THE INTERPRETER'S DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE

An Illustrated Encyclopedia

IDENTIFYING AND EXPLAINING ALL PROPER NAMES AND SIGNIFICANT TERMS AND SUBJECTS IN THE HOLY SCRIPTURES, INCLUDING THE APOCRYPHA With Attention to Archaeological Discoveries and Researches into the Life and Faith of Ancient Times

מלאה הארץ דעה את־יהוה

The earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord—ISAIAH 11:9c

Abingdon Press
NASHVILLE

THE INTERPRETER'S DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE
Volume 2

Copyright © 1962 by Abingdon Press
Copyright renewal © 1990 Abingdon Press

21st Printing 1996

All rights reserved.
No part of this work may be reproduced or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopying and recording, or by any information storage or retrieval system, except as may be expressly permitted by the 1976 Copyright Act or in writing from the publisher. Requests for permission should be addressed in writing to Abingdon Press, 201 Eighth Avenue South, Nashville, TN 37203.

This book is printed on recycled acid-free paper.

ISBN 0-687-19271-4
Library of Congress Catalog Card Number: 62-9387

Scripture quotations unless otherwise noted are from the Revised Standard Version of the Bible and are copyright 1946 and 1952 by the Division of Christian Education of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the U.S.A. Scripture quotations designated "Moffatt" are from The Bible, A New Translation, by James Moffatt, copyright in the United States, 1935, by Harper & Brothers, New York; copyright in countries of the International Copyright Union by Hodder & Stoughton, Ltd., London. Those designated "Amer. Trans." or "Goodspeed" are from The Complete Bible, An American Translation, by J. M. Powis Smith and Edgar J. Goodspeed, copyright 1939 by the University of Chicago. Quotations from the Apocrypha unless otherwise noted are from the Apocrypha: Revised Standard Version of the Old Testament and are copyright 1957 by the Division of Education of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the U.S.A.

MANUFACTURED IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

ABBREVIATIONS

א — Codex Sinaiticus
A — Codex Alexandrinus
AA — Alttestamentliche Abhandlungen
AAA — Annals of Archaeology and Anthropology
AASOR — Annual of the American Schools of Oriental Research
Ab. — Aboth
Add. Esth. — Additions to Esther
AFO — Archiv für Orientforschung
AJA — American Journal of Archaeology
AJSL — American Journal of Semitic Languages and Literatures
AJT — American Journal of Theology
Akkad. — Akkadian
Amer. Trans. — The Complete Bible, an American Translation (Smith and Goodspeed)
ANEP — J. B. Pritchard, ed., The Ancient Near East in Pictures
ANET — J. B. Pritchard, ed., Ancient Near Eastern Texts AO — Der alte Orient
APAW — Abhandlungen der Preussichen Akademie der Wissenschaften
Apoc. — Apocrypha
Apocal. Bar. — Apocalypse of Baruch
Aq. — Aquila
'Ar. — 'Aruk
ARAB — D. D. Luckenbill, Ancient Records of Assyria and Babylonia Arab. — Arabic
'Arak. — 'Arakin
Aram. — Aramaic
ARE — J. H. Breasted, Ancient Records of Egypt ARN — Aboth d'Rabbi Nathan art. — article
ARW — Archiv für Religionswissenschaft
ASAE — Annales du service des antiquités de l'Égypte
Asmp. Moses — Assumption of Moses ASV — American Standard Version (1901)
AT — Altes or Ancien Testament
ATR — Anglican Theological Review
'A.Z. — 'Abodah Zarah

B — Codex Vaticanus
BA — Biblical Archaeologist
Bar. — Baruch Barn. — The Epistle of Barnabas BASOR — Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research
B.B. — Baba Bathra
Bek. — Bekereth
Bel — Bel and the Dragon
Ber. — Berakoth
Bez. — Beẓah
B.K. — Baba Ḳamma
bk. — book
B.M. — Baba Meẓi'a
Bibl. — Biblica
Bibl. Stud. — Biblische Studien
Bik. — Bikkurim
BS — Bibliotheca Sacra
BW — Biblical World
BWANT — Beiträge zur Wissenschaft vom Alten und Neuen Testament
BWAT — Beiträge zur Wissenschaft vom Alten Testament
BZ — Biblische Zeitschrift
BZAW — Beihefte zur Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft
BZF — Biblische Zeitfragen

C — Codex Ephraemi Syri
ca. — circa (about) CDC — Cairo Genizah Document of the Damascus Covenanters (The Zadokite Documents)
cf. — confer (compare)
ch. — chapter
Chr. — Chronicles
Clem. — Clement (I and II)
Clem. Misc. — Clement of Alexandria Miscellanies
Col. — Colossians
col. — column
Cor. — Corinthians
CSEL — Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum

D — Codex Bezae; Codex Claromontanus; Deuteronomist source Dan. — Daniel
Dem. — Demai
Deut. — Deuteronomy
Did. — The Didache
div. — division
DSS — Dead Sea Scrolls

E — east; Elohist source
EB — Early Bronze Age
EB — Études bibliques
Eccl. — Ecclesiastes Ecclus. — Ecclesiasticus
ed. — edited, edition, editor
e.g. — exempli gratia (for example)
Egyp. — Egyptian
EH — Exegetisches Handbuch zum Alten Testament EI — Early Iron Age
Eph. — Ephesians
'Er. — 'Erubin
ERV — English Revised Version (1881-85)
Esd. — Esdras
esp. — especially Esth. — Esther ET — Expository Times
Ethio. — Ethiopian Euseb. Hist. — Eusebius History of the Christian Church
Euseb. Onom. — Eusebius Onomasticon
Exod. — Exodus
Exp. — The Expositor
Ezek. — Ezekiel

fem. — feminine
fig. — figure (illustration)
FRLANT — Forschungen zur Religion und Literatur des Alten und Neuen Testaments

G — Greek Gal. — Galatians
Gen. — Genesis
Giṭ. — Giṭṭin
Gordon — C. H. Gordon, Ugaritic Manual
Gr. — Greek
GSAI — Giornale della società asiatica italiana

GTT — Gereformeerd theologisch Tijdschrift

H — Hebrew; Holiness Code
Hab. — Habakkuk
Hag. — Haggai
Ḥag. — Ḥagigah
Ḥal. — Ḥallah
HAT — Handbuch zum Alten Testament
HDB — James Hastings, ed., A Dictionary of the Bible
Heb. — Hebrew; the Letter to the Hebrews
HERE — James Hastings, ed., Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics
Herm. Mand. — The Shepherd of Hermas, Mandates
Herm. Sim. — The Shepherd of Hermas, Similitudes
Herm. Vis. — The Shepherd of Hermas, Visions
Hitt. — Hittite
HKAT — Handkommentar zum Alten Testament
Hor. — Horayoth
Hos. — Hosea
HS — Die heilige Schrift des Alten Testaments
HTR — Harvard Theological Review
HUCA — Hebrew Union College Annual

ICC — International Critical Commentary
i.e. — id est (that is)
IEJ — Israel Exploration Journal
Ign. Eph. — The Epistle of Ignatius to the Ephesians
Ign. Magn. — The Epistle of Ignatius to the Magnesians
Ign. Phila. — The Epistle of Ignatius to the Philadelphians
Ign. Polyc. — The Epistle of Ignatius to Polycarp
Ign. Rom. — The Epistle of Ignatius to the Romans
Ign. Smyr. — The Epistle of Ignatius to the Smyrnaeans Ign. Trall. — The Epistle of Ignatius to the Trallians intro. — introduction
Iren. Her. — Irenaeus Against Heresies
Iron — Iron Age
Isa. — Isaiah

J — Yahwist source
JA — Journal asiatique
JAOS — Journal of the American Oriental Society
Jas. — James
JBL — Journal of Biblical Literature and Exegesis
JBR — Journal of Bible and Religion
JEA — Journal of Egyptian Archaeology
Jer. — Jeremiah
JJGL — Jahrbuch für jüdische Geschichte und Literatur
JNES — Journal of Near Eastern Studies
Jos. Antiq. — Josephus The Antiquities of the Jews
Jos. Apion — Josephus Against Apion
Jos. Life — Josephus Life
Jos. War — Josephus The Jewish War
Josh. — Joshua
JPOS — Journal of the Palestine Oriental Society
JQR — Jewish Quarterly Review
JR — Journal of Religion
JRAS — Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society
JSOR — Journal of the Society of Oriental Research
J.T. — Jerusalem Talmud
Jth. — Judith
JTS — Journal of Theological Studies
Jub. — Jubilees
Judg. — Judges
Just. Apol. — Justin Martyr Apology
Just. Dial. — Justin Martyr Dialogue with Trypho

KAT — Kommentar zum Alten Testament
Kel. — Kelim
Ker. — Kerithoth
Keth. — Kethuboth
KHC — Kurzer Hand-Kommentar zum Alten Testament
Ḳid. — Ḳiddushin
Kil. — Kil'ayim
KJV — King James Version
KUB — Keilschrifturkunden aus Boghazköi

L — Lukan source
Lam. — Lamentations
Lat. — Latin
LB — Late Bronze Age
Lev. — Leviticus
LXX — Septuagint

M — Matthean source
M. — Mishna
Ma'as. — Ma'asroth
Ma'as Sh. — Ma'aser Sheni
Macc. — Maccabees
Mak. — Makkoth
Maksh. — Makshirin
Mal. — Malachi
Mart. Polyc. — The Martyrdom of Polycarp masc. — masculine Matt. — Matthew
MB — Middle Bronze Age
Meg. — Megillah
Me'il. — Me'ilah
Mek. — Mekilta
Men. — Menaḥoth
mg. — margin
MGWJ — Monatsschrift für Geschichte und Wissenschaft des Judentums Mic. — Micah
Miḳ. — Miḳwa'oth
M.Ḳ. — Mo'ed Ḳaṭan
MS, MSS — manuscript, manuscripts
MT — Masoretic Text
MVAG — Mitteilungen der vorderasiatisch-aegyptischen Gesellschaft

N — north
n. — note
Nah. — Nahum
Naz. — Nazir
NE — northeast
Ned. — Nedarim
Neg. — Nega'im
Neh. — Nehemiah
NF — Neue Folge
Nid. — Niddah
NKZ — Neue kirchliche Zeitschrift
NS — Nova series
NT — New Testament
NTS — New Testament Studies
NTSt — Nieuwe theologische Studien
NTT — Nieuw theologisch Tijdschrift
Num. — Numbers
NW — northwest

Obad. — Obadiah
Ohol. — Oholoth
OL — Old Latin
OLZ — Orientalistische Literaturzeitung
'Or. — 'Orlah
OT — Old Testament

P — Priestly source
p., pp. — page, pages
Par. — Parah
PEQ — Palestine Exploration Quarterly (Palestine Exploration Quarterly Fund)
Pers. — Persian
Pes. — Pesaḥim
Pesiḳ. dRK — Pesiḳta di Rab Kahana
Pesiḳ. R. — Pesiḳtha Rabbathi
Pet. — Peter
Phil. — Philippians Philem. — Philemon
Phoen. — Phoenicia
Pir. R. El. — Pirke di Rabbi Eliezer PJ — Palästina Jahrbuch
pl. — plate (herein, color illustration)
Pliny Nat. Hist. — Pliny Natural History

Polyc. Phil. — The Epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians Prayer Man. — The Prayer of Manasseh Prov. — Proverbs
Ps., Pss. — Psalm, Psalms
PSBA — Proceedings of the Society of Biblical Archaeology Pseudep. — Pseudepigrapha Pss. Sol. — Psalms of Solomon
pt. — part
PTR — Princeton Theological Review

Q — Quelle ("Sayings" source in the gospels)
1QH — Thanksgiving Hymns
1QIs[a] — Isaiah Scroll (published by the American Schools of Oriental Research)
1QIs[b] — Isaiah Scroll (published by E. L. Sukenik, Hebrew University, Jerusalem, Israel)
1QM — War Scroll
1QpHab — Habakkuk Commentary
1QS — Manual of Discipline
1QSa — Rule of the Congregation

RB — Revue biblique
REJ — Revue des études juives
Rev. — Revelation
rev. — revised, revision, reviser
R. H. — Rosh Hashanah
RHPR — Revue d'histoire et de philosophie religieuses RHR — Revue de l'histoire des religions
Rom. — Romans
RR — Ricerche religiose
RS — Revue sémitique
RSR — Recherches de science religieuse
RSV — Revised Standard Version (1946-52)
RTP — Revue de théologie et de philosophie

S — south
Sam. — Samuel
Samar. — Samaritan recension
Sanh. — Sanhedrin
SE — southeast
sec. — section
Shab. — Shabbath
Sheb. — Shebi'ith
Shebu. — Shebu'oth
Shek. — Shekalim
SL — Series Latina
Song of S. — Song of Songs
Song Thr. Ch. — Song of the Three Children (or Young Men)
Soṭ. — Soṭah
SPAW — Sitzungsberichte der Preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften STZ — Schweizerische theologische Zeitschrift
Suk. — Sukkah
Sumer. — Sumerian
Sus. — Susanna
SW — southwest
SWP — Survey of Western Palestine
Symm. — Symmachus
Syr. — Syriac

Ta'an. — Ta'anith
Tac. Ann. — Tacitus Annals
Tac. Hist. — Tacitus Histories
Tam. — Tamid
Tanḥ. — Tanḥuma
Targ. — Targum
T.B. — Babylonian Talmud
TdbK. — Tanna debe Eliyahu
Tem. — Temurah
Ter. — Terumoth
Tert. Apol. — Tertullian Apology
Tert. Marcion — Tertullian Against Marcion
Tert. Presc. Her. — Tertullian Prescriptions Against the Heretics Test. Asher — Testament of Asher Test. Benj. — Testament of Benjamin Test. Dan — Testament of Dan Test. Gad — Testament of Gad
Test. Iss. — Testament of Issachar Test. Joseph — Testament of Joseph Test. Judah — Testament of Judah
Test. Levi — Testament of Levi
Test. Naph. — Testament of Naphtali Test. Reuben — Testament of Reuben Test. Simeon — Testament of Simeon Test. Zeb. — Testament of Zebulun Theod. — Theodotion
Theol. — Theology
Theol. Rundschau — Theologische Rundschau Thess. — Thessalonians
Tim. — Timothy
Tit. — Titus
TLZ — Theologische Literaturzeitung
Tob. — Tobit
Ṭoh. — Ṭohoroth
Tosaf. — Tosafoth
Tosef. — Tosefta
TQ — Theologische Quartalschrift trans. — translated, translation, translator Tristram NHB — H. B. Tristram, The Natural History of the Bible
TSBA — Transactions of the Society of Biblical Archaeology
TSK — Theologische Studien und Kritiken
TT — Theologisch Tijdschrift
TU — Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur TWNT — Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament
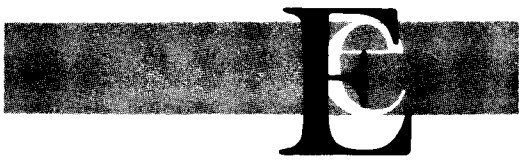
Ṭ.Y. — Ṭebul Yom



Ugar. — Ugaritic
'Uḳ. — 'Uḳẓin

vol. — volume vs., vss. — verse, verses VT — Vetus Testamentum
Vulg. — Vulgate

W — west
WC — Westminster Commentaries
Wisd. Sol. — Wisdom of Solomon
WZKM — Wiener Zeitschrift für die Kunde des Morgenlandes

Y — Yahweh
Yeb. — Yebamoth
Yom. — Yoma

ZA — Zeitschrift für Assyriologie und verwandte Gebiete
Zab. — Zabin
ZAW — Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft
ZDMG — Zeitschrift der deutschen morgenländischen Gesellschaft ZDPV — Zeitschrift des deutschen Palästina-Vereins
Zeb. — Zebaḥim
Zech. — Zechariah
Zeph. — Zephaniah
ZNW — Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der älteren Kirche ZS — Zeitschrift für Semitistik
ZST — Zeitschrift für systematische Theologie
ZThK — Zeitschrift für Theologie und Kirche

E (ELOHIST) ĕl′ō hĭst, ĭ lō′—. One of the principal narrative sources or strata of the PENTATEUCH. The term is derived from a Hebrew word for "God" (אלהים, Elohim; see GOD, NAMES OF, § 3*c*), the use of which is characteristic of this source.

EAGLE [נשר; Aram. נשר (Dan. 4:33—Aram. 4:30; 7:4); ἀετός]. Alternately: VULTURE (Prov. 30:17; Lam. 4:19; Hos. 8:1). Any of several large diurnal birds of prey of the family Accipitridae of the genus Aquila.

The eagle, classified as unclean in Lev. 11:13; Deut. 14:12, was the largest flying bird to be found in Palestine. Probably in the biblical period, as in the nineteenth century, the two types of eagle commonly seen were the Golden Eagle (Aquila chrysaëtos) and the Imperial Eagle (Aquila heliaca heliaca). What impressed the OT writers most about the eagle was the sweep of its flight (Prov. 23:5; Isa. 40:31; Obad. 4) and the swiftness of its movement; the latter frequently served as a simile (Deut. 28:49; II Sam. 1:23; Jer. 4:13; cf. Rev. 12:14; M. Ab. 5:20; for this use in Ugaritic, see ANET 131*a*, lines 14, 16, 21). Reference is also made to the eagle's swooping down on its prey (Job 9:26), to its nesting in inaccessible places (Job 39:27; Jer. 49:16), and to its solicitude for its young (Deut. 32:11). The allusion to the renewal of its youth (Ps. 103:5) doubtless indicates that these birds were known to lead very long lives.

It seems probable that the term נשר was also used for "vulture"; it would, in fact, be difficult to distinguish a vulture from an eagle when it was high in the sky, though the ancient naturalists were aware of the differences between the two birds (Aristotle History of Animals VI.5-6; Pliny Nat. Hist. X.3-4, 7). As most vultures are characterized by the head and neck being more or less bare, it has been suspected that the reference in Mic. 1:16 is to a vulture. The latter, moreover, is characteristically a carrion-eating bird, and is also more gregarious than the eagle; hence the RSV translates נשר as "vulture" in Prov. 30:17 (a possible reference to the vulture's removal of the eyes of its victim); Lam. 4:19; Hos. 8:1; and the RSV mg. renders ἀετός as "vulture" in Matt. 24:28; Luke 17:37.

The eagle, doubtless because it was the monarch of the birds, furnished various figures to the prophets and apocalyptists. Each of Ezekiel's four-faced cherubim has the face of an eagle (Ezek. 1:10; 10:14), and the same prophet uses two eagles in his allegory in ch. 17. In Dan. 7 the lion with eagle's wings (vs. 4) combines the noblest of the beasts and the noblest of the birds to represent the Babylonian kingdom (cf. the use of "gold" in 2:32). In Rev. 4:7 one of the four living creatures surrounding God's throne is said to be like a "flying eagle"; in 8:13 an eagle, possibly the creature mentioned in 4:7, utters a warning to those dwelling on earth (cf. eagles speaking in II Esd. 11:7-10; as a letter carrier in II Bar. 77:17-26). This association of eagles (or vultures) with deity was a very old one in the ancient world. In Akkadian art the eagle symbolizes, or is closely connected with, various deities, as, e.g., the god Ningirsu (see bibliography). In the Iliad Zeus selects an eagle to carry a fawn to the Achaeans (VIII.247-52; cf. XXIV.308-16).

See also FAUNA § B1.

Bibliography. E. Ebeling and B. Meissner, "Adler," Reallexikon der Assyriologie (1932), I, 37.

W. S. MCCULLOUGH

EAGLE, GIER. See VULTURE.

EANES. KJV Apoc. form of MAASEIAH 13.

EAR (HEARING) [אזן; οὖς]. The ear is frequently mentioned in the Bible in its literal, physical sense, but its figurative use as a symbol of the complete process of hearing and, by extension, of understanding and obedience is far more significant. The concrete term "ear" is often employed where our own modes of thought would lead us to use a more abstract word such as "hearing" or "attention." "To speak in the ears" (Deut. 5:1 KJV) means "to speak in the hearing" (so RSV); "to incline the ear" (Ps. 88:2) means "to give attention." The "ear" can also designate the whole faculty of understanding, as in Job 13:1; and because "hearing" in the full sense must include understanding, it is possible to say of people that they "have ears, but hear not" (Jer. 5:21). In many passages the word "ear" might well be translated "mind," as in Job 33:16; cf. LXX.

For the apprehension of the divine word, the possession of physical ears is not enough; God must "open" the ears so that the word is received with comprehension and a spirit of willing obedience (Job 36:10; Ps. 40:6; Isa. 50:4-5). "Uncircumcised" ears are ears which have not been thus opened (Jer. 6:10; Acts 7:51). Ears may also be "heavy" (Isa. 6:10), and men who have physical ears may in fact be "deaf" (Isa. 43:8).

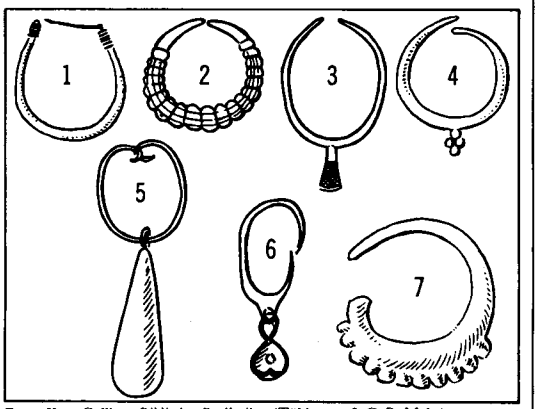
In the Bible, the key word for man's response to God is "hearing" rather than "seeing" (see EYE; SEEING). For the mystery religions the highest religious experience was that of "seeing" the god; but for the Bible, where the basic religious attitude is obedience to the divine word, the emphasis is on "hearing" his voice. The most important formula of Israel's religion begins characteristically: "Hear, O Israel." "He who is of God" is not the mystic who has seen a vision, but one who "hears the words of God" (John 8:47).

R. C. DENTAN

EAR OF GRAIN. "Ear" in this sense usually translates שבלת or στάχυς (Gen. 41:5-7, 22-27; Ruth 2:2; Job 24:24 KJV [RSV HEAD]; Isa. 17:5; Mark 4:28), the individual head of grain. Other terms are: מלילה (Deut. 23:25—H 23:26), referring to rubbed ears of wheat; אביב (Lev. 2:14), ears which are ripe but soft, whose grains may be roasted and eaten; and כרמל (II Kings 4:42), newly ripened ears.

R. W. CORNEY

EARLY RAIN [יורה, מורה]. Alternately: AUTUMN RAIN; FIRST RAIN; KJV FORMER RAIN. The first rains of autumn beginning the rainy season. They were important as softening the ground for plowing, and were linked with the latter rain (see SPRING RAIN) as a token of divine goodness (Deut. 11:14; Ps. 84:6; Jer. 5:24; Joel 2:23).



See also PALESTINE, CLIMATE OF.

R. B. Y. SCOTT

EARNEST. KJV translation of ἀρ(ρ)αβών (II Cor. 1:22; 5:5; Eph. 1:14; RSV GUARANTEE). The word is of Semitic origin, but is found in classical Greek, probably having been brought into Greece by the Phoenicians. In the LXX it translates ערבון (e.g., in Gen. 38:17-18; Deut. 24:6; Job 24:3) and means anything used as a pledge. In Greek from the fourth century B.C. it commonly means "earnest money," and in the papyri it is frequent for a deposit or down payment in business transactions (e.g., BGU 446, 5). In the NT it is used figuratively of "the Spirit" as a guarantee of part payment of the believer's "inheritance" (Ephesians)—namely, immortality—as it is implied in the context of II Cor. 5:5. Cf. the figure in Rom. 8:23 ("the first fruits of the Spirit"). The pledge aspect is reflected in the equation of ἀρραβών with a "seal" in II Cor. 1:22; Eph. 1:14. As in other NT passages, the terminology thus specifically reflects the usage of contemporary documents regarding INHERITANCE and ADOPTION (cf. Rom. 8:15; Gal. 3:18; Heb. 9:15).

Bibliography. J. B. Lightfoot, Notes on the Epistles of St. Paul (1895), pp. 323-24; A. Plummer, II Corinthians (1915), pp. 41, 150; J. H. Moulton and G. Milligan, The Vocabulary of the Greek NT (1929), pp. 79, 346-47; B. Ahern, "The Indwelling Spirit, Pledge of Our Inheritance," Catholic Biblical Quarterly, 9 (1947), 178-89.

A. WIKGREN

From Kurt Galling, Biblisches Reallexikon (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr)

1. Gold earrings: (1-5) from Tell el-'Ajjul; (6) from 'Athlit; (7) from Tell Jemmeh EARRING. The translation of several words:

a) נזם (Exod. 35:22; Judg. 8:24-26; RING in Gen. 24:22, 30, 47; 35:4; Exod. 32:2-3; Job 42:11; Prov. 25:12; Hos. 2:15), a general term for "ring," referring to an earring when qualified by the phrase "in the ears" (Gen. 35:4; Exod. 32:2-3).

b) עגיל (Num. 31:50; Ezek. 16:12), a circular-shaped ornament—whether disc or ring is not clear.

c) לחש in Isa. 3:20 KJV (RSV AMULET).

d) 'Ενώτια (Jth. 10:4).

Fig. EAR 1.

See also PENDANT 3.

J. M. MYERS

EARTH. Biblical views about the earth in its physical aspect are to be found in the OT. The NT has no occasion to touch on the subject, while the intertestamental scriptures confine themselves (as in Ecclesiasticus) to vague praises of the beauties of cosmos, or (as in Enoch) to visionary fantasies.

1. Physical and geographical features
2. Fertility
3. God's earth and devil's earth
4. Mother earth
5. Creation and eschatology
Bibliography

1. Physical and geographical features. The Hebrews regarded the earth as a flat strip (cf. Isa. 42:5; 44:24, where the verb רקע, primarily "flatten out," describes its creation), suspended athwart the cosmic ocean (Pss. 24:2; 136:6) or in empty space (Job 26:7). It was supported on pillars (Job 9:6; Ps. 75:3—H 75:4), joists (Ps. 104:5), or props (מוסדות; II Sam. 22:16; Prov. 8:29; Isa. 24:18; Jer. 31:37; cf. Ugaritic msdt arṣ, II AB, i.40), the lower ends of which reached down to the nether world. To prevent its being submerged by the surrounding waters, it was hemmed in by a protective bound (חוג; Job 26:10; Prov. 8:29), probably conceived as a range of mountains, like the Qâaf of later Arabic folklore. See bibliography § 2.

The total surface of the earth was comprehended by the expression "the four edges" (ארבע כנפות הארץ, RSV "the four corners"; Isa. 11:12; Ezek. 7:2 [LXX πτέρυγες; Vulg. plagae]; cf. Job 37:3 [Vulg. termini])—an expression which recurs in Akkadian (kippat irbitti) and which also finds its counterpart in the early Aramaic inscriptions from Zenjirli (Pannamu 14: רבעת ארק; Bar Rekub 3-4: Tiglath-pileser, מרא רבעי ארקא = Akkad. šar kibrat irbitti, KB II, 2.8.34, etc.). In Job 38:13 the word for "edges" (כנפות) is taken in the literal sense of "skirts," and God is said to grasp them every morning and shake them out so as to rid them of the wicked, as if the latter were dust or vermin.

The ultima Thule of the earth was popularly identified with the wild regions lying to the N, or NE, of Syria (Jer. 6:22; 31:8; 50:41; etc.). This will explain why the ark of Noah, drifting to the end of the world, is said (Gen. 8:4) to have come to rest on the mountains of Ararat—i.e., Urartu-Armenia. In the same way, the Greeks spoke of Scythia as the "back of beyond" (e.g., Aeschylus Prometheus Vinctus 1-3), and the Hittites of the land of the Lullu, near Lake Urmiah.

In II Esd. 6:42 it is stated that six parts of the earth are habitable, while a seventh is covered by water. This strange notion is without parallel in any other ancient writer, but it is of great interest to observe that precisely the opposite of it is attributed by Roger Bacon (Opus majus I, 290, ed. Bridges) to Ptolemy. Since, however, no such assertion is actually to be found in the latter's extant writings, and since it runs counter to what he elsewhere has to say about the surface of the earth, it is not improbable that his original statement in fact agreed with that of II Esdras but was misunderstood by Bacon or his source. See bibliography § 3.

2. Fertility. The fertility of the earth was thought to be dependent largely on the conduct of men—an idea which recurs in other cultures (cf., e.g., Odyssey XIX.109 ff; Hesiod Works and Days 225-27). Accordingly, misdeeds occasioned blight or drought. This belief, shared by several ancient and primitive peoples, stemmed originally from the notion that human misbehavior upset the balance and order of nature in general. In the Bible, however, the concept is expressed in theological terms: such actions offend the tutelary deity (genius loci) and cause him to withdraw his presence and providence (cf., e.g., Deut. 11:16-17; Joel 1). See bibliography § 4.

In Isa. 62:4 the barren but subsequently requickened earth is likened to a woman who is at first abandoned, or put away (עזובה), but eventually remarried (בעולה). This comparison of the soil to a woman, and of its rain-giving god to her impregnator, occurs already in the Tell el-Amarna Letters (74, rev. 7, Knudzton), and is, indeed, virtually ubiquitous in ancient literature (see bibliography § 5). Conversely, when the earth lies barren, this may be described in terms of sexual unchastity (חנף; Isa. 24:5; Jer. 3:1; etc.).

The earth was considered to be polluted especially by bloodshed. Nothing would grow where innocent blood had been spilled (Gen. 4:11-12; Num. 35:33-34), and such soil would be bereft of rainfall (II Sam. 1:21). The idea is admirably illustrated by the Ugaritic Poem of Aqhat, where the murder of that youth is first revealed by a sudden failure of the crops, and where his father, Dan'el, invokes drought upon the blood-stained ground. Analogous notions obtained in classical antiquity (cf. Sophocles Oedipus Rex 22-30; Livy XLV.5). See bibliography § 6.

Hebrew law required that the earth lie fallow every seventh year (Exod. 23:10-12; Deut. 31:10). Although this came to be explained as a humane concession to the poor, it probably originated in the common ancient practice of measuring time in seven- or eight-year "leases" (see bibliography § 7). When a lease expired, an interval of "death" ensued until the next lease began. See JUBILEE, YEAR OF.

3. God's earth and devil's earth. The soil of any given area was regarded as the "estate" (נחלה) of the local deity (cf. II Sam. 20:19; Ps. 79:1; Jer. 2:7; 16:18; etc.), who, as its landlord and "quickener," was entitled to a prime share (tithe) of its produce (see bibliography § 8). Waste land, on the other hand, was the domain of noxious spirits, the natural habitat of demons (cf. Isa. 13:21; 32:14; see DEMON § 1*e*). So, too, among the modern fellaḥîn of Palestine, stony soil is called "devil's land" (arḍ Iblîs). An interesting parallel may be adduced also from Sir Walter Scott's celebrated Letters on Demonology and Witchcraft (no. 3). In many parishes of Scotland, we are told, a certain portion of land, known as the "gudeman's croft," used to be left unplowed and uncultivated as the preserve of the Devil. See bibliography § 9.

4. Mother Earth. There is no evidence that even recalcitrant Israelites ever worshiped the earth. But that this was the case among their Semitic neighbors there can be no doubt. A deity named Erṣîtu—i.e., "Earth"— is mentioned in an early list of gods from Asshur; while in the mythological poems from Ras Shamra-Ugarit (II AB, i.16; I* AB, v.11; etc.), A-r-ṣ-y—i.e., "Lady Earth"—is one of the brides of Baal. It is probable, however, from the words of Job 1:21 ("Naked I came forth from my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither" [where "thither," strangely omitted in the RSV, is deictic, the speaker pointing to the earth]), that the concept of Mother Earth was not unknown in Israel. See bibliography § 10.

5. Earth in cosmogony and eschatology. In the account of the Creation in Gen. 1 the earth is said to have been created on the third day of that process (vss. 9-10); while in the account preserved in Gen. 2 we are informed (vss. 5-6) that it was at first watered, not by rains, but by a subterranean flow (אד = Akkadian edu). The latter notion retrojects into cosmogony the climatic conditions that actually obtain every autumn at the beginning of the agricultural year. See COSMOGONY § A2*c*.

A renewal, even a prodigious increase, of the earth's fertility is a feature of the "new creation" which is to follow the collapse of the present world order. A special stream of living waters will be released (Zech. 14:8); the skies will rain oil and the wadies run with honey (Joel 31:18—H 4:18; Amos 9:13; Sibylline Oracles 3:774-77; II Enoch 8:5; etc.).

On "earth" as a euphemism for the nether world, see DEAD, ABODE OF THE.

Bibliography. 1. General: R. Patai, 'Adham we'adhamah (Man and Earth; 1943; in Hebrew).

2. On the encircling mountain: A. J. Wensinck, The Ideas of the Western Semites Concerning the Navel of the Earth (1916), pp. 5-7.

3. On the statement in II Esd. 6:42 concerning the proportion of water to habitable land: S. Gandz, Proceedings of the American Academy for Jewish Research, XXII (1953), 25-32.

4. On fertility as dependent on human behavior: J. G. Frazer, The Golden Bough, I, ii, 111-17; M. Delcourt, Stérilités mystérieuses et naissances maléfiques dans l'antiquité classique (1938).

5. On the comparison of the earth to a woman: P. Haupt, JAOS, XXVI (1906), 417-20; E. S. Hartland, Primitive Paternity (1909), I, 309-10; M. Eliade, Traité d'histoire des religions. (1949), pp. 224-25, 230-31.

6. On the infertility of the earth through bloodshed: T. H. Gaster, Thespis (1950), p. 296.

7. On seven-year leases: J. G. Frazer, The Golden Bough, IV, 68 ff; VII, 80 ff.

8. On the deity as a landlord to whom a tithe is given: W. Robertson Smith, The Religion of the Semites (3rd ed., by S. A. Cook; 1927), pp. 459, 554.

9. On "devil's land" in Arabic folklore: T. Canaan, ZDMG, LXX (1916), 168.

10. On the deification of the earth in a text from Asshur (VAT 10173, ii.4): O. Schroeder, ZA, XXXIII (1921), 130. On Mother Earth among the Semites: T. Nöldeke, ARW, VIII (1910), 161 ff; K. Briem, ARW, XXIV (1926), 179-95; M. Stein, Tarbiz, IX (1938), 257-77 (in Hebrew).

T. H. GASTER

EARTHENWARE. See POTTERY.

EARTHQUAKE [רעש, shaking, trembling; σεισμός, shaking, as of a sieve]. A trembling of the earth, caused sometimes by volcanic activity but more frequently by a displacement, often very slight, of the earth's crust (tectonic earthquake). When the wave of vibration is severe, it produces spectacular secondary effects, such as loud rumbling noises (Ezek. 3:12-13), avalanches (I Kings 19:11), fissures in the earth (Num. 16:32), and destructive fires (Rev. 8:5).

Palestine lies within the active earthquake zone bounded by the Alps, the Caucasus, and the Himalayas, in which some twenty per cent of recorded earthquakes occur. Although the incidence of earthquakes is greater in Syria to the N, Palestine experiences an average of one or two destructive earthquakes per century, and two to six light shocks each year. The geologically unstable Jordan Valley and the fault lines which run into it obliquely from both E and W create the conditions necessary for movements of the earth's surface. Principal centers of earthquake activity are in Upper Galilee, in the Samaritan territory near Nablus (biblical Shechem), and on the W edge of the Judean Mountains near Lydda, with secondary centers in the Jordan Valley at Jericho and Tiberias.

Classical and modern writers record at least seventeen major earthquakes in the Palestine area during the Christian era. An idea of the destructiveness of these tremors is provided by the earthquake of 1837, which did severe structural damage in twelve districts and took over four thousand lives.

The French archaeologist Claude Schaeffer uses destruction levels caused by earthquakes as a means of comparative dating of biblical sites, and finds evidence for a particularly heavy quake covering the whole region ca. 1365 B.C.—i.e., during the period of the sojourn in Egypt. A memorable earthquake from which Amos' prophecy is dated took place in the reign of Uzziah (786-744 B.C.; Amos 1:1; Zech. 14:5). Josephus describes a severe shock during the reign of Herod (Antiq. XV.v.2), evidence of which was found in the buildings of the Essene community at Qumran. Matthew mentions earthquakes in connection with the crucifixion and resurrection of Jesus (Matt. 27:54; 28:2), and Luke records a tremor which broke open the prison at Philippi where Paul and Silas were confined (Acts 16:26).

The earthquake is one mark of Yahweh's presence for revelation (Exod. 19:18) or for destructive judgment (Isa. 29:6). From the latter use it is only a step to the appearance of earthquakes among the catastrophic disasters of the last days (Matt. 24:7; Mark 13:8; Luke 21:11; Rev. 6:12; 8:5; 11:13, 19; 16:18).

Bibliography. G. A. Smith, Jerusalem (1908), vol. I, ch. 4. C. F. A. Schaeffer, Stratigraphie Comparée (1948), ch. 1. D. H. K. Amiran, "A Revised Earthquake-Catalogue of Palestine," IEJ, I (1950-51), 223 ff; II (1952), 48 ff.

L. E. TOOMBS

EAST. See ORIENTATION.

EAST, THE PEOPLE OF THE [בני קדם, benê qedhem]; KJV alternately: CHILDREN OF THE EAST; MEN OF THE EAST. A term used very broadly to indicate those nations who lived to the E of the Israelites. Thus, in Gen. 29:1, Jacob came to the lands of the people of the East in Paddan-aram. In Judg. 6-8 the term denotes Arab groups who accompanied the Midianites and the Amalekites in attacking Israel, and the same is true for Jer. 49:28; Ezek. 25:4, 10. On the other hand, in Isa. 11:14 the term seems to be equivalent to Edom and Moab, and in Job 1:3 seems to have been included under this designation. The Eastern peoples had a special reputation for wisdom (I Kings 4:30—H 5:10); this may have been the reason for introducing the wise men from the East in the story of the birth of Jesus (Matt. 2:1-12). S. COHEN

EAST COUNTRY [ארץ קדם, 'ereṣ qedhem] (Gen. 25:6). The land to which Abraham sent the children of his concubines. The term is equivalent to that part of Arabia which lies SE of Palestine.

EAST GATE [שער המזרח]. A gate mentioned in Neh. 3:29, but not as one of the structures restored by Nehemiah; perhaps identical with the "eastern gate of the house of Yahweh" (Ezek. 10:19; 11:1). The term "east gate" is used erroneously for the POTSHERD GATE in Jer. 19:2 KJV. See JERUSALEM § 7*b*. G. A. BARROIS

EAST SEA, EASTERN SEA [ים הקדמוני]. A name employed in certain late prophetic passages (Ezek. 47:18; Joel 2:20; Zech. 14:8) for the lake called the Salt Sea in the Pentateuch and Joshua and at present known as the DEAD SEA. The designation is derived from the sea's position on the E boundary of the ancient land of Israel. W. H. MORTON

EAST WIND [רוח קדים, קדים]. Not merely a wind direction like "north wind" (Prov. 25:23), but the name of a wind with special characteristics, now known as the khamsin or sirocco. It is a hot, dry, dusty wind from the deserts to the S and SE of Palestine (Jer. 4:11; Hos. 13:15) which often blows for several days in the transitional months April-June and September-November. High temperatures and extremely low humidity, together with dust-filled air, make this weather trying to men and animals (Isa. 27:8; Jonah 4:8) and withering to vegetation (Gen. 41:6; Ezek. 17:10). The wind may become a gale or WHIRLWIND (Job 27:20-21), wreck seagoing vessels (Ps. 48:7—H 48:8; Ezek. 27:26), and drive back the shallow waters of the Reed Sea (Exod. 14:21).

See also PALESTINE, CLIMATE OF.

R. B. Y. SCOTT

EASTER. KJV translation (erroneous) of πάσχα (Passover) in Acts 12:4. See PASSOVER AND FEAST OF UNLEAVENED BREAD.

EATING. See MEALS.

EBAL ē'bəl [עיבל]. 1. Ancestor of a Horite subclan in Edom; the third son of clan chief Shobal (Gen. 36:23; I Chr. 1:40).

2. Alternate form of OBAL.

EBAL, MOUNT. A mountain located N of and directly opposite Mount Gerizim, with which it forms the sides of an important E-W pass. SHECHEM lies at the E entrance and modern Nablus in the valley between the mountains. The modern name is Jebel Eslamiyeh. See GERIZIM, MOUNT; PALESTINE, GEOGRAPHY OF.

From Atlas of the Bible (Thomas Nelson & Sons Limited)

2. Mount Ebal is to the right, while Mount Gerizim stands to the left. The modern village of Balata, at the S edge of Tell Balata (ancient Shechem), lies near the pass between the two mountains.

The Hebrews, on entering Canaan after the time of Moses, were to confirm the covenant with Yahweh; this involved the setting of the blessing on Mount Gerizim and the curse on Mount Ebal (Deut. 11:29). It is not clear from this passage that the mountain itself was to be cursed, although this has become the tradition. From Deut. 27:13 we gather that the mountain was the place from which curses were pronounced by Reuben, Gad, Asher, Zebulun, Dan, and Naphtali upon any persons who would break the commandments. A degree of sanctity for Ebal is implied in Deut. 27:4 (Samaritan Pentateuch "Gerizim"), where the tradition is reported that stones inscribed with the law are to be placed on Mount Ebal. According to Josh. 8:30, 33, Joshua built an altar on Mount Ebal, and under his leadership the people engaged in a covenantal ceremony, with half of them in front of Ebal and the other half in front of Gerizim, and the ark of the covenant between them. Figs. EBA 2; JAC 7.

Bibliography. G. A. Smith, The Historical Geography of the Holy Land (1896), pp. 119-23; E. Nielsen, Shechem (1955): see index of OT passages cited above; D. Daly, The Geography of the Bible (1957), pp. 20, 36, 178, 180. W. L. REED

EBED ē′bĕd [עבד, evidently a shortened form of עבדאל, servant of God]. 1. The father of Gaal, who led the rebellion against Abimelech at Shechem (Judg. 9: 26-35).

2. One of those who returned to Palestine with Ezra (Ezra 8:6). The LXX and I Esd. 8:32 have ὤβεθ, so it is possible that his name is an abbreviation of עבדיה, "Servant of Yahu." M. NEWMAN

EBED-MELECH ē′bĭd mĕl′ĭk [עבד־מלך, servant of the king]. An Ethiopian EUNUCH in Zedekiah's court, who rescued Jeremiah from the cistern (Jer. 38:7-13). The oracle in Jer. 39:15-18 (sometimes considered a Deuteronomic addition) promised Ebed-melech that he would survive the destruction of the kingdom, as a reward for his deed.

The title ebed (lit., "slave") was adopted, apparently for the first time by David, from Akkadian practice, and was used in Edom and Ammon as well. It designated the class of court (often mercenary) officials, as distinguished from the older institution of tribal elders. In "Ebed-melech" it has become a proper name (known also in Assyrian and Nabatean).

J. M. WARD

EBENEZER ĕb′ə nē′zər [אבן העזר, stone of help]. A place near APHEK where the Israelites had two battles with the Philistines, in the second of which the ark was captured (I Sam. 4:1-11; 5:1). The site may be Majdel Yaba, NE of Jaffa.

I Sam. 7:12 mentions another Ebenezer, a stone which was set up between Mizpah and Jeshanah (MT Shen) to commemorate a victory over the Philistines. This passage comes from the later, unhistorical section of the book, and is apparently an attempt to give a more pleasant explanation of the name. S. COHEN

EBER ē′bər [עבר, eponym from עברי, HEBREW; in 2-4 below a few Heb. MSS read עבד ('ébhedh), servant; in 2-5 LXX tends to read Ωβηδ or Αβεδ]. An eponym. Noth (see bibliography) reads 'ébhedh ("servant") in all occurrences except Num. 24:24.

1. The eponymous ancestor of the Hebrews (Gen. 10:21, 24-25; 11:14-17; Num. 24:24 [see bibliography]; I Chr. 1:18-19, 25). J makes Eber an ancestor of all Semites (Gen. 10:21-25; see SHEM; JOKTAN), while P restricts the progeny of Eber to the Hebrews alone (Gen. 11:14-26). The Chronicler combines the two theories (I Chr. 1:17-27). In Num. 24:24, Eber should probably not be read as a proper name but as the word עבר for "region beyond" (here, beyond the Euphrates), which is the same as the name Eber in Hebrew.

2. A family of the tribe of Gad (I Chr. 5:13).

3. A family of the tribe of Benjamin (I Chr. 8:12).

4. Another family of the tribe of Benjamin (I Chr. 8:22).

5. A postexilic priest (Neh. 12:20).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 252; J. Skinner, Genesis, ICC (2nd ed., 1930), pp. 187 ff. H. H. GUTHRIE, JR.

EBEZ ē′bĕz [אבץ] (Josh. 19:20); KJV ABEZ ā′bĕz. A town in Issachar. Its location is unknown. Possibly "Ebez" is an error for רבץ, "resting place," with the LXX B reading Ῥεβές.

Bibliography. W. F. Albright, "The Topography of the Tribe of Issachar," ZAW (1926), p. 231. G. W. VAN BEEK

EBIASAPH. Alternate form of ABIASAPH.

EBIONITES, GOSPEL OF THE ē′bĭ ə nīts ['Εβιωναῖοι or -ῖται; אביונים, poor]. A gospel referred to and cited by Epiphanius alone under this title, but probably (although this is denied by many) to be identified with the Gospel According to the Hebrews. See HEBREWS, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO THE.

If, as many scholars still contend, this gospel is not to be identified with the Gospel According to the Hebrews, our sole knowledge of it depends upon Epiphanius, who vies with Jerome for the distinction of being the least to be trusted of the ancient fathers in such matters. His several references to and citations of this writing (Heresies XXX), while confusing, suggest that it is essentially the same as the Gospel According to the Hebrews, referred to by several of the early fathers and frequently confused with the Gospel of the Nazarenes (see NAZARENES, GOSPEL OF), which Jerome mistakenly claimed to have translated for the first time from Hebrew into Greek and Latin. Epiphanius' quotations which are to be considered in connection with the Ebionite Gospel According to the Hebrews list the twelve apostles with John in first place; replace the locusts which John the Baptist was said to have eaten with honey cakes (the Ebionites were, of course, vegetarians); mention John the Baptist's lineage; deny the supernatural birth of Jesus; quote Jesus' word in the form: "I came to destroy the sacrifices, and if ye cease not from sacrificing, the wrath of God will not cease from you"; and, again in line with their vegetarian scruples, alter Jesus' word about preparation for the Last Supper to a revealing question: "Have I desired with desire to eat this flesh of the Passover with you?"

Bibliography. E. Hennecke, Handbuch zu den Neutestamentlichen Apokryphen (1904); B. W. Bacon, Studies in Matthew (1930), especially pp. 478-95; J. Schoeps, Theologie und Geschichte des Judenchristentums (1950). Epiphanius' quotations have been conveniently collected in M. R. James, The Apocryphal NT (1924), pp. 8-10. M. S. ENSLIN

EBONY [הבנים, hobhnîm, only plural, from Egyp. hbny; ἔβενος]. The highly prized core wood of the tree Diospyros ebenum König (and other species), imported from S India and Ceylon (and perhaps Ethiopia). It is mentioned along with ivory tusks, which were a part of Tyre's trade with the "men of Rhodes" (Ezek. 27:15; the RSV follows the more plausible LXX and a few Hebrew MSS; KJV "Dedan"). The Egyptians, Phoenicians, Babylonians, Greeks, and Romans prized ebony and ivory for use in furniture (ebony inlaid with ivory is exceptionally beautiful), vessels, and turned objects. It was also used in the Near East for idols.

3. Ebony

Some scholars read the difficult שנהבים in I Kings 10:22 ("ivory") as שן והבנים, "ivory and ebony," thus finding another reference to ebony, an item of trade with Solomon; but see IVORY; FAUNA § A2*i*.

See also FLORA § A8*a;* RHODES; TRADE AND COMMERCE; TYRE.

Fig. EBO 3.

Bibliography. H. N. and A. L. Moldenke, Plants of the Bible (1952), p. 95. J. C. TREVER

EBRON ē′brən [עברון] (Josh. 19:28); KJV HEBRON hē′brən. A town in the territory allotted to Asher. "Ebron" is generally regarded as a mistake in the MT for ABDON.

EBRONAH. KJV form of ABRONAH.

ECANUS. KJV Apoc. form of ETHANUS.

ECBATANA ĕk băt′ə nə [Aram. אחמתא; Old Pers. hagmatāna, place of gathering(?); Pahlavi 'hm(t'n); Elam. ag-ma-da-na; Akkad. a-ga-ma-ta-nu; Ἀγβάτανα, Ἀμαθά (II Esd. 6:2 LXX A), Ἐκβάτανα]; KJV ACHMETHA ăk′mə thə; KJV Apoc. ECBATANE ĕk băt′ə nĭ. A city located at the foot of the Elvend Mountain; now Hamadan.

According to Herodotus (I.96), the city was founded by the Median king Deioces (see MEDIA), while the story contained in Jth. 1:1-4 (see JUDITH §§ 2-3) seems to have little historical value. Cyrus the Great captured Ecbatana in the middle of the sixth century, and it then became the favorite summer residence of the Achaemenian kings (Xenophon Anabasis III.5.15; Cyropaedia VIII.6.22). At Ecbatana during the reign of Darius I a copy of Cyrus' decree concerning the rebuilding of the Jerusalem temple was found, according to Ezra 6:2. See CYRUS.

The city's architectural outlay and lavish construction are described by the Greek authors. Despite the alleged destruction and looting by Alexander the Great, the city remained famous for its luxury and once more became a summer capital, this time of the Parthian rulers (Strabo XI.522; XVI.743). After a slight decline in its importance under the Sassanians the present town was built after the Islamic conquest of Iran, and it is frequently mentioned thereafter by the Islamic authors. It survived severe damage by the Mongol armies in 1220 and again in the next century by Tamerlane. Today it is one of the principal cities of Iran. Its location on the roads from Baghdad to Teheran and from Khorramshahr on the Persian Gulf to Teheran makes it a center of traffic and commerce, as it used to be under the Achaemenians and after, on the main route from Mesopotamia to Iran and farther E to India and Central Asia.

No thorough archaeological work has so far been undertaken at Ecbatana-Hamadan. The modern city is built on top of the ancient, and excavations would necessitate extensive demolition of existing buildings. Incidental discovery of silver and golden objects and of a number of Old Persian inscriptions, which mention Ariyāramna (Ariaramnes), the great-grandfather of Darius the Great, and his son Aršāma (Arsames), among others, are sufficient to show the great promise of the city as an archaeological site.

The alleged tomb of Esther and Mordecai which is to be found in Hamadan is, perhaps, the tomb of the wife of the Sassanian ruler Yazdegird (399-420/421).

Bibliography. C. A. Barbier de Meynard, Dictionnaire géographique, historique et littéraire de la Perse (1861), pp. 597 ff; E. Weissbach, "Ecbatana," in Pauly-Wissowa, Realenzyclopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, V (1905), 2155-58; E. Herzfeld, Archaeological History of Iran (1935). On the gold treasure, see: The Illustrated London News (July 17 and Aug. 21, 1948). On the inscriptions, see: R. G. Kent, Old Persian (1950), pp. 107, 111, 113-14, 116, 147, 153, 155.

M. J. DRESDEN

ECCLESIASTES ĭ klē′zĭ ăs′tēz ['Εκκλησιαστής, one who participates in a popular assembly]. Alternately: KOHELETH kō hĕl′əth (properly Qoheleth) [קהלת, preacher(?) or speaker before an assembly(?) or officer of the assembly(?)]. The pen name of the author (1:12) and the name of his book, the twenty-first book of the OT in the common English versions. The book, like Job, is a noble example of OT wisdom literature. Attributed by courtesy to King Solomon, it was probably written during the Greek period (ca. 250), and its author may have been a Jewish sage schooled in the wisdom tradition and affected by the spirit (rather than the particulars) of Greek philosophy. Though not wholly uncommitted, he explored life with an open mind and recorded his findings as to what is best for a man. His counsel of pleasure is modified by his unacknowledged standards of right and wrong and by his sense of pity for the human state.

1. Title
2. Canon
3. Position
4. Language, text, and versions
5. The author and his times
6. Unity of the book
7. Thought of Koheleth
   a. Wisdom
   b. Ethics
   c. Religion

Bibliography

1. Title. "Ecclesiastes" is the English spelling by way of the Vulg. of the Greek word ἐκκλησιαστής. This Greek noun is related to the more common word 'εκκλησία (the NT term for "church" or "congregation"). In the LXX the term appears in the title verse of the book: "The words of Ecclesiastes, the son of David, king of Israel in Jerusalem" (1:1; cf. 1:12). Read instead with the Hebrew term, the title verse reads: "The words of Koheleth, the son of David. . . ." "Koheleth" (or "Qoheleth") is the English spelling of קהלת, a name which is found seven times in Ecclesiastes and nowhere else in biblical literature. It appears to be a feminine active participle of the verb קהל, which means "to come together" (niph'al) or "to bring together" (hiph'il) and is not used in the qal except here. It is related to the masculine noun qāhāl, "assembly," which circumstance doubtless influenced the Greek translators. The meaning of the name, however, is not clear. The customary rendering, "the Preacher," is not satisfactory; this translation goes back to the Latin commentary of Jerome, who interprets the word as concionator, "speaker before an assembly," but "Preacher" is a poor translation, because whatever Koheleth may be doing in his book, he is not "preaching."

Though the form qôhéleth is feminine, it is construed (1:2; 12:8-10) with masculine verbs, and the feminine form of the Hebrew verb in 7:27—concealed in the English of the RSV—is probably an error: false word-division. The masculine intent of the word is beyond question, since Koheleth appears as a "son," not a daughter, of David (1:1) and as a "king," not a queen, in Jerusalem (1:12). It is customary to compare two names of similar form among "Solomon's servants" listed in Neh. 7:57, 59, which may be occupational titles. One of these, "Sophereth," which though feminine in form might mean "Scribe," is indeed very much like "Koheleth," which could by analogy mean "Officer of the Kahal (assembly)."

Whatever the meaning of the word—and it remains obscure—the author obviously employed it as a proper noun. It was his name: "I Koheleth have been king over Israel in Jerusalem" (1:12)—this despite its use twice with the article ("the Koheleth"), in 7:27 (with different word-division as in the RSV) and 12:8 (but cf. 1:2). The editor who supplied the title verse certainly understood the word as a name: "Koheleth, the son of David."

To be sure, no son of David, to our knowledge, bore the name Koheleth. Moreover, to our knowledge no son of David but Solomon was "king over Israel in Jerusalem." "Koheleth," then, substitutes for Solomon, and the author by design personates Solomon. For his purposes, to seem as one to whom no avenue was closed, able by reason of his superior mind and unlimited wealth and populous harem to gratify all earthly desires, the author made of himself a Solomon, since by his time that ancient king had in popular fancy achieved renown for wisdom and surpassing splendor (I Kings 10:23). Without himself adopting the name of Solomon, without even calling himself the son of David (not he but his editor wrote 1:1), he yet suggests Solomon in his words in 1:12: "I Koheleth have been king over Israel in Jerusalem."

By thus personating Solomon, the author of Ecclesiastes both employed and enhanced the tradition concerning Solomon—the tradition that said of him: "He also uttered three thousand proverbs; and his songs were a thousand and five" (I Kings 4:32—H 5:12); the tradition that made him the author also of Proverbs and the Song of Solomon and, eventually, of the Wisdom of Solomon and the Psalms of Solomon, and that made him likewise the beneficiary of an annual income starting with "six hundred and sixty-six talents of gold" (I Kings 10:14) and the proprietor of "seven hundred wives, princesses, and three hundred concubines" (I Kings 11:3). It was such a Solomon the author of Ecclesiastes would have a person think of as he listened to the tale of the author's own experiments at lavish living.

2. Canon. This evocation of Solomon, for the author's own, quite different purposes, perhaps also facilitated the admission of his book into the OT canon. At the close of the pre-Christian era the school of Hillel regarded Ecclesiastes as a book "which soils the hands" (is holy); not so the school of Shammai (M. 'Eduyot V.3). As late as the end of the first Christian century the academies were still considering whether the book is holy (M. Yadayim III.5; T. Shab. 30*b;* ARN I). It contains contradictions, some said; others suggested: it is not revealed wisdom, for it sets forth Solomon's private opinions

(T. Meg. 7*a*). If in one sense the book came too close to Solomon and was suspect just because, not God, but he seemed to be speaking in it, in another sense its attribution to Solomon of old may have saved it for the canon. The Tosefta suggests that books known to be recent products were not endorsed: "Ben Sira and books of later vintage are not sacred" (Tosef. Yadayim 2.13). But a book with Solomon's seal upon it could hardly be labeled modern. So Ecclesiastes was admitted to the CANON OF THE OT.

3. Position. In the LXX the three books attributed to Solomon (Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Solomon) follow on Psalms, attributed to the father of Solomon. The KJV and the RSV adopted this order, but the English version of the Jewish Publication Society includes Ecclesiastes with the Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations, and Esther to make the Five Scrolls (megilloth), and these follow on the longer books Psalms, Proverbs, and Job among the Writings (Kethubhim) or Hagiographa. There is a rabbinic tradition which groups Proverbs, the Song of Solomon, and Ecclesiastes together as in the LXX, though with a different explanation: that King Hezekiah and his school preserved these three books (T. B.B. 14*b*-15*a*). Naturally, too, midrashic literature also groups together the "Solomonic" books; Midrash Shir Hashirim Rabbah to Song of S. 1:1 (section 10) suggests that Solomon wrote the Song of Solomon in his youth, when one sings, Proverbs when he attained maturity, and Ecclesiastes in his old age, because it is the way of old men to speak of life's illusions. There is a difference of opinion among the authorities in that midrashic passage, one suggesting that Solomon wrote Proverbs before the Song, another that he wrote all three books in a burst of inspiration near the end of his life—but all agree that old age had come upon him by the time he wrote Ecclesiastes.

The Solomonic tradition accounts for the grouping of Proverbs, the Song of Solomon, and Ecclesiastes, but another principle is involved in the clustering of the "five scrolls" characteristic, with rare exceptions, of Hebrew Bible MSS and editions. It was probably the custom of reading the scrolls in the synagogue on certain holy days that brought them together. There is no direct evidence from early times for the public reading of Ecclesiastes, but by the end of the eleventh century it was an established custom to read this scroll in the house of worship on the Feast of Tabernacles (Machzor Vitry, pp. 440-41), and the other four had since earlier times been assigned to appropriate occasions. In Bible MSS the five scrolls do not appear in a final, fixed order, though Ecclesiastes is usually in third or fourth place and in the company of the Song of Solomon.

4. Language, text, and versions. The association of Ecclesiastes with Solomon being no more than a literary device misunderstood, the date of the book is an open question. For determining the relative date the character of the Hebrew in which it is written is one fairly safe criterion. Style in this instance has more than usual significance. A hypothesis to the effect that the biblical book is a Hebrew translation of an Aramaic original, though warmly and ably defended, has not produced conviction. Such rhythmic lines as 7:15-20 are too good to be a translation from even a cognate language. The language of Ecclesiastes is better described as a stage in the development of the Hebrew itself. The book was written in the Hebrew of its author's day, and this was in transition to the Mishnaic idiom. The waw consecutive forms of the verb are all but totally lacking, and there is a relatively large proportion of participles; the relative pronoun שׁ appears about as often as אשׁר; a Persian word occurs—the word for PARK; and too many words and forms for chance suggest that the author and his public spoke Hebrew with an Aramaic accent. Such phenomena and others distinguish the language of Ecclesiastes from classical Hebrew and give it a pre-Mishnaic flavor. The bearing of this fact upon the question of the date of the book is obvious.

The text of Ecclesiastes is relatively clean. Some obscurities can be cleared up easily; little remains quite dark.

If the text of Ecclesiastes is fairly intact, the book had no very long history of textual transmission before it began to enjoy the loving care which preserved the whole Bible text almost unchanged throughout the Christian centuries. That there are no great differences between the Hebrew text and the early versions, including the quite literal Greek translation, apparently means that the recensions of the Hebrew text current in the age of the translators were fairly uniform; and this fact adds to the impression that the text of Ecclesiastes had no very long history before it became fixed. The probable date of the book points to the same conclusion.

5. The author and his times. Except that we know he was not Solomon, we know very little directly about the author of Ecclesiastes. Why, wishing to be associated with Solomon, he chose for himself the name Koheleth is not obvious. We can hardly suppose that he expected his readers to think automatically of Solomon's assembling of Israel in Jerusalem to dedicate his temple, even though the Hebrew word for "assemble" in I Kings 8:1 is from the same root as the name Koheleth. He may, instead, have meant to say something specific about himself, adopting a nom de plume that both concealed and suggested his identity. To us it suggests no more than that possibly he was a public figure connected with some "assembly." That, like Solomon whom he personates, he lived in Jerusalem, as he says in 1:12, 16, we have no reason to question. His urbanity and his cosmopolitanism, as well as his casual attitude toward temple affairs (5:1-5), suggest his residence in that center of cult and culture. His first-person narrative combines homiletic artistry with autobiography, invention with experience; and it is difficult to segregate the fact from the fiction. We could safely say that the author had the means himself to satisfy, to some extent at least, the desires to which in the person of Koheleth he gives full rein. He had wealth; he could indulge his appetites; he could entertain and travel; with his love of beauty and learning he could explore the arts and sciences. The author, like his personation, had experimented with life and could speak out of knowledge. It is probable too that, even as the Midrash surmised, he was advanced in years when he wrote and could speak feelingly of youth's advantage and the inconvenience of old age.

Both the author and his times went into the making of his book. The author played a dominant role; his book is a mirror of his personality, which united independence of judgment with a relaxed and charitable attitude and a grave and wistful disposition. This nature he brought to play upon his times, and their interaction produced the book. His times contributed as well.

The date of Ecclesiastes can be determined with some degree of assurance. Though, as it has seemed, the book was written late in the biblical period, it was certainly written before the Maccabean struggle, of which (unlike Daniel) it knows nothing; for, though the author Koheleth had an independent mind, he was not detached from realities, and the grim events of ca. 165 B.C. would not have passed him unnoticed. The total absence of apocalyptic thought is only partly explained by the fact that Koheleth has quite different concerns; his times apparently were not so desperate that men must escape into apocalypse.

This negative evidence finds positive support in ECCLESIASTICUS, a book which is readily datable (ca. 190 B.C.) and which appears to borrow thoughts and phrases from Ecclesiastes. If the similarities are genuine borrowings and not chance—and they seem too many for chance—Ecclesiastes was well known by 190 B.C. and must have been "published" sometime before 200, though not too long before. Thus, a date in the latter half of the third century is probable.

Other considerations add to the probability of this date. Although there are marked similarities (especially between Ecclesiastes and Epicureanism), no direct influence of Greek philosophers or philosophic systems—Stoics, Epicureans, Cynics, Cyrenaics—upon Ecclesiastes is demonstrable (Koheleth was indeed no philosopher, and Ecclesiastes is no "system"); and yet a Socratic spirit of untrammeled inquiry and of the autonomy of the human mind breathes through the lines of Koheleth—such a spirit as might well have been current in the mildly Hellenized Jerusalem of the century following the division of Alexander's empire.

More readily tangible for fixing the date of Koheleth than the suspicion of Greek influence on his way of thinking is the ideological position which his book occupies among the books of wisdom. This is best seen in the series Ezekiel, Proverbs, Job, Ecclesiastes. Schematically stated—with each step an oversimplification—this was the process: Answering to a human need among the recently exiled, Ezekiel established the principle that each man always receives from God what penalty his offense has warranted, what compensation his virtue has earned. Initially resisted, this principle gained favor until in the heyday of proverbial wisdom, when the bulk of Proverbs was being written, it had become axiomatic. A bold spirit, the author of Job, whose senses taught him otherwise, wrote an agonized doubt. The doctrine, now become an orthodoxy, is piously defended by Job's friends (and Elihu). It is, indeed, defended by Job himself, in desperate confusion, as he is painfully aware of flagrant injustice yet under compulsion to defend the principle of divine justice. Going beyond Job, the author of Ecclesiastes simply denies divine justice and acquiesces in the lack of it. Though an oversimplification, this description of the process is essentially right, and Koheleth, standing at the end of this line but before Ecclesiasticus and Daniel, may well belong to the third century—no earlier than this, since each of the stages starting with Ezekiel's statement of the principle involved a radical ideological readjustment. See WISDOM § 2*b-d*.

6. Unity of the book. The discussion of the author and his times has proceeded as though the book of Ecclesiastes were a unit, which is by no means certain. In fact, an editor, at least, and probably a glossator (one or more) had a hand in the book in addition to its author. The author identifies himself in first-person narrative style in 1:12 and continues with his confidential autobiography almost to the end of the book. But at the end (starting with 12:8), as at the beginning (1:1-2*a*) and once with a phrase in the heart of the book (7:27), Koheleth's "publisher" puts in a good, if not quite accurate, word for him. In 1:2*a*; 7:27 (with different word division in the Hebrew); and 12:8 this publisher merely adds the words "says Koheleth." He fashions his title page (1:1) after 1:12, 15, and so writes: "The words of Koheleth, the son of David, king in Jerusalem." The publisher's endorsement comes at the end: "Besides being wise, Koheleth also taught the people knowledge, weighing and studying and arranging proverbs with great care. Koheleth sought to find pleasing words, and uprightly he wrote words of truth" (12:9-10). The rest is similar; after Koheleth no more books need be written (12:11-12). And then, the "finis" line: "The end of the matter; all has been heard" (12:13*a*).

But after the end still some good counsel (13*b*-14): "Fear God, and keep his commandments; for this is the whole duty of man. For God will bring every deed into judgment, with every secret thing, whether good or evil." And this concluding advice, these maxims, introduce a new question. They mirror the orthodoxy of Job's friends. If they are original with Koheleth, then he has not abandoned the principle expressed in the discourses of those friends of Job and in these concluding verses of this book, that God treats each man according to his individual merit. But the body of Koheleth's work indeed denies this very principle. There are two possible ways to explain the contradiction. Conceivably the tension was within the author of Ecclesiastes, as seemingly it was within the author of Job. Alternatively, the tension was within the wisdom schools. And this latter explanation appears the more probable; Koheleth speaks with a single voice, but his colleagues have other views. If this explanation is correct, then the two maxims which now conclude the book and several more which now appear within the body of the work are the edifying contributions of a wisdom glossator who was moved by a spirit different from that of the author. And he probably speaks for others as well as himself—representing a normative view as against the heterodoxy of Koheleth, possibly even drawing upon a collection of proverbs already at hand.

That the book contains contradictions has long been recognized. The contradictions were offered as one reason for withholding it from the canon (see § 2 above and T. Shab. 30*a, b*). And recent opinion has held that the book was extensively glossed by one or more pious wisdom editors in an effort to blunt the edge of its dissidence. It is really only a question of how much.

In the somewhat disjointed latter half of the book, irrelevancy is hard to determine and therefore no very convincing test. The proverbs in 7:1-13 are a case in point. They deal with various matters and are strongly reminiscent of the book of Proverbs. And yet the recurrent ironical note and the grim humor: "The day of death [is better than] the day of birth"; "Say not, 'Why were the former days better than these?' " "Wisdom is good with an inheritance"; "Who can make straight what [God] has made crooked?" (vss. 1, 10, 11, 13); these may well mark the expressions as thoughts of Koheleth himself—his somewhat random musings, to be sure. The verse 7:26 is another example; but for its wry humor the latter part of the verse might even seem to go contrary to Koheleth's principles: "I found more bitter than death the woman whose heart is snares and nets, and whose hands are fetters; he who pleases God escapes her, but the sinner is taken by her."

Doctrine is a better test. If a proverb in Ecclesiastes gives conventional expression to a familiar and received doctrine which Koheleth is otherwise intent upon discrediting, this proverb is likely to be the work of the fidei defensor. Not that Koheleth demanded consistency—even consistency could be carried too far: "Do not make yourself overwise; why should you destroy yourself?" (7:16). Yet he took a position and was not given to casuistry. Doctrinally considered, the following passages, at odds with Koheleth's argument, appear to be glosses: "I said in my heart, God will judge the righteous and the wicked, for he has appointed a time for every matter, and for every work" (3:17 with a minor correction); "He who fears God shall come forth from them all" (7:18*b*); "He who obeys a command will meet no harm, and the mind of a wise man will know the time and way" (8:5); "Though a sinner does evil a hundred times and prolongs his life, yet I know that it will be well with those who fear God, because they fear before him; but it will not be well with the wicked, neither will he prolong his days like a shadow, because he does not fear before God" (8:12-13); "Know that for all these things God will bring you into judgment" (11:9*b*). Among the many scholars who suspect that Ecclesiastes contains "corrections" of this sort, it is these passages (along with 12:13*b*-14) on which the most will agree.

Now it is true that one is able to interpret away most of the difficulties in these (and other) probable glosses or explain away the apparent differences; but on the one hand the ingenuity involved in the explanation or the complexity of the interpretation raises the question whether any author could trust any reader to discover his meaning and logic without a commentary to supply the transitions, and on the other hand it would be stranger still if such a book as Ecclesiastes had been transmitted intact with never a reader's horrified "correction," when as a matter of course books with a far lower shocking potential were quite freely glossed. That someone glossed Koheleth's work in the interest of right thinking is more than probable (the author of Wisd. Sol. 2, quite a while later, was thoroughly incensed), but the glosses are fewer than some have supposed.

We do not obtain a synoptic view of the book even when we have reduced it by the few verses added editorially and tendentiously. What remains is no argument systematically unfolded; in large part it is musings loosely accumulated, and the associative links are at times not to be recovered. The book is a kind of philosopher's diary, pages from an artist's notebook, a thinking aloud, a gathering of literary fragments published without plan. The unity is of mood more than form.

7. Thought of Koheleth. Koheleth thinks of many things, but prominent in his speculation are the areas of wisdom (how we know), ethics (what is good), and religion (God's way with man).

a. Wisdom. Koheleth was making a study of human society. He set out to observe and take notes, and, because men are basically alike, himself to experiment (2:1) and to record his own findings (7:27). He was animated by a spirit of inquiry. He applied his mind "to seek and to search out by wisdom all that is done under heaven" (1:13), determined to "see what was good for the sons of men to do . . . during the few days of their life" (2:3*b*). To this end he undertook specific projects: "to know madness and folly" (1:17; cf. 2:12; 7:25), to know "how to cheer my body with wine" (2:3*a*), to learn what goes on "in the place of justice" (3:16), and to examine all things (8:9, 16; 9:1).

Having observed them by reason of his inquiring mind, he makes sorrowful record of sundry social phenomena: "oppressions . . . practiced under the sun" (4:1), "in the place of justice, . . . wickedness" (3:16), "riches . . . kept by their owner to his hurt" (5:13—H 5:12), "a man to whom God gives wealth, . . . and honor, . . . yet . . . does not give him power to enjoy them" (6:2), "folly . . . set in many high places, . . . slaves on horses, and princes walking on foot" (10:6-7). He relates more fully certain cases illustrative of the world's folly: the case of the lonely miser (4:7-8), the case of the fickle mob (4:13-16), the case of the forgotten man (9:13-16).

It is not, to be sure, an objective catalogue of social data which he compiles; his interpretation colors the record. He has seen that one fate comes to the wise man and the fool (2:14); he has "found more bitter than death the woman whose heart is snares, . . . and whose hands are fetters" (7:26). He has seen that "the race is not to the swift, . . . nor favor to the men of skill; but time and chance happen to them all" (9:11). His observations are many (7:15, 27; 8:9), and he opens his record with a sweeping conclusion; "I have seen everything that is done under the sun; and behold, all is vanity and a striving after wind" (1:14). This generalization he permits himself as a man of broad experience and great wisdom (1:16).

Not only does he have eyes in his head; this man is also given to introspection and reflection; "I said to myself" is his phrase (1:16; 2:1)—"I said to myself, 'What befalls the fool will befall me also; why then have I been so very wise?' And I said to myself that this also is vanity" (2:15). He ponders his evidence; when he sees injustice, he says "in his heart," or considers the possibility, that God is thus testing the sons of men (3:18; cf. vs. 17): "I saw," "I perceived," "I know" (1:17; 2:13; 3:14; 4:4; 8:16-17). The most significant of these conclusions is his repeated well-considered opinion that what is best for men is "to be happy and enjoy themselves as long as they live" (3:12, and often).

It is notable that Koheleth evokes no authority for his statements other than experience and the reasoned conclusions to which observed phenomena necessarily point. His book contains nothing of the prophetic "word of the Lord," nor any reference to Sinai—nothing even of things "that our fathers have told us" (Ps. 78:3). The author sets out to test all notions against the evidence of his own experience. He indeed claims no more than this for his book, and Rabbi Simeon ben Menasya was half right when he said that it is Solomon's private wisdom (T. Meg. 7*a*).

The spirit of free inquiry which breathes through the book of Koheleth is a remarkable feature of the book, one which it shares in part with Job, since Job, too, seeks truth—if need be, at the cost of received dogma (Job 13:7-12). There is hardly anything that Koheleth does not query.

Koheleth, wise with the wisdom of Solomon, admits his superiority: "I have acquired great wisdom . . . ; my mind has had great experience of wisdom and knowledge" (1:16; cf. 2:9). Although he says: "I have acquired," referring to his wisdom as to an earned degree, wisdom is not for him always something which a man obtains through his own efforts; it may resemble "native intelligence" and come as a gift from God to the man who pleases him (2:26; cf. 9:3). As such it is like the wisdom which came to Solomon as a divine favor, according to the narrative in I Kings 3:3-14. But the proverbialists regarded wisdom as an acquisition; in Prov. 4:5, 7, and throughout Prov. 1–9, they invite the youth to acquire wisdom, just as, according to Eccl. 1:16, Koheleth did for himself. In Koheleth wisdom is a synonym of "knowledge" and "skill" (1:18; 2:21; 7:12; 9:10).

It is because Koheleth has gained such great wisdom that he can undertake his study of human life (1:13; 2:3; and possibly 9:13, if we translate, not "example of," but "through" wisdom). He even turns wisdom on itself, through wisdom considering the virtue of wisdom—weighing it against folly (1:17; 2:12; cf. 2:3*b;* and especially 7:23-25).

Koheleth finds that it is a misfortune when fools bear rule (4:13; 10:5-6), and that intelligent leadership is more effective than an army (9:14-15*a,* 16*a,* 18). He finds one fortunate who is wise, for wisdom brings a man luck (10:2), preserves and protects him (7:12*b,* 19), and helps him both earn a living (10:10?) and advantageously use his acquired wealth (7:11-12*a;* cf. 2:18-19). A fool, he says repeatedly, is known by his chatter (5:3*b*—H 5:2*b;* 7:5; 10:12*b*-13, 14*a;* similarly 7:6, 9; 10:1, 3), but welcome and precious are the words of the wise (7:5; 9:17; 10:12*a*). For him wisdom is practically the same as virtue, folly the same as sin (7:16-17). God "has no pleasure in fools" (5:4—H 5:3), but joy comes along with wisdom as a gift of God (2:26; cf. 9:1). The wise man, indeed, may smile (8:1), for wisdom brightens his life (2:13-14*a*). Koheleth commends wisdom.

But in his attitude toward wisdom and folly, Koheleth is both conventional and undogmatic. He is healthy-minded enough to recognize and acknowledge the advantages of intelligence as against stupidity. But he refuses to be dogmatic even about these advantages and has to say: "The wise man dies just like the fool" (2:16; cf. vs. 14*b* and 6:8). "What befalls the fool will befall me also; why then have I been so very wise?" (2:15). Here, too, he commends moderation; as with righteousness and evildoing, so with wisdom and folly: "Be not righteous overmuch, and do not make yourself overwise. . . . Be not wicked overmuch, neither be a fool. . . . It is good that you should take hold of this, and from that withhold not your hand" (7:16-18*a*). One can go too far even in being wise:

> In much wisdom is much vexation, > and he who increases knowledge increases sorrow
> (1:18).

In fact, his position proceeds from his skepticism. Though for knowledge he relies on nothing more than upon the conclusions which his own observations and experiments lead to, he is yet dubious that thus he can sound the depths of life. "All this," he says, "I have tested by wisdom; I said, 'I will be wise'; but it was far from me. That which is, is far off, and deep, very deep; who can find it out?" (7:23-24). "When I applied my mind to know wisdom, and to see the business that is done on earth, . . . then I saw all the work of God, that man cannot find out the work that is done under the sun. However much man may toil in seeking, he will not find it out; even though a wise man claims to know, he cannot find it out" (8:16-17).

b. Ethics. Without defining his terms, as though he means by them what everyone else means, Koheleth speaks of the "righteous man," צדיק, and the "wicked man," רשע (7:20; 8:10; 9:1; and together in 7:15-17; 8:14; 9:2); of "justice," משפט, or "righteousness," צדק, and "wickedness," רשע (5:8—H 5:7; 7:17, 25; and together in 3:16); of "sin," חטא (5:6—H 5:5; 7:20; and in 10:4 "offences"), and "sinners" (8:12; 9:2, 18). Like their English equivalents the Hebrew words for "good" and "evil," טוב and רע, sometimes have moral overtones, and frequently do not, connoting instead "good fortune" and "misfortune." Though Koheleth often employs these two words, he seldom uses "good" for "virtuous" and "evil" for "sinful"; yet he does, e.g., in 7:20; 9:2, 18 ("good"); and 5:1—H 4:17 (?); 7:15; 9:3 ("evil"). He probably means what the eighth-century prophets meant when he uses their vocabulary in 5:8—H 5:7: "If you see . . . the poor oppressed and justice and right violently taken away," or in 4:1: "I saw all the oppressions. . . . And behold, the tears of the oppressed. . . . On the side of their oppressors . . . power" (and cf. 7:7). Despite his questioning, Koheleth, when speaking of morals, thus employs conventional words in their conventional sense.

Koheleth, therefore, had his standards, knew between good and evil, and was not "above" or "beyond" them. No doubt his behavior was that of any honest, decent, and respectable citizen. If it be objected that he was a slaveholder (2:7), the objection is not valid—having slaves in his day was a mark of respectability.

He behaved himself, was neither immoral nor amoral. Only, he could not say (a) how he knew the morally good, nor (b) why he chose it, nor yet (c) how, indeed, he was able to choose at all. Though consideration of these three questions, fundamental to any ethics, was central to his purpose, he found no answers for them.

a) How does one know right from wrong? Koheleth does not undertake an answer in terms of the question. When he asks: "Who knows what is good for man while he lives the few days of his vain life?" (6:12), he is asking a related but different question, not what is morally right but what is empirically profitable—and, as he knew, the two need not be the same. So his rhetorical question is not a denial that man can know the good but skepticism about whether man knows even what is good for him.

Koheleth's way to knowledge is through observation, but his inquiries and experiments are also not a quest for knowledge of the absolute moral good; they are a search for the profitable course. He makes little use of ways to knowledge except the way of experience. There is a possible reference to revelation in the term "listen" in 5:1—H 4:17: "To draw near to listen is better than to offer the sacrifice of fools." But all in all, Koheleth holds, God conceals more than he communicates (8:17; 11:5; see below). It may be inferred that because he phrases many of his thoughts as proverbs, he stood under the influence of the schools and their wisdom. And it is probable that, since he uses conventional ethical terms often in a quite conventional sense, he was less unorthodox by nature than by profession, and for him, too, right and wrong were—more than he knew them to be—the mores of his society. He was no anarchist by nature.

There is this ambiguity about the ethics of Koheleth: that he never clearly suggests the source of man's knowledge of right and wrong, but also he does not deny the possibility of having such knowledge.

b) Why a man should choose the right, Koheleth really cannot say. There is no apparent advantage in it for a man. "There are righteous men to whom it happens according to the deeds of the wicked, and there are wicked men to whom it happens according to the deeds of the righteous" (8:14; cf. 7:15). And all alike must die: "One fate comes to all, to the righteous and the wicked" (9:2; cf. 2:15). If virtue goes unrewarded, sin unrequited, in this life, even less notice is taken of them in death (cf. 6:6*b*; 9:5). The dead rest forever in darkness; like an "untimely birth" which "comes into vanity and goes into darkness," where "it finds rest" (6:3-5; cf. 11:8), the dead are no longer sentient or desirous (9:6). "There is no work or thought or knowledge or wisdom in Sheol" (9:10). Since reward and punishment are not apparent either in life or in its sequel, why should one choose the right?

c) How, indeed, can man choose at all? Like many another in our theological tradition, in the matter of man's freedom to choose despite predestination and nature's endless repetitions (1:4-10) Koheleth abides in paradox. He can hold that "there is . . . a time for every matter" (3:1-8; cf. 3:14); he can say: "The righteous and the wise and their deeds are in the hand of God" (9:1), and ask: "Apart from him who can eat or who can have enjoyment?" (2:25 with a minor correction; cf. 7:13); he can speak thus of all that is foreordained, and he can then shift ground and for his ethics put upon man the responsibility: "God made man upright, but they have sought out many devices" (7:29); "also the hearts of men are full of evil" (9:3; cf. the gloss, 8:11). Whether God holds the reins loose or tight, man lives as though he is choosing his way.

Although, then, the author of Ecclesiastes develops no clear-cut system of ethics which contains answers to these basic questions, he yet proposes a way of life and a social attitude. They may be viewed as three admonitions.

Since absolute righteousness is beyond human reach ("Surely there is not a righteous man on earth who does good and never sins" [7:20]), a person should not demand of himself the impossible and suffer sure defeat, but neither should he let himself go completely, to his sure ruin: "Be not righteous overmuch, and do not make yourself overwise; why should you destroy yourself? Be not wicked overmuch, neither be a fool; why should you die before your time?" (7:16-17). This counsel of moderation has a timeless quality, from Aristotle's "mean" to current psychotherapy. It is the first admonition.

Koheleth's second admonition runs like a brightly colored cord through the loose fabric of his book. It is the charge to make the most of life—while it lasts. Seven times this is said: in 2:24-25; 3:12-13; 3:22; 5:18–6:2—H 5:17–6:2; 8:15; 9:9; 11:8-9—with some variety but with essential sameness: "There is nothing better for a man than that he should eat and drink, and find enjoyment in his toil" (which means "through his earnings"). When here (2:24-25) he first states the theme, Koheleth continues: "This also, I saw, is from the hand of God," which cannot mean "ordered by God" but can only mean "permitted" (cf. 3:13). Ignoring his theoretical determinism, Koheleth begs men to take advantage of this chance, their portion (5:18-19—H 5:17-18; 9:9). There is an urgency in his voice as, in 11:9, he turns to youth with a special word: "Rejoice, O young man, in your youth, and let your heart cheer you in the days of your youth; walk in the ways of your heart and the sight of your eyes." Such is his insistence that one may believe he regarded the pursuit of happiness as no less than a moral obligation and interference with another's right to life as a sin and a crime, an evil which "lies heavy upon men . . . , a sore affliction" (6:1-2).

This second admonition, like a refrain, seven times repeated, punctuates the discourse and seems to be its author's foremost thought. "I commend enjoyment," he says, "for man has no good thing under the sun but to eat, and drink, and enjoy himself" (8:15). But he has one further thing to say, and it is yet more striking.

The high point in the ethics of Ecclesiastes is found in 4:1-12. Koheleth has compared men to beasts; all are from the dust and share one destiny (3:19-21). Here, with compassion for the human victims of human rapacity, he speaks of the law of the jungle in the society of man: "I saw all the oppressions that are practiced under the sun. And behold, the tears of the oppressed, and they had no one to comfort them! On the side of their oppressors there was power, and there was no one to comfort them" (4:1). Ironically, this lawless law can be defended as the source of profit and progress: "I saw that all toil [i.e., profit] and all skill in work come from a man's envy of his neighbor" (4:4*a*)—competition is the life of trade.

But utter loneliness may be the exorbitant price of success; the victor may miss out on life and achieve no more than resplendent solitude, and "this also is vanity and an unhappy business" (4:7-8), and "woe to him who is alone when he falls and has not another to lift him up" (4:10).

Better then that men help one another—this is the third admonition. Let the herd unite for profit, and for comfort, and for survival: "Two are better than one, because they have a good reward for their toil"; moreover, "if two lie together, they are warm"; also, "a threefold cord is not quickly broken" (4:9-12).

This, then, is the positive side of Ecclesiastes' ethics: pity for the human state, leading to a plea for mutual aid.

c. Religion. The religion of Koheleth, like his ethics, displays a duality; herein a practical piety mingles with a theoretical heterodoxy.

Koheleth acknowledges God—no question there—and recognizes that God is the creator and the source of life (12:1, 7; cf. 7:29), and he assumes with less than proof some continuing divine activity in human society—even a kind of individual care and attention: "To the man who pleases him God gives wisdom and knowledge and joy; but to the sinner he gives the work of gathering and heaping, only to give to one who pleases God" (2:26; cf. 2:25; 7:26*b*). His ethics reveals in part (see above) how he supposes a man might "please" God, with conduct which includes elements of conventional morality. He also commends a modicum of religious practice, in the narrower sense of the term: Go to the house of God, but not so much to offer sacrifices and to multiply prayer as "to listen" (5:1-2—H 4:17–5:1), and "pay what you vow" (5:4-6—H 5:3-5). He does not protest—he lacks enthusiasm for the cult; nevertheless, he would have a man discharge his obligations; "fear God!" (5:7—H 5:6).

There are also less usual features in his religion, as the shape of his ethics indeed suggests. For one thing, his God is somewhat withdrawn and not very communicative.

Biblical religion locates God in heaven, but it rarely makes him inaccessible: one prays. Koheleth says: "Be not rash with your mouth, . . . for God is in heaven, and you upon earth" (5:2—H 5:1).

Biblical religion puts God in constant communication with man—through lawgiver, prophet, and priest, and directly—in response to prayer. Though once Koheleth suggests that in the house of God one "listen" (5:1—H 4:17), he otherwise emphasizes the inscrutable mystery of God: "Man cannot find out" (8:17; cf. 7:14). "As you do not know how the spirit comes to the bones in the womb of a woman with child, so you do not know the work of God who makes everything" (11:5, with a minor correction; cf. 9:1). This is reminiscent of God's challenge to Job and is no isolated expression otherwise, but it is not the commoner biblical view.

Not only is Koheleth's God remote and silent; he is inflexible. Biblical religion knows a God who listens to reason, and is influenced by man's repentance. The words of Koheleth's God are the "laws of the Medes and Persians."

> Consider the work of God; > who can make straight what he has made crooked?
> (7:13);

and "Whatever God does endures for ever; nothing can be added to it, nor anything taken from it; God has made it so, in order that men should fear before him" (3:14). This is the description of a God who determines and changes not.

Biblical religion is dominated by the doctrine of the "two ways." The ethics of Koheleth (see above) ignores a deterministic element in his religious thinking (9:1; 2:25), and repeatedly urges man to "eat and drink and take pleasure," quite as though the choice is his. Ignoring the limitation, Koheleth is nearer biblical religion than he is in his determinism. Urging man to enjoy life because this "is God's gift to man" (3:13), he is probably not so much repudiating the determinism in his religious position as he is emphasizing the remoteness of God. God's essential unconcern gives man the chance (this is his "lot" or "portion") to make the most of his short life.

Bibliography. Introductions and commentaries: M. Jastrow, A Gentle Cynic (1919). P. Volz, "Hiob und Weisheit," Schriften des AT (1921). A. L. Williams, "Ecclesiastes," Cambridge Bible (1922). H. Odeberg, Qohaelaeth (1929). H. W. Hertzberg, Der Prediger (1932). K. Galling, "Die Fünf Megilloth," HAT (1940). V. Reichert and A. Cohen, "The Five Megilloth," Soncino Books of the Bible (1946), pp. 104-91. R. H. Pfeiffer, Introduction to the OT (1948), pp. 724-31. I. Bettan, The Five Scrolls (1950), pp. 123-91. A. Bentzen, Introduction to the OT (1952), II, 188-91. A. D. Power, Ecclesiastes or The Preacher (1952). R. Gordis, Koheleth—The Man and His World (1955). O. Eissfeldt, Einleitung in das AT (1956), pp. 605-17. O. S. Rankin, Introduction and Exegesis of Ecclesiastes, IB, V (1956), 3-88.

Special studies: G. G. Bradley, Lectures on Ecclesiastes (1898). D. B. Macdonald, The Hebrew Literary Genius (1933), pp. 197-215. H. L. Ginsberg, Studies in Koheleth (1950); "The Structure and Contents of the Book of Koheleth," Supplements to VT, III (1955), 138-49.

See also bibliography under WISDOM. S. H. BLANK

ECCLESIASTICUS ĭ klē′zĭ ăs′tə kəs [Lat., from ἐκκλησιαστικός, of (i.e., to be read in) church]. The seventh book (and probably the earliest to be written) of the APOCRYPHA, ascribed to Jesus (Hebrew Joshua; Aramaic Jeshua) the son of Sirach, who appears to have taught in Jerusalem during the first quarter of the second century B.C. It is the most comprehensive sample of extant Jewish WISDOM literature and bears striking resemblances to the canonical book of Proverbs; although, unlike the latter, it is more obviously the work of one author, showing a general uniformity of style which makes it much more than a mere collection of maxims drawn from multifarious sources. The work has been widely respected in both Jewish and Christian circles.

1. Date
2. Text
3. Author

a. Name
b. Interests
c. Hellenism
4. Contents
a. The Greek prologue
b. First main section
c. Second main section
d. Third main section
e. Appendices
5. Language and style
a. Didactic verse
b. Devotional verse
6. Doctrinal antinomies
a. Predestination and freedom
b. Pessimism and optimism
c. Retributive justice and factual truth
d. Ritualism and ethics
e. Universalism and particularism
f. Reason and revelation
Bibliography

1. Date. A general consideration of Ben Sirach's thought and style suggests that his work was written sometime during the century immediately preceding the outbreak of the Maccabean Revolt in 168 B.C. But there are two passages which seem to supply more precise information.

a) From the Greek translator's preface we gather that he was a grandson of the author, that he arrived in Egypt in the thirty-eighth year of the reign of Euergetes, and that after living there for some time he started work on his translation from the Hebrew. There were two Ptolemaic kings who bore the title "Euergetes" (i.e., "Benefactor")—namely, Ptolemy III Euergetes I (247-221) and Ptolemy VII Euergetes II Physicon (170-117)—but as the former reigned for little more than twenty-five years, the latter must be the one to whom reference is made in the Prologue. Thus it may be inferred that the translator arrived in Egypt in 132 B.C., and that his grandfather, Ben Sirach, flourished in the early decades of the second century—before the persecution under Antiochus IV Epiphanes in 168 B.C., to which he makes no allusion.

b) Ben Sirach's eulogy of the high priest Simon son of Onias (50:1-24) gives the impression that he had only recently held office; the phrase "in his life" (vs. 1 G) seems to imply that his death has taken place, while in the concluding lines (vss. 23*b*-24 H) there is a prayer for peace among the sons of Simon so that the covenant with Phinehas (cf. 45:23; Num. 25:12-13), which restricted the high priesthood to the first-born descendants of ZADOK, might be maintained forever. Josephus mentions two high priests named Simon son of Onias: one of these, Simon I the Just, is assigned to a period ca. 300 B.C. (Antiq. XII. ii.5; iv.1); the other, Simon II, was in office ca. a century later (Antiq. XII.iv.10; v.1; cf. III Macc. 2: 1). Some scholars have identified Simon I with the Simon of Ben Sirach's eulogy, partly to allow time for the growth of legendary fame about his name. On the other hand, in view of the confused nature of the data, it is arguable that Simon I is really a fiction of the rabbinical imagination. In the Mishna (Ab. 1.2) he bridges a gap of over two centuries, mediating the tradition from the men of the Great Synagogue in the time of Ezra (ca. 400 B.C.) to Antigonus of Socho (ca. 180 B.C.); and Josephus apparently knows nothing of him, save that he was renowned for his piety and benevolence (Antiq. XII.ii.5). According to the Talmud, Simon I the Just received Alexander the Great in 332 B.C. (T.B. Yom. 69*a*), whereas Josephus reports that it was the high priest Jaddua, grandfather of Simon I, who received Alexander (Antiq. XI.viii.4-5). Moreover, while we learn from the Talmud that Onias son of Simon the Just built the temple for the worship of Yahweh in Egypt (T.B. Men. 109*b*; J.T. Yom. 6.3), Josephus contradicts himself by attributing the founding of the temple at Leontopolis to Onias III son of Simon (War VII.x.2-4) and to Onias IV son of Onias III (Antiq. XII.v.1; v.7; XIII.iii.1-3). But whether it was the son or the grandson of Simon who was responsible for the building of the temple in Egypt (ca. 163 B.C.), the reference is clearly not to Simon I the Just but to Simon II (Antiq. XII.iv.10), whose son Onias III (II Macc. 3–4) was removed from office early in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes (175-164). Thus it is not impossible that Simon I the Just is a legendary figure originating in the rabbinical schools to cover the dark period between Ezra and Antigonus of Socho, and that Josephus sought to bridge the gap by utilizing an artificially constructed list of high priests.

Accordingly, the inference may reasonably be drawn that Ecclesiasticus was written between 195 (the approximate date of the death of Simon II) and 171, when Antiochus Epiphanes, having already deposed Onias III (the last legitimate high priest of Zadokite descent) in favor of his brother Jason, removed the latter and appointed Menelaus, a Benjamite, in his stead. Ben Sirach manifestly knew nothing of this flagrant violation of the covenant with Phinehas, although he seems to betray anxieties about possible future developments in certain passages (45: 26; 50:24 H).

2. Text. There are three principal extant recensions of the text of Ecclesiasticus—namely, the Greek of the LXX and its descendant versions, the Syriac of the Peshitta, and the Hebrew fragments with which are associated the rabbinic quotations. The Syriac MSS represent a uniform kind of text, the other two recensions mixed types; and in the case of the Greek MSS, but not in that of the Hebrew MSS, the evidence allows of a subdivision into two groups, Greek I and Greek II. The Hebrew recension used in the making of Greek II seems to have been based on that behind Greek I. On the other hand, the two later recensions, represented by the Syriac and the Hebrew MSS, are apparently on direct lines of descent from Ben Sirach's autograph. But they show signs of influence from the older recensions, the Syriac MSS having readings peculiar to Greek I and Greek II, and the Hebrew MSS having readings peculiar to Greek I, Greek II, and the Syriac. Not being canonical, the text was free from authoritative control; and as the work was popular, it was frequently copied over a prolonged period—hence the numerous textual changes and corruptions to which the MSS bear witness.

In 1896-1900 almost two thirds of Ecclesiasticus was recovered in Hebrew from four MSS, designated A, B, C, D, belonging to the eleventh and twelfth centuries, found in the Genizah (or synagogue repository for worn-out MSS) in Old Cairo. A fifth MS from the Genizah, MS Adler 3597, designated E in the textual criticism of Ecclesiasticus, was published in 1931, adding 34 distichs in Hebrew to the 1,056 provided by MSS A, B, C, D, out of the 1,616 represented in Greek. In 1956 it was reported that on two fragments from Cave 2 at Qumran scraps of verses from 6:20-31 had been identified, and in 1957 that the text was practically the same as that of the Hebrew MS A. For a thorough discussion of the relationship among the several witnesses to the text, see the work of M. H. Segal in the bibliography.

3. Author. Apart from the scanty information supplied by the Greek prologue and quotations in later writings, our knowledge of the author is based entirely upon internal evidence.

a. Name. Ecclesiasticus is the only book in the Apoc. to which the author attached his name; the others are either attributed to some outstanding individual in Hebrew history or allowed to appear anonymously. The extant texts, however, give the name in various ways. The Genizah text (B) in 50:27 has: "Simon, son of Jesus, son of Eleazar, son of Sira"; the colophon (after 51:30) has two renderings of the name, the first being "Simon, son of Jesus, who is called son of Sira," the second being as in 50:27; the Hebrew copy owned by Saadia Gaon in the tenth century evidently had the same name as the extant text in 50:27. The Syriac colophon has "Jesus, son of Simon, who is called son of Asira ['captive']" twice repeated (with minor variants). It is not improbable that the inclusion of "Simon" in the genealogy is a scribal error due to the occurrence of the name in 50:1, 24 H. The Greek text in 50:27 has "Jesus son of Sirach the Jerusalemite," but the best MSS (ℵ, A, B) add "Eleazar" to "Simon." In his preface the Greek translator names the author "my grandfather Jesus," and the Greek title prefixed to 51:1 (doubtless an early scribal heading) reads: "Prayer of Jesus son of Sirach." See SIRACH, SON OF.

b. Interests. Ben Sirach was well versed in the Scriptures, particularly the books of Proverbs and Psalms and the Pentateuch; and, while remaining true to the religion of his fathers, he shows a relatively broad outlook. He had reflected long on life and its vicissitudes (cf. 51:13-22), and though he had a philosophical turn of mind, his wise sayings largely represent a form of prudentialism. His philosophy of life was practical and empirical, and he was skeptical of metaphysical speculations, holding that the ultimate mysteries of the world are beyond human comprehension (3:17-24).

Ben Sirach had traveled in foreign lands (34:11) and had frequently been in danger of death (34:12); he speaks of perils of all kinds from which God had delivered him, though here (51:1-12) he may be expatiating on a poetic theme and deliberately imitating the psalms of suffering. Perhaps like other wise men he had participated in diplomatic missions and had known what it was to appear before rulers (39:4).

Ben Sirach's counsel ranges over a wide area of human activity, and he deals with social and religious duties, the highest of which is the search for wisdom (14:20–15:8). But his utilitarianism is never far from his thoughts, and he does not forget to stress that the acquisition of wisdom, besides the spiritual values it brings, will eventually benefit with pecuniary rewards (51:28).

Ben Sirach is deeply mistrustful of women, thinking of them as enticers to wickedness (42:9-14); this view seems to be partly based on personal knowledge of unhappy marriages (25:16-26) and of the worries occasioned to fathers by the possession of highly sexed daughters (26:10-12), and partly on a metaphysical theory concerning the origin of evil (25:24); on the other hand, he does not think that a happy marriage is impossible (26:1-4), holding that the husband of a good wife is more blessed by far than a bachelor (36:18-26). He advocates strictness in the training of children (30:1-13).

He had considerable poetic talent, as is shown in the psalms of praise for the works of God in nature (42:15-43:33).

He defends the work of physicians against objections which may have been leveled against them from religious scruples (cf. II Chr. 16:12), arguing that healing skill comes from God (38:1-8). But it cannot be argued from this that Ben Sirach practiced medicine, nor can it be inferred from his respect for the priesthood (45:6-26) that he was a priest. The probability is that he was a scholar who conducted classes in Jerusalem, and in 51:23 he is evidently inviting young men to attend his academy (בית המדרש—the first occurrence in extant literature, but later used commonly of rabbinical schools). He had applied himself to the study of wisdom while he was still young, before his travels abroad (39:4). As a scholar and teacher he combined the functions of "sage" and "scribe"—i.e., he imparted general instruction for the conduct of life (the sort of teaching we find in the book of Proverbs) and at the same time taught the ordinances of the law of Moses. In his portrayal of the genuine scribe Ben Sirach may well be presenting an idealized picture of his own career (38:24–39:11): a man of culture with the means to devote his time to study, a man who has traveled abroad and who attains to eminence in public affairs.

c. Hellenism. In his counsels respecting banquets of wine accompanied by music and animated conversation (32:4-6—G 35:4-6), and in his suggestion that an intelligent man avoids consorting with loose women, just as the cultivated palate avoids inferior foods (36:18-24; cf. 9:4; 19:2), Ben Sirach reflects a way of life which seems to have been much affected by the diffusion of Greek civilization which followed on the conquests of Alexander the Great. Moreover, as he had traveled abroad and served in the courts of foreign princes (34:11-12—G 31:12-13), the likelihood is that he had come into still closer contact with Hellenistic culture. But we cannot definitely say that he had learned Greek, and the parallels which have been cited between certain of his aphorisms and pronouncements made by Greek authors, especially Euripides and Theognis, largely belong to the common stock of ideas to which ancient moralists gave expression. Like Plato, he can advocate temperance (31:12-30—G 34:12-30); like Euripides, he can show a deep mistrust of women (25:24); like Theognis, he can condemn false friendship (37:1-6)—but these similarities by no means prove that he had firsthand acquaintance with the works of the Greek writers in question. Perhaps more noteworthy is 11:28, where Ben Sirach declares that no one should be called happy before his death, for this is a point frequently made in Greek writings (cf. Herodotus I.32; Aeschylus Agamemnon 928-29; Sophocles Oedipus Rex 1528-30; Euripides Troades 509-10; etc.). In 13:2 a piece of advice to the effect that one should not associate with people who are richer and more powerful than oneself, is reinforced by what appears to be an allusion to Aesop's fable (329) of the pot and the kettle. Holding that God discloses his secrets to the humble, Ben Sirach asserts the vanity of all human endeavors to solve the ultimate problems of existence (3:17-25), and here he may be thinking specifically of the excessive confidence of certain Greek philosophers in the powers of human reason. Such repudiation of what is taken to be a form of intellectual arrogance comes to expression in earlier Hebrew writings (Job 9:10; 11:7; Isa. 40:13-14; 55:8-9), as well as in the works of certain Greek authors (Euripides Helena 1137-49; Bacchae 393-94; 427-31). Ben Sirach's conception of the scribe as a man of leisure (Ecclus. 38:24) may have been determined to some extent by Greek ideals concerning the scholarly philosopher or lover of wisdom (the word "scholar" is derived from σχολή, "leisure"), but it should be noticed that there are parallels elsewhere, as in the Egyptian Instructions of Duauf, e.g.; on this question Jewish tradition does not seem to have followed Ben Sirach's advice, for Jewish scribes or biblical scholars appear generally to have made a point of learning a trade, as in the well-known case of the apostle Paul, who was a tentmaker (Acts 18:3; cf. M. Ab. 2.2). Accordingly, while Hellenistic culture may have had some positive influence on Ben Sirach's thought, it cannot be said that such influence was either profound or extensive.

The fact is that the negative influence of Hellenism is much more pronounced than the positive, and this may help to account for the combination of particularism and universalism in Ben Sirach's thought—a paradox which is, however, to be found already in the writings of the prophets. Although Yahweh is the creator of all things (42:15–43:33), Israel is his chosen people who will ultimately be glorified (17:17; 44:21; 47:22); and although Wisdom is a divine quality that suffuses all created existence, yet she has her proper home in Zion in the midst of an honored people (24:8-12) and can even be identified with the law of Moses (24:23). Hence, in addition to the general principles of ethical prudentialism, such as largely make up the book of Proverbs, we have also something of the work of a scribe as this was later to be understood in Jewish circles—i.e., the expositions of a man who had made a special study of the Scriptures with a view to facilitating progress in living according to the declared will of God (cf. the first paragraph of the Greek prologue). The adoption of Hellenistic customs appears to have reached its height in 174-171 B.C. during the high priesthood of Jason (II Macc. 4:13) the second son of Simon II, who was appointed by Antiochus Epiphanes; but already when Ben Sirach was writing, Jewish society seems to have been seriously affected by the allurements of Greek civilization, and it is probably in the light of such a situation that his call for an uncompromising obedience to the words of the Lord is to be understood (cf. Ecclus. 2:15). Only the sinner tries to walk along two ways at the same time—i.e., presumably, tries to combine Judaism in religion with Hellenism in culture (2:12). Only misguided individuals argue (with Epicureanlike confidence) that man is too trivial a creature for his conduct to be an object of God's concern (16:17-23). The Lord, whose eyes are ten thousand times brighter than the sun (23:19), will punish those who lose their powers of endurance (2:14), and it is woe to those who forsake the law of the Most High God (41:8) and are ashamed of their divine heritage (42:2). No matter how lowly his circumstances, a man who fears the Lord ranks higher than noblemen, judges, and rulers (10:24). But Ben Sirach offers no argued critique of Hellenism; he presupposes that divine Wisdom is uniquely embodied in the Scriptures. This is a self-evident axiom, and other faiths are idolatrous, no more effective than the groans of a eunuch who embraces a maiden (cf. 30:18-20).

4. Contents. Ecclesiasticus may be largely based on lecture notes which Ben Sirach rewrote in verse for publication, but he evidently followed no definite scheme in the arrangement of his material. Although there are several passages concerning wisdom in the first forty-one chapters, which may have been intended to serve as introductions to the topics they precede, the fact remains that, apart from 42:15–50:26, the constituent sections are not clearly indicated. It is not surprising, therefore, that many different proposals have been made regarding the division of the book. One view is that the work falls into two principal parts, chs. 1–23; chs. 24–50, which were published separately; and two pieces of evidence have been cited in support. Firstly, the two parts begin with the book's longest poems in praise of wisdom (1:1-20; 24:1-29; cf. the opening disquisition on wisdom in Prov. 1–9). Secondly, in 24:30-34 Ben Sirach, writing metaphorically, declares that his canal, fed by the law of Moses, which is like a great fructifying stream that overflows its banks (vss. 23-29), became a river and his river a sea, and so he can again pour out his teaching like prophecy; this may be taken to mean that after the publication of his first volume he found that his material continued to grow, and consequently he soon had enough for the publication of a second. It is also to be observed that after 42:14, short moralizing essays fall away; the section 42:15–50:26 is made up of three relatively long poems, the first in praise of God for his works in nature (42:15–43:33), the second in praise of the fathers of old (chs. 44–49), the third in praise of Simon the high priest (50:1-26). Perhaps these poems had previously been published separately, and Ben Sirach decided to incorporate them into his larger work, rounding off the whole with a blessing and commendation (50:27-29). Subsequently he appended the fifty-first chapter, which ends with an acrostic poem telling how the author came to obtain wisdom (vss. 13-22; cf. the closing acrostic in Prov. 31:10-31), which he now offers to the untaught (vss. 23-30). The doxology and tailpiece, which appear only in Hebrew and (with variations) in Syriac, could have been added after Ben Sirach's death by an admirer and imitator. Thus, including the Greek prologue and the appendices, the work may be conveniently considered under five main heads. Certain NT parallels are indicated in parentheses.

a. The Greek prologue. The translator commends his grandfather's work and, in view of the difficulties, begs the reader to be indulgent of any imperfections in his translation from the Hebrew.

b. First main section (chs. 1–23). This section, perhaps the first published volume, is introduced with a poem celebrating wisdom: all wisdom is of divine origin and has its beginning in the fear of the Lord (1:1-20).

1:22–4:10: Hypocrisy and pride exclude the possibility of a man's acquiring wisdom. Acceptable men are tested in the furnace of humiliation. Filial piety and almsgiving atone for sin (cf. 3:3, 30, with Mark 12:33). The poor should be treated with kindness.

4:11–6:17: Despite her discipline, wisdom gives help and joy to those who seek her. Avoid sinful shame and false embarrassment, harshness and trust in wealth, insincerity and rashness in speech. Be quick in listening, slow in answering (5:11; cf. Jas. 1:19).

6:18–8:7: The search for wisdom should continue from youth to old age. Beware of political ambition and of mere formalism in religion (cf. Ecclus. 7:14 with Mark 11:25; Ecclus. 7:34 with Rom. 12:15; Ecclus. 8:5 with Rom. 3:23). One should be just and kind.

8:8–10:29: Wisdom is obtained from the sages and the aged. One should be prudent in one's personal associations, avoiding loans and pledges and lawsuits with judges and intimate conversation with strangers. Special care is needed in one's relations with women. New friends are like new wine (9:10; cf. Luke 5:39). Rulers should be wise and humble, for the Lord rules the earth.

10:30–14:19: The wisdom of a humble man will raise him to a position of authority. Avoid passing hasty judgments on people, and do not argue about a matter which does not concern you. Avoid dissipating your energy in many activities, for the busy man may find that death takes him before he has time to enjoy his accumulated wealth (11:19; cf. Luke 12:16-20). Be content with your profession, and call no one happy before his death. Avoid associating with people who are wealthier and more powerful than you. Riches should be used to make life pleasant for oneself and for others before death presents itself.

14:20–18:26: The happy man is he who meditates on wisdom. God created man free to choose between good and evil, but he is not responsible for human waywardness (cf. 15:11-12 with Jas. 1:13). It is better to die childless than to have impious children. Wickedness brings destruction upon a people. The Lord created an ordered universe and gave man dominion over lower creatures; he endowed man with the power to think, that he might praise the Creator. God is merciful as well as just, so resort to him for forgiveness; being aware of the transitoriness of men, he pours out mercy upon them. Kind words should accompany your gifts (cf. 18:15 with Jas. 1:5); in times of prosperity think of poverty and need.

18:27–20:26: The wise man guards against wrongdoing and shows understanding in his sayings. One should control one's appetites, for wine and women bring men to ruin. Avoid malicious gossip. A God-fearing fool is better than an intelligent sinner. Reproof should be timely and without violence. Appearances are not trustworthy, for a windfall may result in a loss.

20:27–23:27: Wisdom will bring a man to a position of authority. The way of sinners is smoothly paved with stones, but at its end is the pit of Sheol (21:10; cf. Matt. 7:13). Weep less bitterly for the dead than for the fool whose presence is a heavy burden. A friend should not be reviled, but should be assisted in his adversity. Avoid making a habit of swearing oaths, of uttering the name of the Holy One, and of using lewd and vulgar words. Nothing is hidden from the Lord, and he will duly punish those who commit sexual sins, thereby showing that obedience to the divine commandments surpasses all other goods.

c. Second main section (24:1–42:14). This section, which may have constituted the earlier part of a second publication, is introduced, like its predecessor, with a poem in celebration of Wisdom, though this time as a personified figure she speaks in the first person (24:1-22). Wisdom pervades all things, but in a special sense dwells in the beloved city of Jerusalem (24:1-12; cf. Prov. 8:22-31; also John 1:1-18, where the Logos enlightens every man, and yet in a distinctive way came to reside in Jesus). She can be identified with the law of Moses, from which Ben Sirach's own work has taken its rise and so grown that he can again make instruction shine forth for the benefit of future generations (Ecclus. 24:23-34).

25:1–26:27: A harmonious marriage is one of three beautiful things, and an adulterous old fool is one of three hateful types of men. A man with an intelligent wife is one of ten things pleasant to contemplate. Nothing is worse than an iniquitous wife, and the tongue-lashing of a woman who is jealous of a rival wife is the most frightening of four scourges of the tongue. Strict watch should be kept over a headstrong daughter. A modest wife adds charm to charm.

26:28–29:28: Three things are grievous to see: a warrior (Syriac "rich man") brought to poverty, an intelligent man treated contemptuously, a righteous man turning to sin. A merchant is especially likely to become dishonest. The character of a man can be discerned in his manner of reasoning. Among stupid people watch for a chance to leave, but among thoughtful people stay on. Do not betray a friend's confidences, or pretend friendship with evil designs, for he who digs a pit will fall into it (cf. 27:26 with Prov. 26:27; Eccl. 10:8). Practice forgiveness, and then your sins will be pardoned in prayer (Ecclus. 28:2; cf. Matt. 6:12). Avoid strife, which may lead to bloodshed, and slander, which brings destruction. The tongue can be worse than the sword, but the pious are protected against it. Lend when your neighbor is in need (cf. Ecclus. 29:10 with Jas. 5:3), despite the fact that you may not be repaid, and thereby you will gain spiritual treasure (Ecclus. 29:11; cf. Matt. 6:20). A simple life at home is better than sumptuous fare in another man's house.

30:1–32:13—G 30; 34:1–35:13: A father who loves his son will often whip him. There is no wealth better than health of body. A sick man can no more enjoy life than an idol can enjoy an offering of fruit, and so beware of anxiety over gold, which makes one prematurely old. At dinner parties do not be greedy, thereby avoiding sleeplessness, nausea, and colic; and be moderate in drinking wine, for in excess it destroys one's health and reputation. Leave in good time and do not linger at the end of a banquet.

32:14–33:18—G 35:14–36:16*a*; 30:25-27: A God-fearing man will find true understanding in the law, but a sinful man will adapt the law's meaning to suit his own convenience. Do nothing without forethought; and when you have acted, do not regret, for he who trusts the Lord will not suffer loss. God distinguished holy days from ordinary days, and likewise he distinguished among men and appointed their different ways, exalting some and abasing others; thus men are as clay in the hands of the potter. Ben Sirach is the last of a long series of teachers, and so he is like one who gleans after the grape gatherers; the Lord has blessed him, and so he can offer wisdom to the leaders of the people.

33:19–36:17—G 30:28–33:13*a*; 36:16*b*-22: The head of a family should retain his authority by not giving his property to relatives before his death. Indolent slaves should be dealt with strictly, and yet one should not be uncharitable. He who has traveled acquires much cleverness. Ritual acts without genuine piety are valueless. Ben Sirach prays the Lord to deliver his people from their Gentile oppressors and gather together the dispersed tribes of Israel according to the prophecies spoken in his name.

36:18–38:23—G 36:23–38:23: As foods vary in quality, so do women. Some friends are friends only in name. For advice one should consult a pious man and one's own heart, praying to God for his divine guidance. Resort to a physician when you are ill, for medical skill comes from God, and do not neglect to pray. In cases of bereavement mourn only for a day or two, not the customary seven (38:17; cf. 22:12), and do not give your heart to sorrow, as you do the dead no good and you injure yourself.

38:24–39:35: The wisdom of the scribe depends on the opportunity of leisure. Artisans do necessary work in the life of a community, but they are not qualified for leadership in its affairs. On the other hand, the scribe devotes himself to the study of the law, seeks out the wisdom of the ancients, is concerned with prophecies, and makes himself at home with the obscurities of parables (cf. 39:2-3 with Mark 4:10-13). He will give counsel to rulers; through his prayers he will acquire God-given wisdom, and his fame will never be blotted out. The pious should praise the Lord, who supplies every need.

40:1–42:14: Mental and physical suffering comes to all men, but more particularly to the wicked. The wealth of the unjust will dry up like a torrent, whereas righteousness endures forever. Death is God's decree for all flesh and should be accepted with equanimity. The days of a good life may be numbered, but a good name, unlike a bad one, endures forever. One should be ashamed of certain things, but not of others, such as the law of God and just dealing. A man's wickedness is better than a woman who does good.

d. Third main section (42:15–50:29). The three relatively long poems in 42:15–50:24 may have appeared on certain special occasions prior to their incorporation into the work as it now stands.

42:15–43:33: God's glory is reflected in the world he has created, and even his holy ones are unable to recount all the wonder of his works. God is omniscient and has so organized natural processes that they operate harmoniously together. Celestial luminaries, meteorological phenomena, and the ocean show forth the greatness of the Creator. He is the All and transcends all his works, many of which are hidden from us.

Chs. 44–49 (Hebrew title "Praise of the fathers of old"; Greek title "Hymn of the fathers"; cf. Heb. 11:4–12:2): The great men of the past should be praised. They won fame during their lives; and though some of them have left no memorial, yet their righteous deeds have not been forgotten, and their prosperity will remain with their descendants. So the congregation proclaims the praise of Enoch, Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, Aaron, Phinehas, Joshua, Caleb, the judges, Samuel, and David. Solomon merits praise for his building of the temple and for his youthful wisdom, but he put a stain on his honor by giving way to sexual lust; Rehoboam and Jeroboam I sought out every sort of wickedness till vengeance came upon them. Glorious were Elijah, Elisha, Hezekiah, Isaiah, Josiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Job (49:9 H; cf. Ezek. 14:14, 20), the twelve (minor) prophets, Zerubbabel, Jeshua, and Nehemiah. Enoch was translated to heaven, and the bones of Joseph were cared for; Shem and Seth were honored among men, and Adam above every living being in creation.

50:1-24: Simon II the high priest, son of Onias (cf. Jos. Antiq. XII.iii.3; iv.10), was the leader of his brethren and the pride of his people (so in the Hebrew and the Syriac; in the Greek this line is lacking, but cf. 49:15*b* G). In his days the temple was fortified, a large reservoir was built, and Jerusalem was strengthened. He made the court of the sanctuary glorious when, clothed in his official vestments and surrounded by priests, he performed sacred ministrations in the temple.

50:25-29: The Idumeans, the Philistines, and the Samaritans are especially detestable. Ben Sirach has written much instruction in this book, and he who lays it to heart will become wise; the light of the Lord will illuminate his path.

e. Appendices (ch. 51). These are not all to be found in the Greek MSS.

51:1-12: A psalm of thanksgiving praising God for delivering the author from various afflictions.

After 51:12:i-xvi: A liturgy preserved only in Hebrew (cf. Ps. 136). Perhaps it was omitted in the Greek translation because the sons of Zadok, who are praised in it (51:12:ix), were no longer high priests in 132 B.C. Or perhaps it was added by a later writer whose outlook was Pharisaic (though he does not mention the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead) and messianic (the words: "O give thanks to him who makes the horn of the house of David to bud," in 51:12:viii, express sentiments absent from 36:1-17; cf. 47:22, which may be a gloss).

51:13-30: An alphabetical acrostic poem recounting how Ben Sirach acquired wisdom through seeking it from the days of his youth, and inviting the untaught to attend his school (cf. vss. 23-27 with 6:24-28; 24:19-22; Matt. 11:28-30).

After 51:30: An alphabetical acrostic canticle preserved only in Hebrew and (with variations) in Syriac.

5. Language and style. Although Hebrew continued to flourish as the language of the schools, Aramaic influence was making itself felt when Ben Sirach was writing, and so it is not surprising that numerous Aramaisms should appear in his work. To some extent his style is imitative and repetitive, but it would be an exaggeration to say that it is decadent; and a study of the language scarcely affords reasons for opposing the view that his book was written earlier than such canonical works as Daniel and Esther. While his composition bears the impress of the living language of his time, Ben Sirach is quite capable of writing classical Hebrew, and stylistically he is by no means inferior to the later psalmists and to the later authors of the book of Proverbs. Although he may never attain to the artistic level of the superb poetic constructions of the book of Job, he possesses considerable literary talent and can deftly relieve the monotony of moralizing verse by combining the lyrical with the didactic. Many of his epigrams compare well with the best in Proverbs (see especially Prov. 25–27), and his magnificent poem in praise of the works of God in nature (Ecclus. 42:15–43:33) compares not unfavorably with such hymns as Ps. 147 or even with passages in Job. In a general way Ben Sirach would seem to derive his literary inspiration from the books of Psalms and Proverbs, and correspondingly two main species of verse may be distinguished in his work—the didactic and the devotional or lyrical. Despite his identification of wisdom with the law of Moses, he never sets forth legal regulations in a juristic style.

a. Didactic verse. While the greater part of Proverbs consists of isolated aphorisms (e.g., Prov. 10:1–22:16 is made up of 375 epigrams, each comprising one independent distich), such couplets complete per se occur but rarely in Ecclesiasticus (e.g., 21:8), which is largely constituted by more sustained versified essays of varying length. Like the authors of Proverbs, Ben Sirach usually employs the normal Hebrew literary unit of verse, a distich or couplet of balanced lines or hemistichs in synonymous, antithetic, or synthetic parallelism, with four stress-accents on each (see POETRY, HEBREW). Popular aphorisms generally assumed this form (cf. Isa. 22: 13*b;* Ezek. 18:2*b;* etc.); it was a unit of verse easy to imitate and in lengthy passages easy to omit—facts to which the variants in the MSS of Ecclesiasticus bear ample testimony. More prolonged numerical proverbs, which may have developed from the riddle (חידה; cf. Ecclus. 8:8; 47:17 H), are to be found in 23:16-17; 25:1-2, 7-11; 26:5-6, 28; 50:25-26 (cf. Prov. 30:15-31; Amos 1–2; etc.). Usually Ben Sirach does not leave his distichs in isolation but connects them with related verses to form continuous passages with a dominant theme, some of which have strophic divisions, although this is particularly noticeable in the lyrical sections.

b. Devotional verse. As in the book of Proverbs, so in Ecclesiasticus, the glories of personified wisdom are celebrated in psalmlike verse (1:1-21; 24:1-22; cf. Prov. 8:1-31; also Job 28:12-28). This is what we should expect, for Ben Sirach holds that the ideal sage, besides imparting moral instruction in wise sayings when inspired by God, also offers thanks to the Lord in prayer (39:6). From time to time he exhorts his readers to bless their Maker, who satisfies them with good things (e.g., 32:13); and he presents a personal song of thanksgiving in 51:1-12 (cf., e.g., Ps. 18). Ben Sirach shows great admiration for the liturgy of the temple, evidently with choir and congregation singing antiphonally (50:18-19), and he extols David for adorning divine worship with his liturgical compositions and choral arrangements (47: 8-10). An example of Ben Sirach's liturgical writing —if it is genuine—is set forth in 51:12:i-xvi (preserved only in Hebrew), a canticle of thanksgiving apparently meant to be rendered antiphonally (cf. Pss. 118:1-4; 136:1-3). His panegyric upon the heroes of Israel's past (Ecclus. 44–49) bears a strong resemblance to such hymns as Ps. 105, with its laudatory celebrations of the Lord for his wonderful deeds wrought in ancient times on behalf of his chosen people. The eulogy of the high priest Simon (50:1-24) has an exalted conclusion in a psalmlike prayer (vss. 22-24; cf. 45:26). Lyrical strains suddenly appear in didactic passages (e.g., 23:19-20), and an elegiac note of regretfulness is struck in some of the poems, occasionally as prayers (14:17-19; 17:27-28; 18:8-10; 22: 27). Perhaps the finest examples of Ben Sirach's lyrical talent are to be found in the hymns to the glory of God in 39:12-35; 42:15–43:33, both exemplifying strophic divisions; thus 43:6-26 (in the Hebrew) has six stanzas of four distichs each.

6. Doctrinal antinomies. Ben Sirach holds that the greatest good is wisdom, a divine quality to some extent present in all creation. It can be discerned in the world generally and in the law of Moses more particularly; by earnest endeavor men can increasingly assimilate wisdom, and Ben Sirach would shed light upon this highest of all human quests by offering his readers the results of his lifelong reflection on the basic conditions of human existence. His teaching is thus extremely comprehensive, and its many-sidedness may be brought out by a consideration of certain fundamental antinomies, contrary viewpoints which he does not succeed in harmonizing with one another. That Ben Sirach was aware in some measure of the presence of such antinomies in his work seems to be indicated by his emphasis on the limitations of the human understanding (3:23). They seem to be latent in all developed forms of biblical religion. See BIBLICAL THEOLOGY, HISTORY OF.

a. Predestination and freedom. Ben Sirach takes over the ethical monotheism implied in the teaching of Amos and his prophetic successors, and assumed in many of the Psalms and in the book of Proverbs. The Lord is the one and only God (Ecclus. 36:5). He is "the all" (43:27), an expression which is not, however, to be construed in terms of strict pantheism, for God transcends his works (43:28). He is almighty and all-seeing (15:18), and knows what will be, as well as what has been (42:19). He created the cosmos, all the parts of which are permanently adjusted to one another so as to operate in mutual harmony (42:23)—a conception which manifestly precludes the possibility of any veritable eschatology. Good and evil alike proceed from God (11:14; cf. Isa. 45:7), and human destiny is in his hands (Ecclus. 33:10-13—G 36:10-13), not in man's (11:10-13). The Lord rules with justice (35:12—G 32:14-15), requiting men according to their deserts (16:12) and controlling the course of events for the benefit of the righteous and the punishment of the wicked (39:22-31). Yet in his compassion he forgives sins and saves in time of affliction (2:11). Wisdom herself is of divine origin (1:1); God poured her out upon all his works (1:9) and supplied her to those who love him (1:10). On the other hand, man is a free being, and wisdom is acquired by human effort (6:18-37). He can choose between good and evil, and therefore the responsibility for sin must not be attributed to God (15:11-20). Ben Sirach is quite confident that man was left in the power of his own inclination (יצר) at the Creation (15:14); this doctrine may have stemmed from Jeremiah's conception of the human heart as the root of sin (cf. Jer. 17:9). Thus, although at times he may need divine help to overcome his evil propensities (Ecclus. 23:4-6), the finite individual alone is finally responsible for the way in which he works out his destiny. No one is without guilt, and all deserve punishment (8:5), and yet man possesses the inherent volitional power to amend his ways and turn to goodness (17:26; 21:1).

b. Pessimism and optimism. Man was created out of dust (33:10—G 36:10) and returns to dust (17:1; 40:11). His span of life is short (17:2; 18:9-10), inevitably terminating, though apparently with a few exceptions (48:9; 49:14), in the dismal existence of Sheol, where there is no luxury (14:16), no singing of praises (17:27), no inquiry (41:4). Nevertheless, even death, the gateway to Sheol, is welcome to those in need and whose strength is failing (41:2). The doctrine of Sheol is made less gloomy in Greek I in certain passages (e.g., 7:17), and some of the glosses in Greek II go so far as to affirm that there is eternal bliss for the obedient beyond the grave (e.g., 2:9; 19:19; cf. the glosses in the Latin version in 17:23, 27; 21:10; 24:32). Besides the fear of death, troubles of one sort or another are the common lot of rich and poor alike—nightmares, calamities, famines, afflictions, and plagues (40:1-11). There are moments of happiness, but these are always likely to come to a sudden end (18:25-26). All men are sinful (8:5), women especially so (42:14), and it was through the sin of Eve that human beings became mortal (25:24). On the other hand, good women do exist, and happy marriages are possible (26:1-4; 36:18-26—G 36:27-31). Man was made in the image of God and granted dominion over beasts and birds (17:3-4), being equipped with intelligence and skill (17:7; 38:6). All the works of the Lord are good, and he supplies every need (39:33); the world constitutes a magnificent unity in its rich variety (42:22-25). Whatever misfortunes may exist, they are due punishments for the wicked (27:25-29; 39:25-31) or blessings in disguise (20:9-11) or means of proving the genuineness of an individual's piety (2:5).

c. Retributive justice and factual truth. God is just or impartial in his treatment of his creatures (35:12—G 32:14-15), so that good things come to good people and evil things to sinners (39:25). Holding neither the Platonic doctrine of the immortality of the soul nor anything corresponding to the Pharisaic notion of the resurrection of the body (10:11), Ben Sirach teaches that just retribution operates wholly on this side of the grave, and he thinks it easy for the Lord to reward a man, even on the day of his death, according to his conduct (11:26). On the other hand, Ben Sirach is not unaware of the sort of objections that are raised against a theory of this kind, e.g., in the book of JOB. He evidently recognizes that the hard facts of common experience at least prima facie militate against it, and in this case he makes a deliberate attempt to overcome the antinomy by resorting to a distinction between appearance and reality. Things are not what they seem to be, and are not therefore to be taken at their face value. The Lord may be slow to anger (5:4), yet his wrath rests upon sinners (5:6), and the day of calamity will inevitably come (5:8), whereas the fear of the Lord brings gladness and long life (1:12). The prosperity of the wicked lacks permanence (40:13), but the afflictions of the righteous are sent to test them (2:5) or to discipline them for their moral improvement (18:13-14; 32:14-15—G 35:14-15), and good fortune may be concealed in adversity (20:9). Moreover, the spiritual rewards of piety are not to be overlooked; the righteous man finds true friends (6:16), wins a good name that outlives him (39:9-11), and realizes that the fear of the Lord is better than knowledge or intelligence (19:24) and better than riches and strength (40:26).

d. Ritualism and ethics. Ben Sirach greatly respects the priesthood and the ritualism of the temple. In one passage divine Wisdom is personified and represented as ministering before the Creator in the holy tabernacle (24:10). The Lord bestowed special privileges upon Aaron the first high priest (45:6-22), and he established a covenant of peace with Phinehas that he and his descendants should always enjoy the dignity of the priesthood (45:24; cf. Num. 25:10-13). Simon the high priest made the court of the sanctuary glorious when, arrayed in his official vestments, he went up to the holy altar while presiding over ceremonies in the temple—perhaps on the Day of Atonement (50:11). Ben Sirach therefore calls upon his readers to honor the priests and to pay the contributions due to them as ministers of the Lord (7:29-31), the festivals and sacrifices being divinely ordained (33:8—G 36:8; 35:4-5—G 32:6-7). On the other hand, in line with the tradition established by Amos, Ben Sirach so emphasizes the ineffectiveness of ritual performances per se, that in the last-cited passage the only justification he can give for the offering of sacrifices is that they are included among the requirements of the law. A man who robs the poor in order to make an oblation is no better than one who kills a son before his father's eyes (34:20—G 31:23). In themselves sacrifices do not atone for sin (7:8-9); God will not accept the offerings of the unrighteous (34:18-19—G 31:21-22), and a man who fasts for his sins without genuine repentance gains nothing by his formal self-humiliation (34:26—G 31:31). It is the offerings of the righteous that are acceptable to God, particularly when they are given generously (35:6-10—G 32:8-12), and it is the practice of justice and kindness—as in filial piety (3:3) and almsgiving (3:30)—that atones for sin.

e. Universalism and particularism. Following the teaching of prophets like Amos, with his stress on divine justice; Jeremiah, with his deep sense of personal responsibility; and Deutero-Isaiah, with his notion of a world-wide mission, Ben Sirach holds that there is one universal God, whose will is valid for all mankind. The Lord is the creator of the world who is everywhere present (16:26-30; 43:27), the ruler of the nations who requites all men according to their deserts (10:14-17; 16:11-14); and the conception of race can be construed entirely in terms of piety and morals (10:19). On the other hand, Israel is the Lord's own portion (Ecclus. 17:17; cf. Deut. 32:8), his first-born son (Ecclus. 36:12; cf. Exod. 4: 22) whose days are without number (Ecclus. 37:25), and Jerusalem is his beloved city and dwelling place (24:8-12; 36:13). So Ben Sirach can pray that God will crush the foreign nations opposed to Israel (36: 3-10—G 33:3-12) and vindicate the prophets by gathering together the scattered tribes of Jacob—his nearest approach to a belief in a messianic expectation (36:11-17—G 33:13*a*; 36:16*b*-22; such passages as 47:22; 51:12:viii may well have been added later). And in an outburst of vexation he gives expression to his detestation of the Idumeans, the Philistines, and especially the Samaritans (50:25-26).

f. Reason and revelation. Ben Sirach's ethics are evidently derived from a study of the writings of the sages, particularly the book of Proverbs, and from his own rational reflection upon his varied experiences of life. Much of his practical wisdom is sound enough, as when, e.g., he argues that gluttony should be avoided because of its deleterious effects on the health (31:20—G 34:20); but his moral generalizations are not always convincing, and his teaching is not always consistent. Thus he sometimes implies that women are inherently evil (25:24; 42:14) and at other times that this is not the case (25:1; 26:3). While these contradictions may be due to the fact that the counsels were given on various occasions and reflect different moods and circumstances, such inconsistencies seem to show that Ben Sirach's rationalistic prudentialism suffers from certain serious limitations. For one thing, he persistently refuses to try to see things from any other standpoint than that of a man who is a somewhat despotic head of a family. Thus when he condemns the sparing of the rod (30:1), he does not carefully scrutinize the pertinent evidence for his pronouncement, but simply jumps to the conclusion that a boy strictly brought up will turn out to be a son of whom his father can boast in the presence of his acquaintances (30:2-3). On the metaphysical plane Ben Sirach's intellectualistic aspirations are most easily discernible perhaps in his various attempts to demonstrate that his doctrine of God's retributive justice does not conflict with the facts of common experience. On the other hand, he freely owns to the limitations of the human understanding (3:17-24) and assumes as axiomatic that God has revealed his will for men in the law delivered to Moses (45:5), which fills the human mind with wisdom (24:25). So it is in terms of respect for the law rather than in terms of rationalistic prudentialism that he defines wisdom (19:20; 21:11); and just as wisdom is older than creation (24:9; cf. Prov. 8:22-31), so the law antedates Moses, as it was already known to Abraham (Ecclus. 44:20) and even to primordial humanity (17:11-14; cf. Siphre on Deut. section 37-f. 76*a-b*). With such an identification of wisdom with the law (24:23), the sum of moral truth comes to be found, not in any sort of rationalistically argued ethics, but simply in obedience to the will of God as revealed in the Scriptures. Nevertheless, Ben Sirach is far from regarding the Pentateuchal legislation as being all on the same level of importance; the ritualistic rulings are taken to be secondary to the ethical, and the requirements concerning diet, lustrations, and the sabbath are passed over in complete silence. Thus his moral rationalism and his religious faith in the revelation of God to Israel are not integrated in a consistent scheme of thought. He does not seek to justify his view concerning the primacy of the ethical in the law, any more than he tries to show that the counsels of his general prudentialism can be deduced from the Pentateuch by legitimate exegesis. It is true that he goes beyond the position represented in the book of Proverbs by emphasizing the identity of Wisdom and the law, and in certain passages he anticipates Talmudic developments, as when, e.g., he approaches a juristic distinction between intentional and unintentional wrong oath-taking (23:11). But the great difference between Ben Sirach's teaching and rabbinics remains; and it is perhaps significant that in his enumeration of the great men of the past (chs. 44–49), there is not so much as a passing allusion to Ezra, the man who in the Pharisaic and Talmudic tradition was destined to become the prototype and paragon of the genuine scholar.

Bibliography. I. Lévi, L'Ecclésiastique (Hebrew text, French trans. and commentary; 2 vols.; 1898-1901); "Sirach, the Wisdom of Jesus the Son of," Jewish Encyclopedia, XI (1905), 388-97. R. Smend, Die Weisheit des Jesus Sirach, I (Hebrew text and German trans.; 1906); II (commentary; 1906); III (Greek-Syriac-Hebrew index; 1907). G. H. Box and W. O. E. Oesterley, "The Book of Sirach" (English trans. with introduction and notes), in R. H. Charles, ed., The Apoc. and Pseudep. of the OT (1913), I, 268-517. R. H. Pfeiffer, "Ecclesiasticus by Sirach" (introduction), History of NT Times (1949), pp. 352-408.

For the argument that Simon I never existed, see: G. F. Moore, "Simon the Righteous," Jewish Studies in Memory of Israel Abrahams (1927), pp. 348-64. For the contrary view, cf.: H. Englander, The Hebrew College Jubilee Volume (1925), pp. 145-69; S. Zeitlin, The Proceedings of the American Academy for Jewish Research, III (1932), 145-46.

On the Genizah MS E, see: J. Marcus, ed., The Newly Discovered Hebrew of Ben Sira (1931). For the textual history, see: M. H. Segal, "The Evolution of the Hebrew Text of Ben Sira," JQR, N.S., XXV (1934-35), 91-149. For the view that the Genizah text is a translation, and for Ben Sirach's doctrine, cf.: A. Büchler, "Ben Sira's Conception of Sin and Atonement," JQR, N.S., XIII (1922-23), 303-35, 461-502; XIV (1923-24), 53-83. For the style, see: W. Baumgartner, "Die literarischen Gattungen in der Weisheit des Jesus Sirach," ZAW, XXXIV (1914), 161-98; cf. H. J. Cadbury, "The Grandson of Ben Sira," HTR, XLVIII (1955), 219-25.

For a parallel (with predestinarian tendencies) between Ecclus. 33:7-15—G 36:7-15 and 1QS 3:14–4:26, cf.: P. Winter, "Ben Sira and the Teaching of Two Ways," Vetus Testamentum, V (1955), 315-18.

For a reconstruction of the Hebrew text as a whole, see: M. S. Segal, Sepher Ben Sira Ha-shalem (1953).

On the Qumran fragments, see: J. T. Milik, Ten Years of Discovery (1959), p. 32. T. A. BURKILL

ECLIPSE. See SCIENCE, §§ A2*c*, B2*b*iii, C2*b*.

ECSTASY [ἔκστασις, from ἐξίστημι, to put out of place]. A mental condition in which consciousness is wholly or partly in suspension, thought and volition cease, and the subject is directed and controlled by the Spirit of God. The word "ecstasy" conveys the idea of the soul or spirit's temporarily leaving the body (the Greek view) and finding union with the divine; this idea is foreign to Hebrew thinking, where the personality in ecstasy is no longer himself but the agent of the spiritual power invading or possessing him. Ecstasy may be spontaneous or stimulated artificially by music, dancing, or contemplation of objects (I Sam. 9; II Kings 3:15), and is sometimes termed madness because of accompanying physical movements, incoherent speech, and frenzied behavior (II Kings 9:11; cf. I Cor. 14:23). Appearing with great diversity universally, it defies rigid definition, and is better viewed collectively to cover conditions of trance, dream, vision, audition, rapture, frenzy, exultation, and related states ranging from entire absence of consciousness to complete or partial awareness.

1. In the OT. In the OT we find the ecstasy of primitive prophecy, produced by group participation in song and dance, contagious, culminating in trance (I Sam. 10:5, 12; 19:20); of the elders, when Moses wishes that "all the LORD's people" were prophets (Num. 11:25-29); of Elijah, when he experienced wind, earthquake, fire, and voice (I Kings 19:11-18); of David dancing before the ark (II Sam. 6:12-23). Abraham's vision in "deep sleep," the vision and audition at the burning bush, the wrestling of Jacob at Penuel, all bear marks of ecstasy (Gen. 15:12; 32:24; Exod. 3:2-14).

Ecstasy does not cease with the development of classical prophecy. The ministries of Isaiah and Amos begin in states of ecstasy (Isa. 6; Amos 7–9). "I am like a drunken man," declares Jeremiah (23:9; cf. Acts 2:13-15). His vision of desolation—sky darkened, mountains quaking, hills moving, earth deserted—is clearly ecstatic (Jer. 4:23-26). Ezekiel, subject to trance and catalepsy, speaks of the Spirit's lifting him, falling upon him, transporting him, entering into him (2:2; 3:14, 23-27; 8:3; 11:1, 5; 37:1). Abnormal elements of ecstasy are, however, subservient to moral and spiritual ends in classical prophecy.

2. In the NT. Events surrounding the birth and ministry of Jesus show signs of ecstasy: the exultation of Elizabeth and Mary (Luke 1:41-55), and the inspired utterances of Zechariah, Simeon, and Anna (Luke 1:67-79; 2:25-39); the heavens opened, the dove, the voice, at his baptism (Mark 1:9-11); his temptation, resembling Ezekiel's being carried about by the Spirit (Luke 4:1-12; cf. Ezek. 8:3); his transfiguration, with the cloud (the "Shekinah"), the voice, the mystic trance induced by intense communion (Mark 9:2-8); his high-priestly prayer suggesting the highest state of spiritual union with the Father (John 17).

The church begins in ecstasy—the wind, the fire, the tongues, indicating exalted states of feeling following much prayer and intense messianic conviction (Acts 2:2-4). Peter's trance vision and audition, at prayer, is clearly ecstatic (Acts 10:9-16). Elements of ecstasy may also be present in Stephen's vision (Acts 7:55; cf. 6:15).

Ecstatic moods and speech (glossolalia) during worship threaten the welfare of the church at Corinth (I Cor. 12–14; cf. I Thess. 5:19-21). Paul speaks with tongues (I Cor. 14:6, 18); he hears divine voices (II Cor. 12:9; Acts 18:9; 22:17); his conversion experience indicates ecstasy (Acts 9; 22; 26); he is "caught up to the third heaven," hears unutterable things, not knowing whether "in the body or out of the body" (II Cor. 12:2-4). He places little weight upon such transports, urging Christians rather to seek the love of Christ which surpasses all knowledge credited to the ecstasies of pagan cults (Rom. 8:38-39; cf. Eph. 3:14-19). John, "in the Spirit on the Lord's Day," hearing a voice and seeing a vision, is doubtless in a state of ecstasy. For NT religion generally, however, being "in the Spirit" represents normal Christian living.

Bibliography. W. R. Inge, Christian Mysticism (1932); K. E. Kirk, The Vision of God (1932); A. Guillaume, Prophecy and Divination (1938); M. Barnett, The Living Flame (1953).

E. ANDREWS

ED ĕd [עֵד, witness]. The name given to the altar in Josh. 22:34 KJV (RSV WITNESS). The word is actually omitted in the MT, but is added on the basis of the Syr. and the context. See WITNESS, ALTAR OF.

EDAR ē′dər. KJV form of Eder in Gen. 35:21. See EDER, TOWER OF.

EDDIAS. KJV Apoc. form of IZZIAH.

EDDINUS. Alternate name used for JEDUTHUN 1 in I Esd. 1:15.

EDEN ē′dən [עֵדֶן, delight]. 1. A Levite in the reign of King Hezekiah, and one of those who cleansed the temple (II Chr. 29:12). It is unclear whether or not II Chr. 31:15 refers to the same individual.

2. See BETH-EDEN.

EDEN, GARDEN OF [גַּן־עֵדֶן, גַּן־בְּעֵדֶן, see below]. A garden of trees planted by Yahweh, in which Adam and Eve first dwelt.

1. Etymology
2. Usage
3. Site
4. Theological significance
Bibliography

1. Etymology. The root of the word "Eden," עֵדֶן, is uncertain in Hebrew. A connection with the Sumerian-Akkadian edinu, meaning "wilderness" or "flatland," is possible. The LXX derived the word from the Hebrew verb עָדַן, "to delight," and translated "garden of Eden" as "garden of delight," παράδεισος τῆς τρυφῆς. This led to the traditional identification of the Garden of Eden with PARADISE.

2. Usage. "Eden" occurs thirteen times in the singular, undetermined form to designate a location. In three cases (Gen. 2:8, 10; 4:16) it refers to a geographical land in which the garden is placed, גַּן־בְּעֵדֶן, "garden in Eden." A shift in meaning occurs in Gen. 2:15; 3:23-24, which speaks of the גַּן־עֵדֶן, "garden of Eden." In certain of the prophets the meaning diverges even further from that of simply a geographical land. Isa. 51:3 sets Eden parallel to the "garden of Yahweh." The highly mythical passage of Ezek. 28:13 places Eden in apposition to the "garden of God" (cf. also Ezek. 31:9, 16, 18; 36:35; Joel 2:3).

3. Site. It is generally agreed among scholars that the section Gen. 2:10-14 stems from a tradition which is at variance with the rest of Gen. 2. These verses interrupt the context and are written in a different style. According to this ancient tradition a river with its source in Eden issues from the garden as a single stream, and then divides into four branches. The third and fourth branches are well known. HIDDEKEL, חדקל, is certainly the Tigris, although the name occurs only once again in the OT (Dan. 10:4). It is more closely defined as flowing קדמת אשור, "east of Assyria." This presents something of a problem, since Assyria extends far to the E of the Tigris. Some have understood אשור as Asshur, the ancient capital of Assyria, but this interpretation seems improbable. The fourth river, the פרת, is unequivocally the Euphrates, derived from the Akkadian Purattu.

The identification of the first two rivers is very controversial, and no generally accepted conclusion has been reached by scholars. Pishon, פישון, is described as the "one which flows around the whole land of Havilah, where there is gold . . . . Bdellium and onyx stone are there." The name appears only once in the OT. It probably should be understood as an appellative from the root פוש, "to spring forth." HAVILAH, חוילה, appears as SW Arabia in Gen. 10: 28, and again as the E frontier of the Ishmaelite Arabs, which would point instead to NE Arabia (25: 18). Some connect Havilah with the word חול, "sand," and understand it as merely a general designation for the "land of sand." The mention of precious stones does not help in regard to location.

GIHON, גיחון, is described as the "one which flows around the whole land of Cush." The etymology is uncertain, but it may be an appellative from the root גוח, "burst forth." Although it occurs nowhere else in the OT as a river, the name does appear as the well-known spring E of Jerusalem. Jewish and Christian tradition identified Gihon with the Nile (cf. Jer. 2:18 LXX). Cush signifies almost always Ethiopia, but there are occasional exceptions (Gen. 10:8). Although the meaning in this passage remains uncertain, Ethiopia lends itself as the most probable interpretation.

In the light of this evidence, it should become clear that any reconstruction of the geography is based on a measure of hypothesis. Nevertheless, some reconstructions are more plausible than others. Earlier attempts have failed in trying to harmonize the biblical account with modern scientific geography by identifying two of the rivers of Eden with Babylonian canals. In such interpretations there is no understanding of the legendary-mythical nature of the material. Certainly the Tigris and Euphrates never had a common source!

A most attractive theory interprets this tradition as an ancient picture of the four world rivers encircling the entire earth. According to this hypothesis the Pishon is identified with the Indus, which was conceived of as encircling Arabia and flowing into the Nile. The Nile, in turn, rising with the Euphrates, crossed below the Persian Gulf and encircled Ethiopia. This presupposes that Africa and India were connected; this was the common concept in the antique world (cf. Arrian Anabasis VI.i). We know that down to the time of Alexander's Indian expedition the Indian Ocean was unknown, in spite of earlier explorations, and that the Arabian and Persian gulfs were considered to be lakes.

4. Theological significance. Although the concept of a primeval paradise appears well developed in many ethnic religions (Persian, Indian), it is found only sporadically in the Near East. The Sumerian "land of Dilmun" and the Babylonian "cedar forest of Irini" and "garden of Siduri" are only indirect parallels to the Garden of Eden. The failure of genuine parallels to the OT ultimately stems from a different concept of man's nature in the Near Eastern religions.

The writer of Gen. 2 has described the Garden of Eden in language arising out of the myth. Nevertheless, he has reworked the ancient material to make his own unique witness. The garden was planted after the creation of man; this repudiates the mythical idea that Yahweh lived there. Again, man was placed in the garden to work it, not just to enjoy its luxury. Man was driven from the garden on account of his disobedience, because Eden symbolized the state of unbroken fellowship between God and man.

Bibliography. Among the standard commentaries on Genesis, J. Skinner, ICC (1910), is superior. For a thorough discussion of the various interpretations up to 1937, see: T. C. Vriezen, Onderzoek naar de Paradijsvoorstelling bij de oude semietische Volken (1937), pp. 148 ff. Important among the older literature are: F. Delitzsch, Wo lag das Paradies? (1881); W. F. Albright, "The Location of the Garden of Eden," AJSL, 39 (1922), 15 ff. More recent interpretations are: G. Hölscher, Drei Erdkarten (1949), pp. 35 ff; L. Koehler, "Problems in the Study of the Language of the OT," Journal of Semitic Studies, I (1956), 8-9. J. Simons, The Geographical and Topographical Texts of the OT (1959). For an excellent discussion of the antique world picture, see: Grosser Historischer Weltatlas, herausgegeben vom Bayerischen Schulbuch-Verlag, I (1953), Tafel 8c, and the Erläuterungen, I (2 Aufl., 1954), pp. 58-59; E. G. Kraeling, Bible Atlas (1956), pp. 42 ff. B. S. CHILDS

EDEN, HOUSE OF. See BETH-EDEN.

EDER ē′dər [עֶדֶר, probably Aram. form of עֵזֶר, helper; LXX B Αἶδαθ (I Chr. 23:23), Ἡλά (I Chr. 24:30); LXX A Ὦδερ, LXX B Ὦδηδ (I Chr. 8:15)]; KJV ADER ā′dər in I Chr. 8:15. 1. A Levite (I Chr. 23: 23; 24:30).

2. A Benjaminite family (I Chr. 8:15).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 63. H. H. GUTHRIE, JR.

3. A village of Judah in the Negeb province of Beer-sheba (Josh. 15:21; probably LXX ARAD is correct).

EDER, TOWER OF [מגדל עדר, tower of the flock] (Gen. 35:21). A place between Bethelehem and Hebron where Jacob camped after the death of Rachel. The term is used in its literal sense to designate Mount Zion in Mic. 4:8, where it is translated "tower of the flock."

EDES. KJV Apoc. of IDDO 8.

EDICT [פתגם, דת]. A public proclamation, written and sealed with the king's signet and publicly read (Ezra 6:11; Esth. 2:8; 9:1, 13). What distinguishes an edict from a decree is its written form and public pronouncement. Note that one of the words translated "edict" is כתב, "a writing" (Esth. 8:8-9; cf. 3:12).

The Bible emphasizes the irrevocability of Medo-Persian law (Ezra 6:11; Esth. 8:8-9; Dan. 6:8), but there is no extrabiblical evidence of this. Darius III is said to have ordered the execution of Charidemos and later acknowledged that he erred but could do nothing about it (Diod. Sic. 17.30). That this argues for the immutability of Persian law may be questioned, as execution had already taken place. It may simply mean he could not undo the deed. In Esther the royal edict to exterminate the Jews was counteracted by another permitting the Jews to take vengeance on their enemies (Esth. 8:8-13). Severe penalties were attached to the violation of Persian edicts (Ezra 6:11; see IMPALEMENT).

In the NT Moses' parents are listed as an example of faith in being unafraid to transgress the royal edict to slay all male babies (Heb. 11:23).

See also LAW; DECREE. V. H. KOOY

EDIFICATION [οἰκοδομή, building]. The Greek root of this word appears in several forms and compounds in the NT—"build," "build up," "builder," "building," "upbuilding," "edify," "edification," "encouraged" (I Cor. 8:10), and "structure" (Eph. 2:21). The word appears only as a verb in the Synoptic gospels, where it almost always has the literal meaning: "to build or construct."

Paul, who frequently uses the Greek word in both noun and verb forms, never uses it literally, in the sense of "erecting" a building. He uses it often metaphorically in the sense of "building" or "building up" the church, and of "building up" fellow believers. In one or two passages (the number depends on whether Paul wrote Ephesians) Paul describes the church as a building (I Cor. 3:9; Eph. 2:21). He also speaks of "building" the church on the foundation he has laid (I Cor. 3:10, 12, 14); and Eph. 2:20 speaks of the church as "built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets."

But Paul uses the word more frequently to mean "edify" or "edification" in the sense of "strengthening, unifying, making for peace"—the opposite of "dissipating, disrupting, destroying, or causing dissension." To the Corinthians (I Cor. 14:26) he writes: "Let all things be done for edification"—i.e., for the upbuilding, strengthening, and uniting of the church. "Edification" does not have primarily an emotional connotation; it has the meaning of "making whole, harmonious, and one." And so, finally, Christians are to "build up" one another (I Thess. 5:11)—i.e., to strengthen and encourage one another. And it is primarily love which "builds up" (I Cor. 8:1).

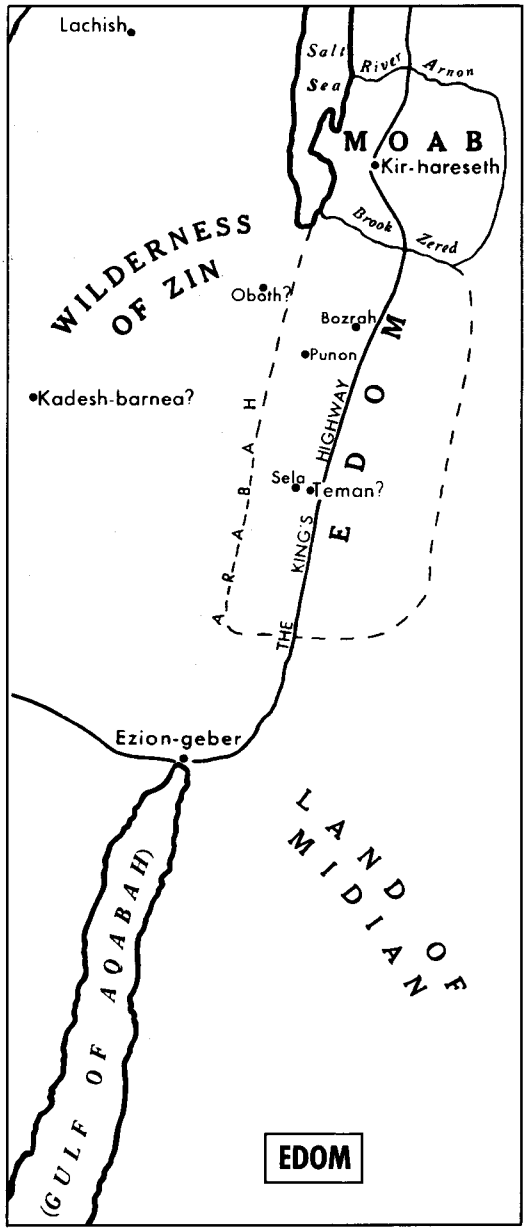
B. H. THROCKMORTON, JR.

EDNA ĕd'nə [Ἔδνα = עֶדְנָה, delight; cf. Ἔδνα or Ἐέδνα, bride price or wedding gift]. The wife of Raguel, Tobit's kinsman; and the mother of Sarah, the bride of Tobias (Tob. 7:2, 14 ff; 8:11-12). The Vulg. and the OL give her name as Anna. Her farewell to her son-in-law is memorable (10:12).

J. C. SWAIM

EDOM ē'dəm [אדום, the red region]; EDOMITES ē'də mīts' [אדומים אדמיים]. A country and its people, neighbors of the Israelites to the E and the S. All the monuments and written records of the Edomites have perished, so what information can be obtained about them comes from the writings of their neighbors and enemies, the Israelites, Egyptians, Assyrians, and Babylonians, and from archaeological exploration. Both Edom and Edomites are mentioned frequently in the Bible; in addition, there are places where, because of the similarity between the letters ד (d) and ר (r), the text has wrongly read ארם, "Aram" (i.e., Syria), and ארמים, "Arameans" (i.e., Syrians), for אדם, "Edom," and אדמים, "Edomites," such as II Kings 16:6; II Chr. 20:2, where the KJV has followed the MT, but the RSV has followed an emended text.

1. The land
   a. Fortress Edom
   b. The outlying regions
   c. The hinterland
2. The people
3. History
4. Edom in biblical literature



Bibliography

1. The land. The territory of the Edomites falls into three distinct parts: Fortress Edom, the outlying regions, and the hinterland to the W.

a. Fortress Edom. This consisted of an irregular quadrilateral, ca. seventy miles from N to S and an average of fifteen miles E to W. The N boundary was the deep ravine of the Brook Zered (Wadi el-Ḥesa), which separated it from Moab; the E boundary faced the desert a few miles W of the modern railway line from Damascus to Mecca; the S boundary was the scarp of the Neqb esh-Shtar, overlooking the Hismeh Valley; and the W boundary was the line of hills that overlook the Arabah from the E. It was this territory that received the name of Edom, "the red region," from the red rocks and soil that abound everywhere through it; SEIR, "the wooded region," was the name specifically given to the slopes E of the Arabah, though in biblical literature "Edom" and "Seir" are sometimes used interchangeably.

Ca. twenty-five miles below the Brook Zered, the W wall is partly broken by the Punon (Feinan) embayment, which extends eastward for ca. nine miles of lower country and furnishes a crossroad from the Arabah into Edom. This divided the territory into two unequal parts—the N, which ranges from 5,000 to 5,300 feet above sea level, with its chief stronghold at Bozrah (modern Buseireh); the S, which is higher, ranging from 5,300 to nearly 5,700 feet, with its chief stronghold at Teman (modern ruins of Tawilan). Down through the middle of the stretch ran the Edomite part of the King's Highway, which, after crossing the Brook Zered at el-'Aineh in Moab, climbed up the Wadi Laban into the plateau and then followed a course that passed through or close to Tophel, Bozrah, Shobek, and Dana, until it descended into the Hismeh Valley.

The entire boundary of this Edom was dotted with a series of fortresses, especially on the E frontier, which was exposed to raids from the desert. These fortresses, which were set back some miles from the edge of the plateau and near enough to one another to communicate by fire signals, formed a formidable barrier against any attack on the country and indicate a well-organized military system under a strong central government.

b. The outlying regions. These consist of the ARABAH and the region S of the Neqb esh-Shtar as far as the Gulf of Aqabah. These parts were not settled by the Edomites, but because of their proximity to the Fortress Edom, they were essentially under Edomite control. They were important as trade routes which permitted an exchange of the products of Syria and Mesopotamia with those of Egypt and Arabia. The Arabah, in particular, possessed copper and iron mines which were worked by the Edomites and contributed greatly to their wealth. When the area was under the domination of the Hebrews, its mineral resources were exploited by them. See MINES; EZION-GEBER.

c. The hinterland. This was a stretch W of the Arabah which was never settled or even effectively controlled by the Edomites but was occupied by nomadic tribes which owed a nominal allegiance to Edom, and in some cases, such as those of the Kenizzites and Amalekites, were reckoned to be of Edomite origin (Gen. 36:11-12). When Moses wrote to the king of Edom, asking that the Israelites be permitted a passage through his land, and stating that they were at Kadesh, "a city on the edge of your territory" (Num. 20:16), he was speaking the language of diplomacy. Actually, when the king of Edom refused them passage, the Israelites had no difficulty in passing through the hinterland and the outlying regions, and only had to avoid Fortress Edom.

2. The people. The biblical narratives in Genesis, as well as allusions in the prophetic books, constantly emphasize the close racial relationship between the Israelites and the Edomites. It is probable, therefore, that like the former, the Edomites came originally from Aram. However, there are also reports that they intermarried with the Canaanites (Gen. 26:34, where "Hittites" is used in this meaning), Ishmaelites (Gen. 28:9), and the aboriginal Horites of Seir (Gen. 36:20-30, contradicting the statement in Deut. 2:12), so that they were a composite group.

While the Edomites practiced agriculture to some extent, their chief wealth came to them from their trade. The copper and iron which they mined from their hills could be exchanged for the products of Arabia, Egypt, Syria, and Babylonia; and the caravans that lumbered through the country not only paid toll, but also purchased food and lodging there.

It is probable that the Edomites spoke a dialect of Hebrew, as did all their neighbors, for there is no hint of a difference in language. Their religion seems to have been polytheistic; among the gods that can be traced from the names of their kings are Qos or Qosan (the Kose of Josephus), Hadad, and possibly Edom. Their government was monarchical long before that of Israel, and to judge from the list of kings that has been preserved, it was elective (Gen. 36:31-39).

3. History. Archaeological investigations have shown that from the twenty-third to the twentieth century B.C. there was a flourishing civilization in Edom, after which the land was uninhabited, save for roving bands of Bedouins, until the thirteenth century. The cause of this catastrophe must have been a foreign invasion, probably that of Chedorlaomer and his allies (Gen. 14), which swept through the length of the country along the King's Highway, destroying as it went. The Edomites of the Bible arrived in the thirteenth century and were well established in the country under a king by the time of the Exodus. Both Edom and Seir are mentioned by the pharaohs Mer-ne-Ptah (1225-1215) and Ramses III (1198-1167) as being subject to them, but it is uncertain how real these claims may be.

There was no contact between Edom and Israel during the period of the Conquest and of the judges, unless CUSHAN-RISHATHAIM was, as some hold, an Edomite chieftain. Saul is said to have defeated the Edomites (I Sam. 14:47), and David "won a name for himself" by being the first to subdue the country. He put garrisons throughout the country, and his general Joab made the defeat more crushing by a six-month campaign of extermination against the Edomite males (II Sam. 8:13-14; I Kings 11:15-17). This conquest was of exceeding importance for the prosperity of Israel in the reign of Solomon, for as a result of it the latter not only secured the rich trade from Arabia but also began to exploit the mines of Edom on a large scale. The guerrilla warfare of Hadad (I Kings 11:14-22) appears to have been more of an annoyance than a serious threat.

Despite the division of the kingdom which weakened the forces of Judah, Edom seems to have remained in subjection. The list of the cities plundered by Shishak (ca. 925 B.C.) includes some from Edom, indicating that it was still considered a part of Judah. In the time of Jehoshaphat, Edom was ruled by a governor (I Kings 22:47) for a time; but later a native ruler was apparently appointed, for a "king of Edom" is mentioned in the expedition against Moab (II Kings 3). This appointment proved unfortunate, for Edom successfully revolted under the next king of Judah, Joram (II Kings 8:20-22).

The independence of Edom lasted ca. fifty or sixty years until it was assailed by new attempts of Judah. Amaziah achieved a partial conquest as far S as Sela (II Kings 14:7), and his successor, Azariah (Uzziah), completed it by once more extending the limits of Judah to Elath (II Kings 14:22). In 735 B.C. Edom once more won back its freedom from the feeble Ahaz (II Kings 16:6), apparently in alliance with Aram and Israel. This league was broken up when the Assyrians came to the rescue of Judah, and in 732 Kaush-malaku, the king of Edom, paid homage and tribute to Tiglath-pileser III at Damascus (ANET 282). For the next hundred years Edom was a vassal of Assyria; in 711 and 701 it joined with the nearby states, with the backing of Babylon, but on each occasion the coalition was quickly broken up.

As a result of these wars and the necessity of paying heavy tributes, the prosperity of Edom, which had been at its height in the thirteenth–eighth centuries B.C., declined rapidly in the next two hundred years. The Edomites submitted quietly to the Babylonian yoke (604 B.C.). When Nebuchadrezzar besieged and captured Jerusalem in 586, the Edomites joined his forces and exulted at the destruction of their ancient enemies (Ps. 137:7; Lam. 4:21-22; Obad. 10-16). After the deportation of most of Judah to Babylon and the flight of the remainder after the assassination of Gedaliah, the Edomites moved northward into S Judah, with Hebron as their capital; this is the IDUMEA of the postexilic period. During the Persian period the NABATEANS began pressing into the Edomite territory from the S and E, and by the fourth century they had built up a territory of their own with Petra as their capital. Many Edomites migrated into Idumea, but many others seem to have stayed and assimilated with the Nabateans.

The history of the Idumeans is unknown until the time of the Maccabean Revolt, when the triumphant Judeans began to make headway against their neighbors. Judas Maccabeus defeated the Idumeans in the Akrabattene in 164 (I Macc. 5:1-5; Jos. Antiq. XII. viii.1), and John Hyrcanus ca. 120 overran all Idumea and forcibly converted its inhabitants to Judaism (Jos. Antiq. XIII.ix.1; XV.vii.9). The result of this eventually was that an Idumean, Antipater, became the governor of the country in 63 B.C., and his son, Herod, founded in 37 the last dynasty of the kings of Palestine, who were ruling in the period of the NT. In the last great struggle against Rome (A.D. 66-73) the descendants of those Edomites who had exulted over the fall of Jerusalem some six hundred years before were its most fanatic defenders.

4. Edom in biblical literature. Just as Jacob was identified with Israel, Esau was identified with Edom (Gen. 36:1). While the story of the two brothers has a plot of its own, many of its features are based on the fortunes of the two nations. The name of Edom is explained either from the ruddiness of Esau (Gen. 25:25) or from the redness of the lentil porridge for which he jestingly sold his birthright (Gen. 25:30). The S boundary of Israel was marked by Mount Halak, which faced the Edomite boundary of Seir (Josh. 11:17; 12:7); accordingly Jacob is described (Gen. 27:11) as being "smooth" (hālāq) and Esau as "hairy" (śā'îr). The blessing which Isaac gives to Esau (Gen. 27:39-40) foreshadows the historical fact that Edom was for a time subject to Judah and later regained its independence.

In view of the constant hostility between Edom and Judah in the time of the kings, it is not surprising that nearly all the Judean prophets are hostile toward the Edomites. Amos denounces them for their employment of slaves and their ferocity in war; he also mentions that the Moabites once burned the bones of a king of Edom to lime, in a border war of which there is no other record (Amos 1:6, 9, 11; 2:1). The entire little book of Obadiah is devoted to predicting the doom of Edom; and numerous similar passages are to be found (Ps. 137:7; Isa. 11:14; 34:5-17; Jer. 49:7-22; Ezek. 35; Mal. 1:2-4). On the other hand, Zephaniah and Zechariah do not include Edom among the nations whose doom they predict; the law of Deuteronomy is fairly lenient in the admission of Edomites into the community (Deut. 23:8); and the author of Job, rising above national feelings, makes his hero and all the other characters of his story not Judeans, but Edomites.

Bibliography. F. Buhl, Geschichte der Edomiter (1893). N. Glueck, "Explorations in Eastern Palestine, II," AASOR, Vol. XV (1935); The Other Side of the Jordan (1940), pp. 114-34.

S. COHEN

EDREI ĕd'rĭ ī [אדרעי]. 1. A residence city of Og, king of Bashan (Deut. 1:4). It was situated at the extreme S boundary of Bashan near the desert, and was apparently the place where the king watched for an enemy attack either from the S or from the E. Moses and the Israelites invaded Bashan from the desert and defeated Og in the plain before Edrei. The city and the district around it were assigned to the Machir clan of the tribe of Manasseh. The name and the site are retained by the modern city of Der'a near the Yarmuk River, ca. sixty miles due S of Damascus; it has many ruins and inscriptions and an ancient subterranean city.

2. A city in Naphtali (Josh. 19:37). It may be the same as 'tra, No. 91 in the list of Thut-mose (ANEP 242).

S. COHEN

EDUCATION, OT. The OT shows a great concern for the education of the young, and some of its most important portions are seen to have been written by men who were evidently teachers of the people.

1. Technical terms
2. Ancient Near Eastern background
3. Regard for children in ancient Israel
4. The aims of education according to the OT
5. The history of education in ancient Israel according to the OT and rabbinic literature
6. Pedagogics in the OT
7. Literacy in ancient Israel

Bibliography

1. Technical terms. The technical term for "instruction," "teaching," or "direction" in the OT is תורה, and is derived from ירה, "to point out, show," hence "give direction, teach"—e.g., I Sam. 12:23: והוריתי אתכם בדרך הטובה והישרה, "I will instruct you in the good and the right way." Instruction, teachings, both human and divine, become synonymous in the OT with the proper way of life, or laws of conduct, both toward God and toward man, hence Torah, "teaching, the Law." The modern Hebrew word for "education," חנוך, is derived from the root חנך, "to train," and is found in the OT at a late period in the imperative verbal form in Prov. 22:6: חנך לנער על פי דרכו, "Train up a child in the way he should go."

The root of the verb "to learn" is למד; see מלמד, "oxgoad" (Judg. 3:31). The sense of training a bullock to the goad or the yoke (cf. Hos. 10:11) would be extended to "become/make accustomed to, (be) train(ed) in," as in Jer. 2:24: למד מדבר, "used to the wilderness." Further extension brings the meaning "learn/teach" in general. It is to be noted, however, that the root lmd, meaning "learn/teach," is found in Ugaritic (3 *Aqht:*rev. 29), and the root lamâdu, "learn," is found in Akkadian. In the pi'el the verb means "to teach"—e.g.: "that he might teach them war" (Judg. 3:2).

Another verb, used at a later period, is יסר, in the sense of "to discipline, correct, admonish," hence "to instruct," and in many cases implies a degree of severity—e.g.:

> He is instructed aright;
> his God teaches him
> (Isa. 28:26).

The noun is מוסר, "wisdom and instruction" (Prov. 1:2). In one instance the hiph'il of בין is used: "He said to the Levites who taught all Israel" (II Chr. 35:3). The object of knowledge is also referred to as בינה or תבונה, "insight, understanding":

> The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom, > and the knowledge of the Holy One is insight > (Prov. 9:10);
>
> Yes, if you cry out for insight > and raise your voice for understanding > (Prov. 2:3).

Teachers are referred to as מורים and מלמדים, from the verbal roots mentioned above:

> I did not listen to the voice of my teachers > or incline my ear to my instructors
> (Prov. 5:13).

The term חכם, "wise," is often used—e.g.: "The lips of the wise spread knowledge" (Prov. 15:7); "The teaching of the wise is a fountain of life" (Prov. 13:14). The plural word "wise" recalls the Greek σόφοι, who had their schools, pupils (בנים; see § 5 below), discipline (מוסר), principles, and collections of wisdom (דברי חכמים). Also, at a late period, מבין, "teacher," from the root בין, is also found: "teacher and pupil alike" (I Chr. 25:8).

Pupils are למודים, "those who are taught"—e.g.: "Seal the teaching among my disciples" (Isa. 8:16); "the tongue of those who are taught" (Isa. 50:4); תלמידים (I Chr. 25:8). Pupils are also called בנים, "sons":

> Come, O sons, listen to me,
> I will teach you the fear of the LORD
> (Ps. 34:11).

2. Ancient Near Eastern background. Education in ancient Israel fitted into the general framework of education in the ancient Near East.

A number of "school texts," dating from ca. 2500 to the first half of the second millennium B.C., show that numerous schools for future scribes flourished throughout ancient Sumer. Many tablets contain short texts set as copying exercises, together with the pupils' own copies (and their mistakes, with the teachers' corrections). We also gain information regarding school life and personnel from essays on the subject written by some of the teachers. It was at these scribal schools that the literary creations of the past were carefully copied and studied by the more mature pupils, and it is because of these assiduous students that many of these texts have come down to us at all.

The main purpose of the Sumerian schools was to train professional scribes for the multifarious needs of the temples, the palaces, the courts, and all the other administrative and economic needs of the life of the time. Accordingly, the complete cultural heritage of the cuneiform world passed through the hands of the scribes and was transmitted by them. Education was voluntary, and since it involved both time and cost, it is natural that we find, in the many cases in which scholars identified themselves, that they came from the higher social and economic strata of the urban communities.

Among the school personnel were the ummia, the "expert" or "professor," who was the head of the school, and the "assistant professor" or "big brother," who prepared the daily exercises for the pupils. It is interesting, in view of the fact that one term for "pupils" among the later Israelites was bānîm, "sons," that another term for the Sumerian ummia was "school father," and the pupil was called "school son." Other members of the faculty were teachers of drawing and Sumerian. There was also a system of monitors in charge of discipline. The teachers were all paid out of the tuition fees collected from the parents of the pupils.

Among the school texts which have come down to us, and from which we may gain a notion of the subject matter studied, are classified lists of words indicating a basic knowledge of the botanical, zoological, mineralogical, and geographical lore of the time; mathematical tables; mathematical problems with their solutions; and many grammatical and lexicographical texts. The myths and epic tales used for study and copying have already been mentioned. This assimilation of the corpus of the cultural heritage would have taken some years to accomplish, and we know from the texts that the pupil attended school from sunrise to sunset and was subject to strict discipline. The teachers were held in great respect by the parents of the pupils, as we learn from a text describing how a father goes to elaborate lengths in order to mollify with gifts the teacher of his son, who had not been doing too well. This system of scribal schools originated by the Sumerians prevailed throughout Western Asia, and even when Sumerian ceased to be a living language, it was studied in the schools and its texts copied, as many bilingual glossaries of Sumerian and Akkadian, which have come down to us from much later times, attest.

Following the Fertile Crescent, we come across more information from the upper Euphrates. In the palace of Mari two rooms were discovered which were quite evidently schoolrooms. They were equipped with rows of benches and desks made of clay, and a few tables scattered over the floor were evidence of their occupation by the pupil-scribes. Many small shells were also found scattered about, and these had doubtlessly served as counters in the study of arithmetic. An organized system of instruction prevailed, then, at least to provide the educated corps of palace scribes along the upper Euphrates during the first portion of the second millennium B.C., in accordance with the cultural tradition of Mesopotamia.

We have definite information regarding organized instruction in pre-Israelite Canaan in the form of a very interesting tablet from Shechem, described by Albright (BASOR, no. 86, pp. 28 ff) and dated by him ca. 1400 B.C. It is a letter to a notable in Shechem from his son's teacher: "From three years [ago] until now thou hast me paid—is there no grain nor oil nor wine which thou canst send? What is my offense that thou hast not paid [me]? The children who are with me continue to learn—their father and their mother every [day a]like am I." This teacher evidently conducted a regular class: although this parent stopped paying his son's tuition, the other children continued to learn, and the class went on. Classroom instruction, then, in the regular tradition of the ancient Near East, was also a feature of the cultural life of Canaan for some time before the Israelite conquest. Note especially the fact that the teacher regards his pupils as his sons, again within the same tradition, to be continued in biblical terminology, where a regular technical term for "pupils" is bānîm.

From Egypt, at the W end of the Fertile Crescent, we gain another clear notion of school life and methods. We have a number of New Kingdom papyri, writing boards, and ostraca which served as schoolboy exercise texts. These are, for the most part, didactic in nature, in the tradition of the wisdom literature of the ancient Near East. As in Mesopotamia, we see the teacher's corrections in the margins of the texts. Another type of copy exercise was the model letter, actual and fictitious, some addressed to teachers. The texts all indicate that the profession of scribe was most highly regarded in ancient Egypt, and was the gateway to all the preferred government positions of both emolument and honor. Horemheb, pharaoh of Egypt, who had been a general, is familiar to us from his statue, where he is represented as a seated scribe. Other professions and occupations are compared unfavorably with that of the scribe, and the sole method of achieving this exalted goal is that of diligence. The teacher beats the pupil often, but it is for the future scribe's own good: the model letters contain beautiful wishes and praises for teachers in gratitude for their severe regimen of instruction. The best method of attaining felicity and preferment is, as we would say, "to keep one's nose to the grindstone." Wine is to be shunned, and also idle music and girls—which reminds us of the exhortations against the "loose woman" of Proverbs.

The scribal school in Egypt was attached to the temple, and was called, significantly, the "house of life." The schoolboy learned writing, not the least important aspect of which was calligraphy, and studied the ancient literature, copying the many texts and absorbing the teachings of the letters and the didactic literature. At the end of this "elementary" course the student scribe was transferred to one of the government administrations, where he received further instruction and supervision from an older official. This higher education included—in addition to instruction in the complex duties of the office—composition, geography, and natural science. If the boy was destined for the priesthood, he would receive additional instruction in theology and medicine.

Against this general background of the educational system of the ancient Near East, we may place the picture of education in OT life, perhaps not on such an elaborate scale as that obtaining in the larger urban centers of Mesopotamia and Egypt, but surely within the same tradition.

3. Regard for children in ancient Israel. In the OT, children are among the most precious gifts of the Lord, and count among the chief blessings to be gained by those who have deserved them of him:

> Unless the LORD builds the house, > those who build it labor in vain.
> . . . . . .
> Lo, sons are a heritage from the LORD,
> the fruit of the womb a reward.
> Like arrows in the hand of the warrior > are the sons of one's youth.
> Happy is the man who has > his quiver full of them!
> (Ps. 127:1, 3).

Blessed are all who fear the Lord and walk in his ways, for they shall be happy, and it shall be well with them:

> Your wife will be like a fruitful vine > within your house;
> your children will be like olive shoots > around your table.
> Lo, thus shall the man be blessed > who fears the LORD
> (Ps. 128:3-4).

Among the blessings of security and plenty and old age, not the least are numerous offspring (Job 5:25). Thus, in the running theme of all earthly good to be earned as the result of righteousness, children are a most intimate and integral portion. They are also regarded as a reward for their own sake, and we find no trace in the OT of the ancient Mesopotamian view that they are to be acquired so that they may slake their dead parents' thirst in the underworld. It is simply that in the view of the OT the happiness of mankind is not to be understood without children. When the Lord returns to Zion and dwells in the midst of Jerusalem, two scenes of happiness will distinguish the event: old men and women will once again sit peacefully in the streets of the city, "and the streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing in its streets" (Zech. 8:5).

For children to figure so prominently among the chief blessings resulting from the fear of the Lord, and for children playing happily in the streets to signalize the Lord's return to Zion, the love of children must have been great indeed among the ancient Hebrews. Further, it was the Lord himself who was the prototype of the loving and merciful father; and conversely, the author of Ps. 103, in order to convey a powerful simile of the Lord's mercy, states that the Lord pities those who fear him, as a father pities his children (vs. 13).

It was natural that in a society in which children were held in such high regard, the careful upbringing and education of these children would be considered, as will be seen, one of the most important functions of parenthood, and that wisdom, which was the means of acquiring fear of the Lord and its consequent righteousness which would result in the Lord's earthly blessings for one's children, was held in the greatest esteem and regarded as the optimum of human attainment.

4. The aims of education according to the OT. The general aims of education in ancient Israel were twofold: (a) the transmission of the historical heritage of the Hebrew nation—the story of God's covenant with his people and the saga of the workings of that covenant in subsequent history—and (b) instruction in the ethical conduct of life—how one's life can be conducted for the purpose of attaining the utmost happiness on earth. According to the evidence of the OT, the first aim was stressed during the formative period of Israel's nationhood, in order that succeeding generations of the new nation might be nourished by the powerful historic memories of the period of its founding by means of the covenant with God, and thus be established upon a firm basis in the consciousness of the people. At a later period, when the nation was firmly established and the kingdom was organically functioning for a time, the second element, that of concrete ethical monotheism as leading to earthly good, was stressed and organized in the wisdom literature, notably the book of Proverbs. However, even in the earlier period, teachings regarding the ethical conduct of life were of major importance, as evidenced by certain portions of the Pentateuch in general, and, of course, by the Decalogue in particular.

The Hebrews are strongly enjoined to teach their children the powerful memories of the redemption of Israel from bondage in Egypt and its entry into Canaan, and by the most effective method—that of arousing the children's curiosity. After setting up the twelve stones taken from the Jordan, Joshua says to the people of Israel: "When your children ask their fathers in time to come, 'What do these stones mean?' then you shall let your children know, 'Israel passed over this Jordan on dry ground' " (Josh. 4:21-22). The Passover sacrifice and the eating of unleavened bread are to serve to prompt the children to ask why these things were done, and the Israelite father is commanded to teach his child their historic and religious symbolism (Exod. 12:26-27; 13:7-8, 14). These vivid memories of the redemption from Egypt and the great wonders that God showed to Israel in establishing and protecting its nationhood are used as prime educational factors through to the later period of the First Commonwealth. In various portions of Deuteronomy we find the same injunctions to remember the testimonies and ordinances connected with the Exodus and to teach them to the children (Deut. 4:9-10; 6:20-21; 7:17-19; 32:7).

The educational aim of transmitting the ethical heritage is already stated succinctly in Genesis: "I have chosen him [Abraham], that he may charge his children and his household after him to keep the way of the LORD by doing righteousness and justice; so that the LORD may bring to Abraham what he has promised him" (Gen. 18:19). Righteousness and justice are embodied in the Decalogue of Exod. 20:1-17, and are given religious sanction in Lev. 19:2: "You shall be holy; for I the LORD your God am holy." Immediately following this opening verse, and in the rest of the same chapter, there follow commandments regarding reverence for parents; providing gleanings for the poor and for the sojourner; and prohibitions of stealing, of false dealings, of lying and false oaths, and of oppression of neighbors, servants, and the physically handicapped. Included are injunctions for ethical dealing between man and man, and various other commandments which make for the good and just society, including respect for the aged (vs. 32) and love for the stranger (vs. 33). These ideas of social justice are intimately associated with and proceed from the holiness of God, and this fellowship in God's holiness and love for God is the key precept, along with God's unity, which is commanded to be taught by the Israelite to his children in Deut. 6:7. It is the following of these precepts of ethics and morality which constitutes the "fear of the LORD," which is considered "the beginning of knowledge" in Prov. 1:7; 9:10; and which will lead to the good life on earth.

The book of Proverbs, which is a manual of instruction in itself, from the later period, contains a third purpose of education, which has many parallels in the wisdom literature of the ancient Near East. This is instruction in the practical conduct of daily existence—how to get along with equals and superiors, and how to keep out of trouble. Many of the maxims and wise saws of Proverbs sound quite familiar in terms of the modern educational jargon of "adjustment." Proper manners and how-to-get-along-with-people teachings formed a major portion of Egyptian instruction (cf. the Teaching of Amen-em-Ope, Ptah-Hotep, and Ka-Gemni) and were, for practical considerations, incorporated also in ancient Israelite education. Instruction in sensible sex life was also not neglected (Prov. 5:3-21). As an organized textbook of education, Proverbs stresses the importance of instruction as of the utmost necessity for the good life. As a matter of fact, wisdom is equated with life itself. For wisdom, which includes knowledge both of those ethical principles leading to righteousness and of the practical skills of social adjustment, is the wellspring of existence, and healing to all human flesh (Prov. 4:10, 13, 20-23; 8:35; 10:16; 11:30; 12:28; 14:27). The purpose of education—that men may receive instruction in righteousness, justice, and equity, and in wise dealing, prudence, and discretion—is stated in the proem to the book itself (1:2-4). Continuity of learning—the fact that study is an ongoing, lifelong process—is also emphasized; the man of wisdom and understanding can always increase his learning and skill (1:5). Finally, at a later period, delight in study is an end in itself; happiness in learning is life, and true happiness consists in meditating on the law (instruction) of the Lord by day and by night (Ps. 1:2).

5. The history of education in ancient Israel according to the OT. According to the OT, it was incumbent primarily upon every father of a family to impart instruction to his children, at least during their early childhood. The early memories of the Exodus and the fear of the Lord are to be retold in the presence of children (Exod. 10:2; 12:26-27). Abraham is to instruct not only his children but his entire household in the way of the Lord (Gen. 18:19). The Shema (Deut. 6:4-9), the most important set of precepts in the Pentateuch after the Decalogue, commands each Israelite to teach the words of God diligently to his children. This duty of transmitting the heritage received from one's father on to one's children was recognized as of prime importance through to the later period of the First Commonwealth, and this principle of the continuity of the educational tradition, to receive the heritage and to pass it on to generations yet unborn, was crystallized as an educational doctrine commanded by God (Ps. 78:3-6). During the Second Commonwealth also, the very young child received his first instruction and his reverence for the sayings of the wise from his father (Prov. 4:3-4).

It would seem, however, that even at an early period it was customary to devote a child to the service of the deity, in which case he was brought to the sanctuary as soon as he was weaned, as exemplified by the case of Samuel. Samuel must needs have received not only general, but also specialized, instruction from Eli in order to perform his ministrations before the Lord. There is no reason to believe that Samuel was an isolated case, and since Samuel was not a Levite, but an Ephraimite, it is quite possible that it was a general practice to devote some children to the service of the sanctuary, in which case they would have received the most developed type of education that their milieu afforded, analogous possibly to the education received by the youngsters in the temple schools of Egypt.

At an early age, children were trained in the everyday duties of the family, such as the pasturing of sheep (e.g., I Sam. 16:11) and the work of the fields (II Kings 4:18). In at least some instances, artistic training was not neglected, as witness David's skill in playing the lyre while still a youth (I Sam. 16:15-18). Music and the dance were also taught, and evidently the Israelites of all periods had a lively taste for these arts (I Sam. 16:18; Judg. 21:21; Ps. 137; Jer. 31:13; Lam. 5:14). The graphic arts—specifically the arts of the celator, or worker in metals—were held in particularly high esteem. The skilled artist Bezalel receives his inspiration directly from God, who fills his mind with wisdom and knowledge of his craft, and, what is particularly important in this connection, inspires him also to teach his art to others.

Girls learned household crafts, such as baking (II Sam. 13:8), spinning, and weaving (Exod. 35:25-26). During the Second Commonwealth, when organized schools were already in existence, they were intended, of course, only for boys, and girls remained at home to learn the various household skills (Prov. 31:13-31). In cases where the household did not boast of any sons, the daughters would do the boys' work, such as pasturing and watering the sheep (Gen. 29:6; Exod. 2:16). Some women had received a relatively good education and hence became prophetesses, for which they had to have a good knowledge both of Israel's past history and of current happenings. An example of the early period is, of course, Deborah (Judg. 4:4 ff; 5). During the later period of the First Commonwealth we have the prophetess Huldah (II Kings 22:14-20). In the book of Proverbs, the mother is regarded as of equal importance with the father in imparting instruction (Prov. 1:8; 6:20). In the same remarkable book we have the compilation of the wisdom of Lemuel (ch. 31) which he had received from his mother (vs. 1). This would indicate that within Israel's orbit, at any rate, there existed women who were educated to such a degree that they played a role in wisdom tradition analagous to that of the hakhamim.

Among the higher classes, particularly the royal families, we have reference to nurses or guardians (omnim) who would have, in these cases, assumed the duties of instruction of their charges along with their other duties in loco parentis (Ruth 4:16; II Sam. 4:4; II Kings 10:5; Isa. 49:23).

The Gezer Calendar supplies some quite interesting details regarding instruction among the peasants of central Palestine during the period of the Early Monarchy. The tablet is dated by Albright (BASOR, no. 92, pp. 16 ff) on the basis of both external and internal evidence and supported by comparative epigraphy, to the second half of the tenth century. It was Albright also who pointed out that this small limestone plaque, just large enough to be held comfortably in the hand of a twelve-year-old-boy, was actually a schoolboy's writing tablet, as evidenced by signs on both sides of scraping to clear it for reuse. In addition, the text itself, which is a sort of "poetic ditty" concisely describing the months of the Palestinian agricultural year, is rhythmically mnemonic in nature. An adult farmer would have no need of such a device. The text on the plaque, then, would be the ancient Israelite boy's equivalent of: "Thirty days hath September . . . ." Albright indicates further that the boy was in all likelihood writing from dictation. The Gezer tablet is, accordingly, excellent archaeological evidence of the extent of literacy among even the peasants of the time of the early Israelite monarchy, of the use of a standard pedagogic device such as the mnemonic and of the use of dictation as one method in instruction.

Reference to bands or companies of prophets in

I Samuel (10:5, 10; 19:20) has led some authorities to infer that there were actually "schools of the prophets" with organized instruction. Such an inference cannot, of course, be proved one way or the other, but one can safely surmise that there was at least a certain body of knowledge and/or skills which was imparted to these youths, for prophecy seems to have been a definitely established "profession" at the very beginning of the history of the Israelite kingdom.

When the tradition of Yahwistic prophecy was established on a firm foundation during the period of the monarchy, the prophets may be safely assumed to have had groups of disciples whom they taught (Isa. 8:16). Isaiah uses the term למודים, which, as we have seen, is one of the technical terms used for pupils or disciples. Elijah's disciple and successor was Elisha (I Kings 19:16), and he was evidently one outstanding pupil of an outstanding prophet, for we have mention of a large group of "sons of the prophets" at Bethel (II Kings 2:3 ff). These "sons of the prophets" evidently regarded Elisha with a great deal of respect (cf. vs. 7), and after the translation of Elijah acknowledged Elisha as their master (vs. 15). "Sons" or בנים, as pointed out above (§ 1), is one technical term for "pupils." As master, Elisha was also responsible for the welfare of the widows and children of any of his pupils who died (II Kings 4:1-2 ff), and assumed the care of providing food for his disciples in time of famine (II Kings 4:38). It is interesting to note that among the body of science at the command of the prophets, and which they transmitted to their pupils, was a knowledge of poisonous herbs and their antidotes (II Kings 4:39-41). This was evidently a part of their general knowledge of the medical science of their day (II Kings 4:19, 32-35). These medical arts were part of the general science of the ancient Near East, and were taught by both priests and prophets to their pupils in ancient Israel, as in the temple schools of Egypt and Mesopotamia.

As the prophets taught their own small groups of disciples who trained for a highly technical profession, so the priests and Levites trained the members of their craft. However, upon the latter devolved also the duty of instructing the people at large in the precepts of the Israelite religion. In the blessing of Moses, the tribe of Levi is named as the preceptor of the people:

> They shall teach Jacob thy ordinances, > and Israel thy law (Deut. 33:10).

In the Levitical Code, among the general duties of the sons of Aaron is the injunction to teach the people of Israel (Lev. 10:11). This function of the priesthood continued to be quite important to the final period of the First Commonwealth: Jehoshaphat sent learned priests and Levites to travel throughout all the cities of Judah and teach the people, using the Book of the Law of the Lord as a text (II Chr. 17:8-9). Under Josiah, the function of teaching the people was among the duties of the Levites (II Chr. 35:3), and during this period and later this Levitical function was recognized by the prophets (Mal. 2:6-7). The priesthood, however, was supposed to give instruction to the people free of charge, and acceptance of any emolument for this purpose was regarded as reprehensible (Mic. 3:11). The method of teaching was evidently to visit the various towns periodically and to gather all the inhabitants together, both Israelite and non-Israelite, and expound the Torah to them (Deut. 31:10-13; II Chr. 17:8-9). This pedagogical function of the Levites was continued after the Return (Neh. 8:7-9), and evidently they were skilled at exegesis and exposition (vs. 8). They were called מבינים (lit. "they who cause to understand"; Neh. 8:7, 9; Ezra 8:16).

During the Persian period, we know that there was current among the Jews of Elephantine, in Egypt, a manual of instruction analogous to the book of Proverbs—namely, the Words of Ahiqar. This work is in the old tradition of the wisdom literature of the ancient Near East, of which Proverbs is a part, and the presence of a wisdom literature would betoken teachers who instruct their disciples in their knowledge. At the beginning of the body of proverbs in Ahiqar, there is the statement: "What is stronger than the wine foaming in the press? The son who is trained and taught" (col. VI, ll. 79-80; Sachau, pl. 44; text in Cowley, Aramaic Papyri of the Fifth Century B.C., p. 214; in translation, p. 222). It may be safe to assume that the "son" is the old technical term for "pupil," as in Proverbs, with the pupils learning their maxims with the aid of the rod, which must not be withheld.

In Israel itself, it is most likely that for some time after the Return the body of teachings (torah) continued to be the property and responsibility of the priesthood. We have seen that the exposition of the accumulated tradition to the people was one of the most important functions of priests and Levites, and this aspect of the sacred office would tend to become most important and have government sanction in the Second Commonwealth, which remained a theocracy, in fact and then in name, until the time of Herod the Great. The great revival of Israel, both nationally and culturally, was initiated by Ezra and Nehemiah. Ezra was himself a priest (Ezra 7:1-5; Neh. 8:2), and evidently a member of that section of the priesthood which specialized in knowledge of the Torah and its teaching (Ezra 7:6, 10). He took it upon himself to continue in the priestly tradition of teacher to the people, and brought with him from Babylon a copy of the Torah, which he expounded before the assembly of the returned exiles. This assembly included the teaching Levites who were termed, as mentioned above, מבינים (MT; RSV Neh. 8:3, 9), in order to refresh their knowledge also. He stood upon a "wooden pulpit" (Neh. 8:4) above the people and read to them, surrounded by his assistants, the teaching Levites (8:7, 9) who assisted him in his interpretation and exposition, which was done in a clear and detailed manner, so that all might understand. This was probably the same manner in which the Torah was expounded on Mondays and Thursdays throughout the ensuing days of the Second Commonwealth, when advantage was taken of the Monday and Thursday market days in the cities of Palestine to read and expound the law to the people congregating there. Later, a method was worked out whereby the Torah was read in consecutive sections, the cycle being completed every three years. Thus was initiated the first large-scale program of adult education in history.

In the subsequent period, with the growing involvement of the upper echelons of the priesthood in politics and the other priests and Levites in the intricacies and large-scale operations of the temple service, biblical exposition and scholarship tended to be concentrated in the hands of a group of men known as סופרים, "scribes." Their occupation dated from the early days of the First Commonwealth, where they are mentioned among the first officers of the kingdom, along with the generals of the army and the chief priests (II Sam. 8:17). Their chief functions were evidently secretarial, and they would have been responsible for the inditing of diplomatic correspondence and compiling the annals of the kingdom. Influence was apparently considerable in this respect from Egyptian government organization, where the occupation of scribe was very highly regarded, and where some of them became generals of the army, and in such cases as Hor-em-heb became kings themselves. Thus under King Uzziah, Jeiel the scribe is mentioned among the generals of the army, and the verse (II Chr. 26:11) might be interpreted to name Jeiel as a general himself. It is possible that many of the scribes were Levites, who would naturally combine both scribal and teaching duties, thus serving as ancestors of the definite institution of the scribes of the Second Commonwealth, who were the custodians of the Torah and its interpretation. Thus, in First Commonwealth annals, Shemaiah, a Levite, serves as a scribe under David (I Chr. 24:6), and a body of Levites who were scribes under Josiah is mentioned (II Chr. 34:13). In First Commonwealth times, too, scribes are already mentioned as having attributes of scholarship and wisdom. Jonathan, David's uncle, is a counselor, a "man of understanding" (מבין, one of the technical terms for "teacher" mentioned in § 1 above), and a scribe (I Chr. 27:32). Baruch, the secretary and disciple of Jeremiah, and thus one of the "sons of the prophets," is also a scribe (Jer. 36:26). In the last days of the First Commonwealth, the scribes are already recognized as a professional class, who presume to be learned custodians of the Torah (Jer. 8:8). It is from within the traditional framework of scribal priests, possessed of the intellectual heritage of Israel, that Ezra appeared. He is known as "Ezra the scribe" in later Jewish literature, and is described as a "scribe skilled in the law of Moses" (Ezra 7:6, 11; cf. Neh. 8:4, 9, 13). From the time of Ezra onward, the scribes became a specialized class of biblical scholars and exegetes, and as such were recognized as the official teachers and spiritual leaders of the people.

According to the traditions recorded in the Mishna, these scribes, who were the repositories of Israel's cultural heritage, were known, during the earlier period of the Second Commonwealth, as the "men of the Great Assembly" (אנשי כנסת הגדולה), possibly because of their connection and intellectual descent from Ezra and his scribes who expounded the Torah before the great assemblies of the people at the time of the Return. In Tractate Aboth of the Mishna, which is entirely didactic, the "men of the Great Assembly" (or "men of the Great Synagogue," translating כנסת according to its Greek equivalent, συναγωγή; actually, the synagogue as a house of worship had not yet come into being) were the direct descendants of the prophets as custodians of the Torah, and lived between the time of Ezra and Nehemiah and the time of Alexander the Great. It is, in all probability, these scribes who are "the wise" of Proverbs (see § 1 above), and it is most likely they who prepared and collated the wisdom literature of the OT, and their role as educators was strongly reflected in their work—e.g., Proverbs passim, where "wise" ="teacher" and "son"="pupil." The book is a compendium both of their methods of instruction and pedagogical attitudes and of a large portion of the content of the subject matter taught in their schools, again in the didactic tradition of the ancient Near East. They, in turn, were the predecessors of the series of doctors of the law who flourished roughly from the time of the Seleucids through the Maccabean and Roman periods up to the time of the completion of the Mishna, ca. A.D. 200. For about two centuries, then, the scribes who constituted the "men of the Great Assembly" slowly built up their method of biblical exegesis and interpretation and constant adaptation of the law to meet the exigencies of their times into the formidable structure of the Mishna. This naturally presupposes a system of instruction of Torah on a more or less formal scale, with generations of scholars handing down their body of knowledge to their disciples, who became scholars in turn. At the very beginning of the Tractate Aboth, the three most important maxims of the "men of the Great Assembly" are given. They are: "Be deliberate in judgment, raise up many disciples, and make a fence around the Law (Heb. torah)." Thus within this succinct summary of their activities, along with the injunctions of deep examination and interpretation for the purpose of applying the law to the everyday life of their times, is included the establishment of the means of educating disciples to transmit the heritage. Their successors were the series of scribes beginning with Simon the Just (ca. 280 B.C.; Jos. Antiq. XII.ii.5), whose maxims in Aboth are replete with the atmosphere of the house of study. The term "house of study" itself is found in the last chapter of Ecclesiasticus (beth midrash; Ecclus. 51:23), and is the first mention of the institution which later became one of the foundations of Judaism.

Josephus speaks of elementary education as a long-established institution. He derives the authority for the education of children from the Mosaic Law (Antiq. IV.viii.12; Apion II.xxv), and emphasizes the extreme solicitude of his people for the instruction of children (Apion I.xii). Education begins as soon as the child is capable of being sensible of anything (Apion II.xix). Philo states that Jews are instructed in knowledge of their laws from their earliest youth, and are taught, so to speak, from their very swaddling clothes (Leg. ad Caium 31). During the entire latter period of the Second Commonwealth, literacy was quite widespread, and books of the law were found in many houses of private individuals (I Macc. 1:56 ff). Hence education of the children in the school would have begun with the teaching of reading, and subsequently consisted of the study of the Torah from the texts themselves. Josephus does not hesitate to boast that by his fourteenth year he had such a profound knowledge of the law that even the high priest and the chief men of Jerusalem used to come to him for consultation on practices of interpretation (Vita 2).

The establishment of a mandatory system of schools was ascribed, in the rabbinic literature, to the Pharisees. The Pharisees, after their recall during the reign of Salome Alexandra (76-67 B.C.), enjoyed the broad popular support of the bulk of the urban population. Under the leadership of Simon ben Shetah, they understood the wisdom of spreading their teachings among the people in a systematic manner. It was Ṣimon (Jer. Keth. VIII.11) who ordained that children (lit. "babes") should attend the elementary school (בית־הספר, "house of the Book"—i.e., the Torah), where the Torah was the text of instruction, supplemented by explanations and interpretations based upon the oral law, that vast body of homiletical and legal commentary upon the Torah which had been accumulating under the scribes during the Second Commonwealth, and which was the basis for Pharisaic teaching. The first of these Pharisaic schools were established in Jerusalem, and the system later spread to the urban centers of the other districts. A few years before the destruction of the temple, Joshua ben Gamala (B. B. 21*a*) enacted that teachers of children be appointed in every province and in every town, and that children be admitted to school at the age of six or seven years. The children's teacher was the חזן, who was evidently a factotum who combined the instruction of children in reading with duties of a more general nature (Sabb. I.3).

Secondary and higher education for adolescents and young men of promise was continued in the בית־המדרש, of which several were conducted by the great Pharisaic teachers themselves. Some of these acquired a wide reputation as instructors, and Hillel came from Babylonia to continue his education at the school of Shemaiah and Abtalion. The בית־המדרש was considered to have more sanctity than even the synagogue (Meg. 26*b*-27*a*). The young students discussed, under the leadership of the Pharisaic sages, the interpretation of the Torah, and the application of its precepts to the greatly changed life of Palestine in the Greco-Roman times. It was these discussions and "lecture notes" which grew into the Mishna, which in turn became the basis for normative Judaism. For the mass of the adult population, there was the regular system of "adult education" mentioned above, whereby the Torah was studied weekly. To Josephus this is already a well-established custom.

6. Pedagogics in the OT. The OT, as a collection of writings by prophets and scribes, who, as we have seen, became the teachers of Israel, would naturally tend to express theories of education and pedagogic viewpoints, whether conscious or implied. We can, therefore, form some impressions of both methods of education and the educator's view of his mission from an examination of the text.

To begin with, education itself was regarded as a mission commanded by God (e.g., Deut. 4:7). Further, the prototype of all teachers was the Lord himself, who, through Moses, is the divine teacher of Israel. Moses says: "And now, O Israel, give heed to the statutes and the ordinances which I teach you" (Deut. 4:1; the pi'el verb למד, "teach," is used, not "command"), and: "Behold, I have taught you statutes and ordinances, as the LORD my God commanded me" (vs. 5). The educational process has divine sanction and authority. The Lord himself is the teacher of Moses (Exod. 4:12). Even when the latter demurs at accepting his mission, God says to him: "I . . . will teach you what you shall do" (vs. 15). Likewise, when the Lord is angry with his people, it is only as a teacher is angry with his pupils, and even when he punishes them, he will still be close to them and guide them in the correct path: "Though the Lord give you the bread of adversity and the water of affliction, yet your Teacher will not hide himself any more, but your eyes shall see your Teacher" (Isa. 30:20). The same sentiment is found in Job 36:22:

> Behold, God is exalted in his power;
> who is a teacher like him?

Man begs God for instruction:

> When I told of my ways, thou didst answer me;
> teach me thy statutes!
> Make me understand the way of thy precepts, > and I will meditate on thy wondrous works
> (Ps. 119:26-27).

The Lord is "he who teaches men knowledge" (Ps. 94:10). Furthermore, in days to come, when God will restore Zion, "All your sons shall be taught by the LORD" (Isa. 54:13)—the first expressed desire for universal education.

As to all teachers of the ancient Near East, chastisement is a necessary concomitant of instruction:

> He who chastens the nations, does he not chastise?
> He who teaches men knowledge.
>
> . . . . . .
>
> Blessed is the man whom thou dost chasten, O LORD, > and whom thou dost teach out of thy law
> (Ps. 94:10, 12).

This parallelism of the roots יסר and למד possibly has its prototype in the Egyptian verbal root "teach, instruct, discipline," with the determinative of physical force, implying chastisement.

Despite the necessity for the use of the rod, teaching should be done with quiet restraint, for: "The words of the wise heard in quiet are better than the shouting of a ruler among fools" (Eccles. 9:17).

In addition, God, as divine Teacher, not only imparts knowledge to men, but also actually inspires them to teach in turn (Exod. 35:31-35). The office of teaching, then, would have been a sacred one indeed, and quite honorably regarded by all.

During both commonwealths, instruction of children began at a very early age, apparently soon after they were weaned (Isa. 28:9). According to the testimony of Josephus, in his time it was a very old tradition that children began their education at their first glimmerings of consciousness (see § 5 above). Actual teaching began quite early in the morning (Isa. 50:4; Jer. 32:33, reading literally with the MT and translating with previous English versions—e.g., Moulton —"rising up early and teaching them"). Note that in both these references it is God as exemplary teacher who imparts instruction at early morning. Both beginning the child's education as early as possible and utilizing the morning hours when the mind is fresh have been universally recognized as two of the basic foundations of pedagogy.

Also among the fundamental laws of education is the axiom of teaching the child a little at a time. Recognition of this pedagogic maxim, along with the previously mentioned one of beginning education at an early age, is found in Isaiah:

> For it is precept upon precept, precept upon precept, > line upon line, line upon line, > here a little, there a little (28:10).

The Hebrew for "precept upon precept, line upon line," ṣaw laṣaw, qaw laqaw, has also been interpreted to mean "letter by letter," ṣaw being taken as an old form of the letter צ and qaw as an old form of ק, using the analogy of ו. Pedagogically speaking, this would illustrate the method of teaching reading by teaching the individual letters of the alphabet first.

Most instruction was imparted orally:

> He awakens my ear > to hear as those who are taught > (Isa. 50:4; cf. Prov.
> 1:8 et passim).

Mnemonic devices for easier memorization were also used, as illustrated in Prov. 31:10-31, where the first letter in vs. 10 is א, and each successive verse begins with the consecutive letter of the alphabet, to vs. 31, which begins with ת.

Another teaching device was the parable (משל). This was a form of figurative expression in narrative, which usually took the form of an allegory or fable vividly illustrating the truth or application of a principle or argument by analogy. The term may have been used originally to denote a poetic oracle (e.g., in the Oracle of Balaam, Num. 23:7; RSV "discourse") and then a popular saying used to point up an analogy (I Sam. 10:12) or a story in the form of a riddle (Ezek. 17:2). The parables in the OT are used for moral instruction, and are shown to convey such a vivid import that those to whom the parables are directed grasp the lesson in spite of themselves (e.g., II Sam. 12:1 ff). It is interesting to note that the lesson thus skilfully directed to David was given by a prophet. Later, the term משל was used for the body of wisdom instruction (Prov. 1:1, the title of the book translated "The Proverbs of Solomon"). The scribes and doctors of the Second Commonwealth used them extensively; they are to be found all through the Talmudic literature of the period, and their widespread use in teaching is illustrated by the extensive recourse which was had to them in the NT—e.g., the various parables of Jesus.

7. Literacy in ancient Israel. Some of the earliest inscriptions indicating the transition from the cumbersome syllabic and ideographic script of Akkadian cuneiform and Egyptian hieroglyphic and hieratic (a combination of ideographic, syllabic, and alphabetic script) to the purely alphabetic script which was the ancestor of the convenient "Roman" script used throughout the civilized world of today have been found in what was ancient Canaan. It was possibly not accidental that a crude form of alphabetic cuneiform was in use at Ugarit down to the fourteenth century B.C. At any rate, the N Semitic script, which was the ancestor of our own, was in widespread use in the Israelite orbit by the time of the entry into Canaan. With such a simplified method of writing, literacy would tend to be rather common, as the N Semitic alphabet was easily learned and easily taught. The Gezer Calendar, described above, is an excellent case in point, illustrating the use of this alphabet in learning during the Early Monarchy.

According to the OT, literacy, while not universal (Isa. 29:11), was nevertheless quite widespread. In Joshua, mention is made of three men from each tribe who were to provide a written description of the land of Canaan (18:4, 8-9). Gideon catches at random a lad of Succoth, who is able to write down for him the names of the important men of the city (Judg. 8:14). Literacy seems to be a common phenomenon according to Deuteronomy. The children of Israel are commanded to write the words of God upon the doorposts of their houses and upon their gates (Deut. 6:9). Moses also commands that the words of the Torah be written upon stones smoothed over with plaster, and that the inscriptions be set up so that all may read (Deut. 27:2-8). In the coming days of the kingdom, the king himself is to write in a book a copy of the Torah, and is to read in it all his days (Deut. 17:18-19). According to Isaiah, any child could write down at least simple numbers or tallies (Isa. 10:19). The Siloam Inscription, with its exclusive interest in the purely technical details of the completion of the tunnel, was evidently written by one of the workmen, or possibly the engineer of the project. Literacy would have been quite common, then, in the days of Hezekiah. The Lachish Letters and the later Elephantine Papyri of the Persian period indicate not only the widespread use of writing in daily affairs; the development of the script into a rapid cursive is indicative also of the great broadening of its use by the masses of the people. I Macc. 1:56 shows that copies of the Torah were found in many private houses. The mass of Talmudic literature, which is a compilation and conflation, for the most part, of the notes of students taken down during the exposition and discussion of the Law by the masters, is an indication of the great degree of literacy during the later days of the Second Commonwealth.

Bibliography. J. Simon, L'éducation et l'instruction des enfants chez les anciens Juifs (1879). A. Klostermann, Schulwesen im alten Israel (1908). F. H. Swift, "Hebrew Education in the Family After the Exile," in The Open Court, vol. XXXII, no. 1 (Jan., 1918); Education in Ancient Israel from Earliest Times to A.D. 70 (1919). J. A. Maynard, A Survey of Hebrew Education (1924). L. Dürr, Die Erziehungswesen im Alten Testament und im antiken Orient (1932). E. Ebner and S. Eliezer, Elementary Education in Ancient Israel During the Tannaitic Period (10-220 C.E.) (1956). H. Gese, Lehre und Wirklichkeit in der alten Weisheit (1958). W. Barclay, Education Ideals in the Ancient World (1959).

For the N Semitic inscriptions, see D. Diringer, The Alphabet (1949), pp. 195-247.

The Gezer Calendar is studied and commented upon by W. F. Albright in BASOR, no. 92 (Dec. 1943), pp. 16 ff.

For ancient Near Eastern background, see A. Erman, The Literature of the Ancient Egyptians (trans. A. M. Blackman; 1927), pp. 185-242. E. Chiera, They Wrote on Clay (1938), ch. 13. G. E. Mendenhall, BA, XI:1 (Feb., 1948; Mari). S. N. Kramer, From the Tablets of Sumer (1956), chs. 2-3.

J. KASTER

EDUCATION, NT.

1. Jewish education
   a. Jewish Dispersion
   b. Religious education
   c. Curriculum
   d. Translations
   e. Jewish schools
   f. Jewish teachers
2. Greek and Roman education
   a. Hellenistic culture
   b. The Greek schools
Bibliography

1. Jewish education. a. Jewish Dispersion. Adequate treatment of Jewish education in the NT period is complicated by the fact that at the time Jews were so widely dispersed, probably more of them living outside Palestine than within. The major Jewish communities in foreign lands were in Egypt and Mesopotamia, but substantial communities were also found in most of the cities of the Roman Empire, especially in Syria, Asia Minor, Greece, Italy, and North Africa. Because of the homogeneous character of Jewish culture, it might be presumed that Jewish education in the various regions of the Dispersion closely approximated that in the homeland, but this could not be assumed without question. Wherever Jews settled, in order to survive, they had to become bilingual, acquiring the vernacular speech in addition to their own mother tongue. Moreover, their livelihood was dependent on mastery of the trades, industries, and forms of commerce prevailing in the newly adopted area. In some way, whether in schools or not, they had to learn the languages and skills necessary to the production and distribution of goods and services. As a matter of course, Jews living outside Palestine acquired many new skills. At this distance we are not always able to say how this new learning was acquired.

b. Religious education. The most obvious generalization about Jewish education in the NT period is that it was primarily religious, which is true also of education in the OT period. God was the presupposition of all Jewish life and culture. To a considerable extent this was true of Greeks and Romans, but it was far more characteristic of the Jews. The idea of secular life and culture was foreign to Jewish thought, as it was to a large extent to all ancient cultures. When one considers the difference between the Hebrew and Greek theories of knowledge, this distinction becomes clear. The tendency of Greek thought, as of Roman after it, was to emphasize the human element in knowledge. Greeks and Romans believed that man's mind itself discovered truth; so they stressed the development of human reason; and this led to study of sciences and the abstract disciplines of philosophy. Hebrews, by contrast, believed that all truth comes from God; that God is the creator, judge, and redeemer of man; and that he reveals to man whatever knowledge is necessary for his welfare. Hebrew learning revolved about the concepts of God and man, yet not in a speculative sense; and so far as man was concerned, education had to do mainly with the moral and spiritual life. Man's health and prosperity depended on a satisfactory relationship with God.

Jewish education of that period is as notable for what it lacks as for what it contains. We find very little of a scientific character. Hebrew culture was prescientific, knowing nothing about physics, chemistry, biology, physiology, and other natural sciences. Hebrews knew many practical trades. They were familiar with skills necessary for construction of ordinary buildings; they understood the simple processes involved in mining and metallurgy, and different types of work with stone and wood. But even in these matters, as the OT shows, where expert skills were required, they had to seek aid from the Phoenicians. Yet in spite of Jewish mastery of practical skills, we hear of no schools to teach such things. There were no schools of music, architecture, sculpture, painting, arts of the theater, and the like. Indeed, most of these, especially the arts of painting, sculpture, and the theater, were associated with pagan religions. So Jewish culture never cultivated these arts, so characteristic of Greek and Roman life.

In a similar way, Jews and Christians of the NT period had no schools of philosophy. The very presuppositions of their culture made this impossible, philosophy being a humanistic enterprise. The nature of philosophical speculation tends to deny the concept of revelation on which all Jewish and early Christian education was based.

As there is no evidence of trade schools among Jews and Christians of the period, we may assume that carpenters, masons, engineers, smiths, potters, and the like learned their trades as apprentices. This may have been true also of musicians and singers of the temple choirs and orchestras, but the prominence and importance of these artists in the worship services suggest that there must have been professional schools for them.

c. Curriculum. The basic curriculum of Jewish education was the Bible itself, the theory being that God had inspired the Scriptures so that they were a perfect repository of truth, containing all that was necessary for the welfare and happiness of man both here and hereafter (see CANON OF THE OT). But there were other important books, not included in this collection, which in some way must have had a place in Jewish education. The best known of these is the group of some fourteen writings known as the OT APOCRYPHA. Some of these, such as the Wisdom of Solomon, the Wisdom of Sirach (Ecclesiasticus), and I Maccabees, are of excellent quality. Except for their late dates, they would probably have been accepted into the Jewish canon. There is another group of indefinite number usually referred to as the PSEUDEPIGRAPHA, late books, mostly without literary merit, but always reflecting religious beliefs held in popular circles of both Jews and Christians. It may be doubted that they found a place in formal schools of the time, yet they had a wide circulation.

Such ideas as the Jews had about the natural sciences were embedded in incidental ways in their Scriptures. Prescientific beliefs about the earth, light, sun, moon, and stars, and about both plant and animal life, are reflected in the creation stories of Genesis; also in numerous other places in the Bible. Hebrews had no books on government and political science as such, yet in the Pentateuch lies the constitution on which the Hebrew state was based; and the same is true of many other aspects of culture. In the ancient period there was no medicine as such; there were no physicians. These matters were in the hands of the priests, and what little we can find about them is scattered through various parts of the OT. No recognition of physicians appears until Ecclesiasticus (ca. 200 B.C.), wherein (38:1-12) there is high praise for both physician and pharmacist. This late recognition of healing arts may show a Greek influence on Hebrew culture.

More congenial to Hebrew and early Christian ideas of disease were beliefs about demon-possession and the mental aberrations resulting from it. Such books as Tobit and I Enoch, from the late Jewish literature, and the NT gospels show numerous examples of belief that demons invaded human beings and either temporarily or permanently deranged their minds. Both Jews and Christians dealt with such forms of mental illness by means of exorcism, in which there was an extensive traffic. This black art was surely not taught in the schools, yet in some way it was possible for interested persons to learn its secrets. These beliefs became so deeply intrenched in Western culture that they were not eradicated until the emergence of modern scientific medicine, which substituted concepts of neuroses and psychoses for demons.

d. Translations. Except for a few relatively short passages, notably in Ezra and Daniel, the original language of the canonical Jewish scriptures was Hebrew. The short passages just noted were in Aramaic; some of the apocryphal books were written in Greek. Hebrew continued to be the basis of the most scholarly interpretation of the biblical texts, but by the end of the OT period the vernacular speech of Palestinian Jews, and others to the E, was no longer Hebrew, but Aramaic. This meant that if the Scriptures were to be used by the Jews in schools and otherwise in a language the people could understand, translations into Aramaic were necessary; and such there were. They are known as Targums. See TARGUM.

In a similar way, during the last pre-Christian centuries those Jews who had settled in Egypt, Asia Minor, Greece, and Italy had adopted the Greek language. Thus they also became unable to read the Scriptures in Hebrew, and Greek translations became a necessity. There were several of these, the best known being the Septuagint supposed to have been produced in Egypt. The Greek translations not only made the Scriptures available to Greek-speaking Jews, but also enabled non-Jews to read the Jewish Bible. Many Gentiles thereby acquired an admiration for Judaism. The Greek translations therefore prepared the way for the spread of Christianity. Indeed, most early Christians used only Greek translations of the Hebrew scriptures, quotations in the NT itself being based on Greek texts. All the NT books were written in Greek, intended, of course, for the Greek-speaking churches, ranging all the way from Antioch to Rome. It needs to be kept in mind also that Greek was widely spoken even in Palestine, and that many Palestinians were bilingual. From the time of Herod the Great all coins of Palestine were inscribed in Greek. Greek was almost the universal language of the Roman Empire; so much so that when Paul wrote his letter to the church at Rome, without apologies he wrote it in Greek, assuming that Christians there could read and understand it. It is evident that the religious education of many Jews and most Christians in the Empire at the time was based on Greek translations of the Scriptures.

The use of Greek not only made the Jewish scriptures available to people almost everywhere, but—equally important—it made Greek culture accessible, first to Jews and then to Christians. Thus emerged a new understanding of religion by each new generation as it made use of the legacy of Greece as well as that of Palestine. Such Jewish writings as the Wisdom of Solomon and those of Philo of Alexandria illustrate this new synthesis from the Jewish side, and the use of the concept of the Logos in the Letter to the Hebrews and the Gospel of John indicates a beginning of the same process among Christians. In subsequent centuries the seeds thus sown bore rich fruit for both Jews and Christians.

e. Jewish schools. A Jewish view of the importance of education in the life of a young man is indicated in a saying of somewhat uncertain date in Pirke Aboth 5:27 to the effect that a child is ready to begin study of the Scriptures at five, the Mishna at ten, the commandments at thirteen, the Talmud at fifteen, and is ready for marriage at eighteen. If professional education was contemplated, it would follow the age of eighteen.

The first teachers of Hebrew children were their parents. Injunctions to this effect are numerous in the law books and Proverbs. It was probably the father's duty to teach his son how to read and write, and such practical skills and elements of history and tradition as would enable him to enter with some understanding into his cultural heritage.

There is no reference to elementary schools until the Maccabean period. At the time of Queen Alexandra (75 B.C.), Simon Ben-Shetach decreed that children should attend elementary school. This was after Greek influence had begun to penetrate Palestine, and probably shows that Jewish education was beginning to respond to it.

In a formal sense, the most fundamental Jewish educational institution was the SYNAGOGUE, which dates at least from the Babylonian exile. This institution grew up in response to the needs of Jews, now far from their homeland, for a means of maintaining their culture and faith. It was first of all a place of assembly in all matters of interest to the Jewish community. It also served as a place of worship. But above all it was a place of study. The school was conducted either in the synagogue proper or in rooms adjacent to it. Hundreds of synagogues came into existence, wherever Jewish communities were found. So important did they become that they were built in Palestine, even in Jerusalem. Their educational function was so important that synagogues were not even thought of as rivals of the temple. Yet in fact the synagogue had essentially replaced the temple in Jewish life even before its fall in A.D. 70. After the temple was gone, the synagogue was able to carry on Jewish culture without a serious break. Judaism had become more a matter of education than of temple rituals. The Essenes at Qumran organized themselves in eight-hour shifts and maintained a continuous study of the Scriptures day and night.

Above the synagogue was a more advanced study of a professional type. This goes back to Ezra, who returned from Babylon to Jerusalem ca. 458 B.C. to institute a renaissance of both education and religion in the destitute and discouraged Jewish homeland. During the succeeding generations there followed a series of great teachers like himself, constituting what was known as the Great Synagogue (actually not a synagogue in a technical sense; see SYNAGOGUE, THE GREAT). These outstanding teachers, each in his own time, were heads of a school in Palestine, one whose learning came to set the standard for Judaism the world over. The best known of these teachers from the NT period were Shammai and Hillel, at the time of Herod the Great, and Hillel's grandson Gamaliel, under whom Paul was a student near A.D. 30.

These great teachers began their work with the written law, but they also included the oral traditions, judgments, and interpretations of scholars prior to their time. This oral law was similar to decisions of courts in our time, both state and federal, which every court must take into consideration in reaching its decisions. At the time of Christ the traditions had to be passed along by memory; it was felt that only the Scriptures should be written down. In time the body of tradition became so large that it was necessary to reduce it to writing; this was done by Rabbi Judah ca. A.D. 200; and it became the MISHNA, the earliest part of the TALMUD.

In Jewish schools there was no formal recognition of alien cultures, not even by the study of foreign languages. At the end of his book Antiquities of the Jews (XX.xi.2), Josephus remarks for the benefit of Greek readers that he has taken great pains to obtain Greek learning, also to understand the elements of the Greek language, but that nevertheless he is still unable to pronounce it accurately; for, he remarks, "our nation does not encourage those who learn the languages of many nations. It looks upon this sort of accomplishment as common," emphasizing that true wisdom is obtained by study of the Jewish law. Josephus, Philo and Paul, and all other Jews with a good knowledge of Greek had to acquire it on their own initiative, probably in Greek schools.

f. Jewish teachers. Even before the founding of synagogues there had been teachers among the Hebrews. Moses was supposed to have been the greatest of OT teachers. But most of the Hebrew leaders after his time, including priests, were teachers, each in his own way. King Solomon had a reputation for scholarship. Some of the greatest of the teachers were prophets; but as prophecy began to decline, teachers of a new type emerged. The sages who produced the wisdom literature were the immediate successors of the prophets. These in turn appear to have been succeeded by the scribes. Ezra himself was a scribe (7: 12, 21) as well as a priest; so his successors should be regarded as scribes. Sirach (Ecclus. 38:24), who mentioned the scribe with such high praise, must have considered himself one. The term "scribe" was finally replaced by "rabbi." We should not attempt to make a sharp differentiation in function between the teachers indicated by these various names. Jesus, the best known of all biblical teachers, was often critical of the scribes, yet in Matt. 13:52 he said: "Therefore every scribe who has been trained for the kingdom of heaven is like a householder who brings out of his treasure what is new and what is old." In this sense, Jesus himself was a scribe. As a teacher he fits into the category of sage or scribe better than that of prophet. Most of his sayings have a proverbial-epigrammatic quality. He spoke, not as a prophet, but on his own authority, like the sages.

2. Greek and Roman education. a. Hellenistic culture. The Greeks had a genius for scholarly and artistic attainments. First they achieved high standards of cultural excellence for themselves; then they became the teachers of the ancient world. During the classical period of Greek history the privileges of education were mainly enjoyed only by the aristocratic upper classes, but the achievements of that early period were never entirely forgotten by Greeks of later centuries. The ancient Greek ideal of education was to produce men like those portrayed in the poetry of Homer. They were outstanding in physical strength and courage, skilful with weapons but also in music, disciplined in all the rigors of war, and exhibiting at the same time the gentler graces of chivalry. Such were the qualities of a Greek gentleman.

The creative power of the classical era produced such poets as Aeschylus, Aristophanes, Euripides, and Sophocles; philosophers like Socrates, Plato, and Aristotle; as well as many artists of equal excellence in other fields.

The cultural vigor of that brilliant period began to wane along with the decline of the economic and political power of individual Greek states which ushered in the Hellenistic age. The spectacular career of Alexander the Great (336-323 B.C.) marked the beginning of that age, which was to last for some five centuries. The most notable political characteristic of the period was the rise of Western empires. With Alexander, domination of that world moved for the first time from the Orient to the Occident. Ca. two centuries of uncertainty followed Alexander. This period was characterized notably by the Hellenistic kingdoms of Syria and Egypt, which, in turn, were followed by Rome, the most completely Hellenized empire of antiquity. Romans were the true heirs of Greece. Yet they did not slavishly adopt Greek culture; they always knew how to adapt it to their own purposes, exploiting its practical elements, frequently adding barbaric touches of their own.

The Hellenistic age was thus a cultural, as well as a military and political, phenomenon. It was the time during which the culture of Greece was carried, either by the power of its inherent virtues or the far-ranging influence of Greek commerce, or by imposition of Greek military and political force, far beyond the frontiers of the Greek states, until it spread like a veneer over the cultures of most of the nations of the Mediterranean world. These less sophisticated peoples, under the Greek spell, to a considerable extent adopted the Greek language, religion, education, and philosophy. They wished to be Greeks; often they imagined they were. Yet not one of them was ever able to reproduce fully the excellence of the ancients they admired.

b. The Greek schools. Greek education was informed by the idea that every attribute of body, mind, and soul, properly disciplined, is inherently good and worthy of expression. There was hardly a negative element, almost no asceticism, in Greek culture as it sought to bring to maturity every incipient virtue of human personality. It was therefore humanistic in the best sense; not that it repudiated religion, but that the gods themselves were so conceived that they inspired the development and exercise of all of man's potential powers. Greek education required rigorous intellectual labor; no other society has seen more clearly the importance of prolonged application of intelligence to all the problems and wonders of both the natural world and the soul of man. Yet no other culture has ever given more place to athletic sports, music, dancing, and arts of the theater, presenting both the tragic and the comic elements of life, as well as a calendar of annual festivals in which a whole people joined in the worship of its gods.

The gymnasium was the educational institution in which preparation was made for this dynamic expression of the versatility of Greek genius. For the first seven years of his life a Greek boy was in the hands of his mother—a girl had no education outside the home. Then he was sent to school, where he was under the care of men. The elementary school, where he was taught the necessary practical rudiments of learning, occupied a boy's attention until he was about fifteen. Sons of families able to bear the expense were then sent to the gymnasium between the ages of sixteen and eighteen. The discipline was rigorous, the basic element being physical training. The name "gymnasium" is derived from gymnos, "naked," from the Greek custom of stripping off all clothing before engaging in athletics. "Music," a flexible term including poetry, dancing, and allied matters, was very important. A third area involved the study of literature, the sciences, and politics. The gymnasium was open to the public; visitors were usually present; and students could join in discussion of current topics with their elders.

The original purpose of the gymnasium was to prepare young men for citizenship. Hence the gymnasium was limited to the native-born. Gymnasium training was usually followed by two years of compulsory military service for those demonstrated to be eligible by birth or otherwise. This was called the ephebia. The first year was devoted to intensive military instruction at Piraeus, the second to campaign maneuvers and garrison duty at frontier posts. When this training was completed satisfactorily, the ephebus was admitted to full rights and responsibilities of citizenship.

The gymnasium was one of the most important agencies for the preservation of Greek culture; it served Greek culture as the synagogue did Jewish. Wherever Greeks planted colonies, and where native peoples were desirous of acquiring Greek culture, gymnasiums were established. From Italy to Babylon and Persia, more than a hundred cities had these centers of Greek learning. At the beginning of the Maccabean Rebellion in 167 B.C., one of the main causes of resentment felt by the fanatical nationalists was a Greek gymnasium some Jewish liberals had established in Jerusalem (I Macc. 1:14-15; II Macc. 4:9-15). The conservative residents of this ancient city were shocked to see their sons performing in this new sports center stripped naked and wearing the wide-brimmed Greek hats. It is probable that gymnasiums existed also in the Decapolis, where, since the time of Alexander, Greek colonists had developed a flourishing culture. Several of these cities, such as Scythopolis and Philadelphia, had excellent theaters; Gerasa had two. Herod built a theater in Jerusalem; also a theater and amphitheater at Caesarea, where he staged games and combats on the order of those at Rome.

As Athens and other Greek cities lost their political independence, the ephebia lost its original purpose; there was no longer a point in training young men for military service and citizenship for a country which had lost its autonomy. But as the military nature of the organization died out, the institution was transformed into something like a liberal-arts college patronized by sons of aristocratic families. Its training was somewhat like that of a university of our time. Athens, Tarsus, and Alexandria were famous. Yet the period of training at Athens was often not more than one year: at best it was superficial. Study was of two types, either philosophy or rhetoric; and the schools were now open to foreigners as well as natives. The education offered there did little more than equip a few wealthy and unoccupied young men to enjoy their leisure time.

Bibliography. H. L. Strack and P. Billerbeck, Kommentar zum NT aus Talmud und Midrasch (4 vols.; 1922-28); G. F. Moore, Judaism (3 vols.; 1927-30); H. L. Strack, Einleitung in Talmud und Midrasch (1930); H. Danby, The Mishnah (1933); W. Jaeger, Paedeia (3 vols.; 1939); S. V. McCasland, By the Finger of God (1951); M. Burrows, The Dead Sea Scrolls (1955); M. P. Nilsson, Die Hellenistische Schule (1955); H. I. Marrou, A History of Education in Antiquity (1956); E. Würtwein, The Text of the OT (1957); M. Hadas, Hellenistic Culture (1959).

S. V. McCasland

EGG [ביצים, plural only; ᾠόν]. Eggs of the domesticated fowl did not become a common item of food in Palestine until ca. the fifth century B.C. or later. The eggs of small birds (e.g., pigeon, dove, partridge; cf. Deut. 22:6; Isa. 10:14) were gathered for food. In Luke 11:12, quite possibly the egg of the domesticated fowl is meant, as these were numerous in Palestine by that time. The reference in Isa. 59:5 to the eggs of a viper is figurative for the schemes of evil men. The ostrich's habit of leaving eggs in the sand to be warmed and hatched is mentioned in Job 39:14.

The obscure word חלמות, translated "white of an egg" in Job 6:6 KJV, may refer to the juice of the PURSLANE or the egg of a small game bird.

In Jewish ceremonial a roasted egg is included among the objects on the Seder table on the eve of Passover to represent the burnt offering. There is no reference to the method of cooking eggs in ancient times. According to the Mishna they were boiled (Shab. 9.15), broken and fried (Shab. 1.10), mixed with oil and fried (Shab. 8.5), or spread upon fish (Bez. 2.1).

Bibliography. A. R. S. Kennedy, "Fowl," EB, vol. II (1901) cols. 1559-60; J. Jacobs, "Eggs," Jewish Encyclopedia (1903), V, 54; G. E. Wright, Biblical Archaeology (1957), p. 184*a*.

V. H. Kooy

EGLAH ĕg'lə [עגלה, heifer]. A wife of David; the mother of Ithream (II Sam. 3:5; I Chr. 3:3).

EGLAIM ĕg'lĭ əm [אגלים] (Isa. 15:8). A town on the border of Moab. Its site is unknown. Eusebius mentions Agallim, eight miles S of Areopolis (Rabba). In that area today is Rujm el-Jilimeh, a pile of field stones flung into a heap by plowmen. Khirbet Jeljul, ca. 4½ miles farther S, is a Nabatean-Roman site.

Bibliography. N. Glueck, Explorations in Eastern Palestine, III, AASOR, XVIII-XIX (1937-39), 98, 100.

E. D. Grohman

EGLATH-SHELISHIYAH ĕg'lăth shĭ lĭsh'ə yə [עגלת שלשיה, the third Eglath]. A place in Moab mentioned in the oracles against Moab (Isa. 15:5; Jer. 48:34). The location is uncertain. Instead of a place name, the KJV translates "an heifer of three years old."

E. D. Grohman

EGLON ĕg'lŏn [עגלון, young bull(?); Akkad. Ig-la-nu]. 1. The obese king of Moab who invaded

W Jordan territory in the region of Jericho, held it subject for eighteen years, and was treacherously assassinated by EHUD (1), the second deliverer in the book of Judges (3:12-25).

Eglon's W Jordan campaign was carried on with the help of the neighboring Ammonite kingdom and the desert Bedouin called Amalekites. Since the "city of palms," JERICHO, had previously been destroyed, this early-twelfth-century-B.C. Moabite occupation was probably subjugation of the surrounding territory, including perhaps Bethel. The bringing of the annual tribute (cf. that required later by MESHA) provided Ehud with the occasion for his exploit on Eglon. According to late rabbinic tradition, the fat king's rising from his chair, out of respect for a divine word, was rewarded by his daughter Ruth's becoming ancestress of David, but in the original story his respect won only his own death and the loss of the territory of Benjamin and Ephraim W of the Jordan River.

Bibliography. K. Tallqvist, Assyrian Personal Names (1914), p. 95. See also the bibliography under EHUD.

C. F. KRAFT

* 2. A Canaanite royal city. Though Tell en-Nejileh, three miles to the SE, has been suggested, Tell el-Hesi seems the more likely modern location. It is seven miles SW of Lachish, at the very edge of the foothills which extend out into the coastal (Philistine) plain.

Eglon was one of the cities in the Amorite coalition led by Adonizedek of Jerusalem against the Gibeonite confederacy (Josh. 10:1 ff). Because of treaty commitments, Joshua, then encamped at Gilgal, agreed to help the Gibeonites. After a bitterly fought battle near Azekah, the coalition was routed. The leaders, including Debir king of Eglon, fled into a cave near MAKKEDAH, from which they were brought by Joshua's men and were executed. Their bodies were hung from trees until sundown and were then cut down and buried in the cave, after which the cave was sealed. After this victory, the Israelites occupied the cities of the coalition (Josh. 10:28 ff; cf. also 12:7 ff). Eglon was totally destroyed (laid to the herem; 10:35). Archaeological evidence indicates a destruction of Eglon in the late thirteenth century, about the same time as Lachish. Subsequently it became a part of the tribe of Judah, district of Lachish (15:39).

V. R. GOLD

EGYPT ē′jĭpt [מצרים]; EGYPTIAN ē jĭp′shən [מצרי]. A land in NW Africa; in the narrowest sense the two banks of the Nile River from the First Cataract N to the region of modern Cairo (Upper and Middle Egypt) and the Delta (Lower Egypt). In this article Egypt includes both the comprehensive biblical name, Mizraim, and the term for Upper Egypt, Pathros.

Ancient Egypt was one of the earliest civilizations and for many centuries one of the most powerful nations. For much of her history she laid claim to the oases W of the Nile Valley, Nubia between the First and Second Cataracts, the Red Sea coast, and much of the Peninsula of Sinai. Shortly after 2000 B.C. she pushed an empire S of the Second Cataract and shortly after 1500 B.C. to the Fourth Cataract. Soon after 1500 B.C. she carved out an Asiatic empire, with claims running N to the Euphrates River, but with the most effective holdings in Palestine and Phoenicia. Fig. EGY 4.

The Egyptians called their country the "Two Lands [of Upper and Lower Egypt]" or the "Black Land," in contrast to the "red" desert, or simply "the land." The name Egypt is of late application and probably derives from an epithet for Memphis, Hi-ku-Ptah, the "House of the Spirit of [the god] Ptah." The name MIZRAIM was not used by the Egyptians, but Pathros came from the Egyptian, pa-to-resi, the "south land." An Egyptian counterpart for "Dan to Beer-sheba" in the Bible was "Migdol to Syene"—i.e., from a NE frontier fortress to Aswan at the First Cataract.

1. Geography
   a. Physical
   b. Economic
   c. Racial
2. History
   a. Prehistoric and Old Kingdom (to 2200 B.C.)
   b. First intermediate period, Middle Kingdom, second intermediate period (2200-1570 B.C.)
   c. Early New Kingdom (1570-1375 B.C.)
   d. Amarna period (1375-1300 B.C.)
   e. Late New Kingdom (1300-1100 B.C.)
   f. Postimperial period (1100-700 B.C.)
   g. Ethiopian and Saitic periods (700-525 B.C.)
   h. Persian, Ptolemaic, and Roman periods (525 B.C.–A.D. 70)
3. Religion
   a. Older official religion
   b. Amarna reformation and reaction
   c. Religion in late times
4. Egyptology
Bibliography

1. Geography.* The Greek writers pointed out that the land of Egypt is the gift of the Nile. NE Africa is a desert country, essentially rainless. Only the flow of the Nile and particularly its annual inundation make human life possible in that part of the world, and this has been true throughout historical times. Because of this, the Egyptian saw a decided contrast between his land and the neighboring countries and felt that this favorable contrast showed the solicitude of the gods for his land. Figs. EGY 5-6.

a. Physical. From the equatorial lakes of Africa, the White Nile starts a four-thousand-mile course northward to the Mediterranean. At Khartum in the Sudan it meets the Blue Nile, which originates in Abyssinia, and the two unite for the final nineteen-hundred-mile flow of the Nile proper. Through sandstone and limestone, this river has carved out a valley in which habitation is possible. Transverse barriers of harder stone cut across the course of the Nile, creating six cataracts, which have been natural frontiers. Some annual rainfall is effective in the latitude of the Fourth Cataract, which in the eighth century B.C. and following was the center of a kingdom the Bible calls Cush or Ethiopia. The region between the Third and First Cataracts is Nubia. N of the First Cataract lies Egypt in the narrower sense.

The Nile Valley is hemmed in by the Libyan and Red Sea hills, and the six-hundred-mile course from the First Cataract to Memphis (near modern Cairo) varies in width from one to twenty-four miles of arable land. From the Cairo region N the land fans out into the broad stretches of the Delta, with a maximum width at the N of ca. 125 miles. Today the Delta has two branches of the Nile; anciently it had at least five.

From When Egypt Ruled the East (The University of Chicago Press)

4. Ancient Egyptian Empire (ca. 1500-1000 B.C.)

The equatorial and Abyssinian rains are seasonal and they combine to enlarge the Nile in an annual flooding. This inundation gives Egypt wide-spreading waters beginning in July and subsiding from September on. The prosperity of Egypt depends upon a good inundation and the planned retention of the flood waters for a maximum period. With a system of catch basins or canals, the waters may be held for as long as possible at some distance from the banks of the river. In the dry season lifting devices have been employed to bring up subsurface water. Before the modern system of dams was introduced, the inundation used to deposit an annual increment of fresh and fertile silt upon the land as a natural fertilizer. Irrigating waters, fertilizing silt, and a warm climate made Egypt one of the richest agricultural countries in the world. It could look upon neighboring lands as decidedly inferior.

In contrast to Canaan or to Mesopotamia, Egypt was relatively insulated against invasion from outside or even from major foreign influence. The long trough of Upper Egypt was fringed by the infertile Red Sea Desert and the formidable Libyan Desert. At the NW only a limited access was possible along the Libyan coast. At the NE the wilderness of Sinai dried out much of the contact from Asia. Only when the Egyptian state was weak or divided, could the Hyksos, Assyrians, Babylonians, Persians, and Arabs penetrate Egypt successfully. Because of the screening effect of the Sinai wilderness, Egypt's successful hold on an Asiatic empire or an Asiatic power's successful hold on Egypt had to be supported by control of the seaways across the E Mediterranean.

The N half of the Delta was afflicted with salt

Adapted from J. B. Pritchard, Ancient Near East in Pictures (copyright Princeton University Press)

5. Egypt

Courtesy of the Oriental Institute, the University of Chicago

6. The Nile Valley at Thebes

marshes. The ancient cities lay twenty-five miles inland from the Mediterranean and were reached along one of the Nile arms. Until Alexander the Great founded Alexandria, there was no major city on the coast. Pelusium, which Ezek. 30:15 calls the "stronghold of Egypt," was probably more of a frontier fortress than a commercial metropolis. The chief cities of biblical interest were Zoan (Tanis) and/or Rameses in the commercial E Delta; On (Heliopolis) and Memphis at the apex of the Delta near modern Cairo; Thebes, the capital city in Upper Egypt; and Syene (Aswan) at the First Cataract. In addition, the agriculturally rich Middle Egypt always had a metropolis, such as Siut.

The N wind has always been the prevailing wind, bringing cool from the Mediterranean and permitting navigation southward against the current of the Nile. In the spring there may be many days of S wind from the desert, producing sandstorms which lay a "thick darkness" (Exod. 10:22-23) over the land.

b. Economic. Egypt's wealth and power rested upon an agricultural base.* Barley was the chief crop, with wheat and emmer less important. Flax made the linen of Egypt prized in the ancient world. There was a generous range of vegetables, and melons were widely raised. In other fruits Egyptian crops were marginal to the agricultural land; e.g., the grape was cultivated in the oases, the Faiyum, and the fringes of the Delta. For many centuries until the coming of paper, papyrus from the marshes was a valued export. Figs. EGY 7-8.

Only in good, firm wood for houses or ships was Egypt poor. From early historical times there was a brisk trade with Phoenicia for cedar, fir, and cypress. Cedar resin also became a desired import for the embalming process.

Livestock were important in the Egyptian economy. There was no such emphasis on sheep and wool as in Asia (Gen. 46:34). However, large cattle were abundant, and hides went into the export market. The camel was very rare until Persian times; the donkey was the earlier caravan animal. The horse was introduced ca. 1700 B.C., and the Egyptian horse market was flourishing some centuries later (I Kings 10:28-29). Fish, the goose, and the duck were abundant enough to be important in the Egyptian diet.

Egyptian hills are rich in building and sculpturing stone, from hard stones like granite and basalt to softer materials like limestone and alabaster. An essential contrast between Egypt and Mesopotamia was that Egypt could build colossal monuments out of stone, whereas Mesopotamia had to rely upon brick. Until the Iron Age, Egypt was also fortunate in the command of mineral deposits: copper in the Red Sea Hills but especially in W Sinai, gold in the Red Sea Hills and in Nubia. Copper for her bronze tools and weapons and gold for purchasing power were two of ancient Egypt's great assets. When the Iron Age came in before 1100 B.C., Egypt had to rely upon purchases from abroad, and her relative strength fell off.

The irrigated black soil was so precious that the Egyptian farmers lived in tightly built villages and went out to their fields. Legally there was no such thing as private property, since everything belonged to the god-king, but in practice, Egyptian commoners treated soil, houses, cattle, and chattels as their own. For economy's sake, the villages were regularly built in the same places, so that most of the ancient towns are now buried deep under the rising alluvial soil. Therefore, our knowledge of domestic life is rather limited. However, for burial there was always the sand of the nearby desert, so that tombs and mortuary temples have survived. Village houses and even royal palaces were of mud brick, whereas tombs and temples were of stone. Consequently, the accident of survival has made the Egyptian emphasis on life after death seem to us a preoccupation with death, which it was not.

The black soil was too valuable to be cut up by permanent roads, while the Nile or its branches were always near to serve as arteries of movement. Thus from prehistoric times on, the Egyptians were a river-faring people, and by the beginning of history they had taken their boats out onto the open sea. Trade with Phoenicia and the Aegean may have been as much in foreign ships as in Egyptian, but on the Red Sea the Egyptian vessel was dominant in the trade southward to the land of incense, myrrh, gums, and ivory, which the Egyptians called Punt.

Courtesy of the Cairo Museum; photo courtesy of the Metropolitan Museum of Art

7. An Egyptian wall painting, from tomb of Nakht at Thebes (fifteenth century B.C.). Upper section shows harvest scenes; middle section shows man chopping down tree, and a laborer breaking soil; lower section shows a laborer plowing, and a person watching laborers from a booth.

The chief commercial-military road to Asia left Egypt near modern Kantarah, cut across N Sinai, and reached Palestine near modern Gaza. This was a useful road for caravans and moderately large flocks of sheep, but for large bodies like armies on the march and also for security it was necessary to police and fortify the water holes along the way. Perhaps because of these police and communications

From When Egypt Ruled the East (The University of Chicago Press)

8. Egyptian harvest scene posts, Moses led the children of Israel "by way of the wilderness" rather than "by way of the land of the Philistines" (Exod. 13:17-18).

In most basic commodities ancient Egypt was self-sufficient. Construction wood, tin, silver, and iron had to be imported from N sources. Olive oil was an early import from Asia. Otherwise, her foreign trade was in luxury items: lapis lazuli, obsidian, marquetry, and metalwork from Asia; ivory, incenses, gums, and rare skins from Africa.

c. Racial. In physical type the ancient Egyptian belonged to the slight, brunet family which is called the Mediterranean race. He was relatively short, of slight frame, dark in hair and color of eyes, but not originally dark in skin color. Hair on face and body was light. He was physically like the Hamites and S Semites.* Even before historical times another type with a broader skull appeared, but in a minority which was soon absorbed by the dominant type. In early history the Negro was unknown to the Egyptian, and the Nubian and Sudanese peoples to his S were physically akin to him. By 2000 B.C. the Negro was visible at the Third Cataract, and by 1500 B.C. the Egyptian Empire, pushing S to the Fourth Cataract, was in constant contact with Negroes. However, Negro characteristics were not prominent in the Egypt with which the Hebrews had contact, except for such Ethiopian pharaohs as Tirhakah, and even they probably had mixed blood. The eunuch of the Candace of Ethiopia, whom Philip baptized (Acts 8:26-39), may have been a Negro. Fig. EGY 9.

Linguistically, ancient Egyptian was a composite of the Semitic and Hamitic branches of language. There was a sufficiently strong relation to Semitic so that many root words are the same in Egyptian and Semitic and borrowing by one side or the other was relatively easy. However, even though the structural formation of Egyptian and Semitic is akin, including an emphasis on a consonantal skeleton, with the vowels subject to grammatical change, the Egyptian language stands outside the Semitic family as normally analyzed and shows definite but imperfectly recorded ties to the Hamitic family. There were physical and linguistic reasons for the Egyptians to be conscious of difference from their Asiatic neighbors. The ancient Egyptians called neighboring peoples by geographical or racial names—"Nubians," "Libyans," or "Asiatics"—but until very late times they applied no ethnic term to themselves; they called themselves simply "the people."

In medieval and modern times, it has been possible to separate dialects within Egypt. There has been a major cleavage in dialect between Lower and Upper Egypt. The same distinction has not been possible for the times of the pharaohs, because the written language was much more under the standardizing control of priestly tradition. However, through a literary reference we do know that it was difficult for a man from the First Cataract to understand the speech of a man from the Delta marshes.

For the Egyptian of the Delta, most of his sacred shrines lay to the S. The temple of the sun-god Re was at On (Heliopolis). Near Memphis were the pyramid area and the ancient cemetery of Sakkarah. Herakleopolis (biblical Hanes) was an important town near the Faiyum. At Hermopolis in Middle

Courtesy of the Nelson Gallery—Atkins Museum (Nelson Fund), Kansas City, Missouri

9. Methethy, an Egyptian nobleman of the king's entourage, Fifth-Sixth Dynasty (ca. 2350 B.C.)

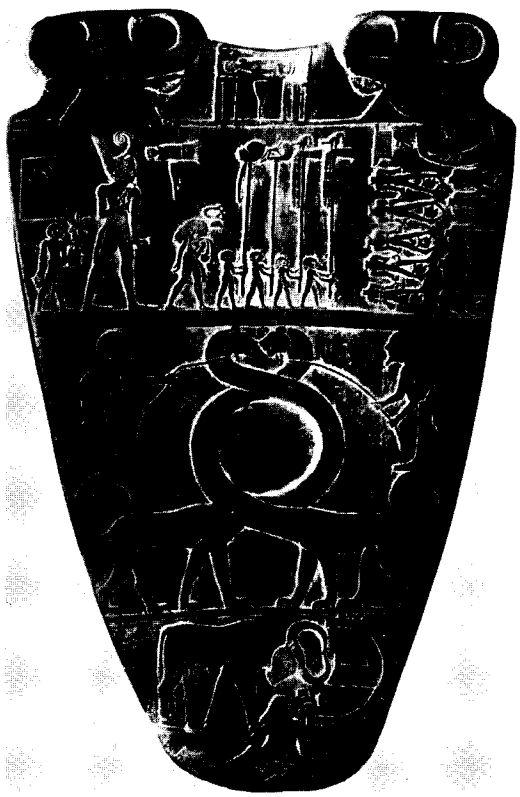
Egypt was the temple of Thoth, moon-god and god of wisdom. Farther S at Abydos lay a holy place of pilgrimage, the shrine of Osiris, god of the dead. Thebes, an effective capital from 2100 B.C. on, was an important provincial capital after 1300 B.C., because at Karnak lay the mighty temple of the imperial god, Amon-Re. Furthermore, the Nile, source of Egyptian life, came from the S. Perhaps this is why Ezek. 29:14 calls Pathros (Upper Egypt) the land of the origin of the Egyptians.

2. History. From Greek times, the history of the pharaohs has been divided into thirty dynasties, the first at the beginning of written history ca. 3000 B.C., the thirtieth ending with the conquest of Alexander the Great in 332 B.C. Then the dynasty of the Ptolemies ran from 306 to 30 B.C. Three political plateaus of older history were the Old Kingdom or pyramid age, Third through Sixth Dynasties (2700-2200 B.C.); the Middle Kingdom, chiefly the Twelfth Dynasty (2000-1800 B.C.); and the New Kingdom or Empire, Eighteenth through Twentieth Dynasties (1570-1090 B.C.). Subsequently there came the Ethiopian period, including the Twenty-fifth Dynasty (715-663 B.C.), the Saitic revival of the Twenty-sixth Dynasty (663-525 B.C.), and the Persian period (525-332 B.C., with interludes of Egyptian reassertion).

Scholars have not attained exact chronology for Egypt before 663 B.C. The farther back one goes, the greater the margin of disagreement becomes. For dates before 2000 B.C. there may be wide disagreement, with estimates for the beginning of the dynasties ranging from 3200 to 2830 B.C. Fortunately the disagreement among scholars on dates for most of the biblical period is not wide, falling usually within the stretch of a single generation.

a. Prehistoric and Old Kingdom (to 2200 B.C.). Archaeologists have traced a series of prehistoric cultures, although there is still an important gap at the time when man first settled down beside the Nile as a farmer. Flint implements have been found in geological context, from crude fist hatchets of the Old Stone Age down to rippled and polished knives in early historic times. The NE African plateau was once well watered. Gradually it dried up, and man, animals, and plants were driven down to the margin of the sole remaining water, the Nile River. Hunting in the uplands became an inadequate source of food; close association at the river bank of man and plant and animal foods promoted the process of domestication. Possibly at the same time as in the hills above the Mesopotamian plain, possibly somewhat later, NE African man ceased to be a Libyan hunter and became an Egyptian herdsman and farmer, living in a village on the margin of the land watered by the Nile. The basic social unit was no longer the family alone; it became the village community.

Very gradually certain amenities were introduced, such as houses with inner sectioning into rooms, doors and windows, granaries for storage, linen in place of hides, containers made of pottery, better tools, metal objects, jewelry, and cosmetics. Objects of foreign derivation show a modestly active trade. Worship of gods and a belief in survival after death are shown by amulets, figurines, and the materials placed in the grave for future life. The diet was enriched. Weapons and broken bones show the competition of one community against another for possession of territory.



As the population increased, it was not enough to herd a few animals down to the marshes which fringed the Nile, nor enough to tease a few marginal plants with a hoe and to depend upon the natural watering from the Nile. The marshes had to be cleared and drained for new fields. Irrigation was necessary to carry the water farther from the Nile and hold it for a longer time. The animal-drawn plow could cultivate wider fields than the hoe. These new activities took a long time and involved cooperation between different towns. The community enlarged from individual agricultural villages to provinces of common interests. Widespread irrigation and the use of the plow were probably the immediate preludes to history.

The motivating factors which carried the Egyptians from the barbarism of prehistory into the civilization of historical times will remain a matter of speculation. However, one factor can be detected.

Just before the beginning of the dynasties there appeared in Egypt elements which were borrowed from Mesopotamia. These certainly included the cylinder seal, a kind of brick architecture developed in Mesopotamia, and certain artistic motifs. They may have included also the idea of writing and its method of setting down objects and concepts in pictorially recognizable form. Since no comparable borrowings from Egypt have been found in Mesopotamian excavation, the priority of Mesopotamian civilization may be conceded. Fig. VES 15.

Ca. 3000 B.C. a family from Upper Egypt succeeded in conquering all of Egypt and founding the First Dynasty. Since this formation of the first state is generally coincident with the first written records, the earliest monumental sculpture and architecture, well-controlled metallurgy, governmental development of copper mines, and such amenities as tables, beds, and chairs, we call this period also the beginning of history and of civilization in Egypt. Fig. EGY 10.

In later tradition the founder of the First Dynasty was called Menes. Although the credit to a single individual remains uncertain, a family from Abydos in the S did form the First Dynasty and set up a capital at Memphis, near the point where Upper and Lower Egypt join. Probably the conquest and unification of Egypt had taken several generations before the formal institution of the new capital and required several generations after Menes to complete the conquest and to organize the new state. The first two dynasties, lasting two to four centuries, were occupied in working out the forms of the new nation.

Courtesy of the Cairo Museum

10. Stone palette from Hierkonopolis celebrating victory of King Nar-mer of the First Dynasty (ca. 3000 B.C.) of Egypt. Before the King are four standard-bearers and bound, headless corpses of his enemies.

By the beginning of the Third Dynasty, ca. 2700 B.C., Egypt was mature enough to express the forms of her new culture. The brilliant pyramid age began with the Stepped Pyramid of Djoser (or Zoser), the first large-scale monument constructed entirely of hewn stone. Credit for this architectural revolution is customarily given to Djoser's brilliant minister, Ii-em-hotep. If the credit is deserved, Ii-em-hotep was rightly esteemed as one of the wise men of Egyptian tradition. Under Djoser the bureaucracy was reorganized, to meet the problems of a more complex state. The government continued to be a theocracy, vested in the person of the king, who was a god; the king's sons continued to hold the most responsible offices; and there was no effective division between priestly and civil offices; but the assignment of authority to individuals to act in the name of the king was the first large step toward the building up of a secular bureaucracy. Egypt was markedly king-centered from the Third to the late Fifth Dynasty: the flat-topped tombs of the princes and nobles, tombs which archaeologists call mastabas, clustered close to the pyramid of the king, who was still the only one who was by definition as a god assured of eternal life. If he needed his court for eternal rule in the next world, then they might also have eternal life in his service.

The Fourth Dynasty (2650-2500 B.C.) was the peak of Egypt's material and artistic glory. It was the age of the three great pyramids of Gizeh:* the Great Pyramid, built as a tomb for Khufu* (or Cheops); the Second Pyramid for Khaf-Re (or Chephren); and the Third Pyramid for Men-kau-Re (or Mycerinus). The Great Pyramid was rightly one of the seven wonders of the world. Despite its tremendous mass and despite man's limited experience in massive architecture, the leveling of a stone surface for the pyramid, its trueness of angle and length, and the precise fitting of huge stones were carried out with the most meticulous accuracy. Legend of later times says that Khufu and Khaf-Re were hated by their own people, and there is some evidence to support this legend. If so, the unpopularity will have arisen more from the economic obligation to supply labor and materials for the largest monument ever erected for a single man than from the bitterness of laborers under a taskmaster's whip. Forced labor was always a regular obligation upon the ancient Egyptians. Figs. EGY 11-12; Pl. XXVI*c*.

By the Fourth Dynasty writing was competent to meet all normal needs of government and religion. Statuary, relief sculpture, and painting enjoyed the sophisticated ability to render beautifully organized scenes and the depiction of mortals in the serene expectation of immortality. Early in Egyptian history art was more successfully "Egyptian," in the blissful capture of eternity, than it was in the following 2,500 years. These were great accomplishments, effected within an extraordinarily short period of apprenticeship.

Of course, the extreme focus upon the divine person of the king was subject to challenge. The Fifth Dynasty (2500-2350 B.C.) saw the rise of two other gods. The sun-god Re of Heliopolis gained political power by the acknowledgment that he was the father of the ruling king. Osiris, the god who had died but yet lived on to rule in another realm, came into prominence as the god of the dead, and kings who had died thereby became Osiris (see § 3 below). Further, there was a centrifugal force at work within the state: the royal family and court had a lesser voice in government, whereas outlying officials, while claiming loyal service to the king, wielded greater authority. Nobles who no longer felt a need for clinging to the king's divine immortality began to build their tombs in their own home districts.

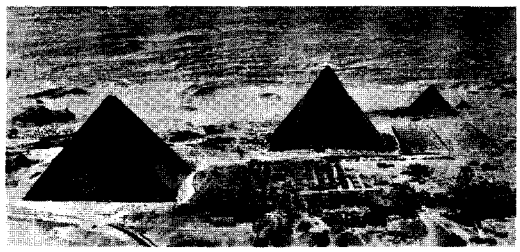
A warning should be issued about the precise historical value of Egyptian inscriptions. For the ancient Egyptian, truth lay in faithful conformance to the divine order. Within this divine order the king was a god, omniscient and infallible, and men faithful to this belief might be rewarded with eternal happiness. Thus the "portraits" of ancient Egyptians may show some element of personal features or character, but this element was overlaid by the serenely eternal type most acceptable to the gods. Similarly, every orthodox inscription shows the king bringing order and success to his nation by superhuman discretion and power. This was conformance to the truth of faith, rather than to objective observation. Texts which are written out of this psychology of devotion have to be tested against any other knowledge we may possess. It is disconcerting for the historian to note that the Fifth Dynasty king Sahu-Re recorded a victory over a certain Libyan family, that a century and a half later the Sixth Dynasty king Pepi II conquered the same family, and that seventeen centuries later the Ethiopian pharaoh Tirhakah again conquered the identical family. This was faithfulness to a favorite tradition, rather than fidelity to historical fact. The historian must accept his data at face value, unless there is clear reason for distrust; but he must be ready to modify his understanding as soon as new material puts the previous interpretation in a new light.



The decentralization of the state which had begun in the Fifth Dynasty continued in the Sixth (2350-2200 B.C.). Tomb autobiographies of provincial nobles show a self-confidence verging on arrogance. Egypt's foreign relations became more active. To the S there was an energetic penetration into the Sudan. From the First Cataract caravans were led by nobles, who had the tasks of promoting the flow of trade, securing favorable alliances with Nubian princes, and enlisting Nubian soldiers for the Egyptian army. A basic import from the S was cattle, but there was an eager interest in luxury goods: incense, gums, ivory, and leopard skins.

Relations with Palestine-Syria showed a double pattern. At GEBAL (Byblos) in Phoenicia there was a temple of strong Egyptian influence. For dedication in this temple the kings of Egypt sent a series of offerings. The trade in cedar from the Lebanon and the trans-shipping facilities of the port of Gebal were to the advantage of both Gebal and Egypt. In Palestine, however, the situation was not so friendly to the Egyptians. Ca. 2325 B.C., Egypt had to send

Courtesy of the Arab Information Center, New York

11. The sphinx and the pyramid of Khaf-Re at Gizeh, near Cairo

Trans World Airlines Photo

12. Aerial view of the pyramids of Khufu, Khaf-Re, and Men-kau-Re at Gizeh five military expeditions against the "sand-dwellers," the people of S Palestine. When these campaigns failed to crush the hostility, a final expedition was mounted by water and penetrated farther N, probably N of the Carmel range. Although the Egyptian texts, as always, claimed a complete success, it was no more than a temporary victory. As the central government weakened at the end of the Old Kingdom and in the first intermediate period, the Asiatics took advantage of a slackened frontier to trickle into the Egyptian Delta.

b. First intermediate period, Middle Kingdom, second intermediate period (2200-1570 B.C.). The Old Kingdom showed structural weakness when ineffective kings were unable to check the growing independence of the nobles. Egypt suddenly disintegrated into fragments. There were at least three competing pretenders to wide rule, but many provincial nobles began to act independently and to claim for themselves the perquisites of kingship. Texts describing the period tell of governmental chaos, overturn of social classes, neglect and robbery of the tombs, the cutting short of foreign trade, and the infiltration of Asiatic Bedouins into the Delta. The human inclination to find a scapegoat moved the Egyptian to place blame upon these Asiatics for the time of troubles. But it was really the weakness of the state which left the borders unguarded, until a slow but steady influx of Bedouins amounted to a major problem.

From the standpoint of religion and thought, the first intermediate period is extraordinarily interesting, because Egypt suffered severely from the overturn of the old values of stability and prosperity. There were reactions of despair, hedonism, and cynicism. One social prophet even dared to point a finger of criticism at one of the kings of the time and blame him for failing to correct the situation. Out of the confusion and the varied reactions to confusion there emerged two constructive forces. The first of these was the realization that the confident materialism of the Old Kingdom had been inadequate for the desired goals of worldly success and eternal life. Men came to feel that a good life was also necessary, exhibited in pious service to the gods and in a concern for fellow men. After death a man was to be judged by the gods for good character, and not simply for position and wealth. The second force, related to the first, was a feeling for the common man. This new sense of social justice could only be real if it were felt that the peasant was also a man of worth. One of the proudest boasts of the inscriptions in this period was: "I was a good little man." A vigorous document insisted that a peasant had rights to justice from a royal official.

This scaling down of the social order and this belief that moral worth should win immortality were reflected in the politics of the first intermediate period, which showed decentralized feudalism, and in the new spread of the rights of immortality to a wider number. Those funeral ceremonies and those mortuary texts which had formerly been the exclusive prerogative of kings were now the rights of the nobility. Every "good man," if his character were judged righteous, would now become the god Osiris at death and enter into eternal happiness. Out of material and political chaos the Egyptians had discovered new values.

Ca. 2100 B.C. the competition for power in Egypt narrowed down to a contest between two city-states. Herakleopolis near the Faiyum felt herself to be the bearer of a tradition inherited from the Old Kingdom at Memphis. To the S there was an upstart city, Thebes, previously unknown to history. Ca. 2050 B.C., Thebes was victorious and reunited Egypt for the period which we call the Middle Kingdom. The rewards were peace, stability, the prosperity of an orderly Egypt, and a resumed foreign trade. The price which the new Theban rulers had to pay lay in the loose fealty of semi-independent feudal lords. Indeed, the newly organized state, after only two generations, saw this new ruling family swept aside by another Theban family, the Twelfth Dynasty (1990-1780 B.C.).

Later ages looked back at the Twelfth Dynasty as a golden classical age of Egyptian history. The new kings realized that they faced a difficult task in welding the separate forces of the state into a unity. They were strong and conscientious rulers. They won new agricultural land by large-scale irrigation works and an observation post S of the Second Cataract to estimate the volume of the annual inundation before it arrived. Nubia was conquered as empire, and a frontier fortress was set above the Second Cataract. A fortified trading house was maintained S of the Third Cataract. Trade was resumed with Phoenicia, and at least one military raid was undertaken into Palestine, as far as Shechem, to keep caravan routes open. The princes of Phoenicia and N Syria were cultivated with generous royal gifts. Palestine and Syria were under the cultural domination of Egypt, even though no political empire was attempted there.

Under the Old Kingdom it had not been necessary to assert the benign power of the king. His godlike qualities had been manifest. The Middle Kingdom was more loosely organized, and the new sentiment for the smaller man presented a challenge to kingship. Therefore, these new kings deliberately issued written publicity on their behalf. A document was published, ostensibly centuries old, in which a prophet foretold the anarchy of the first intermediate period and the messianic delivery of Egypt by the first king of the Twelfth Dynasty. For the use of the priestly schools other documents were prepared, telling of the unceasing constancy of the king, the rewards for loyalty to the throne, and the virtues of being a good Egyptian. These texts were given such momentum that they became Egyptian classics. The Prophecy of Neferti was copied for three centuries, while the Wisdom of Amen-em-het I, the Story of Si-nuhe, and the Satire on the Trades were still used in the government schools seven hundred years later.

The Twelfth Dynasty was particularly active in developing the copper mines of Sinai. Whereas the Old Kingdom had sent army units to Sinai, to mine the ore and to hold off the Bedouins, the Middle Kingdom relied more upon good relations with the Asiatic sheiks and brought them into the outer orbit of Egyptian culture. They were proud to be depicted on monuments at the Sinai mines, with their names and titles written in Egyptian hieroglyphic.

We can only guess at the forces which led to the disintegration of the Middle Kingdom. Despite the success of the Twelfth Dynasty kings in promoting the prosperity of the land and in winning the adherence of provincial nobles, there must have been a structural weakness in a state which still had a strongly decentralized character. Without strong kings, the fealty of the nobles would slacken. Both in Asia and in Africa there were movements of new foreign peoples, which may have cut down on the lucrative foreign trade. At any rate, the end of the Twelfth Dynasty and the beginning of the Thirteenth saw brief reigns and an obvious element of internal weakness.

A group of strange documents belongs to the century following 1850 B.C. These are the "execration texts," written magical formulas for the cursing and confusion of the king's enemies. Within a set formula, the name or the title of such a foe was inscribed upon a pottery bowl or upon the clay figurine of a bound captive. As this inscribed object was ceremonially smashed, so would perish every enemy of the king. Several Egyptians were so cursed, and from their names they seem to have been conspiring members of the royal family. Such magic averted evil thoughts, speeches, plots, and dreams. Actual and potential enemies among the Nubians and Libyans were so cursed. The most interesting group of names comes from Asia, cursing the named rulers of Ashkelon, Shechem, Laish, Beth-shemesh, Acre, Tyre, and so on. As it applied to Jerusalem, the full formula ran: "the Ruler of Jerusalem, Yaqar-'ammu, and all the retainers who are with him; the Ruler of Jerusalem, Sez-'anu, and all the retainers who are with him—who may rebel, who may plot, who may fight, who may talk of fighting, or who may talk of rebelling—in this entire land."

Clearly the execration texts reflect uneasiness on the part of the Egyptian king. At home he had very specific opponents, and he feared hostility abroad from many princes. If he could not win their good will, he could resort to magic to confound them. Insofar as the evidence can be understood, the towns of Palestine were ruled by Semitic princes, who felt no obligation of loyalty to the king of Egypt.

The second intermediate period, like the first, started with the disintegration of the state into parts, a weakened rule at Thebes and a competing dynasty in the Delta. As before, an enfeebled state did not maintain its frontiers, so that Asiatics penetrated the Delta before 1700 B.C. This time it was no trickle of Bedouins; the invaders entered with military force. Tradition calls them the HYKSOS, or, by an incorrect etymology, the Shepherd Kings. The word "Hyksos" has an Egyptian origin, which unfortunately is not very illuminating: hiku-khasu, "rulers of foreign countries." Their main locus in Egypt was a great encampment at Avaris in the NE Delta. Similar beaten-earth-fortification enclosures have been noted in the Delta, Palestine, and Syria. Avaris is to be found either at Tanis (Zoan) or a short distance S of Tanis.

An argument that the Hyksos located their power at Tanis somewhere ca. 1720 B.C. has been based upon an Egyptian monument found at Tanis, the "Stele of the Year Four Hundred." This was erected shortly before the Nineteenth Dynasty, to commemorate the four hundredth year of the rule of the god Seth. Seth, who is depicted upon the stele in the costume of an Asiatic god, was for the Egyptians the god of foreign countries. Thus the stele, ignoring the Hyksos, states that four hundred years before 1320 B.C. an Egyptian god of foreign lands began a sway at or near Tanis. Since this should be the general time at which the Hyksos began their domination of Egypt, it is proper to interpret the inscription as applying to their rule but avoiding reference to hated invaders.

The Hyksos introduced into Egypt and into Syria-Palestine certain new factors—the horse and chariot, the composite bow, a heavier sword, body armor, and their rectangular fortress of beaten earth. Because these elements seem exotic to the Near East, a home origin for the Hyksos has been sought beyond the Caucasus or even in Central Asia. We do not know the ultimate source of the new factors which they introduced. However, insofar as Egypt was concerned, the Hyksos were Asiatics, and they called them by the same terms which they applied to their immediate Asiatic neighbors, 'Aamu and Retenu. Such Hyksos personal names as can be identified prove to be Semitic, like Jacob-har and Simeon. Even though the horse and chariot and other warlike elements may ultimately derive from a territory outside the Near East, these new means of attack and defense were seized upon by the people of Syria-Palestine for their own advantage. Some of this advantage lay in Canaan, but a definite triumph was to invade once-proud Egypt, conquer her, and set up dynasties of Semitic Hyksos kings as overlords.

The question whether the Hyksos age (1720-1570 B.C.) includes the time of Joseph and the beginning of the Israelite sojourn in Egypt has been debated since the time of Josephus. It has been argued that a Semitic king would more naturally appoint Joseph his first minister. Those who argue for a date ca. 1225 B.C. for the Exodus point to the 430 years of sojourn in Exod. 12:40-41 and reach a date of 1655 B.C. for the entry of the children of Israel into Egypt. These are valid arguments, but the problem is much more complex than can be treated here. Certainly the Hyksos as a whole cannot be equated with the children of Israel.

Although Egyptian inscriptions picture the Hyksos as arrogant and impious, this was no barbarian horde. The Hyksos adjusted to Egyptian ways and commissioned good Egyptian works of art. In particular, they seem to have been active merchants. They introduced in Egypt a new system of weights, a recently discovered stele tells of "hundreds" of Hyksos ships laden with rich cargo at an Egyptian port, and objects bearing the names of Hyksos kings have been found all over the Near East.

The Hyksos kings at Avaris tolerated the existence of weakened Theban rulers and were content with the firm possession of the Delta and tribute from Thebes. In the course of time the Egyptians at Thebes themselves acquired the new weapons of warfare. Ca. 1580 B.C. a Theban king named Ka-mose found the situation intolerable. His counselors urged him not to provoke a war. He stood in peaceful relations with the Asiatics to the N and the Nubians to the S; although the Egyptians could not claim sway N of Hermopolis in Middle Egypt, they were permitted to pasture their cattle in the Delta; war might endanger the advantages they held. Ka-mose brushed aside the counsel of his nobles and started a war of liberation.

c. Early New Kingdom (1570-1375 B.C.). Ka-mose succeeded in pushing the Hyksos back into the Delta, but it was reserved for the following king, Ah-mose I, to expel the Hyksos, reunite Egypt, and thus start the Eighteenth Dynasty (1570-1305 B.C.). After three campaigns, Ah-mose captured Avaris. The war then shifted to Palestine, where the town of Sharuhen was besieged for three years before it fell. The clear implication is that the Hyksos fell back upon their homeland in Asia. For a few generations the new dynasty was too busy with the political reorganization of Egypt to undertake more than occasional raids into Palestine-Syria.

The domination of Egypt by Asiatic rulers had made a real difference in the nationalistic spirit of the land. Previously there had been a lofty complacency about Egypt's clear superiority to the nomadic and seminomadic neighbors across her borders. The task of asserting this superiority by military, political, or commercial activity had been the responsibility of the king. For most Egyptians a deep love of home and a scorn for foreigners turned thoughts and interests inward into the land of the Nile. But the shock of foreign domination deeply affected the national psychology. This must never happen again. A feeling of imperialistic patriotism invaded the land. In the Egyptian texts it was, not the "army of his majesty," but "our army," that took the fields to seek Egypt's revenge.

To be sure, this did not happen immediately, nor did it happen without some conflict of opinion within Egypt. The Middle Kingdom had had an African empire, and this was re-established as far as the Third Cataract early in the Eighteenth Dynasty. But what should be the Egyptian attitude toward the enemies in Asia? Ca. 1490 B.C. there was a political controversy over this question.

The protagonists in the struggle were the young King Thut-mose III* and Queen Hat-shepsut. She and her nonmilitary policy had the first success. The youthful Thut-mose was thrust into obscurity and inactivity. Hat-shepsut seized power and proclaimed herself, not queen, but king, so that she might reign as a god. For eighteen years she ruled with vigor (1486-1468 B.C.). The Egyptian energies were devoted to reconstruction, building enterprises, and peaceful foreign trade. Her beautiful temple of Deir el-Bahri at Thebes devotes major space to the depiction of a commercial enterprise, the expedition down the Red Sea to the land of Punt, for incense, myrrh, ebony, apes, gold, and leopard skins. Her party was interested in re-establishing that cultural and economic dominance in foreign lands which the Old and Middle Kingdoms had enjoyed. The incense land of Punt probably lay both on the Somali African coast and on the Arabia Felix Asiatic coast at the S end of the Red Sea. If it is not precisely the biblical Ophir, it is a good counterpart thereof. Fig. EGY 13.

Hat-shepsut suddenly fell from power and disappeared from history. Within a few months, her young relative Thut-mose III (1490-1436 B.C.) set out on a military campaign into Palestine. The implication is clear that the warlike and imperialistic party had succeeded in overthrowing the party of peace and free trade.

Thut-mose III was a man of great military and administrative ability. He devoted seventeen campaigns to Asia, founded an Egyptian empire running up into N Syria, and introduced the military and civil controls to hold the area. His fame dominated Syria for a full century. In Egypt his throne name, Men-kheper-Re, gave magical authority to scarabs for a thousand years.

Thut-mose described his initial campaign into Asia as the punishment of a "rebellion," which is a self-righteous falsehood. He also called himself the "smiter of the rulers of foreign countries [hiku-khasu or Hyksos] who had attacked him." The continuing memory of the disgrace inflicted upon Egypt by the Hyksos was a powerful motive in the setting up of empire and the thrusting of Egypt's frontier back from Sinai to N Syria.

This "rebellion" of May, 1468 B.C., consisted of a coalition of 330 princes of Palestine and Syria, "each one of them having his own army." As the princes were rulers of little city-states, the entire confederacy need not have been very large. The presiding Asiatic leader was the prince of Kadesh on the Orontes. From the S had come such towns as Gezer, Joppa, Aijalon, and Beeroth; from the Plain of Sharon came Aphek and Soco; from the N seacoast of Palestine there were Acco and Achshaph; from the Valley of Jezreel appeared Megiddo, Dothan, and Beth-shan; from Transjordan there were Ashtaroth and Edrei; from Galilee appeared Merom and Hazor; and Syria was represented by such important towns as Damascus, Aleppo, and Carchemish. Major Phoenician cities like Tyre and Gebal did not join the coalition, perhaps wishing to maintain their trade with Egypt.

From When Egypt Ruled the East (The University of Chicago Press)

13. Thut-mose III, upper part of statue in the Cairo Museum, from Karnak

The coalition assembled at Megiddo in the Valley of Jezreel, to gain the potential advantage of the shelter of the Carmel range against the advancing Egyptian army. Thut-mose moved with great energy and daring. Perhaps the Asiatic army relied too much upon the protection of the mountain range, because the pharaoh threw his forces successfully through the Megiddo Pass and emerged into the valley without loss. Then both armies encamped for the night. The battle the following day was a quick Egyptian victory. The demoralized Asiatics fled for safety within the walls of Megiddo, while the Egyptian soldiers were occupied in looting the rich tents of the enemy. The city was encircled with a moat and a wall of timbers and was subjected to a seven-month siege. The booty was great: more than two thousand horses, two thousand cattle, and twenty thousand sheep; abundant gold, silver, metal-work, and inlaid furniture. The victory had come just at the time of the Palestinian harvest, so that the Egyptian army was able to reap 450,000 bushels of wheat, "in addition to what was cut as forage by his majesty's army."

In December what was left of the starving enemy inside Megiddo surrendered and sued for pardon. Thut-mose was magnanimous. He stripped them of their possessions, he took away their fine horses and chariots, but he let them return to their homes after taking an oath of fealty to his person. Only as a mark of vassaldom they went home on donkeyback. Never again did a Syrian-Palestinian group of such wide composition unite to confront Egypt.

In the following nineteen years Thut-mose III conducted sixteen more campaigns in Asia. Some of them were mere parades of power, to keep the awe of the pharaoh alive in his new empire. Some involved actual fighting against Kadesh on the Orontes or the state of MITANNI in upper Mesopotamia. On the eighth campaign Thut-mose enjoyed the diversion of an elephant hunt in the marshes of Syria, and the herd was reported as numbering 120.

The newly won Egyptian territory was organized with resident garrisons, Egyptian high commissioners, and a courier service. The Mediterranean ports were seized and equipped for Egyptian use. The cedar groves of Lebanon were made an Egyptian preserve. The pharaoh wisely maintained local princes upon their thrones, but took their sons and brothers to be hostages in Egypt. The princelings were brought up at the Egyptian court, until their fathers died and they might succeed to the throne. In this way, with a combination of force and clemency, Thut-mose welded a strong empire, which was remarkably loyal to Egypt for the best part of a century.

Thut-mose III's son, Amen-hotep II (1439-1406 B.C.), demonstrated by two vigorous Syrian campaigns that there would be no lapse of Egyptian control. In the first of these he captured a knightly courier "of the Prince of Naharin, carrying a letter of clay at his throat," in the Plain of Sharon. That international correspondence on cuneiform clay tablets which is so well known from the Tell el-Amarna Letters was already a diplomatic factor in the region. The prince of Naharin or Mitanni may have been inciting the local rulers to rebellion against Egypt. In his second campaign Amen-hotep fought in the general vicinity of Soco. The pharaoh brought back to Egypt nearly 90,000 Asiatic prisoners. Among them were 3,600 'Apiru, which is the Egyptian writing for the term HABIRU in cuneiform. These were differentiated in the list from the settled inhabitants of Palestine-Syria and from the nomadic Bedouins, on the basis of either location or way of life. Thus this controversial group enters into the Egyptian records.

The newly won Asiatic empire made profound differences in Egyptian culture. Now many Egyptians resided abroad in towns of Palestine and Syria, while vast numbers of Asiatics, ranging from hostage princes to captive slave laborers, lived in Egypt. The luxury products and the works of art of Asia were found desirable in Egypt, and trade was active. It was no longer possible to believe that the gods cared only for Egypt, when Egypt so obviously desired to hold other lands. Shrines for gods of the Nile Valley were erected in Asia, but the Egyptians who lived abroad also set up offering steles to such Asiatic deities as Baal and Anath. Within Egypt there were priests of Baal and Ashtoreth. Other facets of Egyptian culture were incised by foreign influence. Literature was invaded by foreign words, such as migdol for a fortress or markabah for a chariot. Very soon parents would be naming their children with Asiatic names, such as Ben-Anath, "Son of Anath," or Pa-Khura, "the Horite."

As wealth flowed into Egypt, ostentation became a mark of cosmopolitan sophistication. Art was profoundly affected: it became livelier, more naturalistic, and softer in line; it became more interested in the immediate activities of life, at the cost of an emphasis on eternal bliss. In art the influences of Crete were stronger than those of Asia or Africa. Temple architecture showed the new imperial ostentation and the new wealth of the temples by an expansion toward the colossal. When Egypt's troubles with Mitanni were resolved, the pharaoh was graciously pleased to take a Mitannian princess as wife. Thus the august Egyptian palace was invaded at the top level; it had already been peopled at the lower level with slaves in the kitchen and weaving rooms. As the empire Egyptianized Asia to a marked degree, so also was Egypt Asiaticized.

Three generations of such triumph, power, and wealth brought the imperial magnificence of Amenhotep III (1398-1361 B.C.), who saw Egypt's efforts crowned with apparently unassailable success. Syria and Palestine silently accepted the Egyptian peace; their vassal status had the compensations of orderly prosperity. Phoenicia and Crete were devoted to their commercial ties with Egypt. Mitanni, which was fading as a power, was in peaceful alliance with Egypt. The Hittites, Babylonians, and Assyrians were not yet ready to challenge Egypt in Syria; their kings exchanged royal gifts with the pharaoh. Amenhotep and the commoner Tiy, whom he had made his chief queen, contented themselves with careless enjoyment of the fruits of conquest.

d. Amarna period (1375-1300 B.C.). An Egyptian peace imposed by conquest and administration had its obvious advantages, both to the Egyptians and to their Asiatic subjects. Equally obvious to those subjects were the possible rewards of independence. The period of international correspondence mirrored in the letters found at TELL EL-AMARNA opened with a few signs of dissatisfaction in the Asiatic empire. Even though each Syrian prince wrote to the pharaoh in a spirit of slavish devotion, he might take the opportunity to advise his liege lord that some other prince was acting treacherously. The prince of Gebal humbly fell "seven times and seven times beneath the feet of the king, my lord," and begged the pharaoh to stop the territorial aggrandizement of the prince of Amurru, who at the same time was writing to protest his doglike loyalty. When the Egyptian capital ignored these accusations as being local jealousies, the Asiatics who were experimenting in separatism were emboldened to continue.

Egypt was preoccupied with an internal contest for power. In earlier ages there had been no effective line between church and state. The same individual had been a high government official, an important priest, and a commander of the army. Now these different services had become so demanding that they had become professionalized and specialized. The needs of a large and widespread government had enlarged and emphasized the civil service, for which schools now trained boys to be clerks rather than priests. An army stationed abroad for an indefinite time and composed in part of foreign mercenaries required professional officers and soldiers. Further, the temples had changed radically. The national gods were the guarantors of victory; in return they received a lion's share of the booty. In particular, Amon-Re, the god of empire, came to possess huge lands, great bodies of workers, and a rich annual income. Thus three estates divided apart in Egypt and were set into competition. And the pharaoh himself saw the dissipation of his divine authority. There came into being a four-way contest for power, among the pharaoh, the civil service, the army command, and the priesthood.

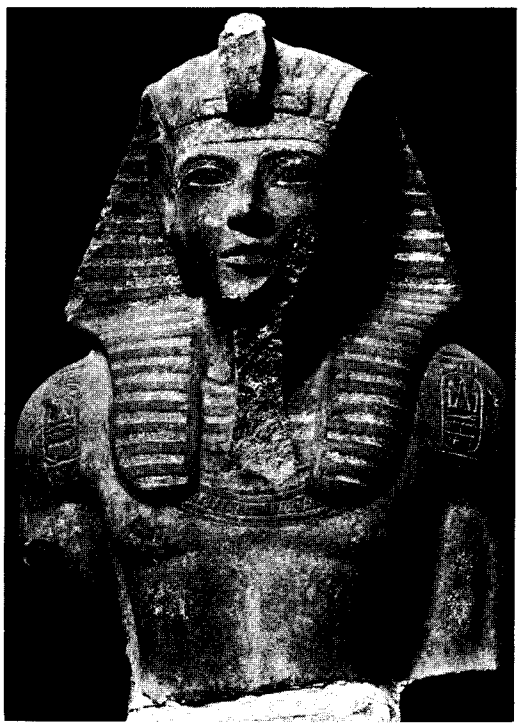
In part it was this contest which precipitated the "Amarna Revolution," headed by the heretic pharaoh, Amen-hotep IV (1369-1353 B.C.), who later changed his name to AKH-EN-ATON.* The new trends in art, architecture, literature, and religion were already working their way into the expression of the state without visible opposition. The new social forces, through the rise of persons previously unknown to position, were necessary to the enlarged state. Foreigners were factors within the state, even in the palace. The daughter of obscure Egyptians had become the honored queen of Amen-hotep III. Even in religion there had already been trends toward a narrowed-down devotion to one god, which sounds essentially monotheistic. The Aton, the life-giving disk of the sun, had been worshiped two generations before Akh-en-Aton's reforms. Of course, new tendencies strain relations between conservatives and liberals, but Egypt had previously been able to compromise and accommodate. Now the pharaoh found himself increasingly the captive of the highest civil servants and the highest priests. To regain his former pre-eminence, he seized upon the new trends as materials for a revolution. Fig. AKH 8.

Since Amen-hotep III appointed his son as coregent, the two kings had a joint reign of perhaps nine years. The formal and open break came while the older king was still living, without apparent objection from him. Indeed, there is evidence that Amen-hotep III and Queen Tiy were in good relation to the revolutionary movement, even though they did not join their son in abandoning the old capital at Thebes. In the sixth year of his reign the younger Amen-hotep gave up the attempt to introduce a new religion in Thebes, which was dominated by the god Amon. The young heretic changed his name from Amen-hotep, "Amon is satisfied," to Akh-en-Aton, probably meaning: "It is well with the Aton." He moved his capital from Thebes to the new site Akhet-Aton, near modern Tell el-Amarna, some two hundred and more miles to the N, and he took a vow never to leave his new garden city. He began a vigorous movement to concentrate worship upon the life-giving power of the sun disk, the Aton, and he sent agents throughout Egypt and the empire to remove the names of gods, particularly the name Amon, from the inscriptions. The revolutionary break had been made. See also § 3 below.

Physically Akh-en-Aton was not strong or well. His ancestors, vigorously setting up empire, had emphasized physical strength, vigor, and endurance. He was not strong enough to follow this precedent, and he resorted to leadership in spiritual, artistic, and intellectual fields. The Amarna art exaggerated the naturalistic trends of the immediate past in sketchy and lively scenes which were almost caricatures of the older serene and poised art. As the pharaoh was long-jawed, sloping-shouldered, and potbellied, so also were his attendants depicted in imitative flattery. In an excess of candor, the formerly cloistered royal palace was opened up to public view, with scenes of the family in affectionate intimacy. Formerly, Egyptian art had been detached from the here and now, in order to achieve timeless and spaceless eternity. But Akh-en-Aton's artists delighted in scenes of the immediate present in the capital city, with a storytelling which was as lively as a Greek vase painting.

In the break with the past, Akh-en-Aton's administrators were new people, who repaid him for their suddenly advanced position by a servile loyalty. The old conservative families who had formerly administered state and temple were cut off from power. Thus there was no diplomatic experience in the problems of foreign affairs. The Asiatic empire went to pieces, and there is evidence that there was internal trouble in the control of the army and the collection of taxes.

The Tell el-Amarna Letters and the Hittite archives tell the story of the disaffection in Palestine and Syria. Not only did Syrian princes try to detach for themselves little states, but a new power, the Hittite Empire, moved out of Anatolia to seize Syrian territory. Those princes who remained loyal to Egypt lost their thrones when the pharaoh ignored their appeals for help. E.g., the prince of Gebal was forced to flee from his town and seek asylum farther S.



The princes in Palestine saw the decomposition of Egyptian power in Syria, and some of them, such as the prince of Shechem, intrigued for personal power, while still writing servile letters to the pharaoh. Mobile invaders, the HABIRU, penetrated the land for their own advantage. The loyal prince of Jerusalem pleaded for only fifty soldiers to hold the land for the pharaoh. The Egyptian capital was too preoccupied to send additional troops. The N part of the empire fell away to the Hittites; the S part was carved up into small independent states.

At Amarna there was trouble. Akh-en-Aton's ailment was apparently progressive. His beautiful queen, Nefert-iti, fell from favor and was exiled to a N suburb. Akh-en-Aton had no sons to aid him in rule. He married his eldest daughter to a youthful favorite, Smenkhkere, and made the young man his coregent. Smenkhkere (1355-1352 B.C.) returned to Thebes, and the worship of the god Amon was resumed. Although Akh-en-Aton would not leave his capital or desert his god, a compromise which was really a surrender was necessary to save his rule.

After Akh-en-Aton's death, Smenkhkere soon disappeared from view. Another son-in-law, Tut-ankh-Aton, changed his name to Tut-ankh-Amon (1352-1344 B.C.),* thus protesting his loyalty to the forces of reaction, abandoned the capital at Tell el-Amarna, and returned devotedly to the older forms in religion and government. He also died while young, and after a brief reign by an elderly relative of the Amarna family, Eye, rule left his family. The commander of the army, Hor-em-heb (1340-1303 B.C.), seized the throne in order to restore law and order to a confused and resentful state. Hor-em-heb vigorously put down rebellion and corruption. Later Egyptian records make him the first legitimate pharaoh after Amen-hotep III, thus expunging the names of the Amarna family from history as heretics. Fig. TOM 69.

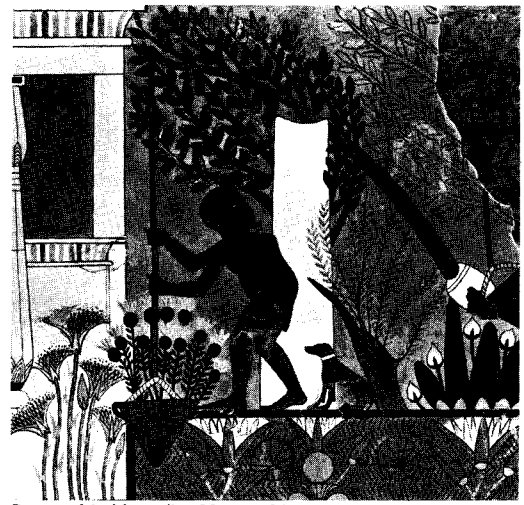
e. Late New Kingdom (1300-1100 B.C.). The Nineteenth Dynasty (1303-1202 B.C.) brought in a new family, with a new political orientation. The names of the Eighteenth Dynasty, Amen-hotep and Thut-mose, showed dedication to Amon of Thebes and to Thoth of Hermopolis in Middle Egypt. The names of the Nineteenth Dynasty, Ramses, Seti, and Mer-ne-Ptah,* expressed devotion to the gods of the N, Re of Heliopolis (On), Seth of the NE Delta and of foreign countries, and Ptah of Memphis.

Courtesy of the Cairo Museum; photo courtesy of the Metropolitan Museum of Art



14. King Mer-ne-Ptah, from Thebes

Within a generation the capital city would be Rameses in the NE Delta; Thebes would become a traditional, seasonal, and religious capital, although it continued to be a provincial seat of government. Egypt's concerns had moved N. Fig. EGY 14.

The military interests and the concern of the army to regain stability are shown by the succession of military pharaohs. General Hor-em-heb was succeeded by Ramses I (1303-1302 B.C.) and his son Seti I (1302-1290 B.C.), both of whom had had army careers. Seti I's determination to restore older glories appears in the term which he applied to the beginning of his reign—the "renaissance."

The reconstruction of the empire was the first concern of the new dynasty. Seti I in his first regnal year campaigned from the Suez frontier to the hills of Galilee, put down an attempt by Palestinian princes to unite, and seized the town of Beth-shan on the Jordan. Subsequently he defeated the 'Apiru or Habiru of Mount Jarmuth near Beth-shan. He realized the importance of good communications and took care to maintain and police the caravan stations across N Sinai. With the land of Canaan again in control, Seti was able to face the major enemy and campaigned against the Hittites in Syria. Perhaps there was no conclusive engagement between the two powers, but the pharaoh was successful in taking Kadesh on the Orontes and setting up a triumphal stele in that town.

Fig. EGY 15.

Courtesy of the Metropolitan Museum of Art

15. Egyptian wall painting showing Apuy's house and garden, from Nineteenth Dynasty, Thebes

At home Seti I's energies were devoted to the continued problem of checking official abuses. At Thebes and Abydos he started major building operations, showing a more restrained taste in art and architecture than his son Ramses II. Fig. EGY 16.

In his fifth regnal year Ramses II (1290-1224 B.C.; see RAMSES 2) fought against the Hittite king Muwatallis at Kadesh on the Orontes.* As allies the Hittites brought such city-states of N Syria as Carchemish, Aleppo, and Ugarit, some of the older peoples of Asia Minor like Arzawa and Kizuwadna, and some of the new Sea Peoples of Asia Minor, such as the Dardanians and the Mysians. As mercenaries on his side Ramses had those Sea Peoples who were later to give their name to the island of Sardinia. The ethnic composition of the battle offers a chapter in the protohistory of the classical world. In the battle the Egyptians suffered an inconclusive setback. By 1270 B.C., Egypt and the Hittites had resolved their difficulties in a treaty of alliance and mutual assistance, and ca. 1257 B.C. the new peace was confirmed by Ramses II's marriage to the daughter of the Hittite king. Although the final thirty-three years of Ramses II's long reign were unmarked by major incident, the Sea Peoples were using the period to increase their aggressive strength against the Hittites and Egypt. Fig. RAM 4.

Ramses II was a great builder within Egypt, and he unscrupulously appropriated the monuments of his predecessors for himself. In the Delta the royal residence city of Rameses (see RAMESES) was named after him, so that serious attention must be given to his claim to be the Pharaoh of the Oppression, as the builder of the store cities of Pithom and Rameses. However, the Egyptian texts present no supporting evidence, specifically upon the enforced toil of the children of Israel or upon a major exodus in the reign of his successor.

Courtesy of Pan American World Airways

16. Statues of Ramses II and columns of the temple at Luxor

Ramses II's long reign produced a swarm of royal princes, many of whom died before their father. His thirteenth son, MER-NE-PTAH, must have been old when he succeeded to the throne (1224-1214 B.C.). His two great problems were keeping alive his hard-pressed Hittite ally with shipments of grain, because the pressure of the Sea Peoples was shaking the prosperity of Anatolia, and of repelling an invasion of Libyans and Sea Peoples at his W frontier in his fifth year. A poem of victory which commemorated this W victory ends with the only mention of Israel in Egyptian literature, and it has therefore been called the "Israel Stele":

> The princes are prostrate, saying: "Mercy!" . . .
> Desolation is for Libya; the Hittites are pacified;
> The Canaan is plundered with every evil;
> Ashkelon is carried off; Gezer is seized upon;
> Yanoam is made as if non-existent;
> Israel is laid waste, he has no offspring;
> The Horite land has become a widow for Egypt!

This is a poetic, nonhistorical outburst. However, it specifically makes the Israelites a people in or near Canaan. The hieroglyphic writing of the word "Israel" is determined with the signs for people rather than place, and this probably shows them to be nomadic or seminomadic, rather than settled. Thus an Israel existed in Asia by 1220 B.C., so that this date must be considered in relation to an exodus and a wandering. There may have been an exodus in the thirteenth century B.C., but the problem of forty years' wandering before the entry into Canaan makes it difficult to regard Mer-ne-Ptah as the pharaoh of the Exodus.

The Nineteenth Dynasty ran out its course with feeble kings succeeding one another rapidly. Then for a brief time, perhaps 1202-1197 B.C., there was an interregnum, in which a Syrian ("Horite") seized the throne of Egypt. Probably he had not invaded the land; perhaps one of the Asiatic chamberlains serving at the palace was able to take over power. E.g., at the court of Mer-ne-Ptah a chief herald had been a Semite named Ben-ozen. The account of this interregnum in a text written a generation later runs: "Afterwards other times came in empty years, and Irsu, a Syrian with them, made himself prince. He set the entire land as tributary before him. One man joined another that their property might not be plundered. They treated the gods like mortals, and no offerings were presented in the temples." There is some doubt about the reading of "Irsu" as a name, and nothing more is known of this episode.

A new dynasty, the Twentieth (1197-1090 B.C.), appeared to "cleanse the great throne of Egypt." Its only important figure was Ramses III (1195-1164 B.C.; see RAMSES 3).* At the end of his reign this pharaoh still held territory in Canaan, for his mortuary testament states that he guaranteed for Amon the nine Palestinian towns which he had given to that god. Within a generation after his death the Asiatic empire collapsed, the Sinai mines were abandoned, and Egypt withdrew into her shell. Fig. RAM 5.

Ramses III lost his life in a conspiracy which originated in his own harem. The court which was constituted to try the plotters was composed of palace officials, among them the Semitic butler Mahar-baal. When the accused of higher ranks were found guilty, they were permitted to take their own lives; the lesser criminals were executed.

In his mortuary testament, Ramses confirmed the Egyptian temples in their holdings. The detailed figures are difficult to relate to the total area and population of Egypt, but it seems possible that the various great temples held no less than ten per cent of the people and twelve per cent of the agricultural land, and that the temple of Amon-Re of Karnak alone owned one person out of every fifteen and one acre out of every ten. The vested power of the temples was certainly extraordinarily high.

The reigns of the later kings of the dynasty—all named Ramses—were weak and brief. There came inflation, famine, strikes by government laborers, plundering by soldiers, and official corruption. A series of tomb robberies began ca. 1225 B.C. and was unchecked for a full generation, resulting in the thorough looting of the royal and noble tombs at Thebes. The dynasty ended with the last of the kings named Ramses a feeble palace prisoner, controlled by the viziers of Upper and Lower Egypt, the high priest of Amon, and the army commander.

f. Postimperial period (1100-700 B.C.). After the empire Egypt never regained her former dominance in the E Mediterranean world. There might be forays into Palestine and Syria, and some of the pharaohs intrigued against the successive powers of Assyria, Babylonia, and Persia, but they never again attained widespread and long control in Asia. In large part this foreign weakness arose from domestic weakness. Egypt kept breaking up into smaller states, either Upper and Lower Egypt as a loosely cooperative duality, or a large number of locally independent states. The empire had manufactured armies of mercenary soldiers. To them were assigned the tasks of conquest and defense, so that there was less pressure upon the native Egyptians to serve the state. In the Delta a strong mercantile interest emphasized local, rather than national, advantage. Upper Egypt (Pathros) was the grain-producing land, and Thebes was a focal point for the nostalgic memory of past grandeur. From the time of Samuel to the fall of the kingdom of Israel, Egypt was normally in a state of divided weakness.

Ca. 1100 B.C. the high priest of Amon at Thebes sent an emissary, Wen-Amon, to Gebal in Phoenicia, to secure cedar for the sacred boat of the god. The document telling of Wen-Amon's misfortunes has no reference to the reigning pharaoh, because he was then of little account. The independent ruler of Tanis (Zoan) found a Syrian ship for the envoy, but appropriated his credentials. In the Palestinian harbor of Dor, then ruled by some of the Sea Peoples, Wen-Amon was robbed of his gold and silver. When he reached Gebal, the local prince brusquely refused to deal with him, except on the basis of prior payment. He brushed aside Wen-Amon's eloquence about the might of Egypt and the god Amon. Finally, after a year of insults and misadventures, Wen-Amon received new payment from Egypt and was given the cedar. This story is a vivid illustration of the low esteem into which Egypt had fallen in that very Phoenician town which had once been the Asiatic center of pro-Egyptian feeling.

The Twenty-first Dynasty (1090-940 B.C.) had two centers of gravity, Tanis and Thebes, working independently but co-operatively. A powerful family at Thebes used the army as a training ground, before young men moved into the high priesthood of Amon and finally onto the throne. The merchant dynasty at Tanis was based upon sea trade across the E Mediterranean. Solomon's Egyptian queen may have been a daughter of this family, and his trading in horses and chariots may well have been with the princes of Tanis.

The rulers at Thebes undertook the pious task of restoring a minimum of order and decency to the thoroughly robbed cemetery of Thebes. The pillaged mummies of the great pharaohs were rewrapped and consigned to a new hiding place. Other than this, the chief records of the dynasty show a marked reliance upon the oracle of a god for guidance. E.g., a rebellion at Thebes was put down, and the leading rebels were exiled to the oasis of Kharga. After some time, the high priest consulted the god Amon as oracle and received an order that the exiles should be allowed to return, that no such banishment should be imposed in the future, but that the punishment for murder should be capital punishment. We do not know just how such an oracle was articulated, but the priest reported it for public action.

The empire had brought Libyan mercenaries into Egypt, and many of them rose to local power in the Delta and the Faiyum, proudly retaining their hereditary title, "Great Prince of the Me" or Meshwesh. Out of such a family located at Herakleopolis (Hines) near the Faiyum came Sheshonk or SHISHAK, founder of the Twenty-second Dynasty (940-745 B.C.) with its capital at Bubastis (Pibeseth) in the Delta.* So little is known of his successors that the period has to be dismissed as weak and unimportant. Egyptology can offer no records to the question whether the thousand soldiers from Musri, who fought against Shalmaneser in 853 B.C. at Karkara in N Syria, were from Egypt or from another Musri. At the period Egyptian troops under the leadership of Hadadezer of Damascus seem unlikely, but of course this small number might have been committed to an opposition against the growing power of Assyria. Figs. SHI 53-54.

The Twenty-third Dynasty was of minor importance, and the Twenty-fourth was confined to a single pharaoh, Bek-en-ranef or Bocchoris (715-709 B.C.). Late tradition credits him with codifying the law of contract for Egypt. This is the earliest Egyptian reference to codified law. Even though older law on papyrus or parchment may have perished, there is still a striking contrast between our knowledge of Mesopotamian or Hebrew law on the one hand and Egyptian law on the other. To a great degree law and judgment in Egypt had been phrased as, first, the divine word of the king, and, later, the divine word of the god's oracle, and not impersonally written law.

g. Ethiopian and Saitic periods (700-525 B.C.). Sometime around the reign of Bocchoris, a new force entered Egyptian history. This was the rise of the Cushite or Ethiopian pharaohs. Their family seat was Napata near the Fourth Cataract, where a modest annual rainfall, African caravan routes, the breeding of cattle and horses, and nearby deposits of iron permitted local power. Their family background was a mixture of Hamitic, Libyan, Negro, and perhaps Egyptian strains. Ca. the middle of the eighth century B.C. they consolidated their power in Cush. They were then ready to move against weak Egypt.

Ca. 720 or 715 B.C. one of these Cushite rulers, Pi-ankhi, had achieved such power that he had some backing in Upper Egypt. An army of his was consolidating his holdings S of Thebes. Pi-ankhi learned that a prince of Lower Egypt was also enlarging his territory, had taken the W Delta, and was operating in Middle Egypt. Pi-ankhi then personally took the field against the Egyptians, captured a series of cities in Middle Egypt, and finally broke the back of resistance by taking Memphis. Sixteen N rulers were forced to submit and take an oath of allegiance to Pi-ankhi. Egypt had fallen under the power of the Ethiopians, even though a weakened local rule went on for a few years.

The inscription of Pi-ankhi is interesting as showing how a non-Egyptian was more devoutly Egyptian than the native rulers whom he conquered. He ordered his army to be properly pious in the holy city of Thebes, he himself participated in a Theban festival, and he made a pilgrimage to the shrine of the sun-god at Heliopolis (On). When the Egyptian rulers came to make submission to Pi-ankhi, three kings were not permitted to enter because "they were eaters of fish, which is an abomination to the palace"; only one might come in to surrender for all, "because he was pure and did not eat fish."

Before returning to the Fourth Cataract, Pi-ankhi achieved the double purpose of demonstrating his devotion to the Theban god Amon and of leaving a reliable agent in Egypt. At Thebes a woman had become the most powerful servant of the god, under the title "divine votaress of Amon." The existing votaress was the daughter of a Twenty-third Dynasty pharaoh. Pi-ankhi forced this princess to adopt his sister as her daughter and successor. Thus she was well placed to serve Ethiopian interests in Egypt, when the pharaoh was absent at his Fourth Cataract capital.

Now came the pressure upon Palestine and then upon Egypt from a succession of imperial conquerors —Assyrians, Babylonians, Macedonians, and Romans. Only occasionally did Egypt commit major military forces to the field; rather, she preferred to resort to diplomatic intrigue by inciting the little rulers of Palestine-Syria to resist the invaders. For the Twenty-fifth or Ethiopian Dynasty (ca. 710-663 B.C.), we know little about the reigns of the first two kings (but see So). On the third pharaoh, see TIRHAKAH. In the reign of this Cushite pharaoh there was a formal Egyptianizing of temples in the region of the Third and Fourth Cataracts. Architects, artists, and temple gardeners were imported from Egypt itself, and the pharaoh even persuaded princesses of Lower Egypt to serve as priestesses in temples a thousand miles to the S. It is possible that the temple rituals of Egypt were as scrupulously observed in Cush as at home. At one and the same time Egypt was changing under foreign influences and was attempting to resist change by new formalism—sacerdotal emphasis on ritual, cults of sacred animals, reliance upon oracles, and syncretism of gods. Cush was less exposed to outside influence, and there in the S some of the older forms of the religion may have survived with greater vigor.

Meanwhile, foreign powers which were more united and more ambitious than Egypt were moving toward the domination of that land. The Assyrian conquerors were consolidating their position in Syria-Palestine before the attack upon Egypt across the difficult Sinai desert. TIGLATH-PILESER operated chiefly in Syria but penetrated as far S as Gaza. Sargon II (see SARGON 2) took Samaria, overthrew the kingdom of Israel, and defeated the Egyptians at Raphia. SENNACHERIB captured cities of Judah and besieged the Jerusalem of Hezekiah. His general assured the people of that city that their reliance upon the pharaoh of Egypt was a trust in a "broken reed," which could only injure him who leaned upon it (Isa. 36:6). Sennacherib defeated the Egyptian forces at Eltekeh in S Palestine in 700 B.C. It may have been in 688 that the Assyrian king moved up to Pelusium on the Egyptian frontier, where his successful advance was cut short by plague (Isa. 37:36). It was reserved for ESARHADDON in 671 B.C. to penetrate Egypt, capture Memphis, and send Tirhakah in flight to the S. The Ethiopian claim to the rule of all Egypt was denied; many small Delta dynasts were confirmed in their local rule, but as Assyrian vassals. Somewhat later Tirhakah's nephew Tanut-Amon (664-653 B.C.) came out of Cush, recaptured Memphis, and briefly defied the Assyrians. He was no match for ASHURBANIPAL, who not only won back Memphis but marched as far S as Thebes and subdued that mighty city. Thereafter the Ethiopians remained in their distant S province.

Esarhaddon had recognized certain small princes of Lower Egypt as legitimate rulers of city-states. Among them was a family at Saïs in the W central Delta. A later member of this family, Psamtik or Psammetichus I (663-609 B.C.), took advantage of the loose Assyrian sponsorship to enlarge his power and claim the rule of all Egypt. The Twenty-sixth Dynasty (663-525 B.C.) is also called the Saitic period, the Renaissance, or the Restoration, by modern scholars. A trend had already started in the preceding century, to study the past glories of Egypt and to attempt to reproduce them. Art reverted to the expressions of the Old and Middle Kingdoms; entire scenes were copied from ancient tombs to adorn the walls of contemporary tombs; old monuments were excavated, restored, and imitated; the classical literature was studied, with a conscientious attempt to reproduce it in form and spirit; and officials were clothed with a series of ancient and now meaningless titles. Where, toward the beginning, this archaism had the excitement of rediscovery and the hope of spiritual encouragement, it produced works of vigor and charm. Later it became sterile, as the ritualistic search for a past glory in an age that had little inner glory.

Another marked feature of the Saitic period was the strong influence of foreigners in Egypt. The commercial interest of the dynasty was strong. The Phoenician merchants were welcomed in the Delta. Clusters of political exiles from Asia were granted asylum in Egypt. In the old Egyptian cities sections were designated for Greek merchants and artisans, and in the W Delta an entire market city, Naucratis, was assigned to the Greeks. Furthermore, the power of this dynasty was maintained by foreign mercenaries. Around the person of the pharaoh himself these were Greeks—Ionian and Carian Greeks, for the most part. The loyalty of the native Egyptians to an upstart rule had become doubtful; the purchased support of foreign professional soldiers seemed to provide a solid base. This reliance upon foreign mercenaries continued throughout the dynasty, despite a mutiny and attempted desertion of the Greeks under Hophra.

At Thebes, always haughtily restless, the Saites continued the Ethiopian policy, and in 654 B.C. forced the divine votaress of Amon to adopt the daughter of Psammetichus I and thus secured a Saitic agent in the southland.

A revival of Egypt's ancient glory involved also a military effort to extend the state. Shortly after 600 B.C. the Greek mercenaries were sent S to the Second Cataract on a conquering expedition. But it was particularly in Asia that the dynasty attempted to regain power. According to Herodotus, Psammetichus I invaded Palestine and laid siege to Ashdod. His successor was even more vigorous (see NECO), campaigning ambitiously in Palestine and Syria, and by tradition was industrious in attempts to improve Egypt's waterways and sea trade. Neco's decisive defeat by the crown prince of Babylonia, Nebuchadrezzar, at Carchemish in 605 B.C., for a time quieted Egypt's ambitions in Asia. However, a generation later HOPHRA tried to stir up Judah in revolt against Babylon and thus was a major factor toward the fall of Jerusalem and the Babylonian captivity. The dynasty finally entered an internecine family struggle for power and laid Egypt open to the Persian conquest.

h. Persian, Ptolemaic, and Roman periods (525 B.C.–A.D. 70). The century following the collapse of the mighty Assyrian Empire and the fall of Nineveh was a period of readjustment. At first it seemed that Babylon might regain its ancient dominance through the vigor of Nebuchadrezzar, but the abrupt emergence of a new force, the Persians under Cyrus, shifted the center of power eastward. In 525 B.C., Egypt fell like an overripe fruit into the hands of the Persians under Cambyses; there is good evidence that the conqueror had Egyptian collaborators. Egyptian tradition insists that Cambyses was brutal and impious. Since he was a conquering invader, he himself may have been very rigorous, but his successors preferred to cultivate Egypt as a valued Persian satrapy. Darius I (522-486 B.C.) did his best to appear to the Egyptians as a legitimate pharaoh. Tradition says that he was cordial to the native priests; certainly he was responsible for the building of at least one new temple. Between the Nile and the Gulf of Suez he completed the canal which had been of interest to Pharaoh Neco; along its line in the Wadi Tumilat he erected five steles inscribed in cuneiform and hieroglyphic. Under his reign we first hear of the Jewish colony at the First Cataract (see ELEPHANTINE PAPYRI). Since this colony had existed before the time of Cambyses, it probably had been founded as a frontier garrison in the Twenty-sixth Dynasty. The Saites had not only had Greek mercenaries; there had also been Asiatics, including Jews.

Egypt was not grateful to the Persians for a mild policy. The death of Darius was the signal for a revolt, which Xerxes I put down with severity. But meanwhile the Greeks at Marathon and Salamis were demonstrating that, when the Persian armies reached the end of their long communication lines, they could be defeated, so that rebelliousness became a normal Egyptian attitude. Persian rule was effective from 525 to 404 B.C., then there came three brief native dynasties based on the Delta, and then Persian domination reasserted itself in 341 B.C. Of the Egyptian rulers only Nectanebo I (379-361) and Nectanebo II (359-341) were strong enough to weld Egypt into some temporary unity and to engage in large building enterprises. The Persian period is one of brief flashes of energy, with long stretches of smoldering inertia.

Two explosive forces burst upon the ancient oriental world—Hellenism as a culture of vigorous ideas, and the military genius Alexander of Macedon, who promoted this culture by his success on the field of battle. After Alexander the Great had defeated Darius III of Persia at Issus in Cilicia in 333 B.C., he decided to build a strong Western empire before advancing E against the Persian bases. Stubborn Tyre had to be subdued to secure the E Mediterranean, and then Alexander moved on Egypt. That country had been so blindly hostile to Persia that it welcomed a deliverer. The Persian satrap surrendered immediately, the Macedonian army entered Memphis, and Alexander paid his respects to the Egyptian gods in the autumn of 332 B.C. Then marching NW to the Mediterranean coast, he founded a new city, named Alexandria after himself. No important Egyptian city had ever been on the coast before, nor had ancient Egypt ever had so large and so cosmopolitan a metropolis. With great daring, Alexander marched through the formidable W desert to the oasis of Siwah to consult the oracle of the god Ammon. He was saluted as the god's son, and from this time forward he based his actions on the belief that he had a divine mission in life. The Egyptian concept that their king was a god (see PHARAOH) deeply affected the mystical young warrior.

From Egypt, Alexander set out to conquer the world, penetrating into India. When he died in 323 B.C., his half-brother and his still unborn son were the obvious heirs. The real power, however, lay in the control of Alexander's senior generals, even though they at first gave nominal service to the heirs. One of the generals, Ptolemy, son of Lagus, ruled Egypt as satrap. When in 306 B.C. the succession finally became an issue, the empire was carved up, Cassander taking Macedonia and the NW, Seleucus taking Syria and the E, with a capital at Antioch, and Ptolemy taking Egypt and the SW. When Alexander's son died, Ptolemy I Soter emerged fully as pharaoh of Egypt and founder of the Ptolemaic Dynasty (305-30 B.C.).

The dynasty began with the devoted attention of the new rulers to the interests of Egypt. They gave respectful attention to the old Egyptian religion, and there was extensive building of new temples throughout the land. Alexandria became a famous center of intellectual life and a vigorous commercial city. The traditional political organization into provinces was retained for most of Egypt, but three cities, Alexandria and Naucratis in the Delta and Ptolemaïs in Upper Egypt, were granted self-government on the pattern of the Greek polis. The Ptolemies energetically promoted the agricultural productivity of Egypt, with new canals in the Delta and extensive land reclamation in the Faiyum. Even though the dynasty was foreign in origin, it presented a contrast to previous conquering regimes by living in Egypt and making efforts to appear natively devoted to that land.

The latter part of the Ptolemaic Dynasty, from ca. 220 B.C. on, showed a decided weakening in power and in character, through family feuds for the rule, through unwise military enterprises into the territory claimed by the Seleucids, through an attempt to secure the support of powerful Rome, and through sheer frivolity.

Under Ptolemy I (305-285 B.C.) there was set up in Alexandria a museum, a temple of the Muses, for study in the arts and sciences, with privileged resident scholars and an ambitious program for the acquisition of MSS. The great library of Alexandria came to accumulate half a million scrolls. Within this inviting intellectual climate, Alexandria became the exciting center for old and new ideas of the civilized world. The cataloguing of MSS and textual criticism were initiated; science, particularly geometry and astronomy, received great impetus. The research museum and the library reached an early height and were not maintained with the same enthusiasm. Then it was Caesar, for the glory of Rome, who began the looting of the MS treasures.

When finally in the seventh century A.D. the Muslim invaders entered Alexandria, there was only a withered stalk of the once magnificent plant left for their zealous burning. Meanwhile, despite this withering, the first Ptolemy had made Alexandria a capital for ideas and discussion, and so it remained for nearly a thousand years. Fig. PTO 74.

The new rulers were not content to hold Egypt alone, and Ptolemy III Euergetes I (246-221 B.C.) conquered land which was also claimed by the Seleucids in Palestine and Syria, thus initiating seventy years of struggle with the kings at Antioch.* Antiochus III (the Great) began to take back the Asiatic territory which Egypt had seized. Although the weak Ptolemy IV Philopator defeated Antiochus at Raphia in 217 B.C.,* Egypt was unable to reap advantage from this victory. Philopator mismanaged both the Egyptian economy and his relations with the native Egyptians, so that his power at home was weakened by local revolts, particularly at Thebes. The Seleucids of Antioch were consistently at the attack; the Ptolemies of Alexandria dissipated their energies by bitter family quarrels. When Egypt then summoned to her support the new Western power, Rome, she sacrificed some of her independence and increasingly became a client of Rome. In 170 B.C., Antiochus IV actually invaded Egypt and ruled there for two years, until Rome demanded his withdrawal. Shortly after this the Seleucids tried to control the high priesthood at Jerusalem, with the result that Onias IV fled to Egypt, was received by Ptolemy VI Philometor, and was permitted to build a Jewish temple at Leontopolis in the S Delta. Figs. PTO 71, 72, 74.

The sordid story of the family feuds and futile weaknesses of the later Ptolemies need not be told. The power of Rome became increasingly felt in Egypt. Finally a century of political intrigues produced one last member of the family who was able to use great diplomatic genius to try to preserve the independence of her land, Cleopatra. Her methods may have been devious and ignobly direct, but her patriotic purpose remained steadfast—the preservation of Egypt's sovereignty. First Caesar came to Egypt in 48 B.C.; from 41 B.C. on, it was Antony who dallied in Alexandria, while plotting his return to Rome. With each of them she pursued her single-minded goal. Yet she was no match for imperial Rome, and after the defeat of Antony and Cleopatra at Actium, she took her own life in 30 B.C., rather than become a vassal. Egypt became a vassal state for many centuries.

The Roman rule of Egypt was oppressive. The land had a reputation for rebelliousness, but, as one of the chief sources of grain to feed the empire, Egypt had to be kept in order. Augustus did not grant the customary pattern for Roman provinces, under which there was some local dignity although the Roman Senate made the essential decisions, but he initiated a tight control under the personal supervision of the emperor. The large force of three legions was garrisoned on the land, and Augustus not only had the appointment of the prefect but even exercised a veto control over senators' visits to Egypt. A very efficient government was introduced, and it was honest, but it had only an official and demanding relation to the Egyptians. Taxes were heavy, and, since the collection of taxes was farmed out, they became oppressively heavy upon the little man. A cold and rigorous system bled Egypt white. Roman taxation and the military control over their once proud spirits changed the Egyptians' outlook on life. As the weight of this world became too burdensome, they turned to the hope of another and better world. When Christian evangelists worked in Egypt in the second century A.D., they found a ready audience.

3. Religion. Ancient Egyptian religion was a polytheism, which, in the course of three thousand years, showed a high complexity. Certain generalities persisted throughout this long course, but no simple analysis will do justice to the changes appearing in the process of time.

The world of the ancient orientals was thoroughly saturated with the presence of the gods, so that every phenomenon and every process in man's life could be attributed to the agency of gods. There was no separation of life into the religious and the secular, with the partial exception of administrative and business life after the state became highly complex ca. 1500 B.C. There was no acceptance of natural law, with its impersonal chain of cause and effect, so that any phenomenon could be traced back to natural causes, but whatever happened was attributed to the agency of the gods. Since it was possible to deify a human being, to see the divine in plant or animal or forces of nature, and to personify qualities such as "truth" or "command" or "fate," the gods were indefinitely many and their agency widespread. Therefore, science could not work out a detached explanation of what occurred in climate or weather, plant and animal life, astronomy, or medicine. History was deeply concerned with its present generation, and had only an annalistic interest in the past. Not only were the gods always present and always ready to intervene in life; Egypt had its own national gods to apply themselves to the various aspects of life, and particularly one resident god, the king of Egypt, whose divine function was to apply his powers to the advantage of his land. One might fairly say that, for the really important phases of life, the miraculous was more real to the ancient Egyptian than the natural.

After the appearance of any phenomenon or after any event, the Egyptians would relate this to the activity of their gods by myth. Over the course of centuries such myths were elaborated to a high complexity. From our modern point of view they might seem to be self-contradictory, since everything was possible to the gods, so that different explanations of the same phenomenon were not to be questioned by mere man; they simply enlarged the range of the gods' powers by demonstrating a wide range of possibilities. E.g., the creation story was told in several different ways about a single god; it was even told to the glory of different gods in different terms. This variety of explanations of a single process was not felt to be inconsistent; rather, it strengthened the concept by making it broadly characteristic of divinity: creation is a continuing power of any great god, and the creative process is to be confidently accepted from any great god.

A religious state, which fervently believed that the gods might intervene at any time, never fully admitted that there was any distinction between the sacred and the secular, particularly when the head of the state was a god. In earlier Egypt there was no distinction between a priest and a layman—the high official, by virtue of his service to the state, was civil administrator, army commander, and priest of the temple. Art and literature were deeply rooted in religion. Only when the exacting demands of a large and complex state after 1500 B.C. made professionalism necessary, do we find full-time priests and full-time civil servants. Even then the dogma of a theocratic state and the myth-making mentality of the Egyptian refused to admit that there was or could be any final division between religious and secular.

The Egyptians lived in houses of mud brick on the fertile alluvial soil. Over the millenniums the slow accumulation of deposit has obliterated most of the evidence of the private life. However, the desert was always near at hand for the stone structures of eternal life—i.e., the temples and the tombs. The result is that we have a disproportionate amount of evidence surviving from this preservative setting in the desert. We are relatively well informed on official religion, as shown in the great state temples, and on mortuary religion, as shown in the tombs. It is more difficult to reach certainty on the correspondence of the state's official religion to the personal beliefs and private devotions of individuals and on the correspondence of life as shown in the tomb scenes and texts to the daily life of persons. The analysis of ancient Egyptian religion inevitably suffers from this incompleteness of survival.

a. Older official religion. For modern understanding, three types of ancient Egyptian gods may be identified. (a) There were divinities of place, such as Ptah of Memphis, Khnum of the First Cataract region, or the crocodile god Sobek of the Faiyum. (b) There were cosmic deities, such as Nut, goddess of the sky; Geb, the earth-god; Re, the sun-god; and eight divinities of pre-creation chaos. (c) There were gods responsible for some function or aspect of life, such as Ma'at, goddess of truth and justice, Bes, god of the household and childbirth, and Sekhmet, goddess of war and disease. By historical times these three categories appear as thoroughly blended, so that Thoth was god of Hermopolis, moon-god, and god of wisdom; Hat-Hor was goddess of Dendereh, sky-goddess, and goddess of love. Throughout Egyptian history and apparently back into prehistory, there was a process of syncretism, whereby recognition of similarity permitted blending. Various falcon gods all came to be Horus,* and similarity of status or purpose permitted mergers, such as Amon-Re or Atum Re-Har-akhti. Fig. FAL 1.

The gods of place have been called totems. This is valid, provided the term does not involve blood-relationship of the people of a community with their totem god. A single being—human form, animal, bird, serpent, tree, crossed arrows, scepter, etc.—was the divine force for a city or region and a totem in this sense. However, there never was any claim that the people of Siut were blood-brothers of the wolf-god Up-wawet of Siut, so that all wolves had to be sacred in that area. Rather, the god Up-wawet might function or make his appearance in a single wolf. Frequently a single animal or other symbol was maintained in a temple for such use of a god. Until Greco-Roman times there was no animal-worship in ancient Egypt, with a universal devotion to a sacred bull or other being. Before that time, only the one dedicated animal in the temple was sacred.

This regional god seems to have been African in origin and relationships. Such totemistic representation of a people or community can be seen in modern African survivals. In Asia the same psychology toward a god was not marked. The reverence for a single force as the divine promoter of a region led easily into the Egyptian concept that their king was a god, a belief which again has its reflection among African tribes, but which was intermittent and incomplete in Asia.

The cosmic gods were more clearly paralleled in

Courtesy of the Trustees of the British Museum

17. The sky-goddess Nut arched like the heavens, supported by the air-god Shu, while at Nut's feet is the earth-god Geb; from a papyrus at Deir el-Bahri

Asia, as were the cosmic myths, such as the creation myth or the myth of the destruction of mankind by an angry god. The theological system of Heliopolis had in itself a progressive myth of the creation of the universe. The god Atum, whose name means "the All," took his place upon a little mound of earth rising out of the waters of chaos and brought the elements of the cosmos into being. Just so, new life rises annually out of the flood waters of the Nile. Atum's own two children were Shu, god of air, and Tefnut, goddess of moisture. These two in turn produced Geb, the earth-god, and Nut,* the sky-goddess —the firmament below and the firmament above. Geb and Nut brought forth the pair Osiris and Isis* and the pair Seth and Nephthys. Osiris and his sister-wife, Isis, came to be the forces of life or regeneration, and Seth the force which destroyed life. The Ennead or "nine" gods just listed were treated as a corporation of supreme gods, most specifically in the theology of Heliopolis, but also generally in Egypt. The successive separations of phenomena in this myth show a broad general similarity to the creation story of Genesis. Figs. EGY 17-18.

Courtesy of the Trustees of the British Museum

18. Isis protecting Osiris with her wings

Another important myth lay in the Osiris saga, which showed many variations. If we select certain components from these versions, Osiris had been a ruler in this world: his brother Seth killed him by trickery. Seth then took over the rule of Osiris. Isis,* the sister-wife of Osiris, succeeded in reclaiming her husband's body and in giving it some measure of revival by her magic. Osiris, the ruler who had died but who lived on in death, thus became the ruler of the dead, and kings of Egypt at death became Osiris, to continue their rule in another realm. Isis also retreated into hiding in the marshes and there brought forth her son, Horus, who tried to avenge his father, Osiris, by combatting his uncle Seth for earthly rule. Ultimately Horus won this contest and became a principle of kingship; every king of Egypt while living was Horus.* Seth became a god of storm, of the desert, and of foreign lands. Figs. ISI 16; FAL 1.

Courtesy of the Metropolitan Museum of Art; gift of Edward S. Harkness, 1926

19. Statuette of the god Amon in the precinct of the Great Temple of Amon at Karnak

The supple generosity of Egyptian mythology can be seen in the problem of defining the supreme god. Several deities were addressed as "father of the gods." Atum, as a creator, had clear title to priority. Re, the sun-god, was also dominant. Har-akhti, or Horus triumphant upon the horizon, was a victorious and ruling god. By the Eleventh Dynasty the god of a new capital city, Thebes, emerged as Amon* and was soon united with Re as Amon-Re, the imperial god. Such a merger of aspects of power produced Atum Re-Har-akhti, a composition of ruling forces. This syncretistic tendency was not monotheism; gods might blend for combinations of power, but were also distinct in specific function, as a spectrum is one but the colors are many. Fig. EGY 19.

Of the many other gods who might be listed, perhaps the most important was Ptah, earth-god, creator-god in his own independent myth, and patron of arts and crafts. His shrine was at Memphis, and, when this became a capital in the First Dynasty, Ptah's power rivaled that of Re at Heliopolis across the river.

From the beginning the king of Egypt was a god, the divine principle of rule upon earth. The earliest inscriptions call him Horus. At first perhaps only he was assured of happy eternal life, because he was a god. It is clear that lesser persons had some sort of continued life after death, because their graves were equipped with offerings for their maintenance, but this may have been shadowy and restricted, as it was with the Semites. However, the king was a god who did not die but who continued to rule in the next existence; he would therefore need his court and his officials and his servants over there. Thus his need of them could offer them eternal life in his service, in the same status they had achieved in life. From the First Dynasty we know of burials of kings, princesses, and nobles, where personal servants, with their tools of service, were buried at the same time as the master. This grisly custom soon died out in Egypt, although the juxtaposition of king's pyramid and nobles' tombs continued for several centuries. Through much of the Old Kingdom the mastaba tombs of the royalty and nobility clung closely to the pyramid of the king, asserting the retainers' hope of happy immortality through immediate relation to the ruler. Throughout Egyptian history the mortuary texts continued to assert that a proper burial was an "offering which the king gives," even though the individual himself might have undertaken the entire responsibility. Beginning in the Fifth Dynasty, there was a decentralizing tendency, and nobles began to seek their burials and their eternal happiness in their home districts. Although this shows that the former dependence upon the divine king was no longer necessary for immortality, the dogma continued to insist on devoted service to the ruler.

The Egyptian interest in life after death bulks large in our view, because their elaborate tombs have been preserved for us. Yet there was no morbid fear of death; on the contrary, there was a triumphant assertion of continued life. Tomb texts are almost arrogantly confident; tomb scenes are full of richness, gaiety, and even humor. From our first view ca. 3000 B.C. down to 1200 B.C., the prevailing psychology was: we Egyptians lead a full, abundant, and cherished life, and the gods will continue this richness after death. Only in the late period, after Egypt's glory had been threatened and life had become restricted, did the mortuary religion strike a more somber note, with paradise a release from this world or a reward for conformance and patience in this world.

The Egyptian faith that an abundant life might be eternal and that the future world reproduced the rich and rewarding aspects of this life offers a contrast to the dim and uncertain future life of the Babylonians and the Hebrews. The reason for this contrast is not clear, but must arise from security and assurance of good in Egypt. Usually the land was secure from major threat of invasion, and the normal Egyptian expectation was for warmth, adequate food, and a life with a small encouragement for man to better his status among men. To be sure, such a statement applies to kings and nobles, because the peasants and the slaves were inarticulate as far as we are concerned; they must have endured burdensome toil, with little prospect of release. But even the peasant on Egypt's rich fields could contrast himself favorably with the neighboring nomads, who had to seek a meager existence in the deserts or marginal lands. Even the peasant could feel that the gods had singularly blessed the Egyptians beyond other peoples and thus hope that his service to his master might be the means of gaining service in a future life and thus of denying obliteration through death.

The centrality of the god-king in the earlier Old Kingdom and the emphasis on his agency in procuring eternal happiness brought forth the pyramid age, in which the supreme energies of the state were concentrated on giving the ruler the mightiest and most enduring tomb possible. In a strictly productive sense, this work of building a monumental tomb was bad economy for the state. In a religious sense, the triumphant denial of death through an assertive and everlasting structure nourished the Egyptian's confidence in himself and in the destiny which the gods had wrought for him. This confidence contributed to Egypt's dominance in her early world.

The visible absolutism of earliest Egypt rests on the dogma that the king was a god. In contrast to Mesopotamia and the Hebrews, there could be no impersonal, written, and codified law, because the spoken word of the god-king was always available and always final. At first, rule was centered in the palace, the royal princes served as the highest ministers, and other members of the king's family filled as many offices as possible. From the Third Dynasty forward the bureaucracy was constructed and enlarged. The king's absolutism was diluted by the use of high officials who did not carry the divine blood and who had to exert personal authority at a distance from the palace. They continued to assure the king that their every act was in his divine service, but their authority continued to increase throughout the course of the later Old Kingdom, so that there was a progressive decentralization and a weakening of the effectiveness of the king.

From the beginning the king had been the god Horus. The Fifth Dynasty opened with a marked shift of emphasis. The king now became the "son of Re," from this time forward practically all the royal names which proclaimed the purposes of rule were constructed with the name of the sun-god Re, and sun-temples of Re were built near the royal pyramid and of relatively large size. Clearly the independence of the king had been limited by forcing upon him filial devotion to the sun-god. The priesthood at Heliopolis (On) must have emerged into political power, just as a millennium later the priesthood of Amon at Thebes was to become commandingly powerful.

Apart from the mortuary religion, we know little about temples and priests in the Old and Middle Kingdoms. Temples must have been modest, relative to the mighty structures which would appear in the New Kingdom. The priesthood was not yet a full-time service but was staffed from the high personnel of the state, nobles and officials, in conformance with the principle that a sacred state made no distinction between the secular and the ecclesiastical. Many of these lay priests served in rotating shifts.

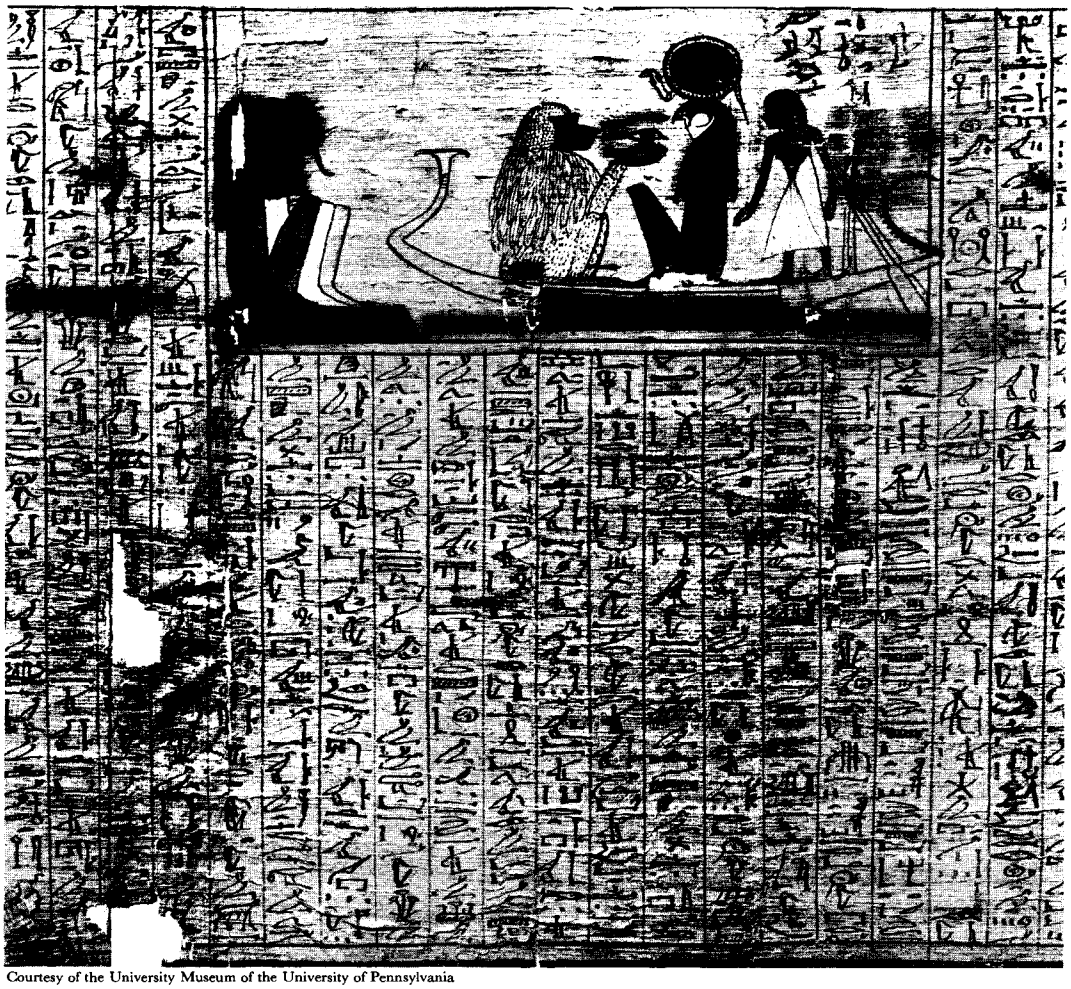
Great resources of the state were, of course, employed to build the king's pyramid tomb and to give him mortuary service in perpetuity. The same diversion of resources and of time was available for the nobles. A man might live his life in house of mud brick, but his eternal home was a mastaba of stone, massively organized to last forever. Further, his survival depended in large measure upon eternal service on his behalf. Thus, as an "offering which the King gives," fields were set apart to provide income for goods and services. Barley and flax from these fields might be made into bread, beer, and linen for offering at the tomb, or they might be used to purchase other mortuary offerings and to secure the perpetual services of funerary priests, who would make these offerings and who would offer prayers for the dead. Such goods and services were in addition to the furnishings placed in the tomb at the time of burial and in addition to the elaborate funeral ceremony. The setting aside of large resources for the maintenance of the dead, carried on over several centuries, very seriously ate into the economy of Egypt. As long as the state was stable and prosperous, Egyptians could afford to pay this high price for the supreme boon of eternal life. In any period of breakdown, this disproportionate economy would become intolerable and would be swept aside to the advantage of the living.

Within the royal pyramids of the Fifth and Sixth Dynasties lengthy texts were inscribed, to promote and ensure the triumphant immortality of the god-king. These Pyramid Texts include a ritual for making offerings, magical charms to advance the king or to protect him from peril, hymns and prayers on his behalf, and fragments of mythology to identify him more securely with the other gods. Much of this was already very ancient, here written in permanent form for the first time. Every means was taken to guarantee the deceased king's welfare, from making him a humble servant of the sun-god to making him the ruthless conqueror of the world of the gods. The Pyramid Texts are a rich, if confusing, source of information on the royal mortuary beliefs and practices in the Old Kingdom.



A state in which the absolutism of the king was gradually diluted, which finally disintegrated into the feudal separatism and chaos of the first intermediate period, could not maintain the separate glory of the god-king. Already in the Old Kingdom the nobles had appropriated for themselves some of the funerary ceremonies of the kings; in the first intermediate period they seized also upon the Pyramid Texts, thereby making themselves gods after death. As this process was defined, each dead Egyptian might become the god Osiris, who had himself survived death. The Old Kingdom Pyramid Texts became the Middle Kingdom Coffin Texts, inscribed inside the wooden coffins of nobles and ladies. The New Kingdom versions of such texts were written on papyrus and are called the Book of the Dead.* This was no book in the sense of our Bible. Not only did each of these three stages present variants on old texts and completely new texts, but it is rare to find two MSS which have the same selection of "chapters" in the same reading. Out of the available religious and magical sources the priests selected and re-edited texts which they thought appropriate. Figs. EGY 20; WEI 13.

The opening up of divine immortality to Egyptian nobles has been called a democratization of the next world. Such a term has to be understood in the ancient Egyptian setting, without any modern concept of universal democracy. The nobles and high officials were affected, and this, in a society which had no fixed castes, might be theoretically universal. In practice the good man was the high-placed and highly regarded man, who alone could afford to purchase the elaborate services of mortuary religion. For the peasant and the slave, eternity was probably uncertain and dependent upon his master's need of him in the next world.

Parallel to the extension of paradise after the collapse of the Old Kingdom, there was a tendency toward wider good, both in the understanding of what is most highly regarded by the gods and in the extension of good to a wider number of persons. The formerly assumed values of position, wealth, and a heavy investment in the tomb and its services had broken down in the disorder of the first intermediate period. The kingship was divided among rival claimants and was no longer distinct from ordinary humanity. Rich had become poor, and poor had become rich. In the doubt and frustration of a time of disorder and social change, man looked for new answers to some of his old problems. There were despair and cynicism, there was an encouragement to mere earthly pleasure while ignoring the next world, and there was the longing for a saving messiah. One important answer lay in a search for social justice.

Throughout Egyptian history a word of highest quality was ma'at, which may be translated as "right" or "order" or "conformity," as "truth," as "justice," or sometimes as "righteousness." The Egyptian had no word which meant directly morally "good." Ma'at was the quality which man had to render to the king and which the king had to render to the gods. Sometimes this was simply the orderly seasons of the sun, moon, and inundation; sometimes it was the arbitrary order imposed by a centralized government; sometimes it was truth or veracity in speech. It was also just administration, and one epithet of the vizier was the "high priest of ma'at."

When the prosperous order of the Old Kingdom went to ruins, the Egyptians sought for new values, and for ca. two hundred years they defined ma'at as social justice, the right of every man to the good things of life. Rich and poor alike had god-given rights to the use of the flood waters. The king had a weighty obligation to be sleeplessly vigilant on behalf of all his subjects. The poorest peasant had an innate right to impartial justice from the administrator. There were even a few brief claims that all men—i.e., all Egyptians—were equal in the sight of the creator god. The Middle Kingdom was a time of local sovereignty on the part of nobles, and the kings of the land found it to their advantage to combat this separatism by conscientious efforts toward the well-being of all Egyptians. The portraits of the period show the lines of this sense of duty engraved upon the faces of the king. This demand upon man for a life of social concern for his fellow man was reflected in the mortuary religion. Now the deceased had to stand before the gods, with the deeds of his life piled up as legal exhibits. If there was an excess of good, he would be admitted to eternal happiness.

Courtesy of the University Museum of the University of Pennsylvania

20. Egyptian papyrus; a section of the "Book of the Dead"

It would be pleasing to assert that this change from material good to moral good was a gain which Egypt cherished and defended. But this insistence at the beginning of the Middle Kingdom that all men had equal rights and that the highest value was a life morally adjusted to men and gods was no longer firmly stated after the state again became prosperous. The conscientiousness of the kings had brought back wealth, power, and security. Worldly success as a recognized good came back again into the texts; concern for the little man faded; and magic and religion united to assure the orthodox worshiper that obedient conformity would win favor from the gods, including eternal life. Individual conscience was not so important as regularity within the system. To be sure, the gains were not entirely lost; the deceased continued to stand before the god Osiris and to deny in detail wrongdoing in his life. Ma'at, although essentially obedient acceptance of the system, continued to have a moral tone. But, after the early Middle Kingdom, later ages did not so clearly demand from man simple piety to the gods and humanity to fellow men.

In part, the retreat from equalitarianism and social justice was a product of the second intermediate period, when Egypt was invaded by Asiatics, the Hyksos. Even after the Hyksos had been expelled and the New Kingdom set up, there was a sense of political insecurity; after 1700 B.C. there was always some threat to Egyptian sovereignty from foreigners. Under this sense of peril, the state could easily be organized in an authoritarian tone, with power and privilege concentrated in the hands of the ruling few. This ruling few included the more powerful priesthoods.

The Old Kingdom capital had been at Memphis in the pyramid area at the N. The Middle Kingdom rule had come from Thebes in the S. A god at Thebes was Amon, the "hidden one," an unseen and ever-present force. As Amon-Re he became the supreme national god and ultimately the imperial god. Important enterprises were started only after a favorable oracle from the god. Then, when the enterprise was successful, the god reaped his reward from a grateful king. Temples became larger, and priests became more prominent.

This process reached its climax in the New Kingdom, when Egyptian armies marched forth to conquer the world, under the sanction of the gods, returned with abundant booty, and thankfully enriched the temples with captive slaves and spoils. Then the priesthood became a full-time activity, and from 1400 B.C. on, the temples became colossal structures.

The three great priesthoods of the land came to be those of Re at Heliopolis (On), of Ptah at Memphis, and of Amon-Re at Thebes. In particular the high priest of Amon-Re of Karnak (Thebes) was a powerful official, with strong family ties into the civil bureaucracy, and a rival to the king in power. By 1200 B.C. the various temples of Egypt owned at least one eighth of the arable land and possibly as much as one tenth of the population, and the temple of Amon-Re held much more than half of this tremendous possession. In addition to the booty which came to Amon-Re as the result of his blessing foreign conquest, the god was a major beneficiary from the gold mines of Nubia, and the pharaoh made the god generous annual gifts.

In the Middle Kingdom the temple of Amon-Re at Karnak had been of modest dimensions. The great conquering pharaohs of the New Kingdom started it on its colossal career, until it became the soaring, sprawling complex which can be seen today. Thousands of serfs and captive slaves worked its great estates scattered throughout the land. In the late New Kingdom we read much more about the oracle of Amon-Re and how his divine sanction was necessary for every major activity of the state. Naturally this increase in wealth and power loomed as a threat to the kingship.

With the New Kingdom empire, two other rivals to the pharaoh appeared. The empire tried to hold lands as far S as the Fourth Cataract and as far N as the Euphrates River. Egypt became the prosperous focus of the world. The bureaucracy was enlarged and consolidated, and this civil service interlocked thoroughly with the priesthood for generation after generation, contributing the ruling personnel for Egypt from a few major families. The army could no longer be formed by a seasonal draft of civilians, since garrisons were now located in distant lands. The army became a standing force, and the commander of the army became a professional, who wielded the strongest police force of Egypt and thus could assume political power. The pharaoh, the priesthood, the civil service, and the army became overlapping rivals for the control of Egypt. In a time of great wealth and of imperial dominance the rewards of control were great.

b. Amarna reformation and reaction. Within a sacred state the tensions which have just been indicated were contributing forces toward a major break with the past, the so-called Amarna revolution. Among several other factors, the struggle for power was undoubtedly a cause of cleavage. The pharaoh, who in dogma was still the absolute god, saw his authority invaded by rival powers. The break was sharpest and most bitter between the heretic pharaoh AKH-EN-ATON and the older religion, particularly the priesthood of Amon. The civil service, which derived from the same families as the priesthood, stood on the conservative side with the older religion. The new force, the army, saw its advantage with the king.

However, the origins of the Amarna reformation are varied. So much has been written about the originality of the new movement, particularly its religion, that it must be stressed that all its elements were present in Egypt in some form before the time of the heretic king. This does not deny originality in the fresh ardor with which these elements were expressed. Politically the Amarna revolution was a reaction to recapture the former centrality of the king. In this vigorous combat, the exciting expressions in art and religion were not inventions but new assertions of already existing influences.

The far-flung empire was a century old. In art the excitation of the empire had already broken down the old rigidities, based upon the unemotional search for eternal life, and introduced a warm interest in the here and now, with more naturalism and a more flexible line for the human image. Some foreign influence is certain here, although the expression of Egypt's conquering vigor is an adequate explanation of the change. In language the old classical speech was already dead in everyday usage. It was only necessary to accept the currently spoken language as appropriate for purposes of the state and of religion. This was in line with Akh-en-Aton's emphasis on ma'at, which here was "truth" in the sense of naturalism or candor.

Akh-en-Aton's religion expressed the devotion to a single god, the Aton or sun-disk, as a life-giving power. The pharaoh referred to the Aton as the "sole god, like whom there is no other." This god was not restricted to Egypt, but was the universal nourisher of all mankind and all life everywhere, the creator and the sustainer. In this commitment to one god and in the violent break with the old religion, Akh-en-Aton had his followers hack out of the old inscriptions the name of the god Amon, frequently the names of other gods, and often the words "the gods" or "all the gods." For the king there was but one god. Fig. AKH 9.

Many of the elements of this new faith were old. Sun-worship in Egypt had existed from the beginnings. A worship of the Aton specifically as a god was two generations older than Akh-en-Aton. Syncretism, whereby two or more divine forces could be merged into one, was centuries old. Hymns addressing a deity as the "sole god," with both a flattering emphasis and an exclusive surrender on the part of the worshiper, had appeared centuries earlier. Universalism was a product of the century-old empire: when the Egyptians marched out to conquer and hold a larger world, they could no longer think of their gods as functional for Egypt alone, but they had to concede that the gods cherished other peoples also. Temples to Egyptian gods were built in Asia; such Semitic deities as Baal and Ashtoreth were worshiped in Egypt. It was only necessary for Akhen-Aton to bring together some of these existing factors and to give them such emphasis that they seem to have been changed.

It is also clear that Akh-en-Aton made his break, changed his name, and moved his capital, while his father and coregent, Amen-hotep III, was still living. As far as we can see, the older king remained at Thebes and continued to serve the older system, including its polytheism. This is certainly a qualification to the violence of the break.

Thus ca. 1375 B.C. a young pharaoh changed his name from Amen-hotep (IV) to Akh-en-Aton, thus officially breaking with Amonism and embracing Atonism, moved his personal capital from Thebes to TELL EL-AMARNA, took a vow never to leave this new site or desert his new god, and gave himself up to new adventures in religion, art, literature, social organization, and town-planning. The temples of Amon and of other gods were bereft of annual royal gifts and of tribute from abroad; it is not clear whether the young king's fervor closed them completely, although this is to be inferred from his hacking gods' names out of inscriptions. The old governing families of the civil service and the priesthood were dropped, and administration was turned over to new persons, ardent followers of the new faith. Thus the heretic king tried to break the vested power of the old gods, who had become so great that they were remote from the people. In particular, he disavowed the god Amon, the "hidden one" in a mighty temple, and he worshiped the candid sun-disk out in the open air. This was ma'at or truth. Politically Akh-en-Aton reasserted his exclusive right to rule, over against the forces which had encroached upon this right.

Akh-en-Aton's beautiful hymn to the Aton gives the essence of the new faith. For all the world there was but one god, creator and sustainer of life, a god who cherished Egyptians and foreigners, plants and animals. Nighttime, when the sun-disk was absent, was like the "manner of death"; when the sun-disk arose again in the morning, all life rejoiced. The similarity of this hymn to the 104th psalm in thought and structure is very marked, even though it is impossible to assume a direct connection between the Egyptian and the Hebrew. Yet it must be stressed that Atonism was a fervent nature-worship and made no demand upon the worshiper beyond loving gratitude. There was little ethical content in the new faith. Atonism thus stands in striking contrast to Hebrew monotheism, with the latter's categorical demands upon man for an upright life.

Two gods were worshiped at Amarna. Akh-en-Aton and his queen, Nefert-iti, gave their sole adoration to the Aton. All of Akh-en-Aton's followers worshiped him as god-king. He became their soul source of good in this life, and, since the older mortuary gods had been eliminated, he was their sole reliance for good after death. It is true that there was a father-son relationship between the Aton and Akh-en-Aton, so that they might both be considered parts of the same godhead. But it must be emphasized that lesser people at Amarna did not practice Atonism; they only reverted to that fervent devotion to the god-king which had characterized Egypt in the earlier Old Kingdom. Atonism was certainly a very qualified monotheism.

Because Akh-en-Aton's exclusive adoration of one god was earlier than the monotheism ascribed to Moses, Atonistic monotheism has been claimed as the inspiration of the Hebrew faith. After all, Moses was educated as an Egyptian. This is a difficult problem, but a direct lineage seems almost impossible. The specific teaching of Atonism was on the high level of the pharaoh at the new capital in Middle Egypt. Even though we cannot date Moses precisely, the means whereby such a teaching could be transmitted are not clear. One assumes that Moses was at least a century later, after Atonism had long been proscribed as heretical, and was located hundreds of miles away to the N. Further, there is a real truth to the story that Moses fled from Egypt, discovered the true God in the wilderness, and returned to liberate his people from Egypt and all that was Egyptian. The new Hebrew faith was anti-Egyptian, and it was a cardinal principle that the Israelite God had defeated the pharaoh and pharaoh's reliance upon Egyptian gods. Disconnection, rather than connection, is clearly indicated.

If it is true that the factors of the Amarna faith had been present in Egypt before the time of Akh-en-Aton, it is also true that some of them persisted after his time: universalism and the tendency to simplify divinity down to a single god of adoration, humble gratitude, and a father-son relationship between god and man. When worship of the Aton became heresy, these factors, which had been present in Egypt with relation to other gods, were not cast out. Thus, if one desires to find connection between Mosaic religion and Egyptian religion, such ideas may have been current in N Egypt or in Egyptian temples in Asia at the time of Moses. However, it is also true that any cast of thought or expression borrowed from Egypt was thoroughly made over for the children of Israel, making an independent religion based on independent experience.

The Amarna revolution started with high enthusiasm, as an exciting assertion in all phases of life. It came to a tragic and dishonored end. Akh-en-Aton was a physical weakling and may have had an ailment which was progressively serious, while the whole movement depended upon his personal leadership. Since the troubles in the Asiatic empire were of little concern to the pharaoh, the Asiatic holdings fell away to the Hittites or to local princes. Within Egypt the loyalty of the provinces was probably withheld from the capital, so that taxes may have been in default. Compromise or surrender became inevitable. Akh-en-Aton took as his coregent a young son-in-law, Smenkhkere, and permitted this new king to return to Thebes, where he paid some homage to Amon. Akh-en-Aton was able to remain true to his vow never to leave Amarna. Time was running out, and ca. 1350 B.C. both Akh-en-Aton and Smenkhkere disappeared from the scene. Whether there was violence we do not know, but there is some evidence that burial had to be hasty and then was endangered by the enemies of the revolution.

A second son-in-law, Tut-ankh-Aton, made the full surrender. He made a formal disavowal of the Aton by changing his name to Tut-ankh-Amon, returned to Thebes, and paid the price of the victorious older gods by "doubling, tripling, and quadrupling" the property of the temples. There were brief reigns by Tut-ankh-Amon and Eye, an elderly member of the family, and then Hor-em-heb, a general of the army, took over the throne to restore order and confidence. The conservative forces had won, and Atonism became heresy. Later tradition dropped out the reigns of the four members of the Amarna family as illegitimate and pretended that General Hor-em-heb had succeeded Akhenaton's father, Amen-hotep III.

Egypt was never again the same. The old cohesive sense of high destiny and common purpose could not be recaptured. Sporadically the same struggle for power recurred among the same four contestants—the pharaoh, the priesthood, the civil service, and the army—and there were a few individual pharaohs of high ability; but, generally speaking, the pharaoh could not recapture his supreme authority. Increasingly he became the figurehead of the state and the captive of custom. The army wielded striking power and was more often the victor in the struggle than the priests or the bureaucrats. Out of army command emerged the Nineteenth, Twenty-first, and Twenty-second Dynasties.

It has been stated above that Atonism became heresy, but that aspects of the expression of the religion did continue. In other areas also, the Amarna break with the past had lasting effects. Art retained some of the lithe naturalism of the new movement and continued to tell specific stories about actual occurrences. Language and literature remained closer to reality, with writing permitted to use current forms and literature somewhat more secular. In religion itself, there were even some later hymns which have been called monotheistic, because god under several different names was addressed in the singular, as if various deities were all functional forms of a single god. Such hymns are monotheistic if the definition of this term is elastic enough to include them.

The powerful old gods who had withstood rebellion—Amon, Re, and Ptah—were now entrenched by victory. Their temples became larger, their estates became richer, and their priests became more powerful. This must have created new cleavages in the state. Like high officials, high gods were too busy to be bothered with small affairs. Only the powerful could seek out the powerful, so that ordinary men must have been cut off from access to the great gods. They would have to seek out gods who, like themselves, were not mighty and successful. This division of great and small gods and this clinging of little men to little gods were clear features of the later times.

c. Religion in late times. For two centuries the late New Kingdom tried to recapture an empire and reclaim Egypt's former glories and dominations. In the end it was unsuccessful. One might say that the gods of Egypt were too busy running their vast estates to take the field of battle. Or one might say that the gods of the Hittites and of the Sea Peoples were active in opposition. It is clear that the forces against Egypt were greater than before and that Egypt's answer was less the unison of religious patriotism and more the employment of paid professionals and foreign mercenaries. Egypt put up a bold front. Temples continued to be colossal and were inscribed with boastful claims of triumphant conquest and wide domination. Egyptian temples were erected in the African and Asiatic empires. Yet it was a losing struggle, and ca. 1150 B.C., Egypt withdrew from empire.

About the same time a succession of weak pharaohs began. They were unable to stem a tide of corruption in the Egyptian government and became the palace captives of the high officials and priests. Desperately hard times came upon the land. The proud spirit withered, and national ambition gave way to individual ambition.

After 1100 B.C., Egypt could not compete equally with Assyria or Babylonia or Persia or Macedonia or Rome as a world power. Internally she was normally divided, with mercantile states in the N and agricultural states in the S. When she temporarily achieved some semblance of union or dared to try for foreign conquest, it was with the help of hired mercenaries or with the backing of foreign powers. The former arrogant confidence and the old encouragement to individual or group initiative were gone. Increasingly the Egyptian became introspective and cautious; it was safer to cling blindly to careful conformance to ritual and regulation.

As early as the Nineteenth Dynasty a change appeared in the scenes of the nobles' tombs. In place of a vigorous and lusty emphasis upon the abundant things of this life, which would be richly extended into the next life, the scenes showed the mortuary services and charted the perils of the passage into the other world. The statement was no longer: this is a good life, and it will last forever. Now the emphasis had become: life itself is restricted, and the passage to the hereafter is not easy; only a rigorous conformance to the practices of the mortuary religion can win for man a continued life. The joy of living had disappeared, and it followed that the future itself had some uncertainty.

Personal religion also showed this new sobriety. Formerly a father had encouraged his son to a life of vigorous activity: be alert and well trained, and you will get ahead; the smart man can seize for himself the rewards of this world. Now abruptly the emphasis had become resignation to one's lot in life: entrust yourself to the arms of the god; he alone can remedy your woes and reward you for submissiveness. There was little room for individual initiative. The deities Fate and Fortune had become powerfully controlling. The good man was no longer the "knowing one"; he was now the "silent one."

This humble piety appeared particularly in two types of documents: dedicatory tablets set up by relatively modest people and the instructions which a father gave to his son. For the first time the Egyptian was aware of a sense of sin—not the ritualistic denial of wrongdoing, but a contrite admission of error. Little steles carried the confession that an individual had committed wrong and that the god had punished him; the god was right and just in this chastisement, and now the worshiper prayed to his god for mercy and healing. Success was for the god alone; man without god was doomed to failure. The normal state of man alone could only be wrongdoing, but the normal state of the god was to be merciful and to rescue man. This humble piety and the faith that the god was a punishing but loving father were, of course, most marked among poor people, but they were characteristic of the age, and even a high-placed official was at pains to insist that he was "truly silent"—i.e., humbly submissive.

The new obedience can be seen most clearly in a papyrus which gave the advice of the agricultural official Amen-em-Opet to his son. This must be dated after the tenth century B.C., possibly three centuries later. The essence of this instruction was that the "heated man" who strives for his own advantage is doomed to destruction, whereas the "silent man" is like a fruit tree growing in a garden. It is wrong to strive for riches and success; "poverty in the hand of the god is better than riches in a storehouse." He who is submissive upon earth will receive his reward in a contented hereafter: "How happy is he who reaches the next world, when he is safe in the hand of the god!" Sections of this text are extraordinarily like passages in the Hebrew book of Proverbs, and there is little doubt that the instruction of Amen-em-Opet is the original for Prov. 22:17–24:22.

If man might no longer be encouraged to individual initiative, religion offered him a sense of community in disciplined tasks. There were new emphases on exact ritual practice, on magic, and on oracles. There was now emerging that Egypt which Herodotus saw, when he described the Egyptians as the most religious of people because they were so scrupulous about specific ritual practices, such as ceremonial cleanliness. Formerly such temple symbols as the sacred animal had been simply one out of several means given to a god so that he might make his appearance. Now the sacred animal became the center of an elaborate cult, so detailed and so devoted that one may now speak of animal-worship. A sacred bull had formal processions and a costly expenditure for his divine burial. Cats and apes and crocodiles were mummified to maintain the sacred body. Cats came to dominate the city of Bubastis, where a cat-goddess had her temple, and dead apes and ibises were sent long distances to be given a reverent burial at Hermopolis. This was a shift from the former belief that a god may be ever present as he wishes and that man needs only a few focal points for the god's activity to the belief that the symbol provided for the god's presence was the god himself.

Egypt had always had recourse to magic, but magical texts and apparatus began to increase in the late New Kingdom. Thereafter the paraphernalia for the magical securing of advantage and warding off of evil became even more abundant. A man could purchase a papyrus or an elaborately carved image to protect himself from the bite of a snake or a scorpion, or he could seek out a magician who would chant an incantation over waxen images to place a hex on a man's enemies.

There was also an added emphasis upon guidance by the oracle of a god. When the sacred statue was carried in procession, a man might halt the god and place a yes-or-no question in the presence of witnesses; he expected to be answered by a visible sign from the god. The state itself posed to the god formal questions about the succession to the throne, the pardoning of political exiles, or even the ownership of a well. It was entirely consistent with Egyptian beliefs that Alexander the Great made a dangerous pilgrimage through the W desert to consult the oracle of Ammon at the oasis of Siwah.

Because of this ritualistic piety there was a dual process at work. The political capitals of Egypt moved easily to new cities for temporal or commercial advantage, but some of the older cities increased in sacred importance as seats of a god who might give oracular direction. Such a holy city was Thebes in the S. In late times the political capital was normally in the N, but Thebes was the home of the revered god Amon. The people of Thebes felt their importance, and the city became a focus of a resentfully rebellious spirit. The pharaohs had to control this separatism by placing a reliable agent in Thebes. A sister or daughter of the reigning pharaoh would be appointed the divine votaress of Amon, would speak on behalf of the king and also the god, and thus become the effective ruler of the Theban area.

The syncretistic process which had always had play in Egypt also received continued emphasis, so that it was possible to see identifications of different gods with one another. In contrast to the rigidity of ritual performance, there was a broad flexibility of divine being. The priests of Egypt might be solemnly mysterious about what they did, but they were eagerly accommodating in explaining the broad interests of their gods. Thus it was easy for the Greeks to identify Amon with their Zeus, Thoth with their Hermes, or Hat-Hor with their Aphrodite. Further, the new introspectiveness and the new emphasis upon ritual performance without any explanation for the reasons for performance meant that Egyptian religion became a "mystery," and thus it had its exotic and inexplicable appeal to Greeks and Romans as something which might have mystic power simply because it was strange.

To apply the term "fossilization" to Egyptian religion of late times may be too harsh. The nature of divine being continued to be flexible, sometimes appearing to be wildly polytheistic and sometimes convergently monotheistic. Egypt continued to be hospitable to deities and worshipers from other religions. E.g., Jewish soldiers at Elephantine might have their synagogue, or political exiles from Jerusalem might build a temple to Yahweh at Leontopolis in the Delta. However, a thousand years of political impotence and domination by foreigners did dry up Egyptian spiritual strength. Emphasis shifted from faith to works.

The Egyptians were going through hieratic gestures to avoid making personal decisions themselves and in the hope that the gods would direct destiny in every respect. Life no longer had its surplus of riches at home or from abroad or its clear sense of superiority over other peoples. When finally Roman taxation was so extreme as to set a penalty upon abundance within Egypt itself, the final attachment to the old faith was broken. Then Christianity entered with the message that the next world would be a release from and a reward for the acceptance of privation in this world, and the Egyptians went over to Christianity with ardor.

4. Egyptology. Biblical studies, ancient history, and field archaeology have been separate parts of a larger whole. The techniques of excavation and of the analysis of pottery were transferred from Egypt to Palestine ca. 1890, and Egyptology for a long time profited from a central curiosity about Egypt in the biblical account. It is appropriate, therefore, to give a brief statement about the standards, achievements, and shortcomings of Egyptology.

The study of ancient Egypt proceeds from history or the analysis of texts and from archaeology or the analysis of physical materials. Despite the persistence of the Coptic language in the liturgy of the Egyptian Christian church, the earlier stages of the Egyptian language and the understanding of the hieroglyphic, hieratic, and demotic writings had been lost to knowledge after the introduction of Christianity into the land. Hieroglyphic two centuries ago was assumed to be an involved, occult writing. There was little interest in field excavation before Schliemann's dramatic results at Troy. Before the nineteenth century, the Bible and the classical writings contributed all that we knew about ancient Egypt.

When Napoleon Bonaparte led a military expedition to Egypt in 1798, he brought with him a staff of historians and scientists. Their observations and recordings reopened an interest in ancient Egypt. Among the discoveries was the Rosetta Stone, containing the same text in Greek and in two Egyptian writings. This was to prove the critical element in Champollion's decipherment of hieroglyphic in 1822. Meanwhile, the opening up of Egypt to Western enterprise greatly enriched public and private museums in Europe with the products of Egyptian art and literature. In the first half of the nineteenth century industrious copying expeditions brought back to Europe a wealth of scenes and texts for scholarship to study. The materials were available so that Egypt might begin to tell her own independent story. As yet there was only looting rather than excavation, philology was only in its undisciplined infancy, and history was written chiefly in biblical and classical terms.

In 1850 a Frenchman, Auguste Mariette, began in Egypt a recorded series of clearances of major monuments and became the dominant figure in the land for thirty years, thus setting a pattern of Western control of Egyptian antiquities which lasted many decades. In the psychology of the time, the work continued to be interested in show pieces and in biblical connections, rather than in an Egyptian process itself.

In the 1880's three figures appeared who changed the study of ancient Egypt to a discipline of higher standards. The young Frenchman, Gaston Maspero, came to direct the antiquities service for a full generation. He was a historian of genius and was able to use the native Egyptian source materials to full advantage. A young German, Adolf Erman, brought order and recognized rules to the study of the ancient Egyptian language in its various periods. A young Englishman, Flinders Petrie, revolutionized field archaeology, not only for Egypt but also for Palestine and Mesopotamia, by his insistence upon respect for every bit of the excavated evidence and upon accurate recording and publication. Petrie made a neglected material, ordinary pottery, the critically decisive factor for excavations which were defective in inscriptions. Archaeology thus could become a science of respected standards. Petrie continued over an extraordinary career to excavate many of the richest sites in Egypt, Sinai, and Palestine. No other single figure has so richly contributed to our knowledge of the physical remains from Egypt or the sequence of cultures.

An inevitable result of the abundance of new material and new insights was that the focus of interest shifted from Egypt's connections with the Hebrews, the Greeks, and the Romans to the process of Egyptian culture in itself. Work in Egypt had produced regrettably little evidence to answer very specific questions about biblical relations. It is true that in recent years the balance has shifted a little: now excavations in Palestine or Phoenicia produce a good measure of evidence upon Egyptian influence abroad.

Ca. the beginning of the twentieth century Americans entered the scene and contributed two notable figures. George A. Reisner of Harvard advanced Petrie's techniques to new standards of precision and excavated with great success in the Sudan and in the pyramid area. James H. Breasted of the University of Chicago became America's most widely recognized ancient historian and produced books on Egyptian texts, history, and religion which still carry great weight.

It is impossible to claim that the ancient Egyptian language is as well known as Hebrew or Greek. Nor does excavation produce the same detailed analysis in a larger setting that it can achieve in Greek or Roman archaeology. Egyptology, however, has reached a firm understanding of careful methodology, has blocked in with success most of the succeeding ages of Egyptian history, and is now able to present a consistent and significant story.

Bibliography. J. H. Breasted, A History of Egypt (1905); Development of Religion and Thought in Ancient Egypt (1912). Cambridge Ancient History, vols. I–IX (1923-32). S. R. K. Glanville, ed., The Legacy of Egypt (1942). H. Frankfort, Ancient Egyptian Religion (1948). H. Frankfort et al., The Intellectual Adventure of Ancient Man, which was abridged by Penguin Books as Before Philosophy (1949). J. A. Wilson, The Burden of Egypt (1951), which is in a paperback ed., The Culture of Ancient Egypt. J. Černý, Ancient Egyptian Religion (1952). J. B. Pritchard, ed., ANEP (1954); ANET (2nd ed., 1955). G. Steindorff and K. C. Seele, When Egypt Ruled the East (2nd ed., 1957).

J. A. WILSON

EGYPT, BROOK OF [נחל מצרים; in Ezek. 47:19; 48:28 נחל]; KJV RIVER or STREAM (Isa. 27:12) OF EGYPT. A stream marking the traditional SW boundary of Canaan (Num. 34:5; I Kings 8:65; II Kings 24:7; II Chr. 7:8; Isa. 27:12; Ezek. 47:19; 48:28) and of the tribe of Judah (Josh. 15:4, 47). It is paired with the "entrance of Hamath" (see HAMATH, ENTRANCE OF) as the other terminus, except in Isa. 27:12, where the N boundary is the Euphrates.

The Brook of Egypt is identified with the Wadi el-'Arish, which has its origin in the middle of the Sinai Peninsula and flows into the Mediterranean midway between Gaza and Pelusium. During the rainy season it is a rushing stream, into which the waters of numerous tributaries drain in its course to the sea; but in summer it dwindles to a dry bed. The Arabic name is derived from the village el-'Arish, located near its mouth.

In other passages the S boundary of the ideal territory of Israel is the "river of Egypt" (Gen. 15:18; cf. Jth. 1:9; see EGYPT, RIVER OF), the SHIHOR (Josh. 13:3; I Chr. 13:5), or the Brook of the Arabah (Amos 6:14; see ARABAH, BROOK OF). Some or all of these may possibly be designations for the Wadi el-'Arish.

The Assyrian records of Sargon I and Sennacherib refer several times to the Brook of Egypt (naḥal [mat]Muṣri), once with the added remark "and there is no river," evidently to distinguish it from the Nile (ANET 286, 290, 292).

Bibliography. E. H. Palmer, The Desert of the Exodus (1872), p. 233; A. Musil, Arabia Petraea (1907), vol. II, pt. 1, pp. 229 ff; A. Alt, ZDPV, LXVII (1945), 130 ff. J. L. MIHELIC

EGYPT, RIVER OF. 1. נהר מצרים. The S boundary of the territory promised to Abram's descendants in Gen. 15:18. Since the word נהר means a "large river," the reference must be to the Nile, but some would emend to נחל, "brook" (see EGYPT, BROOK OF). The phrase is used also in Jth. 1:9.

2. KJV form of "brook of Egypt." See EGYPT, BROOK OF. J. L. MIHELIC

EGYPTIAN, THE ē jĭp'shən [ὁ Αἰγύπτιος] (Acts 21:38). A person with whom Paul is said to have been mistakenly identified. The reference raises two questions: (a) Who was he? (b) What is Luke's intent in introducing the reference to him?

Since Luke nowhere else mentions the Egyptian, Luke's reply to the first question is simply that (a) he did not speak Greek, and was therefore an uncivilized barbarian, and that (b) as leader of the ASSYRIANS he had "recently" led four thousand of them in rebellion out into the desert. He is described from the standpoint of the tribune—namely, as a barbarian rebel, a disturber of the peace on the edge of the Empire. That a religious element was thought to be involved in this revolt may be implicit in the word "assassins"; in the motif of the desert, where it was commonly supposed the Messiah would appear; and analogously in the fact that Paul was involved in a religious dispute, although Luke does not make this explicit.

Interestingly enough, Josephus mentions an Egyptian, strikingly similar and likewise unnamed, in both War II.xiii.3-5 and Antiq. XX.viii.6 (written fifteen years later). In War II.xiii.3 the assassins (sicarii) are described as dagger men running wild in Jerusalem, murdering whom they will, even Jonathan the high priest. However, they are not associated with the desert. Then in II.xiii.4 "another body" of "more wicked" men laid waste the city. They pretended to divine inspiration and induced the multitudes to follow them into the wilderness, "pretending that God would there show them the signals of liberty." But Felix, anticipating a revolt, sent horsemen and footmen, "who destroyed a great number of them."

In War II.xiii.5 follows the Egyptian, described as a false prophet and as the most mischievous of all, "for he was a cheat, and pretended to be a prophet also." He led thirty thousand men from the wilderness to the Mount of Olives, hoping to enter Jerusalem by force, overwhelm the Roman garrison, and subdue the people. Again, Felix took the initiative and with his Roman soldiers assisted by the people, put the Egyptian to flight, destroyed or took alive most of the rest, and dispersed the others into hiding.

In describing the same events in Antiq. XX.viii, Josephus describes the same rebels as robbers, impostors, and deceivers; he does not here use the word "assassins." Contrary to War II.xiii.3-4, here it is the dagger men who persuaded the multitude to follow them into the wilderness to behold signs and wonders. Here, Felix "brought them back, and then punished them." In the Antiquities the man from Egypt came to Jerusalem. Nothing is said about the wilderness. Rather, he persuaded the "multitude of the common people" to go with him to the Mount of Olives. There he promised to show them how at his command the walls of Jerusalem would fall down and they could enter the city unhindered. Again, Felix came "with a great number of horsemen and footmen." He killed four hundred of them and took two hundred alive. "But the Egyptian himself escaped."

The three accounts, the brief statement of Acts 21:38 and the two longer ones of Josephus, obviously refer to the same Egyptian and at least to the same sort of event. All three mention the dagger men, either in connection with the Egyptian or in the context, the wilderness motif, and the revolt. And all affirm or imply that the Egyptian escaped. Yet the details vary greatly and cannot be harmonized. If Luke's four thousand cannot be harmonized with either the thirty thousand of the War or the four hundred killed and two hundred captured according to the Antiquities, neither can Josephus' two sets of numbers be made to fit each other. The four hundred or two hundred of the Antiquities are scarcely appropriate to the statement in the War to the effect that Felix destroyed or took alive most of the thirty thousand. In any case, all such numbers are likely to be fictitious. Luke's estimate of four thousand (one hundred times forty) may be meant simply to indicate a very large number.

The accounts in Josephus—and, indeed, historical probability—seem to require that the Egyptian be a Jew or at least a proselyte. Otherwise how could a non-Jew have led a Jewish rebellion? Critical as Josephus was of the rebellion, he can hardly have intended to suggest that the Jews stooped to uncovenanted leadership to win their liberty. Yet Paul's reply (Acts 21:39): "I am a Jew," seems to imply that the Egyptian was not.

Further, Josephus' description of the Egyptian as a prophet-pretender, as claiming to be an instrument of God to overthrow Rome, seems appropriate only to a Jew. And if the wilderness-assassins-Mount of Olives motifs do not have messianic connotations, they surely do have religious-political ones. This argues for the Jewishness of the Egyptian.

Probably both Luke and Josephus assumed that an "Egyptian" rebel leader and his "assassin" followers in and about Jerusalem would not have Greek as their common language, even if Greek was widely known in the great cities of Roman Egypt; and that this would be true whether or not the Egyptian was an Alexandrian Jew.

In answer to the second question, the intent of Luke in introducing the Egyptian into the narrative is to show that (a) Paul, who speaks excellent Greek, is a civilized citizen of the Roman Empire; (b) the tribune, who stands for Roman officialdom, proposes the identification of Paul with a barbarian anti-Roman rebel only to drop the charge, and by implication to vindicate Paul's loyalty to Rome; (c) Paul, being a city-man, should not be confused with the false prophets and false Christ of Matt. 24: 24-26, who say: "Lo, he is in the wilderness"—i.e., with the political messianists; and (d) since Paul is an authentic Jew, addressing the people in the "Hebrew language" (Acts 21:40), and has been appointed by the "God of our fathers" to know his will (22: 14), he is entitled to all the rights and privileges of Judaism as a legally recognized religion in the Empire.

Bibliography. F. J. Foakes-Jackson and K. Lake, The Beginnings of Christianity, I (1920), 356, 422-24; II (1922), 357; IV (1933), 276-77. E. Haenchen, Die Apostelgeschichte (1956), pp. 556-58. F. D. GEALY

EGYPTIAN VERSIONS. See VERSIONS, ANCIENT, § 5.

EGYPTIANS, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO THE. A Greek gospel current in Egypt during the second century, with distinct doctrinal emphases. Clement refers to it at least six times, but all his quotations seem to be of one passage in which, in good Gnostic fashion, Jesus is engaged in a dialogue with Salome with regard to the propriety of marriage. In answer to her question: "How long shall death prevail?" (Miscellanies III.6.45) his answer is in essence: "So long as women bear children." But in reply to her further observation: "I have done well, then, in not bearing children," Jesus replies: "Every plant eat thou, but that which hath bitterness eat not" (III.9. 66). Again, in referring to those who "set themselves against God's creation because of continence," Clement cites this gospel as carrying the word of Jesus: "I came to destroy the works of the female" (III.9.63). In another apparent reference to the same section he cites Cassian's quotation: "When Salome inquired when the things concerning which she asked should be known, the Lord said, 'When you have trampled on the garment of shame, and when the two become one and the male with the female is neither male nor female" (III.13.92), and comments: "In the first place we have not this saying in the four gospels which have been delivered to us, but in that according to the Egyptians."

A distinctly similar quotation is made in II Clem. 12.2: "For when the Lord himself was asked by some one when his kingdom would come, he said, 'When the two shall be one, and the outside as the inside, and the male with the female neither male nor female.' " In this writing the source is not mentioned, and the author makes the quotation without apology or qualification. A similar logion is found in the third-century Oxyrhynchus fragment (P 645): "His disciples say unto him, 'When wilt thou be manifest to us, and when shall we see thee?' He saith, 'When ye shall be stripped and not be ashamed.' "

Whether the Gospel According to the Egyptians is to be seen as the source from which these latter two quotations in paraphrase are taken, or whether they come from a parallel source, is debatable. The reference to Gen. 2:25 is especially clear in the form of the quotation in the Oxyrhynchus saying. If this particular passage is a fair sample, the Encratite tone of this apocryphon would not appear any marked advance beyond the reply of Jesus to the gibe of the Sadducees (Mark 12:25).

In his first homily on Luke, Origen names this gospel as one of those produced by men who, rashly and without the needful gifts of grace possessed by the writers of the four canonical gospels, attempted to produce gospels of their own. Hippolytus (Heresies V.7) remarks that the Naassenes support their doctrine of the "changes of the soul" by this work. Epiphanius (Her. LXII.2) reports its use by the Sabellians in their claim that the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are one. The references are far too scanty to provide any very clear picture of its content or of its degree of variance from orthodox doctrine.

That the writing bearing the title Book of the Great Invisible Spirit or Gospel of the Egyptians, discovered at Chenoboskion in 1946 (see APOCRYPHA, NT), has any direct relation to this second-century apocryphon, would seem most improbable. M. S. ENSLIN

EHI ē′hī [אחי]. Listed as a son of Benjamin (Gen. 46:21); but the word is probably an erroneous fragment for AHIRAM.

EHUD ē′hŭd [אהוד, אחוד (I Chr. 8:6)]. 1. A left-handed hero, son of Gera ("Abihud," a personal name in I Chr. 8:3, may be an error for "father of Ehud"), and great-grandson of Benjamin. He delivered his countrymen from an eighteen-year Moabite oppression by treacherously assassinating King Eglon and cutting off the escape of the Moabite army of occupation, thus bringing "rest" to Israel for two generations (Judg. 3:12–4:1). See EGLON 1.

Some scholars see in the narrative two interwoven accounts (Judg. 3:17*a* logically follows vs. 15*b*, and vss. 18-19 seem an intrusion between 17*b* and 20). Whether or not the story is a unity, there is a genuine ancient folklore ring about the clever ruse by which Ehud repulsed Moab. Having publicly paid the accustomed tribute to the Moabite king and returned homeward to the Gilgal oracle, he recrossed the Jordan, secured private audience with the king, and left-handedly plunged his specially prepared thirteen-inch sword completely into the unsuspecting king's body. When Eglon's servants found the reason for which the private chamber was locked, Ehud was marshaling W Jordan Israelite troops to prevent ten thousand able-bodied Moabite soldiers from fleeing homeward across the Jordan.

While Ehud is not termed a judge, that he was regarded as a God-inspired deliverer is indicated, not only by the Deuteronomic introduction and conclusion to the story (Judg. 3:12-15*a*, 28-30; 4:1), but also by the probable significance of his association with the oracle and landmark, "sculptured stones," near Gilgal (vss. 19, 26).

2. Son of BILHAN, and great-grandson of Benjamin (I Chr. 7:10), or more likely of Zebulun. Apparently this genealogy was originally that of Zebulun (Benjamin's is I Chr. 8), but on account of an early error of "Benjamin" for "Zebulun" in 7:6, Benjaminite names have been introduced, including a brother of Ehud named Benjamin.

Bibliography. E. L. Curtis, Chronicles, ICC (1910), pp. 144-49, 156-59; L. Desnoyers, Histoire du peuple hébreu (1922), I, 133-37; T. J. Meek, "Some Emendations in the OT," JBL, XLVIII (1929), 163-64; E. G. Kraeling, "Difficulties in the Story of Ehud," JBL, LIV (1935), 205-10; C. A. Simpson, Composition of the Book of Judges (1957), pp. 9-12, 93, 107-8, 122. C. F. KRAFT

EKER ē′kər [עֵקֶר, offspring(?)] (I Chr. 2:27). Part of the postexilic clan of JERAHMEEL 1.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 232.

EKREBEL. KJV form of ACRABA.

EKRON ĕk′rən [עֶקְרוֹן, barren place(?) or fertile place(?); Egyp. 'Angrun; Akkad. Amqarruna]; PEOPLE OF (THOSE OF) EKRON, KJV EKRONITES [עֶקְרֹנִים, עֶקְרוֹנִי]; Apoc. ACCARON ăk′ə rŏn ['Ακκαρών]. The northernmost of the five principal cities (pentapolis) of the Philistines (Josh. 13:3), ca. nine miles E of the Mediterranean, near the beginning of the Valley of Sorek leading to Jerusalem. Though not mentioned in the prebiblical Egyptian records, it was probably an old Canaanite town like other members of the pentapolis (note the Semitic character of the name and the reference to Canaanite territory in Josh. 13:3; cf. Jos. Antiq. V.iii.1). It was assigned to Judah (Josh. 15:11, 45-46) or to Dan (19:43), before that tribe migrated. There is a tradition that Judah captured it with other parts of Philistia (Judg. 1:18), but when it next appears, it is in the hands of the Philistines and the captured ark is brought there from Gath (I Sam. 5:10). The ark proved troublesome and was returned to the Israelites at Beth-shemesh (5:11-12; 6:9-18). The tradition that Ekron and Gath fell to Israel in the time of Samuel (7:14) is hardly correct, for the Philistines were able to retreat to these two places after defeat (17:52).

Ekron next appears in an inscribed list of places captured by SHISHAK in his invasion of ca. 918 B.C. (I Kings 14:25). Then we have the rather amazing information that Ahaziah, son of Ahab and king of Israel (ca. 850-849), being ill, preferred to consult BAAL-ZEBUB, the deity of Ekron, rather than the God of Israel (II Kings 1:2-16). Apparently the religion of Ekron was a form of Baalism, and was making inroads in Israel. Elijah denounced Ahaziah for seeking an oracle from Baal-zebub. Several later prophets denounced Ekron and her sister cities (Jer. 25:20; Amos 1:8; Zeph. 2:4; Zech. 9:5, 7).

From the inscriptions of SENNACHERIB we learn that Ekron played a part in the campaign of that king against rebellious Hezekiah of Judah (701 B.C.). Padi, king of Ekron, who was loyal to Assyria, had been seized by certain elements in his city and handed over to Hezekiah for imprisonment. Sennacherib took Ekron, although it had help from Egypt, and put the rebels to death. He then forced Hezekiah to release Padi, restoring the latter to control in Ekron. Padi also received territory taken from Judah. His successor, Ikausu, was not so fortunate, being laid under tribute, along with Manasseh of Judah, by both Esarhaddon and Ashurbanipal in their great campaigns against Syria and Egypt.

Apart from the prophetic passages (see above), the next information on Ekron is found in the Apoc. (I Macc. 10:89), where it is related that Alexander Balas gave the city to Jonathan Maccabeus as a reward for the latter's loyalty. In the fourth century A.D. it still had a Jewish population (Euseb. Onom. "Akkaron"). It is mentioned in connection with a march of Baldwin I during the Crusades (ca. A.D. 1100) and in a few other medieval sources, after which it drops from view.

Archaeologists are somewhat in disagreement with regard to the exact identification of the site, though there is no question about the general location. Two places are suggested: 'Aqir, bearing a semblance of the ancient name; and Qatra, three miles to the S. If Qatra is correct, the name has shifted, as has happened in a number of other places. More recently Khirbet el-Muqanna', farther to the S, has been suggested.

Bibliography. E. Robinson, Biblical Researches in Palestine, II (3rd ed., 1867), 226-29, the original identification with 'Aqir, useful references to medieval sources. E. Klostermann, Das Onomastikon der Biblischen Ortsnamen, Die gr. chr. Schriftsteller d. erst. drei Jahrhunderte, Eusebius Werke, vol. III, no. 1 (1904), pp. 22-23. W. F. Albright, "The Sites of Ekron, Gath, and Libnah," AASOR, II-III (1923), 1-7, strongly rejects 'Aqir, espouses Qatra. G. Beyer, "Ekron," ZDPV, LIV (1931), 159-70. A. Alt and G. von Rad, Palästinajahrbuch, XXIX (1933), 13, 32-41. J. Simons, Handbook . . . of Egyptian Topographical Lists (1937), pp. 186, 202. J. B. Pritchard, ed., ANET (2nd ed., 1955), pp. 287-88, 291, 294. G. Naveh, "Khirbet al-Muqanna'—Ekron," IEJ, VIII (1958), 87-100, 165-70. W. F. STINESPRING

EL ĕl [אֵל]. The basic Semitic word for "God," probably derived from a root meaning "power." In ancient sources it could designate any supernatural power, and was applied especially to the high god El, father of all gods and lord of heaven and storm.

See also GOD, NAMES OF, § C1. B. W. ANDERSON

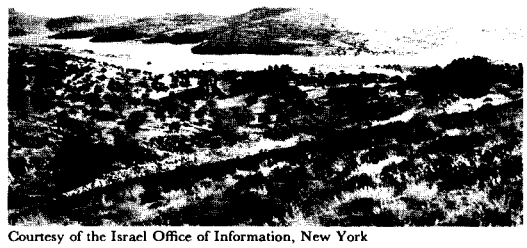
ELA ē′lə [אֵלָא] (I Kings 4:18); KJV ELAH. The father of Shimei, who was the commissariat officer of Solomon in Benjamin. See also ELAM 5.

ELADAH. KJV form of ELEADAH.

ELAH ē′lə [אֵלָה, some kind of large tree, oak(?)]. 1. A chief of EDOM (Gen. 36:41; I Chr. 1:52). The reference, however, is probably to a place rather than to a person. See ELATH.

2. King of Israel ca. 886-885 B.C.; son of BAASHA (I Kings 16:6, 8, 13-14; cf. Jos. Antiq. VIII.xii.4). Elah was killed by Zimri in the revolt that ultimately brought the Dynasty of OMRI to the throne.

3. The father of Hoshea, the last of the kings of Israel (II Kings 15:30; 17:1; 18:1, 9).



4. A family of the clan of CALEB (I Chr. 4:15). It may be that, as in 1 above, the reference is to a place (Elath?) rather than to a person.

5. A Benjaminite family dwelling in Jerusalem in postexilic times (I Chr. 9:8; missing from the parallel list in Neh. 11).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 38, 90. H. H. GUTHRIE, JR.

ELAH, VALLEY OF [עֵמֶק אֵלָה, valley of the terebinth]. A valley in which Saul and the Israelites encamped prior to the battle with the Philistines which was won by Israel when David killed the Philistine champion, Goliath (I Sam. 17:2, 19; 21:9).

Courtesy of the Israel Office of Information, New York

21. The Valley of Elah

It is identified with the fertile, well-watered Wadi es-Sant ("Valley of the Acacia"), fourteen or fifteen miles W-SW of Bethlehem. The passage into the valley was protected by the fortress of AZEKAH (Tell ez-Zakariyeh), between which and Soco the Philistine forces pitched camp.

Fig. ELA 21; Pl. XII*a*. V. R. GOLD

ELAM ē′ləm [עילם; Akkad. elamtu, highland]; KJV ELA ē′lə in I Esd. 9:27. 1. A son of Shem (Gen. 10:22; I Chr. 1:17), and the eponymous ancestor of the Elamites. See ELAM (COUNTRY).

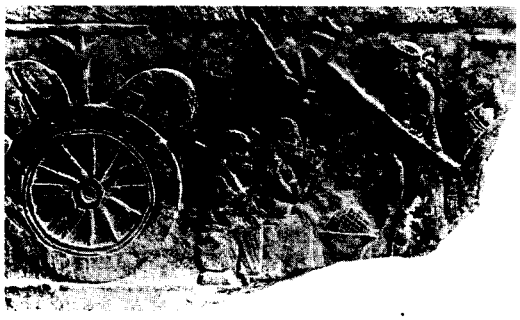
2. A Korahite in the time of David (I Chr. 26:3).

3. A priest at the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. 12:42).

4. A descendant of Benjamin (I Chr. 8:24), probably related to 5 below (cf. Ezra 8:7; I Esd. 8:33).

5. The head of a family that returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:7; Neh. 7:12; I Esd. 5:12). Ezra 2:31 (=Neh. 7:34; cf. I Esd. 5:22, CALAMOLALUS) says the family of "the other Elam" returned too; but since both families numbered 1,254, they may be identical. One of this family, Jeshaiah son of Athaliah, returned with Ezra (Ezra 8:7; I Esd. 8:33). Another, Shecaniah, urged Ezra to act against those who had married foreigners (Ezra 10:2), and six of its members put away foreign wives (Ezra 10:26; I Esd. 9:27). Elam is also said to have sealed Ezra's covenant (Neh. 10:14—H 10:15). M. NEWMAN

ELAM (COUNTRY) [Heb.-Aram. עילם; Elam. haltamti; Akkad. elamtu; Ἐλυμαῖς (cf. I Macc. 6:1; see ELYMAIS); Old Pers. (h)ūja, (h)ūvja; Middle Pers. huž; Modern Pers. Khuz(istan)]; ELAMITES ē′lə mīts. An area covering the territory of the Zagros Mountain range and of modern Luristan and Khuzistan; the capital was SUSA.



Gen. 10:22 lists Elam (עילם) as one of the children of Shem, together with Asshur, Arpachshad, Lud, and Aram; and Ezra 4:9 mentions the "men of Susa" (שושנכיא) and the Elamites (עלמיא) among the companions of Rehum and Shimshai. In Jer. 49:34-39 the destruction of Elam is foreseen (see also Isa. 21:2). The Elamites (Ἐλαμεῖται) are mentioned along with Parthians, Medes, and others among those present in Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost (Acts 2:9).

1. History. Ever since its earliest beginnings the history of Elam, a state occupying the slopes of the Iranian Plateau toward the lower Tigris Valley, has followed the pattern of alternating periods of invasions into that valley, resulting in more or less permanent possession of its regions and of temporary conquest of parts or all of its territory by Mesopotamian rulers. That long history, known through Mesopotamian as well as documents in the Elamite language (see below), most of which were recovered in Susa, may be conveniently arranged in three major periods: (a) earliest times to 1800; (b) 1800-1100; (c) 1100-645.

a. First period. Urban communities and settlements existed as early as the end of the fourth millennium. Contact between Sumer and Elam in the "heroic age" of Sumer is attested by the statement that En-men-barage-si, the twenty-first ruler of the Dynasty of Kish, "carried away as spoil the 'weapon' of Elam" (ANET 265). In their turn the Elamites may have invaded Babylonia during the "reigns" of Lugalbanda and Dumuzi, presumably kings of the First Dynasty of Uruk. Tradition has it that Eannatum, king of Lagash and Kish, conducted a successful campaign against Elam (after 2400). Sargon of Akkad (ca. 2150), then, conquered Elam, which is said to be "standing (in obedience) before Sargon, king of the country" (ANET 267). Judging from the statement: "From Elam came the Elamite(s), from Susa the Susian(s)" (ANET 268), for the purpose of lending assistance with the construction of a temple, it seems as if Gudea of Lagash wielded great influence in Elam. Shulgi, second king of the Third Dynasty of Ur (before 2000), erected a temple in Susa for Inshushinak, the god of that city. Ibbi-Sin, the last king of the same dynasty, was made prisoner by the Elamites. The destruction of Ur by the Elamites and Subarians is deplored in a lamentation text from ca. the middle of the second millennium (ANET 455-63).

b. Second period. In the first centuries of this period Elam was governed by a long series of sukkalmah, indigenous rulers who were considered the representatives of Inshushinak, the god of Susa. Ca. 1770 its power was apparently strong enough to install Elamite rulers (Warad-Sin, Rim-Sin) in Larsa for a period of some sixty years. By the end of the eighteenth century Hammurabi put a temporary end to Elam's expansionist aspirations. In the Kassite period Elam seems to have held the position of a province of Babylonia after having been conquered by Kurigalzu II (ca. 1350). This intermezzo, once more, was followed by one of revival, which culminated in the reign of Shutruk-Nahhunte (ca. 1200), who returned from a successful raid against Babylonia with, among other trophies, the famous law code of Hammurabi, which was rediscovered in 1902-3 at Susa. This upward swing continued under Shilhak-Inshushinak (ca. 1150). It came to an abrupt end ca. 1130, when Nebuchadnezzar I reduced Elam, once more, to the status of a Babylonian dependency, in which it stayed for some three centuries, as clearly testified by the almost complete silence of the Elamite sources.

c. Third period. Under Hubannugash, "king of Susa" (ca. 740), his grandson Shutruk-Nahhunte II, and their successors the policy of Elam was dominated by its alliance with Babylonia against Assyria. The struggle ended with the complete destruction of the power of Elam at the hands of Ashurbanipal (ca. 645).* Before that time (ca. 680) the Persians seem to have succeeded in taking from Elam the part known as Anshan, as is shown, perhaps, by the title "king of the city of Anshan" assumed by Cyrus I. After the fall of Nineveh (612) the protectorate over Elam passed to the Median king Cyaxares. The success of the revolt of Cyrus II against Astyages brought Elam under Persian rule. Its name appears immediately after Media in the satrapy lists of the Achaemenian kings. Darius had to overcome several revolts in Elam in the beginning of his reign before he was able to settle down in Susa in 521. Fig. ELA 22.

Courtesy of Foto Marburg

22. Relief of the time of Ashurbanipal, showing Elamite prisoners eating; from Nineveh

Courtesy of Editions des Musées Nationaux, Paris

23. An Elamite archer with spear (fifth century), member of the Persian army; from Susa

2. Language. Several suggestions have been made as to the relationship of Elamite with other languages or language groups, such as Caucasian. None of these hypotheses has been generally accepted.

Several stages can be discerned in the language as it became known in documents from different periods: (a) from the middle of the third millennium, written in a largely figurative and only partially understood script; (b) from the sixteenth to the eighth century, written in cuneiform; and (c) from the fifth and fourth centuries, in the Elamite version of the inscriptions of the Achaemenian kings.

The Elamite language may well have been used for many centuries after Elam ceased to exist as an independent nation. As late as the middle of the tenth century A.D. the Muslim author Iṣṭaḥrī noticed that the inhabitants of Khuzistan spoke Khūzī, besides Arabic and Persian.

Fig. ELA 23.

Bibliography. F. W. König, Geschichte Elams (1931); G. G. Cameron, History of Early Iran (1936); C. Huart and L. Delaporte, La Perse antique et la civilisation iranienne (1943); R. Mayer, "Die Bedeutung Elams in der Geschichte des alten Orients," Saeculum, VII (1956), 198-220.

On the language, see: F. Bork, "Elam (Sprache)," Reallexikon für Vorgeschichte, III (1925), 70-83; R. Labat, La structure de l'élamite, état présent de la question (1951); H. H. Paper, The Phonology and Morphology of Royal Achaemenid Elamite (1955; with bibliography).

More than a hundred tablets from the treasury in Persepolis were published in G. G. Cameron, Persepolis Treasury Tablets (1948). M. J. DRESDEN

ELASA ĕl′ə sə [Ἐλασά] (I Macc. 9:5); KJV EL-EASA ĕl′ī ā′sə. The place where JUDAS MACCABEUS was slain, in 161 B.C. Il'asa, near Beth-horon, may mark the place today. N. TURNER

ELASAH ĕl′ə sə [אלעשה, God has made]. 1. Son of Shaphan, and one of Zedekiah's emissaries to Nebuchadnezzar who bore Jeremiah's letter to the exiles in Babylon (Jer. 29:3).

2. Son of Pashhur the priest, and one of those with foreign wives (Ezra 10:22).

ELATH ē′lăth [אילת, אילות, אלות, grove of tall trees]. Alternately: ELOTH ē′lŏth. A city situated at the head of the Gulf of Aqabah, embarkation point of the navigation for Arabia. It is mentioned several times as being next to EZION-GEBER (Tell Kheleifeh); but Nelson Glueck, who excavated the site, found there was no room in the region for two cities, and concluded that Elath was a later name for Ezion-geber. The name Elath is probably of Edomite origin, since an Edomite dukedom of Elah is mentioned in Gen. 36:41 just before that of Pinon, which is apparently the same as Punon in the Arabah. For the earlier history of Elath, see EZION-GEBER.

The revolt of Edom in the time of Joram, the son of Jehoshaphat (II Kings 8:20-22), restored Ezion-geber–Elath to the Edomites. About sixty years later it was recaptured and rebuilt by Uzziah of Judah (II Kings 14:22). It remained in possession of Judah until the time of the weak Ahaz, when it was once more occupied by the Edomites ca. 735 B.C. (II Kings 16:6, where the RSV "Edom" is to be read throughout instead of "Syria"). From that time on, the city remained an Edomite possession but gradually decayed in importance. It was abandoned somewhere between the sixth and fourth centuries B.C., and the Nabateans, who had come to control the area, built a new city a little farther E, called Aila. Modern Aqabah, an Arab city, was built near the same site.

Bibliography. N. Glueck, The Other Side of the Jordan (1940), pp. 89-113. S. COHEN

EL-BERITH ĕl bĭr'ĭth [אל ברית, covenant god] (Judg. 9:46). A god worshiped at Shechem. See BAAL-BERITH.

EL-BETHEL ĕl bĕth'əl [אל בת־אל, the god Bethel, or the god of Bethel] (Gen. 35:7). See GOD, NAMES OF, § C2*d*.

ELCIA. KJV form of ELKIAH.

ELDAAH ĕl dā'ə [אלדעה, cf. S Arabian personal names Yada'-'il, Abiyada']. The last of Midian's five sons, from the line of Abraham and Keturah (Gen. 25:4; I Chr. 1:33).

ELDAD ĕl'dăd [אלדד, God loved(?); cf. Akkad. Dadi-ilu, Dadi is God] (Num. 11:26-27). An Israelite who prophesied in the wilderness camp. Eldad and a companion, Medad, were endowed by Yahweh in exceptional fashion with his spirit. At divine command, Moses had selected seventy elders of Israel to assist him in providing for the people, and a portion of the spirit which had empowered Moses was transferred by Yahweh to them. As a consequence of this endowment the seventy prophesied, although not permanently. Eldad and Medad were similarly empowered by the spirit to prophesy, without having been among the seventy chosen elders. Joshua's protest at such apparent irregularity was rejected by Moses with the wish that "all Yahweh's people were prophets."

The spirit of Yahweh appears in the narrative about the elders as the necessary endowment for the performance of a "political" function or office. Here an office could not be executed among the people without possession of the spirit, although it was evidently only Moses upon whom the spirit resided continuously. Nevertheless, the exceptional endowment of Eldad and Medad shows the independence of the spirit in relation to the particular office, and Moses' wish that the spirit of Yahweh would make all his people prophets indicates that the elders were not essentially, although they were functionally, different from the entire community.

Bibliography. K. L. Tallqvist, Assyrian Personal Names (1914), p. 67; M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 183. R. F. JOHNSON

ELDER IN THE OT [זקן; LXX πρεσβύτερο]. The common Hebrew word in Ezekiel, שיב, is derived from the root meaning "chin" or "beard," and so an elder is properly a man with a full beard. Elders are thus the grown-up men, powerful in themselves, by reason of personality, prowess, or stature, or influential as members of powerful families. They are local dignitaries or local rulers. There were elders in ancient Greece and Rome, and sheiks (elders) are characteristic of Arabia. Elders were known too in ancient Egypt (Gen. 50:7), and among the Moabites and Midianites (Num. 22:7).

1. Terminology. "Elder" (and KJV "ancient") translate a particular Hebrew word, but there are also a number of other terms denoting officials and officers among whom elders belong. There are also שרים (see PRINCE), who before the monarchy were identical with the elders (cf. Judg. 5:15; 8:6-16; Job 29:9), though in later days they became king's men, royal officials; חקקים: makers of statutes (Judg. 5:9, 14; cf. Isa. 10:1; 33:22); nobles (Num. 21:18; I Sam. 2:8; Job 12:21; etc.); men of valor (Judg. 11:1, etc.); or the "head" (Judg. 11:8; I Sam. 15:17; Job 29:25; etc.). Pedersen describes these persons as those who maintain or uphold the community. Isa. 3:2-3 gives another list of those who are the staff and stay of the community, and the elder is included among them. Incidentally Isaiah says that all these will fail and that boys, etc., will rule. There is thus implied a connection between the elderly, the elders, and the wise.

2. Origin and distribution. As parents wield authority in a family, so the elders wield authority in the life of the clan, tribe, or local community. This fact of age is undoubtedly the true origin of the authority of elders, and is the prerequisite of any official appointments that may be made (Exod. 12: 21-22). There are three stories of such appointments. The first, in Exod. 18:13 ff (E), describes how Jethro, Moses' father-in-law, counseled Moses to spread the judicial burden among able men, who were to serve as rulers of thousands, hundreds, fifties, and tens. Here the plan of delegated authority is of Midianite origin and was given to Israel before they had even arrived at Horeb. In the parallel account in Deut. 1: 13, Jethro is not mentioned, and the occasion is apparently subsequent to the departure from Horeb. In Exodus and Deuteronomy the word "ruler" is the word for "prince," and in Deut. 1:15 is further defined as "OFFICER." It is noticeable that in Exod. 18: 12 the elders are already in existence as a recognized body before the princes and officers are appointed. Similarly the officers, Shoṭerim, are listed immediately after the elders in such passages as Num. 11:16; Deut. 29:10; 31:28; Josh. 8:33; 23:2; 24:1, and in association with the judges in Deut. 16:18; Josh. 8:33; 23:2; 24:1. It is clear, then, that the princes and officers were very similar and closely related to judges, and may have been in part, at least, recruited from the latter. Exodus and Deuteronomy contain the only references to captains of tens, but the other captains are military figures elsewhere in the OT. It has further been suggested that these early arrangements for the creation of subordinate officials may also conceal later arrangements, whereby the princes or officers represented the local officials of the country towns, and Moses the central authority of the king or the judge or priest at Jerusalem (Deut. 16:18; 17:8-13).

The third story, in Num. 11, is concerned with the selection of a group of seventy from the elders of Israel, who are officers in Israel. The criteria for their selection are not stated. Moses has so much of Yahweh's spirit that he can spare enough to give some to all those seventy to enable them to share with him in bearing the burden of Israel. These special elders were appointed and endowed at the tent of meeting when the theophanic cloud descended. Num. 11:17*b* suggests that the Numbers story is parallel to the stories in Exod. 18; Deut. 1. But even if the accounts are parallel, Num. 11 (also E) shows that the select group of elders is called for different purposes. Exod. 24:1-2, 9-11 (J), preserves a story of seventy elders in which they are religious functionaries, favored participants in theophany and sacred meal. From all these stories, whether parallel or not, it is clear that the elders and officers have a variety of functions. See § 3 below.

It is also clear that the elders exercised a continuing role in Israel's life. Family elders are mentioned in Gen. 50:7, and elders of Israel in the law books that follow, especially in Deuteronomy. They are often referred to in the books Joshua–II Kings. Their numbers depended, no doubt, on the size of the local community, but there were seventy-seven at Succoth (Judg. 8:14). There are few references to them in the pre-exilic prophets, though they are five times mentioned in Lamentations and four times in Ezekiel. There are references too in Ezra. Elders are thus represented as a constant feature of Israel's life from the days of Moses to those of Ezra, and they were as prominent under the monarchy as before it.

3. Functions. In general the elders and the officers may be said to have been leaders in war, judges in dispute, and givers of wise advice and witness in administration. The elders represent and maintain the community, and are thus the focal point of the community (Lev. 4:13-21; Deut. 21:1-9).Their judicial functions are specially prominent in Deuteronomy (cf. 19:2; 21:2-20; 22:15-18; 25:7-9). Such passages as Exod. 24:1-2, 9-11; Lev. 4:13-21 show them in cultic roles, and they are parties to the royal covenant with David (II Sam. 5:3). Elders of priests are mentioned (II Kings 19:2), and Schürer speaks of the elders of the synagogue. They are frequently mentioned after priests, especially in the NT.

Bibliography. H. Lietzmann, "Zur altchristlichen Verfassungsgeschichte," Zeitschrift für wissenschaftliche Theologie, LV (1914), 113-32; P. Volz, Biblischen Altertümer (1914), pp. 445-47, 463-68; A. Alt, "Älteste (Palästina-Syrien)," Reallexikon der Vorgeschichte, I (1924), 117-18; J. Pedersen, Israel, I-II (1926), Index under "elders," p. 558; A. C. Headlam and F. Gerke, "The Origin of the Christian Ministry," in R. Dunkerley, ed., The Ministry and the Sacraments (1937), pp. 326-67; L. Rost, "Die Vorstufen von Kirche und Synagoge im AT," BWANT, Vierte Folge, Heft 24 (1938), pp. 60-76, especially 61-64; J. Pedersen, Israel, III-IV (1940), 760; E. Lohse, Die Ordination im Spätjudentum und im NT (1951), pp. 21-27, 50-60; H. von Campenhausen, Kirchliches Amt und geistliche Vollmacht in den ersten drei Jahrhunderten (1953), especially pp. 82-134; W. Michaelis, Das Ältestenamt (1953); M. Weber, Ancient Judaism (trans. H. H. Gerth and D. Martindale; 1953), pp. 16-18; J. Jeremias, Jerusalem zur Zeit Jesu, (1958), pp. 88-100; M. Noth, The History of Israel (1958), pp. 107-8.

See also bibliography under MINISTER.

G. HENTON DAVIES

ELDER IN THE NT [πρεσβύτερος, noun from adjective in comparative, lit. older person, hence old man; sometimes transliterated presbyter]. The exact meaning of "elder" in the sense of "older person" is found in the parable of the prodigal son (Luke 15:25), with reference to the older of the two brothers, and in Acts 2:17 (Joel 2:28); I Tim. 5:1-2, where older men and women are contrasted with those who are younger. In Heb. 11:2 the word refers to famous men of past times, particularly the worthies of OT history. In the absolute sense, meaning "old man," especially one of wisdom and experience no less than of age, the term does not otherwise occur in the NT except in a technical sense of persons holding an office or position of special dignity and responsibility in the community, whether of Judaism or of the church.

The Christian office of elder stems, without question, from a similar institution of Judaism (see ELDER); but the title was also carried by officers of various Greek cult associations and by village magistrates in Egypt. Apart from the numerous references in both OT and NT, the duties of Jewish elders are known in considerable detail from the Mishnaic tractate Sanhedrin. In NT times each Jewish community had its council of elders or its presbytery (in the Diaspora, it was commonly called γερουσία, and the elders were termed "archons," ἄρχοντες). The most important of these, of course, was the council of seventy-one, the SANHEDRIN, of Jerusalem, which served as a kind of "supreme court" for all Jewry. These presbyteries had a general administrative oversight of the Jewish communities, and represented the Jews in relations with the Roman authorities. Their primary duty was judicial—interpreting the law and meting out punishment to offenders against it.

Similar arrangements for governance obtained in the Qumran covenant community. At the general sessions of the group the "elders" had places of second rank after the "priests" (1QS VI.9), and the community had a supreme council of twelve laymen and three priests who were "perfect in all that is revealed of the entire Law" and served as final interpreters and judges of it (VIII.1–IX.2).

Jewish elders were not responsible for worship in the synagogue, though they enjoyed seats of honor at the synagogue assemblies. Doubtless the synagogue rulers were frequently elected from among their number. The elders traced their descent of succession from Moses' appointment of the seventy elders in the wilderness (Num. 11:16 ff; cf. Josh. 24:31; Judg. 2:7; and especially M. Ab. I.1). They were selected by co-optation and ordained by prayer and the laying on of hands, after the pattern of Num. 27:18; Deut. 34:9. In the course of time the elders developed a vast body of precedents in interpretation of the law—the "traditions of the elders" mentioned in the gospels (cf. Mark 7:3-5; Matt. 15:2).

It was only natural that the church, once organized as a collective body, should adopt the institution, but the NT in no place provides an account of the first ordination of elders. We meet in Acts several references to elders in the Jerusalem church, associated with James and the apostles, and functioning among the Christian brethren in ways comparable to the Jewish Sanhedrin (11:30; 15:2, 4, 6, 22-23; 16:4; 21:18). We are told that Paul and Barnabas ordained elders for the mission churches they established in Asia Minor (14:23), and that Paul met with the elders of the church in Ephesus during his final journey to Jerusalem (20:17). In Paul's extant letters, however, elders as such are never mentioned; but they may be subsumed among the leaders who presided over the churches (προϊστάμενοι) in pastoral labor and admonition (Rom. 12:8; I Thess. 5:12-13). That Christian elders exercised pastoral duties may be inferred from the references in I Pet. 5:1-4; Jas. 5:14. Their seats of honor about the celebrant at the assemblies of worship—comparable to the place of Jewish elders in the synagogue—may be inferred from Rev. 4:4.

The most debated question concerning elders in the NT is the relation of this office to other ministries besides that of apostles. That they were closely associated with apostles in the councils and governing of the church is clear from the passages of Acts cited above. The writer of I Peter, whether actually the apostle or not, describes himself as a "fellow elder" in his exhortation to the elders (5:1). The enigmatic elder who wrote II and III John was accounted in church tradition as no other than the apostle John. A second-century bishop of Hierapolis, PAPIAS, was an avid collector of teachings and traditions stemming from the apostles by way of the elders, two of whom—Áristion and the Elder John—he associates with the apostles as "disciples" of the Lord (Euseb. Hist. III.39; cf. Iren. Her. V.33.3-4). Even Ignatius, who carefully distinguishes the elders from other ministers, compares the presbytery to the "council of the apostles" (Magn. 6.1; Smyr. 8.1). There is never, however, in any of the sources a confusion of apostles and elders, for the former were missionaries, the latter stationary leaders of local churches.

The case is different with regard to "prophets and teachers" and "bishops and deacons." Some critics believe, e.g., that the prophets and teachers who led the church in Antioch, according to Acts 13:1-3, were the elders of this church. There is nothing inherently impossible in this identification. An elder may very well have possessed the spiritual gift of prophecy or of teaching or both; and conversely, a person of such eminent charismata might be a most likely candidate for an office of leadership that was official and authorized by ordination. But there are no texts that make specifically such an equation between elders and charismatic ministers.

There are, on the other hand, a number of passages that appear to make the offices of elder and bishop synonymous. The classic theory of Lightfoot that the episcopate arose out of the presbyterate by a gradual process, whereby one of the elders of a local church was elevated to the position of monarchical bishop, has won many supporters. It is but a variant of this theory that supposes the early Christian communities to have been governed by a "college" of presbyter-bishops (see BISHOP). In Paul's farewell to the Ephesian elders, the author of Acts has him address them as ἐπίσκοποι (20:28). It has been much discussed whether the word is employed here in a technical sense of "bishops" or in a more general meaning of "overseers" (so KJV) or "guardians" (so RSV). A similarly puzzling passage is Tit. 1:5-7, where the qualifications for an elder and a bishop appear to overlap.

In view of the inconclusiveness of NT evidence, critics have centered attention upon the statements of the First Epistle of Clement (see CLEMENT, EPISTLE OF), a letter addressed by the church in Rome ca. A.D. 95 to the church in Corinth concerning the unwarranted deposition from the ministry of the Corinthians' bishops and deacons. According to the author of this letter, the apostles, foreseeing that there would be strife for the "title of bishop," made arrangements for a due succession of "tested men" to replace the bishops and deacons whom they had appointed. These men, whether appointed by the apostles or by "other men of repute" (ἑλλόγιμοι), should not, says the author, be removed from their office, if they have served blamelessly. "For our sin is not small if we eject from the episcopate those who have blamelessly and holily offered the gifts. Blessed are the elders who have finished their course before now . . . for they have no fear that anyone will remove them from their appointed office" (44.4-5).

Several questions arise from this testimony. Who were the "men of repute," the ἑλλόγιμοι, through whom the ministerial succession passed? In the three other instances where I Clement uses the term, it means persons enrolled among the elect—i.e., Christians of distinction and merit (57.2; 58.2; 62.3). There is no justification for Dom Gregory Dix's translation of it as "men accounted apostles" or "included in a list" of men accounted along with apostles. This is pressing the sense too far. The men of repute might have been bishops, prophets, or elders—any distinguished leaders of the church in the second generation of its history.

Likewise the term "elder" does not have a fixed meaning in I Clement. It is used seven times, other than in the passage cited: once of Jewish elders (55.4); three times of "old men" in contrast to "younger men" (1.3; 3.3; 21.6); twice of those set over the Corinthian church, presumably as their ministers (54.2; 57.1); and once, where it is not clear whether it refers to the contemporary leaders or to those of past generations (47.6). It is, of course, a natural reading of ch. 44 to take "elders" as synonymous with the bishops who offer the gifts—i.e., the Eucharist. But it is equally natural to take the word in this context as a general description of the worthies of a bygone generation.

The theory that seems to fit best the meaning, not only of this text, but of all the slender evidence we possess from this period, is that some, though not necessarily all, of the elders were bishops. It has been suggested that the bishop was an "appointed elder"—i.e., one who was set to a special liturgical function. Thus all the bishops might be also accounted as elders, insofar as they functioned with the elders in ruling the churches. But not all the elders were bishops, but only those who presided over the Eucharistic assemblies.

It is first in Ignatius, and after him wherever the monarchical episcopate is firmly established, that the elders become clearly distinguished from the bishop, second after him in rank in the church's hierarchy. They continued to assist in governing the churches by serving the bishop as a council of advice; and, in his absence, they deputized for him as presiding ministers at the sacraments. Thus they came to take on "priestly" functions; but it is not until the middle of the third century that the word "priest" is applied to the elders as well as to the bishops.

Too little is known about the subject to say with any definiteness whether the elders were the ministers of ordination, after the apostles had passed from the scene. The single reference in I Tim. 4:14 suggests that they were, though it is not clear whether the "Timothy" to whom the Pastoral was addressed was a bishop or an elder. No further light is thrown on ordination in the early church until ca. 200, in the directives of Hippolytus' Apostolic Tradition, when the practices of conferring holy orders had become stabilized in ways that have continued ever since in Catholic and Orthodox churches. By this time, only bishops ordained bishops, and a bishop alone ordained a deacon. But the whole presbytery joined with the bishop in the laying on of hands at the ordination of an elder. Hippolytus remarks, however, that in this case the elder even so did not ordain, "but at the ordination of a presbyter he blesses while the bishop ordains" (IX.8).

Bibliography. For the older literature, see bibliography under MINISTRY, CHRISTIAN. H. Lietzmann, "Zur altchristlichen Verfassungsgeschichte," Zeitschrift für wissenschaftliche Theologie, LV (1913), 97-153; H. B. Swete, ed., Essays on the Early History of the Church and the Ministry (1921), especially pp. 57-214; O. Linton, Das Problem der Urkirche in der neueren Forschung (1932); R. Dunkerley, ed., The Ministry and the Sacraments (1937), pp. 326-87; K. E. Kirk, ed., The Apostolic Ministry (1946), pp. 113-303; B. S. Easton, The Pastoral Epistles (1947), especially pp. 188-97, 221-28; H. F. von Campenhausen, Kirchliches Amt und geistliche Vollmacht inden ersten drei Jahrhunderten (1953). See also commentaries listed under PASTORAL EPISTLES; CLEMENT, EPISTLE OF.

M. H. SHEPHERD, JR.

ELEAD ĕl′ĭ əd [אלעד, God has borne witness, or God has returned(?)]. A family of the tribe of Ephraim (I Chr. 7:21). Whether the tradition that Elead and his brother family Ezer were destroyed on a cattle raid in Gath (I Chr. 7:20-23) reflects some historical disaster or is an etiological explanation of the name of the clan of Beriah (I Chr. 7:23) is difficult to say.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 237.

H. H. GUTHRIE, JR.

ELEADAH ĕl′ĭ ā′də [אלעדה, God has adorned]; KJV ELADAH ĕl′ə də. A family of the tribe of Ephraim (I Chr. 7:20); not mentioned in the parallel list in Num. 26:35-37.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 182.

H. H. GUTHRIE, JR.

ELEALEH ĕl′ĭ ā′lə [אלעלא, אלעלה]. A city in Transjordan, rebuilt by the tribe of Reuben (Num. 32:3, 37) and later in the possession of Moab (Isa. 15:4; 16:9; Jer. 48:34). It is identified with modern el-'Al, ca. two miles N-NE of Heshbon.

E. D. GROHMAN

ELEASA. KJV form of ELASA.

ELEASAH ĕl′ĭ ā′sə [אלעשה, God has made; same as ELASAH]. 1. A person or family of the clan of Jerahmeel of the tribe of Judah (I Chr. 2:39-40).

2. A member of the tribe of Benjamin, descended from Saul (I Chr. 8:37; 9:43).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 172.

H. H. GUTHRIE, JR.

ELEAZAR ĕl′ĭ ā′zər [אלעזר, God has helped; Ἐλεαζάρ]. 1. The key figure through whom tradition traced the line of priestly descent from AARON. He was a N Israelite of considerable importance: his grave was memorialized in the land of Ephraim (Josh. 24:33; Simpson, however, regards the name here as part of late redaction). As the son of Aaron, he was invested by Moses as Aaron's successor (Num. 20:25-28; cf. Deut. 10:6), and he took the place of Aaron as Moses' helper (Num. 26:1, 3, 63; 27:2, 21). When Moses was about to die, he commissioned Joshua before Eleazar (27:18-23); Eleazar and Joshua, named in that order, distributed Canaan by lot among the tribes of Israel (32:28; 34:17; Josh. 14:1; 17:4; 19:51; 21:1). Eleazar became listed as the third of four sons of Aaron (Exod. 6:23), consecrated to the priestly office with Aaron and his brothers (Exod. 28:1; Num. 3:1-4). Nadab and Abihu were childless when destroyed by fire; the story of their rejection accentuated Eleazar and Ithamar as priests (Lev. 10). Sixteen courses of postexilic priests were assigned to Eleazar and eight to Ithamar (I Chr. 24). Eleazar was described as having been "chief over the leaders of the Levites" in the time of Moses (Num. 3:32; see also 4:16; cf. Aaron as the Levite par excellence). Eleazar was the father of Phinehas (Exod. 6:25; Josh. 24:33). Through Eleazar the descent of Zadok and of Ezra was traced to Aaron (I Chr. 6:3-15, 50-53; 24:3; Ezra 7:1-5).

See also PRIESTS AND LEVITES.

2. A son of Abinadab; consecrated to have charge of the Ark by the men of Kiriath-jearim who had brought it from Beth-shemesh and lodged it in the "house of Abinadab on the hill" (I Sam. 7:1).

3. Son of Dodo; one of the "three mighty men" whose individual exploits as David's warriors gained special fame (II Sam. 23:9-10; I Chr. 11:12-14; perhaps his name should be inserted in I Chr. 27:4).

4. A Levite; son of Mahli, of the family of Merari. He died without sons, and his daughters were married by kinsmen (I Chr. 23:21-22; 24:28; cf. Num. 36:6-9).

5. A priest, son of PHINEHAS 3. He assisted in the inventory of the temple treasure when it was returned to Jerusalem by Ezra (Ezra 8:33).

6. A son of Parosh, in a list of laymen who put away foreign wives and their children according to Ezra's reform banning foreign marriage (Ezra 10:25).

7. A Levite musician in the clockwise procession on the walls of Jerusalem during their dedication (Neh. 12:42).

8. "One of the principal scribes," martyred during the persecution of Antiochus IV Epiphanes (II Macc. 6:18-31).

9. The fourth son of Mattathias; surnamed Avaran; brother of Judas Maccabeus (I Macc. 2:5; cf. II Macc. 8:23). In the battle at Beth-zechariah between the army led by Judas and the Syrians, he fought his way through the ranks of the enemy to an elephant which appeared to bear Antiochus V Eupator, and was crushed as he killed it (I Macc. 6:43-46).

10. The father of JASON 2 (I Macc. 8:17).

11. An ancestor of Joseph the husband of Mary (Matt. 1:15).

Bibliography. Westphal, "Aaron und die Aaroniden," ZAW, XXVI (1906), 222-24; G. Berry, "Priests and Levites," JBL, XLII (1923), 235-36; M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personen- namen (1928), pp. 20-21, 90, 175; K. Möhlenbrink, "Die levitischen Überlieferungen des ATs," ZAW, LII (1934), 214-18, 225; C. Simpson, The Early Traditions of Israel (1948), p. 322.

T. M. MAUCH

ELEAZURUS. KJV Apoc. variant of ELIASHIB 3.

ELECT LADY [ἡ ἐκλέκτη κυρία]. A phrase used in II John 1 to designate the congregation to which the elder addresses his letter. Associated with this image of the local church as mother is the reference to its members as her children and to another congregation as her sister (vs. 13; cf. I Pet. 5:13). Blended in this phrase are two common ideas: that of the church as the elect and that of the messianic community as a woman bearing children (I Bar. 4–5; Gal. 4:25; Rev. 12). See ELECTION; CHURCH, IDEA OF.

Bibliography. A. E. Brooke, Johannine Epistles (1912), pp. 167-70; C. H. Dodd, Johannine Epistles (1946), pp. 143 ff; E. Stauffer, NT Theology (1955), p. 155; A. N. Wilder, Introduction and Exegesis of II John, IB, XII (1957), 209-16, 302-3.

P. S. MINEAR

ELECTION. The religious conviction that God has chosen one out of a group of individuals, peoples, tribes, cities, or temples; established a unique and exclusive relationship with it; and imposed specific functions, obligations, or authority upon it. By far the most important usages have to do with (a) kings and priests, (b) the fathers of Israel, and (c) the city of Jerusalem. The first two usages are continued in the NT in the election of Jesus and of the Twelve, and of the church as a religious community.

1. Statement of the problem
2. Election as a human act
   a. Pre-exilic sources
   b. Post-Deuteronomic sources
   c. NT usages
3. God's election of individuals
   a. Pre-Deuteronomic sources
   b. Deuteronomy and related sources
   c. Postexilic sources
   d. NT literature
4. God's election of groups
   a. Deuteronomy and related sources
   b. Postexilic developments
   c. NT literature
5. God's election of inanimate objects
Bibliography

1. Statement of the problem. There is no agreement among scholars concerning the precise definition of the term "election," or the range of religious convictions in biblical sources to which this term may properly be applied. The terminology involved in the concept of election includes primarily the Hebrew root בחר and its derivatives בחיר, בחור, and מבחר. There is no word in Hebrew which can be regarded as a synonym. In the NT similarly, the verb ἐκλέγομαι, "choose," and derived forms ἐκλεκτός, "chosen," and ἐκλογή, "election," are without true synonyms. The conclusion seems justified, that in both languages the terminology of "choice" with "God" as subject has become technical usage with a specific meaning not communicated by any other word.

None of the OT sources before Deuteronomy refers to Yahweh's choosing a people, yet on the other hand scholars have always acknowledged that the religion of ancient Israel was from the first based on a unique and exclusive relationship between Israel and Yahweh (as, indeed, in many other ancient religions). Radically differing conclusions have been obtained in scholarly investigations of the problem of election. Those who examine the actual occurrences and usages of the verb בחר, "choose," come inevitably to the conclusion that Yahweh's "choosing" Israel is a concept not demonstrably earlier than Deuteronomy. Other scholars, who start out with a definition of a chosen people as a "group separated from other nations and designated for a particular relation to God," see this conviction as a central feature of Israelite faith from Moses on. It is true that the study of a particular word cannot give reliable conclusions concerning the existence or nonexistence of a particular religious conviction; patterns of thought may very well exist without specific linguistic labels. Nevertheless, an innovation in linguistic terminology may actually result from a new function or meaning of a very old religious concept or conviction. The usage of the verb "choose" with "Yahweh" as subject and "Israel" as object may have resulted in an objectifying, an isolation, even a conventionalizing, of a conviction which previously had been latent or too closely bound up with other religious convictions to be isolated in a particular word.

In recent literature on the subject, three trends have appeared in scholarly opinion: (a) The continuation of older scholarly views, according to which the religion of early Israel was nationalistic, Yahweh being the symbol of national unity, and the concept of the "chosen people" a relatively late expression which conveyed a natural pride of nation and race as a religious conviction. (b) The assignment of this concept to the beginnings of Israel, implied in the religious narratives and interpretations of the dramatic events which took place in the time of Moses. Far from being an expression of a nationalistic pride, it is a part of the religious response to historic events which brought about the formation of a religious community that had not previously existed. (c) The view that there is a composite origin, one source stemming from the more nationalistic traditions connected with the patriarchal narratives, and the other coming from the Mosaic traditions. These two were merged by the Deuteronomist in the concept of God's choice of Israel.

Religious convictions frequently do not lend themselves to precise definition. There can hardly be any doubt that almost everything intended by the Deuteronomist is also specific or implied in the earlier religious traditions, yet we have no evidence that Israel was ever said to be "chosen" by Yahweh before ca. 623 B.C. The very rapid acceptance and popularity of the term can certainly be attributed to the fact that it gave clear expression to very old religious convictions precisely at a time when it was most needed as an assurance of the value of the religious faith and the community—i.e., following the destruction of the nation by Nebuchadnezzar in 587 B.C. It was a religious expression of the conviction that there was a permanent relation between Yahweh and Israel, in spite of the destruction of all the normal social, religious, and political institutions by which that community and faith had been preserved and perpetuated for some four or more centuries. It is no wonder that the expression "chosen people" has been a most important factor in the continuity of Jewish religion and culture. It is not surprising also that the secularization of the idea, its dissociation from the religious context in which it originated, has resulted in some of the least edifying episodes of human history, possibly inspiring, in part, racist theories of ethnic superiority.

2. Election as a human act. As in the case of most theological terms, election attributes to God an act which is familiar in human society and life—what might be called "anthropopraxy." For this reason alone, it is desirable to examine usages of the verb "choose" where human beings appear as subjects.

a. Pre-exilic sources. There are relatively few references to the choice of human beings by individuals. Gen. 6:4 tells of the "sons of God" choosing daughters of men, but this is unique. Nowhere else does the verb בחר refer to the taking of a bride, though in Akkadian the regular term for "spouse" is derived from a verb meaning "choose." In I Sam. 20:30, Saul upbraids Jonathan for having chosen David to his own hurt, but the text has been challenged here (see the commentaries). In I Sam. 8:18; 12:13 the king is the choice of the people, but elsewhere the king is the chosen of Yahweh (cf. Hos. 8:4). The king chooses men for the army (I Sam. 13:2; II Sam. 10:4; 17:1), and in P (Exod. 18:25) Moses chooses able men to be "heads" over the people. Joshua also chooses men for the army (Josh. 8:3). The very frequent use of this term in military context is perhaps reflected in the fact that בחור seems to be a technical term in many passages, perhaps meaning "elite troops."

Human choices frequently involve personal interests of the chooser. David is instructed to choose which of three punishments he shall suffer after the ill-advised census (II Sam. 24:12). He must choose a course of action when Absalom rebels (II Sam. 15:15); on the same occasion Barzillai, who had placed the king in his debt by services beyond the call of duty, suggests that the young man Chimham receive the royal reward due to Barzillai. David thereupon promises to do for the young man anything that Barzillai may choose. In the law of Deut. 23:16, the escaped slave is to dwell wherever he may choose.

Very rarely are choices in the early sources specifically associated with statements as to the superior characteristics of the object chosen. Sometimes this may be implied, as in the choice of men for the army (see above) and as in David's choice of stones for the battle with Goliath (I Sam. 17:40), or Elijah's offering first choice of bullocks to the prophets of Baal at Mount Carmel (I Kings 18:23, 25). Lot, on the other hand, chooses the Jordan Valley (Gen. 13:11), whose desirable characteristics are described in the preceding verse, but even here the interest of the narrator is rather to describe the character of Lot. Human choices are frequently, as here, involved with issues of religious or ethical nature, and the choice made is both an indication of character and the ground for subsequent well-being or punishment. Already in the Song of Deborah (Judg. 5:8) we find a correlation of "choosing new gods" and subsequent calamity, if the traditional interpretation is correct. Apart from this passage, only Josh. 24:15, 22; Judg. 10:14 speak of human beings' choosing a deity. In the former passage, the choice is grounded on the previous acts of the deity chosen, precisely the structure of the old covenant form. In Judg. 10:14 also, where Yahweh refuses to deliver Israel from oppression on the ground that they have chosen other gods, this choice is condemned on the grounds of Yahweh's previous acts on their behalf. Only in Isa. 41:24 do we have a possible late analogy to these three references to a human choice of a god. Contrast the account of Elijah on Mount Carmel, where the verb "choose" is not used. Only in the most archaic period of Israelite faith was there really a live option with regard to the religious community to which groups would belong: namely, the Canaanite city-states, the old familial religion of patriarchal times, or the Yahwistic community of Israel. All choices in subsequent times are entirely within the framework of the religious community of Israel, by definition worshipers of Yahweh.

Choice as a moral issue within the community is illustrated in Isa. 1:29, where the gardens are certainly associated with some pagan cult symbol; and 7:15-16, where ability to choose good and reject evil is the description of the morally responsible person. Finally, in Deut. 30:19 the two ways, life and death, blessing and curse, are set before the people for them to choose. Perhaps Jer. 8:3 should be included here: death is chosen by the wicked—who have chosen that which results in death.

b. Post-Deuteronomic sources. Almost all references to human choice are here religious alternatives between good and evil. Only in Isa. 40:20 is there an exception, in the craftsman's selection of wood which is appropriate for making an idol. In Job also there are some few choices which are not simply the preference of religious orthodoxy over against impiety. In 9:14, Job chooses words for his controversy with Yahweh; in 7:15, he is led by his nightmares to prefer death to life. In 29:25, he describes his former position, in which he chose "their way" for his contemporaries. His opponents, however, attribute to him evil choices: the "tongue of the crafty" (15:5); iniquity is his choice, according to Elihu (36:21), who exhorts: "Let us choose what is right."

Human choice is very frequently bound up with the proclamation of cause-and-effect relationships: in Isa. 66:3*b*-4*a*, Yahweh chooses affliction for those who choose their own ways and delight in their abominations. This is frequently emphasized in Proverbs also (1:29-33; 3:31). The righteous way is then not so much a matter of religious choice as simply common-sense preference of that which is objectively, intrinsically advantageous. Knowledge (Prov. 8:10), the fruit of wisdom (8:19), a good name (22:1), are all preferable (i.e., to be chosen) above gold, silver, and wealth.

Nevertheless, choice as an indication of human character is also illustrated in Pss. 84:11; 119:30, 173. It is difficult, however, to avoid a strong impression that in the postexilic sources human choice is, in general, limited to the question of accepting or being free from an increasingly rigid orthodoxy of actions; of adherence to or freedom from a well-defined tradition, which was regarded as objectively good and perfect; and in Proverbs especially, this choice was the means to all sorts of material ends.

c. NT usages. It is striking how little human choice appears in the NT, especially the sort of ethico-religious choice so emphasized in the postexilic OT sources. In view of the OT emphasis upon choosing the "way of life," Paul's uncertainty as to whether he should choose life or death (Phil. 1:22) is most interesting as an illustration of the redefinition of OT concepts. OT narratives are used as illustration in Heb. 11:25, where Moses chose ill-treatment with his people rather than the fleeting pleasures of sin. In Luke 10:42, Mary chose the better of two good alternatives. There are no other references in the NT to human choices involving religious issues.

Choices of individuals by human agency are also rare. The church chooses Stephen and six others for administrative functions (Acts 6:5), and Judas and Silas as messengers to Antioch (15:22-25). In neither case is there any indication that this is a divine choice; on the other hand, in both cases there is specific statement concerning the superior qualifications of those chosen, which contrasts sharply with the narratives of God's electing human beings.

In Luke 14:7 there is a unique example of choice based on nonreligious self-interest. Jesus observes those invited to a feast choosing places of honor, and commands the opposite procedure.

The silence of the NT concerning human choice of religious faith is the more striking in view of the fact that the Christian movement must have presented Jews and pagans alike with sharply defined alternatives.

3. God's election of individuals. a. Pre-Deuteronomic sources. There is no demonstrable reference to a divine choice of an individual in the premonarchic sources of the OT. This seems to come into Israelite tradition with the kingship, possibly from pagan sources, where kings had long been regarded as the chosen of the gods. Furthermore, the traditions treat the king as the chosen of both Yahweh and the people (I Sam. 10:24). Saul is the first of whom this term is used. David is chosen (I Sam. 16:8-10, 12). In II Sam. 6:21, David, speaking in the first person, claims to have been chosen by Yahweh above Saul and his house. Nowhere else in the OT do we have a similar first-person statement. Again, in II Sam. 16:18, Hushai's reply to Absalom presupposes that the king was chosen by Yahweh and the men of Israel. These are the only certain references to Yahweh's choice of individuals before the book of Deuteronomy, and all refer to the king. Some scholars believe that the prophetic oracle in I Sam. 2:28 is pre-Deuteronomic. If this is the case, we then have evidence that the originator of the priestly line of Eli (Aaron or Levi?) was chosen by Yahweh to function as priest. It is doubtful that this can be regarded as evidence for such a belief before the establishment of the monarchy.

b. Deuteronomy and related sources. It is surprising that this section of the OT refers so little to chosen individuals. In Deuteronomy itself, only Levi is called "chosen" for the specific function of service at the altar. In the Deuteronomic history, David is referred to as the chosen servant, with emphasis on the fact that he kept the commandments and statutes of Yahweh (I Kings 11:34), and it is for David's sake that Yahweh maintains a king at Jerusalem. For the Deuteronomist, the authority of the king is due only to the past promise of Yahweh.

c. Postexilic sources. The extension of the concept of chosen individuals to other personages of sacred traditions is characteristic in this period. In Second Isaiah, the terms "servant" and "chosen" seem nearly interchangeable as technical terms (see SERVANT), and are identified repeatedly with Jacob and Israel (Isa. 41:8-9; 44:1-2; cf. 14:1); Jacob/Israel is, in the first two passages cited, certainly the person of sacred tradition who is regarded as the ancestor of the Israelites. See § 4*b below.*

All references to chosen individuals involve persons of the remote past, with one exception. In Hag. 2:23, Zerubbabel is called both "servant" and "chosen," obviously in an attempt to revive the religious ideology of kingship associated with the Davidic monarchy, perhaps on the foundation of the prophetic oracle in Jer. 33:23-26, where Yahweh guarantees the permanence of the Davidic dynasty. This attempt in the postexilic community failed, and no one is called "chosen" again until NT times. As a matter of fact, Zerubbabel is the only identifiable, historic individual from Solomon to Jesus who is specifically called the chosen of Yahweh.

Other persons of sacred tradition regarded as chosen include Aaron (Num. 16:5, 7 P; 17:2); Moses (surprisingly for the first and last time in Ps. 106:23); David (Ps. 78:70); and finally Solomon, only in Chronicles (I Chr. 28:10; 29:1), where he is chosen to build the temple, and as a son of Yahweh (28:6). Last, but not least, Abraham is included among the chosen, only in Neh. 9:7.

d. NT literature. The limitation of the term in NT sources is important. First, Jesus himself is called "chosen" in the transfiguration narrative (Luke 9:35), by a voice from heaven (a variant reads: "My beloved"). In Luke 23:35 the term is used by scoffers mocking Jesus on the cross, and in I Pet. 2:4-6, an interpretation of Isa. 28:16 refers to Jesus as the "cornerstone chosen and precious," possibly following a different text from the Masoretic Hebrew.

All other references to chosen individuals in the NT have to do with the original Twelve plus Matthias. In Luke 6:13, Jesus calls and chooses the Twelve and names them "apostles," and they are then listed by name. In John 6:70, Jesus' choice of the Twelve, including Judas, is emphasized, as also in 13:18; 15:16. This latter passage is of particular interest in the specific denial that the Twelve had chosen Jesus, and in the emphasis placed on the function for which they were chosen. In 15:19, the separation from the world is also emphasized, with results which contrast greatly with those of postexilic wisdom literature, where human choice of the divinely approved way will result in all sorts of material and spiritual good. The choice of Matthias as a replacement for Judas contrasts sharply also with the choosing of Stephen and others (see § 2*c above*). Here, two men are proposed; prayer for the Lord's indication of his choice is offered; the lot is cast; and when it falls on Matthias, he is enrolled with the Eleven.

Peter, speaking in the first person (the only such case in the NT), states that God chose him from among the disciples to proclaim the gospel to the Gentiles (Acts 15:7). This is not an appointment to a peculiar status, which he already had, but is rather designation for a more specialized function. The important feature of this statement, for present purposes, is the fact that this must have been based on the events narrated in Acts 10: it is not a decision of the church, but a vision seen by an individual, on which this choice is grounded.

It is strange that Paul is never called "chosen." Acts 9:15 perhaps conveys the same idea when Paul, after his conversion, is called a "chosen instrument of mine." Again, the designation takes place by means of a vision to Ananias, but it is not the word ἐκλεκτός, "chosen"; rather, ἐκλογή, "election," is used here, as also in Rom. 9:11, where "God's purpose of election" is illustrated in the choice of Jacob before his birth, thus excluding any possibility that it is based on works.

To summarize all our evidence concerning individuals "chosen" by God, the following points are in order: (a) In the early sources of the OT every chosen individual occupies a definite office, first king and then priest. In the NT, Jesus is chosen, but the office is not defined; the Twelve are chosen and called apostles—whether this is an office analogous to that of priest and king depends upon the ecclesiastical presuppositions of the one who answers the question. (b) In every case in early OT sources the "chosen" individual is the first of a continuity in dynastic succession, his descendants occupying his office, except in the case of Saul, who was specifically rejected (and also the house of Eli). (c) In every case except Solomon (in the Chronicler only), the individual obtains his office by means other than regular, socially established, accepted conventions. (d) Postexilic OT sources seem to attribute the term to all great men of religious tradition (Moses, Abraham, Jacob), but not even at this late time is it ever used of the charismatic leaders, notably the judges and the prophets.

4. God's election of groups. a. Deuteronomy and related sources. Though the religious conviction that Israel was the peculiar possession of Yahweh certainly goes back to the very beginnings of Israel, the use of the term בחר as a theological expression of this conviction suddenly appears for the first time in Deuteronomy. Unless some of the psalms will in the future be successfully dated before Deuteronomy, no source knows the term in earlier times. It now seems doubtful to many scholars that the unknown author of Deuteronomy can be regarded as the inventor of this theological concept; rather, it seems likely that he fixed in writing an idea already current in some unknown circle, where it may have been very old indeed. It is quite likely that the root had some theological significance in pre-Mosaic times, as could be argued from the old Amorite (or East Canaanite) name Yabḫurum, which is linguistically equivalent to the later, Hebrew name Ibhar, known only as the name of one of David's sons (II Sam. 5: 15). Since it is not likely that the old Amorite name had anything to do with kingship ideology, and since names of this type almost always referred to some activity or function of a deity, it is quite likely that this root, like a great number of Hebrew roots with equivalents in pre-Mosaic Amorite dialects, had an important religious significance in earliest Israel. Under the present circumstances, it is hardly consonant with scholarly caution to deny flatly that the term could have been known or used before Deuteronomy. Amos 3:2 is often cited as evidence that the concept, if not the term, existed in the middle of the eighth century. Amos 9:7-10 could also be interpreted easily as a prophetic polemic against a too-facile popular idea of a chosen people. The problem, however, is not that of the existence of a peculiar relationship between Yahweh and Israel; it is the origin of the term "chosen" (or the verb "to choose" with "God" as subject), and if it be a late term, whether or not it added anything new to the theology of the OT.

Religious concepts have a way of surviving by means of reinterpretation, of giving new meaning and function to very old terms—as also in law. It is difficult, therefore, to believe that the concept of the chosen people as it is found in Deuteronomy coincides exactly with an earlier use, if it did exist. Changes in culture inevitably bring along changes, often too subtle to define exactly, in the meaning of words. Particularly in a case such as this, when a term which we suspect was very old suddenly appears toward the end of an era, there is too great a contrast in the nature of the religious community itself to make it likely that the concept was exactly the same. The Deuteronomist was the heir of some six centuries of history and tradition; early Israel was certainly a rather loose federation of "tribes" of diverse origins, customs, and traditions, in which each man "did what was right in his own eyes," to the dismay of the Deuteronomist. That which is true of an ethnic group with its own history, language, and culture can hardly be true in all respects of a group which was just beginning to work out some sort of unity on the foundation of a common religious faith.

It seems, therefore, that if the term "chosen" was known before Deuteronomy, or, at any rate, if the relationship between Yahweh and Israel was one which grew not out of a so-called "tribal" religion in which kinship was the determining factor in membership in the religious community, but rather was a relationship established by some historical event at a given time and place, the religious meaning of God's "choosing" must be looked for within the framework of the religious bond which held early Israel together. This can only be the covenant tradition.

The Deuteronomic tradition fits very well into the structure of COVENANT forms of Mosaic times. Deut. 7:6-7 is the classical passage. Here the choice of Israel is grounded in Yahweh's initiative—his love (see LOVE IN THE OT)—and in the previously existing commitment to the forefathers—the covenant with Abraham. Very strong emphasis is here placed on the motif that the choice is determined by the nature of God, not by the characteristics or excellence of Israel. In some of the extrabiblical suzerainty treaties precisely the same motifs are presented. If Yahweh's choosing the people is an early tradition, it seems much more likely that it referred originally to the choice of each individual, or the head of each family (cf. Acts 13:17)—granting a patriarchal form of social organization—which joined the Israelite religious community. It is difficult to see how it could have been a choice of a collective group which seems to have had only a rather loose organizational structure. With this hypothesis fits the fact that Deut. 7:6 is in the singular—only with vs. 7 does the plural form of address occur—though it must be admitted that this change of number is no very strong evidence. If this is actually a late recording of a very old tradition, it must be admitted that it is too far removed from the original social and theological context to enable us to reconstruct the original content of the religious conviction; at least we cannot do so with any assurance. It is perhaps worth pointing out here that the Decalogue is likewise presented in the second-person-singular form of the verbs involved.

More important for our present purpose is the fact that Yahweh's choice in Deuteronomy refers to the act which initiated that which has a continuity throughout the centuries. Exactly as in the case of the beginnings of the priesthood, the monarchy, and the temple, Yahweh chooses the one (or the many?) whose descendants enjoy the privileges and obligations conferred upon the one who founded the line which bears his name (viz., Aaron/Levi, David, Solomon, and at last Jacob, who is "chosen" for the first time in Deutero-Isaiah). The evidence is thus rather impressive for concluding that Yahweh's choice is closely bound up with ancient concepts of legitimacy. It is a religious conviction, even a part of ancient Israelite political theology, which establishes legitimacy and authority for those institutions of society and culture regarded as of crucial importance, the kingship and the priesthood. With the destruction of both in 587 (at least, the destruction of their functions), it could be seen that these were not, after all, of ultimate importance. The people themselves as a religious community could and did continue to exist in the absence of functioning king and priest. The old concept of Yahweh's choice was therefore transferred from Aaron and David to Jacob, the father (according to the normative religious traditions) of the twelve tribes. This conviction, which, as we have seen above, may have extremely old roots in the premonarchical period, established the religious right and will toward continuity in exile—or perhaps it would be more accurate to say that this term gave expression to that which was a deeply felt conviction. See KING; PRIESTS AND LEVITES.

In the Deuteronomic history there are very few references to a chosen people. God's choice of Israel at the beginning of its history furnishes for the Deuteronomic historian the grounds for Israel's existence, but the obligations of the covenant relationship were not accepted, and therefore it was difficult to identify the actual historical community of later times with the "chosen people." Solomon's prayer at Gibeon (I Kings 3:8) makes reference to "thy people" who are too numerous to be counted (contrast Deut. 7:7), but the term "chosen" is not used. That which is true at the beginning of God's creative activity in Israel cannot automatically be assumed true of the community in a much later time—the later community is only evidence that God has kept his promise.

Finally, in Jer. 33:23-26, which comes from some time shortly after the destruction of Jerusalem, we find the only prophetic usage before Ezekiel and Second Isaiah. This is a promise of the restoration of David's dynasty, and of divine mercy to the descendants of Jacob. This is particularly significant because it is in response to a popular cliché: "The LORD has rejected the two families which he chose." This seems to be the only passage (coming from popular, not prophetic, sources) which attributes the term to the N and S kingdoms (so some commentators). It would seem much better to identify the two families here as those of Jacob and David (vs. 26), since these two traditions of Yahweh's choice are those most emphasized in the exilic period.

b. Postexilic developments. Ezekiel refers to Yahweh's choice of Israel only in 20:5. It is not Jacob (Israel) but his seed in Egypt who seem to be the chosen, and the choice takes place accompanied by Yahweh's oath that he will deliver them from Egypt.

It is in Deutero-Isaiah that the concept of election reaches a culmination. Very characteristic of this prophet, and of a few other passages which seem to be closely related, is the double parallelism of Jacob=Israel and servant=chosen (Isa. 41:8-9; 44:1). These two religious symbols are brought together elsewhere only in Ps. 135:4; Isa. 14:1 (universally assigned to the postexilic period); and in prose, Ezek. 20:5, but without the reference to the servant. The formidable complexity of the chosen-servant problem in Second Isaiah makes any solution extremely tentative. Nevertheless, there are several passages in which Jacob=Israel seems to be definitely identified as the person of historical tradition (Isa. 41:8-10; 44:1-5), and elsewhere is identified with the collective community (so in Isa. 43:10-13 above all). The prophet is here engaged in an attempt to bridge the gap of centuries, and the gulf of discrepancy between the necessary characteristics of the chosen one and the actual nature of the people. In other words, he is cautiously identifying the chosen ancestor, Jacob, with his descendants, who may also be called chosen, at least in certain circumstances, in which the obligations attendant upon being chosen are very carefully emphasized. It must be emphasized that here, as elsewhere, it is the originator of the line of continuity to which the term originally and properly applies.

It is curious that the Chronicler never applies the term "chosen" to a corporate group other than the Levites except in the psalm of I Chr. 16:13 (=Ps. 105:6), where for the first and only time in OT literature we have the plural form of בחיר, "chosen one." The identification of the actual historical community with the chosen people is now complete, and being chosen is equated with being a descendant of Abraham/Jacob. Similarly, in I Chr. 15:2 it is no longer Levi who is chosen, but rather the Levites (cf. also II Chr. 29:11), but here Chronicles follows usage first found in Deut. 18:5.

c. NT literature. The most characteristic usage in the NT seems to be both a continuation and a modification of the OT concept.

In the teachings of Jesus, the elect are a group not closely defined, but seemingly a qualitative term perhaps analogous to the "righteous remnant" of OT prophecy. In Mark 13:20 (=Matt. 24:22), God will shorten the days for the sake of the elect; false prophets will almost lead even the elect astray; at the consummation, God will gather the elect from the four winds. Similarly, in Luke 18:7 (with which Rom. 8:33 may be compared), God will vindicate his elect. The term everywhere seems to convey a relationship to God which guarantees God's protection. If Judaism tended at least to identify the elect with the physical descendants of a chosen individual of the remote past, the identification of the elect in the NT went a different way. What this way was is a question which has never been agreed upon by scholars and theologians. First, it is necessary to point out the distinction between call and election. In Matt. 22:14: "Many are called, but few are chosen," the distinction is made, regardless of the particular interpretation of its connection with the context. This is not the only passage which makes such a distinction. Rev. 17:14 describes those who are with the Lamb, the Lord of lords and King of kings, as "called and chosen and faithful." Also, in II Pet. 1:10 there is an exhortation to "be the more zealous to confirm your call and election" as a necessary condition for entry into the eternal kingdom of Christ. Paul likewise (Col. 3:12) emphasizes the characteristics of the "chosen ones"—namely, compassion, kindness, lowliness, meekness, and patience—which are remarkably similar to the catalogue of fruits of the Spirit in Gal. 5:22. Finally, in I Pet. 1:2, the exiles of the Dispersion are addressed as "chosen and destined . . . and sanctified by the Spirit for obedience to Jesus Christ."

That the elect are identified with the Christian church in some way may be assumed. The only passage which clearly takes over OT terminology to apply it to the Christian community is I Pet. 2:9, where the LXX version of Exod. 23:22 (but cf. Exod. 19:6) is quoted, and followed by an indirect quotation of Hos. 2:23 with similar application to the Christians. An indirect use of OT terminology occurs also in Tit. 2:14, where the word περιούσιος, translated "people of his own," is the LXX rendering of the rare Hebrew word סגלה in Exod. 19:5; 23:22; Deut. 7:6; and elsewhere, which is closely connected with the concept of election. Other references in which the Christian community is identified with the elect are probably to be found in I Thess. 1:4; II Tim. 2:10; Tit. 1:1; II John 1:1, some of which are formulaic in nature, but the last is especially interesting in view of the fact that for Paul the election of the brethren of Thessalonica is known from its results.

The insistence of Deuteronomy that election is the result of God's initiative, not of the characteristics of man, is also taken up in the NT. The classical passage is I Cor. 1:27-28, where Paul describes in detail God's choice of the weak, foolish, despised, and lowly, in order to put to shame their opposites. Similarly, in Jas. 2:5, God chose the poor to become rich in faith. Both specifically deny any intrinsic superiority on the part of those chosen. Paul gives the reason: "that no human being might boast." The parable of the marriage feast in Jesus' teachings (Matt. 22:1-4) certainly seems to convey the same point, when the servants of the king gather all they found in the streets, good and bad.

In spite of the identification of the Christians as the elect, the OT emphasis upon Israel as the chosen could not be ignored. In Acts 13:17, Paul begins his sermon at Antioch in Pisidia with the statement: "The God of this people Israel chose our fathers . . . ," continuing with the message that the promises to the fathers are fulfilled in Jesus for the children (vss. 32-33). This is the theme also of Rom. 11. After denying that God has rejected Israel (11:2), he maintains that there is now, as in the days of Elijah, a remnant chosen by grace. These elect obtained what Israel sought, but the rest were hardened (11:7). Even here, it is impossible to regard election as something which is conferred by birth into an ethnic group. The apostle is trying to resolve a paradox, or escape a dilemma. First, there is the impossibility of rejecting the OT scripture, with its divine promises to Israel; but the Jewish rejection of Jesus, in whom these promises are fulfilled, made it impossible to regard all Israel as the elect. He follows the OT itself in the solution: "As regards the gospel they are enemies of God, . . . but as regards election they are beloved for the sake of their forefathers. For the gifts and the call of God are irrevocable." This would fit in with the OT emphasis upon the fact that the fathers are chosen, but not necessarily all descendants. They are called, they are beloved for the sake of the ancestors, but the elect are those who have responded in Christ, and are identified with the remnant in the prophetic teachings.

In the NT, then, election is an act of God, not based on any inherent superiority of those elected, but grounded in the love and grace of God and in his promises to the OT fathers. The election must be confirmed by the faithfulness, obedience, and personal characteristics of the elect; no historical continuity of biological descent, political or social institution, is relevant as a formal criterion by which the elect are to be identified (cf. John 1:13). "Election" is far from being a term expressing pride or claiming prestige and privilege of some social group; rather, it designates those who have responded to the call of God and consequently exhibit the characteristics of the elect. See CHURCH, IDEA OF.

5. God's election of inanimate objects. It is again Deuteronomy which emphasizes for the first time, and in some twenty-one passages, God's choice of a particular place for a specific function. In Deuteronomy itself it is only referred to as מקום, "place," since from the point of view of Moses' time the selection of Jerusalem is still in the future. The Deuteronomic history leaves no doubt that the "place" is Jerusalem. In I Kings 14:21, God has chosen the city to place his name there (cf. also I Kings 8:16, 44; 11:32-33; II Kings 21:7; 23:7). In the last cited passage there is a prophetic prediction of God's rejection of the city and temple which he chose. The Deuteronomic historian identifies the place as Jerusalem the city, and its importance is further defined as derived from the fact that God has chosen it as the place for the temple, in which he has placed his name. All this is, however, absent in the pre-exilic prophets. See TEMPLE, JERUSALEM.

God's choice of nonhuman objects occurs elsewhere. In Ps. 25:12, God chooses the "way" in which he will instruct the God-fearing man. In Isaiah there are references to the "doings" which God chooses (66:4), and the fasting which differs from that practiced by the prophet's contemporaries (58:5-6). After the Restoration, Zech. 3:2 again refers to Jerusalem as chosen. Mount Zion is chosen in Ps. 132:13. Chronicles continues the now well-established terminology with regard to Yahweh's choice of Jerusalem and the temple (II Chr. 6:6; 7:12; 33:7).

Of all this there is no hint in the terminology of divine choice in the NT. No city, place, temple, house, is referred to as chosen. In fact, the verb never has an inanimate object when "God" is subject. These symbols, which were so important to postexilic Judaism, were evidently disvalued in early Christianity from the beginning, and increasingly as the movement spread into the Gentile world. Jerusalem continues as a symbol, especially in Revelation, but it is the heavenly, not the earthly, city. Even more important for present purposes is the fact that this theological term was not transferred to some other locality or object, at least in NT times. All the significant religious uses of the term "choose" reversed the increasing tendency of Judaism to identify the relationship to God with any objective nation, ethnic group, place, temple, or group of cultural conventions. What God chose could be only human beings, whose personal characteristics exhibited those traits which were qualitatively in harmony with the divine will.

Bibliography. K. Galling, Die Erwählungstraditionen Israels (1928). H. H. Rowley, The Biblical Doctrine of Election (1953). K. Stendahl, "The Called and the Chosen," The Root of the Vine (1953), pp. 63-80. T. C. Vriezen, Die Erwählung Israels nach dem AT (1953). For a succinct statement of the older view, see J. M. P. Smith, "The Chosen People," AJSL, XLV (1928-29), 73 ff. Further discussion is to be found in various OT theologies, and in G. E. Wright, The OT Against Its Environment (1950), especially pp. 46-54.

G. E. MENDENHALL

EL-ELOHE-ISRAEL ĕl ĕl′ō hē ĭz′rĭ əl, ĕl′ĭ lō′hē— [אל אלהי־ישראל, God, the God of Israel] (Gen. 33:20). See GOD, NAMES OF, § C2*g*.

EL-ELYON ĕl′ĕl yōn′ [אל עליון, God the Exalted One, God Most High]. See GOD, NAMES OF, § C2*b*.

ELEMENT (ELEMENTAL SPIRIT) [στοιχεῖα, from στοῖχος, row, rank, series]. A term which has four basic meanings in the Greek:

a) Classical Greek relates the term to the spoken letters of the alphabet and to the fundamental principles or rudiments of any art, science, or discipline. This is the meaning in Heb. 5:12, where τα στοιχεῖα τῆς ἀρχῆς is translated as "the first principles."

b) The term is used to designate the basic components or constituents of the physical world—e.g., earth, fire, water, and air as the four basic elements. Such usage is found also in the noncanonical Jewish writings (Wisd. Sol. 7:17; 19:18; IV Macc. 12:13; Jos. Antiq. III.vii.7). It is this meaning that appears in II Pet. 3:10, 12, in relation to the destruction of the elements (στοιχεῖα).

c) The term came to include not only the physical elements but also the spirits behind them: the elemental spirits. In Hellenism the term had a double meaning, a philosophical and a mythical-religious. The philosophical sought after a unified understanding of the world (see above). However, the world could not be limited to nature; and thus cultural, psychological, and religious aspects stood side by side with the natural. The syncretistic movement in Hellenism kept both, but whereas the philosophical was kept alive almost only in astrological speculation, the mythical became strongly emphasized and provided a framework into which streamed the many oriental divine or half-divine beings, spirits, and angels (see ANGEL). The στοιχεῖα were personified and came to be understood as the final principles of life and all that is. They were the lords of the world; and being regarded as the supporting spirits of the elements from which man is created, they were considered worthy of man's worship. A similar emphasis is present in Jewish apocalyptic literature (Slavonic Enoch 19:1 ff; Ethiopian Enoch 60:11 ff; 69:22; Jub. 2:2; II Esd. 6:3; see also Rev. 7:1; 14:18; 16:5; 19:17).

It is this meaning that appears in Gal. 4:3, 9; Col. 2:8, 20. What the letters to the Galatians and the Colossians are attacking appears to have been a kind of religious syncretism of Hellenistic gnosis, Jewish ethical practice, and Persian mythology. The problem is that "beings that by nature are no gods" (Gal. 4:8) were involving the congregation in what amounted to polytheistic idolatry. Galatians associates the Jewish law and the "elemental spirits of the universe" (cf. Gal. 4:3, 5) and directly links the law to angels (3:19). Colossians associates the "elemental spirits of the universe" and angel-worship (cf. Col. 2:18, 20). See COLOSSIANS § 3.

The basic conflict is one of a self-culture with "human precepts and doctrines" (Col. 2:22-23) versus a "growth that is from God" (vs. 19); and the freedom in Christ versus slavery to the elemental spirits of the universe (Gal. 4:9). In both letters it is the question of a basically man-centered orientation versus a God-centered one in which also the problem of man finds its solution.

d) The term is used also with reference to stars and heavenly bodies. They were regarded as having spirits which affect the life and destiny of men. This astrological concern seems to appear in Gal. 2:10; Col. 2:16 (cf. Ethiopian Enoch 80:6) and indicates another factor in the syncretism confronting the congregations.

Bibliography. G. A. Deissmann, Encyclopedia Biblica, II (1901), 1258 ff; H. Schlier, Der Brief an die Galater (1951), pp. 133 ff. M. Dibelius, An die Kolosser, Epheser, an Philemon (1953), pp. 27 ff; E. Lohmeyer, Der Brief an die Kolosser (1954), pp. 4 ff, 103 ff.

P. L. HAMMER

ELEPH. KJV form of HA-ELEPH.

ELEPHANT [שנהבים, ivory, from שן, tooth, tusk, and הבים, presumably plural of הב, possibly from Egyp. ꜣbw, elephant (cf., however, postbiblical Heb. פיל, elephant; Syr. pîl); ἐλέφας (I Macc. 6:30; etc.)]. Any of certain large mammals of the suborder Proboscidea, of the family Elephantidae, their most striking external peculiarity being the long, flexible proboscis. Of the two living species, the Indian (elephas indicus) and the African (elephas africanus), the latter is the larger and

Courtesy of the Trustees of the British Museum

24. Black obelisk of Shalmaneser III, king of Assyria, which describes the events of his reign; showing elephant in middle section the more active. Africa, however, has no long tradition of elephant-taming, so that domesticated elephants have been almost entirely of the Indian variety.

Elephants of the Indian species once roamed Western Asia. In the fifteenth century B.C. both Assyrian and Egyptian sources refer to elephant hunts in N Syria near Carchemish, and as late as the eighth century B.C. elephant hides and ivory are listed as gifts brought to Tiglath-pileser III at Arpad. It is evident, however, that as the cultivated area expanded and as the demand for IVORY increased, elephants decreased in numbers and eventually disappeared from the Assyrian domains, which would account for the absence of references to the elephant in the OT. Presumably the ivory inlays and the elephant hides, which Hezekiah of Judah sent to Sennacherib in 701 B.C., were imported from Ethiopia or Egypt (ANET 288).

Herodotus speaks of the elephant as a native of Africa (III.114), but Aristotle knows of the Indian species (History of Animals IX.1 [610*a*]). Fifteen of the latter variety were used by Darius III of Persia in 331 B.C. at the Battle of Gaugamela against Alexander of Macedon. The Hellenistic age took up this military use of elephants, employing animals imported from India, though it is claimed that the Seleucids bred and trained elephants at Apamea in Syria. That Lysias included thirty-two elephants in the force marshaled against the Palestinian Jews in 163 B.C. doubtless indicates that the Seleucids considered the situation a serious one (I Macc. 6:30).

Fig. ELE 24. W. S. McCULLOUGH

ELEPHANTINE PAPYRI ĕl′ə făn tī′nī, —tē′nī pə pī′rī. The Aramaic papyri of the fifth century B.C. found at Elephantine Island, opposite Assuan. The first body of material, composed of legal texts, was acquired from dealers and published by Archibald H. Sayce and Arthur E. Cowley in 1906. The second and most important lot was recovered by excavation carried on by the Berlin Museum and was published by Eduard Sachau in 1911. The third lot, much like the first in character, was actually the first to be found (1893), but came to light a considerable time after the other two, at the Brooklyn Museum; it was published by Emil G. Kraeling in 1953. Fig. ELE 25.

The papyri revealed that there was a colony of Hebrews on Elephantine Island (called Yeb) in the Persian era. They had a temple of their god, whose name is written Yhw (Yahu or Yaho). They sometimes refer to themselves as Arameans and apparently were living in an Aramaic-speaking environment and using the Aramaic language. As they claim that their temple existed before Cambyses' invasion of Egypt (525 B.C.), a sixth-century origin of the colony seems probable. A temple of a Semitic god can only have been imposed on the Egyptian community of Elephantine through the act of some Pharaoh who settled these people here (Amasis? 569-526 B.C.). Some regard the colony as of Israelite or of Syrian-Judean origin.

In the Brooklyn Museum Collection

25. Papyrus from Elephantine, containing a marriage contract in Aramaic, tied, rolled, and sealed

A great many of the Elephantine Papyri are legal texts. They reflect a variety of interesting situations in the lives of the colonists. There was considerable litigation. Often an oath by a god was imposed, and if a claimant refused to swear it, he lost his case. He then had to renounce his claim in a manner binding on his heirs. Sales of houses and conveyances, loans with harsh clauses protecting the creditor and requiring usurious interest, marriage contracts, documents of manumission and adoption, are all represented. These texts are largely derived from the archives of two families—in the Cairo texts that of Mahseiah bar Yedoniah and in the Brooklyn texts that of Ananiah bar Azariah, the "lḥn [cantor? temple servant?] of Yahu." This Ananiah married Tamut, handmaiden of Meshullam bar Zakkur, who was possessed of a boy named Palti. They had a daughter named Yehoyishma. Later Meshullam manumitted Tamut (whose name now appears as Tapimut, perhaps in consequence of her new status), but with the proviso that she and her daughter were to provide for him and his son Zakkur. When Yehoyishma wed, it was not Ananiah, but Zakkur, who acted on her behalf. Yehoyishma could become fully free only after the death of Zakkur.

There are also numerous letters among the Elephantine texts. All these except one—the Brooklyn letter—were recovered by the German excavations. Supreme among them is the one addressed to Bagoas, governor of Judea (Yehud), in which appeal is made for his intervention in their behalf to obtain restoration of the Yahu temple, which had been destroyed in 410 B.C. at the instigation of the priests of the Egyptian god Khnum (patron divinity of Elephantine) with the aid of the local Persian commander. The satrap Arsames, who has become more vivid through the publication of the Borchardt Aramaic Leather Documents by G. R. Driver in 1954, knew nothing of it and, in fact, was out of the country at the time. The Bagoas letter not only mentions this individual, about whom Josephus gives legendary report, but also Sanballat and the high priest Johanan (Neh. 12:22; cf. 13:28). The letter received no direct reply, but a memorandum was taken along by the Jewish messenger of what was to be said to Arsames on behalf of Bagoas and Delaiah, son of Sanballat. They recommended restoration of the temple and resumption of the cult, though without permission of bloody sacrifice. The Brooklyn papyri show that the temple must have been restored, and that Persian rule lasted longer in Upper Egypt than had been thought—to the time of the "Anabasis" of Cyrus the younger (401 B.C.). A letter reporting the accession of Nepherites (399 B.C.) shows that the colony still existed at that time, but it seems probable that this ruler removed the Jews from Elephantine.

The religion of these Jews tended toward syncretism. The great list of temple contributors shows that the treasurer had funds for the deities Eshembethel and Anath-bethel, as well as for Yahu. BETHEL, which appears as a god's name in Babylonian sources and probably also in some OT passages (cf. especially Jer. 48:13), may here be a mere equivalent of "God," just as El, the name of a divinity in the Ras Shamra Texts, has become in OT times. For the goddess Anath-bethel is also called Anath-yahu. The latter name must be rendered "the Anath of Yahu" and the others correspondingly. The salutations of the letters frequently refer to "the gods." In an ostracon a certain Jarcho invokes the Babylonian gods Bel, Nabu, Shamash, and Nergal; but he might, of course, be a non-Jew. The phrase "God of heaven" occurs several times, meaning Yahweh, as in Ezra-Nehemiah. An ostracon provides an instance of Yhh ṣb't, "Yahweh of hosts."

Of great interest is the order issued by authority of Darius II in 419 B.C. directing the colony to celebrate the Feast of Unleavened Bread. Whether the Passover was mentioned in the gap before the reference to the Mazzoth Festival is a moot question. It may be that this represents the introduction of Mazzoth into the Jewish festal calendar. The word psḥ occurs in an ostracon, though the translation "Passover" is not certain. There are also probable mentions of the "Day of Preparation" and of the Sabbath in the ostraca.

The Elephantine Papyri are of great importance for the question of the time of Ezra's coming and for the date of the Samaritan Schism. For a significant literary papyrus, see AHIKAR.

Bibliography. A. H. Sayce and A. E. Cowley, Aramaic Papyri Discovered at Assuan (1906). E. Sachau, Aramäische Papyrus und Ostraka (1911). A. Ungnad, Aramäische Papyrus aus Elephantine (1911), an independent treatment of Sachau's texts. W. Staerk, Aramäische Urkunden zur Geschichte des Judentums (1908); Jüdisch-Aramäische Papyri aus Elephantine (2nd ed., 1912; both this and the preceding are invaluable to the beginner, since texts are vocalized and annotated); Alte und Neue Aramäische Papyri (1912; translations and commentary)—all three in H. Lietzmann, ed., Kleine Texte für Vorlesungen und Übungen, nos. 22/23, 32, 94. E. Meyer, Der Papyrusfund von Elephantine (2nd ed., 1912). A. E. Cowley, Aramaic Papyri of the Fifth Century B.C. (1923), an invaluable handbook. H. Gressmann, Altorientalische Texte zum AT (2nd ed., 1926), pp. 450-51. A. Vincent, La religion des Judéo-Araméens d'Élephantine (1937). E. G. Kraeling, "New Light on the Elephantine Colony," BA, vol. XV (1952), no. 3; The Brooklyn Museum Aramaic Papyri (1953), pp. 3-119 (for a full account of the whole subject), 123-319 (for the new texts with translation and commentary). G. R. Driver, Aramaic Documents of the Fifth Century B.C. (1954). J. B. Pritchard, ed., ANET (2nd ed., 1955), pp. 222-23 (translations by H. L. Ginsberg).

E. G. KRAELING

ELEUTHERUS ĭ lōō′ thər əs [ἐλεύθερος, free]. A river in Syria rising at the base of Mount Lebanon and flowing to the sea; an important boundary line referred to in the exploits of Jonathan (I Macc. 11: 7; 12:30; cf. Strabo Geography 16.2.12); probably the modern Nahr el-Kebir. E. W. SAUNDERS

ELEVEN, THE [ἕνδεκα]. A term used in the resurrection narratives to designate the twelve disciples of Jesus minus the traitor Judas (Matt. 28:16; Mark 16: 14; Luke 24:9, 33; cf. Western text of I Cor. 15:5). Acts 1:26 records the selection of Matthias to replace Judas and his enrollment with the "eleven apostles" (but the Western text reads "twelve"). Note also the variant of Codex Bezae (D) in Acts 2:14, which reads "ten" instead of "eleven." See also APOSTLE; MINISTRY, CHRISTIAN; TWELVE, THE.

M. H. SHEPHERD, JR.

ELHANAN ĕl hā′nən [אלחנן, God is gracious]. 1. A son of Jair. He slew a Philistinian giant at Gob (II Sam. 21:19; I Chr. 20:5). There are two diverse accounts of this exploit of Elhanan. In II Sam. 21:19 the text reads: "Elhanan the son of Jaareoregim, the Bethlehemite, slew Goliath"; while in I Chr. 20:5 the text is: "Elhanan the son of Jair slew Lahmi the brother of Goliath." It is generally agreed that the name Jaareoregim (יערי ארגים) is composed of a corrupted form of Jair and a transcriptional error that imported "oregim" (ארגים, "weavers") from the following line. Moreover, it is usually held that II Sam. 21:19, as emended above, represents the original text and that I Chr. 20:5 contains a harmonistic correction. Many scholars believe that the Philistine champion whom David slew was originally anonymous and that a later editor interpolated the name of Goliath, the giant actually slain by Elhanan, into the text of I Sam. 17; 21:9—H 21:10; 22:10. Older interpreters argued generally for the originality of I Chr. 20:5.

2. Son of Dodo the Bethlehemite; a member of the company of David's Mighty Men known as the "Thirty" (II Sam. 23:24; I Chr. 11:26).

Bibliography. A. R. S. Kennedy, "Samuel," The Century Bible (1904); J. Goettsberger, Die Bücher der Chronik oder Paralipomenon, HS (1939); W. Rudolph, Chronikbücher, HAT (1955); J. Bright, A History of Israel (1959), pp. 171 ff.

E. R. DALGLISH

ELI ē′lī [עלי, exalted; an abbreviation of Y is exalted]. The priest at Shiloh to whom the boy SAMUEL was brought to fulfil Hannah's vow (I Sam. 1:1-2:11). Associated with him in this priesthood were his two sons, Hophni and Phinehas (1:3). At this time the ark was kept at Shiloh (4:4), which may mean that this sanctuary was the central shrine of the Israelite amphictyony. It was the news of the capture of the ark by the Philistines and of the death of his two sons, who had accompanied it into battle, that caused Eli's death (4:11-18).

In I Sam. 2:27-36 we have a prophecy of the fall of the house of Eli, which seems to be an expansion of the oracle found in 3:11-14. The latter refers to an imminent catastrophe which will strike the house of Eli as a punishment for the sin of Eli's sons (2:12-17)—i.e., the capture of the ark and the destruction of Shiloh. The former shows a knowledge of the exile of Abiathar (I Kings 2:26-27) and of the problems of the priests dispossessed from the local sanctuaries mentioned in the account of Josiah's reform (II Kings 23:9).

I Sam. 2:27-36 also presupposes the accuracy of the genealogical references which connect Abiathar to the house of Eli. Abiathar is said to be "one of the sons of Ahimelech the son of Ahitub" (22:20; cf. II Sam. 8:17, where the correct reading is probably "Abiathar, the son of Ahimelech, the son of Ahitub"). I Sam. 14:3 describes Ahitub as "Ichabod's brother, son of Phinehas, son of Eli, the priest of the LORD in Shiloh," and gives the name of his son as Ahijah—the chaplain of Saul (vs. 18; see AHIMELECH 1). But vs. 3 seems spurious, for the genealogical clause is without syntax, and the mention of a brother's name in a genealogy is unusual. Nor does the genealogy serve any purpose in the ensuing account. Rather, the purpose of the verse is to connect both the Nob priesthood and Ahijah with the house of Eli and to include both in the condemnation of the Shiloh priesthood, so that it might appear that Yahweh had rejected all the priests mentioned in this period in favor of the Zadokites.

Eli's ancestry is nowhere given in the OT. One tradition assigns him to the Aaronide house of Ithamar (Jos. Antiq. V.xi.5; cf. I Chr. 24:3), another to the rival house of Eleazar (II Esd. 1:2-3; cf. Exod. 6:23, 25). Originally Eli's family was probably that of the ancient priesthood at Shiloh.

Bibliography. W. R. Arnold, Ephod and Ark (1917), pp. 14-15; M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 146. Contrast W. F. Albright, Archaeology and the Religion of Israel (1956), pp. 201-2.

R. W. CORNEY

ELI, ELI, LAMA SABACHTHANI ē′lī, lä′mə, sə băk′thə nī [אלי אלי למה עזבתני; Aram. אלהי אלהי למה שבקתני, see below; ἡλὶ ἡλὶ λαμὰ σαβαχθανί]; ELOI, ELOI ē′lō ī— [ἐλωΐ] in Mark. The Hebrew-Aramaic expression cited in Matt. 27:46; Mark 15: 34 from Ps. 22:1 as an utterance of Jesus on the cross. The Markan form, with Eloi, is closer to the Aramaic, but much variation exists in the MS tradition of both Matthew and Mark, as the text was more or less conformed to the Hebrew or subject to the influence of the LXX. Eloi occurs for Eli in Matthew, and Eli for Eloi in Mark, in some good MS authorities. Assimilation of one gospel to the other, of course, accounts for some of this variation. Lama occurs as lema (the best attested reading in Matthew) and lima, both of which are closer to the Aramaic; the verb is variously transliterated, and in codices Vaticanus (B) and Bezae (D) in Mark and in D in Matthew a transliteration of the Hebrew is substituted. The evangelists accompany their quotation with a translation into Greek which is virtually identical but which differs from the LXX in the omission of προσχες μοι ("give heed to me"). The RSV renders both as: "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" Codex D and some OL MSS read ὠνείδισας, "reproach," for "forsake"—doubtless a softening of the statement, although a few scholars have regarded it as more primitive.

Opinion is divided in regard to the original language of the saying and as to whether Jesus himself would more naturally have used Hebrew or Aramaic. The texts themselves support an Aramaic or mixed form. Proponents of the Hebrew suggest that it would more easily explain the confusion of "my God" with "Elijah," and the reading "my Power" in the Gospel of Peter (5:10), a common metonym for "God" in this period. Cf. Aquila's translation here: ἰσχυρέ. While these points are debatable, the Murabba'at documents indicate that a form of Hebrew, somewhat influenced by Aramaic, may have been in use in Palestine in the first century A.D.

See also CRUCIFIXION; CHRIST.

Bibliography. E. König, ET, 11 (1900), 237-38, 334; E. Nestle, ET, 11 (1900), 287-88, 335-36; G. Dalman, Die Worte Jesu (2nd ed., 1930), pp. 42-44; V. Taylor, Jesus and His Sacrifice (1937), pp. 157-63; C. S. C. Williams, Alterations to the Text of the Synoptic Gospels and Acts (1951), pp. 38-40.

A. WIKGREN

ELIAB ĭ lī′əb [אֱלִיאָב, El is father]. 1. A son of Helon; a leader of the tribe of Zebulun. He represented his tribe in the time of Moses in such concerns as the census and the dedicatory offerings for the tabernacle (Num. 1:9; 2:7; 7:24, 29; 10:16).

2. A Reubenite of the family of Pallu; the father of Dathan and Abiram, who were among the principals in the rebellion of Korah against the leadership of Moses and Aaron (Num. 16:1, 12; cf. Num. 26:8-9; Deut. 11:6).

3. One of the ancestors of the prophet Samuel; listed among the sons of Kohath (I Chr. 6:27—H 6:12). In the parallel genealogies his name is given as Elihu (I Sam. 1:1) and Eliel (I Chr. 6:34—H 6:19).

4. The eldest son of Jesse the Bethlehemite. His appearance and height thoroughly impressed Samuel as befitting a king, but he was passed over by the prophet in favor of David (I Sam. 16:6; I Chr. 2:13). Eliab was in the army of Saul when the Philistine giant defied them in the Valley of Elah, and became greatly incensed at his youngest brother, David, who had arrived at the scene of battle with provisions from home, because of his inquisitiveness regarding the rewards Saul had offered to the warrior that would slay the giant (I Sam. 17:13-28). Eliab's daughter Abihail appears to have been the mother of Mahalath, the wife of Rehoboam (II Chr. 11:18).

5. A Levitical musician who was among those who played harps set to 'alâmôth (see MUSIC) in the sacred orchestra in the time of David (I Chr. 15:18, 20; 16:5).

6. One of the famed Gadite warriors who joined the proscribed band of David at Ziklag and who subsequently became officers in his army (I Chr. 12:9, 18—H 12:10, 19).

E. R. DALGLISH

ELIADA ĭ lī′ə də [אֶלְיָדָע, God knows]; KJV ELIADAH in I Kings 11:23. 1. One of the sons of David who was born at Jerusalem (II Sam. 5:16; I Chr. 3:8). In the parallel list he is called BEELIADA, which is a disguised form of Baaliada (I Chr. 14:6).

2. The father of REZON (I Kings 11:23).

3. A commander of a large force of Benjaminite bowmen in the royal military corps stationed at Jerusalem in the reign of Jehoshaphat (II Chr. 17:17).

E. R. DALGLISH

ELIADAS. KJV Apoc. form of ELIOENAI 5.

ELIADUN. KJV Apoc. form of ILIADUN.

ELIAH. KJV form of ELIJAH in I Chr. 8:27; Ezra 10:26.

ELIAHBA ĭ lī′ə bə [אֶלְיַחְבָא, God hides]. A Shaalbonite or Shaalabbinnite; one of the company of the Davidic Mighty Men known as the "Thirty" (II Sam. 23:32; I Chr. 11:33).

ELIAKIM ĭ lī′ə kĭm [אֶלְיָקִים, God raises up; Ἐλιακείμ]. 1. Son of Hilkiah, and royal chamberlain to Hezekiah (II Kings 18:18, 26, 37). This office (lit., "over-the-house") had increased in importance from Solomon's time (cf. I Kings 4:2-6) until it was second only to the king. Isaiah had prophesied (Isa. 22:15-25) that Eliakim would supersede Shebna; and we see in II Kings 18:18 that their ranks have been reversed.

2. The second son of Josiah; his name was changed to Jehoiakim by Pharaoh Neco when the latter made him the puppet king of Judah (II Kings 23:34). The name is given only here and in II Chr. 36:4. The significance of the new name was not in its intrinsic meaning ("Yahweh raises up" substituted for "God raises up"), but was simply in the fact that it was new. The Pharaoh had, in a sense, remade Jehoiakim, and the latter was his vassal. The "new person" was appropriately given a new name. The choice of name may have been satirical on Pharaoh's part, implying that Yahweh was on his side.

3. A priest at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem after it had been rebuilt under Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:41).

4. Son of Abiud, named in the postexilic division of the genealogy of Jesus (Matt. 1:13).

5. Son of Melea, in Luke's genealogy of Jesus (Luke 3:30).

J. M. WARD

ELIALIS ĭ lī′ə lĭs [Ἐδιαλείς (B), Ἐλιαλει (A)] (I Esd. 9:34); KJV ELIALI —lī. An Israelite who put away his foreign wife and children. The name is omitted in the parallel Ezra 10:38.

C. T. FRITSCH

ELIAM ĭ lī′əm [אליעם, God is kinsman]. 1. The father of Bathsheba (II Sam. 11:3); called Ammiel in I Chr. 3:5. The names are the same; the components are merely reversed.

2. Son of Ahithophel the Gilonite; one of the Mighty Men of David known as the "Thirty" (II Sam. 23:34). His name appears in a mutilated form in I Chr. 11:36*b* as Ahijah the Pelonite.

E. R. DALGLISH

ELIAONIAS. KJV form of ELIEHOENAI in I Esd. 8:31.

ELIAS. KJV NT form of ELIJAH.

ELIASAPH ĭ lī′ə săf [אליסף, God has added]. 1. Leader of Gad; son of Deuel, or Reuel (Num. 1:14; 2:14; 7:42, 47; 10:20). He was one of twelve tribal leaders or deputies who assisted Moses in taking a census of Israel and in other tasks in the wilderness.

2. Leader of the Gershonites in the wilderness; son of Lael (Num. 3:24). The Gershonites were responsible for the care of the tabernacle and other appointments within the tent of meeting. See PRINCE.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 70, 90, 173. R. F. JOHNSON

ELIASHIB ĭ lī′ə shĭb [אלישיב, God restores; theophorous names with the element restores have been found in Akkad., Aram., and other Semitic languages; Apoc. Ἐλιάσιβος]; KJV Apoc. ELEAZURUS ĕl′ĭ ə zo͝or′əs (3 below); ELIASIB ĭ lī′ə sĭb (2 below); ELISIMUS ĭ lĭs′ĭ məs (4 below); ENASIBUS ĭ năs′ə bəs (5 below). 1. A priest of the time of David (I Chr. 24:12).

2. High priest in the time of Nehemiah (Ezra 10:6; Neh. 3:1, 20-21; I Esd. 9:1). He directed the priests in the rebuilding of the Sheep Gate in the city wall (Neh. 3:1), and was subsequently guilty of defiling the temple by assigning space in it to Tobiah, the "Ammonite" opponent of Nehemiah (13:4, 7). The identification between this Eliashib and the high priest (e.g., 3:1) has sometimes been questioned, but without sufficient cause.

3. A postexilic singer among those who had married foreign women (Ezra 10:24; I Esd. 9:24).

4. A layman; son of Zattu, in the same list as 3 above (Ezra 10:27; I Esd. 9:28).

5. A layman; son of Bani, in the same list as 3 above (Ezra 10:36; I Esd. 9:34).

6. A descendant of Zerubbabel and, remotely, of David (I Chr. 3:24). J. M. WARD

ELIASIS ĭ lī′ə sĭs [Ἐλιασείς (B)] (I Esd. 9:34). One of the Israelites, of the family of Bani, who put away his foreign wife and children in the time of Ezra. A clear parallel in Ezra 10:36-37 is not found.

C. T. FRITSCH

ELIATHAH ĭ lī′ə thə [אליאתה, God comes]. A temple musician, son of Heman (I Chr. 25:4, 27). Perhaps it is not a proper name, but part of a prayer which has been incorporated into this list of musicians. If so, we should read: ēlî attâ, "Thou art my God." See GIDDALTI.

Bibliography. G. B. Gray, Studies in Hebrew Proper Names (1896), p. 220. R. W. CORNEY

ELIDAD ĭ lī′dăd [אלידד, God has loved] (Num. 34:21). A Benjaminite, son of Chislon. He was one of those appointed, under the oversight of Eleazar and Joshua, to superintend the distribution of the W Jordanian territory among the ten tribes to be settled in that area of Canaan. The meaning of the name Elidad and of other names in this account underscores Israel's dependence upon God for the new life in Canaan.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 34, 183. R. F. JOHNSON

ELIEHOENAI ĭ lī′ə hō ē′nī [אליהועיני, my eyes are toward Yahu]; KJV ELIAONIAS —ō nī′əs [LXX Ἐλιαωνίας] in I Esd. 8:31; KJV ELIHOENAI ĕl′ə hō ē′nī in Ezra 8:4; KJV ELIOENAI ĕl′ĭ ō ē′nī in I Chr. 26:3. 1. A gatekeeper of the Levitical family of Korah (I Chr. 26:3).

2. Head of a family who returned to Jerusalem with Ezra (Ezra 8:4; I Esd. 8:31).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 32-33, 163, 216. H. H. GUTHRIE, JR.

ELIEL ĭ lī′əl [אליאל, El is my God(?)]. 1. A chief or family of that part of the tribe of Manasseh which dwelt E of Jordan (I Chr. 5:24; not mentioned in the parallel family lists in Num. 26:28-34; Josh. 17:2 ff).

2. A Kohathite; one of the Levitical singers in the temple (I Chr. 6:34). This Eliel is apparently to be equated with the Eliab of I Chr. 6:27 and possibly with the Elihu of I Sam. 1:1.

3. Two chiefs or families of the tribe of Benjamin (I Chr. 8:20, 22; neither is mentioned in the parallel lists in Gen. 46:21; Num. 26:38-41).

4. Three(?) heroes among those in David's service (I Chr. 11:46, 47; 12:11). Whether the Eliel of I Chr. 12:11 is to be equated with one of the other two or not is impossible to say.

5. A Levite (see PRIESTS AND LEVITES) of the family of Hebron mentioned in connection with the bringing of the ARK OF THE COVENANT to Jerusalem (I Chr. 15:9, 11).

6. A Levite purportedly of the time of King Hezekiah (II Chr. 31:13).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 140. H. H. GUTHRIE, JR.

ELIENAI ĕl′ĭ ē′nī [אליעיני, misspelling of אליועיני, my eyes are toward Yahu]. A family of the tribe of Benjamin (I Chr. 8:20).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 237.

ELIEZER ĕl′ĭ ē′zər [אליעזר, my God is my help]; ELIEZAR in I Esd. 8:43; 9:19. 1. The servant of Abraham who, in lieu of a son, would have been Abraham's heir (Gen. 15:2). The Hebrew text is difficult and probably corrupt (cf. commentaries ad loc.). Either Eliezer was from Damascus and the Hebrew rendered "heir" (KJV "steward") has been tampered with in order to play on "Damascus," or "Damascus" has been added to the text as a gloss on the word for "heir." It is presumably Eliezer who is sent to find a wife for Isaac (Gen. 24:2 ff).

2. Moses' second son (Exod. 18:4; I Chr. 23:15, 17; 26:25).

3. A person or family in a list wrongly assigned to Benjamin, actually of Zebulun (I Chr. 7:8).

4. A priest mentioned in connection with the bringing of the ARK OF THE COVENANT to Jerusalem (I Chr. 15:24).

5. A chief of the Reubenites (I Chr. 27:16).

6. A prophet in the time of Jehoshaphat (II Chr. 20:37).

7. A leader in the time of Ezra (Ezra 8:16; I Esd. 8:43).

8. A priest who put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:18; I Esd. 9:19).

9. A Levite who put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:23); called Jonah in I Esd. 9:23.

10. A member of the clan of Harim who put away his foreign wife (Ezra (10:31); apparently called Elionas in I Esd. 9:32.

11. A name in the Lukan genealogy of Jesus (Luke 3:29).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 16, 18, 38, 70, 90, 154, 156.

H. H. GUTHRIE, JR.

ELIHOENAI. KJV form of ELIEHOENAI in Ezra 8:4.

ELIHOREPH ĕl′ə hôr′ĭf [אליחרף] (I Kings 4:3). Son of Shisha; one of the high officials in the Solomonic court. He shared with his brother Ahijah the position of royal secretary. However, J. A. Montgomery (see bibliography) considers this difficult name to be the office of an official known as "Over-the-Year" and, omitting the words "the priest" after Zadok (vs. 2), interprets the text to mean that Azariah ben Zadok held the office of "Over-the-Year" —i.e., the ranking officer (cf. Assyrian līmu).

Bibliography. J. A. Montgomery, The Books of Kings, ICC (1951). E. R. DALGLISH

ELIHU ĭ lī′hū [אליהוא or אליהוא, he (Yahu) is my God]. 1. An ancestor of Samuel (I Sam. 1:1); called Eliel in I Chr. 6:34 and Eliab in I Chr. 6:27.

2. A chief of the tribe of Manasseh who deserted Saul to join David at Ziklag (I Chr. 12:20).

3. A Korahite gatekeeper (I Chr. 26:7).

4. One of David's brothers (I Chr. 27:18); but the name should be read "Eliab" with the LXX (cf. I Sam. 16:6; 17:13, 23; I Chr. 2:13; II Chr. 11:18).

5. The young man who speaks to Job when the three friends have failed to silence him (Job 32:2, 4-6; 34:1; 35:1; 36:1). Elihu's speeches are very probably an addition to the book. Represented as a BUZITE (cf. Gen. 22:21; Jer. 25:33) of the family of Ram (cf. Ruth 4:19; I Chr. 2:9-10), he would come from the same region as Job and the friends but be more closely connected with the Hebrews. His genealogy thus symbolizes the function the interpolater of Job 32–37 would have him fulfil—to raise the discussion to a more theological level.

See JOB, BOOK OF.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 18, 70, 143. H. H. GUTHRIE, JR.

ELIJAH ĭ lī′jə [אליהו, Y is God; LXX has a variety of forms, as Ἠλίου (II Kings 1:3; Jth. 8:1), Ἠλειά (I Chr. 8:27), Ἠλίας (Mal. 4:5—G 3:22), Ἐλία (Ezra 10:21), Ἀϊδίας (I Esd. 9:27); NT Ἠλεῖας, Ἠλίας]; KJV: ELIAH ĭ lī′ə (I Chr. 8:27; Ezra 10:26); AEDIAS ī dī′əs (I Esd. 9:27); HELIAS hĭ lī′əs (II Esd. 7:39); ELIU ĭ lī′ū (Jth. 8:1); ELIAS ĭ lī′əs (NT). 1. See ELIJAH THE PROPHET.

2. A descendant of the patriarch Benjamin; a son of Jeroham. He was the head of a clan and dwelt in Jerusalem (I Chr. 8:27).

3. A priest who returned from the Exile in the time of Ezra. His father's name was Harim. Elijah, the priest, pledged to divorce the foreign wife whom he had married during the Exile (Ezra 10:21).

4. A layman of Ezra's time, son of Elam, who divorced his foreign wife (Ezra 10:26; I Esd. 9:27).

5. One of the ancestors of Judith; father of Ahitub (Jth. 8:1). His name is sometimes rendered as Elihu, because of the ambiguity of the Greek Ἠλίου, which represents both Elijah (II Kings 1:3) and Elihu (I Sam. 1:1). S. SZIKSZAI ELIJAH, APOCALYPSE OF. A brief, thoroughly Jewish apocalypse, written ca. A.D. 261. It has a conclusion very similar to that of Revelation: devastating wars of the Anti-Messiah (Gigit) conclude this present evil age; the Messiah (Winon?) establishes a forty-year kingdom of plenty, which the surviving saints enjoy; Gog and Magog war against Jerusalem, but are destroyed; a general resurrection and judgment usher in God's new and righteous age; the wicked are sent to a fiery pit, but the saints dwell with God in a combination of a glorious Jerusalem, seen descending from heaven to earth, and a new Garden of Eden.

Bibliography. M. Buttenwieser, Die hebräische Elias-Apokalypse (1897). M. RIST

ELIJAH THE PROPHET. A prophet of the ninth century B.C. from Tishbe of Gilead in the Northern Kingdom; the master of Elisha. Elijah's faith in and zealous loyalty to the Lord predestined him to take leadership in the struggle against the encroaching forces of the Tyrian Baalism fostered by Jezebel. His acts and words were long remembered in the circle of disciples, and his fame grew to more than human dimensions until, finally, he was regarded as the harbinger of the eschatological age.

The reports on the acts of Elijah are dissimilar in nature, and they have to be measured separately for their historical value.

1. Miracles and miraculous elements
2. Struggle against Baalism
3. The prophet's denunciation of kings
4. Eschatological forerunner of the coming Day of the Lord
Bibliography

1. Miracles and miraculous elements. The thread of miracles repeatedly appears in the Elijah legends. At his first appearance in the biblical record, Elijah announced to Ahab the coming of a disastrous drought (I Kings 17:1) whose severity was also recounted in secular records (Jos. Antiq. VIII.xiii.2). During the drought, the prophet hid himself by the Brook of Cherith and was fed by ravens. When the brook dried up, he went to Zarephath, a Phoenician town in the territory ruled by Sidon (I Kings 17:2-9). In Zarephath he stayed with a widow and her son. Their food was provided by the jar of meal and cruse of oil which remained miraculously unspent during the whole drought (vss. 10-16). One day the son of the widow became ill and died (or was close to death). But Elijah revived the child with the power of prayer and with the application of magico-medical techniques (vss. 17-24; cf. II Kings 4:34-35).

There emerges from Elijah's conversation with Obadiah (I Kings 18:1-16) the fact that the prophet was transported in a miraculous way by the Spirit of the Lord (vs. 12; cf. II Kings 2:16). There is a miraculous element in the fire descending from the sky and consuming the burnt offering in the scene of Mount Carmel (I Kings 18:20-46), but it is clear that the narrator did not lose sight of the main issue —the struggle of Yahwism against Baalism. In the same way, the miraculous feeding of Elijah by an angel on the road to Horeb (19:4-8) does not overshadow the central question of the encounter of the divine word and the prophet. The miracle of the fire, which descended from heaven on the prophet's word and consumed two of King Ahaziah's troops, each containing fifty men and a captain, who came to capture Elijah (II Kings 1:9-16), has a different character. The lack of ethical concern and the immoral thaumaturgical attitude is, on the whole, far removed from the spirit of the Elijah legends.

The narrative of the translation of Elijah (II Kings 2:1-12) dovetails with the Elisha legends, and serves to support the legitimacy of the prophetic succession of Elisha. This is the only account which places Elijah, otherwise always a solitary person, in the company of the prophetic guilds. Elijah and his disciple, Elisha, went from Gilgal to Bethel and from there to Jericho. Elijah repeatedly bade his disciple leave him alone, but Elisha followed his master in this peregrination. When they reached the Jordan, Elijah struck the water of the Jordan with his mantle, whereupon the water parted, and they crossed dry-shod (vss. 1-9).

Elisha, who was aware of the imminent translation of his master, asked Elijah for his share as the firstborn (i.e., two thirds of the inheritance; cf. Deut. 21: 17) from his spirit, which he apparently obtained (II Kings 2:15). Suddenly a chariot of fire and horses of fire separated the prophet and his disciple, and "Elijah went up by a whirlwind into heaven" (vs. 11). Some fifty men from the prophetic guilds sought him for three days in the mountains and valleys in vain (vss. 15-18), for they thought "it may be that the spirit of the LORD has caught him up and cast him upon some mountain or into some valley" (vs. 16; cf. I Kings 18:12).

2. Struggle against Baalism. During the reign of AHAB, who was politically one of the great monarchs of the Northern Kingdom, the very existence of Yahwism was endangered. Ahab's wife, Jezebel, daughter of Ethbaal, king of Tyre, brought, along with herself, the worship of the Tyrian Baal, erected a temple for the deity (I Kings 16:30-33), and supported a huge college of Baal and Asherah prophets (I Kings 18: 19). Apparently "Ahab served Baal a little" (II Kings 10:18), but he did not completely abandon the faith of his fathers, as the names of his children, AHAZIAH; JEHORAM; ATHALIAH (all of them formed with the divine name Yahweh), indicate. But compromise, false tolerance, and syncretism were incompatible with the Lord's claim for exclusive allegiance. Probably the prophetic guilds' sharp criticism of the court's "limping with two different opinions" was the prelude to the general persecution of Yahwistic prophets (I Kings 18:13; 19:14). Against this dark background, the encounter of King Ahab and Elijah unfolds with dramatic force.

Elijah, himself, went to Ahab to announce the end of the drought (18:1). He was addressed by the king as "troubler of Israel," but he hurled the accusation back to Ahab, confronted him with his apostasy, and challenged the prophets of Baal to a contest (vss. 17-19), which would serve to decide whether the Lord or Baal was God. All Israel was summoned to witness the ordeal. Elijah stood alone against the 450 Baal prophets. The assembled people accepted as conditions of the contest that the sacrificial animals be placed upon the unkindled wood on the altars—one for Baal, another for the Lord—and that the prophets of Baal and Elijah were to ask for fire from the deity, with the provision that whichever deity answered with fire must be accepted as God (vss. 20-24). From morning until noon, the Baal prophets entreated their god, whirled around the altar in a grotesque, limping dance, and, in the final frenzy, cut themselves with lances and swords; but all these attempts were in vain; there was no divine answer (vss. 25-29). In contrast with the desperate, ecstatic frenzy of the Baal prophets, the dignity and serenity of Elijah were indicative of his profound trust in and reliance upon the only God. Upon Elijah's command, water was poured upon the sacrificial animal on the altar of the Lord, probably as a rain-making device in accord with ancient sympathetic magical practices (vss. 30-35). After this, Elijah prayed, and the fire of the Lord fell and consumed the burnt offering. In the presence of this miracle, the people confessed that the Lord was God, and, upon Elijah's command, massacred the prophets of Baal (vss. 36-40). The final scene of the contest of Mount Carmel is the coming of rain after the long drought and Ahab's and Elijah's return to the city of Jezreel (vss. 41-46). The details of the contest of Mount Carmel reveal the growth of the miraculous element in the tradition, but the essential historicity of the contest can hardly be denied.

The momentary victory of Elijah on Mount Carmel was of no avail, for in the next scene he fled from before the revenge of Jezebel. He went to Judah and from there on a pilgrimage to Mount Horeb. On the mount Elijah beheld the power of wind, earthquake, and fire, which phenomena belonged to the theophanic pattern (see THEOPHANY); but the Lord did not appear through these forces. Then a voice commanded Elijah to go and to anoint Hazael as king of Syria, Jehu as king of Israel, and Elisha as the successor to the prophet (19:1-17). In this command and in the divine promise to keep a remnant of seven thousand faithful to the true faith (vs. 18), the struggle of Baalism and Yahwism is the dominant theme. In a loosely connected story, Elijah called Elisha into his service (vss. 19-21); he did not anoint Hazael and Jehu, in spite of the divine commission, but later Elisha completed this mission (cf. II Kings 8–9).

The claim of Yahweh-worship to the exclusion of other deities reappears in the (most likely historical) incident of Elijah's condemnation of King Ahaziah, the son of Ahab, who sent messengers to inquire of the oracle of BAAL-ZEBUB, the god of Ekron, concerning his recovery from sickness (II Kings 1:1-8).

3. The prophet's denunciation of kings. Elijah courageously stood up against King Ahab and his son Ahaziah. He denounced these kings because of their syncretistic attitude which permitted the worship of foreign deities together with the worship of the Lord (I Kings 18:17-19; II Kings 1:1-8).

Besides these instances, the prophet raised his voice against the king in the case of Naboth's vineyard, where the ethical implications of Yahwism were at stake (I Kings 21). King Ahab ardently desired to acquire the vineyard of NABOTH, who refused to sell it. Jezebel instigated a trial in which Naboth was sentenced to death on a fabricated charge. After the execution of Naboth, Ahab took possession of the vineyard. Elijah's scornful words branded Ahab as a murderer and robber and foretold the doom of the royal house (I Kings 21:17-24).

The Chronicler reports of a letter of Elijah to Jehoram, king of Judah, proclaiming punishment for the king's apostasy and fratricide (II Chr. 21:12-15). The letter is generally recognized as a composition of the Chronicler.

4. Eschatological forerunner of the coming Day of the Lord. Elijah's memory was piously preserved in the circle of the prophetic guilds which claimed a spiritual kinship with Elijah through his beloved disciple Elisha. But he made a profound impression on the imagination of the people of Israel, too. Later ages remembered the mystery of Elijah's translation, and expected his return as the forerunner of the coming Day of the Lord (Mal. 4:5). He was expected to "turn the hearts of fathers to their children and the hearts of children to their fathers" (vs. 6), and to come forth from the heavenly chambers "to restore the tribes of Israel" (Ecclus. 48:10).

In the NT, the same role of the eschatological precursor is attributed to Elijah. Some of the contemporaries of Jesus thought that he was Elijah (Matt. 16:14; Luke 9:8). Others thought of John the Baptist as Elijah, but he disowned the role (John 1:21). Yet in the early church John, as the forerunner of Christ, was regarded either as an heir to the spirit and power of Elijah (Luke 1:17), or as Elijah redivivus (Matt. 11:14; 17:10-13). At the transfiguration of Jesus, Elijah appeared together with Moses (Matt. 17:3-4; Mark 9:4-5).

The "prophet" of the Dead Sea Manual of Discipline (IX. 11) is probably Elijah in the same role of messianic herald. He remained the expected harbinger of the age to come and of the Messiah, in the Mishnaic literature also (Sheḳ. 2.5; Soṭ. 9.15; B. M. 1.8; Eduyoth 8.7).

Bibliography. A. S. Peake, "Elijah and Jezebel. The Conflict with the Tyrian Baal," BJRL, XI (1927), 296-321; A. Alt, "Das Gottesurteil auf dem Karmel," Beer-Festschrift (1935), pp. 1-18; R. de Vaux, "Les prophètes de Baal sur le mont Carmel," BMBeyrouth, V (1941), 7-20; O. Eissfeldt, Der Gott Karmel (1953); K. Galling, "Der Gott Karmel und die Aechtung der fremden Götter," Alt-Festschrift (1953), pp. 105-25; Elie le prophète selon les Ecritures et les traditions chrétiennes, I (1956). S. SZIKSZAI ELIKA ĭ lī′kə [אליקא] (II Sam. 23:25). A Harodite whose name appears in the list of Davidic Mighty Men known as the "Thirty." He is omitted from the similar catalogue in I Chr. 11:27.

ELIM ē′lĭm [אילם, large trees]. The fourth stopping place after the Israelites crossed the Red Sea, and the first place where they found fresh water. It was marked by twelve springs of water and seventy palm trees (Exod. 15:27; 16:1; Num. 33:9-10).

Elim is commonly identified with Wadi Gharandel, where vegetation, palms, and abundant water are found. This site is ca. sixty-three miles from Suez, and travelers who make the journey to Sinai from Egypt usually camp there. Some scholars who would place Mount Sinai in Arabia have located Elim near Elath on the Gulf of Aqabah. It also has been suggested that the name Elim, dubiously interpreted as meaning "gods" (אלים), may refer to a cultic place located near the palm trees and water springs.

Bibliography. E. H. Palmer, The Desert of the Exodus (1872), p. 46. J. L. MIHELIC

ELIMELECH ĭ lĭm′ə lĕk [אלימלך, God is king]. A Bethlehemite who, with his wife, Naomi, and his two sons, migrated to Moab in the days of the judges to escape the famine in Israel. After he and his two sons died, Naomi and Ruth, his daughter-in-law, returned to Bethlehem, where Ruth subsequently married his wealthy kinsman Boaz (Ruth 1:2-3; 2:1, 3; 4:3, 9). E. R. DALGLISH

ELIOENAI ĕl′ĭ ō ē′nī [אליועינ[י], my eyes are toward my God]; KJV ELIONAS —ō′nəs [Ἐλιωνας] in I Esd. 9:22, ELIADAS ĭ lī′ə dəs [Ἐλιαδας] in I Esd. 9:28. 1. A postexilic descendant of David (I Chr. 3:23-24).

2. A chief of the tribe of Simeon (I Chr. 4:36).

3. Listed as a Benjaminite family in what is actually a list of families of Zebulun (I Chr. 7:8).

4. A priest of the sons of Pashhur who put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:22; I Esd. 9:22).

5. A son of Zattu who put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:27; I Esd. 9:28).

6. A postexilic priest (Neh. 12:41).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 32, 33, 163, 216. H. H. GUTHRIE, JR.

ELIONAS ĕl′ĭ ō′nəs [Ἐλιωνάς]. 1. One of those who put away their foreign wives (I Esd. 9:32); apparently called Eliezer in Ezra 10:31.

2. KJV form of ELIOENAI (4) in I Esd. 9:22.

ELIPHAL ĭ lī′fəl [אליפל]. Son of Ur(?); a member of the Mighty Men of David known as the "Thirty" (I Chr. 11:35). However, in II Sam. 23:34 he is called Eliphelet (see ELIPHELET 2) the son of AHASBAI of Maacah, which the Chronicler rendered "Eliphal the son of Ur, Hepher the Mecherathite" (I Chr. 11:

35*b*-36*a*). Since the term "Mecherathite" is otherwise unknown, it appears reasonable to consider it a faulty reading of "Maacah," while "Ahasbai" was read by the Chronicler as "Ur Hepher." In these latter two readings is no doubt concealed the true name of the father of Eliphal. E. R. DALGLISH

ELIPHALAT. KJV Apoc. form of ELIPHELET 5.

ELIPHALET. KJV form of ELIPHELET in II Sam. 5:16; I Chr. 14:7; I Esd. 8:39.

ELIPHAZ ĕl'ə făz [אליפז, possibly God is fine gold or God crushes]. 1. The eldest son of Esau and his Hittite wife Adah; husband of a Horite concubine Timna (Gen. 36:4, 10-11, 15; I Chr. 1:35-36). Thus the ancestor of several Edomite clan chiefs (אלופים; cf. Gen. 36:15).

2. The first and oldest of Job's three friends (Job 2:11; 4:1; 15:1; 22:1; 42:7, 9). Though the wisest, Eliphaz is presented throughout the dialogue as a dogmatician, holding to a "merely moralistic view of salvation." First Eliphaz exhorted Job to "despise not the chastening of the Almighty" (5:17) that he might enjoy prosperity, next accused him of "doing away with [religion]" (15:4) and turning against God, then finally charged him with numerous sins and concluded with an appeal for conversion that was still grounded on his dogma of retribution (ch. 22).

Since this Eliphaz is regularly called "the Temanite" (התימני), and TEMAN (תימן) designates both an Edomite district renowned for wisdom (cf. Jer. 49:7) and the eldest son of 1 above (Gen. 36:11), Eliphaz 2 may be seen as derived from Eliphaz 1. However, see TEMANITE 2 for another view.

See also JOB, BOOK OF. L. HICKS

ELIPHELEHU ĭ lĭf'ə lē'hū [אליפלהו, God, distinguish him!] (I Chr. 15:18, 21); KJV ELIPHELEH ĭ lĭf'ə lə. A Levite of the second rank appointed by David to be one of the "leaders with lyres." Names formed of vocative, verb in the imperative, and expressed object are rare in Hebrew, though not uncommon in other Semitic languages. The omission of this name from a similar list in I Chr. 16:5 may indicate that it is an addition to the original list.

Bibliography. G. B. Gray, Studies in Hebrew Proper Names (1896), pp. 220-22. R. W. CORNEY

ELIPHELET ĭ lĭf'ə lĕt [אליפלט, God is deliverance; Ἐλιφαλατος; Ἐλιφαλατ]; KJV ELIPHALET in II Sam. 5:16; I Chr. 14:7; I Esd. 8:39; ELIPHALAT —lăt in I Esd. 9:33. Alternately: ELPELET ĕl pē'lĭt, KJV ELPALET —pā— [אלפלט] in I Chr. 14:5. 1. A son of David (II Sam. 5:16; I Chr. 3:6, 8; 14:5, 7). The repetition of the name in I Chr. 3; 14 must be due to a scribal error.

2. One of David's MIGHTY MEN (II Sam. 23:34); cf. ELIPHAL (I Chr. 11:35).

3. A Benjaminite, descendant of Saul and Jonathan (I Chr. 8:39).

4. One of those who returned from exile with Ezra (Ezra 8:13; I Esd. 8:39).

5. One of those who put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:33; I Esd. 9:33).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 16, 18, 34, 90, 156. H. H. GUTHRIE, JR.

ELISABETH. KJV form of ELIZABETH.

ELISEUS ĕl'ə sē'əs. Douay Version form of ELISHA.

ELISHA ĭ lī'shə [אלישע, God is salvation; Ἐλισαῖος]; KJV NT and Apoc. ELISEUS ĕl'ə sē'əs. A ninth-century-B.C. prophet of the N kingdom; the disciple and successor of ELIJAH. The biblical account of Elisha embraces a considerable part of the first thirteen chapters of II Kings.

1. His call and the dates of his ministry. Elisha, son of Shaphat, was a peasant of ABEL-MEHOLAH,* but that he was considerably rich is indicated by the fact that he was plowing with twelve yoke of oxen at the time that Elijah called him into his service (I Kings 19:19). The lavish farewell feast, consisting of the meat of the oxen, that he gave to the people before his departure with Elijah also supports the assumption that he was wealthy. Fig. ABE 2.

His name appears for the first time in a divine command given to Elijah, according to which Elijah had to anoint Elisha as his successor (I Kings 19:16-17). Apparently another thread of tradition reports the actual call, because there is no trace of anointment, but it is reported that Elijah cast his mantle upon Elisha (vss. 19-21). This act represented a real transfer of the prophetic power to Elisha, so he followed his new master. The same motif of the transfer of the prophetic commission and spirit to Elisha by means of Elijah's mantle appears in the scene where Elijah was transported, amid chariot and horses of fire, by a whirlwind into heaven (II Kings 2:13-15).

The beginning of Elisha's ministry coincides with the last years of Ahab's reign (I Kings 19:1-17) or the first years of Joram's reign (II Kings 2:15; cf. ch. 1), and bridges over half a century—to the first years of Joash' reign (II Kings 13:14-19). With approximate accuracy, his ministry can be dated between 850 and 800 B.C. His ministry and prophetic activity, reported by a reverential tradition which was transmitted in the circle of prophetic disciples, are shrouded by the veils of pious legends and miracle narratives.

2. His miracles. Elisha's first miracle was performed immediately after his master was taken up to heaven. He took Elijah's mantle, invoked the name of the Lord, and struck the water of the Jordan, which thereupon parted before him (II Kings 2:13-14). Thus he repeated the miracle performed by Elijah (vs. 8). The sons of the prophets (see PROPHET) of Gilgal, Bethel, and Jericho recognized him as their leader and the successor to Elijah (vs. 15).

Many of the miracle narratives are connected with these prophetic guilds and witness to a profound reverence and pious awe. Elisha healed the spring of Jericho by throwing salt from a new bowl into the spring (II Kings 2:19-22). By the miracle of the unspent jar of oil, he helped the widow of one of the sons of the prophets when a creditor wanted to take her two children as slaves in place of payment of her debts (4:1-7). Elisha repaid the hospitality of a wealthy Shunammite woman by promising a son to her, and years later he resuscitated the child when it died from sunstroke (vss. 8-37; cf. I Kings 17:8-24). Once, in a time of famine, one of the sons of the prophets put some wild gourds in the common meal of the prophetic monastery—unaware of their poisonous nature. When it was discovered that there was "death in the pot," the prophet made it harmless by putting some meal into the pottage (II Kings 4:38-41). Another time, he fed a hundred men with twenty loaves of barley and some fresh ears of grain (vss. 42-44). He healed Naaman, the commander of the Syrian army, who was afflicted with leprosy, and refused to accept the lavish presents of the grateful Syrian (5:1-19). When one of the prophetic disciples lost a borrowed axe head, Elisha caused it to float on the water (6:1-7); and then another time, he struck a Syrian raiding party with blindness and led them into Samaria, whereupon he caused their eyes to open. The king, following Elisha's magnanimous council, prepared a great feast for the captive Syrians and sent them away (vss. 8-23). Not even death could stop the miracles of the prophet, for when a dead man was put into the grave of Elisha, he was revived by the touch of the bones of the prophet (13:20-21).

The prophet appears in these narratives in a more than human role; he towers over the anonymous members of the prophetic guilds. Apparently these sons of the prophets preserved the memory of Elisha, but they embellished it with folkloristic and magical elements. The aim of the storyteller was, obviously, to enhance the fame of the prophet, even with such a repugnant story as that of the mocking children and the two she-bears (II Kings 2:23-25). The historical fact which emerges out of these miracle narratives is that Elisha was the beloved leader of the prophetic guilds; and his human greatness, piety, and willingness to help were lovingly remembered in the prophetic guilds.

3. His influence upon historical events. In the miracle narratives the historical person Elisha is hard to find, but there are some legends on the border between tales and historical narratives that help to shed light upon the historical role of Elisha. Some of these stories are overloaded with legendary elements, as are the reports on the healing of Naaman's leprosy (II Kings 5:1-19) and the miraculous capture of the Syrian raiding party (6:8-23). In others, the historical elements are dominant, as in the story of Elisha's oracle during the Israelite military campaign against the Moabites (3:4-27) and during the Syrian siege of Samaria (6:24–7:20).

Elisha's portrait as an actor on the scene of history is most markedly drawn in the happenings whereby he fulfils the legacy of his master, Elijah (I Kings 19:15-18), by preparing the revolutions of Hazael of Syria (II Kings 8:7-15) and Jehu of Israel (chs. 9–10). From all these semihistorical narratives, it becomes exceedingly clear that Elisha understood that his task was to direct the route of history. His friendly connections with the court after the Jehu revolution, and the high esteem in which he was held by King Joash, are convincingly mirrored in the deathbed scene of the prophet (13:14-19), where the weeping king cries: "My father, my father! The chariots of Israel and its horsemen!" (vs. 14). If modern scholarship does not pay the same lavish tribute to his greatness as his disciples did, his influence upon the history of Israel can hardly be questioned. He represents, in its initial state, the prophetic attitude which claimed the right to mold the nation's fate by proclaiming the Lord's will.

Bibliography. W. Erbt, Elia, Elisa, Jona (1907); J. Pedersen, Israel, Its Life and Culture, III-IV (1940), 108-20; A. Lods, Israel from Its Beginnings to the Middle of the Eighth Century (1953), pp. 420-23, 446-47.

S. SZIKSZAI

ELISHAH ĭ lī′shə [אלישה]. The name of one of the descendants of Japheth in the "Table of Nations" (Gen. 10:4; I Chr. 1:7) and of a coastal area exporting purple and blue dye stuff to Tyre (Ezek. 27:7). Elishah is commonly associated with Alashia, occurring in cuneiform records found at Mari, Alalakh, Ugarit, Tell el-Amarna, and Khattushash, from the eighteenth to the thirteenth centuries B.C. This name is usually spelled a-ra-sa in Egyptian and occurs in the gentilic alty in an Ugaritic text. It is the opinion of most scholars that Elishah-Alashia refers to some part of Cyprus whence copper and other raw materials were exported. The use of this term in Ezek. 27 as distinct from Kittim ("Cyprus"; vs. 6) shows that at that period it referred to the non-Phoenecian part of the island.

Bibliography. G. F. Hill, A History of Cyprus, I (1940), 42-50; C. F. Schaeffer, Enkomi-Alasia, I (1952), 1-8.

J. C. GREENFIELD

ELISHAMA ĭ lĭsh′ə mə [אלישמע, God has heard]. 1. The leader of the tribe of Ephraim at the census in the wilderness; the grandfather of Joshua (Num. 1:10; 2:18; 7:48, 53; 10:22; I Chr. 7:26). The name may be ancient, but the lists in which it appears are postexilic.

2. One of David's sons (II Sam. 5:16; I Chr. 3:6, 8; 14:7). In I Chr. 3:6 "Elishama" must be a scribal error, and "Elishua" should be read (cf. II Sam. 5:15).

3. A member of the royal family of Judah; grandfather of the Ishmael who slew Gedaliah (II Kings 25:25; Jer. 41:1).

4. Part of the tribe of Judah; descended from Sheshan the Jerahmeelite (I Chr. 2:41).

5. A priest, purportedly of the time of King Jehoshaphat (II Chr. 17:8).

6. A scribe at the court of Jehoiakim (Jer. 36:12, 20-21).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 20, 21, 33, 90, 185; D. Diringer, Le iscrizioni antico-ebraiche palestinesi (1934), pp. 216, 232, 257.

H. H. GUTHRIE, JR.

ELISHAPHAT ĭ lĭsh′ə făt [אלישפט, God has judged] (II Chr. 23:1). One of the Judean commanders who aided Jehoiada the priest in securing the kingship for Joash against Athaliah.

ELISHEBA ĭ lĭsh′ə bə [אלישבע, my God is fortune or fulness] (Exod. 6:23). The daughter of Amminadab, and the wife of Aaron, to whom she bore four sons. The LXX erroneously transliterates 'Ελ(ε)ισάβεθ, "Elizabeth." The Hebrew name commonly occurs in ossuary inscriptions from the first two centuries A.D.

Bibliography. L. Koehler, "Hebräische Vokabeln II," ZAW, N.F. XIV (1937), 165-66 (on the meaning of the name).

J. F. Ross

ELISHUA ĕl′ə shōō′ə [אלישוע, God is salvation]. One of the sons of David who were born at Jerusalem (II Sam. 5:15; I Chr. 14:15). In I Chr. 3:6 he is called Elishama, which appears to be a transcriptional error imported from the following line.

ELISIMUS. KJV Apoc. variant of ELIASHIB 4.

ELIU ĭ lī′ū. 1. Douay Version form of ELIHU.
2. KJV Apoc. form of ELIJAH.

ELIUD ĭ lī′əd [Ἐλιούδ]. An ancestor of Jesus (Matt. 1:14-15; also Luke 3:23 ff in MS D).

ELIZABETH ĭ lĭz′ə bəth [Ἐλισάβετ, Ἐλεισάβετ; same as אלישבע, ELISHEBA ĭ lĭsh′ə bə, God is an oath(?), God is good fortune(?)]; KJV ELISABETH. The wife of the priest Zechariah, and the mother of JOHN THE BAPTIST (Luke 1:5-66).

Elizabeth, who bore the name of Aaron's wife (Exod. 6:23; see ELISHEBA), was of priestly descent. From the standpoint of Jewish law and custom, which required priests to marry virgins of Israelitish birth but not necessarily of priestly families, her marriage to the priest ZECHARIAH (33) would have been considered ideal. In addition to pure lineage, both partners are described as possessing faultless characters (Luke 1:6). In them the highest form of OT piety was embodied.

But there was one limitation. Elizabeth, like Sarah and Hannah of old, was barren—to a Jewish woman a privation almost too great to be borne. The story in Luke records in language reminiscent of the pertinent OT narratives the wondrous deed of God by which her barrenness was overcome in her old age and a child of great promise—a way-preparer for the Messiah—was brought into the world.

Elizabeth is called by Luke a kinswoman or "relative" (συγγενίς) of Mary the mother of Jesus (1:36); the term is too broad to be of help in determining their precise relationship. It is possible that the passage suggests that Mary had priestly blood in her. See MARY THE MOTHER OF JESUS.

In certain OL MSS, in Irenaeus, and in Origen there is evidence that the Magnificat (Luke 1:46-55) in the original text of Luke may have been ascribed to Elizabeth rather than to Mary. This song, so like that of Hannah in I Sam. 2:1-10, in some respects is more appropriately ascribed to the former than to the latter.

Bibliography. H. L. Strack and P. Billerbeck, Kommentar zum NT aus Talmud und Midrasch, II (1924), 68 ff. E. Klostermann, Das Lukasevangelium (1929), pp. 5 ff. J. R. Harris, "Mary or Elizabeth?" ET, 41 (1929-30), 266-67; "Again the Magnificat," ET, 42 (1930-31), 188-90. L. Köhler, "Hebräische Vokabeln II," ZAW, 55 (1937), 165-66.

E. P. Blair

ELIZAPHAN ĕl′ə zā′făn [אליצפן, God has hidden—i.e., protected]. Alternately: ELZAPHAN ĕl zā′făn [אלצפן] (Exod. 6:22; Lev. 10:4). 1. A Kohathite Levite, son of UZZIEL 1 (Exod. 6:22). He was the head of the Kohathites in the wilderness (Num. 3:30). At Moses' direction he and Mishael, his brother, removed the bodies of Nadab and Abihu from the camp (Lev. 10:4). A father's house was derived from him (I Chr. 15:8; II Chr. 29:13).

2. Son of PAROSH; chosen from Zebulun as one of the ten tribal leaders who, with Eleazar and Joshua, were to divide the land of Canaan (Num. 34:25).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 33-34, 178.

T. M. Mauch

ELIZUR ĭ lī′zər [אליצור, God is a rock]. Leader of Reuben; son of Shedeur (Num. 1:5; 2:10; 7:30, 35; 10:18). He was one of twelve tribal leaders or deputies who assisted Moses in taking a census of Israel and in other tasks in the wilderness. See PRINCE.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 156.

R. F. Johnson

ELKANAH ĕl kā′nə [אלקנה, God has created or possessed]. 1. A person or subdivision of the Levitical family of Korah (Exod. 6:24). The list in which it appears is postexilic. Elkanah was apparently a much-used name among the Levites, and whether this Elkanah is the same as one of the ones in 5-8 below is hard to say.

2. The father of Samuel (I Sam. 1:1, 4, 8, 19, 21, 23; 2:11, 20; I Chr. 6:27, 34). In I Samuel, Elkanah is an Ephraimite, but I Chronicles makes him, and so Samuel, a Levite (see PRIESTS AND LEVITES). The Chronicler may have made an honest mistake because of the profusion of Elkanahs in I Chr. 6 (see 5 and 6 below), but it is more likely that, in accord with his purpose, he consciously made the change. See CHRONICLES, I, II.

3. A Benjaminite warrior who deserted Saul to join David at Ziklag (I Chr. 12:6). The designation of this Elkanah as a Korahite must have to do with the town from which he came rather than with his being a member of the Levitical family (cf. I Chr. 2:43). Since I Chr. 12 is largely fictional exaggeration which is not borne out by I Sam. 27, the question is probably impossible to settle.

4. An official of the court of Ahaz, the mention of whose assassination appears in the Chronicler's rather fanciful account of Ahaz' reign (II Chr. 28:7).

5. A name in a list of Levites (I Chr. 6:23, 25, 36; see PRIESTS AND LEVITES).

6. A name in a list of Levites (I Chr. 6:26, 35; see PRIESTS AND LEVITES).

7. A name in a list of Levites (I Chr. 9:16; see PRIESTS AND LEVITES).

8. A Levitical gatekeeper of the Ark of the Covenant (I Chr. 15:23; see PRIESTS AND LEVITES).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 20, 21, 172.

H. H. Guthrie, Jr.

ELKIAH ĕl kī′ə [Ἐλκειά; Vulg. Elai] (Jth. 8:1); KJV ELCIA ĕl sī′ə. An ancestor of Judith; son of Ananias and father of Oziel.

J. C. Swaim

ELKOSH ĕl′kŏsh [האלקשי] (Nah. 1:1); KJV THE ELKOSHITE —īt. The residence of the prophet Nahum.

Several traditions are extant concerning the location of the proposed site. Eastern medieval tradition located both the birth and the burial place of the prophet at Al-Qush, some fifty miles N of modern Mosul (near the ruins of ancient Nineveh). Such tradition does not antedate the sixteenth century, however, and the internal evidence of the book does not support an Assyrian location of the site.

In the prologue to his commentary on Nahum, Jerome speaks of his visit to the village of Hilkesei in Galilee, to which contemporary tradition pointed as the prophet's native home. Modern el-Kauzeh has been suggested as the site to which Jerome referred. A late Galilean tradition centers on Capernaum as probably meaning "the village of Nahum." Any Galilean location is rendered improbable, however, as a consequence of the fall of the N kingdom ca. one hundred years prior to the composition of the prophet's work.

Still another tradition, preserved by certain patristic writers, locates Elkosh in Simeonite territory—i.e., in S Judea. Pseudo-Epiphanius further localizes the site by specifying the vicinity of Begabar (Syrian Bēt Gabrē), the modern Beit Jibrin. Though the exact site remains undiscovered, the S Judean tradition seems more in keeping with the chronological and circumstantial setting of the prophet's work.

Bibliography. E. G. Kraeling, Bible Atlas (1956), p. 310; W. A. Maier, The Book of Nahum (1959), pp. 20-26.

W. H. MORTON

ELLASAR ĕl′ə sär [אלסר]. A country the king of which, Arioch, is mentioned in the Abraham traditions of Gen. 14. Neither Ellasar nor Arioch has so far been convincingly identified with countries or persons of known historicity. The old identifications with the S Babylonian kingdom of Larsa and its ruler Warad-Sin have been generally abandoned.

T. JACOBSEN

ELM. KJV translation of אלה ('ēlâ) in Hos. 4:13 (RSV TEREBINTH). The elm, Ulmus campestris L., is not a Palestinian tree.

ELMADAM ĕl mā′dəm ['Ελμαδάμ; 'Ελμωδάμ] (Luke 3:28); KJV ELMODAM ĕl mō′dəm. An ancestor of Jesus.

ELNAAM ĕl nā′əm [אלנעם, God is pleasantness] (I Chr. 11:46). The father of Jeribai and Joshaviah, both of whom are included in the sixteen additional names which the Chronicler adds to the catalogue of the "Thirty" as it is represented in II Sam. 23.

ELNATHAN ĕl nā′thən [אלנתן, God has given; 'Ελναθάν]; KJV Apoc. ALNATHAN ăl—. 1. A Jerusalemite, father of Nehushta the mother of Jehoiachin (II Kings 24:8), and probably the son of Achbor; among the princes who took part in the episode of Baruch's reading of Jeremiah's scroll to Jehoiakim (Jer. 36:12). He led the party that fetched the fugitive prophet Uriah from Egypt and cut him down before Jehoiakim (Jer. 26:22-23). On Lachish Ostracon III (see LACHISH), which comes from this period, appears the following item: "The commander of the host, Coniah son of Elnathan, hath come down in order to go into Egypt." An identification between this Elnathan and that in the OT is possible though unlikely.

2. The MT of Ezra 8:16 lists two "chiefs" and one "man of insight" by this name among those returning from the Exile. According to I Esd. 8:44, there should be only two named here.

J. M. WARD

ELOAH ĕ lō′ə [אלוה]. A word for God found especially in the book of Job. See GOD, NAMES OF, § C4.

ELOHIM ĕl′ō hĭm, ĭ lō′hĭm (Heb. ĕl ō hēm′) [אלהים]. The general term for "gods" or, when used in the plural of majesty, for "God" or "deity." See GOD, NAMES OF, § C3.

ELOHIST ĕl′ō hĭst, ĭ lō′hĭst. The author or compiler of the E source of the Pentateuch (see E), which is commonly associated with the N kingdom and dated to the eighth century B.C.

ELOI, ELOI, LAMA SABACHTHANI. See ELI, ELI, LAMA SABACHTHANI.

ELON ē′lŏn [אלון or אילון or אילן, oak or terebinth]; ELONITES ē′lə nīts. 1. A son of Zebulun; probably an eponym (Gen. 46:14; Num. 26:26).

2. A Hittite (see HITTITES), the father of one of the wives of Esau (Gen. 26:34; 36:2). The name of the daughter is different in each case, probably because of differing traditions of Edomite genealogy (cf. Gen. 28:9; 36:9-14). In Gen. 26:34, LXX(A), Samar., and Syr. read "Elon the Hivite" (see HIVITES).

3. A minor JUDGE (Judg. 12:11-12). The name may merely be an etiological explanation of the name of the town AIJALON, where Elon is said to have been buried, since both are spelled the same in Hebrew.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 7, 230.

H. H. GUTHRIE, JR.

4. A village of Dan near Timnah (Josh. 19:43). The location may be 'Alein, W of Beit Mahsir, or Khirbet Wadi 'Alin between Deir Aban and 'Ain Shems (Beth-shemesh).

ELON-BETH-HANAN ē′lən bĕth hā′nən [אילון בית חנן, oak of the house of Hanan] (I Kings 4:9). A village of Dan in Solomon's second administrative district. It may be the same as Elon, or perhaps one should read with the LXX: "Aijalon (to) Beth Haran," or with another variant: "Aijalon and Beth Hanan" (cf. Josh. 19:42).

V. R. GOLD

ELOTH. Alternate form of ELATH.

ELPAAL ĕl pā′əl [אלפעל, God of doing or creating(?)]. A Benjaminite clan or family (I Chr. 8:11-12, 18).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 34, 172.

ELPALET. KJV form of Elpelet. See ELIPHELET.

EL-PARAN ĕl pâr′ən [אל פארן, tree of Paran] (Gen. 14:6). The southernmost point reached by Chedorlaomer and his allies in their raid into Palestine, during the course of which Lot was taken captive. El-paran is probably the earlier name for Elath—Ezion-geber.

V. R. GOLD

ELPELET. Alternate form of ELIPHELET.

EL SHADDAI ĕl shăd'ī [אל שדי, God Almighty]. See ALMIGHTY; GOD, NAMES OF, § C2*a*.

ELTEKEH ĕl'tə kə [אלתקה, meeting place] (Josh. 19:44; KJV ELTEKE). Alternately: ELTEKE [אלתקא] (Josh. 21:23). A Danite town assigned to the Levites; later it passed into Philistine hands, along with Timnah, the home of Samson's wife. In 701 B.C. a great battle was fought at Eltekeh between Sennacherib and the Egyptian-Ethiopian army, after which the victorious Sennacherib besieged and captured Eltekeh and Timnah, slew the rebellious leaders of Ekron, and then invaded Judah (cf. Assyrian altaqū, and the Hebrew variant reading 'altaqō in Josh. 19:44). See the Sennacherib Prism, col. II, lines 79-83; col. III, lines 1 ff.

With the identification of Khirbet el-Muqanna as EKRON, the location of Eltekeh, which was N of Ekron and W of TIMNAH, is now uncertain.

Bibliography. Y. Aharoni, "The Northern Boundary of Judah," PEQ (1958), pp. 27-31. V. R. GOLD

ELTEKON ĕl'tə kŏn [אלתקון] (Josh. 15:59). A village of Judah in the hill-country district of Beth-zur; probably to be identified with Khirbet ed-Deir, ca. two miles S of Hausan and ca. four miles W of Bethlehem.

ELTOLAD ĕl'tō'lăd [אלתולד, generation] (Josh. 15:30; 19:4). Alternately: TOLAD tō'lăd [תולד] (I Chr. 4:29). A city of Simeon in the S of Judah, near Ezem and Hormah. The name seems to indicate that it was a shrine to which women would come to pray for children. The site has not yet been identified.

S. COHEN

ELUL ē'lŭl [אלול; Ελουλ]. The Hebrew form of Akkadian ululu, the sixth month of the year (August-September). See CALENDAR.

ELUZAI ĭ lōō'zī [אלעזי, God is my strength] (I Chr. 12:5—H 12:6). One of the disaffected Benjaminite warriors of the house of Saul, famous for their archery and ambidextrous slinging, who joined the outlaw band of David at Ziklag.

ELYMAIS ĕl'ə mā'əs [ἡ Ἐλυμαΐς] (Tob. 2:10; I Macc. 6:1; cf. Dan. 8:2). A city or province located, according to I Macc. 6:1, "in Persia."

In I Macc. 6:1 the minuscule MSS 64 236 534 and 19 62 93 542, dating from the ninth to the twelfth century and probably representing the LXX revision of Lucian (died A.D. 312), read: ὅτι ἐστὶν Ἐλυμαΐς ἐν τῇ Περσίδι πόλις, "that Elymais in Persia was a city"; while 728, which normally agrees with the first group above, has the variant λυμαεις. On the other hand, the so-called "q" group of minuscules and also 56 58 106 340, all dating from the eleventh to the fourteenth century, read: ἐν Ἐλυμαΐς, and are supported by Codex Alexandrinus, in which εν ελυμες would probably be pronounced about the same; while Codex Sinaiticus, Codex Venetus (eighth century), and 46 have εν λυμαις; 381 gives εν λυμαεις; and 55 and the corrector of 311 read πολις εν ελυμαις (the original of 311 is πολις ελυα). The evidence of these sources, especially "q" and A, makes it possible that the original statement was "that in Elymais in Persia there was a city" (so ERV).

Tob. 2:10 simply reads εἰς τὴν Ἐλυμαΐδα, "to Elymais" (RSV) or "into Elymais" (ERV), and there is nothing to indicate whether a city or a province is meant.

In his version of the incident in I Macc. 6:1, Josephus (Antiq. XII.ix.1) considers Elymais to be a city and adds that there was a temple of Artemis in it. Polybius (Histories XXXI.9 [11]) also mentions a sanctuary of Artemis in Elymais.

No such city is known, however, and Elymais is known as the name of a region or province. In Dan. 8:2 the text attributed to Theodotion and found in Codex Vaticanus reads ἐν Χώρᾳ Αἰλάμ, "in the province of Elam," but the LXX text preserved in the ninth-century cursive, Codex Chisianus (87), has ἐν Ἐλυμαΐδι Χώρᾳ, "in the province of Elymais." Thus Elymais and Elam are probably the same.

Strabo speaks of Elymais as the mountainous region N and E of Susis (XV.732, 744), the latter being the area between Babylonia and Persia, of which the most notable city was Susa (XV.727). Herodotus (III.91) identifies the same area as the eighth province of the Persian Empire. Ptolemy (Geography VI.3) says that the Elymaei dwell on the maritime coast of Susiana; Stephen of Byzantium (De Urbibus) describes their land as the part of Assyria which is toward Persia and near Susa. Since the differences in the foregoing references are relatively minor, it is probably to be recognized that Elymais, or Elam, and Susiana were essentially the same—namely, the region and the province between Babylonia and Persia, of which Susa was the chief city.

Bibliography. Weissbach, "Elymais," Pauly-Wissowa, vol. V (1903), cols. 2458-67; W. Kappler, ed., Septuaginta, IX, 1; in Maccabaeorum liber, vol. I (1936); F.-M. Abel, Les livres des Maccabées (1949), pp. 108-9. J. FINEGAN

ELYMAS ĕl'ə məs [Ἐλύμας] (Acts 13:6-12). A Jewish magician (see MAGIC) and false prophet associated with Proconsul Sergius Paulus (see PAULUS, SERGIUS) at Paphos on Cyprus. He challenged Paul and Barnabas when they preached to the proconsul, and in turn Paul denounced him. Elymas was stricken blind temporarily.

Elymas is also called BAR-JESUS. Both the exact form of "Elymas" and its relation to "Bar-Jesus" are obscure. In vs. 8 the Greek has: "Elymas the magician (for that is the meaning of the name)." As the parenthesis follows "magician," it seems to say that the name means "magician." But this can hardly be, since in vs. 6, where the name is Bar-Jesus, he is also called a magician. In spite of the location of the explanatory statement, it probably intends to bring together the names Bar-Jesus and Elymas as equivalents. But in what way is not clear. There is no evident philological basis for saying that Greek "Elymas" is a translation of Aramaic "Bar-Jesus."

One group of scholars tries to solve the problem by referring the explanation to the word "Elymas." They hold that the author says: "Elymas means magician." They derive "Elymas" from the Aramaic alīmā ("strong"), or from the Arabic 'alim ("wise"), both of which have a remote similarity in sound to "Elymas." So "Elymas" could be a transliteration meaning "magician."

Others apply the parenthesis to "Bar-Jesus" and make their approach through the Aramaic Bar-Yeshua and the verb shawah. They note that in D the reading is Ἑτοιμας, which represents Ἕτοιμος, meaning "prepared." Now since the pi'el of shawah may mean "to make ready," in this round-about way they attempt to equate "Bar-Jesus" with "magician."

But neither of these attempts is convincing. It is more probable that the parenthesis says only that the Greek name of this Jew is Elymas—an explanation in harmony with the Jewish practice of changing names when one moves from one culture into another. It is also stated here for the first time that Saul is also called Paul. Why the man chose the name Elymas is not indicated.

It is not impossible that the reading Ἑτοιμας is original. If so, we might identify him with Atomos, a magician who, according to Jos. Antiq. XX.vii.2, assisted the Procurator Felix in winning for his wife Drusilla, daughter of Agrippa I, who was already married to Aziz of Emesa. But this identification is only a remote possibility.

If Elymas was not Atomos, he was similar to him, as he was also to Simon Magus (Acts 8:9-24), whom Peter encountered at Samaria; and to Jewish exorcists met by Paul at Ephesus (19:13-17). Numerous Jews evidently became magicians by profession. Acts presents them only in opposition to Christians, so in an unfavorable light. That they were intimates of proconsuls and governors shows that they were men of recognized cultural attainments. Their profession was probably both a science and a faith; and it may be that they were conscientious in their opposition to Christianity.

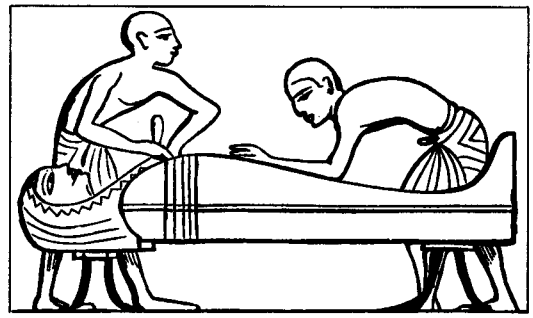
Bibliography. On the attempt to equate "Bar-Jesus" with "magus," see R. J. Knowling, Expositor's Greek Testament, II (1917), 285-87; K. Lake and H. J. Cadbury, Beginnings of Christianity, IV (1933), 143-45; A. D. Nock, Beginnings of Christianity, V (1933), 164-88. S. V. McCASLAND

ELYON ĕl yŏn′ [עליון, the Exalted One, the Most High]. An ancient divine name associated with the El (God) of pre-Israelite Jerusalem (Gen. 14:18-24), and eventually applied to the God of Israel, Yahweh. See MOST HIGH; GOD, NAMES OF, § C2*b*.

ELZABAD ĕl zā′băd [אלזבד, God has given]. 1. A Gadite warrior who joined David at Ziklag (I Chr. 12:12).

2. A Korahite gatekeeper (I Chr. 26:7).

Bibliography. K. Tallqvist, Assyrian Personal Names (1914), p. 100; M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 21, 33, 34, 47, 77, 90. H. H. GUTHRIE, JR.



ELZAPHAN. Alternate form of ELIZAPHAN 1.

EMADABUN ĭ măd′ə bŭn ['Ημαδαβούν] (I Esd. 5:58); KJV MADIABUN mə dī′ə bŭn. A surname distinguishing a certain Jeshua from a Jeshua listed previously, among the returning Levites who rebuilt the temple. J. C. SWAIM

EMATH ē′măth. Douay Version form of HAMATH.

EMATHIS ĕm′ə thəs; KJV AMATHEIS ăm′ə thē′-əs. Apoc. form of ATHLAI.

EMBALMING [חנטים, from חנט, to embalm]. The art of preserving dead bodies from decay, which had its origin in Egypt,* was not practiced among the Hebrews, as can be judged by the paucity of reference to it in the Scriptures and the condition of bodies discovered in thousands of tombs in Canaan. Fig. EMB 26.

26. Embalming in Egypt

The only direct references in scripture to embalming are in Gen. 50:2-3, 26, where it is stated that Jacob (Israel) and Joseph were embalmed. This doubtless was done, and was mentioned, both to indicate that they were prominent figures in Egypt and to account for the preservation of their bodies until they could be buried in Canaan (Gen. 50:13; Exod. 13:19; Josh. 24:32, although the bones, rather than the body of Joseph, are mentioned). The use of spices (see SPICE) in connection with the bodies of Asa (II Chr. 16:14) and Jesus (John 19:39-40) was not embalming, and was probably motivated by a desire to purify ceremonially rather than to preserve.

The Hebrew term for "embalming" appears only in the passages in Genesis cited above and in Song of S. 2:13 in the expression: "The fig tree puts forth [חנטה] its figs," where the verb may be better rendered as "ripens," in the sense that the fruit becomes yellowish-whitish in color (cf. חטה, "wheat" or "grain," in Exod. 9:32; Deut. 8:8; etc.).

The description of the embalming of Israel indicates that the process required forty days (seventy days was common in Egypt, but see Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus, who describe the various steps of embalming), and that it was done by Joseph's servants, "the physicians" (רפאים, "healers" or "surgeons"). See PHYSICIAN; MEDICINE.

The fact that the Hebrews did not practice embalming is doubtless to be explained by their theological beliefs (see IMMORTALITY; RESURRECTION), as well as by their antipathy toward Egyptian religion, and the comparative poverty of Palestine, where the extreme expense of embalming made it prohibitive. W. L. REED

EMBASSY (Luke 14:32 [KJV AMBASSAGE]; 19:14 [KJV MESSAGE]). An abstract form for the concrete AMBASSADOR; either one or more ambassadors.

EMBROIDERY AND NEEDLEWORK. Interweaving materials of varied colors into a specific pattern was skilled work of the highest order and was the forerunner of brocading.

Materials for the tabernacle and the girdle for Aaron and possibly for his sons were embroidered work. There are a number of terms which relate to embroidery and needlework. רקם, "to weave colored fabrics, to embroider," in the expression מעשה רקם (lit., "work of the weaver in colored fabrics"; RSV "embroidered with needlework"; KJV "wrought with needlework" or "needlework"), is found in Exod. 26:36; 27:16; 28:39; 36:37; 38:18; 39:29. Oholiab a Danite was said to have been especially adept as an embroiderer in blue and purple and scarlet stuff and fine twined linen; he was called to perform his service for the tent of meeting (Exod. 35: 35; 38:18, 23).

The word for "embroidered work" is רקמה. In Judg. 5:30 it is used to describe the desired handwork which Sisera was expected to bring home as booty in his battle with Israel. It is used figuratively of Jerusalem in the early days when the Lord clothed her with embroidered cloth (Ezek. 16:10, 13, 18). It is used of the robes of princes (Ezek. 26:16; "embroidered garments") and of the eagle (Nebuchadrezzar) rich in plumage "of many colors" (Ezek. 17: 3). It was among the coveted articles of trade (Ezek. 27:16, 24), and it describes the linen sails of the ships of Tyre procured from Egypt (Ezek. 27:7). The bride in Ps. 45:14—H 45:15 was attired in "many-colored robes" (KJV "raiment of needlework"). In I Chr. 29:2 the term is applied to varied colored stones. A verbal form appears in Ps. 139:15 (רקמתי; "I was . . . intricately wrought"), used of the human embryo.

Another series of words also relates to weaving in patterns. Aaron's coat was to be woven (שבץ; cf. Akkadian sabsinnu, "weaver of patterns" [?]) in checker work of fine linen (Exod. 28:39; "weave"; KJV "embroider"). In Exod. 28:20 the rows of gems on the breastplate of Aaron are to be "set [משבצים] in gold filigree"; cf. also the "settings" (משבצות) of gems in Exod. 28:11, 13-14, 25; 39:6, 13, 16, 18. The "gold-woven robes" (משבצות זהב; RSV mg. "gold embroidery"; KJV "wrought gold") of the bride appear in Ps. 45:13—H 45:14. The high priest was to wear a "coat of checker work" (כתנת תשבץ; KJV "broidered coat"; Exod. 28:4). This type of work was produced by cutting the model of the garment from two different colors of material, to make an inner and outer portion of the garment, which were then sewed together in accordance with the desired pattern so as to produce a sparkling effect, like a gem.

Such embroidered and woven materials were the work of "one who is skilled" (מעשה חשב). Cherubim were "skilfully worked" on the curtains of the tabernacle (Exod. 26:1; 36:8), on the veil (Exod. 26:31; 36:35); the ephod was also made of varied colored materials "skilfully worked" (Exod. 28:6; 39:3); the breastpiece of judgment too was of "skilled work" (Exod. 28:15; 39:8; KJV "cunning work"; cf. Jer. 10:3; Hos. 13:2). The work referred to in these terms is more of the designer type than of the weaver or the embroiderer.

Bibliography. J. Macdonald, "Palestinian Dress," PEQ (Jan.-Apr., 1951), pp. 55-68. J. M. MYERS

EMEK-KEZIZ ē′mĭk kē′zĭz [עמק קציץ, a valley cut off] (Josh. 18:21); KJV VALLEY OF KEZIZ. One of the cities of Benjamin, apparently related to a valley of like name near the SE boundary of the tribe's territory, and seemingly situated in the Jordan Plain in the vicinity of Jericho and Beth-hoglah. The exact location is unknown. W. H. MORTON

EMENDATIONS OF THE SCRIBES [תקוני הסופרים]. A list of eighteen words authoritatively emended in the MT to avoid anthropomorphism. The list, which varies somewhat in number, is given in Masoroth to major MSS (see TEXT, OT, § 1*d*), and in rabbinic works—e.g., Mekilta, Siphre, Yalkut Shimeon, Tanchuma to Exod. 15:7.

Bibliography. C. D. Ginsburg, The Massorah (1880-97), letter ת, vol. 11, p. 710, section 206; Introduction to the Massoretico-Critical Edition of the Hebrew Bible (1897), pp. 347-62. P. Kahle in H. Bauer and P. Leander, Historische Grammatik die Hebräischen Sprache (1922), pp. 76-77. B. J. ROBERTS

EMERALD. A variety of beryl of rich green color. Many of the stones commonly called "emerald" in Egyptian jewelry are really green feldspar. "Emerald" is used in the Bible to translate the following words:

a) ברקת (Ezek. 28:13), one of the stones on the covering of the King of Tyre.

b) נפך (nōphekh), a stone in the breastpiece of judgment (Exod. 28:18; 39:11); also noted with purple, embroidered work and fine linen, etc., as an article of trade between Edom and Tyre (Ezek. 27:16). In Ezek. 28:13 the word is translated "CARBUNCLE" (LXX ἄνθραξ; Vulg. carbunculus). Cf. the Egyptian mfkt, which is probably turquoise and so green in color.

c) Σμαράγδινος, an adjectival form of σμάραγδος. The former is used in the description of the one seated on the throne in Rev. 4:3; the latter denotes the fourth jewel in the foundation of the wall of the New Jerusalem (21:19).

See also JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES § 2.

W. E. STAPLES

EMERODS ĕm′ə rŏdz. KJV translation of טחרים and עפלים (RSV TUMORS); an archaic form of "hemorrhoids."

EMIM, THE ē′mĭm [האימים (אמים), the terrible or frightful ones]. Ancient, presumably gigantic inhabitants of Transjordan, mentioned specifically as dwelling in SHAVEH-KIRIATHAIM (Gen. 14:5). Elsewhere called "Rephaim," they were called the "Emim" by the Moabites who dispossessed them (Deut. 2:10-11).

See also ANAKIM; REPHAIM; GIANT. L. HICKS

EMISSION. See CLEAN AND UNCLEAN.

EMMANUEL. See IMMANUEL.

EMMAUS ĕ mā′əs ['Εμμαούς; חמת, warm wells; the Talmud uses the forms אמאום and עימאום]. A Judean town now of uncertain identification, which was the destination of two travelers to whom Jesus appeared after his crucifixion. Fig. EMM 27.

Copyright: The Matson Photo Service

27. The modern village of El-Qubeibeh, one of the traditional locations of Emmaus

The name appears only once in the Bible, in Luke 24:13. In a postresurrection episode Jesus encountered Cleopas and a companion on the road to Emmaus, conversed with them the remainder of the journey, and accepted their invitation to eat—before he vanished as mysteriously as he had first appeared. For the identification of this town (Κώμη), the only clue given by Luke is that it was 7½ miles from Jerusalem. All external evidence and all tradition direct the attention westward from Jerusalem; nevertheless, there are no fewer than four modern towns proposed as NT Emmaus, ranging from 4 miles to 20 miles from Jerusalem:

a) Qaloniyeh (Colonia) is over 4 miles W of Jerusalem on the main road to Jaffa (Joppa). Josephus reported (War VII.vi.6) that Vespasian in A.D. 75 settled eight hundred veterans at "a place called Emmaus thirty stadia [under 4 miles] from Jerusalem"; this is half the distance stated by Luke. This town is probably the Mozah of Josh. 18:26.

b) El-Qubeibeh is 7 miles W of Jerusalem, but on a more northerly Roman road, passing by Nebi Samwil. Its connection with NT Emmaus is a very old tradition, since Crusaders in 1099 found near there an old Roman fort named Castellum Emmaus. When the guardian Franciscans erected the Church of Saint Cleophas in 1878, they unearthed the remains of a basilica judged to be Crusader or even Byzantine.

c) Abu Ghosh (named after a nineteenth-century brigand) is ca. 9 miles W of Jerusalem on the main road. It is known also as Kiryat el-'Enab, and has been identified with OT Kiriath-jearim. Its Crusader church stands over a Roman fort with an inscription stating that some of the Tenth Legion was stationed here. But the Emmaus colony of Josephus (War VII.vi.6) was much closer to Jerusalem. The guardian French Benedictines maintain here the Convent of Our Lady.

d) Amwas (Nicopolis, since the third century) is 20 miles W of Jerusalem on the road to Jaffa, in the Valley of Ajalon. It preserves the name, has two "warm wells," and in addition has the earliest attestation. The Bordeaux Pilgrim (ca. 333) and the Holy Paula (ca. 386) accepted this site, which the former placed at 22 Roman miles from Jerusalem. Jerome (cf. On Daniel 8:14) in the Onomasticon follows Eusebius in finding Emmaus here. It is identified with the Emmaus of Judas Maccabeus (I Macc. 3:40, 57), who there defeated the Syrian Gorgias (4:1-15). Josephus reports that it was the seat of a toparchy (War III.iii.5), which raises the objection that it was much more than a village (Κώμη). Emmaus had been burned by Varus before Josephus' generation (Antiq. XVII.x.9); and not until the third century was it rebuilt by Julius Africanus and then named Nicopolis. The Crusaders accepted this as NT Emmaus, and one finds there complex Byzantine-Crusader church ruins. The principal objection to its being the NT Emmaus is the distance of 20 miles, or 160 stadia, from Jerusalem. It is true that some good MSS read "160" instead of "60," but the best text is the traditional "60."

Bibliography. E. Robinson, Biblical Researches in Palestine (1867), II, 254; III, 146-50. L. H. Vincent and F.-M. Abel, Emmaüs, sa basilique et son histoire (1932). G. Dalman, Sacred Sites and Ways (1935), 226-32. R. deVaux and A. Steve, Fouilles à Qaryet el-'Enab Abu Ghosh (1950).

K. W. CLARK

EMMER. KJV Apoc. form of IMMER.

EMMOR. KJV NT form of HAMOR.

EMPEROR [βασιλεύς (I Pet. 2:13, 17; KJV lit. KING); σεβαστός=Lat. title AUGUSTUS (so KJV; Acts 25:21, 25)]. A title of the ruler of the Roman Empire (cf. CAESAR), derived from the Latin imperator, which was originally given to honor a general after a victory and retained only temporarily. Julius Caesar, however, used the title permanently, and because of his example it came to refer to supreme military authority. In this sense it was used by Augustus and his successors. In later times, when an army hailed a general as imperator he was recognized as its candidate for imperial office.

In theory the emperor ruled, not as imperator, but as princeps, "chief of state" (cf. the later Duce and Führer). Tiberius made this distinction by saying, "I am dominus [master] of my slaves, imperator of my troops, and princeps of the rest"—i.e., of the free civilian population (Dio Cassius History LVII.8.2). The older usage was continued, however; after military victories the emperor was hailed as imperator, and such events were noted in his official title and given publicity on the coinage. R. M. GRANT

EMPEROR-WORSHIP. Reverence paid to a Roman emperor, whether living or dead, as a divine being. Generally speaking, unofficial enthusiasm could recognize deity, or a germ of deity, in a living ruler, but officially (by vote of the SENATE) deity could be recognized only after the ruler's death. In the first two centuries those emperors who believed that they themselves were divine were all murdered or had to commit suicide (Caligula, Nero, Domitian, Commodus). "Consecration" was effected by a vote of the Senate after an emperor's death, as was the alternative, memoria damnata (though Nero was declared an enemy of the state in his lifetime). The good emperors, in the eyes of the Senate and of senatorial historians, were those who rejected the adulation of courtiers or of the populace.

The worship of kings had precedents both oriental and Greek, because of the narrow dividing line between gods and heroes and the general feeling that a great benefactor was in some sense divine; such worship was fairly common in the Hellenistic age, and was later more widespread in the East than in the West. Thus in the East, Julius Caesar (see CAESAR, JULIUS) was praised as "a god manifest and the savior of the whole human race." At Rome, however, it took two years after his death, and a great deal of political pressure, before the Senate voted his deification. The appearance of a comet facilitated the process. AUGUSTUS was worshiped as a god in the provinces, but he officially permitted his worship even there only when it was combined with that of Rome. It was after his death that he was officially consecrated, when a praetor testified under oath that he had seen the wax image of the dead emperor ascending into heaven (Suetonius Augustus C.4). According to a later account (Dio Cassius History LVI.42), an eagle soared upward "as if" bearing the emperor's soul into heaven. The Empress Livia rewarded the praetor with 25,000 denarii (LVI.46). It has been argued that Augustus was officially recognized as divine in his lifetime, since he tells us (Res gestae II.10) that "by decree of the Senate my name was included in the Salian hymns, and it was enacted by law that my person should be sacred in perpetuity." Dio Cassius (LI.20) explains the first point by stating that in 29 B.C. the emperor's name was "included in their hymns equally with the gods." Yet this inclusion does not necessarily mean that in Roman eyes Augustus was a god. His successor, TIBERIUS, insisted upon divine honors for Augustus but refused them for himself and his family, permitting them only in the East for himself and his mother, and insisting that the Senate be given equal recognition.

CALIGULA asked the Senate to deify Tiberius, but because of the strained relations between the Senate and Tiberius in his last years the request was denied. Caligula himself was able to have his deceased sister Drusilla deified, with the assistance of a senator who swore he had witnessed her ascension. He gradually came to believe in his own deity, and required ritual abasement on the part of his courtiers. In the year 40 a temple to him was erected at Rome, and he required oaths to be taken by his genius ("familiar spirit"). After he was murdered, only the intervention of his successor, CLAUDIUS, prevented the Senate from declaring him an enemy of the state.

Claudius wrote an official letter to the Alexandrians in the year 41, refusing the establishment of a chief priest and temples dedicated to himself; he stated that such observances were suitable "only for the gods." The difference between official Roman policy and popular provincial practice is seen in the Egyptian prefect's edict in which the letter was published; it speaks of the "greatness of our god Caesar." In Britain a temple of the Divine Claudius was actually erected, after a Roman victory there. The worship of Drusilla was terminated, but she was replaced by Julia Augusta (Livia), the wife of Augustus.

NERO had Claudius deified, presumably in order to provide proof of his own rather dubious filial piety. He himself appeared on coins as Apollo the Lyre-Player, but when in 65 one of the consuls proposed the building of a temple to the Divine Nero, he rejected the suggestion as ill-omened; only dead emperors were really divine. A king of Armenia hailed him as a god, but before his death he had been condemned by the Senate and was never consecrated. His successor, VESPASIAN, refused divine honors, though he erected a temple to the Divine Claudius in an effort to recall happier days. On his deathbed he said ironically, "I fear I am becoming a god." Vespasian's son Titus had him consecrated, and in turn was consecrated after his death by Domitian.

As early as the year 89, DOMITIAN was addressed by his courtiers as Master and God, and soon oaths were required by his genius, though his name followed that of Jupiter. He was often called Master and God in the East, and it may well be that popular, or even local official, pressure upon Jews and Christians led to some local persecution in Asia, where it may be reflected in the book of REVELATION. After his death, however, he was declared an enemy of the state, and many of his executive decisions were rescinded by his successor, Nerva. His name was erased from many inscriptions.

Trajan (98-117) had Nerva consecrated, while rejecting divine honors for himself. In the year 112 his legate in Pontus and Bithynia was investigating the Christians and, as a test of their loyalty, required them to offer incense and wine before statues of the gods and of the emperor (Pliny Epistle X.96). This innovation, described in a report to the emperor, was not approved in Trajan's reply (97), and does not occur in later tests of Christians. Sacrifice to the gods can be required; a living emperor is not officially a god. Even though Pliny in his Panegyric on Trajan speaks of him as deus, this was not the emperor's official or private view of himself.

With the exceptions discussed above, the official Roman view recognized the difference between the gods and the living emperor. In a speech to the Senate ascribed to Tiberius by Tacitus (Ann. IV.38) the emperor states that he is only mortal, but adds that his temples are in the Senators' minds; he hopes for their approval after his death. Here Tiberius reiterates the views of Augustus as recorded in a letter addressed to his successor (Suetonius Augustus LXXI): "My goodness will transport me in celestial glory." This is to say that the approval of the Roman people, expressed through the Senate, will recognize a divinity already half-inherent in the emperor during his lifetime. When Augustus' "mind" had ascended to heaven, prayer could be addressed to it (cf. Tac. Ann. I.43).

On the other hand, outside Rome worship of a living emperor, theoretically spontaneous, was never discouraged by local authorities, who saw in it a vital symbol of solidarity, especially valuable in times of crisis. Those who rejected it were likely to be suspected of disloyalty, even though in theory it could not be required of civilians as a test (except in the one instance where Pliny appears to have gone too far). Christians repeatedly stated that while they could, and did, pray for the emperor, they could not possibly pray to him.

Bibliography. E. Bickermann, "Die römische Kaiserapotheose," ARW, XXVII (1929), 1-34; L. R. Taylor, The Divinity of the Roman Emperor (1931); K. Scott, The Imperial Cult Under the Flavians (1936); F. Vittinghoff, Der Staatsfeind in der römische Kaiserzeit (1936); M. P. Charlesworth, "The Refusal of Divine Honours, an Augustan Formula," Papers of the British School at Rome, XV (1939), 1-10; R. M. Grant, The Sword and the Cross (1955); E. Stauffer, Christ and the Caesars (trans. R. G. Smith; 1955). R. M. GRANT

EMPTIED [ἐκένωσεν]. The crucial christological passage in the NT containing this word is Phil. 2:7; Paul says that Christ Jesus was "in the form of God, . . . but emptied himself, taking the form of a servant." There are three major interpretations of this "emptying":

a) Paul has been taken to mean that Christ emptied himself of the outer form of God and took on an outer form of a man. According to this view he appeared on earth in a disguise and was not really man.

b) Another view holds that Christ emptied himself of his divine attributes (omniscience, omnipotence, etc.)—of the "insignia of majesty"—and that what remained of him was born as a man. According to this view, however, not all of the divine in him was given up, for the love of God is still seen in him; hence he gave up some, or most, but not all, of the characteristics which he had when he was in the "form of God."

c) There is a third possible interpretation—viz., that no genitive of contents should be supplied with the word "emptied." Paul said, not that Christ Jesus emptied himself of anything, but that he emptied himself. Thus Paul is saying that rather than trying to grasp equality with God, Christ emptied himself of his life, not of some of its characteristics or of its outer form. The word translated "emptied" may also be translated "poured out": Christ poured out his life "unto death" (Phil. 2:8). Lying behind this picture is Isa. 53:12: "He poured out his life, his being [נפש; RSV 'soul'], to death." Cf. II Cor. 8:9. See CHRIST.

B. H. THROCKMORTON, JR.

ENAC ē′năk. Douay Version form of ANAK.

ENAIM ĭ nā′əm [עינים, two springs] (Gen. 38:14, 21). A place between Adullam and Timnah; possibly the same as ENAM. The present location is unknown.

ENAM ē′nəm [עינם] (Josh. 15:34). A village of Judah in the Shephelah district of Zorah-Azekah; probably same as ENAIM.

ENAN ē′nən [עינן, little(?) spring]. The father of Ahira, who was the leader of Naphtali in the wilderness (Num. 1:15; 2:29; 7:78, 83; 10:27). The name is apparently preserved in the place name HAZAR-ENAN.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 38, 224. R. F. JOHNSON

ENASIBUS. KJV Apoc. form of ELIASHIB 5.

ENCAMPMENT. See CAMP.

ENCHANTER, ENCHANTMENTS. The OT uses several terms to designate an enchanter—i.e., a sorcerer who employs spells, charms, or omens in his occult practice. Because enchanters are generally listed together with other practitioners of the magic art, and the technique of the enchanter is nowhere stated, the English versions differ in their translations. Words translated "enchanter" are:

a) אשף (Dan. 1:20; 2:2, 10, 27; 4:7—H 4:4; 5:7, 11, 15; KJV "astrologer"), clearly a loan word from Akkadian ašipu, a class of conjuration priest.

b) חבר (Ps. 58:5—H 58:6; alternately "charmer"). The basic meaning of חבר (Akkadian ḫabāru) is "to be noisy"; hence חבר חברים is "one who mutters sounds," "a mutterer." Cf. bibliography.

c) KJV נחש (Deut. 18:10; RSV "augur").

d) KJV ענן (Jer. 27:9; RSV "soothsayer").

The practice of the enchanter, like any other form of magic, was forbidden by law (Lev. 19:26; Deut. 18:10).

See also DIVINATION.

Bibliography. J. J. Finkelstein, JBL, 75 (1956), 328-31.

I. MENDELSOHN

END, THE [τὸ τέλος]. A term used in various general or common senses, but especially to designate the end of the present age—as, e.g., in Matt. 24:13-14; Mark 13:7; I Cor. 15:24; I Pet. 4:7. See ESCHATOLOGY OF THE NT. M. RIST

EN-DOR ĕn′dôr [עין דאר, עין דור, עין דר, spring of dor]. A city in Manasseh best remembered as the place where there resided a medium (KJV "witch") who was consulted by Saul king of Israel (I Sam. 28:7). At the time of the conquest of Canaan, the tribe of Manasseh was not able to drive out the Canaanites from En-dor (Josh. 17:11). En-dor is plausibly located at modern Endor on the N side of Little Hermon (Nebi Dahi), ca. four miles from Mount Tabor.

The text of Ps. 83:10—H 83:11, where En-dor is mentioned as the place at which Sisera and Jabin were destroyed, presents a problem, because the book of Judges makes no mention of En-dor. In the preceding verse there is a reference to Midian, which has led some scholars to propose that "En-harod" (cf. Judg. 7:1) should be read in vs. 10 rather than "En-dor." However, it is possible that the Hebrew text of the psalm is correct at this point, and that the psalmist knew of the proximity of En-dor to Mount Tabor and decided on the former merely to indicate the general locality of the destruction of Sisera and Jabin. W. L. REED ENDURANCE. The translation of ὑπομονή in Luke 21:19; Rom. 5:3-4; II Cor. 6:4; Col. 1:11; Heb. 10:36; Rev. 1:9; 2:2, 19; 3:10; 13:10; 14:12 (KJV "patience" in all these passages). The RSV translates this word elsewhere by "PATIENCE"; "STEADFASTNESS"; and "perseverance." These other translations, to which one could add "fortitude," reveal the variety of connotations which the Greek word includes. It is used to describe a sword's power to sustain blows.

B. H. THROCKMORTON, JR.

EN-EGLAIM ĕn ĕg′lĭ əm [עין עגלים, spring of two calves] (Ezek. 47:10). A place on the shores of the Dead Sea; from here to En-gedi fishermen will cast their nets, according to Ezekiel's vision of Israel's restoration. Though 'Ain Hajlah (Beth Hoglah) has been suggested with reason, the more probable location is 'Ain Feshkha, ca. 1½ miles S of Khirbet Qumran. V. R. GOLD ENEMESSAR ĕn′ə mĕs′ər. KJV translation of Ἐνεμεσσάρος. The book of Tobit is dated with reference to the captivity that took place "in the time of Enemessar king of the Assyrians" (Tob. 1:2 KJV). The Vulg. here has "Salmanasar"; and the RSV reads: "In the days of SHALMANESER, king of the Assyrians." Enemessar, an otherwise unknown name, is thought to be an inversion of the two parts of the Assyrian compound SARRU-KINU, meaning "the legitimate king," epithet of Sargon, the general who, on the death of Shalmaneser IV, seized the crown. At Tob. 1:15 the text reads: "When Shalmaneser died, Sennacherib his son reigned in his place." Since Sennacherib was the son of Sargon, there seems further evidence of the confusion between Enemessar and Shalmaneser.

J. C. SWAIM

ENEMY [איב; צר; צרר; שנא; שרר; שור; קום; Aram. ער; ἐχθρός]. Alternately: ADVERSARY; FOE; HATER. One who dislikes or hates another and seeks to do him harm; an opponent or adversary; a hostile force, nation, or army.

While "enemy" in the OT refers usually to the national enemies of Israel (Josh. 24:11, etc.), it is also used to mean one's personal enemies (Exod. 23:4; Judg. 16:23; I Sam. 18:29; Esth. 7:6; etc.), especially in the Psalter (Ps. 3:7 et passim). Similarly, while "enemy" in the NT refers most often to personal enemies (Matt. 13:25; Gal. 4:16; etc.), it also is used to mean a foreign people (Luke 1:71; 19:43; cf. 21:20).

God is often spoken of in the OT as an enemy. He is an enemy to Israel's enemies (Exod. 23:22; Judg. 5:31; II Chr. 20:29; Ps. 68:1; etc.). Such a view was the basis of the early national traditions which viewed God as a warrior championing his people's welfare, bringing them out of Egypt, guiding them through the desert, and giving them Canaan as a promised land. This is the view expressed, not only in the traditions, but also by the prophets (Amos 2:9-10; Mic. 6:4-5; etc.). The prophets spoke also of God's abandoning his people to their enemies for judgment (Judg. 2:14; II Chr. 25:8; Jer. 12:7; cf. Hos. 5:15–6:1; Luke 19:41-44). They thus could call God in his judgments Israel's enemy (Isa. 1:24; Lam. 2:5). Even so the prophets insisted that in his role as enemy to Israel, God's love for them was the dominant factor (Isa. 54:7-8; Jer. 30:14; 31:2-3; Hos. 2:14). Job feels that he is God's enemy (13:24; 19:11; 33:10; cf. 40:1).

Man is God's enemy or, literally, hates him when he disobeys the divine commandments (Exod. 20:5; Deut. 5:8-10; 7:9-10). Paul speaks of sinners as enemies of God (Rom. 5:8; cf. Phil. 3:18), and elsewhere in the NT it is said that a friend of the world is an enemy of God (Jas. 4:4). The devil (see SATAN) is the enemy par excellence (Matt. 13:39; Luke 10:19; cf. Acts 13:10) and death the last enemy (I Cor. 15:26) to succumb to the reign of Christ (cf. Heb. 10:13).

The contrast drawn in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5:43-44) between hating one's enemies and loving one's enemies is wrongly interpreted as a difference between OT and NT personal ethics. While there is no categorical commandment in the OT to love one's enemies, there is certainly none to hate one's enemies. Hatred of national enemies and persecutors pervades such OT works as Nahum, Obadiah, and Esther (cf. Ps. 137:7-9; Isa. 47; 49:22-26), and in the NT the book of Revelation. But a spirit of international good will under the universal sovereignty of God is the very basis of such thinking as is found in Ruth; Isa. 19:19-25; 40–55; Jonah (cf. I Kings 20:31; II Kings 5:20-23). The theme of the biblical doctrine of ELECTION from the early chapters of Genesis is that through Israel the rest of the world may be blessed (Gen. 12:1-3; cf. Jer. 4:1-2). Jeremiah in his letter to the exiles in Babylonia bids them pray for the peace and welfare of their enemies and captors (Jer. 29:7).

It is only in the NT, however, that the categorical imperative is made that a man should love his enemies (Matt. 5:43-44). Nonetheless, if this imperative were spelled out in terms of ethical conduct in given situations, the OT would afford the particulars. Exod. 23:4-5 directs the man who finds his enemy's ox or ass lost to return it to him. Saul defines righteousness in terms of repaying good for evil (I Sam. 24:17-19). Job claims, in defense of his righteous integrity, never to have rejoiced over the misfortune of an enemy (Job. 31:29). The book of Proverbs puts Job's claim in the form of a commandment: "Do not rejoice when your enemy falls" (Prov. 24:17). Paul, in fact, does spell out the meaning of love of one's enemy and in so doing quotes Prov. 25:21-22 to make his point (Rom. 12:14-21): "If your enemy is hungry, feed him; if he is thirsty, give him drink; for by so doing you will heap burning coals upon his head."

See also NATIONS; SIN, SINNERS; WRATH.

J. A. SANDERS

ENENIUS ĭ nē′nĭ əs. KJV Apoc. form of BIGVAI.

ENGADDI. KJV Apoc. form of EN-GEDI.

EN-GANNIM ĕn găn′ĭm [עין גנים, spring of gardens]. 1. A town in Judah (Josh. 15:34). It is perhaps to be identified with the Shephelah town Beit Jemal, approximately two miles S of Beth-shemesh, to the E of which is the spring ʿAin Fatir.

2. A town in Issachar (Josh. 19:21), assigned to the Gershonites as a Levitical city (21:29). The list in I Chronicles (6:73—H 6:58) at this point reads "Anem," but this is considered to be a textual error. It is generally identified with modern Jenin, located near a spring on the S side of the Plain of Esdraelon, where the chief route from Jerusalem and Samaria enters the plain. It has also been suggested that En-gannim probably replaces the original name En-ʿonam, and that the latter should be identified with modern ʿOlam. This site fulfils the topographical requirements of the limits of the territory of Issachar (Josh. 19:17-23) better than Jenin.

Bibliography. W. F. Albright, "The Topography of the Tribe of Issachar," ZAW (1926), pp. 231-32; A. Saarisalo, The Boundary Between Issachar and Naphtali (1927), pp. 62-63, 129; F.-M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine, II (1938), 24, 62, 317.

G. W. VAN BEEK

EN-GEDI ĕn gĕd′ī [עין גדי, spring of the kid]; KJV Apoc. ENGADDI ĕn găd′ī. An important oasis at about the middle of the W side of the Dead Sea, ca. thirty-five miles SE of Jerusalem. The oasis is fed by a hot-water spring located three or four hundred feet above the base of a large cliff. The depression of the Dead Sea made it possible for the oasis to produce semitropical vegetation and to become noted for its palms, vineyards, and balsam (Song of S. 1:14; Ecclus. 24:14; Jos. Antiq. IX.i.2). The ancient site of En-gedi is SE of the oasis at Tell ej-Jurn, near the modern settlement of 'Ain Jidi. There are remains of a Byzantine aqueduct leading from the spring, and recently the walls of a Judahite fortress (from the period 900-600 B.C.) were discovered at Tell ej-Jurn. En-gedi was occupied by Amorites who were subjugated by Chedorlaomer and his allies in Abraham's day (Gen. 14:7, where Hazazon-tamar is En-gedi). Later the village was assigned to the wilderness district of Judah (Josh. 15:62).

Courtesy of the Israel Office of Information, New York

28. En-gedi on the shore of the Dead Sea

David sought refuge from Saul in the rugged terrain around En-gedi (I Sam. 23:29—H 24:1), and in a cave in the vicinity the incident occurred in which David cut off Saul's skirt but did not take his life (I Sam. 24). During the reign of Jehoshaphat (ca. 873-849) Hazazon-tamar (En-gedi) was a staging area for the Ammonites, Moabites, and Meunites prior to the battle at the Ascent of Ziz (II Chr. 20:2).

In Ezekiel's vision of Israel's restoration, fishermen will catch fish in the Dead Sea from En-gedi to En-eglaim (Ezek. 47:10).

Pls. IX*b;* XII*f;* Fig. ENG 28. V. R. GOLD

ENGINE [חשבון (II Chr. 26:15), lit. device, invention, from חשב, think, devise; מחי קבל (Ezek. 26:9 KJV), lit. the blow of an attacking object, from מחה, to strike, and קבל, qᵉbhōl, cf. Arab. qubl, front part, Akkad. qablu, battle, engagement]. Alternately: RSV BATTERING RAMS; KJV ENGINES OF WAR (Ezek. 26:9). A skilful mechanical device for using energy to do work, in this instance for military purposes.

1. History. Engines of war seem to have been developed in Western Asia first by the Assyrians, who employed wheeled towers in siege operations, either as vantage points for archers or to house battering rams. Large catapults for hurling stones, arrows, etc., appeared rather late in the Greek world, and here the name of Dionysius tyrant of Syracuse (430-367 B.C.) is important. Such artillery was used by Alexander the Great (356-323 B.C.), and thereafter it was part of the standard equipment of most Hellenistic armies, and later of the Roman legions. For references to these machines in the Maccabean period see I Macc. 6:51-52; 13:43. See also WEAPONS AND IMPLEMENTS OF WAR.

2. In the OT. a. Battering rams. For devices employed to batter down walls and gates, see BATTERING RAM. It is probable that the unusual phrase in Ezek. 26:9 (מחי קבל) should be translated "battering rams" (RSV) rather than "engines of war" (KJV).

b. Catapults, etc. In II Chr. 26:15 it is said that Uzziah of Judah (eighth century B.C.) set up engines on Jerusalem's defenses to shoot arrows and great stones. While it is impossible to disprove this statement, the fact remains that elsewhere in the Mediterranean area catapults and the like did not come into general use until considerably later than Uzziah's age. As the present form of I and II Chronicles is thought to come from ca. 300 B.C., some look upon this reference in II Chr. 26:15 as an anachronism.

Bibliography. For Roman engines at the siege of Jotapata in Galilee in A.D. 67, see Jos. War III.ix.166-70. For an account of ballistic machines down to the Roman age, see C. Singer, E. J. Holmyard, A. R. Hall, and T. I. Williams, eds., A History of Technology, II (1956), 698-720.

W. S. MCCULLOUGH

ENGLISH BIBLE. The first complete English translation of the Bible was by John Wyclif in 1382. Before his day there had been translations of Psalms, the gospels, and other popular sections, but not of the Bible as a whole. After Wyclif, Tyndale (1525) translated the NT, and before his death in 1536 portions of the OT. His work opened the way for a constant stream of English Bibles that included the new AUTHORIZED VERSIONS down through the official revisions, including the RSV (1946-52). The Roman Catholic Church has produced several English Bibles and independent translations. See also VERSIONS, ENGLISH. J. R. BRANTON ENGRAVING [פתוח, engraving, from פתח, engrave; Akkad. pataḫu, bore; cf. ἐντυπόω, carved (KJV ENGRAVEN)]. Forms of ancient engraving include: (a) Gems cut and inscribed, as on the BREASTPIECE OF THE HIGH PRIEST. The jeweler's art is the usual context of biblical engraving (Exod. 28:9, 11, 21, 35; 31:5; 39:6, 14; see JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES). (b) IVORY carving and inlaying, well illustrated by Palestinian archaeology. (c) Metal, as, metaphorically, an inscription engraved on a metal tablet (Jer. 17:1). (d) For engraving on seals and scarabs, see SEALS AND SCARABS; SIGNET (see II Tim. 2:19). (e) WRITING engraved on STONE (Deut. 5:8, 22; II Cor. 3:7; see also OSSUARIES; INSCRIPTIONS). (f) Wood carving, as on the Holy Place wainscoting of Solomon's temple (I Kings 6:18, 29; Ezek. 41:17-20). See TEMPLE, JERUSALEM.

The copper-bronze "graving tool" (chisel; Exod. 32:4) was one of a variety developed by the Akkadians. The jeweler's wheel was widely used by ca. 1500 B.C. Uncertain Hebrew words following a list of precious stones in Ezek. 28:13 may designate the ordinary tools of the gem-engraver, the polishing drum and drill.

Bibliography. J. H. Middleton, Engraved Gems of Classical Times (1891), p. 110, concerning Ezek. 28:13; P. L. Garber, "Reconstructing Solomon's Temple," BA, XIV (1951), 2-24; J. B. Pritchard, ed., ANEP (1954), pp. 21-70, for illustrations of various kinds of engraving; C. Singer et al., eds., A History of Technology, I (1954), 612, 648-49, 663, 679.

P. L. GARBER

EN-HADDAH ĕn hăd′ə [עין חדה] (Josh. 19:21). A town in Issachar. It is probably located at el-Hadetheh, ca. six miles E of Mount Tabor.

EN-HAKKORE ĕn hăk′ə rĭ [עין הקורא, spring of the partridge or spring of the caller] (Judg. 15:19). A spring at LEHI, from which Samson drank. A word-play is made on the second meaning: Samson "called" on the Lord in his thirst, whereupon this spring was miraculously provided (vs. 18). Both meanings are equally good etymologically.

W. F. STINESPRING

EN-HAZOR ĕn hā′zôr [עין חצור, spring of Hazor] (Josh. 19:37). A fortified town in the territory of Naphtali. It is generally identified with Khirbet Hazireh, a site near Hazzur, in the hills of N Galilee.

Bibliography. F.-M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine, II (1938), 65, 318. G. W. VAN BEEK

ENLIL ĕn′lĭl [lord of the wind]. The chief god of Nippur; king of the earth and lower atmosphere; the "master" (BEL) who overcame the chaotic waters and established Cosmos. His functions and title were later transferred to MARDUK, the god of Babylon.

Bibliography. M. Jastrow, The Religion of Babylonia and Assyria (1898), pp. 52-55; E. Ebeling and B. Meissner, Reallexikon der Assyriologie, II (1938), 382-90; E. Dhorme, Les religions de Babylonie et d'Assyrie (1945), pp. 26-31, 48-50. J. GRAY

EN-MISHPAT. See KADESH.

ENNOM ĕn′əm. Douay Version form of HINNOM. See HINNOM, VALLEY OF.

ENOCH ē′nək [חנוך, possibly retainer, follower (cf. חניקים in Gen. 14:14); Ενωχ]; KJV HENOCH hē′nək in I Chr. 1:3. 1. Son of Cain, and the father of Irad (Gen. 4:17*a,* 18*a*).

2. Son of Jared, in the Sethite genealogy; the father of Methuselah (Gen. 5:17-24; I Chr. 1:3; Luke 3:37). Enoch lived in such intimate association with God (ויתהלך את־האלים; Gen. 5:22, 24; cf. 6:9; 17:1 [with לפני]) that "he was not, for God took him" (5:24*b;* cf. Ecclus. 44:16; 49:14; Heb. 11:5). Enoch's translation (μετάθεσις) produced a large growth of later legend (Wisd. Sol. 4:10; Jude 14; see ENOCH, BOOK OF).

Bibliography. W. F. Albright, "The Predeuteronomic Primeval History (JE) in Gen. 1–11," JBL, LVIII (1939), 96.

3. A city built by Cain and named after his son Enoch (Gen. 14:17*b*). L. HICKS

ENOCH, BOOK OF. Alternately: I ENOCH; ETHIOPIC ENOCH. One of several pseudepigraphic writings ascribed to ENOCH 2. Gen. 5:18-24 gave rise to the belief that Enoch had been translated to heaven, where the secrets of the heavenly regions and the course of human events predetermined in heaven were disclosed to him. Consequently, it was in order that a book dealing with these subjects should carry his name as its author.

1. Text
2. Influence
3. Date
4. Contents
   a. Introduction
   b. Book I, Angels and Universe
   c. Book II, Parables of Similitudes
   d. Book III, The Heavenly Luminaries
   e. Book IV, The Dream Visions
   f. Book V, The Admonitions to Righteousness
   g. Conclusion
Bibliography

1. Text. This lengthy composite work of 108 chapters of quite uneven length was originally written in Hebrew or Aramaic, or, like DANIEL, in both these languages. It was translated into Greek at some early date, and from Greek into Ethiopic (ca. A.D. 500) and also into Latin. The original Semitic text has disappeared. The Greek text has been preserved in part: 1:1–32:6 is found in two eighth-century or later MSS discovered in 1886-87 in a Christian grave at Akhmim, Egypt; 6:1–10:14; 15:8–16:1 are cited in Syncellus (ca. A.D. 800); 89:42-49 is in a Vatican MS; and chs. 97–104; 106–108 are found in Egyptian papyri published by Bonner in 1937. 106:1-18 and some brief quotations are extant for the Latin. Fortunately, the entire work (presumably) is preserved in Ethiopic. In 1773 Bruce discovered three Ethiopic MSS containing Enoch in Abyssinia. Since then a score and more of similar MSS have come to light. Unfortunately, they are all quite late; the earliest, it is said, is sixteenth century. The first complete translation into a modern language was that made by Laurence in 1821. Since then, numerous publications of or about the book have testified to its value.

The book itself was probably composed in the first century B.C. Dates suggested are 95, 63, and during Herod's reign (37-4). It is not an original composition; rather, it is a compilation of disparate, in part inconsistent if not contradictory, sources of differing types by different writers of different times. It has been stated that certain DEAD SEA SCROLLS contain texts of sources used in Enoch, but as yet the evidence has not been thoroughly evaluated.

The extent to which the compiler reworked his sources cannot be determined. He certainly made little effort to harmonize them, for he has retained the differing views of the various sources in his book. To some extent he interwove his sources. Thus, a supposed Noachic source (see NOAH, APOCALYPSE OF) may be in 6–11; 54:1–55:2; 60; 65:1–69:25; 106–107. More typically, however, one source is followed by another, with little attention to chronological or logical sequence, or to consistency in thought.

The text, quite understandably, is quite corrupt. The textual problem is complicated by the consideration that the only source for much of the book is the Ethiopic text, which itself is a translation of the Greek translation. As Charles first noted and shows by his translation, many passages were originally in poetic form. This feature has been an aid in determining whether in the course of transmission lines have been omitted, added, lengthened, or shortened. Despite the condition of the text, in most instances the original thought seems to have been preserved.

2. Influence. The book of Enoch was well known to the Jews and later to Christians. Apparently it was used by the writers of the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, the Assumption of Moses, the Apocalypse of Baruch, and IV Ezra. However, from the second century A.D. on, it is rarely mentioned in Jewish sources. As for its currency among the early Christians, Charles overstates the case when he says that nearly all the writers of the NT books were acquainted with it, and influenced by it, and that with the earlier fathers and apologists it had all the weight of a canonical book. Even so, concepts found in Enoch are found in various NT books, including the Gospels and Revelation, and Jude 14-15 cites it explicitly. It is quoted as scripture in Barnabas, and some of its verbiage may be reflected in the Apocalypse of Peter. A number of the earlier apologists did make use of it, and Tertullian, for one, might have welcomed it in the OT canon. However, by the fourth century it fell into disfavor in the West, being stigmatized by Jerome as apocryphal. The finding of Greek texts as late as A.D. 800 in a Christian grave in Egypt indicates a somewhat longer popularity of the book in the East. Its survival as a complete work, as noted before, is due to its use by the Ethiopian Christians, who included it with other apocryphal writings in the OT.

3. Date. The compiler of the book of Enoch arranged his work in five books corresponding, in part, to his major sources, with an introduction and a conclusion. Scholars are by no means in agreement concerning the dates of the various sources. The dating is in part determined by the presence or absence of reflections of historical events and persons, such as the Maccabean Revolt, Antiochus Epiphanes, the Hasmonean period, the reign of Alexander Janneus (103-70 B.C.), the beginning of the Roman period (63 B.C.), and the like.

With these uncertainties in mind, the divisions of Enoch with the suggested dates, as given by Pfeiffer, are as follows: Introduction, chs. 1-5 (ca. 150-100 B.C.); Book I, Angels and Universe, chs. 6-36 (ca. 100 B.C., though Charles and others assign it to the pre-Maccabean period); Book II, Parables or Similitudes, chs. 37-71 (100-80 B.C.); Book III, The Heavenly Luminaries, chs. 72-82 (150-100 B.C.); Book IV, The Dream Visions, chs. 83-90 (163-130 B.C.); Book V, The Admonitions to Righteousness, chs. 91-105 (100-80 B.C., save for the Apocalypse of Weeks [93:1-10; 91:12-17], 163 B.C.; Charles, however, places this fragment in the pre-Maccabean period); Conclusion, chs. 106-108 (100-80 B.C.; however, chs. 106-107, which are from the Noachic source, may be considerably earlier than the conclusion itself).

4. Contents. The book of Enoch is usually termed an apocalypse. This term applies, however, to only a small portion of the work, for much of it is nonapocalyptic. Still, it is replete with materials that came to be associated with apocalypses: purported visions, symbolism, angelology, demonology, resurrection, judgment, cosmology, the Messiah, the messianic reign, astralism, dualism, eschatology, heavenly tablets (books of life), the New Jerusalem, the tree of life, punishments for the wicked, rewards for the righteous, and the like. Revelation (see REVELATION, BOOK OF) alone compares with Enoch in the richness of its varied concepts. A summation of the important features of each division of the book will reveal its importance for both Jewish and Christian thinking.

a. Introduction (chs. 1-5). The theme that recurs in the book of the coming punishments of the wicked and the rewards for the righteous is introduced. The end of the world is predicted, with the final judgment, the destruction of the wicked, and the resurrection of the righteous to an endless and sinless age.

b. Book I, Angels and Universe (chs. 6-36). Chs. 6-11 (from the book of NOAH) attribute the fallen angels to the intercourse between the sons of God and the daughters of men (related in Gen. 6:1 ff). They, in turn, have corrupted mankind through their instructions in the arts and crafts of civilization. Enoch interceded for the fallen angels ("watchers"), but was instructed to predict their final doom (chs. 12-16). He then was conducted by angels of light on various journeys, throughout the earth, to Sheol, to the place of final punishment of the fallen angels, to the tree of life, to Jerusalem, and to the Garden of Righteousness.

c. Book II, Parables or Similitudes (chs. 37-71). Strictly speaking, these are not parables in the rabbinic or gospel meaning of the term. Their basic message is the coming destruction of wickedness and the triumph of righteousness. The first parable (chs. 38-44) deals with the coming judgment of the wicked and the reward of the righteous, and with angels, archangels, and heavenly secrets of meteorology and astronomy. The second (chs. 45-57) depicts the Messiah, the Elect One, also called the SON OF MAN, sitting on his throne of judgment. The Son of man in Enoch is not a human being, but a pre-existent, heavenly, resplendent, majestic being who possesses all dominion and pronounces judgment upon all men and angels. The final triumph of the righteous, the resurrection and judgment, and the punishment of the wicked are depicted. The third parable (58-71) promises rewards for the righteous; reveals still further heavenly secrets; and depicts the measuring of Paradise, the judgment by the Elect One, the Son of man on his throne, the resurrection of the righteous with their garments of glory, and the punishment of the fallen angels.

d. Book III, The Heavenly Luminaries (chs. 72-82). In Jewish legend Enoch was honored as the inventor of writing, mathematics, and astronomy. This astronomical treatise is concerned that time should be reckoned by the sun, not the moon. However, the writer's solar year is 364 days, even though he is aware of the 365¼-day year. This insistence upon a solar year may have been in opposition to the Pharisaic use of the lunar CALENDAR. An astrological motif appears in 80:2-8, where we learn that the last evil days will be marked (if not predetermined) by grave disorders among the heavenly bodies, sun, moon, and stars, as well as upon the earth. The heavenly tablets containing all the deeds of men of the future generations strike a strongly deterministic note not unrelated to astralism.

e. Book IV, The Dream Visions (chs. 83–90). The two visions comprising this section predict the future history of Israel. The first (chs. 83–84) predicts the Flood as a punishment upon the world because of sin, which is traced to the fallen angels. The second, after recounting the period from Adam to Enoch, predicts the future up to the time of the Maccabean period (thus indicating its date). Symbolic imagery is used: oxen symbolize the patriarchs; sheep, the faithful Israelites; beasts and birds of prey, the heathen oppressors; a sheep (with a great horn, which the birds of prey could not overcome), a Jewish leader, possibly Judas Maccabeus; and a white bull with great horns, the Messiah. There are also seventy shepherds, who may have been angelic guardians of Israel. In the final period the heathen will assault the Jews, but will be repulsed and swallowed up by the earth. Fallen and faithless angels and apostate Jews will be judged. The New Jerusalem will be established, the surviving Gentiles will submit and become converted, the righteous dead will be resurrected, the messianic kingdom will be founded, and the Messiah will appear.

f. Book V, The Admonitions to Righteousness (chs. 91–105). Enoch predicts the judgment of the wicked and the blessed resurrection of the righteous. This introduces the Apocalypse of Weeks, 93:1-10; 91:12-17 (163 B.C.). Beginning with Enoch's own time, the future is divided into ten unequal weeks, each marked by some special event. The second week is characterized by Noah; next in order are those of Abraham, Moses, the temple, and Elijah, with the seventh a week of degeneration, possibly the tragic period that precipitated the Maccabean Revolt. The eighth week will be marked by the victory of the righteous (the Maccabees) over their oppressors, followed by the rule of righteousness. All the works of the wicked will be brought to an end, and in the ninth week the world will be made ready for destruction. In the tenth week, which will be endless, a new heaven will replace the old. Possibly a resurrection and final judgment were in the original of this ancient source. The book continues with exhortations of the righteous and condemnations of the wicked, which some relate to the difficult days of Alexander Janneus (103-76 B.C.). The terrors of the Judgment are portrayed. In the hereafter the wicked will be punished, eternally, in Sheol, whereas the righteous will enjoy the bliss of heaven.

g. Conclusion (chs. 106–108). Chs. 106-107 from the earlier book of Noah relate the birth of Noah and predict the increase of sin following the Flood until the messianic reign is established. The final chapter reverts to the theme of dire punishments that await the wicked and the rewards assured to the righteous.

It is quite obvious that Enoch is a complex book, lacking unity of treatment and of concepts. Consequently, it is exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, to state the actual views of the compiler. But the summation of its contents reveals the indebtedness of early Christianity to this book, or to writings and traditions of a similar character.

Bibliography. G. Beer, "Das Buch Henoch," in E. Kautzsch, Die Apokryphen und Pseudepigraphen des Alten Testaments (1900), II, 217-310. R. H. Charles, The Book of Enoch (1912; reprinted 1921 with an Introduction by W. O. E. Oesterley); "Book of Enoch" in The Apoc. and Pseudep. of the OT (1913), II, 163-281. C. Bonner, The Last Chapters of Enoch in Greek (1937). H. H. Rowley, The Relevance of Apocalyptic (2nd ed., 1946), pp. 54-60, 77-84. R. H. Pfeiffer, History of NT Times (1949), pp. 75-79.

M. RIST

ENOSH ē′nŏsh [אנוש, man, mankind; cf. אדם (Pss. 8:4—H 5; 144:3)]. Alternately: ENOS ē′nəs. Son of Seth; the father of Kenan (Gen. 4:26; 5:6-11; I Chr. 1:1; Luke 3:38). J records the tradition that in some form Yahweh-worship began in Enosh' time (Gen. 4:26).

EN-RIMMON ĕn rĭm′ən [עין־רמון, spring of the pomegranate] (Josh. 19:7; Neh. 11:29). Alternately: AIN, RIMMON ān, rĭm′ən (Josh. 15:32; I Chr. 4:32; see below). A city assigned to Simeon (Josh. 19:7; I Chr. 4:32), and later to Judah's Negeb district of Hormah (Josh. 15:32). Returnees from the Exile resettled at En-rimmon (Neh. 11:29). It is usually identified with Khirbet Umm er-Ramamin, nine miles N-NE of Beer-sheba.

"Ain and Rimmon" in Josh. 15:32; I Chr. 4:32 should probably be "Ain-rimmon"—i.e., "En-rimmon."

V. R. GOLD

EN-ROGEL ĕn rō′gəl [עין רגל, spring of the fuller, or wanderer, or spy]. A spring near Jerusalem, in the valley of the Kidron. It marked the limit between the tribes of Benjamin and Judah (Josh. 15:7; 18:16). When David had to flee from Jerusalem in the days of Absalom's rebellion, two of his men remained near En-rogel to gather intelligence concerning the progress of the revolt in the capital city (II Sam. 17:17). The clandestine coronation of Adonijah took place by the Serpent's Stone, near the spring (I Kings 1:9). En-rogel is commonly identified with the so-called Bir Ayyub, "Job's Well," on the left bank of the Wadi en-Nar (the Kidron), shortly after its junction with the Wadi er-Rababi (Valley of Hinnom).* The well is sunk deep into the rock and reaches an underground stream of water which gushes to the surface and flows down the valley after abundant winter rainfalls. The gradual filling of the valley has made it necessary to line the upper parts of the well with stone masonries which in their oldest stage may go back to Roman times. The constructions seen over the well are modern. See map under JERUSALEM. See also JERUSALEM § 5*b*. Fig. ENR 29.

Copyright: The Matson Photo Service

29. En-rogel, modern Bir Ayyub ("well of Job"), below the village of Silwan

Bibliography. G. A. Smith, Jerusalem, I (1907), 108-11; H. Vincent, Jérusalem Antique (1912), pp. 134-38; G. Dalman, Jerusalem und sein Gelände (1930), pp. 163-67; A. S. Marmardji, Textes Géographiques Arabes sur la Palestine (1951), p. 14; J. Simons, Jerusalem in the OT (1952), pp. 158-62; H. Vincent, Jérusalem de l'Ancient Testament, I (1954), 284-88.

G. A. BARROIS

ENROLLMENT [התיחש, enrolling; ἀπογραφή, registration]. A listing of people in a public register according to family, position, and tribe. Such genealogical lists may have been kept at a number of villages. Enrollments were customary for conscripting soldiers (cf. Num. 1:2-3; II Sam. 24:1-9; I Chr. 7:40; 21:1-5; II Chr. 25:5). Solomon, and evidently David before him, enrolled aliens to conscript them for work (II Chr. 2:17). Priests kept family registers to prove their right to priestly service and support (I Chr. 23:3; Ezra 2:61-63; cf. Neh. 7:61-65). Family registers were probably also kept. In the NT reference is made to Roman imperial policy to enroll people for purposes of taxation (Luke 2:2; Acts 5:37). See also CENSUS.

1. In the OT. Periodic enrollments seem to have been customary in Israel prior to the monarchy in raising armies (Num. 1:2-3; I Chr. 7:40), and even afterward when a king desired to go to war (cf. II Sam. 24:1-9; I Chr. 21:1-5; II Chr. 25:5). By means of his standing army the king more particularly protected himself and his claim to the throne.

Besides political enrollments, it is quite likely that family and tribal genealogical registers were kept (cf. Ezek. 13:9), with great stress on their preservation. The emphasis on family and ancestry, inheritance, tribal solidarity, and the pride and significance of being a true son of Abraham, and heir to the promises of God, make this all the more probable. The Chronicler tells us there was a genealogical register compiled in the time of Jotham and Jeroboam II. When and how often such enrollments were made is uncertain. Josephus states that the genealogy of his family was set down in public records (Life I) and claims that in his day the high priestly family record went back two thousand years. The Priestly writer and the Chronicler seem to have used such lists in their histories. How reliable these lists are is uncertain. See also GENEALOGY.

2. In the NT. Luke states that there was an enrollment of the Jews according to families, in their native city, for purposes of taxation when Augustus was emperor of Rome and Quirinius governor of Syria (Luke 2:2). This he terms the first enrollment, indicating there were others, another of which he records as taking place in the days of Judas the Galilean (Acts 5:37; cf. Jos. Antiq. XVIII.i.1; War VII.i.2). From Egyptian papyri it appears a periodic census by households every fourteen years was a feature of the imperial administration of Egypt. It is probable that such a policy was also normal in Syria. Periodic enrollment by households is emphasized in the edict of G. Vibrius Maximus (A.D. 104), which notifies the people that the time is near and that all who are outside their nomes are to go to their "domestic hearths" for this purpose.

There is some question as to the accuracy of Luke's date for the initial enrollment. Extrabiblical sources are silent as to a world-wide imperial census at the time of Jesus' birth. Moreover, while QUIRINIUS was governor of Syria at the time of the census of A.D. 6, Sentius Saturnius was governor in 8/6 B.C. (cf. Tert. Marcion 4.19). If the word "governor" is used somewhat loosely, it is possible it may apply to Quirinius, who may have held some military position in Syria at that time. But he appears not to have been the official legate.

Bibliography. W. R. Ramsay, Was Christ Born at Bethlehem? (1898), pp. 117-96; W. R. Harvey-Jellie, Chronicles, New Century Bible (1906), p. 36; W. R. Ramsay, The Bearing of Recent Discoveries on the Trustworthiness of the NT (1915), pp. 238-300; A. Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East (trans. L. R. M. Strachan; 1927), pp. 270-71.

V. H. KOOY

EN-SHEMESH ĕn shĕm'ĭsh [עין שמש, spring of the sun]. A place on the N boundary of Judah (Josh. 15:7) and the S boundary of Benjamin (18:17); identified with 'Ain el-Hod, 2¾ miles E of Jerusalem and just E of Bethany, the last spring on the road between Jerusalem and the Jordan Valley. Since the fifteenth century it has been called the "Spring of the Apostles."

V. R. GOLD

ENSIGN. See BANNER.

EN-TAPPUAH ĕn tăp'yōō ə [עין תפוח, spring of Tappuah] (Josh. 17:7). A place of uncertain location at the S border of Manasseh; probably to be associated with the Ephraimite city of the same name (see TAPPUAH 2) SW of Shechem.

ENTHRONEMENT OF YAHWEH. See KING.

ENTRY, TRIUMPHAL. See TRIUMPHAL ENTRY.

ENVOY. See MESSENGER.

ENVY. 1. In the OT. In the OT "envy" usually translates קנאה, which also connotes "jealousy," "ardor," "zeal," and "rivalry." Perhaps it has the connotation of "rivalry" in Eccl. 4:4; 9:6. The jealousy (also קנאה) of God is often referred to (cf. Exod. 20:5), punishing those who are evil. In Exod. 34:14 God's jealousy will not permit Israel to worship another god (cf. Deut. 4:24; 6:15; Josh. 24:19); and God, being jealous, is avenging (Nah. 1:2). But the OT forbids man to be envious of violence (Prov. 3:31) or of sinners (Prov. 23:17; cf. Ezek. 35:11).

2. In the NT. In the NT envy (φθόνος) is also forbidden, usually appearing in lists of vices (Rom. 1:29; Gal. 5:21; I Tim. 6:4; Tit. 3:3; I Pet. 2:1; in Mark 7:22 ὀφθαλμὸς πονηρός is translated "envy"). Matthew says that Pilate knew that it was "out of envy" that the Jews had delivered Jesus up (27:18). This seems a strange reason. Perhaps the hatred of the Jews was a perversion of a hidden yearning. According to Mark, it was the chief priests who had handed Jesus over "out of envy" (15:10). They were jealous of Jesus and wanted him out of the way.

Paul bids the Galatians not to envy one another (5:26), for envy estranges and love builds up. He tells the Philippians that some are preaching Christ "from envy" (1:15). They are envious of the response made to Paul's preaching, and they are trying to persuade his followers to accept a different gospel.

With the OT idea (see § 1 above) that God is a "jealous" God, cf. Jas. 4:5, where it is said that God yearns jealously ("jealously" translates a phrase including φθόνος). Some suggest this text has been corrupted. See JEALOUSY. B. H. THROCKMORTON, JR.

EPAENETUS ĭ pē′nə təs [Ἐπαίνετος, praised] (Rom. 16:5). A Christian greeted as the first believer in the province of Asia. The natural inference is that Epaenetus is still in Asia, and this strongly indicates the Ephesian destination of Rom. 16. The reading "Achaia" (Ἀχαΐας) in some texts of Rom. 16:5 is poorly attested and clearly mistaken, being derived from I Cor. 16:15. Epaenetus is greeted by Paul almost at the very beginning of the long list of persons mentioned by name, and is greeted as especially beloved. Aside from this passage there are no data concerning Epaenetus. J. M. NORRIS

EPAPHRAS ĕp′ə frăs, ĭ păf′rəs [Ἐπαφρᾶς, a familiar form of Ἐπαφρόδιτος, charming] (Col. 1:7; 4:12; Philem. 23). A native of Colossae (Col. 4:12); a Christian preacher through whom the Colossians had come to know the gospel (1:7). He is not to be confused with Epaphroditus (Phil. 2:25; 4:18), who was a native of Philippi.

Epaphras was, at the time of the writing of Colossians and Philemon, a fellow prisoner with Paul (Philem. 23), but at a previous time he had evangelized Colossae and the neighboring towns of Laodicea and Hierapolis (Col. 4:12-13) under the direction of Paul—reading "on our behalf" in Col. 1:7, which is better attested than "on your behalf"—probably during Paul's long period of work in Ephesus (Acts 19:10). It was through Epaphras that Paul had come to know the situation of the Colossian church to which he addressed himself in Colossians. Paul speaks of Epaphras in terms of warmest commendation as his "fellow servant" (Col. 1:7) and even refers to him as a "servant of Christ Jesus" (4:12)—a designation that Paul applies even to Timothy only once (Phil. 1:1). Paul praises Epaphras for his unstinting devotion to the well-being and progress of the Christian communities in Colossae, Laodicea, and Hierapolis. J. M. NORRIS

EPAPHRODITUS ĭ păf′rə dī′təs [Ἐπαφρόδιτος, handsome, charming] (Phil. 2:25). A friend and coworker of Paul who served as messenger and bearer of a gift from the church at Philippi to Paul in prison. He had been a leader in the Philippian church who came not only to bring the gift which that church had collected for Paul, but also to stay and help him. In this service he had fallen ill—seriously so, for Paul reports that he was "near to death." Reiterating this point, Paul says: "He nearly died for the work of Christ, risking his life to complete your service to me" (Phil. 2:30). Now recovered, Epaphroditus was about to return to Philippi, to relieve the anxiety there about him and also Paul's anxiety. Paul asks that the church receive him "in the Lord with all joy."

Although Epaphras is a shortened form of Epaphroditus, we can hardly identify the Epaphras of Philem. 23; Col. 4:12 with the Epaphroditus of Philippians. The former leader had had significant leadership in three churches—Colossae, Laodicea, and Hierapolis (Col. 4:12-13)—and is designated in the Colossian letter as "one of yourselves." One person could hardly have had so close an identification with the interests of the Philippian church if he had also had as much leadership responsibility in the three other churches as the letter to the Colossians implies. The name was a common one in both forms in the first century. M. E. LYMAN EPHAH ē′fə [עֵיפָה, darkness]. 1. A son of Midian; eponym of an Arabian tribe (Gen. 25:4; I Chr. 1:33; cf. Isa. 60:6).

2. A concubine of Caleb; an eponym (I Chr. 2:46).

3. A Calebite family (I Chr. 2:47).

Bibliography. K. Tallqvist, Assyrian Personal Names (1914), p. 75. H. H. GUTHRIE, JR.

EPHAH (MEASURE) [אֵפָה, אֵיפָה]. A dry measure equal to a tenth of a homer (Ezek. 45:11), estimated as 1.52 to 2.42 pecks or three eighths to two thirds of a bushel; mentioned extensively in the OT. In Zech. 5:5-11, which presents some textual problems, there is the vision of a woman in an ephah. It would seem that here the term means a container larger than the standard.

See also WEIGHTS AND MEASURES § C4*d*.

O. R. SELLERS

EPHAI ē′fī [Kethibh עִיפִי, Qere עֵיפִי, perhaps bird, from עוּף, to fly] (Jer. 40:8). A Netophathite whose sons were among the captains in the open country that joined Gedaliah at Mizpah. The parallel passage in II Kings 25:23, however, omits the phrase "the sons of Ephai" and thus makes Tanhumeth "the Netophathite." M. NEWMAN

EPHER ē′fər [עֵפֶר, young deer or gazelle]. 1. A clan of the tribe of Midian (Gen. 25:4; I Chr. 1:33). Some have connected this name with the Apparu of the inscriptions of Ashurbanipal, others with modern 'Ofr in Arabia. The fact that the name occurs in lists of tribes of the Hebrews nearest Midian (cf. 2-3 below) could indicate the incorporation of Midianite clans into Israel.

2. A family or clan of the tribe of Judah (I Chr. 4:17).

3. A family or clan of the part of the tribe of Manasseh which dwelt E of Jordan (I Chr. 5:24). Cf. HEPHER 1 (Num. 26:32).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 230. H. H. GUTHRIE, JR.

EPHES-DAMMIM ē'fĭz dăm'ĭm [אפס דמים, end or border of Dammim (blood)] (I Sam. 17:1). Alternately: PAS-DAMMIM păs dăm'ĭm [פס דמים] (I Chr. 11:13). A staging area between Socoh and Azekah for the Philistine armies before the battle which was concluded by David's killing Goliath, the Philistine hero (I Sam. 17:1). Pas-dammim is probably the same as Ephes-dammim. Some scholars would add Pas-dammim to the parallel account in II Sam. 23:9.

Ephes-dammim is possibly to be identified with Damun, ca. four miles NE of Socoh. V. R. GOLD

EPHESIANS, LETTER TO THE ĭ fē'zhənz ['Εφεσίοι, see EPHESUS]. The tenth book in the NT canon; purporting to be a letter from the apostle Paul to the Christians at Ephesus. The RSV, however, follows the best ancient evidence in relegating to the margin the words "who are at Ephesus and" (1:1). As yet no completely satisfactory solution to the problems of destination, authorship, and purpose has been proposed. Remarkably few British scholars have abandoned the authenticity of Ephesians, but the majority of liberal scholars in America and Europe have done so. Ephesians is widely acclaimed as the greatest ecumenical document in the NT and as standing squarely in the Pauline tradition. Its use of liturgical texts (e.g., 1:3-14; 5:14) has recently been emphasized afresh, perhaps without sufficient caution, because Ephesians may have been a source for the second-century liturgies.

1. Authorship
2. Origin, purpose, and value
3. Contents
   a. Theology
   b. Ethics
4. Text
Bibliography

1. Authorship. The case for authenticity seems very strong at first. It claims to be by Paul (1:1; 3:1; cf. 4:1); its occasion (6:21-22) is identical with that of Col. 4:7-8; Philem. 1, 10, 23-24; and the magnificent hymn at 1:3-14 (if this is what it is) recalls similar poems in I Cor. 13; Phil. 2; Col. 1. The fervor and depth of Ephesians demand Paul as the author, it is said. If one shows close connections between Ephesians and Acts or I Peter or Revelation, the priority can be asserted for Ephesians. The letter was known almost certainly to Clement of Rome, Ignatius, Hermas, Polycarp, and the author of the Pastoral letters—i.e., from ca. A.D. 95. The earliest collected edition of the Pauline letters contained Ephesians; Marcion (ca. A.D. 140) accepted it, although he called it Laodiceans; and by the end of the second century it was canonical and assumed to be Paul's for Irenaeus, the (Roman) Muratorian Canon, and Clement of Alexandria. This unanimous tradition has strength; it was unchallenged until 1792. Obviously the onus of proof is on anyone who denies the ascription to Paul.

The defense will admit that the vocabulary and style are often unusual, and that certain thoughts mark an advance on Pauline teaching as found in Galatians, I and II Corinthians, and Romans. For Ephesians is the manifesto of a mighty controversialist at the end of his days, "all passion spent." As the place of non-Jews in God's new commonwealth was at last assured, Paul was free to write in positive, irenic vein; he lets his mind roam in spacious regions of heavenly truth (cf. II Cor. 12:1-4; I Cor. 2:6 ff); and the result is this profound contribution in which he expounds the meaning of Christ and his church. What other spiritual giant could possibly have produced Ephesians?

Since the address of 1:1 is so uncertain, it may be that Marcion's title, "To the Laodiceans," is correct, for Marcion must have relied on earlier tradition. A more popular suggestion among the conservatives (and some liberals) is, however, Archbishop Ussher's (1654)—that Paul wrote an encyclical to the Gentile Christians (2:11; 3:1). A space was left blank for the bearer (Tychicus) to insert place names as required. Intimate connections with Colossians are inevitable, since the two letters were composed at the same time, but Colossians dealt with Christology and the dangers of a specific heresy. Echoes of other Pauline letters must be due to the apostle's own memory.

Strong as it seems, this case is nevertheless very much weaker than its defenders allow.

The people addressed cannot be Paul's beloved Ephesian converts (Acts 19). They were unknown to the writer, who must "assume" that they understood about his status as the Apostle to the Gentiles and that they had been rightly instructed concerning Jesus the Messiah (1:15; 2:11; 3:2-6; 4:21). Paul could hardly be indulging in mere irony here; but how else can we understand such assumptions in a letter by him to a familiar church? Moreover, Ephesians lacks the truly personal elements we expect in a letter to one congregation or to the churches of a definite area. It will not do, therefore, to describe Ephesians as a circular to Asia Minor, including Ephesus, Colossae, and Laodicea. PHILEMON may be a letter to Laodicea (cf. Col. 4:16); we possess a genuine letter to the COLOSSIANS; and Rom. 16:1-23 has a much better claim to be considered a letter to the Ephesians (see ROMANS). Paul in his prison had no duplicators, and we must not ascribe modern practice to him. Galatians and I Peter show how a general letter might have been addressed. The "whole structure" (Eph. 2:21) does not mean, as has been suggested, "each single church" among the several to whom an encyclical was sent. Again, why did no copy survive except one containing "in Ephesus"? And why do the best and earliest MSS (Chester-Beatty papyrus 46, Vaticanus, Sinaiticus, 1739), as well as Marcion, Origen, and Basil, fail to retain these words, "in Ephesus"? Masson suggests that a disciple of Paul, inspired by Col. 4:15, addressed a letter in his master's name to the Laodiceans. Copyists at Ephesus, the capital of Asia Minor, removed the words "in Laodicea." What more natural at a later time than to substitute "in Ephesus" in order to make sense of the text (for it hardly makes sense without something like "in" followed by a place name)? Marcion's evidence, wherever it came from, would be discounted by the catholics as that of a heretic. Masson adds that the author of Ephesians interpolated 4:16 into Colossians, to recommend his own composition! This is too ingenious.

Scholars on both sides of the controversy pile conjecture on conjecture. Could not Marcion have derived his own "Laodiceans" from an authentic Col. 4:16, and his opponents offered "Ephesians" as a riposte? See § 2 below.

Linguistic considerations alone are not decisive; yet note that Ephesians has almost a hundred non-Pauline words, of which some forty are unique in the NT. The influence of Gnosticism and the mystery cults has been found in the use of "the aëon of this world" (2:2), "height" and "depth," and the group: "mystery" (not quite in the same sense as we find elsewhere in Paul), "knowledge," "wisdom," "mature." Some of these are borrowed from Colossians and other Pauline letters, so that Gnostic sources are unnecessary. The word "devil" is post-Pauline (cf. Matt. 4:1; Acts 13:10), and its employment instead of "Satan," "Belial," or "Tempter" is not explained by saying that it expresses the idea of an attacking demon. Unusual too is the phrase "in the heavenly places," used variously of Christ enthroned, of demonic powers, and even of Christians exalted with their Lord. This last idea cannot be taken literally, and the Pauline doctrine of the final dwelling of believers with Christ is better put at II Tim. 2:11-12. (Observe, however, that at Rom. 6:5 ff the idea is more eschatological than in Ephesians. If it be replied that Colossians equally stresses this concept, note Col. 3:4: "When Christ . . . appears." Ephesians is far less eschatological in tone.) Masson solves the problem of "the heavenly places" by showing that the term (ἐπουρανίοις) was required in the hymn of 1:3-14 for its sonority and the number of its syllables. Again, why does Eph. 6:12 reverse the normal order with "blood and flesh"? (So the Greek; both KJV and RSV change to the usual order.) Because, says Percy, Paul wanted to avoid misunderstanding or to prevent two Greek sigmas coming together. Yet Paul is willing to leave two sigmas together in Eph. 5:31; I Cor. 6:16!

The Greek style has perplexed conservatives and radicals alike, with the following features: the inordinate length of the sentences (e.g., 3:1-7; 4:11-16); many relatives and participles; clauses introduced by ἵνα; indirect questions; infinitives; tautological genitives; abstract forms; etc. Moffatt thought this was enough to disprove Paul's authorship; but Percy proves in detail that it is not. He takes each feature separately and has little difficulty in most cases in demonstrating that the style has parallels in the genuine Pauline letters. However, Percy fails to take account of the cumulative effect of the vocabulary; the style; the thought; and, above all, these added to the evidence that Ephesians betrays knowledge and use of every extant, canonical Pauline letter. If, indeed, Ephesians is a mosaic built up from the corpus of the genuine letters, how could the style fail to be Pauline on the whole, assuming that the author did his work with some skill? Moreover, Eph. 1–3 in Greek has no equal in Paul for sustained slow sonority. Compared with II Thessalonians, Galatians, Romans, or II Corinthians, Ephesians is a lifeless composition! No wonder it is said by some defenders of authenticity that Paul was a poor old soul, a weary apostle, or that he had taken off on mystic wing into the sublime empyrean!

Whatever may be thought of the situation existing between the Jewish-Christian and Gentile-Christian groups in the church before or after A.D. 70, it is certainly not Pauline to define Christ's mission as primarily to reconcile Jews and Gentiles (Eph. 2:15-16; 3:5 contradicts 3:3). Is not the "very least of all the saints" (3:8) a spurious humility? Does the teaching on marriage (5:22 ff) agree with Paul's in I Cor. 7? Would the apostle have moved so far in his attitude in such a short space of time? In spite of 1:10, 14, 18, 21; 4:4, 30; 5:5-6, pressed to their limit, does Ephesians display even as much eschatological adventism as Col. 3:4; Phil. 1:6, 10; 3:20-21, which probably belong to the same period as a genuine Ephesians would? Does not Eph. 2:1-5 ("dead through the trespasses and sins") fail to bring out Paul's doctrine of baptism as a sacramental death and rising again in union with Christ (Rom. 6:3 ff; Col. 2:12, 20; 3:1-4)?

The catholicity of the church in Ephesians is, of course, true to Paul's view (I Cor. 10:32; 11:22; 15:9 must not be underestimated; cf. I Cor. 10:18: "Israel according to the Spirit" is implied, and the Israel is the total entity within which local congregations belong). On the other hand, Paul did not speak of the apostles and prophets as the foundation of the church (Eph. 2:20; cf. I Cor. 3:11) nor of the "holy" apostles (Eph. 3:5). The collocation in short compass (Eph. 1–5) of so many diverse themes as the body, the bride, the temple, the Israel, and the new Adam, has no parallel in Paul.

But "only Paul could have written so excellently!" Did Socrates write the Republic and Phaedo of Plato, the Nicomachean Ethics and the Poetics of Aristotle? Did the eighth century B.C. produce few or many men of genius across the world? Was Shakespeare quite without peers, or must we waste our time trying to prove that only Lord Bacon could have composed Shakespeare's plays and lyrics? Not at all! Then a supremely creative age like the first Christian century was bound to produce more than a Paul, and it is all gain to know that the authors of Hebrews, Ephesians, I Peter, and John's gospel and letters, and John the Seer, are great minds not unworthy to set alongside Paul himself.

These objections to the conservative case are staggering, and they become decisive when added to two other major considerations—the intimate relationship between Ephesians and Colossians; and the use in Ephesians of phrases from the canonical Paulines (Hebrews, I and II Timothy, and Titus excepted, of course). Holtzmann first showed the way; Goodspeed followed with an important contribution; and Mitton has refined and improved the theory. See bibliography.

One third of the words in Colossians are found in Ephesians; and one quarter of the words in Ephesians appear in Colossians. The dependence can hardly be that of the same author on his own memory, because words and phrases from different parts of Colossians are conflated in Ephesians. By the same token Colossians (in its present form, too) is clearly the prior letter (as ab must be later than a or b) and must have been known intimately by the author of Ephesians. Yet the borrower seems often to quote from memory, for the run of consecutive words from Colossians seldom exceeds five (Eph. 6:21-22 = Col. 4:7-8 is the longest continuous passage). Assuming that 6:21-22 is part of the original text of Ephesians, we may suppose that a copy of Colossians was available to the writer of Ephesians. (Why he did not use it more often is a question that remains.)

The situation in both Colossians and Ephesians shows that, if both are authentic, they must have been sent from the same prison cell within days, perhaps even hours, of each other. How then can we explain the use of certain words with radically different meanings in the two documents? Οἰκονομία ("economy") is especially difficult. In I Cor. 9:17 and Col. 1:25 it means task or stewardship entrusted to a human agent; in Eph. 1:10; 3:2, 9, it means a plan or effective management, and is used of God's purpose for the consummation of the times. Cullmann's translation, "the plan of salvation," is not accurate. Similarly, "MYSTERY," which in Paul means a revealed secret (I Cor. 2:7, 13; cf. Mark 4:11), is defined in Col. 1:26-27; 2:2; 4:3 as "Christ in you, the hope of glory"; but in Eph. 1:9; 3:4, 9, the secret is the divine purpose to unite all things in Christ and to reconcile the Jews with the Gentiles. If Ephesians is non-Pauline, the word "mystery" may have the flavor of an esoteric doctrine rather than a revelation (for this idea cf. the use of raz in the Qumran literature—e.g., 1Q 27, "The Book of Secrets").

Percy would get round the difficulty by dismissing the different usage as merely a matter of emphasis. Masson too finds the meaning identical in both letters, but he insists that the Colossians references have been interpolated into Colossians by the author of Ephesians. A third word differently employed is "fulness" (see PLEROMA). At Col. 1:19 it applies to God's dwelling in Christ, by inference from 2:9 (RSV "of God" in 1:19 is absent from the Greek). Then in Eph. 1:23; 3:19; 4:13 "pleroma" is applied to the church as the body of Christ: "which is his body, the [pleroma] of him who fills all in all." "Pleroma" means complement, supplement, or full content (Rom. 11:12, 25; 13:10; 15:29; I Cor. 10:26; Gal. 4:4; and so in Eph. 1:10). It was also a technical term for the realm of the aeons in Gnostic speculation, from which, certain scholars assert, the author of Ephesians derived it. The genuine Pauline antecedents, and those behind such passages as Mark 1:15 (e.g., Lam. 4:18; Dan 2:20-23, 28), make it unnecessary to look to the Gnostics for the meaning here. According to some scholars Ephesians presents Christ as filling the church with his living reality; on the opposite side a large array of students (e.g., Chrysostom, Calvin, and Leenhardt) understands "pleroma" as supplement: the church as his body completes Christ, the head who is enthroned in heaven. The church would then be necessary to Christ. (The language is pictorial and not quite exact.) It remains strange, nonetheless, that Paul would use "pleroma" of Christ's relation to God and immediately after, contrary to his own teaching, of the church's relation to Christ. Dibelius would add to this list the word "soma" ("body")—in Colossians it is used of the universe, but of the church in Ephesians.

As an example of the way Colossians is adapted in its sister letter we may cite Col. 3:16-17 = Eph. 5:19-20. The phrase "in the name of the Lord Jesus" is connected in Colossians with the verb "do." In Ephesians the author has joined it rather to the next words, "giving thanks." This is the sort of memory trick that can be illustrated from many of our own prayers, especially pulpit prayers.

Perhaps the most significant argument against Paul's authorship, and the one that gives pungency to all these other considerations, is the exhibit of dependence on the remaining eight canonical Paulines. The following parallels are adequate to present a good case for the Goodspeed-Mitton thesis of dependence ("P" indicates purple passages of special interest):

	Romans	Ephesians
	1:21	4:17-18
	1:24	4:18-19
	2:11	6:9
	4:2	2:9
	5:1-2	2:18; 3:11-12
	5:15	3:7; 4:7
	8:16-17	1:14; 3:6
P	8:28	1:11
P	8:29	1:4-5
	11:33	3:8
	12:1	4:1
	12:2	5:10, 17
	12:3	3:7; 4:7
	12:5	4:25
	13:12	5:11

(Other possible parallels in Eph. 2:7, 9; 3:16; 4:27; 1:10)

	I Corinthians	Ephesians
	3:12, 6, 9, 16	2:20-21
P	4:12	4:28
	4:14, 16	5:1
P	6:9-10	5:5
	6:15-16	5:30-31
P	11:3	5:23
P	12:28	4:11
P	15:9-10	3:8

(Other possible parallels in Eph. 2:9; 4:6; 1:11; 4:4-5)

	II Corinthians		Ephesians
	1:1-2		1:1-2
	1:3		1:3
P	1:22		1:13; 4:30
	5:20		6:20
	1:12	(possibly)	2:3

	Galatians		Ephesians
	1:10		6:6
P	2:20		5:2, 25
P	4:4		1:10
	2:16	(possibly)	2:8-9
P	3:14	(possibly)	1:13

Philippians		Ephesians
4:18		5:2, 10
4:6	(possibly)	6:18

I Thessalonians		Ephesians
2:2		6:20
3:10		3:20
4:13		2:3, 12
5:9		1:14
2:12	(possibly)	4:1
5:8	(possibly)	6:14-16

II Thessalonians		Ephesians
2:14	(περιποίησις)	1:14
1:9	(possibly)	6:10 (Col. 1:11 conflated)
1:11	(possibly)	4:1 (I Thess. 2:12 conflated)

Mitton takes περιποίησις in Ephesians, with its use in I Peter, in a passive sense; but in I and II Thessalonians in an active. This is dubious. He allows no significant parallels to II Thessalonians.

Philemon	Ephesians
1	3:1
9	6:20

When this evidence is examined objectively in its total impact and significance, the case for the dependence of the author of Ephesians on an existing Pauline collection is unanswerable. Mitton (see bibliography) does a real service by his careful comparisons of Philippians with the other letters, and he finds that "the parallels in Ephesians are twice the number of those in Philippians even when full allowance is made for the greater length of Ephesians." He also proposes certain tests for an imitator's borrowing of existing letters: (a) he would show more correspondences; (b) he would reproduce the striking phrase; and (c) he would be inclined to borrow from the "purple passages." Accordingly, many sustained parallels are exhibited (e.g., Rom. 1:21-24; 12:1-5); see also the verses marked "P" above (e.g., Gal. 2:20). A similar comparison in the case of Philippians shows that there are four or five such groups, and all, with one exception, are insignificant. In Ephesians, however, out of twenty-five groups twenty are significant, Mitton finds.

Percy's view is that Colossians was indeed the model and that the variations are due simply to Paul. He fails to show why, in two letters issued simultaneously for the same general area (he accepts the encyclical theory), Paul should give only in Ephesians the teaching about Christ and the church in terms of the marriage relationship (the "great mystery"; 5:22-33); or why Eph. 6:4 (on children's upbringing) is more detailed than Col. 3:21; or why the meaning of the phrase "buying up the time" is altered in Eph. 5:15-16 from Col. 4:5.

When he comes to the dependence of Ephesians on other Pauline letters, Percy admits the "use" of Gal. 2:20; 3:14; 4:4; I Cor. 6:9-10; 12:28; 15:9; II Cor. 1:22; Rom. 1:21; 8:28-29. However, Paul probably had no collected edition of his own letters! When the complete list of Pauline parallels is examined, one can see that the problem involves more than a few uses of single verses. The point is that we can show how Ephesians is made up of phrases from the nine letters of Paul which have survived as part of the NT canon! Without necessarily committing oneself to every deduction and speculation offered by Goodspeed and Mitton, one must recognize that their evidence is overwhelmingly adequate to provide the desirable onus of proof against authenticity.

For all these reasons together—language, style, theological conceptions, the intimate relation to and use made of Colossians, and the intricate borrowings from the corpus of the canonical Paulines—we are bound to conclude that Ephesians is not from the hand of Paul. It is not even a letter, since the epistolary beginning and end are taken over for effect.

2. Origin, purpose, and value. The usual view—on the basis of authenticity—is that at the same time Paul wrote Colossians and Philemon from Rome, he wrote either to Ephesus or to the province of Asia a general letter summarizing his gospel and defending his mission. The scholars who have advocated Ephesus as the place of writing for the Imprisonment letters have not convincingly made out their case, except possibly for Philippians (see COLOSSIANS; EPHESUS).

N. A. Dahl, looking to the baptismal language in 1:13-14; 4:5, 30; 5:8, 26, suggests that Ephesians was written to newly settled congregations in order to teach them more fully, and with the authority of Paul the apostle, what they had received through baptism. This new version of the encyclical theory certainly draws attention to an important element, although at the cost of exaggeration. If Paul wrote to give post-initiation instruction, why did he lay the emphasis on Jewish-Gentile reconciliation? Why did he not deal with the everyday problems of Gentile Christians eating in Jewish Christian homes, or vice versa? Why did he say so much on baptism and nothing at all about the Lord's Supper, the sacrament of the Cross and the new covenant—especially if Jews and Gentiles were to eat together at the Lord's Table? In the ecumenical document par excellence of the NT canon this absence of teaching about the Eucharist is almost inexplicable (note 4:4); and even the supporters of the Goodspeed hypothesis are hard put to explain why a true Paulinist, with I Cor. 10-11 before him, should have thus neglected this topic. It does not seem probable that, as some hold, the silence is due to an absence of dispute in the primitive church over the Lord's Supper. Gal. 2:12 has little point if it has no bearing on the sacrament. (Eph. 5:20 carries no such sacramental reference.)

Similar objections apply to the theory that Ephesians is a revised edition of Colossians, designed for use as a baptismal homily by the primitive church. Ephesians does not read like a sermon at all, but like an imitation of a Pauline letter! Eph. 1:3; I Pet. 1:3 may be considered the typical opening of a homily, but this is to ignore the dependence of both on II Cor. 1:3, which can be proved in the case of Ephesians by all the arguments and synoptic parallels cited above. It is the fashion in some quarters to discount literary relationships in favor of a widespread catechetical tradition; but the evidence from Qumran helps to demonstrate that there was considerable use of documents and scribes, including the copying of MSS, during the first century A.D. It will not do to use this to draw a picture of Paul and his assistants writing out circulars at Rome, but it may throw light on the practice of the church after A.D. 70 when the "holy apostles and prophets" were dead and being venerated, when the adventist hope was somewhat fading, and when apostolic tradition had to be preserved by literary means.

Goodspeed's view is that someone, probably Onesimus, the converted slave of Philemon, was stimulated by the publication of the Acts of the Apostles ca. A.D. 85 to search for Paul's letters to other churches. Onesimus, now bishop of Ephesus (cf. Ignatius To the Ephesians), collected and published those that he found, along with Colossians and Philemon, which he had long known intimately. Then, in order to commend the Pauline gospel and honor his master, he composed Ephesians and placed it at the head of the corpus. It was, as John Knox holds (see GALATIANS § 6), "a general letter to the churches serving as a preface to the particular church letters which followed and as a symbol that they too had something to say to the whole church." Knox thinks that Marcion replaced Ephesians by Galatians as the first letter in the canon, and that the Pastorals were added later; the date of the original collection he would place about A.D. 90-100 (see bibliography).

It is a weakness in Goodspeed's theory that dependence of Ephesians on Acts is doubtful (see bibliography), and that Ephesians is not quite a summary of the Pauline message. Did Onesimus, of all people, really need to read Acts before discovering where Paul may have written letters? C. L. Mitton, accepting this theory of Goodspeed in principle, declines to name an author but emphasizes the liturgical interest of this document. Acts 20 influenced the author, who wrote for Christians in the Ephesian area. How did it originate? According to Mitton, as follows: Tychicus as an old man was living near Ephesus, and to him the author, a devout disciple of Paul, revealed his desire to compose a letter in Paul's name. From Eph. 6:21-22 we should deduce that Tychicus approved the completed product. We can date this writing within five years, A.D. 87-92, Mitton says, because the authors of Revelation, I Clement, and the Pastorals seem to know Ephesians, and it must be a little later than 85, the estimated date of Acts. This speculation is quite fanciful. Moreover, 85 for the publication of Acts is far from being established.

The following points seem very probable: (a) the author of Ephesians knew Colossians intimately, and modeled his composition on it. (b) He knew the Paulines as a collection, which had been in existence for some time; and he revered Paul as a holy apostle, the greatest of the Christian missionaries to the Roman world and one of the foundation stones in the catholic church. (c) His primary theme is the unity of the church and its obligation to grow in the love and power of Christ. (d) "At Ephesus" (1:1) is probably the earliest guess about the supposed recipients, but the original text was based on Col. 1:1-2 with certain omissions: "Paul, an apostle of Christ Jesus by the will of God . . . , to the saints and faithful brethren[?] in Christ." (e) The writer cannot be identified. It might have been Onesimus. The use of Paul's name, so far from indicating that the apostle had been neglected and ignored, shows how influential and authoritative he was for the author and the circle of Christians with whom he had to do. (f) The date is later than A.D. 70, but the upward limit is uncertain. If Ephesians is known to I Clement, and if the latter should be dated ca. A.D. 95 (it could be nearer A.D. 115), then we should perhaps date Ephesians ca. A.D. 90. (g) Ephesians is an original and, indeed, brilliant composition in the Pauline manner, and many would not disagree with the estimate that if it is the work of a Pauline disciple, he must be the supreme interpreter of the apostle before Martin Luther. He is filled with the spirit of adoring praise and love expressed by Paul himself in Gal. 2:20; Rom. 5:5, 8; I Cor. 13, and he has real insight into the meaning of salvation by grace. The idea of recapitulation at 1:10 appears to be an original contribution and one that bore fruit in the theology of Irenaeus. On 1:3-14, which Lohmeyer divided into strophes, the careful commentary of Masson (see bibliography) may be consulted: "The structure of the hymn is ruled by parallelism, parallelism of the number of the syllables, and assonance of the initial and final syllables. The verses are grouped into six strophes of two stanzas each, representing as many unities of sense." He believes that vs. 13 was altered to suit the writer's purpose and that originally it ran as follows: "In whom we also were sealed after we had heard the word of truth, the gospel of salvation, by the holy spirit of promise." By metrical rules it is necessary to take the words "in love" with "he destined us" of vs. 5, as the RSV does; but the RSV wrongly adds "his" to "purpose" in vs. 9. Such an interpretation of these magnificent verses is most attractive.

Many scholars seem loath to abandon the Pauline authorship because to do so lessens the value of Ephesians perhaps. One must admit that there is some reduction in value; on the other hand, it is surely pure gain that the document should win its authority, not from its supposed authorship or even its place in holy scripture alone (Wordsworth wrote some banal poetry, and scripture contains Esther—some would add, Revelation!), but from its own qualities and in particular its capacity to be a vehicle for the living Spirit of truth, the truth as it is in Jesus. By this test Ephesians maintains an honored place in the affection of the church, and at a time of quickening in ecumenical affairs it stands in no danger of neglect.

3. Contents. Ephesians may be analyzed briefly as follows:

I. The salutation, 1:1-2
II. A. The Jubilate or Benediction, 1:3-14
  B. Paul's prayer for the recipients, 1:15-23
III. A. The redemption of the Gentiles by divine grace into the one church, the Israel of God, ch. 2
  B. Paul's apostolic commission, 3:1-13
  C. Paul's prayer renewed, ending in a doxology, 3:14-21
IV. Ethical admonitions
  A. Church unity, 4:1-16
  B. Christian goodness, 4:17–5:20

C. Family duties, 5:21–6:9
D. The Christian warfare, 6:10-20
V. The visit of Tychicus, 6:21-22
VI. Closing benedictions, 6:23-24

a. Theology. Before all time God the Creator predestined a salvation that should win men by his love and fashion a universe agreeable to his will (1:5), and now that Christ has inaugurated the age of redemption, we Christians adore God as the all-glorious Father, gracious and loving, the Father of Jesus the Messiah. God is eternal, holy, provident, and above all a redeemer. It was in the death of Christ that God won his victory of love, and through Christ he will fulfill his purpose (1:7; 5:2; cf. Mark 10:45). Eventually God will integrate his people, his angelic subjects, and everything that exists; in this way the judgment of his wrath will be set aside (2:3; 5:6). The Father wills that men and women should belong to his family, and the ultimate goal of a saint is to be filled "with all the fulness of God" (3:19)—a vague phrase that reminds one of Ignatius' ambition to "attain unto God" (Ign. Trall. 12:2); presumably it means the enjoyment of the fullest possible fellowship with God in the life eternal (cf. 4:18). The idea of God militant against the powers of darkness may be derived from Jesus' teaching and also Isaiah and the Wisdom of Solomon (6:10 ff; cf. too the apocalyptic Qumran document known as "The War Between the Children of Light and the Children of Darkness"). The language of Ephesians is trinitarian, but the Father remains the supreme God (1:17; 4:30; 5:20).

The Christology is basically Pauline. Observe that "Son of God" appears only once (4:13); the "BELOVED" is used as a messianic title (1:6; cf. Matt. 12:8; Isa. 42:1, of Israel); and Christ is the Savior of the body, his church, rather than of the world of mankind (5:23; cf. I John 4:14). Ephesians has no missionary interest, for it is concerned with unity and maturity. In the light of 1:4; 2:3; 4:17 ff; 5:6, 11-12, which display no gracious solicitude for the disobedient, we must discount somewhat 1:13; 3:9; 6:19-20. 6:19-20 is a borrowed plume, to lend verisimilitude to the Pauline name. Christ is not only the church's head, as the chief cornerstone of the new temple of God (2:20; cf. Isa. 28:16); he is also head over the whole creation (1:22). As exalted to the right hand of God (1:20) he is the source of ministerial gifts (4:11) and of light to the dead (5:14: death may mean here death "through the trespasses and sins" [2:1]; 5:14 may be a quotation from a baptismal hymn; and cf. 1:18 for "enlightenment," a word applied to baptism by Justin Martyr). Pre-existence may be seen in 1:4; but note too the human Jesus in the language of 1:15 and 4:21. The stress on Christ's authority over the created universe is notable.

In view of the dualism of the Qumran scrolls (e.g., 1 QS 3:13 ff), it is interesting to see the references to the devil, "prince of the power of the air," probably the same Belial or Beelzebul known to us from Jewish, Iranian, and Christian literature of this period (2:2; 4:27; 6:11). Some scholars would demythologize the concept of evil spirits, perhaps in psychological terms of wills that are self-centered, or in terms of spirit in inevitable conflict with matter (the flesh); others insist that the demonic expresses a reality in the universe, and that it is essential to any understanding of the problem of evil.

The captain of the divine forces is either Christ or the Holy Spirit (4:30; 6:17-18). The Spirit is given at baptism (1:13; the seal may be the sign of the cross marked with water; no reference to later "confirmation" is to be found in Ephesians). Hence are derived wisdom, revelation, and inward spiritual resource (1:17; 3:5, 16). The Spirit is also the earnest of the heavenly inheritance for which Christians hope (1:14, 18; 4:4; an eschatological element). Believers are to be servants of the Spirit, by whom they have access to the Father (2:18); are constituted one body (4:4); and are becoming God's dwelling place or temple (2:21-22, a process going on; cf. 1QS 8:5-6). The word (rhema, not logos) of God is the sword of the Spirit (6:17; cf. Heb. 4:12-13); i.e., the weapon employed by the Spirit (in scripture or in preaching?) is the gospel or a particular word from God (to a prophet or to the Savior). As man lives by every word that proceeds from the mouth of God, so is the Christian to fight by that word, and thus wage war in the power of God's Spirit. Similarly, he is to pray "in the Spirit" constantly, asking that he may receive, and interceding for all the saints (6:18; the teaching of Jesus on prayer may underlie this verse). Ephesians adds little to Paul's teaching on the Spirit; the author probably thought of the Holy Spirit as in some sense personal (just as the evil spirits are personal wills); but he has no clearly articulated doctrine of the Trinity. This is characteristic of Christian theology up to Irenaeus and Tertullian.

The church is the body of Christ; the bride of Christ (5:22 ff); and the temple of the Spirit (2:19-22). It is not legitimate to take the bride passage to mean that the church is a second Eve because Christ is the second Adam (a favorite Catholic deduction). Christ and the church together constitute the Adam (4:22-24, RSV "your old nature" should be "the old man"; 2:15, to "create in himself one new man"). For the church is the pleroma of Christ, the full measure of his being as the last Adam (1:23; 2:16, where the body may be the body that was crucified; 4:15-16, growing up into Christ; 5:30, we are members of his body, bone of his bone and flesh of his flesh!). There may be here a side glance at the words of Jesus at the Last Supper, if indeed Jesus then said (in Aramaic), "This is my flesh" (J. Jeremias, The Eucharistic Words of Jesus; cf. John 6:51 ff). Christ therefore cherishes his own flesh when he cares for the church; the body idea in this passage is just as important as the bride idea. One day the church will inherit the kingdom (5:5). Ephesians stands in the genuine Pauline tradition, in contrast with I Clement and other writings of subsequent times. It has been said that in Ephesians, Christ the head is in heaven, his body the church is on earth; hence the body is a mere rump. This is to press too far the dynamic picture language of the NT.

The church is catholic (to use the second-century word), because it is one, universal, holy, loyal to the one faith, and apostolic. The classic passage is 4:1-16; cf. 2:15, 21-22; 3:6; 5:6, 17. Faith in the sense of "doctrine" is Pauline (e.g., II Thess. 2:10, 13; Gal. 1:23; II Cor. 11:4; Rom. 10:9). The church is, however, an incomplete organism; it has to grow (2:21;

3:18-19; 4:12 ff). Love must be its primary characteristic as the redeemed community, the new Israel of God (1:5; 2:4; 4:15-16; 5:2, 25, 29; 6:23-24; see LOVE). It is also blessed with ministerial gifts from the risen Christ—apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors, and teachers (contrast I Cor. 12:28, where some of the gifts are "impersonal" and where the evangelists and pastors do not appear). It is possible that 2:20 means us to understand that the apostles are the Twelve, the foundation stones of the temple (cf. Rev. 21:14; but contrast I Cor. 3:5 ff). Following Percy, translate 4:12: "for the equipment of the saints for rendering service to the building up of the body of Christ." This represents a high doctrine of the ministry and a certain stress on the institutional aspect.

The sacrament of baptism, as we have seen, is prominent in Ephesians; this agrees with the general picture of primitive Christianity and is important in the light of the sectarian baptist movements of contemporary Judaism. We must look to Col. 2:11-13, 20; 3:1-5 as the immediate source for Ephesians. But why is the Lord's Supper omitted? (a) Because there was no division over it? We have rejected this idea. (b) Because it was not in fact a focus for unity—at least in the author's own mind? (c) Because the writer was not interested in it? (d) Or, quite simply, because the Lord's Supper is missing from Colossians, his model letter! This last reason is probably the solution to the problem.

b. Ethics. The ethical teaching may be dealt with very briefly. The self-sacrificial offering of the Lord Jesus Christ is the pattern of that love which should exist between the saints. If salvation is by grace (2:5), there are, however, "good works" prepared beforehand for the saved to perform, as men risen from the dead (2:1, 5, 10; the predestination theme of 1:4-5 reappears here in rather strange guise). Christians are to live in a way befitting their high calling (4:1), and so in patience and mutual forgiveness (4:2). We note again the contrast, now in a strictly ethical application, between light and darkness, with ultimate reference to Christ as ruler of the church and the light of sinners (5:8-14). Light exposes and therefore is the instrument of judgment (cf. the same themes in the Gospel of John).

In the familiar list of household duties, the section on slaves has approximately the same length as that in Colossians, without the same personal poignancy; but that on wives is much extended, presumably to allow the writer to include his teaching about the "great mystery." Tit. 3:5 should be compared with Eph. 5:26. Christ acts as the high priest, perhaps, in the offering of his bride in spotless purity; but this thought takes second place to that of the bridegroom. It is worth pondering how a wife may be truly united to a husband and yet be subjected to him; no more than in Colossians is the wife told to love her husband, even as she loves her own body (see also I Cor. 7:4*b*). RSV "respects" in 5:33 should be either "revere" or "fear." The ethic is defective in the light of our Lord's teaching.

The need for prayer is summarily stated; and the concluding advice on Christian fortitude in the warfare from which there is no discharge has always appealed as being in the grand manner (6:10-20).

4. Text. The text of Ephesians is good, and at few places other than 1:1 is there serious divergence. Occasionally there has been harmonization with the parallel text of Colossians. At 1:15 the RSV retains "your love" despite its omission from some important authorities (Chester-Beatty Papyrus 46, Vaticanus, and Alexandrinus). At 2:5 insert "in" and omit "with" before "Christ." The RSV rightly omits "of our Lord Jesus Christ" after "the Father" in 3:14. Some authorities in 4:6 leave out "and Father of us all." After "descended" in 4:9 perhaps insert "first" (but this text need not refer to the descent into hell; earth itself may be the lower parts mentioned). "The fruit of light" is a difficult reading in 5:9, but for this reason it is preferable to "the fruit of the Spirit," which is read by Papyrus 46.

Bibliography. Introductions by Goodspeed; McNeile (2nd ed., rev. C. S. C. Williams); and Moffatt. A. Richardson, ed., A Theological Word Book of the Bible (London, 1950; New York, 1951). G. B. Caird, The Apostolic Age (1955).

Commentaries: T. K. Abbott (1897). J. A. Robinson (1903). J. F. Salmond (1906). M. Dibelius (1927). E. F. Scott (1935). C. Masson (1951). F. W. Beare, Introduction and Exegesis of Ephesians, IB, X (1953), 597-749—the best recent exposition; it accepts Goodspeed's thesis with reservations.

Special studies: E. J. Goodspeed, The Meaning of Ephesians (1933); The Key to Ephesians (1956)—for readers of the English text. The ground for Goodspeed's suggestion of Onesimus as the collector of the Pauline letters and the writer of Ephesians is laid in J. Knox, Philemon Among the Letters of Paul (1935; rev. ed., 1959). On the weakness of Goodspeed's theory, see G. Johnston, The Doctrine of the Church in the NT (1943). For further treatment of Knox's theory of the origin and purpose of Ephesians, see J. Knox, Marcion and the NT (1942). E. Percy, Die Probleme der Kolosser-und Epheserbriefe (1946)—the best defense of the Pauline authorship. L. Cerfaux, La Théologie de L'Église suivant Saint Paul (1948). S. Hanson, The Unity of the Church in the NT: Colossians and Ephesians (1950). L. Cerfaux, Le Christ dans la Théologie de Saint Paul (1951). C. L. Mitton, The Epistle to the Ephesians (1951). E. Best, One Body in Christ (1955). R. Bultmann, Theology of the NT (1955). F. Mussner, Christus, Das All und Die Kirche (1955). F. L. Cross, ed., Studies in Ephesians (1956).

G. JOHNSTON

EPHESUS ĕf′ə səs [ἡ Ἔφεσος] (Acts 18:19, 21, 24; 19:1, 17, 26, 35; 20:16, 17; I Cor. 15:32; 16:8; I Tim. 1:3; II Tim. 1:18; 4:12; Rev. 1:11; 2:1); EPHESIANS ĭ fē′zhənz. A large seaport city in the Roman province of Asia; a commercial and religious center, where the apostle Paul worked for an extended period (Acts 19:8, 10 states that he taught in the synagogue for three months and after that in the hall of Tyrannus for two years, while Acts 20:31 gives a round figure of three years for his total time there). The name Ephesus also appears in Eph. 1:1 in A D G and the later MSS of the Koine or Byzantine text family, but is not found in P^{46} B ℵ(S); it is printed in the KJV but placed in the margin in the RSV. Ephesus and the Ephesians (οἱ Ἐφέσιοι) are mentioned in Acts 18:27 in D and the margin of the Harklean Syr.; the Ephesians are referred to in Acts 19:28, 34, 35, and Trophimus the Ephesian is spoken of in Acts 21:29.

On the deeply indented W coast of Asia Minor a number of river valleys descend to the sea and provide natural channels of travel and favorable locations of great cities. In the N is the valley of the Caicus River, where PERGAMUM was located. Farther S are the Hermus, the Caÿster, and the Maeander. SMYRNA was near the mouth of the Hermus, MILETUS at the mouth of the Maeander. Although the Caÿster was smaller than the rivers on either side, it emptied into a good harbor and also gave excellent access to the valleys of both the Hermus and the Maeander. Therefore, the city located here had the most favorable situation of all and became the first of all the cities of the province of Asia. This was Ephesus.

In ancient times a gulf of the Aegean Sea evidently extended inward to where the city was, since, speaking of Ephesus and its famous sanctuary, Pliny (Nat. Hist. II.201) tells how "once the sea used to wash up to the temple of Diana." The natural harbor which was thus provided was gradually filled up, however, with the silt of the Caÿster. According to Strabo (XIV.641), the Pergamenian king Attalus Philadelphus (ca. 159-ca. 138 B.C.) thought that the harbor would be deepened if its entrance were made narrower; but when a mole was built for this purpose, the actual result was the opposite, and the whole harbor was made more shallow by the increased deposition of silt. In spite of these difficulties and because of its advantageous situation in other respects, Strabo reports that in his time Ephesus was growing daily and was the "largest emporium in Asia this side the Taurus." The silting up of the harbor and river mouth continued, nevertheless, and today the ruins of the ancient city lie in a swampy plain four or five miles inland from the sea.

According to Strabo (XIV.632, 640), the first inhabitants of the place were Carians and Leleges, but they were driven out by Androclus, son of the king of Athens, who led the Ionian colonization in this region and was later regarded as the founder of Ephesus. The immigration of the Ionians probably took place soon after the beginning of the first millennium B.C., but already long before their coming there existed at Ephesus the cult of a goddess whom the Greeks identified with Artemis (Pausanias VII.ii. 6).

The first temple of Artemis was built, according to Strabo (XIV.640), by the architect Chersiphron. When Croesus came to the throne of Lydia (ca. 560 B.C.) and began his conquest of virtually all the nations W of the Halys River, the first Greeks he attacked were the Ephesians. As Herodotus (I.26) tells us, in the extremity of the siege they dedicated their city to Artemis and signified this by attaching a rope to the city wall from the temple, which stood seven stadia away from the ancient city. Afterward Croesus himself contributed to the temple not only oxen of gold but also the greater part of its pillars (Herodotus I.92).

In 546 B.C., Cyrus defeated Croesus, and after that, Harpagus, general of the Persian king, systematically overcame the Ionian cities (Herodotus I.162), doubtless including Ephesus. In 356 B.C., Alexander was born, and on the very day of his birth, according to the tradition reported by Plutarch (Alexander III.3), the temple of Artemis at Ephesus was burned. The fire was set by a certain Herostratus (Strabo XIV.640), and provided spectacular evidence of the behavior of flame and wind which Aristotle discussed soon afterward in his Meteorologica (III.1[371*a*, 32-34]).

In 334 B.C., Alexander the Great conquered the Persians at the Granicus River and Ephesus came under the Macedonian power. The citizens of the city had now begun to rebuild their famous temple with Dinocrates as architect, the man who later built Alexandria and proposed to carve Mount Athos into a statue of Alexander. At this juncture Alexander himself offered to pay all the expenses, provided that he might have the credit in an inscription, but the Ephesians declined the assistance, one of them putting it flatteringly that it was inappropriate for a god —namely, Alexander—to dedicate offerings to gods (Strabo XIV.641).

Of the successors of Alexander it was his general Lysimachus who obtained the greater part of Asia Minor and with it the city of Ephesus. Pausanias (I.ix.7) considered Lysimachus the founder of the "modern city of Ephesus," and tells how he brought additional settlers there from the cities of Lebedos and Colophon, which he had taken. Strabo (XIV. 640) relates that Lysimachus "built a wall round the present city," and when the people were reluctant to move to the area thus marked out, he waited for a downpour of rain, blocked the sewers, and flooded the old city, whereupon the inhabitants were glad to make the change. As this indicates, the city was moved at this time to higher ground, and today the ruined walls and towers of the fortification of Lysimachus are found running along the top of the two chief hills at Ephesus, Panajir Dagh and Bülbül Dagh. At what was then the seashore at the N foot of the latter hill he also established a new harbor. To the city which he thus improved Lysimachus gave the name Ἀρσινόη in honor of his wife, Arsinoë, daughter of Ptolemy I, but the designation endured little longer than the lifetime of the king.

Lysimachus was defeated and slain by Seleucus I in 281 B.C., and the latter in turn entrusted to his son Antiochus I what had been the entire Asian empire of Lysimachus; thus Ephesus came under the sway of the Seleucids (Pausanias I.xvi.2). In 190 B.C. the Seleucid king Antiochus III the Great was defeated by the Romans at Magnesia near Sipylus, and the cities of Asia fell under the dominion of Rome (Livy XXXVII.xxxvii-xlv). In the Battle of Magnesia the Romans were assisted by King Eumenes II (197-159 B.C.) of Pergamum, and afterward they gave him much of the holdings of Antiochus in Asia Minor, including the city of Ephesus (Polybius XXI.xlv.10). When the last ruler of Pergamum, Attalus III Philometor, died in 133 B.C., he bequeathed his kingdom to the Romans, and thereby Ephesus came again under their rule (Appian Mithridatic Wars 62; Civil Wars V.4). In 88 B.C. the Ephesians joined Mithradates VI Eupator of Pontus in acts of violence against the Romans, but this insurrection was soon put down by Sulla, while the victories of Pompey and the death of Mithradates in 64 B.C. marked the complete establishment of Roman control in the whole E Mediterranean. Under the reign of Caesar Augustus the benefits of general peace were enjoyed, and in 29 B.C. the Ephesians dedicated a sacred precinct to Rome and to Caesar (Dio LI.xx.6). As Cassius Dio in the passage just cited explicitly states, Ephesus had now attained the chief place in Asia, and in the next century or two it enjoyed that great glory to which its ruins still bear witness.

The first archaeological excavation at Ephesus was undertaken by J. T. Wood with the support of the British Museum and with the chief purpose of finding the famous ancient temple of Artemis. Beginning the search on May 2, 1863, Wood worked with the utmost persistence until on May 2, 1869, the wall of the temple was finally found. The clue to the discovery was a Roman inscription of the time of Trajan. This was uncovered in the theater and told how images of Artemis (cf. Acts 19:24) were carried from the temple to the theater for the birthday anniversary of the goddess, and how the city was entered by the Magnesian Gate and left by the Coressian Gate. Wood was able to locate these gates and then follow the road from the Magnesian Gate until he came upon the site of the temple. He continued his work until 1874, and in 1904-5 David G. Hogarth excavated further for the British Museum, studying in particular the earlier history of the sanctuary. In addition to this the Austrian Archaeological Institute conducted thorough excavations relating to the entire ancient city in 1898-1913, 1926-35, and again since 1954. Fig. EPH 30.

The railroad station at Ephesus is at the village of Ayasoluk, and nearby is the site of the Artemision, as the sanctuary of Artemis may be called. Here in the oldest period there was an enclosed area which contained a stone platform about ten by fourteen feet in size on which the cult image of the goddess may have stood, and a lower platform on which an altar may have rested. Next, the two platforms were combined into one, and after that an actual temple was built on them with an inner chamber (cella) and a hall in front of it, and perhaps a hall of columns around it.

In the middle of the sixth century B.C. the great marble temple was built, whose architect was Chersiphron and to which Croesus contributed the pillars. According to the relatively scanty remains, this must have been a structure ca. 180 by 360 feet in size, with the shrine of the cult image directly over the place of the oldest sanctuary. In the rebuilding after the fire of Herostratus and in the time of Alexander, the temple was raised on a large terrace nearly nine feet higher than before; but the finding of a pillar base directly above one of the Croesus temple suggests that the plan was otherwise essentially the same. This was the temple which was accounted one of the seven wonders of the ancient world, but which its adherents feared might come to "count for nothing" (Acts 19:27) through the preaching of the apostle Paul. It diminished in importance with the advance of Christianity, was burned by the Goths in A.D. 262, and thereafter was so despoiled that but little remained for the spade of the archaeologist.

From the Artemision an ancient street led approximately one mile W and somewhat S to the Coressian city gate. Immediately adjacent was the stadium. This was so placed at the NW foot of the Panajir Dagh that its seats on the S side were supported upon the rocks of this hill. It evidently served for athletic events and races of all sorts, while a round area was marked off at the E end which probably provided, in lieu of any other amphitheater, for gladiatorial combats and contests with wild animals. If Paul's words about fighting with beasts at Ephesus (I Cor. 15:32) are to be taken literally, this might have been the place of the struggle. As a matter of fact, the stadium was a focus of special interest in Ephesus about the time Paul was there, for an inscription shows that it was rebuilt under Nero (A.D. 54-68).

Jack Finegan

30. City plan of Ephesus

Less than half a mile S of the stadium was the great theater of Ephesus.* It was set into a hollow in the W declivity of the Panajir Dagh, and faced directly toward the harbor about half a mile away to the W. The general plan was probably the same from Hellenistic times on; rebuilding was carried on from Claudius (41-54) to Trajan (98-117). The marble seats for the audience were curved in somewhat more than a semicircle within the hollow of the hill; arranged in three ranks of twenty-two rows each, they provided for 24,000 spectators. The players appeared at first in the orchestra; in Roman times there was an elevated stage. The Hellenistic stage-house was also rebuilt in Roman times, and the side which faced the viewers was elaborately decorated in three stories with pillars, niches, and statuary. Only the first two stories of this façade were completed under Domitian (81-96), and the third probably under Septimus Severus (193-211). It will, of course, be remembered that it was in the theater that the riot took place which was instigated by Demetrius in protest against the results of the preaching of Paul (Acts 19:23-41). Fig. EPH 31.

Courtesy of Theresa Goell

31. Theater and road to the harbor at Ephesus

The main and most magnificent street of Ephesus ran in a straight line from the theater to the harbor.* With a monumental gateway at each end, this thoroughfare was about thirty-five feet wide, and was flanked on either side with colonnades over fifteen feet deep, back of which were buildings and shops. The street was rebuilt in the time of the Emperor Arcadius (395-408) and in his honor was then renamed Arkadiane. Along the N side of the street and in the very heart of the city was a series of buildings, the general layout of which must date from the time of Lysimachus, which were intended for the physical and intellectual development of the people—namely, baths, gymnasiums, and other buildings. Fig. EPH 32.

Courtesy of Ahmet Dönmez

32. Marble street at Ephesus

In the region S of the Arkadiane and SW of the theater was the agora. Here the present ruins date for the most part from a rebuilding in the first part of the third century A.D., in which, however, a great deal of earlier material was used. An open rectangular area, 360 feet on each side, was surrounded by pillared halls, back of which were shops and rooms. In the middle of the open area was a horologium—i.e., a sun and water clock. On the E side was an especially fine hall, dating from the time of Nero, so thoroughly destroyed as to suggest the work of an earthquake. Of the gateways which gave access to the agora, the best preserved is that on the S side, which has an inscription indicating that it was built by the freedmen Mazaeus and Mithridates in 4/3 B.C. in honor of Augustus and members of his family. In addition to architectural inscriptions there were also many inscriptions found on the bases of statues of illustrious persons, which were erected in great profusion in the agora as well as in other public places throughout the city. Other buildings not far from the agora were a library* and a temple (the latter perhaps dedicated to the Egyptian god Serapis), both probably of the second century A.D. A little farther away on the slope of the Bülbül Dagh was another temple; and the finding of broken pieces of a colossal marble statue of Domitian (81-96) showed that this was the temple otherwise known to have been erected at Ephesus by the province of Asia for the worship of the emperor whom the Christians so long remembered as their archenemy. Fig. EPH 33.

Courtesy of Theresa Goell

33. The library of Celsus at Ephesus

As is well known, Christian tradition from the second century onward connects John the apostle and evangelist with Ephesus. As a matter of fact, the name Ayasoluk, which attaches to the village and also the hill in the vicinity of the Artemision, is derived from Agios Theologos ("Αγιος Θεολόγος), the title given to John in the Eastern church. From this hill he is supposed to have viewed the idolatrous worship in the Artemision, and on it at last to have been buried. Over the grave there arose a mausoleum and then a church. The excavation of the site showed that there were subterranean grave chambers here over which, probably early in the fourth century A.D., a quadrangular structure was erected which was later made into a large cross-shaped basilica by the addition of an apse in the E, a long three-aisled building in the W, a three-aisled transept projecting on either side, and finally a five-aisled E part, all roofed with wood. This church was in turn rebuilt on a yet more magnificent scale under the Byzantine emperor Justinian (527-65). It now attained a length of over 425 feet and had six large domes rising above its central portions. Such was the Church of Saint John the Theologian in Ephesus.

Between the stadium and the harbor are the ruins of another large church. It was built on the foundations of a pagan building more than 800 feet long, perhaps a school, and itself seems to have consisted of two churches arranged one behind the other, hence is commonly called a double church. The date of its erection was probably in the fourth century A.D., and an inscription of the time of Justinian found in the narthex shows that it was the famous Church of the Virgin Mary, in which the Council of Ephesus met in 431.

On the NE slope of the Panajir Dagh is yet another place of interest in Christian tradition. This is the Catacomb of the Seven Sleepers. In the persecution of Decius (A.D. 250), the legend runs, seven young men were sealed in a cave, fell asleep, and only awoke under Theodosius II (408-50) to testify again to their Christian faith. Upon their subsequent death they were buried in the cave, and a church was built over it, while the graves of many other saints were put in the same vicinity. At the place above indicated, with which the tradition just related was connected, the removal of great amounts of earth gave access to a catacomb containing hundreds of burial places. In the very midst of the area there was a church with ten burial chambers beneath it, on the walls of which were scratched and painted words of invocation to the seven youths and signatures of pilgrims from many lands dating down into the fifteenth century A.D.

It was perhaps in the fifth century A.D., and thus at about the same time that the seven youths were supposed to have been giving their final testimony, that an inscription was written which was found in the ruins of a gateway near the agora, and which also bears witness to the victory of Christianity at Ephesus. It was on a rectangular stone which had evidently served as the base for an idol of Artemis and on which a Christian had put up instead a cross. Referring to the cross, the inscription says: "Demeas has removed the deceitful image of the demon Artemis and in its place put this sign which drives away the idols, to the praise of God and of the cross, the victorious, imperishable symbol of Christ."

Bibliography. J. T. Wood, Modern Discoveries on the Site of Ancient Ephesus (1890). Bürchner, "Ephesos," Pauly-Wissowa, V (1903). cols. 2773-2822. D. G. Hogarth, Excavations at Ephesus, The Archaic Artemisia (1908); Forschungen in Ephesos, veröffentlicht vom österreichischen archäologischen Institute (5 vols.; 1906-44). J. Keil, Ephesos, Ein Führer durch die Ruinenstätte und ihre Geschichte (3rd ed., 1955). J. FINEGAN

EPHLAL ĕf'lăl [אֶפְלָל, nicked(?)]. A Jerahmeelite family or person (I Chr. 2:37).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 228.

EPHOD ēfŏd [אֵפֹד] (Num. 34:23). The father of the Manassite leader Hanniel, who was selected to help superintend the distribution of W Jordanian Canaan among the tribes to occupy that territory.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 232. R. F. JOHNSON

EPHOD (OBJECT) [אֵפוֹד]. An OT term the derivation and meaning of which are not clear, though one meaning of the word is reasonably certain.

The ephod is a priestly garment of some kind (I Sam. 22:18). In I Sam. 2:18, Samuel was girded with a linen ephod, as was David when the ark was brought to Jerusalem (II Sam. 6:14). It has been suggested that the words for "ephod of linen" or "white stuff" here mean "covering for nakedness" and that Samuel and David were wearing brief loincloths. The Priestly document prescribes an ephod for the high priest (see Exod. 28:28-29; 35:27; 39). It was a costly shoulder garment of gold, blue, purple, and scarlet, part of the ceremonial dress to which was attached the oracle pouch containing Urim and Thummim. There seems to be little doubt that the ephod was a garment and possibly a sleeveless, close-fitting garment put on priests and possibly on idols.

There are a number of passages where the meaning is uncertain. In Judg. 8:27, Gideon is said to make a golden ephod for Ophrah, and it ensnared Israel. This could be (a) a golden image representing Yahweh (cf. I Sam. 21:9); (b) the garment of the image of the deity with pockets for the oracles. This is suggested by Isa. 30:22: "Your gold-plated molten images," where the feminine noun of "ephod" describes the sheathing of images; and by II Kings 23:7, which speaks of the tunics woven by the women for the Asherah. But there is no reference to the ephod in this context. (c) Yet others have thought of a connection between the ark and the ephod. Thus in I Sam. 14:18 the Hebrew "ark of God" is read in the LXX as the ephod. This has led to the view that ephod and ark are closely related; that it is probable that there were many arks; and that ephod is a synonym for the ark, which itself was a miniature temple. It has thus been thought that the ephod too was some kind of miniature temple.

However, one may explain those passages which do not imply that the ephod was a garment. It is clear that there is a very close connection between ephod and teraphim, even if the relation between these two remains obscure (Judg. 17:5; 18:14, 17-18, 20; Hos. 3:4). Further, it is also clear that the ephod was a means of consulting the oracle—a portable object used by the priest in seeking divine direction. I Sam. 14:3, 18-19; 23:9; I Kings 2:26 show this clearly, for there the ephod is carried and consulted.

To the writer it would appear conclusive that the ark and ephod could not be identified or compared, for the biblical ark was not an instrument of divination. These passages would show that the ephod could be carried about, and that in turn could mean that the ephod was a garment, sometimes of very costly materials, as in the case of Gideon's; sometimes located in a shrine and perhaps too big to be carried about (Judg. 17:5; 18:14, etc.; I Sam. 19:13); sometimes carried about during military operations. In this latter case it was doubtless put on by the priest during manipulation of the oracle. Just as a crucifix or cross may be a large object on the wall of a church, or a small object carried on the body, so ephods may have been of different sizes and weights. Since a garment is assumed for some uses of the word, it is the feasible explanation of all references, except that when placed in the shrine it may have been thought of as a sacral covering.

Bibliography. T. C. Foote, "The Ephod," JBL, XXI (1902), 1-47. E. Sellin, "Das israelitische Ephod," Nöldekefestschrift, II (1906), 699-717. H. J. Elhorst, "Das Ephod," JBL, XXX (1910), 254-76. W. R. Arnold, Ephod and Ark (1917). H. Thiersch, Ependytes und Ephod (1936). E. Sellin, "Noch einmal der alttestamentliche Efod," JPOS, XVII (1937), 236-51; "Zu Efod und Terafim," ZAW, LV (1937), 296-98. R. de Vaux, Review of Ependytes und Ephod by H. Thiersch, RB, XLVII (1938), 108-11. H. G. May, "Ephod and Ariel," AJSL, LVI (1939), 44-69. J. Morgenstern, The Ark, the Ephod and the "Tent of Meeting" (1945). G. B. Caird, Introduction to I and II Samuel, IB, II (1953), 872-75.

See also the bibliographies under ARK OF THE COVENANT; TABERNACLE; TERAPHIM. G. HENTON DAVIES

EPHPHATHA ĕf′ə thə [ἐφφαθά, ἐφφεθά; Aram. אפתח or, properly, אתפתח, Ethpeel of פתח, to open] (Mark 7:34). An Aramaic expression attributed to Jesus in his healing of a deaf mute. Mark translates the word by διανοίχθητι, "be opened," and follows this with the statement that the man's ears "were opened" and that "[the bond of] his tongue was loosed." As elsewhere in Mark (cf. TALITHA CUMI), the retention of the Aramaic may be attributed to the desire of preserving actual expressions of Jesus and of enhancing the feeling of supernatural power in the act of healing. There is no evidence of the use of a formula, as in paganism, regarded as magically effective in and of itself. The same may be said of the unique use of a medium, here saliva. Both may be regarded as a means to reinforcement of the patient's faith. The combination, however, was used in an early baptismal rite as practiced in Milan and Rome.

See also HEALING; MIRACLE.

Bibliography. G. Dalman, Jesus-Jeshua (1929), pp. 11-12; L. J. McGinley, Form-Criticism of the Synoptic Healing Narratives (1944); V. Taylor, The Gospel According to St. Mark (1952), pp. 353-56. A. WIKGREN

EPHRAIM ē′frĭ əm [אפרים, originally a region, perhaps from פרה (to be fruitful; Judaic-Aramaic [א]אפר, pasture land), with the place name ending ayim]; EPHRAIMITE —ə mīt [אפרתי]. 1. The younger son of Joseph, and the eponymous ancestor of one of the twelve tribes; later a designation for Israel. He was born of Asenath, daughter of the high priest of On (Gen. 41:52; 46:20), and was adopted by Jacob along with Manasseh and treated as the first-born (48:1 ff). Consequently, in 50:23, Ephraim appears in the first position, ahead of Manasseh. His name was originally a geographical name and later became the name of a tribe.

The tribe of Ephraim belongs to that group (Joseph or Rachel) which apparently did not immigrate until a later stage in the process of the Israelites' occupation of the land (Landnahme)—a process stretching over decades and perhaps centuries, in the "empty space" which resulted in central Palestine from the evacuation to which Simeon and Levi were forced (Gen. 34; 49:5-7). For the general course of the settlement and the development of this group, see MANASSEH). Like Manasseh, and unlike Benjamin, the third partner, Ephraim first developed as a separate tribe in the cultivated area. The character of the landscape settled by Ephraim undoubtedly contributed its share to this end. The S third of the land separated its people sharply from the N by its numerous deeply cut transverse valleys and probably also by its denser forestation. The name of this mountainous region, which to a certain degree actually left its imprint on their character, was then also taken over as their tribal name by the group settling here. The designation "hill country of Ephraim" does not coincide exactly, to be sure, with the territory in which the tribe settled, but occasionally extends beyond it; essentially, however, the hill country of Ephraim was identical with the territory of the tribe of Ephraim. This is shown beyond question by the system of boundary descriptions dating from the prestatehood period in the book of Joshua, where the S boundary runs approximately along the line Beth-horon–Bethel, the N boundary running along the general line of the Wadi Qanah, bending out to the N, E of the principal watershed, up to near Shechem (Josh. 16:6; 17:7).

In the course of time Ephraim outstripped its larger brother tribe Manasseh in importance (Gen. 48). This development is evident even at an early date. So Joshua was Ephraimite; his grave was pointed out in Timnath-serah (Khirbet Tibneh) in the hill country of Ephraim (Josh. 24:30; Judg. 2:9), where the family had its hereditary possession (Josh. 19:50). He was the victorious leader of the Ephraimite levy. Neither the heroic song nor the saga which forms the basis for Josh. 10 mentions Israel as a whole; the battle between Gibeon and Aijalon shows Ephraim already in the period of its expansion (Judg. 1:35). However, more than local significance belongs to Joshua as arbiter of the territorial claims of the tribes (Josh. 17:14) and especially in his role in Josh. 24 (surely amphictyonic now), where he organizes Israel around a new Yahweh sanctuary in the heart of the land and sets Israel upon her firm historical foundation. "As for me and my house" (vs. 15; cf. I Kings 15:27: the house of Issachar) might mean the whole tribe of Ephraim as champion for Yahweh. In other respects the tradition in Josh. 17:14 ff, which is but slightly touched up, seems to reveal that Ephraim invaded his later dwelling place from the N; the forest, which the Josephites are to clear, is precisely the hill country of Ephraim. Josh. 10 shows then how Ephraim pushed forward along the base of the Benjaminite wedge further toward the SW; Beth-Horon (Beit 'Ur el-Foqa) was already Ephraimite at the time of the establishment of the series of fixed boundary points (16:5). Ephraim, too, did not yet get down into the plain for a long time (Josh. 16:10; Judg. 1:29); not until the beginning of the period of the kings did the battles at Gibbethon (Tell el-Melat?) concern the securing of Gezer as a N Israelite possession. On the other side, Ephraim expanded toward the N; in Josh. 17:8 it is specifically stated that the town of Tappuah, with whose fields the Manassites had contented themselves, finally fell into the hands of the Ephraimites. Pirathon (Fer'ata), the home of the Ephraimite minor judge Abdon (Judg. 12:15), probably was also such an Ephraimite town in theoretically Manassite territory—but not Shechem, as the Chronicler believes (I Chr. 7:28). Ephraimites are mentioned relatively often in the early period. In the levy of the amphictyony they served under Gideon, when they were successful in catching two Midianite princes at the fords of the Jordan (Judg. 7:24; 8:1-2), and under Jephthah, when they again complained about not having been called to participate in the war with the Ammonites (leadership pretensions?), resulting in a warlike altercation with the Gileadites (12:1-6). From the latter tradition it is apparent that Ephraimites also took part in the colonization E of the Jordan (see MANASSEH), since they even allowed themselves to be branded as deserters (RSV "fugitives") by their countrymen (vs. 4). The passage of the Danites into their new home naturally led through Ephraimite territory (17:1, 8; 18:2, 13). The Levite whose evil experience on his journey set the judgment of the amphictyony in motion against Benjamin (19:1, 16, 18) came, like his host, from Ephraim; but both may be merely literary figures.

It appears that at times Ephraim played a special role in the twelve-tribe confederacy. Not only were the Levite and his host in the typically amphictyonic tradition just mentioned probably not domiciled there by chance, but also the minor judge Tola, who held an amphictyonic office, lived at Shamir in the hill country of Ephraim (Judg. 10:1-2), although he was appointed by the tribe of Issachar. In the Song of Deborah, too, where Zebulun and Naphtali clearly carried the main burden of the battle (Judg. 5:18), the place of honor at the head of the list of the members of the amphictyony is, nevertheless, granted to Ephraim (vs. 14). Similarly, Ephraim ranks ahead of Manasseh (Deut. 33:17) in the Joseph section of the Blessing of Moses. Should not all this be connected with the shifting of the center of the amphictyony from Shechem to Shiloh, to Ephraimite soil? Does it not thereby in turn show how Ephraim advanced into the forefront at the expense of Manasseh? Thus the tomb of Eleazar, the son of Aaron, could also be located in the hill country of Ephraim (Josh. 24:33). Shiloh is the scene of the story of Samuel's youth; and Samuel, the great initiator of the Israelite kingdom, was an Ephraimite (I Sam. 1:1). In the royal period Ephraim was among the few tribes which recognized Ish-baal (Ish-bosheth) at once as Saul's successor (II Sam. 2:9). Among David's "Thirty" there were two Ephraimites (II Sam. 23:30; cf. Josh. 24:30; Judg. 12:15). Under Solomon the central district around which the remaining eleven districts are arranged in a circle and which also includes the territory of Manasseh is, significantly, designated the hill country of Ephraim (I Kings 4:8). From Ephraim came Jeroboam, who represented the rights of the common freemen against the absolutist Solomon and who finally, by taking over the kingdom, completed the separation of the N tribes from the Davidic dynasty (11:26).

In the later literature the older importance of Ephraim can still be recognized in the fact that Ephraim is almost always given precedence over Manasseh. (To see how this appears in the lists and also in the Psalms and the narrative literature, see MANASSEH.) The corresponding passages for Ephraim are: lists in P, Num. 1:10, 32-33; 2:18-24; 7:48; 10:22; 13:8 (or 26:28, 35-37; 34:24); the Levite cities, Josh. 21:5-20=I Chr. 6:46-51; the lists of Chronicles, I Chr. 12:31; 27:20 (or 7:20-28). Ephraim ranks after Manasseh in the OT only in Num. 26:28, 35; 34:24; Josh. 14:4; 16:4; I Chr. 7:20; II Chr. 34:9; Ezek. 48:5 (where it is required by the form of the context). What the Chronicler has to say about Ephraim otherwise is to be found in the same passages as for MANASSEH; only I Chr. 12:20 is an exception. But the Chronicler gives equally strange special Ephraimite material: in I Chr. 27:10, 14, two of the commanders of the monthly divisions were Ephraimites (at least one of these is identical with one of David's thirty heroes; cf. II Sam. 23:30, but also vs. 26); in II Chr. 15:8; 17:2, Asa is said to have conquered Ephraimite cities; in 19:4, Jehoshaphat converts the people in the hill country of Ephraim; in 25:7, 9-15, Amaziah eliminates the Ephraimite volunteers from his holy army; in 28:7, 12, strange details from the Syro-Ephraimite War are related.

For the territory of Ephraim, see TRIBES, TERRITORIES OF, § 3*a*.

The basis for the use of "Ephraim" to designate Israel was provided by the unfortunate outcome of the Syro-Ephraimite War (734-732), in which the N kingdom of Israel saw itself robbed of its peripheral territories, which were turned into the Assyrian provinces of Dor, Megiddo, and Gilead; and Israel was reduced to its central territory, the old settlement area of the tribes of Manasseh and Ephraim. Since Ephraim had long since overshadowed Manasseh in its importance (see above), the designation of the rump state as Ephraim suggested itself automatically and endured, too, when this remnant was made into the Assyrian province of Samaria ten years later.

The designation is found first of all in the prophets who also experienced the catastrophe, most frequently in Hosea. The situation is clear when he uses "Ephraim" as an alternate expression for "Israel" (Hos. 4:17 [cf. vs. 16]; 5:3, 5; 6:10; 8:9 [cf. vs. 8], 11 [cf. vs. 14]; 9:8 [cf. vs. 7], 11, 13, 16 [cf. vs. 10]; 10:6; 11:3 [cf. vs. 1], 8-9; 12:1-2) and when he makes Ephraim parallel Samaria (7:1), Jacob (10:11), or the S kingdom of Judah (5:12-14; 6:4), or has Ephraim appear among the peoples, especially in connection with Assyria and Egypt (7:8, 11; 9:3). Not otherwise are Hos. 12:8, 14—H 12:9, 15; 13:1, 12, to be interpreted. Only in the case of 5:1, 11, can the meaning be the old, more restricted one, if one—along with Alt—derives the oracle from the beginning of the Syro-Ephraimite War. Isaiah is the other contemporary of the catastrophe. He is surely still cognizant of the older usage when he divides "all the people" into "Ephraim and the inhabitants of Samaria" and in the same oracle has Manasseh devour Ephraim "and Ephraim Manasseh" (Isa. 9:9, 21—H 9:8, 20). But as early as 17:3 he mentions Ephraim alone as an ally of Damascus, and sometime later Samaria is for him the capital of Ephraim—i.e., of the remnant state of Israel (28:1, 3). In this period also 7:2 [cf. vs. 5], 8-9, was written. In the secondary portions the broader usage is clear (7:17; 11:13); here "Ephraim" already refers to the Israelite N in general. This meaning is found in common usage also in Jeremiah (7:15; 31:9, 18, 20) and Ezekiel (37:16, 19); in Ps. 78:9, 67; Zech. 9:10, 13; 10:7; perhaps also in Obad. 19 (if "Samaria" is an addition). Even the Deuteronomic historian, who otherwise knew well how to differentiate, makes a concession once to the linguistic usage of his time in that he combines the N part of the land W of the Jordan as the "house of Ephraim" in addition to Judah and Benjamin (Judg. 10:9).

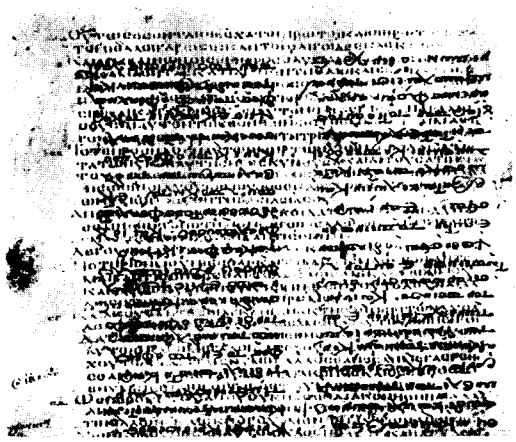
See the bibliography under ASHER. K. ELLIGER

2. A town in the vicinity of Bethel (II Sam. 13:23). II Chr. 13:19 is probably concerned with the same geographical area in mentioning "Bethel with its villages and Jeshanah with its villages and Ephron with its villages." "EPHRON" (עפרון) may be the Chronicler's reading for "Ephraim."

In the NT the same city is probably mentioned in John 11:54; it is reported that Jesus went "to the country near the wilderness, to a town called Ephraim." In the time of the Maccabees a city by the name of Aphairema (Αφαιρεμα) was in the territory of Samaria that was added to the territory of Judah (I Macc. 11:34). Josephus (War IV.ix.9) doubtless has reference to the same place in his description of Vespasian's march against Jerusalem, during which he captured "Bethel and Ephraim, two small cities."

Et-Taiyibeh, ca. four miles NE of Bethel, and Samieh, in the same area but closer to the Jordan Valley, have been proposed as possible locations.



Bibliography. W. F. Albright, "Ophrah and Ephraim," AASOR, IV (1922-23), 125-33. W. L. REED

EPHRAIM, FOREST OF [יער אפרים]. A wooded stretch E of the Jordan into which the forces of David under Joab chased and slaughtered the army of the rebellious Absalom, who was caught by a tree in his flight and later slain by Joab there (II Sam. 18:6-17). The circumstance that a part of Manasseh was named after a tribe to the W of the Jordan can be explained by the supposition that the territory of Ephraim once extended farther to the E. This stretch of land, of a wooded nature, was lost by the tribe after its defeat by Jephthah near Zaphon, E of the Jordan (Judg. 12). Later interpreters, such as the Lucian LXX, who believed that the tribal territories were fixed in the time of Joshua, amended the text to "forest of Mahanaim"; but this is unlikely, as the battle seems to have been fought at some distance from Mahanaim. S. COHEN

EPHRAIM GATE [שער אפרים]; KJV GATE OF EPHRAIM. A gate of the first (oldest) rampart of Jerusalem, four hundred cubits E of the CORNER GATE (II Kings 14:13; II Chr. 25:23). The name was transferred to the corresponding gate in the second wall, restored by Nehemiah (Neh. 12:39). See map under NEHEMIAH. See also JERUSALEM § 6*b*.

G. A. BARROIS

EPHRAEMI SYRI, CODEX ĕf'rĭ ē'mī sī'rī. An early-fifth-century palimpsest Greek uncial codex MS of the Bible (symbol "C"). It is an important witness to the text of the LXX and the NT. See VERSIONS, ANCIENT; TEXT, NT. Fig. EPH 34.

34. Codex Ephraemi (fifth century A.D.)

Originally the MS contained the entire Bible. Only parts of Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus, and Song of Songs are now extant from the OT. Portions of every NT book except II Thessalonians and II John are extant. It contains 209 leaves (64 in the OT; 145 in the NT) measuring 12¼ by 9½ inches. There is one column of writing, containing 40-46 lines per page. The upper writing contains a twelfth-century Greek translation of some writings of Ephraem Syrus.

The codex probably was brought to Florence from the East by John Lascar in the time of Lorenzo de' Medici. It came into the possession of the infamous Catherine de' Medici, who took it to France when she became the wife of Henry II. The codex became a part of the Royal Library and later a part of the MS collection of the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris.

Bibliography. F. H. A. Scrivener, Plain Introduction to the Criticism of the NT (4th ed., rev. E. Miller; 1894), I, 121-24; C. R. Gregory, Canon and Text of the NT (1907), pp. 348-50; W. H. P. Hatch, Principal Uncial MSS of the NT (1939), plate XX; F. G. Kenyon, Our Bible and the Ancient Mss (5th ed., rev. A. W. Adams; 1958), pp. 121-22, 206-7.

M. M. PARVIS

EPHRAIMITE ē'frĭ ə mīt [אפרתי] (Judg. 12:5; I Sam. 1:1; I Kings 11:26); KJV EPHRATHITE ĕf'rə thīt in I Sam. 1:1; I Kings 11:26. A member of the tribe of Ephraim.

EPHRAIN. KJV form of EPHRON 2.

EPHRATHAH ĕf′rə thə [אפרתה]; KJV EPHRATAH —tə. Alternately: EPHRATH —răth (Gen. 35:16, 19; 48:7; אפרת in I Chr. 2:19). 1. The second wife of Caleb, and the mother of Hur and Ashhur (I Chr. 2:19, 24, 50; 4:4). The marriage preserves a memory of the northward movement of the Calebites, since Ephrathah is another name for Bethlehem.

J. F. Ross

2. A city in Judah; identified with Bethlehem. Since, however, there is a significant denotation of the family of David as Ephrathites (Ruth 1:2; I Sam. 17:12), the two cities were evidently not identical, but Ephrathah was an older settlement which became absorbed into Bethlehem. It was still separate in the time of the patriarchs, for Rachel died on the way there (Gen. 35:19; see Rachel's Tomb). In one passage the names are combined as Bethlehem Ephrathah (Mic. 5:2—H 5:1).

3. A district in Palestine; apparently the same as the old tribal unit of Ephraim (Ps. 132:6).

S. Cohen

EPHRATHITE ĕf′rə thīt [אפרתי]. 1. Gentilic of Ephrathah 2.

2. KJV form of Ephraimite in I Sam. 1:1; I Kings 11:26. See Ephraim 1.

EPHRON ē′frŏn [עפרון, עפרן, from עפר, gazelle; Ἐφρών]; KJV EPHRAIN ē′frī ən in II Chr. 13:19. 1. Son of Zohar; the Hittite from whom Abraham purchased the field containing the cave of Machpelah, to the E of Mamre, for four hundred shekels' weight of silver (Gen. 23:8-17; 25:9; 49:29-30; 50:13).

L. Hicks

2. Mount Ephron, a district whose cities were on the border of Judah (Josh. 15:9). In Josh. 18:15, where the S boundary of Benjamin is traced, many scholars emend to insert "to Ephron" (so RSV), for the S boundary of Benjamin corresponds to part of the N boundary of Judah. The district cannot be located with certainty, although the ridge of mountains W of Bethlehem has been proposed.

3. A city in the vicinity of Bethel which Abijah took from Jeroboam I (II Chr. 13:19). The CT has עפרון—i.e., Ephron (RSV); the Masoretic pointing indicates עפרין—i.e., Ephrain (KJV). The place is probably to be identified with Ophrah, a city of Benjamin (Josh. 18:23). Et-Taiyibeh, ca. four miles NE of Bethel, is generally accepted as the location of Ephron-Ophrah.

4. A strongly fortified city between Karnaim and Beth-shean (Scythopolis) in the Maccabean period. It tried to prevent the passage of Judas and the Israelites with him, but Judas assaulted the city and took it, slaying all its male inhabitants and taking spoil (I Macc. 5:46-52; II Macc. 12:27-29; see also Jos. Antiq. XII.viii.5).

Bibliography. W. F. Albright, "Ophrah and Ephraim," AASOR, IV (1922-23), 125-33. W. L. Reed

EPICUREANS ĕp′ə kyŏō rē′ənz [Ἐπικούρειοι]. Adherents of a school of philosophy founded by Epicurus, who was born of Athenian parents in a colony on the island of Samos in 341 B.C. and died at Athens in 270. In 322, shortly after he had completed his prescribed year of military service at Athens, he and his family were forced to leave Samos and to take up life as poverty-stricken refugees at Colophon. Here he developed his philosophy, primarily a doctrine of deliverance from fear of gods and men, pain and death; and of a way to happiness or pleasure (ἡδονή; lit., "sweetness"), in spite of all the real and fancied ills of life. In 310 he opened his first school at Mytilene, but shortly thereafter moved to Lampsacus on the Sea of Marmora, where he attracted a devoted band of disciples, some of whom remained with him as long as they lived. In 306 his friends and followers clubbed together to buy him a house and garden at Athens, and there he lived and taught for the rest of his life. The Garden (κῆπος) became the center of a community which offered a haven of friendship and simplicity of life to all sorts and conditions of men and women, slave and free, of high repute and of ill repute; and from it, disciples of Epicurus carried his doctrine—to them a veritable gospel of liberation—to all parts of the Greek world, and beyond; indeed, his system receives its noblest exposition in the stately hexameters of the Roman Lucretius (99-55 B.C.).

The philosophy of Epicurus was primarily a system of ethics. The epistemology is puerile—a doctrine of the validity of sense impressions. Political theory held no interest for him whatever; and his doctrine of atoms is simply the explanation of a world in which the activity of gods is unnecessary. For gods, angels and demons, worship and sacrifices, mystery initiations, oracles and magic, astralism, fears and hopes of a life to come—in short, the whole apparatus of religion—have no place in his system. Religion is the great enemy, the begetter of monstrous deeds and the breeder of needless terrors. Gods indeed exist, living a life of endless bliss in ethereal realms far removed from the world of men; but they have no concern for man, desiring not his service, neither inflicting nor threatening evil, and imparting no blessing. Their undisturbed tranquillity (ἀταραξία) is the full realization of the life to which men should seek to attain; but the gods cannot help him to attain it. Moreover, it must be attained in this life, for the soul is dissolved at death into the atoms which compose it and has no future existence to dread or to desire.

Epicurus held that the one end of life is happiness, and the first prerequisite to its attainment is deliverance from the fear of the gods. This fear is forever removed in the man who has a true perception of the nature of things; this perception is itself supreme blessedness, and the great poem of Lucretius shows what profound delight his doctrine of nature could bring to men. His theory of atoms originated a century earlier, with Democritus, but he developed it along his own lines by combining it with a kind of hylozoism. The atoms are in constant movement and have the power to swerve in their courses, thus giving rise to the manifold forms of living things—plants, animals, and men—and leaving scope for free will. No divine assistance is needed to bring forth such a world, and no purpose or design, unconscious or deliberate, governs it; the future is in no sense fixed, and men are not in any degree the puppets of a will or power beyond their own control. The soul, like the body, is a composite of atoms, of material though refined substance, penetrating the spaces between the grosser atoms of which the body is composed, and dissolving with the dissolution of the body in death. It follows that all doctrines of a life to come, whether they promise bliss or threaten torments, are absurdities. The Epicureans who listened to Paul at Athens would certainly scoff when he spoke of the resurrection of the dead, and would not be among those who said: "We will hear you again about this" (Acts 17: 32).

The happiness which Epicurus set as the end of human life was no ignoble self-indulgence. He and his community of the Garden lived chastely and frugally, abstaining from flesh and wine and holding that the physical union of the sexes is productive of far more harm than good. The ideal of life, the true happiness, was found in ataraxia, a tranquillity incapable of being shaken by terror, pain, destitution, the ruin of state and home, or any conceivable disaster. Even the worst of pains can be endured without the loss of happiness. "The wise man," said Epicurus, "will be happy even upon the rack." Unendurable pain quickly brings death, and in death there is nothing to fear; and in moments of intense agony the wise man will draw upon memory to recall blissful experiences of other days, and will live in the sweetness of the past, not in the distress of the moment. The great unfailing spring of happiness is friendship (φιλία), which in Epicureanism comes closer to the Christian virtue of love (ἀγάπη) than anything else in antiquity.

The philosophy of Epicurus has no history. The teachings of the master were treated as unalterable dogma, and were perpetuated through the centuries without any attempt at inquiry or advance.

Bibliography. Primary sources: H. Usener, Epicurea (1887), is the fundamental collection. "Epicurus" in Diogenes Laërtius, Lives of Eminent Philosophers, vol. II, bk. 10 (text with English trans. by R. D. Hicks; 1925). C. Bailey, Epicurus, the Extant Remains (1926). A. Vogliano, Epicuri et Epicureorum Scripta in Herculanensibus Papyris Servata (1928). For later Epicureans, see especially: Philodemus Concerning Piety in T. Gomperz, ed., Herculanische Studien, vol. II (1866). J. Winter, ed., Diogenes of Oenoanda (1907). H. Diels, ed., Concerning the Gods, Berlin Sitzungsberichte (1916-17). Lucretius De Rerum Natura (ed. C. Bailey; 3 vols.; 1947).

Articles and monographs: P. Shorey, Plato, Lucretius, and Epicurus, Harvard Studies in Classical Philosophy (1901). R. D. Hicks, "Epicureans," in J. Hastings, ed., Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, V (1912), 324-30. N. W. DeWitt, Epicurus and His Philosophy (1954). A. J. Festugière, Epicurus and His Gods (trans. C. W. Chilton; 1955). See also the commentaries on Lucretius; the histories of Greek philosophy, especially those of E. Zeller and T. Gomperz. F. W. BEARE

EPIGRAPHY ĭ pĭg′rə fĭ. See ALPHABET; INSCRIPTIONS; WRITING AND WRITING MATERIALS.

EPILEPSY (Matt. 4:24; 17:14-18; Mark 9:14-27; Luke 9:37-42). A distressing disorder of the central nervous system, marked by the occurrence of unconsciousness or convulsive fits, or both. It was known in earlier ages as the "falling sickness" from its Greek designation, and its aetiology is still far from clear. The attacks frequently begin in childhood or at puberty, and are associated with abnormal rhythms in the cerebral cortex.

Idiopathic or typical epilepsy is often preceded by an aura, a peculiar sensation which may be auditory, olfactory, gustatory, or visual in nature, and perhaps accompanied by loss of sensation in an extremity. Minor seizures (petit mal) may involve momentary loss of consciousness (morbus caducens), without any convulsions. Major attacks (grand mal) invariably produce unconsciousness, muscular flexion, arching of the back (opisthotonos), and cyanosis in the tonic phase, while severe muscular contractions, convulsions, and enuresis characterize the clonic phase. Several different forms of epilepsy have been described.

The epileptic boy whom Christ healed (Matt. 17: 14-18; Mark 9:14-27; Luke 9:37-42) was probably a low-grade moron. Mark furnishes an accurate picture of idiopathic epilepsy, while Luke employs technical medical terms occurring in Hippocrates and elsewhere. Matthew uses σεληνιάζομαι ("to be moonstruck") in his description, reflecting the ancient belief in a connection between epilepsy and the lunar phases. Jesus also healed other epileptics (Matt. 4:24). R. K. HARRISON EPIPHANES ĭ pĭf′ə nēz [Ἐπιφανής, the Manifest (God)]. A title or surname assumed by the Syrian tyrant Antiochus IV, when he came to the throne, and later on by Antiochus VI after his coronation (see ANTIOCHUS 4, 6). It was the general practice for the Seleucid kings to take to themselves a second name. In scorn for his outrageous deeds, some of the subjects of Antiochus IV later altered the name to the nickname Epimanes, which means "mad"!

N. TURNER

EPIPHI ĕp′ĭ fī [Επιφι]. The eleventh month of the Egyptian year, from June 25 to July 24, mentioned in III Macc. 6:38. According to this Hellenistic Jewish legend, Egyptian Jews were registered during a forty-day period from the twenty-fifth of Pachon to the fourth of Epiphi at Schedia outside Alexandria, preparatory to their execution by order of Ptolemy IV (221-203 B.C.); but they were miraculously delivered from their fate. See TIME.

E. W. SAUNDERS

EPISTLE ĭ pĭs′əl. See LETTER.

EPISTLE OF THE APOSTLES. See APOSTLES, EPISTLE OF THE.

EPISTLES, APOCRYPHAL ə pŏk′rə fəl. A form of composition suggested by the letters in the NT, both those of Paul and those incorporated in the canonical Acts. They are comparatively few in number and for the most part trivial in content, although several attained wide circulation. The most significant is the Epistle of the Apostles (which is actually only superficially an epistle), although the correspondence between Abgarus and Jesus and several letters ascribed to Paul hovered for many years on the fringes of the canon in some circles (see APOSTLES, EPISTLE OF THE). There are also several letters ascribed to Pilate and purporting to record his reports regarding the trial of Jesus. For a list of the epistles treated separately, see APOCRYPHA, NT. M. S. ENSLIN

ER ûr [ער, watcher or watchful; cf. Heb. personal names ערי, יעיר (יעור); Ἠρ]. 1. The first-born son of Judah and the Canaanite daughter of Shua. Although he was married to Tamar, he died childless, Yahweh having slain him as punishment for wickedness (Gen. 38:3-7; 46:12; Num. 26:19; I Chr. 2:3).

2. Grandson of Judah, and the father of Lecah (I Chr. 4:21).

3. The father of Elmadam in the Lukan genealogy of Jesus (Luke 3:28). L. HICKS

ERAN ĭr′ăn [ערן; LXX, Samar., Syr., עדן, delight]; ERANITES ĭr′ə nīts. Son of Shuthelah, and grandson of Ephraim; ancestor of the Eranites (Num. 26:36). In the Ephraimite genealogy of I Chr. 7:20, Eleadah occupies the position held by Eran in Num. 26:36, giving support to the LXX, Samar., and Syr. reading in the latter verse. R. F. JOHNSON

ERASTUS ĭ răs′təs [Ἔραστος, beloved]. 1. City treasurer (οἰκονόμος, Latin arcarius [rei publicae]) of Corinth, who sends greetings to his fellow Christians in Rom. 16:23. Such officials were usually slaves or of servile origin, though often wealthy. A Latin inscription dating A.D. 50-100, found at Corinth by the American School of Classical Studies (see bibliography), names an Erastus who probably was an aedile and who paved a street. It is improbable, though not impossible, that he was the Erastus of Romans.

Bibliography. H. J. Cadbury, JBL, 50 (1931), 42-58, contains the inscription which mentions Erastus. W. Miller, BS, 88 (1931), 342-46.

2. A companion of Paul (Acts 19:22; II Tim. 4:20). It seems unlikely that he was identical with 1 above. F. W. GINGRICH

ERECH ĭr′ĕk [ארך; Sumer. Unug; Akkad. Uruk]; MEN OF ERECH [ארכויא] (Ezra 4:9); KJV ARCHEVITES är′kə vīts in Ezra 4:9. One of the largest and most important cities of Sumer, located at modern Warka, ca. 160 miles S of Baghdad. It appears in Gen. 10:10 as a city of the kingdom of NIMROD in the land of SHINAR. According to Ezra 4:9-10, the men of Erech and others were settled in the cities of Samaria and other parts of the province Beyond the River by Osnappar (probably Ashurbanipal).

The original village, Kullab, was founded by the "Ubaid" people (see SUMER) ca. 4000 B.C. The city called Erech, of which Kullab became a part, was built by Meskiaggasher, the founder of Erech's First Dynasty, who lived early in the third millennium. Meskiaggasher's successors were the "heroes" Enmerkar, Lugalbanda, and Gilgamesh. Between Lugalbanda and Gilgamesh, tradition placed Dumuzi (biblical Tammuz), the prototype of the god who died and was bitterly mourned. Among the more important later rulers of Erech were Lugalzaggesi, Utuhegal (see SUMER), and Sinkashid (ca. 1800 B.C.), noted for his building activities and for a prosperous reign during which the cost of living was extraordinarily low. From the time of Hammurabi, Erech became part of Babylonia and shared its fortunes and misfortunes until the fall of the Parthian Empire, when it was abandoned altogether.

Erech's chief deity was An, who in earliest days was the king of the Sumerian pantheon. But Erech's most beloved and celebrated deity was the ambitious and aggressive goddess of love, Inanna. According to the Sumerian mythographers, it was Inanna who brought the "divine laws," the me's, from Eridu to Erech, to make it Sumer's leading city; it was with Inanna's help that Enmerkar subjugated distant Aratta and saved Erech from the W Bedu known as Martu. Inanna, according to the theologians, married King Dumuzi, to ensure the fertility and prosperity of Sumer, and a number of the later Sumerian kings were therefore identified symbolically with Dumuzi.

Excavations in Erech were conducted by German expeditions in 1912-13, 1928-39, and 1954-59. These laid bare the city walls, six miles in circumference; two ziggurats; and several temples from the late fourth and early third millenniums. From the same general period came hundreds of pictographic tablets; many seals and seal impressions; an extraordinary alabaster vase with what may be a "Dumuzi-Inanna" scene; and a remarkably expressive life-size head of a woman. From a much later date came a Seleucid tablet archive inscribed with Babylonian astronomical texts.

Bibliography. A. Falkenstein, Archaische Texte aus Uruk (1936). H. W. Eliot, Excavations in Mesopotamia and Western Iran (1950), exhibits 3-9. AFO, vol. 17 (1954-56), pt. 1, pp. 198-201; pt. 2, pp. 421-24; vol. 18 (1958), pt. 2, pp. 445-53. S. N. KRAMER

ERI ĭr′ī [ערי, watchful, vigilant]; ERITES ĭr′īts. Son of Gad; ancestral head of the "family of the Erites" (Gen. 46:16; Num. 26:16). See SHUNI.

ERUPTION [מספחת, ספחת]; KJV SCAB. Any cutaneous redness, rash, spotting, or sore. It is one of the symptoms of LEPROSY. Nonleprous swellings or rashes were diagnosed as such after the patient had been isolated for fourteen days.

See also ITCH; SCAB; SCALL; SCURVY. R. K. HARRISON

ESAIAS. KJV NT form of ISAIAH.

ESARHADDON ē′sər hăd′ən [אסר־חדן; Akkad. Aššur-aḫ-iddin, Ashur has given a brother (for a lost son)]. King of Assyria and Babylonia (681-669 B.C.); son of SENNACHERIB, and father of ASHURBANIPAL.

Esarhaddon had to fight for his throne when his father, Sennacherib, was murdered under circumstances of which we know but little, and through references that are difficult to harmonize. Esarhaddon, who had previously been designated crown prince and whose succession had been assured by oaths taken by his brothers and high officials, was in hiding—so at least, he asserts—when Sennacherib met his fate; but he was able to gain enough support to defeat his brothers in a battle at Hanigalbat and to move into Arbela, Asshur, and Nineveh, and thus to terminate the civil war very quickly. Since Esarhaddon was clearly pro-Babylonian, he did not encounter many difficulties in Babylonia, especially since Elam (apart from one incident) was not inclined to support any rebels at that time. He made a son of MERODACH-BALADAN governor of Bīt-Yakīn, and this governor remained loyal to his lord. Esarhaddon's military planning was mainly directed toward subduing Egypt, which was continually inciting Palestine and Syria to rebellion. Energetic measures against Sidon and Kundi (677), as well as effective control of the Arabs (676), primarily by diplomatic means, preceded the first attack upon Egypt (675). Esarhaddon passed, on his way to Egypt, through the city of HARAN, where he received encouraging omens from the moon-god, Sin. Although his army met an initial defeat in Egypt, it continued to fight in the Delta region, and his general Ša-Nabûšû eventually defeated Pharaoh Taharqa, forcing him to retreat toward Upper Egypt. Memphis was conquered in a quick advance, and Esarhaddon tried to rule the country by means of native rulers and Assyrian "advisers." The Assyrian domination was soon threatened by rebellion, and Esarhaddon found it necessary to embark in 669 on a new campaign. On the way to Egypt, however, he fell sick and died. On the essential frontier toward the N and the W, where the pressure of migrating Cimmerians and Medes was by no means diminishing, Esarhaddon was luckier in his military and diplomatic moves. In 679 the Cimmerians suffered a defeat, and in 673 sharp attacks had been mounted against the Medes, with incursions penetrating deep into Iran. An alliance with the SCYTHIANS, directed against the Medes, to be cemented by the marriage of a daughter of Esarhaddon to a barbarian ruler, and a group of treaties with the Medes—recently found in CALAH—demonstrate Esarhaddon's awareness of the potential dangers from these enemies. He was likewise rather fortunate in his arrangements for the succession to the throne. His younger son, Ashurbanipal, was made crown prince and assumed an important share of administrative duties to be discharged in the palace of the crown prince (bīt ridûti), while his elder brother, Šamaššum-ukīn, was made king of Babylon. In 672 the high officials of the country had to take an oath to assure the succession of Ashurbanipal; and, although a minor rebellion of discontented officials had to be put down in 670, this arrangement proved a success, inasmuch as Ashurbanipal became king without any difficulty.

Esarhaddon dedicated much effort to the rebuilding of Babylon and other cities of the S and was much less interested than any other Assyrian king in the embellishment of his capital, Nineveh.

Figs. ESA 35; ASS 98.

Bibliography. R. Borger, Die Inschriften Asarhaddons, Königs von Assyrien (1956).

A. L. OPPENHEIM

Courtesy of the Trustees of the British Museum

35. Baked clay prism containing the annals of Esarhaddon

ESAU ē'sô [עשו, see below; 'Ησαῦ]. 1. Son of Isaac and Rebekah; elder twin brother of Jacob (Gen. 25: 24-26; 27:1, 32, 42; I Chr. 1:34); traditional ancestor of the Edomites (Gen. 36; Mal. 1:2-3). See EDOM.

a. Etymology
b. The birth of Esau
c. Esau's birthright
d. The loss of the patriarchal blessing
e. The reconciliation
Bibliography

a. Etymology. Two etymologies are associated with this patriarch. The name of the patriarch's son is connected with שער, "hairy": "All his body [was] like a hairy mantle [כאדרת שער]; so they called his name Esau" (Gen. 25:25; cf. 27:11, 21-23). However, the two words are only slightly similar in appearance and sound. The "popular etymology" is obviously better suited to SEIR (שעיר), a name roughly designating Edom. Its association with Esau seems secondary.

The patronymic name is twice connected with the verb אדם, "to be ruddy or reddish-brown." Gen. 25: 25 says that "the first [twin] came forth red" (אדמוני, "ruddy"); at vs. 30 he desired some of Jacob's pottage (אדם), "therefore his name was called Edom" (אדום).

b. The birth of Esau (Gen. 25:19-26). When barren Rebekah conceived, two children "struggled together within her," and she gave birth to twin boys. The first, being red and hairy, was named Esau (see § 1 above); the second, having grabbed his brother's heel, was called JACOB (see § 1).

The oracle embedded in this birth narrative (vs. 23) is an ethnic etiology, describing the relation of the Israelites (the sons of Jacob) to the Edomites (the sons of Esau; Deut. 2:4). Although Esau was the first-born (vs. 25), Jacob would be master over him—a "prophecy" reiterated by other Jacob-Esau traditions (see below; cf. Jer. 49:8; Obad. 6; Rom. 9:10-13).

c. Esau's birthright (Gen. 25:27-34). In contrast to the seminomadic shepherd Jacob, Esau became "a skilful hunter, a man of the field," of whose game Isaac loved to eat. When he returned famished from an unsuccessful hunt, Esau impetuously bargained away his birthright for bread and some of the pottage Jacob was brewing (cf. Heb. 12:16). See JACOB (ISRAEL) §C1*b*.

d. The loss of the patriarchal blessing (Gen. 27). For a third, and climactic, time the older brother was supplanted by the younger. When Esau brought in the savory food to obtain his father's deathbed blessing, he received instead a curse. Esau was not to share in the fertile land of Palestine (Behold, away from the fatness of the earth shall your dwelling be, and away from the dew of heaven on high), but was to live by the sword and serve his younger twin. After a time, however, he would break free (vss. 39-40).

Edom's relations with Israel in the tenth and ninth centuries offer a parallel. The Edomites were conquered by David (II Sam. 8:12-14; I Chr. 18:13; cf. Num. 24:18) and remained subject to Judah until the reign of Joram (II Kings 8:20-22; II Chr. 21:8-10). See EDOM § 3.

As a result of this deceit Esau hated Jacob; and his plans to kill him were thwarted only by Rebekah's prompt intervention (Gen. 27:41-45).

e. The reconciliation (Gen. 33:1-16). When Jacob returned to Palestine twenty years later, he made careful preparation both to appease Esau and to protect himself against his brother's wrath (32:3-21; 33:1-3; see JACOB [ISRAEL] § C3*b*). But Jacob's preparations were unnecessary. Esau met his guilty brother and received him back without malice or recrimination (33:4-16).

In the final characterization the shortsighted selfishness and impetuosity which Esau exhibits as a young man must be balanced by the generosity and forgiveness which distinguish this reconciliation. In the early episodes Jacob gained from him by craft material rights; here Esau graciously grants him the priceless gift of forgiveness.

Bibliography. F. M. T. Böhl, "Wortspiele im AT," Opera Minora (1953), pp. 18-19, 25; V. Maag, "Jacob—Esau—Edom," Theologische Zeitschrift (1957), pp. 418-29.

L. HICKS

2. KJV Apoc. form of ZIHA.

ESCAPE, ROCK OF [סלע המחלקות] (I Sam. 23:28); KJV SELA-HAMMAHLEKOTH sē'lə hə mä'lə-kŏth. A place, perhaps a cliff, in the wilderness of Maon to which David fled from Saul. Since this could be a cliff separated from another cliff by a narrow ravine across which one could easily see but not reach the opposite side without a detour of several miles, the suggestion of a place at the Wadi el-Malaqi, ca. eight miles E-NE of Maon, is a tempting possibility. The narrative would seem to indicate, however, that if a detour was necessary, it was nearly completed, since Saul appears to have been rather close on David's heels before the pursuit was ended by the report of a Philistine raid.

Bibliography. G. E. Wright and F. Filson, Westminster Historical Atlas to the Bible (2nd ed.; 1956), p. 127.

V. R. GOLD

ESCHATOLOGY OF THE OT [ἔσχατον, the last thing]. The term "eschatology" has been in use only since the nineteenth century; it signifies the doctrine of the last things. One can distinguish an individual and a general eschatology, depending on whether the final fate of the individual is concerned or the future of the chosen people (national eschatology) or of the whole world (universal eschatology). Individual eschatology does not yet come into view very much in the OT; in any case, it is only very slightly marked by belief in Yahweh (see LIFE; DEATH; IMMORTALITY; RESURRECTION; SHEOL). Much more significant in the OT are the national and universal eschatological expectations, which are often merged with one another. In order to avoid misconceptions, one must understand clearly that the term "eschatology" is used in very diverse ways in OT research—above all, in a narrower and a broader sense. "Eschatology" in the narrower sense means: the (dogmatically firmly established) doctrine of the (dramatically conceived) end of history and of the course of the universe and the beginning of the time of eternal salvation. Prerequisite for this is the abrupt cleavage between this world and the transcendental world of God, as it became more and more firmly established in the postexilic period and especially in the apocalyptic period (see APOCALYPTICISM). "Eschatology" in the broader sense refers to a future in which the circumstances of history are changed to such an extent that one can speak of a new, entirely different, state of things, without, in so doing, necessarily leaving the framework of history. If one defines "eschatology" in the narrower sense (as, e.g., Hölscher, Mowinckel, Frost; see bibliography), the OT contains eschatological concepts only at the very fringes. However, if one uses the term in the broader sense, as is now, with good reason, the custom (cf., e.g., Lindblom, Vriezen), then eschatology is a significant component of the OT faith.

1. Bases of the OT eschatology
   a. Eschatology and the history of salvation
   b. Judgment and salvation
2. Pre-exilic eschatology
   a. Preprophetic expectations
   b. Amos
   c. Hosea
   d. Isaiah
   e. Micah
   f. Zephaniah
   g. Jeremiah
3. Exilic and postexilic eschatology
   a. Ezekiel
   b. Deutero-Isaiah
   c. Haggai and Zechariah
   d. Anonymous postexilic eschatology
4. Apocalyptic eschatology
Bibliography

1. Bases of the OT eschatology. Eschatological expectations are found among many peoples and in many religions. The common factor in all of them, despite all diversity, is the association of the ideas with occurrences which can be observed in nature. Following the pattern of all sorts of natural catastrophes, they infer a future destruction of the world (world conflagration, flood). As life on the earth, the world itself also grows old and dies—and rises again renewed. The natural-cyclical thinking (see TIME § 2*b*) speculates on the eternal rhythm of the ages of the world in analogy to the natural year. In contrast to all this, the eschatology of the OT and also the belief in Yahweh in general is primarily oriented to the history of God (in dealing) with his people. It is, therefore, not strange that the eschatological view of the OT finds no real parallels in nonbiblical religions, even if it has absorbed and elaborated on all kinds of foreign motifs. This is also true with regard to the Iranian eschatology, in which ethical postulates (retribution, ultimate victory of good over evil) have decidedly covered up its natural basis.

a. Eschatology and the history of salvation. The OT is the record of God (in dealing) with his chosen people. God manifests himself in leading the Israelites out of Egypt, in the granting of the Promised Land, in the victories over their enemies—in short, in the entire history of Israel—as Lord and Director of history and the world. On the basis of this experience of faith, they concluded that Yahweh created the world. Here, too, is the starting point of the eschatological expectation of the future: Yahweh keeps on influencing history and completes it by definitely establishing his dominion and granting his people complete fellowship with himself. The course of history is determined by the word of promise which God, in sovereign freedom, gives and fulfils from time to time. Eschatology is the part of the history of salvation which is still in prospect and which presses for realization. At the same time, it is not a question of a rectilinear further development of existing conditions, with which man could even assist or which he could at least calculate. Yahweh's dominion prevails victoriously and miraculously against opposition. The present state of affairs must make room for a new, different state of affairs in all kinds of catastrophes. The catastrophes, however, are not the primary and essential matter, although they furnish the most vivid colors for the picture of the future. The present state of affairs in the world must perish because Yahweh is coming and will create everything new, not vice versa. The coming of Yahweh is the central idea of OT eschatology. Because the same God, who will reveal himself victoriously in the future, has already manifested himself in history from time to time and still does, it is, for the present, not possible to make a complete separation between history and eschatology. Only when God becomes completely transcendental (so that secular history is also no longer regarded as history of salvation), only then, at the end of the OT period, does eschatology acquire its complete qualitative distinction from history. The classical prophets characteristically depict the final act of Yahweh as analogous to his earlier acts of salvation (deliverance out of Egypt: Isa. 10:24-27; 11:15-16; 43:16 ff; 51:10-11; 52:11-12; march through the desert: Isa. 48:21; Hos. 2:14-15—H 2:16-17; conclusion of the covenant on Mount Sinai: Jer. 31:31-34; Ezek. 37:26; victory over the Midianites: Isa. 9:3; 10:26; covenant with David: Isa. 55:3).

According to all that has been said, eschatology is not an accidental appendage, but, from the start, an essential and integrating constituent of the OT faith in God. But it does not have the same importance at all times and in all OT witnesses. In the case of the historical writings, which look back upon the past history of salvation, eschatological hopes can, in most cases, be only indirectly inferred. In peaceful years of abundance the expectation is of less importance than in times of crisis. The thinking of the priests, which is directed toward the legal aspect of the God-given orders, is much less eschatological than that of the prophets, who know themselves to be advance messengers of the Lord, who is coming to his people.

b. Judgment and salvation. Yahweh is the merciful Lord who saves, but also the holy Lord who will punish sin (Exod. 20:5-6; Isa. 6:3, 5). The two characteristic features constitute an indissoluble, paradoxical unit (see GOD, OT; LOVE IN THE OT; WRATH OF GOD). Accordingly Yahweh's eschatological acts comprise, with regard to content, both judgment and salvation. These two and a few basic concepts of the eschatological message of the prophets which are associated with them will now be briefly developed and presented in their relationship with one another, but without special attention to their historical appearance or any degree of completeness in the examples. In this connection the expression "judgment" is not used in the narrower sense as forensic action, but in a more general sense as the punishing and destroying intervention of God. For the term "judgment" in the narrower sense, see DAY OF JUDGMENT.

The attainment of the dominion of God demands victory over the enemies of Yahweh by those faithful to him, not only in the cosmic (Isa. 27:1) but also in the historical realms (Isa. 10:24-27). Yahweh sits in judgment over all that is ungodly, not in blind wrath, but to destroy sin: over the foreign gods (Zeph. 2:11), over the heathen nations (Jer. 25:15 ff; Ezek. 25–32), but also over the sins of his own people (Hos. 4:1-2; Mic. 6:1 ff) and some of its representatives (Jer. 11:21-23; 20:1-6). Various forces for punishment—from nature and from history—are available to God in doing this: the sword, hunger, and pestilence (Jer. 14:12; Ezek. 6:11-12); fire (Amos 1:4 ff); earthquakes (Amos 2:13); etc. Less specific threats of the peril of war (Amos 5:3), of deportation (5:5; 6:7), of a nation from afar (Isa. 5:26 ff; Jer. 5:15-17), may, in accordance with the course of history, be actualized in the historically hostile powers, the Assyrians (Isaiah) or the Babylonians (Jeremiah). Judgment is carried out according to the law of the talion (Isa. 33:1; Jer. 50:29). The oracle of judgment arises, not out of reflection on the moral conditions of the people, but primarily out of confrontation with the holy God who will appear, whom the people must meet (Amos 4:12). Many threats of judgment, therefore, are not provided at all with an ethical basis by words of reprimand. Nor is the apprehension of political catastrophes the decisive factor. In Amos and Hosea, in the early teaching of Isaiah and Jeremiah, the connection of a threat of judgment with the actual political situation is not at all prominent. That Yahweh himself and not some neutral fate is at the center of the prophecy of judgment, can also be seen by the prominent place occupied by the talk of the "DAY OF THE LORD" or of "that day," all the way from the earliest to the most recent time.

But right here it can be shown that the proclamations of judgment and of salvation belong together, by their very nature. Pure prophecy of calamity or pure prophecy of salvation is an abstraction. The Day of the Lord signifies at the same time the destruction of all ungodly powers and the deliverance of those who are loyal to Yahweh, of the REMNANT. While the people of Israel in the days of Amos regard themselves confidently as the remnant to whom salvation will be allotted on the Day of the Lord, the prophet also includes in his sermon of judgment the chosen people who have become apostate (Amos 3:2). That Yahweh may, nevertheless, permit a remnant to survive the judgment rests entirely within his free jurisdiction (5:15: "may be"); but it is assured for the prophet for himself and his followers, and also probably for a renewed kingdom of Judah (9:11). The paradoxical union of love and holiness of God is reflected thus in the polaric tension between proclamation of doom and proclamation of salvation in most of the biblical prophets. The preponderance of the one or the other type depends upon the people addressed and the state of affairs at the moment. Before the great judgment in exile the proclamation of doom predominates; there is only slight mention of a salvation that shines through after it (Isa. 1:25-26; 2:1-5; 9:1-6; 11:1-9; Hos. 2:16 ff; Amos 9:11; Mic. 5:1 ff). But as soon as the judgment has taken place, there is the change back to the prophecy of salvation (Deutero-Isaiah; Ezekiel); the prophecy of disaster is at the edge, but is not entirely lacking (Joel 3:4-5; Mal. 3:5).

The salvation to which Yahweh raised his people, from death in exile to new life, is, as previously, the judgment of God, a voluntary sovereign act. It cannot be traced back ethically as reward for better behavior or conversion of the people (Isa. 43:22 ff). The political situation of the world is also drawn into the promise of salvation only secondarily. In Deutero-Isaiah, King Cyrus of Persia is mentioned only in the polemic limitation against the objections of the heathen or of the exiles weak in faith, not in the primary prophecies of salvation. As to its content the great "change" (Hos. 6:11; Joel 3:1—H 4:1; Amos 9:14; Zeph. 2:7; the expression was applied to the return from exile only subsequently), salvation, which basically again consists of the coming of Yahweh (Isa. 40:9), is expressed in very diverse ways and with the aid of the most varied concepts and traditions. The expectation of a return to the conditions in PARADISE (Isa. 51:3; Hos. 2:20)—abundance of the blessings of the cultivated land (Joel 3:18—4:18; Amos 9:13), long life (Isa. 65:20), PEACE among animals (Isa. 11:6-8), etc.—probably had its origin in myths of nature. Still more often, however, salvation is depicted as an even more glorious return of the good old days of the people of God under Moses or David (for examples see § 1*a above; see* RESTORATION). Yahweh himself is Shepherd and King (Isa. 40:11; 52:7; see SHEEP; KING). The messianic king, usually represented as David or a David redivivus, is considered by many, but not by all of the prophets to be a gift, among others, of the time of salvation (see MESSIAH, JEWISH). The role which the city of JERUSALEM is to play in the final drama should also be mentioned.

2. Pre-exilic eschatology. As soon as faith observes God's continual activity in history, there arises a sort (probably still very simple) of eschatology: God's intervention in the past comes to be expected—even more glorious—for the future. Eschatology is as old as the belief that God has chosen his people and is guiding them at present. Our sources enable us to recognize the eschatological expectations more fully only beginning with the biblical prophets; however, they are already present in the earlier period too and are tangible in traces.

a. Preprophetic expectations. Among the nomads in the time of the patriarchs the promise of a land of plenty made by the ancestral gods, who operated in the historical sphere, plays an important role (Gen. 15:7, 18). In the present connection, however, only their fulfilment is still recalled. After the annexation of the land and in the days of the early kings hopes for national salvation are found in the prophecies of Balaam (Num. 23-24), in the Blessing of Jacob (Gen. 49), and in the Blessing of Moses (Deut. 33). Their themes are Israel's victory over enemies (Num. 24:8; Deut. 33:17) and the happiness of paradise (Gen. 49:11-12, 22; Num. 24:6-7; Deut. 33:13 ff). Here we already find, too, a forerunner of the belief in a Messiah (Gen. 49:10; Num. 24:17; see MESSIAH, JEWISH). It is a question only of the greatness of Israel, but scarcely of the fate of the nations. However, this is different in the programmatic outline of the story of salvation which the author of the Yahweh document has sketched (probably tenth century B.C.) in Gen. 12:1-3. After the Fall the world is under God's curse. In the midst of this account of calamity (Gen. 3–11) Yahweh, by the choosing of Abraham, now begins his story of salvation, which has as its ultimate goal the salvation of all mankind, brought about through Israel. Finally, we can gather a few more ideas concerning the hopes for the future handed down among the people from the words of the biblical prophets. Amos, in his prophecy, starts from popularly held eschatological expectations (Amos 5:18). See DAY OF THE LORD.

b. Amos. In the eschatology of the first literary prophet the prophecy of doom is preponderant. In a series of visions (7:1-8; 8:1-2; 9:1) Amos became convinced that Yahweh would send misfortune upon Israel. To be sure, he proclaims judgment upon the hostile neighbor nations (1:3–2:3) in the style of the national prophecy of salvation which was rooted in their cult and familiar to his hearers, but the words of judgment attached to it strike the Israelites (who at first approve) all the more severely (2:6-16; vss. 4-5 are probably a later addition by which the sermon of punishment was to be made to apply actually to the kingdom of Judah). The proclamation of doom is summed up in the threat of the "Day of the LORD," which is "darkness, and not light" (5:18-20; 8:9: "that day"). The kingdom of the N, together with its dynasty, is to be destroyed (7:9, 11; 9:8); war (3:11; 5:3; 6:14) and deportation (5:27; 6:7; 7:11), earthquakes (2:13; 6:11) and mass death (5:16-17; 6:9-10; 8:3), come upon the people. However, deliverance is not impossible for those who seek Yahweh and his will (5:4, 6, 14):

> It may be that the LORD, the God of hosts, > will be gracious to the remnant of Joseph (5:15).

Positive prophecies of salvation are found only in 9:11-15: the kingdom of David will arise again in its old greatness (vss. 11-12); and with that a new time of salvation begins after the judgment (vss. 13-15). The expectations in this message, still definitely bearing the imprint of the prophetic experience and the direct charge of proclamation, have not yet been expanded into a system of ultimate events. Israel is very much in the foreground, even when the calamity sent by Yahweh concerns her neighbors. The concepts of a last judgment, the end of the world, or a renewal of the world are still entirely lacking.

c. Hosea. Hosea, too, has the obligation of proclaiming calamity over Israel. As punishment for its sins (4:1 ff), especially for its defection to Baal of Canaan (2:13—H 2:15; 9:10), enemies will come upon Israel (5:8-9; 10:14-15; 13:16—H 14:1). Kingdom and cult will cease (3:4; 9:4; 10:2, 8); the people must go into exile (9:3, 6, 17; 11:5). The prophet is not concerned with a political forecast: Assyria and Egypt, paradoxically, stand side by side as the goal of the Exile. Rather, he is greatly concerned that it is Yahweh who sends the disaster (5:12, 14). Just because the relation between Yahweh and Israel—and not political foresight or a rigid doctrine of retribution—is the central point, promises of salvation can appear with the prophet, even more strongly than with Amos and more organically tied in with the judgment sermon. For Yahweh, in spite of everything, remains true to his love for Israel (3:1; 11:1 ff, 8-9). The goal, which he seeks to attain by pedagogic punishments (2:6-7—H 2:8-9; 3:4-5), is the restoration of their first love (2:14—H 2:16) in a wonderful, new, eternal relationship which includes the return of Israel (2:19 ff—H 2:21 ff; 3:5; 14:1 ff—H 14:2 ff). The glance at the nations of the world is missing in Hosea, likewise the messianic expectation (the words "and David their king" in 3:5 are probably a later, Judaic addition to the prophecy of the N Israelite).

d. Isaiah. We can single out only a few especially characteristic or new aspects of the diverse eschatological prophecy of Isaiah in the various periods of his activity. We find here for the first time, in addition to the prophecy which concerns only Israel or individual foreign nations, an eschatology with universal features. A general last judgment falls upon the pride and idolatry which oppose the claim of supremacy of the majestic God of the universe (2:10-21). The prophecy against the world power Assyria (14:24-27) closes with the announcement that Yahweh will lay his hand upon the whole earth and all the nations (vss. 26-27). The same is true also of the proclamation of salvation: all nations will someday make a pilgrimage to Mount Zion and establish a kingdom of peace under the rule of Yahweh (2:2-4).

Furthermore, Isaiah is the first prophet with whom there appears a well-developed conception of a plan of God (5:19; 14:24, 26-27; 28:29; 30:1). The ultimate goal of this plan, the establishment of the holiness and glory of Yahweh among his people and in the whole world, is already anticipated in the hymn of praise of the seraphim, which Isaiah hears when he is called (6:3). The realization of Yahweh's claim to sovereign authority means, first of all, judgment upon his people and their leaders (3:1 ff, 16 ff; 5:8 ff; etc.), and also upon the insubordinate foreign nations (10:5 ff; 14:24 ff; 17:1 ff). However, in addition to this radical judgment, which the prophet himself has to call forth by his sermons which dull the understanding of the people (6:9 ff), Isaiah proclaims a refining judgment (1:24-28) which permits a restoration of the former righteous state of affairs (vs. 26). Yahweh's plan of judgment against his people is also strange and wonderful to the prophet (28:21, 29; 29:14). It crosses the self-willed plans of Israel (29:15; 30:1), but also those of the other nations (7:5-7; 8:9-10; 10:5 ff). This plan does not signify a rigid program; Yahweh's freedom to act one way or another continues to be preserved (28:23 ff).

But we cannot stop with this negative side of the establishment of Yahweh's claim of sovereign authority. Even if the term "plan" is not used for God's impending act of salvation, God's plan of salvation is nevertheless outlined in the background of the judgment, a plan which Isaiah, in ranges of ideas not always completely consistent, may first have presented only to a smaller group of followers. As in Amos, the idea of a REMNANT also appears in Isaiah (1:8-9; 7:3). It indicates the existence of a preceding judgment; and at the same time, it limits the scope of that judgment, since it forms a bridge between calamity and salvation. The remnant is personified in the first-born son of the prophet with the symbolic name SHEAR-JASHUB, "A remnant shall repent" (7:3). The prophet himself, whose sins were forgiven in his experience of being called (6:5-7), together with his children and disciples, constitutes for the coming community the pledge of salvation (8:16-18; 14:32). Out of the tradition of the Songs of Zion (Pss. 46; 48; 76) are drawn the promises in which Mount Zion occupies the central position (Isa. 10:12; 14:32; 31:4-5). On Mount Zion, Yahweh will lay a precious cornerstone, the foundation for the new structure of the time of salvation, which is founded on faith (28:16). Beyond Israel, Mount Zion, as center of Yahweh's kingdom of peace, acquires significance for all nations (2:2-4). Alongside the idea of the remnant and the promise of the preservation of Zion there is, finally, also the messianic hope of Isaiah (7:10 ff[?]; see IMMANUEL; 9:2-7—H 9:1-6; 11:1-9; see MESSIAH, JEWISH). The connection with the actual political situation and with the threat of calamity is especially clear in the case of the Immanuel prophecy. The faithless dynasty in Jerusalem will be redeemed by the Messiah, who will establish a kingdom of peace and justice.

Isaiah probably always expects the arrival of the eschatological events in the near future, without, however, assigning definite dates; which might encroach upon God's freedom. The intimate and tense relation between eschatology and history in the case of Isaiah is revealed also in the fact that several times in the pursuit of his commission to put into effect Yahweh's desire for dominion among his people, he dared to express specific prophecies, which were directly political and, in part, limited as to time. In the war with Syria and Ephraim (734/33) he foretold the failure of the hostile attack, without removing thereby the basic threat to Judah (7:5-7, 16; 8:4). During the uprising of Ashdod (713-711) he symbolized the impending defeat of the ally of Egypt (ch. 20). In the siege of Jerusalem by Sennacherib (701) he proclaimed the collapse of the hostile efforts (37:33-35). These political prophecies, of which ch. 20 was not literally fulfilled, must not be mistaken for the real eschatological prophecy of the judgment and deliverance of Yahweh, although they can be understood only in connection with it.

e. Micah. The eschatological prophecy in the parts of the book originating with Micah reminds us, in many respects, of that of his predecessor and contemporary Isaiah. Zion and Jerusalem are, however, also not excepted from the judgment which is to be expected (3:12; cf. Jer. 26:18). Micah expects the true ruler from Bethlehem (Mic. 5:2-6—H 5:1-5). He will deliver Israel from Assyria and establish a kingdom of peace to the ends of the earth.

f. Zephaniah. For Zephaniah a close association of the national eschatology with a marked universal expectation is characteristic. The judgment of the idolatrous and faithless Judah and Jerusalem (1:4 ff) is introduced by the announcement of a last judgment, which will sweep away everything (1:2-3). The earth is to be consumed by the fire of the wrath of Yahweh (3:8). Correspondingly, judgment is passed in more traditional forms on neighbor nations, specified individually, who in their pride boasted in the face of the people of the Lord of Hosts (2:10). The main theme of the prophecy of judgment in Zephaniah, however, is the proclamation of the great and terrible Day of the LORD (1:7 ff, 14-18; 2:2-3; 3:8), in which destruction is coming upon the whole world and all its inhabitants (1:18; 3:8). Evident here too is the truly prophetic imminent expectation of the catastrophe:

> The great day of the LORD is near,
> near and hastening fast
> (1:14; cf. vs. 7).

But the announcement of judgment is not the final word. As in the case of Amos, there exists in the warning of Zephaniah also the possibility that the remnant which seeks the right, justice, and humility (cf. Mic. 6:8) will be spared on the day of judgment. For this remnant there first come into question the "poor in the land," those who cannot depend upon their own resources. The "perhaps" leaves room for the free action of God. The remnant is also mentioned in the words against the foreign nations and in the promises of salvation. The remnant will triumph over its enemies (2:9). A purified humble and lowly people will seek refuge in the name of the Lord (3:11-13). Unless we are dealing here with later additions to his proclamation, the nations will also have a share in the salutary change (2:11; 3:9-10).

g. Jeremiah. While Nahum's and Habakkuk's prophecies of national salvation yield but little for our topic, the eschatology of Jeremiah shows a few new features—in addition to many already known. In his case, too, the preaching of judgment does not stem from his knowledge of the threatening political situation, although the political events have influenced the form of the threats of judgment more than in the case of any other prophet. The reason for the divine judgment of wrath is the disloyalty of the chosen people (ch. 2). In several passages it is Yahweh himself who brings destruction upon Judah and Jerusalem (9:9—H 9:10; 10:18; 13:26; 16:16-17; 18:17; 21:4 ff). Moreover, the execution of the judgment is pictured throughout the book in the most varied pictures of desolation and distress caused by enemies. The "enemy from the north" who plays a prominent role here (chs. 4–6) is at first simply a mysterious image, probably taken from tradition (cf. Isa. 5:27 ff). At the time of the approach of the Babylonians under King Nebuchadnezzar, this threat acquires historic clarity. That in this case it is not merely a matter of a purely historical prophecy, but rather of actualization of the old eschatological threat of judgment by taking political events into consideration, is shown by the remarkable juxtaposition of nonhistorical prophecies and others which can be understood only as purely historical (e.g., Jer. 21:7-9 alongside vs. 10). In contradistinction to earlier prophets, the calamity here is no longer only viewed primarily as visionary—for the future—but is actually experienced by Jeremiah in the catastrophe of Jerusalem. Given this close relationship of history and eschatological judgment, we can speak of the development of an actualizing eschatology (of disaster). On the other hand, the change to salvation in Jeremiah is still expected entirely in the prevailing form—for the future; for salvation is meant only for those against whom divine punishment has been carried out. A promise of salvation is first granted to the exiles from the kingdom of the N (3:12-13; 30–31). It is relatively modest, almost without marvelous features; but it brings, nevertheless, new, permanent conditions unknown until then (31:22, 31-34, 35-37). Then Yahweh takes pity on those who were deported with Jehoiakim in 597 (24:5-7; 29:10-14) and finally on the remnant in Judah who survived the catastrophe (23:4-6; 32:15 ff; 33:4 ff). Some of the exiles return (3:14; 24:6; 29:10) and live happily under good government (23:4); Jerusalem is rebuilt (33:4 ff). The messianic hope does not play an important role (23:5-6). The total inner renewal (24:7) should be emphasized, as it is powerfully expressed, above all in the prophecy of the new COVENANT (31:31-34). A universal eschatology is scarcely present in Jeremiah. To be sure, the foreign nations around Judah also fall under the judgment of Yahweh (25:15 ff; 27:3 ff; 46–49; cf. also 1:5; 36:2); but (except in additions to the prophecy of Jeremiah) we hear neither of their final destruction nor of any hope of a salvation intended for them.

3. Exilic and postexilic eschatology. a. Ezekiel. Ezekiel, who has much in common with Jeremiah, still belongs in the period of transition. Here, too, eschatology is concentrated entirely upon the people of Israel. To be sure, Ezekiel, in the traditional manner, turns against the neighbor nations (ch. 25); but he, too, has no knowledge of a really universal eschatology. Like Jeremiah, Ezekiel is concerned not only with outward, but also with inner, rebirth of the nation (11:19-20; 36:26-27). On the other hand, more emphasis now falls upon individual retribution, without thereby giving up the hope for the completion of the reign of God in favor of a purely individual eschatology. Between the catastrophe of 587 and the deliverance is inserted a judgment of purification (20:33-38). While Ezekiel, up until the fall of Jerusalem, untiringly proclaims the unavoidable, absolute judgment (chs. 4–24; the idea of a remnant, as in the case of Jeremiah, is not used), there appears subsequently the change to a message of hope (chs. 36–37; 40–48). For the sake of the honor of his name, Yahweh will permit the people to rise again from the death of exile and lead them back to their own country (37:1-14), which will be like a Garden of Eden (36:35). God will turn completely to his people once more (36:28; 37:27-28; 48:35) and let them be ruled by his shepherd David (34:23; 37:24). A new temple (chs. 40–46), from which flows a life-giving stream (47:1-12), rounds out the picture of salvation, which is distinguished from that of Jeremiah by its marvelous heavenly colors, as well as by a certain formal arrangement qualified by penetrating reflection.

b. Deutero-Isaiah. The anonymous prophet in Isa. 40–55 represents a pure eschatology of salvation. The judgment has already taken place (40:1-2; 51:17-20); the time of salvation is immediately ahead (40:3 ff; 51:21-23). God comes with might for the deliverance of his people (40:10), not to reward them for their merit (43:22-25), but solely on the basis of his will to choose them (41:8-10) and of his mercy (54:7-8). Deutero-Isaiah awaits the return of Israel into its own country as a second wonderful exodus (43:14-21; 48:20-21; 51:10-11; 52:11-12; 55:12). Jerusalem and its temple shall be rebuilt (44:28). Yahweh reigns as King of Zion (52:7-8) in a kingdom of security and salvation (51:3; 54:13-14). But the enemies of Israel will be destroyed (47; 51:23). Faithful to the promise of mercy given to David, Yahweh makes an eternal covenant with Israel (55:3). Alongside this eschatology of national salvation we also find evident in Deutero-Isaiah a universal hope of salvation (previously to be probably found only in Isa. 2:2-4). The servant of Yahweh (see SERVANT OF THE LORD) has a divine commission to bring justice, light, and deliverance to the nations (42:1-4, 6-7), and thereby to extend the covenant of God to the entire world (vs. 6). His mission for the world is described explicitly in 49:6:

> It is too light a thing that you should be my servant > to raise up the tribes of Jacob > and to restore the preserved of Israel;
> I will give you as a light to the nations, > that my salvation may reach to the end of the earth.

Also outside the songs of the Servant of the Lord the prophet expects the turn of the heathen to the God of Israel (45:23; 51:4-5; 55:4-5). In contradistinction to the eschatology of salvation of the earlier prophets, the coming of the Lord and the exaltation of Israel are not merely foretold for the future, but are described as already being in process of accomplishment. Here, even more distinctly than in Jeremiah's prophecy of doom, we have an actualizing eschatology. In form this eschatological expectation, which no longer merely proclaims in advance, but actually experiences a present reality, is distinguished by the fact that it no longer employs the customary type of promise, but uses that of the oracle of salvation and restoration. In content it shows itself in the fact that, without further ado, it fits the historic person of CYRUS, king of the Persians, into the eschatological events as the instrument of God (beside the servant of God; 41:2-3, 25; 44:28; 45:1, 13; 46:11; 48:14). The extravagant pictures of the prophecy of Deutero-Isaiah, which include all of nature in what takes place (40:4; 44:23; 55:12), do not allow us to infer a doctrine of cosmic catastrophes of the type of the later apocalyptic expectations (50:2-3; 51:6; 54:10). Hitherto existing conditions and future conditions are not separated by the end of the world, but run over directly into each other. The fact that a genuine eschatology is present is shown by Deutero-Isaiah's preference for the concept of salvation as a new creation (41:20; 45:8; 48:7), a new in contrast to the old (42:9; 43:18-19; 48:6-8). See NEW.

c. Haggai and Zechariah. In Haggai and Zechariah, in a period of eschatological high tension, we encounter once more a strongly actualizing eschatology. The time of salvation (Hag. 2:15-19) begins with the beginning of the construction of the temple. The visions by night of Zech. 1–6 depict God's measures for the establishment of his kingdom in Jerusalem. From the shaking of the world and the nations, the Persian governor ZERUBBABEL emerges as the messianic ruler (Hag. 2:20-23; Zech. 6:9-14). The imminent expectation of the end of time receives a point of crystallization in a historical figure. The arrangement of the text in Zech. 6:9-14 shows how the messianic expectation was later severed from its contemporary historical connection and put off into the future.

d. Anonymous postexilic eschatology. In postexilic times the prophetic charisma is gradually obliterated. With the exception of Joel, not one of the numerous authors of the minor prophetic writings or of the additions to the older prophetic writings is known by name (Obadiah is probably exilic; MALACHI was originally not a proper name). As to its content, the prophetic inheritance is handed down extensively, also actualized (cf. Isa. 16:13-14; 24:16-17), explained, and defended against objections. An accurate dating of the individual passages is, in most cases, no longer possible.

The influence of Deutero-Isaiah's prophecy of salvation appears in many passages in Isa. 56–66 (the so-called Trito-Isaiah), especially in 57:14-19; 60–62; 65:15-25; 66:5-24 (cf. also Pss. 96; 98). The creation of a new heaven and a new earth (Isa. 65:17; 66:22) is aimed at first only at the wonderful transformation of the present conditions at the time of salvation (cf. 65:18 ff), not, as yet, at the cosmologically anchored apocalyptic doctrine of the destruction of the old world and the coming of the new aeon (Enoch 91:16-17; Jub. 1:29; cf. Rev. 21:1). In the exultant description of the period of salvation, universalistic features are also not lacking:

> My house shall be called a house of prayer > for all peoples (Isa. 56:7; cf. 66:23), although Israel always occupies the central position. Further postexilic passages that speak of a turning of the nations to Yahweh or Jerusalem are found in the additions to the book of Isaiah (11:10; 17:7-8; 18:7; 19:18-25), to Jeremiah (3:17; 12:15-16; 16:19), and to Zechariah (2:11—H 2:15; 8:20-23; 14:16).

Naturally, the descriptions of a universal judgment are more frequent than the prophecies of a universal salvation. A powerful representation of the Day of the Lord is found within a threat against Babylon in Isa. 13:5-16. In Isa. 34–35 a judgment of the nations of cosmic proportion (34:2-4) introduces the judgment upon Edom (34:5-17). This is followed by the deliverance of Zion, depicted in a style completely dependent on Deutero-Isaiah (ch. 35). The reference to an older document of revelation (34:16) is characteristic of the late eschatology and apocalyptic writing, which can be understood as an exegesis of the words of the prophets. In the supplement to the book of Obadiah the "day of the LORD . . . upon all the nations" (vs. 15*a*) likewise introduces the triumph of Israel and the judgment upon Edom (vss. 16-21).

A universal judgment is expected also by Malachi and Joel. In Malachi the Day of the Lord comes burning like an oven upon all the arrogant and evildoers (4:1-3—H 3:19-21). The announcement: "Behold, I send my messenger to prepare the way before me" (3:1), by which the prophet himself was probably meant, is new. A subsequent explanation of it points to the returning prophet ELIJAH as this forerunner (4:5-6—H 3:23-24); this fact had a strong influence in the apocalypses of the NT period. Joel 1-2 interprets a plague of grasshoppers and drought as signs of the nearness of the Day of the Lord (1:15; 2:1-11). To this prophecy of real importance for that particular time are joined discussions of individual features of the approaching end of time, which, in part, already show an apocalyptic interest: outpouring of the Spirit (2:28-29—H 3:1-2), portents of the Day of the Lord in the heavens and on earth (2:30-31—H 3:3-4), announcement, preparation and execution of the judgment against the nations in the Valley of Jehoshaphat (3:1-3, 9-12, 13-17—H 4:1-3, 9-12, 13-17; see JEHOSHAPHAT, VALLEY OF), the time of Judah's prosperity (3:18-21—H 4:18-21). The conception of the judgment of the nations before Jerusalem may be derived from passages such as Isa. 14:25; 30:27 ff. In similar fashion the expectation of the "enemy from the north" (Jer. 3-6; 10:22; 50:9, 41-42) and his defeat (Joel 2:20) was described in more detail in the Gog prophecy of Ezek. 38:1-39:22 (see GOG AND MAGOG). The occupation of the scribes with earlier prophecies is revealed clearly in Ezek. 38:17; 39:8. It is not a question of an impending eschatological event, but of a happening "after many days . . . in the latter years" (38:8) and "in the latter days" (38:16), after Israel has long since returned to its land and lives there in security (38:8, 11-12, 14). The combination of exegesis of the prophetic tradition and the arrangement of the final events into separate acts of a drama, as well as the pseudonym behind which the author conceals himself, show that the transition to apocalyptic writing is under way.

Signs of the late eschatology based on the older prophetic literature show also in the pictures of the future in Zech. 12-14. The author or authors occupy themselves not only with the familiar ideas of the annihilation of the nations, the purification and exaltation of Israel, etc., but also with noteworthy individual features—e.g., with topographical details of the splitting of the Mount of Olives when Yahweh fights against the nations (14:4-5), or with physical changes of the landscape of Judah (vss. 8, 10). The cold of winter and the darkness of night will cease (vs. 6).

The so-called Isaiah apocalypse in Isa. 24-27 is not a genuine apocalypse, but probably a rather late composition of prophecies and songs with grandiose eschatological imagery. It begins with the threat of devastation of the whole world (24:1 ff). After the punishment of heavenly and earthly enemies Yahweh will reign as King of Zion (24:21-23). The heathen, too, will take part in a feast on Mount Zion; death will be destroyed forever, tears will be wiped away (25:6-9). The exiled will return to Jerusalem (27:12-13). With the ideas of the punishment of heavenly powers (24:21), which occur as yet incidentally, and of resurrection of the dead (26:19), the passage approaches the themes of the late Jewish apocalypticism.

4. Apocalyptic eschatology. While individual characteristic ideas and formal signs of late Jewish apocalyptic literature appear here and there, as we have seen, already in postexilic times, a fully developed apocalypticism is present in the OT only in the book of Daniel (for its content, cf. DANIEL; APOCALYPTICISM). Here we must note the essential differences between prophetic and apocalyptic eschatology. In content the new form of eschatology has many things in common with the earlier eschatology. Here, as well as there, it is a matter of the coming of the reign of God, in which the salvation of Israel is completely established. But the path is long from the epigrammatic sayings of an Amos to the pseudonymous, learned revelations of the book of Daniel. Between them lies the transition to a marked transcendentalization of God, which resulted in part from foreign influence. The gulf between the earthly and the heavenly world draws in its wake the development of a doctrine of angels (see ANGEL). Instead of the direct intervention of God in the history of this world, one now expects the destruction of this secularized world and the coming of the new aeon. The direct connection between the present and God's impending act of salvation is broken down. The more impatiently and confusedly they long for the end, the more it becomes the object of speculation and calculation by the scribes, expressed in the style of revealed esoteric doctrine (not as yet in Dan. 2; cf., on the other hand, 7:25; 8:14; 9:27; 12:7, 11-12). Old prophecies of the future are reinterpreted and fitted into a system of period theories and number symbolism (cf. Jer. 29:10; 25:11-12; Dan. 9:2). In this strange form, however, the basis of the OT eschatology, faith in the Lord of history and the world, who will soon establish his kingdom for the salvation of those who acknowledge him, is still vigorously expressed.

Bibliography. H. Gressmann, Der Ursprung der israelitisch-jüdischen Eschatologie (1905). E. Sellin, "Alter, Wesen und Ursprung der alttestamentlichen Eschatologie," Der alttestamentliche Prophetismus (1912), pp. 103-93. W. Cossmann, "Die Entwicklung des Gerichtsgedankens bei den alttestamentlichen Propheten," Beihefte zur ZAW, vol. XXIX (1915). S. Mowinckel, "Das Thronbesteigungsfest Jahwes und der Ursprung der Eschatologie," Psalmenstudien, vol. II (1922). G. Hölscher, Die Ursprünge der jüdischen Eschatologie (1925). N. Micklem, Prophecy and Eschatology (1926). O. Procksch, "Eschatologie," RGG, II (2nd ed., 1928), 329-39. H. Gressmann, Der Messias (1929). R. Volz, "Der eschatologische Glaube im AT," Festschrift G. Beer (1935), pp. 72-87. E. Sellin, "Die Lehre des AT vom göttlichen Gericht und vom göttlichen Heil," Theologie des AT, II (2nd ed., 1936), 77-142. J. Begrich, "Studien zu Deuterojesaja," BWANT, Vierte Folge, Heft 25 (1938). W. E. Müller, Die Vorstellung vom Rest im AT (1939). G. Pidoux, Le Dieu qui vient (1947). L. Černý, The Day of Yahweh and Some Relevant Problems (1948). W. Eichrodt, "Bundesbruch und Gericht," and "Die Vollendung des Bundes," Theologie des AT, I (5th ed., 1957), 309-49. W. Zimmerli, "Gericht und Heil im alttestamentlichen Prophetenwort," Der Anfang, Zehlendorfer Vorträge (1949), pp. 21-46. C. Steuernagel, "Die Strukturlinien der Entwicklung der jüdischen Eschatologie," Festschrift für Alfred Bertholet (1950), pp. 479-87. J. Fichtner, "Jahves Plan in der Botschaft des Jesaja," ZAW, LXIII (1951), 16-33. G. A. F. Knight, "Eschatology in the OT," Scottish Journal of Theology, IV (1951), 355 ff. H.-J. Kraus, "Die Königsherrschaft Gottes im AT," Beiträge zur historischen Theologie, vol. XIII (1951). S. B. Frost, "Eschatology and Myth," Vetus Testamentum, II (1952), 70-80; OT Apocalyptic (1952). E. Würthwein, "Der Ursprung der prophetischen Gerichtsrede im Kult," ZThK, XLIX (1952), 1-16. W. Zimmerli, "Verheissung und Erfüllung," Evangelische Theologie, XII (1952), 34-59. F. Hesse, "Wurzelt die prophetische Gerichtsrede im israelitischen Kult?" ZAW, LXV (1953), 45-53. L. Köhler, "Heil durch Gericht," and "Heil durch Erlösung," Theologie des AT (3rd ed., 1953), pp. 208-30. J. Lindblom, "Gibt es eine Eschatologie bei den alttestamentlichen Propheten?" Studia Theologica, VI (1953), 79-114; "Historia och eskatologi hos de gammaltestamentliga profeterna," Talenta quinque (1953), pp. 13-24. T. C. Vriezen, "Prophecy and Eschatology," Supplements to Vetus Testamentum, I (1953), 199-229. E. Jenni, "Die Rolle des Kyros bei Deuterojesaja," Theologische Zeitschrift, X (1954), 241-56. E. Jacob, "L'achèvement," Théologie de l'AT (1955), pp. 254-75. S. Mowinckel, He That Cometh (trans. G. W. Anderson; 1955). E. Jenni, "Die politischen Voraussagen der Propheten," Abhandlungen zur Theologie des Alten und Neuen Testaments, vol. XXIX (1956). M. Noth, "Das Geschichtsverständnis der alttestamentlichen Apokalyptik," Gesammelte Studien zum AT (1957), pp. 248-73. E. Rohland, Die Bedeutung der Erwählungstraditionen Israels für die Eschatologie der alttestamentlichen Propheten (1956). T. C. Vriezen, "Das Königreich Gottes in der Zukunftserwartung," Theologie des AT in Grundzügen (1957), pp. 302-22. E. JENNI

ESCHATOLOGY OF APOC. AND PSEUDEP.

The extra-canonical books known in modern times as the APOCRYPHA and the PSEUDEPIGRAPHA were written, for the most part, between the beginning of the second century B.C. and the close of the first century A.D.; hence they are also known as the intertestamental literature. A number of these writings, especially those of the Apoc., contain little or no eschatology, but in others the subjects of the end of this world and of life beyond the grave are given a considerable amount of attention. There is, of course, no uniformity of belief among these books; indeed, because of their composite character, differing, even conflicting, eschatological concepts may be present in a single work. In all probability popular beliefs not found in the OT form the basis of these concepts; and Babylonian, Persian, and even Greek influence can be detected. Certain early Christian eschatological beliefs depend immediately upon ideas found in these writings.

1. General character
2. Sheol
3. Resurrection
4. The Judgment
5. Hellenistic Jewish views
Bibliography

1. General character. This intertestamental eschatology is based, first of all, upon a three-tiered conception of the universe, with this earth as the normal home of man; with heaven (or a series of heavens) above the earth, where God himself dwells; and with a lower world, which may be designated as Sheol (Hades), the place of the departed spirits, or as Gehenna (Hell, Tartarus), the place of punishment of the wicked. At times, and somewhat confusingly, the place of punishment is called Sheol.

Along with this went the belief in the composite nature of man as having two mutually dependent parts, body and soul—both necessary and good, since both had been created by God. The soul is separated from the body at death; beliefs concerning what happened to it following this separation varied. Under certain Hellenistic influences in Dispersion Judaism, some Jews accepted the idea that the soul was immortal, but that the body was unnecessary, if not evil. This idea led to a somewhat different type of eschatological thinking.

The greater number of the intertestamental writings express belief in but one age, this present age of human history, with no expectation that it will ever end. This age, however, was not considered to be static. Instead, in keeping with the nationalistic hopes of the Jews, it was seen as moving toward the establishment of God's theocracy on earth, his reign or kingdom, or, if a messiah were involved, toward a messianic kingdom. The advent of the kingdom would be marked by the punishment of the heathen nations; by the return of the exiles; and by peace, prosperity, and blessedness for Israel. Belief in the resurrection of the dead and in a final judgment often belonged to this expectation.

A basically different view, APOCALYPTICISM, also came into favor. It was characterized by a dualistic cosmic eschatology involving belief in two completely separate and distinct ages: the present, evil, temporal age under Satan's control; and the future, righteous, eternal age under God's immediate dominion. This belief, even more than that of the kingdom of God or of the messianic kingdom, usually provided for a resurrection and a last forensic judgment.

2. Sheol. Within these various frameworks of belief there was a considerable amount of speculation concerning the immediate fate of the soul when it was separated from the body at the time of death. The earlier teaching, in keeping with OT doctrines, was that the souls of both the righteous and the wicked went directly to Sheol at death, there to remain forever as disembodied spirits, or, perhaps, as spirits with shadowy bodies. Sheol was conceived of as a dark, dreary, dismal place under the earth, where no real life was possible. Life in Sheol was a mere existence, shadowy and aimless, sometimes compared to a deep, lasting sleep. Normally it was a place neither of punishment nor of reward; all, both the good and the evil, dwelt there (cf. Ecclus. 14:16; 22:11; 28:21; 30:17; 41:4; Bar. 2:17; 3:3; Tob. 3:6; 14:10).

This basic OT concept of Sheol began to change in the postexilic period. Instead of being the permanent home, Sheol came to be considered as an intermediate place for the departed spirits. In some instances it was the intermediate abode of the righteous only, who in time would leave it for the resurrection (Pss. Sol. 14:6-7; II Macc. 7:9; 14:46). The belief in a particular resurrection of the righteous alone presupposed that the wicked would remain in Sheol, which might then be thought of as a place of punishment. An interesting variation is presented in Enoch 22, where it is stated that Sheol is divided into three separate places. One, with a spring of water, is for the righteous, who eventually will be resurrected. The second is for those among the wicked who died without suffering retribution while on earth; they will be resurrected that they may be punished for their sins. The third will be the final dwelling of those among the wicked who have been adequately punished while living. The doctrine of a general resurrection of the good and bad alike, we should note, assumed that Sheol was an intermediate abode for the souls of all the dead.

For the most part, there was no connection between God and Sheol; indeed, it was taught that there was no knowledge of God in Sheol. An exceptional teaching is given in II Macc. 12:43-45, where Judas Maccabeus made prayers and propitiations to God for his followers who had fallen in battle, that they might be released from their sins to prepare them for the resurrection. This has been used as a proof text for the Roman Catholic doctrine of prayers for the dead in Purgatory, even though Sheol and Purgatory are two quite different conceptions.

Not all the dead, however, went to Sheol. According to the Apocalypse of Moses 33:4, when Adam died, his soul was taken up to Paradise, the third of seven heavens. We read in the Testament of Job that Elihu, who was an evil son of darkness, was cast down to the lower world when he died, but that Job, at his death, was taken by angels up to heaven by the throne of glory, where his children had preceded him. Similarly, there was the belief that the souls of the righteous go to heavenly "treasuries" (or heavenly chambers) at death to await the resurrection, whereas the souls of the wicked descend to Sheol (II Bar. 21:23 ff; 30:2; IV Ezra 7:95). According to IV Ezra, these chambers are guarded by angels, and the righteous who are in them enjoy rest and profound quiet as they wait to be resurrected.

A curious deviation is given in a brief poetic section of Jubilees (23:23-31). Times will gradually get better, God's law will be studied and obeyed, righteousness will become established, men will live to be a thousand years old, and the enemies of Israel will be vanquished. The souls of the righteous dead are in some undefined place, possibly heaven, while their bones rest upon the earth. When they see the kingdom of God established on earth, they are thankful and rejoice, and their bones are at rest. Presumably, but not definitely, the souls of the wicked who have died are in Sheol. There seemingly is no provision in this brief source for a resurrection or a final judgment.

A somewhat similar pattern is presented in the brief apocalyptic poem in Asmp. Moses 10. When the forces of evil that rule this age are overcome, and this age is brought to an end, Israel as a nation will rise to the stars where God dwells and will look down upon her enemy (Rome) on earth, or in Gehenna. Seemingly there is no expectation that the dead will be raised. Likewise, in the Apocalypse of Abraham, when this age of ungodliness under Azazel is ended and God's age of righteousness is inaugurated, the righteous who are alive will enjoy the fruits of Paradise, whereas the wicked will descend to the abyss.

3. Resurrection. It was but just that the righteous dead share in the joys of God's reign or of the messianic kingdom, whether it was thought of as coming in this present age or in the age to come. Likewise, it was only just that the wicked dead be punished. For the most part, the resurrection was to be physical, with the soul coming from Sheol or some other intermediate place to be reunited with the body, which had been buried here on the earth.

In some of the sources the resurrection is to be general—i.e., of both the good and the bad. In the Apocalypse of Moses, all descendants of Adam will be resurrected (41:3). We read in Test. Benj. 10:6-8 that all will be raised, first the patriarchs and heroes of Israel, and then the rest of the righteous and the wicked together. According to Enoch 51, there will be a general resurrection of all from Sheol. The physical nature of the resurrected body is evident in Sibylline Oracles IV.179 ff, for God shall fashion again the bodies of men and raise them up as they were in life. II Bar. 50 states that all the dead will be raised, and at first will be exactly as they were in this life so that they may recognize one another. A somewhat different sequence of events is given in IV Ezra. This present evil age will be followed by an interim of four hundred years, which will be for the Messiah and the righteous who are alive at the end of this age. When the messianic interval is ended, the Messiah and his companions will all die. However, when the new age is inaugurated, there will be a general physical resurrection of everyone (7:32, 37).

In several passages in Enoch, however, only the righteous will be raised (5:8; 61:5; 62:15-16; 90:32-36; 91:10). Contradicting the prediction in Test. Benj. 10:6-8 of a general resurrection, Test. Zeb. 10; Test. Judah 25:4 affirm that the godly alone will be raised, and, according to Judah, the martyrs especially, as seems to be the situation in II Macc. 7:9. Pss. Sol. 3:16 promises that those who fear the Lord will be raised to life eternal. A general resurrection was promised in II Bar. 50; but in ch. 30 of this same book, after the close of the messianic kingdom, when the Messiah is to return to heaven, the souls of the righteous who have been in the heavenly "treasuries" will be resurrected; but apparently the souls of the wicked will remain in Sheol, where they will waste away, knowing that their torment has come.

Not a great deal is said concerning the actual nature of the resurrection body. As noted before, according to Sibylline Oracles IV.179, the resurrected body will be just like the body that was buried. The martyrs in II Macc. 7:11; 14:46 expected to have their maimed and broken bodies restored in the resurrection. Enoch 62:15-16 relates that the bodies of the righteous who are resurrected will be clad in eternal garments of glory. The most detailed account, however, is given in II Bar. 50. At first the resurrected bodies of all who are raised in the general resurrection will be precisely as they were during life. However, they will undergo changes. The bodies of the righteous will, first of all, be glorified until they have the splendor of angels, and then they will be equal to the stars and more glorious than the angels. On the other hand, as the wicked see the glorious transformation of the bodies of the righteous, their own bodies will waste away.

4. The Judgment. Along with the belief in the resurrection went the expectation of a final or eschatological judgment, usually in connection with apocalyptic hope, but also as a part of the establishment of the theocracy in this age. As has been previously indicated, this is a forensic judgment different from the conflict in which the nations are vanquished prior to the establishment of the kingdom or before the end of this age. The pattern for this kind of judgment was probably set in Dan. 7:9-10 (cf. 12:1), with the "ancient of days" seated on his throne as the books are opened, prepared to give judgment. This probably inspired the similar scene in Enoch 47:3, showing the "Head of Days" seated on his throne to pronounce judgment from the opened books of the living that were before him. Similar descriptions are given in Enoch 90:2-27; IV Ezra 7:33 (cf. 6:20). In much the same manner, in the nonapocalyptic passage in II Bar. 24 the books will be opened and the Most High will judge. Actually, the final judgment is perfunctory, almost automatic, for people are judged by what they have done, as their deeds are inscribed in the heavenly books. Other references to the final judgment are less colorful. In Test. Benj. 10:6-8 it is merely stated that there will be a judgment, of the Israelites first and then of the Gentiles. Jth. 16:17 simply warns that there will be a day of judgment. A curious feature in some sources is that fallen angels, as well as human beings, will be judged (Jub. 5:10 ff; Enoch 10:6; 16:1; 19:1; 90:20-27).

God is usually the judge, as might be expected. However, contrary to other passages in Enoch, according to 45:3; 69:27-29 the heavenly Messiah, the Elect One or SON OF MAN, instead of God, will sit on a throne and pronounce judgment.

For the most part, the eschatological punishments of the wicked and rewards for the righteous have been indicated. As a rule the ungodly (usually Gentiles, at times apostate Jews) will be consigned to Gehenna or some other place of eternal punishment, usually in the lower world, where they will be continually tortured by fire and at times be eaten by worms. The righteous, on the other hand, will be rewarded in Paradise, in heaven, or on earth. If the last, they may live in a renewed earth, one that is marvelously productive, perhaps (cf. II Bar. 29). Or they may live in the heavenly Jerusalem or in the heavenly Garden of Eden come down to earth. The tree of life is another promise of reward. There will be a surcease of all sin, sickness, toil, oppression, persecution, and even death. Furthermore, the righteous will be in the presence of God, or, in messianic kingdoms, in the presence of the Messiah.

5. Hellenistic Jewish views. Finally, the eschatological views of Hellenistic Jewish sources deserve attention. Philo the Alexandrian philosopher probably represents an extreme view. For him the soul, which was pre-existent in heaven, was good, but the body of matter was evil, was indeed the prison house of the soul. At death each soul would leave its body-prison permanently; the souls of those who had lived good lives would return to heaven to an eternity of blessedness, but the souls of those who had lived evil lives would go to Tartarus to an eternity of punishment. The resurrection of the body was unthinkable; there would be no final judgment as in the sources that have been considered.

The Wisdom of Solomon, while retaining the more traditional view of a theocratic kingdom of indefinite duration in which the Jews who are alive at the time will judge the nations (3:7-8), in general holds to quite a different view, which resembles Philo's. The soul, pre-existent in heaven (8:20), is imprisoned in the body of matter temporarily (9:15). When he dies, each individual is judged personally; the wicked are sentenced to eternal punishment, but the righteous are rewarded with an eternity of blessedness and joy with God and his angels (ch. 5).

IV Maccabees is a martyrological treatise, with Stoic overtones, on the supremacy of reason over the passions, thus encouraging the persecuted to endure torture and death impassively. The wicked are not only punished in this life, but in addition at the time of their death their souls will enter upon an eternity of punishment by fire (9:9; 12:12). As for the righteous, the martyrs, when they are put to death, their souls will ascend to heaven, where Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob will receive them (13:17). Their glorious life throughout eternity will be in direct contrast both to their sufferings on earth and to the everlasting torments inflicted upon their persecutors (10:15).

Bibliography. E. Kautzsch, Die Apokryphen und Pseudepigraphen des Alten Testaments (2 vols.; 1900). R. H. Charles, The Apoc. and Pseudep. of the OT (2 vols.; 1913); A Critical History of the Doctrine of a Future Life in Israel, in Judaism, and in Christianity (1913). H. H. Rowley, The Relevance of Apocalyptic (rev. ed., 1946). See also the bibliographies under APOCRYPHA; PSEUDEPIGRAPHA.

M. RIST

ESCHATOLOGY OF THE NT. The spiritual climate in which the eschatology of the NT arose was thoroughly Hebraic-Jewish. This was true even of such writings as those of Paul, the Fourth Gospel, II Peter, and Revelation, all of which, there is every reason to believe, were either written on Greek soil or intended in large part for Gentile readers. The Greek culture made no direct contribution in this area save for a few verbal substitutions for Semitic equivalents (e.g., ᾅδης, "Hades," for Sheol; χριστός, "Christ," for Messiah; διάβολος, "devil," for Satanas; αἰών, "aeon," for 'ôlām, and the like)—substitutes which persisted even in translation from the Greek. Moreover, such contributions as other pagan cultures, such as Egyptian and Iranian, had to make in the field of eschatology—and they were by no means inconsiderable—had already been absorbed into the stream of Jewish apocalypticism before the beginning of the Christian era. In consequence, it was through this latter medium alone that such elements were mediated to the Christian church.

1. The Jewish ethos
2. Jesus' eschatological teaching
   a. Diversity of modern interpretations
   b. The phrase "kingdom of God"
   c. Jesus' relation to the kingdom's coming
   d. Time and "signs" of the consummation
3. Popular Jewish Christian beliefs
4. The teaching of the church's scriptures
   a. Fulfilment of OT hope
   b. Kingdom of God and church
   c. Parousia, judgment, end of the age
   d. Resurrection and future life

Bibliography

1. The Jewish ethos. Behind the Jewish culture and forming the matrix out of which it arose was the teaching of the Hebrew prophets. In eschatology, as in every other area of theological teaching, the prophets were pioneers. The differentia by which their eschatological teaching was distinguished was a wholesome sanity coupled with the courageous faith that God would eventually vindicate his righteous rule within history. Beginning with Amos, these prophets foresaw the coming of the "day of the LORD" (5:18), when he would save and judge men on a universal scale (see ESCHATOLOGY OF THE OT). In the Jewish milieu contemporary with the rise of the Christian movement and even centuries earlier, various groups drew upon this common prophetic eschatological deposit, each group interpreting it after its own predilections and in line with its own interests.

The scribal movement which arose out of the harrowing experiences of the Exile, taking its lead from such prophets as Ezekiel and Haggai and spurred on by the ardent nationalism of leaders like Ezra and Nehemiah, compressed the eschatology they took over into a particularistic (nationalistic) mold such as has characterized Judaism ever since. Its normative statement is found in the rabbinic dictum: "All Israelites have a share in the world to come" (M. Sanh. 10.1). The pharisaic doctrine of the resurrection also could find some support in two or three passages of doubtful interpretation in the OT, though its materialistic elaboration (repugnant alike to Sadducee and church) was a scribal contribution without foundation in the Prophets.

From its contacts with Iranian thought during the Exile, Judaism also developed its peculiar brand of apocalyptic eschatology. Thence came the doctrines of the two kingdoms (of God and Satan), with their multitudes of denizens (men, good and bad, and angels and demons, respectively), the two aeons of Time and Eternity, the arranging and dating of the events of the "last times" in a determined series with definite dates, and the teaching regarding the Son of man—a heavenly figure coming "on the clouds of heaven" to judge the world. This apocalyptic eschatology was characterized also by a fantastic elaboration of genuine elements to be found in the Prophets, such as the nature of the viands served up at God's banquet table to his people; but the realization of the divine salvation and the divine "wrath" against man's sin was pushed forward into the eternal order beyond history. See ESCHATOLOGY OF THE APOCRYPHA AND PSEUDEPIGRAPHA.

The nationalistic party within the contemporary Judaism of the first Christian century—the Zealots with the sicarii or "dagger-men"—turned the particularism of both Pharisees and apocalyptists to good purpose. For them the Messiah who was to come would be a "Son of David" who would lead his forces into victorious battle against the enemies of Jewry and set up the throne and kingdom of his ancestor David. It was their self-appointed task, moreover, to discover this Messiah by recognizable "signs" and to aid him in his every activity by armed force. See ZEALOT.

2. Jesus' eschatological teaching. Jesus' eschatological teaching was given largely in Galilee and so usually in the context of the popular Jewish apocalyptic hope. Moreover, after his day it was communicated by preachers and teachers influenced by popular Jewish Christian interpretations of what he had taught, and when the time came for his teachings to be preserved in writing, this again was done by evangelists who had been subjected to the same influences. In consequence, to unravel his teachings from the interpretations put upon them is not an easy task. We cannot always be certain that it is the voice of Jesus to which we are listening and not that of his early interpreters.

a. Diversity of modern interpretations. As a result of what has just been said, very diverse points of view have developed among modern NT scholars relative to what Jesus actually taught on the subject of eschatology; and in all fairness to the student, one cannot elaborate one's own conclusions without placing them in the context of the conclusions of others.

The "old liberal" school held that the eschatological teaching ascribed to Jesus, particularly that found in the Synoptic gospels, was in its entirety that of the Jewish apocalyptic church. Jesus himself, on this view, was the promulgator merely of a simple ethic not unlike that of the rabbinic teaching of his day.

The school of "consistent eschatology"—represented by J. Weiss and Albert Schweitzer—swinging to the opposite extreme, saw in Jesus a full-fledged apocalyptist who conceived himself to be the "Son of man" about to come on the clouds of heaven, with a view to setting up the kingdom of God on earth.

"Form criticism" in the hands of a protagonist like Rudolf Bultmann has done little to support the claims of either of these older schools. For Bultmann, Jesus was nothing more than the "herald" of the kingdom's coming, who called all men to prepare for it by repentance and faith. The kingdom did not come in Jesus' lifetime, nor would it ever come through any human instrumentality (including that of Jesus himself), but only vertically at the hand of God to each person in his "existential" situation.

Nearly opposite to Bultmann's views was the "realized eschatology" of C. H. Dodd. For Dodd consistently held that for Jesus the prophetic eschatological teaching received fulfilment in his incarnate life and ministry; the "day of the Lord" of Amos had arrived; the future had begun to be realized in the present; the kingdom of God had come in Jesus' own person and work.

It is obvious that all these positions and mediating ones which fall between them cannot be right. To an extent they serve, indeed, to cancel one another out. Perhaps the best service they perform is the sharpening of our understanding of the nature of the problems involved in any approach to Jesus' teaching.

b. The phrase "kingdom of God." The sources of the Synoptic gospels appear to agree that Jesus began his ministry in the spirit of the "herald" of Isa. 52:7, announcing that the day had come for God to begin his reign, that his kingdom was about to be realized among men (Mark 1:14-15; Luke 7:22 [Q]; Luke 4:18 ff [L]; Matt. 4:23 [M]). This could only mean that the eschaton of the Hebrew prophets was near at hand and that in some as yet undefined way its coming was associated with the person and work of Jesus himself. Jesus, however, went beyond the somewhat indefinite proclamation to be expected from a mere herald: he also announced that the kingdom had actually arrived and that its power was at work among his hearers. Jesus' casting out of the demons, on his declaration, attested this fact (Luke 11:20 = Matt. 12:28 [Q]), as did his binding of the "strong man" (Satan; Mark 3:27), a phenomenon which Jewish teaching anticipated as happening in the eschaton upon the arrival of God's reign. Further, Jesus distinguished between the prophetic era ending with John the Baptist and that which opened with his own activity (Luke 16:16 = Matt. 11:12 [Q]), declaring that in the latter epoch the "good news of the kingdom of God" was being preached and that "every one" was entering it with violence—admittedly an enigmatic saying difficult of exact interpretation, but one at all events allowing of no doubt that to his mind the kingdom was already present. The saying at Luke 17:21 ("The kingdom of God is in the midst of you"; possibly from Q) is also perhaps to be understood as representing that the kingdom was present and functioning in his day.

T. W. Manson may be right in suggesting that the change in Jesus' teaching from a mere "herald's" announcement of the kingdom's nearness to the proclamation of its arrival occurred as a result of Peter's confession at Caesarea Philippi (Mark 8:27-30), the implication being that Jesus saw in a disciple's declaration of his messiahship the realization of God's de facto lordship in that disciple's life. At all events, it seems clear that Jesus did claim that the kingdom of God had come in his lifetime and that in consequence one may speak of his conviction that the eschaton had at last arrived. It appears equally certain, however, that for Jesus there remained a phase of kingdom experience not fully realized in his time. For he spoke on more than one occasion of a "day" yet to come (Mark 13:32; Luke 10:12 = Matt. 10:15 [Q]), a day on which would occur the judgment of all men (Luke 10:13-15 = Matt. 11:21-23 [Q]; Luke 17:26-27 = Matt. 24:37-39 [Q]; Mark 8:38). Accordingly, he admonished his hearers to prepare for the coming of the kingdom in this consummated sense (Mark 13:33-37; Luke 12:42-46 = Matt. 24:45-51 [Q]; Luke 12:35-40 [L/Q]; Matt. 25:1-12 [M]). For Jesus, therefore, the kingdom of God was at once a present reality and a future expectation: God's power was already at work among men; his judgment of their lives and persons was still to come.

c. Jesus' relation to the kingdom's coming. It appears reasonably certain—from Jesus' actions as well as from the nature of his teaching—that he considered himself as having a leading role in bringing into being both the present and future aspects of God's kingdom. The view has been advanced that Jesus, like the Hebrew prophets, thought of the kingdom of God in terms of a direct relationship between God and man, requiring no mediation on the part of a Messiah or other intermediary. Hence, it is argued, Jesus could have found no place for himself as "Messiah," "Suffering Servant," or "Son of man" to mediate the kingdom to his disciples. This view appears at once to misrepresent the teaching of the Hebrew prophets, to lay undue stress on the individualistic character of the kingdom experience, and to overlook the evidence of what Jesus actually thought of his relation to the coming of the kingdom. It is rather generally agreed that in the older account the appointment of Saul as king through anointing by Samuel was done at the express command of Yahweh (I Sam. 9:1–10:16)—an act of the prophet resulting in the creation of a contemporary messiah ("anointed one") to serve as Yahweh's viceroy among his people. The coronation psalms, moreover, employed in the ritual of the New Year's Festival (Pss. 2, 110; etc.) were intended to memorialize the office of the reigning king and his duties as God's vicegerent. Further, numerous passages in the prophetic literature of the Hebraic tradition looked for the coming of a great leader who should mediate the kingdom among God's people (e.g., Isa. 11:1-10; 49; 53; Jer. 23:1-8; Mic. 5:2 ff). In all these and similar prophetic passages the kingdom of God is a corporate experience mediated to God's people through his anointed representative. In some of them this representative is identified with the "remnant" of the people itself, in others with the contemporary or a shortly-to-arrive "anointed one," in still others with an ideal figure still far off but represented as very real to the prophet's inspired imagination.

It is generally agreed that the "voice" which spoke to Jesus at his baptism quotes from Ps. 2:7; Isa. 42:1—passages relating respectively to the coronation of the contemporary messiah and to the call or ordination of the (suffering) servant of the Lord. If this voice be thought to reflect the awareness of mission on Jesus' part—a view that will accord with the nature of his temptations in which two conceptions of messiahship (Satan's or the popular nationalistic type, and God's—that of a messiah who must win his way through suffering to moral leadership) appear to be struggling for Jesus' acceptance—then it will appear to be clear that from the beginning of his ministry Jesus conceived of himself as the (suffering) Servant-messiah called upon to inaugurate God's kingdom in the world. Jesus' later sayings regarding his "cross," his "baptism," his "cup"—sayings spoken in the context of the kingdom-of-God idea—will also accord with his sense of a mediatorial mission such as that for which the terms "Suffering Servant" and "Messiah" stand (cf. Mark 8:31-33; 10:35-45; etc.). And it will become intelligible that in times of strategic crisis Jesus endeavored to elicit from his disciples (Mark 8:27-30), from the multitudes (Mark 8:34 ff), from the high priest (Mark 14:62; note Matt. 26:64 and the probability that Jesus said, "Am I?" or "Do you say so?"), and from Pilate (Mark 15:2, where again a question may be intended—"Do you say so?"), an expression of faith in himself as God's accredited viceroy.

Jesus' actions confirm the impression gained from his words that he considered himself to be the mediator of the kingdom to God's people. For early in his ministry he began to surround himself with a small band of well-chosen disciples, twelve in all, to serve as a loyal nucleus at a time when opposition was increasing against him—opposition which in the end excluded him from the congregation of the Jewish community (Mark 6:1 ff). Such appointing of one's disciple-band was as exceptional in the Hebrew-Jewish ethos as it would be in our own. Neither prophet nor rabbi chose his own followers—Moses and Elijah by express divine command were exceptions to this rule (Deut. 34:9; I Kings 19:16). Jesus' choice of the Twelve was matched by his declaration that they should "sit on (twelve) thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel" (Matt. 19:28 = Luke 22:30 [Q]). The conclusion appears irresistible that the band of twelve was to form the nucleus of the prophetic "remnant" (the new Israel)—a sort of acted parable representing the new people of God, which, wherever they went with Jesus as their messianic leader at their head, would tell their own story that God's kingdom had at last come in the person and work of his accredited viceroy. The events of passion week—the so-called "triumphal entry" (Mark 11:1-10), the cleansing of the temple (vss. 15-17), and the Last Supper (14:22-25) more particularly—also constitute a series of acted parables in which Jesus, by means of object lessons after the fashion of many of the Hebrew prophets, rather clearly appears to wish to teach his generation that there is in their midst one who is Lord of city and temple, and host at the banquet table of God's kingdom (cf. also the feeding of the four thousand and the five thousand [Mark 6:35-44; 8:1-10]).

The term employed by Jesus to designate his function as mediator of the kingdom was "SON OF MAN," a phrase with a long history behind it. There appears to be a growing conviction among NT scholars that, as used by Jesus, it was intended to have several denotations, including the usual Aramaic usage for "I" or "one," the corporate sense of the "people of God" as in Dan. 7:13, and the titular meaning roughly equivalent to messiah. The originality of our Lord's usage of the term lies, not in his attaching an exaltation motif to it (this it already had in Dan. 7:13; I Enoch 37-71), but rather in the humiliation or suffering motif which he associated with it and which he probably took over from the figure of the Suffering Servant of Yahweh from Deutero-Isaiah and the Psalms (cf. Isa. 53; Pss. 22; 69).

If the above interpretation is correct, then we may conceive of Jesus as seeing the kingdom of God as having arrived in and through his own person and work. As "Son of man" he conceives himself to be God's Messiah or viceroy, who leads forth the "remnant," each member of which with himself bears aloft his cross (Mark 8:34; Luke 14:27), and thus shares in the redemptive task of the "Suffering Servant"; as corporate "Son of man" he believes also that he and his followers will share in the final consummation of the kingdom and God's judgment upon his world and mankind at the end of the age (Mark 13:24-27; Matt. 25:31-46 [M]).

d. Time and "signs" of the consummation. This subject gave the Jewish apocalyptists of Jesus' day much concern. They looked for numerous precursory events—such as the "woes of the Messiah," earthquakes, wars, cosmic catastrophes, etc.—which should herald the end of the age.

There is good evidence to the effect that Jesus neither concerned himself with times or seasons (Acts 1:7), nor taught that there would be "signs" of the consummation of the kingdom at the end of history (Mark 13:32-37; Luke 12:39-40 = Matt. 24:43-44 [Q]; Luke 21:34-36). The end would come suddenly and without warning—a suggestion which on its face appears reasonable; it seems inconceivable that the breaking of eternity into time should, so to speak, "cast its shadow before it"! If, then, Jesus uttered the so-called "Little Apocalypse" at Mark 13:1-31, it is likely that he meant thereby to refute the expectations of those looking for "signs" of the end. For he says repeatedly that his disciples are not to account this or that a "sign" (cf. vss. 5-8, 21-23); rather, the end of history and the appearance of the Son of man may be expected to come together "after the tribulation" of human experience, and of that "day" and "hour" only the Father has information (vss. 24-27, 32-37).

There is a large body of scholarly opinion, however, committed to the view that at some time in his ministry Jesus specified that the consummation would occur during the lifetime of some of his contemporaries (cf. Mark 9:1; 13:26; 14:62). While this opinion is to be respected, the passages on which it depends are capable of contrary interpretations which are more conformable to his teaching generally. It seems to make nonsense of Jesus' strenuous efforts to create of the Twelve the prophetic remnant which should form the nucleus of a new people of God pledged to an expanding program that would eventually, after the prophetic teaching and hope, extend its redemptive efforts to embrace the whole of mankind.

3. Popular Jewish Christian beliefs. The early Jewish church had inherited the popular eschatological teaching briefly outlined in § 1 above. Jesus' disciples had been Galileans—for the most part, at least—and it was in Galilee that the Zealot movement found its strongest support. Simon the Cananean (or Zealot) and probably also Judas Iscariot (probably Semitic for "sicarius") were from the band of superpatriots. There can be little doubt also that the literalism of the apocalyptic eschatology had a vogue among the Galileans from among whom Jesus' "fringe disciples" were drawn.

The Qumran sect was distributed throughout the Jewish world in small communities or "camps" (CDC 7.6; 12.22; etc.; cf. Jos. War II.viii.4), and it is now established that it considered itself an eschatological community, living in the "last times" and concerned to disseminate apocalyptic writings. That the early Jewish branch of the church saw in itself an eschatological community of much the same type is clear from a comparison of Acts with the Dead Sea Scrolls: both considered themselves the object of special enlightenment (Acts 2:17 ff; 1QS 1.9; 3.13, 24; 1QM); both practiced a common meal (Acts 2:42; 1QS 6.13-23) and community of goods (of free choice in Acts 4:32–5:11; by rule of the order in 1QS 1.1-15); both adhered to the old Jewish particularism (Acts 11:2, 19; Gal. 2:12-21 with Acts 15:1-35; 1QS 1.16 ff; 5.7-20); both looked for "times of refreshing" at the end of the age (Acts 3:19-21; 1QS 4.25; 1QH 11.13-14; 13.11-13; etc.) and for accompanying judgment of the wicked (Acts 3:23-24; 1QS 3.18; 4.20); both communities considered themselves to be the "sons of the covenant" which God had made with his people (Acts 3:25; CDC 6.11 ff).

The poverty of the Jewish church may have been —in part, at any rate—a result of its apocalypticism, which led to communal practices and perhaps to giving up of worldly occupations, as occurred at a later date during Paul's ministry (I Thess. 5:14; II Thess.

3:6-12; cf. Rom. 15:25; Acts 24:17). After the destruction of Jerusalem this Jewish branch of the church became known as "Ebionites" (Hebrew for "poor"). In the end this popular Jewish Christian apocalypticism was bound to issue in a kind of cynical despair, as with the passing of the years its "hope" of a literal fulfilment of the promise of the end of the age and the parousia of the Son of man during the first generation failed to materialize (II Pet. 3:3-4).

4. The teaching of the church's scriptures. By and large, the scriptures of the church were written outside the context of—though in the case of some of Paul's letters, flatly in opposition to—popular Jewish Christian beliefs. In the Synoptic gospels, Matthew's "special source" (M) has at times been held to reflect such beliefs and, as suggested under § 2*d above*, some would attribute the Little Apocalypse of Mark 13 to the same influence in the church. II Pet. 3:5-13 sounds like an answer to the cynical despair in which the early popular apocalypticism had issued (cf. § 3 above). On the whole, however, the church's scriptures were written for a community which had become conscious of itself as a people of God transcending racial or cultural boundaries and which by reason of its Hellenistic ethos was prepared to listen to a type of eschatological teaching as ecumenical as that of the Hebrew prophets from the day of Amos onward and as vitally realistic as that of Jesus himself. It will be convenient to treat of the eschatological teaching of these scriptures under four heads:

a. Fulfilment of OT hope. It was the joint witness of the prophetic spirits who wrote the Christian scriptures that the eschatological hope of the Hebrew prophets had been fulfilled in the incarnate life and work of Jesus and in the gift of his Spirit to the church. Jesus was the fulfilment of the "promises" relative to a redeemer who should redeem Israel and, through Israel, all mankind (Luke 1:54-55; 2: 29-32; Rom. 1:1-6; Eph. 2:11-22; Heb. 9:11-22). In like manner the gift of Jesus' Spirit to his church at Pentecost was a fulfilment of God's promise to pour out his Spirit upon all flesh (Acts 2:17-36; I Cor. 2: 6-13). Indeed, the church itself is the new people of God, the prophetic "remnant," God's own "building" or "temple" (Rom. 9:22-33; I Cor. 3:9, 16-17; Eph. 2:19-22; I Pet. 2:4-10). This factor of fulfilment imparts to the church's scriptures, as well as to its life, an atmosphere that is unmistakable. They are eschatological scriptures in the sense that their authors are convinced that the new day has dawned, the "last times" foretold by the prophets have begun, and the "day of the Lord" or alternatively the "parousia" of the Messiah is just at hand (Rom. 13: 11-14; Phil. 4:5; Heb. 1:2; 9:26; 10:25, 37-38; Jas. 5: 7-9; I Pet. 1:5, 20; 4:7; I John 2:18, 22; 4:3; Jude 18; Rev. 22:10, 12, 20).

John's Gospel is really no exception at this point, as the Johannine Jesus speaks of the "last day" on which salvation and judgment will finally be meted out (John 12:47-48), though the emphasis here is on the thought that eternal "life" is the present possession of Jesus' disciples (John 3:36; 5:24), that it is possible to be "sons of light" now (John 12:36), that oneness of spirit with the Father may be realized in the present age (John 17:20-21). Practically, such teaching meant that the church conceived the prophetic eschaton to have been split in two: the first half began within history with the Incarnation; the second half would await the Parousia and would extend into the beyond-history.

b. Kingdom of God and church. The half of the prophetic eschaton already in process of realization is the period of the church's life on earth. The church is, so to speak, the territory of the kingdom of God, the delimited area of his reign; the far-flung boundaries of the church's activities are the horizons of the kingdom. Beginning with Pentecost, church and Spirit go together in an indissoluble union (Eph. 4: 4). And the gift of the Spirit to the church means that Christ has begun his reign, having assumed authority as he sits at God's right hand (Acts 2:33-34; Phil. 2:9), and is already granting kingdom powers to his disciples (Eph. 4:8 ff), who have been transferred into his kingdom (I Thess. 2:12; Col. 1:13), and are, therefore, already at work in it (I Cor. 3:9-17; 12:4-31).

The church's ethical teaching finds its source at this point. Its ethic is an eschatological ethic in the sense that it is one whose requirements are capable of fulfilment only in the power of the Spirit given to the church in these "last times." It is one rooted in and assured by Christ's rule as God's viceroy through his Spirit granted to his church.

c. Parousia, judgment, end of the age. If the terminus a quo of the kingdom's presence in the world is the Incarnation, its terminus ad quem is equally clearly the parousia of the church's Lord at the end of history. It is striking that the church never adopted Jesus' terminology nor spoke of the parousia of the "Son of man" (Matt. 24:27; Mark 13:26; 14:62)! It spoke rather of the parousia of "Christ" (I Cor. 15: 23), of "our Lord Jesus" (I Thess. 2:19), of "our Lord Jesus Christ" (I Thess. 5:23; II Thess. 2:1; II Pet. 1:16), of "the Lord" (Jas. 5:7-8), even of "the day of God" (II Pet. 3:12), etc. Moreover, there is no slightest evidence of the waning in the church of this eschatological hope of the coming again of her Lord; whatever dates be assigned to the writings of the NT, they are first and last full of the assurance that the Lord is just "at hand" (Phil. 4:5; Jas. 5:3, 7-9; cf. further § 4*a above*). Accordingly, the Lord himself cries out: "Surely I am coming soon," and the church replies: "Amen. Come, Lord Jesus!" (Rev. 22:20). The latter, indeed, appears to have been a cry already employed by the Jewish church in Aramaic (Maranatha; I Cor. 16:22), and continued in a Greek form, at least to the end of the century. Clearly, in the church's teaching the Lord is present by his Spirit in his church at all times; equally at all times his parousia is "drawing nigh." Similarly, the church is living in the "last days"; yet the end has not yet come but is near at hand.

As for "judgment," the Johannine Jesus remarks: "He who rejects me . . . has a judge; the word that I have spoken will be his judge on the last day" (John 12:48). This is a poetic way of saying that men judge themselves by their attitude toward Jesus and that their estimate of themselves will pass current at face value in God's eternal order. It is possible to interpret the famous judgment scene in Rev. 20:4, 12-15, along similar lines (see REVELATION, BOOK OF, § E4).

In any case, the church believed in God's final judgment of all men, living and dead (Heb. 9:27; I John 4:17; Jude 6).

d. Resurrection and future life. There is good reason to believe that Jesus thought of eternal life as an experience of fellowship with God, to be had both within and without history without distinction. In the Synoptic gospels he is generally reported as having employed the term "kingdom of God" to denote the temporal aspect of such fellowship (cf. § 2*b above*), though a saying like that at Matt. 7:13-14 employs the word "life" to convey the same idea, as usually in John's Gospel (John 3:15; 5:24). That he believed in the resurrection, there is also good reason to believe, though there is no record that he inquired intimately into its nature (Mark 12:18-27). The terms "heaven," "hell," and the like, he employed in the manner current in his day (Mark 10:21; Luke 6:23=Matt. 5:12 [Q]; Mark 9:43; Luke 12:5=Matt. 10:28 [Q]). But Jesus' language in all such cases is the language of metaphor and parable, and it is quite impossible to reduce it to the level of scientific categories.

The church's scriptures agreed in all essential respects with Jesus' recorded teachings at these points, in only two particulars going beyond them. The first of these concerns the fact that eternal life (whether present or future) was now said to be God's gift through Jesus (Rom. 6:4; Col. 3:3-4; Jas. 1:12; I Pet. 3:7), or alternatively through his Spirit (Rom. 8:2; Gal. 6:8), and that in like manner the believer's resurrection is a gift of God in Christ (Acts 4:2; I Cor. 15:12-23). The second concerns the nature of the resurrection "body," in which, as Paul showed, there is both continuity and discontinuity with the temporal body (I Cor. 15:35-50).

Bibliography. In addition to the standard works on NT theology, such as those of Feine, Stauffer, and Bultmann, important special studies to be consulted include: C. A. A. Scott, Christianity According to St. Paul (1927); T. W. Manson, The Teaching of Jesus (2nd ed., 1935); R. Otto, The Kingdom of God and the Son of Man (1938); O. Cullmann, Die Hoffnung der Kirche auf die Wiederkunft Christi (1942); J. W. Bowman, The Intention of Jesus (1943); W. Manson, Jesus the Messiah (1943); G. S. Duncan, Jesus, Son of Man (1948); A. N. Wilder, Eschatology and Ethics in the Teaching of Jesus (1950); S. Mowinckel, He That Cometh (1955); W. G. Kümmel, Verheissung und Erfüllung (3rd ed., 1956; English trans., 1957).

J. W. BOWMAN

ESDRAELON ĕz′drĭ ē′lən [Εσδρηλών]. The Greek name, derived from the Hebrew word "Jezreel," for the W portion of the Valley of Jezreel, including the Valley of Megiddon. See JEZREEL 4; MEGIDDON, VALLEY OF. Fig. JEZ 22.

ESDRAS, BOOKS OF ĕz′drəs [Ἔσδρας, from עזרא, Ezra]. The first two books in the APOCRYPHA. I Esdras, which is Ἔσδρας α in the SEPTUAGINT, mainly covers the same ground as the OT book of Ezra and parts of Nehemiah (see EZRA AND NEHEMIAH, BOOKS OF) and II Chronicles; it is a freer Greek translation of the original Hebrew than the LXX version (Ἔσδρας β) of the latter books, and has been thought to be part of the true LXX version of Ezra-Nehemiah, while Ἔσδρας β is the translation by THEODOTION of the same books. II Esdras, the second book in the Apoc., is a composite apocalyptic work (see APOCALYPSES) originally written in Greek —though some think there was a Hebrew original for much of it—but now existing only in Latin (three verses in ch. 15 have been found in a Greek papyrus, P Oxy. 1010) and in other versions made from the Greek. II Esdras is appended to the VULGATE.

1. The titles
2. I Esdras
   a. Acceptance in the church
   b. Contents
   c. Origin
   d. Purpose and value
   e. Date and place
3. II Esdras
   a. Importance
   b. Analysis and dates

Bibliography

1. The titles. The various titles of the books of Esdras are confusing; the data are largely given in the following table. The books with which this article is concerned are represented by the fourth and fifth columns; the second and third columns represent the OT Ezra-Nehemiah. See p. 141.

The first of our books has been known as both I and III Esdras, and for the sake of clarity as the "Greek Ezra." The second has been known as II or IV Esdras, or as the "Ezra Apocalypse."

2. I Esdras. a. Acceptance in the church. Although it is absent from codex SINAITICUS, I Esdras is in codices VATICANUS and ALEXANDRINUS. There are Old Latin versions (see LATIN VERSIONS, OLD) with a good text, and a useful Syr. version (see VERSIONS, ANCIENT). I Esdras occupied a place of equal importance with the Hebrew Ezra. It was in Origen's Hexapla. Augustine could find in it a prophecy of Christ. But Jerome (see VULGATE) was scornful, and since his day it has never been considered canonical. Later editions of the Vulg. relegated it to a subordinate position—in an appendix to the NT! See CANON OF THE OT.

b. Contents. Except in one section, I Esdras covers the same ground as the close of II Chronicles, the book of Ezra, and part of Nehemiah, but not in the same order. It plunges straight into the description of Josiah's Passover (II Chr. 35) and continues until Cyrus' decree after the Exile, permitting the return of the Jews and the rebuilding of the temple (to Ezra 1:11). But the narrative then follows Ezra 4:7-24, the Samaritan opposition in the reign of Artaxerxes. After this there is a section (I Esd. 3:1–5:6) which does not correspond with anything in the OT; it is mainly the story of a competition between three Jewish pages at Darius' court, to say whereof true wisdom consists, a competition which is won by Zerubbabel, who claims as his prize the king's permission for the Jews to return and rebuild Jerusalem. The narrative then reverts to that of Ezra 2, with a list of returning exiles under Zerubbabel, and an account of the Samaritan opposition to the building. The rest of the canonical Ezra, except for that part of ch. 4 mentioned above, which is out of place in Ezra, is now followed, dealing with the building of the temple in the reign of Darius, and with Ezra's visit and work in Jerusalem in the reign of Artaxerxes. Our book

	OT Ezra	OT Nehemiah	Paraphrase of II Chr. 35–36; Ezra; Neh. 8; with an original story.	A Latin pseudepigraph (apocalyptic)
LXX	Ἔσδρας β		Ἔσδρας α
Vulg.	I Esdras	II Esdras	III Esdras	IV Esdras
Many later Latin MSS	I Esdras Esdras		III Esdras	II Esdras (=1–2) IV Esdras (=3–14) V Esdras (=15–16)
English Great Bible, 1539	I Esdras	II Esdras	III Esdras	IV Esdras
39 Articles VI, 1562	I Esdras	II Esdras	III Esdras	IV Esdras
Geneva Bible, 1560	Ezra	Nehemiah	I Esdras	II Esdras
KJV, 1611	Ezra	Nehemiah	I Esdras	II Esdras

ends with the account of Ezra reading the Law, as in Neh. 7–8. It has a sudden ending as well as an abrupt beginning.

c. Origin. What is the relationship with the Hebrew Ezra-Nehemiah, which it closely resembles, and the LXX Ἔσδρας β? If Ἔσδρας α and β are independent Greek translations of the same canonical work, Ezra-Nehemiah, then β is a painfully literal translation and α is more than ordinarily free. Some scholars think that α must be based on a very different Hebrew text from the MT which we possess (see MASORA), and thus provide valuable evidence for an ancient and rival OT text. However, we cannot be sure that I Esdras is not merely a loose compilation, based perhaps upon a previous Greek translation, or compiled from the Hebrew directly; and not all agree that the deviations in I Esdras are due to a different Hebrew text. There must have been more than one Greek version of many OT books, and we need not suppose that Ἔσδρας β was the only Greek version of Ezra-Nehemiah which existed in its own day.

I Esdras is an unsatisfactory piece of writing historically, as a glance at the summary of the contents will reveal; it passes from the reign of Cyrus to that of Artaxerxes, back to that of Darius, and on to that of Artaxerxes again. At the same time, whereas it usually differs from Ἔσδρας β and Ezra-Nehemiah, there are several instances where α and β agree in differing from the Hebrew. Some scholars, therefore, have suggested that behind Ἔσδρας β lay the MT, while behind Ἔσδρας α lay some older Hebrew text. From this older text a Greek translation was made, of which Ἔσδρας α is a redaction. Ἔσδρας β is a new translation from the revised Hebrew (the MT) but very much influenced by the translation of the older Hebrew text. The theory seeks to explain three things: the resemblances between Ἔσδρας α and β (because the "parent" of α was used in making β), the differences between them (they are based on different Hebrew texts), and the redactional traces in Ἔσδρας α. But it would satisfy the evidence merely to say that, whether or not there were two Hebrew originals, the author of Ἔσδρας β felt the unsatisfactory nature of Ἔσδρας α and improved matters by producing a very literal rendering of Ezra-Nehemiah. Nothing is gained by inventing a Greek prototype of I Esdras, of which no trace has survived.

Evidence for the earlier date of I Esdras is its position before Ἔσδρας β in the important MSS and the evidence of Josephus, who follows I Esdras closely in the Antiquities in preference to both the Hebrew book and Ἔσδρας β.

I Esdras, then, is the work of a compiler; he used some form of Chronicles-Ezra-Nehemiah, and added a story from an unknown source. Moreover, either he did not finish his work or some of it has been lost, for it begins and ends abruptly.

d. Purpose and value. The introduction of the Greek story makes the book self-contradictory, for King Darius sent Zerubbabel to rebuild Jerusalem and the temple, whereas according to 6:23 he does not know that Zerubbabel has any authority. There are many errors. As we have seen, the Persian kings are in the wrong order. The compiler's aim was to glorify Ezra, the Law, and the worship of God, especially in the temple, regardless of historical accuracy. On the other hand, some parts appear to be more historical than the canonical work—e.g., by ignoring Neh. 1:1–7:72, I Esdras avoids a gap of fourteen years and presents the story of Ezra logically; and Ezra 4:7-24 is put in its right place (see § 2*b above*), though "Artaxerxes" is an anachronism.

Probably there was little consistency in the original Hebrew accounts of the return from exile; I Esdras represents one tradition, the MT another. They are equally valuable to the historian of the period.

e. Date and place. The Greek story resembles ARISTEAS and may thus date from ca. 150 B.C. The final compilation must have been before A.D. 100 (it is used by Josephus). One is impressed by the agreements between I Esdras and the LXX of Esther and Daniel, which may suggest that all three were translated by the same hand. The date might then be 150-100 B.C., and the original Hebrew pre-Maccabean. It can hardly be later than 50 B.C. It seems to have been translated for the Jews of Alexandria.

3. II Esdras. a. Importance. Our second book is important chiefly because of its close resemblance in parts to the NT. Its popularity in the church is proved by the number of versions into which it has been rendered (Latin, Syriac, Ethiopic, etc.), and by quotations in the fathers beginning with Clement of Alexandria, ca. A.D. 200. The phrases requiem aeternitatis and lux perpetua (2:34-35) have obviously exerted a powerful influence on the Christian liturgy. Still, Jerome regarded the book unfavorably.

In the ERV and subsequent versions will be found a long section of seventy verses between 7:35 and 36 which is not in the KJV. This is because these verses were cut out of a MS of A.D. 822 (Codex Sangermanensis), probably for doctrinal reasons, and they were not generally accepted (see B. M. Metzger bibliography) until R. L. Bensly in 1874 found a Latin MS which contained the whole text. The excised passage denies the efficacy of prayers on behalf of those who are in the intermediate state after death (vs. 105).

b. Analysis and dates. The book is composite. Chs. 1–2 are an anti-Jewish addition to the original Jewish apocalypse (chs. 3–14). The addition was probably made by a Jewish Christian. The language often resembles that of the gospels.

The Ezra Apocalypse (chs. 3–14) may be divided into four sections: (a) the Salathiel Apocalypse (chs. 3–10), which is four visions, dealing with the problem of evil; in accordance with Pharisaic teaching, a solution is suggested in the life to come, rather than in this evil world, about which the Seer is pessimistic (ca. A.D. 100); (b) the Eagle Vision (11:1–12:39), concerned with the Roman Empire and the coming of Messiah (ca. A.D. 96); (c) the Vision of the Man rising from the sea (ch. 13), the Messiah, containing much older material (ca. A.D. 69); and (d) legend (ch. 14), telling how Ezra rewrote the sacred literature, both canonical and apocalyptic (ca. A.D. 100).

Chs. 15–16, the most recent and least valuable part of the book, are thought to be as late as A.D. 270; they contain verbal echoes of the NT. This section is not apocalyptic, but intended only as an appendix to the Ezra Apocalypse.

Neither the final form, then, nor the parts from which it has been compiled are pre-Christian, but much of the traditional Jewish material used in the first two parts (chs. 1–14) is pre-Christian. Probably these parts were issued as a book ca. A.D. 96, with the fall of Jerusalem very much in mind. The place of publication is more likely to have been Palestine than either Alexandria or Rome.

Bibliography. I Esdras: Articles in Academy (1893); Proceedings of the Society of Biblical Archaeology (1901-2), pp. 1,488-94. Greek text in the Cambridge editions of the LXX and in O. F. Fritsche, Libri Apocryphi VT graece (1871). German text by H. Guthe in Kautzsch, Die Apokryphen . . . des AT, I (1898). English text by E. C. Bissell (1880); J. H. Lupton in Speaker's Commentary (1888); C. J. Ball in Variorum Apoc. (1892); S. A. Cook in the Oxford Apoc. (1913). Introductions in histories of Schürer and Ewald; C. C. Torrey, Ezra Studies (1910); W. O. E. Oesterley, The Books of the Apoc. (1914); C. C. Torrey, The Apocryphal Literature (1945); R. H. Pfeiffer, History of NT Times (1949), pp. 233-57, and bibliography on p. 534; B. M. Metzger, An Introduction to the Apoc. (1957), pp. 11-19.

II Esdras: Articles in Bibl. Stud., XX (1922; J. Keulers); ZAW (1929), pp. 222-49 (W. Mundle); MGWJ (1932-33; A. Kaminka), pp. 76-77. Latin text in "Texts and Studies," III.2 (1895); Violet, Die Ezra-Apokalypse, II (1924). German text by Gunkel in Kautzsch (see above), II. English text by Lupton (see above); Ball (see above); Box in Oxford Pseudep. and in The Ezra Apocalypse (1912); Oesterley in WC (1933). Introductions in C. C. Torrey, The Apocryphal Literature (1945), pp. 116-23; Pfeiffer (see above), pp. 81-86, and bibliography on pp. 86, 534; Metzger (see above), pp. 21-30, 231-38. Special studies: R. L. Bensly, The Missing Fragment of the Fourth Book of Ezra (1875); B. M. Metzger, "The 'Lost' Section of II Esdras (=IV Ezra)," JBL, 76 (1957), pp. 153-56.

N. TURNER

ESDRIS ĕz'drĭs [Ἔσδρις] (II Macc. 12:36); KJV GORGIAS gôr'jəs. A leader of the troops of GORGIAS in a battle with Judas Maccabeus. J. C. SWAIM

ESEBON. KJV Apoc. form of HESHBON.

ESEBRIAS. KJV Apoc. form of SHEREBIAH.

ESEK ē'sĕk [עֵשֶׂק, contention] (Gen. 26:20). A well dug by the servants of Isaac, which received this name because the herdsmen of Gerar contended for it and forced the patriarch to abandon it. The site is unknown, but it must have been near Gerar, probably in the Wadi esh-Sheri'ah. S. COHEN

ESHAN ē'shən [אֶשְׁעָן, support] (Josh. 15:52); KJV ESHEAN ĕsh'ĭ ən. A village of Judah in the hill-country district of Hebron. The location is uncertain. The LXX has Σομα ("Soma"); Eshan may thus possibly be identifiable with Khirbet Sam'a, W of Domeh (Dumah) and ca. ten miles SW of Hebron. V. R. GOLD

ESHBAAL. See ISHBAAL.

ESHBAN ĕsh'băn [אֶשְׁבָּן]. The second son of clan chief Dishon; ancestor of a native Horite subclan in Edom (Gen. 36:26; I Chr. 1:41).

ESHCOL ĕsh'kŏl [אֶשְׁכֹּל, usually (grape-) cluster]. 1. Brother of Aner and Mamre the Amorite, who were allies of Abram (בַּעֲלֵי בְרִית־אַבְרָם) in the defeat of Chedorlaomer (Gen. 14:13-24). See 2 below.

2. A valley near Hebron (probably to the N) from which Israelite spies brought back a cluster of grapes so large it had to be carried on a pole between two of them (Num. 13:23-24; Deut. 1:24). It is possibly to be identified with the wadi which arises just N of Ramet el-'Amleh, in an area noted for its vineyards. The wadi is dominated by Burj Haskeh, which may be a corruption of "Eshcol."

ESHEAN. KJV form of ESHAN.

ESHEK ē'shĕk [עֵשֶׁק]. A Benjaminite person or family descended from Saul (I Chr. 8:39). The verse, however, could be in the wrong context (cf. I Chr. 9:35-44).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 254.

ESHKALONITES. See ASHKELON.

ESHTAOL ĕsh'tĭ əl [אשתאול]; ESHTAOLITES —ə līts; KJV ESHTAULITES. A town first assigned to Dan (Josh. 19:41) and then incorporated in the Judahite district of Zorah-Azekah (15:33); possibly to be identified with Eshwa', N of Artuf. Its juxtaposition with Zorah is continued in Judges (13:25; 16:31; 18:2, 8, 11; cf. also I Chr. 2:53). Samson first responded to the Spirit of God between Zorah and Eshtaol and after his death was buried there. Zorah and Eshtaol were Danite centers from which the raiding party set out to capture Laish during the initial stages of the Danite migration northward (Judg. 18). V. R. GOLD ESHTEMOA ĕsh'tə mō'ə [אשתמוע, listening post]. Alternately: ESHTEMOH ĕsh'tə mō [אשתמה] (Josh. 15:50). 1. Son of Ishbah; a descendant of Caleb (I Chr. 4:17).

2. A Maacathite, son of Hodiah (I Chr. 4:19).

3. A city of Judah assigned to the Levites and named as a city of refuge (Josh. 21:14; I Chr. 6:57—H 6:42); later assigned to the highland province of Goshen (Josh. 15:50). It is identified with es-Semu'a, ca. nine miles S of Hebron.

According to I Sam. 30:28, it was one of the cities to which David sent some of the booty from his recapture of Ziklag from the Amalekites for services rendered him and his men during his flights from Saul. V. R. GOLD ESHTON ĕsh'tən [אשתון, effeminate or uxorious(?)]. A family or clan of the tribe of Judah; probably a Calebite (I Chr. 4:11-12).

ESLI ĕs'lī ['Εσλί] (Luke 3:25). An ancestor of Jesus.

ESORA. KJV form of AESORA.

ESPOUSAL. KJV translation of חתנה (Song of S. 3:11; RSV "wedding") and בלולה (Jer. 2:2; RSV "bride"). "Espoused" is used by the KJV (RSV "betrothed") to translate ארש (II Sam. 3:14), ἁρμόζειν (II Cor. 11:2), and μνηστεύειν (Matt. 1:18; Luke 1:27; 2:5). See MARRIAGE.

ESRIL. KJV Apoc. form of AZAREL.

ESROM. KJV NT form of HEZRON.

ESSENES ĕs'ēnz ['Εσσηνόι, 'Εσσαῖοι, see § 1 below]. An important Jewish community which was flourishing in Palestine during the lifetime of Jesus. Their teachings and practice were well known for centuries through the writings of Philo and Josephus. A remarkable series of discoveries in the wilderness of Judea, beginning in the year 1947, produced a major part of the community's literature as well as the ruined remains of the headquarters of the sect. This new evidence aroused widespread interest in the Essenes, with whom some scholars had long associated Jesus without winning general approval of their views. See DEAD SEA SCROLLS.

1. Etymology of the name
2. Sources
   a. Philo
   b. Josephus
   c. Pliny
   d. Dead Sea Scrolls
   e. Hippolytus
3. History of the Essenes
4. Description of the Essenes
   a. Communal life
   b. Marriage
   c. Admission
   d. Discipline
   e. The temple
   f. Daily worship
   g. Study of scriptures
Bibliography

1. Etymology of the name. The name Essene has been derived from numerous Greek and Hebrew words: ὅσιος, "holy"; ἴσος, "egalitarian"; חסיד, "pious"; סחא, "to bathe"; צנוע, "modest"; עשין, "powerful"; אסיא, "a physician"; חזוא, "a seer"; עשה, "to do," whence "the observers of the law"; חזן, "watcher" or "worshiper"; חשאים, "the silent ones." The East Aramaic hasên, hasayyâ, "pious," has also been suggested. These and other derivations represent efforts of varying success to find linguistically plausible names in view of the known traits of the Essenes. There is no scholarly consensus on the etymology of the name Essene, which seems to have been a mystery as early as Philo, and probably never was used by the sect as a term of self-designation. The name Essene does not occur in the Dead Sea Scrolls.

2. Sources. a. Philo. The Essenes are described in two of Philo's works—Hypothetica 11.1-18; and Every Good Man Is Free 12–13. A comparison of these accounts indicates that they are based upon a common literary source or sources freely used by Philo (cf. Hypothetica 11.1 with Every Good Man 12.76*a; Hypothetica* 11.8-9 with Every Good Man 12.76*b, Hypothetica* 11.4 with Every Good Man 12.79; Hypothetica 11.10-13 with Every Good Man 12.86-87). These works were probably composed in Egypt before A.D. 50, and the source or sources upon which they were dependent presumably had been circulating there some years previously. In passages where both of Philo's accounts give the same factual descriptions, we are in touch with what may be presumed to be valuable information about Palestinian Essenism of the early decades of the Christian era.

A third work by Philo, On the Contemplative Life, is largely devoted to a lengthy account of the Therapeutae, an Essene-like community in Egypt. The significant differences between the Essenes and the Therapeutae can be accounted for on the basis of socio-economic and climatic factors plus a period of separate historical development of not more than one hundred years. The Palestinian Essenes may have been more rigorously activistic than their contemplative brethren in Egypt because of the necessities of economic survival. Egyptian climate and society were very conducive to the easy life of the Thera-

peutae, and it is altogether possible that they represent a later development of a pre-Christian Palestinian Jewish sect which was also the parent body of the Essenes. It is equally possible that they are quite independent in origin. However, the hymns and liturgical material of the Dead Sea Scrolls seem to find a natural setting in the liturgical practices of the Therapeutae. Though not a direct source on Palestinian Essenism, Philo's description of the Therapeutae should be taken into account by the reader interested in the Essenes.

b. Josephus. The Jewish War (A.D. 75-79) contains a lengthy and detailed account of the Essenes (II. viii.2-13). A much briefer account in the Antiquities contains valuable additional information (XVIII.i.5). In this account the number of Essenes is given as "about four thousand." The same expression (ὑπὲρ τετρακισχίλιοι) is used by Philo (Every Good Man 12.75), whose works were presumably available to Josephus, though there is no evidence of literary dependence. A comparison of the complete accounts of the Essenes in the writings of Philo and Josephus indicates that both writers were dependent upon written sources which have been freely used.

In his autobiography (ca. A.D. 100) Josephus writes that at about the age sixteen, having made unusual progress in his studies of Jewish law, he resolved to acquaint himself with the various parties of his nation. There were the Pharisees, the Sadducees, and the Essenes. His intention was to select the best after thorough investigation of all three. Therefore, disciplining himself and working hard, he completed a study of all three. But, following this initial investigation, he was still not ready to make his selection. So he went down into the wilderness and zealously attached himself to a man named Bannus, with whom he lived for three years. At the end of this time, at the age of nineteen, his investigations having been thoroughly accomplished, he returned to Jerusalem and joined the Pharisees. The three years spent with Bannus would have covered most of the period between the beginning and the end of his investigations—namely, his sixteenth and nineteenth years. Therefore, the initial stage of his investigations, during which time he acquainted himself with all three sects, must have been a comparatively brief but highly concentrated course of study, most likely undertaken in Jerusalem. We may believe that Josephus had ample opportunity in Jerusalem or with Bannus to become acquainted with Essene teaching and practice. But that he ever became a member of an Essene community, or even a probationary member, is highly unlikely, as will become clear when the rules for admission are considered (see § 4*c below*). Thus Josephus' accounts cannot be regarded as coming directly from the hand of one who knew the Essene community from the inside. On the other hand, there are indications that certain parts of his description of the Essenes ultimately rest upon eyewitness accounts of just such authority (Jos. War II.viii.5).

There are five further references to the Essenes in the histories of Josephus: Judas the Essene and Antigonus (died 37 B.C.; Antiq. XIII.xi.2; War I.iii.5); Herod and the Essenes (Antiq. XV.x.4-5); Essenes Interpret Dreams (Antiq. XVII.xiii.3; War II.vi.3); John the Essene General (died A.D. 66; War II.xx.4; III.ii. 1-2); Gate of the Essenes (War V.iv.2).

c. Pliny. Pliny the Elder was a fellow soldier of Vespasian and probably had been in Palestine, possibly in company with the Tenth Legion as it marched down the Jordan Valley in May, A.D. 68. In his Natural History (5.15.73), completed in 77, Pliny includes a topographical description of Judea. In his description of the region along the W side of the Dead Sea, he begins with Jericho in the N and moves southward to the Essenes amid their palm trees, then on to fertile En-gedi, and finally reaches the mountain fortress Masada, which guarded the S border of Judea. There are only two oases between Jericho and Masada which are capable of sustaining community life on an agrarian basis such as is prescribed for the Essenes by the testimony of Pliny, Josephus, and Philo. These are 'Ain Feshkha (probably biblical EN-EGLAIM), located S of Jericho, and 'Ain Jidi (biblical EN-GEDI), which lies some distance N of Masada. In the light of these geographical and topographical facts, it seems quite likely that when Pliny mentions the Essenes amidst their palm trees, he is referring to a religious community which must have lived in or near the area of the 'Ain Feshkha oasis.

Scholars had long known that at the N end of the 'Ain Feshkha oasis on a plateau overlooking the Wadi Qumran were some ruins of ancient buildings. Subsequent to the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls, archaeologists, between the years 1951-56, excavated these ruins, which proved to be the headquarters of a closely knit community. By numismatic evidence it was conclusively established that this community was indeed occupying the oasis in the first century. Within the community buildings archaeologists found agricultural implements including pruning hooks, and large quantities of date seeds plus the charred remains of palm tree trunks which had been used as ceiling beams. Though the oasis is badly overgrown with reeds now and is marginal land at best, there is no doubt that its agricultural potentialities are sufficient to respond to determined efforts at cultivation. Ancient retaining walls and small agricultural stations indicate that in the past a considerable amount of land was once brought under cultivation. This land was probably systematically irrigated by water from the numerous springs in the area. A consideration of these matters further strengthens the ties which connect Pliny's celibate Essenes, who had "only palm trees for company," with the tightly knit community which in the first century inhabited the 'Ain Feshkha oasis and occupied the nearby community buildings. History knows of no other community but Pliny's Essenes existing in this general area in the first century. Furthermore, a careful surface exploration of the entire region, made subsequently to the excavation of the community headquarters, turned up no other possible sites with which Pliny's Essenes could be identified. Thus it is to be concluded, on the basis of topographical and archaeological considerations, that the Essenes of Pliny are to be identified with those who occupied the community buildings of the 'Ain Feshkha oasis in the first century. We may assume that the Essenes of Pliny are the Essenes of Philo and Josephus, and that while their larger membership was scattered throughout the villages and towns of Judea, the headquarters of their community was in the wilderness near the Dead Sea.

d. Dead Sea Scrolls. The above considerations are of the greatest importance for an evaluation of the significance of the Dead Sea Scrolls for understanding the Essenes. It is impossible to separate these scrolls from the community which inhabited the area of the 'Ain Feshkha oasis in the first century. Fragments of over three hundred MSS were found in a single cave (Cave IV), located only a stone's throw from the scriptorium of the community.

With the scrolls from this Essene library in hand, it is possible to gain an interior point of view of the community, and to correct many misconceptions of the sect which might otherwise come from the tendency of a Philo or a Josephus to conform their portraits of the Essenes to the image of some Greek philosophical school. The scrolls also supplement our knowledge of Essene organization, teaching, and practice, and provide valuable material for the reconstruction of the history of the community. But above all, the scrolls make possible an understanding of the eschatological nature of this Jewish sect (see § 4 below).

e. Hippolytus. A lengthy description of the Essenes is found in a work believed to be by the third-century bishop Hippolytus, Philosophumena 9.4 (18*b*-28*a*). This description of the Essenes seems to show so much indebtedness to Josephus that it has often been thought to be without additional value. However, Kaufman Kohler held that Hippolytus had access to another source as well, because of the important respects in which his portrait of the Essenes differed from that of Josephus. There are two significant variations: (a) Hippolytus considered the Zealots (see ZEALOT) and the sicarii (see ASSASSINS) to be subordinate groups of Essenes; and (b) he omitted all references to sun worship as a practice of the Essenes. Morton Smith has shown that part of the account by Hippolytus was taken from a source which also (perhaps as an independent translation from a Semitic original) lay behind Josephus' account. Therefore, Josephus' account is not automatically to take precedence over that of Hippolytus. When these authorities differ, care must be taken to ascertain whether Hippolytus' account may not sometimes be nearer the original.

3. History of the Essenes. Any reconstruction of Essene history must be largely conjectural, since the amount of information is scanty and often difficult to interpret. What follows is more in the nature of a single historical synthesis than a scholarly consensus.

The Essenes seem to have had their origins among the HASIDEANS. Following the success of the Maccabean revolution and the achievement of national sovereignty, the Jewish nation entered a new phase of statehood in which the revolutionary families and parties began to vie with one another in a struggle for power in the affairs of the newborn state. The house of Simon the Hasmonean finally emerged as the dominant party, with a firm grasp on the high priesthood and eventually the kingship. But in the course of this post-revolutionary power struggle three major theocratic parties emerged: the SADDUCEES; the PHARISEES; and the Essenes. All these followed the revolutionary party line of separatism—i.e., strict observance of Mosaic law entailing a national existence for Israel separate from the Gentiles. The Pharisees and Essenes each developed out of rival wings of the earlier revolutionary Hasideans. Thus the many similarities between these two parties is to be explained by their common origin.

Jewish tradition pictures the Essenes active in Jerusalem up to the reign of Aristobulus I (ca. 105-104 B.C.; Jos. War. I.iii.5; Antiq. XIII.xi.2). But by the end of the reign of Alexander Janneus (ca. 76 B.C.), the Essenes had made a complete break with the Hasmoneans and were sharply critical of the compromising policies of all other parties (cf. Nahum Commentary). As the archaeological evidence indicates, it was at some time during, if not prior to, the reign of Janneus, that the Essenes moved their headquarters to Qumran (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS), where they remained until the HERODIANS brought the final downfall of the Hasmoneans in 36 B.C. Archaeological evidence indicates that at that time they abandoned Qumran, and it seems likely that they returned to Jerusalem and occupied a quarter in the S part of the city.

The major political problem with which Herod the Great (see HEROD [FAMILY]) had to contend was the opposition of the great mass of people who refused to acknowledge the legitimacy of his claims to the throne, and the ever-present threat that some royal claimant of the Hasmonean house would be able to overthrow him. Herod's solution to this problem was, on the one hand, to rely heavily on the military power with which Rome backed its puppet princes, and on the other hand to weaken the relative influence and power of the Hasmoneans among the people by conciliating and granting concessions to parties which had grievances against the Hasmoneans. In this respect the anti-Hasmonean Essenes would have been very useful to Herod. Herod excused the Essenes (and many of the Pharisees) from the loyalty oaths which he made the Jews take in the early years of his reign. This means that some kind of concordat had been reached between Herod and the Essenes, under which the Essenes could have returned to Jerusalem without fear of the kind of repressive or restrictive measures or the offensive temple practices which had forced them to leave the city in the days of the despised Hasmoneans.

It was probably in this period of unrestricted religious freedom that the Essenes carried out their intensive missionary campaigns which resulted in the founding of Essene communities in all the villages and towns of Judea.

When they moved their headquarters back to Qumran after Herod's death—and archaeological evidence makes it clear that it was at this time that they did return to Qumran—they left behind them in Jerusalem, as the only trace of their presence in the city, their name as a legacy for an entrance through the S wall, called the "gate of the Essenes" (Jos. War. V.iv.2). To gain control of the temple mount was the chief objective of every military campaign to capture Jerusalem. With the attack from the E blocked by the steep declivities of the Cedron Valley, it was necessary only to protect the N, W, and S flanks. Therefore, Herod strengthened the fortifications in the N and W sectors of the city, and it would have suited his purposes very well to have had a strict Jewish community in which anti-Hasmonean sentiment ran strong occupy a quarter in the S sector.

Herod's quick move to bring an obscure but legitimate priest from Babylon to Jerusalem as high priest was, no doubt, in part motivated by a shrewd design to conciliate all parties which rejected Hasmonean claims to the high priesthood, without risking the alienation of any one of these parties which might object to the elevation of a rival party's candidate to the office. If the Essenes did return to Jerusalem under the concordat they had with Herod, it is altogether likely that they had effective assurances that the new high priest would pay due regard to the peculiar legal interpretations of the sect. And even later, when under political pressure it became necessary for Herod for a short period to allow a captive member of the Hasmonean family to function as high priest, it is still quite likely that Herod did not permit the legal views of the Essenes to be flouted.

The friendly relations which Herod had with the Essenes had become legendary in Jewish tradition by the time of Josephus (Jos. Antiq. XV.x.5). Nevertheless, it is altogether probable that the Essenes would have had strong sympathies with those who near the end of Herod's life tore down the golden eagle which he had erected above the gate of the temple. Hippolytus tells us that the Essenes would not go through an entrance which had an image above it (Philosophumena 9.4 [26*a*]). When after Herod's death the multitudes demanded of Archelaus the punishment of those who had been instrumental in burning alive the men who had instigated the cleansing of the temple, the Essenes may well have lent their support to the popular clamor (Jos. War II.i.2). In the succeeding course of events three thousand worshipers were slain during the Passover festival. If this did not provide an occasion for the Essenes once more to abandon Jerusalem, then perhaps we should look to the later crucifixion of two thousand Jews by Gentile troops which had been sent down by the governor of Syria to restore order in the city (Jos. War II.i.1–v.2; Antiq. XVII.ix.1–x.10). All this was reminiscent of the days of Janneus, when the community had been led down into the wilderness in obedience to the words of Isaiah: "In the wilderness prepare the way of the Lord" (Isa. 40:3; 1QS 8.13-14). There is evidence that at least one Essene was still lending his services to the Herodian court as late as the period immediately following Herod's death (Jos. Antiq. XVII.xiii.3). But archaeological evidence makes it clear that about this time the headquarters of the community was shifted back to Qumran.

Two generations later, at the outbreak of war with Rome in 66, one of the Jewish generals was an Essene named John. What part the community as a whole played in this war is not known. But Josephus records that the Essenes distinguished themselves as faithful martyrs at the hands of their Roman captors (Jos. War II.viii.10). Their headquarters at Qumran were burned during this war, and the fate of their postwar membership is problematical. Some may have participated in the sporadic but continued resistance to Rome which did not end till Hadrian's crushing of the Bar Cocheba's revolt of 132-135. Toombs has shown that Bar Cocheba himself may have been an Essene. Ultimately the Essenes were probably assimilated by the Jewish Christian community and other Jewish groups which survived the prolonged struggle with Rome.

4. Description of the Essenes. A most important period of Essene history falls between the death of Herod and the outbreak of war in 66. In this period two new Jewish communities were born, Baptist and Christian. Wholly apart from the difficult question whether John the Baptist and Jesus may have been Essenes, an understanding of the teachings, practices, and organization of the Essene community in this period of Palestinian Judaism inevitably increases understanding of the contemporary Baptist and Christian movements, as well as of the Pharisees and the Zealots. Fortunately our sources of information on the Essenes for this period are very rich. We have happily recovered a considerable portion of the literature which was being read by the Essenes in the first century. We also have an abundance of data which has been gathered by archaeologists through a study of their community headquarters. Finally, we have the accounts of Philo and Josephus, who describe in great detail the Essenes as they were known in this period. The description which follows draws upon all these sources of information and provides a picture of the Essene community at that stage of its development which it had reached by the middle of the first century. This is the stage of Essene development which is of greatest interest to NT students. (On the use of the word "Baptist," see JOHN THE BAPTIST.)

The Essenes believed themselves to be the people of the New Covenant. They understood this "New Covenant" to be at once the "renewed old covenant" and the "eternal covenant" to be established at the end of days. Thus they were, like the primitive Palestinian church, a Jewish eschatological community. Philo and Josephus agree that the total membership of the Essenes was ca. four thousand (Every Good Man 12.75; Jos. Antiq. XVIII.i.15). This total membership could have gathered at Qumran on special occasions, as, e.g., at Pentecost, when they seem to have celebrated annually the renewing of the covenant. There was ample camping space for this large number in the environs of the community headquarters. But probably not more than a few hundred Essenes lived at the wilderness retreat regularly. The great majority of their membership was scattered about the villages and towns of Judea (Hypothetica 11.1; Jos. War II.viii.4).

Because of their strict adherence to the Levitical purity laws the Essenes were scrupulous in their avoidance of all ceremonial uncleanness. Since the larger cities were contaminated by the presence of Gentiles and by the nonobservance of the purity laws, the Essenes tended to avoid them (cf. Every Good Man 12.76).

a. Communal life. The Essenes practiced a communal ownership of property. There was no abject poverty nor inordinate wealth among their membership (Jos. War II.viii.3; cf. Antiq. XVIII.i.5; Philo Every Good Man 12.86; Hypothetica 11.10-13). Philo writes: "No one's house is his own in the sense that it is not shared by all, for besides the fact that they dwell together in communities, the door is open to visitors from elsewhere who share their convictions" (Every Good Man 12.85).[1] Josephus confirms and elaborates on the remarkable hospitality Essenes showed other members of their brotherhood: "On the arrival of any of the sect from elsewhere, all the resources of the community are put at their disposal, just as if they were their own; and they enter the houses of men whom they have never seen before as though they were their most intimate friends. Consequently they carry nothing whatever with them on their journeys, except arms as a protection against brigands. In every community there is one of the order expressly appointed to attend to visiting members from other communities, who provides them with raiment and other necessities" (War II.viii.4).[2]

Josephus writes that the Essenes "entirely addict themselves to husbandry" (Antiq. XVIII.i.5). Philo's more detailed statement somewhat qualifies this: "Some of them labor on the land skilled in sowing and planting, some as herdsmen taking charge of every kind of cattle and some superintend the swarms of bees. Others work at the handicrafts . . . and shrink from no innocent way of getting a livelihood. Each branch when it has received the wages of these different occupations gives it to one person who has been appointed as treasurer. He takes it and at once buys what is necessary and provides food in abundance and anything else which human life requires" (Hypothetica 11.8-10).[3]

Josephus refers to these communal treasurers as "stewards" and records that they were "good men and priests" (Antiq. XVIII.i.5; cf. 1QS 6.19-20).

Philo continues his account: "Thus having each day a common life and a common table [cf. 1QS 6.2-3] they are content with the same conditions, lovers of frugality who shun expensive luxury as a disease of both body and soul. And not only is their table in common but their clothing also. For in winter they have a stock of closely woven woolen cloaks ready and in summer inexpensive vests, so that he who wishes may easily take any garment he likes, since what one has is held to belong to all and conversely what all have one has. Again if any one is sick he is nursed at the common expense and tended with care and thoughtfulness by all. The old men too, even if they are childless, are treated as parents of a not merely numerous but very filial family and regularly close their lives with an exceedingly prosperous and comfortable old age; so many are those who give them precedence and honor as their due and minister to them as a duty voluntarily and deliberately accepted rather than enforced by nature" (Hypothetica 11.11-13; cf. Every Good Man 12.86-87).[3] Josephus writes in a similar vein: "There is no buying or selling among themselves, but each gives what he has to any in need and receives from him in exchange something useful to himself; they are, moreover, freely permitted to take anything from any of their brothers without making any return" (War II.viii.4; cf. Every Good Man 12.79).[2]

Every Essene was subject to the authority of his superiors, and his daily life was almost entirely governed by orders from above. Only two things were left to individual discretion, assistance to one in need and compassion. "Members may on their own initiative help the deserving, when in need, and supply food to the destitute; but presents to relatives are prohibited, without leave from the stewards" (Jos. War II.viii.6).[2]

b. Marriage. Philo writes that the Essenes èschew marriage "because they clearly discern it to be the sole or the principal danger to the maintenance of the communal life, as well as because they particularly practice continence" (Hypothetica 11.14).[3] Essene celibacy, however, as we know from the Dead Sea Scrolls, was a vocational celibacy (cf. 1QM 7.5-7). Each Essene was a volunteer for the Lord and subject to the disciplinary demands of the holy-war legislation of the Torah. A very strict interpretation of the regulations for the army of Israel made it advisable for long-term enlistees to avoid marriage (cf. Deut. 23:9-14). After copulation with his wife, an Israelite was unclean until evening (Lev. 15:18). During his period of uncleanness he could not enter the camp of Israel, because unless the camp were free from impurity at all times, the angelic hosts upon whom victory depended would not remain. Because the Essenes believed they were the true Israel (the Children of Light encamped ready for the advent of the final war against Belial and the Children of Darkness), they practiced a kind of eschatological holy-war continence. As the decades passed, this eschatological continence seems to have changed into a kind of vocational celibacy with possible ascetic overtones. Certainly the wilderness headquarters near the Dead Sea was not conducive to marriage and family life. This probably explains why relatively few female skeletons were found in the Essene cemetery at Qumran.

Josephus admits that the Essenes did not condemn marriage on principle, though in practice they avoided it. These nonmarrying Essenes "adopt other men's children, while yet pliable and docile, and regard them as their kin and mold them in accordance with their own principles" (War II.viii.2).[2] At another place he writes: "There is yet another order of Essenes, which, while at one with the rest in its mode of life, customs, and regulations, differs from them in its views on marriage. They think that those who decline to marry cut off the chief function of life, the propagation of the race, and, what is more, that, were all to adopt the same view, the whole race would very quickly die out. They give their wives, however, a three-years' probation, and only marry them after they have by three periods of purification given proof of fecundity. They have no intercourse with them during pregnancy, thus showing that their motive in marrying is not self-indulgence but the procreation of children. In the bath the women wear a dress, the men, a loincloth" (War II.viii.13).[2] This is definite proof that not all Essenes were celibate, and that those in the first century who were declining to marry were being criticized by Essenes who apparently believed that some more realistic adjustment to the circumstances consequent to the delay of the holy war was necessary.

[1] Reprinted by permission of the publishers and The Loeb Classical Library from Loeb Classical Library Volume: Philo Every Good Man Is Free (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1941).

[2] Reprinted by permission of the publishers and The Loeb Classical Library from Loeb Classical Library Volume: Josephus Jewish Wars (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1927, 1956).

[3] Reprinted by permission of the publishers and The Loeb Classical Library from Loeb Classical Library Volume: Philo Hypothetica (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1941).

There can be no doubt that Essene practice should be interpreted against the background of the holy-war legislation in the Torah. E.g., each initiant upon admission was presented with a small mattock which he always carried about with him and with which he obediently dug a trench when he went outside the camp to relieve himself, and with which he afterward replaced the excavated soil (Jos. War. II.viii.7, 9). This mattock and this precise practice are prescribed for the Israelite warrior in Deut. 23:12-13.

c. Admission requirements. It was not easy to become an Essene. Josephus writes: "A candidate anxious to join their sect is not immediately admitted. For one year, during which he remains outside the fraternity, they prescribe for him their own rule of life, presenting him with a small mattock, the loincloth already mentioned, and white raiment. Having given proof of his temperance during this probationary period, he is brought into closer touch with the rule and is allowed to share the purer kind of holy water, but is not yet received into the meetings of the community. For after this exhibition of endurance, his character is tested for two years more, and only then, if found worthy, is he enrolled in the society. But before he may touch the common food, he is made to swear tremendous oaths: first of all that he will practice piety toward God, next that he will observe justice toward men; that he will wrong none whether of his own will or under another's orders; that he will forever keep faith with all men, especially with the powers that be, since no ruler attains office save by the will of God; that should he himself bear rule, he will never abuse his authority nor, either in dress or by other outward marks of superiority, outshine his subjects; to be forever a lover of truth and to expose liars; to keep his hands from stealing and his soul pure from unholy gain; to conceal nothing from the members of the sect and to report none of their secrets to others, even though tortured to death. He swears, moreover, to transmit their rules exactly as he himself received them; to abstain from robbery; and in like manner carefully to preserve the books of the sect and the names of the angels. Such are the oaths by which they secure their proselytes" (War II.viii.7; cf. 1QS 6.14-23).[2]

d. Discipline. The discipline of the Essene community was very strict. Josephus continues his account: "Those who are convicted of serious crimes they expel from the order; and the ejected individual often comes to a most miserable end. For, being bound by their oaths and usages, he is not at liberty to partake of other men's food, and so falls to eating grass and wastes away and dies of starvation. This has led them in compassion to receive many back in the last stage of exhaustion, deeming that torments which have brought them to the verge of death are sufficient penalty for their misdoings. They are just and scrupulously careful in their trial of cases, never passing sentence in a court of less than a hundred members; the decision thus reached is irrevocable. After God they hold most in awe the name of their lawgiver [probably Moses, but possibly their founder, known in the scrolls as the Teacher of Righteousness], any blasphemer of whom is punished with death. It is a point of honor with them to obey their elders, and a majority; for instance, if ten sit together, one will not speak if the nine desire silence. They are careful not to spit into the midst of the company or to the right, and are stricter than all Jews in abstaining from work on the seventh day; for not only do they prepare food on the day before, to avoid kindling a fire on that one, but they do not venture to remove any vessel or even to retire to ease themselves. . . . They are divided, according to the duration of their discipline, into four grades; and so far are the junior members inferior to the seniors, that a senior if but touched by a junior, must take a bath, as after contact with one outside the community" (War II.viii.8-10; cf. 1QS, col. 6, l. 24; col. 7, l. 25).[2]

e. The temple. The Essenes participated in the Jerusalem temple cult worship by sending what they had dedicated to God "into the temple." But the special conditions of purity which they observed were so strict that they could not themselves enter the "common court of the temple." Thus it was necessary for them to offer sacrifices within the purity of their own community, which otherwise they would have offered in the Jerusalem temple (Jos. Antiq. XVIII.i.5). Bones of sheep and goats which had been carefully buried in bowls were uncovered by archaeologists within the Essene community headquarters near the Dead Sea. The scrolls indicate that the Qumran community considered itself a "holy of holies" (1QS 8.13–9.11). Thus archaeological and literary evidence suggests that the Essenes did continue to observe certain sacrificial rites, even though they did not do so in the Jerusalem temple. The eschatology of the sect indicates that its members looked forward to a day when the temple in Jerusalem would be wrested from the hands of wicked priests and restored to their own community of righteous priests. The Essenes seem to have observed their festivals according to a different calendar from that in use in Jerusalem.

f. Daily worship. There are indications that Josephus may have thought that the Essenes engaged in sun worship (War II.viii.5, 9). If so, he was probably mistaken, since neither Philo nor Hippolytus makes reference to this extraordinary practice. Neither do the Dead Sea Scrolls support such a view. These scrolls do suggest that the time of sunrise was the occasion for special prayers for the community (1 QS 10.1, 10). In fact, fragments of a papyrus MS found in Cave IV contain set prayers for the sunrise services. From the Essenes' practice of praying daily at sunrise may have arisen the notion that they worshiped the sun. With this exception, the account which follows seems quite reliable: "Before the sun is up they utter no word on mundane matters, but offer to him certain prayers which have been handed down from their forefathers, as though entreating him to arise [it is possible that in Josephus' source the prayers offered were offered to God, and the entreaties were daily petitions for the coming of his kingdom]. They are then dismissed by their superiors to the various crafts in which they are severally proficient and strenuously employed until the fifth hour, when they again assemble in one place and, after girding their loins with linen cloths, bathe their bodies in cold water. After this purification, they assemble in a private apartment which none of the uninitiated is permitted to enter; pure now themselves, they repair to the refectory, as to some sacred shrine. When they have taken their seats in silence, the baker serves out the loaves to them in order, and the cook sets before each one plate with a single course. Before the meal begins, the priest says a grace, and none may partake until after the prayer. When breakfast is ended, he pronounces a further grace; thus at the beginning and at the close they do homage to God as the bountiful giver of life. Then laying aside their raiment, as holy vestments, they again betake themselves to their labors until evening. On their return they sup in like manner, and any guests who may have arrived sit down with them. No clamor or disturbance ever pollutes their dwelling; they speak in an orderly manner, each deferring to the other. To persons outside, the silence of those within appears like some awful mystery" (War II.viii.5).[2]

[2] Reprinted by permission of the publishers and The Loeb Classical Library from Loeb Classical Library Volume: Josephus Jewish Wars (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1927, 1956).

In the Essene community headquarters near the Dead Sea, archaeologists uncovered cisterns, some of which were appropriately designed to be used by the Essenes when they took their baths for purification. Also uncovered was a large room capable of seating two hundred persons. This room was adjoined by a smaller room in which were found over one thousand pieces of pottery, including plates and bowls, serving dishes, water decanters, wine flasks, and drinking cups. This building complex was presumably the refectory and its pantry which served the community as the sacred place where the Essenes at Qumran gathered to eat in silence and with thankful hearts. There are indications in the Dead Sea Scrolls that the priest blessed separately the bread and the wine and that at least some of the Essene meals had an eschatological reference and were held in anticipation of the messianic banquet (1QS 6.5-6, 20-21; 1QSa 2.11-22).

g. Study of scriptures. The Essenes gave great importance to the study of their sacred scriptures (Jos. War II.viii.6; 1QS 6.6-8). Though they studied their scriptures every day, Philo relates that they particularly devoted the sabbath to this activity. He writes: "For that day has been set apart to be kept holy and on it they abstain from all other work and proceed to sacred spots which they call synagogues. There, arranged in rows according to their ages, the younger below the elder, they sit decorously, as befits the occasion, with attentive ears. Then one selects one of the sacred rolls and reads aloud and another of especial proficiency comes forward and expounds what is not understood. For each roll is studied by them for the symbolic meaning of their emulated traditions" (Every Good Man 12.81-82).[1] This enigmatic statement by Philo about Essenes' studying their scriptures for symbolic meaning is clarified by the Dead Sea Scrolls. The Essenes believed that the promises of God foretold by the prophets were actually being fulfilled in the history of their own community. Therefore, they studied their scriptures to understand better what was happening to them and what would happen in the future. Josephus writes: "There are some among them who profess to foretell the future, being versed from their early years in holy books, various forms of purification and discourses of prophets; and seldom, if ever, do they err in their predictions" (War II.viii.12).[2]

There are a number of commentaries or peshers among Essene writings. In these peshers the author comments upon the text of a particular prophetic book, and interprets what is written to apply to his own time. A careful study of these Essene comments yields valuable, though often obscure, information on the history of the sect during the living memory of the author. For a complete list of the writings in the Essene library, see DEAD SEA SCROLLS.

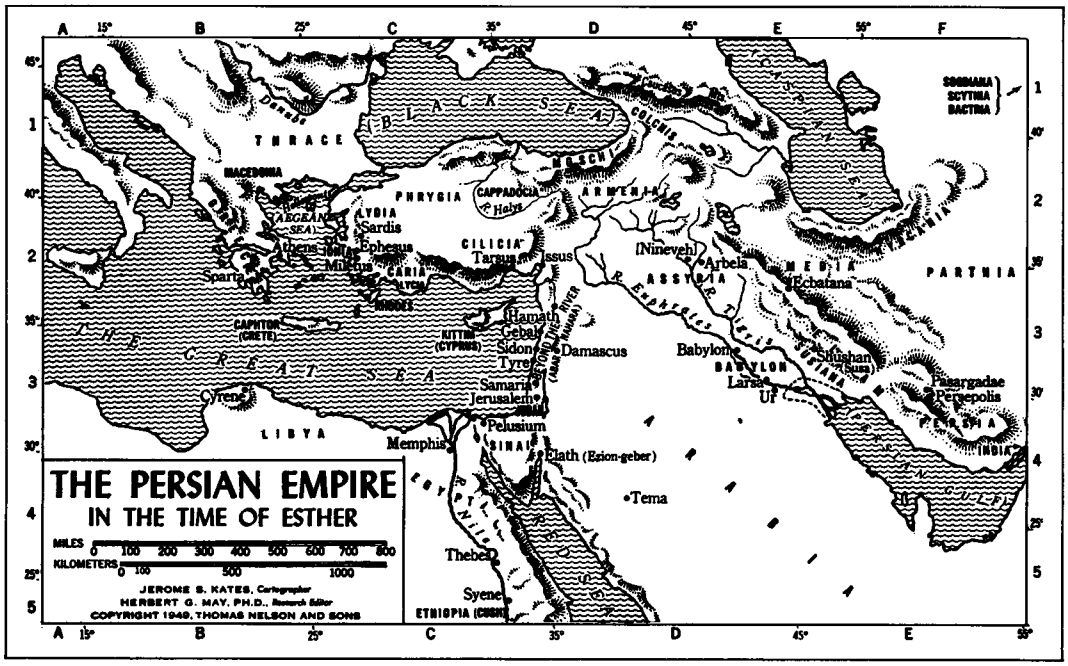
Bibliography. For the nineteenth-century literature on the Essenes, see the essay on the Essenes in J. B. Lightfoot, Dissertations on the Apostolic Age (1892). For the best pre-Qumran study of the Essenes, see K. Kohler's article "Essenes" in the Jewish Encyclopedia. For an authoritative study of the Essenes in the light of the Dea Sea Scrolls, and for important literature on this subject, see F. M. Cross, Jr., The Ancient Library of Qumran and Modern Biblical Studies (1958). M. Smith, "Josephus and Hippolytus," HUCA (1958). L. Toombs's views on Bar Cocheba as an Essene are in "Barcosiba and Qumran," NTS (Oct., 1957), pp. 65-71. See also bibliography under DEAD SEA SCROLLS.

W. R. FARMER

[1] Reprinted by permission of the publishers and The Loeb Classical Library from Loeb Classical Library Volume: Philo Every Good Man Is Free (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1941).



[2] Reprinted by permission of the publishers and The Loeb Classical Library from Loeb Classical Library Volume: Josephus Jewish Wars (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1927, 1956).

ESTHER, BOOK OF ĕs'tər [אסתר; Akkad. Ishtar (the Babylonian goddess) or Pers. stara, star]. The OT book which tells the story of the deliverance of the Jews won by Esther under the Persians and gives the reason for the institution of Purim; a symbol of heroic resistance against persecution. In the book Esther has two names: (a) Esther, used when she is given her official Persian title as queen; (b) Hadassah (Hebrew "Myrtle"), which seems to be regarded as her Jewish name (Esth. 2:7).

Esther, a beautiful Jewish maiden living in Susa, capital of the Persian Empire, was selected for the king's harem, and so delighted King Ahasuerus (Xerxes) that he made her his queen. Then Haman, the prime minister, influenced the king to issue an edict authorizing the annihilation of all Jews in the Empire. In this emergency Esther was able to persuade Ahasuerus to proclaim a second edict reversing the situation, thus saving the lives of her people, and accomplishing the annihilation of their enemies. The rejoicing following this victory, the two days of feasting and gladness on the fourteenth and fifteenth of Adar, was then fixed by Queen Esther as an annual celebration, the festival of Purim (9:17-32).

1. Contents
2. Purpose
3. Historicity
4. Date
5. Place in the canon
Bibliography

1. Contents. The great Persian king Ahasuerus, angered by the disobedience of his queen Vashti, banished her from his presence. Among the beautiful maidens selected to fill her place was Esther, a Jewish girl, who so pleased Ahasuerus that she was made queen. Then Esther's cousin and former guardian, Mordecai, aroused the enmity of Haman, the newly appointed prime minister. Haman incited the king to authorize the destruction of all Jews in the Empire, on the pretext that their laws were "different from those of every other people" so that they did not "keep the king's laws" (3:8). When Mordecai heard of this, he informed Esther, urged her to appeal to the king, and overcame her hesitancy to risk her life by arousing the king's displeasure (4:14). Esther approached the king, told him that the edict would mean the destruction of her and her people, and persuaded him to issue a new edict permitting the Jews to take vengeance on their enemies. Haman was executed on the gallows he had prepared for Mordecai, the Jews annihilated their enemies, and Mordecai became the new prime minister. Then Mordecai and Esther instituted the annual celebration of Purim to commemorate those days when the Jews won deliverance from their enemies (9:17-32).

2. Purpose. The book of Esther is unique among the books of the Bible in the way it deals with religious issues. The underlying question of the book, the question of destruction or survival for Jews under persecution, is certainly a matter of religious concern. Awareness of divine purpose in securing this survival seems to be the basis for Mordecai's conviction that the Jews will be delivered even if Esther does not act (4:14; see also his challenging question to Esther in the same verse: "Who knows whether you have not come to the kingdom for such a time as this?"), and for the opportune sleeplessness of the king just at the time when it was necessary (6:1). Josephus, commenting on the fact that Haman suffered the death he had planned for Mordecai, says that he "cannot forbear to admire God, and to learn hence his wisdom and his justice" (Antiq. XI.vi.11). The book of Esther itself, however, seems deliberately to avoid specific references to God or to religious practice. God is not mentioned in the book, even when the sense seems to demand it, as when Mordecai suggests that deliverance for the Jews may arise "from another quarter" if not from Esther herself (4:14). Prayer does not accompany fasting in Esther's preparation for putting her request before the king (4:16). Victory seems to depend, not so much on loyalty to Judaism (cf. the book of Daniel), as on the use of political maneuver and appeal to self-interest. The spirit of vengeance is considerably more prominent than the spirit of devotion. It is going too far to say that Esther "has no religious content and can arouse no pious thoughts" (Schauss [see bibliography]), but certainly piety in its usual sense receives little emphasis in this book.

One consistent purpose of the book, however, is to explain the celebration of a traditional observance of Judaism, the festival of Purim (see PURIM for a discussion of the nature and origin of this festival). The omission of reference to God is understandable in a book intended to be read at a festival of merrymaking, noise, and conviviality. The major theme of the book, persecution returning on the head of those who initiate it, leads through all the details of the story to the final victory which Purim celebrates. From the first mention of Haman's patiently casting "Pur, that is the lot," day after day until he could find a day propitious for attempting the destruction of the Jews (3:7-11), until the final hanging of Haman "on the gallows which he had prepared for Mordecai" (7:10), and the Jews' celebration of their days of rejoicing—i.e., the days called Purim (9:26) —the story seems to move inevitably toward the institution of the festival of deliverance. Purim is a festival, beloved in the Jewish tradition, which is not mentioned in the Law. To explain the historical reason for the observance of this festival is the important function of the book of Esther.

It is this function which gives unity to the book as a whole. One section of the book which many critics have regarded as a separate unit is 9:20–10:3. This section differs to some extent in style and language from the rest of the book, and presents certain discrepancies, such as the celebration of one or two days of festival (cf. 9:19; 9:20-22; see Paton, Esther, pp. 57-60). The differences in style, however, accompany a change in subject matter. The reference to "Pur" in 3:7 requires the concluding reference to Purim in 9:26. One purpose of the book may well be to reconcile actual diversity in the celebration of Purim in different localities (cf. the reference to one day in II Macc. 15:36, and to both days in Jos. Antiq. XI.vi.13, and in M. Meg. 1.1-2). In this case the variation in practice can probably explain the variation in the text of Esther. It is possible that the author may have used a separate source in 9:20–10:1, but in view of the consistent purpose of the book, to provide the historical background for the celebration of Purim, the variations do not seem significant enough to deny the unity.

3. Historicity. The external form of the book of Esther supports the claim to historicity. The author employs the customary formula for the beginning of an historical account (ויהי; cf. Joshua, Judges, Samuel), and ends with the typical reference to the complete chronicle (Esth. 10:2; cf. I Kings 14:19, 29; 15:23). His references to Persian customs show considerable accurate knowledge (the king's council in 1:14, regard for propitious days in 3:7, the way of honoring a hero in 6:8). It is now generally accepted that Ahasuerus ('Aḥashwērôsh) is the Hebrew rendering of the Persian Khshayarsha, a name more familiar in its Greek form, Xerxes (cf. Paton, Esther, p. 53). More recently cuneiform evidence has been found to show that there was a Persian official named Mardukâ (Mordecai) in Susa at the end of the reign of Darius I or the beginning of the reign of Xerxes (cf. A. Ungnad, ZAW, LVIII [1940-41], 240-44; LIX [1942-43], 219). See XERXES 1. Fig. AHA 5.

Other details in the book of Esther are not supported by historical evidence, however. Xerxes' queen was neither Vashti nor Esther, but Amestris. Many of the details are improbable. If Mordecai was among those who went into exile in 597 B.C. (2:6), he must have been at least 122 years old when he became prime minister in the twelfth year of Xerxes (474), and he would have had as his cousin a beautiful maiden, presumably ca. 100 years younger than he was (2:7). The edict of Xerxes permitting the Jews to kill 75,000 of his subjects (9:16) seems unlikely. Other elements seem to have literary, rather than historical, justification. The repeated delay of Esther in telling the king her request provides the occasion for the pride, and then the fall, of Haman. The banquet lasting 180 days (1:4), the twelve-month beauty treatment (2:12), the gallows eighty-three feet tall (7:9), the complete reversal of the fortunes of Haman and Mordecai—the number of elements of this nature gives a strong impression of fiction to the story. Some of the main themes—the heroine who saves her people by her beauty, the Jew who becomes the trusted official of a great king, or the king who tries a new maiden each night—appear in other writings also (cf. Judith, Daniel, The Arabian Nights). Whether the author invented a wholly fictional account together with the festival of Purim which it purports to explain, whether he was putting in Jewish form a Babylonian festival which originated in mythical adventures of the divine cousins Marduk and Ishtar, or whether he based his romance on some incident involving the historical Xerxes and Mardukâ (cf. Anderson, IB, vol. III, pp. 826-27), is difficult to tell. In any case, it seems probable that the book of Esther is primarily romance, not history.

4. Date. The book of Esther may be dated in the late Persian or Greek period, and probably the latter. The language suggests the Hellenistic period. Ben Sirach, writing ca. 180 B.C., does not mention Esther or Mordecai in his list of the heroes of Israel (Ecclus. 44–50). The earliest witness to the existence of the book of Esther is probably the LXX translation (at the end of the second century B.C.?). Then II Macc. 15:36, dating probably from the first century B.C., makes reference to "Mordecai's day." The dispersion of the Jews is taken for granted in the book (3:8), as is the practice of conversion to Judaism (9:27). The book reflects a period of great bitterness against Gentiles, directed more toward concern with political than with religious survival. The reign of John Hyrcanus—i.e., ca. 125 B.C.—at the height of the political ambitions of the Hasmoneans, makes a probable setting for the book.

5. Place in the canon. Esther is the last of the five Meghilloth or Scrolls, which are found in the Kethubhim or Writings, the third division of the Hebrew canon. These five scrolls, the Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther, are read on special occasions during the year. Esther is the reading appointed for Purim.

Both Jews and Christians were slow to admit Esther to the canon. The early Jewish comments on the text show their concern to make the religious aspect of the book more apparent. They add references to God's purpose, and prayers by Mordecai and Esther (see the Additions to the Book of Esther, now included in the Apoc., or First Targum on Esth. 3:4; 4:2). The delay of Esther in 5:4 is attributed by the Second Targum to her desire to remove hatred from the heart of Haman, and change the hearts of the Jews.

For later Judaism, Esther has become the symbol of deliverance, while Haman represents the force of cruelty and prejudice from which Jews have suffered throughout their history. The downfall of Haman, brought about by his futile attempt to annihilate the Jews, is a triumphant reminder of the continuing life of Israel in the face of persecution. The vindictiveness of the book is certainly one element in it, but the power of the book as a symbol of hope in a history of suffering is equally clear.

Bibliography. L. B. Paton, The Book of Esther, ICC (1916); H. Schauss, The Jewish Festivals (1938), pp. 237-64; S. Goldman, "Esther," in A. Cohen, ed., The Five Megilloth (1946); I. Bettan, The Five Scrolls (1950), pp. 195-247; B. W. Anderson, Introduction and Exegesis of Esther, IB, III (1954), 823-74.

D. HARVEY

ESTHER (APOCRYPHAL). Six passages, consisting of 105 verses not found in the Hebrew text of the book of Esther but interspersed through the Greek translation in the LXX; gathered together as a separate book, the Additions to the Book of Esther, in the Apoc. This expanded edition of the canonical book was probably prepared ca. 100 B.C. by an Egyptian Jew who injected a religious note into this popular story and heightened its anti-Gentile character.

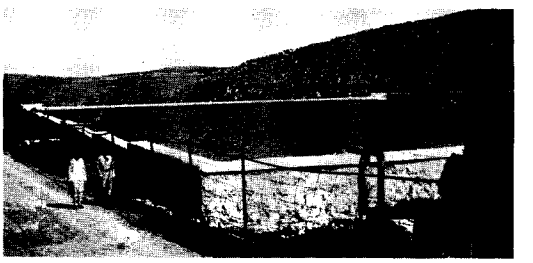
1. The Additions. Besides minor textual variants, the enlarged edition includes the following narratives: Addition A (11:2–12:6), the dream of Mordecai; Addition B (13:1-7), the edict of Artaxerxes against the Jews; Addition C (13:8–14:19), prayers of Mordecai and Esther; Addition D (15:1-16), Esther's appearance before the king; Addition E (16:1-24), decree of Artaxerxes in behalf of the Jews; Addition F (10:4–11:1), the interpretation of Mordecai's dream. These additions may be reintegrated with the canonical text thus: A, preceding 1:1; B, after 3:13; C and D, after 4:17; E, after 8:12; F, after 10:3.

Jerome first removed them from their context because he did not find them in the Hebrew text which he translated, and grouped them in an appendix to Esther in the order of F, A, B, C, D, E, attaching explanatory notes to each passage. In the course of transmission these notes were omitted, resulting in the traditional printing of these passages numbered from 10:4–16:24 in an incoherent sequence which purports to be a unified book. The RSV text is designed to assist the reader to reconstruct easily the original LXX form.

2. Relationship to canonical Esther. The popularity of the story of Esther and its quasi-canonical status is attested by a number of widely different recensions in addition to the MT translated in English versions of the OT. Besides the Greek text, which is known in five variant forms, two Aramaic targums and a number of homiletic commentaries on Esther survive. Although there is a considerable division of critical opinion on the authenticity of the Additions and the relation of the Greek to the Hebrew text, it may be said that most scholars believe that Greek Esther represents a second- or first-century B.C. translation from the Hebrew with the Additions composed in Greek by the translator for an Alexandrian Jewish audience. Roman Catholic scholars generally accept the priority of the Greek form of the tale as representing the original Hebrew or Aramaic story, from which the canonical Hebrew text was later abridged. A few Protestant scholars maintain that the original Aramaic story is best represented by the Greek versions, excluding only Additions A and F. Subsequently A and F were added to the story. According to the colophon in 11:1 of the LXX, a certain Lysimachus, who was "one of the residents of Jerusalem," translated the Semitic text in 114-113 B.C., at which time B and E may have been added.



A number of contradictions between the Greek and Hebrew texts have been noted—e.g., Haman is called a Macedonian in 16:10, 14 (cf. Esth. 3:1); the date fixed for the massacre of the Jews is the fourteenth of Adar rather than the thirteenth (13:6; 10: 13; cf. Esth. 3:13; but also Add. Esth. 16:20).

3. Character. It is generally recognized that the canonical book of Esther is distinguished from other OT literature in its absence of reference to the God of Israel and to Jewish religious rites and practices. The Additions, however, are marked by a frank expression of prayer and devotion. If the prayers of Addition C are original, then the canonical book may represent a deliberate expunging of sacred references, perhaps to permit the story a more secular use at the Festival of Purim. But the spirit of prayer is sadly defaced by the assertion of a dark hostility between Gentiles and Jews (10:10; 13:4-5); indeed, it has been conjectured that the book may have been prepared as an anti-Gentile tract. Like the Wisdom of Solomon, it reflects the widespread anti-Semitism of the time, which found its counterpart in Jewish polemic against all heathen religions and in renewed devotion to the ancestral faith.

Bibliography. L. Ginzberg, Legends of the Jews, IV (1913), 365-448, for the story of Esther based on all known texts; J. A. F. Gregg in R. H. Charles, Apoc. and Pseudep. of the OT (1913), I, 665-71; C. C. Torrey, "The Older Book of Esther," HTR, XXXVII (1944), 1-40; R. H. Pfeiffer, History of NT Times (1949), pp. 304-12; B. M. Metzger, An Introduction to the Apoc. (1957), pp. 55-63. E. W. SAUNDERS

ETAM ē'təm [עיטם, place of birds of prey(?)]. 1. A village in Simeon (I Chr. 4:32; it should probably be supplied before Ain-rimmon in Josh. 15:32, in the Negeb district of Beer-sheba; cf. also Josh. 19:7). The site is unknown.

2. A city of Judah in the hill-country district of Bethlehem (Josh. 15:59*a* LXX, which at this point adds a list of eleven cities of a district centered around Bethlehem, including Tekoa, Peor, Etam, Kerem, and others; cf. also I Chr. 4:3). Etam is probably to be identified with Khirbet el-Khokh, ca. two miles SW of Bethlehem, near Artas. To the W it overlooks 'Ain 'Atan, a spring supplementing 'Ain Salih, the chief source for the three Hellenistic-

Courtesy of Herbert G. May

36. One of Solomon's pools near Etam

Roman reservoirs now called the "pools of Solomon,"* and the S terminus for the aqueduct mentioned below. Fig. ETA 36.

After the secession of the N kingdom, Rehoboam fortified Etam (II Chr. 11:6), probably to secure his position in the S kingdom (cf. vss. 12 ff) as well as to serve as further protection against assault, possibly from the SE.

Josephus (Antiq. VIII.vii.3) describes Etan (Etam) as a favorite rural retreat of Solomon, who enjoyed taking the eight-mile journey from Jerusalem early in the morning in his chariot.

According to Josephus, Pontius Pilate used sacred funds (qorban) to build a great aqueduct two hundred stadia long (ca. twenty-three miles; Antiq. XVIII.iii.2; cf. War II.ix.4, where the length is said to be four hundred stadia). An earlier aqueduct, possibly built by Herod the Great to serve the Herodium leading from 'Ain 'Atan, was incorporated in Pilate's project.

Several passages in the Talmud note that the temple received water from an aqueduct leading from the spring of Etam, said to be ca. a hundred feet higher than the ground level of the temple. Today Bethlehem receives water by a pipe line from 'Ain 'Atan.

Bibliography. H.-J. Kraus, "Chirbet el-chōch," ZDPV, 72 (1956), 152-62. V. R. GOLD

ETAM, ROCK OF [סלע עיטם] (Judg. 15:8, 11). A cave to which Samson resorted after burning the Philistines' crops, and from which the citizens of Judah took him to be handed over to the enraged Philistines. It is possibly to be identified with 'Araq Isma'in, 2½ miles E-SE of Zorah. The platform at the mouth of the cave affords an excellent view of the hills of the Shephelah. V. R. GOLD

ETERNAL LIFE. See LIFE; IMMORTALITY.

ETERNITY. Endless span of time; dominion over time (as an attribute of God). See TIME.

ETHAM ē'thəm [אתם]. The first stopping place of the Israelites after they left Succoth. Both Exod. 13:20; Num. 33:6-8 locate it "on the edge of the wilderness." The name is also given to a part of the Wilderness of Shur (Num. 33:8). Presumably the site was an Egyptian fortress on the E border of Egypt. It was probably located N of Lake Timsah at the edge of the Wadi Tumilat, by which Israel hoped to escape into the wilderness. Finding their way blocked by border fortifications, they were forced to turn back and camp in front of Pi-hahiroth between Migdol and the sea, in front of Baal-zephon.

See also EXODUS, ROUTE OF. J. L. MIHELIC

ETHAN ē'thən [איתן, long-lived, given to a child as a good omen; cf. the adjective איתן, permanent, ever-flowing]. The OT references to Ethan seem to point to four different people. Most of the pertinent material is so obscure or confusing as to produce legitimate questions about this listing. Several different lists have been proposed, ranging from one Ethan to four. Although no single reconstruction is without difficulties, several factors might justify identifying Ethan 1 in the following list with Ethan 2; Ethan 3 with the JOAH (2) of I Chr. 6:21—H 6:6; and Ethan 4 with the JEDUTHUN (1) of I Chr. 16:41; 25:1-2; II Chr. 5:12; 35:15.

1. A son of Zerah, Judah's son by Tamar; the father of Azariah (I Chr. 2:6, 8).

2. A noted wise man called "the EZRAHITE" (האזרחי), earlier than, though possibly contemporary with, Solomon (I Kings 4:31—H 5:11; cf. Ps. 89 title—H 89:1).

3. A Gershomite ancestor of Asaph (I Chr. 6:42—H 6:27).

4. A Merarite, son of Kish (I Chr. 6:44—H 6:29; 15:17, 19).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 224. L. HICKS

ETHANIM ĕth'ə nĭm [אתנים, ever-flowing streams]. The pre-exilic name for the seventh Hebrew month (September-October), of Canaanite origin. It was so called because during this month only permanent streams still contained water, this being the end of the dry season. Later this month was called Tishri. See CALENDAR. S. J. DE VRIES

ETHANUS ĭ thā'nəs [Vulg. Echanus] (II Esd. 14:24); KJV ECANUS ĭ kā'nəs. A scribe listed as one of five who were "trained to write rapidly." J. C. SWAIM

ETHBAAL ĕth'bāl [אתבעל, with him is Baal, or man of Baal; Ιθώβαλος (Jos. Antiq. VIII.xiii.1)]. King of the Sidonians whose daughter Jezebel married Ahab of Israel (I Kings 16:31). A priest of Astarte, he gained the throne by murdering the last of the descendants of Hiram I (Jos. Apion I.xviii). He continued the commercial expansion of the Phoenicians, founding the colony of Auza in Lybia (Jos. Antiq. VIII.xiii.2). The erection of a stele to the Tyrian deity Melcart by Ben-hadad shows that Ethbaal had made an alliance with Damascus as well as Israel. The purpose of these alliances was doubtless to protect Phoenician trade with the hinterland and to ensure against landward attacks. A year-long drought occurred during his reign (Jos. Antiq. VIII.xiii.2; cf. I Kings 17).

Bibliography. J. B. Pritchard, ed., ANET (2nd ed., 1955), p. 501. R. W. CORNEY

ETHER ē'thər [עתר, perfume(?)]. 1. A village of Judah in the Shephelah in the Libnah-Mareshah district (Josh. 15:42); probably to be identified with Khirbet el-'Ater, ca. a mile NW of Eleutheropolis (Beit Jibrin).

2. A village in Simeon (Josh. 19:7; probably to be supplied after Ain-rimmon in 15:32). The parallel list in I Chr. 4:32 reads "Tochen"; "Athach" in I Sam. 30:30 is possibly also a faulty reading for "Ether" (cf. LXX B for Josh. 15:42: Ιταακ). The site is probably Khirbet 'Attir, ca. fifteen miles NE of Beer-sheba. V. R. GOLD

ETHICS IN THE OT. The ethics of the OT is based, not on a philosophical or theoretical system, but on the traditions of both Israel and Canaan, on the sociological necessities of the people, and on the personal religious experiences of the leaders of the congregation.

A. The roots of OT ethics
  1. The traditions
    a. The seminomad cattle-breeders
    b. The peasants
    c. The city dwellers
  2. The sociology of Israel
    a. The tribes
    b. The decline of collectivism
    c. The decline of objectivism
  3. Personal experiences
    a. The sages and the prophets
    b. Job and Ecclesiastes
    c. The Yahwistic writer of the Pentateuch

B. The Yahwistic character of OT ethics
  1. The covenant
    a. The historical character of OT ethics
    b. The religious basis of OT sexual ethics

c. The limitations of OT ethics
2. "You shall be holy, for I am holy"
a. Yahweh's selection of Israel, and his mercy
b. Yahweh's might
c. Yahweh's representatives
Bibliography

A. THE ROOTS OF OT ETHICS. 1. The traditions. The traditions of Israel were not those of the camel-riding nomads in the desert who, in the first century after the occupation of Canaan, were the enemies plundering the harvest and the herds (Judg. 6:3; 7:12). The camel, which was for Israel an unclean animal (Num. 11:4; Deut. 14:7), was never the main basis of their wealth. But it may be that the strong sense of liberty and democracy which characterizes the political attitude of Israel before and during the monarchy was influenced by some reminiscences from the free life in the desert.

a. The seminomad cattle-breeders. The main trend of Israelite tradition derives from the cattle-breeding seminomads who lived on the borders of the cultivated land. They depended on the possibility of watering their flocks in due time and having grass for them during the whole year. For this they were obliged to conclude treaties between their own groups and with the owners of the cultivated grounds concerning the springs and wells or the allowance of gleanings after the ingathering and in the years of fallow. The sacredness of covenants (ברית) was essential for their life, including the covenant with their God, who might increase or stop the fertility of their animals, retain or give rain, multiply or diminish the wild beasts or the serpents, and protect the people from demons or human enemies who were frequently swifter and better armed. After the invasion of Canaan they preserved the feeling that they had not got it by their own strength (Deut. 6:10; 8:11 ff) but that they had depended on their mighty God in the past and depended on him in the present time and in the future. In contrast to the peasant, the cattle-breeder was for them the man whom Yahweh liked (Gen. 4:3-5), and some groups among them tried to retain these inherited forms of life even in Palestine until the sixth century B.C. (Jer. 35). The social differences among them were small, the dangers of life being nearly the same for every member of a group. Compared with the peasant, they were poor; compared with the Bedouins, generally peaceful—e.g., Abraham (cf. Gen. 13:8), with exception in Gen. 14. Since they were obliged to stay together, their ethics had to be an ethics of brotherhood and of dependence upon a God who protected faithfully (e.g., Exod. 34:6) the poor (e.g., Ps. 118:6 ff) and asked faithfulness toward himself and among the members of his covenant (e.g., Hos. 4:1). They might sacrifice the first-born animal of their flocks, and the question arose early if there was a possibility of saving the life of the first-born son (Exod. 13:15; 34:20) and of the first-born of the most important animal in their wanderings, the ass (Exod. 13:13; 34:20). They did not need holy places for their cult but might sacrifice anywhere they liked and wherever their God wandering with them ordered (Exod. 20:24).

b. The peasants. The attitude of the peasant was quite another one. He stayed on the ground he had inherited from his fathers, who had freed the field from stones, planted the fruitful trees, built the house, and dug the well or the cistern. They were buried in the neighborhood or even under the house. As their heir he had the right and the duty to defend his substance against all who wanted to detract from it, even against his own king who offered a good exchange (I Kings 21:2-3). The connection with the fathers—in the later formulations of the law understood as the commandment of Yahweh, who gave the estate to them—had to be preserved, even when it was sold for economic reasons. In every fiftieth year, the "Jubilee" (see JUBILEE, YEAR OF), the ground in the open country (not in the walled cities!) went back to the family of its former owner (Lev. 25:8 ff). The peasant's life, of course, was endangered by lack of rain, by locusts, and by human enemies, but not in the same degree as that of the seminomads. From time immemorial his field was under the protection of its Baal, who secured its fertility (cf. Hos. 2:15), and the peasant did well to give him his tribute from the crops and to honor him and his Astarte by the ancient rites, including the "holy wedding" in the High Place. The tradition in which the Israelite peasant lived was to a high degree formed by pre-Israelite customs. The peasant was a traditionalist who wanted to deliver his ancestors' heritage to his son by teaching him to do as his fathers had done (Exod. 13:14 ff).

c. The city dwellers. The third group is the city dweller in the former Canaanite cities occupied by the Israelites mostly under David (Jerusalem [II Sam. 5:6 ff]) and Solomon (e.g., Gezer [I Kings 9:16-17]), built (Samaria [I Kings 16:24]) or rebuilt (e.g., Jericho [I Kings 16:34]) by them. The Canaanite population became amalgamated with the Israelite overlords, and these themselves incorporated in the economic and social system of city life. As centers of handicraft, of primitive industries, and of international commerce (I Kings 20:34), the towns were centers of higher artistic culture in the temples, the kings' strongholds (cf. I Kings 22:39), and the houses of the wealthier people (cf. Amos 3:15; 6:4). They were too the intermediaries with the literature and the thinking ("wisdom") of foreign countries. As every "capitalist," the city dweller loaned money to the poorer—e.g., the peasant in a year without rain—or to widows and orphans in actual need, and asked for a pledge consisting, in the case of the poorest, of their garment (Exod. 22:25-26), their children (Exod. 21:7), or their personal freedom (Deut. 15:12 ff). The use of such financial superiority without pity was in perpetual conflict with the Israelite ethics of COVENANT and under the curse of the covenant God (e.g., Isa. 5:8 ff; Mic. 2:1 ff), the rich becoming the godless and the poor the godly. So the ethical traditions in the OT are not uniform or homogeneous but derive from different sources according to the manifold national and social groups forming the "Israelite" people.

2. The sociology of Israel. a. The tribes. The influence of the sociology of Israel upon the ethics of the OT went even deeper as the social structure of the whole life of the people underwent essential changes. At the beginning there was the confederation of tribes united by the veneration of Yahweh as their common God. His ordinances were destined primarily to preserve peace in their midst by securing life, wife, possession, and honor of every member (Exod. 20:13-16), especially of father and mother (Exod. 21:15-17), against bad words, bad acts, and even all covetousness (Exod. 20:17). After the occupation of Canaan these leading principles of the "moral" decalogue (see TEN COMMANDMENTS) and the Book of the Covenant (Exod. 20–23) were adapted to the new necessities. They tried to protect the house (Exod. 20:17) and the field's frontier (Deut. 19:14; 27:17), to lower the hardships of an economic system based on slave labor—especially for a male or female "Hebrew" slave (Exod. 21:1 ff)—and to avoid abuses of pledges (Exod. 22:24 ff). But this social system proved unsatisfactory in the Philistine crisis which obliged Israel to install a KING in the interest of national self-preservation. Now some political duties arose: the loyalty to Yahweh's anointed (I Sam. 24:7; II Sam. 1:14), the payment of taxes, and the acknowledgment of some rights limiting the personal freedom and the power of the family's head over his children (I Sam. 8:11 ff). But the influence of the kings on the ethics remained so restrained that only one rule is said to have been instituted by David (I Sam. 30:24). The Israelite ethics did not become a political one, for the monarchy was only an episode in Israel's history, and the division into two states after only two generations lowered the influence of the kings. The Persian authorities, when reconstituting the congregation by Artaxerxes' order, did so on the basis of the older law of the God of heavens who dwells in Jerusalem (Ezra 7:12 ff) and did not ask, in the political field, for more than the prayer for the king (Ezra 6:10). The sociological form of Israel's life was from the fifth century again the congregation, but now its members were no more tribes but single men.

b. The decline of collectivism. This was, indeed, the deepest change in the ethical, as in the religious, field: the decline of collectivism. Of course, there had been a certain individualism in Israel before II Kings 14:6; Deut. 24:16; Ezek. 18. There were early personal responsibilities—e.g., the Levirate marriage to be contracted by the surviving brother under specialized regulations (Gen. 38:8). The formulation of the lex talionis in Exod. 21:23 may be ambiguous, "you" being either (as clearly in Lev. 24:19) the offender or his social group who may be hurt in any of its members, but in Exod. 21:28 ff the lord of the ox is alone responsible and is alone to be punished. But the main ethical subject in the older times was, without question, the collective unit—the wider FAMILY embracing all generations of common blood living together (cf. even Ps. 133:1), later the matriarchal or (since David only) the patriarchal family embracing parents and their children, the tribe, the congregation, the nation. The "you" of the Decalogue is clearly "Israel," to whom Yahweh gave the Promised Land. The unit as ethical subject had to put out of its midst all transgressors of the fundamental statutes (e.g., Deut. 13:6) or to punish the minor "sinners" according to the rules given by custom or by law. The unit had to search for any guilt among its members, by testimonies of witnesses or by oracle, and to watch over equal right for the rich and for the poor (Exod. 23:1 ff) without partiality and bribes (Deut. 1:17; 16:19). The responsibility for the unit lay with its representatives—the father, the elders, the kings, and the priests—in the double sense that the unit was punished for their sins (II Sam. 24:15) and that they themselves had to bear the transgressions of their unit (cf. Isa. 53:5). Besides this the guilt of any member of the unit might be the cause of a catastrophe for the whole group (cf. Josh. 7:11). The responsibility thus put on every action brought forth the great earnestness of OT ethics.

This collectivism soon was felt to be an injustice. It was thought to be better that ten righteous save the wicked town than that they perish with it (Gen. 18:32). As such individualistic criticism was older in the higher cultures of Egypt and Mesopotamia than the existence of Israel, the decline of collectivism was stronger in a milieu with early foreign influences, especially in the WISDOM literature. The wise men taught a personal ethical attitude, among younger people, in the sexual life, in behavior toward older men in higher social position, and in a prudent respect before God. So long as the unit was the ethical subject, every misfortune was explicable by the sin of the fathers (Exod. 20:5) or an unknown member to be discovered by lot or by other methods of inquiry (Josh. 7:14; I Sam. 14:40 ff). The individualistic outlook, with its personal responsibility, led to the ethical crisis we see in the life of Jeremiah (cf. 15:15 ff; 20:7 ff), in Ps. 73, in Job and Ecclesiastes accusing God of injustice in his deeds. "Justice" meant now: to give to the individual life or death according to his personal attitude. But in spite of all declarations of Ezekiel, the fate of every member was so interwoven with the life and death of his unit that a separation according to his righteousness or wickedness remained a dogmatic dream in this world. Only faith in a compensation in the world to come (cf. Dan. 12:2-3) might hinder the development of an ethical skepticism, which was inevitably connected with an individualistic outlook combining good deeds and good life, piety and fortune.

c. The decline of objectivism. This decline of collectivism went hand in hand with the decline of an objectivism for which "sin" might exist without knowledge and intention of the acting person. For an old but long-surviving attitude, to be "guilty" did not depend on the will to violate a commandment. The Babylonian surgeon was punished severely when his patient died (Code of Hammurabi § 215), and an Assyrian adulterer even when he did not know that the woman with whom he had had intercourse was married (Assyrian Law § 22). This is exactly the case in the Yahwistic writer's version of Pharaoh and Sarah's situation, and Gen. 12:18 shows clearly his criticism of the tradition he had to tell. The same criticism is highly enforced by the Elohistic version in Gen. 20:1 ff, and is to be seen in some regulations starting already with the Book of the Covenant (see COVENANT, BOOK OF THE). The owner of a goring ox that killed a man was free from guilt if he had not been told that this beast was accustomed to gore (Exod. 21:28-29). In the same way, a man who struck another without having lain in wait for him might flee to an asylum ordered by God (Exod. 21:13). For the other old oriental laws too, objectivism declined, and guilt became connected only with will and knowledge. This development influenced deeply the ethical consciousness: to be a sinner was no more a question of fate but of man's decision.

3. Personal experiences. a. The sages and the prophets. In the different groups among the people the right ethical attitude was taught by different men: in the family by the father (and the mother), in the cultic organization by the priest (see PRIESTS AND LEVITES) or the cultic prophet who gave advice about the sacrifices and the conditions for the admission to the holy place. In the tribe the elders had the same duty, and in the congregation of the tribes the "Speaker" (נשיא), who proclaimed in the great assembly of the seventh year the duties toward God and fellow men. The sages taught the sons of the wealthier families and received as compensation a certain amount. They taught what they had learned from their predecessors (Job 8:8 ff), and their authority was based on the conformity of their sayings with experiences had and to be had again in practical life with the king, the great or the poor, the good or the bad wife (Prov. 16:10 ff; 19:6 ff; 23: 29 ff). They believed that the rules according to which Yahweh rewarded deeds were to be seen in the realities of life, that they might be taught, and that in this way the fear of him was the beginning of knowledge (Prov. 1:8). It was considered better to learn what the sages had experienced in the civil and the religious field (Eccl. 7:5; 9:17-18), and in their optimism they thought that everybody who learned the right way would be able to do what he was taught (cf. Deut. 30:15 ff).

But there was another group of "teachers" who were in connection with the tradition but depended to a much higher degree on their own experiences—the prophets (see PROPHET). They shared the tradition that Yahweh was the only God of the covenant, demanding brotherhood, punishing his people for all transgressions (Amos 3:2). In the soul of the prophet Yahweh's demands for pity upon the poor, his warnings against all luxury (e.g., Amos 6:1 ff) and the abuse of wealth (cf. Amos 2:6 ff), were so overwhelming that the cult became worthless in their eyes (e.g., Isa. 1:10 ff; Amos 5:21 ff) and the greatest sacrifices (e.g., Mic. 6:6 ff) an offense to the God of justice and mercy. They heard Yahweh's words proclaiming his own faithfulness and the nation's faithlessness with such tremendous power that they were convinced: his holiness obliged him now to make an end. As messenger of God the prophet had to announce in his own words the terrible things he had heard, and this obedience against his own desires was the prophet's ethics. The single demands he had to proclaim were not original. The protection of widows and orphans belonged, like care for the needy, to the deeds of the true king in the Egyptian or the Mesopotamian ideology, as well as of the Ugaritic Danel. That "God" preferred righteousness to sacrifice was recognized long before I Sam. 15:22 by an old Egyptian sage. Original is the strength with which social justice and brotherhood was confessed to be the central, and sometimes even the only, demand of Yahweh; the preponderant, and sometimes even the exclusive, characteristic of ethics in his will. Such earnestness destroyed all optimistic outlook in Jeremiah's experiences (13:23). For him and for Ezekiel the right ethical attitude was not made possible by teaching, but only by a miracle of their God in changing the heart of stone into a heart of flesh and giving his spirit of obedience and good will (Jer. 31:33-34; 36:26 ff).

b. Job and Ecclesiastes. In spite of the fact that the sages were generally more bound to tradition, there were among them men whose belief in the truth of what they had learned was corroborated—or, on the contrary, destroyed—by personal experiences. Both types are to be found in the book of Job (see JOB, BOOK OF). The common dogma of the just reward of men's deeds by God is reinforced for Elihu by a personal revelation (Job 4:16 ff), but the sage speaking through Job himself has learned by his sufferings that this teaching is wrong—again, dogmatic dream. There is no interdependence of fate and justice (e.g., 9:19-23). Only a personal vision of God's majesty and the greatness of his creative power is able, not to solve the intellectual problem, but to teach the sufferer that he has no right at all to question God's actions. Such a critical attitude also has its precursors in the oriental literature starting with the so-called "Sumerian Job." But what we find in the biblical book of Job does not depend on the reading of such texts or the hearing about them. This crisis comes with inner necessity in an ethical attitude which tries to calculate and is pious not "for nought" (Job 1:9).

Similar things are to be said of ECCLESIASTES. Here too we are in the presence of personal experiences (e.g., 1:12 ff; 2:1 ff, 12-16, 20 ff) which destroyed the traditional outlook so completely that the only ethical counsel to be given in this world of "vanity of vanities" is the use of the occasions to rejoice which God gives and to fear him—i.e., not to provoke his punishments. This skepticism has its parallels in the Greek philosophical literature but its roots in the personal thinking of a sage poet who felt with sorrow the differences between dogma and life.

c. The Yahwistic writer of the Pentateuch. Such personal experiences of life's injustice made by a sage even in the beginning of Israelite wisdom are reflected as early as in the work of the Yahwistic writer (J) in the Pentateuch. He does not criticize the collectivism of God's punishments in its totality. In the beginnings of men's history the disobedience of the first couple was the reason for all sufferings, including death of the whole of mankind. Such dogma may be preached where no momentary practical question is to be answered. But when in the wars between Israel and their neighbors cities were destroyed with all the cruelties of that time (cf. I Sam. 11:2; 27:9), doubts arose about the justice of the results of such warfare methods. Such doubts are living already in Tablet XI of the Gilgamesh Epic, whose content is surely much older than the only preserved Ninevite Text: The Deluge, says Ea, was "unreasoning," because it did not impose the consequences of sin (only) to the sinners (ANET 95). Far be it from God to slay the righteous with the wicked (Gen. 18:25; cf. Job 9:22; Eccl. 8:14). "History," as he had experienced it and feared that he would have to experience it again, became for J a problem whose riddle was not to be solved by human thinking. The attitude of Pharaoh during the Egyptian plagues was understandable only by the fact that Yahweh hardened his heart (Exod. 7:3). His justice thus becomes a formal one: he punishes sins whose ultimate cause he is himself (cf. Ezek. 20:25-26; Rom. 1:24 ff). In spite of such riddles man has to believe in God's promises. Confidence in Yahweh's words, beginning with the promise given to Abraham, and obedience toward his demands even when they are not understandable, is the only right ethical attitude for the Israelite pious. Its model is the Yahwistic (and later the Elohistic) picture of Abraham himself leaving his country (and sacrificing his son), the contrary the lack of faith in Yahweh's guidance through Moses shown by the generation in the wilderness.

B. THE YAHWISTIC CHARACTER OF OT ETHICS. 1. The covenant. a. The historical character of OT ethics. In view of pre-Israelite traditions and extra-Israelite influences upon the ethics of the OT, the fact has to be underlined that they underwent very deep changes, not only by the development of the nation's life and culture but to an even higher degree by the deciding force of the faith in Yahweh the God of the COVENANT. This alliance is considered after the model of the suzerainty treaties of the ancient Near East which were contracted between a mightier king (e.g., the Hittite Great King) and his vassals. The former ordained the conditions under which his partners might live in peace and friendship with him. The mightier was free to make or not to make the covenant, but if he made it, he too was bound to fulfil what he promised. The obligations of both sides might greatly differ, but the sanctity of the covenant was the same for them under the guarantee of the gods. By establishing the covenant Yahweh limited his own freedom, and he did so in complete liberty without any preceding obligation or rational motive. His love for Israel and the fathers (cf., e.g., Deut. 4:36; 7:8) was as inexplicable as every true love in the world. This covenant was for the Israelite faith a historical fact connected in all traditions with Moses and the liberation from Egyptian bondage, and its stipulations contained from the beginning religious and ethical norms. Consequently, the OT ethics took on a strong "historical" character, at least so far as it was governed by the prescriptions of the law. The sages (see § A3*a above*) might give rational warnings against visiting a harlot, drunkenness, or friendship with a gossip (Prov. 5: 3 ff; 20:1; 29:20). The Law (see LAW IN THE OT) gives its orders in Yahweh's name without any reasoning why he demands such or such an attitude. It is probable that in a prehistoric time some hygienic experiences had provoked CIRCUMCISION or the prohibition of pork, which is not easily digestible under high temperatures. Cases of illness for such reasons may have been—as all such experiences—interpreted as signs of anger of a god or a demon. In the OT we find no trace at all of reflections of this kind. The reason, known perhaps a millennium or more before Abraham and Moses, had been completely forgotten. Yahweh stipulated as conditions of his covenant what he liked. For this the cultic and the ethical commandments were, for the law, on the same level of importance. The Decalogue forbids the making of images and labor on the sabbath with the same earnestness as murder, adultery, and theft. In the "apodictic" utterances of the Book of the Covenant the strikes and curses against father and mother and the boiling of a kid in his mother's milk (Exod. 21: 15, 17; 23:19) are both sins against the God of the covenant. Where reasons are given for a statute, they are not rational but historical. Why is the male firstling of the cattle to be set apart to the Lord? Because Yahweh slew the first-born in the land of Egypt (Exod. 13:14)! Why is it forbidden to make an IMAGE of Yahweh? Because Israel heard the sound of his words out of the midst of the fire but saw no form on that day (Deut. 4:12, 15). Why shall a manservant and a maidservant rest on the SABBATH? There are two explanations, both historical: because of God's rest on the seventh day (Exod. 20:11) or because Israel was a slave himself in Egypt (Deut. 5: 15). When through the incorporation of Canaanite sanctuaries into the Israelite cult their prescriptions became adapted to it, they too were considered as given by Yahweh in the legislation on Sinai or in the land of Moab. They were observed "because they are ordered and belong to all works of the Most-High" (Ecclus. 33:7; 35:7 ff).

Behind all sayings of Yahweh there is the same authority of his tremendous power, shown first of all in the liberation from Egypt, and of his anger, shown in his punishing the people in the wilderness. From this authority the two main motives of Israel's ethics gained their historical and not at all dogmatic reason: to fear and to love him. The God of the covenant had the right to bless or to curse his people according to their deeds, because the tradition knew that Israel had accepted the stipulations of the covenant (Exod. 19:8; 24:3; Josh. 24:21 ff) voluntarily and had been instructed about its risk, and there was no other god able to protect the nation against Yahweh's wrath. Of course, human nature misled Israel frequently to misunderstand such a covenant with the mighty God to be an unconditioned guarantee, to consider Yahweh's self-binding as an absolute obligation for him to help in any case, to forget what was told about the fiery serpents or the plague of Shittim (Num. 21:6; 25:1). Corroborating such elements in the writings of J and E in the Pentateuch, the Deuteronomists stylized the whole history of Israel from Egypt until the catastrophe of 587 as history of sin, and preached Yahweh's vengeance against all unfaithfulness. This earnestness of Yahweh's demands for deeds was based on what they had to tell about his deeds, and the people's confidence in his truth had its basis in the experiences of his grace in the past. The tension between fear and love in the Israelite ethics, as in Israelite piety, the irrationalism of the law, and the great earnestness with which obedience and faith were asked for have the same root: the historical character of the covenant. Consequently, the prophetic polemics against the cult's endangering the right ethical attitude by its "heathenish" methods and rites had to be historical: Yahweh did not speak to the fathers concerning burnt offerings and sacrifices (Jer. 7:22; cf. Amos 5:25). What is said to men is not a list of offerings, but to do justice and to love kindness and to walk humbly with God (Mic. 6:8).

b. The religious basis of OT sexual ethics. This influence of the covenant ideology was not only a formal one but also decided, to a certain degree, the contents of the Israelite ethics. First of all, the fact has to be taken into account that there is only one God of the covenant. Other nations might have other gods and goddesses—the question at what time the last theoretical consequences were drawn of Israel's "monotheism" is not to be solved here—but the congregation that had entered into the covenant had to worship no other god and to trust in no help of any other "divine" being (departed spirit, demon). This uniqueness was reinforced by Yahweh's jealousy. He wanted his uniqueness to be recognized by facts and deeds and not by theories. No other god should partake of his glory. Not to adore other gods or an image even of Yahweh himself meant to exclude from his service, e.g., the manners and rites connected in the religions of the ancient Near East with the sexual differentiation of the pantheon: the imitation of the "holy wedding" between gods and goddesses in the form of the so-called holy prostitution in the sanctuaries. No sacred harlot (קדשה, "a holy one") should be in Israel (Deut. 23:17). There existed in Israel, as even in Christian countries of the present age, harlots (זונות) who seduced the youngsters (Prov. 7:10 ff), but to have intercourse with them was a secular (and bad), not a sacred, act. The priests were forbidden to marry one of them (Lev. 21:14), and what they earned should not be brought to the temple in payment of any vow (Deut. 23:18). Every father had the duty of preventing his daughter's going that way, to avoid bad example (Lev. 19:29). A priest's daughter or a widow committing harlotry was to be killed (Gen. 38:24; Lev. 21:9), as an adulterous couple (Lev. 20:10).

By these ordinances much license in the sexual field was prohibited (at least in theory) and the whole matter of love brought into close connection with Yahweh and his will. This fact is of high importance for OT ethics, because the regulations of betrothal and marriage in the old oriental civil laws, including those of the Israelites, had been primarily dominated by economic and financial, not by ethical, reasons. The bride price (מהר) was to be paid to the father of the girl either in labor (Gen. 29:18, 27), in money, or in other goods (Exod. 22:16). A boy who would try to avoid such duty by seducing a girl and so lowering her value risked having to pay the מהר without getting her. Later, he had to deliver to the father fifty shekels—i.e., five times the valuation for a girl of the same age in the case of a special vow of persons (Lev. 27:3) and nearly twice the price of a slave (Exod. 21:32), and he lost the right of divorce (Deut. 22:29). Intercourse with a betrothed girl who was already in the possession of her future husband was equal to adultery and consequently punished by the death of both, except when the girl cried for help (Deut. 22:22 ff).

But these economic regulations were combined with another system, for which sexuality was primarily under a taboo which nobody could break without the most serious consequences. To offend the rules of the taboo meant to commit something evil and to work folly (נבלה; cf. I Sam. 25:25). Who did so became himself unclean, and his impurity infected the community in which he lived and which tolerated him as its member. In Israel this system was incorporated in the Yahwistic law. It was Yahweh's command that the sexual sinner was to be purged from the midst of Israel (Deut. 22:21) exactly as, e.g., the seducer to the service of foreign gods (Deut. 13:9; 17:7), the false witness, or a man's abductor (Deut. 19:19; 24:7). It was Yahweh who regulated the מהר. For him a harlot's hire or the marriage of a man with his own divorced wife who had belonged in the meantime to another husband was an abomination (תעבה; cf. Deut. 23:17; 24:4) which defiled the land. So adultery became a great sin and wickedness against God, a despite of Yahweh's word, and evil in his sight (II Sam. 12:9). Even to look upon a virgin (Job 31:1) was forbidden for a man who wanted to be just. Of course, in Israel, as everywhere in the world, young lovers did not ask too much about what was allowed, as the Song of Solomon shows. They had their pleasures where they might find them. If the theory that the Song of Solomon was originally a sacred play showing the holy wedding of Tammuz and Ishtar is right, this book would testify to the importance of the fact that these rites were forbidden in Israel. But the regulation of the sexual life within the covenant with Yahweh did not mean asceticism. All irregularities such as homosexuality or intercourse with an animal or with certain members of the family were an abomination for Yahweh (Lev. 20:11-17), but not the regular use of the vital forces. In the beginning he ordered the man and his wife to be fruitful and multiply, and this command was a part of his first blessing (Gen. 1:28). The joy of the bridegroom leaving his chamber is a poetical image of the rising sun (Ps. 19:5). Children were Yahweh's gift (Ps. 127:3), and a son born in his father's old age was a real source of pride for him (Gen. 44:20). It was Yahweh's promise to multiply Abraham's descendants as the stars of heaven and as the sand on the seashore (Gen. 22:17). To be childless was a hard fate and a severe punishment for a wife, and she asked her god to take it away from her (I Sam. 1:10 ff). To cause a miscarriage, even unwillingly, was an act to be fined (Exod. 21:22 ff). While there was no monastic ideal in Israel before the Essenes, the OT ethics in the sexual field was dominated, not by an asceticism which would go against the Creator's intentions, but by a feeling of shame (Gen. 3:2) which detested all behavior opposite to the monastic ideal (Deut. 25:11-12) and had very strong anti-Canaanite roots. The fear of nakedness, especially in the cult (Exod. 20:26; cf. 28:42; 39:28), may have had its origin in the prehistoric belief in the god dwelling in the stone, but the combination of this fear with the first disobedience in Gen. 3:7, 10, shows a deeper feeling. It is in the strictest contrast with the representations of the old oriental goddess (e.g., the Syrian Qadesh in Egyptian reliefs) in her complete nakedness, frequently with exaggerated demonstration of her sexuality. See SEX.

c. The limitations of OT ethics. The covenant ideology was, finally, the reason for some limitations within OT ethics. A deep gorge existed between the duties toward a member of the covenant's congregation, including the sojourners who were in a legal contract with an Israelite family or tribe (as a "ger"), and all members of a foreign nation. Even the prohibition to bear false witness is limited in some commands by the words "against your neighbor" (Exod. 20:16), not taken in a local sense but designating the member of a smaller or larger community to which both belong. Jeremiah did not hesitate to tell a lie to save the king's life (Jer. 38:25-27), and the storytellers accepted the legend that Yahweh counseled Samuel to feign a sacrifice in order to hide the conspiracy with David before Saul (I Sam. 16:2), or in the story of Elisha's provoking Hazael to give a wrong oracle to Ben-hadad (II Kings 8:10). Good deeds, even of a foreigner, might constitute a community within which a lie should not be told (Gen. 12:16 ff; 20:9). Hospitality protected the foreigner from all danger, but the killing of the king of the enemies might nevertheless be celebrated (Judg. 5: 24 ff).

How a foreigner could become a SOJOURNER is not mentioned in the OT. There was a great variety of political or economic reasons which would oblige a man to leave his homeland and go to worship foreign gods—e.g., Ruth's following her husband's mother (Ruth 1:16; cf. I Sam. 26:19). Once recognized as a sojourner, he was to be protected by all tribes forming the covenant, even against the tribe whose guest he was (Judg. 20:3 ff); this regulation favored the Levites living without their own tribal inheritance as sojourners in the midst of the other tribes.

The sojourner had to observe some ethical, as well as cultic, laws—e.g., the laws regulating sexual behavior (Lev. 18:26). He was forbidden to work on the sabbath (Exod. 20:10; Deut. 5:14), to curse Yahweh (Lev. 24:16), to worship Molech (Lev. 20: 2), or to sacrifice in the wrong place (Lev. 17:8 ff). He was under the jus talionis (Lev. 24:22), as he benefited by the asylum, the water for impurity, and the offerings for error (Num. 15:26; 19:10 ff; 35:15). Generally he was among the poor, always facing the risk of being obliged to sell himself (Lev. 25:45), and for this he was admitted to the poor's privileges: the daily payment of his hire, the tithe of the third year, the gleanings and the fallen grapes especially in the seventh year (Lev. 19:9-10; 25:6; Deut. 24:14; 14:28; cf. Deut. 24:19). Yahweh liked these sojourners and did not want Israel to forget that they themselves had been sojourners in Egypt (e.g., Exod. 22:21; Deut. 10:17 ff). But this love of Yahweh for them did not involve the possibility of changing the economic status. When a sojourner became rich and was able to lend to an Israelite, such a situation was considered as Yahweh's curse against Israel (Deut. 28:43).

That the treatment of the sojourners was primarily based, not on a humanitarian feeling, but on their legal status as partial partakers in the covenant is seen by the fact that toward all other foreigners there was no humanitarian feeling at all. The cruelties of David against the Geshurites, the Girzites, and the Amalekites are reported without any pity or criticism (I Sam. 27:8), which is lacking too in the ordinances to destroy utterly all nations dwelling in Palestine, from the Hittites to the Jebusites (Deut. 20:17). Such regulation is reported to have been executed in the cases of Jericho (with the exception of Rahab's family [Josh. 6:23 ff]) and Ai (Josh. 8:25), but not in the cases of Jerusalem (cf. Ezek. 16:3) and Gibeon (Josh. 9:3). The cruelties of old oriental warfare were excused in later times by the covenant ideology. Foreign nations dwelling in the midst of Israel could become a danger for the exclusiveness of Yahweh's worship (Deut. 20:19). Economic reasons were in opposition to such fervor. It was better that the inhabitants of a foreign town do forced labor for Israel, the women together with the children and the cattle be taken as booty, alive or fruitful trees give their fruits to the Israelite conqueror instead of being killed or cut (Deut. 20:10 ff), but all these milder regulations were limited to the cities far away and not endangering the covenant. In the same way the "humanitarian" interdiction of being a hard creditor or of taking interest was limited to "any of my people" (Exod. 22:25). It was permissible to loan upon interest to a foreigner (Deut. 23:19 ff) who too did not benefit from the release in the seventh year like a slave bought from a foreign country (Deut. 15:3; Lev. 25:6). And the lawgiver knew that even within the covenant there was much hardness of human heart, giving to humanitarian regulations the opposite effect. The POOR from whom one was forbidden to take interest might be unable to get money or victuals he needed in an actual famine; but the Deuteronomist fights against such base considerations by the utopian promise that there shall be no poor in the land and by the fear that Yahweh will listen when the poor cries to him (Deut. 15:4, 9, 11).

2. "You shall be holy, for I am holy." a. Yahweh's selection of Israel, and his mercy. Yahweh himself acted in a different way toward Israel and toward the foreign nations. He selected Israel to be his people—or, according to a tradition nearly forgotten in the actual text of the OT, the Most High gave him Israel as his people (Deut. 32:8-9)—and this selection included duties not only for Israel but also for Yahweh himself. He had to protect it from enemies, from famine, lack of rain, locusts, earthquake, and all other dangers connected with Palestinian life. His care for Israel included too the obligation to give them a cult and a ritual by which to cleanse them from all physical and spiritual impurity, to teach them the right way leading to life and blessing (Deut. 30:19). The old oriental gods were believed to be at the same time terrible and friendly, givers of death and sustainers of life, punishing and forgiving sins. The only question was which moment was stronger in every one of them, as the dispute between Ea and En-lil, who produced the great flood in the Gilgamesh Epic, shows for the Babylonian religion. Yahweh was among the terrifying when he appeared accompanied by pestilence and plague (Hab. 3:5), and Israel's sins might oblige him to bring all his terrors over them. The imagery of his curses, especially in Deut. 28, shows a perversion of feeling exceeding the terrors in the curses in the abovementioned treaties between old oriental states. But when Israel observed his statutes, it would enjoy all his goodness. In the old oriental picture of the ideal god and the ideal king, their goodness included their care for widows, orphans, and the poor whose protector the king had to be. He was not allowed to take the vineyard he liked by killing the possessor (I Kings 21:1 ff). Yahweh treated his people as the "poor." He refrained from using his kingly, terrifying power against Israel. In the same manner he desired that in the midst of his people the rich, the mighty, and first of all the king refrain from using their economic or political power against their poorer brethren and even against slaves. The slave (see SLAVERY) too, if he was an Israelite or belonged to the privileged class of the Habiru, was free from working on the sabbath and was to be released at the end of the seventh year if he liked and he had to be provided with some food for the first days of his liberty (Exod. 20:10; 21:1 ff; Deut. 15:12 ff), in remembrance that Israel had been a slave in Egypt (Exod. 20:2). To rule over one of his brethren with harshness was forbidden for every Israelite (Lev. 25:46). The old feeling for liberty and democracy, which may have been inherited from the sojourn in the desert, was integrated into the religious faith in Yahweh's mercy for his people and its members.

To be holy meant for God not to be overwhelmed by his anger like a man's losing self-control (Hos. 11:8-9). And it was the duty of every Israelite to be holy like him—compassionate and merciful. This "humanitarian" feeling toward the members of the covenant did not include Yahweh's general humanization. His anger against his and his people's enemies remained as terrible as ever until the latest testimonies in the OT—e.g., the picture of the glorious one coming from Edom in crimsoned garments (Isa. 63:1) or of the undying worm in the last verse of the book of Isaiah (66:24). In the same way none of Yahweh's enemies had to be pitied or spared, even by his own father or mother (Deut. 13:8). The covenant with Yahweh prevailed over the family! Antagonism against the breakers of the covenant limited the "humanism" both of Yahweh and of the Israelites. Loving God was combined with the commandment to love one's NEIGHBOR, but the neighbor was limited by the "sons of your own people" in the same verse, Lev. 19:18. It was only against the neighbor in this sense that the Israelites were not to have any hate or desire for vengeance. The injunction alluded to in Matt. 5:43 ("You shall . . . hate your enemy") is not to be found in the OT and reflects its spirit only when understood of the enemy, not in the private, but in the public sphere, the enemy being the member of a community outside the covenant, a community with which there was no "peace." In private life the commandment of Lev. 19:17-18 is interpreted by the wisdom literature as including giving aid to the enemy when he was hungry or thirsty, and Yahweh would reward the Israelite who did so (Prov. 25:21-22)—Paul does not cite this promise when he combines Lev. 19:18 with Deut. 32:35 in Rom. 12:19.

b. Yahweh's might. Within the covenant the ethics of the OT was governed by faith in the power of Yahweh in the creation of the world and no less in the history of Israel, as well by help as by punishments. This power was greater than any human faculty. Before Yahweh all men were nothing, fading flowers when his breath blew upon them (Isa. 40:7). There was no exception for anyone—not for the great king of the world empire nor for the prophet who remained always man and never became a deified being. To recognize the difference between God and man, never to forget the distance existing between them, is the main point in OT ethics. Man shall be like God in his life's conduct according to God's love and truth within the covenant. But he is not allowed to become like God in the sphere of power and knowledge. Both belong together. Yahweh had power because of his knowledge of all that existed, of the good deeds and thoughts as well as of the bad ones. Without knowledge, power is blind and justice impossible, and without power knowledge is useless. By the Spirit of Yahweh the Messiah would have them both (Isa. 11:2). Because the "knowledge of good and evil" embraces the creative power producing life (see GOOD), this was the first temptation: to want to be like God exactly by knowing good and evil, to "know" by sexual intercourse (Gen. 3:5). What is for the priestly writer Yahweh's greatest blessing for men he created in his image, is for the Yahwist obtained by disobedience and for this reason under the curse: to be fruitful, and by this not to "die" but to survive in offspring. The desire to "live" is attested by the whole old oriental literature. But to try to live against God's commandment and the limitations set by him is the first and greatest sin destroying the possibilities of "life." Man has the right to be proud—God made him little less than himself (Ps. 8:5)—but he has to acknowledge precisely this "little less" by word and deed. This is what Job has to learn by the speeches of God in the storm, through the majestic questions about the origin of cosmic phenomena. And this is the background of the prohibition to produce images. Whoever fabricates an image is its lord, since he has the right even of destroying it. The artist would have a magic power even over the god whose figure he made, and for this the feeling of the distance between Yahweh and all men hindered the development of any religious art and, on account of the primary importance of religion in all ancient art, the development of any art. It became an ethical duty not to be an artist. Even in the expression that man is fashioned in the image of God, the same feeling of distance is at work. It testifies at the same time to the democratic feeling of Israel—man and not the king, as in Assyria, is god's image!—and to God's superiority. Man is his work and not his son, nor does he partake of God's physis as in Babylonian speculations telling that Marduk gave his blood to create the first man. The magical power the artist possesses over his work was transformed into God's ethical power to command, which had as its counterpart the ethical duty for men to fulfil these commandments. The sphere of interrelation between Yahweh and men was the ethical sphere, both for him and for men. God's ethics was the self-control of his truth, man's ethics not to abuse this self-control but to refrain from all overestimation of his position to be God's image and partner of his covenant.

c. Yahweh's representatives. The same is true of Yahweh's representatives—the king, the priest, and the prophet. The king, limited in relations with his people by the covenant made with the eldest, was his god's servant who was obliged to obey. Saul was rejected for the sparing of Agag in spite of the regulations of the ban (I Sam. 15:18 ff), and Nathan announced to David the punishment for Uriah's murder (II Sam. 12:1 ff). The law of Deuteronomy obliges the king to read daily in this book that he may learn to fear Yahweh, to live without luxury, many wives, or horses (Deut. 17:16 ff). The king to come was to be humble and ride on an ass, not on a horse (Zech. 9:9). Aaron, the first and greatest of all priests, and even Moses, the greatest of all prophets, had to die, and they were not allowed to enter the Promised Land, because they did not obey the word of their God (Num. 20:24). Nobody knows Moses' tomb (Deut. 34:6)—thus Israel avoided making him the object of a cult. Isaiah had to be cleansed before his vocation by one of the seraphim (Isa. 6:6), and only a late legend tells of Jeremiah's living in the other world and praying for his people (II Macc. 15:14). In contrast to the poet, the prophet was not allowed to produce or to change or to suppress any word said to him. He had to obey without fear and without questioning:

> To all to whom I send you you shall go, > and whatever I command you you shall speak (Jer. 1:7).

The prophet's ethics was none other than his people's religious ethics: to obey his God, believing that the God of the election and the covenant was the only God superior to all men, loving truly his people as he had loved the fathers, giving them laws by which they might live, and leading him the right way to an end he knew, an end which would be peace.

Bibliography. J. Hempel, Das Ethos des Alten Testaments (1938); G. E. Wright, The OT Against Its Environment (1950); F. Michaelis, Dieu à l'image de l'homme (1950); N. North, Sociology of the Biblical Jubilee (1954); G. E. Mendenhall, Law and Covenant in Israel and the Ancient Near East (1955); H. H. Rowley, The Faith of Israel (1956); P. van Imschoot, Théologie de l'AT, II (1956), 83 ff, 278 ff; T. C. Vriezen, Theologie des Alten Testaments in Grundzügen (1956), pp. 271 ff; E. Jacob, Théologie de l'AT (1957); G. von Rad, Theologie des Alten Testaments, I (1957). J. HEMPEL

ETHICS IN NONCANONICAL JEWISH WRITINGS. Though the Mishna (the oldest stratum of the Talmud), as well as the writings of Philo and Josephus, could be included among the noncanonical Jewish writings, it is with the Apoc. and the Pseudep. that this article chiefly deals.

Biblical precedents and rabbinic parallels suggest themselves almost constantly throughout the noncanonical writings. Works such as Phocylides and Menander and large parts of Ecclesiasticus consist almost exclusively of ethical maxims and amount essentially to ethical codes.

A. Rewards and punishments
   1. Otherworldly consequences
   2. "Manner for manner"
   3. Retribution without responsibility
B. Moral excellences
   1. Kindness and sympathy
   2. Benevolence
      a. Rewards of benevolence
      b. Forms of benevolence
      c. Objects of benevolence
      d. Spirit of benevolence
      e. Organization of benevolence
   3. Social justice
   4. Wisdom
   5. Thrift, truthfulness, honesty, faithfulness, courage
   6. Rituals
   7. Nonritualistic religion
   8. Marriage
   9. Persons to be revered
   10. Political virtues
   11. Universalism
C. Moral defects
   1. Folly
   2. Reprehensible speech
   3. Unfaithfulness and deceit
   4. Lack of love
   5. Lack of social justice
   6. Injustice, censoriousness, anger
   7. Vindictiveness, covetousness, avarice
   8. Theft, dishonesty, bribery
   9. Drunkenness, gluttony
   10. Violence and war
   11. Sins of sex
   12. Pride, vanity, envy
   13. Idolatry
   14. Superstition
D. Divergences
   1. Chauvinism
   2. Revenge and severity favored
   3. Lawlessness and harshness condoned
   4. As to accepting advice, honesty, benevolence
   5. As regards humaneness

Bibliography

A. REWARDS AND PUNISHMENTS. Except in Test. Asher 2:5-6, 8; 4:2-3, and possibly in Ecclus. 31:31, where dividing lines become blurred, these writings envisage a clear-cut distinction between right and wrong. Ethical precepts are regarded as emanating from on high, although exceptions do occur. This happens where human actions are viewed in the light of their natural consequences, as often in Ecclesiasticus and as in Aristeas 205-6.

> A pleasant voice multiplies friends, > and a gracious tongue multiplies courtesies.
> (Ecclus. 6:5.)

> Do not shrink from visiting the sick, > because for such deeds you will be loved.
> (Ecclus. 7:35.)

> The indolent may be compared to a filthy stone, > and everyone hisses at his disgrace.
> (Ecclus. 22:1.)

Many are such passages which, while they deal with ethics, contemplate no supernatural intervention.

1. Otherworldly consequences. Except for some concern, now and then, about the prosperity of the wicked and the tribulations of the righteous (Syr. Apocal. Bar. 14:2-7; IV Esd. 1[or 3]:29-36), the noncanonical writings accept, without challenge, the doctrine of divine rewards and punishments. But these rewards and punishments are not limited to this world—either as it is (Apocal. Moses 8; Ecclus. 16:13; 21:9; 35:18-19; 39:29-30) or as it is to be "at the end of days" (Syr. Apocal. Bar. 30:4-5; 40:1-30; 51:1-6; Apocal. Elijah 21:1 ff). The noncanonical literature sees divine punishment in a world beyond. The entirety of the pseudepigraphic work known as the Vision of Esdras, in its depiction of specific punishments for specific sins, resembles the Inferno of Dante. Other writings that expatiate upon the penalties awaiting in the hereafter are the Apocalypses of Abraham, Baruch (64:8), Esdras, and Sophonias, and the Testament of Isaac (6:6). The Apocalypse of Sophonias (II, 15:5, 8) perceives, in hell, bribers chained hand and foot and with their hands tied to their necks, and usurers wrapped in fiery mats. Abraham has a vision of the infernal punishments in store respectively for murder, unchastity, theft, and avarice (Apocal. Abraham 24:5-10). The rewards of the virtuous are corresponding, both "at the end of days" (Syr. Apocal. Bar. 51:3; II Esd. 2:24) and in the world beyond (Apocal. Esd. 1:12; Apocal. Shadrach 16:5; Ecclus. 34:13). At the predicted last judgment, according to Apocal. Elijah 41:2, the wicked will have to look upon the grace enjoyed by the righteous, while the righteous behold the torments of the damned.

2. "Manner for manner." The concept known in the Talmud as "manner for manner"—the manner of reward or punishment resembling that of the merit or the sin—is recurrent (II Esd. 2:23; II Enoch 50:5; 51:1; Test. Zeb. 6:6-7; 8:1; Tob. 4:11). "God does to you as you do to others" (Test. Zeb. 5:3). "Do not turn your face away from any poor man, and the face of God will not be turned away from you" (Tob. 4:7). Ecclus. 28:1 warns that one who seeks revenge will meet with divine revenge. Particularly does II Maccabees exploit this theme. Antiochus is seized with a "pain in his bowels for which there was no relief . . . and that very justly, for he had tortured the bowels of others with many and strange inflictions" (9:5-6). Not only Nicanor's head, but also his hand, is struck off, that hand which "had been boastfully stretched out against the holy house of the Almighty" (15:30, 32; cf. I Macc. 7:47). Menelaus was put to death at a tower filled with ashes; properly so, because of the sin which he had committed against the altar where the ashes are holy (13:8). When Vis. Esdras 40:41 sees in hell those who have misguided wayfarers, and notices how the eyes of these deceivers are beaten with thorny switches, we are again reminded of "manner for manner."

3. Retribution without responsibility. The noncanonical writings occasionally revert to the doctrine that Jer. 31:29; Ezek. 18:2 assail when they reject the maxim: "The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge." IV Esd. 5(or 7):118 declares that, for the sin of Adam, punishment pursues all of Adam's descendants. Somewhat akin is the view in Syr. Apocal. Bar. 77: 10 that, for the sin of Israel, devastation had come upon Israel's innocent soil. This detachment of retribution from responsibility creates, for some of the writers, a quandary. While Ecclus. 33:13, like the OT (Exod. 4:21; 7:3; 14:4, 8; Josh. 11:20; I Kings 12:15; Isa. 6:10), accepts the conclusion that people are punished for their sins even when divinely constrained to commit those sins, Apocal. Abraham 23: 12-13; 26; 27 finds this bewildering. Not far removed is the thought in Apocal. Shadrach 5:5, which pleads for divine leniency toward sinful man on the ground that, like smoke, the devil enters the human heart and teaches every evil. Ecclesiasticus, while recognizing the problem, abdicates all attempts at explanation (15:11-12).

B. MORAL EXCELLENCES. 1. Kindness and sympathy. Among the qualities rated as admirable are kindness and graciousness. Test. Benj. dwells upon the desirability of kindness to rich and poor alike. Also among the virtues is courtesy, exemplars of which, according to Aristeas 122, were the translators of the Law, attentive in conversation as they were thorough at investigation. Allied with kindness and graciousness are sympathy and mercy (Ecclus. 16:12; 35:20; 40:17; 45:1; Add. Esth. 13:2; I Macc. 2:57; Test. Iss. 5:2; Test. Zeb. 5:3; Tob. 14:9). Ecclus. 7:34 urges:

> Do not fail those who weep,
> but mourn with those who mourn.

Similar is the thought in Test. Iss. 7:5. Aristeas 188 voices the persuasion that, if the punishment we inflict is less than deserved, we win people from their badness. In the Apocalypse of Sophonias (II, 17:1, 3), Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, among the redeemed, supplicate God in behalf of the damned. Nor is there lack of encomium on love. Issachar professes to have loved every person as he did his own children (Test. Iss. 7:6).

2. Benevolence. All of this well comports with the emphasis laid, in many passages, upon benevolence. Sibylline Oracles admire, as a paragon, that race, the Jews, among whom the wealthy send portions of their harvest to the destitute (3:244). Giving to the poor should not be deferred (Ecclus. 4:3). It should be abundant, if one's means allow; it should not be omitted entirely even if one's means are scant (Tob. 4:8). A typical giver was Job, who, according to Test. Job (10:1-6), had farms the product of which was at the disposal of the needy. To supply his tables for the poor, Job assigned ten of his fifty ovens. Other paragons of benevolence were Issachar (Test. Iss. 7:5), Tobit (Tob. 1:13, 16-17; 2:2; 14:2), King Ptolemy (Aristeas 290), and Simon the Maccabee (I Macc. 14:14). Zebulon, of an earlier age, would compassionately share his catch of fish with every stranger (Test. Zeb. 6:4-5).

a. Rewards of benevolence. Almsgiving carries a deep religious import (Ecclus. 4:10; 17:22; 35:2; Tob. 4:11; 12:8). Aristeas holds that, when people of devout mind undertake something in behalf of benevolence, Almighty God directs their deeds and their decisions (18). Following the tendency to express commendation by predicting heavenly rewards, the rewards anticipated for benevolence are extraordinary. One of these rewards is escape from affliction (Ecclus. 29: 12-13; 40:24; Tob. 4:9; 14:11). Another is preservation of one's wealth (Ecclus. 31:11). Another is remission of sins (Ecclus. 3:30; II Enoch 63:1-2; Tob. 12:9; Zadokite Fragment 18:3, 8). According to Ecclus. 17:22, a man's alms procure forgiveness even for his sons and daughters. Another reward is deliverance from death (Ecclus. 40:24; Tob. 4:10; 12:9). Then there are the rewards of the hereafter (Ecclus. 4:10; II Enoch 9:1; 50:5; 51:1; Tob. 14:10). Vision of Esdras finds the almsgiver untouched by the flames of hell (7:26). Promised likewise are spiritual rewards:

> You will then be like a son of the Most High,
> and he will love you more than does your mother > (Ecclus. 4:10).

b. Forms of benevolence. Benevolence takes a variety of forms. One is that of providing the needy with food (Ahikar 8:15; II Enoch 9:1; 42:9; 63:1; Test. Iss. 7:5; Tob. 4:16). Another is that of furnishing clothes (II Enoch 9:1; 42:8 Version B; 63:1; II [or V] Esd. 2:20; Vis. Esd. 7; Tob. 1:17). Zebulun, when he saw a poor person unclothed in winter, would secretly obtain a garment from his home and supply the lack (Test. Zeb. 7:1). Another form of benevolence consists in lending, even if repayment is uncertain (Ecclus. 29:1-3, 8-10, 16). Job is reputed to have had 3,500 excellent plow oxen available to anyone who needed them (Test. Job 10:1-6). Likewise figuring here are hospitality (Ethiopic Ahikar 8; Tob. 2:2; cf. Philo Questions and Solutions on Genesis IV.10); burial of the dead (II [or V] Esd. 2:20, 23; Tob. 1:17-18; 2:3-4, 7; 12:13); visiting the sick (Arabic Ahikar 2:57; Ecclus. 7:35; Test. Zeb. 6:4-5); and speaking words of consolation (Ecclus. 7:34; IV Esd. 14:13; Test. Iss. 5:2).

c. Objects of benevolence. Singled out as objects of benevolence are widows and the fatherless (Bar. 6:38; Ecclus. 4:10; 14:10; 35:14; III Sibylline Oracles 242), the stranger (Zadokite Fragment 8:17), the homeless, the captive, the aged, the unmarried woman in need of a dowry (Zadokite Fragment 18:5), the broken, the weak, the blind (II Esd. 2:21). II Macc. 3:10 quotes the high priest as telling the obtrusive Heliodorus that there was money laid up in the temple "belonging to widows and orphans." Job is represented as having twelve tables reserved for widows and thirty for strangers (Test. Job 10:1-6). The poor, the widows, and the cripples are reported to have mourned Job's passing (Test. Job 56:1).

d. Spirit of benevolence. Of no little moment is the spirit in which the giving is to be done (Ecclus. 10:23; 18:16-17; II Enoch 63:1-2).

> Incline your ear to the poor, > and answer him politely and humbly.
> (Ecclus. 4:8.)

Similar thoughts arise in Ecclus. 35:9; Tob. 4:16-17; Test. Iss. 5:2. Test. Zeb. 7:4 reports that once, when Zebulun found nothing on the spur of the moment to give to a poor person, he, with lamentations of sympathy, accompanied the poor person for seven stadia.

e. Organization of benevolence. Zadokite Fragment 18:2-3 sketches a form of communal charity organization. Every month each person was to pay his income of two days to a certain public official who was to spend these funds for charitable aid. Tob. 1:8 mentions, with enthusiasm, the allocation of the third tithe ordained in Deut. 14:28.

3. Social justice. Related to benevolence is that type of concern for the underprivileged which we today call social justice (Ecclus. 4:9; 32:13; II Esd. 2:21; Aristeas 190; III Sibylline Oracles 234-47; Test. Iss. 5:2). Judith (9:11) prays: "Thou art God of the lowly, helper of the oppressed, upholder of the weak, protector of the forlorn, savior of those without hope." The widow, the fatherless, and the stranger are again singled out for special solicitude (Ecclus. 35:14-15; II [or V] Esd. 2:20; II Enoch 42:9 Version B; 50:5; III Sibylline Oracles 242; Zadokite Fragment 8:13), likewise servants and slaves (Syr. Ahikar 3:2; 4:5; Ecclus. 7:20-21; 10:25; Jub. 50:7; Aristeas 20-22). "If you have a servant, let him be as yourself . . . . Treat him as a brother" (Ecclus. 33:30-31). The release of slaves and of captives is spoken of several times (Jth. 16:23; Aristeas 22, 24; I Macc. 10:33). Considerable is said about aiding the underprivileged in the law court (Ahikar 2:57; Ecclus. 4:9; II Enoch 2:20-21; Zadokite Fragment 16:3). Aristeas 188, 208, 290, favors clemency for law violators. The scruple about the prompt payment of wages is pronounced in a number of passages (Ecclus. 4:1; Aristeas 258; Test. Job 12:4; Tob. 4:14; 5:14-15; 12:1).

4. Wisdom. As in the wisdom literature of the OT, wisdom is also in the noncanonical writings the subject of boundless adoration. Encomiums on wisdom occupy long stretches (Ecclus. 14:20–15:8; 24:1–25:2; Wisd. Sol. 9), where wisdom is extolled in many a fine metaphor and turn of phrase. In Ecclus. 24:1–25:2, as in the biblical book of Proverbs, Wisdom personified proclaims her advantages. Wisd. Sol. 4:8-9 declares that old age is honorable only by virtue of the wisdom that attends it. Allied with wisdom are understanding (Ecclus. 5:10; 25:8), knowledge (Ecclus. 11:5), temperance and prudence (Ecclus. 25:9; Wisd. Sol. 8:7, 9), and willingness to accept advice (Ecclus. 32:19; Tob. 4:18). Commended also is the study by which knowledge is acquired (Ecclus. 6:18, 35; 8:8; 39:1; 51:28). Wisdom is linked with godliness (Ecclus. 27:11) and with that widely applauded trait, the "fear of the Lord" (Ecclus. 7:31; 19:20). The interbraiding of wisdom with the "fear of the Lord" occupies the entire opening chapter of Ecclesiasticus. Nurtured by wisdom is reverent and peace-conserving speech (Ecclus. 19:6; 21:26; 22:27), likewise the readiness to keep silent (Ecclus. 20:1, 5-6); although when Ecclus. 4:23 advises:

> Do not refrain from speaking at the crucial time, > and do not hide your wisdom,

we come upon somewhat divergent counsel.

Invoking, like Philo (On Abraham 92; On Genesis III.10, 46-50, 52, 61; Who Is the Heir of Divine Things 268-70), the language of the Greek philosophers, IV Macc. 1:1-6 acclaims "reason," which is credited with power over impulses like excitement, pain, and fear—impulses which hinder justice, will power, discretion, and moderation. As in Philo (On Abraham 245-61), moderation is stressed likewise in Aristobul, Second Piece (66). Aristeas 122, in like spirit, lauds the translators of the Law for observing the golden mean.

5. Thrift, truthfulness, honesty, faithfulness, courage. Other traits deemed worthy are thrift (Ecclus. 18:25; 19:1; III Sibylline Oracles 239) and hard work (Arabic Ahikar 8:18; Syr. Ahikar 8:20; Tob. 2:11-12), with special commendation of agriculture (Ecclus. 7:15; Aristeas 108-11; Test. Iss. 5:3; 8:18), notwithstanding the fact that elsewhere Ecclesiasticus (38:25-26) dwells on the plowman's limitations and handicaps.

There is abounding admiration for truthfulness and for honesty (Ecclus. 5:10; 46:19), which includes scruple about the correctness of weights and measures (Ecclus. 42:4), and for fairness (Ecclus. 11:2). To this group belongs also faithfulness (Ecclus. 22:23; 27:17; 29:3; II Esd. 6:28; III Sibylline Oracles 376-77), with particular reference to the person who has gone one's surety.

> Do not forget the favor of your surety, > for he has given his life for you.
> (Ecclus. 29:15.)

Ecclus. 3:21; 25:2 emphasize the virtue of requiting a good turn. Like Philo (On Abraham 217-44), this literature applauds courage and fortitude (Ecclus. 46:1; Wisd. Sol. 8:7). Jub. 17:15-18 lauds Abraham for having proved trustful amid all tribulations, while Ecclus. 4:9 urges: "Do not be faint-hearted in judging a case."

6. Rituals. The religious rituals and the merit of their observance are occasionally considered (Syr. Apocal. Bar. 66:4; Apocal. Sophonias II, 11:5; Ecclus. 7:31; 14:11; 18:22; 35:9; 38:11; 47:9-10; Jub. 21; 36:6-9; I Macc. 14:15), although I Macc. 2:41 reports, with approval, the decision to fight the Syrian foe on the sabbath. The rituals are sometimes spiritualized (Tob. 12:8). Aristeas 169 maintains that the distinction between clean and unclean animals, in the Jewish dietary, has the purpose of teaching just and right conduct. The cloven hoof and the cud chewing of the permitted animals typify the moral implications of memory (153-54). The teaching of kindness is the reason behind the permitting of gentle birds and the forbidding of ferocious ones (145-48). The hand washing required before prayer is a symbol of innocence (306). As for the usages of the temple:

> He who keeps the law makes many offerings;
> he who heeds the commandments sacrifices a peace offering.
> He who returns a kindness offers fine flour, > and he who gives alms sacrifices a thank offering > (Ecclus. 35:1-2).

7. Nonritualistic religion. The nonritualistic side of religion obtains equally clear recognition, with its concern about love toward God (Test. Iss. 5:2; 7:6), simplicity (Test. Iss. 4:2, 4, 6; Test. Reuben 4:5), patience (Ecclus. 1:23; 2:4), and humility (Ecclus. 3:17, 23; 4:7; 7:17; 18:21; 32:10; Aristeas 122, 257, 282; Test. Gad 5:3; Test. Joseph 17:8; 18:3). "The greater you are, humble yourself the more" (Ecclus. 3:18). Thoughts of poverty (Ecclus. 18:25) and of death (Ecclus. 10:9-11; 14:12) are suggested as a means by which humility can be fostered. Penitence (Ecclus. 18:21; 20:3) is also urged.

8. Marriage. Not a little stress is laid upon marriage. "Where there is no wife, a man will wander about and sigh" (Ecclus. 36:25). Ecclus. 42:9-10 dwells upon a father's fears lest his daughter fail to marry or, being married, "lest she be hated" and "lest she be barren." There is insistence upon endogamy (Tob. 4:12-13), and Tob. 6:12 cites, with deference, the ancient law of the kinship obligation in the choice of a spouse. Along with this there are ponderings on what constitutes wifely excellence (Ecclus. 25:8; 26:1-4, 13-21, 26). Ecclus. 25:26 acclaims the woman who honors her husband. Nor is Ecclesiasticus (7:25-26) indifferent to reciprocal obligations on the part of the man. 36:22 notes that

> A woman's beauty gladdens the countenance, > and surpasses every desire of man.

Nonetheless, at that beauty, one should not stumble (25:21). Aristeas 250 advises that, to get along with his wife and to avoid marital quarrels, a man should bear in mind that women are irrational and flighty.

9. Persons to be revered. Considerable attention is bestowed upon the duty of honoring one's parents (Ecclus. 3:3-4; 7:27; 23:14; Tob. 4:3). Ecclus. 3:12-13 admonishes: "Help your father in his old age, and . . . even if he is lacking in understanding, have patience." Ecclus. 8:6 extends the application to all who are of advanced years. Further laid to heart are the honoring and compensating of priests (Ecclus. 7:31), the respecting and the employing of physicians (Ecclus. 38:1-5), and the reverencing of any great person (4:7).

10. Political virtues. Among the things receiving approbation are good government (Ecclus. 10:1-3; 14:4, 8-9, 12, 14; Add. Esth. 13:2; Aristeas 291; III Sibylline Oracles 373), justice (III Esd. 4:39; IV Esd. 5:114; Aristeas 18, 169, 291; III Sibylline Oracles 234, 374; Wisd. Sol. 8:7; Tob. 14:9), patriotism (Jth. 12:8), and obedience to the law (Syr. Apocal. Bar. 46:5; Ecclus. 46:7).

11. Universalism. From time to time this literature sounds a note of universalism (Bar. 1:11-12; 2:21; I Macc. 8:17, 24-27; 10:25-45; 11:32; 12:1; 13:36 ff; 14:16-18, 20; 15:1, 16). I Macc. 6:12-13 describes how King Antiochus, when dying, repents of the spoliations and atrocities he has committed against the Jews and how he yearns to make amends. The entirety of the Letter of Aristeas presupposes cordial relations between Judea and Egypt. Graciousness toward non-Jews is a frequent attitude. This characterizes especially the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs. Test. Levi 5:7 holds that the righteous among the Gentiles are to share in the boons awaiting the righteous of Israel. In the messianic future, the heathen as well as Israel are to enter upon the divine redemption (Test. Asher 7:3; Test. Benj. 9:2; 10:5; Test. Simeon 6:5). But it is anticipated that the Gentiles will come eventually to accept the Jewish outlook (Test. Dan 6:7; Test. Judah 25:5; Test. Levi 8:14; 18:9; Test. Naph. 8:3).

C. MORAL DEFECTS. Which now are the traits that are evil? Certain qualities are viewed from the angle of psychology. Thus IV Esd. 1:20-21 contends that, despite the giving of the law, the bad heart remains the root of all the world's troubles. Ecclus. 7:16; 18:31; 23:2; Apocal. Shadrach 5:5 contain similar reflections. The whole of IV Maccabees is an ethicopsychological disquisition, not unlike the deliverances of Philo concerning the subjection of the intellect to the sway of passion and the contrast between reason and sensuality (Who Is the Heir of Divine Things 268-70; On Abraham 4.20-21).

1. Folly. As wisdom is extensively lauded, its opposite is vigorously rebuked (Bar. 3:28). There are frequent and often witty allusions to the fool in Ecclesiasticus.

> He gives little and upbraids much.
> . . . . . .
> A fool will say, "I have no friend, > and there is no gratitude for my good deeds;
> those who eat my bread speak unkindly."
> (Ecclus. 20:15-16.)

The unwise are characterized by an imperviousness to the instruction, the counsel, or the reproof by which their defect might be corrected (Ecclus. 3:26; 6:20-21; 21:6, 12, 18-20; 22:7; Tob. 4:18).

2. Reprehensible speech. As a person's speech can manifest his wisdom, it can also betray his folly (Ecclus. 9:18; 14:1; 20:18; 21:26; 22:27; 25:8; 27:7). Ecclus. 28:17-18 says:

> The blow of a whip raises a welt,
> but a blow of the tongue crushes the bones.
> Many have fallen by the edge of the sword, > and yet not as many as have fallen because of the tongue.

Particularly objectionable is the babbler (Ecclus. 19:6; 20:5, 7). Yes, talk in sheer abundance is distasteful (Ecclus. 20:8; 23:1-9). "Speak concisely, say much in few words" (Ecclus. 32:8). Also deprecated are talebearing and calumny (Greek Apocal. Bar. 8:5; 13:4; Ecclus. 5:14; 19:7; 41:23; Aristeas 162-66). Especially deplored are the "double tongue" (Ecclus. 6:1; 19:26; 27:23; Test. Benj. 6:4-6) and dissimulation (I Macc. 11:53; 13:19; Pss. Sol. 4:10; Wisd. Sol. 14:25). The violation of confidences (Ecclus. 19:7; 27:16, 18; 41:23) is also reprehensible. Scolding is among the traits branded as detestable in a woman (Ecclus. 26:27); but it is no less repellent in a man (Ecclus. 41:22). The "wicked woman" is the theme of not a few passages (Ecclus. 25:16-26; 26:6-12, 23-27). Another flaw relating to speech is that of interrupting the speech of others (Ecclus. 11:8). Likewise deprecated are backbiting (Ecclus. 28:14), slander (Test. Isaac 5:12), excessive swearing (Ecclus. 23:9, 13; 27:14), and, of course, perjury (Greek Apocal. Bar. 4:17; Pss. Sol. 4:4; Wisd. Sol. 14:25, 29). Connected with talebearing is a person's willingness to believe everything he hears (I Macc. 10:61). Ecclus. 19:13 advises:

> Question a friend, perhaps he did not do it;
> but if he did anything, so that he may do it no more.

3. Unfaithfulness and deceit. Another despicable trait is unfaithfulness (Ecclus. 9:10; 12:9; I Esd. 1:48; Wisd. Sol. 14:25). Opprobrium in the extreme is also heaped upon treachery, falsehood, and deceit (Ecclus. 7:12; 10:8; 25:2; 37:1; Add. Esth. 16:6; I Macc. 7:16, 27-30; 11:53; 15:27-36; II Macc. 3:4; 4:24, 34; 12:4; Pss. Sol. 4:4; Sus. 1:55, 59). Bel and the Dragon describes the imposture perpetrated by the priests of Bel and their exposure by Daniel. Apocal. Esd. 3:12 foresees, with alarm, how "brother will betray brother, children rise up against their parents, friend against friend, servant against master."

4. Lack of love. As love ranks high among the virtues, hate holds a corresponding place among the obliquities (Test. Gad 4:5-6); similarly uncharitableness and stinginess (Bar. 6:28; Ecclus. 4:5-6; 12:3; 14:3, 10; 31:8, 24; Wisd. Sol. 19:14-15), and charity that is harsh (Ecclus. 18:15) and grudging (II Enoch 62:1-2). Sinful likewise is failure to visit the sick, the widow, and the orphan (Apocal. Sophonias II, 11:4-5). As bringing comfort is a virtue, its opposite is a transgression (Ecclus. 4:1-3).

5. Lack of social justice. As consideration for the underprivileged is a merit, its opposite is in many passages pronounced an iniquity. There is a discernible tendency to idealize the poor (Ecclus. 3:19 [or 20]; 4:6; 10:30-31; 11:1; 13:18; 31:4; 32:16 [or 17 or 20]; 35:13-14, 16-17; IV Esd. 14:13; Pss. Sol. 5:2, 13-14; 10:7; 15:2; Test. Gad 7:6; Zadokite Fragment 9:10), to disparage the wealthy (I Enoch 94:8-9; 96:4, 6, 8; 97:8; 99:12-13, 15), and to dwell upon the possible juncture of wealth with moral shortcoming (Arabic Ahikar 2:52; Ecclus. 10:23; 13:3; 14:3; 20:21; 25:2; 30:14; Ascens. Moses 7:5-6). Among the derelictions specified is the delaying or withholding of wages (Tob. 4:14), dismissal from employment (Aristeas 258-59), and the removal of the landmark (III Sibylline Oracles 240; Zadokite Fragment 1:11; 8:1; 9:13, 49). Apocal. Elijah (3:2-3) charges that the Israelites, returning from captivity, "seize houses, rob farms, slay widows and orphans in the streets"; yet curiously the text proceeds to anticipate that these oppressors will obtain pardon if they repent. Ascens. Moses 7:6 scorns the exploiters and oppressors who claim their doings are acts of righteousness.

6. Injustice, censoriousness, anger. Another evil is injustice, be the victim rich or poor (Ecclus. 40:2; 41:18); likewise unfairness, such as judging a person by his outward appearance or circumstances (Ecclus. 11:2; 22:23).

> Do not find fault before you investigate;
> first consider, and then reprove
> (Ecclus. 11:7).

Other evils are impatience (Ecclus. 2:14), censoriousness (Ecclus. 8:5; 21:12; 22:20; 31:31; Test. Abraham 6:4), lack of sympathy (Ecclus. 4:3; 7:11, 34; II [or V] Esd. 2:21), enmity (Ecclus. 6:1; 25:14), and anger (Ecclus. 1:22; 4:29-30; 10:18; 23:16; 29:23; 30:24; Test. Isaac 5:11; Test. Reuben 4:8). It is better to rebuke openly than to be secretly enraged (Ecclus. 20:2).

7. Vindictiveness, covetousness, avarice. Further qualities pronounced objectionable are vindictiveness (Ecclus. 8:7; 28:1; Test. Benj. 8:1; Test. Dan 1:4; Test. Isaac 5:12; Test. Iss. 4:5), covetousness (Ecclus. 5:8; 10:9; 14:9; 30:14-17; III Sibylline Oracles 236; Tob. 5:18), and avarice (Apocal. Abraham 24:10; Ecclus. 29:23; 30:14-17; 31:6, 11: Test. Judah 19:1; Tob. 5:19). Not far removed from avarice is the conduct of one concerning whom Ecclus. 20:15 says: "Today he lends and tomorrow he asks it back." The aversion to lending on interest is reflected in Apocal. Sophonias 15:8, which sees those who lend on interest punished in hell.

8. Theft, dishonesty, bribery. Also excoriated are theft (Apocal. Abraham 24:8; Greek Apocal. Bar. 4:17; 8:5; 13:4; Ecclus. 14:4; 41:19, 21; III Sibylline Oracles 239, 380; Wisd. Sol. 14:25; Tob. 2:13) and dishonesty (Ecclus. 4:31; 22:4; III Sibylline Oracles 237), including the use of false measures (I Enoch 99:2). In this regard, certain occupations come under suspicion. Sin sticks "close between buying and selling" (Ecclus. 27:2). "A merchant shall hardly keep himself from doing wrong; and a huckster shall not be freed from sin" (Ecclus. 26:29). Bribery also stands on the sinister list (Apocal. Sophonias II, 15:5; Ecclus. 40:12; Ascens. Moses 5:5). Likewise viewed askance is mendicancy (Ahikar 2:52-53; Greek Ahikar 26:10; Ecclus. 29:22-28; 40:28-30). Castigation alights upon sloth (Armenian Ahikar 2:35; Ecclus. 4:29; 10:27; 22:1; Test. Reuben 3:7), notwithstanding the divergent thought that

> Good and bad, life and death,
> poverty and wealth, come from the Lord > (Ecclus. 11:14; cf. Ecclus. 11:17; 31:4).

9. Drunkenness, gluttony. Drunkenness is likewise pilloried (Greek Apocal. Bar. 4:16-17; 8:5; 13:4; Ecclus. 19:1-2; 26:8; 31:25-31; Tob. 4:15). Greek Apocal. Bar. 4:8; Apocal. Abraham 23:5-6 identify the vine with the forbidden fruit of Gen. 2:17; 3:1. Also frowned upon are gluttony (Ecclus. 23:6; 30:25; 31:17, 20; 37:29-31; Heroclitus of Ephesus VII, 5:1; Test. Benj. 6:2) and sybaritic excesses (Ascens. Isaiah 2:9-11; Ecclus. 19:5; Her. VII, 5:1; Test. Iss. 4:2-3), and thoughtless extravagance (Ecclus. 18:33). Nonetheless, it is admitted that there can be excesses of the other extreme, such as inordinate mourning (Ecclus. 38:17).

10. Violence and war. Vehemently reprobated are violence and strife (Greek Apocal. Bar. 8:5; 13:4; Ecclus. 20:4; 27:14; 28:8; I Macc. 1:24; Wisd. Sol. 14:25). Reproof is leveled not only at violence but also at incitement to violence (Apocal. Abraham 17: 12; Wisd. Sol. 14:25-26). Murder is consummately abhorred (Apocal. Abraham 24:5-6; Greek Apocal. Bar. 8:5; 13:4; III Sibylline Oracles 235; IV Sibylline Oracles 163-64; Test. Benj. 7:1-2: Test. Judah 22:1). And notable are the arraignments of war (Syr. Apocal. Bar. 48:37; I Enoch 8:1; 52:6, 8-9; 69:6; Heraclitus of Ephesus 6:1-3; 7:1-2; Jub. 11:2; 23:19-20; Pss. Sol. 17:33 [or 37]; III Sibylline Oracles 235, 367, 751, 753, 755-56, 780-81; IV Sibylline Oracles 163-64; V Sibylline Oracles 253, 381-83; Test. Benj. 7:1-2; Test. Isaac 5:11; Test. Judah 22:1). Echoing the biblical Jeremiah, Baruch quotes God as saying, "Bend your shoulders and serve the king of Babylon, and you will remain in the land which I gave to your fathers" (2:21). Other striking expressions of a pacifist tenor can be found in Jos. Antiq. XIV.ii.1; Jos. War II.xvi.351; and among the rabbis (Gittin 56A; Abot de R. Nathan IV). The extreme of wickedness is, of course, persecution such as that perpetrated by King Antiochus (I Macc. 1:1 ff; II Macc. 5–7).

11. Sins of sex. There are frequent disparaging references to the improprieties of sex. Adultery is attributed to drunkenness (Greek Apocal. Bar. 4:17), music (Pseudo-Philo 2:8), feminine song (Ecclus. 9: 4), dancing (Test. Judah 23:2), masculine gazing (Ecclus. 9:5, 7-8; 41:21; Pss. Sol. 4:4: Test. Benj. 8: 2-3; Test. Isaac 5:13; Test. Reuben 3:10), and dalliance and lingering in the proximity of women (Ecclus. 9:9; 23:5-6; 41:22-23; 42:12-13; Test. Reuben 3:10). Ezra, in Vis. Esd. 17, sees tortured in hell the wives who adorned themselves not for their husbands but for others. Ecclus. 42:14 says that "better is the wickedness of a man than a woman who does good."

Among the evils connected with sex is jealousy (Greek Apocal. Bar. 8:5; 13:4; Ecclus. 9:1; 26:6; Wisd. Sol. 1:10; Test. Reuben 4:5). Cognizant of marital tensions, Ecclus. 25:22 meanwhile observes that > when a wife supports her husband.

> There is wrath and effrontery and great disgrace

Stigmatized also are perversions such as homosexuality (Apocal. Abraham 24:9; Her. VII, 5:1; Wisd. Sol. 14:26). Ezra perceives, among those undergoing tortures in hell, those who have committed incest with their mothers (Vis. Esd. 21). Enoch (I Enoch 15:2-4) beholds the angels rebuked for consorting with human females as reported in Gen. 6:2.

12. Pride, vanity, envy. Also among the failings upon which this literature dwells are pride and envy (Syr. Apocal. Bar. 83:13-16; Ecclus. 6:2; 11:4, 6, 30; 13:1; Test. Isaac 5:12; Test. Reuben 3:5) and ambition (Ecclus. 7:4; II Macc. 4:7) and too much inquisitiveness (Ecclus. 3:21, 23).

> Better is a man who works and has an abundance of everything, > than one who goes about boasting, but lacks bread.
> (Ecclus. 10:27.)

Ecclus. 11:19 points out the indiscretion of one

> When he says, "I have found rest, > and now I shall enjoy my goods!"
> He does not know when his time will come;
> he will leave them to others and die.

Suggestive of Philo, Test. Benj. 6:2, 4-5 asserts that a person of right mind is not passionately concerned about the transitory. He is indifferent to honor or dishonor, poverty or wealth. Likewise upbraided are envy (Syr. Apocal. Bar. 48:37; Ecclus. 9:11; 30:24; Test. Gad 7:2, 6; Test. Iss. 4:5; Test. Reuben 4:5; Wisd. Sol. 6:23) and recklessness (Ecclus. 3:26). Another sin is that of being stiff-necked (Ecclus. 16: 11). But there is also a drawback in bashfulness (Ecclus. 20:22-23). Among the traits to be avoided, mention is likewise made of indecorum (Ecclus. 41: 17-23) and of irreverence toward the aged (Wisd. Sol. 2:10).

13. Idolatry. In matters of ritual, the worst of sins is idolatry (Greek Apocal. Bar. 8:5; 13:4; II Esd. 1:6; Jub. 20:1-9; Aristeas 140; I Macc. 1:47; Pseudo-Philo 2:8-9; Test. Judah 23:1; Wisd. Sol. 14:6, 23, 25, 27, 29). Idolatry is ridiculed in the manner of Isa. 44:9-19; 46:6 (Apocal. Abraham 1–6; 23–25; Bar. 6:4; 8:58; Wisd. Sol. 13:11-19; 14:1; 15:5-19). No little irony ensues from the report concerning the soldiers in II Macc. 12:40 that "under the tunic of every one of the dead they found sacred tokens of the idols of Jamnia, which the law forbids the Jews to wear." This same army had, a short time before, been battling valiantly against idolatrous practices. The text goes on to state that, for this slump into idolatry, sacrifices of propitiation were offered in the temple at Jerusalem. For resistance to idolatry, praise is bestowed upon Abraham (Jub. 12:1, 6), King Josiah (Ecclus. 49:1-4), Daniel (Bel 1:22), Mattathias (I Macc. 2:45), Judas Maccabeus (I Macc. 5:68), and Simon the Maccabee (I Macc. 13:47). Jth. 8:18-19 recounts, with satisfaction, how idolatry was uprooted in Israel through God's annihilation of those that preached it. Also denounced is apostasy (I Macc. 1:14, 43).

14. Superstition. A number of passages expatiate upon the banefulness of superstition, such as belief in dreams, divinations, soothsayings, witchcraft, ventriloquism, and such as addiction to strange rites and ceremonies (Greek Apocal. Bar. 8:5; 13:4; Ecclus. 34:2-7; Test. Judah 23:1; Wisd. Sol. 12:3-5; 14:23). Abhorrence of child sacrifice comes to expression in Wisd. Sol. 12:5; while unbelief is objurgated in Ecclus. 2:13 and blasphemy in I Macc. 7:38. Finally, Vis. Esd. 45:46 beholds in hell, lying on the ground and overpoured with glowing lead and iron, those who taught, but did not practice, the divine word.

D. DIVERGENCES. We have examined the moral judgments to be found in the noncanonical Jewish writings. But the picture, as we have seen, does not prevail uniformly. We have noted some minor deviations. There remain to be noted some major deviations.

1. Chauvinism. Commingled with the universalism already noted, there are strains of chauvinism (Apocal. Abraham 22:6; 29:19; 30:4; Ecclus. 26:2-3; 36:7; IV Esd. 4:56, 58; V Esd. 1:11; Aristeas 139; II Macc. 6:14; Wisd. Sol. 12:22; Test. Levi 4:4). IV Esd. 4:59; 5:11 hold that the world was created for the sake of Israel. The book of Judith is furiously belligerent toward Israel's foes even though Holofernes, whom Judith eventually decapitates, is made to speak as if he believed in Israel's God (11:22). Related to this are the strictures against exogamy (I Esd. 8:70, 93; 9:7-36; Jub. 20:4). The aversion to war has its antithesis in many a passage in which war is glorified (Ecclus. 47:4, 7; Eupolemos 3:5; I Macc. 3:4, 21, 58; 5:68; 10:46; 14:7, 9-10; II Macc. 15:21). When I Macc. 11:47 reports, with satisfaction, that at Antioch "the king called the Jews to his aid, and they all rallied about him and then spread out through the city; and they killed on that day as many as a hundred thousand men," the scruple against the taking of human life is obviously in abeyance.

2. Revenge and severity favored. When it comes to international conflict, revenge no longer meets with disapproval (Ecclus. 35:18; 48:8; Add. Esth. 16:18; Jth. 9:2; I Macc. 2:67; 13:6; II Macc. 1:17; 12:6). Even outside of international conflict vindictiveness is sometimes sanctioned (Ecclus. 25:7; 30:6). Ecclus. 39:28-30 sees the inimical forces of nature as instruments of revenge on the part of God. When treachery is inflicted upon a national enemy, it becomes a virtue (Jth. 10:12; 11:5; 13:8; 15:9; 16), and cruelty becomes an excellence (Jos. Antiq. I.x.176; I Macc. 5:15; 10:36; II Macc. 1:16; 8:19-20, 24; 12:6, 16; Philo On Abraham 233). Nor are the cruelties praised except as they are inflicted on foreign foes (Syr. Apocal. Bar. 66:3-4; Ecclus. 16:12; Jub. 20:4; I Macc. 2:24-25; 9:73). A species of militancy, of course, is the pleasure felt at the furious suppression of nonconformist cults (Syr. Apocal. Bar. 66:4; Jub. 12:12; I Macc. 2:45; 5:68).

3. Lawlessness and harshness condoned. Nor are these writings unanimous as regards loyalty to the state. The books of the Maccabees anticipate the American maxim, "Resistance to tyrants is obedience to God" (esp. I Macc. 2:19). At one point there is even admiration for a mass uprising (II Macc. 4:39). An offset to the above-mentioned approbations of kindness are passages which urge the rigid disciplining of servants (Ecclus. 33:24-28; 42:5), of children (Ecclus. 7:23-24; 30:1, 7, 10; 42:5) and even of one's wife (Ecclus. 25:26).

4. As to accepting advice, as to honesty, as to benevolence. The admonition about accepting advice has its opposite in Ecclus. 37:13, which counsels thinking for oneself. The teaching about leniency toward one's foes is counterbalanced by words of caution against trusting one's foes (Ecclus. 12:1-18). The insistences upon honesty have their antithesis when Ezekiel the tragedian (163-65) admires the departing Hebrews for their spoliation of the Egyptians (Exod. 11:2; 12:35-36). An offset to the copious praises of almsgiving appears when Ecclus. 12:1, 4-5, 7, exhorts:

> Give to the godly man, but do not help the sinner.
> Do good to the humble, but do not give to the godless.
> . . . . . .
> Give to the good man.

A similar thought is that of II Enoch 51:1. Ecclus. 11:34 (cf. 11:29) warns:

> Receive a stranger into your home and he will upset you with commotion, > and estrange you from your family.

Ecclus. 29:20 apprehends the possibility of one's becoming impoverished if he gives too liberally.

5. As regards humaneness. By contrast with Apocal. Sophonias II, 17:5, which tells how the righteous in heaven pray for the damned, Elijah 9:2 reports that God keeps the righteous from hearing the wails of the damned so as to prevent this intercession. According to Apocal. Abraham 31:6, the destruction of idolaters should cause the elect to jubilate. Contrasting with the generous humanitarianism of some noncanonical passages, Phocylides 95 charges that the masses are volatile and that the rabble cannot be trusted.

The commentators dwell upon the political and the cultural factors which have, within the domain of ethical teaching, brought about the transition from the biblical to the noncanonical. Even a superficial reading makes one conscious of the difference, notwithstanding the abundance of doctrine and of phraseology common to both sets of writings.

Bibliography. E. Kautsch, Die Apokryphen und Pseudepigraphen des Alten Testaments (1900); R. H. Charles, The Apoc. and Pseudep. of the OT (1913); P. Riessler, Altjuedisches Schrifttum Ausserhalb der Bibel (1928). ABRAHAM CRONBACH

ETHICS IN THE NT. Fundamental is the recognition that in the NT morality finds its setting in religion. Nowhere is the gospel set forth without a moral demand, and nowhere is morality (illumined from whatever sources, Hebraic or Hellenistic) understood apart from the gospel.

A. The teaching of Jesus
  1. Its setting
    a. The reaffirmation of ethical monotheism
    b. The ethics of the kingdom of God
  2. Its standards
    a. The ethics of grace
    b. Ethics and the end
    c. The ethics and the person of Jesus
    d. Misconceptions
    e. Ethics applied
  3. Its sanctions
B. The early church
  1. Koinonia ethics: vertical
  2. The imitation of Christ
  3. The divine purpose and the Holy Spirit
  4. Koinonia ethics: horizontal
  5. "Casuistry" and the words of Jesus
  6. NT ethics and "the world"
Bibliography

A. THE TEACHING OF JESUS. 1. Its setting. The above indissoluble connection between ethics and religion is preserved in the summary of the proclamation of Jesus given in Mark 1:15: "The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand; repent, and believe in the gospel." This verse is, therefore, highly pertinent to the understanding of the ethics of Jesus.

a. The reaffirmation of ethical monotheism. There is the reference to a time fulfilled (Gal. 4:4). This is to be understood, as is made evident in the rest of the NT, in the light of the expectations expressed in the OT, and in Judaism, that, at some future date, God would act for the salvation of his people. The ministry of Jesus is the fulfilment of these expectations (e.g., Isa. 10:22; 35:4; 43:3; 45:17-22; 60:16; Joel 2:28 ff; etc. [see ESCHATOLOGY OF THE OT, APOCRYPHA AND PSEUDEPIGRAPHA]). But, as fulfilment, implicitly here and explicitly elsewhere, the coming of the kingdom of God does not ignore the moral content of these expectations: the ethical aspirations of the OT and Judaism, the Law and the Prophets, are not annulled; they are fulfilled (Matt. 5:17-18). This means that Jesus consciously accepted the ethical tradition of his people. This was what he had been nurtured on, and it is the source of much of his moral insight. E.g., it has been possible to claim that in the figure of the Suffering Servant (Isa. 53) Jesus could have found the most profound emphases of his ethical teaching. No iconoclast, Jesus affirmed the tradition of ethical monotheism in Judaism, and he assumed and constantly appealed to, the scriptures of his people (Mark 12:28-37; Matt. 4:4, 6-7, etc.). But Jesus passed, nevertheless, beyond his nurture. Nor was it only his own zeal for the doing of God's will that enabled him to do this. Rather, we must couple with this the next item in Mark 1:15.

b. The ethics of the kingdom of God. The ethical teaching of Jesus is not only a reaffirmation of the ethical tradition of Judaism, but is also the concomitant of his overwhelming conviction that the kingdom of God was "at hand." We may go further. As the parables and other sayings show, Jesus preached that the active rule of God was not only approaching, but, in a real sense, already present or in process of realization in his ministry (see ESCHATOLOGY OF THE NT). From the most insignificant beginnings, its growth was assured (Matt. 13:39; Mark 4:3-8, 26-29, 30-32; Luke 13:18-19, 20-21). Similarly, the hour of salvation is declared to have struck (Matt. 11:5; Luke 4:18-19; 7:22). In the symbols of the wedding (John 2:9), of the harvest (Matt. 3:12; 9:37-38; 13:28-29), of the garment (Mark 2:21-22), and of the new wine (Mark 2:21-22), this is implicit, as it is also in the temptation narratives, and in the presentation of Jesus as the shepherd (Matt. 15:24; Luke 19:10), the physician (Mark 2:17), and as victor over Satan (Matt. 12:28; Luke 10:18). Jesus proclaimed the active and imminent rule of God (the term "KINGDOM OF GOD" refers primarily, not to any geographic or communal entity, but to God's rule, as here indicated). It is in the light of this that he understands the demands of God—i.e., in the light of God's "availability" in meeting them. The ethic of Jesus is an ethic of the kingdom of God, of the "end" when God's rule is to be established. And this meant, in accordance with Jewish expectation, that it was the ethics of a new creation, of a new heart and spirit, of a new covenant, of a new people—a new Israel that had responded to Jesus' call to repentance and received the rule of God (Isa. 4:2-4; 44:3-5; Jer. 24:6-7; 31:33-34; 32:38-40; 33:8; 50:20; Ezek. 11:19-20; Zech. 5:5-11; 13:1-2; Jub. 1:29; II Bar. 32:6; 17:2; Ezek. 7:75).

But—and this it is essential to grasp—the coming near of the kingdom of God in the ministry of Jesus is an act of sheer grace. It is of God's good pleasure alone that it is in process: it has not waited upon any worthiness in Israel by way of repentance or otherwise, as was the expectation in Judaism (Pesiḳ. dRK 163-64; Joma 86*b*; Sanh. 97*b*). And, as it was a free gift, so did the rule of God bring with it a gift, that of the forgiveness of sins. The gospels thrill with this. This is so even though the word "grace," with this connotation—i.e., in the sense of "God's active love"—does not occur in the Synoptics. Salvation has come to the poor, the sinful, and the outcast (Matt. 18:12-14; 21:28-31; Mark 2:16; Luke 15:4-7, 8-10; 18:9). Particularly is this expressed in Luke 15:16-17 in the parable of the prodigal son, which reveals the Father's boundless love.

2. Its standards. These two aspects of the kingdom or rule of God proclaimed by Jesus—its presence and imminence and its character as "grace"—have profound significance for his ethical teaching.

a. The ethics of grace. Because the rule of God is an expression of grace, the moral demands of Jesus are the counterpart of God's grace. The grace of God in action, in exorcism, healing, forgiveness, and "power," which is the coming of the kingdom, imposes demands consonant with itself. The very acceptance of grace, because of the very nature of grace, lays upon the recipient a demand corresponding to it. Grace imposes its own terms—i.e., the demand to love. It is therefore no accident that in the SERMON ON THE MOUNT, the Beatitudes, which are the expression of God's grace, precede the statement of the demands of Jesus, which are thus deliberately set in the context of grace. This is reinforced if, as is possible, the Beatitudes (as, indeed, all the sermon) are a commentary on the prophetic vision of redemption found in Isa. 61, the ethic being thus rooted in redemption. And it is in this light that we are to understand the emphasis in the teaching of Jesus on love.

Not only in the sermon does this appear, but elsewhere, especially in Mark 12:28, where the two commandments of love to God and to the neighbor are declared respectively to be the first and second of the commandments. Not only the occurrence of the Golden Rule (Matt. 7:12) as a climactic summary of the Sermon on the Mount, but also the prominent place given to love in the rest of the NT (John 3:16; Rom. 13:8-10; I Cor. 8:1; 13; Col. 3:14), justifies the conclusion that love (agape) was of the essence of Jesus' ethical teaching. The significance of the emphasis in Jesus, however, on love to God and neighbor has been questioned. In Mark 12:28-34 he has merely combined two verses from the OT, and in Judaism itself distinctions between heavy and light commandments were recognized. Akiba (A.D. 135) summarized the law in the love of neighbor (Lev. 19:18; Sifra 89.4), and the GOLDEN RULE is used by Hillel and in the Letter of Artiseas, though in its negative form. As for love to God, this belongs to the Shema (Deut. 6:5), which was taken earnestly by all pious Jews (T.B. Ber. 61*b*). Nevertheless, three things are noteworthy:

a) The explicit combination of the love of God and the love of neighbor is only made by Jesus. This must not be taken to mean that the two are identical: this would be to empty the love of God of its numinous quality and the God, whom Jesus loves, is the Lord of heaven and earth; though God is love, love is not God. But, on the other hand, the love of neighbor is not, for Jesus, merely a means to the love of God. Love to God and love to the neighbor are not identical. This is expressed beautifully in the parable of the good Samaritan. To love the neighbor is to be neighbor to him. The same parable suggests the second intensification of the concept of love by Jesus.

b) It includes not only the national kinsman or neighbor but even the enemy. Love is here universalized (Matt. 5:38 ff).

c) Despite the passages in Jewish sources, where the law is summed up in a single precept, like Lev. 19:18, as by Akiba, there is no real parallel to the elevation of love to pre-eminence by Jesus. When Hillel quoted the Golden Rule, as the quintessence of the law, he thereby had no intention of invalidating the rest of the law (see LAW IN FIRST-CENTURY JUDAISM). Jesus, on the other hand, gave absolute priority to love.

But the nature of love has to be further described. The term "love" (agape) is used of love to God, as we have seen, but, outside Mark 12:28-29, the Synoptics do not refer to love to God, although this is implied in other passages dealing with the love of neighbor (Matt. 5:23-24; 6:12; Mark 12:28 ff). This is significant: it indicates that the essence of love to God is no emotional or mystical relationship, but obedience in the service of the neighbor. This, which is the imitation of God (Matt. 5:48; 18:23-35), extends to the humblest material service, which is demanded by Jesus of all men (Matt. 25:31-46) to all men (Luke 10:30-37). "Religious" acts as such are not condemned; they are assumed (e.g., prayer, fasting [Matt. 6:1 ff]), but they can have no priority over, nor be divorced from, the love of the neighbor (Matt. 5:22-23), and this is rooted in the love of God himself. This last must not be taken to mean, however, that the love (agape) of which Jesus speaks is to be absolutely differentiated from all human affection (eros). For Jesus, as for the OT, there is a real affinity between the affection which man feels for man, and the love of God. At least, human affection is not annulled in the love of God and neighbor. As in the OT the love of God for his people is expressed in human terms (Isa. 65:2), and the love of husband and wife becomes a type of God's love for Israel (Hosea), so the same word is used by Jesus of loving a friend and loving an enemy—i.e., for human affection, and the love which transcends the natural affections, and has its source in God. The conclusion is inevitable that both have their source in him (Matt. 5:46). The love of the Father is to be repeated in the love of his sons—i.e., of those who take upon themselves the yoke of his rule (Matt. 5:45).

This radicalizing of the ethical demand in the teaching of Jesus is not confined to his understanding of love. Other demands of the rule of God are proclaimed with the same utter nakedness, in their absolute state. As compared with the ethical teaching of the rabbis, who were concerned to "hedge" the naked commandments of God with the art of a "kind of compromise," that of Jesus, almost throughout, strikes a note of absolute radicalism (see LAW IN THE NT). Not only murder, but anger, is condemned (Matt. 5:21 ff); not only adultery, but the lustful glance (Matt. 5:27 ff). There is demanded, not an eye for an eye, but boundless, uncalculating love; the uttermost moral absolutism is proclaimed; an impossible is set before us. Considerations of prudence become at best secondary; the light of the rule of God in Jesus has illumined all God's demands with terrible clarity, because with gracious clarity. This it is that explains the utter radicalism with which Jesus proclaimed his ethics: he places men immediately under the gracious and demanding will of God, relentless and uncompromising, untouched by the relativities and contingencies of "the world," as it is unlimited by human sin. The ethics of Jesus then is the ethics of grace, of God's rule, as known by him.

b. Ethics and the end. At this point we have to ask whether considerations, not only of the presence of the rule of God, but of its imminent inbreaking, have influenced the ethical teaching of Jesus.

Some scholars (especially Schweitzer) have termed the absolute ethics of Jesus an ethic of the interim, designed merely for that very brief period of history which was left before the final end of history, which the Messiah was soon to inaugurate: this it is that explains the "impracticability" and "absoluteness" with which Jesus proclaimed the demands of God. Our attitude toward this understanding of Jesus' ethic depends partly on our interpretation of Jesus' attitude toward the "future." If, with some scholars, we regard the imminence of the end as merely formal, a dramatization of spiritual realities in which there is no real temporal imminence contemplated by Jesus, then that imminence cannot have been a considerable factor in his teaching. But even if we accept the view of perhaps the majority of scholars, that Jesus did expect the near "end of the world," there are factors which make it difficult to think of his ethics as merely an Interimsethik.

The early church clearly did not so understand the teaching, because it retained this when the hope of an immediate end of the existing order had waned.

Moreover, the way in which the commandments are given does not suggest "emergency orders" for an interim only. Nowhere in the Synoptics is an appeal made to the "end of the world" as a ground for ethical conduct, as is the case probably in Paul in I Cor. 7:26. It is best to see in the absolute demands of Jesus the obverse side of the absolute succor made available in the coming of the kingdom of God: they presuppose the latter and express the demands of grace in essential, if not formal, independence of the imminent incidence of "the end."

c. The ethics and the person of Jesus. Not only so, but there is another consideration that illumines much in the absolutism of many of Jesus' demands. The coming of the kingdom of God was closely associated with the person of Jesus himself (see KINGDOM OF GOD; JESUS CHRIST). The call to repentance came to be understood as a call to follow after Jesus (אחרי הלך). To judge from Mark 1:16 ff, the conception of the Christian life as a call to follow Jesus, or to discipleship to Jesus (this is not, at this point, to be confused with the imitation of Christ, but regarded as entry upon his way of life), emerged very early in his ministry, but it probably received more emphasis in the later stages of it, when Jesus set his face to go to Jerusalem, when the imperative need to support him became clear. But to be associated with Jesus was to be open to the extraordinary tensions of the crisis in which he was involved, which meant readiness for unusual sacrifices and special duties (Matt. 12:30; Mark 9:38-40; Luke 11:23). The "way" of the Christian becomes the "way" of confession (Matt. 10:18, 22, 24, 39; Mark 8:34-37; 10: 29-30), and of loyalty (Matt. 8:18-22; 19:16-22; Mark 6:8-9; Luke 10:2). Much of the absolutism demanded in these passages is not for general or universal application, but directed to the specific historical crisis of the ministry of Jesus, which laid upon his followers special renunciations, as they were severally able. Jesus demanded both the sanctification of natural conditions—e.g., marriage (Mark 10:2 ff)—and, when necessary, their transcendence. The point is that ethics in the context of the "warfare" of his ministry could not but at times be "totalitarian."

d. Misconceptions. At this juncture it would be well to remove a Roman Catholic misconception. Already in the third century, Origen (Commentary on Rom. 3:3) and Tertullian (To His Wife 2.1) distinguished between the "advice" and the "requirements" of the gospel. The latter are binding on all Christians; the "advice" is for those who would live the holier life. On two main phases of conduct was there "advice"—riches (Matt. 19:21; Mark 6:7-9; 10:21) and sex (Matt. 19:12; 22:30). Poverty and celibacy, while impossible of fulfilment by all Christians, conferred special merit on those who practiced them. But it is best to see in such absolutes the recognition, not of two standards of morality, but of different aptitudes and of different demands in the setting of the ministry. On the other hand, the view familiar to Protestants, that the intention of the absolute demands of Jesus is to produce penitence and despair, and thus to prepare the way for the acceptance of Christ, finds little, if any, support in the gospels. These absolutes are set, as we saw, in a context of grace: in the gospels it is not so much that the demands lead us to grace, as that the encounter with the grace of Christ, or of the kingdom, reveals the incalculable nature of the demands of God. This, it is true, leads again and again to repentance, but only because there has been a "prevenient grace," which is the "coming of the kingdom." This simultaneously creates repentance and reveals demand; and the more it is appropriated, the more it intensifies both the repentance and the demand without limit (Matt. 18:21). This is why to do all the demand is still to be "unworthy servants" (Luke 17:10).

e. Ethics applied. The above discussion might create the impression that the ethical teaching of Jesus dealt only in absolutes. But, before this conclusion is drawn, two considerations should be examined:

a) The tradition of his teaching in the Synoptics, in addition to containing ethical principles, which are of universal application—e.g., that of love and self-denial—contains practical injunctions (e.g., Matt. 18:15 ff). It is possible that, with FORM CRITICISM, we should relegate such passages to the invention of the early church. However, it should not be overlooked that Jesus was not only prophet and Messiah, but also a teacher of "wisdom" (Matt. 5:14-15; 6:27, 34). It has, indeed, been possible to appeal to the essential rationality of his ethical demands, despite their absolute character (Bultmann). These made, it has been argued (over against the Jewish law, which requires a blind obedience to what is therein set forth, reasonable or otherwise), only demands which are self-evidently good; i.e., insight into the right conduct to be followed in any given situation is furnished by that situation itself. In this view the demands of Jesus are eminently self-authenticating. This is to go too far. The words of Jesus are proclaimed by him as authoritative: for him, it is not their self-authenticating character that is significant but their source in God's will. As the demand of God, the teachings of Jesus could not be derived from the essential requirement of any given situation. Precisely the ability, or insight, to define this requirement, as the essential will of God, was the role of Jesus as teacher. Nevertheless, that Jesus' demands could have been defined as rational, should warn us against absolutizing them too severely. The possibility is not to be ruled out that Jesus himself, despite his vivid apprehension of the absolutes, was also aware of the necessity of compromise. Much as he was a universalist in principle, but a particularist in practice, who confined his ministry to Israel (Matt. 10:5-6, 23), so he may have been absolutist in his ethical principles, and yet prepared to issue injunctions of compromise. This suggestion is made hesitatingly, because it is impossible not to recognize that the hand of the church is to be traced in ethical teaching, as in the parables, and that what was originally absolute often became parenetic.

b) In two passages Jesus deals with specific issues, divorce (Mark 10:2-9) and the payment of taxes to Caesar (Mark 12:13-17). In Mark 10:2-9, Jesus describes the Mosaic permission of divorce (Deut. 24:1) as a concession to the hardness of men's hearts —i.e., to their mental and moral petrifaction. Against this permission, he appeals to the aboriginal will of God in creation, which he finds revealed in the story of the creation of man in Gen. 1:27; 2:24. (There can be little doubt that the exceptive phrase introduced, forbidding divorce "except on the ground of unchastity," in Matt. 5:32; 19:9, is an "ecclesiastical" modification.) In the light of God's purpose in creation, Jesus refuses to contemplate divorce at all. The created order here becomes a guide to the moral. And elsewhere, by implication, Jesus finds a congruity between the natural order and the moral order (although he never uses terms such as these). Thus the parables employ natural phenomena for moral and spiritual edification (e.g., Mark 4:1 ff). Jesus finds no mere analogy, but an inward affinity, between the natural and the spiritual order. The kingdom of God is intrinsically like the processes of nature (Matt. 6:26-30; Luke 12:24-28). In Matt. 5: 44-48 the imitation of God in his work in creation is the guide to conduct (cf. Matt. 6:19-20; 7:24; 10:

29; 13:24 ff, 28; 24:27 ff; Mark 4:3 ff, 26 ff; Luke 12:55; 16:21).

The other passage, Mark 12:13-17, where Jesus deals with a specific moral issue is, perhaps, also to be understood in the light of this evaluation of the ethical significance of the created order. Jesus answers: "Render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and to God the things that are God's." This is not ironical, as if Jesus implied that Caesar is after all merely a straw puppet; nor does it mean that the world of politics and the world of religion are two distinct spheres, each governed by its own principles (Luther). Jesus recognizes the claims of the state. At the same time he requires that all that is God's due should be given to God; and the claims of God are all-embracing, although the state has its rightful claims. The saying, on this view, is essentially concerned with the problem of the state. But another possibility is open. The question, earnestly asked by the opponents of Jesus, is, by his answer, relegated to a secondary place. "Your real concern," he might have said, "should be to give to God what is his. Your coins belong to Caesar, but you yourselves to God." A further thought is probably present. The coins bearing the image of Caesar belong to him, but men, through their creation, bear the image of God and so belong to him. Jesus is not essentially concerned with the state, but with the claims of the in-breaking rule of God. Elsewhere also he is completely realistic in his estimate of the state and its powers (Luke 14:31-32; 16:1-7; 18:1-5), but he conceives his mission, not in terms of political power and reform, but of redemption from sin (Matt. 4:3-10; Mark 2:17; 10:45; Luke 4:3-12; 19:10). This does not mean flight from the world, however, as with the Essenes, but entry into it to proclaim God's rule (Matt. 10:16). Mark 10:42, despite its ruthless realism, bespeaks no rejection of the world, but only a recognition of the fascination and danger of power. In the same way, the attitude of Jesus toward wealth is determined by his concern for obedience to the rule of God. Jesus was open to the realities of the economic and social order of his day (Matt. 13:47-50; 20:1-15; Mark 4:3 ff; Luke 12:37 ff; 17:7-10). His eschatological message did not lead him to belittle the work of every day. But he was not concerned with the distribution of wealth as such, although fully aware of human inequalities (Mark 14:7). His woes against the wealthy, which are emphasized in Luke (6:24), but are not peculiar to that gospel (cf. Matt. 6:24), are due, not to any zeal for economic reform as such, but to his awareness of the "demonic" character of wealth, as of power (Mark 10:27), its tendency to come between man and God. This is not to be weakened to a demand by Jesus for "inner" or "spiritual" detachment from wealth: wealth in its actuality is suspect (Matt. 6:19-20; Mark 10:23-27; Luke 12:16-21). Poverty, as such, is neither condemned nor praised by Jesus (Matt. 5:3 correctly interprets Luke 6:20). He faced economic inequality realistically, while he uncovered, equally realistically, the dangers of riches. Throughout, his concern was that men should seek first the rule of God (Matt. 6:33).

What, however, concerns us particularly is the fact that in his discussion, both of divorce and of taxes to Caesar, Jesus makes an explicit and implicit appeal to the order of creation. Are we to conclude that there is an antinomy in his ethical teaching? Does he, on the one hand, proclaim absolute demands, which radically cut across the "natural" inclinations and affections of men, and, on the other, declare his demands to be truly "natural"? On this, two comments are pertinent: The OT, as we saw, drew no sharp distinction between nature and grace (or agape and eros; Pss. 8; 19), so that Jesus has precedents. But to this it may be objected that the OT does not, at least as explicitly, demand the absolutes as does Jesus. We must, therefore, look deeper. When Jesus finds "nature" pointing to his absolute demands, the "nature" which he sees is "the nature" intended by God, not "nature" as it actually is, itself corrupted by the Fall. I.e., the insight which enabled Jesus to penetrate to the primordial purpose of God for man in the moral realm enabled him also to discover anew "nature" in its primordial intention. Like some poets, in their childhood but not in their adulthood (cf. Dylan Thomas, "Fern Hill"; Wordsworth, "Intimations of Immortality"), Jesus saw "nature" as it came from God, before it, too, had become involved in the fall from "grace." He saw it renewed by grace, and so saw in it a confirmation of the moral demands of grace. It is no antinomy, therefore, that we find in Jesus, but the triumph of grace over nature and sin, and thus the rediscovery of the unity of both creation and redemption.

3. Its sanctions. No systematized statement of the motives for the good life is to be expected. Not that of a moral philosopher, Jesus' speech was poetic, parabolic, and hyperbolic, not "scientific"; his concern, not academic definition and precision, but practical and prophetic. He, therefore, offers no analysis of virtue after the manner of a Greek philosopher, no discussion of virtue for virtue's sake. Essentially he appeals to two sanctions:

a) He urges repentance, the final repentance before the kingdom of God (Mal. 4:4-6), and does so in a context of rewards and punishments related to that kingdom. In the tradition, as we now have it, the punishments threatened, perhaps, preponderate over the promises of grace. Jesus points to the terrors of the Day of Judgment (Matt. 5:22; 10:15; 11:22; 12:38-42; Luke 10:13-15) or of the Day of the Son of man (Matt. 10:32-33; 25:31-46; Mark 8:38). Punishment is also loss of the life of the age to come (Matt. 10:38-39; Mark 8:35); the command to watch implies danger (Matt. 24–25). On the other hand, entry into the kingdom of God is the supreme good. Thus the aim of the demands of the Sermon on the Mount is to enable men to enter the kingdom (Matt. 5:3-10, 20; Luke 22:28-30). The rewards of the kingdom seem to include, not only the blessings of the age to come, but tangible things in this age (Matt. 19:23 ff; Luke 6:38; nor should it be forgotten that the Beatitudes imply present blessedness, as well as eschatological), except that for Jesus this age is already under the seal of the age to come. While Jesus occasionally appeals to motives of a rationalistic and utilitarian kind (in Luke 16:16-20 he warns against folly, and in 16:1-17 demands prudence), the possession of or entry into the kingdom of God remains the chief motive. Put in this way, the kingdom of God has itself become a reward, so that the concept of reward is in a dominating position in the ethical teaching of Jesus, which, as we saw, is an ethic of the kingdom. But certain facts are cautionary. Jesus himself warns explicitly against certain rewards and asks for the direction of life toward God himself (Matt. 6:1 ff); to him, after we have done all, we are still unworthy servants (Luke 17:10); real "reward" we cannot gain. So too, in the Beatitudes, the blessings given are not conditioned by obedience but given by grace. It would, therefore, seem that the concept of reward cannot have been a fundamental one for Jesus.

b) Then, what are the fundamental sanctions for him? His ethic, we have seen, is determined by the kingdom of God. To emphasize the words "of God" is to discover wherein Jesus finds the sanction for his ethic. It is the imitation of God, the God who took the initiative in giving the kingdom, that constitutes the motive for the good life in Matt. 5:38-41; Luke 6:31, 36—this without any eschatological reference (cf. Matt. 10:8*b*). The new understanding of God gives to Jesus the absolutism of his demands, and reverence for and obedience to God, the hallowing of his name, his motives for the good life (Matt. 5:16, 34-35; 23:20-22).

We can now evaluate the sanctions used by Jesus. He employed the appeal to scripture, to the rewards and punishments traditional in the furniture of apocalyptic, and in this he was, naturally, governed by motives of pedagogy in dealing with his contemporaries. These sanctions, however, are not the fundamental ones; to make reward for Jesus the fundamental motive is to misunderstand the nature of the rule of God, to which he asks for submission. This rule man can only accept in humility. Since its demand is that of love, submission to it, by this very token, cannot be motivated by any selfish concern. "To love God and to love man," which the receiving of the kingdom implies, by its very nature, excludes religious egoism and eudaemonism. The reward that the acceptance of the kingdom gives in abounding measure (Matt. 25:21, 23; Luke 6:38) is that of grace, which means that those are rewarded who seek no reward. In response to God's grace the Christian enters into a personal relationship of sonship with God the Father; and the Christian moral life arises out of this relationship without concern for reward. The good life is the acceptance of God's gift; its reward lies in the acceptance itself, just as punishment lies in the act of rejection—i.e., in lack of love before love made manifest. In the rule of God, announced by Jesus, man encounters a love measureless in grace, the acceptance or rejection of which brings measureless reward and measureless loss (Matt. 25: 21, 33; Luke 6:38; 12). It is a grace that puts to shame all thought of reward and punishment.

Are we then to conclude that the sanctions of reward and punishment at the Judgment Day are merely formal? Some have drawn this conclusion. It may be that Jesus has, in his pictures of that day, dramatized the inevitable consequences, for good or ill, of the rejection of his appeal. But, whatever the degree of literalness or symbolism we apply to such imagery of reward and punishment as he used, this is not to be isolated from his preaching of the kingdom of God—i.e., from the grace of God. This is the essential reference of all the ethic of Jesus.

It is insufficient to define the ethic of Jesus as one of love (Harnack, Niebuhr), since it is the ethic of God, who, while he is love, is also Lord of heaven and earth: it is also insufficient to define it as radical obedience, "which exists only when a man inwardly assents to what is required of him, when the thing commanded is seen as intrinsically God's command" (Bultmann), because this empties obedience of the richness of the ethical tradition of Judaism and of the meaning of "God" to Jesus as creator and redeemer. The ethics of Jesus is best thought of as the demands which are placed upon those who have accepted God's rule, as Jesus proclaimed and lived it. By its very nature, as the demand of the kingdom of God which is at work, the ethics of Jesus is at once an ethic of grace and forgiveness, gratitude and obedience, and, because it is inextricably bound up with his person and those who have responded to him, it is the ethics of a new community of God, which he called into being, the new Israel, his body. Does this imply that Jesus is a new Moses? In the sense that he issued a set code, the answer to this is in the negative. In the sense that he revealed the will of God, the quality and direction of the good life demanded by him, it is in the affirmative. That Jesus thought of his ministry in terms of that of a new Moses is likely in view of the Last Supper, when he instituted a new Israel "in his blood." See bibliography.

B. THE EARLY CHURCH. The gospels, from which the above account of the ethical teaching of Jesus is drawn, were the products of the early church, and the motifs already emphasized by Jesus reemerge, with inevitable modifications, in its ethical teaching. But the point of departure for the understanding of this is not only the ministry of Jesus, but also the Resurrection. As this was the ground for the emergence of the primitive community, as a well-knit and self-conscious group, so the Resurrection was also the immediate inspiration of its ethic. Because the Resurrection was not only a triumph of life over death; it was also a triumph of forgiveness over sin. The Resurrection was an expression, perhaps even the expression, of God's grace in Christ, because the risen Christ came back to those who had all forsaken him and fled, who had slept during his agony. The Resurrection, as forgiveness, emerges clearly in Paul. The grace of Christ in appearing to a persecutor of the church was marvelous to him (I Cor. 15:8-9). If Luke 5:1-11 is a resurrection scene transferred to the ministry, as many think, the same thing is true of Peter (cf. John 21), and that Jesus first appeared to him, who had thrice denied him, is significant. Thus the Resurrection, which reassembled the scattered disciples to constitute the church, was founded in the grace of Christ and of God in Christ. It was of a piece with the whole ministry of Jesus, and the ethic of the community, like the ethic of Jesus, was to be an ethic of grace—i.e., for those who knew the Resurrection as forgiveness, for the new Israel of God, which the forgiven came to constitute. From this can be seen the main emphases in early Christian ethical teaching.

1. Koinonia ethics: vertical. The ethic of the earliest Christians was an ethic of community or fellowship (κοινωνία). This, however, has to be carefully assessed. Its essential reference is not to the human fellowship which the members of the community enjoyed with one another, although this is most certainly not to be excluded from the connotation of the term. Primarily the emphasis is on the common sharing in the grace of the risen Lord. The participation of the various members in the forgiving experience of the Resurrection lent to them a common grace wherein they stood. This fellowship, in grace, could not but create a warm human relationship: the members became brethren for whom Christ had died; their ethic was the expression of their fellowship, which was, at one and the same time, a fellowship with one another and "in Christ."

2. The imitation of Christ. This reference to Christ shows again that the fellowship was rooted in a particular event—immediately in the Resurrection and, behind this, in the life and death of Jesus, with which, as an expression of grace, the Resurrection was wholly congruous. Thus the ethic of the community is linked to the understanding of an event —the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus. In this the church came to see the act of God himself in history, and the appropriation of this event became the dynamic of the good life—i.e., much in the ethic of the early church is the imitation of God "in Christ." The sign of this appropriation and, therefore, of this ethic, became BAPTISM, which is traced back by Acts to Pentecost; and, although it was not universal (Acts 1:14-15; 19:1-7), it is possible that most Christians were baptized (Rom. 6:3; I Cor. 12:13; Gal. 3:27). Since Jesus had figuratively connected his own baptism with his coming passion (Mark 10:38), it is also possible that this had come to be combined with the rite of baptism in the minds of the Twelve also, so that the germ of later Pauline teaching on baptism as dying and rising with Christ was present from the first.

In any case, for Paul ethics is inseparable from the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus. He divided his own life clearly into two parts: first, his life under the law when he was a Jew, and secondly, his life "in Christ." The two parts were distinctly separated by his experience on the road to Damascus. The act by which a Christian acknowledged his faith, and really began to live "in Christ," was baptism. This act symbolized a death to the old life under the law, and a rising to newness of life "in Christ," or in "the Spirit." By baptism, the Christian, through faith, had died, risen, been justified: he was a new creation. All that was now necessary for him was to become what he was. His ethical life is rooted in what he is. For Paul, ethics thus is indicative in character. This motif—the appeal to God's act in Christ—is not confined to baptismal contexts; see II Cor.8:9; 12:1; Phil. 2:5-8. The imitation of God in Christ is also Johannine: "We love [him], because [and as] he first loved us" (I John 4:19).

But the imitation of Christ, as the imitation of God's act in redemption, does not exhaust this motif. The figure of the historical Jesus, as such, played a real part in the moral development of the early church. There can be little doubt that part of the reason for the preservation of stories about the life of Jesus, such as we have in the gospels, was the desire to imitate Jesus in his acts. During the actual ministry the call which went out, that men should follow him, meant, under the circumstance, readiness to enter upon his way of suffering—i.e., to take up the cross literally (Mark 8:34, etc.). In the life of the early church, while persecution, and, therefore, violent death—walking the way of the cross literally—was always a possibility, more often Christians were called upon to imitate their Lord in virtues of the daily round, less spectacular, but no less arduous perhaps, than readiness to die—in love, forbearance, patience, mercy, etc. The degree to which the imitation of Christ, in this sense, played a part in the lives of Christians has been variously assessed. If, as some form critics assert (see FORM CRITICISM), early Christians, including Paul, were largely uninterested in that life, then the imitation of Christ cannot have been significant. But this position the whole of our previous discussion, with its emphasis on the rootage of Christian ethics in the "event," will have, by implication, invalidated.

Again, it has been urged that where Paul mentions the "imitation of Christ" in I Cor. 11:1; I Thess. 1:6, the reference is not to the details of the character and conduct of Jesus, but to the central act of his self-giving. Paul would have agreed, we are to assume, with Kierkegaard that: "If the contemporary generation had left behind them nothing but the words, 'We have believed that in such and such a year God appeared among us in the humble figure of a servant, that he lived and taught in our community, and finally died,' it would have been enough." But this is invalidated by the fact that Christ is an object of imitation in the same sense as Paul is (I Cor. 11:1); the apostle holds up certain qualities of the historic Jesus which were to be imitated; he points to Jesus, who pleased not himself (Rom. 15:3), to his meekness and gentleness (II Cor. 10:1); he commands liberality through a reminder of him who was rich and became poor (II Cor. 8:8-9; cf. Phil. 2:5-6). The description of "love" in I Cor. 13 is probably based on the life of Jesus—is, in short, a sort of character sketch of the Lord. There can be little question that for Paul every Christian is pledged to an attempted ethical conformity to Christ. So also is it with John (John 13) and I Peter (2:21). Thus, both as an act of God and as "human," the life of Jesus is the paradigm of the Christian life.

3. The divine purpose and the Holy Spirit. The ethic of the church, since it is directed to and by Jesus of Nazareth, as the Messiah, has throughout an eschatological reference; it is related to the purpose of God in salvation revealed in Jesus. This comes out most clearly in Paul's understanding of his call to be an apostle. This meant for him that he was taken up by God's grace to share in the redemptive activity of God now at work in the church. True, the apostolic consciousness of Paul was more intense than that of most Christians, and his calling, in a sense, unique as the apostle to the Gentiles. But the whole community also was "called"—i.e., caught up into the large counsel of God. This shines through the literature of the NT (see CHURCH, IDEA OF). Christians are, therefore, delivered from futility: they share in the work of salvation (including their own) inaugurated by Jesus, and ethical decisions are to be made in this light.

Another way of saying the same thing is to claim that the Christian life is life in the Spirit, because the Spirit is the eschatological gift, which warrants the community's consciousness of itself as the community of the end. This is the meaning of Acts 2. Attempts to maintain that the Spirit, in the earliest days of the church, had no ethical significance must be rejected. The character that the Spirit had already acquired in the OT makes it impossible to interpret him at any time in the church as merely a wonder-working power, mysterious and non-ethical. It was the Spirit that had inspired the prophets, who had discerned between the precious and the vile, that would create a new heart in the new Israel of Ezekiel's vision, and inspire the messianic times with counsel, wisdom, and righteousness. Above all else, for Judaism, the Holy Spirit was the inspirer of the Scriptures; but this, in itself, implied the "ethicization" of the Spirit, because it was through these that Israel knew the moral demands made upon it.

Thus for Acts, Paul, and the rest of the NT, the Spirit was essentially creative and life-giving, not only in the ecstatic aspects of life, but also in the moral. The coming of the Spirit should never be separated from the Resurrection as grace: like the Resurrection, the Spirit is an "energy of forgiveness." Thus for Paul the Spirit becomes the source of Christian morality. Love, joy, peace, righteousness, and "every victory won" in the moral sphere are the fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22-23). The connection of the Spirit with morality in the Fourth Gospel is different. Here the primary function of the Spirit is the illumination of the church (John 14:26; 16:3, 14), the unfolding to it of what Jesus during his lifetime could not reveal, because the disciples could not bear it (16:12). It would seem to be only given on condition of a response to moral obedience (14:15). But the close relationship between the Holy Spirit and the risen Lord in John should again warn us against any de-ethicization of it (John 14:26 includes a reference probably to the ethical teaching of Jesus). Nevertheless, it is in Paul that the Spirit, as the dynamic of the good life, comes to his own. Moreover, it was Paul who isolated the moral aspect of the activity of the Spirit, and thus brought order into the confusion of popular Christian thinking in this field and made "love" the criterion of the Spirit's activity and presence (I Cor. 13).

4. Koinonia ethics: horizontal. The ethics of the NT is not only indicative, pointing to the fellowship (koinonia) of the church "in Christ," to the historic Jesus and the act of God in him, to the divine purpose and the presence of the Spirit; it also contains a "horizontal" imperative. The church did not luxuriate in "grace," but took practical steps to give expression to grace. The chief gift of grace, and fruit of the Spirit, was love (agape). This it was that led to the experiment usually referred to as the communism of Acts (2:42-45). Not indifference to this world's good, engendered by belief in its approaching end, nor the presence among believers of elements related to the communal sect at Qumran (although such "communism" as we find in Acts would be natural in a milieu influenced by the latter), nor any conscious reflection on the indivisibility of the spiritual and material—none of these primarily led to this. Rather, the experiment was the natural, spontaneous expression of life in the Spirit, with which the neglect of the poor was incompatible. This appears from the naïveté of the experiment. Owners sold their property and handed over the proceeds to the apostles, who administered a common fund from which the needs of the poor were met, presumably in the form of common meals. The contributions to the common pool were voluntary (Acts 5:1-11). Living on capital eventually led to economic distress (Acts 11:29; 24:17; I Cor. 16:1; II Cor. 8:1 ff; Gal. 2:10). The experiment failed, not to be repeated in this form, but it witnesses to the "fellowship" ethic of the primitive community in its realism. It lived in the absolutes, not only because the end was at hand, but also because of the intensity of its experience of forgiveness.

This emphasis on the communal nature of the Christian way persisted throughout the NT. It is ultimately rooted in the teaching of Jesus, who not only gathered the Twelve as the representatives of the new Israel to follow him, but attached them in a kind of organic union with himself. Those who accept the disciples whom he sent accept him (Matt. 10:40); those who refuse them refuse him (Matt. 10:14-15); to give to one of the least of the brethren of Christ is to give to him (Matt. 25:31-45); the followers of Christ can suffer with him and represent him (Matt. 5:11-12); to receive a child in his name is to receive him (Matt. 18:5-6). From this background, Paul's Christ mysticism developed, his concept of the solidarity of Christians with their Lord; his understanding of the church, as the new Israel, the body of Christ, is rooted in the ministry of Jesus himself. How this is developed ethically is seen in I Corinthians. One of the criteria for the proper conduct is the upbuilding of the body (I Corinthians, passim). Similarly, in the Fourth Gospel the concept of the disciples, the church, as branches of a vine (John 15), or, in I Peter, of Christians, as constituting living stones in the temple of God (I Pet. 2:4-5), expresses the same truth—that the ethical life of Christians is a life in community, because they share in the one Lord. Thus Christian ethics in the NT is never atomistic. No individual lives to himself. On the other hand, he is not at the mercy of the community, even of the church itself, because the body itself is subordinated to the Head, Christ. The lordship of Christ is a safeguard against both a spurious individualism and a totalitarian collectivism. See CHURCH, IDEA OF.

5. "Casuistry" and the words of Jesus. The same impulse which led to the experiment in communism, the awareness of the "horizontal" significance of the koinonia in grace, in part at least, led to other developments:

a) At first, in the awareness of its resources in grace, the church attempted to live in the light of the absolutes. For certain elements the commandments of Jesus in their absolute form were for long guides to conduct. But, under the inevitable compromises, it became necessary for the church to apply these absolutes to life. First, there began that process which tended to transform the absolutes into practical rules of conduct. The classic example is the way in which the prohibition of divorce was made practicable by the addition of the exceptive clause: "except on the ground of unchastity" (Matt. 5:31 ff). Because it is Matthew that reveals this best, it has been claimed that the words of Jesus as such played a significant part in the ethical development of the church only in Jewish Christian circles. But this is not so. The Pauline letters also appeal to the words of Jesus as authoritative. These words were an important source for Paul's ethical teaching. The extent to which the Pauline letters are reminiscent of the Synoptic gospels has been insufficiently recognized. There are very many such reminiscences. Two factors emerge:

Paul interweaves words of Jesus "unconsciously" into his exhortations, which suggests that these words were bone of his bone (see, e.g., Rom. 12:14 [Matt. 5:44]; 12:17 [Matt. 5:39 ff]; 12:21 [Matt. 5:38 ff]; 13:7 [Matt. 22:15-22; Mark 12:13-17; Luke 20:20-26]; 13:8-10 [Matt. 22:34-40; Mark 12:28-34; Luke 10:25-28]; 14:10 [Matt. 7:1; Luke 6:37]; 14:13 [Matt. 18:7; Mark 9:42; Luke 17:1-2]; 14:14 [Matt. 15:11; Mark 7:15]; I Thess. 4:8 [Luke 10:16]; 5:2-3 [Matt. 24:43; Luke 12:39]; 5:6 [Matt. 24:42; Mark 13:37; Luke 21:34, 36]).

Also, there is clear evidence that there was a collection of sayings of the Lord to which Paul appealed (e.g., Acts 20:35; I Cor. 7:10; 9:14; 11:23 ff; 14:37; I Thess. 4:15-16; see especially I Cor. 7:25). Not only in matters of a legislative character does Paul find guidance in the words of Jesus, but also in more personal matters (Rom. 7), where possibly his discovery of the supreme importance of motive goes back to Jesus. In I Cor. 7:25 he refers to a word of Christ as a commandment (ἐπιταγή); in two places he uses the very words "the law of Christ" where the reference is, in part at least, to the teaching of Jesus. This is no declension on Paul's part to a primitive legalism, but the recognition of the fact that his exalted Lord was never, in his mind, divorced from Jesus the rabbi, that the Spirit is never divorced from the historic teaching of Jesus. And, although in the Fourth Gospel the ethical teaching of Jesus, as such, plays little part, the function of the Spirit is to recall the words of Jesus. The same emphasis appears in I John, where there is constant appeal to the commandments of the Lord, and frequent echoes of them. See bibliography.

Nevertheless, there is a difference of emphasis (but only of emphasis) in Matthew and Paul, as over against the Johannine literature. The words of Jesus appear in the former two over their wide range. But even there they are summed up in one word, "love" (ἀγάπη). Thus the climax of the Sermon on the Mount at Matt. 7:12 is the Golden Rule. Paul and John, like the Synoptics, emphasize the centrality of "love" (Rom. 13:8-10; I Cor. 8:1; 13; Col. 3:14; I John 3:1; 2:7-10; 4:7-16). The meaning of "love" has again to be carefully noted (see § B4 above). Partaking more of active good will than of emotion, it can be commanded, as emotions cannot. In I John it is used in a "down-to-earth" manner as involving willingness to share one's goods (I John 3:17). For Paul it is the fulfilment of the law and the principle of cohesion in the Christian community. The expression of love is multiple (I Cor. 13), but its essential nature is revealed in Christ's dying for men. It is this kind of act that is demanded of those who "love."

b) The necessity which led to the application of the absolutes of Jesus to life led the church to take over for its own use codal material whether from Hellenism or from Judaism or both. Most of the letters reveal a twofold structure: a first part, dealing with "doctrine," is followed by a second, dealing with ethics. Romans is typical. Chs. 1–11 deal with doctrine; 12:1 ff deals with ethics, and it is causally connected with chs. 1–11. The ethical sections of the various letters reveal a common tradition of catechesis, which may have been used in the instruction of converts, especially at baptism (see bibliography). Cf. Rom. 12:1; Eph. 4:20-6:19; Col. 3:8-4:12; Heb. 12:1-2; Jas. 1:1-4:10; I Pet. 1:1-4:11; 4:12-5:14. This common tradition must not be regarded as having a fixed pattern, but the similarity in the order and contents of the material in the above sections is too marked to be accidental. The presence in them of the imperative participle (e.g., at Rom. 12:9-19), a form not common in Hellenistic Greek but familiar in Hebrew legal documents, suggests that Paul, and other early Christian writers, drew upon rabbinic code material, such as is found in the Dead Sea Scrolls (Manual of Discipline 1:18 ff actually has the imperative participle), Mishna Demai and Derek Eretz Rabba and Zuta. There are also parallels to the tradition in Hellenistic sources. The church probably took over much pagan ethical convention from the Jewish Diaspora. Whatever the exact source of the material, the church found it necessary to borrow from non-Christian sources.

6. NT ethics and "the world." What, finally, is the relation of ethics in the NT to "the world"? That non-Christian ethical forms could be taken up into the Christian tradition, without incongruity, means that there was a point of affinity between them and Christian forms. This point lies in the relation of the ethics demanded by the NT to creation. For Jesus, we saw, there was an affinity between the natural and the ethical. Thus he found human relations, at one level, a clue to the will of God (Matt. 7:11; see § B5 above). The created order, and man as part of this order, bears the "image of God." Thus it is natural that the ethical tradition of mankind, in this case of Hellenism and Judaism, should be of use to the church, whose ethic not only can transcend the natural but also can confirm it. Thus Paul can refer to what nature itself teaches (I Cor. 11:14) and make use of the rough rabbinic equivalent of the Stoic "law of nature" (Rom. 1; 2): he speaks of what is fitting (τὰ καθήκοντα; e.g., Rom. 1:28) like a Stoic, and makes appeal to CONSCIENCE. Probably the "apostolic decree" of Acts 15 makes use of the Noachian commandments also—i.e., of laws that were reckoned as binding upon every living soul, which had been given to Noah, the father of mankind, before the revelation on Sinai. Still more important is it that the Christ, who is the redeemer in the NT, and the revealer of God's moral purpose, is also the agent of creation (John 1; Col. 1; Heb. 1), so that the ethics of the NT, rooted as it is in the gospel, is not only of relevance to the church, but also to the world, insofar as this ethics affirms and confirms what is truly natural for all men in virtue of their creation.

Can we go further in relating the Christian ethic to the world? Indirectly, the life of the church, insofar as it really is the community of grace, can convict the world of sin and reveal to it life of a new quality and direction. Does the NT reveal more—an ethic directly relevant to politics and society, etc.? Although there was evident in the church a Christianization of personal relations (see Philemon), within the existing order, the church, partly under the impact of the expectation of the Parousia, was apparently not concerned to change the social structures of the time, evil as many of them were. The preaching of Jesus on the kingdom of God had political repercussions in the ministry: He attracted Zealots (see ZEALOT) for a time, but, rejecting their methods, ultimately disappointed them. When Paul discovered that the term "kingdom of God" was being misunderstood politically, he dropped it almost entirely (Acts 17:7-8). Either submission to the powers that be is advised (Rom. 13:1); or an abortive hatred that can only lead, not to their redemption, but to their destruction (Apoc.); or there is care not to offend (I Peter), although the limits of the claims of Caesar are also recognized (see bibliography).

From all this, are we to conclude that NT ethics are primarily designed to cultivate the garden of the church, the fragrance of which is to sweeten the surrounding wilderness, which, however, is to sustain no frontal attack? To many the answer to this must be in the affirmative. Even in I Cor. 6:1-11, it is claimed, Paul gives no rules for an institutional reform, even in the church, but demands merely that at each point there should be radical obedience to love. This, it is urged, seems to be the case everywhere. Neither Jesus nor Paul reflects on the social consequences of his actions (Rom. 12:2: be not conformed to this world). This is to go too far. As stated above, Jesus may have left instructions for the discipline of the disciples, and Paul was a catechist and an organizer. Moreover, recently the attempt has been made to find a basis for a "kerygmatic social ethic and an aggressive social action" in Paul's view of the conflict between God, Christ, and the church, and the evil, unseen powers of evil, the demonic principalities and powers, the "rulers of this world" (see Colossians, Ephesians, etc.). These last represent the structural elements of unregenerate society, the false authorities of culture. The struggle of Christ against these powers goes on until the Parousia: in this, Christians share and thus engage in social action. They are thus governed by a lively HOPE. This theory preserves the profound truth that the coming of the kingdom of God is never merely a gift, but also a demand to confront the brute realities of the universe: it is in tension. Little examined, the theory, however, faces one difficulty in the NT itself—namely, that while the "unseen powers" in Paul may be mythological expressions of social, political, and economic realities, it is difficult to give them this significance in the Synoptics, which belong largely to the same milieu. And the question must be asked whether it is legitimate to demythologize the "principalities and powers" (as does Wilder). In any case, the real justification for a struggle against social evils lies in the very nature of the grace which created the church and to which it responds; this needs no recourse to "demythologization." Chronological preoccupation with the Parousia, and its own social weakness, made this less clear to the early church than it need be to us.

NT ethics is dominated by the fact of Christ. We have seen an indicative pointing to what he did in his life, death, and resurrection, by the appropriation of which the Christian has died to sin and risen to newness of life; and an imperative derived mainly from his words, but also drawing upon Jewish and Hellenistic ethical traditions. In short, the work and words of Jesus, and these in indissoluble unity, constitute the ethics of the NT, of the new Israel. We might say that it differs from the ethics of the old Israel mainly in this, that while in Judaism, within the complex of the event which redeemed Israel from Egypt—i.e., the Exodus—it is the law of the covenant rather than the agent of the covenant, Moses, that is emphasized; in Christianity, the new exodus, it is the opposite that is true: here the person of Jesus, the agent of the new covenant, achieves preeminence, rather than his word of demand. Christ has taken the place of the law and has become the "new Torah."

Bibliography. On the tradition of catechesis in the early church, see P. Carrington, The Primitive Christian Catechism (1940); E. G. Selwyn, ed., The First Epistle of St. Peter (1946). On the appeal to Jesus' commandments in I John, see C. H. Dodd, The Johannine Epistles (1946), pp. xxxviii ff. On Jesus as a new Moses, see W. D. Davies, Torah in the Messianic Age and/or the Age to Come (1952). On the NT attitude toward the claims of the state, see O. Cullmann, The State in the NT (1956). See also: T. W. Manson, The Teaching of Jesus (1931); R. Bultmann, Jesus and the Word (1934); A. N. Wilder, Eschatology and Ethics in the Teaching of Jesus (2nd ed., 1939); T. W. Manson, Jesus the Messiah (1943); O. Cullmann, Christ and Time (1950); C. H. Dodd, Gospel and Law (1950); R. Schnackenburg, Die Sittliche Botschaft des NT (1954); A. Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus (3rd ed., 1954); W. D. Davies, Paul and Rabbinic Judaism (1955), pp. 111-46; A. N. Wilder, "Kerygma, Eschatology and Social Ethics," in The Background of the NT and Its Eschatology (Studies in Honour of C. H. Dodd; eds. Davies and Daube; 1956), pp. 509-36.

W. D. DAVIES

ETHIOPIA ē′thĭ ō′pĭ ə [כּוּשׁ]; CUSH kōōsh in Gen. 2:13; 10:6; I Chr. 1:8; Ezek. 38:5; ETHIOPIANS —ənz. The ancient name of the territory S of Egypt, corresponding roughly to the present Sudan.

1. Name. Much confusion has arisen between the terms "Ethiopia" and "Cush," which for the biblical period may be taken as more or less synonymous. The MT has only one word: כּוּשׁ (Kûš). The LXX transcribes the name as Χους in the ethnographic lists (Gen. 10:6-8; I Chr. 1:8-10), where Cush is represented as a son of Ham (see CUSH 1); but the name is elsewhere rendered by Αιθιοπια ("Ethiopia"), the Greek name for this same area during classical antiquity, beginning with the Homeric

Imprimerie de l'Institut Français d'Archéologie Orientale

37. A model showing Ethiopians carrying bows and arrows; from the Middle Kingdom (2050-1800 B.C.)

poems. The KJV follows the LXX division between "Cush" and "Ethiopia," with the exception of Isa. 11:11, where the LXX has Αιθιοπια but the KJV has "Cush." The RSV likewise follows the LXX, with the exception of Gen. 2:13, where "Cush" is found for the LXX Αιθιοπια. The gentilic כושי (Kûšî; plural Kûšîm), "Cushite," is translated Αιθιοψ, "Ethiopian," by the LXX with the exception of II Sam. 18:21-23, 31-32, where it is merely transliterated Χουσι. The KJV has "Ethiopian(s)" everywhere but in the II Samuel passages, where "Cushi" is taken as a personal name. The RSV employs "Cushite" for the II Samuel passages and in Num. 12:1 (against the LXX and the KJV) but follows the LXX elsewhere with "Ethiopian(s)." Hebrew Kûš is borrowed from Egyptian k³š; cuneiform attestations include kāš- (from Tell el-Amarna) and kūs- (Late Assyrian). Fig. ETH 37.

2. Extent. The name Cush appears in Egyptian sources for the first time in the reign of Sesostris I (1971-1930 B.C.) and seems to have been employed during the Middle Kingdom as the name of a relatively small area between the Second and Third Cataracts, separated from Egypt itself by the land of Wawat, which extended southward from Syene (Assuan) to the Second Cataract. During the New Kingdom the name Cush took on a much wider meaning but was for some time used in both the narrow and the wider senses; there is no evidence that the biblical use of the term reflects anything but the prevailing designation of all known (or legendary) territory S of Egypt. It is of interest to note that the Egyptian name for an inhabitant of this region was nḥsy, which is preserved in the originally Egyptian names Tahpanhes and Phineas.

3. Political significance. Nubia, as this general area is more commonly called, broke away from Egyptian domination soon after the year 1000 B.C. and became an independent kingdom, with its capital at Napata, near present-day Jebel Barkal. Thanks to the work of the brilliant American archaeologist G. A. Reisner at the royal cemetries of El Khurru and Nuri, both near Napata, an unbroken sequence of rulers has been established reaching down into the third century B.C., at which time Napata was abandoned and a new capital founded farther to the S at Meroe. This Meroitic branch of the Nubian Kingdom continued until the fourth century A.D., when it was overwhelmed by an invasion from the Axumite kingdom of Abyssinia.

The period during which the rulers of Napata exercised sovereignty over Egyptian territory proper coincides roughly with the Twenty-fifth, or Ethiopian, Dynasty of the Manethonian tradition, and is assigned the years 715-663 B.C. In actual fact, however, Kashta, the first Napatan king of whom we know, took advantage of the weak hold that the Saïte ruler Tefnakht (Twenty-fourth Dynasty) exercised over Upper Egypt and conquered that territory, with its chief city, Thebes, ca. 750 B.C. His son Piankhi led a campaign northward to the Mediterranean ca. 725 and succeeded in uniting all Egypt under Nubian rule. The details of this march are known from the remarkable stela set up by Piankhi at Napata and now exhibited in the Cairo Museum. The political situation must have been highly unstable, for we know that Tefnakht was still ruling in the Delta ca. 720. It was not until a further successful campaign of Shabaka, the successor of Piankhi, that the Saïte Dynasty (Twenty-fourth) was brought to an end and Nubian rule firmly established.

Shabaka is thus reckoned as the first ruler of the Twenty-fifth Dynasty; he was succeeded by Shabataka (701-690), Taharka (690-664), and Tanutamun (664-663). Taharka (Hebrew Tirhāqāh) is mentioned, both in Isa. 37:9 and in the Assyrian records, as an ally of Hezekiah in his rebellion against the Assyrian ruler Sennacherib, specifically in connection with the second invasion, which must have taken place between 689 and 686 B.C. According to the biblical account, Sennacherib returned to Nineveh after his army was decimated by an angel of the Lord (presumably by a pestilence, as in Herodotus II.141). Sennacherib's successor, Esarhaddon (681-669), invaded Egypt in 670 and reduced it to a province of the Assyrian Empire. Tanutamun, who still ruled at Napata, attempted to regain Egypt from the Assyrians, but his campaign ended in defeat with the destruction of Thebes in 663 by Ashurbanipal. Retiring to Napata, Tanutamun continued to rule the Nubian Kingdom, while in Egypt proper Psamtik I, first ruler of the Twenty-sixth Dynasty, assumed the throne under the aegis of Ashurbanipal.

Bibliography. G. Reisner, "The Meroitic Kingdom of Ethiopia," JEA, 9 (1923), 34-77. C. C. Rossini, Storia d'Etiopia, Africa Italiana, III (1928). T. Säve-Söderbergh, Ägypten und Nubien (1941). D. Dunham, The Royal Cemeteries of Kush, vol. I: El Khurru (1950); vol. II: Nuri (1955). G. Posener, "Pour une localisation du pays Koush au Moyen Empire," Kush, VI (1958), 39-68.

T. O. LAMBDIN

ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH (Acts 8:27-40). A minister of CANDACE, queen of ETHIOPIA, who was converted to Christianity through Philip the evangelist (see PHILIP 7). Two interrelated questions are here involved: Who was the Ethiopian eunuch? What is the significance of this event in the plan of Acts?

As a geographical or ethnic term, Ethiopia (כרש; Αἰθιοπία; Latin Aethiopia) has had an extended history and varied meaning. It has been used to refer to Africa S of Egypt, to Arabia, and even to India. At times it simply appears to have been a useful word to give vague designation to all peoples far distant from the Mediterranean basin living in the far S and E. In Homer, the Ethiopians are the farthest of mankind: the sun sets there. In Amos 9:7, the implication is somewhat the same. Likewise, the term has covered a wide variety of racial groups. The word itself was sometimes said to mean "burnt-faced" or "swarthy-faced," and thus taken to refer to any dark-skinned person. E.g., Herodotus (III.17-23; VII.69-70) distinguishes between woolly-haired Ethiopians (Negroes) and straight-haired ones (primitive Indians).

By late biblical times, however, the geographical meaning of the term had come to be well limited to the lands S of Egypt, to the part of later Anglo-Egyptian Sudan between Assuan and Khartoum, and especially to the kingdom of Meroe, at the confluence of the Nile and the Astaboras (today, Tacassi), a district sometimes spoken of as an island by ancient geographers.

As a fertile region, abounding in gold, copper, iron, precious stones, ivory, ebony, cereals, dates, aromatics, the kingdom of Meroe (with its earlier capital, Napata) was a caravan center and the seat of some extended economic, political, and cultural activity (Isa. 45:14). Important contacts with the Egyptians, Arabians, Greeks, Phoenicians, and Jews obtained. There is evidence of some variety of racial features in the sculptures of various periods.

While the Ethiopian kings in Napata (ca. 700-300 B.C.), and afterward in Meroe, used the Egyptian language in hieroglyphic writing for formal inscriptions, from the first century B.C. to the end of the third century of the Christian era, a native language and script called Meroitic is common. From the time of Ptolemy II (308-246 B.C.) the kingdom became partly Hellenized. Greeks had visited there since 665 B.C. (Strabo XVI.773-74, 785-87). That a high officer in the queen's court—indeed, the treasurer of her kingdom—should be able to read the Greek roll of Isaiah is not a problem. How he had the roll, if he was neither a Jew nor a proselyte, may be a problem; yet a court official could find a way.

The narrative in Acts seems to emphasize two things: the man was an Ethiopian, and he was a eunuch. His name is not given. Instead, he is introduced into the dialogue five times as "a" or "the" eunuch, but without comment as to whether he was a Jew or a Gentile, a proselyte or a "God-fearer," and without concern to identify him ethnically.

Was the "Ethiopian eunuch" a Jew, whether by birth or as a proselyte? Those who say he was either have to deny that he was properly a eunuch or to maintain that Isa. 56:3-5 is to be taken as evidence that the legislation of Lev. 21:20; Deut. 23:1 was no longer (on occasion) enforced. But the probabilities support neither position. Luke's fivefold use of "eunuch," unqualified, suggests that he means it as such, and does not simply think of it as a synonym for "minister" without any implication of mutilation. That the eunuch should have been properly such fits the pattern both of the Greek idea of non-Greek civilizations and of court officials and keepers of harems (Esth. 2:14) when such existed or where the rulers were queens, as in Meroe.

If a eunuch, then, he was most probably not a born Jew, and only less probably a Gentile proselyte.

Perhaps the most that can be said is that the Ethiopian eunuch best fits the type of half-believer in Judaism, the "God-fearer," and as seems to have been the case with many such Gentiles, was ready for the Christian reading of the OT. That Cornelius later figures so importantly in Acts as the first Gentile convert does not prove that the eunuch was a Jew or that Luke thought he was.

In this narrative, then, Luke will show that (a) the gospel addresses itself to the peoples who dwell on the outermost fringes of the inhabited world; (b) as an "Ethiopian" the eunuch is an outlander (his ethnic origin is strictly undetermined) who comes to the light, and as a high official he is a king who comes to the brightness of its rising; and (c) as a eunuch, he serves as an example of one by nature "not-my-people" becoming "my people." The church now sees the response prayed for in Ps. 68:31: "Let Ethiopia hasten to stretch out her hands to God" (see also Isa. 11:11).

Bibliography. W. K. L. Clarke in F. J. Foakes-Jackson and K. Lake, Beginnings of Christianity, II (1922), 101-3; J. Garstang, Meroe, the City of the Ethiopians (1911); H. J. Cadbury, The Book of Acts in History (1955), pp. 15-18.

F. D. GEALY

ETHIOPIC VERSION ē′thĭ ŏp′ĭk. Made ca. the fourth or fifth century A.D., this translation of the Bible is represented today only by late copies, dating from the thirteenth and succeeding centuries. See VERSIONS, ANCIENT, § 9.

B. M. METZGER

ETH-KAZIN ĕth kā′zĭn [עֶתֶה קָצִין] (Josh. 19:13); KJV ITTAH-KAZIN ĭt′ə kā′zĭn. A town on the border of Zebulun. Its location is unknown, but according to the context, it should be in the vicinity of Gath-hepher, possibly at Kefr Kenna.

Bibliography. F.-M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine, II (1938), 63, 351.

G. W. VAN BEEK

ETHMA ĕth′mə. KJV Apoc. form of NEBO.

ETHNAN ĕth′nən [אֶתְנַן, gift or hire]. Listed as a family of the tribe of Judah (I Chr. 4:7); he could be identified with ITHNAN, a town of S Judah (cf. Josh. 15:23).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 171.

H. H. GUTHRIE, JR.

ETHNARCH ĕth′närk [ἐθνάρχης]. A title with an original meaning of "ruler of the people"; often rendered "governor." Used over a period of centuries, the term can well have changed meanings from time to time, so that obscurity and variation combine to make it an uncertain term.

"Ethnarch" was apparently a title of royalty granted to a dependent monarch. It was higher than "TETRARCH" but lower than "king." SIMON MACCABEUS (I Macc. 14:47) is called "commander and ethnarch"; HYRCANUS II was both the ethnarch and the high priest (Jos. Antiq. XIV.viii.5; x.2), though he was denied the crown (XX.x.4). ARCHELAUS, son of Herod, was not deemed worthy of the title "king," and was named "ethnarch" instead (Jos. Antiq. XVII.xi.4; War II.vi.3; Matt. 2:22 and Jos. Antiq. XVIII.iv.3 allude either loosely or incorrectly to Archelaus as "king"). Much later, Origen (Letter to Julius Africanus 14) described the chief of the Jews in Palestine as "ethnarch," adding that the ethnarch is "in no way different from a king of the people."

The preceding definition supposes a use of the title in a situation in which a people resident in its own land was governed by a ruler who was subject to the Roman authority. Respecting Jews, however, there were situations in which a community was located outside Judea, as in Alexandria in Egypt, and was there subject to Roman rule. Could the term "ethnarch" apply to the Jewish "ruler" in such a situation? Apparently so, for Josephus quotes Strabo (Antiq. XIV.vii.2) as follows: "An ethnarch of their own has been installed, who governs the people and adjudicates suits and supervises contracts and ordinances, just as if he were the head of a sovereign state" (see also XIX.v.2). Philo of Alexandria, however, seems not to have used the term "ethnarch," but rather "genarch" (γενάρχης; Against Flaccus X). Another term was used for the head of the Alexandrian Jewish community, "alabarch" (ἀλαβάρχης); neither the connotation nor the etymology of this term is known.

The only use of the term in the NT is in II Cor. 11:32: "At Damascus, the ethnarch [RSV governor] under King Aretas guarded the city of Damascus in order to seize me." Commentators divide as to whether this ethnarch was the appointed representative of the Nabatean king Aretas (9 B.C.-A.D. 39), who controlled Damascus; or whether Damascus at the time was under Roman control and the ethnarch a Nabatean with functions somewhat like those of the Jewish ethnarch in Jerusalem. It is uncertain whether or not DAMASCUS remained unbrokenly under Roman rule after its seizure by Pompey (ca. 65 B.C.); hence there exists this division among the commentators.

Bibliography. In addition to the standard commentators on II Corinthians, see J. Juster, Les juifs dans l'empire Romain (1914), 1, 391-400. E. Schürer, A History of the Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ (English trans., 1891), I; II, 280, n. 201; II, 357-58; TSK, XCIX (1899), 95 ff. S. SANDMEL

ETHNI ĕth'nī [אתני, gift or hire]. An ancestor of ASAPH in a genealogy of Levitical SINGERS (I Chr. 6:41). The list is postexilic and, to a great extent, artificial, representing an attempt to trace Levitical pedigrees back to the time of David. Jeatherai appears in place of Ethni in I Chr. 6:21, possibly because of a scribal error.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 171. H. H. GUTHRIE, JR.

ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY. See MAN, ETHNIC DIVISIONS OF.

EUBULUS ū bū'ləs [Εὔβουλος, well advised]. A Christian man whose greetings are conveyed in II Tim. 4:21. The name is often found in papyri and inscriptions. F. W. GINGRICH EUCHARIST ū'kə rĭst [εὐχαριστία, thanksgiving]. The name commonly used by Christians of the post-apostolic and later periods for the rite of the LORD'S SUPPER. There is no indisputable use of the word in this technical sense in the NT; though I Cor. 14:16 possibly contains an allusion to the "thanksgiving" over the elements of the Supper, and I Tim. 4:3-4 applies it to the giving of thanks over ordinary food. The references to thanksgiving in Christian worship in Eph. 5:20; Phil. 4:6; Col. 3:17; I Tim. 2:1 are of a more general character.

The verb form, εὐχαριστεῖν, is found in the accounts of Jesus' feeding of the multitude (Matt. 15:36; Mark 8:6; John 6:11) and of the Last Supper (Matt. 26:27; Mark 14:23; Luke 22:17, 19; I Cor. 11:24). It is synonymous with εὐλογεῖν, "bless," the term more generally employed to translate the Hebrew root ברך for blessings over food (cf. Mark 6:41; 8:7; 14:22 and parallels; and the noun form in I Cor. 10:16). Elsewhere in the NT, the verb is used of giving thanks over ordinary food (Acts 27:35; Rom. 14:6; I Cor. 10:30). M. H. SHEPHERD, JR.

EUERGETES ū ûr'jə tēz [εὐεργέτης, benefactor]. A title bestowed by ancient states upon those famed for notable deeds of benevolence who in modern days would receive a distinguished service award (cf. Luke 22:25). The author of Ecclesiasticus dates his work with reference to his coming "to Egypt in the thirty-eighth year of the reign of Euergetes" (Ptolemy VII). J. C. SWAIM

EUGNOSTOS, LETTER OF ūg nŏs'təs. A Gnostic writing in Coptic found at Chenoboskion in 1946 (see APOCRYPHA, NT). In this writing Sophia Pangeneteira is the feminine counterpart of Soter, the bisexual creator of all things. They produce six bisexual spirits, the sixth of which is Archigeneter (masculine)–Pistis Sophia (feminine). In the WISDOM OF JESUS (see JESUS, WISDOM OF), which is based upon this epistle, Pistis Sophia is one of the aeons. This suggests that the term "Pistis Sophia" may well have been drawn from Gnosticism of the type represented in this newly discovered library. M. S. ENSLIN

EUMENES ū'mə nēz [Εὐμενής, well-disposed]. Mentioned in I Macc. 8:8 as a king to whom the Romans had given much Syrian territory. He was Eumenes II, king of Pergamum (197-158 B.C.), who had helped the Romans during their war with the Seleucid Antiochus the Great. See ANTIOCHUS 3. N. TURNER

EUNATAN ū nā'tən. KJV Apoc. form of ELNATHAN.

EUNICE ū'nīs [Εὐνίκη, good victory]. Daughter of LOIS (II Tim. 1:5); wife of a Gentile (Acts 16:1); and mother of TIMOTHY. She is commended by the author of II Timothy for her faith. Coming from Derbe or Lystra in Galatia, she was a Jewess (perhaps a widow) who had been converted to Christianity.

Her faith and that of her mother, Lois, are referred to in II Tim. 1:5 to make the point that Timothy, though young (cf. I Tim. 4:12; II Tim. 2:22), stands in a tradition of Christian experience which compensates for his lack of years. B. H. THROCKMORTON, JR.

EUNUCH [סריס; LXX σπάδων, NT εὐνοῦχος, from to emasculate]. Alternately: OFFICER; CAPTAIN. A CHAMBERLAIN for the women's quarters in the royal household; usually a castrated male person. There are married eunuchs (Gen. 39:1), but Potiphar may not be literally a eunuch, as the word may indicate his office only. However, if he were a eunuch, his anger against Joseph would have more force. Usually the word implied sterility (I Sam. 8:15; Isa. 56:3) in Israel (cf. in Babylon [Dan. 1:3]; in Persia [Esth. 2:3]; in Ethiopia [Jer. 38:7; Acts 8:27]).

These men could be high officials (Gen. 39:1; Acts 8:27). But in Israel they were excluded from the covenant congregation, as were all impaired and defective persons (Lev. 22:24; Deut. 23:1). This made the threat of exile calamitous (Isa. 39:7). There is no certainty that this prophecy was carried out, or that Daniel was a eunuch (II Kings 20:17-18), although Herodotus suggests that captives were commonly made eunuchs. The Tyrian Jezebel used eunuchs (I Kings 22:9; cf. II Kings 8:6; 9:32). David had such officers (I Sam. 8:15; I Chr. 28:1). The last kings of Judah knew them (II Kings 24:15; 25:19; Jer. 41:16). Herod the Great used a eunuch for cupbearer (Jos. Antiq. XV.viii.4; XVI.viii.1). The law-abiding eunuch is praised (Wisd. Sol. 3:14); and in the messianic kingdom, despite Deuteronomy, these castrated outcasts will rank before the unfaithful of Israel (Isa. 56:3-5).

The expression to be a eunuch for Christ's sake (cf. Matt. 19:12) probably refers to those who are voluntarily giving up the use of their reproductive powers to serve better in the kingdom. The verb is perhaps used metaphysically and may not involve surgery. Some think Jesus here refers to John the Baptist or himself. In Ecclesiasticus the opposite idea is conveyed, as eunuchs are figured as powerless men (Ecclus. 20:3; 30:21).

See also OFFICER. C. U. WOLF

EUODIA ū ō′dĭ ə [Εὐοδία, good journey, success]; KJV EUODIAS —əs (masculine, now considered incorrect). A Christian woman in the church at Philippi, in which congregation women were prominent from the beginning (Acts 16:12-15). She and Syntyche (Συντύχη, "coincidence," "success") are advised by Paul in Phil. 4:2 to compose their differences and live in harmony with each other. We have no way of knowing whether their quarrel was of a personal or a doctrinal nature.

In vs. 3 Paul calls upon his "true yokefellow" (σύζυγος) to help these women. This may have been a reference to Epaphroditus (2:25, etc.), though there are other possibilities. The proposal to take it as a proper name, Sy(n)zygus (so Westcott-Hort mg.), is rendered improbable by the fact that we do not yet have any examples of the word used as a proper name elsewhere. F. W. GINGRICH EUPATOR ū′ pə tôr [Εὐπάτωρ, of a noble father] (I Macc. 6:17 ff.; II Macc. 10:10 ff.). A surname or title given to the Seleucid king Antiochus V (see ANTIOCHUS 5), presumably because he was the son of Antiochus Epiphanes.

EUPHRATES ū frā′tēz [פרת, from Assyro-Babylonian Purattu, from Sumer. Puranun; Εὐφράτης, also from Assyro-Babylonian Purattu, via Old Pers. Ufratu]. The largest river in Western Asia. According to biblical tradition the Euphrates was one of the four branches into which the river issuing from the Garden of Eden divided. It formed the upper, N boundary of the territories promised by Yahweh to Israel (Gen. 15:18; Deut. 1:7; 11:24; Josh. 1:4) and was reached by the Hebrew monarchy at its peak (II Sam. 8:3; 10:16; I Kings 4:24). The Euphrates is sometimes designated "the River" (Num. 22:5; Deut. 11:24; Josh. 24:3, 14; etc.; see also "the great river" in Josh. 1:4). It is also thus found in the name of the Persian province "BEYOND THE RIVER" (Ezra 4:10 ff.; Neh. 2:7-9; etc.).

1. The Upper Euphrates.* The Euphrates originates in Armenia and is formed by the confluence of two separate branches. The westernmost of these, Kara Su, is usually considered the actual beginnings of the Euphrates; it flows out of a circular pond in the region N of Erzerum and takes a westerly course. The E branch, Murat Suyu, originates in the region E of Erzerum and follows a course westward roughly parallel to that of Kara Su. The two join N of Malatiya to form the Euphrates proper. Flowing first SE, then SW, from Malatia, the Euphrates enters the Syrian Plain at Samsat, ancient Samosata, which lies on the right bank of the river and marks an important ford. Ancient Samosata was the capital of the Hellenistic kingdom of Commagene, the Assyrian Kummukh. Fig. EUP 38.

2. The Middle Euphrates. Farther S the river passes Jerablus, the site of ancient Carchemish, also on the right bank. Originally the center of a small city-state, Carchemish became an important provincial capital of the kingdom of Mitanni, of the Hittite Empire, and later of the Assyrian Empire. On the Euphrates at Carchemish, Nebuchadnezzar II of Babylon won his decisive victory over Neco of Egypt in 605 (cf. II Kings 24:7; Jer. 46). S of Carchemish the Euphrates receives the Sajur (Assyrian Sagur), which flows into it from the W; and as the

Courtesy of William Sanford La Sor

38. The Euphrates River near its source in the Armenian highlands

Euphrates continues in southeasterly direction, it is joined first by the Belikh (Assyrian Balikhu), later by the Khabur.* Both these rivers flow into the Euphrates from the N. Continuing SE, the river passes Salehiya, classical Dura-Europos, and Albu Kemal near the site of ancient Mari. Flowing E to Ana and again SE, the river reaches Hit, ancient Itu, famous as a major source of bitumen in antiquity. Fig. HAB 1.

3. The Lower Euphrates. From Hit the modern Euphrates flows to Felluja and S to Museyyib, where it divides into two branches. The main branch, the Hindiya branch, flows past Hindiya, through Bahr Shinafiye, and on to Samawa. The lesser of the two branches, the Hilla branch, flows past Hilla and ancient Babylon to reach Diwaniya, and then S to join the Hindiye branch S of Samawa. From Samawa the course leads SE past Nasiriye, through Lake Hammar, and on to juncture with the Tigris shortly before Basra. As Shatt-el-Arab the two rivers flow united past Basra and on into the Persian Gulf.

4. The Lower Euphrates in antiquity. In antiquity the course of the Euphrates seems, in its lower parts, to have been rather different from what it is today. In the region around Felluja the ancient course veered rather more to the E than does the present-day course and passed by the city of the sun-god,

Sippar, famous to late classical times as a seat of Chaldean learning. From Sippar the river ran southward to Kish, seat of the legendary First Dynasty of Mesopotamia. From Kish it passed to Nippur, the city of the storm-god Enlil and the major religious center of Sumer. Passing Nippur, it touched on Shuruppak (modern Fara), where the Sumerian Noah, Ziusudra, built his ark; then S to Erech (Uruk, modern Warka), famous as the city of Ishtar and of the epic hero Gilgamesh. From Erech the Euphrates continued to Ur, birthplace of Abraham in biblical tradition; S of this city it flowed through extensive marshes, eventually reaching the Persian Gulf. Besides this its main course the Euphrates sent off a W branch which took off in the neighborhood of Sippar and flowed through Babylon. This branch, called the Arachtu, became, ca. the beginning of the first millennium B.C., the main course of the river, and was known from then on as the Euphrates. It was clearly this course that Jeremiah referred to when he instructed Seraiah to read his book of prophecies when he came to Babylon and then to bind a stone to the book and cast it into the middle of the Euphrates as a sign of the coming destruction of that city (Jer. 51:60-64). T. JACOBSEN

EUPOLEMUS ū pŏl′ə məs [Εὐπόλεμος, skilful in war]. A Jewish ambassador. He was sent by Judas Maccabeus, after the victory over Nicanor, to Rome to make an alliance, in 161 B.C. (I Macc. 8:17; II Macc. 4:11). There was a Jewish historian named Eupolemus who wrote a history of the Jews in Greek about this time. It is possible that he is the same person as the statesman. N. TURNER

EUROCLYDON. See NORTHEASTER.

EUTYCHUS ū′tə kəs [Εὔτυχος, fortunate, lucky]. A youth of Troas who sat one evening in a window of an upper chamber while Paul talked. Overcome by sleep, Eutychus fell out and was taken up dead; but Paul declared him alive (Acts 20:7-12).

In this narrative in a "we section" of Acts, the author as an eyewitness implies that Paul could restore the dead. This traditional viewpoint is weakened by ambiguity in the story. The boy was "taken up dead" (ἤρθη νεκρός), not "as though dead" (ὡς νεκρός; Rev. 1:17; cf. Mark 9:26), yet Paul found life in him. Most commentators think that Paul's action, embracing the lad, is patterned upon prophetic restorations (I Kings 17:21; II Kings 4:34); some doubt that the youth was dead. The window of the upper room (ὑπερῶον; Acts 1:13; 9:37, 39, not the same word as in Luke 22:11-12) was on the third story, counting the ground floor as the first; hence the third is second in American usage. The distance does not necessarily imply a fatal fall. Probably Eutychus was unconscious and thought dead, though the story stresses the revival of his life by Paul (Acts 20:10) and its continuance (vs. 12). Though the story gives notable details which illuminate early Christianity, there is no report about prayer, faith, or thanks to God. D. M. BECK

EVANGELIST ĭ văn′jə lĭst [εὐαγγελιστής; Lat. evangelizator (Tertullian), evangelista (Vulg.); from the verb εὐαγγελίζεσθαι, to announce good news]. A title, not of an office, but of an activity, of early Christian missionaries and preachers of the gospel. The word is rare outside Christian literature. It occurs in an inscription of Rhodes (CIG XII.1.675) of a pagan announcer of oracles. In the NT the term is employed three times: (a) Acts 21:8, of Philip, one of the SEVEN; (b) Eph. 4:11, where it follows "apostles" and "prophets" in a list of Christian ministries endowed by the ascended Lord with spiritual gifts for the nurture and increase of the church (see MINISTRY, CHRISTIAN); and (c) II Tim. 4:5, of the ministry of Timothy, probably a reminiscence of I Thess. 3:2, in which Paul describes Timothy as "God's servant [in some MSS "fellow worker"] in the gospel of Christ."

In the earliest times, no doubt, the activity of the apostles was not rigidly distinguished from that of evangelists (cf. Gal. 1:8; I Clem. 42; Barn. 8.3). Later Christian usage viewed the evangelists as disciples of the apostles, or as imitators of their example (so Euseb. Hist. II.3.1; III.37.2—and V.10.2-3, where Pantaenus, the founder of the Catechetical School at Alexandria in the second century, is counted as an evangelist). It is probably in this sense that one should understand the reference to a wandering apostle in Did. 11.4-6.

A more restrictive use of "evangelist" to denote the authors of the canonical gospels first appears in third-century writers. The transition may be noted in Hippolytus On Antichrist 56, with reference to Luke, and in Tertullian Against Praxeas 21, 23, and in Dionysius of Alexandria (as quoted in Euseb. Hist. VII.25.8), with respect to John. But the association of the four canonical gospels with the four living creatures of Rev. 4:7 goes back to Iren. Her. III.11.8: the lion=John, the ox=Luke, the man=Matthew, and the eagle=Mark. The use of these symbols in Christian art, however, cannot be traced prior to the fifth century, by which time the symbols of John and Mark, as given in Irenaeus, have been exchanged.

Another specialized use of "evangelists" occurs in later church orders and liturgies. The Apostolic Church Order 19, composed in Egypt ca. A.D. 300, reminds the reader of the lections at the liturgy that "he carries out the office of an evangelist." In the Liturgy of Chrysostom, the deacon, prior to his chanting of the gospel lection, describes himself as the "evangelist of the holy apostle and evangelist."

Bibliography. H. Leclercq, "Evangélistes (Symboles des)," Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, V (1922), 845-52. M. H. SHEPHERD, JR.

EVE ēv [חוה; Εὔα; see below]. The first WOMAN; wife of Adam; designated as the mother of the human race.

1. Etymology. The derivation of the name חוה is very controversial. The popular etymology in Gen. 3:20 connects it with the root "to live," which in Hebrew is חיה, not חוה. Rabbinical exegesis joined the name to the Aramaic חויא, "serpent." This theory has been revived in modern times as the scientific etymology, without winning general support. See bibliography.

2. In the Genesis narratives. The reference to Eve in 3:20 does not fit well in its present context. It is generally assumed that this verse stems from a different recension of the story. It is a parallel to the more usual appellative form, "the woman" (אשה), linked in the wordplay of 2:23 to "the man" (איש).

According to Gen. 1:27 (P), mankind was created in two sexes, male and female. According to Gen. 2:18 ff (J), the male was created first. When Yahweh recognized man's loneliness in the company of mere animals, he formed woman from one of his ribs. The woman was tempted by the serpent into eating the forbidden fruit and causing her husband also to eat. Her punishment took the form of pain at childbirth and subordination to the man. Eve gave birth successively to Cain, Abel, Seth, and other children (Gen. 4:1-2, 25-26; 5:1-5).

The ancient age of this material is indicated by the many etiological motifs which are woven into the narrative. Woman was formed from a rib (2:21); man and wife "belong" together (2:24-25); pain at childbirth is a curse (3:16 ff). However, the attempt to reconstruct an earlier stage of the story in which Eve appears as a mythical figure, does not commend itself.

3. In the NT. Eve is mentioned twice in the NT. In I Tim. 2:11-15 the NT writer argues that the woman's place in the church should be one of silence and submissiveness. He refers to the Genesis story to establish the creative order and to prove woman's vulnerability. The exegesis rests most probably on a current rabbinical interpretation (see bibliography). Paul uses Eve in II Cor. 11:3 as an illustration of how easily one can be led astray.

Bibliography. OT etymology: L. Köhler and W. Baumgartner, Lexicon in Veteris Testamenti (1953), give nine possible derivations. A thorough discussion of the Punic text published by M. Lidzbarski in Ephemeris für semitische Epigraphik, I (1902), 26-27, as a suggested parallel to Eve, is given in: T. C. Vriezen, Onderzoek naar de Paradijsvoorstelling bij de oude semietische Volken (1937), pp. 192-93; L. Köhler, OT Theology (English trans., 1957), p. 246, note 102. In addition to the standard Commentaries on Genesis, see: H. Gressmann, "Mythische Reste in der Paradieserzählung," ARW, 10 (1907), 358 ff; B. Reinach, "La Naissance d'Eve," RHR, 78 (1918), 185 ff; H. Tuerck, Pandora und Eva (1931). For the rabbinical exegesis, see "Eva" in the Index of H. L. Strack and P. Billerbeck, Kommentar zum NT, IV (1928), 1225.

B. S. CHILDS

EVENING. See DAY.

EVENING SACRIFICE. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS § A2*bi*.

EVERLASTING. See TIME.

EVI ē'vī [אוי, desire(?)]. One of the five Midianite kings killed in battle by the Israelites under Moses (Num. 31:8; Josh. 13:21). In Num. 31 the battle is apparently to be set against the background of the religious apostasy into which Israel had fallen under Midianite enticements (ch. 25). In Josh. 13, however, the five Midianite leaders, called princes of Sihon, are said to have fallen in the same battle in which Moses defeated Sihon the Amorite king.

R. F. JOHNSON

EVIDENCE. An occasional translation of the following words (a) עד (Exod. 22:13—H 22:12; KJV and alternately RSV "witness"); (b) μάρτυς (Matt. 18:16; II Cor. 13:1; I Tim. 5:19; KJV and alternately RSV "witness"); (c) μαρτύριον (Jas. 5:3; KJV "witness"). The word is also used to translate the following phrases: (a) לפי עדים, "on the evidence of witnesses" (Num. 35:30; KJV "by the mouth of witnesses"; cf. Deut. 17:6 19:15); (b) יגיד צדק, "gives honest evidence" (Prov. 12:17; KJV "sheweth forth righteousness").

The term is used chiefly in a legal sense—i.e., as "ground for belief," as "testimony," whether personal, in the language of documents, or in the form of material objects, which tends to prove or disprove a conclusion or establish a fact. Evidence therefore consists in statements or proofs admissible as testimony in a legal inquiry or a court of law. More generally, the word is used with reference to appearances from which inferences may be drawn.

Paul's counsel that any charge must be sustained by the evidence of two or three witnesses (II Cor. 13:1; cf. I Tim. 5:19) was based on a venerable legal tradition in Israel (Num. 35:30; Deut. 19:15), of which Jesus was aware (Matt. 18:16). The giving of evidence was regarded as a religious duty and was basic to the administration of justice in Israel (Deut. 17). Such evidence was admissible even in cases involving capital punishment (Num. 35:30; Deut. 17:2-7); according to Deut. 17:2-7 witnesses were expected to cast the first stones at a defendant who had been found guilty of apostasy.

The importance of giving honest evidence is frequently emphasized in the OT (Exod. 20:16; 23:1 ff; Proverbs passim). In cases where witness is borne falsely, the accuser is to receive the punishment which he had intended for the falsely accused (Deut. 19:15-21).

See also JUSTICE; COURT OF LAW.

H. F. BECK

EVIL [רע, רעה, bad, from the verb רעע, to be bad; κακός, κακία, and πονηρός, πονηρία, bad; φαυλός, mean, hence bad]. Both in Hebrew and in Greek usage "evil" has primarily a pragmatic and qualitative sense. As judged by its appearance or effects, something is evil when it is worthless and corrupt (II Kings 2:19; Prov. 20:14; 25:19; Jer. 24:2; Matt. 6:23; 7:17); displeasing, ugly, and sad (Gen. 21:11-12; 28:8; 41:19-20; Neh. 2:3; Eccl. 7:3); or painful and injurious (Gen. 26:29; 31:7; Deut. 26:6; 28:35; I Sam. 18:10; II Sam. 12:18; Prov. 11:15; Rev. 16:2).

As an extension of the latter, "evil" means the "trouble," "distress," and "calamity" which mankind, and particularly Israel, must endure (Gen. 19:19; 47:9; Ps. 90:15; Matt. 6:34; Eph. 5:16). Evil in this sense is often spoken of as a punishment or chastisement sent from God (Deut. 31:17; I Kings 14:10; II Kings 21:12; Jer. 26:19; Amos 9:4). Because under his providential control God uses it for his wise though severe purposes, he is spoken of as the author of evil (Job 2:10; Isa. 45:7; Amos 3:6). Israel's struggle with the theological meaning of suffering constitutes one of the leading problems of the OT. See SUFFERING AND EVIL.

Often in the OT, and predominantly in the NT, "evil" has a moral and spiritual connotation. Thus it indicates the wrong that men do to one another

(Gen. 19:7; 44:5; Deut. 26:6; Judg. 11:27; 19:23; Jas. 3:8; etc.). It also indicates the moral badness, maliciousness, and perversity of the sinful heart (see SIN). The "doers of evil" are therefore the wicked (Job 8:20; Ps. 26:5; Prov. 17:4; Isa. 1:4; Jer. 20:13; etc.). The expression "good and evil" covers the whole range of moral or spiritual possibilities, with their necessary consequences, in such passages as Gen. 2:9; 3:5; II Sam. 14:17 (cf. Job 1:1; Ps. 34:14—H 34:15; Amos 5:14-15; Mic. 3:2), although elsewhere (e.g., Gen. 31:24; Deut. 30:15) it appears in a more pragmatic sense. S. J. DE VRIES

EVIL ONE, THE [ὁ πονηρός]. A way of referring to SATAN. The term occurs several times in the NT (Matt. 13:19; John 17:15; Eph. 6:16; I John 2:13-14; 5:18-19). There is no OT equivalent, although the adjective רַע ("in poor condition," "sick," "evil," "vicious") occurs often. The NT meaning is especially obvious in Matt. 13:19. In the parallels ὁ ζατανᾶς ("Satan") appears in Mark 4:15, ὁ διάβολος ("the devil") in Luke 8:12.

Questionable passages are Matt. 5:37; 6:13; Luke 11:4 (in MSS CDΘ, etc.); II Thess. 3:3, where the genitive form τοῦ πονηροῦ may be derived either from the masculine (see above) or the neuter, τὸ πονηρόν. The question is primarily discussed with regard to the last petition of the LORD'S PRAYER in Matt. 6:13. The RSV gives "the evil one" in a footnote. In the early church the Eastern writers followed a masculine interpretation; the Western fathers, with the exception of Tertullian, a neuter understanding. Present-day exegesis in general follows the neuter interpretation—i.e., the evil of the present and of the last days to come. E. DINKLER

EVIL SPIRIT. See DEMON.

EVIL-MERODACH ē′vəl mĕr′ə dăk [אֱוִיל מְרֹדַךְ; Akkad. Amēl-Marduk, man of Marduk]. King of Babylon (562-560 B.C.); son of NEBUCHADREZZAR.

Of the two years during which this king ruled we know nothing, since no fragment of the Babylonian Chronicle happens to cover that period. His brother-in-law followed him on the throne (as Neriglissar) in a rebellion that has all the appearances of an interdynastic struggle. It should be noted that Nabonidus mentions as his predecessors and models Nebuchadrezzar and Neriglissar, and passes over Evil-merodach in silence. A. L. OPPENHEIM

EVODIUS, HOMILY OF ĭ vō′dĭ əs [Εὐοδίος]. A Coptic (Bohairic) writing containing a version of the ASSUMPTION OF THE VIRGIN. In this account Evodius, traditional first bishop of Antioch, is represented as Peter's successor in the see of Rome, one of the seventy-two disciples, and an eyewitness of the death and assumption of Mary. M. S. ENSLIN

EWE. See SHEEP; SHEPHERD.

EXACTOR OF TRIBUTE [נוֹגֵשׂ, exactor] (Dan. 11:20; KJV RAISER OF TAXES). Alternately: TASKMASTER (Exod. 3:7; 5:6, 10, 13-14; Isa. 60:17 [KJV EXACTOR]). Usually a government officer who levied or collected tribute, taxes, or customs; also one whose duty it was to enforce the performance of work; a taskmaster. The Hebrew term was used derisively of one who, under the protection of official appointment and status, made illegal exactions or laid claim to something as a matter of right, often with the added idea of excess. The term is often used as though it were a synonym for "oppressor" or "extortioner."

As used in Dan. 11:20, the term is usually taken as a reference to the mission of Heliodorus, the finance minister of Seleucus IV Philopator (187-175 B.C.), to Jerusalem. This exactor was sent to see whether great wealth was being stored in the Jerusalem temple as rumored. He meant to claim such wealth for the Syrian treasury. Seleucus' preoccupation with finances arose from the obligation which he had to pay off an indemnity the Romans had levied against his father, Antiochus III, because Antiochus had affronted the Roman authority by invading Greece and parts of Asia Minor (see Polybius Histories XXI.14.7; Livy XXXVII.45.14; Justin History of the World XXXII.2; Diodorus Siculus XXIX.15).

Such an exactor might have visited Jerusalem at specified intervals. I Macc. 1:29 indicates that Antiochus Epiphanes (175-164 B.C.) had such an officer. H. F. BECK EXCAVATION. See ARCHAEOLOGY.

EXCELLENT. The translation of the following words: (a) גדל (Isa. 28:29), "great"; (b) יתר (Dan. 5:12, 14), "abundant"; (c) καλός (Tit. 3:8; KJV "good"), "morally good" or "praiseworthy." The word is used also in several phrases in the NT:

In Luke-Acts, Theophilus (Luke 1:3), Felix (Acts 24:2), and Festus (Acts 26:25) are addressed by the term "most excellent." The adjective κράτιστος used in these passages is based on a root meaning "strength," "power," or "sovereignty." The expression "most excellent" or "most noble" was commonly used to address one who held a higher official or social position than the speaker. In Acts 23:26 the word is translated "his excellency."

In Rom. 2:18; Phil. 1:10 the word "excellent" appears in the phrase "approve what is excellent" (τὰ διαφέροντα), meaning the superior things, the things that really matter.

The sentence in I Cor. 12:31 in which "excellent" occurs is somewhat awkward. The phrase translated "more excellent," καθ' ὑπερβολήν, is usually used adverbially, meaning "to an extraordinary degree." Here it is used adjectivally. Perhaps we may translate: "a way still more extraordinary."

The author of Hebrews uses a word related to τὰ διαφέροντα. In 1:4 he speaks of the "name" of Jesus (i.e., his dignity and superiority, primarily as Son) as διαφορώτερος, "more excellent," than that of angels; and in 8:6 the ministry of Christ is "more excellent" than the Levitical cultus.

B. H. THROCKMORTON, JR.

EXCOMMUNICATION [Lat. excommunicatio]. Punishment of a church member, for error in doctrine or morals, by temporary or permanent exclusion from the sacraments or from membership. The Latin word is late; it is not found in the Vulg. The procedures which were developed in the later church derived only in part from the practices of the NT church.

Temporary exclusion from the services of the sanctuary for violation of ritual taboo was an integral part of Israelite-Jewish ceremonial law (see CLEAN AND UNCLEAN). For serious ritual offenses, such as eating leaven during the Passover season (Exod. 12:15, 19), failure to bring a slaughtered animal to the door of the tent of meeting (Lev. 17:4, 9) or to cleanse oneself from ritual impurity (Num. 19: 20), the prescribed penalty was to be cut off from (the congregation of) Israel, from the people, or from the assembly.

The first instance of the use of the threat of excommunication against recalcitrant members of the religious community was that of Ezra in his campaign against mixed marriages; failure to respond to Ezra's summons to a meeting in Jerusalem was to be punished by the confiscation of all the offender's property and expulsion from the congregation of the exiles (Ezra 10:8). This was a mitigated form of the ancient ḥérem (חרם), which involved death for the person and destruction for his property (Lev. 27:28-29).

In NT times the regular penalty for serious religious or moral offenses was exclusion from the synagogue. A mild form of exclusion, נדוי, which cut off the victim from conversation for a period of thirty days, could be inflicted by a single person. The more severe formal ban, ḥérem, which deprived the victim of all religious privileges for an indefinite period, could be imposed by not fewer than ten persons. A third degree of exclusion, שמתא, involving complete and final expulsion, is questioned by some scholars.

The use of three different terms in Luke 6:22 has been seen as reflecting the different grades of Jewish excommunication, but the terms are probably used synonymously. In the Qumran community members were punished for varying periods for different offenses. The nature of the punishment is not always specified. One form of punishment was exclusion for varying periods from the "purity"—i.e., the sacred food—of the "masters," or full members of the community. For cursing, or for gossip against the "masters," a member was excluded and not allowed to return. Two years' probation was required of a backsliding member before he could be restored to his former position in the community. A member of ten years' standing who backslid was dismissed permanently, and anyone who shared with him the sacred food or communal goods was likewise dismissed. The NT references to the contemporary Jewish procedure of excluding those who confessed Jesus to be the Christ use the term ἀποσυνάγωγος γίνεσθαι, "to be put out of the synagogue" (John 9:22; 12:42; 16:2). The exclusion here could hardly be from a single synagogue, but rather refers to the banishment of the victim from all social and religious fellowship with the Jewish community at large.

The early Christian communities naturally patterned their communal life after that of the parent religion and adopted its familiar terminology. The threefold admonition of the offending brother, first privately, then in the presence of two or three witnesses, and finally before the church (Matt. 18:15-17), is similar to the Jewish practice (Talmud 'Arak. 16*b;* M. Maṣṣoth I.10) and corresponds exactly to the rules of the Qumran sect (1QS 5.26–6.1). This probably reflects the practice of the Jewish Christian circles for which the Gospel of Matthew appears to have been composed.

The origin of Christian excommunication has been seen in the allusion to binding and loosing in Matt. 16:19; 18:18 (cf. John 20:23). The saying, however, probably has reference to the church's spiritual authority and not to any formal procedure of exclusion.

Paul, in dealing with disciplinary problems in the churches, had to resort to exclusion, or the threat of it, in order to maintain or restore order. In less serious cases he employed milder forms of moral suasion and economic and social pressures. For the Thessalonians who refused to work, he prescribed cutting off their food (II Thess. 3:10). This mode of punishment was systematized in the Qumran community where the ration of the offender was reduced in varying proportions and for varying periods, depending on the gravity of the offense. For the disobedient, Paul recommended a brotherly warning and the time-honored and effective sanction of social boycott: "Have nothing to do with him, that he may be ashamed" (II Thess. 3:14-15). But for serious moral offenses his blunt directive was: "Drive out the wicked person from among you" (I Cor. 5:13). A member of the church at Corinth who was living with his father's wife, Paul ordered to be excluded and delivered "to Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that his spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus" (I Cor. 5:1-5). It is not clear whether the "destruction of the flesh" of the culprit means physical death or the purging of the lusts of the flesh, but, at any rate, the drastic treatment was intended for the good of the offender and for the salvation of his spirit. Whether the offender in question is the one for whom Paul in his second letter recommends forgiveness (II Cor. 2:6-11) is not certain. The punishment had been imposed by the "majority" ὑπὸ τῶν πλειονῶν (vs. 11), which term corresponds to the רבים of the Qumran sect's Manual of Discipline. It would seem that the offender had been thoroughly chastened and had undergone a radical repentance, which, in Paul's opinion, had earned him the right to be reinstated in the community. Some of the members of the church still wished to exclude him, but Paul felt that the punishment should be ended and that the members should forgive and comfort him, so as not to defeat the purpose of the punishment and lead to ruin rather than rehabilitation, thus giving Satan advantage.

The Corinthian and Thessalonian letters reflect a rather loose disciplinary organization, without rigid rules, modifiable in accordance with circumstances. The Pastoral letters exhibit a less flexible attitude toward discipline, especially in regard to doctrinal matters. The man who is heretical or factious in matters of doctrine is to be warned in the same way as a moral offender, and then shunned (Tit. 3:10). Dissemination of false doctrine is grounds for exclusion from the fellowship (I Tim. 1:20; 6:3; II John 10). Excommunication was not simply a matter of discipline, or of consigning the offender to Satan, but its main purpose was to keep the church from corruption by amputation of the diseased member. According to rabbinic tradition (Talmud, Sanh. 107*b*), Jesus was excommunicated, put under the ban (ḥérem). The Greek rendering of the Hebrew term ḥérem is ἀνάθεμα, and it may be that when Paul says (I Cor. 12:3) that no one speaking by the spirit of God ever says "Jesus is Anathema," he is replying to the charge that Jesus had been excommunicated, by asserting that the action could not have been in accord with God's spirit. Paul himself expressed willingness to become anathema, accursed and cut off from Christ, if it could mean the winning of his fellow Jews to Christ (Rom. 9:3). Paul felt that anyone who preached a gospel contrary to his (Gal. 1:8) or who had no love for the Lord (I Cor. 16:22) should be anathema, or excommunicated. The question of authority, or who may excommunicate whom, arose inevitably with heresy and schism, when ambitious leaders, like Diotrephes (III John 9-10), undertook to exercise the power.

The NT reflects only the beginnings of what was to develop into an elaborate procedure. The young church was still flexible. Its gradual transformation into a vast and powerful organization led to the development of a complex legal structure.

See ANATHEMA; CHURCH, LIFE AND ORGANIZATION OF; DEVOTED; HERESY. M. H. POPE

EXECRATION. An occasional translation (Num. 5:21, 27; Jer. 42:18; 44:12) of אלה, which is more commonly rendered "OATH" and "CURSE." The term refers to the curse itself and to the victim of the curse.

Execration is, in a sense, the antithesis of blessing and consecration. Blessing and consecration involve making someone or something holy or setting him or it aside for a holy use; execration, cursing, especially when pronounced by a person with spiritual authority, renders the person or thing unholy and useless.

Jeremiah warned his exilic compatriots that God would pour his wrath out on those who fled from Judah to Egypt, so that they would become an "execration, a horror, a curse, and a taunt" (42:18). A similar warning was addressed to the Jews in Egypt because they had fled and because they were willing to participate in the heathen rites of the Egyptians (44:12). An oath of purgation, involving a conditional curse as part of a trial by ordeal of jealousy, was used in Israel as a Levitical device for determining the guilt or innocence of a woman suspected of adultery, when there was no evidence to support the suspicion (Num. 5:11-31). A comprehensive summary of the curses which would befall an Israelite if he and his nation were disloyal to God is presented in Deut. 28: 15-68. Generally in the OT those who persist in their sinfulness run the risk of being cursed by God.

Curses, threats, and magical cursing were used extensively in the ancient Middle East and especially in Egypt. Our earliest Egyptian examples of execration texts date from the twenty-fifth century B.C. and are contained in the pyramid and other tomb texts from Sakkarah. Such texts were designed to serve various purposes—e.g., to protect the honor of a king lest any should speak evil against his name after his death or to ward off tomb-robbers by reminding them of the fate which would befall them in this and the afterlife should they disturb the peace of the dead. Egyptian royal decrees often included the threat of dispossession and capital punishment for subjects who would not comply with the law. In instances where supposed violators of a law could not be indicted, for want of conclusive evidence, the king would invoke divine vengeance against the supposed offenders. In the Middle Kingdom of Egypt the magical cursing of supposed and actual enemies of the state was a common practice. The names and designations of such enemies were inscribed on pottery bowls or written on papyrus and placed in glass bottles; the bowls and bottles were then smashed, either underfoot or with stones. Presumably the power of the enemy was thereby weakened, if not utterly destroyed. Among those so exorcised in the texts we have from the Middle Kingdom were Asiatic princes, Nubians, Libyans, rebellious Egyptians, and all evil forces. Magical cursing of a conditional kind for the protection of children and other persons was also used extensively in ancient Egypt.

See also SIN.

Bibliography. For examples of Egyptian execration texts, together with references to literature on the subject, see: J. B. Pritchard, ed., ANET (2nd ed., 1955), pp. 326-29. W. F. Albright, JPOS (1928), pp. 223 ff; BASOR, 81 (Feb., 1941), 16 ff; 83 (Oct., 1941), 30 ff.

See also: W. R. Smith, "On the Forms of Divination and Magic Enumerated in Deut. 18:10, 11," Journal of Philology, 13 (1884), 113-28; 14 (1885), 273-87. R. C. Thompson, Semitic Magic (1908). A. Guillaume, Prophecy and Divination (1938). J. Pedersen, Israel, Its Life and Culture (4 vols. in 2; 1926-40), pp. 411-52. G. E. Wright, The OT Against Its Environment (1950), pp. 78-93. H. F. BECK

EXECUTIONER [פקדה, punishment (Ezek. 9:1; KJV THEM THAT HAVE CHARGE); KJV σπεκουλάτωρ (Mark 6:27; RSV SOLDIER OF THE GUARD)]. One who puts another to death, usually in carrying out a legal sentence of capital punishment. In Ezek. 9:1 the term refers to an OFFICER in charge of a city. Potiphar was captain of the guard (Gen. 37:36; 40:3 [שר הטבחה]; cf. Jer. 39:9; Dan. 2:14; etc.). He was one of the bodyguard of the king. This captain of guard might act as executioner (I Kings 2:25, 34). But the OT has no special word for those who carried out the sentence of capital punishment.

The Roman administration in NT Palestine reserved exclusive jurisdiction over capital crimes. The term "executioner" was probably attached to the bodyguard of the king or proconsul, since the Greek σπεκουλάτωρ originally meant "scout" or "SPY." Soldiers were the executioners of Jesus (Luke 23:47; John 19:23). C. U. WOLF

EXHORTATION. A translation of παράκλησις (alternately ENCOURAGEMENT; APPEAL; COMFORT; CONSOLATION). It is often difficult to determine just which meaning an author intended, especially as between "exhortation," "encouragement," and "comfort."

In Rom. 12:8, "he who exhorts, in his exhortation," could also be translated: "he who encourages (or comforts), in his encouragement (or comforting)." Phil. 2:1 may mean "Christian exhortation" rather than "encouragement in Christ" (RSV). In II Cor. 8:17 "appeal" (RSV) could be translated "exhortation." In Rom. 15:4 "encouragement" (RSV) could be translated "consolation," etc.

The expression "word of exhortation" occurs in Acts 13:15, where Paul is asked if he has such a word for his hearers; and in Heb. 13:22 the writer asks his readers to bear with his "word of exhortation." And in many other passages believers are exhorted or admonished or commanded.

B. H. THROCKMORTON, JR.

EXILE. The period in biblical history when the Babylonians forced most of the inhabitants of Judah and Jerusalem to migrate from their native homes to Babylonia. The period dates from either the first deportation in 598 B.C. (Esth. 2:6; Matt. 1:11) or, more commonly, the second in 587, to the edict of CYRUS in 538 or the completion of the new temple in 515. The word may also refer to the general state of forced absence from one's native habitat (Amos 1:15; I Pet. 1:17), with or without reference to the Babylonian exile (see DISPERSION). Or it may be used of an individual banished from his home (II Sam. 15:19; Amos 7:17; Acts 7:29; Jer. 20:3 LXX). It may refer in the abstract sense to the condition of being exiled or collectively to the people who are in exile (see § 1*a below*). In the NT "exile" may be used figuratively to mean life on earth (Heb. 11:13).

1. Terminology for "exile" in the Bible
   a. In OT Hebrew and Aramaic
   b. In LXX Greek
   c. In NT Greek
2. History of the Exile
3. Importance of the Exile

Bibliography

1. Terminology for "exile" in the Bible. a. In OT Hebrew and Aramaic. The most common Hebrew term for "exile" is the noun גולה (II Kings 24:15). Occurring less frequently, though with precisely the same meaning, is גלות (II Kings 25:27). They are used interchangeably (Amos 1:6, 15) as synonyms in either the abstract sense (Ezek. 1:2; 12:11) or the collective, meaning "exiles" (Jer. 29:20, 22). Their use is contemporaneous, indicating that no priority is indicated in the history of Hebrew literary style. In exilic and postexilic OT literature the reference is almost invariably to the Assyrian and Babylonian exiles (Obad. 20) and subsequent Dispersion; however, גולה is used in an apocalyptic sense at least once (Zech. 14:2). In pre-exilic literature the reference may be to forced migrations other than those effected by Assyria and Babylonia (Amos 1:6, 9). The word is by no means limited in OT usage to the fate of Israel and Judah (Isa. 20:4; Nah. 3:10; Jer. 46:19; 48:7, 11; 49:3).

The Aramaic noun for "exile" is גלו, used only in the phrase בני גלותא, meaning "sons of the exile" or "exiles," replacing the collective sense of the Hebrew cognate (Ezra 6:16; Dan. 2:25; 5:13; 6:13—H 6:14).

The verb גלה is used in making historical reference to the Assyrian deportation of the N ten tribes (II Kings 15:29; 17:11; I Chr. 5:26) and to the Babylonian exile of Judah (II Kings 24:14; II Chr. 36:20; Ezra 2:1; Lam. 1:3); only once does it refer to the fate of a foreign nation (Amos 1:5). The prophets freely use the verb, as well as the noun, in pronouncing divine judgment on the people (Isa. 5:13; Jer. 13:19; Amos 5:27; Mic. 1:16; cf. Hos. 10:5). The Aramaic verb הגלי occurs twice in the OT meaning "take into exile" (Ezra 4:10; 5:12).

A synonym for גלה in Hebrew is שבה, "take captive," frequently used in reference to the Exile (Ezek. 6:9). The nouns שבי and שבית, meaning "captivity" or "captives" (in the collective sense), are used as synonyms of גולה (Deut. 32:42; Ezra 2:1; Neh. 7:6; Ezek. 12:11; Nah. 3:10). It should be carefully noted that שבה and its cognates are general in meaning and refer frequently to events other than the Exile.

The words עצה, "bow down" (Isa. 51:14), and בלע, "swallow up" (Isa. 49:19), are among the poetic synonyms of גלה.

b. In LXX Greek. The Greek nouns used to translate גולה and גלות are αἰχμαλωσία, "captivity" or "prisoners of war" (II Kings 24:14), and μετοικεσία, "deportation," "captivity," "exile" (II Kings 24:16). The cognate verbs αἰχμαλωτεύειν, αἰχμαλωτίζειν, and μετοικίζειν translate גלה. Μέτοικος, "exile," is used in mistranslation of מגור, "terror" (Jer. 20:3). Παροικία, "exile," translates גולה (I Esd. 5:7; Ezra 8:35).

c. In NT Greek. In the NT, μετοικίζειν means "take into exile" (Acts 7:43; cf. Amos 5:27), and μετοικεσία means "deportation" or "exile" (Matt. 1:11-12, 17). Αἰχμαλωσία means "captivity" (Rev. 13:10; Jer. 15:2 LXX), and παροικία "exile" (I Pet. 1:17). πάροικος (Acts 7:29; I Pet. 2:11) and παρεπίδημος (I Pet. 1:1; 2:11; Heb. 11:13) mean "exile" or "alien." Αἰχμαλωτίζειν means "scattered as captives" (in Luke 21:24). Διασπορά (John 7:35; Jas. 1:1; I Pet. 1:1) means "Dispersion." Matt. 1:11-12, 17, contain the only direct historical references in the NT to the Exile of the OT.

2. History of the Exile. Throughout their history the people of Israel and Judah were forced to play the role of political buffer between Egypt to the SW and the governments in Mesopotamia to the NE. While Egypt was the most dominant power to be dealt with during the early periods of biblical history, it was the rise of a powerful Assyrian government in the eighth century B.C. and an even more powerful Neo-Babylonian renaissance in the seventh century which brought about the total eclipse of the N tribes and the utter prostration of Benjamin and Judah.

After the split of the United Monarchy into the kingdoms of Israel to the N and Judah in the S (see ISRAEL, HISTORY OF), each government independently reached the zenith of its power and prestige in the eighth century B.C. Israel attained its summit during the reign of Jeroboam II (ca. 786-746) and Judah under the rule of Uzziah (Azariah; ca. 783-742). However, it was during this period that Assyria began seriously and ruthlessly to build its empire. Tiglath-pileser III (745-727) captured the cities of Naphtali (II Kings 15:29) and carried the inhabitants of the tribes of Naphtali, Reuben, Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh (I Chr. 5:26) captive to Assyria (733). After Tiglath-pileser had taken Damascus, capital of Syria (732), he appointed for N Israel her last king, Hoshea. Hoshea rebelled, however, ca. 724, depending on an ineffective Egyptian government for help, and was taken prisoner by the Assyrians. Samaria, capital of Israel, held out until early in 721, the siege having been laid by Shalmaneser V (727-722) and the fall of the city effected by Sargon II (722-705). This marked the end of the ten tribes: "None was left but the tribe of Judah only" (II Kings 17:18). According to the biblical account the Assyrians exiled the Israelites to Assyria, in Halah (cf. Obad. 20), on the Habor, the river of Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes (II Kings 17:6; 18:11); on the other hand, they brought people from Babylon, Cuthah, Avva, Hamath, and Sephar-vaim to the cities of Samaria (II Kings 17:24; cf. Ezra 4:10).

This displacement of populations was, it seems, complete so far as the identity of the N ten tribes is concerned; for they eventually assimilated beyond the point of return to any historical continuum with their Israelite origins. Sargon II in his inscriptions boasts proudly of his conquest of the "land of Beth-Omri" (Samaria) and records that 27,290 Israelites were deported.

For the history of Judah in the following century, see ISRAEL, HISTORY OF.

Just as Amos and Hosea had announced divine judgment of destruction and exile on Israel, so Isaiah, Micah, Zephaniah, Jeremiah, Habakkuk, and Ezekiel were in agreement on the fate of Judah under that same judgment.

Ashurbanipal was the last great king of Assyria (died ca. 630), and his passing marked the end of effective Assyrian dominance of Judah. Though the Neo-Babylonian Empire (626-539) was soon to fill the power vacuum, both Judah and Egypt tried to take advantage of the respite. Judah's aspirations were effectively checked at the battle of Megiddo Pass when Josiah, king of Judah (640-609), was killed. With him went any hope of reuniting and strengthening Israel under a Davidic monarch. Egypt enjoyed a further moment of dominance of the little buffer state. Although Nebuchadnezzar decisively defeated Egypt at Carchemish (May-June, 605) the Babylonian Chronicle itself records a defeat at the hand of Egypt ca. 601.

One of Josiah's sons, Jehoahaz, ruled for three months (609) before he was deported to Egypt, where he died (II Kings 23:31-34; II Chr. 36:1-4; Jer. 22:10-12). Eliakim, a second son, whose name Pharaoh Neco changed to Jehoiakim, reigned eleven years (609-598) before the Babylonians under Nebuchadnezzar (605-562) laid siege to Jerusalem (II Kings 23:34–24:6; II Chr. 36:4-8). Jehoiakim died during the siege, and his son, Jehoiachin, after reigning three months (December, 598–March, 597), was exiled to Babylon (II Kings 24:6-8; II Chr. 36:9-10; cf. Jer. 22:24-30; Esth. 2:6; Matt. 1:11). A third son of Josiah, Mattaniah, whose name was changed to Zedekiah by Nebuchadnezzar, then ruled the vassal state of Judah for eleven regnal years (March, 597–July, 587) until the fall of Jerusalem, when he was blinded and taken exile to Babylon (II Kings 24:17–25:7; II Chr. 36:10-21; Jer. 39:1-7; 52:1-11; Ezek. 12:12-13; 17:5-10, 13-21). Jer. 52:11 adds that Zedekiah was there imprisoned until he died. Hence, three of Judah's kings, Jehoahaz, Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah, suffered personal exile.

There were three deportations of Jews to Babylonia. The description of the first (598) is vividly given in II Kings 24:12-16, where, along with the young King Jehoiachin, his mother, his palace retinue, and the temple and palace treasures, it is said that 10,000 captives were taken and "none remained, except the poorest people of the land" (vs. 14). Jer. 52:28-30, seemingly an extract from some official document of the Exile, gives the total number for the three deportations as 4,600 persons, with 3,023 having been taken in 598 and the remainder in 587 and 582.

The discovery of the Lachish Ostraca (see LACHISH) and the excavations of such contemporary fortress towns as Debir, Lachish, and Bethshemesh give graphic evidence of the defeat Judah suffered in 598-597 and testify to the pitiable estate to which she succumbed in the years between 597 and 587. Only the new evidence of the real strength of Egypt and Nebuchadnezzar's annual trips back to Babylon for the New Year festivals, and not Judah's own position, can possibly explain how Zedekiah and his nobles (Jer. 27–29; 34; 37–39; cf. Ezek. 12:12-13; 17:5-21) could rebel against the Babylonian yoke. This rebellion led to the second deportation.

The second deportation is described in II Kings 25:8-21; Jer. 39:8-10; 40:7; 52:12-34 (aside from the references to the fate of Zedekiah). The temple, the palace, and private homes were burned, the walls of the city destroyed, the temple treasures further confiscated, and more people deported (August, 587).

Gedaliah, the former mayor of the palace, was appointed governor of Judah by the Babylonians. He held office in the village of Mizpah until he was assassinated. Many of the remaining Jews fled to Egypt, forcing Jeremiah to join them (II Kings 25:22-26; Jer. 40–44; see DISPERSION).

Yet a third deportation of men of rank and skill, a Babylonian reprisal for the assassination of Gedaliah, took place in 582.

Supported by Nebuchadnezzar's own royal archives is the account given of the favorable treatment in Babylonia of Jehoiachin (II Kings 25:27-30; Jer. 52:31-34), who had been deported in 598. In 561, after the death of Nebuchadnezzar and on the accession of EVIL-MERODACH, Jehoiachin was freed from prison to sit among the kings who were also in exile in Babylon. The last great king of the Neo-Babylonian Empire was NABONIDUS (555-539), whose cultural and religious policies and frequent absences from the capital led to Babylonia's defeat at the hand of Cyrus of Persia.

The Edict of Cyrus (II Chr. 36:22-23; Ezra 1:1-4), to release the Jews in exile to return home to rebuild the temple in Jerusalem, is supported by archaeology and in keeping with the known policies of the new Persian Empire. How many people returned to Judah at this time or later under Cambyses and Darius I is not certain. Conditions in Palestine were by no means attractive, while the comparatively lenient Babylonian policies toward their captives detained many Jewish families permanently. They had communities of their own at TEL-ABIB on the Chebar Canal (Ezek. 1:1; 3:15) near NIPPUR. Some of the people had their own houses (Jer. 29:5; Ezek. 8:1; 12:1-7), married (Jer. 29:6; Ezek. 24:18), and engaged in profitable livelihood (Neh. 1:11; Isa. 55:1-2; Zech. 6:9-11). Egyptian papyri and Babylonian contract tablets dating from the early postexilic period give evidence of a comfortable existence in the Dispersion. It appears that such comfort may have resulted from the understandable expediency of many Jews to defect from their own faith and ancient customs to take up worship of the Babylonian deities (Isa. 46:1, 12; 50:11; cf. Jer. 44). On the other hand, there is ample evidence that many Jews (the faithful?) did not fare so well (Ps. 137:1-6; Isa. 14:3; 42:22; 47:6; 51:7, 22-23).

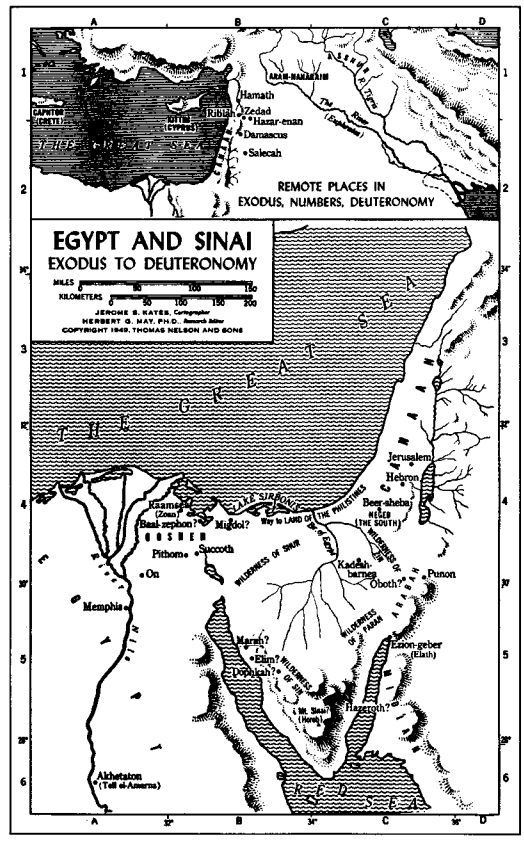
Nonetheless, following 538, a number of Jews did return, among them the Davidic scion ZERUBBABEL and the high priest Joshua. The prophecies of Haggai and Zechariah, which date from August, 520, to February, 519, argue for the speedy rebuilding of the temple in Jerusalem. The temple was completed in March, 515, which usually marks the end of the period commonly called the Babylonian exile.

3. Importance of the Exile. The Exile was a period remarkable for its prophetic and literary activity. Jeremiah, located in Jerusalem until his deportation to Egypt, and Ezekiel and Deutero-Isaiah, located in Babylonia, were in remarkable theological agreement on the importance for Judah of its experience and interpretation of divine activity in the calamity of defeat and exile. Not only was this event to be understood as divine retribution, but more significantly as God's judgment, which, if accepted by faith, would be a revelation of God's love and commitment forever (Isa. 54:9-10; Jer. 31:2-3). Out of the experience would issue a new covenant (Jer. 31:31-34) born of divine judgment to bind the people to God (Ezek. 36:26) in the role of servant and witness to the world (Isa. 43:10; see SERVANT OF THE LORD) of his universal sovereigntv.

Habakkuk (1:12–2:4) offered his interpretation of trust and faith for the early exile, while a successor arose to deride the last days of Babylonian dominance (Hab. 2:7-19). In this period many scattered oracles and poems were penned (Deut. 32; Ps. 137:1-6; Isa. 13–14; 21; 63; Lamentations) to interpret the suffering and encourage the exiles.

Priestly literary activity in Babylonia produced an agonizing reappraisal of the Yahwistic cultus (Lev. 17–26; Ezek. 40-48) to rid it of any element which might have evoked the divine judgment of the Exile (see EZEKIEL; HOLINESS). Out of the Exile, JUDAISM was born.



The Exile is at the heart of the biblical understanding of divine judgment and revelation. It was the crucible of Israel's faith. It is the foundation stone of any biblical understanding of the Cross.

See also ISRAEL, HISTORY OF.

Bibliography. W. F. Albright, "The Biblical Period," in L. Finkelstein, ed., The Jews, I (1949), 3-69; J. B. Pritchard, ed., ANET (1955), pp. 282-317, 321-22; W. F. Albright, "The Nebuchadnezzar and Neriglissar Chronicles," BASOR, no. 143 (1956), pp. 28-33; D. N. Freedman, "The Babylonian Chronicle," BA, vol. XIX, no. 3 (1956), pp. 50-60; J. P. Hyatt, "New Light on Nebuchadnezzar and Judean History," JBL, LXXV (1956), 277-84; E. R. Thiele, "New Evidence on the Chronology of the Last Kings of Judah," BASOR, no. 143 (1956), pp. 22-27; D. J. Wiseman, Chronicles of Chaldaean Kings (626-556 B.C.) in the British Museum (1956).

J. A. SANDERS

EXODUS, BOOK OF ĕk'sə dəs [ואלא שמות, and these are the names (Exod. 1:1), or simply שמות; LXX 'έξοδος, a going out]. The second book of the OT, which receives its name from the LXX designation of the chief event recorded in it—namely, Israel's "going out" of Egypt. In the Jewish canon it is the second book of the Law (Torah, contained in the Pentateuch). In Christian exegesis the events of deliverance from slavery and the covenant at Sinai have received more attention than the law contained in the book, particularly because they have provided a language for comprehending the Atonement (God's "deliverance" in Christ) and the New Covenant. For Israel the events recorded in the book were a testimony to the work of God in fulfilment of promise whereby she became the "people of Yahweh," saved from Egyptian slavery, bound together in covenant with her Lord, and provided with a cultic center (tabernacle and ark of the covenant) which gave assurance of God's "tabernacling" presence in her midst (see §§ 1*c*, 4*c*, below).

1. Contents
   a. The deliverance
   b. The covenant, its breach and renewal
   c. The tabernacle and its furnishings
2. Historical background
3. Composition
4. Significance
   a. God's deliverance from Egyptian slavery
   b. The Sinai covenant
   c. The tabernacle

Bibliography

1. Contents. The diverse contents of the book are set within a geographical outline which may be quickly summarized as follows: (a) 1–19:2, Israel's deliverance from Egyptian slavery and journey to Mount Sinai; (b) 19:3–40:38, Israel at the holy mount. A more adequate summary, however, may be given under the following headings: (a) the deliverance (1:1–19:2); (b) the covenant (19:3–24:18), its breach and renewal (chs. 32–34); (c) the tabernacle and its furnishings: Moses instructed concerning them (chs. 25–31); Moses directs their construction (chs. 35–40).

a. The deliverance. The introduction to this section in ch. 1 succinctly describes the situation with which the subsequent events deal: a new government in Egypt which "did not know Joseph" and which made the Hebrews state slaves, forced to work on public projects, while cruel methods were used to cut down their numbers. In the first main section (2:1–6:27) we are told how God raised Moses to deliver his people and sent him with his brother Aaron to the Egyptian pharaoh. Though reared in the Egyptian court, Moses received his call at "Horeb, the mountain of God" (3:1), in the area to which he had fled. His objections and feeling of inadequacy were overcome in God's commissioning (chs. 3–4), and his message to his people was to include the good news that the "God of the Fathers," who now was come to them under a new name, "Yahweh" (3:13-15; 6:2-3), had "seen their affliction" (4:31) and would save them.

In 6:28–10:29 the contest of God with Pharaoh is described through a series of nine plagues (see PLAGUES IN EXODUS), in which the central theme is expressed in the words: "The Egyptians shall know that I am Yahweh" (7:5; cf. 8:22; 9:14, 16; 10:1-2). Balanced with this is the statement reiterated after every plague, concerning the hardness of Pharaoh's heart, which God uses for his own purpose, and which serves to create a gradually increased sense of tension, leading to the climax (note 7:13, 22; 8:15, 19, 32; 9:7, 12, 35; 10:20, 27). A minor theme concerns the Egyptian magicians, who by the use of their occult arts are at first able to duplicate the feats of Moses before they are bested and forced to retire from the scene (7:11, 22; 8:7, 18; 9:11).

The double climax of the story is given in 11:1–15:21, when after the killing of the Egyptian first-born, Pharaoh allows Israel to depart (12:29-36), only to face a new crisis before the RED SEA, through which God leads the people safely while destroying the Egyptian pursuers (14:19-31). The colorful narrative in this section is interrupted at two points by the insertion of relevant material. The first interruption (chs. 12–13) concerns the detailed regulations for the observances of the PASSOVER and the redemption of the first-born, as these were observed in later Israel. As is usual in the OT, the instructions for such important cultic rites have been inserted in the narrative with the event they commemorate. The second insertion is the great hymn of praise, triumph, and thanksgiving, placed at the conclusion of the section in 15:1-18—a hymn perhaps once used in the Passover liturgy. No tradition of authorship is preserved. According to vs. 1 Moses and Israel sang it, while another tradition (vs. 21) relates it to Miriam, Moses' sister. In the latter case it is cited only by its Incipit (the first line quoted as a title).

The final portion of this section of the book depicts Israel's journey to Sinai (Horeb; see SINAI, MOUNT), and the trouble encountered along the way (15:22–19:2). The main theme here is the people's murmuring and rebellion against God and against Moses. In vivid contrast to the triumph and wonder of God's unparalleled acts of salvation is the sudden introduction of the people's faithless response when difficulty is encountered. Yet the faithfulness of God is emphasized in his gracious provision of sustenance, notably MANNA. The important narrative regarding the judicial procedures introduced for the adjudication of disputes (ch. 18) seems out of place in this section, since its scene is the encampment at the sacred mount (cf. 18:5 with 19:1-2).

b. The covenant (19:3–24:18), its breach and renewal (32–34). At the sacred mountain before which Moses received his call and commission (3:1), Moses now becomes the mediator of the covenant relation between God and people. Through him God first offers the covenant, and the people accept (19:3-8). They then prepare for the great theophany, which is described in terms taken from a mountain storm (19:16-19), a language common to theophany in the OT. Then out of the thundering and the cloud God identifies himself and gives the stipulations of the covenant (20:1-17; the TEN COMMANDMENTS). There follows a code of specific law, which scholars have named the "Book of the Covenant" from 24:7; this is contained in 20:23–23:33 and is introduced (20:18-22) by the people's request of Moses to be the mediator between God and themselves. Thus a distinction is drawn between the Decalogue, as God's covenant revelation, and the specific laws of the code. The former is designated the "words" of God (דברים; 20:1; 24:3; cf. Deut. 4:13; 5:4-5, 22), while the latter are the "ordinances" (משפטים; 21:1)—i.e., the specific legal procedures which the community is to employ.

The ceremony whereby the covenant was sealed is described in ch. 24. The reading of the covenant's stipulations and their formal acceptance by the people was accompanied by a sacrificial ceremony in which the blood of slain animals was partly thrown upon the altar and partly sprinkled upon the participants after the formal vows had been taken (cf. I Cor. 11:25: "the new covenant in my blood").

Precisely what Moses read and what the people promised to obey is not entirely clear in the text. 24:3 says that Moses "told the people all the words of Yahweh and all the ordinances," meaning in the context both the Decalogue and the code in 20:23–23:33, and the people promised to "do" them. Vs. 4 then says that Moses wrote only the "words" (presumably meaning the Decalogue). He then prepared the altar and the blood (vss. 5-6), and read the people the "book of the covenant," to which they replied: "All that Yahweh has spoken we will do" (vs. 7). If Moses read what vs. 4 says that he wrote, then we must presume that the title "book of the covenant" refers to the Decalogue and not to the code of "ordinances." In this case, the formal covenant vows of Israel would be understood to have been taken only on the basis of the "words" (i.e., Exod. 20:1-17), which with their prologue would be called the "book of the covenant" (24:7) or simply the "covenant" (Deut. 4:13; and cf. the setting of the Deuteronomic edition of the Decalogue in 5:3-5, 22).

In chs. 32–34 the story continues with Aaron's making of a golden bull, which is taken as a major offense against the covenant, with Moses' anxious intercession to allay the Lord's anger, and with his breaking of the two tablets on which the "testimony" (i.e., the Decalogue; cf. 25:21; 31:18) was engraved, meaning that the covenant had been breached. Following repentance on the part of the people (33:4-6), Yahweh does not allow Moses to see his "glory" (vs. 22), but he reveals his name as signifying a gracious, patient, loving, and forgiving personality. Here an old cultic confession is employed which is frequently quoted in part elsewhere in the OT and which is the only such confession composed of a selection of divine attributes (34:6-7; cf. 33:19). Moses is then told to make two stone tablets like the first, which had been broken, signifying the reconstitution of the covenant. There follows in 34:10 God's formal declaration of the covenant, and in 34:27-28 Moses is told to write the ten words (Decalogue) on the two tablets. In between (vss. 11-26), we thus would expect to find the stipulations of the covenant (the Decalogue) repeated. Instead, vss. 18-26 preserve cultic instructions, specifying the chief religious festivals of Israel. Many scholars have interpreted these as another series of ten commandments, a "ritual decalogue." Because of the type of injunction herein contained and especially because of the great difficulty in discovering or in reconstructing precisely ten laws from the text as preserved, another view seems preferable. Vss. 11-17 are a hortatory warning against the dangers of idolatry in Canaan. In this section a variant and very archaic form of the first two commandments is preserved: "You shall worship no other god" (vs. 14), and "you shall make for yourself no molten gods" (vs. 17). We should expect to find, in what follows, the other eight commandments. Instead, we encounter a festival calendar which in a variant form also appears in 23:12-19. In other words, for a reason which is now difficult to discover, a section which originally contained a form of the Decalogue has been displaced, and another type of material has been inserted, perhaps to avoid repetition.

c. The tabernacle and its furnishings. While Moses "was on the mountain forty days and forty nights" (24:18), he received from God the instructions concerning the religious cultus (chs. 25–31), which are subsequently carried out (chs. 35–40). The formal setting of each of these sections in the second half of Exodus thus differs one from the other, while the essential content, with minor differences, is the same. In the first, Yahweh instructs Moses: "Speak to the people of Israel" (25:1-2); i.e., the cultus is received by indirect or mediated revelation, like the laws of the so-called "Covenant Code" (20:23–23:33). In chs. 35–39, on the other hand, Moses reports what he has received to the assembled people (35:1), who carry out the instructions, while in ch. 40 Yahweh gives Moses fresh orders regarding the final stage of the work, the actual erection of the tabernacle, and the consecration of its objects and its priesthood (vss. 1-15); and these are faithfully followed (vss. 16-33).

In the first section there are two parts, chs. 25–29 and chs. 30–31, the latter apparently being a miscellaneous collection of items supplementing the former. God's instructions begin with a direction that the people be asked to contribute the needed material as a freewill offering (25:1-9). Directions for the items in the sanctuary then follow: the ark with its lid or "mercy seat" (see ARK OF THE COVENANT), within which the "testimony" (Decalogue) was to be placed (25:10-22), the offering table with its vessels (vss. 23-30), and the lampstand for seven lamps (vss. 31-40). There follows the description of the two-roomed tent shrine with its easily dismantled wooden frames over which fine leather covering was thrown (ch. 26), the court and its altar (ch. 27), the dress and consecration of the priests and altar (28:1–29:37), and the daily burnt offering (29:38-42). In a fitting conclusion to this section Yahweh promises to meet the people at the sanctuary that there they may be hallowed by his glory, to consecrate the tent, altar, and priesthood, and "to tabernacle" with his people and be their God (29:43-46).

In chs. 30–31 the altar of incense within the main cult room is depicted (30:1-10); a sanctuary tax is imposed as an atonement offering (vss. 11-16); the cultic laver, anointing oil, and formula for incense are described (vss. 17-38); Bezalel and Oholiab are selected as craftsmen and artists (31:1-11); and the observance of the sabbath is designated as the sign of the Mosaic covenant (vss. 12-17).

In the second main section Moses begins by announcing the freewill offering, which is brought (35:1-29). Then God's appointment of Bezalel and Oholiab is announced (35:30–36:1), and with the assistance of the able men they make: the parts for the tabernacle (36:2-38); the ark, table, lampstand, altar of incense, altar of burnt offering, the laver, the court curtains, and the priests' vestments (chs. 37–39). In 40:1-33 everything is put in its proper place and consecrated, after which the final climax of the book is recounted, when "the glory of Yahweh filled the tabernacle" (vss. 34-38).

2. Historical background. In itself the book of Exodus contains few references by which the events it describes can be fitted into their precise historical background in ancient history. The first mention of Israel outside the Bible is by the Egyptian pharaoh Mer-ne-ptah, who on a stele set up in the fifth year of his reign (ca. 1220 B.C.) published a hymn of victory in which he described a triumphant raid in Palestine. Among certain Palestinian city-states which he claims to have conquered (Ashkelon, Gezer, Yanoam) he lists the "people of Israel" as desolate and without offspring (ANET 378). It could be inferred from this that Israel was by that time in possession of at least the central and S portions of the Palestinian hill country, while the cities mentioned were in or near coastal and Galilean areas which Israel did not control. Archaeological evidence from the sites of Bethel, Lachish, Debir, and probably Hazor suggests a thirteenth-century date for the Israelite conquest of Canaan and may be taken to be in accord with the information of Mer-ne-ptah's stele (see JOSHUA, BOOK OF). The important reference in Exod. 1:11 to the effect that Israel in Egypt "built for Pharaoh store cities, Pithom and Raamses" (probably Tell er-Retabeh and San el-Hagar in the E Delta) seems to point to the same century for the period of the Exodus. This is inferred from the fact that the Egyptian kings of the Eighteenth Dynasty (ca. 1570-1310) maintained their capital at Thebes in Upper Egypt and did little, if any, building in the Nile Delta. On the other hand, the pharaohs of the Nineteenth Dynasty (ca. 1310-1200) shifted their base of operations to the Delta and erected many new structures there, particularly at the site of Raamses, their capital in the Delta, in order to reconquer and control their Syro-Palestinian empire. Such information leads to the supposition that the Exodus took place during the first half of the thirteenth century, with Ramses II (ca. 1290-1224) as pharaoh at the time.

This chronology of the Exodus, first proposed by W. F. Albright (see bibliography), though subject to future revision in detail, now appears to accord better with archaeological information than the older views which dated the Exodus either about the time of Mer-ne-ptah or during the mid-fifteenth century B.C. The former is too late a period to account for the archaeological data, while the latter appears to have little support except from two biblical passages: I Kings 6:1; Judg. 11:26. The first of these states that Solomon began to build the temple 480 years after the exodus from Egypt, which then would have occurred ca. 1440. This figure, however, is a round number which may easily have been computed by multiplying the twelve generations known to exist between the Exodus and Solomon (I Chr. 6:4-10, 50-52) by the forty years usually reckoned as the length of a generation. The passage in Judges is more difficult; in it Jephthah informs the Ammonite king that Israel has possessed her territory in Transjordan for 300 years. This would date the Mosaic conquest of that land in the fourteenth century, if we are to date Jephthah in the eleventh. Here again, however, the figure in question is a round number, which may well reflect the editorial chronology of the book of Judges. There the editor has reckoned the judges and oppressions as successive, one following the other, instead of being in part contemporary, so that a three-century period has artificially been computed.

Since from Egyptian sources we know that it was customary for Bedouins and Asiatics to be admitted into Egypt in time of famine, we may infer that the Israelites were a part of the shifting population of seminomadic shepherds and cattle-breeders who resided in the Nile Delta. They were thus a convenient source of labor for the pharaohs of the Nineteenth Dynasty, who not only needed the labor but perhaps also feared for the stability of their NE border while engaged in their Asiatic conquests. Furthermore, it is not unlikely that Israel would have been a part of the group of people whom the pharaohs, and many others in Asia, called 'Apiru, a term with which "HEBREW" is somehow related. It is improbable, however, that the name indicated a nationality during the second millennium B.C. Instead, it was probably used for landless aliens who were not citizens of the particular legal community in which they resided. This conforms with the use of the term "Hebrew" in the early historical traditions of the OT, where it is used for the most part in relation to foreigners who needed a designation which they understood and for whom the term "Israel" would have had no meaning. The biblical tradition speaks of a "mixed multitude" or "rabble" (Num. 11:4), composed of such Hebrews, of whom Israel was the dominant part, which Moses was able to release from their bondage at a time when Egypt was severely shaken by a series of plagues. These and other factors were understood to be a demonstration of the power of Yahweh and the means by which he humbled the Egyptian pharaoh.

Whether all twelve of the Israelite tribes—or, if not, precisely which ones—were involved in the exodus under Moses, is a debated problem which at this time cannot be satisfactorily solved. Since the biblical tradition and archaeological investigation combine to suggest that the invading Israelites under Joshua did not conquer the Shechem area of N central Palestine, we must surely infer that the covenant ceremony reported there (Josh. 24) brought into the tribal league elements which had not left Egypt under Moses. Indeed, one might argue, with Martin Noth (see bibliography), that the twelve-tribe league, as it was known in the period of the judges, first came into being in the Shechem ceremony. When he further specifies, however, that the six "Leah tribes," for whom Shechem was the amphictyonic center, were at that time made a part of the larger amphictyony, we must assume that these groups had not been involved in the Exodus. Yet the dominance of the figure of Joseph in the tradition of the N tribes makes such a supposition difficult. All scholars are agreed that the one tribe most closely connected with Egypt is the tribe of Levi, because of the Egyptian names preserved within it (e.g., Moses, Phinehas, Hophni, Pashhur, and perhaps Hur and Merari). Beyond this, however, there is no agreement on the tribal groups involved, and because of the complexity of the biblical tradition it seems improbable that the problem can be solved. Indeed, it is possible that before the period of the judges the composition and even the names of the tribal groups may have been somewhat different from those which later existed, but even this cannot be proved.

The traditions of Israel as preserved in historical, legal, prophetic, and cultic materials, however, all point to the exodus and wilderness periods of the nation's life for the foundations of the faith. All tribal groups of later Israel thus came to accept the traditions of this period as normative. The origins of Yahwism are traced to the Mosaic era, which in some sense must be reckoned as Israel's creative period. While in itself this period is difficult to reconstruct historically, it is even more difficult to depict the pre-Mosaic background of Israel's faith. Perhaps the most elaborate attempt to set the Mosaic era within the cultural and religious atmosphere of the Late Bronze Age is W. F. Albright's From the Stone Age to Christianity. In this book he attempts to show both the continuity and the discontinuity of Mosaic faith with its background, while defining that faith as monotheism. This view was presented with the aid of the new horizons of history now available, which necessitate a revision of older views that interpreted monotheism as a gradual development, an achievement of the evolutionary process. While there is still considerable disagreement over the point, the context of the debate has changed considerably. It is widely agreed that Israel did have an early creative period in which there was a radical devaluation of the world's spiritual powers and the exclusive worship of Yahweh demanded. While a development and refinement of conceptions took place in the centuries which followed, these were within the context of the exclusive holiness and "jealousy"of Yahweh. As a result, the debate has become, in no small measure, one between the proper choice and definition of the terms employed to describe Israel's faith in its early stages —whether "monotheism," "monolatry," or some other related term.

One of the most common views regarding the origin of Yahwism is the assumption that Yahweh was the God of one of the tribal groups which later composed the confederacy. From Exod. 18 it is argued that Jethro, Moses' father-in-law, was a Yahweh priest of the Midianite tribe of the Kenites. The Kenite hypothesis, thought first to have been proposed by Ghillany in 1862, rests, however, on an exceedingly tenuous basis. In any event, it cannot be regarded as particularly illuminating, because it does little more than attempt to explain one unknown by another. Whether Moses was originally influenced by the Kenites, or by the monotheism of Akh-en-Aton in Egypt, or by whatever unknown sources, it must still be supposed that he so transformed all that he borrowed that little actual resemblance to the original remained. Yet even this generalization is conjectural, because we as yet do not have sufficient evidence on which to base a firmly grounded hypothesis. The identification of Yahweh with the God of the fathers (Exod. 3:13-15; 6:2-3) presupposes both continuity and discontinuity, but little more can be said with confidence.

On the other hand, formal elements in the early legal and cultic institutions of Israel have been considerably illuminated in archaeological research. By way of illustration, two matters alone will be mentioned here which bear directly upon the exodus traditions. The first is the work on Israelite law, in particular the proof that the so-called "Covenant Code" in Exod. 20:23–23:33 contains a legal tradition derived from ancient Near Eastern common law, as illustrated by the Eshnunna, Hammurabi, Assyrian, and Hittite codes. The social conditions reflected in these codes differ markedly, and it is clear that Israelite law represented an adaptation for the cultural environment of the worshipers of Yahweh in Palestine.

Albrecht Alt in his Die Ursprünge des israelitischen Rechts (1934) gave the discussion of this question a fresh orientation by distinguishing two legal traditions in Israel, which he termed the "casuistic" and the "apodictic." The first has arisen in judicial decisions, like English common law, which become legal precedents. In formulation the type contains a conditional clause, beginning with "if" (כִּי), which defines the case, and then concludes with the penalty. In form and content it is closely related to the other Near Eastern codes. The apodictic type of law, on the other hand, seems a characteristically Israelite formulation, in which God addresses his people directly (e.g., the Decalogue), and in which no distinction is made between the sacred and the secular. While in the Covenant Code the two types of law are mixed together, such an application of form criticism is able to isolate the forms and to suggest that each has had its separate origin and history, before reaching the present accommodation of one to the other.

A second investigation of importance for the historical background of the Exodus concerns the setting of the conception of a covenant between God and Israel. This covenant is a legal form, comprising a compact between two parties sealed by an oath. It must therefore have been adapted for theological purposes from ancient law. Yet the precise legal background has been difficult to discover.

The basic work on this subject, Johannes Pedersen's Israel, Its Life and Culture, I–II (1926), pointed to a setting in nomadic life where, in the absence of a strong central government, covenants, sealed by the gods of the respective parties, were a fundamental source of social cohesion and peace. The nomadic covenant, illustrated particularly by modern Bedouin life, is not a completely satisfactory background for the Israelite covenant between God and people, however, because the latter seems based upon a political background wherein God appears as sovereign and the people as his subjects or "servants."

G. E. Mendenhall (see bibliography) has pointed to a different type of background in which the parallels to the Mosaic covenant are most striking. This is the suzerainty treaty between a suzerain and a vassal, as known particularly from Hittite sources in the Late Bronze Age. In this type of covenant the suzerain identified himself and in the first person related the benevolent acts which his dynasty had performed in the vassal's behalf, that the latter might keep the treaty on a personal, rather than on a legal or enforced, basis. Then followed the treaty's stipulations, which defined the suzerain's interests while leaving the vassal free to order his own internal relations within the framework they provided. The detailed comparisons between the suzerainty and Mosaic covenants cannot here be described. Suffice it to say that in this view the Decalogue, with its preamble (Exod. 20:1-17), constitutes the covenant document, as the biblical setting appears to suggest (see § 1*b above*), while the code which follows in Exod. 20:23–23:33 is to be understood, not in the sense of constitutional law binding on the judges (for this there is no early Near Eastern parallel), but as legal tactics and procedures, as distinct from the legal policies of the Decalogue, which were subsequently collected for the guidance of people and judges.

3. Composition. Literary critical work on the book of Exodus has found within it the same documents or literary strata as were discovered in the book of Genesis, though admittedly the analysis has been considered more difficult (see PENTATEUCH). The supplementation of the older JE materials by the Jerusalem priesthood (P) is most clearly observed in the third main section of the book, which is concerned with the cultic center of the community's worship (chs. 25–31; 35–40). In the first two sections, while there has been considerable difference of opinion concerning individual passages, the basic division of the material is as in Table 1 (from J. E. Carpenter and G. Harford, The Composition of the Hexateuch [1902]). See pp. 193-94.

There are few literary critics today who would care to support this complex analysis in every detail, particularly in the precise separation of J and E, though there is still wide agreement regarding its main contentions. Chs. 20–23 are considered, e.g., as basically drawn from the E source, which here appears to have displaced J. Only a part of the latter's treatment of the same subject is preserved in

Table 1

J	1 6 8-12 14*a* 20*b* 22 2 11-23*a*
E	15-20*a* 21 1-10 23*b*-25
P	1-5 7 13 14*b*
J	3 2-4*a* 5 7-9*a* *14 16-18 4 1-16
E	4*b* 6 9*b*-13 15 *19-21: 17·
P	1
J	19-20*a* 21-26 29-31 5 3 5-23 6 1
E	20*b* 27 1· 4
P	2-30
J	7 14 16-17*a* 18 21*a* 24: 8 1-4
E	15 17*b* 20*b* 23
P	1-13 19-20*a* 21*b*-22
J	8-15*a* 20-32 9 1-7 13-17· 23*b* 24*b*
E'	*19-23*a* 24*a*
P	5-7 15*b*-19 8-12
J	25*b*-30 33· 10 1-11 13*b* 14*b*-15*a* 15*c*-19
E	25*a* 31· 35R 12-13*a* 14*a* 15*b*
P
J	24-26 28· 11 4-8 12 21-23 25-27
E	20-23 27 1-3
P	*9 1-20 24 28
J	29-34 37-39 13 3*a* 4-7· 10-13 21·
E	*35· 3*b* 9 14-19
P	*40-51 1· 20
J	14 5· 10*a* 11-14 19*b* 20*b* 21*b*
E	7 9*a* 10*b* 15*a* 16*a* 19*a* 20*a*
P	1-4 8 9*b*R 15*b* 16*b*-18 21*a* 21*c*-23
J	24*a* 25 27*b* 28*b* 30 15 1 22-25*a* 27
E	24*b* *31 *2-18 20· 25*b*-*26
P	26-27*a* 28*a* *29 *19
J	16 4 17 3 2*b* 7*a* 7*c* 18 *2-4 7
E	1*b*-2*a* 4-6 7*b* 8-16 1R 5 8
P	1-3 *5-36 1*a*
J	9-11 19 *3*b*-6 11*b*-13 18
E	12-27 2*b*-3*a* 7-11*a* 14-17 19
P	2*a* 1
J	20-22 24· 20 2 4*b*-6 7*b* 9· 12*b* 17*b*
E	*23 1 3-4*a* 7*a* 8 12*a* 13-17*a* 18-26
P	11
J	21 1-36 22 *21*b*-22 *24 23 *13 *15*b*
E	1-21*a* *23 25-31 1-12 14-15*a*
P

Table 1 (continued)

| | | |

character, exploits in which God is glorified and a people made great. Unevenness in the report must be explained by accretions accumulated in cultic usage, rather than by purely literary criteria.

This viewpoint, which Pedersen would extend also to the Sinai covenant sections of Exodus, makes an important emphasis: namely, that a large part of the OT material was used in worship and was transmitted and refracted by this usage. Questions arise, however, regarding the implications of Pedersen's views on Exod. 1–15. Did the cultus originate the epic, or did it simply use and refract it? The question can be argued both ways, but it seems very doubtful whether liturgy creates an epic which has not already been in existence. Furthermore, the question arises as to whether the cultic emphasis actually eliminates the necessity of positing literary fixing of the oral tradition by different circles of the people at different times. It is questionable whether the documentary hypothesis in some form can be completely dismissed by the liturgical and oral-tradition movements; indeed, in their detailed work they seem unable to do away with it completely. The "documents" remain as collections of material, even though it is held that they do not admit of being arranged in an evolutionary scheme.

The same questions arise regarding the liturgical interpretation of the covenant section in chs. 20–24. Gerhard von Rad, e.g. (in Das formgeschichtliche Problem des Hexateuchs [1938]), interprets the whole Sinai tradition as a cultic legend, the Sitz im Leben of which was a cultic festival in which the following liturgical acts can be reconstructed: (a) exhortation (Exod. 19:4-6), with historical presentation of the Sinai events; (b) recitation of the law (Decalogue and Book of the Covenant); (c) the promise of blessing (23:20 ff); and (d) the concluding of the covenant (ch. 24). That these chapters were so used liturgically is most probable. Consequently, literary criticism in itself cannot be expected to solve the basic questions regarding their present form. Yet the problem again arises as to whether the cultic festival has created the tradition or even the material it has used. The cultus transmits, refracts, and combines historical tradition for liturgical purposes in community life, but one cannot assume without question that the tradition, even in all of its written form, was created in and by the cultic ceremonies and their officiants.

Finally, the method of studying such materials as are contained in the historical books of the OT, termed the "history of tradition," may be mentioned. For Martin Noth (see bibliography) the Pentateuchal traditions are to be understood in the first instance as the sacred traditions of the twelve-tribe league on the soil of Palestine during the period of the judges. To penetrate their meaning and history, one must pursue a careful literary analysis to separate the documentary strata of the tradition. Noth's conclusions here are fairly orthodox, though he agrees that J provides the basic literary material, while P gives the framework, and E, though once an independent source, cannot be reconstructed as a continuous document, since it has been used as a supplement to J. Both J and E, however, are derived from a common source, which already contained the basic orientation of the whole within the tribal covenant. Behind this, however, lies the history of the traditions contained in the documents. Five major themes can be isolated, Noth believes, from the various traditions. These are: the Exodus, the entrance into the Promised Land, the promise to the patriarchs, the wilderness wandering, and the revelation on Mount Sinai. The first, fifth, and part of the fourth of these themes are contained in Exodus, and the remaining material, which serves to join them together, is later and artificially contrived to give the whole a unity which the original did not possess. Noth maintains that not even the figure of Moses was originally what connected the themes. Moses was once only a minor tribal sheik, whose grave was encountered by some group on its way into the land, and was only gradually drawn into the traditions.

The question arises, however, as to the proper use of the methodology of form criticism and the history of tradition. One can, indeed, separate the themes or traditions and to a certain extent trace their history within the cultus. But is it possible, without some external checks, to use internal criteria of this sort for historical reconstruction? In cultic practice, e.g., it is true that the exodus and the Sinai themes were separate, because the two seem not to appear together in confessions. Yet what is the proper inference from this fact? Does cultic separation of themes in liturgy mean original historical separation, so that the group involved in the Exodus was not the same as that related to the Sinai experience? In Christian practice a liturgy for Good Friday or Easter may not mention the other events in the church's kerygma, but one cannot infer from such cultic separation of themes that historically they were originally separated.

This is not to say that no historical inferences may be drawn from literary, form-critical, and tradition-history research. Yet the historical tradition lying within and behind the present form of the traditions cannot be reconstructed solely from presuppositions drawn from or imposed upon these methodologies without the use of all factual data and perspectives which archaeology supplies. Only with the latter always in the foreground can hypotheses safely be formulated.

4. Significance. The events recorded in the book of Exodus lie at the very center of Israelite faith and life. The theological significance of these events may be succinctly summarized under the three main headings which constitute the book's content (see § 1 above).

a. God's deliverance from Egyptian slavery. While we cannot be certain as to which tribal groups were involved in the Exodus, we can be quite sure that the tradition was accepted as normative by all members of the twelve-tribe league, and that very early in the nation's life the spring nature festival was "historicized" as the Passover, a celebration of God's act of deliverance. At an early period also the fall olive festival was likewise "historicized" as the Feast of Tabernacles or Booths, the latter symbolizing the life in the wilderness wanderings.

The first thing to observe, then, about the exodus event is that it formed the center of the Israelite confessions of faith and cultic worship. The knowledge of God was communicated in the people's worship, by means of a narrative, wherein historical happenings were related as the great deeds of God, who had brought a people into existence. The Hebrew mind was trained by this manner of communication to view the historical scene as the arena of God's primary self-disclosure, whereas by contrast the polytheist looked to the mythical happenings behind the natural order, in the cultic celebration of which he experienced his religious exaltation. The exodus event ultimately meant for Israel a radical demythologizing of nature as it was interpreted in contemporary polytheism.

Furthermore, the Exodus gave rise to a language which in the Bible as a whole remained central: e.g., "deliver," "redeem," "salvation," "bring out," "lead forth," "mighty acts," "signs and wonders," etc. The event thus became in OT theology a nucleus around which a variety of terms and meanings adhered. In both prophecy and cultic life, therefore, it could be referred to in variant situations, and different meanings could be deduced: e.g., praise of God's majesty and power (Ps. 66); praise of his merciful and gracious nature (Pss. 103:6 ff; 135–36); meditation upon God's love and by contrast Israel's lack of loving obedience (Hos. 11; and note the great narrative hymns in Pss. 78; 106); individual supplication for deliverance from trouble, grounded in the mighty deeds of old (Ps. 77); the first exodus as the basis of hope for the proclamation of a second exodus, this time from Babylonian captivity (Isa. 51:9-11).

A second thing to observe is the manner in which the Exodus determined the people's understanding of the RIGHTEOUSNESS of God. This righteousness was ultimate power acting to save or deliver the weak, the oppressed, the poor, the enslaved. It was not primarily justice distributed according to social status, but redemptive action according to need. Israelite economic life reflected this understanding profoundly, even in the earliest preserved laws. As God is righteous, so Israelites were to be righteous; and this meant economically that weakness and poverty were not to be made into a source of profit by the strong (cf. Exod. 22:25-27), whether the weakness was that of a fellow Israelite or of a stranger ("sojourner") in a status comparable to Israel's in Egypt (22:21).

Finally, it may be recalled that the Israelite conception of ELECTION, of God's choice of Israel to be his "own possession among all peoples, . . . a kingdom of priests and a holy nation" (19:5-6), arose as a primary inference from God's act of deliverance from Egypt. In the OT there is a double tradition of this special election, the Genesis narratives fixing God's choice in the call of Abraham, while other references, particularly in the Prophets, refer it to the exodus period. Yet there can be no doubt that historically the conception of Israel as the chosen people of Yahweh arose in the latter period, though it probably drew on early traditions subsequently interpreted and presented as the time of promise which was partly fulfilled in the Exodus (see bibliography). Furthermore, the exodus event provided the setting in which the relationship between God and people was comprehended. The primary act which called the people into being was by God's gracious initiative, one which Israel could not explain on grounds of merit or requirement. Having been the recipients of this unmerited act of grace, the people were called upon to respond with love and fidelity, while sin took on overtones of faithless infidelity and inhuman betrayal of love. The grace of God and the people's response in this type of relationship appear to be what is involved in that basic word in the Hebrew theological vocabulary, ḥésedh, translated "steadfast love" in the RSV.

b. The Sinai covenant. The election of Israel was given form in the conception of COVENANT—a fact to be inferred, not only from the Sinai traditions, but also from the theological vocabulary, in which legal terms play such a large role. "Covenant" was a pact or treaty between two parties sealed by an oath. Yet there were different kinds of covenants known in Israelite life and in the contemporary world. The simplest were those between two different seminomadic groups, the purpose of which was to prevent intertribal strife (e.g., Gen. 21:27; 26:28; 31:44). The covenant between two individuals is illustrated by the pact of undying friendship between Jonathan and David (I Sam. 18:3; 20:16-17; 23:18). In international politics there were two types of covenant, the parity treaty between equals and the suzerainty treaty between an emperor or suzerain and a vassal.

In Israel the basic terminological pattern revolves around the picture of a divine ruler who reveals his will to a people who as his "servants" are expected to "hearken" (שמע) and to "obey"—i.e., to "serve" (עבד). I.e., the basic symbol used for God is a political one, and the language expressive of the relation between God and people takes form around this symbol. An objection to this view has been that the term "king" for God is rarely, if ever, used in Israel's earliest literature. This is to be explained, however, by the fact that "king" (מלך) in Syria-Palestine referred primarily to the princeling of a city-state, one among many. Yahweh as Ruler, on the other hand, was not one among many; hence the symbolism depicting his "kingship" would be expected to be derived from the emperor figure, the "king of kings," who is not one among many.

On this basis, the one type of ancient covenant that fits Israel's understanding of the relation of God and people is the suzerainty treaty. Indeed, the parallelism between this treaty form and the OT traditions regarding the Mosaic covenant are so remarkable that it is difficult to believe that they are accidental. In this view the covenant document (Exod. 20:1-17; i.e., the "words" [see § 1*b above*]) presents the stipulations of the ruler, defines his interests, and thus becomes the legal policy of the community. Legal tactics, on the other hand, by which the community attempts to carry out the policy, are to be found in the positive law, the "ordinances" (משפטים), which have the position, not of direct, but of mediated, revelation in Israel. The situation in the original covenant differs, however, from that in Judaism, wherein the mass of detailed positive law is considered as a constitution to enforce action. Yet the earlier legal codes in Israel (e.g., Exod. 20:23–23:19) were not constitutional law; like the earlier codes among other peoples, they were compiled for the instruction of the people, and perhaps to unify legal practice. No judge ever decided a case on the basis of the "constitution"; the mentality did not exist at that time for this type of action.

Interpreted in this background, the Mosaic covenant, as the legal form in which self-understanding was provided for Israel, takes on fresh meaning and significance. It explains, e.g., the freedom involved in the early tribal league which led to a resistance of the monarchy. It also provides the setting for legal language to become theological language, and as well for historians and prophets to interpret the history of Israel in the Promised Land in terms of God's controversy with his people. Furthermore, the suzerainty treaty is the only known type of covenant which would have enabled Israel to join "gospel" and "law" together in such close association. This type of treaty, which began with a personal narration of the benevolent acts of the monarch toward the vassal, had as its purpose the binding of ruler and vassal together in a relationship which led the latter to respond from a sense of gratitude, rather than from purely legal necessity. Hence the prologue to the Decalogue binds the Exodus and the covenant together, so that legal obligation in Israel was set within the context of the grace of God, who had redeemed a people from slavery and had become their Lord, Protector, and Guide.

c. The tabernacle. The editor of the older JE material from the circles of the Jerusalem priesthood (P) has appended to the exodus and Sinai covenant narratives a detailed description of the Israelite cultus —i.e., of the place of worship (chs. 25–31; 35–40), the services of worship, the priesthood, and related matters (in Leviticus and Numbers). One of the main reasons for the desire to preserve the TABERNACLE traditions from the nation's earliest times lay in the priestly conception of the meaning of Israel's central sanctuary. This conception is given clear expression in Exod. 29:43-45: "There I will meet with the people of Israel, and it shall be sanctified by my glory. . . . And I will dwell among the people of Israel, and will be their God."

To the Jerusalem priesthood, the holy PRESENCE in the people's midst was what made Israel a people. The tabernacle was the sign and seal of the divine presence, and the place where he could be met and worshiped. The key words for P's theology in the passage quoted above are: "meet," "glory," "dwell." The tabernacle, or "tent of meeting," is interpreted by P as the place where God will meet his people and hallow them. His presence is marked by his "glory," the envelope of brilliance that surrounded him, or a cloud that hid this brilliance from the human eye. By this conception P can affirm the real presence of the Lord in the people's midst, without encountering the danger believed to exist in too intimate a personal encounter. It thus expresses both the hiddenness of God and the knowledge of his "tabernacling" presence in the people's midst. The term "dwell" in priestly theology is for this circle a technical theological expression. It is not the common term used of human "dwelling" in an earthly abode (ישב); the latter is used of God only in relation to his heavenly temple. Because of the problem of expressing the immanence of the transcendent God in an earthly structure, the priests adopted an archaic term that meant "to tent" (שכן). Yahweh does not "dwell" on earth as a human being does; but he has graciously consented to "tent" ("tabernacle") in his people's midst (cf. John 1:14, where the Greek uses the same expression for the Word become flesh).

This richly sacramental conception of Israel's central sanctuary represents an adaptation of the polytheistic conception of the temple as the divine palace on earth, but without the almost materialistic, unspiritualized idea of divine immanence so characteristic of polytheism. Even this adaptation, however, appears to have been unacceptable to the Deuteronomic school, for whom the sanctuary was to be understood as the place which Yahweh chose to have his name "tabernacle," and thus as a symbol of God's accommodation to human need in providing a place to which prayer could be directed (note especially I Kings 8:27 ff). For the priests of Jerusalem, however, the tabernacle tradition represented Yahweh's revelation of himself as the "tabernacling" God, who in the sanctuary could be met and who there would sanctify his people as they worshiped him.

Bibliography. Commentaries: H. Holzinger, KHC (1900). B. Baentsch, HKAT (1903). A. H. McNeile, WC (1908). S. R. Driver, Cambridge Bible (1911). G. Beer and K. Galling, HAT (1939). J. C. Rylaarsdam, IB, vol. I (1952).

Among Introductions to the OT, see especially: O. Eissfeldt (2nd ed.). S. R. Driver. R. H. Pfeiffer. A. Weiser. A. Bentzen. J. E. Carpenter and G. Harford, The Composition of the Hexateuch (1902).

Other works: J. Pedersen, Israel, Its Life and Culture, I–II (1926); III–IV (1940). K. Galling, Die Erwählungstraditionen Israels (1928), on the conception of Israel as the chosen people of Yahweh. M. Noth, Das System der zwölf Stämme Israels (1930), pp. 65-86. G. von Rad, Die Priesterschrift im Hexateuch (1934). W. F. Albright, BASOR, LVIII (1935), 10-18, proposes a chronology of the Exodus. W. Rudolph, Der "Elohist" von Exodus bis Josua (1938). F. M. Cross, BA, X (1947), 65-68. M. Noth, Überlieferungsgeschichte des Pentateuch (1948)—a most important study of the history of traditions of the book of Exodus. T. J. Meek, Hebrew Origins (rev. ed., 1950). M. Noth, Geschichte Israels (2nd ed., 1954). G. E. Mendenhall, Law and Covenant in Israel and the Ancient Near East (1955). W. F. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity (2nd ed., 1957). G. E. Wright, Biblical Archaeology (1957).

G. E. WRIGHT

EXODUS, ROUTE OF. A discussion of the route followed by the people of Israel on their departure from Egypt involves an attempt to comprehend the geographical indications in the books of Exodus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy concerning Israel in the Nile Delta and in the wilderness. It must be confessed at the outset that the biblical record and our knowledge of ancient geography are at many points too imprecise to permit us to construct anything more than reasonable hypotheses.

1. Israel in the Nile Delta. According to the literary critical division of the sources, the first definite geographical notation concerning the Exodus in the older collections of JE is Exod. 13:17-18. Here we are told that God led the people, not by the "land of the Philistines route," though that was near, but by the "Reed Sea [yam sûph; see RED SEA] wilderness route," in order that they might not have to face immediate war. The former is an apparent reference to the main military route along the Sinai coast to Palestine, called by the Egyptians the "Ways of Horus" and defended by a series of fortifications described by Pharaoh Seti I (ca. 1308-1290 B.C.) in his Karnak inscription. It began at the frontier fortress of Zilu, near modern Qantarah, and continued to Raphia in S Palestine. The second route cannot be determined, unless we can fix the location of the "Reed Sea." An Egyptian text mentions two bodies of water near the city of Rameses (Tanis) in the E Delta. One is the "water of Horus" (the Shihor of Isa. 23:3); the other is the "Papyrus Marsh," which recalls the biblical "Reed Sea."

The other geographical notations are those contributed by P, who provided a detailed itinerary as an outline for the older Exodus materials (12:37; 14: 1-2; cf. Num. 33:5-8). According to this information Israel started out from Rameses, journeyed to Succoth, and thence (Exod. 13:20; Num. 33:6) to Etham, on the edge of the wilderness. Once there, the people were commanded to turn back and "encamp in front of Pi-ha-hiroth, between Migdol and the sea, in front of Baal-zephon; you shall encamp over against it, by the sea" (cf. the placement in Num. 33:7: "They set out from Etham, and turned back to Pi-ha-hiroth, which is east of Baal-zephon; and they encamped before Migdol").

With the identification of Rameses with Tanis, as a result of the excavations there of P. Montet since 1929, and of Succoth with Tell el-Mashkutah, the first stage of the journey in this itinerary is clear. Israel went S from Tanis to the Wadi Tumilat, intending to cross the border into the Sinai wilderness by the inland route to Beer-sheba. (If, with a few scholars, Rameses is identified with Qantir, a short distance SW of Tanis, the general meaning and direction of the route remains the same.) Presumably encountering difficulty in breaking through the frontier fortresses (Etham?), they turned back northward the way they had come. The remaining three sites, which, if located, would place exactly the point where the Reed Sea was crossed, are all mentioned in Egyptian inscriptions. A papyrus letter mentioning the god "Baal-zephon and all the gods of Tahpanhes" suggests that a temple of Baal-zephon existed at Tahpanhes (Daphne, modern Tell Defneh), and that this is the location of the exodus site. Pi-ha-hiroth cannot be identified, except that in Exod. 14:2 it would appear to have been E or NE of Daphne. If so, then the crossing of the Reed Sea would have been in the area of, probably to the N of, modern Qantarah (the approximate location of Zilu, the frontier fortress on the "land of the Philistines route"), along the S extension of modern Lake Manzala. Migdol is usually identified with Tell el-Heir, near Pelusium, NW of Qantarah in Sinai, though it is the implication of Exod. 14:2 that it was W, not E, of the sea.

These data suggest that Israel was unable to cross into Sinai by the common routes because of the Egyptian fortresses. To presume that they continued southward to cross near Suez on the Red Sea ignores the implication of the biblical account that they turned back the way they had come after reaching the Wadi Tumilat, and as well the location of Baal-zephon at Daphne. We are thus led to the assumption that the only available way into Sinai was across the shallow waters in the S extension of Lake Manzala. The fact that this was done successfully by remarkable circumstance was celebrated in later Israel as God's greatest act of salvation. That the Reed Sea could not have been a N extension of the Red Sea, has been proved by the recent discovery that the level of the Red Sea has not changed markedly within historical times.

2. Israel in the wilderness. The route through the Sinai wilderness depends, of course, upon the location of the sacred mountain to which Israel journeyed (see SINAI, MOUNT). If it is located in the traditional area among the granite peaks at the S end of the Sinai Peninsula, then Israel would have traveled along the W shore of the Red Sea to the area of Ras Abu Zeneimeh, where the headquarters of modern manganese mining operations are today located, and then have turned inland by a series of valleys to the area of Jebel Musa (Figs. SIN 62-63). While none of the stations of the biblical record can be identified along this route with certainty, the following appear to be the most likely:

The bitter waters of Marah (Exod. 15:22-25; Num. 33:8-9) are usually identified with 'Ain Hawarah, some forty-five to fifty miles S of the tip of the Gulf of Suez, though this source is hard to interpret as being three days' journey from the Reed Sea (Exod. 15:22). Perhaps 'Ain Musa or an unknown spring near the Bitter Lakes, as has been suggested, would be a more fitting location. Elim (Exod. 15:27; Num. 33:9), with its many springs and trees, is probably to be identified with the Wadi Gharandel; the encampment by the Red Sea (Num. 33:10), perhaps at the site of the fifteenth-century Egyptian port of Merkhah, five miles S of Ras Abu Zeneimeh; the Wilderness of Sin (Exod. 16:1; Num. 33:11), a plain along the edge of the Sinai Plateau, Debbet er-Ramleh; Dophkah (Num. 33:12), the Egyptian mining center of Serabit el-Khadim; Rephidim (Exod. 17:1; Num. 33:14), Wadi Rafayid; the encampment in the wilderness of Sinai before the sacred mountain (Exod. 19:1-2; Num. 33:15), the small plain of er-Raha at the foot of that series of peaks of which Jebel Musa is the highest.

The route from Mount Sinai or Horeb to Kadesh-barnea is designated by Deut. 1:19 as "that great and terrible wilderness." It would have followed a series of valleys, between the main Sinai plateau and the coastal chain of mountains of Ezion-geber on the N tip of the Gulf of Aqabah (Num. 33:35), and thence inland, up and over the high ridges lining the Wadi 'Arabah to the area of 'Ain Qedeis and 'Ain Qudeirat in the Judean Negeb. According to Deut. 1:2, this was a journey of eleven days, a distance which closely corresponds to that of Edward Robinson and Eli Smith in 1838 (see bibliography). None of the stations listed in Num. 33:17-35 can be identified with any certainty, unless it be Hazeroth at 'Ain Khadra, a spring some eighteen hours' journey from Sinai according to Abel (see bibliography).

Two general terms are applied in the tradition to the area through which the route passes: the Wilderness of PARAN, encountered after Israel left Sinai (Num. 10:12; 12:16); and the Wilderness of Zin (see ZIN, WILDERNESS OF), in which Kadesh was located (Num. 13:21; 20:1; 33:36). It would appear, however, that the two are not always sharply distinguished, for Kadesh is also said to have been in the Wilderness of Paran (Num. 13:3, 26; Num. 33:36 LXX). Indeed, the latter may have been a much more general term, judging from its application even to the area of Maon and Carmel, NE of Beer-sheba, in I Sam. 25:1.

If the sacred mountain is not to be located in the traditional area at the apex of the Sinai Peninsula, the route of the wilderness wanderings would depend upon its location. If because of its association with the Midianites (Exod. 2:15-16; 3:1) and because of assumed volcanic data behind Exod. 19, Mount Sinai is to be located in Arabia, E of the Gulf of Aqabah, then the route followed from Egypt would have been across the old Mohammedan pilgrim route to Aqabah. If, on the other hand, Sinai is located near Kadesh because of the association of these two in the tradition, then one would presume that the route would have followed the inland road to Beer-sheba. Both roads across Sinai begin at the E end of the Wadi Tumilat by the modern Lake Timsah. In neither case, however, can any of the stations in the biblical route be identified with any known sites along these two routes, at least with any degree of confidence.

Bibliography. E. Robinson, Biblical Researches, I (11th ed., 1856), 60-172. C. W. Wilson and H. S. Palmer, Ordnance Survey of the Peninsula of Sinai (1869-72). W. M. F. Petrie, Researches in Sinai (1906). A. H. Gardiner, Journal of Egyptian Archaeology, vol. 5 (1918), pp. 127-38, 179-200, 242-71; vol. 10 (1924), pp. 87-96; vol. 19 (1933), pp. 122-28. C. S. Jarvis, Yesterday and Today in Sinai (1931). F.-M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine, II (1938), 208-16. W. F. Albright, BASOR, no. 109 (Feb., 1948), pp. 15-16. E. G. Kraeling, Rand McNally Bible Atlas (1956), pp. 100-118. G. E. WRIGHT

EXORCISM [ἐξόρκωσις, from ἐξορκίζω, to bind with an oath, to conjure]; EXORCIST [ἐξορκιστής] (Acts 19:13). The practice of expelling evil spirits from persons or places by means of incantations and the performance of certain occult acts. In the early stages of the Sumero-Akkadian religion evil spirits were considered a separate entity, unrelated to the gods; later, however, they were assumed to be the direct offspring of the cosmic deities, particularly of the sky-god Anu. The evil spirits were believed to be the cause of all kinds of calamities occurring in nature and the bearers of diseases and mental aberrations among men. Once such a spirit took possession of a man, it was the task of the conjuration priest (Akkadian āšipu or kalû), who acted as a messenger of one or several gods, to cast it out of the afflicted body.

The methods employed in exorcising evil spirits were primarily based on sympathetic or imitative magic. The priest would fashion a likeness of the demon (or of the sorcerer who had bewitched the person) in clay, wax, or any other material, and then, after the recitation of certain formulas, destroy it; the principle was that what had happened to the image would also happen to the demon or sorcerer himself. Another technique was to form a likeness of the patient in some plastic material and then induce the evil spirit to leave the sufferer's body and enter into its counterpart. In some cases the priest would also apply medication in the treatment of the possessed person. The following is an excerpt from an Assyrian incantation recited by the sufferer himself.

Incantation. Be off! Be off! Depart! Depart!
Your wickedness like smoke rises heavenward!
By the life of Shamash [the sun-god], the Mighty, verily be ye exorcised!
By the life of Asaruludu [i.e., Marduk], the incantation-priest of the gods, verily be ye exorcised!
By the life of Gira [the fire-god], who consumes you, verily be ye exorcised!
From my body verily may ye separate![1]

Considering the widely held belief in the existence of evil spirits and also in the efficacy of the magicians to dispose of them, it is surprising that the OT maintains complete silence about this branch of magical practice. The only allusion to an "evil spirit" (רוח רעה, always in the singular!) which took possession of a man and "tormented" (בעת) his mind is found in the story of Saul (I Sam. 16:14-16; 18:10; 19:9). However, the melancholy king was relieved from his mental depressions by the skilful playing of the lyre by young David—a performance hardly to be considered an act of exorcism in the classical style. The absence of any direct reference to exorcism in the OT is particularly remarkable, since the postbiblical literature relates the activities of the exorcists as a matter of incontestable fact. The angel Raphael instructed Tobit (6:7, 16-17; 8:3) to ban the evil spirit from the marriage chamber by making a fire and placing on the embers the heart and liver of a fish, and "then the demon will smell it and flee away, and will never again return." Josephus (Antiq. VIII.ii.5) reports: "God granted him [Solomon] knowledge of the art used against demons for the benefit and healing of men. He also composed incantations by which illnesses are relieved, and left behind forms of exorcism with which those possessed by demons drive them out never to return. And this kind of cure is of very great power among us to this day, for I have seen a certain Eleazar, a countryman of mine, in the presence of Vespasian . . . free men possessed by demons." Rabbi Johanan ben Zakkai, a contemporary of Josephus, once prescribed the following technique to expell demons: "Take roots of herbs, burn them under him [the possessed person], and surround him with water, whereupon the spirit will flee" (Pesik. dRK 40*b*).

In the NT evil and unclean spirits are reported to have been exorcised by Jesus and the disciples without recourse to incantations or occult performances. Jesus cast out demons by the "Spirit of God" (Matt. 12:28), and by his own word (Matt. 8:16; Mark 1:25; 5:8; 9:25; etc.). This power to drive out spirits was bestowed by Jesus upon his disciples (Matt. 10:1; Mark 6:7), and they accomplished the charge by invoking his name (Mark 16:17; Acts 16:18; etc.). According to Acts 19:13-14 there were professional Jewish exorcists at Ephesus who tried to expel evil spirits in the name of the Lord Jesus, saying: "I adjure you by the Jesus whom Paul preaches" (see also Mark 9:38).

Like the ancient Babylonian exorcists who invoked the names of the great cosmic deities in their incantations, Babylonian magicians of the first centuries of the Christian era invoked the names of pagan gods (and those of Jewish origin the name of Yahweh) in their attempts to drive out evil spirits (cf. J. A. Montgomery, Aramaic Incantation Texts from Nippur, nos. 9, 26, and particularly 36, which is a close parallel to the Tobit charm).

[1] I. Mendelsohn, ed., Religions of the Ancient Near East (New York: The Liberal Arts Press, Inc.).

Bibliography. G. Meier, Die assyrische Beschwörungssammlung Maqlu (1937); E. Reiner, Šurpu. A Collection of Sumerian and Akkadian Incantations (1958). I. MENDELSOHN

EXPIATION [כפרים, כפרת, כפר; ἱλασμός, ἐξιλασμός, ἐξίλασις, ἱλαστήριον, ἱλάσκεσθαι, ἐξιλάσκεσθαι]; KJV PROPITIATION (see § 1 below). An atoning action which obliterates sin from God's sight and so restores to holiness and the divine favor.

1. Terminology
   a. In biblical Hebrew
   b. In LXX Greek
   c. In NT Greek
2. In the OT
   a. Extraritual expiation
   b. Expiation and the cultus
3. In the NT
   a. The place of expiation
   b. The act of expiation
   c. The sacrifice of expiation

Bibliography

1. Terminology. The word "expiation" occurs only once in the KJV (Num. 35:33 mg.), as does also the verb "expiate" (Isa. 47:11 mg.). In the ERV-ASV "expiation" appears twice in the text (Num. 35:33; Deut. 32:43) and "expiated" four times in the margin (I Sam. 3:14; Isa. 6:7; 22:14; 27:9). Two of these (I Sam. 3:14; Isa. 27:9), in addition to Num. 35:33; Deut. 32:43, are brought into the text of the RSV, in which also "expiation" replaces "propitiation" in Rom. 3:25; Heb. 2:17; I John 2:2; 4:10.

a. In biblical Hebrew. The idea of expiation or ATONEMENT is expressed by the Hebrew verb כפר and its corresponding substantives כפרים and כפרת. The root meaning of כפר, which occurs only in the Pi'el and derivative forms, is uncertain. Some maintain that it means "to cover," like the cognate Arabic word kaphara. The frequent use of כפר as a parallel to the verb כסה, "to cover," gives support to this view (e.g., Pss. 32:1; 85:2; cf. Neh. 4:5; Job 31:33; Prov. 17:9). Others hold that the etymological meaning of כפר is preserved in the Syriac cognate kᵉphar (Pa'el kappar), "to wipe" or "to wipe away," and cite the parallel usage of כפר and מחה, "to blot out" or "to wipe away" (e.g., Jer. 18:23; cf. Ps. 51:1, 9—H 51:3, 11; Isa. 43:25; 44:22). The same meaning is suggested by the Akkadian cognate kuppuru, "to wash away" or "to erase," although it has been maintained that the root meaning of kuppuru includes also the idea of "to cover." It is probable that both meanings are present in כפר. Common to both is the idea of annulling or obliterating sin, and it is in this figurative sense that כפר is used.

b. In LXX Greek. The translators of the LXX usually render כפר by the verb ἱλάσκεσθαι and (more frequently) its intensive compound ἐξιλάσκεσθαι, and the corresponding nouns כפרים and כפרת by ἱλασμός, ἐξιλασμός, ἐξίλασις, and ἱλαστήριον. When translating כפר and its derivatives, these words of the ἱλάσκεσθαι class do not usually have their primary classical meaning of "propitiation" but convey the sense of "expiation," which is only secondary in their classical and Hellenistic use (cf. Plato Laws 862*c*).

c. In NT Greek. In the NT the terms used for "expiation" are the verb ἱλάσκεσθαι and the nouns ἱλασμός and ἱλαστήριον. They always bear the meaning of their LXX, and never of their classical, usage.

2. In the OT. A peculiarity of the Hebrew verb כפר is that "God" is never its object—i.e., it does not, as some have maintained, signify an atoning action directed toward God. Only with reference to a human object, and with a human agent, does it have the meaning of "propitiation." In its general sense of "making atonement" it signifies an action which is directed toward sin or ceremonial uncleanness (e.g., Pss. 65:3; 78:38; Isa. 6:7; Jer. 18:23). The action may take place before or in the presence of God (Lev. 6:7—H 5:26; 14:18, 29, 31; 15:30; 19:22; Num. 31:50), but it is never directed toward him.

a. Extraritual expiation. When expiation is not linked with the cultus, it is usually a direct act of God—he is the subject who expiates or atones—and the object of the act of expiation is the sin or offense, which is thus "covered" or "erased" by God himself from his own sight (cf. Pss. 32:1; 51:9; Isa. 43:25; 44:22; Jer. 18:23). The verb כפר has then the sense of "to treat as covered (or wiped away)" and hence "to forgive" (e.g., Pss. 65:3; 78:38; 79:9; 85:2—H 85:3; Jer. 18:23; Ezek. 16:63; cf. Isa. 6:7). This expresses clearly the realization that only God can remove man's sin, and that God's forgiveness is not conditional upon any human act of propitiation but springs from his own initiative and has its source in his own mercy and grace (cf. Pss. 78:38; 79:9; Mic. 7:18).

There are a few instances where extraritual expiation is effected through the intervention of a human agent who is identified with his people and yet is particularly zealous toward God. After the breach of the covenant through the worship of the golden calf, the divine wrath is expressed in slaughter and plague, but expiation is brought about through the prayer of Moses (Exod. 32:30-34). It is not his intercession which of itself expiates; rather, through his identification with the people Moses expresses their penitence, so that God can now put away their sin (cf. Gen. 18:23-33; Num. 14:11-20; Amos 7:4-6). An example of a different kind occurs in Num. 25:6-13, where Phinehas makes expiation for Israel's participation in the sensual worship of Baal-peor by killing an Israelitish man and a Midianitish woman engaged in ritual prostitution. Expiation is made possible because by his zeal Phinehas has expressed the divine revulsion against sin. Again, expiation is effected through the execution by the Gibeonites of seven sons of Saul, because this tragic act expresses God's justice in the land (II Sam. 21:1-14; cf. Num. 35:32-33; Aaron's burning of incense, by which the plague was stayed [Num. 16:46-48], is really an example of ritual expiation).

These instances set forth the principle that God does not, in forgiving sin, condone it. Expiation may involve an expression of the divine wrath and a participation on the part of some representative man in God's righteous anger. Repentance and trust in the divine mercy are required of those whose sin is expiated.

b. Expiation and the cultus. In the later literature of the OT expiation is closely associated with cultic rites. In such cases the subject who makes expiation is the divinely appointed priest or high priest (e.g., Lev. 4:20, 26, 31, 35; 5:10, 13, 16, 18; 6:7; 7:7; 16:6, 11, 16-18, 24, 32-33; I Chr. 6:49; II Chr. 29:24; Neh. 10:33; Ezek. 43:20, 26). When an offering only is mentioned (Exod. 30:15-16; Lev. 1:4; 17:11; Num. 31:50; 35:33), it is still by implication the priest who is the subject. The sin or offense is no longer the direct object, but expiation is made for or on behalf of (בעד or על) the individual or the community; or the verb is used absolutely as a technical term, "to make expiation," the object being unexpressed. It is only construed with a direct object when applied to something material—e.g., the altar of incense (Exod. 30:10), the altar of burnt offering (Exod. 29:36-37; Lev. 8:15; 16:18, 20, 33; Ezek. 43:20, 26), the sanctuary (Lev. 16:16, 20, 33; Ezek. 45:20). In such cases it has the sense of cleansing or purifying (cf. the LXX rendering of καθαρίζειν for כפר in Exod. 29:37; 30:10, and of καθαρισμός for כפרים in Exod. 29:36; 30:10).

The common ritual means by which expiation is made is sacrifice (see SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS), which is to be understood, not in terms of propitiation, but in terms of sacrament. God himself provides the means of expiation, through which his forgiveness is made real and appropriated (Lev. 17:11).

3. In the NT. The work of Christ is referred to in terms of expiation four times in the NT (Rom. 3:25; Heb. 2:17; I John 2:2; 4:10). On each occasion the word used is one of the ἱλάσκεσθαι class, by which the LXX renders the Hebrew word כפר and its derivatives, and these Greek words are to be understood in terms of their LXX use. The work of Christ is therefore represented, not as the propitiation by the Son of the Father's wrath, but as the divine act of "covering" or "blotting out" sin, since "God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself" (II Cor. 5:19).

a. The place of expiation. In Rom. 3:25 Paul says that God has put forward Christ "as an expiation by his blood" (ὃν προέθετο ὁ θεὸς ἱλαστήριον . . . ἐν τῷ αὐτοῦ αἵματι). Grammatically ἱλαστήριον could be either an adjective in the singular masculine or a neuter noun. In the LXX, however, it regularly translates the Hebrew substantive כפרת, the lid of the ark or MERCY SEAT (Exod. 25:17-22; Lev. 16:14-15; cf. Heb. 9:5). This was the place of expiation on which the blood was sprinkled by the high priest on the Day of Atonement (see ATONEMENT, DAY OF). Thus the cross of Christ is represented by Paul as the place where God's forgiving mercy is manifested in the annulling of sin.

b. The act of expiation. The writer of the Letter to the Hebrews portrays Christ as the great High Priest whose work is "to make expiation for the sins of the people" (εἰς τὸ ἱλάσκεσθαι τὰς ἁμαρτίας τοῦ λαοῦ; Heb. 2:17). This is a rendering of the Hebrew term לכפר. Christ is therefore represented as performing an atoning act by which man's sin is "covered" or "blotted out."

c. The sacrifice of expiation. The word ἱλασμός occurs twice in I John. Christ is said to be the "expiation for our sins" (ἱλασμός περὶ τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν ἡμῶν; I John 2:2; 4:10). Although the Johannine letters are not influenced by LXX usage to the same extent as Romans and Hebrews, it is noteworthy that both the noun ἱλασμός and the phrase τὸ περὶ ἁμαρτίας are used in the LXX to translate the Hebrew substantive חטאת, "sin offering." This is clearly the meaning of ἱλασμός here. It is supported by the earlier reference to the blood of Jesus cleansing from all sin (I John 1:7), since in the LXX καθαρίζειν twice renders כפר (Exod. 29:37; 30:10) and appears as a synonym for ἱλάσκεσθαι. Christ is thus portrayed as a "sin offering," which is the divinely ordained sacrifice most closely related to the expiation of sin.

In this way Christ "fulfils" the OT conception of expiation. He is both Priest and sacrificial Victim, and at his cross atonement is made for the sin of the world.

Bibliography. E. Riehm, Der Begriff der Sühne im AT (1877); H. Schultz, "Sacred Ceremonies," OT Theology, I (English trans., 1892), 397-400; W. R. Smith, "The Deuteronomic Code and the Levitical Law," The OT in the Jewish Church (1892), pp. 380-81; A. B. Davidson, "The Word 'Atone' in Extra-ritual Literature," Exp., Fifth Series, vol. X (1899), pp. 92-103, a valuable discussion reproduced with some slight alterations in "Atonement and Forgiveness," The Theology of the OT (1904), pp. 315-56; S. R. Driver, "Expiation and Atonement (Hebrew)," in J. Hastings, ed., Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, V (1908), 653-59; G. B. Gray, "Sacrifice, Propitiation, and Expiation," Sacrifice in the OT (1925), pp. 55-95; C. H. Dodd, "Atonement," The Bible and the Greeks (1935), pp. 82-95, by far the most important and exhaustive study of the use of words of the ἱλάσκεσθαι class in the LXX; V. Taylor, "Sacrifice," Jesus and His Sacrifice (1937), pp. 49-53; A. G. Hebert, "Atone, Atonement," in A. Richardson, ed., A Theological Word Book of the Bible (1950), pp. 25-26; R. Abba, "Sacrifice," The Nature and Authority of the Bible (1958), pp. 230-37; E. Jacob, "Sin and Redemption," Theology of the OT (English trans., 1958), pp. 293-94; T. C. Vriezen, "The Cult," An Outline of OT Theology (English trans., 1958), pp. 286-301.

R. ABBA

EXTORTION [עשק (Ps. 62:10—H 62:11; Ezek. 22:7, 12; EXTORTED PRACTICE; EXTORTION in Ezek. 18:18; 22:29); ἁρπαγή (KJV RAVENING in Matt. 23:25; Luke 11:39]; EXTORTIONER [ἅρπαξ (Luke 18:11; alternately ROBBER)]. A psalmist who may have been a person of some position warns against confidence in the methods of extortion and robbery; power thus gained will give rise to delusive hopes (62:10—H 62:11). Confidence in such methods is the antithesis to trust in God, who can bring worthy aims to fruition (62:1 ff). The way of extortion and rapacity cannot be depended on for salvation (49:5-15). Extortion is one of the crimes listed by Ezekiel in conjunction with his exposition of the doctrine that God deals justly and retributively with every individual (18:18); in other references he suggests that extortion was a common crime among his contemporaries (22:7, 12, 29). Similar charges of extortion, rapacity, and wickedness were leveled against the Pharisees by Jesus (Matt. 23:25; Luke 11:39; cf. 18:11).

H. F. BECK

EYE [עין; ὄμμα, ὀφθαλμός]. The eye has far less theological significance in the Bible than the EAR. Like the ear, the eye may occasionally be used to represent the whole process of cognition and understanding, as in Jer. 5:21. It is frequently used in the sense of "judgment" or "opinion" (Prov. 3:7; Jer. 7:11). On rare occasions it may "see" God, as in Isa. 6:5, although this privilege is usually accorded to it in an eschatological context (Isa. 33:17; Ezek. 38:23; cf. Rev. 1:7).

More frequently the eye is merely the ordinary, physical eye, represented either as seeing or as expressing mental attitudes or emotion, especially sorrow. The expression of sorrow is a natural activity of the eye, since, next to the faculty of vision, the production of tears is its most characteristic function (Ps. 119:136; Jer. 9:1). Brightness of the eyes is a sign of physical and emotional well-being (I Sam. 14: 27; Ps. 38:10), as dimness is a symptom of its opposite (Job 17:7). The eyes can express arrogance (Prov. 6:17), humility (Ps. 123:2), pity (Ezek. 16:5), and mockery (Prov. 30:17). The term "eye" is often used in such a way as to be almost synonymous with "desire" or "lust" (Prov. 17:24; Eccl. 4:8; II Pet. 2: 14).

The phrase "evil eye" does not refer to magical practices, but to the eye which expresses the stingy or envious disposition of its owner (Prov. 23:6 KJV; Mark 7:22 KJV).

See also SEEING. R. C. DENTAN

EYE PAINT. Painting around the eye was common in ancient Egypt and Babylonia, but among the Hebrews it is mentioned chiefly in connection with women of ill repute.

1. Biblical references
2. Materials
3. Receptacles
4. Application
5. Purpose

Bibliography

1. Biblical references. The word פּוּךְ with the meaning "black eye paint" is used three times in the Bible: II Kings 9:30 says that Jezebel (the Sidonian princess who married Ahab) "painted [lit., 'applied eye paint to'] her eyes" (not KJV "face"), in her effort to be attractive to Jehu. In Jer. 4:30 Jerusalem, personified as a harlot, is said to "enlarge" her "eyes [not KJV 'face'] with paint." One of Job's daughters is called Keren-happuch, meaning "horn of eye paint" (Job 42:14).

In Ezek. 23:40 the harlot Oholibah, representing unfaithful Jerusalem, paints her eyes. The verb here used is כחל, and from the same root is the Arabic kuḥl, meaning "eye paint."

It will be noted that most of these references associate eye-painting among the Hebrews with women of evil character. Prov. 6:25; Isa. 3:16 refer to wanton glances, not to eye-painting.

2. Materials. In ancient Egypt the commonest materials were malachite (a green ore of copper), used especially in the early period, and later galena (a dark gray ore of lead, sulphide of lead, PbS), which became the more common. An Egyptian name for the latter, sdemet, was borrowed by the Greeks in the form στίμμι and by the Romans in the form stibium (which refers, however, to antimony trisulphide; see below). As early as the Neolithic period in Egypt individuals prepared their own powder by grinding the ore on palettes, usually of slate. Later the powder was evidently prepared commercially. In Babylonia the eye paint gukhlu, related to Arabic kuḥl, was usually stibnite, antimony trisulphide (Sb_2S_3). This is listed as part of the tribute of King Hezekiah to Sennacherib in the latter's annals. In Egypt today eye paint is made not only from lead ore but also from burned frankincense, almond shells, or safflower. The biblical references above are probably to a powdered mineral, either galena or stibnite.

3. Receptacles. The name of Job's daughter, Keren-happuch (Job 42:14; see § 1 above) indicates that eye paint could be kept in a horn. In ancient Egypt the dry powder was kept in reeds, reedlike tubes of stone or metal, and especially in small jars of alabaster. Sometimes the powder was made into paste and kept in a shell, both in Egypt and in Babylonia. For Palestinian cosmetic bowls or palettes, see COSMETICS § 5.

4. Application. In ancient Egypt a little rod made of wood, ivory, or metal was first moistened in water (perhaps scented, as at present) and then dipped into

Courtesy of the Oriental Institute, the University of Chicago

39. Queen Nefert-iti, cast of a sculptor's model from Tell el-Amarna, showing use of eye paint the powder. The resulting paste adhering to the rod was drawn around the eye, prolonging the outer corner, and over the eyebrow. Sometimes green malachite was used under the eye and black for the rest. Metal and ivory applicators ("kohl sticks") are found in Palestine excavations. Fig. EYE 39.

5. Purpose. The cosmetic purpose of eye paint was to emphasize the eye and to make it appear larger and more almond-shaped. It was also thought to protect the eyes from glare and disease.

Bibliography. S. Hille, "Ueber den Gebrauch und Zusamensetzung der orientalischen Augenschminke," ZDMG, V (1851), 236-42. E. W. Lane, An Account of the Manners and Customs of the Modern Egyptians (5th ed., 1871), I, 45-46. S. Krauss, Talmudische Archäologie, I (1910), 238-40. B. Meissner, "Das Antinomgebirge," OLZ, XVII (1914), 52-55; Babylonien und Assyrien, I (1920), 244, 347. A. Erman and H. Ranke, Aegypten und aegyptisches Leben im Altertum (1923), pp. 257-58, 312, 349, 605, 610, 612. G. Dalman, Arbeit und Sitte, V (1937), 343, 351. L. Koehler, "Alttestamentliche Wortforschung.

Pūk," Theologische Zeitschrift, III (1947), 314-18. A. Lucas, Ancient Egyptian Materials and Industries (3rd ed., 1948), pp. 99-103. R. J. Forbes, Studies in Ancient Technology, III (1955), 17-20, 39-40. J. A. THOMPSON

EYELIDS OF THE MORNING [עפעפי־שחר] (Job 3:9); KJV DAWNING OF THE DAY. Alternately: EYELIDS OF THE DAWN (Job 41:18—H 41:10). A term usually taken poetically as a figure referring to the first streaks of light which herald the rising sun. The term is used in the OT only in conjunction with references to Leviathan, a marine monster, different versions of which figured prominently in ancient Egyptian and Semitic mythology. Men were powerless before this monster, which they could neither capture nor control and whose extraordinary strength, gnashing teeth, and gleaming eyes terrorized them (Job 41:1 ff; cf. Ps. 74:14).

Leviathan was one of the several symbols of the forces of the primeval chaos (Job 26:12; Pss. 74:13-14; Enoch 60:7-9; II Esd. 6:49-52; cf. Ps. 104:26). According to many ancient traditions this dragon or monster was capable of causing eclipses by swallowing the sun and moon or by surrounding them with his coils, perhaps even of controlling the day and the night. Among the ancient Egyptians, Sukhos, the crocodile which was the incarnation of the god Sebak, was pictured riding on the back of the rising sun; in later tradition he was regarded as the darkness of the night, which triumphed over the sun. In Egyptian hieroglyphics the eye of the crocodile represents the dawn, and Egyptian records mention that the reddish eyes of the crocodile are seen under the water before the animal comes to the surface.

OT writers, perhaps without believing in the existence of these living monsters, used them as poetic images with which to express more forcefully the idea of God's control over the forces of nature.

H. F. BECK

EZAR ē′zər. KJV form of EZER 1 in I Chr. 1:38.

EZBAI ĕz′bī [אזבי] (I Chr. 11:37). The father of Naarai, who was one of the Mighty Men of David known as the "Thirty." However, in II Sam. 23:35*b* Naarai the son of Ezbai is called Paarai the Arbite. It would seem that "the son of Ezbai" (I Chr. 11:37) is a corruption of "the Arbite" (II Sam. 23:35*b*) and that the original name in the list was Naarai the Arbite.

Bibliography. J. W. Rothstein, "Das erste Buch der Chronik," KAT (1927); W. Rudolph, "Chronikbücher," HAT (1955). E. R. DALGLISH

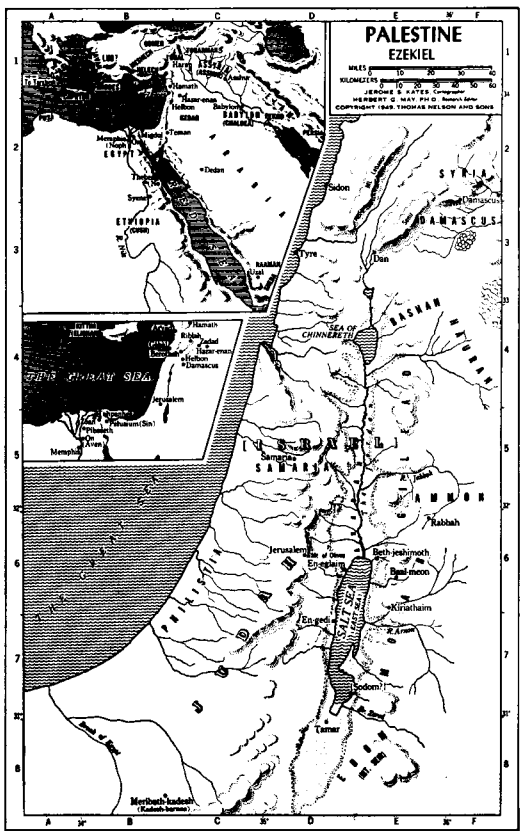
EZBON ĕz′bŏn [אצבן or אצבון]. 1. Eponym of a family of the tribe of Gad (Gen. 46:16); called Ozni in Num. 26:16.

2. According to the text, a Benjaminite family (I Chr. 7:7); but I Chr. 7:6-11 is, most likely, a genealogy of Zebulun assigned to Benjamin by error.

H. H. GUTHRIE, JR.

EZECHIAS ĕz′ə kī′əs. Douay Version form of HEZEKIAH.

EZECHIEL ĭ zē′kyəl. Douay Version form of EZEKIEL.



EZECIAS. KJV Apoc. form of HEZEKIAH.

EZEKIEL ĭ zē′kyəl [יחזקאל, God strengthens; Ιεζέκιηλ]. A prophet of the Babylonian exile; son of the priest Buzi (1:3). The book appears after Jeremiah in the Hebrew canon and after Lamentations in the versions.

A. Author
B. Historical background
C. Locale
D. Date and composition
  1. Date of writing
  2. Editing
  3. Present arrangement
  4. Chs. 40-48
E. General content
  1. Outline
  2. Major themes
    a. Consequences of the absence of God from life
    b. God as the key to life
    c. God as ruler of history
    d. Individual responsibility
    e. History as vindication of God's character
    f. The inner quality of true religion
  3. Place in development of the Hebrew faith
  4. Relationship to the rise of Judaism
  5. Influence on NT thought
  6. Literary figures
F. Apocalyptical and clairvoyant elements
  1. Reason for apocalyptic
  2. Abnormal personality
G. Canonicity
H. Text
Bibliography

A. AUTHOR. Traditionally the author of the book entitled Ezekiel has been thought to be none other than Ezekiel himself, who was a part of that company of Jews carried captive in 598 B.C. by Nebuchadrezzar. This young man, who grew up in the environs of the Jerusalem temple, was the son of a Zadokite priest, Buzi, and in all probability was himself being trained for the priesthood or possibly had already taken the robes of office. In any event, when Jehoiachin surrendered to the armies of Nebuchadrezzar (II Kings 24:10-17) in 598 B.C., Ezekiel was among that unhappy band who made the torturous trek to Mesopotamia. Some of the captives who survived the march were settled by the Canal CHEBAR at a place called TEL-ABIB (til-abûbû, "hill of the storm god"), where the Jewish community eked out a bare existence. Exactly what the future prophet did during the early years of captivity is not known. Unlike his contemporary, Jeremiah, he was married, but little else of his personal life is a matter of record.

In the year 593 somewhere in Mesopotamia, during a thunderstorm, Ezekiel saw his wondrous vision of God and received the call to be a prophet to Israel. The natural setting for the vision was a great cloud from the N (1:4); the living creatures were like a "flash of lightning" (1:14); the noise of heavenly beings was similar to the noise of "many waters" (1:24), while the throne of God had the appearance of a "bow that is in the cloud" (1:28). Obviously the conscious and subconscious had an inevitable interplay which created a great vision of the chariot of God moving where it would. Ezekiel's vision of wheels within wheels, far from being only a grotesque image with little meaning, symbolized the profound insight that God was not imprisoned or immobilized but could move where he wished. Prophet and people undoubtedly had assumed that God was native to Palestine and that his home was the temple, but Ezekiel perceived that the divine presence recognized no terrestrial boundary or barrier. Undoubtedly the four faces of a man, a lion, an ox, and an eagle symbolically dramatize God's reign over every area of human and animal life. The vision rightly understood represents a high point in divine revelation and human insight.

Having seen a vision, the son of Buzi then received his call to service as a prophet to the people. Whether he was called to prophesy to the inhabitants who remained in Jerusalem or to the people who were his immediate congregation in Tel-Abib has become a major area of difficulty for students of the book. Some scholars maintain that the prophet returned to Jerusalem after his call and actually lived in that doomed city during the time of his prophesying to the inhabitants of it. The traditional view, however, has always held that Ezekiel was in Babylonia for the entire time of his prophetic ministry. Whether his residence was Tel-Abib or Jerusalem, there can be no doubt that his prophecies were largely directed to the inhabitants of Jerusalem until the fall of that city in 587.

Ezekiel was reluctant to be a prophet. The symbolic scroll which he had to eat was at first bitter but in time became sweet (cf. ch. 2). Words he was reluctant to speak for God became delectable. He was appointed a watchman for the house of Israel, being made responsible for her spiritual survival. However, the call meant that whether the people would hear or not was of no major consequence: they would know that a prophet had been among them. This would guarantee their chance to repent and justify God's judgment upon the unrepentant.

Apparently the prophet was subject to visionary trances when for a long time he would remain motionless and uncommunicative. It is possible that he was silent for long periods of time, but the evidence is not strong enough for such an unequivocal conclusion (cf. 3:26-27; 33:21-22). During the years of prophetic activity a great personal sorrow came into the life of Ezekiel on the occasion of his wife's death, but with stoic self-control he used the tragedy to drive home a major spiritual message to the people (cf. 24:15-24). In the period that followed the destruction of Jerusalem, when the tone of his message changed from judgment to restoration, this pastor of the exiled congregation became much appreciated as a most excellent preacher whose message was a "love song" and whose voice was "beautiful" (cf. 33:32). Having spoken doom, he looked to the future with great hope, because God's spirit could blow on death to bring life, and because in the restored land "God was there."

In Ezekiel the man there is a strange hybridization of the priest and the prophet, a fact which has often been noticed in studies of this spiritual leader. Yet the priestly and prophetic facets of his make-up were not antithetical, as has sometimes been supposed. True, the priestly element can be clearly detected in many places where liturgical exactitude is reflected, but the prophetic fire always remains in this man as one who had seen a vision of God's chariot. Of more importance than the elements of priest and prophet which mingled in one personality is the fact that he was a man of transition between pre-exilic faith and postexilic religion. He was the product of a faith which was rooted in the soil of Palestine; at the same time he was compelled to worship God without temple or priesthood, and to affirm the existence of a holy people without a land. This conflict is the key to the personality of the man and the measure of his greatness.

Literarily Ezekiel rose to tremendous heights of poetic beauty but quickly reverted to the most prosaic style. His figures of speech and his use of stories are unequaled elsewhere in the OT. Symbolism and reality meet in his creative mind and mingle to make him a literary giant and to label his work an artistic masterpiece. But, as is true of all men of genius, his personality was often enigmatic and his work was not simple.

B. HISTORICAL BACKGROUND. One major aim of the Josianic reform (621 B.C.) was to centralize worship in the temple at Jerusalem. As a result, priests like Jeremiah of Anathoth, who issued from Abiathar, lost their status overnight. On the contrary, the Zadokite family, to which Buzi the father of Ezekiel belonged, now constituted the recognized priesthood, in charge of true worship at Jerusalem, without competitive interference from provincial shrines. However, Josiah's reform did not last. In 609 the king died at Megiddo, and the reform movement died with him. After 605 Jehoiakim supported the Chaldean regime for a few years but finally revolted. Jehoiachin, his successor, after a three-month reign, had to surrender the city of Jerusalem to the armies of Nebuchadrezzar (598). It was in the exile which followed that Ezekiel went to Babylonia. Zedekiah (Mattaniah) became king in the land (598-587), but after ca. eight years he also revolted. His rebellion was summarily crushed, and Jerusalem was utterly destroyed in 587.

Ezekiel's early youth witnessed a quick revival of "pure religion" following the discovery of some portions of DEUTERONOMY. However, the military failure of Josiah brought syncretism back into vogue; society was corrupted from within and from without. As had been the case for centuries, Palestine was a pawn between two large empires. Geographically the land was a bridge linking the two great population centers of Mesopotamia and Egypt. There were pro-Egyptian and pro-Chaldean parties active in Jerusalem in the days of Zedekiah and before. The population always seemed to feel that one great power would counterbalance the other, or when one dominated, it was anticipated that the other would deliver. The multitudes of ordinary citizenry thus looked in hope for deliverance from sources which could not deliver, and false security prevented moral and religious response to the prophetic voice.

C. LOCALE. The problem of setting for the Ezekiel prophetic ministry is not an easy one to solve; this fact is evidenced by an increasingly wide diversity of opinion. Traditionally the prophet has been understood as a member of the exile community at Tel-Abib, where his visions were seen and his oracles were uttered. Yet the major part of his message in chs. 1–24 is admittedly directed to the people in Jerusalem, which he calls a "bloody city." Indeed, he was called to prophesy to the "rebellious house" —in all likelihood the people in Palestine who were ruled over by Zedekiah and who remained in Judah. His prophecies seem to have little relevance to the Tel-Abib community. Having Ezekiel speak his word in Babylonia but direct it to an audience which neither sees nor hears him is out of keeping with the concept of a prophet's standing immediately before those to whom he is speaking. Furthermore, the fact that the exilic prophet possessed such intimate knowledge of events and people in the Holy City makes acceptance of a Babylonian locale quite difficult. The prophet seems to walk in Jerusalem (cf. ch. 8), and his words apparently have immediate effect on the inhabitants of the doomed city (11:13-14). Finally, his symbolic actions would have had little meaning in any place but Palestine. These facts bulk large as one seeks to understand how the traditional view of Babylonian locale could stand under careful scrutiny.

As a result of the above consideration, a number of alternative views present themselves: (a) Quite a large and distinguished number of scholars declare that Ezekiel was called to prophesy in Palestine and that his entire prophetic ministry was fulfilled in the Holy Land. These feel that the Babylonian locale was created out of imagination by a "Babylonian editor." Likewise, some students consider Ezekiel's figure to have been fictitious, while others maintain that he lived in Palestine at a much earlier or later date, but all identify the locale as Palestine whether the prophet's personality is historical or not. (b) A second group solves the problem by putting Ezekiel first in Mesopotamia, then back in Palestine, and finally again in exile. Ezekiel thus is understood as having received the first vision in Mesopotamia (ch. 1), but his call to speak to a rebellious house (ch. 2) and to be a watchman (ch. 3) led him to return to Palestine. So he went back and remained there until the destruction of Jerusalem in 587. (c) A number of competent scholars, perhaps a majority, still hold that Babylonia is the correct locale for the prophetic ministry, though they deny him any such power as clairvoyance.

There are many Babylonian elements in the text which can hardly be excised. The inaugural vision is among the exiles, and Ezekiel sits overwhelmed among them. When he is said to go to Jerusalem (e.g., 8:3), does he actually visit there, or is he experiencing a spiritual transport? Much of the material in the book is clearly visionary, and as such would be just as relevant at Tel-Abib as at Jerusalem. The initial call belongs to this type (1:4–3:15), as also the grotesque description of the siege and fall of Jerusalem (chs. 8–11). The vision of the Valley of Dry Bones (37:1-14) and the vision of the temple restored (chs. 40–48) do not require Ezekiel's physical presence in either place. There is nothing unusual about an exile's walking in the spirit through the familiar streets of his home city, witnessing those forces in action which he remembers well and news of which he receives regularly from travelers.

Ezekiel did receive a call in Babylonia and did fulfil his mission among the exiles. To the prophet there was but one Israel, to whom he spoke whether present or far away, and it was a matter of no importance that some of the chosen people were living in Palestine and some in Babylonia. In fact, the exiles were no less a rebellious house than were those who still lived at home, for both groups had refused to obey God. Though his prophecies of doom had reference to the city of Jerusalem and its inhabitants, still there was a real relevance to the exile community. At Tel-Abib many people kept alive the hope that they would soon return to their homeland, but Ezekiel's words and symbolic actions put an end to any such illusion. Moreover, there were lines of communication open between Palestine and Tel-Abib (see Jer. 29): both the words and the actions of Ezekiel could reach the ears of the Jerusalem community.

Small bits of evidence serve, not to demonstrate, but to strengthen the case for a Babylonian locale. In Babylonia, not in Palestine, it was normative to draw city maps on clay tablets as the prophet does in ch. 4. Moreover, the wall through which the prophet dug (12:1-6) was undoubtedly a mud-brick wall native to Mesopotamia, not a stone wall common in the hill country of Palestine.

Mullo-Weir (see bibliography) points out that בקעה is the word used for "valley," not נחל or עמק as one might expect for Palestine, and that this usage also represents strong evidence for a Babylonian locale. The same term refers to the wide valley or plain of Shinar in Gen. 11:2, where the Mesopotamian atmosphere is unmistakable. Actually the positing of a Palestinian locale raises the problem of the Babylonian atmosphere, which all but saturates the book from the imagery in ch. 1 onward.

Finally, there is little reason to doubt the traditional view since the Jews would have been very reluctant to have a genuine prophet speak outside the land, if in fact there were not overpowering evidence for such a conclusion. All sorts of rationalizations were devised to explain how God appeared to a prophet in a pagan land. Ezekiel was transported to Jerusalem by the Spirit of God, but he was always physically present in Tel-Abib, while his detailed knowledge of the city which was home and the center of faith permitted him exact visions of the events going on in the city. Such details as are found in chs. 8; 11 probably were drawn from memory, since close scrutiny reveals round numbers and generalizations. The problem of Pelatiah's death (11:1-13) looms large, for in this case, at least, there was an actual death brought on by the denunciation of Ezekiel. The ancient Hebrews' ideas of cause and effect were somewhat different from ours. Who can say whether Pelatiah was in Jerusalem or Tel-Abib?

There is a strange fluidity between the visionary and the real in this prophecy. The Spirit of Yahweh is said to have transported Ezekiel to the E gate of the temple, where he saw twenty-five men, one of whom was Pelatiah the son of Benaiah (11:1-2). It is possible that Pelatiah, though seen in vision by the E gate, actually lived at Tel-Abib. The wicked counsel given coincides with that of the false prophet in Jer. 28, and the warning of Ezekiel is similar to that of Jeremiah's letter to the exiles (Jer. 29). Indeed, if Ezekiel called the city a caldron (Ezek. 24:6; RSV "pot"), then why is the same expression considered evil counsel when spoken by another? Ezek. 11:3 should be rendered: "The building of houses is not near. This is the caldron, and we are the flesh." Reference here is to the exile community and to the easy optimism which predicted a quick return home, obviating the need to build houses. Jerusalem, however, according to Ezekiel, will not stand but will be utterly decimated. Hearing this, Pelatiah falls dead in Tel-Abib, where his evil counsel has been devised. This hypothetical approach, properly developed, might not only answer the Pelatiah problem but also help ch. 11 make sense.

The conclusion which must be reached, on the basis of cumulative evidence, is that Ezekiel, as tradition maintains, was a prophet among the exiles in Babylonia, and there he was called to be the spokesman of God, both to his immediate company and to the Judeans who remained in the land of Palestine.

D. DATE AND COMPOSITION. 1. Date of writing. A number of dates have been proposed for the composition of this prophetic work. Of course, not all students or scholars agree that the book is in any degree a single effort of one person, for a considerable number understand it to be a composite from several sources.

For this group the segments of the work are variously dated. C. C. Torrey seriously proposed in his Pseudo-Ezekiel and the Original Prophecy that the book is a pseudepigraphon based on II Kings 21:2-16, written in 230 B.C. with a Palestinian setting. However, this historical novel was edited before 200 B.C. and given a Babylonian locale. Thus to Torrey the entire work is non-historical, as is its chief character, Ezekiel himself. This is part and parcel of the Torrey view on the whole exilic period, which he sees as a ripple, not a wave, in history. James Smith, a Scottish scholar, holds that the prophet really spoke to the N kingdom of Israel in the time of King Manasseh, and not to Judah or to the Exile at all. Others, especially Nils Messel, date the prophecy in the time of Ezra-Nehemiah, while Lawrence E. Browne has suggested Alexander the Great as the figure around which history was moving when these words were uttered and recorded.

The modified traditional view is that Ezekiel the book is the product directly or indirectly of Ezekiel the man. For some time certain scholars who otherwise recognize the integrity of the prophecy have called in question the Ezekielian authorship of chs. 38–39, the so-called Gog-Magog passages, and chs. 40-48, which picture in vision the land restored. There is, as we shall have occasion to see, real reason for such a conclusion, but evidence is still strong that these passages belong to the Ezekiel cycle of thought.

A number of arguments usually presented as evidence prove to be nothing more than assumptions. E.g., it has been long understood that the Aramaisms of this prophecy indicated a late date. Moreover, most writers were content to accept the unqualified assertion that the book was linguistically saturated with Aramaic influence. Upon investigation, one quickly discovers that Aramaic was the lingua franca of the Assyrian Empire from the last half of the eighth century onward. Its presence in any composition cannot, therefore, be taken as evidence for a fourth-century date. On the contrary, some Aramaic influence could be expected in both the seventh and the sixth centuries. The grand assumption thus falls to the ground. More interesting is the extent of Aramaic in Ezekiel. So far as actual vocabulary is concerned, only nine definite Aramaic roots appear, two of which, סגן and פחה, were drawn from earlier Aramaic lingua franca. Nine other words may be related to Aramaic, but are more probably to be understood as products of a general Semitic vocabulary. Morphologically, the influence is stronger, as is evidenced in verb forms, noun endings, and pronominal alterations. This is what one would expect to find in a bilingual situation where an Aramaic-using scribe, writing Hebrew, would inadvertently make a considerable number of formal mistakes. In syntax the Aramaic influence is negligible if it exists at all. Thus the extent of Aramaic influence amounts to what one would expect among the exiles in the first half of the sixth century. In no case can its presence or extent be mustered as evidence for a late date.

In reading Ezek. 40:5 ff one discerns that this vision is actually a subconscious reflection of a real temple drawn from memory. The E gate of the temple when reconstructed proves to be of the same general Solomonic type as that unearthed by Nelson Glueck and others at Megiddo. Actually this type of construction was not found after the early ninth century

B.C. Therefore, this memory must have arisen from one who knew the temple of Solomon in detail. Such a person lived in Jerusalem before that temple was destroyed in 587 B.C. That person in all probability was Ezekiel himself.

This book, unlike any other, specifically dates several of its sections. Albright and others are right in accepting the correctness of these dates and in understanding them as reckoned from the time of Jehoiachin's captivity, which would also coincide with the year of his reign (cf. 1:2; 8:1; 20:1; 24:1; 26:1; 29:1, 17; 30:20; 31:1; 32:1, 17; 33:21; 40:1). The thirtieth year mentioned in 1:1 refers to the thirtieth year of Jehoiachin, who was still considered the rightful ruler of the exile nation, and it was in this thirtieth year that Ezekiel or some editor "published his book." The "twelfth year" in Ezek. 32:1; 33:21 should be read the "eleventh year." Otherwise the dates are substantially correct; however, all the material appearing between two dates should not be understood as being in proper chronological sequence.

The general date for Ezekiel must therefore remain the first half of the sixth century until such time as new evidence is discovered.

2. Editing. The book of Ezekiel is not a composite work like that of Isaiah, nor is it a conglomerate piece like that of Jeremiah. Although this view is generally accepted, there are many who would decidedly demur. In 1925 Hölscher (in Ezechiel, Der Dichter und das Buch) ferreted out 170 verses of poetry which he identified as genuine prophetic utterance largely because it was poetic in nature. Hölscher contributed very much to the study of poetry, but failed to recognize the fact that poets also write prose. Volkmar Herntrich, I. G. Matthews, and others have been less radical in their analyses of the book.

In 1943 Irwin (see bibliography) recovered by inductive method some 251 verses which he felt belonged to the prophet, and recognized also the possibility that some other material was genuine. For him, the poetic center of ch. 15 (i.e., vss. 2-5) is authentic, while the remainder (i.e., vss. 6-8) is a commentary by a later redactor or editor. He assumed that the nature of the fire is the important fact, not the value of the wood (as a confused editor erroneously thought). Having thus discovered a key, Irwin proceeded to analyze the book on the basis of the literary quality of material thus "discovered." Later (see bibliography) he vigorously defended his own views. H. H. Rowley (see bibliography) rejected them and concluded tentatively that the major part of the material in the present book goes back to either the prophet or his disciples. A later editor fashioned the prophecy in its present form. G. Fohrer (see bibliography) also viewed the book as a work composed primarily of original material; indeed, he preserved more of the text than did Rowley. Mullo-Weir (see bibliography) added his support to the general view that the main source of the book of Ezekiel is the prophet himself.

Herbert May (see bibliography), though not so radical as either Hölscher or Irwin, contended that at least forty per cent of the book is definitely not original and that many other passages are highly questionable. May worked on the assumption that there are vast quantities of non-Ezekielian material and is definitely disposed to support this assumption in his discussion.

What constitutes a genuine oracle? Needless to say, few if any of the prophetic utterances manifest the accuracy of a stenographic transcription. Probably some material was written by the prophet; how much, nobody can accurately say. Certainly he drew from earlier sources (possibly some of the poetry predates the prophet). Admittedly editors who were disciples left their mark on the text. However, if we are narrowly to maintain that Ezekiel material is only that which preserves the exact words the prophet said or wrote, then there is very little we could claim for him. On the other hand, if we are willing to credit the author with that part of the book which preserves in essence what he said or wrote, whether he composed it as it now stands or not, then the major part of the prophecy must be understood as having originated with him. The spirit and the mind of Ezekiel are clearly felt throughout the whole work, even in those sections which are generally recognized as editorial. Except for those portions which predate Ezekiel (e.g., early poetry), the great preponderance of the prophecy originated directly or indirectly with him.

The full answer to the composition of Ezekiel has not been reached. In all probability, the editing was finished within the sixth century and the book drawn from the writings and sayings of Ezekiel was completed soon after the return from exile (ca. 539-520 B.C.). Ezekiel himself may have begun the process of compilation in the thirtieth year of the Captivity (cf. 1:1), and his disciples finished it subsequent to his death.

3. Present arrangement. It is obvious, even after the most cursory reading of Ezekiel, that the work changes motif at the end of ch. 24. Chronologically this marks the end of Jerusalem, and prophetically the emphasis is changed from doom to resurrection. Hope replaces despair. The denunciations of sin are replaced by exhortations to have faith. However, this shift of emphasis is not immediately felt until the foreign nations have come in for divine judgment (cf. chs. 25–32).

The key to the present arrangement of Ezekiel is to be found in Ezek. 24:27; 33:21-22, which historically belong together, having reference to the same event. Ch. 33 is a carefully devised suture, designed to bind several independent pieces together. It consists of three doublets (33:1-9 = 3:19-21; 33:10-19 = ch. 18; 33:23-29 = 11:14-21), together with a personal note about the prophet (33:30-33). The aforesaid historical allusion (33:21-22) completes the chapter. Thus the compiler, whoever he was, took the oracles of judgment in chs. 1–24, which had probably been recorded together with the foreign-nations chapters (25–32), and added them to chs. 34–37, which were independent, detached prophecies from Ezekiel, as were chs. 38–39. To this point (chs. 1–39) the book was completed with the promise that evil forces would be destroyed. That this portion of the book was finished during the lifetime of Ezekiel is probable.

4. Chs. 40–48. Quite early in the course of modern Ezekielian research some scholars began to demur so far as crediting the last nine chapters of the book to the prophet himself. Although there is reason for thinking that these nine chapters did circulate as a single piece for a time, it is possible that some of the parts came from other sources than Ezekiel. The survey of the general arrangements of the temple (chs. 40–42; 46:19, 24) and the instructions concerning the altar (43:6-27) are certainly from Ezekiel directly or indirectly. It would seem that the introduction of the passage on the glory of Yahweh (43:1-5) is little more than a literary device used in order to tie this section to the rest of the book. There is reason to doubt the Ezekielian origin of the sections on the allotment of the land (45:1-9; 47:13–48:35) and the regulations and measures (45:10–46:18). However, description of proper priesthood is what one might expect from a Zadokite priest (ch. 44), as also the vision of a life-giving stream issuing from beneath the temple (47:1-12).

A final conclusion on the authorship of chs. 40–48 is not possible at this juncture. Much of the material did originate with the prophet, and yet all of it is either a reflection or a refraction of his point of view. In all probability an editor has been more at work here than in any other part of the book. On the face of it, these chapters as they now stand must be attributed to the editor who also lived before the Zerubbabel-Joshua restoration of the temple.

E. GENERAL CONTENT. 1. Outline.

I. Prophecies of doom (before the fall of Jerusalem, chs. 1–24
  A. Vision and call, 1:1–3:21
    1. Introduction, 1:1-3
    2. Vision, 1:4-28
    3. Call of God, 2:1–3:3
    4. Detailed instructions, 3:4-21
      a. Speak to Israel, vss. 4-11
      b. Prophet's personal reaction, vss. 12-15
      c. "Be a watchman," vss. 16-21
  B. Prophecies and visions of judgment, 3:22–7:27
    1. Consequences to the prophet, 3:22-27
    2. Symbolic siege of city, ch. 4
    3. Extent of desolation, ch. 5
    4. Idolatry denounced, ch. 6
    5. Punishment for sin, ch. 7
  C. Visions, chs. 8–11
    1. Abominations in Jerusalem seen, ch. 8
      a. Baal image, vss. 1-6
      b. Hidden idols, vss. 7-13
      c. Fertility worship, vss. 14-15
      d. Sun worship, etc., vss. 16-18
    2. Vision of complete destruction, ch. 9
    3. Vision of God reappears, ch. 10
    4. Denunciation and hope, ch. 11
      a. Leaders rebuked, vss. 1-12
      b. Pelatiah dies, vs. 13
      c. Promise of renewal, vss. 14-21
      d. God's spirit is withdrawn, vss. 22-25
  D. Oracles concerning Jerusalem, chs. 12–19
    1. Captivity predicted, ch. 12
      a. Prince's escape enacted, vss. 1-7
      b. Captivity and distress, vss. 8-20
      c. Popular proverbs, vss. 21-28
    2. False prophets, ch. 13
    3. Elders denounced, 14:1-11
    4. No hope in present situation, 14:12-20
    5. Future remnant, 14:21-23
    6. Useless vine, ch. 15
    7. Story of unfaithful lover, ch. 16
    8. Parable of the two eagles, ch. 17
    9. Discourse on individual responsibility, ch. 18
    10. Parable of the lioness and cubs, ch. 19
  E. Oracles of judgment against the Lord, chs. 20–24
    1. Review of checkered history, 20:1-44
    2. Judgment, 20:45–21:32
      a. Against Judah and Jerusalem, 20:45–21:7
      b. Song of the consuming sword, 21:8-17
      c. Prediction of Chaldean attack, 21:18-27
      d. Ammon to be conquered, 21:28-32
    3. Catalogue of Jerusalem's sins, ch. 22
    4. Story of two sisters, ch. 23
    5. Last days, ch. 24
      a. The city a caldron, vss. 1-14
      b. Death of the prophet's wife, vss. 15-24
      c. Concluding section, vss. 25-27
II. Foreign-nations prophecies, chs. 25–32
  A. Immediate neighbors of Israel, ch. 25
    1. Ammon, vss. 1-7
    2. Moab, vss. 8-11
    3. Edom, vss. 12-14
    4. Philistia, vss. 15-17
  B. Tyre, 26:1–28:24
    1. Destruction foretold, 26:1-14
    2. Effect on other nations, 26:15-18
    3. No memory of great city, 26:19-21
    4. Lament, ch. 27
    5. Overthrow of proud king, 28:1-10
    6. Lament over Tyre, 28:11-19
    7. Against Sidon, 28:20-24
  C. Interlude about Israel's restoration, 28:25-26
  D. Egypt, chs. 29–32
    1. Prophecy against Egypt, 29:1-13
    2. A base kingdom re-established, 29:14-16
    3. Egypt for Nebuchadrezzar, not Tyre, 29:17-21
    4. Babylon will conquer, ch. 30
    5. Pharaoh warned about Assyria's fate, ch. 31
    6. Final lament for Egypt, ch. 32
III. Prophecies of restoration and hope (after the fall of Jerusalem), chs. 33–37
  A. Review of former oracles, ch. 33
  B. Future promise, chs. 34–37
    1. Discussion of shepherds: past and future, ch. 34
    2. Oracle against Edom, ch. 35
    3. Explanation of destruction and promise of restoration, ch. 36
    4. The Valley of Dry Bones, ch. 37
  C. Gog and Magog, chs. 38–39
IV. The temple and city of God, chs. 40–48
  A. Measurement for the house, chs. 40–42

B. The appearance of the glory of Yahweh, 43:1-12
C. Regulations for temple and service, 43:13-46:24
   1. Altar, 43:13-27
   2. Personnel, 44:1-45:8
   3. Instruction about sacrifices, etc., 45:9-46:24
D. Healing waters, 47:1-12
E. Divisions of restored land, 47:13-48:35

The prophecy of Ezekiel is concerned from the outset with a prophet whose first commission was to express God's judgment upon Judah for its breach of covenant faith. Ezekiel carefully made a case for the rightness of God's condemnation, demonstrating that historically the fault was with a faithless people, not a capricious deity. It was to a rebellious house he was called as a watchman to warn against impending doom. His first visions consisted of a symbolic siege and a graphic description of complete desolation. Idolatry is excoriated in ch. 6, and national sin is labeled for dire punishment in ch. 7. The visions of Ezek. 8–11 alternate between the reason for and the description of doom. Jerusalem's sorry record is detailed in chs. 12–19, where all phases of life from leadership to people are brought under the withering scrutiny of prophetic insight. In the series of oracles are the parable of the vine (ch. 15), the story of the waif (ch. 16), the parable of the eagles (ch. 17), and the account of the lioness and her cubs (ch. 19). Literary skill is used to clinch the indictment which God had against Judah and Jerusalem. Oracles of judgment again are the crux of chs. 20–24.

In chs. 25–32 the universal God stands in judgment over other nations than the Hebrews. Hope rises triumphant in chs. 33–37, and 38–39; 40–48 give a fitting climax with the destruction of evil and the promise of a new society where God would dwell. From judgment in chs. 1–24; 25–32, the prophet moves quite naturally to hope which will rise out of the ashes of destruction. The problem of utter desolation is met head on in the Valley of Dry Bones passage, while the fact of rampant evil is effectively dealt with in Gog and Magog (chs. 38–39). After this, the future glory of God's people and God's land can be described with confidence (chs. 40–48).

2. Major themes. Several themes have been developed in the book beyond their development in previous prophets. One needs to understand the circumstance of Judah and the situation in life for the average Hebrew to appreciate fully the contribution of Ezekiel.

The popular theological notion of the day was that Jerusalem, being God's dwelling place, was inviolate against attack. This concept had been fostered by the defeat of Sennacherib in 701 B.C. and the prophecies of Isaiah ben Amoz in connection therewith. Yahweh's city was Jerusalem, and the temple was his house which no enemy could ever conquer or profane. When, therefore, the temple was destroyed and Jerusalem was reduced to rubble, the popular faith of Israel was dealt a blow from which the people would not have recovered had it not been for the prophetic voice and word. To the average Hebrew, God had been defeated, his land conquered, and his people scattered. The foundation of faith had thus been shattered almost beyond repair.

a. Consequences of the absence of God from life. The absence of God from life signals the beginning of destruction. People had wantonly forsaken God and had in the truest sense become a "rebellious house" (cf. 2:1 ff). Jerusalem was a bloody city (22:2), and her elders were men who had secret places of idolatry (8:7-13). Her prophets were false (13:1-16), and her people worshiped other gods, openly bowing also before the forces of nature (8:14-17). A history of disloyalty was the story of this people, who were like an unfaithful wife (ch. 16) or a younger sister more scarlet than the older (ch. 23) or a useless vine (ch. 17). This constituted a sorry moral situation, where the requirements of God had not even been attempted.

The requirement for God's presence in life is obedience to his will and the keeping of his law, which must be expressed in quality of life, not in ritual alone. When rebellion became the dominant attitude and life was immoral in quality, Yahweh could no longer lend his support to the life of the people. Ezekiel met the popular theology of the day with a vision wherein the כבוד יהוה, "Yahweh's Glory," withdrew from the city (11:22-23). As soon as the Spirit of God absented himself, Jerusalem was doomed to destruction. While the well-being and continuance of any city or region was dependent upon obedience to the Almighty, in no sense was God dependent upon Judah or Jerusalem, but they were alive at his sufferance.

The God who was not a welcome part of living became immediately the judge of life and executor of judgment. Yahweh, according to the prophetic view, would make Jerusalem a desolation (cf. ch. 6); his servant marked its people for destruction (ch. 9); he would destroy the illusion which false prophets had erected (ch. 13); his hand would punish his beloved who had been unfaithful (ch. 16); his sword would go forth to destroy the wicked people (ch. 21); and his vengeance would be felt on the idolatrous nation (ch. 23). God who was not allowed to give life to his people gave them in full measure death, destruction, and exile. God who was not redeemer became the judge.

That God did not desire this destruction is made plain by the prophet. With anguished cry Ezekiel says in the name of Yahweh: "Why will you die, O house of Israel?" The covenant had been broken. God had been faithful and they had been unfaithful; therefore, destruction was a necessity.

b. God as the key to life. Easily the most searching doctrine of the OT is developed by the exilic prophet. He plumbed the depths of the spiritual nature of man when he recorded the positive side of the lesson which history was seeking to teach a people. In the Genesis account of Creation man was a lifeless, inert being until the breath or spirit of God was breathed into him; then he became a living soul. The difference between life and death, according to the prophet, was to be found in the presence of God's spirit in individual or corporate life.

Three passages in the prophecy relate to this great theme. The vision of the Valley of Dry Bones (37:1-14), the river proceeding from the temple (47:1-12), and the name of the city which God would create: Yahweh Shamah.

In the Valley of Dry Bones vision (ch. 37), the concept that God makes the difference between life and death is graphically described. There are three phases to the oracle: (a) the prophet saw a vision of a valley filled with dry, bleached bones, presumably a battlefield where the fallen warriors of the defeated were never buried. In all probability such desolate regions had been known by exiled Ezekiel, who had seen his own land reduced to death. The Almighty asks the question: "Can these bones live?" Hope had been all but extinguished among the exiles. Was there any reason for hope? God then answered with action. Ezekiel would prophesy, and the spirit of God would breathe or blow upon the death-filled valley and in doing so would raise the fallen army once more to be a mighty host.

The second part of the vision (vss. 7-12) describes the obedience of God's prophet and the result. A noise was heard; an earthquake was felt. Bones were brought together and sinews grew, after which the human form was finished, except for the breath of life. Then the breath of God was breathed into these soldiers, and they stood up as a very great army. Doubtless Ezekiel utilized the ancient idea that the E wind was the rûaḥ of Yahweh, but whatever the expression, the spirit or breath of God spelled the difference between life and death. The same creative force which had brought life to man, making him a living soul, could revive a dead people and make them live again.

The prophet left nothing to the imagination of his reader, pointing out that the vision meant that God would restore his people Israel, who were now as dead, and make them live again. The secret of such restoration is summed up in the words: "I will put my Spirit within you, and you shall live." Just as the removal of that spirit had meant death and judgment, so now its return signaled life and strength.

Perhaps the most arresting picture in the entire prophecy is the life-giving stream which issued from beneath the temple where God dwelt (47:1-12). Here was the river of life, which later became so much a part of the future hope for Christendom. A great river was formed by the waters which proceeded from under the altar of the temple, and as it moved toward the Dead Sea, a remarkable miracle occurred. The small stream became so great that it could not be crossed. When it reached the Dead Sea, the brackish waters of that body of water were purified, and fish were caught there at En-gedi and En-eglaim. Although the salt marshes were not reclaimed, on the banks of the river where the desert had formerly prevented growth, there were food trees which bore fruit monthly. The difference between a salt sea and a fresh-water lake, the difference between desert and a flourishing land, was the life-giving water of God proceeding from his throne or altar.

The great triumphant theme of Ezekiel is struck in the last two words of the prophecy: Yahweh Shamah (יהוה־שמה), "Yahweh is there." This shall be the name of the New Jerusalem in the midst of a restored land. It is the most important message Ezekiel had for his people—namely, that any society must be sure that "the Lord is there," since the difference between life and death, hope and despair, was the presence of God. For man is dead until he is made alive by the indwelling spirit of God; society is doomed, however virile at the moment, if it is abandoned by God, but even hopeless death becomes life when the breath of God is felt. So the great prophet gave to posterity a lasting insight into the ways of God with the spiritual life of man.

c. God as ruler of history. In no sense was the exilic prophet first with the concept that God was sovereign of history. From the time of Moses onward, the great leaders in Hebrew faith had known that God's dominion went far beyond the confines of the Promised Land and his rule was over all. Yet the popular notion persisted that somehow Yahweh was a national god who would protect his own. His dwelling was specifically located at Jerusalem in the temple. Ezekiel did much to dispel once for all this false notion, although it was left for Second Isaiah to describe the universal greatness of God in all its true grandeur.

The God whom Ezekiel knew appeared riding in a heavenly chariot which was possessed by his invisible spirit. This chariot was equipped with wheels so that the chariot could move in any direction, to any place where the Spirit might direct. The God whom Ezekiel beheld was mobile and was in no sense to be understood as dwelling in Jerusalem alone. Indeed, the prophet's vision was not in Palestine at all, nor in the temple or a temple; it was seen in heaven above the earth and in a cloud out of the N.

He not only directed the former destinies of his people, moving kings like pawns on the checkerboard of history; the Almighty at the moment was directing the armies of the mighty Chaldeans in their attack against Judah and Jerusalem. But, having used the forces of Chaldea to do his bidding, he could stand in judgment, not only upon his own people, but on all people. Egypt and Tyre were under his rule and therefore under his judgment. God was the Lord of men and nations; history was under his final control.

d. Individual responsibility. Ezekiel was not the originator of the idea of individual responsibility as has been claimed, but he gave a greater impetus to the idea, which was old as the Hebrew heritage of faith. Individual responsibility within the life of the community had long been recognized, though often overshadowed by corporate responsibility of the covenant community. So long as there was an actual physical land and people of God, this would continue. The prophets spoke of the nation and people as a corporate personality, using individuals to demonstrate the general condition. The prophet devotes one entire chapter (18) to the very difficult problem of inherited guilt. The subject is oversimplified with the ringing answer: "The soul that sins shall die," and no reference is made to acknowledged cumulative guilt of the fathers.

The prophet does not solve this knotty problem but concludes that the individual is responsible before God. In the circumstances this had become rather obvious, since the visible covenant community had disintegrated or was in process of disintegrating. The main unit remaining was the individual who might or might not be in a position to share corporate responsibility. That the individual, however bad his forebears had been, might escape punishment by a good life was plainly understood. Furthermore, as a sort of prelude to the gospel, the prophet makes it plain that there is no such condition or possession as inherited righteousness. It is God's will that every individual should now fulfil in himself the covenant requirements and avoid the destruction of judgment. To do so was an individual's responsibility. Other great themes are most surely found in Ezekiel, but these four are dominant.

e. History as a vindication of God's character. More than any other of the writers of the OT, this prophet explains the actions of the Almighty as derived from a desire to vindicate himself in history and before the world. The expression "You shall know that I am the LORD," or a variation of it, is used dozens of times. All actions spring from the desire that men may know what sort of God Yahweh is. Some scholars and theologians have expressed regret at this prophetic emphasis, calling it crude in expression and cold in outlook, but this is most surely not the case.

The prophet, having accepted the fact that God is a holy and righteous God, simply takes the next logical step. The Almighty's actions are a proof that he is such a god. Whether by his absolute destruction of hypocrisy as in ch. 8 or his loving concern expressed in ch. 34, the net effect is that the nations may know what sort of God Yahweh is. Who can quarrel with the fact that history is the arena for the revelation of God's meaning in the life of man? Admittedly a piece like ch. 20 does not represent the manner in which a twentieth-century theologian would express this doctrine. God is here depicted as freeing Israel from Egyptian bondage, withholding judgment in the wilderness and in the settled land for his "name's sake." Because he had sworn to free Israel and to lead them to a promised land, he did so, even though they had not fulfilled their covenant. To have failed might have been misunderstood as weakness among the nations and would have done irreparable harm to the honor of God. Certainly such failure would have been interpreted as proof of the weakness of God, not the sin of man. But now God, having been long-suffering far beyond the deserving of this people, would destroy them, and the surrounding nations would know why. God thus used an unworthy nation to vindicate his true nature and reveal himself to the world. The theme of a God not caught up in the maelstrom of history but ever demonstrating his nature through events constitutes a great contribution to religious thought.

f. The inner quality of true religion. This is in no sense an exclusive emphasis for Ezekiel, but it cannot be overlooked as a major contribution. Proud pretense by prophets and people is likened to a whitewashed wall which will fall in rain or storm. True religion is not a veneer but an inner strength (cf. 13:1-16). External show is no substitute for heartfelt loyalty, as the prophet made so very clear in denouncing the elders for worship in rooms of imagery (8:7-13). The need of people is not for a superficial change but for an alteration at the center of living. God promises that the new day will come because in his people he will put a new heart and a new spirit (cf. 11:19; 18:31; 36:26). Only by such inner change of being can men be acceptable before God. Yet it is God who gives man the new heart and new spirit.

3. Place in the development of the Hebrew faith. Since an increasing number of students and scholars have accepted the date of early sixth century B.C. for Ezekiel, and since a large proportion feel his influence in most of the book, it is possible briefly to understand the place of the prophecy in the development of the Hebrew faith. The book stands at the great divide between pre-exilic religion of a land with a covenant people and postexilic religion of a legal community without a land. Ezekiel draws from the background of one and makes large contribution to the other. He manages to recover from the ashes of destruction the precious faith of the past and with it to give people the new hope of a more profound faith. The continuance of the Jewish faith as a factor in history is proof enough that the prophet did his job very well indeed.

4. Relationships to the rise of Judaism. It has long been recognized that Ezra was, in fact, the father of Judaism, as he instituted the legal concept of a religious community. However, Ezekiel laid the groundwork of the exclusiveness that characterized Judaism and took the first steps toward a legalistic attitude. The corruption by the heathen had been one cause for the downfall of Jerusalem; hence the future must have safeguards against such intrusion of outside influence. It was the worship of foreign gods and the popularity of cults other than Jewish which brought dissolution of the social order. The fence of law, which was made to protect the chosen people against such influence, is implied in Ezekiel, as one might expect, and the seeds of Judaism were here; but in no sense did the prophet foresee what ends his ideas would reach.

5. Influence on NT thought. The vision of God (1:22-28) is felt quite strongly in all the visions of Revelation. The voice of Christ in Revelation was "like the sound of many waters" (Rev. 1:15; 19:6); his feet were burnished bronze (1:15), while his throne was like jasper stone and carnelian; and there was a rainbow about the throne, like an emerald to look upon (4:3). Lightning came from the throne, and there were four living creatures "full of eyes in front and behind" (4:6). The author of Revelation apparently borrowed from the prophetic word, and the borrowed material was shaped for a new usage.

In addition to the vision of God the biblical idea of a holy city, a new Jerusalem, originated from Ezekiel and Second Isaiah. Once more the key to the existence of this new city was the presence of the living God, who would no longer require a temple, its use having been made unnecessary by Jesus Christ. However, in Revelation as in Ezekiel the city is carefully measured, and its dimensions are given (Rev. 21:15-27). Even though the idea of this city proceeding from God is native to Second Isaiah, the concept must find its more original source with Ezekiel.

That remarkable figure of a river of living water proceeding from beneath the throne of God, transforming the land through which it moves, was also borrowed by the writer of Revelation. The trees along the bank yield their fruits monthly in exactly the way described by the prophet.

The concept of a good shepherd, by which so many have come to think of Jesus, came also from this rich prophetic source. Ezekiel saw the Messiah in terms of a shepherd who would do for the people what all their rulers had failed to accomplish. God promised to set up a single shepherd, even his servant David, who would feed the sheep of Israel; but more specifically God himself promised to be the shepherd of his people. This shepherd theme was beautifully adapted by Jesus to his own time. He was the good shepherd, and all others were hirelings to whom the sheep did not belong. Jesus had read and had understood Ezekiel quite well before he spoke the words recorded in John 10:1-39.

Another passage in the Gospel According to John is adapted from the thought of the prophet—i.e., John 15, which is an adaptation of Ezek. 15. The vine which bears no fruit and thus is useless served as a common base for both discourses.

Gog and Magog are definitely original to Ezek. 38–39, as is the emergent notion of an Armageddon. Of course, to Ezekiel, Gog was a person and Magog was a land, while in Revelation they are represented as two persons. In both cases the idea represented evil in full array against God, with such rebellion facing inevitable defeat.

The Gospel of John and the Revelation are most directly akin to the prophet, bearing in themselves the definite imprint of literary kinship. Jesus was well acquainted with the book of Ezekiel, from which he drew expressions to frame the new picture of Christian faith. Indeed, he used the title "Son of man" very frequently in the sense that it was used by the prophet. The NT bears a close kinship to the prophecy of Ezekiel and is furnished much background ideology and prophetic insight from that source.

6. Literary figures. Few authors in OT literature have experimented with new forms of literary expression as much as Ezekiel did. We mention but a few: the prophet as a responsible watchman (3:16-21); irresponsible religion likened to whitewash on a wall about to collapse (13:8-16); the story of a waif in the woods (ch. 16); the city of Jerusalem a caldron (24:6 ff); the story of two sisters (ch. 23); the song of the sword (21:8-17); Egypt a primeval monster (ch. 29); Tyre as a proud mistress fallen (ch. 26). These and other figures mentioned above, such as the useless vine, the good shepherd, the life-giving stream, the holy city, the throne of God, and others, demonstrate how rich is this literary style and the contribution to biblical expression.

F. APOCALYPTIC AND CLAIRVOYANT ELEMENTS. 1. Reason for apocalyptic. Once the Jewish state was destroyed and Jerusalem was no longer existent, the future fulfilment of God's great purposes was raised from an altogether earthly setting in history above history. God had previously worked in the vortex of history through a chosen people and in a land of promise. Now, however, that people had become no people and that land no promised place. Many dreams of restoration were not fulfilled as expected, so the fulfilment of God was lifted above the realm of normal event. Thus the book of Ezekiel became a prologue to apocalyptic, which glimpsed the glorious future in secretive terminology and symbolic language. The Gog-Magog cycle, the Valley of Dry Bones, and the division of the land are certainly in the best apocalyptic style. In fact, ch. 9 is what one might call classically apocalyptic in conception and execution. However, the true apocalypse of God's bringing history to a climax had still to develop, and Ezekiel was little more than an initiator—in expression rather than in idea.

2. Abnormal personality. The claim that Ezekiel was an abnormal personality should be readily admitted, for it is deviation from the norm which frequently is the measure of true greatness. No "normal person" would have been sensitive enough to experience the presence of God or sensible enough to give expression to that experience. However, attempts to psychoanalyze the prophet seem bound to failure. The twentieth century is too far removed from that era, and there is such a paucity of information about "the patient" that no accurate analysis could be expected. Actually there are in all people enough slight deviations from the norm that any future investigator might conceivably make a case for any kind of abnormality for a given individual. That symbols and meanings change with altering cultures has been demonstrated.

The prophet was a sensitive soul given to a semi-mystical type of daydream by which he was able to live in scenes familiar to conscious experience. He was not gifted with clairvoyance—if, in fact, there be such a gift. A troubled spirit himself, he moved from doom to resurrection and expressed this for his people in a superb book.

G. CANONICITY. It was only after certain safeguards had been established that the Jewish community admitted this prophecy to their canon of scripture. The delay in acceptance was partially explained by the fact that Ezekiel's vision of God occurred outside the Holy Land and partially because chs. 1; 10 were considered dangerous in the hands of the wrong people. Apparently with the growing dispersion of Jews the first objection became de facto void because God's people were in many lands. The first chapter, with its marvelous vision and mysterious chariot, was forbidden to all who were under thirty years of age, nor was it ever read at synagogue services, lest it give rise to "theosophical speculations." After burning three hundred jars of oil, Hananiah ben Hezekiah was able to justify the admission of the exilic work to the canon of Jewish scripture, even though its legal sections had not been completely harmonized with the Pentateuch.

By NT times, when the heritage of apocalyptic had come to the fore in biblical books of Zechariah and Daniel, as well as in countless intertestamental works, Ezekiel—especially ch. 1—was most acceptable. Its influence on the writings of the NT and in the training of Jesus has already been assessed. For Christians it is accepted as the work of a major prophet and is read as that which is the Word of God, in whatever sense this concept is meant by the group using the book.

H. TEXT. A long discussion of the text would not be in place here, even though a restudy of it is overdue. Hölscher and Irwin have reduced the text by means of a preconceived key to the true Ezekielian material. Hölscher succeeds in isolating the poetic material, for which scholars are in his debt. However, few agree, nor does Hölscher insist, that only poetry is genuine.

The text is corrupt at many places and has suffered much at the hands of editors and copyists. LXX and Syr. are helpful in attempting to find the original, but every clumsiness in style does not necessarily indicate a nonoriginal expression. The Hebrew leaves much to be desired, but with the help of the versions it is possible to get a fair translation.

Cooke offers an excellent analysis of the MT as compared with the Greek. See bibliography.

Bibliography. C. C. Torrey, Pseudo-Ezekiel and the Original Prophecy (1930); J. B. Harford, Studies in the Book of Ezekiel (1935); G. A. Cooke, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Ezekiel, ICC (1937); I. G. Matthews, Ezekiel, An American Commentary on the OT (1939); W. A. Irwin, The Problem of Ezekiel (1943); C. G. Howie, The Date and Composition of Ezekiel (1950); G. Fohrer, Die Hauptprobleme des Buches Ezechiel (1952); C. J. Mullo-Weir, "Aspects of the Book of Ezekiel," Vetus Testamentum, II (1952), 97-112; W. A. Irwin, "Ezekiel Research Since 1943," Vetus Testamentum, III (1953), 54-66; H. H. Rowley, The Book of Ezekiel in Modern Study (1953); G. R. Driver, "Linguistic and Textual Problems of Ezekiel," Bibl., vol. 35 (1954); H. G. May, Introduction and Exegesis of Ezekiel, IB, VI (1956), 41-338. C. G. Howie

EZEL ē′zəl [אזל] (I Sam. 20:19 KJV). A stone at which David made an appointment with Jonathan. The RSV, following the LXX, emends the passage to אצל הארגב, "beside yonder stone heap."

EZEM ē′zəm [עצם]; KJV twice AZEM ā′zəm. A city of Simeon in the Negeb of Judah (Josh. 15:29; 19:3; I Chr. 4:29). The KJV, following the pausal form of the Hebrew name, renders it as Azem in the first two passages. Its location is uncertain; a possible site is Umm el-'Azem, two low knolls on the NE side of the road that leads from Boweidah to er-Remthah, about 2½ miles N of Beer-sheba.

S. Cohen

EZER ē′zər [אצר (in 1 below), from lay up, store up; עזר (in 2-6 below), from help, succor; cf. proper names אביעזר, אחיעזר, אליעזר, יועזר]. 1. The sixth son of Seir; a clan chief of the native Horite inhabitants of Edom (Gen. 36:21, 27, 30; I Chr. 1:38, 42).

2. A Judahite, father of Hushah (I Chr. 4:4).

3. An Ephraimite slain by the men of Gath (I Chr. 7:21).

4. A Gadite warrior who went over to David (I Chr. 12:9—H 12:10).

5. A Levite, son of Jeshua, who repaired a section of the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah's direction (Neh. 3:19).

6. A priest who participated in the dedication of the wall (Neh. 12:42). L. Hicks

EZERIAS. KJV Apoc. form of Azariah.

EZIAS. KJV Apoc. form of Uzzi.

EZION-GEBER ē′zī ən gē′bər [עציון גבר, from gadyan bush plus giant(?)]; KJV sometimes EZION-GABER —gā′bər. An important port and foundry city situated at the head of the Gulf of Aqabah. The biblical references to Ezion-geber are confined to the fact that it was a station on the journey of the Israelites on their way to the Plains of Moab (Num. 33:35-36; Deut. 2:8) and that it was a port from which ships sailed to Ophir, bringing back gold, almug wood, silver, ivory, and apes (I Kings 9:26-28; 10:11, 22). The greater part of our knowledge of the city comes from archaeological investigation.

1. Location. The biblical references cited above make it clear that Ezion-geber was located somewhere in the Wadi el-'Arabah and that, being a seaport, it must obviously have been on a part of the Red Sea—i.e., its E arm, the Gulf of Aqabah. Various sites were proposed for its location, some far up in the Arabah, on the mistaken supposition that the gulf extended farther N in biblical times. It was not until 1934 that Fritz Frank, in his explorations of the region, reported the discovery of a place at

Courtesy of Nelson Glueck

40. Looking S through the excavated gateway of Ezion-geber (Tell el-Kheleifeh) toward the Gulf of Aqabah

Tell el-Kheleifeh, ca. two miles W-NW of the modern city of Aqabah, which contained pottery from the Early Iron Age (1200-900 B.C.), and which he believed to be the proper site. This opinion was agreed to by Nelson Glueck when he visited the tell in 1936 and was completely confirmed with the excavations that he made from 1938 on, under the auspices of the American Schools of Oriental Research. Figs. EZI 40; JOT 31.

Glueck found the remains of four towns on top of one another, all of which had been destroyed by fire. The first and lowest of these towns had been set on virgin soil and showed evidences of having been built all at one time, indicating a carefully worked-out plan. The style of the buildings and the city wall are very close to those that are identified with the building operations of Solomon at Megiddo and other sites in Palestine. The chief feature of the town was a series of structures with flues and air

From "The Epic of Man," Life (copyright 1957 by Time Inc.); painting by Carroll N. Jones, Jr.

41. Copper refinery foundry operated by Phoenician metallurgists by the Red Sea for King Solomon channels that traversed the walls and the floors; the bricks of the walls had become kiln-baked by reason of an intense heat within, and bore traces of sulphur and of metals. This was evidently a foundry which was used for the final process of refining the ingots of copper and iron that had been worked up in crude form near the mines in the Arabah.* The presence of this foundry explained why the town was located in this spot, which was not ideal for a port, being about three hundred feet from the water, nor for a place of residence, since it was exposed to the sun and the wind-blown sand. It was precisely at the farthest point W where sweet water could be obtained and yet where advantage could be taken of the strong winds that swept down the Arabah. It became obvious that this city must have been built by Solomon, the only king of Israel of the period who possessed the freedom from war, the resources, and the assistance of Phoenician planners to build up such a foundry and port city. Figs. EZI 41; MET 43.

Glueck further noted that there was not enough room in this location for two separate cities and concluded that Ezion-geber and Elath, at least in the book of Kings, were but different names for the same place. The change from the former name to the latter took place between the time of Jehoshaphat (876-851 B.C.) and Amaziah (796-767). The successive destructions of the four cities by fire were evidence of the successive captures and recaptures of the place, some of which are recorded in the Scriptures.

2. History. At the time when the Israelites under Moses passed through the region, Ezion-geber and Elath were only miserable collections of mud huts without significance except that they gave their names to the future city. The Israelites, being denied a direct passage through Edom itself, were forced to make a long circuit down the Wadi el-'Arabah to the head of the gulf, and then around the S and E boundaries of Edom (Deut. 2:8). The Edomites made no attempt to develop the location, and it was not until David had conquered the whole region and Solomon embarked on his career of industrial and commercial expansion that Ezion-geber was built and acquired its importance. The elaborate foundry supplied copper and iron both for the vessels of the temple and for trade; a navy, manned by Phoenician sailors, made trips to Ophir in Arabia (I Kings 9:26-28); and it was no doubt at the same port that the Queen of Sheba arrived on her journey to Jerusalem (I Kings 10:1-13).

After the division of the kingdom, Ezion-geber fell to the kingdom of Judah. The first city was sacked and destroyed, undoubtedly by Shishak in his invasion of Palestine (ca. 925 B.C.), which included a number of places in Edom. A second city was built on the ruins of the first, and the fortifications were strengthened; the place continued to flourish as an industrial center, but there is no further mention of the fleet, which may have been wrecked or else destroyed by the Egyptian attack. Jehoshaphat, another king who enjoyed a prosperous reign, attempted to renew navigation from Ezion-geber; but his ships were wrecked in the gulf, and he declined any further ventures in such a dangerous element (I Kings 22:47-49).

For the subsequent history of the city, see ELATH.

Bibliography. N. Glueck, The Other Side of the Jordan (1940), pp. 89-113. S. COHEN

EZNITE, THE ĕz'nīt [עֶצְנִי]. See ADINO.

EZORA ĭ zôr'ə ['Εζωρά] (I Esd. 9:34). Head of a family of Israelites who put away their foreign wives and children. The name is not found in the parallel Ezra 10:39-40, where it appears to be replaced by Adaiah and Machnadebai. C. T. FRITSCH

EZRA ĕz'rə [עֶזְרָא, possibly from עֶזְרִיָה, Yahweh helps; Εσρας, Εσδρας, Εζδρας]; EZRAH [עֶזְרָה, help; Εσρ(ε)ι, Εζρι, Ιεζρααι] in I Chr. 4:17. 1. One of the priests who came from Babylonia to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:1, 13; Azariah in Neh. 10:2).

2. A priest living in Nehemiah's time (Neh. 12:33).

3. The supposed author of his own memoirs in the books of EZRA AND NEHEMIAH (Ezra 7–10; Neh. 8–10). According to these records Ezra, whose genealogy is given in Ezra 7:1-5, led a caravan of Babylonian exiles to Jerusalem in 458 B.C. (if the seventh year of Artaxerxes I is meant in 7:8) or in 397, if Artaxerxes II is meant (vss. 6-10). Great authority was given him in an Aramaic royal decree (vss. 11-26), for which he thanked the Lord (vss. 27-28). A list of the exiles who returned with Ezra and of the temple vessels which they brought is given in ch. 8. In Jerusalem, Ezra was horrified by the toleration of marriages of Jews to heathen women (ch. 9). The congregation repented, the marriages were ordered dissolved, and a census of the mixed marriages was taken (ch. 10). The Book of the Law was read (Neh. 7:73*b*–8:12); the Feast of Tabernacles was celebrated; and a day of penance, followed by a general confession of sins, was observed (8:13–9:37). The leaders signed a ratification of the law as it was read (9:38–10:39—H 10:40), pledging themselves to oppose mixed marriages, to observe the sabbath and the sabbatical year, to pay the temple tax, and to supply the temple with the wood and the legal sacrifices and offerings.

This is all we know of Ezra from the Bible; even though he is called a priest and a scribe, even though he is said to have come from Babylonia with God's law in his hand, it is difficult to explain why he was regarded as a second Moses who revived Judaism. Most of his autobiography, if not all, was written by the Chronicler long after his death—assuming that he is a historical figure. One Jewish tradition identified him with the prophet Malachi (Meg. 15*a;* Targ. to Mal. 1:1); it is said that the whole record of Jewish literature was restored by him (Justinian de cultu feminarum I.3; cf. II Esd. 14); and, indeed, that "If Moses had not anticipated him, Ezra would have received the Torah" (Tosef. Sanh. 4.7). Long before, the Chronicler had regarded him as the founder of the guild of the scribes.

Bibliography. See the bibliography under EZRA AND NEHEMIAH, BOOKS OF. R. H. PFEIFFER

EZRA AND NEHEMIAH, BOOKS OF. A single volume in the Hebrew Bible and in the original LXX, until the two parts were separated in a Hebrew MS dated 1448 and in most printed editions, following the Vulg.; but Origen (died 254) and Jerome (died 420) knew this material as two books in Greek. They are the sequel of I–II Chronicles (Ezra 1:1-3*a* repeats II Chr. 36:22-23) and were written by the Chronicler (see CHRONICLES, I AND II), except when he quotes earlier sources. They relate the history of the Jews from 536 to 432 B.C.

1. Outline of contents
2. Canonicity
3. Historical problems
   - a. The edict of Cyrus
   - b. Interruption in the building of the temple
   - c. The building of the temple in 520-516
   - d. The work of Ezra
   - e. "The words of Nehemiah"
   - f. Opposition to the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem
   - g. Supplements to the memoirs of Nehemiah
4. Literary problems
5. Authorship and date

Bibliography

1. Outline of contents.

I. The return of the exiles (538 B.C.) and the rebuilding of the temple (520-516 B.C.), Ezra 1–6
   - A. Shesh-bazzar leads the Babylonian exiles to Jerusalem, chs. 1–2 1. The edict of Cyrus, 1:1-4
     2. Return of the exiles bringing the temple vessels, 1:5-11
     3. List of the returning exiles, 2:1-67
     4. Contributions to the temple, 2:68-70
   - B. Rebuilding of the altar in Zion and celebration of Tabernacles, 3:1-6
   - C. Rebuilding of the temple, 3:7–6:22
     1. The beginning of the work, 3:7-13
     2. Opposition of the Samaritans, ch. 4
        - a. Rejection of Samaritan assistance, 4:1-5
        - b. Accusations against Jerusalem under Xerxes I (485-465) and Artaxerxes I (465-424), 4:6-16 (vss. 8-16 in Aramaic)
        - c. Reply of Artaxerxes forbidding the fortification of Jerusalem, 4:17-23 (in Aramaic)
        - d. Interruption of the work, 4:24 (in Aramaic)
        - e. Completion of the reconstruction of the temple under Darius I (521-485) in 516, 5:1–6:18 (in Aramaic)
        - f. Celebration of the Passover, 6:19-22

II. The work of Ezra, Ezra 7–10 (concluded in Neh. 7:73*b*–10:39—H 10:40)
   - A. Introduction, 7:1-10
     1. Ezra's ancestry, vss. 1-5
     2. Ezra's trip to Jerusalem, vss. 6-10
   - B. Decree of Artaxerxes I (465-424), 7:11-26 (vss. 12-26 in Aramaic)
   - C. Ezra's doxology, 7:27-28
   - D. List of exiles who returned with Ezra, 8:1-20
     1. Genealogical list, vss. 1-14
     2. Additional Levites, vss. 15-20
   - E. The safe journey, with the holy vessels, 8:21-36
   - F. The mixed marriages, chs. 9–10
     1. Ezra's horror at the toleration of mixed marriages, 9:1-5
     2. Ezra's confession of sins in a prayer, 9:6-15
     3. The repentance of the congregation, 10:1-5
     4. The calling of a national assembly, 10:6-8
     5. The mixed marriages ordered dissolved, 10:9-17
     6. List of the men with foreign wives, 10:18-44

III. Nehemiah's administration of Judea, Neh. 1–12
   - A. Nehemiah allowed to go to Jerusalem, 1:1–2:8
     1. Nehemiah informed of Jerusalem's misery, 1:1-3
     2. His sadness and prayer, 1:4-11
     3. Nehemiah sent to Jerusalem, 2:1-8
   - B. Nehemiah's decision to rebuild the city walls, 2:9-20
     1. His arrival in Jerusalem, vss. 9-11
     2. His secret inspection of the walls, vss. 12-16
     3. His decision to rebuild the walls evokes the scorn of Sanballat and Tobiah, vss. 17-20

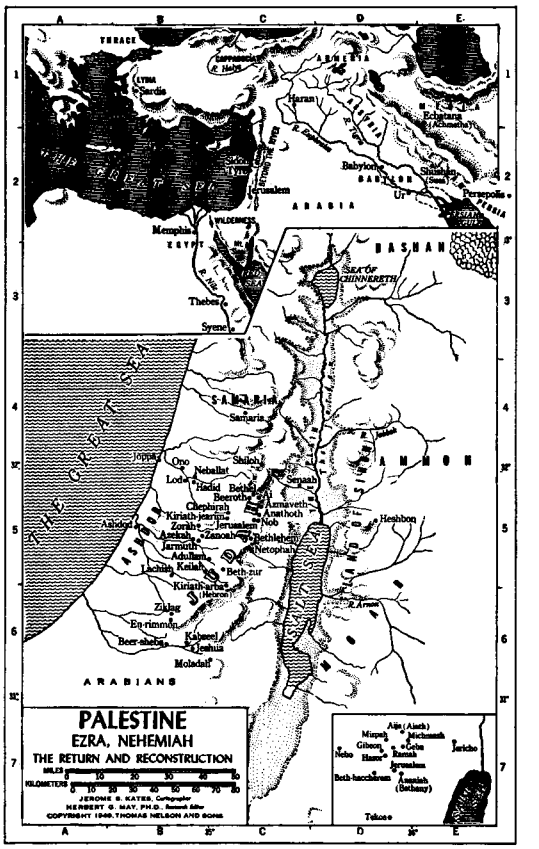
C. The building of the walls, chs. 3–4
   1. List of the wall builders, ch. 3
   2. Opposition of the enemies, ch. 4

D. Economic hardships, ch. 5
   1. Nehemiah's remedies for the hardships, 5:1-13
   2. His serving unselfishly twelve years as governor, 5:14-19

E. Plots of the enemies and completion of the walls, 6:1–7:5*a*
   1. Invitation to a conference, 6:1-4
   2. Slanderous accusations, 6:5-9
   3. False report of a planned assassination, 6:10-14
   4. The completion of the walls, 6:15
   5. The reaction of the enemies, 6:16-19
   6. Defensive measures, 7:1-3
   7. The small population of Jerusalem, 7:4-5*a* (continued in 11:1-2)

F. List of the returned exiles, 7:5*b*-73*a* (cf. Ezra 2)

G. The reading of the law, 7:73*b*–9:37 (perhaps to follow Ezra 10)
   1. Ezra's reading of the law, 7:73*b*–8:12
   2. Celebration of the Feast of Tabernacles, 8:13-18
   3. A day of penance, followed by a confession of sins in a long prayer, 9:1-37



H. The covenant ratifying the law, 9:38–10:39—H 10:40
   1. List of the signers, 9:38–10:27—H 10:28
   2. Pledges made, 10:28-39—H 10:29-40
      a. To avoid mixed marriages, 10:28-30—H 10:29-31
      b. To observe the sabbath and the sabbatical year, 10:31—H 10:32
      c. To pay the temple tax, 10:32—H 10:33
      d. To supply wood and offerings for the services, 10:33-34—H 10:34-35
      e. To supply the first fruits, firstlings, tithes, and other contributions to the temple, 10:35-39—H 10:36-40

I. Rearrangement of the population of Judea, ch. 11
   1. One in ten Jews to live in Jerusalem, vss. 1-2 (the sequel of 7:4-5*a*)
   2. Leaders living in Jerusalem, vss. 3-24
   3. Judean and Benjaminite villages, vss. 25-36

J. Priests and Levites who returned with Zerubbabel (538) and other lists, 12:1-26
   1. Priests, vss. 1-7
   2. Levites, vss. 8-9
   3. High priests from Joshua (538) to Jaddua (331), vss. 10-11
   4. Priests in the time of Joiakim son of Jeshua, vss. 12-21
   5. Levites in the days of Joiakim and Nehemiah, vss. 22-26

K. Dedication of the walls of Jerusalem, 12:27–13:3
   1. Gathering of the Levites and musicians, 12:27-29
   2. Purification of clergy and people, 12:30
   3. List of civil and religious authorities, 12:31-43
   4. Collectors of offering for the clergy, 12:44-47
   5. Exclusion of heathen from Jerusalem, 13:1-3 (cf. Deut. 23:3-7)

L. Nehemiah's second visit to Jerusalem, 13:4-31
   1. Nehemiah expels Tobiah, vss. 4-9
   2. Nehemiah collects the payments due the Levites, vss. 10-14
   3. Nehemiah enforces the sabbath observance, vss. 15-22
   4. Nehemiah's measures against mixed marriages, vss. 23-29
   5. Concluding summary, vss. 30-31

2. Canonicity. Since Ezra-Nehemiah reported historical information not available elsewhere and I-II Chronicles related the history told in Samuel and Kings (with additions), apparently Ezra-Nehemiah was canonized before I-II Chronicles. This seems to explain the incongruous order of the books in the Hebrew Bible, in which I-II Chronicles is the last book of the OT, as already in the Talmud (Baraita B. B. 14*b*). These books were all omitted from the biblical canon of the Syriac Christian Church and of Theodore of Mopsuestia (died ca. 428), as well as that of Nestorius (died ca. 451) and his followers.

3. Historical problems. All our historical information for the history of the Jews in the century 538-432 B.C., except for the rebuilding of the temple in Jerusalem (520-515 B.C.) reported in the books of Haggai and Zechariah, is contained in Ezra-Nehemiah; Josephus adds nothing but legends. Nothing is known of the century 432-331 B.C. The separate sources contained in Ezra-Nehemiah must be examined separately.

a. The edict of Cyrus. This famous edict (538 B.C.), allowing the exiles in Babylonia to go back to Jerusalem and rebuild the temple, is extant in II Chr. 36:22-23; Ezra 1:1-4; I Esd. 2:1-7 (cf. Ezra 6:3-5; I Esd. 6:24-26; Jos. Antiq. XI.i). The return of the Jews is reported in Ezra 1:5-11; I Esd. 2:8-15 (cf. Ezra 5:13-16; I Esd. 6:17-20). The returning exiles are listed in Ezra 2:1-67; Neh. 7:6-69; I Esd. 5:7-43 (cf. Jos. Antiq. XI.iii.10), and their contributions to the temple and settlement in Judea in Ezra 2:68-70; Neh. 7:70-73*a;* I Esd. 5:44-46.

The edict of Cyrus is extant in Hebrew (Ezra 1 and, partially, in II Chr. 36) and in Aramaic (Ezra 6:3-5; cf. 5:13-15). According to the Hebrew version, Cyrus declares that Jehovah had ordered him to build the temple, and all exiles are allowed to go to Jerusalem, bringing gifts from their heathen neighbors. According to the Aramaic version, Cyrus gave exact specifications for the new temple, to be built at the expense of the government, and ordered the return of the temple vessels. Both, if they are complete decrees, as they seem to be, can hardly be authentic. The first is generally regarded as spurious; but the second, while conceivably real, is historically a dead letter. For we know from Haggai and Zechariah that eighteen years later (520 B.C.) nothing was known of such a decree, which had never been enforced. Either Cyrus issued a decree to which no one paid any attention, or both versions of the decree are Jewish forgeries based on the dreams of Second Isaiah about a return of the exiles, and of Ezekiel about an imminent rebuilding of the temple.

The report of the Shesh-bazzar's caravan of exiles (Ezra 1:5-6) bearing to Jerusalem 5,469 temple vessels (2,499 is the actual total of those listed) in Ezra 1:7-11 (cf. 5:13-15) is manifestly a product of the Chronicler's vivid imagination. As for the list of those who had been exiled by Nebuchadnezzar in 586 B.C. and returned with Shesh-bazzar in 538, fifty-two years later (Ezra 2), it is said elsewhere to be a list of the inhabitants of Judea in the time of Nehemiah a century later (Neh. 7). Only an editor entirely unaware of the length of the Persian period (538-331) could have used this list, which may be an official record of a census of unknown date, for naming people alive from 586 to 444, at least 142 years. The historical value of the list, which may not be a concoction of the Chronicler, is unknown. In any case it is difficult to believe that the exiles in three deportations (597, 586, 581 B.C.; Jer. 52:28-30), numbering 4,600 men, could have become 42,360 descendants returning to Jerusalem fifty years later (Ezra 2:64), while many others stayed in Babylonia (Jos. Antiq. XI.i,iii); Neh. 1:3 knows nothing of any exiles that had returned. It seems that for the events of 538 the Chronicler had no genuine information.

b. Interruption in the building of the temple. Apparently in the seventh month of 538 (Ezra 3:1-7) the sacrificial worship was resumed in Zion (but see Neh. 7:73*b*); but the Chronicler's ignorance of facts unfortunately continues from 538 to 520, a period for which reliable sources may not have been accessible to him. For he assumes that the regular morning and evening burnt offering was offered before the temple was rebuilt and that the Levites began their service at twenty years of age (3:8, in contrast with Num. 4:3; 8:24). And he attributes the stopping of the work on the temple (allegedly begun in 536 B.C.) to Samaritan opposition (4:1-5, 24), long before the Samaritan Schism (in 432 or 332 B.C.), and adduces as evidence of this hostility a much later letter to Artaxerxes opposing the building of the walls (Ezra 4:6-23). None of the information for the period from 538 to the beginning of the building of the temple in 520, except perhaps some proper names, is historically credible.

c. The building of the temple in 520-516. For the inception of the work, the Chronicler in Ezra 5:1-2 could use the genuine information contained in Hag. 1:12, 14-15; Zech. 4:9; 8:9. But for its completion he lacked all sources and relied on his imagination (Ezra 6:14-22). Apparently unaware of the inconsistency, the Chronicler reports that the work began in 536 (Ezra 3:8-13; 5:16), for which there is no reliable evidence, and in 520 (4:24; 5:1-2), as was actually the case.

In 5:3–6:16 the Chronicler reproduces in Aramaic a letter to Darius I (5:6-17) and the king's reply (6:3-12), giving the text of the decree of Cyrus (6:3-5) and allowing the building of the temple. The authenticity of these documents has been defended by Eduard Meyer and seriously questioned by C. C. Torrey: critical opinion will probably remain divided on this question, although the presence of the decree of Cyrus (which had never been enforced for eighteen years; cf. Hag. 1:2; 2:15) militates against the historicity of this correspondence, which contains the incredible permission to the Jews to draw from the royal treasury in Syria unlimited funds for the building of the temple (6:8) and for the costs of the temple rituals (6:9-10). If such had been the case, the building would not have looked "as nothing" to those who remembered Solomon's temple (Hag. 2:3). These official documents and the narratives surrounding them were written obviously by a Jew—if not by the Chronicler, by an earlier writer of kindred spirit.

d. The work of Ezra (Ezra 7–10; Neh. 7:73b–10:39—H 10:40). The events of Ezra 7–10 are dated in the seventh year of Artaxerxes (7:7-8), and those in Neh. 8–10 in the twentieth year (1:1; 2:1). If Artaxerxes I Longimanus (465-424) is meant, the years in question would be 458 and 444; if Artaxerxes II Mnemon (404-358), they would be 397 and 384. Unfortunately critics have defended these various possibilities, and no unanimity of opinion seems possible: did Ezra's activity precede or follow Nehemiah's? Has the story of Ezra any basis in fact? Is Ezra, as W. F. Albright asserted, the Chronicler himself? Each part of the memoirs of Ezra should be tested separately for its historicity.

The genealogy of Ezra going back to Aaron (7:1-5) is obviously a concoction of the Chronicler: it is the Chronicler's line of high priests (I Chr. 6:3-14—H 5:29-40; cf. 6:50-53—H 6:35-38), which is at least in part unhistorical.

In his Aramaic decree, Artaxerxes (7:11-26) sent to Jerusalem Ezra "the priest, the scribe of the law of the God of heaven" (vs. 12), and gave to him unlimited authority—including the spending of funds from the royal treasury for the support of the temple (vss. 20-22), and forbidding the taxation of the Jewish clergy (vs. 24). The terminology of this decree is Jewish rather than Persian (see 7:15-17, 24-26; the Jewish law is identified with wisdom in vs. 25). S. R. Driver explains this as due to a Jewish revision, and R. Kittel as due to Ezra's or other Jews' participation in the redaction; the reproduction in the decree of the wording of Ezra's petition would also account for the Jewish style (E. Meyer). Other guesses are possible, but the authenticity of the decree can never be proved. Since Ezra was not a Persian official (as Nehemiah was), his powers are inconceivable. If the decree is questionable, the genuineness of Ezra's memoirs, of which it is part (7:27-28), is accordingly doubtful.

Ezra speaks in the first person only in 7:27–9:15 (except 8:35-36): he reports his journey from Babylonia to Jerusalem, and lists the laymen and the Levites who accompanied him, as well as the priests in charge of the gold, silver, and precious vessels (ch. 8). In Jerusalem he was shocked to hear that many Jews had married heathen wives (ch. 9). The story continues in the third person: the congregation was troubled, a popular assembly was called, and a census revealed that 113 Jews had married alien women (ch. 10). Unless a glorious end of Ezra's memoirs has been mysteriously lost, Ezra, though empowered to enforce the Jewish law by an edict of Artaxerxes, accomplished nothing except lamenting foreign marriages and taking a census. If nothing is lost, Ezra never had any royal authority whatsoever, and never was assured of the co-operation of the Persian authorities in Syria (Ezra 8:36). Whatever date we assign to Ezra's mission in Jerusalem, before or after Nehemiah's coming, nothing that is reported about him is unquestionably historical.

The attribution of Neh. 8–10 to Ezra's memoirs does not dispel the fog surrounding the work and personality of Ezra, who was regarded by the rabbis as a second Moses. If Ezra came from Babylonia in 458 (Ezra 7:7) with God's law in his hand (7:6, 14, 25), why did he wait until 444 (Neh. 1:1), when Nehemiah was allegedly present (Neh. 8:9; 10:1), to have it ratified? And why did he not sign the ratification with the others? The historicity of Neh. 8–10, much as we would like to assume it as basic for the canonization of the Pentateuch, remains questionable. If Ezra read the law in 458 (according to H. H. Schaeder), why did Nehemiah not enforce it until 432 (Neh. 13:4-31)? In conclusion, the extant information about Ezra is unreliable: he may well have been a historical character whose life was told by the Chronicler as romantically as that of David; or (as G. Hölscher claims) he may have been a purely legendary person unknown to Sirach (Ecclus. 49:11-13). So we must conclude with R. A. Bowman (IB, vol. III, p. 564): "The questions that divide scholars here are whether the Chronicler's function was that of an editor, compiling and arranging his sources, . . . or whether he was predominantly an author, using few sources . . . , but, on the other hand, writing from his own imagination great stretches of material."

e. "The words of Nehemiah" (Neh. 1:1–7:73a; 13:4-31). Although according to Neh. 5:14, Nehemiah was Persian governor of Judea from 444 to 432 (if Artaxerxes I is meant), a second visit in 432 is mentioned in 13:6. Nevertheless, the autobiography written by Nehemiah in 1:1–7:73*a* (and probably in 13:4-31) has always been regarded as substantially genuine and therefore the best historical source for Jewish history from 520 to 175 B.C.—in fact, one of the basic historical documents in the Bible. Only the conclusion in 13:4-31 has been questioned by critics (notably C. C. Torrey); there is no impelling reason for denying its historicity.

f. Opposition to the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem (Ezra 4:6-23). The accusation against the Jews in the time of Xerxes I (485-465) is not reproduced in Ezra 4:6, but the one under Artaxerxes I (465-424) in vss. 7-10 is given in full (vss. 11-16), as well as the royal answer (vss. 17-22); 4:8-24 is in Aramaic. The Chronicler in vs. 24 confused the objections to the building of the fortifications of Jerusalem (vss. 7-23) with alleged objections to the building of the temple (which presumably no one objected to). This misunderstanding does not necessarily mean that these documents are not historical; on the contrary, it is proof that the Chronicler did not write them. These are the least suspect of all the Aramaic documents, but may nevertheless be Jewish forgeries.

g. Supplements to the memoirs of Nehemiah (Neh. 11:1–13:3). C. C. Torrey regards them as written by the Chronicler, while others consider them quoted from "the Book of the Chronicles" (Neh. 12:23). It is questionable whether any historical information about Nehemiah may be gleaned from these passages, although they may shed a little light on the days of the Chronicler.

4. Literary problems. In spite of rare dissenting voices it is now certain that the Chronicler, who wrote I–II Chronicles, is the author or editor of Ezra-Nehemiah; the only question is what sources he incorporated into his work. The autobiography of Nehemiah (Neh. 1:1–7:73*a;* and perhaps 13:4-31) has never been seriously questioned as a genuine earlier source, but the authenticity of the memoirs of Ezra is by no means above suspicion, as has been seen above. And critics who have concluded that Ezra's memoirs are authentic have reached widely differing conclusions about what they included, since only in 7:27–9:6 does Ezra speak in the first person. In fact, all attempts to determine the original contents of the Ezra memoirs (if, indeed, there was such a document) must forever remain conjectural. The style and contents of the Ezra narratives are so similar to those of the Chronicler that they have plausibly been ascribed to him and, as has been seen above, furnish no genuine historical information. If the Chronicler is not the author of the Ezra memoirs, as seems likely, they must have been written by a kindred spirit in the fourth century or by an imaginative editor who freely expanded a brief account about Ezra. But if the Chronicler really used some Ezra source, it had been so rewritten before him or by him that it is hopeless to attempt to identify it. Even the dossier of Aramaic official documents in 4:8–6:18; 7:12-26 is thoroughly Jewish in character and much later than the Persian kings to whom the decrees and the letters are attributed. Unless the Chronicler freely compiled the whole collection, the most likely view is that the Chronicler found this dossier in a Jewish work composed shortly before his time; but 7:12-26 seems to be entirely from his hand, as the Ezra memoirs in general. This does not, however, mean that Ezra was a purely fictitious character. He may well have been a Jerusalem Jew in the time of Nehemiah, remembered for his learning and piety, and selected by the Chronicler, who was wont to date Jewish institutions considerably earlier than their true origin (as temple music in the time of David), as the first of the scribes (סופרים; γραμματεῖς, νομικοί) or students of the law (Ezra 7:10-11). There were, however, no scribes before the canonization of the Pentateuch ca. 400 B.C. Scribes and teachers were probably familiar in the time of the Chronicler, although the first one known to us is Ben Sirach, the author of Ecclesiasticus (ca. 180 B.C.), in which he gives us samples (in poetry) of his classroom lectures and of his biblical learning.

Although the memoirs of Nehemiah are the only genuine source used by the Chronicler in Ezra-Nehemiah, their actual extent is disputed. Presumably they are contained in Neh. 1–7; 12:27-43; 13:4-31, which may include some additions and revisions. E.g., the statement in Neh. 5:14, according to which Nehemiah remained in Jerusalem 444-432, is out of harmony with the obvious briefness of his first visit (2:6; 6:15), the reported events of which lasted less than a year. The prayer in 1:5-11 resembles the national confessions of sin in Ezra 9:6-15; Dan. 9:4-19, which are for the most part echoes of Deuteronomy. The hand of the Chronicler appears in 4:2; 5:13; 7:1-3, and elsewhere; the list of the wall builders (3:1-32) may not have been an original part of the memoirs. The unquestionably genuine parts from the pen of Nehemiah are 1–2; 4:1–6:19 (with some revisions); and presumably the kernel of 7:1-5*a;* 11:1-2; 12:31, 37-40; in spite of the traces of the Chronicler's work, evident in 13:1-3, the account of Nehemiah's second visit in 432 (notably in 13:14-27, 29, 31) sounds like an authentic expression of Nehemiah.

In contrast with the pale and ineffective personality of Ezra, Nehemiah stands forth as a vigorous and successful man of action. Through his energy, self-denial, and shrewdness he brought new life to the helpless and pathetic Jewish community in Jerusalem, and may have saved it from extinction. He stood at the end of an era: the Hebrew language was giving way to Aramaic as the vernacular (Neh. 13: 23-24), and the heroic period of Judah was becoming the pious age of the Jewish congregation, obedient to the law of Moses.

5. Authorship and date. Seldom and with dubious arguments has it been denied that the same author wrote, and in part edited, I–II Chronicles and Ezra-Nehemiah, as seems obvious from the style, interest in the ritual and in the Levites, and sacrifice of historical reality to the glorification of Judaism. Curiously, A. C. Welch and W. A. L. Elmslie regard the identity of the end of II Chronicles and the beginning of Ezra as a proof that these books were written by different authors. (For the characteristic views of the Chronicler, who is generally considered the author of Chronicles-Ezra-Nehemiah, see CHRONICLES, I AND II.) The view that the Chronicler is Ezra (cf. the early rabbis, church fathers, and commentators) has been revived by W. F. Albright.

The Chronicler presumably wrote between 350 and 250. The list of David's descendants comes down to at least 350, and the latest high priest, Jaddua (Neh. 12:11, 22), was a contemporary of Alexander (died 323), according to Jos. Antiq. XI.vii.2; viii.7. Most likely the Chronicler wrote a few years before 250. Of course, those who regard these two passages as later additions date the Chronicler ca. 400; by emending Ezra 7:8 and supposing that Ezra followed Nehemiah under Artaxerxes II (404-358), R. A. Bowman concludes that the Chronicler was active "no earlier than about 365-350 B.C." (IB, III, 554).

Bibliography. Commentaries: C. Siegfried in W. Nowack, ed., Handkommentar (1901). A. Bertholet in K. Marti, ed., KHC (1902). L. W. Batten, ICC (1913). W. Rudolph in O. Eissfeldt, ed., HAT (1949). M. Rehm in F. Nötscher, ed., Echter Bibel (1950). J. J. Slotki, Soncino Books of the Bible (1951). R. A. Bowman, Introduction and Exegesis of Ezra and Nehemiah, IB, III (1954), 551-819.

Special studies: C. C. Torrey, Ezra Studies (1910). J. Meinhold, "Ezra der Schriftgelehrte?" in K. Marti Festschrift, BZAW, vol. 41 (1915). S. Mowinckel, Ezra den Skriftlärde (1916); Statholderen Nehemia (1916). J. A. Bewer, "The gap between Ezra Chapters 1 and 2," AJSL, 36 (1919), 18-26. M. Kegel, Die Kultusreformation des Ezra (1921). W. F. Albright, "The Date and Personality of the Chronicler," JBL, 40 (1921), 104-24. A. van Hoonacker, "La succession chronologique Néhémie-Esdras," RB, 32 (1923), 481-94; 33 (1924), 33-64. H. H. Schaeder, Esra, der Schreiber (1930). M. Burrows, "Nehemiah 3:1-32 as a Source for the Topography of Ancient Jerusalem," BASOR, 14 (1934), 115-40. A. C. Welch, Post-exilic Judaism (1935). R. de Vaux, "Les décrets de Cyrus et de Darius sur la reconstruction du Temple," RB, 46 (1937), 29-57. M. Noth, Überlieferungsgeschichtliche Studien, I (1943), 110-80. A. S. Kapelrud, The Question of Authorship in the Ezra Narrative (1944). A. Bentzen, "Ezras Persönlichkeit," Studia Theologica, 2 (1948), 95-98. H. H. Rowley, "The Chronological Order of Ezra and Nehemiah," Ignace Goldzieher Memorial Volume (1948). A. Bentzen, "Sirach, der Chronist und Nehemiah," Studia Theologica, 3 (1949), 158-61. K. Galling, "The 'Gōlā-List' according to Ezra 2 = Nehemiah 7," JBL, 70 (1951), 149-58. I. Arana, "Sobre la colocación original de Neh. 10," Estudios Bíblicos (1951), pp. 379-402. N. H. Snaith in H. H. Rowley, The OT and Modern Study (1951), pp. 107-14; "The Date of Ezra's Arrival in Jerusalem," ZAW, 63 (1952), 53-66. H. H. Rowley, The Servant of the Lord (1952), pp. 131-59. A. Jepsen, "Nehemiah 10," ZAW, 66 (1954), 87-106. M. Avi Yonah, "The Walls of Nehemiah," IEJ, 4 (1954), 239-48. H. H. Rowley, "Nehemiah's Mission and Its Backgrounds," Bulletin of the Johns Rylands Library, 37 (1954-55), 528-61; "Sanballat and the Samaritan Temple," Bulletin of the Johns Rylands Library, 38 (1955-56), 166-98. H. Cazelles, "La mission d'Esdras," Vetus Testamentum, 4 (1954), 113-40.

See also bibliography under CHRONICLES, I AND II.

R. H. PFEIFFER

EZRAHITE ĕz′rə hīt [אזרחי; LXX Ἰσραηλείτης]. The family or clan of Ethan and Heman, legendary wise men and poets (I Kings 4:31; Pss. 88:1; 89:1). The word is probably a gentilic form of "Zerah," since I Chr. 2:6 designates Ethan and Heman as sons of Zerah.

H. H. Guthrie, Jr.

EZRI ĕz′rī [עזרי, my help] (I Chr. 27:26). Son of Chelub; the steward in charge of the agriculture of the crown lands in the time of David.

FABLE. A form of didactic narrative in which plants or animals think, speak, and behave as people do. The fable is related to the ALLEGORY and the PARABLE; in all three types the actors and what they do resemble, but remain distinct from, the characters, who are the narrator's real concern, and their actions. The reader or hearer knows the difference, draws the parallel, and discerns the moral. What distinguishes the fable from the other forms is the human behavior in it of trees and beasts and inanimate nature.

The Hebrew Bible contains two prime examples of the fable. Both are political. The longer one is spoken to the lords of Shechem by Jotham, sole survivor among the sons of Jerubbaal after Abimelech's coup (Judg. 9:8-15). The trees, seeking a king, appeal in vain to the olive tree, the fig tree, and the vine; the bramble alone is willing—but promises tyranny. In the second, shorter fable (II Kings 14:9), Jehoash of Israel rebuffs King Amaziah with an insult: A thistle acted presumptuously against a cedar, and a wild beast came and trampled the thistle. The first biblical fable (above) warns the people of Shechem against the violent Abimelech; the second suggests to Amaziah that he is courting disaster. What is told in a fable does not, of course, really happen, and this the hearer well knows; the story is recounted and heard for the sake of the "moral" only.

What is said of Solomon in I Kings 4:33—H 5:13 about his speaking "of trees" and "of beasts" may mean that he was reputed as a fabulist.

S. H. BLANK

FACE [אף, nose (Gen. 3:19); עין, eye (Exod. 10:5); פנים; πρόσωπον]. In many instances "face" refers simply to the human or animal face, but it is also used analogically in such figurative expressions as "face of the deep" or "face of the waters" (Gen. 1:2), "face of the ground" (Gen. 2:6), or "face of the sky" (Matt. 16:3 KJV).

The face is the part of the body through which a man's attitudes are most clearly expressed. Therefore, "to avert or hide the face" from a person is to express displeasure (Ps. 102:2; Ezek. 39:23); "to set the face against" is to express hostility (Jer. 21:10); "to make the face to shine upon" is an indication of friendly acceptance (Num. 6:25); and "to set the face to" expresses determination (Jer. 42:17; Luke 9:51).

Since a man's "face" reflects his personality and character, the word can be used to mean "person" and is frequently so translated. Thus, in the English phrase "to respect or regard persons" the word for "persons" in the original is literally "faces" (Deut. 1:17 KJV; Matt. 22:16 KJV). In some cases it is used in a weakened sense in which it is merely the equivalent of a personal pronoun (Jer. 1:8; cf. KJV with RSV). In other instances it has the more precise sense of "presence" and is so rendered in the English versions (Exod. 10:11; Acts 5:41).

From this last idiom is derived the most important theological use of the term "face," for it occurs repeatedly with regard to the presence of God. Sometimes the Hebrew or Greek word for "face" is simply translated "presence" (Gen. 4:16; II Thess. 1:9); in many other places the concrete word "face" is allowed to stand, but will be better understood when regarded as a metaphor for the more abstract word "presence" (Ps. 27:8; Matt. 18:10). In a few places the "face (or presence) of the Lord" seems almost a hypostasis (like ANGEL; NAME; GLORY)—the term is used to designate a local manifestation of Yahweh where motives of reverence have led the writer to avoid the unqualified use of the divine name or a pronoun referring to divinity; the clearest example is Exod. 33:14-15. The phrase "BREAD OF THE PRESENCE" (Exod. 25:30; KJV "shewbread") is to be interpreted in the light of this conception.

Bibliography. A. R. Johnson, "Aspects of the Use of the Term פנים in the OT," in H. J. Fück, ed., Festschrift Otto Eissfeldt (1947), pp. 155-59.

R. C. DENTAN

FACETS [עינים, eyes] (Zech. 3:9); KJV EYES. The flat surfaces of a cut gem. A stone with seven facets on which inscriptions were to be placed was given to the postexilic priest Joshua. See JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES.

L. E. TOOMBS

FAIENCE. The term applied to a type of glazed siliceous ware used in Egypt from predynastic times for the manufacture of tiles, vessels, small figures of animals and human beings, and ornamental jewelry. The material consists of two or three layers: (a) an inner core of comparatively coarse grains of quartz, (b) a second layer (often not present) of finely ground quartz, usually white, to enhance the (c) external layer, a glass glaze with various chemically obtained colors.

Bibliography. A. Lucas, Ancient Egyptian Materials and Industries (2nd ed., 1934), pp. 101-15.

T. O. LAMBDIN

FAIR HAVENS [οἱ Καλοὶ Λιμένες] (Acts 27:8). A harbor on the S side of Crete.

The harbor is doubtless to be identified with a bay E of Cape Littinos which is still known as Kalous Limionas. This anchorage opens to the E and SE and is partially protected by a few small islands. In 1853 Captain T. A. B. Spratt found the ruins of a chapel dedicated to Paul (Hagios Paulos) on a hill overlooking the haven. This naval officer considered that the harbor would be inconvenient and unsafe in winter on account of E and SE winds blowing directly into the bay; this accords with the opinion expressed in Acts 27:12. See also LASEA.

Bibliography. T. A. B. Spratt, Travels and Researches in Crete (1865), II, 1-6; H. Balmer, Die Romfahrt des Apostels Paulus und die Seefahrtskunde im römischen Kaiserzeitalter (1905), pp. 315-18; M. N. Elliadi, Crete, Past and Present (1933), p. 139.

J. FINEGAN

FAITH, FAITHFULNESS. Faith is belief in something or trust in some person. In theology it properly describes man's apprehension of the absolute or transcendent. It is response to revelation as contrasted with discovery of new knowledge. KNOWLEDGE is correlative with facts or information or truth, and belongs to the sphere of epistemology. Faith is the more distinctively religious term. There is a necessary distinction here, though it is misleading to differentiate too sharply. For faith may be described as a kind of knowledge, and certainly reason is involved in the act of faith ("blind" faith being a psychological impossibility). In relation both to faith and to knowledge, certitude is predicable.

For the Bible the object of faith is God, and the highest personalization is reached in the NT proclamation that God has revealed himself in a human life, and may be addressed as "Father of our Lord Jesus Christ." In this usage faith is primarily trust rather than belief, a matter of personal relationship rather than of abstract knowledge.

Faith is the indispensable preliminary without which true religious experience cannot develop. It is man's initial awareness of God and also a continuing attitude of personal trust in God. God's movement toward man is primary; the initiative is with God. But there must be the corresponding movement on the human side, and this is basically what is meant by faith. For this reason the importance of faith cannot be overemphasized. Religious and moral attainment is impossible without it. The NT affirms that "all things are possible to him who believes" (Mark 9:23); right standing with God is by faith alone (Rom. 1:17; 5:1; Gal. 2:16; etc.); "without faith it is impossible to please him" (Heb. 11:6).

Whether this is defined as an act of the reason or of the will, or whether it is viewed as pure passivity, may be disputed. The main thing to note is that it is man's acceptance of God, and response to God's offer of himself; man's receiving of God's gift, rather than his own gift, effort, or achievement. God has spoken his WORD (and the Bible mediates this word [Heb. 1:1-2]). Man can say Yes or No to it. Faith is man's Yes to the Word of God. And when the Word comes to a focus in Christ, faith also may be said to center on this focus.

A. Terminology
1. Hebrew
2. Greek
3. In the NT
a. The Synoptic gospels
b. The Pauline writings
c. The Johannine writings
d. The adjective
B. Conception of faith in the OT
1. Recognition of God as the living One
2. A moral response
3. In relation to the covenant
4. A corporate experience
5. Signs
6. Fear of the Lord
7. An exclusive demand
8. The keeping of the law
C. Conception of faith in Judaism
D. Conception of faith in the NT
1. The Jewish heritage
2. The teaching of Jesus
3. Primitive Christianity
4. The distinctive Pauline connotation
a. Relationship with God
b. The new creation
c. Freedom
d. Sonship
e. The content of the Christian faith
f. Love
g. Conviction
5. The distinctive Johannine connotation
a. Basic ideas
b. The significance of "witness," μαρτυρία
c. Acceptance of testimony
d. How faith arises
e. Jesus the object of faith
6. Definition of faith in Hebrews
7. Other NT connotations of faith
Bibliography

A. TERMINOLOGY. 1. Hebrew. The most important of the Hebrew terms for faith is the root אמן, which signifies "firmness," "stability." The verb is used in the Hiph'il in the sense "believe," "trust," "say Amen to" anyone or anything. It is not a strictly causative meaning, as is usual with the Hiph'il form of the verb, but declaratory. The verb is constructed absolutely, or with the prepositions ב and ל (trust in a person or thing), and occasionally with כי ("that" —i.e., an object clause). A relationship is implied, and ultimately a personal one, for behind the object which is the basis of trust there is a person. The outstanding usage is that in which God is the object, and this is implied even when there is no preposition (e.g., Ps. 78:32). The precise meaning is "hold God" (נאמן; Niph'al participle)—i.e., "trustworthy," the fundamental reality; nothing is so sure, permanent, or reliable as God.

The LXX renders האמין by πιστεύειν 45 times and 6 times by a compound of πιστεύειν, by πείθεσθαι once, mostly followed by the dative corresponding to ב or ל.

For the absolute use, see Exod. 4:31; Ps. 116:10; Isa. 7:9; 28:16. The basically religious meaning passes into the moral one of "resolution," especially in face of danger. This is contrasted with the timidity of Ahaz (Isa. 7:4) and the frantic opportunism of other rulers in Jerusalem in Isaiah's time (Isa. 28:15).

For the use with ב: (a) of belief in God, see Gen. 15:6; Exod. 14:31; Num. 14:11; Deut. 1:32; II Chr. 20:20; Ps. 78:22; (b) of trust in men, see Exod. 19:9; II Chr. 20:20; Job 4:18; Jer. 12:6; (c) of belief in things, see Pss. 106:12, 24 (words); 119:66 (commandments); 78:32 (miracles—RSV "despite his wonders" is unnecessary).

For the usage with ל, see Gen. 45:26; Exod. 4:1, 8; Exod. 4:8-9 (belief in "signs"); Isa. 43:10 (in Yahweh); 53:1. No distinction of meaning can be derived from the use of these two Hebrew prepositions.

Two nouns from the same root, אמת (107 occurrences) and אמונה (47 occurrences), occur fairly frequently in the sense of "firmness," "faithfulness." They have often been translated "truth" in English versions, and in the LXX they are rendered ἀλήθεια, "truth," rather than πίστις (ἀλήθεια 119 times; πίστις 26 times). This is probably because they correspond to the Niph'al form of the verb, which has a more passive meaning, and because the Hiph'il form (which becomes πιστεύω in the LXX) did not get its proper cognate noun until the Aramaic stage of development of the Hebrew language. These two nouns are used with reference to God and men alike. They are often associated with חסד, "grace," "steadfast love," and צדק, "right."

These words tend to become comprehensive terms for true religion—e.g., אמת in Pss. 25:5; 26:3; 86:11; Dan. 8:12; 9:13; 10:21; אמונה in II Chr. 19:9; Jer. 7:28; Hab. 2:4. The same tendency is observable with the verb.

Five other verbs fall to be considered in this connection: first, בטח (LXX πεποιθέναι, ἐλπίζειν), "feel oneself secure," is used 57 times in a religious reference, 60 times in a secular sense. The basis of trust may be God or man. If a distinction is to be made between it and האמין, it will be that בטח implies a state rather than a relationship of response or mutuality. But often the words are used interchangeably, as in Ps. 78:22. בטח is a general term like האמין for the attitude of the true believer. Cf. Pss. 32:10; 37:3; 125:1; Prov. 16:20; 28:25; 29:25; Jer. 39:18; Zeph. 3:2.

Another verb, חסה (LXX ἐλπίζειν 20 times, πεποιθέναι 9 times, and other verbs in 7 other places), "seek refuge," "hide oneself," especially in God, as in Ps. 25:20, is used only 5 times in a secular sense, as against 34 times in a religious sense.

There are three other verbs of waiting or hoping, capable of a secular sense as well as a religious one: קוה, יחל, and חכה. The most prominent LXX renderings are ἐλπίζειν and (ὑπο)μένειν. We need not differentiate between them, and it is sufficient to refer for illustration of their usage to Pss. 33:20-22; 37:9; 42:5; 130:5-7; Isa. 8:17; 40:31. There are times when faith can show itself only as hoping against hope; the Lord seems to be hiding his face (Isa. 8:17) or disregarding man's right (Isa. 40:27). But even then faith which still "waits for the Lord" is distinguishable from mere resignation. The first of the two verbs in Isa. 8:17 is חכה, which seems to carry an aura of secrecy or mystery (cf. Dan. 12:12; Hos. 6:9). See WAIT; HOPE.

2. Greek. In classical Greek usage the verb meant "trust," "have confidence in," whether of persons or of things (expressed normally by the simple dative), or "believe," in the sense of "be confident that" (followed by the infinitive or an ὅτι clause). The noun πίστις signified "trust," "confidence," or more objectively "trustworthiness," often in the concrete sense of "pledge," "guarantee," "proof." The word could be used with reference to things divine, but for religious belief in a general sense—e.g., in the existence of God—a Greek would probably use a different verb—e.g., νομίζω. A specifically religious sense for πιστέυω was not developed until the Hellenistic period; the older usage, of course, continued. Of authors who might be quoted from the period prior to and contemporary with the NT, we must be content to refer to two only, the Hermetic writer(s) and Philo.

The Hermetic tracts are difficult to date but are roughly contemporary with primitive Christianity. They show affinity both with Philo and with Gnosticism, and set forth a philosophic mysticism. Their place of origin is probably Alexandria, and Hebrew influence is not out of the question. The word πιστεύω has here come to mean "receive revelation" —i.e., "be on the way to attain salvation and immortality." This is due to reason—not simply to the intellective faculty in man, but to divine illumination. God himself is conceived as Mind (νοῦς). Faith is thus identified with the higher knowledge, which is the way of salvation. An enlightened member of these sects can say: "I believe [πιστεύω] and bear testimony; I enter upon life and light" (Corpus Hermeticum I.32). Philo's voluminous pages show most of the Greek meanings for πίστις and πιστεύω, as well as some coloring from the more personal, Hebraic sense, when he speaks of "faith toward God" (ἡ πρὸς θεὸν πίστις). But he can also use the words in a mystic-philosophic sense—e.g., when he defines πίστις as ἀφανοῦς ὑπόληψις, "apprehension of the unseen." The meaning "revelation" perhaps lies behind Ignatius' reference to Christ as the "perfect faith," ἡ τέλεια πίστις (Ign. Smyrn. 10.2).

See also the notion of "truth" in the Dead Sea Scrolls (see § C below).

3. In the NT. The linguistic usage of the NT (πιστεύω, "I believe"; πίστις, "faith") may be examined in a threefold classification: (a) the Synoptic gospels, representing (roughly) primitive Jewish Christianity, based on the teaching of the Lord himself; together with Acts, James, the Pastoral letters, Hebrews, and Revelation, representing non-Pauline Christianity; (b) the Pauline writings; (c) the Johannine writings.

a. The Synoptic gospels. The most common of the usages to be noted here is the absolute use of the verb in the sense of belief in God (Christ) as almighty, as self-revealing, and as beneficent in his attitude toward mankind, particularly toward his worshipers (Matt. 8:13; 21:22; Mark 5:36; 9:23; 15:32; Luke 8:12-13, 50; Acts 4:4; 5:14; 8:13, 37; 11:21; 13:12, 39, 48; 14:1; 15:7; 17:12, 34; 18:8; 19:2). The participles of this verb are used with the article as a term for Christians—e.g., Matt. 18:6; Acts 22:19; I Pet. 2:7 (present participle); Mark 16:16-17; Acts 4:32; 11:21; Heb. 4:3 (aorist participle); Acts 15:5; 18:27; 19:18; 21:20, 25; Tit. 3:8 (perfect participle).

Among less frequent uses there is the meaning "trust," "give credence to," with the dative case of the person or thing (e.g., Matt. 21:25, 32; Mark 16:13-14; Luke 1:20; Acts 8:12; 16:34; 24:14; 26:27; 27:25; II Tim. 1:12; Jas. 2:23). Three other cases, without a following dative, are in this category of meaning: Matt. 24:23, 26; Luke 22:67. In Acts 18:8 the simple sense of "trust" has given way to the more specific sense of "conversion," "faith."

Sometimes the object of the verb is expressed by a "that" (ὅτι) clause (Matt. 9:28; Mark 11:23-24; Luke 1:45; Acts 9:26; Heb. 11:6; Jas. 2:19). This repeats the LXX rendering כי after האמין. Twice the object is stated by an accusative and infinitive (Acts 8:37; 15:11).

In a few cases the object of faith is indicated by the use of a preposition: by εἰς and the accusative (Matt. 18:6; Acts 10:43; 14:23; 19:4; I Pet. 1:8); by ἐπί with the accusative (Matt. 27:42; Acts 9:42; 11:17; 16:31; 22:19); by ἐπί with the dative (Luke 24:25; I Pet. 2:6; I Tim. 1:16); by ἐν with the dative (Mark 1:15). No distinction of meaning can safely be drawn. It is better to regard these prepositional constructions simply as influenced by the Hebrew usage of האמין followed by ב or ל.

As for the use of the noun, πίστις, in the Synoptic gospels, it mostly carries the meaning of confidence in God and trust in his power to heal and save. Jesus urges his hearers to have this faith in God (Mark 11:22), or he pronounces after a cure: "Your faith has made you well" (Mark 5:34 etc.). This is a straightforward usage, and this meaning must be maintained in two passages of some obscurity (Luke 18:8; 22:32). Similarly in Acts (see especially 14:9). Three times in Pauline speeches (Acts 20:21; 24:24; 26:18) the specific reference of faith to Christ is brought out by the use of εἰς with the accusative following the noun, a usage already noted in connection with the verb.

b. The Pauline writings. The Pauline letters do not exhibit any real development of usage, as compared with the foregoing, but it is justifiable to treat them as a separate class because of their extent and because of the significant place which Paul's theology assigns to faith. This will be noted here, more particularly in the case of the noun πίστις; for a full exposition, see § D4 below.

It is the participial use in which Paul shows the largest accord with the writings of our first classification. It looms even more prominently in his total usage, as the following references indicate: Rom. 1:16; 3:22; 4:11; 10:4, 11; I Cor. 1:21; 14:22; Gal. 3:22; Eph. 1:19; I Thess. 1:7; 2:10, 13. These are present participles, mostly in the plural, with the article: "the believing ones," as a synonym for Christians or church members. In two instances (II Thess. 1:10; 2:12) Paul uses the aorist participle similarly, referring more specifically to the time when those concerned attained their faith. In Gal. 3:8-9 as an alternative to "believers" he coins the phrase "those who depend on faith" (οἱ ἐκ πίστεως). There are further instances of the absolute use of the verb in Rom. 4:18; 10:9-10; 13:11; 15:13; I Cor. 3:5; 15:2, 11; II Cor. 4:13.

Each of the syntactical forms already noted recurs in Paul, but none is prominent. There is no additional construction either with the verb or with the noun. The verb is found with the dative 4 times; with ἐπί and the accusative twice, ἐπί and the dative once; with εἰς 3 times; with ἐν once; with the accusative of direct object once; with the accusative and infinitive once; with a ὅτι clause twice.

The noun πίστις in Paul carries deeper and more theological significance than the usage we have considered in the first classification. This arises to a large extent from his more rabbinical treatment of the OT, particularly in his connection of it with δικαιοσύνη (justification) and νόμος (law). He is closer to Synoptic usage when he gives πίστις the sense of utter dependence on God and belief in his power, as in Rom. 4:16-20; Col. 2:12. But in these it is clear that it is a theologian rather than a historian of the church who is writing. One occurrence with θεοῦ as subjective genitive is noteworthy (Rom. 3:3): this is God's faith in the sense of trustworthiness, a familiar OT conception of God, which is not normally expressed in the NT by the noun πίστις, but by the adjective πιστός. The objective genitive Ἰησοῦ or its equivalent—faith centered on Jesus (Christ)—occurs several times (Rom. 3:26; Gal. 2:16, 20; 3:22; Eph. 3:12). Once the noun is coupled with ἐν χριστῷ (Col. 1:4; cf. Eph. 1:15), once with εἰς χριστόν (Col. 2:5), in Christ.

c. The Johannine writings. The Johannine usage is very distinctive. It is clearly rooted in the primitive usage of the church, as is seen from the reappearance of the use of the verb followed by the dative, with a ὅτι clause, and from the absolute use. There are also two cases of a noun in the accusative as direct object of the verb (John 11:26; I John 4:16).

The absolute πιστεύειν is very frequent (John 1:7, 50; 3:12, 15; 4:41-42, 48, 53; 5:44; 6:47, 64; 10:25; 11:15, 40; 12:39; 14:29; 16:31; 19:35; 20:8, 25, 29).

The usage with the dative, in the meaning "give credence to," whether of persons or of things, is somewhat more frequent than in earlier NT writers (2:22; 4:21, 50; 5:24, 38, 46-47; 8:45-46; 10:37-38; 14:11 [combined with a ὅτι clause]; I John 3:23; 4:1; 5:10). There seems to be no difference of meaning between this and the usage with εἰς, which we are about to consider (cf. John 6:29-30; 8:30-31; I John 5:10).

We now come to the more characteristic Johannine development. The usage with ἐν is not found (with the possible exception of 3:15, where, however, the participle πιστεύων is taken absolutely by some commentators). In 20:31 the phrase "in his name" belongs to "may have life" rather than to "believing." The usage with ἐπί also is absent from John. The use of the ὅτι clause after πιστεύω, on the other hand, is much more frequent in John than in other NT writers. It gives the content of the thing believed and thus constitutes a more intellectual sense than the moral sense of reliance implied by the dative usage; it means, not trust in Christ, but belief that he is Messiah or was sent by the Father, or the like. Thus πιστεύω is approximating to γινώσκω, "I know." The references are: 8:24; 11:27, 42; 13:19; 14:10-11; 16:27, 30; 17:8, 21; 20:31; I John 5:1, 5. See KNOWLEDGE.

On John's identification of believing with knowing, see John 4:42; 6:69; 16:30; 17:3, 8, 20-25; I John 4:16*a*. Some scholars distinguish πιστεύω as the beginning of the right attitude (to Jesus; to ἀλήθεια, "truth") from γινώσκω as the riper development (cf. John 4:42; 6:69; 8:31-32; 10:38). For the connection with truth, see John 8:45-46; 18:37; 19:35; I John 5:20; II John 1-4; III John 3-4. From I John 2:21-23 we see how knowing the truth is synonymous with knowing Christ, because the opposite is denying Christ, the nadir of unbelief. Here, as in I John 3:1-6; 5:1-5—and elsewhere—John can write almost indiscriminately of knowing and believing in Christ. Finally, there is the usage with εἰς in John 2:11; 3:16; 4:39; 7:38-39; 9:35-36; 11:45, 48; 12:36-37, 44, 46;

14:1, 12; I John 5:10. This usage is as prominent in John as it is rare elsewhere in the NT, and seems to have no parallel in the LXX or nonbiblical Greek. Some see no distinction between this usage and that with the dative, and certainly in some places they are merely alternatives—e.g., John 14:11-12. But if εἰς is more than an equivalent for the Hebrew ל or ב after האמין, it may be intended to point definitely to Christ as the basis or true center of faith. (In that case it approximates to the usage with ὅτι, believing something about Jesus—e.g., his messiahship or sonship [20:31; cf. Rom. 10:9; I Thess. 4:14, his resurrection]). This is even clearer in the more elaborate construction εἰς τὸ ὄνομα πιστεύειν (John 1:12; 2:23; 3:18; I John 5:13; to which we may add I John 3:23 [τῷ ὀνόματι]). "To believe into the name of Christ" means to receive Christ. The use of "name" recalls the baptismal formula and was perhaps chosen because of baptismal practice, with its implication that the baptized convert passed into Christ's lordship like a slave entering the possession of a new owner. Alternatively, believing on the name might mean, in accordance with OT conceptions, believing or accepting or appreciating fully the character or authority of Jesus (cf. "name" in John 10:25; 17:6). See also NAME.

The noun πίστις, "faith," does not occur in John except in I John 5:4. This is probably not accidental, but parallel with the (deliberate) avoidance of the noun γνῶσις, "knowledge."

d. The adjective. Πιστός carries on the ordinary Greek sense, both active and passive, whether of persons or of things: "trustful," "trustworthy"; cf. Luke 16:10-12; I Thess. 5:24; I Cor. 1:9; I Tim. 1:15; II Tim. 2:11, 13. In the LXX it is used of persons, like Abraham, Samuel, David; Abraham in particular is often called ὁ πιστός, "the faithful one" (Num. 12:7; I Macc. 2:52; II Macc. 1:2; Ecclus. 44:20; cf. Gal. 3:9). Also it is used of things—e.g., the covenant (Ps. 88[89]:28); commandments (Ps. 110[111]:7); water (Isa. 33:16). For its use in reference to God, see Deut. 7:9; 32:4; Isa. 49:7. The NT develops a new meaning which makes πιστός synonymous with πιστεύων, the present participle of the verb—i.e., "a believer," "a Christian"; sometimes τῷ κυρίῳ, "to (or in) the Lord," is added (John 20:27; Acts 16:1, 15; I Cor. 4:17; Eph. 1:1; Col. 1:2; I Tim. 4:10; I Pet. 1:21). The antithesis is ἄπιστος, which moves away from the meaning "untrustworthy" to that of "unbelieving" (Mark 9:19; Luke 12:46; I Cor. 6:6; 7:12-15; 14:22-24; II Cor. 6:15). Similarly the noun ἀπιστία (Mark 6:6; 9:24; Rom. 11:20, 23; I Tim. 1:13; Heb. 3:19).

From the positive sense is derived the Christian coinage ὀλιγόπιστος (Matt. 6:30; 8:26; 14:31; 16:8).

B. CONCEPTION OF FAITH IN THE OT. In the light of the linguistic usage catalogued above, and with reference to the teaching of the OT as a whole about God and man's relationship with him, we may set out the OT conception of faith under the following eight heads:

1. Recognition of God as the living One. The foundation stone of OT faith is that God is the One to whom the world and every living thing owe their existence and on whom they depend for their survival and well-being (Gen. 1-2; Exod. 3; 20:2-3; Deut. 4:39; Isa. 43:10-11; cf. Rom. 4:17*b*; I Cor. 8:6*a*). This is axiomatic for biblical authors. The skeptical effusion Ecclesiastes was not accepted into the canon of the OT until orthodox insertions had been made which conformed to this axiom.

The objective reference to the ground of faith is typical of Hebrew thought. The subjective factor of man's feeling about God is not much considered. Man must accept the fact of God and his own dependence, and this is faith. The worthiness of the object is stressed; the attitude of the subject is not analyzed.

Man's status before God is that of a creature in relation to its creator, a finite being in relation to the infinite (Gen. 1-2). A distinction is made between man and all other creatures, in that he is affirmed to bear the image and likeness of God (Gen. 1:26-27); but the gulf created by his failure to conform to the Creator's intention is also emphasized (Gen. 3:22).

This is embryonic in Gen. 3, and reiterated in Deuteronomy, with its frequent calls to observe the divine statutes (4:40; 6:25; etc.) and equally frequent warnings of the consequences of refusal (1:43; 30:15-20), and also in the prophetic exposure of the people's sins. See SIN.

Thus it appears that penitence and obedience, rather than faith, are the key words; or faith as a moral quality—i.e., faithfulness (as in Hab. 2:4; Matt. 23:23; Gal. 5:22)—rather than as a primarily religious quality, directed to God rather than to men.

Consider how obedience is stressed in the case of Noah (Gen. 6:9, 22; 7:5); Abraham (Gen. 22:1-18—an example of faith being put to the test; cf. Heb. 11:8, 17); Joshua (Josh. 1:7-8; 24:22-31); Samuel (I Sam. 15:17-33). See OBEDIENCE.

2. A moral response. Faith in the OT is thus a moral response, not the acceptance of ideas or dogmas about God. It concerns will rather than intellect or emotions. It is trust rather than belief. This corresponds to the nature of Yahweh and his revelation. See GOD, OT; REVELATION.

The personal character of God is not fully known until he can be called, as in the NT, the "Father of our Lord Jesus Christ."

3. In relation to the covenant. The meaning of faith must be seen in relation to the covenant, not simply in relation to creation. It is trust in the God who within his general providence has brought Israel into a special relationship with himself; Yahweh "chose" Israel (Deut. 7:6-7). The covenant implied a mutuality of obligation (Deut. 26:16-19). Yahweh can be relied on to keep his part of the contract, to "keep the covenant and the steadfast love" (Deut. 7:9); this is his "faith" or faithfulness (האל הנאמן). Faith on the side of his earthly partner is to be shown in keeping the "commandment and the statutes and the ordinances" (6:17; 7:11). The book Deuteronomy is very significant in demonstrating the significance of the COVENANT, which is central in Hebrew religion. Man's faith is based on God's trustworthiness as evidenced in blessings received.

In addition to this obligation to keep the commandments, the following key words of Deuteronomy may be noted: man is to heed (lit., "hear") the statutes (4:1; 7:12); to cleave or hold fast to Yahweh (4:4; 10:20); to seek and turn to him (4:29-30); to turn, in the sense of "repent," after apostasy (30:2-10); to obey his voice (4:30); to love him "with all your heart," etc. (6:5); to fear him (6:2, 13; 10:20); to remember him (7:18-19; 8:2-3, 18-20; 9:7). As noted above, faith and duty are closely allied; for the Hebrew the moral aspect of faith took precedence over the intellectual and emotional. The other main emphasis in Deuteronomy is on undivided loyalty to Yahweh and full concentration on his service. This faith clearly includes a sense of election and membership of a specially favored people. Josh. 4:24 makes a contrast between Israel, who are to fear Yahweh, and the rest of mankind, who are to recognize his power. It is not denied that other nations may have some knowledge of God. Their worship is often mocked at, but the maturer thought of the OT allows that Yahweh is the God of the whole earth and has concern for all nations (e.g., Ps. 33:8-22). But Israel is drawn into a special relationship (Ps. 33:12). For her, therefore, faith is a heightened kind of awe, trust, and hope, insofar as Israel experiences Yahweh's "steadfast love" (חסד), the characteristic term for Yahweh's concern for his covenant people (Ps. 33: 18-22).

This development of faith depended on being born an Israelite, a "son of Abraham." Abraham's own faith and experience are thus exemplary for his descendants, and the references to them must be considered.

The earliest statement of the promise to Abraham is Gen. 12:1-3. In the work of the priestly school this is related to the foundation of the covenant between Israel and Yahweh (Gen. 17:1-8, 19-21; Exod. 6:4-8; Deuteronomy, passim). The promise is repeated in Gen. 15:1-6, where we have specific mention of Abraham's faith in vs. 6*a:* "and he believed (in) Yahweh." The meaning clearly is "confidence in Yahweh's promise." The distinctive verb which is used (האמין ב) implies the dependability of the one to whom the faith is directed, and is cognate with the important noun inadequately rendered "truth" in many English versions (e.g., 24:27; 32:10).

Paul's exegesis of this passage (Rom. 4:17-21) is correct. The faith in question apprehends God as one who brings into being things which do not exist (vs. 17*b*).

In contrast to this Pauline emphasis on faith Gen. 12:4 points to Abraham's obedience (cf. 26:5; 22:18). This is why Jewish exegetes could refer to Abraham as an exemplar of righteousness rather than faith; even 15:6 makes a connection between faith and righteousness, and the Pauline argument of Rom. 4 revolves around righteousness as well as faith.

The promise to Abraham is fundamental in these narratives of the patriarchs (Gen. 17:1-8, 19-21; 26: 3-5, 24-29; 28:13-15; 35:11-12; 48:4 [cf. Exod. 32:13; Deut. 34:4; Josh. 21:43-45; 24:1-13]). God guarantees it, and this is his "truth" (אמת), or faithfulness. On man's side, faith is simply believing that God is of such a character, even when the evidence seems to point the other way (see Gen. 17:17-18). See ABRAHAM.

It remained for Christian development to point out that it was possible to be a son of Abraham without being a member of the true people of God—in Pauline phraseology, to have descent from Abraham "according to the flesh," but not "according to the spirit" (Matt. 3:7-10; 7:21; 8:11-12; Luke 16:24-25; John 8:33-47; Gal. 3:26-29; Rom. 4).

In the Christian proclamation there was a new center of loyalty, Christ, taking the place of Abraham and Moses; a new covenant replacing the old. The old faith, which could have been described as faith in the name of Abraham, is sublimated into faith in the name of Jesus Christ.

4. A corporate experience. The religion of Israel was a corporate rather than an individual experience. This must be kept in mind when we are considering faith. The individualized conception of faith implied in modern usage, especially among Protestants, is not to the fore in the OT.

To some extent the Psalms, with their many expressions of individual piety, provide an exception to this. The tendency of scholars to assign larger numbers of Psalms to a pre-exilic date emphasizes at the same time their corporate usage (see PSALMS, BOOK OF). In this discussion it is easy to erect false antitheses. It must be remembered that an originally private confession or prayer may become the expression of a whole congregation's devotion, as any hymnbook shows.

As used in the organized worship of Israel, particularly the greater temple festivals, the Psalms are unique expressions of Israel's faith. We note the following:

a) Many Psalms give evidence of intense personal trust in God, even though the specific terms for faith or hope, etc., are not used (e.g., 42; 46; 51; 63; 84; 96; 102–3; 116; 118; 121; 139; 145).

b) Yahweh's faithfulness—i.e., the ground of man's faith—is often referred to (e.g., 36:5-7; 89 passim; 92: 1-2; 94:18; 98:1-3; 100:5 [cf. Isa. 26:1-4]).

c) Trust in Yahweh is most frequently expressed as thankfulness and joy over some deliverance (e.g., 5:11; 9:10; 13:5; 18:1-3; 22:1-5; 27:14; 62:1, 5-8; 141:8). Sometimes this deliverance is from "enemies" or "the wicked" (e.g., 7:1; 11:1; 17:7; 25:1-2; 31; 56; 86; 143).

d) Faith appears sometimes as undivided concentration on Yahweh (16:1, 8; 37:1-9; 62).

5. Signs. Distinctive of Hebrew religion was the sense of the need for a "sign" (אות). The underlying thought is that whoever, God or man, is worthy of trust must be able to give evidence of it: a primitive, but not ignoble idea; for the sign means the presence of God, and his readiness to save, as in John's Gospel 2:11, etc.). The following passages refer to signs in connection with the classic deliverance from Egypt: Exod. 4:1-9, 30-31; 7:3; 14:31; Num. 14:11; Deut. 4:34; 7:19. For signs of the saving presence of God at other times of crisis, see Judg. 6:36-40; Isa. 7:10-17; Dan. 4:2-3. See also SIGNS AND WONDERS.

6. Fear of the Lord. The Hebrew's trust in God could contain within itself the fear of God. These two basic attitudes were not incompatible. This again is typical of Hebrew religion (cf. Ps. 40:3; 56:3). Fear of Yahweh is paralleled with hope in his love (Ps. 147:11). In Dan. 6:26-27 true religion is defined as fear of the living God and belief in his power to deliver his faithful servants from danger. (See also Gen. 22:12; Exod. 14:31; Lev. 19:14, 32; 25:17; Isa. 8:13.)

The fear of the Lord is allied to knowledge and wisdom (Isa. 11:2). It is the "beginning" of wisdom (Ps. 111:10; Prov. 1:7); i.e., it is the primary requisite for one who would be wise. The Hebrews were on the side of those who say, "I believe in order to understand." The only reasoning that mattered for them was that which started from the presuppositions of faith—a faith, moreover, which trembled in reverence before God.

If a man fear Yahweh, what else need he fear? asks a psalmist (Ps. 27:1)—i.e., the fear of Yahweh brings a sense of security, and thus is related to trust or confidence (cf. Job 4:6, where Eliphaz says to Job: "Is not your fear of God your confidence?").

The full exposition of this language would set it in the context of the conception of God as King and Father, and of the divine holiness. See FEAR.

7. An exclusive demand. Hebrew religion made a total demand upon its adherents (cf. Deut. 6:5; 18:13; I Kings 8:61; 11:4; Isa. 38:3). The ideal of unwavering confidence in Yahweh is expressed in David's utterance before Goliath (I Sam. 17:37, 45-47). The twin ideal is undivided allegiance. "You shall have no other gods before me" (Exod. 20:3= Deut. 5:7). Idolatry is regularly ridiculed and condemned, and apostasy is the sin of sins. Faith in Yahweh is thus an exclusive faith, corresponding to the jealousy of Yahweh, who will not give his glory to another (Isa. 42:8). See also JEALOUSY.

There is linguistic support for this in the fact that האמין, the master verb in the vocabulary of believing, is never used of devotion to false gods (though בטח and חסה are). It is the absolute use of האמין which is significant. Two passages of Isaiah come up for consideration here, and perhaps justify the claim that Isaiah saw more deeply into the significance of faith than any other OT author. The passages in question are 7:9; 28:16. Isaiah condemned the behavior of Jerusalem's rulers at two times of crisis: in 734, when a confederation of Israel and Syria was threatening Judah; and in 701, when an Assyrian army was approaching. In his judgment their action was at best political opportunism, at worst sheer panic. He in the strength of his faith in God could detach himself from the immediate danger and survey it objectively in its true proportions. He was sure of God's presence ("Immanuel," "God is with us," seems to have been a favorite word of his during the earlier crisis: 7:14; 8:8, 10). They, on the other hand, took no account of God at all. Their fear prompted only resort to superstition (8:19). Isaiah's utterances seem to mean that Israel needs real principles for her statecraft, and these can be derived only from her religion; no political or any other security is possible without faith:

> If you will not believe,
> surely you shall not be established > (7:9).

The verbs in both clauses here are from the same Hebrew root, אמן, but this wordplay cannot be reproduced in English. Again, "He who believes [Hiph'il participle used absolutely] will not be in haste" (28:16): the man of faith has a stability that saves him from joining in a general panic (cf. 30:15-18).

This is faith which expresses the whole man, a fundamental attitude determining the whole of a man's conduct, a total dedication of the self to God (8:13), resulting in peace of mind, freedom of action, and true strength (30:15, where גבורה, "strength," signifies basically the strength of the male as contrasted with the female, then the valor of a warrior). Isaiah describes it as the foundation stone of the true religious community (28:16; cf. I Pet. 2:6, where this verse is applied with some aptitude to the Christian church).

8. The keeping of the law. In the postexilic period faithfulness to the law was the increasingly dominant expression of faith. Torah was, in the words of S. Schechter, "both an institution and a faith." The faithful are presented as ideals of law-observing righteousness—e.g., Daniel and Judith (Dan. 1:8; 6:10; Jth. 8:5-6; 11:17); the Maccabees and their supporters (I Macc. 2:29-38, 49-68). In Bar. 4:1-2 the Torah is:

> the book of the commandments of God, > and the law that endures for ever.
> All who hold her fast will live, > and those who forsake her will die.

In the wisdom literature the law is not prominent, except in Ecclesiasticus, where it is identified with wisdom, and we read:

> All wisdom is the fear of the Lord, > and in all wisdom there is the fulfilment > of the law (19:20; cf. vs. 24).

In Jubilees the law is the revelation of eternal and absolute truth and right, every detail is of perpetual relevance, and no further revelation is necessary. Aristeas 158, 168, speaks of it as divine oracles (λόγια) and even calls it "the Scripture" (ἡ γραφή): "Its purpose is to enable us throughout our whole life and in all our actions to practise righteousness before all men, being mindful of Almighty God." In IV Maccabees the martyr Eleasar in his defense before Antiochus declares: "We do not believe any stronger necessity is laid upon us than that of obedience to the Law" (5:16). On the other hand, the author of the apocalyptic work known as IV Ezra, brooding over the problem of sin and destiny, finds this superficial and not sufficiently related to hard experience. For him the law is indeed glorious and eternal, but its acceptance by Israel as God's gift has not enabled them to keep it and become perfect; evil could still triumph over good in men's hearts (3:20-22). Thus the law cannot redeem; only God in his mercy can do that. The rabbis would argue that the law does have this power, and that its study is a sufficient antidote against evil. II Baruch also is more optimistic about what the law can do:

> In Thee do we trust, for lo! Thy law is with us, > and we know that we shall not fall so long as > we keep Thy statutes (48:22).

But for IV Ezra man's trust cannot rest on possession of the law, but only on God himself.

C. CONCEPTION OF FAITH IN JUDAISM. Judaism as reflected in the APOCRYPHA and the PSEUDEPIGRAPHA (ca. 200 B.C.–A.D. 100) understood faith in the same sense in which the OT speaks of it. The difference is that it contains a larger element of loyalty to Hebrew traditions, and centers more closely round observance of the law, and, in Palestine itself, the services of the temple. Increasing acquaintance with Gentile ways inspired fresh denunciations of idolatry (e.g., the later chapters of Wisdom and the verses of the Jewish Sibyllists), and confirmation of the monotheism of the Shema ("The LORD our God is one LORD" [Deut. 6:4]), and of the conviction that Israel is God's covenant people, distinguished by divine election from all other peoples. Emphasis on the sovereignty and transcendence of God was deepened. He is the God of the whole earth, and will ultimately vindicate Israel—the latter theme belongs particularly to the apocalyptic writers. A generous attitude toward Gentiles (e.g.:

> The compassion of the Lord is for all living beings.
> He rebukes and trains and teaches them, > and turns them back, as a shepherd his flock
> [Ecclus. 18:13];

cf. also the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs) alternates with a less generous one (Jubilees and IV Ezra). Certain special doctrines are developed, if not actually introduced. The chief of these concerns life after death; teaching about angels and demons was much developed. In some writers (e.g., Tobit, the Prayer of Manasses) we find a deep belief in the power of prayer and an intense, if simple, piety. But on the nature of faith itself, as an attitude of the soul or as communion with God, nothing significantly new appeared. The best that can be quoted is perhaps the passage in IV Maccabees (15:1–17:2), concerning the martyrdom of the seven sons of Eleasar at the hand of Antiochus' torturers, and the fortitude with which their mother encourages them to endure. This the author regards as due not only to reason inspired by the Jewish law (one of his main themes), but also to the "nobleness of faith."

This Judaism was essentially practical, concerned with carrying out in daily conduct the precepts of the law. The Shema and the Ten Commandments were its only creed, and its aim was orthopraxis rather than orthodoxy. "I believe in thy commandments," cries a late psalmist (Ps. 119:66; similarly Ecclus. 33[36]:3). It would, however, give a wrong impression to speak of Jews' believing in the law. Fundamentally they believed in God, apart from whom nothing was conceivable, and the law called forth their highest energies because it was his greatest gift to them.

In the Diaspora some development of the conception of faith is to be noted. The Jews had to see their religion in contrast with polytheism. This resulted in a new appreciation of the excellence of monotheism. Also, as a consequence of proselytism, a conception of faith grew up as acceptance of a truer religion, which a man deliberately chooses for himself as distinct from what he has been born and brought up in. The distinction between believers and unbelievers begins to be seen as not coterminous with that between Jew and Gentile. National boundaries are irrelevant here. The "fool" of Ps. 53:1 is not necessarily a Gentile! Physical descent is not the only claim to a share in the inheritance of Abraham. This is a very significant development in religion. It is a movement toward a more intellectual understanding of faith (i.e., belief) and away from the understanding of faith as personal trust or fidelity (see Wisd. Sol. 11:26–12:2; 13:1-9; 15:1-6; IV Macc. 15:24; 16:18-23; 17:2).

It must be admitted that it is often impossible to dogmatize about the precise meaning of faith in writings of this category, because some are available only in translations of the original.

In Philo of Alexandria (20 B.C.–A.D. 49) the biblical basis is clear, though Philo drank deeply of the Greek spirit. He frequently contrasts reliance on the outward world and the things of sense (φαινόμενα) with trust in God; for him faith is essentially a turning away from the world to concentrate on God. This is not entirely negative, for Philo is convinced that he has a positive apprehension of reality. The unseen world is real to him; faith is a kind of certainty (βέβαια ὑπόληψις). He has learned this from Plato, but he has also learned from the OT more than Plato could teach him about the oneness, the creative sovereignty and providence, of God, the supreme reality. He believes, moreover, that the mind which is constantly striving to apprehend God may be granted a more immediate vision in the experience of ecstasy (ἔκστασις). His conception of faith, therefore, has more in common with the mystic's search for ultimate reality than with that personal trust in God as revealed, which is the hallmark of the Bible's pioneers of faith. Moreover, he retains enough of Jewish moralism to speak of faith as "queen of the virtues"; in a sense, he sees faith as one's duty to God.

For rabbinic Judaism faith meant confidence in God, the simple acceptance of God's existence and his good intention toward Israel. As with the OT, it was hardly at all speculative; and the answer, if people found faith difficult to maintain in the face of life's hardships, was Rabbi Akiba's dictum: "A man should habitually say all that the Merciful [i.e., God] does is for the best." This confidence was based on God's acts of deliverance in Israel's history, more particularly the deliverance of the Red Sea.

This faith moves over into the sense of loyalty, faithfulness, as in Hab. 2:4, or as in the case of Abraham. The rabbis, like Philo, often cite Abraham as an outstanding example of faith, quoting Gen. 15:6 but expounding it, with other passages—e.g., Gen. 22—to show that Abraham fully conformed to God's will. This is the overriding connotation to faith for the rabbis: obedience to the law in every detail.

This implies that for the rabbis, as for Judaism of the last two centuries B.C., a subtle shift of emphasis has taken place in the conception of God and incidentally of faith as well. For whereas in the OT faith is centered on God's saving acts in history and human experience, now the basis of faith is a written record. This means a kind of petrifaction of history, for canonized tradition instead of the events of history has become the vehicle of the divine revelation; God is a voice or a pen rather than a person. These are the seeds of the controversy which we meet in the writings of Paul concerning faith and works. There was need of a new prophet to rescue the concept of faith as personal response to God, and as the precondition of moral obedience rather than as identifiable with moral obedience.

The Qumran brotherhood, as revealed in the hymns of the Dead Sea Scrolls, had a conception of God's "deep truth" and of themselves as its children or inheritors. It is not clear whether this is simply the late Jewish veneration for the Torah, or whether it has the more mystic sense of revelation. This community may be contemporary with the NT, but the date is disputed. See DEAD SEA SCROLLS.

D. CONCEPTION OF FAITH IN THE NT.

1. The Jewish heritage. The basic belief in God is always presupposed (Mark 11:22; Acts 16:34; 27:25; I Thess. 1:8; Heb. 6:1).

For the sense of belief in the word(s) of God or the written word of scripture, see: Luke 1:20; 24:25; John 2:22; 5:46-47; Acts 24:14; 26:27.

For faith as trust in God (the dominant meaning in the teaching of Jesus), see: Mark 2:5; 5:34, 36, etc.; II Cor. 5:7. More particularly, as trust in God's power, see: Mark 4:40; 9:23; 11:22-23; Luke 17:6; Acts 14:9; Rom. 4:17-20; I Cor. 12:9; 13:2; Heb. 11 passim; Jas. 1:6; 5:15.

For the meaning "obedience," see: Rom. 1:5; 6:17; 10:16; 15:18; 16:26.

For the close connection between faith and hope, see: I Thess. 1:3; Rom. 4:18; I Cor. 13:13; I Pet. 1:9, 21; Heb. 11:1.

For the meaning "faithfulness," see: Matt. 23:23; Gal. 5:22; I Pet. 1:7; 5:9; II Tim. 4:7; Heb. 11:7; Jas. 1:3.

2. The teaching of Jesus. For Jesus himself, faith was essentially trust in God. God is King and Father, and is lovingly present to heal and help man in his need and sin. Jesus' sense of the presence of God must be pronounced unique. His faith was, indeed, communion with God to which human experience offers no parallel, and the Christian doctrine of his divinity and unique sonship was later formulated to express this. The basis for this doctrine is his own teaching as recorded in the gospels. Critical treatment of the gospels must attempt to measure how much can reliably be attributed to the Master himself, and how much is the belief of the early church or the opinion of the evangelist. But in this matter of Christ's divine sonship—i.e., his unique relationship to God such as could be attributed to no other man—sane criticism can hardly reject as unauthentic three basic passages where Christ refers to God as Father in a sense which puts him alone in the category of Son: Mark 12:1-9 (this makes his sonship as unique and unrepeatable as Calvary); 13:32*b*; Matt. 11:27 (=Luke 10:22). See also SON OF GOD; FORM CRITICISM.

It is presumptuous to attempt to reconstruct the inner consciousness of Jesus. But it may be affirmed that his sense of his special relationship to God as Father is behind all his utterances about faith. God's fatherly presence is nearer than men conceive; miracles can be done, if only men would expect miracles (Mark 11:20-24). God is waiting to shower his gifts upon men, but men are so loath to receive them (Luke 11:9-13; 14:16-24; 18:1-8). Divine power is available to heal men's sicknesses, just as divine mercy longs to forgive men's sins (Mark 2:5-12; note the dialogue, and the contrast between the faith of the few [vs. 5] and the amazement of the majority [vs. 12] and the objections of an ecclesiastical vested interest [vs. 7]; cf. 3:1-6). It appears that Jesus was surprised at people's obtuseness and unwillingness to count on God's goodness and power to save (Mark 5:34, 36). On the other hand, he expressed appreciation when he found genuine faith (Luke 7:9) or penitence (Luke 7:50).

The opposite of faith is worry, so typical of mankind. The animal and plant creation simply relies on divine providence: if only men could follow that example, instead of being "of little faith," chary of trusting God! The secret is to give priority to God and his kingdom (Luke 12:22-32). Something like irritation seems to be attributed to Jesus over the fact that one distracted parent was too anxious to expect healing for an epileptic boy, and that the disciples whom he had trained had lost the power to put that father in touch with divine healing (Mark 9:17-24, 28-29). Similarly he rebukes the disciples after a storm (Mark 4:40), not simply for cowardice, but for losing faith—i.e., forgetting that God is near and his providence real. This incident throws light on the distinction between Jesus and his most intimate followers: no storm or crisis could shake his faith (cf. Matt. 14:31). The lack of faith of his fellow countrymen surprised him (Mark 6:6): how was it that people through small-mindedness could doubt the power of God, and refuse to recognize the prophetic word and wisdom bestowed upon him? On the assumption of Jesus' real humanity, there need be no doubt about the genuineness of his surprise on these occasions (it may be detected also in Luke 17:5-6, 17-18). Reflection on it may have led him to compare his own experience of human obtuseness with that of Isaiah, and to formulate the theory that lies behind Mark 4:11-12. Many scholars, however, regard this theory as due to the disappointment of some early Christian missionaries over the response to their preaching. However this may be, we may take his surprise as a further indication of the intimacy of his own communion with God, or of the depth of his own faith, as compared with that of his audiences.

God is King as well as Father; the kingship or kingdom of God is the other twin focus round which the teaching of Jesus moves. And faith in God's kingship meant for Jesus belief that through his ministry in Palestine, God was dynamically present as never before in Israel's history; in fact, his kingdom was then entering into human experience, was "at hand" (Mark 1:15; 9:1), or even "has come" (Luke 11:20= Matt. 12:28; Luke 16:16=Matt. 11:12; Luke 17:21 [cf. Luke 4:17-21]; see also KINGDOM OF GOD).

The teaching of Jesus is the laws of this kingdom. His "I say unto you" outdates the ancient laws to the same extent to which the presence of God's kingly rule outdates the prophecy and promise of it (Matt. 5:1-11, 17-48). His power to heal is the liberating power of God; his victorious attack on the evil that plagues human life (demons) is the overthrow of Satan's kingdom in order that God's kingdom may be established (Luke 10:1-11, 16-20; 11:14-23). His presence constitutes the kingdom, and his disciples are its citizens, for their response to his invitation is entry into the kingdom (Matt. 18:3-4; Mark 10:15; 12:34; Luke 14:21-23). It is the greatest of privileges (Luke 10:23-24). It may also be called the culmination of faith, or faith being transformed into sight—in fact, the vision of God (Luke 10:21-22). See also TEACHING OF JESUS.

3. Primitive Christianity. The teaching and ministry of Christ culminated in his death and resurrection, and the total impact of all this on the minds of his disciples generated the Christian faith. In its specifically Christian meaning "faith" is faith in God's decisive activity through Christ for man's redemption (Acts 2:22-24, 32-33; 4:10-12; 10:37-43; 13:26-39; Rom. 4:24-25; I Pet. 1:20-21).

It was not a general belief in God, nor even in the saving activity of God as proclaimed in the OT; but in God as finally revealed in and through Christ. (The usage of the Greek verb with the prepositions εἰς and ἐπί—i.e., belief directed into or upon Christ—aptly expresses this.) For the NT, Christ is the new focus of faith.

It should not be forgotten, however, that although Jesus himself, as we have seen, spoke of faith mainly as faith in God as Father and King, he also called men to believe in himself. The focusing of faith on Christ was an element in his own ministry, and not merely a product of the Resurrection. In this point it is more than ever necessary to scrutinize the gospel records so that what was really the later conviction of the church is not wrongly attributed to him. But when every caution is taken, it must be allowed that many utterances of Christ did so direct men's attention and loyalty to himself that they constitute the nucleus or embryo of the fuller apprehension which the Resurrection made possible. The following verses may be so interpreted: Mark 8:34-38 (cf. Matt. 10:37-38); 9:37 (cf. Matt. 10:40); 10:29-30, 32*b*, 38, 45; 11:9-10, 29-33; 12:1-11, 35-37; 13:6*a* ("in my name"), 9*b* ("for my sake"; cf. Matt. 10:18), 13*a* ("for my name's sake"), 31-32; 14:17-25; Matt. 9:28 (where note "I am able," not "God is able"; this use of the first-person pronoun may, however, be due to the evangelist); 10:24-25, 32-33; 11:27-30; 16:17-19; 19:28.

In primitive Christianity faith meant, in the first place, acceptance of the gospel message (Acts 8:13-14; Rom. 10:17; I Thess. 2:13; John 20:31). The core of this message was that God's redemptive actions culminated in Jesus of Nazareth, whose divinely controlled ministry terminated in martyrdom, but who was authenticated as Messiah and Lord by his resurrection from the dead (Acts 2:36-38). On faith as acceptance of Christ's lordship (i.e., absolute, divinely given authority), and its relation to his resurrection, see Rom. 1:3-6; 10:9; and on faith in the Resurrection as faith in the activity (ἐνέργεια) of God, see Eph. 1:19-20. Faith was normally accompanied by baptism as the sign of repentance and guarantee of forgiveness and renewal by the Holy Spirit (Acts 2:38; 10:43; 18:8; 20:21). Faith "in the name of Jesus," or "through him," releases divine power to heal (Acts 3:16; 4:10; 9:34). He is the Servant of God, the Prophet of Deut. 18, the fulfiller of all God's promises (Acts 3:25), the Son of God (Acts 9:20), the only mediator of salvation (Acts 4:12).

Those united in these new convictions can be described as "the believers" (Acts 4:32; 11:21, where the aorist participle implies reference to the point in the past when the belief was attained—i.e., conversion; more commonly the perfect participle is used, implying the continuing attitude of faith [cf. Acts 15:5; 16:34; 18:27; 19:18; 21:20, 25]). The noun "the faith" is summarily used for these convictions—i.e., the fundamental kerygma (Acts 6:7; 13:8; 14:22; 16:5).

Gentiles also were included, for the "door of faith" (Acts 14:27) was opened to them as well as to Jews. What this meant for a typical non-Jewish community is illustrated in I Thess. 1–3. Their faith produced results ("work"; 1:3; 2:13); they lived a "life worthy of God" (2:12). It meant, basically, abandoning idolatry for the one true God, and trust in Jesus as their future deliverer (1:9-10). They could rely on the faithfulness of God (5:24; cf. II Thess. 3:3).

This faith, as evidenced at the earliest stage of the church's existence, may be summarized as follows:

a) Break from the past, from other religious allegiances (I Cor. 8:6; I Thess. 1:9*b*), from sin (Acts 3:19; Rom. 6:12-23). It meant repentance (Mark 1:15; Acts 2:38; 20:21; Heb. 6:1).

b) It is still belief in God's word, but that word has been personalized in Christ (Acts 11:17; 14:23; 16:31). A personal relationship to Christ is implied, even though the adequate expression of this had to wait for such moving reflections of Paul's experience as Gal. 2:16, 20; Phil. 1:21; 3:8-12; 4:13; II Cor. 1:20; 4:4-6 (cf. I Pet. 1:8).

c) Faith is not only the subjective attitude, but also the content of what is believed (Acts 6:7; Jude 3, 20; Eph. 4:5; I Tim. 1:19; 3:9; 4:6). This aspect is seen even in Paul (Rom. 1:5; 4:14 [where faith is parallel to law]; 10:8; Gal. 1:23; possibly also Gal. 3:23, 25). The meaning of faith in I Cor. 15:14, 17, combines both senses mentioned above.

d) The meaning of the verb πιστεύειν, "to believe," ranges from "attain faith"—i.e., be converted (especially in the aorist; Acts 4:4; 8:13; 9:42; etc.)—to "exercise faith" and "have faith"—i.e., not the activity but the state of being a Christian, not a Jew or a pagan.

e) It is the conviction that God has not only acted in the past history of Israel but also is acting now decisively and finally (Acts 2:17-21; 3:18-21; I Cor. 10:11*b;* Heb. 1:1-2).

4. The distinctive Pauline connotation. In Paul we find a new emphasis on the indispensability of faith. Only when a man has faith is he in a right relation with God, able to understand himself and to act rightly. Faith is not, as with Philo, the goal of man's religious development, but its beginning. "You stand fast only through faith" (Rom. 11:20). "Whatever does not proceed from faith is sin" (Rom. 14:23).

a. Relationship with God. Faith as means of right status with God ("reconciliation," καταλλαγή), as endowment with righteousness (δικαιοσύνη), is the sense in Acts 13:39; Rom. 1:16-17; 3:21-22; Gal. 2:16 (here "justified" is the verb cognate with the noun "righteousness"). See also RECONCILIATION; RIGHTEOUSNESS (NT).

The basic human problem is: How can a man be good, realize his ideals, attain righteousness? This may be treated, as in ancient Greece and by modern humanism, as a problem of independent ethics. For the Hebrews there was no ethics apart from religion, and so this problem was essentially a religious problem: man's goodness was formulated as conformity with God's will. It was not a problem of knowing what God's will is (cf. Socrates' thesis that virtue is knowledge, and that if people know what the good is, they will naturally do it; this visualizes the problem differently, and by religious standards superficially). God's will had been revealed for Israel in the law of Moses; all that was necessary was for every Israelite to hear and obey. The inspiration to do so was the sense of gratitude to God for the gift of the law, and for all his other bounties. It rested with the free will of man, and there was no reason why man should not keep all the commandments. God had done his part, so to speak; for man the way was clear, and, though not always easy, not impossible.

To Paul this problem presents itself as more complex than this. The observable fact of human inability to achieve goodness required a deeper diagnosis. Paul is prepared to admit that all peoples have their laws, and individuals their sense of right and wrong, to guide them in their moral endeavor. What the Jews had was a particularly high and developed moral code (see Rom. 2). The baffling fact was that these codes have not actually resulted in high moral achievement. This was the argument from experience, not a theological dogma. Paul's doctrine of sin rests upon it (see SIN), and his conception of the gospel has its roots here too. For his Christian understanding enables him to regard the moral degradation of man (which he so powerfully argues in Rom. 1:18–3:20), not as an impasse or a reductio ad absurdum of human experience, but as the occasion of God's supreme saving activity. He would have agreed with that Jewish contemporary of his who put into one of the hymns of the Dead Sea Scrolls the sentiment: "No man can be righteous without Thy help."

But he would not have agreed with that earnest brotherhood that the old endowment of God's law and "deep truth" availed, even with the aid of a new exposition ("Teacher of Righteousness," or correct expositor). The "power for salvation" which Paul proclaims as good news (Rom. 1:16*a*) is the fact that God has taken upon himself responsibility for the desperate plight of the human race, and is offering his own righteousness to fill the gap left by man's manifest inability to achieve righteousness by his own endeavors. Man does not deserve this, and cannot earn it. It depends solely on the mercy of God and his compassion over man and concern that man shall be brought to perfection as his ultimate destiny (Rom. 9:15-16; 11:29-36).

To become aware of this, after recognition of the moral need (the knowledge of sin [Rom. 3:20]; the sinfulness of sin [Rom. 7:13*b*]), is what Paul means by faith. It is the only response men can make to God's superlative offer. But on the basis of this response everything in the way of religious and moral development becomes possible: "He who through faith is righteous shall live" (Rom. 1:17*b*); "peace with God" (Rom. 4:22–5:1); moral attainment, for the righteous, which begins as a divinely bestowed status or potentiality, is progressively actualized in moral growth (Rom. 5:17-21; 6:12-19; I Cor. 1:30).

II Cor. 5:17-21 is another main passage about this new life of reconciliation made possible by God's offer and Christ's humiliation to the sinful level (vs. 21*a*). Christian preaching is the announcement of this, with urgent appeal (vs. 20). For the same thought in the words of a later imitator, see Eph. 2:13-16; and for the final reconciliation, see Eph. 1:10.

In Phil. 3:5-9 Paul devaluates the privileged status of the Jew, and his own high merit according to Jewish standards, by rigorous self-discipline, etc. (which he does not here, as in Galatians and Romans, call "works," but "confidence in the flesh"), in comparison with that acceptance with God which comes from faith. We note the contrast between "my own righteousness" (i.e., self-made salvation, which by reference to the law could be estimated as of the very highest value, "blameless" [vs. 6]) and God's righteousness. Faith creates an entirely new perspective and standard of values. What before seemed right and of supreme worth now seems valueless (vs. 7). This transvaluation is "because of Christ." Knowing Christ and taking a new status of utter dependence on God (=faith [vs. 9*b*]) is now of "surpassing worth." It means sharing a new life and prospect, which is God's gift and a kind of resurrection (vss. 10-11).

Rom. 3:3-7 contrasts the divine faithfulness (πίστις) and truthfulness with human unbelief and falsity. The argument is inconclusive in its total context of Rom. 2–3, but it makes clear that God is the sure ground of man's faith. The Jews have not attained righteousness, and many things in the world and in human experience have gone wrong; but the fact of divine revelation (vs. 2) remains, and with it the privileged position of the Jews. They have misinterpreted it and their own privilege, but the true meaning of that revelation waits to be drawn out, and Paul proceeds to do this. He first establishes his argument about universal sinfulness (3:19-20, 23). Then he affirms the opportunity of righteousness for mankind by God's special provision. God's own righteous character has been manifested (vs. 21) in the experience of men—viz., in the life of Christ, more particularly his death (vs. 25*a*). This is already a historic event, but it is also divine activity. Moreover, it is not merely a past spectacle, but a continuing process ("is being revealed" [1:17], the present tense of this verb being significant) of communication of the quality of righteousness from its originator to his creatures. The means of receiving it on the human side is faith, and only faith (3:22, 25*a*, 26*b*, 28; cf. 1:16-17; 9:30-33; 10:4-9). It cannot be earned, even by those who have the law to guide them (3:20*a*); it is a free gift, the offer of divine grace (3:24; 4:16; 5:15-17). The law's function, Paul argues elsewhere, was not to inspire good conduct, but the negative one of revealing bad conduct in its true colors (3:20; 5:20; 7:7-13; Gal. 3:19-24).

This is the new insight Paul has contributed on the nature of faith, and it is his chief self-differentiation from Judaism. The importance of faith in his sense cannot be overstated. For it is the inauguration of the condition which means more than anything else to man: freedom from sin, and harmony with God. Man cannot cope with his major need apart from divine enabling; all he can do is to have what Paul calls faith. Wishes and prayers and effort ("works," whether moral or ritual) are of no avail; even the moral law does not convey moral power. Man must simply confess his helplessness and make himself open to the divine grace. This fundamental humility and willingness to depend on God, abandoning self-sufficiency and the effort to make oneself worthy, is faith in the Pauline sense. Eph. 2:8-9 succinctly states the essentials. There is a place for moral endeavor, the law has to be fulfilled, faith has to be energized by love; but Paul is concerned with a precondition, without which none of these other things is possible. To reject this is the unbelief exemplified in Israel (Rom. 9:27–10:4), and in all who choose to live their lives their own way—in Paul's terms, who prefer their own righteousness to God's. In the last resort man's fate depends on God (Rom. 9:16); but how loath human dignity is to admit this! As Paul himself admits, not all have faith (II Thess. 3:2).

b. The new creation. Faith then is basic in Christian experience. Christians are "the believers" indeed (I Cor. 1:21), but in a deeper sense now. In virtue of faith they are a new creation, a new society (II Cor. 5:17). They are incorporated "in Christ." This is what believing "in" or "into" Christ becomes in the Pauline interpretation (Phil. 3:9-10). In this new corporate reality conventional and inherited distinctions cease to matter (Gal. 3:26-28). It is the true posterity of Abraham, the realization of the final unity of mankind (Gal. 3:6-9, 14, 29).

Alternatively to men of faith being in Christ, Christ may be said to be in them (II Cor. 13:5; Gal. 4:19).

Again, the experience of being in Christ may be described as being in the Spirit (Rom. 8:1-4, 9-17; I Cor. 12:13; II Cor. 3:17-18; Gal. 3:2-5, 14). The Spirit means moral power—power even to carry out the commands of the law (Rom. 8:4; Gal. 5:16-18, 22-25). "In Christ" is a sphere in which righteousness is actually attainable (II Cor. 5:21*b*).

In more individual reference, it is ineffable communion with the risen Lord. Of his own intimate sense of Christ's personal control, Paul can write II Cor. 12:9; Gal. 2:20; Phil. 1:21. Of the possibility of all believers' realizing this intimacy, he writes Col. 2:6-7 (cf. Eph. 3:16-19). The life of faith is a Christ-possessed life, not one of striving for personal ideals, realizing ego capacities, etc. These latter attitudes toward life are mere boasting (Rom. 3:27; 4:2) or confidence in the flesh—i.e., human capacity (Phil. 3:3-4); they stultify the grace of God and the sacrifice of Christ (Gal. 2:21).

Paul sees in the sacrament of baptism, with its features of total immersion and re-emergence from the water, an apt symbol of the end of the old life and the beginning of the new (Rom. 6:3-11; Col. 2:12-13).

c. Freedom. Faith means freedom (Gal. 4:1–5:13) —freedom from wickedness ("former lusts"; Rom. 6:12-19; Eph. 2:1-5; Col. 3:5-10; I Thess. 4:3-9) and from other authorities which mankind acknowledges —e.g., moral law (Rom. 7:4-6; Gal. 3:23–4:7; for fuller explanation of the antithesis between faith and law, see LAW IN THE NT), natural law, fate, the power of the stars, etc. (Gal. 4:3, 8-9; Col. 2:20; see also ELEMENT).

d. Sonship. The new society of faith, inaugurated by God through Christ and empowered by the divine Spirit, is a divine society, not explicable by purely human considerations. Its members are sons of God, sharing the sonship of Christ (Rom. 8:14-17; Gal. 3:26; 4:4-7). See SONS OF GOD.

e. The content of the Christian faith. What was the content of the faith of these believers? A crucified Messiah, says Paul, in whom paradoxically the power and wisdom of God are made known (I Cor. 1:21-24; 2:5). From the secular point of view this is folly; it is not what men expect or can easily reconcile with their Weltanschauung. But it is the redeeming activity of God. God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself (II Cor. 5:19; Col. 1:12-20); lifting men out of the consequences of their sins (II Cor. 5:21*a;* Gal. 1:4; 2:20*b;* 3:13); making possible resurrection for men—i.e., new possibilities of life—as an ultimate consequence of Christ's resurrection (Rom. 1:1-4; 4:25; I Cor. 15:3-11; Phil. 3:10-11). These are the implications of the simpler statement that the object of faith is the lordship of Christ (II Cor. 4:5-6; Phil. 2:5-11).

f. Love. The moral effects of faith can be expressed in terms of love (ἀγάπη). Paul never argues this point; he assumes it. In a nutshell the connection is stated in Gal. 5:6: faith becomes active "through love." The preposition is somewhat ambiguous here; it may mean "by means of"—love, as it were, prompting every expression of faith; or it might signify the attendant circumstances. Love is the chief product of the Spirit in human lives (I Cor. 13; Gal. 5:22); and in this sense has more eternal significance than faith (I Cor. 13:13). Love can be described as the "fulfilling of the law" (Rom. 13: 10*b*), which is also the work of the Spirit (Rom. 8:4). For the general connection of faith and love, see Eph. 1:15; 3:17; 6:23; I Thess. 1:3; 3:6; II Thess. 1:3; Philem. 5. See also LOVE IN THE NT.

g. Conviction. Paul can use "faith" in the sense of "conviction" (Rom. 14:1, 22-23). In this chapter weakness in faith means overscrupulous anxiety, the opposite of confidence (vs. 5*b*). Elsewhere in a similar discussion (I Cor. 8:7 ff; 10:29) Paul uses the term "conscience." The fact that he can use πίστις, "faith," in such a context indicates how fundamental faith was for him. It affected the whole of a man's behavior, and anything which has nothing to do with a man's faith is sin for him (Rom. 14:23).

5. The distinctive Johannine connotation. The Fourth Gospel has a distinctive conception of faith, parallel to the Pauline, but deviating from it through closer association with knowledge. For the Johannine writer, believing in Christ is tantamount to knowing Christ or knowing God (the noun is avoided, and the verb is used exclusively).

a. Basic ideas. The Prologue introduces the thought of bearing witness to Christ (vss. 7, 15), beholding Christ (vs. 14). Christ is veritably God in his self-communication to mankind. He is the Word of God and the Son of God, bringer of life and light, grace and truth—in other words, knowledge of God —of which he is the unique purveyor (vs. 18). The response of men to this witness is described as receiving Christ (vss. 11-12, 16), beholding (vs. 14), knowing (vss. 10, 18; cf. 3:11, and see below). The ultimate outcome of such response is sonship (vs. 12). But a negative response is also possible (vss. 10-11); the fact of human rejection of Christ is much emphasized in this gospel, which through its middle chapters traces a kind of parallel development of faith and unbelief, a judgment process set in motion by the impact of Christ upon human society, those who accept him electing themselves to true (eternal) life, and those who reject him in fact condemning themselves, though they do not realize it. See 3:16-21; 5:24-29; 6:35-40, 64-66; 7:40-52; 8:42-47; 10:26-28; 12:35-43 (cf. Mark 4:10-12; and see JUDGMENT).

The actual verb πιστεύειν, "to believe," is not prominent in the Prologue, but in vs. 7 it means acceptance of the message about the incarnation of the Word, which was a presentation of the knowledge of God hitherto unavailable, a revelation of God's glory, an impartation of divine grace and truth which surpassed even the giving of the law through Moses.

b. The significance of "witness," μαρτυρία. The God who willed his own revelation and the salvation of men ordained also the necessary attestation of his saving action. "There was a man sent from God, whose name was John. He came for testimony, to bear witness to the light, that all might believe through him" (1:6-7).

John the Baptist was the first witness, and due space is allotted him in the opening chapter, apart from the Prologue (1:29-35). Here the content of the Christian faith is summarily stated as the divine sonship of Christ, his endowment with the Holy Spirit and ability to impart it, and his efficacy as bearer or remover of the world's sin. The earliest disciples of Christ immediately are under constraint to bear witness that he is Messiah, King, Prophet, and Son of God (1:41, 45, 49). More general references to the witness are found in 3:11; 12:17; 19:35; 21:24 (cf. I John 1:2; 4:14), sometimes with simple assertion of its truth, sometimes with an indication of its effectiveness. From the episode of the woman of Samaria we learn how the honest expression even of hesitant and groping faith may cause faith in many (John 4:28-29, 39-42).

This vital witness is not purely human advocacy, even though men are its mouthpiece. It is ultimately divine (5:32-37), and deposited in scripture—i.e., the OT (5:39)—more particularly the words of Jesus (not yet regarded as scripture in the sense of the OT; 5:47). The assertion that God himself is the guarantor of the witness is made again in I John 5:7-12. Christian preaching is no less than God's calling attention to his own gift of eternal life for men, made available through his Son alone. When the Spirit is said to be the confirming power, as in this passage (vss. 7:8); I John 4:13-14; and in John's Gospel (15:26-27); or when Christ so speaks of his own witness, the primary witness of God is implied.

It is not convincing to every hearer, but Christian preaching cannot give up this conviction (John 8:13-18). The effects of faith in men's lives may also be said to bear witness, apart from any spoken word, as when Jesus patiently claims that his "works" attest his Father's presence and saving power (John 10:25*b*, 38*b*; 14:10-11) and adds that those who believe will actually perform similar works to the glory of God (14:12-14).

c. Acceptance of the testimony—i.e., faith—in the main narrative of John's Gospel. It is worth while to set out first the Johannine conception of witness, because it is the objective factor to which faith is the corresponding subjective. Faith is the acceptance of the witness.

Nothing is more important than that the testimony should be heard and responded to. The urgency of hearing is underlined in this gospel (e.g., 4:41-43; 5:24; 8:43; 14:23-24; 17:6-8). Failure to respond is also frankly recognized.

The first narrative of Jesus at work shows the disciples finding, seeing, and believing in him (1:35-51). The last (20:19-29; assuming that ch. 21 was the later work of a redactor) reaffirms this privilege of seeing and believing, and points forward to a faith which has no physical seeing as its basis. True faith is independent of material aids, as future generations of believers will exemplify (20:29, 31; cf. 17:20-21). To incipient faith is given a promise of heavenly vision and realization of the pre-eminence of the Son of Man (i.e., Christ as Redeemer), and unlimited spiritual power (1:50-51; 11:40; 14:12).

d. How faith arises. Faith results from witnessing a "sign" (σημεῖον; 2:11, 23). A sign in this gospel means what the other gospels call a "power" or "mighty work" (Mark 6:3-5, etc.). But it is more than a miracle in the sense of an abnormal or unprecedented event; it means something done or said by Jesus which makes people aware of the power of God operating through him; it is a particular manifestation of the divine glory which is the meaning of his incarnation (1:14). A sign occasions faith in those who witness it, though not in all (4:50-54; 8:30; 10:42; 11:45-47; 12:9-11).

There is disparity between John and the other gospels here, insofar as in John signs are performed to evoke faith (or faith is evoked after a sign) whereas in the Synoptics miracles are performed only in response to faith. See MIRACLE; SIGNS IN THE NT.

For a description of how faith arises in the believer, note 17:6-8, though in place of psychological analysis we have an aspect of the determinism of this gospel: only those will attain faith who are "given" to Christ by the Father (cf. 6:37-40, 44). But we may say that, following an initial receptiveness, faith consists of keeping the teaching of Christ, which is the word or words of God. It is a much deeper thing than dependence on human opinions (5:44). Clearly John is not interested in how faith is produced so much as in its content. This is described as the "word" of Jesus in 2:22, where that word is an interpretation of a passage of scripture, or has some connection with a passage of scripture (Ps. 69:9). For scripture as the object of faith, see 5:39.

In these passages the Greek verb has the noun in the dative case, and the meaning is "place reliance on," a simple colloquial sense. But there seems to be also a movement toward a more intellectualized meaning, as in passages where "believe" is followed by an object clause or by the preposition "in," specifying the content of the belief. The logical end of this development is when "believe," πιστεύειν, is not distinguishable from "know," γινώσκειν. Thus the evangelist's comment in 2:22 refers to new meaning which could be discerned in scripture in the light of Christ's resurrection, and confirmation of belief in the authority by which he cleansed the Jerusalem temple and spoke of himself as an adequate substitute for it (cf. 4:21-26).

e. Jesus the object of faith. The meaning which stands out as of greatest significance is belief in Jesus, of which he is the object and which is specifically directed into him, an anomaly by comparison with normal Greek prepositional usage being used to bring out what is distinctive of Christian faith. 3:15-18 illustrates this well. This faith, which is the gateway to eternal life, is centered upon the Son of God (who is also the Son of man; vs. 14), whose earthly activity owes its origin to the divine love. It is also connected with the energy of the Spirit of God (vss. 5-8). It causes a new birth in the believer (vss. 3-8), and creates that life which in this gospel is called eternal, and is the comprehensive term for the sum of God's gifts and for the highest level to which man can attain (cf. 5:24; 6:47; 7:38; 20:31; I John 1:1-2).

We now have the main definition of the content or object of faith. This is illustrated many times, nowhere perhaps more movingly than in the discourse with the woman of Samaria, who is led away from her irreligious arguments and way of life to an understanding of true worship and true religion and to confession that the coming Messiah, the center of true religion, has in fact come and is revealing himself to her (John 4:26). Faith is experience of the climax of revelation. The object of faith is Jesus, who is Messiah of both Jews and Samaritans, but not confined in his significance to them. For the Samaritans here represent the whole non-Jewish section of mankind, and he is "Savior of the world" (vs. 42; cf. 9: 35-37; 11:25-27).

But Jesus declares his conformity with his Father. All that he says and does is as the Father directs. Belief in him, therefore, is belief in his Father, God (5:19-27; 12:44, 49; 14:1, 6-11; 16:27-30; I John 2: 23). Similarly, knowing is knowing both the Father and the Son (John 17:3; II John 9*b*).

The verb "believe" is used also in an absolute sense (cf. John 1:7, 50; 4:42, 53; 6:47; 11:15, 40; 14:29; 16:31; 19:35; 20:8, 25, 31*c*). This is often in passages where there is reference to seeing (e.g., 6:36; 11:40; 20:25-31), and in the judgment of some scholars faith is a form of vision. On the importance of seeing, see 12:45; 19:35; 20:8, 29. This sense of faith with no reference to its object is set in relief in the central chapters by contrast with the half-belief (7:12, 26, 35; 12:42-43), mere opinion (7:24; 8:50), or outright unbelief (7:47-52; 9:40-41; 11:45-53), of others.

Faith is the primary privilege and obligation (6:29, 35-40; 12:36 [cf. I John 5:4-5]). Conversely, not to believe is the greatest tragedy; in fact, it is sin (John 1:10-11; 16:9), and as such carries dire consequences (3:18, 36; 8:24). How much it costeth not to follow (believe in) Christ!

6. Definition of faith in Hebrews. In Heb. 11: 1 we have a concise definition of faith: it is the solid reality of hope, conviction about the invisible world (the word ὑπόστασις, "solid reality," has the philosophic sense of "being, nature," as in 1:3: "the very stamp of his nature"; but the meaning in 11:1 may be the more concrete one: "title-deed" as Moulton-Milligan's Vocabulary suggests). This is somewhat Platonic, but the subsequent illustrations are in the manner of Hellenistic Judaism, which added to its fundamental belief in Yahweh's goodness to his worshipers (vs. 6*b*) the more philosophic notion of his existence in the noumenal world, the antithesis of the phenomenal world (vs. 3*b*). Faith means such awareness of God (vs. 27*b*) and that ideal world as enables men to endure all kinds of tribulations (vss. 25, 32-38; 12:2-3) and to live in detachment from the things of time and sense, even pronouncing judgment on them (11:7*b*), realizing that eternal salvation involves quite different conditions. It means the conviction that one is an heir of the eternal city (vss. 10, 14-16), taking God's promises seriously.

There is nothing distinctively Christian in this, but in 12:2 it is related to the main theme of Hebrews by the description of Christ as "pioneer and perfecter of our faith."

Obviously this conception of faith has a large element of hope in it, as in I Peter (cf. I Pet. 1:3, 7-9, 21).

7. Other NT connotations of faith. The well-known passage in the Letter of James (2:14-22) disparages faith as mere belief, a nominal monotheism which neither affects behavior nor calls forth personal trust; even devils may be said to have faith in this sense (vs. 19)! It hardly needs pointing out that this is far from the Pauline conception. It has been argued that James is controverting Paul here; on the other hand, the view is being revived that James's letter was earlier than those of Paul. James magnifies conduct at the expense of faith, and vss. 2:21*a*, 24, explicitly contradict Rom. 4; so that Paul's teaching on faith and works seems to be presupposed. Possibly the situation James was addressing was one in which antinomianism was a danger because the strong moral interest of Paul had been misunderstood. The moralism of James represents the continuing influence in the church of the ethics of Hellenistic Judaism.

The Pastoral letters, Jude, and Revelation reflect conditions of the second or third generation, when the term "faith" can be used to denote the basic doctrine of churches that are now becoming conscious of themselves in a nonbelieving environment. The new society must build itself upon this foundation; it is a precious trust for which they must be prepared to struggle (Jude 3, 20). It is a divine secret (mystery) imparted to them (I Tim. 3:9). It must be preserved (II Tim. 4:7; Rev. 14:12). Some have given it up (I Tim. 5:8, 12; Rev. 2:13). The ethical interest appears in the linking of faith with a good conscience, or with love (I Tim. 1:14, 19; 2:15; 3:9; 6:11). How different from the way in which the creative teacher of an earlier generation had brought out the moral implications of faith (Rom. 6)! In these writings the noun "faith" is more prominent than the verb "to believe." But the use of the verb also is affected by this second-generation atmosphere, for it is twice used in the passive in the sense of being entrusted with the gospel (I Tim. 1:11; Tit. 1:3). The same or a very similar tendency is to be noted in the usage of the noun in Acts, where it is often hard to say whether faith is the believer's attitude toward Christ, or the doctrine of the churches (e.g., Acts 13:8; 14:22; 16: 5). It is something to be obeyed (6:7).

Bibliography. A. Schlatter, Der Glaube im NT (3rd ed., 1905) —still the fundamental treatment; W. H. P. Hatch, The Pauline Idea of Faith, Harvard Theological Studies, II (1917); Bousset-Gressmann, Die Religion des Judentums (3rd ed., 1926); J. Pedersen, Israel, Its Life and Culture, I (1926), 336-48; Strack-Billerbeck, Kommentar zum NT (1928), on Rom. 4:2-3; G. F. Moore, Judaism (1927-30); C. H. Dodd, The Bible and the Greeks (1935), pp. 42-75; H. A. Wolfson, Philo (1947); C. H. Dodd, The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel (1953), pp. 151-86.

E. C. BLACKMAN

FALCON [אַיָּה, 'ayyâ, cf. Akkad. ayau, unidentified bird; Arab. yu'yu', hawk; LXX ἱκτῖνος, kite (Lev. 11:

Courtesy of James B. Pritchard

1. Egyptian stone relief showing a falcon, a form of Horus, standing above a frame in which is a three-towered palace and a serpent which represents the Horus name of the king (ca. 3000 B.C.)

14 and probably Deut. 14:13); γύψ, vulture (Job 28:7); Vulg. vultur, vulture; Targ. (Onq.) טרפיתא, hawk]. Alternately: KITE (Lev. 11:14 KJV; Deut. 14:13); VULTURE (Job 28:7 KJV). A small or medium-sized bird of prey of the family Falconidae, of the genus Falco, of which several species have been observed in Palestine (Falco biarmicus feldeggii and tanypterus, Falco peregrinus, Falco tinnunculus, Falco subbuteo subbuteo). It is only a surmise, though a reasonable one, that איה refers to these birds (cf. "according to its kind" in Lev. 11:14). In Job 28:7 their keen sight is alluded to, which is, in fact, a characteristic of the falcons.

Fig. FAL 1. W. S. McCULLOUGH

FALL, THE. The Bible speaks of the "fall" of individuals into sin, a continuing occurrence (I Cor. 10:12; I Tim. 3:6-7; 6:9; Heb. 4:11; Jas. 5:12). It also knows of the fall of the wicked angels (II Pet. 2:4; Jude 6; cf. Slavonic Enoch 29:4-5), which was connected in the intertestamental literature with the myth of the marriage of these angels with women (cf. Gen. 6:2, 4). But in Christian theology "the Fall" signifies the transgression of Adam and Eve recorded in Gen. 3. The word itself does not occur in this sense in the canonical scriptures (but cf. II Esd. 7:118). Although the story of the Garden appears to have had little effect upon OT thought, it dominates the NT doctrine of the origin of sin (cf. Rom. 5:12-19; for details, see SIN §§ 1*c*, 2*b*, 3*c*). A discussion of the Fall must therefore concern itself primarily with the Paradise account, which needs to be considered from several points of view.

It has long been apparent to critical scholarship that the background of the Genesis narrative is to be found in mythological elements common to the traditions of various ancient Near Eastern peoples. The biblical account itself furnishes the strongest evidence that this was the case. It contains conceptions which are entirely strange to the standpoint of Yahwism. E.g., Gen. 3:22 describes God as being fearful of man's "equality"; vs. 8 speaks in gross anthropomorphism of Yahweh's walking in the Garden; the speaking (and walking!) serpent is entirely foreign to the Hebrew conception of nature; the name EVE appears to be ultimately derived, despite the folk etymology of vs. 20, from the name of a Semitic serpent-goddess. Moreover, Hebrew religion located the abode of Yahweh in Canaan or on Mount Sinai, not in a garden in the East. The motifs of a garden of the gods (see EDEN, GARDEN OF; PARADISE), with its mysterious trees, are common in ancient mythologies, and the TREE OF LIFE appears in various pictorial representations.

There can be little doubt that the Hebrews knew the cosmological legends of the ancient Near East. Some of the Babylonian and Sumerian myths offer interesting parallels to the biblical account. It may be that the Akkadians knew a temptation tradition similar to that of Genesis, if we may judge by a cylinder seal in the British Museum which depicts a man and a woman (god and goddess?) seated before a palm tree and reaching out for its fruit, with a standing serpent coiled behind the woman as if whispering in her ear. This interpretation has, however, been challenged. More certain parallels are to be found in the Gilgamesh Epic and in the Myth of Adapa.

The theme of the Gilgamesh Epic is the search for immortality. Such a hero as Gilgamesh may possess great strength and wisdom, being half divine himself, but he is never allowed to forget that the gods have reserved immortality for themselves. The story comes to a climax in Tablet XI, which tells of his being given two chances to obtain immortality but losing them both, first through weakness and second by a cruel accident in which a serpent steals a life-giving plant from him.

In the Adapa story the god Ea, who is motivated by jealousy, deliberately misleads his devotee Adapa (which may mean "man") into refusing the gift of immortality when it is offered to him by Anu, the chief of the gods.

It should be obvious that none of these traditions parallels the biblical story of the Fall closely enough to be considered a direct antecedent. As a matter of fact, the differences are almost as striking as the similarities. Probably the most important difference is the entirely distinct morality of the Genesis story, which attributes man's failure to his own sin, and not to his weakness or to fate or to the envy of the gods (except in the secondary material). Another striking difference is that the basic Genesis material is concerned with the obtaining of knowledge instead of the obtaining of life. In the Sumero-Akkadian mythology man could have wisdom equal to that of the gods (cf. the Atrahasis Myth), but he was denied life; in the biblical story he might have obtained life, but he was denied a "divine" knowledge.

It seems very likely that the Hebrews were familiar with a polytheistic legend current in Palestine in which jealous deities were struggling to keep man from stealing their prerogatives, and in which a SERPENT god or demon, at odds with them, introduced man to the secret of a forbidden tree, through which he was enabled to become like them.

Nothing is more evident than the fact that the Yahwistic writer of the basic fall story in Gen. 3 rejected almost the entire polytheistic background of his material in order to transform it into an account that was in keeping with the high moral and spiritual insights of his religion. The serpent appears (without explanation of where he comes from or who he is; he is certainly not SATAN—a late interpretation) as the insidious enemy of both man and God, who are not at odds but live in perfect harmony until he intervenes. The Yahwist omits mention of the TREE OF LIFE. He is concerned solely with the TREE OF KNOWLEDGE. This may have appeared in polytheistic mythology as a magic tree, imparting a kind of occult knowledge, but in the biblical tradition it was divested of magical associations and became nothing more than the object by which man's obedience to God was tested.

Critical scholarship agrees that the third chapter of Genesis, like the rest of the Paradise story, has undergone a long literary development, and that the text has suffered a degree of corruption. Without attempting to delineate the details of literary analysis (see the Commentaries), one ought at least to make clear what the basic Yahwistic account contained and what elements came from a variant tradition which perhaps existed in a parallel recension and was added by a redactor.

The Yahwistic writer himself was responsible for most of Gen. 3:1-19, 23, with perhaps minor glosses from a later hand. He depicts the approach of the serpent, Eve's naïve rejoinder to his query, the serpent's deliberate lie, the woman's fascination with the fruit, her sin and that of her husband, the resulting shame and attempt to hide from Yahweh. He adds the details of the ensuing inquest and the sentence passed upon the culprits for their misdeeds. The etiological motivation of this account is striking. It attempts to answer many basic questions: Why are people ashamed of their nakedness? Why does the serpent creep in the dust, and why does mankind hate him? Why do women suffer when they bear children? Why are they dominated by their husbands? Why does a man have to toil so hard for his bread?

Although some scholars have denied it, the fall story also answers the questions of the origin of sin and the origin of death. The former is especially evident from the succeeding chapters, which show plainly that in the Yahwist's mind man had contracted a fatal tendency toward spiritual corruption. The origin of death appears in the condemnation of man to return to the dust from which he was taken (vs. 19). It is true that the story does not suggest that man was created immortal; immortality was perhaps to have been the reward of obedience. But even so, man's disobedience brought the penalty of death that had been threatened (2:17; 3:3), despite the serpent's assurance to the contrary. The threat of immediate death was not carried out, but in the end the result was the same, as God left sinful mankind to return to its natural end.

The redactor evidently felt that this statement of the reason for human mortality was not sufficiently explicit. Making use of a tree-of-life tradition (cf. 2:9), he pictured Yahweh in 3:22, 24, as being envious of man, who actually had obtained divine knowledge. Determined to ward off this threat of equality, Yahweh now deprives man of immortality by barring him from the Tree of Life. These verses are in glaring conflict with the purer view of Yahweh's character in the original account. It may be, as later exegetes have suggested, that in the finished form of the story the redactor intended the reference to man's equality to be understood ironically. This is doubtless an interpretation that is valid for biblical theology as a whole.

The story of the Fall must also be appreciated for its psychological perceptiveness and theological profundity. It is superbly simple and effective. No human being who has himself sinned can escape from discerning that Eve and Adam's sin is his own. The story has pedagogical effectiveness because every reader, however unsophisticated he may be, instinctively knows that the ambitious self-assertion, the delusion of injured prerogative, the morbid curiosity for something undiscovered and forbidden, the reckless decision against unresisting obedience, the overpowering shame that comes over the sinners as their brazen courage leaves them, are things that he too could experience. He knows that he too would hide in the trees of the Garden, would tell Yahweh half-truths to disguise his guilt, and would blame others for his sin.

Even though they reject the traditional view of the Fall as a historical event, modern theologians are able to turn to the Genesis story for an insight into the real paradox of human existence. In Gen. 2–3 Adam appears as generic man, האדם (see ADAM). He thus represents human nature as created in the divine image—i.e., as related to nature and yet rising above it through the free spirit which his Creator gave him. He also represents mankind as owing unquestioning allegiance to God, as finding the meaning of his existence in harmony with his Creator and not in an independent self-sufficiency. Further, Adam's temptation to snatch a knowledge which as a mere creature he could never have, born of anxiety and distrust, is typical of the temptation in which every man stands at every moment of his existence. Finally, the crumbling of the rebel's bravado as he is summoned before God symbolizes the hollowness of every human pretense over against his Maker.

Thus, quite apart from the theory of a hereditary transmission of the effects of Adam's fall, it should be apparent that Adam's real theological importance is his representation of all mankind in its defiance of God's will. Paul, while affirming a historical connection in Rom. 5:12-19, puts the emphasis on Adam's representative and symbolic function as the counterpart of Christ. As the Apocalypse of Baruch puts it, "Each of us has been the Adam of his own soul" (54:19).

The Paradise narrative helps us to understand the real nature of sin. Sin is possible only because man has been created in God's image. He has a freedom of self-assertion which is his divine endowment. Sin comes when man uses this freedom to measure himself against God, trying to be independent of his control. Immediately man discovers his terrible mistake. He learns that his freedom is only a finite freedom, and he can never really be as God. He has obtained a practical knowledge of the possibilities of good and of evil (see TREE OF KNOWLEDGE), but in a way that his Creator never intended, through a life of pain and spiritual bondage which is ever a continual frustration of the true greatness for which God has made him.

Bibliography. In addition to the relevant sections in the commentaries and books on biblical theology, there are valuable monographs on the subject of Paradise and the Fall. One of the most valuable of these is P. Humbert, Études sur le récit du paradis et de la chute dans la Genèse (1940). Other important titles are: H. T. Obbink, Het bijbelsch Paradijsverhaal en de Babylonische bronnen (1917); N. P. Williams, The Ideas of the Fall and of Original Sin (1927); J. Begrich, "Die Paradieserzählung," ZAW, L (1932) 93 ff; K. Budde, Die biblische Paradiesgeschichte (1932); T. C. Vriezen, Onderzoek naar de paradijsvoorstelling bij de oude Semietische volken (1937); J. Coppens, La connaissance du bien et mal et la péché du Paradis (1948).

S. J. DE VRIES

FALLOW DEER. KJV translation of יחמור (RSV ROEBUCK) in Deut. 14:5; I Kings 4:23—H 5:3.

The context in Deut. 14:5 points to a ruminant, and probably to a member of the DEER family. Bodenheimer holds it to be the Fallow Deer (see FAUNA § A2*e*iv), a smaller deer than the Red Deer (ca. thirty-six inches high at the withers), of yellowish-brown color, found originally in the Mediterranean area and in Persia; two species, dama dama and dama mesopotamica, are recognized. But C. R. Conder contended, on the basis of bones found at Carmel, that it was the Roe, capreolus capreolus.

W. S. MCCULLOUGH

FALLOW GROUND [ניר] (Jer. 4:3; Hos. 10:12, where the absolute form of the noun is used as an accusative of cognate meaning with the verb נירו; the construct form is used only in Prov. 13:23, where the Hebrew text is meaningless as it stands). Fallow ground is usually broken up with plow and harrow, but it is left unseeded for the purpose of destroying weeds and insects and allowing the fertility of the soil to be restored.

The custom of letting land lie fallow was common among primitive people, and the practice was regarded as serving a religious function. The religious law of Israel required that the cultivated land should lie idle every seventh year (Exod. 23:11). There is no evidence that a fallow year was observed during any considerable part of Israelitic history. Lev. 26: 34-35 would seem to imply that it was not.

H. F. BECK

FALSE APOSTLES [ψευδαπόστολοι]. Persons who came to Corinth (II Cor. 11:13) claiming to be "servants of Christ" (vs. 23); Paul denounces them as servants of Satan disguising themselves as servants of righteousness (vss. 13-15). They evidently boasted of their Jewish origin (vs. 22). They came with letters of recommendation from other churches; when they left, they seem to have asked for such letters (II Cor. 3:1; for this custom, see Acts 18:27). It is not clear that they were either Judaizers or antinomians in principle, but Paul says bluntly that they preach "another Jesus" and a "different gospel" and live in a "different spirit," and he implies that their motives were selfish and the moral results of their influence bad (II Cor. 11:4, 6, 18-20; 12:20-21). They were largely responsible for the rebellion against Paul in the church at Corinth.

F. V. FILSON

FALSE CHRISTS. Persons who will imitate Jesus Christ, and who by their pretensions and miracles, and presumably by their false teachings as well, will deceive people and lead them astray (Mark 13:22; Matt. 24:24; cf. Luke 21:8). In some respects the second beast of Rev. 13:11 ff is a false (or pseudo-) Christ. However, false Christs should be differentiated from the satanic Antichrist, who is to be the personal adversary of Jesus Christ at his second advent. But see ANTICHRIST.

M. RIST

FALSE PROPHET. See PROPHET.

FALSE WITNESS. See WITNESS.

FAMILIAR SPIRIT. Divination by means of communication with the spirit of the dead (necromancy) was known and practiced in the ancient Near East (cf. the Gilgamesh Epic, Tablet XII, where Gilgamesh conjured up the spirit of Enkidu in order to inquire about the state of the dead in the nether world). The OT employs two technical terms, אוב and ידעני, and one descriptive term, דרש אל המתים, to denote "necromancy." The exact meanings of the first two words (used as a hendiadys eleven times against the use of אוב in only four passages) are not definitely known. While both the KJV and the RSV render ידעני with "wizard," the former translates אוב as "familiar spirit," and the latter as "medium" (but "spirit" in I Sam. 28:8 and "ghost" in Isa. 29:4). The third term (lit., "one who consults the dead") is found only twice in the OT (Deut. 18:11; Isa. 8:19), and in both cases in conjunction with אוב and ידעני.

The technique used by the necromancers (male and female) is nowhere described in detail. In the story of the witch of Endor (I Sam. 28), Saul asked his servants to seek out for him a "woman who is a medium" (lit., a "woman who possesses an אוב"). When Saul arrived at Endor, he said to the woman: "Divine for me by an אוב [RSV 'a spirit'], and bring up for me whomever I shall name to you." The witch conjured up the spirit of Samuel, and when she saw it, she exclaimed: "I see an אלהים [RSV 'a god'] coming up out of the earth" (the word ilu, "god," is used in Akkadian in reference to the spirits of the departed; see bibliography). In the story of Endor the spirit of Samuel is depicted as conversing with Saul in a clear voice, but Isa. 8:19; 29:4 characterize the utterances of the spirits as coming up from the ground in a chirping, muttering, or whispering sound.

The art of necromancy is prohibited in the OT

(Lev. 19:31; Deut. 18:11; cf. Isa. 8:19), and its practitioners, as well as those who seek guidance from them, are liable to the death penalty (Lev. 20:6, 27; cf. I Chr. 10:13). The kings who drove the necromancers out of the land are praised (cf. I Sam. 28:3, 9; II Kings 23:24), and those who tolerated them are severely condemned (cf. II Kings 21:6; II Chr. 33:6).

See also DIVINATION.

Bibliography. On the Akkadian word ilu, see A. L. Oppenheim, The Interpretation of Dreams in the Ancient Near East (1956), p. 223. Cf. the Ugaritic expression 'ilm arṣ, "ghosts in the nether world," in C. H. Gordon, Ugaritic Handbook (1947), I Aqhat 112, 141.

I. MENDELSOHN

FAMILY. Since marriage was patriarchal—i.e., father-centered—among the people of the Bible, the family was a community of persons, related by ties of marriage and kinship, and ruled by the authority of the father. The biblical family, especially when marriage was polygamous, was large. It included the father, mother(s), sons, daughters, brothers, sisters (until their marriage), grandparents, other kinsmen, as well as servants, concubines, and sojourners (aliens). The Israelites were encouraged to have large families, for economic as well as religious reasons. The family grew both by birth and by covenants made with other groups and individuals. The solidarity of the family was maintained by its organization around the father figure and by the application of the principle of retributive justice in terms of corporate (family) responsibility.

The family functioned as a religious community, preserving past traditions and passing them on through instruction and worship. Forces that threatened the integrity and security of the family, such as economic change and the influence of alien cultures and religions, were vigorously opposed by many of the biblical writers. The importance of the family is to be seen in the projection of this concept beyond the boundaries of the family as such. It then refers to Hebrew tribes, the nations of Israel and Judah, foreign nations, and to all of Israel, viewed as a community of faith rather than a nation. In the NT it identifies the Christian community as well. The family was endangered in this period by the conflict between paganism and the Christian faith. The origin of the Christian church is associated with worship among the families and in the homes of the first Christians.

1. Terminology
2. The extent of the family
   a. Emphasis upon many children
   b. Other forms of growth
3. The status and role of family members
   a. The father
   b. The mother
   c. Sons
   d. Daughters
   e. Other categories
4. Solidarity of the family
   a. Authority of the father figure
   b. Concept of corporate responsibility
   c. The function of religion
5. Wider use of the concept of family
6. The family of Jesus
7. The family and the early church

Bibliography

1. Terminology. The Bible uses several terms to express the idea of family. The most common is בית (lit., "house"); in the NT related words are οἰκία ("family") and οἰκιακός ("relatives"—i.e., members of the family group). The OT uses a second term with the meaning "clan" or "family": משפחה. The Greek word πατριά signifies "family," "clan," "kinship." In several of these we may observe that the idea of "house" or "household" stands out. The first named, בית, may indicate at times "house" as a place, "house" as the occupants of the home—i.e., "family." So we read of Abram's trained men, "born in his house" (Gen. 14:14; cf. 17:12-13). In Exod. 1:21 the word refers to "families" which God "gave" to the Egyptian midwives. In one instance the word refers to a family of linen workers (I Chr. 4:21). The meaning of "family of descendants" appears quite often. The "house of David" is one illustration of this use (I Kings 12:19).

The word οἰκία, "household, family," appears in Matt. 12:25; 13:57; Mark 3:25; 6:4. "Those of his household" translates the word οἰκιακός, "relatives," while members of the household (family) are identified in Isa. 58:7 LXX; Gal. 6:10; Eph. 2:19; I Tim. 5:8, the second and third of these referring to members of God's family (see § 5*c below*). The word משפחה, "clan" or "family," suggests the larger family group in Gen. 24:38—the house of Abraham's father and kindred in the city of Nahor. It simply means the various families of the Israelite elders in Exod. 12:21; and in Lev. 20:5 it designates any family which is implicated in the practice of human sacrifice. The Greek word πατριά may also be considered here. Joseph is said to be of the lineage (πατριά) of David (Luke 2:4); and "every family in heaven and on earth" receives its name from the Father (Eph. 3:15). In the book of Tobit the term simply means "kinsman" (5:12), and similarly Judith's ancestry is said to be the same as that of her husband—i.e., the same tribe and family (Jth. 8:2).

2. The extent of the family. The Hebrew family was an inclusive community, consisting not only of immediate members closely related by ties of blood or marriage. It included also slaves, concubines, foreigners, and hired servants. Abraham circumcised every male of his house, slaves born of slave parents or bought in the market from a foreigner, as well as his son Ishmael (Gen. 17:23, 27). Jacob's family is described as including his sons, their little ones, their wives, his sons' sons, his daughters, and his sons' daughters, "all his offspring" (46:5-7), "sixty-six persons in all," not counting his sons' wives (vs. 26). A family could also have foster fathers and nursing mothers (Isa. 49:23).

a. Emphasis upon many children. CHILDREN, especially sons, were extraordinarily important in the biblical family. This emphasis is especially conspicuous in the patriarchal period of Hebrew history, as far as numbers are concerned. The Hebrew people were commanded to be fruitful and multiply, as was the first human couple (Gen. 1:28; 9:1). The size of families would vary greatly, especially when we recall the variation in the number of wives a man might marry. King Ahab is said to have had seventy sons (II Kings 10:1) in Samaria. The evidence indicates that the families of biblical people were by no means small. They grew by procreation, through one or more marriages.

b. Other forms of growth. Marriage is actually a covenant between two families. This covenant unites them and, by the process of merging, produces a larger kin group. Thus growth may occur in this way. The affair of the sons of Jacob and Shechem involved an alliance between two families of different ethnic groups (Israelite and Hivite) through marriage (Gen. 34:8-22). The family grew also by the purchase of slaves, the birth of slaves to slaves already owned, and doubtless the exercise of protective care over various sojourners and impoverished people who sought help. Marriages with more than one wife in effect created families within families, in that the children of one mother would live in her quarters and be set apart from those of another woman with the same husband (see MARRIAGE § 1*c*). While the control of the father prevailed over all subfamilies whose children he had begotten, these mother-centered communities would tend to stand apart from one another. Each such group would add slaves and servants to serve its own needs. An instance of the inclusion into the family group of the whole clan of a mother's family shows how enlargement could occur (Judg. 9:1-2).

3. Status and role of family members. In the family community the functions and relationships of its various members are defined by custom and, to a degree, enforced by codes of law. Central, of course, is the role of the father in the patriarchal family. By no means negligible, the mother's relation to this community is characterized by special tasks and responsibilities. Sons are of supreme importance in carrying on the family's name. Their sisters play a subordinate role until their marriage, when they join the family of their husband. Other family members and kinfolk play a part which is not always clearly identified.

a. The father. The authority of the father stands out in the pages of scripture. The "father" may be a grandfather or a great-grandfather. A father has the right to offer his son as a sacrifice (Gen. 22); he must teach his sons (Prov. 1:8); he can destroy members of his family if they entice him from his allegiance to his God (Deut. 13:6-10); and his compassion for his children is used to describe the divine mercy (Ps. 103:13; see also Luke 16:24: "Father Abraham"; John 4:53). The father begets, instructs, disciplines, and loves his children. For further details, see FATHER.

b. The mother. The word for "mother" in the OT is אֵם, probably derived from the root אמם, "be wide, roomy," from ummu, "womb." The mother, although having the primary function of producing children, has considerable authority over the family's life. E.g., Sarah directed Abraham to cast out Hagar (Gen. 21:10), and he complied, although reluctantly. Rebekah advised and abetted her son in his theft of the birthright from his brother Esau (27:11-17). The mother of Micah directed the manufacture of an image to be put in a shrine in her son's house (Judg. 17:2-6). The mother exhibits love and care for members of her family also. The prophet speaks of the comfort that a mother gives as indicative of the compassion of Israel's God (Isa. 66:13); while the psalmist emphasizes a mother's care by declaring that if it ceases, the Lord will provide what he lacks (Ps. 27:10).

Respect and obedience were also demanded toward the mother (see Prov. 1:8; 6:20; 10:1; 15:20; Ezek. 22:7, where respect for one's mother is enjoined or disrespect is condemned). Laws which demand such respect and obedience are to be seen in Exod. 20:12; Lev. 19:3; Deut. 22:15. Disrespect and disobedience are prohibited in Exod. 21:15, 17; Lev. 20:9; Deut. 21:18; 27:16. The love which is displayed toward a mother may be detected also.

Thus the mother, the essential bearer of children, and the wife, who satisfies the sexual desires of her husband, is also the object of love and honor. She possesses authority over her family which appears to be second only to that of the father. She loves her children and instructs them even as she disciplines them. She is concerned for their code of behavior and for their relation to God. If she is the mother of a king, she may well seriously influence religious affairs of the state.

c. Sons. Second in importance only to the father in the Hebrew family are sons. Descent is reckoned through the male—i.e., through a man's sons (see, e.g., genealogies in Ezra 10:18 ff). They determine the perpetuation of his name and personality. The longing for sons is therefore understandable. Sons are to be disciplined and carefully trained in the traditions of the community and in the meaning of wisdom (Deut. 8:5; Prov. 3:12; 13:24; 19:18; 29:17). A son is told:

> With all your heart honor your father, > and do not forget the birth pangs of your mother.
> Remember that through your parents you were born;
> and what can you give back to them that equals their gift to you? (Ecclus. 7:27-28).

Besides designating the male offspring of a particular father and mother, the word "son" (בֵּן) signifies descendants or membership in a particular tribe or nation (Gen. 10:21; 19:38; I Chr. 5:23; II Chr. 29:13; Ezra 1:3-7; titles of Pss. 42-49; 84-85; 87-88; etc.). "Sons of God" occurs to show a close, nonphysical relation (Deut. 14:1; Ps. 29:1 ["heavenly beings"]; Isa. 43:6; III Macc. 6:28; Matt. 5:45). It refers also to membership in a guild or order, such as the prophetic order (I Kings 20:35; II Kings 2:3, etc.; 6:1; 9:1; Amos 7:14), and to a person possessing a certain quality or trait, such as power, as "mighty man" (lit., "son of power"; I Sam. 14:52; I Kings 1:52). It has another figurative use also, when it occurs to indicate the age of a person, a "son of five hundred years" (Gen. 5:32; cf. Gen. 7:6; 50:26; Num. 32:11; Josh. 14:7, 10; etc.). But as a word to identify a particular member of the family, it involves the obligation of respect, obedience, the willingness to accept the task of continuing the family line, and in the case of the first-born son (see INHERITANCE; BIRTHRIGHT) the duty of training for leadership as the prospective head of the family. See SON OF GOD; SON OF MAN.

d. Daughters. This term, בת, is employed to identify the female child born of a woman (Gen. 30:21) and is often parallel to "son" in the OT (Gen. 5:4, 7). In Gen. 34:17 a girl is called by this name by her brothers, as well as her father. The book of Ruth uses it in referring to "daughter-in-law" (1:11-13, etc.). It may name women of a particular city or land, such as "daughters of Zion" (Isa. 3:16; cf. Num. 25:1; Josh. 17:6; Isa. 49:22; Lam. 3:51; etc.). For an account of the place of women (and daughters) in the Hebrew community, see WOMAN.

e. Other categories. The Bible notes the relation of brother and sister and has terms to express each. The word used for "brother" is אח, and for "sister," אחות. In a polygamous family the former also identified a half brother and a nephew, "son of a brother." It may describe membership in the same tribe (Num. 16:10; 18:2, 6; II Sam. 19:13), or membership in the same national group (Exod. 2:11; 4:18; Deut. 15:12; Neh. 5:1, 5, 8; Isa. 66:20). The term for "sister" singles out in some instances the female child of the same father but a different mother (Gen. 24:30; Lev. 18:11; Ezek. 22:11). It is parallel to "bride" in Song of S. 5:1-2 (cf. Gen. 20:12). With respect to each other, members of the family in either classification have no special functions or obligations that are not imposed upon them because of their sex in a patriarchal family. Other members of the family are not specifically identified. Kinsmen are mentioned, although their precise relationship to the family in the limited sense is usually not defined. The word used is עם, "people" (Gen. 49:29; Num. 27:13; Judg. 5:14), where being gathered to one's people is expressed. "Uncle" and "aunt" occur also, in the words דוד and דדה, derived from the root meaning "beloved" (see Isa. 5:1). The use of these two words does not reveal any special function in the family community. Other classes represented in the Hebrew family, perhaps especially in those which were wealthy, include aliens, slaves, servants, and the needy, who may or may not have been kinsmen.

4. Solidarity of the family. The family was held together by the central, dominant father figure, supported by the influence of the mother and wife in many cases. During the early pastoral period of biblical history the large, patriarchal family was able to flourish, checked only by famine and disease. With the development in Canaan (Palestine) of an agricultural, urbanized culture, the Hebrew family, as every other facet of the social order, was required to make adaptations to new conditions. This threatened a breakdown of cherished ways of living. To meet this, ancient customs were reaffirmed and the ancient faith was used to undergird them.

a. Authority of the father figure. The function of the father has previously been briefly indicated. He symbolized tradition, the family ancestry, its cult, its power of survival, and its hope for the future. He came under bitter attack when he failed in this function (Ps. 78:8; Amos 2:7). The father as the ancestor of the family or clan became the center of preserved and recited tradition, so that his piety and devotion to God could be made an example for his descendants. So the stories of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (Gen. 12 ff) embodied recitals of the mighty acts of God and of the heroic deeds of paternal ancestors. The father as the visible symbol of the greatness of Israel's (and each family's) past helped to preserve the family from radical modification.

b. Concept of corporate solidarity. Corporate (family) responsibility to protect the family's honor and name through the practice of blood revenge was an effective instrument in biblical times (II Sam. 3:27; 16:8; II Kings 9:26; etc.; see AVENGER OF BLOOD). Each member of a family was urged to fight for the defense of his brethren, sons, daughters, wives, and homes (Neh. 4:14). And each member was obligated to protect the entire family by the uprightness and correctness of his own conduct. In a time of economic distress an entire family might be sold for debt (Matt. 18:25). On the positive side, whole families may enjoy the experience of redemption (Acts 11:14; 16:33).

c. The function of religion. In ancient Israel, religion played a positive role in the determination of family solidarity, as noted above with respect to the function of the father. Under the impact of Canaanite culture, Israel's faith, through the consolidation of family ties, sought to survive in terms of the old pastoral ideal. But the infiltration of concepts and behavior patterns sanctified by the flourishing fertility cult of Canaan worked against such a survival. Intermarriage wth alien peoples also affected this effort to preserve the ancient ways. Drastic steps were taken to eliminate the danger from this source by the enforcement of wholesale divorces (Ezra 9:2; 10:3, 16-17; Neh. 13:23-30), with a resulting destruction of many families for the sake of the purity of the faith. A similar problem confronted the families which were involved in the Christian movement of the first century A.D. This movement caused dissension in many families. By forsaking his own family for the sake of Christ, a man will have eternal life (Matt. 19:29). Hatred of members of one's family is demanded (Luke 14:26). Luke adds that the faithful will be delivered up (betrayed) by parents, brothers, kinsmen (21:16). These words point to a radical disruption of family life, calling for reconstruction on a new basis. In a period of transition, religion becomes a divisive, not a cohesive, force.

5. Wider use of the concept of family. So meaningful was the biblical experience of the family that its use was extended to make it apply to the Hebrew tribes, to the nations of Israel and Judah, to foreign nations, and to Israel viewed as a covenant community under God. It was applied to the Christian people as well.

The importance of the family in biblical society and its function as the center of religious instruction account for the application of the term to Israel and to the community of Christ as the family of God. In the chapter that contains the essence of the so-called New Covenant the prophet writes of the time when Yahweh will be the God "of all the families of Israel, and they shall be [his] people" (Jer. 31:1). Early Christian writers continue the use of this figure by speaking of the Christians as comprising "God's family" (I Tim. 3:15; I Pet. 4:17).

6. The family of Jesus. The allusions to the family of Jesus are sometimes colored by the purpose of his teachings and the motive of the compilers of the gospels which contain them. Jesus' mother and brothers are referred to (Matt. 12:46); but in this context he declares that his family is whoever does the will of God (vs. 50). The next chapter of Matthew refers to his mother and brothers and to his sisters as well (13:55-56). The names of Jesus' brothers are given, but his sisters are not mentioned by name (Mark 6:3). The Gospel of John declares that Jesus' brothers did not believe him (7:5).

7. The family and the early church. It is probable that the first churches were house-churches—i.e., they were communities of Christians who shared the Lord's Supper, sang hymns, read scripture, and prayed in various homes. The place of women in the history of this period in the church's life is significant (see WOMAN). Meetings in house-churches, or at least in homes, are reported (Rom. 16:5). Paul lived and worked in the home of Aquila and Priscilla at Corinth. He writes to them and refers to the church in their house (I Cor. 16:19). Christians are urged to demonstrate their faith by providing for their own families. One who fails to do this is worse than an unbeliever (I Tim. 5:8). All believers are members of the household of God (Eph. 2:19), which is the household (family) of faith (Gal. 6:10). Marriage and the family are important in the life of the early church, especially so because of the pagan forces that threatened them. The language of family relations is transferred to the vocabulary of religion to describe God and man's relation to him. We may note such terms in this context as "Father," "children," "sons," "brothers."

See also GOD, OT; GOD, NT; MARRIAGE; SEX; WOMAN; CHILD; WIDOW; DIVORCE; FATHER.

Bibliography. T. G. Soares, The Social Institutions and Ideals of the Bible (1915); E. B. Cross, The Hebrew Family (1927); D. Jacobson, The Social Background of the OT (1942). See also the bibliographies under MARRIAGE; WOMAN; SEX.

O. J. BAAB

FAMINE [כפן, רעב, רעבון (alternately HUNGER; KJV alternately DEARTH); λιμός (alternately HUNGER; KJV alternately DEARTH, FASTING); cf. νηστεία, fasting]. The word is used to express varying degrees of the general condition of scarcity of food:

a) A time of general famine (Job 5:20).

b) A particular famine, due to DROUGHT, in the time of Abram (Gen. 12:10), of Isaac (26:1), of Joseph in Egypt (seven years in 41:27; universal in 41:54), of Ruth (1:1), of David (three years in II Sam. 21:1; seven [LXX three] years threatened in 24:13), of Elijah (I Kings 18:2), of Elisha (II Kings 4:38; seven years in 8:1), of Claudius (universal; Acts 11:28).

Courtesy of the Metropolitan Museum of Art

2. An Egyptian wall painting showing an emaciated desert herdsman leading three oxen in an offering of gifts to Ukh-hotep (ca. 1971-1928 B.C.)

Courtesy of the Service des Antiquités, Cairo

3. Egyptian relief, showing starving people; from Saqqarah, Fifth Dynasty (ca. 2500-2350 B.C.)

c) Famine in a besieged city: Samaria (II Kings 6:25; 7:4); Jerusalem (II Kings 25:3; Lam. 4:8-10).

Famine is listed among punishments sent by God (Isa. 51:19; Jer. 14:13-18; Amos 4:6) and among apocalyptic woes to come (Mark 13:8).

Since rainfall in Palestine is marginal and irregular, crop failure through drought (Hag. 1:10-11), blight, or locusts (Amos 4:9); loss of cattle and herds (I Kings 18:5); and the ravaging of the land in warfare (Isa. 1:7; 3:1, 7) quickly led to starvation. Cannibalism was not unheard of in the extremities of a siege (II Kings 6:28; Lam. 4:10).

Figs. FAM 2-3.

R. B. Y. SCOTT

FAN. See FORK.

FARE. The translation of שכר in Jonah 1:3. The term (elsewhere "wages," "hire," "reward" for service and faithfulness) is used here in connection with the purchase by Jonah of passage on a ship bound for Tarshish.

FARMER [γεωργός, soil-worker]; KJV HUSBANDMAN. Alternately: TENANT (Matt. 21:33 ff and parallels); VINEDRESSER (John 15:1). A tiller of the soil. The word is used in general of one who raises crops (II Tim. 2:6; Jas. 5:7), and in the parable of the wicked tenants (Matt. 21:33 ff; Mark 12:1 ff; Luke 20:9 ff) and the allegory of the vine and its branches (John 15:1 ff; cf. I Cor. 3:6-9) of those who produce grapes.

See also AGRICULTURE; VINE.

FARTHING. See MONEY § 3*c*.

FAST, FASTING. The origins of fasting as a moral and religious discipline are obscure. Its widespread connection with rites of mourning caused Herbert Spencer to seek its origins in the custom of the leaving of food and drink with the dead that they, instead of the living, might make use of them. Another scholar sought the origin of fasting in the discovery of primitive man that abstinence from food and drink would induce a state of susceptibility to visions and dreams in which direct access to the realities of the spiritual world could be found. Fasting has also been said to be nothing more than preparation for the sacramental eating of holy flesh in a ritual meal. No clue to the origin or original purpose of fasting is to be found in the biblical literature, and it is probably best simply to describe its usage on the basis of the biblical references to it. For the Bible, where, in accordance with the prevailing oriental custom, it must denote complete abstinence from food, fasting can be an expression of any strong emotion or grief. It is connected with mourning, repentance, calamity, and urgent supplication. It can be a spontaneous public or private observance, though, beginning with the postexilic period, Judaism developed set fasts at regular times of the year. Fasting as a private, individual act of devotion also became extremely popular in postexilic times, and, though neither Jesus nor the early church laid down rules for fasting, it was taken for granted as a religious discipline by them.

1. Terminology
   a. In biblical Hebrew
   b. In NT Greek
2. Fasting before the Exile
   a. Fasting by individuals
   b. Public fasts
3. Fasting after the Exile
   a. Public fasts
   b. Private fasting as a work of merit
   c. The Prophets on fasting
4. Fasting in the NT
   a. Jesus' teaching on fasting
   b. Fasting in the early church
Bibliography

1. Terminology. While most of the references to fasting in the OT employ one verbal root and its derivative noun, other words or phrases may also be used to convey the idea of fasting. In the NT one root, in either its verbal or its nominal form, is used.

a. In biblical Hebrew. The Hebrew word used most frequently to denote fasting is the noun צום (Neh. 9:1), which is derived from the verb צום (II Sam. 12: 21, 23). The noun and the verb, in typical Semitic fashion, may be used together—"to fast a fast" (II Sam. 12:16). The uses of the root in other Semitic languages, as well as in Hebrew, indicate that its primary meaning has to do with complete abstinence from food. It is this root which predominates in the pre-exilic narrative literature, in the prophetic books, and in the Psalms. Parallel words or phrases, used infrequently, are לא אכל לחם, "not eat bread (I Sam. 28:20); לא ברה לחם, "not eat bread" (II Sam. 12:17); and כנע, "afflict oneself" (I Kings 21:29). The most frequently used synonym is ענה נפש, "to afflict one's soul" (Lev. 16:29). This phrase is the technical one for fasting in the Priestly Code, and tends to become standard thereafter. Once a noun, תענית, from the root "to afflict," is used in the OT, and this noun came to be used widely in postbiblical Hebrew (Ezra 9:5). The Aramaic adverb טוות, "fastingly, hungrily," is also used once in the OT (Dan. 6:18—H 6:19).

b. In NT Greek. The verb "to fast" in both the LXX and the NT is νηστεύω (Matt. 9:15; Luke 5: 33). It always denotes fasting as a religious practice. The noun for "fasting" is νηστεία (Matt. 17:21), and it almost always denotes fasting as a pious discipline. Paul, however, uses the noun in two instances simply to denote hunger brought about by necessity (II Cor. 6:5; 11:27). The latter indicates that the basic meaning of the root is "to do without food," and this is supported by the use of the noun νῆστις, from the same root, which simply means "hungry" or "not eating" (Matt. 15:32; Mark 8:3). The noun ἀσιτία (Acts 27:21) and the adjective ἄσιτος seem to bear no religious connotation. The verb απέχομαι, "to abstain, to hold off from," seems to be used of abstinence from certain kinds of foods rather than of fasting as such (Acts 15:29; I Tim. 4:3). Its use is not, however, restricted to abstinence from foods (I Thess. 5:22; I Pet. 2:11).

2. Fasting before the Exile. Though fasting was undoubtedly practiced from the earliest times in Israel, references to it in literature that can with certainty be dated before the Exile are not numerous. Many of the references to it in stories of events of the period before the Exile are in sources which, as written documents, must be dated later. Fasting must simply have been taken for granted in the earlier period, and the greater number of references to it in the later literature indicates a growing conviction of its meritoriousness as a pious practice.

a. Fasting by individuals. There is no indication that fasting, in itself, was considered, in the period before the Exile, to be a meritorious pious practice. The mention of fasting by individuals is always connected with some particular occasion, and fasting is usually accompanied by other expressions of self-humiliation, particularly by the wearing of sackcloth. The purpose of such fasting seems to have been to excite the pity and compassion of God, whether in moments of distress or in moments of penitence. This is true, certainly, of the narrative in which fasting is most frequently mentioned, the account of David's distress at the illness of the child conceived by Bathsheba as a result of his illicit affair with her (II Sam. 12:16-23). The surprise of David's retainers at the king's behavior after the child's death indicates that fasting was a normal mourning custom. The motive of exciting the divine compassion also lies behind the penitential fast of Ahab after Elijah's indictment of him and Jezebel for their behavior in the incident of Naboth's vineyard (I Kings 21:27).

Fasting must also, from very ancient times, have been employed as a preparation for the attempt to receive communications from God in dreams and visions and by other such means. Saul, e.g., fasted in connection with the attempts to receive such a communication which culminated with his visit to the woman necromancer at Endor (I Sam. 28:20). While the motive behind them is probably primarily that of legendary exaltation of the miraculous powers of saintly men, the references to the fasting of Moses and Elijah in connection with their encounters with God indicate that fasting was one of the means by which men prepared themselves for the receiving of divine communications (Exod. 34:28; I Kings 19:8).

b. Public fasts. It is not until after the Exile that any record of set fasts for the whole community is found. This is not, however, to be taken to mean that there were necessarily no such fasts. The question, e.g., of whether or not the Day of Atonement, the occasion of a set, public fast (see ATONEMENT, DAY OF), was observed prior to the Exile, is one which cannot be answered on the basis of the available evidence. It is not likely that such an observance was artificially invented by the circles responsible for the Priestly Code.

Nevertheless, the fact remains that the only public fasts mentioned as having taken place in the pre-exilic period are spontaneous ones, arising out of the specific needs of specific occasions. It was undoubtedly the custom to fast at times of mourning, and we hear of such fasting in connection with the deaths of Saul and Jonathan (I Sam. 31:13; II Sam. 1:12). Public fasts, like the fasts of individuals, could also be means of urgent supplication of divine aid and compassion, particularly before war or after calamity in battle (Judg. 20:26; I Sam. 14:24; II Chr. 20:3). Fasting could, for the group as well as for the individual, also be the means of expressing repentance (I Sam. 7:6). Though part of the plot of Jezebel against Naboth and therefore hypocritically proclaimed, the fast mentioned in I Kings 21:9, 12, shows that fasting was an expression of penitence by the community for wrongdoing in its midst. The only fast of pre-exilic times which could be interpreted as a definitely set occasion of the year is the one mentioned in connection with Baruch's reading of Jeremiah's scroll (Jer. 36:6, 9). The passing reference to it does not, however, provide sufficient evidence for a definite decision. Moreover, the reference to this fast may very well be part of material added to an originally simpler narrative in line with a tendency to magnify the solemnity and importance of the occasion upon which Jeremiah's words were read to the king.

These pre-exilic public fasts could be either spontaneous group expressions of deep emotion (I Sam. 31:13) or officially proclaimed by the king (I Chr. 20:3). Custom apparently determined the length of a fast, which might last for a week (I Sam. 31:13) or, as is still the custom among the Muslims on the days of the holy month of fasting, be discontinued at sundown (II Sam. 1:12). As in the case of individual fasts, public fasts from food might be accompanied by other expressions of grief or remorse (Judg. 20:26; I Sam. 7:6; II Sam. 1:11).

3. Fasting after the Exile. It was in the postexilic period that the stated public fasts of later Judaism came to be observed and that private fasting came to be a popular expression of piety.

a. Public fasts. Spontaneous fasts on occasions of distress or mourning continued in later times. Such fasts could be means of earnest supplication proclaimed by a leader in the community (Ezra 8:21-23; I Macc. 3:47; II Macc. 13:12). They could also, as is reflected in the late story in Jonah, be expressions of repentance (Jonah 3:5), and undoubtedly continued also to be a means by which the community besought the divine compassion at times of calamity (Esth. 4:3, 16). The prophetic book of Joel reflects the way in which a disaster such as a plague of locusts could provide the occasion for a solemn fast, which was not only an expression of supplication at a time of dire need but also a repentant pleading for mercy in the day of God's visitation of his people (Joel 1:14; 2:12, 15). Fasts such as these continued to be accompanied by such other means of self-affliction as weeping and the wearing of sackcloth and ashes.

The postexilic movement that resulted in the welding of the Jews into a unified, worshiping community centered around the temple in Jerusalem was responsible for the establishment of set days of fasting in the calendar. It may be that such days originated and were observed in earlier times, but their universal and established observance among the Jews was the result of the movement toward a normative Judaism that followed the Exile. Four such stated fasts are mentioned in the book of the prophet Zechariah (Zech. 8:19; cf. 7:3, 5). The conclusion of the book of Esther refers to the fast in preparation for PURIM, which, it is claimed, originated in the events recounted in that book (Esth. 9:31; cf. 4:3, 16).

It was the Day of Atonement (see ATONEMENT, DAY OF) which, though it may well have been less widely observed earlier, became the most prominent occasion of fasting in postexilic Judaism (Lev. 16:29, 31; 23:27, 29, 32; Num. 29:7). It was on this day that fasting was an expression of penitence accompanying Israel's solemn confession of her sins and the ritual through which atonement was sought. In the provisions laid down for the Day of Atonement in the Priestly Code, fasting is referred to as "afflicting the soul." Though it is dated at a different time from that of the Day of Atonement, the fast mentioned in Neh. 9:1 would appear to be a similar stated occasion upon which the community corporately expressed penitence for its sins.

b. Private fasting as a work of merit. Fasting by individuals continued, in later times, to be a means by which mourning, penitence, urgent supplication, and other such moods could find expression (Ezra 10:6; Neh. 1:4; Dan. 9:3). Fasting was also still thought of as an effective preparation for the reception of divine communications in visions (Dan. 10:3). As time went on, however, fasting came to be a formalized expression of piety in Judaism, and, with or without some specific occasion of distress, was an accepted act of devotion (cf. Pss. 35:13; 69:10). It was the custom of the pious to fast on the second and fifth days of the week (Ta'an. 12*a;* Luke 18:12; Did. 8:1), and the especially devout might fast even more (Jth. 8:6). The value of the discipline of fasting is pointed out in the apocryphal and pseudepigraphal Jewish literature (Tob. 12:8; Test. Reuben 1:10; Test. Simeon 3:4; Test. Judah 15:4; Test. Iss. 7:3; Test. Joseph 3:4; 9:2), and the NT reflects the way in which fasting had come to play so large a part in the piety of Jewish groups such as the Pharisees and the disciples of John the Baptist (Matt. 6:16; Mark 2:18). The Manual of Discipline of the Qumran community also illustrates how special groups within Judaism were given to the practice of fasting. Indeed, in the early years of the Christian era fasting came to be so much identified with the Jews that the Emperor Augustus is said to have boasted that he fasted more than a Jew (Tac. Hist. V.4). The emphasis on fasting in Judaism sprang more from a desire for meritorious living in line with the ethical emphasis of the OT than it did from the ascetical emphasis which came into Christianity from Greek dualism. The latter motive was not, however, entirely absent from Hellenistic Judaism, especially in Alexandria.

c. The Prophets on fasting. The only reference to fasting that could at all be ascribed to one of the great pre-exilic prophets is found in Jer. 14:12. The absence of other pre-exilic prophetic pronouncements on the subject must be due to the fact that fasting did not occupy the prominent place it did in later Judaism. The other references to fasting in prophetic books, aside from Joel (see § 3*a above*) are from the period of disillusionment and strife which followed early postexilic attempts to re-establish Israel in her homeland (Isa. 58:3-4; Zech. 7:5). As might be expected, given the general tone of prophetic teaching, the prophets did not condemn fasting as such, but inveighed against the insincerity with which it was being practiced (cf. Joel 2:12-13).

4. Fasting in the NT. The NT both provides evidence of Jesus' attitude toward fasting and shows how he and the earliest Christians, against the background of first-century Judaism, took it for granted as a pious practice.

a. Jesus' teaching on fasting. The two dominical sayings in which fasting is mentioned indicate that Jesus' attitude was in accord with the prophetic insistence on sincerity in religious observances and also that his conviction of the close connection between his own mission and the coming of the kingdom of God left no time for attention to the lesser details of pious practice.

Jesus maintained, in the same vein as Isa. 58:3-4, that fasting, like any other expression of devotion, is something done to the glory of God, not a means by which the admiration of men is to be sought (Matt. 6:16-18; cf. Luke 18:9-14). It is to be noted that fasting is not, in itself, condemned. The emphasis is one that is consonant both with prophetic teaching and with Jesus' own sayings on other subjects: God looks, not upon outward actions, but upon the disposition of the heart. The worth of fasting, as of any other act, lies in the devotion of which it is the expression. Without such devotion it is, of itself, meaningless.

The second saying of Jesus on fasting carries a different emphasis. Just as the Lord's Prayer was the result of a request that he, like other religious teachers, give his disciples direction in prayer, this saying resulted from a request that he, like other teachers, give his disciples some rule on fasting (Matt. 9:14-15; Mark 2:18-20; Luke 5:33-35). In line with the note struck in the saying now preserved in the Matthean Sermon on the Mount, Jesus refused to lay down any specific regulation on the nature or frequency of fasting for his disciples. The reason given for this is that the way in which the kingdom of God is breaking through into human history in his presence and ministry leaves room only for joy and thankfulness. There is no time for concentration on lesser things. Though the latter part of this saying, the assertion that the time for fasting will come when the bridegroom is gone, may have been added under the influence of Jesus' death, its presence in the gospels was undoubtedly influential in the rise of the tradition of a pre-Easter fast in the Christian community.

Given the fact that he and his disciples seem to have been faithful in their observance of the rites and customs of Judaism, it is probable that Jesus did keep such fasts as the one connected with the Day of Atonement. Indeed, however the Matthean account of his temptation may have been expanded in the course of its transmission, it could be recounted of him that he did fast at times of spiritual crisis (Matt. 4:2; cf. Mark 1:13). But his teaching on the subject was in line with the prophetic tradition and with his own eschatological outlook.

b. Fasting in the early church. The only clear references in the NT to fasting as a religious act in the early Christian community associate it with times of solemn prayer, particularly with the setting apart of officers in the church (Acts 13:2-3; 14:23). The occurrences of the word in the Pauline letters seem simply to denote going without food at times when there was none to be had (II Cor. 6:5; 11:27). There can, however, be no doubt that fasting did soon come to be regarded by the Christians as a commendable pious practice. Evidence of this is found in the tendency to add references to it to the text of the NT, the Textus Receptus containing allusions to fasting which are absent from the earliest MSS (Matt. 17:21; Mark 9:29; Acts 10:30; I Cor. 7:5). Literature of the subapostolic age indicates that the pre-Easter and prebaptismal fasts came early to be widely practiced, and Christians could be exhorted, like Jews, to fast twice in the week—on Wednesdays and Fridays, however, instead of Tuesdays and Thursdays (Did. 8.1).

Bibliography. E. B. Tylor, Primitive Culture, I (1871), 277, 402; H. Spencer, Principles of Sociology, I (1876), 170, 284-85; W. R. Smith, Religion of the Semites (2nd ed., 1901), p. 434; J. A. MacCulloch in J. Hastings and J. A. Selbie, eds., Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, V (1912), 759-65; I. Abrahams, Studies in Pharisaism and the Gospels: First Series (1917), pp. 121-28; G. F. Moore, Judaism, II (1927), 55 ff, 257 ff; H. L. Strack and P. Billerbeck, Kommentar zum NT aus Talmud und Midrasch, IV (1928), 77-114. M. S. Freiberger, Die Fasten im alten Israel (1929). J. A. Montgomery, "Ascetic Strains in Early Judaism," JBL, LI (1932), 183-213.

H. H. Guthrie, Jr.

FASTS AND FEASTS. See Feasts and Fasts.

FAT. See Sacrifice and Offerings § A2*a*.

FATE [דרך (KJV WAY), מקרה (KJV THAT WHICH BEFALLETH in Ecc. 3:19; EVENT in Ecc. 2:14; 9:2-3), מוה (KJV HABITATION in Jer. 49:20; 50:45), עת (KJV TIME), פקדה (KJV VISITATION)]. That which is one's lot or fortune in life. In the Bible "fate" usually has reference to the inevitable fact of death, which comes alike to the wise and the foolish, the rich and the poor, the righteous and the wicked, the pious and the irreverent (Ps. 49:13; Ecc. 2:14; 3:19; 9:2-3). Man is counseled to live his life in the face of it (Ecc. 2:24; 3:12-13).

For the biblical writer fate is directly related to the sovereign will of God. There is no fatalistic concept, such as the Greek μοῖρα or the Muslim kismet. God rules the world, personally and directly, determining the fate of all things (cf. Isa. 45:1-8; Amos 3:6; Matt. 10:29-30; Luke 12:24-28). Man's life is in God's hands. (Among the later rabbis it was common belief that man's life and fortune were determined from year to year by judicial procedure in the supreme court above.) While the Jews believed in foreordination, as Josephus avers (Jos. Antiq. XIII.v.9), it was always maintained so as to leave man ultimately responsible for his destiny. God, in his providence, determines what shall befall a man, but not whether he shall be righteous or wicked.

The mystery of the divine rule was ever a problem. A theory of theodicy was developed—blessing for the righteous, adversity for the wicked—but the Hebrew discovered theodicy did not accord with experience. Job and Ecclesiastes appeared as a protest against such a view. Apocalyptic sought a solution to the inequities of life in future judgment and the eschaton. The biblical author ultimately solved the problem by faith. Life could not be explained in terms of rewards and punishments, but God was found to be sufficient for every need (cf. Job 19:25-27; Ps. 73:23-26; Rom. 8:35-39; II Cor. 9:8-10), and the rewards of the spirit found to be infinitely greater than any physical misfortune (cf. II Cor. 4:7-11). Calamity became a summons to repentance (Luke 13:1-5), and death became the gateway to life (I Cor. 15:51-57; Phil. 1:21-23).

Bibliography. G. F. Moore, Judaism in the First Centuries of the Christian Era, I (1927), 408 (note 1), 454-58; J. Hempel, Gott und Mensch (2nd ed., 1936), pp. 199-233; D. B. MacDonald, The Hebrew Philosophical Genius (1936), pp. 85-93.

V. H. Kooy

FATHER [אב, cf. Assyrian abhu, decides; πατήρ].

1. The immediate male ancestor
2. A more remote ancestor
3. "Gathered to the fathers"
4. An honorary title or term of respect
5. The originator or prototype of a class or condition
6. A name for God

1. The immediate male ancestor. The father of the family demanded honor and obedience, and his authority could not be questioned. When Abraham was directed to sacrifice his son Isaac, the son did not demur (Gen. 22; cf. II Kings 3:27). The law enjoins children to honor their father and their mother (Exod. 20:12; Deut. 5:16; Ecclus. 3:1-16). Death may be the penalty for cursing a father or for striking him (Exod. 21:15, 17). The father could sell his daughter as a slave (vs. 7). A father might destroy members of his own family if they enticed him from his faith (Deut. 13:6-10). He was responsible for the conduct of the required religious observances and ceremonies, such as circumcision (Gen. 17:27). He gave religious nurture to his children and provided for their physical safety (Deut. 1:31; Job 1:5; Hos. 11:1-3). He was the teacher of his sons and their glory (Prov. 1:8; 17:6), and he must therefore be respected and heard (19:26; 30:11). The father loves his children and rejoices over their uprightness (Ps. 103:13; Prov. 23:25; Jer. 47:3). The father grieves over his dead son (II Sam. 18:33), because he knows he cannot leave the son behind to carry on his name (Ecclus. 30:4).

2. A more remote ancestor. "Father" may refer to the forefathers of an individual or a community, as well as to the immediate father (Gen. 28:13; 32:9; I Kings 15:11; 19:4; II Kings 19:12; etc.). The term is commonly applied to ancestors of the entire community of Israel. Abram was told that he would be the "father of a multitude of nations" (Gen. 17:4); the God of Israel's fathers promised the land of Canaan to their descendants (Deut. 27:3). Those who heralded the entrance of Jesus into Jerusalem used the words: "Blessed be the kingdom of our father David that is coming!" (Mark 11:10; see also Luke 3:8; 16:24; John 6:58; 7:22; Rom. 4:1; I Cor. 10:1; Jas. 2:21).

3. "Gathered to the fathers." To signify death as well as some kind of continuation of the family after death in the underworld, the phrase "slept with the fathers" or "gathered to the fathers" is encountered. "David slept with his fathers" (I Kings 2:10; cf. Deut. 31:16; II Kings 22:20).

4. An honorary title or term of respect. Micah said to the Levite: "Be to me a father and a priest" (Judg. 17:10; cf. 18:19). Elisha the disciple addressed Elijah the teacher prophet: "My father" (II Kings 2:12). Similarly, the king of Israel so addressed Elisha (II Kings 6:21; 13:14); and David called Saul his "father" (I Sam. 24:11; cf. II Kings 5:13; Isa. 22:21). "Fathers" is a title applied to older members of the Christian community, equivalent to "elders" (I John 2:13). This honorary title should be reserved for God, one writer declares (Matt. 23:9*a*).

5. The originator or prototype of a class or condition. Spokesmen for the Rechabite group named Rechab as their father in the sense of "founder" (Jer. 35:6); and Jabal was the "father" of tent-dwellers and cattle-raisers (Gen. 4:20). Jubal was the "father" of the musicians "who play the lyre and pipe" (Gen. 4:21). Phinehas is named as the father of the priestly class (I Macc. 2:54), and Abraham is said to be the "father" of all who believe (Rom. 4:11, 16-17). John 8:44 names "your father the devil" and the "father of lies"—i.e., the source of evil and hypocrisy. "Father" may signify compassion also (Job 29:16; 31:18; Ps. 103:13) and thus characterize all who display this virtue.

6. A name for God. For the theological significance of this term in the Bible, see God, OT; God, NT. The word occurs in both parts of the Bible in relation to the nature of God. It appears often as an element in proper names revealing some attribute of the divine being. E.g., Abiel may be translated "El is (my) father" (I Sam. 9:1). Various names may be found with meanings such as "My father is judge," "My father knew," "My father is majesty," "My father is goodness," etc.

For bibliography, see Children; Family; Marriage.

O. J. Baab

FATHERLESS [יתום, orphan, probably from be alone, bereaved; ὀρφανός (Jas. 1:27; RSV ORPHANS)]. Although this word may be equated with "orphan," in no instance of the use of יתום in the Bible is it clear that both parents are dead. Hebrew law carefully provided for fatherless children with special tithes at the end of every three-year period and the requirement that gleanings be left in the fields for them (Deut. 14:29; 24:19-21; 26:12; 27:19). The plea to care for the fatherless is frequent (Exod. 22:22; Deut. 10:18; 24:17; Isa. 1:17; 10:2; Jer. 22:3; Zech. 7:10; Ecclus. 4:10; Jas. 1:27). The fatherless child is often associated with the Widow in the biblical pleas that compassion be shown for the needy. Responding to the demands of their God to show mercy to the needy, the Jews after their victory over Nicanor gave some of the spoil to the orphans and widows in the community (II Macc. 8:28).

Perhaps in some instances the fatherless was a daughter rather than a son, although this cannot be proved. The daughter inherited from her father only in the absence of sons (Num. 27:7-11). Thus the fatherless daughters required special consideration in the Israelite community.

It has been suggested that the "fatherless" were the female children of sacred prostitutes, who obviously had no identifiable father. Their life was integrated with the sanctuary or temple and would have been seriously disrupted by the Josianic reform in 621. These cult children were sometimes adopted by barren women who thus reduced the surplus of children of the gods at the shrine (see Hos. 1 for symbolic names). O. J. Baab

FATHERS, APOSTOLIC. See Apostolic Fathers.

FATHER'S HOUSE [בית־אב; οἰκία]. In the OT the expression may be noted when Joseph speaks to his brothers and to his "father's household" (Gen. 46:31; 50:22). The term בית means, not only "house" in a physical sense, but the Family or household of a man in a social-psychological sense. In this passage Joseph addresses the inclusive family community, consisting of his brothers, their families, and the herdsmen who serve them. A similar usage occurs in Judg. 11:2, where Jephthah's brothers by another woman thrust him out so that he cannot inherit "in our father's house"—i.e., family. In the sense of clans and families, especially in connection with taking a census, the phrase appears frequently in the plural, "fathers' houses" (see especially Num. 1:2, etc.; I Chr. 4:38; 5:13 ff; 7:2, 7; 23:11; Ezra 2:59; 10:16; Neh. 7:61; etc.).

In the NT the words identify the temple of the Lord in Jerusalem: "You shall not make my Father's house a house of trade" (John 2:16; cf. Acts 7:47, 49). When sought by his parents, Jesus said: "Did you not know that I must be in my Father's house?" (Luke 2:49)—i.e., the temple. In the Fourth Gospel the expression signifies heaven as the dwelling place of God (John 14:2). The Greek word οἰκία is used instead of the parallel term οἶκος.

See also Father; Heaven.

Bibliography. For a discussion of heaven as God's dwelling place, see O. Schaefer, ZNW, 32 (1933), 210-17.

O. J. Baab

FATHOM [ὀργυιά] (Acts 27:28). A unit of measurement based on the length from the tip of one hand to the tip of the other when the arms are outstretched —i.e., four cubits or ca. six feet. See Weights and Measures § D4*f*.

FATLING [מרוא, מח, משנה; σιτιστός]. A domestic animal, bovine, important for its use in Israel's sacrificial practices. See Sacrifice and Offerings.

A product of Israel's agricultural milieu, the fatling figured prominently among those animals worthy to be used for cultic offerings. The name is concerned primarily, not with the species, but with the quality of the animal. Only the most desirable, the choice, could be offered to the Lord. It is the well-cared-for, well-fed animal which is worthy. A variety of terms appear in the MT, often rendered FAT CATTLE in the KJV.

Most important of the terms is מריא, used for cattle which are raised and fed for meat. When used in sacrifice, what was offered up was the choicest product of Israel's agriculture. In Isa. 1:11, it is modified by חלב, "the fat one"—i.e., the prime quality. The term in many places is related to sacrifice: it is offered in the sacrifice of slaughter (זבח; II Sam. 6:13; I Kings 1:9, 19, 25; Ezek. 39:18), in burnt offering (עלה; Isa. 1:11), and related to peace offering (שלם; Amos 5:22). It was not the only animal offered but is listed often with other sacrificial animals: ox (II Sam. 6:13; I Kings 1:19, 25), rams (Isa. 1:11), sheep (I Kings 1:9, 19, 25), and oxen (I Kings 1:9). In Ezek. 39:18 "fatling" is treated as a term of classification for all the animals being sacrificed. While the term applies specifically to cattle in a technical sense, it is also an inclusive term for animals worthy of sacrifice. In only one instance is the term used in a nonsacrificial context (Isa. 11:6).

A less used term, מח, more directly stresses the quality of choiceness or fatness. It is derived from the noun for "marrow," thus does not refer to a kind of animal but to the quality. It is mentioned in a noncultic context (Isa. 5:17), and is also related to burnt offering (עלה) along with rams, bulls, and goats (Ps. 66:15).

Among the animals spared by Saul (I Sam. 15:9) is משנה. The term refers to the fact that what is spared is the best. It is suggested that the term is rightly שמן, "the fat ones"; more probably it means the "second offspring," שנה, which is superior to the firstlings. In either case, it is an animal of agricultural life along with sheep, oxen, and lambs. In Matt. 22:4, a σιτιστὰ was prepared for a feast, along with oxen. This feast had no relation to cultic activity. Thus cattle especially fed for meat were used both for cultic and noncultic activity. The fatling, as a sacrificial animal, is not unique, other than that it represented the best Israel could take from its life with which to come before its God.

W. Brueggemann

FATTED. A participial adjective used to render the following Hebrew and Greek terms:

a) אבוס (Prov. 15:17, of an ox; I Kings 4:23—H 5:3, in the plural, of fowl).

b) מרבק (lit., "stall," whence "calf" of a stall—i.e., a stall-fed or fatted calf; I Sam. 28:24; Jer. 46:21).

c) Σιτευτός (Luke 15:23, 27, 30).

In Amos 5:22 the plural of מריא, "fatling," is rendered "fatted beasts." H. F. Beck FAUCHION fô′chən. KJV translation of ἀκινάκης (RSV SWORD) in Jth. 13:6; 16:9. See Weapons and Implements of War.

FAUNA. Every translation and every commentary of the Bible has had to deal with words which indicated names of animals. Almost none of these translators or commentators has had any knowledge of animals, and most of them still less of the animals of the Holy Land. Linnaeus was quite right when he said in one of his seminaries (ca. 1750) that the natural history of the Holy Land is less well known than that of the most distant provinces of India.

The most compendious study on the animals of the Bible is the voluminous folio Hierozoicon (1663), written by Samuel Bochartus of Caen. This study is a compilation of all the earlier traditions, translations, and commentaries, with comparative study of the meaning of each word in the other Semitic languages and of pure etymology.

Frederick Hasselquist of Uppsala, a student of Linnaeus, visited the Holy Land in 1752, but died soon afterward at Smyrna. In his posthumous Iter Palaestinum (Stockholm, 1757), he began with the interpretation of biblical names. But he assumed that no changes had occurred in the fauna of the land since the days of the Bible. Thus, he denied the presence of the lion in those historical times, merely because lions no longer were found in the eighteenth century in Palestine. As sand grouse (Pterocles) were very common in the Jordan Valley during his visit, he was certain to have the שלו of Exod. 16:13; Num. 11:31-32; Ps. 105:40 before him; it, however, is identified with the quail. Even the marvelous Fauna and Flora of Palestine (London, 1884) of Canon Henry Baker Tristram of Durham, the father of the natural history of Palestine, and his successors were unable to identify a very great number of the animals mentioned in the Bible. The knowledge of the actual fauna of the country, of animals extinct in historical times or since the Pleistocene Age, was, of course, of the greatest importance for the interpretation of the animal names of the Bible. But it left still many questions open. If we should briefly summarize the present state of our knowledge in this respect, we should have first to confess that a very great part of these names are nomina nuda, names the true interpretation of which we are still unable to give, and probably will always be unable to give. The reason is usually that the name appears only once or twice and is not connected with a special habit or habitat or character. In these cases neither etymology nor comparison with related languages is able to solve the problem. Pure etymology has long since been abandoned as a method of identifying an animal when no further indications help to support the etymological solution. Still less reliable is the conclusion from related languages. Thus צב ("lizard") means "tortoise" in Hebrew (Lev. 11:29), but the equivalent dhab in Arabic means the big lizard Uromastyx. In addition, we know that animal names change their identification in time and in space—i.e., during the centuries and in various areas of the language. In Jewish tradition we have an excellent illustration of such changes in the word צבי, doubtless the "gazelle" of the Bible, but unanimously interpreted by European Jewry of latter centuries as "deer," merely because the red deer was well known to them, while no gazelles populate Europe. This may also be correct for the interpretation of the צב. In other Hebrew literature it was alternatingly used for a big lizard or for a tortoise. The former interpretation fits well the big Uromastyx lizard, the dhab of the Arabs, which is a recognized delicacy of the Bedouins. This is much more likely to have been mentioned under the forbidden animals than the tortoise Testudo, which is rare in the desert and offers little meat for food.

In certain cases the interpretation became clear, once the fauna of Palestine was known. The שפן of the Bible (Lev. 11:5; Deut. 14:7; Ps. 104:18; Prov. 30:26; "badger") cannot refer to the rabbit, as Luther presumed in his translation, but it is the coney (Procavia capensis), well characterized by habitat and behavior in the biblical data. It cannot be the rabbit, as this animal does not, and did not, occur in Palestine. For this lack of zoogeographical consideration these early interpreters should not be reproached, as such zoogeographical differences were generally unknown in their days.

The modern Hebrew language has made use of a number of nomina nuda or even of definitely wrong identifications. As long as the reader is well aware that these modern names make no pretense of identifying the biblical name, but merely make use of an available ancient Hebrew word without meaning, everything is in order. But we must beware of assuming that such names are authentic interpretations of the biblical name. Thus, it is now clear that the ברבירים אבוסים on King Solomon's table (I Kings 4:23; "fatted fowl") were geese, and not swans. We cannot know for what reason early interpreters identified this bird with a swan; perhaps their imagination suggested to them that this royal animal must have a wonderful taste. Anyhow, nearly contemporaneous ivory carvings from Megiddo show a row of peasants bringing fattened geese into town. But the goose has a well-accepted modern name, אוז, and it was quite properly decided to retain the modern name for "swan," as no other old name is available for this bird and as a long tradition has correlated "swan" with ברבור; but it is understood that the swan of King Solomon is a goose.

A. Mammalia
  1. Domestic
    a. Equidae
      i. Horse
      ii. Ass
      iii. Mule
    b. Suidae
    c. Camelidae
    d. Bovidae
      i. Cattle
      ii. Buffalo
      iii. Goat
      iv. Sheep
    e. Carnivora
      i. Dog
      ii. Cat
  2. Wild
    a. Chiroptera
    b. Insectivora
    c. Carnivora
      i. Wolf
      ii. Jackal and fox
      iii. Bear
      iv. Hyena
      v. Lion
      vi. Leopard
    d. Hyracoidea
    e. Perissodactyla

i. Onager
ii. Artiodactyla
iii. Wild Boar
iv. Deer
f. Bovidae
i. Wild Ox
ii. Gazelle
iii. Ibex
iv. Antelope
v. Varia
g. Lagomorpha
h. Rodentia
i. Mole rat
ii. Mouse
i. Proboscidea
j. Varia
k. Primates
l. Cetacea
B. Aves
1. Falconidae
2. Strigidae
3. Struthionidae
4. Passerine birds
5. Herons and related birds
6. Doves and gallinaceous birds
a. Dove
b. Goose
c. Domestic fowl
d. Partridge
e. Quail
f. Varia
C. Reptilia and amphibia
D. Pisces
E. Insecta
1. Siphonaptera
2. Orthoptera
3. Rhynchota
4. Hymenoptera
a. Ant
b. Wasp
c. Bee
5. Lepidoptera
6. Aphaniptera
7. Diptera
a. Fly
b. Gnat
c. Insect larvae
F. Invertebrata other than insects
1. Mollusca
2. Vermes
3. Arachnoidea
a. Scorpion
b. Spider
4. Anthozoa
5. Addendum
Bibliography

A. MAMMALIA. The animal names in the NT are almost all clearly identified. Those of the OT, however—apart from those of domestic animals, most big carnivores, and a few other mammals—are mere nomina nuda, the identification of which is impossible.

1. Domestic. a. Equidae. i. Horse. The horse is believed to have been introduced into the Middle East from Persia by the Hyksos, invading Egypt early in the second millennium B.C. But recently bones of horses (domesticated) have been discovered in a settlement of the Negeb in the Chalcolithic period. What was interpreted as evidence of horse sacrifices was discovered in Tell el-Ajjul (Beth-eglaim). In the Bible horses in Egypt are mentioned as early as Gen. 47:17 (see also Exod. 14:9-28, etc.), but not until the times of David and Solomon was the horse in common use by the Hebrews and did horsemen (פרושים) form part of the army. The horse stables of King Solomon are well known; it is even probable that he was the center of an important trade of horses in the Middle East (see STABLE; MEGIDDO; HORSE). The local horse is a light horse, similar to the type of the Arabian horse. It should be added that the origin of domestication of the horse is by no means clear. It had obviously been introduced, already domesticated, into the Middle East from the N or the NE. Some even assume an independent domestication in the land of the Hittites. The discovery of bones in the Negeb has made the horse's early history in the Middle East very uncertain. רכש designates a team of horses in I Kings 4:28—H 5:8; Mic. 1:13, and post horses in Esth. 8:10, 14.

ii. Ass. This classification includes the ass (חמור), the she-ass (אתון), the young ass (עיר): Equus asinus. The local ass is clearly a descendant of the wild Nubian ass, recognizable by its black shoulder and back stripes. Before the camel came into its full symbiosis with the Bedouins of the desert, the ass was a very efficient "ship of the desert." It has been shown that until the beginning of the twentieth century ass caravans annually crossed the Sahara from Morocco to the Red Sea and back. Asses were common since the days of Abraham. In later times big white asses were highly appreciated. See also Ass. Fig. ASS 94.

iii. Mule. The mule (פרדה, פרד) is mentioned beginning with the time of King David, and was highly appreciated for riding (II Sam. 13:29, etc.). It was, of course, forbidden to breed mules in Israel, as was every hybridization (cf. the law of diverse kinds [כלאים; Lev. 19:19]). The mules had hence to be brought from beyond the country. Fig. MUL 78.

b. Suidae. The swine (חזיר) belonged to the unclean animals, but they were kept by the Canaanite pagans. Isaiah (65:4; 66:17) expresses abomination of the flesh of swine and of mice. On the other hand, we find the proper name Hezir (חזיר; I Chr. 24:15; Neh. 10:20), in one instance a priest's name. This fact deserves a closer study than it has had so far. Also in the NT swine are unclean animals. See also SWINE.

c. Camelidae. The one-humped camel or dromedary (גמל; Camelus dromedaries L.) is mentioned in the days of the patriarchs (Gen. 32:15, etc.), but the Midianites in the days of the judges (twelfth century B.C.) are the first illustration of any raid of camel Bedouins into the settled land (Judg. 7:12). The conclusion has been drawn from this fact, as well as from the rarity of camel documentations in the art of ancient Mesopotamia (until the seventh century) and in Egypt (until the Ptolemies), that the camel of the patriarchs is an anachronism. The documentation of and on camels is, to be sure, very scanty but continuous in ancient Egypt and Mesopotamia. Some kind of taboo may have prevented its earlier illustration in art. What appear to be domestic camels, judging from the tightly full hump, appear already ca. 7000 B.C. on the rock carvings of Kilwa in the extreme E of Transjordan. The explanation is obvious. The domestication of the wild dromedary began with keeping, with utilization of wool and milk; then it passed slowly to the use of light burdens, and it ended in the fully established symbiosis between camels and Bedouins, finding its expression in the famous camel raids of the Midianites. This long way from semidomestication to a highly integrated domestication took thousand of years, of which we have witness from the Bible and biblical archaeology. בכרה, בכר (Isa. 60:6; Jer. 2:23; "young camels"), as well as כרכרות (Isa. 66:20; "dromedaries"), are young camels. See also CAMEL.

d. Bovidae. i. Cattle. The cattle (בקר; Bos primigenius) of the Bible have many names: שור, "ox"; פר, "bull"; פרה, "cow"; עגל, עגלה, "calf." אבירים (Judg. 5:22; Ps. 22:13; Isa. 10:13; etc.) are animals or men of big stature. This important wealth of ancient Israel was not used for milk or for meat production; cattle were the usual animals for drawing the plow. It was a small cattle like the present Beiruti race. It is very remarkable, however, that all the mosaic pavements and wall paintings from the Hellenistic to the Byzantine periods represent only a zeboid cattle. The crossing of both has apparently resulted in the modern Damascus cattle. While one archaeologist has found one race of cattle through all the layers of the excavations of Megiddo (apparently our Beiruti cattle), another describes five different races of cattle from as many different strata at Gezer. The history of cattle in Bible times needs much intensified study. מקנה may designate possessions of cattle or livestock (e.g., Gen. 4:20; 30:29). Fig. COW 51.

ii. Buffalo. The domestic buffalo (called מרי today; Bos bubalis L.) appears in Palestine for the first time on an Arabic sculpture of the seventh century. Shortly later on, it is mentioned by Saint Willibald in the swamps of Huleh. There is no indication that it was present in Palestine in biblical times.

iii. Goat. The goat was common and has many names. The general name is עז. Many names refer to the he-goat (i.e., צפיר, שעיר, עתוד, תיש). גדי is the young goat. The race is the Syrian or Mamber goat (Capra hircus mambrica), which is characterized by its long, pending ears and its backward-curved horns. Since oldest times goats have helped in causing extreme erosion in the hill country. Among our oldest animal drawings are goats feeding upon trees. The goat is so much more dangerous to the vegetation than the sheep, as the former tears the plant out of the soil while the latter cuts it above the soil.

iv. Sheep. Sheep, giving wool and milk and meat, were the greatest wealth of the patriarchs. The Ovis orientalies vignei Blyth always has a fat tail. While this has a flat hump at the end of it, we find a long, fatty tail on all illustrations from Hellenistic to Byzantine times. The general name is צאן (also including goats) and שה. The ram is איל, the ewe רחל. כבש is a sheep older than one year, עלה a suckling lamb, כר a young lamb in pasture. See also SHEEP.

e. Carnivora. i. Dog. The dog (כלב; Canis familiaris L.) was common in ancient Palestine. It was, of course, the semidomestic Paria dog, which is affiliated to man as scavenger, serving man as a watchdog, announcing the approach of any stranger by its loud and continued barking. No personal relations existed between man and dog, but a flock of dogs was impersonally affiliated to a settlement. As scavenger, the dog was despised. It is probable, but not proved, that the Seluki greyhounds of the Bedouins of the desert already existed in Bible times. But the hunting dogs of the Hellenistic to Byzantine art were not imported before the Hellenistic period, certainly not into Jewish Palestine. See also DOG.

ii. Cat. The domestic cat (חתול; κατος; Felvis silverstris catusil) is not mentioned in the Bible before the apocryphal Letter of Jeremiah 6:22 (ca. 300 B.C. or later). It was certainly much older in Palestine. In the Egyptian fortresses from Beisan to Gaza were temples to the goddess Baste, whose sacred animal was the domestic cat. The Egyptians domesticated it first in their temples.* As a pagan idol it was a taboo to the Jews; hence it is not mentioned, while cat amulets are not rarely found in these ancient Egyptian temples. Figs. CAT 18-19.

2. Wild. a. Chiroptera. The designation עטלף (Lev. 11:19; Deut. 14:18; Isa. 2:20) is the common name for all the many species of local bats, none of which is denominated specifically, but generally as inhabiting caves and ruins. The identification of עטלף has, so far, not been doubted.

b. Insectivora. Certainly no shrews (Soricidae) are mentioned in the Bible. No certain identification of the hedgehogs, three species of which occur and are common in Palestine, can be made from the Bible. The recent name is קפוד, which occurs in Isa. 14:23 ("hedgehog"); 34:11 ("porcupine"); Zeph. 2:14 ("hedgehog"), but cannot be interpreted with certainty as "hedgehog."

c. Carnivora. i. Wolf. The wolf (זאב; Canis lupus L.) was common in the times of the Bible all over Palestine. It was a danger to sheep and shepherds.

ii. Jackal and fox. The jackal (Canis aureus syriacus H.E.) is one of the most common and most conspicuous mammals of the country still today. Its nightly wailing makes it impossible to overlook it. It is also the carrion-feeder, which was the שועל mentioned in the Bible ("jackals" in Ps. 63:10—H 63:11; Lam. 5:18, but elsewhere "foxes"); but the fox is not a carrion-feeder. There is not the slightest doubt that the many references to this animal in the Bible refer to the jackal. It is not so certain that the שועלים קטנים of Song of S. 2:15 are "little foxes." The איים and the ציים (Isa. 34:14, etc.) appear to refer to the wailing of the jackals. The תנים, which are often mentioned in the wilderness (Isa. 13:22; 43:20; etc.), are dragons. It is often but unauthentically interpreted as the jackal. This would leave us with the possible exception of שועלים קטנים in Song of S. 2:15, without any name for the fox, which actually is quite possible. We should, however, not assume that both these species have been understood under one name. The fox (Vulpes vulpes palaestinae Thos.) is fairly common in Palestine, but by far not so conspicuous and not so noisy as are the jackals.

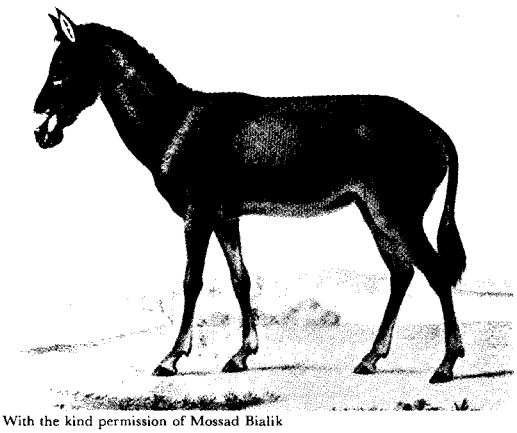
iii. Bear. The bear (דב; Ursus arotus syriacus H.E.) was fairly common in Bible times all over the settled and the hilly country. It was a danger to fruit trees and to herds (II Sam. 17:8, etc.). The color of the Syrian bear ranges from dark red-brown to the rare light specimens. The last bear was killed in Upper Galilee just before World War I. The still fairly common bear of the S and central Lebanon and Hermon was exterminated there by the hunting expeditions of the armies. But it still survives in N Syria, NW Persia, and S Turkey.

iv. Hyena. The striped hyena (צבוע; Hyaenahyana L.) is not mentioned in the Bible except as a geographical name: the Valley of Zeboim (i.e., Valley of Hyenas; I Sam. 13:18; cf. also the town Zeboim [Neh. 11:34]). There is no dissent about the identity of the name.

v. Lion. The lion (Panthera leo persica Mey.) has many names in the Bible, where it is mentioned 130 times. ארי אריה is the general name; כפיר is a young lion; לביא, לביאה (Ps. 57:4—H 57:5; Ezek. 19:2; Nah. 2:13), refer to an old lion and lioness respectively; ליש (Job 4:11; Prov. 30:30; Isa. 30:6) is a poetic name for a full-grown lion. The last lion was killed in Palestine at Ledja near Megiddo in the thirteenth century. From the twelfth century we have vivid descriptions of lion hunts on the Orontes in Syria in the Memoirs of Usamah ibn-Munquidh. In the thickets of the Euphrates and of the Tigris, the lion disappeared only during the nineteenth century. Various travelers, from Hasselquist to Roth, have pointed out that no lion bones have been found and that no lions occurred in Palestine in the memory of the living, and that the leopard was probably meant in the biblical references. There is, however, not the slightest reason, either from the zoological or from the philological point of view, to doubt the common occurrence of the real lion in Bible times. We should not forget that in historical times lions still occurred in Greece. The local lion was the Persian race, which is by no means so short-maned as some descriptions pretend. Its bones have recently been found at Megiddo.

vi. Leopard. The leopard (נמר; Panthera pardus tulliana Val.) is now almost extinct in Palestine, apart from temporary invasions in summer of a few individuals from the Lebanon and Hermon. Yet just before the First World War five leopards were killed around Jerusalem, and just after World War II one was shot near Beer-sheba. Tristram points out correctly that the sentence: "Their horses are swifter than leopards" in Hab. 1:8 refers to the cheetah or hunting leopard (Acynonyx jubatus venaticus Geoff.; נמר הצעיד). This animal can be readily distinguished from the leopard, with its ringed spots, by the solid spots of the cheetah, as well as by its forelegs' being conspicuously higher than its hindlegs. Its use for hunting is old, and a Byzantine sculpture of a cheetah with collar has been found in Palestine.



No other carnivore is reliably reported in the Bible.

d. Hyracoidea. There can be no doubt that the שפן (Lev. 11:5; Deut. 14:7; Ps. 104:18; Prov. 30:26; "badger") is the Syrian coney (Procavia capensis syriacus Schreb.), which lives among rocks from the Dead Sea Valley to the Hermon. Many European translators who were unfamiliar with this animal held it to be a rabbit. Fig. FAU 4.

e. Perissodactyla. i. Onager. The Syrian onager (Equus hemionus hemihippus) of the Syrian Desert is the only onager which lived in Bible times in Palestine (mainly see Job, Isaiah, and Jeremiah). It has

4. Coney (Hyrax Syriacus)

With the kind permission of Mossad Bialik

5. Onager

been mentioned above that the Hebrew פרא (Job 6:5; Isa. 32:14; Jer. 14:6; etc.; "wild ass") and the Aramaic עדר (Dan. 5:21) are synonyms for the same animal. As only one type of onager has lived in historical times in the area, we have to stop looking for two kinds of onagers. It has been extinct for ca. a hundred years in the Syrian Desert (Isa. 32:14; Dan. 5:21). Fig. FAU 5.

ii. Artiodactyla. We have, to begin with, a very ancient misidentification. The name Behemoth (בהמות) in Job 40:15-24 is not the hippo (Hippopotamus amphibius L.) but has the same meaning as in all other places of the Bible—namely, "beast" or "wild beast." Tur-Sinai has definitely cleared the jungle of prejudices grown around this misinterpretation (see his Job Commentary).

iii. Wild Boar. The wild boar (חזיר; Sus scrofa[?] screfa L.) is still common in swamps, but has disappeared from the rest of the country. Its survival was made possible because neither Jews nor Muslims, nor many of the native Christians, eat it, and hence they do not regard it as game.

iv. Deer. Rather complicated is the interpretation of the deer of Palestine. Three species lived there, all still surviving in the N part of the Middle East, but none any longer in Palestine. Throughout the Middle East these three species disappeared in the following sequence:

a) Red Deer (Cervus elaphus[?] maral Gray)

b) Fallow Deer (Dama mesopotamica Brooke)

c) Roe Deer (Capreolus capreolus capreolus L.)

Their Hebrew names are very uncertain: איל is apparently the general name for "deer." The red deer was certainly present in the country in Bible times. A splendid wall-drawing was recently discovered in a sepulchral cave of the Hasmonean period in Jerusalem, but we are unable to associate any of the quotations of the Bible with this species. Its present-day name is אילה, איל, and we are inclined to regard this important game as the deer on King Solomon's table (I Kings 4:23—H 5:3). The two other species were certainly common in that time. The יחמור (Deut. 14:5; I Kings 4:23—H 5:3; "roebuck") seems to be the fallow deer; yet it must be noted that when Conder discovered the Carmel roe ca. 1880, he found it called yaḥmûr by the Arabs. Anyhow, we remain without any biblical name for the common roe deer, as the interpretation of אילה שלוחה (Gen. 49:21; "hind let loose") as "roe deer" certainly is a misunderstanding, meaning "the deer has been sent." The roe deer thus makes necessary a new name, אילון. It does not seem to be mentioned in the Bible.

f. Bovidae. i. Wild Ox. Among the Bovidae we have first to note the Auerochs (Bos primigenius L.). It was Tristram who first identified ראם with this animal instead of the traditional unicorn (Num. 23:22; Ps. 22:21—H 22:22; etc.; "wild ox"; KJV "unicorn"). This does not mean that in biblical times the Auerochs still lived in Palestine, but it was certainly plentiful in the Gezireh of Aram-naharaim. In the Assyrian language rīmu certainly was Bos primigenius.

ii. Gazelle. The symbol of beauty is throughout the Bible the gazelle (צבי, צליה), which is in the country represented commonly by Gazella gazella gazella Pall., the mountain gazelle, and by G. dorcas saudiya C. a. S., the dorcas gazelle. Fig. GAZ 12.

iii. Ibex. As the last of the identifiable species of this group must be mentioned the Nubian ibex (יעל [Ps. 104:18; "wild goats"]; יעלה [Prov. 5:19; "doe"]; יעלה סלע [Job 39:1; "mountain goat"]; cf. I Sam. 24:2 ["Wild-goats' Rocks"]; Capra ibex nubiana F. Cuv.). Fig. FAU 6.

6. Ibex (Capra Beden)

iv. Antelope. דישון (Deut. 14:5; "ibex"), in a list of unclean animals, is apparently identical with Akkadian da-as-su, and in this event it will mean (with all reservations, but very probably, as this is the biggest antelope of Iraq) the Arabian Oryx (Oryx leucoryx).

v. Varia. We have to exclude a few species which, since Tristram and Aharoni, have been interpreted as belonging to animals of this group. No satisfactory evidence exists for the former Asiatic occurrence of the addax (Addax nasomaculatus Balinv.) and of the Bubale Hartebeest (Alcelaphus buselaphus buselaphus Pall.). It must be added that the barbarian wild sheep (Ammotrages lervia Pall.) may have occurred in ancient times in the mountains of S and SE Palestine, but no definite proof is available.

Absolutely unidentifiable but apparently belonging to this group are: אקו (Deut. 14:5; "wild goat"), now used for Capra hircus aegagrus L.; תאו, תוא (Deut. 14:5; Isa. 51:20; "antelope"), now used for Alcelaphus buselaphus Pall. and for the European Bison (Bison bonasus L.). With regard to אנקה (Lev. 11:30; "gecko"), it is doubtful whether it is a small mammal or a lizard. זמר (Deut. 14:5; "mountain-sheep") is unidentifiable; the word is now used for the Arabian Oryx (Oryx leucoryx Pall.).

g. Lagomorpha. The common hare of the country (ארנבת; Lev. 11:6; Deut. 14:7) is the Palestine hare (Lepus europaeus judaeus Gray). Very much rarer are still little-known forms of Lepus capensis and of Lepus arabicus.

h. Rodentia. i. Mole rat. A very characteristic animal in the landscape of the Mediterranean part of the country is the Syrian mole rat (Spalax ehrenbergi ehrenbergi Nhrg.), whose hills are very conspicuous in winter and spring, especially in the terra rossa. Three Hebrew names are connected with it: the Aramaic אשות appears in the Talmudic literature only. חפר פרות (Isa. 2:20; "moles") are mentioned, together with bats, as inhabitants of ruins and dark refuges. The root חפר, meaning "to burrow," would suit excellently the mole rat, but it is doubtful if פרות belongs to the name. The third word is practically unidentifiable: חלד (Lev. 11:29; "weasel"). It is mentioned together with "mouse" and צב ("great lizard"; but see above). Some think that it is the same word as the Arabic ḫuld, "mole rat." Anyhow it is used in the Mishna, as well as in modern Hebrew, in this sense. The biblical interpretation of חלד remains open. It should be added that no mole (Talpa Insectivora!) occurs in Palestine.

ii. Mouse. עכבר (Lev. 11:29; I Sam. 6:4 ff; Isa. 66:17; "mouse") is the general word for all small rodents. It refers, of course, also to the Levant house mouse (Mu musculus praetextus Brants). In I Sam. 6 it refers to the Levant vole (Microtus guentheri D. a A.), where it appears first as an agricultural pest. But the often-assumed connection with the Philistine epidemic, which may have been the true plague, is by no means certain. שך (Jer. 5:26; taken as a verb) is probably a collective word for "mice" or "rodents." Tur-Sinai regards it as the equivalent of the Akkadian šikkū.

i. Proboscidea. The elephant is, of course, no native of Palestine. Yet still ca. 1500 B.C. the Indian elephant (Elephas maximus indicus L.) lived in the Orontes Valley, where it was hunted by Thutmose III. In the time of the Maccabeans (I Macc. 6:30, 34, 37) elephants were used in the armies of the Diadoches as tank units are used in modern armies. IVORY has been used for artistic work at least since the second millennium in the country. But this ivory was introduced from the African elephant (Loxodon sp.). The word שנהב (I Kings 10:22; II Chr. 9:21; "ivory") means "tooth of the elephant," הב being derived from the Egyptian ʾbw, "elephant."

j. Varia. The תחש of the tabernacle (Exod. 26:14; 35:7; etc.; "goatskins"; KJV "badgers' skins") is variously interpreted. Tur-Sinai interprets it as the skins of black goats, in contrast to the white goatskins. The sandals of Ezek. 16:10 may well refer to the marine Dugong (Dugong dugon Mull.), as its thick skin is widely used by the Bedouins of the Sinai for sandals. The interpretation "badgers' skins" makes no sense. While we must leave open the question what the תחש of Exod. 25:5 really is, there is little doubt that the תחש of Ezek. 16:10 ("shod you with תחש [leather]") refers to the skin of the Dugong (Dugong dugon Mull.). Many travelers in the Sinai have described sandals from the skin of this animal on the feet of the Bedouins as late as the nineteenth century.

k. Primates. The קופים and תכיים of I Kings 10:22; II Chr. 9:21 have been regarded as apes and parrots. Both the KJV and the RSV translate "apes and peacocks." Albright has pointed out (1921) that the latter word must be Egyptian kyw, mentioned with gfw (whence Hebrew קופים, qôphîm) as monkeys of a related species. Tur-Sinai rejects this view and holds that the words refer to precious stones (the LXX renders them by "carved and hewn stones"). In a letter Albright has written: "I welcome the chance to clarify my position on tukkîyîm (perhaps to be pronounced tekîyîm). The Egyptian word which occurs with gfw, 'monkeys,' in the Middle Egyptian story of the Shipwrecked Sailor is kyw (plural). The same word appears later in the feminine form kyt (for references to kyw and kyt see Erman-Grapow, Worterbuch der ägyptischen Sprache, V, 110, and Belegstellen, V, 17). The word appears in syllabic spelling in the New Kingdom as ka-y(a), applied to a monkey and to an animal from Nubia which could be taught to dance; it is construed both with the masculine article p and with the feminine t (Worterbuch der ägyptischen Sprache, V, 116). Hebrew tukkîyîm (or tekîyîm), with the Egyptian feminine article and the Hebrew masculine plural, is on a par with Arabic timsâḥ, "crocodile," from the late Egyptian feminine te-msâḥ (the masculine was pe-msâḥ). See my discussions of the word in AJSL, XXXVII, 144 (1921), and Archaeology and the Religion of Israel, p. 212, n. 16. For the Egyptian and Hebrew words for "crocodile" see T. O. Lambdin in JNES, XII (1953), 284 ff, where a full discussion of the linguistic problems will be found.

l. Cetacea. It has already been pointed out that the Leviathan (לויתן) is an old mythological creature, certainly not specifically referring to "whale," for which it is used today.

B. AVES. 1. Falconidae. For big birds of prey the general words are: עיט (Isa. 18:6; 46:11; Jer. 12:9; etc.; "bird of prey"), today used for Aquila, "eagle"; נשר ("eagle" in Exod. 19:4; Deut. 28:49; 32:11; II Sam. 1:23; etc.; "vulture" in Lam. 4:19; Hos. 8:1), today "vulture." According to Tur-Sinai, מחות ("clouds"; KJV "inward parts") and שכוי ("mists"; KJV "heart") of Job 38:36 are also general names for birds of prey. All the smaller diurnal birds of prey are designated as נץ (Lev. 11:16; Deut. 14:15; Job 39:26; "hawk"), a name used today for Accipiter, the "sparrow hawks." In the expression העיט צבוע (Jer. 12:9; "speckled bird"), the word צבוע is certainly not "hyena." Nor does it mean "speckled," for in the OT it is used only for prey. The meaning thus is "bird of prey."

The following specific determinations are possibly correct, even if this is only more or less probable: פרס ("ossifrage" in Lev. 11:13; "vulture" in Deut. 14:12) is the Lammergeier (Gypaëtus barbatus L.). נשר, apart from its general meaning, may be referred to as Gyps fulvus L., the Griffon Vulture, which is called naśr in Arabic. רחם (Lev. 11:18; Deut. 14:17; "vulture") may be Neophron percnopterus L., the Egyptian eagle, the raḫam of the Arabs. דאה (Lev. 11:14; "kite"), איה ("falcon" in Lev. 11:14; Job 28:7; "kite" in Deut. 14:13), ראה (Deut. 14:13; "buzzard"), דיות (Isa. 34:15; "kites"), perhaps the variants only scribal errors for דאה, are all probably kites (Milvus), of which three species occur in the country. עזניה (Lev. 11:13; Deut. 14:12; "osprey") means today the Black Vulture (Aegypius monachus L.). The biblical meaning remains uncertain.

2. Strigidae. The owls of the Bible are still more difficult to identify. Thus קפוז (Isa. 34:15; "owl") and לילית (Isa. 34:14; "night hag") are probably owls, in addition to the latter's meaning of "night ghost." לילית serves today for Strix, the tawny owl. In the lists of Lev. 11; Deut. 14 we find as birds, probably belonging to the owls, תחמס ("nighthawk" in Lev. 11:16; "hawk" in Deut. 14:15), according to Tristram and M. Dor the goatsucker, Caprimulgus sp. ינשוף ("ibis" in Lev. 11:17; "great owl" in Deut. 14:16; "owl" in Isa. 34:11), perhaps a great owl, is used today for Otus, the eared owl. כוס ("owl" in Lev. 11:17; Ps. 102:6—H 102:7; "little owl" in Deut. 14:16) is used for the little owl (Athene noctua). תנשמת (Lev. 11:18; Deut. 14:16; "water hen") is used for the barn owl (Tyto alba Scop.). To all these names of uncertain meaning we have to add the most difficult problem of יען, יענה, or בת היענה (Lev. 11:16; Deut. 14:15; Isa. 13:21; Mic. 1:8; etc.), translated "owl" in the KJV and "ostrich" in the RSV. See § B3 below.

3. Struthionidae. The uncertain יען, יענה, or בת היענה (Lev. 11:16; Deut. 14:15; Isa. 13:21; Mic. 1:8; etc.; "ostrich") may refer to the ostrich.* בת היענה means "daughter of the desert," and it would seem that the ostrich is suitably named the daughter of the desert. It is also quite natural that this giant bird should be mentioned in the Bible at a time when it was by no means rare. The present use of the word is to designate the ostrich (Struthio camelus L.), but in some passages (Mic. 1:8, etc.) it may have been used for owls. Fig. OST 16.

4. Passerine birds. צפור is a general word for "birds," perhaps mainly for the passerine birds. In other Semitic languages it was the name for what today are birds (צפורים or עוף). If דרור (Ps. 84:3—H 84:4; Prov. 26:2; "swallow") was used in the same sense for small birds, or applied to any species in the Bible, we are unable to decide. In medieval Hebrew דרור meant "swallow"; today it is "sparrow."

סוס, סיס (Isa. 38:14; Jer. 8:7; "swallow"), is used today for "swifts" (Apus), and quite possibly this was already the biblical meaning. עורב (Gen. 8:7; I Kings 17:4, 6; etc.) is the general name for ravens (Corvidae), and we have no reason to doubt its authenticity.

5. Herons and related birds. אנפה (Lev. 11:19; Deut. 14:18) was probably the general name for the heron family (Ardeidae), as it is today. חסידה (Lev. 11:19; Deut. 14:18; Jer. 8:7; etc.; "stork") has for very long been used for "stork" (Ciconia alba.), a very common passing migrant in spring, so that it may quite well be a continuous tradition, provided that the stork bred in Bible times in Palestine. קאת ("pelican"* in Lev. 11:18; Deut. 14:17; "hawk" in Isa. 34:11; "vulture" in Ps. 102:6—H 102:7; Zeph. 2:14), the "vomiter," is a night bird. שלך (Lev. 11:17; Deut. 14:17) is undeterminable, but usually translated as "cormorant." עגור (Isa. 38:14; Jer. 8:7) is usually and probably correctly translated as "crane" (Grus grus L.), in which sense it is also used today. But it has also been translated as "swallow." Its migration is not so conspicuous as that of the swallow, and the crane has a croaking cry while on migration. These facts would make "swallow" more probable, if we had any other positive hint for this solution. The last of the water birds is שחף (Lev. 11:16; Deut. 14:15; "sea gull"), absolutely undeterminable, today being used for "gull" (Larus) from an onomatopoetic interpretation of the name. Fig. PEL 24.

6. Doves and gallinaceous birds. a. Dove. The two names for doves are: יונה for the "rock pigeon" (Columbia livia L.), both wild and domestic, and תור (Gen. 15:9; Lev. 1:14; 5:7; etc.; "turtledove"), which comprises all species of turtledoves (Streptopelia).

b. Goose. The ברבורים אבוסים (I Kings 4:23; "fatted fowl") of King Solomon's table are, without doubt, fatted geese. Peasants carrying geese in their arms to the market are seen on ivory carvings from Megiddo from the tenth century B.C. The term is traditionally translated as "swan," but no swan is common in Palestine and none is regarded as food. As we have now a Hebrew name (of Eastern origin) for "goose," אוז, we continue to use ברבור for "swan."

c. Domestic fowl. We now come to the difficulties concerning the domestic fowl (Gallus gallus L.). The Sumerian name tarnegol is not found in the Bible. The NT used the Greek ἀλέκτωρ (Cock). But two Hebrew seals from Palestine with the rooster depicted on them make the presence of the species a certainty in the first millennium B.C.

d. Partridge. קורא (I Sam. 26:20; Jer. 17:11) is usually understood to be the Greek "partridge" (Alectoris graeca L.) or, probably incorrectly, Ammoperdix heyi. Yet Tur-Sinai remarks that these places do not refer to any bird but to a verb form "calling." The connection with דגר in Jer. 17:11 ("gathers a brood") means nothing, as this word occurs twice only and cannot be interpreted with any certainty as "breeding"—the present-day use of the verb. Tur-Sinai understands it as an onomatopoetic word for "cooing"—which actually suits very well. Thus, he thinks, these places may equally well refer to the domestic fowl, without giving it a specific name. Many modern interpreters who insist that the word דגר means "breedings" add that the female of the rock partridge lays two batches of eggs, and while laying the second batch the hen leaves the rooster sitting on the first batch. Both arguments stand on rather weak legs, but Tur-Sinai gives the more convincing reasoning. He also interprets with the LXX זרזיר מתנים (Prov. 30:31; "strutting cock"), usually translated and used for "greyhound," as "lewd cock."

e. Quail. This is a bird whose identity is little doubted. שלו (Exod. 16:13; Num. 11:31-32; Ps. 105:40; "quail") was tentatively assumed to be a sand grouse (Pterocles) by Hasselquist and others before the bird migrations were known. Today there is unanimity that it refers to the quail (Coturnix coturnix L.).* Also the reference to an occasional disease caused by the eating of quails has found medico-historical support. Fig. FAU 7.

With the kind permission of Mossad Bialik

7. Quail

f. Varia. It has been mentioned above that if the word תוכיים (I Kings 10:22; II Chr. 9:21; "peacocks") refers to an animal, it is a species of monkey, but neither peacock nor parrot. Tur-Sinai thinks it means a precious stone.

קפוד ("hedgehog" in Isa. 14:23; Zeph. 2:14; "porcupine" in Isa. 34:11) has often been thought to indicate a bittern (Botaurus stellaris L.). This translation has no support whatsoever.

רננים (Job 39:13; "ostrich") is in an adjectival relationship to "wing" and is no bird.

C. REPTILIA AND AMPHIBIA. There is very little that can be done about the final identification of most of the reptiles.

The Leviathan, לויתן (Job 3:8; Pss. 74:14; 104:26; Isa. 27:1), is the primordial dragon; it is known by this name (ltn) in Canaanite mythology. While being today used for "whale," there is no such indication in the Bible.

תנין, tannîn ("sea monster" in Gen. 1:21; Ps. 148:7; "dragon" in Isa. 27:1; 51:9; etc.; see Dragon), is both a mythological creature appearing as tnn ("dragon") in Canaanite texts and every big animal of the waters, sea as well as rivers. As the latter the crocodile (Crocodilus niloticus L.) is included. The word is today applied to the crocodile only.

לטאה (Lev. 11:30; "lizard") is certainly a general name for lizards, including agamas, skinks, etc. It occurs but once, mentioned together with אנקה ("gecko"), כח ("land crocodile"), חמט ("sand lizard"), and תנשמת ("chameleon"). All these are absolutely unidentifiable. They probably all belong to the lizards. תנשמת (Lev. 11:18; Deut. 14:16; "water hen") again appears as a name of a bird. Today the words in usage are: לטאה as "lizard" (Lacerta), חמט as "skink" (Scincidae), כח for the giant lizards Varanus griseus Daud. and Varanus niloticus Geoffr.

שממית (Prov. 30:28; "lizard"), which lives in palaces it built for itself, is a spider. From the context it is clear that שממית builds its own palace and not that it lives in the palaces of the great. Today the name is used for the geckoes (Geckonidae). The צפרדע (Exod. 8:2-13—H 7:27-8:9; Pss. 78:45; 105:30; "frog") of the second Egyptian plague has never been doubted to be a frog.

The usual identifications of the biblical snakes seem all to be wrong. נחש (Gen. 3:1 ff; Deut. 8:15; etc.) is obviously a general name for snakes, and as such it is still used today. פתן ("asp" in Deut. 32:33; Job 20:14, 16; Isa. 11:8; "adder" in Pss. 58:4—H 58:5; 91:13), always identified with the Egyptian asp Naja haje, which apparently does not occur in Palestine but is common in Egypt, is, according to Tur-Sinai, bašmu in Akkadian, bṯn in Ugaritic and Arabic, every big snake. Anyhow, its biblical identification is absolutely unknown. The same is true of שפיפון (Gen. 49:17; "viper"; KJV "adder"), which today is used for the Cerastes vipers (Cerastes cerastes L., Cerastes vipera L., Pseudocerastes fieldi Schm.) צפעני (Prov. 23:32; Isa. 11:8; 59:5; Jer. 8:17; "adder") may well be the common Palestine viper* (Vipera palaestinae

With the kind permission of Mossad Bialik

8. A Palestinian viper

Wern.), the cause of almost all accidents in the settled area of Palestine. It is used today in this sense, but its biblical identification is uncertain. The אפעה (Job 20:16; Isa. 30:6; 59:5; "viper") has always been identified with the Arabic 'af'ā, which is the Carpet Viper (Echis colorata Gunt.). It has probably referred to that common poisonous snake of the Jericho Plain, which was feared throughout the Middle Ages and became, under the name of Tyr, Tyre, the monopoly of the Sultan of Egypt as the most important and valuable ingredient of theriaca, that famous antidote for the bite of all poisonous snakes. It is used today in this sense, and the identification may also be the biblical one. This Echis may also be meant by שרף, śārāph, or "fiery serpent" (Num. 21:6, 8; Deut. 8:15) and the fiery flying serpent of Isa. 14:29; 30:6, because just the same legends were told in the Middle Ages about this serpent as in the Bible. From a zoological point of view they are, of course, entirely indeterminable. Fig. FAU 8.

עכשוב of Ps. 140:3—H 140:4 ("viper"), translated as ἀσπίς ("asp") in Rom. 3:13, is, according to Tur-Sinai, the same word as עכביש (Job 8:14; Isa. 59:5; "spider").

D. PISCES. דג is, of course, the general name for fishes. There is not one specific fish name in the Bible. We may mention only that the great fish which served as model for the legend of Jonah was apparently not a whale but a great shark. Great sharks are known to have swallowed men entirely without any external wounds. See also FISH.

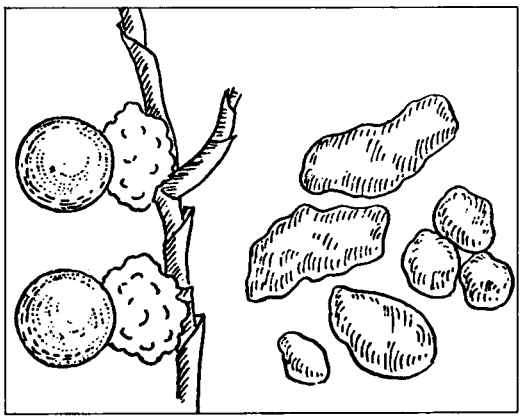
E. INSECTA. 1. Siphonaptera. There is no reasonable doubt that כנים (Exod. 8:16-18—H 8:12-14; Ps. 105:31; Isa. 51:6; "gnats") refers to lice in general and especially to Pediculus humanus L., the human body louse. There is little doubt that the third of the Egyptian plagues (Exod. 8:16-17; Ps. 105:31) referred to the latter, as lice were held a great abomination in Egypt.

2. Orthoptera. Of all the many names for locusts and eventually grasshoppers and other Orthoptera, only the name ארבה (Exod. 10:4-19, etc.; "locust") is certain, belonging to the Desert Locust (Schistocerca gregaria Forsk.), on which a number of excellent ecological observations are given (Nahum on heliothermy, Exodus on wind directions and locust flights, etc.). It seems most probable that גזם ("cutting locust"), ילק ("hopping locust"), חסיל ("destroying locust"), of Joel 1:4 were only various stages of the Desert Locust. סלעם ("bald locust"), חרגל ("cricket"), and חגב ("grasshopper"), mentioned as clean food in Lev. 11:22, may be also references to various stages of the locust,* but may equally refer to other groups of the order. Today the following names are used: חגב for short-horned (Acrididae),* חרגל for long-horned grasshoppers (Tettigoniidae)—this, of course, without any prejudice to the biblical identity of these names. Locusts were served as food to John the Baptist in Matt. 3:4; this is not now regarded as exceptional. Figs. LOC 33; GRA 38.



3. Rhynchota. תולעת שני (Exod. 25:4; 26:1; etc.; "scarlet stuff") and כרמיל (II Chr. 2:7, 14; 3:14; "crimson fabrics") refer to the crimson scales,* Kermes nahalali Bdhmr., Kermes biblicus Bdhmr., Kermes greeni Bdhmr., which are abundant in N Palestine on various oaks. The females mature in March-April, when they reach pea-size. They are either globular or have a deep median furrow. They are of various shades of brown, but after death they all are black-brown. The eggs are taken from the broken body of the mother and carefully rubbed into balls, from which the crimson dye is extracted. Fig. FAU 9.

The "manna" (מן) of Exod. 16:31 ff; Num. 11:6, 9; etc.,* is the sweet excretion of two scale insects living on the twigs of the manna-tamarisk (Tamariscus mannifer); this phenomenon is still occurring every early summer in the wadis of the Sinai mountains.

With the kind permission of Mossad Bialik

9. Crimson scale

With the kind permission of Mossad Bialik

10. Manna

The names of the scale insects are: Trabutina mannipara Ehr. and Najacoccus serpentinus minor Green. For a full discussion of the manna problem, see bibliography. Fig. FAU 10.

4. Hymenoptera. a. Ant. The word נמלה (Prov. 6:6; 30:25) refers to ants in general, but especially to the Harvester Ant (Messor semirufus And.), which harvests grain within its nests. Fig. ANT 28. See also ANT.

b. Wasp. צרעה (Exod. 23:28; Deut. 7:20; Josh. 24:12; "hornet"), used today for wasps (Vespidae) in general, is in the Bible doubtless the hornet (Vespa orientalis F.), which was in Egypt regarded as one of the symbols of military might. In the same sense it is used in the books of the Bible.

c. Bee. The honeybee (דבורה; Deut. 1:44; Judg. 14:8; Ps. 118:12; Isa. 7:18), Apis mellifica syriaca B.R., is not a crossing of the Italian and the Egyptian bee, but a dark southern form of Apis mellifica L., while the Egyptian bee belongs to the African species (Apis unicolor Latr.). There is no reference in the Bible to beekeeping. All references indicate the hunting of wild honey (see bibliography). The rapid re-creating and strengthening quality of honey is well described in I Sam. 14:27. Beekeeping was common in Palestine at the time of the Mishna, when also bee laws were well established. The hives were horizontal tubes made from mud and straw (see Ohaloth).

5. Lepidoptera. עש (Job 4:19; Isa. 50:9; 51:8; etc.; "moth") is the cloth moth (Tineola pellionella L.). In Job 27:18 we find an allusion to the cylindrical tubes which the larva webs as its house. In Isa. 51:8 סס ("worm") is the larva of the moth. The general reference is more to the larva, the massive destroyer of woolen clothing, than to the adult moth.

6. Aphaniptera. The flea (פרעש; Pulex irritans L.) is only twice mentioned in the Bible—i.e., by David to Saul (I Sam. 24:14—H 24:15; cf. 26:20) as a simile for the most insignificant creature. In latter times the king of the fleas was said to court at Tiberias.

7. Diptera. a. Fly. זבוב (Eccl. 10:1; Isa. 7:18) is a general word for flies, of which many species live in Palestine in the vicinity of human habitats. The common housefly is Musca vicina Macq. BAAL-ZEBUB (בעל זבוב) may mean "Lord of Flies" (II Kings 1:2 ff).

רמה ("worms" in Exod. 16:24; Job 7:5; 17:14; 21:26; etc.; "maggot" in Job 25:6; Isa. 14:11) are the maggots of flies from corpses.

b. Gnat. ערב (Exod. 8:21-31—H 8:17-27; Pss. 78:45; 105:31; "fly"), in one of the Egyptian plagues, is usually translated as "mosquito" or "gnat." The name cannot be identified. It may be identical with the Harvester Gnat, the barghaš of the Arabs, Trichotanypus tiberiae Kieff. and related species. It is a small midge (Chironomidae) which enters the eyes, ears, nose, etc., of the field workers in the early morning during the harvest season.

c. Insect larvae. תולעה (Exod. 16:20; Isa. 14:11; 41:14; "worm") is used like the Arabic dûd, mainly referring to insect larvae.

F. INVERTEBRATA OTHER THAN INSECTA.

1. Mollusca. שבלול (Ps. 58:8—H 58:9; "snail"), which occurs only once in the Bible, is used today for "snail"; but the word has no relation to any animal, according to Tur-Sinai. The interpretation as "snail" appeared in the Middle Ages only, when Ibn Esra identified it also with a medusa.

The precious dyes of purple, ארגמן (Exod. 25:4–39:29; Num. 4:13; Jer. 10:9; etc.; "purple") and תכלת (Exod. 25:4–39:31; Num. 4:6; Jer. 10:9; etc.; "blue" or "violet"), products of Phoenicia which are mentioned at 2000 B.C. already as brought to Aram-naharaim, were prepared on the Phoenician coasts from Ugarit to Dor, with Tyre as the famous center. They were produced from three mollusks: Murex brandaris L., Murex trunculus L., and Purpura haemastoma L. Only recently could Pfister by chemical methods identify the true purple color as black-violet. We assume that תכלת is a secondary extract which was considerably lighter in color. Others assume, without any factual foundation, that תכלת was the dye from another marine snail (Janthina) or of a cuttlefish (Sepia). In recent times the number of those who assume both names to be two colors prepared from the same animals is on the increase, especially as it is claimed that תכלת is not the same word as that used now for "sky-blue." The first conclusion seems acceptable, while no valid basis for the second thesis can be given. תכלת is obviously a very light violet dye as contrasted to the black-violet dye of ארגמן.

2. Vermes. There is no dissension on עלוקה (Prov. 30:15) as "leech" (Hirudinea), of which Limnatis nilotica Sav. is the common local giant species.

3. Arachnoidea. a. Scorpion. There is also no disagreement about "scorpions," which are understood to come under the name עקרבים (Deut. 8:15; I Kings 12:11, 14; II Chr. 10:11, 14; Ezek. 2:6), Scorpiones, of which about a dozen species occur in Palestine. There is the geographical name "Ascent of AKRABBIM"—i.e., "Ascent of Scorpions"—in Num. 34:4; Josh. 15:3; Judg. 1:36. Fig. SCO 32.

b. Spider. There is no doubt that עכביש (Job 8:14; Isa. 59:5) is a general name for "spider." We must add to this name עכשוב (Ps. 140:3—H 140:4; "vipers"), which, according to Tur-Sinai, is the same word as עכביש. In this place it may refer either to an actually poisonous spider or to a general popular belief that all or many spiders are poisonous.* According to the reading of the text by some scholars to the effect that the שממית (Prov. 30:28; "lizard"), today a name for "gecko," lives in palaces like those of kings, which it has itself built, also belongs to the spiders (see § C above). The reasons why some authors refer to the אנקה (Lev. 11:30; "gecko") also as a spider are not convincing. Fig. SPI 75.

4. Anthozoa. The present name for corals is אלמוג, which is mentioned in I Kings 10:11-12; II Chr. 2: 8; 9:10-11 ("almug/algum wood"). It is, however, now generally agreed that this name refers to a very precious wood which was imported by King Solomon through Tyre. ראמות ("coral" in Job 28:18; Ezek. 27: 16; "high" in Prov. 24:7) has nothing to do with corals.

5. Addendum. גביש (Job 28:18; "crystal"; KJV "pearls") is often translated "pearls." According to the competent information of Tur-Sinai, it is a precious stone, a crystal, but has nothing to do with pearls. Μαργαρίτης (Matt. 7:6; Rev. 18:12; etc.) doubtless refers to pearls.

Bibliography. S. Bochartius, Hierozoicon (1662). F. Hasselquist, Iter Palaestinum (1757). H. B. Tristram, "The Survey of Western Palestine," Fauna and Flora of Palestine (1884); The Natural History of the Bible (1898). E. W. G. Masterman, Studies in Galilee (1909), ch. 2: "The Inland Fisheries of Galilee." E. Schmitz, Eine Baerenjagd in Palastina (1912), pp. 174-76. P. K. Hitti, An Arab Syrian Gentleman and Warrior (Usamah ibn Munqidh; 1929). F. S. Bodenheimer, Animal Life in Palestine (1935). D. M. A. Bate, "Palaeontology: The Fossil Fauna of the Wadi el-Mughara Caves," in D. A. E. Garrod and D. M. A. Bate, The Stone Age Man of Mount Carmel, vol. I (1937); "Animal Remains," in P. L. O. Guy, Megiddo Tombs (1938), pp. 209 ff. W. F. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity (1940), p. 196. J. P. Free, "Abraham's Camels," JNES (1944), pp. 187-93. F. Harper, Extinct and Vanishing Mammals of the Old World (1945). R. Pfister and L. Bellinger, The Excavations of Dura-Europos: Final Report, 4, pt. 2: "The Textiles" (1945). J. R. Ellermann and T. C. S. Morrison-Scott, Checklist of Palaearctic and Indian Mammals (1951). F. S. Bodenheimer, Insects as Human Food (1953). H. Tur-Sinai, Lashon ve-Sepher (1955). F. S. Bodenheimer, Ha-Hai be-Artsot ha-Mikrah, vols. I-II (1951; 1956); Animal and Man in Bible Lands (1960).

On manna, see: F. S. Bodenheimer, Ergebnisse der Sinai Expedition 1927 (1929), pp. 45-88; "The Manna of Sinai," BA, X (1947), 2-6.

The opinion that references to honey in the Bible indicate the hunting of wild honey is explained in F. S. Bodenheimer, "The Honeybee in Ancient Palestine," The Bee World, 15 (1934), 123, where also is discussed the opposite opinion of A. Armbruster, Die Bienenzucht im Alten Orient, Archiv für Bienenkunde, XIII (1932; rev. ed., 1952), 1-43.

F. S. BODENHEIMER

FAWN [עפר; cf. Arab. ghufr, young chamois, young antelope; see below]. A young animal, usually a young deer.

עפר occurs only in Song of S. 2:9, 17; 4:5; 7:3—H 7:4; 8:14, in all cases being used figuratively. The RSV employs "fawn" only in 4:5; 7:3—H 7:4 (cf. KJV "young roe"); elsewhere it treats the word as "young one" and translates the phrase "young one of the stags" as "young stag" (cf. KJV "young hart").

In Gen. 49:21 the RSV attempts to clear up a puzzling text ("words of beauty," hence KJV "goodly words") by emending the MT "words of" to "fawns of" ('imrê to 'immᵉrê, lit., "lambs of"), thus obtaining "comely fawns." W. S. MCCULLOUGH

FEAR. The concept of fear in the Bible is related to a wide range of emotions, extending from simple apprehensiveness to utter terror or dread, caused by the suspicion of an impending peril, known or unknown. It appears in theological as well as secular contexts, the former illustrated in such expressions as "the fear of Yahweh" or "the fear of God." In such cases the reference is to an emotional experience of a complex nature which is connected with the perception or the awareness of the holy (see HOLINESS), and which produces the concomitant reactions of repulsion, attraction, fascination, awe, reverence, love, trust, faith, worship, and adoration. The commingling of these impulses or feelings—some of which are mutually exclusive—appears not only in the Bible but also in the nonbiblical literatures of the ancient Near East (see bibliography).

1. Terminology of fear in the Bible
   a. Fear in biblical Hebrew
   b. Fear in LXX Greek
   c. Fear in NT Greek
2. Fear in the OT
   a. Worldly fear
   b. Fear and sin
   c. Fear and revelation
   d. Fear and worship
   e. The fear of the Lord
3. Fear in the Apoc. and Pseudep.
4. Fear in the NT
   a. Worldly fear
   b. Fear and Christ
   c. Fear and joy
   d. Those who fear God
   e. Fear and sanctification

Bibliography

1. Terminology of fear in the Bible. The word "fear" and its synonyms (reverence, awe, dismay, dread, distress, trouble, terror, horror, etc.) occur several hundred times in the English versions of the OT and more than a hundred times in those of the NT. They are used to render into English more than a score of Hebrew words and their derivatives, and at least three Greek words and their derivatives.

a. Fear in biblical Hebrew. The most common Hebrew term for "fear" is the noun יראה (Jonah 1:10; Prov. 1:7) and its cognate מורא (Ps. 19:9—H 19:10), both derived from the verb ירא (Ps. 130:4). The noun פחד is translated "dread" (Job 13:11) and usually indicates an intense emotion. The chief synonyms, with various degrees of strength, are אימה, "dread" (Gen. 15:12); בעתה, "terror" (Jer. 8:15); מגור, also rendered "terror" (Jer. 6:25); while חת, חתה, חתת, חתית, and מחתה indicate a shattering dismay (as in Gen. 35:5). The respective strength of each of these words depends to no small extent upon the context in which it appears. Many other Hebrew or Aramaic words designate the emotion of fear by implication. Using a typically Semitic mode of expression, biblical writers are prone to suggest an inward disturbance by depicting its outward manifestations. Fear, distress, and dismay are thus suggested by many different words which mean trembling, quaking, shaking, quivering, shuddering, staggering, reeling, hair-bristling, palpitating, writhing, twirling, whirling, etc.

b. Fear in LXX Greek. The LXX translators usually rendered the common Hebrew word יראה by the Greek εὐσέβεια, "reverence," "respect," "piety" (Isa. 11:2), although they sometimes used φόβος, which is the most common Grek word for "fear" (Prov. 1:7*a*). They also employed the same word to translate פחד (Job 13:11) and אימה (Gen. 15:12). Occasionally they selected δειλία, "fearfulness," "timidity," "cowardice," for the same Hebrew word אימה (Ps. 54:4—H 55:5).

c. Fear in NT Greek. In the NT the verb φοβοῦμαι, "to be afraid," "to be struck with fear," "to be seized with alarm," occurs several times (Matt. 10:31; etc.). Likewise, the noun φόβος means ordinarily "fear" or "awe" (Mark 4:41) and occasionally "reverence" or "respect" (Rom. 13:7). The terms δέος, "awe" (Heb. 12:28), and δειλία, "timidity" (II Tim. 1:7), appear only once in the NT, and so does the verb δειλιάω (John 14:27). The word εὐσέβεια, "reverence," "respect," "piety," "godliness," appears in some passages (Acts 3:12; I Tim. 2:2; 4:7, 8; 6:5 ff; II Tim. 3:5; II Pet. 1:3, 6 ff), and so does its cognate verb εὐσεβέω, "to act reverently" (I Tim. 5:4), or "to worship" (Acts 17:23). The word εὐλάβεια means "reverence" (Heb. 12:28) or "godly fear" (Heb. 5:7). Both εὐλαβής (Luke 2:25; Acts 2:5; 8:2; 22:12) and εὐσεβής (Acts 10:2, 7; II Pet. 2:9) are used to designate "the pious" (חסיד, צדיק, and possibly נדיב).

It will be noted that the idea of anxiety in the Bible seems to be rather sharply distinguished from that of fear. Both Hebrew words דאג, "to be anxious" (Ps. 38:18—H 38:19), and רגז, "to be disturbed" (II Sam. 7:10), are sometimes rendered by the LXX as μεριμνάω, "to be troubled with cares," and the same verb is used by the NT writers in a similar sense (Matt. 6:27, 31; 10:19; cf. Luke 12:22, 25; I Cor. 7:32 ff; Phil. 4:6; cf. I Cor. 12:25; Phil. 2:20).

2. Fear in the OT. In its secular sense, the emotion of fear seizes animals when they react in the presence of the superior power of men (Gen. 9:2), although some are described as fearless (Job 39:16; 41:33). Even the world of nature experiences fear (Ps. 76:8). Men generally fear catastrophes of a cosmic character (Ps. 46:2).

a. Worldly fear. Man is afraid whenever a threat arises against his security and especially his life. Cain, because he is a vagabond upon the face of the earth, knows that anyone who finds him may slay him (Gen. 4:14). Jacob fears the avenging of Esau, his brother (Gen. 32:7), and later is afraid of emigrating to an unknown country (Gen. 46:3). The Hebrews are dismayed by the strength of the Canaanites (Num. 14:9; etc.). A shepherd is afraid at the roaring of the lion (Amos 3:8). The witch of Endor shrieks when she sees the ghost of Samuel (I Sam. 28:12), and Eliphaz of Teman experiences fear at the vision of a nocturnal spirit (Job 4:14). Job is tortured by physical and mental pains which defy explanation and fears the proximity of premature death (Job 3:25; 21:6; 22:10; etc.). There are hundreds of examples of secular fear in the OT.

b. Fear and sin. Man fears God, but such an emotion is ambiguous, for it may both repel and attract. In the first sense the fear of God may result from a sense of sin and therefore correspond more or less to the expectation of a destructive or chastising retribution. Thus man is afraid in the garden after his act of disobedience (Gen. 3:10). Sarah is afraid because she laughed at the word of Yahweh, and her fear prompts her to deny her manifestations of skepticism (Gen. 18:15). Abimelech and his servants are sore afraid when they become aware of the offensive character of their behavior (Gen. 20:8 ff). Moses is afraid of God's anger and hot displeasure caused by the people's worship of the golden calf (Deut. 9:19). The psalmists are aware of the terror which seizes sinners at the expectation of punishment (Pss. 76:8 ff; 78:33; etc.). At least in one instance man's fear of death coalesces with the sense of his iniquity (Ps. 90:7-11; see DEATH; SIN).

Occasionally suffering men are terrified because they find in God the author of their misery; and yet they are unwilling or unable to explain the hostility of the Deity against them as a result of their sinfulness, of which they are unaware (Job 23:15; Pss. 22:1 ff; 88:1 ff).

Consonant with an interpretation of the sinful condition of man, Hebrew eschatology develops a fearful expectation of the day of Yahweh (see DAY OF THE LORD) when men will be paralyzed by terror before judgment (Deut. 32:25; Ps. 48:5 ff; Isa. 2:6-22; 13:6-8; 31:7; Ezek. 27:35 ff; Joel 2:1; Amos 5:18; Hab. 3:2; Zech. 9:5; Mal. 3:2-3; etc.).

c. Fear and revelation. More often, the OT refers to fear in the context of divine revelation. One of the typical features of the theophanies is the formula which is again and again addressed to man by Yahweh or his representative throughout the OT: "Fear not!" (Gen. 15:1; Exod. 14:13; Judg. 6:23; Isa. 41:10; etc.). All the traditions of the self-disclosure of God to men suggest in one way or in another the element of mysterium tremendum. There is a mystery in divine holiness which produces in man a sense of terror (see the expression "the Fear of Isaac" in Gen. 31:42; cf. vs. 53).

But this kind of dread is not merely negative. It accompanies the perception of God's glory and may generate an emotion of exultation and joy at the discovery of God's intense concern and love for man (Ps. 18; Hab. 3; cf. vss. 16 and 18). This kind of fear is the result not only of the knowledge that Yahweh is a holy God, but also of the apprehension of his saving grace. The concept of the "numinous" is to be seriously qualified whenever it is applied to Hebrew modes of theological thinking, for the God of Israel, from the time of Moses, at least, is not an impersonal "numen" but a personal Being who intervenes in the affairs of men and whose self-disclosure is ultimately a gracious uncovering of active will, saving intent, and creative purpose.

For instance, Jacob is seized by terror and exclaims at the vision of the heavenly ladder, "How awesome is this place!" But he adds in the same breath, with a sense of certainty and expectation, "This is none other than the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven!" (Gen. 28:17.) His experience of dread is inseparable from the reaffirmed sense of his destiny and the acceptance of a "tremendous" promise of land and posterity, whose goal is the establishment of peace and harmony for the whole of mankind (Gen. 28:13-14).

Likewise Moses at the burning bush is afraid to look upon God (Exod. 3:6), but this negative fear is compounded with a positive emotion at the disclosure of the name of Yahweh and of the divine purpose in history (cf. the fear of the divine name in Pss. 99:3; 111:9; etc.). To be sure, in at least one theophanic story, the people's reactions to the manifestation of divine presence are those of blind terror and trembling (Exod. 19:16; 20:18 [LXX], 20*b;* Deut. 5:4-5), but the whole tradition is embedded in the theological concept of Israel's inability or unwillingness to fulfil her mission, and this kind of fear is therefore related to the motif of sin and revolt as described above (see § 2*b; see also* THEOPHANY; PRESENCE).

By extension, men who have come into direct and immediate relation with God may produce an emotion of fear in the common people. "When Aaron and all the people of Israel saw Moses, behold, the skin of his face shone, and they were afraid to come near him" (Exod. 34:30; cf. Josh. 4:14; I Sam. 12:18; 18:12). The stories of the ark (I Sam. 5–6; II Sam. 6) and the temple ritual of holiness (Leviticus) derive from a similar complex of fear at the physical contact with the divine (cf. Ps. 5:7; etc.; see HOLINESS).

d. Fear and worship. The attraction-producing fear which arises from theophanic encounters is carried over into the cultic context of worship, and it is also transferred to the psychological experience of the immediate presence of God. The OT repeatedly associates the emotion of fear with the complex of faith, trust, love, and communion; and it is perhaps at this juncture that the biblical mode of thinking is most startling to the modern Western mind. For the ancient Hebrew, a member of the holy people, covenanted with a holy God for a unique purpose in history, there is no paradox in the liturgical command, "Serve Yahweh with fear, and rejoice with trembling!" (Ps. 2:11.)

Israel worships the covenant God, and the sacramental memory of the Exodus becomes for her the ground of hope against all odds that God will triumph over evil and will fulfil his purpose in creation. Thus the Yahweh of the Exodus is adored through the centuries of biblical history, "majestic in holiness, terrible in glorious deeds" (Exod. 15:11). The eschatological hope transcends the fear of enemies here and now or the terror of judgment at the moment of the advent of God. At the same time trust in the saving power of the Deity does not do away with fear of him. On the contrary, the acceptance of salvation produces a kind of awe which is only compatible with the humility, the brokenness, the utter contrition of the saved. This fear is not the result of God's destroying wrath or condemning judgment. It arises from the perception of his very love, unmerited, gratuitous, unearned. At the promise of God's decision not to execute the fierceness of his anger—for he is God and not man, the Holy One in the midst of Israel—the people "shall go after the LORD, he will roar like a lion; yea, he will roar, and his sons shall come trembling from the west; they shall come eagerly like birds from Egypt, and like doves from the land of Assyria" (Hos. 11:9-11*a*). And as if to prevent any misunderstanding of the true intention of God, and to dispel any ambiguity in the emphasis on "trembling," the oracle concludes with the promise, "I will return them to their homes, says the LORD" (Hos. 11:11*b; see* JEALOUSY; LOVE).

It is because there is a kind of fear which is not incompatible with faith that the psalmist is able to exclaim, "But there is forgiveness with thee, that thou mayest be feared" (Ps. 130:4). Faith in Yahweh delivers from worldly fears (Ps. 23:4) because faith involves a true fear of a totally different quality which is based on the recognition of God's holiness. "Do not fear what they fear [the fear of men], nor be in dread. But the LORD of hosts, him you shall regard as holy; let him be your fear, and let him be your dread" (Isa. 8:12*b*-13; cf. Deut. 1:17; see WORSHIP IN THE OT).

e. The fear of the Lord. Hence, the expression "the fear of the LORD" (yir'ath Yahweh) becomes the familiar way of describing the religion of biblical Judaism in the postexilic period (see Proverbs and Ecclesiastes). It would be a grave error, however, to soften the meaning of the expression and to ignore its central element of mysterium tremendum. Although many commentators and historians have fallen into this error during the past hundred years, the fear of the Lord is not merely to be equated with reverence, piety, or religion because it is impossible today to revaluate and again charge these terms with their ancient—but now largely lost—connotation of awesomeness. It is true that biblical religion is summed up in the law to love God absolutely and exclusively (Deut. 6:4-5), but this love, precisely because it is absolute and exclusive, imposes upon man a demand which is never devoid of fearful dimensions. Thus the love of God in the Shema' (Deut. 6:4-5) is never separated from the fear of God (cf. Deut. 6:2, 13; 10:20; 28:58 with 11:1, 13, 22; 19:9; 30:6, 16; etc.; see also Jer. 32:39 ff), because absolute love means total surrender.

It is in the exacting and inclusive sense of an absolute love that the fear of the Lord becomes the principle of human behavior and the beginning of wisdom (Job 28:28; Ps. 111:10; Prov. 1:7; see WISDOM). The true love of man for God creates a sense of anguish at the very thought of moral evil, revolt, rebellion, or compromise (Ps. 51:6-15). At the end of all other attributes, the messianic figure will receive the spirit of the fear of the Lord (Isa. 11:2).

3. Fear in the Apoc. and Pseudep. The literature of the Apoc. and Pseudep. appears to be little concerned explicitly with the idea of fear, either in its secular or in its theological sense. Nevertheless, the author of IV Esdras experiences "dismay" over Israel's trials, and he thinks that before the "inconceivable glory" of the Lord, the hosts of heaven "stand trembling" (8:21). The influence of the Greek mind is revealed when "fear" is described as "nothing but surrender of the helps that come from reason"—προδοσία τῶν ἀπὸ λογισμοῦ βοηθημάτων (Wisd. Sol. 17:12—G 17:11). Even the expression "the fear of God" or "the fear of the Lord" receives scant attention (Ecclus. 1:11-20; 2:7-11; 21:11; II Esd. 8:28). In one passage the fear of sin is made the prerequisite of wisdom (Pirke Aboth 3:12; cf. 2:6). In other places "to fear the Lord" becomes the practical equivalent of "to love God" (Ecclus. 2:15-17; cf. 40: 25-27; Aristeas 159, 189; Test. Benj. 3:3, 4*b*).

Yet some rabbis established a distinction between the love and fear of God. Simeon ben Eleazar said, "Greater is he who acts from love than he who acts from fear" (Soṭ. 31*a;* cf. Sifre Deut. 6:5). Others debated the question whether fear or love of God was the motivation of Job's piety (M. Soṭ. 5:5).

4. Fear in the NT. While the concept of fear in the NT does not occupy a central place, the use of the word and its synonyms offers a remarkable parallel to that in the OT.

a. Worldly fear. The emotion of fear in a nontheological context is frequently referred to. For example, Joseph is afraid to return to Judea when he hears that Archelaus reigns there in the place of Herod (Matt. 2:22). The authorities, on several occasions, are afraid of the people (Matt. 14:5; 21:26, 46; Mark 11:18; Acts 5:26).

It is a similar kind of worldly fear, timidity, cowardice, the dread of dangers, demons, enemies, death, which is in the mind of the NT writers when they extol the fruits of the new life and maintain that God in Christ delivers from secular fear. Thus the spirit of slavery would allow the brethren to fall back into fear, but the spirit of sonship makes them cry, "Abba! Father!" (Rom. 8:15). Love of man for God which is the reflection of God's love for man dispels all fears of disease, oppression, persecution, and death. In this sense, there is no fear in love (I John 4:17-18). Christians experience no longer the spirit of timidity or cowardice (δειλία) but a spirit of power and love and self-control (II Tim. 1:7; see LOVE).

b. Fear and Christ. Another brand of fear is created among men by the witness of the deed of God in Christ. The coming of Jesus is described in terms which are reminiscent of the self-disclosure of God in the OT. The theophanic formula "Fear not!" is used in the narratives of the birth of John the Baptist and Jesus (Luke 1:13, 30; 2:10), and the Synoptic and more particularly the Lukan traditions place it not infrequently in the mouth of Jesus (Luke 5:10; 8:50; 12:7, 32). The Fourth Gospel quotes the same formula in a christological epiphany (John 12:15). The episode of the Transfiguration (Matt. 17:6-7; Luke 9:34) and the stories of the Cross and of the Resurrection (Matt. 27:54; 28:4) are told in terms which likewise echo the manifestations of God at the time of the Exodus. Fear is still a self-centered emotion, which reveals sinful man's unwillingness to accept the implications of his divine calling (Mark 10:32).

c. Fear and joy. An altogether different fear seizes the disciples when they confront holiness in the person of Jesus. The worldly fear of danger in a storm is soothed but a sacred awe takes its place as the disciples discern the power of their Lord (Mark 4:37-41; cf. Matt. 9:8; 14:26-27; Mark 5:15, 33). When Jesus heals or raises from the dead, the bystanders glorify God, and they are at the same time filled with awe (Luke 5:26), for they become conscious of the intervention of God himself in their own history. They claim jubilantly that "God has visited his people," but this very awareness thrust them into fear (Luke 7:16).

As in the OT, this feeling is not incompatible with elation, trust, and certainty. And thus the women at the empty tomb, aware of the victory of Christ over death, "departed quickly . . . with fear and great joy" (Matt. 28:8; cf. Mark 16:8). The growth of the church in Jerusalem yields a similar consequence (Acts 2:43). There is no contradiction, among the early Christians, between the experience of joy and the sense of theological fear.

d. Those who fear the Lord. Like the Hebrew expression "fear of Yahweh," which implies complete reliance on the promise of the covenant God, the NT expression "those who fear God" is employed to describe the faithful (Luke 1:50; cf. 18:2, 4). Quite clearly, however, men who are thus designated do not represent the average religionists of their time. They are inspired by an intense hope and a personal dedication to the will of God, whatever it may be and wherever it may lead them. The same expression designates also in the NT some pagans who had been converted to the Jewish faith (Acts 10:2, 22, 35; cf. 13:43 [σεβόμενος, "worshiper"]; 16:14; 17:4, 17; 18:7; see PROSELYTE).

e. Fear and sanctification. The new man in Christ is delivered from worldly fears, but he is constantly reminded that he has to fear evil in all its forms (Matt. 10:28; Rom. 11:20). The sanctification of the Christian individual as well as that of the church is the fruit of the fear of the Lord (II Cor. 5:10-11; 7:1; cf. Col. 3:22; Heb. 10:31; etc.; see SANCTIFICATION; HOLY SPIRIT). It is thus a grave error to maintain, with many moderns, that Christianity, as opposed to Hebraism, has replaced the fear of God by the love of God. The NT, as well as the OT, understands so profoundly the tragic dimensions of love and knows so acutely the awesomeness of the divine presence that it proposes to man no other prospect than the service of God "with fear and trembling" (Phil. 2:12).

The church is built up and multiplies, "walking in the fear of the Lord and in the comfort of the Holy Spirit" (Acts 9:31). To worship and to adore the Savior is to glorify and to fear the name of the Lord, creator of heaven and earth, who alone is holy (Rev. 14:6-7; 15:3-4).

Bibliography. B. J. Bamberger, "Fear and Love of God in the OT," HUCA, VI (1929), 39-53. J. Hänel, "Die Ehrfurcht vor Gott," Die Religion der Heiligkeit (1931), pp. 106-34. W. Eichrodt, "Die Gottesfurcht," Theologie des ATs, III (1935), 18-33. R. Sander, "Furcht und Liebe im palästinischen Judentum," BWANT, Vierte Folge, Heft 16 (1935). J. Hempel, "Die Furcht vor Jahve," Gott und Mensch im AT (1936), pp. 4-33. G. Nagel, "Crainte et amour de Dieu dans l'AT," Revue de Théologie et de Philosophie, XXXII (1944), 175-86. R. Otto, The Idea of the Holy (trans. J. W. Harvey; 10th ed., 1946). R. H. Pfeiffer, "The Fear of God," IEJ, V (1955), 41-48 (includes a valuable survey of the idea of religious fear in the nonbiblical literatures of the ancient Near East). S. TERRIEN

FEAR OF ISAAC [פחד יצחק]. An ancient divine name which stems out of the pre-Mosaic cult of the "God of the fathers" (Gen. 31:42, 53), as do also the names "God of Abraham" (perhaps "Shield of Abraham" [Gen. 15:1]) and "Mighty One of Jacob" (Gen. 49:24). In the case at hand, the deity was known within the circles of Isaac by the name of the patriarch who received the revelation and established the cult. Frequently פחד is translated "fear, dread" (LXX φόβος)—i.e., the deity is the One who aroused fear on the part of Isaac, even as Jacob was overcome by dread in a holy place (Gen. 28:17; see further FEAR; HOLINESS). On the other hand, the linguistic relation of פחד to Aramaic and Arabic paḥiḏ faḥiḏ ("thigh, loins, hip"; cf. Job 40:17), Ugaritic pḥḏ ("flock"), and later Palmyrenian paḥdâ ("family, clan, tribe") lends support to the view that originally it meant "kindred, kinsman." The archaic meaning, "Kinsman of Isaac," would accord well with the cult of the fathers, which was based upon the relationship between a family or clan and the god who revealed himself in a special way to the patriarchal leader.

As in the case of other pre-Mosaic divine names, this one was later appropriated by Israel as a title for Yahweh. Thus in the present revision of Pentateuchal traditions Yahweh is the "God of the fathers" who, in the time before Moses, manifested himself in various ways to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. See further GOD, NAMES OF.

Bibliography. A. Alt, Der Gott der Väter (1929); H. G. May, "The God of My Father: A Study of Patriarchal Religion," JBL (1941), pp. 155 ff; W. F. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity (2nd ed., 1957), pp. 248-49.

B. W. ANDERSON

FEASTS AND FASTS [חגים; צומות]. The seasonal occasions of national and religious celebration in Israel. The feasts were marked by thanksgiving, and often by joyous feasting; and, in direct contrast (cf. Zech. 8:19), the fasts were seasonal recollections of national disaster and times of communal penitence.

A. Feasting
B. Fasting
C. The festal observances
  1. Canonical
    a. The sabbath
    b. The New Moon
    c. The seventh New Moon
    d. The seventh year
    e. The pentecostal year
  2. Pilgrim
    a. Passover and Feast of Unleavened Bread
    b. Weeks
    c. Booths
  3. Noncanonical
    a. The Feast of Dedication
    b. Purim
    c. Simḥath Torah
D. The fasts
  1. Canonical
  2. Noncanonical
Bibliography

A. FEASTING. In a broad sense the term "feast" can be used with reference to all set times of communal observance in Israel. The RSV recognizes this by frequently translating מועדים ("times," "seasons") by the phrase "appointed feasts" (e.g., Lev. 23:2, 4, 44; Isa. 1:14; Ezek. 36:38; 44:24; 45:17; Hos. 2:11). Thus, in Lev. 23 this phrase even includes the Day of Atonement in a list of mandatory observances, though it is, properly speaking, a fast rather than a feast. In Ezek. 45:17 the Hebrew term for "appointed feasts" includes the new moons and the sabbaths (cf. Hos. 2:11), though in 44:24 the latter are mentioned separately; and in 36:38 the term probably refers only to the pilgrim feasts.

In contrast to the general reference of "appointed feasts," the word "feast," based on the Hebrew חג, is used almost exclusively of the three great annual pilgrim festivals: Unleavened Bread, Weeks, and Booths. The verb from which the noun issues means "to make pilgrimage." Pilgrimages included processions, dances, feasting, and, sometimes, drunkenness. In Ps. 107:27 the verb is translated "reeled," to describe the staggering gait of sailors aboard ship in a storm. It seems probable, however, that connotations such as reeling, dancing, and feasting are derivative from the basic idea of pilgrimage.

The term "feast" is used of the celebrations Israel made in honor of the idolatrous golden calf (Exod. 32:5-6, 17-19). While this was not strictly a pilgrim feast, the account gives a vivid picture of the expansive demonstrations of popular excitement characteristic of these feasts. It also serves as a reminder that all feasts were high religious occasions. A few general references to the great feasts of Israel (Isa. 29:1; 30:29; Amos 5:21; 8:10; Nah. 1:15—H 2:1) also hint at the exuberance characteristic of these occasions. While present in all, it was especially characteristic of Booths (see BOOTHS, FEAST OF). In connection with this feast the term חג occurs in a special sense in Ps. 118:27, which, as part of the Hallel, was sung at Booths. The psalmist calls on the celebrants to bind the חג to the horns of the altar with branches. In all probability the term here does not refer to the sacrifice, as was formerly supposed, but to the procession itself. As part of its circumambulation of the altar the procession attaches itself to its horns.

In Exod. 34:25 there occurs the single explicit reference to the Passover as a feast; it may also be implied in Exod. 23:18; Ps. 81:3—H 81:4; and, perhaps, in Ezek. 45:21. It is a striking fact, however, that the term should be used so sparingly of Passover though occurring with great frequency to describe the intimately related observance of Unleavened Bread (Exod. 12:14; 23:15; 34:18; Lev. 23:6; Deut. 16:16; II Chr. 8:13; 30:13, 21; 35:17; Ezra 6:22; Ezek. 45:23). Sometimes the word is associated more strictly with the special days of SOLEMN ASSEMBLY in this feast, whether the first (Num. 28:17) or the last (Exod. 13:6). Many historians of the Israelite cultus hold that originally Booths was the only pilgrim festival. In this connection they point out that at its observance, in connection with the dedication of Solomon's temple, it is referred to simply as "the feast" (חחג; I Kings 8:2, 65; cf. II Chr. 5:3; 7:9), as though it was the only one. The fact that the month of the feast is mentioned in two of these instances perhaps qualifies this singularity somewhat. However, it is also designated as "the feast of the Lord" (Lev. 23:39). In any case, the term is applied very frequently to Booths as one of the three great pilgrimages (Exod. 23:16; 34:22; Lev. 23:34; Deut. 16:13, 16; 31:10; II Chr. 8:13; Ezra 3:4; Zech. 14:16, 18-19). It also occurs in relation to the less prominent festival of Weeks (Exod. 23:16; 34:22; Deut. 16:10, 16; II Chr. 8:13).

At the center of the great pilgrim feasts were the festal sacrifices. These sacrifices were mainly communal meals, eaten with great joy. The eating of meat, a relatively rare occurrence in ancient Israel, and originally always having a religious significance, coupled with the drinking of wine, gave to a feast both its festal and its sacral character. In contrast to others, the festal sacrifice was known as a זבח, "slaughter." It was eaten at the sites of ancestral altars (Gen. 46:1) or at the designated centers of worship as a common meal "before God" (Exod. 18:12). God himself was assumed to participate symbolically by receiving the choice portions of fat which were burned on the altar. He also shared the wine through the libations that were offered at a later stage of the cultus. As has been emphasized in recent scholarship, the great feasts were occasions of "covenant renewal" at which the bonds that held Israel together as the people of God were reknit.

The whole range of festal observances, both the pilgrim feasts and the "appointed times" of a festal nature, will be surveyed in outline below. In the meantime a presentation of the general data on fasting and fasts is in order.

B. FASTING. As the word צום indicates, abstinence from food is the basic form of a fast. There are, however, many elaborations of this. There is also a wide range of occasions for fasts.

As in the case of the great feasts, communal fasts were held at the site of a central shrine. Following defeat in their war with Benjamin, the Israelites came to fast and weep "before the LORD" in Bethel, where the ark was (Judg. 20:26-27). Samuel is said to have summoned all Israel to a convocation of penitence and fasting at Mizpah, his own seat as priest-judge (I Sam. 7:5-6); much later, in the days of the Maccabees, Judas and his brothers, lacking access to Jerusalem, summoned their followers to Mizpah for a fast day because of its ancient reputation as a site of worship (I Macc. 3:42-54). Jeremiah sent Baruch to read his book to the people at the temple on a fast day, when people from the towns would have come to Jerusalem (Jer. 36:4-6). The great public fasts, not regularly scheduled but called for reasons of dire emergency, had their natural center in the temple at Jerusalem; and the king, the prophets, and the priests played leading roles (II Kings 19:1-7). A sample litany is given in Joel 2:17; some of the penitential psalms were very probably the outcome of the public liturgical ceremonies of the fast days.

The public summons to a fast seems to have been an accepted custom in time of crisis (Jer. 36:9; Joel 2:15). In I Kings 21:9 ff, we learn that, as a trap for Naboth, Queen Jezebel forged letters in Ahab's name calling the nobles and judges, asking them to proclaim a fast. Naboth was to be brought to trial on the false charge of having cursed God and the king (I Kings 21:5-16). The fast must in this case probably be understood as a means of counteracting the power of the curse. At the preaching of Jonah the repentant king of Nineveh "proclaimed a fast" for his city that involved the abstinence from both food and water by animals as well as men (Jonah 3:5, 7-8). Esther sent instructions to Mordecai to gather all the Jews in Susa to a fast in her behalf (Esth. 4:15-16) under circumstances that gave it the significance of a service of intercession.

A typical fast was for a single day (Judg. 20:26; I Sam. 7:6), with the abstinence lasting until sunset; the great official fast of the Day of Atonement conformed to this pattern. Abstinence from wine and water (I Sam. 7:6; Dan. 10:3; Jonah 3:5, 7-8), as well as from food, was practiced. Garments were rent or exchanged for sackcloth; people sat on the ground and threw dust and ashes on their heads. Whether sitting or in ceremonial procession, there was weeping. The hair was left undressed and the body unwashed (II Sam. 12:16; I Macc. 3:47). There are occasional criticisms of these external forms (Isa. 58:1-5; Joel 2:12-13); but this summons to "rend your hearts and not your garments" must not be interpreted as an attempt to abolish fasts, but to give them meaning as expressions of genuine penitence or sorrow. The prophet Zechariah (7:1-7) counseled those who made inquiry to lift the fasts of the fifth and seventh months (see below), commemorating the destruction of the temple and of the Judean state respectively. The issue was raised, in all probability, because these had in his day been restored. His counsel, which did not prevail, was not based only on the fact that the restoration had taken place, however; he was troubled by the fact that as a sacrifice, all fasting, like all feasting, though done before the Lord, has an inescapable ambiguity about it: it is both a form of self-dedication and of self-preservation.

Along with forms of abstinence, sacrifice in some form was a characteristic of all communal fasts. At Mizpah, Samuel "poured [water] out before the LORD" (I Sam. 7:6; cf. II Sam. 23:16-17); this was a primitive form of sacrifice which indicates that, while the codification of fasting practices occurred late in OT history, fasts had been observed all along. The ordinance for the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16) indicates that the sin offering was the most typical sacrifice offered on a fast day; but burnt offerings and peace offerings are also mentioned (Judg. 20:26).

Some fasts, both individual and public, were acts of repentance to avert threatening disaster. The response of Ahab to the word of Elijah (I Kings 21:27) and of Nineveh to the preaching of Jonah (Jonah 3:5-8) are of this type (cf. also Neh. 9:1; Esth. 4:16; Jer. 14:12). So was David's fast (I Sam. 12:16-20), the course of which amazed his courtiers. Other fasts, perhaps even more common, in view of the surprise caused by David's rejection of this type, were really acts of mourning, with confessions of guilt following the occurrence of disaster. The mourning over the fall of the city, illustrated by the book of Lamentations and many psalms, belongs to this group. Mourning rites at the time of death constitute a special instance of the observance of the fast (cf. I Sam. 31:13). In external form the observances of the two types of fast were very similar, though the motivation is fundamentally different.

In the late OT period the fast, notably the private fast, seems to have become increasingly prevalent. The two motivations cited above became combined: i.e., a fast might at the same time be an act of mourning for the disaster that had already struck and an act of repentance that might avert further disaster. But in addition to this, the fast seems to have acquired a new function as a means of personal spiritual cleansing and illumination. Daniel "was mourning for three weeks" (10:2 ff). The account of his behavior conforms to the description of a fast. At the end of this period he receives a vision which he alone is capable of enduring (vs. 7).

C. THE FESTAL OBSERVANCES. The distinction between the pilgrim feasts of Israel and other "appointed" times of celebration was ultimately superseded by a more significant one—i.e., that between those that were provided for in the law and were, therefore, canonical; and those that rested simply on custom.

1. Canonical. The wide range of feasts provided for in the Pentateuchal legislation falls into two main groups: (a) the sabbath, and other "appointed" times related to it; and (b) the great pilgrim feasts.

a. The sabbath. The wide range of legal material that serves as a basis for the observance of the SABBATH (שבת, "rest") includes the following: Exod. 16:22-30; 20:8-11; 23:12; 31:12-16; 34:21; 35:2-3; Lev. 19:3; 23:3; 26:2; Num. 15:32-36; 28:9-10; Deut. 5:12-15. The great bulk of this material belongs to the priestly strand of the Pentateuch. While sabbaths were undoubtedly a feature of Israelite observance from the beginning, the legislation about the sabbath proper and its central role as a sign of Israel's relation to the Lord, was probably a much later development. Originally sabbaths were very probably lunar observances, marking important phases of the moon. In Israel, however, the sabbath no longer depends on this natural cycle; it occurs every seventh day, cutting across and gradually superseding in importance such lunar observances as the new moons. The sabbath commemorates both creation (Exod. 20:8-11; cf. Gen. 2:1-3) and Israel's release from slavery (Deut. 5:12-15; cf. Exod. 23:12). It is a sign of Israel's state of holiness, because of its election by God and its relation to him in the covenant. This relationship is to be set forth in the holiness or "separation" of Israel on the sabbath: from all work and ordinary occupation (Exod. 35:2-3), and from contact with the secular world outside the house (Lev. 23:3). And on the positive side it was exemplified in the sanctification of the home; in light and joy that replaced mourning; and in appearing "before the LORD," whether in a holy convocation at the temple (Lev. 26:2) or in the study of the law. The tractate in the Mishna stands as a monument to the care with which the consecration of the sabbath was defined. The breaking of the sabbath constituted apostasy from the covenant and was punishable by death (Num. 15:32-36). In the order of temple sacrifices the festal character of the sabbath was noted by doubling the sacrifices offered on an ordinary day (Num. 28:1-10).

b. The New Moon. The feast of the NEW MOON (חדש, "new moon," "month") was probably the original form of the sabbath, before the latter was separated from the lunar cycle. The canonical requirement of the observance of the new moons is not so much legally prescribed as presupposed; this is indicated by the fact that the law specifies the amount and manner of the sacrifices (Num. 10:10; 28:11-15). It is to be noted that these are greater than those for the sabbath (Num. 28:1-10) and that their offering was accompanied by the blowing of trumpets as a mark of the festal character of the occasion. The tabernacle had reputedly been set up on the first new moon of the year (Exod. 40:2, 17). Though the Feast of the New Moon had its roots in a native cultus, it had been fully assimilated by Israelite faith and was a sign of the eternal character of the covenant and of the faithfulness of the Lord who instituted it (Ps. 104:19; Ecclus. 43:6-8). The persistence of the Feast of the New Moon contributed to Israel's adherence to a lunar calendar in governing its religious and communal life, with subsequent results for the Christian Year.

c. The seventh New Moon. In contrast to the new moon in general there is a specific prescription in the Law (Lev. 23:24-25) for the festal observance of that of the seventh month. Further, the sacrifices are greater than for other new moons (Num. 29:16). The seventh month is Tishri, in which both the Day of Atonement (see ATONEMENT, DAY OF) and the Feast of Booths (see BOOTHS, FEAST OF) occur. The traditional explanation for the special observance of the new moon of this month is built on the principle of the sacredness of the number seven. The force of this argument is impressive. It can point to the fact that, beginning with the sabbath on the seventh day, the entire cycle of feasts related to it (see § C1*a above*) is arranged on the basis of multiples of seven: the seventh day, the seventh month, the seventh year, and the forty-ninth year (seven times seven), to introduce the Year of Jubilee. The same sabbatical principle is operative elsewhere, notably in the computation of the Feast of Weeks. Since Wellhausen, the attempt has been made to interpret the special observance of the first of the seventh month as a form of New Year's observance. Israel's year originally ended in the autumn, but more probably at the close of Tishri, since Booths seems to have been the last feast of the annual cycle. Since the Jewish New Year currently occurs on the first of Tishri, some of those who consider the Feast of the Seventh New Moon a new year's observance have proposed that the change was made by the Jews in the Babylonian exile to offset the festivities of the Babylonian New Year on the first of Nisan; but evidence for a satisfactory solution of the problem is wanting.

d. The seventh year. Every seventh year (שבת שבתון לארץ, "sabbath of rest for the land") was a festal year. It was a celebration of Israel's faith that the land was a gift of God to his people. The land, like the people, was holy: this feast was for the sake of the land, so that it might rest (Exod. 23:11), and like the people, keep "a sabbath of solemn rest . . . to the LORD" (Lev. 25:4). As a double portion of manna appeared on the sixth day (Exod. 16:5), so the command to observe the rest of the land was coupled with the promise that in the sixth year the land would bear fruit for three years (Lev. 25:21). The sabbatical year was also for the sake of the people. It was the year when all Israelite slaves were to be set free (Exod. 21:2-6), in which the poor and animals might eat freely of what the land produced by itself (Exod. 23:10-11; Lev. 25:6), and in which all creditors would be released from debt (Deut. 15:1-6). The festal year fortified the sabbatical principle, which was a sign that Israel's existence and its land were a gift and an inheritance. Jeremiah notes that the requirement of the festal year was frequently ignored or observed opportunistically (34:8 ff); and the Exile is interpreted as God's punishment for this disobedience and as his vindication of the right of the land to observe its sabbath (Lev. 26:32-35).

e. The pentecostal year. The fiftieth year (דרור, "freedom"), or the year of Jubilee, followed the completion of a series of seven sabbatical years. It is apparent that the plan is modeled upon the observance of Weeks on the fiftieth day following the waving of the barley sheaf at the Feast of Unleavened Bread (Lev. 23:15-16), after the completion of seven sabbaths. This special festal year is provided for only in the priestly legislation (Lev. 25:8-55; 27:17-24); and since its requirements were virtually identical with those of the sabbatical year, including the restoration of property to its ancestral owners and the release of slaves (Lev. 25:10, 13), there are real grounds to question whether the institution was ever much more than an idealistic "plan." It may be significant that the characteristic term, "freedom," "liberty" (Lev. 25:10), is used of the seventh year by Jeremiah (34:8, 15, 17). While the year of Jubilee may have had a slight role in social history it eventually became a very influential Christian eschatological metaphor (Isa. 61:1-2; cf. Luke 4:18-19). See JUBILEE, YEAR OF; WEEKS, FEAST OF; PASSOVER AND FEAST OF UNLEAVENED BREAD.

2. Pilgrim. a. Passover and Feast of Unleavened Bread. This feast, kept for seven days, Nisan 14-21, and marked by two holy convocations (see CONVOCATION, HOLY), combined two originally separate observances. The basic canonical ordinances for it are the following: Exod. 12:1–13:16; 23:15; 34:18-20, 25; Lev. 23:4-14; Num. 28:16-25; Deut. 16:1-8. For a description of the rites of the feast, and of their history and meaning, see PASSOVER AND FEAST OF UNLEAVENED BREAD.

b. Weeks. This one-day festival was kept early in the third month, on the fiftieth day after the offering of the barley sheaf at the Feast of Unleavened Bread. It marked the end of the grain harvest and the beginning of the season for the offering of first fruits. The basic Pentateuchal texts are: Exod. 23:16; 34:22; Lev. 23:15-21; Num. 28:26-31; Deut. 16:9-12. For a full discussion, see WEEKS, FEAST OF.

c. Booths. This feast was kept for seven days, beginning on the fifteenth of the seventh month. It represented Israel's assimilation of an ancient vintage festival and commemorated the wandering in the wilderness. The legal provisions relating to it are: Exod. 23:16; 34:22; Lev. 23:33-36, 39-43; Num. 29:12-32; Deut. 16:13-16. For an account of the rites, see BOOTHS, FEAST OF.

3. Noncanonical. a. The Feast of Dedication. This eight-day festival (חנכה, hanukkah: "dedication"), also known as Lights, commemorates the victories of Judas Maccabeus and the purification and rededication of the temple under his leadership. He is credited with the institution of the annual observance (I Macc. 4:52-59), beginning on the twenty-fifth of the ninth month.

b. Purim. This feast (פורים, "lots") is a carnival-like celebration of one (or two) days, the fourteenth of the twelfth month, to celebrate the deliverance of the Jews from Haman by Esther and Mordecai. The institution of the feast is related in the book of Esther (9:24 ff). The Feast of Nicanor (I Macc. 7:49), celebrating a Maccabean victory on the thirteenth of the same month, was apparently absorbed by PURIM.

c. Simḥath Torah. This festal observance in honor of the Law (שמחת תורה, "Joy of the Law") is now an appendix of Booths (see BOOTHS, FEAST OF) and falls on the ninth day of that festival. The Ezra tradition (Neh. 8:9; I Esd. 9:50) locates a very similar observance on the first day of the seventh month.

D. THE FASTS. 1. Canonical. The Mosaic law provides for only one communal fast, the Day of Atonement (יום הכפורים, "the day of coverings"). This most solemn fast occurred on the tenth day of the seventh month. The Mosaic prescriptions for the observances are: Exod. 30:10; Lev. 16; 23:26-32; 25:9; Num. 29:7-11. In its complex rites, indebted to a great variety of antecedent sources, the Day was both an act of repentance and expiation to ward off disaster and a means of making available the effectiveness of divine power. Though as an institution it was of postexilic origin, the Day of Atonement incorporated many ancient Israelite practices and meanings in its forms. See ATONEMENT, DAY OF.

2. Noncanonical. The fairly common practice of proclaiming communal fasts in Israel has been discussed above. These were generally occasional in nature, rather than institutional. Two, however, had become annual events among the exiles in Babylon. Both were fasts of mourning. The one commemorated the burning of the temple on the ninth day of the fifth month (cf. II Kings 25:8 with Jer. 52:12), and the other the murder of Gedaliah on the second of the seventh month (Jer. 41). Despite the counsel of Zechariah (7:3-5), the former of these has survived as an annual institution. Its title is תשעה באב, "the ninth of Ab." In contemporary Jewish Orthodoxy this fast, though not Mosaic, has been practiced with utmost seriousness.

Bibliography. I. Elbogen, Der jüdische Gottesdienst (2nd ed., 1924). G. B. Gray, Sacrifice in the OT (1925). H. Schauss, The Jewish Festivals (1938). H. Frankfort, The Problem of Similarity in Ancient Near Eastern Religions (1951). E. Auerbach, "Die Babylonische Datierung . . . ," Vetus Testamentum, II (1952), 334-42. H.-J. Kraus, Gottesdienst in Israel (1954). J. Wellhausen, Prolegomena to the History of Ancient Israel (1957), pp. 17-164. E. Auerbach, "Die Feste im alten Israel," Vetus Testamentum, VIII (1958), 1-18; "Neujahrs und Versöhnungs-Fest . . . ," Vetus Testamentum, VIII (1958), 337-43. H.-J. Kraus, "Zur Geschichte des Passah-Massot-Festes . . . ," Evangelische Theologie, 18 (1958), 47-67.

J. C. RYLAARSDAM

FELIX, ANTONIUS ăn tō′nĭ əs fē′lĭks [Φήλιξ]. PROCURATOR of Judea from 52 to 60 and successor to Cumanus. According to Acts 23:24–24:27, Felix was procurator at the time of Paul's last visit to Jerusalem and his arrest there. When Felix was recalled by Nero, Paul was turned over to the new procurator, FESTUS.

1. In Josephus. Felix, according to Josephus (Antiq. XX.vii.1), was the brother of an influential Roman named Pallas. In 52 (or 53) Felix was named procurator. Some two years later, Felix was busy putting down uprisings by "robbers and impostors" who "were a multitude not to be enumerated" (War II.xiii.2-3). By treachery Felix seized one such leader, Eleazar the son of Deneas, after giving him an assurance of no harm. He utilized the services of these robbers (identified as Sicarii) in the murder of the high priest Jonathan (Antiq. XX.viii.5). A Jew out of Egypt (see Acts 21:38), who led a large number of Jews, was attacked by Festus; the leader escaped, never to be heard from again, but four hundred of his followers were slain (Antiq. XX.viii.6; see War II.xiv.6).

Felix was recalled to Rome. A deputation of Jews went to Rome to accuse Felix, but the influence and intervention of Pallas saved him from punishment (Antiq. XX.viii.9).

Felix married DRUSILLA, a sister of Agrippa II, after persuading her to leave her husband, Azizus king of Emesa (Antiq. XX.vii.2); she bore him a son, Agrippa. Felix was married two other times.

2. In Roman sources. Scattered notices about Felix appear in the works of the Roman historians Suetonius and Tacitus. A conflict exists in the data provided by Josephus (Antiq. XX.vi.3–vii.1; War II.xii.8) and Tacitus (Ann. XII.54). The latter supposes that Felix was procurator of Samaria and Judea while Cumanus was procurator of Galilee, whereas Josephus relates that Felix succeeded Cumanus as procurator of Judea. Most scholars prefer Josephus on this point.

Suetonius (Claudius 28) reports that Felix had been married to three royal women (reginarum). One was Drusilla; another was the granddaughter of Mark Antony and Cleopatra; the third is unknown (see Tac. Hist. V.9).

Tacitus (Ann. XII.54) reports that Felix believed that he could commit all kinds of evil with impunity. The influence of his brother was undoubtedly a spur to his arbitrariness. Tacitus comments that his actions only provoked further difficulties. Some six years after Felix' recall, the Jewish War broke out; Josephus is the source of the credible contention that Felix' term, with its cruelties and oppressions, provided the cause of the war; neither Festus nor his successors (Albinus, 62-64; Florus, 64-66) would have been able to avert the disaster, had they been minded to, and they were not. Felix is a prime example of colonial mismanagement.

Apparently he was a freedman, deriving his name Antonius from Antonia, the mother of the Emperor Claudius. (A scribal error in Suidas is the basis of a wrong contention that Felix bore the name Claudius.)

3. In Acts. Acts relates that the Roman tribune Claudius Lysias sent Paul from Jerusalem to Felix in Caesarea; five days later the high priest Ananias and one Tertullus laid before Felix the case against Paul. Tertullus is portrayed as speaking of the peace enjoyed under and the reforms introduced by Felix. Paul's speech begins: "Realizing that for many years you have been judge over this nation, I cheerfully make my defense." After Paul's speech, Felix, to whom is attributed a "rather accurate knowledge of the way," postponed the decision; he kept Paul in custody, but gave him "some liberty." A few days later, Felix and his Jewish wife, Drusilla, sent for Paul "and heard him speak upon faith in Christ Jesus." Felix was alarmed when Paul "argued about justice and self-control and future judgment." Felix said: "Go away for the present; when I have an opportunity I will summon you." Felix hoped "that money would be given him by Paul. So he sent for him often and conversed with him." When Festus became the new procurator, Felix, "desiring to do the Jews a favor," kept Paul in prison (Acts 23:24–24:27).

The reliability of Acts is a general problem (see G. H. C. MacGregor, IB, IX [1954], 12-14, for a brief summary), in which the incident of Felix constitutes but a detail. While MacGregor (p. 307) states that "there is nothing in Luke's narrative that is either improbable or inconsistent," he concedes that "some radical critics have questioned the historicity of Paul's 'trial' before Felix."

Neither Josephus nor Paul's letters relate or allude to any connection between Paul and Felix.

Bibliography. "Antonius," Pauly-Wissowa, Real-Encyclopadie der classischen Altertumswissenschaft, vol. I (1804), cols. 2616 ff; E. Schürer, A History of the Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ (English trans.; 1891), div. 2, vol. II, pp. 174-82.

S. SANDMEL

FELLOE fĕl′ō. KJV translation of גב (RSV RIM), a part of the wheels used for the stands of bronze in Solomon's temple, in I Kings 7:33; Ezek. 1:18.

FELLOWSHIP. See COMMUNION.

FENCE [גדר (Ps. 62:3—H 62:4), גדרה (Nah. 3:17; KJV HEDGE)]. A stone wall enclosing a field, town, etc. In Ps. 62:3—H 62:4 a man beset by enemies is described as a "tottering fence" (lit., a "pushed-in wall")—a wall whose stones are out of line and whose fall is imminent.

FENCED (CITY). KJV translation of some derivatives of בצר, "enclose," and צור, "confine" (RSV FORTIFIED). See CITY § B2*b*.

FERRET. KJV translation of אנקה (RSV GECKO).

FERTILITY CULTS. The oldest common feature of the religions of the ancient Near East was the worship of a great mother-goddess, the personification of fertility. Associated with her, usually as a consort, was a young god who died and came to life again, like the vegetation which quickly withers but blooms again. The manner of the young god's demise was variously conceived in the myths: he was slain by another god, by wild animals, by reapers, by self-emasculation, by burning, by drowning. In some variations of the theme, he simply absconded. His absence produced infertility of the earth, of man, and of beast. His consort mourned and searched for him. His return brought renewed fertility and rejoicing.

In Mesopotamia the divine couple appear as Ishtar and Tammuz, in Egypt as Isis and Osiris. Later in Asia Minor, the Magna Mater is Cybele and her young lover is Attis. In Syria in the second millennium B.C., as seen in the Ugaritic myths, the dying and rising god is Baal-Hadad, who is slain by Mot (Death) and mourned and avenged by his sister-consort, the violent virgin Anath. In the Ugaritic myths there is some confusion in the roles of the goddesses. The great mother-goddess Asherah, the wife of the senescent chief god El, seems on the way to becoming the consort of the rising young god Baal, with whom we find her associated in the OT. Ashtarte also appears in the Ugaritic myths, but she has a minor and undistinguished role.

The OT furnishes abundant evidence as to the character of the religion of the land into which the Israelites came. Fertility rites were practiced at the numerous shrines which dotted the land, as well as at the major sanctuaries. The Israelites absorbed the Canaanite ways and learned to identify their god with Baal, whose rains brought fertility to the land. A characteristic feature of the fertility cult was sacral sexual intercourse by priests and priestesses and other specially consecrated persons, sacred prostitutes of both sexes, intended to emulate and stimulate the deities who bestowed fertility. The agricultural cult stressed the sacrifice or common meal in which the gods, priests, and people partook. Wine was consumed in great quantity in thanksgiving to Baal for the fertility of the vineyards. The wine also helped induce ecstatic frenzy, which was climaxed by self-laceration, and sometimes even by self-emasculation. Child-sacrifice was also a feature of the rites. It was not simply a cult of wine, women, and song, but a matter of life and death in which the dearest things of life, and life itself, were offered to ensure the ongoing of life.

See also ANATH; ASHERAH; ASHTORETH; BAAL; DAGON; GOD, OT VIEW OF; HIGH PLACE; PROSTITUTION; SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS; TAMMUZ; UGARIT.

Bibliography. E. G. Kraeling, "The Real Religion of Ancient Israel," JBL, 47 (1928), 133-59. H. G. May, "The Fertility Cult in Hosea," AJSL, 48 (1932), 73-98. W. C. Graham and H. G. May, Culture and Conscience (1936). W. F. Albright, Archaeology and the Religion of Israel (1942). G. Östborn, Yahweh and Baal: Studies in the Book of Hosea and Related Documents, Lunds Universitets Arsskrift 51, no. 6 (1956). J. Gray, "Cultic Affinities Between Israel and Ras Shamra," ZAW, 62 (1949/50), 1-4; reprinted in The Legacy of Canaan (1957), pp. 207-20.

M. H. POPE

FESTAL GARMENT [חליפות בגדים, חלפות שמלת]; KJV CHANGE OF RAIMENT or GARMENTS. An outfit worn on gala occasions (Gen. 45:22; Judg. 14:12-13, 19; II Kings 5:5, 22-23). The word חליפה, "change," when used of clothing, acquires the meaning of a special garment for other than everyday use.

FESTAL ROBE [מחלצה; cf. Akkad. ḫalṣu, clean; Arab. ḫalaṣa, to be clean, pure, white] (Isa. 3:22); KJV CHANGEABLE SUIT OF APPAREL. Alternately: RICH APPAREL (Zech. 3:4); KJV CHANGE OF RAIMENT. In the Isaiah passage it is a part of the finery of the daughters of Zion, and may refer to extra fine, white robes. In the Zechariah passage the allusion is to the garments which replaced the filthy garments in which Joshua the high priest was brought before the heavenly courts. In this instance the term might refer to priestly robes or, more probably, to clean garments which symbolized Joshua's innocence of the charges brought against him. Such a change of garment may reflect a court rite.

H. G. MAY

FESTIVAL. See FEASTS AND FASTS.

FESTUS, PORCIUS pôr'shəs fĕs'təs [Φῆστος]. PROCURATOR of Judea probably from 60 to 62. He is known only from the NT and Josephus. Problems of chronology, debated for decades, focus on Festus.

1. In Josephus. Festus followed FELIX as procurator, and preceded Albinus. What Josephus relates about him (Antiq. XX.viii.9-11) can be summarized briefly (War II.xiv.1 is scarcely more than a mention).

At Caesarea (by the Sea) under Felix, bloody conflicts between Jews and pagans had arisen; pagans denied Jews a share in the administration of the city. The Jews appealed to Nero, but in vain. The conflicts thereupon became worse.

The Sicarii (wielders of small swords, sicae) were regarded by Festus as bandits. A certain impostor had persuaded the Sicarii that his leadership would bring them deliverance and freedom. The forces of Festus destroyed both the leader and his follower.

A dispute arose between Agrippa II and the priests over the erection of a wall designed to blot out Agrippa's view of the temple from the portico on which the king ate and, with Festus' consent, slept. Festus sided with Agrippa. The priests appealed to Rome, with the result that the wall was permitted to stand. Most writers believe, as is probable, that Festus died before this decision was announced.

2. In Acts. Acts 24:27 relates that when Felix was succeeded by Festus, Paul, in prison already for two years, came under Festus' jurisdiction. Chs. 25–26 relate that Festus visited Jerusalem, inviting the Jewish authorities to come to Caesarea to give testimony against Paul. Paul was offered the opportunity of going to Jerusalem to be tried there; in reply Paul "appealed to Caesar."

When Agrippa II and his sister Bernice visited Caesarea, Festus put Paul's case before the king, so that Agrippa expressed a wish to hear Paul. On the next day Paul was brought in before them and given permission to speak. After his speech (which Festus thought proved Paul a madman) Agrippa told Festus that Paul could have been set free, had he not appealed to Caesar.

MacGregor (see bibliography) expresses the judgment that the "vivid piece of drama is securely founded on fact"; he cites, however, respectable opinion—e.g., Goguel, who regards the narrative as "frankly incredible." Goguel's opinion is to be preferred.

Josephus lacks completely any mention of Paul, so that this incident naturally is not found in Josephus.

3. The chronological problem. On the supposition that the incident is based on fact, the age-old (and gratuitous) problem of its chronology can be stated as follows. Eusebius (Chronicle) declares that Festus became procurator in the second year of Nero's reign (56) and Albinus in the sixth or seventh year (61 or 62). This would have Festus' term last five or six years; but Josephus' account seems to suppose a very short term. That Albinus became procurator in 62 seems to be confirmed by Josephus. If the date of Albinus' becoming procurator is fixed as 62, and if Festus served but for two years, then Eusebius and Jerome err in setting Festus' entrance into the procuratorship as early as 56.

But on the preferable supposition that the incident of Paul and Festus is not based on fact, it is unnecessary to attempt to construct a consistent and persuasive chronology. Virtually all that the NT relates about the Herodian period is absent from Josephus. See HEROD (FAMILY). Krenkel (Lukas und Josephus) argues with some persuasiveness that the history which Luke reproduces is derived from Josephus. A telling argument against Krenkel, however, is the absence from Josephus of most of what Luke relates. If Josephus was indeed a source utilized by Luke, then he used it with the freedom and imagination of an artist, and not with the discipline of a modern historical researcher.

Bibliography. G. H. C. MacGregor, Exegesis of Acts, IB, IX (1954), 318-19. An immense literature exists in support of both a long term (56-62) and a short term (60-62) for Festus. K. Lake, The Beginnings of Christianity, V (1933), 466-67, favors the date 56, but a short term. F.-M. Abel, Histoire de la Palestine depuis la Conquête d'Alexandre jusqu'à l'invasion Arabe, I (1952), 468-69, prefers the dates 60-62. On older literature, see E. Schürer, The History of the Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ, div. 1, vol. II (1891), p. 182, note 38.

S. SANDMEL

FETTER. The translation of words which have the general meaning "anything that restricts or restrains" (נחשת, אסור, and δεσμός), as well as those which bear the specific meaning "shackle for the foot" (כבל[?] and πέδη). Fetters were made from wood, bronze (called נחשת, "bronze," just as in English shackles are frequently called "irons") or iron (Ps. 149:8). A captive's hands could be inserted in a manacle which would then be suspended from his neck by a rope. His feet might be bound with shackles, which were joined by a chain or rope so that the hobbled prisoner could take only short steps (Ps. 105:18; Mark 5:4). In Eccl. 7:26 the hands of a woman "more bitter than death" are metaphorically described as "fetters."

See also CHAIN.

Bibliography. J. B. Pritchard, ed., ANEP (1954), figs. 10, 49-51, 55, 57, 325-26.

R. W. CORNEY

FEVER [חרחר, דלקת, קדחת, שחפת; LXX πυρετός, δυσεντέριον]. While it is not always easy to identify the diseases mentioned in the Bible, the incidence of febrile conditions is generally described in terms which permit reasonably consistent interpretation.

חרחר (Deut. 28:22 [LXX ἐρεθισμός; RSV "fiery heat"; KJV "extreme burning"]) is probably a description of undulant (Malta) fever, or of erysipelas.

דלקת, "inflammation" (Deut. 28:22 [LXX ῥῖγος, "ague"]), probably describes malarial fever.

קדחת (Lev. 26:16 [LXX ἵκτερος; KJV "burning ague"]; Deut. 28:22 [LXX πυρετός]) may describe two different stages of the same general febrile condition, the former referring to the incidence of jaundice (icterus) with malarial fever, and the latter indicating the fever itself.

שחפת (Lev. 26:16; Deut. 28:22 [LXX ἀπορία]), translated "CONSUMPTION" in the English versions, is a wasting disease accompanied by fever. Phthisis is not common in Syria. The disease implied is more probably undulant fever, which is frequently accompanied by anemia, febrile paroxysms, and emaciation.

Πυρετός is generally used to describe malaria, a disease of frequent incidence and severe mortality in ancient Palestine. Peter's wife's mother (Matt. 8:14; Mark 1:30; Luke 4:38) and possibly the nobleman's son at Capernaum (John 4:52) were thus afflicted.

Δυσεντέριον (Acts 28:8 [RSV DYSENTERY; KJV "bloody flux"] is dysentery accompanied by fever (πυρετός), perhaps relapsing malarial fever. But the condition described may be acute gangrenous dysentery, which is normally fatal.

R. K. HARRISON

FIELD. A tract of ground used for farming (see AGRICULTURE) or for grazing (see PASTURE LANDS), varying in size and fertility according to the economic status of the owners and the geographical location of the territory involved.

The Hebrew word שדה is the one most commonly translated "field," and is often used in a context where it is impossible to determine its size or purpose (Gen. 2:5, 19; 4:8; Exod. 1:14; 22:5; Deut. 5:21; etc.). The word was sometimes used to designate a larger area than would be owned by one person (שדה מואב, "country of Moab"; KJV "field of Moab" in Gen. 36:35). The same word was used to designate an uncultivated region where game could be hunted (Gen. 27:5), a cultivated area where crops could be grown (Ruth 2:2, etc.; Job 24:6; Ps. 107:37), and a pasture where herds could graze (Gen. 34:5; Exod. 9:21; Num. 22:4). Details concerning the purchase of a field at Anathoth by Jeremiah are reported in Jer. 32:7 ff.

Other Hebrew words used to designate a cultivated field are: שרמות (Jer. 31:40); יגבים (Jer. 39:10); שדמה (Isa. 16:8); שדי (Deut. 32:13); חלקה (II Sam. 14:30); חוץ (Job 5:10). Aramaic בר in Dan. 2:38, etc., refers to a field in the open country.

Three Greek words rendered "field," ἀγρός, χώρα, and χωρίον, may refer either to areas limited in size or to the open country (Matt. 6:30; Luke 15:25; John 4:35; Acts 1:18).

See also FULLER'S FIELD; POTTER'S FIELD.

W. L. REED

FIELD OF BLOOD. See AKELDAMA.

FIERY SERPENT [שרף, śārāph] (Num. 21:6, 8; Deut. 8:15; in KJV also Isa. 14:29; 30:6). The serpents sent among the Israelites in the wilderness of wandering, which caused the death of many of the Israelites (Num. 21:6, 8; Deut. 8:15); the reference may be in part to the fiery inflammation caused by the bite of the serpent (see Hebrew sāraph, "to burn"). The flying (fiery) serpents of Isa. 14:29; 30:6 are apparently legendary in character. In the context of the latter is a reference to the mythological serpent-dragon, Rahab.

See also SERPENT; SERPENT, BRONZE; SERAPHIM.

H. G. MAY

FIG TREE, FIG [תאנה, te'ēnâ; תאנים te'ēnîm; Akkad. tittu; Arab. tîn; συκῆ, σῦκον]. A tree and its fruit, Ficus caricus L., referred to more than sixty times in the Bible. תאנה (Gen. 3:7, etc.) and συκῆ (Matt. 21:19, etc.) usually refer to the tree, while תאנים (Num. 13:23, etc.) and σῦκον (Matt. 7:16, etc.) refer to the fruit. Other words are used for the fruit to indicate its various stages of development; בכורה bikkûrâ (Isa. 28:4, etc.), refers to the early fruit, which usually ripens in June; and פגה, paggâ (Song of S. 2:13), and the Greek ὄλυνθος (Song of S. 2:13 LXX; Rev. 6:13[?]; cf. Isa. 34:4) refer to the early spring green fruit, which emerges before the leaves from the branches of the previous season. דבלה, dᵉbhēlâ (I Sam. 30:12, etc.) and the Greek παλάθη (I Kings 25:18 LXX, etc.) refer to a cake of pressed figs, which was also used medicinally as a fig poultice (II Kings 20:7 = Isa. 38:21).

The large, palmate leaves of the tree provided the "aprons" for Adam and Eve (Gen. 3:7), and shade from the sun (John 1:48, 50). The fruit was a feature of attraction for the Hebrews approaching Palestine (Num. 13:23; Deut. 8:8; cf. Num. 20:5). Almost all the references to the fruit of the fig tree are indications of its great importance to the life of ancient times, as it continues to be in the Holy Land today.

The majority of the references to the fig are metaphorical. It appears often as an illustration in stories and parables: in Jotham's fable of the trees (Judg. 9:10-11); in Jeremiah's parable concerning the exiles (the "good figs"; Jer. 24; cf. 29:17); as a symbol of peace and prosperity (I Kings 4:25; II Kings 18:31 = Isa. 36:16; Joel 2:22; Mic. 4:4; Hag. 2:19; Zech. 3:10); and frequently in prophecies of impending national distress (Jer. 5:17; 8:13; Hos. 2:12; Joel 1:7, 12; Amos 4:9).

The most difficult passage to interpret is the story of Jesus' cursing the fig tree (Mark 11:13-14, 20-21; and its parallel in Matt. 21:18-21), which seems so out of character. Many explanations have been offered, but without any permanent solution. That it may have been a dramatic illustration of the parable in Luke 13:6-9, pointing to the tragic end of those who produce no fruit from their lives, seems possible. The absence of the early spring green figs (Song of S. 2:13), which normally precede the leaves and indicate that the tree would bear fruit that season, may have been the basis of the story, though it would not explain the impulsive action of Jesus. Perhaps the story was originally intended as an apocalyptic symbol. That the original context and meaning of the story have been obscured or lost is clear. The fact that Luke omits the story is indicative of an early recognition of the difficulties. See bibliography.

Trans World Airlines Photo

11. Fig tree in the foreground, with Nazareth on the hillside in the background

Ezek. 27:17 refers to the products which were exported from Judah and Israel, including the obscure "wheat of Minnith, and Pannag" (KJV). By slight emendation it becomes "wheat, olives and early figs" (RSV), one of several suggestions which attempt to solve the textual problem. Three Hebrew MSS read ופגג for ופנג, in support of this emendation. If the fig were meant by the writer, however, it seems strange that he did not use the usual word for the fruit in such a context. Another suggested reading is דנג, "wax" (Amer. Trans.).

Another species of fig, Ficus sycomorus L., is common in the Holy Land. See SYCAMORE.

See also FLORA § A2*c;* AGRICULTURE; FOOD; PANNAG.

Fig. FIG 11; Pl. XII*b*.

Bibliography. I. Löw, Die Flora der Juden, I:1 (1926), 224-54; I. J. Condit, The Fig (1947); H. N. and A. L. Moldenke, Plants of the Bible (1952), pp. 103-6. For summary of the problem of Jesus' cursing the fig tree, see D. M. Beck, Through the Gospels to Jesus (1954), pp. 272-73.

J. C. TREVER

FIGURED STONE [אבן משכית, משכית]. Probably religious scenes painted or carved on stone, depicting some kind of ritual offensive to the Hebrews. At any rate, they were forbidden to set up such stones (Lev. 26:1; KJV "image of stone") and enjoined to remove them from the land (Num. 33:52; KJV "pictures").

In Ezek. 8:12, where the prophet speaks of a room or rooms of these objects maintained by the elders of Israel, the RSV translates "pictures" (KJV "imagery"). The word is found elsewhere in variant meanings (Ps. 73:7; Prov. 18:11; 25:11).

Cf. the stone reliefs or orthostats found in the excavations, such as the basalt orthostat with a lion carving from the thirteenth-century Canaanite temple at Hazor. Fig. ART 65.

Bibliography. W. F. Albright, Archaeology and the Religion of Israel (1942), pp. 165 ff; Y. Yadin, BA, XIX (Feb., 1956), p. 10 and Fig. 1.

J. M. MYERS

FIGUREHEAD [παράσημος] (Acts 28:11); KJV SIGN. The word used for the emblem on the prow of the Alexandrian ship on which Paul sailed from Malta, ultimately to Rome. It was of the TWIN BROTHERS, Castor and Pollux, twin sons of Zeus and Leda. The Greek text, Παρασήμῳ Διοσκούροις is literally "marked by the Dioscuri [or Twin Brothers]." They were considered to bring good luck to the ship because the sight of the constellation in bad weather was a good omen. B. H. THROCKMORTON, JR.

FILIGREE [משבצות, משבצים, lit., interwoven work, from שבץ, to weave in a checker pattern]; KJV OUCHES (i.e., settings for precious stones). Ornamental work in fine gold wire, used in making clasps and settings for jewels.

The two onyx stones on the ephod (Exod. 28:11; 39:6) and the twelve jewels of the breastplate (Exod. 28:20; 39:13) were set in filigree, and filigree clasps held the breastplate to the shoulders of the ephod (Exod. 28:13, 25; 39:16, 18; see BREASTPLATE; EPHOD [OBJECT]). The design was probably a rosette or simple floral pattern similar to those seen on Palestinian ivories. See IVORY.

See also JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES; METALLURGY. L. E. TOOMBS

FILLET. 1. חשוק. A band or collar of metal binding the tops of the pillars of the court and of the door of the TABERNACLE, probably just below the capitals. Those of the door pillars were of gold (Exod. 36:28), while those of the pillars of the court were of silver (38:10-12, 17, 19). Some scholars have understood them to be rods joining the tops of the pillars, with the curtains attached to them. However, this interpretation raises problems at several points in the description of the tabernacle:

a) The verbal form "were filleted" (Exod. 27:17; 38:17, 28). The Aramaic root means "to bind," and the LXX translates it "cased (covered) with silver."

b) The absence of any reference to such rods in the instructions in Num. 4 for the transportation of the tabernacle.

c) The clear inference of Exod. 26:32, 37, that the veil and the screen of the tent hung by hooks from the pillars themselves rather than from rods.

Therefore, it seems best to consider the fillets as bands, in which were probably fixed the hooks by which the curtains were hung from the pillars.

2. KJV translation of חוט in Jer. 52:21 (RSV CIRCUMFERENCE), indicating a thread or measuring line used to measure the circumference of the pillars in front of the temple.

Bibliography. A. H. McNeile, Exodus, WC (1908), addenda.
S. V. FAWCETT

FINE. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS.

FINE FLOUR. Flour ground from only the inner kernels of the wheat. See FLOUR.

FINE LINEN. See LINEN.

FINERY [תפארת, splendor, beauty, ornament] (Isa. 3:18); KJV BRAVERY. A term referring to the luxuriousness of the anklets worn by the society women of Jerusalem.

FINGER OF GOD [באצבע אלהים]. A figurative expression for the power of God. The finger is viewed as the instrument of work; this is especially true with reference to God. Not infrequently the finger is understood to be the equivalent of the hand, which also represents the divine power. Thus it was the finger of God that brought forth the plagues which confounded the Egyptian pharaoh and his magicians (Exod. 8:19—H 8:15). The Law was written on tables of stone by the finger of God (Exod. 31:18; Deut. 9:10). The creation of the heavens was the work of God's fingers (Ps. 8:3). Jesus leaves us free to infer that he cast out demons by the finger of God—i.e., that he possessed divine power over evil spirits (Luke 11:20).

By contrast, the hands and fingers of men are often given over to the fabrication of idols (Isa. 2:8), and other worthless activities (17:8). In times of adversity the faithful should not conclude that the Lord's hand has been "shortened" (59:1), but rather that they have been separated from God because their own hands have been defiled with blood and their fingers with iniquity (59:3). H. F. BECK

FINING POT. The KJV translation of מצרף in Prov. 17:3; 27:21. This Old English is replaced by CRUCIBLE in the RSV.

FIR TREE [תדהר, tidhār (Isa. 41:19; 60:13); ברוש, bᵉrôš (Ps. 104:17; Ezek. 27:5; 31:8; RSV elsewhere CYPRESS), Aram. bᵉrôṭ (Song of S. 1:17 KJV; RSV PINE)]. Although the true fir, Abies cilicica Carr., which grows best in high alpine regions like the cedars of Lebanon, would suit the associations of ברוש in the OT, most botanists and biblical scholars have abandoned this translation, because of the sparsity of the tree in the Lebanons, in favor of the pine, cypress, or juniper; but its choice for the rare word תדהר seems reasonable in the contexts in which it appears. תדהר is the tree associated with the "glory of Lebanon." Many translations of the word have been offered, including "savin," "plane" (see PLANE TREE), "pine," "elm" (Douay and modern Hebrew), etc. Any translation is gratuitous, for there are no cognates to assist identification.

See also FLORA § A9*f*. J. C. TREVER

FIRE. Fire is used as a motif of theophany and of divine punishment and purification. Fire is, of course, also an important part of domestic life (see COOKING AND COOKING UTENSILS), and it was a frequent implement of war in OT times (see WAR, METHODS OF). Since these facts are self-evident, we may concentrate on the symbolic aspects of fire.

1. Vocabulary
2. Fire and theophany
3. Fire and worship
4. Fire and the divine action
   a. Fire and punishing destruction
   b. Fire as purification
Bibliography

1. Vocabulary. A large number of words are used to express various kinds of fire (for further vocabulary, see BURNING). Most important of these in Hebrew is אש (probably onomatopoetic; Gen. 22:6;

Lev. 2:14; Deut. 13:16; etc.); variants: אשה (Jer. 6: 29); 'ish, "flame" (Nah. 2:3); Aramaic אשא, "flame" (Dan. 7:11). אור (Isa. 24:15 KJV) is properly "LIGHT." בערה (from בער) is "that which burns." The cognates להב (Judg. 13:20, etc.), להבה, להבת (Ps. 29:7; Isa. 47: 14; etc.; לבה [Exod. 3:2] is probably a contraction), and probably שלהבת (Job 15:30; Song of S. 8:6), all mean "flame." משאת (from נשא, "to lift") is a fire signal (Judg. 20:38, 40; Jer. 6:1 KJV; RSV SIGNAL). זקים (Prov. 26:18) and לפיד (Judg. 15:4) may be translated "firebrand" (RSV "torch"), as is אוד (Isa. 7:4; Amos 4:11; Zech. 3:2). שרפים (Num. 21:6, 8; Deut. 8:15; etc.) is sometimes rendered "fiery serpents" (see SERAPHIM). כליל ("flame" in Judg. 20:40 KJV) is rightly translated "whole." Principal verbs are: יצת (II Sam. 14:31), "to set afire"; שרף (Exod. 29:14, etc.), "to burn"; להט (Deut. 32:22, etc.), "to set afire"; בער (Exod. 3:2, etc.), "to burn." Aramaic words are נור (Dan. 3:22; 7:9-10), "fire"; שביב (Dan. 7:9), "flame."

The main Greek word for "fire" in the NT is πῦρ (Matt. 3:10; Acts 2:3; I Cor. 3:13; etc.), with its cognates: πυρά, "fire" (Acts 28:2-3); πύρινος, "the color of fire" (Rev. 9:17); πύρωσις, "fiery ordeal" (I Pet. 4:12); πυρόω, "to be set on fire" (Eph. 6:16; Rev. 3: 18). Φλόξ, "flame" (Luke 16:24; II Thess. 1:7), and φλογίζω, "to set aflame" (Jas. 3:6), occur several times. In addition, φῶς, properly "light," is translated "fire" in Mark 14:54 and in Luke 22:56 KJV.

2. Fire and theophany. Fire is a consistent element of the description of THEOPHANY throughout biblical literature. The appearance for covenant with Abraham (Gen. 15:17), the appearance in the burning bush (Exod. 3:2; cf. Acts 7:30), Yahweh's leading Israel in the pillar of fire by night (Exod. 13:21-22; 14:24; Num. 9:15-16; 14:14; Deut. 1:33; Neh. 9:12, 19; Pss. 78:14; 105:39; Isa. 4:5; see also GLORY), his appearance in fire on Mount Sinai (Exod. 19:18; 24: 17; Deut. 4:11-36; 5:4-26; 9:10, 15; 18:16; cf. I Kings 18:24; Heb. 12:18), are of the central elements in Israel's faith (see SINAI, MOUNT). Indeed, it may be argued that the Sinai experience is the foundation of OT fire imagery. Some of the elements of the Sinai theophany seem to suggest that it was a volcano, whereas others indicate a thunderstorm. Certainly Yahweh is frequently described under the figure of a storm (II Sam. 22:9, 13; Pss. 18:8—H 18:9;18:12-13 —H 18:13-14; 29:7; 50:3; 105:32; Ezek. 1:4, 13; 10: 2, 6-7). Other fiery theophanies, however, do not have stormy surroundings (cf. I Kings 18:24, 38; I Chr. 21:26; II Chr. 7:1, 3). Christ's appearance in the vision of John (Rev. 1:14; 2:18) is with "eyes of fire," and the descent of the Holy Spirit (Acts 2:3) is accompanied by "tongues of fire." The fire persists in visions of eschatological theophanies (cf. Isa. 4:5; 64:2—H 64:1; 66:15; Dan. 7:9-10; Joel 2:30—H 3:3; Mic. 1:4; Zech. 2:5—H 2:9; Mal. 3:2; Enoch 14:12-22; Acts 2:19; Rev. 15:2; 19:12). Fire is a symbol of HOLINESS and in some cases of protection (cf. especially Zech. 2:5—H 2:9). The fire motif in theophanies is evocative of the divine presence.

3. Fire and worship. The use of fire in Israel's worship mirrors the principal meanings of the symbol. The ever-burning fire on the ALTAR (Lev. 6:12-13) shows the continual presence of God. The practice of burning offerings in fire mirrors the use of fire as symbolic both of the divine judgment on sin and of purification of the sinner (see SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS). Therefore Nadab and Abihu are punished for offering "strange fire" to Yahweh (Lev. 10:1; RSV "unholy fire"). The pagan custom of burning children in fire as sacrifice is also condemned (Deut. 12:31; 18:10; II Kings 16:3; 17:17, 31; 21:6; 23:10; Jer. 7:31 [see HINNOM, VALLEY OF THE SONS OF]; 19:5), partly because it was sacrifice to pagan deities (see MOLECH) and partly because it was human sacrifice.

4. Fire and the divine action. In most cases fire represents the divine action on earth. "Our God is a consuming fire" (Heb. 12:29; cf. Deut. 4:24). Fire is his servant (Ps. 104:4; Heb. 1:7), and his word is like fire (Jer. 23:29; cf. 5:14; 20:9).

a. Fire as punishing destruction. By far the majority of instances have this as their intention. Fire is a symbol of destruction because of its power to consume. In the extension to the idea of holiness, fire becomes further a symbol of destruction. Since wickedness is sometimes compared to fire (cf. Isa. 65:5; Hos. 7:6; Jas. 3:5-6), its punishment is consumption by fire (cf. Gen. 19:24; Lev. 10:2; Josh. 7:15). Thence the image receives the force of the WRATH OF GOD (cf. Ps. 89:46—H 89:47; Jer. 4:4; 15:14; 21: 12; Lam. 1:13; 2:3; Ezek. 22:31) and of JEALOUSY (cf. Deut. 4:24; Ps. 79:5; Ezek. 36:5 KJV; 38:19 KJV; Zeph. 3:8). As time went on, fire more and more took its place in the eschatological judgment. Beginnings can be seen in the cosmic destroying fire of Deut. 32:22; Job 28:5; Amos 7:4. In later prophecy, punishing fire has a definitely eschatological flavor (cf. Isa. 33:11; 50:11; 66:24; Ezek. 38:22; 39:6; Zeph. 1:18). In apocalyptic, particularly of the Pseudep., we have almost a theology of fiery judgment (cf. the abyss of fire [Enoch 18:11; 90:23-26; see GEHENNA]; fire of judgment [Dan. 7:11; Enoch 10:6; 21:7; 67:13; 91:9; 100:9; 102:1; 108:3; III Bar. 4:16; II Bar. 48:39, 43; Jth. 16:17; Test. Judah 25:3; cf. Sibylline Oracles 4:43; IV Macc. 9:9; 12:12]). Likewise the NT frequently cites fire as an element of judgment (cf. Matt. 3:10, 12; 5:22; 13:40; 18:8-9; 25:41; Mark 9:43-48; Luke 17:29; II Pet. 3:7; Jude 23; Rev. 8:7; 9:18; 11:5; 14:10; 19:20; 20:9-15; 21:8). Whether this is dependent on Persian influence cannot finally be determined. See DAY OF JUDGMENT; DAY OF THE LORD; ESCHATOLOGY.

b. Fire as purification. Just as the fire of altar and sacrifice denotes purification of sin, so the fire metaphor has this meaning. The experience of history is sometimes seen as purification by fire, particularly in the Babylonian exile (Ps. 66:12; Isa. 43:2), but this purification may be in vain (Jer. 6:29; Ezek. 22:20-21; 24:12). Certainly the Day of Yahweh will purify Israel (Zech. 13:9; Mal. 3:2; 4:1—H 3:19). This motif finds more expression in the NT (cf. I Cor. 3: 13, 15; I Pet. 1:7; Rev. 3:18), and the references to "baptism by fire" (Matt. 3:11; Luke 3:16; 12:49) would appear to have the same thrust (see REFINING; BAPTISM). Fire, as the metaphor of God's holiness, may destroy or it may purge. It does not leave man comfortably alone.

Bibliography. C. M. Edsman, Le baptême de feu (1946); Ignis Divinis: le feu comme moyen de rajeunissement et d'immortalité; contes, légendes, mythes et rites (1949). E. M. GOOD FIREBRAND [אוד (1 below); זקים, brands or sparks (2 below)]. 1. A word used metaphorically by Isaiah: two angry kings are derisively described as "smoldering stumps of firebrands" (Isa. 7:4). "Brand" is the translation in Amos 4:11; Zech. 3:2: Israel is a "brand plucked out of the burning."

2. An object thrown by a madman (Prov. 26:18; cf. Isa. 50:11).

3. KJV form of TORCH in Judg. 15:4.

F. T. SCHUMACHER

FIREPAN [מחתה, from חתה, to rake together]. A pan for raking and carrying live coals to and from the altar; made of bronze (Exod. 27:3; 38:3) or, less probably, of pure gold (I Kings 7:50=II Chr. 4:22). It was a part of the altar equipment and was used in connection with the sacrifices (Num. 4:14; II Kings 25:15=Jer. 52:19). When incense was dropped on the live coals, the pan became a CENSER (Lev. 10:1; 16:12; Num. 16:6, 17-18, 37-39). It was also used with the SNUFFERS of the lampstand, evidently to serve as a "tray" (KJV "snuffdish") for disposing of burned portions of the wicks (Exod. 25:38; 37:23; Num. 4:9). J. L. MIHELIC

FIRKIN fûr'kĭn. KJV translation of μετρητής (RSV converts into gallons) in John 2:6. A measure of ca. ten gallons. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES § C4*o*.

FIRMAMENT. The traditional English rendering, following the LXX στερέωμα and the Vulg. firmamentum, of the term רקיע, used in Gen. 1:6-7 and elsewhere to denote the expanse stretched across the sky in order to separate the upper and lower waters.

The Hebrew term means properly a "strip of beaten metal" (cf. Exod. 39:3; Num. 17:3; Jer. 10:9; Shek. 9*b;* Phoen. CIS I, 90) and harks back to the conception of the sky as a mirrorlike surface—a conception which recurs in Job 37:18, and which finds a classical counterpart in the common Homeric expression "brazen heaven" (Iliad V.504; XVII.425; Odyssey III.2; Pindar Pythian Odes X.22, Nemean Odes VI.3). The picture is elaborated in Job 26:13, where the movement of winds across the sky is represented as God's breathing on its surface in order to polish it.

See also HEAVEN. T. H. GASTER

FIRST AND LAST [ראשון ואחרון]. A title used by Second Isaiah (Isa. 41:4; 44:6; 48:12; cf. 40:28; 43:10-11) to express Yahweh's eternal majesty and power. The prophet of the Exile does not think of Eternity in abstract and nonhistorical terms, but presses temporal language to its utter limits by saying concretely:

> Before me no god was formed, > nor shall there be any after me
> (Isa. 43:10).

The title ὁ πρῶτον καὶ ὁ ἔσχατον appears in Rev. 1:17; 2:8; 22:13; cf. 1:11.

See also GOD, NAMES OF, § D4*c*.

B. W. ANDERSON

FIRST FRUITS [בכורים; ἀπαρχή]. The sacrifice offered by the Hebrews for the redemption of the annual crop. Early Semitic peoples held that, inasmuch as the Deity was the creator of all living things, vegetable, animal, and human, they belonged primarily to him, and therefore were endowed with the quality of sanctity, were "holy" (קדוש). Accordingly, use of them by men for any purpose was tantamount to violation of the Deity's prior rights in them and would entail divine retribution. Yet, as these things were indispensable to the existence of men, a way had to be found to make possible the termination of this state of sanctity or taboo and the transfer to the condition of profane existence and use of these various forms of life: the use of grain, vegetables, and fruits, and also of the flesh of animals, as food; and likewise the admission of children, at the proper age, into clan or tribe membership, activities, and obligations. The principle prevailed that the sacrifice to the Deity, the giving back to him, of a part, and particularly the first, and presumably therefore the best, part, of the tabooed object "redeemed" (חדה) the remainder, nullified the Deity's prior property rights to it, and rendered it "profane" (חול), free for ordinary use by men and for participation in the normal activities of the clan or tribe. Such redemption sacrifices of the annual crop were known as "first fruits," of animals as "firstlings," and of human beings as "first-born."

First fruits were regularly offered in ancient Israel at the annual Festival of Weeks (Exod. 34:22; Lev. 23:15-22; Num. 28:26; Deut. 16:9-12; see WEEKS, FEAST OF), known originally as the Festival of the Harvest (Exod. 23:16). It was celebrated originally upon the day following the completion of the seventh week—i.e., upon the fiftieth day, after the cutting of the first sheaf of the new crop, at the close of the grain harvest. Originally this day of cutting the first sheaf followed immediately the seventh and final day of the Unleavened Bread Festival and, in the earliest calendar current in ancient Israel was celebrated as the NEW YEAR. In the latest calendar of Bible times these fifty days were reckoned from the second day of the PASSOVER AND FEAST OF UNLEAVENED BREAD, and so the festival fell upon the sixth of the month Sivan. Such is the dating of this festival in the official Jewish calendar today.

In the NT the term "first fruits" is used figuratively (Rom. 8:23; 11:16; 16:5; I Cor. 15:20, 23; 16:15; Jas. 1:18; Rev. 14:4). J. MORGENSTERN

FIRST-BORN [בכור, בכורה, בבירה; LXX and NT πρωτότοκος, cf. ἀπαρχή]. That which first opens the womb (פטר רחם). The ancient Semites believed the first-born belonged to the deity and were to be sacrificed to him. The Hebrews related this offering to the exodus event. Within the family and tribal spheres a certain preferential status, preciousness, sanctity, authority, sovereignty, responsibility, and right of succession accrued to the first-born. In a figurative sense the term was applied to Israel, the king, the Messiah, and in the NT to Jesus.

1. Right of the first-born
2. Offering of firstlings
3. Human sacrifice
4. Figurative meaning
5. Jesus as first-born
Bibliography

1. Right of the first-born. The term "first-born" (בכור) is used predominantly in the OT to designate the eldest son (e.g., Gen. 10:15; 22:21; Exod. 6:14; Num. 3:2; cf. גדול, "eldest," in Gen. 44:12; I Sam. 17:28). While the prerogatives of the first-born are basically those of sanctity, the emphasis on ancestry, family, and inheritance among the Hebrews gave a special distinction to the first-born son. As the first strength of the father, he became the next head of the family (or clan or tribe), and embodied the soul and character of the social group, becoming responsible for its continuance and welfare. As such he acted with a certain authority, felt a greater responsibility (cf. Reuben; Gen. 37:22), and received a preferential treatment (cf. Gen. 43:33). As his BIRTHRIGHT he had claims on the family BLESSING (cf. Gen. 27:1-4, 35-37) and received a double portion of the family inheritance (Deut. 21:17; cf. ANET 185, 220, for a similar allotment in the Middle Assyrian Laws, Tablet B, no. 1, and the Nuzi-Akkadian Laws, no. 3). In the Code of Hammurabi, while all sons seem to share equally, the first-born is at times given a special present (ANET 173, no. 165) or a preferential share (ANET 173, no. 170); note that Elisha asks to be Elijah's successor by laying claim to this right (II Kings 2:9). It was perhaps a father's privilege to pass by the first-born for a younger son (e.g., Isaac [Gen. 17:19-21]; Ephraim [Gen. 48:13-20]; Solomon as king [I Kings 1:32-37; cf. II Sam. 3:3; II Chr. 21:3]; Shimri as clan chief [I Chr. 26:10]), but custom frowned on the procedure, and later Deuteronomic law banished the practice (Deut. 21:15-17).

In the case of Levirate MARRIAGE the first-born was considered heir of the deceased brother.

With regard to daughters, the term "first-born" (בכירה) refers simply to the elder (Gen. 19:31, 33, 37; I Sam. 14:49). Laban gives it as a Mesopotamian custom that the eldest daughter is to be married first (cf. Gen. 29:26).

2. Offering of firstlings. From pre-Canaanite days, Israel acknowledged the first-born to belong to God (Exod. 22:29*b*-30 E; 34:19-20 J; cf. 13:1-2 P), as Head of the Tribe or Giver of Fertility—later, no doubt, as Lord (בעל) of the Land (cf. Pss. 24:1; 50: 10, 12). The firstlings of domestic animals were offered to the deity at the spring pastoral festival (at the yeaning period) by a sacrifice and communal meal (see SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS). The first-born possessed a peculiar sanctity and efficacy, and, when offered to the deity, guaranteed the fertility and continuity of the flock or herd, and released the remainder from taboo so they could be appropriated. There is possibly a relationship between this spring festival and the wilderness sacrifice of the Exodus account (Exod. 3:18; 5:3; 8:27; cf. 10:25), as well as the later Passover celebration (Exod. 34:18-20, 25-26; see also FIRST FRUITS). Subsequently the offering of firstlings was given new meaning in the context of the exodus faith (Exod. 13:14-15 J; Deut. 15:19-20 D).

In the early days of Palestinian existence the firstlings of flock and herd were sacrificed at the local sanctuary (the eighth day; Exod. 22:29*b*-30 E), and the worshiper partook of the meal. The firstling of an ass was to be redeemed with a lamb or have its neck broken (i.e., blood was not to be shed as taboo; Exod. 13:11-13; 34:19*b*, 20, J). In the Deuteronomic regulations the sacrifice was to be an unblemished animal (not previously worked or shorn, since sacred), offered perhaps yearly at the central sanctuary, with the meal eaten by the owner and his household. The blemished were not to be sacrificed, but eaten in the towns (Deut. 15:19-23). In the Priestly Code the sacrifices became the property of the priest. Unclean animals were redeemed when a month old at five shekels (Num. 18:15-18), or at valuation plus a fifth; if not redeemed, they were to be sold by the priest at valuation (Lev. 27:26). When the Levites took the place of the first-born of Israel (Num. 3:12; 8:16), possibly all firstling domestic animals were to be redeemed for a price (cf. Num. 3:41). At this period the offering became a virtual tax or tribute, and not only the first-born, but also a tithe of herd and flock, were considered to belong to Yahweh (Lev. 27:32; cf. Tob. 5:13) and consequently to the priests.

3. Human sacrifice. How the first-born of man was offered to Yahweh is not certain—on occasion, perhaps, as a sacrifice. Human sacrifice does not seem to have been unknown, or especially revolting, to Israel in the early days (Gen. 22:2-3; Judg. 11: 34-39; II Sam. 21:9; cf. Ezek. 20:26). But the practice does not seem to have been widespread and was soon abandoned (cf. Gen. 22, which vindicates the substitution of a ram for human first-born; see also Exod. 13:13, 15; 34:20, J). It is quite possible many first-born sons were devoted to the Lord for service as priests, before there was an ordered priesthood (cf. I Sam. 1:11, 22).

In the law codes of Israel, first-born sons were to be redeemed—originally, perhaps, by a ram (cf. Gen. 22:9-13), and later for five shekels (Num. 3:47; 18: 16, P). When the Levites became the Lord's instead of the first-born (Num. 3:46-47; 18:15-18), all first-born were perhaps to be redeemed. Here sanctity disappeared and tribute became exacted.

There was a revival of human sacrifice in the time of Ahaz (II Kings 16:3; cf. II Chr. 28:3) and Manasseh (II Chr. 33:6), with piacular significance (cf. II Kings 17:31; Ezek. 16:21; Mic. 6:7). A high place (Tophet) in the Valley of Hinnom (cf. GEHENNA) became the scene of infant sacrifices to Molech prior to the Exile (II Chr. 28:3; Jer. 7:31; 19:5-6; cf. Isa. 30: 33[?]). How much of this pertained to the first-born is uncertain; some, probably. One notes that in the days of Ahab, Mesha the Moabite king offered his first-born as a burnt offering on the wall in order to rid his country of Israelites (II Kings 3:27). Much has been made of infant remains found at Gezer and Taanach as evidence of first-born sacrifice, but the evidence is inconclusive. Foundation and wall sacrifices of human beings were certainly known. At times these involved the first-born (II Kings 3:27; cf. I Kings 16:34[?]).

The prophets spoke out against this revival in no uncertain terms (cf. Jer. 7:30-34; 19:4-9; 44:6-10; Ezek. 16:20, 27), emphasizing that it had no expiatory value in the sight of God (Mic. 6:7) and was instrumental in bringing about the downfall of the nation (Jer. 44:6, 22).

4. Figurative meaning. In a figurative sense the word "first-born" is used to designate a special quality or strength, the first of a thing being the strongest (cf. "first-born of death" [Job 18:13], a deadly disease; "first-born of the poor" [Isa. 14:30], the poorest).

The term also implies a special close relationship, affection, authority, and sovereignty as the preferential heir. In this sense Israel is called Yahweh's first-born (Exod. 4:22; Pss. Sol. 18:4; II Esd. 6:58); the seed of David, the highest of kings (Ps. 89:27), interpreted by the rabbis as referring to the Messiah.

5. Jesus as first-born. In the NT the term is applied chiefly to Jesus, who is called the first-born of Mary (Matt. 1:25; Luke 2:7), with the emphasis probably more on previous virginity than on later childbearing.

When the word is figuratively applied to Jesus, it implies a certain preferential status and closeness to God, even as Israel in the OT (Heb. 1:6: God's first-born); a certain priority over, and oneness with, men, in inaugurating the new life (Col. 1:18; Rev. 1:5: "first-born of the dead"; cf. I Cor. 15:20: "the first fruits [ἀπαρχή] of those who have fallen asleep"; Rom. 8:29: "the first-born among many brethren"); a certain dignity and sovereignty as heir and destined ruler of all (Col. 1:15: "first-born of all creation"). This uniqueness in relation to God and oneness with men is expressed also by the use of "Son" (υἱός; John 1:34, 49, etc.) and "only Son" (μονογενής; John 1:14, 18; 3:16, 18) in the Fourth Gospel.

In one instance in the NT the term has a historical reference to the exodus event (Heb. 11:28). The phrase "assembly of the first-born" (12:23) refers to the departed faithful, who stand in a peculiar and special relation to God as though first-born sons. Such is the blessing of salvation; it makes one fellow heir with Christ, who is the first-born of God.

Bibliography. J. Wellhausen, Prolegomena to the History of Israel (trans. J. S. Black and A. Menzies; 1885), pp. 83-92, 102. R. A. S. Macalister, "Excavation of Gezer," PEQ (1903). J. B. Lightfoot, St. Paul's Epistles to the Colossians and Philemon (1912), pp. 140-56. G. B. Gray, Sacrifice in the OT (1925), pp. 33-36, 86-93. W. R. Smith, The Religion of the Semites (3rd ed., 1927), pp. 458-65, 688-92. J. Pedersen, Israel, I-II (1926), 193, 258-59; III-IV (1947). I. Mendelsohn, "On the Preferential Status of the Eldest Son," BASOR, no. 156 (Dec., 1959), pp. 38-39.

V. H. Kooy

FIRSTLING. See Sacrifice and Offerings.

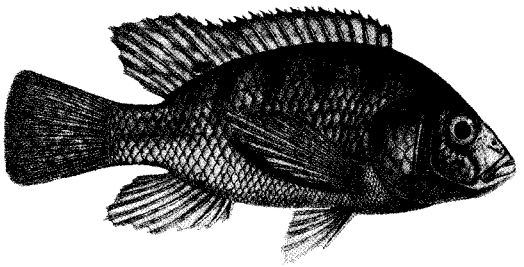
* FIRST-RIPE [בכור, בכורה, ראשית] (Num. 13:20; 18:13; Isa. 28:4 [KJV HASTY]; Jer. 24:2; Mic. 7:1; Nah. 3:12). An adjective describing the fruits, vegetables, and grains which ripen first and are a token of the coming harvest. The first-ripe fruits, like the First-born (usually of men, though sometimes of animals) and the Firstlings (always of animals), were to be offered to God, the Creator of all life. The offering of the first-ripe fruits figured prominently in the corporate worship of Israel (Lev. 23:9-21) and in individual worship (Exod. 23:19; Deut. 26:1-11). The term "first-ripe" or "First Fruits" (ἀπαρχή) was used metaphorically by several NT writers and came to have popular theological connotations (Rom. 8: 23; 11:16; 16:15; I Cor. 15:20, 23; 16:15; Jas. 1:18; Rev. 14:4).



See also Sacrifice and Offerings; Worship in the OT.

H. F. Beck

FISH [דג (דאג in Neh. 13:16), דגה, cf. Ugar. dg; נפש, wrongly rendered "fish" in Isa. 19:10 KJV; ἰχθῦς, ἰχθύς; ἰχθύδιον (Matt. 15:34; Mark 8:7), diminutive of the preceding; ὀψάριον (only in John), diminutive of ὄψον, cooked food, relish, fish]. The Bible makes no distinction among the many species of fish in the Mediterranean and in the fresh waters of Palestine. They were all "fish" (דג or דגה) to the ancient Hebrews.

A. Kinds of fish
1. Cichlidae
2. Cyprinidae
3. Siluridae
B. Literary allusions and symbolism
1. In the Bible
2. In the Mishna
3. In ancient symbolism
a. Pagan
b. Jewish
c. Early Christian
Bibliography

A. KINDS OF FISH. Since the NT makes reference to fishing on the Sea of Galilee, it is of interest to mention the main species of fish which are to be found there.

12. Tilapia (Chronis Simonis)

13. Clarias (Cabites Insignis)

1. Cichlidae. This is the musht of the Arabs, a family of mouth-breeding fishes of Ethiopic origin. Here belong Tilapia galilaea Art., Tilapia nilotoca L., Tristramella sacra Gthr., etc. Fig. FIS 12.

2. Cyprinidae. Among these are the bigger species of the carp family which belong to the barbels (Barbus), with two common species (B. canis C. V., B. longiceps C. V.), and a number of Varicorhinus species, as well as the small Acanthrobrama terrae-sanctae H. St., called "sardines."

3. Siluridae. This is the catfish, *Clarias lazera C. V. It may reach large size. It is this fish that Josephus recognized as present also in the Nile, and so he presumed a subterranean connection with the Nile. Fig. FIS 13.

All fish with fins and scales were regarded as clean, but those without them were regarded unclean (Lev. 11:9-12). Among the unclean fish in the Sea of Galilee is the catfish, in the coastal waters the eel, and in the Mediterranean probably sharks, rays, and lampreys.

The fish brought from Tyre and Sidon were, of course, preserved by being salted, dried, or pickled.

Thus we find on Lake Tiberias (Sea of Galilee) in the days of Herod a town Tarichaea, whose name indicates it was a center for the preservation of fish, and there was naturally a big fish industry there (cf. ταριχεία, "pickling," "seasoning," and τάριχος, "fish" dried, pickled, or salted).

Among the gates of Jerusalem there was a fish gate. See JERUSALEM § 7*b*. See also FISHER.

F. S. BODENHEIMER

B. LITERARY ALLUSIONS AND SYMBOLISM. Fish, which were found in great variety in the waters of the Holy Land, figured in many ways in the life and thought of its people.

1. In the Bible. Fish, whose flesh Paul recognized as different from that of other creatures (I Cor. 15: 39), were created by God (Gen. 1:20-22) and are subject to his will (Isa. 50:2; Ezek. 38:20; Zeph. 1:3). They are often grouped with birds, cattle, and creeping things, to constitute the fauna of the OT (Gen. 1:26; Job 12:7-8; etc.), and as such they were one of the subjects of Solomon's discourses (I Kings 4:33). Over the fish, as over all other subhuman life, man is to exercise dominion (Gen. 1:28; Ps. 8:6-8—H 8:7-9). In the general prohibition of graven images in Deut. 4:15-18, the "likeness of any fish" is included.

The fish of Egypt (Ezek. 29:4-5) are also mentioned in the OT, (a) as eaten by the Hebrews during their sojourn in the land (Num. 11:5), and (b) as victims of the first plague in Moses' time (Exod. 7:18, 21; Ps. 105:29).

In Ezekiel's picture of the Lord's glorious future for Israel, the life-giving river flowing from the temple is to sweeten the waters of the Dead Sea so that fish will abound there (Ezek. 47:7-10).

There are three literary fish in the Scriptures: the great fish of the book of Jonah; the fish that met Tobias at the Tigris River, and whose internal organs served Tobias so well (Tob. 6:1-5, etc.); the fish that paid the temple tax for Jesus and Peter (Matt. 17:27).

The Bible makes very slight use of fish as a figure of speech. In Eccl. 9:12; Hab. 1:14 man's helplessness in the world is compared to that of fish taken in a net. In Matt. 13:47-48 the variety of fish which a large net will bring to shore serves to characterize the kingdom of heaven.

2. In the Mishna. Clean fish (unclean fish caught in fishing may be sold [Sheb. 7.4]) may be cooked in milk and served with cheese (Hull. 8.1), and they may also be cooked with leeks (M. Sh. 2.1) and eaten with eggs (Bez. 2.1). Some fish were salted (Ned. 6.3), and others were evidently pickled, for fish brine is referred to (Ter. 11.1; Ned. 6.4; A.Z. 2.6). Some cured or pickled fish were seemingly imported from both Egypt and Spain (Maksh. 6.3). One variety of brine (muryês or muryîs), to which wine was sometimes added, was used as a sauce and as a preservative (cf. A.Z. 2.4). Fish oil could be put in lamps (Shab. 2.2), and the skins of some fish were used for various domestic purposes (Kel. 10.1; 16.1; 24.11).

3. In ancient symbolism. a. Pagan. Fish are frequently introduced into ancient art to give a realistic touch to water scenes. Often, however, a fish appears in a composition without any obvious appropriateness, and in such cases it would seem to have symbolic significance, possibly to represent deity, power, fecundity, etc.

In the dynastic period of Egypt, several kinds of fish appear to have been worshiped or venerated—e.g., at Oxyrrhynchus, Seth was worshiped in the form of a sharp-nosed fish; the ʿbḏw fish occurs in a number of mythological and magical texas.

The fish appears in designs on painted pottery found in the excavations of Canaanite cities, especially ca. 1500 B.C., along with dove, snake, stag, goat, palm-tree, and other motifs. Pl. XX.

In Assyrian religion, Ea was sometimes represented by a fabulous monster with the body of a fish, and the exorcist-priest wore on occasion a garment like a fish skin.

A ninth-eighth-century Babylonian seal shows a large fish upright between two men (see bibliography).

In the Persian age, Xenophon refers to the sacred fish of the Chalus River in Syria (Anabasis I.4). Some centuries later, Lucian's account of the goddess Derceto (half woman, half fish), and of certain sacred fish, at least testifies to the perpetuation in Syria of this old veneration of the fish (The Syrian Goddess 14).

b. Jewish. Jewish artists and craftsmen made a limited use of the fish (see bibliography). Doubtless, in some cases the fish was employed as a conventional decorative detail; in others, the past association of fish with various cultic practices may have established it popularly as a kind of talisman.

c. Early Christian. It is probable that the considerations mentioned in § 3*b above* account in part for the appearance of the fish in the art of the oldest Christian catacombs. How early the Greek word for "fish" (ἰχθύς) came to be interpreted as a cipher for "Jesus Christ, Son of God, Savior" (Ἰησοῦς Χριστός Θεοῦ Υἱός Σωτήρ), we do not know; but once this identification was made, the fish became a standard Christian symbol. Fig. ACR 3. See bibliography.

Bibliography. On pagan symbolism: A. Moortgat, Vorderasiatische Rollsiegel (1940), no. 687; cf. E. D. Van Buren, The Fauna of Ancient Mesopotamia as Represented in Art (1939), pp. 104-8.

On Jewish symbolism: E. R. Goodenough, Jewish Symbols in the Greco-Roman Period (1953), especially vol. II, nos. 11, 84, 261, 371, 380, 545, 635, 897, 900, 914.

On early Christian symbolism: J. Finegan, Light from the Ancient Past (1946), pp. 382-83.

W. S. MCCULLOUGH

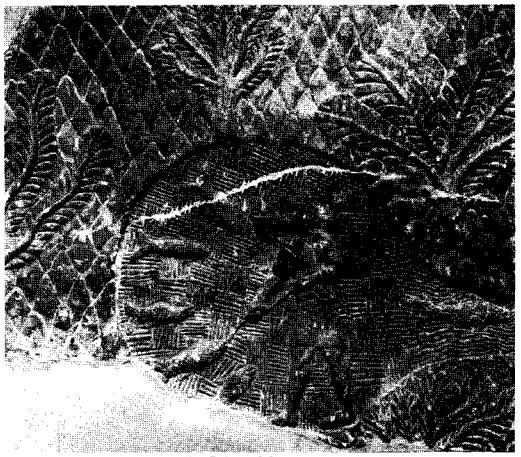
FISH GATE [שער הדגים]. A gate of Jerusalem mentioned in connection with the Mishneh or SECOND QUARTER (Zeph. 1:10) and the fortifications of Manasseh (II Chr. 33:14). The Fish Gate was restored by Nehemiah (Neh. 3:3; 12:39). See map under NEHEMIAH.

See also JERUSALEM § 7*b*.

G. A. BARROIS

FISHHOOK. The translation of two words:

a) חכה (Aram. חכתא; KJV HOOK) in Job 41:1—H 40:25 (HOOK in Isa. 19:8; Hab. 1:15; KJV ANGLE).



b) סיר דוגה (Amos 4:2).

FISHING. This work may be for pleasure, profit, or provision. The kings of Egypt engaged in fishing for sport. In the early days of Israel the Phoenicians were the fishers. Again after the Babylonian exile, Tyrians monopolized the fishing industry (Neh. 13:

16). The Philistines called their god Dagon, perhaps reflecting in this name their interest in fishing (I Sam. 5:4).

There is no evidence that the Israelites engaged in fishing for pleasure or sport. To them it was hard work. The job, in addition to catching the fish, included salting and peddling the fish, as well as mending nets and sails and keeping the boats in repair (Ezek. 26:5; Matt. 4:21). Fishermen brought the fish to market in baskets. There was a fish gate and possibly a fish market in Jerusalem (II Chr. 33:14). The fish brought as far as Jerusalem were probably dried and salted. There were similar markets in other large cities such as Athens. The fishermen often worked together in bands or guilds (Job 41:6; Luke 5:10). They sometimes worked at night (Luke 5:5; John 21:3). Fishing was done in the Nile (Isa. 19:8), the Mediterranean (Neh. 13:16), the Sea of Galilee (Matt. 4:18), the Jordan, Lake Huleh, the Orontes, the Tigris and Euphrates, and the Aegean Sea.

Several methods of fishing are noted in the Bible (Hab. 1:15). Fishhooks (חכה) have been used from prehistoric times in Palestine and Egypt. Bone fishhooks were found in Natufian settlements. Iron fishhooks occur in the time of Solomon at Ezion-geber. Hooks were still in use in NT times (ἄγκιστρον; Matt. 17:27). The mythical beast LEVIATHAN could not be caught by hooks (Job 41:1-7). This passage and Amos 4:2 suggest that originally a thorn (סיר) was the fishhook. The hook and line are noted in Isa. 19:8. There is no mention of a fishing rod. There were two types of fish nets. One was thrown by hand (Eccl. 9:12), usually while the fisherman was standing on the shore (Ezek. 47:10). Perhaps Peter and Andrew used this method, while the sons of Zebedee used the dragnet (Matt. 4:18, 21; ἀμφίβληστρον δίκτυον). A larger net was used from the boats (Luke 5:4-7) and was operated like a sieve from a circle of boats closing in to one another or to the shore (σαγήνη; Matt. 13:47). The spear (צלצל) or the barbed harpoon (שכה) was used from prehistoric times (Job 41:7, 26).

Courtesy of the Trustees of the British Museum

14. Assyrian fishing with a line, from a monument of Nineveh, from the time of Sennacherib (704-681 B.C.)

Courtesy of Staatliche Museen, Berlin

15. Three fishermen pull lines of net, from a tomb relief of Ra-hotep, Fourth Dynasty (2650-2500 B.C.).

Metaphorically the symbol of fishing is used for captive Israel (Eccl. 9:12; Ezek. 29:4; Hab. 1:14). The judgment of God against Israel is as if many fishermen and hunters have been sent out to catch the rebellious people (Jer. 16:16; Ezek. 47:10). The LXX in the Jeremiah passage uses "avengers" for fishers.

Jesus performed miracles of fishing (Luke 5:1 ff; John 21:1 ff), not to mention the feeding of the five thousand (John 6:1 ff). In the NT many of the disciples were fishermen (Matt. 4:18, 21; Mark 1:16; Luke 5:2). By a metaphor the entire NT mission is a fishing operation. The disciples and all succeeding them are called by Jesus to be "fishers of men" (Matt. 4:19; Mark 1:17; Luke 5:10; cf. Jer. 16:16). These men accepted Jesus' call and apparently gave up all their investment in equipment and customary fishing rights. The Christian anagram ἰχθύς forms a confession based on "Jesus Christ, God's only Son," and the symbol of the fish is consonant with this Christian commission to be fishers of men.

Figs. FIS 14-15. C. U. WOLF

FITCHES. KJV translation of כסמים (RSV SPELT) in Ezek. 4:9 and of קצח (RSV DILL) in Isa. 28:25, 27. "Fitch" is an archaic form for the common "vetch," a leguminous plant of the Vicia genus, of which many species are found in Bible lands. Vicia ervilia L., called in Arabic kirsannah, is identified by some botanists as the kussemeṭ of the OT. It is a vetch used today for camel fodder, but hardly suits the biblical references. It is doubtful if vetch was present in Bible times.

See also FLORA § A6*c*; SPICE.

Bibliography. H. N. and A. L. Moldenke, Plants of the Bible (1952), pp. 152-53. J. C. TREVER

FLAG. KJV translation of אחו (RSV "reed") in Job 8:11 and of סוף (RSV "reed") in Exod. 2:3, 5; Isa. 19:6. Both these words refer to a kind of REED or grass which grows by rivers and lakes.

אחו ('āḥû,) appears also in Gen. 41:2, 18 (KJV "meadow"), and probably in Hos. 13:15 ('āḥîm; KJV "brethren"). Zohary (see FLORA § A11) favors the translation "meadow" for 'āḥû, but in Job 8:11 the parallelism with gōmê (see PAPYRUS) indicates that a marsh reed or grass is meant. The LXX translates 'āḥû here with βούτομον, which perhaps led Moldenke and Post to suggest the Butomus umbellatus L., the flowering RUSH (cf. Liddell, Scott, and Jones, A Greek-English Lexicon, where βούτομον is identified with Carex riparia Curt., a sedge). But in Gen. 41:2, 18, the LXX transliterates the Hebrew, apparently intending the more general "reed grass." "Marsh grass" or "reed grass" would probably be better for all these passages.

סוף (sûph) in the OT usually occurs in the phrase yam sûph, "Sea of Reeds," which the LXX translated thálassa 'eruthrá (RED SEA; Exod. 10:19; etc.); but in Exod. 2:3, 5; Isa. 19:6, sûph alone seems to mean "reed" or "rush" (cf. Jonah 2:5—H 2:6; see WEEDS 3). The general meaning seems to be intended rather than a particular species, but probably includes the cattail, Typha angustata Bery et Choub.

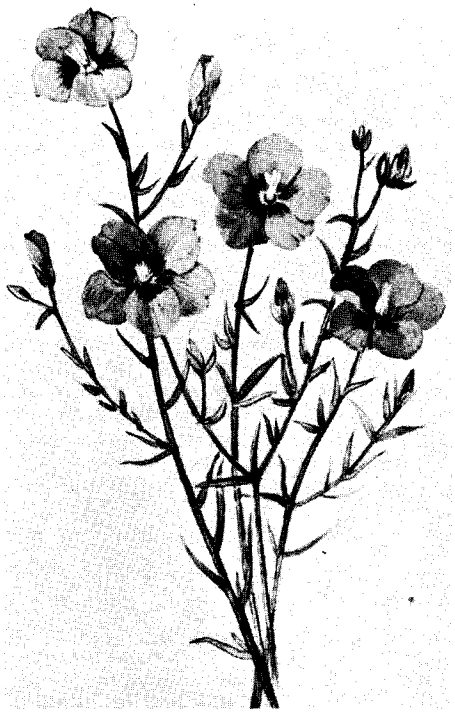
J. C. TREVER

FLAGON. A large wine pitcher. In the KJV of Isa. 22:24, "flagons" is a good translation of נבלים. In other KJV passages, however, the word translated "flagons" (אשישה) is now known to be a "cake of raisins," as in the RSV (II Sam. 6:19; I Chr. 16:3; Song of S. 2:5; Hos. 3:1). Where the RSV uses "flagon" (Exod. 25:29; 37:16; Num. 4:7; Isa. 22:24), the term is a good translation. J. L. KELSO

FLAGSTAFF. The translation of תרן in Isa. 30:17 (KJV "beacon"). Elsewhere the word is translated "mast" (Isa. 33:23; Ezek. 27:5).



FLASK. A term used in the RSV to refer to four different vessels. In the story of the wise and foolish virgins, it was a small-sized oil juglet (ἀγγεῖον; Matt. 25:4; KJV "vessel"). In the anointing of Jehu (II Kings 9:1-3), it was a small perfume juglet (פך; KJV "box"). In Jer. 19:1 the flask (בקבק; KJV "bottle") was a water decanter used on the tables of better-class homes. Its narrow neck made it impossible to mend the vessel. In Luke 7:37 the term is ἀλάβαστρον, "alabaster flask" (KJV "alabaster box"); it contained ointment with which the woman anointed Jesus.

Alabaster juglets were used for thousands of years as containers for the more expensive perfumes. By NT times glass was just coming in to replace alabaster. For pottery flasks, see Pls. XX-XXI. Fig. OIN 5.

J. L. KELSO

FLAX [פשתה, pištâ; פשתים, pištîm; Akkad. pištu; Punic phoist; λίνον]. A cultivated plant, Linum usitatissimum L., and some products made from it. The plant is referred to only in Exod. 9:31 (the flax crop of Egypt destroyed by hail); Josh. 2:6 (Rahab hid the spies under stalks of flax which were drying on the roof). Judg. 15:14 may refer to burning stalks of flax.

Elsewhere pištîm seems to refer to the combed fibers or spun thread already prepared for weaving, or finished linen cloth (Jer. 13:1; Ezek. 44:17-18; etc.; see LINEN). Samson snapped the new ropes by which he was bound, as though they were burned flax ropes (or stalks? Judg. 15:14). The good wife is one who gathers her wool and flax "and works with willing hands" (Prov. 31:13). Isaiah predicted the workers in combed flax would be in despair (Isa. 19:9). Ezekiel saw a man with a "line of flax and a measuring reed" (Ezek. 40:3). The harlot mother (Israel) received her wool and her flax from her lovers, and God would take them away (Hos. 2:5-9—H 2:7-11).

Courtesy of Winifred Walker

16. Flax

A lamp wick made from flax seems to be intended in Isa. 42:3 ("dimly burning wick"; KJV "smoking flax"; cf. Matt. 12:20). Armies and warriors "are extinguished, quenched like a wick" (Isa. 43:17) by the Lord.

The stalks of the flax plants are pulled when the seeds are ripe, dried, deseeded, then soaked ("retted") until the outer fibers are loosened. Again they are dried, after which the fibers are separated from the inner core by "hackling," then combed in preparation for spinning into thread. The short, tangled fibers which are left over from the combing are the "tow" (נערת) referred to in Judg. 16:9; Isa. 1:31. The tow makes a coarse yarn. Fig. HAR 7.

In the tenth-century-B.C. Gezer Calendar, the month of the harvest of flax is mentioned ("His month is pulling[?] of flax; see CALENDAR).

See also CLOTH; FLORA § A4; LINEN.

Fig. FLA 16.

Bibliography. I. Löw, Die Flora der Juden, II (1924), 210-16; H. N. and A. L. Moldenke, Plants of the Bible (1952), pp. 129-33. J. C. TREVER

FLEA [פרעש; Akkad. parša'u, paršu'u; Arab. barghût, flea, cf. barghash, mosquito] (I Sam. 24:14—H 24:15; 26:20 KJV [RSV "life," with LXX]). An insect (order Siphonaptera), wingless, but a powerful leaper. Many species are found in Palestine, including Pulex irritans, on man. David symbolically uses it to indicate his insignificance.

See also FAUNA § E1.

Bibliography. See bibliography under ANT.

W. W. FRERICHS

FLEET [אני] (I Kings 9:26-27; 10:11, 22); KJV NAVY OF SHIPS. See SHIPS AND SAILING; EZION-GEBER.

FLESH IN THE OT. The word used to translate two Hebrew words in the OT—viz., בשר and שאר, the latter being of rare occurrence compared with the former (LXX σάρξ, sometimes σώμα). The word בשר is probably connected with the Arabic bathar ("skin") and the Akkadian bišru ("flesh and blood," "blood relationship"), and may originally have meant the flesh next to the skin. The term שאר is connected with the Arabic tha'r ("blood," "blood revenge") and the Akkadian šîru ("flesh"), and may originally have meant the inner flesh which was full of blood.

1. Literal use. The word בשר (less often שאר) designates the soft, muscular part of the body of both men and animals. The flesh is thought of as dust which has been made alive (cf. Gen. 2:7; 7:22), but it is still called flesh, even when dead, until it returns as dust to the earth (Eccl. 12:7). Flesh can be used as food (Gen. 9:4; 40:19; II Kings 9:36).

2. Use by synecdoche. "Flesh" is the word Hebrew normally uses when reference has to be made to the body (Num. 19:7 KJV; I Kings 21:27; II Kings 4:34), though the phrase "flesh and bones" also occurs. Inasmuch as flesh is the outward manifestation of soul (נפש), it can have psychic functions, and the word can be used in the same way as "soul" or "heart" or "bones" of the whole person (e.g., "flesh faints" [Ps. 63:1—H 63:2]; "heart and flesh sing for joy" [Ps. 84:2—H 84:3]). By a further extension of usage, the phrase "all flesh" can denote living creatures, both animal and human, the nuance doubtless intended being their creaturely weakness (see Gen. 6:17; 7:16, 21; Ps. 136:25, of animals; Gen. 6:12; Ps. 145:21; Isa. 40:5-7; 49:26*b*; 66:23; Joel 2:28—H 3:1, of men). "Flesh" can be used euphemistically (Lev. 15:2-3, 7, 19 KJV; possibly also Ezek. 16:26 KJV; 23:20 KJV; 44:7, 9).

3. Use by metonymy. The word "flesh" can be used in connections where natural relationship is being spoken of. Adam says of the woman: "This at last is bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh" (Gen. 2:23). The unit of relationship may be the family (Gen. 2:24; 29:14), the township (Judg. 9:2), the people (II Sam. 5:1). Flesh almost stands for corporate personality.

4. Theological significance. The fact that "flesh," as just explained, was used to indicate different degrees of kinship, and, indeed, that "all flesh" could mean "humanity," could suggest that man was essentially a social being. This, of course, would not have been a sufficient basis for ethical conduct unless the individual was roused to a sense of his responsibility in relation to the group. Yet it did provide a natural basis for the recognition by the individual, constituted as such by God, that his obligation to obey God was inclusive of the obligation to serve his brother.

A number of passages make it plain that "flesh" to the Hebrew mind suggested "weakness," "frailty." In Gen. 6:3 the implication is that, because man is flesh, he is mortal (cf. Job 34:15). In Ps. 78:39, God excuses sin on the ground that men are flesh (cf. Ps. 103:12-16). In II Chr. 32:8, the arm of flesh of the king of Assyria—i.e., his weakness—is contrasted with God, who is all-powerful (cf. Job 10:4; Ps. 56:4; Jer. 17:5). In Isa. 31:3, flesh is contrasted with spirit as weakness with strength. Yet, while flesh in the OT is regarded as weak, it is not regarded, as in the NT, as also sinful. The nearest we get in the OT to the NT idea is in Ps. 78:39. Actually, the promise is made (Ezek. 11:19-20; 36:26-27) that men will receive a new spirit and a heart of flesh to replace their heart of stone so that they may obey God.

Bibliography. H. W. Robinson, The Christian Doctrine of Man (1911); E. de W. Burton, Spirit, Soul, and Flesh (1918), pp. 66-72; J. Pedersen, Israel, Its Life and Culture, I-II (1926), pp. 578 et passim; A. R. Johnson, The Vitality of the Individual in the Thought of Ancient Israel (1949), pp. 39-41; C. Ryder Smith, The Bible Doctrine of Man (1951), pp. 24-25; J. A. T. Robinson, The Body (1952), pp. 11-16. N. W. PORTEOUS

FLESH IN THE NT [σάρξ, κρέας]. The elementary meaning of "flesh" is the substance covering the bones of animals or man, but the word has numerous figurative meanings, as will be seen. Κρέας occurs only in Rom. 14:21; I Cor. 8:13, where it refers to flesh of sacrificed animals. But σάρξ is also often used in this sense, and it is the usual word for "flesh" in the NT. It is the ordinary translation of Hebrew words for "flesh" in the SEPTUAGINT.

1. To denote kinship
2. As a metonym for "man"
3. "Flesh and bones"
4. "Flesh and blood"
5. In Paul's vocabulary
6. As a euphemism
Bibliography

1. To denote kinship. Flesh enters into a common idiom in the OT to express blood kinship. One encounters it, e.g., in Gen. 2:23; Judg. 9:2; II Sam. 5:1; etc.; but the idiom was still used in the NT period, as indicated by Rom. 1:3; 9:3; 11:14.

2. As a metonym for "man." One of the most frequent uses of "flesh" was as a metonym for "man," especially when man was thought of as a frail being in contrast with God. The word occurs in the OT in such passages as Gen. 6:12; II Chr. 32:8; Isa. 40:5; Jer. 17:5; but it is equally familiar in the NT, as in Matt. 24:22; Mark 13:20; I Pet. 1:24. But the most famous example is John 1:14: "The Word became flesh," which means that the divine Logos became a human being.

3. "Flesh and bones." On the other hand, the essential differentiation between a man and a bodiless spirit was seen in the concept of flesh and bones. In Luke 24:36-43 the risen Christ challenges his doubting disciples: "Handle me, and see; for a spirit has not flesh and bones."

"Flesh and bones" was also an idiom in the OT to express kinship. One finds this, e.g., in Gen. 2:23; Judg. 9:2; II Sam. 19:12; but the idea occurs also in the NT period. The critical reading of Eph. 5:30 is: "We are members of his body," but a rejected reading adds: ". . . of his flesh and of his bones." This reading has enough age to be in the Syr. and Vulg. versions. It shows a survival of the Hebrew notion that the essence of a man is in his flesh and bones.

4. "Flesh and blood." "Flesh and blood" is also used in the NT, both as a metonym for "man" and to express kinship. This idiom does not appear in the OT. Apparently the first occurrences of it are Ecclus. 14:18; 17:31. It may be that this poet originated the expression. At any rate, it is frequent in later rabbinic writings and was to find extensive use in the NT.

We come upon the phrase as a metonym for "man" first in the famous words of Jesus in Matt. 16:17: "Blessed are you, Simon Bar-Jona! For flesh and blood has not revealed this to you." But if we keep in mind the date when Matthew was written, rather than the time when Jesus spoke the words, we have to say that they occur first in Paul, who also had a gift for colorful language. In Gal. 1:16, Paul says: "I did not confer with flesh and blood." In Eph. 6:12 he remarks: "We are not contending against flesh and blood." These passages from Paul use "flesh and blood" as a metonym for "human being." But in I Cor. 15:50 ("Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God") and Heb. 2:14, the idiom is a metonym for the "physical body."

"Flesh and blood" is used to express the idea of kinship in the NT interpretation of the Lord's Supper, although this is along spiritual lines. Either symbolically or really, the bread and wine are believed to become the flesh and blood of Christ. As Jesus says in John 6:53: "Unless you eat the flesh of the Son of man and drink his blood, you have no life in you." The idea appears to be that the very essence of the life of Christ is found in his flesh and blood, and that the disciple is able to participate in this divine life by means of the sacrament. So flesh and blood have become the basis of kinship in the new spiritual family of faith, and the elements which were before only a simple but colorful metonym have now acquired a transcendental, theological meaning.

5. In Paul's vocabulary. Paul provides one of the most interesting developments in the meaning of "flesh" in his triangular analysis of the INNER MAN in Rom. 7:7-25. This is one of the most picturesque and significant phases of the NT doctrine of man (see MAN, NATURE OF [NT]). Paul views the self as having three elements: reason, which is the seat of God's law; the flesh, out of which lawless desire rises; and the ego or "I" in control of the will, which must choose between the law of God and the lawless desires of the flesh. He elaborates the concept of the flesh as the seat of desire again in Gal. 5:16-24. His thinking about personality is reflected in the school of depth psychology associated with Sigmund Freud and his followers. According to Paul, man is in bondage to the flesh, from which he can be delivered only by the grace of God through Christ. Freud analyzed the self into a trinity of the ego, superego, and id, to the latter of which he said man is enslaved.

Paul's view has slight affinity with anything in the OT. Its kinship is closer to that of Philo (On the Giants 29), who speaks of the flesh as the chief cause of ignorance; and of Epicurus, who, according to Plutarch (Morals 135C), regards the flesh as the bearer of sinful feelings and desires—a view with which Plutarch himself appears to be in sympathy. The philosophical thought deriving from Plato, Orphism, and various Gnostic systems, as well as from later Manicheism and other ascetic ideas based on a distrust of the flesh, shows the mood to which Paul in his own way was giving expression. The sense of sin and desire for redemption were unique marks of the Hellenistic age in which he lived.

6. As a euphemism. "Flesh" is used as a euphemism for the male sex member in references to the rite of circumcision, both in the OT (Gen. 17:11, 14, 23-25) and in the Pauline language of Rom. 2:28; Eph. 2:11; Col. 2:13.

Bibliography. F. Brown, S. R. Driver, and C. A. Briggs, Hebrew-English Lexicon (1907); E. D. Burton, Commentary on Galatians (1921), pp. 492-95; M. Burrows, Outline of Biblical Theology (1946); J. Knox, Exegesis of Romans, IB, IX (1954), 491-504; W. Bauer, Greek-English Lexicon of the NT (1957).

S. V. MCCASLAND

FLESH POT [סיר הבשר]. Literally, a kettle (full) of meat. The Israelites in the wilderness spoke of sitting by the flesh pots and eating bread to the full while they were in Egypt (Exod. 16:3). This is a striking statement, for the Israelites are claiming that they had plenty of meat, as well as bread, to eat in Egypt! Meat, however, was not the poor man's diet.

J. L. KELSO

FLESH-HOOK. KJV translation of מזלג (RSV FORK).

FLINT [חלמיש (Ps. 114:8; Isa. 50:7; elsewhere usually FLINTY ROCK; cf. Akkad. elmēšu, diamond); צר ṣōr (cf. Akkad. ṣurru, flint; ṣurtu, flint knife; Arab. ẓarra, to cut)]. An impure variety of quartz. It breaks with a conchoidal fracture and is very hard. Flint artifacts were among mankind's earliest implements, and prehistoric cultures may be distinguished by flint types which can be stratigraphically dated. Flint instruments continued to be used after the introduction of metals.* They were used for many purposes—as scrapers, axes, knives, weapons, sickle blades, picks, awls, etc. (Fig. FLI 17.) See also PREHISTORY; WEAPONS AND IMPLEMENTS OF WAR; CIRCUMCISION. Fig. SIC 56.

From Garrod and Bate, The Stone Age of Mount Carmel (Oxford: Clarendon Press)

17. Lower Paleolithic flint instruments from Wadi el-Mugharah

The ṣōr in Exod. 4:25 (RSV mg. "knife"; KJV "sharp stone") is Zipporah's instrument for circumcising her son. "Knives of flint" (חרבות צרים) in Josh. 5:2-3 designate the flint instruments used by Joshua in circumcising the Israelites at Gilgal. In Isa. 5:28 (reading ṣōr for ṣar) the horses' hoofs are counted as flint. In Ezek. 3:9 ADAMANT is harder than flint. The Lord turns flint into a spring of water (Ps. 114:8)—an allusion to the exodus miracle (Deut. 8:15; cf. Exod. 17:6; Num. 20:8-11; Deut. 32:13). Flint symbolizes the determination of the Servant of the Lord in Isa. 50:7. W. E. STAPLES FLOAT. KJV translation of דברה (I Kings 5:9—H 5:23) and רפסדה (II Chr. 2:16—H 2:15; RSV RAFT).

FLOCK. See SHEEP.

FLOGGING [מהלמות (KJV STROKES in Prov. 18:6; KJV STRIPES in Prov. 19:29), strokes, stripes, blows]; FLOG [נכה (Prov. 17:26; KJV STRIKE), smite, strike, attack (and destroy); μαστιγόω (Matt. 10:17; KJV SCOURGE), alternately CHASTISE, SCOURGE]. The practice or system of punishment by repeated lashes or blows, usually with a rod or whip; or an instance of such punishment.

Beating is recognized as a legitimate form of punishment in Deut. 25:1-3. According to Proverbs, hasty and poor judgments, like careless talk, often lead to strife; the settling of strife involves punishment for those who have been wrong, and it should be recognized that flogging is "for the backs of fools" (Prov. 19:29; cf. 18:6; 20:3). It is permissible to beat a child and so to correct him (23:13-14).

Elsewhere in the OT it is recognized that even the innocent may sometimes be smitten and crushed by evil individuals and cliques (Isa. 52:13-53:12, especially 53:5). The suffering of the innocent, often at the hands of evildoers, is a common theme in the Psalms (13; 22; 28; 31:9-24; 35; 38; 41; 69; 71; 86; 102; 109).

Jesus warned certain of his disciples that they would be beaten in the synagogues if they continued to preach the gospel (Mark 13:9). According to Acts 5:40, the apostles were beaten by representatives of the Sanhedrin and charged not to speak in the name of Jesus, but only after Gamaliel had pleaded with his fellow members not to put the defendants to death (vss. 33-39). Paul, who himself had beaten and imprisoned many Christians (Acts 22:19-20), was flogged with rods three times (II Cor. 11:25; see, e.g., Acts 16:11-24, where both Paul and Silas were involved). H. F. BECK

FLOOD. The translation of a number of words, which may be divided according to three distinct connotations:

a) A stream overflowing: מים בלהות (Job. 27:20); פרץ מים (II Sam. 5:20); שבלת (Ps. 69:2—H 69:3); שטף (Dan. 9:26); שפעה (Job 22:11); πλήμμυρα (Luke 6:48).

b) The primeval flood, "heavenly ocean": מבול (Gen. 6:17; Ps. 29:10); נהרות (Ps. 93:3); נזלית (Exod. 15:8); תהמת (Exod. 15:5); κατακλυσμός (Luke 17:27).

c) The "waters of Noah," the Deluge: מבול (Gen. 9:28); κατακλυσμός (Matt. 24:38). See FLOOD (GENESIS).

The imagery of a is taken from the sudden rush of water in a wadi or ravine following heavy rains in the vicinity. The primeval-flood imagery (b) reflects the cosmological myth of Yahweh's victory at Creation over the dragon of chaotic waters (Job 26:12; Ps. 74:13-14—H 74:12-13), and the belief that waters from the cosmic sea poured down through the lattice windows of heaven and gushed up from beneath the earth (Gen. 7:11). Hence the Deluge (c) showed the destructive power of the מבול, or primeval flood, when Yahweh released it from its bonds, and was also a symbolic event in the myths of beginnings which Israel inherited from Mesopotamia.

R. B. Y. SCOTT

FLOOD (GENESIS) [מבול; LXX κατακλυσμός, see § 2*b below*]. The catastrophic deluge recounted in Gen. 6-9 as divine judgment on the corrupt world, from which only NOAH and those with him in the ARK OF NOAH were saved. Similar sagas of a great flood in the (prehistoric) past, many of which relate as their cause the sin of mankind, exist throughout the world. Their relation to one another and to the biblical account is not always clear. The origin of these legends is generally considered to be folk recollection of actual inundations, but the legends seem also to be incorporated into some scheme of cosmic cycles, independent of historical traditions of a flood, in which the flood catastrophe ends one epoch and begins a new age with new men. The biblical story accepts the cyclical tradition for the past but expressly denies it for the future (Gen. 9:15).

1. The OT account
2. The literary character of the biblical story
   a. The sources
   b. מבול (mabbûl)
3. The literary dependence of the biblical story
   a. The Gilgamesh Epic
   b. Cuneiform recensions
   c. The account of Berossus
   d. The problem of dependence
4. Historicity of the Flood

Bibliography

1. The OT account. Since the wickedness of man was very great on the earth, God repented of his creation and determined to destroy both men and beasts (Gen. 6:5-13); only the righteous Noah and his family would be spared (vss. 8-9). God therefore announced to Noah his intention to destroy the earth (6:13, 17; 7:4) and ordered him to build an ark according to definite plan and dimension (6:14-16). Into the ark Noah was to take all his family (6:18; 7:1), members of every species of animal (6:19-20; 7:2-3) "to keep their kind alive upon the face of all the earth" (7:3), and provisions for the duration of the floodwaters (6:21). Noah followed the divine command (6:22; 7:5, 7-9, 13-16), and when the ark was finished, he entered with all his family and every species of animal into the ark, and God "shut him in" (7:16). Then the heavens were opened and rain descended, and "all the fountains of the great deep burst forth," bringing a great flood upon the earth (7:11). Everything on earth was flooded, "and all flesh died." "Every living thing that was upon the face of the ground . . . [was] blotted out from the earth" (7:21-23*a*) by waters which eventually rose fifteen cubits above the highest mountains (7:17-20).

Finally, after the water had subsided, the ark landed "upon the mountains of Ararat" (8:4), and Noah sent out first a raven and then a dove (8:6-12) to determine whether the land was dry. When he knew the ground was dry (8:13-14), Noah and all who were with him went forth from the ark (8:15-19), and Noah sacrificed to God (8:20). Whereupon God was pleased and determined never again to destroy man as he had done (8:21-22) by a flood (9:8-11). Then God blessed Noah and his family (9:1-7) and gave the rainbow as the sign of his covenant with the earth that "the waters shall never again become a flood to destroy all flesh" (9:12-17).

2. The literary character of the biblical story. a. The sources. Even though the story appears simple and homogeneous, the existence within it of two independent and partially inconsistent parallel flood stories, the earlier Yahwistic (J) and the postexilic Priestly (P), can easily be demonstrated. Aside from observing the distinctive use of the divine name (Yahweh, RSV LORD [Gen. 6:5-8; 7:1, 5, 16*b;* 8:20-21]; God [Gen. 6:9-13, 22; 7:16*a;* 8:1-15; 9:1, 6, 8, 12, 16-17]) and certain differences in usage (cf. 7:2: "the male and his mate" [J] with 6:19; 7:9, 16: "male and female" [P]), one can distinguish duplicate representations of nearly every phase of the narrative: God sees the wickedness of man (J 6:5-7; P 6:11-13) and commands to enter the ark (J 7:1-3; P 6:18-20); Noah enters the ark (J 7:7-9; P 7:13-16). The Flood comes (J 7:10; P 7:11); the waters increase (J 7:17*b;* P 7:18-20). All flesh is destroyed (J 7:22-23; P 7:21). God decides against a future destruction (J 8:21-23; P 9:9-11). In addition to these parallels, there are also several contradictions: In J the ark is already present; in P (6:14-16) it has to be built. In J, Noah takes into the ark seven pairs of every clean animal and one pair of every unclean, while in P he takes one pair of every kind, without distinction. Further, P, which contains precise dates, gives the time of the increase of waters as 150 days and the entire duration of the Flood as one year, while J gives it as 40 days (7:4, 12, 17; 8:6). For J the Flood is caused by rainfall (7:4) which begins seven days after Noah and his family enter the ark (7:10), while for P the catastrophe is brought on by rainfall and the eruption of underground waters (7:11; 8:2).

When one separates the two strands of the story, one discovers two series of passages, each of which forms an all-but-continuous narrative. The J story includes the passages 6:5-8; 7:1-5, 7, (8-9), 10, 12, 16*b*, 17*b*, 22-23; 8:2*b*, 3*a*, 6-12, 13*b*, 20-22; while the P narrative includes the others: 6:9-22; 7:6, 11, 13-16*a*, 17*a*, 18-21, 24; 8:1-2*a*, 3*b*-5, 13*a*, 14-19; 9:1-17. The differences in style and literary power between the narratives of J and P are apparent. The J story is an imaginative, charming tale, containing the picturesque incident of sending out the raven and the dove, while the P narrative is "formal, precise, and calculated." The existing conflate biblical account skilfully preserves the information contained in both sources.

The thesis that only two sources are to be found in the flood narrative is not quite satisfactory in explaining all the diversity present in the existing biblical account. Scholars claim to have discovered still a third, independent strand within the existing narrative, variously labeled J^1, L, S, E. The evidence they have adduced to prove the point cannot easily be controverted and serves to emphasize both the complexity of the historical growth of the flood story and the hypothetical nature of any theories brought forward to describe or explain the origin of the existing biblical account.

The presence of separate strands in the biblical story is apparent, but any theory to explain the phenomenon completely is necessarily only a working hypothesis. It has been argued, e.g., that the material cannot "be resolved into its constituent elements with any degree of certainty" and that the "alleged remnants of each supposed document" do not necessarily all together constitute the whole original document. If we possessed the original documents in their entirety "(assuming, for the sake of argument, that such documents ever existed), we might see at once that there were no discrepancies at all between the two" (Heidel; see bibliography). Arguments like these rightly call attention to the existing biblical story, which at some point must be considered as it now exists, but they detract in no way from the generally accepted source analysis and contribute nothing to a satisfactory explanation for the present state of the biblical narrative. They do, however, remind one that the theories of the composition of the Pentateuch are not conclusively proven facts but only plausible and cogent hypotheses. See PENTATEUCH.

b. מבול (mabbûl). The Hebrew term for the catastrophe is המבול, occurring everywhere in the story with the definite article (Gen. 6:17; 7:6-7, 10, 17; 9:11, 28; 10:1, 32; 11:10) except in 9:11, 15. This usage suggests that for the Hebrews the מבול was a well-known entity to which water belonged (Gen. 6:17; 7:7). Its only occurrence elsewhere in the OT is Ps. 29:10.

The word was often derived from the Akkadian abūbu by way of a supposed wabūbu, "cyclone," which is used in the Babylonian flood narrative in a way corresponding to the use of מבול in the Hebrew narrative. But this derivation is highly improbable, for (a) the dissimilation from "b" to "l" is unknown in Semitic grammar, and (b) the doubled consonant in the Hebrew word remains unexplained if abūbu be the prototype, to say nothing of (c) the problem of the shift from "a" to "m" at the beginning. Some scholars suggested the Akkadian bubbulu, biblu, bibbulu, "inundation," as the prototype of the Hebrew מבול. While this derivation is linguistically possible, it seems nevertheless improbable, because the word used in the Akkadian story is not bibbulu but rather abūbu. Another suggestion is to derive מבול from the Akkadian root nbl, "to destroy." This etymology also has linguistic difficulties, but in addition it makes of the Hebrew word an abstraction, "destruction," which scarcely fits the usage in Genesis. The theory that מבול goes back to an Akkadian original has generally been given up.

It has been shown that מבול with the meaning "deluge" occurs only in P and the texts dependent on P (Gen. 9:11, 15, 28; 10:1, 32; 11:10), while, e.g., Isaiah (54:9) when referring to the story avoids the word altogether and speaks simply of the "waters of Noah." That מבול originally cannot have denoted "deluge," however, is clear from its usage elsewhere in the flood story. At its first occurrence in P, God announces to Noah his intention to bring the מבול of waters upon the earth (6:17). The new thing for Noah obviously is not the well-known מבול, but the announcement of its being brought upon the earth. In J, Noah learns, to begin with (7:4), only God's intention to destroy the earth with water; the מבול is mentioned first in 7:10. Further, whenever the Flood itself is mentioned throughout the story, it is referred to as "the water" (Gen. 7:18-20, 24; 8:1, 3, 5, 8-9, 11, 13) as in Isa. 54:9. The word מבול, on the other hand, occurs only in connection with the inception of the catastrophe. In J the Flood is never spoken of as the מבול, but only as the "waters of the מבול." Thus, "after seven days the waters of the מבול came upon the earth" (7:10; cf. 6:17; 7:6, 17). Moreover, the sequence 7:10, 12 (J): "After seven days the waters of the flood came upon the earth, . . . and rain fell upon the earth forty days and nights," makes it clear that the מבול is not a terrestrial object but is located in heaven. In the light of these considerations Ps. 29:10 makes clear that the מבול "is an ancient designation for the heavenly ocean" which "lies directly at Yahweh's feet" (Begrich; see bibliography).

The use by P of מבול with the meaning "the Flood" indicates the firm place the term had in the flood tradition, as well as the gradual fading from memory of its original meaning in the course of Israel's development. This change in meaning occurred probably in two stages: (a) The idea that the מבול itself, instead of simply the waters of the מבול as in J, came upon the earth was a natural conclusion if it were once supposed that the מבול actually emptied itself at the time of the Deluge (which is not stated in the story). Then the notion would be that just as God in Gen. 1 separated the waters of the primeval world, giving each its place above or beneath the firmament, so he allowed them, according to P, to flow together again in the flood story to form a new chaos. (b) Once the מבול had been closely connected with the idea of the waters of the Flood spread over the entire earth, the shift in its meaning from heavenly ocean to the world-wide Flood is a matter of course.

Finally, the derivation of מבול is to be sought either from the Hebrew יבל, "to flow," "to stream," or from נבל, "waterskin" (cf. Job 38:37). If the latter derivation is correct, then מבול is the technical term for the "heavenly ocean" or the "heavenly store of water jars."

3. The literary dependence of the biblical story. That many flood legends exist throughout the world is a long-known and well-attested fact. At one time this widespread distribution of a flood tradition was considered proof of the historicity of the biblical account, which with some expected modification had been spread throughout the world as people migrated from their original homeland in the Near East. This notion has necessarily been given up. We know, e.g., that numerous peoples have no flood legend in their literature. Flood stories are almost entirely lacking in Africa, occur only occasionally in Europe, and are absent in many parts of Asia. They are widespread in America, Australia, and the islands of the Pacific. In addition, many of the known flood legends differ radically from the biblical story and stand independent of it and of one another. Many do not know a world-wide flood at all, but only a local inundation; not all relate the rescue of a man or a family who "found favor in the eyes of the LORD." Often the heroes save themselves in boats or by scaling mountains, without intervention of the gods. Further, only a few of the flood stories give the wickedness of man as the cause for the Flood. In many instances nothing is said about either the characteristics of the Flood or the means of its origin. Often storms cause an inundation, sometimes rains and ocean tidal waves, occasionally earthquake. The saved may be a single person (man or woman), a couple, an entire family, a definite or an indefinite number of people. Only in a few sagas are seeds and representatives of various species of animals taken into the vessel of deliverance. The duration of the Flood, if given, varies from a few days to many years. Facts of this kind disprove the claim that the biblical account is the parent of all flood stories.

There is, however, one flood tradition which bears such striking resemblance to the biblical story that it must be directly related to it. This is the cuneiform (Sumerian, Babylonian, Assyrian) tradition. Since before the Christian era, the existence of a Babylonian flood story, resembling in many respects the biblical story, has been known. Berossus, a Babylonian priest, compiled a history of Babylonia, containing a flood story, which he published in Greek ca. 275 B.C. Unfortunately, his work has been lost, but extracts from it were collected by Greek historians and so transmitted to us (see § 3*c below*). Berossus' account of the Flood was commonly believed to have been adapted from the biblical story. But the discovery and publication in 1873 by George Smith of the British Museum of the "Chaldaean Account of the Deluge" proved conclusively that the Babylonian story was markedly older than the Hebrew version and had, in fact, been written down about the beginning of the second millennium B.C., long before the Hebrew migrations into Palestine. The documents published by Smith came from the library of Ashurbanipal (668-626?), who had collected at his palace in Nineveh copies of the great works of Mesopotamian literature. The tablets identified by Smith were fragments of the Gilgamesh Epic (there are twelve tablets in all), of which the Flood constitutes a single episode of three hundred lines, recorded on Tablet XI. Fig. FLO 18.

a. The Gilgamesh Epic. Gilgamesh, mourning the death of his friend Enkidu and increasingly obsessed with the fear of death, decides to go to his ancestor Utnapishtim (variant of Atrahasis; Old Babylonian Utanapishtim; Sumerian Ziusudra; Greek Xisouthros), the Babylonian Noah, to learn from him the secret of eternal life. After great difficulty and hardship Gilgamesh finds Utnapishtim, who tells him that he and his wife won immortality by surviving a flood, the details of which he recounts vividly. When the gods determined to destroy the world, Ea, contrary to the plan of En-lil, in a dream commanded

Courtesy of the Trustees of the British Museum

18. Fragment of the Babylonian account of the Flood, from Nineveh (Quyunjiq); Tablet XI of the Gilgamesh Epic

Utnapishtim, who was living in Shuruppak (modern Fara), to tear down his house and build a ship with the shape of an exact cube measuring two hundred feet per side, in which he would save himself and the "seed of all living things." Utnapishtim was not to tell his fellow citizens the reason for his action, but when they asked him where he was going, he was only to answer them with an ambiguous statement about a visit to the gods, which to them would be a promise of prosperity but to Utnapishtim would designate the impending Deluge.

When Utnapishtim awoke, he began work on the ship, and within five days had "laid her framework." The vessel had six decks (i.e., seven stories), and each story was divided into nine sections, providing in all a ship with sixty-three compartments. After calking the boat with pitch and treating it with oil, on the seventh day he had it ready for launching. Then he loaded the boat with silver and gold, "whatever he had of all the living beings," all his family and kin, the beast and wild creatures of the field, "all the craftsmen," and the boatmen.

After Utnapishtim himself had entered and shut the door, the skies grew black with clouds, thunder rumbled, lightning flashed, the rivers rose, breaking dams and dikes, and the tempest swept over the land. It was so dark that a man could not recognize his fellow. So bad was the Deluge that even the gods "cowered like dogs (and) crouched against the outer wall." Six days and nights the wind blew, while downpour, tempest, and flood overwhelmed the land. "When the seventh day arrived, the flood(-carrying) south-storm subsided . . . the sea grew quiet, the tempest was still, the flood ceased." Utnapishtim looked out upon the sea: "Stillness had set in, and all of mankind had returned to clay."

After an unspecified time the ship came to rest upon Mount Nisir (modern Pir Omar Gudrun, NE of Kirkuk), where it remained motionless for six days. On the seventh day Utnapishtim released a dove, which, finding no resting place, returned to the ship. Then he set free a swallow, which also returned. Finally he released a raven, which "went forth and, seeing that the waters had diminished, he eats, circles, caws, and turns not round." At this sign, Utnapishtim opened the door of the ship for every creature to go forth, while he offered sacrifice to the gods. The gods "smelled the sweet savor" and "crowded like flies about the sacrifice."

When En-lil arrived, he was angry to find that someone had escaped the Deluge, but he submitted to Ea's reproach that the Flood had been too severe and rewarded Utnapishtim and his wife with immortality. In the words of the narrative, he said: "Hitherto Utnapishtim has been but human. Henceforth Utnapishtim and his wife shall be like unto us gods. Utnapishtim shall reside far away, at the mouth of the rivers!"

b. Cuneiform recensions. The oldest account of the Flood is the Sumerian version found at Nippur. It was inscribed in six columns on a tablet, only the lower one third of which has been preserved. In this story Ziusudra learns of the gods' decision to send a flood "to destroy the seed of mankind." The instructions to Ziusudra which must originally have been included in the story are missing, because the text is broken at this point. When the text resumes, the Flood has already raged upon the earth seven days and nights and "the huge boat had been tossed about by the windstorms on the great waters." Then Utu, the sun-god, came forth, and Ziusudra sacrificed to him and the rest of the gods. Finally "Anu (and) En-lil cherished Ziusudra, life like (that of) a god they give him, breath eternal like (that of) a god they bring down for him. Then, Ziusudra the king . . . in the land of Dilmun, the place where the sun rises, they caused to dwell."

In addition to the Sumerian tablet, a second fragment of a flood story, written in Old Babylonian, was excavated at Nippur. Only a few lines of the tablet are preserved. The text seems to relate the decision of a god to destroy the earth with a flood. A great ship is to be built bearing the name "Preserver of Life." A strong roof is to be constructed, and into the ship are to go "beasts of the field and fowl of the heavens."

The Atrahasis (Old Babylonian "Atramhasis") epic containing a flood narrative is known to us only from four small fragments from three original tablets, which contained a total of 1,245 lines. Two fragments are from the Old Babylonian recension, the other two from an Assyrian version. The Assyrian tablets were found in the library of Ashurbanipal, while the Babylonian are about a thousand years older, going back to the time of King Ammizaduga (first Babylonian dynasty). According to this story the Flood was preceded by severe plagues, sent in vain by En-lil to restrain the "oppressive . . . clamor of mankind." When everything else failed, En-lil determined to send the Deluge. Ea warned Atrahasis in a dream, in words strikingly like those of the Gilgamesh story, and Atrahasis built his ship according to the design given him by Ea. After the Flood subsided, the earth was repopulated from "fourteen wombs." The narrative of the earth's repopulation, though present at the end of the Assyrian version of the Atrahasis myth, appears originally to have been part of a creation story and to have no integral relation to the flood account.

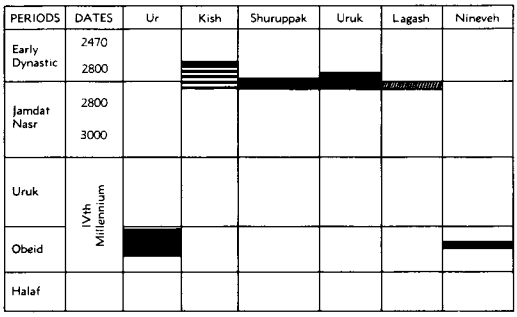
Other allusions to a flood exist in cuneiform literature, but to date no further extended story has been discovered. Cf. A. Jeremias (see bibliography), pp. 136-37.

c. The account of Berossus. The youngest known Babylonian flood version is that of Berossus (see above). Extracts from this work were made by Alexander Polyhistor of Miletus (second-third century A.D.) and by Eusebius (A.D. 260?-340?) in his Chronicle. The Chronicle of Eusebius, which unfortunately exists only in fragments, was quoted at length by Georgius Syncellus (died sometime after 810) in his Chronography (53.19-56) of events from Creation to Diocletian, and is also contained in a complete Armenian recension. Only the high lights of the Chronicle are given in Jerome's translation of Eusebius. According to Berossus' account, a deluge occurred during the reign of Xisouthros or Sisithros (same as Ziusudra). Cronos (corresponding to Ea) revealed to him in a dream the imminent destruction of the world by a deluge and commanded him to write a history and bury it in Sippar, to build a boat, stock it with provisions, take into it all species of animals, and set sail. He was to answer those who asked him whither he was sailing: "To the gods, in order to plead with them for the good of mankind." Xisouthros obeyed the command and survived the Flood. After the storm abated, Xisouthros released "some birds," which returned to the boat; after some days he released them again, only to have them return with mud on their feet. When they were released the third time, however, the birds did not return. Then Xisouthros made an opening in the vessel and, seeing that the ship rested on a mountainside, disembarked with his family and the pilot. When he had sacrificed to the gods, he and those who had disembarked with him disappeared. Those remaining on the ship then came out to look for Xisouthros; but they could only hear his voice, telling them to honor the gods, and that they should return to Babylon, recover the records hidden in Sippar, and make them known to all men. The voice finally informed them that they were then in Armenia. So they returned and rebuilt Babylon, but the vessel remained in the mountains of Armenia, where, according to the story, people still scrape off pitch from it to make amulets.

d. The problem of dependence. The points of contact between the Hebrew and the Mesopotamian flood stories are numerous. In both traditions the hero is a pious man, divinely warned of the coming catastrophe and saved from destruction because of his fear of god. In both traditions careful attention is given to the size of the boat; both take care for the repopulation of the earth; for both the Flood is world wide, involving great masses of water (in Gen. 7:19 the water rises fifteen cubits above the mountains).

The duration of the storm is variously given. The effect of the Flood is total destruction. The boat comes to rest on a mountain. Birds are released so that the hero may secure information about the decrease of the waters. (The biblical order—raven, then dove—is more sensible than the Babylonian; for the raven could alight on floating carrion and live, while the dove required growing trees in the valley. The raven's failure to return to the ship would have told Utnapishtim nothing, whereas the dove's failure to return gave Noah the information he sought.) Noah disembarked only at the command of God, but the Mesopotamian hero left the vessel at his own discretion. Both traditions relate several acts of worship after the hero's escape from the Flood, and both traditions recount divine blessings on the survivors, with an indication (in Gilgamesh) and a promise (in Genesis) that a similar catastrophic deluge will never again occur.

In the Gilgamesh Epic, Utnapishtim received eternal life. The biblical story may preserve an allusion to a similar translation of Noah in 6:9*b*: "Noah walked with God." The possibility of this allusion is suggested by 5:24: "Enoch walked with God; and he was not, for God took him" (J), which appears perhaps to have been misunderstood by P in 5:22: "Enoch walked with God after the birth of Methuselah three hundred years, and had other sons and daughters." If this supposition is correct, both the dependence of the Hebrew tradition on the Babylonian and its revision and reworking by the Hebrews become even clearer. A further allusion to the Babylonian story may be found in Gen. 11:2: "As men migrated in the east, they found a plain in the land of Shinar." This passage, which does not follow logically from 11:1, does make sense when considered as a sequel to the flood narrative (J), which assumes that the ark landed at a point W of Babylon. Such a conclusion to the flood narrative is reminiscent of the conclusion to the flood story given by Berossus (see § 3*c above*). Further, in Berossus' version the flood survivors have to be told where they are; a similar allusion to being "lost" may perhaps be inferred from Gen. 11:2.



The historical relation between the actual biblical and Mesopotamian flood stories cannot be determined precisely. The main outline of the Hebrew account obviously stems from the Babylonian flood tradition. That the Hebrew story is derived from the Babylonian cannot be doubted, but the differences in details and in spirit between the two narratives are so great that a literary dependence of the biblical upon the Babylonian cannot be proved and is, in fact, improbable. The Babylonian flood tradition was, in all likelihood, not transmitted directly to the Hebrews but rather was mediated to them through the Amorites and proto-Arameans, and the Hebrews adapted the story to fit their theological presuppositions. Instead of the Babylonian gods, who lie to one another, cheat and deceive both one another and mankind, who cower in terror before the flood-storm and then flock like flies to the sacrifice after the Deluge, we find in the biblical account the righteous, omnipotent, merciful God, "majestic in holiness, terrible in glorious deeds, doing wonders" (Exod. 15:11). In Genesis the Flood is interpreted unmistakably as divine judgment on a corrupt world, and the story is so well told that it has even today the same power to stir the conscience, for which purpose the biblical writers told it.

4. Historicity of the Flood. In Genesis the flood story is incorporated into the history of mankind, so that all the then known peoples of the earth are said to be descended from Noah's three sons and CANAAN. This corresponds to the earlier Mesopotamians' attempt to incorporate the Deluge into their history (cf. the Sumerian King List, ANET 264). Attempts like these at historical documentation of the flood narrative naturally raise a question about the historicity of the Flood. Was there an actual inundation which forms the historical core of this Near Eastern flood tradition?

The belief in a deluge covering the whole earth and destroying all men and animals except those preserved in an ark has been largely given up. Aside from the great variety in substance and detail which exists in the flood myths of the world, making their reference to a single historical event impossible, and apart from the advances of anthropology which show that early civilization could not have been interrupted by a flood within millenniums of the time assigned to it by biblical chronology, the obvious difficulties of the biblical narrative itself preclude reference to an inundation of the whole world as we know it. The ark could never have weathered a storm such as Genesis describes, nor could it possibly have contained a pair of every existing species of animal and creeping thing, to say nothing of providing proper subsistence conditions for such a menagerie. Neither would the eight members of Noah's family have been able to care for a zoo of such proportions, even assuming they really had been able to collect one pair of every species of life.

That the deluge story is a reminiscence of some one of those prehistoric catastrophes reported by geologists is unthinkable. The biblical account is scarcely a report of that occurrence, as at least one writer maintains, which separated the Tertiary period from the Quaternary, recalling events of at least thirty thousand years ago. It is psychologically and physically impossible that men could remember prehistoric catastrophic events of the kind known to geologists, even assuming, for the sake of argument, that Homo sapiens was on earth at that time.

If there is historical substance to the flood tradition, it must be found in some local Mesopotamian disaster of special magnitude, which could be confirmed by archaeological evidence. For a flood of the proportions described in the Babylonian and biblical accounts would leave an alluvial deposit, above and below which could be found traces of human activity, but within which would be found none. Two archaeologists of repute have claimed to have discovered proof of the Flood: Sir Leonard Woolley at Ur and Stephen Langdon at Kish. The two alluvial layers, however, cannot be dated contemporaneously and must refer to two separate inundations, one at Ur and the other at Kish. Alluvial layers similar to those at Ur and Kish have been found at Uruk, Fara (ancient Shuruppak), Telloh (ancient Lagash), and Nineveh.* These findings seem to indicate that these Mesopotamian cities did at various times experience severe flooding by either the Tigris or the Euphrates River, or by both. Some such violent

From Parrot, The Flood and Noah's Ark (Neuchâtel: Delachaux & Niestlé)

19. Mesopotamian sites showing flood deposits flooding, accompanied by heavy rains and perhaps earthquake, may form the basis for the flood tradition in cuneiform literature on which the Genesis account depends. Fig. FLO 19.

Bibliography. Commentaries: H. Gunkel, HKAT (5th ed., 1922). J. Skinner, ICC (2nd ed., 1930)—comprehensive.

Etymological studies: J. Begrich, "Mabbūl, Eine exegetisch-lexikalische Studie," ZS, 6 (1928), 135-53—the standard work. W. F. Albright, "The Babylonian Matter in the Pre-Deuteronomic Primeval History," JBL, 58 (1939), 91-103.

Flood traditions: R. Andree, Die Flutsagen ethnographisch betrachtet (1891). H. Usener, Die Sintfluthsagen (Religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchungen III; 1899). M. Winternitz, "Die Flutsagen des Alterthums und der Natürvölker," Mitteilungen der anthropologischen Gesellschaft in Wien, 31 (1901), 305-33—excellent survey of the material. J. G. Frazer, Folklore in the OT, vol. I (1918). E. G. Kraeling, "The Earliest Hebrew Flood Story," JBL, 66 (1947), 279-93.

The Gilgamesh Epic: G. Smith, "The Chaldaean Account of the Deluge," TSBA, II (1873), 213-34. A. Jeremias, Das AT im Lichte des alten Orients (4th ed., 1930). A. Heidel, The Gilgamesh Epic and OT Parallels (2nd ed., 1949). J. B. Pritchard, ANET (2nd ed., 1955).

Berossus: A. Schoene, ed., Eusebi chronicorum libri duo, vol. I (1875); the Armenian version ed. by J. B. Aucher (2 vols.; 1818); A. Schoene, Die Weltchronik des Eusebius in ihrer Bearbeitung durch Hieronymus (1900).

Historicity of the Flood: J. Riem, Weltenwerden (1924). H. Peake, The Flood, New Light on an Old Story (1930). J. Boehmer, "Tellurische Trümmerstücken im Flutbericht der Genesis," ZAW, 50 (1932), 117-24. A. Parrot, The Flood and Noah's Ark (1953), contains a useful introduction. L. Woolley, Excavations at Ur (1954). M. Eliade, Patterns in Comparative Religion (1958).

J. H. MARKS

FLOOR. 1. קרקע, the floor of a building. Solomon's temple is described as having a floor covered with boards of cypress (I Kings 6:15) and overlaid with gold (vs. 30). The dust of the earthen floor of the tabernacle was regarded as possessing special qualities (Num. 5:17). The word is used of the bottom of the sea in Amos 9:3.

See also ARCHITECTURE; HOUSE.

2. גרן, a threshing floor; an open space of rock or pounded earth exposed to the wind and used for THRESHING and WINNOWING grain.

FLORA.

A. Classification of biblical plants
   1. Cereals and legumes
      a. Wheat
      b. Emmer
      c. Barley
      d. Millet
      e. Beans
      f. Lentils
   2. Fruit trees
      a. Almond
      b. Apple
      c. Fig
      d. Husks
      e. Mulberry tree
      f. Nuts
      g. Olive tree
      h. Palm tree
      i. Pomegranate
      j. Sycomore
      k. Vine
   3. Vegetables and gourds
      a. Onion
      b. Garlic
      c. Leek
      d. Melon
      e. Cucumber
   4. Flax
   5. Cotton
   6. Flavors and condiments
      a. Anise
      b. Coriander
      c. Fitches
      d. Cummin
      e. Mint
      f. Mustard
      g. Saffron
   7. Balms, drugs, and incense
      a. Aloes
      b. Balm
      c. Bdellium
      d. Henna
      e. Cane, calamus, sweet cane, sweet calamus
      f. Cassia
      g. Cinnamon
      h. Galbanum
      i. Incense, frankincense
      j. Myrrh
      k. Spikenard, nard
      l. Spices
   8. Costly timbers
      a. Ebony
      b. Gopher wood
      c. Algum, almug timber
   9. Forest trees and shrubs
      a. Acacia tree, acacia wood
      b. Bay tree
      c. Bush, thornbush
      d. Cedar
      e. Cypress
      f. Fir, fir tree
      g. Heath
      h. Juniper
      i. Laurel
      j. Hyssop
      k. Mallow
      l. Myrtle
      m. Oil tree, wild olive
      n. Oak
      o. Plane tree
      p. Storax tree
      q. Tamarisk

r. Terebinth, turpentine tree
s. Thick tree
t. Willow
10. Lilies and roses
11. Reeds and rushes
a. Reeds
b. Rush, papyrus, bulrushes
c. Cattail
d. Rush, bulrush, hook, caldron
e. Flag, meadow, reeds 12. Thorns and thistles
a. Thorn
b. Brier
c. Thistle
13. Weeds and nettles
a. Nettle
b. Wheel, rolling thing, whirling dust
c. Cockle
d. Tares
14. Wormwoods and poisons
a. Gall, hemlock
b. Wormwood
c. Bitter herbs
d. Wild gourds
15. Hedges and fences
a. Brambles, thorns
b. Thorns
16. Other plants
a. Gourd
b. Capper
c. Mandrake
d. Manna

B. The vegetal landscape
1. History of the flora
2. Vegetation units
a. The Aleppo pine forest
b. Evergreen oak maquis and forest
c. Deciduous broad-leaved oak forest
d. Evergreen park woods
e. Evergreen Mediterranean dwarf shrub formation
f. Deciduous steppe forest
g. Tamarisk woods
h. The riparian forest
i. The Saxaul forest
j. Sagebrush steppes
k. Succulent shrub desert
l. Swamps and marshes
m. Sand-dune vegetation
n. Vegetation of tropical oases

C. Man and plants
1. Man and trees
2. Native plants in everyday life
a. Industrial plants
b. Medicinal plants
c. Pasture and forest plants
3. Wild ancestors of cultivated plants
4. Man and weeds
5. Agriculture through the ages

Bibliography

A. CLASSIFICATION OF BIBLICAL PLANTS. It may seem surprising that the number of plant names mentioned in the Bible is not much over 100, while the flora of the land of the Bible comprises ca. 2,300 species. It should be remembered that the Bible as a historical, legislatorial, and literary work can by no means fully reflect the relations between the people and their plant environment. It is therefore quite understandable that many very common or even useful plants, including many forest trees and shrubs, ornamental plants, and edible herbs, find no mention in the Scriptures.

But it is not the number of plants which is important in this biblical florula. Notwithstanding its limitations, it provides a deep insight into many aspects of life associated with the plant world. Not only agriculture is involved in or illuminated by this flora, but also religion, customs and practices, law, commerce, manufacturing, architecture, medicine, sanitation, cosmetics, and even love.

The frequency of the mention of the names of plants in the Bible is not always in proportion to their use and distribution. E.g., the cedar, which has never been native in Palestine, appears seventy times in the Bible, while the wheat plant is mentioned only thirty-two times. Foreign drugs and balms are much more frequently mentioned than many native useful trees and herbs.

The identification of plant names is a difficult and responsible task, which unfortunately has not always been successfully done. There are three types of plant names in this respect: (a) those indubitably and unanimously identifiable, (b) those which need further study and research before identification can be made, and (c) those for which there seems to be no hope that accurate identification can be made. The last group is quite considerable in number, and comprises those names about which there is much confusion, inconsistency, and controversy among biblical scholars. The reason for this is that there are many plants which are very poorly described, or which are mentioned in association with an environment or use which would suit scores of various species. Here we could include plants like thistles, reeds, and rushes. Most of such names have a collective or general meaning, and do not denote specific plants. There are also plant names embodied in ancient proverbs and phrases which passed down from generation to generation, the detailed connotation of which has been lost through the ages.

Besides linguistic methods of research, the plant lore of the Bible requires also a geographical and ecological approach, and an adequate knowledge of the local flora. The latter can be of great help in avoiding many mistranslations and absurdities met with in current literature, and in excluding from the biblical flora such items as rye, heath, box trees, cockles, tares, teil trees, chestnuts, which have never been native to or grown in Palestine.

In the following short discussions of the biblical plants their uses and descriptions are given. For the sake of brevity the reasons for the identification are given only where it has seemed necessary. For further study, see bibliography.

1. Cereals and legumes. a. Wheat (חִטָּה; σῖτος). One of the most important field crops of Palestine since the Early Bronze Age (3300-2000) and probably earlier is wheat (Triticum durum, Host). Its general area of cultivation extends throughout the warm temperate and subtropical regions. Its centers of origin are Anterior and Central Asia. Wheat is an annual grass with two-ranked leaves. The ears are rather thick and compact with three-flowered to five-flowered spikelets, each subtended by two glumes and producing two to three grains. The hard grains contain, among other substances, a high percentage of gluten, which renders the flour most suitable for baking and pastry. Wheat is sown with the first winter rains or before, and is harvested in June or July. Special varieties of this wheat species are grown in various parts of the country. In biblical times, as at present, wheat was consumed not only in the form of bread, cakes, and wafers, but also as "parched grain" (קלי; I Sam. 25:18, etc.) and as green or fresh ears of grain (כרמל; Lev. 2:14; 23:14; II Kings 4:42). It was also brought as a cereal offering (KJV "meal offering"). Wheat and barley were the only cereals included within the "seven kinds" with which the land was blessed (Deut. 8:8). A wild-growing wheat, Triticum dicoccoides (Koern.) Schulz, is supposed to be the wild ancestor of certain cultivated wheats. For wheat in the NT, see WHEAT.

b. Emmer. This is a translation of כסמת, כסמים, mentioned in Exod. 9:32; Isa. 28:25; Ezek. 4:9. This plant (RSV SPELT; KJV "rie," "fitches") is Triticum dicoccum Schrank. There is no evidence that rye, fitches, and spelt were grown in biblical times in Palestine, but emmer has been found in old Egyptian tombs, and its cultivation in the Near Eastern countries in biblical times is almost certain. Emmer is a kind of wheat, with very dense ears and a brittle rachis. The spikelets are usually two-flowered, and their glumes are prominently keeled. The slender red grains are acute at each end and remain in chaff after threshing. Emmer is much inferior to durum wheat (see § A1*a above*). Its growth requirements are more modest than those of wheat.

c. Barley (שעורה, שערים). One of the most ancient cereals, known to have been grown in Palestine and elsewhere since the Early Bronze Age (3300-2000) and probably earlier, is barley (Hardeum vulgare L.; Exod. 9:31; Num. 5:15; Job 31:40; etc.). Its countries of origin are supposed to be Anterior and Central Asia. It is an annual grass, growing up to three feet high. Its leaves are broader than those of wheat. The ears are composed of clusters, each consisting of three one-flowered spikelets. According to the variety, all or only the central flowers of the spikelets produce grains. The grains are attached to the chaff, which is furnished with a long awn. Barley is extensively cultivated in Palestine as a winter crop. It is harvested in May. It is less demanding than wheat and thrives well under drier conditions. See also BARLEY.

d. Millet (דחן). This is an annual grass (Panicum miliaceum L.; Ezek. 4:9), attaining a height of three feet or so. The flowers are borne on much-branching and spreading panicles. The minute, almost globular grains are an excellent forage, but are also eaten by men as porridge or bread. Millet has been known since ancient times in Persia and is probably indigenous in the East Indies. The Arabic name dukhn refers also to some varieties of sorghum, so that it is not improbable that sorghum annuum, the durra of the Arabs, is also involved here. Durra is of African origin and is known from Egypt at ca. 1000 B.C. See also MILLET.

e. Beans (פול). This plant, referred to in II Sam. 17:28; Ezek. 4:9, is the common broad bean (Vicia faba L.), grown in gardens and in fields of Palestine and elsewhere. It has been known since the Bronze Age (3300-2000) and is used as a pulse eaten roasted or boiled; it is also grown as a green manure plant. It is two to three feet high. The leaves consist of two or three pairs of broad leaflets. The flowers are borne in axillary clusters; their color is white, marked with a purple spot. The large pods contain several seeds. The origin is not certain. See also BEANS.

f. Lentils (עדשים). Identification of the lentil (Lens esculenta Moench; Gen. 25:34; II Sam. 17:27-29) is certain. The Arabic name is 'adas. This is an annual plant, with a slender stem and pinnate leaves; the flowers are whitish and violet-striped; the pods are small and contain single seeds; the shape of the seed is biconvex-lenticular. Lentils have been grown as a field crop in Palestine and adjacent countries since very ancient times. They are mainly cooked as pottage and are especially popular with the poor. See also LENTILS. Fig. LEN 26.

On "spelt," see §A1*b above*.

2. Fruit trees. a. Almond (שקד, לוז). Identification of this tree (Amygdalus communis L.; Gen. 43:11; Jer. 1:11; etc.) is certain. The almond tree is eight to twenty feet tall and sheds its leaves in winter. The leaves are oblong-elliptical. The flowers are large and handsome; their color is white to pink. The fruit is a drupe, of which the large seed is eaten. The seed contains a high percentage of fat. The almond tree grows wild in Palestine, Syria, and other countries of the Near East. Several varieties have been cultivated in Palestine since ancient times. The recent discovery of the almond tree in the Negeb suggests its occurrence also in the Sinai Mountains, and this may explain the adoption by the Israelites of almond branches as a model of the lampstand (Exod. 25:33-36). The Arabic name for the almond tree is lawz. It is not improbable that the geographical name Luz (Bethel) is due to the occurrence in the past of almond trees in this locality. See also ALMOND. Fig. ALM 16.

b. Apple (תפוח). Among the various identifications suggested for this name, mentioned in Prov. 25:11; Song of S. 7:8; etc., none is more plausible than that of the apricot, Prunus armeniaca L. It fits the context completely. The apricot tree is twelve to twenty feet tall, its spreading branches and its dense foliage affording much shade; its leaves are ovate and heart-shaped at the base. It blossoms in spring, producing white-pinkish flowers in profusion. The fruit, not unlike a plum, is very aromatic and delicious in taste. The apricot is a very common fruit tree in Anterior Asia, but there are no clear evidences as to its existence in Palestine during biblical times. See also APPLE.

c. Fig (תאנים, תאנה; συκῆ, σῦκον). The fig tree (Ficus carica L.; Num. 13:23; 20:5; Matt. 7:16; etc.) is one of the most popular fruit trees, which together with the vine typified freedom and prosperity at the time of the Bible. It is a deciduous tree, ten to twenty feet tall, very irregularly branching; the branches are often curved. The large leaves are palmately lobed. The minute flowers are aggregated within a pearlike or a globular fleshy receptacle called syconium (פגה, "fig fruit"; Song of S. 2:13; RSV "figs"; KJV "green figs"), which has a small opening at the broad end. The fig tree has been cultivated since ancient times in the Mediterranean and Anterior Asian countries. It is of high esteem, because of its delicious fruit and heavy shade. It often escapes cultivation and inhabits old walls and river banks. It produces two crops: the winter figs, occurring on leafless twigs, are small, hard, and not edible; the summer figs, which ripen from the middle to the end of the summer, are the only usable crop. They are eaten fresh or dried and pressed into cakes (דבלה; Isa. 38:21). There is a wild variety of fig named the caprifig (Ficus carica L. var. silvestris Nees), which, unlike the true fig, produces in its syconia also male flowerets. Although its fruits are inedible, it has been largely planted for pollination of certain varieties of the true fig tree. In Palestine the wild fig tree is no more used, as the local fig varieties produce fruits without pollination. See also FIG. Fig. FIG 11; Pl. XV*b*.

d. Husks. This is the KJV translation of κεράτια (Luke 15:16; RSV "pods"). It is generally believed that the husks are the pods of the carob tree (Ceratonia siliqua L., the חרוב of the Mishna). It is an evergreen dioecious tree, ten to twenty feet high, with a hemispheric crown. Its leaves are composed of a few pairs of leathery, glossy leaflets. It flowers mainly in late summer; its flowerets are yellowish-green and borne on branches of the previous year. The fruits, which ripen ca. ten months after flowering, are dark brown fleshy pods, four to eight inches long. They have a dry, fleshy, sweet pulp and many small, stony seeds. The pods are collected and widely used as fodder for cattle and sheep; they are also eaten fresh by man. A sirup and a kind of honey are prepared from the pulp by the Arabs. Some authorities believe that the "honey" in some passages of the OT refers to the husks of the carob tree. Ceratonia siliqua is one of the most common forest trees native to Palestine.

e. Mulberry tree. The translation "mulberry" for the Hebrew בכאים in II Sam. 5:23-24; I Chr. 14:14-15; Ps. 84:6 (BACA) is an unfounded identification. Still less certain and controversial to the context, at least ecologically, is Populus euphratica, or "balsam trees" (so RSV), brought forward by Moldenke and others. There is no evidence to believe that this name refers to any plant. The sycamine tree in Luke 17:6 is more likely to be a mulberry tree, at least because of its Greek name. Of the mulberry species, the black and the white, the former (Morus nigra L.) was probably the more popular. Morus nigra is a deciduous and dioecious tree, ten to twenty feet high, with a broad crown and large and often lobed leaves. Its small green flowerets are aggregated in catkins or heads. The female entire head ripens to a fleshy, sweet fruit, which is eaten fresh or cooked. Its origin is supposedly Persian. See also MULBERRY TREES;* SYCAMINE. Fig. MUL 77.

f. Nuts. This is the translation of בטנים in Gen. 43:11, as well as of אגוז in Song of S. 6:11. The first-mentioned refers to the genus Pistacia. Some authorities believe that בטנים are the fruits of Pistacia vera, which is cultivated for its almondlike nuts. But there is strong evidence that this name refers either to the fruits of Pistacia palaestina or to Pistacia atlantica, the fruits of which, though much smaller and less tasteful than those of Pistacia vera, are commonly eaten fresh or roasted, and even offered for sale, by Arab villagers. This is in full agreement with the Greek translation (Terebinthos) and the Douay Version ("turpentine"). It also agrees with the Arabic name butm in the whole Near East, and with the geographical indication of the context. The Hebrew name for the trees is אלה (see TEREBINTH). The nut in Song of S. 6:11 is the walnut, Juglans regia L. It is a handsome dioecious tree with a broad, hemispherical crown. Its leaves are composed of two to six pairs of ovate to elliptical, entire, glabrous, and fragrant leaflets. The numerous male flowerets are arranged in long catkins, while the few female ones are borne in the axils of the upper leaves. The fruit has a fleshy outer skin containing a tannin substance, while the inner stone contains a single folded seed, which is very nutritive because of its high percentage of fat. The timber is very much appreciated in the manufacture of costly furniture. According to Josephus, walnuts have been widely cultivated in the past. At present, the tree is less common in Palestine. The countries of its origin are probably Persia and Transcaucasia. See also NUTS. Fig. NUT 23.

g. Olive tree (זיתים, זית). The olive tree (Olea europaea L.) was the most important fruit and oil tree of Palestine in biblical times and prior to that period. This is attested by the findings of olive kernels in Meggido from the Bronze Age (3200-2000). The olive tree is an evergreen tree, fifteen to twenty feet high, with a thick, gnarled, and often twisted trunk, and a broad, ovate, much-branched crown. It reaches an age of several hundred years, and some trees are estimated to be over a thousand years old. The leaves are leathery, lanceolate to oblong, green and glabrous above, and white and scurfy beneath. The small, white flowers are arranged in loose racemes and appear generally in May. The fruit is a fleshy drupe varying in size according to variety; it ripens five or six months after flowering. At full maturity the green color of the fruit turns black. The fleshy pulp of the fruit contains, among other substances, about fifty per cent oil. The fruits are eaten, green and black, fresh or conserved in salt water or in acid. Oil extracting was very common in the past, as it is at present. Ancient oil presses are found abundantly even among natural forests. Apart from serving the everyday diet, oil was widely used as fuel for lamps, in medicine, in sacrificial offering, perfumery, and probably also in soap manufacture. The fruits are removed from the tree by beating the branches with long sticks. The hard wood of this tree is hardly workable and, thus, scarcely used for building and manufacture. The olive tree was a symbol of superiority and divine blessing (Judg. 9:8-9), fertility (Ps. 128:3), beauty and freshness (Jer. 11:16), and peace (Gen. 8:11; Neh. 8:15). Because of its very ancient cultivation, the origin of the olive tree is still unknown. Yet many authorities believe that the wild olive tree (Olea europaea L. var. oleaster), native to Palestine and other Mediterranean countries, is the wild ancestor of the cultivated species. For the cultivated olive (καλλιέλαιος) and wild olive (ἀγριέλαιος) in Paul's metaphor, see Rom. 11:17, 24. See also OLIVE TREE; WILD OLIVE. Fig. OLI 7.

h. Palm tree (תמר). This is the date palm (Phoenix dactylifera L.), a dioecious tree, generally forty to sixty feet tall. The trunk is simple, unbranched, and the pinnate leaves reach a length of four to six feet. They are arranged in a terminal cluster, from which the flowering shoots arise. The flowers are white and arranged in much-branched panicles enclosed in a spathe, which splits into two boatlike valves. The male flowers produce abundant pollen, borne by the wind to the female flowers. In order to secure efficient pollination, palm growers used to climb up to the top of the tree and put branches of male flowers near the female ones, or spray pollen on the female flowers. The fruit is a one-seeded berry ca. two inches long; it contains a high amount of sugar and is very nutritive. There are Bedouins in desert oases whose main diet consists of dates and camels' milk. The origin of the date palm is as yet not adequately known. Its cultivation dates back to early prehistoric time. Its present range of cultivation embraces the entire tropical and subtropical zones of the globe. Its main centers of cultivation and varietal diversity are Iraq, Iran, and some North African countries. In Palestine date growing was centered in the Coastal Plain and in the Jordan Valley. Jericho, En-gedi, Zoar, and Elath were once famous for their date-palm groves. Because of its manifold use, the date palm once played an important part in agriculture. Apart from the fruits, which were eaten fresh, dried, and in the form of cakes, other parts of the tree were also used: The leaves were applied to cover roofs; the trunk supplied timber, the young flowering shoots yielded a sort of wine, and from the fibers of the leaves robes were woven. The palm was respected by the ancients as a tree of pride and grace. Many localities and men bore the name of the palm. See also PALM TREE. Pl. XII*d*.

i. Pomegranate (רמון). The Arabic name is rumman. This is a small deciduous tree up to twelve feet tall (Punica granatum L.; Num. 20:5; Deut. 8:8; etc.). The leaves are oblong to lanceolate, entire and reddish when young. The large, showy red-scarlet flowers appear in summer; they are subtended by several large, leathery calyx lobes. The fruit is as large as an orange; it has a leathery, yellow-to-purple rind and is crowned by the persistent calyx. The pink or red seeds are juicy and have an acid, agreeable taste. The tree has been widely cultivated in Palestine since ancient times. The origin of the pomegranate is referred by some scholars to the East Indies. In addition to the common use of the fruit, a wine is also prepared from the juice, and the rind of the fruit is used in dyeing and leather tanning. The fruit was a symbol of profusion and a pattern in painting and sculpturing. See also POMEGRANATE. Pl. XI*c-e*.

j. Sycomore (שקמים, שקמה; συκομορέα). This species Ficus sycomorus L.; I Kings 10:27; I Chr. 27:28; Amos 7:14; etc.; RSV "sycamore") has nothing in common with the North American sycamore tree. The sycomore of the Bible is a strong tree, reaching a height of thirty feet or more and an age of several hundred years. It has a round or oval, much-branched crown. The rather large leaves are unlobed, and the figs are arranged in dense clusters on the older branches. They are more or less globular in shape, much smaller and inferior in taste and sugar content than those of the fig tree. Yet they are collected and eaten by the population of the Coastal Plain, where the sycomore has been widely cultivated in the past as a fruit tree. The Hebrew word bôlēs in Amos 7:14, associated with sycomores, is now commonly believed to mean "piercing" or "puncturing" the premature fruit with a nail or another sharp implement in order to accelerate ripening. This is said to have been a practice with Egyptian sycomore growers. The wood of the sycomore is known for its durability, and mummy coffins made of this wood have been found in old Egyptian tombs. It is also used sometimes for furniture and building. The sycomore tree is native to tropical Africa. It has also been cultivated in the Jordan Valley. See also SYCAMORE. Fig. SYC 93.

k. Vine (גפן, גפנים; ἄμπελος). The grapevine (Vitis vinifera L.) is one of the most ancient cultivated plants. Its cultivation dates back in Palestine to the Early Bronze Age (3200-2000 B.C.). In biblical times the grapevine was one of the most important plants in economical and cultural life. The rich botanical and agrotechnical vocabulary associated in the Bible with the vine testifies to the high level of viticulture at that period. The grapevine is a trailing or climbing shrub with very long branches. The leaves are rounded in outline, heart-shaped at base, and generally five-lobed. The threadlike tendrils borne on the branches are organs which enable the vine to climb up to house roofs and treetops. The vine blossoms in the spring; the flowers are small, greenish, and arranged in compound panicles. They have a sweet smell. The fruits are berries containing a few seeds. In certain varieties of the cultivated vine, the berries are seedless. There are hundreds of varieties of the cultivated vine, differing from one another by shape, taste, sugar content, color of the fruit, and other characteristics of the plant. The range of vine cultivation is world wide and embraces all the warm temperate and subtropical regions. In Palestine, the vine was and is still cultivated in most climatic zones, with special varieties for each zone. Vintage is spread over the entire summer season from July to October. The grapes are eaten fresh or dried (raisins), but more often they are pressed to juice and wine. For the latter, stone presses were and are still in use. The vine was a symbol of peace, fertility, and prosperity, and also an emblem of the nation. It was later widely used in painting and sculpture. Many localities and men bore the name of the vine, or names associated with it. Anterior Asia is believed to be the region of origin of Vitis vinifera. See also VINE; WINE AND STRONG DRINK.

3. Vegetables and gourds. a. Onion (בצלים). The Hebrew name is preserved in the Mishna and the Talmud and also in Arabic. The common onion (Allium cepa L.; Num. 11:5) is a member of the lily family. It is a perennial herb, with a large underground bulb, composed of several fleshy coats. The leaves are hollow, and so is also the long stalk terminating with a dense, globular umbel of pink to white flowers. The fruits are small capsules with a few seeds in each. It is cultivated in most regions of the earth. In Palestine it has been introduced from Egypt, where it is known from very ancient times, and where special varieties have been developed. Onions are used as a vegetable and a culinary seasoning. See also ONION.

b. Garlic (שומים). The Hebrew name is still preserved in the Talmud and among the Arabs. Garlic (Allium sativum L.; Num. 11:5) is a perennial herb of the lily family, with a subterranean bulb composed of several membranous tunics, each bearing a number of bulbils (cloves). The stem is tall and bears long, flat, linear leaves and an umbel of white or pinkish flowers. The fruit is a small capsule containing a few seeds. All parts of the plant have a pungent odor. The garlic is grown everywhere in gardens, mainly as a culinary seasoning. It has been known since ancient times in the countries of Anterior Asia, where it was no doubt first brought into cultivation. One of its closest wild relatives is Allium ampeloprasum L., which grows as a weed in Palestine and adjacent countries. The garlic is rather popular with the people of the Near East, who use it cooked or eat it raw with bread. See also GARLIC.

c. Leek (חציר). Leek (Allium porrum L.; Num. 11:5) is a tall herb resembling garlic, but with a more elongated bulb and much longer leaves. As in garlic, all parts of the plant have an acrid taste. Its bulb and leaves are widely used in cookery, as a flavor and as a vegetable. They are also eaten raw. In Egypt leeks have been grown since prehistoric times, and up to the present the leek is common in markets in all countries of the Near East. The Hebrew name חציר is also applied in the Bible to grass, hay, and green herbs in general. In this meaning it is mentioned twenty-seven times in the Bible. It may be synonymous with דשא (Isa. 40:7-8, etc.) and with עשב (Gen. 1:30, etc.). See also LEEKS. Fig. LEE 25.

d. Melon (אבטחים). This is the plant commonly named watermelon (Citrullus vulgaris L.; Num. 11:5). The Arab name for it is baṭṭîḫ. It is an annual plant grown in summer. The trailing stems and branches bear large leaves, deeply lobed. The large yellow flowers are separated into male and female ones. The fruit is a globular or elliptic berry ten inches or more in width. The fleshy, juicy pulp is aromatic and refreshing, and is widely served in Palestine and elsewhere. It has been grown in the Near Eastern countries since time immemorial, and has its origin in tropical Africa.

e. Cucumber (קשואים). It is generally believed that the Hebrew name denotes the common cucumber, Cucumis sativus L., but there is no evidence that this species was grown in biblical times in Egypt. What is clear is that ancient Egypt grew, apart from the watermelon mentioned above, three other gourd species—viz., Cucumis melo L. (the muskmelon), Lagenaria leucantha (Duch.) Rusby, and Cucumis chate L. Only the first of these three is so delicious and tasteful that the Israelites could have longed for it while in the desert (Num. 11:5). It is almost certain that Lagenaria was already in biblical times named דלעת, as it was later named in the Mishna and the Talmud. A locality name, Dilean (דלען; Josh. 15:38), may be associated with this name of gourd. The collective name (מקשה; Isa. 1:8) is a melon field and not a cucumber garden, as translated by the RSV and the KJV, since lodges are put in melon fields and not in cucumber gardens. It seems, thus, more likely that the Hebrew קשואים denotes the muskmelon, grown in Egypt since prehistoric times and native to tropical Africa. See also CUCUMBER.

4. Flax (פשתה; λίνον). The identification of this plant (Linum usitatissimum L.; Exod. 9:31; Isa. 42:3; 43:17) is certain. Flax is the most ancient textile plant of the Near Eastern countries. The manufacture of linen from flax was known long before biblical times. Although flax is at present scarcely cultivated in Palestine, it was an important field crop in the period of the Talmud, when a rich agrotechnical vocabulary was associated with this plant. Flax is a tender annual plant, two or three feet high, with narrow leaves and blue or whitish flowers. The fruit is a capsule containing several oleiferous seeds. The oil is used as food and in the paint industry. The material remaining after oil extraction is made into cakes and used as cattle feed. There are two groups of flax varieties: one is grown for oil, the other for fibers. The origin of flax is referred to Anterior Asia. Native to Palestine is a wild flax species, Linum angustifolium L., which is closely related to the cultivated species, and believed by some to be the ancestor of the latter. See also FLAX. Fig. FLA 16.

5. Cotton (כרפס). The rendering "cotton" for this plant (Gossypium herbaceum L.; Esth. 1:6) is not in contradiction with botanical facts. The oriental cotton seems to have been a very ancient crop in Persia, India, and perhaps other countries of Anterior Asia, but its cultivation in Palestine during biblical times may be doubted. Cotton is an annual or perennial plant with large three-to-seven-lobed leaves, and showy flowers, subtended by a cup-shaped involucre. The fruit is a capsule containing several seeds, beset with a dense cover of long white hairs—the cotton fibers. At present cotton grows easily in various parts of the country and yields heavy crops. See also COTTON.

6. Flavors and condiments. a. Anise. Some commentators are right in rendering "dill" (Anethum graveolens L.) for the KJV "anise" (ἄνηθον; Matt. 23:23),* but not for קצח (Isa. 28:25, 27). Indeed, dill is cultivated among the Arabs of Palestine, while the true anise is not. Dill was also grown in ancient times, and its name in the Talmud is שבת. It is an annual plant, ca. two feet high, with leaves dissected into capillary lobes and with large umbels of yellow flowers. The fruits are flattened with marginal wings. It is chiefly used for flavoring pickles, but it also yields an ethereal oil used in medicine. See also ANISE; DILL. Fig. ANI 27.

b. Coriander (גד). This is an annual plant one or two feet high (Coriandrum sativum L.; Exod. 16:31; Num. 11:7). It has strongly dissected leaves and umbels of white flowers. The fruits are globular, ca. 1½ lines across, gray to black. The whole plant has a heavy, unpleasant odor, but the fruits are used as a condiment and are sown by the Arabs in the vegetable gardens, often together with dill. It also occurs in Palestine and Syria as a weed. In the Talmud it is called כסבר. It is also known as a medicinal plant, at present rather obsolete. Its likening to manna should be restricted only to the size and shape of the seeds. See also CORIANDER. Fig. COR 41.

c. Fitches. "Fitches" are mentioned twice by the KJV, once for קצח (Isa. 28:25, 27) and once for כסמים (Ezek. 4:9). Both are mistranslations. The latter is to be identified with emmer (see § A1*b above*), and the former is undoubtedly Nigella sativa L., which is the nutmeg flower or the black coriander. This is in full agreement with the text as regards its threshing and its comparison with cummin. The Arabic name for Nigella sativa is qazḥa. It is an annual plant ca. a foot high with dissected leaves and handsome white to blue flowers. The fruit is a capsule containing many small, black, strongly pungent seeds. The seeds are used in some oriental and East European countries along with cummin as a condiment for dishes, and especially are they sprinkled on bread. At present it is only sparsely cultivated in Palestine vegetable gardens. See also FITCHES.

d. Cummin (כמן; κύμινον). This is an annual plant one to two feet tall (Cuminum cyminum L.; Isa. 28:25, 27; Matt. 23:23). Its leaves are much dissected into long, linear lobes. The small flowers are pink to white and arranged in umbels. The fruits are small, linear to elliptical, and strongly aromatic. Cummin is widely cultivated for the seeds, used as a flavor for liquors, cakes, and bread. In Palestine it is scarcely grown at present. See also CUMMIN. Fig. CUM 54.

e. Mint (ἡδύσμον). This plant (Matt. 23:23; Luke 11:42) is presumably a kind of Mentha, which was probably grown for flavoring because of the strongly aromatic odor of the leaves and flowers. Three species of Mentha are native to Palestine, and none of them is cultivated. See also MINT. Fig. MIN 52.

f. Mustard (σίναπι). The identification Brassica nigra (L.) Koch does not fully agree with the context (Matt. 13:31-32, etc.). This annual plant is known to have been once cultivated for oil secured from the seeds. In Palestine it is at present one of the common weeds, exceeding in height all others and projecting far above the level of grainfields by its flowering branches. Its leaves are large, and lyrate in shape, and its flowers are yellow. Its small, linear pods contain small, blackish seeds. See also MUSTARD. Fig. MUS 93.

g. Saffron (כרכום). Whether this name (Song of S. 4:14) is identical with the tropical Curcuma zedoaria or with Crocus sativus cannot be readily decided. For "crocus" is the Greek and Arabic name; against it is its listing along with foreign spices. Crocus sativus L. is a small, bulbous plant with narrow leaves and a stalk bearing a few showy flowers. The commercial product is the aromatic style and threadlike stigmas of the flower, which are picked out, dried, and pounded into small cakes. It is mainly used as a vegetable dye for coloring food and liquors. Crocus sativus is neither native nor grown in Palestine at the present time, but it might have been once cultivated there for the above purpose, as it is still grown in other countries. Saffron is also used in medicine, as a flavoring, and in perfumes. See also SAFFRON.

7. Balms, drugs, and incense. a. Aloes (אהלות, אהלים; ἀλόη). The identification Aquilaria agallocha Roxb. is given by most of the modern commentators. It refers, however, only to the passages in Ps. 45:8; Prov. 7:17; Song of S. 4:14; John 19:39; and not to Num. 24:6, in which this name should perhaps be substituted by "oaks," as suggested by Moffatt. Aquilaria, or the eaglewood, is a tropical tree native to Southern Asia. It has oblong to lanceolate entire leaves and small flowers arranged in clusters. It has a fragrant wood and is used as an incense and also in medicine and perfumery. See also ALOES. Fig. MAS 16.

b. Balm (צרי). Some authorities identify this name with Balanites aegyptiaca (L.) Del. This is a tropical tree rather common in the oases of the Dead Sea surroundings and the Lower Jordan Valley. It has thorny branches bearing pairs of obovate-elliptical leaflets and clusters of small, greenish flowers. The fruit resembles a small plum and contains oil, which is used by the Arabs for healing various kinds of illness. This identification does not fit the text (Gen. 37:25; 43:11; etc.), insofar as this tree also occurs in Egypt and was not needed to be sent there as a gift. The identification of צרי with Pistacia lentiscus is an absurdity, as the latter does not occur at all in Gilead, as required in Gen. 37:25. See also BALM.

c. Bdellium (בדולח). According to Smith (1898) this is a gum resin secured from certain species of Commiphora native to tropical Arabia. But there is no valid argument for this identification (Gen. 2:12; Num. 11:7). Moffatt denies its identity with plants altogether, translating "bedolach-pearls."

d. Henna (כפר). This word is used in Song of S. 1:14; 4:13 (KJV "camphire"). Loew and others identify this name with Lawsonia inermis L., the henna tree of the Arabs, grown in many Arabic countries for its sweet-scented, white flowers and for its "henna." The latter is a yellow, orange, or red dye prepared in the form of a paste from the crushed leaves mixed with water. This dye is commonly used by Arab women in cosmetics, mainly for coloring the tips and nails of fingers and toes, as well as other parts of the body. Colored nails have been observed on some Egyptian mummies. How far "henna" was used as a cosmetic among the Hebrews is unknown, although cosmetics in general seem to have been rather common during biblical times. That Lawsonia might have been a common garden plant in Jericho and En-gedi in biblical times is ascertained from the fact that it has been observed in Jericho, as well as in Arab gardens of the Coastal Plain. Lawsonia inermis is a small tree with opposite elliptical-lanceolate leaves and with richly branching, flowering panicles. Its fruits are capsules. It is probably native to the East Indies. See also HENNA. Fig. HEN 14.

e. Cane, calamus, sweet cane, sweet calamus. These translations seem to refer to one or a few plant species of the genus Cymbopogon. The Hebrew קנה, which generally means "reed," is here associated with the epithet הטוב, meaning "sweet" or "sweet-scented" (Jer. 6:20, etc.). Sometimes the epithet בשם is added (Exod. 30:23), and in some phrases the epithet has been dropped (Song of S. 4:14, etc.). It is mostly listed along with other spices and drugs. The conventional name of the cane is Cymbopogon martini (Roxb.) Stapf (Andropogon aromaticus Royle). It is a perennial grass, which yields the familiar ginger-grass oil. This species is only one out of a whole group of species yielding sweet-scented, volatile oils (among them ginger-grass oil, citronella oil, lemon-grass oil) known as "Indian grass oils." Another commercially important species is Cymbopogon nardus (L.) Rendle, known for its highly aromatic citronella oil, widely used for perfumes in India and adjacent countries. It is also noteworthy that Cymbopogon schoenanthus (L.) Spreng., found in old Egyptian tombs, is considered by Loret as a source for one of the ingredients of the "sacred perfume" of the ancient Egyptians. It is seen from the above that a few allied species may be involved in the name קנה. See also SWEET CANE.

f. Cassia. There are two Hebrew words rendered "cassia": קדה (Exod. 30:23-24, etc.) and קציעות (Ps. 45:8). For the former Cinnamomum cassia Blume has been suggested by some authorities. Although there is no sound evidence for this identification, it does not disagree with the context of the phrases. Cinnamomum cassia is a tree very like Cinnamomum zeylanicum. It is native to India, Ceylon, and Malaya. The product is the dried bark, peeled off from the branches and stems of the tree in the form of hollow tubes. Its quality is said to be inferior to the true cinnamon. It could have been imported to Palestine via S Arabia, a famous trade center of drugs, incenses, and spices during biblical times. More dubious is the identification of קציעות, suggested by some commentators to be Saussurea lappa (Dec.) Clarke, the Indian orris. This is a perennial plant with large leaves and a tall, thistlelike stem bearing purple flower heads. The roots of this plant possess very fragrant substances used for perfumes and incense and also in medicine. It is native in the Himalaya Mountains, from which it is exported to other countries. See also CASSIA.

g. Cinnamon (קנמון). This is an evergreen tree, twenty to thirty feet high (Cinnamomum zeylanicum Nees; Exod. 30:23; Prov. 7:17; Song of S. 4:14). Its bark is ash-colored, its leaves lanceolate and glossy, and its flowers white and arranged in clusters. It is native to Ceylon and Malaya, but is rather widely cultivated in other tropical countries for its valuable bark, which is peeled off from the younger branches and brought to commerce as hollow bark tubes. Another product is the fragrant oil extracted from the fruits and the bark. The use of cinnamon at the time of the Bible was threefold: as a delicious flavor for food, as a perfume, and as an ingredient of the "holy oil." Like many other spices, it was imported to Palestine via S Arabia or via Tyre by the Phoenicians. See also CINNAMON.

h. Galbanum (חלבנה). The plant referred to is a member of the carrot family (Ferula galbaniflua Boiss. et Buhse [or an allied species]; Exod. 30:34). It is a high perennial herb, with a strong taproot and finely dissected leaves. The yellow or yellowish-green flowers are arranged in umbels. The stem and root contain a yellow or brown gum, which looks like amber. This gum is strongly fragrant when burned. It has been used both in medicine and as an incense in Asian countries. Persia is believed to be the country of origin of galbanum. In biblical days it was used as an ingredient of the incense in the tabernacle. See also GALBANUM.

i. Incense, frankincense (לבונה, לבנה). It is generally agreed that the Hebrew name (Exod. 30:34) is identical with certain species of Boswellia. These are low trees or shrubs with pinnate leaves and small white or green flowers.* They grow in E tropical Africa, in tropical Arabia, and in India. The branches exude a gum in the form of glittering drops, which when burned or heated give off a strong balsam odor. By making incisions in the bark of the branches, the amount is considerably increased. This gum was imported from Arabia, chiefly for the use of sacrificial services. Some authorities maintain that the incense used in the service was not a pure substance but a mixture of several ingredients. It is now known that the incense was also used by the Egyptians and others for embalming and fumigating. "Frankincense" (λίβανος) appears in the NT in Matt. 2:11; Rev. 18:13. See also FRANKINCENSE. Fig. STA 76.

j. Myrrh. This name occurs as a translation of both לט (Gen. 37:25) and מור, מר (Song of S. 5:13). The identification of the former is very obvious. It is generally believed that לט is a fragrant gum known as "labdanum" or "ladanum" or "laudanum," which is exuded from a species of Cistus. The assumption that this is Cistus creticus is not consistent with the pertaining text, as this species does not occur in Gilead. The other two suggested species, Cistus salvifolius and Cistus villosus, are much more common in W Palestine than in Gilead. Moreover, it is doubtful that these plants ever secrete gum. It is therefore not improbable that the Greek rendition στακτή for לט and נטף (Exod. 30:34) is right, and both names may refer to a species of Commiphora (opobalsamum), as suggested by the ASV mg., or to another gum-bearing plant. The Hebrew מור is generally identified with Commiphora myrrha (Nees) Engl. or with an allied species. *Commiphora myrrha is native to Arabia, Abyssinia, and Somaliland. It is a thorny shrub or a small tree with leaves composed of three leaflets; the flowers are small, and the fruits are plumlike drupes. A fragrant, slightly bitter and pungent resin is exuded from the branches and stems. By making incisions in the bark, larger amounts of this gum can be obtained. The gum was once highly esteemed as a drug, a perfume, and an embalming substance. It was also an ingredient of the holy oil, along with other aromatic substances. "Myrrh" (σμύρνα) appears in the NT in Mark 15:23; John 19:39. See also MYRRH. Fig. MYR 94.

k. Spikenard, nard (נרד). This is a perennial herb of the valerian family, with strongly aromatic rootstocks (Nardostachys jatamansi [Wall.] DC.; Song of S. 1:12). The stem is one to twenty-one inches high; the leaves are oblong to ovate. The flowers are arranged in heads. The fruits are small and hairy. It is native to the Himalaya Mountains and is used as a perfume in India and other Asian countries. It is also known in commerce. For "nard" in the NT (νάρδος; Mark 14:3; John 12:3), see NARD. Fig. NAR 6.

l. Spices (בשם). These are mentioned in Exod. 25:6; 30:23; 35:8; I Kings 10:10; etc., and are also referred wrongly sometimes to צרי (e.g., Ezek. 27:17; "balm"). The Hebrew בשם, בשמים, has been variously translated. It includes such spices as balm, balsam. The Hebrew name, although not always denoting a specific plant or its products, refers mostly to Commiphora opobalsamum (L.) Engl. or to its products. Commiphora opobalsamum is a tropical deciduous shrub growing in SW Arabia. It has trifoliate leaves and white flowers. It contains a deliciously fragrant resin, which exudes from the branches in the form of yellow drops, not unlike honey drops. When hardening, the resin turns dark. The yield may be increased by making incisions in the stem and branches. In Arabia the resin is highly esteemed in medicine. In the days of the Bible it was used as an ingredient of holy oil and incense, as well as for a perfume, and probably also as a medicinal substance. According to various sources this plant has been grown since the time of Solomon and thereafter in Jericho, and probably also in En-gedi, Zoar, etc. These localities present tropical sites in the Jordan Valley and in the Dead Sea surroundings. It may also have been grown in the lowlands of Gilead near the outlets of the rivers Nimrim and Jabbok, which are also tropical; hence the name "balm of Gilead." It is highly probable that, along with the latter species, other species of Commiphora, such as Commiphora myrrha, were cultivated in this tropical zone of Palestine. It is also highly probable that these "balm gardens" were partially, at least, planted from seeds brought by the Queen of Sheba. They lasted long after the conquest of Judea by Titus; and there are records on the existence of the "balm shrub" in Palestine from the first centuries of the Christian era. For NT references to "spices" (ἄρωμα; Mark 16:1; Luke 23:56; 24:1; John 19:40), see SPICE.

8. Costly timbers. a. Ebony (הבנים). The identification of this tree (Ezek. 27:15) as Diospyros ebenum Koenig seems to be correct. The name is of Egyptian origin. Ebony wood was well known in Egypt, and pieces of it, as well as some of its manufactures, were found in old Egyptian tombs. The wood of this tropical tree is highly praised, and is listed along with ivory and gold. It is a black or dark brown wood, hard, heavy, and most durable. It is used for costly furniture, instruments, and ornaments. It is a tall tree, indigenous in Ceylon, with simple leaves and bell-shaped flowers. It is also probable that some other species of the genus Diospyros are involved in the name "ebony." See also EBONY.

b. Gopher wood (גפר). All the attempts to identify gopher (Gen. 6:14) with trees like pine, cypress, plane tree, etc., are unacceptable. See also GOPHER WOOD.

c. Algum, almug timber (אלמגים, אלגומים). The identity of this tree (I Kings 10:11-12; II Chr. 2:8; 9:10-12) is uncertain. See also ALMUG.

9. Forest trees and shrubs. a. Acacia tree, acacia wood (שטה, שטים). This tree (Exod. 25:5-38; Deut. 10:3; etc.) is the Acacia raddiana Savi. The Egyptian name šnḏt, from which the Hebrew name is derived, is still preserved by the Arabs for Acacia albida Del. But this species does not occur in Sinai. Of the three species native to Sinai, Acacia raddiana is the most common and most suitable for building purposes. It is an evergreen tree, ten to eighteen feet tall, with a thick trunk and a spreading crown. The branches bear strong spines which are the stipules of the small, bipinnate leaves. The small, yellow flowers are aggregated in globular heads. The pods are spirally curved and bear many seeds. The wood is hard and durable. The locality Shittim in the Jordan Valley was called so because of the abundance of acacia trees in the surrounding territory. See also ACACIA. Pl. XII*e-f.*

b. Bay tree. This is the KJV translation of אזרח in Ps. 37:35 (RSV CEDAR). For discussion of the bay tree (Laurus nobilis), see BAY TREE.

c. Bush, thornbush (סנה). The identification Rubus sanctus Schreb. for this plant (Exod. 3:2-4) is recorded here after Loew (Fl. d. Juden 3:178). The bush is common in moist soils and near river banks throughout Palestine and Syria. It is a shrub ca. three feet high, with spiny branches and leaves composed of three oblong or roundish leaflets. The white or pink flowers are arranged in clusters, and the fruit is an edible berry. Neither this identification nor that which renders "acacia" has any satisfactory base. Rubus was not observed in Sinai, while the true name for "acacia" is shiṭṭa.

d. Cedar (ארז). This is the Cedrus libani Barrel. The cedar of Lebanon is one of the most famous trees of the plant world. It is a mighty, beautiful, and long-living tree of the pine family. It reaches a height of a hundred feet or so, and its trunk may attain a width of six to nine feet. In the cedar forests of the Lebanon there are specimens a thousand years old or older. Its crown is very broad and its branches horizontally spread. Its green-gray needles are borne in clusters. The male flowers are arranged in linear, oblong cones and the female in ovate, globular ones. The mature female cones are ovate, ca. three inches long. The seed-bearing scales of the cone detach from one another at maturity. The cedar is rather common in middle and N Lebanon, where it is confined to an altitude between 4,500 and 5,700 feet above sea level. There are indications that in the past it also occurred in S Lebanon, but it never grew in Palestine. Apart from Lebanon, this species of cedar also occurs in the Taurus Mountains, and a particular variety of it grows in Cyprus. Since ancient times, Lebanon cedars were cut and exported to Egypt, Assyria, and Palestine. Its timber was used for construction of temples and royal palaces, as well as for shipbuilding. At the time of David and Solomon, as well as thereafter, large amounts of cedar timber were imported into Palestine for the construction of the temple and other houses. The cedar was a symbol of grandeur and might (Ps. 92:12—H 92:13, etc.), pride and majesty (II Kings 14:9, etc.). It is mentioned seventy times in the Bible, but some of the references, at least those associated with purification of the lepers and of infested houses, are certainly to be referred to other conifers, such as *Pinus halepensis or Juniperus phoenicea (see §§ 9*g, m, below*). See also CEDAR. Fig. PIN 57.

e. Cypress (תאשור). The identification Cupressus sempervirens L. var. horizontalis (Mill.) Gord. refers only to those cases where "cypress" is rendered for תאשור, as in Isa. 41:19; 60:13; Ezek. 27:6 (RSV PINE). One of the most absurd translations of תאשור is the box or box tree (Buxus sp.), a tree neither native to nor ever grown in Palestine. Smith, Moffatt, and Loew are right in rendering "cypress" for תאשור, for geographical and linguistic reasons. The cypress is native to Palestine and has recently been found growing wild in Gilead and Edom. It is also commonly cultivated all over Palestine. It is thirty to fifty feet high, with an erect trunk and spreading branches (the pyramidal form is a cultivated variety of this species). The leaves are minute, scalelike, and appressed to the branches. The seed-bearing cones are globular, an inch or so across; the seeds are narrowly winged. The cypress is native mainly to the E Mediterranean countries. It is used as an ornamental and as a windbreak tree, but also in building. Its wood is known for its durability. See also CYPRESS.

f. Fir, fir tree. There is much confusion among the translators and commentators in the identification of the Hebrew names of trees and shrubs; and the fir tree is just one example. It has been rendered for the Hebrew אזרח, תאשור, ברוש, etc. Most authorities, however, render "fir" for ברוש, ברות. This refers to one of the juniper species growing along with the cedar in the Lebanon, most probably to Juniperus excelsa Bieb. It is a high and robust tree with spreading branches, much resembling the cedar in structure. It is strongly fragrant; its leaves are small and scale-shaped, and its female cones are fleshy, small, globular bodies less than half an inch across. Its timber is highly valued in building because of its durability. That neither the Cupressus sempervirens nor the Pinus halepensis should be referred to this name is evident from the fact that both these trees are native to Palestine and would not have been imported from the Lebanon. See also FIR; PINE.

g. Heath. This name is rendered in some translations for ערער, ערוער, in Jer. 17:6; 48:6. This translation is erroneous, as there are no heath trees in deserts. More plausible is the identification with Juniperus, as given by some commentators. The Arabic name 'ar'ār is still preserved for Juniperus phoenicea L., of which single trees and small groups of trees are met with in Sinai and in the S outskirts of Mount Seir facing the Desert of Edom. Juniperus phoenicea is a shrub or a small tree with an ovate oblong crown and with small, scalelike leaves. The cones are small and globular. It is common throughout the Mediterranean countries. See also JUNIPER.

h. Juniper. This is the KJV translation of רתם (I Kings 19:5, etc.; RSV BROOM), which is Retama raetam (Forsk.) Webb. The Arabic ratam is still applied to this plant. It is a broomlike, much-branched shrub three to six feet high. It bears small, oblong-lanceolate leaves in winter and has handsome white flowers arranged in small clusters. The fruit is a one- or two-seeded pod. It is most characteristic of the deserts and sand dunes and is used by the Bedouins for fuel.

i. Laurel (ארן). It is now well established that this name, mentioned only once in the Bible (Isa. 44:14), is not an "ash," as translated by the KJV, but the laurel (Laurus nobilis L.; RSV CEDAR). This is linguistically well argued by Loew. The laurel is an evergreen, dioecious tree, reaching fifteen feet in height. It has leathery, ovate or elliptical leaves and white-cream flower clusters. The fruit is a black berry, somewhat smaller than the olive fruit. All parts of the plants contain fragrant ethereal oil, well known in medicine as the laurel oil. The leaves and the fruits are used for flavoring pickles. The laurel is native to Palestine and to other Mediterranean countries. It is a member of the forests and maquis and blossoms in spring. In modern Hebrew ארן is applied to Pinus halepensis, and Laurus is called after its Aramaic name, ערא.

j. Hyssop (אזוב; ὕσσωπος). A large body of literature has been accumulated on the biblical hyssop (Majorana syriaca [L.] Feinb.; Exod. 12:22; Lev. 14:4; etc.). Perhaps no plant name has been so controversially and inconsistently interpreted as the hyssop. But it is now almost agreed and validly based that the hyssop is identical with Majorana syriaca (Origanum maru L.). It is in full agreement with the context of all the phrases in the Bible in which it is mentioned, including I Kings 4:33, as it also grows between rocks and cliffs. One of the most convincing evidences for this identification is that the plant is still in use with the Samaritans, who apply its branches as a brush for the sprinkling of the blood of the Passover sacrifice. This is a perennial herbaceous white, hairy shrub, one to two feet high, with slender branches and small ovate, opposite and woolly-hairy leaves. The minute, white flowers are arranged in small, dense heads or spikes. The whole plant is strongly aromatic, reminiscent of mint; and, like the latter, it is used for extraction of an ethereal oil. Its slender branches can be easily cut, made into bunches, and used as sprinklers. In the Bible it was a symbol of humbleness as against the grandeur of the cedar (I Kings 4:33). It was used for sprinkling the doorposts of the Israelites in Egypt, for purification of lepers and infested houses, and also in the sacrifice of the red heifer. In the NT it was used to administer vinegar to Jesus, according to John 19:29. See also HYSSOP. Fig. HYS 38.

k. Mallow (מלוח). This species of Atriplex (Atriplex halimus L.; Job 30:4) is the most common in the saltlands of Palestine. The leaves are often eaten by hungry shepherds of the desert. Thus it fits well the context in Job. Atriplex halimus is a shrub up to four feet high. Its ovate, obtuse leaves are covered with vesicular hairs. Its small, green flowers are arranged in spikelike bodies, and its small fruits bear single seeds. See also MALLOW.

l. Myrtle (הדס). The myrtle (Myrtus communis L.; Neh. 8:15; Isa. 41:19; 55:13; Zech. 1:8, 10-11) is an evergreen, much-branched shrub, two to four feet high. The leaves are glabrous, ovate to lanceolate, opposite or arranged in whorls of threes. The flowers are white and arranged in clusters. The fruits are blue-blackish berries. Almost all the parts of the plant contain a fragrant aromatic oil used in perfumeries. The fruits are edible. It is native to Palestine and other Mediterranean countries. At present it is met with in Mount Carmel and Galilee, but it has been found in Samaria and near Jerusalem. It thus fits geographically the context in Nehemiah. While the myrtle played an important part in classical mythology and was a symbol of heroism and immortality, it has typified peace and thanksgiving with the Hebrews. It has continuously remained, together with the ethrog, the palm leaf, and the willow branches, one of the "four kinds" used by the Jews in the tabernacle feast. See also MYRTLE.

m. Oil tree, wild olive (עץ השמן). This is probably the Pinus halepensis Mill. (Neh. 8:15; Isa. 41:19; etc.). Not all the interpretations of the Hebrew name are acceptable. They are in conflict with the contexts in which the name is mentioned, both for geographical and for botanical reasons. It is certainly not identical with the olive tree, which has a name of its own so commonly used in everyday life. This name has not been changed in the Talmud nor by the Arabs and other Semitic peoples. Olive-tree wood is very little used in carpentry, and among the thirty-eight occurrences of זית in the Bible there is not a single one associated with building or wood manufacture. In Nehemiah the true olive tree is listed along with the oil tree. This is sufficient to show that "oil tree" and "olive tree" are different trees. The translation "wild olive" (RSV), which is a low, thorny bush, for the oil tree is even more improbable, because one can neither build from its wood nor fetch branches of it, as the phrase in Nehemiah demands. That the oil tree is not a species of Elaeagnus, as misunderstood by some students, follows from the fact that the latter is an introduced plant, rather rare in Palestine. It is also very doubtful whether it was grown in Palestine at the time of the Bible. Pinus halepensis is most likely the plant to fit the context, at least in most of the phrases in which עץ השמן is mentioned. It was one of the most common evergreen trees of Palestine, occurring all over the mountain range from the Lebanon in the N to Hebron in the S. There are evidences that the surroundings of Jerusalem were once densely inhabited by this tree. It has a soft, workable wood and is largely used in building and carpentry. The most convincing support for this assumption is the fact that this tree (or Pinus bruttia, which is very close to it) is up to the present day named by Kurdish Jews עץ השמן. These Jews are undoubtedly descendants of old Babylonian Jewish communities with which the true Hebrew name of the pine has been preserved. It is called "oil tree" because tar and turpentine are secured from it. Pinus halepensis, the Aleppo pine, or the Jerusalem pine, is thirty to fifty feet high. It has an ovate or round crown. The needles are arranged in pairs; the male flowers are borne on the lower branches, while the ovate, ca.-three-inch-long female cones are confined to the upper branches. Pinus halepensis is now widely used in afforestation.

n. Oak (אלון, אלונים). There is no question that אלה and אלון—namely, terebinth and oak respectively —represent different trees (Quercus calliprinos Webb, Quercus ithaburensis Decne). This is obvious from Isa. 6:13; Hos. 4:13; etc. Specific identification of אלה and אלון is difficult. This does not exclude the possibility that all these names may also have been applied to big trees in general. There are three species of oaks in Palestine, but only the two mentioned above are involved in the biblical name. Quercus calliprinos is an evergreen tree which may attain a height of fifty feet. The leaves are leathery and often spiny-margined, 1-1½ inches long. The flowers are inconspicuous, and the fruit is an acorn. It is the most common tree in the Mediterranean parts of Palestine and also in other E Mediterranean countries. Quercus ithaburensis is a broad-leaved, deciduous tree, confined to lower altitudes and less common than the former. Both are leading plants of forests and maquis (bushy lands); aged trees of both species are found as "sacred trees" or "sacred woods." The oak symbolized might and grandeur (Amos 2:9) and long life (Isa. 6:13). It was also connected with sacrificial offering (Hos. 4:13), and under the shade of the oak the dead of the beloved were buried (Gen. 35:8). See also OAK.

o. Plane tree (ערמון). The plane tree (Platanus orientalis L.; Gen. 30:37; Ezek. 31:8; KJV "chestnut tree") is a deciduous tree, thirty to fifty feet high, with a broad, ovate crown and large, hairy, deeply lobed (three to five lobes) leaves. The flowers are green and inconspicuous, and are arranged in globular heads pending on long stalks. It grows on river banks, mainly in the N part of Palestine. See also PLANE TREE.

p. Storax tree (לבנה; Gen. 30:37; Hos. 4:13; RSV POPLAR). It is surprising how far some interpreters went in putting along with the native oak and terebinth, growing on dry hillsides, an introduced tree which requires deep soil and heavy irrigation such as the poplar. If this is because the Hebrew name requires a white plant, there is a white tree growing naturally among the oaks and terebinths, known as the storax tree (Styrax officinalis L.). This is called by the Arabs 'abhar, meaning "bright," and they also call it lubnā. Styrax officinalis is certainly not that tree supplying the costly drug which is known in pharmacopeias under "storax" and which comes from Liquidambar spp. or from Styrax benzoin. This gum has been considered, without valid reasons, to represent the Hebrew נטף, rendered "stacte" in the Greek and other translations. There is also no evidence whatever for the identification of נטף with Liquidambar orientalis Mill., as maintained by others. Styrax officinalis is a small tree or a high shrub with ovate leaves, green above and woolly white beneath. It has long, flexible twigs, and blossoms in spring. Its white, showy flowers remind one of those of the orange tree. The fruit is a green, velvety drupe in the size of a hazelnut. It is common all over the E Mediterranean countries. See also STACTE.

q. Tamarisk (אשל). Identification of this tree (Tamarix aphylla [L.] Karst., Tamarix gallica L.; Gen. 21:33; I Sam. 22:6; etc.) is certain. The Arabic name, 'athl, is still preserved for one of the above species. Tamarisks grow abundantly in deserts, on dunes, in salt marshes, and on river banks. All mentions of אשל in the Bible fit perfectly Tamarix, both botanically and geographically. Tamarix aphylla is a leafless tree with green, jointed branches and a wide-spreading crown. It flowers in late summer; its small, white flowers are arranged in short racemes. The fruits are capsules with minute, feathery seeds. It is one of the fast-growing trees of Palestine. See also TAMARISK. Pl. XVI*b*.

r. Terebinth, turpentine tree (אלה). The identification is sure (Pistacia palaestina Boiss., Pistacia atlantica Desf.; Isa. 6:13; Hos. 4:13; etc.), with the exception of some mention in the form of אלה and אלון (see § 9*n above*). The renditions of "teil tree" and "elm" for the above Hebrew name by some translations are to be rejected, for the following reasons: the teil has only recently been introduced into Palestine; the elm has been recently found and is exceedingly rare. Both can by no means replace the common terebinth tree. The Palestine terebinth is a dioecious and deciduous tree, sometimes reaching a height of thirty feet. Its leaves are compounded of three to five pairs of lanceolate-elliptical leaflets, one to two inches long. The flowers are inconspicuous; the female ones develop small, globular stone fruits which have an acrid odor of turpentine. They are often roasted and eaten as nuts. While this is an E Mediterranean species, Pistacia atlantica is a semidesert tree characteristic of the E and S border of the Mediterranean zone. It is very similar in habit to the former, but it often grows to a higher tree with a broad and dense crown. As with oaks, there are many high and aged trees left of the once-flourishing steppe forests of the atlantic terebinth. Among them are also some "sacred trees" and small "sacred woods." See also TEREBINTH; NUT. Fig. TER 51.

s. Thick tree (עץ עבות). All the identifications as yet suggested for this name (Lev. 23:40; Neh. 8:15; RSV "leafy tree"), with the probable exception of myrtle, are unacceptable.

t. Willow (ערבים). This may be identified both as Salix spp. and as Populus euphratica Oliv. (Lev. 23:40; Ps. 137:2). The willows of Ps. 137 are most certainly Euphrates poplars, for the following reasons: (a) Populus euphratica is so common on the banks of the "waters of Babylon" that no other tree may fit better the context than it. It is true that there are also some Salix species, but they are comparatively rare. (b) The Euphrates poplar is well known by producing narrow lanceolate or linear willow leaves on its younger shoots and branches, and this makes the tree very similar to a willow. (c) The Arabic name gharab, still preserved for the Euphrates poplar, is identical with the Hebrew ערב. The name in Lev. 23:40 means true willows, since the poplar is confined in Palestine to the Jordan Valley only, while willows occur near rivers, also in the mountain region. Populus euphratica is a high tree with two forms of leaves: broad rhomboid to ovate deltoid leaves and linear-lanceolate or oblong ones. The small flowers are arranged in catkins, and the fruits are capsules containing numerous minute seeds furnished with a bunch of hairs. On the banks of the Jordan River this tree forms, along with the Jordan tamarisk, dense thickets. Of the willows of Palestine the most common is Salix acmophylla Boiss. Willows differ from the poplars by their narrow leaves and by some details in the floral structure. They never attain the size of poplars. See also WILLOW TREE.

On "ash," see § A9*i above*. On "box tree" see § A9*e above*. On "chestnut tree," see § A9*o above*. On "elm," see § A9*r above*. On "pine," see § A9*m above*. On "poplar," see §§ A9*p, t, above;* MULBERRY TREES. On "stacte," see §§ A7*j,* 9*p, above*. On "teil," see §A9*r above*.

10. Lilies and roses. Lilies and roses, anemones, hyacinths, tulips, daffodils, irises, and many other showy plants have been suggested by various translators and commentators to represent the two names שושנים, שושן, שושנה, and חבצלת. A tremendous body of literature dealing with this subject has been accumulated (see the works of Loew and Moldenke in the bibliography). It is probable that all the suggestions presented in the current literature for identification of these Hebrew names are devoid of any scientific or otherwise convincing bases. Reference to "lilies" illustrates this point:

The expression "lilies of the field" (κρίνον; Matt. 6:28; cf. Luke 12:27) probably refers merely to the "flowers of the field." The reasons for this opinion are:

a) The Hebrew name שושנה, שושנים, in Song of S. 2:1-2, 16; 4:5; 6:2-4, is not identical with Lilium candidum L., as many authors incline to believe, or take for granted. Lilium candidum, the only lily native in Palestine, grows neither in the valleys nor among thorns or "brambles." It is an extremely rare plant, and from its ecological behavior it is evident that it must have been so also in the past. It has been found only in two localities: in Upper Galilee and on Mount Carmel. In both, it is hidden in shady holes or among cliffs, within dense woodland. Thus, there is no pasturing (feeding) among lilies, as suggested in the Song of Songs. But there are amazing quantities of most beautiful flowers forming variegated carpets in the plains, and there are handsome and attractive flowers among pastures and thorns of the hills. Mention may be made of only a few of over two scores of genera comprising most attractive flowers, such as Ranunculus, Anemone, Cyclamen, Arum, Colchicum, Allium, Fritillaria, Tulipa, Hyacinthus, Sternbergia, Narcissus, Pancratium, Ixiolirion, crocus, iris, and orchids. Each of them, because of its beauty, has its right to represent the "lily."

b) There is reason to believe that the name שושן, shûshan, is not specific and that it may denote the blossom of a plant or any plant with showy flowers. E.g., there is a phrase in the Talmud: שושנה של ורד (shôshannâ shel wered), the "blossom of the rose." According to one authority, the Arabic cognate sûsan denotes in some countries any brilliantly colored flower. In Palestine the Arabs call various attractive flowers ward, a name also specific for the rose plant. This may lead to the assumption that the name sûsan and its variants may have primarily denoted a particular plant species, and even Lilium candidum itself, but in time—and this may have happened very early in history—the name became generalized and abstract, denoting a certain group of flowers similar in some qualities to the original subject. The choice of "narcissus" to represent the חבצלת in Isa. 35:1 lacks any basis. There are more showy flowers to symbolize the gladness and blossoming of the desert. It seems that a good part of the literature about this subject is unproductive guesswork on nonidentifiable items. See also LILY.

Pls. XI*b;* XII*c*.

11. Reeds and rushes. This is a group of plants which possess many specific characteristics, such as the "reedy" habit and the confinement to swampy and aquatic habitats. As a group, these plants are easily recognizable. But it is rather difficult to distinguish between individual species and genera within this group. Ordinarily people are thus satisfied with a general name, such as "reed" or "rush." There is no reason to believe that botanical items were more accurately known by the people of the Bible than by people of today. Thus, confusion and uncertainty in naming and identification are quite natural. The names involved in this group are: קנה, סוף, גמא, אחו, אגמון, and אגם. They have been variously translated and even inconsistently rendered by the same authority. The renditions in English translations are "reed," "rush," "papyrus," "bulrush," "hook," "caldron," "flag," "meadow." In many cases the names denote the whole group, although originally they may have been specific. The following is a short presentation of the most plausible identifications suggested:

a. Reeds (קנה). There are at least five species of reeds in the flora of Palestine to which this name can be applied (II Kings 18:21; Job 40:21; Isa. 19:6; etc.). Among them, Phragmites communis Trin. is the most common and thus fits best the context of some phrases. It occurs along river banks all over Palestine. It is 4-10 feet high and ½-1 inch thick. It has a fluffy panicle of flowers, 1-1½ feet long. It very often grows together with Typha angustata, the cattail (see § A11*c below*). It must, however, be remarked that in some phrases (Job 40:21; Isa. 19:6; 35:7) this name has a more collective sense, comprising reed vegetation in general. See also REED; SWEET CANE. Pl. IX*c*.

b. Rush, papyrus, bulrushes (גמא). This Hebrew name has not always been uniformly translated (Exod. 2:3; Job 8:11; Isa. 18:2; 35:7). In Job it may well be a collective name, but in the remaining passages it fits well Cyperus papyrus L., which is very outstanding in its appearance and could not have been ignored. The papyrus plant is a perennial rush, ten to fifteen feet high and one to three inches thick. The green culm terminates in a compound umbel of long, flower-bearing rays. The flowers and fruits are inconspicuous. The culm is made of a soft white pith provided with air chambers. It is a tropical plant reaching in Palestine its N range of distribution. This is the famous papyrus plant of the ancients, from which papyrus rolls were prepared. Apart from the above use, the papyrus was one of the most important sources for various wickerwork, manufacture of mats, rods, and also small canoes. In Palestine it is very abundant in the Hule Valley, but also occurs in the Coastal Plain. In Egypt, where this plant was also used in ornaments, it disappeared from the banks of the Lower Nile. See also BULRUSH; PAPYRUS.

c. Cattail (סוף). This is the Typha angustata Bory et Chaub. It is mentioned several times in the Bible (Exod. 2:3, 5; Isa. 19:6; Jonah 2:5; RSV "reed," "weed") and sometimes with קנה. From its occurring together with Phragmites, as well as from its Egyptian name (twfy), from which סוף was probably derived, the above identification gains some support. But this does not exclude the fact that this name was also applied as a group name. Typha angustata is a tall, grasslike perennial with very long, striplike, erect leaves and a cylindrical stem, bearing at the upper part separate male and female inflorescences of very minute flowers and fruits. It is used in various wickerworks. See also REED.

d. Rush, bulrush, hook, caldron (אגמון). This word is rendered "rush," "bulrush," and also "hook," "caldron," etc., in various translations. To restrict the meaning of this name more specifically, certain members of the genus Scirpus would fit best the content of the relevant phrases in the Bible. As lacustral plants they agree with the Hebrew name, which is derived from אום, "lake." The flowering heads of the plants are bent down (Isa. 58:5). They are lower than the common reed (Isa. 9:14; 19:15). The culms are flexible and used in wickerwork. As far as this name in Job 41:2—H 40:26 refers to plants, the plants under discussion are not contrary to the context. The Hebrew name אגם in Jer. 51:32 probably means "swamp vegetation" and not "lake." Burning of the swamp plants in order to accelerate their growth is common practice with the inhabitants of the swamp areas. See also RUSH; REED.

e. Flag, meadow, reeds (אחו). Mentioned in Gen. 41:2; Job 8:11, this is a loan word from Egyptian iyh and ihy. Most of the translations rendering "meadow" for אחו seem to be right. In the vicinity of water bodies there is a vegetation of grasses and low rushes fed by underground water or by floods. These are excellent grazing areas. See also FLAG.

12. Thorns and thistles. The number of Palestinian plants which belong to the category of thorns and thistles is much over a hundred. The biblical names, generally conceived as thorny or spiny plants, do not exceed fifteen. These are: אטד, ברקן, דרדר, חוח, חדק, נעצוץ, נחלול, סרפד, סלון, סירים, קוץ, קמוש, שמיר, שית. The English names used in various translations are "thorn," "thistle," "bramble," and "brier."

There are great difficulties, not only in the identification of these names with existing plants, but also in finding English names for them. Thus, it is no wonder that the above names have been so variously and inconsistently translated. Ordinary observers, and even some in touch with the native vegetation, are seldom able to distinguish between the various kinds of thistles and produce specific names for them. As in the case of lilies and roses, many names of thistles, which have been primarily specific, became later generalized. It seems that such phrases as קוץ ודרדר (Gen. 3:18, etc.; "thorns and thistles"), שמיר ושית (Isa. 5:6, etc.; "briers and thorns"), etc., sometimes repeatedly mentioned, became with time devoid of a specific meaning. There are, however, some particular plants in this group which for some reason deserve consideration.

a. Thorn. The thorn (Matt. 27:29; John 19:2), of which the "crown" of Jesus was made, has been much discussed in literature, and the usual opinion now is that this was Zizyphus spina-christi (L.)* or Paliurus spina-christi Mill. Neither Linné nor Miller, who named these species, was acquainted with the vegetation around Jerusalem. Zizyphus spina-christi does not occur naturally in the Judean mountains, and there was no reason why the people of the Bible should have grown it there. A few trees have quite recently been planted in the vicinity of Gethsemane. This is a tropical tree which is rather common in the plains and valleys of Palestine, up to an altitude of a thousand feet or so. Paliurus spina-christi is a very rare shrub, confined to N Palestine, and has not been found S of Mount Tabor. But there are several spiny plants common in the vicinity of the place supposed to be Golgotha. Among them Poterium spinosum L., the סירים of the Bible (see § A15 below), is the most common. This is a low shrub of the rose family, with inconspicuous flowers, with small, compound leaves and thorny branches, of which the thorny wreath of Jesus might have been made. See also THORNS, CROWN OF; THISTLES. Fig. THI 59.

b. Brier (חדק). The only support for the identification of this plant (Mic. 7:4) as Solanum incanum L. is the Arabic name ḥadaq, still preserved for this plant. Solanum incanum is a perennial shrub, three to five feet high. The whole plant is beset with dense, woolly hairs. The branches and the leaves bear curved spines. The leaves are rather large with wavy margins. The flowers are pink or blue, and the fruit is a large yellow, nonedible berry containing several seeds. The plant is native to Dead Sea surroundings, and to the Lower Jordan Valley. See also BRIER.

c. Thistle. This name has been rendered in the translations for several Hebrew names of spiny plants. Only two of these names may be considered here: (a) דרדר (Gen. 3:18; Hos. 10:8), identified as Centaurea sp.; (b) חוח (Job 31:40; Isa. 34:13), identified as Scolymus sp. The identification of the former is based on the Arabic name shawk ed-dardār, which is applied to one or more species of Centaurea ("star thistle"), the most common of which are Centaurea iberica Trev. and Centaurea hyalolepis Boiss.* These are annual or biennial plants, in which most of the leaves are arranged in a rosette. The stem is much-branched and bears flowering heads surrounded by spiny scales. The flowers are mostly yellow. The leaves are gathered in winter by villagers and Bedouins, and are used as salads. See § A14*c below*. Fig. THI 58; Pl. XIV*b*.

Of Scolymus there are two species, and that which corresponds best to the context in Job is Scolymus maculatus L. This is a noxious weed abundant in the grain fields. It is three to four feet high. The stem is provided with spiny wings, and its green leaves have white patches and veins. The yellow flowers are arranged in spiny heads. On fallow ground it occupies large stretches. The same Hebrew name in Isa. 34:13 may well correspond to Scolymus hispanicus L. In II Kings 14:9 the חוח may well be identified with Prunus ursina Ky., a thorny shrub of the rose family, which bears small apricot fruits and which is quite common in the Lebanon.

13. Weeds and nettles. The number of weeds in Palestine fields is amazingly large. The names mentioned in the OT and commonly regarded as weeds are: חרול, גלגל, באשה. The names in English are "nettle," "wheel," "cockle," respectively. "Tare" is mentioned in the NT only.

a. Nettle (חרול). Many commentators agree that this name (Job 30:7; Zeph. 2:9; etc.) is identical with plants of the genus Urtica. In Palestine four species are involved, all of them being annuals with opposite broad, dentate leaves. The flowers and fruits are green and inconspicuous. The whole plant is beset with stinging hairs, which excrete an irritating liquid when touched. Some of these species grow on damp places, refuse heaps, or roadsides. See also NETTLE.

b. Wheel, rolling thing, whirling dust (גלגל). This name (Ps. 83:13; Isa. 17:13) has been variously translated. The most plausible translation is that of Goodspeed: "tumble weed." But this is surely not Anastatica hisrochuntica, as maintained by Moldenke and others, because this plant never rolls over the surface, but sticks to the ground for years. Besides, it is a very rare and tiny plant confined to the environs of the Dead Sea and the Arava Valley. In the flora of Palestine there are at least thirty species which are most typical tumble weeds. These are mostly much-branching annuals or perennials, the main stem of which breaks near its base after seed ripening, and rolls with the wind over plains and valleys. They look mostly like globular bodies. Sometimes a few of them meet together to form larger bodies which may frighten animals. The most common tumble weeds are Gundelia tournefortii, Cachrys goniocarpa, Aellenia autrani, Salsola kali.

c. Cockle (באשה). This is a mistranslation in Job 31:40 KJV. Cockle (Agrostemma githago L.) is exceedingly rare in Palestine and probably a newcomer. This word seems to be a collective name for "weeds" (so RSV). Similarly the word באושים in Isa. 5:2, 4, means grapes of wild or inferior vines.

d. Tares (ζιζάνιον). This is the KJV form of "weeds" in Matt. 13:24-30. It is now generally agreed that the word refers to the darnel, or Lolium temulentum L., an annual grass two to four feet high. The leaves are like those of wheat, but the ears are narrow and composed of many-flowered spikelets. The grains are equal in size and shape to those of certain varieties of wheat. They pass the screen meshes with the wheat grains and are therefore sown together with them, or ground with them into flour. Because of a fungus growing under the seed coat of the darnel grains, flour containing much of the darnel has a bitter taste and is even believed to be poisonous. The darnel is therefore one of the most noxious weeds of the grain crops. See also TARES.

14. Wormwoods and poisons. a. Gall, hemlock. These words are used by the KJV to translate ראש and רוש in Deut. 29:18; Jer. 23:15; etc. Some authorities claim that in most passages the Hebrew rôsh is a poisonous plant or one with a bitter root. In Hos. 10:4 rôsh is translated "hemlock" in the KJV. This is Conium maculatum L., which is rather common in waste places throughout Palestine. It is a much-branched perennial herb, three to four feet high with cut leaves like the carrot plant; it has large white-flowered umbels and small, ellipsoid fruits. It is supposed to be the plant whose poisonous juice was given to Socrates to drink. This is not contrary to the context of the pertaining passages in the Bible in which rôsh is mentioned with "wormwood" (לענה). It should, however, be remarked that other "bitter" plants native to Palestine are not excluded from consideration in the identification of this name. See also HEMLOCK; POISON; GALL.

b. Wormwood (לענה). This plant, mentioned in Deut. 29:18; Jer. 23:15; etc., is identified as Artemisia herba-alba Asso. This is the most widespread species of Artemisia in the deserts of Palestine and the adjacent countries. It is a dwarf, grayish-hairy, strongly aromatic, much-branched shrub. Its leaves are cut, and its flowers are arranged in minute heads. It has a bitter taste and is used in folk medicine. See also WORMWOOD. Fig. WOR 26.

c. Bitter herbs (מרורים). The plant which best fits the text (Exod. 12:8; Num. 9:11) is Centaurea. Indeed, several species of Centaurea grow in the desert; their leaves are arranged in rosettes and are gathered by the Bedouins of the desert and eaten as salad, despite their bitter taste. The Arabs name them murar, murir, yamrur, and Yamrir. The flowers of these plants are small and arranged in spiny heads. One of these species, also called durdar by the Arabs, is presumably the Hebrew דרדר (see § A12*c above*). See also BITTER HERBS.

d. Wild gourds (פקועות שדה). The identification of this plant as Citrullus colocynthis (L.) Schrad. is in full agreement with the context (II Kings 4:39), from both the geographical and the botanical viewpoint. It is a relative of the cultivated melon, and by its long, trailing branches, its palmately lobed leaves, and its tendrils, it is strongly reminiscent of a vine, or "wild vine" (גפן שדה), associated with the gourds in the above passage. Since this plant is not uncommon in the Jordan Valley and also in the Dead Sea surroundings, it also agrees with the geography of the Elisha story and with the "vine of Sodom" (גפן סדום) in Deut. 32:32. The fruits of this plant are globular, of the size of an orange fruit, with a hard yellow rind and a spongy pulp with numerous seeds. The pulp is widely used medicinally, mainly as a purgative. It has a strong, bitter taste and is presumably poisonous. The Hebrew name פקועה denotes, among others, a globular body. This name is still preserved by the Arabs for a kind of Tuber (mushroom) with a globular shape; it also denotes globular bodies in postbiblical literature. Cucumis prophetarum L., which also occurs in the Dead Sea region, is a rare plant with small, spiny fruits and has no resemblance to a vine. Ecballium elaterium L., another member of the same family, suggested by some authors, does not altogether fit the text. See also GOURDS, WILD. Fig. GOU 36.

On "vine of Sodom" and "wild vine," see GOURDS, WILD.

15. Hedges and fences. Hedges and fences have their own story to tell in Palestine. The Hebrew משוכה (Isa. 5:5, etc.) is a hedge built mostly of thorny plants, while גדר is a fence built of stones or stones and plants. Various plants have since biblical times been used as hedges. In the Coastal Plain hedges have been built for protecting vineyards and orchards against animals and theft. Since ancient times, Lycium europaeum L., the boxthorn, has been planted for this purpose, and only since ca. the seventeenth century has it been replaced by the American prickly pear, Opuntia ficus-indica, which has quite recently been replaced by Acacia farnesiana. All three types of hedges are still to be found in the Coastal Plain. In the stony mountain region three other types of hedges prevail. In one, there are bushes and shrubs of natural vegetation which were left around the cultivated plots and used both as a landmark and as a hedge. In the other, bushes of boxthorn were planted; and in the third type a stone fence generally not exceeding two to three feet in height is built, and to it a layer of dead shrubs of Poterium spinosum is added. Sometimes combinations of the three types are found.

a. Brambles, thorns (אטד). This word, translated "brambles" in Judg. 9:14-15 and "thorns" in Ps. 58:9, is Lycium europaeum L. The Arabic name is 'auśaj, although this name is sometimes given also to Rhammus and the Greek translation of אטד is ῥάμνος, it is Lycium which fits the context. Lycium is a shrub three to six feet high. It has oblong, cuneate leaves and spiny branches; its flowers are pink to violet, and its fruits are edible berries. See also BRAMBLE.

b. Thorns (סירים). These "thorns" (Isa. 34:13; Hos. 2:6; etc.) refer to Poterium spinosum L., a much-branched shrub one to two feet tall. The branches are slender and spiny; the leaves are composed of a few dentate leaflets; the flowers are green and inconspicuous; the fruits are dry berries with two to three seeds. This plant is the most common shrub of Palestine; it is widely used by the Arabs for fuel and fencing. The passage in Ps. 58:9 is perhaps better understood when the relation between סירה and אטד as hedge plants is considered (see also § A12*a above*). This plant is called by the Arabs netesh or billan, but a plant similar to it but growing in the desert areas bears the Arabic name sirr, and this is Noea mucronata. Pl. XIV*c*.

16. Other plants. a. Gourd (קיקיון). According to Smith, Loew, and others, this word in Jonah 4:6-7 (RSV "plant") is not a gourd but the castor bean plant, Ricinus communis L. This is a fast-growing perennial which may attain the height of ten feet. Its large leaves are palmately divided into several lobes. Its flowers are arranged in spikelike clusters, the male beneath the female ones. The fruit is a capsule containing three large seeds. The oil extracted from the seeds is used in medicine and as a lubricant in machinery. The castor plant grows wild in Palestine, but was probably introduced earlier from tropical countries. It is known from Egypt in ancient times under the name kiki; it is not improbable that the Yonas plant may have been Ricinus.

b. Capper. This is a translation of אביונה in Eccl. 12:5 (RSV-KJV "desire"). The Greek and the Vulg. render κάππαρις, capparis. This name is also mentioned in the Mishna and the Talmud. Capparis spinosa, or its local varieties, is a plant two to three feet tall. It has round or nearly round leaves and spiny stipules. Its large white flowers are open for one night only; its fruits are many-seeded, fleshy berries. The flower buds are conserved in acid and used as a condiment. In the past both the buds and the young fruits were used as an aphrodisiac.

c. Mandrake (דודאים). The identification of this plant, mentioned in Gen. 30:14-16; Song of S. 7:13, as Mandragora officinarum L. is certain. It is a stemless perennial herb, with thick, branched roots and with large, ovate or oblong, wrinkled leaves, arranged in a rosette. The bluish, bell-shaped flowers are borne on long stalks, and the plumlike, yellowish-red fruits have a delicious fragrance. They are edible, but are said to be narcotic, purgative, and emetic. The mandrake has ever since been a plant of many superstitious tales and unbased beliefs. Because of the shape of its roots and root branches, which may sometimes resemble a human body, and especially its lower parts, it has long been, and still is, in use with some primitive people as an aphrodisiac. In Palestine it is common in fields and waste places of the Mediterranean zone. It flowers early in winter and gives its fruits in spring. See also MANDRAKE. Fig. MAN 7.

d. Manna (מן). The literature hitherto accumulated on "heaven bread" is tremendous. As yet there is no adequate scientific explanation of the manna represented in the Bible (Exod. 16:31-35, etc.). Some authorities attempt to identify the manna with certain lichens or with a substance exuded from tamarisk trees, or with an excrement of certain scale insects living on tamarisk trees. However, although these identifications are based on substantial findings, the substances involved are quantitatively by far insufficient to have supported the heavy population wandering in the desert. See also MANNA.

B. THE VEGETAL LANDSCAPE. 1. History of the flora. Paleobotanical and paleogeographical evidences have clearly shown that the recent Palestine flora and vegetation have been successively built up by various stocks, which reached this country in various geological periods and through different migration routes. During the Oligocene and Miocene periods, the Palestine-Syrian part of the E Mediterranean region was detached from the N part of this region by a wide arm of the ancient Mediterranean Sea, deeply extending into Asia. Palestine, then connected with Africa, was governed by a tropical climate and inhabited by a tropical flora and vegetation of the African stock.

With the advent of the Pliocene period, the tropical flora became strongly decimated, and only remnants of it were pushed down to the hot enclaves of the Jordan Valley, where they are preserved up to the present. At that period the Mediterranean Sea lost its E branch, and an open land connection was established between Palestine and the N countries, wherefrom Palestine received its Mediterranean and its Irano-Turanian elements. Together with this migration wave, Palestine was open to the influx of Saharian desert plants which inhabited the driest parts of the country. From that period on, and during the entire Pleistocene period, Palestine was subjected only to minor climatic oscillations, so that the make-up of its flora and vegetation did not change considerably. The three plant geographical territories—namely, the Mediterranean, the Irano-Turanian, and the Saharo-Sindian—had already been in existence since the Pliocene period.

2. Vegetation units. When man first appeared in Palestine, there was already a diversity of vegetation units there, which were due then, as today, to the differences in climate and soils in the various parts of the country. The following types of vegetation existed then as today: (a) pine forest, (b) hard-leaved evergreen oak maquis and forest, (c) deciduous broad-leaved oak forest, (d) evergreen park woods, (e) evergreen Mediterranean dwarf shrub formations, (f) deciduous steppe woods, (g) tamarisk woods, (h) riparian forests, (i) saxaul forests, (j) sagebrush steppes, (k) succulent shrub deserts, (l) swamp and marsh vegetation, (m) sand-dune vegetation, and (n) vegetation of tropical oases.

a. The Aleppo pine forest. This is one of the southernmost pine forests of the Northern Hemisphere. The dominating tree is Pinus halepensis. It is accompanied by other trees and shrubs, such as Pistacia lentiscus, Arbutus andrachne, Phillyrea media, Cistus villosus, Cistus salvifolius, and others. This forest type is confined to highly calcareous soil of the mountain region. At present it covers considerable areas on Mount Carmel, in Samaria, and in Gilead, while remnants of it are preserved in Galilee and Judea. The reason for the devastation of the pine forest lies primarily in the fact that the soil occupied by this forest is most easily reclaimed for cultivation in the mountains. Besides, it is the best timber tree and is most susceptible to fire.

b. Evergreen oak maquis and forest. The following variants may be distinguished:

The maquis comprises mainly low woods of the oak-terebinth (Quercus calliprinos–Pistacia palaestina) community, which is the most common wood formation in Palestine. The two dominating trees are the oak and the terebinth, and they are generally accompanied by other low trees and shrubs, such as: Arbutus andrachne, Styrax officinalis, Cercis siliquastrum, Phillyrea media, Laurus nobilis, Crataegus azarolus, Rhammus alaternus. A few low shrubs and a number of vines are characteristic of this community. Also there are a great many shade-demanding herbs and bulbous plants which are confined to the maquis. This wood community is widely distributed all over the E Mediterranean region. In Palestine it occurs in all the Mediterranean mountain ranges on both sides of the Jordan. It demands relatively low winter temperatures and accordingly does not occur at an altitude lower than 900 feet. It is best developed on red soils.

Remnants of a true evergreen oak forest, with almost exclusive dominance of the oak as a high tree, are found in various places throughout Mediterranean Palestine. They occur mostly as "sacred forests" or "holy trees."

A particular variant of the evergreen oak community is that met with in Edom at an altitude of 3,000-4,500 feet. Here the oak is mostly accompanied by the red juniper (Juniperus phoenicea).

c. Deciduous broad-leaved oak forest. This type is dominated by the Tabor oak (Quercus ithaburensis). It is much more limited in distribution than the former types. It has three centers in Palestine: (a) The Sharon forest. Only small remnants of this forest, once flourishing between the Yarkon River and the S slopes of Mount Carmel, have been left. It was supposedly a pure forest and was confined here to sandy clay soil. According to some travelers of the nineteenth century, it was one of the largest and most beautiful forests of the region. (b) The Samarian-Galilean type is the most widespread. The oak is accompanied here by other trees such as Styrax officinalis and occasionally also by Pistacia palaestina, Crataegus azarolus, Cercis siliquastrum. It is common on the SW slopes of Lower Galilee, and its remnants are met with in the Ephraim Hills. (c) The Bashan forest. This E variant is well characterized by Pistacia atlantica, which accompanies the oak in the W slopes of Bashan, Golan, and Gilead. One of its remnants is the "sacred forest" of the Dan Valley, which testifies to the beauty of this forest type in the past. From a look at these mighty oaks and terebinths, it is readily understood why these trees have been so proverbially admired in the Bible. The Tabor oak forests are less restricted in their soil requirements, but are confined to lower altitudes, not exceeding 1,500 feet above sea level. The Tabor oak is a shallow-rooting tree which regenerates easily after logging. It may attain a height of sixty feet and a very great age.

d. Evergreen park woods. This comprises a wood community, the leading plants of which are composed of Pistacia lentiscus, forming a green shrubby carpet, and of Ceratonia siliqua, a tree ca. twelve to twenty feet high, scattered among the shrubs. This community occupies large stretches on the W side of the Jordan, along the W foothill region, on consolidated sand dunes, on calcareous sandstones of the Coastal Plain, and also on the E slopes of Galilee and Samaria. It is confined to lower altitudes only and tolerates various soils.

e. Evergreen Mediterranean dwarf shrub formation. Where forest and maquis are destroyed, a series of plant communities, consisting of low shrubs, permanently or temporarily occupy the area. The leading plants of these communities are Poterium spinosum, Cistus salvifolius, Cistus villosus, Calycotome villosa, Salvia triloba, Phlomis viscosa, Satureja thymbra, and others. It is only on the E and S borders of the Mediterranean territory that these communities are final stages in the vegetal development. Elsewhere in this territory they are only temporary stages which, when not disturbed by man, are sooner or later replaced by woody vegetation which formerly inhabited the area.

But, as often happened, these communities have been largely destroyed by man during centuries to supply fuel, and this brought about extreme denudation of the hillsides in the midst of the Mediterranean territory.

f. Deciduous steppe forest. This type is characterized by its remotely scattered trees and by the semi-desert shrubs or herbs filling the interspaces between the trees. Pistacia atlantica forms such forests in the Syrian Desert and elsewhere. In E Gilead this forest type, made up of mighty and aged trees of Pistacia atlantica, is still in existence. In the Hule Plains only remnants of this type occur.

g. Tamarisk woods. There are many species of tamarisk in Palestine. But only a few of them form woods. The most important habitat for this type are the salines near the Dead Sea, where certain varieties of Tamarix gallica, Tamarix deserti, and others form almost pure stands.

h. The riparian forest. This consists of a few plant communities such as that dominated by Platanus orientalis in the N part of the country. The banks of the Yarkon and other rivers are adorned by willows and Populus euphratica trees which form thickets on the banks of the Jordan River.

i. The Saxaul forest. This unit, which is common in the Aralo-Caspian region and in Persia, has its SW representative in the Arabah Valley. Here Haloxylon persicum is the dominant tree. It reaches a height of ten to twelve feet and grows on sand dunes, derived from igneous rocks or sandstones.

j. Sagebrush steppes. These are represented by several Irano-Turanian plant communities in the Judean Desert, the Negeb, and Transjordan. One of the most typical plant communities is dominated by Artemisia herba-alba, which is a low, strongly fragrant, gray shrub.

k. Succulent shrub desert. This comprises a series of plant communities dominated by dwarf shrubs, with fleshy leaves or stems. They form the vegetation in the extreme deserts of Palestine. The leading plants of these communities include Zygophyllum dumosum, Anabasis articulata, Suaeda asphaltica, and Chenolea arabica. Large portions of the Palestine deserts are almost plantless. Most of the soils are stony, salty, and dry.

l. Swamps and marshes. There are two main hydrographic centers in Palestine: the Jordan Valley and the Coastal Plain. In both a fairly rich hydrophytic vegetation occurs. The Hule marshes in the Upper Jordan Valley abound with various plant communities, the leading plants of which are: Cyperus papyrus, Phragmites communis, Polygonum acuminatum, Iris pseud-acorus, Typha angustata, and Sparganium neglectum. On river banks of the Coastal Plain, most of the plants mentioned, as well as various species of Cyperus, Scirpus, Polygonum, Juncus acutus, Inula viscosa, Rubus sanctus, and Lythrum salicaria, dominate.

m. Sand-dune vegetation. Among the plant communities of the coastal sand dunes, the most conspicuous ones are those dominated by Ammophila arenaria, Artemisia monosperma, Ratama roetam, and Polygonum equisetiforme. They are all evergreen, deep-rooting shrubs or grasses, which withstand salt spray brought from the sea, as also the moving of sand by the wind.

n. Vegetation of tropical oases. At the outlet regions of the permanent water currents in the Lower Jordan Valley, the Dead Sea shore, and the Arava Valley, there are small enclaves of tropical vegetation comprising, among others: Acacia raddiana, Acacia tortilis, Salvadora persica, Zizyphus spina-christi, Balanites aegyptiaca, and Moringa aptera. These are tropical trees of the African flora, which at an earlier geological period dominated in Palestine.

The major vegetation types listed above are units which existed in Palestine since very ancient times, including the biblical era. Climate, topography, and soils, which determine this diversity of vegetation, have not changed considerably since biblical times. Man's influence on vegetation, despite its large extent and duration, affected vegetation rather quantitatively than qualitatively, so the over-all pattern of the vegetal landscape and its diversity have been preserved almost in their entirety during the millenniums of human history in Palestine.

C. MAN AND PLANTS. The relations between man and the plant world around him were intimate from the very appearance of man on the earth. Man found his food, clothes, and shelter in this world of plants, and also his admiration of beauty and divinity. These relations grew closer as means and ways were invented toward a more efficient utilization of plants. The manifestations of these relations are so diverse that only a few aspects of them can be mentioned here.

1. Man and trees. In biblical times and thereafter, trees have played a primary role in man's daily and spiritual life. Adoration of trees, symbolizing trees with might and godliness, repeatedly occurs in the Bible. It was under the shade of trees that the judges of old gathered to dispense justice, that services were held, incense was burned, beloved and admired persons were buried. "Holy trees" and "sacred forests" abound not only in Palestine, but also in adjacent countries.

In contrast with this great respect for trees is the widespread destruction of forests wrought by man. Damage to forests was made through cutting trees for industry and fuel, through grazing by goats and sheep, through clearing and fires. Wood was widely used for timber for manufacture of implements, utensils, and ornaments. For millenniums, forests were the sole source of fuel for cooking, heating, and lime kilns. Timber was also exported to neighboring countries devoid of natural forests. The harbor of Dor (Tantura) at the foot of Mount Carmel was known as an export city of wood destined for Egypt. The fact that the country borders on deserts has always made the forests liable to heavy damage by the Bedouins. Continuous browsing of goats damaged the bud-bearing branches and deformed the tree habit into a shrub form. This is, no doubt, one of the main factors which, under Mediterranean conditions, has converted high forests into shrubby maquis. Reclamation of forest land for agriculture had the most devastating effect. There are a variety of methods by which this work has been done since the remote past. Not always has man been able to surmount the obstacles involved in removing trees from their natural habitat. In areas with deep soils, forests have been tracelessly exterminated; while in areas with rocky ground, large expanses of woods have been left, despite man's effort of destruction.

2. Native plants in everyday life. The use of native plants by man for food and other daily requirements, common everywhere in the present, was much commoner in older days. There are still desert tribes in the vicinity of Palestine who are entirely unacquainted with plant cultivation, and who obtain their vegetable food from the "herbs of the field." Hundreds of native species are used by the natives for food and other purposes. These were certainly more numerous in biblical times. Some of the food plants collected by the tribes and villagers are often offered for sale. Some of them are eaten as salads and greens, whereby leaves, stems, flower heads, and roots are used. Some of them are eaten raw, others after roasting or boiling. A considerable number are used as spices and condiments, while from others edible fruits are collected. Pulses are gathered from wild leguminous plants, which are richly represented in the flora of Palestine. Most interesting is the occurrence of a Mesembryanthemum, growing in the area of the Dead Sea, which is reportedly used in the Arabian Desert for preparing "wild bread." Grains of some wild cereals are also known to be collected for the same purpose.

a. Industrial plants. A number of plants belonging to the reeds and rushes, growing in moist habitats, have been used since ancient times up to the present day as fiber and wicker plants. Native markets, as well as those of the neighboring countries, abound with homemade wickerware such as mats, baskets, and trays, all manufactured from native plants such as Juncus, Scirpus, Cyperus, Typha, and Salix.

Among a number of wild plants, known for their yield of oil, are Sinapis alba, Sinapis arvensis, Brassica nigra, Calepina irregularis, Eruca sativa, and Ricinus communis. Some of them are no longer in use in Palestine but have certainly been used in the past. There are also many tannin and dye plants which have been widely used in the past. Especially interesting are the soap plants, used up to the present as sources for potassium. These plants mainly include species of Haloxylon, Anabasis, and Salsola. They are also sold in the markets of Cairo, Damascus, and Baghdad.

b. Medicinal plants. A large number of wild plants are used in folk medicine by the Arab population. A part of them are well known in the drug markets of the greater cities; others are widely used but have no commercial value. Some of them are known as "panaceas," others are specific. While the Bible does not mention much about these plants, postbiblical literature abounds with medicinal herbs. A few of them, at present widely used by the Arabs, are: Majorana syriaca, Teucrium polium, Bongardia chrysogonum, Ruta bracteosa, Peganum harmala, Althaea officinalis, Citrullus Colocynthis, Achillea fragrantissima, Alkanna strigosa, and Matricaria chamomilla.

c. Pasture plants. Mention should also be made of the numerous pasture plants native to the Palestine flora. Some of them are of wide repute and have been introduced in many countries. Similar is the abundance of honey plants, which enable heavy honey yields in two or three seasons of the year. A series of native plants are now grown in various countries as ornamental plants. Among native forest plants at present used in afforestation are Pinus halepensis, Cupressus sempervirens, Ceratonia siliqua, Pistacia atlantica, and Tamarix spp. Some of these plants were undoubtedly planted in biblical times.

3. Wild ancestors of cultivated plants. The flora of Palestine includes a number of species identical with, or close to, varieties of some most important cultivated plants. Among the plants in question, the following should be mentioned: Amygdalus communis, Ceratonia siliqua, Olea europaea var. oleaster, Triticum dicoccoides, Hordeum spontaneum, Trifolium Alexandrinum, Lupinus luteus, Vicia sativa, Vicia narbonensis, Pisum elatius, Linum angustifolium, Daucus maximus, and Allium ampeloprasum. The occurrence of these plants in Palestine points to the assumption that the local ancient population might have contributed to the formation of some cultivated plants, which is the highest achievement of civilization.

4. Man and weeds. Weeds are always associated with human activity in the cultivation of plants. There are ca. 450 species of weeds occurring among cultivated crops in Palestine. A part of them have been unintentionally imported along with crop seeds. Another part penetrated here from the neighboring steppes, while the majority of them are native plants which grew here in open sites similar to those of cultivated lands.

The richness of this weed flora is, no doubt, the result of the antiquity of agriculture. Indeed, weed seeds have been found in excavations belonging to the Bronze Age (3000-2000 B.C.). A geographical analysis of the weeds may perhaps disclose the history of agricultural lines of contact. Weed control during the ages has been so unsuccessful that man has always been largely troubled by weeds. He has looked upon weeds as a plague of God; and, being helpless to remove them from his fields by primitive means, he was sometimes compelled to harvest the weeds instead of the sown crop. Indeed, some of the cultivated plants have had their origin from weeds, such as rye, oats, etc.

5. Agriculture through the ages. The origin of cultivated plants is one of the most interesting chapters of human civilization, but also one of the most obscure. The first buds of plant cultivation are as yet unknown, both as to when and where. What is certain is that cultivation was preceded by a long period of collecting and storing of wild-growing plants. The transition from this stage to the stage of sowing was slow and not exclusive, as is the case with present-day agriculture in some regions where sowing and collecting exist side by side. While man easily learned sowing from nature, he had to invest much of his intellectual effort to convert wild plants into cultivated crop plants through selection and breeding. Palestine was, no doubt, part of this arena in which some important cultivated plants originated, and where agriculture might have had one of its first sprouts. This may be supported by the fact that some ancestors of cultivated plants are still growing wild here, and that, according to Vavilov, Palestine lies between two great centers where cultivated plants originated—viz., the Mediterranean and the Anterior Asian centers.

The earliest data on Palestinian agriculture come to us from the Mesolithic or Middle Stone Age (ca.

8000 B.C.). It was the so-called "Natufian" culture, in which sickles and hoes, used to break the soil before sowing, were found among other artifacts. In the Neolithic-Chalcolithic period (5000-3000) Palestine's agriculture was, according to some sources, rather developed and partly based on irrigation. From the Early Bronze Period (ca. 3000-2000) many findings of seeds and kernels in the Upper Jordan Valley, in Gezer, and in the Negeb testify to the existence of a comparatively high level of agriculture. Mention may be made, among other plants, of wheat, barley, lentils, broad beans, pomegranates, figs, vine, and olives.

For the Middle and Late Bronze period (2000-1200), as well as for the Early Iron period (1200-586), one needs no better source on agriculture than that of the Bible. At those periods Palestine had had already a variegated agriculture. Dry farming, as well as irrigation crops, was well known. Along with wheat, emmer, and barley, the main field crops, lentils, broad beans, and flax were also grown. As summer crops, millet or sorghum, or both of them, were grown. The gourd crops may have consisted of watermelons, muskmelons, and Lagenaria. The vegetable garden was rather poor in plants. Onions, leeks, and garlics were certainly grown as plants introduced from Egypt. Among the spices and condiments were cummin, coriander, dill, and nutmeg flower. Fruit-tree orchards and vineyards were highly developed. Among them were the vine, olive, fig, sycomore, date, almond, pomegranate, and probably also the apricot and the mulberry. A novelty was the introduction of the balm shrub (Commiphora opobalsamum) and probably also other balm species, as well as the henna (Lawsonia inermis), grown in the gardens of Jericho and En-gedi in the Jordan Valley.

The Late Iron period (600-300) and the subsequent Hellenistic period was an era in which agricultural development reached a standard considerably higher than in the following Roman-Byzantian and Arabic periods. A comparatively high level of agrotechnique in the agricultural industry and a very rich inventory of cultivated species characterize this era. Open to the influence of both the NE countries and Egypt, Palestine developed and improved its grain crops, its fodder plants, its vegetable gardens, and its orchards. New introductions for summer crops were rice, sesame, and probably cowpeas. Fodder plants included alfalfa, vetches, lupines, fenugreek, and clover. Carrots, beets, cabbages, radishes, artichokes, and some spices not adequately identified were added to the vegetable garden. New orchard plants were pears, quinces, pistachio, ethrog (Citrus medica), celtis (Celtis australis), and other varieties not defined. The Mishna, although compiled in the Roman period, clearly reflects the period under review, and is an inexhaustible source for learning about the history of agriculture of that period. It is not improbable that many of these novelties already existed prior to that time, but were not mentioned.

During the Arabic period very little was added to the agricultural technique and to the inventory of the cultivated plants. The banana, the sugar cane, and probably some new vegetables were introduced in this period. But agriculture, in general, was at its decline. Large stretches of mountain terraces, built during earlier centuries, were neglected and left to denudation. Many flourishing villages of the past turned into "tells" (ruin mounds), bearing the ancient name of the sites.

Under the Turkish rule, there is nothing to add except that of citriculture, which probably began in the sixteenth century. Long after the discovery of America, new plants came into the fields and gardens of Palestine. With the beginning of Jewish immigration a stream of new plants in each branch of agriculture flowed into Palestine. In agricultural technique, modern methods have been introduced. This ever-increasing trend toward modernization and rationalization of agriculture is now about to overshadow older achievements and to eliminate ancient crops from the country.

Bibliography. J. Smith, Bible Plants, Their History (1878). G. Dalman, Arbeit und Sitte in Palaestina (2 vols.; 1928). G. E. Post, Flora of Syria, Palestine and Sinai (2nd ed.), vol. I (1932); vol. II (1933). I. Loew, Die Flora der Juden, vol. I (1928); vols. II-III (1924); vol. IV (1934). H. N. and A. L. Moldenke, Plants of the Bible (1952). M. Zohary, Geobotany (1955; Hebrew). M. ZOHARY

FLOUR [סלת (alternately FINE FLOUR; FINE MEAL); σεμίδαλις]. Flour is to be distinguished from MEAL (GROUND GRAIN) in that flour was ground from only the inner kernels of the wheat, whereas meal was ground from the whole kernels and the bran. Thus the grain from which flour was prepared was called the "finest of the wheat" (Deut. 32:14 [KJV "fat of kidneys of wheat"]; Pss. 81:16—H 81:17; 147:14). Accordingly it was a luxury (II Kings 7:1; Ezek. 16:13; Rev. 18:13). Nevertheless it was used by ordinary people: Sarah made cakes from it for the three strangers (Gen. 18:6). By far its most extensive use, however, was in CEREAL OFFERINGS (Exod. 29:2; Lev. 2; 7; Num. 15; 28–29; etc.), in which the flour was mixed with OIL (see § 2*c*).

See also CEREALS; THRESHING; WHEAT.

Bibliography. G. Dalman, "Die Mehlarten im AT," BWAT, XIII (1913), 64. J. F. ROSS

FLOWERS (PLANTS) [גבעל; נצה, נץ, נצן; פרח; ציץ; ἄνθος]. The blossom, or reproductive part, of trees, shrubs, and other flora.

Among the hundreds of species of flowers believed to have grown in Palestine since ancient times, barely a dozen (including tree blossoms) are mentioned specifically. That flowers were noticed and appreciated is indicated by the above group of general Hebrew words which apply to them. Flowers of the fields appear as a symbol of the springtime (Song of S. 2:12). Frequently they were a symbol of the transitory nature of man's life (Job 14:2; Ps. 103:15; Isa. 5:24; 40:6-8; cf. Jas. 1:10-11; I Pet. 1:24). Woe is proclaimed against the fading flower of Ephraim's glorious beauty (Isa. 28:1, 4). The bloom of Lebanon fades before the power of God (Nah. 1:4). Blooms would provide the fragrance of the garden (Song of S. 4:16). The familiar "lilies of the fields" (Matt. 6:28; Luke 12:27) quite possibly refer to many flowers. See LILY.

Of the nearly one hundred different flora species mentioned in the Bible the following are the only flowers or tree blossoms specified, and the identification of several of these must be questioned:

a) ALMOND (לוז, שקד, lûz, šāqēdh = Amygdalus communis L.; Exod. 25:33-34; 37:19-20; Num. 17:8—H 17:23; Eccl. 12:5).

b) Colchicum (?; חבצלת, ḥ^{a}bhaṣṣéleth = Colchicum autumnale L.; Song of S. 2:1 [RSV ROSE]; Isa. 35:1 [RSV CROCUS]).

c) CROCUS (?; חבצלת, ḥ^{a}bhaṣṣéleth = several possible species; Song of S. 2:1 [RSV ROSE]; Isa. 35:1; cf. SAFFRON in Song of S. 4:14).

d) FIG (פגה, paggâ = Ficus caricus L.; Song of S. 2:13; cf. Hab. 3:17, a negative reference to its flowers, which are enclosed within a fleshy bract appearing as an unripe fig).

e) FLAX (פשתה, pištâ = Linum usitatissimum L.; "in bud," גבעל, in Exod. 9:31).

f) HENNA (כפר, kópher = Lawsonia inermis L.; Song of S. 1:14; 7:11—H 7:12[?]; see HENNA).

g) LILY (שושן, šôšan = Nymphaea lotus L.[?] in I Kings 7:19, 22, 26; flowers in general in Song of S. 2:1-2, 16; 4:5; 6:2-3, 11; κρίνον = Anemone coronaria L., Ranunculus asiaticus L., Papaver rhoeas L., or flowers in general in Matt. 6:28; Luke 12:27; Lilium candidum L. [?] in Ecclus. 39:14; 50:8).

h) LOTUS (צאלים[?], ṣe'elîm = Nymphaea lotus L., in Job 40:21-22; שושן[?], šôšan [RSV LILY] in I Kings 7:19, 22, 26).

i) MALLOW (מלוח[?], mallûa^ḥ = Malva sylvestris L.; Job 24:24).

j) Narcissus (?; חבצלת, ḥ^{a}bhaṣṣéleth = Narcissus tazetta L., thought by some scholars to be the "rose" or "crocus" of Song of S. 2:1; Isa. 35:1; see ROSE).

k) Oleander (?; ῥόδον = Nerium oleander L.; Ecclus. 24:14; 39:13; cf. Ecclus. 50:8; Enoch 82:6; 106:2, 10; III Macc. 7:17; RSV ROSE).

l) OLIVE (זית, záyith = Olea europaea L.; Job 15:33).

m) POMEGRANATE (רמון, rimmōn = Punica granatum L.; Song of S. 6:11; 7:12—H 7:13).

n) ROSE (ῥόδον = Rosa phoenicia L.; II Esd. 2:19; Wisd. Sol. 2:8).

o) VINE (i.e., grapevine; סמדר, s^{e}mādhar = Vitis vinifera L.; Song of S. 2:13, 15; 6:11; 7:12—H 7:13; cf. Gen. 40:10; Isa. 18:5; Hos. 14:7—H 14:8).

The springtime traveler to the Holy Land today is impressed by the great masses of yellow flowers, most of which are chrysanthemums (primarily Chrysanthemum coronarium L.). They dominate hillsides and valleys and cover almost every ancient tell.

See also FLORA § A10.

Bibliography. A. A. Temple, Flowers and Trees of Palestine (1929); H. N. and A. L. Moldenke, Plants of the Bible (1952), Index; W. Walker, All the Plants of the Bible (1957).

J. C. TREVER

FLUTE. See MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

FLUX, BLOODY. KJV form of DYSENTERY.

FLY. The translation of two Hebrew words:

a) זבוב (z^{e}bhubh), "moving to and fro"(?), a sound-imitating word like "buzz" (cf. Akkadian zumbu; Arabic dhubâb, "fly" or "bee"; Syriac zebaba; Amharic zemb; Mehri ḏebbēt; Eccl. 10:1; Isa. 7:18).

b) ערוב, from ערב, therefore "mixed insects, a swarm" (cf. Syriac 'arûba, "mix"; Exod. 8:21-22, 24, 29, 31—H 8:17-18, 20, 25, 27; Pss. 78:45; 105:31).

Both are dipterous (two-winged) insects. Generally זבוב is understood as the common housefly, Musca domestica. The ruining of ointment by falling into it (Eccl. 10:1) is entirely in keeping with its habits. But, vexing as this species is in the Orient, a more aggressive one would more likely be used metaphorically of Egypt's invading army (Isa. 7:18). The wasp-sized horsefly, Tabanus arenivagus, which attacks horses, cattle, and even persons while traveling in automobiles, is the more likely species. The inhabitants of Ekron worshiped the god of flies, BAALZEBUB, to avert the evil done by flies (II Kings 1:2-3).

The ערוב is the stinging fly sent by God as the fourth of the PLAGUES IN EXODUS. It is translated uniformly as "swarms of flies" in both Exodus and Psalms (KJV "divers sorts of flies" in the Psalms). Various species could be referred to: the housefly (Musca domestica), the bluebottle fly (Calliphora erythrocephala), the dog fly (LXX), the Barghaš midge, or a Tabanid fly (Stomoxys calcitrans). The Barghaš enters the eyes, ears, and nose of fieldworkers during harvest. The Stomoxys calcitrans bites the legs of man and beast.

The maggot (רמה; Job 25:6; Isa. 14:11; etc.) and the WORM (Exod. 16:24; Deut. 28:39; Job 7:5; 17:14; etc.) are the larvae of flies.

See also FAUNA § E7*a*.

Bibliography. G. Hort, "The Plagues of Egypt," ZAW, 69 (1957), 84-103; 70 (1958), 49-59. See also the bibliography under ANT.

W. W. FRERICHS

FODDER [בלל, בליל, mix, mingle]. Food for animals consisting of a mixture of grains (Job 6:5; 24:6). In Isa. 30:24 (cf. Judg. 19:21) the same word is translated "PROVENDER," and the food was salted, probably to make it more palatable as well as to satisfy the animals' need for salt. On the basis of the Arabic balla, "moisten," some scholars believe that בליל may have been brought to a preliminary stage of fermentation by soaking in water.

H. N. RICHARDSON

FOLD. See SHEEPFOLD.

FOLLY. The translation of several uncomplimentary terms often used in the Bible and particularly in the wisdom literature to describe persons lacking wisdom and the senseless behavior of such persons. Folly is opposed to WISDOM (see § 2*b*), and a fool is the reverse of a wise man. Folly is a sort of behavior which is self-defeating or unprofitable; also, in the Bible, immoral, wanton, impious.

The more common Hebrew terms for "fool" are חסר לב, פתי, סכל, נבל, כסיל, בער, אויל, and the related terms for "folly" are אולת, כסילות, נבלה, סכלות. While "folly" is the common denominator of all these nouns, certain ones among them have special connotations. The בער inclines to a subhuman mentality (brutishness); the פתי is simple, largely through want of experience; the נבל is less innocent than the merely foolish. Similarly, נבלה often appears to be an understatement for outright sinfulness.

Most of these terms are favored by the wisdom writers. Outside the books of Proverbs, Job, and Ecclesiastes, only בער, נבל, נבלה, and סכל occur with relative frequency.

Folly is often known by its opposite; it is contrasted with wisdom in the wisdom literature quite as, in Deuteronomy, death and life, evil and good, curse and blessing are opposed (e.g., Deut. 30:15, 19). Not that folly is merely the negation of wisdom. Folly appears as a principle in human affairs—a power by its own right—which offers its wares to the unsuspecting young. The "foolish woman" of Prov. 9:13 is properly a personification of folly (cf. Prov. 14:1), conceived as the rival of the woman wisdom, who, in the parallel first section of the chapter (Prov. 9:1-6), entices the same youth (cf. Ecclus. 6:18-21). Koheleth the questioner examines with philosophic detachment the way of wisdom and the way of folly, to discern which indeed has the advantage (Eccl. 2:3), and he arrives at two answers: "Wisdom excels folly as light excels darkness" (2:13), but also: "The wise man . . . , the fool . . . ; one fate comes to all" (2:14). This latter answer is colored by the special hues of Koheleth's thought. Otherwise, biblical man remained by the former view, the recognition of the superiority of wisdom.

The literature contains a number of clues also as to the specific nature of folly and the behavior of fools:

A fool is neither provident nor prudent. He "folds his hands" (Eccl. 4:5), follows worthless pursuits; and his fields and vineyards go to ruin (Prov. 12:11; 24:30-31); he "believes everything" and goes surety for his neighbor (Prov. 14:15; 17:18).

A fool is hot-tempered (Prov. 14:17, 29; Eccl. 7:9) and quarrelsome (Prov. 20:3), giving full vent to his anger (12:16; 29:11).

A fool talks loosely and too much. A proverb in his mouth is lame (Prov. 26:7; Ecclus. 20:20). Whereas if he kept his mouth shut he might be thought intelligent (Prov. 17:28), he talks without listening (18:13), babbles, and "flaunts his folly" (10:14; 13:16; Ecclus. 20:13; 21:16, 25-26; 27:13). He speaks slander, gossip, and spite (Prov. 10:18; 11:12; 20:19), and stirs up strife (18:6).

A fool may be merely simple and uninstructed, young and susceptible (Prov. 1:4; 7:7; 9:4, 16; 14:15; Ecclus. 19:23-24). But he may also be wilfully perverse, ill-natured like Nabal or like Saul in their behavior toward David (I Sam. 25:25; 26:21), or a prey to cupidity like Achan (Josh. 7:15; Ecclus. 20:14-17), and hating knowledge or reproof (Prov. 1:22; 12:1; 13:19), his way being "right in his own eyes" (12:15).

At its best, folly is a kind of epicureanism, dedication to a life of pleasure; for when Koheleth makes trial of "folly," what he does is to accumulate all the "good things" of the earth (Eccl. 2:1-11). At its worst, a fool's folly is rank immorality, rape, fornication, incest, adultery (Gen. 34:7; Deut. 22:21; Judg. 19:23-24; 20:6, 10; II Sam. 13:12-13; Prov. 6:32; Jer. 29:23), but also lesser wrongs (Ps. 69:5—H 69:6; Prov. 10:23).

Folly is the rejecting of God's will, for "the fear of the LORD is the beginning of knowledge" (Prov. 1:7); but "the fool says in his heart, 'There is no God' " (Ps. 14:1), speaks falsehood of God (Job 42:8; 2:10), and refuses him obedience (I Sam. 13:13; II Sam. 24:10; II Chr. 16:9).

So a fool learns the hard way, through the "rod of discipline" (Prov. 10:13; 16:22; 19:29; 22:15) if at all (cf. Prov. 17:16, 24; 18:2; 23:9; Ecclus. 22:7-15; 33:5), and goes to meet a bitter fate (II Sam. 3:33: "Should Abner die as a fool dies?"; cf. Job 5:2-5; Prov. 22:3; Eccl. 7:17; 10:12).

Both wisdom and folly are personal philosophies, different ways of looking upon life. Wisdom is the way of the religious man, and it leads to victory; folly is the way of the impious, and its end is defeat.

S. H. BLANK

FOOD. Although food was, of course, one of the necessities of life in biblical times (cf. Ecclus. 39:26), the Hebrews and early Christians did not enjoy as extensive a variety of foodstuffs as their modern descendants. Furthermore, the danger of famine due to crop failure and natural disasters (see § 2*d below; see also* FAMINE) was much greater in ancient times. These difficulties were enhanced by the lack of a well-developed system of trade whereby needy areas could be relieved by the food surpluses of other districts; in a time of famine Jacob and his sons were forced to procure grain from Egypt (Gen. 42:1-2). For these reasons the simple gathering and preparation of food occupied a major part of man's life; the alternative was death by starvation.

1. Varieties of food in the Bible
   a. Meat
   b. Fruit
   c. Vegetables
   d. Cereals
2. The significance of food in daily life
   a. As a bond of fellowship
   b. Gifts of food
   c. Foreign trade
   d. The danger of famine
3. The significance of food in the religious life
   a. As the gift of God
   b. In the eschatological age
   c. The devaluation of food

Bibliography

1. Varieties of food in the Bible. Of course, the Bible is not an encyclopedia of manners and customs, and it must not be assumed that all the foodstuffs consumed in biblical times are specifically mentioned in its pages. The main categories can, however, be determined with some degree of accuracy, although many of the details are missing.

a. Meat. In biblical times meat was not a regular part of the diet. It is missing in Sirach's list of the necessities of life, which otherwise includes salt, wheat, milk, honey, wine, and oil (Ecclus. 39:26). According to the priestly writer (see PENTATEUCH § A5), the reluctance to eat meat can be traced back to the Creation. When God created man, he gave him for food "every plant yielding seed which is upon the face of all the earth, and every tree with seed in its fruit" (Gen. 1:29); only after the Flood was man permitted to eat animal food (Gen. 9:3). The narrative preserves the tradition that in the golden age of the past there was perfect harmony among all creatures, human and animal. God does not command his creatures to kill one another. Even when permitting animal food, God prohibits the consumption of blood, for that is "its life" (Gen. 9:4; cf. Lev. 17:11, 14; Deut. 12:23). See CLEAN AND UNCLEAN.

Apart from religious scruples, the chief reason for abstaining from meat was simply the scarcity of domestic cattle in biblical times. One could secure meat by hunting wild GAME (see also HUNTING), but it was uneconomical to slaughter animals which could provide other necessities (see CHEESE; CURDS; MILK). Consequently meat was usually eaten only on the occasion of a SACRIFICE. There were exceptions, of course. An honored guest was entertained with a meal which included meat; Abraham took a calf from the herd when the three strangers arrived (Gen. 18:7). Naturally the return of a long-lost son was also an occasion for the eating of meat; the father commands the servants to "bring the fatted calf and kill it, and let us eat and make merry" (Luke 15:23). Oxen and fat calves are also mentioned in Jesus' parable of the marriage feast (Matt. 22:4).

These restrictions did not apply to the wealthy. We are told that Solomon's provisions for one day included "ten fat oxen, and twenty pasture-fed cattle, a hundred sheep, besides harts, gazelles, roebucks, and fatted fowl" (I Kings 4:23—H 5:3). Amos denounces the wealthy who > eat lambs from the flock, > and calves from the midst of the stall

> (6:4).

Roasting and boiling were the usual methods of preparing meat. The Passover lamb is to be roasted, not boiled (Exod. 12:8-9; cf. II Chr. 35:13), and a similar distinction was made at the Shiloh temple (I Sam. 2:15). Ezekiel, however, threatens Jerusalem with an "allegory":

> Set on the pot, set it on,
> pour in water also;
> put in it the pieces of flesh,
> all the good pieces, the thigh and the shoulder;
> fill it with choice bones.
> Take the choicest one of the flock, > pile the logs under it;
> boil its pieces,
> seethe also its bones in it > (Ezek. 24:3-5).

See COOKING.

Meat was also obtained from FOWL; quails were sent from heaven to the Israelites in the wilderness (Exod. 16:13), and pigeons and turtledoves are mentioned elsewhere. Eggs from wild birds were eaten in OT times (cf. Deut. 22:6; Isa. 10:14), but it is probable that the chicken was unknown in pre-exilic Palestine. However, the "egg" in Luke 11:12 is very probably the hen's egg. Similarly the eating of fish was rare in OT times, since the Hebrews controlled the Mediterranean coast only at infrequent intervals and were thus reduced to the Sea of Galilee for fishing. Thus in the wilderness the Israelites looked back with longing to the fish they had eaten in Egypt (Num. 11:5). But fish was a common food in NT times; the disciples had only five loaves and two fish in a "lonely place" (Mark 6:38 and parallels; cf. Matt. 15:34). At least four of the disciples (Peter, Andrew, James, and John) were fishermen (Matt. 4:18, 21; Mark 1:16, 19; cf. Luke 5:1-11).

b. Fruit. Olives and grapes were the most important fruits in biblical times, but they were generally made into OIL (see also OLIVE TREE) and WINE (see also HONEY; VINE). Of the fruits consumed in their natural state figs were the most popular. The early figs (בכרות, lit. "first-born") were regarded as special delicacies because of their sweetness:

> When a man sees it, he eats it up > as soon as it is in his hand > (Isa. 28:4; cf. Mic. 7:1).

Thus Hosea compares the Israelites in Egypt to the "first fruit on the fig tree" (Hos. 9:10), and Jeremiah claims that those who have gone into exile are "first-ripe figs," while those who remain in the land are "very bad figs, so bad that they could not be eaten" (Jer. 24:1-10). Cakes of dried figs (דבלים) were prepared for journeys (I Sam. 25:18; 30:12; I Chr. 12:40—H 12:41; cf. Jth. 10:5); they were even used to heal boils (II Kings 20:7; Isa. 38:21). See bibliography.

Since there are two towns and one person named TAPPUAH, the Hebrew word for "apple," it may be assumed that apples were eaten in OT times. Actual references are few, however; Joel reports that the apple tree is among the victims of the locust plague (Joel 1:12), and the loved one in the Song of Solomon asks to be refreshed with apples (2:5; cf. 7:8—H 7:9; 8:5). The actual identification is difficult, however; perhaps the citron or the quince is meant.

Other fruits included the pomegranate (Num. 13:23; 20:5; Deut. 8:8; etc.), the date (not mentioned by name, although there are references to the palm), and the sycamore fig (Amos was a "dresser of sycamore trees" [7:14]). See FRUIT (PRODUCTS).

c. Vegetables. The climate of Palestine is not suited for the growing of a wide variety of vegetables. In the wilderness the Israelites longed for the "cucumbers, . . . the leeks, the onions, and the garlic" they had enjoyed in Egypt (Num. 11:5); of these the cucumber is elsewhere mentioned only twice (Isa. 1:8; Jer. 10:5) and the others not at all. It should not be assumed, however, that the lack of specific references means that these vegetables were not known. Indeed, on the basis of modern parallels it is likely that at least onions and leeks were rather widely cultivated. More important, however, were beans and lentils. They could be boiled into POTTAGE, eaten in their natural state, or mixed with flour to increase the yield of BREAD (§ 1*a*). In addition to these the husks of the carob tree, although usually used as fodder for animals, served as emergency food (Luke 15:16). See VEGETABLES.

d. Cereals. In view of the above-mentioned reluctance to eat meat at everyday meals and the relative scarcity of fruits and vegetables, it is natural that cereal foods should make up a large part of the diet in biblical times. The Egyptian envoy Sinuhe reported that barley and emmer (a primitive form of wheat) were plentiful in Palestine-Syria. These two grains were by far the most important. BREAD was made from both wheat flour and barley meal, and was eaten at every meal. In a time of need, however, millet and spelt (KJV "fitches") could also be used in bread (Ezek. 4:9); spelt was usually used as a border for a field (Isa. 28:25). But these grains could also be eaten in other forms. It was customary to rub off the husks in one's hands and eat the fresh kernels. One of Elisha's friends brought the prophet and his friends bread and "fresh ears of grain"; the company proceeded to eat the uncooked grain (II Kings 4:42-44). Furthermore, the heads of grain could be roasted in a pan or merely held in the fire; this "parched grain" (KJV "parched corn") was appropriate at a harvest meal (Ruth 2:14), but was also eaten by the king himself (I Sam. 25:18; II Sam. 17:28). See NUT.

2. The significance of food in daily life. Food was not merely a means for sustaining life in biblical times; it had wide significance in the social and the economic life generally.

a. As a bond of fellowship. In OT times almost every pact or covenant was sealed with a common meal; the food consumed by both parties made them, so to speak, members of the same family or clan. In spite of the mutual suspicion between Jacob and Laban, they concluded their boundary treaty with a meal which lasted all night (Gen. 31:54). Such an agreement was not always made between two equal parties, however. Joshua and his men were convinced by the Gibeonites that they were "from a far country" and therefore needed the protection of a covenant; as a sign of agreement the Israelites ate of the provisions which the strangers had brought with them (Josh. 9:3-15). The bond thus created was so strong that it could not be broken even when it was discovered that the Gibeonites were actually from a nearby district (vss. 16-27). Similarly Mephibosheth, who described himself as a "dead dog," was adopted by David and thus was allowed to eat at the king's table, like one of his sons (II Sam. 9:7, 10-11).

Conversely, the refusal to eat food with someone was a mark of anger and a symbol of the rupture of fellowship; when Jonathan learned that Saul was determined to kill David, he "rose from the table in fierce anger and ate no food . . . , for he was grieved for David, because his father had disgraced him" (I Sam. 20:34).

This significance of food as a bond of fellowship may even be preserved in the Hebrew word for "covenant," ברית, which is often held to be derived from the root ברה, "to eat." However this may be, the phrase "covenant of salt" means a "permanent covenant," since eating salt with one's companions means to be bound to them in loyalty (Num. 18:19; II Chr. 13:5; cf. Ezra 4:14). Similarly Jesus' injunction: "Have salt in yourselves" (Mark 9:50; cf. Col. 4:6), is an encouragement to mutual loyalty among the disciples. See COVENANT; SALT.

b. Gifts of food. Because of the function of food in sealing personal and communal relationships, gifts of food were not merely a matter of form. The recipient, if he accepted the gift, was put under an obligation, and the giver was well aware of this. When it became necessary to make a second trip to Egypt in order to get food during a time of famine, Jacob and his sons were somewhat concerned about the good will of "the man" (Joseph) who had previously given them grain; the patriarch thus advised his sons to "take some of the choice fruits of the land in your bags, and carry down to the man a present, a little balm and a little honey, gum, myrrh, pistachio nuts, and almonds" (Gen. 43:1-11). Jacob had already had experience in such affairs. He had naturally worried about his reception at the hand of his disinherited brother, Esau, and had sent on ahead a gift of goats, sheep, cows, bulls, and asses (Gen. 32:3-21).

It was even more necessary to placate a political leader. When David was on the point of becoming king of all Israel, the people of Hebron, his former capital, made adequate provision for a feast lasting three days, and Israelites from as far as Issachar, Zebulun, and Naphtali "came bringing food on asses and on camels and on mules and on oxen, abundant provisions of meal, cakes of figs, clusters of raisins, and wine and oil, oxen and sheep, for there was joy in Israel" (I Chr. 12:38-40—H 12:39-41). Even when he was later forced to flee on the occasion of Absalom's revolt, David was brought food by his loyal subjects (II Sam. 16:1; 17:27-29); presumably they hoped that he would again rise to power and reward them accordingly.

The earlier prophets were also given gifts of food, either as payment for services rendered or as a sign of good faith. When Saul and his servant were looking for lost asses, they decided to consult the seer Samuel; Saul, however, was concerned because their bread was gone and they had no present to bring (I Sam. 9:6-7). On the occasion of his son's illness Jeroboam sent Ahijah a gift of loaves, cakes, and honey in hopes that the seer would predict a favorable outcome (I Kings 14:1-3). Ahijah was apparently not impressed, however; he announced the destruction of the house of Jeroboam, and the child died (vss. 6-18). Nevertheless, the custom of presenting gifts to prophets apparently survived. Amaziah could thus say to Amos: "O seer, go, flee away to the land of Judah, and eat bread there, and prophesy there" (Amos 7:12). Micah is scathing in his criticism:

> Thus says the LORD concerning the prophets > who lead my people astray, > who cry "Peace"
> when they have something to eat, > but declare war against him > who puts nothing into their mouths > (3:5).

c. Foreign trade. In spite of the unreliability of food supplies in Palestine itself, foodstuffs were the most important items of foreign trade in biblical times. Just as presents of food were made to private persons to insure their good favor, so relationships between Israel and her neighbors were improved by mutual gifts. Hosea complains that the people of Israel > make a bargain with Assyria, > and oil is carried to Egypt > (12:1).

Naturally food was also given in exchange for foreign aid in one form or another. Hiram, king of Tyre, offered to supply cedar and cypress timber for the building of the temple on the condition that "[Solomon] shall meet my wishes by providing food for my household"; accordingly, large quantities of wheat and oil were sent from Israel to Tyre each year (I Kings 5:9-11—H 5:23-25). The same trade was effected four and a half centuries later when Zerubbabel and his associates sent "food, drink, and oil" to Tyre and Sidon in return for the cedar required for the rebuilding of the temple (Ezra 3:7).

Tyre became very rich as a result of such commerce; Ezekiel lists the many nations which had traded with her, among which were Judah and Israel, who "exchanged for your merchandise wheat, olives and early figs, honey, oil, and balm" (Ezek. 27:17).

d. The danger of famine. Perhaps the best-known famines in biblical times are those described in the story of Joseph (Gen. 41:54; 43:1; 47:13, 15) and in the Elijah narratives (I Kings 17:1, 7, 12; 18:2, 5). Although lack of rain was the chief cause of such crop failures, other natural disasters also played their part. Amos graphically describes the catastrophes sent by Yahweh: (a) he withheld the rain when the harvest was three months off; (b) he sent blight and mildew; (c) he caused the locust to devour fig and olive trees; and (d) he created a pestilence, probably affecting both men and animals (Amos 4:6-10; cf. Deut. 28:22; I Kings 8:37). To these may be added hail (Hag. 2:17), which is particularly damaging to cereal crops.

The only way to ward off the consequences of such a famine was to build up reserves of food in plentiful times. Having been warned by Pharaoh's dream that a famine was coming, Joseph suggested that one fifth of the food grown in the seven normal years be stored up against the approaching lean years (Gen. 41:34-36; cf. 47:24). The alternative to such a wise policy was simply malnutrition, if not death. Thus Jeremiah receives a "word of the LORD . . . concerning the drought":

> Because of the ground which is dismayed, > since there is no rain on the land,
> the farmers are ashamed,
> they cover their heads.
> Even the hind in the field forsakes her new-born calf > because there is no grass.
> The wild asses stand on the bare heights, > they pant for air like jackals;
> their eyes fail
> because there is no herbage (Jer. 14:1, 4-6).

It is no wonder that people would > trade their treasures for food > to revive their strength > (Lam. 1:11).

3. The significance of food in the religious life. In biblical times scarcely any secular activity failed to have a counterpart in the religious life of the people, and the production and consumption of food are no exception.

a. As the gift of God. Since God is the creator and sustainer of life, it is natural that biblical man should regard food as a divine gift. The Lord God planted the garden of Eden, put man in it, and "made to grow every tree that is pleasant to the sight and good for food" (Gen. 2:9). But man is not left to his own devices. God even teaches the principles of agriculture—how to level the surface of the ground, when to sow various seeds, and the way of putting wheat and barley in rows (Isa. 28:24-26). Ben Sirach thus urges his "son" not to hate "farm work, which [was] created by the Most High" (Ecclus. 7:15). The gift of food was renewed at the Conquest; Yahweh gave the wandering Israelites a "land of wheat and barley, of vines and fig trees and pomegranates, a land of olive trees and honey, a land in which you will eat bread without scarcity, in which you will lack nothing" (Deut. 8:7-9; cf. Josh. 24:13). Men and beasts have nothing which they have created for themselves; in praising God the psalmist says:

> These all look to thee,
> to give them their food in due season.
> When thou givest to them, they gather it up;
> when thou openest thy hand, they are filled with good things > (Ps. 104:27-28; cf. 145:15-16).

A similar attribution of food to God is found in the Egyptian "Hymn to the Aton." See bibliography.

One must not presume upon God's gifts, however. The Israelites in the desert decided to test God by demanding food, thinking that it would be impossible to "spread a table in the wilderness"; in spite of his anger God gave them manna, the "bread of the angels," and "winged birds like the sand of the seas." After the people had eaten, however, God slew the strongest of the men because of their presumption (Ps. 78:18-31).

Since food is a bond between man and man (see § 2*a above*), it is even more natural that it should find a place in the expression of the relationship between man and God. Thus on Mount Sinai, Moses and the elders "beheld God, and ate and drank" (Exod. 24:11). Similarly one of the most important motifs in SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS is the consumption of food. In the early days of Israel, food offerings were probably thought to be eaten by Yahweh, although in the name of God the psalmist asks:

> Do I eat the flesh of bulls, > or drink the blood of goats?
> (Ps. 50:13).

Offerings of food continued to be made as long as the temple stood, however, and the pious Israelite undoubtedly felt that he had come closer to God when he had returned to him a part of his gifts. A similar motive lies behind the requirement that the FIRST FRUITS and a TITHE of all produce be brought to the sanctuary.

b. In the eschatological age. Since God created a fruitful garden at the beginning of his work, he will naturally bestow an abundance of food upon his faithful people in the days to come. Many of the prophetic books contain descriptions of the material blessedness of the New Age. Hosea looks forward to a time when Israel will be "allured" by Yahweh and given vineyards; "in that day" the heavens, the earth, the grain, the wine, and the oil will say "Jezreel"—i.e., "God sows" (Hos. 2:14-15, 21-22—H 2:16-17, 23-24). Similarly Amos predicts that at the time of Israel's restoration, men > shall plant vineyards and drink their wine, > and they shall make gardens and eat their fruit > (9:14).

The imagery used by Joel (3:18—H 4:18; cf. Amos 9:13) is even more expressive:

> And in that day
> the mountains shall drip sweet wine, > and the hills shall flow with milk.

Ezekiel even foresees the day when the waters of the Dead Sea will become fresh and thus able to support "very many fish"; on its banks "all kinds of trees for food" will grow (Ezek. 47:6-12). Later apocalyptic books also give descriptions of a messianic banquet to be held in heaven after this earth passes away; the NT contains several allusions to this coming event. See MEALS § 4*b*.

c. The devaluation of food. Important as food naturally was in both secular and religious affairs, it was never regarded as the sole source or end of man's life. The Deuteronomist knows that "man does not live by bread alone, but . . . by everything that proceeds out of the mouth of the LORD" (Deut. 8:3; cf. Jesus' reply to the tempter [Matt. 4:4; Luke 4:4]). And the author of the psalm of Habakkuk can say:

> Though the fig tree do not blossom, > nor fruit be on the vines,
> the produce of the olive fail > and the fields yield no food, > the flock be cut off from the fold > and there be no herd in the stalls, > yet I will rejoice in the LORD,
> I will joy in the God of my salvation > (Hab. 3:17-18).

The clearest insight into the ultimate importance of food is to be found in the NT, however. In the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus says to his listeners: "Do not be anxious about your life, what you shall eat or what you shall drink, nor about your body, what you shall put on." Rather, "life [is] more than food, and the body more than clothing"; God knows that his children need these things (Matt. 6:25, 32; Luke 12:22, 30). On another occasion Jesus calls himself the "bread which comes down from heaven"; if any man eats it, he will never be hungry again. Ordinary food, symbolized by the manna, does not have this power (John 6:31-35, 48-59).

The author of Hebrews may have had such sayings of Jesus in mind when he admonished his readers: "It is well that the heart be strengthened by grace, not by foods, which have not benefited their adherents" (Heb. 13:9). Paul, however, has the final word when he quotes a slogan of his opponents: "Food is meant for the stomach and the stomach for food," and concludes: "God will destroy both one and the other" (I Cor. 6:13). See also AGRICULTURE; DRINK.

Bibliography. J. Benziger, Hebräische Archäologie (1927), pp. 62-72; W. R. Smith, Lectures on the Religion of the Semites (3rd ed., 1927), pp. 217-23; C. H. Gordon, Ugaritic Literature (1949), p. 129, on the use of fig cakes in healing; A. C. Bouquet, Everyday Life in NT Times (1954), pp. 69-79; R. J. Forbes, Studies in Ancient Technology, III (1955), 50-59, 84-104; J. B. Pritchard, ed.,.ANET (2nd ed., 1955), pp. 19 (the story of Sinuhe), 370 (Hymn to the Aton); E. W. Heaton, Everyday Life in OT Times (1956), pp. 81-115. See also the commentaries on Matt. 4; Luke 12; John 6. J. F. ROSS

FOODS, CLEAN AND UNCLEAN. Those foods permitted and prohibited to the Jews; the most important lists appear in Lev. 11; Deut. 14. See CLEAN AND UNCLEAN § 3*b*.

FOOL. See FOLLY.

FOOT [רגל; πούς]. In the Bible this word normally has its ordinary physical sense. The word is used metaphorically only in certain instances where it is a picturesque equivalent of "person" (I Sam. 2:9) or a personal pronoun (Pss. 40:2; 66:9; Rom. 3:15), and in the phrase "foot of arrogance" (Ps. 36:11). The expression "to put under the feet" (Ps. 8:6) is a symbol of conquest and dominion recalling the actual practice of conquerors in ancient times (Josh. 10:24); to sit "at the feet" (Luke 10:39; Acts 22:3) is a symbol of discipleship, recalling the practice of the schools. With the metaphors should also be included the euphemistic use of the term "feet" for the pudenda (Judg. 3:24 KJV; II Kings 18:27 Qere; Isa. 6:2; Ezek. 16:25 KJV).

Because of the dusty roads of the ancient world, feet quickly became dirty in traveling (Mark 6:11), and provision for the washing of a guest's feet was an ordinary act of hospitality (Gen. 18:4; Luke 7:44; John 13:5). The removal of the shoes in a holy place was necessary because of their previous defilement by contact with the profane earth (Exod. 3:5). Because of the lowliness of the feet and perhaps also because, as mentioned above, they symbolize subjection and discipleship, the most natural gesture of humility and self-abasement was to "fall at the feet" (I Sam. 25:24; Mark 5:22). A common method of punishment in ancient Israel was to bind the feet in the STOCKS (Job 13:27; Jer. 20:2). The reference in Deut. 11:10 to watering "with the foot" is evidently to some kind of irrigation machine. R. C. DENTAN

FOOT WASHING. A hospitable amenity in Palestine, extended to guests upon arrival at the home of their host. It was usually performed by a servant, or by the wife of the host, while the guests were reclining at table (Luke 7:44; cf. Mark 1:7 and parallels). The Fourth Evangelist relates that Jesus performed this menial service to his disciples at the Last Supper (John 13:4 ff), as an example of the humble ministry they must ever be ready to perform one for another. The incident is an acted parable of his teaching: "Whoever would be great among you must be your servant, and whoever would be first among you must be slave of all" (Mark 10:43-44 and parallels). The Fourth Evangelist undoubtedly intended the narrative to convey deeper meaning than a lesson in humility. It was a sign of the entirely selfless love of Jesus himself that took him to the humiliation of the Cross (cf. 13:1). Many commentators also believe the Evangelist considered the foot washing to be symbolic of the sacraments of baptism and the Eucharist, by which Christians are cleansed of the defilement of sin and nurtured in a communion of love with their Lord and with one another.

The service of foot washing of the "saints" is mentioned in I Tim. 5:10 among the qualifications of the order of widows (see WIDOW). The ceremonial washing of feet in the church's liturgy is first attested ca. 400 by Augustine (Letters LV.33), in connection with the Easter baptisms in certain churches. The earliest trace of the ceremony on Maundy Thursday—a custom continued in many churches to the present day—is in the seventh-century liturgy of the church in Spain.

Bibliography. O. Cullmann, Early Christian Worship (1953), pp. 105-10. M. H. SHEPHERD, JR.

FOOTMAN [רגלי (II Kings 13:7; usually FOOT SOLDIER); KJV רץ (I Sam. 22:17; RSV GUARD; alternately COURIER), from רוץ, to run]. A soldier in the infantry.

FOOTSTOOL [הדם רגל; כבש, see below; ὑποπόδιον]. A word usually used metaphorically. According to II Chr. 9:18, Solomon's throne had a "footstool of gold." The word is כבש, which is probably a deliberate alteration of כבשׂ, "lamb," which in turn is probably a scribal alteration for עגל, "calf." (Cf. I Kings 10:19, which has עגול לכסה—i.e., the "top of the throne." or "The throne had a rounded top behind" [so Syr., Vulg., etc.]. But Greek texts have the equivalent of "heads of calves"—i.e., "calves" for "rounded top" [עגל for עגול]—now generally accepted. The RSV translates: "At the back of the throne was a calf's head.") If the Chronicles text is correct, however, this text uses a later Hebrew word for "footstool," though the root from which it is derived expresses "dominion."

In Pss. 99:5 (cf. vs. 9); 132:7; Lam. 2:1, "footstool" is a metaphor for Zion, if not for the temple itself (see also "place of my feet," etc., in Isa. 60:13; Ezek. 43:7). In I Chr. 28:2 it is generally referred to the mercy seat, the lid of the ark. In these four references the word is metaphorical of obeisance in worship. In Isa. 66:1 (so Matt. 5:35; Acts 7:49) it is a metaphor of the earth, as contrasted with the heavens as the Lord's throne, and with the temple as an alternative footstool to the temple. In Ps. 110:1 it is a metaphor of Davidic dominion.

Ps. 110:1 is quoted by Jesus in his argument with the scribes and Pharisees (Matt. 22:44; Mark 12:36; Luke 20:43). Peter applies the verse to Jesus as proof of his dominion and ascension (Acts 2:35), and this is precisely re-echoed in Heb. 1:13; 10:13. In Jas. 2:3, Christians are warned not to give the best seats to the wealthy and show the poor to a standing or a lowly place ("footstool").

The place at God's feet—no doubt originally the ark (I Chr. 28:2), then the temple, then the earth—is the place where the enemies demonstrate the divine dominion through obeisance. The NT applies this idea of the footstool to the Ascension.

Figs. BAN 19; DAR 4. G. HENTON DAVIES

FORBEARANCE. The English verb "forbear" has two connotations: (a) "desist, abstain, refrain from"; (b) "endure, bear, bear with." These are related, since to desist or refrain from positive action indicates a willingness to abide by the result.

In the KJV of the OT there are a number of examples of the first connotation in the translation of three separate Hebrew verbs: דמם, חדל, חשך, all of which are variously rendered in the LXX. The RSV has retained "forbear" in only four instances (I Kings 22:6, 15; II Chr. 18:5; Job 16:6); in other places it uses "refrain," "cease," "refuse," etc.

The only appearance of the second connotation is in Neh. 9:30 KJV: "Many years didst thou forbear them" (RSV "Many years thou didst bear with them"). The Hebrew original here means literally: "Thou didst stretch out upon them many years," and this is taken over word for word into the Greek of the LXX. Although the exact wording does not occur elsewhere in the OT, the idea that God patiently endures for a time the sinfulness and rebellion of his people appears a number of times (cf., e.g., Isa. 43:1-7; Jer. 31:1-3; Hos. 11:8-9). For the expression of this idea by other words, see LOVE; LONGSUFFERING.

In the LXX there is found a number of times the verb ἀνέχομαι, which means literally "to hold oneself up" and which has the same two connotations found in the English "forbear," although it is never used to translate a Hebrew verb that is so rendered in English (cf., e.g., Gen. 43:31; Isa. 63:15; Amos 4:7, for the sense of "restrain," "withhold"; and Job 6:11, for the meaning "endure"). The cognate noun, ἀνοχή, is found only once in the LXX (I Macc. 12:25), where it seems to have the technical meaning of "truce."

In the NT "forbear" occurs in the KJV in both senses. In both the KJV and the RSV of Eph. 6:9 it is used to translate ἀνίημι, which in secular Greek meant "let go," "unloose," "relax"; and in this passage it clearly means "refrain from." In II Cor. 12:6 for the Greek φείδομαι (lit., "spare") the KJV has "forbear" and the RSV "refrain." The same is true of I Cor. 9:6, where the words represent merely the negative particle (lit., "not to work"). The other meaning of "forbear" is found in I Thess. 3:1, 5, where the Greek has στέγω, which means in the first place "cover," hence "protect," and then "endure" because one is protected. Here the KJV has "forbear" and the RSV "bear."

The verb, however, which in Greek best represents the English "forbear" is ἀνέχομαι. It occurs fourteen times, but is translated by "forbear" only in Eph. 4:2; Col. 3:13. Elsewhere it is translated in the KJV by "suffer" (Mark 9:19 and parallels; I Cor. 4:12; II Cor. 11:19-20; Heb. 13:22); "bear with" (Acts 18:14; II Cor. 11:1); "endure" (II Thess. 1:4; II Tim. 4:3). The RSV has "bear," "bear with," "endure," "submit to." In all these cases it means "put up with," "endure," "bear up under provocation"—sometimes in a bad sense, as in II Cor. 11:19: "For you gladly bear with fools"—and sometimes in a good, as in I Cor. 4:12: "When persecuted, we endure." In Eph. 4:2 a more strongly positive meaning is indicated; "forbearing one another in love" must mean more than "put up with," since there is nothing negative about Christian LOVE. This is reinforced by the concluding phrase of the series: "eager to maintain the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace." Col. 3:13 uses "forbear" in the same positive way.

Mark 9:19 and parallels form a transition to the use of the word as applied to God. Here Jesus, when presented with the failure of his disciples to heal the epileptic boy, says: "O faithless generation, how long am I to bear with you?" From the point of view of the writer of the gospel this cannot be an expression of mere human impatience, especially in view of the story of the Transfiguration which has just been recounted. Jesus, as Son of God, is acting as God does. Jesus says: "O faithless generation," and then proceeds to heal the boy. The implication is that God acts in the same fashion. In spite of his MERCY the people of Israel have a long record of faithlessness, sinfulness, and rebellion. Such conduct merits punishment; and punishment must be meted out, if God is to be regarded as a God of justice. Since, however, he is also a God of mercy, he stays his hand in the hope that repentance will take place (cf., e.g., Neh. 9:26-38).

This gives us the key to the meaning of ἀνοχή, the cognate noun, as used in Rom. 2:4; 3:25, the only occurrences in the NT and translated "forbearance" in both KJV and RSV. In secular Greek the word meant "holding back," "stopping" (especially hostilities), and is therefore used most frequently for an "armistice" or "truce." The thought in Rom. 2:4 is that God, because of his kindness, delays "to inflict wrath" (3:5), in the hope that the sinner will repent. The thought is best understood if the passage is considered as a reply to one who might say that, if man is as bad as Paul paints him, then a just God would at once visit punishment upon him. Paul replies that the delay in inflicting the punishment is due to God's "forbearance" and is meant both to give opportunity for, and to lead the sinner to, repentance. Only repentance can prevent the application of the wrath on the "day of wrath" (Rom. 2:5). In Rom. 3:25 the reference is to the past. God had not inflicted to the full the penalty merited by sin—i.e., the complete destruction of the sinner—but in "his divine forbearance" he had passed over former sins because the "redemption which is in Christ Jesus" (vs. 24) had not yet been revealed. This "forbearance" is part of God's righteousness.

Bibliography. On the passages where the word occurs in Romans, see the Commentaries: W. Sanday and A. Headlam, ICC (1896); C. H. Dodd, Moffatt NT Commentary (1932); J. Knox, IB, IX (1954).

Special studies: O. J. Baab, Theology of the OT (1949), pp. 126-30; A. Richardson, "Forbear, Forbearance," Theological Word Book of the Bible (1950). E. J. Cook

FORD [עברה, מעבר, מעברה, all from עבר, pass over, through]. A place where a river or other body of water can be crossed by wading.

1. Palestine. It was the Romans who built the first bridges in Palestine, in the early Christian centuries. This explains why the word "bridge" occurs nowhere in the Bible. In order to cross rivers in biblical times, other means had to be used; the commonest was a ford. The chief river to be thus crossed was the Jordan, whose fords are referred to in Josh. 2:7; Judg. 3:28; 12:5-6; I Sam. 13:7 (emending MT); II Sam. 15:28; 17:16 (with some Hebrew MSS; KJV "plains"); 19:18—H 19:19. In I Macc. 9:48, Jonathan and his men are said to have swum the Jordan, but they may only have waded it. In Gen. 32:22—H 32:23 the ford of the Jabbok (Wadi Zerqa) appears, and in Isa. 16:2 the fords of the Arnon (Wadi Mojib). The location of none of these crossings is known for certain, though the "fords of the wilderness" (II Sam. 15:28; 17:16) have been identified with two Jordan fords a few miles N of the Dead Sea, Mahadat el-Hajlah and Mahadat el-Henu. Presumably the fords associated with Jericho (Josh. 2:7) and Moab (Judg. 3:28) cannot have been too far from the Jordan's mouth.

The Jordan between the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea flows strongly, following a serpentine course of about two hundred miles—though the geographical distance is only sixty-five miles—with a depth of from three to ten feet and a width of about ninety. There have always been numerous spots at which it can be forded, though these change with changes in the river bed. It remains a moot question how heavy wheeled vehicles, both civilian and military, were transported in the biblical period across such muddy fords (see Rafts). For an account of fording the Jordan ca. 1903 at El 'Abadiyeh, a little S of the Sea of Galilee, see W. Libbey and F. E. Hoskins, The Jordan Valley and Petra (1905), I, 138-41.

2. Babylonia. In Jer. 51:32 the "fords" of Babylon are referred to. These must be the crossings over the Euphrates and its numerous canals.

W. S. McCullough

FOREHEAD [מצח; μέτωπον]. The word is used in its literal sense as the spot where the golden plate on Aaron's turban was to be situated (Exod. 28:38) and where the insigne of a harlot was apparently worn (Jer. 3:3, "brow"; Rev. 17:5). The marks which were to distinguish the men of God (Ezek. 9:4; Rev. 9:4) and the men of "the beast" (Rev. 13:16) were also to be placed there. Metaphorically, the hard forehead is a symbol of stubbornness (Ezek. 3:7-8).

R. C. Dentan

FOREIGNER [זר (alternately STRANGER; ALIEN), נכרי (alternately STRANGER; ALIEN); LXX and NT ἀλλότριος, ἀλλογενής (alternately STRANGER; ALIEN)]. As distinct from the גר, Sojourner, who makes Israel his home, the foreigner comes into temporary contact with Israel as trader, traveler, or soldier, without cutting ties with his original home.

The Hebrew words are used in four different ways. They describe:

a) The enemies who invade and threaten to overthrow the established order of Israel: (both terms in parallel), Prov. 5:10; Obad. 11; (נכרי alone), II Sam. 22:45-46; Pss. 18:44-45—H 18:45-46; 144:7; Eccl. 6:2; Isa. 60:10; 62:8; (זר alone), Job 15:19; Ps. 109:11; Isa. 1:7; 25:2, 5; Jer. 30:8; 51:51; Ezek. 7:21; 11:9; 28:7, 10; 31:12; Hos. 7:9; 8:7). See Nations.

b) The gods of the foreign nations which are temptations for Israel (both terms in parallel: Ps. 81:9—H 81:10; Jer. 5:19; נכרי alone: Gen. 35:2; Deut. 31:16; 32:12; Josh. 24:20, 23; Judg. 10:16; I Sam. 7:3; II Chr. 14:3—H 14:2; 33:15; Jer. 8:19; Mal. 2:11; זר alone: Deut. 32:16; Ps. 44:20—H 44:21; Isa. 17:10; 43:12; Jer. 2:25; 3:13; Ezek. 16:32).

c) The non-Israelites who came into ordinary contacts with the Israelites. Special legislation was necessary with regard to financial dealings (Exod. 21:8; Deut. 14:21; 15:3; 23:20—H 23:21), and proverbs warned against giving surety for strangers (Prov. 11:15; 20:16; 27:13) or being enticed by an אשה זרה or a נכריה (Adventuress; Prov. 2:16; 5:3, 20; 6:24; 7:5; 23:27).

d) Those barred from the cult. Foreigners—either freemen (Exod. 12:43; Neh. 9:2; 13:30; Ezek. 44:7, 9) or slaves of Israelites (Gen. 17:12, 27)—were not allowed to participate in the cult, and even their animals were not suitable for sacrificial use (Lev. 22:25). In priestly legislation the זרים who are barred from contact with the holy objects include all who are not hereditary priests (Exod. 29:33; 30:33; Lev. 22:10, 12-13; Num. 1:51; 3:10, 38; 16:40—H 17:5; 18:4, 7). The more positive attitude toward foreigners in the worship of Israel in the pre-exilic period is seen in I Kings 8:41-43, while the postexilic horror of defilement is illustrated by Joel 3:17—H 4:17.

In the NT "foreigner" is used, rarely, to refer to non-Jews: Egyptians (Acts 7:6), Canaanites (Heb.

11:9, 34; ἀλλότριοι), and the Samaritan who shamed the Jewish lepers by giving thanks (Luke 17:18; ἀλλογενής). The reason for this rare use of the term as compared with the OT is that foreigners who were sojourners (παρόικοι) or strangers (ξένοι) could now become full members of the household of God, since the separating wall between Jew and Gentile was broken down (Eph. 2:11-19). With the disappearance of the Jewish political base for the life of God's people, Christians consider themselves as "aliens" (παρόικοι) on the earth, like the patriarchs (Acts 7:6, 29; Heb. 11:13; I Pet. 2:11), and their highest service is to care for strangers (ξένοι) as for Jesus himself (Matt. 25:35-44; III John 5).

Bibliography. A. Bertholet, Die Stellung der Israeliten und der Juden zu den Fremden (1896); M. Guttman, "The Term 'Foreigner' Historically Considered," HUCA, 3 (1926), 1-20; P. Humbert, "Les adjectifs 'Zar' et 'Nokri' et la 'femme étrangère' des proverbes bibliques," Mélanges syriens offerts à M. Dussaud (1939), pp. 259-66; L. Snijders, "The Meaning of זר in the OT," Oudtestamentische Studien, 10 (1954), 1-154.

E. J. HAMLIN

FOREKNOW, FOREKNOWLEDGE [προγινώσκω; πρόγνωσις]. These words occur several times in the NT (Acts 2:23; 26:5; Rom. 8:29; 11:2; I Pet. 1:2, 20; II Pet. 3:17). The idea they represent, however, is much more pervasive throughout the Bible than might appear from the infrequent appearance of these terms, for it is inseparably related to such kindred conceptions as ELECTION; PREDESTINATION or foreordination; PROVIDENCE.

Basically the verb προγινώσκω means "to know in advance," and in this sense it is well attested in Greek sources (e.g., Thucydides II.64.8; Plato Republic IV.426*c*; Aristotle Nicomachean Ethics 6.2; Philo On Dreams I.2; Jos. War. VI.viii). Since the time of Hipprocrates the noun πρόγνωσις has been a special medical term, referring to a prediction or prognosis made on the basis of diagnosis. In the biblical tradition, however, God's foreknowledge is of a different kind from human foresight of future developments. The biblical usage is qualified by the recognition that God alone is the Lord of the times and that his purpose encompasses all events from the beginning to the consummation of history. In the biblical understanding, he alone has foreknowledge, although this trait is ascribed to pre-existent Wisdom in the Wisdom of Solomon (8:8). In a passage which is consonant with the biblical witness God's sovereignty over history is grounded in the fact that he has created all nations and Israel, his people: "He hath foreseen them and us from the beginning of the creation unto the end of the age, and nothing has been neglected by him even to the least thing" (Asmp. Moses 12:4).

1. God's knowledge. Lest divine foreknowledge, and the associated term "predestination," be misunderstood to mean historical fatalism or predeterminism, it is appropriate to begin with an understanding of biblical words for "know" (ידע; γινώσκω, εἰδέναι) and "knowledge" (דעת; γνῶσις). Modern epistemology tends to assume that man is a thinker who stands over against the objects to be known, whether timeless realities or the objective world of persons, things, facts, etc. So viewed, God's knowledge is that of a divine mind which knows what eternally is or which comprehends encyclopedically all the facts that are knowable. But in the Bible knowledge comes, not so much through an intellectual vision of timeless reality or through the perception of objective facts, but in the context of personal relationship; and this is true above all with respect to God's knowledge of man and man's knowledge of God (see KNOWLEDGE). The man of faith confesses that he is known by God (Ps. 139:1; Jer. 1:5; I Cor. 8:3; 13:12; Gal. 4:9), in which case it is not meant that God knows facts about him but rather that God enters into relation with him, visiting, demanding, judging, and blessing. Thus God's knowing, being the expression of his personal will, is also an act of election (Gen. 18:19; Hos. 13:5; Amos 3:2; II Tim. 2:19), as indicated in the words: "I know you by name" (Exod. 33:12; cf. Isa. 43:1; 45:3-4; 49:1). Standing in a personal relationship to God, the biblical man affirms that his whole life, from beginning to end, is known by God, and from the same standpoint he perceives that all of human history is encompassed within the divine purpose.

From the experience of being known by God comes also the confession that God is omniscient, a central tenet of biblical faith despite passages, found in old folk tradition, which suggest that Yahweh acts to ascertain something he does not know (Gen. 3:9; 11:5; 18:21). God's knowledge is all-inclusive in the sense that nothing or no one can slip beyond the range of his personal lordship. The religious implication of divine omniscience is that God is inescapable: nothing is hidden from his view. Only the fool supposes that his deeds can be done in the dark without God's knowing (Job 21:27; Pss. 10:4, 11; 11:4-6; 33:13-15; 51:6; 138:6; Isa. 29:15-16). And if

> Sheol and Abaddon lie open before the LORD, > how much more the hearts of men!
> (Prov. 15:11; cf. Job 26:6).

He knows man's thoughts (Ps. 94:11), his mortal weakness (Ps. 103:14); and therefore there is no hiding place in which the creature can escape from the God who knows him completely (Ps. 139:1-6).

> The eyes of the Lord > are ten thousand times brighter than the sun;
> they look upon all the ways of men, > and perceive even the hidden places;

this affirmation about the inescapable judgment of God is underscored by reference to divine foreknowledge:

> Before the universe was created, it was known to him;
> so it was also after it was finished
> (Ecclus. 23:19-20).

In the NT it is affirmed that nothing falls beyond the range of God's concern (Matt. 10:29-31). Moreover, it is said that the word of the Lord, sharper than any two-edged sword, pierces to the innermost center of man's life; for "before him no creature is hidden, but all are open and laid bare to the eyes of him with whom we have to do" (Heb. 4:12-13).

Thus the personal lordship of God means that nothing is hidden from him. And just as his searching eye scans the present scene, seeing "everything under the heavens," so the past and future are open before him. From the standpoint of faith, God's knowledge is also foreknowledge.

2. Foreknowledge of events. According to the ancient view, the gods are distinguished from men by virtue of their superior knowledge, as well as their immortality (cf. Gen. 3:22). Man's knowledge, particularly his knowledge of the future, is severely limited, and therefore he must seek divine direction if he is to have any inkling of his destiny. Various techniques of divination were developed to enable man to know and control the future, and these practices are often mentioned in the OT: interpretation of dreams (Gen. 41), necromancy (I Sam. 28), decision by the sacred lot (I Sam. 30:7-8), and prophetic oracle (I Kings 22:1-36; note the three main practices mentioned in I Sam. 28:6, 15). Although Hebrew prophecy rose far above its humble origins in soothsaying (I Sam. 9–10; note 9:9 and see PROPHET, PROPHETISM), it never surrendered its predictive reference to the future. To be sure, prophecy at its best was not an inquisitive prying into divine secrets for the purpose of enabling man to control his destiny. Nevertheless, the great prophets spoke as those who had heard Yahweh's decree in his heavenly council (Jer. 23:18, 22; cf. Isa. 6:8; 40:6; Amos 3:7), and their message to the present contained the announcement of what Yahweh was about to do in the accomplishment of his purpose. Divine foreknowledge, then, is the presupposition of the prophetic message about things to come, both in the OT and in the NT.

When the theme of foreknowledge is abstracted from faith's experience of the historical sovereignty of God, it is quickly converted into a doctrine which, to the reflective mind, apparently devaluates human freedom and historical creativity. However, divine foreknowledge has nothing to do with fatalism or determinism. It does not mean that history is written in advance, that it follows a chronological timetable drawn up by God. Nor does it mean that man's will is causally determined, whether by impersonal fate or by an impersonal system of laws. Rather, the affirmation about divine foreknowledge springs out of the experience of man's relation to a personal Lord whose personal will governs man's life from beginning to end. From the perspective of faith, nothing happens by chance or caprice, for God's will enfolds all happenings, even the evil that befalls a city (Amos 3:6). Again and again the prophets emphasize Yahweh's sovereign purpose:

> As I have planned,
> so shall it be,
> and as I have purposed,
> so shall it stand > (Isa. 14:24-27; cf. 5:19; 19:17; 28:29; Jer. 50:45; Amos 3:7; Mic. 4:12).

In any given situation, the man of faith is conscious of the priority of God's purpose, and this may be expressed in temporal terms by saying that the event was previously planned, and therefore known, by God. It is not just that God can make the best of an unexpected situation and pull it into the orbit of his activity; rather the situation, viewed from the angle of faith, belongs intrinsically to God's prevenient purpose (cf. Gen. 45:4-8; Ps. 50:20; Prov. 16:4; II Pet. 3:9).

The priority of God's purpose is one of the fundamental themes of the prophecy of Second Isaiah. The gods of the nations cannot announce the things to come, for they are caught within the temporal process and are subject to the same weakness and limitation of vision as man. Yahweh, on the other hand, is the eternal God, the First and the Last (see GOD, NAMES OF, § D4*b*), whose purpose spans history from beginning to end. According to this prophet, Yahweh's unique and exclusive deity is attested by his foreknowledge: he alone can declare the things to come. History is the unfolding of his purpose, a movement of events from promise toward fulfilment.

> Who declared it from the beginning, that we might know, > and beforetime, that we might say, "He is right"?
> (Isa. 41:26 and all of vss. 21-29; cf. 43:8-13; 44:6-8; 46:8-11; 48:3-8).

Moreover, Yahweh fulfils his purpose by doing something new in history, by performing a new act of creation (see CREATION § 3*b*).

> Behold, the former things have come to pass, > and new things I now declare;
> before they spring forth
> I tell you of them (42:9; cf. 43:18-19).

Thus the new era, heralded by the rise of Cyrus and the imminent release of exiles, does not represent a change in the divine will, but only the fruition of Yahweh's saving purpose announced beforehand.

The book of DANIEL gives the impression that divine foreknowledge, communicated through prophetic vision, involves advance knowledge of historical details. Admittedly, apocalyptic writers tended to think of foreknowledge in this way (see APOCALYPTICISM). Some of the theological problems of the Daniel apocalypse vanish, however, when it is realized that it was written in the Maccabean period and that the prophetic "predictions" are, for the most part, a retrospective narration of historical events, a narration which becomes more accurate as the writer approaches his own period. The book bears witness to the experience of God's lordship over history. In retrospect it is discerned that history is not governed by caprice or by the powerful ambitions of nations, but solely by the prevenient purpose of God. Far from paralyzing human action, this sense of the overruling sovereignty of God provided the spring for action and the support for faith during the Maccabean trials, when overwhelming odds were arraigned against the Jewish people (cf. Dan. 11:32). Similarly in the story of Judith, the heroine acts in the confidence that God has designed the things that have come to pass as well as those that are to come, "for all thy ways are prepared in advance, and thy judgment is with foreknowledge" (Jth. 9:5-6). The prophetic knowledge of things to come is mentioned in other passages, such as Jth. 11:19; Jos. Antiq. VIII. viii.5; xv.6 (cf. Wisd. Sol. 18:6; II Pet. 3:17).

Since the NT is dominated by the announcement that God's promises have been fulfilled, the theme of divine foreknowledge is expressed in various ways. Paul proclaims the gospel of God "which he promised beforehand [προεπηγγείλατο] through his prophets in the holy scriptures" (Rom. 1:2). Frequently the gospel writers comment that events in the story of the Messiah occurred that what was spoken by the prophets might be fulfilled (Matt. 1: 22-23; 2:5-6, 15, 17; etc.). Although OT passages are often used with considerable freedom, these citations nevertheless express the conviction that the prior purpose of God was disclosed in the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ. Jesus himself, according to the gospel portraits, believed that his task was to carry out the foreordained divine plan. At least in part, this accounts for the statements that "the Son of man must suffer" (Mark 8:31), that he "goes as it has been determined" (Luke 22:22), and that his appointed "hour" or "time" (kairos) has come (Matt. 26:45; Luke 12:40, 46; John 7:30; 12:27; 17:1). According to the kerygma of the primitive church, Jesus was betrayed and crucified "according to the definite plan and foreknowledge of God" (Acts 2:23; cf. 4: 28). It is wrong to deduce from these and similar NT statements that Jesus' career was mapped out in advance and that he submitted himself to a prearranged fate. Rather, the NT writers, viewing Jesus' career from the standpoint of faith, discern in these events the prevenient purpose of God. The event of the Messiah's coming was no divine afterthought, no casual and unexpected occurrence in history, but an essential part of God's redemptive purpose, announced in advance through his prophetic spokesmen. Moreover, just as it could be said that Moses was chosen from the time of Creation (Asmp. Moses 1:14; 12:4-7), so also the NT affirms that the Elect One (Luke 9:35; 23:35; cf. I Pet. 2:4) was purposed from the beginning: He was "destined [προεγνωσμένου] before the foundation of the world but was made manifest at the end of the times for your sake" (I Pet. 1:20; cf. John 17:24). Thus the saving activity of God, as manifested in Jesus Christ, is the expression of his eternal purpose, not a mere accommodation to historical circumstance. It should be emphasized that the language of foreknowledge and predestination belongs within the experience of God's lordship through Jesus Christ and therefore speaks "from faith to faith." When translated out of the situation of faith into abstract, logical categories, its meaning is inevitably diluted or falsified.

3. Foreknowledge and election. As indicated above, divine foreknowledge and divine election are intimately related. Indeed, the language of foreknowledge arises confessionally out of the awareness of God's call, whether that call is directed toward an individual or a people. This is clear, e.g., in the vocation of a prophet or an apostle. God's call not only summons a man to perform a task within the divine plan but also discloses the prevenience of the divine purpose in his personal history. Jeremiah doubtless came to his decision and responded to Yahweh's call out of an intense inner struggle. Nevertheless, from the vantage point of faith he perceived that Yahweh had meant for him to be a prophet all along. While he was still in his mother's womb, Yahweh knew him and appointed him for his task (Jer. 1:5). Similarly, Paul says, looking back from the time after his conversion, that he was set apart before he was born, called through divine grace (Gal. 1:15). In these instances the divine call prompts the awareness that the initiative is on God's side, that his purpose underlies every moment of one's life right from the beginning. Thus a psalmist confesses that Yahweh's eyes beheld him in his prenatal state, and that the days of his life were written in Yahweh's book even before they unfolded (Ps. 139:16).

God's people, too, share a common calling. Israel's election was grounded primarily in God's deliverance of his people from Egypt (Exod. 19:3-6; Jer. 2:2-7; Hos. 2:14-15—H 2:16-17; 11:1; Amos 3:1-2; 9:7; Mic. 6:4); but the traditions of the book of Genesis, in their present form, emphasize that even in advance of the Exodus and the Sinai revelation Yahweh was calling a people into existence and manifesting his prior purpose in the lives of the patriarchs. According to Second Isaiah, Yahweh's creation of Israel and his calling his people by name express the divine initiative and grace which lie behind and within Israel's history (Isa. 43:1). Furthermore, the Servant testifies:

> Yahweh called me from the womb, > from the body of my mother he named my name > (Isa. 49:1; cf. Jer. 1:5).

In the NT, Paul says of Israel, the "remnant, chosen by grace," that "God has not rejected his people whom he foreknew [προέγνω]" (Rom. 11:2; cf. vs. 5), and the prevenience of God's purpose is underscored by tracing his act of election back to the time when Jacob and Esau were still in the mother's womb (9:6-18).

In a special sense, however, the church is bound together by a divine calling. "Those whom he foreknew [προέγνω] he also predestined [προώρισεν] to be conformed to the image of his Son," writes Paul (Rom. 8:29). In this context (vss. 18-39) Paul expounds the doctrine of divine Providence in the most practical terms, at a time when Christians were facing difficult circumstances. Those "who are called according to his purpose" confess that in everything God works for good. Faith, therefore, is grounded solely upon God's initiative and grace, not upon changing human fortunes or the character of the world's response to the gospel. In this milieu of thought belong other NT affirmations: that the scattered exiles of the Christian dispersion are "chosen and destined by God" (κατὰ πρόγνωσιν Θεοῦ; I Pet. 1:2); that he "chose you from the beginning to be saved" (II Thess. 2:13); that God "chose us in [Christ] before the foundation of the world" and "destined [προορίσας] us in love to be his sons through Jesus Christ, according to the purpose of his will" (Eph. 1:4-5); that, although men of the Old Covenant lived by faith, "God had foreseen [προβλεψαμένου] something better for us" (Heb. 11: 40); and that the names of the faithful have been inscribed on the book of life from the foundation of the world (Rev. 17:8).

These statements about foreknowledge and predestination are not intended as expressions of pride or exclusiveness. On the contrary, they testify to God's initiative which precedes man's response, to the divine purpose which has priority over everything else. "What have you that you did not receive? If then you received it, why do you boast as if it were not a gift?" (I Cor. 4:7.) Thus salvation is traced back beyond anything human and temporal to the eternal purpose of God, which spans history from beginning to end and which has its center in Jesus Christ. Nor do these statements intend to destroy human freedom. On the contrary, the certainty that man's salvation is in God's hand frees the believer from worldly anxieties and enables him to affirm that "in all these things we are more than conquerors through him who loved us" (Rom. 8:37).

Bibliography. R. Bultmann in TWNT, I (1933), 688-719, especially 715-17; P. Minear, Eyes of Faith (1946), pp. 33-37; W. Eichrodt, Theologie des Alten Testaments, II (1948), 87-97; H. H. Rowley, The Biblical Doctrine of Election (1950); E. Stauffer, NT Theology (1955), pp. 51-55.

B. W. ANDERSON

FORERUNNER [πρόδρομος] (Wisd. Sol. 12:8; Heb. 6:20). A scout sent in advance of troops.

The word πρόδρομος is a technical military term in classical Greek for light-armed soldiers sent out as advance scouts. In Herodotus the term is used to designate the Scythian cavalry sent in advance of the regular army (IV.121-22, but simply as κήρυξ in I.60). In Alexander's army οἱ πρόδρομοι were a special corps of mounted guides (Arrian 1.12.7; Diodorus Siculus XVII.17).

The word can thus be understood in one of two senses: (a) as precursor or herald; (b) as scout—i.e., one who prepares the way. In the Wisdom passage the first meaning is clearly intended ("wasps as forerunners of [God's] army"), whereas in the Hebrews passage Christ is the forerunner who has entered heaven before us—i.e., the one who prepares the way (cf. John 14:2).

The OT notion of preparing the way for the one coming (Isa. 40:3-11; Mal. 3:1) is applied in the gospels to JOHN THE BAPTIST as forerunner of Jesus, though the term itself is never used (Matt. 11:10; Mark 1:2-8; Luke 7:27-28).

Bibliography. J. Kromayer and G. Veith, Heerwesen und Kriegführung der Griechen und Römer (Handbuch der Altertumswissenschaft IV, 3.2; 1928), pp. 53, 100. J. W. WEVERS

FORESAIL [ἀρτέμων]; KJV MAINSAIL (Acts 27:40). A small square sail rigged to the foremast on Roman ships. See SHIPS AND SAILING IN THE NT § 3.

FORESKIN. See CIRCUMCISION.

FOREST. There are numerous OT references to forests which included shrubs, thickets, and trees, and the reports of travelers in Palestine during the period of Turkish control of the land and earlier indicate that trees were more common in Canaan in ancient times than at the present. See also TREES; FLORA; WOOD; HOUSE OF THE FOREST OF LEBANON.

The Hebrew word commonly rendered "forest" is יער (I Sam. 22:5; II Kings 19:23; Ps. 50:10; etc.). There is no way of determining with certainty the number of trees or the extent of such forests, but it is probable that they were much smaller and the wood less precious than that of the famous CEDARS OF LEBANON (I Kings 7:2; 10:17, 21; etc.). The same word is used in Isa. 21:13 to designate the "thickets in Arabia" (יער בערב; KJV "forest in Arabia"), on the supposition that there were no forests in Arabia. In Mic. 3:12 (cf. Jer. 26:19) the expression במות יער is to be understood as referring to a "wooded height" rather than to the "high places of the forest" (KJV), in view of the desolation which is predicted for Zion in the passage. יער is rendered "forest" (KJV "wood") in the following passages, where the context implies the presence of a number of trees; Deut. 19:5; Josh. 17:15, 18; I Sam. 14:25-26; II Sam. 18:6; Ps. 80:13; etc.

Other terms for collections of trees include חרש (II Chr. 27:4 KJV "forests"; RSV "wooded hills"; cf. I Sam. 23:15, where the KJV has "wood" and the RSV a proper name HORESH) and פרדס (Neh. 2:8), where a reference to the king's forest may indicate a royal preserve. The only NT reference to a "forest" occurs in Jas. 3:5, where the word ὕλη (KJV "matter"; mg. "wood") is used in a figure of speech that implies a recognition of the danger of forest fires (cf. Ps. 83:14—H 83:15).

Although forests in ancient Palestine were not extensive, the OT mentions them as being located in the hill country of Ephraim (Josh. 17:15, 18; II Sam. 18:6) and in the NEGEB (Ezek. 20:46-47). It is probable that there were forests in Gilead, where trees are still numerous. Although there must have been trees on Mount Carmel in OT times, as there are today, the phrase יער כרמלו (II Kings 19:23; "its densest forest"; KJV "the forest of his Carmel"; cf. Isa. 37:24) is to be understood as referring to the thick forests of Lebanon (cf. reference to Lebanon in same vs.). Wild animals inhabited the forests (Ps. 80:13; Jer. 5:6; Amos 3:4; etc.) and made them places that were feared (II Sam. 18:8). According to I Sam. 22:5, David took refuge in the forest of HORETH (KJV "Hareth"), which has not been located with certainty, although the scene of David's activities as reported would indicate an area near the Philistine Plain. W. L. REED

FOREST OF LEBANON. See HOUSE OF THE FOREST OF LEBANON.

FORGE. See FURNACE.

FORGETFULNESS, LAND OF [ארץ נשיה] (Ps. 88:12—H 88:13). A poetic term for Sheol which suggests that God (Ps. 88:5), perhaps like humanity (Ps. 31:12; Eccl. 9:5-6), forgets those who have died, and that the dead pass into utter oblivion. Contrast Job 14:21-22, in which the dead, however oblivious to the fortune of their descendants, retain some sort of psychological consciousness and experience great anguish about their own fate.

A plain of forgetfulness in the Greek Hades is mentioned by Plato (Republic X.621). H. F. BECK

FORGIVENESS. In the Bible forgiveness is primarily the act of God by which he graciously takes away the obstacles or barriers which separate man from his presence, thus opening the way to reconciliation and fellowship. It is secondarily man's forgiveness of his neighbor, an aspect which becomes especially prominent in the teaching of Jesus.

A. Terminology
   1. In biblical Hebrew
   2. In LXX Greek
   3. In NT Greek

B. In the OT
1. God forgives
2. The need of forgiveness
3. The way of forgiveness
a. The covenant
b. The sacrificial cultus
c. Repentance
4. The meaning of forgiveness
C. In the NT
1. John the Baptist
2. The teaching of Jesus
a. Repentance and faith
b. Forgiveness in the new age
c. The centrality of the person of Jesus
3. The apostolic church
4. The meaning of forgiveness
Bibliography

A. TERMINOLOGY. The idea of "forgiveness" is expressed by a number of different metaphors in Hebrew and Greek.

1. In biblical Hebrew. The metaphors of "sending away," "covering," "removing," and "wiping away" are used in Hebrew to express the notion of "forgiveness." The commonest term is the verb סלח, "to send away" (Lev. 4:20, 26; I Kings 8:30, 34; Pss. 86:5; 103:3). The verb כפר, "to cover," is especially frequent in the priestly tradition and expresses the idea of "atonement" or "propitiation" (Exod. 29:36; 30:10; Lev. 8:15; 16:20; Ezek. 43:20; 45:20). Other expressions are: the verbs פשה, "to wipe away" (Ps. 51:1, 7; Isa. 43:25; 44:22); נשא, "to lift away, remove" (Gen. 50:17; Ps. 32:5); and כסה, "to cover" (Neh. 4:5; Pss. 32:1; 85:2). The noun סליחה uses the picture of "removal" to express "forgiveness" (Ps. 130:4; Dan. 9:9).

2. In LXX Greek. The commonest term for "forgiveness" in the LXX is ἀφίημι, "to send away," which is used to translate כפר, נשא, and סלח. כפר is also rendered by ἱλάσομαι, "to be merciful." Εὐιλατεύω, "to be merciful," translates both נשא and סלח. סלח is also translated by ἵλεως. כסה is rendered by καλύπτω and ἐπικαλύπτω, both meaning "to cover," and by κρύπτω, "to conceal." Ἐξαλείφω, "to wipe away," translates פשה; and the noun ἱλασμός, "atonement," is used to translate סליחה.

3. In NT Greek. The commonest words for "forgiveness" in the NT are the verb ἀφίημι, "to send away" (Matt. 6:12, 14-15; 9:2; 12:31; etc.), and the noun ἄφεσις, "sending away" (Mark 3:29; Luke 3:3; 24:47; Acts 2:38), used both of God's forgiveness of sin and of man's forgiveness of his neighbor's offenses. The verb ἀπολύω, "to loose away," is used twice in Luke 6:37. The verb χαρίζομαι, "to be gracious to" (Luke 7:43; II Cor. 2:7, 10; Col. 2:13), stresses the generosity and graciousness of forgiveness. The noun πάρεσις, "a passing over," is used of "forgiveness" in Rom. 3:25. Ἐπικαλύπτω (Rom. 4:7) and καλύπτω (Jas. 5:20; I Pet. 4:8) both mean "to cover."

B. IN THE OT. Forgiveness is an expression of the religious relationship between God and man. God is Creator, Sustainer, and Judge of all the earth. Man is his creature, lives by his bounty, but is separated from him by his sin, and thus needs forgiveness, for he cannot live under God's wrath. When sins are forgiven, reconciliation is possible and man may experience again the blessings of fellowship with God.

1. God forgives. Israel has encountered a God of power. He is Lord of all the earth, and all that exists is the result of his creative will. He sends rain and harvest, grants strength and health to his creatures, and assigns the conditions of their existence (II Sam. 22:32-42; Job 26:6-14; Ps. 65:6-8). But where sin separates man from God, man does not experience God's blessing. Even though God's gifts sustain him, he does not have peace and fulness of life until through forgiveness God's blessing can rest on him (Ps. 32:3-4).

The God of Israel is the Holy One. He cannot endure evil or impurity. He is a jealous God and will not tolerate violation of his law (Lev. 11:44-45; 20:7; Deut. 7:6). But holiness is necessary for harmonious human life, and man thus needs the holiness of God in his life. Man cannot live without God, and as sinner he cannot approach God. Only the removal of sin can enable man to have a life of integrity and wholeness.

But Israel's God is also merciful (I Kings 8:23; Ps. 13:5; Isa. 60:10). He has no pleasure in the death of a sinner. Through the covenant he offers mercy to his people, granting the assurance of his favor through the cultus he has established. In spite of man's backsliding and unfaithfulness the covenant mediates the mercy of God, because it is based, not on the achievements of man, but upon the righteousness and reliability of God (I Kings 8:30; Ps. 130:3-4; Jer. 31:34).

2. The need of forgiveness. Living in confrontation with a holy God, man knows himself as a sinner. SIN is a fundamental distortion of human personality; its repercussions in human life are manifold and devastating. The OT has several words for "sin," expressing different aspects of man's separation from God. Sin is disobedience, straying from the will of God (Pss. 32:1, 5; 51:2); it is trespass or wickedness, an informed and deliberate violation of the law (Isa. 53:8; 59:20; Mic. 3:8); it is perversity, the petulant rebelliousness of the human spirit; it is iniquity or vanity, the pathetic emptiness of the creature trying to wage war with his Creator (Pss. 90:8; 103:3; Isa. 43:24; Amos 3:2); it is bondage:

> Their deeds do not permit them > to return to their God.
> For the spirit of harlotry is within them, > and they know not the LORD
> (Hos. 5:4).

As a consequence of sin man has lost fellowship with God. He is cut off from the source of life; his soul is crippled, the powers and effectiveness of the human person reduced. He lives under God's wrath, filled with anxieties and fears and out of harmony with nature and with his fellow men. Whereas God created him for a life of peace and harmony, he now lives in frustration.

Forgiveness is the removal of the barriers between God and man. Sin is covered, expiated; it is sent away, removed, wiped away; God has cast it behind his back (Isa. 38:17), or into the depths of the sea (Mic. 7:19). Forgiveness renews fellowship with God, who is the source of all holiness and life. His mercy and favor replace his wrath and judgment, so that the entire environment of human life has new possibilities. The created world is sanctified to man again, and new relationships become possible in community and family. Terror of conscience and dread of judgment give way to peace. Man's soul is healed, the powers of his personality restored and strengthened.

3. The way of forgiveness. a. The covenant. Israel's assurance that sin can be forgiven rests ultimately upon its COVENANT relationship to God. Yahweh has made himself known as the one, the unique, God. Unlike the gods of the nations, Yahweh the Creator is Lord of nature, Lord of history, the God who reveals his will and the God who manifests his love in choosing for himself a people. Israel's awareness of its election gradually transforms its religion and theology, as the implications of the covenant relationship are worked out. Israel's history is the struggle between the naturalistic and prophetic understanding of religion. The naïve and naturalistic relationship between God and people prevalent in ancient Semitic religion gives way before the knowledge of Yahweh as the transcendent One. He cannot be identified with his people, nor is his fate linked with that of his people. As Lord of the world he deals with Israel, not because he needs them, but because it is his nature to be merciful and gracious. Forgiveness is not something men gain by punctilious performance of the proper rituals; it is the free and sovereign gift of the loving God.

b. The sacrificial cultus. The chief instrument for the realization of forgiveness is the sacrificial cultus. As in all the religions of the ancient world, sacrifice (see SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS) is a part of the common life of the OT world. But Israel's understanding of sacrifice gradually changes as it becomes aware of the implications of the covenant. This understanding is won through conflict, a constant battle on shifting fronts between prophetic religion and the various attempts to assimilate the religion of Israel to that of surrounding nations.

Participation in sacrifice was a dramatic-liturgical expression of the worship of God. The various actions of the ritual and ceremony enabled the worshiper to express his movement toward God and experience the gracious action of God toward him. His approach to the altar was an expression of his awareness of need, his sense of guilt and unworthiness, and his realization that his life could achieve wholeness only in the presence of God. As he placed his hands upon his sacrifice, he symbolized his identification with his gift, which, at least in the early days of Israel's history, was a product of his own care and toil. This was the acknowledging that God's claim involved his total being and that in offering his gift he was offering himself. The killing of the sacrifice and the sprinkling of the blood were the offering up of life, and, by previous identification, the life of the worshiper. The insistence on an unblemished sacrifice emphasized that worship is the offering of the best and most precious, life itself, to God. The burning of a portion of the offering symbolized the transformation of the gift and its acceptance by God. This emphasized the fact that sacrifice is not a barter transaction in which God forgives for a consideration, but that sacrifice is effectual because God in his mercy chooses to accept the offering as the offering of the worshiper's life. Sacrifice is not the purchase of forgiveness but the claiming of God's promise of mercy. The sacrificial meal expresses the restoration of fellowship between God and man. Man shares in the most intimate expression of friendship, the fellowship meal. At this climax of the ritual act the guilt-burdened worshiper is assured of pardon and experiences the restoration of wholeness to life. Admission once again to God's presence is the reintegration of man in the fellowship of the elect nation, the sanctification of the natural world created by God, and the resultant recovery of soundness of life.

The OT itself makes it clear that the prophetic understanding of the covenant religion did not always prevail in Israel. Nevertheless the Israelite, living as he did in an environment permeated with the atmosphere of sacrifice, would find it more significant than can we in our attempts to understand it from without by historical and theological analysis. Religious realities can be communicated by other than verbal symbols, and the sacrificial cultus was a significant agent in the tradition of the religion of Israel. See REDEMPTION.

c. Repentance. The third element in the realization of forgiveness is REPENTANCE. Yahweh reveals himself as Person and deals with his people as persons. The relation to God cannot be merely objective or impersonal. The prophetic movement ceaselessly emphasizes the demand for genuine repentance and amendment of life. The prophets protest vehemently against the mechanical and formalistic performance of sacrifice:

> For I desire steadfast love and not sacrifice, > the knowledge of God, rather than burnt offerings > (Hos. 6:6).

The cultus is not a device to purchase from God a license to continue a self-centered existence; it is the divinely given means for the sanctification of his people. "You shall . . . be holy, for I am holy" (Lev. 11: 44-45). The purpose of sacrifice is not to acquire peace of mind inexpensively, but to provide the means for Israel's self-giving to Yahweh and dedication to his purposes. The prophetic insistence on repentance is not so much concerned with sorrow and contrition as with amendment of life, restitution, and righteousness:

> "Rend your hearts and not your garments."
> Return to the LORD, your God
> (Joel 2:13);
>
> Is not this the fast that I choose:
> to loose the bonds of wickedness, > to undo the thongs of the yoke?
> . . . . . .
> Is it not to share your bread with the hungry, > and bring the homeless poor into your house?
> (Isa. 58:6-7).

4. The meaning of forgiveness. The focus of forgiveness in the OT is the renewal of HOLINESS. This is a comprehensive notion with several aspects. It is, first, the removal of that which separates man from God, the source of holiness. Forgiveness is the taking away of barriers of sin and guilt in order that man may again enter the divine presence and experience God's blessing in his life.

Secondly, it is the restoration of divine favor and the overcoming of God's wrath. Man has been made to live in God and in community with his fellow man. Sin destroys both relationships. Forgiveness restores fellowship and makes possible harmonious relationships with the fellow man.

Thirdly, holiness is the healing of the soul, the recovery of strength and power in human life. The energies perverted or rendered powerless by sin can again be put to productive uses:

> When I declared not my sin, my body wasted away.
> . . . . . .
> My strength was dried up as by the heat of summer (Ps. 32:3-4).

But forgiveness restores strength:

> No inhabitant will say, "I am sick";
> the people who dwell there will be forgiven their iniquity (Isa. 33:24).

A fourth emphasis comes to the fore in the exilic and postexilic periods: the stress on forgiveness as opening the way to holiness. With the temple in ruins and the people in exile, the Torah becomes more prominent and leads to a discipline in individual and personal holiness in which the ethical element is very prominent. There is an increased stress upon the holiness and transcendence of God, and a corresponding deepening of the sense of human sin and guilt. During this period the sense of forgiveness as restoration of integrity weakens, the ethical and juridical elements become more prominent, and forgiveness is seen more narrowly as the removal of guilt.

C. IN THE NT. Rabbinic Judaism was zealous to hold the prophetic faith of Israel as it had come down in the tradition of the elders. There was deep reverence for God and great concern for the proper exposition of his will as revealed in the Torah. An earnest seeking for holiness accompanied strenuous religious discipline. The temple was venerated as the abode of the divine name, the emblem of God's presence in Israel, and the ground for assurance of his favor to the covenant people. For communities outside Jerusalem the synagogue became the center of religious life, increasing the prominence of the Torah for the pious and strengthening the tendency to think of forgiveness in primarily ethical and legal terms.

Another potent influence in the religious life of NT times was APOCALYPTICISM. The long-frustrated yearning for the re-establishment of the Davidic kingdom found an outlet in hopes for the intervention of God in a dramatic or even catastrophic manner. Ordinary historical and political developments offered little hope for the establishment of the kingdom; eyes were raised to heaven in hopes of the action of God himself. The effect of apocalyptic thought was to lessen confidence in human powers; even genuine repentance is beyond human abilities. Man's only hope is that God will grant him the possibility of repentance as well as forgiveness.

1. John the Baptist. The work of John the Baptist introduced new elements into the religious situation. He proclaimed a BAPTISM of repentance unto remission of sins, and pointed to one to come who should bring the baptism of the Holy Spirit (Mark 1:4, 8). John's preaching and baptism aroused great interest, first because the voice of prophecy (see PROPHET) was heard in Israel again after centuries of silence. The spontaneity and unpredictability of the prophetic came to disturb the well-regulated system of Torah, tradition, and cultus. Secondly, his baptism was a striking innovation, combining the old prophetic call to repentance with the promise of forgiveness of sins through baptism. Its implied challenge to the cultus of the temple at Jerusalem was not lost upon the priestly authorities, who demanded that John present his credentials (John 1:19-27). If he were not the Messiah, or Elijah, or the prophet, by what authority did he baptize people and promise them forgiveness? Thirdly, John pointed to the imminent fulfilment of age-old messianic hopes, asserting that God's anointed one was in their midst and that the kingdom was at hand. His baptism was a preparation for the Messiah, a part of the purification of Israel promised before the great and terrible Day of the Lord (Matt. 3:11-12; Luke 3:15-17). John's imprisonment and death put an end to his public activity, but his connection of forgiveness with repentance and baptism continued to be significant in the work of Jesus of Nazareth.

2. The teaching of Jesus. After baptism at the hands of John, Jesus went about as a teacher and was accepted by many of his contemporaries as rabbi and prophet. His teaching very soon burst out of rabbinic and prophetic categories, however, and aroused strong opposition, especially among the religious authorities.

a. Repentance and faith. John the Baptist gave his demand for repentance a strongly ethical content with his insistence on fruits worthy of repentance, his exhortations to honesty and generosity, and his counsel that soldiers eschew robbery and extortion (Luke 3:10-14). Jesus began his ministry with words strikingly similar to John's preaching: "The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand; repent, and believe in the gospel" (Mark 1:15). There is the same emphasis on repentance, on eschatological fulfilment and the kingly rule of God; new is the coupling of repentance and belief in the gospel.

Jesus deepens the prophetic demand for repentance. He whets the cutting edge of the law by his insistence on inner purity and sincerity. The angry word and the lustful glance put man under judgment. The law of God requires not only outward conformity, but also a deep and complete correspondence to God's holy will. By his stress on the necessity of a forgiving spirit, he insists that repentance go beyond sorrow for sin and issue in a radical reorientation of personality. He repeatedly asserts that man cannot be forgiven if he will not forgive (Matt. 6:14; Mark 11:25; Luke 11:4; 17:3). The parable of the unmerciful servant ends on a disquieting note as the unforgiving servant is delivered over to torture: "So also my heavenly Father will do to every one of you, if you do not forgive your brother from your heart" (Matt. 18:23-35).

b. Forgiveness in the new age. Jesus also broadens the meaning of repentance. The prophets were aware that the repentance demanded by God lay beyond human powers, and therefore looked forward to the day when God would give his Spirit to men (Jer. 31; Ezek. 18; 37). Jesus announced that the significant time was fulfilled and God's royal rule was at hand. His miracles are signs of the powers of the messianic age at work in him (Mark 3:27; Luke 11:20-22). The parallel passage in Matthew makes the reference to the Spirit explicit: "If it is by the Spirit of God that I cast out demons, then the kingdom of God has come upon you" (Matt. 12:28). Repentance has been broadened to include faith, which is man's response to the manifestation of God's kingly rule. He who responds to the preaching of Jesus: "Repent, and believe in the gospel," lives in the new age, in which the rule of Satan is overcome and the reign of God established. Jesus' teaching concerning forgiveness must be seen in relation to the eschatological kingdom. In the new age the sinner not only is forgiven; he also shares in the life and power of God and is able to forgive others. One of the distinctive elements in the teaching of Jesus is his stress on the forgiveness of the brother. In the new age forgiveness of sin is conditional not only upon repentance and faith, but also upon forgiveness of others. This finds expression in the Lord's Prayer, the parable of the unmerciful servant, and other sayings, and in the example of Jesus in the prayer of forgiveness from the cross (Luke 23:34). It is carried a step further in response to Peter's question about frequency of forgiveness. Peter suggests the rabbinic figure: "As many as seven times?" But Jesus replies: "I do not say to you seven times, but seventy times seven" (Matt. 18:21-22; cf. Luke 17:3).

In the teaching of Jesus the meaning of the word "forgiveness" retains its OT content: the removal of barriers between man and God or man and man. But he relates the term to new and richer contexts—to a broader and deeper conception of repentance, to the fact of the messianic kingdom, and to a new ethics, the ethics of the new age. To do justice to his teaching, the word "forgiveness" must take on a heavier cargo of meaning, as it has done in theology since the Reformation, or new vocabularies must be prepared to express the new content, as was done in the apostolic church. The fact that "forgiveness" does not occur in the parables of the prodigal son (Luke 15) or the Pharisee and the tax collector (Luke 18:10-14) suggests that Jesus himself found the term in its rabbinic meaning too narrow for his purposes.

*c. The centrality of the person of Jesus. However creative Jesus was as teacher of repentance and a new ethics, or as prophet of the new age, his most significant contribution comes through his relation of forgiveness to his own person and mission. Rabbinic theology, with its devotion to Torah and tradition, could probably have made room for the deepened understanding of repentance and ethics, but the preaching of the new age and its attendant interpretation of the OT proved shocking and offensive. Jesus' polemical attitude toward the tradition of the elders was offensive enough, but his interpretation of the OT with himself as the center of it seemed not merely shocking, but blasphemous.

For Jewish theology it was quite clear that God alone could forgive sins, and that he did so through the covenant, with its Torah and cultus. When a paralytic was carried to him, Jesus healed him, asserting that he had authority on earth to forgive sins. In giving a theological diagnosis to what seems primarily a medical problem, Jesus reasserted an interpretation of forgiveness which is prominent in the OT and identified it with his own career. Forgiveness removes the barriers caused by sin and thus opens the way to recovery of wholeness of personality, of health and integrity. Thus Jesus made the claim of authority to forgive, a claim which sounded presumptuous to his pious contemporaries, and backed up his claim with an act of the messianic age which showed before their eyes the restoration of soundness and health.

Another example of Jesus' radical reinterpretation of the OT is his relation to the temple. As the symbol of the abiding presence of God, it had an exalted place in Jewish religion. Jesus dared to put himself above the temple: "I tell you, something greater than the temple is here" (Matt. 12:6). In cleansing the temple Jesus either acted in disregard of law or asserted propietary authority. How he himself understood it is suggested by his quotation of the prophetic statement: "It is written, 'My house shall be called a house of prayer'; but you make it a den of robbers" (Matt. 21:13). At his trial it was charged: "We heard him say, 'I will destroy this temple that is made with hands, and in three days I will build another, not made with hands' " (Mark 14:58). The Fourth Evangelist regarded this as a true saying of Jesus and interprets it as a reference to his death and resurrection (John 2:21).

Another aspect of Jesus' reinterpretation of the OT is his identification of his life and death with the sacrificial cultus. At the Last Supper he interpreted his death as the "blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many for the forgiveness of sins" (Matt. 26: 28). Even if the last phrase is an editorial addition by the evangelist, the words "covenant" and "blood" indicate the use of sacrificial language. His death could be interpreted as the unfortunate result of several accidental factors such as Jewish malice, Pilate's cowardice, the uncertain temper of a festival crowd. It is here understood as an act of God similar to his dealings with Israel at the Exodus, the establishment of a new covenant sealed by a sacrifice offered not by men but by God.

That Jesus understood his work as the act of God is shown also by his words: "Whoever blasphemes against the Holy Spirit never has forgiveness, but is guilty of an eternal sin" (Mark 3:29). The words are his response to the scribes who asserted that his exorcism of demons was a manifestation of Satanic power. The sin is unforgivable, not because it is too shocking or heinous for God to forgive, but because it labels as diabolical the deeds by which God acts in his anointed servant. This is a perilous misuse of theology: in the name of piety to reject the approach of the merciful God. On Jesus' conception of his own nature and work, see also JESUS § F5.

3. The apostolic church. Jesus' interpretation of the OT is the starting point of the religious thought of the early church. The centrality of Jesus is seen in the use of the theology of the name of God with reference to the Messiah. As the summary term for God's self-manifestation to Israel, the word "name" emphasizes that the holy and transcendent God has revealed himself in the covenant. The apostles boldly use this language of Jesus: "There is no other name under heaven given among men by which we must be saved" (Acts 4:12; cf. 2:38; 10:43). He who cannot dwell in temples made by man makes his abode among men in Jesus of Nazareth.

Forgiveness of sins is still spoken of in the language of sacrifice, but the cultus has given way to the offering of Christ. His death is the sacrifice which removes sin: "Through this man forgiveness of sins is proclaimed to you" (Acts 13:38). "We are now justified by his blood" (Rom. 5:9), "whom God put forward as an expiation in his blood" (3:25). We have been ransomed "with the precious blood of Christ" (I Pet. 1:19). The sacrificial cultus is now seen in perspective, not as an end in itself but as a prophetic foreshadowing of the great offering made by God in Jesus Christ.

Repentance and faith remain conditions of forgiveness. They are related to the covenant, the new covenant established by the Messiah. But where Jesus uses the language of forgiveness even though he seems to find it inadequate, the apostolic church coins new vocabulary to expound the meaning of the new covenant. Paul speaks seldom of forgiveness of sins but often of being ἐν χριστῷ. The man of the new age is in Christ through baptism, which unites him to Christ in his death and his resurrection (Rom. 6:3-4). He prefers the verb χαρίζομαι, "to be gracious," perhaps because it stresses the generous and personal character of God's action and avoids the juridical associations of ἀφίημι. "Membership in the body of Christ," the "new man" or "new humanity," "RECONCILIATION," and "JUSTIFICATION" are other metaphors expressing the new state of things issuing from forgiveness of sins.

The Johannine writings similarly seldom use the word "forgiveness" (there is but one occurrence of the word in the Fourth Gospel), although allusions to temple and sacrifice are frequent. The meaning of discipleship is expressed rather by the term "abiding in Christ" or images such as the vine and the branches, which stress the intimacy of the relationship and the complete dependence of disciple upon the Lord.

4. The meaning of forgiveness. Although the NT has a variety of "theologies," it presents basically the same understanding of forgiveness as the OT. It is the covering or removal of sins, transgressions, iniquity, or impiety, thus making reconciliation possible. The richness and range of the OT understanding were narrowed and attenuated in the postexilic and rabbinic developments, where forgiveness was thought of in primarily ethical and juridical terms. But in the teaching of Jesus the horizons broaden again through the prophetic realism of his teaching on sin and repentance, the union of repentance with faith in the Messiah, and the relating of the whole question of forgiveness to the fulfilment of the messianic kingdom. While the term "forgiveness" retains lexically its first-century rabbinic value, it is put in richer contexts, and given new theological referents in its use.

Sin has multiple consequences in human life, involving rebellion against God, guilt, and bondage in sin. Forgiveness of sins has also various aspects, and the NT writers differ in their choice of emphasis. The Synoptic gospels lay most stress on Christ's conflict with the powers holding mankind in thrall. Jesus is the mighty one who despoils Satan's household, liberating the captives, healing the sick, cleansing lepers, restoring sight to the blind, and even giving life to the dead. Forgiveness appears here in the context of wholeness of life; to the paralytic, e.g., it meant recovery of ability to walk, to be fully a human being again. What he experienced through the power working in Jesus will be the eschatological gift of God to all men who accept his reign. This element is also prominent in the Fourth Gospel and the writings of Paul (Rom. 6; Eph. 1:7; Col. 1:14).

Where sin as guilt is stressed, forgiveness appears in the context of atonement or expiation. Here it is seen as release from guilt, deliverance from anxiety and a burdened conscience, and recovery of peace with God. This is the chief thrust of the Letter to the Hebrews, and is found also in the letters of Paul, I Peter, and the Johannine letters. The language of sacrifice is present not only in such expressions as "Lamb of God," "expiation," and "blood," but also less directly in allusions to Christ's death "for us" and "for the ungodly."

Where sin is thought of as rebellion, forgiveness is given the context of reconciliation, and expresses the removal of enmity between man and God. Man's proud and rebellious spirit has turned him away from God, and only through acquiring a new heart and spirit can he find his way back to the source of life. What is impossible for man is possible to God, who offers his Son and sends his Spirit. Forgiveness makes possible the sinner's adoption as son, the renewal of fellowship with the Father, access to the renewing powers of the new age.

Bibliography. W. Eichrodt, Theologie des ATs, III (1935), 81-148; E. B. Redlich, The Forgiveness of Sins (1937); J. Pedersen, Israel, IV (1940), 299-375; V. Taylor, Forgiveness and Reconciliation (1941), pp. 1-28; A. Richardson, An Introduction to the Theology of the NT (1958), pp. 348-50. W. A. QUANBECK

FORK. A translation of:

a) מזלג (I Sam. 2:13-14; KJV "fleshhook"), a three-pronged sacrificial instrument; מזלגה (Exod. 27:3; 38:3; Num. 4:14; I Chr. 28:17; II Chr. 4:16; KJV "fleshhook"), a sacrificial implement belonging to the altar in the tabernacle and to the temple.

b) מזרה (Isa. 30:24; figuratively in Jer. 15:7; KJV "fan"), a pitchfork, probably with six prongs, used in winnowing.

c) Πτύον (Matt. 3:12 = Luke 3:17; KJV "fan"), winnowing fork.

The translation "fork" is used in the KJV of I Sam. 13:21, but the Hebrew of this verse is obscure and has been the subject of various interpretations.

Forks were among the implements belonging to the altar of the tabernacle (Exod. 27:3; 38:3; Num. 4:14); these and other implements were made of bronze by Bezalel (Exod. 38:3; cf. vs. 23). Forks were also used by the priests at Shiloh in taking their portions from the pot in which the sacrifice was boiled (I Sam. 2:13-14). Similar sacrificial implements, to be made of gold, were ordered by David for the proposed Jerusalem temple (I Chr. 28:17). According to II Chr. 4:16, HURAM-ABI made them of burnished bronze. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS.

WINNOWING with a fork (Isa. 30:24) is referred to figuratively in Jer. 15:7; Matt. 3:12 (=Luke 3:17) to suggest the judgment and chastisement of people.

H. F. BECK

*FORM CRITICISM. Form criticism, also known as form history (Formgeschichte), as category criticism (Gattungsgeschichte), and as tradition analysis, is a method of dealing with folk material, whether written down or not, which for some part of its existence was oral tradition. While patches of such material quite often occur within works properly called "literary," this method intrinsically applies to subliterary "small literature," "folk literature."

1. The method in general
2. The method as applied to the Bible
3. Dibelius' "forms"
4. Dibelius and Bultmann

1. The method in general. The fundamental insight underlying this method is the recognition that folk memory—the vehicle of tradition—operates with small units, often no larger than a single couplet of poetry. Delimitation of these irreducible units of primitive tradition is the first task. But it soon becomes apparent, no matter what "folk's" tradition be under scrutiny, that similar units reappear—similar not so much in content as in structure, length, and tendency. In other words, a given folk at a given time is likely to use a limited number of types of unit, into one or another of which by an instinctive mnemonic economy it pours the content of each particular tradition. These several types are the "forms" or "categories" from which form criticism gets its name.

But such unit types grow out of the everyday life of their particular community: funerals, weddings, victories, defeats, worship and its liturgical acts, instruction, missionary propaganda, etc. These and the like are the "seat in life" of each kind of tradition unit. Tradition is never preserved for its own sake with conscious antiquarian intent, but only because some need or interest of the community presses it into service. In such service it stays alive as oral tradition as long as that practical interest remains alive.

The forms not only were the expression of the interests that kept specific traditions alive but also are the best available key for isolating and defining the specific interest in a given case. For many examples of a single form may be studied side by side until they disclose the relatively pure form among less pure variants, hybrid forms, and sometimes pseudo forms (epigonic imitations of the once living forms). That is to say, there is a kind of literary history here. Not, of course, in the sense of author-fathered literature, for the irrecoverable "author" of a specific tradition performed his function precisely by effacing himself and acting only as spokesman of the group in pouring their material into a living mold—one of the group-created, familiar, life-related "forms." But the forms themselves, apart from their content, have a history which in broad outline can be discerned—a preliterary literary history. This is the justification for speaking of "form history."

2. The method as applied to the Bible. Up to this point the Bible has been intentionally unmentioned. Insofar as the Bible contains tradition that once was oral (e.g., Proverbs, Genesis, the Synoptics, James), it invites treatment by this method; indeed, the name of the method was evolved within the biblical wing of its wide field—but only after it had been practiced nearly a century in secular folklore (a name which also was invented long after [1846] a new science had begun to study it). Jakob and Wilhelm Grimm were the scientific pioneers (from ca. 1812 onward). They already recognized and defined the differences between folk tale, myth, saga, and legend; they have had a host of successors in many lands. The method could and should be applied to many other fields—e.g., nursery rhymes, political jingles, and college cheers.

The scholar who most fertilely applied form criticism to the Bible was Hermann Gunkel (1862-1932; see BIBLICAL CRITICISM). He acknowledges a great debt to the genius of Herder and recognizes predecessors in Wellhausen and Norden, but it was Gunkel himself who conceived and named almost all the technical concepts which in English are better known through the works of his NT pupils. His essay on "Grundprobleme der israelitischen Literaturgeschichte" in Deutsche Literaturzeitung, XXVII (1906), cols. 1797-1800, 1861-66 (also in his Reden und Aufsätze, 1913), is a veritable mine in this respect.

After the wide acceptance of the two-source theory (ca. 1890) the literary investigation of the Synoptics was at a stalemate (see SYNOPTIC PROBLEM). The real problem was oral tradition. But how could one deal intellectually in any valid way with the oral tradition lying behind the accepted sources? A remarkably unanimous answer was proposed by three nearly independent and almost simultaneous works in the years 1919-21: Apply the folkloristic methods already so fruitfully used by Gunkel on the OT to the Synoptic tradition. Karl Ludwig Schmidt, developing then unpublished insights of his teacher, Martin Dibelius, showed (Rahmen der Geschichte Jesu, 1919) how casual and arbitrary the order of pericopes is in Mark, the oldest connected narrative source. A few months earlier in the same year Dibelius had published Die Formgeschichte des Evangeliums, giving the method its permanent name. In this small programmatic brochure Dibelius dealt only with such tradition units (pericopes) as seemed to him to fall particularly clearly into his five "forms": paradigm, Novelle, legend, parenesis, and myth.

3. Dibelius' "forms." Of these the paradigm turned out to be the most important—those concise, self-contained, and edifying (not "worldly") stories concentrated about a striking saying or deed of Jesus. The motive power which kept them alive and bore them along in tradition, he believed, was their continued use in Christian preaching. It is in stories of this form that we must seek for our surest information about Jesus of Nazareth. Next in importance are the exhortatory words preserved in the form he called parenesis; these owe their survival to the need of the Christian community for words of practical guidance in personal ethics and community self-discipline. But here tradition was so sensitive to the current need of the community that there is no guarantee that all the parenetic tradition goes back to Jesus himself. The novelle, typically relating some wonder and offering details that satisfy "worldly" curiosity, is much more Hellenistic; and while some examples may contain historical reminiscence, they also contain floating stories transferred to Jesus (e.g., the Gerasene demoniac [Mark 5 and parallels]). The essence of legend (e.g., the twelve-year-old Jesus in the temple [Luke 2]) is not its unhistoricity (it can contain sound history), but its tendency to cast its religious hero into a rather stereotyped mold of the man of piety, whether the historical person fitted that mold or not. Even myth need not be devoid of history, but its interest is never in history but in the theological idea which it clothes with narrative form.

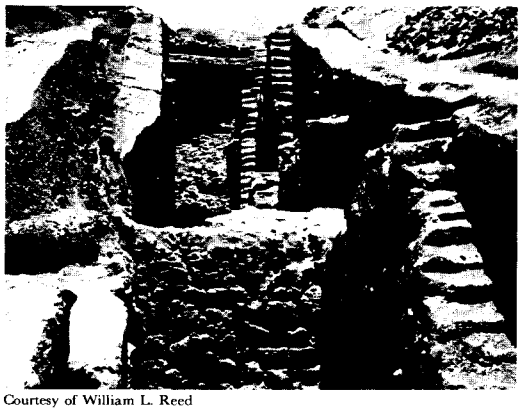
4. Dibelius and Bultmann. The most ambitious and controversial of the three works mentioned is Rudolf Bultmann's Geschichte der synoptischen Tradition (1921), which systematically sorts the entire material of all the Synoptics into a many-branched classification whose classes often overlap. Two of Bultmann's categories, apothegm and wonder tale, are closely analogous to Dibelius' paradigm and novelle, and the two very largely agree in assigning the passages selected by Dibelius to corresponding categories. But Bultmann is particularly interested in distinguishing between Palestinian and Hellenistic tradition, recognizing that only within the former can probable historical information about Jesus be found. The fact, however, that Bultmann declines on principle to treat "legend" and "historical narrative" separately (because they are so closely related and their mutual boundaries so little marked) leads many to regard Bultmann as almost totally skeptical about our present ability to know the historical Jesus. This is not an adequate impression. His Jesus and the Word and NT Theology indicate that he is willing to find more of historical fact within legendary material than was indicated in the 1921 book.



Whoever takes form criticism seriously finds that he can still write and teach on "deeds and words of Jesus" but not on "life and teaching of Jesus," for the latter would demand a knowledge of connection and development which had already been lost before Mark was ever written. In the eyes of the form critics and their disciples, those who continue to write "Lives" of Jesus are only adding to the already crowded shelf of the "Jesus novel." K. GROBEL

FORNICATION [זנונים, זנות; πορνεία; etc.]. The practice of sexual immorality and harlotry; hence a symbol for idolatry. In the OT it is equivalent to "playing the harlot" (Gen. 38:24; Deut. 22:21; etc.; see PROSTITUTION). In the NT the words for "fornication," "to practice fornication," etc., refer to every kind of sexual intercourse outside marriage.

See also ADULTERY. O. J. BAAB

FORT. KJV translation of words which the RSV translates "siegework," "siege wall," "fortress," "stronghold," "hill/high fortifications." See FORTRESS; FORTIFICATION; WAR, METHODS OF.

FORTIFICATION. The erection of artificial defense works around a city or camp. These at first merely improve the natural strength of the location, but become more complex in response to improved siege methods. The basic fortification is an encircling wall or walls, strengthened by towers and defended externally by a dry moat or a beaten-earth rampart.

Courtesy of William L. Reed

20. Fortifications of ancient Jericho on the W side of the city, as viewed from the W

Potential weak spots, such as gateways, pose special problems, as does the frequent necessity of bringing in a water supply from outside the city. Government buildings, situated on the highest part of the site, were usually guarded by secondary, inner defenses.

See also CITY; WALL; GATE; TOWER; WATER WORKS; WEAPONS AND IMPLEMENTS OF WAR; WAR, METHODS OF. Fig. FOR 20. L. E. TOOMBS

FORTRESS [מבצר, מצורה, משגב, מעוז, בירה, בירניה]. Alternately: STRONGHOLD; CITADEL; PALACE; DEFENSE; CASTLE; FORT; FORCE. A fortified city, a fortified place, a secure height or refuge, a stronghold, a citadel. In Pss. 59:9, 16-17; 62:2; 94:22 ("stronghold"); Isa. 33:16 (משגב; KJV "defense"), the fortress is symbolic of God as a protection and refuge. For the fortified city, see CITY § 2*b*.

The phrase "god of fortresses" (אלה מעזים) in Dan. 11:38 is ambiguous. The common explanation is that it means the Roman god Jupiter Capitolinus, for whom Antiochus IV promised to build a magnificent temple in Antioch (Livy XLI.20). Possibly, however, in the context of Dan. 11:36-39 it refers satirically to Antiochus himself, whose assumed title, "Epiphanes," means "god manifest," and whose rapid military successes made him a dread enemy to any besieged fortress (Dan. 11:24, 31, 39; I Macc. 1:19, 33; Jos. Antiq. XII.viii.3-4; ix.1). J. A. SANDERS

FORTUNATUS fôr'chə nā'təs [Φορτουνᾶτος; Lat. Fortunatus; found in papyri and inscriptions in both Greek and Latin forms]. A prominent member of the earliest Christian church at Corinth, mentioned in I Cor. 16:17 (in some MSS 16:15) as being with Paul in Ephesus when he wrote this letter; STEPHANAS and ACHAICUS were other Corinthians with him. The subscription to I Corinthians in the Textus Receptus names these three men as the bearers of the letter to Corinth; it is also conceivable that they brought to Paul the letter mentioned in I Cor. 5:9. The Fortunatus named in I Clem. 65:1 could hardly be identical with the one in Corinth, not only because of the lapse of five or six decades between the two works, but also since the Fortunatus of I Clement was from Rome, where this name was very common. F. W. GINGRICH

FORTUNE. See DESTINY.

FORTY. See NUMBER.

FORUM [φόρον, from Lat. forum]. The open place or market of a town, or the settlement itself.

FORUM OF APPIUS ăp'ĭ əs [τὸ Ἀππίου Φόρον] (Acts 28:15). A station on the Appian Way through which Paul passed as he was going to Rome.

The Forum of Appius was forty-three miles from Rome. Horace (Satires I.v.3-6) says that travelers covered the distance in one day, although on a journey thither from Rome he himself "lazily" preferred to take two days. The Forum of Appius was also at the head of a canal which ran through the Pontine Marshes to Feronia, a canal on which there was travel by boat. Horace had no high opinion of the Forum of Appius and described it as "crammed with boatmen and stingy tavern keepers." The Roman milestone at the Forum of Appius was marked "XLIII," and not far away was a carved stone of the Emperor Nerva with the words ad Forum Appi (Corpus Inscriptionum Latinarum X.6824-25).

Bibliography. C. Hülsen, "Appi Forum," Pauly-Wissowa, vol. II (1896), col. 242. J. FINEGAN

FOUNDATION. The translation of a number of words in the Bible. In the OT various forms derived from the stem יסד are translated "foundation" or "foundations" and used both literally and metaphorically. The foundation of Solomon's temple was of costly stones (I Kings 7:10). In Ezekiel's temple the foundations of the side chambers measured a reed of six cubits (Ezek. 41:8). From other stems are שתות (Ps. 11:3, a figurative reference); אשיות (Jer. 50:15), "foundations" (i.e., of Babylon) in the KJV, "bulwarks" in the RSV; and Aramaic אשין (Ezra 4:12, of Jerusalem; 5:16, of the temple; 6:3 KJV [RSV "burnt offerings," from a different root]). אמות (Isa. 6:4) is "foundations" in the RSV, "posts" in the KJV. In the NT both θεμέλιος and καταβολή are used extensively for both literal and metaphorical "foundation."

Courtesy of the American Schools of Oriental Research

21. Excavations at Tell Beit Mirsim, showing hall of a house (b) before and (a) after removal of foundations in June and July, 1930

Laying the foundation of a city or a temple was an elaborate ceremony in the ancient Middle East. At times it was accompanied by human sacrifice (Josh. 6:26; I Kings 16:34). Inscribed cylinders were placed in some Babylonian foundations. In excavations frequently remains of foundations show ground plans where the superstructure has been destroyed. Fig. FOU 21.

See also ARCHITECTURE; HOUSE; POST.

O. R. SELLERS

FOUNDATION, GATE OF THE [שער היסוד]. A gate in Jerusalem, possibly leading from the king's palace to the temple, mentioned in the narrative of the murder of Athaliah (II Chr. 23:5). The parallel passage (II Kings 11:6), the original Hebrew of which is probably corrupt, reads instead: "the gate SUR" or "gate of Sur" (שער סור).

See also ATHALIAH; JEHOASH; TEMPLE, JERUSALEM.

G. A. BARROIS

FOUNTAIN. A spring of water flowing from an opening in a hillside or valley; to be distinguished from a WELL or CISTERN. The limestone rock of Palestine is conducive to the formation of fountains, which are numerous. Fountains are also mentioned in the OT in a figurative sense in referring to the Lord or to wisdom as the source of life (see below).

In Hebrew a number of words are used to designate fountains which are rendered in English as "fountain" and "spring" without distinction between the two. Among the Hebrew words most commonly used are: עין (I Sam. 29:1), מעינת (Gen. 7:11), and מקור (Prov. 5:18). The following are used less frequently: בור (Jer. 6:7; RSV "well"; KJV "fountain"), מבוע (Eccl. 12:6), אשדת (Deut. 4:49; RSV "slopes"; KJV "springs"), גל (Song of S. 4:12; RSV "garden" with some MSS and most versions; KJV "spring" with the MT), גלת (Josh. 15:19), מים חיים (Gen. 26:19; "springing water"), מוצא (II Kings 2:21), מעינים (Ps. 104:10), and תהמת (Deut. 8:7).

In the NT, where fountains or springs are mentioned infrequently, the Greek word is πηγή (II Pet. 2:17; Rev. 7:17; "springs").

The land of Canaan was to the ancient Israelite "a good land, a land of brooks of water, of fountains [עינת] and springs [תהמת], flowing forth in valleys and hills" (Deut. 8:7).

Although considerable skill was developed in conserving water in pools and cisterns, fountains were important as a source of water supply, and their presence often determined the location of a village. This importance is indicated by the use of the prefix "En" (fountain) in a number of place names (see EN-DOR; EN-EGLAIM; EN-GANNIM; EN-GEDI; EN-RIMMON; EN-ROGEL; EN-SHEMESH; EN-TAPPUAH). One of the gates in the city wall of Jerusalem was called the Fountain Gate, probably because it was used by persons bringing water from En-rogel (Neh. 2:14; 3:15; 12:37). Among the famous springs mentioned in the OT were the one in the city of Nahor where Abraham's servant met Rebekah (Gen. 24:16), the one at Harod where Gideon encamped (Judg. 7:1), and the one near Jericho which was purified by Elisha (II Kings 2:21).

Primitive peoples believed that springs were inhabited by spirits. To the Hebrew patriarchs springs were not only important sources of water but also places of theophany (Gen. 16:7; 24:42). In later times fountains were mentioned as symbols of the Lord's power to give life and refreshment. The Lord is referred to as Israel's fountain (Ps. 68:26—H 68:27), and reverence for the Lord is spoken of as a fountain of life (Prov. 14:27). The Lord is also called the fountain of living water (Jer. 17:13), and the teaching of the wise man is described as a fountain of life (Prov. 13:14).

Among the fountains which are still sources of water for modern biblical villages may be mentioned the ones at Solomon's pools S of Bethlehem, in the Kidron Valley at Jerusalem, at Tell es-Sultan near Jericho, and the Virgin's Fountain in Nazareth. Thermal springs are located near the Sea of Galilee and E of the Dead Sea. Their warm, sulphurous waters are thought to have healing properties, and many persons suffering from various forms of rheumatism bathe in the springs (cf. Gen. 36:24: הימם במדבר, "hot springs in the wilderness").

W. L. REED

FOUNTAIN GATE [שער העין]; KJV GATE OF THE FOUNTAIN. A city gate in the SE section of Jerusalem, restored by Nehemiah (Neh. 2:14; 3:15; 12:37). Perhaps identical with the "gate between the two walls" (II Kings 25:4; Jer. 39:4; 52:7). See map under NEHEMIAH. See also JERUSALEM § 7*b*.

G. A. BARROIS

FOWL [ברברים, see FAUNA § C6*b;* LXX ὀρνίθων ἐκλεκτῶν, choice birds; for עוף (Aram. עוף), עוט, צפור (Aram. צפר), ὄρνεον, πετεινόν, see BIRD; BIRD OF PREY]. Any feathered vertebrate animal; usually in modern use restricted to domestic poultry.

It is agreed that the domestic fowl comes from the Indian jungle fowl (Gallus gallus gallus), but the time of its introduction into Western Asia is debatable. The NT (Matt. 23:37; 26:34; etc.) and the Mishna (e.g., Shab. 24.3) indicate that domestic fowl were well known to the Jews by the opening of the Christian era, but it is uncertain when they first came into Israel's life. The fact that the Mishnaic terms for "cock" (תרנגול; cf. Akkadian ṭarlugallu) and "goose" (אווז) are not in the OT, suggests that these birds were unknown to the Hebrews at least in the days of the monarchy. We must note, however: (a) a Hebrew seal, depicting a fighting cock and thought to date ca. 600 B.C., has been found at Tell en-Naṣbeh (Fig. JAA 1); (b) two potsherds, possibly as early as 600 B.C., with fowl incised on them, were unearthed at el-Jib (Gibeon) in 1956-57; (c) two cylinder seals from the Neo-Babylonian period have cocks on them.

The Greek word for "cock" (ἀλέκτωρ), appearing as a proper name in Homer Odyssey IV.10, is used as a common noun in the fifth century B.C. by Pindar (Olym. XII.14) and by Aristophanes (Birds 483-85); the latter reference, in which the cock is termed the "Persian bird," points to a connection between the cock and Persia, which suggests that Persia was the source from which the Greeks derived this bird. The Persians, or the somewhat earlier Medes, may in turn have obtained it from India.

In view of the above considerations, it is unlikely that domestic fowl were on Solomon's table; if any birds appeared there, they were probably game. The "fowls" (צפרים) prepared for Nehemiah (Neh. 5:18) may have been game, pigeons, or domestic fowl.

W. S. MCCULLOUGH

FOWLER [יקוש] (Pss. 91:3; 124:7; Prov. 6:5; Jer 5:26; Hos. 9:8). One who traps birds by sling, bait, lure, or snare for sport or for food. The verb is always metaphorical in the Bible. The snare is wickedness, evil, or idolatry (Pss. 91:3; 124:7; 141:9; Jer. 5:26-27). Perhaps decoy birds were tied in the traps

Courtesy of the Service des Antiquités, Cairo

22. Birds being caught in a net cage by a fowler; from a tomb of Ka-gemni at Saqqarah; beginning of the Sixth Dynasty (ca. 2350-2200 B.C.)

(Ecclus. 11:32). False prophets are likened to fowlers (Hos. 9:8), yet God snares the wicked (Job 18:9-10; Hos. 7:12). Jesus also uses the metaphor of the snare (Luke 21:35). Business is a snare (Prov. 6:5). Besides the various kinds of nets the fowler also used throwing sticks and sling stones (Judg. 20:16).

See also BIRDS. Fig. FOW 22. C. U. WOLF

FOX [שועל (JACKAL in Ps. 63:10—H 63:12; Lam. 5:18), cf. Akkad. šellebu, šēlabu; Arab. tha'lab; Syr. ta'lā; ἀλώπηξ]. Any of certain widely distributed carnivorous mammals of the genus Vulpes, of the family Canidae, smaller than the wolves, having a long, bushy tail, and noted for speed, cunning, and resource. The fox is normally a solitary animal, mostly nocturnal; it feeds upon smaller animals, as well as insects and fruit. We do not know whether the two varieties of fox which Tristram found in Palestine in the nineteenth century (NHB 85-88) existed in the biblical period. See FAUNA § A2*cii*.

The fox usually excavates its own burrow (cf. Matt. 8:20; Luke 9:58). Its proverbial slyness explains Jesus' allusion to Herod Antipas in Luke 13:32, though in Jewish usage "fox" may also suggest insignificance. The latter meaning may lie behind Tobiah's reference to Nehemiah's wall as being so flimsy as to break under the tread of even a fox (Neh. 4:3—H 3:35). The other OT references to foxes may, in fact, be to jackals, for only the latter hunt in packs, and, unlike the fox, they tend to be scavengers and therefore might be represented as prowling over ruins (Judg. 15:4-5; Ps. 63:10—H 63:11; Song of S. 2:15; Lam. 5:18; Ezek. 13:4). In Ezek. 13:4 "foxes" serves as an appropriate term for false prophets; the latter, amid Israel's misfortunes, seek only their own interest. "Foxes" and "little foxes" in Song of S. 2:15 are used symbolically, but the precise meaning of this verse depends upon the interpretation given to Song of Songs as a whole. W. S. McCULLOUGH

FRACTURE [שבר] (Lev. 24:20); KJV BREACH. The act of breaking a bone or cartilage or the result of such a break (cf. Lev. 21:19). The "breach" of Gen. 38:29 refers to perineal rupture or laceration. R. K. HARRISON FRAGRANCE. See ODOR; PERFUME.

FRAME. 1. מוט (KJV "bar"), a receptacle for carrying the lamps and utensils of the tabernacle (Num. 4:10, 12).

2. מסגרת (lit., "enclosure"; KJV "border"). This word has two uses:

a) A brace for the legs of the table of the presence (Exod. 25:25, 27; 37:12, 14; see TABLE; TABERNACLE). Ca. three inches wide, it ran around the legs about halfway down, judging from the picture on the Arch of Titus. The rings for the carrying poles were in the legs near this frame.

b) A side panel (KJV "border") of the stands for the lavers in the temple (I Kings 7:28-36; II Kings 16:17; see LAVER). See also 4 below.

3. קרש (KJV "board"), a section of the skeletal structure of the TABERNACLE, over which the curtains were spread (Exod. 26:15-29; 35:11; 36:30-34; 37:12, 14; 39:33; 40:18; Num. 3:36; 4:31). The earlier view that these frames were solid planks raised insuperable difficulties. Instead, they were formed of two uprights of light wood, joined at the top, middle, and base by crossbars. Two legs were set in silver sockets on the ground. Each frame was 10 cubits high, 1½ cubits wide, and of no specified thickness. Figs. FRA 23; TAB 1.

Reproduced from McNeile, Book of Exodus, by permission of the publishers, Methuen & Co. Ltd.

23. The tabernacle: (1) two kerashim (beams) with bars, rings, and bases; (2) plan of the court of the dwelling

4. שלב (I Kings 7:28-29; KJV "ledge"), a horizontal brace of the stands for the lavers of the temple. See LAVER. See also 2 above.

5. שקף (I Kings 6:4; 7:4-5), שחיף (Ezek. 41:16), the casing of windows and doors. See WINDOW; TEMPLE, JERUSALEM.

6. The human form. Three words have this meaning:

a) יצר (Ps. 103:14).

b) עצם ("bone, substance"; Ps. 139:15; KJV "substance").

c) ערך ("order, symmetry"; Job 41:12—H 41:4; KJV "proportion").

7. A verb meaning "to plan or devise." צמד ("combine, join"; Ps. 50:19) is so translated, as is יצר ("form, fashion"; Ps. 94:20; Jer. 18:11 KJV [RSV "shape"]); and in the KJV, תן ("give, permit"; Judg. 12:6, which refers to framing the lips to make a certain sound; Hos. 5:4; cf. RSV in both these instances).

Bibliography. A. H. McNeile, Exodus, WC (1908), pp. lxxiii-lxxvi; S. R. Driver, Exodus, Cambridge Bible (1911), pp. 272 ff; J. A. Montgomery and H. S. Gehman, Kings, ICC (1951), pp. 175-77. S. V. FAWCETT

FRANKINCENSE [לבנה (Exod. 30:34; Lev. 2:1-2, 15-16; etc.; I Chr. 9:29; KJV alternately INCENSE—e.g., Isa. 43:23; 60:6; Jer. 6:20); λίβανος]. A fragrant gum resin consisting of small, white chunks and beads which are easily ground into a powder; this powder emits a balsamlike odor when burned.

Frankincense, technically called libanum (Medieval Latin, from the Arabic al-luban), is yielded in the form of a milky exudation by trees belonging to certain species of the genus Boswellia (for an account of the process by which the gum was obtained in his time, see Pliny Nat. Hist. 12.14 ff).The gum resin was imported into Palestine from Arabia, where it was probably produced in the central district of Hadramaut (Isa. 60:6; Jer. 6:20). The Arabic and Hebrew names were suggested by the fact that the gum resin is white.

According to the Levitical regulations frankincense was one of the major ingredients of the INCENSE which was holy unto the Lord (Exod. 30:34-38). The use of this incense for purposes other than those specified in the priestly legislation was forbidden. Incense compounded according to any other recipe could neither be offered to deity nor displayed in the holy place (vs. 9).

Frankincense was set before the holy of holies with the BREAD OF THE PRESENCE (Lev. 24:7); Josephus suggests that two golden cups filled with frankincense were set on top of the rows of holy bread (Antiq. III.vi.6). Frankincense and oil were added to the cereal offerings (Lev. 2:1-2, 14-16; 6:14-18), and the frankincense was subsequently burned (cf. Isa. 43:23; 66:3; Jer. 17:26; 41:5). The addition of frankincense to a sin offering (Lev. 5:11), or to a cereal offering of jealousy (Num. 5:15), was forbidden.

Stores of frankincense were kept in the Jerusalem temple (I Chr. 9:29; Neh. 13:5, 9). Voluntary offerings of it are mentioned (Jer. 17:26). It was one of the gifts offered to the infant Jesus by the Wise Men (Matt. 2:11). The only other NT use of the word occurs in Rev. 18:13 (in both instances the Greek term is simply a transliteration from the Hebrew).

See also SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS; INCENSE ALTAR; WORSHIP IN THE OT.

Bibliography. G. W. Van Beek, "Frankincense and Myrrh," BA, XXIII (1960), 70-94. H. F. BECK

FREEDMEN, SYNAGOGUE OF THE [συναγωγή τών Λιβερτίνων]; KJV SYNAGOGUE OF THE LIBERTINES. One of a number of synagogues at Jerusalem, conducted for Jews who spoke Greek rather than Aramaic, the latter being the native language of Palestinian Jews. This synagogue is mentioned in the NT only at Acts 6:9. The same passage refers to synagogues of the Cyrenians, Alexandrians, Cilicians, and Asiatics, but it is not certain that five separate groups are meant. E.g., "Cyrenians and Alexandrians" might be one congregation; or "those from Cilicia and Asia" might describe the Freedmen themselves. See ALEXANDRIA; CYRENE.

Some have conjectured, on the basis of the Armenian Version, that for Λιβερτίνων we should read Λιβυστίνων, "of the Libyans," which would match "of the Cyrenians." Assuming the correctness of the standard text, these Freedmen were former captives at Rome, or else children of former captives, who had been set free and had returned to Jerusalem. The Roman historian Tacitus indicates that freed Jewish captives were a special problem for the government (Ann. II.85).

Evidently the young church found it necessary to debate its faith with these Greek-speaking people. STEPHEN was assigned the task, which he performed with "wisdom" and "the Spirit" (Acts 6:10). He was one of seven men who had been ordained to minister particularly to Greek-speaking converts (vss. 1-6). Most of the other six bore Greek names, and it is likely that all seven were, like the Freedmen, immigrants from other lands. See SEVEN, THE.

PIERSON PARKER

FREEDOM. See LIBERTY.

FREEWILL OFFERING. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS § A1*e*.

FRIEND, FRIENDSHIP. Usually the understanding that binds one man to another or (less commonly in the Bible) one woman to another (Judg. 11:37-38; Ps. 45:15—H 45:14), as distinct from love and from the affection uniting members of a family.

The word "friend" renders Hebrew nouns derived from the roots רעה II and אהב. One of these nouns, rēa', serves a double purpose, frequently having the neutral meaning "another person," "neighbor," as in: "You shall love your neighbor as yourself" (Lev. 19:18). As "friend" the word suggests close companionship; after "your brother . . . , or your son, or your daughter, or the wife of your bosom," Deut. 13:6—H 13:7 next lists "your friend who is as your own soul." A proverb even says: "There is a friend who sticks closer than a brother" (Prov. 18:24). A high point in the ethics of wisdom is Koheleth's endorsement of friendship (Eccl. 4:9-12; see ECCLESIASTES § 7*b*). Notable examples of friendship in the Bible are the love between David and Jonathan (I Sam. 18:1; II Sam. 1:23) and the devotion of Barzillai to David (II Sam. 19:31-39—H 19:32-40). Though awkward, Job's friends were well-meaning (Job 2:11; 19:21; cf. 6:14-23) and stayed with him in time of trouble, thus controverting occasional cynical reservations as to friendship in proverbial wisdom (Prov. 14:20; 19:4, 7; Ecclus. 9:10). In Isa. 41:8 God refers to Abraham as "my friend." Such expressions of God's friendship for his people as those in Isa. 5:1-7; Jer. 12:7 facilitated the allegorical interpretation of the SONG OF SONGS. S. H. BLANK

FRIEND OF THE KING. A high court officer, intimate counselor, and companion of kings. Abimelech had such an officer in Ahuzzath (Gen. 26:26). Zabud and Hushai are so called in I Kings 4:5; I Chr. 27:33. In Maccabean times a special privileged class was composed of these persons (I Macc. 2:18; 3:38; 6:10; 10:65).

See also FRIEND. C. U. WOLF

FRINGE [κράσπεδον (Matt. 9:20; 14:36; 23:5; Mark 6:56; Luke 8:44; KJV HEM, BORDER); KJV ציצת (Num. 15:38-39; see TASSEL), גדל (Deut. 22:12; see TASSEL; WREATH]. A cord or thread which ended in a kind of tassel, sewn on at the four corners of the outer garment. The oldest of the passages dealing with fringes is that of Deut. 22:12: "You shall make yourself tassels on the four corners of your cloak with which you cover yourself." The cloak (כסות) was the square outer garment which was also used as a cover at night. According to the Numbers prescription, the cord was to be blue. Later on, white was permitted, probably because of the difficulty and costliness of the dye required. The threads had to be spun, and the fringes could not be made from the overhanging threads of the warp and woof of the garment itself. They could, however, be made from a sewn tuft. Talmudic practice required that they be made of eight white wool threads twisted a specified number of times with five double knots tied at prescribed intervals. A minimum length was prescribed, but not a maximum.

Both Numbers and Deuteronomy indicate that the tassels were to be attached to the outer garment, where they were quite conspicuous and would thus serve their prescribed purpose most effectively. Later, when the Jews were forced out of their land and were dispersed in foreign lands, such outward marks became especially noticeable and served to attract undue attention on the part of their persecutors. Hence the custom of wearing the fringes or tassels on a square woolen cloth carried under the outer garment, and from this developed the practice of the prayer shawl (טלית) worn on the head during prayer.

There were three tokens of remembrance prescribed for every Jew: the ציצת ("tassels," "fringes"); the מזוזה, the small cylinder with parchment scroll attached to the doorpost (Deut. 6:9; 11:20); and the טוטפות, arm and head bands or phylacteries (Exod. 13:9, 16; Deut. 6:8; 11:18). The purpose of the fringe or tassel was "to look upon and remember all the commandments of the LORD, to do them, not to follow after your own heart and your own eyes, which you are inclined to go after wantonly" (Num. 15:39). The origin of the wearing of fringes is obscure, but it was doubtless connected with magic or taboo of some kind, which was now sublimated by a high and exalted purpose.

The term "fringe(s)" occurs in the NT in connection with the woman who had an issue of blood and who touched the fringe of Jesus' garment (Matt. 9:20=Luke 8:44), and with those who brought their sick that they might do the same (Matt. 14:36= Mark 6:56). Matt. 23:5 records Jesus' severe condemnation of the scribes and Pharisees who, to be seen by men, made their fringes long. All the references are manifestly to the four fringes worn on the garments of all Jews for purposes noted above.

Figs. AHA 5; ASS 97; HUN 34. Monuments from the Near East illustrate many types of tassels and fringes (ANET 45, 52, 64, 351-54, 436, 441, 460, etc.).

Bibliography. E. Schürer, History of the Jewish People, div. 2, vol. II (1891), pp. 111-12; H. Strack and P. Billerbeck, Kommentar zum NT aus Talmud und Midrash, IV (1928), 276-92; F. J. Stephens, "The Ancient Significance of Sisith," JBL, 50 (1931), pp. 59-70. J. M. MYERS

FROG [צפרדע (Exod. 8:2-13—H 7:27–8:9; Pss. 78: 45; 105:30), cf. Arab. ḍafda', ḍifdi'; Jewish Aram. עורדענא; βάτραχος (Wisd. Sol. 19:10; Rev. 16:13)]. Any of various genera (especially at the genus Rana) of tailless leaping amphibians of the order Ecaudata.

All the references to frog in the OT and the Apoc. are to the frogs of the second plague in the Exodus story. The description in Rev. 16:13 of the three frog-like demons, which come as a result of the sixth angel's pouring out his bowl, doubtless reflects the unclean status of the frog among the Jews (cf. Lev. 11:10, 41); this status may have been further lowered by the traditional association of the frog (or toad) with the Egyptian goddess Heqt, who assisted women in childbirth. W. S. MCCULLOUGH

FRONTLETS [טוטפת, from נטף, to drop, drip?] (Exod. 13:16; Deut. 6:8; 11:18). Objects worn on the forehead between the eyes, just below the hairline, at prayer times. They were doubtless for more than memorial purposes and were regarded as effective against certain kinds of evil. In later times the PHYLACTERIES, which consisted of small cubical cases into which were inserted parchments inscribed with the words of Exod. 13:1-10, 11-16; Deut. 6:4-9; 11:13-21, served the same purpose.

The redemption of the first-born is "as a mark on your hand or frontlets between your eyes" (Exod. 13:16). The injunction to bind the words of God as a sign on the hands and that they should be as frontlets between the eyes was probably intended to be taken literally, since the reference was to the commands of God (cf. Exod. 13:9).

Bibliography. E. Schürer, History of the Jewish People (1891), div. 2, vol. II, pp. 113 ff; A. S. Yehuda and H. Grimme, OLZ, vol. 41 (1938), cols. 148 ff. J. M. MYERS

FROST. See SNOW; PALESTINE, CLIMATE OF.

FRUIT (PRODUCTS) [פרי; καρπός]. The edible pulp which surrounds the seed (or seeds) of many plants and trees, including nuts. פרי appears more than one hundred times in the OT and καρπός more than sixty in the NT, but the majority of these are symbolical rather than specific. The biblical peoples, being so close to the soil throughout their history, used these terms as an integral part of their vocabulary.

The most basic fruits of the ancient economy were, first, the OLIVE, then the FIG and the grape (see VINE), as illustrated by Jotham's parable (Judg. 9:7-15). Other fruits of the Bible include ALMOND; APPLE (more likely apricot or quince); DATES; MELON; mulberries (see MULBERRY TREES); pistachio NUT; POMEGRANATE; and SYCAMORE figs. The MANDRAKE and the carob bean (see HUSKS) were occasionally eaten.

Several Hebrew words in the OT in addition to the general word פרי, perî, specify certain types of fruit products:

a) אשישה ('ašîšâ), "raisin cake" (II Sam. 6:19=I Chr. 16:3; Song of S. 2:5; Isa. 16:7; Hos. 3:1). See VINE.

b) בכורה (bikkûrâ), "first-ripe [June] fig" (Isa. 28:4; Jer. 24:2; Hos. 9:10; Mic. 7:1). See FIG.

c) דבלה (dᵉbhēlâ), "cake of [pressed] figs" (I Sam. 25:18; 30:12; II Kings 20:7=Isa. 38:21; I Chr. 12:40; cf. Ugaritic dblt, 55:28; 56:33). See FIG.

d) צמוק (ṣimmûq), "cluster of raisins" (I Sam. 25: 18; 30:12; II Sam. 16:1; I Chr. 12:40—H 12:41; cf. Ugaritic ṣmqm, 12+97:5, 17; 55:28; 56:34). See VINE.

e) קיץ (qâyiṣ), "summer fruit" (probably the ripe fig and other perishable fruits; II Sam. 16:1-2; Isa. 16:9; Jer. 40:10, 12; 48:32; Amos 8:1-2; cf. Ugaritic qz, 77:2, 24; 1 Aqht:18, 41).

f) תנובה (tᵉnûbhâ), fruit of the fig (also general produce; "good fruit" in Judg. 9:11).

Fruit from a newly planted tree could not be eaten until the fifth year (Lev. 19:23-25). The fourth year's crop was dedicated to the Lord, and any fruit of the first three years was considered forbidden.

See also FLORA § B; FRUIT (SYMBOL).

J. C. TREVER

FRUIT (SYMBOL) [פרי; καρπός; ἡ ὀπωρία (Rev. 18:14)]. Alternately: DESCENDANTS (Acts 2:30); RETURN (Rom. 6:21-22); HARVEST (Rom. 1:13; Jas. 3:18). There are several ways in which the word "fruit" is used symbolically in the Bible:

a) Children are sometimes referred to as the "fruit of the womb" (Gen. 30:2; Ps. 127:3; Isa. 13:18; cf. Luke 1:42), or praise described as the "fruit of the lips" (Isa. 57:18—KJV 57:19; cf. Heb. 13:15).

b) More often "fruit" denotes the rewards meted out by God (Jer. 17:10). The fruit of righteousness is the benefit bestowed for right action (Prov. 12:14; 31: 31; Isa. 3:10; Hos. 10:12; Amos 6:12; John 4:36; Phil. 4:17; Heb. 12:11), while the fruit of wickedness is the judgment it incurs (Prov. 1:31; Jer. 6:19; 21:14; Hos. 10:13; Mic. 7:13).

c) Most frequently "fruit" is the total result that issues from any specific action or disposition. The fruit produced may be evil (Matt. 3:10; 7:15-20; 12: 33; Luke 6:43-44*a;* Rom. 7:5), but is more often good

(Ps. 104:13; Matt. 3:8; 21:43; Rom. 7:4; Eph. 5:9; Phil. 1:11; Jas. 3:17). Paul describes his mission generally in these terms (Rom. 1:13; 15:28; Phil. 1:22; Col. 1:6), and beyond gifts given by the Spirit makes a special place for the "fruit of the Spirit" (Gal. 5: 22). Seed (John 12:24), tree (Rev. 22:2), and vine (John 15:1-16) illustrate how God produces life among men. In like fashion disciples are urged to "bear fruit," καρποφορέω (Mark 4:20; Col. 1:10), and are criticized for being "unfruitful," ἄκαρπος (Mark 4:19; Eph. 5:11; Tit. 3:14; II Pet. 1:8; cf. I Cor. 14:14; Jude 12). I. W. BATDORF

FRYING PAN. KJV translation of מרחשת (RSV PAN), the vessel in which the cereal offering was cooked (Lev. 2:7; 7:9). It is more accurately identified as a kettle for deep-fat frying. See POTTERY.

J. L. KELSO

FUEL [אכלה לאש, food for fire; בער (in Second Isaiah), to burn, consume]. In ancient Israel many different substances were used for burning: wood, vine branches, thornbushes, withered grass, dung, charcoal, chaff. A great variety of wood may be assumed, ranging from logs or faggots (Isa. 44:14-16) to sticks or twigs (I Kings 17:12). According to numerous references, the thorn was a very common fuel. This, as well as other shrubs, gave out a very intense heat, especially when reduced to charcoal. The Hebrews were, no doubt, aware of the advantages of reducing wood to charcoal; and references to the brazier, by means of which the houses of the upper classes were kept warm, indicate its use in this way (Jer. 36:22). Charcoal apparently was also piled up without a container (John 21:9). Chaff and straw were used but burned quickly, while dung burned slowly with low heat and much smoke. H. N. RICHARDSON FULFIL. This term, as well as such closely related terms as "fill" and "fill up," can be understood only in the light of an examination of a rather wide range of biblical words: מלא and of ἀνακεφαλαίοω, πίμπλημι, (ἀνταναπλήρωσις, ἀναπληρόω, πληροφορέω πλήρης, πλήρωμα, τελειόω, (συν-)τελέω, τέλος. For τελειόω and (ἐπι-, συν-)τελέω, and a certain overlap in all these words, see also ORDINATION; PERFECTION. For πλήρωμα, see PLEROMA. But it is to be noted here that πληροφορέω is clearly synonymous with πληρόω in II Tim. 4:5 (cf. Col. 4:17), 17 (cf. Rom. 15:19); possibly also in Luke 1:1 (but see Commentaries here); while "fulfil" is used for τελέω in Luke 22:37 (cf. 18:31: "accomplish"), and for τελειόω in Rev. 10:7; 17:17 (cf. Acts 20:24: "accomplish"; II Tim. 4:7: "finish"; Jas. 2:22: "complete"), and τέλος is rendered "fulfilment" in Luke 22:37.

1. Nontheological uses, literal or metaphorical. The uses in which the words under consideration mean "fill" or "complete" (whether of concrete things or of abstract matters) in a straightforward or "nontheological" sense (whether literal or metaphorical) require little discussion here.

a. In the OT. In the OT the only uses calling for attention under this heading are idiomatic ones, concealed in the Greek and English versions by nonliteral renderings.

The first is "to fill the hand," meaning "to ordain to the priesthood" (e.g., Exod. 28:41; 29:9; "ordain"). That the verb is here used literally, seems to be suggested by the ceremony as described in Exod. 29:24 —a filling of the hands of the ordinand with offerings as part of the ritual. But the phrase "to fill the hand" became so regular a synonym for "ordain" that in Ezek. 43:26 it is applied to an inanimate object, the altar (RSV "consecrate," as though it were קדש); while in Exod. 32:29 there may, it has been suggested, be a grim double entendre: "You have ordained yourselves" (lit., "you have filled your hand") may mean, You have taken weapons in your hands (to slay your renegade brothers, and so "ordain" yourselves to the service of purity of worship).

At any rate, secondly, the same verb is used in the Hebrew, and still, probably, in an ultimately literal sense, in II Kings 9:24, where Jehu "filled his hand with the bow"—i.e., drew the bow to its full extent, or (so RSV) drew it "with his full strength"; and in Zech. 9:13 the metaphor seems to be taken from the same action (lit., "I have trodden Judah for myself"—the regular technical term for stringing a bow was to "tread" it): "I have filled the bow Ephraim"—i.e., "I have bent Judah as my bow; I have made Ephraim its arrow" (so RSV).

b. In the NT. In the NT there are entirely straightforward uses (literal or metaphorical) such as the following (see also PLEROMA): Matt. 13:48 (fill a net with fish); Luke 2:40 (the child Jesus filled with wisdom); Luke 3:5 (fill up a valley so as to level it); John 12:3 (fill the house with fragrance); John 16:6 (grief filling the heart); Acts 5:28 (of the apostles' filling Jerusalem with their teaching). And just as the Spirit of God may be said to fill a person (Acts 6:3; Eph. 5:18), so may also Satan (Acts 5:3— so the best reading) or wickedness (Rom. 1:29). In this same straightforward sense it is perhaps right to interpret the verb used with a secondary accusative, as in Phil. 1:11 ("filled with the fruits of righteousness"); Col. 1:9 ("filled with the knowledge"), though these might mean "brought to maturity in respect of."

2. Theological or ethical uses. Theologically or ethically the most important use is probably in connection with "fulfilling" prophecy, etc. But first, there are also the following:

a) In Matt. 23:32 the religious authorities are ironically bidden to fill up the measure of their fathers—i.e., to come up to their forefathers' standard of wickedness, or, perhaps, to complete the tale of wickedness begun by them. Similarly, in I Thess. 2: 16 the Jews are spoken of as opposing the gospel, "so as always to fill up the measure of their sins" (ἀναπληρῶσαι)—a phrase reminiscent of Gen. 15:16, and implying a fixed amount destined to be achieved before the penalty falls (cf. Rev. 6:11).

