Hosea sees the election of Israel in historical perspective. Israel's special relation with Yahweh did not begin yesterday but has compassed its entire history as a nation. He looks back to the days of the Exodus as the idyllic honeymoon in the marriage of Yahweh with Israel (2:15; 11:1). At that time the leadership in the life of Israel was in the hands of a prophet and not in the hands of a king (12:13). God was Israel's king and husband and father. But from the earliest days of settlement in Palestine the covenant was broken. The worship of the people became corrupted into Baal-worship, and the trust of the people became fixed upon kings and armies and foreign alliances rather than upon God. That which alone has given Israel a purpose in its life has been the uniqueness of its relation with God, and with the destruction of this relation the very basis of its continued existence among the nations has been taken away (8:8). It is clear that, for Hosea, the covenant, while it binds Israel to God, does not bind God to Israel in such a way as to encourage any false confidence or self-righteousness. God's covenant love for Israel is such that in spite of the nation's sin, he cannot lightly give them up (11:8). It breaks his heart to have his covenant partner turn from him. But the relation is a personal one, which can be maintained only when there is faithfulness in both partners.

Hosea interprets God's judgment upon sin and unfaithfulness, not as arbitrary acts, but as consequences which issue from the nature of sin itself. The disruption of the covenant relation results in a vanishing from the life of the nation of all knowledge of God and all faithful love. The priests, whose task it is to teach the nation to know God, are themselves without the knowledge which they are to communicate (4:4-6). This blindness and ignorance and incapacity for faithful love plunge the whole of society into disorder. Without knowledge of God, men are without the kind of understanding which makes possible healthful relations with one another, and all the institutions of society are corrupted (4:4). Hosea used the likeness of sowing and reaping to represent the causal relationship between human conduct and national consequences. They who sow the wind must reap the whirlwind (8:7; cf. 10:13). The incurring of guilt brings death (13:1). But he knows that it is equally true that the sowing of righteousness will bring a harvest of salvation (10:12).

Perhaps it was in his own marriage situation that Hosea came to see most clearly the fearful dilemma of man's evil. Sin, by its disruption of the personal relation on which life depends, brings blindness, callousness, and despair, which lead to yet more violent sin. The human being, once started on this disastrous downhill course, is helpless to stop the tragic cumulative process. There must be an intervention from beyond. Someone, with love for the sinner in spite of the sin, must break in upon the deadly process and by sheer grace create for the prisoner of sin and death the possibility of a new beginning. This was Hosea's final word concerning God. Israel by her sin might bring herself to the very verge of slavery and self-destruction, but God would not give her up. When she had tasted the bitterness of judgment, he would intervene and open the way for restoration of the covenant and a new future.

Bibliography. Commentaries: A. Wünsche, Der Prophet Hosea übersetzt und erklärt, mit Benutzung der Targumim der jüdischen Ausleger Raschi, Aben Ezra und David Kimchi (1868). C. F. Keil, Commentary on the Twelve Minor Prophets (German, 1866; English trans., 1880). W. Nowack, Der Prophet Hosea erklärt (1880). F. Hitzig, Die zwölf kleinen Propheten (4th ed. by H. Steiner; 1881). T. K. Cheyne, Hosea with Notes and Introduction, Cambridge Bible (1884). C. von Orelli, The Twelve Minor Prophets (German, 1888; trans. J. S. Banks, 1893). J. J. P. Valeton, Jr., Amos en Hosea (1894; German ed., 1898). J. Wellhausen, Die kleinen Propheten, übersetzt und erklärt (3rd ed., 1898). K. Marti, Dodekpropheton, KHC (1903). R. F. Horton, The Minor Prophets, Hosea-Micah, New Century Bible (1904). B. Duhm, Die zwölf Propheten (1910). W. R. Harper, Amos and Hosea, ICC (1910). J. M. P. Smith, Amos, Hosea and Micah (1914). W. Nowack, Die kleinen Propheten übersetzt und erklärt (later ed., 1922). H. Gressmann, Die Schriften des AT, pt. II (2nd ed., 1931). E. Sellin, Die kleinen Propheten, KAT (1932). G. A. Smith, The Book of the Twelve Prophets, vol. I (rev. ed., 1940). G. Brillet, Amos et Hosée (1946). A. Weiser, "Die kleinen Propheten," AT Deutsch (1949). T. H. Robinson and F. Horst, "Die zwölf kleinen Propheten," HAT (1954). N. H. Snaith, Amos, Hosea and Micah (1956).

Special studies: A. B. Davidson, "The Prophet Hosea," Exp., IX (1879), 241-64. J. Bewer, "The Story of Hosea's Marriage," AJSL, 22 (1906), 120-30. K. Budde, Der Schluss des Buches Hosea, Toy Festschrift (1912), pp. 205-11. W. Baumgartner, Kennen Amos und Hosea eine Heils-Eschatalogie? (1913). A. Heerman, "Ehe und Kinder des Propheten Hosea," ZAW, 40 (1922), 287-312. K. Budde, "Der Abschnitt Hosea 1-3," TSK, 96/97 (1925), 1-89; "Zu Text und Auslegung des Buches Hosea," JBL, 45 (1926), 280-97. F. Prätorius, Die Gedichte des Hosea (1926). K. Budde, JBL, 53 (1934), 118-33; "Hosea 1 and 3," Theologische Blätter, 13 (1934), 337-43. H. S. Nyberg, Studien zum Hoseabuch (1935). T. H. Robinson, "Die Ehe des Hosea," TSK, 106 (1935), 301-13. H. G. May, "An Interpretation of the Names of Hosea's Children," JBL, 55 (1936), 285-91. T. C. Vriezen, Hosea: Profeet en Cultuur (1941). H. W. Robinson, The Hebrew Prophets (1948). A. D. Tushingham, "A Reconsideration of Hosea 1-3," JNES, 12 (1953), 150-59. F. Buck, Die Liebe Gottes beim Propheten Osee (1953). H. H. Rowley, "The Marriage of Hosea," Bulletin of the John Rylands Library, XXXIX (1956), 200-233. G. Östborn, Yahweh and Baal: Studies in the Book of Hosea (1956). F. S. North, "Solution of Hosea's Marital Problems by Critical Analysis," JNES, 16 (1957), 128—. H. H. Wolff, Dodekapropheten (1957—). G. Farr, "The Concept of Grace in the Book of Hosea," ZAW, 29 (1958), 98-106.

On the assumption that only those portions of Hosea are genuine that proclaim doom, see L. W. Batten, "Hosea's Message and Marriage," JBL, 48 (1929), 257-73. R. E. Wolfe, Meet Amos and Hosea (1945), follows Batten's lead. Essentially the same viewpoint is supported by W. F. Stinespring, "Hosea, Prophet of Doom," Crozer Quarterly, 27 (1950), 200-207.

J. D. SMART

HOSEN. KJV for Aramaic פמיש (RSV TUNIC) in Dan. 3:21. "Hosen" is an archaic term for "hose," "leggings."

HOSHAIAH hō shā'yə [הושעיה, Yahu has saved]. 1. One of the princes of Judah who participated in the processional at the time of the dedication of the rebuilt walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:32).

2. The father of Azariah (Jer. 42:1—G 49:1; 43:2) or Jezaniah (42:1 MT), who was a leader among the Jews after the fall of Jerusalem. He seems to have been a Maacathite (40:8). M. NEWMAN

HOSHAMA hŏsh'ə mə [הושמע, contracted from יהושמע, Yahu has heard] (I Chr. 3:18). One of the seven sons of Jehoiachin.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 107n, 185.

HOSHEA hō shē'ə [הושע, may Yahu save]; KJV OSHEA ō— in Num. 13:8, 16.

1. The original name of Joshua the son of Nun, an Ephraimite (Num. 13:8). The name was changed by Moses (vs. 16).

2. One of David's officers set over the Ephraimites; son of Azaziah (I Chr. 27:20).

3. The prophet whose Hebrew name has been commonly Anglicized as Hosea.

4. The last king of Israel (ca. 732-724 B.C.); son of Elah. Murderer and successor of Pekah, Hoshea was taken captive by Shalmaneser V.

The name is probably a shortened form of (a) יושיע and יהו, "Let Yahu save"; or (b) הושעיהו, "Yahu saves." The latter has been found in the Lachish Letters. The name appears as A-ú-si-' in Assyrian inscriptions.

Hoshea became king as the result of a conspiracy, in which he murdered Pekah. Tiglath-pileser claims that he placed Hoshea on the throne. In a sense both statements are correct, for Hoshea could not have become king without the approval of Assyria. He reigned for nine years (II Kings 17:1).

The usual moral judgment is passed on him by the Deuteronomic writer: "He did what was evil in the sight of the LORD." In Hoshea's case, however, the judgment is not absolute, for these words are added: "yet not as the kings of Israel who were before him" (II Kings 17:2). This may very well be a historical reminiscence based on a trustworthy tradition.

Assyria still dominated the scene. Tiglath-pileser III died in 727 and was succeeded by his son Shalmaneser V. Until that year Hoshea continued to pay tribute to Tiglath-pileser. The burden, however, finally became intolerable, and he revolted, probably at Tiglath-pileser's death, before his successor was able to establish himself. The revolt seems to have been widespread and had the promised support of Egypt. The name of the Egyptian king is given as סוא (So; II Kings 17:4). This should probably be vocalized differently and read as "Sewe" (cf. Assyrian Sibe). In the Annals of Sargon for his second year the name appears with the title turtanuu (cf. the tartan of Isa. 20:1)—i.e., "commander-in-chief." It is possible that at this time he was the commander-in-chief and only later became king. Egyptian influence may have been felt in Samaria even prior to this time (cf. Hos. 7:8, 11, 16; 11:5). In 724, Shalmaneser marched against Hoshea, who capitulated and again paid tribute (II Kings 17:3). But Shalmaneser "found treachery" in him, so he took him prisoner and besieged Samaria (vss. 4-5). The siege lasted three years—a fact which indicates something of the strength of its defenses. In the meantime Shalmaneser died and was succeeded by Sargon II (722-721). The latter finally subdued the city, as he claims in the annals for his first year—i.e., 722-721—and frequently elsewhere.

There is confusion in the biblical record in regard to the name of the Assyrian king. II Kings 17:6 says simply: "In the ninth year of Hoshea the king of Assyria captured Samaria." The parallel account in 18:9-10 states that "Shalmaneser king of Assyria came up against Samaria and besieged it and at the end of three years he [MT 'they'] took it." It continues with the indefinite phrase: "Samaria was taken."

The precise figure given by Sargon of 27,290 prisoners carried off contrasts sharply with II Kings 17:18: "[The Lord] removed them [i.e., Israel] out of his sight; none was left but the tribe of Judah only" —a statement which can be true only in a general sense. As a result of Sargon's deportation of the leading citizens, calculated at about one twentieth of the total population of the land, Israel as a kingdom ceased to exist. The captive Israelites were carried off to Assyria and were resettled in "Halah, and on the Habor, the river of Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes" (vs. 6). To take their place, Sargon imported colonists "from Babylon, Cuthah, Avva, Hamath, and Sepharvaim and placed them in the cities of Samaria" (vs. 24). These new colonists brought with them their own cults.

Bibliography. H. G. May, "The Deportation of Israel" and "The Israelites in Exile," BA, VI (1943), 57-60. A. Alt, Kleine Schriften zur Geschichte des Volkes Israel, II (1953), 188-205, 226-34. J. B. Pritchard, ed., ANET (2nd ed., 1955), pp. 284-85. W. F. Albright, "New Light from Egypt on the Chronology and History of Israel and Judah," BASOR, no. 130 (1953), pp. 4-11, especially pp. 8-11; "Further Light on Synchronisms Between Egypt and Asia in the Period 935-685 B.C.," BASOR, no. 141 (1956), pp. 23-27, especially pp. 23-26. M. Noth, Geschichte Israels (3rd ed., 1956), pp. 236 ff. G. E. Wright, Biblical Archaeology (1957), pp. 160-63.

5. One of those who set their seal to the covenant in the time of Nehemiah-Ezra (Neh. 10:23—H 10:24). H. B. MacLean HOSPITALITY [φιλοξενία] (Rom. 12:13; Heb. 13:2; I Clem. 1:2; 10:7; 11:1; 12:1; Herm. Mand. 8:10; cf. I Tim. 3:2; Tit. 1:8; I Pet. 4:9). Entertainment of a stranger (sojourner) as a guest; recognized as a sacred duty throughout the Mediterranean world, and more heartily and stringently kept than many a written law. While the word does not appear in the OT, the custom is evidenced, particularly in the patriarchal stories (Gen. 18:1-8; 19:1-11; 24:14-61; cf. Judg. 19:10-25). In the NT the practice provides the background for many of the details in the life of Jesus and the early Christian community. See also Guest; Sojourner.

1. Among the Hebrews. The main practices stem from nomadic life, when public inns were a rarity and every stranger a potential enemy. Hospitality was discharged more from fear and for protection than from generosity. One might even entertain the deity or his messengers (cf. Gen. 18:1-8; 19:1, 3; Heb. 13:2). Moreover, the host never knew when he himself would be dependent on others. The guest was treated with respect and honor and was provided with provender for his animals, water for his feet, rest, and a sumptuous feast. He enjoyed protection, even if he were an enemy, for three days and thirty-six hours after eating with the host (the time sustained by his food). Hospitality was to the Bedouin what almsgiving was to the later Jews—an expression of righteousness. A traveler entering a city would come to the open place, and there, unless a breach of etiquette occurred, someone would invite him to his home and grant him the customary graces (Gen. 19:1-3; Judg. 19:15-21).

2. Among the Christians. The NT describes Jesus as dependent on hospitality for his daily care and lodging (Matt. 8:20; 9:10; Mark 7:24; 14:3; Luke 7:36; 8:3; 9:52; 10:38; 14:1; 19:5; John 12:2). It is assumed in the sending forth of the apostles (Matt. 10:5-15; Mark 6:7-11; Luke 9:2-5; 10:4-11). And it accounts to a considerable degree for the extensive journeys of the early Christian missionaries (cf. Acts 16:15; 18:27; III John 5-6), and the retention of the "living voice" of the gospel. Christians, in their travels, would seek out Christian brethren, partly for protection but mainly to share fellowship and worship. Churches shared their gospel tradition, the collection (possibly in the form of eucharistic elements; cf. Just. Apol. 1.67), their homes (Acts 16:15; 18:27; Herm. Sim. 8:10; Arist. Apol. 15:7), and provided labor for those desiring to settle in their midst (Did. 12). On hearing of poverty, they contributed to the necessity of the saints (Rom. 15:26-27; II Cor. 9:1-2; cf. Phil. 4:10, 14-18). Hospitality was the chief bond which brought the churches a sense of unity. The Roman church, as the church of the imperial capital, came to supremacy partly through its constant concern for Christians everywhere.

Certainly such a practice was bound to be abused by idlers and pretenders. Precautions early were taken to test the genuineness of a Christian traveler and to forestall his becoming a burden to the Christian community (cf. I John 4:1; II John 7-11; Did. 11-12).

Bibliography. J. L. Burkhardt, Notes on the Bedouins and Wahabys, I (1831), 338-50; C. M. Doughty, Arabia Deserta, I (1888), 228; A. von Harnack, The Expansion of Christianity in the First Three Centuries, I (trans. and ed. J. Moffatt; 1904), 181-249; J. Pedersen, Israel, I-II (1926), 356-58; W. R. Smith, Religion of the Semites (3rd ed., 1927), pp. 75-78; D. W. Riddle, "Early Christian Hospitality," JBL, 57 (1938), 141-54.

V. H. Kooy

HOSTAGES [בני תערובות, sons of pledging]. Persons held as security against revolt or aggression.

The Hebrew word תערובות is an abstract plural substantive from ערב, "to take or give a pledge"; hence the phrase בני תערובות literally means "sons of pledging." The LXX misunderstood the word as deriving from ערב, "to mix"; hence the odd misrendering "sons of commingling."

The word "hostages" occurs only in II Kings 14:14=II Chr. 25:24 in the account of Jehoash' victory over Amaziah of Judah. Amaziah was captured, part of Jerusalem's walls were broken down, much booty was removed to Samaria, and hostages were taken to ensure the future good behavior of the Judean king.

See also Surety. J. W. Wevers

HOSTS, HOST OF HEAVEN. In the OT the God of Israel is frequently called "Yahweh [God] of hosts" (יהוה [אלהי] צבאות), for that is his "name" (Isa. 47:4; 51:15; Jer. 10:16; 31:35; Amos 5:27)—i.e., his personal nature (see God, Names of, § 1). The epithet expresses Yahweh's sovereign might and majesty in history, but the precise meaning of the "hosts" which stand at his command is uncertain. The ambiguity of the epithet is inherent in the words "host," "hosts" (צבא, צבאות), whose range of meaning extends from earth to heaven.

Basically, צבא is a military term. It is used most frequently to indicate a body of men organized for war—i.e., an army (Gen. 21:22, 32, E; 26:26 J; Judg. 4:2, 7; 9:29; I Sam. 12:9; II Sam. 3:23; Isa. 34:2; Jer. 51:3; etc.). Also it may mean the act of war, or warfare (Num. 1:3, 20 P; Deut. 24:5; Josh. 22:12, 33; I Sam. 28:1; etc.), or, by an extension of meaning, may designate a term of hard service (Job 7:1; Isa. 40:2; Dan. 10:1). In late priestly literature it is sometimes used of the service of the Levites in the sanctuary (Num. 4:3, 23, 30, 35, 39, 43; 8:24-25).

Since the realms of earth and heaven were closely related in ancient thought, it was believed that the same kind of organized military array was found in the heavenly sphere. Thus the celestial bodies—the sun, moon, and stars—were regarded as an army, the "heavenly host" (צבא השמים). In the astrological cults of antiquity it was believed that the celestial bodies were animated by divine spirits and thus constituted a living army which controlled human destiny. The temptation for Israel to worship them proved to be irresistible, especially in the time when Assyrian and Babylonian cultural influence was strong (Deut. 4:19; 17:3; II Kings 17:16; 21:3, 5 [=II Chr. 33:3, 5]; 23:4-5; Jer. 8:2; 19:13; Zeph. 1:5). This paganism was effectively answered by Israel's doctrine of creation, which affirmed that the heavenly host were God's creatures, ordained to perform a special function and marshaled at his command (Gen. 1:14-19; 2:1; Neh. 9:6; Pss. 33:6; 103:21; 148:2; Isa. 40:26; 45:12). See CREATION § 2.

Moreover, included in the conception of the heavenly host is the idea of the angels (better, "messengers"; see ANGEL) who are associated with Yahweh in his rule. On the analogy of divine assemblies known in Canaan and Babylonia, Israel conceived of Yahweh as a king who presides over his heavenly council, composed of angelic servants or "sons of God" (see below). Micaiah's vision is expressed in these words: "I saw Yahweh sitting on his throne, and all the host of heaven standing beside him on his right hand and on his left" (I Kings 22:19; cf. Gen. 1:26; Job 1-2; Ps. 82; Isa. 6). From time to time, divine messengers were sent forth from the council to accomplish Yahweh's purpose, as we learn from the Prologue to the book of Job. Tradition relates that Joshua, just before leading his army to attack Jericho, was met by one of these angels, who introduced himself as the "commander of the host [צבא] of Yahweh" (Josh. 5:14). The angelic host (cf. Luke 2:13) was conceived of as a mighty army, in the service of Yahweh. Thus when Jacob was met by a band of angels, according to Gen. 32:1-2—H 32:2-3, he exclaimed: "This is God's army!" (מחנה אלהים).

At various times and in various circles of Israelite tradition all these ideas were associated with the epithet "Yahweh of hosts." Here we are dealing with an old cultic name whose original meaning was given within the context of holy war (see WAR, IDEAS OF). Interestingly, the epithet does not occur at all in the Pentateuch or Joshua and Judges, but first appears in Israelite tradition in connection with the amphictyonic sanctuary of Shiloh, where an annual sacrifice to Yahweh of hosts was held (I Sam. 1:3, 11). At Shiloh was stationed the "ark of the covenant of Yahweh of hosts, who is enthroned on the cherubim" (I Sam. 4:4)—a war palladium whose presence in Israel's camp gave assurance that Yahweh himself was conducting Israel's battles (Num. 10:35-36; I Sam. 4:1-7:2; cf. II Sam. 11:11; 15:24-26). David inherited the conception of holy war that was inherent in the epithet "Yahweh of hosts" (note Saul's exercise of the ban upon Amalek in the name of Yahweh of hosts [I Sam. 15:2-3]), and transferred the central sanctuary from the then defunct Shiloh to his capital city of Jerusalem, which he appropriately consecrated by bringing into it the ark of Yahweh of hosts (II Sam. 6:2-19; note especially vss. 2, 18). Although the conception of holy war was soon superseded by a new, nationalistic ideology, the cultic epithet was thereafter associated in a special sense with Jerusalem, where the ark rested within the temple (II Sam. 7:8, 26; Ps. 46:4-7—H 46:5-8; Isa. 6:3; 37:16, 32=II Kings 19:16, 31). The military meaning of "hosts" is clearly set forth in I Sam. 17:45, where David is represented as saying that he fights in the name of Yahweh of hosts, who is the "God of the armies [מערכות] of Israel." Elsewhere Israel's troops are designated as צבאות whom Yahweh leads to victory (Exod. 6:26; 7:4; 12:17, 41, 51), and this is often implied when the epithet is used (I Sam. 15:2; II Sam. 5:10; 6:18). According to Ps. 24:7-10, the King of glory is Yahweh of hosts: "Yahweh strong and mighty, Yahweh mighty in battle"; and the lifting of the gates may presuppose a ceremony of bringing the ark into the temple. Another psalmist laments Yahweh's apparent rejection of his people by saying: "Thou dost not go forth, O God, with our armies" (צבאותינו; Ps. 60:10—H 60:12=108:11—H 108:12; cf. 44:9—H 44:10).

Believing that the powers of heaven and earth are under Yahweh's lordship, the author of the Song of Deborah sensed no contradiction between Yahweh's summons of Israel to holy war through a charismatic leader and the idea that the heavenly host—the stars in their courses—were marshaled to fight for Israel (Judg. 5:20). But the meaning of the old cultic epithet "Yahweh of hosts" inevitably shifted when, in the time of David, the tribal confederacy began to vanish and Israel's religious traditions were reoriented in terms of the new nationalism. Under the new circumstances holy war, as practiced formerly when the ark was carried into battle, became obsolete. Moreover, the surviving belief that Yahweh was on Israel's side in war was repudiated by a line of prophets, beginning with Amos, who insisted that the Day of Yahweh would be a day of darkness and defeat for Israel (Amos 5:18-20).

The name "Yahweh of hosts" occurs predominantly in the literature of the prophets (247 out of some 285 times), which is a clear indication that in their vocabulary "hosts" was not synonymous with Israel's armies. To be sure, the prophets did not surrender the ancient idea of Yahweh's action in the military sphere but rather inverted it, as it were, by insisting that Yahweh was turning military forces against his people in order to judge them for their sins. Whenever the epithet "Yahweh of hosts" is used by pre-exilic prophets, invariably it has the dynamic meaning it formerly had in the days of the amphictyony: Yahweh of hosts acts in the historical arena to accomplish his sovereign purpose (Isa. 1:9, 24; 2: 12; 3:15; 5:9, 16, 24; 21:10; Jer. 5:14; 6:6, 9; 8:3; 35:17; 38:17; Amos 5:14-17, 27; 6:8; Nah. 2:13—H 2:14; Hab. 2:13; etc.). Moreover, at the deepest level of prophetic insight it was perceived that Yahweh of hosts brings a redemption which surpasses and transcends all nationalistic hopes (Isa. 44:6; 45: 13; 47:4; 48:2; 51:15; 54:5; Mic. 4:4), and, indeed, a psalmist affirmed that the God of Israel "makes wars cease to the end of the earth" (Ps. 46:8-11).

In reinterpreting Yahweh's power, expressed in the traditional cultic epithet, the prophets had at their disposal the conception of the heavenly council, referred to above. Micaiah's vision of Yahweh enthroned in majesty and surrounded by the host of heaven is echoed in the account of Isaiah's inaugural vision (Isa. 6), and this in turn is echoed in Isa. 40:1-11. Indeed, Yahweh's prophets insisted that they spoke with an authoritative "Thus saith the LORD" because they had been drawn into Yahweh's council, while the false prophets had not (Jer. 23:18, 22; cf. Isa. 6:8; 40:6; Amos 3:7). During the prophetic period, the idea of the heavenly council posed both a danger and an opportunity for Israel's faith. The danger lay in the fact that, owing to the undefined constituency of the council, pagan deities could be admitted and, in popular syncretistic faith, could be venerated along with Yahweh. The seriousness of this threat can be seen from the action of Manasseh, who constructed altars to the "host of heaven" in the Jerusalem temple, where Yahweh demanded the exclusive worship of his people (II Kings 21:3-5; cf. 23:4-5; Deut. 4:19; Jer. 8:2; 19:13). On the other hand, the threat also provided the opportunity to understand Yahweh's power and majesty in concrete and vivid terms. Pagan deities were absorbed into the heavenly council and were given the subordinate status of messengers or servants of Yahweh of hosts (Exod. 15:11; Pss. 29; 89:5-8—H 89:6-9). The members in good standing are those divine beings who hearken to their sovereign's will (Pss. 103:21; 148:1-6). According to Ps. 82, those "sons of God" who fail to perform their appointed function are banished and sentenced to die like men. In an apocalyptic passage it is stated that in the end time > the host of heaven, in heaven, > and the kings of the earth, on the earth > (Isa. 24:21).

> Yahweh will punish

Thus the epithet "Yahweh of hosts" sums up the Israelite faith that Yahweh alone is Lord in heaven and on earth. The One whom the heavenly host praise is also exalted in the earth and, above the tumult of history, commands: "Be still, and know that I am God" (Ps. 46:10).

The above discussion has been based on the assumption that it is proper to translate "Yahweh of hosts," thus indicating a genitive relationship, which is clearly the case in the expanded form "Yahweh, God of hosts" (see LORD OF HOSTS). Along different lines, however, the view has been advanced that both terms of the epithet are independent grammatically and thus stand in apposition, on the analogy of "Yahweh El Elyon" or "Yahweh El Olam" (see GOD, NAMES OF, §§ C2*b-c*). According to this hypothesis, צבאות is an intensive abstract plural (cf. "Elohim") which means "Sabaothic Power"—i.e., "mightiness" or "the mighty one." The juxtaposition of the two divine names, one derived from Israel's Mosaic tradition and the other perhaps from Canaanite circles, first occurred in the ancient central sanctuary of Shiloh, where Israelite faith was influenced by Canaanite motifs. Thus Yahweh was identified with Sabaoth, enthroned upon the cherubim (in the fashion of other throne scenes represented in Canaanite art), and extolled as the God who is elevated above all powers. Although this view (Jahwe, der Zebaothhafte) is grammatically possible, it advocates an abstraction of thought which is not characteristic of the Hebrew mind. Therefore, the concrete meaning of "Yahweh of hosts," which expresses either the historical dynamism of holy war or the sovereign decree issued with the heavenly council, is preferable. Admittedly, in the course of time צבאות lost its specific meaning and became more abstract. This is evident in the LXX, where the translators sometimes treat Σαβαώθ as a divine proper name (cf. Rom. 9: 29; Jas. 5:4), sometimes suggest that Kyrios includes all powers in himself (κύριος τῶν δυνήμεων), and most frequently construe the Hebrew to mean "the Lord Omnipotent" (κύριος παντοκράτωρ).

Bibliography. S. R. Driver, "Lord of Hosts," HDB, III (1900), 137-38. E. Kautzsch, "Zebaoth," Realenzyklopädie für protest. Theologie und Kirche (3 Aufl., 1908), XXI, 620-27. W. F. Arnold, The Ephod and the Ark (1917), pp. 142-48. B. N. Wambacq, L'épithète divine Jahvé Ṣebaôt (1947); see the review by W. F. Albright, JBL, 67 (1948), 377-81. W. Eichrodt, Theologie des ATs, I (1948), 89-90. J. Obermann, "The Divine Name YHWH in the Light of Recent Discoveries," JBL, LXVIII (1949), especially 309-14. O. Eissfeldt, "Jahwe Zebaoth," Miscellanea academica Berolinensia, vol. II, no. 2 (1950), pp. 128-50. V. Maag, "Jahwes Heerscharen," Festschrift L. Köhler (1950), pp. 27 ff. L. Köhler, OT Theology (1958). B. W. ANDERSON HOSTS, LORD OF. See LORD OF HOSTS.

HOTHAM hō′thəm [חותם, seal, signet ring]; KJV HOTHAN hō′thən in I Chr. 11:44. 1. A member of the tribe of Asher (I Chr. 7:32). In vs. 35, חלם, Helem (RSV "Heler"), is apparently the same person.

2. An Aroerite (see AROER), father of two of David's Mighty Men (I Chr. 11:44).

B. T. DAHLBERG

HOTHIR hō′thər [חותיר]. One of the sons of Heman who assisted in the instrumental music in the worship in the house of Yahweh (I Chr. 25:4). He obtained for his allotted time of service the twenty-first lot of the twenty-four divisions (vs. 28). Some scholars, however, believe that I Chr. 25:4, from the name Hananiah to the end of the verse, is a misplaced, fragmentary psalm of lamentation.

Bibliography. W. Rudolph, Chronikbücher, HAT (1955), includes relevant bibliography. E. R. DALGLISH in Dan. 3:6, 15; 4:33; 5:5. The RSV translates "immediately," as the Aramaic indicates, not a period of time, but a point in time (cf. Dan. 4:19). The OT knows no system of equal hours for dividing the day. See DAY; NIGHT; TIME; WATCH.

HOUR [Aram. שעה, glance, twinkling; ὥρα, hour]. 1. KJV translation in the phrase "the same hour"

2. The NT designation of a definite period (e.g., Matt. 20:1-12; Mark 15:25); also used loosely (e.g., Matt. 8:13 KJV) or metaphorically (e.g., Matt. 26:45). By NT times the Jews were counting twelve hours each in the day and in the night (cf. John 11:9). Sundials and water clocks were in use for marking the hours. See DIAL AND SUNDIAL. S. J. DE VRIES

HOUSE [בית; so Aram; Akkad. bitu; Ugar. bt; Arab. bayt; οἰκία, οἶκος]. A word used some two thousand times throughout the Bible referring to an abode, varying from the simplest home of a peasant to the palace (house of the king) and the temple (house of God). In Egypt, Mesopotamia, and the lowlands of Syria and Palestine, builders of houses used mud or sun-dried brick, while in the hills of Palestine they used mostly stone, which was abundant. Wood was used for roofing and for some superstructure. As civilization developed in Egypt, stone was quarried from the cliffs and used in some of the better houses. In Palestine the earliest known houses are the mud houses in Jericho. See JERICHO § 2.

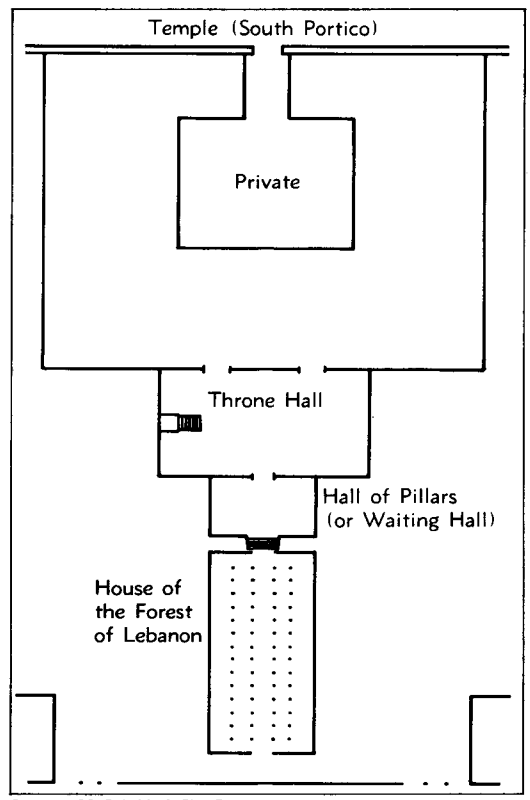
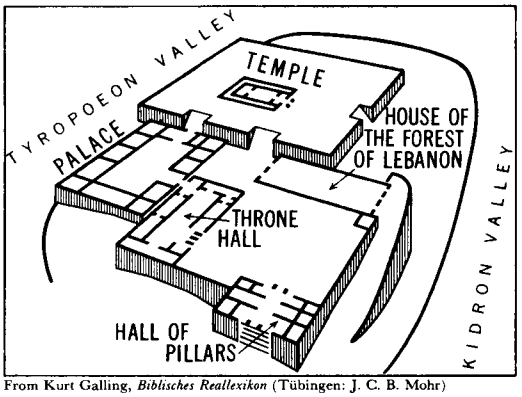
Etymology of בית is uncertain; some consider it derived from a root meaning "go in," "spend the night," with the implication that the house was principally a refuge from nocturnal dangers and bad weather. From earliest historical times, however, there were throughout the Near East houses designed for comfortable living. Excavations at AI disclosed impressive houses with thick walls from the Early Bronze Age (ca. 3000-2100). At Tell Beit Mirsim (DEBIR) foundations of the Middle Bronze Age (ca. 2100-1550) show thick, well-constructed walls. The house of Lot at Sodom (Gen. 19:1-11), presumably of the Middle Bronze Age, reputedly was strong enough to hold off a mob temporarily.



In biblical times most houses were in cities, towns, or villages. The agricultural population had houses in settlements from which members went out to cultivate their fields or tend their flocks. There are few instances of separate military posts or community houses, like the one at Qumran, away from towns. From excavations it appears that during the time of Israel and Judah cities became more congested, with the result that houses were smaller, walls thinner, and planning less careful. There were exceptions, as in official houses in MEGIDDO.

At every period covered in the Bible there was a variety of dwelling. The house of a free man or an official would face a street and adjoin other houses. It might be part of the city wall with a window opening to the outside (Josh. 2:15-21; II Cor. 11:33). Probably it would be rectangular with an open court in front. The door would be of wood with a wooden beam as the lintel and two upright posts as jambs. There would be a room for domestic animals, sleeping quarters, and a central room with a hearth for cooking and braziers for heating. Smoke would go out through open windows, which could be closed by latticework. The ceiling would be of wooden beams plastered over with clay. Some of the flooring would be of plaster or stone. Steps would lead to the roof, where there would be a guest room (II Kings 4:10). The surface of the roof would be of clay, which regularly had to be replenished and rolled, as in many houses today. In the spring grass might grow briefly on the housetop (Ps. 129:6; Isa. 37:27).

The term בית has a variety of meanings, as "inside" (Gen. 6:14); a receptacle for a corpse, called "eternal home" (Eccl. 12:5); any dwelling, as a spider's web (Job 8:14).



Both Hebrew and Greek words for "house," as in English, many times refer to the family. To build a house, then, may mean to produce a family (Exod. 1:21; Ruth 4:11; Matt. 12:25; John 4:53). See ARCHITECTURE. O. R. SELLERS

HOUSE OF THE FOREST OF LEBANON lĕb'ə nən [בית יער הלבנון]; in short HOUSE OF THE FOREST (Isa. 22:8). A part of Solomon's palace in Jerusalem, named for its cedar pillars and wallboards imported from Mount Lebanon. It is described as a rectangular building divided by three (Hebrew four) rows of pillars, with an upper story of chambers distributed in (three) rows of fifteen each (I Kings 7:2-5). It was organically connected with the other public rooms of the palace, namely the Hall of Pillars, perhaps to be amended into "Waiting Hall" (העומדים instead of העמודים), and the Hall of the Throne, as

Courtesy of J. Gabalda & Cie., Paris

32. Suggested arrangement of the buildings of Solomon's palace at Jerusalem, according to L.-H. Vincent (Jerusalem de l'AT, vol. II, fig. 134, p. 428, by L.-H. Vincent and A.-M. Steve)

From Kurt Galling, Biblisches Reallexikon (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr)

33. Suggested arrangements of the Solomonic temple and palace complex well as with the private apartments of the king (palace) and of the daughter of Pharaoh (I Kings 7: 6-8). Various references are made to the golden shields (of the guard), the ivory throne, and the precious vessels that were kept in the House of the Forest (I Kings 10:17, 21; II Chr. 9:16, 20; Isa. 22: 8). The palace compound was located to the S of the courtyard of Solomon's temple and belonged to the same architectural ensemble, combining God's house and the house of the king, his representative on earth. The exact location and layout of the palace remain highly hypothetical, in the absence of definite archaeological information. See PALACE; TEMPLE (JERUSALEM); HALL.

Figs. HOU 32-33.

Bibliography. K. Galling, Biblisches Reallexikon (1937), p. 411; J. Simons, Jerusalem in the OT (1952), pp. 130, 436; H. Vincent, Jérusalem de l'Ancien Testament, II (1956), 423-31.

G. A. BARROIS

HOUSEHOLD DUTIES, LIST OF. See LISTS, ETHICAL.

HOUSEHOLD OF GOD [οἶκος θεοῦ (I Tim. 3:15); ὄικος τοῦ θεοῦ (I Pet. 4:17); οἰκεῖοι τοῦ θεοῦ (Eph. 2: 19)]. The community of believers, the members of the household which constitutes the church. See CHURCH, IDEA OF.

HOUSEHOLDER [οἰκοδεσπότης] (Matt. 20:1). A house steward or master of the house. The Greek word occurs twelve times in the Synoptic gospels, and nowhere else in the NT. In the parable of Matt. 20:1 ff, Jesus makes the point that God deals with men as the householder deals with his laborers.

B. H. THROCKMORTON, JR.

HOWLING CREATURES [אחים, cf. Arab. 'aḥḥa, to cough, or aḥū, strange, foreign] (Isa. 13:21); KJV DOLEFUL CREATURES. The context suggests some wild creatures not normally to be found in houses (cf. LXX ἦχος, "sound, noise"). Koehler (Lexicon, p. 26) favors "eagle-owls," and G. R. Driver (PEQ [May-Oct., 1955], p. 134) "hyaenas."

W. S. MCCULLOUGH

HOZAI hō'zī [חוזי]. Author of some "sayings" in which the record of Manasseh's life was preserved, according to the Hebrew text of II Chr. 33:19. One Hebrew MS and the LXX (τῶν ὁρώντων) read "of the seers" (חוזים; so RSV), and this is generally preferred. Some commentators, however, take the MT as a reference to an otherwise unknown prophet. A third alternative is to rearrange the consonants of the Hebrew text to read חזיו, "his [i.e., Manasseh's] seers."

J. M. WARD

HUKKOK hŭk'ŏk [חוקק]. A border town in the territory of Naphtali (Josh. 19:34). It is generally identified with Yaquq, approximately three miles W of CHINNEROTH, overlooking the plain.

HUKOK. Alternate form of HELKATH.

HUL hŭl [חול]. The second son of Aram, and a grandson of Shem, according to Gen. 10:23; in I Chr. 1:17, the seventh son of Shem (but see LXX A).

HULDAH hŭl'də [חלדה, possibly from חלד, weasel]. A prophetess; wife of Shallum, "keeper of the wardrobe" (II Kings 22:14). She was the one consulted when King Josiah sent to "inquire of the LORD" after finding the Book of the Law in the temple. She prophesied God's judgment upon the nation, but peace for Josiah because of his repentance (vss. 16-20). It was after this consultation that Josiah carried out his religious reform (23:1-25). Huldah's prophecy is of interest in connection with the question of fulfilment of prophecy (Josiah was later killed), and also for the unusual example of a woman's acting in this capacity (cf. Deborah in Judg. 4:4; Anna in Luke 2:36).

D. HARVEY

HUMANITY OF CHRIST. The idea found in the NT that Jesus Christ was truly human in every respect, despite the emphasis on his divinity (see DIVINITY OF CHRIST).

The earliest gospel, Mark, appears to teach that Jesus' knowledge was limited (13:32), and quotes Jesus as disclaiming to be good in the absolute sense (10:18: "Why do you call me good? No one is good but God alone"). The cry from the cross: "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" (15:34), can be understood as an expression of true humanity.

The Gospel of Luke affirms that Jesus grew "in wisdom and in stature, and in favor with God and man" (2:52). The gospels throughout reflect a life of human activity, and Jesus was regarded by most of his contemporaries as a teacher and prophet.

The Gospel of John, which has the most developed Christology of any NT book, pictures Jesus as fatigued and thirsting (4:6-7; 19:28) and includes the story that when his side was pierced, blood and water came out (19:34), perhaps in order to guard against the idea that his sufferings were illusory.

The Pauline letters emphasize Jesus' origin from a Jewish family and the human limitations under which he lived (Rom. 9:5; II Cor. 13:4; Gal. 4:4; Phil. 2:7-8).

The Letter to the Hebrews teaches that Christ is a high priest who can have compassion for human weakness, since he was tempted in every way, yet without sin (4:14; cf. Matt. 4:1-11 = Luke 4:1-13); also that Christ was perfected through his sufferings (Heb. 2:10), shared human flesh and blood (2:14), and cried out to God and learned obedience through what he suffered (5:7-8).

The Pastoral letters refer to him as the "man Christ Jesus" (I Tim. 2:5). See also CHRIST §§ 5, 9; KENOSIS.

S. E. JOHNSON

HUMILITY [צנע, ענוה, עני; ταπεινός, πραΰς, and related words]. A situation of lowliness or affliction, and a characteristic way of acting toward God and man; opposite to pride, arrogance, and violence. There is not a clear distinction between humility and MEEKNESS or PATIENCE. At first the humble are the poor or afflicted, but later humility is separated from socio-economic connotations to refer to subjective traits of character; the words translated by this English word have relatively little to do with one's self-valuation apart from ways of acting toward others.

1. In the OT. The great emphasis upon humility in both Judaism and Christianity must be traced back to its roots in the beginnings of Israel. The pre-Mosaic ancient world was, like the later Greco-Roman world, very sensitive to social status, so much so that the overturning of the normal social distinctions was calamity and chaos. The beginnings of Israel were tied up with rejection of such aristocratic stratification of society. Acutely aware of their lowly origins as state slaves in Egypt (Exod. 1:11; Deut. 26:6), and of the goodness of Yahweh, who delivered them from an intolerable affliction, they could never regard Yahweh as the upholder of a social system built on pride and wealth. On the contrary, it is Yahweh who delivers the humble, but brings down the haughty (cf. I Sam. 2:7; II Sam. 22:28). The concept of humility is thus in the OT almost exclusively tied up with human beings who are in affliction, poverty, and suffering; only rarely does ענוה occur as an abstraction (and in relatively late passages), designating a purely subjective trait of character. Humility is the state of the POOR and afflicted (עני and אביון), whose situation is one in which they must acknowledge their own helplessness and utter dependence upon God. Yahweh himself humbles man, whether it be Pharaoh (Exod. 10:3) or Israel in the wilderness (Deut. 8:2, 16), in order that man may know that he does not live by bread alone, and that it is by Yahweh's power that he obtains wealth. The Deuteronomists warn against pride in power on the ground that Yahweh's choice of Israel was based, not on human strength and achievements, but on divine love and promise to the fathers (Deut. 7:7-8). By attributing to Yahweh the source of all wealth and power, these two major sources of human pride and arrogance were brought under control (cf. Jer. 9:23-24). On the other hand, the humble poor are the constant concern of Yahweh, from the oldest law codes (Exod. 23:6, 11; cf. Deut. 15:4, 7, 11; 24:14) throughout the prophets. Utterly dependent, they were evidently increasingly preyed upon by the wealthy and powerful, who acted with violence and arrogance and are thus equated with the enemies of Yahweh in all the pre-exilic prophets (Isa. 3:14-15; Jer. 2:34, et passim; Amos 2:6-7; 4:1). It is most likely that this horror of violent actions against the helpless was constant from the time of Moses on. On the other hand, the humility of the poor became the symbol of the righteous God-fearer from Moses (Num. 12:3), and especially after the destruction of Jerusalem. Zephaniah had already nearly equated righteousness and humility (2:3; 3:12-13) and Micah (6:8) had identified humility as the requirement of God, but in the Psalms particularly the afflicted is almost a technical term for the God-fearing pious (Pss. 22:26; 25:9; 147:6; et passim). It is probable that there is a direct connection between these uses and the HASIDIM of the Maccabean period, since a direct connection is seen between suffering and the maintenance of religious integrity.

2. In the NT. Only rarely does humility in the NT have the objective aspect of poverty, affliction, or low social status so characteristic of OT uses. Matt. 5:5 may have such underlying connotations, but is obviously a reminiscence of Ps. 37:11, as Luke 1:52 takes up I Sam. 2:7. In Acts 20:19, Paul mentions humility together with tears and trials; this suggests the old connection. However, it is in connection with Jesus himself as Messiah that the motif of humility and also of affliction occurs most frequently. Matt. 21:4-5 applies to him the prophecy of Zech. 9:9, in which the religious ideal of humility has already been attributed to the king. The same is true in Matt. 11:29, where there is the same emphasis upon peace and nonviolence. It is possible that the OT narratives of Saul (I Sam. 10:21-23) and David (16:11-12) are also deliberate attributions of humility to the earliest kings. This humility of the sovereign is, at any rate, not a new motif in the NT, connected as it is with the OT, where it reflects theological concepts of sovereignty which contrast most sharply with ancient paganism, even though the ritual humiliation of the king does play a part in the Babylonian Akitu Festival. See ASSYRIA AND BABYLONIA.

The vast majority of references to humility in the NT refer to subjective traits of character not tied up with an objective situation of affliction or poverty. Humility appears in many catalogues of Christian virtues in the letters, sometimes connected with the example of Jesus (I Cor. 4:21; II Cor. 10:1; Phil. 2:8) and sometimes connected with OT passages which emphasized God's concern for and protection of the poor and resistance to the proud (II Cor. 7:6; Jas. 4:6). Humility is sometimes contrasted deliberately with violence (I Cor. 4:21; Gal. 6:1; II Tim. 2:25). Christian humility means a lack of concern for one's own prestige (Rom. 12:16; cf. Matt. 18:4; 23:12; Luke 14:11; II Cor. 11:7), and consequently valuation of others above self (Phil. 2:3). In Jas. 1:10 the old expectation of the exaltation of the poor and humbling of the rich is to be realized in the Christian community, but the economic difference is now irrelevant.

From the frequency of references in the NT, one may conclude that humility is regarded as a most important trait of early Christian life. Since it is primarily an attitude and mode of acting in regard to one's fellow men, it does away with selfish pride, arrogance, and especially violence, and furnishes the possibility of peace and harmony within the community. It also, however, withdrew the normal foundations of authority in human society, which are usually to be found in prestige and power. This conflict between humility and prestige appears throughout the OT, and perhaps is to be found in the temptation narratives, but certainly is dealt with by Paul in Phil. 2:5-13. The resolution of the religious necessity of humility and at the same time of authority is to be found in the Cross—and the Resurrection. Nothing could more forcefully indicate that for early Christians, the two are to be harmonized only in the act of God, not in exempting religious authorities from humility, nor in reducing humility to ritual acts or a false self-denigration.

Bibliography. A. Rahlfs, עני und ענו in den Psalmen (1892); A. Causse, Les 'Pauvres' d'Israël (1922); R. Storr, Die Frömmigkeit im AT (1928), pp. 159-60; H. Birkeland, 'ānî und 'ānāw in den Psalmen (1933); A. Gelin, Les pauvres de Yahvé (1954); T. C. Vriezen, An Outline of OT Theology (1958), p. 313.

G. E. MENDENHALL

HUMOR. Subject indexes in library catalogues often use the caption "Wit and Humor" rather than "Humor" alone. This usage is appropriate to an investigation of humor in the Bible. Religion is serious, and the Bible is basically a serious book. However, the Bible, like any other great literature, has its lighter moments, especially its quick perception of the incongruous, which is the essence of wit. Another aspect of wit is the ability to make a neat turn of speech; it is obvious to all that the Bible abounds in this sort of thing. We should also keep in mind Whipple's classic descriptions: "Wit is abrupt, darting, scornful, and tosses its analogies in your face; humor is slow and shy, insinuating its fun into your heart."

Not only is the Bible a serious book; it is also an ancient and mostly oriental book, originally written in languages little known to ordinary Occidentals today, and evincing only a few instances of contact with the European or Western world. Because of the verbal and intellectual subtlety of humor, it is the literary quality most easily lost in translation. "In other words," says Leacock, "translation of humor from one language to another, from one age to another, from one thought to another, is almost impossible." Almost, it might be added, but not altogether impossible. Some of the Bible's humor is already fairly well recognized, and more of it can be pointed out or explained. Modern translations often provide help by adding an explanation in brackets or in a footnote.

IRONY AND SATIRE are special forms of humor, usually with a didactic or moralistic purpose.

One of the most common kinds of humor (or rather, wit) in the Bible (and perhaps everywhere) is the pun, a form of wordplay or paronomasia. Paronomasia, or wordplay in general, goes far beyond mere humor in the Bible, because of the oriental fondness for this sort of thing. Learned dissertations have been written on the subject (see bibliography), attesting its prime importance. Casanowicz lists some five hundred wordplays from the OT, and Russell adds at least two hundred from the NT. Obviously, only a few of the more striking examples can be mentioned or discussed here. Not all of these could be called humorous in the modern sense, but certainly they are all witty, and were so intended by the original speakers and writers. It has been said that the pun is the lowest form of humor; the people of Bible times would not have agreed; to them words were more serious and significant than to us.

Genesis provides some of the best plays on words, especially in connection with proper names. The Garden of Eden story, in spite of serious implications such as the introduction of sin into the world, has a lightness of touch that has long been recognized. Who has not smiled at the indecent haste with which the guilty pair clothe themselves and try to hide among the trees? And how sadly yet ludicrously human it is when the man blames the woman and she in turn blames the serpent! The whole atmosphere contrasts sharply with the austere account of Creation that precedes (1:1–2:4*a; see* DOCUMENTS). In this atmosphere the pun is at home; we are prepared to understand the earthy nature of mankind by an untranslatable pun at the beginning of the story (2:7): "Then the LORD God formed man [ādhām] of dust from the ground [adhāmâ]." Likewise, in the passage on the formation of the woman from a rib of the man (which has given rise to no end of humorous remarks), the close relationship between man and woman is asserted, and then clinched by a telling pun, which is not altogether lost in English (2:23):

> This at last is bone of my bones > and flesh of my flesh;
> she shall be called Wo*man* [ishshâ], > because she was taken out of Man [îsh].

Near the end of the story the woman, destined to become the mother of the race, receives an appropriate personal name; and again the occasion calls for a pun (3:20): "The man called his wife's name Eve [ḥawwâ], because she was the mother of all living [ḥay]."

The famous story of the Tower of Babel, or Babylon, as we now call it, is in similar vein. The language barrier is a tragic problem among men, as the biblical writer senses when he makes it the result of man's sinful pride and ambition; but it also has its comic aspects—the other person's language often sounds ludicrous, as though it were mere babbling. Thus arises the opportunity for the pun on the name of the tower (11:9). By using the form "Babylon," Moffatt makes the pun very close in English, thus: "Hence it was called Babylon [bābhel], because it was there that the Eternal made a babble [bālal] of the language of the whole earth."

The names of the PATRIARCHS give fruitful occasion for punning. Abram and Abraham suggest "father" (ābh) plus another word (17:5). Isaac (yiṣḥaq) suggests the verb "to laugh" or "to enjoy oneself" (17:17, 19; 21:6; 26:8). Ishmael sounds like the verb "to hear" or "give heed" (16:11; 17:20). Esau suggests "hairy" (25:25). Edom is very similar to the word for "red" (25:30). Jacob suggests both "heel-holder" and "supplanter" (25:26; 27:36; Hos. 12:2-3). Joseph may be compared with the verbs "take away" ('āsaph; Gen. 30:23) or "add" (yāsaph; 30:24). Manasseh suggests "forgetfulness" (41:51), and Ephraim can be connected with a verb meaning "to be fruitful" (41:52; Hos. 9:16; 14:8).

The prophets also use puns, often with ironical, sarcastic, or satirical force, to make their monitory message more vivid (see IRONY AND SATIRE). Thus their humor is of a somewhat grimmer sort than that found in Genesis. Only a few selected examples can be given: "Gilgal shall go into galling exile [gālâ]" (Amos 5:5; cf. Amer. Trans. and Moffatt). The most famous and the grimmest pun in the Prophets occurs in Amos 8:1-2: "Thus the Lord GOD showed me . . . a basket of summer fruit [qayiṣ]. . . . Then the LORD said to me, 'The end [qēṣ] has come upon my people Israel.' " This figure is very vivid, for not only does the word for "summer fruit" sound like the word for "end," but obviously the fruit is conceived of as being overripe to add to the effect of doom (see Moffatt).

The splendid paronomasia in Hos. 8:7 is usually lost in English:

> The standing grain [qāmāh] has no heads [semaḥ], > it shall yield no meal [qemaḥ]

(note the rhyming free translation of Moffatt). Hos. 12:11—H 12:12 has another pun on Gilgal:

> If in Gilgal they sacrifice bulls, > their altars also shall be like stone heaps [gallîm].

Because of its strong feeling and high literary style throughout, wordplays are found in all parts of the book of Isaiah. A few examples must suffice: "Ah [hôi], sinful nation [gôi]" (1:4); "eat the good" or "be eaten by the sword" (1:19-20); "to terrify ['ārōṣ] the earth ['āreṣ]" (2:19);

> He looked for justice [mishpāṭ], > but behold, bloodshed [miṣpāḥ];
> for righteousness [ṣᵉdāqâ], > but behold, a cry [ṣᵉ'āqâ]!
> (5:7);

note 17:12; 21:2 in any translation, though none does justice to the original; "There shall be moaning [ta'ᵃniyyâ] and groaning [wa'ᵃniyyâ]" (29:2); "a sacrifice [zebhaḥ] in Bozrah, a great slaughter [tebhaḥ] in the land of Edom" (34:6); "Wild beasts [ṣiyyîm] shall meet with hyenas ['iyyîm]" (34:14); "He makes them . . . like driven stubble [qash] with his bow [qashtô]" (41:2); "like a wife forsaken ['ᵃzubhâ] and grieved ['aṣûbhath] in spirit" (54:6); "a rush [sheṣeph] of wrath [qeṣeph]" (54:8 Moffatt).

Mic. 1:10-14 contains a series of wordplays of this type. Unfortunately the text is not in good order, and most translations give no hint of the original flavor. The Interpreter's Bible and the translations of Knox and Moffatt (especially the latter) do give some help.

The most telling pun in Jeremiah, comparable to that in Amos 8:2 and setting the theological tone for the entire book, is that in 1:11-12: "I [Jeremiah] said, 'I see a rod of almond [shāqēdh; Moffatt 'wake-tree'].' Then the LORD said to me, 'You have seen well, for I am watching [shōqēdh; Moffatt 'wakeful'] over my word to perform it.' " Horror, a very grim form of humor, is well expressed in 2:12: "Be appalled [shōmmû], O heavens [shāmayim], at this"; note in the following verse the contrasting figures, "living waters" and "broken cisterns." The call to repentance in ch. 3 plays upon two meanings of the verb shûbhâ, "to turn," "return," "turn away": "Return [shûbhâ], faithless [mᵉshûbhâ; Moffatt 'turncoat'] Israel" (vs. 12); "Return [shûbhû], O faithless [shôbhābhîm] children" (vs. 14);

> Return [shûbhû], O faithless [shôbhābhîm] sons,
> I will heal your faithlessness [mᵉshûbhōth] > (vs. 22).

The feeling in this last verse is no longer satirical humor, but deep pathos; this shows the range of moods which the pun could express.

Our final prophetic example, typical of a group, is from Zech. 9:5: "Ashkelon shall see [tērê] it, and be afraid [têrâ]." A number of the forms of the Hebrew verbs meaning "to see" and "to fear" are similar, with the result of about fifteen plays on these two words in the OT.

The WISDOM literature naturally makes use of wordplays and other forms of wit. Examples are:

> A stupid [nābhûbh] man will get understanding [yillābhēbh], > when a wild ass's colt is born a man (Job 11:12);

"The companion [rō'ê] of fools will suffer harm [yērôᵃ']" (Prov. 13:20); "There are friends [rē'îm] who pretend to be friends [hitrō'ᵉ'ᵃ', similar to a word meaning "be harmful"; double-entendre]" (Prov. 18:24); "Who has woe ['ôy]? Who has sorrow ['ᵃbhôy]?" (Prov. 23:29)—a part of the satire on the drunkard.

The APOCRYPHA are, for the most part, translated works; therefore many of their wordplays are lost. However, Susanna contains two clever and bitter puns in the Greek (both LXX and Theod.), which are worthy of mention here: " 'Under which tree did you see them meet?' He answered, 'Under a mastic tree [schînon].' And Daniel said, 'You have told a fine lie against your own life, for already the angel of God has received the sentence from God, and he will cut [schisei, 'split'] you in two' " (vss. 54-55 Goodspeed); " 'Under which tree did you catch them embracing each other?' . . . 'Under a liveoak tree [prînon].' And Daniel said to him, '. . . the angel of God is waiting with his sword to saw [prisai] you in two' " (vss. 58-59 Goodspeed). Note, in addition to the wordplays, that the names of the trees rhyme—they are both lies!

The translation problem also affects, to some extent, the presentation of wordplays from the Greek NT (see ARAMAIC). Yet much of the Greek NT is not translation; in some cases the wordplays are preserved, and in other cases the Greek itself gives occasion for new wordplays (as was probably the case also in the passage from Susanna presented above). Hence it is not difficult to collect examples from the NT. Most of them are witty, rather than humorous; some are very serious.

Underlying Matt. 1:21 is a pun on a proper name, similar to those presented from Genesis. The idea presented is basic to NT thought—namely, that Jesus is savior; but the pun is not even preserved in Greek, to say nothing of English. Yet the original import of the verse cannot be understood without reference to it: "She will bear a son, and you shall call his name Jesus [original form yēshû'ᵃ], for he will save [yāsha'] his people from their sins." A good humorous, satirical pun occurs in Matt. 6:16: "They disfigure [aphanizousin] their faces that they may figure [phanôsin] in public as fasting" (Russell). Probably the most famous wordplay in the NT is that in Matt. 16:18, fairly well preserved in Greek, but lost in English: "You are Peter [Greek petros; Aramaic kēphâ], and on this rock [Greek petra; Aramaic kēphâ] I will build my church." Note John 3:8, where the same word (pneuma) means both "wind" and "Spirit." In II Cor. 1:21 occurs a significant wordplay on the root meaning of the word "Christ": "It is God who establishes us with you in Christ [the 'Anointed' One], and has commissioned [chrisas, 'anointed' (Goodspeed) or 'christened'] us." In I John 2:19 the same

Greek phrase (ex hēmôn) is repeated with an opposite meaning: "They went out from us, but they were not of us."

In conclusion, reference may be made to a few more general or extended passages of humorous import.

Outstanding is the story of Samson (Judg. 13–16). Pfeiffer's characterization is most apt: "The hero lacks the refinement of a Joseph or an Achilles, but possesses traits dear to simple and healthy rural folk. Always brawling and excelling all rivals in muscular strength, this uncouth fellow is no match for feminine wiles. But under the rough exterior there is a witty if untutored mind, quick at repartee, an instinctive devotion to his own people, and a dogged determination in avenging wrongs, which culminates in a self-inflicted heroic death. Samson is a sort of irresponsible and uncontrollable Till Eulenspiegel or Peer Gynt."

By combining two translations (Moffatt and RSV) of Samson's exulting cry after the jawbone incident (15:16), we can sense something of the flavor of the more humorous parts of the entire narrative:

> With the jawbone of an ass,
> I have piled them in a mass!
> With the jawbone of an ass,
> I have slain a thousand men!

Other OT passages to be noted are: Lamech's boast (Gen. 4:23-24); Noah's drunkenness (Gen. 9: 18-27); Abraham's bargaining with the Lord (Gen. 18:22-33); the various instances of Jacob's clever trickery (Gen. 25:21–32:1); the story of the attempts of the angel to impede the progress of Balaam and his ass (Num. 22:21-35); Ehud's stabbing of the obese Eglon (Judg. 3:15-27); the rout of the Midianites (Judg. 7:19-22); Jotham's fable or parable (Judg. 9:7-20); Abimelech's death at the hands of a woman (Judg. 9:50-54); the ruse by which the Benjaminites obtained wives (Judg. 21:15-24); the slaying of Goliath (I Sam. 17); David's frustration of Nabal (I Sam. 25), whose name means "fool" (vs. 25); Elijah's ridiculing the prophets of Baal on Mount Carmel (I Kings 18:26-29; sarcastic and satirical); Micaiah's irony (I Kings 22:15); the extravagant actions of Ezra and Nehemiah (Ezra 9:3; Neh. 13:25; unintentionally humorous); Haman's unwittingly being the cause of honoring his enemy Mordecai (Esth. 6:1-11); Haman's hanging on his own gallows (Esth. 5: 14–7:10); Job's bitter irony (Job 12:2); the sluggard (Prov. 6:6-11; 24:30-34; 26:13-16); the scolding wife (Prov. 21:9, 19; 25:24); the drunkard (Prov. 23:29-35); the fool (Prov. 26:1-12; 27:22); "A living dog is better than a dead lion" (Eccl. 9:4); the satirical ridicule of IDOLATRY (cf. Elijah; Pss. 115:2-8; 135:15-18; Isa. 2:8, 18-21; 40:19-20; 44:9-20; 45:16; 46:1; Jer. 10:1-10; Hos. 4:17; 8:4-6; 13:1-2); Nebuchadnezzar's madness ("made to eat grass like an ox" [Dan. 4]); Jonah's absurd sulking (Jonah 4:1-9); Micah's mockery (Mic. 2:6-7, 11); Nahum's gleeful taunts over Nineveh (Nah. 3).

In the Apoc.: Holofernes' being overcome by the wiles of a woman (Jth. 12–13); Daniel's trapping the guilty old men (Sus. 51-59); the detection of the fraud of the priests of Bel (Bel 19-22); the bursting of the great dragon or serpent (Bel 23-28).

In the NT: the mote (RSV "speck") and the beam (RSV "log"; Matt. 7:3-5; Luke 6:41-42); the outwitting of the Pharisees (Matt. 22:15-22; Mark 12:13-17) and the Sadducees (Matt. 22:23-33; Mark 12:18-27); "straining out a gnat and swallowing a camel" (Matt. 23:24); "whitewashed tombs" (Matt. 23:27; cf. Acts 23:3); Peter's impetuous overconfidence (Matt. 26:33-35; Mark 14:29-31; Luke 22:33-34); "better to marry than to burn" (I Cor. 7:9 KJV); Paul's ridicule of misconduct in worship (I Cor. 11: 22).

Bibliography. E. P. Whipple, Literature and Life (1871), p. 91; I. M. Casanowicz, Paronomasia in the OT (1894)—a Johns Hopkins dissertation, and a very valuable study; E. Russell, Paronomasia and Kindred Phenomena in the NT (1920)—a University of Chicago dissertation, and a useful supplement to Casanowicz; D. Zuver, Salvation by Laughter (1933); S. Leacock, Humor: Its Theory and Technique (1935), p. 226; F. Rosenthal, Humor in Early Islam (1956).

W. F. STINESPRING

HUMTAH hŭm'tə [חמטה, place of lizards(?)] (Josh. 15:54). A village of Judah in the hill-country district of Hebron. The present location is unknown.

HUNCHBACK [גבן, curved, crook-backed]. A type of person cited in the Holiness Code (Lev. 21:20) as unfit for priestly service, although he was permitted to partake of holy food (the priest's portion). The priest was a sacred person, consecrated to Yahweh, and thus was to have no blemish, spiritual or physical.

V. H. KOOY

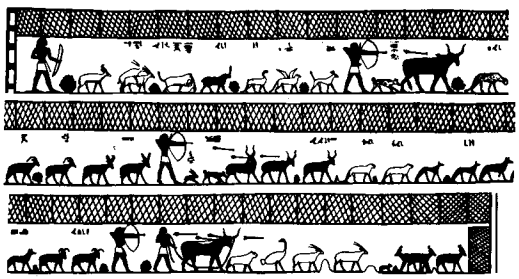
HUNDRED, TOWER OF THE [מגדל המאה, migdal hammē'â]; KJV TOWER OF MEAH mē'ə. A tower of the N rampart of Jerusalem restored by Nehemiah (Neh. 3:1; 12:39). It is listed immediately before the Tower of Hananel (see JERUSALEM § 7*b*). It is very possible that the mention of the Tower of the Hundred may result from an artificial insertion into the text of Neh. 3:1.

G. A. BARROIS

HUNDREDWEIGHT. The measure used in the translation of ὡς ταλαντιαία, "heavy as a hundredweight" (Rev. 16:21). The KJV translates "about the weight of a talent," and the RSV interprets the talent as ca. a hundred pounds. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES § B4*k*.

O. R. SELLERS

HUNTING [ציד, ṣayyādh, hunter (Jer. 16:16; emended Prov. 6:5); ציד, ṣayidh, hunter (Gen. 10:9; 25:27; Qerê Gen. 27:3; also RSV GAME, KJV VENISON); צוד, to hunt; למצודה (KJV to be hunted, RSV for prey; lit., for hunting; Ezek. 13:21; elsewhere used of the hunting SNARE: Ezek. 12:13; 17:20; etc.); מדה, hunted (participle; Isa. 13:14)]. The pursuit of wild animals for food, protection, or pleasure.



Although the purely hunting phase of human culture was long past before the biblical period began, the hunt must still have provided an important supplementary source of food, especially in the seminomadic stage. Hunting with dogs is attested for the immediately pre-Israelite period in Palestine by the Egyptian story The Tale of Si-nuhe. Two hunters from the early time are mentioned by name in the OT: Nimrod (Gen. 10:9) and Esau (Gen. 25:27).

With the coming of city life and the development of trade, the economic importance of hunting declined further, but it remained significant enough to be the subject of a law in Lev. 17:13 and of one of

Courtesy of the Trustees of the British Museum

34. Assyrian hunters using bow and arrow to shoot birds and other game; from a bas relief on the palace of Sargon II (721-705 B.C.) at Khorsabad the proverbs (12:27; cf. Ecclus. 36:19). Deut. 14:5 includes wild game among the animals permitted as food (e.g., the hart, gazelle, roebuck, wild goat, ibex, antelope, and mountain-sheep; see FAUNA), and these must have been obtained by hunting. Many common game animals, such as the hare and wild pig,* were, however, prohibited by the dietary laws (Lev. 11:6). The OT has few references to the hunting of four-footed beasts, but the fowler with his nets and snares* is a common figure; understandably so, since Palestine lies on the main flight routes of the migratory birds. Nevertheless, a rather low opinion of hunting as a profession seems to have prevailed in Israel, for Esau, who lived by the hunt, is regarded as uncivilized by contrast with Jacob the herdsman (Gen. 25: 27). Figs. HUN 34-35; TRA 76.

35. Hunting in the desert, showing the use of bow and arrows and netting; from tomb of Amen-em-hep at Beni-hasan, Twelfth Dynasty (1971-1928 B.C.)

The hunting weapons specifically mentioned in the OT are the bow and arrow (Gen. 27:3) and, by implication, the sling (I Sam. 17:40). Ancient Near Eastern art shows the lasso and spear in use for hunting, and traps, nets, and deadfalls are described in the OT. In hunting wild animals for protection or to rid the community of a dangerous beast or pest, the more military weapons—spear, sword, and club—were used (I Sam. 17:40; Ps. 23:4). The OT records several incidents of killing animals in self-protection (Judg. 14:6; I Sam. 17:34-37; II Sam. 23:20), and describes the shepherd as equipped with club and sling for the defense of his flocks. See WEAPONS; TRAPS.

In communities where the chase is a substantial source of food, the battue method of hunting was employed from antiquity, and is still in use. The villagers form a cordon, and beat forward over the ground, with loud shouts and the pounding of drums or sticks, driving the frightened game before them into a blind canyon, a corral of nets, or a prepared pit, where it is easily killed. Allusions to this type of hunting may be present in OT references to the fear inspired by confined spaces (Job 18:11; Ps. 18:5), and especially the prophetic linking of "terror" and "the pit" (Isa. 24:17-18; Jer. 48:43-44). Fig. HUN 36.

Hunting for pleasure was the privilege of kings and nobles. Phoenician, Assyrian,* and Egyptian art shows royal personages hunting from the chariot while hunting dogs join in the chase (ANEP 183-84, 190). Such royal sport is not referred to in the OT, either because the mountainous terrain of Palestine made it impossible or because the OT writers had too little interest in such matters to record them. Josephus, however, states that Herod enjoyed hunting on horseback, a practice introduced by the Persians (War I.xxi.13). Fig. ASS 102.

Courtesy of the Trustees of the British Museum

36. An Assyrian bas relief showing two footmen with shields and daggers assisting Ashurnasirpal (883-859 B.C.) in a lion hunt; from Nimrud

The patience required of the hunter and the deadly intent of the hunt provided a suitable metaphor, often used in both the OT and the NT, for persistent and inexorable pursuit with intent to destroy (cf. I Sam. 24:11; Job 10:16; Jer. 16:16; Mic. 7:2; Mark 12:13; Luke 11:54; I Tim. 3:7; II Tim. 2:26). The strangest use of the hunting metaphor is Ezek. 13:18, 21, where sorceresses who attempt to destroy life by their magic are said to be hunting souls.

Bibliography. F. von Oppenheim, Der Tell Halaf (1931), pp. 133-38; K. Galling, Biblisches Reallexikon (1937), pp. 286-90; G. Gerleman, Contributions to the OT Terminology of the Chase (1946); J. B. Pritchard, ANEP (1954), pp. 56-60.

L. E. TOOMBS

HUPHAM hū′fəm [חופם, a tribal name]; HUPHAMITES —fə mīts. Alternately: HUPPIM hŭp′ĭm [חפים (Gen. 46:21); חפם (I Chr. 7:12)]; probably HURAM hyo͝or′əm [חורם] (I Chr. 8:5). An eponym; listed as a son of Benjamin (Gen. 46:21 [cf. Jub. 44: 25]; Num. 26:39; I Chr. 7:12); inserted erroneously in I Chr. 7:15. The context of "Huram" in I Chr. 8:5 suggests that "Hupham" be read here.

Bibliography. E. L. Curtis, Chronicles, ICC (1910), pp. 150, 152-53, 158.

B. T. DAHLBERG

HUPPAH hŭp′ə [חפה, canopy (perhaps referring to divine protection)] (I Chr. 24:13). A priest contemporaneous with King David.

HUPPIM. Alternate form of HUPHAM.

HUR hûr [חור, perhaps child (originally a pet name; cf. Akkad. ḫūru), or perhaps shortened from אשחור, ASHHUR, or perhaps related to gentilic חרי, HORITES]. 1. An eponym; listed as a descendant of Judah; son of Caleb and Ephrath, and an ancestor of Bezalel the craftsman (I Chr. 2:19-20; cf. Exod. 31:2); but listed also as a son of Judah (I Chr. 4:1); again, listed as the "first-born of Ephrathah the father of Bethlehem" (I Chr. 4:4; cf. 2:50). Possibly he is to be identified with the Ashhur who was the son of Caleb and Ephrathah (I Chr. 2:24, as the RSV emends; cf. vs. 19; 4:4-5). Possibly this lineage is represented in 2, 4, and 5 below. But it is worth while to note that this name comes into association with the gentilic חרי, "Horite" (i.e., "Hurrian"; e.g., Gen. 36:20; see HORITES), since both "Seir the Horite" and Hur are listed as having among their descendants Shobal (Gen. 36:20; I Chr. 2:50; cf. I Chr. 4:1, where he is the brother of Hur) and Manahath or the Manahathites (Gen. 36:23; I Chr. 2:54; cf. also Ezer [אצר] in Gen. 36:21; Ezer [עזר] in I Chr. 4:4).

2. Moses' assistant, who with Aaron supported Moses' upraised hands during the battle with Amalek (Exod. 17:10-12) and who, with Aaron, presided over the government of the people during Moses' absence (24:14). The Jewish historian Josephus (ca. A.D. 100) thought he was the husband of Moses' sister Miriam (Antiq. III.ii.4).

3. One of the five kings of Midian slain by the Israelites under Moses (Num. 31:8; Josh. 13:21).

4. Father or family name of Solomon's purveyor in the hill country of Ephraim (I Kings 4:8; see 1 above; also BEN-HUR).

5. Father or family name of a certain Rephaiah, who helped repair the wall of Jerusalem in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. 3:9).

Bibliography. E. L. Curtis, Chronicles, ICC (1910), pp. 89-90; M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 221.
B. T. DAHLBERG

HURAI hyo͝or′ī. Alternate form of HIDDAI.

HURAM hyo͝or′əm [חורם]. Alternately: HURAM-ABI hyo͝or′əm ā′bī [חורם אבי, חורם אביו, Huram is my father] (II Chr. 2:13—H 2:12; 4:16); HIRAM hī′rəm [חירם, brother of the exalted one] (Samuel, Kings). 1. A Benjaminite (I Chr. 8:5). Probably his name should be read HUPHAM (cf. Num. 26:39).

2. Same as HIRAM 1.

3. Chief architect of Solomon's temple. In I Kings 7:14 he is said to be the son of a man of Tyre and a woman of Naphtali; II Chr. 2:14—H 2:13 makes his mother a Danite. The Chronicler calls him Huram-abi—a name which he may have created by combining "Hiram" (I Kings 7:13) with "ab" from the second element of "Oholiab," the name of a Danite who helped build the tabernacle (Exod. 31:6). The list of Huram's talents (II Chr. 2:7, 14—H 2:6, 13; cf. I Kings 7:14) is taken from Exod. 31:1-6; 35:35.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 242; A. Brunet, "Le Chroniste et ses sources," RB, LXI (1954), 358-59.
R. W. CORNEY

HURI hyo͝or′ī [חורי, perhaps child (originally a pet name; cf. Akkad. ḫūru)] (I Chr. 5:14). A Gadite.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 38, 221.
B. T. DAHLBERG

HURRIANS ho͝or′ī ənz. The name of a people widely diffused throughout most of the ancient Near East; referred to in the Bible as HORITES; HIVITES; and Jebusites (see JEBUS). Various social customs of the patriarchal age can be traced back to the Hurrians (see NUZI), whose language, moreover, left its mark on Hebrew and Northwest Semitic phonology.

1. In extrabiblical sources. The Hurrians were spread more widely in the ancient Near East than any other people before the Arameans. Although their original home has to be sought in the general region of Armenia, the Hurrians were settled in historical times not only in adjacent areas of Anatolia and Syria but also as far E as the district of Arrapkha (modern Kirkuk), which included Nuzi, and as far S as Central Palestine. It is this exceptional expansion that long kept scholars from recognizing diverse units of the far-flung Hurrians as branches of the same people. The ties between biblical Horites, the dominant ethnic element of the kingdom of Mitanni, and the bearers of certain unusual personal names from Mesopotamia were by no means apparent at first glance.

The necessary key was provided by the Hittite archives from Boghazköy. Included among these were texts and passages in a language expressly labeled as ḫurli-li, "Hurlian," which could then be linked up with lands and people elsewhere designated as Ḫurri. This language, in turn, proved to be the same as the speech of Mitanni—previously discovered at AMARNA—in which the pertinent gentilic form appeared as ḫurw-oḫe and ḫurr-oḫe. The basic stem, then, had to be ḫuru- or ḫurw-, which became ḫurli- in Hittite and ḫurri elsewhere; it was manifestly a native term. The corresponding gentilic in Ugaritic proved to be ḫry. Inevitably, the biblical חרי, "Horite," as applied to an ethnic group attested in Central Palestine, fell into line, inasmuch as Hurrian personal names had been discovered in that same area. And the reason for the Egyptian designation of Palestine as Ḫr (=Ḫuru), which was introduced in the New Kingdom, likewise ceased to be a puzzle. Thus in the space of a few years Hurrians had been certified by name all the way from Anatolia to Egypt.

Before long it became possible to recognize Hurrian elements even without the benefit of the appropriate ethnic or linguistic label. This result was brought about by steady progress in the recovery of the Hurrian language. Unrelated to any of the linguistic stocks previously established for that region —such as Semitic, Sumerian, and Indo-European— Hurrian has generic affinities only with Urartian (the language of ancient Armenia); its only likely modern relatives would have to be sought among the Caucasic family, with which Hurrian shares certain structural features.

The Hurrians flourished from the middle of the third to the end of the second millennium B.C. Their greatest political accomplishment was the Mitanni Empire, with its center in the Middle Euphrates Valley, in the vicinity of Harran (biblical Haran). At its height, ca. the middle of the second millennium, Mitanni dominated Assyria, apart from extending to Arrapkha and Nuzi in the E and Alalakh in the W. But the cultural role of the Hurrians outstripped by far their political authority, both in time and in space. They were sufficiently important at Mari, in the Hammurabi period, to have religious compositions in their own language included in the local archives. Hurrian texts of a few centuries later have been found at Boghazköy, as has already been indicated, and also in UGARIT, where the material comprises not only unilingual compositions but also a short Sumero-Hurrian vocabulary and a brief Akkado-Hurrian bilingual. The Amarna Letters, furthermore, contain numerous Hurrian technical terms and glosses, aside from the long Mitanni letter of Tushratta, which was composed in classical Hurrian.

Having borrowed extensively from Mesopotamian culture, back in the third millennium, the Hurrians were that much better equipped to serve as teachers to their Hittite neighbors in regard to writing, literature, law, religion, and art; small wonder that the Hittite vocabulary teems with Hurrian loan words. Although deeply indebted to Mesopotamia, the Hurrians have left ample evidence of their independent cultural achievements, notably in the fields of art, literature, and social practices.

2. In the Bible. Because of greater distance from their main centers, the Hurrians were much less influential in Palestine than in Syria and Anatolia. Nevertheless, their impact on the Israelites was far from negligible. This can be traced to two separate points of contact. One was in Central Mesopotamia: since the home of the patriarchs was in the Haran region, which was also the center of Hurrian authority, the Hebrew forefathers were exposed there directly to Hurrian influence (see NUZI). The other was in Canaan: as an important component of the pre-Israelite population, the Hurrians were bound to leave some mark on the Israelite settlers.

One unexpected trace of the presence of Hurrians in Canaan is linguistic. In common with Phoenician and Aramaic, Hebrew changes its stops b g d k p t, when they are undoubled and postvocalic, to corresponding spirants (transliterated as bh gh dh kh ph th herein). Such a pattern is foreign to Semitic, but indigenous to Hurrian. Since spirantization occurs precisely where Semitic and Hurrian were in intimate contact, but is absent elsewhere, and since the process can now be synchronized with the period of maximum Hurrian expansion, it is apparent that the practice was copied by West Semitic from Hurrian.

The presence of Hurrians in Palestine proper is witnessed independently by cuneiform sources. In the Amarna Letters (fourteenth century B.C.) the ruler of Jerusalem, which was then a Jebusite center, bears a name meaning "Servant of Ḥepa." The first word is represented by a logogram (originally a picture sign), so that its actual form is still uncertain. The rest, however, stands for the Hurrian mother-goddess, thus testifying to the Hurrian background of the Jebusites. This conclusion is supported by the Jebusite name in II Sam. 24:16, where the consonantal text gives 'wrnh (traditionally Araunah), which can now be explained as a form of Hurrian ewri, "lord." There is, further, the evidence of the cuneiform tablets from Tell Ta'annek (biblical Taanach), dating from the middle of the second millennium B.C., which contain a large proportion of Hurrian personal names. Moreover, a contemporary tablet from Shechem also lists names that may well be Hurrian. It is thus clear that in the patriarchal age Hurrians were settled in Central Palestine in considerable numbers.

The Bible does not fail to reflect these conditions. The pertinent references, however, are to be found under other ethnic headings. One such term, as has just been indicated, is "Jebusite." Another, more widely used, one is "Hivite." Gen. 34:2 connects Hamor the Hivite directly with Shechem. Gibeon, which was situated a short distance to the N of Jerusalem, was a Hivite center (Josh. 9:7; 11:19). And Hivite settlements are recorded for Mount Lebanon (Judg. 3:3) and Hermon (Josh. 11:3), districts otherwise known for their Hurrian connections. It follows, therefore, that the term "Hivites" somehow came to refer to Hurrians. This equation is confirmed by indirect textual evidence. In one instance the MT interchanges "Hivites" (Gen. 36:2) with "Horites" or "Hurrians" (36:20). The LXX substitutes χορραῖοι for the MT חוי in Gen. 36:2; Josh. 9:7, the Greek form still retaining the double "r" sound of Ḫurri; and conversely, the LXX Ευαῖοι at Isa. 17:9 points to an original MT חרי, "Horite," for the present חרש (see RSV text and mg.; see HORITES § 2). The term "Hivites," then, was apparently a local name for Hurrians—another such being "Jebusites" —which gradually replaced "Horites," perhaps in order to avoid confusion with the unrelated namesakes in Seir.

In the light of the foregoing evidence, we are now in a much better position to appreciate the Shechemite agitation against Abimelech, of which a vivid account is given in Judg. 9. Abimelech had usurped the throne at Shechem by first trading on his blood ties with the Shechemites through his mother's line. It was a dangerous argument, for eventually his opponents turned it against him by reminding the citizenry that their ruler was the son of the Israelite Jerubbaal; and in so doing, they harped on the fact that true Shechemites were descendants of Hamor (vs. 28). Now Hamor is identified in Gen. 36:2 as a "Hivite" (MT), which the LXX equates with "Horite." What is more, the main point of that chapter is that the Hamorites were uncircumcised, which in Canaan would be tantamount to non-Semitic. The bitterness of the war against Abimelech can scarcely be ascribed to political or clannish differences alone. The whole issue, however, gains immeasurably in sharpness and importance when it is viewed as a symptom of the deeper cleavage between the heterogeneous societies of Hurrians and Israelites. Thus the course of cultural co-operation between the two communities was not uniformly smooth or constructive.

In summary, there is more Hurrian matter in the Bible than is generally realized. Further research is bound to add to what is already known on the subject.

Bibliography. On the people and their culture: E. A. Speiser, "Ethnic Movements in the Near East in the Second Millennium B.C.," AASOR, XIII (1933), 13-54; A. Götze, Hethiter, Churriter und Assyrer (1936); I. J. Gelb, Hurrians and Subarians

(1944); E. A. Speiser, "Hurrians and Subarians," JAOS, LXVIII (1948), 1-13.

On the language: E. A. Speiser, "Introduction to Hurrian," AASOR, vol. XX (1941).

On Hurrians (Horites) in Palestine: E. Meyer, Die Israeliten und deren Nachbarstämme (1906), pp. 328-44; W. F. Albright, "A Teacher to a Man of Shechem About 1400 B.C.," BASOR, LXXXVI (1942), 28-31; "A Prince of Taanach in the Fifteenth Century B.C.," BASOR, XCIV (1944), 12-27; B. Landsberger, Journal of Cuneiform Studies, LVIII (1954), 59.

E. A. SPEISER

HURRICANE. The translation of סופה in Ps. 83:15—H 83:16 (elsewhere STORM; WHIRLWIND).

HUS hŭs. Douay Version form of Uz.

HUSBAND AND WIFE. See FAMILY; MARRIAGE.

HUSBANDRY. The tilling of the soil. This term, along with "husbandman," is used in the KJV but is not employed in the recent translations. אכר is translated in the RSV by such words as "plowman" (Isa. 61:5), "farmer" (II Chr. 26:10; Jer. 14:4; 31:24; 51:23; Amos 5:16), and "tiller of the soil" (Joel 1:11). Such phrases as איש האדמה (Gen. 9:20) and איש־עבד אדמה are now translated "tiller of the soil." In I Cor. 3:9, γεώργιον has become "field." In other NT passages the KJV "husbandman" has become "householder," since originally "husbandman" meant "master of the house." See AGRICULTURE.

H. N. RICHARDSON

HUSHAH hōōsh'ə [חושה, haste(?)]; HUSHATHITE —thīt. A village in Judah's hill country (I Chr. 4:4); the home of one of David's Mighty Men (II Sam. 23:27; cf. II Sam. 21:18; I Chr. 27:11). It is identified with Husan, SW of Bethlehem.

HUSHAI hōōsh'ī [חושי]. An Archite who served the exiled David as a spy in Jerusalem during the rebellion of Absalom. Deeply aggrieved, with coat rent and earth upon his head, Hushai would have joined the company of David at the Mount of Olives, whither they had fled from Jerusalem when its capitulation to Absalom appeared imminent (II Sam. 15:32). At the instance of the king, however, he returned to the capital and was received as a royal adviser by the unsuspecting Absalom (16:15-19). The plan of AHITHOPHEL to attack the forces of David without delay was successfully opposed by Hushai, who thus gave David time to escape beyond the Jordan (17:5 ff). The espionage of Hushai at the court of Absalom was supported by the priests Abiathar and Zadok, each of whose sons acted as couriers to David (vss. 15 ff). Absalom's discovery of this treasonable activity and the subsequent silence of the narrative concerning Hushai suggest an ominous end of the "friend of David." This title appears to be equivalent to the office of the "king's friend" (I Chr. 27:33; cf. II Sam. 15:32 LXX; 15:37; 16:16; I Kings 4:5), which Hushai held under David.

He is probably to be identified with the father of BAANA (2), one of the prefects of Solomon (I Kings 4:16).

E. R. DALGLISH

HUSHAM hōōsh'əm [חושם, חשם; LXX 'Ασόμ] (Gen. 36:34-35; I Chr. 1:45-46). A Temanite, third king in Edom "before any king reigned over the Israelites."

HUSHATHITE. See HUSHAH.

HUSHIM hōōsh'ĭm [חושים, חשים, חשם]. 1. Son of Dan (Gen. 46:23). The name occurs in Num. 26:42 as Shuham, by an interchange of consonants.

2. Son of Aher, a Benjaminite (I Chr. 7:12; text uncertain).

3. A wife of Shaharaim, a Benjaminite, and the mother of Abitub and Elpaal (I Chr. 8:8, 11; text uncertain).

L. HICKS

HUSK. KJV translation of זג (Num. 6:4; RSV SKINS); צקלן (II Kings 4:42; RSV SACK); κεράτιον (Luke 15:16; RSV POD).

HUT. The translation of מלונה (from לון, לין, "to lodge, pass the night") in Isa. 24:20 (KJV COTTAGE). In the catastrophic outburst of terror which the author envisions, the earth itself "sways like a hut." The same Hebrew noun occurs elsewhere only in Isa. 1:8 (LODGE).

E. M. GOOD

HUZ. KJV form of Uz.

HUZZAB hŭz'əb. KJV translation of חצב (Nah. 2:7), an obscure word translated "its mistress" (i.e., the palace') by the RSV. Alternative suggestions include: (a) Nineveh, the Assyrian queen (thus Targ.), or a goddess (these take the word as a noun with cryptic denotation); (b) if it is a verb, a passive form of נצב, "be established" or possibly "be decreed" (the LXX apparently presupposes this root and translates "the foundation"; but this could hardly be the subject of the following verbs in vs. 7), or a passive of יצא, "be brought forth." All nouns proposed are guesses, while any verb would leave the sentence without a proper subject ("palace" in vs. 6 is masculine and so does not fit the feminine verbs in vs. 7).

J. M. WARD

HYDASPES hī dăs'pēz ['Υδάσπης] (Jth. 1:6). A river in the Elymais. The Vulg. reads Jadason, the Syr. Ulay (cf. Dan. 8:2). This river cannot be identical with the Hydaspes (=Vitasta) in the Punjab. The Greek might be corrupt for the Χοάσπις, now the Kerhah, which flows into the delta at the mouth of the Euphrates and Tigris.

P. WINTER

HYENA [אי (KJV WILD BEAST OF THE ISLAND[S]), cf. Arab. 'ibn āwī, jackal, fox; צבעים, proper name ZEBOIM, lit. hyenas (singular צבוע or צבע); cf. Arab. ḍabu'; Syr. 'aph'ā]. Any of certain stockily built carnivorous mammals of the genus Hyaena, placed zoologically between the cats (Felidae) and the dogs (Canidae). Usually feeding on carrion, the hyena is regarded as cowardly and cruel. Its cry is a disagreeable, unearthly sound. Tristram described the striped hyena (Hyaena striata) as being, in the nineteenth century, the commonest of the beasts of prey in Palestine, next to the jackal (NHB 107-9). If this situation obtained in the biblical period, it is strange that the Bible does not contain more allusions to this animal. As matters stand, hyenas have furnished the place name Zeboim (cf. the proper name Zibeon in Gen. 36:2, etc.). Whether ʾR, cited above, means "hyena" in Isa. 13:22; 34:14; Jer. 50: 39 is uncertain; it is at least an animal occupying deserted human habitations. W. S. McCULLOUGH

*HYKSOS hĭk'sŏs. A term applied originally by the priest-historian Manetho (ca. 280 B.C.) to the rulers of Egypt assigned to the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Dynasties, but extended by modern scholars to designate the ethnically composite group which dominated Egypt and most of the Syro-Palestinian area during MB II (ca. 1800-1550 B.C.).

It is generally agreed that Manetho's translation of the word "Hyksos" as "shepherd kings" is only partially correct, and that the word is simply a rendering of Egyptian ḥqꜣw ḫꜣswt, "rulers of foreign countries." The beginnings of Hyksos control in Egypt are obscure, owing to the paucity of written sources from the period, but it appears that their invasion of the Nile Valley from the NE took place during the period of anarchy and political dissolution which followed the powerful Twelfth Dynasty (ca. 1991-1792 B.C.), and that the first Hyksos dynasty—the Fifteenth, according to traditional Egyptian accounts—was established in the Delta with its capital at Avaris ca. 1730 B.C. It apparently supplanted the Fourteenth Dynasty, then centered at Khois in the Delta, and was concurrent with the latter half of the Thirteenth Dynasty at Thebes in Upper Egypt. It is probable that the ruling powers at Thebes were vassals to the Hyksos domination during the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Dynasties in the N, but there is no clear evidence that the Hyksos actually controlled the territory of Thebes and the country to the S.

Growing dissatisfaction with the foreign domination of the N led to positive action on the part of Kamose, the last Egyptian ruler of the Seventeenth Dynasty at Thebes. While details of his campaign against the Hyksos are lacking, one may assume that he succeeded in driving them from Middle Egypt and confined them to the Delta region. The expulsion of the Hyksos from Egypt was accomplished by Ahmose (ca. 1570-1545 B.C.), the first ruler of the Eighteenth Dynasty. His campaigns against the Hyksos resulted finally in the destruction of their capital at Avaris, after which the king pursued them to S Palestine and besieged them at Sharuhen (Tell el-Far'ah) for three years.

It is certain from both archaeological and philological evidence that the Hyksos were not an ethnic unity. Because the Hyksos in Egypt adopted the language of that country, the linguistic evidence for affiliations with other ethnic groups consists primarily of personal names. Among these, only Semitic has been identified with certainty, but other considerations make it more than probable that both Hurrian and Indo-European elements were also present. These conclusions appear all the more certain when the Hyksos migration is viewed in the light of the general ethnic movements during the first half of the second millennium B.C. in which Hurrian and Indo-European peoples gained domination over much of the Near East.

The archaeological remains of Hyksos sites in Palestine are characterized by large fortifications of beaten earth with a sloping revetment and a surrounding moat; examples occur at Tell Beit Mirsim, OT Jericho, and Hazor. Also associated with the invasion of the Hyksos are the use of horse-and-chariot in warfare, which the Egyptians were quick to adopt, a more common use of bronze and the concomitant superiority in weapons, and special skills in numerous crafts such as metallurgy and jewelry.

Bibliography. R. M. Engberg, The Hyksos Reconsidered (1939); A. Alt, Die Herkunft der Hyksos in neuer Sicht (Berichte über die Verhandlungen der sächsischen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Leipzig; 1954). T. O. LAMBDIN HYMENAEUS hī'mə nē'əs [Ὑμέναιος, hymeneal, or pertaining to marriage]. Mentioned with Alexander in I Tim. 1:20 and with Philetus in II Tim. 2: 17 as a Christian (of Ephesus[?]; cf. I Tim. 1:3) who taught false doctrine.

In I Tim. 1:19, Hymenaeus is said to have rejected his conscience—probably in rejecting right beliefs—and to have "made shipwreck of [his] faith." "Paul" had therefore delivered him and Alexander to Satan (cf. I Cor. 5:5)—i.e., he had put them out of the church, making them ipso facto subject to the powers of evil. The hope was that as a result of excommunication Hymenaeus and Alexander would "learn not to blaspheme" (I Tim. 1:20) and not to misrepresent the truth. Here, as in the Corinthians passage; deliverance to Satan was intended to be ultimately beneficial.

In II Tim. 2:16, Timothy is told to avoid the (Gnostic?) "profane jargon" (Moffatt) used by men like Hymenaeus and Philetus, which was undermining the faith of some believers. Hymenaeus denied the resurrection of the body by affirming that "the resurrection [was] past already" (vs. 18). Just when and in what way Hymenaeus believed the resurrection had already happened in the lives of believers is not said; but the probability is that he taught that the resurrection took place at baptism. His view may have stemmed from a misunderstanding of Rom. 6:1-11; Col. 3:1 (cf. John 17:3) and was probably related to a similar notion referred to in the Church Fathers. E.g., Irenaeus tells of Menander, who taught that his disciples "obtain the resurrection by being baptized into him, and are no more able to die, but remain youthful and immortal" (Iren. Her. I.23.5; cf. also Tert. On the Soul 50; Just. Apol. I.26). Closely related is the view that the resurrection takes place when one becomes acquainted with the truth, the truth often believed to be communicated at baptism. E.g., Simon and Carpocrates denied the possibility of the resurrection of the body but held that the resurrection from the dead was simply an acquaintance with the truth which they taught (Iren. Her. II.31.2; cf. Tert. On the Resurrection of the Flesh XIX). A less likely possibility is that Hymenaeus taught that the resurrection takes place in one's children (cf. Acts of Paul 2:14; Ecclus. 30:4).

B. H. THROCKMORTON, JR.

HYMNS. The earliest Christians received from Judaism the use of psalms and religious songs both in public, liturgical cult and in private, informal devotions. The production of psalms among the Jews did not abate with the editorial completion of the canonical Psalter, but continued uninterrupted. One may note the psalms contained in the Apoc., notably the SONG OF THE THREE YOUNG MEN and Prayer of Manasseh (see MANASSEH, PRAYER OF), the Pharisaic collection of eighteen PSALMS OF SOLOMON from the middle of the first century B.C., and the "Psalms of Thanksgiving" found in the MSS of the Qumran sect of Essenes (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS). In this same tradition of psalmody, inspired by the religious poetry of the OT, must be placed the cento of Rom. 3:13-18, the hymn of Rev. 15:3-4, and the messianic psalms of Palestinian Jewish Christianity preserved in the narratives of Luke 1–2: the Gloria in Excelsis; MAGNIFICAT; BENEDICTUS; and NUNC DIMITTIS.

The "hymn" sung by Jesus with the Twelve at the conclusion of the Last Supper (Mark 14:26; Matt. 26:30) was probably the Hallel, or Pss. 113–18, particularly associated with the celebration of the chief Jewish festivals. The church's adoption of the OT psalms in its own worship was inevitable, if only for the reason that Jesus used them, as did all devout Jews, in his own devotions, and that he viewed them as a prophecy of himself (cf. especially Mark 12:10-11, 35-37, and parallels; Luke 24:44). Indeed, there is greater evidence for the use of the Psalter by the church in the first two centuries as a prophetic book than as a liturgical hymnal. Of an estimated 287 quotations of the OT contained in the NT writings, 116 are from the Psalter.

References to song in the church's worship of NT times are abundant (Acts 2:47; I Cor. 14:15, 26; Eph. 5:19; Col. 3:16; Jas. 5:13), but they are so general in character that one cannot say that it was drawn exclusively from the canonical Psalter. The same is true of the hymns sung as personal devotions by Paul and Silas in the jail at Philippi (Acts 16:25). The evidence of Col. 3:16 (parallel in Eph. 5:19) suggests a variety of types of religious songs. Attempts of commentators to distinguish "psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs" as referring to OT psalms and Christian compositions of both a formal and a spontaneous nature are suggestive; but the classification cannot be rigidly applied. The NT does contain, however, a few fragments of early Christian hymnody, in addition to the psalms of Luke 1–2; and these give us some idea of its richness and variety. A baptismal hymn is probably cited in Eph. 5:14, a creedal or confessional type in I Tim. 3:16. Hymns of a doxology character are to be found in I Tim. 6:15-16, and notably in Rev. 4:8, 11; 5:9, 12-13; 7:10, 12; 11:15; 19:1-2, 6-8. The inspiration of these doxologies was most likely the similar acclamations of praise in use in the Greek-speaking synagogues of the Jewish Dispersion. Several other NT passages have been held by some critics to be based on hymns: the Prologue of John's Gospel; the Pauline christological summaries in Phil. 2:6-11; Col. 1:15-20, and the cento of OT texts in Rom. 9:33; I Pet. 2:6-7. Hymnal forms, such as these, were valuable for evangelistic and didactic purposes no less than for worship.

The production of Christian hymns accumulated during the second century, although only one collection has come down to us—the forty-two baptismal hymns of the Syrian church known as the Odes of Solomon, in the parallel verse form of the canonical Psalter. Especially favored were hymns in honor of Christ, in the style of the Greek metrical ode, such as the hymn "Bridle of Untamed Colts," appended to Clement of Alexandria's Instructor—a hymn still used in modern church hymnals (see also Euseb. Hist. V.28.4). The "hymn [carmen] to Christ as to a god," referred to by Pliny the Younger (Letters X.97), has been variously interpreted: as a hymn, antiphonal psalmody, litany, or ritual formula such as the baptismal promises and creed. The Gnostics and other heretical groups made much use of metrical hymns, finding them, no doubt, an effective medium for the propaganda of their peculiar theological views. Their success may be measured by the reaction in orthodox circles, about the turn of the third century, against the use in the liturgy of all nonbiblical psalms and hymns. It was not until the middle of the fourth century that Christian hymnody once more blossomed in the church's worship. However, in private devotion and informal gatherings, such as the AGAPE, Christians continued to find an outlet for singing "new songs."

Bibliography. J. B. Lightfoot, St. Paul's Epistles to the Colossians and Philemon (rev. ed., 1892), pp. 222-23. J. Kroll, Die christliche Hymnodik bis zu Clemens von Alexandreia (1921); "Die Hymnendichtung des frühen Christentums," Die Antike, II (1926), 258-81. E. G. Selwyn, The First Epistle of St. Peter (1949), pp. 273-77. J. Quasten, "Carmen," Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum, II (1954), 905-8.

M. H. SHEPHERD, JR.

HYPOCRISY, HYPOCRITE [ὑπόκρισις, ὑποκριτής]. Originally, in the context of Greek drama, the act of playing a part and the one who plays a part. The terms were also used metaphorically to signify the action of feigning to be what one is not. In English only the metaphorical meaning remained, with the prevailing signification of the simulation of goodness. This context of meaning which originated from the Greek drama has no place in OT thought and hence no comparable Hebrew terms. The RSV reflects this fact by eliminating the words "hypocrisy" and "hypocrite" from their translations of the OT, whereas the KJV used them.

1. OT meaning. The Hebrew root frequently translated "hyprocrisy" or "hypocrite" in earlier versions is חנף. The RSV regularly translates the Hebrew by the English "godless" (Job 8:13; 15:34; Isa. 33:14; etc.) where the KJV has "hypocrite." We can gain an understanding of the meaning of the Hebrew root חנף from those passages where a synonym is conjoined in familiar parallelism. Most common synonyms are מרע, "evildoer" (Isa. 9:17); חטאים, "sinners" (Isa. 33:14); רשעים, "wicked" (Job 20:5). In some passages light is shed on the meaning by the use of an antithetical Hebrew word placed in parallelism, such as צדיקים, "righteous," in Prov. 11:9.

The terms most frequently used by the LXX to translate the root חנף are ἄνομος and πονηρός (Isa. 9:17; "godless," "wicked"); ἀσεβής (Isa. 33:14; "godless," "impious"). The verb form of the Hebrew occurs numerous times meaning "pollute" or "corrupt" (Num. 35:33; Ps. 106:38; Isa. 24:5; Jer. 3:1). From this it can be seen that the Hebrew root חנף means radical opposition to God and the wickedness of the one so opposed. This stands in sharp contrast with English "hypocrisy," meaning basically "pretense" and "simulation of goodness." In two passages of Theod.'s translation of Job (34:30; 36:13), later incorporated into the LXX, the Hebrew חנף is translated by Greek ὑποκριτής. This, in addition to similar occurrences in Aq. and Symm., seems to imply that Greek-speaking Jews had come to understand ὑπόκρισις in other than its normal Greek metaphorical meaning of "pretending to be what one is not."

2. In the NT. This background in the OT and Hebrew is very significant for interpreting the words ὑπόκρισις and ὑποκριτής in the NT, especially in the words of Jesus. The Greek meaning was as alien to Aramaic as to Hebrew. It is unlikely that Jesus in the many passages where he is reported to have attacked the Pharisees as "hypocrites" was attacking them for simulating goodness. This is substantiated by the several instances in the Synoptic gospels where in the same saying we have alternate readings. E.g., the reading "their hypocrisy" in Mark 12:15 becomes "their malice" (πονηρίαν) in Matt. 22:18 and "their craftiness" (πανουργίαν) in Luke 20:23. The words "the hypocrites" in Matt. 24:51 alternate with "the unfaithful" (ἀπίστων) in Luke 12:46. Jesus does not attack the Pharisees for insincerity in feigning goodness, though they knew they were evil. On the contrary, it is because they are so self-righteously convinced of their goodness that he castigates them. Their blindness sets them in opposition to God. They not only lock men out of the kingdom of God (Matt. 23:13) but also make them children of Gehenna (vs. 15). They are compared to unmarked graves, which by their uncleanness contaminate those who walk upon them (Luke 11:44). This is consistently the field of meaning in the many sayings where Jesus uses the terms "hypocrisy" and "hypocrite" according to the Greek NT.

In the few instances of the terms elsewhere in the NT we find the same meaning. It is the term used by Paul to describe the actions of the Christian Jews, including Peter and Barnabas, at Antioch (Gal. 2: 14). The term "insincerely" does not do full justice to the phrase ἐν ὑποκρίσει. Paul is condemning their irresponsible breach of good faith in renouncing an original agreement, not their pretense (see also I Tim. 4:2; I Pet. 2:1). The only passage in the NT which clearly retains the original Greek meaning is the verb form used in Luke 20:20, where the scribes and high priests send spies who "pretended to be sincere" (ὑποκρινομένους). In view of the Gentile background of the author of Luke, this is not surprising. With this one exception the occurrences of "hypocrisy" and "hypocrite" in the NT must be understood against the background of the peculiar development of meaning in Jewish thought and the OT.

Bibliography. E. Hatch, Essays in Biblical Greek (1889), pp. 91-93. D. Matheson, " 'Actors' Christ's Word of Scorn," ET, XLI (April, 1930), 333-34. L. H. Marshall, The Challenge of NT Ethics (1947), pp. 60-62. F. W. YOUNG

HYRCANUS hûr kā'nəs ['Υρκανός, perhaps from Hyrcania, to which many Jews had been transported] (II Macc. 3:11); KJV HIRCANUS. A man who, for some reason or other, had a great deal of money deposited in the temple about the time of the visit of the notorious HELIODORUS. He was of high rank, and the son of TOBIAS (1). Fig. HYR 37.

Courtesy of the Trustees of the British Museum

37. Coin of John Hyrcanus (135-104 B.C.)

For the more important John Hyrcanus and Hyrcanus II, see HASMONEANS §§ 3*b*,f, 4.

N. TURNER

HYSSOP hĭs'əp [אזוב, 'ēzôbh; ὕσσωπος]. A small, bushy plant, probably the Origanum maru L., the Syrian marjoram (called in Arabic ṣa'tar). For centuries arguments have raged over the identification of אזוב, largely because of the occurrence of ὕσσωπος in John 19:29. The eleven other occurrences of "hyssop" offer little difficulty of identification, though the meaning of the Greek is not fully established. It was clearly not the Southern European hyssop, Hyssopus officinalis L., characterized by its blue flowers, which is not native to the Holy Land.

The use of a "bunch of hyssop" as a brush for daubing the lintels of the Hebrew homes with blood from the sacrificed lamb at the first Passover (Exod. 12:22) seems to have established the tradition for most of the other references. The Levitical laws for the cleansing of LEPROSY (Lev. 14:4, 6, 49, 51-52) and the rite of the RED HEIFER (Num. 19:6, 18) involved the use of אזוב (no reference to a "bunch," however) along with "CEDAR wood" and "SCARLET stuff." In the former laws the hyssop, together with the cedar wood and the scarlet stuff, is dipped in the blood of a sacrificed bird and sprinkled seven times on the person or the house to be cleansed of leprosy. In the latter law the cedar wood, the scarlet stuff, and the hyssop are burned with the sacrificial red heifer.

38. Hyssop

The writer of Kings says of Solomon: "He spoke of trees, from the cedar . . . to the hyssop that grows out of the wall" (I Kings 4:33—H 5:13). Here the expression means all flora, from the greatest of trees to the most humble shrub. In the familiar penitential psalm attributed to David, the king refers to the symbolic use of hyssop in the cleansing ceremony ("Purge me with hyssop"; Ps. 51:7—H 51:9).

Heb. 9:19 refers to Moses' reading of the Old Covenant at Sinai (Exod. 24:6-8) and sealing it by sprinkling blood and water over the book and the people with "scarlet wool and hyssop." The OT passage, however, makes no reference to hyssop in this case.

Hyssop was used to administer vinegar to Jesus on the cross, according to John 19:29, while Matt. 27:48; Mark 15:36 mention a REED. Since hyssop seems inconsistent with this scene, some scholars consider ὕσσωπος here to refer to the Sorghum vulgare L. as the "reed" used. Others emend ὑσσώπῳ περιθέντες to ὑσσῷ προπεριθέντες, reading: "They put . . . on a pike" (Amer. Trans.). Could it be that the variation from the Synoptics was intentional, and that John used ὕσσωπος with a symbolic meaning? Hyssop formed an integral part of OT redemptive theology. Another suggestion is that hyssop and the sponge were put on a reed (not mentioned), thus adding the cooling effect of the hyssop leaves, for which they are noted.

See also CLEAN; CRUCIFIXION; FLORA § A9*j*.

Fig. HYS 38.

Bibliography. I. Löw, Die Flora der Juden, II (1924), 72-73, 84-101; L. Baldensperger and G. M. Crowfoot, "Hyssop," PEQ, 63 (1931), 89-98; E. J. Goodspeed, Problems of NT Translation (1945), pp. 115-16; H. N. and A. L. Moldenke, Plants of the Bible (1952), pp. 160-62. J. C. TREVER

I AM [אהיה] (Exod. 3:14). The formula which gives an opaque explanation of the meaning of the sacred name Yahweh (יהוה). In its full form, "I am that [or what] I am" or perhaps "I cause to be what is," it represents a wordplay on the root of the word "Yahweh," "to be, to come to pass." It has been suggested that the "I am" sayings of the Fourth Gospel (John 6:35; 14:6; etc.) echo the Exodus passage. See GOD, NAMES OF, § B3. B. W. ANDERSON

IBEX [דישן, cf. דוש, to tread; Akkad. dašśu, buck of gazelle] (Deut. 14:5); KJV PYGARG. A species of WILD GOAT. The wild goat of the OT is generally thought to be the ibex, but the meaning of דישון is not known, although the antelope has been suggested. See also FAUNA § A2*f*iii. W. S. MCCULLOUGH

IBHAR ĭb'här [יבחר, he (El or Yahweh) chooses]. One of the sons of David who were born at Jerusalem. His mother is given the status of a wife, and not a concubine (II Sam. 5:15; I Chr. 3:6; 14:5).

IBIS ī'bĭs [ינשוף] (Lev. 11:17); KJV GREAT OWL. A wading bird (of the family Threskiornithidae) found on the margins of rivers and lakes. It was not in Palestine in the nineteenth century, although it may have been there in the biblical period. It is doubtful if ינשוף means "ibis"; the RSV follows the LXX and the Vulg. in this translation in Lev. 11:17 but uses "GREAT OWL" in Deut. 14:16.

The ibis was a well-known bird in ancient Egypt (Threskiornis aethiopica aethiopica), where it was sacred to the god Thot(h). Its association with Egyptian religion, and its consumption of mollusks, crustaceans, etc., would undoubtedly have made it unacceptable as food to the Hebrews. W. S. MCCULLOUGH

IBLEAM ĭb'lĭ əm [יבלעם]. A city in the territory of Issachar listed among the cities in Issachar and Asher which were given to Manasseh, and from which the Manassites were not able to drive out the Canaanites (Josh. 17:11-12; Judg. 1:27). Ibleam is mentioned in a list of cities conquered by Thut-mose III, who claims to have brought it, with many other Palestinian cities, under his control (during the fifteenth century B.C.). Ibleam probably was not conquered by the Israelites until the time of David.

It is reasonably certain that Ibleam was one of the LEVITICAL CITIES and that it is identical with BILEAM (I Chr. 6:70—H 6:55; some MSS of the LXX read "Ibleam" [Ιεβλααμ]). The LXX of Josh. 21:25 also lists Ibleam as one of the cities allotted to the Levites. Probably the Hebrew text of this verse does not mention Ibleam, because "Gath-rimmon," which is in Dan, not in Manasseh, was copied by mistake from the preceding verse.

Ahaziah king of Judah was wounded by Jehu's soldiers at Ibleam near the ascent of GUR (II Kings 9:27). Most modern English translations of II Kings 15:10 read "Ibleam" on the basis of one Greek MS which has Ιεβλααμ where the Hebrew reads "before the people" (קבל עם). If this is correct, Zechariah king of Israel was assassinated at Ibleam by Shallum.

Ibleam has been identified with modern Bel'ameh near Jenin. W. L. REED

IBNEIAH ĭb nē'yə [יבניה, Yahu builds up] (I Chr. 9:8). A Benjaminite who returned from exile in Babylon.

IBNIJAH ĭb nī'jə [יבניה, may Yahu build up (i.e., grant posterity)]. A Benjaminite (I Chr. 9:8*b*); possibly the same as Ibneiah (9:8*a*).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 212; F. S. Brown, S. R. Driver, and C. A. Briggs, eds., Hebrew-English Lexicon of the OT (1955), p. 125. B. T. DAHLBERG

IBRI ĭb'rī [עברי, a Hebrew, but perhaps corrupted from עבדי, servant] (I Chr. 24:27). A Merarite Levite, contemporary of David.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 252; cf. pp. 38, 137.

IBSAM ĭb'săm [יבשם, fragrance of balsam] (I Chr. 7:2); KJV JIBSAM jĭb'—. A man of the tribe of Issachar.

IBZAN ĭb'zăn [אבצן, swift; Arab. 'abūṣun, swift (horse)] (Judg. 12:8-10). A so-called minor judge whose thirty sons and thirty daughters were married to persons outside his clan.

In the stories of the judges Ibzan appears next after Jephthah. The site of his seven-year career, and presumably the location of his tomb, is given simply as Bethlehem. Early commentators beginning with Josephus assumed this to be the famous Bethlehem of Judah. Therefore Ibzan was traditionally understood to be Boaz, husband of Ruth and ancestor of David. More likely the city was the site of modern Bet Laḥm, on the border of Zebulun and Asher, ca. ten miles N of Megiddo and seven miles W-NW of Nazareth. If, as seems likely, the various judges were understood as representing their respective tribes, since the next-mentioned judge, Elon, was a Zebulunite, Ibzan was probably regarded as the judge representing the tribe of Asher.

The mention of his large family, whose numbers are exceeded only by Gideon and Abdon, indicates his wealth. The reference to his children's extra-clan marriages indicates his wide influence and high esteem outside his own immediate circle.

The name Ibzan is mentioned nowhere else and does not seem to be related to the place name Ebez (Josh. 19:20). As so few details of his career are given, some commentators consider Ibzan to be a late editor's unhistorical invention to fill chronological space between Jephthah and Samson (so also Elon and Abdon). Others consider that on these minor judges—including, before Jephthah, Tola and Jair—what is given is authentic information, based on official records, about persons who occupied the central office in Israelite society before the rise of the monarchy.

See also JUDGE; JUDGES, BOOK OF, § E1.

Bibliography. G. F. Moore, Judges, ICC (1895), pp. 310, 312; C. F. Burney, Judges (1930), pp. 289-90, 334; M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 226; History of Israel (1958), pp. 99-102. C. F. KRAFT

ICE. See SNOW; PALESTINE, CLIMATE OF.

ICHABOD ĭk′ə bŏd [אִי־כָבוֹד, where is the glory? or inglorious (ἀδοξία; Jos. Antiq. V.xi.4) or alas the glory (LXX Οὐαὶ Βαρχαβωδ)]. Son of Phinehas. He received his name from the great catastrophe which befell Israel at the time of his birth—the capture by the Philistines of the ark, which was Israel's "glory," the source of her worth and greatness. Stunned by news of this disaster and by the death of both her husband and her father-in-law (Eli), Ichabod's mother died after giving him birth (I Sam. 4:19-21).

For the relationship of Ichabod to Ahijah (I Sam. 14:3), see ELI. R. W. CORNEY

ICONIUM ī kō′nĭ əm [Ἰκονιόν, Εἰκονιόν] (Acts 13-16; II Tim. 3:11). A city in S central Asia Minor visited by Paul and Barnabas on their first recorded missionary journey; now the Turkish provincial capital Konya.

It was considered the capital of Lycaonia during the Greek and Roman empires. Highways from Syria to Ephesus and Rome went through Iconium, and this made it a place of vast trade. With its beautiful plains, made productive by the streams from the Pisidian Mountains, it was a center of grain and fruits, known especially for its plum and apricot orchards and its fields of wheat and flax. An old proverb said, "See all the world; but see Konia [Iconium]," for it was considered one of the most beautiful and fertile sites in the world. Iconium became a large and wealthy city in later Roman and Byzantine times, a metropolis with its seat for the archbishop.

Xenophon in the fourth century B.C. (Anabasis I.2.19) is the first historian to mention Iconium, when he tells of Cyrus' travels to the E and his coming to "Iconium, the last city of Phrygia; thence he pursued his route through Lycaonia." Cicero (ad Familiares XV.55.2), Strabo (Geography XII.6.1), and Pliny (N.H. V.25) speak in their writings of Iconium as a city of Lycaonia. The inhabitants of Iconium regarded themselves as of Phrygian, rather than Lycaonian, extraction, since they used the Phrygian language. In A.D. 163 one at the trial of Justin Martyr referred to himself as a slave from Iconium in Phrygia; and Bishop Firmilian at the Council of Iconium (235) spoke of Iconium as in Phrygia. A legend is related to Stephanus regarding King Annakos of Iconium, after whose death the Deluge destroyed the entire population, who were called Phrygians.

In the third century B.C., Iconium was ruled and largely Hellenized by the Seleucid kings of Syria; but after the Battle of Magnesia in 187 B.C. it was placed under the rule of the king of Pergamum, though he never took possession of it; and by 165 B.C. it was governed by the Galatae. In 129 B.C., Iconium with Galatia came under the government of the Pontic kings. Mark Antony in 39 B.C. gave it to Polamon, but in 36 B.C. he placed it under Antymas, who at that time became king of Galatia. In 25 B.C., at the death of Antymas, Iconium became a part of the province Galatia, and was thus incorporated into the Roman Empire.

In NT times Iconium was considered, along with Antioch (Pisidia), Lystra, and Derbe, as belonging to the Roman province of Galatia. Paul and Barnabas on their first recorded missionary journey proceeded to Iconium after their first visit to Antioch in Pisidia, where they made many Gentile converts; at Iconium they preached to Jews and Gentiles in the synagogue, but left for Lystra and Derbe when both Gentiles and Jews threatened to stone them; the Jews from Iconium and Antioch pursued Paul to Lystra, where they stoned him and dragged him out of the city; in Iconium, as in other cities on his first recorded journey, Paul left elders in the church. Timothy was well spoken of in Iconium; a later reference is made to Paul's persecutions and sufferings at Iconium; the city was the principal setting for the Acts of Paul and Thecla. By the beginning of the Christian era Iconium was completely Hellenized. If the S Galatian theory is correct, then Paul's Letter to the Galatians would have been directed to Iconium, Lystra, Derbe, and Antioch (Pisidia); and I Peter would have been sent to these churches (I Pet. 1:2).

Claudius (41-54) gave Iconium the name Claudiconium, which showed its strong Roman sympathies; and under Hadrian (117-38) it was made a Roman colony. In 235 one of the early church councils was held there. In 295, Diocletian created the province Pisidia, with Iconium as one of its principal cities, Antioch being the capital; but in 372, Iconium became the principal city and capital of the new province Lycaonia. After 660 and the coming of Islam, Iconium was victimized for three centuries by Arab raids, and it fell into the hands of the Arabs in 708, but was never taken by the caliphs. It was included in the Byzantine Empire until the eleventh century, with its prosperity culminating in 1097, when it was made the capital of the Seljuk Empire. After Frederick I (Frederick Barbarossa) captured Iconium in 1190, it remained permanently a Turkish city, with the Christians dwelling six miles to the N in Tsille. Today it is called Konya (also Konia, Koniah), and is the capital of the province Konya in S central Turkey.

See also GALATIA; GALATIANS, LETTER TO THE; PAUL AND THECLA, ACTS OF; PHRYGIA; LYCAONIA.

Bibliography. W. M. Ramsay, The Cities of St. Paul (1908), pp. 317-82; W. M. Calder and J. Keil, eds., Anatolian Studies (1939), pp. xxiv, xxviii-xxix, xxxiii, 60, 67, 69, 103, 225, 234, 238, 395; J. Finegan, Light from the Ancient Past (1946), pp. 260-64. T. S. KEPLER

IDALAH ĭd'ə lə [ידאלה] (Josh. 19:15). A town in Zebulun. It is generally identified with Khirbet el-Hawarah, a site just S of BETHLEHEM 2.

IDBASH ĭd'băsh [ידבש, honey-sweet] (I Chr. 4:3). A man of Judah; son of Etam.

IDDO ĭd'ō [אדו (6 below), perhaps an abbreviated form of אדון, LORD; ידו (2, 8 below), possibly an abbreviated form of ידעיה, Yahu has known; עדא (3 below), עדו (1, 4-5, below), עדוא (7 below), probably abbreviated forms of עדיה, Yahu has adorned]; KJV Apoc. ADDO ăd'ō (I Esd. 6:1); SADDEUS săd'ĭ əs (I Esd. 8:45); DADDEUS dăd'— (I Esd. 8:46); EDES ē'dēz (I Esd. 9:35). 1. A Levite of the clan of Gershom (I Chr. 6:21—H 6:6), who evidently is called Adaiah (עדיה) in vs. 41—H vs. 16.

2. The son of a certain Zechariah, and the man appointed by David as chief over the Manassites in Gilead (I Chr. 27:21).

3. The father of Abinadab, an administrative officer of Solomon in Mahanaim (I Kings 4:14).

4. A seer and prophet cited as an authority for the reigns of Solomon (II Chr. 9:29), Rehoboam (12:15), and Abijah (13:22). In 9:29, Kethibh is יעדי, and Qere is יעדו.

5. The grandfather of the prophet Zechariah (Zech. 1:1, 7). In vs. 7, as well as in Ezra 5:1; 6:14 (cf. I Esd. 6:1), his name is spelled עדוא. He is possibly the same as 7 below.

6. The head of a group of temple servants from Casiphia who provided cultic servants to accompany Ezra in his return to Jerusalem (Ezra 8:17; I Esd. 8:45-46).

7. The head of a family of priests that returned to Jerusalem after the Exile (Neh. 12:4, 16). He is possibly the same as 5 above.

8. One of those compelled by Ezra to give up their foreign wives (I Esd. 9:35). He is called Jaddai in Ezra 10:43. M. NEWMAN

IDLENESS [עצלות, from העצל, be slow, sluggish; ἀτάκτως]. The neglect of proper duties; depending upon the generosity and toil of others. A theme of Hebrew wisdom was that indolence led to poverty and want (Prov. 19:15; Eccl. 10:18; Tob. 4:13). A good wife (Prov. 31:27) "does not eat the bread of idleness"; she will not sit down inactive, eating the bread of those who work. She is always well occupied, supervising all that goes on in her household. She earns her bread (Prov. 31:27; cf. II Thess. 3:8, 10).

Paul reproved the idlers at Thessalonica for walking disorderly (ἀτάκτως, "out of ranks") and not in accordance with the tradition handed down by him (II Thess. 3:6, 8). They were truant from responsibilities, busybodies, meddling in the affairs of the brotherhood, and throwing the burden of their maintenance on hard-working and charitable brethren. Such were no longer to be sustained by the community (vs. 10).

In the Papyri ἀτάκτως means "to play truant from work"—i.e., "absenteeism" (P. Oxy. 275, 725). Among the Thessalonians this condition appears to have been something of long standing and not due simply to the expected Parousia.

Bibliography. J. E. Frame, Thessalonians, ICC (1912), pp. 297-310; W. Neil, The Epistle of Paul to the Thessalonians (1950), p. 124. V. H. KOOY

IDOL. A transliteration of the Greek εἴδωλον, "image."

Specifically the term denotes the image of a god when such is the object of worship, but any material symbol of the supernatural which is the object of worship may be so termed. The latter usage, like the application of the term "idol" to the unworthy object, concrete or abstract, of obsession, is secondary from a linguistic point of view.

In the English version of the OT "idol" is the general translation for a variety of words. Some of these—e.g., סמל (II Chr. 33:7, 15); ציר (Isa. 48:5); גלול (Lev. 26:30; Deut. 29:17; I Kings 15:12; 21:26; II Kings 17:12; 21:11, 21; 23:24; Ezek. 6:4-6, 9; 8:10; 14:3-7; 16:36; 18:6, 12, etc.); פסל (Exod. 20:4; Deut. 4:16, 23, 25; 5:8; II Kings 21:7; Isa. 40:19-20; 42:17; 44:9; 48:5; Nah. 1:14; Hab. 2:18); צלם (Num. 33:52; II Kings 11:18; II Chr. 23:17; Ezek. 7:20; 16:17); and עצבים (I Sam. 31:9; II Sam. 5:21; Pss. 106:36, 38; 115:4; Isa. 10:11; Hos. 4:17; 8:6; Zech. 13:2)—actually mean graven images.

Other images, probably anthropomorphic, with which the Hebrews were familiar were תרפים, "teraphim." These were apparently images of household gods in the patriarchal period (Gen. 31:19, 34-35). Unlike the other words cited, this word does not by its etymology, which is uncertain, suggest idols or graven images; and teraphim were not, like these, representations of alien deities. An etymological connection with Assyrian tarpu, "specter," is possible, in which case teraphim may signify images of dead ancestors or ancient kin-gods; this explanation would be in accord with the store which Laban set on his teraphim which were stolen by Rachel (Gen. 31:19 ff). There is, however, no evidence of the actual worship of these, and in historical times in Israel they were used in divination (Ezek. 21:26; Zech. 10:2). Nevertheless, they are associated with graven or molten images (Judg. 18:14, 17) and with images in the round (II Kings 23:24).

In addition to words signifying actual images sculptured or cast in the round, there are a number of circumlocutions which express Hebrew abomination or contempt for alien gods, and may or may not refer to plastic images of these. Such words are אימה, "an object of terror" (Jer. 50:38); מפלצת, "a cause of trembling" (I Kings 15:13; II Chr. 15:16); שקוץ, "abomination" (II Chr. 15:8); און, "vanity" (Isa. 66: 3); and אליל, ælîl, "a nonentity" (Lev. 19:4; 26:1; I Chr. 16:26; Pss. 96:5; 97:7; Isa. 2:8, 18, 20; 10:10-11; 19:13; 31:7; Hab. 2:18; Zech. 11:17). The last word, cognate with an Arabic root meaning "to annihilate," is very commonly used in the OT and is a wordplay on אל, 'ēl, or אלהים, the generic name for "god." There is a similar wordplay between עצב, "shape," and עצב, "grief," in Isa. 48:5. In certain cases these circumlocutions denote alien gods, which were represented by images; in other cases—e.g., Lev. 19:4; 26:1; I Kings 15:13; II Chr. 15:16; Isa. 2:20; 31:7; 48:5; Jer. 50:38—the context indicates that actual images are denoted.

Aside from the bulls which were a conspicuous feature of the cult sponsored by Jeroboam I at Bethel and Dan (see IDOLATRY), the Israelites would seem to have been familiar with idols of the Canaanite deities Baal, Ashera, and Astarte at least from the time of Solomon, whose liberal proclivities permitted the worship of gods of neighboring peoples by his foreign harem in Jerusalem. The Baal temple built by Ahab at Samaria (I Kings 16:32) doubtless contained an image of the god either sculptured in the round or in relief like the god Resheph and the goddesses Anat and Astarte from the Late Bronze Age sanctuaries at Beth-shan, but this is a matter of conjecture. The nature of the "horrible thing," or "object of trembling," set up to the mother-goddess Ashera by Maacah, the mother of Asa, in Jerusalem (I Kings 15:13) is likewise uncertain, and may or may not have been an anthropomorphic image or, as has been suggested, a phallic emblem. From the account of the reformation of Josiah (II Kings 23) it is apparent that many symbols of Canaanite worship and other pagan cults, like sun worship, had been in use in Jerusalem, and that even in the exilic period the miserable remnants of the Jerusalem community could resort to the use at least of drawings or reliefs of gods and cult animals, if not to actual idols in the ruins of the temple (Ezek. 8:10).

This familiarity on the part of the Hebrews with material representations of local deities is the more intelligible when we consider the limited area of the settled land in Palestine occupied by the Hebrews in OT times and the proximity of Phoenicians, Syrians, and Philistines, to say nothing of the local Canaanites, who did not scruple to use idols. Baal, or Hadad,* the Canaanite god of winter storms and rain, is known from sculpture from Ras Shamra* and from statuettes from the same site and from Megiddo and Lachish in Palestine in the Late Bronze Age as a warrior-god striding forth in a short kilt and brandishing a mace and a thunderbolt as a spear.* His helmet is adorned with the horns of his cult animal, the bull. The Canaanite goddess Anat, the sister of Baal, is known as a warrior-goddess from a Ras Shamra relief, and Astarte is represented regularly in Egyptian reliefs from the Late Bronze Age as a naked female, usually standing upon a lion. From various Palestinian sites of the Late Bronze Age and

Courtesy of James B. Pritchard

1. Storm-god, perhaps Adad, on the back of a bull; from Arslan Tash

Early Iron Age come clay-molded figurines of a naked female with pudenda and breasts emphasized. The coiffure of certain of these suggests that of the Egyptian cow-goddess Hathor, with whom Astarte was often identified, but it is doubtful if these "Astarte plaques," as they are called, were properly objects of worship. Though derived from representations of this fertility-goddess, they may simply have served as amulets to prompt on the principle of imitative magic fertility in communities where progeny was almost an obsession. These figurines have a long history throughout the Near East from the Neolithic period, where highly stylized forms of the female figure appear. Figs. HAD 2; IDO 1; UGA 7, 10-11; UGA 6.

In Palestine and even from Ras Shamra no life-sized idol survives, though the story of the mishap of Dagon at Ashdod (I Sam. 5:1-4) indicates that such anthropomorphic images, either life-sized or colossal, must have been known.

In the period of the Hebrew settlement the story of Micah in the Danite migration (Judg. 17–18) indicates that graven and molten images and other concrete objects such as the ephod were used, presumably in the cult of Yahweh (see IDOLATRY § 3). After the seventh century, however, the worship of Yahweh was divested of all suggestion of images. Thereafter, any use of idols in Israel was introduced ab extra, as in the struggling Jerusalem community in the exilic period (Ezek. 8) and notably in the Seleucid period, when the pagan nature cults were revived in the provinces, and Hellenistic cults, such as that of Olympian Zeus, complete with anthropomorphic image, were set up in the temple in Jerusalem (Dan. 11:31). Such attempts, however, in the interests of political and cultural uniformity, were resolutely opposed by the hard core of Judaism.

In the early Christian community practices connected with idols again became a problem, though in the NT the references to idols (e.g., Acts 7:41; 15:20, 29; 21:25; Rom. 2:22; I Cor. 8:1, 7, 10; 10:28; II Cor. 6:16; I Thess. 1:9; I John 5:21; Rev. 2:14, 20; 9:20) are generally not specifically to images but to the worship of alien gods in which the idol in the Greco-Roman age might signify much or little (see IDOLATRY § 4). In Christian as in Hebrew writings, "idol" or "mere image" is a convenient form of abuse for pagan worship. In I Cor. 8:4; 10:19; 12:2, however, Paul seems to refer to the actual image as having no more than its material significance.

In Rom. 2:22, referring to the Jew's abhorrence of "idols" in the context of the Decalogue, and in the famous definition of the duties of Gentile converts in the eyes of the primitive Hebrew Christian community in Acts 15:20, the term "idols" probably signifies the worship of actual images, though in the last passage (Acts 15:29), in view of the reference to communion feasts in the temples of pagan gods (cf. I Cor. 8:1 ff; Rev. 2:14, 20; see IDOLATRY), it is not clear that "pollutions of idols" means the use of images rather than communion feasts, ritual prostitution—ostensibly as a rite of imitative magic—and other practices associated with the worship of alien gods.

Bibliography. R. Dussaud, Les découvertes de Ras Shamra (Ugarit) et l'AT (1941); J. B. Pritchard, Palestinian Figurines in Relation to Certain Goddesses Known Through Literature (1944); A. G. Barrois, Manuel d'archéologie biblique (1953), pp. 389-98.

J. GRAY

IDOLATRY [εἰδωλολατρία]. Idol-worship; worship of images. Taken literally in the OT, idolatry may signify the worship of alien gods, generally represented by concrete images or idols (see IDOL), or the use of such symbols in the worship of Yahweh. In the NT, where the worship of alien gods is not denoted, the term is used figuratively of undue obsession with any object less than God.

1. Idolatry in alien cults
2. Relation of Israel to alien cults
3. Concrete symbols in Yahwism
4. Idolatry in the NT
Bibliography

1. Idolatry in alien cults. The various gods of Mesopotamia, Canaan, and Egypt were represented in sculpture in the round or in relief as anthropomorphic figures. In Egypt, however, though the chief gods were depicted in human form, most of the numerous deities were depicted also with the chief physical characteristics of animals—e.g., Horus with the head of a falcon,* Anubis with the head of a jackal,* Hathor with the horns of a cow. This theriomorphism is probably the survival of a primitive local totemism, such as is regularly found in primitive societies of Central Africa, with which ancient Egyptian culture had certain fundamental affinities. In Syria and Palestine also documents and sculpture from the latter part of the second millennium and from the first millennium B.C. indicate the association of certain deities with certain animals. Thus in the Ras Shamra Texts the senior god El is termed "the bull" and is represented probably on the sculpture of an unnamed deity with bull's horns. Baal is also depicted as an active warrior in a helmet garnished with the bull's horns. The bull features in the case of El and Baal probably symbolize their procreative powers. Resheph, the god of plague and mass destruction, is represented in Egyptian sculpture from the fourteenth and thirteenth centuries with a helmet and gazelle horns, suggesting probably the desert as the source of untoward influences, such as sirocco winds, locusts, and possibly marauding nomads. The Canaanite fertility-goddess Astarte (biblical ASHTAROTH)* was associated with the lion and in a late Egyptian sculpture from the Ptolemaic period bears the head of a lion. These, however, may be simply cases of the use of images as concrete imagery, a grosser case of the anthropomorphic and vivid figurative language in which even the Hebrews found it necessary to speak of Yahweh. No doubt, such concrete symbols of the gods tended in popular thought to supplant the attributes they symbolized, and it was certainly no part of Hebrew or Christian polemic against such cults to represent them otherwise than in their abuse. Nevertheless, the Canaanite texts from Ras Shamra show evidences, though slight, of a more enlightened theology, and the animals in question, as Jeroboam's bulls at Bethel and Dan, and as similar animals in N Syria and Anatolia, may have been, not images of the Canaanite deities, but rather pedestals or symbols of their presence, as the ark was the symbol of the presence of Yahweh (Num. 10:35-36). Well known as an object of Canaanite worship is Asherah, now known explicitly from the Ras Shamra Texts as the mother-goddess and consort of El. Often Asherah appears to be misunderstood in the versions of the OT—e.g., II Kings 23:4, 6 (LXX τῷ ἄλσει, "to the grove"; cf. ERV "to the Asherah"). The narrative of Gideon's destruction of the fertility shrine of Ophrah (Judg. 6:25 ff) indicates that the Asherah was by the altar of Baal, and the fact that Gideon burnt his offering to Yahweh with the Asherah which he had cut down indicates that it was of wood. The Hebrew text mentions literally עצי האשרה, "the trees of the Asherah," and this is probably the source of the belief that the Asherah was a grove. We are not bound, however, to render the Hebrew word עצי so literally, and it may signify simply "wood." A single object seems to be denoted—either a natural tree or a wooden pole as a stylized tree—the term "Asherah" either signifying its "erect" position or being the name of the Canaanite mother-goddess whom it symbolized as the repository of fruitfulness. The association of the mother-goddess with a tree, moreover, may have been suggested by primitive Semitic animism, where, as among Arab peasants to the present day, certain, mostly conspicuous, trees, thickets, wells, and rocks are thought to be the abode of welis (genii loci), many of whom may be the survivors of ancient Baalim (see BAAL). Figs. IDO 2; JAC 5; ASH 91.

In the Brooklyn Museum Collection

2. A hawk, wearing a crown, represents the god Horus.

2. Relation of Israel to alien cults. At various crises in the history of Israel there was a tendency to adopt the local Canaanite cults either in principle or in detail. This tendency is condemned generally by the protagonists of Israelite monotheism as "idolatry" or rather "idols," a term which visualizes either actual images or the forces acknowledged and worshiped—whether with or without images is not always certain (see IDOL). In considering the condemnation of idolatry in Israel we must bear in mind the varying degrees to which Israel assimilated the culture of Canaan.

In settling to the new life of the agriculturist in Palestine, the Hebrew nomads naturally adopted various rites, particularly associated with imitative magic, appropriate to seasons of transition, such as the beginning and end of harvest, and the New Year festival. The last, which was associated with the Feast of Tabernacles, was the chief seasonal festival in the peasant's year, and from Zech. 14:16 it is apparent that the kingship of God was a prominent theme of that festival. Psalms and passages in the Prophets on this theme reveal a striking affinity in imagery and subject matter with the Ras Shamra myth of the kingship of BAAL. Here the Hebrews seized upon the Canaanite expression of faith in Providence in nature and adapted it to their own peculiar ethos as the expression of their faith in Providence in history and the moral order. The popular tendency, however, was to remain satisfied, as the Canaanites had been, with the rites designed to secure the material benefits of nature, and this is the substance of Hosea's censure of his contemporaries. This preoccupation with the material fruits of creation rather than with the nature and will of the Creator himself is idolatry in the general sense (cf. Rom. 1:25).

Apart from this Canaanite fertility cult thinly disguised under the name of Yahweh, there were periodic efforts of a more deliberate nature to establish it in more detail. The Deuteronomic version of the Hebrew settlement in Judges regards the progress and recession of the settlement as related to fidelity to the ancestral faith and their apostasy to the cult of Canaanite Baal and Ashtaroth. The degree of accuracy in this sweeping condemnation is impossible to determine, and it may amount to no more than the adoption of seasonal rituals without undue emphasis on the characters of the Canaanite gods. In the cults of Dan and Bethel sponsored by Jeroboam I the bull symbols indicate Baal, the celebration of whose kingship was—to judge from the Ras Shamra Texts—the high light of the nature cult of Canaan. Here Jeroboam seems simply to have adapted the cult of Baal to that of Yahweh in the New Year festival, in which the stability of God's order and that of his community were affirmed in the celebration of God as King (I Kings 12:32). Under Ahab, however, the king's affiance with the Phoenician princess Jezebel stimulated a more deliberate reaction to the Canaanite fertility cult. Ahab established the cult of Baal of Sidon at Samaria (I Kings 16:32) in a temple, which was the scene of Jehu's bloody extermination of the house of Omri (II Kings 10). In Judah the liberal policy of Solomon had encouraged the cults of his foreign wives, and in the reign of his grandson Asa we read of an "abominable image" (מפלצת) having been set up by the queen mother, Maacah, to Asherah (I Kings 15:13). From the accounts of the reforms of Hezekiah (II Kings 18:4) and Josiah (II Kings 23) it is apparent that Canaanite idolatry in its crude form, as well as the cult of Chemosh—"Milcom"—from beyond Jordan, astral worship, and the worship of the sun with the horse as its cult animal, had pervaded Jerusalem and the temple itself. These reforms, of course, had also the purpose of a political demonstration, prompted by the signs of the decay of Assyria, which had so long dominated Palestine. With the death of Josiah and the relapse of Judah into political insignificance in face of the rising power of Babylon, there was a recrudescence of the grosser forms of idolatry in the temple itself, including theriomorphic images or figures drawn in the temple (Ezek. 8:10), the worship of the vegetation-god Tammuz (Ezek. 8:14) and of the sun (Ezek. 8:16). In the disillusionment of postexilic times Isa. 65:2-7 indicates the tendency to resort to heathenish practices and even obscene rites, where the flesh of unclean animals like swine (Isa. 65:4) and mice (Isa. 66:17) was eaten and dogs were sacrificed (Isa. 66:3). This, however, was in the poor Jewish community of Palestine; in the Jewish communities in Mesopotamia, which were the real representatives of the traditions of the race, the imposing cults of Babylonia were regarded with supreme contempt, and local idolatry was reduced to absurdity (Isa. 40:18-26; 44:9-20; 46:1-2). The Seleucid suzerains of Palestine in the second century B.C. revived the worship of local fertility-gods in the provinces, in the Hauran, Transjordan, and the Philistine coast, and endeavored to establish the worship of Hellenistic deities in Judah and in the temple itself with "the abomination that makes desolate" (Dan. 11:31), the statue of Olympian Zeus. Such cults, however, like the cult of Augustus established by Herod the Great at Samaria, were imposed ab extra and resolutely resisted by the Jews.

The extent to which the Hebrews in the pre-Mosaic period may have shared in the grosser forms of religion current in the Near East is a matter of conjecture. The practice of totemism among the ancestors of the Hebrews must remain an interesting hypothesis suggested by the designation of certain tribes, families, and individuals, and distinction which the historical Hebrews drew between clean and unclean animals, and the taboo on the flesh of certain animals. The crude animal cult to which Ezekiel alludes (8:10), though possibly a survival of primitive totemism, far from being a revival of native Hebrew totemism after almost a millennium, is more likely to have been an alien importation like the cults of Tammuz and the sun mentioned in the same context. The various places hallowed in patriarchal tradition by theophanies, such as the terebinths of Mamre and Shechem,* the wells of Beer-sheba and Beer-lahai-roi, and the stone of Bethel, suggest that primitive animism was an element in the faith of the early Hebrews, though to classify this as idolatry depends on the worshiper's conception of the power present at such places. On the evidence of theophoric names of Amorite contemporaries of the earlier patriarchs living in similar conditions, we have little doubt that the Pentateuch, in spite of a tendency to theological anachronism, in presenting the relation between God and the patriarchs as a social one is fundamentally true to fact. Fig. TER 51.

3. Concrete symbols in Yahwism. In the patriarchal tradition, in spite of its idyllic cast, there is a certain amount of evidence of unorthodox liberality in religion. Josh. 24:2 alludes to the worship of other gods than Yahweh in Mesopotamia in patriarchal times, though Gen. 12:1 ff in the account of the migration from Mesopotamia makes no mention of alien worship, and it may well be that Josh. 24:2 is visualizing the worship by various Hebrew septs of several kin-gods to whom they stood in a social relationship.

The worship of any other god than Yahweh and the use of any image in his worship are forbidden in the Decalogue (Exod. 20:3-4); and in the apodictic laws, which Alt regards as the oldest specifically Israelite elements in the Book of the Covenant (Exod. 20:22–23:33), images of gold and silver are expressly forbidden (Exod. 20:23). In this latter enactment, which according to Alt would antedate the Decalogue by some three or four centuries, it is to be noted that the Hebrew text does not forbid the representation of Yahweh, but only the use of images of other gods besides him. Thus it is possible that some concrete representation of Yahweh, or at least a symbol of his presence, was used until the time of the formulation of the Decalogue in the E body of Pentateuchal tradition, which is generally dated in the eighth century B.C. An argument for this view is that the idiom "to placate God" means literally "to sweeten the face of God," and in certain passages the MT which is rendered "to appear before God" is an obvious modification of an original phrase meaning "to see the face of God" (e.g., Exod. 23:15; 34:23; Deut. 16:16; I Sam. 1:22; Ps. 42:3). The former expression may refer to the anointing of some concrete object, such as the standing stone which Jacob anointed at Bethel (Gen. 28:18-19). The representation of a god by a rough stone block was known in the case of the local Nabatean god Dusares, and the term "the Rock" applied to Yahweh may refer to such a concrete representation. A concrete object of worship was visualized in Judg. 8:24 ff, which describes how Gideon used the gold ornaments from the spoils of the Midianites to make an "ephod" which he set up as a cult object in his native Ophrah. The actual nature of the ephod in early Israel is not certain, but it was apparently a garment (I Sam. 2:18; II Sam. 6:14) either worn or carried by a priest (I Sam. 14:3) and used in divination (I Sam. 23:6 ff; 30:7 ff). In the time of Saul the ephod had its place in the sanctuary of Nob, and behind it was kept Goliath's sword, a trophy of the wars of Yahweh (I Sam. 21: 9). This passage and the narrative of Gideon suggest a free-standing object, but neither excludes the possibility that the ephod might be of cloth or sheet metal, worn by the priest or hung over some symbol of the presence of Yahweh and so, through the sacred lots, the medium of the revelation of his will (cf. Exod. 28:6 ff). In Hos. 3:4 the ephod is visualized as a vital element in the cult of Yahweh. Here its association with a pillar or standing stone may indicate that the latter represented Yahweh, or at least marked the place where he was to be found, and the ephod may have been draped over it. In the story of Micah in the Danite migration an ephod is associated with a graven and molten image (Judg. 17:4-5; 18: 14), though there is no suggestion that the object of worship was other than Yahweh. It is noteworthy that Hosea mentions ephod, teraphim, and standing stone without condemnation as necessary cult objects in the cult of Yahweh.

The last two passages do nothing to clarify the nature of teraphim, though from Ezek. 21:21; Zech. 10:2 it is apparent that they were used in divination. Their use is condemned in I Sam. 15:23. There teraphim might be taken as parallel to "divination" (קסם) in the preceding colon, but it might also be taken in apposition to "vanity" (און), the preceding word. Since this term generally signifies idols or idolatry, teraphim might also have this significance here. The same difficulty applies to the mention of teraphim in the account of Josiah's reformation in II Kings 23:24, where the term is associated with various illegitimate means of divination in what precedes, but with images in the round with what follows. In I Sam. 19:13, 16, where teraphim (RSV "image") were used to counterfeit David in bed, it is generally held that an anthropomorphic image, a household god, was denoted, but Albright seems nearer the truth in regarding teraphim here as a bundle of rags, in support of which view a root trp, "to wear out, languish," may now be cited from the Ras Shamra Texts. From Gen. 31:19 ff, however, we see that teraphim were portable images, and are actually called the "gods" of Laban (Gen. 31:30). No doubt these were the familiar domestic deities represented by clay figurines often found in boxes beneath the corner of the floor of ancient Mesopotamian dwelling houses. Whatever their actual nature and significance in early Israel, they were apparently considered quite legitimate in certain quarters until the time of Hosea, though the passage in I Sam. 15:23 indicates that at an earlier time the use of teraphim was not above suspicion. By the time of Josiah the teraphim were definitely abused and as such uncompromisingly condemned.

A theriomorphic cult object, the precise nature of which and its actual use in the cult of Yahweh are very obscure, was the brazen serpent, Nehushtan. The serpent is associated in sculpture from Egypt and Canaan in the Late Bronze Age (1600-1200 B.C.) with the goddess Astarte, and serpents in clay and metals were found in the excavation of Gezer. The serpent, renewing its skin every year, was the fitting symbol of the goddess of fertility, but it is unlikely that Nehushtan had such significance in Jerusalem. Hebrew tradition in Num. 21:8-9; II Kings 18:4 regards it as a prophylactic amulet associated with Moses in the desert period. The fact that it seems to have been used in the Wadi Arabah in the vicinity of the ancient copper mines suggests that it was some symbol in the worship of the native smiths, or Kenites, who were allies of the Hebrews and also worshipers of Yahweh. However this may be, the brazen serpent at Jerusalem had outlived its practical purpose and so was abolished by Hezekiah.

4. Idolatry in the NT. In the NT, idolatry, meaning the worship of gods other than the one living and true God, and the use of images, is characteristic of the life of the heathen. The difficulties of the early Christian communities in a pagan world are particularized in the practical problem of Christians' eating meat which had been part of an animal sacrificed to a heathen god or "idol" (I Cor. 8; 10:14 ff; Rev. 2:14, 20). This seems to refer to the eating of such meat in a communal meal in fellowship with heathen rather than to the buying of meat for private consumption in the open market. For the more sophisticated among the heathen in the Greco-Roman world this communion meal, primarily a means of reintegrating the community and its god, had a merely social significance, and certain enlightened Christians felt themselves free to partake of such meals without prejudice. In the mind of certain less enlightened Christians, however, the religious association of such meals prevailed, and for their sakes the practice was condemned by Paul, who nevertheless implies that the fact that the idols or gods of the heathen have no real existence means that the meat of their sacrifices is not really harmful.

Higher thought in the Greco-Roman world had really outgrown idolatry and the old cults of Greece and Rome. This attitude is symbolized for Paul by the altar at Athens "to an unknown god" (Acts 17: 23). Mystery religions, however, where the individual or community sought to appropriate the experiences of dying and rising nature deities such as Osiris or Triptolemus, were very popular, and the emperor cult was already by the time of Paul accepted, at least in the Eastern Mediterranean. Indeed, Herod the Great had already established the cult of Augustus at Samaria, and Caligula proposed to set up the cult with his image in the temple at Jerusalem—an episode to which Mark 13:14, citing Dan. 11:31, may refer.

In general "idolatry" is used figuratively in the NT, especially in the Pauline letters, and signifies obsession with created things instead of devotion to the Creator (e.g., Eph. 5:5; Phil. 3:19, where gluttony and covetousness are said to be "idolatry").

Bibliography. W. R. Smith, The OT in the Jewish Church (1892), pp. 165-213, 221-28, 240-44; S. I. Curtiss, Primitive Semitic Religion Today (1902); W. R. Smith, The Religion of the Semites (1927); S. A. Cook, The Religion of Ancient Palestine in the Light of Archaeology (1930); W. Schmidt, The Origin and Growth of Religion (English Trans. H. J. Rose; 1931), pp. 62, 72, 75, 267; W. C. Graham and H. G. May, Culture and Conscience (1936); H. Frankfort, Kingship and the Gods (1948); S. Mowinckel, Han som Kommer (1951), pp. 24-43; A. G. Barrois, Manuel d'archéologie biblique, II (1953), 82, 324-459; M. Noth, Die Welt des AT (1957), pp. 221-36. J. GRAY

IDUEL ĭd'yo͞o əl. In I Esd. 8:43 for ARIEL 1.

IDUMEA ĭd'yo͞o mē'ə ['Ιδουμαία, 'Ιδουμέα, (land) of the Edomites]. A term used in the LXX and Josephus for Edom, the region SE of the Dead Sea. After the Exile, it refers to the region S of Judea occupied by Edomite refugees from the growing pressure of the Nabateans, an Arab tribe which took over the ancient Edomite homeland.

Idumean authority eventually extended as far N as Beth-zur, fifteen miles S of Jerusalem. In the Herodian dynasty, the Idumeans provided the native ruling house in Palestine for nearly a century and a half. Throughout the Seleucid, Hasmonean, and Herodian periods, Idumea changed hands frequently. In 164 B.C., Judas Maccabeus fortified Beth-zur against an independent Idumea (I Macc. 4:61) and ravaged its territory (5:3, 65). In 125, John Hyrcanus annexed it to the Hasmonean state. In 63 Pompey detached it from Judea, but in 37 Herod the Great, an Idumean, reannexed it to Judea. During the next century this exchange continued until it finally became a permanent part of the province of Syria under the rule of the procurator of Judea after the First Revolt.

See also EDOM; SEIR.

Bibliography. A. Robert, "Idumée," Dictionnaire de la Bible, Supplément, vol. 4, cols. 195-99. V. R. GOLD

IEZER ī ē'zər; IEZERITES —zə rīts. Contraction of ABIEZER.

IGAL ī'găl [יגאל, may (God) redeem; KJV IGEAL ī'gĭ əl in I Chr. 3:22. 1. The spy from Issachar among the twelve spies sent out by Moses to search out Canaan (Num. 13:7).

2. One of David's Mighty Men (II Sam. 23:36). Cf. I Chr. 11:38, where apparently this name is replaced by Joel (יואל).

3. A descendant of King David through King Jehoiachin (I Chr. 3:22).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 28, 200. B. T. DAHLBERG

IGDALIAH ĭg'də lī'ə [יגדליהו, Yahu is great] (Jer. 35:4). An obscure Judean prophet whose grandsons had a chamber in the temple under Josiah.

IGEAL. KJV alternate form of IGAL.

IGNATIUS, EPISTLES OF ĭg nā'shəs. Seven letters by a bishop (reputedly the second) of Antioch in Syria, written in two successive stages of a journey through Asia Minor while he was being conducted to Rome as a prisoner condemned to fight and die in the wild-beast shows. From Smyrna were sent the letters to the churches of Ephesus, Magnesia, Tralles, and Rome; from Troas, the ones to the churches of Philadelphia and Smyrna, and a personal letter to Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna. The original collection and preservation of these letters was due to the initiative of Polycarp. See POLYCARP, EPISTLE OF.

In the fourth century these letters were expanded by an Arian interpolator, and later ages witnessed further expansion of the corpus by the addition of a number of spurious letters. There also exists in Syriac an abridged recension of three of the letters. Legendary Acts of Ignatius' martyrdom, composed in the fifth and sixth centuries, are historically worthless, but important witnesses for the text of the letter to the Roman church. The researches of Theodor Zahn (1873) and J. B. Lightfoot (1885) in sifting the genuine from the spurious in the textual tradition of Ignatius have won universal acceptance; and students should beware of using texts or translations of Ignatius published prior to the work of these two scholars.

We know nothing certain about Ignatius except what is revealed in these letters. His name is a Latin form which has suggested to some a servile origin. We do not know how or when he became a Christian or a bishop. He apparently left the church in Syria in turmoil; but whether this was cause or effect of his arrest, we cannot tell. To Eusebius alone (Hist. III.36) we are indebted for the information that he suffered under Trajan (A.D. 98-117). Internal criticism of the letters tends to confirm this dating, particularly in view of Ignatius' knowledge and use of NT writings. A few critics argue for a later date. Unfortunately, the date of Polycarp's letter, our earliest witness to Ignatius, depends upon the date of Ignatius' martyrdom itself. Irenaeus (V.28.4) quotes Rom. 4:1 as by "a certain one of us," which suggests that Ignatius was long dead. Origen (Homily VI on Luke) cites Ign. Eph. 19:1 and describes Ignatius as "second bishop of Antioch after Peter."

The immediate appeal of Ignatius' letters is their revelation of a sensitive, intense mystic, both proud of and humbled by his sufferings for Christ's sake. He communicates vividly the physical horror and the spiritual exaltation of his martyrdom. His letter to the Romans is an urgent plea that they do nothing to hinder his becoming an "imitator of the suffering of my God." He earnestly longs to "reach the presence of God," by being "ground by the teeth of the wild beasts, so that I may be found pure bread of Christ." Ignatius claimed the gifts of prophetic utterance (Ign. Phila. 7:1) and visions of heavenly things (Ign. Trall. 5). But it is an exaggeration of certain modern critics when they describe him as a man of abnormal psychology and neurotic temper.

In all his letters to the Asian churches Ignatius was a strenuous advocate of the authority of the hierarchy of bishops, presbyters, and deacons, and of the need for unity in the churches under these ministers. His writings are the earliest unmistakable witness to the governance of the churches by these threefold orders of ministry, and in particular by the monarchical episcopate (see MINISTRY, CHRISTIAN). He would allow no meetings of any kind in the churches without the knowledge and authorization of the bishop. Yet he shows no hint of any doctrine of apostolic succession in the ministry. His advocacy of episcopal rights stemmed apparently from practical, rather than theoretical, considerations. By reason of his liturgical and pastoral oversight the bishop was responsible for preserving his flock from the dangers then threatening the integrity of the apostolic faith and teaching.

This theological crisis had two roots. On the one hand, the Asian churches were being subjected to powerful Judaizing tendencies, both speculative and cultic (Ign. Magn. 8-10; Ign. Phila. 6-9; cf. similar warnings in Rev. 2:9; 3:9). On the other hand, these churches were infiltrated with teachers of the Docetic heresy that denied the historic reality of the Lord's birth, life, death, and resurrection in the flesh, and affirmed that his human nature was only a semblance (Ign. Eph. 7-9; Ign. Magn. 11; Ign. Trall. 9-11; Ign. Smyr. 1-7; Ign. Polyc. 3). The teaching was the same as that condemned in I John 4:2-3. Against this denial of the "flesh and blood" of Christ, whether in Incarnation or in sacrament, Ignatius was passionately aroused to express his dread, anger, and contempt. He took the outrage of Docetic heresy personally—to say that Christ's sufferings were only a semblance was equivalent to affirming that his own martyrdom for Christ in the body of flesh was unreal (Ign. Trall. 10; Ign. Smyr. 4).

Ignatius is the first Christian writer to use the term "Catholic Church" (Ign. Smyr. 8:2); and he takes "catholic" to mean "orthodox." His doctrine of the Godhead and of the person of Christ is remarkably agreeable to the dogmatic definitions of later times. His ringing assertions of the reality of the Incarnation are frequently phrased in ways that suggest dependence upon creedal formulas. He affirms the Davidic descent of Jesus, his virgin birth, his baptism by John, his crucifixion under Pilate and Herod, and his bodily resurrection. He is familiar with a theological speculation concerning the star that appeared at Jesus' birth (more developed than what is suggested by Matt. 2:2; cf. Ign. Eph. 19). He accepts the doctrine of the descent into Hades, to raise the prophets of old from the dead (Ign. Magn. 9:2). He shows little interest in the Second Coming.

The OT is not often reflected in Ignatius' letters. He seems to have preferred the authority of a living tradition of faith to subtle exegesis of texts (see the much-discussed passage about the "archives" and the "gospel" in Ign. Phila. 8:2). His gospel traditions are closest to Matthew, and he probably cites Matt. 3:15 textually in Ign. Smyr. 1:1. Critics differ respecting his knowledge of John. There are strong affinities of thought and outlook between Ignatius and the Fourth Evangelist, and some striking parallels of phrase—Christ as the "door" (Ign. Phila. 9:1), "living water" and "bread of God" (Ign. Rom. 7:2-3), and the Spirit who "knows whence he comes and whither he goes" (Ign. Phila. 7:1). In Ign. Smyr. 3:2, Ignatius cites an apocryphon of the risen Lord, which Origen knew in the Preaching of Peter, Jerome in the Gospel According to the Hebrews. Ignatius was well acquainted with the letters of Paul, especially Ephesians; and he recalls associations of Paul with the church in Ephesus (Ign. Eph. 12:2), and of Peter and Paul with the church in Rome (Ign. Rom. 4:3). Dependence of Ignatius upon other

NT writings cannot be demonstrated, though there are occasional verbal parallels with Acts and Hebrews.

Ignatius' style is popular, replete with vivid metaphor and quotable maxims, generally lucid, and free of all bombast. It is not cultivated, but there are traces of Hellenistic vocabulary and rhetoric. It is intensely personal, and Ignatius has the gift of communicating in words the passion with which he held his convictions.

Bibliography. The fundamental work is J. B. Lightfoot, The Apostolic Fathers, pt. II: S. Ignatius, S. Polycarp (3 vols.; 2nd ed., 1889). See also the texts, translations, and commentaries listed in the bibliography under APOSTOLIC FATHERS, to which should be added: J. H. Srawley, The Epistles of St. Ignatius (1935); T. Camelot, Ignace d'Antioche, Lettres (Sources Chrétiennes, 10; 1951).

Important monographs: H. Schlier, Religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchungen zu den Ignatiusbriefen (1929); J. Moffatt, "Ignatius of Antioch—A Study in Personal Religion," JR, X (1930), 169-86; F. A. Schilling, The Mysticism of Ignatius of Antioch (1932); C. C. Richardson, The Christianity of Ignatius of Antioch (1935); J. Moffatt, "An Approach to Ignatius," HTR, XXIX (1936), 1-38; C. Maurer, Ignatius von Antiochien und das Johannesevangelium (1949); R. Bultmann, "Ignatius und Paulus," in J. N. Sevenster and W. C. van Unnik, eds., Studia Paulina (1953), pp. 37-51; E. Molland, "The Heretics Combatted by Ignatius of Antioch," The Journal of Ecclesiastical History, V (1954), 1-6.

See also bibliographies under BISHOP; MINISTRY, CHRISTIAN.

M. H. SHEPHERD, JR.

IGNORANCE [שגגה, שגיאה (RSV generally ERROR; SIN), unwitting sin; ἄγνοια, ἀγνωσία, ἀγνόημα]; IGNORANT [ἀγνοέω, uninformed; ἰδιῶται, uneducated]. In the OT, unwitting or inadvertent sin, which, although less serious than conscious transgression, involves guilt and requires atonement.

שגגה is a somewhat technical name for this kind of sin, and is found, outside Eccl. 5:6—H 5:5; 10:5, only in legislative passages (Lev. 4:2, 22, 27; 5:5-18; 22:14; Num. 15:24-29; 35:11, 15; Josh. 20:3, 9). This sin is plainly contrasted with deliberate and flagrant offenses, those committed "with a high hand" (Num. 15:30; cf. Ps. 19:13—H 19:14), for which there is no cultic atonement. Similar words are משוגה (Job 19:4) and משגה (Gen. 43:12), meaning "error."

The Hebrew roots שגג and שגה convey the basic idea of "erring" or "going astray," often with the expressed or implied causation of ignorance. This may be a physical straying (Deut. 27:18; Ezek. 34:6), drunken staggering (Isa. 28:7), emotional infatuation (Prov. 5:19-20), or intellectual and moral error (Gen. 43:12; Job 12:16; Prov. 19:27). In the priestly legislation and in Ezek. 45:20 it is brought into a ritual context where it is dealt with as a sin before God.

It is apparent that for the Hebrew even a sin of ignorance was taken seriously as incurring guilt, not only upon the sinner himself, but often upon the whole community. The fact that he was not aware of his wrongdoing (the element of ignorance is clearly stated in Lev. 4:13-14, 22-23, 27-28; 5:2-4; 22:14; Num. 15:24) does not excuse him. Guilt automatically attaches itself to the deed. That this conception is a remnant from an earlier, dynamistic mentality seems likely in cases where the unwitting sin violates ritual or taboo (e.g., Lev. 4:3; 5:14-16; 22:14; cf. I Sam. 14:24 LXX). However, this sin could occur "in any of the things which the LORD has commanded not to be done" (Lev. 4:2, etc.), so that the consciousness of guilt attaching to it ought to be viewed, at least in its later expressions, as arising from a deep and truly spiritual insight into the pervasiveness of sin. When a sin of inadvertence came to light, restitution was required (Lev. 22:14), and prescribed sacrifices were carried out in order that it might be forgiven (cf. Num. 15:22-29, elaborated in Lev. 4; 5:14-16). See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS.

That a sin committed in ignorance was considered less serious than a deliberate sin, despite its culpability, appears very clearly in the provision of cities of refuge for those guilty of manslaughter (Deut. 19:4-10; Josh. 20:2-6, 9). The fact that a death had been caused without deliberate intent removed it from liability to blood-vengeance. See CITY OF REFUGE.

Other passages where these words indicate sins of ignorance are Job 6:24; 19:4; Ps. 19:12—H 19:13; Eccl. 5:6—H 5:5. Otherwise the Bible furnishes many instances of unknowing sins (e.g., Gen. 20:9; Num. 22:34; Deut. 22:8). The Greek ἀγνοέω, ἄγνοια, occasionally employed in the LXX to translate forms of these roots, appear in this meaning in II Macc. 11:31; Heb. 5:2. It is, of course, considered a serious transgression to lead others into these sins (Prov. 28:10; Isa. 28:7).

By extension of meaning these words come simply to stand for all sin viewed as culpable error, with or without the element of inadvertency. OT passages with this meaning are I Sam. 26:21; Ps. 119:10, 21, 67, 118; Prov. 5:23; 20:1; Eccl. 10:5. The same usage appears in Tob. 3:3; Jth. 5:20; Ecclus. 23:2-3; I Macc. 13:39; Heb. 9:7 (cf. also Ecclus. 51:19). See SIN; FOLLY; WISDOM.

More Hellenistically, the NT generally speaks of ignorance as the want of KNOWLEDGE. As such it may be exclusively an intellectual matter, or it may incline to the OT notion of culpable ignorance in a religious sense.

In the purely intellectual sense, the concept of "ignorance" appears in various shades of meaning. It indicates lack of personal acquaintance (II Cor. 6:9; Gal. 1:22; cf. Wisd. Sol. 19:14), the absence of awareness or orientation (Acts 17:23; Rom. 2:4; II Cor. 2:11; cf. Wisd. Sol. 7:12; III Macc. 5:27), the lack of comprehension (Mark 9:32; Luke 9:45; Rom. 6:3; 7:1; I Pet. 2:15; II Pet. 2:12), or a refusal to acknowledge (I Cor. 14:38; cf. vs. 37). A common Pauline formula is: "I would not have you ignorant" (KJV)—i.e., "Be aware, comprehend" (Rom. 1:13; 11:25; I Cor. 10:1; 12:1; II Cor. 1:8; I Thess. 4:13).

Intellectual ignorance can, however, lead to sin; in fact, ignorance of God and of the gospel is identical with spiritual estrangement and apostasy. Thus the Jews' ignorance in crucifying Jesus (Acts 3:17) and Paul's ignorance in persecuting the Christians (I Tim. 1:13) approach both in culpability and in forgivability the OT sin of שגגה. Equally serious is the failure of the Jews to acknowledge Christ (Acts 13:27) and to understand the true "righteousness" of God (Rom. 10:3), and the failure of the Gentiles to know the true God (Acts 17:30; I Cor. 15:34; Eph.

4:18; I Pet. 1:14; cf. Wisd. Sol. 13:1; 14:18, 22; 15:11; II Macc. 4:40), particularly when they ignore the light of natural knowledge (cf. Rom. 1:21; II Pet. 3:5).

S. J. De Vries

IIM ī'ĭm [עיים, heaps, ruins]. 1. One (Josh. 15:29) of a list of cities "in the extreme South," which were allotted to the tribe of Judah.

Bibliography. F. M. Cross, Jr., and G. E. Wright, "The Boundary and Province Lists of the Kingdom of Judah," JBL, LXXV (1956), 202-26.

2. KJV form of Iyim (Num. 33:45).

E. D. Grohman

IJE-ABARIM. KJV form of Iye-abarim.

IJON ī'jŏn [עיון]. An important Israelite town in the extreme N of Palestine. It is probably located in Merj 'Ayyun, between the watershed of the Litani River and Mount Hermon, but the exact site is unknown. The generally proposed identification of Ijon with Tell ed-Dibbin is doubtful, because surface explorations have failed to yield evidence of occupation in Iron II (ca. 900-600), required by the biblical narrative.

Ijon was among the Israelite towns captured by Ben-hadad of Damascus during the reign of Baasha (I Kings 15:20; II Chr. 16:4). Tiglath-pileser III of Assyria also took the town and deported its inhabitants in the time of Pekah (ca. 733 B.C.).

Bibliography. A. Jirku, "Neue Forschungen in Syrien und Palästina," ZDMG, N.F. 11 (1933), 188.

G. W. Van Beek

IKHNATON ĭk nä'tən. See Akh-en-Aton.

IKKESH ĭk'ĭsh [עקש]. A Tekoite whose son Ira was a member of the company of David's heroes known as the "Thirty" (II Sam. 23:26; I Chr. 11:28) and the officer in charge of the Davidic militia for the sixth month (I Chr. 27:9).

ILAI ī'lī [עילי] (I Chr. 11:29). An Ahohite who was a member of the Mighty Men of David known as the "Thirty." In II Sam. 23:28 he is called Zalmon.

ILIADUN ĭ lī'ə dən ['Ειλιαδούν (B), Ιλιαδουν (A), Ελιαδουν (Luc.)] (I Esd. 5:58); KJV ELIADUN. Ancestor of some of the Levites who rebuilt the temple. The name is omitted in the parallel Ezra 3:9, unless it is to be identified with Henadad.

C. T. Fritsch

ILLEGITIMATE CHILD [νόθος]. See Bastard.

ILLYRICUM ĭ lĭr'ə kəm [τὸ 'Ιλλυρικόν] (Rom. 15:19). A Roman province on the E coast of the Adriatic Sea.

The limits of this area were variable (Suetonius Tiberius 16; Appian Illyrian Wars 1) and often indeterminate, but in general it may be said to have been bounded by Pannonia on the N, Moesia on the E, Epirus on the S, and the Adriatic on the W. The inhabitants were the Illyrians (οἱ 'Ιλλυριοί), and the land was often called Illyris (ἡ 'Ιλλυρίς) or Illyria (ἡ 'Ιλλυρία). Strabo (VII.317) describes the Illyrian seaboard as very well supplied with harbors both on the coast and on the neighboring islands, and says that the coastal lands were sunny and fertile but the inland regions mountainous and cold. He also speaks of the wildness and the piratical habits of the people.

The Greeks came in contact with the Illyrians when Chersikrates of Corinth settled on the island of Corcyra and expelled the Liburnians, members of an Illyrian tribe (Strabo VII.315), this being narrated by Strabo (VI.269) in connection with the founding of Syracuse by Archias in the eighth century B.C. In succeeding centuries Greek colonies were established in Illyria, notably at Salona near Spalato. The kings of Macedonia warred repeatedly against the Illyrians, and in 359/358 B.C., Philip II defeated their king Bardylis in a severely contested battle (Diodorus XVI.4). When the Gauls invaded Greece (279 B.C.), they sent one of their armies against the Illyrians and the Macedonians (Pausanias X.19.7). Illyrian acts of aggression against the Greek colonies and of piracy against both Greek and Roman shipping reached a climax under Queen Teuta and led to war with Rome in 229 B.C. As he narrates these events, Polybius (II.12) remarks that "the Illyrians were then not the enemies of this people or that, but the common enemies of all." Although Teuta surrendered large parts of Illyria to the Romans, the conflict with Rome continued intermittently for a long time. In 168 B.C. a Roman army under the praetor L. Anicius overcame the Illyrian people, and in the settlement of the following year Illyricum was divided into three parts (Livy XLV.26.15; 43.4). Regular Roman government was still not established in the region, but in 59 B.C., Caesar was granted the governorship of Illyricum for a period of five years (Dio XXXVIII.8.5). In 35-33 B.C., Octavian campaigned in Illyria and, as Appian (Illyrian Wars 28) narrates, subdued the whole country, not only parts which had revolted from the Romans but also parts which had never been under their rule before. Ca. 11 B.C., after Tiberius had put down a rebellion of the Dalmatians (see Dalmatia), the region was placed under Augustus as an imperial province (Dio LIV.34.4). Yet again in A.D. 6 there was a great revolt of the Dalmatians as well as the Pannonians, but this too was suppressed by Tiberius after three years of fighting (Dio LV.29-34). Only then could it be said that Illyricum was fully integrated as a province in the Roman Empire.

It is uncertain whether Paul means in Rom. 15:19 that he had actually preached in Illyricum, or simply names this province as marking the W limit of the Eastern world, in the strategic centers of which he had planted the gospel (see bibliography). Christianity is known in Illyricum from the third century, Salona being an important center.

Bibliography. Vulić, "Illyricum," Pauly-Wissowa, IX, i (1914), cols. 1085-88; Fluss, "Illyrioi," Pauly-Wissowa, Supplement V (1931), cols. 311-45; H. Lietzmann, Handbuch zum NT 8, An die Römer (4th ed., 1933), p. 121; J. Knox, Exegesis of Romans, IB, IX (1954), 645-46.

J. Finegan

IMAGE. See Graven Image; Molten Image; Idol.

IMAGE, IMAGERY. A graphic description, or pictorial representation of reality and truth, as opposed to abstract thought. The Oriental had a love for the concrete and the practical. He expressed his ideas pictorially, and he had a special gift for story and the ability to make his figures come alive with a few, well-chosen phrases. Contemplation was in terms of life situation. There was no metaphysical search for absolute goodness, beauty, truth. The Hebrew was too practical for that. There was search for truth in the present experience, for the good under existing circumstances. Greed was portrayed by a picture of a greedy man; love, by an example of loving; fear, by an experience of terror. Here the distinction between the historical and the imaginative, between fact and figure, is not clear-cut. This makes the problem of ascertaining the actual historical facts of the Bible extremely difficult. It also accounts for the incessant use of proverb, story, and parable in teaching.

For the ancient Hebrew, the secular and the sacred were one. He was dominated by the idea of God, and accepted the world as an expression of the divine personality. God was ever near at hand. The phenomena of nature, the movements of men and of nations, the fortunes and woes of life, were related to his direct action and control (cf. Isa. 45:5-7; Amos 3:6*b*). Hence the abundance of anthropomorphisms. When the Israelite expressed his faith, it was in terms of experience; when he spoke of God, it was in terms of his mighty acts.

The imagery of the Bible is expressive of the life of the Hebrews, who lived between the desert and the sea, dependent upon the land for existence, threatened by politically ambitious neighbors to the N and to the S. The hopes and fears of the people, together with the waverings of faith and apostasy, in all periods of their history—nomadic, agricultural, dynastic, exilic, colonial—are expressed in the imagery of the day.

The imagery of the OT is rich and expressive in its variety, and taken from the most common and elemental experiences of life—e.g., speaking and hearing, walking, birth, marriage, adultery, judging, are given deep religious and ethical import. God is described as father (Isa. 1:2; 50:1), husband (Jer. 2:2; Hos. 2:16), teacher (Isa. 28:26), healer (Jer. 30:17), shepherd (Ps. 23:1; Jer. 31:10), judge (Isa. 2:4), king (Isa. 33:22), warrior (Jer. 20:11), winnower (Jer. 15:7), husbandman (Isa. 5:2-7), smelter (Isa. 1:25), builder (Jer. 31:4), harvester (Jer. 8:13), giver of rain (Jer. 5:24), leader of the blind (Isa. 42:16), stranger and wayfarer (Jer. 14:8), etc. Israel is depicted as one diseased (Isa. 1:5-6), a faithless wife (Jer. 3:20), a wild vine (Jer. 2:21), a wild ass (Jer. 2:24), well-fed stallions (Jer. 5:8), cows of Bashan (Amos 4:1), as well as God's servant (Jer. 30:10), his beloved (Jer. 11:15), bride (Jer. 2:2), vineyard (Isa. 5:1-7), heritage (Jer. 12:7-9).

The NT is equally rich in imagery. Jesus speaks of the kingdom of God in terms of a man sowing seed (Matt. 13:24-30), treasure hid in a field (vs. 44), a net cast into the sea (vss. 47-50). He finds religious truth in a shepherd's seeking a lost sheep (Luke 15:4-7), children at play (7:31-35), men at prayer (18:9-14), a woman preparing dough (Matt. 13:33). Light, water, wind, bread, wine, salt, a lamp, a vine, a road, all became expressive of religious truth.

Again, salvation is portrayed in figures drawn from the law court, the slave market, the market place, the mystery cults, the temple service, and the family sphere. Again, this is to say nothing of the elaborate and rich imagery depicted in the cosmology and eschatology of the Bible.

What the biblical writer accomplished by imagery was to relate faith to the life situation and experience of man. To the modern interpreter this peculiarity presents the problem of distance and antiquity. He lives in a new day, with a new culture and new thought-forms. The problem of interpretation and reinterpretation, the presenting of the gospel in terms of contemporary imagery, is the ever-current need. This is one of the most important tasks of the biblical scholar if he is to help make the faith relevant for his day. See ANTHROPOMORPHISM; SYMBOL.

Bibliography. D. B. Macdonald, The Hebrew Literary Genius (1933); J. Muilenburg, "The Ethics of the Prophet," Moral Principles of Action (ed. R. N. Anshen; 1952), pp. 527-42; S. Terrien, "The Anthropology of God," Union Seminary Quarterly Review, vol. XIII, no. 1 (1957), pp. 13-17.

V. H. Kooy

IMAGE OF GOD. In elucidating the meaning of "image of God" in the OT, it is necessary to discount the theological speculation of which it has been the subject throughout the Christian centuries. We must also look at the expression in isolation from the "sea change" which it underwent when it was taken up into NT thought. Only in this way can we do justice to both the OT and the NT conception.

The P narrative in Genesis tells that man was made in the image of God. The primary reference is to concrete resemblance, but we must credit the writer with some intention to convey an abstract idea —viz., that of human personality in its relation to God. The OT never suggests that the image of God was lost by the Fall.

In the NT the image of God is something which (in all but two cases) does not belong to man. It is identified with Christ, image now being the perfect reflection of the prototype. Through his relation to Christ the believer is transformed into the same image. This is both an eschatological hope and (in some measure) a present reality.

1. In the OT
   a. The evidence
   b. Linguistic considerations
   c. Interpretation
2. In the NT
   a. Traces of the OT view in the NT
   b. The NT transformation of the idea
   c. The Pauline view

Bibliography

1. In the OT. a. The evidence. The primary OT evidence is limited in scope. The passages to be considered are: Gen. 1:26-27; 5:1-3; 9:1-7 (all in the P source and clearly written with reference to one another), to which must be added the poetical treatment of the theme, Ps. 8, even though the expression "image of God" does not actually occur in it. Though not strictly relevant, two references in the Apoc. should perhaps be mentioned: Ecclus. 17:3; Wisd. Sol. 2:23-24; to which may be added Wisd. Sol. 7:25.

b. Linguistic considerations. A few preliminary observations on the linguistic problem may be helpful. In Gen. 1:26 two words are used, צלם ("image") and דמות ("likeness"). When we are told in Gen. 1:27 that the proposal made in 1:26 was carried into effect, only the former of these words is used. Gen. 5:1 uses the second word only (sometimes regarded as a redactional gloss), and 9:6 the first. In 5:3, where we find the expression used of the resemblance between Adam and his son Seth, both words occur, but in reverse order. To complicate interpretation, the use of the particles which go with the nouns is not consistent. In 5:1, דמות has the particle which goes with צלם in 1:26-27, whereas in 5:3 the particles are interchanged, though in some forty-five MSS the reading has been harmonized with 1:26.

In 1:26 the particle with צלם may be regarded as a beth essentiae—i.e., as signifying identity. Though the point is debatable, the particle with דמות, which normally signifies "resemblance," may occasionally be used to express identity. This would give us virtually "as the image and likeness." On the other hand, we may translate "in [or after] the image" and "after the likeness" (cf. RSV). The choice is difficult and seems to depend on the way in which the terms צלם and דמות are understood.

The word צלם occurs seventeen times in the OT. Five of the occurrences are in the passages under consideration. In ten of the other cases the meaning is plainly concrete ("statue," "model," "picture"). In the remaining two (Pss. 39:6—H 39:7; 73:20) the translations "shadow," "dream," seem appropriate. It is a matter of debate whether or not צלם in these two cases should be regarded as actually a different word coming from a distinct Arabic root, the word in the other ten cases coming from an Arabic root meaning "cut." If we accept the view that there are two separate roots, it becomes more difficult not to take the five occurrences in Genesis in a strictly concrete sense. If we vote for a single root only, we may say that, on the polarity principle, the word צלם may be concrete at one end of the scale and abstract at the other, regarding the occurrences in Genesis as perhaps somewhere in the middle. One interesting suggestion is that צלם in the context might be derived from the second Arabic root and explained as "shadow picture." The most prevalent opinion today is that צלם should be given a concrete meaning in the first instance, but that a certain flexibility of meaning should be allowed for.

The second term in Gen. 1:26, דמות, has more the appearance of being abstract in meaning, and it actually is so used in certain instances of its occurrence. It may also, however, be used concretely as meaning a "plan."

That in 1:26 two words are used may imply that the author was struggling to express a difficult idea or wished to obviate the danger of צלם being taken in too concrete a sense. The linguistic evidence which has been thus summarily reviewed would suggest that there is not much difference in meaning between the two nouns or, indeed, as used here, between the two particles.

c. Interpretation. The attempt must now be made to determine the meaning of the statements of the priestly writer. For evidence of the variety of scholarly opinions, see bibliography.

At the one extreme are those who take the words צלם and דמות in the most strictly concrete sense and declare the meaning to be, either that man is a concrete image of God in respect of literal physical resemblance, or that he is made after an actual concrete model or image of God. One translation of a disputed passage in the Gilgamesh Epic (Altorientalische Texte zum AT I 80 ff or ANET 73-99) might seem to support this second suggestion. The word zikru, however, probably does not mean "model" but rather "mental image." A mythological reference to the making of men in the image of a god in a Babylonian or Sumerian epic (there are various examples which could be cited) is conceivable, but the fact that the priestly writer is at pains elsewhere in Gen. 1 to exclude mythology would suggest that here too he may be deliberately rejecting mythology. Certainly there is no trace here of the Babylonian belief that man had in his veins the blood of a god. It is possible that the clear separation in Gen. 1:27 of the statement about the distinction between man and woman from that about man's being made in the image of God may imply a rejection of the view found in a Sumerian liturgy that men and women were made after the image of a god and a goddess respectively.

At the other extreme are the interpretations which depart entirely from the concrete meaning of צלם and offer a purely spiritual interpretation, using words like "personality," "self-consciousness," "self-determination," "immortality" (cf. Wisd. Sol. 2:23-24), "reason," "ability to pass judgment," "freedom of the will," "moral capacity."

The image of God is something which the priestly writer believes to be characteristic of all men (not specially of the king, as in Egypt). He makes no reference to the narrative of the Fall, and he gives as the reason for the command not to commit murder, given after the Flood, that man was made, and therefore presumably still is, in the image of God. This disposes of the dogmatic interpretation which goes back to Justin and Irenaeus that the צלם is reason, which man retained after the Fall, whereas the דמות is justitia originalis, which he lost.

Man's resemblance to God is analogous to Seth's resemblance to his father, Adam. This makes it certain that physical resemblance must not be excluded. We still talk of a boy's being the living image of his father.

The manner in which the creation of man is introduced in 1:26 and the fact that the passage 9:1-7 implies that human life has a greater sanctity than animal life and that this difference is linked with the image of God imply that the writer intends by the phrase "image of God" to express in some way man's peculiar dignity. That there is any intention on the part of the writer of 1:26-27 to imply that, as the woman is the "thou" of the man, so man is the "thou" of God, is more doubtful, though perhaps not impossible. The idea that there is any reference to the relationships within the Godhead must be rejected.

If we start with the possibility that the writer is thinking of man as the image of God in the sense in which a statue can represent the absent ruler (cf. Dan. 3), it will be seen that immediately man acquires dignity and authority as God's representative. It is possible that there is some implied reference to man's erect posture as compared with the animals.

Man and the animals are distinct, and the distinction must not be obscured (Lev. 20:15-16). The possibility that a physical resemblance between God and man is intended should not be excluded on the ground of Deut. 4:15-24. Though no תמונה ("form") was seen at Horeb, it is not denied that God has form, and that he has is clearly the implication of certain theophanies described in the OT (e.g., Isa. 6; Ezek. 1). In the OT there is a curious oscillation between the belief that God cannot be seen and that he can be seen. What the writer in Genesis says is, not that man may make an image of God—this he would have strenuously denied—but that God has made man an image of himself. By stating likeness, he also implies distance. It should also be recognized that to assert external resemblance does not exclude spiritual resemblance. The OT does not treat man as a duality of soul and body. Moreover, anthropomorphisms are used in speaking of God and are not a sign of primitive thought. On the other hand, it is true that P avoids anthropomorphic language as much as possible, and this creates a probability that, when P uses the concrete term צלם, he may well be seeking to convey an abstract idea.

Perhaps we may conclude that, while much of the thought that there is an external resemblance between God and man may be present—Ezekiel, who was a priest, has it, however cautiously he states it—P seems to have reached a measure of abstraction. We may not go far wrong if we say that for him the image of God means personality, provided we remember this must not be understood in the sense of the autonomous, self-legislating self of the philosophers. Man is determined by God as his Creator. By "image of God" may be meant what gives authority, and that God has made him to exercise such may imply responsibility.

Though the image of God must not be defined in terms of the task of ruling over the lower creation, or of ability to do so (cf. Ecclus. 17:3), the two are closely connected. This appears also in Ps. 8, which speaks of God's condescension to, and care of, man and his granting him a status little less than divine and royal honors that he may exercise his rule. The glory and honor with which man is crowned suggest both external beauty and inward dignity. The mythological account of the king of Tyre in Eden (Ezek. 28:12, 17) implies an endowment of beauty and also of wisdom. We may say that Ps. 8 implies dignity and authority and nobility of appearance as God's gift to man to fit him for his cultural task (cf. Gen. 1:26, 28).

2. In the NT. a. Traces of the OT view in the NT. The OT view of the image of God appears without alteration in two passages of the NT—viz., I Cor. 11:7; Jas. 3:9. It is important to notice that in the former passage, εἰκών (the LXX translation of צלם) is coupled with δόξα (cf. Ps. 8), whereas James uses ὁμοίωσις (the LXX translation of דמות). In the same way in Rom. 1:23, ὁμοίωμα is used of "likeness" (דמות), whereas εἰκών seems to mean something more than "image" in the sense of "likeness"—in fact, to signify what completely corresponds to the "prototype," that of which the εἰκών is the "likeness." This change of meaning of εἰκών is also shown in Heb. 10:1, where it is contrasted with σκιά.

b. The NT transformation of the idea. It is this change of meaning of the term εἰκών (the LXX equivalent of צלם) from "likeness" to "perfect reflection of the prototype" which is determinative for the NT. Nothing could make clearer the tremendous impact of the revelation of God in Christ than the fact that it has almost completely obliterated the thought of man as being in the image of God and replaced it with the thought of Christ as being the image of God, that being understood in the sense of perfect correspondence to the divine prototype. In Wisd. Sol. 7: 25-26, Wisdom had been described as a "pure emanation of the glory of the Almighty," a "reflection of eternal light," a "spotless mirror of the working of God," the "image of his goodness." This description is applied to Christ as the Son in Heb. 1:3: "He reflects the glory of God and bears the very stamp of his nature," and this opening assertion of the writer governs his conviction throughout his letter that in Christ reality had come to take the place of shadow.

It is a central theme of the Johannine writings (though the expression "image of God" is not used) that in Christ, who became flesh, a "glory as of the only Son from the Father" became visible (John 1: 14), and that to see Christ was to see the Father (John 12:45; 14:9). I John 3:2 is occupied with the thought that, while men are God's children already, an even more glorious destiny is in store—viz., a likeness to God or, it may be, to Christ, in whom God is visible. It is in Paul's thought that the change of view is most fully worked out.

c. The Pauline view. It is in the Pauline writings that the new thought of Christ as the image of God is most fully worked out and brought into relation with the question of man's destiny. In Col. 1:15 it is stated that Christ, the "beloved Son" (vs. 13), "is the image of the invisible God," while in II Cor. 4:4 we read of "Christ, who is the likeness of God." In both cases the word used is εἰκών. Paul is concerned above all, however, with the practical consequences of this. What interests him is not a philosophy but his gospel. What seems to have happened is that Paul, accepting an exegesis of Gen. 1-2 such as we find in Philo in the distinction he draws between the heavenly man (Gen. 1:26) and the earthly man (Gen. 2:7), identifies man as the image of God (Gen. 1:26) with Christ, as Philo identified him with the Logos. This is worked out in detail in I Cor. 15:45-46 in the contrast between ὁ πρῶτος ἄνθρωπος Ἀδάμ, the first Adam who became at his creation a living soul (נפש חיה) made of the dust and therefore χωϊκός, and ὁ ἔσχατος (δεύτερος) ἄνθρωπος, the last or second Adam, who was a life-giving spirit (cf. II Cor. 3:18: "the Lord who is the Spirit"). If there is any connection here with the Iranian Anthropos myth, it is noticeable that Paul says nothing of the pre-existence of Christ as man—indeed, seems deliberately, by the terminology he uses, to avoid doing so—though elsewhere he speaks of Christ's pre-existence freely (see Col. 1:15: "the first-born of all creation"; Phil. 2:6: "though he was in the form of God"). The man from heaven (I Cor. 15:47) is not pre-existent man. This means that Paul's identification of Christ with the man in the image of God of Gen. 1:26 springs, not from a cosmological, but from a soteriological, concern.

Paul's mind is filled with the thought that it is only in relation with Christ that man can attain the likeness to God which at the first (Gen. 1:26) was only man's in promise. In Phil. 2:6-8 he speaks of Christ's exchanging the form (μορφή) of God, which was his by right, to assume the form of a servant and the likeness of men, μορφή—in both cases, meaning "mode of existence."

As Christians are in this Christ, the relationship will work itself out in the relationships existing in the Christian community. In Col. 3:15 the exchanging of the old man (nature) for the new, "which is being renewed in knowledge after the image of its creator," will bring about a community in which racial, religious, and social distinctions will no longer have any meaning, "but Christ is all, and in all" (cf. Eph. 4: 22-24).

Above all, Christians must "put on love, which binds everything together in perfect harmony" (Col. 3:14). It is in God's plan for men that they should "be conformed [συμμόρφους] to the image of his Son" (Rom. 8:29) and therefore, since there is no distinction, to the image of God. This is an eschatological hope, but it is also in some real measure a present reality, for "we all, with unveiled face, beholding the glory of the Lord, are being changed into his likeness from one degree of glory to another; for this comes from the Lord who is the Spirit" (II Cor. 3: 18; cf. Phil. 3:20-21).

Bibliography. W. Eichrodt, Theologie des AT (2nd rev. ed., 1935), II, 60-65; G. Kittel, "Der übertragene Gebrauch von 'Bild' in NT," BWANT, II (1935), 393-96; G. von Rad, "Die Gottesebenbildlichkeit im AT," BWANT, II (1935), 387-90; P. Humbert, " 'L'Imago Dei' dans l'AT," Études sur le récit du paradis et de la chute dans la Genèse (1940), ch. 5, pp. 153-75; T. C. Vriezen, "La Création de l'homme d'après l'image de Dieu," OTS, II (1943), 87-105; W. Zimmerli, I Mose I-II Die Urgeschichte, I (1943), 75-100; L. Köhler, "Die Grundstelle der Imago-Dei Lehre, Gen. 1:26," Theologische Zeitschrift 4, Jg. 1 (1948), pp. 16-22; H. Schrade, Der Verborgene Gott (1949), p. 316; F. Horst, "Face to Face: The Biblical Doctrine of the Image of God," Interpretation, vol. IV, no. 3 (1950), pp. 259-70; L. Köhler, Theologie des AT (3rd ed., 1953), pp. 134-35; E. Jacob, Théologie de l'AT (1955), pp. 135-40; G. von Rad, Das Erste Buch Mose: Genesis (4th ed., 1956), pp. 44-47.

N. W. Porteous

IMAGINATION. This noun in the older English versions (together with its cognate verb) is a source of misconception to the modern reader, since it ordinarily has the obsolete sense of "plotting or devising evil" rather than the current sense of "the power of freely forming mental images," a concept entirely unfamiliar to the ancient Hebrews, who were not given to fantasy and who conceived of mental activity primarily in terms of preparation for action (see Mind). In Prov. 6:18; Lam. 3:60-61, where the word "imaginations" is found in the KJV, the underlying Hebrew word is מחשבות, which means literally "thoughts," but is more accurately translated by the RSV as "plans" and "devices." The Hebrew word יצר, for which the RSV retains the translation "imagination" in two places (Gen. 6:5; 8:21), does indeed seem to mean the power of forming mental images, but presumably also as a prelude to action, and in three of the five instances in the KJV obviously a bad action. In only two late passages (I Chr. 28:9; 29:18) does the English word have a good, or at least a neutral, sense. Here, as in Deut. 31:21, the RSV translates "purposes" or "plans." In the later rabbinic view the word יצר was taken to mean "impulse," and the conception arose that the יצר הטוב ("the good impulse") and the יצר הרע ("the bad impulse") were elements in the human personality.

The general confusion created by the use of the word "imagination" in the KJV is even worse confounded by its being used in a series of passages (e.g., Deut. 29:19; Jer. 3:17) to translate the Hebrew שרירות, which properly means "stubbornness" and is so translated in the RSV (though usually by means of an adverb rather than the noun).

The situation with respect to the use of the word in the NT is essentially the same as that in the OT. The words διαλογισμοῖς and λογισμοὺς in Rom. 1: 21; II Cor. 10:5, which the KJV, taking account of the bad sense implied by the contexts, translates "imaginations," would be more accurately rendered "reasonings" (cf. RSV). The RSV has retained "imagination" only in Luke 1:51 (for διάνοια, "thought"), presumably because of its liturgical familiarity, and added it in Acts 17:29 to translate ἐνθύμησις (KJV "device").

R. C. Dentan

IMALKUE ĭ măl'kyōō ĭ ['Ιμαλκουέ=ימלכו; Vulg. Emalchuel] (I Macc. 11:39); KJV SIMALCUE sī'məl kū'ĭ. Someone described as "the Arab, who was bringing up Antiochus, the young son of Alexander." It is clear from Greek and Roman writers, as well as from the scriptures (II Sam. 4:4; II Kings 10:2; 11:2), that the companion of a young prince in the ancient world occupied a position of honor and importance. Josephus (Antiq. XIII.v.1) describes Imalkue as "an Arabian prince who had charge of the young Antiochus." At a time when "the troops were murmuring against Demetrius," Trypho, formerly "one of Alexander's supporters," saw an opportunity to set up a rival to Demetrius and sought the aid of Imalkue in a plot to proclaim Alexander's son as King Antiochus VI (I Macc. 11:38-40). The plot was successful, and when Antiochus "began to reign and put on the crown," "all the troops that Demetrius had cast off gathered around him, and they fought against Demetrius, and he fled and was routed" (vss. 54-55).

J. C. Swaim

IMLAH ĭm'lə [ימלה (Kings), ימלא (Chronicles), he is full(?); a name known in Palmyrene]. The father of the prophet Micaiah (I Kings 22:8-9; II Chr. 18:7-8).

IMMANENCE. A philosophical term often used to express the biblical view that while God is elevated in majesty (transcendent), he is also actively present in human affairs. See God, OT View of, § C; Incarnation.

IMMANUEL ĭ măn'yōō əl [עמנו אל, God is with us; 1QIs^a עמנואל; LXX 'Εμμανουήλ]; KJV EMMANUEL in Matt. 1:23. A symbolic name to be given to the child whose birth was foretold by Isaiah as the sign to Ahaz and his court that God would deliver them from their enemies (Isa. 7:14; 8:8). In the NT this name is applied similarly to Jesus.

1. Historical circumstances
2. Lexical problems

3. Exegetical problems
4. History of interpretation
   a. An OT parallel
   b. Early Christian
   c. Jewish
   d. Critical
5. Suggested solution

Bibliography

1. Historical circumstances. In 734 B.C., Judah was threatened by kings REZIN of Syria (Aram) and PEKAH of Israel (Isa. 7:1-2). Their purpose was to compel AHAZ to join a coalition against TIGLATH-PILESER of Assyria. If he refused to comply, they intended to depose the Davidic dynasty and set up in its place "the son of Tabeel" (see TABEEL 1), probably an Aramean. Ahaz was inclined to appeal for help to Tiglath-pileser, and he subsequently took this course (II Kings 16:7 ff). Isaiah was instructed by God to meet Ahaz at a place outside Jerusalem as he was inspecting the defenses of the city. He was to take with him his son SHEAR-JASHUB and assure the king that if he had faith in God, he had nothing to fear from Rezin and Pekah, who were only "two smoldering stumps of fire-brands" on the point of being extinguished. Ahaz was unconvinced.

At some time later Isaiah confronted Ahaz in the presence of the court (Isa. 7:10-13) and offered him a "sign" from Yahweh. The sign might be anything he asked, either from the underworld ("Sheol") or from heaven. Ahaz declined to ask, saying that it was not for him to put God to the test (cf. Deut. 6:16). Whether this was pious timidity on his part, or whether he was masking hypocrisy under a show of piety, is not certain, but Isaiah's forthright indignation points to the latter. He seems to say that Ahaz has renounced his allegiance to Yahweh ("your God" in vs. 11 has become "my God" in vs. 13). Then he goes on: "Therefore the Lord himself will give you [plural] a sign: See, the young woman is [or perhaps will be] pregnant and will give birth to a son, and will give him the name Immanuel." Then follow particulars of the fortunes of the infant Immanuel and what appears to be an assurance that within a comparatively short time the danger to Judah will have passed.

2. Lexical problems. The word translated "young woman" is עלמה. "Virgin" (RSV mg.; KJV) is based on the LXX and Matt. 1:23 (παρθένος). The Hebrew for "virgin" is בתולה, which could be further defined to avoid ambiguity (Gen. 24:16). The word עלמה properly denotes a young woman of marriageable age. Although it must have been a common enough word, it is comparatively little used (Gen. 24:43; Exod. 2:8; Ps. 68:25—H 68:26; Prov. 30:19; Song of S. 1:3; 6:8; Isa. 7:14; and, doubtfully, in one or two psalm titles); the corresponding masculine form, עלם, is used in I Sam. 17:56; 20:22. None of the examples (not even Prov. 30:19) is inconsistent with virginity, unless Isa. 7:14 should be translated: "The young woman is [already] pregnant" (on which see below). The word may have denoted a woman until the birth of her first child, though there is no proof of this. On the other hand, in Ugaritic the corresponding words ġlmt and btlt are both used of the goddess Anat, who was not virgo intacta, and in Palmyrene the plural is used of harlots.

Another problem is the force of the article in "the young woman." The article is sometimes used in describing a situation vivid to the imagination, as in II Sam. 17:17 (cf. G-K § 126q, r); so "a young woman" (RSV). Or it could be used "generically" (G-K § 126m); hence "any young woman," or even "young women." As between the present "is pregnant" and the future "shall be pregnant," the Hebrew can mean either, but the close similarity to Gen. 16:11 is in favor of the first alternative.

The word "sign" (אות) can be used of either natural (Gen. 1:14; 9:12; 17:11; Exod. 3:12; I Sam. 10:7, 9) or supernatural (Exod. 4:8-9; Isa. 38:7, 22) phenomena. When it denotes the latter it is sometimes conjoined with מופת ("portent" or "wonder"), as in Exod. 7:3; Deut. 4:34. In Isa. 7:11 the proffered sign was, to judge from the context, to be supernatural; in vs. 14 it could be natural, the closest parallel being Exod. 3:12, where the meaning is: "This shall be the evidence or proof that it is I who have sent you: when you have done what I tell you, you and the people you have delivered shall worship me here." In other words, the sign is verified as subsequent events happen according to prediction.

3. Exegetical problems. Opinion has been sharply divided on whether the "sign" is a promise or a threat. In vs. 11 it is clearly a promise. But since Ahaz is obdurate (vs. 12), the promise, many suppose, is turned to a threat in vss. 14-17. The arguments for this are: (a) The wider context, vss. 18-25, gives a picture of general desolation; (b) the word "therefore" (vs. 14) introduces a threat in 1:24; 5:13, 24; (c) the name Immanuel could mean "God be with us" in the sense "God help us!" (d) "butter and honey" indicate privation.

The contrary arguments are: (a) The desolation in vss. 18-20, 23-25, may well be that of the dominions of Pekah and Rezin, as in 8:1-4. Vss. 21-22, which picture depopulation and return to a pastoral economy, may apply to Judah, and the situation is consistent with Isaiah's doctrine of the remnant. Isaiah nowhere promises that Judah will be unscathed. In vs. 17 the prosaic "the king of Assyria" is widely regarded as a marginal gloss, and the meaning would then be that Judah will enjoy prosperity such as it had not known since the disruption of Solomon's kingdom, the inference being that the sundered kingdoms will be reunited.

b) "Therefore" can introduce a promise (cf. Jer. 16:14-15), and the meaning would then be: "In the circumstances, since you will not ask for a sign, though Yahweh has offered it, he will have to give it you himself."

c) In all similar annunciation passages (Gen. 16:11; 17:19; Judg. 13:3, 5; Matt. 1:21; Luke 1:13 ff, 31 ff) the birth of the child bodes good. This is equally true of the extrabiblical parallels (see § 5 below). Also the refrain: "Yahweh of hosts is with us" (Ps. 46:7, 11—H 46:8, 12; cf. I Kings 8:57) is always on a note of confidence.

d) For the Hebrews the Promised Land was a "land flowing with milk and honey." "Butter" (חמאה) was made with aromatic herbs from the richest part of the milk (Prov. 30:33), and butter, milk, and honey were luxury foods (Gen. 18:8; Deut. 32:14; Judg. 5:25; II Sam. 17:29; Job 20:17; 29:6). In Babylonia they were ingredients in cultic ceremonies, and in Ugaritic texts fruitfulness is accompanied by abundance of butter (ḥm't=חמאה) and milk (ḥlb=חלב). In late Jewish texts (Sibylline Oracles V.282; II Enoch 8.5-6) the righteous are to eat milk and honey in paradise. The association of "butter and honey" with privation may, however, be true insofar as they were given to those who had recently been in privation (cf. Judg. 5:25; II Sam. 17:29), or the inference may be that the crops have been devastated.

4. History of interpretation. a. An OT parallel. A passage similar to Isa. 7:14 is Mic. 5:3—H 5:2:

> Therefore he shall give them up until the time > when she who is in travail has brought forth.

If this is from Isaiah's contemporary Micah, it may be an independent prophecy. Many think it is later than Micah himself, in which case it may be an interpretation of Isaiah. It is in vaguer terms than Isa. 7:14, but it is to be noted that in both passages the birth of the child is to be followed by what appears to be the reunion of Israel and Judah (Isa. 7:17; Mic. 5:3*b*).

b. Early Christian. The earliest clear interpretation is Matt. 1:22-23, in which the Immanuel oracle is taken as a prophecy of the virgin birth of Christ. This interpretation lay ready to hand in the LXX rendering ἡ παρθένος. It was almost unchallenged in Christendom until the end of the eighteenth century, notwithstanding that in the Isaiah context the sign must have been something relevant to the situation in which Ahaz found himself. Indeed, it is clearly indicated that by the time the child is able to discriminate between foods he likes and foods he does not like (for this interpretation of "to refuse the evil and choose the good," see II Sam. 19:35)—i.e., by the time he is weaned—Syria and Ephraim will be devastated. Damascus was destroyed in 733-732 B.C.

c. Jewish. The Jews reacted strongly against the Christian interpretation, and in the Greek translations of Aq., Symm., and Theod. they substituted νεᾶνις for παρθένος. They maintained that Immanuel was Hezekiah, the first-born son of Ahaz. The Christian reply to this was that if Ahaz reigned sixteen years (II Kings 16:2) and Hezekiah was twenty-five years old when he came to the throne (II Kings 18:2), Hezekiah must already have been nine years old when the Immanuel prophecy was uttered. Accordingly, medieval Jewish scholars came to identify the עלמה with either the wife of Isaiah or another wife of Ahaz. The objections to the wife of Isaiah are that elsewhere the prophet refers to her as "the prophetess" (8:3) and that since she had already borne one child, Shear-jashub, she could hardly be called עלמה.

d. Critical. From the end of the eighteenth century the traditional Christian interpretation was being increasingly abandoned. By the turn of the twentieth century it was common for critical scholars to take the article in העלמה generically and to make the sign mean little more than an assurance that within a year the situation would have changed so much for the better that women bearing male children would be calling their boys Immanuel. This implied that the Immanuel sign was no longer to be taken as having any messianic significance, such as might still be assumed for Isa. 9:1-7; 11:1-9. And it must be conceded that the NT is not regulative for the interpretation of the OT; e.g., Matt. 2:15 cannot make the original meaning of Hos. 11:1 anything other than that God delivered Israel from Egypt at the Exodus.

5. Suggested solution. The view summarized in § 4 above has never gone unchallenged. Isolated scholars, not fundamentalists, have maintained something like the traditional interpretation, this in view of the many ancient myths which tell of the virgin birth of a wonder child. There must, it is postulated from Isa. 7:14; Mic. 5:3, have been a similar popular expectation in Israel.

This postulate has been strengthened by a passage in a Ras Shamra text: hl ġlmt tld b(n), "See! the ġlmt shall give birth to a son" (Nikkal and the Kathirat, line 7), which, with the omission of a single word, is the same as in Isa. 7:14. In another text (II Aqhat II.1 ff), Danel cries: k yld bn ly, "for a son is born to me" (cf. Isa. 9:6). This makes it difficult to disassociate the Immanuel sign from the messianic passages in Isa. 9; 11. In the Ras Shamra Texts the children are the offspring of divine, or at least royal, marriages. It is therefore probable that the Immanuel sign is to be interpreted in the context of a widespread divine-royal annunciation formula, in which the words btlt and ġlmt ("virgin" and "young woman"), which are frequently used together, had a cultic, rather than a biological, signification. (This is without prejudice to the historicity of the nativity story in Matt. 1, where ἡ παρθένος certainly means virgo intacta and the story is one the historicity of which must be decided on its merits.) The likelihood is that the "young woman" of Isa. 7:14 was the wife of Ahaz and that she was thought to share something of the sacral character of the king her husband (see KING § 4). In this case the original Immanuel may have been Hezekiah. The objection that Hezekiah was already born when the Immanuel sign was given (see § 4*c above*) is not fatal: II Kings 16:2; 18:2, if taken exactly as they stand, seem to be in need of some correction, since they would make Ahaz only eleven years older than his son Hezekiah.

There is no indication that Hezekiah or any contemporary of Isaiah was actually named Immanuel. For that matter, the names in Isa. 9:6—H 9:5 are honorific rather than personal. Nor, on the traditional interpretation, was Jesus called Immanuel, except subsequently, and occasionally, in the language of devotion. It is true that Isaiah apostrophizes Immanuel in 8:8: "Its outspread wings will fill the breadth of your land, O Immanu-el." The attempt has sometimes been made to read this as ". . . the breadth of the land, for God is with us" (as in vs. 10—this without change of the Hebrew consonants). But such a reading makes nonsense in the context, and in the Qumran scroll of Isaiah the letter kaph is clearly a pronominal suffix in the expression "your land." That Isaiah should address Immanuel in a single lyrical passage is not proof that an actual Immanuel was at that time on the throne of Judah. The only names similar to Immanuel are, so far as is known, Immadiyahu, "Yah(u) is with me," on an early Hebrew seal, and Immanuiah, "Yah(weh) is with us," in a papyrus from Elephantine (fifth century B.C.).

It is obvious that the problems presented by Isa. 7:14 ff are complicated and that in the present state of our knowledge no final answer to them can be given. There have been Protestant scholars, not fundamentalists, who have favored the traditional interpretation that the sign is a direct prediction of Christ; also, Catholic scholars who have only accepted the traditional interpretation with reservations. The difficulty is to see how a long range prediction could have any intelligible meaning for Ahaz, the more so since Isa. 7:14 ff appears to say that the child, whether or not he is already conceived, will be born within a comparatively short time.

The possibility must be considered that a prophecy may have a proximate fulfilment which nevertheless does not exhaust its meaning. If we say that the original Immanuel was Hezekiah, we are not saying that the further application of the sign to Jesus in the NT was unwarranted fantasy. The widespread ancient myth of the dying and rising god bears a certain superficial resemblance to the NT account of the death and resurrection of Christ. This does not mean that the death and resurrection of Christ are mythical. It means that the Christian gospel is the historicization of ideas and longings which, for all their crudity, are, and were intended by God to be, a praeparatio evangelica. Or, it is generally agreed today that the kings in Pss. 2; 45; 110 were actual reigning kings of Israel or Judah; the author of the Letter to the Hebrews, not inappropriately, gives to the Psalms a messianic-christological interpretation. It is a far cry from early expectations of a wonder child to the Incarnation of God in Christ. The complex of messianic oracles in Isa. 7; 9; 11 is the middle term between them.

Bibliography. In addition to the Commentaries on Isa. 1–39 listed under ISAIAH, see: F. Giesebrecht, "Die Emmanuelweissagung," TSK, LXI (1888), 217-46; K. Fullerton, "Immanuel," AJSL, XXXIV (1918), 256-83; E. Norden, Die Geburt des Kindes (1924); R. Kittel, Die hellenistische Mysterienreligion und das AT (1924); H. Gressmann, Der Messias (1929), pp. 235-42; E. G. Kraeling, "The Immanuel Prophecy," JBL, L (1931), 277-97; W. C. Graham, "Isaiah's Part in the Syro-Ephraimitic Crisis," AJSL, L (1934), 201-16; C. B. Hansen, "Immanuel," Dansk teologisk tidsskrift, III (1940), 31-47; J. J. Stamm, "La prophétie d'Emmanuel," Revue de Théologie et de Philosophie, N.S. XXXII (1944), 97-123; G. Widengren, "Hieros gamos och underjordvistelse," Religion och Bibel, VII (1948), 17-46; E. Hammershaimb, "The Immanuel Sign," Studia Theologica, III (1949), 124-42; J. Coppens, "La prophétie de la 'almah," Ephemerides Theologicae Lovanienses, XXVIII (1952), 648-78; S. Mowinckel, He That Cometh (trans. G. W. Anderson; 1956), pp. 110-19; N. Gottwald, "Immanuel as the Prophet's Son," Vetus Testamentum, 8 (1958), 36-47; J. Lindblom, A Study of the Immanuel Section in Isaiah, Isa. vii.1–ix.6 (1958). C. R. NORTH

IMMER ĭm′ər [Aram. אמר, lamb (-village); Apoc. (A) Ἐμμηρούθ (I Esd. 5:24), Ἐμμήρ (I Esd. 9:21); Apoc. (B) Ἀλλάρ (I Esd. 5:36)]; KJV Apoc. MERUTH mĭr′əth (I Esd. 5:24), EMMER ĕm′ər (I Esd. 9:21), AALAR ā′ə lər (I Esd. 5:36). 1. A priest or priestly house first listed as a contemporary of David in I Chr. 24:14. Pashhur, Jeremiah's priestly opponent, is identified with this family (Jer. 20:1), and other members are prominently mentioned from the postexilic period. The line is represented among the priests returned from Babylon (I Chr. 9:12; Ezra 2:37; cf. Neh. 7:40; I Esd. 5:24). Two of them were among those persuaded by Ezra to divorce their foreign wives (Ezra 10:20; I Esd. 9:21). One Zadok of this house helped repair the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. 3:29), and they are included in the list of priests resident in Jerusalem after the Exile (Neh. 11:13). B. T. DAHLBERG

2. A Babylonian place, unidentified, from which Jewish exiles, who could not prove their ancestry with genealogical records, returned to Palestine (Ezra 2:59; Neh. 7:61; I Esd. 5:36). Later Jewish records mention a Kefar Imra ("lamb-village") in the Jerusalem Talmud (Ta'an. IV.69*a;* cf. Lamentations Rabbah on II.2: נמרא). R. A. BOWMAN IMMORALITY [πορνεία]. Some kind of unlawful sexual intercourse. The RSV sometimes translates "fornication" (the usual KJV translation), "unchastity," and in two cases "impurity" in the phrase "impure passion" (τοῦ θυμοῦ τῆς πορνείας; Rev. 14:8; 18:3). Paul speaks of a case of immorality involving a man's living with his father's wife (I Cor. 5:1); he fears he will find many cases of (sexual) immorality in Corinth (II Cor. 12:21). He lists immorality as one of the works of the flesh (Gal. 5:19); he says that the man who engages in immorality sins against his own body (I Cor. 6:18) and will not inherit the kingdom of God (I Cor. 6:9-10; Gal. 5:19-21; cf. Eph. 5:3, 5). Because of the temptation of immorality, it is better for each person to marry (I Cor. 7:2). Christians are not to associate with "immoral" Christians (I Cor. 5:11).

In Revelation "immorality" is often used figuratively in the sense of apostasy from God, or idolatry, as in the OT (cf. II Kings 9:22; Jer. 3:2, 9; Hos. 6:10; Rev. 2:21; 9:21). B. H. THROCKMORTON, JR.

IMMORTALITY [ἀθανασία (I Cor. 15:53); ἀφθαρσία (Rom. 2:7), lit., incorruptibility]. Once a relationship between Yahweh and DEATH had been affirmed, there could be hope of a victory over death; for where Yahweh reigns, life must dominate. If Yahweh can cure persons dying of illness, he can also make manifest his power over death, once death's work is finished. The assertion that Yahweh is a living god is a central theme of the OT (Pss. 18:46—H 18:47; 42:2—H 42:3; 84:2—H 84:3; etc.; Jer. 23:36; Hos. 1:10—H 2:1). The affirmation of his eternity is only the consequence of his existence. The living God stands in contrast both to the pagan deities, who are only dead idols (II Kings 19:4, 16; Ps. 106:28; Jer. 10:11), and to men, who are mortal.

The life that Yahweh possesses is, moreover, a source of life that he puts at the service of his faithfulness to men and his covenant with them. Thus Yahweh can restore a life weakened by illness and sin—an action presented as a revivification, expressed with the help of the root היה (Job 33:19-26; Pss. 30:2-3—H 30:3-4; 56:13—H 56:14; 71:20; 143:11). Nothing prevents Yahweh from exercising this regenerating power, once death has completed its work. The OT mentions several cases of persons' being restored to life by Elijah and Elisha—the son of the widow of Zarephath (I Kings 17:17-21), the son of the Shunammite (II Kings 4:18-37), and the body of an anonymous individual reanimated by contact with the bones of Elisha (II Kings 13:20-21). In these instances the resurrections are more akin to the cure of the very ill than to the final resurrection. They occur shortly after death, when the body has not yet been reduced to dust, and they only prolong life. A more definitive victory over death occurs in the taking up to God of certain privileged individuals. Thus Enoch (Gen. 5:24) and Elijah (II Kings 2:10-11) were taken by God (לקח) without dying. Pseudepigraphic tradition ascribes a similar fate to Moses by interpreting Deut. 34:5 in the sense of a taking away (cf. Asmp. Moses 11:9 ff). These examples have been considered to be premonitory signs of a more general reality.

Faith in immortality was oriented in two main directions:

a) The idea of a possible return to life gained wider and wider acceptance. The Israelites could not remain unaffected by the Canaanite belief in the death and resurrection of a divinity who symbolized the life of nature. The faithful linked themselves with the idea of death and resurrection within the cult. Certain expressions employed by the Israelites in their own religion may be adapted from the faith of the Canaanites. Thus Hos. 6:1 ff perhaps imitates a liturgical theme of a cult celebrating the death and resurrection of the god. The lament for King Jehoiakim might likewise be borrowed from Canaanite ritual (Jer. 22:18). It is not impossible that Israel may have shared with its neighbors a belief in the immortality of the king (cf. Ezek. 34:24; 37:24), although this idea should be explored only with extreme caution. It should be emphasized, on the other hand, that this mystical attitude toward nature, which is the essence of Canaanite religion, served to render the Israelites very cautious in speculating about eternity.

Probably the idea of the resurrection of the dead underlies certain images in which the future of the Israelitic people is presented as a resurrection. In addition to the text of Hosea already cited, the vision of the prophet Ezekiel (ch. 37) may be mentioned. The precision with which this text describes the reanimation of the bones of the dead and the coming out from the tombs seems to suggest that certain precise ideas relative to death underlie these images. In the fourth song of the Servant of Yahweh, a long, probably immortal, life is mentioned. This life is granted him as a compensation for his sufferings and death, which are accepted as an expiation for the sins of others (Isa. 53:8, 10). In Dan. 12:2 resurrection is extended to a greater number (רבים). It is not yet a question of the resurrection of all, but of many, and this resurrection will be twofold in nature, being followed by the recompensing of some and the punishment of others. The resurrection is born from the Maccabean wars and from the problem presented to faith by the martyrdom of so many just people, who should normally have been rewarded with the blessings of this life. It is definitively conceived as a form of retribution. Isa. 26:19 in speaking of "thy dead" probably also refers to the martyrs.

As well as being an expression of retribution, the resurrection appears as the logical and necessary consequence of the extension of Yahweh's reign over the whole earth. When Yahweh becomes king, death will be destroyed forever (Isa. 25:8), and the host on high will be punished, together with Leviathan and the other powers who keep the dead captive in Sheol (24:21; 27:1 ff). At the same time Yahweh will spread over the earth a "dew of light" (26:19—H 29:19), the resurrection being thus identified with a new creation more perfect than the first. For the author of Ps. 22, the resurrection likewise forms part of the triumph of the reign of Yahweh (vss. 29-30). Israelitic faith was perhaps influenced by the Iranian religion in certain aspects of the idea of resurrection—e.g., in the association of the resurrection with retribution and with the messianic hope. On the other hand, hope of an eternal life based on the immortality of the soul is entirely foreign to the OT, and the cosmic myth of the destruction and renewal of the world, which was basic in Iran, was far less important in Israel than was faith in the power and justice of Yahweh.

b) The second current of thought is not characterized by a consideration of the possibilities and modes of resurrection. It is a matter of faith which, trusting to God for the choice of a solution, asks no other certitude than communion with him. This attitude, which may be termed mystic, occurs in several psalms. The author of Ps. 16 is not concerned with what will happen after death, but for him communion with Yahweh is so strong a reality that it could not be destroyed by death. Since Yahweh is the living god, this communion likewise means to the psalmist a life after death. A similar hope is perhaps expressed in Ps. 17:15, even though the allusion to resurrection is not obvious there. In Pss. 49; 73 the psalmists seem to find a possible solution to the problem of death in the taking up to God of certain privileged beings (cf. the use of the verb לקח, "take," in Pss. 49:15—H 49:16; 73:24). The author of Ps. 49 is certain that since he has been just and faithful, death will not be for him the inexorably destructive force that it will be for the ungodly. The author of Ps. 73, threatened with a premature and unjust death, knows that even if death takes place, it cannot end his communion with God, which no power can destroy. This is already the triumphal faith expressed by the apostle Paul at the end of Rom. 8, that nothing can separate from God's love a man who knows he has been chosen by God. The same attitude appears in Job 19:26, where primary emphasis is put neither on retribution on earth nor on the resurrection, but on the certainty of "seeing" God, a term which always means communion with God, generally through the cult. Job's faith is in knowing that his communion with God will exist, whatever happens, and this precisely at a time when sight and reasoning seem to prove the contrary.

It is this profoundly religious current which contributed the most strongly to transforming the idea of the resurrection into a living faith. With the triumph of a clearly individualistic doctrine of retribution, the ideas of immortality and resurrection came to occupy an increasingly important place in Judaism. These ideas, however, were far from receiving unanimous acceptance. They are clearly rejected by Ecclesiasticus, Judith, Tobit, Baruch, and I Maccabees (cf. I Macc. 2:49, 70), and the Sadducean party remains faithful to this position. An affirmative attitude is expressed in II Macc. 7:9 ff, in the parables of Enoch, in the book of Baruch, and in the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (particularly that of Judah). The terms of Isa. 26:19; Dan. 12:2 are re-employed and made explicit, although numerous variations occur in these writings as to the mode and place of resurrection and as to the nature of the resuscitated bodies.

The texts of Qumran speak now of a resurrection of the just (1QH XI.12), now of an "eternal joy in a life without end" in the shining world of God and the angels (1QS IV.7-8). In the writings of Alexandrine Judaism the idea of a resurrection is replaced by that of the immortality of souls near God (Wisd. Sol. 3:1 ff; 9:15; IV Maccabees). Popular Judaism compromised between the beliefs inherited from the OT and the Greek or Greco-Iranian ideas. In Enoch 22 the "spirits of the souls of the dead" are distributed in Sheol among four compartments—which is already a form of judgment—and have an independent existence while waiting to resume a bodily form on the day of resurrection. The same combination of the doctrine of the immortality of the soul with that of the resurrection (which sometimes leads to original points of view), reappears in II Esdras (IV Ezra), particularly in ch. 7. An analogous attitude may be found in the NT, where, besides the clear assertion of corporal resurrection, is found a belief in immortality and in a life near God immediately following death (cf. Luke 16:24). Jesus, however, by insisting on the reality and omnipotence of the living God in speaking of life after death, rejoins the fundamental assertions of the OT, passing over contemporaneous Judaic belief (Matt. 22:23; Mark 12:26).

Bibliography. J. Touzard, "Le développement de la doctrine de l'immortalité dans l'AT," RB (1898), pp. 207 ff. L. F. Burney, Israel's Hope of Immortality (1909). W. V. Baudissin, Adonis und Eshmun (1911); "Alttestamentliches 'ḥajjim' Leben in der Bedeutung von Glück," Festschrift (ed. Sachau; 1913), pp. 143-61; J. Lindblom, Das ewige Leben (1914). A. Bertholet, "The Pre-Christian Belief in the Resurrection of the Body," AJT (1916), pp. 1 ff. E. Sellin, "Die alttestamentliche Hoffnung auf Auferstehung und ewiges Leben," NKZ (1919), pp. 232 ff. F. Noetscher, Altorientalischer und alttestamentlicher Auferstehungsglauben (1926). W. Baumgartner, "Der Auferstehungsglauben im Alten Orient," Zeitschrift für Missionskunde und Religionswissenschaft (1933), pp. 193-214. J. Schmid, "Der Ewigkeitsbegriff im AT," AA (1940). A. T. Nikolainen, "Der Auferstehungsglaube in der Bibel und ihrer Umwelt," Annales Acad. Scient. fennicae (1944). W. Bieder, "Auferstehung des Fleisches oder des Leibes?" Theologische Zeitschrift (1945), pp. 105 ff. H. Birkeland, "The Belief of the Resurrection of the Dead in the OT," Studia Theologica (Lund, 1950), pp. 60-78. L. Rost, "Alttestamentliche Wurzeln der ersten Auferstehung," In Memoriam E. Lohmeyer (1951), pp. 67 ff. J. Guillet, "Les sources scriptuaires de la foi en la résurrection de la chair," Bible et Vie chrétienne (1953), p. 40. G. Molin, "Entwicklung und Motive der Auferstehung vom AT bis zur rabbinischen Zeit," Judaica (1953), pp. 225 ff. H. J. Franken, The Mystical Communion with YHWH in the Book of Psalms (1954).

See also bibliography under DEATH. E. JACOB

IMNA ĭm'nə [ימנע, may he (God) preserve] (I Chr. 7:35). A descendant of Asher.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 28, 197.

IMNAH ĭm'nə [ימנה, luck, good fortune]; KJV JIMNA jĭm'— in Num. 26:44; KJV JIMNAH in Gen. 46:17. 1. An eponym; listed as a son of Asher (Gen. 46:17 [cf. Jub. 44:21]; Num. 26:44; I Chr. 7:30).

2. A Levite; the father of Kore, a contemporary of King Hezekiah (II Chr. 31:14).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 224. B. T. DAHLBERG

IMPALEMENT. An ancient Near Eastern method of execution, whereby a spiked stake was set in the ground (or wall) and a living body thrust upon it (usually between the legs). In Ezra 6:11 (יזקף יתמחא; lit., "and being raised up, let him be stuck on it") this is set as the penalty for altering the edict of Darius relative to rebuilding the temple; a timber of the offender's house is used. Impalement was practiced by the Assyrians for prisoners of war, deserters,

3. Victims impaled by the Assyrians on the hill; from an Assyrian relief and malefactors guilty of the more horrible crimes or unnatural vice.* Darius is said to have impaled three thousand when he took the city of Babylon (Herodotus Hist. 3.159). Fig. IMP 3.

Some scholars feel the biblical references Num. 25:4; Deut. 21:22-23; Josh. 8:29; II Sam. 21:6, 9; Esth. 9:14 refer to impalement. See HANGING.

Bibliography. A. H. Layard, Babylon and Nineveh (1853), p. 335n; W. D. Birch and T. G. Pinches, The Bronze Ornaments of the Palace Gates of Balawat (1902), pp. 2*b*, 4*b*, 10*a*; A. T. Olmstead, History of Assyria (1923), pp. 87, 112, 114, 144, 177, 308, 551. V. H. KOOY

IMPEDIMENT IN SPEECH [μογιλάλος]. Labored speech; a disturbance of the organ of speech causing one to speak with difficulty—i.e., to make no intelligible sounds (Mark 7:32). The ancient versions understood the term here to mean "mute, dumb."

While Mark 7:37 (ἀλάλους, "speechless") suggests "mute" or "dumb," vs. 35 (ἐλάλει ὀρθῶς, "He spoke plainly") and the alternative reading of a number of MSS in vs. 32 (μογγιλάλον, "hoarse of speech") would indicate that the man with an impediment in his speech was unintelligible in his speaking, rather than without the faculty of speech.

The phraseology was undoubtedly meant by the author to recall the messianic passage Isa. 35:5-6 (where μογιλάλος is used in the LXX to translate אלם, "dumb"), as indicated by the concluding comment of the people: "He has done all things well; he even makes the deaf hear and the dumb speak" (vs. 37).

The word occurs also in Exod. 4:11 Aq., Symm., and Theod. (LXX δυσκωφος, "injured in one of the senses," "deaf," "mute"), and in Isa. 56:10 Aq. (LXX ἐνεόι, "silent from terror or amazement").

Bibliography. H. B. Swete, The Gospel According to St. Mark (1898), p. 151; J. M. Lagrange, Evangile selon Saint Marc (1920), p. 187; V. Taylor, The Gospel According to Saint Mark (1952), pp. 353-54. V. H. KOOY

IMPRISONMENT. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS.

IMPURITY. See CLEAN AND UNCLEAN.

IMRAH ĭm'rə [ימרה, may he rebel(?); or read ימנע, Imna(?); see bibliography] (I Chr. 7:36). A descendant of Asher.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 246.

IMRI ĭm'rī [אמרי, contraction of אמריהו, Yahu has uttered, or Yahu has promised]. 1. Ancestor of one of the returned exiles (I Chr. 9:4); possibly to be identified with the AMARIAH of the parallel Neh. 11:4.

2. The father of the Zaccur who helped repair the wall of Jerusalem in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. 3:2).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 38, 173. B. T. DAHLBERG

INCANTATIONS. Ceremonial chants used by magicians to exorcise malevolent spirits and to heal the sick. The technique of the magicians engaged in this work consisted of two distinct parts: (a) the chanting of these incantations—i.e., the pronouncement of "words of power"; and (b) the performance of prescribed acts—i.e., the use of certain substances charged with supernatural potency.

The quality of the ingredients employed by the "physicians" varied in accordance with the nature of the sickness, but the spells, which constituted the most important element of the whole procedure, remained, to a degree, stereotyped in form. These were collected and classified by the conjuration priests into special "incantation series" for the ready use of the practitioners. The Babylonian incantation commonly consisted of three parts: (a) the invocation of the names of the great gods by the magician in whose behalf he acted; (b) the identification of the spirit (or sorcerer) which caused the sickness; and (c) the call on the demon to leave the body of the sufferer, which often ended with the words: "By heaven be ye exorcised! By earth be ye exorcised!"

We have no extant text of a Palestinian incantation from the biblical period. The OT terms חובר חברים (lit., "one who mutters sounds") and מלחש (lit., "one who whispers"; Ps. 58:5—H 58:6) probably refer to the art of chanting incantations (see ENCHANTER). Acts 19:13 reports that "itinerant Jewish exorcists [in Ephesus] undertook to pronounce the name of the Lord Jesus over those who had evil spirits." The invocation of the name of Jesus was part of an incantation formula used by these exorcists. That incantation manuals, similar to those in use in Egypt and Babylonia, were in circulation in Ephesus and could be obtained at a price seems to be clear from vs. 19, in which we are informed that "a number of those who practiced magic arts brought their books together and burned them in the sight of all; and they counted the value of them and found it came to fifty thousand pieces of silver." See EXORCISM. I. MENDELSOHN

INCARNATION ĭn'kär nā'shən [Lat. incarnatio, being or taking flesh]. God's becoming man; more particularly, in Christian usage, the revelation of God in the human life of Jesus of Nazareth. The Christian use of the term was derived from the Latin version of John 1:14, and is frequent in Latin Christian authors from the fourth century onward.

1. Fundamental significance
   a. Generally
   b. In Christianity
2. In the gospels
   a. Mark
   b. Matthew and Luke
   c. John
3. In Acts and the letters
   a. Acts
   b. I–II Peter
   c. Paul
   d. The Pastoral letters
   e. Hebrews
4. In the OT
Bibliography

1. Fundamental significance. a. Generally. Incarnation signifies the assumption by a divine being of human or animal form. More is meant than simply divine influence, however continuous, as, e.g., in the case of the prophets of Israel or the imams (divinely appointed leaders) of Mohammedanism. The elevation of a human being to divine honors—properly speaking, apotheosis—is also to be distinguished from incarnation. The idea of incarnation is found in various religions, but its most serious expression is its use in Christian theology with reference to Christ.

In Hinduism, Rama, the hero of the epic Ramayana, was regarded as divine, and, probably later, as an incarnation of the god Vishnu. Buddhism can think of the Buddha as an incarnation of Vishnu. In ancient Egyptian religion the deities could be thought of as incarnate in men or animals; and dead men could become incarnate again (this borders on the belief in metempsychosis or the transmigration of souls). More particularly, the king in Egypt was an incarnation of one of the gods. The theory was that his father in the act of begetting was really the god Ra, who had assumed the father's body. One sect of Muslims, the Shiites, believe that Allah became incarnate in the Prophet's son-in-law Ali.

The incarnations of subordinate deities are not very significant, nor are repeated incarnations of the same deity. More noteworthy is the conception of an incarnation of the one God, as in Hinduism. Distinctive of Christianity is the note of finality in the thought of Christ's incarnation. Incarnation cannot mean so much in Hinduism as in Christianity, because of the pantheistic presuppositions of Hinduism—viz., that the divine (Brahma) is not transcendent but all-pervasive; moreover, Hinduism attaches no significance to personality and individuality.

b. Christian. John 1:14 is the fundamental affirmation of Christianity. The fullest revelation of God was personal, in a particular life. For Jesus ben Joseph, carpenter of Nazareth, 6 B.C.-A.D. 30, was no mere Galilean, or Jew, a man of the first century A.D. He was the incarnation of God. In his actual, Jewish life the life and power of God were in action (John 10:30; 14:10). He was the revelation not only of human potentialities as carpenter, teacher, and prophet, but also of divine truth and power. Henceforward God was to be addressed, in the circle of his adherents, as the "Father of our Lord Jesus Christ." And this means much more than that Christ was an avatar, or temporary manifestation of deity—a conception congenial to other faiths. Nor was the theory known as adoptionism acceptable. According to this theory Jesus was adopted, or promoted, to divine status at a certain point in his earthly career, because of his resistance to temptation, his moral achievement, etc. Although some features of the most primitive preaching of the church lend plausibility to this theory, it was early defined as heresy—i.e., as not adequate to the true stature of Christ. He was divine throughout the whole period of his humanity. From the very beginning of his earthly existence he was God incarnate, although, by an ineluctable paradox in the Christian affirmation, his humanity was fully real.

In his flesh the Logos—i.e., mind—of God was expressed. He not merely conveys or mediates that mind, like the Hebrew prophets, but, so John assures us, he is to be identified with it, and his human life made God's mind personally present and real before men in an unprecedented manner. The opening verses of the Letter to the Hebrews make the same assertion.

The coming of Christ is explicable in terms of the Logos conception—i.e., roughly speaking, in terms of the best human thinking up to that date about God and his self-communication to the world. All that men had truly discerned about God is illuminated, and brought to a focus, in Christ. The eternal, cosmic, mediating principle between God and the world is no longer a philosophic term, but a human life. In the life of Jesus, as the Christian tradition bears witness to it, can be discerned the mode of operation of the universe. The meaning of the universe and the nature of God are related to the nature of Christ. For he is the Logos, the eternal Son of God, on whom the universe depends. See CHRIST.

The question may be raised, How much more is implied by incarnation than by REVELATION? Roughly speaking, the Logos doctrine explains revelation adequately enough. The Logos stands for God as revealed—i.e., not for his transcendent being or inner nature, but for that of God which can be projected into the world and become immanent. In the OT and Hellenistic Judaism this was expressed in terms of WISDOM. John goes further when he declares that the Logos became immanent in a human life. This is more than speaking of revelation at a point in history, or of a climax of revelation. Incarnation is the final form of revelation. The revelation vouchsafed in Christ so much surpasses other revelation as to make John assert that other revelations do not count (1:18; 10:8; 14:6). And in the earlier gospel tradition one finds Jesus saying that the mutual knowledge of Father and Son is now available to those "to whom the Son chooses to reveal him" (Matt. 11:27). The ultimate goal of knowing and being known by God (cf. I Cor. 13:12; Gal. 4:9; Col. 1:9-10) is brought within reach through Christ's ministry among men.

A doctrine of the Incarnation must take some account of the ATONEMENT, because the revelation Christ brought was not complete until his passion and resurrection. It is not only Christ's birth as a man, but also his whole life and achievement which give him supreme significance both as revealer of the divine concern for man and as solver of the human problem. He came into the world to deal with sin (Rom. 8:3), to make goodness possible, to bring men into a harmonious relationship with their Creator (Rom. 5–8), to impart that knowledge of God without which man cannot truly live (John 10:10; 20:31).

His achievement was not simply his, qua man; for God was operating in and through him. This is clear in the witness of the NT, and it is this twofold aspect of his person which the later doctrine of the two natures, the divine and the human, was formulated to conserve. The paradox of God incarnate, of Christ as God-Man, is typical of the whole operation of God as our redeemer. And it may be argued that apart from belief in the Incarnation we cannot ultimately believe in Christ as redeemer.

2. In the gospels. a. Mark. Mark's Gospel has no birth narrative or genealogy, but it gives prominence to Jesus' divine sonship. Jesus is acclaimed "my beloved Son" by a heavenly voice at his baptism and transfiguration (1:11; 9:7). The question whether these were private experiences of Jesus, or whether they represent a wider awareness of his function at that time, cannot be taken up here. The Baptism and the Transfiguration are cardinal moments in Jesus' ministry, however they are to be interpreted in detail. Of lesser importance, though noteworthy in Mark's narrative, is the recognition of Jesus' divine nature by demons (3:11; 5:7; etc.) and by the centurion at the Cross (15:39).

The christological parable generally referred to as that of the laborers in the vineyard (12:1-11) is primarily intended to illustrate, not Israel's recalcitrance, but the martyrdom of God's final messenger to them, who is no less than his Son. Two new points are made about Jesus' sonship: It is distinguished from the relationship of other servants of God to him—i.e., it is a unique relationship—and it is destined to lead to self-sacrifice in death. The parable is told, as it were, under the shadow of the cross, and in this we can be sure that we have Jesus' own conception of his destiny. For the uniqueness of his relationship to the Father we refer also to 13:32, and to the account of the agony in Gethsemane, where the retention of the Aramaic Abba (14:36)—an actual memory of Jesus at prayer, as overheard both at Gethsemane and elsewhere—expresses the relationship more intimately. This is accentuated by Matthew, who reiterates "My Father" (Matt. 26:39-44). This Abba is more significant than the Abinu (Our Father) of the Jewish Prayer Book, and also than the "Our Father" of the Lord's Prayer.

The historical accuracy of the accounts of Jesus' trial is more doubtful. In Mark 14:61-62 Jesus accepts the high priest's charge that he claimed to be the "Son of the Blessed" (i.e., God). This is intended as a synonym for "Messiah." In the Lukan account we note that the claim to messiahship and the claim to sonship are differentiated (Luke 22:67-70).

b. Matthew and Luke. Mark's statement of the basic Christology is taken up into the developed Christologies of Matthew and Luke. The distinctively Matthean and Lukan features, such as their stress on Jesus' kingship (Matthew) or on his humanity (Luke), are not so relevant to his incarnation and sonship. The theme of Jesus as the one who establishes the kingdom of God is also more emphasized in Matthew and Luke than in Mark. The KINGDOM OF GOD means the divine, redemptive activity in which Jesus was the central actor. But Jesus' relationship with God is not precisely defined in passages about the kingdom. As inaugurator of the kingdom he is differentiated from all other men, even from those who could justifiably be called heralds of the kingdom—e.g., the prophets of Israel, culminating in John the Baptist. As Messiah, Jesus himself is King of Israel, and this receives some prominence, especially in Matt. 2:1-11 (cf. Mark 15:1-32; John 18:33–19:22).

For our purpose the most significant additional materials furnished by Matthew and Luke are their accounts of the birth of Jesus and the notable Logion which they derive from the primitive sayings source Q (Matt. 11:25-27; Luke 10:21-22).

The birth narratives of Matthew's and Luke's gospels testify that, though the birth of Christ (and his consequent humanity) was real, his paternity was divine rather than human. In the intention of both evangelists, it is not so much the virginity of Mary as the activity of the Holy Spirit which is emphasized.

According to Luke (1:26-38), Mary's child was conceived without human sexual relationship, but through the activity of the divine grace (χάρις; vs. 30), spirit, and power (πνεῦμα and δύναμις; vs. 35). He was Son of God in a unique sense, and Messiah (1:32-33; 2:11). The Magnificat (Luke 1:46-55) interprets this as one of the saving acts of God for Israel; similarly the Benedictus (Luke 1:68-79; cf. 2:25-32, 38). Mary has the unique honor of being the instrument of this divine action, but no special glorification of her as the virgin mother is intended in the Lukan record (cf. 11:27-28).

Matthew, like Luke, connects the birth of Jesus with the action of the Holy Spirit (Matt. 1:20), and with messiahship (2:1-6). He mentions also the significance of the name Jesus (1:21; cf. Luke 1:31). Peculiar to Matthew is the reference to Isa. 7:14 (1:23), where the Hebrew does not imply virginity in the strict sense, and the main emphasis is on the birth of a child who shall bring the presence of God near to men. Matthew makes more than Luke does of the significance of the birth of Jesus for the Gentile world (cf. Matt. 2:1-11 with Luke 2:32*a*).

The absence of human paternity is just as much emphasized by Matthew (1:18-20) as by Luke. The fact of incarnation and this particular manner of its achievement appear to be inseparable in these two accounts. Modern criticism of the gospels is inclined to label them legendary, and to pronounce the virgin birth unhistorical and, in view of the silence of the other NT sources about it, not essential to Christian faith. It may be held, however, that acceptance of the fact of an unprecedented divine incursion into human conditions of life presupposes willingness to admit unprecedented circumstances in the manner of its inauguration. Moreover, two features in these accounts of the birth, in addition to the physical miracle, should be remembered: The Isaiah quotation in Matthew indicates that the birth of Christ, whether normal or miraculous as a biological event, was part of the eternal purpose of God. Secondly, both writers have something to say about the spiritual preparation of the parents (Matt. 1:20-21; Luke 1:26-38), without whose sensitiveness to divine action the physical event could not have happened in their home.

Certainly the reality of Christ's birth is affirmed in these birth narratives. He was truly born, and his body was not a mere semblance, as the heresy known as DOCETISM supposed (Col. 2:8-9; I John 4:1-3). This type of spiritualizing, which cannot take seriously the idea of incarnation, has its parallel in some forms of Buddhist thought which conceived of Buddha as having a purely spiritual body, and as having been born in a special manner, unsoiled by the impurities of conception, etc. See also VIRGIN BIRTH.

Matt. 11:25-27 (=Luke 10:21-22)—there can be no doubt about the genuineness of this saying—mirrors Jesus' own consciousness of dependence on God and of mission to make him known to men. The relationship of Father and Son is one of mutual intimacy and recognition. The Father is of such a character as to grant the revelation of himself to the humble upon earth, and of this revelation the Son is the sole mediator. His earthly existence is the outcome of that divine purpose (note the Johannine parallel, to be examined below, John 1:14, 18). The verb form "have been delivered" must signify the heavenly or pretemporal equipment of Jesus—i.e., the preparation for incarnation—rather than incarnation itself. On this divine authority, which Jesus possesses and which he can transmit to his own representatives when his earthly mission is terminated, we may compare Matt. 28:18. For the thought of his actual mission to the world, which is not explicitly referred to in Matt. 11:27, we may note Luke 4:43, where the words "I was sent for this purpose" —viz., to preach the good news of God's kingdom—are made to refer to his incarnation—a subtle alteration of Mark 1:38*c*.

Matt. 11:25-27 undoubtedly portrays Jesus' self-consciousness. It is perverse to make this saying refer to a sonship Jesus shares with all who have knowledge of God. In this passage, as in Mark 12:1-11, Jesus' own conviction and insight are preserved. Similarly, on the peculiar intimacy with which Jesus felt himself to be in relation to God, we may rely on Matt. 10:32-33; 15:13; 16:17; 18:10-14, 35 (mostly peculiar to Matthew), and four passages peculiar to Luke: 22:29; 23:34, 46; 24:49.

The unique sonship of Jesus stands out in contrast with a general sonship which is predicated of all who believe in God and accept him as Father—e.g., Luke 6:35-36 (cf. Matt. 5:48); 12:30-32; 15:11-32; 16:24; Matt. 5:9, 16; 6:9; 21:28-31; 23:9; 25:34. From Luke 8:19-21 (=Mark 3:31-35); 11:27-28, we may infer that Jesus dissuaded people from special veneration for himself or his mother. For him the question of personal dignity or birth is never so important as doing the will of God. What matters above all is the relation with God created by obedience. Even incarnation is not an honor for which he is willing to be congratulated.

c. John. In John's Gospel the Incarnation has special prominence. Whereas in the Synoptics Jesus' divine sonship, though its uniqueness is affirmed, is synonymous with messiahship, in the Fourth Gospel its eternal aspect is much more emphasized, and the sonship and messiahship of Jesus are considered, not simply in terms of his ministry in Palestine at a particular period of time (though the reality of Jesus' human life, and the whole setting in history, are definitely presupposed by John), but in their relationship to the eternal being of God, ontologically rather than historically.

This is most evident in the opening section of the gospel (1:1-18). John does not commence, as Mark does, with the baptism of Jesus; nor even, as do Matthew and Luke, with his birth and its immediate antecedents. John opens his gospel concerning Jesus of Nazareth with a reference to creation, and before creation to the timeless existence of God: the very opening words, "In the beginning," are identical with the opening words of the OT and were intended to recall the creation narrative of Gen. 1 and the creative Word upon which everything depends. The ministry of Jesus, according to John, is part of the self-communication of God to man, and is grounded in the mystery of the nature of the eternal God. For what was manifested in the activity of Jesus was nothing less than the Word—i.e., that in God which mediates between God and the world. The term "Word" had enjoyed considerable currency in religion and philosophy before John wrote his gospel. In Greek (Logos, λόγος) it signifies both reason and spoken word—i.e., inner thought and outward expression. (See WORD; MEDIATION § C8*b*.) John chose the term and applied it to Jesus because his earthly life and ministry were actually the revealing of the divine purpose to men, and needed to be understood, not as mere historical event, but as carrying that divine significance. In and through him God was imparting himself. His words were "spirit and life" (6:63; cf. 4:24, "God is spirit"). His acts were "signs" —i.e., of the presence and power of God (2:11, etc.).

In conceiving that the work of Jesus could be described as the operation of the Logos, John has to state emphatically—here going beyond all previous teachers, whether Jewish or non-Jewish—that the Logos actually entered the human sphere in the sense of becoming a human being: the Word became flesh (1:14). The choice of the word "flesh" rather than simply "man" is deliberate; it signifies humanity in its physical aspect, where its affinity with animals and its differentiation from God is most patent. The precise meaning of the verb "became" is difficult to determine, and perhaps it is unwise to attempt to define it too precisely. After all, it is a statement of the central paradox of the Christian faith. As distinguished from the verb "to be," which is used in vs. 1, it signifies coming into existence, as in vs. 3 ("were made") and vs. 10 ("was made") and vs. 17 ("came"). Thus the fleshly existence of the Word began with the human life of Jesus of Nazareth. On the other hand, something less than the full identification of the eternal Word with flesh is intended; for the Word is still the subject, imparting through the "flesh" grace and truth and glory; moreover, at this point it passes over into the term "Son," whose continued existence "in the Father" as well as in the earthly life of Jesus is maintained throughout the gospel. The more specific word for generation, which is used in vs. 13, is avoided in vs. 14. But it cannot be expected that a single verb should fix finally the sense in which the divine was really present among men in a human body. The divine Logos entered, not merely the mind, but the body (flesh) of a particular man.

The eternal thus entering history, and being, as it were, concentrated in a single human life, poses an insuperable philosophical problem, admittedly. This aspect of the Incarnation has been called, in G. Kittel's memorable phrase, the "scandal of particularity." But John felt that nothing short of this must be affirmed if the significance of the historic life of Jesus, as Christian experience had come to evaluate it, was to be brought out as a manifestation of ultimate reality. Having pondered this and having decided to express this in terms of the Logos, John felt that he must break the bounds of the Logos doctrine as previously understood and develop his argument to the culminating assertion that the Logos became flesh.

We note that in this gospel this "becoming" is the focal point, as it were, the decisive event for human salvation; this, rather than the successive experiences and achievements of the earthly ministry of Jesus, culminating in the Cross and the Resurrection. In other words, the Fourth Gospel is the fountainhead of the type of Christian theology which is called incarnational.

This difference of emphasis, as compared with other NT writings, must not be treated as an outright contrast. The necessity of Christ's passion, and his significance as the Lamb of God who takes away the world's sin (1:29; I John 3:5; 4:10) are also emphasized in this gospel. Moreover, the effect of the Incarnation is declared to be enlightenment (1:5, 9); regeneration (1:12-13); true, eternal life (3:15-17; 5:26; 17:2-3; 20:31; I John 4:9).

Nevertheless, this focusing on revelation rather than on atonement, and on the divine initiative in entering upon the human stage rather than on Christ's dealing with the human problem, by his teaching, healing, sacrificial death, etc., is new and significant. There is a notable, small group of passages in which Christ is described as the Son of man, who came down from heaven (3:13-15; 6:33-39, 62; 8:14*b*; 12:32-34; 13:3). Probably the Gnostic myth of the Redeemer who descends from the heavenly to the terrestrial sphere, and whose ascent again makes possible liberation for men, has exerted some influence on John in these passages; the significant difference, however, is that for Jesus the ascent was possible only after his meeting the opposition of men and the power of darkness, and after a lifting up on the cross (12:32, and the whole context vss. 31-39); exaltation in glory had to be preceded by exaltation in suffering and death. The descent of Christ for this earthly ministry is never called his taking flesh, as in 1:14. But it makes the entry into the earthly sphere the decisive factor for human salvation, and tends to place the emphasis on the commencement of the Redeemer's career rather than on its culmination in sacrificial suffering. In the Johannine conception incarnation involves atonement, not atonement, incarnation.

In 1:14 the Incarnation means revelation of the divine glory and dwelling (lit., "tabernacling") among men. The implied reference to Exod. 29:42-43; 33:7-9, suggests that the coming of Jesus is God's presence upon earth. No tabernacle is now necessary, no Jerusalem temple either (4:21-24); God can be known and worshiped in and through Christ. See also GLORY; TABERNACLE.

The opposition of human society to him who came as the revelation of God is frankly recorded in this gospel, often in terms of the antithesis of light and darkness (1:4-5, 9-11; 3:19-21; 6:60-71; 8:37-59; 12:37-43; 15:18-23; 17:14). The presence of the Revealer forces men into the valley of decision, and they must either respond with faith or remain in darkness.

After the announcement of the Incarnation at 1:14 the term "Logos" is laid aside, and throughout the rest of the gospel Christ is referred to, and refers to himself, mainly as the Son of God. ("Son of man" also is a frequent title, but it does not predominate.) For the full understanding of what incarnation means, therefore, the implications of divine sonship must be drawn out. 3:16-18 grounds the mission of the Son in the divine love for the world. This is a change from the more metaphysical vocabulary of Logos and revelation to the ethical term which John shares with other NT writers, and which is a characteristic Christian term deriving from the Master himself. It is here used for the motive of divine self-revelation and incarnation, and thus we learn that the significance of love in human relationships is to be seen in the self-giving of God himself. The divine self-giving which prompted the incarnation, and was complemented by Christ's self-sacrifice, is the heart of the gospel and the sole hope of man. We hear elsewhere in John's Gospel of the Father's love for the Son (3:35; 10:17; 15:9-10; 17:23-26) and of the Son's love for the Father (14:31; 15:10), as well as of the Son's love for his own (13:1, 34; 14:21; 15:9-13). John has, in fact, used the idea of love to interpret the nature of God, the process of revelation and redemption, and moral relationships within the redeemed community, the church. For this we may refer to the First Letter (I John 3:11-24; 4:7–5:5).

On the equality of the Son with the Father see 5:18-23; 10:29-30, 37-38; 14:8-11. His pre-existence is of course implied (cf. 5:17; 8:57-58). On the mission of the Son see 4:34; 5:37; 6:38-39; 9:33; 12:44-46. The incarnate Christ is represented as saying: "I am in the Father and the Father in me" (14:10; cf. I John 2:23). This is his sole claim to authority in the church or to significance for humanity, and the doctrine of the Incarnation safeguards this. It is difficult to reconcile this with doctrines of his self-emptying (Kenosis) derived from Phil. 2:6-8. See also SON OF GOD.

3. In Acts and the letters. a. Acts. The Christology of Acts might be described as adoptionist rather than incarnational. Christ appears as a "man attested to you . . . with mighty works" (2:22); as God's servant, the "Holy and Righteous One" (3:13-14; also 4:27; cf. 8:32-34); as the prophet whom God had promised to raise up (3:22); as one "anointed . . . with the Holy Spirit and with power" (10:38). All this adds up to Messiah (9:22; 17:3; 18:5, 28) and final judge of mankind (10:42; 17:31). As Messiah he can also be called Son of God (9:20), but this seems to contain no suggestion about his divine origin.

> Thou art my Son,
> today I have begotten thee, taken from Ps. 2:7, is applied to him in one passage (13:33), but the thought is not of his birth but of his resurrection, and of the fulfilment of God's purpose through him, a greater boon even than the Mosaic law (vs. 39).

Christ's lordship is asserted (2:36), especially in the Pauline speeches (16:31; 20:24, 35; 22:8-10; 23:11; 26:15).

b. I–II Peter. I Peter is more concerned with the passion of Christ and his coming again (his apocalypse, 1:13; or manifestation, 5:4) than with his first coming. But in 1:20 that first coming is referred to as a realization in time of a divine decision before the beginning of time (cf. II Tim. 1:9-10). This realization in time is the prelude to the end of time—a conviction shared by most of the early Christians and rooted in the primitive proclamation (Acts 2:16-17; Heb. 1:1-2). The imminence of the end makes the second manifesting of Christ more prominent in the thought of I Peter than the first (the same verb, φανερόω, is used in both 1:20 and 5:4. Similarly in the Johannine writings it means both Incarnation [I John 1:2; 3:5, 8] and Second Coming [I John 2:28; 3:2]).

II Peter asserts the reality or historicity of Christ's earthly career; it was no myth (1:16). The same noun is used here for Christ's first coming as is used in 3:4 for his final coming (παρουσία, a parallel to the double sense of "manifest" in I Peter).

c. Paul. For Paul's understanding of the Incarnation, as in the case of other authors, all statements about Christ's divine sonship are in a general way relevant. But three passages stand out as of major relevance:

a) Gal. 4:4-5: In the divine control of history, which is the background of the argument of chs. 3-4 in this letter, the period before Christ was, for the Jews in particular, and by implication for mankind generally, "under the law"—i.e., a period when men were subject to the guidance of the Mosaic law or other moral codes. This, as Paul sees it, was a kind of slavery, from which men needed to be liberated. True righteousness of life was not attainable under these conditions (3:11, 21*b*). But this was in the divine plan merely a preparatory dispensation (3:24: "The law was our custodian until Christ came"). God's intention was that goodness should be achieved (3:24*b*: "that we might be justified by faith") and the ideal society realized (3:26-29); and the coming of Christ was the means of this achievement. That is the point of "when the time had fully come" (4:4). The object was the desired liberation (4:5; 5:1), by which the former slaves became freemen, in fact attained the status of divine sonship, the highest expectation of old Israel, and a sharing in the privileged status of Christ himself (4:5-7; 3:26). Christ came as the emissary from the Creator, in fact his Son, and as a power superior to all authorities which tyrannized over mankind (cf. 4:8-9).

In conferring freedom he had to submit to human conditions both of heredity, "born of woman," and of social and physical environment, "born under the law" (4:4*b*). The implication of "born of woman" is the reality of his human birth; it was not an appearance only, nor a legend. Nothing is implied here about the virginity of his mother. The miracle resides, not in the physical conditions, but in the divine overruling and purpose suggested by "when the time had fully come, God sent forth his Son." Paul's other two references to Christ's birth simply record that he was by physical descent a Jew (Rom. 1:3; 9:5). Galatians is not more explicit as to how Christ's coming secured these benefits, but we may refer to Rom. 8:3-4, where the purpose of the Incarnation is given as "for sin"—i.e., to deal with the problem created by man's sin. Man, left to his own resources ("the flesh"), even with the guidance of a moral code (the law), could not achieve the good life (fulfil the "just requirement of the law"). This need has been met by Christ's coming into human life ("in the likeness of sinful flesh"). Somehow—again no full explication is offered—he has removed the limiting factor ("condemned sin") and liberated mankind (vs. 2) and provided new moral resources (the Spirit; vss. 2, 5-11).

Christ so confronts men with the righteousness of God that it becomes available for them, and the human problem is transformed (I Cor. 1:24, 30; II Cor. 5:21; Phil. 3:9). There is no specific reference to incarnation in these passages. We may speak of a divine indwelling in Christ (II Cor. 5:19). Whatever metaphor may be used for the mode of God's control of Christ, it is definite that he is God's representative, through whom the divine plan for human redemption is made operative.

b) Phil. 2:6-8: The second main passage refers to the birth and death of Christ, the beginning and end of his earthly life, as his humiliation and self-emptying. His pre-existence is assumed, and is somewhat loosely described as existence "in the form of God." Equality with God was his by right, not a status to be laboriously acquired. Becoming a man meant renouncing that heavenly status, and by comparison humanity was utter slavery (7*b*). But he was prepared for this sacrifice and extended it to the point of dying a slave's death (8*b*). Paul makes no use of the idea of sonship here. Incarnation meant a temporary laying aside of divinity, and its outcome was the attainment of lordship (9-11); inescapably involved in it was "death on a cross." Neither here nor in Rom. 8:3 does "likeness" (7*b*) imply any lack of the full reality of manhood. Paul cannot be charged with Docetism, the view that Christ's body was not real (referred to in I John 4:2; II John 7). The metaphor of emptying which is used here has a good parallel in II Cor. 8:9, where Christ's earthly ministry is thought of as voluntary self-impoverishment. In both passages the paradox of the Incarnation is stressed. It was alien to Jewish messianic expectations. Some scholars admit Hellenistic influence here —e.g., the idea of a Redeemer who comes down from heaven, makes contact with human beings imprisoned on earth, awakes their latent divinity, and liberates them to return with him to the heavenly sphere. We have already noted the possible influence of this conception on the Johannine Son of man. The theory of some that Phil. 2:5-11 is a pre-Pauline hymn does not affect our interpretation. (Similar views are held by some about Col. 1:15-20.) There is certainly a poetic or liturgical quality in the language, which should warn us against imposing a too-precise theological meaning on such words as "form," "emptied."

Paul would agree that in assuming human nature Christ did not assume liability to sin (cf. II Cor. 5: 21). In the language of later theology, Christ took upon him perfect, not fallen, manhood. For definite assertion of his sinlessness cf. Heb. 4:15.

In two important passages (Rom. 5:12-21; I Cor. 15:45-47) Christ is spoken of as second Adam, as realizing the ideal which the first Adam—i.e., mankind as a whole—failed to attain. This means that Christ opened a new possibility for human life. His own achievement is made available to those who attach themselves to him, by faith, in the church. To quote the language of later theologians again, "He became what we are that we might become what he is."

c) Col. 1:15-20: This passage does not explicitly mention the coming of Christ, but gives us Paul's maturest thought about his pre-existence and divine status. Jewish conceptions of WISDOM undoubtedly contributed to Paul's Christology here.

Christ is God's likeness or image (vs. 15, also II Cor. 4:4). The term was used of the Logos (in Philo) and Wisdom (Wisd. Sol. 7:26), as well as of man in the creation narrative (Gen. 1:26). This divine intention, which actual man never realized, is realized in Christ, who does show forth the invisible God to the world of men. There must be reference in this to Christ's earthly life, although the passage continues with reference to his pre-existence before creation and his activity as agent of creation (vss. 15*b*-16). The universe was created by his agency—here the thought is precisely that of the conception of wisdom in Prov. 8; Wisd. Sol. 7—and to serve his ends ("through him and for him")—that is an extra touch of Paul's: Christ is the Lord who will also preside over a final consummation (cf. Eph. 1:10; 4:13-15). Christ is the principle of cohesion or stability in the universe (vs. 17). His headship in the universe and of mankind generally is paralleled by his headship in the redeemed society, the church, though this was established by his resurrection—viz., at the conclusion of his ministry as a man (vs. 18).

His work can be described as reconciliation in the whole universe (vs. 20)—i.e., the removal of hindrances and the production of harmony, not among men only but also among heavenly beings. For this Christ has unlimited divine support and accreditation: "In him all the fulness of God was pleased to dwell" (vs. 19). Is this a reference to the Incarnation, or to Christ's pre-incarnation status? Probably the former, since vs. 20 definitely means his ministry on earth, including his passion (cf. "bodily," 2:9; see PLEROMA).

Christ's presence in the world and in the church is the divulging of the "mystery" of God's purpose which had previously been hidden (Col. 1:26-27; 2:2-3; I Cor. 2:7).

d. The Pastoral letters. The Pastorals offer isolated references to Christ's incarnation. The writer has greater aptitude for an impressive phrase than for sustained theological argument. "Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners" (I Tim. 1:15); the thought moves quickly from incarnation to atonement, which was its main purpose, as in Tit. 2:11; 3:4-5. He was "manifested in the flesh" (I Tim. 3:16). This reads like a quotation from a rudimentary creed. We have the verb "manifest" again in II Tim. 1:10, together with a cognate noun for the Incarnation, whereas the cognate noun signifies the final coming in I Tim. 6:14; II Tim. 4:1, 8; Tit. 2:13.

In II Tim. 1:10 again incarnation is the prelude to Christ's work of abolishing death and conferring the new light of true life and immortality.

In two memorable phrases (Tit. 2:11; 3:4) the "appearing" of Christ is due to the grace or goodness or loving kindness of God which has in view the salvation of all mankind.

e. Hebrews. In this letter the Incarnation is not stressed in and for itself, but as the prelude to Christ's dealing with sin, the basis of mankind's greatest need. This required the blood of self-sacrifice (9:22), and so, the author might argue, the sacrificial death which Christ actually offered presupposed his human birth.

In contrast with the prophets who brought earlier revelation, Christ is God's son (1:2), his first-born (1:6; cf. Col. 1:15-18). All the dignity and intimate relationship to God which this implies is emphatically, though very succinctly, stated in 1:2-4. Adequate exposition is impossible here. The language is influenced by descriptions of Wisdom, and there are parallels in John 1:1-5; II Cor. 4:4; Col. 1:15. Christ is pre-existent, the agent of creation and maintenance of the world, and of the redemption of man ("purification for sins," 1:3*b*, as also 5:9: "source of eternal salvation"; cf. 9:12).

His actual birth is not mentioned, either in the manner of Matt. 1–2; Luke 1–2; or in that of John 1:14. But his superiority, not of degree but of nature, not only to prophets but also to angels, is brought out (1:5–2:8), and to Moses (3:1-6), Joshua (4:1-8), and the Jewish high priest (5–10). His life on earth meant identification with mankind (2:9-18). Christ "partook of the same nature" (vs. 14) as the "descendants of Abraham"—i.e., he was born a Jew. This self-subjection involved death and the conquest of the devil (vs. 14*b*), a hard discipline (5:8) accepted in response to God's call (5:4-5; 10:5-9). The reality of his temptation is stressed (2:18; 4:15), but also his sinlessness (4:15; 7:26; cf. 2:10; 5:9). His sinlessness is generally implied rather than asserted in the NT, but cf. John 7:18; 8:46; II Cor. 5:21; I Pet. 2:22.

Though Hebrews is explicit on Christ's personal perfection, it is mainly concerned with the efficacy of his ministry: this also was perfect (argued in somewhat Platonic terms, 8:1-7) in relation to past, present, and future (8:13; 7:25; 13:8). According to this line of thought the Incarnation was simply the commencement of this fully efficacious ministry by which sin and death, and the Devil who was held to cause them, were overcome. The once-for-all-ness of this achievement is underlined (7:28; 9:26). It was final and unrepeatable. Christ's life was eternal in quality, in that Johannine sense which includes moral perfection and divinity as well as timelessness (7:15-28). The purpose of his incarnation was not simply to live, or teach, or leave an example; but to effect atonement—i.e., to liberate man from all that prevents his obeying the will of God.

4. In the OT. The transcendence and holiness of God is axiomatic in the thought of the OT, and therefore incarnation cannot so easily be accommodated as it would be in a more immanental conception. Nevertheless, as partial anticipations of the NT doctrine the following points should be noted:

a) God is close to men, controlling human action (e.g., Gen. 41:32).

b) Man has a certain affinity with God (Gen. 1:26).

c) God bestows his spirit upon those who have special tasks to perform, ministering to his purpose (see SPIRIT). Most significant here are prophets, high priest, and Messiah; also the king, whose precise relationship to God is the subject of current debate. See MEDIATION § C6; SERVANT OF LORD.

d) Isa. 7:14 is not a reference to incarnation in the NT sense; but it does imply that in some human lives God's presence is particularly known. The idea of a mother's being "pregnant by no mortal" (as Philo says of Moses' wife Zipporah) is later.

e) There is important teaching about divine self-manifestation—e.g., by angel, word, wisdom. See MEDIATION § C8*a*.

f) Pre-existence implies, to the Hebrew mind, nothing ontological about the being in question, but simply that his function is according to the purpose of God. It was held by some rabbis that not only Messiah, but also the Law and the temple were created before the world. This is not pre-existence in the metaphysical or Platonic sense, nor as implied in John 1; Col. 1. Neither OT nor later Judaism seems to hold that the Messiah really existed before his actual appearance; all passages that can be appealed to as evidence of such a belief (Ps. 72:5; 110:3; I Enoch 48:3, 6; Asmp. Moses 1:14) are to be understood otherwise.

To accept the Johannine identification of the Messiah, insofar as represented in Jesus, with the Logos, and the affirmation of the incarnation of the Logos, is to break the bounds both of pre-existence and of messiahship as previously understood. The Incarnation had no real precedent. The impact of Christ was like new wine potent to burst old bottles. On this whole subject, see also CHRIST.

Bibliography. Biblical material: A. E. J. Rawlinson, The NT Doctrine of the Christ (1926); Strack-Billerbeck, Kommentar zum NT, II (1928), 333-52; W. D. Davies, Paul and Rabbinic Judaism (1948); C. H. Dodd, The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel (1953); G. V. Jones, Christology and Myth in the NT (1956).

On Christology in general: L. S. Thornton, The Incarnate Lord (1928); K. Barth, Dogmatik, I.2 (1938), 134-221; J. M. Creed, The Divinity of Jesus Christ (1938); D. M. Baillie, God Was in Christ (1948); A. R. Vine, An Approach to Christology (1948).

E. C. BLACKMAN

INCENSE [קטרת, smoke, odor of (burning) sacrifice; θυμίαμα (KJV alternately ODORS); KJV לבונה (RSV usually FRANKINCENSE; alternately INCENSE (I Chr. 9:29; Jer. 41:5); SMOKE (Ps. 66:15), see below]. A compound of gums and spices intended to be burned; the perfume arising from these substances when burned.

"Incense" is the KJV translation of two Hebrew words, קטרת and לבונה (Isa. 43:23; 60:6; 66:3; Jer. 6:20; 17:26; 41:5), which were at an early time quite distinct in meaning in Israel. Later the second word (lit., "frankincense") came to be practically synonymous with the first. The distinction between these two words is usually maintained in the RSV.

The term קטרת was first used with reference to the smoke of the sacrificial victims (Deut. 33:10; Ps. 66:15; Isa. 1:13), and the Pi'el form of the verb means "cause to smoke" upon the altar (I Sam. 2:15-16; Jer. 19:13; 44:21, 23; Hos. 4:13; 11:2; Hab. 1:16). Subsequently the term was used with reference to the smoke of frankincense and other aromatics, of the incense offering (Exod. 30:8), and of the material burned in the offering (Lev. 10:1; Ezek. 8:11). The meaning "incense" probably belongs clearly to the term for the first time in Ezek. 8:11; 16:18; 23:41. This connotation, which refers specifically to the material burned in the offering, is used frequently in P.

Incense compounded according to a specified formula (Exod. 30:34-38) was used extensively in the ritual of the temple (Exod. 25:6; 35:8, 28; 37:29; etc.). This pure incense was compounded of equal parts of stacte, onycha, galbanum, and frankincense, plus a seasoning of salt. In Herodian times, according to Josephus, there were thirteen ingredients in the pure incense (War V.v.5). Pure incense, which could not be made or used for secular purposes (Exod. 30:37-38; Lev. 10:1-11), was burned on the altar of incense (Exod. 30:1 ff; 40:5; Lev. 4:7; I Chr. 28:18), which was in the temple just before the veil of the holy of holies. This altar was a replica in miniature of the altar of burnt offering (Exod. 30:1-10); it was flanked on the S by the seven-branched lampstand and on the N by the table of the bread of the Presence. Incense was burned on this altar by the high priest each morning and evening (Exod. 30:1 ff; cf. Luke 1:8-11). Once a year, on the DAY OF ATONEMENT, the high priest was directed to carry a censer of burning incense when he entered the holy of holies and approached the mercy seat (Lev. 16:12-13).

Virtually all Pentateuchal references to the offering of incense occur in the Priestly Code; this fact led Wellhausen and Kuenen to the conclusion that the offering of incense was a late refinement of the cultus and perhaps a result of the influence of heathen religious rites (II Chr. 34:25; Jer. 11:12-17; 48:35). It is, of course, noteworthy that the eighth-century prophets made no allusion to such a feature in the cultus. Nevertheless, there is no conclusive proof that the offering of incense was unknown in Israel before the seventh century. Israelitic religious tradition regarded the offering as an ancient one and as a local parallel to a practice which was widely known among the worshipers of false divinities (II Chr. 34:25; Jer. 48:35; cf. Lev. 26:30; II Chr. 14:5; 34:4, 7; Isa. 17:8; 27:9; Ezek. 6:4, 6).

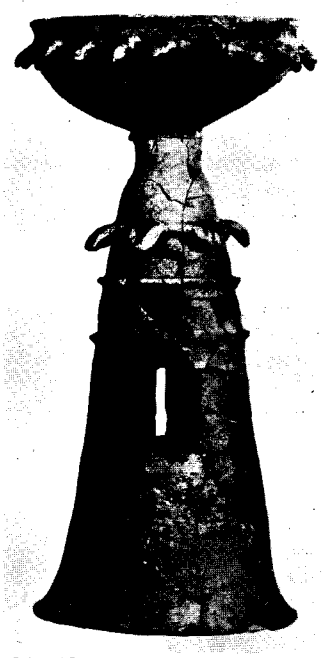
The offering of incense came to bear several significations in the Israelitic tradition. Purificatory powers were attributed to the burning of incense in time of plague (Numbers), and probably the burning of incense was thought to have a sanitary influence in places of slaughter and sacrifice. Incense was regarded as a costly offering (Song of S. 3:6; 4:6, 14; cf. Isa. 60:6; Matt. 2:11; Rev. 18:13), and therefore a suitable one for princes and leaders (Num. 7:14, 20; incense may also have been of some peculiar significance in the rites of consecration). The Israelite, like many another ancient, assumed that the deity, like his people, would enjoy the fragrance of burning incense; he therefore offered it to the deity whom he wished to honor, as also to heads of state and honored guests (I Kings 11:8; II Kings 22:17; 23:5; Jer. 1:16; 7:9; 11:13; 19:13; 32:29; 44:17 ff; Ezek. 6:13; 23:41; Dan. 2:46). According to Deut. 33:10, these offerings of incense were well received by the God of Israel; it was therefore assumed that they were effective in making atonement before him (Lev. 16, especially vss. 12-13; Num. 16:46-48). It is perhaps in light of this belief that in both the OT and the NT an interesting parallel relationship between the offering of incense and of prayer is suggested (Ps. 141:2; Rev. 5:8; 8:3-4; cf. Luke 1:10). The fragrance of the incense was symbolic of the prayers of the faithful.

The offering of incense is treated as a very sacred rite wherever mentioned in the OT. Technically the prerogative of making the offering belonged to the high priest, and unqualified persons who presumed to make it were sometimes struck dead (Num. 16; cf. the Chronicler's account of Uzziah's leprosy in II Chr. 26:16-21). Aaron's sons were smitten because they offered the incense improperly (Lev. 10:1-2). Both John Hyrcanus (Jos. Antiq. XIII.x.3), and Zechariah (Luke 1:8-23) received divine revelations while offering incense. This last passage indicates that the offering of incense was no longer the prerogative of the high priest in Herodian times.

See also INCENSE, ALTAR OF; SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS; WORSHIP IN THE OT. H. F. BECK

INCENSE, DISH FOR [כף, palm of the hand]; KJV SPOON. A type of shallow golden bowl used as a CENSER.

Lists of the furnishings of both the TABERNACLE (Num. 7:14, 20; etc.) and the TEMPLE (I Kings 7:50) include a number of these incense vessels, made of pure gold. In the tabernacle they are associated with the table for the BREAD OF THE PRESENCE. There were twelve such vessels, each weighing ten shekels of gold by the temple standard (Num. 7:84-86). They are mentioned again in the account of the building of Solomon's temple (I Kings 7:50 = II Chr. 4:22), and of its repair under Joash (II Chr. 24:14), and they were among the plunder taken by the Babylonians in 586 B.C. (II Kings 25:14 = Jer. 52:18-19).



The function of these vessels indicates that they were shallow bowls, and the Babylonian cognate of their Hebrew name has this sense, but the literal meaning of the Hebrew "palm of the hand," suggests that they may be related to a class of shallow stone bowls found at several sites in Palestine and Syria, including Tell Beit Mirsim and Megiddo. These have hollow handles into which a wooden pipe was probably attached so that the incense in the bowl could be kept burning by blowing through it. They are often carved with lions' heads and other cultic symbols, and a number of them have a hand carved in relief on the bottom, so that the interior of the bowl was almost literally the palm of the hand.

Bibliography. W. F. Albright, "The Fourth Joint Campaign of Excavation at Tell Beit Mirsim," BASOR, 47 (1932), 15; G. E. Wright, "Solomon's Temple Reconstructed," BA, vol. IV (1941). L. E. Toombs

INCENSE ALTAR [מזבח קטרת]. This term, which refers (Exod. 30:27) to the altar of incense of the wilderness sanctuary, may also be applied to the "golden altar" of the temple of Solomon (I Kings 7: 48; missing in 6:20), as Isa. 6:6 suggests. That the offering of incense was not introduced in Israel until the sixth century B.C. is surely not correct, even if it did not find more general usage, particularly in "family worship," until more recent times (cf. I Sam. 2:28; Isa. 43:23; Jer. 6:20). According to Exod. 30: 1 ff, the incense altar, which was intended to be portable, consisted of a gold-overlaid table with horns, measuring one cubit by one cubit by two cubits. In the equipment of the interior of the new temple in Ezek. 41:1 ff the incense altar is missing; but this description, from a secondary source, is fragmentary. Perhaps the incense altar was considered pagan by the author (see Ezek. 8:11). I Macc. 1:21; 4:49 give an account of an incense altar in legitimate worship, whereas Josephus does not—which is probably accidental. Offerings of incense were also presented in the Jewish colony at Elephantine (cf. ANET 492).

The term חמן (ḥammân), attested among the Nabateans and the Palmyreans, designates a (small) incense altar, just as in the OT; it is not, as has been suggested, "sun statues" or, with the KJV, "images," which are meant by the plural of the term in the OT

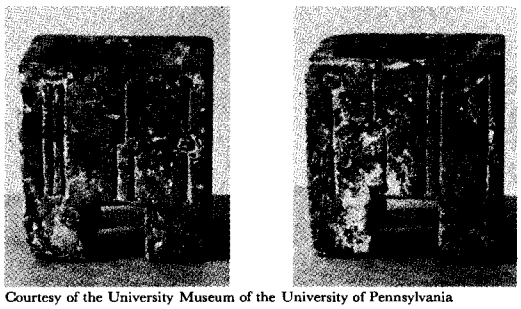
Courtesy of the Oriental Institute, the University of Chicago

4. Pottery incense stand, from Megiddo, Stratum VI (ca. 1150-1100 B.C.)

Courtesy of the Oriental Institute, the University of Chicago

5. Limestone horned incense altar from Megiddo (ca. tenth century B.C.)

(חמנים; Lev. 26:30; II Chr. 14:5; 34:7; Isa. 17:8; Ezek. 6:4, 6), but rather with the RSV, "(incense) altars." They are regarded as pagan and are condemned.



If we disregard the clay incense holders which can be traced in Palestine up until the end of the second century (Figs. INC 4; LIL 29; ART 66), we can identify two types for the period between the tenth and the fifth century. One is a rectangular hewn block of stone—often provided with a decorative border—with a depression in the upper surface and (in most cases) horns on four corners; the smallest specimen is from the eleventh to the tenth century, from Tell Beit Mirsim; other examples are known from Megiddo (Figs. INC 5; MEG 32), Shechem (E. Sellin, "Die Ausgrabung von Sichem," ZDPV, 49 [1926], 232-33), and Gezer (AOB 444). As the exceptionally high—0.90 meter—altar of Shechem demonstrates (cf. BRL 19), there were incense altars with attached base or podium, and the smaller models were probably also placed on the large altars of burnt offerings or table altars (Depositaltäre) at times (cf. II Chr. 34:4). Fig. INC 6.

A second, more recent type, the המנים, which probably comes from Arabia, is the cuboid incense altar, usually with four low feet. These have come to light in Gezer, Tell Jemmeh, Cyprus (cf. K. Galling, "Archäologischer Jahresbericht," ZDPV, 52 [1929], 247-48), S Arabia (Fig. INC 7), and also in Uruk, Babylon, and Asshur (L. Ziegler). These little limestone incense altars (sixth to fifth century) are especially numerous in Lachish (O. Tufnell et al., Lachish III [1953], plates 68-70); one of them has an Aramaic inscription beginning with the word "incense offering."

Courtesy of the University Museum of the University of Pennsylvania

6. Cylindrical incense stand from Beth-shan (ca. eleventh century B.C.)

Courtesy of the University Museum of the University of Pennsylvania

7. Limestone incense altar with S Arabic inscriptions on the sides (third to first century B.C.)

Bibliography. M. Löhr, Das Räucheropfer im AT (1927). H. G. May, Material Remains of the Megiddo Cult (1935). K. Elliger, "Chammanim-Masseben?" ZAW, 57 (1939), 236-65; "Der Sinn des Wortes chamman," ZDPV, 66 (1943), 129-39. H. Ingholt, "Le sens du mot Ḥamman," Melanges syriens offerts à M. R. Dussaud, II (1939/40), 795-802. L. Ziegler, "Tonkästen aus Uruk, Babylon und Assur," ZA, 13 (1948), 224-40. R. De Langhe, "L'autel d'or," Anal. Bibl., X (1959), 342-60. M. Haran, "The Use of Incense," VT, X (1960), 113-29. K. GALLING

INCEST. The translation of תבל (KJV CONFUSION) in Lev. 20:12 (PERVERSION in Lev. 18:23; KJV CONFUSION). A number of examples of incest, or sexual intercourse between persons too closely related for normal marriage, may be observed in the Bible (Gen. 19:31-35; 20:2, 12; 35:22; 49:4; II Sam. 13:14; Ezek. 22:10-11; I Cor. 5:1). The writer of the book of Jubilees states that the sons of Adam married their sisters (Jub. 4). This allusion and the one concerning Lot and his daughters (Gen. 19:31-35) show that one alleged reason for incest was to populate the earth. Some of the illustrations exhibit the influence of sexual passion, whereas others were doubtless affected by the existence of subfamilies, children with the same mother, who were not intimately related to one another (e.g., Lev. 18:9: a daughter "born at home or born abroad"). Further, in a polygamous society a son, when he inherited his father's estate, may have inherited also his father's wives, except, of course, his own mother (II Sam. 3:6-11).

Sexual intercourse with the following classes of women was prohibited: "any one near of kin," the mother, any other wife of one's father, a sister, the daughter of a son or daughter, a father's wife's daughter, a father's sister, a mother's sister, an aunt, a daughter-in-law, a sister-in-law (Lev. 18:6-16), or one's mother-in-law (Deut. 27:23). The penalty for incest was childlessness (Lev. 20:21) or death (vss. 11-13)—by fire if a man took a wife and her mother also. Whoever committed various "abominations," including incest, was to be cut off from his people (18:29). With respect to the case of incest in the Corinthian church, Paul says: "Let him who has done this be removed from among you. . . . You are to deliver this man to Satan for the destruction of the flesh" (I Cor. 5:2, 5). The emphasis upon exogamous marriage, as well as opposition to incestuous practices by the idolatrous Canaanites (Lev. 20:23), serves to explain the biblical attitude on this matter. See MARRIAGE.

Bibliography. For the text of law codes on incest, see J. B. Pritchard, ed., ANET (2nd ed., 1955). O. J. BAAB

INDIA [הדו (Esth. 1:1; 8:9), probably from Old Pers. hiⁿduš, from Sanskrit síndhu, stream—i.e., the Indus River]. A country in Asia S of the Himalaya Mountains, referred to twice in Esther as marking the E limits of Ahasuerus' (Xerxes') kingdom.

Persian inscriptions make it clear that India was a province of the Achaemenid Empire (559-330 B.C.), but they say nothing about its extent. In view of the limited data on India which Herodotus of the fifth century B.C. was able to glean (III.94-106; IV.40, 44), it is not surprising that the OT writers, living in their rather circumscribed world, should have known nothing about such a distant land. Some hearsay about it may have drifted into Palestine when the latter was part of Achaemenid Persia, but it was not until after the time of Alexander the Great (died 323 B.C.) that the Mediterranean world was properly informed about the Indus Valley and its peoples. This is the age to which Esther belongs, as does I Maccabees. The latter suggests that in the second century B.C. the Seleucids still used war elephants (possibly Indian) and Indian mahouts (I Macc. 6:37), though the statement in I Macc. 8:8 that Antiochus III (223-187 B.C.) had control of any part of India, if the text is sound, is incorrect.

Despite the growth of geographical knowledge in the Hellenistic and early Roman periods, and the considerable Roman trade with India, via Egypt and the Red Sea, the NT is just as ignorant of, or indifferent to, India as is the OT. W. S. MCCULLOUGH

INDIAN DRIVER [ὁ Ἰνδὸς αὐτοῦ] (I Macc. 6:37); KJV INDIAN. An elephant driver. Each war elephant of Antiochus V is said to have had its Indian driver. N. TURNER INDICTMENT [ריב]. A formal charge or complaint in a court of justice. ריב is a technical legal term for "a case at law," "to conduct a legal suit," "to lay a case before one" (Job 31:35; Jer. 25:31; Hos. 12:2; cf. Isa. 3:13-15; Jer. 2:9; Hos. 4:1; Mic. 6:2). This term, in the sense of "indictment," is used exclusively of God, who brings a case against the wicked (the elders of Israel in Isa. 3:13-14; the nation in Jer. 2:9 [cf. Mic. 6:2]; the inhabitants of Israel in Hos. 4:1; Judah[?] and Jacob in Hos. 12:2; the nations in Jer. 25:31) for their moral and spiritual condition. Job, in maintaining his innocence, cries out for the indictment written by his adversary (Job 31:35). In Mic. 6:2 we have a picture of such a cosmically constituted court. The hills, mountains, and foundations of the earth are the jury; God is the prosecutor; and Israel is in the witness box. V. H. KOOY

INDIVIDUAL, INDIVIDUALISM. See MAN, NATURE OF.

INFANCY GOSPELS. Narratives purporting to tell of the birth of the Virgin and of the birth and childhood of Jesus. For further treatment and a list of those to which articles are devoted herein, see APOCRYPHA, NT.

INGATHERING, FEAST OF. See BOOTHS, FEAST OF.

INHERITANCE. One Hebrew term commonly translated "inheritance" has related meanings as well. The RSV sometimes uses the word "HERITAGE," especially when a spiritual sense is intended (see below). It parallels rather closely a Greek term in the NT, where it is adapted to a Christian frame of reference. Israel herself is called the inheritance of Yahweh, even as the "people," Mount Zion, and the temple are so designated. A special application of the term "inheritance" is made by the NT writers.

1. Relevant terms and concepts
2. Inheritance of a father's possessions
3. Legislation on inheritance
   a. Son of a slave girl
   b. Right of the first-born
   c. Rights of daughters
   d. The status of the widow
   e. Other categories
4. Canaan as Israel's inheritance
5. Israel as the inheritance of Yahweh
6. Inheritance in the NT

Bibliography

1. Relevant terms and concepts. Based on נחל, "give," "bestow," the idea of "inheritance" is indicated usually by נחלה. The related meanings "property," "possession," should also be noted. Associated with the word, especially in connection with the distribution of the land of Canaan to the various tribes, is the meaning of "portion (tract, territory)." The Greek has κληρονομία, a noun from a verb which means "to inherit." In the strict legal sense, both biblical words relate to the process of receiving possessions by descent or to that which is so received, as against that which is received—devised—by means of a will. A more general meaning is "to possess as having been handed down from the past," or, in the context of the Bible, as either having been handed down from the father or fathers or given by God. In many instances of biblical usage, the theological meaning of the word goes beyond the legalistic. Apart from any legal process, it may characterize the bestowal of a gift or possession upon his people by a merciful God, in fulfilment of a promise or as a reward for obedience. A Greek word, cognate to the one named above, κλῆρος signifies what is assigned by lot, or portion. The first meaning connotes the process of casting lots, but this meaning is lost, and a theological one takes its place. See §§ 4-5 below.

2. Inheritance of a father's possessions. Scattered indications of inheritance customs and practices are insufficient to provide a complete understanding of this subject, but they do furnish useful clues. The right of inheritance was vigorously defended by the prophet Elijah. Ahab had tried by legal means to acquire Naboth's vineyard, but Naboth had refused, saying: "The LORD forbid that I should give you the inheritance of my fathers" (I Kings 21:3). Naboth's right to preserve and transmit his inheritance from his fathers to his sons was circumvented by false charges of crimes calling for the death penalty.

Rachel and Leah, wives of Jacob, protested to the God of Bethel that their father had denied them their property rights (Gen. 31:14, 16). This episode in Genesis reveals only the desire of Jacob's wives to inherit from their father and gives no clear account of any particular custom.

A man's inheritance is so much a part of his life that it is spoken of as his house:

> They [the wicked] oppress a man and his house, > a man and his inheritance (Mic. 2:2).

Righteousness enables a father to leave an inheritance to his children and to their children as well, while the sinner can leave nothing (Prov. 13:22).

The request that Jesus direct a man's brother to divide his inheritance with him may reflect the concern of a brother who is not the first-born (Luke 12:13).

3. Legislation governing inheritance. Laws aimed at the control of inheritance are few in the Bible. For reasons that are not entirely clear, certain classes of persons in the community are singled out for special attention with respect to inheritance. These include the son of a slave girl or concubine, the first-born son, daughters, and the widow.

a. The son of a slave girl. The right to inherit was evidently not materially affected by the status of the mother. Sarah needed to take special action in order to prevent the son of the slave girl Hagar from inheriting along with Sarah's son, Isaac, and from inheriting as the first-born, at that (Gen. 21:10). The Babylonian Code (CH) provides that if a slave girl bears children and their father accepts them as his children, they are to share equally with the children of the wife in their father's estate as his heirs (section 170). But if the father fails to acknowledge them, they have no claim on his estate. However, in this event they shall be set free (section 171). It is noteworthy that Abimelech the son of a concubine asserted his claim to inherit against the claims of the sons of his father's wives (Judg. 8:30-31). A slave who acts wisely will have pre-eminence over a son who behaves shamefully, and he will "share the inheritance as one of the brothers" (Prov. 17:2). An interesting variant is the law enabling the prince of the Jewish theocratic state to give an inheritance to a slave (Ezek. 46:16-17), who, however, must return it if he is liberated.

b. Right of the first-born. The first-born is to receive double the portion of his father's possessions given to other sons (Deut. 21:15-17). Reuben was the first-born of Israel; "but because he polluted his father's couch [see Gen. 49:4], his birthright was given to the sons of Joseph" (I Chr. 5:1). I.e., Reuben's violation of the law against incest denied him the benefit of the law governing the rights of the first-born son. The story of Isaac's blessing to Jacob before he died suggests that the right of the first-born may have been formally conferred by a verbal blessing from the aged father (Gen. 27:4) in connection with a ceremonial meal. Once the words of the blessing had been pronounced, their effect was irrevocable (vs. 37). Custom, however, was doubtless sufficient to ensure that the inheritance was distributed in accordance with this right, whether or not a formal ceremony took place.

c. Rights of daughters. In view of the patriarchal form of the Hebrew family, the rights of sons were pre-eminent. These rights determined the succession to the father's name and possessions. But what happened in the event there were daughters but no sons? This problem is handled in considerable detail in Num. 27:1-11. A man had five daughters and no sons. Moses gave the decision that in such cases the father's inheritance should go to the daughter(s). If he had no daughters, his possessions should go to his brother. If he had no brother, then they should go to his father's brothers. If there were none, the property should go to the next of kin. This procedure was to become a statute for the entire nation, Moses decreed. To prevent the inheritance from going to another tribe, a ruling prohibited daughters from marrying outside the tribe of their father (Num. 36:6). Whether because of changes brought about by the Exile and subsequent events or because of the effect of this law, the book of Job records that Job's three daughters received an inheritance along with their brothers (42:15).

d. Status of the widow. No provision is made for the security of the widow through a provision that she inherit a portion of her late husband's property. Reasons for this singular omission have been advanced, such as the view that death before old age is a calamity, a punishment for sin, the effects of which extended to the wife who was left behind (see WIDOW). But the widow was not entirely unprotected by law and custom. The requirement of the levirate marriage (see MARRIAGE § 1*g*) may have provided for the inheritance of property. To preserve both the name and the inheritance of the family, the remarriage of the widow was required. The remarriage of the widow to each of six brothers under the operation of the levirate law (Matt. 22:24-26) thus continuously provided for her, apparently until her death, because she had no children by any of her husbands. Here and in the LXX the term "son," which appears in the Deuteronomic statement of the levirate law, becomes "children," possibly under the influence of the law permitting the inheritance of daughters in Num. 27.

e. Other categories. Inheritance of a king's possessions and royal office was not automatic in Israel, although the right of the FIRST-BORN was evidently operative as a rule. Succession to the throne might be decided by the help of a king's harem and his counselors (I Kings 1:27-28). The resident alien was allotted land in the restored community as an inheritance (Ezek. 47:20), provided he had children. His inheritance—i.e., assignment of land—would be decided by the identity of the tribe with which he lived. Priests were to have no inheritance (44:28). The fate of a rebellious son is drastic in Deut. 21:18-21: there is no question of cutting him off as an heir; he must be destroyed.

4. Canaan as Israel's inheritance. Canaan was the land that God had promised and delivered to his people (Deut. 4:21; 19:14). The basis of this belief is succinctly stated in the Lord's words to Joshua: "You shall cause this people to inherit the land which I swore to their fathers to give them" (Josh. 1:6; cf. 13:6-7, etc.; 23:4-5). Jeremiah refers to this land as that which was given to the fathers of Israel and Judah "for a heritage . . . , a heritage most beauteous of all nations" (3:18-19; cf. 12:14). This land was distributed among the various tribes of Israel, divided according to the size of each tribe (Num. 26:52-62; 33:54). Precise areas of land were specified for the tribes, each portion being located in relation to the one adjoining (Ezek. 48:1-7). Although the priests had no inheritance of land, because God is their inheritance, they shall share the offerings of grain and meat that are brought by the people (44:28-30).

5. Israel as the inheritance of Yahweh. Central to Israel's life are the holy temple and the land around it. These too are God's inheritance (Ps. 79:1). Israel is the tribe of the Lord's inheritance (Jer. 10:16). A similar use of the term appears in some passages (Deut. 9:26, 29; Ps. 28:9; etc.) where God's people are called his heritage. Because of Israel's treachery, God has forsaken his house, abandoned his heritage (Jer. 12:7); rejected by him, she has become like an enraged lion (vs. 8). Even though she is the Lord's inheritance, Israel has polluted the land with her "detestable idols" and has "filled [his] inheritance with their abominations" (16:18). Babylon is the plunderer of God's heritage—i.e., Israel (Jer. 50:11; cf. 51:19).

As a consequence of her nature as the inheritance or heritage of her God, Israel—or members of the Israelite community—undergoes certain types of experience which are also described as a heritage from the Lord. Destruction is the "heritage which oppressors receive from the Almighty" (Job 27:13). God will make the nations the heritage of his anointed one, the king on Zion, his holy hill (Ps. 2:6-8). The heritage of the blameless and upright ones "will abide for ever," for they are the true people of God (37:18). God has given his people, who are his true inheritance, the "heritage of the nations"—i.e., control over them as a possession (111:6). The Servant of the Lord receives divine protection as a heritage (Isa. 54:17); and those who honor the sabbath shall receive the heritage of Jacob their father—namely, divine approval (58:14). The tribes of Jacob are to be gathered in one place where they will receive their inheritance as it was of old—namely, Jerusalem and the greatness which this city once symbolized (Ecclus. 36:11). And the honorable man transmits to his descendants a good inheritance of uprightness (41:10-11). The priesthood is the "heritage" of the Levites (Josh. 18:7), and the Lord's testimonies are the "heritage" of the psalmist forever (Ps. 119:111).

6. Inheritance in the NT. Apart from the use of "inheritance" as the transmission of property from a father to his son in some of the parables of Jesus (Matt. 21:38; Mark 12:1-8; Luke 15:11-12), the NT employs this concept largely in a spiritual and theological sense. Thus eternal life is a benefit that can be inherited (Luke 18:18). The inheritance of God will be given to the elders of Ephesus in terms of the "word of his grace" (Acts 20:32). Abraham and his descendants did not receive the promise that they would inherit the world through the law, but through the "righteousness of faith" (Rom. 4:13). God's kingdom cannot be inherited by men who are immoral (I Cor. 6:9-10); the Holy Spirit is a guarantee of "his glorious inheritance in the saints" (Eph. 1:18). To share in the inheritance of the saints, men must be delivered from the dominion of darkness and transferred to the kingdom of his beloved son (Col. 1:12-13). This inheritance is a reward for obedience by the faithful (3:24). The promises of the gospel are inherited through patience and faith (Heb. 6:12); and "those who are called may receive the promised eternal inheritance" (9:15; cf. Heb. 11:8; I Pet. 1:4, 18). In the Dead Sea Scrolls appears a similar figure. God's chosen ones will obtain from him an inheritance of righteousness, strength, and glory (1QM XI.7-8).

Bibliography. A. Deimel, Codex Hammurabi (1930); M. Noth, Die Gesetze im Pentateuch (1940); E. Neufeld, Ancient Hebrew Marriage Laws (1944); T. J. Meek, Hebrew Origins (rev. ed., 1950), pp. 77-78; J. B. Pritchard, ed., ANET (2nd ed., 1955).

O. J. BAAB

INIQUITY. See SIN.

INK [דיו; μέλαν] (Jer. 36:18; II Cor. 3:3; II John 12; III John 13). Writing fluid made from soot or lampblack mixed with gum arabic. Red ink was also made by substituting red iron oxide for the carbon. See WRITING AND WRITING MATERIALS.

INKHORN, WRITER'S. KJV translation of קסת הספר (RSV WRITING CASE).

INLAY. A piece of material fitted or molded into a recess in the surface of another body. In Ezekiel's lament over Tyre, which is likened to a ship (27:1-9), vs. 6*b* is somewhat obscure, although the first three (Hebrew) words, translated: "They made your deck (or boards) of ivory," are textually sound. As it is incredible, particularly in an otherwise plausible description, that the deck of any ship should be made of ivory, the RSV has tried to reduce the difficulty of this verse by the rendition: "They made your deck . . . inlaid with ivory."

It is probable that various objects, described elsewhere in the OT as being "of ivory," were in fact inlaid with ivory. Solomon's throne (I Kings 10:18) was likely of wood, with extensive ivory and gold inlay. Similarly we may interpret the "beds of ivory" in Amos 6:4. This inlaid furniture was sufficiently prized to be part of Hezekiah's tribute to Sennacherib in 701 B.C., for we learn that the latter received, among other things, "couches (inlaid) with ivory, nîmedu-chairs (inlaid) with ivory" (ANET 288). The ivory buildings mentioned in I Kings 22:39; Ps. 45:8—H 45:9; Amos 3:15, were doubtless structures characterized by the generous use of ivory inlay on doors and paneling (see bibliography). Figs. INL 8; IVO 18.

By permission of the Palestine Exploration Fund

8. Ivory inlays from Samaria (first half of ninth century): (1, 1*a*) lotus flowers and a lily; (2, 2*a*) lotus flowers and buds; (3, 3*a*) chain of lotus and buds; (4, 4*a*) chain of palmettes and buds

In Esth. 1:6 the description of the floor of the banqueting court is probably to be taken (with RSV) as a "mosaic pavement."

Inlay has played a continuous part in the decorative art of the Near East from Sumerian to modern times, the earliest inlays being made from bone, mother-of-pearl, and shell. See IVORY.

Bibliography. For a survey of inlays, enamels, and fine ivory work, to ca. 500 B.C., see C. Singer, E. J. Holmyard, and A. R. Hall, eds., A History of Technology, I (1954), 659-83. For an account of ivories from inlays in doors and paneling, unearthed at Samaria and believed to have come from the ninth century B.C., see J. W. Crowfoot, Early Ivories from Samaria (1938).

W. S. MCCULLOUGH

INN [מלון (RSV LODGING PLACE; Gen. 42:27; 43:21; Exod. 4:24); κατάλυμα (Luke 2:7), πανδοχεῖον (Luke 10:35)]. A word used for several different kinds of shelter or dwelling.

1. In the OT. The Hebrew word by etymology is a "place to spend the night" (see Josh. 4:3), and it is used of the camping place of an individual (Jer. 9:2—H 9:1), a family (Exod. 4:24), a caravan (Gen. 42:27; 43:21), an army (II Kings 19:23 [RSV "retreat"]; Isa. 10:29), or even a nation (Josh. 4:3, 8). Perhaps a simple shelter for desert travelers is meant in Jer. 9:2—H 9:1, but in none of the other references is any structure demanded by the context. So the KJV "inn" for the references in Genesis and Exodus is misleading. When travelers did not find lodging in private houses, they often camped in the open (Gen. 19:2; 28:11; Judg. 19:15).

"Geruth Chimham" (Jer. 41:17) could be translated "habitation of Chimham" (KJV) or "Chimham's Inn" (Amer. Trans.), but the text and meaning are uncertain. This place was near, not in, Bethlehem, and the gap in time makes the identification with the "inn" of Luke 2:7 unlikely.

The Targ. of Josh. 2:1 calls Rahab פונדקיתא, "innkeeper," and Josephus (Antiq. V.i.2) so describes her also. It is possible that Rahab combined the professions of harlot and innkeeper, as was sometimes done in Roman times also. It is noteworthy that this Aramaic word for "innkeeper" and the words in rabbinic sources for "inn" (פונדק, from Greek πανδοχεῖον; and אושפיזא, from Latin hospitium) are of foreign origin, perhaps indicating that the organized hostel was an importation into the Near East.

2. In the NT. In Bethlehem, Joseph and Mary could find no room in the "inn" (Luke 2:7). The root meaning of the Greek word καταλύμα is a "place to loose one's burden." Here the word does not mean a hotel, but perhaps the village guest house, like the modern Arabic maḍâfah. The same word is used of the "guest room" where Jesus and the disciples ate their last supper together (Mark 14:14; Luke 22:11). According to a Greek inscription of the first century A.D., a man named Theodotus provided a hospice (καταλύμα) with rooms and a water supply for Jewish pilgrims in Jerusalem. Fig. SYN 94. See also JERUSALEM § 12.

The Good Samaritan took the wounded traveler to an "inn" (πανδοχεῖον; Luke 10:34). Since this hostel had an "innkeeper" (πανδοχεύς; vs. 35), who could supply food and care to the wounded man, it was more like an inn in the modern sense than that of Luke 2:7. By coincidence, the Mishna (Yeb. XVI.7) relates that some Levites going along the same road from Jerusalem eastward left a sick companion at an inn (פונדוק) in charge of the woman innkeeper (פונדקית). This may have been the same inn as that of Luke 10:34.

The inn of the Good Samaritan has been traditionally identified with Khan el-Ahmar, or more commonly with Khan Hathrur (or Hatrur), midway on the road between Jerusalem and Jericho. This khan, or caravansary, consists of a building with arched door, and a large court, in the center of which is a well. The inn of Jesus' day may have had a similar plan.

In Fragments of an Unknown Gospel a leper says to Jesus that he contracted the disease by eating with lepers in an "inn" (πανδοχεῖον).

Bibliography. A. Bertholet, Die Stellung der Israeliten und der Juden zu den Fremden (1896), p. 24; G. Dalman, Sacred Sites and Ways (trans. P. L. Levertoff; 1935), pp. 41-43, 244-45; E. F. F. Bishop, Jesus of Palestine (1955), pp. 41-45.

J. A. THOMPSON

INNER, INWARD MAN [ὁ ἔσω ἄνθρωπος]. The meaning of this phrase in Paul's theology may be found in his view of personality (see Rom. 7:22-23), in which he sees the self as comprised of three elements: (a) the "inmost self," in which the law of God dwells and which in Rom. 7:23 he equates with reason (νοῦς); (b) "my members" (τοῖς μέλεσίν μου), which in Rom. 7:18 he calls "my flesh" (τῇ σαρκί μου) and which in this sense means the innate desires that in their natural state accept no law standing in the way of their satisfaction; and (c) the conscious "I" (ἐγώ), which is aware of both reason and desire. Every "person" includes these three "selves," each of which in its role speaks as "I." Man's predicament is that the inner self of reason is in conflict with the self of desire, which by its nature recognizes no law.

Elsewhere (II Cor. 3:17-18; Eph. 3:16) Paul indicates that the Lord, or Spirit, dwells in the Christian's inner self, providing grace necessary to bring the flesh under discipline.

A reflection of Paul's understanding of the self occurs in Freud's analysis of personality into superego, id, and ego.

Bibliography. S. V. McCasland, By the Finger of God (1951), pp. 21-30; J. Knox, IB, IX (1954), 498-505.

S. V. MCCASLAND

INNOCENCE; KJV INNOCENCY. The condition of one who has not offended God; freedom from sin and guilt.

1. In the OT. In the RSV of the OT this noun occurs only three times (Gen. 20:5; Pss. 26:6; 73:13), though the adjective is found frequently. The Hebrew root נקה (adjective נקי), which it regularly translates, has the primary meaning of "clean" or "free from"—thus, "free from guilt, innocent" (e.g., Exod. 23:7; II Kings 24:4). The person so described has refrained from transgression of God's will or commandment in his relations both to God and to man. The RSV frequently translates the same Hebrew root by "guiltless" (e.g., Exod. 20:7; Deut. 5:11; Jer. 2:34). Closely allied in meaning is the Hebrew root תם, which the RSV translates "righteous" or "blameless" when moving in this sphere of thought, denoting more positively the status of completeness or integrity (Gen. 7:1; Job 1:1; Ps. 18:23). This positive emphasis is further reflected in other passages, where תם is translated "perfect" (e.g., Lev. 22:21; Job 36:4; Ps. 18:30). The Hebrew צדיק (see RIGHTEOUSNESS), with the same positive nuance, is eight times translated "innocent" by the RSV (e.g., Gen. 20:4; Deut. 25:1; Job 9:15). The LXX usually translates δίκαιος ("right, just, righteous"). All three roots move in the same sphere of meaning.

Innocence throughout the OT is conceived basically in moral terms. That this innocence is relative is necessitated by the OT view of human sinfulness (see SIN). Nevertheless, with the growing tendency to equate God's will with the Torah, there was a corollary tendency to define innocence in terms of keeping the Torah. The OT never departs from the conviction that only God can create a right heart and remove sin. But the growing tendency toward emphasis on Torah as the objective criterion for judging innocence was accompanied by an absolutizing and moralizing of the concept of innocence.

2. In the NT. In the RSV of the NT the adjective "innocent" is found eight times, translating four different Greek terms: ἀκέραιος ("unmixed, pure"; Matt. 10:16; Phil. 2:15), ἀθῷος ("free from"; Matt.

27:4, 24), δίκαιος ("upright, just, righteous"; Matt. 23:35; Luke 23:47), κάθαρος ("clean, pure"; Acts 18:6; 20:26). The first two Greek terms convey the negative and the last two the more positive meaning. Several other Greek words (ἄμωμος, ἀνέγκλητος, ἄμεμπτος, ἄκακος) translated "blameless" by the RSV are closely associated in meaning to these four. The disciples are to be "innocent as doves" (Matt. 27:24); Paul is innocent of the fate of those who will not hear the gospel which he has responsibly preached (Acts 18:6).

In the NT it is primarily in relation to God's will revealed through Jesus Christ that innocence is judged. However, innocence in the NT must ultimately be understood, not merely in moral, but in eschatological terms. The Christian is only relatively innocent in the moral sense, since only Jesus Christ was truly innocent—really free from sin and guilt (Luke 23:47; cf. I Pet. 1:19). With Adam the Christian is a creature whose sense of guilt reveals that his innocence is lost. But in the Second Adam, Jesus Christ, he is confronted with the possibility of restoration in the innocence of God's only faithful Man. Insofar as the Christian can be called innocent, it is as he is forgiven and becomes a new creature through Christ. To be innocent in this ultimate sense involves the full consummation of the new age already inaugurated by Christ. It is only Christ who can present him "holy and blameless" (Col. 1:22; cf. Eph. 5:27) and "guiltless in the day of our Lord Jesus" (I Cor. 1:8; cf. I Thess. 5:23). Innocence in any ultimate sense for the Christian is not something he attains, claims, or possesses on his own. It is a gift of God revealed and given through faith in Jesus Christ (Eph. 1:4); its full meaning and consequences await the final disclosure in the Day of the Lord.

F. W. YOUNG

INNOCENTS, SLAUGHTER OF THE. An incident recorded in Matt. 2:16-18, where it is part of the narrative of 2:1-18. A messianic prediction by MAGI or astrologers that a child should be born in Bethlehem who would be "king of the Jews" is understood by HEROD the Great as referring to a royal claimant. When the Magi flee to avoid questioning, Herod in a rage orders the death of all male children in Bethlehem two years of age or less (perhaps twenty to thirty in number). The evangelist finds in this a fulfilment of Jer. 31:15—G 38:15; but the connection of this verse with Bethlehem is not clear, as Ramah, traditional burial place of Rachel, is ca. ten miles N of Jerusalem (cf. Gen. 35:17; 48:7). See EPHRATHAH 2.

The motif of the story is familiar, and recalls the account of Pharaoh and Moses in Exod. 1-2. However, the character and deeds of Herod, especially in his last years, would make such an act quite plausible, although no other evidence for it exists. Josephus' silence may be part of his general suppression of messianic data. He recounts similar and worse atrocities—e.g., Herod's order to mark his own death by the slaying of one member of each family (Antiq. XVII.vi.5-6).

See also JESUS CHRIST; RAMAH 3.

Bibliography. A. H. McNeille, The Gospel According to St. Matthew (1915), pp. 19-20; P. Saintyves, "Le massacre des Innocents ou la persécution de l'Enfant Prédestiné," Congrès d'histoire du Christianisme, I (1928), 229-72.

A. WIKGREN

INQUIRE OF GOD [שׁאל, to ask, consult; דרשׁ, to seek, resort to; בקר, to inquire]. To seek divine guidance through the consultation of oracle, priest, prophet, or God himself. In the early period of Israel's history the Deity was consulted through the priest (Judg. 18:14, 17; I Sam. 22:10), or through the seer, the precursor of the prophet (I Sam. 9:9). Priest and prophet were both connected with the sanctuary, and both were diviners. The priest divined by sacred lot, URIM AND THUMMIM (cf. Num. 27:21; I Sam. 14: 36-42); ephod (I Sam. 23:9-13; 30:8); and perhaps also by teraphim, sacred images (Judg. 18:14), and sacrifice (Hos. 3:4). How the prophet divined is not known. Seeing and hearing were his specialty. He used ecstatic vision, and at times music was employed (cf. I Sam. 10:5; II Kings 3:15).

The Deity was consulted on numerous matters of personal and public welfare (cf. I Sam. 9:9). More particularly, the king would inquire of the Deity, before going to battle, to create victory in his soul and assure himself of victory (I Sam. 23:2, 4; II Sam. 5: 19, 23; II Kings 3:11; II Chr. 18:4, 6-7; cf. Judg. 1:1; 20:23).

While dreams, Urim, and prophet were the recognized means to ascertain the divine will (I Sam. 28: 6), many others existed—e.g., mediums and wizards (I Sam. 28:3; Isa. 8:19; cf. Deut. 18:10-11), necromancers (I Sam. 28:8; Isa. 8:19; cf. Deut. 18:11), teraphim (Judg. 17:5; 18:13-14, 17-18, 20; Hos. 3:4; Zech. 10:2), pillar (Hos. 3:4), ark (Judg. 20:27), altar (II Kings 16:15)—to say nothing of the consultation of foreign deities such as Baal-zebub (II Kings 1:2-3, 16) and Milcom (Zeph. 1:5).

With the rise of prophetic schools, consultation of the Deity was predominantly through the prophet. The earlier prophets used stimulated ecstasy to ascertain the divine will; the later prophets relied more on inspiration and prophetic insight. The fall of the nation brought prophecy into disrepute (because of the false prophets), and the priest in postexilic Judaism rose to the foreground. However, since the time of Solomon, the wise man (or sage) was frequently consulted as to the divine will in matters of daily life (cf. Jer. 18:18). With the rise of the synagogue, direct consultation of the Deity through prayer came more and more in vogue, until in NT times we have prayer as the chief means to inquire of God. Christians were taught to pray in the name of the Lord Jesus (John 14:13-14; 15:16; 16:23, 26; cf. Acts 2:21; Rom. 10: 13).

See also ARK; DIVINATION; EPHOD; PRIESTS AND LEVITES; PROPHET; SEER.

Bibliography. W. R. Arnold, Ephod and Ark (1917); J. Pedersen, Israel, I-II (1926), 141-44; A. Guillaume, Prophecy and Divination (1938).

V. H. KOOY

INSCRIPTION ON THE CROSS [ἐπιγραφή]. KJV alternately: SUPERSCRIPTION (Mark 15:26; Luke 23:38). The sign attached to Jesus' cross to indicate the crime alleged against him, the crime for which he was condemned. See also CROSS; TRIAL OF JESUS.

The word αἰτία (RSV "charge"; KJV "accusation") is used in reference to the inscription in Matt. 27:37; Mark 15:26. John 19:19-20 uses the word τίτλον, "title." The basic meaning of αἰτία is the cause or reason for an action. This use appears often in the LXX and contemporary Greek literature, as well as in the NT (e.g., Luke 8:47; Acts 10:21; 22:24; II Tim. 1:12; Tit. 1:13). From these it takes on the legal meanings of "accusation" (Acts 25:18), "charge or ground for complaint" (Matt. 19:3; John 18:38; 19:4, 6; Acts 23:28; 25:27), and "ground for capital punishment" (αἰτια θανάτου; Acts 13:28; 28:18). The last two are involved at Matt. 27:37; Mark 15:26. The authors of Luke and John may have recoiled at applying so opprobrious a term in Jesus' case, and so changed it.

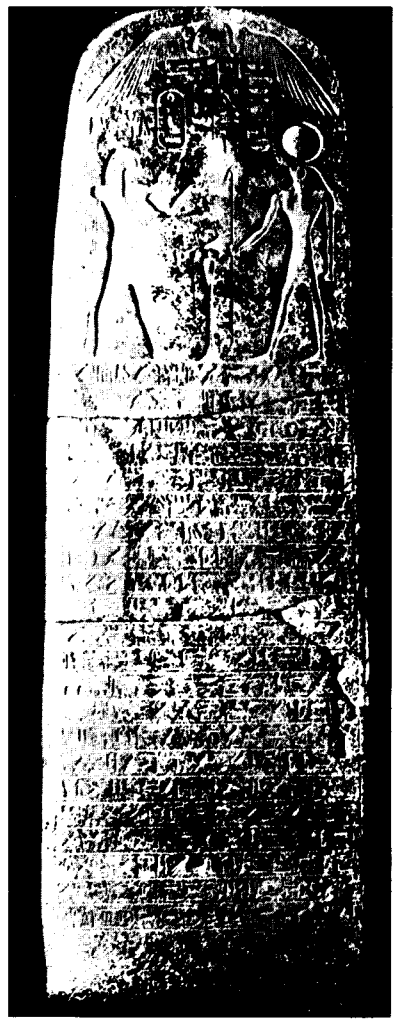
The wording of the inscription varies in the four gospels, but all contain the definitive phrase "the King of the Jews." This shows, on the one hand, that Jesus was convicted of insurrection, his personal claims being interpreted as opposed to the authority of Rome (see TRIAL OF JESUS). On the other hand, the phrase exhibits the contempt in which the Jews were held by their Roman masters. The cross stood close to a main road out of Jerusalem, where Jewish passers-by must see the inscription and sense the derision. The Fourth Gospel strongly underscores this (John 19:20-32). The words, it says, were in Hebrew, Latin, and Greek; hence none who saw it could fail to understand. The Jewish authorities complained to Pilate, asking that the inscription be changed to: "This man said, I am King of the Jews." Pilate, however, refused to alter it. PIERSON PARKER

*__INSCRIPTIONS.__ During the past century or so, the understanding of the Bible has been revolutionized by the mass of written documents recovered from the ancient Near East. The story of the decipherment of the scripts in which they were written and the recovery of the many languages employed has all the elements of suspense and romance.



In this article the term "inscriptions" is understood to mean any written documents, whether on stone, clay, papyrus, or any other material (see WRITING AND WRITING MATERIALS). The exigencies of space preclude any exhaustive listing of texts or full discussion of their significance. Brief references to documents of greatest interest to students of the Bible must suffice. It will be convenient to divide these texts into five groups according to the languages in which they are written.

1. Egyptian
2. Sumerian and Akkadian
3. Canaanite
4. Aramaic
5. Greek
Bibliography

1. Egyptian. With the successful decipherment of the ROSETTA STONE* by Champollion in 1822, it became possible for scholars to read the hitherto enigmatic hieroglyphs inscribed on Egyptian temples, tombs, stelae, obelisks, etc., as well as the even more extensive materials written in hieratic and demotic script on leather, papyrus, etc., thus rendering this great body of material available to scholars. Fig. ROS 19.

One of the classics of Egyptian literature, preserved on many papyri and ostraca, is the Story of Si-nuhe. It narrates the adventures of a self-exiled official of the early Twelfth Dynasty who took refuge in Syria on the assassination of King Amen-em-het I, ca. 1962 B.C. The vivid picture it affords of seminomadic life is a valuable contemporary illustration of the background against which the patriarchal narratives in the book of Genesis are set.

From the end of the Twelfth or beginning of the Thirteenth Dynasty, during the nineteenth and eighteenth centuries B.C., a number of pottery bowls and figurines have come to light. On these were inscribed a series of curses directed against real or potential enemies of the state. The bowls were then ritually smashed to accomplish the magical destruction of these foes. Among the names of persons and places recorded in these Execration Texts are many Asiatic ones (e.g., Ashkelon, Jerusalem, Achshaph, Shechem), from which may be deduced the political conditions

Courtesy of the University Museum of the University of Pennsylvania

9. A stele of Seti I, giving an account of the King's victory over a coalition of Asiatic princes; found at Beth-shan in Syria-Palestine during this period. They show a patriarchal organization, e.g., rather than that of the later city-states. From the same time (ca. 1740) comes a papyrus which contains a list of ninety-five slaves, many of them Semites.

Much important information may be derived from the topographical lists, cataloguing the conquests of Thut-mose III (ca. 1490-1436) of the Eighteenth Dynasty, inscribed in the temple of Amon at Karnak. Together with his "annals," recorded on the same building, these lists serve to document the history of the Palestinian city-states such as Megiddo, Gezer, Taanach, Aijalon, etc., during the expansion of the Egyptian Empire. The names of places in Palestine contained in the later lists of Ramses II (ca. 1290-1223) on the Ramesseum at Thebes and of Ramses III (ca. 1179-1147) at Medinet Habu are mere copies of the earlier list of Thut-mose. The much later Karnak list of Sheshonk I (ca. 940-919), whom the OT calls SHISHAK, records 156 cities of Syria-Palestine which he claims to have captured; this is not a mere copy, but contains many names not to be found in the earlier lists. This invasion of Palestine in the fifth year of Rehoboam is referred to in the OT (I Kings 14:25-26; somewhat expanded in II Chr. 12:2-9).

A papyrus of ca. 1300 relates an episode, legendary in character, concerning a general of Thut-mose III who was responsible for the capture of the town of Joppa. In it we find the prototype of the story of "Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves."

A number of Egyptian inscriptions have turned up at various sites in Palestine. Three stelae, one of Ramses II and two of his predecessor Seti I (ca. 1303-1290), come from BETH-SHAN, which was occupied by an Egyptian garrison. The larger stela of Seti tells of the capture of Beth-shan by the ruler of Hamath and its relief by Seti. The smaller one mentions "the 'apiru [see HABIRU] of Mount Yarumtu," and is evidence of a later invasion by Seti. Fig. INS 9.

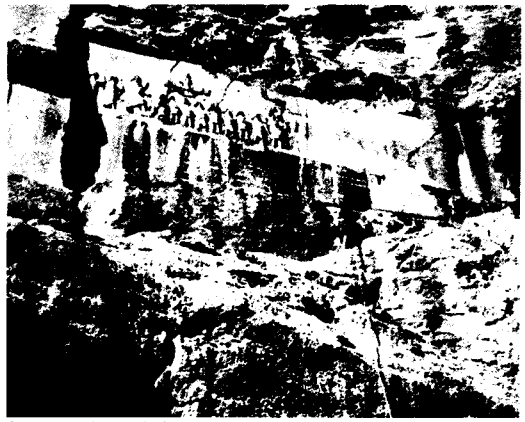
An outstanding literary work of the reign of AKH-EN-ATON (ca. 1360-1353) is his great hymn to the god Aton, carved in hieroglyphs on a tomb at Tell el-Amarna. Rightly regarded as a major document of the Atonist "heresy," this work draws upon elements from the earlier Hymn to Amon, speaking of the sun-god's benefactions and lauding him as creator and sustainer of the universe. The supposed monotheistic tendencies in the hymn are mere literary clichés which are to be found already in the polytheistic Hymn to Amon, and are part of the universalism in religion which was characteristic of the Empire. Reference has frequently been made to the striking similarity of this hymn to Ps. 104, but direct literary dependence is most unlikely. It is probable, however, that the Hebrew writer drew upon Egyptian sources for these ideas which pervaded later Egyptian religious works.

During the Nineteenth Dynasty, in the third year of MER-NE-PTAH (ca. 1223-1211), revolts seem to have occasioned a punitive expedition into Syria-Palestine. Although no such campaign is recorded in the OT, there is some evidence to suggest that it did take place. Two years later, Mer-ne-ptah faced a far more serious threat to Egyptian security when the Libyans, supported by the Sea Peoples, attempted to invade his borders. To commemorate his achievements on both these occasions, Mer-ne-ptah inscribed a series of hymns of victory on a stela which he set up in his mortuary temple at Thebes, meanwhile carving a duplicate on the temple of Amon at Karnak. In the final strophe the pharaoh makes the sole reference to Israel to be found in any Egyptian text:

> Canaan is plundered with every evil;
> Ashkelon is taken; Gezer is captured;
> Yanoam is made non-existent;
> Israel lies desolate; its seed is no more.[1]

The name Israel is written in such a way as to suggest that the people was an important one, although not yet permanently established.

The short story was first developed as a literary genre in Egypt, from whence the art was passed to the Hebrews. A fine example of the Egyptian genius for storytelling is the Tale of the Two Brothers, preserved in a MS of ca. 1225. Of particular interest is the close resemblance which the first part of the story bears to the account of Joseph and Potiphar's wife (Gen. 39).



The Sea Peoples, who had been repulsed by Mer-ne-ptah, made a full-scale assault on Egypt by land and sea during the reign of Ramses III (ca. 1179-1147) of the Twentieth Dynasty. These Indo-European folk, who had established themselves in the E Mediterranean, included such groups as the Achaeans, Tyrsenians, Lycians, Teucrians, and others who later gave their names to Sardinia and Sicily. Among them were also the PHILISTINES, who settled on the Palestinian coastal plain after they were driven back by Ramses. The records of these naval and land battles were inscribed on Ramses' mortuary temple at Medinet Habu.

A tale of the Twenty-first Dynasty, ca. 1100, relates the experiences of an Egyptian temple official by the name of Wen-Amon who was dispatched to purchase timber in Byblos for the bark of the god Amon. The story, with wry humor, makes clear the depths to which Egyptian prestige had sunk by this time. In the course of the tale mention is made of an episode in which "the god seized" a priest and "made him possessed." This instance of prophetic frenzy in Syria is of great interest in view of the OT accounts of ecstatic prophecy in Israel. See ECSTASY.

Egypt, famed for her wise men, produced many didactic treatises written for the instruction of officials' sons, such as the Old Kingdom writings of Ptah-hotep. In her declining years this tradition was maintained and at some period, probably during the eleventh century, the Wisdom of Amenemope made its appearance. Exhibiting a high ethical tone and an emphasis on personal piety characteristic of the times in which it was written, the work has special significance for biblical studies. The very close parallelism between parts of this document and Prov. 22:17–23:14 is such as to suggest literary dependence of the latter on the Egyptian work.

At the end of the fourth century B.C. the tomb of an Egyptian official by the name of Petosiris was adorned with a series of hieroglyphic texts. Among [1] From D. W. Thomas, ed., Documents from OT Times, published by Thomas Nelson & Sons.

Courtesy of George C. Cameron, American Schools of Oriental Research and the University of Michigan

10. The cliff at Behistun, with Darius I relief and inscription in three languages: Old Persian, Elamite, and Akkadian these were some of a didactic nature which seem to have been influenced by OT literature, notably Ps. 128.

Finally, in a demotic MS of the first century A.D. there occurs a tale which, despite its late date, is purely Egyptian in character. This is the story of a man whose son, possessed of magical powers, led him through the halls of the underworld. In it can be found the prototype of the parable of the rich man and Lazarus (Luke 16:19-31).

2. Sumerian and Akkadian. The key to the decipherment of the CUNEIFORM scripts was the great rock inscription of Darius I at Behistun.* Unlike the Rosetta Stone, which provided a Greek version of the Egyptian texts, Darius' record of his suppression of the revolts which followed his accession was inscribed in three unknown languages: Old Persian, Elamite, and Akkadian. Rawlinson, who first copied the text in 1837, succeeded in deciphering the Old Persian version in 1846, and the Akkadian version shortly afterward. As a result of this achievement, the riches of the Sumerian and Akkadian literatures, written in the same script, were at last revealed.

Some texts are written on stone, but the vast majority are on clay tablets. The amazing extent of these treasures first become apparent with the discovery in 1853 of the royal library of Ashurbanipal (668-633) at Nineveh. Although this was the largest, similar libraries have been found going back as early as Sargon II (721-705). Figs. INS 10; PER 38-39.

The Sumerian King List, compiled ca. 2065, records the reigns of the earliest rulers in Mesopotamia and indicates that the line was interrupted by a memorable flood. The eight antediluvian kings are given reigns totaling 241,200 years (the last ruling 18,600)! A late form of the list preserved by Berossus (281-261) enumerates ten such kings, with a total of 432,000 years. Such astronomical figures recall the OT record of the longevity of the ten patriarchs from Adam to Noah (Gen. 5).

The early Sumerian supremacy was interrupted by the Semitic Old Akkadian Dynasty founded by Sargon I (ca. 2360). A legendary account of his birth has been preserved in which he is said to have been placed in a basket of rushes and set afloat in the river, to be rescued by an irrigation official. The similarity of this story to that of Moses (Exod. 2:1-10) is obvious.

It was in Mesopotamia that the first legal "codes" were produced. Most famous of all is that of HAMMURABI (ca. 1728-1686),* inscribed on a magnificent stela, with copies on clay tablets. This great work was a compilation of laws already in existence, many of them translated from Sumerian, and was intended as a supplement and amendment to the common law of his day. Recent discoveries have revealed that, far from being the earliest such "code," this was one of a series. Similar collections of laws are known from the reigns of Ur-Nammu (ca. 2060) of Ur, Bilalama (ca. 1930) of Eshnunna, and Lipit-Ishtar (ca. 1865) of Isin. The Middle Assyrian laws, probably of the fifteenth century, are similar in content and refer to levirate marriage (cf. Deut. 25:5-10). This development of a legal tradition was transmitted to the West, giving rise to the Hittite "code." Not only do such collections illuminate the Mosaic legislation in the OT (see LAW IN THE OT), but they also suggest how the tradition and form (though not necessarily the content) of the latter had their origin. Fig. HAM 5.

Two sites have unexpectedly yielded great numbers of texts which have shed much welcome light on the early narratives in Genesis. The first is MARI on the middle Euphrates, where over twenty thousand tablets from the nineteenth and eighteenth centuries have been recovered from the archives of the palace. Among the letters is preserved some correspondence with Hammurabi himself. Since the region was predominantly Amorite in population (see AMORITES), these texts supply much information for the background of the Hebrew patriarchal period.

The second group of texts, numbering many thousands of tablets from the fifteenth and fourteenth centuries, comes from the site of ancient NUZI in NE Mesopotamia. This was an area inhabited largely by Hurrians, in the OT called HORITES, although the language used in the texts is Akkadian. These business and legal documents have provided a clue to the understanding of many of the legal practices preserved in the patriarchal narratives of the OT, such as the selling of the birthright, and the fact that the possession of the household gods (see TERAPHIM) virtually gave title to an estate.

At the site of ancient Alalakh in the Turkish Hatay, the statue of King Idrimi (ca. 1450), accompanied by a long biographical inscription, has recently been recovered. The account which it contains of a man, estranged by jealousy from his elder brothers but later, after having become king, reconciled to them, may be reflected in the OT story of Joseph.

The reigns of Amen-hotep III (ca. 1397-1360) and his son Akh-en-Aton (ca. 1360-1353) witnessed the breakup of Egypt's Asiatic possessions. The stirring events of these days are graphically portrayed in the state archives of Akh-en-Aton unearthed at TELL EL-AMARNA in Middle Egypt. These consist of nearly four hundred clay tablets written in Akkadian, which was at this time the language of international diplomacy. The documents include letters to and from the petty rulers of the city-states in Syria-Palestine which were under Egyptian suzerainty, such as Byblos, Tyre, Megiddo, Jerusalem, etc. The HABIRU figure prominently in these letters as a people whose invasions led to the collapse of Egyptian domination. Of great importance also is the language of these texts, for not only do they betray Canaanite grammatical and lexical features, but they also contain a large number of Canaanite glosses which are invaluable for a knowledge of the Canaanite (Hebrew) language of the period.

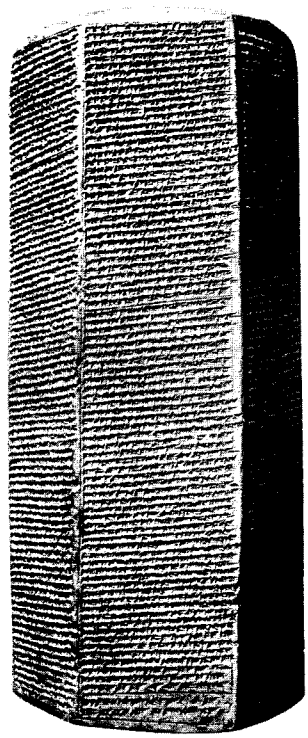
The epic had its rise in Mesopotamia. To honor the Babylonian god Marduk, a great poem of seven tablets was composed in which earlier Sumerian ideas of COSMOGONY were incorporated. This Creation Epic was recited annually as a part of the New Year's festival to celebrate the triumph of the hero Marduk over the forces of chaos, represented by the goddess Tiamat. This victory, achieved by his weapons the storm winds, reflects the annual conflict in nature between the floods and the winds in springtime, just as the description of creation in the epic is a portrayal of the continuous formation of alluvial Mesopotamia through the deposit of silt. The motif of the fight between Marduk and Tiamat was later transmitted to Canaanite and Hebrew literature (see LEVIATHAN); indeed, the name Tiamat is etymologically akin to the Hebrew *t*ehōm* (Gen. 1:2; see ABYSS). The epic tells how, in order to relieve the gods of menial tasks, man was created from the blood of one of the gods. In other Sumerian and Akkadian myths the substance used is clay mingled with divine blood.

The Epic of Gilgamesh, which goes back to Old Babylonian times and utilizes earlier Sumerian sources, achieved even greater popularity, as the versions in Hittite and Hurrian testify. It relates, in the course of twelve tablets, the adventures of Gilgamesh and his boon companion Enkidu.* When the latter dies, Gilgamesh embarks on a search for immortality, which leads him to the abode of Utnapishtim, the hero of the flood. In the eleventh tablet Utnapishtim recounts the flood story in a form remarkably similar to that in Gen. 6–8 (see FLOOD [GENESIS]). This account, based on the Sumerian story of Ziusudra, is similar to others in Akkadian texts, such as the Atrahasis Epic. Fig. FLO 18.

Mesopotamian wisdom literature, unlike that of Egypt, is characterized by extensive collections of proverbs, both in Sumerian and in Akkadian, a custom which the Hebrews adopted in the book of Proverbs. The discussion of theodicy likewise has no counterpart in Egypt, but is represented by four works, one Sumerian, the others Akkadian: a Sumerian poem, perhaps as early as 2000; a poem from the reign of Ammiditana (ca. 1619-1583); the Acrostic Dialogue or Babylonian Theodicy, from the Kassite period; the slightly later Poem of the Righteous Sufferer. These all pave the way for the later Hebrew discussions of the same problem (Job; Pss. 37; 49; 73).

A common literary genre in Mesopotamian religious literature is the penitential psalm. Its influence on Hebrew psalmody is seen in such examples as Ps. 51.

The royal annals of the Assyrian kings afford a valuable supplement to the historical books of the



Courtesy of the Trustees of the British Museum

11. Scenes from the "Black Obelisk" of Shalmaneser III (858-824 B.C.), from Nimrud, showing tributes being brought to Shalmaneser III by Sua the Gilzanite (left) and Jehu "son of Omri" (right)

Bible, and Mesopotamian methods of recording events may well have served as models for Hebrew historiography. Those of most direct interest for the OT begin with Shalmaneser III (858-824), whose "monolith inscription" tells of his battle at Qarqar on the Orontes River in 854 against a coalition of twelve kings, including Ahab of Israel, who supplied the largest contingent. On his "black obelisk"* he describes (and illustrates with a relief) the submission of Jehu of Israel. Neither of these facts is mentioned in the OT. Tiglath-pileser III (744-727) records how Menahem of Israel paid tribute (cf. II Kings 15:19-20) and mentions the Syro-Ephraimite War, which involved Ahaz of Judah (cf. II Kings 16:5-18). The destruction of Samaria and the deportation of the Israelite population (cf. II Kings 18:9-12) are recounted by Sargon II (721-705). The description of the siege of Jerusalem in the reign of Hezekiah by Sennacherib (704-681)* supplements the OT account (II Kings 18–19=Isa. 36–37). The annals of Esarhaddon (680-669) mention Manasseh as a vassal, and those of Ashurbanipal (668-633) describe his invasion of Syria-Palestine and Egypt. Figs. INS 11-12.

Four Babylonian chronicles give a graphic account of the fall of Nineveh and fix the date as 612. The description of the collapse of the Assyrian Empire makes the death of Josiah at the hands of Pharaoh Neco (II Kings 23:29) intelligible. The chronicles also fix the date of the capture and destruction of Jerusalem. Most remarkable of all is a group of three hundred tablets from Babylon, dated between 595 and 570, during the reign of Nebuchadnezzar II (605-562). These list the rations of oil and barley for persons maintained by the royal commissariat, among whom appear none other than Jehoiachin, the exiled king of Judah, and his five sons (cf. II Kings 25:27-30).

Courtesy of the Oriental Institute, the University of Chicago

12. Clay prism containing the annals of Sennacherib (704-681 B.C.)

A poem by a Babylonian priest denounces the reign of Nabonidus (555-539) and recognizes Cyrus II (557-529) as the heaven-sent world ruler in terms reminiscent of the sentiments expressed by the prophet in Isa. 40–55. Cyrus himself has left a cylinder relating the fall of Babylon and indicating that he allowed various exiled peoples in his new domains to return to their own lands.

3. Canaanite. The discovery at Ras Shamra, ancient UGARIT on the N Syrian coast, of an archive of hundreds of clay tablets inscribed in an alphabetic cuneiform script and in a language which proved to be an early form of Canaanite was destined to have far-reaching effects on OT studies.* These mythological poems of the fifteenth and fourteenth centuries are of great linguistic importance and have contributed not a little to the understanding of Hebrew vocabulary in the OT. But even more significant is the fact that OT poetic literature is permeated by literary reminiscences of these epics. Moreover, they richly illustrate the religious beliefs and practices denounced by such prophets as Hosea. Figs. UGA 2; WRI 28.

A number of inscriptions discovered at the Egyptian turquoise mines in the Sinai Peninsula have provided the evidence for the origin of the alphabetic scripts which produced the Hebrew alphabet and ultimately our own (see ALPHABET).* These proto-Sinaitic inscriptions, to be dated ca. 1500, were written with signs derived from Egyptian hieroglyphs on the acrophonic principle. Three short inscriptions in the same script have turned up at Gezer, Lachish, and Shechem. Figs. WRI 29; INS 13.

From Zeitschrift des Deutschen Palästina-Vereins; by permission of Otto Harrassowitz, Wiesbaden, Germany

13. Inscribed plaque from Shechem in alphabetic script (ca. 1650 B.C.)

From the thirteenth and twelfth centuries comes a series of alphabetic inscriptions from such sites as Beth-shemesh, Byblos, and Lachish,* as well as inscribed arrowheads. These are of great importance in illustrating the development of the script from the proto-Sinaitic texts to the Phoenician inscriptions of the tenth century at Byblos (see EPIGRAPHY).* The latter, six in number, together with the later Phoenician inscriptions, such as that of Kilamuwa from Zenjirli, contribute valuable data for the history of PHOENICIA. They also provide evidence for the orthography of the Hebrew in the earliest portions of the OT. Figs. LAC 4; GEB 15.

The longest Phoenician inscription to date was recently discovered at Karatepe in E Cilicia. From it may be obtained much information about the kingdom of the Danunians (one of the Sea Peoples) in the latter part of the eighth century. This great inscription, which actually contains three versions of the text in Phoenician, is also bilingual, for the same text, with minor differences, appears in two versions written in hieroglyphic Hittite. The text affords a brilliant confirmation of the successful attempts of scholars to decipher this new language and script (see HITTITES). Its greatest contribution in this connection will be the new lexical information it provides.

The MOABITE STONE, a monument erected ca. 840 by Mesha, king of Moab, is the only important inscription in the Moabite dialect.* It tells how the Israelite ruler Omri conquered N Moab and further recounts a victory over Israel not mentioned in the OT. Fig. MOA 66.

The earliest Hebrew inscription is a limestone plaque from GEZER, to be dated ca. 925. This interesting text is an agricultural calendar, probably a schoolboy's exercise. Fig. CAL 2.

Of great interest is the group of about seventy Hebrew ostraca from SAMARIA (town), consisting of invoices for the deliveries of oil and wine to the royal treasury between ca. 778 and 770. These texts, contemporary with Jeroboam II of Israel and the prophets Amos and Hosea, are of extreme value for Hebrew paleography, showing as they do the development of the cursive hand, as well as for the language, being written in the N Israelite dialect, like the Gezer Calendar.

Copyright: The Matson Photo Service

14. The Siloam Inscription, in Hebrew, found at the end of Hezekiah's tunnel, tells of the workmen's boring the tunnel from opposite ends and finally meeting.

In 1880 a lad accidentally discovered a Hebrew inscription in the ancient tunnel leading from the Gihon spring to the Pool of SILOAM at Jerusalem. It proved to contain a description of the engineering feat by which the tunnel was excavated during the reign of Hezekiah to withstand the siege of Sennacherib ca. 701 (II Kings 20:20; cf. II Chr. 32:2-4, 30). Fig. INS 14.

Twenty-one ostraca were recovered from the excavations during 1935-38 at LACHISH, to be dated ca. 589, just before the capture of the town by Nebuchadnezzar in the time of Jeremiah and Zedekiah. In addition to business documents and lists of names, there are several letters addressed to Yaosh, the military governor of Lachish.* The importance of these inscribed potsherds for a knowledge of the Hebrew of the time of Jeremiah is enormous. As in the case of the Siloam Inscription, they are composed in the S dialect of Judah. Fig. INS 15.

Copyright: By permission of the Trustees of the late Sir Henry S. Wellcome

15. Lachish Letter No. 4, written with pen and ink on pottery, is a letter from a field officer to his commanding officer; written in the late summer of 589 B.C.

Some hundreds of Hebrew inscriptions are to be found on miscellaneous objects, such as seals, weights, jar-handle stamps, ossuaries, coins, etc. Often these are of particular interest, like the recently excavated jar handle stamped with the name of Gibeon,* which confirms the tentative identification of the site. One seal bears the legend "Shema, liegeman of Jeroboam" (II), another has "Ushna, liegeman of Ahaz," and two others, bearing the names of Gedaliah and Jaazaniah, have been discovered among remains of the period just before the Exile.* Four weights, inscribed with the word פים, have clarified the meaning of this enigmatic expression in I Sam. 13:21. OSSUARIES yield a rich store of Jewish names. Figs. GIB 30; AHA 5; GED 16; JAA 1; SEA 35.

From the Phoenician colony of Carthage come two Punic inscriptions of the fourth century B.C. These are sacrificial tariffs, listing sacrifices with the payments due the priests and the apportionment of the sacrificial victims. They display a marked resemblance to the ritual and practice of the sacrificial system outlined in the Priestly Code. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS.

Until recently the earliest Hebrew MSS of the OT were of the ninth century A.D. The one possible exception was the NASH PAPYRUS from Egypt, which contains the Decalogue and Shema. This fragment, perhaps to be dated late in the second century B.C., is of importance both paleographically and as evidence that Hebrew could still be read by Jews in Egypt. The sensational discoveries of the DEAD SEA SCROLLS from 1947 on, however, have yielded MSS earlier by a millennium (see TEXT, OT).* The wealth of information they furnish with regard to the literature and beliefs of the sectarian community which produced them can scarcely be overestimated. Figs. DEA 20-21.

4. Aramaic. A stela, found near Aleppo, was erected ca. 860 to Melcarth, the god of Tyre, by "Ben-hadad [I], the son of Tabrimmon, the son of Hezion, king of Syria," thus confirming the succession as given in I Kings 15:18.* This ruler, who aided Asa, king of Judah, against Baasha of Israel, is thus shown on epigraphic grounds to be a contemporary of Elijah and Elisha (cf. II Kings 8:7-15; this Ben-hadad is usually considered to be the second king of this name). Fig. BEN 28.

According to II Kings 8:15, Hazael usurped the throne of Ben-hadad I, as Assyrian inscriptions also affirm. A brief Aramaic inscription on one of the ivories from Arslan Tash in N Syria gives the name of Hazael. An Assyrian inventory list records these ivories as part of the booty captured from Syria by Shalmaneser III. Hazael's son and successor was Ben-hadad II (usually regarded as III; cf. II Kings 13:24); this fact was confirmed by the stela of Zakir, king of Hamath and Lu'ash, erected ca. 775. Zakir relates how he defeated a coalition of kings led by Ben-hadad.

The longest Old Aramaic text yet found, to be dated ca. 750, comes from Sujin. This, together with three other eighth-century inscriptions from Zenjirli, provides contemporary material for the history of the Aramaic kingdoms. Two grave inscriptions from Nerab and an ostracon containing a letter found at Ashur, all of the seventh century, complete the corpus of Old Aramaic inscriptions.

Many documents coming from the sites of Jewish military colonies have been found in Egypt. These letters and business and legal documents are written in Imperial Aramaic, the lingua franca of the Persian Empire. They include 110 papyri from Saqqarah, Edfu, Hermopolis Magna, and especially Elephantine (see ELEPHANTINE PAPYRI),* in addition to some 350 ostraca from Elephantine and at least thirteen letters to administrative officials written on leather. Although a few are dated in the sixth and third centuries B.C., the bulk of the texts comes from the fifth century. They are important for a knowledge of the Aramaic of the period, which is somewhat earlier than that of the Aramaic sections of the OT. The light they shed on the religious practices of Jewish colonists in Egypt is also considerable, indicating as they do the existence of a temple at Elephantine subsequent to the Deuteronomic legislation in favor of a single sanctuary at Jerusalem. Recently a still earlier papyrus was found at Saqqarah, to be dated ca. 603. Written by a ruler of a Palestinian town (Ashkelon?) to Pharaoh (probably Neco II), it refers to Nebuchadnezzar's invasion. Fig. ELE 25.

Three silver vessels now in the Brooklyn Museum bear Aramaic inscriptions referring to Gashmu, king of Kedar. If these are to be connected with a Lihyanite inscription associating a man of the same name with the Persian governor of Dedan, it may well be that we are dealing with the very Gashmu or Geshem of Neh. 2:19; 6:1, 6.

Among minor inscriptions of a later period may be mentioned an ossuary of the first century A.D. with the legend: "Here were brought the bones of Uzziah, king of Judah. Do not open!"* Apart from its historical interest, the text is important as an example of the Aramaic of Jesus' time. An altar from Palmyra, bearing the word חמן, has proved that the object so designated in the OT is not a "sun image" as in the KJV, but an INCENSE ALTAR. Fig. UZZ 19.

5. Greek. The "Balustrade" Inscription, which survives in two Greek copies from Herod's temple in Jerusalem, reads: "No foreigner is to enter within the balustrade and enclosure around the temple. Whoever is caught will render himself liable to the consequent penalty of death" (cf. Acts 21:28-29).

Another inscription from Jerusalem provides the oldest evidence of a synagogue in Palestine. It commemorates the construction of a synagogue by Theodotus, a "ruler of the synagogue."* Since the description of this Theodotus suggests that he was a freedman, perhaps this was the "synagogue of the Freedmen" mentioned in Acts 6:9. Fig. SYN 94.

An inscription from Delphi proves that Gallio was proconsul of Achaia in A.D. 52. This fact is of importance for the chronology of Paul (cf. Acts 18:12).

The sands of Egypt have yielded up masses of Greek papyri. Two letters, of the year 259 B.C., come from Tubias—i.e., Tobiah—who held the same position under Ptolemy II that his ancestor the Ammonite TOBIAH (2) held under Artaxerxes I (Neh. 2:10). Most of these papyri come from the Faiyum, from such sites as Arsinoë, Tebtunis, Gurob, and especially Oxyrhynchus. They are letters; business and legal documents; literary works, including the famous OXYRHYNCHUS SAYINGS OF JESUS;* etc.; and they shed a flood of light on the daily life of the early centuries A.D. Of great significance also is the evidence they afford for the Koine, or nonliterary Greek of the day, which is the form of Greek used by the NT writers. Fig. OXY 19.

Bibliography. Translations of many of the inscriptions discussed herein, together with bibliographies, are contained in J. B. Pritchard, ed., ANET (2nd ed., 1955); D. W. Thomas, ed., Documents from OT Times (1958).

The following are supplementary: F. L. Griffith, Stories of the High Priests of Memphis (1900), pp. 142-207; cf. H. Gressmann, "Vom reichen Mann und armen Lazarus," Abhandlungen der preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin, Philosophisch-historische Klasse (1918). G. A. Cooke, Text-Book of North-Semitic Inscriptions (1903); cf. W. F. Albright, "Phoenician Inscriptions of the Tenth Century B.C. from Byblus," JAOS, LXVII (1947), 153-60; D. Diringer, Le iscrizioni anticoebraiche palestinesi (1934). C. C. Edgar, "Selected Papyri from the Archives of Zenon," Annales du Service des Antiquités, XVIII (1918), 164-66, 231-32. "A Greek Synagogue Inscription from Jerusalem," BASOR, IV (1921), 13-14. L. H. Vincent, "Découverte de la 'Synagogue des affranchis' à Jérusalem," RB, XXX (1921), 247-77. G. Lefebvre, Le tombeau de Petosiris (1923-24). W. F. Albright, "The Discovery of an Aramaic Inscription Relating to King Uzziah," BASOR, XLIV (1931), 8-10. "The Proconsulship of Gallio," in F. J. Foakes-Jackson and K. Lake, The Beginnings of Christianity, V (1933), 460-64. J. Simons, Handbook for the Study of Egyptian Topographical Lists (1937). W. F. Albright, "The Early Alphabetic Inscriptions from Sinai," BASOR, CX (1948), 6-22. H. L. Ginsberg, "An Aramaic Contemporary of the Lachish Letters," BASOR, CXI (1948), 24-27. S. Smith, The Statue of Idrimi (1949); cf. W. F. Albright, BASOR, CXVIII (1950), 14-20. W. F. Albright, "The Smaller Beth-shan Stele of Sethos I," BASOR, CXXV (1952), 24-32. W. C. Hayes, A Papyrus of the Late Middle Kingdom (1955), pp. 87-89; cf. W. F. Albright, JAOS, LXXIV (1954), 222-33. I. Rabinowitz, "Aramaic Inscriptions of the Fifth Century B.C.E.," JNES, XV (1956), 1-9; cf. F. M. Cross, Jr., BA, XVIII (1955), 46-47. R. J. Williams, "Theodicy in the Ancient Near East," Canadian Journal of Theology, II (1956), 14-26. D. J. Wiseman, Chronicles of Chaldaean Kings (1956); cf. D. N. Freedman, BA, XIX (1956), 50-60.

R. J. WILLIAMS

INSECTS. The phrase שרץ העוף (Lev. 11:20-21, 23; Deut. 14:19) is translated "winged insects" (KJV FOWLS THAT CREEP; FLYING CREEPING THING[S]; CREEPING THING THAT FLIETH; see CREEPING THINGS). On insects as a class, see FAUNA § F.

The "winged insects" of Lev. 11:20-23 include the LOCUST. It illustrates the prescientific character of the biblical age that any of these insects should be referred to as having four feet, though the edible ones are said to have leaping legs in addition to their four feet (cf. M. Hullin 3.7; Talmud Hullin 65*a*-66*a*).

W. S. McCULLOUGH

INSIGHT [בים, בינה, תבונה]. The intellectual and spiritual capacity to discern the nature of things; the power of discernment and discrimination (Ezra 8:16; Prov. 1:2; 2:3; 3:5; 4:1, 5, 7; 7:4; 8:14; 9:6, 10; Eph. 1:9; 3:4; cf. II Sam. 14:17, 20; Wisd. Sol. 7:7, 17-21). In biblical thought insight, like wisdom, is a gift from God (Eccl. 2:26; Wisd. Sol. 7:27; cf. 7:7; I Cor. 2:2-16; Jas. 1:5-8), and is a somewhat permanent mental and spiritual endowment. The desire for it is preponderantly pragmatic; it is essential for the guidance of life. Man's intellect, apart from God, will not lead him aright (Prov. 3:5).

Insight is coupled with wisdom (Prov. 1:2; 4:5, 7; 7:4; 8:14; 9:10; Eph. 1:9), understanding (Prov. 2:3), and counsel (Prov. 8:14), to all of which it is intimately related. It brings to man intellectual perception (Prov. 2:3); knowledge of the deep things of God (Job 11:7; 28; Jer. 9:23-24; Wisd. Sol. 9:13-18; I Cor. 2:10-11), of the counsel of God (Wisd. Sol. 9:13, 17), of good and evil (II Sam. 14:17; I Kings 3:9), of all things on earth (II Sam. 14:20), of things pleasing to God (Eccl. 2:26; Wisd. Sol. 9:18); and skill in arranging things so as to lead to a desired end (Prov. 8:14). Such knowledge is regarded as revelation. In Ezra 8:16, the term "men of insight" refers to intelligent leaders—i.e., teachers.

By this gift man is able to perceive the spiritual in the material, to see in human history the divine activity, in Jesus of Nazareth the Christ of God. See also WISDOM; UNDERSTANDING.

Bibliography. M. Burrows, An Outline of Biblical Theology (1946), pp. 31-33; W. Eichrodt, Theologie des Alten Testaments, II (Dritte Auflage; 1950), 38; O. Procksch, Theologie des Alten Testaments (1950), pp. 476-80; L. Koehler, OT Theology (trans. A. S. Todd; 1957), p. 146.

V. H. KOOY

INSPIRATION AND REVELATION. The verb "to inspire" is found in a number of passages in the RSV, where it does not translate any single word in Hebrew or Greek but has been supplied in order to clarify the sense of the original. In such instances it denotes the action of God in bestowing wisdom or skill on a particular individual, or the operation of the HOLY SPIRIT in guiding the minds of prophets or stimulating the members of the Christian community either to spiritual joy or to the performance of the various functions and offices by which the fellowship of the whole body is maintained and strengthened.

God may thus "put it into the heart of" (RSV "inspire") the skilful artist Bezalel to teach his craft (Exod. 35:34). The wise king, as a servant of God, whose mind is directed by the Lord, utters "inspired decisions"—i.e., oracles or wise decrees (Prov. 16:10; קסם; LXX μαντεῖον). The word "inspire" is used by the RSV in order to bring out the meaning of such passages as Matt. 22:43; Mark 12:36, where David, as a prophet, is quoted as having spoken of Christ "in the Spirit"—i.e., under the guidance of the Spirit of God; Luke 2:27, where Simeon, as a Spirit-possessed prophet, comes into the temple under impulse of the Spirit to greet the Christ; I Tim. 1:18, which speaks of the stimulus provided for Timothy's Christian career by the prophecies which marked him out for selection as a leader in the church. In I Cor. 12:11 we are told that the Spirit "operates" (ἐνεργεῖ; RSV "apportions") the various gifts needed by the members of the community for their different kinds of service; here the RSV explains that these are the result of the Spirit's inspiration. Similarly, the "joy of the Holy Spirit" which fills the Christians of Thessalonica in their reception of the gospel, despite the persecution and affliction with which its coming had been associated, is rightly described by the RSV as "inspired by the Holy Spirit" (I Thess. 1:6).

1. Inspiration and scripture
   a. General view of the OT as inspired
   b. Christian interpretation of the OT
   c. Inspiration of the prophets
   d. Inspiration proved by the Holy Spirit in the church
2. Inspiration of apostolic preaching
3. Inspiration of Christians
   a. Martyrs and other confessors
   b. In the corporate life of the church
   c. As related to ecstatic speech

Bibliography

1. Inspiration and scripture. a. General view of the OT as inspired. The Greek term for "inspired" (θεόπνευστος, "God-breathed") occurs only once in the Bible (II Tim. 3:16) and then with reference to the OT scriptures: "All scripture is inspired by God and profitable for teaching, for reproof, for correction, and for training in righteousness," or, as the passage should perhaps be rendered: "Every scripture inspired by God is also profitable . . ." (RSV mg.). The word indicates that God has in some manner breathed into these writings his own creative Spirit, just as he breathed life into man when he formed him out of the dust of the ground (Gen. 2:7). The Scriptures have been in some way infused with the life-giving power of the Spirit of God.

So much is clear from the use of this term. It is, however, not easy to determine in what sense the writer of this letter thought of the Scriptures as being inspired. "Inspiration" is a quality of persons rather than of writings as such, and there can be little doubt that what is meant is that the scriptures of the OT are the product of men who were specially inspired and empowered by the divine Spirit. The concept was a familiar one in the Greek world. Oracles, e.g., were regarded as inspired because they were delivered by persons who were supernaturally possessed by a divine power and spoke under the compulsion of a mysterious afflatus which controlled, and in a measure superseded, the exercise of their natural faculties. The writer of II Timothy is certainly thinking of the Scriptures as the writings of men who wrote under the guidance and in the power of the divine Spirit. The Scriptures—i.e., the Law, the Prophets, and such other writings as the Psalms —were written by men who were given peculiar insight into the ways and purposes of God, so that their message was to be regarded as essentially God's word to his people.

b. Christian interpretation of the OT. The setting of the Law and the Prophets as sacred books in Judaism, followed by the gradual definition of the rest of the CANON of the OT scriptures, already rested upon the belief that God had uniquely revealed himself to certain minds which he had empowered to receive his self-disclosure. The Christian church looked at the Scriptures from a different standpoint. At a very early date, it carried through a most remarkable revolution in the understanding of the OT. This is reflected in the account Luke gives of the journey to Emmaus, when the risen Lord expounded to his disciples "in all the scriptures the things concerning himself," "beginning with Moses and all the prophets" (Luke 24:27). The Bible was now read as a Christian book. It was a collection of writings whose focus and central point was Christ. The Scriptures, in fact, were a book about Christ. The Law, properly understood, pointed forward to him and spoke of him in types and figures, as the writer to the Hebrews pointed out at length; the prophets foretold Christ in fuller detail and with greater clarity; and for the purpose of this exegesis David, the ancestor of Christ according to the flesh, was himself one of the prophets, an inspired seer who spoke plainly about Christ in the Psalms. This reinterpretation of the Scriptures is known to us chiefly through the way in which the authors of the NT use the Greek Bible; but the process must date back to a time before the establishment of the Hellenist churches. The justification of the Christian gospel from the pages of the Scriptures must have been an essential task of the missionary preacher who sought to commend his message to Jews; and without a scriptural armory no apologetic addressed to Jewish audiences would have been possible. The peculiar collection of proof texts used by Matthew may indicate an early stage in the process of assembling evidence to prove that, properly understood, the Scriptures spoke of Christ. Indeed, it is likely that the reinterpretation was begun by Jesus himself, as he used passages of Deuteronomy to define his mission against misconceptions of it suggested to him by the devil (Matt. 4:1-10; Luke 4:1-12), and worked out his vocation in terms of the Son of man and the Servant of the Lord.

c. Inspiration of the prophets. This drastic change in the understanding of the OT led to a new conception of the inspiration of the ancient writers. They had been accepted as men who had been endowed with a singular understanding of the ways of God, and hence as men who spoke the word of God to his people. Now it was seen that "in many and various ways God spoke of old to our fathers by the prophets; but in these last days he has spoken to us by a Son" (Heb. 1:1-2). In Christ there was to be discerned God's final and complete word to man. This word was not discontinuous with what God had declared in former times through the mouth of the prophets and such inspired writers as David in the Psalms. On the contrary, the prophets of Israel were now seen as men who were moved by the Spirit of God to witness to Christ and his coming before the event took place. Their inspiration was now thought of as a special gift which enabled them, not simply to discern the significance of God's acts in history as a whole, but rather to foresee and proclaim the dispensation of the Incarnation. This view of the function of the OT teachers is well summed up in the opening discourse in I Peter: "The prophets who prophesied of the grace that was to be yours searched and inquired about this salvation; they inquired what person or time was indicated by the Spirit of Christ within them when predicting the sufferings of Christ and the subsequent glory. It was revealed to them that they were serving not themselves but you, in the things which have now been announced to you by those who preached the good news to you through the Holy Spirit sent from heaven, things into which angels long to look" (I Pet. 1:10-12).

The prophets of the Old Covenant are thus regarded as men who were divinely empowered to predict the sufferings of Christ and the subsequent glory. This reflects the use that was actually made of their writings by the primitive church's missionaries and teachers. Their value lay in the fact that in them the Spirit had borne witness to Christ. As the Fourth Gospel represents Jesus as saying to the Jews: "You search the scriptures, because you think that in them you have eternal life; and it is they that bear witness to me" (John 5:39), and: "If you believed Moses, you would believe me, for he wrote of me. But if you do not believe his writings, how will you believe my words?" (vss. 46-47). Moses wrote about Christ; the Scriptures bear witness to him. The Spirit instructed the prophets about the fulfilment of God's purposes in Christ. See PROPHET.

d. Inspiration proved by the Holy Spirit in the church. The Scriptures can be understood, however, in the sense which their inspired authors intended, only if the reader possesses the key to their interpretation. Without this, the reader would be in the same position as the Ethiopian who, on reading the Servant poems, could only ask whether the prophet was speaking of himself or of some other man, and needed to be enlightened by the Christian evangelist before he could discern that the prophet was foretelling Jesus (Acts 8:34-35). The key was supplied by the apostles and the other missionaries who bore testimony to Christ under the guidance and in the power of the same Spirit who had inspired the prophets to bear witness beforehand. The ministry of the prophets and of the apostles is continuous; in essentials it is the same ministry, for the same Spirit speaks in both and their testimony is the same. Its expression is different, for the former spoke before the event, indicating it in mysterious images and types, whereas the latter were sent to point to the fulfilment, and to declare the gospel openly. Looking back to the prophetic writings in the light of the witness of the apostolic church, one could see that "no prophecy of scripture is a matter of one's own interpretation, because no prophecy ever came by the impulse of man, but men moved by the Holy Spirit spoke from God" (II Pet. 1:20-21, a variant reading being: ". . . moved by the Holy Spirit holy men of God spoke" [RSV mg.]). The prophecies are to be interpreted by an objective standard; they are not capriciously given oracles, each related to particular individual circumstances, but are divinely revealed words whose meaning is declared in Christ. The Holy Spirit, who is now active in the church's proclamation of the gospel, moved the saints of old to speak as they did.

There is thus a double movement of thought, as it were, in the primitive church's understanding of the inspiration of the prophetic writers: (a) It accepts their works as a body of sacred scriptures, uniquely authoritative as embodying the word of God to his people. It has taken them over from Judaism with this value already set upon them. It therefore looks to them for evidences for the gospel, and seeks to prove the truth of the Christian understanding of the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus on the basis of OT texts. An essential part of the earliest Christian preaching is that "Christ died for our sins in accordance with the scriptures, that he was buried, that he was raised on the third day in accordance with the scriptures" (I Cor. 15:3-4). The evidence of the inspired prophets, enshrined in the written Bible, is an actual part of the gospel as Paul had received it and as he handed it on in turn to his own converts. The missionary speeches of the apostles, so far as we may judge from the narrative of Acts, when they were not directed to purely Gentile audiences, like the speeches of Paul at Lystra and Athens, were mainly concerned to show the necessary connection and harmony between the Christian message and the prophecies of the OT, the latter embracing, not only the prophetical books in the narrower sense, but also all those parts of the scripture which could be understood in a new sense as alluding in some way to Christ or to the situation of Christ's church. The inspiration of the ancient prophets, a matter on which both the missionaries and their hearers were fully agreed, could be appealed to as a guarantee of the truth of the gospel. (b) At the same time, the movement of thought runs in the other direction. The inspiration of the prophets is attested in a new way, by reason of the fact that their utterances have found a fulfilment in the events of the gospel and the age of the church.

That the Scriptures have so been fulfilled can be shown by the apostles on the basis of their personal testimony. Their witness is guaranteed by the authority of the inspired prophets and is in itself a new attestation of the fact that the Spirit of God moved those prophets so that their writings are supremely authoritative for the Christian. Hence the early Christian writers ascribe to the prophetic scriptures the value of the words of God himself. According to Mark, Jesus asserted the divine inspiration of David in the messianic Ps. 110. The citation of the first verse of this psalm is introduced with the words: "David himself, in the Holy Spirit, declared" (Mark 12:36). The RSV gives the right sense of this verse when it translates: "David himself, inspired by the Holy Spirit, declared." David was speaking as an inspired prophet possessed by the Spirit and enabled by the Spirit to declare the truth about God's purposes. It is God himself who spoke through the prophets. As Zechariah said in his hymn of praise:

> [God] has raised up a horn of salvation for us > in the house of his servant David, > as he spoke by the mouth of his holy prophets from of old > (Luke 1:69-70).

The gospel of Christ was "promised beforehand" by God "through his prophets in the holy scriptures" (Rom. 1:2). A psalm prophetical of the condition of the church can therefore be ascribed directly to the Holy Spirit: "Therefore, as the Holy Spirit says,

> 'Today, when you hear his voice, > do not harden your hearts' "
> (Heb. 3:7).

It may be that the phrase rendered by the RSV "it is said," introducing a quotation of Ps. 68, should rather be translated "he says," indicating that God himself speaks in the psalm (Eph. 4:8), but this is uncertain. God, at any rate, speaks in the Scriptures, in harmony with, and subordinately to, the final utterance of his word in Christ.

2. Inspiration of apostolic preaching. The apostles and the other Christian missionaries witness to the events the prophets foresaw. Hence the foundation of the church is "the apostles and prophets" (Eph. 2:20). The prophets are conjoined with the apostles because through them both the same Spirit testifies to Christ. Both are inspired. The apostles, as the representatives and envoys of Christ, are inspired by the Spirit to testify to him. They are to be received as Christ himself, for they bear Christ to their hearers (cf. Matt. 10:40). Their witness is the witness of the Spirit himself: "When the Counselor comes, whom I shall send to you from the Father, even the Spirit of truth, who proceeds from the Father, he will bear witness to me; and you also are witnesses, because you have been with me from the beginning" (John 15:26). The Spirit attests the gospel and commends it to those who listen to the apostolic preaching. At Thessalonica, Paul presented the gospel "in power and in the Holy Spirit" (I Thess. 1:5)—a phrase which probably indicates both the inspiration of the preacher and the witness of the Spirit in the hearts of his audience. So, too, Paul declares: "Christ has wrought through me to win obedience from the Gentiles, by word and deed, by the power of signs and wonders, by the power of the Holy Spirit" (Rom. 15:18-19). His message did not rest upon any wisdom or persuasive eloquence of his own, but it was presented "in demonstration of the Spirit and power" (I Cor. 2:4). The apostle was inspired by the Spirit to proclaim the gospel in word and deed. He was inspired by the Spirit to grasp the meaning of God's promises (I Cor. 2:10). It is as one inspired by the Spirit that Paul approaches and grapples with the problem of Israel's disobedience (Rom. 9:1). The Pauline letters bear out in detail what is said in the gospels and Acts concerning the inspiration of the apostolic missionaries (see HOLY SPIRIT), and their inspiration is continuous with that of the inspired writers of the Scriptures. Whether or not Paul conceived himself in his letters to be writing "Scriptures," he certainly believed that the inspiration which enabled him to grasp and to proclaim the Christian gospel was the operation of the same Spirit who had spoken in the prophets of the OT. See PREACHING; APOSTLE; MINISTRY.

3. Inspiration of Christians. a. Martyrs and other confessors. The Spirit that inspired the prophets to foretell the coming of Christ and to proclaim the gospel in advance, often in words which inevitably remained obscure until their fulfilment, testified to Christ in a special way in the mouth of his disciples when they publicly acknowledged him. A definite promise that those who confessed Christ under the stress of persecution would receive an immediate inspiration of the Spirit was contained in the gospels, and was the NT basis of the later belief that the martyr or the confessor was pre-eminently a "spiritual" man, one possessed by the Spirit in a unique degree, whose words were therefore such as to carry supreme authority. The warning given by Jesus to his disciples that they must expect to suffer persecution is followed by the promise: "When they bring you to trial and deliver you up, do not be anxious beforehand what you are to say; but say whatever is given you in that hour, for it is not you who speak, but the Holy Spirit" (Mark 13:11). Matthew, rewriting this section of Mark, puts this promise into the context of the instructions given by Jesus to the Twelve and makes the nature of the promised inspiration clearer: "It is not you who speak, but the Spirit of your Father speaking through you" (Matt. 10:20). Luke sets in contrast with the confessor's possession of this special inspiration of the Spirit the unforgivable blasphemy against the Spirit committed by the person who rejects the divine assistance, refuses the Spirit's inspiration, and apostatizes, denying Christ (Luke 12:8-12). The promise of the PARACLETE, related by the Fourth Evangelist, also places the witness which the Spirit will bear to Christ, along with, and througn, his disciples, in the context of a warning that the disciples of Jesus will be hated and persecuted as he himself was (John 15:18-27). Running through the entire gospel tradition, therefore, there is the thought that the highest degree of inspiration is given to the Christian who confesses Christ when he is on trial for his faith. Inspiration is in itself the witness of the Spirit of God to Christ; and the Spirit is most truly and perfectly active in the testimony of the martyr.

The great example of the fulfilment of this promise of inspiration is to be seen in the story of STEPHEN. It is in the Spirit that he contends against the enemies of Christ (Acts 6:10). When he is arrested, on charges which are essentially those upon which Jesus himself had been condemned in the high priest's court (vss. 11-13), he is transfigured in countenance as he prepares to make his defense. His speech is not a defense in the proper sense; he does not defend himself against the charges which have been preferred against him. It is, rather, a proclamation of the gospel in terms of scriptural fulfilment. For the Christian confessor a trial was the great opportunity for the preaching of the gospel; and in Luke's picture of Stephen's apologia we see the inspired Christian confessor bearing witness to Christ and using for this purpose the inspired utterances of the ancient scriptures and the understanding which the inspired prophets had of the long story of God's dealings with his covenant people. When his hearers break in on his speech and are about to kill him, he is filled with the Holy Spirit (7:55), and enabled in an ecstasy to "see the heavens opened and the Son of man standing at the right hand of God" (vs. 56). The manner of his death, as Luke records it, is strongly reminiscent of the death of Jesus. The martyr is one who shares in a supreme sense in the death of Jesus, being indwelt by the same Spirit which belonged to Jesus.

The confessor who suffers for his faith is thus a uniquely inspired man. It is this conviction which underlies the early origin of the Christian belief in the special sanctity of the martyrs and prompted the development of a cult of the saints. Nevertheless, it is not only confession of Christ under persecution which is the work of the Spirit. All acknowledgment of the lordship of Christ is his work, and it is because of the inspiration of the Spirit that any man can make his profession of faith. "I want you to understand," says Paul to the Corinthians, "that no one speaking by the Spirit of God ever says 'Jesus be cursed!' and no one can say 'Jesus is Lord' except by the Holy Spirit" (I Cor. 12:3). This passage raises difficulties of interpretation, but it is likely that Paul is referring to a profession of faith in Christ made by the new convert at his baptism. We may compare: "If you confess with your lips that Jesus is Lord and believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead, you will be saved" (Rom. 10:9). No one, then, can make his initial confession of faith in Christ as Lord (cf. the early form of baptismal creed in the "Western" text of Acts 8:37, RSV mg.), without the inspiration of the Spirit. We may say that all inspiration of the Spirit, according to the NT, is related to the testimony of men to Christ: to the testimony of the martyr, to that of the apostolic missionary, and to that of every believer as he comes to conversion. The fact that the Spirit inspires the convert to profess his creed of belief in Christ when he comes to his baptism, and yet that the bestowal on him of the living presence of the Spirit is something which the evidence of the NT makes us assign to the convert's baptismal and postbaptismal experience, is paradoxical. Christians are those who have received the Spirit as a result of their conversion; the Spirit's coming to them is a result and consequence of their baptism and its profession of faith; yet it is because of the inspiration of the Spirit, as a prevenient act, that the Christian is enabled to confess Christ in the first place. Here is an aspect of the constant paradox of grace.

b. In the corporate life of the church. Since the Spirit's inspiration is experienced by all who acknowledge Christ, the whole community of the church can be said to be inspired. They are a people who are "taught of God." The Christians at Thessalonica "have been taught by God"—i.e., through the inspiration of the Spirit—"to love one another" (I Thess. 4:9). Speaking of the Christian's possession of the Spirit, the "anointing" by which they are truly the people of the Messiah, John says: "The anointing which you received from him abides in you, and you have no need that any one should teach you; as his anointing teaches you about everything, and is true, and is no lie, just as it has taught you, abide in him" (I John 2:27). The Christian community is a body of those who are inspired by the Spirit. Such inspiration is no longer the privilege of a few individual prophets, selected to receive a special revelation of the purposes of God; it is granted to the whole society insofar as it is possessed by the Spirit, who mediates to it the presence of the glorified Christ. They are "taught by God," in the sense that the Spirit is given to them to bring the words of Jesus to their remembrance, to illuminate their meaning, and so to guide them into all the truth (cf. John 14:26; 16:12-14). In this inspired community the prophecy is fulfilled: "And they shall all be taught by God" (Isa. 54:13, cited at John 6:45). See CHURCH, IDEA OF.

There is thus a continuous operation of the Spirit in the prophets and other inspired individuals in the Old Covenant, and hence in their words as written down and set apart as "scripture," in the testimony to Christ of the apostles, the confessors, and the ordinary Christian believers, and in the church collectively.

c. As related to ecstatic speech. It remains true that the NT speaks of certain classes of persons who are endowed with a peculiar degree of inspiration, or rather, who experience the operation of the Spirit in a remarkable and unusual mode. The most important of these are the ecstatics, endowed with the gift of tongues (see TONGUES, GIFT OF), and the prophets within the Christian church (see PROPHET IN THE NT). Paul is concerned (I Cor. 12–14) to insist that the obvious and spectacular inspiration which enables some to speak with tongues and others to interpret what has thus been said in a state of ecstatic possession is only one among the many manifestations of the activity of the Spirit within the Spirit-possessed community of the church. Speaking with tongues is listed by Paul relatively low in his enumeration of the operations of the Spirit among the members of the Christian society (I Cor. 12:10, 28-29), and he is evidently anxious to dispel the idea, so prevalent in the congregation at Corinth, that a person who has been inspired to "speak in a tongue" has received a special divine favor which marks him out as a more advanced and "spiritual" Christian than his fellows. He is also insistent that the gift of prophecy ought to be more highly valued than that of tongues. The latter is a peculiarly individual gift, useless for the edification of the congregation as a whole: "For one who speaks in a tongue speaks not to men but to God; for no one understands him, but he utters mysteries in the Spirit" (I Cor. 14:2). Prophecy, however, is intelligible. It conduces to the instruction and edification of the whole body. Even an unbeliever or outsider, should he enter the congregation when all are prophesying, will be impressed with the sense that God is present in the assembly; whereas if they were speaking with tongues, such an intruder could only conclude that he had come into a crowd of madmen (I Cor. 14:23-25).

Prophecy is to be preferred because the prophet can be understood by his hearers without the need for an interpreter with a peculiar inspiration of the Spirit to enable him to grasp the meaning of what has been said: "He who prophesies is greater than he who speaks in tongues, unless some one interprets, so that the church may be edified" (I Cor. 14:5). Paul will not allow that speaking with tongues is beneficial to the community, unless the ecstatic utterances can be translated into intelligible speech, or unless the inspired person can somehow preserve at the same time his normal exercise of his own reason. This is especially true in the case of liturgical prayer and praise in the congregation. "I will pray with the Spirit [RSV 'spirit'] and I will pray with the mind also; I will sing with the Spirit [RSV 'spirit'] and I will sing with the mind also. Otherwise, if you bless with the Spirit [RSV 'spirit'], how can any one in the position of an outsider say the 'Amen' to your thanksgiving when he does not know what you are saying? For you may give thanks well enough, but the other man is not edified" (I Cor. 14:15-17). The reference here is probably to the Eucharistic liturgy. The celebrant might make his prayer "in the Spirit," in a state of ecstatic possession; but his unintelligible utterances will not benefit the congregation. The prophet, on the other hand, is rational. He is inspired; he speaks in the Spirit; but his inspiration does not suspend his ordinary rational faculties. "The spirits of prophets are subject to prophets"; the speaker does not lose control of himself (I Cor. 14:32).

In the controversy with the Montanists, orthodox apologists were accustomed to maintain that genuine prophecy did not involve the suspension of the prophet's rational consciousness. Irrational inspiration was a mark of the false prophet. We know too little of the nature of the prophetic gift in the primitive church to be able to test this claim, apart from the words of Paul quoted above. Such men as Agabus behave in the manner of the prophets of the OT, declaring the will of God in a particular situation. It seems probable, however, that the chief task of the Christian prophet was to unlock the meaning of the Scriptures in the light of the inspiration of the Spirit of Christ. Prophets are associated with teachers by Paul (I Cor. 12:28), as well as with apostles and evangelists (cf. Eph. 4:11). On the whole it seems improbable that their inspiration took the form of speaking in ecstatic trances; they are, rather, missionary preachers.

The OT prophet was essentially a man inspired to interpret God's dealings with man. He was conscious of being entrusted with a word of God, so that his speech could be prefaced with "Thus saith the Lord"; but to what extent the great "canonical" prophets, as well as the members of prophetic guilds at an earlier stage, were ecstatics is hard to determine (see PROPHET). Certainly, the outward signs of Spirit-possession were no sure guarantee that the prophet was genuinely speaking under the compulsion of the Spirit of God (cf. Deut. 13:1-5; I Kings 22:19-28; Jer. 20:7-18). Whether the prophet was really inspired to receive and declare the meaning of God's acts in history (cf. Jer. 7:25; 25:4; Hos. 6:5; Amos 3:7) could be determined only by the content of his message and not by external phenomena. So far as the OT is concerned, the test of prophetic inspiration lay in the effects and results of the prophet's message; from the standpoint of the NT writers it lay primarily in the relation of his message to Christ. See SPIRITUAL GIFTS.

Bibliography. W. Sanday, Inspiration (1893); H. W. Robinson, Inspiration and Revelation in the OT (1944); F. W. Camfield, Revelation and the Holy Spirit (1945); E. Brunner, Revelation and Reason (1946); A. Farrer, The Glass of Vision (1948); J. K. S. Reid, The Authority of Scripture (1957).

G. W. H. LAMPE

INSTINCT. A word which occurs in the phrases "creatures of instinct" (II Pet. 2:12) and "by instinct" (Jude 10). The Greek, ἄλογος, means simply "without reason." The same word is found in Acts 25:27 with the sense of "contrary to reason" (RSV "unreasonable").

Jude speaks of blasphemers who know "by instinct," or "by nature." II Peter speaks of false prophets who are merely "creatures of instinct." Perhaps this means that they are "creatures of nature"—i.e., with no intellectual or spiritual life.

B. H. THROCKMORTON, JR.

INSTRUCTION. See TEACHING.

INSTRUMENTS. See ALTAR; MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS; THRESHING; WEAPONS AND IMPLEMENTS OF WAR.

INTEGRITY [תם, תמה, תמים]. The state or quality of being complete, well adjusted. The term is extracted from practical evaluation, not legal phraseology. It implies sincerity of heart and motive, singleness of purpose, genuineness, truthfulness, uprightness (cf. Gen. 20:5-6; I Kings 9:4; Pss. 7:8; 25:21; 26:1, 11; 41:12; 101:2; Prov. 2:7; 10:9; 19:1; 20:7; 28:6). In biblical thought moral character is not judged by any absolute or ideal (as in Greek philosophy), but by relationship to God. God sets the standard by which man is judged. That man alone is perfect who is so in the judgment of God. Integrity thus marks the man who walks with singlehearted devotion to God and honorable behavior to men (Prov. 25:21). Noah (Gen. 6:9), Abraham (Gen. 17:1), Jacob (Gen. 25:27), David (I Kings 9:4), and Job (Job 1:1, 8; 2:3) are described as possessing this quality.

Integrity brings its own reward: preservation from enemies (Pss. 25:21; 41:12), redemption from destruction (26:11; 41:12), guidance for living (Prov. 11:3). He who has it has the Lord as his shield (2:7), walks securely (10:9), remains in the land (2:21). Blessed are his sons (20:7).

Assertions of integrity and innocence do not indicate a spirit of self-righteousness and self-satisfaction (as in Luke 18:11-12). The great religious souls who profess integrity—David, Job, the psalmist, Paul—are also most keenly aware of personal sin (II Sam. 12:13; 24:17; Job 13:26; 14:16-17; Pss. 51:5; 69:5; I Cor. 15:9; I Tim. 1:15). The whole drama of redemption is centered on the possibility of the sinner walking in uprightness before God.

While the term "integrity" scarcely occurs in the NT (only Tit. 2:7), the concept is current enough. The Baptist demands integrity in daily life from the penitents (Luke 3:8-14); Jesus enjoins purity of heart (Matt. 5:8), singleness of eye (Matt. 6:22; cf. Luke 11:34-36), purity of motive (Matt. 6:1-6, 16-18); and there are numerous injunctions to truthfulness, sincerity, and genuineness as fundamental to Christian character and conduct.

See also RIGHTEOUSNESS.

Bibliography. A. F. Kirkpatrick, The Book of Psalms, I Cambridge Bible (1914), pp. lxxxvii, lxxxviii; J. Pedersen, Israel, I-II (1926), 363-76; L. Koehler, OT Theology (trans. A. S. Todd; 1957), pp. 166-68.

V. H. KOOY

INTERCESSION. See PRAYER; MEDIATOR.

INTERDICT [אסר, אסרא]. A legal term signifying a prohibitory decree, a prohibition (Dan. 6:7-9, 12-13, 15). The biblical references are to a written decree of Darius banning a petition (prayer) to any god, or man, for thirty days, except the king. The presupposition is that the king alone is to be treated as god, or the only authentic representative of the deity. The prohibition was to be binding on all subjects, and irrevocable according to the laws of the Medes and the Persians (Dan. 6:8, 12; cf. Esth. 1:19; 8:8). Such an ordinance, while not impossible, is utterly out of keeping with what we know of the religious policy of Persian kings, but may well reflect the religious situation of the Hellenistic era.

V. H. KOOY

INTEREST [נשך; τόκος]; KJV USURY. The sum paid by a borrower for the use of the borrowed capital.

Other Hebrew words for "interest" are תרבית and מרבית, rendered in the RSV by "increase." Instead of "interest" and "increase," the KJV has invariably "usury," which in the mind of the translators of the time had not the derogative connotation it has taken in our days. They were perfectly aware, however, of the prohibitions and restrictions expressed in the Law, of the excessive rates charged by unscrupulous lenders at all times, and of the fact that some medieval theologians had condemned the practice of lending money for interest.

For a detailed discussion of the various types of interest mentioned in the Bible, see DEBT.

G. A. BARROIS

INTERMEDIARY [μεσίτης] (Gal. 3:19-20); KJV MEDIATOR. See MEDIATOR.

INTERPRETATION, HISTORY AND PRINCIPLES OF. Interpretation represents either of two technical words, "exegesis" or "hermeneutics," which were originally synonyms but now are arbitrarily distinguished: exegesis, the detailed specific explication of a text; hermeneutics, the theory underlying such explication. Interpretation will here be treated primarily in the sense of hermeneutics.

1. The necessity of interpretation
2. How many meanings?
   a. The Alexandrian answer
   b. The Antiochene protest
   c. The triumph of allegory
   d. Jewish influences
   e. Nicholas of Lyra
   f. Martin Luther
3. The authority of tradition
Bibliography

1. The necessity of interpretation. Any not simply naïve product of the human mind, even if contemporary and in one's own idiom, invites, perhaps demands, interpretation; the invitation turns the more insistently into demand the farther the product may be from one's own time or idiom, or both. Such a product may be a painting or sculpture, a symphony or drama, a law code or a document of religion. The Bible contains thoughts now between two and three millenniums old, formulated within an environment alien to our own, and written in two Semitic languages (Hebrew and Aramaic) and an Indo-European language (Hellenistic Greek) remote from our own—three clamorous demands for interpretation. But it is a fourth fact about the Bible which, for the Christian, makes interpretation of it the most poignant demand for interpretation in our entire culture: its claim to authority, a claim rather modestly made within the Bible, but categorically made for it by the group (the church) within which it has its life.

There is, of course, already interpretation within the Bible, not merely of dreams (Gen. 40; Daniel; cf. Acts 10–11) or riddles (Judg. 14; Dan. 5) or figurative speech (John 2:21; 21:19; and often) which may occur in the text, nor merely of the OT within the NT (Matthew; Hebrews; et passim), but also of older OT passages in younger ones (Jer. 31:29-30 in Ezek. 18; the books of Samuel and Kings in the books of Chronicles) and of the older NT in its youngest portions (Matt. 10:10 in I Tim. 5:18). Furthermore, there is a subtle web of interpretation lying between the two testaments: the fact that the NT writers always quote the OT, not in Hebrew, but in Greek. But every translation is inevitably to some degree (and often to a high degree) an interpretation—in fact, one of the common meanings of interpretatio, since Cicero's time at the latest, is "translation." For every translator "carries over" into the new language only what he understands the original language to be saying; in other words, between the translator's reading of the original and his transmutation of it there lies a fundamental act of interpretation: it is only what he thinks the original means that he can translate.

Two basic questions have agitated the history of biblical interpretation: (a) How many meanings may a given passage have? and (b) To what extent must or may interpretation be governed by a tradition of interpretation recognized as authoritative?

2. How many meanings? The now obvious answer that a passage of scripture, as of any other literature, has just one meaning unless there is exceptional indication of double meaning, far from being obvious, had to be won through the travail of many centuries. The underlying cause of this struggle was a misunderstanding of the divine authority of the Bible, complicated by various theories of verbal inspiration. With only occasional exceptions, until the Reformation the church and its scholars took for granted multiple meaning in scripture.

a. The Alexandrian answer. It was fateful for a thousand years of interpretation that the first great Christian exegete, Origen (ca. 185-254), lived and worked in the city of the learned Jewish interpreter Philo of Alexandria (ca. 25 B.C.–A.D. 40). Though two centuries and a new religion separated Origen the Christian from Philo the Jew, Origen worked in a literary milieu deeply conditioned by the chameleonlike art of allegory, which had arisen in Greek rationalistic interpretation of mythology and had been cultivated by Hellenistic Jewish forerunners of Philo (Letter of Aristeas; Aristobulus) but found its great virtuoso in that philosopher himself. Like Philo, Origen was not systematically interested in finding a true plurality (three or more) of meanings in a given passage, but only in finding the "deeper meaning," which he was more than willing to find everywhere, even when he accepted and valued the literal meaning, but in which he was particularly interested when he found the obvious sense untrue, unworthy, or impossible. Writers on Origen often leave the impression that he regularly set forth three meanings of a passage: its "flesh," its "soul," and its "spirit," in accordance with On First Principles IV.1, where such interpretation is recommended in order that three kinds of men may be edified: the simple man by the "flesh" of a text (the obvious sense), he who has ascended a certain way by its "soul," and the perfect man (I Cor. 2:6-7 is cited in full) by the "spiritual law which 'has but a shadow of the good things to come' " (Heb. 10:1). (Note that this definition of the "spirit" of a passage fully equates it with the later patristic anagoge.) But this is theory, not practice. So is Homily V.1 on Leviticus, where the same scheme is mentioned but only the sense called "anima," which one "takes by surprise" within the literal text, is pursued. (Here there is also the interesting statement that God made the corpus for those who were before us, the anima for us, and the spiritus for future believers.) In his exegetical works he only rarely pursues a third meaning, and where he does (e.g., Homily II.6 on Genesis), the third meaning is likely to be moral (i.e., tropological) rather than anagogic. Nevertheless, both his formulated theory and his practice were fertilely influential after him, in spite of the church's official anathema upon him three centuries after his death.

What the church condemned was his theological results, not the exegetical method by which he had reached them. The church had too well learned from him to use his own method for it to be able to condemn Origen the exegete along with Origen the theologian.

Origen's hermeneutic legacy was (a) the unrestricted assumption of at least a second meaning lying universally beneath the letter and to be found by allegory; (b) a great fund of clever allegory to countless texts of both testaments; (c) a theory of the threefold meaning of scripture.

b. The Antiochene protest. Within the ancient church there arose only one noteworthy protest against allegorical exegesis—that of the School of Antioch. Its great names were: Diodorus of Tarsus (died 394), Theodore of Mopsuestia (died 428), and Theodoret of Cyrrhus (died 460), plus their great popularizer, Chrysostom the homilist (ca. 347-407). The School of Antioch was not without later influence in Asia Minor and the West (see below), but its main stream "went underground" from the Greek-speaking world eastward into the Syriac-speaking interior of Syria, first 150 miles to Edessa, then another 150 miles to Nisibis, and remained effective for centuries in the Nestorian church, whose founder (Nestorius; died ca. 451) had been probably a personal and certainly a loyal pupil of Theodore himself. Unfortunately the writings of the real founder of the school (Diodorus) exist only in vestiges, barely enough to suggest the powerful impetus he gave to his great pupil Theodore, who is the only one of this school who is reasonably tangible to us, because more of his work is preserved. His hermeneutically most suggestive work—five books Adversus Allegoricos—has perished, either by neglect or, more likely, by the official censorship of the allegorizing majority. It doubtless contained sharp words like his remark on Zech. 1:9-10: "It is full of utter inanity [ἀνοίας], or, to come nearer the truth, of insanity [φρενοβλαβείας], to assert that whenever there is mention of both an 'angel' and 'the Lord' the OT is thereby [i.e., with 'angel'] speaking of the Son of God." Theodore himself bears out in the prefaces to his commentaries on the minor prophets what Photius long after says of his exegesis: "He did his utmost to avoid allegories; he made his interpretation according to the historia [i.e., according to the literal account]."

Theodore insists that "the narratives of events of olden time are not fictitious" (Preface to Joel) but were written down "for the great advantage of those then living" (Preface to Jonah); and in his reaction against the allegorists he is often amazingly reluctant to find direct predictions of Christ, doubtless because they had found reference to Jesus and Christian institutions in almost every line of the OT. He declares the following to be nonmessianic: Hos. 11:1; Mic. 4:1-3; 5:1-2; Hag. 2:10; Zech. 11:12-15; 12:10; Mal. 1:11; 4:5-6. For introducing the sole occurrence in the NT of any form of the Greek root on which the word "allegory" is formed, Theodore criticizes Paul (on Gal. 4:24): "He [Paul] calls comparison of events [accomplished] by juxtaposing past and present events—'allegory.' " But this is not allegory in Theodore's sense. Paul was speaking inexactly, nontechnically, and the allegorists, he says, abuse Paul's inexact use of the word when they take it technically as authority for resolving scripture into a series of allegories.

A modern exegete almost feels that he hears a colleague speaking when he finds such insights in Theodore. Protestant writers often wax lyric and hyperbolic when they speculate on "what might have been" if Theodore's hermeneutics had not sunk with the anathema on Nestorius, even hinting that Reformation exegesis might have emerged a thousand years earlier than it did. Certainly the course of exegesis would have been incomparably more sober and would have been spared many a blind alley, but these enthusiasts fail to see that the double meaning which Theodore so valiantly excluded with one hand, as allegory, he and the whole School of Antioch admitted with the other hand—as typology. Admittedly there is a difference in degree, but the underlying assumption of dual (if not plural) meaning is the same. Thus, in his typological sense, Theodore finds the following passages indirectly messianic (i.e., alluding to Jesus of Nazareth): Pss. 15—H 16; 54—H 55; 88—H 89; Joel 2:28-29; Amos 9:11; Zech. 9:9; Mal. 3:1. Even the justly famous School of Antioch leaves us with two meanings of scripture, the historia and the typus.

Two weak bridges bring some slight influence of Antiochene hermeneutics into the West: Jerome and Junilius Africanus. In the 370's Jerome had studied at Antioch, hearing among others Apollinaris of Laodicea (Jerome's Letter 84 to Pemmachius, § 4), a contemporary of Diodorus (who, himself, had probably already left Antioch for Tarsus). Judging from the fragments of his work preserved in the catenae, Apollinaris' exegesis shared the Antiochene characteristics of sobriety, insight, and avoidance of allegory. Where the many-sided and often self-contradictory Jerome sets himself to unfold the literal or historical sense, as he does countless times, it is not unreasonably assumed that the seed of his Antiochene teacher is bearing fruit; but this is only one facet of Jerome.

The other bridge, much later, was Junilius, a high palace official of African origin, at Constantinople ca. 550. He wrote in his native Latin Instituta regularia divinae legis, owing its content, he confesses (dedicatory letter), to Paulus Persa (probably Paul of Basra), who was intimately connected with the Nestorian academy at Nisibis, where the methods and insights of Theodore of Mopsuestia were still thriving.

c. The triumph of allegory. By and large the exegesis of the great church, both Latin and Greek, flowed on as if the School of Antioch had never been. Origen had established the method which triumphed. As we have seen, Origen had called the three meanings of scripture its body, its soul, and its spirit. But his terminology was still in flux: for the derived meaning(s) he also used the learned terms "anagoge," "allegory," and "tropology," but for him the first two were synonyms and the third differs very little. He also used theoria in the sense of "allegory." (The Antiochenes used theoria as the antithesis to "allegory," and the equivalent of their own "typology"—but one may say that "typology" was only their special brand of "allegory" in the widest sense of the latter word.) Pupils of Origen distinguished between allegory and anagoge: they are one in origin but separate in teleology. The goal of allegory is Christology and ecclesiology; that of anagoge, the eschatology of the individual. Tropology is also allegorical in character, allegory applied to ethical living (τρόπος means both "figure of speech" and "moral character").

Within two hundred years of Origen's death John Cassianus formulated for his monks in Marseilles (ca. 425) a fourfold theory of hermeneutics which uses exactly the terminology that crops out again and again through the next thousand years. The two basic kinds of interpretation are: (a) historical and (b) spiritual; but the latter has three subspecies: (a) tropology, (b) allegory, and (c) anagoge. (Cassian's great contemporary and theological opponent, Augustine, has his own hermeneutic tetrad: history, aetiology, analogy, and allegory, of which the middle two are of non-Origenic provenance.) What Origen himself might have indicated as either of two synonymous series of three—history, allegory, tropology, or: history, anagoge, tropology (the two respective middle terms being interchangeable)—has here been conflated into a single series of four members by simple addition.

Jerome, just before Cassianus, seems never to have brought into one sentence a formal fourfold theory of hermeneutics; like many another exegete after him, he professes to follow a threefold scheme: by combining two of Origen's key passages, I Thess. 5:23 and Prov. 22:20 (which he rendered Ecce, descripsi tibi eam tripliciter), he concludes: "The description in our hearts is threefold; so is the rule [for the interpretation] of the Scriptures," and says that we must understand them according to "history," "tropology," and intelligentia spiritualis (Epistle to Hedibiam CXX. 12). The third term is vague but probably equals allegory. The missing term is "anagoge." But Jerome is quite familiar with it—e.g., in his Isaiah Commentary: in the Preface to book V he says that the next book will be "tropological" in method, but in the Preface to book VI he says that both books VI and VII will deal with "anagoge." For him, as for Origen, the words are virtually synonymous. Many times in the body of the Isaiah Commentary he uses the word "anagoge" (cf. also Epistle CXX.8) so that centuries of exegetes whom his great prestige drew into his following could, not unreasonably, believe they were following him in a fourfold method because he had himself tacitly added one to his theoretical three.

So for a thousand years the exegete could choose either a twofold sense (the literal or historical and the mystical or spiritual sense) or a threefold (several different groups of terms) or a fourfold—and still remain within the hermeneutic tradition of Alexandria. Sometime in the scholastic period a mnemonic couplet was devised which became very popular:

> Littera gesta docet, quid credas allegoria, > moralis quid agas, quo tendas anagogia.

"The letter teaches the events, allegory what you are to believe, the moral sense what you are to do, anagoge whither you are to strive."

It is a curious fact that medieval Jewish exegesis also knew and used a fourfold theory of interpretation. It also had its mnemonic device, the single word "PaRaDiSe," whose four Hebrew consonants yielded the initials of four key words: peshat ("spread out," the obvious literal meaning), remez ("hint," typological or allegorical meaning), derash ("search," a meaning derived by research according to the middoth [rules]), and sod ("secret," mystical meaning). If the fourth term can be understood as at least including the secrets of life hereafter (i.e., anagoge), then three of the rabbinic terms are equatable with three of the patristic four, and only the equation "tropology = derash" remains doubtful. (Since tropology always refers to conduct, one would expect "halachah" as its equivalent; can derash here mean "halachah" arrived at by midrashic methods? Surely the Beth hammidrash was a place primarily for the study of halachah, not of haggadah, and many of the early midrashim were halachic.) But even a 75-per-cent correlation requires some explanation. Do the two quadriform series resemble each other by chance or by dependence, and if the latter, in which direction?

Since the church has been so often and so deeply indebted to the synagogue, it might be so here, too. But the only really old evidence for this scheme must be sought in the Mishnaic story (Chagiga 14*b*) of the four scholars who got into "paradise" and all came to grief except Rabbi Akiba, and can be found there only by allegorizing the story itself: PRDS the fourfold scheme of interpretation, each of the scholars representing one kind! But the story really means by "paradise" the enticing garden of speculation on the two theosophic subjects—the "works of creation" (Gen. 1) and the "works of the chariot" (Ezek. 1) mentioned in the story—a paradise to avoid if one is not Akiba. The actual mnemonic word "paradise," with its specific four pendants, seems first to occur in the Zohar (thirteenth century; Spain). The twelfth century seems to have been a time of relatively peaceful discussion between learned Jews and Christians, particularly in France; then, if not before, the Christian schematization appears to have brought about the similar system in certain Jewish circles—viz., the cabalists and their public. Not that the rabbis needed to learn anything from the outside about any one of these four methods of interpretation! They had long used all of them, and many more, for finding remotely derived "meanings."

d. Jewish influences. But the direction of dependence was certainly the reverse in a much more important matter: Jewish scholars brought the church the first dawning since the School of Antioch of central, though not sole, interest in the literal meaning of scripture. Through the latter half of the eleventh century there taught and wrote at Troyes in Champagne the great reformer of Jewish exegesis of the Bible (and the Talmud): Rabbi Solomon ben Isaac, better known by his acrostic nickname, Rashi. Though some of his pupils carried through the master's ideas more radically and consistently than he had, Rashi nevertheless gave the real impetus. In regard to choice between the literal sense and the midrashic nonliteral meaning(s), his commentary on the Pentateuch is not so much a clear break with the past as it is a strong shift in emphasis: his intention is to find the literal meaning. He is too loyal a traditionalist to ignore the welter of inventive exegeses of the past, but he also sifts them, passing on only those which seem to him somewhat compatible with the literal meaning. Thus on Gen. 3:8 he says: "There are many haggadic midrashim on this passage . . . but I have no intention other than to indicate the simple sense of the Bible, and, besides that, to incorporate such statements of the haggadah as expound the words of the Bible appropriately." Or on Gen. 49:22: "There are still many more haggadic midrashim on this, but this is the one which best expounds the actual wording of the text." So he comes to the conclusion: "Therefore I say let Scripture be expounded according to its simple meaning, each word in its proper context—and let the midrash-interpretation be only a hint" (on Exod. 6:2-9).

Among Rashi's distinguished pupils were Joseph Kara, Rashi's own two grandsons Samuel ben Meir (Rashbam) and Jacob Tam, and a pupil of the latter, Joseph Bekhor Shor. For us the most important is Rashbam, whose commentary on the Pentateuch has been called the "most illustrious product" of the school of Rashi. In it at Gen. 37:2 he says: "But our teacher Solomon, my mother's father, . . . already set his mind to explaining the simple meaning of Scripture. I myself . . . argued with and before him and he admitted to me that if he had time he would feel himself obliged to compose new commentaries according to the literal explanations which are turning up every day anew." This the grandson was more or less doing for him in writing the commentary where these words stand.

How did knowledge of the Rashi school of commentaries, written in Hebrew, cross the barrier of language and religion into Christian scholarship? Until recently it has been conventional to assert that Nicholas of Lyra was the mediator; undoubtedly he was one factor, but there was another very important, earlier one: the school of St. Victor in the persons of three teachers, Hugh, Richard, and Andrew, all called "of St. Victor." St. Victor was a chapter of canons regular (not monks) of the rule of St. Augustine founded at Paris in 1110 (the decade in which Rashi had died at Troyes, ca. eighty miles away). Its canons conducted a theological school, of which Hugh was an early master. His interest in the present connection is twofold: while he was far from abandoning mystical meanings he had a clear grasp and insistence upon the literal meaning as basic; and his Notulae on the Octateuch (MPL, CLXXV, 29-114) frequently offer exegetic insights of "Hebrews" or of "a Hebrew" which are not to be found in his revered Jerome, but which are found either in the works of Rashi or in those of Hugh's contemporaries Joseph Kara and Rashbam. Hugh never gives the names of his Jewish authorities; but since it was a convention of the time not to name one's contemporary Christian authorities, Hugh had all the more reason to suppress the names of his contemporary "infidel" authorities.

Hugh's ideas and methods lived on in two pupils who succeeded him, Richard (a Scot) and Andrew (probably an Englishman). Richard, best known for inheriting his master's mysticism, is noteworthy here only for his own statement (De Concordia Temporum; MPL, CLXXV) that he had consulted "writings of the Jews" (not scripture: scripta, not scriptura) per Judaeos—"with the help of Jews" (apparently an admission that he could not read medieval Hebrew but sought personal help from those who could).

Andrew of St. Victor is the heir and perfecter of the hermeneutics of their master Hugh, going so far in devotion to the literal meaning that he interpreted Isa. 7:14 literally (and Jewishly, as he admits), thereby evoking a shocked refutation by Richard in two books De Emanuele. Andrew's method is to give first the (traditional) Christian explanation, then the Jewish. But since he assumes the first to be more or less known, the latter unknown, he often gives more space to the Jewish view, which he may refute or leave unanswered, or frankly adopt. Like his teacher Hugh, he leaves his Jewish informants unnamed; they are Hebraei or a Hebraeus. Frequently what they report coincides with recorded interpretations of Rashi. But Andrew also knows some interpretations of his own contemporary, the very sober Rabbi Joseph Bekhor Shor. Andrew in the latter half of the twelfth century, though remaining a Christian, had become a disciple of Rashi's literal method as developed by his pupils. Andrew's work was not quite forgotten in the succeeding centuries. His interpretations, though without his name, are frequently cited in the Historia Scholastica of Peter the Eater (Comestor). In the next generation Stephen Langton often cites him by name. In the fourteenth century Nicholas of Lyra cites both Master Andrew and his Jewish originals. But the canons of St. Victor had not succeeded in persuading the church to concentrate upon the literal sense of scripture.

e. Nicholas of Lyra. A Franciscan professor at the University of Paris, Nicholas (died ca. 1349) from Lyra in Normandy, has the distinction of being the author of the first Bible commentary ever printed (Postillae Perpetuae [Rome, 1471-72]). Its eighty-five books were usually divided into five huge folio tomes, but, with accumulated annotations by others, later editions grew to six and seven folios. (Pope could think of nothing more hugely forbidding to symbolize a dull library: "De Lyra here a dreadful front extends" [Dunciad, bk. 1, l. 153]). All through the first two centuries of printing it was reprinted in many countries, editions, and forms. A decade before Luther's emergence a Strasbourg writer reports a proverb: "Nisi Lira lirasset, nemo doctorum in Bibliam saltesset" ("Had Lyra not played his lyre, none of the learned would have danced into the Bible"). Another (later?) form of the proverb may be a Protestant rejoinder to this implied belittling of direct Bible study: "Si Lyra non lyrasset totus mundus delirasset" (". . . all the world would have gone mad")—with a second pun on de Lyra! But the classical form of the jingle is an anti-Lutheran innuendo that Luther owed all his biblical learning to Nicholas: "Si Lyra non lyrasset Lutherus non saltasset" (". . . Luther would not have danced").

Actually this giant work is two commentaries: the first fifty books go through the whole of scripture, giving a professedly literal interpretation. The other thirty-five books, called Moralitates (in the incunabula, Moralia), cover the same ground with a mystical commentary. The second Prologue ("Concerning the author's intention and method of procedure") to the first fifty books is significant. He no more than Rashi rejects the nonliteral senses, but he considers the literal sense basic: "All [senses] presuppose the literal as a foundation . . . : thus a mystical exposition at variance with the literal sense is to be regarded as improper and tactless, or, other things being equal, as at the least not very decent or tactful." Only the literal sense, not the mystical, can furnish an argument for proving or clearing up any doubt. Besides, the literal sense has suffered at the hands of interpreters who usually were little interested in it and smothered it under their countless mystical interpretations. "I intend to insist upon the literal sense and sometimes to insert very few and brief mystical expositions, albeit rarely." He will use not only the catholic doctors but also "what the Hebrews have said, particularly Rabbi Solomon [Rashi] who has done more than the rest to clear up the literal sense." But the purpose of these fifty books of labor was only to furnish a firm support for the thirty-five books of the mystical commentary, which find abundant room for all three of the traditional mystical meanings. Nicholas is still solidly within the patristic-scholastic tradition, but the fact that he treats the literal and the mystic senses separately and does so in the ratio 50/35 is the portent of a more radical possibility in the future.

f. Martin Luther. Luther began in the old hermeneutic tradition. "When I was a monk, I was an expert in allegories. I allegorized everything" (Table Talk I.136; his earliest lectures on Psalms [1513-16; WA 3, 4] abundantly document this statement). "So I hated Lyra beyond all interpreters because he so diligently pursued the literal meaning. But now for this very recommendation I place him ahead of almost all interpreters of Scripture" (WA 42^{377}). "Since that time when I began to embrace the historical meaning I have always abhorred allegories and have not used them unless either the text itself exhibited them or [allegorical] interpretations could be cited from the New Testament" (WA 42^{173}).

Particularly in his lectures on Genesis (WA 42) Luther constantly cites Lyra. On 2:9 (WA 42^{71}) he says: "All these things are literal [historica] as I strongly warn you, lest the unwary reader be tripped up by the Fathers who forsake the historia and hunt allegories. The reason I love Lyra and place him among the best is that he everywhere retains and pursues historia, although he lets himself be overcome by the authority of the Fathers, and sometimes it deflects him by their example from the right meaning to tactless allegories." The thing to seek is faith in the Pauline sense. "So it is not to be wondered at that those who do not seek this [faith] in historiis seek the shades of allegory as pleasant paths to go strolling in" (WA 42:377). Again mentioning Lyra, he refers to the "well-known rule" in theological schools "that Scripture is to be understood in a fourfold sense," which he describes and then rejects with the ironic remark: "For all of me, let each one of them overflow with its meaning! But our effort will be placed above all in this: to arrive at one simple, germane, and sure literal sense—if we are to treat sacred things aright. For I consider the ascription of several senses to Scripture to be not merely dangerous and useless for teaching but even to cancel the authority of Scripture whose meaning ought to be always one and the same. . . . Lyra thinks that the studies of students are aided by this rule so that they may get themselves out of the more obscure places. But I judge otherwise and decide that it is neither safe nor useful to follow this rule in the Church" (WA 42:567-67).

In a certain sense Luther was willing to tolerate "allegory." "I hold simple literal meanings to be of the highest importance; I do not particularly approve of allegories. For allegories ought to be employed as if they were ornaments and amplifications. For clearly they are to teaching as color is to building; color neither constructs nor supports the house but only decorates it." He proceeds to "decorate" with two little allegories and then goes on: "If one wants to play with allegories, he will do it very comfortably if he refers this [Isa. 13] to the Law and the Gospel. Let Cyrus be the Law and that power of Babylon be directed against the haughty consciousness of the self-righteous." But he is lecturing to students: is this not a parody on the game of allegory? He finishes seriously: "Had not this business with the Pope kept me in the simple text of the Bible, I would have become an idle trifler with allegories like St. Jerome and Origen. . . . You, therefore, learn by my example and beware—and pursue everywhere simple stories [literal meanings] and the naked text. Afterwards it may be that you can treat allegories without peril, as we see that Paul also brought up an allegory by way of ornament" (WA 25:142). In his own practice Luther seems to have excepted from his category of allegory references that he considered christological, excepted them because to him they only doubled what the NT told him directly (literally); at any rate, he was much inclined to find, not merely messianic allusions, but explicit references to Jesus Christ in OT passages where modern exegetes find only the former or neither.

Although Luther's principle of the simple literal meaning of scripture only slowly gained recognition, it never has been lacking in any generation of the Protestant church, even when other interests have eclipsed it. For the further thread of the history of interpretation, see BIBLICAL CRITICISM.

3. The authority of tradition. The other main factor in the history of interpretation owes its importance largely to the uncertainties of Alexandrine hermeneutics: if scripture or a particular scripture has no certain, dependable meaning, some other authority beside it or above it is necessary to guide faith and conduct. Such an authority was ready at hand in the concept "tradition." By it the second century had meant the sum total of that which had been passed on by the apostles, written or unwritten, but the third and fourth centuries understood tradition to be distinct from scripture: tradition is the unwritten ongoing life of the church handed down in unbroken succession from the apostles—indeed, tradition is the church. Augustine himself, with his high estimate of scripture, once says: "I would not believe the gospel if the authority of the catholic Church did not impel me to do so" (Against the Epistle of Manichaeus Called Fundamental I.5; MPL, XLII, 176). From the context it is clear that he means: the Christian accepts the canon of scripture only on the endorsement of the church—it was the church which established and maintains the canon.

But it was a young contemporary and theological opponent of Augustine, Vincent, a monk at Lerinum, who coined the formulation of the tradition principle that became classic: "Care is to be taken that we hold that which has been believed everywhere, always, by everybody" (Commonitorium II, MPL, L, 640). This is his circumlocution for the tradition which is the church's norm even over the understanding of scripture: "It is necessary . . . that the line of prophetic and apostolic interpretation be guided by the norm of the ecclesiastical and catholic sense." Throughout the Middle Ages this assumption of an authoritative tradition governing interpretation tended either to insulate the church's scholars from interpreting the Bible itself or to distort every attempt to do so. Abelard dared to show that what "everybody" had "always" believed "everywhere" was exceedingly problematic, because one father's "Yes" stood against another's "No" in countless cases (Sic et Non; twelfth century), and incurred for his daring the condemnation of the church. Perhaps aware that his literal interpretations were a departure from the multiple-meaning tradition, and hence possibly suspect, Nicholas of Lyra wrote (Preface 2 to the Postillae): "I protest that I do not intend to assert or determine anything that has not been manifestly determined by Sacred Scripture or by the authority of the Church. . . . Wherefore I submit all I have said or shall say to the correction of Holy Mother Church and of all learned men."

Before Luther, Wyclif was in this respect already thoroughly Protestant: "Though there were a hundred popes and every monk were made a cardinal, their opinion in matters of faith is to be valued only insofar as it is founded upon Scripture" (Trialogion IV c. 7). Luther himself came only gradually to the position of declaring the sole authority of scripture —but it was his discovery of Rom. 1:17 within scripture which led him to this position. In matters of faith ecclesiastical tradition had to submit to the highest authority: scripture. (In matters of ritual and liturgy Luther conceded tradition more, sometimes determinative, authority side by side with scripture.) The Council of Trent felt obliged to define its stand on scripture and tradition: "The Council accepts all the books of the Old and New Testament [enumerated] and also the traditions pertaining either to faith or morals . . . with the same respectful affection and reverence." Actually, since "tradition" at any given moment is the mind of the church, a slightly later decision of the same council placed tradition above scripture: "It is for Mother Church to judge of the true sense and interpretation of the holy Scriptures." Tradition and the mind of the church have become one. But just where is the mind of the church to be found? Roman Catholics received the answer from the Vatican Council (1869): in the Pope; since then it is he who, as the embodiment of Catholic tradition, decides what scripture means.

But for Protestant interpretation the conditions necessary for critical understanding were present when it had been accepted that scripture has one simple meaning and that it neither has nor can tolerate human authority. See BIBLICAL CRITICISM.

Bibliography. L. Diestel, Geschichte des Alten Testamentes in der christlichen Kirche (1869); F. W. Farrar, History of Interpretation (1886); W. Bacher, Die jüdische Bibelexegese vom Anfange des zehnten bis zum Ende des fünfzehnten Jahrhunderts (1892); G. H. Gilbert, Interpretation of the Bible, A Short History (1908); E. von Dobschütz, "Vom vierfachen Schriftsinn," Harnack-Ehrung (1921), pp. 1-13; B. Smalley, The Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages (1941); R. M. Grant, The Bible in the Church (1948). K. GROBEL

INTERPRETER [מליץ]. One who translates languages; one who makes known the will of another, such as an AMBASSADOR; one who unfolds the meaning of what is said, seen, or dreamed by another. Joseph uses an interpreter when his brothers are still to be confused and tested (Gen. 42:23). On the other hand, he solves the riddle or interprets the dreams of others (40:22; 41:13). In Job 33:23; Isa. 43:27 the interpreter is an intermediary between God and man, a spokesman or ambassador for God (see MEDIATOR). In the NT the verb "interpret" is used in reference to explaining the speech of those with the gift of tongues (I Cor. 14:28), expounding scriptures (Luke 24:27), or translating foreign languages (Acts 9:36).
C. U. WOLF

IOB yōb [יוב; Samar.-LXX 'Ιασούβ] (Gen. 46:13); KJV JOB jōb. Third son of Issachar. The parallel lists in Num. 26:24; I Chr. 7:1 (especially the Qere) indicate that "Jashub" was the original reading.

IOTA ī ō′tə [ἰῶτα]. The smallest letter of the Greek alphabet. It also has generally been regarded in Matt. 5:18 as representing the Hebrew yodh as the smallest of the Hebrew alphabet. While some doubts have been expressed about distinguishing the yodh and waw in regard to size in certain periods and scripts, it is probably safe to say that in the "square" script of the first century A.D. such a distinction was possible and is reflected in Matthew. The RSV here simply transliterates the Greek word: "Not an iota, not a dot, will pass from the law." The KJV rendering, "jot," goes back to Tyndale's "one iott," probably itself influenced by the Vulg. iota unam.
See also DOT. A. WIKGREN

IPHDEIAH ĭf′dē′yə [יפדיה, may Yahu ransom] (I Chr. 8:25); KJV IPHEDEIAH ĭf′ə dē′yə. A Benjaminite.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 28, 200.

IPHTAH ĭf′tə [יפתח, he (God) opens] (Josh. 15:43); KJV JIPTAH jĭp′tə. A village of Judah in the Shephelah district of Libnah-Mareshah; possibly modern Tarqumiya, E of Lachish.

IPHTAH-EL ĭf′tə ĕl′ [יפתח-אל, let El open, or El opens] (Josh. 19:14, 27); KJV JIPHTHAH-EL jĭf′thə ĕl′. A valley on the border between Zebulun and Asher. It is probably to be identified with Wadi el-Melek, NW of Nazareth.

IR ĭr [עיר, perhaps ass's colt] (I Chr. 7:12). Apparently a Benjaminite; perhaps to be identified with IRI (I Chr. 7:7).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 230.

IRA ī′rə [עירא]. 1. A Jairite who was included among the officers of David as his priest—an office not necessarily sacerdotal in character (II Sam. 20:26). In the similar catalogues of Davidic officials the office of priest (II Sam. 8:18) is interpreted to mean "chief official in the service of the king" (I Chr. 18:17).

2. An Ithrite who belonged to the company of the Mighty Men of David known as the "Thirty" (II Sam. 23:38; I Chr. 11:40).

3. Son of Ikkesh, and one of the Mighty Men of David (II Sam. 23:26; I Chr. 11:28) who also served as captain in charge of the Davidic militia for the sixth month (I Chr. 27:9). E. R. DALGLISH

IRAD ī′răd [עירד] (Gen. 4:18). In the Yahwistic tradition, an antediluvian patriarch of the line of Cain, and father of Mehujael. The parallel member in the Priestly Sethite list is Jared.

IRAM ī′răm [עירם]. An Edomite clan chief (Gen. 36:43 [LXX Ζαφωιμ, Ζαφωει]; I Chr. 1:54 [LXX Ηραμ, Ζαφωειν]).

IRI ī′rī [עירי, perhaps same as עיר, Ir] (I Chr. 7:7). A Benjaminite.

IRIJAH ī rī'jə [יראיה, Yahu sees] (Jer. 37:13-14). A Benjaminite sentry, presumably at Anathoth, who arrested Jeremiah as a deserter to the Chaldeans when he went to claim his inheritance.

IRNAHASH ĭr nā'hăsh [עיר נחש, city of a serpent; perhaps originally city of copper—Copperopolis] (I Chr. 4:12). A city of Judah whose location is unknown. The reference to "Valley of Craftsmen" (גיא חרשים; vs. 14) may indicate the time of composition of this section (cf. Neh. 11:35). If the reference in Nehemiah could be validly compared, Irnahash should be sought N of Jerusalem, in the territory of Benjamin.

The suggestion of Deir Nahhas, near Beit Jibrin, should not be ignored, however. Reference to Khirbet en-Nahas, near the N end of the Arabah, is tempting but improbable. V. R. GOLD

IRON (CITY). KJV form of YIRON.

IRON [ברזל, Akkad. parzillu, Ugar. brśl, all apparently derived from Hitt. barzillu; biblical Aram. פרזל; σίδηρος, adjective σιδηροῦς].

1. Origin of ironworking
2. Tubal-cain
3. Iron in Palestine
4. Literary metaphors derived from iron

Bibliography

1. Origin of ironworking. Beads made of meteoric iron were used in Egypt as far back as predynastic times. Apart from these, only five iron objects have been found before the end of the Eighteenth Dynasty. Four of these are probably more recent than the date their finders gave them. The fifth, now only an iron mass but once probably an iron object, adhering to Sixth-Dynasty-type copper adzes, has been tested and shown to be of nonmeteoric origin, although it could be merely a lump of iron smelted accidentally and found to be useless since the method of working iron red hot was not then known (so Lucas). It is practically certain that the art of smelting and working iron was discovered by the Hittites of Asia Minor ca. the middle of the second millennium B.C. The fact that the word for "iron" in Akkadian, Hebrew, Ugaritic, and Aramaic seems to be a loan word from Hittite supports this view. It is true that very few iron objects dating from the Hittite period have been found in Anatolia, but this is doubtless to be accounted for by the tendency of iron to rust away quickly. A letter of the Hittite king Hattusilis III (1275-1250 B.C.) to one of his contemporaries, probably the king of Assyria, implies that in the thirteenth century B.C. the Hittite area was recognized to be the source of iron: "'As for the good iron which you wrote about to me, good iron is not available in my sealhouse in Kizzuwatna [a district in south-east Asia Minor]. That it is a bad time for producing iron I have written. They will produce good iron, but as yet they will not have finished. When they have finished I shall send it to you. To-day now I am dispatching an iron daggerblade to you." (O. R. Gurney, The Hittites [2nd ed., 1954], p. 83).

2. Tubal-cain. Hebrew tradition associates the beginnings of ironworking with a figure called Tubal-cain (Gen. 4:22). This figure is undoubtedly composite and represents a merger of two different traditions concerning the origin of metalworking (see METALLURGY). It is usually maintained that the form TUBAL is due merely to the desire of the author to achieve an assonance with the preceding Jubal and that it can have no possible connection with the Tubal of Northeastern Asia Minor, who are associated in tradition with metalworking (cf. Ezek. 27:13; Herodotus 3.94). But this contention is dominated by the idea that the J source, to which Gen. 4 belongs, is of ninth-century-B.C. date, at which time the Hebrews seem to have known nothing of the Tubal. Tubal and the associated Meshech first appear in Hebrew literature in the book of Ezekiel (sixth century B.C.) and in Gen. 10:2. But the date of the J source is open to question; it may well come from the hand of the pre-P author of the book of Genesis, who may be dated in the early postexilic period. This was a time when the geographical horizons of the Hebrews were considerably enlarged by the incorporation of Asia Minor, as well as of Palestine, in the Persian Empire.

Tubal and Meshech seem to have moved into Asia Minor ca. 1200 B.C. and to have inherited the Hittite skill in the mining and smelting of iron. Since they were the leading craftsmen in iron at the time when the Hebrew tradition took shape, the origin of the art was attributed to them rather than to their Hittite predecessors and teachers. The tradition is valid to the extent that it points to the N as the region from which iron reached Palestine; cf. Jeremiah's "iron from the north" (15:12).

3. Iron in Palestine. The use of iron seems to have spread very slowly, because it was difficult to produce and because the first iron smelted was doubtless not much harder than hammered copper or bronze. Furthermore, it required heating before being worked, and this necessitated a great expenditure of fuel, whereas copper and bronze could be worked cold.

It is generally believed that iron was introduced into Palestine by the Philistines, but if the latter came from Crete rather than from Anatolia, this is unlikely. According to Hebrew tradition, the Canaanites possessed iron at the time of Joshua's invasion and thus before the arrival of the Philistines ca. 1190 B.C. Thus Josh. 6:24 states that iron objects were found in the house of Rahab the harlot; 22:8 lists iron among the spoil taken from the Canaanites; and Num. 31:22 lists it among the booty taken from the Midianites. Furthermore, Moses is said to have forbidden the Israelites to employ any iron tool when they built an altar on Mount Ebal (read "Gerizim" in Deut. 27:4). The historical value of references to iron in late sources may be questioned, but there seems no reason for questioning the statements in Josh. 17:16; Judg. 1:19 that the Canaanites of Beth-shean, the Valley of Jezreel, and the Coastal Plain possessed iron chariots at the time of Joshua.

Although the Philistines may not have introduced iron to Palestine, they soon gained access to a considerable supply for themselves, as the story of Goliath implies (I Sam. 17). The iron tip of the giant's spear is said to have weighed six hundred shekels (over sixteen pounds; vs. 7). When the Philistines conquered the Hebrews, they did not permit them to have smiths of their own, and so prevented them from equipping themselves with up-to-date weapons. This made it necessary for the Hebrews, whenever their implements and tools needed sharpening or repairing, to resort to the Philistine smiths, who charged them exorbitant prices (I Sam. 13:19-22). These tools were doubtless of copper or bronze, not of iron. The only iron object from this period found in Hebrew territory is a plowpoint from Gibeah, Saul's capital.

For a long time the Hebrews continued to be handicapped in the struggles with their neighbors by their lack of metal, whereas at least one of their foes, Jabin king of Hazor, is said to have possessed nine hundred iron chariots (Judg. 4:3). The situation changed with the establishment of a Hebrew monarchy. David followed the example of other kings in making metal one of the main prizes of war (II Sam. 8:8). This may have been the way he obtained the "great stores of iron" (I Chr. 22:3) which were later used for making nails for the gates of the temple, although I Chr. 29:7 claims that the iron (100,000 talents of it, equivalent to over 7,500,000 pounds!) was donated by the people. Iron tools were in use in Transjordan in David's time, for after conquering the Ammonites he is said to have "set them to labor with saws and iron picks and iron axes" (II Sam. 12:31 = I Chr. 20:3). (For iron mines in Hebrew territory, see MINING.) In the sixth century B.C., Tyre was importing iron, but the corrupt condition of the text of Ezek. 27:19 makes it impossible to tell whence she obtained it. In the stories of Elijah and Elisha there are two references to iron: in one we read of a prophet named Zedekiah making a set of iron horns for himself and prancing around in front of kings Ahab and Jehoshaphat at Samaria (I Kings 22:11); in the other story we hear of a prophet chopping down trees along the Jordan with an iron axe (II Kings 6:5).

4. Literary metaphors derived from iron. The literary metaphors derived from iron all seem to be of relatively late date, as is to be expected. Thus iron is used as a symbol of hardness and strength or of harshness in Deut. 28:48 (a "yoke of iron"), in Isa. 48:4 (an "iron sinew"), in Job 19:24; Jer. 17:1 (a "pen of iron"), in Ps. 2:9; Rev. 2:27; 12:5; 19:15 (a "rod of iron"), and in Ps. 105:18 (a "collar of iron"). In Dan. 7:7 the crushing might of the fourth beast is symbolized by its having "great iron teeth," with which it devoured and broke in pieces. Most striking of all is the simile in Prov. 27:17:

> Iron sharpens iron,
> and one man sharpens another.

Bibliography. A. Lucas, Ancient Egyptian Materials and Industries (2nd ed., 1934), pp. 193-200, 405-7; G. A. Wainwright, "The Coming of Iron," Antiquity, X (1936), 5-24; R. J. Forbes, "The Coming of Iron," Ex Oriente Lux, IX (1944), 6-14; W. F. Albright, "Cilicia and Babylonia under the Chaldaean Kings," BASOR, 120 (1950), 22-25.

F. V. WINNETT

IRONS [ברזל] (Ps. 107:10). A reference either to fetters or to chains (cf. Pss. 105:18; 149:8; III Macc. 3:25; IV Macc. 11:10), suggesting the custom of binding prisoners shut up in a dungeon with chains (cf. Job 36:8; Acts 12:6; 16:26), or to the iron bars which strengthen the prison gates (cf. Ps. 107:10, 16; Isa. 45:2). The term is used figuratively for the condition of those who reject the commandments of God.

V. H. KOOY

IRONSMITH [חרש ברזל] (Isa. 44:12); KJV SMITH. One who works with IRON, both smelting the ore and casting the finished pieces. The Hittites and the Philistines had a monopoly of such craftsmen until the time of David (Judg. 1:19; I Sam. 13:19-21). The iron swords (I Sam. 17:7) and chariots (Josh. 17:16) gave the Israelites an inferior position. Smiths also made axe heads (Deut. 19:5), chains (Pss. 105:18; 107:10; etc.), chisels (Job 19:24), idols (Dan. 5:4), prison bars (Acts 12:10), etc.

See also METALLURGY; CRAFTS. C. U. WOLF

IRONY AND SATIRE. Irony is defined by Webster's New International Dictionary as a "sort of humor, ridicule, or light sarcasm, which adopts a mode of speech the intended implication of which is the opposite of the literal sense of the words." Satire is defined by the same authority as a "literary composition holding up human or individual vices or folly, or abuses or shortcomings of any kind, to reprobation by means of ridicule, derision, burlesque, or other method of intensifying incongruities, usually with an intent to provoke amendment." Dudley Zuver says: "In general, satire and irony can be distinguished from humor in being more moralistic and disciplinary in intent." Ronald Knox makes this distinction: "Irony is content to describe men exactly as they are, to accept them professedly, at their own valuation, and then to laugh up its sleeve. . . . Satire . . . is born to scourge the persistent and ever-recurrent follies of the human creature as such." See also HUMOR.

1. Irony. There are numerous examples of irony in the Bible. From the OT, these may be noted: the mockery of supposing that man can be equal to God (Gen. 3:5, 22; 11:6); false reasons for the failure of Sisera to return (Judg. 5:28-30); "You only hate me" (Judg. 14:16); Samson's straight-faced lies to Delilah (Judg. 16:7, 11, 13); Solomon's command: "Cut the living child in two" (I Kings 3:25 Amer. Trans.); Elijah's sarcastic taunting of the prophets of Baal (I Kings 18:27; see § 2 below); Micaiah's mocking answer to Ahab (I Kings 22:15); Job's bitter answer to his friends (Job 12:2); God's challenge to Job (Job 40:10-14; cf. Gen. 3:5); the mistaken notions of God's enemies (Pss. 2:3-4; 83:3-4); the downfall of the great (Isa. 14:9-17; 23:4, 16; Ezek. 28:2); the deluded Ephraimites (Hos. 6:1-3); "offspring of Canaan and not of Judah" (Sus. 56).

In the NT: "I do not know you" (Matt. 25:12; cf. 7:23; Luke 13:25-27); "I reap where I have not sowed" (Matt. 25:26); Jesus' answer to Judas ("Friend"!) and the crowd (Matt. 26:50, 55, the latter more like sarcasm); the mockery of the crowd (Matt. 26:68; 27:40-43, 49; John 19:3); "Can anything good come out of Nazareth?" (John 1:46); "him who is without sin among you" (John 8:7); "Do you too want to become his disciples?" (John 9:27); Jesus' answer to Peter (John 13:38); the contemptuous epithet of "King" spoken by Pilate (John 19:14-15, 19); "Shall I commend you [for gluttony and drunkenness]?" (I Cor. 11:22); "Go in peace, be warmed and filled" (Jas. 2:16).

2. Satire. This is a more extended form of expression than irony; in fact, it may use irony, sarcasm, invective, burlesque, ridicule, and all similar devices. One should remember, however, that invective alone is not satire. Satire must manifest the lightness of wit and humor, yet have a serious purpose to reform some widespread evil or folly. The outstanding example in the Bible is the prophets' bitter criticism of the corrupt society in which they lived. The terrific impact of this satire is often avoided or evaded by readers or exegetes who wish to see the Bible as a book entirely of sweetness and light (e.g., the many absurdly sentimental interpretations of the life and theology of Hosea). In general, the extent of satire in the Bible is probably unknown to many. Some of the outstanding examples may be mentioned here:

The satire on the reign of Solomon in particular and the monarchy in general (Deut. 17:14-20; I Sam. 8:10-18; cf. I Kings 9:15–11:40) seems clear. Jotham's fable or parable against the evil deeds of Abimelech (Judg. 9:4-20; this passage is also antimonarchical in tendency) is notable for its literary form and style.

The book of Job (see JOB, BOOK OF) is a masterpiece from many points of view, including that of satire. The whole effort of Job in the debate (nine speeches) constitutes, not only a personal defense, but a satire on the conventional religious ideas of the day, especially the dogma of perfect and exact retribution, or justness of reward, for the deeds of men on this earth. Even the so-called "friends" add to this effect by the very stuffiness and conventionality of their attack. We have here also the quality of dramatic irony, since the reader knows from the Prologue that Job really is innocent. On the other hand, the praise of Wisdom (ch. 28) and the speeches of the Lord (chs. 38–41) constitute a sort of counter-satire on the obviously earthbound and personally conditioned views of Job and those who would agree with him. In spite of the decision rendered in the Epilogue, it would seem from one point of view in the book that both sides in the debate stood in need of correction such as might be stimulated by satire.

Another wisdom book with satirical content is Ecclesiastes. As in Job, there is sharp reaction against the orthodox thought of the author's day, especially the idea of just deserts for all in the best of all possible worlds. There are flashes of sardonic wit, such as: "Vanity of vanities! All is vanity" (1:2; 12:8), and: "A living dog is better than a dead lion" (9:4); yet the author never criticizes God as does Job, and he may have been contending for a better conception of God and a more wholesome view of life.

The book of Proverbs, by its very nature of offering comments on morals and manners, contains a certain amount of satire. Some of its more vividly satirical passages are: on the victim of an evil (KJV "strange") woman (5:1-20; 6:23-33; 7:4-27 [note vss. 7, 22-23]; 9:13-18 [the woman here personifies all folly]; 22:14; 30:20; cf. Ecclus. 9:2-9); on the sluggard or lazy man (6:6-11; 13:4; 18:9; 21:25; 22:13; 26:13-16; cf. Ecclus. 22:1-2); on the drunkard (20:1; 21:17; 23:19-21, 29-35 [note delirium tremens in vs. 33]; cf. Ecclus. 31:25-30); on gluttony (23:1-3; cf. Ecclus. 31:12-24); on the fool (10:8, 14, 23; 14:7, 24; 15:5, 7, 14, 21; 16:22; 17:7, 10, 12, 16, 21, 24-25, 28; 18:2, 6-7; 21:20; 22:3, 15; 26:3-12; 27:22; 29:9, 11, 20). It should be noted that all this is prefaced by praise of wisdom (1:20–2:22), personified as a chaste and beautiful woman—an effort by one of the later writers of the book to present the cure for the satirized follies.

As noted above, the most significant strain of satire in the OT is that in the books of the prophets (see PROPHET). It should be remembered that this satire is directed against the prophets' own people and culture. It is easy to criticize foreigners; it is less easy and requires far more courage to attack the evils in one's own society.

This satire may be said to emerge in the story of ELIJAH THE PROPHET and the prophets of Baal on Mount Carmel (I Kings 18:16-46). It is clear that a large part of Israel has gone over to the worship of Baal, and the tendency of this story is to show how ridiculous are Baalism and those who follow it. Another satire, this time directed against the sycophantic professional prophets of Yahweh, who say only what the king wants to hear, is seen in the story of Micaiah (see MICAIAH 3) from the same period (I Kings 22:5-38).

A century later the literary prophets began to satirize conditions in the Hebrew states. Amos and Hosea spoke directly to the N kingdom of Israel, trying to avert its downfall. Practically the whole book of Amos should be read in this connection (2:6–9:8*b;* 9:8*c*-15 were probably added later). Note particularly 4:1-5, beginning with "cows of Bashan" (overfat women); also the climactic pun in 8:2 (see HUMOR for explanation). The message of Hosea is similar, but even more bitter (2:2-13 [note vs. 7—H 9]; 4–10 [note 4:16; 6:4; 8:6; 10:11]; 11:12–13:16—H 12:1–14:1 [note 13:2, 16—H 14:1]).

Isaiah and Micah also satirized Israel from their vantage point in Judah (Isa. 28:1-4; Mic. 1:6-8), and then, especially after the fall of Israel, turned their barbs even more trenchantly upon their own nation and its self-righteousness (Isa. 1:2-23; 3:13-26; 5:1-7, 22-24; 28:7-22; 29:1-4; 30:8-17; 31:1-3; 32:9-14; Mic. 2:1-11; 3; cf. Zeph. 1:2-13).

Jeremiah and Ezekiel spoke in similar vein to Judah just before its downfall (Jer. 1:4–23:29, omitting 3:14-18; 10:1-16, 23-25; 12:14-17; 16:14-15, 19-20; 17:19-27; 23:1-8 [note 2:23-28]; Ezek. 4–9; 11:1-12; 12–16 [note the especially bitter satire in ch. 16]; 20:45–24:14 [note ch. 23]).

Each of these prophets criticized the ruling monarch of his day; hence the antimonarchical satire pointed out above may have had its origin in the preaching of the prophets.

The prophets criticized, ridiculed, and satirized the idolatry and corruption of their own kings, cities, and people. Amos included some neighboring nations in his sweep before castigating Israel most of all (1:3–2:16). Isaiah probably uttered oracles against Assyria, Philistia, Damascus, and Egypt (10:12-15; 14:28-32; 17:1-3; 20). Jeremiah prophesied against Egypt (44:30; 46:3-12). Other, more chauvinistic writers hurled even more fiery verbal darts at foreign nations, so that we have a whole library of "anti-foreign oracles," some added to the books of the earlier prophets, some standing alone or added to later prophets (Isa. 13:2-22; 14:3-21 [very satirical]; 15:1–16:11; 9:1-15; 23:1-16; 37:22-29; Jer. 46:13–51:58; Lam. 4:21-22; Ezek. 25–32; 35:1–36:15; Joel 3:19-21—H 4:19-21; Obadiah; Nah. 2–3; Zeph. 2; Zech. 9:1-7; 14:12-19; cf. Ps. 137:7-9).

Closely related is the ridicule of foreign idolatry, in contrast to condemnation of idolatry practiced by Hebrews (I Sam. 5:1-7 [cf. I Kings 12:28-30]; Pss. 115:4-8; 135:15-18; Isa. 44:9-20; 45:16; 46:1 [cf. 57: 3-13]; Jer. 10:1-16).

Much of the book of Daniel has a similar satirical cast. Ch. 1 satirizes foreign "wisdom" and eating habits. In ch. 2, the helpless ignorance of the Chaldeans is the first target; then the collapse of the great image with feet of clay is a double satire against foreign nations and idols—the image representing both. Again, in ch. 3, the three Jews make a great image and a great king look ridiculous. In ch. 4, a great foreign potentate goes ridiculously mad; some regard this as a satire on Antiochus Epiphanes. Ch. 5 satirizes licentiousness, idolatry, and the ignorance of foreign magicians. Again, in ch. 6, a mighty foreign king is brought down to humility. In the rest of the book the mightiest foreign kingdoms are shown under the guise of strange beasts as transitory and of little significance compared with the immortal kingdom of the saints.

The book of Jonah presents a satire of a very different type, more like that of the earlier prophets. A broad-minded Jew ridicules his own people, represented by the rebellious prophet, Jonah, for their lack of missionary zeal, their prejudice against foreigners, and their failure to understand a God of love.

In the Apoc., the book of Judith again satirizes the impotence of foreign potentates. Wisdom of Solomon contains another satire against idolatry (13:10–14:31; 15:7–16:1). The Epistle of Jeremiah (Bar. 6) has a similar theme. The same is true of Bel and the Dragon.

In the NT, the principal satire is that in the gospels against the scribes and the Pharisees for their hypocrisy. The bulk of the material is in Matt. 23; Luke 11:39-54, with other scattered references such as Mark 2:16-17; Luke 5:30-35; 6:7-11; 15:1-10. Note also Paul's attack on the Judaizers (Phil. 3:2, 19) and the castigation of the rich in Jas. 5:1-6 (cf. Mark 10:25). Finally, of course, comes the well-known satire on Rome in Revelation. The wicked city and its empire are first represented under the guise of strange beasts, as are the foreign kingdoms in the book of Daniel (Rev. 13; see above); then Rome is disguised for further vituperation as the great harlot-city of Babylon, a favorite target of the antiforeign satirists of the OT (14:8; 16:18–19:3). The city and all its allied potentates in the end go down to perdition as the apocalyptic author vents his bitterest mockery and sarcasm upon them (19:17-21).

Bibliography. H. Lesêtre, "Ironie," VDB, III (1903), 924-25; R. A. Knox, Essays in Satire (1928), p. 23; D. Zuver, Salvation by Laughter (1933), p. 17; D. Worcester, The Art of Satire (1940).

W. F. STINESPRING

IRPEEL ĭr′pĭ əl [ירפאל, God heals] (Josh. 18:27). A town allotted to the tribe of Benjamin. The associated towns suggest a site in the hill country NW of Jerusalem. The most likely is Rafat, N of Gibeon and 6½ miles NW of Jerusalem. W. H. MORTON IRRIGATION. Artificial means of watering crops; used throughout Bible times in the form of aqueducts, cisterns, dams, canals, etc. See AGRICULTURE.

IR-SHEMESH ĭr shĕm′ĭsh [עיר שמש, city of the sun] (Josh. 19:41). A city of Dan; probably identical with BETH-SHEMESH.

IRU ī′rōō [עירו] (I Chr. 4:15). A son of Caleb; listed in the genealogy of the tribe of Judah.

ISAAC ī′zĭk [יצחק, ישחק, see § 1 below; 'Ισαάκ]. The son of Abraham's "old age." Isaac was born in his father's hundredth year (Gen. 21:5, 7). He married Rebekah when he was 40 years old (24:64; 25:20) and became the father of Esau and Jacob at age 60 (Gen. 25:26*b;* I Chr. 1:34). Isaac died at Hebron when he was 180 years old (Gen. 35:27-29) and was buried with his wife in the cave at Mach-pelah (49:31).

1. Etymology
2. Isaac in the OT
   a. Birth of Isaac
   b. Isaac and Ishmael
   c. Sacrifice of Isaac
   d. Isaac and Rebekah
   e. Birth of Esau and Jacob
   f. Isaac and Abimelech
   g. Isaac's blessing
   h. Death of Isaac
3. Isaac in the NT
Bibliography

1. Etymology. The name Isaac, from the verb צחק, means "he laughs" (or "he will laugh"), as does the variant from שחק at Ps. 105:9; Jer. 33:26; Amos 7:9, 16. The several OT etymologies play on this meaning. In the J narrative Sarah laughs in derision at Yahweh's promise of a son, because she is old (Gen. 18:12-15). In E she sees herself as the object of laughter (21:6), or, possibly, as laughing for joy at Isaac's birth (KJV). But E alludes to another explanation also in vs. 9 when Ishmael is pictured as "sporting" with Isaac. מצחק may mean "laughing at" in the sense of "mocking" (so ASV; also Gen. 17:17; 18:12-15; Judg. 16:25; Ps. 2:4) or "laughing with" in the sense of (sexual) play (Gen. 26:8 [RSV "fondling"]; Exod. 32:6). In P it is Abraham who laughs at the divine promise (Gen. 17:17-19).

But these are popular (Volksetymologien), not accurate, etymologies. יצחק, an imperfect-tense formation like יעקוב (JACOB § A), is best regarded as a shortened form of an original theophorous name. A divine element—most probably אל (cf. ישמעאל; see ISHMAEL 1)—should be supplied, and the full form translated: "Let (may) God laugh"—i.e., look with kind affection toward the bearer. (In the Canaanite religious texts from UGARIT [§ 4], 'El frequently laughs [ẓḥq/ṣḥq]).

2. Isaac in the OT. In comparison with the towering Abraham, the complex Jacob, and the noble Joseph, the Isaac of the OT story is weak both in character and in portrayal. In both these respects it is true that "an Abraham is apt to be followed by an Isaac." Of the biblical patriarchs, strictly defined (see PATRIARCHS § 2), he is patently the least significant.

The Isaac cycle of stories was probably formed and preserved in the cultic centers at Beer-sheba and Beer-lahai-roi, where he was esteemed as the regional hero and patron. His life revolves chiefly around these centers (Gen. 21; 22:19; 26:23, 33; 28:10 [Beer-sheba]; and 24:62; 25:11 [Beer-lahai-roi]). Further, whatever its original place in Israel's traditions, the Isaac story creates the initial impression of serving primarily as a link between the major narratives about Abraham and Jacob. E.g., with the possible exception of the sections showing Isaac's relations with Abimelech (see § 2*f below*), in no unit of the present story does Isaac emerge as the leading figure for whose purpose alone the events are recounted.

Nevertheless, in Genesis as now constructed, it not only serves quite successfully as the genealogical link between the Abraham and Jacob cycles but also makes its own distinctive contribution to the theological themes in the patriarchal history. For, first of all, Isaac is the child of promise, a living sign of God's faithful and gracious dealing with Israel (see § 2*a below*). The God who promised has also fulfilled. He is dependable, and Israel can trust in him. But more, he is faithful even when Israel is weak and vacillating. Vague and insignificant though Isaac appears, he remains nevertheless a major channel through whom God works salvation for Israel and mediates his grace to future generations. Standing in this position, Isaac is seen, therefore, also as the man of blessing. See § 2*f below*.

a. Birth of Isaac* (Gen. 21:1-7). The first word spoken about Isaac's birth declares him to be the child of divine promise. Although Abraham is old and his barren wife, Sarah, is past the normal expectation of childbearing, God has promised them a son of their own (15:4; 17:15-19 [P]; 18:9-15 [J]; cf. 15:5 [E]; see ABRAHAM §§ C1*g, j*). Now, after Abraham has reached the age of a hundred years, God makes good his word. Sarah conceives and bears a son, whom she calls Isaac, saying: "God has made laughter for me; every one who hears will laugh over me" (21:6; but cf. KJV; see § 1 above). With his name Isaac, the child stands as an inescapable sign of God's faithfulness in the face of Sarah's incredulity.

But the parents are grateful; and, as a proper son of the covenant, Isaac is circumcised on the eighth day (vs. 4; cf. Luke 1:59; 2:21; Acts 7:8; Phil. 3:5).

b. Isaac and Ishmael* (Gen. 21:8-14; 25:9-11). Sarah's lack of faith in God's ability to perform his promise that Isaac will inherit the divine blessing leads to the expulsion of Ishmael. On the day of the festal celebration of Isaac's weaning, Sarah is greatly disturbed to see Ishmael sporting "with her son Isaac" (not in the MT; supplied from the LXX). The exact nature of the "offense" is not clear (see § 1 above). But however the relationship is expressed, Ishmael's intimacy with Isaac leads Sarah to question whether the son of the handmaid may share in, or even usurp, the inheritance of her own son. She compels Abraham to drive out Ishmael and his mother.

Abraham is distressed. But God suffers him to comply with Sarah's desperate action, assuring him of Isaac's unassailable position: "Through Isaac shall your descendants be named" (vs. 12*b;* cf. Rom. 9:7; Heb. 11:18). Not through Ishmael, the child of human impatience and unfaith (see ABRAHAM §§ C1*i*, 2*c;* ISHMAEL 1), nor any collateral line, however worthy, but through Isaac, the child granted by God's grace, the divine promises will be transmitted to Israel (cf. Gal. 4:21-31). Therefore, Abraham may assist in Hagar's dismissal, knowing that her son, though he continues a neighbor, will not threaten Isaac's future (Gen. 21:14).

The tradition here accounts for the historic situation that the Israelites and Ishmaelites represent collateral lines of descent from Abraham and live as neighbors, the latter occupying the territory lying principally to the E (cf. ארץ קדם in 25:6; ארץ בני קדם in 29:1) of Palestine. See PALESTINE, GEOGRAPHY OF; ARABIANS § 2.

The biblical narrative brings Isaac and Ishmael together again only upon the occasion of Abraham's death (25:9-11*a*).

c. The sacrifice of Isaac* (22:1-19). As is the case with Jesus in the gospels (Luke 2:41-51), only one episode is known about the childhood of Isaac. Since Isaac knows what a sacrifice entails and is old enough to carry a load of wood (vs. 6), he is portrayed, not as a small child, but as at least a lad. The story of the "sacrifice" of Isaac (called by later Jews the "binding of Isaac," עקדת יצחק) is a superb example of the Elohist's narrative art. The issue of faith and obedience dominates the whole story. It pictures father and son, in journeying to the land of MORIAH, intimately sharing the pathos of the hour. As they walk together (vss. 6*b*, 8*b*), each bearing the materials by which the father expects to offer up the life of his only beloved son—Ishmael having been sent away previously (see § 2*b above*)—they share also a deep faith. Abraham trusts that God knows what he has asked and that Isaac will respond in obedience; Isaac relies upon the wisdom and love of his father and, perhaps by his example, also upon God's providence (vss. 6-8; cf. Wisd. Sol. 10:5; Heb. 11:17-19). Isaac's question: "Where is the lamb for a burnt offering?" (vs. 7*b*), seems to go beyond innocent curiosity and betrays an intuition that this is no common journey on which his father leads him. Accordingly, the picture of Isaac sensing the solemnity of the occasion and yet walking in perfect obedience, while carrying the wood upon which he is to be sacrificed, ranks among the most christological portraits found in the OT.

For his part Abraham, for his faithfulness, receives his son, as it were, a second time (cf. Gen. 21:1-3). The "gift" of Isaac is especially significant here, in view of Abraham's earlier gross lack of faith in fathering a son by Hagar (see ABRAHAM §§ C1*i*, 2*c*), for it demonstrates God's unshakable fidelity to his promise.

d. Isaac and Rebekah* (24:62-67). When Abraham is old, he sends his trusted servant back to the region of Haran (see ARAM-NAHARAIM) to obtain from his own kindred a wife for Isaac (24:1-61; see ABRAHAM § C1*m*). By this he wishes to maintain, principally at least, purity of religion, not of race; for the religion of Nahor's family is of the same basic type as Abraham's (see PATRIARCHS § 5; NAHOR 2). But he is very insistent that Isaac not be taken there, even if it be the only means of his obtaining a wife. For Abraham is the possessor of "this land" (vs. 7), and Isaac must inherit the promise. To leave Canaan would be a signal act of infidelity. The faithful servant is entrusted with the double responsibility of preventing Isaac from marrying a native Canaanitess and yet from leaving the Promised Land. With this commission the servant goes and finds Rebekah. Rebekah, the sister of LABAN, sharing something of the steward's own sense of destiny, agrees to accompany him back to Palestine and marry Isaac, whom she has never seen. In this compelling scene, which introduces her to the reader, Rebekah displays something of the resolution of will and independence of action which characterize her later in the Isaac story.

The scene depicting the first meeting of the future couple, though brief, is colorful and winsome (vss. 62-67). Isaac has just come up to the region of Hebron, Abraham's residence according to J (13:18; 18:1 [=Mamre]), from Beer-lahai-roi, which is located farther in the Negeb (24:62*b*, or "the wilderness of Beer-lahai-roi"; see Commentaries). Presumably he has been told of his father's intent and has come to Hebron to await the servant's return, because he goes out into the field in the evening "to meditate" (the precise meaning of the verb שוח is uncertain), sees the caravan approaching, and walks out to meet it. His curiosity is matched by Rebekah's, for when she sees her groom-to-be, she "falls off" the camel, and she veils her face. The lasting impression of the narrative is that the pair enjoy love at first sight. He marries her and is "comforted after his mother's death" (but the text is not in order; probably notice of Abraham's death originally stood here, or in the preceding verses).

e. Birth of Esau and Jacob (25:19-28). Like Sarah, who was to be a "mother of nations" (17:16*b; see* SARAH), Rebekah is barren. In the over-all context of the promise of continuing descendants in the house of Abraham (12:7; 13:16 [J]; 15:5 [E]; 17:2-3 [P]; cf. 24:60 [J]), Rebekah's barrenness creates a major test of faith in Yahweh. Instead of resorting to despair or self-willed action (see ABRAHAM §§ C1*i*, C2*c*), Isaac meets the temptation with prayer (25:21*a*). Isaac's patient faith is set in a high light by the Priestly chronology, for according to it Rebekah remained childless for twenty years (cf. vss. 20*a*, 26*b*). Yahweh was gracious to Isaac: he "granted his prayer [lit., 'allowed himself to be entreated by him,' ויעתר לו], and Rebekah his wife conceived" (vs. 21).

With the birth of the twins Esau and Jacob, Yahweh's promise concerning Isaac is fulfilled and the patriarch's faith and prayer exonerated. And in the oracle characterizing the future of these two (vs. 23), this promise is renewed implicitly by the words "nations" and "peoples," as it is explicitly at 26:3-5 (see § 2*f below*). But also, with the birth of twins who are in conflict with each other (vss. 22*a*, 23*b*, 26*a*, 29-34; cf. 27:41-45), the promise is again threatened. Further, the conflict between the sons is reflected in, and the threat deepened by, the divided loyalty of their parents; for Isaac loved the roving hunter, ESAU, but Rebekah loved the "quiet" Jacob (25:28; see JACOB § C1).

f. Isaac and Abimelech (ch. 26). Only in his dealings with ABIMELECH does Isaac stand out as a person in his own right. Previous episodes have seen him subordinated to his father or his wife, and the remaining sections weave his story into the narrative of his sons. Perhaps here, then, Israel's distinctive picture of Isaac may be sought. The portrait of Isaac which dominates all his dealings in this chapter is that of the man of blessing.

Yahweh's initial theophany to Isaac, when he had taken refuge in GERAR from the famine, sounds this note clearly: "Sojourn in this land, and I will be with you, and will bless you" (vs. 3*a*). The obstacle created by the famine to the working out of the patriarchal promise of land and seed (12:7; 13:15) is overcome by divine protection, as is also the threat posed by Rebekah's beauty (vss. 6-11). Isaac sowed in that land "and reaped in the same year a hundredfold," because "Yahweh blessed him, and the man became rich, and gained more and more until he became very wealthy" (vss. 12-13). His prodigious success is the natural and inevitable effect of the divine blessing which he bore. In the borderland between the natives and the Israelites (the "valley of Gerar"), Isaac was also successful in obtaining plentiful sources of water, so vital for life in Palestine. Since Yahweh prospered his efforts, he would surely become "fruitful in the land" (vss. 17-22).

When Isaac returned to Beer-sheba, Yahweh again appeared to him, identifying himself as the "God of Abraham your father" and repeating the promise of blessing. By erecting an altar there, Isaac bound his family to the same God worshiped by his father (vss. 23-25; cf. 21:25-33). See PATRIARCHS § 5.

The final episode emphasizes further the theme of blessing. Abimelech and two high officials (see PHICOL) come to Isaac in the patriarch's own land and request a covenant with him because, they acknowledge, "you are now the blessed of Yahweh" (ברוך יהוה; vs. 29).

g. Isaac's blessing (ch. 27). The theme of blessing dominates also the final, most poignant scene in Isaac's life. Not knowing the day of his death, the man of blessing wishes to communicate this blessing to his older son. However, through crass deceit, initiated by the mother herself, the younger son, who has previously gained the family birthright (see JACOB § C1*b*), now steals the patriarchal benediction. The pathetic and shocking story is masterfully told by the Yahwist. The aged, blind father, uncertain of his son yet wishing to believe in him, finally satisfies himself by the kiss, and gives to his undeserving son his deathbed blessing (vss. 1-30).

With Esau's anguished cry ("Bless me, even me also, O my father!" vs. 34), which severs the father's vain hold on the hope that he has nevertheless been right, the scene reaches its dramatic height. Isaac knows that the blessing he has solemnly communicated to Jacob can be neither recalled nor annulled, for it comes from God (see JACOB § C1*c*). The broken-hearted father can only take some of the words of the blessing and pronounce them over Esau as a mitigated curse (vss. 39-40; cf. vs. 28). The results of the affair seem tragic: Isaac dies, knowing he has given his blessing to a lying, deceitful son; Esau hates his brother and seeks occasion to kill him; and Jacob flees from the land promised to him, never to see his mother again (vss. 41-45 [J]; but see P's explanation, 27:46–28:9). Yet in the skein of tragedy God has been at work; and Jacob's blasphemous assertion (27:20) is, in the ultimate issue, true (cf. Heb. 11:20).

h. The death of Isaac (Gen. 35:27-29). When he was 180 years old, Isaac died at Hebron, and was buried by his sons Esau and Jacob in the cave of MACH-PELAH, where Abraham and Sarah lay and where he had buried Rebekah (35:27-29; 49:32). The phrase "old and full of days" (35:29) is seen as evidence of the blessing manifesting itself in his life. See BLESSEDNESS.

3. Isaac in the NT. The most important aspect of the Genesis story dealt with in the NT is, obviously, the sacrifice of Isaac (see § 2*c above*). Although Paul did not develop the relation between the sacrifice of Abraham's only beloved son and that of Christ, his reminder that "we, brethren, like Isaac, are children of promise" (Gal. 4:28; cf. Rom. 9:6-13) points suggestively in that direction. As Isaac was obedient unto the point of death, so Christ offered himself in perfect obedience to the Father's will; and it is in the same sacrificial self-giving that the Christian is called to share. Isaac's sacrifice would serve as a "type" (τύπος), first for Christ, who fulfilled it perfectly, then also for Christians, who are Abraham's seed after the Spirit (see ABRAHAM § E). The early Christian church developed this latent concept quite fully (Barn. 7:3; Clement of Alexandria Paedagogica I.5.1; Strom. 2.5; Iren. Her. 4.4; and especially Origen), and it had a parallel development in post-biblical Judaism. See the Isaac theme in the article by Schoeps in the bibliography.

Bibliography. J. Pedersen, Israel, I-II (1926), 190-212; M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 210, 218; H. J. Schoeps, "The Sacrifice of Isaac in Paul's Theology," JBL, LXV (1946), 385-92; D. Lerch, Isaak's Opferung christlich gedeutet (1950); J. J. Stamm, "Der Name Isaak," Festschrift für Albert Schaedelin (1950), pp. 33 ff; E. A. Speiser, "I know not the Day of my Death," JBL, LXXIV (1955), 252-56.

For historical background and religion of the patriarchal period, see bibliography under PATRIARCHS. For description of some Genesis commentaries, see bibliography under ABRAHAM.

L. HICKS

ISAI ī′zī. Douay Version form of JESSE.

ISAIAH ī zā′ə [ישעיהו, ישעיה, Yah(weh) is salvation]. KJV alternately: ESAIAS ĭ zā′əs [twenty-one times in the NT, from LXX Ἡσαίας]. The name of the first of the "major" prophets (always ישעיהו) and of the book (ישעיה) in which his prophecies have been preserved.

The spelling current in the eighth century B.C. was ישעיהו. The shorter ישעיה was later and is found in the Elephantine Papyri (Cowley 5.16; 8.33; 9.21). The name is similar in meaning to Joshua (יהושוע) or Jesus (ישוע), and Hosea (הושע), also to Elisha (אלישע, "God is salvation"). Other individuals are named ישעיהו and ישעיה in the OT, but for these the RSV has kept the KJV spelling JESHAIAH.

A. The prophet
1. His life
a. Early ministry
b. Withdrawal from public life
c. Middle years
d. Later ministry
2. His personality
3. His theology
a. Yahweh's sovereignty
b. Yahweh's holiness
c. Human sin
d. Faith in Yahweh
e. The remnant
f. The Messiah
B. The book
1. Chs. 1–39
a. Composition
b. Contents
2. Chs. 40–55
a. Historical background
b. Authorship
c. The author
d. Structure
e. Contents
f. Interpretation
g. Theology
3. Chs. 56–66
a. Authorship and date
b. Contents
4. Text
Bibliography

PALESTINE
ISAIAH
BASHAN
SEA OF CHINNERETH
MEDIA
EGYPT ARABIA
ETHIOPIA
Sidon
Tyre
Dothan
Megiddo
Jericho Jerusalem
Hebron
Lachish
Libnah
Beer-sheba
Aroer
Dibon
Kir-hareseth
Madmen
Gomorrah
Sodom
Zoar Bozrah
Edrei
Ashtaroth
Ramoth-gilead
Gilead
Jazer
Heshbon
Elealeh
Medeba
Nebo
Sibmah
Ai
Bethel
Ashdod
Ekron
Gaza
Gerar Kadesh
Shur
Dead Sea
Sea of Reeds
Euphrates R.
Tigris R.
Nile R.
Jordan R.
Arnon R.
Zered R.
Brook of Egypt Mediterranean Sea
Persian Gulf
Red Sea
Gulf of Aqaba
Assyria
Babylonia
Media
Kedar
Damascus
Tema
Dedan
Seir
Ishmael
Moab
Ammon
Edom
Philistia
Judah
Ephraim
Manasseh
Gilead
Bashan
Naphtali
Zebulun
Issachar
Asher
Dan Benjamin
Simeon
Reuben
Gad

1. His life. What is related of Isaiah's life in the book of Isaiah is supplemented in part by II Kings, especially 18:13–20:21, which is parallel, with some variations, to Isa. 36–39. He was the son of a certain Amoz (אמוץ), who is not to be confused with the prophet Amos (עמוס). It may be assumed that he was born in Jerusalem, about, or shortly before, 760. His call came to him "in the year that King Uzziah died" (6:1), ca. 742.* He was married and refers to his wife as "the prophetess" (8:3). He had sons to whom he gave the symbolical names SHEAR-JASHUB and MAHER-SHALAL-HASH-BAZ. His ministry extended over more than forty years, during the reigns of four kings of Judah—Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah (1:1). The last we hear of him is on the occasion of Sennacherib's threat to Jerusalem (701), when he was appealed to by Hezekiah and his court. Tradition has it that Isaiah was sawn asunder in the reign of Manasseh (see ISAIAH, ASCENSION OF). This legend may be older than the Letter to the Hebrews (cf. Heb. 11:37) and is perhaps based upon II Kings 21:16. It is impossible to determine whether or not it contains an element of truth. Fig. UZZ 19.

a. Early ministry (742-734). Isaiah's call came to him in the temple. Assuming, as we must, that his account of it is of something he actually experienced, and not so much imaginative description, he must have stood in or very near the sanctuary, and it is not fanciful to suppose that he was, like Jeremiah and Ezekiel, a priest, or perhaps a prophet attached to the temple. It may be taken as certain that he began at once to prophesy and that his message was one of condemnation of the religious and social-economic evils of his time (6:9-10). Most of the contents of chs. 1–5 accord well with this. It is clear that Isaiah had no illusions about the obduracy of his people. He came into public prominence at the time of the Syro-Ephraimitic invasion of Judah in 734 B.C. He always appears to have had easier access to the king and the court than we can suppose was possible for the ordinary citizen; the assumption that he belonged to the aristocracy is confirmed by all that we read of him, as well as by his literary style. It was now that Isaiah made his pronouncement of the birth of IMMANUEL. He was uncompromisingly opposed to Ahaz' plan to cast himself on the protection of Assyria, and he maintained his stand against alliances with foreign powers throughout his ministry. He saw clearly that such alliances would compromise the religious as well as the political freedom of his country (cf. II Kings 16:10-18). Accordingly, the motive underlying his counsel was more religious than political: the prophet believed that faith in Yahweh was a sufficient guarantee of divine protection. Not to have faith was to court disaster:

> If you will not believe, > surely you shall not be established (7:9).

b. Withdrawal from public life (734-715). Isaiah was no conspirator against the state; and after Ahaz concluded the Assyrian alliance, Isaiah announced his intention to keep silence and to wait for Yahweh (8:16-18). The present Hebrew text speaks of his "disciples." Although there is some doubt about the originality of this reading, there is every reason to believe that the prophets did gather disciples and that it was to such like-minded spirits that we owe the preservation of much of their teaching. At the least, Isaiah's attitude was that his own name and the names of his children would continue to witness as "signs and portents" from Yahweh. But we cannot point with certainty to any public utterances of his between 734 and the death of Ahaz in 715.

c. Middle years (715-705). When Ahaz was succeeded by Hezekiah, Isaiah was once more able to speak freely. An utterance on Philistia is dated "in the year that King Ahaz died" (14:28-32). Hezekiah only waited for an opportunity to break with the foreign policy of his father. The messianic passages 9:2-7—H 9:1-6; 11:1-9 cannot be dated with any certainty. Their optimism is not decisive evidence against their composition in Ahaz' reign, but it is more likely that they come from a time when the outlook was brighter. In 711, the year that the Assyrian TARTAN captured the Philistine stronghold of Ashdod, Isaiah was bidden to go naked and barefoot as a sign and portent (cf. 8:18) of the fate that awaited Egypt and Ethiopia (ch. 20; cf. ch. 18; 19:1-15). This he did for three years. The motive was doubtless to dissuade Hezekiah from becoming involved in Egyptian intrigues against Assyria. At the same time Isaiah could hardly be blind to the increasing ruthlessness of Assyria. He was from the beginning convinced that Yahweh's chastisement was coming to Judah. It was also clear to him that Assyria was the instrument of this chastisement (10:5-10). But he was equally convinced that it was not in the divine purpose that Zion, the earthly habitation of Yahweh, should be given over to the Assyrians to be spoiled and plundered. This may be the reason why invective against Jerusalem and its inhabitants is not so prominent in the middle years as it had been earlier.

d. Later ministry (705-701). The death of Sargon II (see SARGON 2) in 705 was the signal for a general revolt against Assyria. The embassy of MERODACH-BALADAN of Babylon (ch. 39), although its setting in the book of Isaiah is later than the time of Hezekiah's illness (ch. 38), which itself was subsequent to the invasion of Sennacherib in 701 (chs. 36–37), must have been ca. 703. It is clear from the story that Hezekiah was being drawn into a coalition against Assyria. Isaiah's policy of nonparticipation was the same as it had always been. He stigmatized the alliance as a "covenant with death and Sheol" (28:15). Egypt as an ally was wholly undependable (30:1-5; 31). SENNACHERIB, having crushed Merodach-baladan, moved swiftly against the Philistine cities, with whom (and probably with Egypt) Hezekiah had now compromised himself. The biblical account of the campaign in II Kings 18:13-37; Isa. 36 is supplemented by the Cylinder of Sennacherib, which tells how the citizens of Ekron delivered their king Padi to Hezekiah. An Assyrian detachment was sent to invest Jerusalem, and Sennacherib describes how he shut up Hezekiah "like a caged bird in Jerusalem his royal city." In this crisis Hezekiah sent to Isaiah the entreaty: "Lift up your prayer for the remnant that is left" (II Kings 19:4; Isa. 37:4). Isaiah interpreted the insolence of Sennacherib's envoys as mockery and reviling of the "Holy One of Israel."

His answer was unhesitating: he declared in Yahweh's name that Sennacherib should go back by the way he had come, "for I will defend this city to save it, for my own sake and for the sake of my servant David" (II Kings 19:34; Isa. 37:35). At the same time Isaiah saw no excuse for levity on the part of the populace; 22:1-4 may come from a time earlier than Sennacherib's invasion, but it would be no less relevant in 701 than it had always been.

2. His personality. So long as it was believed that the entire book of Isaiah was written by the prophet himself, Isaiah was assumed to be the greatest, as he was the first in time, of the major prophets. Today not even the whole of chs. 1–39 is thought to come from him. Accordingly, his stature may seem less than it was, and there are those who reckon Jeremiah and/or Deutero-Isaiah as at least his equals. To discuss which was the greatest of the prophets is futile. Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Deutero-Isaiah, to name those who may be considered "major" in the nonliterary sense, have common characteristics and qualities. The differences between them are largely those dictated by the circumstances of their times. Notwithstanding that the word "genius" is nowadays loosely and all too frequently used, it is the only word that does justice to Isaiah. His literary output is still considerable, and his ministry lasted for more than a generation. He was a poet-seer and at the same time a man of action, a statesman unerring in judgment. As a young man he was mature in both, and as a man in his sixties he had lost nothing of his mastery in either. Ezekiel could be bizarre; Isaiah was sanity itself. Jeremiah was sometimes unsure of himself, even unsure of Yahweh. Isaiah never was; there is no evidence that he ever had to wait for Yahweh's instruction in an emergency (contrast Jer. 28:11-14; 42:1-7).

Isaiah never felt under unwilling compulsion, notwithstanding that after his call he could speak of Yahweh's "strong hand" being "upon" him (8:11). His answer to Yahweh's call for a volunteer was the free-will offering of himself: "I heard the voice of the Lord saying, 'Whom shall I send, and who will go for us?' Then I said, 'Here I am! Send me' " (6:8). His gifts of mind and imagination; his social position as, it may be assumed, a member of the aristocracy; his private and family life—all were dedicated to a service he never regretted and from which he never looked back. He was fearless and frank in the presence of majesty; he could pour withering scorn on the pretensions of a state official (22:15-25); he was scathing in his denunciations of gluttony, land greed, and social injustice (5:8-23); he told the society beauties of his time exactly what Yahweh thought of them, without any mincing of words (3:16-26); and his compassion for the unprivileged never made him pander to the mob (22:1-3). He must have been far and away the greatest man of his time.

Isaiah's consistency was not the consistency of a "little mind." His policy of nonalliance was the right one for his time, though we are not at liberty to argue from it that alliances between nations are always and everywhere immoral. His doctrine of the inviolability of Zion was justified, and if its signal vindication and his own immense prestige converted it into a dogma whch a century later had baneful consequences (cf. Jer. 7:1-15), this was no fault of his.

Isaiah, like all great poets, must have been born a poet. But his experience at his call gave an incandescent quality to his genius. His style is simple and direct, without the elaboration of the later Second Isaiah (this is no depreciation of Second Isaiah). That he knew how a vineyard was prepared (5:1-2), or what a derelict hut in a garden looked like (1:8), or was familiar with the bovine patience of domestic animals (1:3), is not remarkable. There were no mammoth cities in his day. But the majesty of his description of Yahweh's coming in judgment is superb (2:10-21). The skill with which he begins the love song of "my beloved" about his vineyard, until as he proceeds it is "my beloved" (Yahweh) himself who is singing, is perfect. Like other poet-prophets (Jer. 1:11-12; Amos 8:1-2), he is not ashamed of a pun; but it is an apt pun, even when it is intentionally harsh: "He expected justice [mishpāṭ], but instead, bloodshed [miśpāḥ]; righteousness [ṣᵉdhāqâ], but instead, a cry [ṣᵉʿāqâ]" (5:7 [orig. tr.]). If, to be a genius of the first rank, a man must be at once a creative artist and a man of affairs, Isaiah must be accorded his place among the select few. And his was genius heightened by utter consecration to the service of God.

3. His theology. The outstanding emphases in Isaiah's theology are already explicit or implicit in the account of his call (ch. 6).

a. Yahweh's sovereignty. "Monotheism" is an abstract noun, and the eighteenth century Deists were monotheists. Isaiah did not say, as the Prophet of the Exile did (Isa. 45:6, 22-23), that there is no God but Yahweh. But from what he does say, it is inconceivable that he thought of any other "god" as having real existence: "The whole earth is full of his [Yahweh's] glory" (6:3). Idols are אלילים, "worthless things," "nonentities" (2:8, 18, 20-21), the "work of men's hands" (37:19; cf. 2:8; Ps. 115:4). It is Yahweh who determines the course of history. The Assyrians appear invincible, but they are only a rod in Yahweh's hand, and if they overstep the bounds of their commission, Yahweh will not spare them (10:5-19).

b. Yahweh's holiness. "Holiness" is another abstract noun, and it is probable, though not certain, that the original idea underlying the root קדש was that of (physical) separation (see HOLINESS). All Semitic "gods" were "holy," but the word had no ethical connotation. The temple prostitutes of Akkadian and Canaanite religion were "holy women." Isaiah saw Yahweh in majestic exaltation. The attendant seraphim shielded themselves from the dazzling radiance as they cried: "Holy, holy, holy is Yahweh of hosts" (6:3). The threefold "Holy" (Trisagion) was the Hebrew way of expressing the superlative, "most holy." Holiness in such a context is not a negative absence of moral impurity; it is not positive moral perfection, that and no more. It has still the "numinous" quality which had always attached to it. Yahweh's holiness is his perfect moral purity combined with his transcendent exaltation. That holiness has a moral content had been anticipated by Amos (Amos 4:2), who voiced Yahweh's demand for justice and righteousness (5:24). But it was Isaiah who laid the main emphasis upon Yahweh's holiness, who first, and often (twelve times), called Yahweh the "Holy One of Israel," and forever sealed the bond between holiness and righteousness.

*c. Human sin. That Yahweh's holiness must express itself in judgment upon human sin is evident from the immediate impact it made upon Isaiah: "I said: 'Woe is me! For I am lost; for I am a man of unclean lips, and I dwell in the midst of a people of unclean lips; for my eyes have seen the King, Yahweh of hosts.' " Sin is uncleanness; it is also rebellion against Yahweh (1:2). The whole body of society is tainted with it (1:4-6). Sacrifices are no remedy for it (1:11-15) but only make matters worse. The inevitable consequence of man's sensuality, self-sufficiency, pride, and injustice was a fearful expectation of judgment. Amos had already announced such a judgment, the "day of Yahweh" upon Israel (Amos 5:18-20). In Isaiah the day of Yahweh is to be universal in its scope (2:6-22).

*d. Faith in Yahweh. There is only one remedy for man's self-reliance and resort to his own expedients, and this is faith in Yahweh. This strikes a new note in prophecy and finds expression in two passages which sum up Isaiah's positive testimony. In 7:9: "If you will not believe [ta'ᵃmînû; Hiph'il], you shall not be established [tē'āmēnû; Niph'al]," the play on words can be conveyed by some such rendering as: "If you will not be sure, you cannot be secure," or by making the contrast between "faith" and the now obsolete colloquial "staith." The other passage is 28:16: "He who believes will not be in haste," meaning that he will not get panicky. Closely related in thought is 30:15:

> In returning and rest you shall be saved;
> in quietness and in trust shall be your strength, this attitude being contrasted (vs. 16) with feverish reliance upon horses, which will only suffice for ignominious flight.

*e. The remnant. Amos (5:15) had spoken of the "remnant of Joseph" (N Israel), which should survive catastrophe, as of something to which Yahweh might be "gracious." It is probable that the last clause in Isa. 6:13: "The holy seed is its stump," is a gloss—it is not in the LXX. Nevertheless, the doctrine of the remnant must early have taken shape in Isaiah's mind. His little son SHEAR-JASHUB, "A remnant will return," was old enough to accompany his father on foot to the encounter with Ahaz in 734 B.C. (see IMMANUEL § 1). At first the name was a "sign and portent" of sinister import (8:18). Even if 10:20-23; 11:11, 16, should not be from Isaiah, it is certain that Isaiah looked for something more than a bare survival of Judah. Yahweh was > laying in Zion for a foundation > a stone, a tested stone, > a precious cornerstone, of a sure foundation > (28:16).

"My disciples" (8:16) may be suspect (see § A1*b above*), but the very book of Isaiah, not to speak of the postexilic Jewish community, is evidence that a purified remnant did survive. The doctrine of the remnant has been of immense significance in the subsequent history both of Judaism and of Christianity.

*f. The Messiah. Isaiah's messianic teaching is not free from perplexity. This may be because it was more incidental than central to his teaching. The prophet was in declared opposition to the policy of Ahaz. He was not uncritical of Hezekiah (ch. 39), but his conviction of the inviolability of Zion was for him a higher compulsion than denunciation of what might be interpreted as the pro-Egyptian leanings of the king, and in the crisis of 701 he stood firmly by Hezekiah. Expectation of a future messiah was largely born of dissatisfaction with the reigning kings, and it is not antecedently improbable that Isaiah should have made messianic pronouncements. The "Immanuel" prophecy, no matter how it should be interpreted (see IMMANUEL), was such a pronouncement. With it 9:2-7—H 9:1-6; 11:1-9 make up a trilogy. But it is difficult to determine whether the "perfect" tenses of 9:2-7 are "prophetic perfects" referring to the future, or whether the passage celebrated the birth, or perhaps the enthronement, of a contemporary prince. 11:1-9 has often been denied to Isaiah, on the ground that it is written from the standpoint of the Exile—the "stump of Jesse" has already been cut down (vs. 1); but the present trend of opinion is to regard the passage as Isaianic. Even so it may refer to a contemporary king (Hezekiah?) of whom great things were expected, rather than in the first instance to a future messiah. What is said of the "Messiah" in both 9:2-7; 11:1-9 is in terms of then current kingship ideology (see KING § 7). The king was a sacred, and, in some sort, semidivine person. But for all his endowment, it is clear that he is only a vicegerent, entirely subordinate to Yahweh: "The zeal of Yahweh of hosts will do this" (9:7). 32:1-8 is in general terms, and the parallelism of "king" and "princes" in vs. 1 shows that it is a description of society in conditions where kings "reign in righteousness" and princes "rule in justice."

B. THE BOOK. In all printed Hebrew Bibles "Isaiah" is the first of the "Latter Prophets" (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and "the Twelve"). It is so also in the oldest Hebrew MS codices (tenth and eleventh centuries A.D.). The Qumran scrolls give no indication of where their copyists would have placed Isaiah in the order of prophets. Some later MSS place Isaiah after Ezekiel, and a passage in the Talmud (B.B. 14*b*) has it that this is the correct order and that Isaiah was composed by the "men of Hezekiah." This recalls Prov. 25:1 and may indicate that Jewish scholars were not satisfied that the entire book was from the pen of Isaiah. Such, indeed, is the general view today. But that the book as we know it went by the name of Isaiah by ca. 180 B.C., is clear from Ecclus. 48:17-25, which refers to the historical section (Isa. 36–39) and then goes on to say of Isaiah:

> By the spirit of might he saw the last things, > and comforted those who mourned in Zion

(cf. Isa. 40:1). This is confirmed by the somewhat later Qumran scrolls.

There is an obvious break in the subject matter of the book at the end of ch. 39, and another almost equally obvious at the end of 55. Even if chs. 40–66 are predictive prophecy from the pen of Isaiah, it is convenient to deal with the sixty-six chapters under separate headings (1–39; 40–55; 56–66), without, at the outset, pronouncing on the authorship of chs. 40–66.

1. Chs. 1-39. a. Composition. The occurrence of subsidiary titles (1:1; 2:1; 13:1; etc.) suggests that the book was in part compiled from smaller units and collections. The following main divisions are fairly clear: (a) ch. 1, a collection of prophetic pronouncements; (b) chs. 2–12, mainly concerned with "Judah and Jerusalem," ascribed in a title (2:1) to Isaiah; (c) chs. 13–23, pronouncements mainly concerned with foreign nations; (d) chs. 24–27, an eschatological prophecy or prophecies; (e) chs. 28–33, a collection of "woes" dealing with the relationship of Judah to Assyria; (f) chs. 34–35, two eschatological prophecies; (g) chs. 36–39, historical narratives.

But it is an oversimplification of the problem to suppose that Isa. 1–39 was formed by the addition of some seven originally independent booklets. A feature of the prophetical books is that they consist of three types of materials generally denoted by (a) utterances of the prophets, for the most part short, and usually in verse; (b) stories about the prophets, in prose and in the third person; (c) passages of autobiography, mainly prose but sometimes with verse intermingled (cf. Isa. 6). Now if 2:1 was intended as the superscription to chs. 2–12, it is clear that the section contains a, b, and c materials: chs. 2–5 are prophecies; chs. 6; 8 are autobiographical; ch. 7 is biographical; and chs. 9–12 are again prophecies. The processes by which even chs. 1–39, without the addition of chs. 40–55; 56–66, assumed their present form, are complicated and obscure. It is likely enough that chs. 13–23; 24–27; and, with modifications, 36–39 were complete and separate entities before they were incorporated in the book as we have it today, but how the materials in the other main sections were assembled in their present order we can sometimes only conjecture. One main principle of association would seem to have been "catchwords." E.g., 1:10-17 is clearly distinct from 1:2-9, but the one begins, as the other ends, with the mention of Sodom and Gomorrah. A similar catchword is the "woe" (six times) of ch. 5 (cf. 28:1; 29:1 [in Hebrew], 15; 30:1; 31:1; 33:1). Two other sets of consecutive passages begin: "In that day" (7:18, 20, 21, 23; 19:16, 18, 19, 23, 24). Chs. 13–23 consist of what must originally have been separate pieces; the majority of them now have in common an introductory: "The oracle concerning," which stands outside the poem proper. The Hebrew is משא (from a root "to lift up"—i.e., the voice) in the construct state. "Pronouncement on" perhaps better conveys the meaning to the modern reader, though some of these passages are oracular enough in the usual sense of the word.

b. Contents. The contents of chs. 1–39 may be grouped and summarized as follows:

Ch. 1: This contains some five (ERV) or more short poems, mostly denunciations but with some promises. The title (vs. 1), with its enumeration of "kings of Judah," must be postexilic. While most of the sections are presumably early, the description in vss. 7-9 best suits the conditions during Sennacherib's invasion. Unlike most prophetic oracles, vss. 2-9 are put in the mouth of the prophet, not Yahweh. Heaven and earth are called to hear Yahweh's verdict on his people's ingratitude. The description of the diseased body politic well illustrates the concept of corporate personality. Vss. 10-17 are related to the preceding by the figure of Sodom and Gomorrah, here examples of wickedness, there of destruction. Their theme is the futility of sacrifices (cf. Jer. 7:22-23; Hos. 6:6; 8:11-14; Amos 5:21-24; Mic. 6:6-8). The alternative to repentance is destruction (vss. 18-20). Vss. 27-31 are generally thought to be a later consolation, offsetting the preceding denunciations; this may well be, but we can no longer assume it. It is an oversimplification to suppose that the preexilic prophets were concerned only with judgment.

Chs. 2–12: The superscription 2:1 may refer to chs. 2–12, since the next heading is at 13:1, or it may refer only to 2:2-4. These verses are found with minor variations, and the addition of another verse, in Mic. 4:1-4. They may well have been anonymous, and the conception of Zion as a center of pilgrimage for all "nations" (Micah "peoples") is not otherwise attested until the Exile (see §§ B2*e*, 3*b*, below). The theme of 2:5-22 is the coming "day of Yahweh," which will spell doom for idolatry and human pride.

3:1-15 pronounces the doom of rapacious rulers. This is followed (3:16–4:1; cf. Amos 4:1-3) by denunciation of frivolous women whose love of luxury can only be satisfied as their consorts "grind the face of the poor." (The inventory of luxuries in vss. 18-23 is prose, probably later amplification.) 4:2-6 is descriptive of Zion, which has been purified by judgment. It is as near prose as a prophetic utterance can be. In thought and expression it reads as if it is later than Isaiah, but it is a fine example of the way the spirit of Isaiah continued to influence later generations.

The vineyard song, 5:1-7, viewed only as a poem, is a work of consummate art. It is evidently based on popular vintage songs (cf. 56:12) and begins with a quick movement (meter 3:2 and 2:2), which appropriately passes at vs. 4 into longer and heavier rhythm (3:3 and 2:2:2; see POETRY [HEBREW]). 5:8-24 contains a series of "woes" ("Shame . . . !") on the privileged classes, landowners who evict small farmers, drunkards, skeptics no longer capable of making moral distinctions, and venal judges. Their enormities will have inevitable consequences—"Therefore . . ." (vss. 13-24)—and the tragedy is that the crimes of those who are privileged must drag down all society in a common ruin. The concluding verses of ch. 5 (25-30) relate to the downfall of N Israel at the hands of Assyria and are best read as the conclusion of 9:8-21 (note the refrain at the end of vs. 25 and cf. 9:12, 17, 21).

The account of Isaiah's call (ch. 6) is autobiographical and is too well known to need description (see §§ A3*a-c above*). It is likely that vss. 9-13 are proleptic, colored by the prophet's experience of the obstinacy of his people.

Chs. 7–8 relate to the Syro-Ephraimitic invasion of 734 (see IMMANUEL; SHEAR-JASHUB; MAHER-SHALAL-HASH-BAZ). Ch. 7 is biographical, ch. 8 autobiographical.

9:1—H 8:23 is prose, a connecting link between the preceding pronouncement of doom and the messianic passage following (9:2-7—H 9:1-6, for which see § A3*f above*). 9:8-21—H 9:7-20, of which 5:25-30 (see above) is the conclusion, relates to the coming downfall of N Israel. It is presumably earlier than the fall of Samaria and may picture the dynastic struggles which preceded the final catastrophe. 10:1-4, notwithstanding that it concludes with the refrain:

> For all this his anger is not turned away > and his hand is stretched out still, has more in common with the "woes" of 5:8-23. It is directed against "those who decree iniquitous decrees . . . and rob the poor of my [Yahweh's] people" —i.e., Judah.

10:5-19 illustrates, as well as any passage in the OT, the Hebrew conviction that Yahweh is Lord of history. Its relevance for the present century is obvious. The Assyrians were an utterly ruthless military power. They are the unconscious instrument of Yahweh, a rod in his hand to chastise his own people. There is no criticism of them in chs. 7–8, but here their arrogance cries aloud for retribution. They have exceeded the bounds of their commission, but they are powerless to exceed the bounds of Yahweh's purpose. Vs. 12: "When the Lord has finished all his work on Mount Zion and on Jerusalem he will punish the arrogant boasting of the king of Assyria and his haughty pride," is probably secondary, but it sums up the situation as well as anything could. In 10:20-23 the conception of the remnant (see § A3*e above; see also* SHEAR-JASHUB; REMNANT SHALL RETURN) finds expression in both its aspects, of doom and of promise. The promise of deliverance from Assyria is closely related to vss. 5-19 and to the subsequent assurance to Hezekiah (37:6-7). The chapter concludes with a vivid description of an army (Assyrian[?] or Syro-Ephraimite; cf. 7:1-2) marching from N to S against Jerusalem.

Ch. 11 is a picture of the messianic age. For vss. 1-9 see § A3*f above*. They are more eschatological in tone than 9:2-7 and are remarkable for the conception of the sevenfold (cf. Rev. 1:4) spirit of Yahweh, which shall "rest" on the king as his permanent endowment, not "rush" upon him as in the earlier accounts of the "judges" (Judg. 14:6; I Sam. 10:6). The passage has contributed to later apocalyptic imagery (cf. vs. 4*b* with Rev. 1:16). The picture of the messianic age is continued in 11:10-16, which is almost certainly postexilic, and closes with two short hymns of thanksgiving (12:1-2, 3-6).

Chs. 13–23: These chapters are mainly concerned with foreign peoples and are similar to collections in Jer. 46–51; Ezek. 25–32. The heading משא ("Oracle" or "Pronouncement") occurs ten times in the section.

Although the "oracle concerning Babylon" (ch. 13) is said to be that "which Isaiah the son of Amoz saw" (vs. 1), it is almost certainly from a later time. The coming destruction is "near" (vs. 6), and the reference to the Medes (vs. 17) points to a date ca. 540. The taunt song against "Babylon" (14:4-21), which may here be a symbolic name, is a separate poem and is joined to the preceding by verses (14:1-3) which presuppose the Exile. The passages on the overthrow of Assyria (14:24-27) and the premature rejoicing of Philistia (14:28-32) are Isaianic.

The "oracle concerning Moab" (chs. 15–16) is full of obscurities, and parts of it (15:2-7; 16:6-11) are found also in Jer. 48:29-38. If the editorial note 16:13-14 is right, it may be that Isaiah made use of an earlier poem.

The "oracle concerning Damascus" (17:1-6) pronounces doom on both Syria and Ephraim. It is Isaianic, ca. 734, and should be read against the background of 7:1–8:4. 17:9-11 is directed against the widespread cult of ADONIS (TAMMUZ): "pleasant plants" (vs. 10) is better rendered "gardens for Adonis" (cf. ERV mg.); at least, this is what it means. The concluding verses of the chapter (12-14) sound like Isaiah but cannot be exactly dated.

Chs. 18–19 are "concerning Egypt" (19:1). The poetical sections (18:1–19:15) confirm the mean opinion Isaiah had of reliance upon Egypt (cf. 30:1-7; 31:1-3). The occasion may have been the establishment of the twenty-fifth (Ethiopian) dynasty (cf. 18:1), which attempted to revive the ancient glory of the country. 19:16-25 contains five prose passages beginning: "In that day." They are not from Isaiah, but they are unique in that they envisage a time when Egypt and Assyria, who had so long and so often been Israel's and each other's foes, will worship Yahweh together with Israel (vss. 23-25).

Ch. 20 is biographical and unlike anything else in chs. 13–23. Its place here is, no doubt, due to its community of subject with chs. 18–19.

Ch. 21 contains three pronouncements, on the "wilderness of the sea" (vss. 1-10), "Dumah" (vss. 11-12), and Arabia (vss. 13-16). The enigmatical "wilderness of the sea" (מדבר ים) can hardly be right. The LXX reads "wilderness" simply, and the first Qumran scroll has "words" (דברים). The original was perhaps "pronouncement on the wilderness." The passage, with its references to Elam and Media (vs. 2) and the fall of Babylon (vs. 9), recalls chs. 13–14 and dates from about the same time. For "Dumah" (vs. 11) the LXX reads "Edom," interpreting rightly, as the following "Seir" shows. "What of the night?" means either: "How much longer will the night last?" or perhaps: "What will follow the night?"

22:1-14 is a pronouncement on the "valley of vision." It obviously relates to Jerusalem, and the "valley" must have been somewhere in its vicinity, perhaps the Valley of Hinnom (cf. Jer. 7:31-34). The passage is in two parts (vss. 1-8*a*, 12-14), with connective verses (8*b*-11) in prose. Isaiah protests against the premature and reckless levity of the inhabitants of Jerusalem: they rely on their own resources without regard to Yahweh. The date that comes readiest to mind is 701 B.C., but another possibility is 711, when Sargon took Ashdod (cf. 20:1) and might have been expected to follow this with an attack on Jerusalem. 22:15-25 is an invective against Shebna, the major-domo of the palace, and an announcement that he will be replaced by Eliakim. The date must be prior to 701, since by then (cf. 36:3; 37:2) Eliakim was major-domo and Shebna subordinate to him.

The pronouncement on Tyre (ch. 23) foretells the doom of the seaports of Phoenicia. There were so many unsuccessful sieges of Tyre between the eighth century and its capture by Alexander the Great, that it is impossible to determine which of them Isa. 23 describes, or, it may be, anticipates. Tyre was, at the most, on the periphery of Isaiah's interest. The passage should be read in conjunction with the more elaborate Ezek. 26–28.

Chs. 24–27: These chapters have often been described as an "apocalypse," and they are more like apocalypse than anything else in the OT, with the exception of Dan. 7–12. But while they are certainly eschatological, they lack the differentiae of apocalypse proper—pseudonymity, symbolism, and the like (see APOCALYPTICISM § 2). Similar materials are found at the ends of other prophetical books (e.g., Isa. 63–66; Joel 3:9-21—H 4:9-21; Zech. 12–14). It is not obvious that the chapters are a unity: the eschatological passages are interspersed with some lovely lyrical passages (25:1-5, 9; 26:1-6), and it may be that the arrangement of the several pieces is on the principle of alternating woe and weal. Specially noteworthy is 25:7, which promises that Yahweh "will destroy" (lit., "swallow up") the "veil that is spread over all nations," this being followed (vs. 8) with words which have been taken up in part into Paul's "Death is swallowed up in victory" (I Cor. 15:54), and in part into the NT Apocalypse (Rev. 7:17). Note also 26:19, one of only two passages in the OT—the other is Dan. 12:2—in which the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead finds expression. No clear historical background is discernible for Isa. 24–27, and the general opinion is that the chapters are some of the latest in the OT.

Chs. 28–33: These are mainly Isaianic. They open with a "woe" against the "drunkards of Ephraim," which must be earlier than the fall of Samaria. But for the most part the contents are from the later period of Isaiah's ministry, when Judah was dallying with the Egyptian alliance (cf. 30:1-7; 31:1-3). Isaiah is scathing in his denunciation of the blindness and incompetence of the rulers of Jerusalem (28:14-15; 29:13-16), but he never wavers in his conviction that Yahweh's purpose for Zion was something which no folly of man could gainsay (28:16; 30:15), even though destruction should overwhelm all else (28:22). The concluding chapter (33) in this section reads like a prophetic liturgy, and it is probably from a time much later than Isaiah's.

Chs. 34–35: These contain two eschatological poems. The first (ch. 34) describes Yahweh's judgment "against all the nations" (vs. 2), with particular reference to "Edom" (vss. 5-6). The feud between Israel and Edom (Jacob and Esau) was of long standing and reached its height when the Edomites took advantage of their "brothers" in the catastrophe of 586 B.C. (cf. Ps. 137:7; Ezek. 35; Obad. 10-12). But it is likely that in the present context "Edom" is "typical" of those who are enemies of the Jews and thereby become the enemies of God. The well-known ch. 35 is in complete contrast to the preceding, and, in its descriptions of the desert become oasis and the highway back to Zion, has affinities to chs. 40–55.

Chs. 36–39: These historical narratives are parallel to II Kings 18:13–20:19, but omit II Kings 18:14-16 and insert the psalm of Hezekiah (Isa. 38:9-20). The section looks like an appendix similar to that which closes the book of Jeremiah (Jer. 52 is parallel to II Kings 24:18–25:30) and suggests that the book of Isaiah once closed with ch. 39.

2. Chs. 40–55. It is almost unanimously agreed that the historical background of at least chs. 40–48 is the Babylonian exile (sixth century B.C.). In chs. 56–66 the background appears to be Palestinian, though it reads more like Palestine after than before the Exile. Hardly anyone today denies that chs. 49–55 are from the author of chs. 40–48, notwithstanding that chs. 49–55 contain no references to Babylon. It is convenient to distinguish between chs. 40–55 and chs. 56–66, even if (as some hold) both sections are from the same author. The question is whether chs. 40–55(66) are "long-range" prophecy from the pen of the eighth-century Isaiah, or whether they come from an author or authors living during (40–55) and after (56–66) the Exile. A very few scholars believe that chs. 40–66, together, perhaps, with chs. 34–35, are a unity from ca. 400 B.C. This involves either deleting "Cyrus" in 44:28; 45:1, or regarding him as a "type."

a. Historical background. If the text of 44:28; 45:1 is sound and Cyrus is the historical CYRUS, king of Persia, it is clear that we must interpret chs. 40–48(55) against the background of the Exile, even if Isaiah of Jerusalem was their author. In 39:5-8 Isaiah is said to have predicted the Exile. In chs. 40–48 this has come about: the Jews have been despoiled (42:24-25) by the Babylonian-Chaldeans (47:6) in whose land they now are (48:20). Assyria, the world power in Isaiah's day, is not mentioned except as an oppressor in the undefined past (52:4). The Exile is represented as accomplished fact. Jerusalem and the temple appear to be in ruins but are to be built through the agency of Cyrus (44:26-28; cf. 45:13). Babylon is to be humiliated (43:14; 46–47). Release is coming to the Jews (40:1-11), and the overwhelming impression we receive is that it is coming soon (46:13; 51:5, 14).

b. Authorship. If chs. 40–55 had not been preserved as part of the "book of the prophet Isaiah," and we were left to determine from internal evidence when the (in that case) anonymous author lived and wrote, it is safe to assume that the answer would be that he wrote sometime between the rise of Cyrus and the fall of Babylon. This, indeed, is the normal "critical" opinion today. But to say so is, as some devoutly believe, to deny the inerrancy of the Bible, since in the NT Isa. 40:3 is cited as from "Isaiah the prophet" (Mark 1:2-3; though vs. 2*b* is actually from Mal. 3:1!). The belief that Isaiah was the author of the entire book that bears his name was current by the early part of the second century B.C., and was taken for granted in the NT (Matt. 12:17; Acts 8:30) and probably by Jesus himself. The question is whether there is reason to suppose that Jesus would, on a question of this kind, have voiced any other view than that which was current in his time, even if he had known there was a "Second Isaiah." He had something other to do than to instruct his generation in matters which had no relevance for them, however much they may exercise our minds today.

That prophecy, and, in particular, Isa. 40–55, contains a large element of prediction, is not in doubt. Nor are there wanting passages which predict the distant future (e.g., Isa. 2:2-4). But such passages are mostly brief and in general terms. A prophecy of sixteen consecutive chapters, giving a detailed account of what was to happen two centuries after it was written, would be unique in the prophetical writings, and it is difficult to see what purpose it could serve for Isaiah's contemporaries. Scholars who conclude that it dates from the sixth century B.C. are as devout and conscientious as those who believe it was written in the eighth, and they are equally persuaded that it is the "word of God." Their case rests finally upon 48:6-7:

> From this time forth I make you hear new things, > hidden things which you have not known.
> They are created now, not long ago;
> before today you have never heard of them.

If the passage was written by the eighth-century Isaiah, and if the "new things" relate to the time of Cyrus, it could not be said: "You have never heard of them," unless, of course, chs. 40–55 were "hidden" in the sense that they were not put into circulation but went "underground" for nearly two centuries, to be brought to light during the Exile. But the conception of "hidden things" as "sealed apocrypha" (cf. Dan. 8:26; 12:4, 9; Rev. 10:4; 22:10) is, so far as we have any evidence, considerably later than the time of the pre-exilic Isaiah (Isa. 8:16 does not refer to a sealed "book" but to oral "teaching").

*c. The author. Nothing is known of the author, who is generally referred to as Second Isaiah, or Deutero-Isaiah, occasionally the "Babylonian Isaiah." It is probable that he lived in Babylonia, though Palestine, and even the Lebanon or Egypt, have been suggested. His only reference to himself is in the LXX, Vulg., and first Qumran scroll reading of 40:6: "And I said" (cf. ERV mg.), but it is by no means certain that this was the original reading. It is likely enough that in the earlier part of his ministry the prophet was precluded from speaking in public; otherwise he might well have been silenced by the Babylonian authorities. But 55:1-5 reads like public proclamation, and it is easy to imagine that as Babylon fell, he was free to come into the open. He had no illusions about the "blindness" of his fellow exiles (cf. 42:18-25; 48:1-11), and it may well be that he encountered opposition from them (see on 45:9-13). It is not improbable that there is an autobiographical element in 50:4-9, and some have maintained that he was himself the Suffering Servant (in which case 49:1-6 will be autobiographical). This is improbable; but whoever the SERVANT OF THE LORD was, it would be surprising if something of the prophet's own experience had not contributed to the portrait of him.

*d. Structure. So long as chs. 40–55 were thought to come from the eighth-century Isaiah, it was assumed that they were part of a "written book," as, indeed, were all the prophetical writings. Not until the second decade of the present century did those even who assigned them to Second Isaiah begin seriously to think otherwise. There had been a growing recognition that the prophets were primarily "speakers" rather than writers and that the prophetical books as we have them are precipitates from the originally "spoken word." It was recognized that Second Isaiah bears more of the marks of a written composition than do, e.g., the utterances of Amos. But Second Isaiah's work is repetitive, and there is in it much overlapping. If he was a prophet, he must, it was urged, like his predecessors, have been himself a speaker. Accordingly, for a number of years, the dominant view has been that Deutero-Isaiah consists of some fifty originally independent pieces or poems delivered orally. How these pieces came to be related to one another in the order in which we have them, has been the subject of much discussion. One theory is that they were juxtaposed on the "catchword" or domino principle (see § B1*a above*): thus a passage beginning "Fear not" (feminine; 41:14) is placed after another ending "Fear not" (masculine; 41:13). Similarly, passages beginning "Hearken to me" (51:1, 7) and "Listen to me" (51:4), or "Awake, awake" (51:9; 52:1), and "Rouse yourself" (51:17), are found in near contexts. This principle of arrangement could be the prophet's own, but an arrangement so mechanical, if the suggestion is right, is more likely to be that of his disciples than of the master himself.

A closer inspection reveals that Isa. 40–55 is a shapely and orderly document, in which the several pieces are preserved in relatively logical and even chronological order. Thus, in chs. 40–48 the address is generally to Jacob-Israel, in chs. 49–55 to Zion-Jerusalem. Cyrus and Babylon are named in chs. 40–48, never in chs. 49–55. In chs. 40–48, but never in chs. 49–55, there are polemics against the idol-gods, summonses to assize-inquests, and appeals to the fulfilment of former prophecies. Of the references, implicit (first in 41:2, 25) and explicit (44:28; 45:1), to Cyrus, it is significant that Cyrus is not named until he is directly addressed, as if by that time there was no further need for anonymity and veiled allusions. All this points to the chapters' being in approximately chronological order.

There is reason to think that some of the short passages which have been supposed to be independent units, are really parts of longer poems. E.g., the four short pieces 40:1-2, 3-5, 6-8, 9-11, may have been composed separately, but together they were intended as a programmatic prelude to the whole work. Similarly, 41:1-16 is a unit (see § B2*e below;* the paragraph divisions in the RSV sometimes mark "strophes," as well as separate poems). A comparison of 42:10-17 with Pss. 96; 98; 149 makes it probable that the Isaiah passage is a unit, since no one proposes to divide the psalms into separate compositions.

At the other extreme from the "small-units" theory, it is thought by some that Isa. 40–55 is a poem, or series of poems, carefully arranged by Deutero-Isaiah himself. The difficulty of this theory is that no two scholars agree, or are ever likely to agree, on where the larger units begin and end. The truth probably lies somewhere between the two extremes. But the whole is sufficiently well arranged for us to say with some confidence that it bears the stamp of Deutero-Isaiah's own personality, and in it we can discern his theological conceptions in some logical sequence.

*e. Contents. The contents of chs. 40–55 may be grouped and summarized as follows:

Chs. 40–48: The prophecy opens (40:1-11) with a series of proclamations announcing Jerusalem's approaching deliverance from her "warfare" (RSV mg. "time of service"; cf. Job 7:1: "hard service").

Her guilt is pardoned, and it is as if she had served a double sentence. We are probably to understand that the prophet overhears announcements made in the divine assembly (cf. I Kings 22:19-22; Isa. 6). A herald gives orders for a processional highway to be prepared across the desert between Babylonia (presumably) and Jerusalem. Yahweh is coming in person, and all mankind is to witness his "glory." Then follows a passage in which all human "steadfastness" (RSV "beauty") is said to be as evanescent as the flower of the field, in contrast with the "word of our God," which "will stand for ever." Finally, Jerusalem is to announce to her daughter cities of Judah the imminent approach of Yahweh. He is bringing with him the exiles he has delivered, tending his flock with an arm both strong and tender.

The prelude over, the main themes are taken up. 40:12-31 describes Yahweh in a series of questions, some of them certainly, all of them probably, by Yahweh himself, as the Incomparable. He created the world without instruction or agency, either of man or of gods which are only fashioned by men. He is Lord of the nations and leader into battle of the starry hosts of heaven. From where he sits enthroned upon the overarching vault of the earth, the inhabitants of the world look as numerous, and as small, as grasshoppers. Yet no assurance of the creative might of God can bring relief to souls in anguish, and after all the weary years of exile Jacob-Israel feels that his "way" is hid from, and his "just right" disregarded by, God. He should know that the Creator, who faints not nor is weary, gives power to the faint and strength to those who, unlike himself (vs. 26), have none. Those who wait expectantly for Yahweh acquire fresh strength, strength that sustains them not only in heroic ventures that demand soaring flight or swift running, but also in the drudging walk of life: "They shall walk and not faint."

In 41:1-7 the nations are summoned to an assize-inquest to inquire who it is that has "stirred up one from the east whom victory meets at every step." The answer is that it is Yahweh, who controls history, "calling the generations [of mankind] from the beginning." The monotheistic formula: "I am He [than whom there is none other]" recurs several times in subsequent chapters. The victor from the E is, by general consent, Cyrus. Vss. 8-10 (note the adversative "but") are a continuation of what precedes. The coastlands "are afraid" (vs. 5), but Israel is not to fear (vs. 10; the verbs are the same in the Hebrew). Israel is called by Yahweh "my servant." Vss. 11-16 are a further continuation of the same theme, notwithstanding that in vss. 11-13 there is a change of meter (3:2 instead of 3:3), and in vss. 14-16 Jacob-Israel is addressed in the feminine (this is due to the word "worm," which is feminine; in vss. 15-16 the gender reverts to the masculine). The more violent Israel's enemies become, the less is their power to harm (vss. 11-13). Indeed, the despised and puny "worm" shall become a giant threshing sledge, capable of pulverizing mountains (vss. 14-16).

In 41:17-20 the theme of the processional highway (40:3-4) is amplified. The inhospitable desert will be abundantly supplied with water and adorned with forest trees. These, apparently, are not saplings, which are to be "planted" and must slowly grow to maturity; they are to be "placed" and will presumably be mature trees. The return from Babylon is to be a second and more wonderful exodus. Deutero-Isaiah has frequent allusions to the exodus from Egypt, and his thought is steeped in the hallowed traditions of his people.

41:21-29 is another unity. The nations have already been summoned to the bar of judgment (vs. 1). Now it is the turn of their gods. Can they foretell the future, or do they understand the significance of the "former things"? Let them do anything, either good or ill, and show at least some sign of life and animation! Yahweh declares that they are nothing at all. Herodotus relates that when Croesus of Lydia was forced to encounter Cyrus, he sent gifts to all the oracles of Greece that he might know the outcome of the campaign. He was told that he would destroy a great empire, but the oracles were careful not to say that it would be his own. In vss. 25-29 Yahweh asserts, as an example of his ability to determine the course of events, that it is he who has stirred up the conqueror from the NE. But when he looks for a like ability elsewhere, neither the heathen nor "these" (their gods) have anything to say.

For 42:1-4, see SERVANT OF THE LORD. 42:5-9 is thought by some to be either a separate Servant Song or a continuation of the preceding. As it stands, the "you" of vs. 6 is best understood as referring to the Servant (so RSV; cf. "a covenant to the people"). It is possible that the verses were originally addressed to Israel, that the subject of the infinitives in vs. 7 was Yahweh, and that the passage has been adapted as a follow-up to the song (the words "a light to the nations" [vs. 6] are not in the LXX or in the closely related Hebrew of 49:8; they may have been filled in from 49:6). The problem is a difficult one, and reference should be made to the commentaries. A striking feature of the passage is the "hymnic" introduction (vs. 5), in which the attributes of Yahweh are extolled in a series of participial relative clauses. This is characteristic of Deutero-Isaiah (cf. 43:1; 45:18; etc.).

Reference to Pss. 96; 98 indicates that 42:10-17 is a unity. The psalms begin with the summons to "sing to Yahweh a new song" and end with the announcement of his coming to judge the world. The Isaiah passage follows a similar pattern. The anthropomorphic figures of Yahweh as a berserk warrior (vs. 13) and a woman in travail (vs. 14) may strike the modern reader as bizarre, if not repellent. But in the context of the Exile they are not inappropriate. It is Yahweh's zeal for the helpless enslaved that moves him to speak so (cf. 59:15-18; 63:1-6). In the sequel, when Christ came, it was not to slay but to be crucified.

The last verses of ch. 42 (18-25) are uncompromisingly frank about the "blindness" of Yahweh's servant Israel. The prophet makes it clear that the disaster which had overtaken his people was due to their sins, not the inevitable fate of a small people in the path of a ruthless empire. 43:1-7, with its initial "But now," is a continuation of the preceding paragraph, and pictures the reversal of Israel's fortunes. Yahweh has "redeemed" (see REDEEM) Israel (the general sense of "redeemer" in Deutero-Isaiah is "protector"). Neither water nor fire can harm her, since God will be with her. He will gather his children ("my sons . . . and my daughters") from the four points of the compass, to which they have been driven. He alone is God (43:8-13), and the Israelites, notwithstanding that they are blind and deaf, are his witnesses to the nations, who are once more pictured as assembled in a world-wide court.

A comparison of the RSV rendering of 43:14 with the KJV and the ERV indicates that the meaning of the text is uncertain, but it is clear that disaster is to overtake Babylon. This is followed (43:15-21) by a reference to the disaster which overtook Egypt at the Red Sea. (The verb forms in vss. 16-17, most of them participles, should be translated by past tenses: "made," "brought forth," "lay down."). The wonders of the second exodus will even surpass those of the first, and the theme of "rivers in the desert" (cf. 41:18) is amplified by saying that even the wild creatures of the waste will join in honoring Yahweh.

The meaning of 43:22-24 is not that Israel had not offered sacrifices during the Exile—how could she?—but that the sacrifices she offered in the days of her independence were prompted by self-indulgence and did not honor Yahweh at all. Translate: "It was not upon me that you called . . . to the point of becoming weary of me." The references to "sheep" (KJV-ERV "small cattle") and "sweet cane" (cf. Jer. 6:20) seem derogatory. But Yahweh had not "burdened" (lit., "put to slave labor"; cf. Exod. 1:13) his people with offerings; on the contrary, they had burdened him with their sins. Nevertheless, it was his nature to "blot out" their rebellions, though they had first to endure heavy chastisement.

In 44:1-8 the reference to "water on the thirsty land" (vs. 3) does not refer to the watered desert of 41:18; 43:20, but to the outpouring of Yahweh's spirit for the increase of Israel's population, which may have become inadequate to ensure maintenance of the prosperity of the homeland. Vs. 5 seems to anticipate that Gentile proselytes will join themselves to Israel. 44:6-8 refers to what are now the familiar themes of Yahweh's sole deity and his ability to predict the future: the RSV rendering of vs. 7 is based upon a slight but widely accepted conjectural emendation.

The satire on the making of idols (44:9-20) is more elaborate than anything else of the kind in the prophecy. It is printed in the RSV as prose, but there are many traces of parallelism in it. It has often been thought to be a late insertion. This cannot be affirmed with confidence. Whoever the author may have been, the passage is based on accurate observation. "One log for fuel and deity"; it is ludicrous. Worse, it is stupid (vs. 19), a pathetic delusion (vs. 20).

44:21-23 is perhaps the original continuation of vs. 8; otherwise the reference to "these things" is obscure. These verses lead up to a further declaration (vss. 24-28) that Yahweh is the sole Creator and that Cyrus, now actually named, is the appointed agent to fulfil Yahweh's "purpose" to rebuild Jerusalem and the temple.

Ch. 45 is mainly concerned with Cyrus. Yahweh has already called him "my shepherd"—in the OT the word "shepherd," when used metaphorically, always refers to a ruler. Now he is addressed as his "anointed" (משיח, "messiah"), a word nowhere else used of a foreigner, who does not "know" Yahweh (vs. 4) and so is his unconscious instrument. Vss. 9-13 are probably addressed to Jews who might be scandalized that Yahweh should be said to employ a non-Israelite to carry out his purposes. It is possible that Cyrus is addressed in vs. 14—the pronoun suffixes for "you" can be read as masculine, without changing the consonantal text—but this cannot be regarded as certain. The chapter rises to a magnificent climax. God's creation is orderly (vs. 18), and his word is clear (vs. 19). All the ends of the earth are bidden to turn to him and be saved; such is the declared and unalterable purpose of him who is at once "a righteous God and a Savior."

Bel (Marduk) and Nebo (Nabu) in ch. 46 were the gods of Babylon and Borsippa respectively and were related in the Babylonian pantheon as father and son. They are contrasted, as gods which have to be carried on the backs of pack animals in a vain attempt to deposit them in safety, with Yahweh, who carries his people from birth to old age. They are incapable of self-movement, nor can they save their anguished devotees. Again the chapter closes with the assertion of Yahweh's sole deity and the accomplishment of his purpose through Cyrus, a "bird of prey from the east."

Ch. 47 is a "taunt song" (cf. 13:1–14:23) addressed to Babylon. She who had been the mistress of kingdoms will be degraded to a menial drudge. She has exceeded her commission by maltreating Yahweh's people. None of her enchanters or astrologers will be able to stave off her ruin.

Ch. 48 asserts that Yahweh long ago announced the disaster that would overtake Israel. This was in order that, when it came, Israel might have no occasion for attributing it to anything else but her own obstinacy. The passage is harsher in tone than anything else in the "prophet of consolation," and it has sometimes been thought that the original words of consolation have been expanded by an interlinear commentary of condemnation (vss. 1*b*, 2, 4, 5*b*, 7*b*, 8*b*-10). This view is not so common as it once was. Vss. 17-19 portray something almost like divine anguish in the face of Israel's obstinacy (cf. Luke 13:34). The chapter closes with a summons to leave Babylon (vss. 20-21), and the references to the first exodus are intended to inspire confidence in the equal safety of the second.

Chs. 49–55: Nearly all the leading ideas of Deutero-Isaiah find expression in the first half of his prophecy. What we find in chs. 49–55 is mostly amplification of them, with particular reference to Yahweh's purpose to rehabilitate Jerusalem.

49:1-6 is the second of the so-called Servant Songs (see SERVANT OF THE LORD). It is followed by verses which have much the same relation to it as 42:5-9 has to 42:1-4, but in this case the passage has even more clearly the marks of a declaration of the release and safe conduct of the returning exiles. Yahweh can less readily forget Zion than a mother can forget the child she has borne (vss. 14-16). The rebuilt city will be too small for its inhabitants (vss. 17-21). At Yahweh's signal the nations, led by kings and their consorts, will conduct Zion's children home with deference and even homage (vss. 22-23), and those who had tyrannized over them will in their panic consume one another in internecine war.

Chs. 50–54 contain two songs of the Servant of the Lord: 50:4-9(11); 52:13–53:12. For the rest the chapters are mainly concerned with the rehabilitation of Zion-Jerusalem. In 50:1-3; 52:1-2; 54 the city is pictured as the "wife" of Yahweh. This figure is not uncommon in the OT (cf. Jer. 2:2; Ezek. 16; Hos. 2) and is continued in the NT in the conception of the church (Eph. 5:25-27) or the new Jerusalem (Rev. 21:2, 9) as the bride of Christ. After all they had endured of separation from their homeland, Yahweh's people might conclude that he had formally divorced their mother (cf. Deut. 24:1) or sold them (her children) to some creditor (cf. Exod. 21:7; II Kings 4:1; Neh. 5:5, 8; Matt. 18:25). The meaning of 50:1, which is correctly translated in the RSV (contrast KJV), is that Yahweh has not given Zion any bill of divorce, and to think of him as having any creditors is preposterous. On the contrary, the Exile was consequent to his people's sins (vs. 2).

In the well-known final chapter (55) the gifts of God are as ex gratia and as universal as anywhere in the Bible. Vss. 3-4 are sometimes interpreted as an assurance that the Davidic monarchy will be restored. Another and more probable interpretation is that the covenant with David will now be remade with the people as a whole (the pronouns "you" and "your" in vs. 3 are plural in the Hebrew). At the same time it is urged that delay in accepting the proffered grace may be fatal (vss. 6-7). Yahweh's "thoughts" and "ways" are not as the thoughts and ways of men (vss. 8-9). His "word" and purpose will as assuredly be fulfilled as that rain and snow fructify the earth (vss. 10-11). The prophecy concludes on the same note as that with which it began. We should judge that the liberation edict of Cyrus (cf. Ezra 1:1-4) had not yet been published. The closing sentence may be rendered: "It shall be to Yahweh for a memorial, an everlasting inscription which shall never be effaced," as though the way back through the desert is to be kept in perpetuity as a commemorative park.

f. Interpretation. The conclusion of the preceding paragraph raises the question whether the exuberant language of the prophet is to be taken literally, or whether it is only so much poetic hyperbole. Did he expect the journey back to Palestine to be effected in the wonderful way he describes? And, if he did, must we set him down as a deluded enthusiast? Was he, in fact, a poet-prophet of the sixth century? Or was he a poet of ca. 400 whose imagery need not be taken literally? If he was the former, it may be argued that if events did not happen as he expected, his "theology" has no firm foundation.

It is hardly necessary to say that there was no "return" from exile on the scale and in the miraculous way Deutero-Isaiah expected. Indeed, there does not appear to have been any considerable return until the time of Ezra (ca. 400 B.C.). The evidence of Haggai and Isa. 56–66 is that conditions in Jerusalem were depressing until Nehemiah rebuilt the walls (444 B.C.). The "glory of the LORD" was not revealed with the immediacy and fulness the prophet seems to have expected.

This, however, is not to discredit Deutero-Isaiah. The matter may be expressed in this way: Deutero-Isaiah is the last of the great prophets, and in his message we see the culmination of revelation which may be said to have begun through Moses and was intensified in the prophets, particularly Isaiah, of the eighth century. It is as if the Prophet of the Exile reached the crest of a range looking out over a wide prospect to the coming of Christ (see SERVANT OF THE LORD). The NT gospels take their cue from the "evangelist of the OT" (Mark 1:1-3 and parallels), and Christ, as it has been said, "served himself heir" to the mission of the Servant. But the vision of any great prophet is "foreshortened." He sees the distant as near and depicts it in outlines of amazing clarity. And a prophet, like any artist, must depict what he sees in a medium (in this case poetry) suitable to his theme and in the idiom of his time. Deutero-Isaiah was steeped in the traditions of his people, and his descriptions of salvation were inspired by the epic of the Exodus, which in the course of the centuries had come to have all the radiance of "salvation history." Had there been no NT sequel, we might have had to say that the prophet's theology had little foundation to sustain it. As it is, in the context of Scripture as a whole, it is right to say that his message has been "transfigured" and that its basic conceptions are authenticated.

g. Theology. It is permissible to speak of the "theology" of Deutero-Isaiah, notwithstanding that it is not systematically formulated. All his thinking is determined by his conception of Yahweh as the sole Creator of the universe, Lord of history, Savior of Israel his chosen people and, indeed, of all mankind. His whole outlook is theocentric. Yet there is no trace in it of pantheistic monism. Yahweh is represented as saying: "I am He [than whom there is none other]." This is in marked contrast with the Vedantic philosophy, which says to man: "That art thou [than which there is nought else]." Yet Yahweh's care and concern for the world did not cease when he had created it. There is, of course, no hint of the modern concept of "continuous creation," but Yahweh is said to have "created" Israel (43:1, 7, 15), and the word is used even of contemporary happenings (41:20). This is as far removed from a stark or abstract theism as it is from pantheism: in the "berserker rage" passage (42:13-14) something like anguish is attributed to Yahweh. Whoever the perfect Servant of the Lord may have been, suffering is the means by which he fulfils his mission. The range of verbs and nouns which the prophet uses to describe Yahweh's relation to the Israel he "loves" (43:4) is very wide: he is Savior, Redeemer, King, Shepherd; he calls, chooses, strengthens, and takes by the hand. The most obvious link with proto-Isaiah is the conception of Yahweh as the "Holy One of Israel" (thirteen times in Proto-, eleven in Deutero-Isaiah). The expression is infrequent outside the book of Isaiah, and Isaiah was the first to use it. But there is a difference in emphasis between the two prophets: in Proto-Isaiah the major emphasis is upon Yahweh as judge (1:4; 5:19, 24; etc.); in Deutero-Isaiah it is always upon his saving power and protection.

3. Chs. 56–66. This section of Isaiah presents problems of which there is so far no agreed solution.

The divergencies of view may be briefly indicated. A small minority of scholars believe that chs. 40–66, together with, perhaps, chs. 34–35, are from one author. Others think that chs. 56–66 are not from Deutero-Isaiah. Of them, some think they are a unity, by a disciple of Deutero-Isaiah; others, the majority, that they are from several authors, most of whom were disciples of Deutero-Isaiah. In either case, "Trito-Isaiah" is a convenient designation.

a. Authorship and date. The general background is Palestinian, and it is arguable that some parts at least could be pre-exilic (e.g., 57:1-13 is very much in the vein of Ezek. 16; 23). On the other hand, passages like chs. 60–62 are so like Deutero-Isaiah that if they had been included in chs. 40–55, there would be little disposition to doubt that they are his. It has often been argued that the references to the temple (56:5, 7; 60:7) and the walls of Jerusalem (60:10) are proof that the temple had been rebuilt but that the walls had not. This would indicate a date between 516 and 444. But what is said about the temple may be in expectation of the future rather than description of the present, very much as 62:6 must be anticipation of the rebuilding of the walls, if the chapters are a unity and the walls had not yet been built. In 63:7–64:11 the temple is in ruins, from which we must suppose that the passage dates from shortly after 586, unless—which is questionable—disaster had befallen the 516 temple.

On the whole, chs. 56–66 are not so clearly a unity as are chs. 40–55. Even in chs. 60–62, which are so like Deutero-Isaiah, there are significant differences of emphasis: e.g., in 62:11 there is obvious literary affinity to 40:10, but instead of "Behold, the Lord Yahweh comes," we have: "Behold, your salvation comes," as if studiously to avoid the idea, so prominent in chs. 40–55, of Yahweh's triumphal march in person; similarly, "Prepare the way of Yahweh" (40:3) becomes: "Prepare the way for the people" (62:10).

The broad difference of emphasis between chs. 56–66 and chs. 40–55 is this: in chs. 40–55 Yahweh is coming to the immediate help of his people, and it is they who need to be roused from their hopelessness and despondency; in chs. 56–66 it is Yahweh who seems reluctant, while the people clamor for his coming; passages like

> O that thou wouldst rend the heavens and come down
> (64:1);
>
> We look for justice, but there is none, > for salvation, but it is far from us > (59:11);
>
> Give him no rest > until he establishes Jerusalem would sound out of place in chs. 40–55.
> (62:7)

The probable solution of the problem of chs. 56–66 is that which is most widely favored—namely, that "Trito-Isaiah" is from a number of authors who were in the tradition of Deutero-Isaiah. In that case the several pieces may date from various times between 538 and 444 or even later. 63:7–64:12 is similar in tone to Lamentations and may date from early in the Exile. For the rest, it is difficult to assert with confidence dates before or after the period 520 (Haggai-Zechariah) to 516 (dedication of the second temple). Earlier "Trito-Isaiah" critics were inclined to a date not long before Nehemiah (444) and interpreted passages like 65:1-7; 66:1-4 as polemic against the Samaritans; but little is known in detail about the Samaritan Schism. More recently the tendency has been to favor dates ca. 516. This would account better for the close similarities between Trito- and Deutero-Isaiah. It must be admitted that the history of the Jewish community in the first half of the fifth century is very obscure.

Trito-Isaiah shares with Deutero- and Proto-Isaiah the emphasis upon Yahweh as the "Holy One of Israel" (60:9, 14; cf. 57:15). We are to think of the eighth-century Isaiah as having created a tradition which continued to be a living and potent force for some three centuries.

b. Contents. The emphasis upon the ordinances of religion in 56:1-8 is almost wholly foreign to the chapters preceding. There is no mention of the sabbath in Deutero-Isaiah. Here, to keep the sabbath and to refrain from doing evil are in parallel clauses. Justice (משפט) and righteousness (צדקה) have many nuances in Deutero-Isaiah; in this context they have a cultic-legal flavor. The passage is an assurance to foreign proselytes and (Jewish) eunuchs that if they hold fast by Yahweh's covenant, they shall have equal access to Yahweh in his temple with born and unmutilated Jews. In this there is something of the catholicity of Deutero-Isaiah, and the verses appear to be a protest against an exclusiveness which became all too common in postexilic times.

56:9–57:13 is a scathing invective against corrupt religious leaders (56:9–57:2) and licentious nature-worship (57:3-13). It could well be pre-exilic, but there is insufficient reason to suppose that the practices condemned did not persist after the Exile. The remaining verses of ch. 57 are entirely in the spirit of Deutero-Isaiah. The transcendent God dwells with the man "who is of a contrite and humble spirit." This paradox is expressed with a simplicity that makes it sound entirely natural. It is not said that God in spite of his holiness dwells with the lowly and meek, but that he "dwells" (so the Hebrew) in eternity and with the lowly and meek.

There is evidence that during the Exile regular fasts were observed (Zech. 7:1-7; 8:18-19). There is always danger that statutory religious observances can come to lack sincerity. From Isa. 58:1-12 it appears that fasting made people quarrelsome and that on fast days they engaged in business (vs. 3 RSV mg.) and bullied their workers. The prophet is bidden to ask them whether they can properly call this fasting. This denunciation of social unrighteousness is entirely in the spirit of the pre-exilic prophets. In 58:13-14 the sabbath is to be treated as holy ground, a day when business is to be put aside (vs. 13 RSV mg.). The passage is brief but has the same moral fervor as the preceding.

The theme of ch. 59 is that Yahweh's delay in coming to the help of his people is not due to inability on his part but to their sins. A vivid description of these is followed by a community lament and confession. Finally, Yahweh himself takes the initiative and intervenes, coming in judgment like a pent-up stream (vs. 19 ERV mg.). He will come as Redeemer (so RSV rightly, as against KJV). There is no thought of incarnation, but in the light of the NT sequel the interpretation of the KJV has a certain justification and even inevitability.

The general similarity of chs. 60–62 to Deutero-Isaiah has already been noted. The section can be divided into three parts according to the present chapter divisions. Ch. 60 opens with a magnificent description of the sunrise glory of Yahweh upon Jerusalem while the rest of the world still lies in darkness. The nations are attracted to the brightness and themselves bring back the exiles. The Holy City shall be mistress of the nations; foreigners will rebuild her walls, and their kings be her servants. The material and moral prosperity of Zion will be without precedent. There will be no more need of sun and moon, because Yahweh will be her everlasting light (cf. Rev. 21:23).

The opening verses of ch. 61 were read by Jesus in the synagogue at Nazareth at the beginning of his ministry (Luke 4:16-20), with the significant omission of the words "and the day of vengeance of our God." They have sometimes been taken as a Servant Song, but it is more probable that the speaker is the prophet. The rest of the chapter is very similar to the chapter preceding. A glorious future awaits the Jews, who are collectively to exercise the same priestly functions in the world-wide community of the people of God as the priests exercise toward lay Israelites.

62:1-5 reverts to the theme of Zion as the bride of Yahweh (cf. 50:1-2; 54; see BEULAH). For the meaningless "your sons" (vs. 5) read, with only a vowel change, "your builder"—i.e., Yahweh. Yahweh will station watchmen on the walls of Jerusalem to remind him continually of his promise to make the city a "praise in the earth" (vs. 7).

The dramatic poem 63:1-6 has literary affinities with 59:15-20; 61:2, and recalls the figure of the berserk warrior of 42:13. Antiphonal voices are heard. The first must be that of the prophet; the second is the voice of Yahweh, solitary, and mighty in power and salvation. The words: "I have trodden the wine press alone" (vs. 3) have sometimes in the language of devotion been interpreted of Christ's agony on the Cross. This was not the intention of the writer. Nevertheless, in the light of the sequel, it has a measure of justification (see on 42:13).

63:7–64:12 is one of the most moving passages in the OT. It is a community lament, in which appeal is made to Yahweh's steadfast love manifested in the past history of his people. The words "in all their affliction" should be joined to the end of 63:8, and vs. 9 should be translated: "It was neither envoy nor messenger, but his own presence [lit., 'face'] that saved them" (cf. Exod. 33:14). This is supported by the parallelism and by the LXX, and is even closer to the MT. "In all their affliction he was afflicted" is hardly normal OT doctrine, though there are approximations to it in passages like Isa. 42:13-14. The whole is an impassioned appeal to Yahweh to come to the deliverance of his people. The passage is significant in that twice in it the spirit of Yahweh is called "his holy Spirit" (elsewhere in the OT only Ps. 51:11—H 51:13), and it is often noted that there is a measure of hypostatization in the conception of the Spirit (cf. "They . . . grieved his holy Spirit"; one cannot "grieve" an abstract quality).

The difference between the RSV and KJV translations of 65:1 should be noted. The former is correct: "I was ready to be found by those who did not seek me." God is ready to be found, but he is not found by those who will not trouble to seek him. This is appropriately followed by a denunciation of ghoulish worship. Yet God will not destroy the whole people (vss. 8-10), though destruction awaits those who deliver themselves over to gods like Gad ("luck") and Meni ("fate"; vss. 11-12). The chapter concludes with descriptions of a new creation and the long life of those who shall live in the redeemed community.

The concluding chapter (66) moves between the two poles of judgment and salvation. The most natural interpretation of the first paragraph is that it dates from ca. 520 and is a protest against temple and sacrifice as such. However this may be, the verses are the clearest foreshadowing in the OT of the dominical word: "God is spirit, and those who worship him must worship in spirit and truth" (John 4:24).

In conclusion, although on a first reading chs. 56–66 seem uneven in quality and hardly on the same level of inspiration as Deutero-Isaiah, the oftener they are read the more are they seen to contain some of the unforgettable passages in the OT.

4. Text. The text of Isaiah has, on the whole, been well preserved; indeed, a glance at the footnotes to Kittel's Biblica Hebraica is sufficient to indicate that it presents fewer problems than do the majority of the other prophetical writings. Even before the discovery of the DEAD SEA SCROLLS, the attitude of scholars toward the text was already becoming markedly more conservative than it had been at the beginning of the present century (see TEXT, OT). If a passage appears to be seriously corrupt and the versions provide no solution, it is now widely agreed that purely conjectural emendation is of little value. There is always the possibility that a passage which has defied interpretation may become clear as knowledge of the languages cognate with Hebrew increases (e.g., the word עָשִׁיר, "rich," in 53:9 has long been a puzzle, and it has been usual to emend it to עָשֵׁי רַע, "evil doers"; but it now appears that it is cognate with Arabic ġuthrᵘⁿ, "rabble" or "dregs" [of humanity], of which it is a sound philological equivalent). There are two Dead Sea Scrolls of Isaiah. One (1QIs^{a}) is complete, and the other (1QIs^{b}) fragmentary. MS b is almost word for word the same as the MT. MS a has many readings different from those of the MT, and although some few of them may be superior, the majority are only differences of orthography. The two Dead Sea MSS go to show that the MT was substantially fixed by the beginning of the Christian era—a conclusion which few would have dared assert with confidence before the discovery of the scrolls.

Bibliography. Commentaries on the whole book: B. Duhm, Das Buch Jesaia übersetzt und erklärt (4th ed., 1922), first separated the Servant Songs and assigned chs. 56–66 to Trito-Isaiah; free with the text but still valuable. J. Skinner, The Cambridge Bible (2 vols.; rev. ed., 1925). F. Feldmann, Das Buch Isaias übersetzt und erklärt, Exegetisches Handbuch zum AT, 14 Bd. (2 vols.; 1925-26). G. A. Smith, The Book of Isaiah (2 vols.; 2nd ed., 1927). J. Fischer, Das Buch Isaias übersetzt und erklärt, Die Heilige Schrift des ATs, VII Bd. (2 vols.; 1939). E. J. Kissane, The Book of Isaiah (2 vols.; 1941-43).

Commentaries on chs. 1-39: G. B. Gray, ICC (1912), for chs. 1-27 only. O. Procksch, Jesaia I übersetzt und erklärt, KAT, Bd. IX.1 (1930). R. B. Y. Scott, Introduction and Exegesis of Isa. 1-39, IB, V (1956), 151-381.

Commentaries on chs. 40-55(66): R. Levy, Deutero-Isaiah (1925). C. C. Torrey, The Second Isaiah: A New Interpretation (1928), takes chs. 34-35; 40-66 as a unity dating ca. 400. P. Volz, Jesaia II übersetzt und erklärt, KAT, Bd. IX.2 (1932). J. Muilenburg, Introduction and Exegesis of Isa. 40-66, IB, V (1956), 381-773.

Special studies: H. Gressmann, "Die literarische Analyse Deuterojesajas," ZAW, XXXIV (1914), 254-97. L. Köhler, Deuterojesaja (Jesaja 40-55) stilkritisch untersucht, BZAW, vol. XXXVII (1923). K. Elliger, Deuterojesaja in seinem Verhältnis zu Deuterojesaja, BWANT, 4 Folge, Heft 11 (1933). L. Glahn and L. Köhler, Der Prophet der Heimkehr (1934). J. Begrich, Studien zu Deuterojesaja, BWANT, 4 Folge, Heft 25 (1938). J. Lindblom, Die Jesaja Apocalypse Jes. 24-27 (1938). S. Smith, Isaiah Chapters XL-LV: Literary Criticism and History (1944). M. Burrows, ed., The Dead Sea Scrolls of St. Mark's Monastery, vol. I (1950).

The standard Introductions to the OT may also be consulted, especially those of S. R. Driver, Bentzen, Eissfeldt (2nd ed., 1956), Oesterley and T. H. Robinson, Pfeiffer, Sellin (8th ed., ed. L. Rost; 1950), and Weiser (2nd ed., 1949).

See also bibliographies under IMMANUEL; SERVANT OF THE LORD.

C. R. NORTH

ISAIAH, ASCENSION OF. A pseudepigraph, a combination of three earlier sources: the Martyrdom of Isaiah (Jewish) and the Testament of Hezekiah and the Vision of Isaiah (both Christian). Origen (third century) and IV Baruch (second or third century) both refer to the death of Isaiah by being sawed in two, in a manner to indicate acquaintance with the Martyrdom. Justin Martyr, Tertullian, and the Talmud (see also Heb. 11:37) testify to the early currency of the legend, if not of the book itself. External testimony to the existence of the Testament as a separate work is given by Cedrenus (beginning of the twelfth century), who cites 4.12 as being from the Testament of Hezekiah. Still earlier, a fifth- or sixth-century Greek Amherst papyrus contains 2.4-4.4, comprising parts of both the Martyrdom and the Testament.

A Vision of Isaiah is included in the Montfaucon list of apocryphal books based on MSS from the tenth century and later. A Latin text, printed in 1522 from a MS now lost, and reprinted by Gieseler in 1832, contains the Vision alone, as does the Slavonic version, which gives the title, the Vision of Isaiah. Latin fragments from the fifth or sixth century contain part of the Martyrdom (2.4-13) and of the Vision (7.1-19). The Vercelli Acts of Peter 24 (ca. A.D. 200) quotes a prophecy concerning the birth of Jesus which may be from 11.14 of the Vision. Jerome cites 11.34 from an Ascension of Isaiah, and Epiphanius quotes two different passages from the same work, saying that it was used by the Hieracites and by the Archontics, two early-fourth-century heresies. The complete text of the Ascension, so-named, is in the Ethiopic version, first published by Laurence in 1819, and later, in 1877, by Dillmann. A twelfth-century Greek MS (published by Gebhardt in 1878) contains the entire work, but in an abbreviated and rearranged form. Referred to as the Greek Legend, it seems to reflect the tripartite origin of the Ascension, since it describes the work as the prophecy, apocalypse, and martyrdom of Isaiah.

The Martyrdom was probably written in Hebrew or Aramaic, then translated into Greek. The rest was originally in Greek. The Ethiopic, Latin, and Slavonic go back to Greek texts. The latter two do not have 11.2-22, a somewhat Docetic account of Jesus' birth, but this may be an omission for doctrinal reasons. The text throughout is corrupt, but for the most part the corruptions are of a minor character.

The patristic and textual data, as well as internal evidence, seem to support the identification by Charles of the several sources, with some editorial redactions: the Martyrdom of Isaiah in 1.1-2*b*, 6*b*-13*a;* 2.1-3.12 (save for the mention of the ascension of Jesus in 2.9); and in 5.2-14; the Testament of Hezekiah in 3.13*b*-4.18; and the Vision of Isaiah in 6.1-11.40. The redactions are 1.2*b*-6*a* (an introduction to the whole work); 1.13*a;* a phrase in 2.9; 3.13*a;* 4.19-5.1*a,* 15-16; 11.41-43 (a conclusion).

1. The Martyrdom of Isaiah. This is a Jewish midrash of II Kings 21:16, which summarizes Manasseh's evil deeds. Accordingly, Isaiah makes certain dire predictions concerning Manasseh, the servant of Beliar-Sammael, who will climax his evil deeds by having Isaiah sawed in two. Belchira, a false prophet, speaking for Beliar-Sammael, tempted Isaiah by offering him freedom and the reverence of Manasseh, the princes, and the people if he would say that his prophecies were lies. Isaiah resisted this temptation, and, upheld by the Holy Spirit, died bravely.

As previously noted, the manner of Isaiah's death became a part of both Jewish and Christian tradition. Isaiah's temptation shows some similarities—but this is all—to that of Jesus. The work may be pre-Christian, but more probably belongs to the first century A.D.; it is certainly no later than the early second century.

2. The Testament of Hezekiah. Here (3.13*b*-4.18) is a Christian apocalypse purporting to be a vision of Isaiah's which he related to Hezekiah. Isaiah briefly predicts the descent of the Beloved (Christ) from the seventh heaven, his incarnation, the Twelve, the fact that he taught, his tortures by the Jews and his crucifixion, the Twelve being offended by him, the watch at the tomb, the Resurrection, his commission to the Twelve to teach all nations about the Crucifixion and the Resurrection, and his ascension to the seventh heaven.

Next, and still briefly, Isaiah prophesies about the early church (the "plant") and the working of the Holy Spirit. However, with the approach of the Second Advent there will be much falling away; the leaders, elders, and shepherds will be lawless and contentious, as will be many believers. There will be a decrease of true prophets, and the prophets of the OT will be ignored.

Then Beliar, the Satanic ruler of this world, will descend from his place in the firmament, assuming the form of the lawless royal matricide (i.e., Nero). He will persecute the church and will put one of the Twelve (Peter?) to death. Acting and speaking like the Beloved, he will perform miracles. Calling himself God, he will place his image in the cities so that people can worship and sacrifice to him. Many Christians will follow him; those who are faithful (including some who knew Jesus personally) will go to the desert to await the Beloved's return. Beliar-Nero (both an ANTICHRIST and a pseudo Christ) will hold sway three years, seven months, and twenty-seven days (the 1,335 days of Dan. 12:12).

The Lord will then return with his army of angels and holy ones; he will defeat Beliar and his hosts, dragging them into Gehenna. A messianic reign of unstated duration will follow; it will be shared by the godly who are still alive and by the saints who have gone to the seventh heaven (a first resurrection). After this messianic period the righteous will ascend to the seventh heaven, clothed in spiritual bodies ("garments") in place of their earthly bodies. A rebuke of the visible world ruled over by Beliar will precede a second resurrection and judgment of the godless, whom the Beloved will annihilate by fire. Presumably, though this is not stated, he then will return to the seventh heaven.

This little apocalypse has a Neronic Antichrist passage resembling that in Rev. 13 (see also Mark 13; II Thess. 2:1-12). The eschatological pattern is also remarkably similar: the destruction by Christ of the Antichrist and his armies, the first resurrection of the righteous only who share in a messianic interim, a second resurrection and judgment, and the destruction of the wicked by fire. The differences, it would seem, preclude the dependence of one upon the other; they both reflect the same Christian tradition. Unlike Revelation, the Testament has the final dwelling of the righteous in the seventh heaven; also, the resurrected (as in Paul and II Enoch) have spiritual, not physical, bodies.

There are also some striking similarities to the Matthean account of the Crucifixion and the Resurrection, with the offense of the Twelve, the guard at the tomb, and the postresurrection commission to the disciples. However, in the light of marked differences from the canonical gospels, it is possible that here again there is a common dependence upon Christian traditions.

The Testament has been dated as early as A.D. 68. This may well be too early. However, the statement that there would be some who knew Jesus living at the time of his second advent, together with the resemblances to Revelation, might indicate a late-first-century or early-second-century date. The simple church organization, with elders, shepherds, and a diminishing number of prophets, indicates a similar period, as does the blame placed upon the Jews alone for the crucifixion of Jesus. The complete silence concerning Paul (even though Peter's martyrdom is mentioned) may indicate a time prior to the publication of Acts and of Paul's letters, or to an early-second-century period when Paul was in eclipse.

3. The Vision of Isaiah. The Vision (6.1–11.40) is the longest source. It shows similarities in language to the Testament, but is more Gnostic than apocalyptic, with the Beloved a kind of Gnostic redeemer rather than an apocalyptic messiah.

Isaiah had a vision in which he left his earthly body and was taken up into the seventh heaven by an angelic guide. The seventh heaven was the abode of God, the Beloved, and the Holy Spirit, as well as the righteous dead from the time of Adam (however, other righteous dead are in Sheol), clothed in their spiritual bodies. He was shown the garments (spiritual bodies), crowns, and thrones that were reserved for the believers when they reached the seventh heaven. Sammael (also called the Adversary) dwelt in the firmament and controlled the earth, which, like physical bodies, seemingly is evil.

Isaiah heard God bidding the Lord Christ to descend to the earth, and also to the lower regions. In his descent he assumed the form of the angels of each heaven, and of the firmament and air as well, thereby disguising himself.

A birth narrative, somewhat Docetic in nature, is then presented. The Virgin Mary is with child, but, because of a visit by the angel of the Spirit (the Holy Spirit), Joseph does not put her away. Two months after her marvelous conception Mary looked and saw a babe and was astonished, for she had no pain, nor were there any visible signs of a birth. She reared the child without revealing who he was. When he was grown, he performed signs and miracles (nothing is said about his teaching). The Adversary caused the Jews to deliver him to the king to be crucified. The Beloved then descended to Sheol; next, after the third day he arose, remained on earth for a time (in 9.16 for 545 days), and commissioned the Twelve. He then ascended to the seventh heaven, and seated himself at the right hand of the Great Glory, with the Holy Spirit at God's left. Isaiah is assured that in the last days he (and presumably others of the righteous) will go to the seventh heaven to receive their heavenly garments.

A Gnostic movement (possibly Ophite) described by Irenaeus in his Against Heresies I.30 provides the best parallel for the Vision. Following an account of an elaborate Gnostic myth, it is stated that the preexistent Christ descended from the seventh heaven to earth, disguising himself in the form of the residents of each heaven on entering it. In the meantime a certain Jesus, born of a Virgin, was prepared to be the pure receptacle for the descended Christ. Christ, then, united with Jesus, possibly at the time of baptism, thus forming Jesus Christ. Many of the disciples were unaware of his true identity. He began to work miracles, to heal, and to announce the unknown "Father." When the "powers" decided to destroy him, Christ departed from Jesus, who then was crucified. However, Christ assisted Jesus in rising from the dead; this was a spiritual, not a physical, resurrection, so that his disciples at first did not recognize him. He remained on earth eighteen months (cf. the 545 days in Vision 9.16), he received knowledge, and he taught some of his disciples the great mysteries. He was then received into heaven, where he sat down at the right hand of Ialdabaoth. Here he would receive those who had known Jesus Christ, after they had put off their earthly bodies of flesh.

The Vision seems to be a modification of this Gnostic scheme—lacking, of course, its fantastic mythology and its extreme Gnosticism. If so, this would tend to place the Vision in the latter part of the second century. There are some similarities between the birth story of the Vision and that in Ign. Eph. 19 (first part of first century), and of the Infancy Gospel of James 19 (late second century). The possible citation of the Vision in the Vercelli Acts of Peter 24 (ca. 200) fits in with the other data.

It is quite evident that the Ascension as a whole was in circulation by the beginning of the fourth century; it may well have been compiled earlier, but where or by whom is unknown. The suggestion that Hieracas, a heretic in Egypt at the beginning of the fourth century, was the redactor is plausible, but is without any proof. If the component sources are as early as is generally supposed, then the work deserves more attention than it has usually received.

Bibliography. G. Beer, "Das Martyrium Jesajae," in Kautzsch, Die Apokryphen und Pseudepigraphen des Alten Testaments (1900), II, 119-27. R. H. Charles, The Ascension of Isaiah (trans. from the Ethiopic Version, which, together with the New Greek Fragment, the Latin Versions, and the Latin Translation of the Slavonic Version, is here published in full; 1900). J. Fleming, "Himmelfahrt des Jesaja," in Hennecke, Handbuch zu den Neutestamentlichen Apokryphen (1904), pp. 323-31 (Introduction and critical notes). R. H. Charles, "The Martyrdom of Isaiah," The Apoc. and Pseudep. of the OT (1913), II, 155-62. R. H. Charles and G. H. Box, The Ascension of Isaiah (1919; trans. by Charles, Introduction by Box). V. Burch, "The Literary Unity of the Ascensio Isaiae," JTS, XX (1919), 17-23; "Material for the Interpretation of the Ascensio Isaiae," JTS, XXI (1920), 249-65. J. Flemming and H. Duensing, "Die Himmelfahrt des Jesaja," in Hennecke, Neutestamentlichen Apokryphen (2nd ed., 1924), pp. 303-14 (German translation). A. L. Davies, "Ascension of Isaiah," in Hastings, Dictionary of the Apostolic Church, I (1915-18), 99-102.

M. Rist

ISAIAS ī zā′əs. Douay Version form of Isaiah.

ISCAH ĭz′kə [יסכה] (Gen. 11:29). A daughter of Haran, and the sister of Milcah.

ISDAEL. KJV Apoc. form of Giddel.

ISHBAAL ĭsh′bāl [איש־בעל, man of Baal]. Alternately: ESHBAAL ĕsh′— [אשבעל, man of Baal, or Baal exists] (I Chr. 8:33; 9:39). The name Ishbaal is not found in the Bible. Because of the hesitancy to pronounce the name "Baal," Ishbosheth was substituted.

Ishbaal-Ishbosheth was ruler of the N tribes of Israel after the death of Saul. He struggled unsuccessfully with David for the leadership of all the tribes. The Chronicler, anxious to avoid anything which would cast doubt on the legitimacy of David's reign, makes no mention of this chapter in Israel's history.

After the defeat of Israel by the Philistines at Mount Gilboa, and the death of Saul and his older sons (I Sam. 31), the ambitious Abner took Ishbaal, one of the surviving sons of Saul, and proclaimed him king. The crowning took place at Mahanaim in Transjordan (II Sam. 2:8), no doubt because the territory W of the Jordan was under Philistine control (I Sam. 31:7). In II Sam. 2:9 it is claimed that Ishbaal ruled over Gilead, Asher (reading "Asherites" for "Ashurites"), Jezreel, Ephraim, Benjamin, and all Israel. That "all Israel" did not follow Ishbaal is clear from the following verse, where it is stated that the house of Judah followed David. The boundary between the areas controlled by David and Ishbaal seems to have been the Aijalon Valley (vss. 12-13). Whatever control Ishbaal exercised over the territory W of the Jordan was probably due to his submitting himself to Philistine overlordship. Indeed, both David and Ishbaal may well have started their careers as Philistine vassals (see Achish). Perhaps the Philistines hoped that conflict between the two contenders for rule in Israel would provide a check to the development of any single strong power in Palestine.

A long civil war soon broke out between the two parties (II Sam. 2:12-17; the precise nature of the "play"—Pi'el of שחק, "to laugh"—of the young men which caused the outbreak of hostilities is not clear; the context indicates some sort of tournament). The tide of war ran steadily in David's favor (3:1).

The N tribes were handicapped by lack of strong leadership. The real power was Abner, whom the weak Ishbaal seemed unable to check (II Sam. 3:6). When Abner appropriated for himself one of Saul's concubines—an act which may well have indicated that Abner had designs on the throne (cf. II Sam. 16:22; I Kings 2:22)—Ishbaal for once objected. Abner asserted his loyalty and immediately began plotting to transfer the allegiance of the N tribes to David (II Sam. 3:7-19).

Joab's murder of Abner frustrated this attempt (II Sam. 3:26-27). But without Abner the cause of the N tribes was in dire straits. Once his commander was gone, Ishbaal seems to have given up all hope of holding his crown, and Israel found itself practically without leadership (4:1). Ishbaal was soon murdered in his sleep by two of his captains, and the last block to David's complete control was removed (4:5-12; cf. the account of the murder of the Egyptian Amen-em-het).

In II Sam. 2:10 it is stated that Ishbaal was forty years old when he began to rule, and that his reign lasted two years. Both these figures have been questioned. Abner's treatment of Ishbaal is more understandable if the king was still a minor when crowned; his youth would also explain why he apparently was not present at the Battle of Mount Gilboa. At any rate, forty years is much too old, for this would make Ishbaal ca. twenty-eight years old when his father was anointed, an event which took place when Saul was a "young man" (I Sam. 9:2).

It is likewise argued that the length of his reign must have been roughly the same as the rule of David at Hebron, since the capture of Jerusalem and the transfer of the capital appears to have followed closely upon the acknowledgment of David as king of all Israel (II Sam. 5:1-9). David's reign at Hebron is given as 7½ years (2:11; 5:5).

Bibliography. J. B. Pritchard, ed., ANET (2nd ed., 1955), p. 418; E. Voegelin, Israel and Revelation (1956), pp. 254-55; M. Noth, The History of Israel (1958), pp. 183-86.

R. W. Corney

ISHBAH ĭsh′bə [ישבח, perhaps may (God's wrath) be allayed] (I Chr. 4:17). A descendant of Judah; son of Mered and Bithiah the daughter of Pharaoh. The KJV follows a corrupt text.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen, pp. 28, 211.

ISHBAK ĭsh′băk [ישבק; cf. personal name שובק (Neh. 10:25)]. Fifth son of Abraham and Keturah (Gen. 25:2 [LXX Ιεσβοκ]; I Chr. 1:32 [LXX A Ιεσβοκ; LXX B Σοβακ]).

ISHBI-BENOB ĭsh′bī bē′nŏb [ישבו בנב (Kethibh), ישבי בנב (Qere)] (II Sam. 21:16). A Philistine giant who was slain by Abishai when he threatened the life of David. However, the verse presents serious difficulties principally because "Ishbi-benob" is clearly translatable as "they abode in Nob" (better, "Gob"—cf. vss. 18-19). With the dissolution of the name of the giant, one of the simplest of the various resultant reconstructions of vss. 15-16 posits that some such words as "Now there was a warrior" be placed after the words "and they abode at Gob."

Bibliography. A. Schulz, "Die Bücher Samuel," EH (1920).

E. R. DALGLISH

ISHBOSHETH ĭsh bō′shĭth [איש־בשת, man of shame]. Alternately: ESHBAAL ĕsh′bāl [אשבעל, man of Baal, or Baal exists] (I Chr. 8:33; 9:39). King of Israel after the death of Saul. The name was originally ISHBAAL. During the period of the judges and the early monarchy many Hebrew names were compounded with "Baal," a word which can mean "master" or "possessor," and which may have been applied to Yahweh without any thought of connecting him with the Canaanite fertility gods. By the time of David such formations had all but ceased. The violence of the prophetic attack on Baal-worship (cf. Hos. 2:16—H 2:18) made later generations hesitant about pronouncing the name "Baal," and "bosheth" ("shame") was substituted.

Bibliography. G. B. Gray, Studies in Hebrew Personal Names (1896), pp. 120-36; W. F. Albright, Archaeology and the Religion of Israel (1956), p. 207.

R. W. CORNEY

ISH-HAI ĭsh′hī [אישחי (Kethibh), אישחח (Qere)]. The name used in the title "the son of Ish-hai," used of Benaiah in II Sam. 23:20 RSV mg. The Qere reading, "valiant man" (so RSV text), which is probably to be preferred, is found also in I Chr. 11:22.

C. T. FRITSCH

ISHHOD ĭsh′hŏd [אישהוד, man of vigor] (I Chr. 7:18); KJV ISHOD ĭsh′ŏd. A Manassite, son of Hammolecheth the sister of Gilead. The names are eponymous.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 225.

ISHI ĭsh′ī [ישעי, (God) has saved]. 1. A Jerahmeelite (I Chr. 2:31).

2. A man of Judah (I Chr. 4:20).

3. A Simeonite (I Chr. 4:42).

4. A chief of the half-tribe of Manasseh (I Chr. 5:24).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 38, 176.

ISHI (NAME OF GOD). KJV translation of אישי (RSV MY HUSBAND) in Hos. 2:16. This is the name to be used by Israel in addressing God in the day of redemption, instead of the pagan BAALI, in which Israel's God was confused with the Canaanite Baal.

J. D. SMART

ISHIAH. KJV form of ISSHIAH.

ISHIJAH. KJV form of ISSHIJAH.

ISHMA ĭsh′mə [ישמא, hypocoristic for ישמע, may (God) hear] (I Chr. 4:3). A descendant of Judah.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 28, 39, 198.

ISHMAEL ĭsh′mĭ əl [ישמעאל, see below; LXX Ισμαηλ]; KJV Apoc. ISMAEL ĭs′mĭ əl. The first and oldest etymological reference to "Ishmael" is also the most explicit: the child is to be named Ishmael (ישמעאל) because the Lord "has given heed" (שמע) to the mother's affliction (Gen. 16:11). Since this is from the J Source, "Yahweh" occurs as the divine name; but it must originally have been "Elohim" or better "El," as the name itself and the prevalence of the "El religion" in Genesis would indicate (see GOD, NAMES OF, §§ C1-2). Two other passages allude to the meaning of the name: one from the Elohist (21:17*b*); one from the Priestly writer (17:20*a*). Although both employ the verb שמע, "to hear," in the perfect tense (however, cf. 21:17*aα*), "Ishmael" reflects a formation with the imperfect (probably originally yishma'ʾēl, like the Hebrew personal name yishma'yāh(û); cf. Elephantine יהוישמע). It is best translated as a jussive, "May God hear," though "God hears" and "God shall hear" are permissible. Significantly, the analogous form to this OT name now appears in the Mari Texts as Ya-áš-ma-aḫ-AN (VI.22.16). See MARI; PATRIARCHS § 3*a*.

1. Son of Abraham by HAGAR; older half brother of Isaac (Gen. 25:12; I Chr. 1:28).

Despite the fact that the traditions about Ishmael are carried by all three sources comprising Genesis (ch. 16; 17:18-27; 21:8-21), little is said about the person himself.

The Yahwist, other than furnishing the clearest etymology (see above), tells that Ishmael "shall be a wild ass of a man, his hand against every man and every man's hand against him; and he shall dwell over against all his kinsmen" (16:12). But this is more in the nature of an ethnic etiology, referring to the ISHMAELITES, than a biographical contribution.

The Elohist adds that Sarah (technically, Sarai; see SARAH) saw Ishmael "playing [מצחק] with her son Isaac" (lacking in the MT; supplied from the LXX and the Vulg.) on the day when the latter was weaned and, through jealousy for Isaac if not also for herself, forced Abram (see ABRAHAM §§ A1-2) to cast out Hagar and Ishmael into the wilderness. "God heard" the voice of the lad, however, and saved them by providing a well of water at Beer-sheba. Under the protection of God, Ishmael grew up in the wilderness of PARAN. Hagar procured for him a wife from her own country, Egypt (21:8-21). E's note that Ishmael "became an expert with the bow" (vs. 20*b*) points beyond the man to the people. His accounting for the separation of Ishmael from Isaac, similar to J's statement at 16:12*b*, is also more ethnic than personal.

From the Priestly writer come a few personal data, but these are brief. Ishmael was born when Abraham was 86 years old, and was named by his father (16:15-16); he was circumcised at the age of 13 (17:

22-27); when Abraham died, Ishmael joined Isaac in the burial (25:9); and Ishmael lived 137 years (vs. 17). Moreover, P furnishes statistics on Ishmael's descendants: his twelve sons (25:12-16; given also at I Chr. 1:29-31), who dwelt from Havilah to Shur (Gen. 25:18); and a daughter Mahalath, Nebaioth's sister (28:9; identified as Basemath at 36:3 [P]; cf. 36:10, 13, 17). But again, these lists are more pertinent for the Ishmaelites than for Ishmael.

But if these few verses tell little about Ishmael the man, they say a great deal about Ishmael the child as a witness to man's despair and God's goodness.

God had promised Abraham and Sarah a son (15:4; 17:16, 19, 21; 18:10, 14). Yet they doubted that he could fulfil his promise (17:17; 18:12-15; cf. 15:2-3) and, despairing, forced the issue by using Hagar as a substitute (16:1-6). Then, even after God had made good his promise through the birth of Isaac himself, Sarah, with Abraham consenting, drove Hagar and Ishmael into the wilderness, because she still feared that God might renege in the future and allow the "son of this slave woman" to become a joint heir with her son, Isaac (21:8-10; see Paul's famous use of this incident in Gal. 4:21-31). Ch. 21 is not, therefore, just a N version of ch. 16 but shows a progression of man's doubt. Ishmael, the very child of Sarah's despair (ch. 16), instead of serving as a confirmation of God's goodness, becomes for Sarah and Abraham a living threat to the promise. Regardless of ameliorating circumstances such as the ten years' wait (16:3), the slave's contempt (vs. 4), and the mistress' hurt (vs. 5), or personal concern such as Abraham's care for mother and child (21:11, 14; but cf. 16:6), the Ishmael story in its present construction portrays the tension between faith and doubt. So viewed, it condemns Abraham, Sarah, and Hagar alike as guilty of lack of faith.

Conversely, through Ishmael, God proves himself dependable and gracious. He is "faithful" in performing his promises to each person. Not only does he give Isaac to Abraham and Sarah as their own child, but he hears Hagar and saves Ishmael also, making him—for Abraham's sake (21:13)—into a great nation, headed by his sons as "twelve princes" (16:10; 17:20; 21:13, 18; 25:16).

Bibliography. S. R. Driver, The Book of Genesis, WC (1926), pp. 180-84, 209-13, 241-44; M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 198; G. von Rad, Das erste Buch Mose, ATD 3 (1952), pp. 160-72, 196-201; M. Noth, "Remarks on the Sixth Volume of Mari Texts," Journal of Semitic Studies, I (1956), 325.

2. The third son of the Benjaminite Azel, a descendant of Saul (I Chr. 8:38; 9:44).

3. The father of Zebadiah, who was "governor [הנגיד] of the house of Judah" during the reign of Jehoshaphat (II Chr. 19:11).

4. Son of Jehohanan. One of the "commanders of hundreds" who helped bring the royal child Joash to the throne (II Chr. 23:1).

5. Son of Nethaniah. As a member "of the royal family" (מזרע המלוכה) of Judah (II Kings 25:25), Ishmael acted as leader of the "captains of the forces" (שרי החילים) who overthrew the Judean puppet government established by Nebuchadnezzar in 586 B.C. With the assistance of ten of his cohorts, and apparently at the instigation of the Ammonite king (Jer. 40:14*a;* cf. 41:10*b,* 15), Ishmael went into Mizpah and killed Gedaliah, along with his fellow Jews and the Chaldean (Babylonian) soldiers "who happened to be there" (40:7-10, 13-16; 41:1-3). Later by treachery he slew also seventy Israelites who had come to Mizpah to worship (41:4-9). The rest of the citizens of Mizpah he took captive, intending to carry them over to the Ammonites. These were rescued by Johanan (see JOHANAN 6), though Ishmael and eight comrades completed their flight successfully (vss. 10-15; omitted in the summary account in II Kings 25:23-25). See GEDALIAH 4; NEBUCHADREZZAR.

6. Pashhurite who put away his foreign wife during Ezra's reforms (Ezra 10:22). L. HICKS

ISHMAELITES ĭsh'mĭ ə līts [ישמעאלי, ישמעלי, ישמעאלים, for etymology, see ISHMAEL] (Gen. 37:25, 27-28; 39:1; Judg. 8:24; I Chr. 2:17; 27:30; Ps. 83:6—H 83:7); KJV often ISHMEELITES. A gentilic term applied without specific geographical or racial reference (just as kᵉna'anî, "merchant," was applied to the Canaanites) to wandering caravan traders, tent-dwellers, and camel-herders who dwelt in settlements or nomadic camps in the desert regions of North Arabia between HAVILAH, Egypt, and the Euphrates (Gen. 25:18) from the early second millennium until at least the eighth-seventh century B.C.

1. Origin
2. The Ishmaelites and Joseph
3. Ishmaelites and Midianites
4. Other references to Ishmaelites
5. Descendants of the Ishmaelites
Bibliography

1. Origin. The Ishmaelites traced their descent from their eponymous ancestor Ishmael, the son of Abraham by his handmaid Hagar (Gen. 25:18-19). Since Ishmael's mother was an Egyptian (Gen. 16:1), it is implied that the Ishmaelites had some Egyptian blood in their veins, and a late tradition holds that Ishmael's wife, who is nowhere mentioned in the OT, was also an Egyptian (cf. Jos. Antiq. I.xii.2).

2. The Ishmaelites and Joseph. The Ishmaelites as such are mentioned only a few times. The earliest instance is in the story of Joseph, who was sold by his brothers to an incense-bearing caravan of Ishmaelites coming from Gilead (Gen. 37:25, 27-28; 39:1). Two strands of tradition appear to be interwoven in this story (see MIDIANITES). Many scholars consider the use of the term "Ishmaelites" here, like the mention of camels (see CAMEL), to be anachronistic, since, according to the patriarchal genealogies, Ishmael himself would appear to have been a fairly close contemporary of Joseph. However, as pointed out above, the Ishmaelites were primarily nomadic caravan traders without specific geographical or racial reference, so that rigid chronological relationships need not be implied.

3. Ishmaelites and Midianites. In the period of the judges we find the Ishmaelites in close connection with Midianites. When Gideon had defeated the latter, he requested the men of Israel to give him the earrings they had taken as spoil from the Midianites: "For they had golden earrings, because they [i.e., the Midianites] were Ishmaelites" (Judg. 8:24). The designation "Ishmaelites" here is presumably synonymous with "nomadic traders," as both the Midianites and the Ishmaelites belonged to nomadic groups, although each reckoned their origin from a slightly different source.

4. Other references to Ishmaelites. In the last OT occurrence of the Ishmaelites as an ethnic group (Ps. 83:6—H 83:7), they are mentioned with the Edomites in a list of conspirators against Israel. The majority of scholars have held that Ps. 83 is very late; some even date it to the era of the Maccabees. There is nothing, in either the style or the content of the psalm, that warrants such a late date. A careful study of the historical period in which the peoples flourished who are named in the psalm (vss. 6-8—H 7-9), shows that the historical context which may have evoked the writing need not be any later than the eighth century.

Two individual Ishmaelites are named by the Chronicler: Abigail, David's sister, married "Jether the Ishmaelite" (I Chr. 2:17), and the official in charge of the camels in David's administrative organization is named "Obil the Ishmaelite" (27:30).

5. Descendants of the Ishmaelites. Twelve princes (eponyms of tribes or districts) are said to have sprung from Ishmael (Gen. 17:20; 25:12-16), causing the Hebrews to acknowledge that the descendants of Ishmael had become a "great nation" (Gen. 21:18). A number of the names of these descendants appear in historical records outside the biblical narrative, and such Ishmaelite congeners as Nebaioth, Kedar, Adbeel, Dumah, Massa, and Tema are mentioned in Assyrian texts dating from the eighth-seventh century B.C. Mibsam, Mishma, and Hadad have so far not been identified in any extrabiblical sources. The first two appear again in I Chr. 4:24-25 as Simeonite clans, probably affiliated with Arab clans in S Judah. Jetur, Naphish, and Kedemah form another homogeneous group; Jetur is associated with the powerful tribe of the Hagarenes (see HAGRITES), frequently cited in the Assyrian records, and Kedemah designates descendants of the Bᵉnē Qedem (see EAST, PEOPLE OF THE), more or less mixed with Qedar. All these Ishmaelite stocks are represented as quartered, in general, to the E of Palestine in the Syrian Desert, and flourishing primarily in the first centuries of the first millennium B.C. In the first century A.D., Josephus (Antiq. I.xii.2) connected the Ishmaelites with Arabia in general, but throughout the OT they are clearly distinguished from the descendants of Joktan, who peopled the Arabian Peninsula.

Bibliography. E. Meyer, Die Israeliten und ihre Nachbarstämme (1906), pp. 261, 322-28, 390; F.-M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine (1933), I, 294-97; W. F. Albright, "The Biblical Tribe of Massa' and Some Congeners," Studi orientalistici in onore di G. Levi della Vida (1956), pp. 1-14.

G. M. LANDES

ISHMAIAH ĭsh mā'yə [ישמעיהו, Yahu hears]; KJV ISMAIAH ĭs— in I Chr. 12:4. 1. One of the disaffected Benjaminite warriors who joined the proscribed band of David at Ziklag (I Chr. 12:4). He is represented as a leader of the "Thirty," a legion of military merit, presumably composed of Benjaminite worthies in this early stage of David's career, and different from the later Davidic "Thirty."

2. An officer and a leader of the tribe of Zebulun in the Davidic era (I Chr. 27:19). E. R. DALGLISH

ISHMEELITES. KJV alternate form of ISHMAELITES.

ISHMERAI ĭsh'mə rī [ישמרי, may (God) preserve] (I Chr. 8:18). A Benjaminite.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 28, 38, 196.

ISHOD. KJV form of ISHHOD.

ISHPAH ĭsh'pə [ישפה, possibly from ישפט, may (God) judge] (I Chr. 8:16); KJV ISPA ĭs'pə. A Benjaminite.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 248, no. 773.

ISHPAN ĭsh'păn [ישפן, possibly from ישפט, may (God) judge] (I Chr. 8:22). A Benjaminite.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 248, no. 774.

ISHTAR ĭsh'tär. The Babylonian fertility-goddess —originally masculine—Athtar, the Venus Star (see LUCIFER; SHAHAR; SHALEM 2). Ishtar was the most potent goddess in Mesopotamian religion, playing the same role in the fertility cult as Anat at Ras Shamra and ASHTORETH in Palestine. Like the former goddess and Isis in Egypt and Demeter in Greece, Ishtar is associated with the dying vegetation-deity, in this case TAMMUZ. From early in the second millennium her warlike character was recognized, and in the Assyrian period she was revered beside the national god Assur as a goddess of war, and in fact was termed Belit, the mistress par excellence.

On the possibility of her cult among the Hebrews at the end of the Monarchy, see QUEEN OF HEAVEN. See also ASSYRIA AND BABYLONIA.

Bibliography. M. Jastrow, The Religion of Babylonia and Assyria (1898), pp. 202-6; J. Bottéro, La religion babylonienne (1952), pp. 37-38; J. B. Pritchard, ed., ANET (2nd ed., 1955), pp. 83-85, 106-9; Larousse Encyclopedia of Mythology (1959), pp. 57-58; E. O. James, The Ancient Gods (1960), pp. 78-80.

J. GRAY

ISH-TOB ĭsh'tŏb. KJV reading for "men of TOB."

ISHUAH. KJV form of ISHVAH.

ISHUAI, ISHUI. KJV forms of ISHVI.

ISHVAH ĭsh'və [ישוה, perhaps from שוה, to be like, resemble; LXX Ιεσουα, Ιεσσαι, Ιουα]; KJV ISHUAH —ŏŏ ə in Gen. 46:17; ISUAH ĭs'— in I Chr. 7:30. Second son of Asher; descended from Jacob and Zilpah (Gen. 46:17; I Chr. 7:30). Since the name is lacking in the parallel list in Num. 26:44, it may be a variant form of ISHVI.

ISHVI ĭsh'vī [ישוי, possibly crippled in the hand]; ISHVITES —vīts; KJV ISHUAI —ŏŏ ī in I Chr. 7:30; ISHUI in I Sam. 14:49; ISUI ĭs'— in Gen. 46:17; JESUI jĕs'— in Num. 26:44. 1. An eponym; listed as a son of Asher (Gen. 46:17 [cf. Jub. 44:21]; Num. 26:44; I Chr. 7:30).

2. A son of King Saul (I Sam. 14:49).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 227. B. T. DAHLBERG

ISIS ī'sĭs. An Egyptian goddess; the wife of Osiris and the mother of Horus.

Isis was worshiped in ancient Egypt from the earliest historical period as the supreme mother-goddess and as a personification of the creative power of the soil. Although she may have been originally a local predynastic deity of the Lower Egyptian nome of Sebennytus, her principle attributes were well defined by the time of the Pyramid Texts, and evidence points to her having attained her universal character at a very early date. By a constant syncretic process whereby she was identified with numerous Semitic, Greek, and Roman deities, her cult eventually spread over nearly all the ancient world. Her cults survived in the Roman world until the sixth century A.D.

16. Isis, seated on her throne, holds King Seti I (1318-1301 B.C.) on her lap; from Abydos

Figs. ISI 16; EGY 18.

Bibliography. S. A. B. Mercer, The Religion of Ancient Egypt (1949), pp. 198-202; J. Černý, Ancient Egyptian Religion (1952), passim. T. O. LAMBDIN

ISLAND, ISLE [אי, אִיִּים; νῆσος, νησίον]. The islands of the Mediterranean are referred to in the biblical references in which these words are found.

The hope is expressed in Ps. 72:10 that the kings of the isles will render tribute to the Hebrew king. According to Isa. 40:15, the Lord's power extends over islands. The same idea may be implied in Ezek. 26:18, although it is possible that אִי, אִיִּים, may refer to the Phoenician coastland (cf. vs. 15) rather than to the islands of the Mediterranean Sea. The eschatological imagery of Isa. 42:15 in the phrase: "I will turn the rivers into islands," is a unique use of אִיִּים (some scholars have suggested that the text should be emended to read צִיִּים, "dry land").

In the NT, specific islands of the Mediterranean Sea are referred to by name. Among them are the islands of CYPRUS (Acts 13:4, 6); CAUDA (27:16); MALTA (28:1). Although they are not designated as islands, the islands of CRETE; RHODES; and COS are also mentioned in connection with the travels of Paul.

The Hebrew אִיִּים, as can be judged by the context, frequently does not mean "islands" but "coasts" or "coastlands" (see COAST). It is so rendered by the RSV in certain passages where the KJV has "islands" or "isles" (Gen. 10:5; Esth. 10:1; Ps. 97:1; Isa. 11:11; Jer. 2:10; etc.). The same word elsewhere is correctly translated by the RSV as "hyenas" (Isa. 13:22; 34:14; Jer. 50:39; see HYENA).

W. L. REED

ISMACHIAH ĭz'mə kī'ə [יִסְמַכְיָהוּ, Yahu sustains] (II Chr. 31:13). A temple officer of third rank.

ISMAEL ĭs'mĭ əl. Douay Version and KJV Apoc. form of ISHMAEL.

ISMAIAH. KJV form of ISHMAIAH 1.

ISPAH. KJV form of ISHPAH.

ISRAEL, HISTORY OF (ISRAELITES). The history of Israel can scarcely begin before the time of Jacob, who is represented in the Bible as the ancestor of the twelve tribes. The Bible opens, however, with cosmogonic traditions, and bridges the gap between Creation and the patriarchs by a series of genealogies, into which ancient stories have been woven. While some of these stories embody profound spiritual teaching and are of high value for the study of biblical thought, they cannot be treated by the historian as materials for any scientific account of the course of events. Their similarity to Babylonian traditions has long been recognized, even though the vast difference in spirit and in religious outlook between the Babylonian and the biblical stories demands equal recognition (see GENESIS; CREATION; FLOOD). Our knowledge of Canaanite mythology has now been greatly increased, chiefly through the discovery of the Ras Shamra Texts (see UGARIT). Nothing comparable with the biblical stories is known from Canaanite sources, and we may have reasonable confidence that there is historical substance in the biblical tradition that Israel's ancestors derived from Babylonia. Abram, the grandfather of Jacob, or Israel, is said to have left Ur and migrated with his family to Haran, and thence to have gone to Palestine. Since Ur was the principal seat of the worship of Sin, and the same god was the chief deity of Haran, some ancient connection between these cities is probable, and migration from the one to the other is not unlikely. Nevertheless, Israel's links with N Mesopotamia seem to have been closer than with Babylonia, and in Deut. 26:5 Jacob is represented as a "wandering Aramean."

1. The patriarchal age
2. Moses and the Exodus
3. Joshua and the judges
4. The rise of the monarchy
5. The reign of David
6. The reign of Solomon
7. The Divided Kingdom
8. The fall of Samaria
9. The kingdom of Judah
10. The fall of Jerusalem
11. The Exile and restoration
12. The Persian period
13. The Greek period
14. The Maccabean age
15. The Roman period
Bibliography

1. The patriarchal age. Some scholars have found no historical value in the traditions about the patriarchs, who were formerly thought to be mere personifications of tribes—though this view was always questioned by some scholars. In Gen. 10 we find many tribal names treated as the names of individuals and fitted into a genealogy, and it is characteristic of Hebrew thinking to personify a group, and to speak of Amalek or Moab with a singular verb when a whole people is meant. There is nothing antecedently impossible, therefore, in the supposition that in the patriarchal traditions group experiences were represented as those of individuals. In Gen. 34, indeed, the cities of Hamor and Shechem are represented as father and son. It is impossible to carry such a theory through all the patriarchal traditions, however, and especially so in the case of Abraham, whose singularly exalted character bears the stamp of individuality. Even if these stories were originally told about tribes, they might still have some historical substance, and they could not be lightly dismissed as without value for the historian.

It is true that of none of these stories do we have independent confirmation from other ancient or contemporary sources. Nevertheless, our recent knowledge of the ancient Near East from archaeological discoveries has made it clear that contemporary customs of the period in which the patriarchs are located are accurately reflected in the biblical stories. Wellhausen affirmed that "we attain to no historical knowledge of the patriarchs, but only of the times when the stories about them arose in the Israelite people; this later age is here unconsciously projected, in its inner and outer features, into hoar antiquity, and is reflected there like a glorified mirage" (Prolegomena to the History of Israel). But this is precisely what we do not find. Customs which are not attested for the period to which the creation of the stories is attributed are reflected in these traditions. Yet texts which have been found at NUZI and MARI show that similar customs prevailed in Mesopotamia in the first half of the second millennium B.C. (see bibliography). A modern writer, using all the resources of great libraries, may write a historical novel that accurately reflects the conditions of the age in which he sets his story. But the biblical narratives cannot be supposed to have had such an origin, and when we find here striking examples of the true reflection of ancient customs, we can only conclude that they have been handed down in tradition. There is thus some reason to believe that the stories in which they are embodied were also handed down, and that the substance of the stories was faithfully transmitted. Hence there is a much greater disposition today to allow that there is some reliable historical substance in the stories.

We must, however, beware of going to the other extreme, and treating all these stories uncritically as scientific history. They are sagas, rather than history, and the recovery of history from them can only be in broad and general terms, and is only to be achieved with patience and by the careful study of the stories themselves and of known contemporary history. That Israel's ancestors came from Babylonia to N Mesopotamia and thence into Palestine, and that later some of them went into Egypt and subsequently were reduced to taskwork and then brought out of Egypt, there seems no reason to doubt —the more so as no obvious motive for the creation of such stories, if they were not true, lies to hand. Many of the individual stories preserve reliable traditions, though in evaluating these traditions one finds it impossible to consider the patriarchal age without relation to the Mosaic age.

The chronological problems attaching to this period are complex in the extreme, and it may be said at once that there is no general agreement about them. The biblical statements contained in Gen. 12:4; 21:5; 25:26; 47:9; Exod. 12:40; I Kings 6:1 would bring the migration of Abram from Ur into the twenty-first century B.C., and the Exodus into the middle of the fifteenth century. There is only one passage which sets Abram in relation to world history, and this is Gen. 14, a passage which has by many been held to be very late, but which many today believe to be quite ancient. Its use for historical purposes, however, is beset with difficulties. It makes Abram the contemporary of AMRAPHEL, king of Shinar. This king is often held to be HAMMURABI of Babylon, though the equation of the names is far from sure and has long been challenged. Hammurabi was formerly believed to belong to the twenty-first century B.C., and this perhaps contributed to the acceptance of the equation. But in the light of recent knowledge, and especially that gained from texts recovered from Mari, it is now certain that Hammurabi belonged to a much later period, and he is today placed either wholly within the eighteenth century or in the eighteenth and seventeenth centuries. If the equation of Amraphel with Hammurabi is retained, therefore, there are serious difficulties about the biblical chronology, while if it is abandoned, we have no passage which sets Abram in the framework of known history. For any reconstruction we must therefore start from the Exodus.

2. Moses and the Exodus. At the beginning of the century the Exodus was dated by most scholars of all schools, including the most conservative, in the thirteenth century B.C. More recently many scholars have moved back to the fifteenth century, and when Garstang dated the fall of Jericho, on the basis of his excavations there, at the end of that century, this date became widely adopted. There were, however, many difficulties. For the biblical traditions represent the Israelites as engaged on taskwork in cities of the Nile Delta region for a Pharaoh who had his court in the neighborhood. Our knowledge of Egyptian history of the fifteenth century B.C. provides no suitable background for these traditions. Moreover, Exod. 1:11 gives the names of the cities on which the Israelites were set to work as Pithom and Raamses (see RAMESES [CITY]). These names have to be rejected as a later addition if the fifteenth-century date is retained. Furthermore, Palestinian archaeology has established that the main wave of destruction of Canaanite cities fell toward the end of the thirteenth century, and all probability would suggest that this destruction was at the hands of the Israelites. In favor of the fifteenth-century date for the Exodus, it is argued that the Amarna Letters (see TELL EL-AMARNA), written by Palestinian princes to the Egyptian court in the first half of the fourteenth century and appealing for help against enemies who are called by the ideogram SA-GAZ or by the name HABIRU, reflect from the Canaanite side the incursion of the Israelites who had come from Egypt. Since these letters ask for small reinforcements of fifty, or in one case as few as ten, soldiers, it is hard to reconcile them with the biblical tradition.

The recent excavations at JERICHO have brought Garstang's conclusions into question, and it is increasingly recognized that we have here a special problem and that the date of the fall of this city cannot be made the sole determining factor in considering the date of the Exodus.

On the other hand, any simple acceptance of the thirteenth-century date involves us in other difficulties. The shortening of the period of the judges is got over by the view that the judges were local heroes, rather than a succession of national leaders. The "Israel stele" of MER-NE-PTAH brings us incontestable evidence of the presence of Israel in Palestine when they would be barely out of Egypt on this late-date view. This difficulty is countered by the observation that Israel does not appear to be a settled people, like the others mentioned in the stele. More difficult to explain is the fact that the wave of destruction of S Palestinian cities, such as LACHISH, fell almost immediately after the Israelites would have left Egypt on this view, whereas the biblical tradition is of an initial, unsuccessful attempt on the S. Here scholars have fallen back on the view that not all the tribes went into Egypt, and that some were in Palestine while the others were in Egypt. This view is supported by the fact that there is some evidence from contemporary sources that some of the tribes were in Palestine at a time when on any view the Israelites are represented as being in Egypt. The crucial difficulty here concerns the tribe of Levi. For there is much evidence in the OT that links the tribe of Levi with the S and with Judah, whereas Moses is represented as a Levite and as the bringer out of Egypt of the tribes which were there. Some have argued that the word "Levi" simply means "priest," but against this we have the evidence of Gen. 34; 49:5-7, which associates Levi with Simeon, and predicts a common fate for both. That they did not share a common fate is certain, and it is therefore probable that Gen. 49:5-7 is an ancient oracle, coming from a time when it seemed likely that they would share a common fate, and when, therefore, Levi was a secular tribe.

Combining as much biblical evidence as possible with the extrabiblical evidence, one may put forward the view that the migration of Jacob and his sons from Mesopotamia fell early in the Amarna age, at the beginning of the fifteenth century B.C., and that this group formed part of the Habiru tribes, which were, however, far more widespread in the ancient Near East, and are not to be simply equated with the children of Israel. For detailed treatment of this view, see bibliography.

In that age there seem to have been two main attacks, one from the N and the other from the S. The treachery of Simeon and Levi at Shechem would fall in this age, and would perhaps indicate a group that advanced into the center of the country, but failed to maintain itself. The other associated groups moved much more slowly northward, and the archaeological evidence that points to destruction of S cities more than a century later is to be connected with their exploits. The story of Joseph's being taken into Egypt is placed shortly after the Shechem incident in the Bible, and if this is to be relied on, we should still be in the Amarna age for Joseph's rise to power. In that period the heretic Pharaoh AKH-EN-ATON broke with the Theban priesthood of Amen, that had hitherto provided the chief ministers of state, and proscribed the worship of Amen, making the worship of the sun-god, whose symbol was the sun-disk Aton, the sole permitted worship. Such a Pharaoh would have to look round for talent elsewhere for the service of the state, and this period would offer a suitable background for the story of Joseph. Moreover, we are told that Joseph was given as wife the daughter of the priest of On (Gen. 41:50). In no age would it have been a greater honor to be given the daughter of the priest of the sun-god as wife. The descent of a small group of Joseph's kindred into Egypt after his being taken there could rest on a subsequent migration, perhaps especially of some of the Levites and Simeonites who had failed to establish themselves in Shechem, while others of these tribes may have fallen back on Judah—the Simeonites to achieve some territorial settlement in the S for a time, prior to their early disappearance from history, while Levi gradually took on a functional character and became priests.

The period between the death of Joseph and the rise of the oppressing Pharaoh is passed over in a single verse in the Bible, and was probably quite short. The time of the sojourn in Egypt is given as 430 years in Exod. 12:40 (though this is halved in the LXX), but the biblical genealogies are uniformly inconsistent with this. The period is commonly put at four generations, with a maximum of seven in the case of Zelophehad's daughters and a minimum of three in the case of Moses. It would therefore seem likely that the sojourn in Egypt lasted about 130 years. The Pharaoh of the Oppression would then be Ramses II (see RAMSES 2), who is known to have undertaken building operations in the Nile Delta region in the reign of his father, Seti I, and to have continued them in his own reign. This fact would provide an appropriate setting for the taskwork of the Israelites and for the Moses story, as well as for the names of the store cities preserved in the Bible. The Israelites who were led out by Moses would be mainly the Joseph tribes, but with Levite elements, to which Moses certainly belonged, and Levites would be connected both with the groups which had not gone into Egypt and with those which had. The tribes led out of Egypt would not, on this view, have spent a long period in the wilderness before attacking the center of Palestine across the Jordan under Joshua. It has to be remembered that in the biblical account thirty-eight of the forty years between the Exodus and the Conquest are said to have been spent at Kadesh, and the wandering proper was limited to two years. It may be that the long sojourn at Kadesh preceded the earlier entry in the time of Jacob, and it is the combining of the two movements into a single story which has resulted in the linking of the long sojourn at Kadesh and the short period of later wandering into a single period of forty years.

This view finds substantial historicity in the traditions of the Bible, though it disentangles them into two separate strands. It should be noted that no view accepts all the statements of the Bible as they stand, but that every view either openly or silently dismisses what it cannot use. The view indicated here represents a greater integration of biblical and extrabiblical evidence than can be found in any other, and while it cannot be presented as in any sense certain, it offers a reasonable working hypothesis. The only major pieces of archaeological evidence which provide difficulties are provided by Jericho and Ai, the latter of which seems to have been destroyed long before the time of Joshua, on any possible view of the Exodus. Both these difficulties lie, not alone against the present view, but against every other. Apart from these all the evidence of archaeology falls into place.

It will be seen that substantial historicity is here allowed to the Joseph story. It is also allowed to the story of Moses. Neither of these stories can be regarded as strict history in all its details, and certainly the numbers of those led out by Moses must have been greatly multiplied. But this does not mean that there is no core of reliably ascertainable fact. Some writers have dismissed the whole story of Moses as worthless from a historical point of view and as created by faith. This does not seem likely. Granted that none of the actual events of the Exodus can be shown to be referred to in contemporary nonbiblical records, it has yet to be remembered that the known history of the fourteenth and thirteenth centuries provides a background which suits the biblical stories. Moreover, it is antecedently unlikely that any people would invent the story that it had been reduced to taskwork in a foreign country, if there were no substance in the story. It is similarly unlikely that any people would have invented the story that in its deliverance it took no active part itself, if it had fought its way out. Nor would any people have invented the story that it had been delivered by a God it had not hitherto acknowledged as its own God, if it had not substantial reasons for believing it.

The religious significance of the work of Moses is not in question here. Politically he was the creator of the nation, or at least of those elements which he led. From an oppression which lasted down to ca. the middle of the thirteenth century, he led these tribes into the desert and filled them with a national consciousness, as well as with the sense that they had been chosen by the Yahweh in whose name he had led them out, to whom they had committed themselves by the Covenant, and with the confidence that this God would give them a settled home in Canaan.

3. Joshua and the judges. Joshua is represented as the leader of the united tribes of Israel, and as achieving the conquest and division of the entire land. At the same time, in Judg. 1 the conquest is attributed to separate tribes, or small groups of tribes. This is probably the more accurate account. To Joshua, the Ephraimite, the leader of the Joseph tribes and their associates who had come from Egypt, should be attributed the securing for Israel of a foothold in the central part of the country. That he won a great victory at Aijalon is not to be doubted, since an ancient poem, which commemorated this victory, links it with his memory (Josh. 10:12-13). This poem may well be contemporary with the events of which it sings. In the S the kindred tribes who had not gone into Egypt were in the same age extending their influence and pressing steadily northward, and it may well be that Joshua in some way gave them support. It is improbable, however, that he succeeded in linking up with Judah, since we find that in a later age a Canaanite belt still separated Judah from the N tribes. The feeling that all the Israelite tribes were of a common stock, even though their settlement came in different waves, would seem to be well grounded in fact. The sense of kinship among the tribes and also the tensions that existed among them are alike to be understood, if we recognize a common origin, but a long period of separate history before they came together for a short time in the United Monarchy.

On the view presented above, it is not necessary to shorten the period of the judges to ca. a century and a half between Joshua and the rise of Saul. The judges were tribal heroes, rather than national heroes, and the chronological framework in which they are set in the book of Judges comes from the Deuteronomic school of a later age, and is to be differentiated from the content of the traditions themselves. If some of the tribes had been continuously in the land from the time of Jacob, some of the stories may well come from the period before the time of Moses and Joshua. The earliest of the major judges, of whom alone we have traditions preserved, was Othniel, who belonged to the S group, and whose exploits were probably stated to be against the neighboring Edomites in the earliest form of the tradition. The confusion of Edom and Aram is a common one in the Bible, and the expansion of Aram to Aramnaharaim, or Mesopotamia (Judg. 3:8), may postdate the confusion here.

It has been suggested that the Israelite tribes formed an amphictyony, pledged by a religious oath to help one another, with an amphictyonic shrine as the center of their confederation. One may doubt whether there was any twelve-tribe amphictyony at this date, for one finds little evidence of it in the period of the judges. At the same time, the prominence of shrines in the narrative must be recognized, and it seems more likely that at various times there were alliances of groups of tribes, these alliances being sealed at sanctuaries. The variety of shrines mentioned seems to tell against an amphictyony of all the tribes with a central amphictyonic shrine.

The exploit of Ehud was against the Moabites, who were extending their power W of the Jordan; that of Gideon was against the Midianites, who were similarly extending their power; that of Jephthah was against the Ammonites on the E of Jordan; those of Samson against the Philistines. It will be observed that all of these were non-Canaanite foes, and the Israelite leaders were fighting the battles of the Canaanites, no less than their own. It is not surprising, therefore, that while in times of crisis the Israelites were conscious of their racial and religious distinction from the Canaanites, there was not a little fusion and intermarriage during this postsettlement period. That the fusion brought a measure of religious syncretism, involving the worship of Israelites at Canaanite shrines and the following of Canaanite religious customs, is clearly recognized in the Bible, and is understandable.

In the case of only one of the judges was the enemy Canaanite. This is in many ways the most important of the stories of the judges. Sisera of Harosheth was extending his power from the Vale of Esdraelon over the Israelite tribes N and S of the vale, until Deborah, a prophetess, urged Barak to summon the tribes on both sides to combine against the foe. The subsequent victory, in which the Israelites routed the far better equipped enemy, was due in no small part to a storm which immobilized the chariots of Sisera, and in which the Israelites found the hand of their God. The victory was celebrated in a magnificent poem (Judg. 5), which is doubtless contemporary, and which is therefore a historical document of the utmost importance (see DEBORAH 1). In the prose account, which precedes the poem, the victory over Sisera has been combined with the account of a victory over Jabin of Hazor, won by two N tribes, originally quite separate from it. In the book of Joshua the victory over Jabin and the destruction of his city is attributed to Joshua (Josh. 11). Sisera was defeated by a larger combination of Israelite tribes than had hitherto come together in any single operation. Various tribes are praised or blamed in the poem for giving or withholding aid, but the measure of the blame varies, and this does not suggest that all the tribes were under a common amphictyonic oath to give aid. Judah is not mentioned for praise or blame, and this is probably because Judah was still separated from the N tribes by a Canaanite belt, and it would have been unrealistic to expect any help from that quarter.

Samson, the last of the major judges, performed feats of personal heroism against the PHILISTINES, who here come prominently before us for the first time. The Philistines were a people who effected a foothold on the Mediterranean coast early in the twelfth century B.C., probably as a part of the movement of peoples and wide disturbances in the E Mediterranean following the fall of the Minoan Empire, though there is no evidence that the Philistines had come from Crete itself. Gradually they extended their sway up the coast and into the hinterland, until they became the most dangerous menace to both Israelites and Canaanites. The migration of the tribe of Dan to its N home, recorded in the appendix to the book of Judges, was doubtless due directly or indirectly to the pressure of the Philistines.

The book of Judges is of the utmost importance for the study of the social and political conditions in the postsettlement period, as well as for the study of the religious conditions. There was little lasting cohesion among the Israelite tribes, and more than once intertribal jealousies led to internal war among the tribes. At one time the son of Gideon by a Canaanite wife attempted to establish a monarchy (see ABIMELECH), with an authority based on force instead of the moral authority of a leadership based on charismatic gifts freely recognized by the tribes; but this attempt came to a speedy end.

The most serious internal strife among the Hebrew tribes is recorded in the appendix to the book of Judges, when other tribes combined against Benjamin after the incident concerning the Levite's concubine (Judg. 19–21). The story itself is full of interest for the light it sheds on the times, but also because it prepares the way for things that follow.

4. The rise of the monarchy. The rise of Saul and the establishment of the monarchy was mainly due to the extension of Philistine power to the heart of the land. In the time of Eli, who was the priest of SHILOH, where the ancient symbol of the ark, which had come down from the time of Moses, was kept, the Philistine pressure was strong, and a battle was fought at Aphek. Here the ark was carried onto the battlefield as the guarantee of the presence of the national God, Yahweh. Instead of the hoped-for succor, however, disaster ensued. The ark itself was captured and taken as a trophy, and Shiloh was destroyed. Eli collapsed and died on hearing the news of the defeat, and the whole of the central highlands came into the power of the enemy. Israel lay defenseless and leaderless. The Philistines soon returned the ark, but its sanctuary had been destroyed, and it lay neglected in Kiriath-jearim for many years, while Philistine influence continued dominant.

The rise of the monarchy to meet this situation was due to prophetic inspiration. Prophecy is a phenomenon by no means limited to Israel, and it is now known that it was found in Mesopotamia as well as in Syria quite anciently (see PROPHET). The rising against Sisera had been due to the activity of a prophetess, and from now on, we find frequent evidences of the political as well as religious activities of the prophets of Israel. The man who had most to do with the establishment of the monarchy was Samuel, though it is clear that there were prophetic bands who fostered patriotic and religious feelings. Samuel is depicted as a judge, though he does not fit into the pattern of the judges of the book of Judges, and in one story is represented as a man of local fame before the emergence of SAUL.

That two accounts of the rise of the monarchy are combined in the Bible is well known. The earlier represents Saul as first privately anointed by the prophet Samuel (see SAMUEL 1) in the name of Yahweh, with the commission to deliver the Israelites from Philistine power. At the same time the Jephthah story and the story of the war with Benjamin also seem to lead up to the same climax. Saul's first exploit was against the Ammonites, who were renewing the pressure on the E of Jordan from which Jephthah had given relief. After the war with the Benjaminites, the people of Jabesh-gilead had intermarried with the Benjaminites, as they had stood aside from the war. Hence, when they were now pressed by the Ammonites, they appealed to the tribe of Benjamin for help, and Saul took the lead against the enemy with conspicuous success. The Philistines would be unconcerned with this incident, which seemed likely only to weaken the Israelites and not to menace themselves. But Saul turned against the Philistines the strength and popular support he had gained by this exploit, and the Philistines were driven out of the center of the land and Saul was acclaimed as king. The Philistines still controlled the coastal region and the vale of Esdraelon, and in the subsequent encounters with Saul they tried first to force their way inland, and then later to attack from the N. As the result of the latter thrust Saul was killed on the fatal field of Gilboa, and Philistine power was re-established W of the Jordan.

Some idea of the real achievement of Saul may be gained by noting the scenes of his battles with the Philistines. At the beginning of his reign they were in the heart of the country, until the victory at Michmash drove them out. Later, they sought to go up the defiles that led directly from their own chief cities into the hill country, but the battle of Ephesdammim, with which the story of David's victory over Goliath is associated, checked their attempt. At the end of Saul's reign it was by the wide detour and approach from the N that they were able to re-enter. The moodiness of Saul, which is given prominence in the Bible, should not lessen the historian's recognition of the service he rendered his people during the years he led them.

5. The reign of David. Already, before the death of Saul, the attention of the reader of the Bible is directed to David, of whose life we are given a more detailed account than we have of any other OT character (see DAVID). At first he was a supporter of Saul, until the king's jealousy of his popularity turned him into an outlaw, who fled for refuge to the Philistines and then became the dependent of one of the Philistine leaders. On the death of Saul, Ish-bosheth succeeded his father as king, but had his headquarters E of the Jordan. He can have had little real authority W of the Jordan, where Philistine influence was again paramount, and even E of the Jordan he counted for but little, all real power being in the hands of his general, Abner. Meanwhile, David extended his influence in Judah, where he was recognized as king. At once war ensued between him and Ish-bosheth. This war the Philistines were content to watch unmoved. At first there would be a certain benevolent neutrality toward David, since he owed some allegiance to the king of Gath, but they would welcome the struggle with Ish-bosheth as calculated to weaken both groups of Israelites, and to prevent David from becoming too powerful. Again they miscalculated, as they had done at the time of Saul's rise. Ish-bosheth's cause languished, and when Abner made overtures to David, he was killed by David's general, Joab, as the result of a blood feud which the war had created. Ish-bosheth was thereafter murdered, and David was recognized as the king of all Israel. This brought Judah into a closer union with the N tribes than had hitherto been known.

David quickly turned his arms against Jerusalem, which till now had remained a Jebusite town. It is probable that in the war with the Philistines, Jerusalem had recognized that her interests and those of the Israelite tribes were common, and no embarrassment had been caused to Saul while he was defending the land against them. But in the encounter between David and Ish-bosheth the situation was different. David's relations with the Philistines would not commend him to the Jebusites, and this stronghold in his path must have hampered him in dealing with Saul's son. Hence, no sooner was David acclaimed as king of all Israel than he turned to attack Jerusalem. The natural strength of the city gave its people a sense of security against such means of attack as were available to David. By a bold and skilful ruse, however, the city was entered and captured, though David was too wise to treat its people harshly, or to destroy its defenses.

It was at once clear to the Philistines that David was no longer a dependent, but a menace to their power, and they quickly tried to suppress him. It was now too late, however. Just as Saul had turned against them the strength he had developed in the encounter with the Ammonites, so David faced them with a strength they had watched him acquire. Instead of yielding to their attack, therefore, David turned the tables on them, and was able to reduce them to dependence on him. His position was now much stronger than Saul's had ever been, and he was not long in exploiting the situation and reducing the surrounding states one by one to a similar recognition of his overlordship. In consequence he soon established himself as the head of a kingdom greater than that ruled by any other Israelite king during all the history of the people. That this was in part due to his own and Joab's military gifts is beyond question. But it should be remembered that it was also in part due to the international situation of his time. In an earlier age Egyptian power had been dominant in the whole region, just as in later ages Assyrian, Babylonian, and Persian power was dominant. During the brief period of the United Monarchy none of the greater neighboring powers was in a position to interfere in Palestine, and the union of the Israelite tribes under skilful leadership made them the strongest unit within that little world, and gave to David an opportunity that did not recur.

This is not to attribute the success of David simply to good fortune. The situation offered the opportunity, but David's skill enabled him to seize it. His genius is seen in his transfer of his capital to Jerusalem after its capture. This would seem to have alienated some Israelite sentiment, but David was anxious to enlist the natural strength of the city, and the prestige it had long enjoyed, on his own side. The wisdom of his choice was matched by the measures he took to attach Israelite sentiment to the city. He brought the long-neglected ark into the city. As a sacred object linked with the name of Moses, it made Jerusalem an Israelite center no less than a Jebusite; and since the ark was no longer kept in a famous shrine, no sentiment could be offended by its elevation to prominence again. Hitherto the ark had been associated with the N tribe of Ephraim, while David's personal links with the tribe of Judah ensured its support at this stage. More important was the clear declaration implicit in this act that the national religion lay at the base of David's kingdom, and that the worship of Yahweh was to be its unifying force. For despite the tribal independence and often separate history, all the Israelite tribes had come to recognize Yahweh as their God, by whatever diverse ways they had come to this recognition.

David's rule did not continue to be popular among all his subjects, however. The disappearance of the menace of foreign foes removed one of the major unifying forces, and the newly found unity of the Israelite tribes began to disintegrate. Even David's own tribe of Judah became disaffected, as is clear from the fact that when Absalom raised the standard of revolt, he did so in Hebron. At this time David was able to find refuge E of the Jordan, in the place where Ish-bosheth had maintained himself after the death of Saul. The hostility of Saul's own tribe of Benjamin is to be understood, and is clear from the fact that at the time of the king's flight before Absalom, Shimei could openly curse him with impunity. Later Sheba, from the same tribe, led a revolt against David, which seemed at first likely to be dangerous, until the seasoned and ruthless Joab took charge of the campaign. It must be remembered, also, that despite the glory of David's reign, to which later generations looked back with some wistfulness, his subjects in his own day were conscious of the burdens of war, arising, not alone from the hazards of battle which they were compelled to face, but also from the frequent neglect of their own occupations. For David imposed forced labor on his subjects, and established the system which aroused deep resentment in the time of Solomon.

6. The reign of Solomon. When David's end seemed near, his eldest surviving son, Adonijah, assumed that the succession would be his, and made his plans to meet the expected situation. He was foiled by the prophet Nathan and the queen Bathsheba. When David had committed adultery with Bathsheba and had had her husband, Uriah the Hittite, virtually murdered, Nathan had rebuked the king in the name of Yahweh (II Sam. 12). Afterward, however, Nathan was on the side of Bathsheba, and it was because of his resource that her son secured the throne. Various rivalries played their part in the situation. During the time of his outlawry in the reign of Saul, David had been accompanied by Abiathar, the sole survivor of the family of Eli who had escaped the massacre which Saul had ordered. In Jerusalem, however, we find Abiathar beside Zadok, who was perhaps the Jebusite priest in the city before David captured it. That there was rivalry between them is certain, and we find Abiathar supporting Adonijah and Zadok supporting Solomon. Similarly we find David's field commander, Joab, on the side of Adonijah, but Benaiah, the captain of the king's bodyguard, on the side of Solomon. By a swift stroke, planned by Nathan, Solomon was proclaimed king on David's orders, before the death of his father, and the succession thereby secured.

Later generations accorded Solomon a reputation for wisdom which his subjects might have disputed, and we find the works known as the wisdom literature freely ascribed to him. That there was a certain splendor about his reign may be recognized, but it was largely a hollow splendor. Solomon's reign was predominantly one of peace, in contrast to the constant wars whereby David had established and maintained his kingdom. It might therefore have been expected that the country would enjoy prosperity, in which people and king would share. Instead, the people faced ever harder conditions, while the court grew in size and splendor.

The sources of Solomon's wealth were many. He levied heavy taxes on his own people, requiring both goods and services from them. His country was divided into twelve districts, charged with the maintenance of the court for a month in turn, and since approximately equal districts would be needed, the tribal divisions were ignored. This would inevitably add to the dissatisfaction the levies must in any case have aroused. Moreover, Judah seems to have been given a privileged position, and so the feeling was increased. For the king's many building enterprises forced labor was used, doubtless in a far more burdensome form than the reign of David had seen. The subject peoples were also forced to contribute, probably under harsher conditions than the Israelites. Again, the tolls that were levied on the transit trade that passed through the land went to swell the king's exchequer. During many of the periods of peace the land knew, such tolls went to the exchequer of some foreign sovereign, in Egypt or Assyria or Babylonia. During other periods several of the small states must have levied their toll on the trade that passed from Asia Minor and Mesopotamia to Egypt. The reign of Solomon was the one period of peace when the Israelite king controlled this area, and drew the profit from this trade. Again, Solomon engaged in state trading enterprises. He fitted out a fleet of ships which sailed down the Red Sea and as far as India, engaging in commerce which brought various exotic products into the land and no small profit to the coffers of the king. In the neighborhood of the port of EZION-GEBER, from which his ships sailed, he had copper mines, which are unmentioned in the Bible, but which archaeology has uncovered. These were doubtless worked by slave labor. From all these sources, it is not surprising that the king acquired a wealth which seemed to his contemporaries to be vast, perhaps the more so since his subjects were given so little opportunity to share it.

Great building enterprises were undertaken. The most famous building was the temple, which Solomon built to house the ark, and which later became the sole sanctuary where sacrifice to Yahweh was recognized as legitimate by the Jews. It was not built by the king to be the sole sanctuary, however, and there is ample evidence that he visited other shrines. The temple was intended to be the royal shrine, and it was attached to the king's palace, which exceeded it in size, and probably in splendor. In various parts of the land the king established depots, of which some were to provide for the large number of chariots which he maintained. At MEGIDDO stables have been discovered by archaeologists, and there can be little doubt that these were built for Solomon. So costly was his court and so many his enterprises, that despite his wealth he was not able to meet all his obligations, and he was forced to cede some cities to the king of Tyre in payment for the services of the skilled craftsmen placed at his disposal and materials imported from abroad.

Solomon entered into numerous foreign alliances, including one with the Pharaoh of Egypt, as well as his alliance with the great maritime power of Tyre. These alliances were sealed by marriages with foreign princesses, which brought religious and cultural influences into the land which were unwelcome to the devotees of the national religion of Israel. For now, as so frequently, religion became the focus for all the discontent with which the land seethed, and when the time was ripe, it was the prophets who directed the discontent.

7. The Divided Kingdom. Already, during the reign of Solomon, the discontent was smoldering, and the prophet Ahijah encouraged Jeroboam, who was one of the king's officers in charge of the corvée, to lead a revolt. News reached Solomon, however, and he took swift action against Jeroboam, who escaped to Egypt and remained there until the king's death, placing himself under the protection of the reigning Pharaoh—who was not, needless to say, the Pharaoh with whom Solomon had allied himself by marriage, but of another dynasty, which had by now gained control of the country. Throughout his reign Solomon does not seem to have had to face any outbreak of rebellion within the country, as David had done, and may not have realized the strength of feeling his oppressive reign had aroused. Before the end of his life, however, he had seen clear signs that the little empire he had inherited was cracking. Some of the neighboring states had broken away and secured their independence, and the revolt of Damascus brought into being a kingdom which was later to become a serious threat to Israel.

On the death of Solomon, Jeroboam returned from Egypt, and soon became the leader of the dissident elements in the N. The tribes gathered at Shechem to demand reform before they pledged their loyalty to Rehoboam, the son of Solomon. The story of Rehoboam's disdainful answer is familiar. It showed that he and some of the court circle were still quite unaware of the state of feeling in the land, and Rehoboam was completely unprepared for the open revolt which at once broke out, under the leadership of Jeroboam.

It would be unfair to attribute the rebellion solely to the foolish answer the new king had given. A more adroit handling of the situation might have surmounted the peril, but the real causes were deep-seated, and it may well be that the Disruption would have come in any case. It has been said above that under Solomon, Judah seems to have enjoyed a favored position; and jealousy of this position played its part in the situation. In the period of the judges intertribal jealousy among the tribes of the N had more than once led to friction, and it is not surprising that there was feeling against the privileged position of Judah, which had so recently come into the stream of Israelite life. On the view presented above, Judah had entered the land quite separately from the Joseph tribes, and in a different age, and though they recognized a common origin and shared a common religion, they had for long had a separate history, because of the Canaanite belt across the land. To conciliate this feeling would have meant that Rehoboam would forfeit the support of his own tribe, and he could have little certainty that the dissidents would at once rally to his side. To respect the tribal divisions would have meant an immediate reorganization of the land, and to lighten taxation and abandon the corvée would have struck at once at the life of the swollen and luxurious court Rehoboam had inherited, and would have turned its members into enemies. To cut expenditure when circumstances compelled was one thing; to do so in response to a demand whose seriousness neither the king nor the court could recognize would have been another, and would have been interpreted by friend and foe as weakness. While recognizing the folly of the answer that touched off the rebellion, it is fair to recognize that the new king was in a real difficulty, which was not of his making.

Still more important, we should not forget the part the prophets played at this time. AHIJAH, a N prophet, had instigated the rebellion; and after it had broken out, a S prophet, Shemaiah, paralyzed Rehoboam's arm when he planned to suppress the rebellion. Prophets of N and S therefore favored the Disruption. That they were moved in part by the sufferings of the people is doubtless true, and we should not suppose that the prophets of the eighth century were the first to feel indignation at social injustice and oppression. On the other hand, we should not forget that Ahijah and his fellow prophets were also interested in the national religion and were concerned to fight all that imperiled it. At the time of the establishment of the monarchy, the prophets realized that the Philistine domination was a menace to the religion of Yahwism, since a God who was powerless to defend his people, as Yahweh had seemed in the battle of Aphek, would be likely to lose their confidence. Now, however, the menace was more insidious. The foreign alliances of Solomon had brought Israel into the stream of international life in a way she had not hitherto known in her history; and this in turn brought religious and cultural influences into the land that the prophets could not but view with alarm. The Disruption was the final blow at the little empire which David had established, to which later generations looked back with wistfulness. But the prophets preferred religious purity to political power.

The relatively brief period during which all the Israelite tribes had been united in a single kingdom had left a permanent deposit of the greatest importance. For during this period the traditions of N and S had been brought together and amalgamated into a single corpus. It is generally believed that among the sources of the Pentateuch there are two early documents, one coming from the N and the other from the S, and these probably took their separate shape after the Disruption. Both, however, were collections of traditions of N and S, and the United Monarchy had left an enduring mark on these traditions, which in part determined the form in which they have come down to us.

When Jeroboam led the N tribes in revolt, the S tribe of Judah continued to be loyal to Rehoboam. From now on until the destruction of Samaria the two kingdoms continued to be separate, sometimes warring with each other, the smaller kingdom sometimes accepting a position of dependence on the other. The S kingdom remained true to the dynasty of David, save that for a few years Athaliah ruled the land. The N kingdom had frequent changes of dynasty, however, and throughout its checkered history had less stability than the S. Not infrequently these changes of dynasty were due to prophetic incitement, and we sometimes find that the prophet who had instigated an insurrection quickly turned against the man of his choice, just as Samuel had turned against Saul. Jeroboam himself did not long retain prophetic support. In the books of Kings he is constantly condemned from the Deuteronomic standpoint of the compiler because he elevated the sanctuaries of Bethel and Dan into national shrines. The priesthood of Dan claimed descent from Moses, while Bethel is associated in the traditions with the patriarchs. Neither shrine was first created by Jeroboam, and both had continued through the period of the United Monarchy to function as shrines, just as other sanctuaries in the land had. Solomon's temple later became the only sanctuary to be recognized as legitimate, but, as has been observed above, it was not built to be the sole sanctuary, but to be the royal shrine. It was therefore natural that Jeroboam should desire a royal shrine, though in actual fact he had two. Both were recognized as Yahweh shrines, and it is probable that the bull images which stood in them were not thought of as images of Yahweh, but as the pedestals of an imageless God. Their condemnation by the Deuteronomist is to be understood. We should not suppose, however, that the N was religiously inferior to the S. For long the religious leaders belonged to the N. Elijah and Elisha were both N prophets, and in the eighth century Amos, though a southerner, prophesied in the N, and Hosea was a northerner.

Not long after the Disruption the Pharaoh of Egypt, SHISHAK, led an expedition against the land. His own inscription shows that this was not to support Jeroboam against Rehoboam's attempts to reduce the revolted tribes to obedience, as the reader of the biblical account might suppose, but was against both the little kingdoms. One of the first effects of the Disruption, therefore, was to expose both kingdoms anew to perils from without. In the subsequent times of friction between the two states, the S kingdom, with a shortsightedness it was often to show, appealed on occasion to the kingdom of Damascus to come to its aid by an attack from the N. Gradually the Arameans of Damascus increased their power, until they became a serious menace to the Israelites.

Early in the ninth century the N Israelite kingdom went through a period of revolution when there were three aspirants to the throne. One was quickly eliminated, but for a time the other two continued their rivalry, until Omri emerged as the sole king (see OMRI, KING). He was an abler leader than the few verses devoted to him in the Bible would suggest. To him was due the choice of Samaria for the capital. Hitherto the N capital had been moved about, but for some time had been at TIRZAH. The choice of Samaria showed something of the strategic insight David had shown in moving to Jerusalem, though Samaria was not already a famous city, but had to be created by Omri. In order to strengthen himself against Damascus, Omri made an alliance with the maritime power of Tyre, and his son Ahab married a Tyrian princess. Under Omri's leadership the N kingdom showed a new strength, and he was able to reconquer Moab, as we learn from the MOABITE STONE. This monument was prepared for Mesha, the king of Moab of whom we read in II Kings 3, and it tells us that for forty years the Moabites had been subject to Israel.

In the reign of Omri's son Ahab, the evil effects of the Tyrian alliance became apparent. For the queen, JEZEBEL, was a forceful personality, whose ideas of the position of a king were other than those of the Israelites, as the story of Naboth's vineyard eloquently testifies. Tyrian cultural and religious influence was widely felt in the land, and it inevitably roused prophetic opposition. Such opposition the queen would not brook, and the sanctity of the person of the prophets was not recognized.

The S kingdom was at this time friendly to the N, and both flourished. The S king, Jehoshaphat, was able to re-establish control over the S route to Ezion-geber, and even attempted to renew the maritime trade that Solomon had maintained. An alliance between the two kingdoms was sealed by the marriage of Ahab and Jezebel's daughter Athaliah to the son of Jehoshaphat. Subsequent events showed that the S kingdom was not regarded as an equal partner in the alliance.

It is of interest to note that though the prophet Elijah (see ELIJAH THE PROPHET) was bitterly opposed to Jezebel and all the Tyrian influence, and though in this reign his great conflict with the prophets of the Tyrian god took place on Mount Carmel, whenever it came to a conflict with Damascus, the prophet was on the side of his people. Later we find the same thing with ELISHA. Though he was opposed to the court, and ultimately instigated the revolution which brought Jehu to the throne, he was regarded by the Arameans as their most powerful enemy, because of the support he always gave to the Israelite king. In Ahab's reign Damascus made a determined attempt to conquer Israel. This ended in a defeat which brought the king of Damascus into the hands of Ahab as a prisoner. To the consternation of the prophets, Ahab treated his prisoner with generosity and made a treaty with him. Our external sources show that this was less quixotic than might appear. At this time Assyrian power was waxing, and her influence and arms were already known in the W. In 853 B.C., which must have fallen shortly after Ahab's treaty with Ben-hadad, Assyria was met by a confederation of W states at the battle of Qarqar. Here a large Israelite contingent was found, including a considerable force of chariots, which probably consisted of those ceded to Ahab by Ben-hadad. The Assyrians claimed the victory, but at least their advance was halted, and they do not boast of any large fruits of the victory. In effect, therefore, this concerted action was a triumph for the W states.

Statesmanship did not long outlive the triumph, however. Ahab called on Ben-hadad to implement the provisions of the treaty he had made and restore Israelite districts E of the Jordan which had earlier been annexed; and when Ben-hadad refused, war broke out anew between Israel and Damascus. Here it is to be noted that one prophet opposed Ahab's adventure, though all the other prophets—prophets of Yahweh and not of Baal—supported him, just as Elijah and Elisha consistently supported their country against foreign foes. Only the prophet Micaiah (see MICAIAH 3) proved to be a true prophet, and in the battle which ensued Ahab met his end, despite the fact that Jehoshaphat had reluctantly been drawn into the adventure and had been compelled to wear the royal robes.

Within a few years the prophets judged that the time was ripe for another revolution in the N. This time they sought to promote revolution in the Damascus kingdom as well as in Israel, doubtless to prevent Aramean exploitation of the situation in Israel. In fact, the Damascus revolution took place first, and advantage was taken of Israel's weakness. This time Jehu was the chosen vessel of the prophets for the revolution against the dynasty of Omri, and the revolution swept away the kings of both Israel and Judah; the queen mother, Jezebel; and large numbers of the royal house. Despite the zeal for Yahwism which Jehu showed, the prophets were not long in turning against his house, though before it came to an end, it attained a splendor the N kingdom had not hitherto known.

Jehu sought to make up for his weakness against Damascus, now that the alliance with Tyre was completely broken, by sending tribute to the Assyrian king. This shortsighted policy of buying security against a nearer menace by welcoming a farther one, we find repeatedly in both kingdoms; and it is a tragic fact that the nearest approach to statesmanship, shown by Omri and Ahab, was ruined by the baneful influence of Jezebel and the religious opposition she aroused. Jehu found temporary relief against Damascus, but soon Assyria was occupied with her own troubles, and for some years Israel had to face continual pressure from Damascus with little relief through Assyrian activity in the W. It was not until toward the end of the ninth century that the Aramean pressure was relaxed.

In the meantime Jehu's revolution had affected the S kingdom as well as the N. The king of Judah had been among his victims, and Athaliah, the queen mother and daughter of Ahab, at once seized the power and put to death all the surviving members of the royal house, with the exception of the boy Joash, whose life was preserved by the high priest, Jehoiada. After six years he was presented in the temple by Jehoiada and acclaimed king, while Athaliah was swept away. For a time the kingdom was administered by the high priest, but later, when the king assumed the power, there was friction between Joash and his former guardian. This took the form of a dispute as to whether the maintenance of the temple fabric should be a charge on the king's revenues or on those of the priests. In the end a compromise was reached, and a system which continued to the days of Josiah, two centuries later, was established.

With the advent of the eighth century there was an improvement in the fortunes of both kingdoms. Renewed Assyrian activity in the W had weakened the Aramean kingdom, but had then given place to further Assyrian inactivity in this area, and as there was now peace between Israel and Judah, each kingdom had been able to protect itself, and even to expand its power against its neighbors. In the N kingdom the long reign of Jeroboam II saw a revival which brought a greater measure of prosperity than had been seen since the Disruption. Unhappily the prosperity was not shared by all classes, and it but served to breed social evils which proved a menace to the stability of the state. Wealth was concentrated in the hands of a small class, and many of the small peasant farmers found themselves dispossessed of their lands and reduced to the position of serfs. The courts were venial, and the poor were denied the protection of the law. In such a situation the prophets championed the rights of the oppressed, as their predecessors had done, and championed them in the name of religion and not merely in the name of humanity. Amos and Hosea belonged to the time of Jeroboam and the period immediately following, and their prophecies give a vivid insight into the social ills of the time. They show that the forms of religion were still maintained—indeed, splendidly maintained. Nevertheless, in the prophetic view Israel's religion consisted, not simply in the observance of ritual, but in the maintenance of a covenant which bound the people to God and to one another. "You shall love the Lord your God . . . , and your neighbor as yourself," is a fitting summary of the prophetic demand no less than of Christ's.

In the S kingdom Uzziah's long reign fell largely at the same time as Jeroboam's in the N, and it saw a similar prosperity and some expansion against Judah's neighbors in the S. That it brought similar ills in its train is clear from the prophecies of Isaiah and Micah, though the work of both prophets fell somewhat later.

8. The fall of Samaria. To the prophet the collapse of the N kingdom was due to its weakness and disloyalty; to the historian it was due to the irresistible power of a revived Assyria. The prophet was aware of this power, and regarded it as the divine means of disciplining Israel; the historian is aware of the part the seething discontent within the land and the bitter divisions among the little W states played in exposing them to the new peril. In 745 B.C., Tiglath-pileser seized the Assyrian throne, and soon showed himself a vigorous and ruthless ruler. The system of deportation of conquered peoples which he began was continued by his successors, and this inevitably checked the recovery of the states once reduced to dependence. Before Assyrian arms brought menace to Israel, however, the inner weakness of the state was manifest. For after the death of Jeroboam II there were frequent revolutions, and no king continued long on the throne. One party pinned its faith to Egypt and another favored submission to Assyria, with a resulting inner strife that ensured that no policy should be successful. In 734 B.C. there was an attempt to revive an anti-Assyrian alliance in the W, and Israel joined with Damascus to bring pressure on Judah to join it. Instead of joining the alliance, Ahaz, the king of Judah, appealed to Assyria for help, in continuance of the already noted policy of embracing a more distant menace to avoid a nearer. The prophet Isaiah had only contempt for the W allies, though he did not favor the appeal for Assyrian aid. This aid brought relief; it also brought the end of the Damascus kingdom, and so brought the dreaded foe to the borders of Israel. Within a few years the Assyrians were on Israelite soil, and after a stubborn resistance Samaria was captured, many of its citizens deported, and the N kingdom had come to an end.

9. The kingdom of Judah. One of the most vexed questions of OT chronology concerns the date of Hezekiah's accession to the throne, since the biblical data do not seem to be self-consistent (see CHRONOLOGY OF THE OT). There is therefore disagreement among scholars as to whether he was already on the throne at the time of the fall of Samaria. In any case, Judah was not involved in the disaster of her neighbor, and this little kingdom survived for a further century and a half. She was now the buffer state between Assyria and Egypt, and therefore the scene of constant intrigue. It was not only Egypt that intrigued here. Babylon was restless under Assyrian rule, and Merodach-baladan, a Chaldean, twice sought to head a revolt in the E and to free Babylon from Assyria under his own rule. His embassy to Hezekiah (II Kings 20) was concerned with more than the king's health, and was doubtless directed toward the fomentation of rebellion in the W to synchronize with the rebellion in the E. Both of Merodach-baladan's bids for power in Babylon were crushed, the second by Sennacherib before the W plans were ripe.

In 711 B.C., Hezekiah seems to have maintained the policy of submission to Assyria which he had inherited from Ahaz, at a time when Assyrian arms were moving toward Egypt along the coast road through Philistia. A few years later, however, he was drawn into the alliance in which doubtless Merodach-baladan's envoys had been interested. Revolt in the W, with Egyptian backing, was planned, and in preparation for it Hezekiah sought to bring the same pressure on his Philistine neighbors as Samaria and Damascus had sought to bring on Ahaz. Padi, the king of Ekron, was carried to Jerusalem, and the city was brought into the alliance. Hezekiah strengthened the defenses of Jerusalem, and constructed the SILOAM tunnel to ensure the water supply of the city. He also carried through a religious reform, which was doubtless closely linked with the revolt. For Assyria imposed the worship of her gods on conquered peoples, and the altar which Ahaz had built in Jerusalem following his submission to Assyria (II Kings 16:10 ff) was an expression of the recognition of Assyrian gods. Any revolt against Assyria would therefore involve the repudiation of her gods, and the revival of the national religion. In this revival Hezekiah incorporated reform, and the most significant feature of this reform, abortive though it proved, was the centralization of Judah's religion in Jerusalem.

The prophet Isaiah did not favor the rebellion, and perceived that it could not succeed, though he consistently promised that Jerusalem itself should be spared. When Sennacherib moved against the W, the whole of Judah, with the exception of Jerusalem, was soon overrun. Hezekiah yielded without a struggle, and handed over Padi to be restored to his throne, and paid a heavy fine. Thereafter we read of the investment of Jerusalem by Assyrian troops, the closing of the gates with the support of Isaiah, and the deliverance of the city through a plague which broke out in the Assyrian camp, compelling the withdrawal of the enemy, who had moved to meet an advancing Egyptian army. While in the Bible this reads as the account of a single campaign, many scholars believe that two separate campaigns of Sennacherib are here telescoped.

In any case the reform of Hezekiah seems to have collapsed with the revolt associated with it. His successor, Manasseh, pursued the policy of submission to Assyria, and when Assyrian arms were carried into Egypt, which was conquered for a short time, Manasseh loyally supplied contingents. Manasseh's reign saw the greatest expansion of Assyrian power; before its end, however, that power was already crumbling. New foes were now appearing from the Caucasus, invading the Assyrian dominions from the N, and though for a time they were successfully met and diverted, the menace remained. Yet when Assyria fell, it fell from inner weakness as much as from external pressure. After the long reign of Ashurbanipal, the Assyrian throne knew little stability, and revolt was soon widespread. In Babylon, Nabopolassar appeared, to renew—this time successfully—the attempt of Merodach-baladan to establish a Chaldean dynasty there. In the W, Josiah revolted in alliance with other little states, which dreamed anew of freedom. That Josiah carried through a religious reform is in no way surprising, and that he should seek to give leadership to Israel as well as to Judah is not surprising. For Israel had no surviving royal house, and Israel's interest in liberation was the same as Judah's. The reform again centralized religion in Jerusalem, but this time on the basis of a book which was discovered in the temple, and which is identified by almost all scholars with the book of Deuteronomy, or at least with its core. Babylon secured her independence, and in alliance with the Medes she overthrew Assyria. In 612 B.C., Nineveh was destroyed, and though the capital was transferred to Harran, that also fell two years later.

Meanwhile Egypt, traditionally the foe of Assyria, had come to the help of the tottering empire. This may have been in part because she feared the upstart powers attacking Assyria, and in part in order that she might extend her own powers W of the Euphrates. Certainly when Assyria fell, she sought to occupy that W area, and whatever measure of freedom Josiah might have enjoyed now came to an end. The Pharaoh at once sought to consolidate his own power in the W in readiness for the inevitable struggle with Babylon, and Judah was quickly reduced to obedience, while Josiah perished for his resistance. In 605 B.C. the battle of Carchemish settled the fate of the W states. Here Nebuchadrezzar, the son of Nabopolassar, conquered Neco, who hastily withdrew to Egypt, and Egypt itself was spared invasion only through the death of Nabopolassar, which compelled Nebuchadrezzar to return to Babylon without delay to secure the kingdom for himself. It is now known that the battle of Carchemish did not finally decide the issue. A few years later Babylon was forced to meet another threat from Egypt, and another battle was fought in the S.

10. The fall of Jerusalem. Not even yet could the W believe that the new power would endure. On the death of Josiah, his younger son had been placed on the throne, but he was quickly removed by Neco in favor of Jehoiakim, who promised obedience. This obedience was in turn pledged to Babylon after the battle of Carchemish, but Jehoiakim looked for the opportunity to revolt, and later did so. Josiah's reform had collapsed with his revolt, and the suppressed shrines were soon functioning once more. Jehoiakim's revolt was short-lived when Nebuchadrezzar moved against him and his allies. Before the Chaldean armies appeared at the gates of Jerusalem, the king had died and his son Jehoiachin had succeeded him. The city surrendered, and Jehoiachin was carried off to Babylon to face a long captivity. We now know from surviving tablets that children were born to him there, and we have particulars of the allowances of food made to the king and his family (cf. E. F. Weidner [see bibliography]). Meanwhile his uncle, Zedekiah, had been placed on the throne in Jerusalem. Many of the leading people of the city had been carried away with Jehoiachin, and the weak Zedekiah, with no wise counselors to guide him, save the prophet Jeremiah, whose advice he had not the strength to take, became drawn into fresh Egyptian plots and rebelled against Babylon once more, bringing down on himself and his people the horrors of the long siege of Jerusalem, and ultimately the destruction of the city and the temple, and the end of the kingdom of David. In the surviving Lachish Letters we have contemporary records from a time shortly before the fall of Jerusalem, and while they add little to our knowledge of events, they reveal the tension and recrimination that marked the closing stages of the resistance to Nebuchadrezzar. See LACHISH.

11. The Exile and restoration. Large numbers of the people were carried away to Babylon when Jerusalem fell. Soon fresh troubles came upon the unhappy people left behind, for Gedaliah, who had been made governor by the conqueror, was murdered, and his companions fled to take refuge in Egypt, taking Jeremiah the prophet with them. In the years that followed, the Edomites pressed in on the people of Judah who survived, leaving bitter memories that long persisted; but otherwise we have little knowledge of the state of the land. The exiles seem to have cherished in an alien land the faith they had been frequently reproved by prophets for forsaking, and while there were doubtless some who were absorbed into the community among which they lived, there were others who maintained their separateness and cherished the hope of restoration to their land. In this they were helped by the prophet Ezekiel, whose despair for Jerusalem before its fall was matched by his hope of a new temple and a reorganized cultus. Many of the exiles gradually settled down in Babylonia, and a century later we find a successful firm of Jewish bankers there.

Nebuchadrezzar was not only a great warrior, but also a wise and enlightened ruler, whose inscriptions tell of his works of peace more than of his victories (see NEBUCHADREZZAR). No comparable ruler of this line followed him. After his death there were a few years of disorder, during which three rulers followed him, and then NABONIDUS seized the throne. For most of his reign he lived in Tema, leaving the administration of the state in the hands of his son Belshazzar. From a surviving lampoon in verse we know of the contempt in which Nabonidus was held, and a fragment from Qumran describes him as mad. The land was seething with discontent, and was in no state to meet a new peril which had arisen. CYRUS, king of Anshan, had become king of Persia, and then revolted against his overlord, the Median king, and within a few years had conquered Croesus, king of Lydia. Here was a clear menace to the Babylonian kingdom, and before long the arms of Cyrus were directed against it.

Among the Jewish exiles was the prophet whom we call Deutero-Isaiah, who quickly perceived the significance of the new star on the horizon, and heartened his people with the promise of deliverance. Cyrus won a victory at Opis, and shortly afterward Babylon fell without a blow, and the Babylonian Empire was annexed to the Persian. Cyrus soon gave the Jews permission to return to their land and to rebuild their temple. A few seem to have returned, but the rebuilding of the temple was delayed. The enthusiasm of hopes was exchanged for the hard realities of rebuilding their homes and their life among the dispirited people they found in Judea.

12. The Persian period. Of the history of the Jews in the Persian period relatively little is known. On the death of Cyrus, Cambyses became king, and during his reign Egypt was added to the Persian Empire. We learn from the ELEPHANTINE PAPYRI, which were found in Egypt ca. the beginning of the twentieth century, that there was already a Jewish colony in the island of Elephantine, opposite Assuan, when Cambyses invaded Egypt, and that the Jews had a temple of their own God there, which Cambyses left undisturbed. How far back this colony went can only be conjectured. It continued to exist for more than a century after the Persian invasion, and it became a Persian military outpost.

Cambyses did not return from his Egyptian campaign. One Gaumata laid claim to the throne, giving himself out to be Smerdis, brother of Cambyses, who had been put to death by the king before setting out for Egypt. For a time it looked as though the Persian Empire would fall to pieces, the various provinces each taking advantage of the situation to resume their independence. At this time ZERUBBABEL, who was of the house of David, was the governor of Jerusalem. It is not surprising, therefore, that the Jews should have dreamed of the restoration of the kingdom of David, and before long we find the prophets Haggai and Zechariah calling for the rebuilding of the temple, and seeking to revive the national life on the basis of the national religion.

Meanwhile Darius Hystaspis, who was a kinsman of Cyrus, though not in the direct line of succession, assumed the leadership, and quickly eliminated Gaumata, and then set to work to reduce the provinces one by one to obedience. In this he was completely successful, and before long the Persian Empire was restored, and then given a more solid organization than it had yet had. Before the Jews were reduced, the rebuilding of the temple had been begun, and Zechariah had visions of Zerubbabel and the high priest standing side by side as the crowned heads of the restored Jewish state. Suddenly Zerubbabel disappears from the picture, and we can only suppose that in some unrecorded way Judea came again under the Persian sway and Zerubbabel was eliminated for his rebellion. Nevertheless, the building of the temple continued. The Samaritan community appealed to the king to stop this, but the people of Jerusalem were able to produce the authority to rebuild the temple granted by Cyrus, and they were allowed to continue the work, and in 516 B.C. it was completed. From the beginning the Persian religious policy toward subject peoples was more enlightened than the Assyrian policy had been, and it was under the Persian rule that Judaism was established.

For the next half century we have no secure knowledge of Jewish history. We read of an abortive attempt to rebuild the walls of the city in the reign of Artaxerxes (Ezra 4:7-24), and this was almost certainly Artaxerxes I. Again, there was an appeal to the court against this rebuilding from Samaria, this time successful, and the king ordered the forcible interference with the work, pending his further pleasure. It is probably this blow to the Jerusalem community which lies behind the grief of Nehemiah on his receiving news from the city (Neh. 1:4), and it would explain his nervousness in asking the king for permission to renew the rebuilding.

That the mission of Nehemiah fell in the twentieth year of Artaxerxes I admits now of little question. His adversary was SANBALLAT, who is known from the Elephantine Papyri to have been the governor of Samaria, and at the end of the fifth century Sanballat was still governor, though the actual administration was then in the hands of his sons. The extreme caution of Nehemiah in laying his plans and the extreme speed with which he carried through the work of rebuilding the walls would alike be explained by the recent abortive attempt. Nehemiah was anxious to complete the work before there could be any renewed appeal to the court.

The mission of Ezra is less easy to place. We are told that he was sent to Jerusalem in the seventh year of Artaxerxes, and if this was also Artaxerxes I, it fell before Nehemiah's mission. The Chronicler clearly believed that Ezra was sent to put into effect the "law of the Lord" before Nehemiah came to restore the walls, but that Ezra delayed to carry out his mission for thirteen years and first read the law after Nehemiah had arrived. The abortive attempt to rebuild the walls would then appear to have fallen after Ezra's arrival, though it is nowhere associated with his name. Many scholars believe, however, that the work of Ezra lay in the reign of Artaxerxes II, and this greatly eases the difficulties. Both men are represented as having exercised independent civil and religious authority, and if both were in the city together, this is hard to understand. Both dealt with the question of mixed marriages. When Nehemiah returned to Jerusalem after reporting to the court, he found that there had been intermarriage between the family of Sanballat and that of the Jerusalem high priest, and also another enemy, Tobiah the Ammonite, was installed in a room in the temple. It was therefore political conditions that angered him, and led him to attack mixed marriages. Ezra's action was religiously inspired, and was directed against the threat that such marriages brought to the religious purity of the Jews. While the chronological problems attaching to the work of these two men cannot be settled with certainty, it seems likely that the work of Ezra should be placed later than that of Nehemiah. Some scholars would place Ezra in the reign of Artaxerxes I, but shortly after the second visit of Nehemiah. This would hardly allow time for the evil of mixed marriages to have become serious once more after Nehemiah had forcibly dissolved such marriages. To place Ezra's mission in the seventh year of Artaxerxes II would allow an adequate period for this. See bibliography.

The work of Ezra was the enforcement of a religious law which he brought from Babylon. It is not necessary to suppose that this was a new and unheard-of law. It may well have been heard of in Palestine as well as in Babylonia, and the fact that it was accepted as the law of Moses would suggest that this was so. Whether it was the completed Pentateuch or the Priestly Code is not agreed, but in either case it became accepted by the Samaritans no less than by the Jews, and its origin was therefore clearly not attributed to Ezra. By putting this law into force Ezra gave to Judaism the character it continued to have down to NT times.

One of the vexed questions of Jewish history is that of the Samaritan Schism. Throughout the post-exilic period there were recurrent crises between the Jews and Samaria, though these seem to have been political rather than religious. Since the Samaritans accepted the Pentateuch, which must have included the law book of Ezra, the final breach cannot have taken place until after the mission of Ezra, but it appears to have been final before the work of the Chronicler, who left the N kingdom entirely out of his history so far as this could be done, and who seems to have regarded the N community as no true part of Israel. See bibliography.

13. The Greek period. For the remainder of the Persian period we have little secure knowledge of Jewish history. With the rise of Alexander the Jews soon passed into his power, and from extrabiblical sources we learn that when the conqueror passed through Palestine, he was received by the high priest. Alexander advanced into Egypt and there founded Alexandria, which seems from the start to have contained a Jewish colony. This colony inevitably soon became Greek-speaking, and it was for them that the Bible was translated into Greek. The translation of the Pentateuch is ascribed by tradition to the middle of the following century, and this is probably reliable. It must be remembered, however, that there was a considerable Jewish Diaspora in other lands, and with the spread of Greek power the Greek language became widely current, so that for other Jewish communities Greek renderings would be valuable. How far the Alexandrian rendering spread elsewhere, or how far there were other local renderings which ultimately influenced what came to be known as the LXX, cannot be known with certainty.

When Alexander came to his early end, his generals fell to quarreling, and for some years the history of the period became rather like a kaleidoscope. Gradually there emerged three principal divisions, of which two concerned the Jews. These were the Ptolemaic kingdom of Egypt and the Seleucid kingdom, which included Asia Minor, Syria, Babylonia, and a rather nebulous claim to the more E conquests of Alexander, somewhat fitfully renewed from time to time. These two kingdoms are referred to in the book of Daniel as those of the S and the N respectively. Palestine soon fell within the sphere of the Ptolemies, and for more than a century continued to owe them allegiance. Nevertheless, the Seleucids claimed that it belonged to them of right. Seleucus I, who established the Seleucid kingdom, had once been a fugitive at the court of Ptolemy I, with whose help he set out to secure for himself the largest slice of the empire of Alexander. Before the battle of Ipsus it had been agreed among the victorious allies that in the event of victory Palestine should fall to Ptolemy, but the contingents of Ptolemy arrived too late to take part in the battle, and Seleucus held that the agreement was void. Since Ptolemy's troops had occupied Palestine, and since Seleucus was too conscious of his debt to Ptolemy to use force against him, he contented himself with a protest. The result was that Palestine was a bone of contention between the two houses for a century. Of the conflicts and alliances between the Seleucids and the Ptolemies, briefly summarized in Dan. 11, it is unnecessary here to treat. It must suffice to say that following the battle of Paneion, in 198 B.C., Palestine passed to the rule of the Seleucids. Antiochus III had sought twenty years earlier to wrest this region from the Ptolemies, but had failed. When he now succeeded, there were Jews who welcomed the change. It was not long, however, before they took a different view.

At this time there were inner dissensions among the Jews. The Greek kingdoms, while separately governed, claimed to be parts of the undivided empire of Alexander, and both continued Alexander's policy of spreading Greek culture and marrying it to the culture of the E. There were Jews who favored the spread of Greek culture and welcomed its influence, while there were others who clung to the separatism which Ezra had stamped deeply upon Judaism, and held aloof from it. Political and religious considerations were soon woven together. The high-priestly house of Onias stood over against the house of the Tobiads, who, before the change-over to the Seleucid rule, had secured from the Ptolemies the tax-farming rights which had formerly belonged to the high priest. Hence the Oniads favored the change to Seleucid rule. They soon found that they had secured no advantage from the change, however. The Tobiads secured their position with their new masters, and neither religiously nor politically had the Oniads strengthened theirs. It is only in the light of these internal and external factors that the conflict of the Maccabean age can be understood.

14. The Maccabean age. Antiochus III became involved in war with Rome a few years after his annexation of Palestine, and at the battle of Magnesia in 190 B.C. he was defeated and compelled to forfeit his control of Asia Minor and to pay a large indemnity. His successor, Seleucus IV, inherited an exchequer depleted by wars, and a reduced kingdom to provide the indemnity. The high taxation this involved contributed to the unpopularity of Seleucid rule. When Seleucus turned to robbing temples to supply his needs, and sent his representative to rob the Jerusalem temple, this unpopularity among the Jews was increased, even though the attempt to rob the temple was foiled. Religious loyalty, nationalism, and resentment at oppressive taxation united one section of the people, while the pro-Seleucid elements reacted more strongly in favor of Greek culture.

When Seleucus was murdered by Heliodorus, who proclaimed the infant son of Seleucus as king, with the real power in his own hands, Antiochus, brother of Seleucus, soon landed in Syria to eliminate Heliodorus and to take his nephew under his own protection, and then to eliminate him and leave himself on the throne (see ANTIOCHUS 4). Antiochus had been a hostage in Rome, but had been replaced by Demetrius, the son and rightful successor of Seleucus. Antiochus was not, therefore, the heir to the throne, and it is not surprising that the elements in Palestine who were disaffected toward the Seleucids disputed his title to rule them. Antiochus, who became known as Antiochus Epiphanes, was not long in seeking to exploit dynastic troubles in Egypt in order to get possession of the Ptolemaic kingdom. His nephews, the two disputing Ptolemies, hastened to make up their quarrels, perhaps moved by the fate of the son of Seleucus. Before long, Antiochus made an open move against Egypt, but this time was foiled by the ambassador of Rome, to whose Senate Egypt had appealed for help.

Humiliated and angry, Antiochus fell back on Jerusalem. Here he found a complex situation. Already before this, Onias had been removed from office through inner Jewish intrigues, and the high priesthood had been bartered to the highest bidder. Deep personal feelings had been aroused, and all the religiously loyal had been driven to the side of Onias. This high priest had been himself put to death before the time we have now reached, but the bitter divisions continued. Now Antiochus determined to destroy the religion of Judaism, since he judged that though religious and political considerations were woven together in the opposition to himself, this opposition would collapse if its religious root were extirpated. It has been said that it was the policy of the Greek rulers to foster Greek culture. Antiochus therefore now pursued this policy in Palestine with greater vigor and violence than any of his predecessors. All the practices of the Jewish faith were forbidden, the temple was desecrated and turned into a shrine of Zeus, and the Jews were ordered to eat unclean foods and to sacrifice to idols.

It was this situation which brought about the Jewish revolt under the Maccabees. Led at first by Judas Maccabeus, the rebels scored initial successes against the forces sent by Antiochus, until the temple was recovered, cleansed, and rededicated, though a Seleucid garrison continued to occupy the citadel in Jerusalem. The death of Antiochus in the E led to a period of confusion in the Seleucid kingdom, with upstarts and pretenders taking part in the internal wars that followed. Judas Maccabeus was himself killed in 161 B.C., but he was followed by his brothers Jonathan and Simon in turn, and these took advantage of the troubles in Syria to barter their support now to one and now to another, so as to secure their own position and to gain Jewish independence. The result was the Hasmonean rule, which continued down to the Roman annexation of Palestine. The Maccabean family was a priestly house, though not in the high-priestly line. The successors of Judas nevertheless assumed the high priesthood, and later took the title of king, thus combining in a single person these two offices, save for a period when the civil office was held by a woman.

It was this period which saw the rise of the Jewish parties known as Pharisees and Sadducees. Other Jewish sects seem also to have been born in the second century B.C. According to Josephus the Essenes already existed in the middle of that century. By many writers the sect of the DEAD SEA SCROLLS is identified with the Essenes. Whether or not this identification is allowed, it is commonly believed that the sect of the Scrolls took its origin in some way from the troubles of the Maccabean age, though there is less agreement as to when the Teacher of Righteousness of that sect lived.

15. The Roman period. At the end of the second century there was much tension between the Pharisees and the Sadducees, and this continued into the first century, when, under Alexander Janneus, the Pharisees were ranged in opposition to the king, whose enemies at one point invoked the aid of Demetrius III against him. Arising from this, a large number of the Pharisees were crucified by Janneus. In the middle of the first century, however, Palestine became involved in the Roman civil wars, and the army of Pompey came to Jerusalem and brought the Jews under Roman control. Soon Herod, an Idumean, skilfully exploited the dissensions in the Hasmonean family, and secured from Rome the title of king, though he had yet to win his kingdom, which was, of course, still subject to Rome. He succeeded in winning his kingdom, and by his adroitness in dealing with the ever-changing situation arising from the civil wars among the Romans, he continued to hold the kingdom until his death in 4 B.C. In some ways he served the Jews well, though he was never loved by them and was always regarded as an alien. His ruthless cruelty was experienced by members of his own family, as well as by large numbers of his subjects, and despite the outer splendor of his reign and the building achievements which he could claim, including the undertaking of the rebuilding of the temple, he won no gratitude. See HEROD [FAMILY].

After his death his kingdom was divided among members of his family; Archelaus secured the rule of Judea for a few years, until he was displaced and Judea was brought under direct Roman rule. The other parts of Herod's kingdom continued to be ruled by members of the Herodian house, though still with responsibility to Rome. Again deep divisions developed among the Jews. Some cherished bitter hostility to the Romans and to all who supported them, while others sought by co-operation with Rome to further Jewish interests—and their own at the same time. The Roman rulers rarely understood the Jewish character, and were themselves of varying ability and worth. The situation therefore went from bad to worse, until in A.D. 66 the Jewish Revolt broke out. The course of the war is recounted by Josephus in The Jewish War. It was marked by fanaticism and bitter excesses even among those who fought the Romans, and despite the heroism of the rebels and the religious loyalty that made them observe the sabbath and maintain the sacrifices of the temple even when in the direst straits, the issue was the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple in A.D. 70. For a time the Roman armies were commanded by Vespasian, until he was called to wear the purple. The final capture of Jerusalem was made by his son Titus (see TITUS, EMPEROR). Among the treasures carried away by Titus, and displayed at his triumph, were the table of shewbread from the temple, the golden candlestick, and a roll of the Law. The temple itself was destroyed completely, and has never been rebuilt. It was not destroyed, however, until its work was complete. It symbolized the religion of Israel, with its high achievement, its pure monotheism, its noble prophetic teaching, and its deep personal piety. Its sacrifices might pass, as the author of the Letter to the Hebrews says, for they had been superseded by the sacrifice of enduring efficacy at Calvary. But the table, the candlestick, and the Law were fittingly carried to Rome, to symbolize the dissemination in the wider world of the faith that had sprung from Judaism—the faith whose supreme sacrament centers in a table, whose Lord is the light of the world, and whose roots are so firmly embedded in Israel's history that without the Old Covenant it cannot be fully understood.

Bibliography. J. W. Rothstein, Juden und Samaritaner, BWAT, vol. 3 (1908). E. Schürer, Geschichte des jüdischen Volkes im Zeitalter Jesu Christi (3 vols.; 4th ed., 1901-9). R. Kittel, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, I (6th ed., 1923); II (6th ed., 1925); III (1927-29). A. Schlatter, Geschichte Israels von Alexander dem Grossen bis Hadrian (3rd ed., 1925). W. Kolbe, Beiträge zur syrischen und jüdischen Geschichte, BWANT, N.F. 10 (1926). H. H. Schaeder, Esra der Schreiber (1930). A. Jirku, Geschichte des Volkes Israel (1931). E. Meyer, Geschichte des Altertums, II (2 vols.; 2nd ed., 1928-31). A. T. Olmstead, History of Palestine and Syria to the Macedonian Conquest (1931). W. F. Albright, The Archaeology of Palestine and the Bible (1932). A. Lods, Israel from Its Beginnings to the Middle of the Eighth Century (English trans. S. H. Hooke; 1932). W. O. E. Oesterley and T. H. Robinson, A History of Israel (2 vols.; 1932). E. Bickermann, Der Gott der Makkabäer. Untersuchungen über Sinn und Ursprung der makkabäischen Erhebung (1937). A. Lods, The Prophets and the Rise of Judaism (English trans. S. H. Hooke; 1937). A. H. M. Jones, The Herods of Judea (1938). E. F. Weidner, "Jojachin, König von Juda, in babylonischen Keilschrifttexten," Mélanges syriens, II (1939), 923 ff. W. F. Albright, The Archaeology of Palestine (1949). T. J. Meek, Hebrew Origins (2nd ed., 1950). H. H. Rowley, From Joseph to Joshua (1950); "Recent Discovery and the Patriarchal Age," The Servant of the Lord (1952), pp. 217 ff; also "The Chronological Order of Ezra and Nehemiah," pp. 131 ff. F.-M. Abel, Histoire de la Palestine depuis la conquête d'Alexandre jusqu'à l'invasion arabe (2 vols.; 1952). W. F. Albright, The Biblical Period (1952). A. Alt, Kleine Schriften zur Geschichte des Volkes Israel (2 vols.; 1953). J. B. Pritchard, ed., ANET (2nd ed., 1955). G. Ricciotti, The History of Israel (trans. C. della Penta and R. T. A. Murphy; 2 vols.; 1955). H. H. Rowley, "Sanballat and the Samaritan Temple," Bulletin of the John Rylands Library, XXXVIII (1955-56), 166 ff. D. J. Wiseman, Chronicles of Chaldaean Kings (1956). M. F. Unger, Israel and the Aramaeans of Damascus (1957). G. E. Wright, Biblical Archaeology (1957). M. Noth, Gesammelte Studien zum AT (1957); Die Welt des ATs (3rd ed., 1957); History of Israel (1958). J. Bright, History of Israel (1959).

Bible atlases: P. Lemaire and D. Baldi, Atlante Storico della Bibbia (1955). L. H. Grollenberg, Atlas of the Bible (trans. and ed. J. M. H. Reid and H. H. Rowley; 1956). E. G. Kraeling, Rand McNally Bible Atlas (1956). G. E. Wright and F. V. Filson, The Westminster Historical Atlas to the Bible (2nd ed., 1956).

H. H. ROWLEY

ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF.

See ISRAEL, HISTORY OF, §§ 7-8.

ISRAEL, NAMES AND ASSOCIATIONS OF.

1. The name of Jacob the patriarch
2. A designation of the people of Israel as a whole
3. A designation of the inhabitants of the N kingdom
4. A designation of the inhabitants of the S kingdom
5. A designation of a cult community
Bibliography

1. The name of Jacob the patriarch. In Gen. 32:22 ff we are told about Elohim's wrestling with Jacob, and that because of this the latter's name was changed and he should be called Israel. This story contains an etymology of the name, what we may call a popular etymology, according to which the meaning of the name would be "El wrestles." It is commonly admitted that this interpretation cannot be said to give the real meaning of the name, and, of course, it is impossible to present decisive arguments for any etymology of a name like Israel. However, the most probable interpretation is that which connects the name Israel with the root išr/'šr, "reliable," "successful," "happy." It may be mentioned that in cuneiform texts there are names almost identical: Išrē-il, Ašri-ilišu. It seems hard to assume that such names should be explained in another way than Israel. If Israel is etymologically connected with Ašer, we are faced with the possibility that Israel is originally connected with the ancient Canaanite gods of fertility, Ašer being the male counterpart of Ašera, which is one name of the Canaanite goddess of fertility. In that case, the name Israel refers to the Canaanite substratum of OT religion, and Jacob's change of name may then refer to a merging of the tribes entering from the E with a Canaanite religious community. The "Rock of Israel" (Gen. 49: 24) has been referred to in this connection as being an allusion to the cult stone (massebah) and parallel to the "Mighty One of Jacob," the latter expression referring to the bull as the symbol of the god of fertility.

2. A designation of the people of Israel as a whole. According to the OT traditions of the growth of the Israelite nation, the patriarchs were the earliest ancestors of the people. In the scholarly discussion of these figures several theories have been advocated. According to one theory, they were real historical persons; according to another they are to be regarded as cult heroes. Since the traditions of the patriarchs were created much later than the time they reflect, they have received many features from later periods, and they can by no means be considered real historical sources. In all probability they reflect early migrations of various ethnic groups, a number of which later merged with one another. As a matter of fact, they have been associated with cult centers, Abraham with Hebron, Isaac with Beer-sheba, and Jacob with Bethel.

In the traditions about the sojourn in Egypt and the Exodus from there, the wandering through the desert and entering into Canaan under Joshua, the name of "Israel," or more commonly the "children of Israel," is used about the Israelite people as a whole, and accordingly the twelve tribes of Israel all appear in these traditions. It is true, in several passages the term "Hebrews" is used. In the sections of the OT dealing with the people after the invasion of Canaan, "Israel" is used as a designation of the people as a whole (Deuteronomy–Samuel), consisting of twelve tribes. If we compare various lists of the twelve tribes, a few variations are found. In Gen. 49 we encounter the twelve sons of Jacob, whereas in Deut. 33 the tribe of Simeon is omitted and the tribe of Joseph is divided into two tribes, Ephraim and Manasseh. The system of the twelve tribes is now admitted to have originated in Palestine, and accordingly, this system as applied to earlier periods is not historical. The traditions about the early periods may be said to be a schematic outline of historical events during many centuries.

3. A designation of the inhabitants of the N kingdom. In passages like II Sam. 2:9, 17; 3:10; 19: 41; 20:1; I Kings 12:16, the name Israel is used about the N tribes, whose center is Ephraim. The mountain of Israel is found in Josh. 11:16, 21. After the division of the United Kingdom into two, Israel is the name of the N kingdom (I Kings 14:19, etc.) Other expressions are, e.g., the "house of Israel" (I Kings 12:21; Hos. 5;1; Amos 5:1; Mic. 1:5; etc.).

4. A designation of the inhabitants of the S kingdom. In some passages Israel is used about the S kingdom (e.g., Isa. 5:7; Mic. 3:1). This is particularly the case after the fall of the N kingdom.

5. A designation of a cult community. The name Israel has come into use as a designation of the Israelite people, and from an early time particularly of the N tribes, in Canaan. In this development Canaanite elements played an important role, several of the Israelite tribes being Canaanite or other ethnic groups. But when the Israelite nation became conscious of its national characteristics, it was the belief in the national god Yahweh that was the basis of the Israelite nation. Because of this belief not only was the name Israel used as a designation of the cult unity bound up with the worship of Yahweh, but also the figure of Israel became a religious ideal (see, e.g., Isa. 1:3; 4:2; 49:3). This religious basis of the national consciousness is particularly to be observed in the idea of the people of Israel as the people chosen by Yahweh, and in the idea of the covenant. These ideas are the chief recurrent theme in the whole OT conception of the history of the Israelite people. Since the idea of the Israelite people as Yahweh's chosen people was especially connected with the temple of Jerusalem onward from the period when that temple became the only legitimate cult place, these religious ideas have remained the basis of the national consciousness of the Jews through the ages. As an example it may be mentioned that the name Israel was used by the Maccabeans to designate the kingdom of the Jews, and this is the case with the Jewish kingdom in Palestine of the present day.

Bibliography. G. A. Danell, Studies in the Name of Israel in the OT (1946), with further references; I. Engnell, review of Danell's book in Symbolae Biblicae Upsalienses, no. 7 (1946).

A. HALDAR

ISRAEL, RELIGION OF. See HEBREW RELIGION.

ISRAEL, SOCIAL AND ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT OF. The people of Israel, dwelling in Palestine, experienced a long and complex social and economic development, extending through several stages of cultural evolution.

1. The nomadic stage
2. The agricultural stage
3. The international-commercial stage
4. The postexilic period
Bibliography

1. The nomadic stage. Israel, like the other Semitic peoples of antiquity, had its origins in the Arabian Desert, particularly in its N stretches. Contrary to the nationalized, biblical tradition, Israel emerged from the desert and established itself in Palestine, not as a single, united people, but rather as separate, independent, or, at the most, loosely federated clans or tribes. During this pre-Palestine, desert period the Israelites lived as nomads, the only way of life which the desert permits. Their wealth consisted primarily of sheep and goats. The problem of food supply for themselves and their animals confronted them constantly. See NOMADISM.

Their religious belief and practice were correspondingly primitive. Their gods they conceived of as supernatural powers responsible for their existence, both as individuals and as clan or tribal groups, and whose immediate, divine task was therefore to provide for their physical needs, to make both their women and their animals fertile, to guarantee their safety during their desert wanderings, and to give them victory over all enemies. Each clan or tribe, a complete social unit unto itself in every respect, had its own particular deity, a god of distinctly local character, thought to dwell in some one, single spot—a mountain perhaps, or a life-giving spring of water. See HEBREW RELIGION.

These ancient Semitic, desert clans, for the most part at least, practiced beena MARRIAGE, and accordingly traced kinship through the mothers alone. Endogamy was strictly prohibited. The women of a clan received visits, either momentary or prolonged, from men of other clans. The offspring of such matings belonged to the clan of the mother. Fatherhood, frequently—perhaps usually—unknown, was inconsequential. Many scholars maintain that the more primitive Semitic society was patriarchal, or that it also had fratriarchal and matriarchal elements, being primarily patriarchal.

Within the clan absolute social equality and democracy prevailed. Everyone was equal in every respect. Clan action was initiated only upon the decision of its male members, or at least of the oldest, most experienced, and presumably therefore wisest, among them—in other words, the elders. Right and wrong were determined primarily by custom and tradition. Those male members recognized as the most authoritative custodians of time-honored customs and traditions functioned as judges. Conformity to ancient custom and tradition was the norm in rendering judgment. But the principle of absolute democracy withheld from these so-called judges, or even from the clan itself, authority to enforce their judgments. Public opinion within the clan alone exercised this power. Any member of the clan might, if he chose, disregard the decision of the judges. But in such case public opinion might expel him from the clan, deprive him of all privileges of membership therein, including protection by both clan deity and kinsmen, and force him out into solitary and exceedingly precarious desert existence (cf. Gen. 4: 14).

2. The agricultural stage. The country of Palestine divides naturally into two distinct sections. An imaginary, E-W line just N of Jerusalem would effectively mark this division. N of this line the country is, as a whole, fertile and well watered. Accordingly agriculture has always been the basic occupation of its population. S of this line the country is, in the main, poorly watered, sterile, and in places even barren. Therefore, its dominant occupation in biblical times was sheep-raising.

This S section was conquered and settled by the clans of Judah ca. the middle of the thirteenth century B.C. They entered from the S, led by the Levite Moses. Firmly established in this southernmost section of Palestine, their way of life changed but little from what it had been of old. David it was who finally welded these clans into the single tribe of Judah, and this tribe, in turn, through integration with other seminomadic clans and tribes in the far S, into the kingdom of Judah in its initial stage, with himself functioning as king.

N of this imaginary line conditions differed radically, both because of the relative fertility of this section and its consequent ability to support a larger and more densely settled population and because of earlier entrance of Israelites into it. Here Israelites first established themselves permanently in the district N of the Valley of Jezreel ca. 1400. The occupation of the entire N section was completed by other nomadic or seminomadic Israelites certainly not later than 1300. Not impossibly with some of these the transition from clan to tribal organization may have begun prior to entrance into the land. On the other hand, the tribe of Manasseh certainly evolved within Palestine through the fusion, following the protracted and devastating forays of marauding Midianite nomads and their ultimate conquest by Gideon, of the decimated clans of Machir, Jair, and Abiezer, and quite probably of remnants of other neighboring clans as well. Moreover, that the nomadic spirit of democracy still persisted in the thought and culture of these clans is evidenced by Gideon's absolute refusal to accept the proffered kingship (Judg. 8:22-23). Obviously the very concept of royalty, with its absolute authority, particularly over kinsmen, was abhorrent to him.

This second group of invading Israelite clans and tribes seem to have established themselves at first in the more mountainous section of Central Palestine, bordering the Jordan Valley. Confrontation by a common enemy, the native Canaanites, and also the consciousness of a common, desert background, culture, and religion, tended to draw these N Israelite clans and tribes together upon occasion into loose, intertribal federation. Such was the case at the decisive Battle of Taanach (Judg. 4–5). However, even in this battle only those tribes immediately contiguous to the Valley of Jezreel, and therefore directly endangered by the federation against them of Canaanite city-states within the Valley, participated. This victory established definitive Israelite domination of this entire N section of the country.

Now firmly settled in the land, these N Israelite clans and tribes quickly absorbed much of the Canaanite way of life, its agricultural techniques and institutions, its language, and its religion. Eventually, however, with the progressive integration of the surviving Canaanite population with their Israelite conquerors, and with this the termination of the earlier, common, Canaanite danger, the impulse to intertribal federation gradually weakened. The tribes N of the Valley of Jezreel and likewise, to some extent at least, those E of the Jordan, and also the tribe of Dan to the SW, along the seacoast, relaxed in considerable measure their sense of intertribal obligation and tended to go each its own way. In consequence the tribes of Central Palestine, Ephraim, Manasseh, and Benjamin, came to constitute a sort of tribal federation, still rather loose, but decidedly more closely integrated than anything previously existent among the N Israelites. In the main, especially for these tribes of Central Palestine, this was a period of steadily expanding life and culture, growing prosperity, sense of security, and belonging to the land.

However, the advent of the PHILISTINES, early in the twelfth century, changed all this. Migrating from Crete, they eventually established themselves along the S Palestinian coastland. They contributed to West Asiatic culture knowledge of the production of iron and the fabrication of iron weapons and tools. Eventually they undertook to expand their territory. Early in the twelfth century the whole of Central Palestine, from the N border of Benjamin to the N edge of the Valley of Jezreel, had come under repressive Philistine domination.

However, a half century or so later the prophet Samuel, realizing that a leader and deliverer would hardly arise either from Ephraim, his own tribe, or from equally crushed and dispirited Manasseh, turned his gaze farther afield, to the kindred and still unconquered tribe of Benjamin. He understood that to achieve this goal a much closer and more effective and stable organization than the former, loose, intertribal federation was imperative. Accordingly, when chance brought to him the Benjaminite Saul, and this too at a most auspicious moment, the New Year's Day, Samuel, convinced that Yahweh had chosen this man and sent him to him for a purpose, anointed Saul as king (I Sam. 9:1–10:1)—king over a united Israel, but a united Israel which, for the moment, consisted, and that merely in theory and hope, of only Benjamin and the remnant of conquered Ephraim and Manasseh. Thus Israel became a monarchy.

Saul's entire reign was devoted to unremitting but fruitless warfare against the Philistines. The failure of the Ephraimites and Manassites to rally to him compelled him to operate almost entirely on the defensive. Small wonder that he failed completely in the task Samuel had laid upon him. With his death Benjamin too came completely under Philistine domination.

David, Saul's successor, was a man of extraordinary ability. Operating primarily from his assured position as king of Judah and only secondarily from that of being Saul's son-in-law—and therefore, in conformity with one rule of succession to the kingship current among Western Semites in that relatively early day, also king of Benjamin and the N tribes—David captured the hitherto impregnable Canaanite city-state, Jerusalem. Through Jerusalem passed the all-important trade route leading upward from South Arabia, through Ezion-geber, at the N tip of the Gulf of Aqabah, then through the lower Arabah, Judah, Israel, and onward to Tyre. Now in complete control of this one, indispensable avenue of communication between N and S, David joined the two kingdoms of Judah and Israel into the so-called United Kingdom, and strengthened this union by enforcing his claim to Michal, Saul's daughter, as his wife, and thereby his right of succession to Saul as king of Israel (II Sam. 3:12-16). The Philistines were reduced to vassalage. And, taking advantage of the contemporary low ebb of power of the surrounding nations, Egypt, the Hittites, Assyria, and Babylonia, David established an Israelite empire, which extended from Ezion-geber northward to Kadesh on the Orontes, and from the Mediterranean coast as far N as Mount Carmel and thence from the Lebanon Mountains eastward to the Great Desert. Naturally within this United Kingdom of Israel, under David's able and aggressive leadership, his own tribe, Judah, was dominant.

3. The international-commercial stage. Shortly before this time, the final decade of the eleventh century, Tyre had become the commercial metropolis of the world. The new united Israel was Tyre's immediate neighbor, linked to it directly by the trade route from Ezion-geber through Jerusalem. Relations of friendship and alliance were quickly established. Tyrian merchants began to frequent Israel, bartering the commodities of foreign lands for Israel's products. The establishment of the Davidic empire inaugurated a period of relative peace for all Western Asia, which endured for well over a half century. The people of Palestine could now, as never before, undisturbedly carry on their normal occupations. Now the Israelite farmers of the N began to raise crops far in excess of local needs. This surplus they could dispose of to these Phoenician merchants. Steadily this process expanded. Foreign commodities became increasingly plenteous, and with this slowly but surely the standard of living rose. In due time a merchant class evolved. Their activities expanded steadily, and their wealth and influence increased correspondingly. More and more they centered their transactions, and with this their residence, in the cities, where they could operate upon an ever widening and more remunerative scale. They built luxurious homes and acquired servants and slaves. They traveled about in horse-drawn chariots, carrying on their manifold enterprises. Their women and children were garbed in foreign textures, and foreign commodities to an ever-increasing extent satisfied their daily needs. The cities grew in size, wealth, and economic power, and among them especially Jerusalem, the capital. Class distinctions gradually evolved, and a city-dwelling aristocracy, consisting in the main of court personnel, military dignitaries, government officials, and wealthy merchants, soon asserted itself, which contrasted strikingly with the mass of the people, the peasants of the N and the shepherds and small farmers of the S. As might be expected, the agricultural N, having far more to barter, advanced further and more rapidly in this economic and attendant cultural evolution than did the pastoral S.

This program, inaugurated by David, was greatly expanded by his very able son and successor, Solomon. Relations with Tyre were drawn closer, while at the same time Israel inaugurated direct commercial contacts with neighboring nations. Traffic in horses and chariots was cultivated particularly (I Kings 10:14-29). The mineral resources of the country, and especially the copper mines in the Arabah, were exploited extensively, in the main by slave labor. And Solomon even developed Ezion-geber as a seaport and from there with his own fleet began to exploit the potentially rich commerce of the Red Sea and the Indian Ocean (I Kings 9:26-28). Steadily the wealth of the nation grew; its international role expanded; and its way of life, its social organization, and its culture were transformed, particularly for its urban population. Likewise during this period, largely in response to the demands of empire administration and the promotion of international commerce, scribal activity increased, and Hebrew literature had its beginnings.

Quite naturally the stronghold of this new, evolving Israelite culture was Jerusalem, the capital. Other cities, particularly in the agricultural N, throve and underwent corresponding social and cultural transformation, but in far less degree than Jerusalem. And equally naturally, a decided division and more or less latent antagonism in cultural and religious outlook and practice sprang up between the progressive and class-conscious city-dwellers, particularly those of Jerusalem, and the rural population, the conservative-minded farmers of the N and the decidedly reactionary shepherds of the S.

With the death of Solomon the Israelite empire dissolved, and also the United Kingdom resolved itself into its two component parts, the agricultural N and the predominantly pastoral S, organized thenceforth as two distinct kingdoms, Israel and Judah. At times a state of hostility—of varying intensity, however—kept the two nations apart. But, in the main, the more or less conscious realization of joint dependence upon a common source of self-sufficiency—viz., undisturbed control of the trade route from Ezion-geber to Tyre—tended to maintain peaceful, and occasionally even co-operative, relations between them, to link both of them together to Tyre, and likewise to bring both into natural competition with and active hostility to Aram.

Immediately following the division of the kingdom and the resultant termination of international contacts, Israel, the Northern Kingdom, reverted to its earlier agricultural economy. Under Ahab, however, and again apparently under Jeroboam II, mediated by renewed, close, co-operative relations with both Judah and Tyre, international commerce flourished anew, and urban life, with its attendant social class distinctions, expanded greatly, especially in the thriving N. It was in large measure these circumstances, and particularly those of social and economic character, such as the steady increase in wealth and power of the rich, their luxurious, self-indulgent living, their dishonest business practices and the attendant, steadily expanding oppression and enslavement of the poor, which seemed to contravene in every way the democratic manner of life instituted by Yahweh for his people and accepted by them as a basic condition of their covenant relationship with him, which summoned to action the two shepherd-prophets, Elijah in the reign of Ahab, and Amos in the reign of Jeroboam II.

In Judah conditions remained much as they had been. If anything, the contrast between Jerusalem, with its distinctly urban cultural and social stratification, and Judah proper, with its rural, predominantly pastoral population—the so-called 'am ha'areṣ, "people of the land" (cf. II Kings 11:14, 18-20)—became even more clearly defined. After this general pattern economic, social, and cultural conditions persisted, in Israel until its final overthrow by the Assyrians in 721, and likewise in Judah until its conquest by the Babylonians in 586.

4. The postexilic period. The Babylonian conqueror, Nebuchadnezzar, captured, laid in ruins, and carried off to exile in distant Babylonia large sections of the population, not only of Jerusalem (II Kings 24:11-16; 25:22), but also of all the other fortified cities of Judah. With this, urban life and its attendant economic and social circumstances and activities came to a sudden and complete end. Only the lower social strata, in large measure the rural population, remained resident in the land. Farming and grazing became again the dominant occupations, and the general culture of the Judean community reverted very largely to the agricultural level, with the attendant revival of the long-outgrown agricultural way of life and many of its distinctive institutions. During the early portion of this exilic period life for these Judean farmers in their native land seems to have been difficult indeed. Gradually, however, despite occasional poor crops, the economy of the people seems to have become satisfactorily stabilized, and some, and perhaps even many, to have prospered sufficiently for them to dwell in ceiled houses and even to seem economically capable of rebuilding the temple (Hag. 1:2-11). During this seventy-year period, throughout which the temple lay in ruins (586-516), these Judean farmers seem to have, quite naturally, expanded the role of the SYNAGOGUE as the center of local religious observance, and in such measure that it apparently satisfied all their needs of worship, with the result that their initial response to Haggai's plea that they rebuild the temple was apparently one of indifference at the very least.

The message of that exalted prophet Deutero-Isaiah (see ISAIAH) plainly influenced the thought and program of this Judean community far more than it did those of the Babylonian Jewish exiles, to whom it was primarily directed. It proclaimed the absolute unity and universal character and authority of Yahweh, Israel's native deity, as the one, sole God of the world, the unity of the world itself and of mankind therein in conformity with the divine plan, the impending realization of this world unity through the establishment of a world empire by Cyrus the Persian, chosen for this service by Yahweh and destined by him to be the world king, his messiah (Isa. 45:1). It proclaimed further that Israel was no longer a political entity, a nation, but was rather a people, Yahweh's people, chosen by him to be his servant, the agent of his purposed salvation for all mankind, and for the discharge of this service destined to be restored by Cyrus from exile in Babylonia to the cherished homeland.

The closing years of the Babylonian exile found the Jewish community of Palestine divided into two distinct parties, which may aptly be termed the nationalists and the universalists. Both parties, responding in this one respect to Deutero-Isaiah's message, were definitely universalistic in principle and program. The nationalists cherished the eager hope for regained Jewish political independence and the reestablishment of the ancient Judean kingdom under a line of kings of the divinely chosen, ever-enduring Davidic dynasty. The suicide of Cambyses in 522 B.C., and with this the sudden collapse of the short-lived dynasty of Cyrus, coupled with the attendant chaos and the seemingly impending collapse of the Persian Empire, encouraged these nationalists in their hopes and plans. They readily accepted Deutero-Isaiah's thought of a divinely purposed world empire, but, rejecting a portion of the prophet's full message, held that Yahweh, truly the one, universal God, but nevertheless Israel's own god primarily, could never have intended that any people other than Israel should permanently administer this world empire, nor any dynasty other than that of David rule over it eternally. Moreover, the time was ripe, so they believed, for the achievement of their program. The result was the altogether futile rebellion of Zerubbabel in 520-519 (Hag. 2:20-23; Zech. 4:6-7*a*).

With the collapse of the Zerubbabel rebellion the universalists came to the fore. This party apparently accepted the Deutero-Isaianic message and program practically in toto. With the aid of the Persian government the second temple was erected and was formally dedicated upon the New Year's Day of 516. This was a significant moment indeed. Conforming to the basic theme of Deutero-Isaiah's message, that Yahweh had chosen Israel, not at all to be a nation, ruled by a king of the Davidic line, but rather to be his people, his servant, the agent of his salvation of all mankind, these universalists now transformed the former Jewish nation into a people, a religious people, a theocracy, under the meaningful name qᵉhal Yahweh, the "community of Yahweh," a community whose true and sole king was Yahweh himself, and whose natural, earthly representative and spokesman was the chief priest of the new temple. Furthermore, accepting, apparently unconditionally, the role of Israel as Yahweh's servant, the agent of his purposed world salvation, these universalists inaugurated an active program of proselytism, which apparently won many converts to Judaism and admission into the "community of Yahweh." This program continued in effect so long as this second temple stood and the universalist party remained dominant. This was, however, only thirty years.

It came to a sudden and catastrophic end through a second attempt at rebellion from Persia by the nationalists at the death of Darius I late in 486. This rebellion was crushed by Xerxes, Darius I's successor, quickly and ruthlessly by permitting and encouraging Judah's immediate and bitterly hostile neighbors, Edom, Moab, Ammon, and the Philistines, to invade the country. They encountered practically no resistance from the nationalists, who relied entirely upon Yahweh's presumptive promise to himself subdue all nations beneath them (Deut. 20:10-20) and thus establish the destined Jewish world empire. The country was ravaged, Jerusalem was taken, and its walls and gates were destroyed. The second temple was burned to the ground. Many of the people were massacred pitilessly, while others, taken captive, were sold, in the slave markets of Tyre and Gaza, unto the farthest corners of the then known world (Joel 3:1-8—H 4:1-8). The Jewish community of Judea was left but a tiny, pitiful remnant of its former self (Neh. 1:2-3).

With the return, in 458, from Babylonian exile of Ezra and his band and the erection by him of the third temple, with Persian authorization and support, conditions within the Jewish community of Palestine became slowly but steadily stable once again. Urban life began to revive in Jerusalem. The rebuilding of the city walls by Nehemiah in 444 stimulated this trend greatly. That portion of the Jewish community in Babylonia of which Ezra and his followers were representative had faced a constant challenge. Accepting Jeremiah's message, especially as reinterpreted by their fellow Zadokite, Ezekiel, of Yahweh's purpose eventually to restore exiled Israel to its native land, take it again as his people, give it a new heart, purged of all impulse to sin (Ezek. 36:16-36), and enter into a new, and now an eternal, covenant with it (Jer. 24:4-7; 31:30-33), this community was faced with a perplexing problem, how to resist assimilation and preserve its Jewish identity in a foreign land, amid a strange people, and under the compulsions of a variant and, in many respects, superior culture, so that they might be ready for the day of fulfilment of Yahweh's announced purpose with them. The solution of this problem was a program of strict Jewish separatism and particularism, the complete antithesis of the program of the universalist party of the Jewish community of Palestine, and likewise in considerable measure of that of the nationalists.

This Babylonian program of Jewish particularism and separatism Ezra sought quite naturally to impose upon the Jewish community of Palestine. Proselytism to Judaism was halted completely, and intermarriage with foreigners was prohibited. To the former universalist doctrine of the religious peoplehood of Israel, as opposed to political nationhood, Ezra and his followers subscribed fully. But for them this was an exclusive, not an inclusive, Jewish peoplehood. Israel was a people apart from all the other peoples of the world, Yahweh's people and his alone. Both Ezra and Nehemiah still designated the Jewish people by the now traditional name qᵉhal Yahweh, the "community of Yahweh" (Ezra 10:12, 14; Neh. 7:66; 8:17). However, by the close of the fifth century a new term, ʿᵃdat Yisraʾel, the "congregation of Israel," had supplanted the older term (cf. Exod. 12:3, 6, 47; II Chr. 5:6). The particularistic, almost racial implications of this term, especially when contrasted with its antecedent term, qᵉhal Yahweh, are unmistakable. As a further manifestation of the extreme particularism of the Ezranic movement and of the institutions it fostered, the penalty of excommunication, of "cutting off," of expulsion from the "congregation of Israel" for the transgression of those principles which safeguarded the Jewish integrity of this "congregation" and linked it in proper relationship with Yahweh, was instituted already in Ezra's day. And as a still further manifestation of the now dominant spirit of extreme particularism, the SAMARITANS and likewise the contemporary Jewish community of Egypt, both regarded as sprung from marriage with non-Jews, were regarded as not true Jews, and so were excluded from the "congregation of Israel."

With the erection of the third temple by Ezra, the entrenchment therein, after a prolonged struggle with the Levitical priests of the second temple, of the Zadokite or Aaronide priests as the dominant priestly functionaries (Ezek. 44:10-16), with their compilation, during the final quarter of the fifth century B.C., of the major stratum of the Priestly Code (see LAW [IN THE OT]), and with the adoption of a new, luni-solar calendar and the regulation of the festivals and other ritual occasions thereby, the character of official Judaism and the way of life of the Jewish people for the ensuing five centuries became fixed.

The Hasmonean kingdom came into being as the result of the desperate reaction of the Jewish people to the drastic transformation of their religion which Antiochus IV of Syria sought to impose upon them. The HASMONEANS were not of the Davidic line. Theirs was not at all the restored Judean kingdom, as this had been envisaged of old and of which memories still lingered in certain circles. The first Hasmonean rulers administered the kingdom in responsible and traditionally democratic manner. The later Hasmonean kings became more autocratic. Under them a court party and a resultant aristocracy, with attendant social class distinctions, tended to evolve once again. In no small measure the struggle between the two parties, the Sadducees and the Pharisees, reflected the resultant situation. Under Herod and his successors (see HEROD [FAMILY]) this process expanded notably. But this aristocracy represented always something foreign to the true, democratic spirit of the Jewish people, superimposed upon and more or less consciously resented by them. Throughout the Herodian era, until the destruction of the temple by the Romans in A.D. 70 and the end of the Jewish state, the lines of demarcation between this aristocracy and the people at large were clearly defined, with a resultant strengthening of the traditional spirit of democracy within the Jewish people.

Bibliography. W. R. Smith, Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia (1885); J. Benzinger, Hebräische Archäologie (1894); W. R. Smith, The Religion of the Semites (3rd ed., 1927); A. Lods, Israel (1932); M. Burrows, The Basis of Israelite Marriage (1938); D. Jacobson, The Social Background of the OT (1942); E. Neufeld, Ancient Hebrew Marriage Laws (1944); J. Morgenstern, various studies in the Calendars of Ancient Israel in HUCA, I (1924), 13-78; III (1926), 77-107; X (1935), 1-148; XXI (1948), 365-496; Vetus Testamentum, V (1955), 34-76; "Beena Marriage (Matriarchate) in Ancient Israel," ZAW, N.F., VI (1929), 91-110; VIII (1931), 46-58; "Amos Studies, III," HUCA, XV (1940), 59-304 (also in book form, 1941); "Jerusalem—485 B.C., I," HUCA, XXVII (1956), 101-79; XXVIII (1958), 15-47. J. MORGENSTERN

ISSACHAR ĭs'ə kər [יִשָּׂשכָר, probably a verbal form: Yaśaśkir, May (God) show mercy; NT Ἰσσαχάρ]. 1. The ninth son of Jacob, and the eponymous ancestor of one of the twelve tribes. He was the first of those sons born later to Leah (Gen. 30:18, giving the folk etymology of the name, "man of reward"); for this reason in the enumerations of the descendants of Jacob he is always mentioned together with Zebulun and directly after the older full brothers (Gen. 35:23; 46:13; Exod. 1:3; cf. I Chr. 3:1).

The tribe of Issachar belongs with the tribe of Zebulun as Manasseh does with Ephraim. They are full-blooded members of the Leah group, but within it they are taken together as a unit. Their territories border each other, and on the border they have a common sanctuary on Mount Tabor. For this reason, too, a common saying is devoted to them in the Blessing of Moses (Deut. 33:18-19):

> Rejoice, Zebulun, in your going out;
> and Issachar, in your tents.
> They shall call peoples to their mountain;
> there they offer right sacrifices.

Obviously Tabor is meant, and the "peoples" are the related tribes. The most important thing is that they are named together at the beginning of the saying, and, indeed, in contrast to Gen. 30:18, etc., Zebulun before Issachar, exactly the same as with the two Joseph tribes at the close of the preceding Joseph saying, and, likewise, the younger before the older. The conclusion might be that, like Manasseh and Ephraim, Issachar and Zebulun developed separately only under the influence of their geographical setting, and that they were very much more closely associated in the first period of their occupation of the land.

Later each of them had its own destiny. And perhaps it can also be inferred from the arrangement of the names in the Blessing of Moses that Issachar, like Manasseh, once lost the priority. The Issachar statement of the Blessing of Jacob (Gen. 49:14-15), which is again preceded by the Zebulun statement, indicates this from quite a different point of view. There the tribe is compared to a strong ass which can no longer rise between its loaded saddle baskets (הַמִּשְׁפְּתָיִם, RSV "sheepfolds"). It is reproved for having become a serf in this pleasant land. This can only mean that in the territory described in Josh. 19:17-23 between Tabor and the S end of the Lake of Chinnereth in the N and the valley of the River Jalud in the S, where a series of Canaanite cities lay, the tribe sought and found contact with them, and this was condemned by the remaining tribes. Light may perhaps be thrown on Issachar's fate by one of the Amarna Letters which was newly published by Thureau-Dangin in 1922, in which the prince of Megiddo complains that management of the lands of the devastated city of Shunem (Solem) falls on him alone; he must bring in people from far away for the purpose. From this, Alt concluded that in the long run help could be procured and Pharaoh would reap his harvest only if Shunem were newly settled. Shunem lay in what was later Issacharite territory. Alt asked the not-unjustified question as to whether it were not possible that in just such a circumstance Issachar—or at least parts of the tribe—might have been taken into service by a ruler. In this way the biting scorn concerning the "slave at forced labor" (serf) who "bowed his shoulder to bear" (Gen. 49: 15) finds, undoubtedly, a suitable explanation. In any case, Issachar at one time went through a crisis. Nevertheless, the tribe maintained itself as an equal in the twelve-tribe scheme.

Obviously Issachar was able to rehabilitate itself in the period before the kings. Perhaps this happened as a result of its brave action in the Battle of Deborah. Issachar is mentioned with praise in the Song of Deborah (Judg. 5:15, after Zebulun), while the parallel prose account does not speak of the tribe at all, although it refers to Zebulun and Naphtali. The tribe even furnished once the "proclaimer of the law" of the amphictyony in the person of the "minor judge" Tola (Judg. 10:1). In Solomon's arrangement of administrative districts Issachar's territory formed an independent province (I Kings 4:17). In Baasha the tribe furnished a king for the N kingdom (15:27). From then on, an Israelite royal residence, Jezreel, was situated in the territory of Issachar, probably because the property of the discredited royal family of Baasha had been confiscated as royal domain. Issachar was assigned and also filled the important role of bridge between the N and the S as long as the Plain of Jezreel was in Canaanite hands. It was, indeed, the only Israelite tribe to settle from the beginning in the territory which was long occupied by old Canaanite city-states. For this it paid at times with its independence, but it withstood the test.

In the later literature Issachar appears primarily in statistical contexts. In the lists of the Priestly Code it regularly has its place before Zebulun, always along with the Leah tribes (Num. 1:8, 28-29; 13:7; 26:23-25), sometimes immediately after Judah as the first (Num. 2:5; 7:18; 10:15); Num. 34:26 constitutes the only exception, insofar as Zebulun ranks ahead of Issachar and the list of the land-allotment commission is arranged geographically to some extent. In Deut. 27:12, Issachar stands with the tribes who bless. In Josh. 19, Issachar's lot is given after that of Zebulun. In the list of the Levite cities Issachar leads the third group, in one instance (Josh. 21:6=I Chr. 6:62—H 6:47); and in the other instance, the E half-tribe of Manasseh is still put ahead of it (Josh. 21: 28=I Chr. 6:72—H 6:57), while Zebulun is shoved into the fourth group. In Ezek. 48:25 the tribe receives the third strip of land in the S—before Zebulun; and in vs. 33, the middle S gate—before Zebulun. In the lists of Chronicles, too, Issachar has priority (I Chr. 12:32—H 12:33, where Issachar even gets special praise; 27:18), as well as in the narrative portions (I Chr. 12:40—H 12:41; II Chr. 30: 18). In the arrangement of I Chr. 4–7 the extended genealogy of Issachar may be found in 7:1-5, while that of Zebulun is missing. The NT does not deviate from the rule, in that it puts Issachar ahead of Zebulun in the list of the sealed (Rev. 7:7).

For the territory of Issachar, see TRIBES, TERRITORIES OF, § 4.

See also the bibliography under ASHER.

Bibliography. A. Alt, "Neues über Palästina aus dem Archiv Amenophis IV," PJB, XXV (1924), 22-44=Kleine Schriften, III (1959), 158 ff.

2. Son of Obed-edom; a Levite gatekeeper at the time of David (I Chr. 26:5). K. ELLIGER

ISSHIAH ĭ shī'ə [ישיה, ישיהו, perhaps may Yahu forget (one's sin), or Yahu has caused (one) to forget (bereavement)]; KJV ISHIAH in I Chr. 7:3; JESIAH jĭ sī'ə in I Chr. 12:6; 23:20. 1. A man of the tribe of Issachar (I Chr. 7:3).

2. One of David's Mighty Men (I Chr. 12:6).

3. A Levite, son of Uzziel (I Chr. 23:20; 24:25).

4. A Levite, chief of the family of Rehabiah (I Chr. 24:21), and accordingly descended from Moses (cf. 23:14-17).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 28, 211. B. T. DAHLBERG

ISSHIJAH ĭ shī'jə [ישיה, may Yahu forget] (Ezra 10:31); KJV ISHIJAH. One of those forced by Ezra to give up their foreign wives. The name perhaps appears as Asaias ['Ασσιας] in the parallel I Esd. 9:32.

ISSUE. KJV translation of זוב, מקור, αἱμορρέω, and ῥύσις, all referring to a DISCHARGE as from a suppurating sore or wound; a bodily secretion, whether venereal or not.

ISSUE OF BLOOD. KJV translation of αἱμορροοῦσα (RSV HEMORRHAGE) in Matt. 9:20.

ISTALCURUS ĭs'təl kyŏŏr'əs ['Ιστάλκουρος]. According to I Esd. 8:40, the father of Uthai, one of the "sons of Bigvai" who returned from the Exile with Ezra "in the reign of Artaxerxes." But apparently "Uthai the son of Istalcurus" is a corruption of "Uthai and Zaccur" in the parallel Ezra 8:14. See ZACCUR 5. J. C. SWAIM

ISUAH. KJV alternate form of ISHVAH.

ISUI. KJV alternate form of ISHVI 1.

ITALIAN COHORT ĭ tăl'yən kō'hôrt [σπεῖρα 'Ιταλική] (Acts 10:1). A unit of the Roman army. Inscriptions attest the presence of Cohors II Italica (civium Romanorum voluntariorum) at Caesarea in A.D. 69-157. Although there is no clear evidence to show that Cohors II or any other Italian cohort was present in Caesarea before 69, Luke probably had this cohort in mind. He would have understood that it was made up, for the most part, of troops mustered in Italy and possessing Roman citizenship, whether free-born or freedmen.

See also COHORT; AUGUSTAN COHORT; CORNELIUS.

Bibliography. T. R. S. Broughton, "The Roman Army," in F. J. Foakes-Jackson and K. Lake, eds., The Beginnings of Christianity, pt. I, vol. V (1933), pp. 427-45, note xxxiii. See especially pp. 441-43.

F. D. GEALY

ITALY ĭt′ə lĭ [ἡ Ἰταλία]. A long peninsula between the Tyrrhenian and Adriatic seas.

From the Alps in the N to the sea in the S, Italy has a length of some 700 miles, and its breadth is from 100 to 150 miles. The mountain chain of the Apennines forms the backbone of the peninsula. Fertile plains and valleys are to be found particularly on the W side. The largest river is the Tiber, which flows between Etruria and Latium. S of this is the extremely fertile Campania. The best harbors are at Naples and Genoa on the W, and at Brindisi, ancient Brundisium, on the E.

According to Antiochus of Syracuse, a historian of the fifth century B.C. quoted by Dionysius of Halicarnassus (I.12.35), Italy derived its name from a King Italos (Ἰταλός) who ruled in the thirteenth century B.C. in the extreme SW part or "toe" of the Italian boot. The name thus applied originally only to this region. It was gradually extended in its application northward until the Rubicon River, which flowed into the Adriatic N of Ariminum, was the N boundary between Roman Italy and Cisalpine Gaul (Appian Civil Wars II.35). In popular usage, indeed, Italy meant the entire land as far as the foot of the Alps (Polybius V.29).

Italy is mentioned in the NT in Acts 18:2; 27:1, 6; Heb. 13:24; while Acts 10:1 refers to the ITALIAN COHORT. Places in Italy which are mentioned in the NT include: FORUM OF APPIUS; PUTEOLI; RHEGIUM; ROME; THREE TAVERNS. See also ROMAN EMPIRE.

Bibliography. Philipp, Lackeit, and Scherling, "Italia," Pauly-Wissowa, Supplement III (1918), cols. 1246-1302.

J. FINEGAN

ITCH [נתק] (Lev. 13:30; 14:54); KJV SCALL. One possibility of differential diagnosis where LEPROSY was suspected. A fourteen-day quarantine period sufficed to establish its identity. It may have been alopecia areata, which produces restricted patches of baldness; tinea tonsurans or tinea sycosis (varieties of ringworm).

R. K. HARRISON

ITHAI ĭth′ī [איתי] (I Chr. 11:31). Son of Ribai of Gibeah of the Benjaminites; numbered among the Mighty Men of David known as the "Thirty." In the parallel catalogue he is called Ittai (see ITTAI 2; II Sam. 23:29).

ITHAMAR ĭth′ə mär [איתמר, perhaps island of palms]. A figure known only in P, Chronicles, and Ezra; the fourth of the sons of Aaron: Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, Ithamar (Exod. 6:23; Num. 26:60; I Chr. 6:3; 24:1). These names interconnect various traditions concerning the priesthood (see PRIESTS AND LEVITES). After the Return, the problem of the constitution of the priesthood was resolved by ascribing to David the following arrangement: sixteen courses of priests of the descendants of Eleazar (Zadok reckoned as the son of Eleazar), eight courses of priests of the descendants of Ithamar (non-Zadokite priests; I Chr. 24:1-19). Postexilic tradition stated that four sons of Aaron were consecrated to the priestly office (Exod. 28:1; Num. 3:2-3; cf. Num. 20: 25-28). The rejection of Nadab and Abihu left Eleazar and Ithamar pre-eminent (Lev. 10; Num. 3:4; I Chr. 24:2). Eleazar became the chief figure through whom priestly descent was traced to Aaron. However, tradition concerning Ithamar asserted that in the wilderness he was the leader over all the Levites (Exod. 38:21), over the Gershonites (Num. 4:28), over the Merarites (vs. 33; 7:8). The house of Eli was descended from Ithamar, according to comparison of I Sam. 14:3; 22:9; I Chr. 24:3. A family of Ithamarite priests (who had become prominent in Babylonia) returned with Ezra (Ezra 8:2; I Esd. 8:29).

Bibliography. Westphal, "Aaron und die Aaroniden," ZAW, XXVI (1906), 222-25; T. Meek, "Aaronites and Zadokites," AJSL, XLV (1929), 158-60, 165; K. Möhlenbrink, "Die levitischen Überlieferungen des ATs," ZAW, LII (1934), 214-15, 217-19, 225; W. Rudolph, Ezra und Nehemiah, HAT (1949), pp. 79-81; R. Bowman, Exegesis of Ezra, IB, III (1954), 632.

T. M. MAUCH

ITHIEL ĭth′ī əl [איתיאל, probably God is with me; cf. עמנואל]. 1. An ancestor of the Benjaminite Sallu, who resided in Jerusalem after the Exile (Neh. 11:7).

2. One of two people in Prov. 30:1 to whom Agur addressed his words, the other being UCAL.

M. NEWMAN

ITHLAH ĭth′lə [יתלה, a hanging (or lofty) place] (Josh. 19:42); KJV JETHLAH jĕth′lə. A village of the tribe of Dan. The site is unknown.

ITHMAH ĭth′mə [יתמה] (I Chr. 11:46). A Moabite whose name is included in the sixteen names added by the Chronicler to the catalogue of the Davidic Mighty Men known as the "Thirty."

ITHNAN ĭth′năn [יתנן] (Josh. 15:23). A city in the S of Judah, near Ziph. The name may be connected with ETHNAN, a descendant of Judah (I Chr. 4:7). Its site is unknown.

ITHRA ĭth′rə [יתרא]. The father of Amasa. He was married to David's sister Abigail (Abigal in II Sam. 17:25). According to II Sam. 17:25 he is called Ithra the Israelite; but a better reading is provided in I Chr. 2:17, where his name is given as Jether the Ishmaelite (cf. II Sam. 17:25 LXX^{A}; I Kings 2:5, 32).

E. R. DALGLISH

ITHRAN ĭth′răn [יתרן; cf. personal names יתר, יתרא, אביתר, יתרו]. 1. Son of clan chief Dishon; ancestor of a native Horite subclan in Edom (Gen. 36:26; I Chr. 1:41).

2. Son of Zophah, an Asherite (I Chr. 7:37).

ITHREAM ĭth′rĭ əm [יתרעם] (II Sam. 3:5; I Chr. 3:3). The sixth son of David; born of David's wife Eglah in Hebron.

ITHRITES ĭth'rīts [יתרי, perhaps abundant or pre-eminent)]. A tribe or clan associated with KIRIATH-JEARIM (I Chr. 2:53). Two of David's Mighty Men were Ithrites (II Sam. 23:38; I Chr. 11:40).

ITTAH-KAZIN. KJV form of ETH-KAZIN.

ITTAI ĭt'ī [איתי]. 1. A devoted Philistine soldier, exiled from his native city of Gath, who with six hundred of his followers and their families accompanied David, despite the latter's magnanimous dissuasion, when the king fled from Jerusalem at the outbreak of Absalom's rebellion (II Sam. 15:19-22). Ittai shared the command of the forces of David with Joab and Abishai in the battle of the forest of Ephraim, when the rebellion of Absalom was effectively crushed (II Sam. 18:2 ff).

2. Son of Ribai of Gibeah of the Benjaminites; numbered among the Mighty Men of David known as the "Thirty" (II Sam. 23:29). In I Chr. 11:31 he is called Ithai.

E. R. DALGLISH

ITURAEA ĭt'yŏŏr ē'ə, —ŏŏr— ['Ιτουραῖοι or 'Ιτουραία(χώρα); related to יטור; LXX Ιετουρ, Ιεττουρ]. A region NE of Galilee in the Anti-lebanon country settled by Arab people of Ishmaelite stock; included in the tetrarchy of Philip in Luke 3:1. The people known from the second century B.C. on as 'Ιτουραῖοι are undoubtedly the same tribe as the descendants of Ishmael's son Jetur (Gen. 25:15), referred to in I Chr. 5:19 as enemies of the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and Manasseh.

1. Location. Historical geographers have found it difficult to define the boundaries of Ituraea, since the references in ancient literature are often confusing and ambiguous. The Ituraeans of N Palestine are frequently mentioned by Greek and Roman writers, but it is not certain whether Ituraea and TRACHONITIS were wholly distinct districts or overlapped or were identical. Strabo (Geography XVI.2.16, 18) appears to locate the kingdom of the Ituraeans in Anti-lebanon in the Beqa' Valley, with its capital at Chalcis, carefully distinguishing it from the territory of the Trachons. Josephus certainly understands the Ituraeans to live N of Galilee, for he describes a campaign against them by Aristobulus I (105-104 B.C.), who annexed part of their land to Judea and forcibly circumcised their people (Antiq. XIII.xi.3). Originally the Ituraeans were a hill-country people living on the W slope of Anti-lebanon, perhaps in the larger Lebanon region toward Phoenicia. In the first century B.C. under the rulers Ptolemy and Lysanius the kingdom encompassed its largest area, extending westward to the sea, eastward to Damascus, and including the lands of Panias and Ulatha in the S down to and perhaps including the N borders of Galilee. After the death of Lysanius in 36 B.C., the kingdom may have been divided into several smaller districts (see § 2 below) of which one small tetrarchy was inherited by Herod Philip in 4 B.C. (Jos. Antiq. XVII.xi.4; Luke 3:1); some scholars, however, have believed that in NT times Ituraea and Trachonitis referred to the same territory.

2. History. To the Greeks and the Romans the Ituraeans were known as an uncivilized bandit people, designated both as Syrians and as Arabians, and renowned for their skill as bowmen, as references in Vergil, Lucan, Cicero, and Strabo attest. Their name as a people appears first in the second century B.C. Shortly before the beginning of Roman rule in Palestine, they formed a strong confederacy scattered through the entire Lebanon region, ruled by a certain Ptolemy, the son of Mennaeus (ca. 85-40 B.C.), "who possessed Massyas and the mountainous country of the Ituraeans" (Strabo Geography XVI.ii.10) and probably the surrounding territory. Pompey destroyed many of his fortified places in the Lebanon and probably reduced somewhat the extent of the empire. The tribal principality was inherited by his son Lysanius I, who is called "king of the Ituraeans" by Dio Cassius (XLIX.32). At his death in 36 B.C. at the instigation of Antony, large portions of the principality were given to Cleopatra (Plutarch Antony 36; cf. Jos. Antiq. XV.iv.1-2). Our knowledge of the subsequent history is confused by incomplete sources, but the former empire probably suffered division into at least four parts whose individual histories can be partially traced. In 20 B.C., Herod the Great received from Augustus the tetrarchy of Zenodorus, successor to Lysanius and vassal of Cleopatra. Part of this tetrarchy was inherited in 4 B.C. by Herod's son Philip (Luke 3:1) and ruled still later by the Agrippas after Philip's death in A.D. 34.

Another section of the principality which centered in the city of Abila, the "tetrarchy of Lysanius," was bestowed upon Herod Agrippa I in A.D. 41 by Claudius (cf. Jos. Antiq. XIX.v.1; XX.vii.1). This Lysanius has often been identified with the earlier ruler of the Ituraean kingdom (cf. Luke 3:1). However, an Abilene inscription (Corpus Inscriptorium Graecarum 4521) and an inscription at Heliopolis (4523) lead to the conclusion that Josephus is referring to a younger tetrarch of the same name who governed Abila before A.D. 37, thus supporting the chronological note of Luke.

In 38 the kingdom of a certain Soemus of the Ituraeans was seized by Caligula and later incorporated into the province of Syria. It probably consisted of the N territory below Heliopolis (Baalbek) to Laodicea (Dio Cassius LIX.12; Tac. Ann. XII.23), the tetrarchy of Arca.

A final section known as the kingdom of Chalcis, the center of the earlier principality, was given to a grandson of Herod the Great known as Herod of Chalcis, by Claudius in 41; it subsequently passed in 50 to Herod Agrippa II when it was enlarged to include all of Philip's tetrarchy, Abilene, and Arca, and incorporated at Agrippa's death ca. 93 into the province of Syria.

Bibliography. E. Schürer, History of the Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ, div. 1, vol. II (1900), 325-44 (with extensive bibliography); G. A. Smith, Historical Geography of the Holy Land (9th ed., 1902), pp. 544-47; Pauly-Wissowa, Real-Encyklopädie, vol. IX (1916), cols. 2377-80.

E. W. SAUNDERS

IVAH. KJV form of IVVAH.

IVORY [שן, tooth; ἐλεφάντινος]. Ivory was carved for inlaid decoration (see INLAY) on thrones (I Kings 10:18; II Chr. 9:17), beds (Amos 6:4), houses (I Kings 22:39; Ps. 45:8; Amos 3:15), and possibly on decks of ships (Ezek. 27:6 RSV). To the uses to which ivory was put, as attested by the biblical references, are now to be added others discovered in archaeological excavations in Palestine and the ancient Near East: boxes, gaming boards, cosmetic spoons and jars, figurines, amulets, and combs. Fig. ART 67.

Copyright: By permission of the Trustees of the late Sir Henry S. Wellcome

17. Ivory flasks, from Lachish

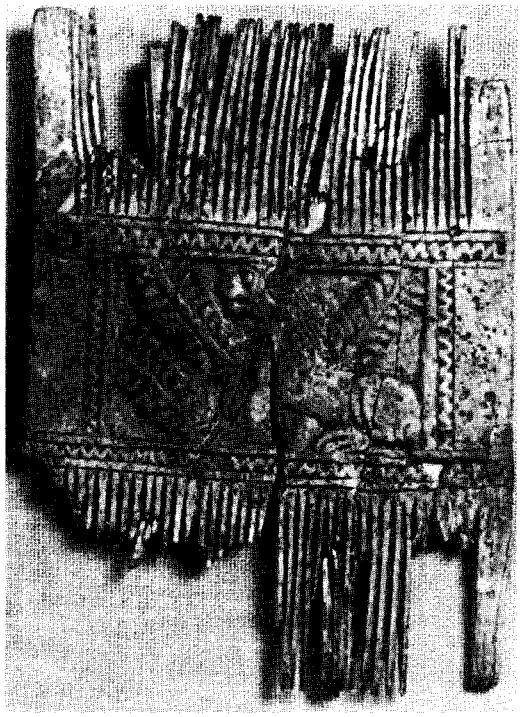
One source for ivory used in carving is suggested by I Kings 10:22, where Solomon is said to have had a "fleet of ships of TARSHISH," which once every three years used to bring gold, silver, ivory, etc. In Ezek. 27:15, Rhodes (Hebrew Dedan) is mentioned in connection with "ivory tusks" (lit., "horns of ivory "). From sources outside the Bible it is known that large herds of elephants roamed N Syria in the second millennium B.C. In the fifteenth century B.C., Amen-em-heb, a soldier of Thut-mose III, tells of an elephant hunt in Ni on which 120 elephants were captured (ANET 241). Tiglath-pileser I, Assyrian king of the eleventh century, captured and slew elephants in the country of Harran (ARAB I, 247). In the ninth century, Ashurbanipal II reported the slaying of thirty elephants and collecting live specimens for a zoo (ARAB I, 519-20). Up until the middle of the ninth century, when the elephant may have become extinct there, tusks from elephants were available from N Syria. Pictorial representation of an elephant appears on the Black Obelisk of Shalmaneser III, where the tribute from Musri is represented. Fig. ELE 24.

In Amos 3:15; 6:4 ivory is mentioned as a token of wealth and luxury. This association of ivory with luxury items is confirmed by lists of booty taken from Palestine by Egyptian and Assyrian conquerors. Among the objects taken from Megiddo by Thutmose III in 1468 B.C. were: "6 carrying-chairs of that enemy, of ivory, ebony, and carob-wood, worked with

Courtesy of the Oriental Institute, the University of Chicago

18. A reconstruction drawing of an ivory inlay with a plant ornament; from Megiddo (1350-1150 B.C.)



Courtesy of the Oriental Institute, the University of Chicago

19. A single ivory comb with an ibex and a dog in relief; from Megiddo (1350-1150 B.C.)

gold" (ANET 237). Adad-nirari (810-783 B.C.) listed as tribute from Damascus, "a bed (inlaid) with ivory, a nimattu-couch mounted and inlaid with ivory" (ANET 282). Sennacherib's account of tribute paid him in 701 B.C. by Hezekiah listed: "couches (inlaid) with ivory, nîmedu-chairs (inlaid) with ivory" (ANET 288).

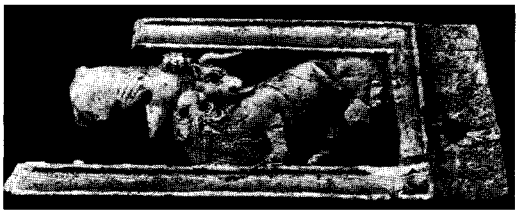
A great wealth of "Phoenician" ivory has come from excavations in Palestine and Syria, and specimens of carved work have been found scattered from Cyprus to Ur in Lower Mesopotamia. An inventory of these carved ivories (see bibliography) lists 1,271 separate objects. While ivory has been found at Tell



Courtesy of the Oriental Institute, the University of Chicago

20. A double ivory comb with lion and trees in relief; from the treasury in the palace of the princes at Megiddo (1350-1150 B.C.)

Courtesy of the Oriental Institute, the University of Chicago

21. Opposite sides of an ivory spoon with female figurine handles, from Megiddo (1350-1150 B.C.)

Courtesy of the Palestine Archaeological Museum, Jerusalem, Jordan

22. Ivory found at Samaria, showing lion grappling with bull; from Ahab's palace (ninth century B.C.)

el-Far'ah (in the S; Figs. ART 68-69), Tell ed-Duweir (Fig. IVO 17), el-Jish, and Beisan, the most important collections of Palestinian ivories have come from Megiddo and from Samaria (Figs. ART 70; LIO 32). In 1932 a hoard of 383 pieces of carved work was discovered at Megiddo and attributed by the excavator to the period of 1350-1150 B.C. (Figs. BAN 18-19; IVO 18-20). On one piece (Fig. ART 70), probably an inlay for furniture, was depicted a prince of Megiddo seated on a sphinx throne and celebrating a military victory. Gaming boards, cosmetic spoons, boxes, and a rich variety of other objects constituted this hoard of ivory, which may well have represented the treasure of an "ivory-collector" (Fig. IVO 21). The ivories found at Samaria, thought to belong to the ninth century, contain decorated panels with frame and tendon on the side for attaching to furniture or woodwork (Figs. INL 8; IVO 22). These pieces, to judge from a partly worked carving, were probably carved at Samaria and belong to the period of Ahab (Fig. ART 71).

Pl. XXIV.

Bibliography. J. W. and G. M. Crowfoot, Early Ivories from Samaria (1938); G. Loud, The Megiddo Ivories (1939); C. Decamps de Mertzenfeld, Inventaire commenté des ivoires phéniciens et apparentés découverts dans le proche-orient (1954); J. B. Pritchard, ANEP (1954), figs. 125-32; R. D. Barnett, A Catalogue of Nimrud Ivories and Other Examples of Ancient Near Eastern Ivories (1957). J. B. PRITCHARD

IVVAH ĭv′ə [עִוָּה] (II Kings 18:34; 19:13; Isa. 37:13); KJV IVAH ī′və. A town; the site is unknown. In II Kings 18:13-36 the envoys of the Assyrian king Sennacherib, trying to persuade the Judean king Hezekiah to give up his policy against Assyria, referred to the fate of other towns: Hamath, Arpad, Sepharvaim, Hena, and Ivvah (cf. II Kings 19:13; Isa. 37:13). A. HALDAR

IVY [κισσός]. According to II Macc. 6:7, when the Dionysiac festival took place, Antiochus compelled Jews to march in the procession for DIONYSUS wearing ivy wreaths. Dionysus, or Bacchus, was the pagan god of the vine and its produce, and ivy was sacred to him. Cf. III Macc. 2:29, a reference to Jews' being branded with an ivy leaf.

B. H. THROCKMORTON, JR.

IYE-ABARIM ī′yə ăb′ə rĭm [עִיֵּי הָעֲבָרִים, heaps of the regions beyond, or perhaps heaps of the passes]; KJV IJE-ABARIM ī′jə—. A stopping place of the Israelites, following Oboth, and preceding the "Valley of Zered" (Num. 21:11-12; see ZERED, BROOK) or Dibon-gad (33:44-45). Iye-abarim was in the wilderness on the SE border of Moab. It is tentatively located by some in the region of Mahaiy, a strong Moabite fortress dominating the ascent from the Brook Zered. E. D. GROHMAN

IYIM ī′yĭm [עיים] (Num. 33:45); KJV IIM ī′ĭm. A shortened form of IYE-ABARIM.

IYYAR ē′yär [איר]. The second month of the Hebrew CALENDAR; earlier known as Ziv.

IZHAR ĭz′här [יצהר, perhaps may (the deity) shine forth, or may (the deity) show himself exalted]; KJV IZEHAR ĭz′ə här in Num. 3:19; JEZOAR jĭ zō′ər in I Chr. 4:7 (but cf. 2 below); IZHARITES —hə-rīts. 1. A Levite, son of Kohath; eponym of a tribal family (Exod. 6:18, 21; Num. 3:19, 27; 16:1; I Chr. 6:2, 18, 38: 23:12, 18).

2. In I Chr. 4:7 a variant of ZOHAR (Kethibh יצחר; Qere וצחר, "and Zohar").

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 205, 225, 255. B. T. DAHLBERG

IZLIAH ĭz lī′ə [יזליאה; cf. Arab. jazalījun, eternal= long-living(?)] (I Chr. 8:18); KJV JEZLIAH jĕz—. A Benjaminite.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 246.

IZRAHIAH ĭz′rə hī′ə [יזרחיה, may Yahu arise, shine forth (i.e., as a star)] (I Chr. 7:3). A descendant of Issachar.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 28, 205, 216.

IZRAHITE ĭz′rə hīt [יזרח, may (the deity) shine forth] (I Chr. 27:8). A man of a family or town called Izrah. The name occurs only once and with the definite article. Perhaps it is to be identified with ZERAHITE (I Chr. 27:11).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 205. B. T. DAHLBERG

IZRI ĭz′rī [יצרי, perhaps contraction for Yahu has fashioned, or perhaps for צרי (Zeri), mastic balsam] (I Chr. 25:11). A temple musician; and if identified with ZERI (I Chr. 25:3), a descendant of Jeduthun.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 247; cf. p. 223. B. T. DAHLBERG

IZZIAH ĭ zī′ə [יזיה, may Yahu sprinkle, purify] (Ezra 10:25; I Esd. 9:26); KJV JEZIAH jĭ—; KJV Apoc. EDDIAS ĕ dī′əs. One of those compelled by Ezra to put away their foreign wives.

J

J. One of the principal narrative sources or strata of the PENTATEUCH. The symbol is derived from the personal name of God, Jehovah (or more accurately Yahweh, from יהוה), the use of which is characteristic of this source. It is commonly regarded as Judahite in origin, and somewhat earlier than E (tenth-ninth centuries B.C.). D. N. FREEDMAN

JAAKAN jā′ə kən [יעקן; LXX Ιωκαν] (I Chr. 1:42); KJV JAKAN jā′kən. Third son of clan chief Ezer; ancestor of a native Horite subclan in Edom. He is probably to be associated with Bene-jaakan in Num. 33:31-32, and with Beeroth Bene-jaakan in Deut. 10:6.

The original form of the name is not clear. Cf. יעקן (LXX και Ιωυκαμ και Ουκαν), translated "and Akan," in Gen. 36:27. L. HICKS

JAAKOBAH jā′ə kō′bə [יעקבה, may (the deity) protect] (I Chr. 4:36). A prince of the tribe of Simeon.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 28, 38, 46, 197.

JAALA jā′ə lə [יעלא, ibex] (Neh. 7:58). Alternately: JAALAH [יעלה; 'Ιεηλί] (Ezra 2:56; I Esd. 5:33); KJV Apoc. JEELI jē′lī. Eponym of a family of "Solomon's servants" listed among the returned exiles.

JAALAM. KJV form of JALAM.

JAANAI. KJV form of JANAI.

JAAR jā′ər [יער, forest] (Ps. 132:6); KJV THE WOOD. A place appearing in parallel with Ephrathah; usually thought to be the same as KIRIATH-JEARIM.

JAARE-OREGIM jā′ə rĭ ôr′ə jĭm [יערי ארגים]. An obvious textual corruption of "Jair" and a transcriptional error that imported "oregim" ("weavers") from the following line (II Sam. 21:19; cf. I Chr. 20:5; see ELHANAN 1; JAIR 4).

JAARESHIAH jâr′ə shī′ə [יערשיה, may Yahu plant; cf. Akkad. erêsŭ, plant] (I Chr. 8:27); KJV JARESIAH jăr′ə sī′ə. A Benjaminite.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 28, 203.

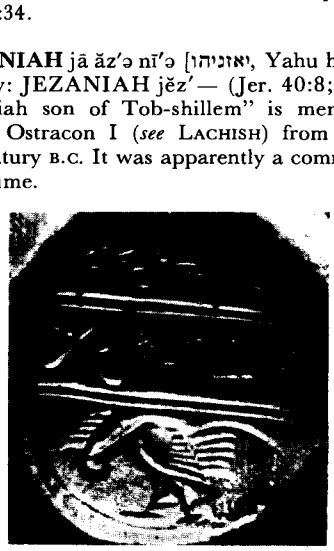
JAASAU. KJV form of JAASU.



JAASIEL jā ā′zĭ əl [יעשיאל, God does]; KJV JASIEL jā′— in I Chr. 11:47. 1. Son of Abner; an officer and leader of the tribe of Benjamin during the reign of David (I Chr. 27:21).

2. A Mezobaite whose name appears among the sixteen names added by the Chronicler to the catalogue of the Davidic Mighty Men known as the "Thirty" (I Chr. 11:47). The difficulty involved in the gentilic name has been resolved by some interpreters as equivalent to "from Zobah."

E. R. DALGLISH

JAASU jā′ə sōō [יעשו (Kethibh), יעשי (Qere), probably a shortened form of יעשיאל or (ו)יעשיה, may God (or Yahu) make] (Ezra 10:37); KJV JAASAU —sô. One of those compelled by Ezra to give up their foreign wives. The name has no clear parallel in I Esd. 9:34.

JAAZANIAH jā ăz′ə nī′ə [יאזניהו, Yahu hears]. Alternately: JEZANIAH jĕz′— (Jer. 40:8; cf. 42:1). "Jaazaniah son of Tob-shillem" is mentioned in Lachish Ostracon I (see LACHISH) from the early sixth century B.C. It was apparently a common name at that time.

Courtesy of the American Schools of Oriental Research

1. Impression of the seal of Jaazaniah, from Tell en-Nasbeh

1. A Judean, son of Maacathi, or the Maacathite, (II Kings 25:23; Jer. 40:8), who remained under Gedaliah after the Exile. If Hoshaiah (Jer. 42:1) was a Maacathite, his son was the same Jezaniah mentioned in Jer. 40:8; although the latter may refer to Azariah son of Hoshaiah (cf. 43:2), as the LXX shows (see RSV).

Fig. JAA 1.

2. A Rechabite, son of Jeremiah (not the prophet), tested by the prophet Jeremiah in Jehoiakim's reign (Jer. 35:3).

3. Son of Shaphan, appearing, in a vision of Ezekiel, among the idolatrous elders of Israel (Ezek. 8:11).

4. Son of Azzur, one of the twenty-five Judean elders in one of Ezekiel's visions (Ezek. 11:1).

J. M. WARD

JAAZER. KJV alternate form of JAZER.

JAAZIAH jā′ə zī′ə [יעזיהו, may Yahu nourish; cf. Arab. raḍā)] (I Chr. 24:26-27). A Levite, son of Merari.

Bibliography. On the problem of identification of this name, see E. L. Curtis, Chronicles, ICC (1910), p. 274; J. D. Davis, The Westminster Dictionary of the Bible (rev. H. S. Gehman; 1944), p. 276. On etymology, see M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 28, 203. B. T. DAHLBERG

JAAZIEL jā ā′zĭ əl [יעזיאל, may God nourish; cf. Arab. raḍā] (I Chr. 15:18). Alternately: AZIEL ā′— [עזיאל, originally same form as above] (I Chr. 15: 20). One of the musicians accompanying the ark on its removal from the house of Obed-edom. This name is probably also to be read in I Chr. 16:5 for "Jeiel" (see JEHIEL 1), which is doubtless a copyist's error.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 27-28, 203. B. T. DAHLBERG

JABAL jā′bəl [יבל; LXX 'Ιωβέλ] (Gen. 4:20). The first son of Lamech and Adah; progenitor of nomadic shepherds.

JABBOK jăb′ək [יבק]. One of the principal E tributaries of the Jordan; the modern Nahr ez-Zerqa, so called from its blue waters. It rises in a spring near 'Amman (the biblical Rabbah of the Ammonites), flows N for some miles, then turns and flows westward through an ever-deepening canyon, ending in a fertile delta and emptying into the Jordan ca. fifteen miles N of the Dead Sea. Its total length is ca. fifty miles, and its average rate of descent is ca. eighty feet to a mile, so that its current is strong and steady. The name Jabbok may be derived from the sound of the gurgling of its waters. It was when Jacob crossed the Jabbok that he had his nocturnal encounter with a spirit that wrestled with him all night and gave him a new name, Israel, at dawn (Gen. 32:22-29); the word used for "he wrestled" (yē'âbhēq) may be a pun on the name Jabbok.

With its steep banks, the river was a natural boundary; the early S-N stretch formed the W boundary of Ammon, regarded as very strong (Num. 21:24), and the lower courses formed the boundary between the kingdoms of Sihon and Og (Judg. 11: 22). The lower courses also divided Gilead into two parts (Deut. 3:12, 16; Josh. 12:2-6), S Gilead being called here "the half of Gilead" and N Gilead "the rest of Gilead." The cities that lay on or near its course included Gerasa, Mahanaim, Penuel, Succoth, and Adam, while numerous tells, of whose identity the Bible gives no indication, point to the density of the population in ancient times in the Jabbok Valley.

Fig. JAB 2. S. COHEN

Courtesy of Herbert G. May

2. Valley of the Jabbok River

JABESH jā′bĭsh [יבש, יביש, dry]. 1. Same as JABESH-GILEAD.

2. The father of King Shallum of Israel (II Kings 15:10, 13-14). Jabesh here may be a geographical rather than a personal name, for "Shallum the son of Jabesh" may mean that Shallum was a native of the town of Jabesh. Cf. "the son of Tabeel" (Isa. 7: 6), which refers to a person whose home was in the land of Tabeel in NW Palestine or SW Syria, a place known to us in an Assyrian inscription from Calah. So also "Jehu the son of Omri" in the Assyrian records means "Jehu of Beth-omri," the official name of Samaria; and "Shamgar the son of Anath" in Judg. 3:31 means "Shamgar of Beth-anath," a town in the Galilee area.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 244; W. F. Albright, "The Son of Tabeel (Isaiah 7:6)," BASOR, CXL (1955), 34-35. H. G. MAY JABESH-GILEAD jā′bĭsh gĭl′ĭ əd [יבש גלעד, יביש גלעד, Jabesh of GILEAD]; also JABESH [יבש, יביש] (I Sam. 11:1, 3, 5, 9, 10; 31:12, 13; I Chr. 10:2). A city E of the Jordan with significant associations with the career of Saul.

1. Location. The name of Wadi el-Yabis (River Jabesh), which flows into the Jordan from the E some twenty air miles S of the Sea of Galilee, points to the general area in which the site must be located. It was placed by Eusebius six miles from Pella on the road to Gerasa, which would support its location at Tell el-Maqlub, overlooking the N side of the wadi in the broken hill country of N Gilead. But the biblical accounts of overnight communications with Bezek and Beth-shan (see § 2 below) favor identification with the joint site of Tell el-Meqbereh–Tell Abu Kharaz farther W, overlooking from the N the broadening out and merging of the wadi with the Jordan Valley. From Tell Abu Kharaz one can see to the NW Tell el-Husn, the site of the city of Beth-shan. This is one of the richest sections of the fertile N half of the E side of the Jordan Valley.

Tell Abu Kharaz was a great fortress towering over Tell el-Meqbereh, which was probably the residential section of the city. Examination of potsherds on the surface of the site has disclosed that it was occupied in the Early Bronze, Middle Bronze, and Iron Age (EB I-II, EB IV–MB I, MB II, Iron I-II), and to the Roman and Byzantine periods. The place was first occupied ca. 3200 B.C. Potsherds from the thirteenth to the sixth centuries B.C., from Israelite times, predominated.

2. History. The biblical history of Jabesh-gilead is closely connected with that of Gibeah of Benjamin. Early ties between the two areas may be reflected in the account of marital relations of Machir (i.e., Gilead) and Benjamin in I Chr. 7:15 (cf. vs. 12).

Jabesh-gilead first appears in Judg. 21. As punishment for not participating in the war against Gibeah and the Benjaminites, Israel put it to the sword, saving only four hundred virgins. These were given as wives to four hundred of the six hundred warriors who were the only Benjaminites to escape in the destruction of their tribe. Although this story has folkloric embellishments and is variously interpreted by scholars, its essential historicity is supported by the total biblical picture of intertribal conflicts, in particular those between the West Jordan and the Transjordan tribes. The story also helps explain subsequent relations between Jabesh-gilead and Gibeah. The site was apparently reoccupied soon after this incident, presumably by neighboring Gileadites.

The bonds between their descendants and the Benjaminites were strengthened when Saul rescued Jabesh-gilead from Nahash the Ammonite, who had laid siege to it and demanded as a condition for capitulation that he might gouge out the right eyes of the men of the city. Its elders sent messengers through Israel for help. Saul and the people of Gibeah responded, and Saul mustered an army at Bezek (Khirbet Ibziq?) at the edge of the hills overlooking the Jordan Valley from the W. Saul and his men made a forced march at night into the valley and across the Jordan to arrive at Jabesh-gilead at dawn; it was a distance of only about ten miles as the bird flies, but for Saul's army hardly an easy trip over such terrain. He attacked the Ammonites from the morning watch to the heat of the day, defeating and scattering them. This incident marked the effective beginning of the monarchy, and Saul was made king at the Gilgal sanctuary (I Sam. 11).

When Saul and his sons had been slain on Mount Gilboa and their bodies hung on the wall of Beth-shan by the Philistines, all the valiant men of Jabesh-gilead crossed the Jordan and rescued the corpses. The approximately nineteen-mile trip to Beth-shan and back was made during the night. They burned the bodies and buried the bones in honor under the tamarisk tree at Jabesh, holding a seven-day mourning fast (I Sam. 31:8-13; I Chr. 10:8-12). David commended the Jabeshites for their act (II Sam. 2:4*b*-7), seeking in vain that they recognize his kingship. After he had later established his rule over both Judah and Israel, David brought from Jabesh-gilead the bones of Saul and Jonathan and buried them in the family tomb at Zela in Benjamin (II Sam. 21: 12-14).

Bibliography. N. Glueck, The River Jordan (1946); "Explorations in Eastern Palestine, IV," AASOR, XXV-XXVIII (1951), Pt. I, 268-75. Contrast M. Noth, "Jabes-Gilead: Ein Beitrag zur Methode AT Topographie," ZDPV, LXIX (1953), 28-41.

H. G. May

JABEZ jā′bĭz [יעבץ, see 1 below]. 1. A name introduced abruptly into a list of descendants of Judah (I Chr. 4: 9-10); possibly the Zobebah of vs. 8 is corrupted from this name. The folk etymology in this passage derives יעבץ from עצב—i.e., "he gives pain (or sorrow)." He is perhaps the eponym of the community of this name.

Bibliography. E. L. Curtis, Chronicles, ICC (1910), p. 107.

B. T. Dahlberg

2. A place in Judah, perhaps near Bethlehem, where several families of scribes lived (I Chr. 2:55).

JABIN jā′bĭn [יבין, one who perceives(?)]. 1. King of Hazor, defeated and executed by Joshua (Josh. 11:1). A confederacy of Canaanite kings, promoted by Jabin, was organized in the area W and N of the Sea of Galilee upon receipt of news of Joshua's victories elsewhere in Canaan. Although equipped with horses and chariots, the Canaanite forces were defeated at the Waters of Merom; and Jabin's city, Hazor, SW of Lake Huleh, was burned. Other cities in the region were not razed but were occupied by the Israelites. With the exception of some oversimplifications, Josh. 11 appears a reliable account of the Israelite campaign in N Canaan.

2. King of Canaan, reigning in Hazor, whose forces under the command of Sisera were defeated by Deborah and Barak in battle at the River Kishon (Judg. 4:2, 7, 17, 23-24; Ps. 83:9—H 83:10). Jabin was hardly king of Canaan, but rather a Canaanite king of Hazor, whose career has now been confused with that of Sisera. Sisera, "who dwelt in Harosheth-ha-goiim," was most likely king of that settlement and spearhead of a Canaanite coalition to resist Israelite encroachment upon the Plain of Esdraelon. Whether Jabin has been introduced secondarily from Josh. 11 into the account of Sisera's defeat is uncertain.

R. F. Johnson

JABNEEL jăb′nĭ əl [יבנאל, God causes to be built]. Alternately: JABNEH jăb′nə [יבנה] (II Chr. 26:6). Apoc.: JAMNIA jăm′nĭ ə [Ιαμνεια, Ιαμνια, Ιεμνααν, Ιαμνιται]; KJV JEMNAAN jĕm′nĭ ən (Jth 2:28); JAMNITES jăm′nīts (II Macc. 12:8-9, 40). 1. The westernmost location point on the N border of Judah (Josh. 15:11); modern Yebna, four miles from the Mediterranean Sea and nine miles N-NE of Ashdod.

In the course of his reign, Uzziah (ca. 783-742 B.C.) recaptured Jabneh from the Philistines by breaching its wall (II Chr. 26:6 ff).

Jamnia is mentioned with other cities along the Syro-Palestinian coast as being alarmed at the approach of Holofernes (Jth. 2:28). Because of its easily defended position, Jamnia served as a base of operations for the Seleucid generals, Gorgias (I Macc. 4:15; 5:58), Apollonius (10:69), and Cendebeus (15: 40). According to II Macc. 12:8, Judas Maccabeus captured and burned Jamnia in 164 B.C. to prevent a rumored atrocity against his countrymen. Josephus, however, attributes the capture and sack of Jamnia to Simon in 142 (Antiq. XIII.vi.7). In 80, it appears in the list of cities under the control of Alexander Janneus (Jos. Antiq. XIII.xv.4).

In 63 B.C., Pompey occupied Jamnia (Jos. War I.vii.7; cf. Antiq. XIV.iv.4), and a few years later Gabinius ordered it rebuilt (War I.viii.4; cf. Antiq. XIV.v.3). After the death of Cleopatra, Herod added it to his domain (cf. War I.xx.3; Antiq. XV.vii.3). Herod first presented it to his sister Salome and later to the Empress Livia. Under Tiberius (A.D. 14-37) it was administered by an imperial official.

Jamnia appears in the events leading up to the First Revolt (cf. Jos. War II.xvi.1-2), and after the revolt it became the "center-in-exile" of the Sanhedrin, the Beth-Din, which continued to meet in Jamnia until the beginning of the Second Revolt in 132. It is probably best known for the meeting of the Synod of Jamnia, ca. 100, in which the collection of Jewish sacred writings was reviewed and conclusions were reached which have had great significance for both Jew and Christian in matters pertaining to the CANON OF THE OT (see § 4).

2. A village in S Naphthali (Josh. 19:33); possibly to be identified with Khirbet Yamma, W-SW of the Sea of Galilee. V. R. GOLD

JACAN jā'kən [יעכן] (I Chr. 5:13); KJV JACHAN. A Gadite.

JACHIN jā'kən [יכין, he (i.e., the deity) establishes, or he will establish; shortened form of יהויכין (יויכין); cf. also Phoen. ykn'l; Akkad. Jakini; see JACHIN AND BOAZ; JEHOIACHIN]; JACHINITES —kə nīts. 1. The fourth of six sons of Simeon in Gen. 46:10; Exod. 6: 15, but the third of five (Ohad being omitted) in Num. 26:12. He is probably identical with Jarib, who occurs in the parallel list of Simeon's sons in I Chr. 4:24. Also, he is the ancestral head of the "family of the Jachinites" (Num. 26:12).

2. The priest to whom the twenty-first lot fell when David divided the officials for temple service (I Chr. 24:17); eponymous head of a priestly house living in Jerusalem (I Chr. 9:10; Neh. 11:10).

L. HICKS

* JACHIN AND BOAZ jā'kən, bō'ăz [יכין, he will establish; בעז, bᵉʿōz, in strength of]. Twin pillars of cast bronze erected on each side of the entrance to Solomon's temple (I Kings 7:15-22, 41-42; II Kings 25: 16-17; II Chr. 3:13, 15-17; Jer. 52:17, 20-23). The descriptions of the pillars are not clear, and the sources differ as to their dimensions—height, 18 cubits in Kings and Jeremiah MT, 35 cubits in Chronicles and Jeremiah LXX; circumference, 12 cubits in Kings MT and Jeremiah, but 14 cubits in I Kings 7:15 LXX; height of capitals, 5 cubits, except 3 cubits in II Kings 25:17. The function and symbolism of the pillars and the meaning of their names have given rise to many hypotheses.

The pillars are said to have been hollow (Jer. 52: 21), with a thickness of four fingers, or 1/6 cubit (1 cubit = 17.7 inches). On top of each pillar was a bowl-shaped capital 5 cubits in height, decorated with a checkered design, lily leaves, or petals to a height of 4 cubits, and wreathed with strings of pomegranates. Although the primary source (I Kings 7:19, 21, MT) is vague as to the relation of the pillars to the vestibule of the temple, and the dubious LXX addition to 7:22 suggests that they carried the architrave, it is almost certain that Jachin and Boaz were free-standing columns "in front of the temple" (II Chr. 3:17). Their function was decorative, symbolic, and cultic, like the other bronze furnishings of the temple with which they are listed. The proportions of diameter to height are not those of structural pillars; this may explain the doubling of the height in later tradition. Most important is the analogy of such free-standing columns in front of temples at

Courtesy of the Oriental Institute, the University of Chicago

3. Restoration of the façade of the inner temple of Nabu at Khorsabad, showing two pillars before the temple

Courtesy of the Oriental Institute, the University of Chicago

4. Column base of temple at Tell Tainat (ca. eighth century B.C.)

Khorsabad, Tyre, Paphos, and elsewhere. Particularly striking is the finding in front of the temple of Sin at Khorsabad of a cylindrical bronze casing 29½ feet in length, comparable to the height of the Jachin and Boaz pillars. Fig. JAC 3.

In a Canaanite temple excavated at HAZOR two round basalt pillar bases were found in the porch on each side of the entrance. Cf. the two-pillar bases of the Tell Tainat temple (see TEMPLES).* These were not free-standing pillars. Fig. JAC 4.

The proportions and form of the pillars, surmounted by their bowl capitals (cf. Zech. 4:3), accord with Albright's view that they served as giant incense stands, or as cressets, on the analogy of the cressets pictured in a third-century-B.C. tomb at Marisa and those in front of a temple at Paphos shown on Roman coins. There is no biblical reference to their cultic use (with the possible exception of Isa. 4:5), and it is possible that their function was symbolic only. They have been interpreted as stylized forms of the standing stones and sacred poles of Canaanite shrines (Gen. 28:18; Deut. 12:3), of the "pillars of heaven" (Job 26:11), and as the mountains between which the sun was believed to rise. Doubtless the symbolism was multiple and developed in the course of time. Architecturally they are descended from the standing stones and detached pillars of Canaanite and Assyrian temples, but their meaning in Solomon's temple must be related to their distinctive names. The twin pillars at Gadeira mentioned by Posidonius bore inscriptions. One such at Lagash erected by Gudea was called: "Ellil, king of the stormy whirlwind . . . has chosen Gudea."

It seems probable that the names of the pillars in Solomon's royal temple (cf. Amos 7:13), where he officiated as principal priest (I Kings 7:14, 22; 8:64), were derived from the initial words of dynastic inscriptions like that of Gudea. In Gen. 31:45, 49, a named pillar serves as a perpetual witness to a solemn covenant. In II Kings 11:14; 23:3 it is specially noted that the king "stood by the pillar," suggesting its special significance for the king. The verb הכין, "establish," is prominent in OT dynastic oracles (cf. II Sam. 7:12-13, 16; I Kings 2:24; Ps. 89:3-4—H 89:4-5; Isa. 9:6; etc.), and the first pillar may have borne an inscription like: "He will establish [yākîn] the throne of David forever." The second inscription may also have had dynastic significance—e.g., "In the strength of [bᵉʿōz] of Yahweh shall the king rejoice" (cf. Ps. 21:1—H 21:2)—or it may have had a mythological or cultic reference (cf. Pss. 74:13; 96:6).

Bibliography. K. Möhlenbrink, Der Tempel Salomos (1932), pp. 110-15. R. B. Y. Scott, "The Pillars Jachin and Boaz," JBL, LVIII (1939), 143-39. W. F. Albright, Archaeology and the Religion of Israel (1942), pp. 138-48; "Two Cressets from Marisa and the Pillars of Jachin and Boaz," BASOR, 85 (1942), 18-27. H. G. May, "The Two Pillars Before the Temple of Solomon," BASOR, 88 (1942), 19-27. P. L. Garber, "Reconstructing Solomon's Temple," BA, XIV (1951), 8-10. A. Parrot, Le Temple de Jérusalem (1954), pp. 14-20.

R. B. Y. Scott

JACINTH jā'sĭnth [לשם, lešem (KJV LIGURE, from LXX λιγύριον, Vulg. ligurius); NT ὑάκινθος, ὑακίνθινος]. A reddish-orange stone, a variety of zircon. It is the first stone in the third row in the breastpiece of judgment (Exod. 28:19; 39:12; see BREASTPIECE OF THE HIGH PRIEST).

The NT jacinth is the eleventh jewel in the foundation of the wall of the New Jerusalem (Rev. 21:20), and the adjectival form of the Greek word (ὑακίνθινος) is used to describe the color of the breastplates of the riders in the vision in Rev. 9:17 (RSV "sapphire," mg. "hyacinth"). See also JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES § 2.

W. E. Staples

JACKAL [שועל, see Fox; תן (plural תנים in Isa. 13:22, etc.; תנין in Neh. 2:13; Lam. 4:3; תנות in Mal. 1:3; KJV DRAGON, SEA MONSTER]. Any of certain carnivorous mammals of the genus Canis Aureus, of the family Canidae, smaller than the true wolf, with a shorter tail than the latter. The jackal moves about mostly in packs and usually at night. Its food is small mammals, poultry, fruit, vegetables, etc., and, unlike the fox, it will eat carrion and other refuse. In India it is said to suffer much in extremely hot weather, and in biblical Palestine it may have been very sensitive to unusual drought and heat (cf. Jer. 14:6).

Courtesy of the Cairo Museum; photo courtesy of the Metropolitan Museum of Art

5. The god Anubis as a jackal, lying on a funerary chest; from the tomb of Tut-ankh-Amon at Thebes

Although its cry is a distinctive wailing howl, which must have been familiar to most Hebrew villagers, there is only a single allusion to this sound (Mic. 1:8). Apart from one reference to the suckling of its young (Lam. 4:3), and another to a "Jackal's Well" outside Jerusalem (Neh. 2:13), most of the other OT passages relate to jackals' prowling around ruins and desertlike areas. Babylon (Isa. 13:22; Jer. 51:37), Edom (Isa. 34:13), Hazor (Jer. 49:33), the cities of Judah (Jer. 10:22), Jerusalem (Jer. 9:11—H 9:10), Mount Zion (Lam. 5:18), Esau (Mal. 1:3), are specifically mentioned as being, or as destined to be, the resorts of jackals. In Ps. 63:10—H 63:11 the psalmist's enemies are to be prey for jackals, whereas in 44:19—H 44:20 the psalmist's lament is that this is the sad lot of Israel (cf. Job's complaint in Job 30:29). In the messianic age the desolate haunts of jackals will bring forth vegetation (Isa. 35:7), and the jackals and other wild animals will rejoice in the Lord's gift of plenteous water in the wilderness (Isa. 43:20).

Fig. JAC 5.

W. S. McCullough

JACKAL'S WELL [עין התנין, fountain of the tannîn (a mythological monster)] (Neh. 2:13); KJV DRAGON

WELL. A well or fountain accessible from the VALLEY GATE outside Jerusalem. It has been identified by some with EN-ROGEL. A location in the upper tract of the Valley of Hinnom (see HINNOM, VALLEY OF) suits the context better.

See also JERUSALEM §§ 2, 7*b*. G. A. BARROIS

JACOB jā'kəb [יעקב, יעקוב, see JACOB (ISRAEL) § 1; LXX and NT Ἰακώβ; Vulg. Jacob]. 1. See JACOB (ISRAEL).

2. Son of Matthan and father of Mary's husband, Joseph (Matt. 1:15-16). See GENEALOGY OF CHRIST.

JACOB (ISRAEL). Son of Isaac and Rebekah; younger twin brother of Esau; and husband of Leah and Rachel (Gen. 25:21-26; 29:21-30). Because Jacob is also called Israel (32:28; 49:2), his twelve sons are the "sons of Israel" (Exod. 1:1; I Chr. 2:1).

A. Etymology
B. Sources of the Jacob tradition
  1. The written sources
  2. The earlier cycles
  3. The unified story
C. Jacob in Genesis
  1. Jacob and Esau
    a. Birth of Jacob and Esau
    b. Jacob obtains Esau's birthright
    c. Jacob steals Esau's blessing
  2. Jacob in Haran
    a. The vision at Bethel
    b. Jacob and Laban
  3. The return of Jacob
    a. Mahanaim and Peniel
    b. Reconciliation with Esau
  4. Jacob the patriarch
D. Jacob in the rest of the Bible
E. Theological significance
Bibliography

A. ETYMOLOGY. Genesis gives two etymologies of the name Jacob. The primary reference occurs, as is usual, in the birth narrative: the younger twin is called Ya'aqōbh because at birth he was holding his brother's heel ('āqēbh; 25:26 J). In the second passage, when the younger steals the older brother's blessing, Esau affirms that Jacob is rightly named, "for he has supplanted me [wayya'qebhēnî] these two times" (27:36). Here the verb 'āqabh, really a denominative from 'āqēbh and so "to seize by the heel," carries by extension the meaning "to overreach" (cf. Ps. 49:5—H 49:6).

Further, two passages outside Genesis clearly play upon the name Jacob. Jer. 9:4*b*—H 9:3*b* makes a twofold allusion to the traditional etymology: "For every brother is a supplanter ['āqôbh ya'qōbh]." Hos. 12:3*a*—H 12:4*a* brings to mind both the strict and extended meanings of the verb 'āqabh in saying of Jacob: "In the womb he took his brother by the heel."

Accordingly, the biblical form Ya'aqōbh should mean "He overreaches" or "He will overreach." Cf. also the OT proper names יעקבה and עקוב.

Nevertheless, these traditional explanations have the appearance of popular etymologies (Volksetymologien), with which Genesis abounds (e.g., Cain, Seth, Abraham, Reuben). Quite likely the original name was different in form and meaning.

In all probability the name Jacob was originally theophorous, the divine element of which—commonly 'ēl—is now missing (like Isaac, Joseph, Jephthah; see ISHMAEL 1). The restored form would then be Ya'aqōbh-'ēl or, as a jussive, Ya'aqubh-'ēl. This is parallel in form with the Palestinian place name Yaqob-el, appearing in the lists of the Pharaoh Thutmose III (1490-1436 B.C.); with Ya'qub-Har, the name of a Semitic chieftain of the early Hyksos period; and with the personal name Ya-a' (AḪ)-qu-ub-ilu, attested at Chagar Bazar (ca. 1725 B.C.).

The root עקב is general Semitic and occurs in the Arabic personal names 'Aqba' and 'Aqabtu/'Aqbatu, in Akkadian Aqbi-il and (Ḫ)aqba-aḫum at Mari, in the Aramaic inscriptions at Hatra, and perhaps in Syriac עקבאלהא and Palmyrene בלעקב. As a noun meaning "heel" it occurs in Hebrew, Aramaic, Syriac, Arabic, Ugaritic, and Akkadian. However, the meanings of the verb are not clear, and the biblical etymologies may even represent a deliberate obscuring of an earlier meaning. "To guard, watch, or protect" has been suggested (cf. South Arabic and Ethiopic 'aqaba and North Arabic mi'qab^{un}). Accordingly, "Jacob" could mean "May God protect!"; but this is uncertain.

In conclusion, Jacob was not uniquely a biblical name but an ancient member of the Near Eastern onomastica.

B. SOURCES OF THE JACOB TRADITION.

1. The written sources. The written sources from which the present biblical narrative was constructed are the documents identified by Pentateuchal criticism as J, E, and P (see PENTATEUCH §§ A3, 5). The following is, mainly, the analysis made by Martin Noth: From the Yahwist come 25:21-26*a,* 27-34; 27:1-45; 28:10, 11*a*α, 13-16, 19; 29:1-35; 30:1*a*α, 3*b*β, 4, 5, 7-16, 20*a*β*b,* 21, 24-43; 31:1, 3, 17, 18*a*α, 19*a,* 20, 21*a*α*b,* 22, 23, 25*b,* 26*a*α, 27, 30*a,* 31, 36*a,* 38-40, 46-49, 51-53*a;* 32:4-14*a,* 23-33; 33:1-3, 6, 7, 12-17, 18*b;* 34:1-31; 35:21, 22*a;* 37:3*a,* 4, 5*a,* 6-21, 25-27, 28*a*β*b;* 38:1-30; 42:1*b,* 4, 5, 38; 43:1-13, 14*a*α*b;* 45:25-28; 46:1*a*α, 5*b,* 28-34; 47:29-31; [49:2-28]; 50:1-10*a,* 14. From the Elohist come 28:11*a*β*b,* 12, 17, 18, 20-22; 30:1*a*β*b,* 2, 3*ab*α, 6, 17, 18-20*a*α, 22, 23; 31:2, 4-16, 19*b,* 21*a*β, 24, 25*a,* 26*a*β*b,* 28, 29, 30*b,* 32-35, 36*b,* 37, 41-45, 50, 53*b,* 54; 32:1-3, 14*b*-22; 33:4, 5, 8-11, 19, 20; 35:1-5, 7, 8, 14, 16-20; 37:3*b,* 31-35; 42:1*a,* 2, 3, 29-37; 46:1*a*β*b*-5*a;* 47:7-12; 48:1, 2, 7-22; 50:10*b,* 11. From the Priestly writer come 25:26*b;* 27:46-28:9; 31:18*a*β*b;* 33:18*a;* 35:6, 9-13*a,* 15, 22*b*-29; 31:1, 2*a*α*b;* 46:6-27; 47:27*b,* 28; 49:1*a,* 29-33; 50:12, 13.

But these documents were not the earliest sources. At the beginning Jacob stories were popular in the S, in Transjordan, and even in Haran, as well as at Bethel and Shechem. From these areas they found their way into larger cycles of legend, on which the principal written documents later drew.

2. The earlier cycles. It would seem desirable, therefore, to get behind these written documents to the earlier strata of Jacob legends which, though part may have been in written form, were originally oral traditions. By critical analysis Hermann Gunkel delineated four strata of Jacob stories, now stacked on top of one another like layers of soil. By removing each layer in reverse chronological order—i.e., the uppermost, and thus latest, stratum first—he felt that he reached down to the core of the Jacob tradition.

First and oldest of the strata are the narratives about Jacob and Esau. These, contained in Gen. 25:21-27:45; 32:4-33:17, are the "real kernel of the Jacob tradition." The Jacob of this stage is the shepherd who bests the hunter. His name is simply a common proper name, not infrequent in Palestine or Mesopotamia. See § A above.

Next oldest are the narratives about Jacob and Laban (29:15-32:1). In these the clever young shepherd outwits the older, more experienced shepherd, who attempts to take advantage of him.

Originally these stories circulated as independent traditions about the several principals; for this, according to Gunkel, is the basic feature of oral tradition, that "each story existed by itself as a separate entity." However, Jacob was basically the same type of figure in both cycles, and later they were combined, the Jacob-Laban tales being set in the midst of the older, Jacob-Esau group. The union was effected by having Jacob flee from Esau in Palestine to Laban in Mesopotamia. Then, after having despoiled Laban, Jacob returns to Palestine, where Esau awaits him.

Superimposed on this combined narrative is a third layer of stories about theophanies and holy places. Having earlier been honored independently in the particular localities where they were at home, they were incorporated into the composite story at the various points where Jacob was brought into contact with the sites they concern. These pericopes served also to effect the transition from one cycle to another. So, e.g., the Bethel story (28:11-22) becomes a link between the first part of the Jacob-Esau cycle and the Laban narrative, and the Mahanaim (32:1-2—H 32:2-3) and Peniel (vss. 22-32—H 22-33) units mark the return to the Esau cycle. At this point in the tradition, Jacob was raised to the status of national ancestor; Esau became associated with Edom, and Laban with Aram (Syria). The Shechem notice (33:18-20) both concludes the Esau cycle and introduces the Dinah legend (ch. 34).

Finally, stories about Jacob's children, their birth and destiny, form the top, and latest, layer. Since Jacob-Israel was held to be the ancestor of the nation, his sons were ranked as the heads of the twelve tribes of Israel. At this final stage Jacob is no longer the "skilled shepherd" of the Esau and Laban narratives nor the "fearless foeman" of the Peniel scene; he appears, rather, as the aged father who is reunited in Egypt with his favorite son, Joseph, and as the honorable patriarch who blesses the people that will bear his name.

3. The unified story. Gunkel's investigation attempted to get behind the composite narrative by isolating the smallest units in Israel's earliest traditions. In dealing with the forms and cycles of ancient saga, oral as well as written, it made a historic advance over the purely literary documentary analysis of Wellhausen. It does not, however, represent the final approach to the Genesis narratives. After analysis must come synthesis. Ultimately the stories must be put together again and, with understanding increased, read in their present setting as organic, carefully considered portions of a unified epic. The resulting story is Israel's faithful assertion that the God who made all the peoples on earth has been at work in her own history in a special way, calling the patriarchs to a destiny he is able to fulfil even when they least deserve it.

The Jacob story, then, must finally be read as a whole, and as an integral part of a canon which is Holy Scripture.

C. JACOB IN GENESIS. In its broadest reaches the Jacob story comprises half the book of Genesis. The account of his birth comes in ch. 25 and his burial in ch. 50.

1. Jacob and Esau. a. The birth of Jacob and Esau (Gen. 25:21-28). The first word about Jacob is that he was given in answer to prayer. Rebekah, like Sarah (11:30; 16:1-2), was barren. When Isaac prayed for his wife, "Yahweh allowed himself to be entreated by him" (see ISAAC § 2*e*), and Rebekah gave birth to twin boys. The first was named Esau because he was hairy (see ESAU § 1). The second was named Jacob because he came forth holding his brother's heel (see § 1 above). Esau became skilled at hunting, and a man of the field, whom Isaac loved "because he ate of his game." Jacob, in contrast, was "a quiet man [איש תם, 'a settled, orderly, and well-integrated man'], dwelling in tents"; and Rebekah loved him.

The birth ensured Isaac that the promise of the land of Canaan and of numerous descendants, which God made to Abraham and repeated to him, would be fulfilled. He had sons from whom "nations" would come (25:23).

Yet this promise was immediately placed in jeopardy. For at the very beginning a note of conflict between the two sons was sounded, and it was echoed in the partiality of the parents. Family hostility gravely threatened the patriarchal promise of land and seed. Under this tension Jacob must live.

Yet the initial scene of the Jacob story foreshadowed also the resolution of the tension and guaranteed the fulfilment of the promise. Jacob, by divine oracle, would triumph (vs. 23). The end is obvious to the reader, regardless of the problems to be met.

b. Jacob obtains Esau's birthright (25:29-34). The paradox in Jacob's life is immediately illustrated in the first specific story told about him. When Esau, the carefree hunter, came in from a fruitless chase, and learned that the careful shepherd had prepared food, he bargained away his birthright (בכרה; see FIRST-BORN) for a batch of stuff, the name of which he did not even know (lit., "this red, this red stuff"; vs. 30*a*).

An element of fraud, not now sufficiently clear, may have been involved in the transaction. E.g., Jacob may have deliberately disguised the nature of his brew. His insistence on the irretractable oath (vs. 33; cf. Josh. 9:19) seems to be a protection against the discovery of deception. Also, deliberate deceit here would clarify Esau's later accusation (Gen. 27:36: "these two times"). At any rate, by patience and foresight, Jacob gained the right of precedence which by birth was not his. God's oracle (25:23) was working itself out. Yet with good fortune came also the hostility which would later imperil his life (27:41).

c. Jacob steals Esau's blessing (ch. 27). Being old and fearing that he might die suddenly, Isaac charged Esau to prepare for him savory food, that he might pass on to his first-born son the patriarchal blessing his soul carried (cf. vs. 4*b*). But while Esau was out innocently hunting, Jacob hearkened to his mother's stratagem and, after cautiously satisfying himself on the risk, carried off the deceit with boldness. And to his crass lies (vss. 19, 24) he added shocking blasphemy ("Because Yahweh your God granted me success"; 27:20; cf. 24:12). The pathos of the occasion is deepened by the aged father's blindness. Torn by suspicion and doubt ("The voice is Jacob's voice, but the hands are the hands of Esau"; vs. 22), the blind father finally pronounced upon Jacob the deathbed benediction (vss. 27*b*-29; cf. 24:1-9; ch. 49).

Here the blessing is not directly from God. The word itself is active, Isaac communicates it, and even Jacob helps fashion the conditions under which it is given. So with Esau's curse. The blessing can be neither recalled nor shared (vss. 37-38). Only an ill fortune remains for Esau (vss. 39-40).

2. Jacob in Haran. a. The vision at Bethel (28:10-22). En route to Haran from Beer-sheba, Jacob lodged at the ancient Canaanite sanctuary-city Bethel (see BETHEL [SANCTUARY]). There, in a nocturnal vision, Yahweh appeared to him, identified himself as the God of his fathers (cf. 12:7; 13:14-17; 26:3-5; see PATRIARCHS § 5), repeated to him the promise of the land and seed, set him to a universal mission (see ABRAHAM § A4), and assured him of a divinely guided prosperity. Jacob acknowledged the awesomeness of that place where he had met God, by solemnly naming it Bethel and binding himself to the patriarchal God by personal oath.

Theologically the importance of this scene may first have been to legitimize Yahweh-worship at this pre-Israelite cultic center. But as one of the principal passages in which God deals with Jacob directly and declares his personal direction of the patriarch's destiny, it serves now as a manifest guide to the interpretation of the Jacob story as a whole. See § E below.

b. Jacob and Laban (chs. 29-31). This ancient cycle, laid in Aram-naharaim and featuring the family of LABAN, now interrupts the Palestinian-oriented Jacob-Esau story. The union of the two narratives links the Hebrew patriarchs with their Aramean kinsmen.

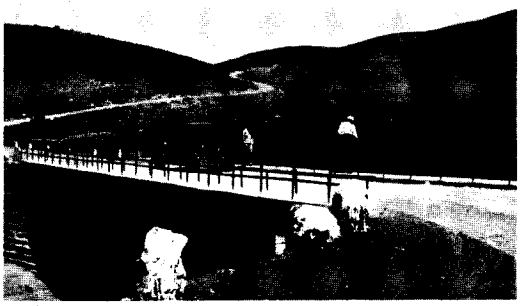
In the first of these narratives (29:1-30) Jacob marries Leah and Rachel. Having come to the region of Haran, Jacob met Laban's beautiful daughter RACHEL, whom he loved at first sight (vss. 10-11, 18, 20). Laban took his nephew home and agreed to give him Rachel in exchange for seven years' service with his flocks. Jacob not only fulfilled the bargain honorably but also, because of his blessing, brought to his uncle great prosperity (cf. 30:27-30). Laban, however, deceived Jacob, making him take the elder and less attractive sister, LEAH. Once more Jacob agreed to serve seven years for his favorite, Rachel, and was faithful to his word.

The second narrative (29:31–30:24) tells of Jacob's children. Twelve children were born to Jacob during his long service in Mesopotamia. From the disdained Leah came Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, Zebulun, and Dinah; and from her maid ZILPAH came Gad and Asher. The beloved Rachel, being barren (29:31; 30:1-2; cf. 11:30; 25:21), gave her maid BILHAH to Jacob, in order to obtain children by her (30:3-8; see ABRAHAM § C1*i*). Bilhah bore Dan and Naphtali. Finally, Rachel herself bore Joseph, an answer to her prayer (vss. 22-24).



The names of the children are, most likely, shortened forms of originally theophorous names whose earlier meaning is hidden by the popular etymologies given here (see § A above; see also NAME § C2). Regardless of the historical difficulties involved, the picture of Israel as a unit of twelve members, articulated into smaller groups and yet sharing common parentage and common allegiance, must rest on a valid tradition; and its basis may be sought here. See TRIBE.

The present story of Jacob's return to Palestine, involving the reasons for this major decision (31:1-2, 3, 13); the question of Laban's bargain for an equitable distribution of their common gain (30:25-43); and the ethical issues involved in Jacob's departure, Rachel's theft of her father's household gods (31:19; see TERAPHIM), Laban's accusation against his son-in-law (vss. 25-35), and Jacob's angry oath of clearance (vss. 36-42), has woven together conflicting traditions and makes a simple picture difficult to gain.

Nevertheless, from this presentation of the several episodes, the conclusion is clear that in the midst of the all-too-human quarrels over family and fortune God is at work, protecting and prospering his blessed (31:38-42), as even Laban (30:27) and his daughters (31:16; cf. vss. 5-13) acknowledged. And in their final scene, when the two parted at Mizpah, Laban, by requesting Jacob to cut a covenant of peace with him, admitted Jacob's favored position as the carrier of divine blessing. See LABAN § 3.

3. The return of Jacob. a. Mahanaim and Peniel (ch. 32). As Jacob approached the land of which by divine promise he was heir, a band of angels met him (vss. 1-2—H 2-3), perhaps symbolizing for him once again God's protection. See MAHANAIM.

But at the JABBOK he was met by "a man" (אִישׁ) who wrestled with him until daybreak. In a show of magnificent courage Jacob prevailed and won from the antagonist a blessing which entailed the change of Jacob's name to ISRAEL. Fig. JAC 6.

Courtesy of Herbert G. May

6. Bridge across the Jabbok River at the point of the ancient ford (see Gen. 32, Jacob's wrestling with the angel)

In this story, which combines the etymologies of Israel and PENIEL and an ancient cultic etiology (vs. 32), a major key for the interpretation of Jacob's life is given. For Jacob did not wrestle with a river demon or the devil or Esau or even his own alter ego, but with One who was able to bless him and change his name, and this is God himself (as P states clearly in 35:9-15; cf. Gen. 17:5, 15; Isa. 62:4; Hos. 2:23; 12:3-4—H 12:4-5; Matt. 16:17-18). The persistent struggle with God which issues in a divine blessing must be seen as characteristic, not only of Jacob the man, but also of Israel the nation.

b. Reconciliation with Esau (ch. 33). Fearful that his brother's hostility had not subsided during the years, Jacob approached the dreaded meeting with his usual careful cleverness, seeking both to pacify his wronged twin and to protect himself and his family from attack (32:3-9, 13-21; 33:1-3). To his stratagems, however, he added prayer (32:9-12). In this prayer to his father's God, which brings together the divine action in the past (vs. 9*b*), the need of the present (vs. 11), and the promise for the future (vs. 12), a pattern of Jacob's whole life may be seen. Amid all the tragic tangles in his human relations, Jacob realized that ultimately it was God with whom he dealt.

In an appealing scene of great tenderness Jacob met Esau and was received back with magnanimity and affection.

4. Jacob the patriarch (chs. 34–50). The twins separated, to meet again only at their father's death (35:27-29). Esau went to Seir and there became the ancestor of a nation, thus fulfilling the divine promise (25:23; cf. 27:39-40; 33:16; ch. 36; see ESAU; EDOM). Jacob remained in Palestine to assume his inheritance.

The rest of the Jacob narrative focuses not so much on the patriarch himself as upon the places and people associated with him.

Leaving Esau, Jacob journeyed to SUCCOTH; then to Shechem, where he bought ground and built an altar (33:17-20). From there he went, by divine command, to Bethel (see BETHEL [SANCTUARY]) and received a theophany which repeated the patriarchal promises. Once again he responded with worship (35:1-15). Jacob and his family continued southward (cf. 12:9). During this journey Rachel died in childbirth and was buried on the way to Ephrath (Bethlehem; 35:16-20). Jacob joined Isaac at Mamre (Hebron) and there buried his father in the family sepulchre (35:27-29; cf. 49:31). Finally, when severe famine gripped Canaan, Jacob and his sons set out for Egypt. At Beer-sheba he received further assurance of God's favor (46:1-4). In Egypt he dwelt "in the land of Goshen" until his death.

This part of the story of Jacob is told principally in terms not only of places but also of persons. It is, in fact, primarily a family history. Jacob's return to Canaan brought his family immediately into conflict with the sons of Hamor (ch. 34). Rachel's death was the occasion of Benjamin's birth, an event marking a certain climax in the narration, for it is followed by a short list of Jacob's twelve sons (35:22*b*-26) and a lengthy genealogy of the descendants of Esau (ch. 36).

Moreover, the final chapter in Jacob's life, that intertwined with the Joseph story (chs. 37; 39–50; see JOSEPH SON OF JACOB), is an intimate family portrait. Regardless of a cosmopolitan context, it contrasts the internal conflicts of jealousy and hate with the ennobling power of love and forgiveness. At the story's end Jacob bestows a patriarchal blessing upon Ephraim and Manasseh (48:8-20) and then upon his own sons (ch. 49; see BLESSINGS AND CURSINGS). God's promise to Jacob was fulfilled; at his death the Egyptians paid him great homage, and his sons buried him at Machpelah with Abraham and Isaac (49:29–50:14; cf. 27:28-29; 46:3-4).

Although this story is a moving "family history," it is not thereby a secular narration but the disclosure of God at work through people and places. See § E below.

D. JACOB IN THE REST OF THE BIBLE. As an individual Jacob is not frequently mentioned. He is remembered as a child of favor (Mal. 1:2; Rom. 9:10-13), an heir of the divine promise (Heb. 11:9), and a man of blessing (Heb. 11:20-21).

As Israel's third great patriarch (see PATRIARCHS § 2) Jacob is often linked with ABRAHAM (see §§ D-E) and Isaac. So the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, who is the same as El Shaddai (Exod. 6:3) and Yahweh (3:6, 15; see GOD, NAMES OF, § B2) remembered his covenant (2:24; 32:13; Deut. 29:12), had compassion on Israel (II Kings 13:23), and glorified his servant Jesus (Acts 3:13). The patriarchs are alive with him (Mark 12:26-27) and sit at his table in the kingdom of heaven (Matt. 8:11).

However, as the representative of the nation whose name he bears, Jacob appears quite frequently. Israel is the "house of Jacob" (Luke 1:33); its God is the "King of Jacob" (Isa. 41:21); and his temple is a "habitation for the God of Jacob" (Acts 7:46). This figure of Jacob (Israel) reaches its height when applied to the Servant of the Lord (Isa. 41:8; 44:1-2, 21; 48:20; cf. 49:3), of whom Jesus is the perfect example (Matt. 8:17; 12:15-21; Mark 1:11; 9:2-8; 10:45; Luke 2:30-32; John 1:19-23; Acts 8:26-39; Heb. 9:28; I Pet. 2:22-25).

E. THEOLOGICAL SIGNIFICANCE. Jacob's story is a story of conflict. The note of conflict which is heard even before his birth (Gen. 25:22-23) reverberates throughout the entire narrative. Having twice supplanted Esau, Jacob flees to Haran. But with Laban, Jacob must engage in a protracted struggle, resolved only after he has left for Palestine. The mood of the scene in which Jacob returns to Esau is pregnant with the threat of hostility and fear. Even in the "Joseph section" most of the scenes depicting Jacob's relations with his sons are fraught with concern. In short, Jacob is beset with dangers from every area—the natural (famine), the human (Esau and Laban), and the divine (the "man" at the Jabbok). Upon each occasion his inheritance of the blessing is threatened.

Moreover, this situation is made more complex by the sharp edge of Jacob's personality. The character of Jacob the clever, mendacious supplanter projects so prominently from the narrative that it is difficult to bring the story into proper focus. The reader frequently feels that the deceitful Jacob deserves to be forsaken, left to face alone the full force of his dangers. No other patriarchal narrative is so inescapably dominated by the character of the man himself; and this tends to distort the evaluation of every incident.

Yet the paradox of the Jacob story is that its very domination by personal, secular concerns, which tend to alienate the reader and obscure his judgment, provides also a key to its underlying theology. With the other patriarchs God acts directly. In the story of Jacob, however, he seems mostly to have withdrawn from the active scene. But God is no less at work here, ordering the course of history for his purposes, as the Bethel and Peniel theophanies demonstrate. He works, however, through unworthy persons and unsavory situations. It is Israel's belief that in the tangled web of conflict and tragedy which Jacob weaves and then falls into himself, God's guiding hand, though half-hidden, is nonetheless present. Thus, when Jacob rises to a height of blasphemy unprecedented in the patriarchal history and declares to his blind father that he has found game so quickly "because the LORD your God granted me success" (27:20), he utters also the most profoundly true explanation of his career.

In many spots Jacob's story is distasteful, in others delightful. But whatever the original purpose of its separated parts, the present narrative was written to instruct, not to amuse, its readers. To see its proper role in the great theological epic of the patriarchs, the reader has to recapitulate Jacob's own discovery that "surely the LORD is in this place; and I did not know it" (28:16).

Bibliography. Among the many good Commentaries on Genesis, H. Gunkel, HKAT (4th ed., 1917), is distinguished by richness of detail and form-critical analysis; and G. von Rad, ATD, vol. 4 (1953), by its theological perception. For fuller reference, see the bibliographies under GENESIS; PATRIARCHS.

Special studies: H. Gunkel, What Remains of the OT (1928), pp. 151-86; M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 177-78, 207-9; C. H. Gordon, "The Story of Jacob and Laban in the Light of the Nuzi Tablets," BASOR, LXVI (1937), 25-27; W. F. Albright, "A Third Revision of the Early Chronology of Western Asia," BASOR, LXXXVIII (1942), 36; M. Noth, Überlieferungsgeschichte des Pentateuch (1948), pp. 58-62, 95-111, 160-71; A. Alt, "Die Wallfahrt von Sichem nach Bethel," Kleine Schriften zur Geschichte des Volkes Israels (1953), I, 79-88; M. Noth, "Mari und Israel," Geschichte und Altes Testament (Alt Festschrift; 1953), pp. 142-52; B. D.

Napier, From Faith to Faith (1955), pp. 70-80, 80-97; J. Muilenburg, "The Birth of Benjamin," JBL, LXXV (1956), 194-201; V. Maag, "Jakob-Esau-Edom," Theologische Zeitschrift, 6 (1957), 418-29; G. von Rad, Theologie des ATs (1957), I, 135-40, 169-77; S. Mowinckel, "'Rahelstämme' und Leastämme,'" Von Ugarit nach Qumran (Eissfeldt Festschrift; 1958), pp. 129-50; M. Noth, The History of Israel (1958), pp. 1-7, 53-84, 120-26. L. Hicks

JACOB'S WELL [πηγὴ τοῦ Ἰακώβ] (John 4:3-12). The well where Jesus met the Samaritan woman.

The earliest reference to Jacob's Well is the gospel account, for the OT mentions no such well. The narrative implies a well-established tradition that "Jacob's well was there." It was along the road at or near a city of Samaria called Sychar, which is probably identified with Shechem (Tell Balâṭah). The identification of Jacob's Well as Bîr Ya'qûb is supported unanimously by Jewish, Samaritan, Christian, and Muslim tradition. This tradition is as early as the Bordeaux Pilgrim (ca. A.D. 333). The well is certainly ancient and is generally accepted as the one referred to in the Gospel of John. However, there is no evidence aside from tradition that it was dug by or dates from the time of Jacob, "who gave us the well" (John 4:12).

Bîr Ya'kûb, at the foot of Mount Gerizim, is 1½ miles SE of Nablus. It is at a road junction, just N of the place where the roads from Jerusalem and the Jordan Valley join. At the well the road divides again, one fork going to Nablus and the other to roads leading N and E to Jenin and the Jordan Valley.

The well, at present seventy-five feet deep, is partly filled with debris. The water never rises near the top; as the woman said: "The well is deep" (John 4:11). It is ca. eight feet in diameter, but it narrows toward the top, which is covered with a large stone with a hole in it. The upper portion of the well is lined with masonry, but the lower portion is cut in the soft limestone. The water is cool and refreshing. It is both a cistern (φρέαρ) and a spring (πηγή), for it appears to be fed by surface water as well as by underground sources (cf. John 4:6, 11).

Courtesy of Harriet-Louise H. Patterson

7. Site of Jacob's Well, within the unroofed church right of center; Mount Ebal in the background

In the fourth century A.D. a cruciform church was built on the site with the well at the crossing. There are also remains here of a Crusader church which was destroyed in the twelfth century. It is now the property of the Greek Orthodox Chuch, which has a walled enclosure and an unfinished church at the site. Today one goes down a stairway below ground into the remains of a crypt of the Crusader church to reach the top of the well.

Fig. JAC 7; Pl. XXXI*a*.

Bibliography. W. Sanday, Sacred Sites of the Gospels (1903), pp. 31-33; G. Dalman, Orte und Wege Jesu (1919), pp. 207-11. D. C. Pellett

JACUBUS. KJV Apoc. form of Akkub 4.

JADA jā'də [ידע, (God) has cared] (I Chr. 2:28, 32). A Jerahmeelite, son of Onam.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 181.

JADDAI jăd'ī [ידו (Kethibh), ידי (Qere)] (Ezra 10:43); KJV JADAU jā'dô. Same as Iddo 3.

JADDUA jăj'ŏo ə [ידוע]. 1. A chief of the people and signatory to the covenant (Neh. 10:21—H 10:22.)

2. Son of Jonathan (though this may be an error for "Johanan"), and high priest three generations after Eliashib (Neh. 12:11, 22; "Jaddua" may be a late addition in vs. 22). He was the last high priest named in the OT, holding office probably in the time of Alexander the Great, with whom he was linked by Josephus (Antiq. XI.viii.2). See Priests and Levites. J. M. Ward

JADDUS jăd'əs [Ἰαδδούς (B), Ιοδδους (A), Ακκους (Luc.)] (I Esd. 5:38); KJV ADDUS ăd'əs. A man who married Agia, one of the daughters of Barzillai, and took the name of his father-in-law. In the parallels Ezra 2:61; Neh. 7:63, he is called simply by his adopted name. After the return under Zerubbabel his descendants were excluded from serving as priests, since their genealogy was not found in the priestly register. C. T. Fritsch JADON jā'dŏn [ידון, frail one, from Arab. wdn(?), or possibly a shortened form of the name ידניה, Yahu rules, found in the Elephantine Papyri] (Neh. 3:7). A Meronothite who worked with Melatiah the Gibeonite and the men of Gibeon and of Mizpah in repairing the walls of Jerusalem during the time of Nehemiah. Meronoth (cf. I Chr. 27:30) is probably to be identified with modern Beit Unia, three miles NW of Gibeon. If the KJV of Neh. 3:7*b* is correct, perhaps the work of these men extended to the place where the Persian governor had his seat in Jerusalem.

M. Newman

JAEL jā'əl [יעל, mountain goat]. The Bedouin woman who killed the Canaanite leader Sisera after his defeat by the Israelites. According to the Song of Deborah (Judg. 5:2-31), she used true nomadic guile, bringing out milk—a sign of hospitality—to the fugitive Sisera when he sought refuge at her tent. Sisera, accepting the bait, took the "lordly bowl" in his hands, and was probably struck down by Jael just as he bent his head to the dish (vss. 24-27). The later prose account turns the exploit into treachery, having Sisera killed after he had eaten, and misunderstanding the original weapon of the poem (4:17-22).

The description of Jael as the "wife of Heber the Kenite" (5:24) may have been introduced into the poem from 4:17, where it belongs. It is possible that some exploit of the wife of Heber has been combined with that of Jael. It is also entirely possible that Jael was a Kenite woman, for the Kenites were ancient allies of Judah (see 1:16). A northern origin for Jael might be more probable, however, considering the location of the battle and the fact that Judah is not listed as one of the warring tribes.

The reference to Jael in 5:6 has been questioned on the basis of both the history and the meter of the poem.

See also DEBORAH 2. D. HARVEY

JAGUR jā′gər [יגור] (Josh. 15:21). A city in the SE part of Judah, near the border of Edom. It may be the same as GUR-BAAL. A possible site is Tell Ghurr, ten miles E of Beer-sheba.

JAH, YAH jä, yä [יה]. An abbreviated form of the sacred name Yahweh, as in the Hebrew text of Exod. 15:2 or in the liturgical expression "Hallelujah" ("praise Yah[weh]"). See GOD, NAMES OF, § B.

JAHATH jā′hăth [יחת, perhaps (God) will snatch up]. 1. A descendant of Judah (I Chr. 4:2).

2. An eponym; a Gershonite Levite (I Chr. 6:20, 43; 23:10-11).

3. An Izharite Levite (I Chr. 24:22).

4. A Merarite Levite; an overseer of the workmen repairing the temple in the reign of King Josiah (II Chr. 34:12).

Bibliography. F. S. Brown, S. R. Driver, and C. A. Briggs, eds., Hebrew-English Lexicon of the OT (1955), p. 367.
B. T. DAHLBERG

JAHAZ jā′hăz [יהץ, יהצה, perhaps a trodden or open place]. Alternately: JAHZAH jä′zə; KJV JAHAZA jə hā′zə; JAHAZAH. A city in Transjordan, where the Israelites defeated the Amorite king Sihon, when he refused permission to pass through his territory (Num. 21:23; Deut. 2:32; Judg. 11:20). Jahaz was assigned by Moses to the tribe of Reuben (Josh. 13:18). The city with its pasture lands was given to the Merarite Levites (Josh. 21:36; I Chr. 6:78—H 6:63). Later it was taken by Moab (Isa. 15:4; Jer. 48:21, 34), to whom it had probably originally belonged before Sihon's conquest. Mesha (see MOABITE STONE) said that the king of Israel had built Jahaz and dwelt there while fighting Moab. However, Chemosh drove out the king of Israel, and Mesha took Jahaz in order to attach it to the district of Dibon.

Jahaz would seem to be N of the Arnon, not far from Dibon, but its site has not been identified. One suggested identification is Jalul, 3½ miles E of Medeba. Another is Khirbet et-Teim, a mile SW of Medeba. A third is Umm el-Walid, 7½ miles SE of Medeba, but the remains there do not seem to antedate the Nabatean period. E. D. GROHMAN

JAHAZIAH. KJV form of JAHZEIAH.

JAHAZIEL jə hā′zĭ əl [יחזיאל, may God see; Apoc. Ἰεζηλος]; KJV Apoc. JEZELUS jĭ zē′ləs. 1. One of the Mighty Men who came to David at Ziklag (I Chr. 12:4—H 12:5).

2. One of the priests appointed by David to blow trumpets before the ark of the covenant (I Chr. 16:6).

3. A Korahite Levite listed as contemporaneous with David (I Chr. 23:19; 24:23).

4. A Levite of the sons of Asaph who prophesied before King Jehoshaphat concerning battle with Ammon and Moab (II Chr. 20:14).

5. The father of one Shecaniah among the exiles who returned from Babylon (Ezra 8:5; cf. I Esd. 8:32).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 27-28, 198. B. T. DAHLBERG

JAHDAI jä′dī [יהדי, may (God) lead; cf. Syr. and Arab. root h-d-y] (I Chr. 2:47). A descendant of Judah.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 196.

JAHDIEL jä′dĭ əl [יחדיאל, may God rejoice (in his works)] (I Chr. 5:24). A chief in the half-tribe of Manasseh.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 210.

JAHDO jä′dō [יחדו, may (God) rejoice (in his works), from חדה] (I Chr. 5:14). A Gadite.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 28, 210.

JAHEL jā′əl. Douay Version form of JAEL.

JAHLEEL jä′lĭ əl [יחלאל, may God show himself friendly(?)]; JAHLEELITES —ə līts. Third son of Zebulun, and ancestor of the Jahleelites (Gen. 46:14; Num. 26:26).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 204.

JAHMAI jä′mī [יחמי, may (God) protect] (I Chr. 7:2). A descendant of Issachar; son of Tola.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 28, 196, 216.

JAHVEH jä′və [יהוה]. A vocalized form of the four consonants of the Israelite sacred name for God; more properly, Yahweh. See GOD, NAMES OF § B.

JAHZAH. Alternate form of JAHAZ.

JAHZEEL jä′zĭ əl [יחצאל, may God distribute, or may God grant good fortune]; JAHZEELITES —ə līts. Alternately: JAHZIEL [יחציאל] (I Chr. 7:13). An eponym; descendant of Naphtali (Gen. 46:24 [cf. Jub. 44:30]; Num. 26:48; I Chr. 7:13), and founder of a tribal family (Num. 26:48).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 27-28, 204. B. T. DAHLBERG

JAHZEIAH jä zē′yə [יחזיה, may Y see] (Ezra 10:15); KJV JAHAZIAH jā′ə zī′ə. One of the four men who opposed Ezra's action in regard to foreign wives.

JAHZERAH jä′zə rə [יחזרה, possibly, prudent; cf. Arab. ḥadhira] (I Chr. 9:12). Ancestor of a priest among the returned exiles. The name parallels Ahzai in Neh. 11:13.

Bibliography. R. A. Bowman, Exegesis of Nehemiah, IB, III (1954), 775-76; M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 228. B. T. DAHLBERG

JAHZIEL. Alternate form of JAHZEEL.

JAIR jā′ər [יאיר, may (the deity) shine forth; in I Chr. 20:5, Kethibh יעור, Qere יעיר, may (God) arouse (see 4 below)].

1. An eponym (cf. II Sam. 20:26); a son of Manasseh. He occupied a number of villages in Gilead in the region of Argob (Num. 32:41; Deut. 3:14; Josh. 13:30; I Kings 4:13; cf. I Chr. 2:22, where his father is Segub of Judah, and his grandmother a daughter of Machir of Manasseh). See HAVVOTH-JAIR; JAIRITE.

2. A Gileadite who judged Israel twenty-two years (Judg. 10:3, 5); he and his sons had thirty cities. The name is doubtless related to 1 above. See HAVVOTH-JAIR.

3. A Benjaminite, possibly related to 1 above; ancestor of Esther's guardian, Mordecai (Esth. 2:5).

4. Father of the Elhanan who killed the brother of Goliath, according to I Chr. 20:5; or who, according to II Sam. 21:19, killed Goliath himself (where read "Jair" [יעיר] for "Jaareoregim"; the latter spelling is a copyist's error due to homoeoteleuton; cf. MT).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 7, 28, 204, 216. B. T. DAHLBERG

JAIRITE, THE jā′ə rīt [היאירי] (II Sam. 20:26). A patronymic used only to describe Ira the priest of David, and indicative of descent from JAIR (1) the son of Manasseh, whose descendants resided in Gilead (Num. 32:41; Deut. 3:14; etc.).

JAIRUS jā ī′rəs ['Ιάϊρας, W-H Ιάειρος; KJV Apoc. יאיר, see 2 below]. 1. A synagogue official ("ruler") whose dead daughter, aged twelve, was raised by Jesus (Mark 5:21-24, 35-43; Luke 8:40-42, 49-56; Matt. 9:18-19, 23-26, though Matthew abstains from mentioning Jairus by name).

In all three accounts the narrative is interrupted by an account of a woman who had had a flow of blood for twelve years. Scholars have puzzled that the one narrative encases the other, for they have in common little more than the commending of faith and the number twelve.

The name could well have been repeated in Mark 5:35-36, 38, 40, but is not; two good ancient MSS (D and it) omit "Jairus by name" from Mark 5:22; some scholars suggest that only Luke's text carried the name, and that the presence of this name in his text is a product of a tendency in late times to supply names which were unknown in the more primitive tradition.

Matthew's version of the story is much condensed; it is one in a succession of ten miracle narratives. Luke's account has some details quite different from those of Mark. Mark 5:41 portrays Jesus as saying in Aramaic: " 'Talitha cumi'; which means, 'Little girl, I say to you, arise.' " Luke and Matthew omit this Aramaic, Luke portraying Jesus as saying: " 'Child, arise,' " while Matthew relates Jesus "took her by the hand, and the girl arose." In Acts 9:36-43 a Dorcas died; her name means "gazelle," which in Aramaic, according to vs. 36, is Tabitha: "Peter . . . knelt down and prayed; then turning to the body he said, 'Tabitha, rise.' " Commentators have noticed the similarities in the Tabitha account and that of Jairus' daughter, and some have thought the one to be a doublet of the other.

The Hebrew of Jairus might well be יעיר ("he will awaken") rather than יאיר ("he will enlighten"); this is cited by those who regard the narrative as a legendary resurrection.

Other commentators suppose that possibly the girl was not dead, but only in a trance. Branscomb comments in opposition that the evangelist did not take literally the words, "The child is not dead but asleep"; if he had done so, "there would have been no miracle to relate." It is reasonable to conclude that all three evangelists intended the narrative to be a bit of wonder-working by Jesus, not a mere error by the parents.

Bibliography. E. Plummer, St. Luke, ICC (1901), p. 237; E. Klostermann, Das Markusevangelium (4th ed., 1950); W. E. Bundy, Jesus and the First Three Gospels (1955).

2. KJV translation of יאור (RSV JAIR 3) in Add. Esth. 11:2 ('Ιάειρου B א L, ἰάτραυ A).

S. SANDMEL

JAKAN. KJV alternate form of JAAKAN.

JAKEH jā′kə [יקה, prudent, from Arab. wāqin; participle active I of w-q-j=be wary] (Prov. 30:1). Apparently the father or ancestor of Agur, a wisdom sage. The verse forms a title to the passage following it and has been variously interpreted.

Bibliography. C. H. Toy, Proverbs, ICC (1916), pp. 518-19; M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 228; C. T. Fritsch, Exegesis of Proverbs, IB, IV (1955), 947.
B. T. DAHLBERG

JAKIM jā′kĭm [יקים, may (the deity) establish]. 1. A Benjaminite (I Chr. 8:19).

2. A priest, descendant of Aaron (I Chr. 24:12).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 28, 200.

JALAM jā′ləm [יעלם, young man]; KJV JAALAM jā′ə ləm. An Edomite clan chief; second son of Esau and Oholibamah (Gen. 36:5, 14, 18; I Chr. 1:35).

JALON jā′lŏn [ילון] (I Chr. 4:17). A descendant of Judah.

JAMB [איל] (Ezek. 40:9–41:3); KJV POST. In Ezekiel's vision the jambs were decorative, and not merely structural, parts of a gate. See ARCHITECTURE; TEMPLE, JERUSALEM.

JAMBRES. See JANNES AND JAMBRES.

JAMBRI jăm′brī ['Ιαμβρί] (I Macc. 9:36). A tribe, presumably the Amorites (cf. the reading in Jos. Antiq. XIII.xi: "the sons of Amaraios"). When Jonathan became leader and left the command of the irregular troops to John, the sons of Jambri from Medeba (which is noted in Num. 21:31 as a city of the Amorites) made John captive and took everything that he had. Jonathan and Simon took revenge by ambushing a wedding party of the sons of Jambri, killing many, and taking their spoils.

Bibliography. S. Tedesche and S. Zeitlin, I Maccabees (1950). S. B. HOENIG

JAMES jāmz ['Ιάκωβος, Hellenized form of 'Ιακώβ (see JACOB); Lat. Jacobus, Jacomus]. A variant form of the name Jacob. The extent of identity among the various persons named James in the NT is much discussed. Some or all of those listed under 2-5 below are considered by many to be the same person.

1. One of the sons of Zebedee; one of the twelve disciples of Jesus (Matt. 4:21; 10:2; 17:1; Mark 1:19, 29; 3:17; 5:37; 9:2; 10:35, 41; 13:3; 14:33; Luke 5:10; 6:14; 8:51; 9:28, 54; Acts 1:13; 12:2). Jesus' call of James and his brother John (see JOHN THE APOSTLE), the sons of Zebedee, who were fishermen in the Sea of Galilee, is related in connection with the call of two other brothers, Peter and Andrew (Matt. 4:18-22; Mark 1:16-20). The call of these four disciples was the first event after the beginning of the ministry, according to Mark and Matthew. Luke, who places the story later, tells it differently, mentioning only Peter, James, and John (Luke 5:1-11). That James and John left their father with the hired servants (Mark 1:20) indicates that they were working in a family business, though Mark mentions the point to stress their obedience. Luke adds that James and John were partners of Peter (Luke 5:10).

In the lists of the Twelve, James and John always form a group of four with Peter and Andrew. Sometimes the sons of Zebedee are named after Peter and Andrew (Matt. 10:2; Luke 6:14); sometimes they come between them (Mark 3:16-18; Acts 1:13). The latter order reflects the priority of the new relationship to Jesus over the human relationship of Peter and Andrew.

James was probably the older brother, since he is usually mentioned first, and John is sometimes identified as the "brother of James" (Mark 3:17; 5:37; cf. Matt. 10:2; 17:1). However, Luke and Acts sometimes name John first or call James the brother of John (Luke 8:51; 9:28; Acts 1:13; 12:2), probably because John was a well-known "pillar" of the church after James's death (Gal. 2:9).

Mark alone records that Jesus gave James and John the special name BOANERGES, or "sons of thunder" (Mark 3:17).

Peter and James and John form a special group of disciples on three occasions recorded in the gospels, in addition to the occasion of their call as described by Luke. At the home of Jairus, Jesus permitted only these three from the circle of disciples to go with him to the child (Mark 5:37; Luke 8:51; Matthew omits this detail). Again, at the Transfiguration, Jesus chose these three to ascend the mountain with him (Matt. 17:1; Mark 9:2; Luke 9:28). Finally, in Gethsemane they were again chosen to accompany Jesus (Matt. 26:37; Mark 14:33; Luke omits this detail). Similarly, according to Mark, James and John went with Jesus to the home of Peter and Andrew (Mark 1:29); and it was Peter, James, John, and Andrew who asked about the signs of the coming Judgment (Mark 13:3).

James and John appear together in two other places. In Luke 9:51-56 they ask Jesus whether he wants them to call down fire from heaven on the Samaritan village that would not receive Jesus and his disciples. In this story James and John, with their allusion to Elijah (II Kings 1:10-12), represent the old way in contrast to the way of Jesus. Later copyists have expanded the text to explain the conclusion. "He . . . rebuked them" (Luke 9:55) is interpreted in some MSS by the addition of: "You do not know what manner of spirit you are of"; many others also add the saying: "For the son of man came not to destroy men's lives but to save them" (cf. Luke 19:10).

The other episode in which the two brothers appear together is when they requested places at Jesus' right and left hand in his coming glory (Matt. 20:20-28; Mark 10:35-45). In Matthew it is their mother who makes the ambitious request, though Jesus replies directly to James and John; in Mark the two brothers speak for themselves. The answer of Jesus is a double one: to the brothers, a prediction that they will drink the cup that he drinks, and to the rest of the Twelve, in response to their grumbling at James and John, words on true greatness—to be great means to be slave or servant of all. The section on greatness (Matt. 20:24-28; Mark 10:41-45) is used in a different setting in Luke 22:24-27, and may not be originally part of the story of James and John. Both in this story and in the story of the Samaritan village, the focus falls on Jesus rather than on James and John, except as their human desires, perhaps emphasized by their human relationship to each other, make their words a foil for the words and purpose of Jesus.

With the rest of the Eleven, James was a witness of the Resurrection. But the narratives of the Resurrection do not make any special mention of him, except that the sons of Zebedee are listed as present on the shore of the Sea of Galilee when Jesus appeared to the disciples there (John 21:1-8)—this story shows striking parallels to the original call of Peter, James, and John, as told in Luke 5:1-11.

James is the only one of the Twelve whose martyrdom is related in the NT, and probably he was the first of them to be put to death. According to Acts, Herod Agrippa I, king of Palestine A.D. 42-44, executed James as part of a wider move of persecution which included the arrest of Peter (Acts 12:1-3). That James was prominent enough to be singled out for execution may indicate that Peter, James, and John formed a special group among the leaders of the church in Jerusalem, as they had among the followers of Jesus. However, though Peter and John are mentioned together in Acts (3:1, etc.), the martyrdom is the only episode related of James.

Later, legendary stories expand the narrative of Acts. Clement of Alexandria (ca. 200) writes that James forgave his accuser (quoted by Euseb. Hist. II.9.2-3). The apocryphal Apostolic History of Abdias (see ABDIAS, APOSTOLIC HISTORY OF) describes James's miracles and controversies, which culminate in his execution by Herod. But his known early death led to James's receiving little attention in the growth of legendary stories about the apostles. A later legend (sixth or seventh century) told that he preached in Spain, and it was also believed that he was buried there. In Christian tradition James the son of Zebedee is known as James the Great, in contrast to James the son of Alphaeus, who is known as James the Less.

Some interpreters think that James was a cousin of Jesus, on the basis of a comparison of the lists of women present at the Crucifixion. In Matt. 27:56 the mother of the sons of Zebedee is one of these; she is often identified with the Salome listed in Mark 15:40 (see SALOME 2). If a further identification can be made, of the mother of the sons of Zebedee (Matt. 27:56) with "[Jesus'] mother's sister" (John 19:25), then James's mother was the sister of Mary the mother of Jesus. This theory assumes, probably rightly, that in John 19:25 "his mother's sister" is a different person from "Mary the wife of Clopas" (see 5 below). But it is very improbable that James was a cousin of Jesus. In view of the interest of the early church in relatives of Jesus, it is very likely that if he had been, this fact would have been prominent in early tradition, but it is not. Furthermore, it is doubtful that the various lists of women present at the Crucifixion can be harmonized, since they represent various traditions. Matthew and Mark state that they name only a few women of many, and it is not necessarily the case that the individuals mentioned in the various gospels are the same persons.

2. The son of Alphaeus; one of the twelve disciples of Jesus (Matt. 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:15; Acts 1:13). He heads the third group of four disciples in each list of the Twelve, but is not mentioned by name in any episode recorded in the gospels or Acts.

Since the disciple Levi is also called a son of Alphaeus (Mark 2:14), it has been suggested that James and Levi were brothers. But this is not likely, since they are not associated in any way in the gospels. Even on the assumption that Levi is an alternative name for Matthew (who is never called a son of Alphaeus), Matthew is never paired with James the son of Alphaeus in the lists of the Twelve, though Peter and Andrew, and James and John, are paired as brothers (see ALPHAEUS; LEVI 4; MATTHEW, APOSTLE). It is quite possible that James the son of Alphaeus is the same person as James the son of Mary. See 3 below.

A number of early forms of the text substitute the name "James the son of Alphaeus" for "Levi the son of Alphaeus" in Mark's story of the call of the tax collector. This alteration is not found in Luke's narrative of the call of Levi (Luke 5:27), while Matthew reads the name "Matthew" in the parallel (Matt. 9:9). Though the sources offering the reading "James" in Mark 2:14 represent a variety of early traditions, this variant reading is not original and does not give the clue to another James, nor to information that James the son of Alphaeus was a tax collector; but rather it represents an attempt, different from the tradition of Matthew, to identify Levi as one of the Twelve.

3. One of the sons of Mary (see MARY 4). The mother is mentioned as present at the Crucifixion (Matt. 27:56; Mark 15:40), and at the discovery of the empty tomb (Mark 16:1; Luke 24:10). This James had a brother Joses (see JOSES 1) or Joseph, and was known as James the "less" (Mark 15:40 KJV) or "younger" (RSV), perhaps because of his small stature. It is often thought that James the son of Mary was a cousin of Jesus, but this theory is extremely improbable (see 5 below). It is possible that James the son of Mary is to be identified with the son of Alphaeus. See 2 above.

4. The father of Judas (Luke 6:16; Acts 1:13). In the lists of Luke and Acts, Judas the son of James is one of the Twelve. The Greek reads "Judas of James." The KJV translates "Judas the brother of James"; and on the assumption that these two were brothers, this James has often been identified with James the brother of Jesus, who had a brother named Judas (Matt. 13:55; Mark 6:3; cf. JUDE 1), and often as well with James the son of Alphaeus and James the son of Mary. It is exceedingly unlikely that these persons are all the same (see 5 below). In any case, it is probable that this James was the father, not the brother, of the disciple Judas, and as such it is doubtful that he is otherwise known in the NT. See JUDAS 8.

5. A brother of the Lord. He is listed first among the brothers of Jesus, presumably as the oldest of them (Matt. 13:55; Mark 6:3). Paul met James the Lord's brother in Jerusalem on his first visit, three years after his conversion (Gal. 1:19). There can be little doubt that the same person is referred to simply as James in Acts 12:17; 15:13; 21:18; I Cor. 15:7; Gal. 2:9, 12; and is probably intended in Jas. 1:1; Jude 1.

The relationship between James and Jesus has been much discussed (see BROTHERS OF THE LORD). NT and early Christian writers refer to James as a "brother" of Jesus, and the natural interpretation of the language of that period is the literal one, that James was a son of Joseph and Mary, younger than Jesus. Though this view was rejected by most of the ancient church, it is probably correct.

Belief in the perpetual virginity of Mary led to the development of the view that Jesus and James were foster brothers. The legend of Mary's betrothal to Joseph, an elderly widower with children, developed early. It may be read in the Protevangelium of James (see JAMES, PROTEVANGELIUM OF). Thus, it was believed, Joseph's sons were known as the brothers of the Lord. This theory was widely accepted during the early centuries of Christian history, and is still the prevailing view of the Eastern churches. The principal difficulty with it is that it is based on accounts of the lives of Joseph and Mary which are essentially legendary and nonhistorical.

Another, later view is that James and Jesus were cousins. By identifying James with James the son of Alphaeus (see 2 above), it was believed that he was one of the Twelve. By identifying him also with James the son of Mary (see 3 above), it was held that he was a cousin of Jesus. As in the theory that James the son of Zebedee was a cousin of Jesus, this conclusion was reached through a study of the lists of women present at the Crucifixion. By comparing Matt. 27:56 with John 19:25, and punctuating the latter verse to read: "his mother, and his mother's sister Mary the wife of Clopas, and Mary Magdalene," students have concluded that Mary the mother of James was Mary of Clopas, and that she, rather than the wife of Zebedee, was the sister of Jesus' mother. If James the brother of the Lord is James the son of Mary, and if the identification of the Mary of Matthew and the Mary of John is correct, then James was a cousin, not a brother, of Jesus. Another theory established the relationship through a tradition that CLOPAS, identified with Alphaeus, was a brother of Joseph. Either of these chains of identification is very improbable. Nonetheless, the view that James and Jesus were cousins became current in the Western church and is current in the Roman Catholic Church. By his identification with James the son of Alphaeus, James is known in Christian tradition as "James the Less" (from Mark 15:40 KJV), in contrast to James the Great, the son of Zebedee.

James apparently was not a disciple during the ministry of Jesus (Matt. 12:46-50; Mark 3:31-35; Luke 8:19-21; John 7:5). Yet he was a witness of the Resurrection (I Cor. 15:7), and he appeared very early as an important leader in Jerusalem. Though he was not one of the Twelve, James was apparently regarded as an apostle. This is the most natural meaning of Gal. 1:19: "I saw none of the other apostles except James the Lord's brother." It has been suggested that James became an apostle as a replacement for James the son of Zebedee, since Acts first mentions him after the death of the latter. It is more probable, however, that in the early church there were more than twelve apostles from the beginning, since I Cor. 15:5-7 mentions the Twelve separately from "all the apostles." James, like the Eleven and Paul, became an apostle by the appearance of the risen Christ to him, commissioning him to be a specially authorized witness to the Resurrection. Though he apparently stayed in Jerusalem, in contrast to other apostles and other brothers of the Lord who traveled (I Cor. 9:5), his vocation is apparent when Paul refers to the agreement that James, Peter, and John should go to the Jews, while Paul should go to the Gentiles (Gal. 2:9). Thus the beginning and basis of James's position in the church was not his human relationship to Jesus, but his special relationship by faith to the risen Christ. See APOSTLE.

From James's presence in Paul's list of those to whom the risen Christ had appeared, it is clear that James shared the eschatological faith of the first Christians, that God would establish a new age through Christ. James was at one with Paul in believing that the new faith in Christ was for Gentiles as well as for Jews, and they agreed as well that Gentiles did not have to follow the Jewish law (Gal. 2:6-10; cf. Acts 15:12-21). James's own special vocation, however, was to the Jews (Gal. 2:9). Perhaps James and many other Jewish Christians believed that the mission to the Jews would pave the way for the salvation of the Gentiles, as is suggested by Acts 15:16-18, quoting Amos 9:11-12 (LXX). Paul, on the other hand, believed that the salvation of the Gentiles would unexpectedly precede the conversion of the Jews (Rom. 10–11). It is difficult, however, to know James's thought in detail, especially since the speeches in Acts are not literal records of the words of the speakers.

Ancient tradition presents James as combining the new faith in the Resurrection with a strong loyalty to the Jewish law. Most scholars find that this tradition reflects his real sympathy with the law, though the later traditions greatly exaggerate his legalism. In Galatians and Acts, James is not presented as a rigid follower of the law. Probably James the brother of the Lord is the James of the Letter of James (Jas. 1:1; cf. Jude 1). Whether the letter was written by him, or whether, as is more likely, it is a collection of Christian teaching presented in his name at a later time, its emphasis on common-sense morality rather than legalism shows that James was not remembered as a strict follower of the Mosaic law. See JAMES, LETTER OF.

In Gal. 2:1-10, Paul says that in a private conference at Jerusalem the "pillars," James, Peter, and John, accepted him without qualification, except that he should remember the "poor" (perhaps the saints of Jerusalem). The context shows that the discussion centered on circumcision, and that Paul was not required to ask circumcision of his Gentile converts, since they did not have to follow the law.

Acts 15:1-29 presents an account of a public conference about Paul's work, which cannot be completely harmonized with Galatians, though most scholars think that Acts and Galatians are reporting the same conference. In Acts the issue of circumcision drops into the background, and James proposes certain minimum requirements to be followed by non-Jewish believers; these proposals are then adopted as the so-called "apostolic decree." In the usual text Gentiles are required to "abstain from the pollution of idols and from unchastity and from what is strangled and from blood" (Acts 15:20). This is a series of predominantly ceremonial requirements apparently designed to make easier the table fellowship within the church, between Jews and those who did not follow Jewish dietary practices. Some "Western" forms of the text omit "what is strangled"; their shorter list, which some scholars consider the original form, can be seen as involving primarily moral rather than ceremonial requirements, though either list can be interpreted with either emphasis. In either case, Acts shows James playing a mediating position between a group of Jewish Christians who wished all believers to follow the law, and Gentile Christians on whom the obligation of the law as such was not laid. Whether the details of the decree can be attributed to James is a difficult question, since Paul says nothing about it in Galatians. If the decree was adopted before Paul wrote Galatians, he may have ignored it because he thought that it was temporary or local. But many scholars think that the differences between Acts and Galatians are most easily resolved by supposing that the decree comes from a somewhat later period, and has been inserted at this point by the author of Acts because it deals with the relations between Jewish and Gentile Christians. If this theory is correct, then it is problematical to what extent the rules of the decree present the point of view of James. In any case these rules attributed to James did not become regular requirements laid on Gentile Christians. See COUNCIL OF JERUSALEM.

When Paul resisted Peter's refusal to eat with Gentile Christians at Antioch, apparently after his conference with the leaders at Jerusalem, the turning point in Peter's refusal was the coming of "certain men . . . from James" (Gal. 2:12). They claimed James's support for requiring the full observance of Jewish dietary laws among Jewish Christians, but it is not possible to be sure that they represented him accurately in the matter of Jewish and Gentile Christians' eating together, or even that he was as anxious to follow the old traditions as they asserted. Similarly James is shown in Acts as joining with the elders of the church in Jerusalem in advising Paul to share in a temple ceremony (Acts 21:17-26). Here again, the story indicates James's reverence for the old pattern of piety, but does not clearly show how he related it to his new faith. Perhaps James represented a group of Christians who continued to celebrate the temple worship, while Stephen (Acts 7) represented a group which rejected the temple.

Thus the NT references to James show that he was devoted to the old Jewish tradition, yet willing to modify it in the light of the newness of God's action in Christ. A background for this combination of concern for both law and eschatology is found in some Jewish apocalyptic writings (see APOCALYPTICISM) and in the DEAD SEA SCROLLS. Later tradition among Jewish Christians remembered and exaggerated James's devotion to the law, almost to the neglect of his faith in the new action of God in Christ. According to Hegesippus, writing ca. 180 (quoted by Euseb. Hist. II.23.4-18), James was a NAZIRITE and spent so much time on his knees in intercession for the people that his knees grew horny like a camel's. He was thought to have been so pious that he was revered by all as "the Just" (a title perhaps transferred from Christ; cf. Acts 3:14; 7:52; 22:14). This picture of devotion to the law is full of legendary traits; in it James almost becomes himself a mediator between God and man. E.g., Hegesippus portrays James as a priest in his intercession for the people, though he could not have belonged to the priestly group, and he makes his faith in Christ so secret that the "Jews and scribes and Pharisees" ask him to restrain the people from believing in Christ. Though James was not so offensive to the Jewish leaders as was Paul, it is very improbable that he was honored by them for his piety; eventually they put him to death (see below). The exaggerated picture of James's Jewish piety reflects a later period, when Jewish and Gentile Christians had separated. It does not represent the conditions of the first Christian generation, though some scholars have wrongly used this picture of James to reconstruct an early Christianity which fell apart almost from the beginning in a conflict over the law.

By tradition James was the first "bishop" of Jerusalem (Clement of Alexandria, quoted by Euseb. Hist. II.1.3). Jewish Christianity exalted James to a position above Peter and Paul. The Gospel According to the Hebrews (see HEBREWS, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO THE) presents the resurrected Christ as appearing first to James, and apparently presupposes that James, unlike the others, never doubted the Resurrection. The Clementine Homilies and Clementine Recognitions, which are romances about the life of CLEMENT dating from the fourth century but partly based on Jewish Christian sources of an earlier time, call James "bishop of bishops." In these writings Peter and the other apostles are accredited by James (Clementine Recognitions IV.35). James is presented as sending out the apostles in the Coptic Gnostic "Letter of James" of the Jung Codex. As in Hegesippus' tradition about his piety, this honoring of James is a Jewish Christian attempt to exalt the one remembered as their leader to the position of true guide of the first Christians. James was not a "bishop" in the later sense of the term. But both Galatians and Acts confirm the conclusion, exaggerated in these later writings, that James was the most respected and authoritative leader in Jerusalem for most of the first Christian generation. Though Paul's independence of Jerusalem was acknowledged (Gal. 2:6-10), the fact that his position had to be discussed with James and the other "pillars" shows that authority in Jerusalem also meant, in the first generation, recognition in other churches.

The basis of James's position in the church was his relation to the Risen Christ, but the fact that he was of the family of Jesus no doubt strengthened his authority. Jesus himself repudiated the ties of family as a basis for importance among his followers (Matt. 12:48-50; Mark 3:33-35; Luke 8:21). Nonetheless, the role of the family in leadership in the ancient Near East makes it probable that many Christians honored James as a brother of Jesus, especially since they were keenly aware that Jesus and his brothers were of the family of David, the promised messianic line. That there was some recognition of James's human relationship to Jesus is made more probable by the fact that after the death of James and the destruction of Jerusalem, another relative of Jesus, named Simeon, came into a position of leadership (Hegesippus, in Euseb. Hist. IV.22.4; cf. III.11-12). The succession Jesus-James-Simeon has led some students to find in early Jewish Christianity an approach to a dynastic pattern of leadership, a Christian "caliphate." It is probable that this way of ensuring continuity in the church did commend itself to some Christians, but it proved to be only a temporary experiment.

Two separate traditions tell that James was put to death shortly before the destruction of Jerusalem in 70. According to the Jewish historian Josephus, writing ca. 94, James with "certain others" was stoned in 62 at the instigation of the Sadducee high priest Ananus, as one of his first acts as high priest. Ananus was able to carry out the execution because the newly appointed Roman procurator, Albinus, had not yet arrived in Palestine (Jos. Antiq. XX.ix. 197-203). It is possible that the others who were put to death were also Christians, but this is not stated. This passage has been suspected of being a Christian interpolation in the text of Josephus, but it shows no obvious Christian bias and fits Josephus' usual interpretation of the Sadducee party. Thus there is little doubt that James was put to death by the priestly authorities in the early sixties, perhaps as part of a wider move of opposition to Christianity.

Another account of the death of James comes from Hegesippus, in the passage cited above to describe his piety. According to Hegesippus, James met his death after being presented to the people at Passover to give his impartial judgment about Jesus. When he proclaimed Jesus as the Son of man, seated at God's right hand, he was cast down from the temple, stoned, and clubbed to death. Hegesippus agrees with Josephus that James was put to death by priestly authorities in the sixties, though he puts the episode shortly before the siege of 66. But the details of his story are legendary.

Bibliography. T. Zahn, "Brüder und Vettern Jesu," Forschungen zur Geschichte des neutestamentlichen Kanons und der altchristlichen Literatur, vol. VI, pt. II (1900), pp. 225-364; J. B. Mayor, The Epistle of St. James (3rd ed., 1913), pp. i-lxv; H. J. Schoeps, Theologie und Geschichte des Judenchristentums (1949), pp. 122-26, 256-70; H. von Campenhausen, "Die Nachfolge des Jakobus," Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte, LXIII (1950-51), 133-44; E. Stauffer, "Zum Kalifat des Jakobus," Zeitschrift für Religions- und Geistesgeschichte, IV (1952), 193-214; J. Munck, Paulus und die Heilsgeschichte (1954), pp. 103-11, 233-37; G. Quispel, Neue Funde zur valentinianischen Gnosis," Zeitschrift für Religions- und Geistesgeschichte, VI (1954), 291-92; L. E. Elliott-Binns, Galilean Christianity (1956); E. J. Goodspeed, The Twelve (1957); S. E. Johnson, "The Dead Sea Manual of Discipline and the Jerusalem Church of Acts," in K. Stendahl, ed., The Scrolls and the NT (1957), pp. 129-42. W. A. BEARDSLEE

JAMES, APOCALYPSE OF [יעקב; Ἰάκωβος]. A Gnostic writing found at Chenoboskion in Egypt in 1946 in no fewer than three editions, two in one codex, the third in another codex and in a hitherto unknown Coptic dialect. This writing is apparently totally distinct from the apocryphon quoted in an encomium on John the Baptist (see bibliography), and may conceivably be related to the "discourses" which Hippolytus (Heresies V.2) reports the Naasenes claimed had been handed down to Mariamne by James the brother of the Lord, concerning primordial man and the triple principle of the universe.

For further discussion of Gnostic apocrypha, see APOCRYPHA, NT.

Bibliography. E. A. W. Budge, Coptic Apocrypha (1913), p. 348. M. S. ENSLIN

JAMES, ASCENTS OF [Ἀναβαθμοὶ Ἰακώβου]. A writing mentioned, only by Epiphanius (Heresies XXX.16). According to him it was a book used by the Ebionites; it represented James the brother of the Lord as speaking against the temple and sacrifices, and was bitterly anti-Pauline. Paul was a Greek; desiring to wed the daughter of the high priest, he got himself circumcised and became a proselyte; but, failing to win his bride, he became enraged and wrote tirades against the law and circumcision. See APOCRYPHA, NT.

It has been plausibly conjectured that the book described the ascents of James up the temple steps, whence he addressed the multitude. Reflections of the writing have been seen in the Clementine Recognitions (I.66-71), where James is represented ascending the steps on seven consecutive days, only at last to be flung down and left for dead by "the enemy" (Saul of Tarsus). It has been suggested that the familiar story of James's martyrdom, quoted by Eusebius (Hist. II.23.3-18) from Hegesippus (ca. A.D. 175), may well have been the grand finale of these ascents, recounting, as it does, James's address from the pinnacle of the temple, his being hurled from this lofty height, his stoning, and his subsequent death by a laundryman's club.

Bibliography. For an account of conjectures about the writing and the possibility of its connection with an otherwise unknown Jewish-Christian Acts of the Apostles, see H. J. Schoeps, Theologie und Geschichte des Judenchristentums (1949), pp. 381-456. M. S. ENSLIN

JAMES, LETTER OF. The twentieth book in the NT and the first of the so-called CATHOLIC LETTERS.

1. History
   a. Authorship
   b. Reading public
   c. Date
   d. Place of composition
   e. Purpose
2. Message
   a. Genuineness versus pretense
   b. Credentials of leaders
   c. Christian godliness
3. Text
Bibliography

1. History. a. Authorship. The author identifies himself simply as "James, a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ" (1:1). More specifically, he says he is a teacher (3:1). His excellent Greek style, varied vocabulary, use of the diatribe form, suggest a Greek background. He thought and taught in Koine Greek. His public was as clearly Greek.

The issues with which James of Jerusalem was concerned do not appear in this letter. Author and audience knew Paul through his published letters only. The problems treated by James had grown out of a misuse of such Pauline emphases as love and faith to justify moral inertia and acts of partiality. The soundness of Paul's positions is assumed by James. The sort of antagonism toward Paul manifested by many Jewish Christians nowhere appears in James (cf. Rom. 2:17–4:25; Gal. 1–3).

Eusebius says that in the Hypotyposes, Clement of Alexandria gave concise explanations of "all of the Canonical Scriptures, not passing over even the disputed writings." He explains that by the latter he means "the Epistle of Jude and the remaining Catholic Epistles, and the Epistle of Barnabas, and the Apocalypse known as Peter's" (Hist. VI.14.1). No extant statement by Clement substantiates Eusebius' representation. Eusebius himself regarded James, the Lord's brother, whom he calls an apostle, as the author, but he clearly knew the status of the letter was debatable because of uncertainty regarding its authorship. See CANON, NT.

Origen is the earliest of the fathers to refer explicitly to James (Commentary on John XIX.23). He seems to have popularized the letter in Alexandria, and under Alexandrian influence its acceptance spread throughout the church. In the East, from the time of Origen, James was generally treated as having been written by the Lord's brother. Eusebius' references to its doubtful status (Hist. II.23.24-25; III.35.3) probably described his knowledge of contrary opinions in Syria and the West.

In Syrian centers like Antioch and Edessa, James was recognized by the fifth century. I John, I Peter, and James were the three Catholics included in the PESHITTA, and James may have been translated for inclusion in that version. In Syrian centers remote from Greek influences, James remained doubtful.

The church in the West came to know James through leaders who had traveled in the East. Hilary of Poitiers (A.D. 356-58) was the first Westerner to refer to the letter as by "the apostle James" (On the Trinity IV.8). Jerome included James in the Vulg. version and quoted it in his writings. Augustine's canon was identical with Jerome's, and his espousal of the letter was reflected in its adoption as canonical at the councils of Hippo in 393 and Carthage in 397 and 419. Augustine was the first African father to use James.

Authorship of James by the Lord's brother is rendered unlikely by the fact that prior to Origen it was unknown outside the locality of its origin and was thereafter accepted hesitantly in Syria and the West. Apostolicity early became a credential for canonicity, and skepticism about its authorship accounts for the slowness with which James won its way. Jerome, who was largely responsible for the acceptance of James in the West, thought the Lord's brother wrote it, but he knew the tradition of its pseudonymity and reported that it was thought "by some to have been published by someone else" in James's name, and gradually "as time went on . . . gained authority" (On Illustrious Men II).

The tradition of authenticity thus hinges on the judgment of Origen. He may have known an earlier tradition to this effect. Just as possibly, his opinion may have been based on inferences from allusions to James in Acts and in Paul's letters.

Whatever the origin of the tradition, it represented the impression the author of the letter himself probably intended to create. His description of himself (1:1) suggests that he wrote in the name of James of Jerusalem, now a revered figure of a relatively remote past, in whose spirit he intended to speak. The names of Paul, Peter, and John were already associated with influential letters. The name of James, popularized in Acts and Galatians, was, however, available, and could be effectively used in accordance with current literary practice.

b. Reading public. The letter describes its reading public as the "twelve tribes in the dispersion" (1:1). Jewish tribal divisions disappeared centuries before the Christian era, so that it is needlessly literalistic to interpret this address to mean Jews or Jewish Christians. Nothing in the letter suggests the Jewish origin of the readers. The sins condemned are human, not Jewish. The "perfect law, the law of liberty" (1:25), refers, not to the Mosaic system, but to the Christian law of love (cf. Barn. 2.1, 6; Just. Dial. 12.3). James shows no awareness of the antagonistic groups of Paul's time (cf. Acts 15; Gal. 2–3). The address is clearly a designation of Christendom as the spiritual Israel (cf. Matt. 3:9; 12:46-50; Acts 10:34-37; Rom. 4:16; 9:6-8; Gal. 3:7-9; 6:16; Eph. 1:1; I Pet. 1:1; Rev. 7:4-17; 21:10-15).

c. Date. The literary connections of James are the principal basis for an approximate date. The letter does not quote earlier Christian writings. Rather clearly, however, its author knew Romans, I Corinthians, Galatians, and Ephesians, which means that he knew them as members of a published collection. The concern of James and II Peter with the misuse of Paul by heretics strongly suggests A.D. 125-50.

Though in all cases indecisive and requiring detailed discussion, parallels both verbal and ideological suggest James's knowledge of Matthew, Luke, Hebrews, I Peter, Hermas, and I Clement, in addition to Paul's published letters. Paul's letters were published ca. A.D. 95. Between 95 and the date of Origen's use of James, the most significant datum is the concern of James and II Peter with the misuse of Paul's teaching. Paul's letters enjoyed a tremendous vogue for the quarter of a century following their publication. Because of the espousal of Paul by heretics during the second quarter of the second century, however, Paul's letters waned in popularity. James apparently originated in this period of waning popularity—i.e., A.D. 125-50.

d. Place of composition. The author's basic interest is the "good life" (3:13). Obedience to the "perfect law" is the foundation of the "good life" (1:25). These emphases so closely resemble those of Matthew and the Didache as to suggest Syrian Antioch as the common place of origin. The hesitancy with which James was accepted in the Syrian canon, however, makes this view less plausible.

More probably, Origen found the letter at Caesarea and brought it with him to Alexandria. Until then it had apparently enjoyed a purely local circulation. Origen's appreciation of it gained an extension of its appeal. A Caesarean origin would explain affinities of the letter with Jesus' teaching as preserved in non-Markan written sources used by Matthew and Luke. The location also fits the comparatively early acceptance of James in the Greek church in the East.

e. Purpose. Faced with serious misuse of Paul's teaching on love and faith, a Greek Christian teacher of the first quarter of the second century wrote a letter in the name of James, whose authority Paul had recognized and with whose approval he had done his missionary work (Acts 15:12-41; Gal. 1:19). He was moved to write because "foolish fellows" (2:20), like the "ignorant and unstable" of II Pet. 3:16, had distorted Paul's emphases "to their own destruction" and the confusion of the church. James condemns an understanding of love that condones "partiality" (2:1-13), and that justifies inertia by equating faith with orthodoxy (2:14-26). Love and faith require commitment to the "perfect law, the law of liberty." The result of such commitment is perseverance in obeying that law. James intended to exalt genuineness and condemn sham. He wrote to insist that religiousness be morally energetic and socially redemptive. He proposed to arouse the conscience of the church on issues confused in the preaching of incompetent and heretical leaders.

2. Message. The theme of James is the "righteousness of God" (1:20), meaning the righteousness God approves. The letter is an exposition of this theme under three broad headings:

I. Genuineness versus pretense, 1:2–2:26
II. Credentials of leaders, 3:1-18
III. Christian godliness, 4–5

Somewhat more specifically, James insists that righteousness involves performance, not merely perception of truth. A piety that is exclusively devotional or intellectual is counterfeit. Effective piety is a synthesis of endurance (1:2-18), obedience (1:19-27), impartiality (2:1-13), integrity (2:14-26), discipline

(3:1–4:10), humility (4:11–5:6), patience (5:7-11), prayerfulness (5:12-18), and love (5:19-20).

The superscription (1:1) sets the tone of the message. Its point of view is more definitely theological than moralistic. The author describes himself as a "servant [δοῦλος] of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ." This is the equivalent of saying that God has no competitors for his devotion. He utterly belongs to God and desires to be used in bringing God's will to pass. His acknowledgment of Jesus Christ as Lord gives his service to God its most fruitful norm (cf. Rom. 10:9-13). The author is, in other words, a Christian, distinguished from other Christians only in having assumed the role of a teacher (3:1).

Under the analogy of the "twelve tribes in the dispersion," James addresses the church in its wholeness as the spiritual Israel. "The dispersion" (ἡ διασπορά) described the Jews as separated from their homeland and scattered among alien nations (cf. Jer. 15:4-7; Dan. 9:7; John 7:35; I Pet. 1:1). In the first century, three fourths of all Jews in the Roman world were so scattered. They found it advantageous to live outside Palestine, and most of them had emigrated for this reason. Sentimentally, however, the dispersion was regarded as lamentable, and it was felt that God's providence would be fulfilled by reunion in their homeland (cf. Isa. 40:1-5; 43:5-19; 49:22-25; 66:20-23). Applied to the church, "the dispersion" described Christians as temporarily residing in a hostile world, and as looking toward the bliss of a heavenly homeland. Christians, wherever located, were united by the hope of being together eternally (John 14:1-3; 17:10-20; Gal. 4:26; Phil. 3:20-21; Heb. 12:22-29; 13:14; I Pet. 1:1; Rev. 21-22).

a. Genuineness versus pretense. The emphasis on genuineness is positively stated in 1:2-18. Exposure of pretense in 1:19–2:26 complements the analysis of genuineness and clarifies its meaning. Constituent elements in true religion are unwavering constancy, maturity of character, expectant prayerfulness, heavenly wisdom, joy based on preference for true values, confident hope, objectivity in self-judgment.

The trials (πειρασμοί) James discusses are related to πειρατής, from which the English word "pirate" comes. A pirate attacks with a view to taking valuables from their owner. Satan is called ὁ πειράζων (Matt. 4:3; cf. I Cor. 7:5; 10:13; I Thess. 3:5). By analogy, "trials" assault men of faith and tend to create skepticism of God's providence. Instead of jeopardizing faith, however, trials should enhance it by enriching its elements. Christians should be glad to have their faith subjected to critical appraisal. Accordingly, they are to count it unmixed joy (πᾶσαν χαράν) when variegated trials (ποικίλοις πειρασμοῖς) come. Trials make the elements of true faith stand out in bold relief.

Constancy (ὑπομονή) is the inner principle of faith. It is staying power. Adversity brings out this aspect of faith and develops it (cf. Rom. 5:3-5). Constancy is prerequisite to perfection (τελείωσις; cf. Heb. 12:2, τελειωτής τῆς πίστεως, where Christ is described as raising faith to its ultimate expression). James urges a mature, as against a partially developed, faith (1:4: ἔργον τέλειον ἐχέτω; cf. 2:22). This is comparable to Paul's idea of faith working itself out in love (Rom. 6; Gal. 5:6; cf. John 17:4). Maturity of character is the goal of faith, and James thinks trials foster maturity (1:2-4).

This perfection is nurtured by prayer that is undoubting (μηδὲν διακρινόμενος)—i.e., faith whose inner principle is the constancy developed in trial (1:5-8). The wind-tossed sea and the irresolution of a double-minded man (ἀνὴρ δίψυχος) are analogies for ineffective faith. When a man prays, he must face one way—toward God—and ignore all else. The object of such prayer is wisdom, a religious equivalent of the worldly man's capacity for achieving success based on discernment and determination. God bestows such wisdom impartially and generously in answer to undoubting faith. God matches prayer of this quality with generosity: he "gives to all men generously." His impartial generosity in bestowing wisdom is man's warrant for praying.

Poverty and wealth illustrate the trials James discusses (1:9-12). Both the gaining of wealth and its loss typify the circumstances of Christians. Joy in the midst of adversity discloses the wisdom God gives. The ephemeral character of riches, discerned by wisdom, is illustrated by flowers that "fade and die." Moral growth in adversity is, by contrast, heavenly wealth (cf. I Cor. 7:17-24). The reward of steadfastness and perfection is the "crown of life which God has promised to those who love him" (1:12). Genuine faith enables men to face the future unafraid. God's reward is eternal, not ephemeral. God's victor's wreath is a "crown of life"—i.e., eternal life (cf. John 3:15; 10:10; Rom. 2:7; I Cor. 9:25; Rev. 2:7-10).

James next examines the origin of trials, which are more easily occasions for temptation than for joy (1:13-18). If God is regarded as sending trials, Christians will tend to yield and sin. So James insists that though trials may be so met as to please God, their origin cannot be attributed to God. Like Paul (cf. I Cor. 10:9-13), James destroys the self-excusing sinner's chief defense. God as God is untemptable (ἀπείραστος) and does not violate his character by tempting men. Nor is Satan responsible (cf. Enoch 69:4-15). Temptation is from within; man's inner life is the source. By their own desires (ὑπὸ τῆς ἰδίας ἐπιθυμίας) men are enticed. As the author pursues these figures of hunting, desire becomes temptation's bait, and the lured man finds death, not a "crown of life" (cf. Rom. 6:15-23; 8:5-30). Invariably, from God come "every good endowment and every perfect gift." God is undeviating, and in him "there is no variation or shadow due to change" (1:17). Truth, as revelation in its totality, supplies men with a guide for achieving the crown of life (1:18).

In 1:19–2:26, James complements his exposition of genuineness by exposing pretense to view. Right response to instruction is the keynote in 1:19-27. Moral consistency as the foundation of worship is the theme in ch. 2.

Appropriate performance is made the test of good listening (1:19-27). Attentiveness is important, but as the condition of discovery of duty. Execution of duty is the listener's primary concern. The teacher's words are lures to action. One who divorces hearing from doing is like "a man who observes his natural face in a mirror . . . and goes away and at once forgets what he was like" (1:23-24).

Scriptural revelation and inner conviction support James's contention (cf. Rom. 5:1-11). Truth inwrought in man's heart (ἔμφυτος λόγος) and revealed in the Scriptures forms the substance of Christian teaching. Interpretation of man to himself and exposition of historical revelation are the teacher's twofold task. For the Christian, truth is always imperative, never merely descriptive.

The Greek word θρησκεία, translated "religion" (1:27), describes religion in terms of observances and rites, both external. James contends that actual sanctity takes precedence over rites. To control the tongue and manifest sympathy with "orphans and widows" is to "keep oneself unstained from the world." Deeds that express love, not rites, constitute genuine purity.

Partiality (προσωποληψία), based on outer circumstances, betrays religion (2:1-7). Two excuses for so perverting Christianity are refuted in 2:8-12, 14-26. In 2:1-7, James contends that faith alone makes men Christian. Religion is debased when churchmen classify men by worldly norms. Non-Christian outsiders have, presumably, visited church services. Fawning before them is an effort to win them to membership. Granting success, such members would be Christian in appearance only. James insists that rich visitors be so treated as to show them that true wealth belongs to the realm of faith. The criteria of the kingdom, not the world, control God's judgment and should dictate the attitudes of churchmen.

The "royal law" (2:8) is clearly the Christian law of love. Partiality has been excused as an observance of this law. Deference to rich visitors has masqueraded as redemptive love. James brands such pretense as a caricature of evangelism (2:8-13). Evangelism is futile, he contends, if it leaves men ignorant of moral values implicit in the gospel. They will be unmercifully judged who cater to the rich, because they are unfair in leaving the rich uninstructed regarding true wealth.

Faith has also been caricatured as a substitute for living by Christian standards (2:14-26). This is a second instance of sham. Christians are πιστοί, but faith as commitment is energetic, not apathetic (cf. Gal. 5:6, 13-26; 6:2-4; I Thess. 1:3). Demons, Abraham, Rahab, are three analogies for the energetic quality of saving faith. James's contrast is between two grades of faith, or between nominal and actual Christians. Faith and the behavior it implies are halves of an indivisible whole. Instead of discussing faith and works on a Pauline precedent, James deals with faith conceived to be either living or dead. The one effectively saves; the other is useless—i.e., dead (νεκρός)—in that it accomplishes nothing.

b. Credentials of leaders. In 3:1-12, the church leader is called teacher, and in 3:13-18, wise man. The discussion throughout reflects the atmosphere of the second century and tends to locate James in the context of the Didache and the Pastoral letters. James makes it clear that personal qualities, not status, are important. In view of temptations teachers face, James urges that few nominate themselves for the role. Being a teacher, he knows the severity with which God will judge teachers (ἐιδοτες ὅτι μείζον κρίμα λημψόμεθα; 3:1).

Wisdom implies a reasoned view of life. Whether earthly or heavenly, it proposes conduct designed to win success. Criteria belong to the realm in which success is sought. In 5:19-20, James describes as truth the body of revelation that guides men in godliness. The wise man is expected to exemplify and urge this truth as the basis for success—i.e., salvation. Irresponsibility in speech has been reprimanded already (cf. 1:19, 26; 2:12). Such irresponsibility in a teacher implicates the church. It is singled out, now, as the most prevalent of the "many mistakes" Christians make. Control of the tongue thus typifies the thoroughly disciplined life. It is the mark of maturity (τέλειος ἀνήρ). Because few Christians are so disciplined, the number of aspirants for teaching should be kept to the minimum (3:1-12).

A too passionate zeal for one's own views is apt to be the undoing of the wise man (3:13-18). Controversialism is, therefore, a less desirable evidence of wisdom than meekness, purity, peaceableness, gentleness, reasonableness, mercy—the elements that compose the wisdom that "comes from above." By contrast, earthly wisdom involves "jealousy and selfish ambition . . . , disorder and every vile practice," precisely because it is "unspiritual" and "devilish." Heavenly wisdom is the leader's best credential, and with it he must be endowed "from above."

c. Christian godliness. Worldiness and godliness, briefly contrasted in 3:13-18, are now elaborately analyzed. In 4:1–5:6 worldliness is portrayed and censured, and in 5:7-20 the Christian virtues are urged on the basis of the nearness of the "coming of the Lord" and the inspiring examples of Job and Elijah as representative prophets. Worldliness is examined under three manifestations: double-mindedness, or "friendship with the world" (4:1-12); presumptuousness, illustrated by traders who plan with no thought of God (4:13-17); and devotion to pleasure (5:1-6).

Worldly wisdom has been described as "earthly, unspiritual, devilish," and as finding fruition in "jealousy and selfish ambition . . . , disorder and every vile practice" (3:14-16). Prevalence of this wisdom constitutes "friendship with the world" (4:1-12). It explains the generally lost condition of the world. The church has not remedied this state of affairs because, instead of employing the wisdom that "comes down from above," it has accepted the worldliness which breeds "wars" and "fightings."

This "friendship with the world" makes desire (ἐπιθυμία) the norm of behavior (4:2). It may take many forms: pleasure-madness, acquisitiveness, double-mindedness, pride (cf. Luke 12:16-21). Inner tensions and social confusion are its results. The mark of godliness, by contrast, is humility; and to the humble, God "gives more grace" (4:7). Spiritual values alone satisfy man's spirit, because God himself bestows that spirit.

Desire to possess correlates the thought of 4:1-12 with that of 4:13-17. The traders whose one thought is to "get gain" are, presumably, nominal Christians. They know "what is right" but fail to do it (4:17). Their self-confidence causes them to omit God from their plans. They never say, "If the Lord wills" (4:13-16).

That there were rich Christians is implied in 1:9-10. Wealth, like desire, is now condemned as a false and frustrating goal (5:1-6). The rich, whether Christians or not, exhibit the folly of making wealth life's goal. James pleads that Christians make the Lord their "portion." As with the rich man in Luke 16:19-31, the prospect for the rich is the judgment of the Lord of hosts. When the "miseries" of that judgment befall them, they will "weep and howl." The inhumanities of their money-madness make them objects of God's wrath. The transitoriness of riches (5:1-3), inhumanities involved in acquiring them (5:4, 6), the sensuality they engender (5:5), combine to require God's condemnation.

In 5:7-20, James turns to the positive commendation of qualities that mark men as friends of God. These qualities are patience (μακροθυμία; 5:7-10), steadfastness (ὑπομονή; 5:11), truthfulness (ἤτω δὲ ὑμῶν τὸ ναὶ ναί καὶ τὸ οὒ οὔ; 5:12), confident prayerfulness (5:13-18), readiness to confess one's sins (5:15-16), and active concern for the salvation of sinners (5:19-20).

Instead of bitter retaliation against those who by "fraud" have kept back the wages of the laborers, and who have "lived on the earth in luxury," and who have "killed the righteous man," Christians are urged to be patient (μακροθυμήσατε). This patience is closely related to expectancy ("The Judge is standing at the doors," as in II Thess. 2:5). It is in view of the "coming of the Lord" that patience is obligatory. The farmer and the prophets illustrate this expectant calmness (5:7-10).

Steadfastness (ὑπομονή) is akin to patience, but specifically describes the man whom no suffering can frighten (5:11). It is patience manifested in unwavering constancy (cf. 1:2-4). Job is the great exemplar of this virtue, and its justification is found in the compassion of the Lord. The injunction against swearing (5:12) is conceivably a condemnation of malediction in contrast with patience. More probably, it has the meaning of Matt. 5:34-37, where the oath guarantees truth. James, like Jesus, pleads for a rigorous integrity that obviates the need for swearing. The "fraud" used in holding back the "wages of the laborers" typifies the evil system that necessitates oaths.

Prayer taps divine sources of strength (5:13-18). Whatever the problem (suffering, sickness, sin, frustration), the "prayer of faith" (cf. 1:6) puts the Christian in touch with ultimate sources of help. It is the Christian's principal reliance in life's vicissitudes. Confession of sins (5:15-16; cf. Rom. 14:11) is primarily Godward and is thus an aspect of prayer. It is manward also, and so looks toward prayer for "one another" by Christians.

Finally, Christians who bring a wandering brother back to the truth will save the sinner's soul "from death and will cover a multitude of sins" (5:19-20). "The truth" is the body of revealed norms, religious and moral, recognized by the church for guidance in godliness. They who "wander from the truth" have in some way violated this revelation. Such "wandering" is serious and conceivably threatens death. It is not, however, irremediable (cf. Heb. 6:4-8; Herm. Vis. II.2.4-8). Not only so, but he who "brings back a sinner" will "cover" his own sins, even though they be "a multitude" (cf. Prov. 10:12; I Pet. 4:8; I Clem. 49:5).

3. Text. The history of James in the third and fourth centuries does not coincide with that of the other CATHOLIC LETTERS. The study of its text is for this reason unencumbered by problems that attend the remainder of the group. The first version of James does not antedate the fourth century. Materials of primary importance for the study of the text are the Greek uncial and minuscule MSS and the various versions of the Greek text. References to James in the writings of early church fathers are extremely limited in number.

Codex Vaticanus of the early uncials best preserves the text. There the text of James is comparatively free of emendations. Vaticanus is probably the oldest extant Greek MS of the letter.

The correction of texts was widespread at a very early date, and most of the significant variants in the text of James were extant by the fourth century. A comparison of the collations of uncial MSS shows few instances of significant variants in which Vaticanus stands alone. Its readings show less evidence of emendation than the solitary witness of uncials ℵ, A, and C. In combination with Sinaiticus or Alexandrinus, there is no instance of emendation, whereas uncial combinations excluding Vaticanus are relatively numerous. The preference in Vaticanus for shorter readings distinguishes it from Sinaiticus. The readings of Codex Ephraem do not differ appreciably from Alexandrinus.

The text of James in Codex Alexandrinus is more closely related to the cursive Codex 33 than to any of the uncials. In fifteen readings, A and 33 stand together without corroboration of other uncials. Most of these, however, represent deliberate correction. Deviations from the witness of earlier uncials in such ninth-century uncials as K, L, and P yield few readings free from suspicion. Emendation in the interest of improvement of style and the explanation of the text characterizes these ninth-century uncials. They represent the Antiochian text and are of first importance as the textual basis of later MSS that underlie the texts of Erasmus and the Complutensian Polyglot.

Until the middle of the third century, Greek was the official language of the church in the West. Under Pope Callistus, Latin supplanted Greek, and a translation of the Greek text became necessary. The Old Latin version was the result. Individual MSS of this version show pronounced textual variation. The exact origin of this version is not known, but it enjoyed wide circulation in North Africa. The best extant witnesses to the Old Latin for James are the ninth-century Codex Corbeiensis and Speculum Pseudo-Augustini. They both testify to a common Greek text of which, apparently, a single translation was made. Of older Greek uncials, their closest affinities are with Vaticanus, which means that they represent a Neutral type of text. Both, however, have undergone a greater degree of emendation than Vaticanus. In the Armenian Version, the text of the Catholic epistles corresponds most closely to the text of Vaticanus. See TEXT, NT.

Bibliography. J. B. Mayor, The Epistle of James (1892); J. H. Ropes, The Epistle of James, ICC (1916); R. J. Knowling, The Epistle of James, Westminster Series (1922); F. Hauck, "Der Brief des Jakobus," Kommentar zum NT (1926); J. Moffatt, The General Epistles, Moffatt NT Commentary (1928); A. Meyer, Das Raetsel des Jakobusbriefes (1930); H. Windisch, "Die katholischen Briefe," 3rd ed., reworked by H. Preisker, in Handbuch zum NT (1951); F. Hauck, Die Kirchenbriefe (7th ed., 1954); M. Dibelius, Der Brief des Jakobus (8th ed., prepared by H. Greeven; Meyer Series; 1956); B. S. Easton, Introduction and Exegesis of James, IB, XII (1957), 3-74.

A. E. BARNETT

JAMES, PROTEVANGELIUM OF prō'tĭ văn jĕl'ĭ əm. The earliest of the infancy gospels, recounting the birth, childhood, adolescence, token marriage, supernatural pregnancy, and delivery of Mary. Together with the Gospel of Thomas (see THOMAS, GOSPEL OF), it was the chief source of several other infancy gospels. Its original title appears to have been History of James Concerning the Birth of Mary; Origen refers to it as the Book of James. The title Gospel of James the Less, under which it was condemned in the Gelasian Decree, is not earlier than the fourth century. It was first styled Protevangelium (i.e., Protogospel) of James by its sixteenth-century discoverer, Guillaume Postel.

The earliest certain reference to this writing is by Origen, who cites it as the source of the tradition that Jesus' brothers were "sons of Joseph by a former wife whom he had married before Mary." His added comment: "Now these who say so wish to preserve the honor of Mary in virginity to the end" (On Matthew 10.17), accurately describes the apparent purpose of the author, who claimed in the concluding section to be James, head of the Jerusalem church: "Now I, James, who wrote this history in Jerusalem, when there arose a tumult when Herod died, withdrew myself into the wilderness until the tumult ceased in Jerusalem. Glorifying the Lord God who gave me the gift and wisdom to write this history."

The writing tells the story of the birth and early years of Mary. Like Samuel—the story clearly reflects the OT narrative—she is born to Anna and Joachim in answer to the bitter prayers of the long-barren woman and her husband, after an angelic visitation to each separately (cf. the same note in the story of the birth of Samson). At the age of three, in accord with the earlier vow of the mother, Mary is brought to the temple and seated by the priest upon the third step of the altar. She is brought up in the temple as a sort of Jewish vestal virgin, "as a dove that is nurtured" and fed solicitously by angels, until, reaching the age of twelve, she becomes a problem.

In answer to the advice of his fellow priests the high priest Zacharias enters the holy of holies, prays, and receives divine direction for her betrothal to that one of the widowers of the people who shall be designated by a divine portent. Her betrothal to Joseph follows, for from his rod a dove flies out and lights upon his head. Joseph's unwillingness to be made a "laughingstock to the children of Israel" is silenced by a warning reference to the fates of Dathan, Abiram, and Korah, and he takes her to his house, while he himself goes "to build his buildings."

Then follows, as a sort of interlude, the story of her selection by the priests, as one of the pure virgins of the tribe of David, to weave the "true purple and scarlet" portion of the veil of the temple. "At that season Zacharias became dumb and Samuel was in his stead until the time when Zacharias again spake." Mary, while filling her pitcher with water, hears the word: "Hail, thou art highly favored—blessed art thou among women." As she is spinning the thread for the temple veil, an angel appears and announces the birth of a son, whom she shall name Jesus. When the spinning is completed, Mary visits Elizabeth. "Now she was sixteen years old when these mysteries came to pass."

Joseph, now returning from his building and finding her six-months pregnant, reproaches her, but is admonished in a dream. Later he is accused by Annas the scribe; but when he and Mary drink the waters of conviction with no ill effect, the high priest is convinced of their innocence.

Then follows the decree of Augustus, the trip to Bethlehem (apparently from Jerusalem), where Mary is left in a cave while Joseph seeks a midwife. At this point the narrative changes without warning to the first person, with Joseph the speaker, describing first the sudden and complete cessation of all action in nature and mankind, and then his conversation with a midwife.

The narrative changes back to the third person, with the birth of the baby in the cave, the testimony of the midwife and Salome that even after the birth Mary is a virgin, and the restoration, by contact with the infant Jesus, of Salome's hand, which has "fallen away from her in fire" because of her unbelief in Mary's virginity.

Then follows the story of the Wise Men and the star (which stands over the head of the cave). In fear of Herod's decree, Mary wraps the young child and hides him in an ox manger.

Then follows the story of the miraculous escape of John the Baptist, for whom, his mother hears, Herod is searching. She flees to the hill country, and finding no place of escape, groans aloud: "O mountain of God, receive thou a mother with her child. And immediately the mountain clave asunder and took her in."

Then follows the death of Zacharias, who is arrested and slain by the officers of the enraged Herod. The priests enter the temple, find blood congealed by the altar, and are informed by an angelic voice of the murder of Zacharias. Symeon is elected by lot to take his place and is promised that he shall not see death until he shall see the Christ in the flesh. With the claim to authority (quoted above) and a brief benediction the document ends.

This résumé of contents reveals that the birth stories in Matthew and Luke are the principal sources. In a manner similar to that in which the other type of infancy gospels—namely, the Gospel of Thomas and its imitators—sought to fill in the "hidden years" of Jesus' boyhood, this nameless author has "filled in" for Mary. Considerable ingenuity is displayed in braiding into the purely imaginative story many biblical touches, with a total disregard of their original setting. There seems no slightest trace of what might be properly styled independent tradition, while attempts to see this account as the earlier source of the stories in Matthew and Luke are manifestly absurd.

That the story as we now have it is all the product of one author is most unlikely. The sudden introduction of Joseph as the narrator of one section; the story of the choice of Mary to be one of the makers of the veil of the temple; the unexplained lapse of four years, during which Joseph is seemingly absent from home "building his buildings"—Mary was twelve at the time of her marriage, sixteen when found to be pregnant; the long section at the end having to do with Zacharias and his death, have suggested to several investigators that at least two narratives have been woven together, and hypotheses of an Apocryphon of Joseph and also one of Zacharias have been offered.

Touches from folklore are clearly to be seen, as in the reference to the cave as the site of the divine birth—a common motif far earlier than the Christian legend—and the supernatural and portentous hush that held all nature speechless. These suggest a familiarity on the part of the teller or tellers of this tale with popular legend and tradition, but to what extent they and the other variations evidence the formal use of other written sources is at best uncertain. That the author knew stories of Isis and of the vestal virgins is entirely likely; his reference to the years Mary spent in the temple is nevertheless adequately explained on the basis of the story of the boy Samuel, while the statement that the aged prophetess Anna—no less a female—"did not depart from the temple" (Luke 2:37) is not to be overlooked.

That the story was composed in Greek in the second century, very probably in Egypt, and had acquired its present form prior to Epiphanius, is widely recognized. Many MSS containing the text in whole or in part are extant. Most of them are not earlier than the tenth century, although one may be dated in the ninth, and occasional fragments still earlier. Versions from the Greek are extant in Syriac, Armenian, and Coptic. Whether a Latin version was ever made is uncertain. At any rate, none is known.

Although early pronounced heretical, the Protevangelium of James has had a very wide influence. The source, as already stated, for many other apocryphal writings, notably the Gospel of Pseudo-Matthew (see PSEUDO-MATTHEW, GOSPEL OF) and those dependent upon this, it is summarized in the Golden Legend, compiled by Jacobus de Voragine in the thirteenth century. It was the principal, if indirect, source of the cult of Saint Anne and the Feast of the Presentation of the Virgin in the Temple, and the inspiration of many of the masterpieces of such Italian painters as Giotto, Raphael, and Titian.

See also APROCRYPHA, NT.

Bibliography. An English translation is given by M. R. James, The Apocryphal NT (1924), pp. 38-49. Brief descriptions with convenient bibliographies of editions and studies are to be found in B. Altaner, Patrologie (2nd ed., 1950), pp. 50-51; J. Quasten, Patrology (1950), I, 118-22. M. S. ENSLIN

JAMES THE GREAT, ACTS OF. One of the many romances styled apocryphal Acts (see ACTS, APOCRYPHAL; APOCRYPHA, NT), purporting to set forth the adventures and martyrdom of James the son of Zebedee, in amplification of the bare notice in the canonical Acts. It is extant only in Latin, as bk. IV of the Apostolic History of Abdias (see ABDIAS, APOSTOLIC HISTORY OF), although it is possible that there was an earlier Greek original, of which no trace has come down save an apparent quotation by Clement of Alexandria in his lost Hypotyposes, in which James forgives his accuser while en route to martyrdom (Euseb. Hist. II.9.1-3).

James is represented as being in constant conflict with the magician Hermogenes and his disciple Philetus (cf. II Tim. 1:15; 2:17), the latter of whom he finally converts and empowers to perform miracles. The bare mention in the canonical Acts of James's martyrdom is, of course, amplified. After a dispute with the Jews, in which James quotes many pat prophetic passages from the OT, he is beheaded, together with a scribe named Josias, whom James converts and pardons.

The book is a commonplace tale of magical wonders, influenced by the earlier legend of Peter in constant conflict with his archopponent, Simon Magus.

Bibliography. A brief résumé of the contents of the book is found in M. R. James, The Apocryphal NT (1924), pp. 463-64. M. S. ENSLIN

JAMIN jā'mĭn [ימין, good fortune; Apoc. Ἰάδινος]; JAMINITES —mī nīts; KJV Apoc. ADINUS ə dī'nəs. 1. An eponym; son of Simeon (Gen. 46:10 [cf. Jub. 44:13]; Exod. 6:15; Num. 26:12; I Chr. 4:24).

2. A Jerahmeelite (I Chr. 2:27).

3. One of the Levites who helped interpret the law to the people at the public reading by Ezra (Neh. 8:7; I Esd. 9:48). B. T. DAHLBERG

JAMLECH jăm'lĕk [ימלך, may (the deity) give dominion] (I Chr. 4:34; cf. vs. 38). A Simeonite and family prince.

JAMNIA. See JABNEEL.

JANAI jā'nī [יעני, may (the deity) answer] (I Chr. 5:12); KJV JAANAI jā'ə nī. A Gadite.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 27-28, 198.

JANIM jăn'ĭm [ינים] (Josh. 15:53); KJV JANUM jā'nəm [Qere וינחם]. A village of Judah in the hill-country district of Hebron; possibly to be identified with Beni Na'im, E of Hebron.

JANNAI jăn'ī [Ἰανναί] (Luke 3:24); KJV JANNA jăn'ə. An ancestor of Jesus.

JANNES AND JAMBRES jăn'ĭz, jăm'brĭz [Ἰαννῆς καὶ Ἰαμβρῆς (Μαμβρῆς)=יוחני וממרא; Aram. (Targ.) ינים וימבריים (cf. Gr.)]. The legendary Egyptian magicians who opposed Moses and Aaron and duplicated their miracles to discredit them (Exod. 7:11-12, 22), and who came to typify heretical opponents to truth in Jewish and Christian circles (cf. II Tim. 3:8). In Exodus they are anonymous, and the names do not occur in the OT, Philo, or Josephus. But they are common in late Jewish and in Christian sources, and are partly attested in pagan writers. The names may be Grecized Aramaic, and may all derive from forms of "John." Certain references in Origen and the Decree of Gelasius (see below) attest the existence of an apocryphon, perhaps in the first century A.D., describing and condemning their activities.

The non-Jewish sources are brief, simply identifying them as outstanding magicians living after Zoroaster, one (Numenius) associating them with the Exodus episode. Two of the three pagan references name only Jannes (Pliny Nat. Hist. XXX.2.11; Lucius Apuleius Apology II.90). These are from the first and second centuries respectively. The Neoplatonic Numenius (second century), as cited by Origen (Against Celsus IV.51) and Eusebius (Preparation for the Gospel IX.8), mention both. The two are also named in various Christian sources, the earliest, besides II Timothy, being Origen (On Matt. 23:37; 27:9), Cyprian (On the Unity of the Church 16), Acts of Pilate 5; Apostolic Constitutions VIII.1, and the so-called Decree of Gelasius (sixth century).

In the late Jewish and Samaritan sources an extensive legendary tradition developed about them in connection with the Exodus account, and they were also associated with the eschatological conflict between good and evil as false prophets and antagonists of God and Israel. They were connected with the figure of Bileam (Balaam) and with Beliar (Belial). The earliest written tradition which mentions them (Damascus Document 7.18-19; ca. 100 B.C.) speaks of Belial as "setting up" or "rearing up" Jannes and his brother in opposition to Moses and Aaron, and the Jerusalem Targ. to Exodus (22:22) makes them the wizard sons of Balaam, as do various rabbinic sources (see bibliography). In this tradition they escape with Balaam to Ethiopia and usurp the throne of the king, Kikanos. But they are routed through the intervention of Moses and flee to Egypt, where they become Pharaoh's head magicians. According to another legend, they become proselytes to Judaism and join in the Exodus. Cf. the title of the book referred to in the Decree of Gelasius: Poenitentia Jannis et Mamre. The names BALAAM (Bileam) and BELIAL apparently were confused in the various legends.

Bibliography. E. Schürer, Geschichte des jüdischen Volkes (3rd ed., 1909), III, 402-5, gives the text of the pagan and Christian sources and references to the Jewish accounts; H. L. Strack and P. Billerbeck, Kommentar zum NT aus Talmud und Midrasch, III (1926), 661 ff; M. Gaster, The Asatir (1927), pp. 80-99, etc. (on the Samaritan documents and beliefs); J. Bidez and F. Cumont, Les Mages hellénisés (1938), pp. 11-14 (for the pagan references); H. Odeberg and A. Oepke in R. Kittel, TWNT, III (1938), 192-93, 990-91, give data on the origin, spelling, etc., of the names; L. Ginzberg, The Legends of the Jews (7 vols.; 1910-39), contains the legendary materials and references to the rabbinic sources; M. Dibelius, Die Pastoralbriefe (1955), pp. 87-88. A. WIKGREN

JANNEUS jă nē′əs [ינאי, from יונתן, Jonathan; Ἰαννοῦς]. King of Judea ca. 103-76 B.C.; also called Alexander (Ἀλεξανδρος); son of John Hyrcanus. His half brother Aristobulus I, on becoming king, imprisoned Alexander. But when Aristobulus died, after a year's reign, Alexander succeeded him and also married the childless widow. He then became high priest and thus did not violate the law of levirate marriage, which prevents a high priest from marrying a widow. Perhaps the notion that a high priest is not permitted to marry in a levirate manner was a later measure.

Alexander Janneus was concerned with imperialism. He besieged Ptolemaïs (Acre) but was repulsed by Ptolemy Lathyrus and suffered great losses. He was saved only when Cleopatra sent two Jewish generals to help Alexander against her banished son,

Courtesy of the Trustees of the British Museum

8. Coin of Alexander Janneus

Ptolemy Lathyrus. She was dissuaded from annexing Judea only by these generals. In new campaigns Alexander Janneus suffered losses also in NE Palestine. He was most successful in his expedition against Philistia and Gaza. The rift between the Pharisees and the Sadducees is set by the Talmud as occurring in his day (Ḳid. 66*b*).

Friction developed between Janneus and the Pharisees, who disliked his warlike tactics but sought only religious observances. They also resented his assumption of the title "king." Alexander sided with the Sadducees, and in a ceremony on the Feast of Booths the people pelted him with their citrons. He allowed the mercenaries free run, and they killed six thousand Pharisees.

Janneus was unsuccessful against the Arabs and returned to find the Pharisees opposed to him, seeking his death as a condition for lasting peace. They negotiated with Demetrius III to fight against their own king. However, in time they repented of their act and left the Syrians, to turn toward Alexander. Alexander treated them cruelly, executing eight hundred Pharisees before the eyes of their wives and children, while he feasted with his courtesans. Many Pharisees then emigrated to Syria or Egypt.

Alexander continued his warlike campaigns, battling against the Arab king Aretas, but was shamefully defeated by him. Even though he was afflicted with disease, he continued his warlike activities, suffering much the last three years of his life. His wife, Salome, was entrusted with the civil government. On his deathbed, he counseled her to be friendly with the Pharisees but only to fear the hypocrites therein (Soṭ. 22*b*). Despite his cruelty the Pharisees gave him last honors.

Alexander's main purpose was to increase the boundaries of Judea. Hence he came into conflict with the Pharisees on political matters. All his gains were temporary, for his reign brought about excessive hardships later to his people.

The Talmud narrates many incidents of his association with his brother-in-law Simon ben Shetah, one of the leaders of the Great Sanhedrin. Alexander's wife, Salome Alexandra, succeeded him as ruler, introducing a favorable Pharisaic rule.

Fig. JAN 8.

Bibliography. For the original narrative in Josephus, see Antiq. XIII.xiii; War I.iv. See also: J. Derenbourg, Essai sur l'histoire de la Palestine (1867), pp. 86, 99 ff; E. Schürer, The History of the Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ (1891), div. 1, vol. I, pp. 295 ff; L. Ginzberg, "Alexander Jannaeus," Jewish Encyclopedia, I (1902), 353; R. H. Pfeiffer, History of NT Times (1949), pp. 21 ff, 190. S. B. HOENIG

JANOAH jə nō′ə [ינוח]; KJV JANOHAH —hə in Josh. 16:6-7. 1. A border town in Ephraim (Josh. 16:6-7). It is identified with Khirbet Yanun, ca. seven miles SE of Shechem.

2. A town in N Galilee, captured by Tiglath-pileser III of Assyria (II Kings 15:29). The site is uncertain, but it must have been located between Abel-beth-maacah and Kedesh (cf. Josh. 19:37), according to the context. G. W. VAN BEEK

JANUM. KJV form of JANIM.

JAPHETH jā'fĭth [יפת, see § 1 below; Ιαφεθ]. The second son of Noah.

1. Etymology. OT tradition connects yāpheth (pausal form of yépheth) with the Hebrew verb פתה: "God enlarge [יפת] Japheth" (so RSV), or "May God make Japheth spacious" (Gen. 9:27 [J]). This folk etymology may have carried theological as well as geographical connotations.

No positive connection has been established with Kafti, the Egyptian designation of the (Eteo-)Creteans, or with the Greek Titan Japetos (Ιαπετος), the father of Atlas and Prometheus.

2. The blessing of Japheth. When Noah became drunk from the wine of his vineyard and lay uncovered in his tent, "his youngest son" breeched the laws of Hebrew modesty—though apparently without premeditation—by seeing the nakedness of his father. The two older brothers, walking backward, covered Noah (Gen. 9:20-23). Upon awaking, Noah cursed Canaan, making him the lowest of slaves to his brothers (see CANAANITES § 1). Then, after blessing SHEM (§ 2), he said:

> God [אלהים] enlarge Japheth, > and let him dwell in the tents of Shem;
> and let Canaan be his slave (vs. 27).

This story presents such a different view of Noah's life and family from that given in the flood account that they are best considered separate traditions. There are strong indications that this J tradition of Noah the vinegrower knew that patriarch's three sons as Shem, Japheth, and Canaan. To harmonize this version with the Priestly list, an editor would then have added Ham as Canaan's father in vss. 18, 22.

The people who are to dwell with the Hebrews in Canaan are, most probably, the PHILISTINES. Although the Hittites have also been proposed, 10:18 links them with the descendants of Ham.

Accordingly, Von Rad postulates, the Yahwist picked up this ancient piece and placed it here to show why the Israelites (Shem) do not have sole possession of the land promised to their fathers. It had been God's will from the beginning, as Noah himself prophesied, that the Philistines (Japheth) would also have a share in Canaan.

3. The table of nations. In the Priestly genealogy Japheth is the youngest of Noah's three sons and the father of Gomer, Magog, Madai, Javan, Tubal, Meshech, and Tiras (Gen. 10:1-2; cf. I Chr. 1:4-5). Since this table is really a "map in literary form," it presents Japheth as the ancestor of those ancient peoples who lived to the W and the N of the Hebrews—principally those dwelling in the regions adjacent to the Aegean, Black, and Caspian seas (see MAN, ETHNIC DIVISIONS OF). These are mainly the components of the Indo-European family of nations whose area stretched from the S coasts of Europe to Persia.

Bibliography. F. M. T. Böhl, Kanaanäer und Hebräer (1911), pp. 19, 68-69; G. von Rad, Das erste Buch Mose, ATD, 2 (1949), pp. 111-22; W. Brandenstein, "Bemerkungen zur Völkertafel in der Genesis," Festschrift Albert Debrunner (1954), pp. 63-83. L. HICKS

JAPHIA jə fī'ə [יפיע, may (the deity) shine(?)]. 1. King of Lachish, SW of Jerusalem (Josh. 10:3). He was one of five confederate kings in the Amorite coalition that attempted to halt Joshua's invasion.

2. A son of David, born after David had become king in Jerusalem (II Sam. 5:15; I Chr. 3:7; 14:6).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 204-5. R. F. JOHNSON

3. A border town in Zebulun (Josh. 19:13). It is identified with Yafa, a site less than two miles SW of Nazareth. The remains of an early synagogue have been found there.

JAPHLET jăf'lĭt [יפלט, may (the deity) deliver] (I Chr. 7:32-33). An Asherite, son of Heber.

JAPHLETITES jăf'lə tīts [יפלטי] (Josh. 16:3); KJV JAPHLETI —tī. A clan whose location helps to mark the S boundary of Ephraim in an area E of Gezer.

JAPHO. KJV form of JOPPA in Josh. 19:46.

JAR. See POTTERY; VESSELS.

JARAH jâr'ə [יערה, honeycomb, but perhaps read יעדה (B, A, Ιαδά)] (I Chr. 9:42). A descendant of King Saul. Instead of this name I Chr. 8:36 has Jehoaddah (יהועדה).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 246; cf. p. 245. B. T. DAHLBERG

JAREB jâr'ĭb. KJV translation of ירב, as the name of a king, in Hos. 5:13; 10:6. More likely מלכי רב, "great king" (so RSV), should be read, as apposition or title of the Assyrian king mentioned there.

JARED jâr'ĭd [ירד; 'Ιάρεδ]. An antediluvian patriarch of the line of Seth; father of Enoch (Gen. 5:15-20; I Chr. 1:2; Luke 3:37). See also JERED; IRAD.

JARESIAH. KJV form of JAARESHIAH.

JARHA jär'hə [יורחע] (I Chr. 2:34-35). Egyptian servant of Sheshan, a Jerahmeelite, who gave his daughter as wife to the former.

JARIB jâr'ĭb [יריב, a shortened form of יויריב (Joiarib), may Yahu contend]; KJV Apoc. JORIBAS jôr'ə bəs (I Esd. 8:44); JORIBUS (I Esd. 9:19). 1. A son of Simeon, according to I Chr. 4:24, but not mentioned in Gen. 46:10; Exod. 6:15; Num. 26:12.

2. One of the leading men who assisted Ezra in securing temple servants before the return to Palestine (Ezra 8:16; I Esd. 8:44).

3. One of the priests compelled by Ezra to give up their foreign wives (Ezra 10:18; I Esd. 9:19).

M. NEWMAN

JARIMOTH. KJV Apoc. alternate form of JEREMOTH.

JARMUTH jär'mŭth [ירמות, a height]. 1. A city of Judah situated on an easily defended hill, Khirbet Yarmuk, eight miles N-NE of Eleutheropolis (Beit Jibrin).

It was one of five Canaanite royal cities which attempted to halt Joshua's invasion, but the coalition was defeated and the kings executed at Makkedah (Josh. 10:3, 5, 22 ff; 12:11). It became a part of the Shephelah province of Zorah-Azekah (15:35), and after the Exile it was reoccupied by Jewish returnees (Neh. 11:29).

In a cuneiform letter from ca. 1365, found at Tell el-Hesi (Eglon), Yaramu (Jarmuth) is a town ruled by a robber chief who is answerable only to the Egyptian officials.

2. A Levitical town in Issachar (Josh. 21:29). This should perhaps be read Remath (with LXX B), the initial yodh being a scribal reminiscence of the famous town in Judah. It would then be the RAMOTH of I Chr. 6:73—H 6:58 and Remeth of Josh. 19:21.

Bibliography. W. F. Albright, "A Case of Lese-Majeste in Pre-Israelite Lachish," BASOR, no. 87 (1942), p. 36, note 30; Albright, "The List of Levitic Cities," Louis Ginzberg Jubilee Volume (English section; 1945). V. R. GOLD

JAROAH jə rō'ə [ירוח, soft, delicate; cf. Arab. wariḥa] (I Chr. 5:14). A Gadite.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 226.

JASAEL. KJV Apoc. form of SHEAL.

JASHAR, BOOK OF jā'shər [ספר הישר, book of the upright one(?), see below]; KJV JASHER. A written document mentioned as though well known and containing Joshua's poetic address to the sun and the moon (Josh. 10:12-13), David's lament over Saul and Jonathan (II Sam. 1:17-27), and probably (see below) Solomon's original words of dedication of the temple (I Kings 8:12-13).

Reference is made to the above-mentioned poetic quotations of Joshua and David as having been "written in the Book of Jashar" (Josh. 10:13; II Sam. 1:18). Using exactly the language of Josh. 10:13, the writer in the LXX rhetorically asks whether Solomon's quotation was not written in the Book of "Song." On the assumption that this statement accidentally dropped out of the MT (the entire quotation appears in the LXX after Solomon's long prayer of I Kings 8:14-53) and that by accidental transposition of two Hebrew letters the LXX read "Song" (שיר) instead of "Jashar" (ישר), most scholars consider I Kings 8:12-13 to be a third quotation from the lost Book of Jashar.

The term "Jashar" is a fairly common Hebrew word meaning "one who [or that which] is straight, honest, just, righteous, upright." Therefore it is assumed that the title "Book of the Upright [One]" refers either to the historical heroic individuals who are the subjects of its contents or to all Israel as the upright people. If the latter, the title may be related to JESHURUN.

The three quotations from the Book of Jashar are all poetry. Because of this fact, and because the term "Jashar" in the title has never been satisfactorily explained and yet has obvious similarity to various verb forms of the root שיר, "to sing," a few scholars hold that the LXX rendering "Book of Song," rather than "Book of the Upright [One]," is the correct original title.

The nature of this book must be inferred from its three quotations, for there is no other evidence. It seems to have been an ancient national song book, the antiquity of which is suggested in part by the relatively poor state of preservation of the Hebrew text of each poem.

The book must have contained a variety of songs, for each of the extant ones is very different from the others. The first is apparently a very old incantation to Yahweh's heavenly bodies to prolong daylight—or perhaps to lengthen predawn darkness—until Israel has time enough to complete victory over its Amorite enemies. The second, an authentic literary monument to David's poetic skill, is a remarkable appreciation of both the national significance and the personal friendship of the tragic heroes involved. The third, reminiscent of Ugaritic parallels but probably an authentic utterance of Solomon on the occasion, is an ancient song establishing God's supremacy over nature and ritual.

The origin of the Book of Jashar is uncertain. Some think it was a written collection begun in premonarchic Israel and expanded from time to time. Others regard it as the compilation of oral tradition not earlier than the days of Solomon and perhaps much later. Probably it was the beginning of sacred literary archives established at the height of the monarchy in order to preserve some of the most notable traditions of Israel. Its nearest parallel was apparently the Book of the Wars of the Lord (Num. 21:14). In fact, some scholars would identify these two books as one (see further WARS OF THE LORD, BOOK OF). There has been speculation as to whether the Song of Deborah (Judg. 5), the Song of Miriam (Exod. 15:21), and the like may not have been included in these extraordinarily important ancient anthologies of Israel's heroic past. But there is no record of such.

The intriguing and mysterious nature of the Book of Jashar has given rise through the centuries to both false identifications and imitations of the book. Certain ancient Jewish commentators considered the title a reference to the Torah. A medieval Book of Jashar paralleled a portion of the pseudepigraphic Testament of Judah. Other medieval rabbinical works have received the same title. Worthless modern forgeries claiming to be discoveries of this long-lost book have occasionally appeared, the most recent of which was in a fifth edition in 1953.

Bibliography. H. St. J. Thackeray, "New Light on the Book of Jashar," JTS, XI (1909-10), 518-32; S. Mowinckel, "Hat es ein israelitisches Nationalepos gegeben?" ZAW, N.F. XII (1935), 130-52; J. A. Montgomery, Kings ICC (1951), pp. 189-92; E. Nielsen, Oral Tradition (1954), ch. 3.

C. F. KRAFT

JASHEN jā'shən [ישן] (II Sam. 23:32). A member of the Mighty Men of David known as the "Thirty." The MT of II Sam. 23:32 reads "the sons of Jashen," while the parallel passage in I Chr. 11:34 has "the sons of Hashem the Gizonite." It is manifest that in both instances the words "the sons of" (בני) are dittographic and repeat the ending of the name Shaalbonite (שעלבני). The gentilic name of Jashen has dropped out of the text of II Sam. 23:32 but is given as "the Gizonite" in I Chr. 11:34. The name of the hero in the original catalogue would then seem to have been "Jashen/Hashem the GIZONITE."

E. R. DALGLISH

JASHER. KJV form of JASHAR. See JASHAR, BOOK OF.

JASHOBEAM jə shō′bĭ əm [ישבעם]. 1. A Hachmonite who is described as the son of Zabdiel and a descendant of Perez; the chief of the "Three," the highest command among the Mighty Men of David. He was personally credited with 300 enemy casualties in one encounter (I Chr. 11:11). He was also in command of the 24,000 men of the Davidic militia that served for the first month of the year (I Chr. 27:2-3).

The text of II Sam. 23:8 differs considerably from that of I Chr. 11:11 and may be reconstructed in the following manner: The reading "Josheb-basshebeth," which the KJV renders "that sat in the seat," is probably a corruption of the name Ishbaal (LXX Ἰεβοσθε—i.e., אישׁ־בשת; Lucian Ἰεσβααλ—i.e., אישבעל; the original name אשבעל was apparently changed to אשבשת, then corrupted to ישב בשבת). The gentilic "Tachmonite" (KJV) or "Tahchemonite" (RSV) should no doubt be read "Hachmonite" in accordance with I Chr. 11:11. The reading of שלשה for שלשי (שלושים—I Chr. 11:11) and the RSV rendering of "Three" rather than the KJV "captains" appear justified in view of II Sam. 23:9, 13, 18-19, 22-23; I Chr. 11:12, 18, 21, 25; and are supported by the LXX of II Sam. 23:8 and the reading of Lucian there and in I Chr. 11:11. The words "Adino the Eznite" are a KJV transliteration of an unintelligible phrase which interprets the expression as a personal name of the "Tachmonite." However, it seems best to adopt the reading of I Chr. 11:11 and to translate "he wielded his spear" (RSV). The Chronicler's reading of "three hundred" seems preferable to the text of II Sam. 23:8, where "eight hundred" is found.

In summary, the reconstructed text of II Sam. 23:8 may be rendered: "Ishbaal, a Hachmonite; he was chief of the three; he wielded his spear against three hundred whom he slew at one time."

2. One of the disaffected Benjaminite warriors who joined the proscribed band of David at Ziklag (I Chr. 12:6). It seems best to interpret his description as a Korahite as having reference to the place of his origin.

E. R. DALGLISH

JASHUB jā′shəb [ישוב, may (the deity) return; Ἰάσουβος]; JASHUBITES —shə bīts; KJV Apoc. JASUBUS jə sōō′bəs. 1. An eponym; descendant of Asher (Num. 26:24; I Chr. 7:1). He is called Iob (KJV Job) in Gen. 46:13, but this is a copyist's error (cf. Jub. 44:17).

2. One of the men persuaded by Ezra to divorce their foreign wives (Ezra 10:29; I Esd. 9:30).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 28, 199.

B. T. DAHLBERG

JASHUBI-LEHEM jə shōō′bī lē′hĕm. KJV translation of וישבי לחם, as the name of a man of Judah, in I Chr. 4:22. The RSV reads: וישבו לחם, "They returned to Lehem"; the reading should probably be: וישבו לחם[ו], "but they returned." See LEHEM.

JASIEL. KJV form of JAASIEL 2.

JASON jā′sən [Ἰάσων, Greek substitute for Joshua]. 1. Jason I, high priest in 174-171 B.C.

He was the brother of Onias III, whom he supplanted as high priest. (Some scholars believe he was a son of Joseph ben Tobias and his brothers were Simon, Onias-Menelaus, Lysimachus, and Alcimus-Eliakim.) When Onias III fled to Egypt, Joshua-Jason maneuvered to obtain the priesthood. The office of high priest should have gone to Onias IV, son of Onias III, by inheritance, but Jason brought about a deviation which ultimately led to the decline of the priesthood, and it was dominated by the sons of Joseph. Jason promised to build gymnasiums in Jerusalem and to give a great sum of money to King Antiochus for confirmation of the office. He influenced changes for Hellenism and made Jerusalemites "citizens of Antioch" (II Macc. 4:8 ff). He also sent representatives to the Olympic games at Tyre, to give three thousand silver drachmas for sacrifice to Hercules. Even the escort thought this wrong, and through the intervention of these escorts the money intended for pagan sacrifice by Jason was converted into fitting out ships (vss. 18-20).

The sons of Joseph, however, found Jason to be too conservative in his notion of Hellenization, and he was deposed by his cousin Onias (called Menelaus), brother of Simon the Captain, of the family of Tobias, when the latter conveyed a sum of money to Antiochus. A false rumor had spread that Antiochus had died, and Jason then attacked Jerusalem, killing his own countrymen unmercifully. Jason fought against Onias-Menelaus, driving the latter out of Jerusalem; but Antiochus, who had to abandon his attack on Egypt because of Roman intervention, attacked Jerusalem and aided Onias-Menelaus. Jason was forced to flee to the Ammonites, to Transjordan, and remain there.

Accused before Aretas, ruler of the Arabs, he had to flee from city to city, despised as a tormentor of his fatherland. He could not find asylum in Egypt because Onias, his predecessor, was there and because it was known that Jason had been pro-Seleucid though he had fought Antiochus. He died as an exile among the Lacedaemonians and had no one to mourn him. He was accursed because he was not buried in the sepulchre of his fathers (II Macc. 5:10).

Bibliography. S. Tedesche and S. Zeitlin, The Second Book of the Maccabees (1954), pp. 7 (note 11), 13.

2. Jason II, son of ELEAZAR (10); one of the delegation sent to Rome by Judas Maccabeus to establish a treaty of friendship and alliance (I Macc. 8:17).

3. Jason of Cyrene. He was recognized as the author of II Maccabees, a history of Judas Maccabeus and his brothers, written in five books. The Epitomist, an Antiochean Jew, condensed it. Jason may have supplied the basic facts, but many chapters seem to be the adornment and rhetoric of Epitomist.

The abridgment shows remnants of beautiful style of Judeo-Hellenistic literature. Some scholars think that the Hebrew Jossipon may have traces of Jason's original work.

We do not know when he lived. Jason's work is the only authentic document of the civil war among Jews in the period before the Hasmoneans (II Macc. 2:23 ff).

Bibliography. C. C. Torrey, The Apocryphal Literature (1945), pp. 78 ff; R. H. Pfeiffer, History of NT Times (1949), pp. 506 ff, 514; S. Tedesche and S. Zeitlin, The Second Book of Maccabees (1954), pp. 20 ff; A. Tcherikover and A. Fuks, Corpus Papyrorum Judaicarum, I (1957), 47. S. B. HOENIG

4. Paul's host at Thessalonica (Acts 17:5-7, 9), who was haled before the politarchs when the mob could not find Paul. He was freed upon giving security to keep the peace. The Jason mentioned as sending a greeting in Rom. 16:21 was in Corinth when this letter was written, but it is possible that he was the same as the one in Acts; if so, he was a Jew ("kinsman" = "fellow countryman").

F. W. GINGRICH

JASPER. A green chalcedony. The word is used to translate:

a) יהלום, yahᵃlôm (KJV and elsewhere RSV "diamond"), a stone in the covering of the king of Tyre (Ezek. 28:13).

b) ישפה, yāšᵉphê (cf. Persian yashm; Arabic yashb or yaṣb; Akkadian ašpu; LXX ονύχιον; Vulg. beryllus), a stone in the breastpiece of judgment (Exod. 28:20; 39:13). In Ezek. 28:13 this word is translated "onyx" (cf. LXX), while יהלום, elsewhere "diamond," is "jasper."

c) Ἴασπις, used with carnelian in the description of the one on the throne (Rev. 4:3), the radiance of the glory of God (21:11), the walls of the city (21:18). It was the first jewel in the foundation of the wall of the New Jerusalem (21:19).

W. E. STAPLES

JASUBUS. KJV Apoc. form of JASHUB.

JATAL. KJV Apoc. alternate form of ATER.

JATHAN jā′thən [Ἰαθάν (BA), Ναθαν(א)] (Tob. 5:13); KJV JONATHAS jŏn′ə thəs. Son of Shemaiah, and brother of Ananias. They were kinsmen of Tobit, who fondly recalls his accompanying Ananias and Jathan to Jerusalem for worship. J. C. SWAIM

JATHNIEL jăth′nĭ əl [יתניאל] (I Chr. 26:2). A Korahite gatekeeper of the sanctuary.

Bibliography. On the etymological obscurity, see M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 248, no. 782.

JATTIR jăt′ər [יתיר, pre-eminence(?)]. A Levitical city of Judah in the hill-country district of Debir (Josh. 15:48; 21:14; I Chr. 6:57—H 6:42). Jattir shared in David's booty from the Amalekites (I Sam. 30:27). The site is modern Khirbet 'Attir, ca. thirteen miles S-SW of Hebron. V. R. GOLD JAVAN jā′vən [יון; Arab. Ỿûbān] (Gen. 10:2, 4; I Chr. 1:5, 7; see also Isa. 66:19; Ezek. 27:13; Dan. 8:21; 10:20; 11:2; Joel 3:6—H 4:6; Zech. 9:13, which are references to the descendants of Javan and their lands; also the somewhat obscure reference in the Hebrew text of Ezek. 27:19). The fourth son of JAPHETH son of Noah (Gen. 10:1-2); and the father of Elishah, Tarshish, Kittim, and Dodanim (or Rodanim; Gen. 10:4; cf. I Chr. 1:5, 7). The name is generally understood to refer to the descendants of Japheth through Javan, and to their W lands (Gen. 10:5)—Ionia (which corresponds etymologically with the name of Javan and which denotes GREECE, including Asia Minor and Macedonia); CYPRUS; RHODES; and at least a part of Syria.

Javan is mentioned in Isa. 66:19 as one of the distant nations which will witness the future manifestation of God's glory. The sons of the Javanites (the Greeks) are referred to in Joel 3:6—H 4:6 as slave traders who purchased Jewish captives from the Phoenicians and the Philistines. Javan is also mentioned in the oracle against Tyre in the book of Ezekiel (27:13), again with reference to their involvement in the slave traffic and other commercial activities. According to Zech. 9:13, Judah and Ephraim, the sons of Zion, will serve as God's warriors in wreaking vengeance upon the sons of Javan (Greece). The references in Daniel to the king (8:21), the prince (10:20), and the kingdom of Javan (11:2), allude to the Greco-Macedonian Empire, and reflect an extension of the original identification of Javan with the Ionian colonies in Asia Minor.

Javan is mentioned in the Hebrew text of Ezek. 27:19 as a place or people with whom Tyre carried on commercial relations. The verse presents textual difficulties (the Hebrew text was read by the LXX as ויין, "and wine"; cf. the RSV including the mg.). Those who retain the Hebrew text identify Javan with a Greek colony or an Arab tribe in Arabia.

The Ionians are referred to in Assyrian records, in the cuneiform inscriptions of Darius and in Egyptian records from the times of Ramses II.

Bibliography. B. Stade, Das Volk Javan (1880); M. Lidzbarski, Handbuch der nordsemitischen Epigraphik (1898), p. 287*a;* J. Skinner, ICC (1910), pp. 196-200; D. D. Luckenbill, "Jadanan and Javan," Zeitschrift für Assyriologie, 28 (1913), 92-99; C. F. Lehmann-Haupt, "Zur Erwähnung der Ionier in altorientalischen Quellen," Klio, 27 (N.F. 10; 1934), 74-83, 286-94; E. Herzfeld, Altpersische Inschriften (1938), no. 14, pp. 27 ff. H. F. BECK

JAVELIN. See WEAPONS AND IMPLEMENTS OF WAR § 3*c*.

JAZER jā′zər [יעזר, יעזיר]; KJV JAAZER jā ā′zər in Num. 21:32; 32:35. A fortified Amorite city in Gilead, in a district that was disputed by the Israelites, Moabites, and Ammonites.

1. History. After the defeat of Sihon, king of the Amorites, Moses sent spies out to Jazer and subsequently occupied the town (Num. 21:32), which was later fortified by the Gadites to whom it was assigned (Num. 32:1, 34-35). Later it became a Levitical city (Josh. 21:39). The region was noted for its pasture lands and for its fruits and vines (Isa. 16:8-9; Jer. 48:32). Jazer was important as a border post against an attack from Ammon, and during the reign of David the city was garrisoned by Judahites from Hebron (I Chr. 26:31). After the death of Ahab (853 B.C.), the entire region was conquered by Mesha of Moab; and from that time on, the city is mentioned as an important city of Moab, in the books of Isaiah and Jeremiah. In Hellenistic times the city was under the rule of the Ammonites, from whom it was retaken by Judas Maccabeus (I Macc. 5:8).

2. Location. Jazer was situated not far from the border of Ammon, in this case the river Jabbok as it flows N from Amman (Rabboth-ammon). The LXX, which RSV follows, reads: "Jazer was the boundary of the Ammonites," instead of: "The boundary of the Ammonites was strong (עז)" (Num. 21:24). Eusebius and Jerome speak of a place named Azer or Iazer, about ten Roman miles W of Rabbah of the Ammonites. The site that best suits this location is the ruin called Kom Yajuz, which occupies a splendid defensive location between the Wadi Kom and the Wadi Yajuz.

Bibliography. I. Press, Entziklopedia Eretz Yisrael, IV (1955), 399-400; N. Glueck, "Explorations in Eastern Palestine, III," AASOR, XVIII–XIX (1939), 178-81. Contrast G. M. Landes, "The Fountain at Jazer," BASOR, 144 (1956), 30-37.

S. COHEN

JAZIZ jā′zĭz [יזיז] (I Chr. 27:30—H 27:31). A Hagrite who was one of the royal stewards of David in charge of the flocks.

JEALOUSY. The biblical idea of jealousy includes the range of attitudes from the intense hatred of man for man in envy to the positive emotion of single-minded zeal. The English words "zeal" and "jealousy" are both derived from Greek ζηλόω, "to be jealous," which is itself derived from ζέω, "to boil." The term "jealousy" is used for both man and God, both as "jealousy of" something and as "jealousy for" something. The line between the two meanings is very thin, and context alone determines which is applicable.

1. Terminology
   a. In Hebrew
   b. In LXX Greek
   c. In NT Greek
2. In the OT
   a. Human jealousy
   b. Man's jealousy for God
   c. The jealousy of God
3. In postbiblical Judaism
4. In the NT
   a. Envy
   b. Zeal
Bibliography

1. Terminology. The word "jealousy" and its allied terms ("envy," "zeal," "passion," "fury") occur a number of times in the Bible, to translate several Hebrew and Greek terms.

a. In Hebrew. The root usually translated "to be jealous" is קנא, the root meaning of which is perhaps "to become red in the face." The verb (perhaps denominative, always in pi'el and hiph'il) and the noun קנאה are the normal terms for all kinds of jealousy (cf. Gen. 37:11; II Sam. 21:2; Zech. 1:14). Two intensive nominal forms, qannā' and qannô', are used only of God (Exod. 20:5; Deut. 5:9; Josh. 24:19; Nah. 1:2). In I Sam. 2:32 the RSV, probably correcting מעון to עין, "eye," translates "envious eye," supplying "envious" from the context. In Ps. 68:16—H 68:17 "envy" renders רצד, a hapax legomenon connoting stealthy and hostile watching (cf. Arabic raṣada, "to lie in wait with hostile intent").

b. In LXX Greek. The usual LXX translation of קנא and its cognates is ζηλόω (Isa. 11:13) and the nouns ζήλος (Num. 25:11), ζήλωσις (Num. 5:14, 30), ζηλωτός (Exod. 20:5), and ζηλοτυπία (Num. 5:15). The cognate παραζηλόω occurs in Deut. 32:21; I Kings 14:22; Ecclus. 30:3; παροργίζω, "to provoke to anger," is found in Ps. 105:16—H 106:16; and παροξύνω, "to infuriate," in Deut. 32:16. In Ezek. 36:5 קנאה is rendered by θυμός, "wrath" (RSV "hot jealousy"); and in Prov. 14:30 καρδία αἰσθητική, "a perceptive heart" (RSV "passion"), perhaps mistranslates קנאה.

c. In NT Greek. The NT derived its terminology from the LXX, though not all terms of the LXX are used. ζηλόω and its cognates ζηλεύω (only Rev. 3:19), ζήλος (Acts 5:17), ζηλωτής (I Cor. 14:12; see ZEALOT), and παραζηλόω (Rom. 11:11) are used for the whole range of meanings. Φθονέω (only Gal. 5:26) and the noun φθόνος (Matt. 27:18) denote human envy, though φθόνος is used in Jas. 4:5 for divine jealousy.

2. In the OT. For the OT jealousy is the emotion of single-minded devotion, which when turned upon the self, produces hatred or envy of others; or when turned beyond the self, produces overpowering zeal leading to total selflessness.

a. Human jealousy. Human jealousy may be either envy of or zeal for another. The Philistines envy Isaac his great possessions (Gen. 26:14), and Rachel is jealous of Leah's ability to bear children (Gen. 30:1). Ps. 106:16 describes the opposition to Moses by Dathan and Abiram (Num. 16) as jealousy. The pious are not to be jealous of evildoers (Ps. 37:1; Prov. 24:1, 19) or of the fortunes of the wicked (Ps. 73:3; Prov. 3:31; 23:17). Jealousy causes vengeful fury (Prov. 6:34) and produces a kind of spiritual death (Job 5:2; Prov. 14:30; Song of S. 8:6). But jealousy is also suspicion, as in the prescriptions of an offering and trial by ordeal for a wife suspected of infidelity (Num. 5:14-30). See BITTER.

The jealousy which produces positive devotion to others is exemplified by Joshua's desire to forbid Eldad and Medad from prophesying, which Moses rebukes, wishing that the whole nation would prophesy (Num. 11:26-29). David makes restitution to the Gibeonites for Saul's misdirected jealousy for Israel and Judah in seeking to slaughter them (II Sam. 21:2).

b. Man's jealousy for God. Phinehas' murder of an Israelite and his Midianite bride is commended by Yahweh as being "jealous with my jealousy" (Num. 25:11-13, a favorite example of zeal in later Judaism; cf. Ecclus. 45:23; I Macc. 2:26; IV Macc. 18:12; Sanh. 81*b;* Numbers Rabbah 20.25). Jehu's jealousy for Yahweh is likewise expressed by the slaughter of Ahab's family (II Kings 10:16). Elijah pleads that he has been "very jealous for Yahweh" (I Kings 19:10, 14). A less destructive devotion is expressed in Pss. 69:9—H 69:10 (jealousy for the temple); 119:139 (a jealousy in response to neglect of Yahweh's words).

c. The jealousy of God. The divine jealousy is also expressed in two directions. It is, on the one hand, provoked by idolatry, which is usurpation of the divine prerogatives (Deut. 32:16, 21; Ps. 78:58; Ezek. 8:3, 5), or by disobedience, implying a heedlessness of commitment (Deut. 4:24; I Kings 14:22; Isa. 59:17 ["fury"]). Wilful departure from the covenant causes the jealousy of God to break forth in destructive judgment (Deut. 29:20—H 29:19; Ps. 79:5; Ezek. 5:13; 16:38, 42; 23:25; Nah. 1:2; Zeph. 1:18; 3:8; see FIRE; DAY OF THE LORD). But Yahweh is also jealous because of his holiness (Josh. 24:19; Ezek. 39:25; see HOLINESS). Covenantal jealousy demands totality of obedience (Exod. 20:5; Deut. 5:9; 6:15), for in Yahweh's covenantal activity, "his name is Jealous" (Exod. 34:14). See COVENANT.

The divine jealousy, however, is the principle of God's protection of his people. It is his zeal which will provide the remnant of Israel with its life (II Kings 19:31; Isa. 37:32), which will maintain the messianic kingdom forever (Isa. 9:7—H 9:6). His jealousy blazes against the foes of his exiled people (Isa. 42:13; Ezek. 36:5-6; 38:19) and shames their adversaries (Isa. 26:11). His jealousy for Judah is both wrath against her adversaries and compassion for Jerusalem (Zech. 1:14-16; 8:2). The cry of the faithful in the straits of a locust plague arouses Yahweh's jealousy and his pity (Joel 2:18).

3. In postbiblical Judaism. The jealousy of God tends to fall into the background in both the Apoc. and the Pseudep. and in the rabbinic literature. The omniscience of God is a "jealous ear [which] hears all things" (Wisd. Sol. 1:10), and his jealousy is his "whole armor" (Wisd. Sol. 5:17). But Rabbi Jonathan interpreted Nah. 1:2 as meaning that God overcomes his own jealousy (Genesis Rabbah 49.8).

Human jealousy in its two characteristic directions appears in this literature. "Jealousy and anger shorten life" (Ecclus. 30:24), but righteous jealousy for the law is commended (I Macc. 2:27, 50; II Macc. 4:2). Envy is the opposite of love (Test. Gad 7:7; Test. Simeon 4:7) and is cast out by the fear of God (Test. Simeon 3:4-6; see FEAR) and by humility (Test. Gad 5:3). Pious zeal, however, is praised, for "the zealous come early for the performance of religious duties" (R.H. 32*b*; cf. Pes. 4*a*).

4. In the NT. As in the intertestamental literature, the jealousy of God takes the background in the NT. The author of Hebrews foresees judgment as a "fury of fire" (πύρος ζήλος) against God's adversaries (10:27). Paul fears that the Corinthians' idol-worship will "provoke the Lord to jealousy" (παραζηλόω; I Cor. 10:22), though he feels for them a "divine jealousy" (ζηλῶ γὰρ ὑμᾶς θεοῦ ζήλῳ; II Cor. 11:2), a covenantal jealousy put in terms of betrothal (see LOVE [NT]). The author of James quotes an unknown source, perhaps a paraphrase of Exod. 20:5: "He yearns jealously [πρὸς φθόνον ἐπιποθεῖ] over the spirit which he has made to dwell in us" (Jas. 4:5).

a. Envy. Jealousy of others for the NT is the antithesis of love (I Cor. 13:4; II Cor. 12:20; Jas. 3:14, 16; 4:2). It is listed by Paul among the "works of the flesh" (Gal. 5:20 [ζήλος], 21 [φθόνος]). All the uses of φθόνος and φθονέω, save that of Jas. 4:5, fall into this negative category (Matt. 27:18; Mark 15:10; Rom. 1:29; Gal. 5:26; Phil. 1:15; I Tim. 6:4; Tit. 3:3; I Pet. 2:1). The author of Acts ascribes jealousy to the Jews' treatment of the early church (Acts 5:17; 13:45; 17:5).

b. Zeal. The positive pole of jealousy is found in the NT, particularly in Paul, who feels that the "godly grief" engendered by the Corinthians' repentance produced zeal (II Cor. 7:11) of a kind which inspires the other churches (II Cor. 9:2). Paul finds this pious jealousy admirable in the Jews (Rom. 10:2; cf. Acts 21:20; 22:3), and he feels that it characterized his own life before his conversion (Gal. 1:14; Phil. 3:6). But Paul hopes that his ministry will provoke the Jews to yet more jealousy for God's truth, which may bring them salvation (Rom. 11:11, 14). The church must have zeal for the Spirit and its manifestations (I Cor. 12:31; 14:1, 12, 39). But zeal must be focused on the proper end. Those who corrupt the Galatians do so out of false zeal, so that their zeal may be reciprocated (Gal. 4:17-18).

Other writers commend zeal for "good deeds" (Tit. 2:14) and for "what is right" (I Pet. 3:13). It is the exclusive devotion which produces repentance in the face of chastening persecution (Rev. 3:19).

Bibliography. F. Küchler, "Der Gedanke des Eifers Jahwehs im AT," ZAW, 28 (1908), 42-52. B. Reicke, Diakonie, Festfreude und Zelos in Verbindung mit der altchristlichen Agapenfeier (1951). E. M. GOOD

JEALOUSY, ORDEAL OF [מנחת קנאת, cereal offering of jealousy]. A test which was devised to determine if a woman suspected of adultery was guilty or not. She had to drink holy water mixed with dust after she had taken a solemn oath, the "oath of the curse," while holding the "cereal offering of jealousy." If she was guilty, her body would swell and her thigh fall away; if innocent, she should be free to conceive children (Num. 5:12-28; cf. Code of Hammurabi, section 132).

See also JEALOUSY. O. J. BAAB

JEARIM, MOUNT jē′ə rĭm [הר יערים, mountain of forests] (Josh. 15:10). A mountain on the N border of Judah; probably identical with Mount Seir (see SEIR 2), on which is located the modern village of Saris, ca. nine miles N of Jerusalem. V. R. GOLD

JEATHERAI jē ăth′ə rī [יאתרי] (I Chr. 6:21); KJV JEATERAI —ăt—. Probably a scribal error for ETHNI.

JEBERECHIAH jĭ bĕr′ə kī′ə [יברכיה, Yahu blesses] (Isa. 8:2). The father of Zechariah.

JEBUS jē′bəs [יבוס]; JEBUSITE jĕb′yə sīt [יבסי, יבוסי]; KJV JEBUSI jĕb′yə sī [יבוסי] in Josh. 18:16, 28. Originally the name of a clan, the Jebusites, in control of Jerusalem before the conquest of the city by David. The Hebrew word יבוסי (yebhûsî), with the ending î characteristic of the names of clans and nations, was reproduced by the KJV in Josh. 18:16, 28, instead of the more usual form, "Jebusite." The name Jebus occurs in Judg. 19:10-11 with the explanation "that is, Jerusalem," and in I Chr. 11:4-5, where Jerusalem is glossed "that is Jebus, where the Jebusites were." One may conclude from these passages, not that Jebus was the primitive name of Jerusalem, but rather that Jebus was derived from the name of the clan which occupied the site, as, e.g., Paris (in Latin Lutetia Parisiorum) was named for the tribe of the Parisii. The toponym Jebus may well have been forged by late biblical writers unaware of the fact that the name Jerusalem, which they regarded as sacred, actually did antedate the first appearance of the Hebrews in Palestine, and was of pagan origin (see JERUSALEM § 1). The list of the principal cities of the tribe of Benjamin (Josh. 18:28 MT) mentions "the Jebusi, which is in Jerusalem," probably to be interpreted "the city of the Jebusi . . . ," rather than "Jebus (that is, Jerusalem)," as in the RSV. The etymology of the name of the clan is unknown.

The clan of the Jebusi or the Jebusites (generally in the singular in Hebrew with a collective sense), is mentioned in Gen. 10:16, together with other clans allegedly issued from Canaan (see CANAANITES), on the same line as the AMORITES. Accordingly, Josephus classifies the Jebusites among the Canaanites (Antiq. VII.iii.1). The Jebusites are listed on a par with the Amorites, the Canaanites, and the Girgashites in Gen. 15:21. However, the (Jebusite) king of Jerusalem, Adonizedek, is counted as one of the five confederate Amorite kings who opposed Joshua (Josh. 10:5). Onomatology confirms to some extent the Amorite background of the Jebusites, whose listing among the people of Canaan probably results from geographical, rather than ethnological, considerations, inasmuch as the Amorites and their kindred are mentioned as inhabiting the highlands of Palestine, thus being surrounded by, or living in the midst of, the Canaanite populations of the lowlands, which occupied the Mediterranean seaboard and the valley of the Jordan (Num. 13:29).

Jerusalem, the city of the Jebusites, was claimed in theory by the tribe of Benjamin in the division of the soil of Canaan (Josh. 18:28). As a matter of fact, the boundary between Judah and Benjamin ran along the Valley of Hinnom (see HINNOM, VALLEY OF THE SON OF), to the S of the "shoulder of the Jebusite" (Josh. 15:8; 18:16). The imprecision of the biblical text makes it inadvisable to speculate too heavily concerning its bearing on the topography of primitive Jerusalem. The location and the general layout of the city, however, have been ascertained by archaeology (see DAVID, CITY OF; ZION). Jerusalem was not occupied by the Israelites as they overran the land of Canaan under Joshua, and the town and its suburbs remained as a foreign enclave (Josh. 15:63). In this passage, Jerusalem is mentioned in connection with Judah, probably by implicit reference to the later status of the city as the capital of the S kingdom. The independence of Jerusalem from Hebrew rule in the time of the judges is further evidenced by the story of the Levite of Mount Ephraim who, journeying from Bethlehem northward, passes in view of the presumably hostile city of the Jebusites (Judg. 19:10-12).

The capture of the stronghold of Zion by David put an end to the domination of the Jebusites (II Sam. 5:6-7; I Chr. 11:4-6). The survivors submitted to the Israelites, and David, after he had made the city his capital, purchased from a Jebusite, ARAUNAH, or Ornan, the rocky hilltop used as a threshing floor to the N of the city of David, with a view to building a permanent structure for housing the ark of the covenant (II Sam. 24:18-25; I Chr. 21:15, 18-28).

Bibliography. G. A. Smith, Jerusalem, I (1907), 266-67; G. Dalman, Jerusalem und sein Gelände (1930), pp. 82-83; F.-M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine, I (1933), 320-21; J. Simons, Jerusalem in the OT (1952), pp. 60-61, 246-47.

G. A. BARROIS

JECAMIAH. KJV form of JEKAMIAH.

JECHOLIAH. KJV alternate form of JECOLIAH.

JECHONIAH; KJV JECHONIAS. Apoc. and NT forms of JECONIAH 1; SHECANIAH 5.

JECOLIAH jĕk′ə lī′ə [יכליהו, יכליה (II Chr. 26:3 Qere), יכוליה (II Kings 15:2; II Chr. 26:3 Kethibh), Yahu is able] (II Kings 15:2; II Chr. 26:3); KJV JECHOLIAH in II Kings 15:2. The mother of King Azariah (Uzziah).

JECONIAH jĕk′ə nī′ə [יכניה; Ιεχονιας]; Apoc. and NT JECHONIAH; KJV Apoc. JECONIAS —əs; KJV NT JECHONIAS. 1. Alternate name of JEHOIACHIN, king of Judah.

2. Apoc. form of CONANIAH 2.

3. Variant of JEHOAHAZ 3 in I Esd. 1:34.

JEDAIAH jĭ dā′yə [ידיה (1-2 below), Yahu has favored; ידעיה (3-7 below), Yahu knows]; KJV Apoc. JEDDU jĕd′o͞o. 1. A Simeonite (I Chr. 4:37).

2. One of those who helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:10).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 182.

3. A descendant of Aaron; eponym of a priestly house mentioned from the time of David (I Chr. 24:7) and listed among the returned exiles (I Chr. 9:10; Ezra 2:36; cf. Neh. 7:39; I Esd. 5:24). The individuals and families listed below are doubtless a part of this priestly line, but the exact relationships cannot be determined; and the distinctions, if any, among the various subjects referred to by this name cannot be clearly drawn.

4. One of the priests among those resident in postexilic Jerusalem (Neh. 11:10).

5. A priest among the returned exiles, related to a priestly house of this name (Neh. 12:6, 19).

6. Evidently another priest related to another priestly house of this name (Neh. 12:7, 21).

7. One of the returned exiles who brought contributions from Babylon for the Jerusalem community (Zech. 6:10, 14).

Bibliography. On the occurrence of this name in Neh. 12, see R. A. Bowman, Exegesis of Nehemiah, IB, III (1954), 785.

B. T. DAHLBERG

JEDEUS jĭ dē′əs. KJV Apoc. form of ADAIAH 6.

JEDIAEL jĭ dī′əl [ידיעאל, known of God]. 1. An eponym; a Benjaminite, according to I Chr. 7:6, 10-11; but the genealogy may originally have been that of Zebulun.

2. One of David's Mighty Men (I Chr. 11:45).

3. One of the Manassites who deserted to David while the latter served with the Philistines (I Chr. 12:20).

4. A Korahite gatekeeper in the reign of David (I Chr. 26:2).

Bibliography. On this name in I Chr. 7, see E. L. Curtis and A. A. Madsen, Chronicles, ICC (1910), pp. 145-49. On etymology, see M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 13, 35, 90, 181. B. T. DAHLBERG

JEDIDAH jĭ dī′də [ידידה, beloved, lovely] (II Kings 22:1). The mother of King Josiah.

JEDIDIAH jĕd′ə dī′ə [ידידיה, beloved of Yah(weh)] (II Sam. 12:25). A name given to Solomon by Nathan to indicate Yahweh's love for Solomon and gracious restoration of the erring David.

JEDUTHUN jĭ dōō′thən [ידותון, ידתון, ידיתון (properly Jedithun)]; Apoc. EDDINUS ĕd′ə nəs ['Εδδειvoῦς (B); 'Εδδινoῦς (A)]. 1. A Levitical singer of David's time. He is associated with Asaph and Heman (I Chr. 25:1; II Chr. 5:12). Elsewhere the third associate of Asaph and Heman is Ethan (I Chr. 15:17), suggesting that the names Ethan and Jeduthun refer to the same person. If so, Jeduthun (whose ancestry is nowhere given by the Chronicler) would become a member of the Levitical family of Merari (I Chr. 6:44—H 6:29). Perhaps the name Jeduthun is derived from the psalm tone (see 2 below), which originally may have read "upon the hands of Ethan" (לידי איתן).

Jeduthun is said to "prophesy" (I Chr. 25:1, 3) and is called the "king's seer" (II Chr. 35:15; cf. Eddinus in I Esd. 1:15). Possibly the guild which traced its origin to Jeduthun was originally a prophetic guild, which by the time of the second temple had become a guild of singers. See HEMAN.

In I Chr. 16:38, 42, Jeduthun is mistakenly made the father of the gatekeepers. The first of these verses may be a gloss by one who found Obed-edom mentioned as a singer in I Chr. 15:21. Perhaps some words have fallen out of the text between "the sons of Jeduthun" and "were appointed to the gate" in vs. 42. See PSALMS, BOOK OF.

2. A psalm tone ("according to Jeduthun"; titles of Pss. 39, reading על ידותון for לידותון; 62; 77).

Bibliography. P. de Lagarde, Übersicht über die im aramäischen, arabischen und hebräischen übliche Bildung der Nomina (1889), p. 121; S. Mowinckel, Psalmenstudien, III (1923), 17-18; A. R. Johnson, "The Prophet in Israelite Worship," ET, XLVII (1935-36), 312-19. R. W. CORNEY

JEELI. KJV Apoc. form of JAALAH.

JEELUS. KJV Apoc. alternate form of JEHIEL.

JEEZER; JEEZERITES. KJV alternate form of ABIEZER.

JEGAR-SAHADUTHA jē′gər sā′ə dōō′thə [יגר שהדותא, witness heap] (Gen. 31:47). The Aramaic name given by Laban to the heap of stones set up by him and Jacob. There is no indication that this became the basis of a place name, as was the case with the corresponding Hebrew term GALEED.

S. COHEN

JEHALLELEL jĭ hăl′ə lĕl [יהללאל, may God shine forth]; KJV JEHALELEEL jē′hə lē′lĭ əl in I Chr. 4:16; JEHALELEL jĭ hăl′ə lĕl in II Chr. 29:12. 1. An eponym; a descendant of Judah (I Chr. 4:16).

2. A Merarite Levite (II Chr. 29:12).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 28, 205, 208, 216. B. T. DAHLBERG

JEHDEIAH jĕ dē′yə [יחדיהו, may Yahu rejoice (i.e., in his works)]. 1. A Levite identified in I Chr. 24:20 with the reign of King David.

2. A Meronothite; official in charge of David's she-asses (I Chr. 27:30).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928). pp. 28, 210. B. T. DAHLBERG

JEHEZKEL jĭ hĕz′kĕl [יחזקאל, may God strengthen] (I Chr. 24:16); KJV JEHEZEKEL —ə kĕl. An eponym; a priest descended from Aaron.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 28, 202.

JEHIAH jĭ hī′ə [יחיה, Yah(weh) lives] (I Chr. 15:24). A Levite who was appointed as a gatekeeper for the ark when it was brought to Jerusalem by David.

JEHIEL jĭ hī′əl [יחיאל, may God enliven; KJV יעואל in I Chr. 9:35; 11:44 (RSV JEIEL 2-3)]; KJV Apoc. HIEREEL hī ĕr′ĭ əl ['Ιερεήλ (B, A)] (I Esd. 9:21); HIERIELUS hī ĕr′ī ē′ləs ['Ιεζρίηλος (A)] (I Esd. 9:27); JEELUS jĭ ē′ləs ['Ιεήλ (A)] (I Esd. 8:92—G 8:89); JEZELUS jə zē′ləs ['Ιεζήλου] (I Esd. 8:35); SYELUS sī ē′ləs ['Ησύηλος] (I Esd. 1:8). Alternately: JEHUEL jĭ hū′əl [Kethibh יחואל, Qere יחיאל] (II Chr. 29:14). 1. A Levite musician among those ministering before the ark in Jerusalem (I Chr. 15:18, 20; 16:5).

2. A Gershonite Levite; chief of the house of Laadan (I Chr. 23:8). He was in charge of the temple treasury in David's reign (29:8), and he was founder of a priestly family called Jehieli (I Chr. 26:21-22).

3. An instructor or adviser to David's sons (I Chr. 27:32).

4. A son of King Jehoshaphat of Judah (II Chr. 21:2).

5. One of the Levites assisting the reforms of King Hezekiah (II Chr. 29:14), and later a temple overseer in his reign (31:13).

6. A ruler of the temple during the reforms of King Josiah (II Chr. 35:8).

7. The father of one of the exiles returning with Ezra from Babylon (Ezra 8:9; cf. I Esd. 8:35).

8. The father of the Shecaniah associated with Ezra's marriage reforms (Ezra 10:2; cf. I Esd. 8:92), and perhaps the same Jehiel who was among those induced to divorce their foreign wives (Ezra 10:26; cf. I Esd. 9:27).

9. A priest among those persuaded by Ezra to divorce their foreign wives (Ezra 10:21; cf. I Esd. 9:21).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 28, 90, 206. B. T. DAHLBERG

JEHIELI jĭ hī′ə lī [יחיאלי] (I Chr. 26:21-22). Gentilic of JEHIEL 2.

JEHIZKIAH jē′hĭz kī′ə [יחזקיה, יחזקיהו] (II Chr. 28:12). Son of Shallum; a chief of Ephraim.

JEHOADDAH jĭ hō′ə də [יהועדה, perhaps a corruption of יערה, Jarah (I Chr. 9:42), or יהוידה, Jehoiada] (I Chr. 8:36). An obscure Benjaminite.

JEHOADDAN jĭ hō′ə dən [יהועדן, probably Yahu is delight] (II Chr. 25:1); JEHOADDIN —dĭn [יהועדין (Kethibh)] (II Kings 14:2). The mother of King Amaziah.

JEHOAHAZ jĭ hō′ə hăz [יהואחז, Yahu has grasped or taken hold of]. Alternately: JOAHAZ jō′ə hăz [יואחז, a contraction of יהואחז] (II Chr. 34:8). 1. King of Judah ca. 842 B.C.; youngest son and successor of Joram.

"Jehoahaz" is a variant of "Ahaziah" (cf. II Chr. 21:17; 22:1). In the former case the divine name appears as a prefix, in the latter as a suffix. See AHAZIAH 2.

2. King of Israel ca. 815-801 B.C.; son and successor of Jehu.

Jehoahaz is said to have reigned for seventeen years (II Kings 13:1). But the synchronisms of 13:1, 10, require a correction to fifteen.

The text of II Kings 13:1-9, which describes his reign, is confused. It is clear, however, that Israel was overrun by the Syrians under Hazael and his son Ben-hadad (vs. 3; cf. vs. 22; for the situation in Judah, cf. 12:17-18). The survival of the Asherah in Samaria was the ostensible reason for Israel's overthrow (13:6). The N kingdom was reduced to the status of a subject nation. This is borne out by the description of the military forces left to Jehoahaz. They consisted of only "fifty horsemen and ten chariots and ten thousand footmen" (vs. 7). Contrast the forces ascribed to King Ahab in Assyrian sources at the Battle of Qarqar, "two thousand chariots and ten thousand footmen." The number of ten thousand footmen (vs. 7*a*) is open to serious question in view of the statement that "the king of Syria had destroyed them [i.e., Israel's military forces] and made them like the dust at threshing" (vs. 7*b*). The clear implication is that Israel's armed might was almost totally destroyed. In the light of this situation the reference to the "might" of Jehoahaz in the summary of his reign (vs. 8) is clearly a mere formula.

Vss. 4-6 give the impression of being an intrusion in the present text. The attempted identifications of the "savior" (vs. 5) have proved improbable.

The archaeological evidence bears out this description. Megiddo seems to have been destroyed at this time and was not rebuilt until a later period.

Bibliography. J. B. Bury et al., eds., Cambridge Ancient History, III (1925), 375-76.

3. King of Judah 609-608 B.C.; son and successor of Josiah, carried into captivity to Egypt by Pharaoh Neco.

In our sources this king is called by two names—Jehoahaz and Shallum (I Chr. 3:15; Jer. 22:10 ff). The probable explanation is that Shallum was his personal name. He assumed a throne name—Jehoahaz —when he became king. Cf. a similar change of name in the cases of Eliakim/Jehoiakim (II Kings 23:34), Jeconiah (Coniah)/Jehoiachin (Joiachin; II Kings 24:6; Jer. 22:24; 24:1; Ezek. 1:2), Mattaniah/Zedekiah (II Kings 24:17). Names compounded with "Yahu" were common.

Jehoahaz came to the throne at the age of twenty-three and reigned three months in Jerusalem (II Kings 23:31; II Chr. 36:2). His mother's name was Hamutal (or Hamital). She was the daughter of Jeremiah of Libnah (probably by a diplomatic marriage; cf. II Kings 19:8).

According to the family tree in I Chr. 3:15, Shallum was the youngest of Josiah's four sons. There must, therefore, have been some special reason why he was made king by the "people of the land" instead of his elder brother. It may be that Eliakim/Jehoiakim had already shown pro-Egyptian tendencies. This would be especially resented in view of the circumstances of the death of the popular Josiah. It is possible that he was Josiah's "brother," but in the light of the evidence such a conclusion is not convincing.

Jehoahaz succeeded to the throne in tragic circumstances. With Josiah's death at Megiddo (609) Judah's dream of independence and a revival of the old Davidic empire was rudely shattered. She had escaped from Assyrian domination only to become a province of Egypt. After a brief reign of three months Jehoahaz was summoned by Pharaoh Neco to Riblah on the Orontes. This was the capital of Coele-Syria at the time, and here Neco had set up his headquarters. Jehoahaz was made a prisoner and tribute was imposed on Judah to the extent of a hundred talents of silver and ten(?) talents of gold. Neco made Eliakim king and changed his name to Jehoiakim. Jehoahaz was taken to Egypt, where he died.

The exile of Jehoahaz to Egypt was the occasion of Jeremiah's dirge (22:10-12), where he called on the people to lament for Jehoahaz, who was about to go away, never again to see his native land. Cf. also the reference to Jehoahaz in Ezek. 19:3, with its description of him as a "young lion."

Bibliography. W. F. Albright, "The Seal of Eliakim and the Latest Pre-exilic History," JBL, LI (1932), 77-106; F.-M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine, II (1938), 436-37; A. M. Honeyman, "The Evidence for Regnal Names Among the Hebrews," JBL, LXVII (1948), 13-25; D. J. Wiseman, Chronicles of Chaldean Kings (1956), pp. 18 ff.

H. B. MACLEAN

JEHOASH. Alternate form of JOASH.

JEHOHANAN jē′hō hā′nən [יהוחנן, Yahu has been gracious; cf. JOHANAN; Apoc. Ἰωανάν (A, I Esd. 9:1), Ἰωάννης (I Esd. 9:29)]; KJV alternately JOHANAN jō hā′nən (Ezra 10:6; Neh. 6:18); JOANAN jō ā′nən (I Esd. 9:1); JOHANNES jō hăn′ĭz (I Esd. 9:29). 1. A Korahite Levite; gatekeeper of the sanctuary (I Chr. 26:3).

2. One of King Jehoshaphat's captains (II Chr. 17:15).

3. The father of Ishmael, a commander who supported Jehoiada's revolt against Athaliah (II Chr. 23:1).

4. The owner of the chamber to which Ezra withdrew for fasting (Ezra 10:6; I Esd. 9:1); called the "son of Eliashib." If, as seems probable, he can be identified with the Johanan of Neh. 12:22, who is evidently a grandson of Eliashib, the high priest of Nehemiah's time (3:1), his connection with Ezra offers an important clue to the chronology of Ezra-Nehemiah. See JOHANAN 9.

5. One of the Israelites, contemporaries of Ezra, who had married foreign wives (Ezra 10:28; I Esd. 9:29).

6. A son of Tobiah the Ammonite; contemporary of Nehemiah. His Jewish wife was a daughter of Meshullam, who helped repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 6:18; cf. 3:4, 30).

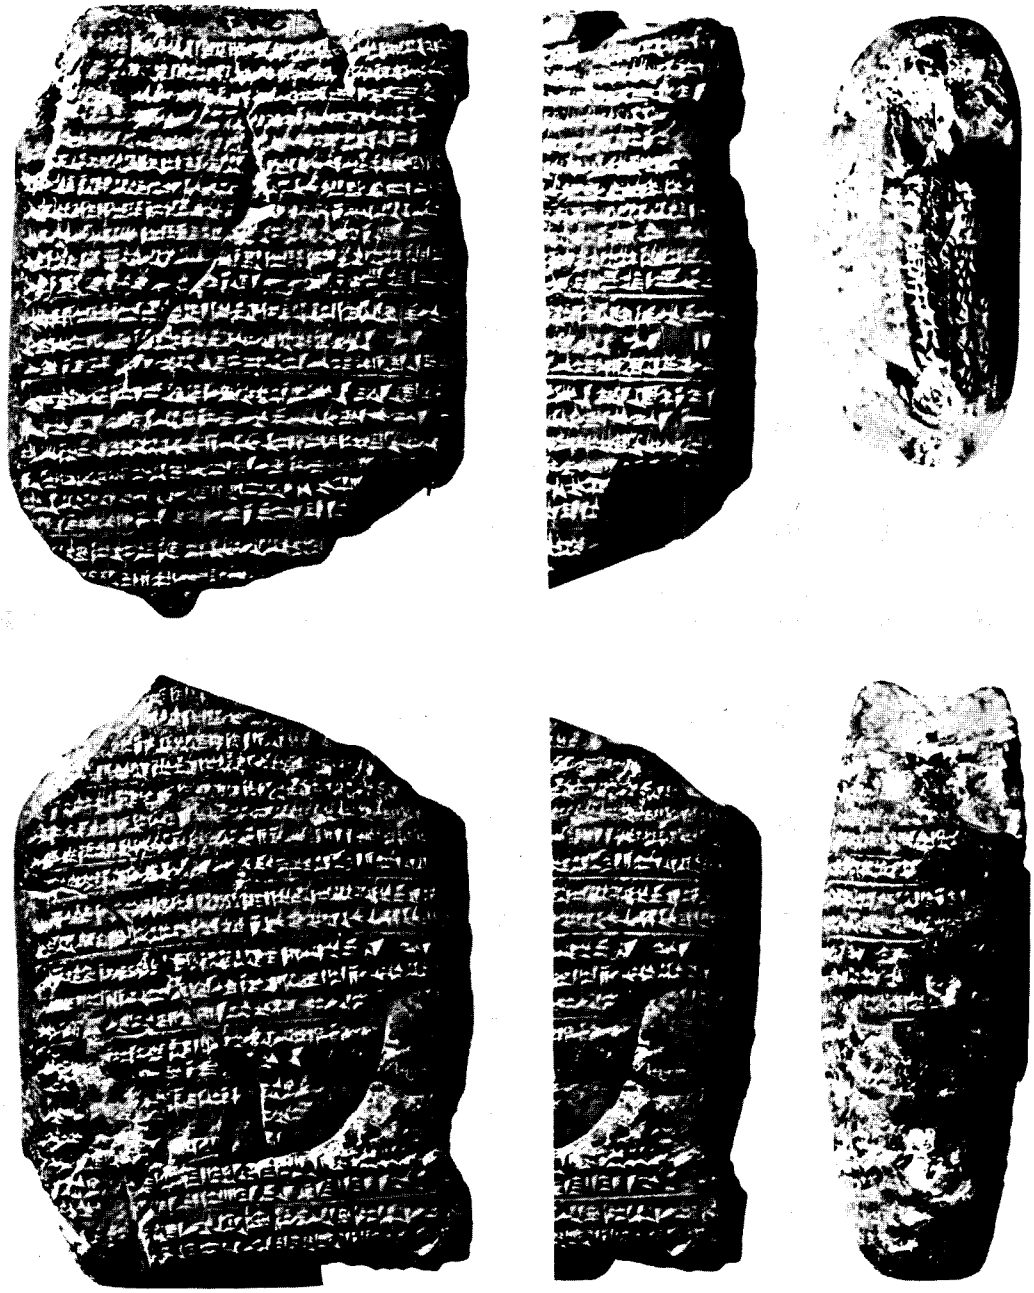
7. A priest in the time of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. 12:13).

8. One of the priests officiating at the dedication of the Jerusalem wall during Nehemiah's term as governor (Neh. 12:42).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 21, 62, 187. B. T. DAHLBERG

JEHOIACHIN jĭ hoi'ə kĭn [יְהוֹיָכִין, in Ezek. 1:2 יוֹיָכִין (properly Joiachin), Y establishes]. Alternately: JECONIAH jĕk'ə nī'ə [יְכָנְיָה, יְכָנְיָהוּ, יְכָנְיָה, Y exists (?) or Y protects (?) or let Y establish (?)] (I Chr. 3:16-17; Esth. 2:6; Jer. 24:1; 27:20; 28:4; 29:2); CONIAH kō nī'ə [כָּנְיָהוּ, a contraction of the preceding] (Jer. 22:24, 28; 37:1); JECHONIAH, KJV JECHONIAS ['Ιεχονίας] (Matt. 1:11-12). King of Judah 598-597, son and successor of Jehoiakim, carried into exile by Nebuchadrezzar.

In contemporary inscriptions the name appears as Yaukîn, which might be anglicized "Jauchin." This and the related forms Jehoiachin and Joiachin probably represent his throne name, given to him when he became king, while Jeconiah (Coniah) was his personal or private name. Compare how his father Eliakim became Jehoiakim (II Kings 23:34) and his uncle Shallum was also called Jehoahaz (II Kings 23:30; I Chr. 3:15; Jer. 22:11).



Jehoiachin became king in December of 598 at the age of eighteen and reigned for three months (II Kings 24:8). According to II Chr. 36:9 he was eight years old and reigned for three months and ten days, but the Babylonian tablets mentioned below and the mention of his wives in II Kings 24:15 make it clear he was eighteen years old. His mother was Nehushta, the daughter of Elnathan of Jerusalem, possibly the same Elnathan mentioned in Jer. 26:22; 36:12, 25; see also the contemporary Elnathan in an inscription from Lachish (Lachish Letter No. 3, line 15). The prominence given her suggests her great influence in the briefly reported events.

Jehoiachin inherited a disintegrating kingdom, with Judah in rebellion against Nebuchadrezzar's overlordship (see ISRAEL, HISTORY OF). His father Jehoiakim may have been assassinated in a palace revolt by elements unsympathetic with his policies, and this may help explain Jehoiachin's apparently quick capitulation. The Babylonian Chronicle, based on the official annals of the Babylonian kings, supplements the biblical narratives and establishes the chronology for the end of Jehoiachin's reign.* It informs us that in the seventh year of Nebuchadrezzar's reign, in the month Chislev (December, 598), Nebuchadrezzar mustered his troops and marched to the Hatti-land (Syria-Palestine). He encamped against the "city of Judah" (Jerusalem), and on the second day of the month Adar (March 16, 597, or more exactly March 15/16, since the Babylonians reckoned the day from sunset to sunset) he seized the city and captured the king. He appointed there a king of his own choice, and took heavy tribute, which he sent to Babylon. The captured king was, of course, Jehoiachin, and the king of his own choice was Jehoiachin's uncle (II Chr. 36:10 has "brother"), Mattaniah, now named Zedekiah. The biblical accounts relate that Jehoiachin submitted and, along with his mother, his wives, his officials, and others, was carried into exile. Jer. 52:28 numbers the exiles at this time as 3,023, but II Kings 24:14 reports 10,000. Fig. JEH 9.

The exile of Jehoiachin was the occasion for oracles of Jeremiah (13:18-19; 22:24-30; cf. 24:1-10), which mention also Jehoiachin's mother. Jeremiah believed Jehoiachin would not return from exile, and that his offspring would not rule again in Judah. The prophet Hananiah, by contrast, predicted the return of Jehoiachin within two years (Jer. 28:3-4, 11). Others doubtless had similar hopes and still reckoned Jehoiachin as the legitimate king. Jehoiachin's own hopes for return and restoration are reflected in Jeremiah's oracle (22:24-30). Ezekiel dated his oracles, not according to the reign of Zedekiah, but by the exile of King Jehoiachin (1:2; 8:1; etc.), perhaps reflecting the exile's view of Jehoiachin's continuing royal status.

Zedekiah may have been regarded by many as only a provisional ruler, in anticipation of Jehoiachin's return. Two stamped jar handles from the excavations of Tell Beit Mirsim (Kiriath-sepher) and one from Beth-shemesh, belonging to the time of Zedekiah, bore the inscription לאליקם נער יוכן, "Belonging to Eliakim, steward of Yaukîn."* Eliakim was steward of the crown property, which was thus kept intact and protected while Jehoiachin was in exile, that it might be his when he returned. It is possible that Gedaliah, who was governor of Judah after Zedekiah was deposed, may also have been regarded as a provisional ruler. Fig. JEH 10.

The Babylonians themselves may have intended the eventual restoration of Jehoiachin, if circumstances would make it advisable. We may compare Manasseh's exile and return (II Chr. 33:11-13). Jehoiachin continued to bear the title of king of Judah in Babylon. On tablets found in Babylon listing deliveries of rations in oil, barley, etc., to captives and skilled workmen, Yaukîn king of Judah and his five sons are mentioned. The tablets also contain references to other Judeans, to inhabitants of Ashkelon, Tyre, Byblos, and Arvad, and to Egyptians, Elamites, Lydians, and others. They are dated from the tenth to the thirty-fifth year of Nebuchadrezzar (595-570 B.C.). One of the tablets mentioning Jehoiachin is dated 592. The reference to distribution of rations to him and the mention of his five sons suggest that he was not in prison but was living a fairly normal life in Babylonia. Perhaps an attempted escape later resulted in his imprisonment. In II Kings 25:27-30; Jer. 52:31-34 we are informed of his release from prison by Evil-merodach (Amel-Marduk) on a date which, according to one possible reckoning, represents March 20 or 22, 560 (561). Jehoiachin's seat was set above that of other kings with him in Babylon, and he dined at the table of Evil-merodach, who gave him a regular daily allowance of food as long as he lived. His elevation at this time may have engendered great hopes among the exiles, perhaps even bordering on messianic expectations.

Courtesy of the Trustees of the British Museum

9. Babylonian chronicle, recording the Battle of Carchemish (605 B.C.) and the capture of Jerusalem (597 B.C.)

Jehoiachin altogether had seven sons, whose names are listed in I Chr. 3:17. It has been suggested that the name of one of them, Shenazzar, perhaps to be read Sin-ab-usur, may be corrupted to Sheshbazzar in Ezra 1:8, etc.; and so he may have been the first leader or governor of Judah after the return. He was succeeded by a grandson of Jehoiachin, Zerubbabel, who became the center of an unsuccessful attempt to restore the throne.

In the genealogy in Matt. 1:11-12 Jechoniah (Jehoiachin) is given as the son of Josiah, the name of Jehoiakim being absent from the list. In the Apoc., Baruch reads his book in the hearing of Jeconiah and other exiles in Babylon (Bar. 1:3), and in I Esd. 1:43 Joacim (Jehoiakim) appears as an error for Jehoiachin (corrected in RSV).

Courtesy of the American Schools of Oriental Research

10. Seal of Eliakim, steward of Jehoiachin; unearthed at Beth-shemesh

Bibliography. W. F. Albright, "The Seal of Eliakim," JBL, LI (1932), 77-106; "King Jehoiachin in Exile," BA, V (1942), 49-55. H. G. May, "Three Hebrew Seals and the Status of Exiled Jehoiachin," AJSL, LVI (1939), 146-48. E. F. Weidner, "Jojachin, König von Juda, in babylonischen Keilschrifttexten," Mélanges Syriens, II (1939), 923-35. J. B. Pritchard, ed., ANET (2nd ed., 1955), p. 308. D. J. Wiseman, Chronicles of the Chaldean Kings (1956), pp. 32-35, 72-73.

H. G. MAY

JEHOIADA jĭ hoi'ə də [יְהוֹיָדָע, Yahu knows or has regarded; same as יוֹיָדָע, Joiada]. 1. The father of the Benaiah who commanded King David's mercenaries (II Sam. 8:18; 20:23; 23:20, 22; I Kings 1:8–2:46) and who served under Solomon also (I Kings 4:4; cf. I Chr. 11:22, 24; 18:17; 27:5; in the last passage he is called "the priest"). It is doubtless this same Jehoiada who, according to the Chronicler, joined forces with David at Hebron and is called a "prince" (נָגִיד) and identified with the house of Aaron (I Chr. 12:27). See BENAIAH; DAVID.

2. According to I Chr. 27:34, the successor to Ahithophel as King David's counselor; the son of Benaiah, and presumably the grandson of 1 above. But it is possible that the genealogical order has been inverted here through a scribal error and that this individual is identical with 1 above.

3. The high priest in Jerusalem who organized and led the coup that overthrew Queen Athaliah of Judah (ca. 842-837 B.C.), together with the Baal cult that she supported, and established the boy king Joash (Jehoash) on the throne (II Kings 11:4-21; cf. vss. 1-3). Jehoiada apparently acted as regent for the new king during the latter's minority, and later inspired Joash' rehabilitation of the temple of the Lord (12:1-6). In the parallel account in II Chr. 22:10–24:27, Jehosheba (Jehoshabeath), the royal aunt of Joash who saved and hid the infant prince when Athaliah killed the other male heirs to the throne, is represented as the wife of Jehoiada, thus making him the new king's uncle (22:10-12). In the latter account it is related further that after Jehoiada's death his son, Zechariah, was executed by King Joash for having criticized conditions in Judah, for which death in turn Joash suffered divine punishment through military defeat and assassination (24:17-27). See also ATHALIAH; JEHOSHEBA; JOASH.

Bibliography. W. O. E. Oesterley and T. H. Robinson, A History of Israel, I (1932), 350-53.

4. A priest in the time of Jeremiah the prophet (Jer. 29:26).

5. Alternate form of JOIADA 2; KJV form of JOIADA 1.

B. T. DAHLBERG

JEHOIAKIM jĭ hoi'ə kĭm [יְהוֹיָקִים, Y raises up; cf. JOIAKIM]; KJV Apoc.: JOACHIM; JOACIM jō'ə kĭm. 1. King of Judah ca. 609-598 B.C.; son of Josiah, and brother of Jehoahaz.

In contemporary documents the name appears as Yaukîm. This is an abbreviation of Joiakim (or Jehoiakim). These related forms in all probability represent his throne name. His given name was Eliakim (II Kings 23:34; II Chr. 36:4), but Pharaoh Neco changed his name to Jehoiakim (see JEHOIACHIN). The change of name may very well have been deliberate on the part of the pharaoh, to appeal to Israel's national pride.

On the evidence of I Chr. 3:15, Jehoiakim was the second son of Josiah. He succeeded to the throne when his younger brother Jehoahaz was deposed by Pharaoh Neco after a reign of only three months.

Jehoiakim became king at the age of twenty-five and reigned eleven years in Jerusalem (II Kings 23:36; II Chr. 36:5). His mother was Zebidah, daughter of Pedaiah of Rumah (II Kings 23:36) in Galilee. He may have been passed over as his father's immediate successor because of his pro-Egyptian leanings. That he had some influence with Egypt is clear from the story of the flight and death of the prophet Uriah (Jer. 26:20 ff). This would also account for Neco's choice of him. Neco further laid the land of Judah under heavy tribute—a hundred shekels of silver and ten(?) talents of gold (II Kings 23:33; II Chr. 36:3). This sum Jehoiakim obtained by levying a tax upon the whole land (II Kings 23:35). That the king put some of the money thus obtained to his own personal use seems clear from Jeremiah's oracle of woe against him (Jer. 22:13 ff).

Our knowledge of events following the death of King Josiah at Megiddo (609) has been increased considerably by the appearance of four hitherto unpublished texts of the Babylonian Chronicle. Previously our main source of information for this period was the extract from Berossus, contained in Jos. Antiq. X.xi.1. Exact details are still lacking, but after the Battle of Megiddo (609) Assyria as an empire does not again appear in the picture. The world powers are Egypt and the Medo-Babylonian Empire. From 609 to 605 Nabopolassar of Babylon and his son Nebuchadrezzar were engaged in a number of campaigns against the hill folk on the S Urartian border. At the same time the Egyptians held a strong position at Carchemish on the Euphrates, from which the Babylonians were apparently unable to dislodge them, despite repeated attempts to do so. The general picture is that Egypt managed to retain the initiative. Nabopolassar himself returned to Babylon, where he died in August, 605.

Meantime, probably in May-June, 605, Nebuchadrezzar, now in sole command of the Babylonian army, attacked the Egyptians at Carchemish. He claims to have routed them completely in the decisive battle that followed. The Babylonian Chronicle records that even those who escaped were overtaken in the district of Hamath, and "not a single man escaped to his own country." Nebuchadrezzar pursued his attack to the W and "conquered the whole area of the Hatti-country" (i.e., Syria-Palestine). The biblical record confirms this account. "The king of Egypt did not come again out of his land, for the king of Babylon had taken all that belonged to the king of Egypt from the Brook of Egypt to the river Euphrates" (II Kings 24:7). These events must have occurred before August, 605, when Nebuchadrezzar was recalled to Babylon by the news of his father's death.

The date is important also from the point of view of chronology. Jeremiah (46:2) assigns the Battle of Carchemish to the fourth year of Jehoiakim. This enables us to date both the Battle of Megiddo and the death of Josiah. It also fixes the date of the reign of Jehoahaz and the accession of Jehoiakim.

As a result of Nebuchadrezzar's victory over Egypt, Jehoiakim transferred his allegiance to him, but his actual submission (II Kings 24:1*a*) probably took place in the first year of Nebuchadrezzar's reign —i.e., 604-603, when he marched with his army through the Hatti territory and received heavy tribute from all its kings.

For three years Jehoiakim acknowledged Babylonian suzerainty. Then he rebelled (II Kings 24:1*b*). The occasion appears to have been an indecisive battle of great ferocity fought near the Egyptian border between the Babylonians and the Egyptians in 601-600. The Babylonian Chronicle does not mention either the date or the place of this battle, nor is any reference made to it in our present Egyptian sources. Casualties were very heavy on both sides, and the clear implication is that Nebuchadrezzar was compelled to break off the campaign. After the battle he withdrew to Babylonia, where he remained for almost two years. This interval he spent in reequipping his military forces, especially his chariotry. Egypt was apparently in no position to move toward the conquest of Syria-Palestine. It is clear, however, that she continued her policy of intrigue, and apparently she was sufficiently strong to make an attack to the N and capture Gaza (Jer. 47:1). Jehoiakim's revolt against Nebuchadrezzar, against the advice of Jeremiah (cf. Jer. 27:9-11), was probably due to Egyptian influence at his court. In the circumstances Nebuchadrezzar dispatched bands of Chaldeans and enlisted the aid of the Syrians, the Moabites, and the Ammonites in an attempt to put down the rebellion (II Kings 24:2). Apparently these efforts were unsuccessful, and in 598 Nebuchadrezzar himself was again in Judah at the head of his armies and laid siege to Jerusalem. The Babylonian Chronicle enables us to date the succession of events. In the seventh year of the reign of Nebuchadrezzar, in the month of Chislev (i.e., December, 598), he mustered his troops, marched to Hatti land, and besieged the "city of Judah" (i.e., Jerusalem). The city was captured on the second day of the month Adar (i.e., March 15/16, 597), and the king taken prisoner. The captured king was Jehoiachin, who reigned for three months. Thus December, 598, marks not only his accession but also the death of Jehoiakim.

The probable explanation of the Chronicler's statement: "Against him came up Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon, and bound him in fetters to take him to Babylon. Nebuchadrezzar also carried part of the vessels of the house of the LORD to Babylon and put them in his palace" (II Chr. 36:6-7), is that this is a conclusion which the Chronicler drew from the report of Berossus that among the captives captured by Nebuchadrezzar in 605 were Jews, and that he decorated the temple of Bel and the other temples with the spoils of war (cf. also Dan. 1:1-2).

The reign of Jehoiakim and his character form the subject of a number of the oracles of JEREMIAH (cf., e.g., Jer. 36).

The manner of the king's death is problematical. The writer of Kings says that he "slept with his fathers" (II Kings 24:6), thereby indicating that he died a peaceful death. The Chronicler, on the other hand, makes no mention of his death. In this connection Jeremiah's two oracles relating to Jehoiakim's death must be considered. No lament would be made for him. He would be buried with the "burial of an ass," "dragged and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem" (Jer. 22:18-19). "His dead body shall be cast out to the heat by day and the frost by night" (36:30). The Chronicler's omission of any notice of his death is understandable if II Chr. 36:6 means that Jehoiakim was carried off in fetters to Babylon, where he died. Such an interpretation of the verse, however, does not seem probable. It declares that Jehoiakim was bound in fetters with the intention of taking him to Babylon. But the plan was apparently given up, for some reason which is not recorded. The most likely explanation for the ignorance of the sources regarding his death would seem to be that he was murdered by supporters of the pro-Babylonian party. The king's pro-Egyptian policy had brought the armies of Nebuchadrezzar to the gates of Jerusalem. He paid the penalty for this policy with his life. If this surmise is correct, it would explain, at least in part, why Jehoiachin, the son and successor of Jehoiakim, surrendered so quickly to the Babylonians. In these circumstances Jeremiah's prophecies may very well have been fulfilled and the king's body left unburied. It is an interesting suggestion that the phrase הנמצא עליו (II Chr. 36:8) means "that happened to him because of these things" (RSV "which he did") and is an actual reference to Jeremiah's prophecies.

In the genealogical list in Matt. 1, Jehoiakim's name is missing; only Jechoniah (Jehoiachin) is mentioned by name as the son of Josiah.

Bibliography. F.-M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine, II (1938), 438; A. M. Honeyman, "The Evidence for Regnal Names Among the Hebrews," JBL, LXVII (1948), 13-25; J. Bright, "A New Letter in Aramaic, Written to a Pharaoh of Egypt," BA, XII (1949), 46-52; H. L. Ginsberg, Alexander Marx Jubilee Volume (1950), pp. 439 ff; W. F. Albright, Review of a Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Books of Kings, JBL, LXXI (1952), 253; J. P. Hyatt, "New Light on Nebuchadrezzar and Judean History," JBL, LXXV (1956), 277-84; D. J. Wiseman, Chronicles of Chaldean Kings (1956), pp. 20-32, 65-75; G. E. Wright, Biblical Archeology (1957), pp. 175 ff. H. B. MACLEAN

2. A priest at Jerusalem to whom the Babylonian captives sent offerings (Bar. 1:7).

JEHOIARIB jĭ hoi'ə rĭb [יהויריב, may Yahu contend (i.e., in behalf of one)]. Descendant of Aaron; eponym of a priestly house identified in I Chr. 24:7 with the reign of King David and represented among those who returned from the Babylonian exile (I Chr. 9:10; the same as JOIARIB in Neh. 11:10).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 28, 201. B. T. DAHLBERG

JEHONADAB. Alternate form of JONADAB.

JEHONATHAN jĭ hŏn'ə thən [יהונתן, Yahu has given]. 1. One of the Levites who, in company with the princes of Judah and some priests, instructed the people in the law during an itinerant teaching mission in the cities of Judah in the third year of Jehoshaphat (II Chr. 17:8).

2. The head of the postexilic priestly family of Shemaiah (Neh. 10:8; 12:6) in the days of the high priesthood of Joiakim the son of Jeshua (12:18; cf. vss. 10, 12, 26).

3. KJV form of JONATHAN in I Chr. 27:25.

E. R. DALGLISH

JEHORAM. Alternate form of JORAM.

JEHOSHABEATH. Alternate form of JEHOSHEBA.

JEHOSHAPHAT jĭ hŏsh'ə făt, —hō'shə— [יהושפט, Yahu judges or has judged; 'Ιωσαφάτ]; KJV JOSAPHAT jŏs'ə făt (Matt. 1:8). Alternately: JOSHAPHAT jŏsh'ə făt [יושפט, a contraction of יהושפט] (I Chr. 11:43; 15:24). 1. One of the priests who took part in the procession when the ark of God was brought from the house of Obed-edom the Gittite to the city of David. His task was to blow a trumpet before the ark (I Chr. 15:24).

2. Recorder ("[the king's] 'remembrancer' " is a better translation of the Hebrew title מזכיר) in the administrations of David and Solomon; son of Ahilud (II Sam. 8:16; 20:24; I Kings 4:3; I Chr. 18:15). He is always listed as one of the chief officials of the kingdom.

3. One of Solomon's twelve administrative officers, with responsibility for the district of Issachar; son of Paruah (I Kings 4:17). The task of each of the officers was to provide food for the king and his household for one month each year (vs. 7).

4. King of Judah ca. 873-849 B.C.; son and successor of Asa.

Jehoshaphat became king at the age of thirty-five and reigned for twenty-five years. His mother was Azubah daughter of Shilhi (I Kings 22:42; II Chr. 20:31).

The reign of Jehoshaphat was marked by the end of the warfare which had gone on continuously between Israel and Judah since the death of Solomon (I Kings 22:44). The kings of the two countries entered into an alliance which was later confirmed by the marriage of Ahab's daughter Athaliah to Jehoram, son and heir of Jehoshaphat (II Kings 8:18, 27; cf. II Chr. 18:1)—an alliance which in the end was to prove disastrous. The immediate result, however, was a revival of strength in both kingdoms, though Judah clearly occupied a subordinate position. This is evidenced in the account of the Israelite attack on Ramoth-gilead (I Kings 22:1 ff), which comes from a prophetic source. Jehoshaphat was on a state visit to Ahab when he was persuaded to join in an attempt to recover Ramoth-gilead for Israel. But he was unwilling to set out without divine approval. With one accord Ahab's prophets, four hundred in number, announced the success of the contemplated expedition. Jehoshaphat, however, was not satisfied, and grudgingly Ahab sent for Micaiah son of Imlah. Micaiah first agreed with the other prophets, but later declared the vision he had seen. Israel would be "scattered upon the mountains, as sheep that have no shepherd." Despite this prophetic word the planned attack on Ramoth-gilead was carried through, and in the ensuing battle Ahab was mortally wounded. The news of his death was followed by the rout of the allied armies. The writer of Kings makes no mention of Jehoshaphat's further part in the action. Presumably he withdrew to Jerusalem. The Chronicler, however, records a word of censure uttered against him by Jehu the son of Hanani the seer (II Chr. 19:1-3). Judah's position at this time is further corroborated by the story of the attack on Moab (II Kings 3:4 ff). Historically, this alliance was probably the result of a double pressure from Assyria and Aram.

Jehoshaphat proved to be an able ruler and succeeded in bringing Edom under his control. The importance of this success lay in the fact that it gave Judah command of most of the caravan routes from Arabia and brought increased wealth to the S kingdom (II Chr. 17:5; 18:1).

The incident recorded in I Kings 22:47-49 (cf. II Chr. 20:35-37) must have occurred toward the end of Jehoshaphat's reign, as Ahaziah son of Ahab was then king of Israel. The text of I Kings 22:47-48 is corrupt and requires correction. It seems probable that Jehoshaphat had appointed a deputy over Edom, and that an attempt was made to revive maritime trade with Arabia. The first ship to be built was wrecked at Ezion-geber. Thereupon Ahaziah of Israel offered help to man a fleet, but Jehoshaphat would not agree to his proposal. It is clear that his refusal was based on the fear of N encroachment upon his territory. The matter of the control of the trade routes was also doubtless involved.

There is no reason to doubt the essential historicity of the incident recorded in II Kings 3:4 ff, where the kings of Israel, Judah, and Edom undertook a war against Moab, which had revolted from Israel. It is questionable, however, if Edom had a king at this time (cf. I Kings 22:47; II Kings 8:20).

The Chronicler gives a long and detailed account of Jehoshaphat's achievements (II Chr. 17-20). He fortified cities in Judah and placed garrison troops also in the cities of Ephraim which Asa his father had taken (17:1-2). He was feared and held in the highest regard by all the surrounding peoples. Philistines and Arabs alike brought him tribute and gifts (vss. 10-13). He had a mighty army (vss. 14-19). The figures are not reliable, but the passage probably gives a historical picture of the organization of the army. II Chr. 20:1-30 records a great victory over a combined force of Moabites, Ammonites, and Meunites at En-gedi. The story appears to be based upon a reliable tradition, which has been extensively worked over by the Chronicler. It is not a parallel to II Kings 3:4-27. Noteworthy in this connection is the account of a great penitential assembly gathered together "to seek help from the LORD" in a time of crisis. In the midst of the waiting people "the Spirit of the LORD came upon Jahaziel the son of Zechariah, . . . a Levite of the sons of Asaph," and he proclaimed the word of Yahweh. In all probability this reflects a common Israelite religious practice.

In addition, Jehoshaphat carried out a systematic teaching program among the people of Judah. Certain of the princes, Levites, and priests were sent throughout the land to instruct the people in the "book of the law of the LORD" (II Chr. 17:7-9). Vs. 8, with its emphasis on the prominent position occupied by the Levites, is demonstrably a reading back into the time of Jehoshaphat of conditions which prevailed in the Chronicler's own day. Vss. 7, 9, may rest on an old tradition. The scope of the "book of the law of the LORD" is unknown. By his own example Jehoshaphat openly encouraged the worship of Yahweh in the land. He also introduced a very important administrative change (19:5-11). Prior to his time justice had been administered by the local elders in the various communities. Jehoshaphat appointed judges in all the fortified cities of Judah. He also established a court of final appeal in Jerusalem, made up of Levites, priests, and heads of families, with the chief priest and the governor of the house of Judah in charge. The similarities between II Chr. 19:5-11 and Deut. 16:18-20; 17:8-13 are obvious. The divergences are probably to be explained by the situation existing in the time of the Chronicler. That his source told of such a judicial reform initiated by Jehoshaphat seems certain. The suggestion that II Chr. 17:7-9 is perhaps a doubtlet of 19:4-11 is an interesting one and may be correct.

In the Chronicler's account of the wars of Jehoshaphat the numbers are quite unreliable. In like manner his picture of the reforms carried out by the king bears upon it the stamp of the postexilic period. But that reforms took place is beyond question.

It seems probable that the fortresses and store cities which Jehoshaphat built in Judah (II Chr. 17: 12-13) are to be understood in the light of a province system existing in Judah—a fact to which Rehoboam's comparable list (11:5-12) also points. Like Rehoboam, Jehoshaphat appointed his sons over some of these fortified cities (21:2-3). If Josh. 15:20-62 is the province list of Judah and dates from the reign of Jehoshaphat, as has been suggested, we have at hand a picture of the extent of the kingdom of Judah at this time.

Jehoshaphat may have acted as regent for his father, Asa, after the king was incapacitated in his thirty-ninth year.

Bibliography. N. Glueck, "The Third Season of Excavation at Tell el-Kheleifeh," BASOR, no. 79 (1940), pp. 2-18, especially p. 8; W. F. Albright, "The Judicial Reform of Jehoshaphat," Alexander Marx Jubilee Volume (1950), pp. 61-82; A. Alt, Kleine Schriften zur Geschichte des Volkes Israel, II (1953), 276-88; M. Noth, Das Buch Josua (2nd ed., 1953), pp. 73-123; W. Rudolph, Chronikbücher (1955), pp. 249-65; F. M. Cross and G. E. Wright, "The Boundary and Province Lists of the Kingdom of Judah," JBL, LXXV (1956), 202-26.

5. The father of Jehu, who exterminated the dynasty of Omri; and son of Nimshi (II Kings 9:2, 14). In I Kings 19:16; II Kings 9:20; II Chr. 22:7, Jehu is called the "son of Nimshi," but this is his grandfather's name. H. B. MACLEAN

JEHOSHAPHAT, VALLEY OF [עמק יהושפט]. A valley in which God shall summon the nations to be judged in the days of the messianic restoration of Judah and Jerusalem, according to Joel 3:2, 12. The intent of this text is symbolical rather than geographical, as may be inferred from the etymology of the name, "Yahweh shall judge," or from Joel 3:14, where the same valley is called "valley of decision" (עמק החרוץ), in the sense of a judicial decision or a verdict.

A few Jewish commentators, followed by the majority of early and medieval Christian exegetes, however, interpreted the toponym realistically. Kimchi supposes that a valley near Jerusalem would have been named for a monument built by King Jehoshaphat (see JEHOSHAPHAT 4). The Valley of Jehoshaphat has been identified at times with the Valley of Hinnom (see HINNOM, VALLEY OF THE SON OF), and, ever since the fourth century A.D., with the Valley of the Kidron (see KIDRON, BROOK), on the basis of speculations concerning God's vengeance in the day of judgment, of which the destruction of idols burnt in the Kidron by reformer kings was regarded as a type. This artificial exegesis has left traces in the Vulg.'s rendering of Jerusalem's MUSTER GATE as Porta Judicialis, "Gate of Judgment," in Neh. 3:31, according to a current meaning of the root pqd ("to visit," "to punish"). The associations of the Kidron Valley with the theme of Judgment survive in various Moslem legends concerning the so-called Golden Gate, on the E front of the Ḥaram esh-Sherīf or temple area. The upper tract of the Kidron Valley opposite the Golden Gate is referred to as the Djahannum (Gehenna), and the two doors of the gate, which shall be closed to unbelievers and all evil men, are known as the door of mercy and the door of contrition. The groups of Christian hermits and nuns who were seeking shelter from the wrath to come, and who repaired to miscellaneous caves and desecrated rock-cut tombs on either bank of the Kidron, were incorporated in the Laura, or monastic foundation, of the "Valley of Jehoshaphat," as early as the sixth century. A later monastery, built in the twelfth century near the church of the Tomb of Mary, bore the title of Saint Mary of Josaphat, and the city gate leading to the bridge of the Kidron, called today Bāb Sitti Mariam, Gate of Saint Mary, and also (erroneously) Saint Stephen's Gate, was known until the fourteenth century as Gate of the Valley of Josaphat.

The fanciful identification of the Valley of Jehoshaphat with the Kidron remains extremely popular among tourists and pilgrims, no doubt because of the countless tombstones and monuments of the Jewish cemeteries, which call to mind the day when the dead shall rise from their graves to face the sovereign Judge.

Bibliography. H. Vincent and F.-M. Abel, Jérusalem Nouvelle, IV (1926), 813-16, 849-52; J. Simons, Jerusalem in the OT (1952), pp. 10, 372. G. A. BARROIS

JEHOSHEBA jĭ hŏsh′ə bə [יהושבע, Yahu is abundance, wholeness; cf. Bathsheba, Elisheba]. Alternately: JEHOSHABEATH jē′hō shăb′ĭ əth [יהושבעת] (II Chr. 22:11). The daughter of King Jehoram of Judah (II Kings 11:2). When Ahaziah was killed in Jehu's revolt, the queen mother, Athaliah, destroyed the rest of the royal family and reigned herself. Jehosheba saved Joash from this destruction, hiding him for six years, until Jehoiada could make him king. According to Chronicles, she was the wife of Jehoiada. D. HARVEY

JEHOSHUA; JEHOSHUAH. KJV alternate forms of JOSHUA.

JEHOVAH jĭ hō′və. An artificial form, often attributed to Petrus Galatinus in ca. A.D. 1520, which results from the combination of the consonants of the Tetragrammaton, "YHWH," with the substitute vowel reading which was introduced when the MT was fixed during the sixth-seventh centuries A.D. The pre-Masoretic text was consonantal, vowels being supplied by the reader from a knowledge of the language. In the postexilic period (after 538 B.C.) the sacred name "Yahweh" was withdrawn from popular usage for fear that it would be profaned. Of the various substitutes that were employed, the chief was "Adonai" ("Lord"), the vowels of which the Masoretes as a rule added to the consonants "YHWH" to indicate that "Adonai" should be read. The combination of the two—the Tetragrammaton and the vowels of "Adonai"—yields the artificial name which appeared in a few passages of the KJV and was regularly used in the ASV. The RSV, following ancient synagogue practice, renders "the LORD."

See also GOD, NAMES OF, §§ B, C6.

B. W. ANDERSON

JEHOVAH-JIREH jĭ hō′və jī′rə. KJV translation of יהוה יראה (RSV lit., THE LORD WILL PROVIDE) in Gen. 22:14. This is the designation Abraham gave to the location where God provided a ram to be sacrificed in Isaac's stead. The equally possible reading "Yahweh will see" is less likely in the context, where divine providence is apparently the theme (vss. 8, 12).

The location of the site is unknown. Tradition, with Rashi, Ibn Ezra, etc., has always associated the story with the location of the Solomonic temple. Scholarship has offered the alternative suggestion that the sanctuary of the oak of Moreh at Shechem was originally intended. J. A. SANDERS

JEHOVAH-NISSI jĭ hō′və nĭs′ī. KJV translation of יהוה נסי (RSV lit., THE LORD IS MY BANNER) in Exod. 17:15. This was Moses' designation of the altar which he had erected as a memorial after the victory over the Amalekites. God was regarded as the rallying point for the Israelite army, and the name יהוה was their battle cry (cf. Judg. 7:20; Ps. 20:7). J. L. MIHELIC

JEHOVAH-SHALOM jĭ hō′və shā′ləm. KJV translation of יהוה שלום (RSV lit., THE LORD IS PEACE), the name of the altar erected by Gideon at Ophrah (Judg. 6:24).

JEHOZABAD jĭ hŏ′zə băd [יהוזבד, Yahu gives; cf. JOZABAD]. 1. Son of Shomer; one of the servants of Joash who murdered the king at Millo (II Kings 12:21—H 12:22). In the parallel version (II Chr. 24:26) he is called the son of Shimrith the Moabitess.

2. A temple gatekeeper, son of Obed-edom (I Chr. 26:4).

3. A Benjaminite commander under Jehoshaphat (II Chr. 17:18). J. M. WARD

JEHOZADAK. Alternate form of JOZADAK.

JEHU jē′hū [יהוא, he is Yahu]. 1. King of Israel ca. 842-815 B.C. He succeeded to the throne after the murder of Joram, last of the Omride dynasty.

The original vocalization was probably יְהוֹא (Yōhu) or יְהוּא (Yāhu). In cuneiform texts the name is found as Ja-u-a.

Jehu was the son of Jehoshaphat, son of Nimshi (II Kings 9:2). It is clear that in the phrase "son of Nimshi" (vs. 20) "son" is used in the general sense of "descendant." Actually he was the grandson of Nimshi. He reigned in Samaria for twenty-eight years (10:36).

II Kings 9:1–10:28 gives a detailed account of Jehu's rebellion against the house of Omri. It comes from a prophetic source, roughly contemporary with the events it describes. The movement had full prophetic backing. The note of censure, which appears in II Kings 10:29 ff; Hos. 1:4, is the result of later reflection. Certain features of this bloody revolution are noteworthy:

a) It was prophet-inspired. Whether Elijah had anything to do with it or not (I Kings 19:15-18), the motive was a religious one. Elijah's very name, "Yahweh is God," indicates his attitude toward the worship of any other god in Israel, and the episode on Mount Carmel (18:17 ff) his blazing passion for Yahweh alone. It is clear that the worship of the Tyrian Baal-Melcarth and Astarte, imported into Israel by the Tyrian Jezebel, was regarded by the prophets as an insult to Yahweh the God of Israel, and must therefore be completely destroyed. The opportune moment arrived in the time of Elisha. The Israelite army was on guard at Ramoth-gilead against Hazael, king of Syria (II Kings 9:14*b*-15*a*). King Joram had been wounded in the campaign there, and had returned to Jezreel to recuperate. Elisha summoned one of the sons of the prophets and bade him go to Ramoth-gilead, seek out Jehu, one of the army commanders, and privately anoint him king over Israel in the name of Yahweh. Then he was to make his escape as quickly as possible (9:1-3). The elements of speed and secrecy are stressed in Elisha's orders (vs. 3).

The young man executed his commission. It is probable that the command to exterminate the house of Ahab (vss. 7-10*a*) did not belong in the original statement. The hesitancy of Jehu in announcing to his fellow commanders the purpose of the prophet's visit gives every appearance of an actual event. On their insistence, however, he told them what had happened. They immediately proclaimed him king, and Jehu made preparations to drive to Jezreel, after taking precautions that news of the events at Ramoth-gilead should not reach that city. Then he set out with a company of chariots. As they drew near to Jezreel, the watchman on duty reported to King Joram that a company was approaching. Joram ordered messengers on horseback to be sent out to meet them, but they did not come back. Suspicious of what this meant, Joram ordered his royal chariot to be made ready; and he and Ahaziah king of Judah, who was paying him a visit, drove, each in his own chariot, to meet Jehu. They met him at the plot of ground which had belonged to Naboth the Jezreelite. Queen Jezebel had been responsible for the murder of Naboth, and his property had then come into the possession of King Ahab (I Kings 21: 17 ff). In ruthless manner Joram was slain by Jehu and his body tossed on the plot that had formerly belonged to Naboth. Thus Elijah's prophecy was fulfilled (I Kings 21:17 ff). Ahaziah king of Judah tried to escape, but was pursued, overtaken, and seriously wounded at Ibleam. He died at Megiddo. Then Jehu came to Jezreel, where Jezebel awaited him in state. On his orders she was thrown into the street from an upper window, trampled on by the horses, and eaten by dogs (II Kings 9:30-37). Perhaps the character of Jehu is to be seen in the words: "He went in and ate and drank" (vs. 34), just as if nothing unusual had happened.

The murder of the kings of Israel and Judah, together with the queen mother, was followed by the slaughter of Ahab's whole family in Samaria, some seventy persons in all (II Kings 10:1). By a clever ruse Jehu challenged the loyalty of the city's leaders. He invited them to choose the best and fittest of the king's sons and set him on his father's throne and fight for him and his father's house. When they protested their loyalty to him, Jehu ordered the heads of all the members of Ahab's family to be sent to him at Jezreel, where he exhibited them at the city gate. Then he slew all who were left of Ahab's family in Jezreel, together with all who had held high official positions (II Kings 10:1-11). Thereafter he went to Samaria.

On his way there he met the royal party from Judah coming to visit the royal family in Samaria. The place of meeting was at Beth-eked of the Shepherds (II Kings 10:12)—i.e., the "shearing house of the shepherds." This place has not certainly been identified. Jehu gave orders that the whole party should be taken alive and slaughtered. In this blood bath forty-two persons perished (vs. 14). The figure may be a round number, but if so, one would expect forty instead.

The religious element in the revolt was again demonstrated by the fact that Jehonadab, son of Rechab, is pictured as giving his wholehearted support to Jehu (II Kings 10:15-16). The Rechabites were fanatical in their devotion to Yahweh. They had neither gardens nor vineyards. They refused to drink wine. They lived in tents and would not build houses. The ideal they had was the simple life of the desert (Jer. 35). The association of the Rechabite leader with Jehu is indicative of the spirit of discontent that prevailed in Israel at this time. Jehonadab was remembered as taking part with Jehu in the blood purge that followed.

Arrived in Samaria, Jehu completed the destruction of the house of Ahab (II Kings 10:17). He then proceeded to the wholesale extermination of both the cult and the worshipers of Baal. That this incident is historical is not to be doubted, but that it involved all the worshipers of Baal "throughout all Israel" (vs. 21) is open to question. Under the pretense of offering a great sacrifice to Baal, Jehu summoned all the Baal-worshipers to the house of Baal which Ahab had built in Samaria (I Kings 16:32). Jehonadab son of Rechab had part with him in the events that followed. Orders were issued that every single person present was to be slain. These orders were carried out. Then the house of Baal itself was demolished and the pillar of Baal broken in pieces. The site became a latrine, and its evil reputation was remembered even in the writer's own day.

One may question Jehu's real religious zeal for Yahweh in all these events, but that a religious motive was present is unquestionable. The cult of Baal-Melcarth had been exterminated from Israel, or at least it had been drastically curtailed. It is to be remembered, however, that a similar thing had happened before (I Kings 18), but Baal-worship had survived. And the same thing occurred again.

b) An economic factor was also involved. The Omride rulers had brought about a considerable change in the fortunes of Israel. Prior to this time Israel's economic prosperity had depended upon the small peasant farmer. He owned his own plot of land by inalienable right and expected to hand it down to his descendants. There were larger farms, but these were the exception rather than the rule. Omri's choice of Samaria as his new capital city, and particularly his alliance with Phoenicia, affected the whole destiny of Israel. Wealth began to appear in Israel as the result of increased trade, and a new merchant class arose. The contrast between rich and poor became sharper as the years passed, and this contrast was heightened as a result of periods of drought. Men long remembered the great drought which occurred in Ahab's reign, with its accompanying famine in the land (I Kings 17). The result was that the wealthy merchants loaned money at extortionate rates to the peasants, and when they were unable to pay, confiscated their land and enslaved their families. There is no question that the incident of Naboth's vineyard (I Kings 21) aroused popular discontent and fed the flames of revolt. Presumably other similar travesties of justice had occurred.

c) It is equally clear that there was dissatisfaction in the army. Plans for revolution had already been made. These only awaited a suitable opportunity to put them into effect. This opportunity came with the absence of Joram when the army was defending Ramoth-gilead. Thus the stage was set for Jehu's purge of the land.

But it went too far. From the religious point of view it accomplished its purpose: There was no longer any chance of successfully establishing a rival worship to that of Yahweh in Israel. From the political point of view, however, it was a major disaster. Israel's former allies, Phoenicia and Judah, had been permanently antagonized. The prophetic hatred of Jezebel's Tyrian deities may account for Jehu's savage revenge on Jezebel and all her followers, but it is difficult to find any real justification for the murder of the royal family of Judah. Israel now stood alone, and she paid the penalty. Hazael king of Aram seems to have completely overrun Transjordan at this time and annexed it (II Kings 10:32-33; cf. Amos 1:3). Clearly Jehu was not in a position to challenge him, despite the reference to "all his might" in the summary of his reign (II Kings 10:34). The Assyrian inscriptions furnish further details of the situation. In 842 Shalmaneser III marched against Aram. He claims to have inflicted a defeat on Hazael of Damascus, and besieged him in Damascus, but did not succeed in capturing the city. He then proceeded to Phoenicia, where he placed a stele with his image as king on the cliff of Ba'li-ra'si. On the cliff at the mouth of the Dog River in Lebanon an image is pointed out which may be the one erected by Shalmaneser III. In the course of this campaign Shalmaneser received tribute from the inhabitants of Tyre and Sidon and from Jehu, son of Omri (Ia-ú-a mār Ḫu-um-ri-i). The tribute consisted of gold, silver, vessels made of these metals, and wooden objects, the exact nature of which is unknown. Shalmaneser's famous Black Obelisk shows Jehu actually presenting these tokens of his submission. It is also of interest as portraying Israelites for the first time, as far as we know. Ca. 837 the Assyrians again raided Syrian territory, but thereafter were taken up with their own affairs till 805. The general picture during this period is one of constant aggression by Aram against both Israel and Judah. It is probable that at this time Megiddo was destroyed by Hazael.

It is to be noted that the Chronicler gives only a very brief summary of the events recorded in II Kings 9:1–10:28 (II Chr. 22:8-9). The reason is clear: He was not interested in Jehu. He was interested only in the fate of Ahaziah.

Bibliography. E. G. Kraeling, Aram and Israel (1918), pp. 73-84; M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 143; J. A. Montgomery, "Ascetic Strains in Early Judaism," JBL, LI (1932), 183 ff; F.-M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine, II (1938), 271; R. S. Lamon and G. M. Shipton, Megiddo I, XLII (1939), 8 ff; J. B. Pritchard, ed., ANET (2nd ed., 1955), p. 281; G. E. Wright, Biblical Archaeology (1957), pp. 156 ff.

2. A prophet, son of Hanani, who foretold the destruction of Baasha's house (I Kings 16:1, 7, 12). The same name is given to the prophet who censured Jehoshaphat king of Judah for joining with Ahab king of Israel in the attack on Ramoth-gilead (II Chr. 19:2). In II Chr. 20:34 are mentioned the "chronicles of Jehu the son of Hanani, which are recorded in the Book of the Kings of Israel."

3. A Benjaminite from Anathoth; one of David's Mighty Men who came to him at Ziklag (I Chr. 12:3).

4. A Judahite, of the family of Jerahmeel; son of Obed (I Chr. 2:38).

5. A Simeonite; son of Joshibiah, head of a father's house (I Chr. 4:35). H. B. MacLean JEHUBBAH jĭ hŭb'ə [יחבה; Qere: חבה, perhaps contracted from חביה, (God) has hidden (someone from danger)] (I Chr. 7:34). A descendant of Asher.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 242; cf. p. 178 n. B. T. Dahlberg JEHUCAL jĭ hū'kəl [יהוכל, Yahu is mighty] (Jer. 37:3); JUCAL jōō'kəl [יוכל] (Jer. 38:1). Son of Shelemiah; a courtier of Zedekiah.

JEHUD jē'hŭd [יהד, praise] (Josh. 19:45). A Danite village; identified with modern el-Yahudiyeh, eight miles SE of Jaffa. The LXX reads "Jazur" (modern Yazur) here—probably a variant reading, not a scribal error.

JEHUDI jĭ hū'dī [יהודו, Jew, Judean]. The prince, son of Nethaniah, who brought Jeremiah's scribe Baruch to the court and read his scroll to Jehoiakim (Jer. 36:14, 21, 23). His name (lit., "the Judahite") may be due to the fact that he was a naturalized Judean, since his great-grandfather was named Cushi (lit., "the Cushite"). J. M. Ward JEHUDIJAH jē'hə dī'jə. KJV translation of יהדיה (RSV JEWISH) in I Chr. 4:18. The word is not a proper name; it appears with the definite article and means "woman of Judah," to distinguish this one of Mered's wives from another, who was Egyptian.

JEHUEL. Alternate form of Jehiel.

JEHUSH. KJV alternate form of Jeush.

JEIEL jĭ ī'əl [יעיאל, God has healed or preserved (cf. Arab. w'j); Kethibh יעואל (I Chr. 9:35; 11:44; II Chr. 26:11)]; KJV JEHIEL jĭ hī'əl in I Chr. 9:35; 11:44. Alternately: OCHIEL ō kī'əl ['Οχίηλος] (I Esd. 1:9).

1. A chief of the tribe of Reuben (I Chr. 5:7).

2. Ancestor of the inhabitants of Gibeon and of King Saul (I Chr. 9:35; cf. 8:29, as emended in the RSV).

3. One of David's Mighty Men (I Chr. 11:44); possibly identical with 1 above.

4. A Levite represented both as gatekeeper and as musician (I Chr. 15:18, 21; 16:5*b*). Jehiah apparently stands for this name in I Chr. 15:24.

5. In I Chr. 16:5*a*, probably a copyist's error for Jaaziel.

6. A Levite of the sons of Asaph (II Chr. 20:14).

7. King Uzziah's secretary who prepared the military lists mentioned in II Chr. 26:11.

8. A chief of the Levites in the time of Josiah (II Chr. 35:9). Ochiel appears in the parallel I Esd. 1:9.

9. One of the Jews who put away their foreign wives in obedience to Ezra's decree (Ezra 10:43). The name is absent from the parallel I Esd. 9:35.

10. KJV form (correctly) of Jeuel 2-3.

Bibliography. W. Rudolph, Esra und Nehemia (1949), p. 78. B. T. Dahlberg

JEKABZEEL. Alternate form of Kabzeel.

JEKAMEAM jĕk'ə mē'əm [יקמעם, may 'am (divine kinsman) raise up] (I Chr. 23:19; 24:23). A Levite, son of Hebron.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 76-79, 200.

JEKAMIAH jĕk'ə mī'ə [יקמיה, may Yahu establish]; KJV JECAMIAH in I Chr. 3:18. 1. A Jerahmeelite (I Chr. 2:41).

2. One of the sons of King Jehoiachin (I Chr. 3:18).

JEKUTHIEL jĭ kū'thĭ əl [יקותיאל, may God nourish; cf. Arab. qāta] (I Chr. 4:18). An eponym; descendant of Judah through Mered.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 36, 203.

JEMIMAH jĭ mī'mə [ימימה, perhaps dove] (Job 42:14); KJV JEMIMA. The first of Job's three daughters born to him when his fortunes were restored.

JEMNAAN. KJV Apoc. form of Jabneel.

JEMUEL jĕm′yo͞o əl [יְמוּאֵל] (Gen. 46:10; Exod. 6:15). The first son of Simeon; same as NEMUEL.

JEPHTE jĕf′tĭ. Douay Version form of JEPHTHAH.

JEPHTHAH jĕf′thə [יִפְתָּח, he opens, see below; Ἰεφθάε (Heb. 11:32; KJV JEPHTHAE)]. Gileadite warrior who, as "ruler" or "judge," delivered Israel from the Ammonites, sacrificed his daughter in fulfilment of a vow, and defeated the Ephraimites (Judg. 11:1–12:7).

1. The name
2. Critical problems
3. Jephthah and the Ammonites
4. Jephthah and his daughter
5. Jephthah and the Ephraimites
6. Jephthah's significance

Bibliography

1. The name. The Hebrew name Jephthah appears also as a place name, IPHTAH (Josh. 15:43). It is a shortened form of IPHTAHEL, a place name meaning "El (God) opens (the womb)" or "El (God) frees (the captive)" (Josh. 19:14, 27); the same name also appears in Old South Arabic. Related are the Hebrew personal name PETHAHIAH, meaning "Yahweh has opened" (I Chr. 24:16; Ezra 10:23; Neh. 9:5; 11:24), and the name Japtih-Adda in the Tell El-Amarna Tablets.

2. Critical problems. The biblical story of Jephthah contains a number of puzzling literary and historical problems. It is preceded by a long introduction (Judg. 10:6-16) and includes what has been called a "great interpolation" (11:12-28). The introduction summarizes the period of the judges thus far in language and theology similar to that of the introduction to all the stories of the judges (2:6–3:6). It is probably by the same Deuteronomic editor. The faithless Israelites have fallen successively into the worship of seven foreign gods; hence angry Yahweh has sold them into the hands of seven foreign nations, until they have cried for deliverance. This introduction gives special attention to oppression by the Philistines and the Ammonites (11:7-9) and hence was evidently intended to introduce the subsequent stories of both Samson and Jephthah. See JUDGES, BOOK OF, § C2*i*.

The long interpolation, Jephthah's diplomatic negotiations with the enemy, mentions the Ammonites only in the introduction (11:12-15) and the conclusion (vss. 27-28). The body of the argument concerns the Moabites and is based upon the accounts in Num. 20–22, despite the fact that it was EHUD who had encountered the Moabites, and Jephthah's calling was to deliver Israel from the eighteen-year menace of the Ammonites (10:8, 17-18). Historical precedents cited are the Israelite forefathers' having by-passed Moab on their journey from Egypt to the Promised Land, having won the now-disputed territory N of Moab between the rivers Arnon and Jabbok from Amorite—not Moabite or Ammonite—King Sihon and held it for the intervening three hundred years (see JUDGES, BOOK OF, § E, on the chronology), and not having been challenged by war with Moabite King Balak at the time. The religious view taken is that, since the Israelite God, Yahweh, had long ago given them their territory, the invaders should confine themselves to the territory their own god had won for them. The god mentioned is CHEMOSH, national deity of the Moabites, not the Ammonites, and he is evidently respected by the writer as having power as the enemy's national deity.

Some interpreters explain this confusion between Moabite and Ammonite history as due to the fact that this interpolation was written perhaps in the seventh century B.C., when distinctions even between national deities were blurred because the Ammonites were taking over declining Moab's territory. See further AMMON; MOAB.

Because of the problems above indicated and other internal inconsistencies in the Jephthah story, some scholars have concluded that there were originally two very different narratives of Jephthah. In the earlier one, a continuation of the old J narrative of the Hexateuch, Jephthah was a Gileadite driven from home because of his illegitimate parentage, and he was the leader of a bandit gang. Recalled by the promise of rulership, he saved his people from the Ammonites, and subsequently massacred escaping Ephraimites at the fords of the Jordan. In the later narrative, a continuation of E, Jephthah, who was a respectable householder living in Mizpah, saved his people from the Moabites and sacrificed his daughter in fulfilment of a vow. With some differences in detail, some interpreters have seen the latter only as Jephthah's true story, the former as the otherwise lost story of another Gileadite, JAIR.

It is possible, however, with the exception of the interpolation in 11:12-28, to interpret the story of Jephthah as a fairly consistent early account of the first real defense of Transjordan territory and of the career of a historical Jephthah, centering in his charismatic leadership in defeating the Ammonites, his vow and its fulfilment, and his intertribal struggle with jealous Ephraimites.

3. Jephthah and the Ammonites. The Ammonites' territory was on the border of the Arabian Desert E of both Gilead and Moab, their capital Rabbath-ammon (modern Amman). Jephthah's call was in response to their pushing W in perhaps the early eleventh century B.C.

The selection of Jephthah is the story of crisis-motivated popular demand that an obviously God-empowered leader become practical dictator, despite his low family background (Judg. 10:17–11:11). Because Jephthah's mother was a harlot, whose son therefore could not share in any family inheritance, Jephthah had been banished from home, probably with clan approval (11:1, 7). His father may have been unknown (the language of 11:1*b*-3*a* and the concept of the territory Gilead as a personal name are probably from a late editor). As leader of an outlaw band Jephthah conducted successful raiding parties from his center at TOB, perhaps some fifteen miles E of Ramoth-gilead, the location later of Syrian allies of the enemy Ammonites (cf. Jephthah's outlaw activities, including a possible league with allies of Ammon, with those of David and his league with enemy Philistines: I Sam. 21:10–22:2; 28:1-2; 29; II Sam. 10:6-8).

In the crisis Jephthah was offered the position of "chief" or "ruler" (קָצִין, RSV "leader"; Judg. 11:6, 11; Arabic "one who decides judicially"; used only here in Judges, but elsewhere in Josh. 10:24; Prov. 6:7; 25:15; Isa. 1:10; 3:6-7; 22:3; Dan. 11:18; Mic. 3:1, 9). When his mission was successfully accomplished, his position was to be permanent, but he is later recorded as having been judge only six years before his death and burial in his Gileadite city (Judg. 12:7).

At a sacred place, Mizpah in Gilead (site unknown), Jephthah was consecrated in a solemn ceremony of holy words: "The Lord was witness" (lit., "hearer"); all the words were spoken "before the LORD" (11:10-11). Immediately thereafter (if, as seems likely, vs. 29 is the sequel of vs. 11), Jephthah's charismatic leadership became clear, for "the spirit of the LORD came upon Jephthah" (vs. 29; exactly the language used of Othniel in 3:10; cf. Ehud and Gideon).

The named sites of the routes of Jephthah's collection of troops from Gilead and E Jordan Manasseh (vs. 29) and of his battles, probably to the E, are unknown. But because of his decisive victory over the Ammonites, they caused no more trouble until the days of Saul (I Sam. 11).

4. Jephthah and his daughter. The central concern in the story of Jephthah is his vow and its fulfilment, as the explanation of an old Israelite annual four-day feast of lamentation (Judg. 11:30-31, 34-40). Jephthah's vow, made perhaps at his consecration, was not rash, but deliberate. Expecting great things of Yahweh, he promised his best in return, human sacrifice. Such sacrifice was not infrequent in Israel; it was usually made as a desperate, last-resort measure of securing divine favor (cf. II Kings 16:3; 17:17; 21:6; Jer. 7:31; Mic. 6:7; see SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS § B4). Jephthah's bitter sorrow lay in the fact that God did not intervene (as with Abraham in Gen. 22), perhaps by letting only a slave be the first to come forth from his house. This Jephthah must have hoped, for the sacrifice had been postponed until after victory; it was not the prelude to battle. Instead of a slave, God took his "absolutely only child" (as vs. 34 emphasizes) when she welcomed her father, as would be expected, by the custom begun by Miriam at the Exodus from Egypt (Exod. 15:20-21; cf. I Sam. 18:6-7). Unlike the gory details of Aeschylus' portrayal of the sacrifice of Agamemnon's daughter Iphigenia, the Hebrew storyteller with fine sensitivity shows Jephthah's bitter grief and his daughter's courageous self-denial, born of respect for her father's faith, and then leaves the outcome to the reader's imagination.

On the plane of social custom the emphasis upon Jephthah's daughter's virginity points up the fact that she had neither husband nor father of her child to rescue her from her father's vow. That she was not sacrificed but became founder of an order of perpetual virgins is a medieval idea. On the plane of folk tale or cult legend the story and its resultant custom were related to the prevalent Near Eastern fertility cults. In one form of the cult there were "women weeping for Tammuz" (Ezek. 8:14), dead Babylonian god of vegetation who had been killed at the onset of the dry season by his enemies and was then sought in the underworld by his wife, Ishtar (see TAMMUZ; cf. Egyptian Osiris and Isis, Canaanite Baal or Adonis and Ashtarte). Such women weepers were the "companions" (Judg. 11:37-38; cf. "my love" in Song of S. 1:9) who accompanied Jephthah's daughter on her two-month mountain vigil. Possibly in this form of the nature-worship the weeping was over the feared perpetual virginity of Ishtar or Ashtarte, Mother Earth—hence no agricultural crops in the foreseeable future.

5. Jephthah and the Ephraimites. Jephthah's conflict with the Ephraimites could have been a private feud between a few individuals, which in the subsequent telling was blown up to become a tribal affair (Judg. 12:1-6). Perhaps a few "fugitives of Ephraim" (vs. 4), onetime W Jordan Ephraimites now living as colonists in Gilead, incensed because they did not feel included, contrary to his intent, in Jephthah's call to battle, made trouble. GIDEON had dealt with a similar situation by persuasion and flattery (Judg. 8:1-3). Not so Jephthah. In the subsequent struggle, according to the exaggerated figures, 42,000 Ephraimites trying to return to their W Jordan homeland were massacred when detected, because of their inability to pronounce SHIBBOLETH.

6. Jephthah's significance. Jephthah's victories stopped Ammonite invasions until the days of Saul, some decades later. His massacre of Ephraimites, only an incident in the intertribal conflict with that haughty people (see EPHRAIM 1), gives the Hebrew student evidence of early dialect differences among the Israelites. Religiously Jephthah's career was distinguished by his charismatic adventuring and success as evidence of divine favor; and his indomitable will, revealed in his overcoming personal grief and sacrificing his daughter, was memorable in establishing an Israelite custom. As one of the chief "judges" he was remembered as one of Yahweh's chief deliverers of his people (I Sam. 12:11) and celebrated by the author of the NT Letter to the Hebrews as one of the heroes of faith (Heb. 11:32).

Bibliography. G. F. Moore, Judges, ICC (1895), pp. 275-310. K. Tallqvist, Assyrian Personal Names (1914), p. 92. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 28-29, 179, 200. C. F. Burney, Judges (1930), pp. 293-334. G. Ryckmans, Les noms propres sud-sémitiques, I-III (1934-35), 74. J. Pedersen, Israel: Its Life and Culture, I-II (1926), 44-45, 216, 218-19, 224, 317; III-IV (1940), 34, 37-38, 325-27, 381, 450, 703. H. M. Orlinsky, "Critical Notes on Gen. 39:14, 17; Judg. 11:37," JBL, LXI (1942), 92-97. C. A. Simpson, Composition of the Book of Judges (1957), pp. 45-53, 99-100, 112-13, 128-29, 142-45. M. Noth, History of Israel (1958), pp. 61, 157-59.

C. F. KRAFT

JEPHUNNEH jĭ fŭn′ə [יפנה, may he (God) turn(?) or turned(?)]. 1. The father of Caleb (Num. 13:6; 14:6, 30, 38; 26:65; 32:12; 34:19; Deut. 1:36; Josh. 14:6, 13-14; 15:13; 21:12; I Chr. 4:15; 6:56). Jephunneh is identified as a member of the tribe of Judah and, on occasion, as a Kenizzite (e.g., Num. 32:12).

2. Son of Jether; included in the genealogy of the tribe of Asher (I Chr. 7:38).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 28, 199.

R. F. JOHNSON

JERAH jĭr ə [ירח, moon] (Gen. 10:26; I Chr. 1:20). A son of Joktan, and hence probably the name of an Arabian locality. Since it is mentioned next to Hazarmaweth (Hadramaut), it was probably located on the Mahra coast, where a city called Jerakon Kome is mentioned by Ptolemy. S. COHEN

JERAHMEEL jĭ rä′mĭ əl [ירחמאל, may El (the deity) have compassion]; JERAHMEELITES —ə līts. Apoc. form: JEREMIEL jĭ rĕm′ĭ əl [Ἰερεμιήλ] (II Esd. 4:36); KJV URIEL yo͝or′ĭ əl. 1. A Semitic tribe first mentioned as living in S Judah, where David came into contact with them during his forays out of Ziklag, while he was a fugitive from Saul (I Sam. 27:10; 30:29). Only in the postexilic period is Jerahmeel listed as a Hebrew clan, of the tribe of Judah (I Chr. 2:9, 25-27, 33, 42; cf. vss. 3-5). It is believed that this clan, along with others such as the Calebites (cf. 2:9, 18; Chelubai= Caleb), was gradually forced northward after 586 B.C. by Edomite incursions from the S and the E, until it attached itself to the Jewish communities around Jerusalem. See bibliography.

2. A Levite; son of a certain Kish (not Saul's father; I Chr. 24:29).

3. An officer under King Jehoiakim (ca. 609-598 B.C.) and contemporary with the prophet Jeremiah (Jer. 36:26). Although a "son of the king" (not KJV "Hammelech," which only transliterates the Hebrew phrase, "the king"), he can scarcely be a son of Jehoiakim if the latter was only thirty years old at the time (cf. II Kings 23:36; Jer. 36:9). He was perhaps the king's brother or had some other relation to royalty.

4. The archangel Jeremiel (also Ramiel or Remiel), appointed over the resurrection (I Enoch 20:8; cf. II Esd. 4:36; II Bar. 55:3). See bibliography.

Bibliography. On the Jerahmeelite clan, see: W. O. E. Oesterley and T. H. Robinson, A History of Israel (1932), I, 101, 135; II, 55. W. A. L. Elmslie, Exegesis of I Chronicles, IB, III (1954), 353. For a radical theory in this connection that has become a curiosity in the history of biblical criticism, see T. K. Cheyne, "Jerahmeel," section 4, Encyclopaedia Biblica (1901), vol. II, cols. 2365-66.

On Jeremiel, see R. H. Charles, "Enoch," and G. H. Box, "IV Esdras," in R. H. Charles, ed., The Apoc. and Pseudep. of the OT (1913), II, 512, 567 (note 36).

See also K. Kohler, "Angelology," The Jewish Encyclopedia, I (1901), 590. B. T. DAHLBERG

JERASH jĕr′ăsh. Modern Arabic name of GERASA.

JERECHUS jĕr′ə kəs. KJV Apoc. form of JERICHO.

JERED jĭr′ĕd [ירד, rose]. 1. An eponym; a descendant of Judah through Mered (I Chr. 4:18).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 231.

2. KJV form of JARED.

JEREMAI jĕr′ə mī [ירמי, perhaps fat one, from Arab. warima; Apoc. Ἱερεμιας] (Ezra 10:33; I Esd. 9:34); KJV Apoc. JEREMIAS jĕr′ə mī′əs. One of those compelled by Ezra to give up their foreign wives.

JEREMIAH jĕr′ə mī′ə [ירמיה, ירמיהו, perhaps may Yahu loosen (the womb), or may Yahu lift up; Ἱερεμίας]; KJV JEREMIAS —əs in Ecclus. 49:6; Matt. 16:14; JEREMY —mĭ in I Esdras; Matt. 2: 17; 27:9. 1. One of the "Mighty Men" who joined David at Ziklag (I Chr. 12:4—H 12:5).

2. Another warrior, a Gadite, who joined David at Ziklag (I Chr. 12:10).

3. A third warrior, also a Gadite, who joined David at Ziklag (I Chr. 12:13).

4. A Manassite, head of a father's house (I Chr. 5:24).

5. The father of Hamutal, wife of King Josiah and mother of King Jehoahaz (II Kings 23:31) and King Zedekiah (24:18).

6. See JEREMIAH THE PROPHET.

7. The father of Jaazaniah, a Rechabite contemporaneous with Jeremiah the prophet (Jer. 35:3).

8. A priest who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:1); a priestly house is also represented by this name (vs. 12).

9. One of the priests signatory to the covenant of Ezra (Neh. 10:2).

10. One of the princes of Judah among those officiating at the dedication of the Jerusalem wall under Nehemiah (Neh. 12:34).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 36, 201. B. T. DAHLBERG

JEREMIAH, LAMENTATIONS OF. See LAMENTATIONS, BOOK OF.

JEREMIAH, LETTER OF. A letter purporting to be written by Jeremiah to the exiles of Judea at the time of their deportation to Babylon by Nebuchadrezzar and warning them of the length of their captivity and of the danger of apostasy. It is rambling and fragmentary and difficult to analyze because of its illogical and repetitious structure. In some Greek MSS and in the KJV it follows Baruch, without a break, as though it were the sixth chapter of Baruch.

The Letter of Jeremiah, or Jeremy, as it is sometimes called, is not a letter, nor was it written by Jeremiah. The unknown author, who lived much later than the prophet, was influenced by Jeremiah's letter to the exiles of 597 (Jer. 29:1-23) to write this so-called letter. However, where Jeremiah had exhorted the exiles to mistrust the false prophets in their midst, the so-called Jeremiah went further and warned the exiles to beware lest they be attracted by the Babylonian gods, because these idols had no power or life.

Jeremiah addresses his letter "to those who were to be led captive to Babylon by the king of the Babylonians, to make known unto them in accordance with what had been commanded to him by God" (vs. 1). The people are not yet in exile, and the name of Jeremiah does not even occur in the letter itself. This work is more of a sermon than a letter. After an Introduction (vss. 1-7), the rest of the sermon of seventy-three verses is divided into ten parts, each of which reiterates the lifelessness of wooden and metal images and their uselessness as objects of worship. There is no logic or order in the whole work, and it is tiresomely repetitious, but the homily is broken up into portions by a refrain repeated eleven times, emphasizing his exhortation: "Thereby they are known not to be gods; therefore, fear them not" (vss. 16, 23, 29, 30, 40, 44, 49, 52, 54, 56, 69).

The author mentions only two religious practices characteristic of Babylonia, the mourning for dying gods, like Tammuz in vss. 31-32—G 30-31, and the maiden's sacrifice (vs. 43). The letter was almost certainly inspired by Isa. 44:9-20; Jer. 10:1-16. These prophets were denouncing Gentile idolaters, but they also intended to show their own people the vileness of idolatrous practice and to warn them against it. This was the sole purpose of this anonymous writer.

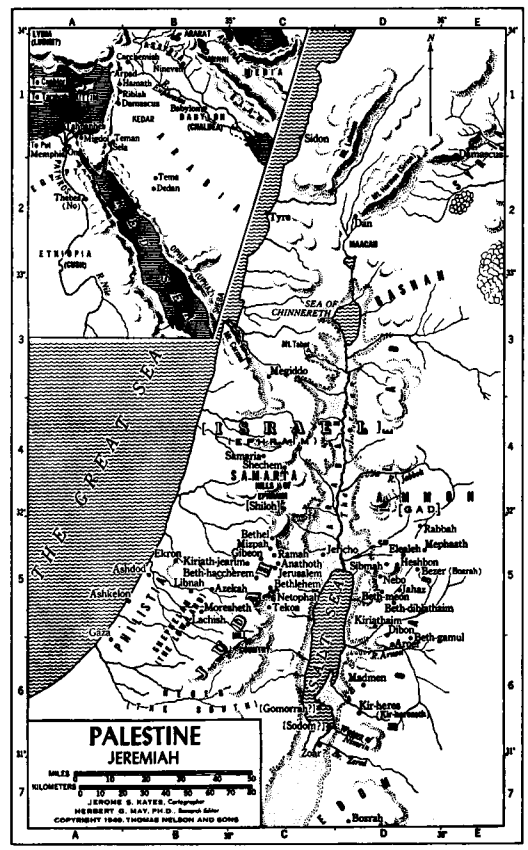
The exact date is difficult to determine. Backsliding from faith was a frequent fact in Israel during times of peace. It is well known that many Jews were attracted to alien cults throughout the Greek period, 300 B.C. onward, so that the warning in the letter might have been uttered any time during this period. It might have been written in the time of John Hyrcanus or a hundred years later. The reference in vs. 3: "So when ye come into Babylon ye shall remain for . . . seven generations," indicates, according to one scholar, a date ca. 306 B.C. or some thirty years after the arrival of Alexander in Babylon. Another scholar places the date near the end of the second century B.C.



Many scholars are of the opinion that the letter was originally written in Greek, but this is improbable if the date at the end of the fourth century is accepted. Others are of the opinion that Hebrew is the original language, finding throughout peculiarities which suggest translation from a Hebrew original; and still others hold to the theory of an Aramaic original. C. C. Torrey (see bibliography) defends this view. He believes that in II Macc. 2:1-2 the reference to instruction given by the prophet Jeremiah to "those who were being deported" and the exhortation not "to be led astray in their thoughts upon seeing the gold and silver statues and their adornment," are undoubtedly references to this letter. The passage in II Maccabees is in an Aramaic letter sent by the authorities in Jerusalem to the Jews in the year 124 B.C.; and this, Torrey believes, shows that the letter, in its original Aramaic form, was held in high esteem.

Bibliography. O. F. Fritzsche, Handbuch zu der Apocrypha (1851), p. 206; R. H. Charles, Apoc. and Pseudep. (1913); W. O. E. Oesterley, Books of the Apoc. (1914); H. St. J. Thackeray, Some Aspects of the Greek OT (1927); C. C. Torrey, The Apocryphal Literature (1945); R. H. Pfeiffer, History of NT Times with Introduction to the Apoc. (1949); S. Tedesche and S. Zeitlin, I and II Maccabees (1950). S. TEDESCHE

JEREMIAH THE PROPHET. One of the major prophets, whose activity spans the period 626–ca. 580 B.C. and whose book is second in the canonical order of the Prophets.

A. The man and his times
  1. The age of Jeremiah
    a. The Near East
    b. Judah
  2. Personality of the prophet
B. Life and ministry
  1. 626-621
  2. From the reformation of 621 to the death of Josiah
  3. From 609 to the Battle of Carchemish
  4. From Carchemish to the first deportation in 598
  5. From 598 to the fall of Jerusalem in 587
C. Theology
  1. The word of God
  2. Knowledge of God
  3. Yahweh's activity
    a. In the life of the prophet
    b. In the life of the people
    c. In the history of nations
    d. In the universe
  4. Sin and judgment; repentance and forgiveness
  5. Eschatology
D. The book
  1. General character
  2. Major divisions of the book
  3. Composition
  4. The Baruch Scroll
  5. Prophecies against Judah and Jerusalem
  6. The biographical narratives
  7. The Deuteronomic additions
  8. The Little Book of Comfort
  9. The oracles against the nations
  10. Historical appendix
  11. Text

Bibliography

PALESTINE
JEREMIAH
THE GREAT SEA
SEA OF CHINNERETH
JORDAN
Sidon
Tyre
Megiddo
Samaria
Shiloh
Bethel
Mizpah
Gibeon
Ramah
Anathoth
Jericho Jerusalem
Bethlehem
Hebron
Ashdod
Ekron
Gaza
Ashkelon
Libnah
Lachish
Moresheth
Tekoa
Kiriath-jearim
Beth-haccherem
Azekah
Netophah
Beth-diblathaim
Kiriathaim
Dibon
Beth-gamul
Ar
Medeba
Kir-heres
Zoar
Bozrah
(Gomorrah)
(Sodom)
Dan
Rabbah
Mephaath
Heshbon
Bezer
Jahaz
Elealeh
Nebo
Ai
Michmash
Ataroth
Sibmah
Aroer
Madmen
Ethiopia
Egypt
Babylon Nineveh
Carchemish
Damascus
Kedar
Dedan
Tema
Thebes (No)
Memphis
Migdol
Zoan
Pithom
Succoth
Arpad
Hamath
Riblah
Mt. Tabor
Mt. Gilboa
Shechem
Samaria
Gilead
Ammon
Moab
Edom
Judah
Israel
Philistia
Manasseh
Ephraim
Gad
Reuben
Simeon
Benjamin
Dan
Naphtali
Zebulun
Issachar
Asher
Gennesaret
Jordan R.
Arnon R.
Zered R.
Kishon R.
Brook Besor
Wilderness of Judah Wilderness of Zin
Wilderness of Paran
Wilderness of Kadesh
Wilderness of Shur
Wilderness of Sin
Wilderness of Sinai

the Medes under Cyaxares intervened. In 614 they captured Asshur. The Chaldeans, arriving too late to aid in the attack, forged an alliance with them, and the allies, joined by the Umman-manda, besieged Nineveh. The city fell in 612. Meanwhile Egypt, under Psammetichus (663-609), came to the support of the Assyrian army at Harran, but the city was taken in 610. The next year NECO (609-593), successor to Psammetichus, went to relieve the hard-pressed Assyrians. At Megiddo he met Josiah, king of Judah, whom he put to death. He arrived too late to be of help to his Assyrian ally, however, for the Chaldeans were already in command. The issue between Chaldea and Egypt was settled in 605 in the important Battle of Carchemish, where NEBUCHADREZZAR, son of Nabopolassar, won a decisive victory. "At that time," the Chronicle reports, "Nebuchadrezzar conquered the whole of Hatti." The future of the Near East lay with Chaldea until the rise of Cyrus a half century later.

b. Judah. Manasseh's long reign of fifty-five years (687-642; see MANASSEH) was one of almost complete subservience to Assyria. His son Amon (see AMON 1), after a reign of two years (642-640), was assassinated in an anti-Assyrian coup. He was in turn succeeded by JOSIAH, a child of eight years (640-609). According to the Chronicler (II Chr. 34:3), while still a youth "he began to seek the God of David his father; and in the twelfth year began to purge Judah and Jerusalem" of the syncretistic cults. This may preserve an authentic reminiscence, for it is difficult to believe that the reformation was suddenly initiated in 621 as the consequence of the discovery of the Book of the Law. Moreover, it seems likely that it was the result of the labors of the anti-Assyrian party long active underground during Manasseh's reign. It is singular that the Chronicler's date for the beginning of the reforms coincides with the year of the Chaldean revolt. Josiah's reformation gave notice that Judah's vassalage was at an end. His designs were national and political as well as religious. In keeping with contemporary aspirations, he sought to reestablish the kingdom of David. It is probable, as Alt (see bibliography) and Noth (see bibliography) have shown, that Josh. 15:21-62; 18:21-28 reflect the boundaries of the new United Kingdom. But the reformation described in II Kings 23:1-25, probably an extract from the royal annals, also sought to return Israel to her ancient heritage in the old Shechemite amphictyony. The Covenant Book, contained within the book of Deuteronomy, rested on the foundations of Mosaic religion, but it was a greatly expanded version of that faith, expressed in the categories, language, and literary style of the seventh century B.C.

In 609, Neco went to the aid of the dying Assyria. Josiah met him at Megiddo, according to the Chronicler with a military force (II Chr. 35:20-24); if so, his designs may have been to impede the Egyptian advance and thus to render support to Chaldea. But the venture ended disastrously, for Josiah was slain. Meanwhile Jehoahaz, Josiah's second son, was anointed king of Judah. Neco forthwith summoned him to Riblah and made his elder brother king, assigning him the regnal name of JEHOIAKIM (609-598). Three years after the fall of Carchemish in 605, the Judean king withheld tribute, and bands of marauding Chaldeans, Syrians, Moabites, and Ammonites invaded the land (II Kings 24:2). Again in 598, Jehoiakim refused tribute; this time Jerusalem was subjected to terrible siege. Many of its foremost citizens and skilled artisans were carried into exile. JEHOIACHIN, who had meanwhile ascended the throne, was carried to Babylon, where he received the preferential treatment of a captive monarch. The following years were hectic and confused. Judah was split between pro-Chaldean and pro-Egyptian factions. The book of Jeremiah presents a vivid picture of this period. The prophet was the victim of the nationalistic hysteria of those who favored revolt. In 588 the Chaldean army laid siege to Jerusalem, and on the ninth of Ab, a year and a half later, entered the city. The temple was destroyed, and the kingdom of Judah came to a disastrous end. Zedekiah (598-587; see ZEDEKIAH, KING OF JUDAH) was blinded and sent to Babylon as a captive of war. In contrast to the relatively merciful treatment accorded her in 597, Judah was now made a Babylonian province with Gedaliah of the family of Shaphan as its governor.

See also ASSYRIA AND BABYLONIA; ISRAEL, HISTORY OF.

2. Personality of the prophet. Not only is the age of Jeremiah extraordinarily well documented with a great diversity of literary materials, but the life of the man, who, more than any other, was called to speak to that age, is richer in the variety of its literary witnesses than that of any other of the prophets of ancient Israel; indeed, the sources for his biography and prophetic career are not only more extensive in their range but also more revealing and searching in their portrait of the man. Already in his call we can discern the beginning of those tensions which were to disturb him throughout his life. His poetry, of which we have a substantial deposit, possesses a lyrical quality, an afflatus and emotional power, a wealth of imagery, a sensuousness and passionateness, a revelation of changing moods and tempers, unrivaled in the records of Semitic antiquity. His self-disclosures in the so-called "confessions" are the most intimate and unglossed, the most inward and authentic, of any that have been preserved to us from ancient times; in this respect Jeremiah comes closer to Paul, Augustine, and Luther than any other of the OT prophets. So much a part of him is this preoccupation with the interior life that personal ejaculations and outcries intrude upon his prophecies, especially in the war poems (4:10, 19-21, 23-26), but also elsewhere (16:19-20; cf. 8:18–9:2—H 8:18–9:1). But alongside the prophet's own poetic effusions lie long prose narratives, straightforward and unembellished, perhaps by his amanuensis Baruch, which constitute a second major source for our knowledge of the man. Finally, there is a substantial number of passages bearing a strong Deuteronomic stamp, which supplement what Jeremiah has to tell us about himself. See § D below.

The portrait which emerges from an examination of these literary records is one of a very sensitive man, quickly responsive to the vicissitudes of life about him, with a capacity to set down in words all that he observed and felt and suffered, all that had come to him from Yahweh, however much they might offend his tendencies toward self-centeredness and pride. To the world of nature, in all its varied manifestations, he was sensitive and percipient: the blossoming of the almond in early spring (1:11-12); the hot air of the sirocco (4:11); the migratory impulse of the stork and the times of the turtledove, swallow, and crane (8:7); the fierce, inchoate drive of the young camel and the sexual lust of the wild ass (2:23-24); and even the pathos of the heavens and the earth (2:12; 4:23-26, 28). Throughout his life he suffered the torment of being set apart from others: from his fellow countrymen; from the various classes of priests, prophets, and statesmen; from the members of his own family (12:6); and from all who participated in the everyday pleasures of life. He was denied the comfort and joy of wife and family (16:1-2). Yet he was sustained by an awareness of God's presence with him, inconstant and fleeting though it sometimes was (1:8, 19; 14:8-9; 15:20), of Yahweh's contending in his behalf like a dread warrior (20:11), of the power of the divine word (1:9; 15:16, 19; 20:8-9; 23:29); and by memories of Israel's election-covenant past (2:2*b*-3). Like Moses he was called to be God's mouth (15:19). Yet he was sore afflicted by a sense of alienation from God (14:8-9; 15:18; 17:17; 20:7). It was this sensitive and passionate man who was called to be a prophet to the nations (1:5); an intercessor for the people, yet denied this role when he most desired it (11:14; 14:11-12); a gleaner in the vineyard (6:9); a refiner and tester (6:27-30); an Israelite Cassandra discredited in an age of peril; a speaker of parables and himself a parable (13:1-11; 18:1-3; 19:1-2, 10-11); a "fortified city, an iron pillar, and bronze walls, against the whole land" (1:18; 15:20). Jeremiah addresses his own people during the four decades before the Chaldean conquest of 587 B.C. with a directness and power unmatched by any of his contemporaries; yet it was he more than any other who gave expression to a piety, faith, and hope, and indeed a theology, which made it possible for Judah to survive the disasters of the nation's fall, the destruction of the temple, and the end of the Davidic dynasty.

B. LIFE AND MINISTRY. Jeremiah was born in the village of Anathoth, modern Ras el-Kharubbeh, ca. two miles NE of Jerusalem, the son of Hilkiah, a priest, possibly a descendant of Abiathar, whom Solomon expelled to Anathoth shortly after his accession to the throne (I Kings 2:26). The town belonged to the tribe of Benjamin, for which Jeremiah seems to have had special concern and affection (Jer. 6:1; 11:18-23; 31:15). While we are not informed concerning his early years, it is apparent that he was reared in the traditions of his fathers. Even in his earliest poems he reveals a firm grasp of the election-covenant faith of the Mosaic age, akin to Hosea's understanding of it and particularly as it was to be revealed in the Deuteronomic Book of the Covenant a few years later. His prophetic predecessors left a deep impression upon him, above all Hosea, who prophesied in the turbulent closing years of the N kingdom. He had experienced the apostasies of Manasseh's reign, and his revulsion to its syncretistic practices is reflected in his earliest oracles.

The prophet's call came in the year 626 B.C. How old he was at the time we do not know, but he was probably only a youth (1:6). The report of the call may well come from a later period in his life; like Isaiah's vision, it reflects, not only a profound awareness of the significance of his mission, but also a realization that he is called to prophesy to the nations. Like Moses, he shrinks from the burden that is laid on his shoulders, but the power of the divine word overcomes him (1:9). His divine commission is > over nations and over kingdoms, > to pluck up and to break down, > to destroy and to overthrow,

> to build and to plant.

Two visions follow the narrative of the call. The first is of an almond rod (שקד), which through paronomasia signifies God's watching (שקד) over his word to bring it to fruition (1:11-12). In the second (1:13-19) Jeremiah sees a boiling caldron "facing away from the north." This is symbolic of the imminent coming of the foe from the N. The terrible invasion is God's judgment against Judah for her apostasy to other gods.

The prophetic ministry of Jeremiah falls into the following periods:

a) From his call to the reformation of 621
b) From the reformation to the death of Josiah (609)
c) From 609 to the Battle of Carchemish (605)
d) From Carchemish to the first deportation (598)
e) From 598 to the destruction of Jerusalem (587)

1. 626-621. Jeremiah's prophetic activity during this period is directed to two major concerns: (a) the prevailing religious corruption of the time, the seductive lure of the nature cults, and Judah's spiritual insensateness; and (b) the imminent invasion of the foe from the N. Yahweh remembers Israel's early devotion (חסד), her love (אהבה) as a bride, the years of wandering in the wilderness when she covenanted with him to be his people (2:2-3). But now an appalling thing has happened: Israel has exchanged her God for other gods. The fathers, priests, rulers, and prophets have all forsaken Yahweh. The people engage in the licentious rites of the fertility cults (2:20, 27; 3:2-3); some are attracted by Egypt, others by Assyria (2:18).

> Where are your gods > that you made for yourself?

Jeremiah exclaims (2:28). So he issues an urgent plea for Judah to turn from her gross infidelity and to return to Yahweh (3:1, 12, 14, 20, 22; 4:1). The influence of Hosea upon the young prophet is apparent in these oracles. The central theme of harlotry is the same in both, as is the emphasis upon the father-son relation, the bridal days in the wilderness, the lure of Egypt and Assyria, but more especially Yahweh's covenant with his people, the bond sealed in steadfast or covenantal love (חסד).

In the poems on the foe from the N, Jeremiah achieves the loftiest height of lyrical expression. Much controversy has raged over the identity of this foe. Formerly, on the basis of the account in Herodotus (I.103-5), it was identified with the SCYTHIANS from the region beyond the Caucasus, perhaps the Umman-manda of the cuneiform inscriptions. But this view has been subjected to trenchant attack by

F. Wilke (see bibliography) and has been rejected by many modern scholars. Others have thought of the Chaldeans and Medes who destroyed Nineveh in 612; still others of the Chaldeans (i.e., Neo-Babylonians) alone. But the latter view demands altering the text of 1:2 (cf. 25:3; 36:2) from the "thirteenth year" to the "twenty-third year." It is perhaps better to hold that the reference was originally to the Scythians, but that it was altered by Jeremiah himself in the light of later events, when the invasion came from the Babylonians. In these poems we see Jeremiah torn and at times even convulsed by Yahweh's revelation to him that the imminent war is his judgment upon Judah, on the one hand, and by his passionate concern for his own people, on the other (4:19-20). But what is more, the mind of the prophet has become a field of battle, where disaster follows hard upon disaster; his own writhing is the interior psychological counterpart of the awful events which are impending. For him they are already happening.

2. From the reformation of 621 to the death of Josiah. There was much in the reformation of JOSIAH (see § A1*b above*) of which the prophet might approve: the return to the election-covenant faith of the Mosaic age and the Shechemite amphictyony, the stress upon the holy people and their unique relation to Yahweh, the divine love for Israel and the moving appeal for a responding love on the part of Israel, the extirpation of all Canaanite and Assyrian worship, the call to responsibility, and the humanitarian requirements. But unfortunately it is uncertain whether we have any record at all of Jeremiah's activity during the years following the reformation. It may be, however, that ch. 11 gives an authentic account of Jeremiah's early support of the movement. That the language contains much Deuteronomic phraseology is unquestionable, but this need not militate against its historicity. We may well believe, not merely that Jeremiah gave his approval to the great reforming movement, but that at the command of Yahweh he proclaimed its words in Jerusalem, urging the people to obey them. More than this we do not know; the period, so far as our record goes, seems to be one of complete silence. It may well have been a time of relative peace for Judah despite the fateful struggle going on in Mesopotamia, a period in which the king and his supporters were able to implement their national goals and to resuscitate the ebbing covenantal faith of Sinai and Shechem. If so, it was to receive a terrible reversal in the tragic death of the king at Megiddo (609). When Jehoahaz was taken to Riblah some three months later, Jeremiah indited a lament:

> Weep not for him who is dead,
> nor bemoan him;
> but weep bitterly for him who goes away, > for he shall return no more > to see his native land.

3. From 609 to the Battle of Carchemish. It was a dark hour for Judah, but Jehoiakim was not the man to meet it. At the beginning of his reign, possibly on the occasion of his coronation (26:1), Jeremiah went to the temple at the command of Yahweh to deliver a sermon against the excessive trust in the temple as a source of deliverance in this time of crisis. The reformation had sought to centralize worship there and had bred a superstitious trust in its efficacy. But the place in and of itself was no harbor of refuge; Yahweh is present to those whose lives are in conformity with his will and purpose: "Amend your ways and your doings, and I will let you dwell in this place" (7:3). When those who come to worship in the temple violate all the requirements of the covenant, making it a veritable den of robbers, it will suffer the fate of Shiloh in the time of Eli and Samuel (7:1-15).

The address caused consternation among the temple priests and prophets, and they pronounced their verdict upon the prophet: "You shall die." The princes came to the New Gate of the temple, and there Jeremiah was tried. He defended himself by saying that he had spoken at the behest of God, then repeated the substance of his address and warned them of the evil consequences upon themselves if he was put to death. The princes and the people rose to the prophet's defense, accepting his word that he had spoken in the name of Yahweh and invoking the instance of the prophet Micah in the eighth century, who had prophesied in very similar terms (Mic. 3:12). The verdict is not given, but Ahikam the son of Shaphan took Jeremiah under his protection (ch. 26). Uriah, another prophet, who had prophesied in words like Jeremiah's, fled to Egypt, but was returned to Jerusalem, where he was put to death by Jehoiakim (vss. 20-23).

Jehoiakim proved to be an unscrupulous and oppressive monarch, self-seeking and luxury-loving. The reforming movement suffered a serious reversal during his reign (7:17-19, 30-31; 11:9-13). Jeremiah's proclamations in its support were deeply resented, especially by his townsmen at Anathoth, who sought to dispose of him (11:18-23). His temple address shows very clearly, however, that he had begun by this time to have serious reservations concerning popular attitudes toward the reformation, for the people were exaggerating the value of purely cultic acts to the exclusion of the ethical imperatives which the Book of the Covenant had so strongly emphasized. If Jeremiah opposed the excessive trust in the temple as merely a spatial refuge, he was equally outspoken concerning the efficacy of sacrificial offerings solely as cultic acts (6:20; 7:21-24; 11:15-16; 17:1).

Again and again he exhorted his countrymen to obedience (7:23-29; 22:1-5), and persisted in his call to repentance and change of heart (8:4-7; 9:5), although he came to feel that their moral sense had become so atrophied that repentance was impossible (8:4-7). "They do not know me," is the judgment that sounds again and again. Jeremiah sought to intercede for his people, but so grievous was their insensateness that Yahweh forbade him (7:16; 11:14; 14:11-12; cf. 15:1). Against Jehoiakim he launched a bitter invective, detailing his enormities and contrasting them with the exemplary conduct of Josiah, his father (22:13-17), and followed it with a sinister lament: "With the burial of an ass he shall be buried" (vss. 18*b*-19).

The fall of Carchemish to Nebuchadrezzar in 605 seems to have registered a profound effect upon the prophet. It was in that year that he was commanded by Yahweh to transcribe all his prophecies from the beginning of his prophetic ministry in 626. He himself was debarred from the temple precincts, doubtless because of such episodes as the temple discourse, and Baruch was ordered to read the scroll on a great national day of fasting before all the people. So serious was the indictment that it was called to the king's attention. The princes saw to it that Baruch and Jeremiah went into hiding, but Jehudi was commanded to read the scroll to the king in the winter house where fire was burning in the brazier. As he completed three or four columns, the king would cut them from the scroll with a penknife and cast them into the blaze. Jeremiah was commanded to dictate his prophecies once more. He did so, but added to them "many similar words," including a denunciation of Jehoiakim's act of sacrilege and a pronouncement of dire punishment (ch. 36). A vivid poem celebrating the overthrow of Egypt at Carchemish, reminiscent of the war poetry of 4:5–6:30, is given in Jer. 46:3-12. It may well be Jeremiah's own composition.

It was probably about this time that the prophet suffered another humiliation. Returning from Tophet, where he had been prophesying, he stood in the court of the temple and proclaimed an oracle of imminent doom upon Jerusalem. When Pashhur the priest heard it, he beat the prophet, put him in stocks in the upper Benjamin Gate of the temple, and left him there for the night. Jeremiah was prepared: he delivered an even more terrible indictment of Pashhur and accompanied it with his original invective (19:14–20:6). Such experiences as these did not leave Jeremiah unscathed; he was deeply wounded by them, and the interior self-disclosures which are interspersed in his book follow naturally upon this period of rejection and contumely.

4. From Carchemish to the first deportation in 598. As the fateful year of 626 had marked the beginning of Jeremiah's prophetic career, the year of the fall of Carchemish (605) seems to have marked the beginning of a new period of his activity. It is likely that it is to this time that we are to assign his interior dialogical encounters with Yahweh, the so-called "confessions," although they may well be earlier. To this time too we may assign the symbolic prophecies, in which Yahweh's word was acted out in dramatic form. In the confessional laments Jeremiah reveals his innermost thoughts and feelings. He grieves that he was born a man of strife and contention (15:10), of hostility and indignation (15:17). He recalls hours when God's words were the delight of his heart (15:16), but when at the same time he suffered the anguish of isolation and alienation: "I sat alone, because thy hand was upon me" (15:17). He was separated from everyone, but the depths of his despair came in his sense of God's absence. Yahweh had become to him an unreliable wadi whose waters fail (15:18). He even accuses God of deceiving him (20:7; cf. 14:8). In utter desperation he cries out:

> Why is my pain unceasing, > my wound incurable?
> (15:18).

These laments of the prophet are remarkable for their fluctuation of feeling and mood, the constant ebb and flow from faith to doubt, from courage to despair, from compassion to hostility (11:18-21; 20:11-12). There is egocentricity in these outcries, but what is most remarkable is that they are usually overcome by God's word (12:5-6; 15:19-21). Jeremiah hears Yahweh canceling his claims, ignoring his complaints, admonishing him to return—to utter what is precious and to cast out what is worthless, so that he may be Yahweh's mouth (15:19). Again, in many contexts Jeremiah's declarations about himself are transformed by the divine first-person causative: his knowing is God's causing him to know (11:18); his returning is God's causing him to return (15:19). At times he approaches blasphemy (20:7), but he does not hesitate to expose his thoughts. In the symbolic prophecies he plays the role of Yahweh himself, as in the acted parable of the linen waistcloth (13:1-11) or the potter's earthen flask (19:1-2, 10).

It was in this period also that Jeremiah brought the Rechabites, who refused to drink wine, to the temple as an example of obedience to the disobedient men of Judah (ch. 35). When in 598 Jehoiakim refused tribute to Babylonia and the city was subjected to siege, Jeremiah uttered a vehement oracle of doom against its inhabitants (10:17-18), but when the city was taken, he identified himself with its fate in a poignant and beautiful lament (13:15-17). Yet the tragedy only confirmed his conviction that Judah's sufferings were the result of its defection from Yahweh (15:5-9). When Jehoiachin was taken to Babylon as a captive, Jeremiah refused to offer any hope for his return or for the resumption of the Davidic dynasty (22:24-30).

5. From 598 to the fall of Jerusalem in 587. Zedekiah, another son of Josiah and full brother of the lamented Jehoahaz, came to the throne at the age of twenty-one. He was neither tyrannical nor prodigal like Jehoiakim, but was incapable of coping with the forces arrayed against him. He lacked force and stability of character. That he came to the throne at the command of Nebuchadrezzar made him suspect to the nationalists in Judah. He was friendly to Jeremiah and often called on him for counsel. But there were many popular prophets who predicted an imminent return to the exiles, the restoration of the temple treasures, and divine judgment upon Nebuchadrezzar. These Jeremiah strenuously opposed. He lamented the ungodliness of priest and prophet (23:9-12) and urged the people not to listen to the optimistic predictions of the prophets (vss. 16-17), declaring that they were dreamers of dreams, deceivers intent on making the people forget the prophetic Word, thieves of authentic divine oracles, crying: "Thus says Yahweh," when they had not listened to him (vss. 23-32).

The issue came to a dramatic head in 594 on the occasion of a gathering in Jerusalem of representatives of the smaller powers, who had doubtless come to plan concerted action against Babylonia. Jeremiah, at the command of Yahweh, placed thongs and yoke bars on his neck and addressed them with an oracle. The sovereignty of nations is in the power of the Creator of the earth, and it is for him to dispose of nations as he will. Nebuchadrezzar is his servant, and to him has been given all the lands; therefore, they must subject themselves to his rule (27:1-11).

Later in the year he was confronted by the prophet Hananiah in the presence of a crowd of priests, prophets, and people gathered in the temple. Hananiah proclaimed the imminent defeat of Babylon, the return of the exiles, and the restoration of the temple treasures. This was Jeremiah's wish too, but he reminded Hananiah that the former prophets gave no such pleasant assurances and that the prophet who proclaims peace will be justified only by the event. Hananiah then took the yoke bars from Jeremiah's neck and broke them, saying this was a symbol of the rupture of Chaldean power. Jeremiah left, but sometime later returned with bars of iron and reminded Hananiah that he had not been sent by Yahweh (ch. 28).

Perhaps it was at this time that Jeremiah wrote a letter to the exiles urging them not to be deceived by the dreams of the diviners and prophets, because the exile would be long. They must therefore seek the welfare of the land of their captivity, "for in its welfare you will find your welfare" (29:1-14).

Zedekiah was unable to hold out against the demand for resistance, and Jeremiah's support of his policy gave him no strength. Nebuchadrezzar and his army descended upon Judah and Jerusalem. The city was surrounded and the towns of Judah systematically destroyed. In the Lachish Ostraca we have contemporary documents from this period which show many interesting affinities with the book of Jeremiah (ANET 321-22). Jeremiah went to Zedekiah to warn him that the city would be burned but that he would die in peace (34:1-6). During the siege Zedekiah made a covenant with the people to liberate all the slaves, but in a short time they were taken back by their masters. Jeremiah reproached them severely and told them that they would suffer grievously for this breach of good faith (34:8-22). When the siege was lifted at the approach of the Egyptian army ca. 588, Zedekiah sent a deputation to Jeremiah asking him to pray for the city, but the prophet replied that the relief was only temporary and that the city would certainly be destroyed (37:1-10). He sought, however, to take advantage of the respite and set out to go to the land of Benjamin, presumably to Anathoth, but was arrested by a sentry at the Benjamin Gate and accused of desertion, which he denied. He was forthwith beaten by the princes and placed in custody (37:11-15).

Jeremiah languished there for some time, until Zedekiah sent for him secretly and asked him if there was any word from Yahweh. Jeremiah replied: "There is . . . You shall be delivered into the hand of the king of Babylon" (37:17). He then besought the king not to return him to the prison; his request was granted, but he was placed in the court of the guard (37:16-21). While there, but after the siege was resumed, Jeremiah purchased a field from his cousin Hanamel, since the right of redemption belonged to him. This act he interpreted as a sign that normal commercial actions such as these would again take place (32:1-15). Jeremiah persisted in counseling capitulation, even by individual citizens; it was a choice of life or death. The princes demanded his life, and Zedekiah was unable to defend him. He was cast into a cistern of the court of the guard, but was later rescued by Ebed-melech (38:1-13). A poignant interview with the king followed shortly after. Jeremiah feared for his life, and the king was in the depths of despair. But the prophet again counseled surrender. The king feared revenge by the Jewish deserters, however. Jeremiah agreed to the king's request that he make no reference to the real substance of the interview to the princes (vss. 14-28).

The Babylonians captured Jerusalem on the ninth of Ab, 587 (Jer. 39:1-2; II Kings 25:8-21). Nebuchadrezzar had given orders to Nebuzaradan, the captain of the guard, to show Jeremiah special consideration. He was released from confinement, and elected to go to Mizpah to join Gedaliah, the grandson of Shaphan, who had been appointed governor of the newly created Chaldean province. After the disastrous events in which Gedaliah and many of the Jews were slain, the new leaders turned to Jeremiah to request that he pray to Yahweh for counsel; Jeremiah acceded to their request, and after ten days the word of Yahweh came to him. It was Yahweh's will that they remain in the land, trust themselves to the mercy of the Chaldeans, and give up all plans of going to Egypt. The leaders were enraged, accused Baruch of instigating him against them, and set out for Egypt, taking Jeremiah and Baruch with them. Of the prophet's life in Egypt we know little. An account is preserved of a symbolic action, which was designed to show that Nebuchadrezzar would devastate Egypt. It may have been in Egypt that Baruch compiled his master's prophecies and added to them his own memoirs of the fateful years during which he served him as amanuensis. Included was a special collection, known as the "little book of comfort" (chs. 30–31), parts of which remind one of the style of his early years, but others suggest the hope of restoration. Most significant is the prophecy of the new covenant (31:31-34), in which Judah would receive a new Torah inscribed on the heart and all would know Yahweh in a new relation because their sins and iniquities would be forgiven.

C. THEOLOGY. The thought and faith of Jeremiah are so intimately interwoven that it is impossible to isolate one from the other. Whether we can speak of his theology in any strict construction of the term may be questioned, for nowhere does he endeavor to delineate his thought into a nicely articulated system. Here we are concerned rather with a poetic mind given to rich and variegated imagery; with a living, moving, historical relationship between God and man; with autobiographical transcripts of interior experience and biographical accounts with abundant circumstantial detail. From the beginning to the end of his life it is with Yahweh that the prophet has to do, not with a transcendent Being separated from human life and history but with One who is transcendent, to be sure, but also a personal Lord active in the concrete intimacies of life, in the life and history of the chosen people, in the affairs of the nations, and in the universe of creation. Behind all these lie the traditions of the election-covenant faith; a story of perpetual vicissitudes; a cultic life of venerable institutions, celebrations, and rituals; and a constant emergence of new situations in which the revelation becomes concrete, unique, and alive, yet related to revelatory events and words of the past and oriented to the future in foreboding and hope. Again, the language and literary modes are such as to resist intellectual formulations, which it is likely the prophet would not have understood or would have deemed inadequate to his meaning. So abundant and striking are his imagery and symbolism that a general or abstract terminology deprives his thought of what is often most alive and most significant.

1. The word of God. In Jeremiah the theology of the Word reaches its culmination. Throughout his life he is aware that it is his destiny to proclaim Yahweh's דבר. The hour of his call is the arrival of God's word to him. The divine words are placed in his mouth, words which are to extend to nations and kingdoms with overwhelming consequences. The דבר has Yahweh's intention and will in it, and it is alive with the divine energy and sovereignty. In his conflicts with the popular prophets of his day, he is compelled to discern the nature of God's revelation to him. They too speak in the name of Yahweh, but Jeremiah denies that they have been sent (23:21), that they have stood in the divine council (23:18, 22), that they have been addressed (23:21). They dream dreams, but these dreams are their own (23:25-28); they have no knowledge (14:18); they are propagators of lies (5:31; 14:14; 23:26-27, 32); above all, they deceive the people by their optimism, rehearsing the old text of the holy-war ecstatics: "Go up and prosper," the unreflected שלום of their wishes. To these facile preachers Jeremiah has no easy reply, for the Word is for him something with which he has himself to contend. But he knows it is nothing over which man has disposal (23:18); it cannot be induced at will. It is given, even against one's own wishes (28:6-7). To it the true prophet must subject himself in obedience, listening, waiting. For Jeremiah it formed the line of battle where he waged his terrible conflicts. To him Yahweh's word was like blazing fire, a hammer crushing the rocks in pieces, a reproach and derision (20:7-9; 23:29). Its source was not to be discovered in the exigencies of contemporary politics nor in the charismatic seizures of the ecstatics but in the purpose and activity of God (29:26). In the travail of prayer Jeremiah waited for the Word, and at times he waited long (15:10-21; 42:1-7). He knew what it was to tremble and stagger like a drunken man because of the impact of Yahweh's holy words (23:9).

2. Knowledge of God. The acute problem which the word of God could pose for Jeremiah is reflected in his meditation upon the knowledge of God, upon the relationship between God's knowing and his own knowing, and upon the mystery of his own self-consciousness and his profound awareness of being apprehended and grasped. Jeremiah reports a momentous divine self-asseveration: "I am the Knowing One" (29:23; cf. RSV: "I am the one who knows"). The life of faith is being known of God. So Jeremiah is aware of Yahweh's foreknowledge of him (1:5), and more than once he appeals to God's knowing of him in earnest cries (12:3; cf. 11:18; 15:15; 17:16). He finds it necessary again and again to translate his simple declaratives in the qal stem into the divine causatives in the hiph'il. Yahweh knows the plans and devices of men (18:23; 29:11). It is obvious that Yahweh's knowing of Jeremiah is more than cognitive; it is rather an activity of relationship, an interior and prior being—apprehended. But man has a "knowledge" of God too, although the prophet is never bold enough to say that he possesses it. Yet he chides the priests because they have no knowledge of God (2:8), the poor because "they do not know the way of Yahweh" (5:4), the foolish people who do not know him (4:22). They turn to other gods whom they do not know (7:9). Even the stork in the heavens knows her times, but Israel does not know Yahweh's משפט (8:7). Yet in the time of the new covenant, Israel will no longer be admonished: "Know Yahweh," for they shall know him, both small and great, through Yahweh's forgiveness of their sins.

3. Yahweh's activity. a. In the life of the prophet. Yahweh's activity in Jeremiah's life is best understood by an examination of the many verbs in which he is addressed, more particularly in the call and confessional laments. Here we have Jeremiah's most inward "theology" in nuce. We confine ourselves to the divine first-person verbs: "I knew you," "I consecrated you" (הקדשתיך), "I appointed you," "I send you," "I command you," "I am with you," "I have put my words in your mouth," "I have set you over nations," etc. (1:5-10). It is in lines such as these that we come to grasp what Yahweh's presence meant to Jeremiah.

b. In the life of the people. Underlying all that Jeremiah has to say concerning Israel, whether in judgment, exhortation, or promise, is the memory of its election to be the people of Yahweh. This is at once the source of its uniqueness, the meaning of its existence, and the expression of the divine purpose within its life. Israel is separated to Yahweh as holy (קדוש), the first fruits of his harvest (2:3), a choice vine of pure seed (2:21), his beloved (11:15; 12:7), his heritage (12:7-9), his vineyard (12:10), his flock (13:17), his first-born (31:9). In the first of his recorded oracles Jeremiah tells of Yahweh's participating in Israel's time by his remembering the devotion (חסד) of her youth, her love (אהבה) as a bride, following him (לכת אחרי) in the wilderness (2:2).

Only seldom do we encounter a specific reference to the covenant (14:21; 31:32), but the terminology associated with it is certainly present (7:23; 11:3-8; 24:7); the requirements and laws to which appeal is made have their source in the covenant, as does the grace which exceeds all of Israel's performance. Permeating all the prophet's thought is the realization that Israel belongs to Yahweh and that her existence stands upon the foundation of an ultimate demand of obedience and service and with it the joyous expression of thanksgiving. This relationship is described in terms of the two most intimate bonds in the family life of the Orient; of the father to his son and the bride to her husband. It is clear that Jeremiah is heavily indebted to Hosea here, but he makes the imagery his own (2:2; 3:4, 19, 22; 31:9, 18-20). Elsewhere (18:1-11) Yahweh is portrayed as the Potter and Israel the clay in his hands. He is sovereign over her life: "He reworked it into another vessel, as it seemed good to the potter to do." Yet, paradoxically, she is accountable to him, and his action is determined by her conduct.

c. In the history of nations. The nations, too, are under Yahweh's gracious sovereignty. Nebuchadrezzar is his servant (27:6), the instrument of his purpose (vss. 6-9). The appeal in this context to Yahweh's creation of the earth (vs. 5) is merely prelude to the assertion of his sovereignty over the nations. Similarly, the foe from the N is the divine judgment against Israel. In the dark days after the downfall of Judah, Yahweh assures the remnant at Mizpah that they need not fear Babylon, because he is able to deliver and save them (42:11-12).

d. In the universe. Yahweh created the earth and all the living creatures which inhabit it (27:5). It is therefore his to govern as he will (27:4-11; cf. 18:1-11). The whole created universe, with its fixed order and purpose, is assurance of his lordship over history (31:35-37). He gives the rain in its appointed season (5:24; 14:22); he determines the times of the stork, turtledove, swallow, and crane (8:7), as of men, even though they may defy the givenness of their times. Thus he is Lord of "times" and of space and demonstrates his sovereignty over all, not only in the affairs of nations (ch. 27) but also in the lives of men, as Jeremiah can witness from his own experience.

4. Sin and judgment; repentance and forgiveness. Yahweh has revealed his holy will through his Torah and in the ministry of priests and prophets. What is required of Israel is the kind of activity and conduct which characterize his rule over the earth: steadfast love, justice, and righteousness (9:23-24). These are not understood as ethical norms or ideals but as ways of divine action; nor are they understood solely as grounded in creation, although this is not excluded, but through revelation in call, consecration, election, and covenant. It is these latter events which determine the true nature of the people. Therefore, sin is viewed as unnatural, a violation of all that which Israel was destined to be through her commitment to Yahweh's proffered relationship (2:11, 21), a perversion of her true self. It is the stubborn refusal to know God (see § C2 above). It is a going away from him (2:5), a going after חבל, "worthlessness"; a refusal to inquire into the revelatory events of the Heilsgeschichte (2:6-8); a rejection of their "glory" and apostasy to other gods (2:11-12), forsaking Yahweh, the fountain of living waters, for "no gods" (vs. 11); a capitulation of the life lived in holy memory; a gross forgetting (שכח 2:32; 3:21); a perverting of their ways (3:21); the faithlessness of wayward sons (3:22); the forsaking and abandoning (עזב) of God (2:17, 19); the breaking of the bond between servant and master (2:20); harlotry (2:20, 25; 3:1); incorrigibility (2:30, 35); profligacy (2:36); disobedience (3:13); rebellion (2:29); marital infidelity (3:20); sickness (3:22); want of a sense of shame (3:3); and degenerateness (2:21). The stain of guilt is so deep it cannot be cleansed with lye (2:22); its drive is as compelling as that of the restive young camel and the lust of the wild ass (2:24), as ineradicable as the Ethiopian's skin or the leopard's spots (13:23). The consequence of sin is judgment. This belongs to Yahweh's righteous ordering of history. The misfortunes that befall a people are from God, and they are called forth by its guilt and disobedience and refusal to serve. The foe from the N is an instrument of punishment and discipline. Yahweh's desire is always that his people turn from their past ways and return to him. Jeremiah echoes again and again the old prophetic cry: "Repent!" (3:1–4:4). If his people repent and swear:

> "As Yahweh lives," > in truth, in justice, and in uprightness, > then nations shall bless themselves in him
> (cf. Gen. 12:1-3).

God calls his wayward sons back to him, and is eager to forgive (3:12*b*-14, 19-22*b*). The underlying basis of all that is said about the new covenant—indeed, the transforming event which brings it into existence—is Yahweh's forgiveness and his determination not to remember any more the iniquities of his people (31:31-34; cf. 2:2).

In this connection we may turn to the cult and its practices as means of reconciliation and deliverance. It is probable that Jeremiah himself was connected with the temple and its ministry (cf. chs. 7; 26). But the temple has no efficacy in and of itself and will be destroyed because its worshipers violate the spirit and attitude which true worship requires: repentance, contrition, and a changed life. Neither are sacrifices sufficient of themselves to ward off the imminent threat of national destruction. The true circumcision is circumcision of the mind and heart (4:4). Even the Torah may become a snare and a delusion through the false pen of the scribes (8:8). It is not probable that Jeremiah opposed any of these institutions as such; he saw them, however, as possible instruments of corruption and induration. The popular prophets could appeal legitimately to the assurance of Yahweh's presence with Israel, but they distorted and perverted it by failure to grasp the contingency which lay at the heart of the original covenantal bond (Exod. 19:5).

5. Eschatology. Jeremiah's expectations for the future are obscured by the presence of much material which does not belong to him. The book contains a number of passages which look forward to a complete restoration in the manner of Ezekiel and Second Isaiah (Jer. 23:1-8; 30:10-11, 18-22; 31:10-14, 23-25): the gathering of the remnant from the nations (23:3-4; 30:10-11; 31:10-14); the raising up of David, a righteous Branch (23:5-6); and the new exodus (23:7-8).

But there are other passages which have some claim to authenticity where the restoration motif is present. In the parable of the two baskets of figs (ch. 24) Yahweh through his grace regards as good those who have suffered the harshness of exile and promises them a new heart that they may become his people once more (24:4-7). In the letter to the exiles (29:4-14) all hopes of a speedy return are rejected; indeed, the prophet urges them to seek the welfare of their captors and to pray on their behalf. Yet he has a plan for them, a plan for welfare to give them a future to which they may look forward (29:11-12). We are on even surer ground in the account of Jeremiah's purchase of the field at Anathoth. Here too there is considerable expansion of the text, but the prophet's words to Baruch have every mark of genuineness. The latter is commanded to place the two deeds in an earthenware vessel "that they may last for a long time. For thus says the Yahweh of hosts, the God of Israel: Houses and fields and vineyards shall again be bought in this land" (32:9-15). In this chapter we hear again of the promise of one heart and one way, "for their own good and the good of their children after them" (vs. 39).

Finally, in the great oracle of the coming age, the prophecy of a new covenant, we have words which, while not from Jeremiah, are consistent, not only with the foregoing passages, but also with the tenor of much of his earlier utterances. The new covenant is not like the old; it will be engraved on the hearts of the men of Israel and Judah, and "they shall all know me" (see § C2 above), for Yahweh will forgive their iniquities, and his remembering of them (cf. 2:2) will not include their transgressions (31:31-34).

D. THE BOOK. Jeremiah is the second of the books of the major prophets in our present canon, but in an earlier period the first, following the books of Kings, which were also attributed to him (B.B. 14*b*-15*a*). More than any other book of the Bible it reveals the prophet's personal experiences and sufferings, as well as his own intimate self-disclosures. It is in this area that his influence upon subsequent writers and later piety has been most profound, notably the poems of the Psalter, the portraits of the Servant of the Lord in Second Isaiah, and the records of travail during the Maccabean age. The prophecy of the new covenant (31:31-34) influenced the writers of the NT (II Cor. 3:2-18; Heb. 8:6-11; cf. Matt. 26:28; Mark 14:24). While he was by no means the first in Israel to emphasize individualism, the example of his life and the poignancy of his laments and "confessions" left a deep impression upon his successors. It was he, more than any other, who made it possible for Israel to meet the tragedy of the nation's downfall and the destruction of the temple in 587.

1. General character. Like the other great prophetic collections—Isaiah, Ezekiel, and the Book of the Twelve—the book of Jeremiah is a compilation —indeed, a compilation of compilations. It contains a great variety of literary types and forms. The two major types characteristic of the OT as a whole are abundantly represented and in a particularly striking fashion. The poetry assumes many guises: the ecstatic lyricism of the war songs (4:5*b*-8, 13-16, 19-22), the cosmic brooding of the imminent "end" (4:23-26), the intense subjectivity of the confessional laments (15:10-11, 15-20; 20:7-18), the unsparing and withering denunciation of the invectives with their accompanying threats (22:13-19), the pathetic effusion of intimate grief (13:15-17), the rhetorical and stylistic diversity of the poems against the foreign nations (46:3-12; 50:35-38; 51:1-58).

Similarly, the prose of the book has many forms: acted parables (13:1-11; 18:1-6; 19:1-2, 11-12), protracted sermonic discourse (7:1-15; 34:12-22), biographical narrative (chs. 26; 27–28; 36), letter (29:4-23, 25-28), vision (1:11-12, 13-14; ch. 24).

The literary units vary greatly in length, in both the poetry and the prose. Moreover, it is easy to recognize various literary strata by relative consistency of style in different parts of the book.

The variety in literary form and style calls attention to what is perhaps the most singular feature of the book's composition: the anomaly of numerous indications of systematic order and plan, on the one hand, and apparent confusion and disarray, on the other. It is clear as one reads through the whole book that it has gone through a long and complicated process. It is not the work of a single mind or the craft of a single writer. The history of its composition and growth is not to be explained, however, on a purely literary basis. It is probable that many of the poems and oracles circulated in the oral tradition before they were transcribed, and even in the course of oral transmission they underwent alteration and expansion. This, to be sure, is also true of the literary history of the book, in respect both of its individual literary units and its more extensive literary complexes. Intrusive material has disturbed the sequence and structure of the separate compositions as well as the manner in which they are arranged, of the ipsissima verba of the prophet Jeremiah as well as of the contributions of other writers. The impression of an involved literary history in which different compilers were active—sometimes, it would seem, in almost cavalier independence of one another—is confirmed by two further phenomena: (a) the substantial number of repetitions or literary duplications and (b) the divergences of the Greek text from the MT. Of the repetitions and duplications the following are illustrative:

6:12-15 and 8:10-12
10:12-16 and 51:15-19
16:14-15 and 23:7-8
23:5-6 and 33:15-16
23:19-20 and 30:23-24
30:10-11 and 46:27-28

Duplicates more or less similar to these appear in other books of the OT also—in Ezekiel, Second Isaiah, Joel, Obadiah, and others; the authenticity of each case must be examined by itself. In the Greek text of Jeremiah the oracles against the foreign nations (chs. 46–51) appear after 25:13 of our Hebrew and English texts (46:1–51:64 MT=25:15–45:5 LXX), and in a radically different order. Moreover, the LXX omits portions of the Hebrew text (27:20-22; 33:14-26; 39:3-14; 48:45-47). The presence of the foreign oracles in the second major section of the book conforms to the arrangement of such oracles in Isaiah (chs. 13–23) and Ezekiel (chs. 25–32).

Despite the foregoing demonstration of disarrangement of material, evidences are not wanting of systematic ordering and plan in the literary history of the book. There are, e.g., a number of collections which possess a certain homogeneity, some of them with appropriate headings or introductions, as in the oracles against the kings of Judah in 21:11–23:8, or against the prophets in 23:9-40, or the introduction to the "little book of comfort" (chs. 30–31; see 30:4), or the opening verse of the oracles against the nations (46:1; the closing phrase, "against all the nations," of 25:13*c* belongs here). Despite interruptions here and there, 4:5–6:30, with its vivid strophes on the foe from the N, forms a fairly unified literary whole, as does 2:2–4:4 on Israel's infidelity and apostasy and Yahweh's call to repentance. Moreover, the scroll which Jeremiah dictated to Baruch ben Neriah in 605 (see ch. 36) was certainly controlled by a dominant theme (vss. 2, 29). Signs of chronological arrangement are also present. The account of the prophet's call in ch. 1 is followed by a sequence of poems which are held by the majority of scholars to come from his earliest period. Chs. 37–44 are in excellent chronological order; elsewhere too the sequence of materials, while now disrupted, shows signs of an original chronological ordering (cf. chs. 26 ff).

The critical task is thus clear: to explain the extraordinary situation in the history of the book's composition, of order and plan on the one hand and of disorder and confusion on the other.

2. Major divisions of the book. The book may be outlined as follows:

I. Prophecies against Jerusalem and Judah, chs. 1–25
II. Biographical narratives about Jeremiah, chs. 26–45
III. Prophecies against the foreign nations, chs. 46–51
IV. Historical appendix, ch. 52

It is within the first major division of the book that we find the greatest amount of material stemming from Jeremiah. Among the passages which may be assigned to him with some confidence are the following: the call (1:4-19), invectives and calls to repentance (2:2–4:4), poems on the foe from the N (4:5–6:30; 8:14-17), confessional laments (11:18–12:6; 15:10-21; 17:12-18; 18:18-23; 20:7-18; cf. 8:18–9:3—H 8:18–9:2), laments for Judah and Jerusalem (9:4-11—H 9:3-10; 9:17-22—H 9:18-23), liturgy of drought (14:1–15:3), symbol of celibacy (16:1-13), oracles against the kings of Judah (21:11–23:8), oracles against the prophets (23:9-40), and the vision of the baskets of figs (ch. 24). There are other passages also which preserve authentic reminiscences of the prophet's activity and words like his temple discourse repeated in a condensed form but expanded with narrative detail in ch. 26 (7:1-15) and the prophet's support of the Deuteronomic reformation (11:1-17).

The second division (chs. 26–45) is almost exclusively prose and is in all probability the composition of Baruch (see 32:11-16; ch. 36; 43:1-7; ch. 45). The Little Book of Comfort (chs. 30–31) is an intrusion and contains both authentic Jeremianic material and additions from a later time.

The prophecies against the foreign nations (chs. 46–51) seem to have had a different literary history from the rest of the work. How much of this section, if any, comes from the prophet, it is difficult to say.

The final section is derived from II Kings 24:18–25:21, 27-39, but fortunately adds the important and reliable record of the numbers carried into captivity.

3. Composition. The modern phase of the critical study of the book of Jeremiah was inaugurated by the publication of the commentary by Bernhard Duhm in 1901 (Das Buch Jeremia in KHC). It is the merit of this work that it shows remarkable appreciation of the prophet's poetic style, but more especially that it recognizes for the first time the major literary strata of the book. Its defect is its too rigid limitation of the authentic materials to poems in a single meter (3′2′).

Sigmund Mowinckel advanced the study of the book in his monograph Zur Komposition des Buches Jeremia (1914). Here the literary strata were more clearly identified and explicated. Mowinckel recognized three major collections of material:

a) A compilation of authentic Jeremianic oracles, but without any introductory or concluding formulas: 1:4-10, 11-12, 13-16; 2:2*b*-9; 2:10-13; 2:14-28*a*; 2:29-37; 3:1-5, 19-20; 3:21–4:4; 4:5-10; 4:11*a*β-18; 4:19-22; 4:23-28; 4:29-31; 5:1-9; 5:10-14; 5:15-17; 5:20-31; 6:1-6*a*; 6:6*b*-8; 6:9-15; 6:16-19; 6:20-21; 6:22-26; 6:27-30; 8:4*a*β-12; 8:13; 8:14-17; 8:18-23; 9:1-8; 9:9-11; 9:16-21; 9:22-23; 9:24-25; 10:17-22; 11:15-16; 11:18-20, 22-23; 12:1-6; 12:7-12; 13:12-14; 13:15-27; 14:2-10; 14:11-16; 14:17*a*β–15:2; 15:5-9; 15:10-21; 16:1-13; 16:16-18, 21; 17:1-4; 17:9-10; 17:12, 14-18; 18:13-17; 18:18-23; 20:7-13; 20:14-18; 21:11*b*-12; 21:13-14; 22:6*a*β-9; 22:10-12; 22:13-19; 22:20-23; 22:24-30; 23:5-6; 23:9-15; 23:16-20; 23:21-24, 29; 24:1-10(?); 25:15-16, 27-38.

b) The work of the author of the book as a whole, a personal-historical composition:

1. 19:1-2, 10, 11*a*, 14–20:6
2. Ch. 26
3. Ch. 28
4. 29:24-32
5. Ch. 36
6. 37:1-10
7. 37:11-16
8. 37:17-21
9. 38:1-13
10. 38:14-28*a*
11. 38:28*b*; 39:3, 14; 40:2-12
12. 40:13–43:7
13. 43:8-13; 44:15-19, 24-30

Mowinckel denied Baruch's authorship of this work and assigned it to a date after Jeremiah's death, 580-480 B.C. According to him it was composed in Egypt.

c) A special source of pronounced Deuteronomic style with the characteristic formula of introduction: "The word which came to Jeremiah from Yahweh": 7:1–8:3; 11:1-5, 9-14; 18:1-12; 21:1-10; 25:1-11*a*; 32:1-2, 6-16, 24-44; 34:1-7; 34:8-22; 35:1-19; 44:1-14. The authenticity of all these utterances is rejected.

Mowinckel's work has had a profound influence on subsquent discussion. With significant reservations, especially with regard to dates and authenticity, it is accepted by Rudolph (Jeremia, in HAT [1947]) and substantially by H. G. May (see bibliography). The attack against his position has concentrated on his view of the date and authorship of b but more especially on his somewhat radical estimate of the c material. But his brilliant analysis succeeds in calling attention to the stylistic and ideological diversities within the book.

Another and perhaps more common approach to the composition of the book has been the attempt to reconstruct the scroll dictated to Baruch in 605.

4. The Baruch Scroll. In the fourth year of Jehoiakim, Jeremiah was commanded to dictate to Baruch all the "words" which he had spoken against Israel, Judah, and all the nations from the days of Josiah to the present. The scroll was read in the temple on a day of fasting, and the event was reported to the king, who commanded it to be read in his hearing. As he listened to it, he cast it several columns at a time into the fire of the brazier. Jeremiah was then ordered to dictate the scroll again, and to it he added "many similar words."

Is it possible to reconstruct this work? Many have thought so, but the results have not served to inspire much confidence. Yet certain criteria are present which should provide some clue: (a) the date, 626-605 B.C.; (b) the character of the oracles, certainly judgment and threat (36:3, 29); (c) the length (it was read three times in the course of a single day). If the substance of the scroll is present in our book, then it is likely that it is to be found in the first major division (chs. 1–25). Now 25:1-13 forms an admirable conclusion, and although it has doubtless received expansion, gives us certain data of some interest: the temporal limits are the same, as in ch. 36; the character of the prophecy is the same; and, above all, the final words refer to "everything written in this book" (25:13). It is obvious, however, that this cannot mean that Baruch's scroll was coextensive with these chapters; much would need to be excluded to conform to its length and character. J. P. Hyatt (IB, V, 787) suggests the following passages as belonging to the original document: 1:4-14, 17; 2:1-37; 3:1-5, 19-25; 4:1-8, 11-22, 27-31; 5:1-17, 20-31; 6:1-30; possibly 8:4–9:1. This is probably a minimum. Eissfeldt (Einleitung in das Alte Testament, p. 425) gives quite a different set of passages, including the great temple speech (7:1–8:3), the threat against Jerusalem (11:6-14) and Israel and Judah (13:1-14), and the denunciation of sabbath violation (17:19-27). Certainty on the matter is excluded, and this applies a fortiori to the expanded scroll, but it would seem likely that the original writing is contained within the compass of 1:4–25:13.

5. Prophecies against Judah and Jerusalem. A somewhat closer inspection of chs. 1–25 in historico-critical perspective will supplement our observations concerning its contents and the possibility of the presence of Baruch's scroll within its compass. The superscription (1:1-3) may be the work of Baruch or of the final editor or of both (vss. 1-2, 3). The present literary construction suggests the work of two hands by its twofold temporal setting. The rest of the chapter is devoted to the call (1:4-10, 11-12, 13-19). It is likely that none of it was reduced to writing until long after the event. Each pericope opens in the same fashion: "The word of Yahweh came to me, saying." It is possible that vss. 4-10 and 13-19 are parallel accounts of the call, the first representing substantially the report of Jeremiah himself, the second that of Baruch, though based upon Jeremiah's own account.

In ch. 3, vss. 6-12*a* and 15-18 are surely intrusive. They do not belong here. It is less certain that vss. 24-25 (rendered as prose in the RSV) are spurious; stylistic and structural features favor their originality.

In ch. 4, vss. 9-10 are certainly Jeremiah's, as are 11-12; they are literary fragments which were inserted here, the first because it represents the prophet's actual commentary, the second because it was related to the major theme of the foe. While vss. 23-27 seem difficult to credit to the prophet because of their "apocalyptic coloring," it is not safe to reject them on this account. In general, 4:5–6:30, like 2:2–4:4, represent fairly homogeneous sections.

The long prose section 7:1–8:3 is of quite a different style; the Deuteronomic cadence and terminology do not argue against essential authenticity, however. This is true also of the not dissimilar section in 11:1–12:6. That there are intrusions here is likely, but its general tenor is Jeremianic. The confessional laments are certainly genuine (11:18–12:6; 15:10-21; 17:12-18; 18:18-23; 20:7-18; cf. 8:18–9:3—H 8:18–9:2), as are the denunciations of the kings (21:11–23:8) and the popular prophets (23:9-40). In its present form ch. 24 is not Jeremiah's composition, but it is most probably based upon his report. The concluding section (25:1-13) is laden with Deuteronomic terminology, but it correctly witnesses to a crucial point in his prophetic ministry (cf. vs. 13 with chs. 36; 45).

6. The biographical narratives. This section includes 19:1–20:6; chs. 26–29; 32:1–45:5, with the deletion of minor passages such as 33:14-26. It covers the period from ca. 608 to Jeremiah's last days. The whole comprises a Leidensgeschichte, a memoir of the prophet's trials and sufferings.

The style of these narratives contrasts sharply with that of Jeremiah in his early period. It is straightforward, clear, and detailed. There is no reason to doubt the essential historical accuracy of this section. To be sure, Baruch reproduces the prophet's words in his own language, as Thucydides did the funeral oration of Pericles or the author of the book of Acts the speeches of Paul; yet it is precarious to make too much of this, for it is doubtful whether the prophet always indulged in the poetic flights of his early years. Moreover, there is not a little in these discourses which preserves the kind of personal detail and intimate reflections characteristic of the "confessions" in the first division of the book, as well as the vigorous forthrightness of the invectives and threats. It is apparent that an original order has been altered, as is seen, e.g., by the dating of ch. 26 at the beginning of Jehoiakim's reign and ch. 45 during his fourth year, while the intervening narratives (also disordered) fall partly in the reign of Zedekiah.

H. G. May has subjected this division of the book to a thoroughgoing critical analysis and reaches the conclusion that it cannot come from a contemporary of Jeremiah but must be dated, at the earliest, in the first half of the fifth century (see bibliography). John Bright (see bibliography) has assayed the same task with equal vigor and thoroughness and reaches radically different results. While his view of the precise nature of the compilatory character of the book is open to question, his defense of the narratives as trustworthy and the work of a contemporary is entirely successful.

Here we have Baruch's somewhat circumstantial and detailed yet, partly for this very reason, deeply moving account of the suffering and persecutions of his master. Some have supposed that it is he who is responsible for the book in substantially its present form; others see him as the compiler of Jeremiah's ipsissima verba with his own prose "passion story." The latter may indeed be the case; if so, we may well understand how his own language occasionally interrupts the prophet's own. It is also probable that we have duplicate accounts from Jeremiah and Baruch, comparable to 7:1-15 and ch. 26, as in 1:4-10, 13-19.

7. The Deuteronomic work. As we have seen, it was Duhm who first called attention to the distinctiveness of this "source," and he was seconded in his views by Mowinckel, who assigned it to Source c. There is no question that this material bears the stamp of Deuteronomic composition and style; the problem is whether it is in any sense Jeremiah's and whether it is historical. The problem is a complicated one, for not infrequently Baruch employs the same style and language. It is now increasingly recognized, however, that the practice of excision of so-called Deuteronomic language will not meet the situation. For it is very probable that this kind of speech was contemporary with the prophet, and it is not inconceivable that he may himself have employed it upon occasion, above all within the precincts of the temple or in his relationships to the cult. Yet it need not be contended that all the passages included within Mowinckel's "c" are Jeremiah's ipsissima verba; what is probable, however, is that they are in general dependent upon authentic historical information derived from the prophet himself. An excellent example is the account of the potter and the clay (18:1-12); that the nucleus is Jeremiah's can scarcely be questioned, even though it is certainly elaborated Deuteronomically. In a different way the same is true of chs. 32; 34–35.

8. The Little Book of Comfort. It is generally recognized that chs. 30–31, called the "Little Book of Comfort," represent an independent compilation, although some scholars have suggested that the work extended through ch. 33 (e.g., R. H. Pfeiffer [see bibliography]). While there is widespread disagreement concerning originality, date, and provenance, the following conclusions seem probable: (a) the little book is highly composite, representing very early oracles together with substantial additions from a much later period than Jeremiah's; (b) the dominating interest is with the N, and the original poems may well have had their provenance there; (c) the poetry which has the strongest claim for originality possesses the same vigor, imagery, and ecstatic quality of his earliest work and is therefore to be assigned to that period, conceivably during the period of silence from 621 to 609. The following passages probably come from this time: 30:5-7, 12-17, 23-24; 31:2-6, 7-9, 15-22. Other original material may have been reworked, but most of the rest is late. The important passage on the new covenant (31:31-34) "gives the substance of Jeremiah's thought, but not in his words" (Hyatt).

9. The oracles against the foreign nations. This, too, originally comprised a separate compilation and is comparable to similar collections in Isaiah (chs. 13–23), Ezekiel (chs. 25–32), and the Twelve (Amos 1:1–2:4). That its literary history is somewhat involved is suggested by the order of the poems in the LXX and by omissions in the latter. Hans Bardtke (see bibliography) has argued for the authenticity of most of these poems to the nations. There is much that is attractive in this view. Jeremiah was called to be a prophet to the nations, and it must be admitted that if the authenticity of oracles such as these could be demonstrated, the phrase would gain in propriety and cogency. The argument of style (cf. Pfeiffer's characterization, pp. 506-10) is not necessarily decisive against their genuineness, for it is certain that Jeremiah did not retain his fervor and imaginative genius and éclat throughout his life. The long period of suffering exacted a heavy toll. It is possible too that he may have prophesied in Egypt. The fact that the collection is independent may only mean that it was added later after the completion of the earlier compilation. The poem against Egypt (46:3-12) is probably genuine, and portions of other poems may go back to him. Bardtke's own reconstruction, however, is open to grave objections.

10. Historical appendix. The concluding chapter of the book, as we have seen, has been taken from II Kings 24:18–25:21, in the same manner as Isa. 36–39 was drawn from the same book. Notable is the extremely valuable report, probably drawn from an official record, preserved in Jer. 52:28-30. There is every reason to credit its reliability, and it is a great support for assessing the extent of the captivity.

11. Text. The Greek translation deviates from the text transmitted by the Masoretic scholars. Most notable is the location of the oracles against the nations; in the LXX they appear after 25:13 of our present text. What is more, they are ordered differently:

MT: Egypt (46), Philistines (47), Moab (48), Ammonites (49:1-6), Edom (49:7-22), Damascus (49:23-27), Kedar and Hazor (49:28-33), Elam (49:34-39), Babylon (50:1–51:58).

LXX: Elam, Egypt, Babylon, Philistines, Edom, Ammonites, Kedar, Damascus, Moab.

About one eighth of the Hebrew text is absent in the LXX. Most of these omissions are minor, representing individual verses or parts of verses; others are due to error, such as the homoeoteleuton of 39:4-13 and 51:44*b*-49*a;* still others are intentional—e.g., the omission of doublets in the Hebrew text (8:10-12; 30:10-11; 48:10-11). But some are to be explained only by their absence in the Hebrew Vorlage employed by the translators, as in 33:14-26. Stylistic and cultic interests may also have played a role. In assessing the relative superiority of one text over another, each case must be considered independently.

Bibliography. The relevant sections of the following critical introductions are recommended: Driver, Steuernagel, Eissfeldt, Pfeiffer, and Bentzen.

Commentaries: B. Duhm, KHC, vol. XI (1901). C. H. Cornill (1905). F. Giesebrecht in Nowack. HKAT (2nd ed., 1907). P. Volz, KAT, X (1922; 2nd ed., 1928). F. Noetscher in Feldmann-Herkenne, Die Heilige Schrift des ATs, VII, 2 (1934). W. Rudolph, HAT, vol. 12 (1947). A. Weiser, ATD (Jer. 1:1–25:13 [1952]; 25:14–52:34 [1955]). J. P. Hyatt, IB, V (1956), 777-1142.

Critical discussions of composition and related problems: F. Wilke, "Das Skythenproblem in Jeremiabuch," BWAT, 13 (1913), 222-54. S. Mowinckel, Zur Komposition des Buches Jeremia (1914). F. Horst, "Die Anfaenge des Propheten Jeremia," ZAW, 41 (1923), 94-153. T. H. Robinson, "Baruch's Roll," ZAW, 42 (1924). 209-21. A. Alt, PJ, XXI (1925), 100 ff. H. G. May, "The Chronology of Jeremiah's Oracles," JNES, 4 (1935), 217-27. H. Bardtke, "Jeremia, der Fremdvoelkerprophet," ZAW, 53 (1935), 209-39; 54 (1936), 240-62. G. von Rad, "Die Konfessionen Jeremias," Evangelische Theologie (1936), pp. 265-76. G. R. Driver, "Linguistic and Textual Problems: Jeremiah," JQR, 28 (1937/38), 97-129. H. Birkeland, Zum hebraeischen Traditionswesen (1938). For the theory that the Little Book of Comfort extends through ch. 33, see R. H. Pfeiffer, Introduction to the OT (1941), p. 501. H. G.

May, "Towards an Objective Approach to the Book of Jeremiah: the Biographer," JBL, 61 (1942), 139-55, shows the influence of Mowinckel; on the biographical narratives, see especially p. 152. S. Mowinckel, Prophecy and Tradition (1946). H. H. Rowley, "The Prophet Jeremiah and the Book of Deuteronomy," Studies in OT Prophecy (1950), pp. 157-74. J. P. Hyatt, "The Deuteronomic Edition of Jeremiah," Vanderbilt Studies in the Humanities (1951), pp. 71-95. J. Bright, "The Date of the Prose Sermons of Jeremiah," JBL, 70 (1951), 15-29. H. Kremers, "Leidensgemeinschaft mit Gott im AT," Evangelische Theologie, 13 (1953), 122-40. On the Babylonian Chronicle, see D. J. Wiseman, Chronicles of Chaldean Kings (1956). M. Noth, History of Israel (1958), pp. 271-74.

J. MUILENBURG

JEREMIAS jĕr'ə mī'əs. Douay Version form of JEREMIAH.

JEREMIEL. Apoc. form of JERAHMEEL (4) in II Esd. 4:36.

JEREMOTH jĕr'ə mŏth [ירמות, yᵉrēmôth, swollen or obese (with -ôth here hypocoristic); Apoc. 'Ιερεμώθ, 'Ιαριμώθ; see also JERIMOTH]; KJV twice JERIMOTH —ĭ mŏth (I Chr. 7:8; 27:19—but in the latter passage correctly, with the MT ירימות, a variant of the foregoing); KJV once RAMOTH rā'mŏth [Kethibh ירמות, yᵉrāmôth; Qere רמות, rāmôth] (Ezra 10:29); KJV Apoc. HIEREMOTH hĭ ĕr'ə mŏth in I Esd. 9:27, 30; JARIMOTH jăr'ə mŏth in I Esd. 9:28. 1. According to I Chr. 7:8 (cf. vs. 6), a Benjaminite; but the genealogy is probably Zebulunite.

Bibliography. E. L. Curtis and A. A. Madsen, Chronicles, ICC (1910), pp. 145-49.

2. A Benjaminite (I Chr. 8:14). "Jeroham" perhaps stands for this name in vs. 27.

3. A Merarite Levite (I Chr. 23:23; same as "Jerimoth" in 24:30).

4. A Levite of the "sons of Heman" (I Chr. 25:22; same as "Jerimoth" in vs. 4).

5. A chief of the tribe of Naphtali (I Chr. 27:19, where the KJV "Jerimoth" is proper).

6. One of the Jews who were listed as having foreign wives in the time of Ezra (Ezra 10:26; I Esd. 9:27).

7. Another Jew listed as having a foreign wife in the time of Ezra (Ezra 10:27; I Esd. 9:28).

8. A third Jew listed as having a foreign wife in the time of Ezra (Ezra 10:29; I Esd. 9:30).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 39, 226.

B. T. DAHLBERG

JEREMY. KJV Apoc. and NT alternate form of JEREMIAH.

JEREMY, EPISTLE OF. See JEREMIAH, LETTER OF.

JERIAH jĭ rī'ə [יריהו, may Yahu see (one's need)]. Alternately: JERIJAH —jə (I Chr. 26:31). A Kohathite Levite, son of Hebron (I Chr. 23:19; 24:23); listed as chief of the Hebronites in the time of King David (26:31).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 198.

B. T. DAHLBERG

JERIBAI jĕr'ə bī [יריבי] (I Chr. 11:46). One of the sons of Elnaam whose names appear among the sixteen additional names that the Chronicler added to the catalogue (II Sam. 23) of the Mighty Men of David known as the "Thirty."

JERICHO jĕr'ə kō [יריחה, יריחו, ירחו]. The major city at the S end of the Jordan Valley; the key defense position for the W section of the wide plain. The OT city was located at Tell es-Sultan, the NT city at Tulul Abu el-'Alayiq. The former was built above one of the largest springs in all of Palestine, and this spring is still watering the extensive gardens of modern Jericho a mile or so downstream. The NT city was a mile S of the OT Jericho. It was located on both banks of the Wadi Qelt, where that magnificent canyon opens out into the great, broad plain of the Jordan.

1. OT Jericho
2. Neolithic Jericho
3. Intertestamental and NT Jericho
4. Roman and Byzantine Jericho

Bibliography

1. OT Jericho. The story of the fall of Jericho is very difficult of interpretation. Before the days of archaeological research the commentators could let their imagination have free rein, and this gave a multiplicity of interpretations. Unfortunately the Jericho of Joshua's day still presents a highly technical problem even for the archaeologist, as only a small portion of that city survived to the present century. Today there is nothing left for the archaeologist to dig and thus double check the work of his predecessors. When, however, the fall of Jericho is studied in the light of the military campaigns which preceded it and followed it, the archaeologist can, at least in part, reconstruct the Jericho picture; and today archaeology is fast approaching a solution of the problem. Some space, however, must be devoted to the history of archaeological work at Jericho and the other key cities of Joshua's campaigns before and after Jericho.

Copyright: The Matson Photo Service

11. Air view of OT Jericho, showing the mound of Jericho in the foreground; in the distance are the Dead Sea and the mountains of Moab.

Since the fall of Jericho is one of the most fascinating stories in all of scripture, it is not surprising to find that Jericho was one of the first cities in Palestine to be excavated. This work was done by Ernst Sellin and Carl Watzinger in 1907-11. Unfortunately this work was carried on before any accurate pottery calendar (see ARCHAEOLOGY § C3*a*; POTTERY § 2) had been worked out for Palestine. Indeed, the excavators gave only a minimum attention to pottery, specializing on striking forms rather than on an overall portrayal of the pottery. The city which Sellin identified as Israelite was actually centuries earlier —i.e., in the latter part of the Middle Bronze Age (seventeenth-sixteenth centuries).* Père Hugo Vincent, however, who later became known as the best pottery expert in Palestine, was an unofficial observer at the excavations, and he insisted that there was pottery of the final phase of Late Bronze Age—i.e., the thirteenth century—on the site. Figs. ALA 12; JER 11.

From 1929 to 1936 John Garstang worked on the mound. His major discovery was that the site was occupied in the Neolithic period, even before the invention of pottery. When he came to that part of the mound dealing with Bible times, however, Garstang found the site difficult to excavate and more difficult to interpret. Although he shifted his dating of various walls and levels several times, the general public knows his work best through a single study, The Story of Jericho, in which he dated Joshua's conquest at 1400-1388 B.C. He described Jericho as a four- or five-acre city surrounded by a double wall. The city was destroyed in a great conflagration apparently assisted by an earthquake. His description of the city seems to many readers to fit well into the Joshua story, and it is quoted or used in modified versions. But whatever date is now given by scholars to this particular destruction emphasized by Garstang, all agree that his date is more than a century earlier than the conquest of the cities described in the immediately following campaign, which began at Ai and ended at Hazor. Fig. JER 12.

Courtesy of Herbert G. May

12. Excavations of ancient Jericho

Garstang's work gave emphasis to the views of several scholars that the Israelites left Egypt at various times rather than in a single mass exodus under Moses. These scholars differed among themselves, but in general they separated Moses and Joshua by a strong time lag—some giving priority in time to one leader and some to the other. See JOSHUA, BOOK OF, § D1.

In 1952, Kathleen M. Kenyon began work on the mound. After five years of her work the archaeological picture is clearer, and the following conclusions now seem valid: Most of the mound is sixteenth century B.C. or earlier; indeed, the major depth of the mound is actually Neolithic.* In other words, most of the mound belongs to prehistoric times, and the last big city was something like three hundred years earlier than Moses. Unfortunately she has found that the small amount of the upper levels which had escaped destruction by wind and rain were those areas already worked by the Germans and Garstang. Jericho was built of mud brick, and this is quickly disintegrated by both wind and rain. The same winds which furnished the forced draft for Solomon's smelters at EZION-GEBER (§ 2) had already been blasting away at the mud bricks of Jericho. One year the English excavations here were flooded by heavy rains. Even in the Neolithic area, Miss Kenyon found, stream channels had cut into parts of the mound. It therefore seems unlikely that anything new can be learned of thirteenth-century Jericho from the mound itself, although nearby tombs may prove very helpful in the future. One of the major tragedies of Palestinian archaeology is that the Germans excavated Jericho when archaeology was still an infant science. Figs. JER 13-15.

From Kathleen Kenyon, Digging Up Jericho (London: Ernest Benn Ltd.)

13. A thumb-impressed Neolithic brick, from Jericho

Since the archaeological evidence at Jericho is small, it is wise to move on to the remainder of Joshua's campaign to see what new light it may throw on the Jericho story. The capture of Bethel-Ai (see BETHEL [SANCTUARY] § 2) is shown by a terrific conflagration followed by a complete cultural change and deterioration in the city which replaced it. This pattern was repeated in the excavations of Lachish and Kiriath-sepher. Furthermore, the fall of LACHISH (§ 2) was dated by inscriptional material to ca. 1200 B.C. Tell el-Hesi, which is probably Eglon, was also destroyed ca. 1200 B.C. The importance of this S campaign is demonstrated in the Mer-ne-ptah inscription of the same general date (see INSCRIPTIONS § 1). This is the first mention of Israel in any inscription, and here the Egyptian king refers to Israel as a nation but as yet without specific boundaries. Even Joshua's northern campaign, which seems so

From Syria (1935); courtesy of the Librairie Orientaliste Paul Geuthner, Paris

14. Mask from Neolithic Jericho

From Kathleen Kenyon, Digging Up Jericho (London: Ernest Benn Ltd.)

15. Neolithic plastered skull, from Jericho totally unrelated to the southern one, has now been confirmed by Israeli excavations at HAZOR, where the city was found to be very much larger and stronger than expected and where there is a wealth of pottery data belonging to the same period.

The success of such an extensive military campaign as these archaeological excavations have demonstrated and which included cities as far distant and as unrelated as Lachish and Hazor could hardly have been started in a local feud between the Bethel-Ai Canaanites and some Israelite clan. The preceding Transjordan campaign, however, had been an excellent preparatory action over equally long distances; and Glueck's researches in Transjordan show that the thirteenth century was the only possible date for that campaign. Jericho was the junction point of these two campaigns. It was the first city across the Jordan and the bridgehead in Cis-Jordan.

Turning now to the interpretation of this archaeological evidence of the two campaigns and of that found at Jericho itself, it looks as if Jericho was only a small city in Joshua's time. It probably used a section of the old brick walls of an earlier city for its defenses. That such brick walls do actually disappear rather easily can be seen at Kiriath-sepher (see DEBIR [Josh. 1:11-15]) in the Late Bronze Age, where the city wall is missing but where a street, concentric with that wall, still remains with the house foundations adjacent. That there was some occupation at Jericho in the thirteenth century is proved by some local imitations of Mycenean ware that have been found on the mound and in tombs. This is what Père Vincent maintained as far back as the German excavations.

Furthermore, not only is the city which Joshua conquered largely missing, but the next two cities that succeeded it, according to scripture, do not appear anywhere on the mound! The city of palm trees which Eglon captured and where he received tribute from Israel (Judg. 3:13) must have been Jericho, but no signs of this city have yet been found in the excavations. David's ambassadors, who had been insulted by the king of the Ammonites, stopped at Jericho until their beards were grown (II Sam. 10:5); but again the mound furnishes no remains of this town. Equally instructive is the fact that only a portion of the little city or "block house," which was a century earlier than Joshua's conquest, was preserved.

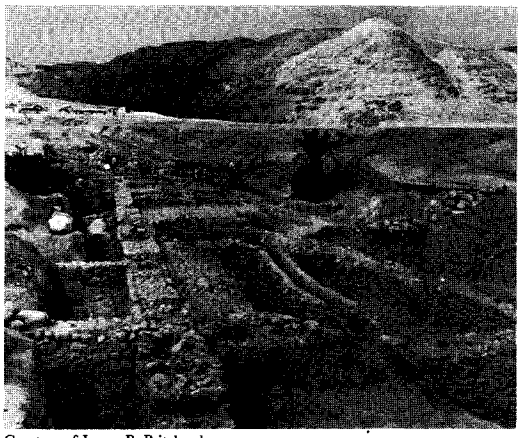
At the present time the interpretations of the Israelite conquest fit into two general categories, although each view has several modifying features. (a) Jericho was a small city captured in the same military campaign which saw Israel conquer Transjordan and then move successfully against some, but not all, of the major cities of W Palestine, going even as far N as the great fortress of Hazor. (b) The Israelite conquest extended over a considerable length of time and occurred in two or more waves. Those which took place earlier than the thirteenth century would be represented by three factors: (i) the fall of one of the older and stronger Jericho fortresses—i.e., those dug by Garstang; (ii) an earlier military conquest of central Palestine which made it possible for Joshua to reinstitute the law at Shechem without any prior military action; and (iii) other data referred to in the genealogical material of I Chronicles.

Although Joshua laid a heavy curse upon Jericho (Josh. 6:26), nevertheless when the conquered land was distributed, Jericho was credited to the tribe of Benjamin (Josh. 18:21), and the boundary between Benjamin and Ephraim was the road from Jericho to Bethel. The above curse is apparently referred to in the founding of Jericho by Hiel, the Bethelite (I Kings 16:34). The loss of his sons may well refer to a foundation sacrifice after the Canaanite pattern. Actually, however, archaeologists do not find too many such foundation sacrifices.

At one point on the mound the Germans found a heavy building with long rooms. They interpreted it as a reflection of Syrian architectural influence. Archaeologists now recognize this type of structure as an Israelite granary characteristic of the tenth and ninth centuries B.C. Since there were two cities on the site after Joshua's conquest, the founding of this city by Hiel may well refer to its elevation as a military depot as represented by the granary. Such a reserve depot was good military strategy at this time, as the wheat basket of Transjordan was a constant battleground between Israel and Syria.

There was a school of the prophets in Jericho at the time of Elijah's translation (II Kings 2:4-18). Elisha's first act after he took up Elijah's mantle was to purify the spring at Jericho (II Kings 2:19-22). Both Ezra and Nehemiah speak of a postexilic Jericho, listing the population of this Jericho as 345 (Ezra 2:34; Neh. 7:36), and Nehemiah also notes that the men of Jericho helped rebuild the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:2). This Jericho was apparently like the Jericho of the days of the judges and David. These are the last OT references to the Jericho that was located at Tell es-Sultan—i.e., beside the great spring. The Jericho that we know from the intertestamental and NT periods was located along the Wadi Qelt a mile or so to the S.

2. Neolithic Jericho. But there is another phase of excavations at Tell es-Sultan that deserves notice—namely, the Neolithic period. This was discovered by Garstang, and he continued to dig down to a prepottery period (before 5000 B.C.); but it was Miss Kenyon who revealed the phenomenal nature of this Neolithic period. This phase of Jericho's history throws new light on the pre-Abrahamic chapters of Genesis. Miss Kenyon has demonstrated that civilization actually existed here several thousand years earlier than anyone had even dreamed of. Carbon 14 dating has confirmed this.



These Neolithic cities occupy forty-five feet of debris representing about twenty successive house levels! Equally significant is the size of these cities, for they were approximately eight acres in area—the same as many an OT city. Their houses had well-designed rooms characterized by the use of burnished plaster on both floors and walls. The flattened cigar-shaped bricks were thumbmarked for easier bonding.* The population used fine limestone dishes and a new type of quern; their flints were Tahunian (see PREHISTORY § 1). Fertility-cult objects common to later times were here also. There was a new religious factor, however, in the use of skulls, some of which had the features reproduced in plaster. They are true individualistic pieces of art in portrait sculpturing. Figs. JER 13; 15.

Among the earlier Neolithic phases was a military defense consisting of a solid stone tower thirty feet through, and for additional defense there was a twenty-seven-foot ditch cut out of solid rock. Still earlier there was a better tower with an interior stairway, where twenty steps are still intact, and each step is a three-foot dressed stone. The roof used even larger stones. These lowest levels represent a different culture, for the brick used was flat on the bottom but the tops were hog-backed. The houses were round and the walls battered. The objects found in the dwellings were also different from the later levels. Thus Jericho continues to add to its honor as the world's oldest city, and we must now date civilization several thousand years earlier.

3. Intertestamental and NT Jericho. Herod the Great founded NT Jericho, which is today represented by ruins called Tulul Abu el-'Alayiq. Jericho served as his winter capital, and its balmy winter climate was in striking contrast to the bone-chilling damp winter of Jerusalem. The city was located on the W edge of the Jordan plain where the Wadi Qelt opens out onto this plain. J. B. Pritchard reports a Chalcolithic and Early Bronze settlement here. Charles Warren and Ernst Sellin had both trenched this tell, but they reported little in the way of findings. J. L. Kelso excavated it for the American School of Oriental Research in 1950, and the following year J. B. Pritchard worked here.

A small Hellenistic fortress was erected here to guard the road from the Jordan Valley to Jerusalem. Bacchides is credited with fortifying Jericho (I Macc. 9:50); this was either his work or that of his opponents the Maccabees. Simon, one of the Maccabees, was treacherously killed at Jericho by his son-in-law Ptolemy (I Macc. 16:14-16). A second small tell across the wadi was probably originally built at the same time. Pompey captured two forts called Threx and Taurus at Jericho in 63 B.C.; and they are probably the same forts as those of the Maccabean period. A mountaintop on either bank of the Qelt was also a citadel of defense, especially Kypros on the S, which Herod the Great gave to his mother.

Herod's work on the site seems to fall into two phases, an early cut-stone period, where the masonry is similar to that used in other cities, and a later opus reticulatum phase. This latter reflects one of Herod's trips to Rome, for here on the Wadi Qelt are con-

Courtesy of James B. Pritchard

16. Excavated remains of Herodian gymnasium or palaestra(?) at NT Jericho, W of the tell structions similar to those which Augustus was building on the Tiber. Anyone who has seen Pompeii has seen the same building phase that appears at Jericho. Although the buildings of the two cities are similar, Jericho was a much more expansive site with plenty of room for pools, parks, and villas, as well as the normal civic buildings of a Greco-Roman metropolis.* The Qelt ran through the city, and some of its major buildings were oriented to that stream. One of them was about two city blocks in length. Another had a grand stairway 150 feet long. There was a sunken garden with fifty statuary niches and a semicircular terraced garden in the center. At either end of this sunken garden were buildings, some walls of which were forty-one inches thick. Josephus reports that at the death of Herod the Great his palace and some of the other buildings of Jericho were burned, but his son Archelaus quickly restored the city. Fig. JER 16.

Zacchaeus, the most famous of all tax collectors, held an office which was highly remunerative, not only because of the fabulously rich balsam groves nearby, but also because Jericho was the winter capital of the kingdom. When Christ was entertained by Zacchaeus (Luke 19:1-10), it would be in one of the finest houses of the city, and it would compare with the best of Pompeii. The presence of sycamore trees in Jericho in connection with this story is testified to by the use of this timber in one of the earlier Hellenistic forts. Beggars were also found in these rich cities, for almsgiving was highly meritorious. Matthew, Mark, and Luke all tell of Christ's ministry to such beggars here at Jericho (Matt. 20:29-34; Mark 10:46-52; Luke 18:35-43). As Christ left the city, he entered at once into the great canyon of the Wadi Qelt, which carried the main road to Jerusalem. These same mountains had witnessed the scene of his temptations immediately after the baptism, and Jericho may well have summarized all the cities of this world in that temptation. Now at the close of his ministry Christ passed through the same mountain setting en route to Calvary, that final testing. This concludes the story of NT Jericho, but the city lived on for some time yet.

4. Roman and Byzantine Jericho. Archaeologists have not yet found any evidence of Jericho's destruction by Vespasian's army. Instead, he spared the city and stationed large garrisons here preparatory to the attack on Jerusalem. His troops, however, did destroy Khirbet Qumran (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS §· 3), about seven miles to the S, at this time. The relationship of this Essene community to Jericho is still puzzling, for that puritanical group did not live at Qumran in the days when the profligate Herod had his winter capital there. Whether or not Herod the Great ordered them out, we do not know. Upon his death, however, they did return to their old center.

After Jerusalem was destroyed in A.D. 70, Jericho declined swiftly, and by the turn of the century the old capital had shrunk to a small garrison town. At the time of Bar Cocheba's Rebellion (A.D. 132-35), however, the city flared up briefly, for either the Romans or the Jews rebuilt one of the early forts. Roman Jericho was still located on this site when the Bordeaux Pilgrim passed through here in A.D. 333, but shortly thereafter the site was abandoned and Roman Jericho was replaced by a new Byzantine Jericho (Erikha) a mile or so to the E. Modern Jericho is built over this Byzantine site. When the Germans excavated OT Jericho, they found a little Byzantine occupation on that mound also.

Bibliography. E. Sellin and C. Watzinger, Jericho, Die Ergebnisse der Ausgrabungen (1913); J. and J. B. E. Garstang, The Story of Jericho (1948); J. L. Kelso and D. C. Baramki, Excavations at NT Jericho and Khirbet en-Nitla (1955); K. M. Kenyon, "Jericho, Its Setting in Near Eastern History," Antiquity (Dec., 1956), pp. 184-95; J. B. Pritchard, The Excavations at Herodian Jericho, 1951 (1958). J. L. KELSO

JERIEL jĭr′ĭ əl [יריאל, may God see] (I Chr. 7:2). A descendant of Issachar.

JERIJAH. Alternate form of JERIAH.

JERIMOTH jĕr′ĭ mŏth [ירימות, yᵉrîmôth, swollen or obese (with -ôth here hypocoristic); see also JEREMOTH]. 1. According to I Chr. 7:7, a Benjaminite; but this genealogy is thought to be rather that of Zebulun.

Bibliography. E. L. Curtis and A. A. Madsen, Chronicles, ICC (1910), pp. 145-49.

2. A Benjaminite among those who joined forces with David at Ziklag (I Chr. 12:5—H 12:6).

3. A Merarite Levite (I Chr. 24:30; same as "Jeremoth" [yᵉrēmôth] in 23:23).

4. A Levite of the "sons of Heman" (I Chr. 25:4; same as "Jeremoth" [yᵉrēmôth] in 25:22).

5. A son of King David, and the father of Mahalath, a wife (and cousin) of King Rehoboam (II Chr. 11:18).

6. A Levite; one of those who helped supervise the temple treasuries in the reign of King Hezekiah (ca. 715-687 B.C.; II Chr. 31:13).

7. KJV form of JEREMOTH 1; 5 (correctly of the latter).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 39, 226. B. T. DAHLBERG

JERIOTH jĕr′ĭ ŏth [יריעות, tents] (I Chr. 2:18). One of the wives of Caleb. The MT is obviously in disorder; either Jerioth is another name for Azubah, or Azubah was formerly the wife of another man called Jerioth.

Bibliography. G. Richter, "Untersuchungen zu den Geschlechtsregistern der Chronik I," ZAW, XXXIV (1914), 109-10.

J. F. Ross

JEROBOAM jĕr'ə bō'əm [ירבעם, may the people grow numerous]. 1. The first king of Israel (ca. 922-901 B.C.); son of Nebat. Jeroboam was chosen as king of the ten N tribes at the disruption of the kingdom following the death of Solomon.

The parallelism between the names of the two rivals Jeroboam and Rehoboam may very well be deliberate, and both may be throne names. In both cases the power of the people (עם) is stressed as against the power of the king. There may be a connection with the Babylonian "Hammurabi." See REHOBOAM.

Jeroboam reigned for twenty-two years (I Kings 14:20).

There are two accounts of Jeroboam, prior to his becoming king. These are contained in I Kings 11:26-40 and in the Greek supplement to I Kings 12:24 ff; 14:18 ff. According to the former, he was an Ephraimite from the village of Zeredah (the modern Deir Ghassaneh), SW of Shechem. His father was Nebat, and his mother Zeruah (i.e., "leprous"). She was a widow (I Kings 11:26). When next we hear of Jeroboam, he was a young man employed in fortification work which Solomon had ordered to be done in Jerusalem. His marked ability and industry brought him to the attention of the king, who appointed him overseer of the corvée of the house of Joseph (vss. 27-28; cf. 5:13 ff). As such, Jeroboam must have become aware of the deep resentment this system evoked among the people. This awareness may have caused him to rebel against the king and to side with the people. No open act of rebellion, however, is mentioned. Where such would be expected in the narrative, there appears the story of the prophet AHIJAH the Shilonite, who met Jeroboam one day as he was leaving Jerusalem. Ahijah symbolically tore his new robe into twelve pieces, gave ten of them to Jeroboam, and announced in the name of the Lord, the God of Israel, that on Solomon's death he would give ten tribes to Jeroboam, while one tribe would be left to Solomon's son, for the sake of David. The prophecy ended with the promise that if Jeroboam continued loyal and true to the Lord, his kingdom would endure (I Kings 11:29-39). "Solomon sought therefore to kill Jeroboam," but he fled to Egypt to the protection of Shishak king of Egypt, and there he remained until Solomon's death. It is clear that the connection between vs. 39 and vs. 40, if any, is a very loose one, inasmuch as the narrative records that "the two of them were alone in the open country" when Ahijah's prophecy was made. The same thing is true of the connection between vs. 28 and vs. 29.

Two points in particular in this story call for comment. Is this episode of Ahijah, which makes him the chief instigator of the revolt, historically trustworthy? That it may have a basis in fact is to be granted, but it does not belong in its present position. In this story of Jeroboam material taken from two different sources has been combined by the Deuteronomic editor of Kings. It does not account for Solomon's hostility and Jeroboam's consequent flight to Egypt, nor does it adequately explain the choice of Jeroboam as king on his return.

The probable explanation of the reference to ten tribes and one tribe in vss. 31-32, and again in vss. 35-36, is that it was customary in later times to speak of the ten tribes of the N, and of the S kingdom of Judah. At this time Benjamin may have been considered as part of Judah. It may not have recovered from the massacre of the people recorded in Judg. 19-21.

According to the latter account Jeroboam was an Ephraimite. His mother's name was Sarira, and she was a harlot. Consequently, no mention is made of his father's name. Solomon had made him overseer of the corvée of the house of Joseph. He built a city called Sarira on Mount Ephraim. He had three hundred chariots. Using the levies of Ephraim, he built the Akra and enclosed the city of David. Then he rebelled against Solomon, wishing to become king himself. Solomon therefore attempted to kill him, but he fled to Egypt to the protection of Sousakim (Shishak). There he remained until the death of Solomon. When word reached him that Solomon was dead, he wanted to return home, but Sousakim was unwilling to let him go. Parenthetically we learn that Jeroboam had married the Pharaoh's sister-in-law, who had borne him a son, Abia. Sousakim finally gave him permission to return. He came back to Sarira, where the tribes of Ephraim gathered to him, and there he built a fortress. Then follow the story of the sickness of his son, the prophecy of Ahijah, and the death of the child (cf. I Kings 14:1-18). After this Jeroboam came to Shechem, where he gathered the tribes together. This is followed by the prophecy of Samaias the Elamite (cf. I Kings 11:29 ff). The rest of the Greek supplement corresponds to the Hebrew text of I Kings 12:1-24.

Of the two accounts the Hebrew is to be preferred. It is more objective and impartial. The Greek account is clearly biased against Jeroboam. He had prophetic backing at first, even though it was later withdrawn. This may be the reason for the insertion of Ahijah's prophecy in I Kings 11:29-39.

When he heard of the death of Solomon, Jeroboam returned from Egypt. The present text of both Kings and Chronicles indicates that on his return he was summoned by the assembly of the N tribes to Shechem (I Kings 12:2-3; II Chr. 10:2-3), and that he took part in the complaint made to King Rehoboam to redress the grievances of the people. It is clear, however, from I Kings 12:20 that Jeroboam was not present at the discussions with the king. Only after Rehoboam had given his answer and the standard of revolt had been raised by the N, was Jeroboam called to the assembly and made king of the ten tribes. He had already demonstrated his ability. As an overseer he was familiar with the dissatisfaction of the people, and he had apparently sided with them against Solomon, who tried to kill him. This man was the people's choice.

A major task faced Jeroboam at the very outset. It was essential to consolidate the kingdom and to counteract the well-established position in which Jerusalem stood both politically and religiously, but actual details of the reign are absent. This may be due to two factors: (a) The violence of Shishak's invasion which occurred in the fifth year of King Rehoboam (ca. 918). It is now known from archaeological evidence that in this invasion Israel, as well as Judah, was laid waste, although the biblical record speaks only of the invasion of Judah. The young N kingdom, which had not had time to establish itself, fared worse than the S kingdom. Hence actual historical data of the period are missing. (b) Despite the evidence of I Kings 12:21-24; II Chr. 11:1-4, the historicity of which is questionable, it is extremely probable that Jeroboam was engaged in border warfare with Judah throughout his reign (I Kings 15:6; II Chr. 12:15*b;* cf. also I Kings 13:3-20). This may have engaged much of his attention.

Jeroboam fortified ("built") Shechem (I Kings 12:25)—this has been confirmed by archaeology—and made it his capital. The cryptic statement that follows: "He went out from there and built Penuel," may indicate that he established a new capital there. This, however, appears unlikely. It is more probable that he established a strong point on the other side of the Jordan at Penuel on the Jabbok River, so as to be able to command the trade routes over the Jordan. He later moved to a new capital, Tirzah (14:17), the modern Tell el-Far'ah, although this is not stated directly. Nor is any reason given for the change. From the military point of view, however, Shechem could have been defended only with difficulty.

Later Judean prejudice has colored the account of Jeroboam's so-called religious innovations to such an extent that it is difficult to assess their true value. Cf. the formula used by the Deuteronomist in passing judgment on most of the kings of the N kingdom: "He walked in the way of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin." Our sources consist of a late tradition (I Kings 12:26-31), and two stories which come from a prophetic source (I Kings 12:32–13:32; 14:1-18). Jeroboam would not have dared to substitute the worship of any other God in place of Yahweh with any hope of success. He therefore proceeded to reorganize the Yahweh cult on the basis of old traditions which were characteristic of the N tribes. For this purpose he chose two sites—Dan, in the far N, and Bethel. Bethel had been the scene of a theophany to Jacob (Gen. 28:10 ff), and Dan claimed connection with the family of Moses (Judg. 18:30). Further, tradition affirmed that the golden bull calf had been introduced into the Israelite cult by Aaron while Moses was still alive (Exod. 32). What Jeroboam did was to alter, not the worship of Yahweh, but the symbolism of the cult. For the cherubim of the S, which bore the invisible presence of Yahweh, Jeroboam substituted the bull. The change, as was almost inevitable, led to syncretistic worship, and it is questionable that Jeroboam was motivated by a real religious concern. Rather, political expediency dominated his action.

It is further stated that he made houses on high places (I Kings 12:31), but it is to be noted that removal of these is not attributed either to David or to Solomon. From the point of view of the temple priesthood in Jerusalem, he was guilty of an unpardonable crime in appointing non-Levitical priests to have charge of the cult (II Chr. 11:13-15; 13:9). Not only this, but he dared to burn incense himself—this was the prerogative of the priests—and he appointed a feast in the eighth month, similar to the feast held in Judah in the seventh month. It is probable that Jeroboam is here in line with the old Israelite practice, and that originally the feast was celebrated in the eighth month. Only later, with the change of calendar, did it come to fall in the seventh month.

The story of the nameless man of God (I Kings 13:1 ff) who came from Judah and appeared suddenly at Bethel while Jeroboam was burning incense at the altar, is of doubtful historical value. On the contrary, 14:1-18, which tells of the sickness of Jeroboam's son Abijah, of the visit of his mother in disguise to the prophet Ahijah, of his prediction of Abijah's death on her return home, and of the doom of Jeroboam's house, probably contains factual data. The parallel in the Greek in 12:24 g-n is to be noted, but the present Hebrew version is to be accepted. It gives a consistent picture. The movement which began under prophetic auspices and with prophetic backing ended in failure. Jeroboam proved unequal to the situation.

I Kings 14:19 refers to the "Book of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel" for the record of the wars of Jeroboam; but apart from the general statement (I Kings 14:30) that there was continual war between Rehoboam and Jeroboam, no details of specific battles are given. That the statement gives a true picture of existing conditions is, however, not to be doubted. II Chr. 13:3-19 purports to give details of one such battle between Abijah, Rehoboam's son, and Jeroboam which resulted in a great victory for the S kingdom. There is no reason to question the historicity of the battle which took place near Mount Zemaraim, in the neighborhood of Bethel in the hill country of Ephraim (II Chr. 13:4). The result was noteworthy. The Israelites fled before the men of Judah, and Abijah's forces took Bethel, Jeshanah, and Ephron, each with its villages (vs. 19). Jeshanah and Ephron both lay NE of Bethel. This warfare involved the border territory for the most part, as was only to be expected. That this territory frequently changed hands is evident from the story in I Kings 15:16. The details of the battle of Mount Zemaraim given by the Chronicler are historically unreliable. His account is colored by his theological viewpoint. The probability is that Abijah had made a covenant with the king of Syria, as is actually stated in I Kings 15:19; II Chr. 16:3. The Chronicler hints at an unusual kind of death for Jeroboam (II Chr. 13:20), but it is more likely that he died peacefully (I Kings 14:20).

It is difficult to define precisely the line of demarcation which separated the two kingdoms. It appears probable that the territory of Benjamin was joined to Judah, although the N kingdom did not give up its claim to this territory without a struggle. The border seems to have passed through the territory formerly occupied by the Danites (cf. the mention of Zorah and Aijalon in the list of cities fortified by Rehoboam; II Chr. 11:10).

Bibliography. J. Skinner, Kings, Century Bible (ca. 1893), pp. 443 ff. J. Morgenstern, "Three Calendars of Ancient Israel," HUCA, I (1924), 67 ff. W. F. Albright, "Archaeological and Topographical Explorations in Palestine and Syria," BASOR, 49 (1933), 26 ff; From the Stone Age to Christianity

(1940), pp. 228 ff; "The Chronology of the Divided Monarchy," BASOR, 100 (1945), 16-22. T. J. Meek, Hebrew Origins (1950), pp. 160 ff. J. A. Montgomery, The Book of Kings, ICC (1951), pp. 242-67. E. R. Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings (1951), pp. 55 ff. W. F. Albright, "New Light from Egypt on the Chronology and History of Israel and Judah," BASOR, 130 (1953), 4-8. W. Harrelson, B. W. Anderson, and G. E. Wright, "Shechem, the 'Navel of the Land,'" BA, XX (1957), 2-32.

2. King of Israel ca. 786-746 B.C.; son and successor of Joash.

Jeroboam reigned for forty-one years (II Kings 14:23). The book of Kings furnishes but scant information about his achievements, but it is clear that under him the N kingdom attained a prosperity such as it had not known before. See AMOS; HOSEA.

The summary of the reign in II Kings 14:28 tells of all that Jeroboam did, "and his might, how he fought, and how he recovered for Israel Damascus and Hamath, which had belonged to Judah." The MT reads: "and how he recovered Damascus and Hamath for Judah in Israel." Perhaps two items have been telescoped here. The only word of the second that has survived is ליהודה ("to Judah"), which has been misplaced in the present text. The verse records an Israelite expansion to the N, involving Damascus and Hamath, and a further expansion to the S, involving Judah. This would seem to be borne out by the general statement that "he restored the border of Israel from the entrance of Hamath as far as the Sea of the Arabah" (vs. 25). These two terms expressed the N and S boundaries of Israel ideally (cf. Amos 6:14). An oracle to this effect had been given by the prophet Jonah the son of Amittai, who belonged to Gath-hepher (II Kings 14:25). To this prophet was assigned the later prophetic book which bears his name. He was clearly an intense nationalist, and as such stands over against his contemporaries Amos and Hosea (cf. Amos 6:13-14).

Details of Jeroboam's campaigns are almost entirely lacking. Amos has a reference to the conquest of Lo-debar and Karnaim (6:13) in Gilead.

The international situation was particularly favorable to Israel. Assyria was weak and managed to retain only a measure of control in the W by a series of campaigns against Damascus and Hamath. The Eponym Canon lists five such campaigns. In addition Damascus and Hamath vied bitterly with each other for mastery in Syria. Against this background Jeroboam's successes against both Hamath and Damascus are to be understood.

While the cult of Yahweh flourished as never before, Baalism still prevailed among a large number of the people. The Samaria Ostraca (ca. 778-770) indicate a large number of personal names formed with "Baal." According to Amos, everything in the land was crooked (8:7-9). A great gulf separated the rich and the poor. Trade was good; architecture and the arts flourished; but fundamentally the revival was unsound and could not last.

Bibliography. A Alt, Die syrische Staatenwelt vor dem Einbruch der Assyrer, ZDMG, 88 (1934), 233-58; F.-M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine, II (1938), 341-42; E. R. Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings (1951), pp. 288 ff; J. B. Pritchard, ed., ANET (2nd ed., 1955), p. 321; M. Noth, Geschichte Israels (3rd ed., 1956), pp. 227-28; G. E. Wright, Biblical Archaeology (1957), pp. 157-60. H. B. MACLEAN

JEROHAM jĭ rō′hăm [ירחם, perhaps soft or delicate; see bibliography]. 1. An Ephraimite, and the father or ancestor of Elkanah the father of Samuel (I Sam. 1:1). The Chronicler represents him as a Levite (I Chr. 6:27, 34).

2. A Benjaminite of Gedor (locality uncertain); father or ancestor of two of the men who joined David's forces at Ziklag (I Chr. 12:7); possibly related to 6 below.

3. Father or ancestor of one Azarel who was a chief officer over the tribe of Dan during the reign of King David (I Chr. 27:22).

4. Father or ancestor of a certain Azariah, one of the military officers involved in the uprising against Queen Athaliah which resulted in her execution (II Chr. 23:1).

5. A Benjaminite (I Chr. 8:27); perhaps the same as "Jeremoth" in 8:14, and perhaps identical with 6 below.

6. Father or ancestor of a Benjaminite among the residents of postexilic Jerusalem (I Chr. 9:8; absent in the parallel Neh. 11:7).

7. A priest resident in postexilic Jerusalem (I Chr. 9:12; Neh. 11:12).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 226. B. T. DAHLBERG

JERUBBAAL jĕr′ə bāl [ירבעל, Baal contends (if the root of the verb is ריב); Baal multiplies (if the root is רבב)]. The name given to Gideon when he broke down his father's Baal altar (Judg. 6:32), and thereafter stated to be Gideon's other name (7:1; 8:35) or used in place of "Gideon" (8:29; 9:1-2, 5, 16, 19, 24, 28, 57; I Sam. 12:11). The root meaning of the name expresses the power of Baal either to fight for himself or to make fruitful (see above; it is probably not "Baal teaches" or "founds," from the root ירה). As such it could originally have referred to Yahweh as the "Baal" or "lord" who has these qualities. Thus, as some interpret, it could have been Gideon's original name, or, according to others, the name of a person other than Gideon. In the context of Judg. 6:32, however, it seems clearly to be understood as ironically urging the impotent god Baal's defiance of Yahweh's hero. Thus under the anti-Baalism preaching of the prophets the name later was corrupted to Jerubbesheth in order to poke shame upon all Baal-worship and obliterate the Baal element in the word (cf. Ishbosheth for Ishbaal, and Mephibosheth for Meribaal).

Bibliography. J. Pedersen, Israel: Its Life and Culture, III-IV (1940), 205; M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 77, 119-22, 206-7; W. F. Albright, Archaeology and the Religion of Israel (1946), p. 112; M. Noth, History of Israel (1958), pp. 152-53. C. F. KRAFT

JERUBBESHETH jĭ rŭb′ə shĕth [ירבשת, shame contends, or shame multiplies(?)] (II Sam. 11:21). The deformation of the name JERUBBAAL by substituting the word "shame" for the god name "Baal" in order to obliterate the Baal element in the original name (cf. Ishbosheth for Ishbaal, and Mephibosheth for Meribaal). C. F. KRAFT

JERUEL jĭ rōō′əl [ירואל, founded by God(?)] (II Chr. 20:16). A wilderness area between Tekoa and En-gedi; scene of Jehoshaphat's defeat of the Ammonite-Moabite-Meunite coalition. For the name, cf. יריאל, Jeriel and Penuel-Peniel.

JERUSALEM jĭ rōō'sə ləm [ירושלם, foundation of Shalem; Ἱερουσαλήμ, Ἱεροσόλυμα]. The chief city of Palestine. Sacred to Jews and Christians to this day as the "city of the great King," and to Muslims as the third most holy city of Islam, Jerusalem outranks all other cities of the Bible in prominence and wealth of sacred associations. Under one name or another it appears in about two thirds of the books of the OT and about half of the books of the NT.

Figs. JER 17-18; Pl. XXIX.

1. Names
2. Situation and general topography
3. Early history
   a. Prehistoric times
   b. The Early and Middle Bronze Ages
   c. Abraham at Jerusalem
   d. The Late Bronze Age
4. The period of conquest and settlement
   a. The conquest and division of the land
   b. The time of the judges
5. The early monarchy
   a. The reign of David
   b. The reign of Solomon
6. The kingdom of Judah
   a. Rehoboam, Asa, and Joash
   b. Amaziah, Uzziah, and Jotham
   c. Ahaz and Hezekiah; Isaiah and Micah
   d. Manasseh and Josiah; Zephaniah
   e. Jehoahaz, Jehoiakim, Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah; Jeremiah
7. The Exile and the Persian period
   a. Sheshbazzar and Zerubbabel
   b. Ezra and Nehemiah
   c. Visions of the future
8. The Greek period
9. The Hasmonean period
10. The early Roman period and the reign of Herod
11. The lifetime of Jesus
12. The apostolic period to the death of Agrippa I
13. From the death of Agrippa I to the fall of Jerusalem

Bibliography

1. Names. The name Jerusalem appears first in Egyptian "Execration Texts" of the nineteenth and eighteenth centuries B.C., in a form equivalent to Urushalim. In the Amarna Letters of the fourteenth century (see TELL EL-AMARNA) it is written Urusalim. Later Assyrian texts have the form Urusilimmu. In the Hebrew OT the Masoretic vowel points (see MASORA) indicate the pronunciation yᵉrûšālayim; in the Aramaic parts of the OT, however, the pronunciation indicated is yᵉrûšālēm. The Greek transliteration Ἱερουσαλήμ, used regularly in the LXX and often in the NT, follows the Aramaic pronunciation.

The meaning of the name is undoubtedly "foundation of Shalem." The traditional interpretation, "city of peace," is as inaccurate etymologically as it is inappropriate historically. The root yrh is used in Job 38:6 in the sense of "laying" a cornerstone; it appears also in other names (see JERUEL; JERIEL; JERIAH).

Copyright: The Matson Photo Service

17. Jerusalem as seen from the Mount of Olives

Courtesy of the Arab Information Center, New York

18. Air view of Jerusalem, showing the Dome of the Rock Mosque to the right in the rectangular square, and the Kidron Valley in the right foreground Jerusalem was evidently in early times a center of the worship of Shulmanu or SHALEM. In the Amarna Letters the city is apparently called Beth-shalem, the name Jerusalem being applied to the territory of which it is the capital.

The first name under which the city appears in the Bible is Salem, or more exactly Shalem, שלם (see § 3*c below*). This is clearly a shortened form, using only the name of the god and omitting the noun Yeru ("foundation of") or Beth ("house of"). The Egyptian texts mentioned above show that the longer name was older than the time of Abraham. In Ps. 76:2, Salem is used as a poetic name for Jerusalem.

Other names applied to the Holy City will be discussed in connection with the passages where they first appear. They include Moriah (see MORIAH 2; cf. § 3*c below*); JEBUS (cf. § 4*b below*); ZION (cf. § 5*a below*); City of David (see DAVID, CITY OF; cf. § 5*a below*); and Ariel (see ARIEL 2).

2. Situation and general topography. Jerusalem is located at approximately 31 degrees N latitude and 35 degrees E longitude. It lies on the central plateau at an altitude of ca. 2,500 feet above sea level. Its location makes it a natural center of the country, both commercially and politically. The main route between Shechem on the N and Hebron on the S meets here the road from Jericho and the Jordan Valley on the E and several converging routes from the Mediterranean on the W.

This is not the highest point in the country or even in the immediate vicinity. A traveler from any direction cannot see the city until he has crossed the hills "round about Jerusalem" (Ps. 125:2). This is especially true of the site of the earliest city, which was on the lowest of the hills occupied by Jerusalem in later centuries. Now outside the city altogether, this hill is at the SE corner of the group of hills. All the subsequent expansion has been to the N and the W.

Millar Burrows

MAP I. Relief map of Jerusalem

The principal features of the site can still be discerned, though at many points they have been greatly altered by natural erosion and even more by the hand of man, cutting and filling in, destroying and

Courtesy of Westminster Press

19. Plan of Jerusalem today rebuilding. The valleys, which were once deep ravines, have so filled with sediment and debris that in some places, especially where they pass through the city, they are now only slight depressions. Fig. JER 19.

A glance at Map I will give a better idea of the site than any description. The black lines mark the course of the sixteenth-century Turkish walls, enclosing what is now called the Old City. It will be seen that except on the N the city is surrounded by valleys. On the W and the S is the Valley of Hinnom or of the son of Hinnom (see HINNOM, VALLEY OF). On the E is the Kidron Valley (see KIDRON, BROOK).* Running through the city from N to S and dividing it into two very unequal parts is a central valley not named in the Bible but known in Roman times as the Tyropoeon, or Cheesemakers', Valley. Pl. XXV*a*.

There are three different Hebrew words for VALLEY. The Kidron is always designated as a naḥal, translated "brook," "torrent," or "ravine." The general word for "valley," gē', is applied to the Hinnom Valley. The third word, 'ēmeq, is used for such a relatively broad, level valley or plain as the Valley of Rephaim (see § 3*a below*), the Valley of Shaveh (see § 3*c below*), or the King's Valley (see § 5*a below*); in Jer. 31:40—H 31:39 it is used for the "valley of the dead bodies and the ashes" (see § 6*e below*).

The hill to the E of the central valley is highest and broadest at its N end (A), which is the Temple Mount (see TEMPLE). The long, narrow, relatively low S end of the E hill (B) is the site of the ancient City of David (see § 5*a below*). Between these two, above the narrowest part of the hill, is the part (C) called OPHEL.

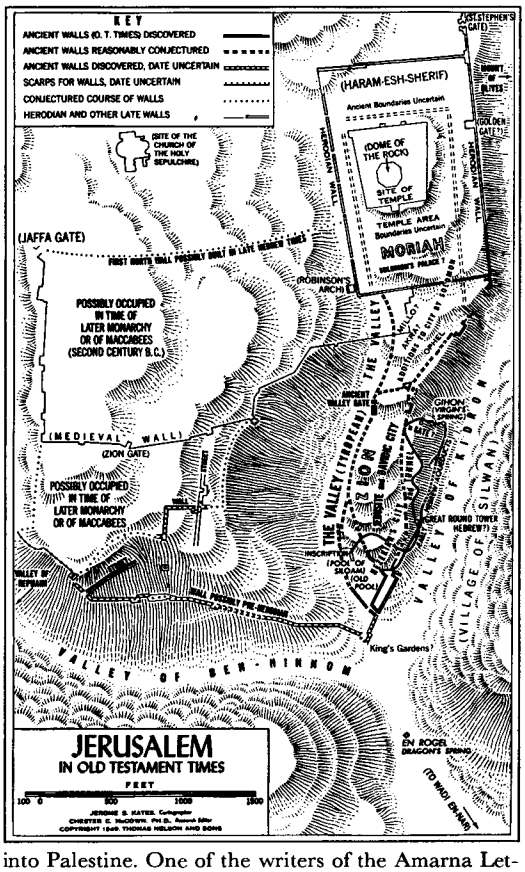
The higher and much larger hill (D) on the W side of the central valley is cut off on the N by a smaller valley, which runs from W to E into the central valley, just below the site of the temple. Its course is followed by what modern visitors know as David Street. At the NE corner of this hill a knob or promontory (E) projects into the central valley. To the N and W of the two valleys is the hill on which stands the Church of the Holy Sepulchre (F; see § 11 below). To the NW and beyond the present walls the ground continues to rise to the modern Russian Compound.

The first settlement was located on the low, narrow SE hill because only there was a convenient supply of water available. At the bottom of the hill on the W edge of the Kidron Valley is an intermittent spring now called Umm ed-Daraj ("Mother of Steps"), 'Ain Sitti Miryam (the "Spring of My Lady Mary"), or the Virgin's Spring. In the Bible its name is GIHON. Another spring, EN-ROGEL,* is the present-day "Job's Well." It is ca. 250 yards to the S of the southernmost tip of the hill. The location of the JACKAL'S WELL, mentioned by Nehemiah, is uncertain (see § 7*b below*). It is clear in any case that the ancient city depended upon Gihon for water. See §§ 3*d,* 6*c below.* Fig. ENR 29.

3. Early history. a. Prehistoric times. In the Valley of Rephaim (see REPHAIM, VALLEY OF), to the W and SW of Jerusalem, have been found Paleolithic and Mesolithic flints like those associated elsewhere with the Paleoanthropus Palestinensis (see PREHISTORY). At Jerusalem itself pottery from the fourth millennium B.C. has been excavated. Apparently during the last part of that millennium the SE hill (B) was occupied by a people, probably Semites, who used pottery and metal.

b. The Early and Middle Bronze Ages. Pottery of the Early and Middle Bronze Ages (see ARCHAEOLOGY; POTTERY; also Fig. POT 63, nos. 3-4) demonstrates the occupation of the site during the third and early second millenniums, preceding and during the period of the HYKSOS. Judged by modern standards, the walled city of this period was very small, occupying only between eight and nine acres, but Jericho at that time was even smaller, and Shechem was not much larger. At the upper end, a little to the N of the spring, there was a sanctuary; the royal palace and cemetery lay below this, and the rest of the hill to its S tip was occupied by the city.

Remains of Early Bronze Age walls have been discovered on this part of the hill. By the end of that period, indeed, or early in the Middle Bronze Age, the city evidently expanded to the N, for traces of walls from that time have been found along the E side of Ophel (C).



The W wall of the pre-Israelite city has not been traced, but a large gate uncovered near what must have been the NW corner of the city may indicate the original position of the wall at this point, though the actual remains probably come from a later time. At the S end of the hill a stone stairway cut out of the rock has been excavated. There are indications that it may go back to the earliest period of settlement, possibly before any wall and gate were built here.

c. Abraham at Jerusalem. The incidents related in Gen. 14 took place during the Middle Bronze Age. The city here called SALEM was undoubtedly Jerusalem (see § 1 above). The Valley of Shaveh, identified for ancient readers as the King's Valley (vs. 17; see SHAVEH, VALLEY OF), may have been the open space at the juncture of the Kidron and Hinnom valleys; but the fact that it was the king of Sodom who met Abram there suggests that this place was down in the Jordan Valley.

The second time that Abraham came, or may have come, to Jerusalem was the occasion of the offering of Isaac (Gen. 22:1-19). The place is indicated only as "one of the mountains" in the "land of MORIAH," but in II Chr. 3:1 the place where Solomon built the temple is called Mount Moriah. Coming up from Beer-sheba, Abraham might well reach Jerusalem on the third day; he would not be able to see it from a great distance, but the phrase "afar off" need not imply this (vs. 4). The name Moriah is itself subject to some suspicion. The LXX reads "the high land"; the Syr. reads "the Amorite land," which may be correct. By the time II Chr. 3:1 was written, however, it was believed that the temple hill was the place where Isaac had almost been sacrificed.

After the marvelous deliverance of his son, Abraham named the place "The LORD will provide" (see JEHOVAH-JIREH). As the marginal notes of the RSV indicate, neither the name nor its context is at all clear. Apparently this name was never in common use for Jerusalem.

d. The Late Bronze Age. In the fifteenth century B.C. or thereabouts the Hurrians or HORITES came into Palestine. One of the writers of the Amarna Letters (see TELL EL-AMARNA) was 'Abd-Ḫiba or Arti-Ḫepa, probably a Hurrian, who reigned at Jerusalem in the fourteenth century as a vassal of Egypt. The Hurrians introduced at Jerusalem, as elsewhere, improved methods of fortification. A strong masonry rampart which has been excavated on the E slope of Ophel (C) comes from this period. A later tower inserted in the rampart obscures its original form, but there are two curving sections, between which there was probably a gate. Farther S, at the end of the hill, have been found several lines of wall, one above another, which probably supported the successive stages of a similar rampart. The rulers of the city undertook also to ensure their water supply. At about the beginning of the Late Bronze Age several shafts and tunnels were cut in the solid rock above Gihon, affording access to the spring from inside the city.

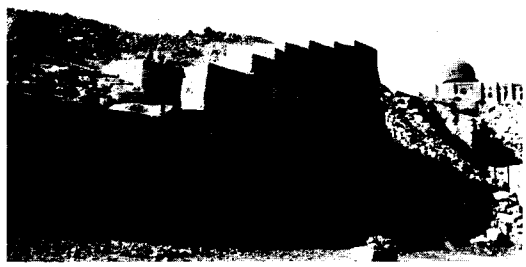
4. The period of conquest and settlement. a. The conquest and division of the land. The capture of Ai and the submission of Gibeon so alarmed the king of Jerusalem, ADONI-ZEDEK, that he formed a coalition with four other kings and attacked Gibeon (Josh. 10:1-5). Joshua promptly and decisively crushed the coalition, and Adoni-zedek perished with his allies, but Jerusalem was not taken (vss. 6-43).

The city appears again in the description of the boundaries of Judah and Benjamin (Josh. 15:7-8; 18: 16; see TRIBES, TERRITORIES OF). The points named in the boundary of Judah appear in the opposite order in the boundary of Benjamin. Coming up from the Jordan Valley, the line reaches En-rogel; thence it "goes up by the valley of the son of Hinnom at the southern shoulder of the Jebusite" (or more literally "to the shoulder of the Jebusite on the south") and on "up to the top of the mountain that lies over against the valley of Hinnom, on the west, at the northern end of the valley of Rephaim." All these points we have met before (see § 2 above), except the "shoulder of the Jebusite," of which 15:8 adds: "that is, Jerusalem."

That the Jebusites were the pre-Israelite inhabitants of Jerusalem is evident from many references (see JEBUS). The identification of the "shoulder of the Jebusite" with Jerusalem, however, raises questions, because proceeding from En-rogel, one turns W into the Valley of Hinnom before reaching the SE hill (B), which was the Jerusalem of Joshua's time. The "shoulder" must be the SW hill (D). It was doubtless held by the Jebusites and therefore may have been known by this name, even though it was outside the walled city. Later, when the explanation "that is, Jerusalem," was written, the city had spread over to the W hill. An alternative explanation is that the name Valley of Hinnom meant originally the central valley, the Tyropoeon (see § 2 above); but while this disposes of some difficulties, it raises others which make it unacceptable.

Judg. 1:1-8 reports that Judah and Simeon defeated and cruelly mutilated Adoni-bezek (see above), and that Judah captured Jerusalem, slaughtered the inhabitants, and burned the city. Apparently, however, the Jebusites soon reoccupied and rebuilt it. According to Josh. 15:63, "the Jebusites dwell with the people of Judah at Jerusalem to this day." Judg. 1:21 makes the same statement concerning the tribe of Benjamin.

b. The time of the judges. In Judg. 19:10-12 it is said that on the way back from Bethlehem the Levite and his concubine arrived at nightfall "opposite Jebus (that is, Jerusalem)." The Levite's servant proposed that they "turn aside to this city of the Jebusites," but the Levite refused to "turn aside into the city of foreigners." Just where the road was that brought the travelers "opposite" or "near" the city, yet would have required them to "turn aside" to enter it, we cannot tell. Possibly it was on the W side of the W hill.



The name Jebus occurs elsewhere only in I Chr. 11:4, which says that David and his followers "went to Jerusalem, that is Jebus, where the Jebusites were." The parallel in II Sam. 5:6 (see § 5*a below*) does not use this name. It is clearly not an older name than Jerusalem (see § 1 above). Perhaps it was used by the Hebrews to designate the city of the Jebusites.

5. The early monarchy. a. The reign of David. The account of the capture of Jerusalem by David in II Sam. 5:6-9 is obscure, and the text is undoubtedly corrupt. The parallel in I Chr. 11:4-8 does not resolve the difficulties. Without attempting to explain the references to the blind and the lame, which the Chronicler omits, we note first that "David took the stronghold of Zion, that is, the city of David." Here we first encounter the name ZION.

Was the "stronghold of Zion" the same as Jerusalem? The word "stronghold" would suggest a fortress or a fortified part of the city, but this would hardly be called the "city of David." Possibly "Jerusalem" had then a somewhat wider connotation than "Zion," but this is uncertain. The name Zion was applied in later times to the temple hill; still later tradition transferred it to the SW hill.

David's statement: "Whoever would smite the Jebusites, let him get up the water shaft" (II Sam. 5:8), becomes in I Chr. 11:6: "Whoever shall smite the Jebusites first shall be chief and commander." The KJV borrows the last clause from I Chronicles to complete the sentence in II Samuel. The original text probably read something like this: "Whoever reaches the water shaft first and smites the Jebusites and the lame and blind, who are hated by David's soul, shall be chief and commander." The word translated "water shaft" appears elsewhere only in Ps. 42:7, where it means "cataracts" (KJV "waterspouts"). In II Sam. 5:8 it may mean the rock-cut shaft already mentioned (see § 3*d above*), by which access was afforded to the spring from within the city. Many, therefore, suppose that Joab climbed up this shaft and took the Jebusites by surprise. The verb here used, however, does not mean "get up" (RSV) but "touch" or "reach" (KJV "get up to"). What David challenged his men to accomplish was to fight their way up to the opening of the shaft and so cut off the Jebusites from their water supply.

Courtesy of Herbert G. May

20. Walls excavated on the SE hill of Jerusalem, part of which has been ascribed by some archaeologists as built in the time of David

David now made the stronghold his own dwelling place and "built the city round about from the Millo inward" (vs. 9). The term MILLO occurs again later (see §§ 5*b*, 6*a*, c below). Literally it means "filling," and it probably designates a place where a depression, a ditch, or a breach in the wall was filled in, but what or where this was we can only guess. On the W side of the E hill just to the S of the temple area, where the hill was originally very narrow, an accumulation of debris has filled in the curve of the valley and widened the hill. If this was the Millo, II Sam. 5:9 means that David's building extended to the S from this area. Portions of walls excavated on the SE hill have been attributed by archaeologists to David, but none can be dated with certainty in his time. Fig. JER 20.

The selection of Jerusalem as the royal capital was a step of great historic importance. Belonging to neither the N nor the S tribes, it facilitated the unification of the kingdom. It constituted also a personal domain for David and his descendants and so promoted the establishment of a long-lasting hereditary dynasty. David also made Jerusalem the religious capital of the nation by bringing the sacred ark to the city and setting up a tent for it, presumably near the palace (II Sam. 6). After building his own palace, David aspired to build a house for God too, but was not allowed to do so (II Sam. 7).

Where David's house was built (II Sam. 5:11) we cannot tell. A reference to it in Neh. 12:37 (see § 7*b below*) suggests that it was near the S end of the hill and on the E side. It was, no doubt, from a window of this house that Michal looked with disgust at her husband's undignified behavior when the ark was brought into the city (II Sam. 6:16, 20-23). From the roof of this house David saw Bathsheba bathing (11:1-5). Here Uriah was brought before the king, and here he "slept at the door of the king's house" (vss. 6-13). Here David made Bathsheba his wife after having Uriah killed (vss. 14-27), and no doubt it was here that Nathan denounced his sin and brought him to repentance (ch. 12). In this house Absalom for a while supplanted his father (15:16, 35), until David was brought back after Absalom's death (19:11; 20:3).

Absalom's own house is mentioned (II Sam. 14:24, 31). We read also that he set up a monument for himself in the King's Valley (18:18). This may be the place mentioned in Gen. 14:17 (see § 3*c above*), but neither reference gives any clue to its location. It may have been in the space at the confluence of the Kidron, the Tyropoeon, and the Hinnom valleys. The word rendered "valley" in this case, however, suggests an even broader area. See VALLEY; see also § 2 above.

Fleeing from Jerusalem at the time of Absalom's revolt, David crossed the brook Kidron (see § 2 above) and "went up the ascent of the Mount of Olives" (15:23, 30; see OLIVES, MOUNT OF), passing the "summit, where God was worshiped" (15:32; 16:1), and so going down to the Jordan Valley. During his absence he was informed of Absalom's doings by his spies, to whom a maidservant brought word while they hid at En-rogel (see § 2 above), until "a lad saw them, and told Absalom" (17:17-18).

The pathetic closing scenes of David's life (I Kings 1 ff) took place, no doubt, in the palace that Hiram's men had built for him (see above). When he died, he "was buried in the city of David" (2:10). Neh. 3:16 (see § 7*b below*) indicates that the "sepulchres of David" were near the S end of the SE hill on its E side. Remains of ancient tombs excavated in this area may indicate the place. The traditional site on the SW hill has no claim to authenticity; in David's time that hill was not "in the city of David." See TOMBS OF THE KINGS.

b. The reign of Solomon. When Adonijah attempted to seize the throne, he offered sacrifices "by the SERPENT'S STONE, which is beside En-rogel"* (I Kings 1:9). Aside from its being "beside En-rogel" (see §§ 2, 4*a*, 5*a above*), its location is unknown. Prompt action by Nathan led to the anointing of Solomon at Gihon (1:38-40; see § 2 above). Adonijah sought sanctuary at the altar (vs. 50). This was in the tent David had set up for the ark (see § 5*a above*), as is stated in connection with Joab's vain attempt to escape Solomon's wrath (2:28-34). Fig. ENR 29.

Solomon's most important act was undoubtedly the building of the TEMPLE; it was only one, however, of his many building enterprises. In addition to the "house of the LORD" and "his own house," he built the "wall around Jerusalem" (I Kings 3:1; 9:15), not to mention many buildings at other places. The building of the temple required an extension of the city's walls to enclose and protect the holy precincts. From the NE corner of David's city the wall was carried to the N above the Kidron Valley. Its foundation was set in the rock nearly a hundred feet below the level of the ground at the bottom of the modern wall. About where the Golden Gate now stands, the wall turned and followed to the NW the S edge of a small valley now covered by the N part of the sacred area. After crossing the crest of the hill, it turned again to the left and proceeded southward, perhaps a little to the E of the present wall.

The SW corner of the present ḥaram or sacred enclosure juts out into the Tyropoeon Valley, which originally curved to the E near the position of the "Wailing Wall." Solomon's wall may have followed the valley to the SE until it reached the NW corner of the City of David; from this point it could follow the old wall of the SE hill. Whether it did so cannot be determined without our knowing whether Solomon enclosed the SW hill. This question cannot be answered at present.

Involved with it is the identification of "the Millo" which Solomon built (I Kings 9:15, 24; 11:27). The previous mention of the Millo in the story of David (see § 5*a above*) implies only that the place referred to was known by that name in the writer's time. The statements in I Kings 9; 11 may mean that Solomon merely rebuilt something which already existed, but they suggest that it was a new structure. In 11:27 it is connected with closing the "breach of the city of David." We do not know where or what this breach was. The word translated "breach" must mean here, as elsewhere (e.g., Neh. 6:1), a break in the city's fortifications, but what was built to fill this breach must have been something rather imposing to be included in the lists of Solomon's major achievements and to bear a special name for centuries. See §§ 6*a-c below*.

In Eccl. 2:6 the "Preacher, the son of David, king in Jerusalem," says that he made pools for irrigating his trees. This no doubt reflects a tradition that Solomon made some provision for Jerusalem's water supply. One of a series of ancient rock-cut channels, which led the overflow from Gihon to the lower end of the SE hill and the valleys below it, is plausibly attributed by archaeologists to Solomon. Just above the strong ancient wall across the mouth of the Tyropoeon Valley there is an older and lighter wall which seems to have been built to form a pool for the water from this channel; it may have been the work of Solomon (see SILOAM; also Fig. SIL 60). Both walls, however, may be later (see § 6 below). A similar channel, made to bring water to Jerusalem from what are traditionally known as Solomon's Pools, near Bethlehem, may go back in its earliest form to Solomon. See POOL.

Within the city there were other works of the royal builder. Along with the temple and the city wall "his own house" is mentioned (I Kings 3:1; 7:1, 8; 9:1, 15; see PALACE). With this are named also the HOUSE OF THE FOREST OF LEBANON, the Hall of Pillars, and the Hall of the Throne or Hall of Judgment, with incidental mention of the "great court" and the "other court back of the hall" (7:2-12; see HALL 2). There are references also to a house built by Solomon for his Egyptian wife (I Kings 7:8; 9:24). This great complex of buildings evidently lay in the area between the City of David and the temple. Figs. JER 17; HOU 32-33.

Less to his credit are the pagan altars which Solomon built for his foreign wives. Where these were located we are not told, except that the high place for Chemosh and Moab was "on the mountain east of Jerusalem," which was no doubt the southernmost summit of the Mount of Olives, now known as the Mount of Offense (I Kings 11:7-8). In spite of this apostasy, Solomon was buried in the City of David when he died (11:43).

6. The kingdom of Judah. Too many events at Jerusalem are recorded to be noted here. From here on, only events especially affecting the city itself and references to particular buildings or parts of the city will be considered.

a. Rehoboam, Asa, and Joash. In the reign of Rehoboam, the Egyptian king Shishak attacked Jerusalem and plundered both the temple and the palace (I Kings 14:25-26). Rehoboam and most of his successors continued to be buried in the City of David (14:31; 15:8; etc.). Asa, the third after Solomon, deposed his mother, who "had an abominable image made for Asherah," from the rank of queen mother, and the image was burned in the Kidron Valley (I Kings 15:13).

The next event involving topographical details at Jerusalem is the accession of Joash (II Kings 11). The young prince was crowned in the temple, after guards had been posted at the palace, at the "gate Sur" (see GATE; SUR), and at the "gate behind the guards" (vss. 5-6). Neither of these gates can be located. Presumably the "gate behind the guards" was the same as the "gate of the guards" (vs. 19), through which the new king was taken to his palace; it was therefore between the temple and the palace. In II Chr. 23:20 it is called the "upper gate" (see § 6*b below*). The gate Sur is called in II Chr. 23:5 the "Gate of the Foundation"; either name could be derived by a scribal error from the other.

When Athaliah came on the scene, she was seized by the guards and taken "through the horses' entrance to the king's house" (II Kings 11:16; cf. II Chr. 23:15: "into the entrance of the horse gate of the king's house"), where she was killed. The HORSE GATE appears again in Neh. 3:28; Jer. 31:40, both of which indicate a position on the E side of the hill, near the Kidron Valley. Since it obviously led from the temple to the palace, it must have been near the SE corner of the temple enclosure, not far from the city wall but probably not a part of it (see §§ 6*e*, 7*a-b below*).

Following the coronation of Joash, the temple of Baal was destroyed. Where this was is not indicated. Joash also repaired the temple. See TEMPLE, JERUSALEM, § A1*d*.

At about this time Jerusalem was threatened by Hazael, king of Syria. Joash bought security at the cost of all the treasures of the temple and the palace (II Kings 12:17-18). According to the Chronicler, Jerusalem was attacked by the Syrians, and Joash was wounded (II Chr. 24:17-24). II Kings 12:20; II Chr. 24:25 agree that the servants of Joash conspired against him and killed him; the Chronicler, however, says that he was killed in his bed, while the account in Kings says that he was killed "in the house of Millo, on the way that goes down to Silla." Where Silla was is unknown; the "house of Millo" may or may not be the same Millo that was built by Solomon (see § 5*b above*). Like his predecessor, Joash was buried in the City of David (II Kings 12:21); the Chronicler adds, however, "but they did not bury him in the tombs of the kings" (II Chr. 24:25).

b. Amaziah, Uzziah, and Jotham. Amaziah, the successor of Joash, was defeated by Jehoash of Israel and taken captive at Beth-shemesh. Jehoash thereupon "came to Jerusalem, and broke down the wall of Jerusalem for four hundred cubits, from the Ephraim Gate to the Corner Gate" (II Kings 14:8-13). Other references to these two gates indicate their general position. See §§ 6*e*, 7*b below*.

The name of the Ephraim Gate suggests that a road to the N passed through it. When only the SE hill was occupied, a gate opening on the central valley would fulfil this purpose; by the time of Amaziah, however, the city wall almost certainly enclosed the SW hill also. Vestiges of an ancient wall, perhaps as old as the ninth century B.C., have been discovered, running E and W, a little to the S of the present David Street. At about the intersection of this line and the first street leading N to the Damascus Gate,* the top of a large Roman arch is now visible above ground. The Ephraim Gate of Amaziah's time probably stood at about this place. Fig. GAT 11.

The Corner Gate was then four hundred cubits (two hundred yards) away, probably at the W end of the wall just mentioned. This would put it at about the corner of the square in front of the present Citadel, where David Street begins its descent into the central valley. Because of the higher ground to the N and the W, this stretch of wall would be the most vulnerable in the city's defenses; and while Jehoash, coming from Beth-shemesh, would approach the city from the SW, he might well select this W portion of the N wall for destruction.

Important measures for the fortification of Jerusalem and other places are attributed to Amaziah's son Azariah, called also Uzziah. He "built towers in Jerusalem at the Corner Gate and at the Valley Gate and at the Angle, and fortified them" (II Chr. 26:9). The tower at the Corner Gate would strengthen the wall at a point where it had already been found to need special protection. The Valley Gate is mentioned here for the first time. It was in either the W or the S wall of the city. The SW corner, above the turn of the Valley of Hinnom, seems as likely a place as any. Where the ANGLE was is unknown. The Hebrew word may mean a recessed or inner angle, as distinguished from a projecting corner, but this is not certain. Other passages apply it to points in the city wall (see § 7*b below*); whether they refer to the same point mentioned here is not clear.

The only act with which Jotham is credited in II Kings is the building of the "upper gate of the house of the LORD" (15:35; see TEMPLE, JERUSALEM, § A1*d*). The Chronicler adds that Jotham "did much building on the wall of Ophel" (II Chr. 27:3).

c. Ahaz and Hezekiah; Isaiah and Micah. The momentous meeting of Ahaz with the prophet Isaiah recorded in Isa. 7 took place "at the end of the conduit of the upper pool on the highway to the FULLER'S FIELD." None of the topographical items here mentioned can be identified now. The "upper pool" has been located by different scholars on the N, E, S, and W sides of the city and even in the central valley. The other points are moved about accordingly. Almost exactly the same description of the place is given later in connection with another incident. See below.

The next chapter of Isaiah refers to the "waters of Shiloah that flow gently" (8:6). In the LXX this name takes the form SILOAM, as in the works of Josephus and in the gospels (see § 11 below). The Hebrew word means something like "conveyer." It would be an appropriate designation for one of the rock-cut channels which brought water from Gihon to and around the S end of the SE hill. Later this name was applied to Hezekiah's tunnel through the hill and the pool into which it emptied (see below), but these did not yet exist in the reign of Ahaz. The prophecy in Isa. 8:5-8 seems to reflect the situation after Ahaz had disregarded the warning of ch. 7 and had called Tiglath-pileser to his aid (II Kings 16:7).

In Hezekiah's reign Sennacherib "came up against all the fortified cities of Judah and took them" (II Kings 18:13). Hezekiah paid heavy tribute, despoiling both temple and palace (vss. 14-16), but Jerusalem was still threatened. Now occurred the incident referred to above: emissaries from Sennacherib came to Jerusalem to demand complete submission. "When they arrived, they came and stood by the conduit of the upper pool, which is on the highway to the Fuller's Field" (vs. 17). The conversation which ensued was heard by the people assembled on the wall (vs. 26). Apparently Hezekiah's officials were on the wall, while the Assyrian envoys stood below. Putting together the incidents of II Kings 18; Isa. 7, we learn only that the place described was outside the city wall but near it, on a highway, and beside a conduit which brought water to or from a pool. Fig. HEZ 18.

The term "upper pool" implies the existence of a "lower pool," and this name actually appears in Isa. 22:8-11. Here a king, probably Hezekiah, is said to have "looked to the weapons of the house of the forest" (presumably Solomon's House of the Forest of Lebanon; see § 5*b above*), and to have broken down houses "to fortify the wall" of Jerusalem. He is said also to have "collected the waters of the lower pool" and to have "made a reservoir between the walls for the water of the old pool." The old pool seems to be distinguished from the lower pool, although some commentators take vss. 9, 11, as referring to the same enterprise. The reservoir for the water of the old pool was evidently a new receptacle to receive water from that pool; collecting the waters of the lower pool, however, may mean either providing a receptacle for water from the pool or bringing the water together to fill it. The phrase "between the two walls" is intriguing, especially in view of the fact that a "gate between the two walls" near the "king's garden" is mentioned later (see § 6*e below*). If the same two walls are meant, a location near the mouth of the central valley is indicated for the reservoir of Isa. 22:11.

Further accounts of Hezekiah's defensive measures help to clarify the picture. II Kings 20:20 says that he "made the pool and the conduit and brought water into the city." II Chr. 32 gives a fuller account. Expecting an attack by Sennacherib, Hezekiah undertook "to stop the water of the springs that were outside the city" (vs. 3). This must mean Gihon in the Kidron Valley, the openings in the irrigation channels leading from it to the lower end of the hill, and En-rogel. The king and his men also "stopped all the springs and the brook that flowed through the land." The "brook" (naḥal) is probably the Kidron itself, which is regularly designated by this word. See § 2 above.

The same chapter says also: "This same Hezekiah closed the upper outlet of the waters of Gihon and directed them down to the west side of the city of David" (II Chr. 32:30). This refers undoubtedly to the "conduit" mentioned in II Kings 20:20, which still exists. It is a tunnel cut through the solid rock, twisting and turning for nearly six hundred yards from the spring to an opening in the central valley near its mouth. Just inside the opening was found in 1880 an inscription, in the alphabet of Hezekiah's time, recording the cutting of the tunnel by two teams who began at the ends and met in the middle. The proud memory of this achievement found expression centuries later in Ecclus. 48:17. See SILOAM.

All these facts, taken together, suggest a possible identification of the various pools and the reservoir that have been mentioned. The "reservoir between the two walls for the water of the old pool" was perhaps the pool into which Hezekiah's tunnel emptied, where the Pool of Siloam is now. The "two walls" between which it was made may have been those on both sides of the central valley, one being the ancient wall of the SE hill and the other a later one on the other side of the valley. The new reservoir received the water formerly stored in a pool near the spring in the Kidron Valley, called the "old pool" in Isa. 22:11 and the "upper pool" in II Kings 18:17; Isa. 7:3. The stopping of the "upper outlet of the waters of Gihon" (II Chr. 32:30) made this old upper pool useless. The spot where Isaiah met Ahaz and the Assyrian envoys later threatened Hezekiah was not beside this upper pool in the Kidron Valley, far below the city wall, but at the low S end of the hill, beside the conduit which, before the tunnel was made, brought water to irrigate the gardens in the valley. See § 5*b above*.

The lower pool, whose waters Hezekiah collected, was probably in the mouth of the central valley, just above the strong double wall which here crosses the valley and just below the spot where the new reservoir was made somewhat later. At this point there is still an old pool, now filled with earth, called birket el-ḥamra. At some time previous to the cutting of the Siloam tunnel, the conduit mentioned above was diverted and carried around the S end of the hill by a short tunnel, so that the water flowed into the pool in the central valley. Possibly Ahaz was having this done when Isaiah met him, but it is equally possible that Hezekiah had it done early in his reign, before the Assyrian threat had become formidable. Directing the conduit to this pool would then be what is meant by collecting the waters of the lower pool.

One thing seems clear: the central valley was by this time inside the city, and therefore at least some part of the SW hill was now within the walls. II Chr. 32:30 says that Hezekiah directed the waters of Gihon "down to the west side of the city of David"; II Kings 20:20 says that he "brought water into the city." There would have been no point in the elaborate enterprise of the tunnel and the pool if they had only conveyed the water to a place still open to a besieging army; nor would a wall merely enclosing the pool and the outlet of the tunnel have met the demands of the situation.

II Chr. 32:5 goes on to say that Hezekiah "built up all the wall that was broken down, and raised towers upon it, and outside it he built another wall; and he strengthened the Millo in the city of David." What the Millo was we still do not know (see § 5*b above*). The word translated "broken down" recalls the action of Jehoash of Israel in II Kings 14:13 (see § 6*b above*), but the reference here is probably not to that incident. Hezekiah "saw that the breaches of the city of David were many" and "broke down the houses to fortify the wall" (Isa. 22:9-10).

But what was the other wall which Hezekiah built? Conceivably it was merely one built outside the existing wall to reinforce it; more probably it enclosed a new portion of the expanded city. Not much later we hear of the "SECOND QUARTER" or Mishneh (see § 6*d below*). It is commonly supposed that this was an extension of the city to the N, beyond the old N wall. If so, it may also have been the area enclosed by Hezekiah's "other wall."

All Hezekiah's precautions would hardly have availed against a determined Assyrian attack, but at the moment of supreme peril Jerusalem was marvelously delivered (II Kings 19:20-37). Her doom, however, was only postponed. Isaiah's contemporary, Micah, denounced the corruption and oppression practiced by those who would "build Zion with blood and Jerusalem with wrong," and declared that because of them Zion would be "plowed as a field," Jerusalem would "become a heap of ruins," and the "mountain of the house" would become a "wooded height" (Mic. 3:10, 12). Isaiah himself promised Hezekiah only a respite during his own lifetime (II Kings 20:6, 16-19; Isa. 38:5-6; 39:5-8).

According to II Chr. 32:33, Hezekiah was buried "in the ascent of the tombs of the sons of David." One is reminded of the "stairs that go down from the City of David," mentioned in Neh. 3:15 near the "sepulchres of David." See § 7*b below*.

d. Manasseh and Josiah; Zephaniah. Very different from Hezekiah was Manasseh. All he is said in II Kings to have built is a succession of pagan places and objects of worship (21:3-5, 7). In addition to his idolatry he "shed very much innocent blood, till he had filled Jerusalem from one end to another" (vs. 16). His wickedness evoked the vivid prophecy that God would "wipe Jerusalem as one wipes a dish, wiping it and turning it upside down" (vs. 13). When Manasseh died, he "was buried in the garden of his house, in the garden of Uzza" (21:18; II Chr. 33:20 says simply "in his house").

The Chronicler adds the story of Manasseh's captivity and repentance, after which he removed all the pagan altars and idols he had set up and "restored the altar of the LORD" (II Chr. 33:15-16). He also "built an outer wall to the city of David west of Gihon, in the valley, to the entrance by the Fish Gate, and carried it round Ophel, and raised it to a very great height" (33:14). Being "west of Gihon, in the valley" (naḥal—i.e., the Kidron Valley), Manasseh's outer wall must have been on the E slope of the SE hill, below the older wall of the City of David and above the spring. To the N, Manasseh "carried it round Ophel." If his wall reached "to the entrance by the Fish Gate," it must have continued around the temple area on the E and the N. Obviously the points here mentioned are not given in the order of their location; the reference to Ophel is brought in, so to speak, as an afterthought.

The Fish Gate is here mentioned for the first time. From Neh. 3:3 it is clear that this was a gate in the N wall, about where it crossed the central valley (see § 7*b below*). In Zeph. 1:10 the Fish Gate is named along with the Second Quarter (see below). It is unlikely that for this whole distance Manasseh's wall ran outside the older wall and parallel to it. II Chr. 33:14 may be translated: "He built an outer wall for the city of David . . . and for the entrance into the Fish Gate; he also carried it around Ophel." If this interpretation is correct, it was only at the points mentioned that the wall was doubled.

Of the brief reign of Amon, who followed Manasseh's bad example, nothing of note for the history of Jerusalem is recorded. He was killed "in his house" and buried "in his tomb in the garden of Uzza" (II Kings 21:23, 26). His son Josiah returned to better ways and destroyed the pagan sanctuaries and idols of his predecessors (II Chr. 34:2 ff). The temple was repaired, and the finding of the Book of the Law led to a drastic reformation (II Kings 22:3-20; 23:1-25; see TEMPLE, JERUSALEM, § A1*d*). On hearing the book read, Josiah sent the high priest and his associates to consult the prophetess HULDAH, who "dwelt in Jerusalem in the Second Quarter" (22:14). The SECOND QUARTER, or Mishneh, is mentioned also by Zephaniah, who prophesied during the reign of Josiah (Zeph. 1:1). On the Day of the Lord, he says:

> A cry will be heard from the Fish Gate, > a wail from the Second Quarter, > a loud crash from the hills (1:10).

The fact that the Fish Gate and the Second Quarter appear together does not imply that they were in the same part of the city, but it is probable on other grounds that this gate was in the wall which enclosed the Second Quarter, N of the old city wall (see § 7*b below*). The wall enclosing the Second Quarter may have been, as we have seen, the "other wall" built by Hezekiah. See § 6*c above*.

Zephaniah continues (vs. 11):

> Wail, O inhabitants of the Mortar!
> For all the traders are no more;
> all who weigh out silver are cut off.

The Mortar is not mentioned elsewhere, and nothing can be inferred from this passage except that it was a commercial quarter of the city. The Targ. identifies Zephaniah's Mortar with the Kidron Valley, but modern scholars take it to be the depression between the E and W hills where the central valley is joined by the valley descending from the W. See § 2 above.

Several places in Jerusalem and its vicinity are named in the account of Josiah's reformation, but most of them cannot now be identified. For the writer's contemporaries the "high places of the gates that were at the entrance of the gate of Joshua the governor of the city, which were on one's left at the gate of the city" (II Kings 23:8), would be quite explicit, but we do not know any of the points mentioned. Equally unknown are the "chamber of Nathan-melech the chamberlain" (vs. 11) and the "upper chamber of Ahaz" (vs. 12). What is meant by the word in vs. 11 translated "precincts" by the RSV (KJV "suburbs") is obscure. The pillar by which the king stood (23:3) was, no doubt, the one mentioned in 11:14. See § 6*a above*.

Many of the idolatrous objects removed from the temple and the city were burned and pulverized in the "brook Kidron"—i.e., the Kidron Valley, conveniently near the temple and the palace (see § 2 above). S of the city, "in the valley of the sons of Hinnom," was TOPHETH, where child-sacrifices by fire were offered (vs. 10). Josiah "defiled" this and also Solomon's "high places that were east of Jerusalem, to the south of the mount of corruption" (vs. 13). The "mount of corruption" is identified by the Targum with the Mount of Olives, and this must be correct, because the Mount of Offense (see § 5*d above*) is just to the S of the Mount of Olives. See CORRUPTION, MOUNT OF.

e. Jehoahaz, Jehoiakim, Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah; Jeremiah. The death of Josiah was closely connected with the rise of the Neo-Babylonian Empire. After the brief reign of Jehoahaz, Jehoiakim came to the throne as a tool of Egypt; compelled to submit to the Babylonians, he soon rebelled but did not live to see the consequent investment and surrender of Jerusalem. His son Jehoiachin, after reigning only three months, was taken captive to Babylon with "all Jerusalem," leaving only the "poorest people of the land" (II Kings 23:36–24:16). Zedekiah held the throne for ten years, but then rebelled and brought upon his capital and kingdom the disaster of 587 (24:17-20).

During these tragic years, beginning back in the reign of Josiah, Jeremiah prophesied, and there is much about Jerusalem in his words. The sacrifice of children by fire at Topheth (see § 6*d above*) was repeatedly denounced by Jeremiah: in the days to come, he said, the place would be filled with the bodies of the people of Judah and would be called the "valley of Slaughter" (Jer. 7:32; 19:6). He pronounced this doom in the "Valley of Ben-hinnom at the entry of the Potsherd Gate" (19:2). The Valley of Ben-hinnom is, of course, the same as the Valley of Hinnom (see § 2 above). The Potsherd Gate is not mentioned elsewhere, but it obviously opened on this valley near Topheth. It may have been the same gate elsewhere called the Dung Gate. See § 7*b below*.

Several points in Jerusalem and its surroundings are named in Jer. 31:38-40. This is not a description of the city's growth in the days to come; its point is that not only the temple area, but the whole city and even the polluted valley S of it, "shall be sacred to the LORD." Other references to some of the places mentioned show that the prophet assumed the extent of the city as it was in his own day.

The tower of Hananel was at the NW corner of the temple enclosure (see § 7*b below*). The Corner Gate was at the W end of the N wall of the city (see § 6*b above*). These two points therefore mark the NE and NW limits of the city outside the temple area. As vs. 39 reads in the RSV, it suggests that the N limit will continue to the W "farther, straight to the hill Gareb." The Hebrew, however, says "upon the hill Gareb" (cf. KJV). The expression translated "straight" in the RSV (lit., "opposite it"; cf. KJV "over against it") does not imply that the line continues without a change of direction; a turn to the S at the Corner Gate is probably taken for granted, and the meaning is that from this point the line will continue straight ahead to the S along the edge of the W hill to its SW corner, where it will turn eastward toward Goah.

Neither Gareb nor Goah is mentioned elsewhere. Gareb is apparently the SW hill of Jerusalem; Goah must be something in or near the Valley of Hinnom. The word used for the "valley of the dead bodies and the ashes" indicates a broad, level surface ('ēmeq; see § 2 above); it is therefore undoubtedly the open E end of the Hinnom Valley, where Topheth was, and the bodies and ashes are those of the sacrifices by fire at that place (see above and § 6*d*). The "fields as far as the brook Kidron" must be in the area where the three valleys come together. It was in the "fields of the Kidron" that Josiah burned the pagan objects taken out of the temple. See § 6*d above*.

From this point the line turns N, following the E wall of the City of David to Ophel and the temple area. It ends at the "Horse Gate toward the east," probably the gate where Athaliah was killed (see § 6*a above*). Thus the boundary sketched by Jeremiah, beginning at the NW corner of the temple enclosure, ends at the SE corner of the palace area, S of the temple, and so encloses the whole city.

Most of the other topographical data in the book of Jeremiah are associated with the Temple. In 17:19 Jeremiah is told to "stand in the Benjamin Gate, by which the kings of Judah enter and by which they go out, and in all the gates of Jerusalem," and to denounce working and burden-bearing on the sabbath. Since the territory of Benjamin lay to the N and NE of Jerusalem, the entering and going out mentioned must mean coming from and going to the N or the NE. In 20:2 Jeremiah is confined "in the stocks that were in the upper Benjamin Gate of the house of the LORD." The implied lower gate of Benjamin may have been the one called simply the Benjamin Gate in 17:19 and elsewhere. It was probably a city gate, whereas the upper Benjamin Gate was a temple gate.

Jeremiah was on the way to the land of Benjamin when he was arrested and accused of deserting to the Chaldeans (37:12-13). The Chaldean army which had been besieging Jerusalem had just withdrawn (vss. 5, 11). This incident too suggests that the Benjamin Gate was near the NE corner of the city, in either the N or the E wall. The king was "sitting in the Benjamin Gate" when Ebed-melech came to intercede for Jeremiah (38:7); conceivably he was enjoying the sight of the area from which the besiegers had departed.

In Zech. 14:10 (see § 7*c below*) the Benjamin Gate marks the opposite extreme from the Corner Gate (see above and § 6*d*). Since other points in the same verse indicate the N and S limits of the city, these two gates evidently indicate the E and W limits. The Benjamin Gate was therefore probably in the E wall rather than the N wall. It may have been a gate designated elsewhere by another name, possibly the Muster Gate of Neh. 3:31. See § 7*b below*.

The dramatic scene of the reading and burning of Jeremiah's scroll took place in the king's "winter house" (36:22). We cannot identify this or the other places mentioned in the story of Jeremiah's imprisonments. Twice he was confined in the "court of the guard which was in the palace of the king of Judah" (32:2; 33:1; 37:21); he was even kept for a while in a cistern in this court (38:6-13). Meanwhile he had been imprisoned in the "house of Jonathan the secretary," which "had been made a prison" (37:15-20). After his release from the cistern, he "remained in the court of the guard until the day that Jerusalem was taken" (38:13, 28).

The account of the fall of Jerusalem in Jer. 39 says that the Babylonian princes and officers "came and sat in the middle gate" (vs. 3). Presumably this was in the N wall, perhaps the gate elsewhere called the Fish Gate (see § 7*b below*). Zedekiah fled in the opposite direction, "going out of the city at night by way of the king's garden through the gate between the two walls" (vs. 4; II Kings 25:4). In Neh. 3:15 (see § 7*b below*) the "king's garden" is placed near the S end of the City of David, apparently at the juncture of the three valleys. The "two walls" may have been the same as those between which Hezekiah had made a reservoir (see § 6*c above*). Possibly the gate here mentioned was Nehemiah's Dung Gate. See § 7*b below*.

7. The Exile and the Persian period. a. Sheshbazzar and Zerubbabel. Although the city had been left in ruins by the Chaldeans, returning refugees probably made some effort to worship, at least by prayer and lamentation, on the site of the temple. There is no authentic record of this, however. The first indication we have of any attempt at restoration is the statement of II Chr. 36:22-23; Ezra 1:1-4 that Cyrus issued a proclamation charging the Jewish exiles to go to Jerusalem and rebuild the temple. A group thereupon returned, taking with them the temple vessels, which Cyrus had entrusted to their leader, Sheshbazzar (1:8). Other groups evidently followed them at intervals. The rebuilding of the temple, undertaken by Zerubbabel and Jeshua, was stopped by their adversaries in the surrounding territory until the second year of Darius, 520 B.C. (Ezra 4:1-5, 24). Then, at the urging of Haggai and Zechariah, it was resumed and completed (Ezra 5-6; Hag. 1-2; Zech. 1-8).

So far we hear nothing of rebuilding the city itself. Zechariah receives assurance that the Lord will comfort Zion (1:17). Walls will not be needed (2:4-5). A charge that the Jews were rebuilding the city, however, was made in the reign of Xerxes and renewed in the reign of Artaxerxes I, who ordered the cessation of the enterprise (Ezra 4:6-23).

b. Ezra and Nehemiah. Ezra came to Jerusalem in the seventh year of ARTAXERXES (Ezra 7:1-10). One may question which of the emperors who bore this name is meant; we shall assume that the reference is to Artaxerxes II (405-358 B.C.). In any case, it was in the twentieth year of Artaxerxes I (444 B.C.) that Nehemiah was authorized to go to Jerusalem and rebuild the walls (Neh. 2:1-8). The forcible interruption of the previous attempt to rebuild the wall in the reign of Artaxerxes (see § 7*a above*) probably caused the condition reported to Nehemiah (Neh. 1:3). His success in securing the emperor's approval was all the more remarkable.

Millar Burrows

MAP II. Different conceptions of the plan of Nehemiah's Jerusalem: (1) Avi-Yonah; (2) Simons; (3) Vincent

Gates and other points in the wall are named in three passages concerning the work of Nehemiah: the account of his preliminary inspection by night (2:12-15), the account of the rebuilding of the wall (ch. 3), and the account of its dedication (12:31-43). Some of the same points and a few others are named in connection with the work of Ezra (Ezra 9; 10:1-7; Neh. 8; 9:1-4; 10:28-39; 13:1-3). For our present purpose all these may be considered together. For the sequence of events, see EZRA AND NEHEMIAH, BOOKS OF.

Several of the points specified have been encountered already; others, though not necessarily all, had existed before the exile. Possible locations of the points named in these passages are shown in Fig. NEH 13; three other views of outstanding scholars are given here in Map II, where the small letters indicate respectively the following points:

a. Corner Gate (see §§ 6*b, e,* 7*c*)
b. Gate of Ephraim (Neh. 8:16; 12:39; see § 6*b*)
c. Old Gate (Neh. 3:6; 12:39)
d. Broad Wall (Neh. 3:8; 12:38)
e. Tower of the Ovens, or Furnaces (Neh. 3:11; 12:38)
f. Valley Gate (Neh. 2:13; 3:13; see § 6*b*)
g. Dung Gate (Neh. 2:13; 3:13-14; 12:31)
h. Fountain Gate (Neh. 2:14; 3:15; 12:37)
i. King's Pool (Neh. 2:14)
j. Wall of the Pool of Shelah of the King's Garden (Neh. 3:15)
k. Stairs of the City of David (Neh. 3:15; 12:37)
l. Sepulchres of David (Neh. 3:16; see § 5*b*)
m. Angle (Neh. 3:19-20, 24-25)
n. Water Gate on the E (Neh. 3:26; 12:37)
o. Horse Gate (Neh. 3:28; see § 6*a*)
p. E Gate (Neh. 3:29)
q. Muster Gate (Neh. 3:31)
r. Sheep Gate (Neh. 3:1, 32; 12:39)
s. Tower of the Hundred (Neh. 3:1; 12:39)
t. Tower of Hananel (Neh. 3:1; 12:39; see § 6*e*)
u. Fish Gate (Neh. 3:3; 12:39; see § 6*d*)

The Corner Gate (a) is not mentioned in Ezra or Nehemiah; if it belonged at all to the wall repaired by Nehemiah, it must have been known by some other name in his time. Why the Gate of Ephraim (b), named in the account of the dedication of the wall, does not appear in the account of the rebuilding, can only be guessed. It is mentioned between the Old Gate (c) and the Broad Wall (d), but there seems to be no place for it there, and the other may not be strictly consecutive. Some scholars identify the Old Gate with the Ephraim Gate on the assumption that in Neh. 12:39 the two names are merely alternative designations of the same gate. The name "Old Gate" (more exactly "Gate of the Yeshanah") is probably a corruption of "Gate of the Mishneh" (see § 6*d above*). The name "Broad Wall" should perhaps be emended to "Wall of the Square" (cf. 8:16: the "square at the Water Gate" and the "square at the Gate of Ephraim"). The Tower of the Ovens (e) may have been the tower built by Uzziah at the Corner Gate (see § 6*b above*), but in this case the Corner Gate cannot be identified with any of those named in Nehemiah.

The Valley Gate (f) is not named in connection with the dedication of the wall, but it was clearly the point from which the two processions set out, proceeding in opposite directions and meeting at the temple (Neh. 12:31, 38, 40). It had been the point from which Nehemiah set out and to which he returned in his preliminary inspection of the wall (2:

13, 15), and we have encountered it before (see § 6*b above*). Its choice as the starting point of the two processions suggests that it was at the opposite corner of the city from the temple—i.e., the SW corner.

Between the Valley Gate and the Dung Gate (g) the JACKAL'S WELL is named in Neh. 2:13. Its location is uncertain; the hypothesis which identifies it with En-rogel (see § 2 above) is as likely as any. Possibly it was what Jeremiah called the Potsherd Gate (see § 6*e above*). If the Valley Gate was at the SW corner of the city, the Dung Gate was not far from the juncture of the Hinnom and Tyropoeon valleys. It may well have been at the S end of the ancient wall which crossed the mouth of the Tyropoeon Valley, where remains of an ancient gate have been found.

The Fountain Gate (h) was undoubtedly at the N end of the wall just mentioned, at the S tip of the E hill. In 2:14 it is followed by the "King's Pool" (i), and in 3:15 by the "wall of the Pool of Shelah of the king's garden" (j). The name of the Pool of Shelah recalls the Shiloah of Isa. 8:6 (see § 6*c above*), and the two names are probably only variant forms of the same word; in fact, some MSS read "Shiloah" in Neh. 3:15. It does not follow, of course, that the same canal or conduit is referred to in Neh. 3:15; Isa. 8:6.

The King's Pool and the Pool of Shelah may have been the same pool. Perhaps it lay at the end of the Tyropoeon Valley, where the birket al-ḥamra is now, just above the wall which crossed the mouth of the valley. The Lower Pool into which Hezekiah's tunnel emptied (see § 6*c above*), the King's Pool, and the Pool of Shelah would then all be one and the same, except for such changes as followed the cutting of the tunnel; and the word "Shelah" would refer here to the tunnel.

In that case it is strange that the Fountain Gate is named before the King's Pool in Neh. 2:14 and before the wall of the Pool of Shelah in 3:15. The gate may have been mentioned first in 3:15 as a more formidable item than the wall in the program of repairs, or it may have been repaired before the wall; but 2:14 is not so easily explained. Perhaps, therefore, the King's Pool lay outside the wall in the lower Kidron Valley. The Pool of Shelah, however, cannot be located there unless the text is in disorder, because the wall of this pool was built "as far as the stairs that go down from the City of David." These were at the S end of the SE hill, just where we are compelled to place the Fountain Gate. In 12:37 also the Fountain Gate is followed immediately by the "stairs of the city of David." Here we seem to strike solid rock, both literally and figuratively. The remains of a staircase cut in the rock at this point have been excavated, and there is no reason to doubt that they are the stairs in question.

Neh. 12:37 mentions next the "ascent of the wall," which suggests that here the wall itself ascended the slope to reach the top of the hill on the E side. This seems to be confirmed by steplike cuts in the rock, apparently for the foundation of successive sections of the wall.

From here on, we proceed northward along the E side of the hill. From the King's Pool, Nehemiah on his tour of inspection found no place for his beast to pass; he therefore "went up by the valley" (naḥal —i.e., the Kidron; see § 2 above), inspected the wall either by looking up from the bottom of the valley or by climbing the steep slope on foot, and then returned to the Valley Gate (2:14-15). The builders and the dedicatory procession moved along the top of the slope.

The next team of workers (3:16) "repaired to a point opposite the sepulchres of David, to the artificial pool, and to the house of the mighty men." David's tomb (l) was in the S part of the SE hill (see § 5*b above*). The artificial pool (lit., "made pool") must have been somewhere in the Kidron Valley, doubtless below Gihon and only a little farther N than the sepulchres of David. No more can be said of the house of the mighty men. The house of David mentioned in 12:37 was presumably the palace built by David on the SE hill (see § 5*a above*). Remains of a wall which may be the one repaired by Nehemiah have been uncovered along the E edge of the hill in this region, but their identity and date are not certain.

The next portion of wall designated is a "section opposite the ascent to the armory at the Angle" (3:19). The Angle (m) is mentioned also in vs. 20, and the same word appears again in vss. 24-25 (see below). Its exact meaning is uncertain. In II Chr. 26:9 it designates an unidentified place where Uzziah built a tower (see § 6*b above*). That we are now not far from the temple area is suggested by the next point named, the "house of Eliashib the high priest" (3:20).

A few more sections bring us "to the Angle and to the corner," and another group's assignment is "opposite the Angle and the tower projecting from the upper house of the king at the court of the guard." Here we are plainly in the vicinity of Solomon's palace, called the "upper house of the king," as distinguished from David's palace farther to the S. The court of the guard recalls Jeremiah's imprisonment (see § 6*e above*). Where the tower projecting from the palace was, we cannot tell.

The workers on the next section of the wall included "temple servants living on Ophel"; their portion extended "to a point opposite the Water Gate on the east and the projecting tower" (3:26). The following section was "opposite the great projecting tower as far as the wall of Ophel" (vs. 27). The wall of Ophel recalls Manasseh's wall around Ophel (see § 6*d above*). The "Water Gate on the east" (n) appears in Neh. 12:37 as the terminus of the first procession. Since the two companies came together at the temple (12:40), a position very close to the temple is indicated. This gate therefore cannot have been directly above Gihon, as its name suggests. The vicinity of the temple is indicated also by the fact that Ezra assembled the people to hear the law in the "square before the Water Gate" (Neh. 8:1, 3); this was also one of the places where booths were made for the ensuing festival (8:16).

The repeated references to projecting towers and the reappearance of the Angle after several sections of wall, not to mention the corner (3:25), are confusing. Possibly from the neighborhood of the house of Eliashib there were two walls under repair, some of the teams working on the W wall of Ophel and the S wall of the palace and temple area, while others carried the repair of the E wall up to the SE corner of that area. This would not, however, answer all the questions raised by the text, which has undoubtedly suffered from the mistakes of copyists who understood it no better than we do.

Some of the difficulty arises from the fact that the prepositions used do not always make clear whether what is named was a part of the wall itself or something inside or outside the city, mentioned merely as a point of reference. The Horse Gate (o), which comes next in Neh. 3:28, seems to be an entrance to the palace in II Kings 11:16; II Chr. 23:15 (see § 6*b above*). In Jer. 31:40 the "corner of the Horse Gate" marks the farthest extension of the city to the E (see § 6*c above*). Probably, therefore, the Horse Gate was a gate in the city wall, not far N of the corner where it became also the E wall of the temple enclosure.

The East Gate of Neh. 3:29 (p) is a temple gate, probably a gate of the inner court. The fact that the "upper chamber of the corner" cŏmes between the Muster Gate and the Sheep Gate (3:31-32) favors the location of the Muster Gate (q) in the E wall near its N end. As noted above (§ 6*e*), Nehemiah's Muster Gate may have been the Benjamin Gate of Jeremiah and Zechariah.

At this time the N wall still followed the S slope of the valley which descended from the NW into the Kidron Valley, under the NE corner of the present sacred area. In this wall was the Sheep Gate (r), the starting point and end of the account of rebuilding (Neh. 3:1, 32) and the last point but one in the route of the second dedicatory procession (12:39). From the Sheep Gate the second company in the dedicatory procession, coming from the W, went on and "came to a halt at the Gate of the Guard" (Neh. 12:39). Unless this is to be identified with the Muster Gate, which seems unlikely, it must have been a gate of the inner temple court. It cannot be connected with the court of the guard of 3:25, for that was attached to the palace, S of the temple. See § 6*e above*.

To the W of the Sheep Gate in the N wall were two towers, the Tower of the Hundred (s) and the Tower of Hananel (t). They were evidently not far apart, at the northernmost point of the city wall, just before it turned slightly to the left and crossed the Tyropoeon Valley. The Tower of Hananel is named also in Jer. 31:38 (see § 6*e above*) and Zech. 14:10 (see § 7*c above*) to mark the N extent of the city.

The Fish Gate (u), mentioned only in Neh. 3:3; 12:39, was the N gate of the Mishneh (see § 6*d above*) in the Tyropoeon Valley, where the road from the N entered the city. Nehemiah speaks later of men from Tyre who lived in Jerusalem and sold fish even on the sabbath (13:16). From their market and perhaps their dwellings in the same quarter, this gate probably got its name.

c. Visions of the future. For the remainder of the Persian period we have little information concerning Jerusalem, but the writers of the time had much to say concerning the city's future glory. To list here the references to Jerusalem and Zion in the Psalms, the wisdom literature, and the late portions of the prophetic books would serve no purpose. In two prophetic passages, however, there are references which call for comment. Either or both may have come from the Greek instead of the Persian period, but in view of the uncertainty on this point it is convenient to discuss them here. The first is the prophecy of judgment in the Valley of Jehoshaphat in Joel 3:11-21 (see JEHOSHAPHAT, VALLEY OF). Tradition locates this in the upper Kidron Valley, but the prophet probably had no particular valley in mind. The Hebrew word used here ('ēmeq) does not, in fact, indicate such a steep, narrow valley as that of the Kidron (see § 2 above). The name, which means "Yahweh has judged," was probably meant to be understood symbolically, like the "valley of decision" in vs. 14. See DECISION, VALLEY OF.

The other passage is the vision of the judgment on the Mount of Olives and the future growth of Jerusalem in Zech. 14. The location of the Mount of Olives is familiar (see §§ 5*a-b*, 6*d above*, 11 below). The description of Jerusalem mentions as points in its periphery the Gate of Benjamin, the "place of the former gate," the Corner Gate, the Tower of Hananel, and the "king's wine presses." The Gate of Benjamin (see §§ 6*e*, 7*b above*) clearly marks the E extent of the city, as the Corner Gate (see §§ 6*b-c*, 7*b above*) marks its W limit. What the "former gate" was is unknown. It was probably a gate in the old N wall, perhaps the Ephraim Gate (see § 6*b above*), which had lost its previous importance after the enclosure of the Mishneh. See § 6*d above*.

The Tower of Hananel (see §§ 6*e*, 7*b above*) and the "king's wine presses" obviously designate respectively the N and S extent of the city. This indicates that the king's wine presses were in or near the Hinnom Valley, in the general region where the King's Pool and the King's Garden have been placed. See § 7*b above*. Fig. JER 18.

8. The Greek period. For more than a century after the conquests and death of Alexander the Great, Palestine was involved in the struggle between the Ptolemies of Egypt and the Seleucids of Syria. In 320 B.C., Ptolemy I captured Jerusalem. During most of the third century, while Palestine was under Egyptian rule, Jerusalem was secure and prosperous. A description of the city in the Letter of Aristeas, from about this time, notes especially the hilly nature of the site, with walls and streets going up and down across hills and valleys.

Our sources for this period are scanty, and there is little to report concerning Jerusalem. Excavations on both the E and the W hills have found remains of buildings and walls which can be attributed either to the Greek or to the Hasmonean period (see § 9 below), but they cannot be connected with anything recorded in the literature of the time. Buildings for athletic contests and dramatic presentations were apparently built in the Tyropoeon Valley, between the temple and the W hill. This area has never been thoroughly excavated. The tombs in the Kidron Valley traditionally called the tombs of Absalom, Jehoshaphat, James, and Zechariah, though commonly assigned to the time of Herod, are probably the result of a process of construction and reconstruction which began as far back as the third century B.C.

The fighting between Egypt and Syria caused much damage at Jerusalem, both directly and indirectly. When Palestine became a part of the Seleucid dominions (198 B.C.), special privileges and exemptions were granted to the Jews to repair the damage suffered by the city and the temple. This favorable treatment, however, soon gave way to more oppressive measures, including even an attempt to plunder the temple treasure (II Macc. 3).

Meanwhile the growing influence of Hellenistic culture had produced a division among the Jews themselves. This was intensified by the worldliness and venality of contenders for the high priesthood, who made this sacred office a matter of royal favor, purchased by bribes and political subservience. In the reign of Antiochus IV Epiphanes a violent conflict between two such rivals gave the king an occasion to desecrate and plunder the temple and massacre many of the people of Jerusalem. Later Antiochus sent a "chief collector of tribute, and he came to Jerusalem with a large force" (I Macc. 1:29). The city was plundered and burned, its houses and walls torn down, and many of its people killed or taken captive (vss. 30-32). "Then they fortified the city of David with a great strong wall and strong towers, and it became their citadel" (vs. 33). For years to come, this citadel (for the location see § 9 below) was to be a "great snare" and an "ambush against the sanctuary" (I Macc. 1:35-36; 3:45). The ensuing persecution provoked the Maccabean Revolt.

9. The Hasmonean period. In the tangled history of the MACCABEES and the HASMONEANS, Jerusalem was deeply involved. Devastated and in ruins, its population decimated, the city was controlled by the garrison in the Syrian citadel. Judas Maccabeus was able to purify and rededicate the temple (see TEMPLE, JERUSALEM, § B2) in 164 B.C., and even to fortify the sacred enclosure, while a part of his troops kept the Syrian garrison occupied (I Macc. 4:41, 60). Two years later, in the reign of Antiochus V Eupator, Judas besieged the citadel, but the king came to the relief of the garrison. Inducing the Jews by an offer of peace to admit him to the temple, he broke his oath and had the protecting wall destroyed (6:18-62).

Demetrius I made Alcimus high priest and sent Bacchides with him to Jerusalem to overthrow Judas. A group of Hasidim sought to make peace with these two and were promised safety, but sixty of them were treacherously seized and killed. Nicanor, who was sent later with an army, was defeated by Judas, and his soldiers "fled into the city of David" (7:32). Coming to Mount Zion, Nicanor mocked and threatened the priests, but not long thereafter he lost his life in the decisive battle of Adasa, and his head and right hand were exhibited by the triumphant rebels "just outside of Jerusalem" (vs. 47).

Bacchides and Alcimus were not sent again. After the death of Judas in the battle of Elasa, Jonathan fought against Bacchides, who now fortified many cities in Judea. "And he took the sons of the leading men of the land as hostages and put them under guard in the citadel at Jerusalem" (9:53). Alcimus ordered the wall of the inner temple court torn down, but died before the work was completed (vss. 54 ff). A few years later, when the throne of Demetrius was threatened by Alexander Epiphanes, both contestants tried to win the adherence of Jonathan, whose power had become formidable. Demetrius authorized him to recruit and equip troops and made the garrison in the citadel give up to him their hostages. Jonathan now undertook to restore the dismantled walls of Jerusalem "and encircle Mount Zion with squared stones" (10:11).

Not to be outdone, Alexander conferred the high priesthood upon Jonathan. Demetrius countered by offering extraordinary exemptions, declaring Jerusalem to be tax-free, undertaking to yield the citadel to Jonathan, and granting release to debtors who took refuge in the temple. The promise to give up the citadel, however, was not kept. After the accession of Demetrius II, Jonathan besieged the citadel. He obtained also from Demetrius the confirmation of his high priesthood and another promise to remove the Syrian garrison from the citadel, but this promise, like others before it, was broken.

Jonathan now transferred his allegiance to the rival king Antiochus VI and undertook "to build the walls of Jerusalem still higher, and to erect a high barrier between the citadel and the city to separate it from the city, in order to isolate it so that its garrison could neither buy nor sell" (I Macc. 12:36). A part of the E wall of the city above the Kidron Valley "had fallen, and he repaired the section called Chaphenatha" (vs. 37). The building of the barrier and the repairing of Chaphenatha were probably not connected but distinct items in the comprehensive effort to build up the city.

At the height of his success, Jonathan was deceived and imprisoned by Trypho, who was seeking to become king. Simon, last of the Maccabean brothers, now "hastened to complete the walls of Jerusalem, and he fortified it on every side" (13:10). Responding to appeals from the garrison of the citadel, Trypho attempted to come to their relief but was frustrated by a heavy snowfall. Simon now made peace with Demetrius, but continued to enforce an effective blockade of the citadel until the garrison was compelled to sue for peace. They were put out, the citadel was cleansed, and the Jews took possession in 141 B.C. (13:49-51; 14:36).

Jews were now settled in the citadel, and Simon "fortified it for the safety of the country and of the city, and built the walls of Jerusalem higher" (14:37). He also "strengthened the fortifications of the temple hill alongside the citadel, and he and his men dwelt there" (13:52). Presumably this means that they established themselves in the fortress at the NW corner of the sacred area, where the Tower of Hananel had formerly stood. See §§ 6*c*, 7*b above*.

The historian Josephus inserts at this point a tale which has seriously embarrassed scholars. To prevent any future control of the temple and the city from this point of vantage, he says, Simon demolished the citadel and had the whole "mountain" on which it stood cut down to a lower level than the temple. To accomplish this, says Josephus, the people worked day and night for three years (Antiq. XII.vi.7). What makes the whole episode incredible is that there is no area near the temple which is now lower but can be believed to have been higher at any time without the assumption of what has been called a geological monstrosity. The story also contradicts the statement of I Macc. 14:37 that Simon settled Jews in the citadel and fortified it.

Where then was this citadel (Greek ἄκρα)? I Macc. 1:33 identifies it with the fortified City of David. In 14:36 it appears as a fortress in the City of David. Josephus puts it in the "lower city," by which he clearly means the SE hill, where the ancient city of David lay (see §§ 1, 2, 5*a-b*, 6*a above*). A garrison in this position, however, could not have dominated the temple. Josephus evidently assumed that it was here, and this assumption may account for his idea that the SE hill had originally been higher than the temple hill.

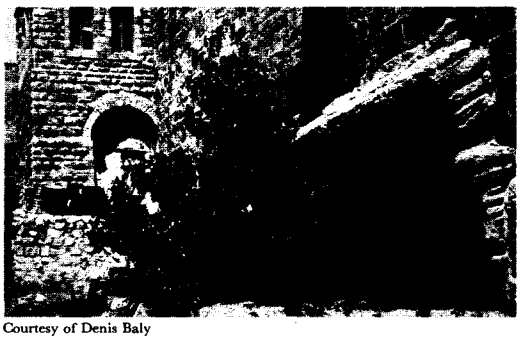
To find a more convincing location for the citadel, one must assume that the designation "city of David" does not mean in I Maccabees what it means in the OT. Its application must have shifted from one place to another. This is by no means impossible or without parallel, though Josephus still knew that David's city was on the SE hill. Certainly the relations between the citadel and the temple and the great difficulty the Jews had in capturing the citadel are much clearer and more consistent on the supposition that the citadel was on the NE spur of the SW hill (Map I,E), across the valley from the temple. From this point one can still overlook the sacred area. Here the palace of the Hasmonean rulers stood later (see below). Some cutting in the rock when this palace was built, or perhaps even when Simon himself refortified the citadel, may have afforded the factual basis for a tradition which grew and was transformed into Josephus' tale of the leveling of the SE hill.

For several years after the capture of the citadel Jerusalem enjoyed peace. When Antiochus VII demanded that the citadel be turned over to him, with Joppa and Gazara, Simon bluntly refused (I Macc. 15:28-36). Shortly thereafter Cendebeus, the king's general, built up Kedron, fortified its gates, and stationed troops there to raid the highways of Judea (I Macc. 15:38-41; cf. 16:9). This cannot mean the Kidron Valley at Jerusalem, which had no gates and would be a poor place for such a purpose. No town named Kedron is known, but Gederoth in the coastal plain (Josh. 15:41; II Chr. 28:18) is undoubtedly meant.

After the assassination of Simon and the accession of his son John Hyrcanus, Antiochus VII invaded Judea and besieged Jerusalem, attacking it from the N, where the ground was as high outside as inside the walls. A shortage of water in the city was relieved by a heavy rain, but to forestall the danger of famine Hyrcanus put out of the city all the people except the fighting men. The poor wretches, not being allowed to pass through the king's lines, suffered horribly, and many died. The survivors were finally readmitted in the autumn at the time of the Feast of Tabernacles.

At the request of Hyrcanus, Antiochus now granted a week's truce and even sent a liberal offering for the festival. Encouraged by this generosity, Hyrcanus sued for peace. The king's demand that a Syrian garrison be established in the city was rejected, but his other terms were met, tribute and hostages were given, and after demolishing the city's fortifications he raised the siege.

A period of prosperity and conquest followed. To support his many military ventures, in which he used foreign mercenary troops, Hyrcanus plundered the tomb of David (see §§ 5*b*, 6*c*, 7*b above*). I Maccabees mentions as a major achievement of John Hyrcanus the "building of the walls which he built" (16:23). This probably means the rebuilding of the walls dismantled by Antiochus.



According to Josephus (Antiq. XVIII.iv.3), Hyrcanus also built a tower or fortress on the site later occupied by the fortress Antonia (see § 10 below), and "usually lived there." This was at the NW corner of the temple enclosure. Simon, as we have seen, had taken up residence in the temple precincts, probably at this same place. Aristobulus I, son and successor of John Hyrcanus, continued to live in the tower his father had built. He was lying sick there when his brother Antigonus, coming to visit him, was killed, because of a tragic misunderstanding, in a dark underground passage between the tower and the temple.

The reign of Alexander Janneus was decidedly eventful, but most of what occurred at Jerusalem was connected with the temple rather than the city. His notorious crucifixion of eight hundred captured rebels and slaughter of their wives and children, while he callously feasted with his concubines before the eyes of the horrified citizens, may have taken place at the palace, but there is nothing to prove this. The first definite reference to the palace occurs in the reign of his widow and successor, Alexandra. A delegation including her younger son Aristobulus appeared here before the queen and besought her to restrain the excesses of the Pharisees.

Later Aristobulus attempted to wrest the kingdom from his mother, whereupon she seized his wife and children as hostages and imprisoned them in the fortress N of the temple. Upon the death of the queen not long thereafter, her elder son Hyrcanus II, whom she had made high priest, was defeated in battle by Aristobulus and took refuge in the fortress where the wife and children of Aristobulus were imprisoned. The two brothers now met in the temple and made a solemn agreement, by which Aristobulus became king and occupied the palace, while Hyrcanus retired to the former dwelling of Aristobulus. Where this was is not indicated; the palace was, no doubt, the one opposite the temple on the E spur of the W hill (E).

Beguiled by the wily Idumean Antipater, Hyrcanus fled to Petra and took refuge with the Nabatean king Aretas, who attacked Aristobulus, defeated him, and besieged him in the temple at Jerusalem. Aristobulus, however, won the support of the Roman official whom Pompey had placed in charge of Syria. He promptly compelled Aretas to give up the siege. Aristobulus now took the offensive and decisively defeated Aretas and Hyrcanus.

All this, however, was the beginning of the end for the Hasmonean kingdom. When Pompey, returning from Armenia, heard the pleas of Aristobulus, Hyrcanus, and the Jews who wanted neither of them, he found Aristobulus so intransigent that he imprisoned him and besieged Jerusalem. The adherents of Hyrcanus admitted the Romans to the upper city on the W hill, enabling them to invest the temple on that side. There was at this time a bridge across the Tyropoeon Valley, but it was cut by the followers of Aristobulus. On the N the temple hill was protected by a strong wall above a little ravine and by a ditch connecting this ravine with the Tyropoeon Valley. Pompey filled the ravine and ditch and made a great ramp for his siege engines. After a siege of three months, the wall was breached, and a frightful massacre followed in the sacred area. Pompey destroyed the city walls but ordered that the temple be cleansed and the sacrifices renewed. Many of the people were carried off as slaves.

Courtesy of Denis Baly

21. Remnant of E span of a bridge over Tyropoeon Valley; discovered in 1838 by Edward Robinson

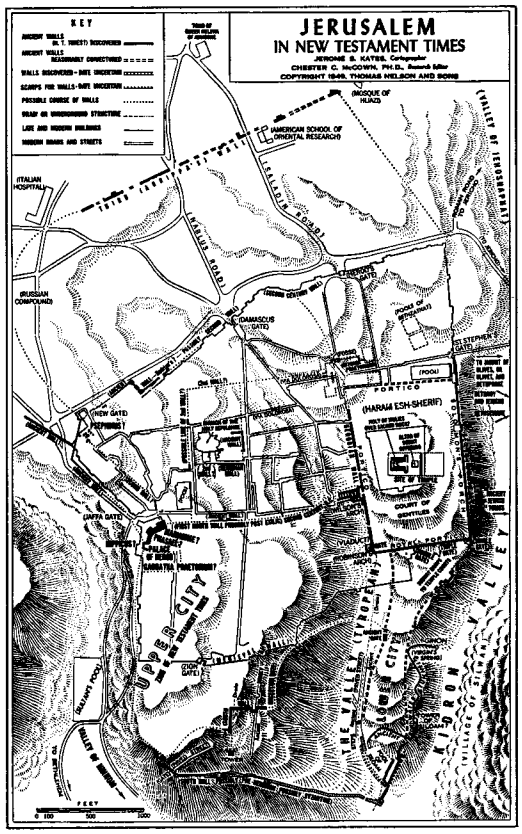
During the Hasmonean period the city had undergone considerable modification. The fortress built by John Hyrcanus N of the temple, the Hasmonean palace above the Tyropoeon Valley, and the bridge across the valley have been mentioned. The temple area was extended at its SW corner by partly filling in the Tyropoeon Valley, which curved to the E at this point. Remains of two phases of Hasmonean fortifications, both possibly from the time of John Hyrcanus, have been found at the NW corner of the city, in the present citadel. Other remains of walls at various points may have come from this time. Cf. Fig. JER 21.

10. The early Roman period and the reign of Herod. After the fall of Jerusalem in 63 B.C., Hyrcanus was left in charge as high priest and ethnarch. Attempting to rebuild the walls, he was restrained by the Romans. Twice in the next decade a son of Aristobulus named Alexander attempted to gain control; once Aristobulus himself with another son, Antigonus, made a similar effort. In spite of Pompey's consideration for the temple, its treasure was robbed by his lieutenant Crassus.

After the death of Pompey, Hyrcanus and Antipater allied themselves with Julius Caesar. Hyrcanus was confirmed as high priest and ethnarch, Antipater was made governor of Judea, and they were allowed to restore Jerusalem's walls. When Antigonus tried again to invade Palestine, he was defeated by Antipater's son Herod, then governor of Galilee. Later, when summoned before the Sanhedrin at Jerusalem for putting a bandit chief to death, Herod confounded that body by his bold demeanor but withdrew without resorting to violence.

After the assassination of Julius Caesar and the defeat of Brutus and Cassius, Mark Antony made Antipater's sons Phasael and Herod tetrarchs of Judea; but Antigonus, aided by the Parthians, attacked Jerusalem, made his way into the city, and besieged Phasael and Herod in the Hasmonean palace. Driven back, Antigonus was compelled to take refuge in the temple enclosure; but the people and the pilgrims who had come for the feast of Pentecost took his part, and Phasael and Herod were shut up again in the palace. Making a bold sally into what Josephus calls the suburb, the Mishneh of the OT (see §§ 6*a*, 7*b above*), Herod drove the people to the upper city on the W and the temple area on the E.



Phasael and Hyrcanus now tried to negotiate with the Parthian general, but he made them prisoners. Phasael committed suicide, and Hyrcanus was carried off to Babylonia. Herod slipped out of Jerusalem by night, took his family to Masada, and went to Rome, where the Senate appointed him king of the Jews. Meanwhile, however, the Parthians plundered Jerusalem, and for three years Antigonus ruled as king and high priest. In 37 B.C., Herod besieged the city, with the help of Roman troops. Again siege engines were set up before the N walls. The suburb was captured and then the temple, and once more there was frightful carnage in the sacred courts and the city, but Herod prevented his foreign soldiers from entering the temple or pillaging the city.

So began a long reign rivaling that of Solomon in the magnificence of its building enterprises at Jerusalem and elsewhere, though marked also by cruelty and tragedy. One of Herod's first undertakings was the rebuilding of the fortress at the NW corner of the temple area, which he named Antonia in honor of his patron Mark Antony (see ANTONIA, TOWER OF). He moved it a little to the N, on the ridge between the Tyropoeon Valley and the ravine which descended toward the SE. Protecting ditches and a large reservoir were cut in the solid rock. Excavations have disclosed the impressive form and extent of the new fortress, which Herod now used for several years as his own palace. It was connected with the temple enclosure both by stairways and by underground passages.

After the death of Herod's favorite wife, Mariamne, her mother tried to suborn the commanders of Antonia and the Hasmonean palace. The plot was foiled, but Herod's rule now became more despotic. Much of his building was done in this part of his reign. A theater and an amphitheater were built, as well as a xystus or place for athletic games, all apparently in the Tyropoeon Valley. These expressed Herod's interest in Hellenistic culture but alienated the Jewish religious leaders.

Herod built also a new palace at or near the site of the ancient Corner Gate (see §§ 6*b*, e, 7*a*, c above). It was strongly fortified and protected by three great towers, named Hippicus, Phasael, and Mariamne. The massive foundations of the present "Tower of David" belonged to one of these towers, either Phasael or Hippicus. The palace was abundantly supplied with water by an aqueduct or canal from a source perhaps as far away as the "Pools of Solomon" S of Bethlehem. Fig. WAT 6.

Herod's most famous building project was, of course, the reconstruction of the temple (see TEMPLE, JERUSALEM, § C). His extension of the sacred enclosure affected the topography of the city as a whole. Some enlargement had already been made at the SW corner, as we have seen (see § 9 above). Herod now extended the area both to the S and to the N, filling in not only the Tyropoeon Valley on the SW but also the ravine on the NE and the ditch across the ridge between the ravine and the Tyropoe-on Valley. The city wall also was pushed further to the N. The area on the S which had been occupied by the pre-exilic royal palace was now included in the temple enclosure.

Extension to the E and the W was prevented by the valleys, but there was considerable reconstruction of the walls. The famous "Wailing Wall" on the W side of the area, traditionally ascribed to Solomon, is a part of Herod's wall; other portions are to be seen on the S and E sides. Of the temple itself not a stone remains, but the sacred area remains to this day substantially as Herod left it, approximately twice as large as it had been before his time. From the main gate on the W side of the temple area, where a bridge had formerly crossed the Tyropoeon Valley (see § 9 above), Herod built a new viaduct following the line of the ancient N wall, now marked by the Street of the Chain.

To secure funds for his extravagant projects, according to Josephus, Herod broke into the tomb of David, as John Hyrcanus had done before him (see § 9 above); but when two of his guards were killed by a supernatural flame that burst out upon them, the frightened king withdrew and built a monument of white stone at the mouth of the tomb.

From the reign of Herod or near it come some of the ornamental tombs in the vicinity of Jerusalem. They contribute nothing to our purpose beyond the fact that they exhibit a rather clumsy attempt to copy Greco-Roman art.

11. The lifetime of Jesus. The opening events of the gospel story occurred during the last troubled years of Herod's reign. Only the vision of Zechariah in the temple (Luke 1:5-23), the appearance of the Wise Men before Herod (Matt. 2:1-12), and the presentation of the infant Jesus (Luke 2:22-38) are connected with Jerusalem. When Joseph learned that Herod was dead and his son Archelaus was reigning in his place, he avoided Judea and withdrew to Galilee (Matt. 2:19-22).

Archelaus had to put down rioting in the temple before he could even sail for Rome to secure the emperor's confirmation of his authority. During his absence the Roman official in charge at Jerusalem so enraged the people by his efforts to obtain the royal treasure that they rose against him at the Feast of Pentecost. Three bands attacked his forces, one to the N of the temple, another at the hippodrome in the Tyropoeon Valley, and the third at Herod's new palace. In a violent struggle on the W side of the temple area, the Romans burned the porticoes, penetrated the sacred area, and seized some of the temple; but the people's attack on the palace continued until the governor of Syria came and put down the insurrection.

Augustus appointed Archelaus ethnarch of Judea, Samaria, and Idumea. Within ten years, however, Archelaus' subjects appealed to the Emperor to remove him. In A.D. 6 he was banished to Gaul, and Judea came under the direct government of a Roman procurator. It must have been at about this time that Jesus came to Jerusalem with his parents for the Passover (Luke 2:41-51). In A.D. 6 he would have been about twelve years old. His awareness of the events of the time may be reflected by the reference in Luke 19:12-14 to a nobleman who "went into a far country to receive kingly power," but whose subjects sent an embassy to say that they did not want him as their king.

The procurators, not finding life at Jerusalem to their liking, made Caesarea their principal place of residence. An officer was left in charge at Jerusalem, with troops stationed at the Herodian palace and at Antonia. On their periodic visits to Jerusalem the procurators lived at the palace. Under the first four procurators nothing of great importance occurred at Jerusalem, but in A.D. 26 Pontius Pilate became procurator, and trouble arose at once. The first time he came to Jerusalem, he brought into the city by night troops carrying ensigns bearing the emperor's image. The previous procurators, out of deference to the religious scruples of the Jews, had refrained from introducing such images into the holy city. In the morning a delegation of the indignant citizens went to Pilate, who at once withdrew to Caesarea and a few days later had the ensigns removed.

Pilate undertook one notable project for Jerusalem—an aqueduct to bring a more adequate supply of water from the vicinity of Bethlehem. Herod, if not Solomon, had made a beginning in this direction by creating the lower of two aqueducts which can still be partially traced; the upper aqueduct was the work of Pilate. To pay for it he undertook to draw on the temple treasury, but the citizens angrily protested. Pilate had soldiers circulate in diguise among the people, killing or wounding many of them, and proceeded with the enterprise.

The Synoptic gospels say nothing of any visit to Jerusalem by Jesus between the age of twelve and the last days of his life. The Gospel of John reports several incidents there during this interval. The cleansing of the temple and the conversation with Nicodemus take place at the Passover season shortly after the "first sign" at Cana (John 2:13–3:21). The healing of the lame man and the ensuing controversy are connected with another feast, not specified, at Jerusalem (ch. 5).

The place of this miracle is a pool called Bethesda, Bethsaida, or BETHZATHA. Josephus calls the quarter N of the temple Bezetha, and the two names were probably the same originally. The pool is said also to have been "by the sheep gate" (KJV "sheep market")—the Greek has only an adjective, but it is the same one used in the LXX for the Sheep Gate (see § 7*b above*). The region N of the temple area seems therefore to be indicated. An old reservoir under a little church in the property of the White Fathers is commonly believed to be the pool of Bethzatha. This identification is as probable as any that has been suggested.

In John 7–8 a visit to Jerusalem at the Feast of Tabernacles is reported. After this, in ch. 9, comes the healing of the blind man who receives his sight after washing in the pool of Siloam. That this was identical with the present pool of Siloam, at the outlet of Hezekiah's tunnel (see §§ 6*c*, 7*b above*), cannot be assumed, but it was undoubtedly in that vicinity. A tower in Siloam which fell and killed eighteen people is mentioned in Luke 13:4.

When Jesus saw his end approaching, he "set his face to go to Jerusalem" (Luke 9:51). It could not be, he said, "that a prophet should perish away from Jerusalem" (13:33); and he cried out in sorrow and compassion at the city which rejected his loving solicitude (vss. 34-35). At the end of the tragic journey, surrounded by people who spread garments and branches before him, he came to Jerusalem; but "when he drew near and saw the city," Luke tells us, "he wept over it" and foretold its destruction (19:41-44). About halfway down the W side of the Mount of Olives there is a chapel called Dominus Flevit, which is believed to mark the place where Jesus wept over Jerusalem. A more probable place is the point where one comes over the top of the hill and gets the first breath-taking view of the city.

Crossing the Kidron Valley, Jesus "entered Jerusalem, and went into the temple" (Mark 11:11). The cleansing of the temple and the teaching in its courts lie outside the scope of this article, but the disciples' amazement at the "wonderful stones" of the temple (Mark 13:1) recalls the remains of Herodian masonry still to be seen in the foundations of the sacred enclosure. See § 10 above.

For the "holy places" connected with the last week of Jesus' life on earth, we are dependent upon church traditions of uncertain age and value, in no case definitely attested earlier than the fourth century. It is disappointing not to be sure of the authenticity of these sites, yet perhaps it is better so. Veneration of sacred places may easily pass into idolatry. At all of them we can at least reverently recall the events associated with them by tradition, and respect the fervent faith of pilgrims who through the centuries have found here comfort and inspiration.

The place where the Last Supper of Jesus with his disciples was eaten is defined in the gospels only as a large upper room in a private house (Matt. 26:18; Mark 14:13-15; Luke 22:10-12). The traditional site of the upper room, called the Cenaculum, is on the SW hill outside the present walls. The slight claim of this tradition to authenticity is not enhanced by the fact that the tomb of David is alleged to have been at the same place.

Concerning the sites of other events we are no better informed. On the SW hill, just outside the Zion Gate, is the burying ground of the Armenian patriarchs. The adjoining buildings are believed to cover the site of the high priest's palace, where Jesus was arraigned before Caiaphas (Matt. 26:57; Mark 14:53; Luke 22:54). A chapel called the Prison of Christ indicates the place where Jesus is supposed to have been detained. Some think, however, that the high priest's palace was in what is now the garden of the Assumptionist fathers, a little farther to the E. According to John 18:13, Jesus was taken first to Annas, the father-in-law of Caiaphas, and only then to Caiaphas (vs. 24). The traditional site of the house of Annas is the Armenian Convent of the Olives near the Church of St. James, in the SW part of the Old City.

Tradition has long regarded a cave on the W side of the Tyropoeon Valley as the place where Peter wept after denying his Master (Matt. 26:75; Mark 14:72; Luke 22:62). Here once stood a church referred to by many pilgrims in the Middle Ages. Another grotto, farther to the S and W in the garden of the Assumptionist fathers, is thought by some to be the site of this church and of Peter's remorse. The whole series of events may have occurred in an entirely different part of the city.

In the morning Jesus was taken to Pilate. Matthew inserts here (27:3-10) the story of the death of Judas, which Luke relates in Acts 1:18-19. In both accounts, which are otherwise quite different, reference is made to a field called the Field of Blood or AKELDAMA, traditionally located on the hill directly S of the Valley of Hinnom. One tradition has it that Caiaphas had a country home on this hill, and the trial of Jesus before him was held there.

According to John 18:28 (cf. vs. 33 and 19:9), Jesus was taken to the PRAETORIUM to appear before Pilate. The Synoptic gospels do not name the place until later, when the soldiers are said to have taken Jesus into the praetorium (Matt. 27:27; Mark 15:16). It has been argued that Pilate's praetorium was at Herod's palace; most authorities, however, accept the tradition which identifies it with the fortress Antonia (see § 10 above). Ordinarily the procurator lived and held court at the palace, but at such a time as the Passover, when Jerusalem was crowded with pilgrims, he may well have made his headquarters at the fortress overlooking the temple. There is now a Muslim school on the rock above the NW corner of the sacred area, where once stood one of the towers of Antonia. In the courtyard of this school is the First Station of the Cross, marking the beginning of the Via Dolorosa. The trial of Jesus before Pilate probably occurred near this spot (Matt. 27:1-14; Mark 15:1-5; Luke 23:1-5; John 18:33-38; 19:8-11).

Luke alone records (23:5-11) an interruption of the hearing before Pilate. Learning that Jesus was a Galilean, the Procurator tried to evade the problem before him by sending Jesus to Herod Antipas, a son of Herod the Great, who had been tetrarch of Galilee and Perea since his father's death. He had come to Jerusalem for the Passover. The supposed site of his house is marked by the little Greek chapel of Nicodemus in the NE part of the present Old City, not far from the site of Antonia. Other sites also have been suggested. The Old Hasmonean palace overlooking the Tyropoeon Valley (see § 9 above) may have been used by the royal visitor. In any case, Jesus, after refusing to answer Herod's question, was mocked and sent back to Pilate.

The crowd which clamored for Jesus' death and refused to accept Barabbas in his place (Matt. 27:15-26 and parallels) "did not enter the praetorium" (John 18:28). Pilate repeatedly went out to speak to the crowd and back into the praetorium to question Jesus further (John 18:29, 33, 38; 19:4, 9). Once he brought Jesus out and showed him to the crowd, saying: "Here is the man!" (19:5). Near the first station of the cross, where this is thought to have occurred, the street is spanned by a Roman arch traditionally known as the Ecce Homo arch. It is part of a triumphal arch of the time of Hadrian, a century later than the crucifixion of Jesus. Pl. XXVII*b*.

John 19:13 says that when Pilate found he could not satisfy the mob except by condemning Jesus to death, "he brought Jesus out and sat down on the judgment seat at a place called The Pavement, and in Hebrew, Gabbatha." The strongest evidence for the location of the praetorium at Antonia—and it is very impressive indeed—is a great stone pavement, more than 150 feet square, under the convent of Notre Dame de Sion across the street from the first station of the cross and a little to the W. The second-century arch just mentioned rests on it and is obviously later. Scratched in the pavement are the complicated diagrams of a Roman game. This was undoubtedly the courtyard of Antonia, and it is probably the very pavement on which Pilate's judgment seat was placed when he pronounced the sentence of death on Jesus. Here, too, in all probability, were posted some of the soldiers who took Jesus into the praetorium and cruelly mocked him (Matt. 27:27-31=Mark 15:16-20; John 19:1-3).

According to John 19:17, Jesus "went out, bearing his own cross." The second station of the cross is at the foot of the ramp leading down to the street from the Muslim school; here the imposition of the cross is commemorated by pilgrims who follow the Via Dolorosa. The way now follows the street to the W. The incidents marked by the third and fourth stations of the cross are not recorded in the gospels. A broken column at the corner of the street which comes down from the Damascus Gate marks the third station, where Jesus is thought to have fallen under the weight of the cross. At the fourth station, where the Via Dolorosa turns the corner to the S, tradition says that Jesus met his mother. At the first corner to the right the way turns westward again. Here a little shrine with an inscription over the door marks the fifth station, where, it is supposed, Simon of Cyrene was compelled to carry the cross, though the Synoptic gospels imply that this was done at the beginning (Matt. 27:32; Mark 15:21; Luke 23:26).

The street now climbs the W side of the Tyropoeon Valley. About midway up the hill a piece of an old column in the wall of a building indicates the sixth station, where according to tradition Veronica wiped the Master's face. Where the ascending street meets another running straight S from the Damascus Gate, tradition says that there was a city gate in the first century called the Gate of Judgment because a notice of the sentence passed on Jesus was posted on it. A chapel at this corner marks the seventh station of the cross, where Jesus is thought to have fallen again in passing through the gate. There is nothing of this in the gospels, and it is unlikely that there was a city gate at exactly this spot, though there probably was one a little farther to the S. The question depends on the course of the city wall at the time of Jesus, which we shall have to consider presently.

Crossing the street and continuing up the hill to the W, one comes to the eighth station, marked by a cross carved in the wall of a Greek monastery. This is believed to be the place where Jesus spoke to the women of Jerusalem (Luke 23:27-31). From here on, the way is barred by the Greek monastery, and it is necessary to return to the corner, turn to the right, and proceed S to a flight of steps, from the top of which an alley leads to the door of a Coptic monastery. The ninth station, where Jesus is thought to have fallen a third time, is marked here by a column.

The last five of the fourteen stations of the cross are inside the vast Church of the Holy Sepulchre, four of them at the traditional site of Calvary and the last at the tomb itself (see SEPULCHRE, CHURCH OF THE HOLY). To reach the church from the ninth station, one must return to the steps and continue down the street to the S, turning to the right around the corner of a Russian convent and following the street toward the W to the court in front of the church.

Just inside the door of the church on the right is the elevated rock which tradition regards as GOLGOTHA or Calvary (Matt. 27:33; Mark 15:22; Luke 23:33; John 19:17). The question of its authenticity has been a subject of distressingly heated controversy. Western visitors are alienated by the childish legends told to pilgrims and tourists and the barbarous fashion in which the place is adorned. What is called Gordon's Calvary, N of the Old City, with its Garden Tomb, preserves an atmosphere more suited to devotion than the ancient Church of the Holy Sepulchre, but the arguments advanced for its authenticity have no historical value. The evidence for the traditional site itself is by no means conclusive; the arguments against it, however, are not cogent, and it remains more probable than any other site that has been suggested. The place where Jesus was crucified was certainly outside the city of that time. John 19:20 says that it was "near the city"; Heb. 13:12 preserves the memory that it was "outside the gate." We cannot trace the tradition of the site farther back than the fourth century A.D., when Constantine built his church there; but unless there had been such a tradition, he would hardly have selected a place which in his time was inside the city. The question therefore depends largely on the location of the city wall in the first century.

What is at issue is the "second wall," as Josephus calls it. The older wall lay farther to the S. Unfortunately Josephus does not describe the course of the second wall precisely. He says only that it began at a gate of the first wall called Gannath (i.e., the Garden Gate), that it enclosed the N quarter of the city, and that it ended at the fortress Antonia (War V.iv.2). On the location of the Gennath Gate authorities differ. If it was near the middle of the old wall, not far from the Tyropoeon Valley, the second wall ran northward well to the E of the hill occupied by the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. If, as seems more likely, the starting point was nearer the W end of the old wall, the second wall may have turned to the E either N or S of the traditional Calvary.

Archaeological evidence has been offered for both hypotheses. That advanced for the more northerly line, enclosing the traditional site, has been shown to be irrelevant. That advanced for the line farther S is more impressive but still not entirely conclusive; it consists of bits of ancient masonry and rock-cuttings which may or may not represent an ancient wall and moat. The existence of other Jewish tombs near the Holy Sepulchre supports the view that this area was outside the wall in the first century. Of course, even if it be granted that the city wall in the time of Jesus lay to the S and E of this place, it does not necessarily follow that the sacred events took place at exactly these particular spots. It is not too much to say, however, that the evidence, as far as it goes, favors this general vicinity.

Since neither the location of the praetorium nor the authenticity of the traditional Calvary can be definitely established, the route between them is of course still less certain, quite apart from the fact that the streets in the time of Jesus lay at many points far below the present level of the ground. The reports of pilgrims through the centuries, moreover, show that the stations of the cross have been variously located at different times and by different groups. The honest and enlightened pilgrim of today finds all this very disappointing. With a little exercise of historical imagination, however, he can still be deeply moved by the fact that somewhere on these very hills his Lord was condemned and crucified.

The eleventh and twelfth stations of the cross, on Calvary itself, commemorate the crucifixion and death of Jesus. The thirteenth station marks a traditional incident, the delivery of Jesus' body to his mother. The fourteenth station is at the Holy Sepulchre. The authenticity of this tomb, in the center of the great rotunda of the ancient church, stands or falls with the authenticity of Calvary. Around both of them the rock has been cut away to produce a level floor, so that they now stand up above the surrounding surface. If this is indeed the tomb of Joseph of Arimathea, in which he reverently laid the body of Jesus (Matt. 27:57-61; Mark 15:42-47; Luke 23:50-56; John 19:38-42), the level of the ground was then much more uneven and somewhat higher than it is now. According to John 19:41 (cf. 20:15), it was in a garden.

A detail in the record of the burial of Jesus is illustrated by a number of Jewish tombs of the period. Joseph, we read, "rolled a great stone to the door of the tomb" (Matt. 27:60), or, as Mark says, "against the door of the tomb" (15:46). In the tombs just mentioned, a circular slab resembling a millstone rolls in a groove so that it covers the opening but can be rolled back to gain access to the tomb. This explains the sealing of the tomb related in Matt. 27:62-66. One of the best examples, belonging unquestionably to the first century, is in the tomb of Helen of Adiabene, of which more will be said later. See § 12 below.

The Holy Sepulchre is the traditional site, of course, not only of the burial of Jesus but also of his resurrection. Here, it is believed, the women came to anoint the body and found the tomb open and empty (Matt. 28:1-10), and here the risen Lord appeared to Mary Magdalene (John 20:11-18).

A postresurrection appearance to the disciples at Jerusalem is related in Luke 24:33-49; in John 20:19-29 there are two such appearances, eight days apart. The place is not specified; tradition supposes that the disciples were gathered in the same upper room where the Last Supper had been eaten, but there is nothing to indicate this in the text. Acts 1:13 speaks of the "upper room, where they were staying," to which they returned after the Ascension. According to Acts 1:3-5, Jesus appeared repeatedly to the disciples "during forty days" and "charged them not to depart from Jerusalem" until they received the baptism of the Holy Spirit (cf. Luke 24:49).

In Acts 1:12 the Ascension is located on the "mount called Olivet"—i.e., the "Mount of Olives" (see §§ 5*a-b*, 6*d*, 7*c above*); Luke 24:50 places it "as far as Bethany," on the E side of the Mount of Olives, but both the text and the meaning of the phrase rendered "as far as" are uncertain. Tradition points to a place on the summit of the mount, marked by an old chapel now converted into a mosque.

12. The apostolic period to the death of Agrippa I. The first recorded incident in the history of the apostolic church is the selection of Matthias to take the place of Judas among the twelve apostles (Acts 1:15-26). Where this took place is not stated. The eleven disciples had been devoting themselves to prayer "together with the women and Mary the mother of Jesus, and with his brothers" (vss. 12-14); vs. 15, however, speaks of a company of about a hundred and twenty, who could hardly have assembled in the upper room where the eleven were staying (vs. 13).

The fulfilment of the promise of the Holy Spirit at the Feast of Pentecost occurred when "they were all together in one place," not otherwise specified (Acts 2:1). At the sound of the speaking in tongues the multitude of pilgrims "from every nation under heaven" flocked together (vss. 5-6), and Peter addressed them (vss. 14 ff). This implies sufficient space for a considerable assembly, but there is nothing to indicate where it was.

Several incidents related in the early chapters of Acts may be passed over here, because they occurred at the temple (see TEMPLE, JERUSALEM, § C1). Even the "common prison" mentioned in 5:18 may have been connected with the sacred area. Where the disciples were gathered when they prayed for boldness to speak the word, and the place was shaken by the power that came to them (4:23-31), where they administered their common affairs (4:32–5:11), and where they ordained seven men to supervise the daily distribution (6:1-6), we have no means of telling. We do not know even in what quarter of the city all these things took place.

Among those who disputed with Stephen and instigated his arrest (6:9 ff) were "some of those who belonged to the synagogue of the Freedmen (as it was called)." A possible reference to this synagogue has been found in a Greek inscription discovered in a cistern on the SE hill of Jerusalem. It says that a synagogue, a guesthouse for strangers, and a bathing establishment were built by a man named Theodotus, son of Vettemus. From the fact that the father's name is Latin it has been inferred that he may have been an emancipated Jewish slave. The script of the inscription favors a date in the first century.

The place where Stephen was stoned to death is designated only as outside the city (Acts 7:58). There are two traditions concerning the site of this first Christian martyrdom. The Dominican Church of St. Stephen, on the Nablus Road N of the Damascus Gate, is built on the foundations of a fifth-century basilica, erected by the Empress Eudoxia to house the relics of the saint and to be her own mausoleum. Whether this was believed at that time to be the place where Stephen died is not clear, but the Crusaders who camped there later so regarded it. The rival site, marked by the Greek Chapel of St. Stephen, is beside the Jericho Road near the bottom of the Kidron Valley, below St. Stephen's Gate. It is attested at a slightly earlier date than the other.

The next incident located at Jerusalem is the criticism of Peter by the "circumcision party" after the conversion of Cornelius (Acts 11:1-8). Meanwhile much else had been happening at Jerusalem. Philo reports an incident which sounds like a variant version of Josephus' story of the ensigns (see § 11 above). Pilate, says Philo, had the name of the Emperor Tiberius inscribed on shields which were hung on the walls of the palace. The Jewish leaders, unable to induce Pilate to remove them, appealed to the emperor, who ordered the shields removed.

In A.D. 36 Pilate was deposed because of a cruel massacre of Samaritans. The Roman legate in Syria, Vitellius, appointed another procurator and came to Jerusalem himself at the Passover season. His liberal attitude greatly pleased the Jews. The priestly vestments for the festivals, which had been kept in the fortress Antonia since the days of the Hasmonean priest-kings, were now turned over to the priests to be kept in the temple. Before Vitellius left Jerusalem, word came that Tiberius had died and Caligula had become emperor (A.D. 37).

Vitellius and his successor, Petronius, dealt wisely with the Jews, but all chance of tranquillity at Jerusalem was lost when Caligula ordered his own image set up in the temple. Disaster was averted by the prudent procrastination of Petronius and the intercession of Agrippa, a grandson of Herod the Great whom Caligula had made king over the former territories of Philip and Antipas. The death of Caligula further allayed the excitement. The threatened desecration of the temple may well be what is meant by the "desolating sacrilege" in Matt. 24:15; Mark 13:14.

Caligula's successor, Claudius (A.D. 41-54), added Samaria and Judea to the domain of Agrippa, who now reigned as Agrippa I over the whole kingdom of Herod. A famine "in the days of Claudius," which necessitated sending relief from other places to the Jerusalem church, is recorded in Acts 11:27-30. On the whole, however, the reign of Agrippa seems to have been a time of prosperity. A generous patron of the temple and a strict observer of the law, at least while he was in Palestine, the king was idolized by the Jews.

His popularity was probably enhanced by his harsh treatment of the disciples at Jerusalem: he is the "Herod the king" who "laid violent hands upon some who belonged to the church," had James the brother of John put to death, and imprisoned Peter (Acts 12:1-5). Marvelously delivered from prison, Peter went to the house of Mark's mother, but the disciples gathered there could not believe it was really he (vss. 6-19). Where this house was we do not know. There is a tradition which places it where the Syrian Orthodox Monastery of St. Mark now stands in the Old City, not far S of David Street.

One enterprise of Agrippa I has occasioned much debate. The city had now spread beyond the wall to the N, occupying the "fourth hill," Bezetha (see § 11 above). To protect this new quarter Agrippa began to build what Josephus calls the third wall; but, fearing the emperor's displeasure, he abandoned the project when only the foundations had been laid. The course of the third wall is defined in some detail by Josephus, but the points of reference he names cannot all be identified.

Foundations of an ancient wall which have been uncovered some distance to the N of the city are believed by some archaeologists to be the remains of Agrippa's wall; others find good reason to reject this identification. The foundations are earlier than the Byzantine period, but their construction does not correspond to the description of Josephus. Their course also is not that of Agrippa's wall. It began at Hippicus, one of the towers of Herod's palace (see § 10 above), and extended northward to a great tower named Psephinus. Part of the foundations of this tower still survive at the base of the "Tower of Goliath" in the NW corner of the Old City.

At this point the wall turned to the E and passed opposite the site of the somewhat later tomb of Helen of Adiabene, the traditional "Tombs of the Kings" (see § 13 below). Josephus says that this tomb was ca. three stadia from the city—i.e., ca. five hundred yards, which is approximately the distance between it and the present N wall. The foundations in question are much nearer to Helen's tomb. Agrippa's wall, Josephus continues, passed through the royal caverns, meaning undoubtedly the so-called Quarries of Solomon, which run under the present N wall. At an unidentified tower called the "Fuller's Monument" the wall turned S above the Kidron Valley and rejoined the earlier wall.

What Josephus tells us about the third wall thus corresponds fairly closely with the present N wall of the Old City. Archaeological soundings have shown that Agrippa's wall did not follow exactly the line of the present wall, but probably ran a few feet to the N of it. When the wall considerably farther N was built is an unsolved problem, but it was apparently after the close of the NT period, probably in the second or third century.

13. From the death of Agrippa I to the First Revolt. Soon after Agrippa's death (A.D. 44) Queen Helen of Adiabene, a convert to Judaism, came to Jerusalem. Her palace on the SE hill is mentioned by Josephus in his account of the siege of A.D. 70 (see § 14 below). In the region N of the temple and outside Agrippa's unfinished wall she had a magnificent tomb made for herself and her family. Under the traditional name of the "Tombs of the Kings" it is still one of the most impressive sights of Jerusalem, a striking example of the mixed style of art which prevailed at that time in the Near East.

Most of the procurators sent by Rome after the death of Agrippa were corrupt and indifferent to Jewish traditions and aspirations. Disorder and messianic uprisings became more and more the order of the day, and contending factions arose among the Jews themselves. The temple was often desecrated by fighting and killing, as one high priest succeeded another. In A.D. 49-50 the Emperor Claudius gave the supervision of the temple and the right to appoint the high priests to Agrippa II, a son of Agrippa I, making him also king of a little kingdom in Syria. As his residence when in Jerusalem, he was given the old Hasmonean palace. See § 9 above.

Ca. a year later Felix became procurator. Although he married Agrippa's sister, his dealings with the Jews were far from sympathetic. The revolutionary party of the Zealots received especially harsh treatment. It was during this time that the apostle Paul came to Jerusalem and was attacked by a mob for allegedly bringing Greeks into the temple (Acts 21:27-30). His life was saved by the intervention of the Roman tribune, who took him into the barracks for safety after allowing him to address the crowd from the steps (21:31–23:29). Presumably these barracks were in the fortress Antonia.

The conversation between Paul and the tribune includes a reference to the ASSASSINS and to an Egyptian who led some of them into the desert (21:38). This Egyptian was a Jew from Egypt who promised his followers that from the Mount of Olives they would see the walls of Jerusalem collapse at his command, and could then follow him into the city. Felix attacked them, killed over a hundred of them, and captured two hundred, but their leader escaped. Meanwhile disorders in Jerusalem and throughout the country increased. Felix put to death many brigands and agitators; but, being annoyed by the high priest, Jonathan, he allowed some of the brigands to enter the city, mingle with the worshipers at the temple, and kill Jonathan with the daggers they had concealed in their robes.

In A.D. 60 Felix was removed from office. His successor, Porcius Festus, won the approval of the less extreme elements of the population. Strife arose, however, between the aristocrats of Jerusalem and Agrippa II when the latter built a large dining hall at the top of the old Hasmonean palace, where he could observe what was going on in the temple enclosure as he took his meals. The Jewish leaders thereupon erected a high wall at the W edge of the inner court, cutting off the king's view. Festus ordered them to demolish the wall but let them appeal to the Emperor Nero, who allowed them to leave it standing.

Albinus, who followed Festus, was one of the worst of the procurators. At this time serious unemployment was created at Jerusalem by the completion of construction in the temple courts. A project to relieve the situation by reconstructing one of the temple gates was vetoed by Agrippa II, but he sanctioned an alternative project to pave the city with white stone. A little later Albinus, hearing that he was about to be displaced, tried to please the Jews by executing all the worst criminals in the prisons and releasing the rest.

Gessius Florus, the last procurator, was even worse than Albinus. As though bent on provoking rebellion, he allowed disorder to go unchecked, imprisoned Jews who protested, and misappropriated the funds of the temple. Troops were sent against a crowd at the temple who had demanded that the emperor intervene. Taking up his residence at the palace (presumably that of Herod the Great; see § 10 above), the procurator now set up his tribunal beside it and heard the supplications of the city's leading men, but then rejected their petitions and turned his troops loose against the people in the market place and streets of the upper city. Many leading Jews of Roman citizenship and rank were scourged and crucified before the procurator's tribunal. Josephus says that ca. 3,600 men, women, and children were killed that day. Horrified at the slaughter, Agrippa's sister Berenice (see HEROD [FAMILY] § H 7) tried repeatedly to induce Florus to have mercy, but in vain.

Some of the Jewish leaders and priests persuaded the multitude to desist from public lamentation, but Florus apparently did not want peace. Troops brought up from Caesarea fell upon a delegation which met them before the city gates, then pushed through the N quarter Bezetha (see § 10 above) in the hope of occupying the fortress Antonia and the temple area. Florus himself and his soldiers set out from the palace but were unable to reach Antonia, because the people stopped their passage through the narrow streets and threw darts at them from the housetops. The Jewish insurgents also destroyed the N cloisters of the temple, cutting off access from Antonia.

Florus now withdrew to Caesarea and reported to the legate of Syria that the Jews were in revolt against Rome. Charges against Florus himself were sent also by the Jewish leaders and Berenice. A tribune was sent to Jerusalem to investigate. Persuaded by Agrippa to walk around the city as far as Siloam accompanied only by one servant, the tribune was convinced that the population was peaceably disposed. When he was gone, however, the people, fearing that Nero would hold them responsible for the disorders, decided to send a delegation to Rome to complain against Florus. Agrippa considered this very unwise. Putting Berenice where she could be seen at the Hasmonean palace, he assembled the people at the xystus, a smooth area for athletic contests in the Tyropoeon Valley below the palace. His eloquence persuaded the people to abandon the project of complaining to Nero. When he urged submission to Florus, however, he was so violently opposed that he withdrew to his own kingdom.

The beginning of the war with Rome, in the opinion of Josephus, was the decision of the priests to receive no offering in the temple from any foreigner. This meant the rejection of the emperor's offerings. At the same time the customary sacrifices for rulers were stopped. The leading men of the city, unable to control the rebellion, now appealed to Florus and Agrippa for military assistance. Agrippa sent three thousand horsemen, by whose help the party opposing the revolt occupied the upper city of the W hill, while the insurgents controlled the temple area, the SE hill, and the Tyropoeon Valley. The fortress Antonia was still held by Roman troops.

In the ensuing struggle the party of moderation was soon driven from the upper city and shut up in the Herodian palace. The Hasmonean palace and the high priest's house were burned. The fortress Antonia also fell to the rebels, who burned it and slaughtered its garrison. When the Jews besieged in Herod's palace surrendered, the Romans took refuge in the towers of Hippicus, Phasael, and Mariamne. Eventually they too surrendered and were treacherously massacred.

All this was accomplished in spite of bitter factional struggles among the insurgents themselves. The rebels were now masters of the whole city. In the autumn of 66 the legate of Syria, Cestius Gallus, brought an army against them. The N quarter, Bezetha, was burned, but when his soldiers had reached the temple wall and undermined it, Cestius inexplicably recalled them and withdrew from the city.

All efforts among the Jews to avoid war were now abandoned, and the leaders at Jerusalem attempted to form a military organization. Nero sent his ablest general, Vespasian, to put down the revolt. Arriving in Palestine early in the year 67, Vespasian undertook to get control of the rest of the country before attacking Jerusalem. Time was thus given the rebels to make preparations, including the completion of the N wall which Agrippa I had begun (see § 12 above); but factional strife in the city, resulting even in frightful slaughter of Jews by Jews or by Idumeans brought in by one group to attack another, prevented effective action.

After a rapid succession of three emperors in one year following the death of Nero, Vespasian became emperor in 69 and went to Rome, leaving his son Titus to carry out the attack on Jerusalem. The story of the siege of 70 cannot be repeated here; its details are of no significance for the understanding of the Bible. The stratagems of the besieged sometimes imperiled the Roman soldiers and even Titus himself, but the end would have been certain even if the Jews had been united among themselves. The bloody strife within the walls between the factions which struggled for possession of different quarters of the city was more horrible than the siege itself.

Titus attacked the city from the NW and took one wall after another. To take the oldest and innermost wall, he set up great mounds or ramps of earth, one of them being near the pool Amygdalon, now known as the Patriarch's Bath or the Pool of Hezekiah. The fortress Antonia and the wall N of the temple were invested in like manner. The whole city was surrounded also by a wall more than five miles long.

Famine was soon added to the horrors of the siege, but the factions in the city continued their insensate fighting and killing. The N wall was finally breached by the battering rams of the Romans; the fortress Antonia was captured and dismantled, the sacred enclosure became a scene of frightful carnage, and the lower city was plundered and burned all the way down to the pool of Siloam. The upper city, too, was laid waste. Of Herod's palace only the three great towers remained standing to mark the site.

For both Judaism and Christianity the fall of Jerusalem and the destruction of the temple marked a turning point. The Christian community had escaped to Pella across the Jordan before the siege. No more incidents of biblical history are located at Jerusalem. Jesus had foretold the time when the city would be surrounded by armies, and her enemies would cast up a bank about her (Luke 19:43; 21:20); he had foreseen the ruin of the temple, leaving not one stone on another (Mark 13:2).

Since then the Holy City has gone through innumerable vicissitudes, rarely knowing peace for any length of time. Christians may well pray for the peace of Jerusalem (Ps. 122:6), remembering always at the same time that the true worship of God can never again be localized either there or at any other place on earth (John 4:21). The new Jerusalem of Rev. 21 is no earthly city, but one that will come down "out of heaven from God" (vs. 2).

Bibliography. J. Jeremias, Jerusalem zur Zeit Jesu (1923—); G. Dalman, Jerusalem und sein Gelände (1930); D. Baldi, Enchiridion Locorum Sanctorum (1935); J. Simons, Jerusalem in the OT (1952); L. H. Vincent, Jérusalem de l'AT (1954); M. Avi-Yonah, ed., Sepher Yerushalayim (The Book of Jerusalem; 1956).

M. Burrows

JERUSHA jĭ rōō′shə [ירושא, from ירש, possession] (II Kings 15:33); JERUSHAH [ירושה] (II Chr. 27:1). The mother of Jotham king of Judah.

JESHAIAH jĭ shā′yə [ישעיה, ישעיהו, Yahu has saved (same spelling as for ISAIAH); Apoc. (A) 'Ιεσσίας, 'Ωσσίας; Apoc. (B) 'Εσιας in I Esd. 8:33]; KJV twice JESAIAH jĭ sā′yə (I Chr. 3:21; Neh. 11:7); KJV Apoc. JOSIAS jō sī′əs in I Esd. 8:33; OSAIAS ō sā′yəs in I Esd. 8:48. 1. A descendant of King David in the postexilic period (I Chr. 3:21).

2. A Levite musician, one of the "sons of Jeduthun" (I Chr. 25:3, 15).

3. One of the Levites sharing supervision of the temple treasuries (I Chr. 26:25).

4. An Elamite among the Babylonian exiles who returned to Jerusalem with Ezra (Ezra 8:7; I Esd. 8:33).

5. A Merarite Levite in the same company (Ezra 8:19; I Esd. 8:48).

6. A Benjaminite ancestor of one of the residents of postexilic Jerusalem (Neh. 11:7). The name is not given in the parallel I Chr. 9:7-8.

B. T. Dahlberg

JESHANAH jĕsh′ə nə [ישנה (II Chr. 13:19), שן (I Sam. 7:12)]; KJV SHEN shĕn in I Sam. 7:12. One of the cities taken, with its villages, by Abijah in a war with Jeroboam I (II Chr. 13:19), suggesting a location on the border of Judah and Israel. "Jeshanah" is probably to be read for "Shen" in I Sam. 7:12, in view of the similarity of the names and the region involved.

Apparently the same place, called Isanas, was the headquarters of Pappus, general of Antigonus, where the forces of Herod the Great were victorious (Jos. Antiq. XIV.xv.12).

The most probable of several proposed locations is Burj el-Isaneh, ca. three miles N of Jifneh.

Bibliography. W. F. Albright, "Ophrah and Ephraim," AASOR, IV (1922-23), 125-26. W. L. REED

JESHARELAH jĕsh'ə rē'lə [ישראלה] (I Chr. 25:14). A musician among the sons of Asaph during the time of David. The name is probably a corrupt form of ASHARELAH (vs. 2).

JESHEBEAB jĭ shĕb'ĭ ăb [ישבאב, perhaps may the father (here secular) endure (i.e., enjoy prolonged life)] (I Chr. 24:13). A priest or priestly house, descended from Aaron.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 247; cf. p. 67n. B. T. DAHLBERG

JESHER jē'shər [ישר, (the deity) shows himself just(?)] (I Chr. 2:18). A son of Caleb, listed in the genealogy of Judah.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 189.

JESHIMON jĭ shī'mən [הישימון, הישימון, a waste, a desert; translated as a common noun except in the occurrences below]. 1. A waste area in the neighborhood of Ziph (I Sam. 23:19, 24; 26:1, 3), N of the hill of Hachilah, and of Maon. The location seems to be a few miles S of Hebron.

2. KJV translation in Num. 21:20; 23:28 (RSV "desert"). It is a waste, overlooked from the top of Peor and from the top of Pisgah. The location would seem to be near the NE end of the Dead Sea, perhaps including the site of BETH-JESHIMOTH.

See also DESERT; WILDERNESS. E. D. GROHMAN

JESHISHAI jĭ shĭsh'ī [ישישי, venerable(?)] (I Chr. 5:14). A Gadite.

JESHOHAIAH jĕsh'ə hā'yə [ישוחיה, possibly Yahu humbles] (I Chr. 4:36). A prince of the tribe of Simeon.

JESHUA jĕsh'ōō ə [ישוע, Yahu is salvation]; KJV once JESHUAH (I Chr. 24:11); KJV Apoc. JESUS jē'zəs ['Ιησοῦς] (I Esd. 5:8, 24; 9:19, 48; Ecclus. 49:12); JESSUE jĕsh'ōō ĭ ['Ιησουέ (A)] (I Esd. 5:26); JESU jē'zōō, jē'sōō ['Ιησοῦς] (I Esd. 8:63). Alternately: JOSHUA jŏsh'ōō ə [יהושע, variant of ישוע (in Haggai and Zechariah)]. 1. The form of Joshua used in Neh. 8:17. See JOSHUA SON OF NUN.

2. A division of Aaronite priests identified by the Chronicler first with the time of David (I Chr. 24:11), and perhaps the same priestly house as is listed among the returning exiles in Ezra 2:36 (cf. Neh. 7:39; I Esd. 5:24); possibly represented also in 5 below.

3. A Levite who assisted in the distribution of the priests' allowances during the reign of Hezekiah (ca. 715-687 B.C.; II Chr. 31:15).

4. A subdivision of the (nonpriestly) clan of Pahath-Moab listed among the exiles returning from Babylon (Ezra 2:6; cf. Neh. 7:11; I Esd. 5:11 [RSV only]).

5. A high priest (in Haggai and Zechariah called Joshua); ca. 560-490 B.C.; son of Jozadak (Jehozadak), who was among the Jews taken into Babylonian captivity in 586 B.C. (I Chr. 6:15—H 5:41). Jeshua the high priest was contemporary with Zerubbabel the governor and the prophets Haggai and Zechariah in postexilic Jerusalem under the Persian king Darius Hystaspis (522-486).

The books of Haggai and Ezra generally mention his name and Zerubbabel's together as a pair, indicating respectively their ecclesiastical and civil leadership of the Jerusalem community, and one of the visions of Zechariah epitomizes this relationship as "the two anointed who stand by the LORD of the whole earth" (cf. Zech. 4:11-14).

Following Zerubbabel, who is first, Jeshua's name heads the Chronicler's lists of returned exiles (Ezra 2:2; Neh. 7:7; 12:1, 10, 26; cf. I Esd. 5:8). He shares with Zerubbabel the responsibility for building the Jerusalem temple, aroused and spurred on by the preaching of the prophets Haggai and Zechariah (Hag. 1:1, 12, 14; 2:2, 4; cf. Ezra 5:2; Ecclus. 49:11-12). Although the Chronicler projects the beginning of their reconstruction of the temple and its cult back into the time of the Persian king Cyrus—i.e., to the years immediately following the termination of the Exile in 538 B.C. (Ezra 3:2, 8; 4:3; cf. 1:1-2)—the work described in this connection is generally presumed to belong in the reign of Darius (see EZRA AND NEHEMIAH, BOOKS OF; HAGGAI; ZERUBBABEL). Apparently Jeshua is one of those signified in Enoch 89:72—the others being Zerubbabel and either Ezra or Nehemiah—where are mentioned "three of those sheep" who "turned back and came and entered and began to build up all that had fallen down of that house." See bibliography.

Jeshua (or Joshua) is the subject of several of the prophet Zechariah's apocalyptic visions. In one the high priest appears before a heavenly court in which he is absolved of iniquity and his "filthy garments" are exchanged for clean apparel, and he as high priest is given jurisdiction over the temple (Zech. 3). The vision would appear to attempt an expression of divine sanction for the high priest's ecclesiastical authority in the face of doubts concerning the qualifications of a returned exile for the office. Zech. 6:9-14 (cf. 4:14) suggests, on the other hand, that the high priest is to have a supportive role vis-à-vis the royal throne as represented in the governor Zerubbabel, a ruler in the Davidic line. The phrasing of 6:12-13 anticipates that "the Branch"—i.e., Zerubbabel, not Joshua (as now in vs. 11)—was to receive the crown of David. However, the passage was emended later to read "Joshua" by a redactor who knew, after the event, that both civil and religious authority in Judah devolved finally upon the high priest after Persia withdrew all political power from the house of David. See HAGGAI; PRIESTS AND LEVITES; ZECHARIAH; ZERUBBABEL.

Some of Jeshua's family are listed among those contemporaries of Ezra who married foreign wives (Ezra 10:18; cf. I Esd. 9:19).

Bibliography. C. C. Torrey, Ezra Studies (1910), p. 319; L. W. Batten, Ezra and Nehemiah, ICC (1913), p. 107; R. H. Charles, "Book of Enoch," Apoc. and Pseudep. of the OT (1913), II 256; W. F. Albright, "Date and Personality of the Chronicler," JBL, XL (1921), 122; R. H. Pfeiffer, Introduction to the OT (1948), p. 605; D. W. Thomas, Exegesis of Zech. 1–8, IB, VI (1956), 1067-71, 1080.

6. A Levitical house or clan, perhaps descended from 3 above, among the exiles returning to Jerusalem from Babylon (Ezra 2:40; 8:33; cf. Neh. 7:43; 12:8, 24; I Esd. 5:26; 8:63). This is doubtless the family from whom is descended the Ezer son of Jeshua who worked on Nehemiah's wall (Neh. 3:19), and a representative of this house was among those who signed the "covenant of Ezra" (Neh. 10:9—H 10:10). The individuals following below are doubtless members of this family.

7. A Levite chief who helped supervise the work of rebuilding the temple in the days of Zerubbabel the governor and Jeshua the high priest (Ezra 3:9).

8. One of the Levites who interpreted the law as Ezra read from it before the people (Neh. 8:7; cf. I Esd. 9:48; but see bibliography). In Neh. 9:4-5 he and his colleagues direct the public service of worship.

Bibliography. R. A. Bowman, Exegesis of Nehemiah, IB, III (1954), 736-37. B. T. DAHLBERG

9. A town occupied by Jewish returnees from the Exile (Neh. 11:26); modern Tell es-Sa'wi, NE of Beer-sheba. See also SHEBA 3.

JESHURUN jĕsh'ə rən [ישרון, probably from ישר, upright] (Deut. 32:15; 33:5, 26; Isa. 44:2); KJV JESURUN jĕs'ə rən. A variant form of the name Israel. It was usually regarded by scholars as a late and artificial construction after the analogy of the name ZEBULUN (cf. JEDUTHUN), but the two poems of Deut. 32–33 cannot now be regarded as late. It is perhaps best taken to be a hypocoristicon from the name Israel, occurring only in poetry, and conceivably intended to emphasize the root meaning, "upright." The LXX does not treat this as a proper name, but instead translates it very curiously with ἠγαπημένος, "beloved" (ἠγαπημένος Ἰσραὴλ in Isa. 44:2). The same Greek word occurs repeatedly as an appellative of Egyptian kings during the Greek period. Since the passage in Deutero-Isaiah connects the term with the Servant who is chosen, the corresponding Greek word occurs repeatedly as an adjective characterizing both Jesus (Eph. 1:6) and the NT church (Col. 3:12; I Thess. 1:4; II Thess. 2:13; Jude 1). In almost every passage the concept of ELECTION is closely connected.

G. E. MENDENHALL

JESIAH. KJV alternate form of ISSHIAH.

JESIMIEL jĭ sĭm'ĭ əl [ישימאל, may God establish] (I Chr. 4:36). A prince of the tribe of Simeon.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 28, 36, 202.

JESSE jĕs'ĭ [ישי; אישי; Ἰεσσαί]. The father of King David. He was of the tribe of Judah and resided in Bethlehem. Jesse is first introduced in the narrative which describes the visit of the prophet Samuel to Bethlehem to anoint, in the place of Saul, one of the sons of Jesse. When the prophet had called the guests to the sacrificial meal, he had pass in review before him all the sons of Jesse except David, but none was chosen. When David, the youngest son of Jesse, was finally summoned from tending the sheep, Samuel anointed him as the future king of Israel (I Sam. 16:1-13).

Somewhat later Jesse received messengers from King Saul, petitioning that David be sent to the court to alleviate the periodic mental depression of the monarch. Jesse not only acceded to this request but also sent along with his son a present of foodstuffs for the king. When a second request was made by Saul, that David be permitted to reside at the court, Jesse likewise granted it (I Sam. 16:14-23).

From another source in the book of Samuel it is recounted that on the occasion when Jesse sent David with provisions for his three eldest sons, who were serving in the army of Saul in the campaign against the Philistines in the valley of Elah, the famous encounter of David with the Philistine giant took place (I Sam. 17:12 ff).

Although Jesse is described as well advanced in years when David was but a lad (I Sam. 17:12), he appears to have survived a sojourn in the land of Moab, where David took his parents during the time of his proscription by Saul (22:3-4).

Jesse was the son of Obed and the grandson of the opulent Boaz, the hero of the story of Ruth (Ruth 4: 17, 22; I Chr. 2:12; Matt. 1:5-6; Luke 3:32). He was the father of eight sons: Eliab, Abinadab, Shimea or Shammah, Nethanel, Raddai, Ozem, Elihu (I Chr. 27:18; see bibliography), and David; and two daughters: Zeruiah and Abigail (I Chr. 2:13-16). A discrepancy appears, however, when Abigail (called Abigal) is described as the daughter of Nahash (II Sam. 17:25). It has been proposed that in this verse the name Nahash is a textual importation from the following verse; or that Nahash is the wife of Jesse; or that Jesse may have contracted with the family of Nahash, king of Ammon, a beena marriage, in which the children would bear the maternal family name.

The designation of David as the "son of Jesse" was an opprobrious epithet used by those who were inimically disposed toward him, as Saul (I Sam. 20:27, 30-31; 22:7-8), Doeg (22:9), Nabal (25:10), and the ten tribes (I Kings 12:16). However, the designation subsequently achieved a continuing venerability (I Chr. 10:14; 29:26; Acts 13:22), while the similar expressions "shoot from the stump of Jesse" and "the root of Jesse" (Isa. 11:1, 10 = Rom. 15:12) became symbols in messianic prophecy.

Bibliography. W. Rudolph, Chronikbücher (1956), p. 180. E. R. DALGLISH

JESSUE. KJV Apoc. alternate form of JESHUA.

JESU. KJV Apoc. alternate form of JESHUA.

JESUI. KJV alternate form of ISHVI.

JESURUN. KJV alternate form of JESHURUN.

JESUS jē' zəs [Ἰησοῦς = יהושוע, Joshua]. 1. Grandfather of Jesus son of Sirach (Prologue to ECCLESIASTICUS).

2. Son of Sirach; author of ECCLESIASTICUS. See SIRACH, SON OF.
3. See JESUS CHRIST.
4. Jesus Barabbas. See BARABBAS.
5. Jesus Justus. See JUSTUS 3.
6. KJV Apoc. alternate form of JESHUA.
7. KJV translation in Acts 7:45; Heb. 4:8. See JOSHUA SON OF NUN.

F. W. GINGRICH

JESUS, WISDOM OF. A Gnostic writing discovered at Chenoboskion in 1946 (see APOCRYPHA, NT), based on the Letter of Eugnostos (see EUGNOSTOS, LETTER OF), and in the form of a dialogue between the resurrected Jesus and twelve disciples and seven holy women. In an appendix Mary Magdalene (who played an important role in Gnostic literature) inquires regarding the origin and function of the disciples.

The precise relation of this document with the one bearing the same title in the famous Berlin MSS is still uncertain.

M. S. ENSLIN

JESUS CHRIST. The personal name of the one whose title, "Christ" (or "the Christ"), gave its name to the Christian religion (Acts 11:26). The English form of the word goes back to the Latin (Iesus), which transliterates the Greek; but the original Hebrew form was Joshua, or more fully Yehoshuah ("Yahweh is salvation," or ". . . saves," or ". . . will save"), which Matthew (1:21) found especially significant, "for he [i.e., either Jesus or God] will save his people from their sins." This was an early Jewish Christian reflection on the meaning of Jesus' name; it would not have occurred to anyone but a believer. The name was fairly common in the first century; Josephus mentions nineteen persons called Jesus. The popularity may reflect the rising tide of nationalism which accompanied and followed the Maccabean War, and only increased under the Roman domination; for the first to bear the name was Joshua the son of Nun (Josh. 1:1), who led the Israelites in the conquest of Canaan. (Cf. Heb. 4:8, where the KJV reads "Jesus"—i.e., Joshua; the names were identical both in the NT and in the LXX. In Matt. 27:16-17 the MSS 1 etc. sy^s sy^{pal} and Origen read "Jesus Barabbas" to distinguish him from Jesus of Nazareth.)

In order to distinguish their Master from others of the name, the disciples used various phrases, such as "Jesus of Nazareth" (Luke 24:19), "Jesus, Son of David" (a messianic title; Mark 10:47), "the Galilean" (Mark 14:70), "the Nazarene" (Mark 14:67; cf. Matt. 26:71), "the prophet" (Matt. 21:11; Luke 7:39; 24:19). Perhaps significantly, the usual appellation "son of so-and-so" (naming his father) is not used: Jesus is described as "son of Joseph" only in Luke 4:22; John 1:45; 6:42 (contrast Mark 6:3: "the son of Mary," and Matt. 13:55: "the carpenter's son," though many scholars suspect that the text has been altered at this point, at least in Mark). None of these appellatives survived for very long in Greek-speaking Gentile Christianity (though "son of Mary" was revived in medieval devotion); the Gentile church preferred titles with a theological connotation. Even before the period of Paul's missionary activity—i.e., probably from the very beginning of Gentile Christianity—the title "Christ" (Christos = "anointed" = Messiah) had tended to become a proper name, either in the usual form, "Jesus Christ," or (less commonly) "Christ Jesus"—the latter order retained more of the original significance, "the Messiah Jesus." Throughout the later Christian church, in all its branches, "Jesus Christ" has been used as the proper name of Jesus.

The history of this title and its transformation into a proper noun reflects the earliest development of Christology, which began with a Jewish messianic concept and ended with the metaphysical idea of divine incarnation. It also reflects the spread of Christianity in the Greco-Roman world, where Greek and Latin proper nouns usually included two words, a personal name with an appellative, like Julius Caesar, Titius Justus, Diodorus Siculus, or Marcus Aurelius.

A. Sources
  1. Paul
  2. The gospels
    a. The nature of the gospels
    b. The Gospel of Mark
    c. Luke and Matthew
    d. John
    e. No "harmony" of the gospels
    f. Varieties in tradition
    g. Different types of tradition
    h. The question of authenticity
  3. The non-Christian sources
  4. Is a life of Jesus possible?

B. Background
  1. Jesus the Galilean
  2. Economic and political conditions
  3. The revival of messianism

C. Jesus' birth
  1. The two infancy narratives
  2. Luke's narrative
  3. Matthew's narrative

D. John the Baptizer
  1. His call to repentance
  2. Relations between John and Jesus
  3. Jesus' baptism and temptation

E. Jesus' mission and message
  1. The beginning of the mission
  2. Jesus the prophet
  3. The message of the kingdom of God
    a. The meaning of "kingdom of God"
    b. The teaching of the parables
    c. The "coming" of the kingdom
    d. The coming Parousia and Judgment
    e. Was the kingdom identical with the church?
  4. Jesus' ministry to the outcast
  5. Jesus' teaching and Judaism
    a. Absolute sincerity
    b. Love for one's neighbor
    c. Humility
    d. The permanence of the Law
    e. The Lord's Prayer
    f. His criticism of scribal teaching
    g. Jesus' teaching on wealth
    h. The scribes' reply
    i. Jesus' criticism of the law
    j. Jesus' teaching of his disciples
    k. Discipleship

F. The mighty works
  1. Healings and exorcisms
  2. Other miracles

3. The meaning of the "mighty works" for Jesus himself
4. Significance of the Baptism and the Temptation
5. The question of messiahship
   a. The journey to Caesarea Philippi
   b. Jesus did not proclaim his messiahship
   c. The "Great Thanksgiving"
   d. Jesus' authority as a teacher

G. The death of Jesus
1. The forces against him
2. Jesus in Jerusalem
3. The Last Supper
4. The arrest and Jewish "trial"
5. The Roman trial and the Crucifixion
6. The Resurrection
7. Theories of the Resurrection

Bibliography

A. SOURCES. 1. Paul. The earliest literary reference to the birth of Jesus is in Paul's letter to the churches in Galatia (Gal. 4:4-5): "When the time had fully come, God sent forth his Son, born of a woman, born under the law, to redeem those who were under the law, so that we might receive adoption as sons." The statement is entirely theological and characteristically Pauline. The "fulness of time" probably means "at the end of the ages" (cf. Dan. 11:35; Tob. 14:5; Syr. Bar. 40:3; II Esd. 9:5; 11:44), rather than at the end of a particular sequence of historical events, preparatory to Christ's coming, or as a result of some special development of religious ideas or even of revelation (a view which is partly patristic, partly modern). "Born of a woman" is scarcely a reference to the Virgin Birth (though some read it: "born of the woman"); instead, like all anti-Gnostic, anti-Docetic language, including that of the Apostles' Creed, it meant: "He was truly born, of flesh and blood, not a phantom [i.e., a purely 'spiritual'] redeemer who appeared only to disappear and leave behind him a collection of esoteric doctrines" (cf. Job 14:1; 15:14; Heb. 2:14). "Born under the law" affirms that he was a Jew, a member of the sacred covenant with Israel, a fact attested by the whole NT and questioned only in the interest of bizarre modern "Aryan" or anti-Semitic theories.

Paul's statement is an example and illustration of his usual way of referring to the historical life of Jesus (cf. Rom. 1:3-4; II Cor. 5:16). The facts of Jesus' earthly life are presupposed, but not stated; Paul builds upon them, interprets or reinterprets them, but does not describe them. He presupposes that the story of Jesus is already familiar to his readers (as he does again in Gal. 3:1). The narratives of Jesus' life, teaching, ministry, death, and exaltation were undoubtedly a part both of the earliest Christian PREACHING (or kerygma) of the gospel, the new message of salvation, and also of the detailed teaching (didache; see CHURCH, LIFE AND ORGANIZATION OF) based upon the written OT as well as upon the church's oral tradition (cf. Luke 1:1-4). Hence the assumption that Paul's references to Jesus provide support for the "Christ myth" theory—popular ca. 1910, and occasionally revived—rests upon a strange and unrealistic view of Paul himself—i.e., his mind, his writings, and his public teaching. In particular, it rests upon a mistranslation of II Cor. 5:16: "From now on, . . . we regard no one from a human point of view; even though we once regarded Christ from a human point of view, we regard him thus no longer." This is no repudiation or minimizing of knowledge about the "earthly" Jesus, let alone an attempt to explain or qualify Paul's disregard for the facts of Jesus' life; instead, it shows Paul's insistence upon the supernatural, divine, and therefore absolute significance of Jesus' life, death, and resurrection (see vss. 17-19). Yet even this theological statement (like the one in Gal. 4:4) presupposes the historical facts which are at the basis of the discussion. So also do many other references in the Pauline letters. Occasionally, as in I Cor. 11:23-25 (the Last Supper); 15: 3-8 (the resurrection appearances), Paul cites specific events. At other times one must read between the lines for references to the life of Jesus, as in Rom. 15:8; I Cor. 13; Gal. 3:1; Phil. 2:5-11. It is inconceivable that these are references to some "mythical" or purely legendary or otherwise unhistorical figure.

A similar situation is reflected elsewhere in the NT, outside the gospels, as in Heb. 13:12 (Jesus was crucified outside Jerusalem); II Pet. 1:17-18 (the Transfiguration). The events are presupposed, are referred to as already familiar to the readers, and are either cited as evidence or given a further interpretation.

2. The gospels. A consideration of the earliest references to Jesus, found not only in the letters of Paul but also in other early Christian writings outside the gospels (e.g., the apostolic fathers and the apologists), will prepare the modern reader to approach the main sources—the four gospels. These also are "theological" writings, whose purpose is either to convince their contemporaries that Jesus is divine and so to win them for eternal life (John 20: 30-31), or to set forth a more satisfactory interpretation of the meaning of his life than the one proposed by Jewish or pagan opponents or by Docetic Gnostics (see GNOSTICISM). The inference is sometimes drawn that such theological or apologetic—not to say polemical—writings do not furnish adequate data for reconstructing the biography of Jesus or even for drawing a clear and consistent picture of his character, mission, and teaching. But it may be said in reply that it is precisely the variety found in the gospels and in their underlying traditions—a variety which survived and was really not greatly affected by the unifying theological interpretation—which provides us with the range and variety in testimony which are needful in interpreting the life of Jesus. But the gospels are not biographies of Jesus. Instead, they are the writing-down of the traditions of his earthly life, his teaching, death, and resurrection, as a part—the historical part—of the early Christian kerygma, the proclamation of the message of salvation in and through him, his work (in the past), and his coming PAROUSIA.

As a matter of fact, very few detailed biographies have come down to us from the ancient world: Cicero's (based on his letters), Alexander's (based on the memoirs of his generals), Caesar's (based on his "commentaries")—these are the chief examples. Such collections as Plutarch's Parallel Lives of Famous Greeks and Romans, or Suetonius' Lives of the Twelve Caesars, Eunapius' Lives of the Sophists, Diogenes Laertes' Lives of the Philosophers, are usually based on tradition, occasionally supplemented by documents. Tacitus' Life of Agricola, Josephus' Autobiography (= Antiq. XXI, in the second edition), are based on personal recollections. The oft-cited Life of Apollonius of Tyana by Philostratus (ca. A.D. 210) is not really a biography at all but a Tendenzschrift, possibly in imitation of the gospels, written "in praise of Apollonius" and for the purpose of supporting the revived pagan religion in the court of the Severi, especially at the request of the Empress Julia Domna. Xenophon's Memorabilia of Socrates was only an anecdotal memoir, designed to add further luster to the fame of this philosopher, who had left no writings to posterity. Hence it cannot be assumed that the church fell in with a custom already well established in providing itself with written records of the life of Jesus; instead, as the historians of ancient literature now recognize, the church created this type of literature to serve its own purposes. The material thus used was the oral tradition which had circulated in the church itself, from the beginning. The gospels were, therefore, not literary works, written for publication and wide dissemination in the Greek-speaking world of the first and second centuries, but represent the compilation and editing of the traditions as handed down within the church itself.

The reasons for writing were obvious: the age of the earlier "eyewitnesses and ministers of the word" (Luke 1:1-4) was drawing to a close; the stories from Jesus' life and his reported sayings, parables, controversies, and expositions of scripture—which the Christians used in their services of worship, as supplementing the readings from the OT—must be written down if they were to be preserved for continued use. The appeal to such Christian writings as were already in existence (e.g., Paul's letters) could conceivably—without the supplementing oral traditions of Jesus' life—be misinterpreted, e.g., in a Gnostic or other partisan direction; hence, for these and still other reasons, the necessity of writing down the tradition was strongly felt, and led to the composition of the four gospels—and of others—in the period following ca. A.D. 65. See bibliography.

a. The nature of the gospels. The nature of the gospels needs to be borne constantly in mind; for, although it is widely recognized that their purpose and character are "theological," the bearing of this upon their historical interpretation and use in writing the life of Jesus is often overlooked. As already in the pre-Pauline and Pauline tradition, the earthly life of Jesus is dominated by the figure of the risen and exalted Christ; it is the heavenly Lord, whose words and deeds during the period preceding his resurrection and exaltation are related here. The significance of "all that Jesus began to do and teach" (Acts 1:1) is found, not in the ongoing sequences of historical continuity, his personal influence, the growth of his fellowship, the results of his "founding" of a new religion—things a biography would record and emphasize—but in its relevance to the coming event of his resurrection, glorification, and final parousia. His life is interpreted as the climax of OT prophecy and preparation; his own words are given a deeper relevance to the future—i.e., the period in which the church was now living and witnessing to him; thus the whole tradition forms the main subject and substance of the early Christian propaganda, the GOSPEL or "good news" of salvation in and through the Lord Jesus Christ.

By the same process, words of early Christian prophets (as well as those of the OT) are occasionally added to the tradition, since they have been spoken "in his name," and are as authentic "words of the Lord" as were those of Jesus himself as he walked on earth (e.g., Rev. 1-3). The reconstruction of the life of Jesus and the recovery of his teaching in its earliest form—i.e., as delivered by Jesus himself—therefore involves a careful literary and historical examination of the gospels; for the original stratum of tradition must be distinguished from later levels, and then at the end it must be recognized that this earliest stratum is itself "theological"—i.e., interpreted or set forth in terms of a definite set of presuppositions regarding God's purposes and activities in this present age, preparatory to his fuller self-revelation in his acts in the age to come. There is no "bare" history, or "mere" or "pure" history; all history is interpreted history.

History has meaning, and so is remembered, only because it has been interpreted in one or another particular way. Nowhere is this principle more obvious than in the gospels.

The word "gospel" is from Old English godspel, "good spell"—i.e., "good news." (The association with God and substitution of "God" for "good" came later.) The English term thus meant, originally, what εὐαγγέλιον meant in NT Greek: the "good news" of salvation in the age to come. In this sense, the word was used chiefly by Paul (e.g., Gal. 1:6-9). The use of the term as referring to a book (i.e., the one containing this message of "good news") came only in the second century, as in Just. Apol. 1.66; Dial. 8.2; 11.3; 15.3; II Clem. 8.5; Ign. Phila. 8.2; Smyr. 7.2; Diognetus 11.6. Even so, the earliest usage still referred to the contents of the book—i.e., the subject of the fourfold gospel canon which was collected ca. A.D. 150. To this day, the titles of the books by the four evangelists are simply "[The Gospel] According to Matthew," "According to Mark," etc. The popular usage in the present day, "The Gospel of Matthew," "The Gospel of Mark," etc., with its question-begging assumption of authorship, was wholly unknown in the earliest period of the church history.

b. The Gospel of Mark. The earliest of the four was MARK, written probably late in the sixties, just before the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. It contained the gospel—i.e., the tradition of Jesus' life and teaching, forming part of the Christian kerygma—as it circulated in and was cherished by the Christian community in Rome, where recently both Peter and Paul had died as martyrs, along with many others; the story, without names, is told by Tacitus in his Annals XV.44, where the massacre of the Christians is attributed to the Emperor Nero. Whether or not the author or editor—i.e., compiler—of this gospel was the Mark referred to in Acts 12:25; 13:13; 15:37-40; or in I Pet. 5:13, is uncertain. Marcus was a very common Roman name, in the first and second centuries, but Papias of Hierapolis (ca. 130) evidently assumed that all the NT passages just cited refer to Mark the evangelist (see Euseb. Hist. III.39.15).

The traditions preserved in Mark are arranged in a clearly recognizable order, which some scholars even believe to have been that of the early Jewish Christian ecclesiastical or liturgical year, from the Christian observance of Rosh Hashanah to Passover (=Easter), with additional lections for Passover week (or Holy Week) relating the last days of Jesus in Jerusalem, his death and burial. (See bibliography.) The story begins with the prophetic ministry and message of John the Baptist, Jesus' baptism and temptation, and his own ministry in Galilee after John was imprisoned; this ministry falls into two main parts, in Galilee and in Jerusalem. Even within these two divisions there are various sequences and collections of material which must go back to the oral tradition as it first began to be gathered about various subjects and grouped accordingly, either orally or (here and there) in writing. Thus the ministry in Galilee (1:14–10:52) consists of two parts:

a) Jesus' work in the towns about the Sea of Galilee (1:14–5:43), includes the events of a day in Capernaum, told with vivid detail (1:16-38), a series of controversies with the scribes (2:1–3:6; 3:22-30), a group of parables (4:1-34), and a collection of great miracle stories (4:35–5:43). It is impossible to assume that these groups represent any but the most general chronological scheme—Papias said that Mark wrote "by no means in order"!—or that they give us more than sample incidents and teachings from Jesus' ministry in his homeland, Galilee.

b) Chs. 6–10 of Mark recount a series of more distant journeys—i.e., outside Galilee (e.g., to the N, where two more or less parallel accounts are given of what may have been the same journey, in 6:30–7:37; 8:1-26), three more controversies (7:1-23; 8:11-12; 10:1-12), and the great central section of Mark on the "way of the cross" (8:27–10:45), which is clearly addressed to a martyr church, and culminates in the sublime saying recorded in 10:45; it includes a whole sequence of "discipleship" sayings (8:34-38; 9:33-50; 10:13-31, 35-45).

By ch. 10, Jesus is already on his way to Jerusalem, where his ministry is to culminate in his death (foreseen in 8:31; 9:31; 10:32 ff). Here is included another series of controversies (11:27–12:34, supplemented by vss. 35-40), the great apocalyptic discourse in ch. 13 (with material from the so-called "Little Apocalypse" in vss. 6-8, 14-20, 24-27), for which obviously there was no other, certainly no more appropriate, place than right where it is, at the conclusion of the Jerusalem ministry, and just preceding the passion narrative.

The narrative in chs. 14–15 is probably Mark's revision of the older Roman form of the passion narrative, which was known to all the Christian churches (cf. Gal. 3:1), but which took somewhat different form as it was studied, revised, and amplified in various places—or by various evangelists. The general course of events is the same in all the gospels; but the details vary greatly, for all the gospels come from a period before rigid canonization and the stereotyping of form and content precluded any further elaboration or revision of the story. Mark's passion narrative probably reached its climax in the testimony of the Roman centurion (15:39), to which was appended, naturally, the account of Jesus' burial. Finally, the account of the finding of the empty tomb (16:1-8) is Mark's closest approximation to the story of the Resurrection, which he entirely presupposed (as did every early Christian), and undoubtedly accepted in the sense in which it had long before been recounted and interpreted by Paul (cf. I Cor. 15:3-8), though his story also clearly implies the physical reality of the event.

It is now thought that the "blocks" of material found in Mark represent old pre-Markan sources—i.e., collections of gospel tradition. In addition, there are traces of early "sequences," in which the material probably had already been arranged for didactic use (e.g., the "discourse" on the washing of hands—i.e., ceremonial cleansing—as contained in Mark 7, or the discipleship theme which lies just under the surface and juts out repeatedly in 8:27–10:45). There is little question that the arrangement of the tradition had begun before Mark wrote. There were "sources of sources," even before the earliest gospel was written.

The importance of Mark's arrangement of the traditional material cannot be exaggerated. In spite of the rearrangements, omissions, and additions made by Luke and Matthew (see SYNOPTIC PROBLEM), Mark's order continued to dominate the presentation of the life of Jesus. It has been argued that it tallies with the order found in the speeches of Peter in the first half of Acts, and therefore must reflect the original, authentic sequence of events. But the theory that the speeches in Acts are derived from early sources is very questionable; and, by hypothesis, Luke had followed Mark in preparing the gospel which bears his name, and naturally did the same in writing its sequel, the book of Acts. There is a strong probability that Mark follows a trustworthy general sequence: John the Baptist, Jesus in Galilee, more distant journeys, the journey to Judea, his visit to Jerusalem, arrest, trial, death, resurrection. But this is no guarantee of details, and the late-nineteenth-century "Markan hypothesis," which assumed that the primitive "Petrine" Gospel of Mark retained the authentic recollections of an eyewitness, in the exact order of events, is now generally abandoned. Papias says, among other things, that Mark was not himself an eyewitness (contrary to modern theories which identify him with the young man in the garden in Mark 14:51-52), and also that—as mentioned above—he did not write "in order" (τάξει)—i.e., in correct sequence (contrast Luke 1:3—καθεξῆς). It is obvious that Mark's order is chronological only in its widest, most general outline; it is, in fact, far more topical than chronological. Mark's purpose was not that of a historian or biographer, but of a compiler of traditions—the traditions of the Roman church, now threatened with persecution and perhaps suppression. He wrote to encourage this martyr church, his fellow Christians, to stand fast and remain loyal to Christ in spite of outrage, torture, even death. See MARK, GOSPEL OF.

c. Luke and Matthew. The order of the other gospels is in general that of Mark, but each has its own plan and purpose. Luke-Acts, of which the gospel formed Part I, is an apologetic writing, designed to show that Christianity was not a subversive movement, and that neither Jesus nor Paul, nor the other apostles, nor the rank and file of Christians from the beginning of the Christian movement, had ever threatened public law and order or encouraged revolution against Rome. In fact, the Christians were entitled to the same rights and privileges at law which were accorded the Jews—i.e., the right to be let alone, and to worship freely, in accord with their ancient ways, the God of their fathers; for Christianity itself was a "way" within Judaism, on a par with that of the Pharisees, with whom they shared several of their main beliefs. In the gospel, Luke revises Mark, omitting two long sections, and inserting material from the "Sayings Source" ("Q"), chiefly in his long central section (9:51–18:14), which expands the material associated with the journey to Jerusalem (Mark 10:1) into a series of didactic sayings, parables, and incidents. The device is purely literary: Jesus leaves Galilee a second time (13:33), and yet at the end of the section he is no nearer Jerusalem than when he began (cf. 18:31). The bearing of this phenomenon of Lukan order, like that of Mark, upon the writing of the life of Jesus, will be made clear in what follows. It is obvious that the order is not chronological. See LUKE, GOSPEL OF.

The order of Matthew is the result of combining a series of subject sequences, where five great sections of narrative, in which Mark is followed closely, are each followed by a discourse summing up Jesus' teaching on a related topic. These topics are: (a) discipleship (narrative, 3–4:22; discourse, 4:23–7:27); (b) apostleship (narrative, 7:28–9:34; discourse, 9:35–10:42); (c) the hidden revelation (narrative, 11–12; discourse, 13:1-52); (d) church administration (narrative, 13:53–17:27; discourse, ch. 18; (e) the Last Judgment (narrative, chs. 19–22; discourse—a double discourse, one public, the other private—chs. 23–25). To this very formal didactic arrangement of the life and teachings of Jesus has been prefaced the nativity narrative in chs. 1–2, and following it the passion narrative (26–27) and the resurrection narrative (28), in all of which Matthew sets forth entirely independent tradition, revising Mark's passion and resurrection narratives to insert this special tradition. Clearly Matthew's topical and didactic order does not supply us with a chronology of the life of Jesus.

The material common to Luke and Matthew, outside that which they derive from Mark, is thought to represent still another source, now usually designated as "Q" (=Quelle, German for "source"). This seems to have been (like Mark's sources) an orderly arrangement of the tradition, in this case the sayings of Jesus together with various cognate material, and can be reconstructed with fair certainty. It is impossible to say, however, whether it was in written or stereotyped oral form—in the ancient Orient this was a distinction without a difference, as the latter form was as fixed as the former. In addition to Mark and Q, it is now held by most scholars that Matthew had special material of his own (M) and that so also had Luke (L), each a fairly homogeneous body of tradition with a distinct and characteristic vocabulary and set of presuppositions, theological and other. See MATTHEW, GOSPEL OF.

d. John. The order of John is even more formal and didactic. After the great hymn about the Logos in 1:1-18, into which the author has inserted references to John the Baptist, and the account of John the Baptist, his message, and his disciples (1:19-51) —several of whom leave him to follow Jesus—the book is divided into two main parts: (a) the manifestation of the incarnate Logos on earth, in chs. 2–12, including the seven great "signs" or proofs of Jesus' divine nature and power (2:1-11; 4:46-54; 5:2-9; 6:1-14; 6:16-21; 9:1-7; 11:1-44—not one of these is an exorcism, like those in the Synoptics, as if the foul demons dared not enter the presence of the incarnate Son of God); and (b) the story of Jesus' return to the Father (13:1–20:31; ch. 21 is an appendix), including the deeply moving supper discourses (chs. 14; 15–16) and the sublime high-priestly prayer (ch. 17). Although it was once thought that John presupposed the other gospels, which he undertook to supplement, correct, or perhaps even supplant, it is now generally held that both his material and his point of view are unique and cannot be explained by correlation or comparison with the Synoptics. In John it is the cosmic Christ of the Christian faith and worship at the end of the first century—or even early in the second—who speaks to his disciples, to the later church, to the world, and to the assailants and antagonists of the church. The process of selection and reinterpretation which began even before the gospels were written, and which made the living, present Christ, the church's Lord, the real subject—not a mere figure from the past, the historical Jesus of Nazareth, who died under Pontius Pilate ca. A.D. 29 or 30—has now reached its culmination.

This cosmic Christ is the head of his church, the Savior of the world, the one by whom men are to live forever (ch. 6), the Judge of all mankind who nevertheless judges no man (8:15; 12:47), since men judge themselves by their response or reaction to him—this purely theological interpretation of the gospel tradition has all but eclipsed the historical; and yet there are surviving historical traits in John which supplement the Synoptic accounts at important points. The long-recognized contrast between John and the Synoptics is certainly obvious, but it may easily be exaggerated: the Synoptics are also "theological," though to a lesser degree; John is also historical—i.e., contains historical tradition—though to a lesser degree. But it is not John's purpose to write either history or biography, but to prove that Christ, the incarnate Logos, was truly human, and not a phantom, as the Docetic Gnostics held, a divine being who appeared in human form but was incapable of suffering or dying. Hence we cannot take John's outline for a chronological one. See JOHN, GOSPEL OF.

e. No "harmony" of the gospels. Modern gospel research has abandoned the hopeless attempt to weave together the four gospels into one consecutive narrative, or even to arrange a "harmony" of the four separate narratives. Their divergent purposes and arrangement make this impossible. Instead, what is known as FORM CRITICISM, or better, form history (Formgeschichte), has taught us to recognize that in its original "form" the gospel tradition existed in separate pericopes (or roughly "paragraphs"), each a unit complete in itself and each reflecting the whole of Jesus' thought, attitude, purpose, and career—as a dewdrop reflects the whole sky, including the heavenly bodies. No single pericope presupposes any other—except in the passion narrative, which was the earliest consecutive arrangement of separate pericopes into a historical narrative—and none requires any other for its explanation. The same is true of Jesus' sayings: each is an independent unit, a shimmering jewel, rounded and complete in itself. The discourses in the gospels have been composed by gathering together and arranging these sayings in more or less homogeneous groups, as in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5–7) or the earlier Q collection reflected in Luke 6:20-49, or the great discourses in John 14–16, where the structure is that of a catena (or "chain") of sayings on a common subject.

The marvelous fact is that, despite the divergent purposes of the evangelists, and the differing frames or classifications in which the sayings of Jesus have been collected—and probably were so collected before the evangelists wrote—the unique and distinctive character of Jesus stands out clearly and unmistakably, far more so than any other figure in the past whose life was recorded only in tradition (e.g., Moses or Pythagoras, Ezra, Hillel, or Akiba). The character and personality of Hippocrates cannot be recovered from the Hippocratic writings, or those of Homer, Herodotus, or Vergil from their so-called "lives." (The early lives of Francis of Assisi are different; they are Christian—i.e., post-Christian.) If we inquire what a community is likely to produce (by "projection" of the influence of its leader), an example may be found in the Hermetic writings, with their monotonous, uniform, impersonal didactic style and purely speculative or metaphysical type of spirituality. But the gospels have the freshness and vividness, as well as the variety, of all human life, and bear the stamp of their own self-evident authenticity. The later sayings—e.g., postresurrection or community sayings—reflect the mind and spirit of Christ and are as a rule entirely "in character." This is true even of many of the legendary accretions to the gospel story. A parallel may be seen in the discrepant lives of Alexander the Great, all the way from the legendary work of Pseudo-Callisthenes to the memoirs of his generals, reported by Arrian; the result is a composite, fairly homogeneous picture of their subject (see Arrian's Anabasis of Alexander).

f. Varieties in tradition. The gospel tradition embraces a variety of narrative forms: brief anecdotes from the life of Jesus, told in the simplest and most direct language (e.g., Mark 1:29-31); longer, more circumstantial, more elaborate narratives (e.g., Mark 6:30-44), especially the great miracle stories (e.g., Mark 5:1-20); purely legendary material (e.g., Mark 6:17-29); midrash, like the pious fiction of the rabbinical teachers or the medieval guides in the art of meditation who elaborated and impressed the teaching of a text by free use of the imagination (e.g., Matt. 2:1-12, 13-23; 27:3-10). It also includes a variety of didactic forms, some new, some old and familiar: the gnomic saying (e.g., Mark 4:9; 8:35; 9:40; 10:15; Luke 14:11); the prophetic utterance (Mark 1:15; 9:1); the scribal disputation or controversy (Mark 7:6-13; 12:35-37), usually concerned with the interpretation of scripture; the parable (Mark 4:3-8); the macarism or pronouncement of happiness: "Blessed are those who . . ." (e.g., Matt. 5:3-12; Luke 6:20-23; 10:23-24); worthy examples (Luke 10:29-37); the exposition of the OT, especially the Law (e.g., the series in Matt. 5:17-48); the commission of the disciples and predictions of their coming experiences (Matt. 9:35–11:1); apocalyptic forecasts (Matt. 23:37-39; Luke 19:39-44; 21:20-24); and the castigation of Jesus' enemies, chiefly the scribes and Pharisees (e.g., Matt. 23:1-36; Luke 16:14-15).

The narratives, like the sayings and parables, were originally distinct, and were not at first parts of a continuous account of the life or ministry of Jesus. In fact, the few links which we find are wholly editorial. In the gospels, as in all traditional literature, sections which are retrospective and designed to bind the narrative together into a continuous story are always editorial (cf. Mark 8:16-21; Luke 22:35-38; 24:6-11; John 12:37-43). So also are the passages which look forward (e.g., Mark 8:31; 9:31; 10:32-34; 9:12*b*; Luke 2:34-35; 4:13; 9:31; 13:32-33, 35; 19:43). It is Luke who had done most, among the evangelists, to link the story of Jesus into one consecutive narrative. And yet, even in Luke these are only initial attempts to weave together the gospel story as a whole and give it literary unity—i.e., that unity which we expect in a work of history or biography. (As stated above, the earliest narrative to take continuous form was the basic passion narrative underlying Mark 14–15.)

g. Different types of tradition. The preservation of these divergent types of tradition was due entirely to their use in the early church, especially in preaching, in teaching, and in worship. The "place in life" (Sitz im Leben) of the parables and the miracle stories was probably the instruction of converts and of the faithful; that of the controversies with the scribes and Pharisees was the still-continuing contest of the church with its opponents, and especially the disagreements in the interpretation of scripture—e.g., the demands of the law and also the messianic prophecies; that of the prophetic and apocalyptic material was the apocalyptic interests of the church, which rose to great heights in times of crisis (e.g., under Gaius [A.D. 40], again under Nero just before the fall of Jerusalem [A.D. 69-70], or under Domitian, when Revelation was written, or later under Hadrian, when the second Jewish war against Rome broke out [A.D. 132]).

In its original form the gospel tradition—certainly its oldest portions—circulated in Aramaic, the language of Palestine in the first century. But it was not long before this was translated into the ordinary, everyday (koine) Greek of the Greco-Roman world outside. In fact, the Greek translation of the oldest pericopes had continued in use for a long time before they were collected into the gospels or even into the gospel sources. Many of the earliest Christians were bilingual (e.g., at Antioch), and the process of translation was probably sporadic, individual, and a little at a time—like the later Old Latin translation of the gospels themselves in North Africa and elsewhere. Thus some of Jesus' sayings have been transmitted in two or more different forms (they may, indeed, have circulated in more than one form in Aramaic, before the process of translation began). But in almost every case the essential content is the same, though the language differs (cf. the Beatitudes in Matt. 5:3-12 and in Luke 6:20-23, and the Woes in Luke 6:24-26).

The sayings and parables of Jesus reflect a world of thought quite different from that of the Pauline letters, and bear no trace whatsoever of the philosophical examination or discussion of religious problems: Jesus is the prophet (Matt. 21:11; Luke 24:19), who spoke simply, with inspired directness, the message from God to his contemporaries. If a few sayings of a similar character have crept into the tradition, either from the parallel tradition of Jewish wisdom teaching or from the utterances of early Christian prophets, they also are found to be "in character" and belong by right of identical spiritual insight with those of Jesus. So are the sayings which Jesus may have quoted from the OT and other religious writings: he quoted them only because they were relevant, and expressed his own point of view and convictions. A similar problem was faced, in the ancient world, by all schools or religious groups whose teaching was traditional—i.e., oral rather than written. The Muslim rule is noteworthy (the early Muslim teachers faced a similar problem); the Prophet said: "If the tradition is worthy of me, it can be accepted." There is no other rule, in cases where doubtful sayings are to be considered—e.g., those with secondary textual support (such as Luke 9:55; 23:34); or the so-called AGRAPHA, or unwritten sayings (those found outside the gospels—e.g., Acts 20:35); or the oracular utterances of apocalyptists speaking in the name of the risen Lord (e.g., Rev. 22:16).

h. The question of authenticity. The source and authenticity and the later elaboration of sayings which have to do with Jesus' own destined place in the kingdom of God (e.g., Mark 14:62) or his coming death and resurrection (8:31) must be considered in connection with Jesus' own self-consciousness and sense of mission, so far as these are reflected in the gospels (see § E below). The early church had no questions on this point. God's will was clear from scripture, once the key had been provided by Jesus' actual career, death, and resurrection; and if the OT contained the secret "hidden for ages and generations but now made manifest to his saints," must it not have been clear to Jesus himself? This is the presupposition of such passages as the confession of Peter, especially in its Matthean form (16:17 ff), and the whole of Jesus' life and teaching as set forth in John. Since the gospels were not biographies, nor records of the gradual disclosure of Christian truth to the believing church, after the Resurrection, the whole content of this new faith had to be moved back into the earthly life of Jesus. What was for him only an apprehension, a presentiment, a growing awareness, became for the church a positive conviction, an openly avowed certainty. How else could it be? If Jesus truly was now the glorified Messiah, awaiting in heaven, at God's right hand, the swiftly approaching hour when he should return on the clouds to conduct the Last Judgment, then must he not have been already the Messiah while he walked on earth? And must he not have been fully aware of all that awaited him, at the end of his earthly life and also afterward? A Messiah who did not know himself to be the Messiah was preposterous! A Messiah who was to turn the ancient messianic category upside down, and who was to suffer and die before beginning his reign in glory, but who knew nothing about the divine plan which led to this totally new role and its sovereign strategy, was equally inconceivable! Hence the motive which led to the reinterpretation and reformulation of some of Jesus' sayings, in the interest of making clear his own awareness of the supreme role which he was to play in the purposes of God, was a perfectly natural, indeed an inevitable, one. See CHRIST.

The question to be investigated is the extent to which the church has reinterpreted or re-emphasized Jesus' words, making him responsible (as in John) for the proclamation, during his own lifetime, of his own character, nature, and destiny. We have already seen that the gospel tradition, like all historical tradition everywhere, is interpreted tradition; uninterpreted history is meaningless. Nevertheless, we cannot escape the duty of drawing a line, if possible, at the point where interpretation passes over into reinterpretation, and where later convictions are read into the simpler early sayings and narratives. It is the same problem with which we are faced in the study of all ancient history, in the OT, in classical literature, and even in modern history and contemporary reporting. There are no infallible records anywhere; in the nature of the case, there cannot be, for we ourselves are far from infallible in understanding the records before us, and so were those who first composed them, compiled them, and transmitted them to posterity. It is asking too much—in fact, it is asking the impossible—to demand a clear, plain statement of "just what happened," or of "just what was said," without innuendo, overtone, allusion, or implicit reference of any kind. Only angels, not men, could ever grasp and understand such a record. We have this treasure "in earthen vessels" (II Cor. 4:7) —i.e., conditioned by all the limitations of human language, human understanding, the meaning of words, and especially the limits set to the unveiling of one person's inner consciousness to another. There are many questions we would like to ask, which can never be answered (cf. Acts 1:6 ff). History, all history, is based on probabilities.

3. The non-Christian sources. The non-Christian sources are few and slight. Tacitus, writing ca. 110, described (Ann. XV.44) the horrible tortures meted out by Nero to the Christians in Rome. He ostensibly punished them as the incendiaries who had fired the city in July, 64. One term used of them was probably "Chrestians," due to a popular misunderstanding found elsewhere in ancient literature (e.g., Suetonius Life of Claudius 25.4; see also Tert. Apol. 3). Chrestus meant "kind," while christos (in Greek and Latin) meant "anointed," or "smeared," and had no meaning either as a title or as a proper name. Josephus (writing ca. 90) mentions (Antiq. XX.ix.1) the stoning of James, "the brother of Jesus, the so-called Christ." (The longer passage in XVIII.iii.3 is now recognized to be an interpolation, for it begins: "This man was the Messiah." If Josephus had written this sentence, he would have been a Christian!) The old Slavonic version of Josephus' War mentions Jesus in several places, and even describes his personal appearance; but the hand of the interpolator is clearly evident. In the Babylonian Talmud (Sanh. 43*a*) is a reference to "Jeshu ha-Notsri," who "did signs and wonders and led Israel astray," whom "they hanged on the eve of Passover." But this is at best only a vague and distorted echo of the gospels, and contains no independent historical information. Even more fruitless is the identification of Jesus with the "Teacher of Righteousness" referred to in the Dead Sea Scrolls. There is no evidence to support this hypothesis.

As for later Christian writings, there are scattered sayings attributed to Jesus, such as the so-called Sayings of Jesus found at OXYRHYNCHUS; but they are chiefly Gnostic compositions, and one or two of them are thoroughly pantheistic. The same is true of those found at Nag Hammadi in 1945. The data contained in the apocryphal gospels (dated after 150) are mainly unreliable; their only authentic traces are derived from the canonical gospels. This is especially noteworthy in the "Fragments of an Unknown Gospel," published in 1935. See APOCRYPHA, NT.

4. Is a life of Jesus possible? The question is often asked, whether it is possible, on the basis of the tradition contained in the gospels, to write a life of Jesus. The diversity—in fact, the total disagreement—of the lives of Jesus produced during the past two centuries does not encourage optimism. The chronology of Jesus' ministry has been variously estimated, all the way from a few months—a year or less—to four years, or seven, or even twelve. In some lives the forced inclusion of John, with its totally different point of view (instead of Mark's theory of the "messianic secret," shared more or less by Luke and Matthew, John represents Jesus as announcing his divine nature from the outset), and even the substitution of John's three Passovers for the one in Mark, completely distorted what remained of the Markan order. The differences in the interpretation of Jesus' teaching, all the way from a social-ethical system of morals to the pure otherworldliness of "thoroughgoing" eschatology or the ultratheological view which in effect forces Jesus' teaching into agreement with Paul's (especially in Rom. 7), have resulted in totally divergent reconstructions of Jesus' life and ministry. Above all, the question of the so-called "messianic consciousness" of Jesus—i.e., his own view of his vocation, mission, career, and quasi-divine nature, as prophet, Messiah, or Son of man—and the question of the sense in which he used the term "Son of man," either with the connotations of divine exaltation and power (as in Daniel and I Enoch) or with those of lowly humanness (as in Ezekiel)—this twofold question has divided scholars, especially since 1900, into two or more irreconcilable camps. The result has been an impasse for scholars, and despair for laymen. Many of the theories advanced in recent times have been ephemeral, and are now of interest only to students of the history of research, comparable to the contemporaneous and now antiquated theories in physics and biology. Unfortunately, some of them are revived from time to time by ingenious writers—this could not happen in the field of natural science.

Nevertheless, the progress of modern research in this area is undeniable. For one thing, it is now more clearly recognized than ever before that the student needs a fuller equipment of knowledge than has sometimes been the case, and cannot trust to his own private and personal impressions derived from the careful reading of the English Bible. He needs ancient languages, and also should be familiar with ancient literature and history, not only classical but also Semitic, for the gospels contain originally Semitic (i.e., Aramaic) traditions in Greek translation; he should also be familiar with ancient historiography, and realize that there are questions which it is useless to ask. (E.g., it is a real question whether or not the ancient world—except for two or three exceptional Greek and Latin historians—had any conception of history comparable to the modern conception. Certainly our modern types of history and biography did not exist in the ancient world.) He must also realize that the criteria of the validity or authenticity of tradition were not at all what we demand—for the simple reason that the purpose of tradition, especially of religious tradition, was something entirely different from the annalistic recording of past events or incidents, speeches or sayings. The fortuitous accretion of cognate traditions, such as the Cynic teaching found in Matthew (e.g., 6:34*b*) and the Didache, or the added apocalyptic material from the Little Apocalypse in Mark 13 (e.g., vss. 24-27), or the ascetic sayings (e.g., Matt. 19:10-12), must be recognized, but must not lead to skepticism regarding the basic traditions, which remain unaffected. The influence of the OT, which was positive and factual and not merely formal (see Matt. 27:6-10 or John 19:23-24), must also be recognized—also without detracting from the substantial veracity of the basic tradition.

Finally, the student must realize that the ancient world had no interest in what we call "personality," the unique combination of physical and mental, emotional and spiritual characteristics which distinguishes the individual from all other men, and rouses the reader's curiosity to find out, if possible, the "secret" of his growth and development—why, or how, he turned out to be the "person" he was. No trace of this interest is to be found in the Bible, or in other ancient Semitic literature, and almost none in classical literature, until a very late period. It is significant that neither the Greeks nor the Romans had a word for this concept of "personality." Thus it will have to be recognized that we shall probably never get back to a fully detailed, photographically authentic account of Jesus' life and character, and to tape-recorded accuracy in the reproduction of his sayings. But this, it must be borne in mind, is what we must expect in the biography of any figure in the ancient world; we have no right to demand more, for it could never have been provided, under the circumstances and conditions of the early church.

The situation is similar to that of the NT text: we cannot hope to recover the autographs, and the best that modern textual scholarship can possibly achieve is an approximation to the readings of the majority of the MSS which were in circulation during the second century. Yet we will not despair! The probability is that the text, for all the thousands of variations in MSS, patristic quotations, and ancient versions, is correct to within one or two per cent. And in the case of the gospels, and their interpretation, and the resulting life of Jesus, the probability is that modern historical research is approaching a reliable consensus. It is like the restoration of an old master—e.g., Rembrandt's "Christ in the Garden," which turned out, when later incrustations and additions had been removed, to be a very different scene, "The Changing of the Guard"—but now has all the freshness and power of the original masterpiece. As we work back through the gospels and their underlying sources to the still earlier and really basic traditions, we are confronted, as never before, by a consistent and homogeneous figure whose voice rings across the centuries and still penetrates our inmost hearts. And we hear this voice all the clearer for the removal of secondary and really obstructing sounds, whether they be the voices of devout and consecrated disciples proclaiming their Lord, or the echoes of later theological discussion and debate. We are not, in fact, in any worse straits than the church has been since the end of the first century. What we have, in the end, is the separate pericopes, just as they are still read, and for many centuries have been read, in the church's liturgy.

The late-nineteenth- and early-twentieth-century dream of recovering the biography of Jesus on the basis of the gospels viewed as the "earliest sources for the life of Jesus," or of reconstructing in detail the history of the apostolic age on the basis of its "historical records and documents," was too ambitious, too modern, and really impossible. It was a mistake to describe the gospels, or the rest of the NT, in such terms. One might as well describe the works of Plato as the "earliest documents for the life of Socrates"—Plato was simply not trying to write the life of his master, but to carry on, apply, and elaborate certain fundamental principles which were apparently implicit in the older man's unwritten teaching. What we have, in lieu of a life of Jesus, is the fourfold gospel in the NT, to be studied with patience, discrimination, and the courageous use of our critical faculties—never forgetting that criticism (κρίσις—i.e., "judgment") is a positive tool, enabling us to distinguish between arguments, to weigh evidence, and to decide which is the more probable view or reading. There is no short cut to the achievement of the modern dream of a "purely historical life of Jesus." We are still where the church has always been, confronted with the four gospels and with the rest of the NT, which we are bidden to "search and examine" and apply, first of all, in our own lives. The task is essentially religious, not secular.

For several centuries it was held that the OT (i.e., prophecy and typology) was an authentic "source" for the life of Jesus. With the prevailing view of the inspiration of scripture, this was natural and inevitable. For several centuries the interpretation of the gospels, and of the Bible generally, from the point of view of systematic or dogmatic theology was unquestioned (Is not all divine truth one?), with the result that the gospels were forced to yield data which could readily be fitted into whatever dogmatic system was held by the commentator or exegete. Only with the rise of the modern historical-critical view of the Bible has the procedure been reversed, and the data of the gospels established first, and without regard to the requirements or presuppositions of systematic theology. The result thus far has been the liberation of exegesis and literary-historical criticism from the shackles of dogmatic theology, though the process is not yet complete; and the consequences, for theology generally, have also been advantageous, for it has been compelled to find its data in the immediate deliverances of religious faith, in general religious experience, and to rest its foundations upon a purely spiritual, self-consistent, self-authenticating view of religion—as may be seen in such modern theological systems as those of Paul Tillich and William Temple.

B. BACKGROUND. 1. Jesus the Galilean. Jesus was a GALILEAN (Mark 1:9, 14; 6:6). This fact was of far-reaching significance for his whole career. For Galilee was the "Circle of the Gentiles," galil ha-goyim (Matt. 4:15; Isa. 9:1), either because it was surrounded by foreign nations or because (in later times) the Jews there were surrounded by foreigners. This region, lying between Samaria in central Palestine and the mountains of Lebanon on the N border, and between the Mediterranean Sea on the W and the Jordan on the E, was fertile and populous in the first century. But it had not always been Jewish territory. In the days of Jesus there were many non-Jews, especially Syrians, Phoenicians, Arameans, Greeks, and Romans, living here. Some of these were descended from the peoples who had settled in Palestine during the Exile—i.e., the century or more following 597 B.C.—or earlier still, after the destruction of Samaria, then capital of the Northern Kingdom, in 722 B.C. Many had, no doubt, crowded into the land during the terrible days of the Maccabean War, which began in 168 B.C., when the MACCABEES had evacuated the whole Jewish population to Judea for safety. Later (104 B.C.) these foreigners were forced to accept Judaism. But Jesus' ancestors were purely Jewish, and traced their descent from King David.

In the Ten Towns (or DECAPOLIS) lived descendants of Alexander's veterans and other Greeks, together with the veterans of later campaigns, such as those of Pompey. The outlook of a Jewish boy growing to manhood in this region, surrounded by Gentiles, and in contact with foreigners from all parts of the world, was necessarily different from that of a citizen of Jerusalem or of any town in Judea. Across the broad, fertile Plain of Esdraelon lying S of Nazareth came the ancient caravan road from Egypt; it had followed the coast to the range of Mount Carmel, then crossed over the pass at Megiddo. Moving on to the N and E, it went up and over and down the hills of E Galilee, rounded the Lake of Galilee at Capernaum, and moved on into the distant NE, toward Damascus, Palmyra, Babylon, India, China! How could a boy fail to be impressed with the vastness of the world, with the improbability of God's exclusive concern for one people only, when daily before his eyes came "many from east and west" (Matt. 8:11), Gentiles who might be seeking not only the riches of this world but also the kingdom of God! Off to the W, he could catch a view of the broad sea, with its dark ships and their white sails, as the traders of the Western world and the troops of the Romans followed their coastal routes from land to land. Moreover, Galilee was an agricultural region, with widely diversified occupations: its small hillside fields produced grain (chiefly barley); its lake abounded with fish; its orchards grew figs, olives, and apples, with melons and cucumbers on the ground between the trees; its vineyards produced the rich grapes and tart wine preferred by the peasantry. By ancient standards, especially in the East, Galilee was very prosperous, and the description of conditions drawn by modern Marxists is refuted by the researches of historians and archaeologists. On the other hand, Ernest Renan's description of the happy Galilean fishermen, singing as they drew in their full nets, is too romantic—fishermen rarely sing as they work, and there were cares and burdens enough for all in those days.

It is impossible even to approximate the figures for the population of first-century Galilee. One scholar estimates a total of 5,000,000 to 6,000,000 for all Syria in the first century; for Galilee, ca. A.D. 68, about 400,000; for Jerusalem 100,000; for the (western) Diaspora as a whole, about 6,000,000. For Palestine as a whole, a figure of 800,000 to 1,000,000 has been proposed. But these are only guesses, though based on considerations which are used elsewhere in estimating ancient populations. There is no use in comparing figures for the present day, as Palestine is in a process of transition, and no one can predict its eventual population when stabilization is finally achieved.

2. Economic and political conditions. The economic and political situation was serious. For a hundred years Palestine had been free, though the Maccabean War, which had lasted twenty-five years (168-143 B.C.), was won only by a heroic expenditure of life and treasure; then in 63 B.C. came Pompey the Great, invited to come down from Antioch and settle the quarrel over the right of succession between the last two Maccabean brothers, Hyrcanus and Aristobulus II. Following this act of armed intervention, the Romans never withdrew. Herod the Great (40-4 B.C.) was an "allied king" (rex socius) of the Romans; his sons were permitted to succeed him only by Roman consent: ARCHELAUS (4 B.C.–A.D. 6) as ethnarch of Judea and Samaria, with the promise of kingship if he did well (he did not, and was removed in 10 years, and Roman procurators were appointed instead); Antipas as tetrarch of Galilee and Peraea (4 B.C.–A.D. 39); Philip as tetrarch in NE Palestine (4 B.C.–A.D. 26; cf. Luke 3:1-2). But the government of the Herods (see HEROD) was only a stopgap. Roman policy was consistent and continuous: the whole exposed E frontier, from the Black Sea to the Red, required the establishment of a continuous line of defense, since there was no natural frontier of mountains, rivers, or lakes. Two armies of swift-riding Parthians had invaded Palestine in 40 B.C., sacked several towns, and murdered their inhabitants; this must be prevented. The rich caravans which moved northward toward the upper Euphrates must be protected—the Romans even tried, later on, to control that river (e.g., at Dura-Europos) and made a temporarily successful attempt to include Armenia in their E frontier; but this was later abandoned by Hadrian.

The meaning of all this for Palestine, including little Galilee, was obvious. Like Belgium, like Alsace, like Poland, like every buffer state in all history, the land of the Jews was forcibly annexed, overrun, conquered, and reconquered again and again. The dreams of the founders of the Second Commonwealth —complete isolation from the surrounding nations, with freedom to worship God in his designated way in his own land—was impossible of realization. The Maccabean War had been won not only by the heroism and sacrifices of the Maccabees, but in consequence of the declining strength of the Seleucid Empire, itself caught between the advancing power of Rome (especially after the Battle of Magnesia in 189 B.C.) and its crumbling E and S support, and enfeebled by internal strife and disloyalty, especially dynastic. The insurgents in Jesus' days, the Zealots (see ZEALOT), were also devoted to the ancient ideal of a priestly theocracy, free from all foreign control; their battle cry was: "No King but God," as Josephus repeatedly informs us. But they were destined to fail —the old Maccabean dream was impossible of realization; the new Roman Empire of the first century A.D. was a wholly different force in world affairs than the tottering Seleucid Empire had been in the later second century B.C. The only contribution of the nationalists was negative: unrest, violence, internal tension and disorder, ending finally in open revolt, the emergence of the "cutthroats" (sicarii), and the reign of terror that preceded the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70.

This political situation also affected the economic conditions of the time. On the whole, the East was better off than the West, in the first century. Asia Minor and Syria contained many thriving centers of industry; Egypt was still the more or less unexploited treasure house of the ancient world, where the accumulated wealth of the Pharaohs had been ably conserved and enhanced during three centuries by the Ptolemies, and where a docile peasantry worked hard and long to produce and increase the resources of their masters. Under Rome, Egypt was looted. In the West, especially in Italy, two centuries of warfare had all but exhausted the agricultural population, the mainstay of a settled and prosperous economy. Greece had been overrun, ravaged, sacked, and largely depopulated; even in Cicero's time its decline was evident to all observers. The seizure and conveyance of the treasures of Greek art to Rome and the neighboring Italian villas; the influx into Italy of tens of thousands of slaves; their harsh and inhuman treatment by their masters, the nouveaux riches of the new empire—all these factors were to affect the early church in its westward advance. But in the East, conditions were still more or less patriarchal, and far less disturbed, except in Palestine. In Palestine the intransigent refusal of the Jews to accommodate themselves to the "wicked kingdom" (Rome), to accept the principle of taxation by a foreign power and occupation by a foreign army, even a token force, made it impossible for Palestine to share in the rising prosperity of the first and early second centuries. Added to this factor was the steady influx of Jews from abroad, who came here in order to pass their remaining years in the sacred land, and as near as possible to the sacred city on Mount Zion—a factor which complicated the already difficult problem of the food supply, in a country whose productivity was already in decline. (The ancient forests were gone, and the land was already becoming arid, as it has remained for centuries under Arab, Frank, and Turkish rule.)

Finally, the Roman tribute, designed to meet the costs of occupation and defense, was imposed without regard to the sacred taxes, tithes, and other offerings which were set up as the only system of taxation—i.e., that of the priestly theocracy envisaged in the Pentateuch (see TAXES). It has been estimated that the total taxation, Roman and priestly, amounted to about 35-40 per cent of the total income of the nation. For an ancient people living under patriarchal conditions, with almost no margin between production and consumption, and threatened with famine every few years (twice in Herod's reign), this was an impossible economic burden, with no conceivable solution such as improved agriculture, industrial development, manufacture, or increased commerce. The combination of political friction and oppression (as it was viewed by most Jews) with a hopeless economic situation formed the background not only of the political history of Palestine in the first century, but also of the life and ministry of John the Baptist and of Jesus and the early Christian apostles.

3. The revival of messianism. For one thing, the rise and nationwide spread, not only of a revived and fanatically jingoist messianism, but also of a more esoteric apocalyptic eschatology, were both conditioned by this unhappy situation. If Jesus and John both firmly rejected the resort to violence, each in his own way, it was their answer to a widespread appeal which was steadily winning the masses and leading on to the catastrophe of the late sixties, the meaningless and futile tragedy of the war with Rome. But there were other leaders who did not hesitate to approve the movement and to make the most of it for personal ends; the years from the death of Herod to the outbreak of the war with Rome were filled with movements headed by fanatical adventurers, false prophets, even false messiahs whose deluded followers were led out to perish in the wilderness or to be cut down by the Roman cavalry (see Mark 13:5-6; Acts 5:36-37). If, here and there, scattered groups gathered to pray for the "redemption" of Israel (Luke 2:25; 24:21), it was because things had gone so far that no solution could be thought of short of direct divine intervention. If pious PHARISEES redoubled their vigils and prayers (Luke 18:12), and their scrupulous observance of all the detailed minutiae of the scribal interpretation of the law, it was in view of the growing crisis. Only the complacent "quisling" SADDUCEES washed their hands of the whole movement (John 11:48 ff), preferring to make the most of both worlds—their priestly patrimonies in the country and the omnipotent world power represented by their Roman friends and associates.

Off in the wilderness N of the Dead Sea, the ESSENES observed their special rites, chiefly baptismal, and studied their esoteric books. What Josephus tells us of them, and what Philo says about the Therapeutae in Egypt, is now elucidated in some measure by the DEAD SEA SCROLLS, though our information is still mainly derived from Josephus. But the Essenes also, like the apocalyptists, like many of the Pharisees, and like many of the early Christians, were pietists, quietists—i.e., escapists. The theory that the Essenes, or the Qumran community whose library contained the Dead Sea Scrolls, influenced John, or Jesus, or the early Christians, or the NT, is not convincing. Repeatedly, during the past decades, various scholars have tried to show that Jesus was an Essene, but the view is no more probable now than when it was first advanced. The "contacts" between the Dead Sea Scrolls and the Gospel of John, e.g., are not nearly so striking as those between the Gospel of John and other ancient writings, Greek, Hellenistic, or rabbinic. Hellenistic Judaism included a far greater variety of religious thought and speculation than is realized by those who have not studied its literature.

C. JESUS' BIRTH. 1. The two infancy narratives. It is now widely recognized that the accounts of Jesus' birth in Matt. 1–2; Luke 1–2 were entirely independent in origin, and represent two different attempts by the later Synoptists to provide the account of Jesus' life with a proper beginning. The two genealogies (see GENEALOGY) well illustrate this independence; the view that one is the genealogy of Joseph, the other of Mary, is a perversion of the plain meaning of holy scripture. Matthew (1:1-17) traces Jesus' descent through the royal line from King David, and, earlier still, from Abraham—Jesus was a true Jew. Much of the material is taken directly from the OT (Ruth 4:18-22; I Chr. 2:1-15; 3:10-19). The list ends with: "Joseph the husband of Mary, of whom Jesus was born, who is called Christ," though some MSS, notably the Sinaitic Syr., read: "Joseph, to whom was betrothed the virgin Mary, was the father of Jesus who is called Christ." This latter is an impossible reading, in view of what follows in vss. 18-25, but may (as many now hold) contain the original conclusion of the genealogy: "Joseph was the father of Jesus who is called Christ"—the only possible conclusion, if the genealogy was to have any meaning. (Some take it to mean legal father, but this is an evasive and artificial explanation.) Luke's genealogy (3:23-38) reverses the order, and traces Jesus' ancestry, as the son ("as was supposed") of Joseph, through another line back to King David and Abraham (also using the material from I Chronicles and Ruth), but continuing back to "Adam, the son of God," as if descent from Abraham were not so important as from Adam, and the universal human nature which this involved. (So the rabbis often interpreted the descent of all mankind from Adam.)

2. Luke's narrative. The story of the annunciation, birth, and childhood of both Jesus and John, as told in Luke 1–2, is a weaving together of two infancy narratives, whose component parts can still be distinguished; and within the story of Jesus' birth and infancy, three strands are clearly marked: the story of the divine announcement (1:26-38); the birth of Jesus and the divine proclamation to the shepherds (2:1-20); the visit to the temple and the revelation to Simeon (2:21-40). The story of the visit to Elizabeth (1:39-56) is designed to tie together the two strands (the Johannine and the Nazarene), and may originally, as certain MS readings in vs. 46 suggest (by attributing the Magnificat to Elizabeth), have been Johannine material. The finished story is often described as the Lukan "idyll," and recalls the OT story of the birth and infancy of Samuel, which it frequently echoes (I Sam. 1–3). It is partly traditional, no doubt, but the telling is the work of an extraordinary literary artist. In it Luke has re-created (imaginatively) the long-vanished figures of the family of Jesus and of John, the atmosphere of simple but noble Jewish piety which dominated Jesus' home in Nazareth and influenced his whole development. The deep religious feeling which still throbs in the Lukan canticles (1:14-17, 32-33, 35, 46-55, 68-79; 2:14, 29-32, 34-35), the glowing hope of the coming national liberation and the restoration of the ancient Davidic kingdom, the profound motives of humility and loyalty and obedience to the divine will—all this is indispensable for understanding Jesus, his life and times, his teaching, and his personal character. The language and the thought are alike derived from the OT, especially the Psalms and the Prophets, and are continuous therewith (like the Psalms of Solomon, written ca. 50 B.C.). If Jesus' boyhood home had an influence upon the shaping of his mind, as it must have had; if the religious character and devotion of his parents had any influence upon him; if the atmosphere which surrounded his childhood conditioned in any way his later development (and how else could he have grown, if the Incarnation was real?), then we must suppose that the picture Luke draws in his first two chapters is true and realistic. In other words, the early surroundings of the One whom God "chose" and "sent" to his people and to all mankind must have been those of this humble, beautiful, consecrated Jewish home.

The central story in Luke's infancy narrative is the annunciation to Mary, the betrothed of Joseph, that she is to bear a son who > will be great, and will be called the Son of the Most High; > and the Lord God will give to him the throne of his father David, > and he will reign over the house of Jacob for ever;

> and of his kingdom there will be no end (1:31-33).

This prophecy is, of course, in the language of the ancient hope of the Messiah, the glorious supernatural king who was to sit on David's throne, free the nation, and establish a purely religious and absolutely just theocratic utopia which would endure forever (see Ps. 72, for an OT example). The fact that Jesus never mounted an earthly throne, or desired to do so, only increases our debt to Luke for preserving this ancient conception and emphasis, deeply embedded in the old Palestinian tradition.

3. Matthew's narrative. By contrast, the story in Matthew (1–2) is far less inspiring; it resembles the fanciful but pedantic tales in the later Jewish midrash, which as a rule started with a text, or texts, and then "re-created the scene" by a free flight of fancy, often fabricating historical events to meet the needs of the exegete or preacher—much as modern writers often do in producing "religious" novels of the life of Moses, the Maccabees, or Christ. E.g., the verse in Isa. 7:14 which reads in the LXX (it is not the reading of the original Hebrew—i.e., of the canonical text of the Bible): "Behold, a [or the] virgin shall conceive and bear a son" (Matt. 1:23), is now interpreted as a prediction of Jesus' birth, although no suggestion of the idea (the Virgin Birth) is found anywhere else in the NT. (The phrase in Luke 1:34: "Since I know not a man," and the one in Luke 3:23: "as was supposed," are often viewed either as editorial additions or as later glosses added to the text of Luke under the influence of Matt. 1:18-25.) From an ancient Jewish point of view (see, e.g., Philo's accounts of the births of the patriarchs), a virginal conception would add nothing to the assurance of Jesus' future greatness; the idea is purely Hellenistic. Moreover, the question in Luke 1:34: "How shall this be?" (the RSV "How can this be?" is not supported by the Greek) refers not to the birth of a son, for Mary is about to be married, but to the glorious destiny of her son, described in vss. 32-33; and the angel's reply (in vs. 35), explaining how it is to be—through the "overshadowing" of the "Holy Spirit"—explains Jesus' character and destiny (as "holy," and "the Son of God"), not his birth. The question is a leading one—its sole purpose is to introduce the answer which follows. Luke has several of these "leading questions"—they are characteristic of his style (see 12:41; 13:23; Acts 1:6). Later Christian doctrine laid great emphasis upon the VIRGIN BIRTH; but for the gospels, and the NT writings generally, and their writers, it had little significance, and was probably unknown. (Even in the earliest form of the Apostles' Creed, in the second century, the emphasis is on "born," not on "virgin"—one purpose of the Creed was to rule out Docetic Gnosticism, with its phantom deity.) If, as moderns, we try to picture the scene, the old Italian painters Leonardo da Vinci and Antonello da Messina will help us: Mary is kneeling in prayer and meditation, with the Bible open before her, when the angel appears and addresses her. One wonders what passage she could have been reading. There is only one answer: the great messianic prediction in the book of the prophet Isaiah.

The concluding sections of Luke's infancy narrative (2:21-52) likewise stress the deep piety of Jesus' family, and his own response. They also suggest that the glorious future anticipated in the OT, and summarized in the angel's words to Mary, may not be readily or easily fulfilled (vss. 34-35), and that Jesus himself had to rise above family loyalty in his life of utter obedience to God (vs. 49)—the very demand he was later to make of his disciples (Luke 14:26). At the same time the universal extension of his gospel is foretold both by the angels (vs. 14), in language which must have reminded Theophilus of the imperial inscriptions in honor of Augustus, and by Simeon (vss. 29-32) in language which echoes the OT (cf. Isa. 42:6; 46:13; 49:6).

D. JOHN THE BAPTIZER. 1. His call to repentance. The earliest form of "gospel," still preserved in Mark and John and also reflected in Acts 10:36 ff, begins, not with the birth of Jesus, but with the coming of JOHN THE BAPTIST. The conclusion of John's work marked the "beginning of the gospel" (Mark 1:1, 14-15; Luke 16:16; Acts 1:22; 10:37; 13:25). Although there is some evidence of later rivalry between the followers of Jesus and those of John (e.g., Mark 2:18; Luke 5:33; 11:1; John 1:6-51; 3:22-30; 10:41; Acts 18:24–19:7), the view which eventually prevailed is that John was the "forerunner" or herald, whose chief function was to announce the coming of the Messiah (=Jesus) and to prepare the way for him by calling the nation to repentance (Mark 1:2-8; 9:11-13). For this reason Luke gives the multiple dating in 3:1-3. It is his only way of dating the beginning of Jesus' ministry, which he assumed, apparently, was a year in length (at least so Irenaeus interpreted Luke 4:19). The year referred to must have been A.D. 27 or 28 for the beginning of John's ministry, with the presumption that Jesus' ministry began in 28 or 29. At least this is as close an approximation as can be made; and for ancient chronology of either private or popular events, not public or official, this is very close. See CHRONOLOGY OF THE NT.

John's message was a call to repentance in preparation for the coming Judgment. Not only his garb but also his manner and his message suggested Elijah the Tishbite (Matt. 11:14; Luke 1:15-17; contrast John 1:21), who was expected to return at the end of the age (Mark 9:11 ff; Mal. 4:5-6). In fact, John took up where Malachi left off, and renewed the ancient prophet's denunciation of sin and wickedness, including the sin of adultery and the cruel "putting away" (divorce) of wives (Mal. 3:5; 2:13-16). John denounced Herod Antipas for his highhanded taking of his brother Philip's wife (Mark 6:17-18), which also involved (according to Josephus) the disgrace and abandonment of his first wife, a Nabatean princess, the daughter of King Aretas. Josephus says that Antipas put John in prison out of fear of his growing popularity, lest he should start an insurrection. The two explanations, by Mark and Josephus, are not incompatible; both stories are traditional.

By "repentance" John meant the biblical teshubah, "turning about"—i.e., the actual abandonment of sin, facing away from it, and "turning" to the Lord; and the seal of this thorough repentance was baptism, which was a self-administered rite of cleansing. It was like the baptism of proselytes, for whom it meant the washing away of all defilements contracted through contact with idolatry; in this case, the extraordinary feature was that it was required of born Jews. It was to be followed by the practice of a new and better righteousness, in obedience to the will of God (Luke 3:7-14). The literary analysis of Mark 1:8 and parallels suggests that the original form of John's saying (in Q) read: "I baptize you with water; he [the Coming Judge—i.e., either God himself or the Messenger of the Covenant] will baptize you with fire." Mark revised this to fit the current Christian situation, and read: "I have baptized you with water; but he will baptize you with the Holy Spirit." In editing Mark, Luke and Matthew conflated the two versions and read: "with the Holy Spirit and with fire," and then continued with the rest of the saying, which Mark had omitted: "His winnowing fork is in his hand. . . . The chaff he will burn with unquenchable fire." It has been thought that the Baptist here referred to the universal conflagration at the end of the age, an expectation found in Persian religious thought and also in Stoic teaching; but the reference to Malachi seems more probable (Mal. 3:2-3; 4:1-3), as more fully in harmony with Jewish eschatological expectations.

2. Relations between John and Jesus. The character of John is in sharp contrast with that of Jesus, throughout the gospel narratives which bring them together. John was an ascetic who renounced the world and its good things, lived in the desert, and preached a stern message of repentance based on the threat of judgment to come. Jesus, on the other hand, was the prophet of the kingdom of God, who was himself able to communicate to others, in word and deed, the mighty powers of the coming kingdom. This marked contrast between Jesus and John makes improbable the modern theory (based on John 1) that the two were closely associated for a time, but finally disagreed and separated, each going his own independent way as prophet and teacher. See also § E2 below.

3. Jesus' baptism and temptation. The specific point at which John's office as herald and forerunner was connected with Jesus' mission was the baptism of Jesus at the direction of John (Mark 1:9-11 and parallels; only Matthew [3:14-15] reflects the later difficulty of representing the sinless Jesus as accepting John's baptism, and he solves it by making Jesus the example of perfect obedience). At this moment, according to the Synoptics, Jesus becomes aware of his life's mission: the heavens open, the Holy Spirit descends upon him, and the voice of God declares: "Thou art my beloved Son; with thee I am well pleased." (The words "well pleased" mean that he is the one whom God has specially chosen for some divine mission.) The "Western" (see TEXT, NT) reading in Luke 3:22: "Today I have begotten thee" (cf. Ps. 2:7), is improbable after Luke's infancy narrative. It was this endowment with the Spirit which not only, according to Luke, led Jesus into the wilderness (4:1-2), where he was put to the test by Satan, but also equipped him for his public ministry in Galilee (4:14-15, 18; 5:17).

The story of the Temptation, briefly recounted by Mark (1:12-13) and more fully by Matthew (4:1-11) and Luke (4:1-13), is best understood as an account of the ordeal of the Messiah, in which he was put to the test in ways comparable to those of the people of Israel in the wilderness after the Exodus. The solution of the problem in each trial is a verse from the story of the Exodus (Deut. 8:3*b*; 6:16, 13). The fuller version, in Matthew and Luke, is probably from Q; Mark's is only a brief reference. In form, it is perhaps a meditation on the Deuteronomic story of the nation —somewhat as Luke's central section (9:51-18:14) clearly parallels Deuteronomy in many places—rather than an autobiographical narrative from Jesus' own lips. Once more it is clear that the sources of the gospels included the OT, which was viewed as of equal authenticity and authority for the life of Jesus with the church's own traditions.

Crossing this motif of the ordeal is another: the devil's attempt to ascertain Jesus' true nature, whether he is really the "Son of God" or not. This feature anticipates the later attempt of the demoniacs (or, in the ancient view, of the demons) in the gospel story, where they concluded that he was the Messiah and Son of God (Mark 1:34; Luke 4:34, 41). Jesus' victory over the tempter was decisive, but not permanent: the devil departed "until an opportune time," according to Luke (4:13), which probably meant until the Passion (22:46, 53*b*). The temptation narrative gives us an insight into a widespread early Christian view of Jesus, his nature, mission, and achievement, according to which his whole career was one of conflict with the powers of darkness, and reached its climax at the Cross, where defeat was turned into victory through the Resurrection. The view is also reflected in Paul (cf. Col. 2:15) and in Origen and other, later Christian writers, for whom Jesus' conflict with the powers of evil, ending in his victory over sin, Satan, and death, is the key to his whole career—and to the theology of the Incarnation and the Atonement. See also § F4 below.

E. JESUS' MISSION AND MESSAGE. 1. The beginning of the mission. Although the Gospel of John represents Jesus as a member of the Baptist's entourage, possibly even a follower and associate (as some scholars hold) who took away—with the prophet's full consent—some of John's own disciples when he returned to Galilee, the earlier gospels state only that Jesus' public ministry began after John had been imprisoned by Herod Antipas (Matt. 4:12; Mark 1:14; Luke 3:19-20; 4:14). His mission was primarily that of a prophet (Mark 1:15), teacher (Luke 4:15), and healer (Luke 4:40; 13:32) or exorcist (Luke 4:41; 6:17-19); his message was the announcement of the impending arrival of the reign (or kingdom) of God (Luke 4:43), and the requirements which were to be met before admission into this kingdom (Luke 6:20-23).

2. Jesus the prophet. Although the apparel and food of John the Baptist are described in the gospels (Mark 1:6), nothing is said of Jesus' personal appearance or habits—for the reason that there was nothing unusual about them (Matt. 11:18-19). The earliest representations of him in Christian art are only types, like the stern, majestic, sublime face that looks down from the ceiling of the sanctuary in Byzantine churches of the East, and in the West from Cefalù and Monreale to Ravenna and Aquileia; or, in modern art, like the well-known head of Christ by Heinrich Hofmann. His intrepid courage is clear from every page of the gospels (e.g., Luke 4:28-30; 13:31-33); at the same time his gentleness is evident from the attraction which he had for children (Mark 10:13-16)—something unusual in an ancient religious teacher, Jewish or other.

The popular estimate of him as a prophet is reflected in Luke 7:39, where Simon the Pharisee questions it. His own words presuppose it, more than once (e.g., Luke 4:24; 13:33). So does the beginning of the gospel story: Jesus is endowed with the Holy Spirit for the mission he is to carry out (Luke 3:22; 4:17-21). If this involved messiahship as well, that was an additional office. The gift of the Spirit constituted men prophets (I Sam. 10:10; Isa. 61:1-4; Mic. 3:8; Luke 1:15, 67; 4:18-19; I Pet. 1:10); it did not constitute them messiahs. Yet if John the Baptist was "more than a prophet" (Matt. 11:9), Jesus himself was undoubtedly also more (cf. Matt. 12:6). The discussion in John 7:40-42 over the prophet also implies that Jesus was popularly known as a prophet: "the prophet from Galilee." It was also the view reflected at the end of the gospel (Matt. 21:11; Luke 24:19) and in the early Palestinian church (Acts 2:22); though it was this prophet who became, by his resurrection, "both Lord and Christ" (Acts 2:36). This was the attitude of the "common people," the "great throng" who heard him gladly (Mark 12:37*b*) and hung on his words, not only in Galilee but also in Judea and Jerusalem—in fact, wherever he went; for the gospels make it clear that even when he withdrew into the wilderness (i.e., the uninhabited, open country), the crowds followed him, and whenever he arrived in a village, the people immediately gathered about him. As he spoke as an inspired prophet, his words were infallible (Mark 13:31) and must be accepted and obeyed. The ancient conception of prophet was as far from that of "lowly humanness" as it was from that of the religious or theological expert: in a monotheistic religion like Judaism, or as later in Islam, but also in the polytheistic religions of antiquity, a prophet was the direct mouthpiece of God. It was the highest possible conception, next to deity itself—which, in the Semitic religions, was impossible, since they ruled out all concepts of Incarnation.

Since John the Baptist was thought of as a prophet (Mark 11:32; this was also Jesus' view of him—Matt. 11:9-11; Mark 9:13), the question at once arose as to the relationship between the two. Not only Herod Antipas (Mark 6:14-16) but also the people (Mark 8:28) assumed that Jesus was John risen from the dead—these passages obviously belong later than Herod's murder of John. This was one view. Another, also reflected by Jesus himself, made John the expected Elias redivivus (Mal. 4:5; Mark 9:12-13; contrast John 1:21), so that Jesus and John could scarcely be identified. (The order of verses in Mark 9:9-13 is probably to be altered to agree with that in Matt. 17:9-13.) Their authority, as Jesus implied, was identical—from "heaven" (i.e., from God; Mark 11:27-33); both were inspired prophets, and both were rejected (Matt. 21:28-32). Yet John's preaching did not go beyond the coming Judgment (Luke 16:16), and never embraced the kingdom, which was Jesus' main subject of discourse. Not only in character, appearance, and message were they different, but also, and especially, in their mission. John was the forerunner, Jesus the fulfiller; this was the simple, pristine theology of the Palestinian church reflected in our earliest gospel sources.

3. The message of the kingdom of God. Jesus' conception of the KINGDOM OF GOD is not set forth systematically or dogmatically anywhere in the gospels. Instead, as elsewhere in the NT, it is assumed that the reader will understand what is meant. But the very terms used imply that it is eschatological: the reign of God is "at hand" (i.e., it has already drawn near (ἤγγικεν [Mark 1:15]; the verb ἐγγίζω is one of the new verbs [Aristotle and later; LXX] formed from an adverb—here ἐγγύς, which means "close by"; cf. Syriac Apocalypse of Baruch 85), and is still on its way; it "has come upon" (Luke 11:20) Jesus' contemporaries, though its full and final realization is still in the future (Luke 19:11); the time for its coming has been "fulfilled"—i.e., completed (Mark 1:15; for the term see Acts 2:1), and there will be no further delay; men must therefore repent, believe the good news, and prepare for the kingdom's arrival. What has become of John's prediction of the coming Judgment is not clear; apparently Jesus takes it for granted (cf. Luke 11:29-32, 50-51; 12:35–13:9; 13:25-30), though it is variously interpreted in the gospels; Luke seems to identify it with the fall of Jerusalem (13:34-35; 21:20-24); at least the fall of Jerusalem is a part of the drama of the final Judgment. The kingdom is to be the outward and visible manifestation of God's rule over the universe.

a. The meaning of "kingdom of God." Such a statement as that in Luke 17:21: "The kingdom of God is in the midst of you," is not to be taken otherwise.

Although frequently cited as an example of Jesus' "mysticism" or "inwardness," this interpretation rests chiefly upon the old translation, "within you," understood in the unfortunate modern sense of "you" as singular; the "you" (ὑμῶν) is plural (Jesus is addressing the Pharisees—vs. 20), and the contrast is not between an inward realization and an outward manifestation of the kingdom, but between a present realization (or perhaps a sudden coming) and a series of observable external "signs," events which could be taken as evidence of its gradual approach and would thus permit one to calculate the time which remained before its arrival—the favorite occupation of apocalyptists in all ages. The "signs" are already present in the "signs of the times"; and chiefly, it is Jesus himself, his teaching, his disciples, his followers, and the "mighty works" which God is doing through him (Luke 11:20, 29). Therefore the kingdom of God is already present, "in your midst," and there is no need to look for "signs and portents" in the skies or elsewhere in the natural order (cf. Mark 13:4). The theory that the kingdom of God is an inner state of mind, or of personal salvation, runs counter to the context of this verse, and also to the whole NT presentation of the idea.

It is strange, in view of the fact that Jesus clearly takes for granted his hearers' understanding of the term, that the phrase "kingdom of God" is not found in the OT or in later Jewish literature prior to or contemporary with Jesus' generation. Such expressions as "his [God's] kingdom," or "the kingdom of the Most High" are found in the OT (see Pss. 29:10; 47:7; 139:9; 145:11-13; Dan. 2:44; 4:3; Zech. 14:9); but here the meaning is God's universal sovereignty over nature and history. It is not something that "comes" only at the end of the age. It is eternal, and existed before the Creation; and yet it must "come" here in this world where human and demonic sin has led to a revolt against the divine rule. Even the apocalyptic literature makes no use of the term. And yet Jesus assumes that his ordinary hearers among the Galilean 'AM HA'AREZ will understand it! The most probable explanation seems to be that the term was not really a theological one at all, but popular, and was perhaps taken over from the Zealots, who "rejected the kingly and all other forms of government" (i.e., Greek or democratic; or Roman—i.e., senatorial or imperial—together with the procurators, and also the local Idumean dynasty of the Herods as allies of Rome), and insisted upon the sole sovereignty of God, who had chosen Israel for his own people. The great slogan of the Zealots, "No king but God," had been perverted and degraded by these fanatical freebooters, revolutionists, and murderers masking as religious and political liberators. But the term was perfectly appropriate on the lips of one whose purpose was entirely religious, and who looked forward to the establishment of God's reign, not by the violence of the sword (Matt. 26:52*b*) nor by the gathering of an army (John 6:15), but by the act of God himself, when he should "take his great power and reign" (cf. Rev. 11:17). The Zealot principle, and all other activistic principles, had been rejected by Jesus from the outset, according to the clear implications of the temptation narrative. His mission was to wait, prepare, convert; to heal the sick, exorcise demons, convert the sinful, and thus gather a consecrated people who would make ready for the full and final coming of God's reign. The "revolution" which would bring in the reign of God was entirely in God's hands.

b. The teaching of the parables. Many of Jesus' parables (see PARABLE) deal with the coming of the kingdom, though the precise meaning is not conveyed by such language as "the kingdom of God is like . . ." (e.g., Mark 4:26, 30-31; Luke 13:18, 20). A similar formula was used by the Jewish rabbis, and by the ancient wisdom teachers: "To what is the thing like, and with what shall we compare it?" I.e., the point of comparison with the kingdom of God is indicated in only a general way—the subject is the kingdom of God—and its precise teaching must be sought for by the hearer. Other parables (e.g., Luke 18:1-8, 9-14) have no such introduction, and some are not comparisons at all, but illustrative examples (e.g., Luke 14:7-32; 16:1-9, 19-31). The theory in Mark 4:11-12, that the parables were meant to conceal Jesus' teaching rather than to make it clear, is peculiar to Mark and Luke; Matt. 13:13 changes Mark's ἵνα to ὅτι, "because," and thus avoids the paradox; John has no parables, only allegories. Mark's theory, which is consonant with his theory of the "messianic secret" (i.e., Jesus' secret messiahship), may have seemed probable in a milieu of esoteric religious teachings—i.e., Rome in the sixties—but was surely out of place in Galilee in the twenties, especially in the circle of Jesus and his simple followers; and it is contradicted by the tradition contained later on in the same chapter (Mark 4:21-25, 33, 34*a*).

In spite of Mark's adverb, "of itself," in 4:28—the parable is omitted by Luke and Matthew—there is no suggestion of a mechanical "advance" or "spread" of the kingdom of God, as the result of human effort to "found" or "build" it; the whole point is that the kingdom, like the harvest, comes secretly, and the word αὐτομάτη ("of itself") emphasizes only the fact that one cannot watch it (cf. Luke 17:20, as above). Matthew's substituted parable of the weeds (Matt. 13:24-30, 36-43) has an entirely different point; here it is the presence of wickedness or the absence of devotion in the later church (cf. 24:12). The point in such a parable as that of the sower (Mark 4:3-8) is not the nature of the kingdom, but the response to the message of its coming and the call to repentance, as even Mark's pedestrian interpretation in 4:13-20 makes clear; nor does it imply that only a fourth of the hearers respond—a farmer whose seed was three-quarters wasted or lost would soon give up! The picture is really one of success—the size of the harvest (vs. 8). The same theme appears in the parables of the mustard seed and the leaven (Matt. 13:33; Mark 4:31-32): the results (the final response) are out of all proportion to the tiny beginnings! So also in the parable of the leaven (Matt. 13:33; Luke 13:21), where the eventual success of the process is assumed. The parables of hidden treasure, the pearl, and the net (Matt. 13:44-50), and of the trained scribe (51-52), found only in Matthew, are not descriptive of the kingdom, but of its joyful discovery, its priceless value, its universal range of appeal, its challenge and judgment of the unworthy, its deeper meanings as discovered (in scripture) by the trained scribe—i.e., the Christian teacher.

c. The "coming" of the kingdom. Jesus assumes that the kingdom is coming at once, in "this generation" (Mark 9:1; 13:30). Although "no sign shall be given" (Mark 8:12), the "signs of the time" are clear for all to see (Luke 11:16; 12:54 ff). The steadily growing unrest of the people, the tyranny of the foreign occupying power, the injustice of the rulers (seen in the death of John the Baptist), the impotence and inability of the religious authorities to deal with the situation—all these tensions and frustrations indicated that a crisis was impending. It was as clear to John and Jesus, and also to some others, no doubt, as the similar situation in centuries gone by had been to Amos, Jeremiah, and other prophets.

This "prophetic" interpretation of contemporary history is not to be confused with the "apocalyptic" (see APOCALYPTICISM), which is found in such works as Daniel, Enoch, IV Ezra, and in the Little Apocalypse underlying Mark 13 (vss. 3-4, 6-8, 14-20, 24-27; see especially vss. 4, 29); other apocalyptic features are the appearance of false messiahs and false prophets, as in vss. 6, 21 ff, of which the first century had many examples (cf. Matt. 7:21-23; Luke 6:46; 13:26-27). The "signs" described in Mark 13 contradict the principle: "No sign shall be given" (Mark 8:11-13, modified in Matt. 12:38-42; Luke 11:29-32; there are three stages in the development of the saying in the tradition). But the presuppositions of Mark 13 are derived not from Jesus' teaching, but from the Jewish-Christian Little Apocalypse. The details in Matt. 24:40; Luke 17:34-35 are derived from the Little Apocalypse via Mark 13:14-20. As in the OT crises, especially the fall of Jerusalem in 597-586, God's patience has been exhausted by this generation (Matt. 23:35-36; Luke 13:6-9).

The passage announcing the threat of doom is credited by Luke (11:49-50) to the "Wisdom of God," which may have been some apocryphal or apocalyptic work then in circulation; its fulfilment, as Luke clearly recognized, took place, not in an ending of the world or of its present order, but in the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 (Luke 19:41-44; 21:20-24; he sees the whole eschatological gospel of Jesus through the lurid haze of this great catastrophe). The temple is to be destroyed (Mark 13:1-4), as well as the city. Not one stone will be left upon another in the beautiful new structure begun by Herod the Great and still far from completion in Jesus' day. Jesus weeps over the city (Luke 13:34-35)—the editorial addition in vs. 35*b*, which was found even in Q, must not mislead the interpreter; it no doubt refers to Jesus' triumphal entry on Palm Sunday (19:38). Similarly, Jesus warns the women of Jerusalem not to weep for him, but for themselves (Luke 23:28-31); some scholars think that all these Lukan passages concerning the fall of Jerusalem are related, perhaps derived from a common source. The tension of the times is clearly reflected likewise in Luke 12:49-50, where the "fire" and "water" of John's baptismal preaching are applied by Jesus to himself (cf. Mark 10:38). So also Luke 13:1-9 is no abstract discussion of theodicy, but a warning of the coming destruction of Jerusalem, whose terrors and dangers can be escaped only by repentance. Repeatedly Jesus warns that the coming of the Judgment, or the PAROUSIA of the Son of man, will be sudden, instantaneous, inescapable, and "without observation" other than the "signs of the times" (Matt. 24:26-27; Luke 17:20-37). As we have seen, the proper translation of Luke 17:21 is "in the midst of you"; the proper exegesis is suggested by vss. 23-24, where part of the saying is repeated. The kingdom is already here, in essence; its full manifestation in external reality will be instantaneous (cf. Mark 13:26). The Gnostic interpretation, "Whoever knows himself will find it," quoted in Huck's Synopsis and in Gospel Parallels, section 183, from Oxyrhynchus Papyri, 654 (2), is to be rejected, along with the ancient translation, in animis vestris. Further emphasis upon this suddenness of the final end is seen in the reference to the Flood and the burning of Sodom and Gomorrah (vss. 26-30), and other warnings, some of which are only conventional apocalyptic, but others are fresh and original (e.g., vs. 33, from Mark 8:35; and vss. 34-35, from Q). The saying about the vultures and the corpse (37*b*) points once more toward the contemporary scene: wherever there is evil, the Judgment will strike. The vultures remind us of the Erinyes in Greek religious thought.

d. The coming Parousia and Judgment. As later on in Paul's teaching ("the Day will disclose it"—I Cor. 3:13), so in that of Jesus, everything will be clear at the coming Judgment (Matt. 10:26-33; Luke 12:2-12). Again, this is eschatological teaching, not Gnostic (as in the saying quoted in Huck and in Gospel Parallels on § 155, from Oxyrhynchus Papyri, 654 [4]: "What is hid from you will be revealed to you.") Also as in current apocalyptic thought, only a few will be saved (Luke 13:22-24)—i.e., the "elect" (cf. Mark 13:22), or the "righteous" (Matt. 25:34), for whom the kingdom has been "prepared from the foundation of the world." Jesus does not say that these are identical with his followers, though it is assumed that his own disciples, who have renounced all to follow him, will receive the kingdom as a gift (Luke 12:32-33), and surely those who "hear the word of God and keep it" (viz., Jesus' true family; Mark 3:31-35; Luke 11:27-28) will be included. Such a saying as that about the apostles' twelve thrones (Matt. 19:28; Luke 22:28), though by definition belonging to Q, seems to have a wholly different background from the other kingdom sayings; it is ruled out by the pericope in Mark 10:35-45, where Jesus denies that he has authority to assign places of honor in the kingdom (though here also there are difficulties —the disciples' request would have been impossible after vss. 33-34, and vss. 38-40 are clearly a vaticinium ex eventu; the Gospel of the Naassenes, quoted in Huck and in Gospel Parallels, on § 192, undertook to get around the difficulty by reading: "Even if you drink . . .").

The real answer to the request and the continuation of the narrative is in vss. 41-44. The Son-of-man saying in vs. 45 is perhaps a reformulation of a saying of Jesus, made in the early church; cf. Luke's form of it in 22:27. The sublime account of the Last Judgment in Matt. 25:31-46 is not a "parable" but an illustrative story, and so is the one in Luke 16:19-31 (the rich man and Lazarus), which was based, apparently, on an old Egyptian tale of the judgment of souls after death. In view of the sudden coming of the kingdom, at the Parousia, Jesus' message is to watch! (Mark 13:37), with loins girded and lamps aflame (Luke 12:35-36; the parable of the watchful maidens, Matt. 25:1-13, elaborates this teaching); every Jew would recognize an added reference to the Passover celebration with its eschatological connotations (Exod. 12:11; cf. Mark 14:38; Luke 22:40; 21:34 ff, concluding the apocalyptic discourse, is an editorial cento based on Mark). Nevertheless, Jesus himself does not know the day or the hour of the impending Parousia of the Son of man or of the Judgment, which presumably is to follow (see Mark 13:32; cf. Acts 1:7). The text of Matt. 24:36 has probably been altered by the insertion of "nor the Son"; the addition is probably an inference from Matt. 25:13 (cf. 24:44; Luke 12:40, from Q), and the statement is strong enough without it. If Irenaeus and Origen had omitted the phrase, we should assume that it represented a theological interest; but when Eastern MSS omit it, this can scarcely be because of a theological presupposition. And if the words were not found in the original text of Matthew, the next inference is that they were likewise absent from Mark. The use of "the Son," absolutely, is not found elsewhere in Mark; it is found in Matthew (11:27), where, however, the Son's knowledge seems to rule out such a statement as the present one. The view that the gospel must first be preached to all nations (Mark 13:10; 14:9), and then will come the end (Matt. 24:14), is surely a later one. Contrast the idea set forth in I Cor. 15:24, which does not emphasize preaching. Finally, such a passage as Matt. 16: 17-19, the blessing of Peter and his promised pre-eminence in the church—if this is the true interpretation—is likewise a later addition to the gospel tradition. No such conception is found anywhere else in the NT, nor is it congruous with the course of early Christian history, so far as we know it.

e. Was the kingdom identical with the church? There are passages in which the kingdom is referred to as Christ's or the Son of man's (Matt. 13:41, where the kingdom is identified with the church; see CHURCH, IDEA OF); but these are late editorial revisions (especially in Matthew) which reflect the early Christian point of view (cf. John 18:36). So also are the passages which apparently identify the kingdom with the Jewish people or the Jewish church-state or the ancient covenant (e.g., Matt. 21:43). A striking saying about the new era which began after John's imprisonment (or death) appears in two different forms: "From the days of John the Baptist until now the kingdom of heaven has suffered violence [or has been coming violently], and men of violence take it by force" (Matt. 11:12); "The law and the prophets were until John; since then the good news of the kingdom of God is preached, and every one enters it violently" (Luke 16:16). "Kingdom of God" and "kingdom of heaven" are identical in meaning; the latter is only the reverent Jewish circumlocution to avoid using the word "God." Matthew's form of the saying looks back upon a period of violence which began with the Baptist's martyr death; here the kingdom is apparently the Jewish people, or the holy covenant, which has been ravaged and violated by "men of violence," including Herod, the Zealots, the Romans, and all who have had their will with the helpless nation: the very form of the saying is its interpretation. On the other hand, Luke's form pictures the beginning of the gospel (as also in Acts 10:37 ff), its public proclamation, and the ensuing popular response. This also is an interpretation. As both forms are interpretations, it is difficult to find a common element which can be described as the original saying of Jesus. This is also true of many other "detached" sayings preserved in the gospels, where no editorial interpretation or setting gives us a clue to the original meaning.

4. Jesus' ministry to the outcast. Jesus' ministry, as we have seen, was devoted to the "lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Matt. 10:6; Mark 2:14-17; cf. Ps. 147:2-3; Ezek. 34:6)—i.e., the Galilean 'AM HA'AREZ who were scorned by the religious leaders, the scribes, and by the model pietists, the PHARISEES, since they neglected the observance of the religious rules of strict Judaism such as those concerning the sabbath, tithes, the food laws, and avoidance of contacts with idolatry (i.e., with Gentiles). Their very occupations required them to disregard some of the rigid theoretical rules of the scribes—and even of the Torah. E.g., the cattle required watering and feeding, the cows and goats milking (Luke 13:15), even on the sabbath. Accidents and injuries required attention, even on the holy day (Luke 14:5). The later rabbis admitted the point that works of necessity and of mercy abrogate the letter of the law, but in the first century the rigorists seem to have prevailed. Such rules as that of CORBAN (Mark 7:10-11)—viz., the insistence that there could be no dispensation from vows dedicating property or income to God, even in cases of momentary anger or resentment (they were binding even when it meant neglect of one's parents, whose support the law required)—such abstract, theoretical, and inhuman interpretations of the law were egregious examples of uncontrolled legal professionalism. They help to account for the neglect of the law by many of the laity, and also explain the rift between them and their leaders ("This crowd, who do not know the law, are accursed!"—John 7:49).

It was to the neglected common people, who "heard him gladly," that Jesus devoted himself. His saying: "I was sent only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel," receives a curious emphasis and interpretation from its setting in Matt. 15:24, where it is assumed (as in 10:5, 23*b*) that it rules out any consideration of the needs of Gentiles; but the emphatic words are "lost sheep," not "Israel," and the verses in ch. 10 are now generally thought to reflect the views of the ultra-right-wing Jewish Christians in Jerusalem ("those about James") in the forties or fifties, rather than Jesus' own principles. But as a matter of fact, Jesus never began a ministry among the Gentiles, in spite of the suggestion in John 7:35. The charge against Jesus: "He eats with tax collectors and sinners" (Mark 2:13-17), was reiterated throughout his ministry (e.g., Luke 15:1). The strict Pharisee, who avoided contaminating contact with idolatry and with those who were careless of their own contacts with it, could not understand him (Luke 7:39). Jesus viewed his mission as "to call sinners" (Mark 2:17), rather than the "righteous"—i.e., the religious-minded and devout observers of Judaism.

In other words, the gospel was, from the outset, a gospel of redemption. The trilogy of parables in Luke 15 (the lost sheep, the lost coin, and the lost son) makes this clear: "There will be more joy in heaven [i.e., in the presence of God] over one sinner who repents" than over many of the "righteous" who "need no repentance," while God's welcome to the penitent is like that of a father receiving back again a beloved son who has become "lost." The parable of the marriage feast (Luke 14:16-24) pictures God's invitation as extended to the 'Am Ha'arez, after the professionally pious have rejected it—the later interpretation of it as a reference to the Gentile mission is a sound application of the principle, but not a sound exegesis of the original meaning. E.g., the conversion of Zacchaeus (Luke 19:1-10) is an example of a recovery of the "lost" (cf. 3:13; the penitent is welcomed back as a true "son of Abraham" [3:8]). Blind Bartimaeus and others were saved by faith; Zacchaeus was saved by repentance. Keeping the commandments could lead to salvation (cf. Mark 10:19); but Zacchaeus was a sinner (Luke 19:7; this is not an insertion into the story but the necessary setting for vs. 9). The woman with the ointment in Simon's house (Luke 7:36-47) is a glowing picture of gratitude to Jesus for all he was doing for the poor and outcast, and for all that he meant to them. The final verses (48-50) are a typical Lukan "tag" which, as often, only confuses the story. The fact that the woman's sins are already forgiven is evident from her deep love and gratitude. The parallels in Matt. 26:6-13; Mark 14:3-9; John 12:3-8 move in another direction, and are interpreted as referring to Jesus' impending death. Did Jesus intend (at least eventually) a mission to Gentiles? Luke 4:25-27 may be understood to point that way, and also 13:29; but the evidence as a whole is against the theory. This was one charge his enemies did not bring against him—they might have done so had there been sufficient grounds for it (cf. John 7:35).

5. Jesus' teaching and Judaism. Jesus' teaching embraced, apparently, most of the basic beliefs and practices of religion as set forth in contemporary Judaism (though the gospels are not exhaustive). Centered in his proclamation of the coming kingdom (Luke 4:43), his preaching dealt with a whole series of correlated subjects. The fundamental revelation of God in the OT, and his character and purposes as therein revealed, are everywhere taken for granted. E.g., the parable of the workers in the vineyard (Matt. 20:1-16) is no illustration of a new economic theory, but a story to illustrate the overwhelming grace and goodness of God, which cannot be measured by human deserving. The goodness of the Creator is apparent even in nature; he sends his sun and his rain "on the evil and on the good" (Matt. 5:45), and cares for the birds of the air and the flowers of the field (Luke 12:22-31; cf. Ps. 147:8-9). Hence God is to be trusted for our daily needs (Mark 8:16-21); we must not yield to anxiety (Matt. 6:33). In fact, God always answers prayer, though not always as we wish (Matt. 7:7-11); hence the power of faith is unlimited (Luke 17:5-6): "With God all things are possible" (Matt. 19:26). It is only a step from this conviction to that of the unlimited power of prayer, and in Mark and Matthew of cursing (Matt. 17:20; 21:21-22; Mark 11:23-24; Luke 17:6; John 14:13-14; 16:23). The story of the importunate friend (Luke 11:5-8) illustrates this principle, as does also the parable of the unjust judge (Luke 18:1-8); constancy in prayer will achieve results, as it did in this case—if it succeeds with a wicked human judge, how much more with the Father in heaven! (Vs. 8*b* is another Lukan "tag," suggesting that the Christians—i.e., the faith, which is the Christian—may be exterminated before the Parousia, a possibility which must have seemed real in the days of Nero or Domitian, if not earlier.)

a. Absolute sincerity. In the practice of religion, absolute sincerity and singleness of purpose are required (Luke 11:34-35; 14:34-35; the parables of light, the lamp, the eye, and even salt are interpreted in this sense). There is no use in trying to escape this principle; to do so is only to deceive oneself: "Where your treasure is, there will your heart be also" (Luke 12:33-34). It is impossible to serve two masters (Matt. 6:24), and even in serving one master it is not possible to win merit: "When you have done all that is commanded you, say, 'We are mere undeserving slaves [not "unworthy," as in RSV, nor "worthless," but as slaves "non-remunerated"; cf. Antigonos of Socho in Pirke Aboth 1:3]; we have only done our duty' " (Luke 17:10). The actual practice of religion is what matters, not ardent professions of zeal or devotion (Matt. 7:21-27), and the outward act discloses the inner motive and disposition (Matt. 7:15-20; 12:33-35; 21:28-32). Even everyday prudence is invoked to support the appeal to repentance (Luke 12:57; 14:34-35; 16:1-13, the parable of the clever steward, followed by a series of admonitions or homiletical tags in verses 8*b*-13). The parable in 12:57-59 even urges reconciliation with God as a matter of common prudence. The parable of the talents (Matt. 25:14-30; Luke 19:11-27) likewise emphasizes the necessity of "putting religion in practice," though Luke's parallel is confused by conflation with another story—or parable—of a king seeking investiture, and in both (therefore in Q) the insertion of a verse from Mark 4:25 has obscured the meaning: the verse from Mark refers to learning, not to economic conditions. (The verses in Luke 12:47-48 about responsibility for service are only two tags attached to the preceding section, vss. 42-46; one is in vss. 47-48*a;* the other, in 48*b,* forms a simple quatrain.)

b. Love for one's neighbor. High among the duties of religion, as taught in Judaism and also by Jesus, is LOVE for one's neighbor, and even one's enemy (Luke 6:27-28, 32-36). This is not limited to fellow Jews. The finest example is in the illustrative story (not a "parable") of the good Samaritan (Luke 10:29-37), which explains what loving another "as thyself" means: it was at considerable risk, as well as expense, that the Samaritan rescued the wounded traveler, for he cared for him as he would for his own life. (Cf. Jesus' own attitude toward the Samaritan village [Luke 9:51-56], and the account in John 4:1-42.) Such sayings as those about reconciliation and forgiveness of enemies (Luke 17:4) or even about reproving an offender (Matt. 18:15-17) make the principle still clearer, in the undramatic situations of everyday life—though Matthew as usual is moving in the direction of canon law, and follows the sayings with the awesome parable of the unmerciful steward (18:23-35). Above all things, the sin of leading others into sin must be avoided (Mark 9:42-48).

*c. Humility. The teaching on humility is very prominent, not only in the Beatitudes (Matt. 5:3-12; Luke 6:20-23), which describe the character pleasing to God and therefore requisite in those who are to enter his kingdom, but also repeatedly in the gospels: e.g., Matt. 18:4; 23:12; Mark 9:33-37; 10:15, 43-44; Luke 9:48; 14:7-11 (where it is combined with charity, vss. 12-14, introducing the parable of the great supper, vss. 15-24); 18:14, 17. The Beatitude, "Blessed are the poor in spirit," means "in their own estimation, aware of their own shortcomings and insufficiency"—the opposite of self-confidence in the approach to God. Jesus' whole concept of the kingdom of God rules out pride of place (Mark 10:35-45). God prefers the humble to the arrogant (Luke 18:9-14). He is greatest who serves (Mark 10:42-44). It is this demand of a lowly estimate of oneself which leads to the prohibition of censoriousness (Matt. 7:1-5).

*d. The permanence of the law. Although the gospels are not in entire agreement (see § A4 above), Matthew at least insists that Jesus held the Jewish law to be permanently binding (Matt. 5:17-20; the saying in Luke 16:17 does not fit the context and may be a gloss—at best it is one of a group of supplementary sayings for which Luke had not found a suitable context in his narrative). In the Christian interpretation, the law is even harder to keep than in the scribal! The rest of Matt. 5 shows that mechanical piety will not do—nothing less than the imitation of the perfect love, compassion, mercy, and justice of God. The two great commandments in the law make for eternal life (Mark 12:28-31), as the friendly scribe recognized (vss. 32-34). The Torah really sets a very high goal for human effort, and cannot be easily observed, or observed 101 per cent, so as to achieve merit through either complete observance or "works of supererogation." Thus the Torah itself, in spite of the concession in Deut. 24:1-4, really requires monogamy and forbids divorce and remarriage (Mark 10:1-12). Such practices of religion as the three considered in Matt. 6:1-18 (almsgiving, prayer, and fasting) were not strictly rules governing all Jews at the time, though the first two were universally commended, and the third was increasingly in practice, especially among the Pharisees. (Jesus and his disciples did not fast—Mark 2:18-22—but the early Christians did.)

*e. The Lord's Prayer. In its phraseology the LORD'S PRAYER (Matt. 6:9-13) closely resembles both the ancient form of Kaddish and some of the petitions in the earliest recensions of the Shemoneh Esreh or Eighteen Benedictions. The Lord's Prayer begins, as all Jewish prayers begin, with the praise of God, and is centered in the coming of his kingdom. "Hallowed be thy name" means, May God be recognized and worshiped everywhere. "Thy kingdom come," or "Thy reign begin," includes:

> Thy will be done,
> On earth as it is in heaven.

"Daily bread" means enough for daily needs. "Forgive us our debts" includes our failure to do good as well as our actual commission of wrong. "As we have forgiven" does not set a standard which God must meet, but means only that we have met the absolutely essential precondition to being heard by him (vss. 14-15). "Lead us not into temptation" means, as in other Jewish prayers, "Do not subject us to testing, do not compel us to face trials" (of the kind which often destroy men's faith in God; cf. Ecclus. 2:1-18); or possibly the final, eschatological tribulation, as in Albert Schweitzer's interpretation. "Deliver us from evil" means from the evils of life (as also in other Jewish prayers), not from wickedness. The ascription at the end, "For thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory, for ever," is a very early liturgical addition (cf. Did. 8.2; 10.5) based on I Chr. 29:11-13.

The saying about the temple tax (Matt. 17:24-27) may be apocryphal—at least the story of the shekel in the fish's mouth must be a legend—but the saying in Mark 11:17: "My house shall be called a house of prayer for all nations," quoting Isa. 56:7, is certainly authentic. Moreover, Jesus' teaching shares many principles also found in Pharisaism—e.g., the doctrine of the resurrection (Mark 12:18-27, which may have been originally a "school debate," like the one on the grounds for divorce); but in Jesus' teaching all material concepts of the resurrection body were certainly ruled out.

*f. His criticism of scribal teaching. On the other hand, Jesus' criticism of the scribal interpretation of the law, and also of the personal character of the religious leaders of his time, is clear in all the gospel sources. Mark 7:1-13 criticizes the mistaken tradition of the scribes, while vss. 14-23 state the real causes of defilement, which the scribes apparently overlook; Mark 8:15 criticizes the leaven of the Pharisees, and Luke 12:1 interprets this as the leaven of "hypocrisy"; the stern invectives in Matt. 23; Mark 12:37*b*-40; Luke 11:37–12:1 also charge them with greed as well as hypocrisy, with ostentation, the love of adulation, a merely external righteousness (or practice of religion)—e.g., the exact specification of tithes and the neglect of mercy and love, the increase of the burden of ceremonial rules upon the people, and the actual hindrance of those who would enter the kingdom of God. Luke 16:14-15 includes avarice as a Pharisaic vice; but this is scarcely reflected in their tradition—it was far more true of the affluent, worldly Sadducees. Moreover, the criticism of the leaders also included the people—"Like people, like priest" (Hos. 4:9). The parable of the wicked vineyard tenants (Mark 12:1-12) is a criticism, not of the leaders only, but of the nation; Luke 7:31-35 criticizes Jesus' contemporaries as a whole, in view of their failure to respond to either John's preaching or his own. (The woes on the Galilean towns, Luke 10:13 ff, may reflect a later view.)

*g. Jesus' teaching on wealth. Jesus' teaching on wealth was probably more of a concern to the rich, landowning Sadducean high-priestly aristocracy than to either the scribes or Pharisees or the average "poor priest" living on his little patrimony somewhere in Judea or Galilee and performing his temple duty only two weeks in the year—like the prebends at Wells Cathedral in the Middle Ages. The praise of the widow offering her two "mites" (Mark 12:41-44) is caustic enough: "She has given more than all the others"; but the positive statement that riches are a hindrance to one's entering the kingdom of God (Mark 10:23-27), the story of the rich man and the beggar Lazarus (Luke 16:19-31), the demand of renunciation of property (Mark 10:17-31), and the total, sweeping principle of Luke 14:33: "Whoever of you does not renounce all that he has cannot be my disciple" (this emphasis is peculiar to Luke), and above all the parable of the rich fool (Luke 12:13-21) —these sayings must have seemed to many contemporaries to mark a total divergence, not only from the Jewish leaders and people and the practice of both, but from all traditional religion. It is noteworthy that this motive is not based on asceticism, or even on eschatology (the "interim ethics" to hold good until the kingdom comes), but upon the love, mercy, and goodness of God—and the love of neighbor that forms the heart of this religious ethic.

Jesus' ethic as a whole is neither scientific nor philosophical, in either the modern or the ancient sense. It cannot be lifted off its true base in the revealed religion of the OT, and set upon some other (Marxist, or Utilitarian, Aristotelian, or the "success" ethics of modern commercialism). The citation of the "Golden Rule" (Matt. 7:12; Luke 6:31; hence in Q) is only an added admonition, as it appears in the Sermon on the Mount, not an ethical principle of fundamental importance. It was a world-old adage, and circulated in its negative form in the Judaism of Hillel and of Jesus: "Do not do to others what you would not have them do to you." The strange and obscure gnomic saying found in Matt. 7:6, a chiastic quatrain: "Do not give dogs what is holy . . . ," is probably the conclusion of the sequence on the practice of piety: 6:1, 2-4, 5-8, 16-18. It is a quaint, even quasi-cynical, conclusion like 6:34 and the tags in the Didache, and means much the same as 10:13*b*-14 —i.e., do not waste your efforts on the unconvertible, who only oppose and revile you.

h. The scribes' reply. In their reply, the criticisms of Jesus by the scribes and Pharisees included his association with "sinners"—not necessarily wicked men, but lax, nonobservant Jews, who were despised by the official interpreters of the law and their lay followers, the Pharisaic "separatists." In Luke 7:39 the suspicion that Jesus cannot be a prophet, since he does not avoid contact with a "sinner," is openly voiced by Simon the Pharisee.

The charge brought by the scribes who came down from Jerusalem (Mark 3:22), more serious than the criticisms of the local scribes, maintained that Jesus was "possessed by Beelzebul, . . . the prince of demons," and thus exercised the undenied power of driving out other demons. Jesus' refutation of the charge is masterly: (a) a kingdom divided—as they thus represent Satan's to be—is on the way to ruin; (b) the fact that Jesus exorcises demons (which they cannot deny) shows that the "strong man" is already bound—the robber-baron is in chains, if the prisoners in his dungeons are being released; (c) if Jesus' exorcisms are effected by the authority and power of Beelzebul, by what power do the "sons" (disciples) of the scribes exorcise demons?—the libel must also apply to them; (d) but if, on the contrary, Jesus' exorcisms are done by the authority and power of God—i.e., his Holy Spirit—then the inference must follow that God's kingdom is close at hand, and has, in fact, "come upon you" (Matt. 12:25-29; Mark 3:23-30; Luke 11:17-22; Mark for some reason has omitted the crucial Q verse, the climax of the argument).

The criticism that Jesus undertook to forgive sins appears in Mark 2:5-7; Luke 7:49; but the middle part of the pericope (vss. 5*b*-10) is thought by many to be an insertion from another source, while Luke 7:49 belongs to the Lukan "tag"—the story is complete with vs. 47, where Jesus infers from the woman's gratitude that she is already forgiven. At least, the charge against Jesus is not repeated in the tradition, as it would have been had it been often made.

The criticism that he disregarded the sabbath was most serious, for it meant a breach, not of scribal tradition but of the law itself (Mark 2:23-28; 3:4; Luke 13:15-16; 14:3). Again, Jesus' refutation was not a denial of the fact, but its justification: works of mercy were at least on a par with works of necessity, if not a priority, and grave human need abrogates the requirement of the sabbath "rest"—which itself had been ordained for the benefit and welfare of men, not as an end in itself (Matt. 12:5; Mark 2:27; 3:1-6). The interpretation of "Son of man" in Mark 2:28 and parallels cannot be either "man" or Jesus himself; either interpretation would be contrary to his thought. It must be an inference drawn in the early church, in the course of the transmission of the tradition. The textual evidence in vss. 27-28 is complicated, and requires careful analysis; the pericope properly ends with vs. 27.

i. Jesus' criticism of the law. Thus Jesus' criticism of the scribal interpretation of the law, which the Pharisaic pietists adopted as their rule of life, went farther and included some parts of the law itself. E.g., the Torah permitted divorce under certain conditions, but hedged it about with provisions which would make for justice and equity (Deut. 24:1-4; see MARRIAGE). The scribal authorities, Hillel and Shammai and their followers, debated the meaning of the grounds to be alleged—viz., "some indecency" (in the wife)—some authorities arguing that it meant premarital sexual indulgence, others open adultery or fornication, still others incompetent housekeeping ("if she burns his bread"). Most of the interpretations were impossible, since they were covered by other regulations in the Torah; but Jesus swept them all aside (Mark 10:1-9). "From the beginning" God intended husbands and wives to be "joined together" in lifelong mutual fidelity. The Deuteronomic (=Mosaic) legislation was only a later concession to the hardness of human hearts, and could not possibly abrogate the fundamental principle laid down by the Creator (Gen. 2:24): "What therefore God has joined together [i.e., the principle of monogamic marriage], let not man put asunder." The added statement "in the house" (vs. 10, a regular Markan device for introducing additional material, especially from Q) is a categorical formulation of the principle, on the way to its incorporation in the church's canon law (see also Matt. 5:31-32; 19:9; Luke 16:18; I Cor. 7: 10-16 shows that the apostle Paul found it necessary to allow a modification of the rule). The added verse, Mark 10:12, is a corollary which makes the rule applicable to both partners, since under Roman law a woman could divorce her husband; under Jewish law only the husband could divorce. This is an example of the way in which Jesus, a nonrabbinic, nonscribal lay teacher of religion, expounded the OT, and dealt with one of the problems which vexed the schools (Matt. 19:3).

In dealing with this and other religious and moral questions, Jesus appealed to the highest principles, the love, mercy, and justice of God, and took his stand upon a direct, intuitive understanding of God's will and requirements, not upon the scribal tradition of authoritative interpretations in the past (see Matt. 5:17-48; Mark 7:5-13). It was his freedom from scribal tradition, and his unhesitating rejection of scribal authority, culminating in his free and independent attitude toward the Scripture itself, which roused the antagonism of the religious authorities and resulted in his death. His teaching was a threat to their influence over the people, and to their whole system of religious interpretation and regulation. It was as a "heretic" who criticized and interfered with the national cultus that he was delivered to the Romans, on a trumped-up charge, and executed by them as a revolutionist.

j. Jesus' teaching of his disciples. Much of Jesus' teaching was addressed to his own disciples and to the larger group of followers who gathered about him wherever he went. The "Twelve" are listed four times in the NT (Matt. 10:2-4; Mark 3:14-19; Luke 6:13-16; Acts 1:13), though the lists do not entirely agree. This is not surprising in view of the fact that the names had been handed down by oral tradition (the great second-century rabbi and patriot Akiba had twelve disciples), but the total comes to fourteen in the various lists. The main purposes of Jesus' selection of disciples is stated in Mark 3:14-15: "to be with him, and to be sent out to preach [i.e., proclaim the gospel of the kingdom] and have authority [or power] to cast out demons"; i.e., they were to share, and to carry further, the mission and ministry of Jesus himself (cf. Mark 1:17, 39). The mission of the disciples (described in Matt. 9:35–10:16; Mark 6:6-13; Luke 9:1-5; 10:1-12, 16) illustrates this—though some of the details refer to the later, postresurrection mission of the early church in Palestine; they have been read back into the lifetime of Jesus. Although Luke assumes (12:33; 14:33) that every follower of Jesus was required to renounce all his possessions, this seems not actually to have been the case. In any event, the possibility of return to their usual occupations was still open (John 21:3), and the renunciation, for most of them, did not involve giving up great wealth (Mark 10:17-22 is exceptional).

k. Discipleship. Discipleship is a great privilege (Matt. 13:16-17), and therefore any sacrifice it requires must be met cheerfully and unhesitatingly. The way is narrow that leads to life (Matt. 7:13-14), and prudence must be exercised in choosing to follow Jesus (Luke 14:25-35)—the statements are largely negative; note the threefold "he cannot be my disciple." The saying about eunuchs in Matt. 19:10-12 is perhaps an Encratite addition to the gospel tradition; it really requires celibacy, which is impossible without the help of divine grace, as in Mark 10:27*b*. Yet the disciples are to be like their Master (Matt. 10:24-25) if they are to share his life; and he was unmarried. Nothing less than total renunciation is required (Mark 8:34-38; Luke adds "daily"), including the renunciation of family life—hyperbolically described as "hating" their next of kin, since the spread of the gospel produced intense frictions within families (Mark 10:28-31; Luke 9:57-62; 12:51-53; 14:26-27; domestic divisions were a feature in the anticipated conditions of the "latter days," according to the eschatological interpretation of Mic. 7:6, overlooking Mal. 4:6). For one thing, Jesus' disciples included women (Luke 8:1-3; cf. Acts 1:14), and in an ancient oriental household this might easily lead to disunity and separation, as it often did in the early centuries of the church's history, especially during the persecutions. The beautiful story of Mary and Martha (Luke 10:38-42) illustrates the requirement of singlehearted devotion. We should probably omit vs. 42*a*, which is unessential and complicates the story (as the gloss in Mark 8:14*b* did!), and which in view of the textual variants probably originated in a well-meaning gloss, followed by later attempts either to remedy or to improve it.

Persecution is foreseen as the lot of the disciples (Matt. 10:17-25; Mark 13:9-13; cf. John 15:21; 16:2), though some of the details probably reflect the conditions of tension and opposition in Palestine during the decades which led up to the final breach between the church and the synagogue. Yet the disciples are not to be anxious (Matt. 10:19-20; Luke 12:11-12); the Spirit will teach them what to say, when they are brought to trial (Luke) or will inspire their words and speak through them (Matthew). What is required is fearless confession of their discipleship (Matt. 10:26-33; Luke 12:2-12), since on the Day of Judgment the Son of man will surely deny the faithless and apostate (Mark 8:38; Luke 9:26; Matt. 10:33 has "I will deny," an example of the frequent interchange of "Son of man" and the first person singular of the verb in the "Son of man" sayings; Luke 12:9 has "he will be denied"). And yet the blessed promise is clear: "Those who receive you, receive me," and the cup of cold water given the persecuted or the imprisoned will not be forgotten (Matt. 10:40 ff).

For further details on Jesus' teaching, see SERMON ON THE MOUNT; TEACHING OF JESUS.

F. THE MIGHTY WORKS. 1. Healings and exorcisms. From the outset, Jesus' proclamation of the kingdom of God was accompanied by supernatural manifestations, chiefly exorcism and the healing of the sick. This was in marked contrast to the Baptist ("John did no miracle"—i.e., "sign"—John 10:41). Attempts have been made to analyze the descriptions of the various ailments treated, and the methods used by Jesus; but the diagnosis was only popular and traditional, not scientific, and the methods were chiefly prayer, the eliciting of faith on the part of the sick, and the firm, authoritative word of command by the healer.

Such ailments as possession by a "demon" (Mark 1:21-28, 32), fever (1:29-31), leprosy (1:40-45; cf. Luke 17:11-19), paralysis (Mark 2:1-12), a "withered" hand (3:1-6), chronic hemorrhage (5:25-34), deafness and muteness (7:31-37), blindness (8:22-26; 10:46-52), epilepsy (9:14-29), dropsy (Luke 14:1-6)—these are the ailments that commonly afflicted mankind in the ancient world, as the Greek medical writers and the great Natural History of the elder Pliny show. The continuous emphasis on healing in Mark justifies the description of this work as the "gospel of the mighty works of Jesus." And yet the emphasis is not altogether on his pre-eminence as a healer, and it is recognized that at Nazareth he failed (Mark 6:5-6; the exception clause sounds unreal after "not a single [οὐδεμίαν] mighty work," and must be a gloss); the explanation is the Nazarenes' lack of faith. Other "mighty works" included the restoration of the centurion's slave (Matt. 8:5-13; Luke 7:1-10; cf. John 4:46-53), Jairus' daughter (Mark 5:22-24, 35-43), the widow's son at Nain (Luke 7:11-17), the Syrophoenician's daughter (Mark 7:24-30), the woman with a "spirit of infirmity" (Luke 13:10-17). In none of these is the precise ailment suggested, though the last-named intimates that the weakness was due to an evil spirit. Even the "miraculous" catch of fish in Luke 5:1-11 may be accounted a "mighty work," or the stilling of the storm (Mark 4:35-41, which some view as an exorcism of the spirit of the storm), and certainly the exorcism of the "legion" which possessed the Gerasene demoniac (Mark 5:1-20), whose condition is vividly described—an ancient "terror of the glen." Perhaps the cursing of the fig tree (Mark 11:12-14, 20-26) should be included; according to Mark it was the only miracle performed in or near Jerusalem (excluding Jericho, which was several miles E of the city). Matthew tells the story in the true vein of miracle lore: the tree withers instantly (Matt. 21:19), and the story becomes a lesson in successful cursing (vss. 20-21)! But Mark's catena of sayings at the end is surely inappropriate here. Vss. 25-26 are probably both interpolated; both are based on Matt. 6:14-15, and neither of them is in Markan language or style. It scarcely needs to be said that this picture of a disappointed, resentful, and vindictive prophet or holy man is not worthy of Jesus, and conflicts with the usual representation of him in the gospels. It sounds more like Elijah, Elisha, or Mohammed. See MIRACLE.

2. Other miracles. Although healings and exorcisms provide the majority of the miracle stories in the Synoptics (cf. Luke 13:31-32), there are a few others which can scarcely be included in this category. One is the walking on the water (Mark 6:45-52), which has a parallel in the life of Buddha; the story as told in Matthew (14:22-33) is almost a parable of Peter's wavering faith (vss. 28-31), as seen in his "denials" of Jesus during the "trial" by the Sanhedrin (26:69-75). Luke omits both this miracle and the cursing of the fig tree.

The feeding of the multitude is told in two forms (the five thousand: Matt. 14:13-21; Mark 6:30-44; Luke 9:10-17; John 6:1-13; the four thousand: Matt. 15:32-39; Mark 8:1-10; Luke and John omit). The stories are two variant accounts of the same event, presumably; for when the problem of feeding the four thousand arises, the disciples make no reference to any earlier solution. The reference to both feedings, in Mark 8:16-21, is an editorial device to furnish a setting for the repeated saying (7:18; 8:17*c*, 18, 21). The whole outlook of the passage, and of the narratives of the feeding to which it refers, is diametrically opposed to the temptation narrative, where Jesus flatly refuses to satisfy hunger by performing a miracle (Matt. 4:3-4; Luke 4:3-4). (Does this explain Mark's omission of the fuller Q account of the Temptation—viz., because he held a different interpretation of the meaning of the feeding than that which the old tradition had set forth?) Many scholars now believe that the feeding was a kind of "eschatological sacrament," binding Jesus' followers to him and to one another in view of the approaching crisis.

Thus the miracle stories in the Synoptic gospels are mainly of one class, healing and exorcism. Those in John are in a different category, as "signs" of divine power, or even "epiphanies" of a divine being (John 2:11). That exorcisms and cures could be performed by others than Jesus is clear from his commission of the disciples to do both (Matt. 9:8; Luke 9:1-2; 10:9), from his reference to the "sons" of the scribes who practiced exorcism (Luke 11:19), from his refusal to interfere with the work of the stranger who was using his name (Mark 9:38-41), from the expectation that false prophets and messiahs would be able to do signs and wonders (Matt. 24:11, 24), and from the fact that his practice of exorcism and healing was not denied or included among the charges brought against him by his enemies. Even the occasional failure of exorcism is recognized (Luke 11:24-26).

Yet even during his ministry of extraordinarily successful healing and exorcism, Jesus could say: "No sign shall be given!" (Mark 8:12), and in the Fourth Gospel the failure of the "signs" to convince his adversaries is noted (John 12:37). All this is evidence of the slightness of the emphasis placed on the exercise of supernatural—or supernormal—powers in the early church. Paul, e.g., lays no emphasis on Jesus' "miracles"; he never, in fact, mentions them, though he does refer to his own "signs of an apostle" (Rom. 15:19; II Cor. 12:12). Even Jesus' resurrection is not, for Paul, either a "sign" or a "mighty work," but the supremely natural consequence of the victorious life and death of the Son of God.

3. The meaning of the "mighty works" for Jesus himself. In fact, the whole modern concept of "miracle," as a stupendous, inexplicable event which conflicts with or contradicts the "laws of nature," is useless when we try to explain the "mighty works" of Jesus. They were not indications of superior skill or even of a privately possessed supernatural power; instead, as in the OT, they were the "mighty works" of God, not man, though done through a prophet or other chosen person. The ministry of Jesus included healings and exorcisms in addition to teaching and proclaiming the message of the arriving kingdom; and these "mighty works" were evidence, not of the truth of his message, or of his own personal power or divine nature, but of the fact that the kingdom of God was really at hand. The powers of darkness were actually being rolled back, the "powers of the age to come" (Heb. 6:5) were already being manifested, now at the end of this present age. In a word, the whole concept, in the Synoptics, is eschatological; and if one inquires what the "mighty works" meant to Jesus himself, the answer is clear and unmistakable: "If it is by the Spirit of God [Luke reads "finger of God," which is an OT phrase meaning the same thing] that I cast out demons, then the kingdom of God has come upon you" (Matt. 12:28; Luke 11:20). The miracle stories in the Fourth Gospel belong in a different category, although three of them are also found in the Synoptics. They are basically "signs" of the divine person who performed them and of his heavenly "glory," which he had laid aside temporarily but incompletely on becoming man.

4. Significance of the Baptism and the Temptation. We are now in a position to look back and recognize the significance of the baptism and temptation narratives, located at the beginning of the story by Mark (the other Synoptists follow his order). The Baptism (Mark 1:9-11) was not, as some scholars have held, the "awakening of Jesus' messianic consciousness," or his "inauguration" as Son of God—a view reflected in the Western reading of Luke 3:22, but refuted by Paul's statement in Rom. 1:4, which is consonant with most of the NT; instead, the Baptism was Jesus' endowment with the Holy Spirit for his office and ministry as a prophet. Like all the prophets of the OT, like every prophet, even in the NT, there had to be a "call" and a "commission," and the outpouring of the Spirit upon him. But unlike the prophets of old, Jesus' endowment was permanent and was given, as the Fourth Gospel says, "without measure" (John 3:34). Unlike the earlier prophets, he neither committed a sin nor spoke a sinful word after his endowment with the Spirit (cf. John 8:46; II Cor. 5:21; I Pet. 2:22; see the Gospel According to the Hebrews, quoted by Jerome Against the Pelagians III.2, cited in Huck's Synopsis and in Gospel Parallels, on § 135).

The ordeal, through which he at once passed, was the test of his vocation, and proved him superior to the various diabolical proposals—short cuts devised to bring in God's kingdom, popular demagoguery, "signs and wonders," spectacular self-exploitation, the direct action of the Zealots and of other revolutionists. All these were the ways of Satan, not of God (cf. Mark 8:33). Instead, he must follow the way of simple obedience to the Spirit's guidance (Luke 4:1, 14, 18; 5:17; 6:19), one step at a time, without any "program" or "campaign" of action. See also §§ D3, E2, above.

So true is the temptation narrative to the whole character of Jesus as portrayed in the gospels that it provides the key to the beginning of his ministry, where the Synoptists have placed it (though they might well have considered such a location as Mark 8:27-29 or 31-38; or 14:32-42; or Luke 12:49-50; 13:31; or 17:22-30). The fall of Satan (Luke 10:17-20) presumably belongs in the period of the mission of the disciples (i.e., the Twelve, who were sent out to exorcize; not the Seventy of Luke 10:1-12), but the binding of the strong man (Mark 3:27) must have been earlier (cf. John 12:31). The testing of Jesus in the wilderness takes forty days, as the testing of Israel in the wilderness (Deut. 2:7) took forty years. When it is over, the devil leaves him "until a more convenient opportunity" (ἄχρι καιρόυ—Luke 4:13; but see Acts 13:11—the phrase was common and untechnical).

The words spoken by the heavenly voice at the Baptism and those at the Transfiguration (Mark 9:7) are related, and the implications of the second, "Listen to him," may well have been implicit in the first. The scene is prophetic, as the association with Moses and Elijah suggests, though Luke has introduced a wholly new idea in 9:31-32: their conversation concerned Jesus' "exodus" from this life, to "enter into his glory" permanently (Luke 24:26). The Markan narrative may be composite; 9:5-6 (or even 4-6) may be secondary. Peter's words were admittedly irrelevant (vs. 6), and their purpose is apparently to emphasize the terror occasioned by the supernatural phenomenon. Some scholars interpret the incident as a postresurrection appearance of Jesus predated to the Galilean ministry; but whatever its origin, in the tradition, the story as now presented is an anticipation of the "glory that shall be" when Jesus has risen from the dead. Luke, of course, edits the passage with his central section in mind (cf. 9:51).

5. The question of messiahship. a. The journey to Caesarea Philippi. It is significant that according to the Synoptics (unlike the Fourth Gospel), Jesus did no "mighty works" of healing or exorcism outside Galilee, except for the healing of the Syrophoenician girl (Mark 7:24-30)—none in Judea except Bartimaeus at Jericho, where Mark represents him as teaching (10:1; 11:18; 12:1, 38). The journeys to the region of Tyre and Sidon (Mark 7:24) and Caesarea Philippi (8:27) were clearly not for the purpose of evangelizing the Gentiles, since Jesus preferred not to be recognized. Some writers have held that Jesus fled from Herod Antipas, thus acknowledging that his Galilean ministry had failed; others that he went away for a rest (as in Mark 6:31). The simple fact is, we do not know why he went away. It has been suspected that the journey to Tyre and Sidon was described in order to justify the reference in Luke 10:13-14; but the latter is from Q, and the logic of the connection is hard to see. The Phoenician cities did not, as a matter of fact, repent, any more than ancient Nineveh at Jonah's preaching. The journey to Caesarea Philippi, like Jesus' withdrawal beyond the Jordan in John 10:40, may have been a "retreat"; but the evidence is lacking. Jesus' question, addressed to the disciples: "Who do men say that I am?" (Mark 8:27), and especially the answers: "John the Baptist," or "Elijah," or "one of the prophets," remind us of Herod's quandary (6:14-16). In the eyes of his contemporaries, even of his disciples, Jesus was a prophet, which meant an authorized and authoritative representative of God. If he was something even more, as some suspected—i.e., the Messiah—it is clear from the Synoptics that Jesus made no public claim to either the title or the office.

All the more singular then is the passage relating Peter's confession of faith (Mark 8:27-33), with Jesus' apparent acceptance of the description (which Matthew elaborates in 16:17-19) followed by the stern charge that they were to say nothing about it. This may, of course, be due to the theory of the "messianic secret" which Mark held (cf. 3:12; 9:9; etc.), but it is equally probable that Jesus had no intention of fulfilling the ancient hope of a great king who should arise, free the nation, destroy their enemies, restore its old boundaries, mount the throne of David, and thenceforth reign in bliss for many years—or forever—over a happy people. The "messianic hope" was too earth-bound, too this-worldly, too materialistic, even jingoistic, to match Jesus' concept of the kingdom of God. The modern insistence upon the historical reality of Jesus' "messianic consciousness" overlooks this fact, and also the fact that there is no direct line between Jesus' "messiahship" and the "divinity" of Christ. A great many impostors, both ancient and modern, have had a "messianic" consciousness. Jesus was something different, and far profounder, in his meaning for the world and for man's salvation. When Jesus rebuked Peter for protesting against his approaching rejection and death (Mark 8:32-33), it became clear that what Peter—and others—meant by messiahship was not at all Jesus' concept of his mission. It is in this light that the question in Mark 12:35-37*a:* "How can the Messiah be the Son of David?" is to be understood. Although the popular acclamation identified him with this coming nationalistic deliverer (cf. Mark 10:47-48; 11:9-10; for the interpretation, see Matt. 21:9, 15; Luke 19:38), and although the conviction of Jesus' descent from David was deeply embedded in Christian tradition, as Rom. 1:3 and the genealogies in Luke and Matthew show, it is clear that Jesus himself laid no emphasis upon it. Too many would-be deliverers claimed royal descent, and proved by their actions how remote were their aims from the true purposes of God. Jesus' aim was certainly nonpolitical (see the passage about tribute to Caesar: Mark 12:13-17).

b. Jesus did not proclaim his messiahship. Unlike some other religious leaders of the time, and unlike the portrayal in John, Jesus (according to the Synoptics) does not make himself the center of his teaching or demand submission or loyalty to himself as a condition of acceptance or admission to the kingdom of God. (The sayings that deal with loyalty in persecution even to the point of death obviously reflect the conditions of the early church, faced with opposition and the threat of extermination by either the Jewish synagogue or the Roman state or by both.) His whole concern was with the kingdom of God and its coming. The passion predictions (Mark 8:31; 9:31; 10:32-34 and parallels) are totally ignored in the narrative that follows, especially the passion narrative; they are not only based on the passion narrative itself, as brief summaries of the leading facts, but are projected backward into the Galilean ministry by Mark, presumably in order to show that Jesus was not taken unawares in Jerusalem and that he knew in advance what he was doing. But such incidental statements as those in Matt. 28:17; Mark 14:29, 31, 32-42, 47; 16:1, 3, 8; Luke 24:11, 21, are impossible on the assumption that the disciples had ever heard the three passion announcements.

Nor is the messianic claim the real ground of Jesus' condemnation, either by the Jewish authorities in Mark 14:53-65 or before the Roman governor in 15:1-5; in both cases the charge is trumped up and garbled, to make out Jesus a revolutionist or insurrectionist, as Luke 23:1-25 and even the passion narrative in John make clear. Moreover, the Synoptic accounts of Jesus' teaching contain no emphasis on his messiahship (as in John), but only the narratives of his life.

The reason for this distinction is probably Mark's interest in showing that Jesus was already Messiah during his earthly life, and that he acted accordingly; Mark was not interested in Jesus' teaching. When the later Synoptists revise and supplement Mark with material on Jesus' teaching, they do not edit it in the messianic direction. For the fundamental conviction of the earliest church was that Jesus became Messiah at his resurrection from the dead (Acts 2:36; Rom. 1:4), and Mark's theory of the secret messiahship during his preceding lifetime cannot really alter this principle.

c. The "Great Thanksgiving." Such a "christological" section, perhaps hymn, as the Great Thanksgiving (Matt. 11:25-27; Luke 10:21-22) is unique in the Synoptics, and sounds more like the discourses in John (cf. John 10:15). The "babes" are those of I Cor. 1:18–3:2, and of the central discipleship sequence in Mark (e.g., 9:42; see also Matt. 18:1-5, 6, 10, 14). The hymn is not Gnostic, though Luke reads almost as if it were: "No one knows who the Son is" (Marcion's variant, "No one knew," is Gnostic). For the phrase "to know God" is perfectly biblical (cf. Isa. 11:9; Jer. 22:16; 31:34; Hos. 6:6; John 17:3), whereas "to know who [he] is" imports a speculative, metaphysical, nonbiblical, Gnostic turn of thought into the expression. The continuation of the hymn in a third stanza (Matt. 11:28-30) based on Ecclesiasticus 24:19-22; 51:23-24 (cf. Pss. Sol. 7:9) perhaps indicates the origin of the passage in early Christian devotion and meditation, like much of the material (also poetic) in the discourses of the Fourth Gospel. Finally, the blessing of Peter in Matt. 16:17-19, which implies a fully "messianic" consciousness and purpose on Jesus' part, is now widely recognized to be a bit of pious theorizing or fancy, in the interest of the supreme authority of Peter as the Christian interpreter of the law and the expounder of Christian duty, who possessed the right "to bind and to loose"—in the early Palestinian or Antiochene church, where Peter might have become the first pope, had Rome not claimed him. Cognate material on Peter is also found in Matthew, and even in Mark. But (see § E3*d above*) the total neglect or ignoring of this passage in the other gospels, and also especially in Acts and the Pauline letters, is sufficient proof of its apocryphal character.

As Origen observed long ago (Against Celsus I.48): "The whole life of Jesus proves that he avoided speaking of himself. . . . He preferred to make himself known as Messiah more by his works than by his words." His purpose was purely religious, and his submission to the will of God was complete. It is "out of character" when Jesus is represented as demanding submission to his own messianic authority, or even as claiming to be the Messiah. What was to be his own position in the coming kingdom he left entirely in the hands of God. It was the kingdom, not his own position in it, which was his sole and exclusive concern.

d. Jesus' authority as a teacher. Much has been made of the solemn tone of Jesus' reiterated pronouncements in the Sermon on the Mount: "You have heard that it was said. . . . But I say to you . . ." (Matt. 5:22, 28, 32, 34, 39, 44—from M), as if Jesus were asserting his own personal authority, superior to that of Moses. Perhaps this was the view of the author or compiler of Matthew, who viewed Jesus as the "second Moses" or "greater than Moses"; but in English translation it is largely the effect of the archaic King James Version, and was no doubt intentional, as the seventeenth-century translators shared the view. But in the tradition behind Matthew there was no emphasis on the speaker's own authority as contrasted with some other—as may be seen elsewhere in the gospels: e.g., Luke 10:24; 11:51; 12:4-5, 8, 22, 27, 37, 44, 59; 13:3, 5; 18:14; etc. Even in Matt. 5, and elsewhere in the Sermon on the Mount, the same manner of speech (i.e., with no contrasting emphasis) is found: e.g., 5:18, 20, 26; 6:2, 5, 16, 25, 29, etc. Even in the Fourth Gospel the striking "Truly, truly, I tell you" may be a final echo of this characteristic manner of speaking—too heavily stylized in the archaic translation: "Verily, verily, I say unto you." In such a turn of expression the human Jesus still stands before us, with his emphasis, which is not on personal authority but on the truth of what he is saying: "But, I tell you. . . ." In fact, this characteristic human tone carries far more weight than the formal "I say" or "It is I who say." It is a mistake to look for support of a theological doctrine (the divinity of Christ) in an archaic example of overtranslation. One does not do the same in interpreting Paul and other ancient writers (see I Cor. 7:29; 15:50; etc.).

There is no question that Jesus viewed himself and was viewed by others as a prophet; even incidental notes in both the discourses and the narratives of the gospels reflect this fact. But it is a question whether or not he also thought of himself as the Messiah—this would not be an alternative to the prophetic call, but an addition to it—for the texts which suggest it are open to question, and several of them are undoubtedly secondary and editorial. Further, the passages which represent Jesus as a prophet are clear and consistent, whereas those which represent him as claiming messiahship are not. The conception of messiahship ranges all the way from the nationalistic "son of David" type to the exalted "Son of man" conception found in Daniel and Enoch—it is a question if this latter conception should be called "messianic." If a choice must be made, it is probable that the first of these goes back to Jesus himself, while the second is due to the attribution to him of the exalted office of Judge at the Last Judgment, by others, especially in the early Palestinian church, perhaps even in Galilee.

Although the title "rabbi" is given to Jesus in the gospels, it is not probable that the title was in common use before the reorganization of the Jewish schools after the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. Mark uses it in 9:5; 10:51; 11:21; 14:45; but the usage was rare, and the RSV correctly translates it "Master." It was essentially an academic term, "my teacher"; and although Jesus was a teacher, with disciples who accompanied him, and expounded the scripture, and debated with the scribes, it is much more probable that he was viewed, in his own lifetime, as a "wisdom" teacher—i.e., a lay teacher of religion, not a professional rabbi. The same is true of Paul, who deserves the title even less; he had no students or disciples, and no tradition (in the usual sense), and, like Jesus, his attitude toward the Law can never have been the characteristic rabbinic or scholastic attitude.

G. THE DEATH OF JESUS. 1. The forces against him. Although the Gospel of John represents Jesus as actively engaged in teaching and "performing signs," and debating with the Jewish authorities in Jerusalem, chiefly in the temple, the Synoptics describe him as centering his ministry in Galilee, and going to Jerusalem only for the final Passover. Even Mark pictures him as going up to the city as if walking in a dream (Mark 10:32), "as one whom a dream hath possessed," bent on laying down his life there as the "ransom for many." But it is doubtful if this can be harmonized with the actual events described in the passion narrative. Instead, Jesus is aware of the dangers confronting him, but does not flinch; he has faced opposition, even royal opposition, before (Luke 13:31). Like the men chosen for a raid behind enemy lines, or those in a flying squadron sent on a forlorn mission, he knows that the prospects are against his return to Galilee. But that he actually courted death, or went up to Jerusalem knowing that he was to die, seems suicidal and—as a part of the gospel story—unreal.

The forces arrayed against him were powerful: the scribes, jealous of his influence with the people and resentful of his independent exposition of the Scriptures, and of his criticism of their methods and their traditions; the Pharisees, stung by his riddling exposure of their weaknesses and failures; Herod Antipas, suspicious of Jesus' possible connection with the Zealots or with John the Baptist; the Sadducees, equally suspicious, and roused to fury by his interference with the routine of the temple worship; the Romans, concerned only with peace and security; and Pilate, concerned chiefly over his own waning popularity with the Jews—he had twice already driven them to riot, once over the introduction of the idolatrous legionary standards into Jerusalem, and once when he laid hands on the sacred treasure in the temple in order to build an aqueduct. Hence it was not surprising that Jesus faced the possibility, even the probability, of death at their hands.

2. Jesus in Jerusalem. According to Luke and Matthew (not Mark), the TRIUMPHAL ENTRY into Jerualem was followed at once by the "cleansing" of the temple, when Jesus drove the tradesmen and their wares out of the sacred enclosure, and refused to permit anyone to carry a vessel through the outer court—a casual profanation of the shrine by making it a short cut (Matt. 21:10-17; Mark 11:11, 15-19; Luke 19:45-48). This was an act which any OT prophet might have undertaken, though the early Christians no doubt viewed it as messianic (cf. Mal. 3:1*b*). Immediately, the temple authorities interrogated him, and he characteristically answered them with a question: By what authority did John [the Baptist] act? (Mark 11:27-33). It was a question they found inconvenient to answer. His teaching in the temple, according to Mark, was chiefly controversial, beginning with the parable of the wicked tenants (12:1-12), which was obviously aimed at the religious authorities. In its present form, it has been considerably edited, in an allegorical direction, not only by Luke and Matthew but even by Mark. The question over tribute to Caesar (Mark 12:13-17) was clearly designed to answer his dilemma over authority (11:28-30) by an even more serious one, since it required an answer which would either end his popularity or throw him into the hands of the Romans. But Jesus replied that both Caesar's demands and God's are to be met—Caesar's, which are not many (a few denarii), and God's, which are the whole of life.

The question regarding the RESURRECTION is also located here by Mark (12:18-27) and the other Synoptists. In his answer Jesus proves by their own methods of exegesis that the Torah itself teaches the survival of the departed, and therefore their resurrection, but not in a mundane or material sense as a mere restoration to earthly conditions or relations. The question of the Great Commandment which follows (Mark 12:28-34) ends the series of controversies and questions, in Mark, and shows the agreement of at least one scribe with Jesus' teaching, and his recognition that the love of God and of one's neighbor "is much more than all whole burnt offerings and sacrifices"—a remarkable admission in the very presence of Israel's sacrificial system. Jesus' commendation: "You are not far from the kingdom of God," is a pacific close to the incident, but the mood lasts only momentarily. The question of Jesus: "How can the scribes say that the Christ [the Messiah] is the son of David?" (Mark 12:35-37*a*), followed by the discourse against the scribes (37*b*-40, greatly enlarged in Matt. 23:1-36), the remark about the widow's offering of two "mites" (the smallest copper coins), and the prediction of the coming destruction of the temple (Mark 12:41–13:4), completes the setting for the passion narrative. It is painted in the darkest colors of which the evangelists are capable. (The Synoptic Apocalypse, Mark 13 and parallels, is an interlude; this was the only possible place for the material, in Mark's arrangement of the tradition.)

3. The Last Supper. The passion narrative proper opens with the plot of the Jewish authorities (Mark 14:1-2) to get rid of Jesus before the Passover, and Judas' agreement (vss. 10-11) to hand over Jesus to them secretly. Mark's basic narrative, derived, no doubt, from the old Roman passion narrative, is amplified by a series of insertions, such as the anointing in Bethany (vss. 3-9), and the preparation for the Passover (vss. 12-16, closely resembling the preparation for the Triumphal Entry in 11:1-7); but it must have contained the account of the LAST SUPPER (14: 17-25), which was probably known to all Gentile Christians from the beginning (cf. I Cor. 11:23-26). Despite Mark's editorial treatment (vss. 12-16), this was probably not a Passover meal, but simply Jesus' last meal with his disciples—there is no mention of lamb or unleavened bread, and other features in the Passover meal are missing. The tone of vs. 25 is thoroughly eschatological, far more so than the similar note in the Passover Seder. Jesus' whole ministry of teaching, healing, preaching, and preparation for the kingdom of God had now reached a climax and crisis: if he was to die, it was not because his mission had been a failure, but only because the purposes of God led another way than the one he had anticipated. If the world—or the present order—was to end with his death (a note found in a late-first-century apocalypse, IV Ezra [=II Esdras] 7:29 ff: "My son the Messiah shall die, and all who draw human breath. . . . And after seven days the world, which is not yet awake, shall be roused"), God's purpose of redemption nevertheless still held good, and he would "drink the fruit of the vine" with the disciples once more "in the kingdom of God."

The whole purpose of the sacramental "institution" is clear from these words: Jesus is binding his disciples to himself, and himself to them, with bonds which even death cannot break or weaken. If he is to die, so are they. If the end of the age has finally arrived, they must together face the great transition. If the prospect of death now faces them, so also does the promise of resurrection. Apparent defeat is really the beginning of triumph—death is in fact only the mode, God's method, of bringing about the victory. Such invincible faith is the spirit, not only of the supper, but of the whole gospel of Jesus, and of the beginning of the Christian religion. The tense atmosphere of the hour, electric with powerful eschatological expectancy and surrounded by the dark night of earthly and demonic hostility (cf. John 13: 30), still breathes in the passage about the two swords (Luke 22:35-38). Jesus speaks ironically: danger is abroad, you must go armed; now not only make for yourselves "purses that wax not old" (Luke 12:33) but a sword as well—the sword of the Spirit, as a later apostle said, and the breastplate of faith; for their battle is not with flesh and blood but with the principalities and the powers, the rulers of darkness who are closing in on them. But still they do not understand (Mark 8:21). "Here are two swords," they tell him, and he replies: "It is enough." As Chrysostom explained, this laconic reply only meant, "What an utterly insignificant arsenal!"

4. The arrest and Jewish "trial." After the supper the band withdrew to the Garden of Gethsemane, across the Kidron Valley on the E side of Jerusalem, where Jesus was wont to spend the night (John 18:1-2). It lay on the W slope of the Mount of Olives (Mark 14:26). Here Judas followed them with his rabble of slaves and temple police from the high priest's household, seized Jesus, and led him to the house of Annas, the old high priest, where the junto of high priests and members of the Sanhedrin was gathered. Although Mark represents the scene as a session of the SANHEDRIN, proceeding by orderly steps to a legal trial (14:53-65), a representation which Matthew and Luke follow, it is probable that the account in the Fourth Gospel is to be preferred (John 18:12-24). The so-called "Jewish trial," described in the Synoptics, contravenes Jewish legal procedure (as set forth in the Mishna, tractate Sanhedrin) at several important points, and implies that the Sanhedrin still possessed the right to try capital cases—which the rabbinic tradition denies for approximately this period ("forty years before the fall of Jerusalem"). But in John, the "trial" is only a private examination by the high priest, in which Jesus is asked about "his disciples and his teaching," whereupon Jesus replies that he has done nothing in secret, and that his teaching is well known (vss. 19-21). It is not strange that the early Christian tradition was ill informed on the subject. The hints contained in the Gospel of John as to the sources of its information (John 18:15-16, 26) are impressive, as is the whole story in John, including the chronology.

5. The Roman trial and the Crucifixion. But with the Roman trial the situation is different: in spite of editorial revisions, especially by Luke and John, the basic story is the same in John and the Synoptics. Pilate is informed that Jesus is an agitator and insurrectionist claiming to be "King of the Jews," and therefore a dangerous plotter against the Roman military regime in Palestine. Luke also states that they charged him with interfering in the collection of tribute (Luke 23:2; κωλύων means more than "forbidding"). But Pilate is not impressed. When he asks

Jesus if he is "the king of the Jews," Jesus replies: "You have said so"—which may mean either "Would you say so?" or "That is what you say," as well as "Yes, I am." (Cf. Luke 22:70 and Mark 14:62 in some MSS: "You say that I am"—which Luke certainly understands as an affirmation; but here, in all three Synoptics, the reply seems inconclusive, and Pilate ignores it.) Since Jesus made no further answer (Mark 15:5), Pilate informed the Jewish leaders that he found Jesus guiltless of the charges. But after three unsuccessful attempts to free his prisoner (the maneuver of sending him to Antipas is found only in Luke [23:6-16]), Pilate yields to the insistence of the high priests and elders, supported now by an excited mob, and orders Jesus scourged and crucified.

This was a most horrible, agonizing death, usually taking several days, during which the dehydrated body of the victim, exposed to sun and air, gradually shriveled. Only the most vicious criminals, traitors, brigands, and public enemies were condemned to this mode of execution. Sometimes their bodies were nailed, usually only tied, to low crosses, barely off the ground; and a guard was set to watch them and see that they did not escape or were not rescued by friends and accomplices. Along with Jesus were executed two "robbers" (Mark 15:27), really insurrectionists, as Josephus uses the term (cf. vs. 7).

The location of the scene was just outside one of the N gates of Jerusalem, on a hill called Golgotha ("Place of a Skull"). Mark gives the time, 9 A.M., and adds that from 12 to 3 there was darkness over the whole land (vss. 25, 33). Some of Mark's details, and more of Matthew's, Luke's, and John's, are derived from the OT, which to the early Christians was exactly as reliable and authentic a source as their own local tradition or the earliest written accounts of the Passion. One such detail may be the "cry of dereliction" (Mark 15:34), which is quoted from Ps. 22:1, but which some scholars take to be the proof that Jesus was reciting the Psalms as he hung on the cross, as Columban recited the Psalter standing waist deep in the cold river. But even so, it was not Jesus' last word. Mark says that he died with a mighty shout—of victory (vs. 37). Luke (23:46) keeps the victorious cry, but adds the words: "Father, into thy hands I commit my spirit!"—another verse from the Psalms (Ps. 31:5), and one which is surely by far the most appropriate, as it continues: "Thou hast redeemed me, O LORD, faithful God."

6. The Resurrection. The burial of Jesus was in a nearby garden, in a new grave or sepulchre belonging to a secret disciple, JOSEPH OF ARIMATHEA (Mark 15:42-47; John 19:38-42). The burial was only temporary, as the sabbath was now drawing near. When the sabbath was over, Jesus' women disciples would come and bury him permanently, with spices and ointments (Mark 15:47; 16:1). But when they arrived, as the story is told in the Synoptics, they found the tomb empty and were told by angels (Matthew: "an angel"; Mark: "a young man"; Luke: "two men"; John omits) that Jesus was risen. In Mark and Matthew, the women are bidden to go and tell the disciples that Jesus is preceding them on the way to Galilee. Luke alters this to read: "Remember what he told you, while he was still in Galilee"—viz., that he must die and rise again. In John there is no angel, and Jesus makes himself known, not to the disciples, but to Mary Magdalene—in one of the most beautiful and touching stories in all religious literature (John 20:1-18).

It is clear that several strands of tradition have been woven together in the Easter story. Luke's revision is motivated by his conviction (see Acts 1:4, 12, 14) that the disciples actually remained in Jerusalem, and did not return to Galilee. Matthew tries to fill out what seems missing in Mark's brief account (breaking off at 16:8, where the women, in spite of vs. 7, "said nothing to anyone"), and recounts an appearance of Jesus in Galilee (Matt. 28:16-20). Luke amplifies with the sublime story of the walk to Emmaus (24:13-35), followed by the appearance of Christ in Jerusalem (vss. 36-49), and the Ascension (vss. 50-53). Someone in the second century completed Mark's brief narrative of the open tomb with material (the longer ending in 16:9-20) taken from the other three canonical gospels, and even from Acts; while still another—or others—added the shorter ending (see RSV): "But they reported briefly to Peter and those with him all that they had been told. And after this, Jesus himself sent out by means of them, from east to west, the sacred and imperishable proclamation of eternal salvation." In addition to all this, the Washington MS, supported by certain Greek MSS referred to by Jerome in his Against the Pelagians II.15, has a long interpolation between vss. 14 and 15. See MARK, GOSPEL OF.

7. Theories of the Resurrection. It is not strange, accordingly, that various theories of the Resurrection have been propounded. In the age of rationalism, one popular theory explained Jesus' revival or resurrection as the effect of a night of rest in a cool rock tomb, which promptly restored the energies of a vigorous young man—a carpenter!—who had been on the cross for only six hours at most.

Early in the era of modern "psychological" interpretation, it was explained that a hysterical young woman, Mary of Magdala, who was in love with Jesus, came to the garden in the misty April morning, looking for his tomb, and finding one that happened to be open, immediately fell under the hallucination that the gardener (also astir at an early hour) was her lost Lord and Master.

Still other theories have been advanced, none of them very convincing, for they all assume a wholly corporeal idea of the risen body of Christ, quite contrary to the NT concept. The true starting point, for the earliest account of the Resurrection and the earliest conception of it, is I Cor. 15:3-8, where Paul lists in a series the appearances of the risen Lord to his disciples, and includes the manifestation to himself as the last in the series. This appearance of the risen Christ is described by Luke in Acts 9:3-7, but is only briefly hinted at by Paul in Gal. 1:11-17, where it is clearly a "revelation" (vs. 12: ἀποκάλυψις). In I Cor. 15:3-8, Paul uses the term which in the Greek OT (Paul's Bible) is repeatedly used for divine self-manifestations or theophanies, and which, when God or some supernatural being, such as an angel, is involved, never means "was seen by" but "made himself seen by"—i.e., "appeared to" (ὤφθη, a technical term in the "Jewish Greek" which the early church took over and made its own).

It is, therefore, a great mistake in interpretation to ignore the out-and-out supernatural character of the Resurrection, and try to explain it in some naturalistic way; it is equally a mistake to reduce the Resurrection to a mere revival or resuscitation of the body of Jesus, as "resurrected from the grave," reanimated, and merely transfigured or equipped with supernatural faculties or powers. Paul sounds the right note when he insists that "Christ being raised from the dead will never die again; death no longer has dominion over him" (Rom. 6:9). Hence "if any one is in Christ, he is a new creature," or, "there is the new creation"—i.e., the "new" creation, which is to take the place of the old, has already begun (II Cor. 5:17). The fulfilment of the gospel, with its eschatological hope, takes place in the "new being," the new existence which comes to pass "in Christ," and which was inaugurated by the event which we still call, inadequately, his "resurrection from the dead." See RESURRECTION OF CHRIST.

Bibliography. On the composition of the four gospels, see F. C. Grant, The Gospels, Their Origin and Their Growth (1957), especially chs. 1-3.

On the relation of Mark's traditions to the early Jewish Christian liturgical year, see P. Carrington, The Primitive Christian Calendar (1952).

On Jesus' ability to communicate to others the powers of the kingdom, see M. Dibelius, Jesus (1949), p. 58.

For the Washington MS interpolation between vss. 14-15 of Mark 16, see A. Huck, Synopsis of the First Three Gospels (1936), p. 213; B. H. Throckmorton, Gospel Parallels (2nd ed., 1957), p. 191.

Other works: E. Renan, Life of Jesus (1863). J. R. Seeley, Ecce Homo (1866). G. Dalman, The Words of Jesus (1902). O. Holtzmann, The Life of Jesus (1904). W. Sanday, The Life of Christ in Recent Research (1907); Outlines of the Life of Christ (rev. ed., 1908). A. Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus (1910). T. R. Glover, The Jesus of History (1917). V. Taylor, The Historical Evidence for the Virgin Birth (1920). E. F. Scott, The Ethical Teaching of Jesus (1924). J. Klausner, Jesus of Nazareth (1925). F. C. Grant, The Economic Background of the Gospels (1926). W. Bauer, "Jesus der Galiläer," Festgabe für Adolf Jülicher (1927). S. J. Case, Jesus, a New Biography (1927). M. Goguel, Au seuil de l'évangile: Jean Baptiste (1928). B. S. Easton, Christ in the Gospels (1930). B. H. Branscomb, Jesus and the Law of Moses (1930); The Teachings of Jesus (1931). T. W. Manson, The Teaching of Jesus (1931). R. Bultmann, Jesus and the Word (1934). M. Dibelius, From Tradition to Gospel (1934); Gospel Criticism and Christology (1935). C. H. Dodd, The Parables of the Kingdom (1935). C. A. H. Guignebert, Jesus (1935). H. J. Cadbury, The Peril of Modernizing Jesus (1937). J. Héring, Le royaume de Dieu et sa venue (1937). J. Weiss, The History of Primitive Christianity, bk. I (2 vols.; 1937). B. S. Easton, What Jesus Taught (1938). L. Finkelstein, The Pharisees (2 vols.; 1938). P. Gardner-Smith, The Christ of the Gospels (1938). M.-J. Lagrange, The Gospel of Jesus Christ (2 vols.; 1938). M. Dibelius, The Message of Jesus Christ (1939). F. C. Grant, The Gospel of the Kingdom (1940). C. C. McCown, The Search for the Real Jesus (1940). D. E. Adams, Man of God (1941). J. Knox, The Man Christ Jesus (1941). A. Richardson, The Miracle Stories in the Gospels (1941). A. T. Olmstead, Jesus in the Light of History (1942). F. C. Grant, The Earliest Gospel (1943); An Introduction to NT Thought (1943). H. B. Sharman, Son of Man and Kingdom of God (1943). J. Knox, Christ the Lord (1945); On the Meaning of Christ (1947). M. Dibelius, Jesus (1949). T. W. Manson, The Sayings of Jesus (1949). R. H. Pfeiffer, History of NT Times (1949). M. Goguel, The Life of Jesus (1950). E. J. Goodspeed, A Life of Jesus (1950). A. N. Wilder, Eschatology and Ethics in the Teaching of Jesus (new ed., 1950). H. Windisch, The Meaning of the Sermon on the Mount (1951). J. Jeremias, The Parables of Jesus (1955). G. Bornkamm, Jesus von Nazareth (1956). O. Cullmann, The State in the NT (1956). W. R. Farmer, Maccabees, Zealots, and Josephus (1956). S. M. Gilmour, The Gospel Jesus Preached (1957). S. E. Johnson, Jesus in His Homeland (1957). J. Knox, The Death of Christ (1958). F. C. Grant, Ancient Judaism and the NT (1959), pt. III.

F. C. GRANT

JETHER jē'thər [יתר, abundance; this form appears once (Exod. 4:18) for יתרו (JETHRO)]. 1. The oldest son of Gideon, one of the "judges" during Israel's period of settlement in Canaan. Jether was commanded by his father to slay the prisoners Zebah and Zalmunna, the "kings of Midian." He was afraid, however, and Gideon performed the act himself; the prisoners were spared the humiliation of execution by a boy (Judg. 8:20-21).

2. An Ishmaelite; father or ancestor of Amasa, whom Absalom, David's son, made commander of the army when Absalom rebelled against David (I Kings 2:5, 32; I Chr. 2:17). In II Sam. 17:25 he is called Ithra (יתרא).

3. A descendant of the tribe of Jerahmeel (I Chr. 2:32).

4. Son of a certain Ezrah mentioned in a list of descendants of Judah (I Chr. 4:17).

5. A descendant of the tribe of Asher (I Chr. 7:38); probably the same as Ithran (יתרן) in vs. 37.

B. T. DAHLBERG

JETHETH jē'thĕth [יתת; LXX A Ιεβερ, LXX B and Luc. Ιεθερ, in Gen. 36:40; LXX A Ιεθεθ, LXX B Ιεθετ, Luc. Ιεθερ, in I Chr. 1:51]. An Edomite clan chief; or perhaps "chief of Jepheth."

JETHLAH. KJV form of ITHLAH.

JETHRO jĕth'rō [יתרו, יתר]. Priest of Midian; the father-in-law of Moses (Exod. 3:1; 4:18; 18:1-2, 5-6, 12).

Moses' initial flight from Egypt led him to the land of Midian, where his protection of seven shepherdesses at a well subsequently brought him the hospitality of their father, Jethro, the priest of MIDIAN. Here Moses found not only refuge but also a bride, Zipporah, one of the seven daughters, and employment as shepherd for his father-in-law. The name of the deity Jethro served as priest is not explicitly disclosed, but when Jethro later met Moses and the Israelites after their exodus from Egypt, he affirmed that "Yahweh is greater than all gods" (Exod. 18:11). It is the combination of these roles of priest and father-in-law that makes Jethro of such moment in the story of Moses.

Tradition preserves two names, Hobab and Jethro, for the father-in-law of Moses. HOBAB evidently belongs to the J source and Jethro to the E. The name REUEL, which appears in the story of Moses' protection of the seven shepherdesses (Exod. 2:18), is apparently a misreading of the reference in Num. 10:29 to "Hobab the son of Reuel the Midianite, Moses' father-in-law." The J tradition records Moses' attempts to persuade his father-in-law to accompany the Israelites as guide through the wilderness to the Promised Land (Num. 10:29-32), but E reports only that Jethro "went his way to his own country" (Exod. 18:27). The early attachment of KENITES to Israel (Judg. 1:16; 4:11) is connected with their descent from Hobab, Moses' Kenite father-in-law

(J). Such information suggests that the father-in-law belonged to a Kenite ("smith") clan of Midianites and that he migrated with the Israelites to the Promised Land.

The figure of Jethro has attracted most attention, however, because of attempts to identify his priesthood as exercised in a pre-Mosiac Yahweh cult. According to this hypothesis, Yahweh was the tribal god of the Midianites or Kenites, and it was through his priest Jethro that Moses and the Israelites were introduced to the knowledge and service of Yahweh. Exod. 18 is interpreted as the initiation of Aaron and the elders of Israel into the cult of Yahweh at a sacrifice "offered" by Jethro (vs. 18; cf. RSV). In this view Israel derives not only cultic ceremony but also legal institutions from the Midianites. Jethro's proposal that Moses lighten his judicial burden by hearing only those cases in which he would "represent the people before God, and bring their cases to God" (vs. 19), is said to involve the introduction of the sacred lot (see LOTS) into Israel. Later Israelite piety, however, attempted to reduce the evidence of Israel's indebtedness to Midian and transformed Jethro in Exod. 18 from missionizing priest to visiting father-in-law escorting his daughter and her two sons to a reunion with Moses (vs. 5).

Undoubtedly, Israel derived cultic and cultural forms from its neighbors, although what the forms meant remained by no means necessarily the same. It is also unlikely that a later age would have invented Moses' intimate connection with Jethro and Midian, in view of the later hostility between Midianites and Israelites (cf. Judg. 6:2; Isa. 9:4—H 9:3). Yet these considerations cannot of themselves establish the validity of the hypothesis that Jethro transmitted Yahwism to Israel. It is significant that Moses did not mention to Jethro the disclosure of Yahweh's name and will after the theophany at the burning bush (Exod. 4:18), and when Jethro met Moses and the Israelites escaped from Egypt, he is repeatedly characterized as father-in-law but only once as priest (Exod. 18). His sacerdotal and hence evangelistic capacity appears distinctly minimized. Yet it remains a startling reminder of the comprehensiveness of OT religion that the initial and perhaps foremost proponent of Yahweh, "whose name is Jealous" (34:14), should have been sheltered, married, employed, and counseled within the precincts of a priest of Midian.

Bibliography. H. Gressmann, "Jethros Besuch bei Mose," Mose und seine Zeit (1913), pp. 161-80; M. Buber, "Jethro," Moses (1946), pp. 94-100. R. F. JOHNSON

JETUR jē′tər [יטור]. A tribe descended from Ishmael (Gen. 25:15; I Chr. 1:31), which was at war with the Israelites of Transjordan (I Chr. 5:19). For its history, see ITURAEA.

JEUEL jo͞o′əl [יעואל]; KJV correctly JEIEL jī′əl [MT יעיאל, God has healed or preserved; cf. Arab. w'j] in II Chr. 29:13; Ezra 8:13. 1. Chief of a father's house; listed among the returned exiles (I Chr. 9:6).

2. One of the Levites who took part in the reforms of King Hezekiah (II Chr. 29:13).

3. One of those who returned with Ezra from Babylon (Ezra 8:13; I Esd. 8:39).

Bibliography. W. Rudolph, Esra und Nehemiah (1949), p. 78. B. T. DAHLBERG

JEUSH jē′ŭsh [יעוש, perhaps may (God) aid; Kethibh יעיש, Qere יעוש, in Gen. 36:5, 14; I Chr. 7:10]; KJV JEHUSH jē′hŭsh in I Chr. 8:39. 1. An eponym; one of the sons of Esau born to him by Oholibamah (Gen. 36:5, 14). He and his brothers became Edomite chiefs (vs. 18; cf. I Chr. 1:35).

2. A Benjaminite, son of Bilhan (I Chr. 7:10).

3. A Benjaminite, son of Eshek, and apparently a descendant of King Saul (I Chr. 8:39).

4. A Gershonite Levite, and the house descended from him (I Chr. 23:10-11).

5. A son of King Rehoboam (II Chr. 11:19).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 196. B. T. DAHLBERG

JEUZ jē′ŭz [יעוץ, possibly encouraged] (I Chr. 8:10). A Benjaminite.

JEW, JEWS, JEWESS jo͞o, jo͞oz, jo͞o′ĭs. In biblical terms, the members of the S state of Judah (Neh. 1:2; Jer. 32:12; 40:11) or the postexilic people of Israel in contrast to Gentiles (Esth. 9:15-19; Dan. 3:8; Zech. 8:23; John 4:9; Acts 14:1) or the adherents of worship of Yahweh as done at Jerusalem after the Exile (see JUDAISM; Esth. 3:4-6; Dan. 3:8).

1. Etymology
2. OT usage
3. NT usage
4. "Jewess"
5. The Jews

Bibliography

1. Etymology. The English word "Jew," as well as the French juif, comes from Old French giu. This undoubtedly derives from the Latin judaeus, which is based on the Greek Ἰουδαίος, an approximate transliteration of the Aramaic יהודאי and Hebrew יהודי.

2. OT usage. In the OT, יהודי ("Jew") is not used for members of the old tribe of Judah or even to distinguish persons of the Southern Kingdom from those of the Northern Kingdom (cf. איש יהודה in I Sam. 11:8; II Sam. 2:4; cf. II Kings 16:6). It is scarcely used until the kingdom of Judah had survived N Israel (II Kings 25:25; Jer. 38:19; 52:28-30). In postexilic times "Jew" refers to a subject of the Babylonian or Persian province of Judah or of the Maccabean state (Esth. 9:15-19; Neh. 4:1—H 3:33; Zech. 8:23; I Macc. 8:20; Jos. Antiq. XI.v.7) in contrast to Gentiles. The term is used to mean a member of the Jewish people or religion (Ezra 4:12; 5:5; Esth. 2:5; cf. especially Esth. 8:17: proselytes).

3. NT usage. In the NT, Ἰουδαίος ("Jew") is used in contrast to "Gentiles" (John 2:6; Acts 14:1), to "Samaritans" (John 4:9), and to "proselytes" (Acts 2:10; cf. John 4:22). This would indicate that "Jew" in the NT is applied to one who is Jewish by both nationality and religion. It would appear that the factor of nationality was the stronger, for Jewish Christians are called Jews (Acts 21:39; Gal. 2:13; cf. John 8:31). On the other hand, one may be called a Jew, not by race or nationality, but because of his faith: "He is a Jew who is one inwardly" (Rom. 2:28-29; cf. Rev. 2:9; 3:9). The NT at times rather indiscriminately speaks of Jews as antagonists to Jesus, his ministry, the gospel, and his followers (Matt. 28:15; John 3:25; 5:10; 6:41, 52; 7:13; 8:48-57; 9:18, 22; 10:19, 31; 11:37; 12:10, 37; II Cor. 11:24; I Thess. 2:14-16; etc.). While this is particularly true in the Gospel of John, even here an attitude favorable to Jesus is evidenced among the Jews (11:33-36; 12:9-11; cf. 3:1) in contrast to their leaders (8:13, 16; 12:10, 19; 18:3, 12, 14).

4. "Jewess." This word occurs only once in the Bible (Ἰουδαία; Acts 24:24), for Drusilla, the wife of Felix. Timothy's mother is called a "Jewish woman who was a believer" (Acts 16:1). Mered's "other wife" is referred to as "his Jewish wife" in contrast to Bithiah, the daughter of Pharaoh (I Chr. 4:18). "Judith" (יהודית) is the name of Esau's wife, the daughter of Beeri the Hittite, as well as of the heroine of the apocryphal work Judith.

5. The Jews. As shown above, the usage of the term "Jew" was very fluid even in biblical times. It does not refer exclusively to members of the tribe of Judah. While it is freely used to indicate national origin, this usage begins only after the southern kingdom of Judah had survived the northern kingdom of Israel in the seventh century B.C. Soon, however, one was called a Jew, regardless of nationality, if he adhered to Judaism. Nonetheless, religion did not become the sole criterion by which to call oneself a Jew, as noted in the OT and NT passages (§§ 2-3 above), for proselytes were often distinguished as such, while those of racial or national origin were distinguished as Jews.

Today the term is even more fluid. There are Jews both by religion and by birth, by religion but not by birth, and by birth but not by religion. Race, nationality, physical type, language, culture, belief—none of these nor any combination of these will distinguish or identify the Jew. While it is without question that the Jews represent a clearly traceable continuum in the history of mankind, there is no least common denominator for the some twelve million people today who call themselves Jews. Indeed, perhaps the best that can be said is that he is a Jew who says he is.

Bibliography. J. Jacobs, "Jew (the Word)," Jewish Encyclopedia, VII (1904), 174-75; R. B. Gittelsohn, "What Is a Jew?" Modern Jewish Problems (1943), pp. 8-29; M. J. Herskovits, "Who Are the Jews?" in L. Finkelstein, ed., The Jews, II (1949), 1151-71; J. R. Marcus, Early American Jewry, vol. I (1951), p. viii. J. A. SANDERS

JEWELER [חרש אבן, artificer of stone] (Exod. 28:11); KJV ENGRAVER. An artificer who cut inscriptions on precious stones. See ART; ENGRAVING; JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES.

JEWELS AND PRECIOUS STONES. Stones valued for rarity, beauty, or association, especially stones polished, cut, or engraved for use as ornaments; gems. The word כלי (lit., "thing," "anything made") is used specifically for "jewel" or "jewelry." אבנים יקרות, "precious or costly stones," refers to costly building stones and other objects, as well as jewels.

Pl. XVII.

1. General observations concerning jewels in the Bible
   a. Early reasons for regarding stones as precious
   b. Archaeological evidence for the quantity and sources of jewels and for the extent and processes of their manufacture
   c. Difficulties in making specific and accurate identification of jewels
2. Jewels named in the Bible and relevant archaeologically known materials
3. Noteworthy jewel passages
   a. Exod. 28:17-21; 39:10-14
   b. Job 28:12-19
   c. Ezek. 28:12-19
   d. Isa. 54:12
   e. Lists of precious stones
4. Rev. 21:19-20 and the symbolism of precious stones
   a. Precious stones and theophany
   b. Interpretation of the twelve stones in Philo and Josephus
   c. The heavenly city, New Jerusalem, and paradise

Bibliography

1. General observations concerning jewels in the Bible. a. Early reasons for regarding stones as precious. Gems, according to Pliny (died A.D. 79), are the concentrated beauty of the world. Aesthetic appreciation was probably not the earliest motivation for acquiring, preparing, and wearing stones. The desire for personal adornment (see DRESS AND ORNAMENTS) may have come first. Some think the early use of jewels was intended to secure for the wearer magical benefits associated with the stones (see AMULETS). The Egyptian Book of the Dead (ca. 1500 B.C.) refers to amulets in heart shapes made of lapis lazuli, green feldspar, carnelian, and serpentine. The Lithica poem of Orpheus (second century B.C.) tells of the magical properties of gems. The "magic stone" (אבן חן) which causes everything to prosper (Prov. 17:8) is suggestive of the amuletic power of jewels, but this idea is rarely found in biblical texts. With the beginnings of personal property and business, social, and political relations, the need on the part of unlettered folk to identify personal possessions, agreements, and communications caused stones to be prized as materials for SEALS AND SCARABS. One of the safest and soundest ways the ancients had to conserve great wealth was investment in jewels. They fluctuated little in value, could be readily sold if need be; they were light and small in size and could be readily carried or hidden away. Regard for jewels is likely to have been prompted in antiquity, as it has been at other times, for a variety of reasons.

b. Archaeological evidence for the quantity and sources of jewels and for the extent and processes of their manufacture. The Hebrew language does not have one specific word for "jewel"; it is only by context that the word usually translated "jewel," כלי, meaning "made or manufactured thing," has that significance; in Prov. 25:12; Song of S. 7:1—H 7:2 another word (חלי; plural חלאים) is used which means rather generally "ornament," as translated in the former passage. "Precious stones" is an original Hebrew expression which has come into the English language by Bible translations. The phrase itself appears fourteen times in the RSV, and there are other synonymous expressions such as "stones of remembrance," "costly stones," "stones for setting," "stones of fire," "precious jewel," "most rare jewel," "fair jewels," and "fine jewels." Job 28:10 is understood by some to affirm that God's "eye" has seen "every precious thing" (יקר)—i.e., every jewel. If one considers further the numerous references to separately named jewels, the part played by gem stones in OT literature appears to be as remarkable and significant as jewels themselves seem to have been to Bible peoples. Jewels were used for personal adornment (Exod. 11:2; Isa. 3:20; 61:10); for gifts and tokens of friendship (Gen. 41:42 [see SIGNET]; I Kings 10:2, 10; II Chr. 9:1, 9; Ezek. 16:11, 39; 23:26); for royal crowns (II Sam. 12:30; I Chr. 20:2; cf. Zech. 9:16); for royal garments (Ezek. 28:13); for the royal treasury (I Kings 10:11; I Chr. 29:2; II Chr. 9:10; 32:27); for the royal sanctuary (II Chr. 3:6; cf. Esth. 1:6; Dan. 11:38); and for the high priest's insignia (Exod. 28:15-21; 39:8-14; cf. Ecclus. 50:9). OT "jewelry," a closely related term, certainly included objects set with gems—e.g., the signet (Gen. 38:18), anklets, armlets, bracelets, crescents, earrings, and nose rings (see ANKLET; ARMLET; CRESCENT; EARRING). For the incorporation of jewels in an article to be worn, cf. the golden tomb mask of Tut-ankh-Amon (died 1349 B.C.), inlaid with lapis lazuli, calcite, obsidian, quartz, carnelian, and bits of colored glass.

It would appear that in contrast to the many kinds of jewels that were known, the early Israelites actually must have possessed small quantities of jewels, precious stones, or decorative minerals. In Palestinian excavations generally (cf. the exceptional fifteenth-fourteenth-century-B.C. collection found at Megiddo, the finds at Gezer, and the Ezion-geber necklace of carnelian, agate, alabaster, and glass beads), comparatively slight evidence for precious stones has been found. By contrast, engraved gems, along with elaborately tooled vessels of gold and silver, are among the common surviving Phoenician products (e.g., the rich finds at UGARIT and the contents of the royal tombs of Byblos, OT GEBAL, now in the National Museum, Beirut). Engraved jewels from the excavations in Greece are so numerous that by examples taken from them it is possible to trace the whole historical panorama of Greek art styles. The richness of Egyptian tomb collections in this regard is familiar knowledge.

Geological surveys indicate that in Palestine-Syria there are no gem deposits. In Egypt fifteen kinds of precious stones are to be found, six of them in more than one site, and in N Mesopotamia there are native deposits of four of the gem stones the ancients counted as precious. Such facts explain the reports that the Israelites received their precious stones from other lands and other peoples. Apart from an early quantity from Egypt in the form of manufactured jewelry (Exod. 3:22; 11:2; 12:35-36; 35:22) and other booty (e.g., Num. 31:50; Judg. 8:26), jewels came into Palestine through regional distributors, especially the traders of Phoenicia (Ezek. 28:13). The stones are said to have originated in OPHIR and in other parts of Arabia (I Kings 10:2; Ezek. 27:22), but the Arabians must have been mainly traders, too, as many of the most valued stones came from still more remote places—Asia and India have been suggested.

I Kings 20:34 indicates that foreign merchants had factories in the Samaria of Omri's time; the art of cutting and polishing stones probably became in time a local craft, the uncut stones, by necessity imported, remaining rare and quite expensive. In the Exodus period, however, as Egypt already possessed a fully developed gem-engraving industry in the Eighteenth Dynasty (1580-1350 B.C.), such Israelite workmen as OHOLIAB (Exod. 38:23), working with more abundant raw material, could have learned the art there. See ENGRAVING.

Cutting stones in facets to intensify brilliance by multiplying internal light reflection and refraction is a modern technique developed in Europe. The ancient method of stone dressing was that today called en cabochon—i.e., in rounded, convex forms with smooth or polished sides. The effect of natural colors was often further heightened through engraving. In stones of multilayered structure two or more colors might appear in the engraved designs. In this art the ancients excelled; the quality of their workmanship is rarely equaled by modern craftsmen equipped with mechanical tools and powerful magnifying instruments. The finest of the gem cutters' art (see a description, Ecclus. 38:27) is assumed in Exod. 28:9-11; 39:6, where instructions are given for the engraving of two multicolored, horizontally stratified stones (in Exodus, onyx—i.e., black and white; cf. Josephus: sardonyx—i.e., red and white), each with six tribe names, not in reverse as on a seal, but so as to be readable by the observer (the Lord; Exod. 28:12); i.e., white letters were cut into a red or black polished face, or the same technique was applied with a reversal of the colors.

c. Difficulties in making specific and accurate identification of jewels. The jewels named in the OT appear accidentally and in connection with the writers' primary interests. No catalogue appears or would be expected. Even with such a listing, the difficulties of positive identification of ancient jewels by modern terminology and classification would remain. The translating of terms was already complicated in biblical times. It is evident that the LXX translators in the third century B.C. had no more exact understanding of the Hebrew jewel names than had Jerome (ca. A.D. 400) of Hebrew or Greek terms when he translated the Latin Bible. English versions offer little more help; they tell us of the kinds of stones that were considered precious by the translators, rather than what the Bible means.

The broader consideration of jewels in the ancient world to which the subject of jewels in the Bible belongs is as yet indefinitely described. Only a fractional part of the ancient world is known archaeologically. The ancient writers shared the scientific limitations of their time; lacking modern methods of investigation such as chemical analysis and precision instruments of measurement and discrimination, they relied on examination and classification by color, weight, consistency, hardness, transparency, conductivity, friction, taste, and smell. From the large number of writers quoted by Pliny who made studies of stones between the time of Theophrastus (third century B.C.) and his own (first century A.D.), it is clear that there were some in the ancient world who, with all their superstitious beliefs, made remarkably close observations. Even so, exact identification is often impossible—e.g., in the same category defined by physical characteristics, especially color, an identical name is given to stones which modern analysis shows to be of quite different natures. The general accounts by modern writers of gems in antiquity vary because of the limited evidence upon which deductions are based or inability to use available modern techniques of identification. In the present state of our general knowledge, the most that can be offered is an alphabetical listing of jewels as named in the current English translations of the Bible, with references to special articles in this work, including in the list gem stones known archaeologically to have been available and used as jewels in the Bible lands and times.

2. Jewels named in the Bible and relevant archaeologically known materials. "Adamant" represented the hardest substance known, called adamas, "invincible." It translates šāmîr, probably "corundum," in Ezek. 3:9; Zech. 7:12. Diamonds became useful precious stones only with the fifteenth-century-A.D. discovery of how to cut them. The word šamir in Jer. 17:1 ("diamond") should be understood possibly to refer to a point of exceptionally hardened iron or a splinter of natural crystal (as corundum or rock crystal). The word yahᵃlōm in Exod. 28:18; 39:11 ("diamond") refers to some very hard stone—perhaps, as the Ezekiel rendering suggests, jasper, a stone widely used in Egypt for engraving. See also ADAMANT; DIAMOND.

"Agate" translates kadhkōdh in Isa. 54:12; Ezek. 27:16, šᵉbhô in Exod. 28:19; 39:12, and χαλκηδών in Rev. 21:19. Theophrastus states that in his day these quartz stones, with their banded structure adapted for engraving, were sold at great price; by Pliny's time agate had ceased to be a precious stone. It is well represented in Palestinian bead finds and in Egyptian beads. See also AGATE.

On "alabaster," see "calcite" below. See also ALABASTER.

Amber, though not a stone but fossilized resin, is known archaeologically to have been used especially with yellow gold by the ancients for personal jewelry; it was credited with medicinal qualities. Ḥašmal (Ezek. 1:4, 27; 8:2; "gleaming bronze") is a word of great uncertainty, possibly with primary emphasis on shining qualities, whether in bronze, AMBER, or electrum (cf. LXX ἤλεκτρον).

Amethyst, a purple quartz, is widely represented in the excavations in Palestine and Egypt and in many sorts, most of them variations of violet or wine color. Pliny brands as false an assertion of the magi that this stone was an effective preventive against intoxication. The Hebrew name 'aḥlāmâ links the stone with dreams or dreaming (ḥālām, "to dream"; Exod. 28:19; 39:12). The NT name is Ἀμεθύστος (Rev. 21:20). Amethyst is frequent as beads in Palestinian excavations, and in Egyptian amulets, beads for necklaces, and bracelets and scarabs. It was rarely used by the Greeks. See also AMETHYST.

Basalt, a black volcanic rock available in Palestine as elsewhere in the Near East, was used in Egypt for scarabs and in Assyria for cylinder seals.

"Bdellium" (bᵉdhōlaḥ) is of quite uncertain identification but indicates some type of precious material (Gen. 2:12; Num. 11:7, where the LXX understands bdellium as rock crystal). See also BDELLIUM.

"Beryl" (taršîš in Exod. 28:20; 39:13; Dan. 10:6; šōham in Ezek. 28:13; βήρυλλος in Rev. 21:20) is a stone usually of sea-green color, though it is known in other colors. The emerald is a superior variety of beryl. Beryl is not often represented in Palestinian finds. The numerous early Egyptian amulets once called beryl are proved, on further examination, to be green feldspar. See also BERYL.

Calcite is one of the commonest of minerals; alabaster, marble, and onyx are among its varieties. Alabaster was used in Egypt in thin plates for inlaid jewelry and furniture.

"Carbuncle" means currently a bright, deep red stone like a garnet cut en cabochon with smooth rounded sides. In the OT bāreqeth (Exod. 28:17; 39:10) is a glittering stone (bārāq, "lightning"); the LXX translation of bāreqeth suggests our emerald—i.e., gem-quality green beryl. See also CARBUNCLE.

"Carnelian" translates 'ōdhem (Ezek. 28:13), σάρδιον (Rev. 21:20). Red stones, especially chalcedony, are among the most frequently excavated jewels in Palestine, where it is the favorite material for Hebrew seals, as well as in Egypt for scarabs and in Mesopotamia for engraved objects (it is mentioned three times in the Gilgamesh Epic) and in Greek and Roman engraved gems. See also CARNELIAN.

"Chalcedony" (KJV translation of χαλκηδών in Rev. 21:19), is the name of a class of quartz stones including carnelian, sardius, chrysoprase, agate, and onyx. These are frequent in Palestine excavations as beads and seals, occasionally in Egyptian beads and scarabs. Chalcedony ranked high with Greek gum cutters in the fifth and fourth centuries B.C. See CHALCEDONY.

"Chrysolite" (taršîš in Ezek. 1:16; 10:9; 28:13; χρυσόλιθος in Rev. 21:20), modern magnesium iron silicate (related to olivine and peridot), was Pliny's term for the present-day golden-yellow topaz. See also CHRYSOLITE.

"Chrysoprase" (χρυσόπρασος; Rev. 21:20) is somewhat uncertain. If it was the same as that known today, it was an apple-green, fine-grained variety of quartz. Some ancient Egyptian jewelry of this material has been identified. See also CHRYSOPRASE.

"Coral" (râmôth in Job 28:18; pᵉnînîm in Lam. 4:7) in the red variety, for which there is a similar Arabic word meaning "branches," was available from the Mediterranean Sea. A type of coral from the Red Sea was used for beads in Egypt. See also CORAL.

"Crystal" (gābhîsh in Job 28:18; qeraḥ in Ezek. 1:22; κρύσταλλος in Rev. 22:1) covers all transparent, almost colorless materials such as glass, "Iceland spar," rock crystal, etc. Crystal beads are found in OT Palestine. See also CRYSTAL.

On "diamond," see "adamant" above. See also DIAMOND.

"Emerald" now means a rich green beryl. Such stones are rare in excavations. Green feldspar and turquoise, with the same general color tones, frequently appear and may be what is meant by nōphekh (Exod. 28:18; 39:11; Ezek. 27:16; 28:13; in Ezek. 28:

13 "carbuncle)." Bāreqeth (Ezek. 28:13) is thought to be more likely our emerald. Both terms could have meant simply green precious stones. The NT terms are σμαράγδινος, σμάραγδος (Rev. 4:3; 21:19). See also EMERALD.

Emery and corundum dust were used as polishing and drilling abrasives.

Feldspar in many types, all aluminum silicates, is of frequent occurrence in excavations. Green feldspar, which is commonly confused with other green stones, appears to have been popular in Egypt as material for amulets and beads.

Flint, important in early antiquity for ornaments and tools, may have continued as a valued stone, at least among the less wealthy folk. In Job 28:9 it is referred to as a treasure of the earth. See also FLINT.

Garnet, as employed by Egypt, was a native dark red or reddish brown, translucent stone used for beads. The flame-colored garnet was largely used for Greek, Etruscan, and Roman engraved gems.

Glass in various colors is found in Egyptian excavations at least from the third millennium B.C. It is opaque and is used as a substitute for precious stones, especially in inlaying of ornaments and utensils. Note the glass beads found at Solomonic Ezion-geber.

Hematite as used in Egypt was black, opaque, and with a metallic luster, and it appears in beads, amulets, kohl sticks, scarabs, and small objects. In the red variety (sometimes called bloodstone) Mesopotamian seals and Hittite gems are found, as well as beads of the same material, throughout the ancient Near East. In Palestine hematite Hebrew seals and beads are known.

"Jacinth" in the OT (lešem; Exod. 28:19; 39:12) refers to an orange-colored zircon. In the NT ὑάκινθος (Rev. 21:20) and the adjective ὑακινθίνος (Rev. 9:17; RSV "sapphire") refer to a blue precious stone (possibly including our modern sapphire, but see "sapphire" below) which in a yellow variety Pliny states was often made into gems by the ancients. See also JACINTH.

"Jasper" (yāshephê in Exod. 28:20; 39:13; yahᵃlōm in Ezek. 28:13; ἴασπις in Rev. 4:3; 21:11, 18-19) is a present-day opaque type of quartz usually red, brown, or yellow. Pliny describes ἴασπις as green and often transparent—i.e., apparently our translucent green chalcedony or plasma. It is uncertain whether the LXX equivalent constitutes a sure identification. This stone is frequent in Palestinian tombs and excavations and in Egyptian amulets, beads (usually red), and inlays. Green jasper was common for Greek gems. See also JASPER.

Lapis lazuli, a rich azure blue with "fool's gold" spangles, is abundantly represented: in the Mesopotamian literature (mentioned six times in the Gilgamesh Epic) and excavations; in Egypt, where it was an imported material from Western Asia for small jewelry and objects; in Palestine, where some specimens such as those at Megiddo have been found. Lapis lazuli was probably the ancient sapphire or firestone. See also LAPIS LAZULI; SAPPHIRE.

On "ligure," see "jacinth" above.

Limestone in some varieties is hard enough for engraving and polishing. A readily available material in Palestine, limestone is known to have been frequently used for seals bearing Hebrew writing, for beads, and probably for other kinds of ornamentation, possibly more generally among the common people. A number of Egyptian scarabs made of limestone have been found dating to the OT period.

Malachite is a brilliant green copper carbonate, occasionally used in Egypt for worked objects or as inlay in jewelry but mainly as eye paint. Sinai offered an ancient source of malachite with turquoise deposits nearby.

"Marble" (šēš; I Chr. 29:2; Esth. 1:6; Song of S. 5:14), a crystallized limestone capable of high polish, is used in the Bible only of building material but was found in bead form at Megiddo. See also MARBLE.

"Mother-of-pearl" is a possible alternative to the translation "coral" in Ezek. 27:16. This material was used in Egypt from predynastic times.

Nephrite ("kidney" stone), a low-grade jade, sometimes appears among Palestinian beads.

Obsidian, a kind of dark, glassy volcanic rock, was used in ancient Egypt in small amounts and was obtained from Abyssinia.

"Onyx" (šōham in Gen. 2:12; Exod. 25:7; 28:9, 20; etc.; σαρδονυξ in Rev. 21:20) is a chalcedony of banded structure, often with milky-white bands alternating with black. See also SARDONYX; ONYX.

Opal in hyalite form (translucent, colorless), not native to the Near East, is found only in sufficient numbers to indicate that it was anciently known.

"Pearl" (pᵉnînîm in Job 28:18; μαργαρίτης in Matt. 7:6; 13:46; I Tim. 2:9; etc.), not a precious stone but always associated with gems, is among the materials used after the Ptolemaic period by the Egyptians for jewelry. A pink variety (cf. "coral" in Lam. 4:7) comes from the Red Sea. See also PEARL.

Peridot is a pale green chrysolite variety of olivine used as a gem stone. Although it is to be found on islands in the Red Sea, it was but rarely used in ancient Egypt. If the identification of peridot as the OT "topaz" is accurate, Palestine must have used the stone more extensively. For references, see TOPAZ.

Rock crystal is colorless, crystallized quartz, harder than glass or steel (see "adamant" above). Frequently rock crystal appears in Hebrew seals; in Palestinian beads; and as amulet, bead, inlay, and even vase material in Egypt. It was widely used for engraved gems only in the late Roman period.

"Ruby" in the modern sense appears not to have been known in the ancient Near East before the third century B.C., and not at all by the Greeks and Romans. Pᵉnînîm, sometimes translated "ruby" in the KJV (Job 28:18; Prov. 3:15; 8:11; etc.), is better understood as "coral" or "pearl."

"Sapphire" (sappir in Exod. 24:10; 28:18; 39:11; Job 28:16; etc.; σάπφειρος in Rev. 21:19) is likely not the modern transparent blue stone, which was too hard for the ancients with their tools to use for the stylish engraved gems, but rather, as Pliny's description indicates it was for his day, lapis lazuli, which is frequent in jewelry and scarabs in Egypt and Babylonian seals and is fairly well known in Palestinian excavations. See also SAPPHIRE.

Sardius is suggested by the name 'ōdhem, "red," and is transparent (Ezek. 28:13). "Sardius" may be an alternative to "carnelian," and both are included in the same grouping with red jasper; all three are frequently found in excavations in Egypt, Assyria, and Palestine. In the NT, σάρδιον is translated "carnelian" in Rev. 4:3; 21:20.

"Sardonyx" is not used in the OT but is a possible alternative translation of šōham, "onyx." It was popular with the Romans for cameos and signets. It is in the NT in Rev. 21:20 (σαρδόνυξ, "onyx"). See also SARDONYX.

Steatite, a gray-green or brown talc, also called soapstone, is frequent in Palestinian excavations. Quantities of steatite beads were found at Megiddo and elsewhere. Because it was soft, steatite was a favorite material with engravers of the early periods in Egypt, Assyria, Babylonia, Phoenicia, and Greece, but in late times it seems not to have been used.

"Topaz" in the OT (piṭ·dhâ; Exod. 28:17; 39:10; Job 28:19; Ezek. 28:13) is probably, as Pliny's account suggests, modern peridot or olivine, a green gem stone found on islands of the Red Sea. Cf. the Greek τοπάζιον (Rev. 21:20), which, if we follow Strabo, may have been used for any of a group of bright yellow transparent stones. We do not know whether Ethiopia in Job 28:19, mentioned in connection with topaz, is the jewel's point of origin (which, even when topaz is considered as peridot, seems unlikely) or the nearest known country to the Red Sea islands producing peridot, or possibly the identification name of some singularly large and fine peridot jewel. See also TOPAZ.

"Turquoise," though not used in English versions, is a possible alternative translation of nōphekh. Abundant in Egypt, where it is found frequently in jewelry combined with lapis lazuli, the material is also known in Palestinian excavation finds. The delicate sky-blue to green turquoise must have been well known to OT peoples. There are ancient turquoise workings in the Sinai Peninsula near mines which were worked from early times for malachite and copper ore. See also TURQUOISE.

3. Noteworthy jewel passages. Certain remarkable OT passages cite the names of specific gem stones. In the order of their canonical appearance, though possibly not in the order of their date of composition, these include:

a. Exod. 28:17-21; 39:10-14. The BREASTPIECE OF THE HIGH PRIEST is described, following directions discussed above for the engraving of the two onyx stones of remembrance for the sons of Israel. Upon the gold, blue, purple, and scarlet fine linen of which the breastpiece was made, there were to be mounted twelve precious stones, cut and polished as signets, each engraved in the same manner as the onyx stones with the name of one of the tribes of Israel. In view of the widespread ancient beliefs in the amuletic powers of gem stones, some connection might be expected between the particular stones specified and particular names of the tribes. Unless some traditional ordering of the tribe names is assumed in the Exodus passages, no evidence is offered here or elsewhere in the OT as to the assignment of special jewels to each of the twelve tribes. One may use in an attempt to link stones with tribes, as some do, a list of the tribes arranged by the age relation of the tribal heads, but this is still uncertain. Arranging the stones in rows from left to right, and identifying the stones (a) by the RSV translation and (b) by the Hebrew term in each case, one may find, within the limits of probability of the separate articles and the list above (c) an identification and (d) a general impression of the colors of stones employed.

b. Job 28:12-19. In a chapter where in some detail the technological achievements of man in mining and metallurgy are contrasted with the impotence of his crafts to secure for himself wisdom, a connection is made between treasures of earth such as gold, silver, onyx, sapphire, coral, crystal, pearls, and topaz, apparently offered as sacrifices, and the erroneous and superstitious worship of Tehom (see DEEP, THE) and Yam (see SEA). Jewels are among the gifts which, according to Job, man is prepared extravagantly but uselessly to offer for the gift of wisdom. The allusion of the passage is clearly to a false and pagan association of the wealth of the earth with the spirits of the underworld.

c. Ezek. 28:12-19. The final oracle in the book of Ezekiel dealing with Tyre depicts the king of that city as a man (see ADAM 1) who once lived in a veritable paradise (see EDEN, GARDEN OF) but who through proudness of heart and inordinate concern for splendor (vs. 17) had suffered a disastrous fall, described in terms of expulsion from Eden. There is in the Genesis account of Eden only one brief allusion to precious stones (Gen. 2:12; bdellium and onyx). The Gilgamesh Epic is a long and ancient Mesopotamian literary production which in the extent of its influence in that area of the ancient world has been compared to the Iliad and the Odyssey. It is quite possible, if not probable, that Ezekiel in his residence in Babylonia could have known of the work. In any case, it is interesting to note these lines (Tablet IX.48-51) from the Gilgamesh Epic found in a description of a mythological park called the "grove of stones."

> The carnelian bears its fruit;
> It is hung with vines good to look at.
> The lapis bears foliage;
> It, too, bears fruit lush to behold.[1]

Ezekiel 28:13 lists as ornaments of the Tyrian king's "covering" (possibly "shield") nine stones, in three groups of three: carnelian, topaz, jasper; chrysolite, beryl, onyx; sapphire (meaning lapis lazuli), carbuncle, emerald. It is frequently asserted that, in view of Ezekiel's priestly interests, there is in his listing a reflection of the stones of the Exodus high-priest's-breastpiece passage. This is conceivable, yet the smaller total number of stones and the inexact correspondence of the order in which the stones are named raise a question as to any kind of literal or mechanical interdependence of the passages. See further below.

d. Isa. 54:12. This is a message of comfort which the prophet directs to Jerusalem: "O afflicted one!" He casts hope in terms of a projected future for the city, when its foundations shall be sapphires, its pinnacles of agate, its gates of carbuncles, and all its walls of precious stones. The connection of jewels with the anticipation of a Jerusalem in colorful, radiant splendor is also made in Tob. 13:16-17; Rev. 21:19-21. See further below.

e. Lists of precious stones. The precious stones which adorn (or constitute?) the twelve foundations of the New Jerusalem (Rev. 21:19-20) are reminiscent of the twelve stones on the BREASTPIECE OF THE HIGH PRIEST in the dual lists of Exod. 28:17-20; 39:10-13 (cf. Ecclus. 45:11); the adornment of the king of Tyre, moreover, consists of nine (Hebrew; LXX twelve) precious stones (Ezek. 28:13). The problem of the interrelationship of the four biblical lists has evoked much discussion, the results of which have not been conclusive.

The identification and order of the stones in the four lists are separate problems, as the confusion arising from their conflation demonstrates. Regarding the former, certain results are impossible, given the inadequacy of ancient classification and the dissimilarity of modern terminology (see § 1*c above*), and pointless in view of the wide divergence of the tradition (see further below). The problem of order is best approached apart from the question of identification. With reference to the Hebrew text, the two lists in Exodus are identical, but the number and order in Ezekiel differ. It has been noted that the third row of stones in the breastpiece is missing in the Ezekiel list; the order of the remaining nine, moreover, is altered (see Table 1). On the other hand, the number and order in the LXX are constant in all three cases. That the LXX list was known in the first century A.D. is confirmed by the two accounts found in Josephus (War V.v.7; Antiq. III.vii.5). In the earlier of the two (Jewish Wars), given the equation ὄνυξ=ὀνύχιον, the same twelve stones appear but with variation in order within rows 2-4 of Table 2.

[1] Trans. E. A. Speiser, in J. B. Pritchard, ed., Ancient Near Eastern Texts (Princeton University Press; rev. ed., 1955).

Table 1

	Exod. 28:17-20; 39:10-13	Ezek. 28:13
1.	אדם	אדם
2.	פטדה	פטדה
3.	ברקת	יהלם
4.	נפך	תרשיש
5.	ספיר	שהם
6.	יהלם	ישפה
7.	לשם
8.	שכו
9.	אחלמה
10.	תרשיש	ספיר
11.	שהם	נפך
12.	ישפה	ברקת

In the Antiquities, Josephus makes a point of correcting the order of the last two rows, but introduces still another sequence within rows 3-4 which is at variance with both the LXX and his previous list; he also substitutes σαρδόνυξ for σάρδιον, perhaps inadvertently repeating the former from the two jewels on the high priest's shoulders, just previously mentioned.

The striking feature of these five lists is the uniformity in Greek, apart from the small discrepancies mentioned; the fact that Josephus takes pains to correct his own order suggests that it held some significance for him, but which, unfortunately, he nowhere discloses. The inference appears to be that the LXX list was compiled under the impact of tradition current in Alexandria 300-100 B.C., without reference to the Hebrew counterpart, a tradition which Josephus knew late in the first century A.D. but desired to modify. The attempt, therefore, to establish equivalences between the Hebrew and Greek terms on the basis of parallel lists in Exodus and Ezekiel is at best precarious, perhaps even futile.

Table 2

	Exod. 28; Exod. 39; Ezek. 28	Jos. War V.v.7	Jos. Antiq. III.vii.5	Rev. 21
1.	σάρδιον	σάρδιον	σαρδόνυξ	ἴασπις
2.	τοπάζιον	τόπαζος	τόπαζος	σάπφιρος
3.	σμάραγδος	σμάραγδος	σμάραγδος	χαλκηδών
4.	ἄνθραξ	ἄνθραξ	ἄνθρακα	σμάραγδος
5.	σάπφειρος	ἴασπις	ἴασπιν	σαρδόνυξ
6.	ἴασπις	σάπφειρος	σάπφειρον	σάρδιον
7.	λιγύριον	ἀχάτης	λίγυρος	χρυσόλιθος
8.	ἀχάτης	ἀμέθυστος	ἀμέθυσος	βήρυλλος
9.	ἀμέθυστος	λιγύριον	ἀχάτης	τοπάζιον
10.	χρυσόλιθος	ὄνυξ	χρυσόλιθος	χρυσόπρασος
11.	βηρύλλιον	βήρυλλος	ὄνυξ	ὑάκινθος
12.	ὀνύχιον	χρυσόλιθος	βήρυλλος	ἀμέθυστος

The list in Revelation differs with regard to the names of the stones and to their order. Four new names appear along with eight known from the LXX

(see Table 2). Were it not for the problem of order, it might be conjectured that the author has made a fresh translation of the list from Hebrew, but in view of several rather well-established correlations (e.g., ישפה = ἴασπις; ספיר = σάπφειρος), this is improbable. On the assumption that there is a literary dependence of the Revelation list on the OT lists, several solutions to the problem of terminology and order have been proposed. One proposal is that the author of Revelation read the Exodus list in a different order, with regard both to rows and to sequence within rows: row 2 in reverse; row 1 in reverse; row 4; row 3. The obvious difficulty here is that four substitutions and one exchange are necessary, and an explanation for either the peculiar method of reading or the variation is not forthcoming. Another view is that the Revelation list reverses the order established by pagan astrological speculation, in which each stone represents a sign of the zodiac; the reversal was deliberate, in order to negate pagan associations of the twelve constellations with the twelve stones. Dependence on the Exodus list is here denied, but the proposal rests for other reasons on tenuous grounds. An even more elaborate proposal has been to read the stones counterclockwise, the signs of the zodiac clockwise (along with the names of the tribes), in order to get a particular color associated with the proper tribe. This view raises the double difficulty of establishing the color-tribal equation (known from medieval texts) and of showing that the author had the twelve tribes in mind (in 21:14 the names of the twelve apostles are inscribed on the foundations). The weight of the evidence, therefore, favors the view that the content and order of the Revelation list was derived from a tradition independent of other biblical lists as well as that of Josephus.

Other references to the tradition (e.g., Isa. 54:11-12; Tob. 13:16-17; II Bar. 6:7) are of little help regarding either identification or order.

4. Rev. 21:19-20 and the symbolism of precious stones. Jewels and precious stones with pagan mythological or magical connotations play very little role in the Bible. There are, nevertheless, notable passages in which the symbolism of jewels is a significant feature; these involve the garments of the high priest, the visions of Ezekiel and the author of Revelation, and occasional allusions elsewhere. The primary passages, together with the concepts which are suggested, will be discussed.

a. Precious stones and theophany. The connection of precious stones with theophanies has some support in the Bible. In the vision of Ezekiel, upon which the author of Revelation may be dependent, certain stones are utilized in the description of the glory (or brightness) of the theophany (Ezek. 1:16, 22, 26; 10:1, 9). Likewise in Rev. 4:3 the one sitting on the throne has the appearance of jasper and carnelian, and around the throne is a rainbow which gives the appearance of an emerald (cf. 9:17). Light and related figures which are often used to express the immanence of God (e.g., Ezek. 43:2) are, of course, ultimately derived from the heavenly bodies—the sun, moon, and stars. The original connection is suggested in many texts (Ps. 104:2; Enoch 14:18; Sibylline Oracles V.420-26; Jas. 1:17; cf. the representation of the Shekinah under the figure of light in the rabbinic literature). The ability of the polished stone to reflect brilliant light is doubtless the source of the idea that the jewel was the microcosmic counterpart of the heavenly bodies and hence an apt figure for divine glory—i.e., divine immanence; from this may have developed the notion of oracular and amuletic power often associated with jewels (cf. Prov. 17:8). Josephus interprets the two jewels on the high priest's shoulders in this fashion, noting that when God wanted to indicate his presence at the sacred ceremonies, he caused the stone on the right shoulder to shine (Antiq. III.viii.214-15); the twelve stones on the breastpiece functioned in the same fashion, indicating by flashing or sparkling that God was present when the Israelites went into battle (Antiq. III.viii.216). The oracular qualities of the breastpiece stones were considerably elaborated in later times by the rabbis, and the medieval astrologists developed this theme in great detail.

There seems to be little doubt that behind the precious-stone symbolism in general floats the astral imagery which was well known in the first century A.D. and probably much earlier, so that it becomes necessary to examine the motifs which underlie this symbolism.

b. Interpretation of the twelve stones in Philo and Josephus. Philo provides an extensive interpretation of the temple and the high priest's garments along the lines of the "lesser" mystery of Aaron (the "greater" being that of Moses). Included in his triple account (Life of Moses II.23-24; Questions and Answers on Exodus II.112-14; On the Special Laws I.82-97) of the mystery of Aaron is an explanation of the two stones on the shoulders of the priest and the twelve stones of the breastpiece (he does not list them). The two emeralds (or sardonyxes) represent either the sun and the moon (also Josephus and Clement of Alexandria) or the two celestial hemispheres, and the six tribal names on either stone the signs of the zodiac belonging to either sphere. The twelve stones on the breastpiece are a more detailed representation of the same symbolism: the division into four rows represents the four seasons. The breastpiece as a whole stands for the immutable divine Logos, the "law of nature." In another place Philo points out the virtues of this symbolism: by constant association with this symbolism, the high priest makes his own life worthy of the universal nature; his robe signifies that the whole cosmos worships with him; the Jewish high priest, as opposed to other priests, is the mediator for all mankind. All this sets forth the cosmic significance of Jewish worship.

Josephus agrees with the major lines of this interpretation, but differs in details (War V.v.231-37; Antiq. III.vii.162-71; vii.185-87; viii.214-18). He adds in particular a note about the oracular power of the twelve stones (see § 4*a above*), but which, he says, ceased to function two hundred years earlier (i.e., ca. the time of John Hyrcanus, 135-105 B.C.). Each of the patriarchs is associated with a stone, having his name engraved on it, and the order is that in which they were born (Antiq. III.vii.169). Philo indicates that the stones were distinguished from one another by color (Moses II.126; On the Special Laws I.87), each color corresponding to a sign of the zodiac, for each "produces its own particular coloring in the air and earth and water and their phases, and also in the different kinds of animals and plants" (Moses II.126).

That this tradition was widely known is indicated by the reference to the same line of interpretation in the Wisdom of Solomon (18:24). Cosmic symbolism also penetrated Jewish worship in Palestine and elsewhere to an amazing degree in the third-sixth centuries A.D., as the synagogues which date to this period show. The zodiac, the four seasons, and Helios often occupy a central position in floor mosaics and appear in other ways in synagogue decoration. The details of this symbolism seem to have been only sketchily known, since the signs of the zodiac are represented in both clockwise and counterclockwise patterns, and the seasons are not always associated with the correct signs. A specific connection with jewels is, of course, lacking, but the mythology which supports both the twelve jewels and the mosaics is identical. That this imagery was known to the author of Revelation is not improbable. The fact that he connects the names of the twelve apostles with the foundation jewels is strong evidence that he was aware of the tradition, though other motifs appear to have dictated the architecture of the holy city, New Jerusalem.

c. The heavenly city, New Jerusalem, and paradise. In apocalyptic literature the myths of the heavenly city, New Jerusalem, and paradise flow together to form a composite picture in which now one element, now another, is uppermost. It is generally agreed that the three motifs were originally distinct, the first and third going back to remote antiquity. The concept of the heavenly city is found in Babylonian mythology, where its architecture has been influenced by cosmic symbols. The myth probably rests on primitive concepts of the vault of heaven: as the handiwork of the gods, it rests on four pillars, is bedecked with glittering jewels (stars), and is transversed by a golden street (Milky Way; cf. II Enoch Proem, chs. 24–30). The twelve portals, or gates, and the twelve foundations derive ultimately from the zodiacal divisions of the heavens (Ezek. 48:30-35; Enoch 72; 75:6; 76; 82:4 ff; II Enoch 13–14; 30:6; cf. Josephus and Philo, in § 4*b above*).

This mythology is in part taken over and adapted to the idea of the renewal of Jerusalem. The development is away from the idea of a simple restoration of the earthly Jerusalem in the direction of a transformation of the city or the radical substitution of a heavenly archetype for the earthly model (cf. Isa. 60:10-14; Hag. 2:7-9; Zech. 2:1-5; Pss. Sol. 17:25 with Enoch 90:28-29; II Bar. 4:2-7; Rev. 21). In the process of transition, some of the features of the heavenly city are incorporated in the picture of the New Jerusalem. E.g., the precious stones as building materials (Isa. 54:11-12; Tob. 13:16-18; Rev. 21:10-21) and the twelve portals (Ezek. 48:30-35; Rev. 21:12-14) are derived from the heavenly archetype. Paul may have had this imagery in mind in I Cor. 3:12.

A third strand is the myth of the garden of God, or paradise. It is noteworthy that precious stones are also connected with the garden in Gen. 2:12 and the Gilgamesh Epic (see § 3*c above*). Of greater interest is the oracle in Ezek. 28:11-19 against the king of Tyre. The setting is Eden, the garden of God, where the king has as a covering (breastpiece; or "is enclosed, hedged about"?) every precious stone; he walks, moreover, among stones of fire (stars?). The location of the tree of life in the garden had long since been established in Near Eastern mythology, and its transfer to the New Jerusalem indicates the confluence of the two concepts (Enoch 25:4-5; Rev. 22:2; cf. Test. Dan. 5:12). Thus it is clear that the picture of the New Jerusalem in Revelation is a composite drawn from several strands of mythological tradition which had been partially fused.

While the list of foundation stones of the New Jerusalem in Revelation is not directly dependent on the breastpiece tradition, the two have a single root—namely, the ancient mythological view of the heavens. Twelve in either case corresponds to the twelve zones into which the heavens had been divided already in Babylonian astrology. The author of Revelation may not have been fully aware of the implications of his symbolism, but he knew that the twelve jewels were properly associated with the divine city and stood, as in earlier tradition, for the twelve heroes of the church upon which the city rests.

Bibliography. R. H. Charles, The Revelation of St. John, vols. I-II, ICC (1920); W. Bousset, Die Religion des Judentums (3rd ed., ed. H. Gressmann, 1926), pp. 282-85; A. Jeremias, Handbuch der Altorientalischen Geisteskultur (1929), pp. 108-14; E. R. Goodenough, By Light, Light (1935), pp. 95-120; A. Rowe, A Catalogue of Egyptian Seals in the Palestine Archaeological Museum (1936), pp. 328-29; L. Ginzberg, The Legends of the Jews, vols. I-VI (1913-38), Index; R. J. Forbes, Bibliographia Antiqua (1940), Part C: "Precious and Semiprecious Stones"; A. Lucas, Ancient Egyptian Materials and Industries (3rd rev. ed., 1948), pp. 52, 442 (a list of precious stones used in ancient Egypt); A. Farrer, A Rebirth of Images (1949); E. Lohmeyer, Die Offenbarung des Johannes (1953); E. R. Goodenough, Jewish Symbols in the Greco-Roman Period, vols. I-IV (1953-54; see the Index to the individual volumes); J. B. Pritchard, ed., ANET (2nd ed., 1955), p. 89. P. L. GARBER AND R. W. FUNK JEWRY jōō′rĭ. KJV translation of יהודה (Judah) in Dan. 5:13 and of Ἰουδαία (Judea) in Luke 23:5; John 7:1.

JEZANIAH jĕz′ə nī′ə [יזניהו (properly Jezaniahu), KJV יזניה (Jer. 42:1; RSV AZARIAH), contractions of יאזניהו (Jaazaniah), Yahu hears] (Jer. 40:8). One of the Judean captains who remained with Gedaliah at Mizpah after the Babylonian deportation. The name occurs on a sixth-century-B.C. seal inscription from the region of Mizpah and in the first Lachish Letter (see LACHISH). These may refer to the biblical Jezaniah; identification is impossible. J. M. WARD

JEZEBEL jĕz′ə bəl [איזבל, from Phoen. זבל, prince, exalted, plus some other element]. Probably the deliberate Hebrew distortion of a Phoenician name honoring Baal (cf. the name Baal'zebel [בעלאזבל] from a Phoenician inscription [CIS, I, 158]). The LXX seems to understand the name in this way (cf. the LXX, reading: "If you are Elijah ['My God is Yahu'], I am Jezebel," in I Kings 19:2). Zbl appears as a title for Baal in Ugaritic texts (49, I.14; III.3, 9, 21; IV.29, 40; 67, VI.10, where "Prince (zbl), Lord of Earth," occurs in parallelism with "Aliyn Baal").

1. The wife of Ahab, king of Israel. She was a Phoenician, daughter of Ethbaal, "king of the Sidonians" (I Kings 16:31) and, according to Menander's account, priest in the Phoenician cult of Baal and Astarte (cf. Jos. Antiq. VIII.xiii.2). According to the Bible, Jezebel made every effort to remain a true daughter of her father in both these respects. A ruthless devotion to the absolute rights of oriental monarchy and to the worship of the Phoenician Baal are characteristic marks of her behavior, not only during the reign of Ahab, but also during the reigns of her two sons, Ahaziah and Jehoram. Even her daughter, Athaliah, who became queen of Judah, was regarded as carrying on Jezebel's influence (II Kings 8:18). Jezebel, like any foreign queen, seems to have demanded the right to her own practice of worship from the beginning (I Kings 16:31-33; cf. 11:8). Her own unusual initiative and resolution were shown, however, when she pressed her cult on Israel, supporting hundreds of prophets of Baal and Asherah (I Kings 18:19), carried her attack against the prophets of Yahweh (vs. 4), and even succeeded in driving out the by no means irresolute Elijah (19:1-3). The "harlotries and the sorceries" ascribed to Jezebel in II Kings 9:22 are almost certainly to be taken in reference to this attack against the worship of Yahweh (cf. Hos. 4:12).

The contrast between the Israelite and the usual oriental monarch is seen in the incident of Naboth's vineyard. When Ahab accepted the right of the private citizen to refuse to sell or exchange his property, Jezebel made the taunting response: "Do you now govern Israel?" (I Kings 21:7.) She was the one who stopped only long enough to cover her action with a pretense of legal form, and had Naboth stoned so that the king could take possession. The account of the death of Jezebel, when she "painted her eyes, and adorned her head" and defied Jehu with a final magnificent insult, is a fitting climax to the biblical picture of this remorseless, "cursed," but royal woman (II Kings 9:30-37), whose strength of character was with her to the end.

2. In Rev. 2:20 the name used symbolically for the false "prophetess" who beguiles the Christians of Thyatira into idolatrous practices. D. HARVEY

JEZELUS. KJV Apoc. form of JAHAZIEL 5; JEHIEL 7.

JEZER jē′zər [יצר] (Gen. 46:24; Num. 26:49; I Chr. 7:13); JEZERITES —zə rīts. Third son of Naphtali; ancestral head of the Jezerites.

JEZIAH. KJV form of IZZIAH.

JEZIEL jē′zĭ əl [Qere יזיאל, Kethibh יזואל] (I Chr. 12:3). Son of Azmaveth; one of the disaffected Benjaminite warriors who joined the proscribed band of David at Ziklag.

JEZLIAH. KJV form of IZLIAH.

JEZOAR. KJV form of IZHAR. See also ZOHAR.

JEZRAHEL jĕz′rə hĕl. Douay Version form of JEZREEL.

JEZRAHIAH jĕz′rə hī′ə [יזרחיה, Yahu will arise or shine] (Neh. 12:42). A leader of temple singers; same as Izrahiah (I Chr. 7:3).

JEZREEL jĕz′rĭ əl [יזרעאל, God sows, or may God make fruitful]; JEZREELITE —ə līt; JEZREELITESS jĕz′rĭ ə lī′tĭs. 1. A descendant of Judah (I Chr. 4:3), and related to the town in Judah of this name (locality uncertain; cf. Josh. 15:56). Whether the person is the eponymous ancestor of the town or the name represents a personification of the town is unknown.

2. A son of the prophet Hosea; his first child by his wife Gomer. The boy's name was a symbol at once recalling the bloodshed at Jezreel by which Jehu came into power (cf. II Kings 9:17-26; 10:1-11), as well as anticipating now the divine vengeance on the house of Jehu for that slaughter (Hos. 1:4-5).

Bibliography. H. G. May, "An Interpretation of the Names of Hosea's Children," JBL, LV (1936), 285-91.

B. T. DAHLBERG

3. A border town in Issachar (Josh. 19:18). It is identified with modern Zer'in, a village at the foot of Mount Gilboa, located approximately seven miles N of Jenin. The site commands a view of the entire Plain of Jezreel (see 4 below), and is strategically located on the routes from the Mediterranean Coast to the Jordan Valley, and from S to N Palestine. It has not been excavated. Jezreel is first mentioned as one of the towns in Solomon's fifth administrative district under Baana (I Kings 4:12), but it was not until after the division of the kingdom that the town played a prominent role in biblical history. During the reign of Ahab, it became a royal residence (I Kings 18:45-46), and was the scene of the incident involving the vineyard of Naboth the Jezreelite (ch. 21), which evoked a strong denunciation from Elijah. It was to Jezreel that Joram, Ahab's son and successor, came to recover from wounds incurred in battle with Hazael of Syria (II Kings 8:29; II Chr. 22:6). This town witnessed more of the bloodshed that accompanied Jehu's revolution than any other town in Israel, with the exception of Samaria. Here Joram, Jezebel, and the resident officialdom of Israel were murdered; Ahaziah of Judah was wounded; and it was to Jezreel that the heads of Ahab's sons were sent from Samaria (II Kings 9:1–10:11).

4. The OT name of the entire valley which separates Galilee from Samaria. The W portion of this valley is now referred to as ESDRAELON (Ἐσδρηλών) by some authors, while the name Jezreel is restricted to the E part of the valley.* That the valley is divided into two parts is clear from a study of a map of Palestine. The W section is roughly shaped like a right triangle, with the base running N and S along the W slopes of the Hill of Moreh and Mount Gilboa, the apex touching the Plain of Acco, and the hypotenuse stretching along the N slopes of the Carmel Range. This area included the Valley of Megiddon (see MEGIDDON, VALLEY OF). It slopes gently from SE to NW; a slight rise, which runs from E to W through the center of the valley, forces the River Kishon (see KISHON) to the N part of this plain. The smaller E section of the valley begins at the pass between Moreh and Gilboa, and terminates abruptly at the Jordan Rift. It slopes from NW to SE and is drained by the River Jalud, which flows eastward along the narrow valley floor. Fig. JEZ 22.

Courtesy of the Israel Office of Information, New York

22. Road at the right leading from Nazareth into the Valley of Jezreel (the Plain of Esdraelon)

The Valley of Jezreel is a geological fault basin. It is covered with alluvium and receives an abundance of water, which makes it one of the most fertile areas of Palestine. A probable allusion to its fertility is contained in Hos. 2:22—H 2:24. It is also the major corridor through the rugged hills of Palestine and, as a result, is interlaced with routes from the Mediterranean on the W, to Beth-shan, the Jordan Valley, and the Transjordanian Plateau on the E; and from the hill country and Egypt on the S, to Galilee, Syria, and Phoenicia on the N.

From early times, the Valley of Jezreel was inhabited by Canaanites. At the time of the Conquest the Canaanites in the valley were militarily strong—their equipment included iron chariots—with the result that Ephraim and Manasseh were unable to dispossess them (Josh. 17:16). Like the Plain of Megiddo, it was the scene of many battles. During the period of the judges, Gideon and the N tribes defeated a coalition of Midianites, Amalekites, and Bne Qedem ("people of the East") who were encamped in the valley (Judg. 6:33–7:23). From here was issued the news of the death of Saul and his sons, including Jonathan, in battle with the Philistines on neighboring Mount Gilboa (II Sam. 4:4). In the ensuing struggle for the throne between Saul's son Ish-bosheth and David, Jezreel was among the areas of Israel which were briefly ruled by Ish-bosheth (II Sam. 2:9). According to Hos. 1:5, the valley was to be the place where Yahweh would break Israel's might, as fitting punishment for the murders which had been committed nearby in the town of Jezreel, during the revolution of Jehu.

5. A town in the territory of Judah (Josh. 15:56); the home of Ahinoam the Jezreelitess, one of David's wives (I Sam. 25:43; 27:3; 30:5; II Sam. 2:2; 3:2). Josh. 15:56 indicates that the town was located in the general vicinity of Ziph, Carmel, and Juttah. Khirbet Tarrama, a site situated ca. six miles SW of Hebron on the Plain of Dilbeh, has been suggested as a possible location, but no certain identification has been made.

Bibliography. G. A. Smith, The Historical Geography of the Holy Land (1894), pp. 379-410. W. F. Albright, "The Topography of the Tribe of Issachar," ZAW (1926), p. 226. F.-M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine, I (1933), 399, 411-13; II (1938), 364-65. G. W. VAN BEEK

JIBSAM. KJV form of IBSAM.

JIDLAPH jĭd'lăf [יִדְלָף, he weeps, or perhaps he is sleepless] (Gen. 22:22). Seventh son born to Nahor and Milcah.

JIMNA; JIMNAH. KJV forms of IMNAH.

JIPHTAH. KJV form of IPHTAH.

JIPHTHAH-EL. KJV form of IPHTAH-EL.

JOAB jō'ăb [יוֹאָב, Yahu is father]. 1. The eldest son of Zeruiah, the sister of David; brother to Abishai and Asahel (II Sam. 2:18; I Chr. 2:16). His perspicuity and military adroitness as commander of the army of David and royal confidant earned for Joab an importance among his contemporaries second only to David.

The military record of Joab commences with the defeat of Abner at Gibeon. After the death of Saul, his son Ish-baal was placed upon the throne of Israel by Abner, the commander of the army; the tribe of Judah, however, anointed David as its own king (II Sam. 2:4, 8 ff; I Chr. 11:1-3). When Abner set out from Mahanaim, the Transjordanian capital, for W Palestine with a considerable detail of soldiers, he was met at the pool of Gibeon by the men of Joab, who no doubt had this movement under careful surveillance. As they confronted each other on the opposite sides of the pool, Abner challenged Joab to choose twelve warriors from his ranks to champion the cause of Judah against an equal number who would represent Israel. In the ensuing combat, after all the participants had fallen, the opposing forces joined the melee, with the result that Israel was routed. As Abner fled from the skirmish, he was doggedly pursued by the fleet Asahel, who refused to heed Abner's warning to desist and was slain. Joab and Abishai continued the obstinate pursuit until evening and were dissuaded from further bloodshed only by the urgent pleading of Abner and the regrouping of his forces. With Abner's admission of defeat, Joab halted the conflict and marched homeward to Hebron, interring on the way the body of his brother Asahel in the family sepulchre at Bethlehem (II Sam. 2:32).

The dissolution of amicable relations between Ish-baal and Abner, which was climaxed in their altercation over Rizpah, prompted the commander of Israel's forces to open negotiations with David with a view to effecting a united monarchy under his rule. Abner and his diplomatic corps then proceeded to Hebron, where they were feted by David, and after a satisfactory plan for the unification of the kingdom was formulated, they departed to accomplish its realization. Shortly thereafter Joab, who was ignorant of what had happened, returned to Hebron from a predatory foray and learned to his amazement that David had quite forgotten the unrequited blood of his nephew Asahel by sending Abner away in peace. Without the knowledge of David, the turbulent soldier sent messengers to recall Abner, and when he returned, Joab and Abishai treacherously slew him in the gate of Hebron. This wanton murder of Abner was decried by David with a harsh invective and fierce imprecation upon Joab, who was commanded to observe the passing of his enemy with sackcloth and mourning. The motive of Joab in the assassination of Abner was hardly to dispose of a spy (II Sam. 3:25); the deed was dictated as much by jealousy lest Abner assume command of the army as by desire for blood revenge for his brother Asahel (II Sam. 3:6-39).

The military service of Joab seems to have been commensurate with all the important conquests of David. The capture of the Jebusite stronghold of Zion by the daring assault of Joab through the water shaft won for him the permanent command of the army in accordance with the promise of David, who subsequently entrusted him with the repair of the city (II Sam. 5:6 ff; 8:16; 20:23; I Chr. 11:4 ff; 18:15; 27:34). Joab participated in the campaign of David against the Edomites, who had their country occupied and their male population exterminated by the forces of Joab (II Sam. 8:13-14; I Kings 11:15; Ps. 60). He was in charge of the Israelite campaign against the Syro-Ammonite axis and threw the Syrians (Arameans) into confusion by his attack while his brother Abishai routed the Ammonites, forcing them to return to Rabbah (II Sam. 10:6-14; I Chr. 19:6-15). Later Joab was in charge of the military operations when the land of Ammon was ravaged and its capital, Rabbah, was placed under siege. It was during this siege that Joab became a party to the nefarious plot of the king against Uriah (II Sam. 11; I Chr. 20:1-3). When the fall of Rabbah was imminent, Joab displayed a kindlier aspect of his nature by inviting the king, who had remained in Jerusalem, to assume command of the troops and be given the honor of the actual capture of the city (II Sam. 12:26-28).

Although Joab is not particularly mentioned in the other conquests of David, it is most probable that he played an important role in the subjugation of the Philistines (II Sam. 5:17-25; 8:1; I Chr. 14:10-16; 18:1), the Moabites (II Sam. 8:2; I Chr. 18:2), and the Arameans (II Sam. 8:3-8; 10:6-19; I Kings 11:23-24; I Chr. 18:3-8; cf. above).

As a confidant of David, Joab was successful in obtaining the recall of Absalom from Geshur, where he had fled after the slaying of Amnon. Through a clever stratagem carefully concocted by Joab and skilfully executed by a wise woman of Tekoa, the king was made aware of his inconsistent attitude toward Absalom; and he then permitted his son to return to Jerusalem, although he was debarred from the court. After two years of this unbearable situation Joab was summoned by Absalom to intercede for him again with the king, but Joab refused twice to see the prince. It was only after Absalom resorted to the desperate expedient of firing the barley field of Joab that the commander pleaded the inequitable case of Absalom and obtained from David his son's reinstatement at court (II Sam. 14).

In the rebellion of Absalom, Joab maintained his loyalty to David and marshaled a third of the royal forces against the rebel. When the plight of Absalom, who had become ensnared in the branches of an oak by his hair, was communicated to Joab, he slew the prince forthwith, in direct violation of the express orders of David, and raised a cairn over the corpse. Joab then dispatched messengers to bring David the tidings of the battle (II Sam. 18). When David learned of the death of his son, he broke out in unrestrained grief and cast such a pall over the brilliant victory of his followers that Joab had to rebuke the king for the incongruity of his behavior. For his insubordination in the death of Absalom Joab appears to have been relieved of his command, for in his preparation to assume the monarchy again, David shrewdly obviated most of the remaining difficulty by appointing Amasa, the leader of the rebel forces of Absalom, as the successor to Joab in the command of David's army (II Sam. 19:1-13).

The rebellion of Sheba, which took place immediately upon the reinstatement of David, threatened the very existence of the united kingdom and evoked from the king the urgent order for Amasa, the new commander of the army, to gather within three days the Judean forces. Amasa failed to return within the appointed time; consequently, David placed Abishai in command of the royal guards and ordered him to quell the uprising. When Amasa joined his command at Gibeon, Joab, who accompanied the expedition, perfidiously murdered him and, by an appeal to his loyal followers and by a speedy suppression of the revolt, regained incontestably his former position (II Sam. 20).

The census of the people which David ordered evoked from Joab the strongest protests, but to no avail, and occupied the commander for more than nine months (II Sam. 24:1-8; I Chr. 21:1-5; 27:24).

It was the dispute of Adonijah and Solomon over dynastic succession that ultimately led to the downfall of Joab. With Abiathar the priest, Joab supported the regal claims of Adonijah and was at the supposed coronation feast when the ominous news came that David had nominated Solomon as his successor. The proponents of Adonijah melted quickly away; Joab himself rushed for sanctuary to the horns of the altar, but even this plea for asylum did not mollify the implacable anger of Solomon toward this aged soldier, whose bloody deeds had irritated and embarrassed the house of David sufficiently long to warrant his summary dispatch by Benaiah (I Kings 1:7, 41; 2:28-35).

Joab possessed all the virtues and the vices of an ancient warrior. He was devotedly loyal to the king, utterly fearless (II Sam. 10:12; I Chr. 11:6), and a shrewd tactician (II Sam. 10:9 ff; 18:22); but he was also irrepressibly self-willed (II Sam. 18:5, 14), summarily truculent (II Sam. 3:27; 18:14; 20:10 ff), and untrustworthy toward his inferiors (II Sam. 11:14 ff; 18:12 ff). Although he was not without religious feeling, it was devoid of any real ethical content (II Sam. 10:12; 24:3; I Chr. 26:28). No small share of the military successes of David is attributable to Joab, who, with his retinue of ten armor-bearers (II Sam. 18:15; 23:37) and his renowned heroism, must have been an imposing personage in Israel, commanding the respect of his followers and inspiring fear in his enemies (I Kings 11:21).

2. Son of the Judahite Seraiah, a descendant of Kenaz, who was the father—i.e., ancestor—of the Geharashim—i.e., (the dwellers in) the valley of smiths, which may be identified with the Wadi Arabah (I Chr. 4:14; see bibliography).

3. The eponym of a Judean family which was represented in the return from the Babylonian captivity to Judah in the days of Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:6; Neh. 7:11; see PAHATH-MOAB) and in the days of Ezra, when Obadiah the son of Jehiel was head of the family (Ezra 8:9; I Esd. 8:35).

Bibliography. N. Glueck, The Other Side of the Jordan (1940), p. 83. E. R. DALGLISH

JOACHAZ jō'ə kăz [Ἰωαχαζ, LXX A I Esd. 1:34—G 1:32; other texts read Ιεχονιας (Jeconiah)]. KJV Apoc. form of JEHOAHAZ 3.

JOACHIM; JOACIM. KJV Apoc. forms of JEHOIACHIN; JEHOIAKIM; JOAKIM.

JOADANUS jō'ə dā'nəs. KJV form of JODAN.

JOAH jō'ə [יואח, Yahu is brother]. 1. A Levite; son of Obed-edom (I Chr. 26:4).

2. A Levite; son of Zimnah (I Chr. 6:21—H 6:6); perhaps the same as the Joah who assisted in the reforms of King Hezekiah (II Chr. 29:12).

3. A court official, and a member of the deputation from King Hezekiah to the Assyrian armies (II Kings 18:18, 26, 37; cf. Isa. 36:3, 11, 22).

4. Recorder under King Josiah; one of those deputized to see to the repair of the temple (II Chr. 34:8).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 69, 141. B. T. DAHLBERG

JOAHAZ. Alternate form of JEHOAHAZ.

JOAKIM jō'ə kĭm [Ἰωακίμ]; KJV JOACHIM; JOACIM. 1. A son of Zerubbabel who came from Babylonia as leader of a group (I Esd. 5:5).

2. The high priest at Jerusalem in the story of Judith (Jth. 4:6, 8, 14; 15:8).

3. Susanna's husband (Sus. 1, 63). N. TURNER

JOANAN jō ā'nən [Ἰωανάν=יוחנן] (Luke 3:27); KJV JOANNA jō ăn'ə. An ancestor of Jesus.

JOANNA jō ăn'ə [Ἰωάν(ν)α, probably feminine of Ἰωάννης, John]. The "wife of Herod's [Antipas'] steward"; one, among others, who was healed and who provided for Jesus and the Twelve "out of [her] means" (Luke 8:3). In Luke 24:10 Joanna, with Mary Magdalene (as in 8:2-3), Mary the mother of James, and "the other women," is said to have been at the empty tomb. B. H. THROCKMORTON, JR.

JOANNAN jō ăn'ən. KJV Apoc. form of JOHN 1.

JOARIB jō'ə rĭb [Ἰωαρ(ε)ίβ=יויריב, may Yahu contend]. The head of the priestly family from whom the Maccabees traced their descent (I Macc. 2:1; 14:29; cf. Jos. Antiq. XII.vi.1). The family first appears in the time of David (I Chr. 24:7), when it is called Jehoiarib. M. NEWMAN

JOASH jō'ăsh [יואש, Y gives, or has given, from Arab. 'wš, to give, bestow]. Alternately: JEHOASH jĭ hō'ăsh [יהואש]. 1. A man of Manasseh, of the clan of Abiezer; father of Gideon (Judg. 6:11-15). He lived at Ophrah, whose location has not been established with certainty. Here was a sacred oak where oracles were given. In Judg. 6:11-32 two traditions appear to have been combined, and the details are difficult to fit together. Joash had apparently built an altar to Baal, and had also made an Asherah (vs. 25). These Gideon was commanded to destroy. Joash took his son's part when the men of the town remonstrated with him (vss. 28-32).

2. A man of Judah; one of the sons of Shelah (I Chr. 4:22; LXX B reads Ἰωαδα).

3. A Benjaminite of the clan of Becher (I Chr. 7:8).

4. A Benjaminite, son of Shemaah of Gibeah; a Mighty Man, ambidextrous in shooting arrows and slinging stones. He came to David at Ziklag, while David was held there by Saul and his men. Joash was second in command to Ahiezer (I Chr. 12:1-3).

5. One of David's officers in charge of the stores of oil (I Chr. 27:28).

6. A son of Ahab, associated with Amon the governor of Samaria. To their care Micaiah son of Imlah was entrusted after he had uttered a prophecy of doom against King Ahab as he went to campaign against Ramoth-gilead (I Kings 22:26; II Chr. 18:25).

7. King of Judah ca. 837-800 B.C.; son of Ahaziah.

With the murder of King Ahaziah of Judah by Jehu in his bloody revolution in the N, the throne of Judah was seized by the queen mother, Athaliah. Her first act was to destroy the royal family (II Kings 11:1), presumably to rid herself of anyone who could challenge her position. But one of Ahaziah's sons, Joash, escaped through the intervention of his aunt Jehosheba, the wife of Jehoiada the high priest of Yahweh, and was kept hidden in the temple precincts for six years along with his nurse. During this period Athaliah reigned as queen over the land.

In the seventh year, however, a revolution similar to that which had occurred in the N under Jehu, but on a much smaller scale, broke out in Judah. It is interesting to note that in the revolutions in both the N and S kingdoms religion played a prominent part. No details are given of the situation in Judah during the six/seven years of Athaliah's rule. One can imagine, however, on the basis of her former background and her initial act as queen, that she ruled as a despot and alienated the people. Further, the Davidic dynasty was imperiled and was in danger of being blotted out. It is clear, too, that the religion of Yahweh was endangered, for Athaliah was a devotee of Baal, and under her royal patronage Baalism flourished in the land. The high priest of Baal at the time, Mattan (II Kings 11:18), had a Phoenician name. It is probable that the Baal was the Tyrian Baal-Melcarth, and that the worship of this god had gained a stronghold in both the N and the S. The Judean revolt is, therefore, from the historical point of view a sequel to the Israelite revolt.

The leader of the revolution was Jehoiada, the high priest of Yahweh. When the opportune time arrived, he organized the mercenaries, the temple guards, and the people. The day chosen was the sabbath, which was a holiday. Jehoiada so arranged the guards that all three companies were present at the same time in the temple. Then he brought in the young king, crowned him, and anointed him, and those present shouted: "Long live the king!" (II Kings 11:4-12).

On hearing the shouting, Athaliah came to the temple. Apparently she realized at a glance what the situation meant. On Jehoiada's orders she was taken outside the temple to one of the palace gates and there slain (II Kings 11:13-16). It is possible that this section (vss. 13-18*a*) is secondary.

There followed a covenant-making ceremony in which king and people alike pledged themselves to be the people of Yahweh. The second covenant, "between the king and the people," is omitted by many scholars, and is absent from Chronicles. But there is point in its inclusion on this occasion. The people pledged anew their loyalty to the Davidic dynasty. The phrase "the people of the land" used here means more than "the populace." It probably means "full citizens." The people were not organized but acted in times of political crisis (cf. II Kings 21:24; 23: 30*b*).

After the queen's death the people destroyed the house of Baal, with its altars and images, and murdered Mattan the Baal priest. There is no mention of further bloodshed, though the fact that special guards were placed over the temple suggests the possibility of such further acts. These, however, did not occur. "The city was quiet," and the people rejoiced (II Kings 11:17-20). The Chronicler's representation of these events (II Chr. 22:10–23:21), while based essentially on II Kings 11, differs from it in several points, particularly in its emphasis on the part played by the priests and the Levites and the sacredness of the temple. From the historical point of view Kings gives a more accurate picture of what actually happened.

Joash was seven years old when he began to reign, and he reigned for forty years. His mother was Zibiah of Beer-sheba (II Kings 12:1). It is probable that the figure of forty years is a round number, and perhaps it includes the period of Athaliah's reign. Theoretically, Joash became king at his father's death in 842. The discrepancy of twenty-two years between the regnal totals given for Israel and Judah for the period 842-721 can in large measure be corrected by relying on the synchronistic data. It is clear that Jehoiada acted as regent of the kingdom and as tutor to the boy king (II Kings 12:2). Chronicles adds the further information that "Jehoiada got for him two wives, and he had sons and daughters" (II Chr. 24: 3). This item is important, as Joash represented the last member of the Davidic line.

During the reign of Joash, who proved to be a good king, repairs were made to the temple, and the system of temple revenue was improved (II Kings 12:5-17). By this time the temple was, no doubt, in need of extensive repairs. The story gives a picture of the dishonesty practiced by the temple priests, and how they misappropriated temple funds for their own use. It tells further how the king put a stop to these practices by having a collection box placed at the entrance of the temple. Into this box the "priests who guarded the threshold" had to put the money as it was handed to them in the presence of the givers. When the box was full, the king's secretary and the high priest came and counted the money, which was then given to the overseers. They in their turn paid the workmen. The story is an interesting commentary on priestly practices, which necessitated a royal rebuke. It is noteworthy that in the account of Josiah's reformation (II Kings 22) details are taken from this narrative.

The Chronicler's account of this incident (II Chr. 24:4-14*a*) differs considerably from Kings. Presumably his source was the "Commentary [midrash] on the Book of the Kings" (vs. 27). It presents a picture which cannot be regarded as historical.

The Chronicler has a further story about a break between the king and the priesthood after the death of Jehoiada. This culminated in the murder of Jehoiada's son Zechariah, who was stoned to death by the people (II Chr. 24:15-22). That this tradition is historically reliable seems to be borne out by the reminiscence in Matt. 23:35 (cf. Luke 11:51).

In the reign of Joash, Judah suffered a bitter humiliation at the hands of Hazael of Aram (II Kings 12:17-18; cf. II Chr. 24:23-24). Hazael captured Gath, probably the modern Araq el-Menshiyeh, on the way to Gaza. This may indicate a conquest of Philistia, which would have given him control of the caravan routes from Egypt. He then planned to attack Jerusalem, but Joash bought him off by paying a heavy tribute. The details the Chronicler gives of this event are not reliable.

Joash was assassinated in a palace conspiracy led by some of his servants. The leaders are named (II Kings 12:20-21; II Chr. 24:25-26). The Chronicler here relied on a different tradition from the writer of Kings. The motive he alleges for the murder was the death of Zechariah. It seems better, however, with Kings to leave unanswered the question of motive. The general historical background was clearly one of disorder in both kingdoms.

Bibliography. W. F. Albright, "Contributions to the Historical Geography of Palestine," AASOR, II-III (1923), 11 ff; C. C. Torrey, "The Foundry of the Second Temple at Jerusalem," JBL, 55 (1936), 247 ff; H. G. May, "A Key to the Interpretation of Zechariah's Visions," JBL, 57 (1938), 181; R. B. Y. Scott, "The Pillars Jachin and Boaz," JBL, LVIII (1939), 143 ff; C. C. Torrey, "A Hebrew Seal from the Reign of Ahaz," BASOR, 79 (1940), 28, note 1 by W. F. Albright; J. A. Thomson, "On Some Stamps and a Seal from Lachish," BASOR, 86 (1942), 24 ff; W. Eichrodt, Theologie des Alten Testaments, I (3rd ed., 1948), 221-31; J. A. Montgomery, The Books of Kings, ICC (1951), p. 431; G. von Rad, Studies in Deuteronomy (1953), pp. 60 ff.

* 8. King of Israel ca. 801-786 B.C.; son and successor of Jehoahaz.

Joash reigned for sixteen years (II Kings 13:10). II Kings 13:12-13 is parallel to 14:15-16, and is out of place here.

During the last illness of ELISHA, King Joash went to see him. In a series of symbolic acts, reminiscent of sympathetic magic, Elisha promised him victory three times over Syria (II Kings 13:14-19). The specific mention of a victory at Aphek (vs. 17) is highly unlikely, and is probably a reference to I Kings 20:26 ff. The datum of an annual invasion of Israel by the Moabites each spring (II Kings 13:20) may be historical, in the sense of limited forays.

The background of II Kings 13:24-25 can now be filled out from Assyrian records and the Aramaic inscription of Zakir. In 805 Adad-nirarî III, the Assyrian king, led an expedition to Palestine. He claims to have subjected "the country of the Hittites, Amurru-country in its full extent, Tyre, Sidon, Israel (mat Ḫu-um-ri), Edom, Palestine (Pa-la-as-tu) as far as the shore of the Great Sea of the Setting Sun," and imposed tribute upon them. Then he marched against Damascus, where he "shut up Mari, king of Damascus, in Damascus, his royal residence." Damascus had to pay a very heavy tribute—a hundred talents of gold, a thousand talents of silver, and much else in the way of spoil. Aram was left prostrate, and there seems to have been a general uprising of the neighboring states against her. The Zakir Inscription, the date of which is open to question but is in all probability after 805 B.C., tells of an unsuccessful expedition led by "Bar-hadad bar Hazael king of Aram" against Zakir, "king of Hamath and La'ash."

This is the background against which Joash's successful campaign against Ben-hadad of Syria, who had succeeded his father, Hazael, as king, is to be set. Joash took the opportunity to recover for Israel the territory previously lost to Aram in the reign of Jehoahaz.

Not only was Joash successful against Aram; he was also victorious against Judah. Amaziah king of Judah, flushed with pride as the result of his victory over Edom, challenged Joash to battle. Amaziah's army was routed at Beth-shemesh of Judah, and he himself was captured. Joash came to Jerusalem, broke down part of the wall, despoiled the temple and the royal treasuries, and took hostages back to Samaria (II Kings 14:8-14). It is clear that, for all practical purposes, Judah was reduced to the status of a vassal. Israel had recovered her position, and under Joash's son Jeroboam II she reached her greatest heights.

Bibliography. J. B. Bury et al., eds., Cambridge Ancient History, III (1925), 375-76; F.-M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine, II (1938), 282; A. Guillaume, Prophecy and Divination (1938), especially pp. 173-74; J. Simons, Jerusalem in the OT (1952), pp. 233 ff, 300 (note 3), 301 (note 2); J. B. Pritchard, ed., ANET (2nd ed., 1955), pp. 281-82. H. B. MACLEAN

JOATHAM. KJV NT form of JOTHAM 2.

JOAZABDUS. KJV Apoc. alternate form of JOZABAD.

JOB. KJV form of IOB.

JOB, BOOK OF jōb. The eighteenth book in the OT canon in the English versions. The book of Job takes its title from the central figure of the story; other biblical documents—Joshua, Samuel, Ruth, Jonah, Esther, Ezra, Nehemiah, Daniel, and the various prophetic books—are named after a hero or heroine or a pre-eminent figure appearing in them.

1. Name
2. Text and versions
3. Place in the canon
4. Original language
5. Date
6. Author
7. Background and parallels
8. Content
   a. The Prologue
   b. The Dialogue
   c. The Elihu speeches
   d. The speeches of Yahweh
   e. The Epilogue
9. Literary form
10. Unity and integrity
11. Purpose and teaching

Bibliography

1. Name. The English form of the hero's name, based on the Greek and Latin transcriptions, Ἰώβ and Iob, gives a rather inaccurate rendering of the Hebrew form of the name, איוב, 'iyyôbh. The German form, Hiob, is somewhat closer to the Hebrew, but still not exact. The derivation and meaning of the name are uncertain. The apparent root of the name, איב, 'yb, is perhaps to be connected with the idea of "enmity, hostility." The common word for "enemy" is the simple active participle of this root, אויב, 'ôyēbh (nomen agentis). The form of the name (the nominal pattern qaṭṭâl > qiṭṭôl) is that usually designating a profession (nomen professionis), or habitual or characteristic activity, such as gannâbh, "thief" (professional or habitual), or gibbôr (< gabbâr), "powerful man." Accordingly, the name would mean something like "inveterate foe." This form of the root איב, however, is not otherwise attested. If the name does mean "enemy, foe," it may have been intended as symbolic of the hero's attitude toward God, of his adverse reaction to the seemingly senseless suffering inflicted on him. The opposite sense has also been suggested for the name. There is an adjective or noun of this pattern, ילוד, yillôdh, which has apparent passival sense, "(one) born," and accordingly the name has been interpreted as designating one who is the object of enmity or persecution; this sense is quite appropriate for the name of one who is the victim of a cruel wager and experiment on the part of the Lord and "the" Satan and the target of criticism by his fair-weather friends. The passival sense of this nominal pattern, however, is not otherwise attested and is far from certain.

The name has also been related to the Arabic root 'wb, "return, repent," and thus 'awwâb > 'ayyâb > 'iyyôbh would mean "the penitent one," or the like.

The notion that the name may have been artificially constructed, ad hoc, to characterize the hero of the story, is now seen to be without basis. In the Execration Texts from Egypt (ca. 2000 B.C.) a Palestinian chief bears the name 'ybm (i.e., 'Ayyâbum). The name also occurs in Akkadian documents of the second millennium B.C. from Mari, Alalakh, and Amarna. In the Amarna Letter no. 256 the prince of Ashtaroth in Bashan is one Ay(y)âb (a-ya-bu). The name has been explained by W. F. Albright as meaning "Where is (my) Father?" similar to the names Ayaḥammu/ḥalu, "Where is the Paternal/Maternal Clan?" The name is perhaps contracted from a longer form such as Ayabi-sharri, "Where is my Father, O King?" or Ayabi-ilu, "Where is my Father, O God?" The authenticity and the antiquity of the name 'Ayyâb>'Iyyôb is thus well attested, as borne by a number of Western Semites in the second millennium B.C. It is an ordinary name and may have been chosen for this reason, or it may be that some ancient worthy bearing it actually experienced a fate such as described in the biblical story and became the type and model of the righteous sufferer.

2. Text and versions. The text of the book of Job leaves much to be desired, and resources for its restitution and reconstitution are meager. Comparison of the MT with the LXX in a few cases leads to the correction of the Hebrew, but for the most part the Hebrew has to be relied on rather than the Greek.

Many verses of the received Hebrew text were missing from the oldest form of the Greek text. In Origen's time the current Greek version was shorter than the Hebrew by some four hundred lines. Origen supplied the missing lines from Theodotion, who gave a full translation rather than the abridged form of the original LXX. The lines supplied from Theodotion were marked by Origen with asterisks. A Coptic translation of the LXX of Job, published in 1899, agrees substantially with the pre-Origen text in the omission of the passages Origen marked with asterisks. The situation with the text of Job is similar to that of Jeremiah, where the Greek is also considerably shorter than the Hebrew. Some scholars have supposed that the shorter Greek text of Job represents the more primitive form of the book and that the Hebrew was later expanded. The weight of the evidence, however, is against this view. The omissions of the Greek do not improve matters, and in many cases the difficulty of the extant material is increased by the lack of coherent context. It appears that the Greek translator did what the modern translator is tempted to do with some of the more difficult passages of the Hebrew, simply to give up the attempt to translate as futile. In many cases the LXX must be regarded as more of a paraphrase than a translation, and in some instances the sense of the Greek is so far removed from the Hebrew as to constitute a radical reinterpretation. Theological bias is apparent in many instances in the LXX and especially in passages where the sense of the Hebrew is obscured or even radically altered. A flagrant example is the famous text 13:15, where the Masoretes resorted to a simple and convenient device to change the shocking sense of the verse, but the LXX translator completely revamped the verse so as to alter entirely the sense and the tone of Job's bitter outcry.

The other versions are no more helpful than the LXX. The Peshitta is occasionally useful, as it was made from the Hebrew and clarifies some of the obscure words. The Targ. presents many curiosities, but does not contribute substantially to the restitution or understanding of the text. A portion of a Targ. of Job has been found at Qumran, but its textual value remains to be assessed. The Vulg., according to Jerome, was translated directly from the Hebrew text current in his day, at the end of the fourth century. But Jerome, as he admits, in the face of many difficulties, translated sometimes literally and sometimes freely, according to the sense. Jerome was assisted in his task by a rabbi of Lydda, who apparently influenced him along the line of traditional rabbinic exegesis. Jerome was also inevitably influenced by the LXX hexapla, which he had himself translated into Latin. The Vulg. thus must be employed with considerable discretion, but so used, it is a valuable help in the study of the text of Job. The MT, although manifestly corrupt and needing emendation in many places, remains our primary source. Conjectural emendation is often necessary, and all translators are forced to take some liberties with the text to avoid rendering nonsense. Modern research in Semitic philology and linguistics, and especially the recovery of the Ugaritic mythological texts, has shown some words and forms previously suspect to be quite correctly preserved. At the same time, while some words have been authenticated, others have been rendered suspect by new data. With the possible exception of Hosea, Job remains textually the most difficult book of the OT.

3. Place in the canon. The book belongs to the last of the three divisions of the Hebrew scriptures, the Kᵉthûbhîm, Hagiographa, or Writings. Except by Theodore of Mopsuestia, the canonicity of the book has not been questioned. Its position among the Writings varies somewhat. The oldest tradition (Talmud, B.B. 14*b*) gives the order as Ruth, Psalms, Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Songs, Lamentations, Daniel, Esther, Ezra, Chronicles. The order Psalms, Job, Proverbs, is found in Codex Alexandrinus; but the order Job, Psalms, Proverbs, is attested by Cyril of Jerusalem, Epiphanius, Jerome, Rufinus, and the Apostolic Canons. The order Job, Proverbs, Psalms, is indicated by the Hebrew initials which designated the poetic trilogy, having a special system of accents, אמת, 'iyyôbh, mišlê, tᵉhillîm; while the order Psalms, Job, Proverbs, is indicated by the alternative designation, תאם. Other orders are mentioned by the Latin fathers, but the order favored by Jerome, with Job as the first of the great poetic trilogy, was fixed by the Council of Trent as the order of the Vulg. and this has been generally followed in modern versions in the West.

4. Original language. The language of Job, while ostensibly Hebrew, presents many difficulties to the philologist, translator, and interpreter. In view of the Edomite connections of the characters and setting of the story, it has been suggested (Voltaire, J. G. von Herder, E. Renan) that the poem is an echo of the famed wisdom of Edom. It has even been concluded that the author was an Edomite and not a Jew. For the Edomite language, unfortunately, we have very meager linguistic data. It is known to be a dialect of Canaanite, and must have been quite similar to the neighboring dialects Hebrew, Ammonite, and Moabite. We will have to know more of the dialect of Edom before we can judge its influence on the language of the book of Job.

The suggestion was first made by Ibn Ezra that the difficulties of the book of Job derive from the fact that it is a translation. This view has been echoed by a number of modern scholars. Arabic has been suggested as the original language. A considerable number of words found in Job and not otherwise known in Hebrew have been explained from Arabic. This, however, is also true of many other OT words outside the book of Job. The explanation of this fact is quite simple—Arabic is the best known and has the richest vocabulary of any of the Semitic languages. Many obscurities in the Ugaritic texts have also been clarified by recourse to Arabic. The idea that Job is translated from an Arabic dialect is, on the face of it, improbable, and the linguistic evidence for it is insufficient to warrant a review of the case.

The most striking linguistic feature of Job is its strong Aramaic coloring. Aramaic elements in the book are universally admitted. Often in the poetic parallelism Hebrew and Aramaic words are juxtaposed as synonyms. There are also phonological and morphological features that are characteristically Aramaic. Now it is recognized that even classical Hebrew has some features and inconsistencies that seem best explained as due to Aramaic influence, so much so that some Semitists have classified Hebrew as a hybrid speech (Mischsprache). The admixture of Aramaic elements in Job, however, exceeds that of any other biblical book. It has been argued that the explanation of the mixture in Job is that we have, not a hybrid language, but rather a halfway translation from an Aramaic original. The incomplete translator wished to make the Aramaic poetry accessible to Hebrew-speaking readers and made only such alterations as he deemed necessary. Since much of the alleged original Aramaic would be intelligible without change, it was left unaltered. Thus in large part the supposed Aramaic original remains, in hundreds of words, grammatical forms, idioms, and phonetic traits. The Hebrew translator, it is alleged, in many cases failed to recognize the proper sense of Aramaic words and phrases and thus mistranslated. The Masoretes, quite naturally, had their troubles with this Aramaic-Hebrew mixture and vocalized many of the words incorrectly.

According to Tur Sinai, the alleged original Aramaic of Job is Babylonian and not later than the sixth century. The author was supposedly a Jew who in the early days of the Babylonian exile composed the poem on the basis of an ancient legend. Some generations later in Palestine the "translator" performed the incomplete operation on the poem.

The testing of this theory of linguistic mixture and halfway translation from Aramaic yields little by way of assured improvement in the sense. The presence of numerous Aramaic elements in the book of Job cannot be denied, but a satisfactory explanation of this fact has not been given. It seems best to operate with the Hebrew(?) text as we have it, with a minimum of alteration. It may be that no small part of our difficulty with the language of Job is due to our lack of knowledge. The Ugaritic texts have contributed a great deal to the improvement of our knowledge of ancient Northwest Semitic poetry, and it may be that future discoveries and studies will further improve our understanding.

5. Date. The patriarchal background of the prose narrative gave rise to an ancient view that the author was Moses himself (Talmud, B.B. 14*b*). The apocryphal appendix at the end of the LXX goes even deeper into antiquity, identifying Job with Jobab, king of Edom (Gen. 36:33), grandson of Esau, and great-great-grandson of Abraham. The patriarchal coloring appears to be quite authentic in detail. The religion depicted is primitive. There is no priesthood or central shrine. Divine anger is assuaged by sacrifice offered by the patriarch (Job 1:5; 42:8), as in the Balaam story (Num. 23:1, 14, 24). Wealth consists of cattle and slaves (Job 1:3; 42:12), as in the patriarchal narratives (Gen. 12:16; 32:5). The Sabeans and Chaldeans are represented still as marauding nomads (Job 1:15, 17). The unit of money mentioned in 42:11 (the קשיטה) is referred to elsewhere only in Gen. 33:19; Josh. 24:32. Job's exceptional longevity (Job 42:17) is matched or surpassed only in the patriarchal period (cf. Gen. 35:28-29) or earlier. Moreover, the style of the Prologue and the Epilogue exhibits a number of literary features which are characteristic of Semitic epic and have their most striking parallels in the Ugaritic literature. These features comprise a sort of epic substratum, as it has been termed. This epic substratum may very well derive from an older Job epic which served as the basis of the present Prologue and Epilogue. That there was an ancient Job legend, and perhaps an epic, is indicated by the allusion to Job in Ezek. 14:14, 20, in association with Noah and Danel. The antiquity of the Noah legend is patent, and we now know that the Danel here mentioned was also a relatively ancient worthy. This Danel, in all probability the prototype of the biblical hero Daniel, we meet in an Ugaritic epic which dates from the middle of the second millennium B.C. The Keret epic, also from the same time and place, has some marked affinities with Job, for it tells of a king who lost his entire family, but who by divine favor and assistance got a new wife and other children. He was also smitten with a seemingly fatal illness and yet was restored to health. Some of the Mesopotamian parallels to Job are also quite ancient. The so-called Babylonian Job, the text entitled "I Will Praise the Lord of Wisdom," long known from copies of the seventh century B.C., is now attested in a copy ca. a thousand years older. A Sumerian version of the Job motif, dating from ca. 1700 B.C. and probably derived from an original composition at least as early as the third dynasty of Ur, ca. 2000, has now been recovered. Thus the parallels to the Job story go back at least to the second millennium B.C. and enhance the probability that a very ancient legend and epic lies behind the prose narrative which serves as the framework of the poetic dialogue. Some scholars have dated the prose narrative in the Persian period because of the appearance of "the" Satan (with the definite article as in Zech. 3:1 ff). The Satan, however, is missing from the Epilogue, and it may be that the episodes involving the Satan are a later graft on the original prose tale. The Epilogue places the responsibility for Job's misfortunes solely on the Lord (Job. 42:11). The divine assembly of 1:6-12; 2:1-7, apart from the problem of the Satan, is a reflex of early Near Eastern mythology which we meet in Mesopotamian literature and in the Ugaritic texts and is echoed in some of the biblical Psalms and in Second Isaiah. The celestial court scene in Job has more in common with the vision of Micaiah ben Imlah (I Kings 22:19-23), in the ninth century, than with the vision of the high priest's trial in Zech. 3, in spite of the use of the definite article with the word "Satan" in both passages.

While the introduction of the Satan into the narrative may be as late as the sixth or fifth century, the core of the story featuring an Edomite hero and an Edomite supporting cast would hardly have come into existence in the exilic or early postexilic period, when the Edomites had incurred the lasting enmity of the Judeans (cf. Pss. 83:4-6; 137:7; Isa. 34:5-6; Jer. 49:7-22; Lam. 4:21; Ezek. 25:12-14; 35:2; Obad. 10-14). There is nothing to indicate that the choice of an Edomite hero was motivated by a desire to prick the consciences of particularist bigots, as may be the case with the choice of a Moabitess as the heroine of the book of Ruth.

While it is impossible to fix the date of the prose narrative exactly, there is no reason, apart from the references to the Satan, to place it later than the seventh century B.C., and its antecedents may go back a millennium or more. The author of the poetic dialogues and the latest editors of the completed book may have made considerable alterations and adaptations in the old Job legend, but there seems little ground for doubt that they made use of a narrative featuring many genuinely archaic elements.

The opinions of the rabbis as to the date of the book of Job varied from pre-Mosaic times to the time of Cyrus and Ahasuerus. Eusebius advocated a pre-Mosaic date, and a few scholars in modern times have argued for the same. Gregory of Nazianzus, in the fourth century A.D., placed the book in the time of Solomon, and this view also found favor with a small number of modern scholars. The seventh century B.C., early, middle, and late, has been proposed by a number of critics, mostly German, of the late nineteenth century. In more recent times the tendency has been to date the book between the sixth and fourth centuries. Opinion is divided as to whether Job is earlier or later than the Second Isaiah, with eminent scholars on both sides. The theme of innocent suffering is common to Job and Isa. 52:13–53:12, but, while Job is concerned with the individual, the Second Isaiah deals with the nation. It has been argued that since the nation's interest was recognized before that of the individual, the Suffering Servant passage must be earlier than Job. This argument has little cogency, since the theme of individual suffering was current in the literature of Egypt and Mesopotamia centuries earlier and is given eloquent expression by Jeremiah. It occurs also in a number of psalms, but these cannot be dated with any degree of exactness. In relation to the problem of suffering, individual or national, there is no firm basis for dating Job later than the Second Isaiah. A date between Jeremiah and the Second Isaiah has been suggested. This would place the book in the first generation of the Exile and relate it inescapably to the suffering of the nation. This view has some intriguing implications, but there is no hint in the book that the poet has any thought of the fate or destiny of any nation. The allusion to the deportation of dignitaries (Job 12:17-19) is too general to be taken as a reference to the exile of Judah. The entire history of Israel is completely ignored. If the author was a Jew of the first generation of the Exile, the shock of the experience seems to have destroyed all concern and hope for the nation. The choice of an Edomite, of all people, as the hero of the story would indicate complete rejection of nationalist aspirations. The destruction of the nation is a fait accompli. God has acted in history, and the act was one of destruction. Where now was there ground for hope? The rejection of nationalism by the author of Job would thus anticipate the similar development in the rise of Christianity. The implications of such speculation could be developed further, but it is only speculation, since there is nothing in the book itself to suggest an exilic setting.

The majority of critics, in the absence of any indication of exilic setting, assign the book to the post-exilic period. Within this period, however, there is no firm consensus, and the suggestions range from the fifth to the third century. The book certainly reached its final form by 200 B.C., since it was known to Ben Sirach (Ecclus. 49:9), and no critic has suggested a date later than ca. 250 B.C.

The reason for the considerable spread in the dating of the book is simply that the evidence is inconclusive. For almost every argument for a given century, counterarguments can be given. It does not serve the cause of truth to pretend that any great degree of certainty attaches to any of the various dates that have been proposed.

6. Author. Despite the evidences that the book is a composite, as were most literary productions of the ancient Near East, still there must have been a single personality who gave to the work the high literary quality which characterizes it. This person will doubtless remain anonymous, like the author of the poems of the latter half of the book of Isaiah, and we can know him only through his work. That he was a poet of rare genius cannot be doubted, for the book has been hailed by men of letters as the greatest, or one of the greatest, of the masterpieces of world literature. The author of the Dialogue was a deeply religious soul, sensitive to the suffering of humanity at large and especially to that of particular and exceptional individuals. He himself must have suffered greatly—if not in his own flesh, at least in his mind—out of empathy and sympathy for others. Some have felt that he could not have written as he did without having himself experienced intense and prolonged suffering. The depth and the earnestness of the author's thought and feeling, the keenness of his insight into human nature, the vivid beauty of his expression, as well as the universal human concern with the problem of pain, gives the work a quality of realism and a power to stir the human soul in all times and places. The influence of the biblical book on modern literature has been profound, as seen pre-eminently in Goethe's Faust and Byron's Manfred.

That the author was an Israelite is not entirely certain. Parts of the book may indicate familiarity with the prophetic and wisdom literature of the OT. Job's complaint recalls some of the psalms of lamentation, such as 38; 88; 102, but this type of lamentation literature was common in the ancient Near East. Some of the figures and metaphors comport with a Palestinian background, but there is little that is definite or distinctive to fix the locale. The author may have traveled widely. He appears to have been especially familiar with Egypt. The many allusions to mythological motifs now partially known from Mesopotamian and Syrian (Ugaritic) sources show that he was well versed in the lore of the ancient Near East. It is certain that he belonged to the intellectual elite of his time. Then, as now, ideas were not confined by geographical and political boundaries. "Wisdom," accordingly, had a cosmopolitan, international flavor.

7. Background and parallels. The recovery of the literatures of the ancient Near East, of Egypt, Mesopotamia, Syria, and Anatolia, has shed much light on the OT. It is no longer possible to study the OT in isolation from the larger world in which it originated. Wisdom literature of the OT in particular has so much in common with similar literatures of Egypt and Mesopotamia that international influence appears likely.

The problem faced by the book of Job especially exercised the Egyptian and Mesopotamian sages and scribes. From the early second millennium B.C. there is an Egyptian text in which a man debates with his soul the expedient of suicide when life has become unbearable. Like Job, the weary sufferer welcomes death as release from life's miseries. There are a number of ideological and phraseological parallels with Job, but hardly enough to indicate direct connection.

Another Egyptian text from the early second millennium, "The Tale of the Eloquent Peasant," has a literary form similar to that of Job. A prose prologue and epilogue introduce and conclude the text, while the central portion consists of nine semipoetic appeals for justice by the peasant. The wronged peasant appeals to the chief steward for redress, and the chief steward answers him. At first the peasant is polite, but as his appeals for justice are denied, he becomes more vehement and accuses the chief steward of injustice. He even threatens to appeal to Anubis, the god of the dead. When it looks as if the peasant will suffer death for his boldness in insisting on justice, he welcomes the prospect, as a thirsty man goes for water, or a nursing child for milk. But justice triumphs, and the persistent peasant is rewarded with the property of the one who has robbed him. While the issue here is social justice, and the peasant's complaint is against his fellow man, the plaintiff's attitude resembles that of Job.

From Mesopotamia we have numerous psalms and lamentations which deal with the problem of suffering. The best known is the text "I Will Praise the Lord of Wisdom," sometimes called the Poem of the Righteous Sufferer, or the Babylonian Job. It is, as the title suggests, a psalm of thanksgiving. The hero of the poem, stricken by disease, seeks to know the cause of his misfortune. He consults the gods, but receives no answer. He cannot believe that his distress is the result of sin, for he has been punctilious in the cult observances, and he recounts his pious acts. He concludes that the way of the gods is inscrutable, never to be understood by mortal man. He gives a long and gruesome description of the symptoms of his disease, which leaves him prostrate and wallowing in his own excrement. All attempts to compass and exorcise the disease fail. Death is expected momentarily. But the god Marduk brings about his healing, and the poem concludes with a hymn of thanksgiving and praise to Marduk.

This poem has many contacts with Job. In both, a man of high position, who has had a long and prosperous life, is suddenly reduced to misery. Both victims protest their innocence and impugn divine justice. Both give long descriptions of their afflictions and contrast their lot with their deserts. Both are finally restored to health. There are, however, marked dissimilarities. The settings and personal names are entirely different. The literary forms differ. The Akkadian poem, as much as is preserved, is entirely poetic monologue, without prose prologue or epilogue. The attitudes of the sufferers also differ somewhat. Job stresses his ethical probity, and Yahweh vouches for his innocence. The Babylonian sufferer emphasizes his ritual acts, but is prepared to entertain the idea that he may have committed some sin unwittingly. While the author of Job may have been familiar with the Akkadian poem, there is no evidence of direct literary dependence.

Another Akkadian text, which has been called the Babylonian Ecclesiastes, also has affinities with Job. It is a dialogue about human misery and divine justice, between a victim of suffering and a group of friends. The poem consisted originally of twenty-seven stanzas of eleven lines each. The lines of each stanza begin with the same syllable, and the acrostic of the twenty-seven syllables spells out the sentence "I, Shagil-kinam-ubbib, the conjurer, worship god and king." The very name of the sufferer, Shagil-kinam-ubbib, "O E sagil [i.e., Marduk's temple], declare the righteous one pure," expresses the hope for vindication. The pious sentiment of the acrostic, however, hardly agrees with the attitude of the sufferer in the dialogue. Perhaps the author wished to affirm his orthodoxy, in spite of the seeming skepticism. The sufferer begins the dialogue and answers each of his friends in turn—i.e., the sufferer speaks in the odd-numbered stanzas and the interlocutors in the even-numbered ones.

The sufferer appeals to his learned friends to hear and consider his tale of woe. Trouble began with his birth. Both his parents were snatched away, leaving him without a guardian. A friend agrees that this is a sad story, but the sufferer's attitude is self-conceited and impious. Whoever reveres the gods prospers. The sufferer responds with a description of his condition which belies the doctrine of retribution. The reply (stanza 4) is poorly preserved, but the recommended remedy is prayer, which will bring pardon. The sufferer protests that he has prayed and fulfilled all ritual requirements. The friend answers with sarcastic praise of the sufferer's great wisdom. He appeals to the world of nature, where the violent and predatory, the wild ass and the lion, eventually get their due, the arrow and the pit. The rich young upstart, too, the ruler burns along with his wealth. Why follow their path? Instead, seek divine favor. The sufferer characterizes such talk as mere wind (cf. Job 12:2). From childhood he has sought the will of the gods and has received only misfortune as his reward. The friend charges that the sufferer has rejected the truth and despised the divine ordinances. Thus the argument goes back and forth with no progress toward agreement, as with Job and his friends. In the last stanza the sufferer pleads for the mercy and understanding of his friends. He cites his humble conduct in the past. Finally he addresses a plea for mercy to the god Ninurta, the goddess Ishtar, and the king. The conclusion of the poem is not known, but we may assume that the appeal to the gods brought a change in the sufferer's lot.

The parallels between this document and the biblical books of Job and Ecclesiastes are numerous. In some cases the similarity is phraseological as well as ideological. The differences also are notable. The eleven-line stanzas of the Akkadian poem stand in sharp contrast with the long speeches of the book of Job. It is possible that the author of Job was familiar with this Akkadian poem. The extant tablets date from the seventh century B.C., but the original composition was probably some centuries earlier. Still there is no evidence of direct influence.

Another Akkadian poem, called "A Pessimistic Dialogue Between Master and Servant," relates to a concern of the book of Job, the seeming meaninglessness of life. The master summons the slave and proposes to engage in various endeavors. For each proposal the slave expresses enthusiastic approval and lauds the activity as pleasurable or profitable. Each time the master rejects the idea of pursuing the projected activity, and the obliging servant agrees and shows that it is, after all, a bootless endeavor. All aspects of human activity—the pursuit of pleasure, political power, wealth, the love of women, worship of the gods, charity, service to one's country—are shown to be futile and void of satisfaction. What then is good? The servant suggests that to break one's neck and plunge into the river is (the only) good. The master proposes to kill the servant and send him on ahead. The servant replies: "Would/could my lord live three days after me?" Whether the servant means that the master could not survive without someone to look after him, or that he would not care to prolong a life void of purpose, the pessimism, cynicism, and skepticism current in effete Mesopotamian society are vividly illustrated. While this document has more affinities with Ecclesiastes than with Job, since the victim suffers from ennui rather than physical pain, they all have in common a spirit of rebellion at the seeming futility of human existence.

A Sumerian poem which bears closer relation to the Job motif than any of the Mesopotamian documents previously known has been recovered from fragments excavated at Nippur. The original composition probably dates from the beginning of the second millennium B.C. The poem deals with the case of an unnamed man who had been healthy, wealthy, and wise, but suddenly was seized with severe illness and pain. The sufferer laments his bitter fate, but instead of railing against his god, he confesses his guilt, and the god answers the man's prayer and delivers him from affliction.

The similarities and the differences between the Sumerian poem and the book of Job are very considerable. In the Sumerian world view, evil was integral to the cosmic order. Basic to their theology and ethics was the doctrine that man's afflictions result from sin. The problem of justice was thus not so acute for them, since all men are sinful. In all cases of human suffering, it is man who is to blame and never the gods. When adversity strikes, there is nothing a man can do but praise his god and lament and plead until the god relents and hearkens to his prayer. This view is virtually identical with that espoused by Job's friends. For the Sumerians, the god with whom the man must remonstrate is his own personal god, who acts as intermediary with the major gods on behalf of his client and intercedes for him in the assembly of the gods, where men are judged and their fates decided. The Sumerian concept of a personal god may be behind Job's appeals to or for an umpire, witness, vindicator (9:33; 16:19, 21; 19:25-27), who will plead his case in the celestial court. A notable difference between the Sumerian poem and the book of Job is that the Sumerian sufferer assumes and admits his guilt all the way, while Job is declared guiltless from the beginning and protests his innocence throughout the Dialogue. In the end, however, Job is brought to the attitude with which the Sumerian sufferer began, to acquiescence before the overwhelming power and inscrutable will of the gods.

As early as the second millennium, both in Egypt and in Mesopotamia, there were literary compositions which dealt with the same concern as the book of Job and in form and content exhibited features characteristic of the biblical book. That these works, directly or indirectly, contributed to the biblical masterpiece, appears ever more probable as new materials such as the Sumerian Job are added. Even if the author of Job did not know these works at first hand, they created a literary, poetic, and religious background to his work.

In the lore of India the story of Hariscandra is parallel to the theme of Job. The story is first told in the Mārkandeya Purāna. At an assembly of the god Indra there arose a discussion as to whether a perfectly righteous man existed on earth. Most of the gods thought not. The god Vasishta nominated a certain king, Hariscandra, for this distinction, but the god Shiva expressed doubt that this person would bear testing. A wager on this issue was made between Vasishta and Shiva, and the latter then brought a series of misfortunes on Hariscandra. The monarch was deprived of his wealth, his kingdom, his wife, and his only son, but through it all he preserved his rectitude and in the end was restored to his former estate and rewarded. The possibility of direct interdependence between the Hebrew and Indian stories is remote.

In Greek literature the mystery of suffering is a prominent theme. The concept of fate, Moira, apparently came down to the Greeks from the warring Myceneans. Fatalism seems to develop inevitably among peoples inured to war. Man's share in life is like his ration of food or booty. He must take what he gets, without grumbling. To demand or take more than one's due is insubordination, or hubris. The belief in gods who interfere in the life of men eventually came into conflict with the idea of fatalism. Good fortune a man does not question, but misfortune sets one to thinking. When a righteous man is struck down by calamity, the problem is inescapable. The Greeks, however, had little to offer by way of a solution. Their fatalistic response is summed up in the maxim of the Delphic Apollo, "Know thyself"—i.e., be mindful of the insurmountable barrier between man and the gods. Another famous maxim, "Nothing in excess," reflects the same attitude, that a man must not attempt to arrogate to himself more than his share in life. To do so is hubris, the froward attempt to emulate the gods. This is certain to incite nemesis, the revenge of the jealous gods. The safest thing for man is to keep his place in all humility and never risk the ire of the gods. Man's hubris, overweening transgression of the bounds, and the consequent retaliation by the gods, nemesis, is the common theme of the Greek tragedies. The divine order always prevails over man's self-destructive heroism.

The tragedies of Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides have much in common with the Dialogue of the book of Job, for the tragedy is above all a lament. Of all the Greek tragedies, Aeschylus' Prometheus Bound bears closest resemblance to Job.

Chained to a rock by Zeus as punishment for having brought mortals the gift of fire, he protests the injustice in terms reminiscent of Job. His sympathizers, the nymphs and Oceanus, beg him to confess his error and submit, much as Job's friends counseled. But Prometheus refuses; it is Zeus who must relent. When the earth opens and he plunges into fresh tortures in the nether world, Prometheus disappears with a cry: "See the injustice of my fate." Prometheus makes the same sort of accusation as Job, expresses the same wistful longing, asserts his righteousness, but there are important differences. Prometheus is an immortal Titan. There is no mystery in his suffering, for he knows Zeus to be unjust, vengeful, savage, relentless, and unpredictable. Prometheus receives sympathy from his friends, while Job is condemned by his. But Job at last, though rebuked by God for what the Greeks would have considered hubris, is vindicated also by God, whom he finds to be, not the tyrant his tortures had led him to think, but the source of all power and wisdom, and even justice.

Though the major Greek tragedies bear evident similarities to Job, not only in literary form but also in content, and above all in depth of sorrow for the human predicament, there is no indication of direct interdependence.

The Greeks' logic and sense of justice forced them ultimately to the conclusion that since wrongs are not always righted in this life, they must be in the afterlife. To Plato, in particular, we are indebted for the refinement of this idea, which has had a tremendous influence on the thought of later ages. The punishments of the afterlife are not entirely for retaliation or revenge, but for the purpose of purifying the sinner. Job's questioning led him to the very brink of this solution, but he withdrew without making the leap. Elihu suggested that the sufferings of this life may be intended for discipline. Neither of these "answers" is wholly satisfying to the one who has to endure suffering here and now.

The author of Job could have derived much of his material and literary forms from other portions of the OT, or from the sources on which these other portions were based. The various literary genres found in Job—narrative, dialogue, hymn, lament, proverb, oracle—are well represented in the OT.

Although the narrative portion of Job has a patriarchal setting, it bears little resemblance to the patriarchal narratives of Genesis, which are rather epic saga. The folk tale of Job has more affinity with some of the stories of the book of Judges, and is perhaps closer to the book of Ruth than to any other OT narrative.

About half the book consists of poetry which belongs to the genre of hymns and individual lamentations. Several beautiful hymns are components of the speeches of Job (e.g., 9:4-12; 12:13-25; 26:5-14), and a few bits and pieces in the speeches of the friends (e.g., 5:9-16; 11:7-11; 25:2-6; 34:18-30). Among the hymns in the Psalter, Ps. 104 has many striking contacts with Job (cf., e.g., Ps. 104:6-9 with Job 38: 8-11; Ps. 104:21, 27, with Job 38:39-41; Ps. 104:30 with Job 12:10; Ps. 104:32 with Job 9:5; 26: 11). Ps. 104 appears to have been strongly influenced by Akh-en-Aton's Hymn to the Aton, the sun disk. This beautiful Egyptian hymn of the fourteenth century B.C. may have been known internationally among scribes and sages.

A considerable part of Job's discourses are to be classed as laments (3:3-26; 6:2-7:21; 9:25-10:22; 13: 23-14:22; 16:6-17:9; 19:7-20; 23; 29:1-31:37). This literary genre had its prototype in Mesopotamia in the elegiac complaint of the sick or the persecuted. The lament is not a mere rhetorical exercise. The sufferer's woes are described with stark realism and in gruesome detail to excite divine pity and to attain healing or deliverance. The victim pins his hopes on the discourse, by which he expects to convince the offended god or gods of his innocence or penitence. The lament is thus a sort of liturgy of healing and exorcism, a purgation by poetry or catharsis by canticle. The author of Job exploited this literary genre to the full. He may have been familiar with it either from Mesopotamian sources or from Hebrew literature, since some of the biblical psalms, or parts of psalms (e.g., 22:2-19; 38; 88) belong to this genre.

There are a number of dialogues in the OT. Abraham's negotiations with Ephron the Hittite (Gen. 23: 3-16) are a model of tactful bargaining. His intercession with Yahweh (Gen. 18:22-32) resembles the prophetic intercessions of Amos (7:1-9; 8:1-3). The divine call of the lawgiver and the prophets is in the form of a dialogue (Exod. 3:2-4:17; Isa. 6; Jer. 1:1-10). The author of Job had these and many other dialogues to serve as models, but he went far beyond anything else in the OT in developing and expanding the poetic dialogue around a single theme.

Scattered in the book of Job are bits and pieces of proverbial wisdom of the sort found also in other OT wisdom literature, both canonical and apocryphal (e.g., 4:8-11; 5:1-7; 8:11-19; 12:11-12; 14:1-2). The latter part of Eliphaz' second speech (15:17-35) is largely made up of proverbial utterances. Here and there in the book are obscure sayings which seem to have little or no connection with the context and may be misplaced or mangled proverbs. In Job 11:12, e.g., is a delightfully intriguing saying:

> A stupid man will get understanding, > when a wild ass's colt is born a man.

The sense of the Hebrew, however, is obscure, and many critics emend the text. The RSV rendering is perhaps the best sense that can be read into the text without emendation. Proverbs are often very difficult to interpret. Although there are many proverbs and wise sayings in Job, the work as a whole can scarcely be classed as wisdom literature. Most of the contacts with wisdom-type literature occur in the speeches of the friends. Job's vehement protest against their point of view makes the book, as it were, anti-wisdom literature.

8. Content. The book of Job consists of five parts: (a) a prologue in prose (chs. 1–2); (b) the Dialogue, or Symposium (chs. 3–31); (c) the Elihu speeches (chs. 32–37); (d) the theophany and speeches of Yahweh (38–42:6); (e) an epilogue in prose (42:7-17).

a. The Prologue. The Prologue presents a man named Job, famous for his rectitude and piety, wealthy, with a large and happy family, solicitous for the propriety of his children's conduct (1:1-5). At a meeting of the celestial court, Yahweh asks the Satan specifically about his observation of Job, and the Satan questions whether Job's piety and rectitude are purely disinterested. He suggests that if Job were bereft of his possessions, he would curse Yahweh to his face. Yahweh accepts the wager and gives the Satan leave to test Job (vss. 6-12). The Satan proceeds to have Job robbed of all his wealth, even his children, but Job accepts the blow with resignation and blesses the name of Yahweh (vss. 13-22). The Satan, chided by Yahweh, proposes more drastic measures and is given permission to do anything short of taking Job's life (2:1-6). Job, stricken with a loathsome and painful skin disease, sits among the ashes and scrapes his sores with a potsherd. His wife urges him to curse God and die, but he rebukes her and accepts his evil state as also coming from God, whom he refuses to criticize (vss. 7-10). Three friends hear of his misfortunes and come to condole him. Appalled at his condition, they sit with him seven days in silent grief (vss. 11-13).

b. The Dialogue. Job speaks out in bitter complaint, curses his life, wishes he had died at birth, wonders why life is given to the wretched when death would be welcome release (ch. 3).

Now begins the Dialogue, which consists of three cycles of six speeches, a speech by each of the three "comforters" and a direct reply by Job to each in turn. (The third cycle, however, is incomplete and garbled.)

Eliphaz leads off cautiously and apologetically, but quickly turns to criticism of Job for faltering in the face of adversity (4:1-6). He affirms divine justice (vss. 7-11), relates a vision in which it was revealed that mortal man cannot be just before God (4:12-5:7), and advises Job to turn to God who is powerful and just and who will, after chastening Job, deliver him from adversity and restore him to a rich and full life (5:8-27).

Job replies that the intensity of his suffering is ample justification for the bitterness of his complaint (6:1-7), and he pleads again for death as release from pain (vss. 8-13). He charges that his friends have disappointed him and failed to give him moral support (vss. 14-23). He challenges them to prove that he has merited such misfortune (vss. 24-30). Human life is hard at best, and in his case sheer agony, with no hope but the grave. So he will speak out in bitter complaint (7:1-11). Why will not God simply leave him alone, give him a moment's respite before he lies down in the dust (vss. 12-21)?

Bildad characterizes Job's speech as so much wind. He asserts God's justice, hints that Job's children merely got what they deserved, and suggests that if Job would only turn to God, he might be restored (8:1-8). He appeals to history to prove that the wicked get short shrift, that God always rewards and punishes (vss. 9-20), and that hence Job may be assured of justice (vss. 21-22).

In reply Job admits that man cannot be just before God (9:1-4), for God puts the issue on the basis of power rather than justice, and man cannot argue with him (vss. 5-21). God destroys the innocent and guilty alike, mocks at the innocent, gives control of the world to the wicked (vss. 22-24). Life is short and painful. Why struggle in vain, when one can hope only for condemnation (vss. 27-31)? He asks for an arbiter to ensure fairness and allow him to speak without fear (vss. 32-35). Since he is tired of life, he will speak out and ask God why he oppresses. Can God see with man's eyes and share man's limitations? Why does he persecute (10:1-7)? Man is only clay, flesh and bone (vss. 8-12). Why pursue him like a hunted beast (vss. 13-17)? Why give him life at all? Why not leave him to live out his brief span in peace before he descends to the dismal nether world (vss. 18-22)?

Zophar accuses Job of boasting of his innocence to silence men, but God could show him his guilt (11:1-5). God's wisdom and power are beyond human comprehension (vss. 6-12). Job ought to change his attitude and appeal to God, who will restore him (vss. 13-19). The wicked will receive their due (vs. 20).

Job answers with sarcastic praise of his friends' wisdom. He is not inferior to them (12:1-3). He points to his own misery and to the prosperity of the wicked (vss. 4-6). Even the beasts, the birds, the earth, and fishes know that God is in control, with all his wisdom and power (vss. 7-25). All this Job knows as well as they (13:1-2). They are lying to defend God (vss. 3-12). He is willing to stake his life on a direct argument with God. He asks only that God give him a hearing and not resort to force and terror; that he make specific indictment of his transgressions (vss. 13-23). God, instead, persecutes him (vss. 24-28). Man's life is short and troublesome. Why does not God let him have some rest (14:1-6)? There is no hope of afterlife (vss. 7-12). If only there were, he would be content to wait (vss. 13-15). There is nothing to look for but extinction (vss. 18-22).

Eliphaz begins the second cycle by characterizing Job's speech as hot air, vain and impious talk (15:1-5). Job's own mouth convicts him (vs. 6). Does he think he is the first man ever born? Does he eavesdrop on the divine council, or have a monopoly on wisdom (vss. 7-8)? Does he know any more than they (vss. 9-10)? What right has he to berate God (vss. 11-13)? No man is clean before God (vss. 14-16). The wisdom of the ages is that the wicked always suffer (vss. 17-35).

Job answers that he has heard all this flatulent nonsense before (16:1-3). If the tables were turned, he could serve them the same verbiage (vss. 4-5). He turns again to God with bitter complaint for the vicious and unwarranted assault on him (vss. 6-17). He cries out for vindication. There must be a witness in heaven who will serve as an arbiter for him with God, as a man mediates between friends (vss. 18-22). His life is coming to an end in mockery, with no support from God (17:1-3) or his friends (vss. 4-12). His only hope is the maggot in the grave (vss. 13-16).

Bildad objects to being called stupid, and deprecates Job's histrionic agonizing (18:1-4). He paints a dark picture of the woes of the wicked (vss. 5-21).

Job rebukes his "friends" for their harsh judgment of him (19:1-6). It is God who has afflicted him unjustly (vss. 6-12). His family, friends, servants, wife, are all alienated; urchins and friends alike abhor him (vss. 13-19). His body is emaciated (vs. 20). He cries out for pity from "friends" who persecute him like God (vss. 21-22). He appeals to the future and asserts faith in ultimate vindication before God, even though he himself die (vss. 23-27). His friends had best be warned against persecuting him (vss. 28-29).

Zophar is deeply agitated (20:1-3). The seeming triumph of the wicked, he declares, is only momentary. No matter how high they rise, they become like dung, they pass away like a dream, etc., etc. (vss. 4-29).

Job requests close attention to his words. He feels he has some ground for impatience. He invites them just to look at him and be horrified, as he is horrified (21:1-6). He refutes the claim of the friends by pointing to the continued prosperity of the wicked (vss. 7-18). The reply that God takes it out on the wicked man's children is unacceptable (vss. 19-21). Death comes to all men alike, without regard to the life they lead. The wicked escape calamity and go peacefully to the grave (vss. 22-33). The "comfort" of the friends is vain and their arguments groundless (vs. 34).

Eliphaz, in his third speech, asserts that God receives no benefit from human virtue (22:1-3). It could hardly be for piety that Job is being judged (vs. 4). Hence it must be that Job's wickedness is very great. He proceeds then to charge Job with oppression of the poor, the widow, and the orphan. This is the cause of his calamity. He thought God would not see his misdeeds, and disaster inevitably followed (vss. 5-20). Return to God, however, will bring restoration of good fortune (vss. 21-30).

Job continues in his extremity to search for God, so that he may come into court with him (23:1-7). But he cannot find him (vss. 8-9). God knows Job is innocent (vss. 10-12), but he does as he pleases and uses terror against him (vss. 13-17). God's purposes are hidden and even the pious cannot know them. Violence and oppression are rampant (24:1-17). (Vss. 18-24 are corrupt and probably belong in the mouth of one of the friends rather than of Job.) No one could deny these facts (vs. 25).

Chs. 24–27 are thoroughly scrambled. Bildad's third speech is short and out of keeping with his previous utterances. Job's reply consists of the very ideas he has been so vigorously opposing. Zophar's third speech is missing altogether. The following rearrangement makes tolerably consistent sense:

Bildad's third speech (25:1; 27:7-10, 16-23), as reconstituted, declares that wealth will not save the wicked from punishment.

Job's reply (26:1-4; 27:11-12; 25:2-6; 26:5-14) consists mainly of description of God's power.

Zophar's missing speech (27:13; 24:21-24, 18-20; 27:14-15) reaffirms the certainty of the punishment of the wicked.

Ch. 28 is an entirely extraneous poem on the value of wisdom and its complete inaccessibility to man, except through piety.

Job's final speech in the Dialogue reaffirms his innocence (27:1-6) and gives a nostalgic review of his former blessed estate when he was under divine favor, happy, prosperous, respected, praised as a benefactor of the poor, a champion of justice, who confidently looked forward to a long and happy life (ch. 29), as contrasted with his present misery, derided by young upstarts, spit on by the dregs of society, racked by a painful and loathsome disease (ch. 30). Job now makes a series of negative confessions with horrible self-imprecations if ever he committed such wrongs as to lust after a maiden; attain wealth by injustice; commit adultery; mistreat his slaves, withhold charity from the poor, the widow, the orphan; put his trust in riches; worship the sun and moon; rejoice at his enemies' misfortune; put a stranger into the street; or abuse his land and tenants. Here Job rests his case, affixes his signature (31:35-37 should be transposed after vs. 40*a*), and challenges God to answer him (ch. 31).

c. The Elihu speeches. A young man named Elihu, having listened to the argument, angry because of Job's self-righteousness and the failure of the three friends to confute him, intervenes (32:1-5).

First Elihu makes a long apology for his intervention, for his youth and seeming brashness in venturing to lecture his elders, but since wisdom is a divine gift and not necessarily a concomitant of old age, and since his elders have failed to answer Job, he will now speak his piece. He is bursting with words and must give them outlet. He will speak frankly and without flattery (32:6-22). He now turns to Job and assures him that he, Elihu, is only a man, and not God, and the two of them can argue on equal terms (33:1-7). He summarizes Job's argument: that he is innocent and yet God persecutes him and refuses to answer his complaint (vss. 8-13). But, argues Elihu, God does answer man in various ways, by dreams, or illness, to warn or chasten him (vss. 14-22). When some angel intervenes, man is restored to health and repents and is redeemed from death. Thus God redeems a man time and again (vss. 23-30). Unless Job has something to answer, he should keep quiet, and let Elihu lecture him further (vss. 31-33).

Elihu launches into a second discourse, in which he charges Job with blasphemy for questioning God's justice and maintaining that piety is of no consequence. God is just and rewards and punishes. Job in denying this adds rebellion to his sin (ch. 34).

Elihu goes on to a third speech. As for Job's assertion that sin or piety does not seem to matter either to man or to God, Elihu answers that God is too high to be affected by what a man does, but the man himself is affected for good or ill. If God ignores a plea, it is because he recognizes insincerity, and this is the case with Job (ch. 35).

In a final speech Elihu continues to defend God's justice. Even kings are not immune to divine reward and punishment. The sinner who repents prospers; otherwise he dies. Affliction may be the means of deliverance, and this could be so in Job's case. God is supreme and eternal, and his ways are beyond human comprehension. He makes the rain, the storms, thunder, lightning, snow. Can Job understand or do such things? The thunderstorm shows God's power, yet he is also just (chs. 36–37).

d. The speeches of Yahweh. Yahweh himself now answers from the whirlwind. Why does Job speak in ignorance? What does he know of the founding of the earth, the binding of the sea, the dawn of day, the depths of the nether world, the breadth of the earth, the abodes of light and darkness, the stores of snow and hail, the mystery of storms, the control of the constellations, the rain (38:1-38)? Can he provide food for the lion, the raven? Does he know the gestation period of wild goats or hinds, the habits of the wild ass? Can he domesticate the wild ox? What of the swift but stupid ostrich, the war horse, the hawk, the vulture (38:39–39:30)? Yahweh challenges Job to reply, but Job confesses his inadequacy and promises to say no more (40:1-6).

Again Yahweh challenges Job to show that he has power like his, and he, Yahweh, will admit that Job's own hand can save him (40:7-14). There follow two long poems describing Behemoth, the hippopotamus (vss. 15-24), and Leviathan, the crocodile (41—H 40: 26–41:34). Job acknowledges God's omnipotence and his own ignorance. Now that he has seen God for himself, he repents in dust and ashes (42:1-6, omitting vss. 3*a*, 4, as mistakenly copied from 38:2, 3*b*; 40:7*b*).

e. The Epilogue. In the Epilogue, Yahweh rebukes Eliphaz and his two friends for not having spoken rightly of him, as Job has done. He orders them to offer sacrifice and have Job pray for them, lest he, Yahweh, take reprisals against them for not having spoken rightly of him. Yahweh now restores Job's fortunes, giving him twice as much property as he had lost. His relatives all come to visit him and eat with him and give him condolences and gifts. Job has seven sons and three exceptionally beautiful daughters. After this he lives 140 years and sees grandchildren to the fourth generation. He dies in contented old age.

9. Literary form. The precise literary classification of the book of Job has been the subject of considerable discussion, more or less unprofitable. Until modern times, it was commonly taken as sober history, although Rabbi Resh Lakish opined that Job never existed and the story is simply a parable (Talmud, B.B. 15*a*). It cannot be taken as history, but there may have been a historical personage behind the story. It is, in a sense, a parable of any and every man who suffers without cause or without knowing the cause. Job is thus a type of the righteous in affliction. It has been suggested that Job really represents the nation Israel, like the Suffering Servant of the Lord. If the work was composed in the exilic or postexilic period, by a Jew, as many scholars believe, then it would be virtually impossible for the author to be unmindful of the parallel between the afflictions of the man and the nation. Yet there is not the slightest hint of national concern in the work. It is hardly likely that the narrator would have chosen a descendant of Esau as the symbol of Jacob!

Already in the fourth century Theodore of Mopsuestia held that Job was modeled on the Greek dramas. Theodore Beza regarded the book as a tragedy, Milton as an epic. It has been compared with the Homeric epics, with which it has very little in common, and with the tragic dramas of Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides. It has been argued that the book has the form of a Greek tragedy, including the chorus and the denouement by the deus ex machina. The dialogues of Plato have been compared, but there is no similarity whatever between these brief prose conversations, with their precise, analytical argument, and the long poetic speeches of the Job Dialogue. "Dialogue," indeed, is not a very apt term for lengthy speeches of the book of Job. Actually no general classification suits the book. It has features that partake of all the various literary forms that have been ascribed to it, but it is not to be classed with any one of them, for it is neither exclusively lyric, epic, dramatic, or didactic. The book is sui generis, and no single term or combination of terms that has been proposed does justice to the scope of the work.

10. Unity and integrity. A mere summary of the book's contents inevitably raises the question of its unity and integrity, for its parts are seemingly inconsistent and incongruous, and the plan and structure of the whole seems illogical and haphazard.

The major problem is posed by the incongruities between the prose introduction and conclusion and the poetic Dialogue. The Prologue presents the traditional pious and patient Job, who through all the misfortune visited on him maintains his integrity and continues to bless Yahweh. The Epilogue brings divine rebuke on the friends for having spoken falsely, and commendation of Job for having spoken the truth about Yahweh. The Dialogue, however, confronts us with an altogether different Job, whose bitter complaints and accusations against God shock the pious friends, who steadfastly defend divine justice in the world. The Prologue has a detached and impersonal, almost ironical attitude toward the ghastly experiment to see just how much Job will endure. The Dialogue, on the other hand, is charged with the anguish of the tormented victim. The Epilogue presents a patently artificial vindication of divine retribution, with a hundred per cent bonus for Job's pains, although the Job of the Dialogue has shown that one cannot count on treatment of this sort in real life. In the prose narrative Job is scrupulous in observance of the sacrificial cultus, while in the Dialogue there is no mention of such concerns, and in his final apology for his life (ch. 31) he makes no plea on this score. Even the designations of deity differ in the prose and the poetic portions; the prose uses the name Yahweh, and the poetry uses El, Eloah, Elohim, and Shaddai. For these and other reasons, critics very early cast suspicion on the Prologue and the Epilogue as editorial additions and rejected one or the other or both. The originality of the episodes featuring the Satan (1:6-12; 2:1-7*a*) has been particularly suspect, because the Satan is absent in the rest of the book, even in the Epilogue. Some critics have maintained that the author of the poetic Dialogue also composed the prose setting for his work. The view now generally held, however, is that the poet adopted and adapted an ancient folk tale as the frame for his work. Whether the folk tale was transmitted orally, or whether it had long been committed to writing, it had apparently achieved a relatively fixed form and content, which the poet could alter but little. The legendary Job had become a type of the ideal righteous man, like Noah and Daniel (Ezek. 14:14, 20). Job may also have been the type of the innocent sufferer, like the anonymous victim of the Sumerian poetic essay of ca. 2000 B.C. recovered among the fragments from Nippur (see above). What modifications were made in the ancient story we do not know. Perhaps the poet introduced the visit of the three friends to connect the Dialogue with the prose story. The divine censure of the friends' views and the praise of Job's in the Epilogue (42:7-8) is hardly compatible with the blasphemous tirades of the Job of the Dialogue and the rigidly righteous views of the friends. It may be that the older prose tale, which now has the middle cut out, included an episode in which the friends urged Job, as his wife had done, to curse God and die. It may also be that the censure of the friends and praise of Job was added in a futile attempt to harmonize the Job of the Prologue with the Job of the Dialogue.

In spite of the modifications to which the folk tale may have been subjected, it preserves the flavor and the charm of an oft-told classic.

Few critics have questioned the basic unity of the Dialogue (chs. 3–31). In spite of textual and exegetical problems, there is an organic cohesion, a unity of style and language, and a consistency in the opposing viewpoints which bears the mark of a single mind. This is not to say that the Dialogue has not been subjected to alterations by well-meaning meddlers. In the speeches of Job especially, there appear to have been attempts to tone down the shocking charges against God or to alter or deliberately obscure the sense. The Masoretes on occasion contributed to this end by imposing a vocalization which changes the sense indicated by the context. The most serious tampering with the text has been in chs. 24–27, where the order is clearly disturbed and the text of some passages has apparently been doctored (see § 8*b above*). Bildad's third speech is quite short (ch. 25), and Zophar's is entirely missing, while Job, surprisingly, expresses the very views hitherto espoused by the friends and vehemently denied by him. Some critics have regarded this as merely an accident in the transmission of the MS, but others have considered it a deliberate juggling of the text to bring Job around to acceptance of the "orthodox" view of retribution. Few scholars have accepted the present order and state of the text of chs. 24–27 as original. The various combinations of transpositions that have been proposed are too numerous to mention. The rearrangement suggested above in the summary of the book's content seems simplest and most satisfactory.

The poem on wisdom (ch. 28) is recognized as out of place by nearly all critics. The case for its logical connection with its surroundings is difficult to support. The admission that wisdom, the secrets of the universe and of divine providence, are inaccessible to man is hardly compatible with Job's desire to cross-examine God. The poem has marked affinities with the speeches of Yahweh (chs. 38–40), and it seems quite improper for the divine argument to be thus anticipated and pre-empted. The language and style of the poem, however, exhibit marked similarity to that of the rest of the Dialogue, and some scholars regard it as an independent composition of the author of the Dialogue, though not as an integral part of the book.

A small minority of interpreters have accepted the Elihu speeches (chs. 32–37) as authentic. Some have even held that here is found the climax of the work and the author's solution to the problem of suffering. Most critics, however, have regarded Elihu's diatribes as interpolated and of scant value either as literature or as a contribution to the argument. They could very well be dropped from the book without loss either to the content or to the literary structure. Their style is diffuse and prolix, even pompous. Almost half the volume of the four speeches is taken up with pretentious and irksome introduction. Resemblances in style and phraseology have been noted in the Elihu speeches and the Dialogue, but these are easily explained as imitation. The argument itself, for the most part, merely echoes what has already been said repeatedly by the three "friends." If Elihu has anything new to offer, it is the suggestion that suffering is disciplinary (33:14-33), but this has already been hinted by Eliphaz in his first speech (5:17). It seems likely that the author of the Elihu speeches, shocked, as he says, at Job's blasphemy and rebellion against God, disappointed at the inability of the friends to refute Job's arguments, but also, perhaps, chagrined at Yahweh's failure to speak directly to Job's challenge, ventured to inject himself into the dispute. He could not very well speak after Yahweh had spoken and silenced Job. He had to butt in before the theophany. His profuse apologies to the three friends may reflect more his qualms at presuming to speak before Yahweh than his deference to his elders. He anticipates the divine discourse (ex eventu) and supplements the weakness of its argument. He even sets the stage for the theophany by describing God's power in the storm (ch. 37). Perhaps the most telling reason for regarding the Elihu speeches as interpolations is the fact that they are not integrated into the work as a whole. In the distribution of praise and blame in the Epilogue, Elihu is completely ignored. It may be argued that the Satan is also ignored. But if Elihu's speeches were an original part of the Dialogue, and if the author put as much confidence in them as Elihu clearly does, they would surely have been acknowledged in the Epilogue.

Some scholars have rejected the speeches of Yahweh in toto. It is argued that they could not have been known to the author of the Elihu speeches, for he would not then have inserted his contribution. This argument has little force, as noted above, for it seems even less likely that the author of the Elihu speeches would have ventured to append his speech to that of Yahweh. Job's challenge: "Here is my signature! let the Almighty answer me!" (31:35*b*), calls for something more dramatic than the secondhand and third-rate tirades of Elihu. The situation demands some response from Yahweh. The first speech of Yahweh is widely hailed as a composition unsurpassed in world literature, an effort of the highest genius, transcending all other descriptions of the greatness of the Creator and the wonders of his creation. Scholars who reject the speech take a somewhat less appreciative view and see therein a brutal irony and diabolical contempt for man's predicament. While the authenticity of the first speech is generally accepted, that of the second is not. Still at least one eminent theologian regards the second speech of Yahweh as the high point of the book and perhaps a more original form of the divine reply than the first. After Job has been humbled and silenced (40:3-5), a second speech by Yahweh seems quite unnecessary and might well be considered nagging. The second speech, especially the long descriptions of the hippopotamus and the crocodile, is commonly considered spurious and inferior. (The description of the ostrich in the first speech [39:13-18] is missing in the LXX.) These nature poems, while very interesting, do seem a bit incongruous in the mouth of Yahweh, and many scholars reject them. Against the argument that a second speech by Yahweh, very much like the first, seems like nagging, it may be held that this is only pressing home the point. At the end of the first speech, Job is merely silenced (40:3-5), but with the second speech he becomes submissive and repentant (42:2, 3*b-c*, 6).

The Epilogue has been rejected by some critics, who point to the inconsistency and artificiality of Job's reward, which seems to prove the very doctrine he had refuted and to give the friends the last word. The fact, also, that Job is condemned in the divine speech and praised and rewarded in the Epilogue is often adduced as evidence of diverse authorship. This is admittedly a cogent objection. It must be considered, however, that the author was working here with prefabricated materials which he could not radically alter. It is certain that in the traditional tale the hero was in the end rewarded, as in the Sumerian and Akkadian prototypes. The author could not very well edit a well-known ending to suit his purposes, as might a modern scenario writer. Moreover, the contradiction is not explicit. While the doctrine of exact retribution may seem to be upheld by the reward, with a bonus, it is not defended as an unfailing principle. Yahweh's condemnation of Job in the speeches from the whirlwind was for presumption in passing judgment on matters beyond his comprehension. It was not on the grounds which the friends and Elihu had asserted. The condemnation of the friends in the Epilogue may indicate that in the ancient folk tale they, like Job's wife, urged him to curse God and die. It involves no contradiction to leave the rebuke of the friends in the Epilogue, for after the Dialogue it could be argued that they merited divine rebuke for asserting a lie in order to defend God. Thus the seeming contradictions may be reconciled. As for Job's restoration and reward, it would make little sense to leave him in his misery after he had been vindicated.

Except for the Elihu speeches, the book of Job has an over-all organic unity. Even the Elihu speeches, while not adding a great deal, do not seriously disturb the integrity of the book; if they are interpolated, the process was performed with considerable skill.

11. Purpose and teaching. The purpose of the book of Job has commonly been supposed to give an answer to the problem of evil, especially of undeserved suffering. The case of our hero, a man of exemplary piety, suddenly overwhelmed with misfortune and disease, poses the problem in the most acute fashion: How can these and like injustices be reconciled with divine justice? If the purpose of the book is to "solve" this problem, it must be admitted to be a conspicuous failure. The problem remains the most difficult and crucial for theology, and all attempts at a rational solution have fallen short of satisfaction, as Immanuel Kant demonstrated in his monograph On the Failure of All Philosophical Attempts in Theodicy. This problem is certainly the focal point of discussion in the book, especially in the Dialogue and the Elihu speeches. Several answers or attitudes are suggested. The question is which, if any, of the various answers was intended as definitive.

The explanation offered in the Prologue is that Job's sufferings were imposed, at the behest of the Satan, to test the genuineness of Job's piety. The three friends in the Dialogue argue that God is just, in spite of any and all appearances to the contrary, and that he rewards and punishes: therefore, Job must have sinned and merited his misery. This Job strenuously denies, arguing that justice is frequently abortive in the world and that God alone must be responsible: hence God is unjust. Elihu holds, with the friends, that God is just, and he suggests that suffering may be to warn and to discipline a man. Yahweh from the whirlwind ignores the question entirely (but see 40:8), points to his power in nature, and brings home to Job his ignorance and insignificance. None of these answers or attitudes can be deemed adequate, if the purpose is to justify the ways of God to man.

The intent of the book has been taken by a number of scholars to be the refutation of the doctrine expounded by the friends, that righteousness brings prosperity and wickedness misfortune in this life—the doctrine of exact retribution or terrestrial eschatology, as it has been called. This doctrine is often taught in the OT, especially with regard to the nations (e.g., Exod. 23:20 ff; Lev. 26; Deut. 28; Jer. 7:5-7), and is also applied to the individual (e.g., in the book of Proverbs, and in Pss. 1; 37; 49; 73; Isa. 58:6-14; Jer. 17:5-8). The doctrine may be quite comforting as long as one is healthy and prosperous. The three friends in the Dialogue stoutly and smugly maintain it. The pernicious aspect of the doctrine is that it carries the corollary that prosperity is a sure token of divine favor and suffering always a punishment for sin. This view has often been termed "orthodox," with the implication that it is the accepted, normative, and time-honored view of the OT. That the view was "orthodox" in some circles is quite clear, but to take it as normative for the OT is to ignore a great deal that contradicts it, apart from the book of Job. The stories of Abel, Uriah the Hittite, and Naboth were certainly not recounted to support the conclusion that they got what they deserved. The case of Jeremiah himself, who is credited, with Ezekiel, as responsible for the development of the doctrine of individual retribution (Jer. 31:30), shows that it does not hold true in every case (cf. 11:19; 12:1). That there is a measure of truth in the doctrine is obvious. Righteousness ought to be, and frequently is, rewarded with success and favor of man and God, and wickedness often overreaches itself and brings about its own merited destruction, but the attempt to make this an absolute rule goes against the hard facts of life. It ought to be so, but it certainly is not, as Job well argues and exemplifies. This view is thoroughly refuted by Job, but the Prologue of the book had already taken the ground from under the friends by assuring us that Job was quite innocent.

The mode of thought of the friends, though discredited, persisted even in later times and was confuted again by Jesus (Luke 13:1-5; John 9:2). It persists even today, because it answers the urgent need to reduce the complexities of life to a simple formula. It was hardly the whole purpose of the author of Job merely to refute a manifestly fallacious view, although it must be admitted that a large part of the book is spent in doing just this.

Some scholars have found the problem of theodicy

resolved in advance in the Prologue. Here the reader is taken behind the scenes into the celestial council and made privy to the plot. It is Yahweh himself who initiates the action by calling attention to Job. The Satan is a mere agent of Yahweh, and it is Yahweh's will that is carried out. He gives the Satan permission to work on Job and sets the limits of the experiment. The purpose is to prove to angels and men that disinterested piety is possible, that Job can and does revere God for no hope of reward, but for himself. The victory is seen in Job's confession of unshakable trust: "The LORD gave, and the LORD has taken away; blessed be the name of the LORD" (1:21); and: "Shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil?" (2:10). This is viewed as moving toward the profoundest insight of the NT, the doctrine of the Cross, that innocent suffering serves some larger purpose of God. Helpful as this understanding may be, it derives more from the hindsight of Christian faith and experience than from internal evidences of the purpose of the author. Still, in the assurance that Job's suffering was innocent, the author makes an important contribution to the problem. Job, of course, did not know that God reckoned him as righteous. Only his conscience and common sense told him there was nothing in his conduct to merit such punishment. Had he known the reason for his suffering, it would have been no test of his faith and would have no meaning for the man who must suffer without knowing why. In Job's case the issue at stake was more than the winning of an idle wager; it was the vindication of God's faith in man, as well as man's faith in God.

The Dialogue (chs. 3–31) offers no answer to the question of theodicy, except the negative result of the debate, which could have been decided after the first round. The friends assert God's justice, and Job shows that it does not hold in his and many other cases. It has been quite properly pointed out that the speeches are not really a dialogue in the sense of disputations designed to arrive at the truth, but they are like the speeches in a legal proceeding, in which each side has a predetermined point of view, which is asserted back and forth till one side gives up. This is seen as the explanation of Zophar's failure to take his last turn. This view also accords with the fact that there is no real progress in the argumentation, despite labored efforts to find some. The friends do grow more vehement and more outspoken in their indictment of Job, but their basic position remains unchanged. Job, however, appears to grow more calm toward the end. He has been groping toward some answer. He wants to argue the case with God rather than man, but he cannot find God or bring him into court. His vain appeal (9:33) for an umpire has been seen as a sort of prophetic witness to the necessity of a Christ, a being, at once man and God, who could effect reconciliation. This is an intriguing thought, but certainly oversteps the bounds of sober exegesis, since there is no hint that this umpire is, in any sense, conceived as a messianic figure. It is, however, quite possible that behind Job's appeal for a mediator lies the ancient Sumerian idea of a personal god, which each man relied on to present his cause to the greater gods in the divine assembly. Job also grasps at the hope of an afterlife, especially in ch. 14; but the idea is broached only to be rejected, and Job lapses into the standard attitude of resignation to the finality of death. It is often assumed that this, the hope of recompense in a future life, would be the answer to the problem. But this is not so. The prospect of future bliss may be of some consolation to one in agony, but it does not help to understand or bear the suffering of the present. Paul's belief in resurrection, which he held as a Pharisee and retained as a Christian, did not solve the problem of his suffering. He received the strength to endure, not from contemplating the consolation of the life beyond, but from his fellowship with Christ.

Job returns to the theme of the mediator as he appeals to a heavenly witness who would argue his case with God (16:19, 21). This witness is manifestly the person previously referred to as an umpire, for the verb which describes his action is a form of the same that designates the actor, the umpire (9:33). Job is using the terminology of the law court, and all he asks for is a fair trial, for the right to have a friendly witness or defense counsel.

The climax of Job's questing is commonly seen in the famous passage 19:25-27. Unfortunately, this is one of the most difficult passages in the book, for the ambiguities are compounded by a hopelessly corrupted text. Two interpretations are possible: either Job counts on vindication before his death, or hopes for it after death. Some scholars emend or interpret the text to remove all suggestion of an afterlife, and others emend or torture the passage to make the suggestion of afterlife more explicit. The latter interpretation has to lean on the Vulg. rather than the Hebrew. Jerome thought that Job here clearly prophesied the resurrection of the body, and he made this explicit in his translation, which has long dominated traditional Christian exegesis. Many critics, however, both ancient and modern, have thought that Job speaks of vindication before his death, as in other places he hopes for the visible triumph of his cause (13:15-16; 23:2-10) and the return to divine favor (ch. 29).

The immediate context of 19:25-27 has to be taken into account. Stricken by God, denied even the pity and support of his friends, Job wishes to leave for posterity a lasting memorial and protestation of his innocence, a document or an inscribed stela (vss. 20-24). From this thought he comes again to an appeal for personal help, for a living vindicator or redeemer who would defend his case, acquit him of guilt, and win God over to his side. The idea here is the same as that expressed previously in the appeal to an arbiter or umpire (9:33), or to a witness to testify on his behalf (16:19, 21). To see here a messianic figure is to press the metaphor too hard. There is also nothing to support the view that Job here surrenders all claim on God and places his trust in a sort of heavenly high priest. On the contrary, he is still protesting his innocence and calling for vindication. His acquittal must come, whether during his life or after he has turned to dust. Even if he dies without seeing it in the flesh, he sees it now in his mind's eye, or hopes to be conscious of it when it comes, even though it be too late.

While the solution to the problem has been seen in one or the other of the several parts of the book, the view of the majority of interpreters is that it is to be found, if anywhere, in the theophany, in the speeches of Yahweh from the whirlwind (chs. 38–42). There are, however, difficulties in this view. Job has refuted and repudiated the dogma espoused by his friends in the Dialogue and has challenged God to come forth and answer his charges. The challenge brings a direct response (if we may pass over Elihu's interruption), but Yahweh ignores the issue as Job had posed it. No explanation is given of Job's suffering. A series of ironic questions convince Job of his ignorance and insignificance, and he confesses his error and recants. In the Epilogue, paradoxically, Job is commended for having spoken correctly about Yahweh, and the friends are sharply rebuked. Job is then restored to health and prosperity, and the doctrine he had refuted is seemingly upheld. The variety of attempts to reconcile or remove the inconsistencies involved here points up the very real difficulties. The resort to surgery to remove the difficulties requires more and more of the same, till scarcely a torso is left. If the speech(es) of Yahweh are removed, the Epilogue must go too, for it presupposes the divine speech (42:7). Dissatisfaction with the content of the divine speeches is hardly warrant for rejecting them. By its position in the book, as well as by its literary power, it is obvious that the theophany was intended as the climax. Here we have to look for the best word the poet has to offer on the subject, since it is not likely that he would give less than his noblest effort to the divine utterances.

The seemingly magnificent irrelevance of Yahweh's speech(es) presumably veils the poet's meaning. Yahweh answers Job's challenge to appear, but he declines to submit to cross-examination. Instead he asks the questions, with more than a touch of irony. Here it may be that the poet reveals his purpose: to put man in his proper place in relation to God. Yahweh's evasion of the question of Job's innocence may be the poet's oblique way of saying that no answer is available to man. God cannot be hauled into court or compelled to testify against himself. Ignorant and impotent man cannot presume to tell God how to order the universe. No amount or degree of suffering could give a mere man, with his finite intelligence, license to question God's justice as Job has done. It is exactly on this point that Job confesses and repents of his error; he has spoken without knowledge or understanding (42:3*b-c*). Job makes no concession, either explicit or implicit, in regard to his innocence and integrity, and Yahweh says nothing to imply that Job has merited his misery. This is an ethical triumph for Job over the friends, who had maintained that he must be guilty and would be proved so if God were to speak. But God brings no bill of indictment against Job; this fact accords with both Prologue and Epilogue, which tell us Job was innocent. Job gets no apology and no explanation from God for having wrongfully afflicted him, but the absence of any charge of guilt is tantamount to vindication. The assurance that his suffering is not punishment for sin is a part, at least, of what Job has demanded. The further question—if not for sin, why then?—is rejected as presumptuous. Job is rebuked for speaking out of ignorance. The rebuke must have reference to Job's charges of injustice against God.

Accordingly, Job's confession does not refer only to God's power, which he has never questioned. Throughout the Dialogue, Job has complained of the hopelessness of his case in the face of God's arbitrary omnipotence. Now that he actually gets a glimpse of God, he realizes that he has spoken rashly, for God moves on a level beyond human comprehension. The last vestige of Job's rebellious attitude disappears (42:3, 5).

If the poet's best word is not here, it is hard to say where else in the book it may be found. The answer which God gives from the whirlwind, passing over the details of the zoological marvels, is as much of an answer as man has ever received, apart from a beatific vision (42:5).

Bibliography. Books: K. Kautzsch, Das sogenannte Volksbuch von Hiob (1900). K. Fries, Das philosophische Gespräch von Hiob bis Plato (1904). J. Strahan, The Book of Job (1913). R. H. Pfeiffer, Le problème du livre de Job (1915). H. M. Kallen, The Book of Job as a Greek Tragedy Restored (1918). S. R. Driver and G. B. Gray, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Job (1921). P. Volz, Hiob und Weisheit (1921). M. Buttenwieser, The Book of Job (1922). P. Dhorme, Le livre de Job (1926). P. Humbert, Recherches sur les sources égyptiennes de la littérature sapientiale d'Israël (1929). E. König, Das Buch Hiob (1929). H. Ranston, The OT Wisdom Books, and Their Teaching (1930). F. Baumgärtel, Der Hiobdialog (1933). O. S. Rankin, Israel's Wisdom Literature: Its Bearing on Theology and the History of Religion (1936). B. D. Eerdmans, Studies in Job (1939). E. J. Kissane, The Book of Job (1939). E. Kraeling, The Book of the Ways of God (1939). F. Wutz, Das Buch Hiob (1939). R. H. Pfeiffer, Introduction to the OT (1941). J. Lindblom, La composition du livre de Job (1945). N. H. Snaith, The Book of Job (Study Notes; 1945). A. M. Dubarle, Les Sages d'Israël (1946). V. E. Reichert, Job (Soncino Books of the Bible; 1946). J. J. Stamm, Das Leiden des Unschuldigen in Babylon und Israel (1946). M. Susman, Das Buch Hiob und das Schicksal des jüdischen Volkes (1946). W. B. Stevenson, The Poem of Job (1947). J. J. Weber, Le livre de Job, l'Ecclésiastique (1947). R. R. Schärf, Die Gestalt des Satans im AT (1948). C. Larcher, Le livre de Job (1950). I. J. Gerber, The Psychology of the Suffering Mind (1951). H. Lamparter, Das Buch der Anfechtung (1951). H. H. Rowley, Submission in Suffering and Other Essays (1951). A. Weiser, Das Buch Hiob (1951). D. H. Gard, The Exegetical Method of the Greek Translator of the Book of Job (1952). G. Hölscher, Das Buch Hiob (1952). C. G. Jung, Antwort auf Hiob (1952; trans., Answer to Job, 1954). H. Richter, Studien zu Hiob, Der Aufbau des Hiobbuches, dargestellt an den Gattungen des Rechtslebens (1954). T. H. Robinson, Job and His Friends (1954). F. Stier, Das Buch Ijjob (1954). H. Möller, Sinn und Aufbau des Buches Hiob (1955). H. W. Robinson, The Cross of Job (1955). J. Scharbert, Der Schmerz im AT (1955). J. Steinmann, Le livre de Job (1955). E. F. Sutcliffe, Providence and Suffering in the Old and New Testaments (1955). C. Westermann, Der Aufbau des Buches Hiob (1956). O. Eissfeldt, Einleitung in das AT (1957). S. Terrien, Job: Poet of Existence (1957). N. H. Tur Sinai, The Book of Job (1957). G. von Rad, Theologie des Alten Testaments, Band I: Die Theologie der geschichtlichen Überlieferungen Israels (1957). H. Gese, Lehre und Wirklichkeit in der alten Weisheit (1958).

Articles: W. E. Staples, "The Speeches of Elihu," University of Toronto Studies, Philological Series 8 (1925). R. H. Pfeiffer, "Edomitic Wisdom," ZAW, 44 (1926), 13-25. M. Burrows, "The Voice from the Whirlwind," JBL, 47 (1928), 117-32. F. H. Foster, "Is the Book of Job a Translation from an Arabic Original?" AJSL, 49 (1932-33), 21-45. W. A. Irwin, "An Examination of the Progress of Thought in the Dialogue of Job," JR, 13 (1933), 150-64. A. Lods, "Recherches récentes sur le livre de Job," RHPR, 14 (1934), 501-19. R. H. Pfeiffer, "Wisdom and Vision in the OT," ZAW, 52 (1934), 93-101. B. Landsberger, "Die babylonische Theodizee," Zeitschrift für Assyriologie und verwandte Gebiete, vol. 48 (1936). A. Alt, "Zur Vorgeschichte des Buches Hiob," ZAW, 55 (1937), 265-68. W. A. Irwin, "The Elihu Speeches in the Criticism of the Book of Job," JR, 17 (1937), 37-47. J. Lindblom, "Job and Prometheus, a Comparative Study," Dragma Martino P. Nilsson (1939), pp. 280-87. A. Lods, "Les origines de la figure de Satan, ses fonctions à la cour céleste," Mélanges Syriens Dussaud, II (1939), 649-60. R. Gordis, "Corporate Personality in Job: A Note on 22:29-30," JNES, 4 (1945), 54 ff. S. Spiegel, "Noah, Danel, and Job," Louis Ginzberg Jubilee Volume (1945), pp. 305-55. C. L. Feinberg, "The Poetic Structure of the Book of Job and the Ugaritic Literature," Bibliotheca Sacra, 103 (1946), 283-92. R. Gordis, "All Men's Book: A New Introduction to Job," Menorah, 37 (1948), 329-58. R. Marcus, "Job and God," RR, 14 (1949), 27 ff. W. A. Irwin, "Prometheus and Job," JR, 30 (1950), 90-108. O. J. Baab, "The Book of Job," Interpretation, 5 (1951), 329-43. H. G. May, "Prometheus and Job," ATR, 34 (1952), 240-46. J. Nougayrol, "Une version ancienne du 'Juste souffrant,'" RB (1952), pp. 239-50. K. Kuhl, "Neuere Literaturkritik des Buches Hiob," Theol. Rundschau, 21 (1953), 163-205, 257-317. M. P. Nilsson, "Religion as Man's Protest Against the Meaninglessness of Events," Bulletin de la société royale des lettres de Lund, II (1953-54), 25-92. E. A. Speiser, "The Case of the Obliging Servant," JCS, 8 (1954), 98-105. S. Terrien, Introduction and Exegesis of Job, IB, III (1954), 877-1198. H. A. Fine, "The Tradition of a Patient Job," JBL, 74 (1955), 28-32. B. Gemser, "The Rib —or Controversy—Pattern in Hebrew Mentality," Vetus Testamentum, Supplement III (1955). P. Humbert, "Le modernisme de Job," Vetus Testamentum, Supplement III (1955), pp. 150-61. S. N. Kramer, "Man and His God," Vetus Testamentum, Supplement III (1955), pp. 170-82. G. von Rad, "Hiob XXXIII und die altägyptische Weisheit," Vetus Testamentum, Supplement III (1955), pp. 293-301. H. Knight, "Job (Considered as a Contribution to Hebrew Theology)," Scottish Journal of Theology, 9 (1956), 63-76. R. J. Williams, "Theodicy in the Ancient Near East," Canadian Journal of Theology, 2 (1956), 14-26. J. Daniélou, "Job," Holy Pagans of the OT (1957), pp. 86-102. N. M. Sarna, "Epic Substratum in the Prose of Job," JBL, 76 (1957), 13-25. H. H. Rowley, "The Book of Job and Its Meaning," Bulletin of the John Rylands Library, 41 (1958), 167-207.

M. H. POPE

JOBAB jō'băb [יובב; cf. Akkad. Iabibi]. 1. The youngest son of Joktan, and hence the name of an Arabian group (Gen. 10:29; I Chr. 1:23). It was probably connected with the town of Juhaibab, which is mentioned in a Sabean inscription and which was located in the neighborhood of Mecca.

2. The second king of Edom, who came from the N capital, Bozrah (Gen. 36:33). The LXX appendix to the book of Job confounds the latter's hero with this king.

3. A king of the town of Madon, located somewhere in the N of Palestine. He was defeated by Joshua (Josh. 11:1; 12:19).

4. A Benjaminite; son of Shaharaim (I Chr. 8:9).

5. A Benjaminite; son of Elpaal (I Chr. 8:18).

S. COHEN

JOCHEBED jŏk'ə bĕd [יוכבד, see below]. A daughter of Levi; the wife of Amram; and the mother of Aaron, Moses, and Miriam (Exod. 6:20; Num. 26:59). Only the P document has the name; the E document calls her merely a "daughter of Levi" (Exod. 2:1). The etymology of the name is uncertain. The most natural suggestion would be that it signifies "Yahweh is glory"; this would mean, however, that the name Yahweh was known prior to the time of Moses (see GOD, NAMES OF, § B2). Thus the Priestly writer probably did not understand it in this sense. Another possibility is that the syllable יו stands for a Canaanite god yw; the existence of such a god has been generally denied, however.

Bibliography. G. B. Gray, Studies in Hebrew Proper Names (1896), pp. 156, 257; M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 111; H. Bauer, "Die Gottheiten von Ras Schamra," ZAW, LI (1933), 92-93; T. J. Meek, Hebrew Origins (rev. ed., 1950), p. 97.

J. F. ROSS

JOD jŏd, jōd (Heb. yōṯh) [י, y (Yôdh)]. The tenth letter of the Hebrew ALPHABET as it is placed in the KJV at the head of the tenth section of the acrostic psalm, Ps. 119, where each verse of this section of the psalm begins with this letter.

JODA jō'də ['Ιωδά, 'Ιούδας]. 1. Son of Iliadun; head of a family of Levites appointed to help repair the temple after the return from the Exile (I Esd. 5:58).

2. An ancestor of Jesus (Luke 3:26).

JODAN jō'dən [Ἰώδαν, Ἰωάδαν] (I Esd. 9:19). Probably same as GEDALIAH 5.

JOED jō'ĕd [יעד, Yahu is witness] (Neh. 11:7). A Benjaminite listed as resident in Jerusalem under Nehemiah. The name is absent from the parallel I Chr. 9:7.

JOEL jō'əl [יואל, Yahu is God; cf. אליה, ELIJAH; 'Ιωήλ, 'Ιουήλ]; KJV Apoc. JUEL jōō'əl ['Ιουήλ (A)]. The comparatively wide distribution of the name Joel among the different tribes is theologically significant in view of its etymology.

1. A prince (nāsî) in the tribe of Simeon (I Chr. 4:35).

2. A man of the tribe of Reuben (I Chr. 5:4, 8).

3. A chief of the tribe of Gad in Bashan (I Chr. 5:12).

4. A Kohathite Levite; and, according to the Chronicler, an ancestor of Elkanah the father of the prophet Samuel (I Chr. 6:36; cf. vss. 34-35 with I Sam. 1:1).

5. The elder son of Samuel the prophet (I Sam. 8:2); and, according to the Chronicler, a Kohathite Levite and father or ancestor of Heman the singer (I Chr. 6:33). In I Chr. 6:28 the name Joel has dropped out of a corrupted Hebrew text but can be restored on the basis of vs. 33, I Sam. 8:2, and the Syr., as in the RSV. The KJV reads "Vashni," merely transliterating the Hebrew phrase "and the second," which precedes the name of the second son.

6. A man of the tribe of Issachar (I Chr. 7:3).

7. One of David's "Mighty Men" (I Chr. 11:38). In a related list Igal (יגאל) stands for possibly this name (II Sam. 23:36).

8. A chief of the Levite "sons of Gershom," who with 130 of his brethren took part in the ceremonies connected with bringing the ark of the Lord up to Jerusalem in the reign of David (I Chr. 15:7, 11). He is apparently the same as the Joel, son of Laadan, in I Chr. 23:8, who shared responsibility with his brothers for the temple treasuries (I Chr. 26:22).

9. Son of Pedaiah; chief officer over the half-tribe of Manasseh in the reign of David (I Chr. 27:20).

10. A Kohathite Levite who took part in the cleansing and reconsecration of the temple during the reign of King Hezekiah (II Chr. 29:12).

11. The prophet Joel, son of Pethuel. See JOEL, BOOK OF.

12. One of the postexilic Jews among Ezra's contemporaries who are listed as having married foreign wives (Ezra 10:43; I Esd. 9:35).

13. An overseer, or chief representative (pāqîdh) of the laity (not merely of the Benjaminites), in postexilic Jerusalem (Neh. 11:9).

Bibliography. R. A. Bowman, Exegesis of Nehemiah, IB, III (1954), 774.

14. In the pseudepigraphical literature, the archangel Joel, the same as Jaoel or Jahoel or Jehoel (יהואל; Apocalypse of Moses 29:4; 43:5; Apocalypse of Abraham 10:20; 17:22; etc.; see bibliography).

Bibliography. L. S. A. Wells in R. H. Charles, ed., Apoc. and Pseudep. of the OT (1913), II, 148, 154; G. H. Box, ed., The Apocalypse of Abraham (1918), pp. xxv-xxvi, 46n.; M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 16, 70, 77, 107, 140. B. T. DAHLBERG

JOEL, BOOK OF [יואל; Ἰωήλ]. The second of the twelve short prophetic books which together make up the concluding section of the OT. In the versions the book consists of three chapters; the MT has four. The versions have combined two of the Hebrew chapters into one. In the case of the English versions, following the LXX and the Vulg., chs. 2–3 of the Hebrew have been thus amalgamated into 2:1-27, 28-32.

Nothing is known of the author apart from his name. The oracles suggest Jerusalem as their place of origin, and the date has been variously given as pre-exilic or postexilic. Majority opinion now favors a date ca. 400 B.C. The occasion of the prophecies appears to have been an unusually severe plague of locusts, which suggested to the author the imminence of the Day of Yahweh (see DAY OF THE LORD). These are the two main topics of his short work, although it has frequently been argued that the apocalyptic sections are not original. The main interest of the oracles as they stand, apart from their literary qualities and the impressive conception of the Day of Yahweh, lies in the connection between the prophecy of the outpouring of the Spirit (2:28-32) and the pentecostal experience of the early church (Acts 2:14-21).

See map "Palestine: Joel, Obadiah, Jonah," under OBADIAH, BOOK OF.

A. The author
B. The book
  1. The prophecies
    a. The locusts
    b. The meaning of the visitation
    c. Repentance and its sequel
    d. The coming of the Spirit
    e. Judgment upon the world
    f. The golden age
  2. Interpretation
  3. Integrity
  4. Date
C. The significance of Joel
Bibliography

A. THE AUTHOR. The prophet is described as the son of Pethuel or Bethuel (LXX), but nothing is known apart from this of either father or son. His name, which means "Yahweh is God," was not an uncommon one (see JOEL). From his interest in the temple ritual it has been inferred that he was a cultic prophet.

B. THE BOOK. 1. The prophecies. a. The locusts. The prophet describes a swarm of locusts of unprecedented intensity, which have apparently devastated the land (1:2-4). With the ferocity of lions the creatures have stripped trees and vines and left them bare (vss. 5-7). Even the holy offerings to Yahweh cannot be made in the temple for sheer lack of corn, wine, and oil. The priests are in despair (vss. 8-10), as are the farmers (vss. 11-12). Joel calls upon the priesthood to summon the people to fasting and penitential prayer that the plague might cease (vss. 13-14).

b. The meaning of the visitation. The prophet sees this calamity as more than a natural phenomenon. It is a warning of the approaching judgment, a sign of the impending Day of Yahweh (1:15). In graphic detail he depicts the catastrophic plight of man and beast. Not only locusts but also forest fires and lack of vital rainfall have emptied the granaries and turned the lush pastures into a barren waste (vss. 16-20).

Now let the alarm ring out from Jerusalem through the land, that all may take heed of the clear warning which Yahweh has given. Let them see in this onslaught of destruction a presage of the coming judgment. The black clouds of insects that darken the sky are a foretaste of the darkness and gloom of the Day of the Lord. They sweep through the land like a consuming fire, like an invading army (2:1-5). Men cringe in terror before this irresistible onset. Stout city walls cannot hold them back. They swarm into the dwelling houses of Jerusalem (vss. 6-9). The very earth and heavens seem to shudder, and light itself is blotted out, as it will be on that dread day (vss. 10-11).

c. Repentance and its sequel. Yet there is still hope. If only the people will repent and turn to Yahweh in sincerity of heart, they will find him ready to forgive their past offenses and to rid them of this plague. The land will again yield its fruit, and the sacred offerings may be made once more (2:12-14). So the prophet calls anew (cf. 1:14) for national repentance. Let the priests intercede with Yahweh that this disaster may be averted and that the world may thus see that Israel does not worship him in vain (2:15-17).

From the next words it appears that Joel's appeal has been heeded and that the people have repented. Now the prophet predicts the sequel. The land will once again yield its proper fruits. The swarms of locusts will be swept away and destroyed (2:18-20). The rains will fall once more in their due season. Grain, wine, and oil in plenty will gladden men's hearts. The protracted losses due to the visitation of locusts will be made up. Israel will know that Yahweh alone is her true God, and never again will the heathen have cause to doubt his power (vss. 21-27).

d. The coming of the Spirit. After this prospect of material abundance has been confidently predicted, the prophet goes on to envisage even greater blessings. Yahweh will send down his Spirit upon all Israel. From the oldest to the youngest, from the highest to the lowest, his people will no longer depend on the voice of a few prophets to communicate divine truth, but each and every one will be a prophet in his own right, with the prophet's insight through vision and ecstasy into the nature and purpose of God (2:28-29).

Then convulsions on earth and portents in the heavens will herald the approach of the Day of the Lord, with all its terrors. But true worshipers of Yahweh need have no fear. For not all in Israel are doomed to destruction. Those whom Yahweh has called to be his faithful servants will survive the horrors that mark the coming of the judgment (vss. 30-32).

e. Judgment upon the world. These will be the days when the Lord will summon the heathen nations to meet him in the Vale of Judgment (see JEHOSHAPHAT, VALLEY OF) and to stand their assize. He will charge them with scattering his people in exile, with despoiling their lands and selling even their children into slavery (3:1-3). He will call to account the Phoenicians and the Philistines for plundering the territories of his people and for selling them to the Greeks as slaves. But the tables will be turned, for the scattered people of Yahweh will be brought back from their places of exile to take vengeance on these foes. They in their turn will become slaves of the Jews, who will sell them to the traders of distant Sheba (vss. 4-8).

The nations of the earth rally for a final battle against Jerusalem, in preparation for which they forge every peaceful tool into a weapon of war, and even their weaklings become warriors (vss. 9-10). There in the Vale of Judgment the angelic host of heaven will carry out the sentence which the Lord has passed upon his enemies. Cut down like grain at harvesttime, crushed like grapes in a winepress, the heathen will perish in the Valley of Decision (see DECISION, VALLEY OF) while heaven and earth tremble and Yahweh roars from Zion (vss. 11-16*a*).

f. The golden age. But in the midst of this terrible judgment Israel will be protected by her God. Hence she will know for certain that Yahweh will never be absent from his people. Never again will Jerusalem, his holy city, be violated by the heathen. Hitherto unimagined fertility will bless the land, and a miraculous life-giving spring will flow from the temple (3:16*b*-18). While Egypt and Edom, the ancient enemies of Israel, become a wilderness, Judah will be inhabited forever, and Yahweh will live eternally in Jerusalem (vss. 19-21).

2. Interpretation. The book of Joel is generally recognized as falling naturally into two distinct parts, as indicated more clearly by the Hebrew division, into chs. 1–2; 3–4, or, in the English versions, into 1:1–2:27; 2:28–3:21. The problem of its interpretation arises from the fact that the first part (1:1–2:27) appears to deal with a recent historical event—namely, a plague of locusts which so devastated the land that the prophet, regarding this affliction as a clear indication of Yahweh's displeasure, called the people to repentance. The people responded to his call, whereupon he predicted the destruction of the locusts and the restoration of fertility to the land.

The second part (2:28–3:21), on the other hand, appears to be wholly eschatological in character. The prophet speaks of a future time when a supernatural visitation of the spirit of Yahweh will bestow upon all his people the gift of prophecy. He further depicts in apocalyptic terms the final conflict between the hosts of Yahweh and the armies of the heathen nations, ending in the annihilation of the latter and the ultimate vindication of Israel.

Yet while the first part is predominantly historical and the second part mostly apocalyptic, the division is not so radical as is at first apparent. The Day of Yahweh occurs in both sections (cf. 1:15; 2:1-2, 10-11), and elements in the description of the invading army of locusts seem to have already a kinship with the supernatural character of the events described in the second half of the book (e.g., 2:2-11, 20). The question has therefore been raised as to whether the locusts are, in fact, real locusts, or whether they are merely symbols of the heathen armies whose destruction is described in ch. 3. If they are symbolic, either they may represent hostile attacks in the course of the past history of Israel, or they may be wholly apocalyptic in character as in Rev. 9:1-11.

The fathers favored an allegorical interpretation. The locusts of chs. 1–2 are the powers of darkness which threaten the church. But in the end God's judgment will fall upon the world. Later explanations identify the four types of locust (1:4) with four great world empires which harried Israel—Egyptian, Assyrian, Babylonian, and Greek; or Babylonian, Persian, Greek, and Roman—or with four separate assaults on the country during the Persian period. None of these allegorical interpretations is satisfactory. As has been pointed out many times, if the locusts are armed warriors, they cannot be said to be like themselves (cf. 2:4-7).

The view generally held now is that the locusts are real and not symbolic. Close observers of the habits of these creatures, and spectators who have witnessed the devastation they have caused, recognize in the prophet's description an accurate picture of such a fearful onslaught as must have given rise to this book. Their behavior suggests nothing more vividly than the terrible havoc wrought by invading armies, and might well be described in the highly colored terms of ch. 2. In the normal manner of apocalyptic thought, as in Ezekiel, Daniel, and Revelation, this would lead the prophet, in the second part of the book, to regard such a disaster as a warning of the judgment to come (cf. Isa. 13). The association of the two elements would readily account for the apocalyptic coloring and eschatological references of the first part. See ESCHATOLOGY OF THE OT.

3. Integrity. On this view there is no reason to suppose that Joel was not responsible for the whole work. Many other suggestions have, however, been advanced. It has been conjectured that 1:1–2:27 forms the original work and that 2:28–3:21 is by the hand of a later apocalyptist. In this case references to the Day of Yahweh in 1:15; 2:1-2, 10-11, have to be eliminated. More recently 1:1–2:27 has been held to contain liturgical poems which formed part of the New Year Festival ritual, and to which have been added at subsequent dates fragments of an apocalyptic character. None of these suggestions appears to be based on incontrovertible evidence, and there would seem to be no advantage to be gained from treating the book as composite. There is also the fact that nothing suggests conclusively that its various parts come from different periods.

4. Date. Critics have ranged from the ninth century to the second century B.C. in seeking to determine a date for the prophecies, either as a whole or in part. The modern consensus, however, regards them as postexilic and narrows the range of time to the period ca. 400.

The grounds for postulating a date about this time are well-nigh conclusive. Israel and Judah have ceased to exist as separate nations, and the names appear to be used synonymously (2:27; 3:2, 16). The monarchy has disappeared, and many of the people are scattered in exile (3:2-3). But the temple is standing and is in full operation (1:13-14; 2:15-17). The walls of Jerusalem are intact (2:9), and the community is small enough to be gathered within the temple courts (2:16). Its leaders are priests and elders (2:16-17). The priesthood and the ritual figure prominently (1:13-14; 2:12-17), in particular the meal offering and drink offering (1:9, 13; 2:14). Greeks have replaced Assyrians and Babylonians as masters of the dispersed slaves, though not yet as rulers of the world (3:6). Despite the possible qualification in 2:32, it would seem that the prophet drew a sharp distinction between Israel and the rest of the world in his view of the Day of the Lord. Whereas earlier prophets (cf. Amos 5:18-20) had thought in terms of judgment upon Israel for its sins, Joel thinks rather of the punishment of Israel's enemies and the triumph of the Jews (ch. 3).

All this points to the period after the Exile, when the worship of the restored TEMPLE had become the lifeblood of the people, when formalism in ritual had taken the place of moral issues as the main concern of a prophet (2:12-14). Disappointment and disillusionment over the failure of earlier prophetic promises to materialize had led to a growth of nationalism and exclusiveness (2:28-32; 3:18-20), which saw the Jews as the victims of a world too corrupt to be redeemed, and which placed its only hope in their vindication by the total and supernatural annihilation of their enemies. This attitude was encouraged by the legislation of Nehemiah and the promulgation of the law. The affinities of the book of Joel are with the oracles of Zech. 9–14 rather than with Malachi, and the above considerations appear to point to conditions in Jerusalem at the end of the fifth or the beginning of the fourth century.

C. THE SIGNIFICANCE OF JOEL. This fascinating little book has many intriguing features, and these not only theological. Naturalists commend the accuracy of the description of the ravages of the locusts, and littérateurs are impressed by the vividness of the imagery and the poetic quality of the style. It would appear from the number of phrases which can be paralleled in other OT books that the author had modeled himself on earlier masters like Amos and Zephaniah, Ezekiel and Second Isaiah. Indeed, he acknowledges a quotation (from Obad. 17) in 2:32, but he in his turn probably influenced the imagery of the second part of Zechariah.

His artistic skill in weaving backward and forward between the historical phenomenon of the locusts and the suprahistorical events of the Day of Yahweh is considerable. Each of these themes takes on something of the coloring of the other—a fact which, as we have seen, gave rise to the suggestion that the locusts themselves must be as supernatural as the judgment.

But it is in his role as a harbinger of the apocalyptic school that Joel's importance lies for biblical theology. In other respects he shares the older prophetic ideas. The plague of locusts is a certain sign of Yahweh's wrath. Repentance is therefore incumbent on the whole community for their unspecified sins. The most tragic aspect of the rift between Yahweh and his people is seen as the cessation of the daily offerings, now, in the postexilic theocracy, the guarantee of the covenant relationship (see WORSHIP IN THE OT). But given repentance, divine favor will be manifested, not only in terms of material prosperity for the community, but also, and more important, in the restoration of the means of preserving the covenant relationship. By this both Israel and the world will know that Yahweh is I ord and that his own people are his peculiar care.

It is on this conventional basis of rewards and punishments that Joel builds his apocalyptic structure (see APOCALYPTICISM). The events of history are projected onto a cosmic canvas and become prefigurations of what lies beyond the natural sequence of occurrences within the time process. The plague of locusts becomes a type of the powers of evil that oppress Yahweh's people. Their rout and the subsequent restoration of prosperity are transposed into the final judgment upon the world and its sequel in a golden age for the people of the promise.

There are three main aspects of apocalyptic eschatology which are expressed more fully in the later writings of the intertestamental period, but it is remarkable to find them all side by side within the compass of this short book. The first is the pastoral motif, more familiar in the context of Isa. 2:2-4, where the eschatological hope revolves round the conception of paradise regained, the reversal of the Fall, and the idyllic prospect of a transformed natural world and its denizens existing together in a state of peace and bliss, while man lives in the midst of it in harmony with the Creator.

That this aspect, expressed in an apocalyptic context in Joel 3:17-18, was no longer conceived of as a state of purely material well-being can be seen from the reference to the miraculous fountain which comes from the dwelling place of God and which is regarded as the water of life (cf. John 4:14; Rev. 22:1-2). Nor does the fact that national exclusiveness is featured side by side with this vision of the golden age vitiate its value. Whatever the failure of Israel may have been to fulfil the vocation of a people of God, the mission and the historical concept were not invalidated. The Zion of the age to come in 3:17 is an eternal reality, even if the prophet saw it with the limited vision of Jewish nationalism, and the essence of the hope which is here expressed is part of the Christian heritage.

The second main type of apocalyptic expectation is one which springs from the increasingly nationalistic outlook of the Jews in the period after the return from exile. When a people had seen their children sold for a song into slavery, they looked to a supernatural intervention for redress, of which they saw no prospect in the normal way. Joel in his oracle against the Phoenicians and the Philistines has worked this out on the strictest basis of retributive justice (3:4-8).

In his vision of the cosmic battle between the nations of the world and the hosts of heaven (cf. Ezek. 38–39; Zephaniah), in which Isa. 2:2-4 is parodied, he assumes the total extermination of the heathen and the preservation of Israel alone (3:9-17). It should be remembered, however, that in apocalyptic thought the "nations" ceased to consist of men, women, and children, and became the incarnation of the evil that warred unceasingly against the good purposes of God. That these good purposes were thought of as canalized in his peculiar people led inevitably to an identification of the harrying of Israel with a frontal assault on God himself.

Yet once again it was basically a true insight that led the apocalyptic seers of Israel to regard every attack on the people of the law and the promises as a violation of the law and promises themselves. The human fallibility of old and new Israel alike cannot obliterate the truth that, however imperfect be the fulfilment, the basic aspiration of both has been to serve God, and the initial stand has been taken on the side of what has been accepted as the direct revelation of God's will. It should be noted that in his picture of the annihilation of the forces of evil (3:13; cf. Rev. 14:14-20) Joel refrains from the lurid descriptions of later apocalyptic (e.g., Zech. 9:15; 14:12).

The third main tendency of apocalyptic thought, the mystical or spiritual emphasis, is expressed by Joel (2:28-29) in a passage which was regarded as deeply significant by the early church. Again its form has the limitations common to all Jewish apocalyptic ideas. It rests upon the words of Num. 11:29, where Moses reproves Joshua for seeking to confine the onset of prophetic ecstasy within approved channels. Moses utters the wish that all the people of Yahweh might be similarly endowed with a visitation of his rûaḥ.

It is this apparently miraculous possession by the spirit of Yahweh that is foreseen by Joel as one of the supernatural manifestations of the end, doubtless influenced by the decline in prophecy which eventually led to the situation described in Zech. 13:1-6. It is in terms of dream, vision, and ecstasy that the prophet thinks, rather than in terms of spiritual insight and communion with God in the Christian sense. Moreover, in his thought the gift is limited to Israel. Yet once more the prophet—or the apocalyptist—speaks more truly than he knows, and the fulfilment in the experience of the church is richer than the prophecy.

In his sermon on the day of Pentecost, when prophetic ecstasy of the OT type fell upon all present so that they seemed to the bystanders to be behaving like drunk men, Peter quoted in full these words of Joel in explanation of the miracle (Acts 2:14-18). Yet just as the early church spiritualized and reinterpreted the other elements of Joel's vision (Acts 2:19-21), so, from the beginning, the presence of the Spirit was held to be evidenced, not only by ecstatic frenzy, but also by the witness of lives lived in a new dimension through the coming of the Messiah and the realization of the eschaton in history (Acts 11:24; Gal. 5:22). Nor did the gift of the Spirit remain for very long the sole prerogative of the Jews, for it was soon seen to be available for all within the new Israel, both Jew and Gentile (Acts 2:21, 39; 10:45; Rom. 10:12-13). See HOLY SPIRIT; PENTECOST.

Bibliography. Commentaries: J. A. Bewer, ICC (1912); G. W. Wade, WC (1925); G. A. Smith, EB (1928); R. F. Horton, Century Bible; E. Sellin, KAT (1929); S. R. Driver, Cambridge Bible (1934); T. H. Robinson, HAT (1938); J. A. Thompson, IB (1956). See also Introductions to the literature of the OT by Driver, Pfeiffer, Bentzen, et al.

For background: H. H. Rowley, The Relevance of Apocalyptic (1944); S. B. Frost, OT Apocalyptic (1952).

Special studies: L. Dennefeld, Les problèmes du livre de Joël, RSR, XV (1925), 35-57, 591-608; A. S. Kapelrud, Joel Studies (1948). W. NEIL JOELAH jō ē′lə [יועאלה] (I Chr. 12:7—H 12:8). One of the sons of Jeroham of Gedor who are named among the famed Benjaminite warriors that joined the proscribed band of David at Ziklag.

JOEZER jō ē′zər [יועזר, Yahu is help] (I Chr. 12:6—H 12:7). One of the famed warriors of the tribe of Benjamin who joined the followers of the proscribed David at Ziklag. It seems best to interpret his gentilic name, Kohathite, as referring to his place of origin.

JOGBEHAH jŏg′bə hə [יגבהה, height]. A fortified city of Gad, mentioned next to Jazer (Num. 32:35). When Gideon was pursuing the Midianites, he made a circuit about Nobah and Jogbehah in order to attack his enemies from the rear (Judg. 8:11). The site is Khirbet el-Ajbeihat, seven miles NW of 'Amman.

S. COHEN

JOGLI jŏg′lī [יגלי; LXX Εγλι, may (God) reveal(?)] (Num. 34:22). The father of the Danite leader Bukki, who was selected to help superintend the distribution of W Jordanian Canaan among the tribes to occupy that territory.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), p. 244. R. F. JOHNSON

JOHA jō′ə [יוחא]. 1. A Tizite who, with his brother Jediael, is mentioned among the Mighty Men of David known as the "Thirty" (I Chr. 11:45).

2. One of the sons of Beriah included in the genealogies of the tribe of Benjamin (I Chr. 8:16).

JOHANAN jō hā′nən [יוחנן, Yahu has been gracious (cf. JEHOHANAN); Apoc. 'Ιωάννης (A)]; KJV Apoc. JOHANNES jō hăn′ĭz. 1. One of the Benjaminites who joined David's forces at Ziklag (I Chr. 12:4).

2. One of the Gadites who joined David at Ziklag; an officer (I Chr. 12:12, 14).

3. A priest, and a son or more distant descendant of the priest Azariah, who was a contemporary of King Solomon (I Chr. 6:9-10—H 5:35-36; cf. I Kings 4:2; the reference to service in Solomon's temple in 6:10 correctly belongs with the first "Azariah" in vs. 9).

4. An Ephraimite (II Chr. 28:12). The Hebrew name here (יהוחנן) requires transliteration as "Jehohanan," not "Johanan" as in the KJV-RSV.

5. A son of King Josiah (ca. 640-609 B.C.). Although the eldest, for some reason he did not succeed to the throne (I Chr. 3:15).

6. Son of Kareah, and a contemporary of the prophet Jeremiah. He was one of the Jewish military leaders in Judah who, after the fall of Jerusalem to Babylon in 586 B.C., gave his allegiance to Gedaliah, the governor of Judah appointed by the Babylonian king Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. 40:8; cf. II Kings 25:23). He warned Gedaliah of a plot to assassinate him, but the latter disbelieved him (Jer. 40:13-16); and when the deed was actually accomplished, Johanan led a force to avenge his death. He then, with the other leaders, prepared to take the company into Egypt to escape the feared reprisals from Babylon for the death of Gedaliah (41:11-18). Jeremiah the prophet counseled him and the others to remain in Judah, trusting in God for their safety, but they distrusted his advice and migrated to Egypt, taking the prophet with them (42:1–43:7).

7. Son of a certain Elioenai, a descendant of David (I Chr. 3:24).

8. One of those who returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezra 8:12; I Esd. 8:38). For "Johanan the son of Hakkatan" (הקטן; lit., "the little one"), read probably "Johanan the Younger."

9. Grandson of the high priest Eliashib, and himself a high priest (Neh. 12:22-23, where "son," as in many other passages, can mean "grandson" or an even more distant heir). In Neh. 12:11 the name JONATHAN 12 (יוכתן) is probably an error for Johanan; the difference in Hebrew is slight. If he is identical (as seems probable) with JEHOHANAN 4 (יוחנן=יהוחנן), into whose chamber Ezra retired to fast (Ezra 10:6; I Esd. 9:1), the relationship is significant, for Eliashib was Nehemiah's contemporary (e.g., Neh. 3:1; and see ELIASHIB 2); and the contemporaneity of his grandson with Ezra, if granted, requires the dating of Ezra's advent in Jerusalem sometime after that of Nehemiah.

This Johanan is the high priest referred to by this name in the Elephantine Papyri (see bibliography), which place him, moreover, as a contemporary of the Persian king Darius II (423-404 B.C.). The Jewish historian Josephus (ca. A.D. 100), calling him by the Greek form of his name, John ('Ιωάννης), writes that while the latter was high priest, he murdered his brother Jesus (Jeshua) in the temple, believing the latter about to usurp his office. See bibliography.

10. KJV form of JEHOHANAN 4, 6.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 21, 62, 187. On 9 above, see: Josephus Antiquities XI.vii.1; A. Cowley, ed., Aramaic Papyri (1923), p. 114, no. 30, line 18; H. H. Rowley, "The Chronological Order of Ezra and Nehemiah," The Servant of the Lord (1952), pp. 145-51; R. A. Bowman, Exegesis of Ezra and Nehemiah, IB, III (1954), 654, 787, 789. B. T. DAHLBERG

JOHANNES. KJV Apoc. form of JOHANAN; JEHOHANAN.

JOHN jŏn [יוחנן; 'Ιωάννης]. A name once common among Jews.

1. The father of MATTATHIAS 1, and grandfather of JUDAS MACCABEUS (I Macc. 2:1; 14:20). The text speaks of the family as "sons of JOARIB"; the latter is probably the Joarib mentioned in I Chr. 24:7 as the forebear of the first of the twenty-four families of priests.

2. The oldest of the five sons of Mattathias, and the grandson of 1 above (I Macc. 2:2). He was called Gaddi (in some texts Caddi), possibly the same name borne by an earlier person, of some eminence in the tribe of Manasseh (Num. 13:11). That Judah, John's brother, led the Hasmoneans initially, and was replaced after his death by Jonathan Maccabeus, suggests that John, though the oldest son, was not the leader. Virtually nothing is related of him except for the incident of his death (I Macc. 9:35-42): John was sent by his brother Jonathan to carry the property of the Maccabeans into Nabatea for safekeeping. He was slain (probably in 161 B.C.) by a marauding tribe, the Jambri, from Medeba.

The mention of a Joseph (II Macc. 8:22; 10:19) is often regarded as a false reading for "John."

3. An envoy from the Jews to Lysias, a general of Antiochus Epiphanes (see ANTIOCHUS 4). The text (II Macc. 11:17) does not further identify him.

4. The son of Accos (I Macc. 8:17), and the father of EUPOLEMUS. Nothing is known of him except his name.

5. The father of PETER (John 1:42; 21:15-17). Matt. 16:17 reads bariona or bar Iona, which is Aramaic for "son of Jonah," not "John." Perhaps 'Ιωνα is to be regarded as a diminutive of 'Ιωάνης; but the Hebrew יונה, Jonah, is quite distinct from יוחנן, John, and the former would not be a diminutive of the latter; or, perhaps, two different traditions existed about the name of Peter's father.

Various ingenious emendations or explanations have been proposed for bariona—e.g., that it is an Aramaic word meaning "swordsman" (see bibliography). Two harmonizing efforts merit outright rejection; one attributes to Peter's father the double name of Jonah-Johanan; the other makes Jonah the father and Johanna ('Ιωάννα) the mother (Paris Mss. Reg. 1789, 1026).

Bibliography. On bariona, see H. Hirschberg, "Simon Bariona and the Ebionites," JBL, LXI (1942), 171-91, and R. Marcus' rejection on pp. 281 ff.

6. See JOHN THE BAPTIST.

7. See JOHN THE APOSTLE.

8. See MARK, JOHN.

9. A member of a priestly family, mentioned in Acts 4:6 and otherwise unknown. A far-fetched view identifies him with a prominent rabbi, Johanan ben Zakkai. Codex Bezae (D) reads "JONATHAN," often identified as the son of ANNAS, who in A.D. 36 succeeded CAIAPHAS as high priest (Jos. Antiq. XVIII. iv.3; v.3; XIX.vi.4; War II.xii.5-6). Jonathan was assassinated at the behest of FELIX (Antiq. XX.viii.5; War II.xiii.3). While a few commentators have proposed to regard "Jonathan" as correct and to regard John as an error, the majority do not find the reading of D significant. S. SANDMEL

JOHN, ACTS OF. Commonly regarded the earliest of the apocryphal Acts (see ACTS, APOCRYPHAL), this work contains a series of wonder stories, miracles, and discourses of the apostle John in Asia Minor; all are of a strongly Docetic nature.

The work purports to be an eyewitness account of the events and scenes described, and from the fifth century has been ascribed to a shadowy Leucius, who eventually came to be regarded as the author of the whole series of five Acts which the Manichaeans substituted for the canonical Acts (see APOCRYPHA, NT). It is commonly dated in the second half of the second century, in part because of probable reference to it by both Clement of Alexandria and Tertullian, in part because of the nature of its teaching.

In the Stichometry of Nicephorus it is listed as containing 2,500 lines, substantially less than the Acts of Paul (see PAUL, ACTS OF) and slightly less than the canonical Acts. About two thirds of it is still extant, large portions being preserved in Greek, and there is a Latin version of some parts not found in Greek. The beginning is now lost, but a late Greek text tells of John's return from Patmos, his shipwreck, and his swimming to Miletus on a piece of cork. The first long episode recounts many romantic and not uninteresting happenings in Ephesus: the healing of Cleopatra and the raising to life of her husband Lycomedes; the portrait of John, surreptitiously acquired and reverenced; the destruction of the temple of Artemis; the swarm of bedbugs in the deserted inn, halted by the indignant prayer of the weary apostle; the lurid tale of Drusiana and the attempt in the tomb after her death to ravish her corpse. In all the stories a very strong ascetic tone of hostility to marriage and everything sexual is ever present.

The Docetic emphasis is most clearly revealed in the long discourse in which John tells of his early contacts with Jesus, whose appearance and form were always changing—to James he appeared a child, to John a full-grown man. In the account of the Transfiguration a most belabored attempt is made to dwell on this evanescence, strangely interrupted by the detail that Jesus, to teach him to "be not faithless, but believing," had tweaked John's beard so vigorously that John had suffered pain for thirty days. The account proceeds: "Sometimes when I would lay hold on him, I met with a material and solid body, and at other times, again, when I felt him, the substance was immaterial and as if it existed not at all." Then follows the account of how Jesus had led the disciples onto a mountain on the night of his arrest, and of the antiphonal hymn with its many curious paradoxes:

> I would be wounded, and I would wound. Amen.
> I would be born, and I would bear. Amen.
> I would eat, and I would be eaten. Amen.
> I would be thought, being wholly thought. Amen.

Then there is an account of the dance which Jesus had at that occasion taught them. Again and again, the dominant note is struck: "What now I am seen to be, that am I not." At the Crucifixion, John fled to the Mount of Olives in tears. Suddenly Jesus appears to him with the word: "John, unto the multitude below in Jerusalem, I am being crucified and pierced with lances and reeds, and gall and vinegar is being given to me to drink. But unto thee I speak, and what I speak hear thou." This sermon to Drusiana and his other hearers concludes: "Having therefore beheld, brethren, the grace of the Lord and his kindly affection toward us, let us worship him as those unto whom he has shown mercy, not with our fingers, nor our mouths, nor our tongues, nor with any part whatsoever of our body, but with the disposition of our soul" (cf. I John 1:1).

The remaining section in Greek tells of John's peaceful death. A trench is dug at his command; he places his garments in it and lies down upon them, following a lengthy prayer in which, among other things, he thanks God for having kept him "untouched by union with a woman" even until this hour, despite his own earlier inclinations. With the single word: "Peace be with you, brethren," he "gave up his spirit rejoicing." Of course, this was later heightened with additions to the effect that on the next day the grave was found empty, for he had been translated, or was empty save for his sandals. Augustine reports that in his day it was commonly believed that the earth over the grave was seen to move as if stirred by his breathing.

In the Latin version other stories are given—carefully purged of their heretical (Gnostic) notes, but with a very strong condemnation of wealth and of the folly of those who prized it. Notable among these is the story of Craton the philosopher and the two youths, Atticus and Eugenius, who gave up their wealth, only later to repent it, and of its miraculous return to them and the subsequent discovery of their folly and their second relinquishing of it. Tertullian knows a story of John's having been "plunged, unhurt, into boiling oil" (Presc. Her. 36). This story, while well known in the Latin West, is never referred to by any of the Greek fathers. That it was a part of the earliest version of these Acts is most uncertain, although often assumed.

The famous story told by Clement of Alexandria about John and the robber chief does not occur in any version of the Acts and apparently, although this has been questioned, was never a part of this cycle of romances. On the other hand, the story of John and the partridge, told by John Cassian (Collationes Patrium XXIV.12), is paralleled by another, quite different story on the same theme in an eleventh-century Greek MS of the Acts. All this illustrates the uncertain content of the original "Leucian" Acts. That all that now purports to be a part of this ancient work was in its first draft is quite unlikely.

Despite its obvious unorthodox representation of the physical nature of Jesus and the heated criticism it received from many fathers and by the Second Council of Nicea, this writing has exerted a real influence upon both Christian literature and art. It is also of great value to the historian, not only for its firsthand view of certain Gnostic teachings, not burlesqued as at the hands of unsympathetic critics like Irenaeus, but also for the light it throws upon the early practice of a "eucharist for the dead" and upon the sort of prayer felt appropriate for such an occasion. Any attempt to see it in whole or in part as reflecting actual tradition about the historical John —e.g., his perpetual virginity—is utterly unwarranted. John is simply the vehicle chosen for the expression of the writer's views. On the other hand, it is far from impossible that it was just because of the distinctly anti-Docetic polemic in I John that the later writer chose John to be the mouthpiece of the particular views that apostle had traditionally attacked, precisely as the author of the Acts of Paul had chosen Paul as the sponsor for women as preachers, in contradiction of the opposite teaching of the Pastoral letters.

Bibliography. The not uninteresting stories, together with the turgid and often very slow-moving preachments, of this curious book are conveniently available in M. R. James, The Apocryphal NT (1924), pp. 228-70. For further bibliography, see APOCRYPHA, NT. M. S. ENSLIN

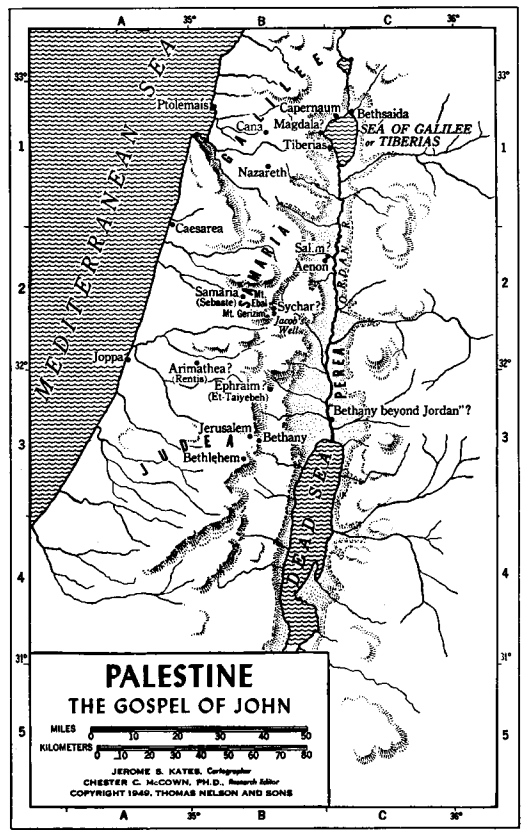
JOHN, ACTS OF, BY PROCHORUS prŏk'ə rəs [Πρόχορος]. A Greek fifth-century romance, originally quite distinct from the "Leucian" Acts of John (see JOHN, ACTS OF); it recounts the wondrous deeds of John during his fifteen years on Patmos. Besides the Greek text of this very popular writing, versions in Latin, Sahidic, Ethiopic, Armenian, Arabic, and Old Slavonic are extant. Many of the Latin MSS contain large sections of the Leucian Acts—the tale of Lycomedes, the temple of Artemis, Drusiana, and the death of John—but never those sections reporting the Lord's life and passion. Prochorus, the alleged author and amanuensis, to whom John is represented (in Byzantine art) as dictating his gospel, is surely a reflection of the Jerusalem deacon (Acts 6:5) whom tradition made one of the Seventy and subsequently bishop of Nicomedia.

See also APOCRYPHA, NT.



Bibliography. The complete text of Prochorus may be found in T. Zahn, Acta Ioannis (1880). M. S. ENSLIN

JOHN, APOCRYPHON OR SECRET BOOK OF. A second-century Gnostic work, long unknown, refuted by Irenaeus (Her. I.29-31). Coptic translations of this work are now available in the fifth-century Codex Berolinensis and also in the great collection of Gnostic texts discovered in Upper Egypt at the ancient site Chenoboskion in 1946. See APOCRYPHA, NT. M. S. ENSLIN

JOHN, GOSPEL OF. Written, according to tradition, by John the son of Zebedee, this gospel stands as the last of the four canonical gospels in the NT, consistently with its traditional date of composition; though some early MSS—notably Codex Bezae (D) and the Washington Codex (W)—put first the two gospels considered of apostolic authorship, Matthew and John, with Luke and Mark in third and fourth place respectively.

John was highly valued in ancient times as the "spiritual gospel," first so called by Clement of Alexandria, and was perhaps the single most influential book of the NT in the fashioning of early Christian dogma.

Since the beginning of the period of modern critical study, however, there has been much controversy about its authorship, place of origin, theological affiliations and background, and historical value. Already in the late second century certain conservative and otherwise orthodox Christians, the so-called "Alogi," denied its apostolic authorship. This was, however, on the grounds of its teaching, which they judged unorthodox, and not because of any authentic alternative tradition. In the modern period too, dogmatic presuppositions have played a considerable part, if not always consciously, in the controversy about this gospel. Conservative scholars have been at pains to uphold its apostolic authorship, and others to deny it, both sides tacitly agreeing that it constituted a bulwark of orthodoxy. It has not always been sufficiently realized by both parties to the controversy that to settle the question of its authorship would not necessarily decide that of its value. Even if it could be proved that it was not the work of an apostle and eyewitness of the events it purports to describe, it would not follow necessarily that its testimony is intrinsically inferior to that of the other gospels, and vice versa.

The real focal point of the controversy about John is therefore not the problem of authorship, but the question why it differs as it does from the other gospels. Only if the latter question is satisfactorily answered can there be any hope of understanding the origin, purpose, and value of John.

Accordingly, this article aims at giving as fairly and fully as possible the data of which any hypothesis about John must take account, rather than at tracing the course of the long and so far inconclusive controversy about it. These data, and the theories based on them, can be most conveniently considered under the following heads, the order of which is designed in general to allow the objective data to be presented before the theories:

A. Contents and structure
   1. Summary of contents
   2. Dislocations of the text
B. Text and canonicity
   1. The MS evidence
   2. Place in the NT canon
C. Relationship to other NT writings
   1. The other gospels
   2. The letters of John
   3. Revelation
D. Teaching
   1. The theology of John

2. Theological affiliations of John with other religious literature
   a. The teaching of Jesus in the other gospels
   b. Paul
   c. Jewish literature
   d. Pagan literature

E. Evidence of use and authorship from early Christian literature
F. Internal evidence of purpose and authorship
G. The origin and purpose of John
H. Historical and religious value
Bibliography

A. CONTENTS AND STRUCTURE. John falls into four main sections of unequal length:

I. Prologue, 1:1-18
II. Testimony that Jesus is the Christ, furnished by John the Baptist and other witnesses, and by his own acts—the "signs"—and words, 1:19–11:57 (omitting, however, 7:53–8:11 [see § B1 below])
III. Passion and Resurrection, chs. 12–20
IV. Postscript, ch. 21

1. Summary of contents. The Prologue (1:1-18) deals with the nature and incarnation of the divine WORD, or Logos, the agent of God in creation and revelation.

The second section (1:19–11:57) may be outlined as follows:

1:19-36, the testimony of John the Baptist that Jesus is the Lamb of God (vss. 29, 36) and Son of God (vs. 34).

1:37-51, the testimony of Andrew that Jesus is the Messiah (vs. 41), and of Nathanael that he is Son of God and King of Israel (vs. 49). Jesus claims to be, as Son of man, a new Jacob (vs. 51).

2:1-11 (the first sign), Jesus changes water into wine. His disciples believe in him.

2:12-25, Jesus cleanses the temple, and gives the first hint of his death and resurrection (vss. 19-22). Many, seeing his signs, believe in him (vs. 23).

3:1-21, Jesus expounds to Nicodemus the new birth by water and the Spirit, and claims, as Son of man, to fulfil the OT type of the serpent which Moses set up as a means of salvation in the wilderness (vs. 14), thus also obliquely hinting at his crucifixion. At vs. 16 Nicodemus disappears from view, and there begins what is probably a meditation by the evangelist, rather than a continuation of Jesus' discourse, on the purpose of Christ's coming, interrupted by 3:22-30, and resumed at 3:31.

3:22-24, Jesus exercises a ministry of baptism in Judea parallel with John's.

3:25-30, final testimony of John the Baptist.

3:31-36, conclusion of the evangelist's meditation on the coming of Christ.

4:1-42, Jesus leaves Judea for Galilee, and goes through Samaria. His conversation with a Samaritan woman (vss. 7-26) culminates in his claiming to be Messiah. The woman bears witness to Christ (vss. 27-30). Jesus predicts to his disciples a harvest of fruit for eternal life (vss. 31-38). Many Samaritans believe because of the woman's testimony, many more because of Jesus' own word; they recognize him as Savior of the world (vss. 39-42).

4:43-45, Jesus is welcomed in Galilee.

4:46-54 (the second sign), Jesus saves from imminent death the son of an official, who believes.

5:1-9 (the third sign), Jesus heals a man who has been ill for thirty-eight years, at the pool Beth-zatha in Jerusalem on the sabbath.

5:10-47, the Jews object to his action, which Jesus defends.

6:1-15 (the fourth sign), Jesus feeds five thousand men with five loaves and two fish. He is acclaimed as the prophet who is to come into the world, and he avoids an attempt to make him king, by withdrawing to the hills.

6:16-21, as the disciples are crossing the sea, they see Jesus "walking on the sea" (vs. 19). It is not clear whether this should be classed as a "sign" or as a nonmiraculous action like the cleansing of the temple. "On the sea," ἐπὶ τῆς θαλάσσης, could be translated "by the sea" (cf. ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, "at the land," in vs. 21). The miracle, if it is meant as such, is not so much emphasized as in Matt. 14:22-33, and it is perhaps better not to regard this as a "sign."

6:22-25, the people look for Jesus, and at last find him.

6:26-59, a discourse of Jesus in which he contrasts the bread he will give with the manna which Moses gave, speaks of himself as the bread of life, and describes his flesh as real food and his blood as real drink.

6:60-71, a discourse which offends many of his disciples. In spite of further explanation that the flesh by itself is of no avail, since it is the spirit which gives life, all except the Twelve leave Jesus. Simon Peter affirms their faith (vss. 68-69), but Jesus hints at a further defection.

Ch. 7; 8:12-59, Jesus at the Feast of Tabernacles (in vss. 1-9 Jesus at first remains in Galilee, but in vss. 10-13 he goes up to the feast in private). In 7:14-36 Jesus preaches in the temple, challenging the Jews' unbelief, against a background of mounting hostility. In 7:37-44, on the last day of the feast, Jesus invites anyone who thirsts to come to him and drink; the evangelist explains this offer as of the Spirit which he was to give (vs. 39). An attempt is made to arrest Jesus. In 7:45-52 the officers are unable to effect his arrest. Nicodemus speaks on his behalf, but to no avail. 8:12-59 is a continuation of Jesus' dispute with the Jews. He proclaims himself the light of the world (vs. 12), gives a further hint of his passion (vs. 28, echoing 3:14, and looking forward to 12:32 ff), and denies that the Jews are true sons of Abraham (vss. 39 ff). When he claims: "Before Abraham was, I am" (vs. 58), there is an abortive attempt to stone him.

9:1-12 (the fifth sign), Jesus heals a man blind from birth.

9:13-41, the man is persecuted by the Jews for his faith in Jesus, who condemns them for thinking they see when in fact they are blind.

10:1-18, parables of the sheepfold, the sheep, and the shepherds. Jesus likens himself to the door by which the sheep enter the fold, and contrasts himself, the good shepherd who lays down his life for the sheep (vs. 11), with the thieves and hirelings.

10:19-21, there is a division of opinion among his hearers.

10:22-42, Jesus at the Feast of the Dedication is challenged to say plainly if he is the Christ. His claims that he and the Father are one (vs. 30), and that he is the Son of God (vs. 36), provoke further attempts against him (vss. 31, 39). He withdraws from Jerusalem, and it is noted that many believed in him (vs. 42).

11:1-44 (the sixth sign), Jesus raises from the dead his friend LAZARUS OF BETHANY.

11:45-53, this action calls forth both faith and opposition. The chief priests and Pharisees determine to put Jesus to death.

11:54-57, Jesus remains in retirement, the Passover is at hand, and the stage is set for the Passion.

The third section (chs.12–20) may be outlined as follows:

12:1-11, Jesus, among his friends at Bethany, is anointed by Mary, sister of Lazarus. The chief priests plan to put Lazarus also to death.

12:12-19, Jesus rides into Jerusalem on an ass, and is hailed as King of Israel.

12:20-36, some Greeks attending the feast wish to see Jesus, and are brought to him. Jesus accepts this as a sign that the time has come for the Son of man to be glorified (vs. 23). This is the time of judgment for the world (vs. 31), when he will be lifted up and will draw all men to himself (vs. 32; cf. 3:14; 8:28).

12:37-43, the evangelist's reflections on the unbelief of the Jews.

12:44-50, Jesus proclaims that he has come as light into the world, and points out the consequences of belief and unbelief.

13:1-30, the Last Supper (in 13:1-11 Jesus washes the disciples' feet, and in 13:12-20 he explains the significance of his action).

13:21-30, he predicts his betrayal, and points out the betrayer to the disciple whom he loved. Judas goes out into the night.

13:31–16:33, the conversation of Jesus with the remaining disciples. The salient features of this conversation are: the new commandment to love one another (13:34; cf. 15:12-17); the prediction of Peter's denial (13:38); the sayings "I am the way, and the truth, and the life" (14:6), "He who has seen me has seen the Father" (14:9), "If you ask anything in my name, I will do it" (14:14; cf. 16:23-24); the promise of "another Counselor, . . . even the Spirit of truth" (14:16-17; cf. 14:26; 15:26; 16:7-15); the parable of the vine and branches (15:1-11). A spirit of calm confidence in victory pervades the whole.

Ch. 17, the prayer of Jesus for the disciples, and for those who are to believe in him through their word, "that they may be one; even as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee" (vs. 21).

18:1-11, Jesus is arrested in Gethsemane. Peter resists, wounds Malchus, and is rebuked by Jesus.

18:12-14, Jesus is bound and taken to Annas.

18:15-18, Peter and another disciple, known to the high priest, follow into the house.

18:19-24, Jesus is questioned by Annas and sent to Caiaphas.

18:25-27, Peter denies that he is a disciple of Jesus.

18:28–19:16, Jesus is brought before Pilate. The Jews refuse Pilate's offer to try Jesus themselves; they want him crucified (18:31-32). Pilate questions Jesus about his kingship, and is told that it is not of this world (18:36). Pilate attempts to release Jesus, but the crowds demand Barabbas (18:40). Pilate has Jesus scourged (19:1), and the soldiers put on him a crown of thorns and a purple robe (19:2), and mock him (19:3). Pilate continues his efforts to save Jesus; but when the Jews say that if he releases him, he is not Caesar's friend (19:12), he hands Jesus over to be crucified (19:16).

19:17-37, the Crucifixion. Jesus is crucified between two others (vs. 18), and Pilate has the title "the King of the Jews" put over him (vs. 19). The guard cast lots for his clothes (23-24). Jesus gives his mother into the keeping of the disciple whom he loved (vss. 25-27). Jesus says: "I thirst," is given vinegar, says: "It is finished," and dies (vss. 28-30). The Jews ask Pilate to remove the bodies. The other two are killed, but Jesus is found to be dead already. One of the soldiers pierces his side with a spear, and blood and water flow out (vss. 31-37).

19:38-42, the burial of Jesus. Joseph of Arimathea asks for Jesus' body, and, helped by Nicodemus, buries him in a new tomb in a garden.

20:1-29, appearances of the risen Jesus. In vss. 1-10 Mary Magdalene finds the stone taken from the tomb. She tells Peter and the other disciple whom Jesus loved. Peter goes into the tomb, and sees the empty gravecloths, and so does the other disciple. In vss. 11-18 Jesus makes himself known to Mary Magdalene and tells her to tell the disciples that he is ascending to his and their Father and God. This she does. In vss. 19-25 Jesus appears to the disciples, gives them the Holy Spirit, and the power to forgive and retain sins. Thomas is not with them and refuses to believe them. In vss. 26-29 Jesus appears to the disciples a week later, and overcomes Thomas' disbelief. Thomas confesses him "my Lord and my God." Jesus blesses those who have not seen and yet have believed.

20:30-31, the purpose of the gospel: "that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing you may have life in his name."

In the Postscript (ch. 21) Jesus appears to some of his disciples by the sea of Tiberias. They have had an unsuccessful night's fishing, but following Jesus' instructions, they catch 153 fish (vss. 1-11). Jesus gives the disciples a meal, and then commissions Peter to feed his sheep and prophesies Peter's death (vss. 12-19). His words about the disciple whom he loved are recorded with the comment that they have been misunderstood in the church (vss. 20-23). In a footnote (vss. 24-25) the author is identified as the disciple whom Jesus loved.

Running through the whole gospel and bringing it into a unity are a number of themes, the most important of which are stated in the Prologue. Thus the gospel is not unlike a sonata in form. Examples of these recurrent themes are:

a) Christ as the Logos. Though "Logos" is not used again as a title in the gospel, references to Christ's or God's "word" are particularly important (e.g., 2:22; 4:41, 50; 5:24, 38; 6:63, 68; 8:31, 47; 12:48; 15:3; 17:17). The words disclose the Word.

b) Christ as the source of life (1:4; cf. 3:15-16; 5:24, 26, 29, 39-40; 6:35, 63, 68; 8:12; 10:10, 28; 11:25; 14:6; 17:2-3; 20:31). The signs, particularly the raising of Lazarus, show the Christ as giver of life.

c) Christ as the source of light (1:4-5 etc.; cf. 3:19-21; 8:12; 9:5; 12:35-36, 46). This is particularly illustrated by the healing of the blind man.

d) Witness to, and faith in, Christ (though John does not use the noun "faith"; cf. [for "witness"] 1:7, 15, 19; 4:39; 5:36; 8:18; 19:35; [for "belief"] 2:11, 22-23; 3:15-16, 18, 36; 4:39, 41, 53; 5:46-47; 6:35, 40, 69; 7:31, 38; 8:24, 30; 9:38; 10:42; 11:25-27, 45; 12:11, 42, 44, 46; 14:1, 11-12; 16:30; 19:35; 20:8, 25, 29, 31).

e) Christ as the source of truth (1:14, 17; cf. 4:23-24; 5:33; 8:32, 40, 44-46; 14:6, 17; 15:26; 16:13; 17:17, 19; 18:37-38 [significantly the last occurrence of the word in John]).

The recurrence of these (and other) themes imparts to John a peculiar richness and closeness of texture to which no summary can do justice.

2. Dislocations of the text. Many critics, impressed both by the occasional abruptness of transitions in John's text and by the difference in the order of events between John and the other gospels (see § C1 below), infer that the text of John has been dislocated, either by accident or by design. By restoring the supposedly original order, they claim to improve the flow of the narrative, avoid abrupt transitions, and make harmonization with the other gospels easier. Some or all of the following changes have been recommended by various critics:

a) Remove 3:22-30 and place it after either 2:12 or 3:36, thus avoiding the interruption of the passage 3:16-21, 31-36, which reads as a continuous whole.

b) Transpose chs. 5 and 6, since 6:1 follows more naturally on 4:54 than on 5:47.

c) Rearrange chs. 7 and 8 thus: 7:15-24; 8:12-20; 7:1-14; 7:25-52; 8:21-59.

d) Put 10:1-18 after 10:29, thus avoiding the abrupt opening of ch. 10.

e) Put 12:36-43 (from "When Jesus had said this") after 12:50, thus bringing together the speech of Jesus at present divided by the evangelist's reflections.

f) Put 13:31-14:31 (from "Now is the Son of man glorified") after ch. 16, so that "Rise, let us go hence," does not break into Jesus' discourse.

The preferred opinion today is that, if dislocation has occurred, it was not accidental. The order of the gospel as it stands is plainly intentional, but it may not correspond to the intention of the original author. The gospel as it stands may reflect the activity of more than one mind. See § G below.

B. TEXT AND CANONICITY. 1. The MS evidence. John is not only found in all the most important uncial codices of the NT—Sinaiticus (ℵ), Vaticanus (B), Ephraemi (C), Bezae (D), Alexandrinus (A), and the Washington (W) and Koridethi (Θ) codices—and in all the early versions, but is also particularly well represented among the earliest papyrus fragments that have come to light. Of the sixty-eight fragments listed to date, fifteen are of John, and these include the earliest of all NT MS fragments—the Rylands Papyrus 457 (Papyrus 52), a few lines from John 18 dating from the first half of the second century—as well as the Chester Beatty Papyrus (Papyrus 45), which includes parts of John 10 and 11 and of the other gospels, and the Bodmer Papyrus II (Papyrus 66), which contains nearly all of John 1-14. These latter papyri are of approximately the same date, probably very early in the third century. This is striking evidence of the early popularity of John, at least in Egypt.

The text is not only well represented, but on the whole also very well preserved. The following variants are worthy of notice:

1:3-4. The punctuation, "without him was not anything made. That which has been made was life in him" (RSV mg.), is to be preferred. Not only is it found in the earliest extant quotation of John (by Tatian ca. 170), as well as in nearly all pre-Nicene quotations, but the alternative is probably a deliberate alteration, to exclude the interpretation which would count the Holy Spirit among the things made.

1:18. "Only Son" has the inferior MS attestation to the alternative "God only-begotten," found in ℵBCWΘ and other authorities. There is some slight evidence in favor of "the only-begotten," a reading which would account for both the other alternatives.

4:9. "For Jews have no dealings with Samaritans" is omitted by ℵD and some Latin MSS.

7:39. "For as yet the Spirit had not been given" is the reading of the Latin and Syriac versions. Several Greek MSS, headed by ℵ, read: "For as yet the Spirit was not"; W and the majority add "Holy," while B has: "For as yet the Holy Spirit had not been given." The reading of ℵ is to be preferred, the others being expansions of it.

7:53–8:11. This whole passage, though found in D and most later Greek MSS, is omitted by papyrus 66, ℵBWΘ, and by most of the early versions and fathers. One group of Greek MSS puts it at the end of John, another after Luke 21:38. It is clearly no part of John, but was perhaps put in here to illustrate John 8:16.

8:57. ℵ has the curious variant: "Has Abraham seen you?"

13:10. "Except for his feet," is omitted by ℵ and some Latin MSS—probably correctly, in spite of the relatively weak attestation.

2. Place in the NT canon. It is not known when the four gospels as we now have them were collected into one and accepted as alone authoritative, but it was probably sometime between Marcion's choice of a revised edition of Luke as the sole authoritative gospel (ca. 140) and the publication by Tatian ca. 170 of his Diatessaron, a continuous narrative made out of our four gospels. The choice of the four may well have been meant as a counterblast to Marcion, and Tatian's use of them testifies to the esteem in which they were then held. John was one of them, and since the time of Tatian its place in the canon has been challenged only by a group of ultraconservative but otherwise orthodox Roman Christians who apparently thought it countenanced certain heretical views. But by the end of the second century the place of John as part of the NT canon was assured. See CANON OF THE NT.

C. RELATIONSHIP TO OTHER NT WRITINGS. 1. The other gospels. The differences between John and the other three gospels are sufficiently obvious, in subject matter, arrangement of material, and style.

John contains many incidents to which the others have no parallel—e.g., the "beginning of signs" at Cana, baptism by Jesus and his disciples, Jesus' conversations with Nicodemus and the Samaritan woman, his frequent visits to Jerusalem and his preaching and miracles there, and, not least, the raising of Lazarus. The author's point of view is Judean rather than Galilean: Judea is Jesus' "own country" in John (cf. 4:43-45, contrasted with Mark 6:4 [cf. Matt. 13:57; Luke 4:24]).

John puts what are apparently the same events at different places in his narrative—e.g., the cleansing of the temple and the anointing at Bethany.

He also has alternative versions of what look like the same events—e.g., the first encounters of Jesus with John the Baptist and with Simon Peter (John 1:29 ff [cf. Mark 1:9-11]; John 1:42 [cf. Mark 1:16-17]); the Last Supper; the arrest, trials, and crucifixion of Jesus; the Resurrection; the draught of fishes (John 21:4-8; cf. Luke 5:1-11).

He also does not mention events to which some or all of the other evangelists appear to attach considerable importance. He omits the birth and baptism of Jesus, his temptations, his exorcisms, his transfiguration, and his blessing and distribution of bread and wine at the Last Supper.

There are also differences in the form and content of Jesus' teaching in John. In the other gospels it is given mainly in parables and epigrams, in forms which often resemble those of Hebrew prophecy. In John it is given mainly in long meditative discourses and dialogues more like those of the Corpus Hermeticum (see § D2*d below*) than of the other gospels. In John much of Jesus' teaching is about himself and his relationship to the Father—sayings beginning "I am" are characteristic of John but absent from the others. The "theme words" of John (see § A1 above) are more characteristic of Hellenistic mysticism and of the Dead Sea Scrolls than of the teaching of Jesus in the other gospels.

These differences would be even more remarkable if we could be sure that the author of John knew one or more of the other gospels. On this subject scholars are divided. It is generally agreed that points of contact between John and Matthew are too slight to suggest that John knew Matthew, but the case is different with Mark and Luke.

a. John and Mark. If, as is probable, the author of Matthew in Syria and Luke in Macedonia or Achaia both knew of Mark toward the end of the first century, it appears more likely than not that John in Ephesus also knew of it at much the same period—i.e., if we may provisionally accept the traditional date and place for the composition of John. Moreover, to prove a negative is notoriously difficult. So it may well seem antecedently more probable that John knew Mark. It does not follow, however, that if John knew Mark, he must necessarily have used Mark as a source.

The following are the main passages which must be taken into consideration:

1:1. "In the beginning" may be read as a tacit correction of Mark 1:1: "The beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ," suggesting that the gospel's beginning is the Creation. But the allusion to Gen. 1:1 is obvious, and may well be thought a sufficient reason for the form of words in John.

1:19-34. Though most of the material in this passage is unlike anything in Mark, there are close parallels between John 1:23 and Mark 1:3; John 1:26 and Mark 1:8; John 1:27 and Mark 1:7; John 1:32 and Mark 1:11. It may be that John took these from Mark, but he might well have got them from a common tradition.

2:13-22. The cleansing of the temple, both here and in Mark 11:15-17, occurs at Passover, but at different periods in the ministry of Jesus. The allusion to the Passion in John 2:19 recalls the accusations made against Jesus at his trial in Mark 14:58 and when he was on the cross (Mark 15:29-30), and tells in favor of Mark's date for the cleansing against John's (if we are to assume that Jesus cleansed the temple only once). It is conceivable that John has taken the incident from Mark, but it may also be felt, in view of the differences in detail between the stories, that John was using an independent tradition.

3:24. "John had not yet been put in prison" may be meant as a cross reference to Mark 1:14: "After John was arrested, Jesus came into Galilee," but can equally well be taken as an independent note of time.

4:44. "Jesus himself testified that a prophet has no honor in his own country" recalls Mark 6:4: "A prophet is not without honor, except in his own country," but the difference in setting may argue for independence.

5:1-18. The healing of a paralyzed man here recalls a similar incident in Mark 2:1-12. In spite of some obvious differences (in John it takes place in Jerusalem, in Mark in Capernaum, etc.), the essentials of the two stories are the same. In both John 5:8; Mark 2:9 occur the words: "Rise, take up your pallet, and walk"; and John 5:14: "Sin no more," recalls the forgiveness of the man's sins in Mark 2:5. Unless these parallels are fortuitous, there is a case for supposing that John has added to his tradition material taken from Mark.

6:1-21. Both here and in Mark 6:34-52, Jesus feeds five thousand men, then sends his disciples across the lake, and appears to them walking on the sea. Here, if anywhere, there is a case for John's dependence upon Mark. Both mention two hundred denarii as the probable cost of bread (John 6:7; Mark 6:37), five loaves and two fish (John 6:9; Mark 6:38), the men sitting on grass (John 6:10; Mark 6:39), Jesus' blessing the bread (John 6:11; Mark 6:41), the twelve baskets of fragments (John 6:13; Mark 6:43), and the five thousand men (John 6:10; Mark 6:44), often in the same words: in the second incident the words of Jesus to the disciples are in part identical in the Greek, though the RSV translates John 6:20: "It is I; do not be afraid," and Mark 6:50: "It is I; have no fear." But if John is borrowing from Mark, where did he get his independent features—e.g., the parts played by Philip and Andrew, the boy who provided the food, and, above all, the attempt to make Jesus king (John 6:15)? Unless these come from John's own imagination, he must have had an independent source for them, and if for them, why not for the rest?

6:42. The description of Jesus as "son of Joseph" may be taken as a correction of his description in Mark 6:3 as "son of Mary," similar to, and for the same reason as, those in Matt. 13:55: "Is not this the carpenter's son?" and Luke 4:22: "Is not this Joseph's son?"—i.e., to avoid the implication of illegitimacy involved in calling a man the son of his mother, as if his father were unknown.

6:66-71. In Mark 8:29, Peter's confession that Jesus is the Christ closely follows Mark's account of the second feeding of the multitude (Mark 8:1-10). Similarly here Peter makes a confession of faith in Christ (John 6:68-69). That John had the passage from Mark in mind may be suggested by the fact that in 6:70-71 Judas is identified as "a devil." Is this a tacit correction of Mark 8:33, where it is Peter who is called Satan?

12:1-8. The anointing of Jesus at Bethany shortly before the Passover recalls Mark 14:3-9, the anointing of Jesus at Bethany two days before the Passover. Points of similarity are: the rare Greek word translated "pure nard" (John 12:3; Mark 14:3); the objection to the waste of the ointment, worth "more than three hundred denarii" (Mark 14:5), or "three hundred denarii" (John 12:5); and Jesus' saying about the disciples' always having the poor with them (Mark 14:7; John 12:8). But again John has details not derived from Mark, and this fact weakens the case for his dependence.

12:12-19. The description of Jesus' entry into Jerusalem is, in detail, so different from that in Mark 11:1-10 that it can hardly be dependent upon it.

12:27. Jesus' refusal to pray to be saved from "this hour" may be meant as a correction of Mark 14:35, where he in fact does so pray. This may appear more plausible if it is also supposed that John 18:11: "Shall I not drink the cup which the Father has given me?" is a similar correction of Mark 14:36: "Remove this cup from me."

13–21. From the Last Supper to the end of the gospel John is so clearly following an independent tradition, though covering the same ground as Mark, that it is unnecessary to consider their resemblances and differences in detail any further.

The examination of John 1–12 suggests that Mark can hardly have been a source of John, though John may occasionally have expected his readers to compare his own account with Mark's. If it appears plausible to distinguish between an author and an editor of John, the occasional cross references to Mark will most plausibly be attributed to the editor. If John and Mark are substantially independent, this adds considerably to the force of their testimony where their traditions overlap (e.g., in the feeding of the multitude).

b. John and Luke. Such points of contact as there are between John and Luke all occur in material peculiar to Luke—i.e., in parts of his gospel which he did not get from Mark or from the hypothetical source which he shared with Matthew. This suggests that Luke's tradition was in part dependent on that used by John rather than that John utilized Luke. The chief points of contact are: the use of "the Lord" instead of "Jesus" in the body of the narrative (Luke 7:13; 10:1; 11:39; 12:42; 13:15; 18:6; 19:8; 22:61; John 4:1; 6:23; 11:2; 20:20), which by itself only shows that both share a common environment, that of the Gentile church; the absence of exorcisms; the disciple Judas (not Iscariot; Luke 6:16; John 14:22); Martha and her sister Mary (Luke 10:38-42; John 11:1 ff; 12:1-3); LAZARUS (Luke 16:19-31; John 11:1 ff); the location of Jesus' resurrection appearances in Jerusalem (Luke 24:36-43; John 20:19-29); the draught of fishes (Luke 5:1-11; John 21:1-14). It is not easy to estimate the precise significance of all this. It is hardly enough to prove that John knew Luke, unless one is to suppose that John's only sources were the other gospels and his own imagination. It is, e.g., hard to see why he put Martha and Mary down as sisters of Lazarus, unless he had information on this point.

c. Conclusion. The independence of John is sufficiently obvious. We should not, however, make the mistake of ascribing the difference between John and the other gospels to the fact that the others are historical and John is theological. The fact that all are gospels goes far to outweigh the differences. All are theological in the sense that they presuppose their authors' faith that Jesus is the Christ, and are written to foster this faith in others. And John is concerned to stress that the events which he narrates really happened, and is, so far, historical, at least in intention. See § H below.

Furthermore, the fact that John gained acceptance as canonical, though so obviously unlike the other gospels, is a fact to be taken into consideration when estimating the value of the tradition of its authorship. See § E below.

2. The letters of John. The similarity of thought and language between the gospel and the letters of John (see JOHN, LETTERS OF) is at first sight so close that the traditional ascription of them to the same author is often taken as self-evident, even by scholars who do not also accept their traditional ascription to John the son of Zebedee. Nevertheless, there are some slight differences which some scholars have thought to raise a doubt about their identity of authorship.

Thus, e.g., the thought of the letters, particularly their eschatology, is more conventional than that of the gospel. The chief concern of the letters, theologically, is to stress the reality of Christ's flesh; while this interest is not, of course, absent from the gospel, it is by no means so prominent in it. On the other hand, the concern of the gospel for the apostasy of Israel finds no echo in the letters.

There are also differences in matter of detail: e.g., in I John 2:18 the time of writing is for the author the "last hour," while for the gospel the eschatologically decisive "hour" is that of the Crucifixion (cf. John 12:23, etc.); the "last day," on the other hand, is mentioned six times in John (6:39, etc.), but never in the letters; eschatological technical terms found in the letters and not in the gospel are "the coming," παρουσία (I John 2:28), and "antichrist" (five times; I John 2:18, etc.); the term "Paraclete," παράκλητος, is used of the Holy Spirit in John 14:16, 26; 15:26; 16:7 (translated "Counselor" in the RSV), but of Christ in I John 2:1 (where the RSV translates it "advocate"); "the word" has not the particular personal sense in I John 1:1 that it has in John 1:1 (and also in the interpolation in I John 5:7 KJV); the same idea, "the lust of the flesh," is expressed by θέλημα σαρκός (John 1:13) and ἐπιθυμία σαρκός (I John 2:16); words important in the gospel, like "Lord," "glory," "scripture," "save," are not in the letters, while "faith," absent from the gospel (carefully avoided by it, we may say), is found in I John 5:4; and the common conjunction οὖν, "therefore," found some two hundred times in John, occurs only once in the letters—III John 8.

What weight should be attached to these facts, in view of the close similarity that otherwise exists between the gospel and the letters, is hard to estimate. The evidence of Revelation has also to be considered. It will be suggested (see § G below) that the facts may perhaps best be accounted for on the hypothesis that the author of the letters edited the gospel (but see also JOHN, LETTERS OF).

3. Revelation. Tradition eventually ascribed Revelation as well as the letters of John to the author of the gospel, but few scholars today would maintain this view, for in spite of some resemblances between John and Revelation, the differences between them are much greater than between the gospel and the letters. John and Revelation are the only books of the NT to use Logos and Lamb as titles of Christ, but the Logos of Rev. 19:13 is more akin to the warrior of Wisd. Sol. 18:15 ff than to the Logos of John 1:1 ff, while the word used for "lamb" in John 1:29, 36, is ἀμνός, and in Rev. 5:6, etc. (twenty-nine examples in all), ἀρνίον. Their theology also is different, at least in emphasis. The eschatology of Revelation is predominantly futurist, unlike that of the gospel, and its conception of the Holy Spirit is impersonal, while that of the gospel is clearly personal. There are, however, some resemblances in theology, for both appear to see a symbolical significance in numbers, and (more important) both in their different ways emphasize the true humanity of Christ—Revelation uses the human name Jesus even in the most exalted contexts. They also resemble one another in the simplicity of their syntax, though in the Greek this resemblance is made much less obvious by the bizarre grammatical and syntactical usages of Revelation. The language of Revelation is not simply bad Greek, but a deliberately constructed language, defying the ordinary rules, yet fully self-consistent and most effective in conveying an unearthly atmosphere. So one cannot really argue from differences of language; the other differences, however, are generally felt to rule out the possibility that John and Revelation are by the same author. Nevertheless, there is some interrelation among the gospel, the letters, and the Revelation of John—theologically the letters are midway between the gospel and Revelation—and it is not beyond the bounds of possibility that Revelation is the work of the author of the letters (the editor, perhaps, of the gospel), or is a pseudepigraph meant to be taken as his and perhaps incorporating some of his work. See REVELATION, BOOK OF.

D. TEACHING. 1. The theology of John. The theological ideas which underlie and pervade the gospel impart to it a distinctive quality and flavor, and even influence the form of the narrative, which is dictated rather by the necessity of an orderly development of doctrine than by the observance of a strictly chronological sequence of events.

John's thought, like that of the NT as a whole, is eschatological, but whereas elsewhere in the NT the predominant eschatological contrast is that between the present age and the age to come—a temporal contrast—in John it is between two orders of existence, the temporal and the eternal. This fact may be illustrated by John's interpretation of the concepts of life, judgment, and glory. In John life, or eternal life, ζωὴ αἰώνιος, is often spoken of as a present possession of the believer (cf. 3:36; 5:24; 6:47, 54; 17:3), while elsewhere it is not so much "eternal" life as the life "of the [coming] age" (cf. Matt. 19:16, 29 [and parallels, Mark 10:17, 30; Luke 18:18, 30]; 25:46; Luke 10:25; Rom. 2:7; 6:22; Gal. 6:8). There is perhaps no ultimate difference here, but there are certainly two different points of view. Similarly, while judgment is elsewhere thought of as future, as in Matt. 10:15; 11:22 (=Luke 10:14), 24; 12:36; Heb. 9:27; 10:27; and (significantly) I John 4:17, in John, apart from the isolated instance of John 5:29, which speaks of those who have done evil coming to the resurrection of judgment, the peculiar and characteristic conception is that judgment is in the present (cf. 3:19: "This is the judgment, that the light has come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light"; 5:24; 12:31; 16:11). In the same way the glory of Christ is elsewhere thought of as subsequent to his humiliation and suffering, as in Matt. 24:30 (=Mark 13:26; Luke 21:27); 25:31; Phil. 2:5-11; Heb. 2:9; and particularly clearly in I Pet. 1:11, but in John the Crucifixion is consistently regarded as the glorification of Christ (7:39; 12:23; 17:1), and as his "lifting up" (3:14; 8:28; 12:32), which, as I Tim. 3:16 suggests, implies glorification.

Consistently with his peculiar eschatology, John's theology tends to deal in contrasts—light and darkness, life and death, spirit and flesh, God and the world. But though it sounds dualistic, it has nothing more than its language in common with the ontological dualism characteristic of Gnosticism. Light and darkness are not two equal and opposed powers with the same metaphysical status. The world, though under the usurped power of a ruler who is opposed to God (cf. 12:31; 16:11), and so unable to recognize and obey the Christ (1:10) or God (17:25), and hating Christ and his disciples (15:18-19; 17:14, 16), is yet the creation of God (1:10), the object of his love (3:16), and destined to be saved (3:17; 12:47), and to come to belief and knowledge (17:21, 23). It is not simply a matter of certain elect souls' being saved from the world; Christ is the Savior of the world (4:42). It is true that there are occasional passages like 17:9: "I am praying for them; I am not praying for the world," which are susceptible of a dualist interpretation, but these should not count against the general tenor of John's thought, for his cardinal principle of incarnation is quite incompatible with ontological dualism.

For John, God is unknowable and unknown unless and until he reveals himself through his Logos or Son (1:18; 5:37; 6:46; 7:28-29; 8:19, 54-55; 14:6-7; 15:21; 16:3; 17:25). But this revelation, when made, is the fullest possible, so that to see the Son is to see the Father (14:9). God is then known as Father, primarily as the Father of Jesus Christ, but also of those who are Christ's, in virtue of their union with Christ (17:21; cf. 1:12-13). "God is spirit" (4:24), and we may infer from 3:8 (where "wind" is the same word as "spirit") that it is because he is spirit that the Father is unknowable. The reason for God's revelation of himself through his Son is his love for the world, of which, again through his Son, he is the creator (3:16 ff).

The agent of God in all his dealings with the world, both in creation and in salvation, is his Logos.

John introduces the term quite without explanation at the beginning of his gospel, as if he fully expected his readers to understand its meaning, but he does not use it after 1:14: "The Word became flesh," in which verse he speaks for the first time of Son and Father, the terms which he uses henceforward. The Logos is himself God (1:1, where there is a sublety in the Greek which no English translation can reproduce—"the Word was with God," where the article is used, πρὸς τὸν θεόν, making "God" a substantive, while in "the Word was God" "God" has no article, θεὸς ἦν ὁ Λόγος, and is thus adjectival). The climax of the gospel is Thomas' confession of the risen Christ as Lord and God (20:28). Being himself divine, the Son can reveal the Father. He is in perfect union with the Father—this thought is most emphatically expressed in 10:30: "I and the Father are one"; he is the object of the Father's love (3:35, etc.), and invested with his authority to execute judgment (5: 27) and to grant eternal life (17:2). The Son, for his part, imitates his Father, and does nothing by himself (5:19; 8:28-29), but simply carries out his Father's will in perfect filial obedience (4:34; 5:30; 6:38). It is noteworthy that this gospel, which is most emphatic in maintaining the full divinity of Christ, also lays such stress on his obedience—and, indeed, subjection—to the Father's will.

If the Son is to reveal the Father, he must share, not only his divine nature (only as God can he reveal God to man), but also our human nature (only as man can he reveal God to man). Hence John's affirmation that "the Word became flesh" (1:14). John offers no explanation of this paradox, such as the church fathers hammered out in the ensuing centuries of christological controversy, for he does not share their metaphysical interests. His affirmation is as much religious as theological. He is concerned to maintain the reality of Jesus' humanity, and introduces his human name at the first opportunity (1:17), as if to point this out. He can make this affirmation because the experience of Christians was that if they would know what God is like, all they had to do was to study Jesus. This intuition is independent of, and prior to, christological speculation. Hence "we have beheld his glory, glory as of the only Son from the Father" (John 1:14).

The incarnate Christ is given the title SON OF GOD far more freely in John than in the other gospels. In Mark, e.g., apart from the evangelist's own words in 1:1 and the centurion's confession at 15:39, this title is used only by supernatural speakers, divine or diabolical. In John, however, the Baptist uses it at 1:34 and Nathanael at 1:49. Similarly "Messiah" is used by Andrew at 1:41. It is noteworthy that the untranslated Μεσσίας is used by John alone of the evangelists (here and at 4:25). John also has the title "Lamb of God" in the Baptist's testimony to Jesus at 1:29, 36. "The Lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world" is a complex concept, weaving together various allusions to OT types—the Passover lamb (cf. the fulfilment of the scripture referring originally to the Passover lamb in the fact that no bone of Jesus' body was broken on the cross [19:36]); the scapegoat (the Passover lamb did not "take away sin," but the scapegoat did); the lamb led to the slaughter, of Isa. 53:7 (ἀμνός in the LXX of Isaiah, as in John, whereas in Exod. 12:3 LXX the word is πρόβατον); the lamb which God provided as a substitute for Isaac, in Gen. 22:8 (hence the lamb of God); and finally, perhaps, if the Baptist may be supposed to have spoken in Aramaic, an allusion to the two senses of the Aramaic טליא, "lamb" and "servant."

John also uses the title SON OF MAN, found in the other gospels. It is as if, having emphasized Jesus' divinity by the title "Son of God," he would redress the balance by using one that emphasizes his humanity. But he tends to use it in a way which suggests that its implication for him is that of the "heavenly man" familiar in the Christology of Paul. In 1:51 it occurs in a context in which Jesus claims to fulfil the type of Jacob; in 3:13-14 he is clearly the man from heaven; in 5:27 he has authority to execute judgment, as Son of man (cf. Matt. 25:31 ff); in 6:27, 53, the Son of man gives food and drink that convey eternal life—his flesh and blood; in 13:31 Jesus speaks of the Son of man being glorified (in his crucifixion).

John also stresses that Jesus is King, much more explicitly than do the other evangelists, though he does not give Jesus the title "Son of David" (cf. Nathanael's confession [1:49]; the words of the crowd at his entry into Jerusalem [12:13; contrast Matt. 21:9; Mark 11:9-10; but cf. Luke 19:38]; and Jesus' conversation with Pilate [John 18:33 ff], in which he does not disclaim the title, but explains the nature of his kingship).

According to John, the purpose of Jesus' ministry is to reveal the Father by his words and actions. The actions which he narrates are "signs" revealing Jesus as the agent of the Father. The meaning of the signs is made explicit in the discourses which accompany them (see §G below). An important feature of Jesus' ministry is his bringing of the Spirit. He himself, in virtue, presumably, of his divinity, is endowed with the Spirit (cf. 1:33; 3:34) and finally bestows it upon his disciples (20:22), in order to fulfil the promise he had made to them that they would have the Spirit after his departure (14:16-17, 26; 15:26; 16:7 ff). Jesus had united "flesh" and "Spirit" in himself, and so had brought within man's reach the possibility of union with, and knowledge of, God, which is the supreme object of man's existence.

Because he had already united flesh and Spirit in himself, Jesus was able to devise a means whereby Spirit could be communicated to men and enable them to share the divine life. He indicated what this means was to be when he gave the bread to the multitude which he fed. This bread was a symbol of his flesh, which was to be given for the life of the world (6:51). By eating the bread, men would participate in the spirit-bearing flesh of the incarnate Son, himself the living bread, the real manna (6:32-33). But to guard against any magical conception of the sacrament (if we may use a term which John does not), he emphasizes elsewhere that the flesh, apart from the spirit, is valueless; it is the spirit which is the life-giving principle (6:63).

John thus attaches to the feeding of the multitude the significance of Jesus' action in giving bread to the faithful which the other evangelists associate with the Last Supper. That the latter is the proper context is suggested by the fact that John also makes Jesus speak of drinking his blood, as well as eating his flesh (6:

53-56), though we are not told that Jesus gave anything to drink at the feeding of the multitude.

John again offers no explanation of the way in which the bread of the Eucharist is, represents, or symbolizes the flesh of Christ. He accepts and adapts the words which the faithful believed to be those of Christ, sharing their conviction that the Eucharist is a means of imparting the life-giving Spirit to believers.

He likewise interprets the water of baptism as a vehicle of the Spirit (cf. 3:5 ff). The mention of Jesus' baptizing at the outset of his ministry (3:22)—after he has told Nicodemus that he must be "born of water and spirit" (3:5, where "spirit" has no article in the Greek—the RSV "the Spirit" may be misleading), and of the washing of the disciples' feet at the Last Supper (13:5 ff), is meant presumably to indicate water as the future vehicle of Spirit, as is also the bread given at the feeding of the multitude. During Jesus' actual ministry they could not convey the Spirit, as is clear from 7:39: "As yet the Spirit had not been given, because Jesus was not yet glorified." Only after his death does he breathe on his disciples, as a sign that the Spirit can now be received (20:22). It may also be noted that the emphatic way in which John draws attention to the blood and water which flowed from Jesus' side after his death (19:34) suggests that John sees in them a sacramental significance.

John also stresses the necessity of faith if men are to receive the Spirit. Already in 1:12-13 he makes it clear that the new birth as children of God depends on faith, and repeats the thought (3:15-16, 36; 5:24; 6:35, 40, 47; 7:38-39; etc.). He avoids using the noun πίστις, "faith," perhaps because it had lost in some circles what John judged to be its full and proper meaning; instead he uses the verb πιστεύω, "believe."

The result of Jesus' ministry was to call into being a body of believers, whose destiny it was to be united through the Son to the Father (17:21 ff). They are likened to a flock of which Jesus is the shepherd (10: 11 ff), and to the branches of a vine, the vine being Jesus (15:1 ff). Both "flock" and "vine" are symbols of Israel in the OT (cf. Ps. 80, which uses both [vss. 1, 8 ff]; Isa. 40:11; 5:1-7; etc.). They are to come both from Israel and from the Gentiles, being the "children of God who are scattered abroad" (John 11:52; cf. 10:16). They are those who are to come to the light (3:21), and worship the Father in spirit and truth (4:23); who, though in the world, are not on the world's side ("of the world"; 17:14; etc.), since they belong to God (17:6 ff). The bond which unites them to one another and to Christ and the Father is love—the Father's love for the Son and for those who belong to him, and their love responding to it (14:21; 15:10; 17:23, 26). Love is, indeed, the motive behind the whole ministry of Christ (3:16 ff), and, supremely, this love is shown by his death (15:13). Both as the supreme evidence of love for man, and as the means whereby the Spirit is to be made available for men, Christ's death is the efficient cause of man's salvation. By his lifting up on the cross, which for John is Christ's glorification, he draws all men to himself (cf. 3:14-15; 8:28; 12:23-25, 32). His death is his victory over the world (16:33), of which his resurrection is the evidence. It is the conclusive sign of his divine commission and nature.

Those who respond in love and faith to the love of Christ shown in his death will, as the fruit of his death and resurrection, enjoy the gift of the Spirit—not as an impersonal power, which is what one might infer from the references to spirit early in the gospel (e.g., 3:5; 7:39), but as a personal presence. John tells us nothing about the precise relationship of the Spirit to the Son, or about his metaphysical status, except that he "proceeds from the Father" (15:26), which the later church took as justifying the equal metaphysical status of the Spirit with the Son. But here again John's interest is not speculative, but religious. He is concerned to establish that the withdrawal of Christ's visible presence does not leave the faithful destitute of his help, for they have the Spirit, who is, as it were, Christ's second self. This comes out clearly in 14:16-18, where Jesus says first that the Spirit will be with and in his disciples, and then continues: "I will not leave you desolate; I will come to you" (vs. 18)—i.e., the presence of the Spirit is that of Christ.

This indwelling Spirit is called παράκλητος (RSV "Counselor," KJV "Comforter"; 14:16, 26; 15:26; 16:7). This word is used elsewhere in the NT only in I John 2:1, where it is a title or description of Christ himself, and is translated "advocate" by both the KJV and the RSV. This is etymologically closest to its root meaning, "one called to the side of another," advocatus. "Advocate" is a possible translation in the gospel passages; the Spirit is a kind of counsel for the defense of the disciples, as also in Mark 13:11, and in John 16:8-11 he also appears as counsel for the prosecution of the world. But his functions are wider than the purely forensic term allows, so that "Counselor" is preferable. "Comforter," now archaic, is misleading; it meant "Strengthener." The Counselor, then, "the Spirit of truth" (14:17; 16:13), will teach the disciples and remind them of Christ's words (14:26; 16:13-15), bearing a testimony to Christ concurrent with that of his disciples (15:26-27). The Spirit is, in fact, to inspire Christian prophecy, and it may well be that the evangelist himself was a prophet, and would have claimed for his work the inspiration of the Spirit. See § G below. See also PARACLETE.

One further feature of John's thought calls for comment—his ideas on predestination. Here again his interest is practical rather than speculative, and he does not have a rigidly consistent theory. While on the one hand he stresses the importance of belief, on the other he makes salvation depend wholly on the divine initiative: "You did not choose me, but I chose you" (15:16). The faithful are already God's, even (it seems) before they are conscious of the fact: "Thine they were, and thou gavest them to me" (17: 6). Conversely, Judas appears doomed from the start (cf. 6:70-71; 12:4; 13:21-30).

2. Theological affiliations of John with other religious literature. The question of the origin of John's distinctive teaching receives a bewildering variety of answers. To the traditionalist all the teaching which John puts into the mouth of Jesus is to be accepted as his and to be harmonized as nearly as possible with the evidence of the other gospels. To many, however, this appears a task impossible of achievement, and it is widely recognized that the teaching attributed by John to Jesus contains elements which do not, in fact, come from him. But, when this has been recognized, the questions still remain, how much of John's teaching goes back to Jesus, and what are the sources of that which does not come from him? Some would limit the part played by Jesus virtually to giving the initial impulse, the teaching material in John being provided almost entirely from elsewhere. Others would see a considerable substratum of Jesus' own teaching embodied in the discourses and dialogues in John. If, as appears likely, John was himself a prophet, and if much of his material is, in fact, Christian prophecy, he would no doubt reject as mere pedantry the modern critic's distinction between the words spoken by Jesus in the days of his flesh and those spoken by his Spirit through his prophets. But the distinction is to us a valid one, and poses a question which we must try to answer.

The other question, of John's other sources, has also received a variety of answers. Paul; the Jewish philosopher Philo of Alexandria, an approximate contemporary of Paul; the Corpus Hermeticum, portions of which may be as early as the middle of the first century A.D.; the early Gnostics, particularly the Mandeans, who originated in Transjordan possibly in the first century A.D.; and, most recently, the sect which produced the DEAD SEA SCROLLS have all in their turn been regarded by competent scholars as having had a contributory, or even principal, influence in molding the thought of John.

It can hardly be disputed that the period from the conquests of Alexander to the early Christian centuries was one of great importance in the history of religion. Greek philosophy and religion were brought into contact with the ancient cults of the East, with momentous effects on both sides. In the ensuing ferment of ideas Judaism was involved as much as the religions of Asia Minor, Egypt, and Mesopotamia. It had, moreover, already undergone the influence of Iranian religion. Out of the cross-fertilization of Greek and oriental religions arose a great variety of syncretistic cults and theologies. It was in this environment that Christianity arose, and it would be idle to deny that it shared certain common features with contemporary religious movements. But it does not follow that it was wholly a product of the same forces which produced, e.g., the Hermetic and Mandean literature. Yet if it was to secure a hearing in the Hellenistic world, it had to put its message into language which its contemporaries could understand, and it may well be that John only did this more thoroughly than other Christian writers. Certainly his fundamental proposition, that the Word became flesh, is something unparalleled in any literature that can conceivably have influenced him, and this should put us on our guard against reducing his thought entirely to the product of contemporary influences in Judaism or outside it.

After these preliminary observations, it may be convenient to consider the possible sources of John's theology in the following order:

a. The teaching of Jesus in the other gospels. To determine what is original in the TEACHING OF JESUS in the other gospels is a problem in itself, but one which need not be considered here. For the present purpose the other gospels can be taken as they stand, as affording evidence of what may be presumed to have been in the tradition accessible to John.

It is clear that John stands within the Christian tradition. He presupposes the church, the leadership within it of the Twelve, the sacraments of baptism and the Eucharist, and the tradition of Jesus' teaching. He shares with the other evangelists a belief in the importance of Jesus' acts of healing, etc., as more than marvelous displays of power; if for him they are signs of Jesus' messianic authority, so too for Matthew and Luke his exorcisms show that the "kingdom of God has come upon" his hearers (Matt. 12:28=Luke 11:20). His death has in John a meaning found also in the other gospels. Jesus lays down his life for his friends (15:13); he gives his life a ransom for many (Mark 10:45=Matt. 20:28). The words of Jesus in John 6:53 about eating his flesh and drinking his blood recall his words at the Last Supper in Matt. 26:26-29; Mark 14:22-24; Luke 22:17-19. Jesus' saying that "no one comes to the Father, but by me" (John 14:6), recalls Matt. 11:27: "No one knows the Father except the Son and any one to whom the Son chooses to reveal him," and its parallel in Luke 10:22.

But even if all such parallels are adduced, and full weight given to them, there remains much, both in form and in substance, peculiar to John. Even when the same phrase is used in John as in the other gospels, it may have a different nuance, as, e.g., "Son of man," or again the command to love. It is difficult to resist the impression that in John love is something which operates within the Christian community—Christians are to "love one another" (15:12); contrast the command to love "your neighbor as yourself" (Mark 12:31), which looks outward to those not in the community. John says, it is true, that God loved the world, but he does not record any command to Christians to do so.

The feature of John most difficult to reconcile with the teaching of Jesus in the other gospels is the large amount of controversy about Jesus' own status and function, and, in the course of this, the explicit claims made by Jesus on his own behalf, in particular the "I am" sayings (6:35 [cf. vss. 41, 48, 51]; 8:12; 10:7 [cf. vs. 9], 11 [cf. vs. 14], 25; 14:6; 15:1 [cf. vs. 5]). Though it may be argued that these only make explicit what is implicit in the other gospels, it cannot be denied that the total impression made by John is different from that of the other gospels. It would, indeed, appear that a considerable amount of material in John represents the results of meditation upon the life and teaching of Jesus by the evangelist, based, indeed, upon actions and sayings of Jesus, but modifying them considerably in the process.

b. Paul. The thought of John is closest to that of Paul in the Letter to the Colossians (see COLOSSIANS, LETTER TO THE). In Col. 1:15-19, Paul makes a series of affirmations about Christ very similar to ideas of John. Paul's description of Christ as the "image of the invisible God" recalls John 1:18; his claim that "all things were created through him and for him" likewise recalls John 1:3; and the statement that "in him all the fullness of God was pleased to dwell," though it has no exact verbal parallel in John, is fully in accord with his ideas, and moreover has in common with John 1:16 the word "fulness," πλήρωμα, a technical term of Hellenistic theology for the sum total of the divine attributes (see PLEROMA).

Now if Colossians is indeed the work of Paul, it is by common consent one of the latest, if not the very latest, of his extant letters. He wrote it to refute certain heretical notions which had gained currency at Colossae, a city in the province of Asia, of which Ephesus, the traditional place of origin of John's Gospel, was the capital. When it was customary to date John's Gospel much later than now seems possible (see § G below), it was easy to find in Colossians a source of John's theology, even allowing for the late date of Colossians. Indeed, this was possible even if Colossians was not ascribed to Paul. But if John is to be dated in the first century, it is perhaps more reasonable to see Colossians and John as similar responses to the same challenge, rather than Colossians as an actual source of John's Christology. The point of contact between Paul and John may well lie in the thought of the "Hellenists," the associates of Stephen, who had first faced the problem of presenting Christianity to the pagan world.

This suggestion may be reinforced by the consideration that the Letter to the Hebrews, which is not, of course, by Paul, has in its opening verses resemblances to John quite as close as any in Colossians; cf. Heb. 1:1-3: "God . . . has spoken to us by a Son, whom he appointed heir of all things, through whom also he created the world. He reflects the glory of God and bears the very stamp of his nature." Hebrews may, of course, be the work of a disciple of Paul, but it could equally well be the work of one of the early "Hellenists," and so, like John, an example of a similar reaction to the same situation rather than of dependence upon Paul.

c. Jewish literature. In order to assess the value of the material found in John, it is very important to have as accurate a knowledge as possible of the author's background. Is it primarily Jewish, or primarily Hellenistic? This contrast can easily be overstressed, for there had been a certain amount of assimilation—in both directions—between Jewish and Hellenistic religion and culture. Books like Ecclesiastes and Wisdom of Solomon testify to the influence of Greek philosophy within Judaism, while Philo is an example of a man writing in the interests of the Jewish religion whose ideas are nevertheless profoundly influenced by Greek philosophy. And the influence of Judaism and its sacred literature upon the syncretistic religions of the period cannot be ignored. Nevertheless, the distinction of Jewish and Hellenistic is, within limits, a valid one. Now if the author of John can be shown to be primarily Jewish in his ideas and background, it is open to the critic to admit the possibility that the tradition which he preserves is primitive more easily than if he is primarily Hellenistic. And conversely, if he appears to be primarily Hellenistic, then it is easier to regard his gospel as a work of imagination, a theological romance of a type not unparalleled in Hellenistic literature.

The fact that both views of John are maintained should induce caution. It is easy when arguing for one side to ignore or minimize what tells in favor of the other. Those scholars who regard John as primarily a work of imagination stress its Hellenistic features, while the more conservative maintain its essentially Jewish character. The view which best accounts for all the evidence is perhaps that John was written by a man of Jewish origin, familiar with the Palestinian background of the story which he had to tell, who was also anxious to make his message intelligible to a predominantly Gentile audience. In this case he would resemble Philo in his objective, if not necessarily in his ideas and method. There is a somewhat similar controversy over Paul, and in his case also the most satisfactory solution to the problem may well be that he was a man of primarily Jewish origin addressing a primarily Gentile audience.

The familiarity of John with the Jewish scriptures, both canonical and apocryphal, is sufficiently obvious, but does not of itself decide the issue. The Jewish scriptures were studied and valued by Gentile as well as by Jewish Christians, and familiarity with them does not necessarily argue a Jewish origin. Features of John which suggest more convincingly a Jewish and even Palestinian background are its language, its echoes of rabbinic ideas and methods of argument, and its parallels in thought and language with the recently discovered documents of the Qumran community, though it must be remembered that all these are more or less matters of dispute.

That the language of John has a Semitic flavor, particularly in the simplicity of its syntactical structure, is fairly generally recognized, but the precise implication of this is disputed. Some scholars have gone so far as to maintain that John is the translation of an Aramaic original, but this view has not met with wide acceptance. John's Semitic characteristics are rather attributed to the use of originally Aramaic sources, or to the fact that its author was bilingual, writing in Greek but thinking in Aramaic (or, as some scholars infer, in rabbinic Hebrew). Nevertheless, though its precise explanation may be in dispute, the Semitic character of the language of John tells in favor of a Jewish background.

Apparent parallels to rabbinic ideas, phraseology, and methods of argument have also been found in John, particularly in passages of controversy between Jesus and the Jews. These, by themselves, would, if substantiated, only suggest the faithful reproduction of primitive sources. But they are not confined to such passages, being found also in those which are clearly the author's own composition. Thus in 1:14: "The Word became flesh and dwelt among us, full of grace and truth; we have beheld his glory," and in vs. 17: "The law was given through Moses; grace and truth came through Jesus Christ," the evangelist appears to be claiming for the incarnate Word the functions of mediation and revelation which the rabbis attributed to the Torah. The use of the verb ἐσκήνωσεν, "dwelt," may be a kind of bilingual pun, since it contains the same root consonants as the rabbinic technical term Shekinah, the manifestation of the divine presence. Grace and truth, the divine attributes, to be seen according to the rabbis through the Torah, came in fact through Jesus Christ. This contrast between the Torah and the Christ is a recurrent theme in John, and gives a point to many incidents narrated in it. In rabbinic literature the Torah is frequently likened to water, wine, bread, and light. Such symbolism is readily understandable. And it is not difficult to see it underlying those narratives in John in which reference is made to these substances. Thus in the miracle at Cana (2:1-11) there is the contrast between the "good wine" given by Jesus and the inferior wine that had been used up, as well as the water in the jars "for the Jewish rites of purification" (2:6); in 4:12-14 there is the contrast between the water that Jesus gives and that of Jacob's well; in 6:32 the bread which Moses gave is contrasted with the true bread from heaven; in 8:12 Jesus proclaims himself the light of the world, which, according to the rabbis, it is the function of the Torah to be (cf. 1:5, 9).

In John the word νόμος, "law," is used only in the same senses as the Hebrew Torah, in contrast to Paul, who occasionally gives it a Greek meaning, alien to that of the Hebrew Torah. This is in itself noteworthy. Moreover, in the allusions to the law in John there are many indications of the author's acquaintance with rabbinic usage. Thus 7:22-24 shows familiarity with the rabbinic ruling that the need to circumcise a child on the eighth day suspends the law of the Sabbath rest, and employs the familiar rabbinic argument "from light to heavy" in the plea that if one may circumcise on the Sabbath, one can also heal; 7:51 quotes the rule that a man must not be condemned unheard, and 8:17 the rule that two witnesses are necessary.

These are only a few examples of the many that could be cited to show the familiarity of the author of John with rabbinic ideas.

The documents of the Qumran community, the DEAD SEA SCROLLS, show, along with many differences that must not be ignored, some striking affinities in outlook and terminology to John. They share the same ethical dualism, both stopping short of the full ontological dualism taught by some later Gnostics; and they use the same terminology to express it. For both this world, though the creation of God, lies in the power of a rebellious spirit, created, indeed, but hostile to the creator. There is an irreconcilable opposition between the two powers of light and darkness, truth and falsehood, life and death. These pairs of opposites, found in John, occur also in the Scrolls, as do also phrases characteristic of John like "do the truth" (3:21), "the works of God" (6:28), "walk in darkness" (8:12; 12:35), "the light of life" (8:12), "sons of light" (12:36), "the spirit of truth" (14:17; 15:26; 16:13). These affinities are the more remarkable inasmuch as they occur precisely with those aspects of the thought and language of John which, before the discovery of the Scrolls, seemed to bring John into contact with the thought-world of Hellenistic Gnosticism, and so to preclude a date in the first century for the composition of the gospel. But now it is no longer necessary to look beyond Palestine and the first century A.D. for the environment in which these ideas, so characteristic of John, could have originated. John can no longer be regarded as a Hellenistic document pure and simple, as was often done in the past. Much still remains in dispute with regard to the precise relationship between the first Christians and the Qumran community and between their respective literatures, but this much at least seems beyond reasonable doubt: whether it was that the early Christians borrowed from the ideas of the Qumran community or reacted against them, the Qumran documents provide valuable evidence for the moral and religious climate in which early Christianity developed and the tradition found in John was formulated.

Philo of Alexandria, an approximate contemporary of Paul, has, both in his general outlook and in particular in his doctrine of the Logos (see WORD, THE, § 4), obvious points of resemblance to John. Philo was entirely loyal to Judaism, but his philosophy was so thoroughly Hellenized as to have little distinctively Jewish about it. He used the technique of allegorical exegesis (which the Stoics had elaborated) in order to extract from the OT a variant of the popular Stoicism of his period, and, apparently in all sincerity, presented this as the true meaning of the sacred text. At the time when it was easy to regard John as both later in date and more definitely Hellenized in character than now seems probable, it was natural that Philo should have been regarded as a major influence upon John. Critics could point to the fact that, for both Philo and John, to know God is the principal aim of human existence, and that God can be known only through his Logos, his agent both in creation and in revelation. Some even went so far as to suggest that John was designed to be interpreted allegorically on the lines of Philo's exegesis of the OT. But to compose a narrative and deliberately to adapt it to allegorical interpretation is something very different from so interpreting a given text; and, though John is undoubtedly interested in symbolism, symbolism is not the same thing as allegory, while the manifest conviction of the evangelist that the events which he describes really did happen is hard to reconcile with the suggestion that he could consciously have adapted them to allegorical interpretation. John is also less philosophical and more obviously religious in his interests than Philo, and while for Philo the Logos is a personified attribute of God, John's affirmation is that the Logos "became flesh," which goes far beyond anything in Philo. It is therefore probable that we should regard Philo, not as a major influence on John, but as evidence for the beliefs of some, at least, of the readers to whom John was designed to appeal.

d. Pagan literature. The conclusion suggested above about Philo and John is probably also that most appropriate to the non-Jewish literature which now has to be considered, the Corpus Hermeticum, and the Mandean and Gnostic writings. The Corpus Hermeticum is a collection of tracts, Egyptian in origin and written in Greek, mainly in the second and third centuries A.D., containing what purport to be the revelations of "Hermes Trismegistus," a deified Egyptian sage. The chief sacred books of the Mandeans, a somewhat bizarre community still surviving in Iraq, are the Ginza (i.e., "Treasure"), and the Book of John, written in Aramaic and put into their present form not earlier than 700 A.D. The Gnostics, properly speaking, were Christian heretics, whose writings survive mainly in fragments, but the term "Gnosticism" is also used to describe a system or systems of belief thought to antedate the origin of Christianity, and to be presupposed by the various Gnostic systems known today.

Though none of this literature can certainly be dated earlier than John in its present form, it is argued, with some show of probability, that it is dependent upon earlier writings, which it is claimed (particularly in the case of the Mandean literature) can be reconstructed from that now extant. Then it can be argued that this earlier literature could have influenced John.

These various writings (like some of the OT wisdom literature and the works of Philo himself) all appear to owe their ultimate origin to the ferment of religious and philosophical ideas which marked the Hellenistic age, when Greek popular philosophy encountered and came to terms with the native religions of Egypt, Syria, and Mesopotamia; syncretized, rationalized, and allegorized their mythologies; and discovered in them its own teaching, revealed as the esoteric wisdom of the East.

The resultant systems of belief all have a strong family likeness. They are concerned primarily with the salvation of the individual, and pessimistic about the world as it is. They are ethically and sometimes also ontologically dualist; they preach a supreme deity unknowable except insofar as he wills to reveal himself, which he does by means of some divine or semidivine emissary and agent (Hermes in the Corpus Hermeticum, John the Baptist in the Mandean books, Jesus in the Gnostic systems), who preaches the knowledge (γνωσις) which saves mankind. They all use more or less the same basic terminology, found also in John—"light," "life," "truth," "Logos," "knowing," and "believing"—and this is used as an argument for their influence upon John. But if John's use of this terminology can be adequately explained otherwise, from literature that can be dated with much greater probability to his period, then Hermetic, Mandean, or Gnostic influence is much less likely, and, insofar as this literature preserves more ancient elements, these are to be used to illustrate the beliefs of the Hellenistic world to which John was addressed rather than those which actually influenced its thought. John is basically Jewish Christian, though designed (as were Paul's letters) to be understood by men brought up in a different tradition. See GNOSTICISM.

E. EVIDENCE OF USE AND AUTHORSHIP FROM EARLY CHRISTIAN LITERATURE. There are possible echoes of John in isolated passages of I Clement and Barnabas, but the first clear traces of fairly systematic use of John are in the epistles of Ignatius of Antioch (ca. A.D. 110) and in the writings of Justin Martyr, a generation later. Neither actually mentions John. Indeed, when Ignatius wrote to Ephesus (the traditional place of writing of John), he called the Christians there "Paul's fellow initiates," but said nothing of John. Justin knew of more than one gospel, for he speaks of the "memoirs of the apostles which are called gospels," and he attributes Revelation to the apostle John, but does not attribute any gospel to him.

The earliest mentions of John of Ephesus are in connection with Polycarp and Papias, both bishops in Asia Minor younger than Ignatius and older than Justin. Eusebius (Hist. III.39) calls Papias, on the authority of Irenaeus (who lived toward the end of the second century), a "hearer of John, and a companion of Polycarp." He also quotes a letter of Irenaeus to Florinus (Hist. V.20), in which Irenaeus speaks of having heard, when he was very young, Polycarp telling of "his association with John and with the others who had seen the Lord." Eusebius (Hist. III.39) quotes a passage from Papias' own book in which he speaks of inquiring "about the sayings of the elders—what Andrew or Peter said, or what Philip, or Thomas, or James, or John, or Matthew, or any other of the Lord's disciples, and what Aristion and the elder John, the disciples of the Lord, say." Though some scholars deny it, saying that Papias has only expressed his meaning clumsily, it is natural to suppose from this that he distinguished John the apostle, who was presumably dead when he wrote, from John the elder, who was still alive. Thus the John whom Papias and Polycarp knew was presumably the elder, which is borne out by the fact that, according to Eusebius, Papias quoted I John, while Polycarp's extant Epistle to the Philippians shows clearly that he knew I John—the author of II and III John, who must also have written I John, calls himself "the elder."

About the time of Justin the Leucian Acts of John, a historically valueless and heretical romance, identifies the BELOVED DISCIPLE with John the son of Zebedee, but denies that he wrote a gospel. This at least shows that by this time the belief (whether well founded or not) was current that John of Ephesus was the Beloved Disciple and son of Zebedee, and the denial that he wrote a gospel looks like an attempt to discredit John in the interests of the heretical work of "Leucius."

Ca. A.D. 160 the Valentinian Gnostic Heracleon wrote a commentary on John, considerable fragments of which remain in the homilies of Origen on John. These contain no mention of the authorship of John, and it may perhaps be inferred from the fact that Origen usually quotes Heracleon only when he disagrees with him, that they held the same view on authorship—i.e., that John was the work of the son of Zebedee. A little later than Heracleon, Tatian, a pupil of Justin, not only used John in his Diatessaron, a harmony of the four gospels, but also made the earliest known formal quotations of John—of John 1:5 in his Oratio XIII.1 and of John 1:3 in XIX.4.

Ca. A.D. 180, Theophilus of Antioch (Apology II.22) quotes John 1:1 as scripture and ascribes it to John; Irenaeus (Her. III.1) identifies the author as the Beloved Disciple, and adds that he published the gospel at Ephesus, being apparently unaware of the fact that this contradicts the obvious inference from John 21:20-23 that this disciple was dead when the gospel was published; and the Muratorian Canon (see CANON OF THE NT § C6) says that John, "one of the disciples," wrote the gospel after it had been revealed to Andrew, "one of the apostles," that he should do so. This sounds like an attempt to provide apostolic authority for a work not actually of apostolic authorship, in the face of the attacks being made at this time, particularly in Rome, against John by the Alogi. See § B2 above.

Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus at the end of the second century, in his letter to Pope Victor (Euseb. Hist. V.24), describes the Ephesian John (whom he identifies with the Beloved Disciple) as having been a "priest who wore the πέταλον" (i.e., the gold plate attached to the high priest's turban; Exod. 28:36-38). None of these actually says that John of Ephesus was the son of Zebedee, and it is difficult to see how Polycrates' description of him can ever have been thought to apply to a former Galilean fisherman.

Nevertheless, the view that John was the work of the son of Zebedee was firmly established in the following century, and it remains to be seen how this accords with the evidence of the gospel itself.

F. INTERNAL EVIDENCE OF PURPOSE AND AUTHORSHIP. John 21:20-24 identifies the author as the disciple next to Jesus at supper (13:23; 21:20). It had been expected that he would not die, but presumably he had done so, and ch. 21 was added to the gospel (which clearly is meant to end at 20:31) in order to explain the misunderstanding of Jesus' words that was responsible for this belief. If so, the man who published the gospel (John of Ephesus?) cannot have been the BELOVED DISCIPLE. Was the Beloved Disciple then John the son of Zebedee? The sons of Zebedee were present at the events described in ch. 21 (vs. 2), and so the identification is possible if the rest of the gospel bears it out.

The Beloved Disciple is the "witness" of 19:35, and from his association with Peter in 20:2 ff and at the Last Supper it follows that he is also the disciple "known to the high priest" (18:15-16). As it is unlikely that a son of Zebedee would be known to the high priest, the suggestion has been made that the disciple of 18:15; 20:2 is not the same as the Beloved Disciple. He may, indeed, be the John of Ephesus. But there are other difficulties in the way of the identification of the son of Zebedee with the Beloved Disciple, the chief one being that the standpoint from which the gospel is written is Judean rather than Galilean. On the other hand, the presence of the Beloved Disciple at the Last Supper suggests that he was one of the Twelve, unless others besides the Twelve were present.

Some scholars, impressed by the difficulty of identifying the Beloved Disciple, dismiss him as an "ideal figure." But to do this makes nonsense of the whole tenor of the gospel; no reliance can be placed upon the author's assurance that the events which he describes really happened. There is, however, a great air of verisimilitude about John which induces many to accept the traditional view of its authorship (in spite of its difficulties), or else to dismiss the problem of authorship as insoluble. Admittedly it is not of primary importance, though it would be very desirable to have the solution to it.

There are two alternative possibilities: either (a) that the Beloved Disciple is the John whose mother's house in Jerusalem was a meeting place for the church there (cf. Acts 12:12)—if the Last Supper was held there, it would account for the presence at it of the son of the house; or (b) that he is Lazarus (for details see LAZARUS OF BETHANY), and that John of Ephesus (who in this case may still be the son of Mary of Jerusalem) published his gospel, and added to it ch. 21. If the disciple known to the high priest (or, as the Greek may also mean, related to him) is other than the Beloved Disciple, then he may be John of Ephesus, and Lazarus the Beloved Disciple. If John were of high-priestly family, this might account for Polycrates' description of him as a high priest himself. It would then have to be assumed that in the course of the second century the local patriotism of the Ephesians led them to identify their elder John with the Beloved Disciple of the gospel which he published, and to claim him as John son of Zebedee, which is not, indeed, incompatible with the evidence of the gospel.

G. THE ORIGIN AND PURPOSE OF JOHN. Whoever it was who put John in its present form and published it, whether he was its author or its editor, the Beloved Disciple or another, he offered it to the church and to the world as evidence for the claim that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God (20:31), furnished by a selection of Jesus' own acts—the "signs"—expounded in the discourses, and by the testimony of individuals, primarily of the Beloved Disciple.

There are six signs, one less than the perfect number seven, and, both by this fact and by their content, they lead up to the final and perfect sign, the death and resurrection of Christ. The first sign, the changing of water into wine, symbolizes Christ's ministry as the substitution of the wine of the gospel for the water of the law; the second and third, two miracles of healing, show Christ as the bringer of life and forgiveness—the paralyzed man by the pool represents the sinner whom the law cannot save; the fourth shows him as the bringer of the real manna; the fifth illustrates that "in him was life, and the life was the light of men," by the curing of the blind man; the sixth, the raising of Lazarus, shows Christ as victor over death and prepares immediately for his own resurrection. The inner meaning of these events is expounded in the discourses, which are held together by the themes which run through them and give the gospel its unity. The fact that the main themes are stated in the Prologue suggests that the Prologue is integral to the gospel, which is, in fact, an exposition of its meaning. It is difficult to imagine the Prologue as an originally independent hymn to the Logos, subsequently attached to the gospel, though this has been suggested.

The discourses may well have originated in sermons expounding the "signs": the feeding of the multitude and the discourse associated with it would be an appropriate Easter sermon, and, indeed, it may be that the association of the signs with feasts gives a clue to the occasions on which these sermons were preached. They were then formed into the gospel, and may have undergone a certain amount of rearrangement by the editor, thus giving rise to the phenomena explained by some critics as due to dislocation of the text (see § A2 above). The present order, however, is clearly intentional, even if it is not according to the author's intention.

It is not easy to date the gospel at all precisely. Much of its material, even in the discourses, may be primitive, but it may have been gradually brought into shape during a lifetime of preaching, and the traditional date for its publication, late in the first century, fits the evidence of its early use by Ignatius. A man who was a youth at the time of the Crucifixion could well have published the gospel in the nineties when he was himself, as the tradition asserts, an old man, perhaps the last survivor of those who had seen the Lord.

Published at Ephesus at that time, the gospel must have been designed not only to remind the church of vital truths about its Lord, but also to win from the mystery cults and Gnosticism those pagans who sought salvation.

H. HISTORICAL AND RELIGIOUS VALUE. There is no reason to doubt that the author believed that the events he narrates actually happened. The fact that he finds them full of symbolical significance is no argument to the contrary. He chose those which best suited his purpose. And they contain many details, particularly topographical, from which no symbolical significance can be extracted, and which may stand as evidence for the historicity of the narratives in which they are found. John's dating of the Crucifixion at the time when the Passover lambs were being slaughtered for the coming feast has been widely suspected as unhistorical, but the alternative dating, on the actual day of the feast, is not without difficulty, and John may after all be correct.

It is, however, probably too much to expect that the events are in the actual order of occurrence. The order of the gospel is theological rather than chronological. But, even so, it must not be too readily assumed that where John and the other gospels disagree, John is necessarily wrong.

Nor can it be expected that the discourses were uttered by Jesus precisely as we have them in John. Its author was a prophet, and his own inspired utterances were "words of the Lord" as truly as any spoken by Jesus in his earthly ministry. They take up and expound many actual words of Jesus (in our sense), but their final form and emphasis is the evangelist's. John 16:14 suggests the process by which this happened. But, no doubt, the fact that the author had known Jesus and had grown up in Judea put limits to his freedom. John is not the first apocryphal gospel.

Its religious value can be considered even more briefly. If it is indeed wholly or mainly the work of a disciple, matured through years of preaching and meditation, it fully merits the description which Clement of Alexandria gave it of the "spiritual gospel." Its author possessed the "mind of Christ" (I Cor. 2:16) as truly as Paul, and generations of Christians have found in his work an insight into the life of their Lord given nowhere else. It may not be legitimate to press this consideration in a strictly critical study, but it cannot be wholly ignored.

Bibliography. Of the innumerable books on John the following list aims at giving a selection representing different points of view:

Commentaries: B. F. Westcott (1882). A. Loisy (1903). M. J. Lagrange (1924). J. H. Bernard, ICC (1928). W. Bauer (1933). R. Bultmann (1937-41; supplement, 1950). E. C. Hoskyns (ed. F. N. Davey; 1940). C. K. Barrett (1955). R. H. Lightfoot (ed. C. F. Evans; 1956).

Other books and articles: E. F. Scott, The Fourth Gospel, Its Purpose and Theology (1906). J. Rendel Harris, The Origin of the Prologue to St. John's Gospel (1917). C. F. Burney, The Aramaic Origin of the Fourth Gospel (1922). H. Odeberg, The Fourth Gospel Interpreted in Its Relation to Contemporaneous Religious Currents in Palestine and the Hellenistic-Oriental World (1929). R. Eisler, The Enigma of the Fourth Gospel (1938). P. Gardner-Smith, Saint John and the Synoptic Gospels (1938). E. Percy, Untersuchungen über den Ursprung der johanneischen Theologie (1939). W. F. Howard, Christianity According to St. John (1943). J. N. Sanders, The Fourth Gospel in the Early Church (1943). P. H. Menoud, L'évangile de Jean d'après les recherches récentes (1947). E. K. Lee, The Religious Thought of St. John (1950). W. F. Albright, "Recent Discoveries in Palestine and the Gospel of St. John," The Background of the NT and Its Eschatology (ed. W. D. Davies and D. Daube; 1953), pp. 153-71. C. H. Dodd, The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel (1953). F. M. Braun, "L'arrière-fond judaïque du quatrième évangile et la communauté de l'alliance," RB, LXX (1955), 5-44. W. F. Howard, The Fourth Gospel in Recent Criticism and Interpretation (4th ed., rev. C. K. Barrett, 1955). K. Aland, "Das Johannesevangelium auf Papyrus," Forschungen und Fortschritte, XXI (1957), 50-55. J. N. SANDERS

JOHN, LETTERS OF. These three letters, together with the Gospel of John (see JOHN, GOSPEL OF) and the Revelation (see REVELATION, BOOK OF), constitute a corpus of writings which have been traditionally associated with the name John. Early patristic citations indicate that all five books were written in the province of Asia during the last decade of the first century or the first decade of the second century. Internal evidence, supplemented by information from other sources, enables us to give a more or less detailed description of the circumstances which called forth each of the five books. But whether the churches of Asia numbered among their leaders one John or more than one, and whether the Johannine writings come from one hand or from a Johannine school, are questions to which there is still no generally accepted answer.

The value of the letters, however, does not entirely depend on the solution of such historical problems as these. For, whoever may have written them, these short writings raise in striking form questions which are of permanent interest and importance for Christian faith and practice: the validity of religious experience, the relation of inspiration to authority, the meaning of love, the nature of Christian assurance, and the proper attitude toward those whose convictions are radically different from our own.

1. Purpose
   a. The nature of the opposition
   b. The identity of the opponents
   c. The author's own background
2. Contents
   a. The first letter
   b. The second letter
   c. The third letter
3. I John and the Fourth Gospel
4. Patristic references
5. Authorship
6. Text

Bibliography

1. Purpose. Each of the three letters was written to deal with a challenge to the teaching or authority of the writer which had arisen within the churches of Asia. They cannot properly be called polemical writings, for they are not addressed to those who have caused the trouble. Rather, they are pastoral letters, directed to those Christians who have remained faithful, in order to undergird their faith and reinforce their loyalty during the period of crisis. But, reading between the lines, we can gain a reasonably clear picture of the opposition.

a. The nature of the opposition. Throughout the first letter we find a series of warnings against those who make claims which are not justified by the facts:

"if we say we have fellowship with him while we walk in darkness" (1:6); "if we say we have no sin" (1:8); "he who says 'I know him' but disobeys his commandments" (2:4); "he who says he abides in him" (2:6); "if any one says, 'I love God,' and hates his brother" (4:20). It is obvious that these denunciations are not made without good reason and that someone has actually been making such professions. The opposition has been laying claim to a special knowledge and love of God and to a peculiarly intimate relationship with him which has set them above the common distinctions between good and evil and therefore above the demands of Christian ethics. It is probable, too, that the initial message of the letter: "God is light and in him is no darkness at all," is directed against a theology which held that God comprehended in himself both light and darkness.

These heretical teachers have also been denying that Jesus was the Christ (2:22). We are not to conclude from this that they were Jews or Judaizers who denied his Messiahship, but rather that they were Christians who denied his Incarnation. For their error is more particularly defined later in the letter as a denial "that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh" (4:2). In this connection the writer warns his readers to test the spirits to see whether they are of divine origin, which suggests that his opponents have been basing their teaching on what they claimed to be the divinely inspired utterances of a prophet or prophets. It is a reasonable conjecture, therefore, that the strange word "chrism" or "unction," which is twice used to describe the gift of the Spirit in which all Christians participate (2:20, 27), has found its way into the vocabulary of the letter because the heretics had first used it to describe what they believed to be their own unique spiritual endowment.

The opponents were Christians and had formerly been members of the church. But they had recently withdrawn from the Christian fellowship to start a new movement of their own (2:19), which had met with a readier acceptance in the pagan world than the church had been accustomed to find (4:5).

Into this picture we may readily fit the evidence of the second letter, which was written by one who calls himself "the presbyter" (RSV "elder") to inform a particular church of the existence of a heretical missionary movement, which was denying the reality of the Incarnation, and to caution them against encouraging such missionaries by offering them hospitality.

The opposition in the third letter comes from a certain Diotrephes, who has refused to acknowledge the authority of the presbyter who writes the letter, and has managed to win so much support in the church to which he belongs that the presbyter's emissaries have been excluded from its meetings and even denied hospitality by its members. But there is no reason to connect him in any way with the heretical party of which we hear in the other two letters, unless it was that he took advantage of the confusion which their schism created to assert his own independence.

b. The identity of the opponents. An aberrant Christianity, which teaches salvation by esoteric knowledge, excites an enthusiasm devoid of moral concern, and nourishes a spirituality contemptuous of all things material, can be identified unmistakably as an early form of the movement which came to be known as Gnosis or GNOSTICISM. At this stage, however, there is no sign of the gross sensuality which was countenanced by some of the later developments of the Gnostic heresy; the moral laxity here stigmatized consists solely in an indifference to the practical demands of the law of love.

We can be equally sure that the denial that Jesus has come in the flesh was a form of the Docetic heresy, which is so strongly denounced in the letters of Ignatius. Docetism consisted either in a general denial of the reality of Christ's human nature or in a more precise theory that the Christ had adopted only the outward appearance of human form, a shallow disguise used to accommodate his divine nature to the feeble capacities of human comprehension. This idea was a natural concomitant of Gnosticism, which, by its depreciation of all matter and of the physical body in particular, seemed to rule out the possibility that flesh and blood could be a genuine medium of divine revelation. The belief that there is a fundamental antagonism between spirit and matter was ultimately of oriental origin, but it had long since made a deep penetration of Hellenistic thought. It need not surprise us, then, to find that the other factor which contributed to the growth of Docetism was the purely Greek, philosophic conception of the impassibility of God, since, if God cannot be said in any sense to suffer, the divine nature of Christ cannot have been involved in the Crucifixion.

Among the early Gnostics there is one, CERINTHUS, who is known to have been active in Asia in the closing years of the first century, and his teaching shows certain points of similarity with that which is attacked in I John. He taught that Jesus was merely human "and that after his baptism there descended into him from the Supreme Power Christ in the form of a dove, and that he then proclaimed the unknown father and performed miracles, but that finally Christ withdrew again from Jesus, so that it was Jesus who suffered and rose again, while Christ remained impassible, being pure spirit" (Iren. Her. I.26.1). In other words, Cerinthus denied that Jesus Christ had come in the flesh, because he denied that the human Jesus could in any real way be identified with the divine Christ. Whether the opponents of John were actually associates or disciples of Cerinthus, it is perhaps too much to say, but they certainly moved in the same universe of discourse.

c. The author's own background. Though the author of I John deals firmly with his Gnostic opponents, his theology has nevertheless much in common with theirs. He does not repudiate the OT as they tended to do, but he is the only NT writer who never quotes from it. He protests against allowing Hellenistic notions to distort the facts of the apostolic tradition, yet he is himself the most thoroughly Hellenized of all the NT writers and the only one to equate God with an abstraction: "God is light" (1:5); "God is love" (4:8). To expound his own doctrinal beliefs, he takes over from his opponents the idea that the Christian life consists in the outpouring of a divine unction (2:20, 27) or the implanting of a divine seed (3:9). He does not believe in salvation through esoteric knowledge, but he does lay emphasis on the cognitive side of faith. Above all, when he is combatting the absolute dualism of the Gnostics, he expresses himself in dualistic terms; he sees everything black and white, without halftones in between: light and darkness, truth and untruth, love and hate, life and death, God and the world. This propensity for thinking in extremes was characteristic of the Semitic mind (see especially the Manual of Discipline among the DEAD SEA SCROLLS), and could be illustrated abundantly from the traditions of primitive Christianity. But the dominant place which these stark contrasts occupy in the thought of I John suggests that the author was not merely drawing on the common Semitic background of early Christian theology but was at home in the religious atmosphere in which Gnosticism also flourished.

2. Contents. a. The first letter. This document defies precise analysis, because its thought moves, not forward in a logical progression, but spirally, with the same few ideas constantly recurring for new consideration and new development. For the sake of convenience, however, the letter may be summarized as follows:

I. Apostolic Christianity, 1:1-4
II. The tests of true Christianity, 1:5–2:27
  A. The test of obedience, 1:5–2:17
  B. The test of truth, 2:18-27
III. The new life of the children of God, 2:28–4:12
  A. The life free from sin, 2:28–3:10
  B. The life that is love, 3:11-18
  C. The life of assurance, 3:19-24
  D. The life in God's family, 4:1-12
IV. Christian certainty, 4:13–5:12
  A. Love excludes fear, 4:13-21
  B. Love is founded on truth, 5:1-12
V. Postscript, 5:13-21

The letter opens abruptly without the usual epistolary introduction, which would have given us information about its author and destination; and for this reason it has sometimes been treated as a tract rather than as a letter. On the other hand, it is clearly addressed to a particular situation and to a particular people, whom the author knows and loves with a warm personal affection. In his first paragraph, whatever else he may have omitted to tell us, he does make one thing abundantly plain: that even in controversy his purpose is not primarily polemic but pastoral, and that he means to combat the errors of his opponents by positive action, by calling his flock back to the gospel of the primitive church, which rested ultimately on the testimony of the eyewitnesses to the ministry of Jesus. He thus firmly lays down the one paramount criterion for distinguishing between genuine and spurious Christianity: that Christian teaching must preserve, undiminished and uncorrupted, the apostolic witness to Christ. In his own day it was enough to appeal to the living tradition, handed down from the earliest period of Christian history. Before long, however, the church was to discover in its fight against Gnosticism the need for a further criterion to distinguish the authentic tradition from accretions of legend, myth, and fantasy, and the answer to this need which began to emerge in the second century was the CANON OF THE NT, the purpose of which was to distinguish decisively between that which is apostolic, and therefore authoritative, and that which is not. Thus the prescription of I John leads directly to the guiding principle of Protestantism, that to be apostolic the church must be controlled by the NT scriptures.

The main argument of the letter begins with the provision of two tests whereby we may tell whether a man's faith is really the apostolic faith and whether the religious experience he claims to have had is really an experience of the one true God. The first test is an ethical one: a Christian is one who believes that God is utter goodness, that he himself is under an obligation to be like God, and that the road to goodness lies, not through his own moral effort, but through acceptance of the means which God has provided in Christ for dealing effectively with sin; and this belief will show itself outwardly in love and by an inner conviction of forgiveness, knowledge, and victory. The second test is a theological one: a Christian is one who believes that Jesus is the Christ, that the human Jesus is the incarnate Son of God, who perfectly reveals the Father. The two tests belong inseparably together, because it is through the human life of Jesus that our ideas of union with God and eternal life are filled with ethical content and the goodness and love of God are spelled out in human form. This insistence on the constant interplay of the intellectual and the moral elements in faith finds expression in other parts of the NT (e.g., John 7:17; Heb. 5:11-14), but nowhere more emphatically than in I John.

We are now told that those who have passed these tests have the right to call themselves children of God, since they have already entered upon a life which has its source in God. This life has certain distinctive qualities, which have already been touched on, but which require further elaboration. In the first place, the Christian life is a life free from sin, and the author is at pains to make clear that by sin he means, not a subjective state or a psychological disorder, but a definite violation of the moral law. This is one occasion when his black-and-white thinking is in evidence, for he has already warned his readers against the self-deception of thinking that they are without sin. Here he is concerned to say in the strongest possible fashion that there can be no salvation, no eternal life, no union with God, which does not involve a thorough moral purification. Christ came, not merely to give men the assurance that their sins no longer stood between them and the God of mercy, but actually to destroy their sins along with the devil from whom those sins took their origin. The Gnostic who denied that he was sinful was quite right in his belief that a Christian should be without sin, but wrong in claiming that he personally had reached the point where he could dispense with the sin-destroying power made available to all through the victory of Christ.

The epitome of all sin is hatred, which leads on to murder and death. By the same token the opposite of sin is love, which is almost synonymous with life. Love, indeed, is the one clear indication that a man has broken with the old order and entered the new. From the cross of Christ we can see that love means a willingness to serve the needs of others at whatever cost to ourselves. In time of crisis we may be called upon to make the ultimate sacrifice, but at other times the same law of love operates at a lower level, even in the smallest expenditure for the benefit of others of money, time, or effort which might have been spent on ourselves.

The Christian, then, because love has become the dominant principle of his life, constantly has free access to God. His conscience, it is true, may sometimes trouble him, but these occurrences should never be allowed to interrupt his normal state of calm assurance, based as it is, not on his own achievement, but on God's knowledge of him. This state can also be described as keeping Christ's commandments, abiding in him, or having the gift of the Spirit.

Love, moreover, provides every Christian with a standard for discriminating between true and false inspiration. The gift of the Spirit of God is inseparable from the gift of love, and Christian love will always recognize its source in Jesus, the incarnate Son of God. Those who claim to speak as inspired prophets but deny the reality of the Incarnation, and thus deny that the love displayed in the ministry of Jesus was God's love, show that they are controlled by a spirit antagonistic to God. The actual source of their doctrine is paganism, and this is why the pagan world finds that teaching congenial. By contrast, those who have a personal acquaintance with love are able to recognize God in Christ: for God is love. Once again we are made to see that the intellectual and the moral, belief in the Incarnation and obedience to the commandment of love, are obverse and reverse of one coin. To know God is to know love, and to know love is to express it in all the concrete duties and relationships of God's family.

We are now in a position to place over against the ill-founded confidence of the heretics, who claimed to know God and to abide in him, a Christian assurance, based on the inner witness of the Holy Spirit, that the love which moves in our hearts is the love of God, or rather the love which is God, and confirmed by the witness of the apostolic tradition that God was in Christ. Thus the historic act of God's love in Christ and the continuing and growing action of that love in the heart produce in the believer a conviction which enables him to live now in tranquil communion with God and to face the Last Judgment without trepidation. In other words, Christian assurance is based, not on human effort or achievement, but on God's love for us and God's love in us—always remembering that love is not love unless it finds active expression.

One final problem remains to be faced. The Christian who tries to live the life of love as a member of the family of God has also to live in a world which is hostile to God and which is constantly undermining his good intentions with evil suggestion or flattening them with social pressures. The life of love, therefore, becomes possible only through the victory of faith. This victory, we are now told in cryptic terms, consists in a belief that Christ came by water, blood, and spirit. These words have been carefully chosen so as to have a double reference to the historic life of Christ and to the continuing life of the church. The victory of God over the world was wrought out in the first instance by the operation of the Holy Spirit in the complete ministry of Jesus from his baptism with water to the shedding of his blood on the cross, but the same Spirit, made available to believers in the sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper, operates in their lives with the same victorious results. We thus arrive at a final definition of Christianity: the Christian is one who believes that God's decisive victory over the world in the life and death of Jesus Christ is being reproduced in his own life, so that he is being set free from the trammels of worldliness to live the life of love, which is life eternal.

Almost as an afterthought, the writer now turns briefly to the subject of prayer as an expression of Christian confidence. The Christian prays for the fulfilment of God's will and can expect an answer to his prayers, especially when he prays for the restoration of those who through sin have fallen away from God (though he has to allow for the possibility that some sinners have deliberately put themselves beyond the scope of God's mercy). The letter then ends with a reiteration of the three great certainties: that those who belong to God do not sin, that we belong to God, that our God was revealed in Jesus Christ.

b. The second letter. This is written by one who calls himself "presbyter," or "elder," and is addressed "to the elect lady." This lady has a large family, some of whom live with her and are said to be beloved not only by the presbyter but also by all true Christians. Others of her children the presbyter has met elsewhere, and he declares that some of them are faithful Christians (is it implied that others are not?). She has a sister who lives in the same locality as the presbyter and whose children join their greetings to his. He addresses her sometimes in the singular and sometimes in the plural. The only reasonable explanation of all this is that the two ladies are not individuals but churches, and this has become the almost universally accepted interpretation.

The presbyter writes to warn the church against a vigorous missionary campaign launched by heretics who have denied the reality of the Incarnation, and presumably they are representatives of the same heresy as that denounced in the first letter. These heretics apparently claimed to be "progressive" or "advanced"; to this claim the presbyter retorts that they have advanced right out of the limits of true Christian doctrine. He urges the church not to offer hospitality to these missionaries, since this would be tantamount to supporting their mission and endorsing their doctrine.

If we entitle I John "The Letter of Love," then to II John we must give the title "The Letter of Love's Limitation." It challenges the Christian to decide in what circumstances he would be justified in withholding from his neighbor the ministrations of love. In particular, it raises the question of the limits of toleration. Is the Christian at all times bound to uphold liberty of conscience for those who disagree with him, or does the point come where it is a Christian obligation to boycott or otherwise to restrain those whose beliefs constitute a threat to the faith or freedom of others? Whenever the church has been engaged in a struggle for its very life, its leaders have usually agreed with the presbyter that toleration lies too near compromise to be always a safe policy and that, above all, it is wrong to tolerate those who do not believe in toleration and who, given the opportunity, would rob others of their religious liberty. But is this the teaching of the Sermon on the Mount?

c. The third letter. This letter is also written by a presbyter to one Gaius (see GAIUS 3), whom he describes as his "child"—certainly his faithful adherent, probably one of his own converts. This Gaius, it seems, has opened his home to some itinerant Christians, who have subsequently visited the presbyter and at a meeting of the church have testified to Gaius' loyalty and hospitality. They are proposing to set out on another missionary journey, and the presbyter has written to "the church"—Gaius would know which one he meant, since it must be a church with which he had some connection, though he can scarcely have been a member of it—asking that they be given a welcome. But his letter has provoked a crisis. A certain DIOTREPHES, who refused to recognize the presbyter's authority, has secured the support of a majority of the members and has persuaded them not to receive anyone who came with the presbyter's recommendation and to eject from the church anyone who proposed to carry out the presbyter's instructions. The presbyter is confident that he can deal with this crisis by a personal visit. In the meantime he is concerned to provide for the missionaries by asking Gaius to repeat his offer of hospitality and to help his guests further with a contribution toward the expenses of their journey.

Diotrephes is important because he represents a stage in the transition from the church order of the first century to that of the Ignatian letters. In the later NT writings each congregation is governed by a board of presbyters, who are also called bishops, but the independence of the local church is qualified by the paternal oversight of men like the Presbyter, who exercise authority over a wide area in virtue of their age, experience, and intimate connection with the apostolic origins of the Christian movement. By the time of Ignatius the local church in Asia is governed by a bishop presiding over the board of presbyters, and congregational independence is complete. The episode of Diotrephes belongs to the growing pains of this period of development. He is in revolt against the paternalism of the presbyter. We may regard him either as the prototype of the Ignatian bishop or as the kind of upstart whose ambition made the emergence of the Ignatian bishop inevitable. In either case he is the champion of the autonomy of the younger churches as they emerge from their missionary period. It would be interesting to know the outcome of the presbyter's visit.

3. I John and the Fourth Gospel. Any careful reader of the NT is bound to notice a close resemblance of vocabulary, style, and thought between I John and the Fourth Gospel. Both works employ a small vocabulary to express a small number of ideas which are constantly repeated in new forms, and most of the words and ideas that are characteristic of the letter are found also in the gospel—e.g., "love," "life," "truth," "light," "Son," "Spirit," "advocate," "manifest," "sin," "world," "flesh," "lie," "abide," "know," "walk," "witness," "commandments." Still more striking are the many phrases which the two books have in common—e.g., "Spirit of truth," "do the truth," "born of God," "children of God," "walk in darkness," "have sin," "cross out of death into life," "overcome the world," "take away sin," "Savior of the world." Both books share certain points of style, such as asyndeton and the use of a demonstrative pronoun to introduce a subordinate clause. Both books teach union with God, made possible through the Incarnation and interpreted in ethical terms as a union of obedience and love.

These similarities are obvious and undeniable and have usually been taken as a clear indication of common authorship. Indeed, when A. E. Brooke wrote his commentary, he apologized for raising afresh the question of common authorship, which seemed to him to have become long since a closed question. On the other hand, the evidence so far considered does not exclude the possibility that the letter was written by one who had been deeply influenced either by personal contact with the evangelist and his teaching or by reading his gospel. There are significant differences between the two writings which lend substance to this second hypothesis.

The letter makes no use of some thirty of the words which are characteristic of the gospel, including the very important word "glory," and uses about forty words which do not occur in the gospel, including "fellowship," "expiation," and "antichrist." Of the words which are common to both works, some—e.g., "Paraclete" or "Advocate"—are used in quite different senses. The style of the letter is much less varied than that of the gospel, and is distinguished by the monotonous repetition of a few favorite syntactical devices: in its 105 verses there are twenty conditional sentences, forty-four substantival uses of article + participle, thirty-two sentences introduced by a demonstrative (eight of them beginning "By this we know"), fourteen pairs of antithetical sentences, and four rhetorical questions. There is also the marked absence from the letter of the Semitic idiom and coloring and of the OT references which are so much in evidence in the gospel. There are, moreover, several points at which the thought of the letter comes closer to that of the primitive church than to the highly developed theology of the gospel: the death of Christ as an expiation, the Spirit as the Spirit of prophecy, the imminence of the Parousia.

4. Patristic references. The first writer to show any acquaintance with the Johannine letters is Polycarp of Smyrna (see POLYCARP, EPISTLE OF), who quotes from I John without acknowledgment (Phil. 7). The date of this letter is still in dispute, and the part in which the quotation occurs may have been written at any time from 115 to 140. We have it on the authority of Eusebius (Hist. III.39.17) that I John was also known to Papias of Hierapolis (ca. 140), who quoted from it a number of times. Toward the end of the second century Irenaeus of Lyons, another native of the province of Asia, quotes from both I and II John as though they were a single letter and ascribes them, along with the Fourth Gospel, to John the apostle (Her. III.15.5, 8). Clement of Alexandria makes frequent use of I John, which he describes as John's "larger epistle" (Strom. II.15.66), thereby implying that he knew of at least two letters. The Muratorian Fragment (ca. 200) also mentions two letters of John among the writings generally accepted as canonical, and one of them was certainly I John, since it is quoted earlier in the document. There is thus no evidence for the circulation of III John during the second century.

Origen (In Joann. V.3) attributed to John the apostle the gospel, the Revelation, and one short letter, adding that he may also have written a second and third, but that not everyone admitted them to be genuine; and it is possible that Origen himself shared these doubts, since elsewhere he frequently makes use of I John but never of the other two letters. Eusebius also places II and III John among the disputed books (Hist. III.25.3) and makes the suggestion that they may have been written, not by John the evangelist, but "by another man with the same name." This was the theory favored by Jerome, who ascribed the gospel and the first letter to John the apostle and II and III John to John the presbyter; and through his influence all three letters found a place in the Roman list of 382 (Iohannis apostoli epistula una alterius Iohannis presbyteri epistulae duae). During the fourth century, however, the Eastern churches, led by Cyril and Athanasius, came out strongly in favor of the apostolic authorship of all three letters, and this was the opinion which ultimately prevailed.

5. Authorship. The one fact that emerges from this survey of the early patristic citations is that they provide no compelling reason for regarding the three letters as an inseparable triad. There are those who regard the first two letters as a pair and make no mention of the third; there are those who treat all three, together with the gospel, as the work of the one John, the apostle; and there are those who link the first letter with the gospel and attribute the other two to a different hand. For convenience we may call these theories the Muratorian, the traditional, and the Hieronymian; and we shall find that none of them is thoroughly satisfactory.

The Muratorian theory is that the first and second letters are by one author and the third by another. It rests chiefly on the negative evidence of Irenaeus and the Muratorian Fragment, but gains some support from the intensely personal character of the third letter, which differentiates it in a striking fashion from the other two; but this theory is open to one damaging criticism. Both II and III John claim to be written by the presbyter, a man so important and well known that he needs no further designation. If they did not in fact come from a single writer, one must be an imitation of the other. Now it is prima facie credible that II John was written by an imitative writer who modeled his work on III John, though we should then have to explain how the imitation came to be accepted as canonical while the original remained unknown or unregarded. On the other hand, it is quite impossible to believe that III John is an imitation. It bears the stamp of originality in every line. It is written by one in authority, who expects his authority to be recognized and who has therefore no need to father his correspondence on another and more impressive figure. To this it may be added that the failure of the second-century sources to mention the letter or to quote from it is hardly surprising. It is not a document that would be useful in controversy, and it must have been preserved solely because it was believed to have come from the hand of a well-known leader. The obvious and simple conclusion is that the one presbyter wrote both the letters which bear his name.

The traditional theory is that the gospel and all three letters are the work of John the apostle. To attack this hypothesis at its weakest point, we may ask whether it is possible to identify John the apostle with the presbyter of II and III John. There is ample evidence that in the subapostolic age in the province of Asia there was a small group of men called presbyters and regarded as the sole remaining link with the apostolic past. Irenaeus mentions them several times and calls them "disciples of the apostles" (Her. V.36.2). Papias in one place refers to a nameless presbyter (Euseb. Hist. III.39.15) and in another place distinguishes between John the apostle and John the presbyter (Euseb. Hist. III.39.4). It is surely easier to envisage Diotrephes defying the authority of such a presbyter than asserting himself against one of the closest friends of Jesus; and if the presbyter had been the apostle, could he have refrained from crushing his troublesome opponent by an appeal to his apostolic dignity?

These considerations lead directly to the Hieronymian theory that the gospel and the first letter were written by John the apostle and the other two letters by John the presbyter. There is one small piece of internal evidence which has been thought by some scholars to bear out Jerome's suggestion. The second letter, like the first, attacks the Docetists, who deny the reality of the Incarnation, but with a significant modification of syntax. I John uses a perfect tense ("every spirit which does not confess that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh"); II John uses a present ("men who will not acknowledge the coming of Jesus Christ in the flesh"). A single instance of this kind cannot be a decisive argument against common authorship, though it would be strange to find an author using an expression in a precise fashion on one occasion and in a slovenly fashion on another. It is, however, hardly likely that Jerome's judgment was based on such calculations. He simply could not believe that the apostle would have referred to himself merely as presbyter, and we have already seen that his doubts in this respect were justified. Jerome's theory of dual authorship, then, depends on his major premise that John the apostle wrote the gospel and I John; if we are satisfied with this assumption, we shall be satisfied also with Jerome's theory as a whole. If we abandon the idea of apostolic authorship for either or both of the larger works, then we must reconsider the possibility that they were written by the presbyter who wrote II and III John. For the presbyter claims to possess such authority that he can hardly have been a subordinate member of the Johannine school, and on this ground alone we should suspect that he was the author of one or both of the other Johannine works.

Apart from its traditional association with the gospel, the case for the apostolic authorship of I John rests wholly on its opening sentence. Indeed, the author of the Muratorian Fragment was so convinced by this sentence that he believed he had only to quote it in order to silence those critics who questioned the apostolic authorship of the Fourth Gospel itself. But will the sentence bear this much weight? The author states that he is going to build his argument on eyewitness evidence, but the apostles were not the only eyewitnesses to the ministry of Jesus. John the presbyter, according to Papias, was a disciple of the Lord. Moreover, it is quite reasonable to suppose that the author is referring, not to his individual experience, but to the corporate experience of the church, considered as a close-knit fellowship throughout the world and throughout the years. It remains, then, to examine the evidence for the apostolic authorship of the gospel. See JOHN, GOSPEL OF.

Jerome's theory still has its advocates among modern scholars, but others prefer to ascribe the gospel and all three letters to the presbyter of II and III John, who may or may not be identified with Papias' presbyter John. In support of this theory it may be urged that Irenaeus, our earliest witness, certainly confused James the apostle with James the Just (Her. III.12. 14), and, though we might have expected him to be better informed about the Christian history of his own native province, he nevertheless erroneously supposed Papias to have been a disciple of John the apostle (Euseb. Hist. III.39.1), so that he could unquestionably have confused John the apostle with John the presbyter, who was also a disciple of the Lord.

Another theory, which has grown in favor, is that the presbyter wrote all three letters but not the gospel; this is the theory to be adopted if we are convinced that the differences between the gospel and I John are so impressive as to outweigh the uniform testimony of antiquity to their common authorship.

Amid this welter of conflicting theories it is possible to make one statement that will command universal agreement—that the authorship of the Johannine letters is still very much an open question.

6. Text. The text of the Johannine letters is well preserved, and the few points where there is room for dispute over divergent readings involve only minor details and not serious matters of interpretation. There are, however, a number of passages where our modern critical texts differ from the Textus Receptus, so that there is a corresponding difference between the RSV and the KJV; and of these, five are for various reasons worthy of mention, all in the first letter:

In the KJV the second half of I John 2:23 ("He that acknowledgeth the Son hath the Father also") is printed in italics. The half verse had for some reason been omitted from the Greek MSS on which this version was based. The translators were apparently following the example of Stephanus, who on the sole authority of the Vulgate had inserted the missing words into his edition of the Greek text. Not long after 1611 the reading was confirmed by Codex A. Nowadays the A reading has the confirmation of ℵ, B, C, P, and a number of less important authorities, and is generally accepted.

In I John 2:20 the KJV reading ("Ye know all things"), which has the support of A, C, and a majority of Greek MSS, has rightly been supplanted in the RSV by the reading of ℵ and B ("You all know"). Here is a textual variant which makes a real difference to our understanding of the letter. The argument is directed against the arrogance of the Gnostics, who claim special, esoteric knowledge, and the point is not that the Holy Spirit confers complete knowledge on anybody but that he confers the knowledge of God upon all.

Another point of theological importance turns upon the reading of I John 4:19. Here the KJV follows the majority of MSS in reading: "We love him, because he first loved us." ℵ reads: "We love God . . . ." But the RSV rightly adopts the reading of A and B: "We love, because he first loved us." For the point of the paragraph is not that God's love calls forth a responsive love from us, but that God's love, once perfectly active in Christ, becomes active in us also through our love of the brethren.

One of the greatest textual curiosities in the NT is the passage about the three heavenly witnesses in I John 5:7-8 (KJV): "There are three that bear record [in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost: and these three are one. And there are three that bear witness in earth], the spirit, and the water, and the blood: and these three agree in one." There is not the slightest doubt that the words enclosed in brackets are an interpolation. They occur in only two late Greek MSS, and in each case the lack of articles betrays the Latin origin of the text. They are not found in any ancient version except the Latin. They were absent from the Old Latin text used by Tertullian, Cyprian, and Augustine, and from Jerome's Vulg. They were first quoted as part of I John by the Spanish heretic Priscillian, who died in 385. At a later date they were accepted into the Vulg. and thus eventually into the Complutensian Polyglot of 1514. Erasmus excluded them from his 1516 edition but promised to restore them if one Greek MS could be found to support them. The late Codex Britannicus was produced, and he reluctantly admitted the disputed verse into his edition of 1522. It was accepted by Stephanus and so found its way into the Textus Receptus and the KJV. In 1897, Leo XIII, acting on the advice of a committee of cardinals, declared that no Roman Catholic might deny or even call in question the authenticity of this comma Johanneum. This is, therefore, one of the places where there is a textual difference between the official Roman Catholic Bible and modern Protestant texts and translations of the Bible. But it must be added that since 1927 Roman Catholic scholars have been free, and have even been encouraged, to use their own judgment, and that their judgment has usually brought them into agreement at this point with Protestant scholarship. It should be noted that the RSV has not only eliminated the old vs. 7, but has renumbered the verses of the passage so as to leave no gap in the numbering.

In I John 5:18 a difference of one letter produces a very striking alteration in meaning. The KJV reads: "He that is begotten of God keepeth himself"—a reading which in 1611 had almost unqualified MS support and has since acquired the additional testimony of ℵ. There can be little doubt, however, that the true reading is that of B and the first hand of A: "He who was born of God keeps him" (i.e., Christ keeps the Christian).

Bibliography. B. F. Westcott (3rd ed., 1892). A. E. Brooke, ICC (1912), is the fullest treatment and indispensable for scholarly study. H. Windisch, Handbuch zum NT (2nd ed., 1930). C. H. Dodd, Moffatt NT Commentary (1946), is the most illuminating. J. Bonsirven, Verbum Salutus, IX (3rd ed., 1956). A. N. Wilder, IB, vol. XII (1957). G. B. CAIRD

JOHN, REVELATION TO. See REVELATION, BOOK OF.

JOHN MARK. See MARK.

JOHN SON OF ZEBEDEE. See JOHN THE APOSTLE.

JOHN THE APOSTLE. Son of Zebedee and brother of James. The clearest information concerning the apostle John is found in the Synoptic gospels and in Acts and Galatians. Disputed data are derived from the Gospel and Letters of John and the book of Revelation, and also from later church tradition.

1. The Synoptic gospels. Here it is clear that John, like his father, Zebedee, and his brother James, was a fisherman on the Sea of Galilee (Matt. 4:21-22; Mark 1:19-20; Luke 5:10 adds that James and John "were partners with Simon" Peter). A comparison of Matt. 27:56 with Mark 15:40 suggests that their mother's name was Salome. Mark's reference to "hired servants" implies that the family was well-to-do, and Mark 1:21 implies that the family residence was in or near Capernaum. When the sons of Zebedee are mentioned by name, John is usually named second; from this it would seem that he was younger than James. These two brothers Jesus called early in his ministry in Galilee; only Peter and Andrew were called earlier, and the calls were almost simultaneous.

John was chosen by Jesus as one of the Twelve (Matt. 10:2; Mark 3:17; Luke 6:14), and he was one of the three apostles who were closest to Jesus. These three, Peter and the two sons of Zebedee, were present when Jesus raised the daughter of Jairus from the dead (Mark 5:37; Luke 8:51), when Jesus was transfigured (Matt. 17:1; Mark 9:2; Luke 9:28), and when Jesus went apart to pray in Gethsemane (Matt. 26:37; Mark 14:33).

Luke 9:54 tells that when Jesus and his disciples left Galilee for Jerusalem and a Samaritan village refused to welcome them, James and John wished to "bid fire come down from heaven and consume them," but were rebuked by Jesus. On another occasion John told Jesus that he and the other disciples had rebuked a man who, though not a member of Jesus' group, was casting out demons in the name of Jesus (Mark 9:38; Luke 9:49); Jesus, however, condemned John's narrow zeal. The sons of Zebedee, according to Mark 10:35-41 (Matt. 20:20-24 ascribes the request to their mother), asked Jesus for the highest rank among his followers in the final kingdom, and in response to a question by Jesus, declared their readiness to "drink the cup" and "be baptized with the baptism" of martyrdom, which martyrdom Jesus then predicted they would suffer. Such events throw light upon the statement of Mark 3:17 that Jesus gave to the sons of Zebedee the surname BOANERGES—i.e., "sons of thunder." They had a tendency to be severe and aggressive. Perhaps they did not relish being second to Peter, but this suggestion should not be pushed too far, for in Luke 22:8 Jesus sends Peter and John together to prepare the Passover, and these two appear together in the apostolic age.

2. Acts and Galatians. The apostle John is mentioned in three passages in Acts, and in all three he is associated with Peter. The list of the Eleven in the upper room at Jerusalem names John second, immediately after Peter (1:13). Peter and John went up together to the temple at the hour of prayer, and met the lame beggar, who was healed at the word of Peter; after a crowd had gathered and Peter had preached to them, Peter and John were arrested, imprisoned overnight, examined and threatened by the Jewish leaders, and released (chs. 3–4). Peter and John were sent to Samaria to see whether the conversions under the ministry of Philip, one of the Seven, were genuine; from Samaria they returned to Jerusalem (8:14-25). In both stories Peter is the spokesman and leader of the two; no word or act of John alone is mentioned. After the visit to Samaria there is no suggestion that Peter and John worked again as a team of two.

James the brother of John was executed by Herod Agrippa I (12:2), but Acts gives no indication that this persecution affected John directly, and John is assumed to have been present at the council in ch. 15.

Paul mentions the apostle John but once (Gal. 2:9). In telling of his conference with the Christian leaders at Jerusalem, he names as the outstanding three "who were reputed to be pillars" James (the brother of the Lord), Cephas (Peter), and John. Here again John is associated with Peter; he is an outstanding leader at Jerusalem but apparently not so influential as James or Cephas; and he is prominent in the Christian mission to Jews rather than in the Gentile mission. Thus the explicit NT references to John end with this glimpse of him residing at Jerusalem, active in the church there, and concerned with the preaching of the gospel to his fellow Jews.

3. The "Johannine" writings. According to church tradition, the apostle John wrote the Gospel of John; I, II, and III John; and Revelation. The book of Revelation is the only one of these five writings which names its author (the titles of the books in English Bibles were added later). Its author calls himself Christ's "servant John" (1:1), gives his name as John when he addresses his letters to the seven churches (1:4), calls himself the brother of Christians suffering for their faith and states that he was on the island of PATMOS when he saw the vision he records (1:9), and speaks of his role as that of prophet and of his writing as a book of prophecy (10:11; 22:6-10, 18-19). He does not call himself an apostle or give any clear statement concerning his exact identity.

In the opening words of II and III John the writer calls himself "the elder." He speaks with a note of authority, but does not give his name or call himself an apostle. The completely anonymous I John implies in 1:1-4 that its author had been a personal companion of Jesus during Jesus' earthly ministry. It may be possible to understand that "we" in these verses is a reference to all Christians, as some scholars have claimed, but by far the more natural interpretation of these verses is that which takes the "we" to refer to all the actual eyewitnesses of Jesus' ministry or to the apostolic circle of the Twelve or simply to the writer, who in this case uses the editorial "we" to refer solely to himself. One thing is clear: the writer does not identify himself by name.

The Gospel of John likewise refrains from naming its author. Moreover, it never mentions the apostle John by name, although the Appendix (ch. 21) states that the "sons of Zebedee" were among seven disciples to whom the risen Jesus appeared by the Sea of Tiberias (vs. 2). That the gospel rests on the witness of a Palestinian Jew, whose Greek reflects an Aramaic background, is widely recognized. The claim to be an eyewitness appears to be made in 1:14; 19:35, and is made in behalf of the witness in 21:24. If the original Greek for "first" in 1:41 were πρῶτος, this verse would imply that Andrew was the first of the two hearers of Jesus to bring his own brother (Peter) to Jesus, and then the other hearer brought his brother; since James and John the sons of Zebedee were the only other pair of brothers among the Twelve, this could mean that John was the unnamed other hearer of Jesus and at once brought his brother James to Jesus. But the better Greek text for "first" in 1:41 seems to be πρῶτον, which means that the first thing Andrew did was to bring his brother to Jesus; this verse then says nothing of the identity or action of the unnamed other hearer of Jesus.

Whether the apostle John appears in this gospel or was the witness and writer depends mainly upon the identity of the BELOVED DISCIPLE. He appears only at the Last Supper, where he "was lying close to the breast of Jesus" and at a signal from Peter asked who would betray him (13:23-26); at the Cross, where Jesus committed his mother to the Beloved Disciple, who "from that hour . . . took her to his own home" (19:26-27); at the resurrection site, to which he and Peter ran on hearing the tomb was empty, and where he "saw and believed" (20:2-10); and by the Sea of Tiberias, where he first recognized the risen Jesus standing on the beach (21:7), and Jesus said of him that it was no concern of Peter's whether this Beloved Disciple survived until the Lord's return—a saying that apparently caused perplexity in the church when the Beloved Disciple died (21:20-23). The group of disciples responsible for adding the Appendix (ch. 21) to the gospel credit the testimony and writing of the gospel to the Beloved Disciple (21:24).

If we assume that the Gospel of John was written to be intelligible when read as an independent document, we can only conclude that the Beloved Disciple was Lazarus of Bethany. Jesus' love for Lazarus is emphasized in 11:3, 5, 11, 36; Lazarus appears with Jesus at a supper in 12:2; the Beloved Disciple appears at the Last Supper with Jesus a few days later (13:23); and Lazarus is the only man named in this gospel who is thus described as loved by Jesus. Moreover, Lazarus of Bethany would fit well as the source for this Judea-centered gospel; his resurrection in ch. 11 is the climax of Jesus' ministry and embodies the theme of life, which dominates the gospel; it is fitting that he, having been raised from the dead, should first realize that Jesus was risen (20:8) and first recognize the risen Jesus by the Sea of Tiberias (21:7); and Lazarus, who had died and been raised, is the one disciple concerning whom the report might most easily have found credence that he was not to die (21:22-23). The Appendix may be a stage in a process by which the Beloved Disciple was identified with the apostle John, but even the Appendix, read in connection with the gospel, still points to Lazarus as the Beloved Disciple.

The challenge to this conclusion comes, not from this gospel, but from other writings. In the Synoptic gospels and Acts, where the Twelve play a more prominent role than they do in the Gospel of John, Peter and John appear closely related, and this is especially true in Luke and Acts. This recalls that Peter and the Beloved Disciple are related in a similar way in the Gospel of John, a parallel which suggests that John is the Beloved Disciple. The apostle John is one of the three most closely associated with Jesus in the Synoptic gospels, and is the only one of these three who could be identified with the Beloved Disciple. It seems a bit strange to identify the Beloved Disciple and author of the Gospel of John as one of the aggressive "sons of thunder" of the Synoptic gospels; this makes the "son of thunder" an advocate of love as the keynote of Christian living; but it has been argued that John was transformed by his association with Christ, and that traces of his thunderlike temperament survive in the Gospel and Letters of John, as well as in the book of Revelation.

4. Later tradition. The dominant church tradition states that the apostle John moved to Ephesus after years of leadership at Jerusalem, and there wrote the five writings known as Johannine. He is said to have lived to old age and to have died a natural death at Ephesus. However, there is a strong and early tradition that he once was banished to the island of PATMOS, although Eusebius states that he returned to Ephesus and lived until the time of Trajan (Hist. III.18.1; 20.9; 23.4). A number of stories tell of his life in Asia Minor; according to Apollonius, he raised a dead man at Ephesus (Euseb. Hist. V.18.14); Clement of Alexandria tells how in the region near Ephesus he reclaimed a robber for Christ (What Rich Man Can Be Saved? 42); Irenaeus tells that he opposed the heretic Cerinthus (Her. III.3.4); and in his old age, when too weak to speak with his former vigor, he is said to have been carried to meetings of Christians and to have said repeatedly, "Little children, love one another" (Jerome Commentary on Galatians 6.10).

The key witness for the Ephesian residence of John is Irenaeus. He claims explicitly (Her. III.3.4; V.33.4) that through Polycarp and Papias he has direct reports of the presence and work of John in the Ephesian region. He goes into detail concerning his hearing of these things from Polycarp when he (Irenaeus) was "still a boy" (Euseb. Hist. V.20.5). The testimony of Irenaeus became the accepted tradition of the church.

The ancient tradition, however, is more complex than this might suggest. Other reports, not all of them in conflict with the tradition of a long residence in Ephesus, must be taken into account. Tertullian says that John went to Rome, "was plunged, unhurt, into boiling oil, and then exiled on an island" (Presc. Her. 36). Polycrates of Ephesus, who confirms John's Ephesian residence, adds that John was a "priest, wearing the sacerdotal plate" (see Euseb. Hist. V.24.3); this would suggest priestly origin for this John. The Muratorian Fragment (ll. 9-23) states that John was with the rest of the apostles when he was led to write his gospel; this, if true, would suggest a date while the other apostles were alive and would favor Palestine as the place of writing.

A more serious challenge to the Irenaeus tradition is the statement found in a medieval copy of the writing of the ninth-century George the Sinner and in an eighth-century fragment of an epitome of the Chronicle by the fifth-century Philip of Side; the statement is that both sons of Zebedee were martyred. This report, which would imply that John was martyred instead of going to Ephesus and living to old age, recalls Mark 10:39, and has some support in church calendars which list John among Christian martyrs. But the balance of evidence is against this tradition, which may be due to a confusion of the apostle John with John the Baptist, who was martyred.

It is puzzling that Polycarp and especially Ignatius in his Letter to the Ephesians, ch. 12, do not refer to John as a leader at Ephesus. Ignatius speaks of Paul but not of John.

An added difficulty is that all five Johannine books are ascribed to one John, and such common authorship is highly improbable. But unless this common authorship is accepted, there is something radically wrong with the ancient tradition. This does not exclude Ephesian residence for John, but the earliest explicit testimony as to authorship is the statement by Justin Martyr (Dial. 81) that the apostle John wrote the book of Revelation. This would raise a question as to whether John could have written the gospel and the letters.

There was dispute about the authorship of the Gospel of John in the second century. It is reported that Gaius of Rome and a group called the Alogi denied its apostolic authorship, and Hippolytus, at the end of the second century, wrote at Rome a work called In Defense of the Gospel and Revelation of John. This defense implies that the Johannine authorship had been questioned.

The testimony of Papias is much debated. While Irenaeus claims that Papias "was a hearer of John," Eusebius states flatly that "Papias himself, in the preface to his discourses, makes it plain that he was in no sense a hearer and eye-witness of the holy apostles" (Hist. III.39.2). Eusebius goes on to quote Papias, who distinguishes between (the apostle) John and "John the Elder" (Hist. III.39.4). Some have denied that Papias speaks of two Johns, but his words as quoted, and certainly as understood by Eusebius, seem to refer to two Johns. In that case, II John 1 and III John 1 could favor the Elder as author of the gospel and the Johannine letters. In any event, if Irenaeus was wrong, as appears to be the case, in reporting that Papias heard the apostle John, the force of his testimony is considerably weakened. He appears to confuse James the Lord's brother with James the son of Zebedee (Iren. Her. III.12.15), and Polycrates of Ephesus seems to have confused Philip the apostle and Philip one of the Seven (Euseb. Hist. III.39.9). In other words, we note a tendency to identify as one of the apostles another person of the same name.

Such data do not disprove the Ephesian residence of the apostle John. There is considerable strength to the tradition for that residence. But a number of opposing items clearly exist, and the ancient advocates of the tradition tended to claim too much. If the Ephesian residence is accepted, this does not necessarily carry with it authorship by John of any particular Johannine writing. The tradition for apostolic authorship of the book of Revelation is earliest, and the author of this book, whether an apostle or not, was certainly named John. The author of II and III John, who probably wrote the Gospel of John and I John, calls himself "the elder," which could mean the elder John mentioned by Papias or some other prominent elder. The apostle John could have been the source of the witness recorded in the Gospel of John, or his connection with the gospel could have been a confusion in developing church tradition. The Ephesian residence of the apostle John and the apostolic authorship of part of the five Johannine writings are traditions with strength, but are confronted by opposing traditions which cannot be ignored, and no final conclusion on these questions is now attainable.

See also JOHN, LETTERS OF; JOHN, GOSPEL OF; REVELATION, BOOK OF.

Bibliography. I. T. Beckwith, The Apocalypse of John (1919), pp. 343-94; C. F. Nolloth, The Fourth Evangelist (1925); J. H. Bernard, The Gospel According to St. John (1929), I, xxxiv-lxxviii; B. H. Streeter, The Four Gospels (4th ed., 1930), chs. 15-16; B. W. Bacon, The Gospel of the Hellenists (1933), pp. 3-132; W. Michaelis, Einleitung in das Neue Testament (1946), pp. 89-117, 298-300, 303-4, 315-19; F. C. Grant, The Gospels: Their Origin and Growth (1957), ch. 12. F. V. FILSON

JOHN THE BAPTIST [Ἰωάννης ὁ βαπτίζων]. A prophet of priestly descent, whose mother, Elizabeth, was related to Mary the mother of Jesus. John lived in Judea and had close contacts with the wilderness, where he began his public ministry by proclaiming a baptism of repentance for the forgiveness of sins. Multitudes came to be baptized by John in the River Jordan, among them Jesus himself. Later John was arrested, imprisoned, and finally executed by Herod Antipas. The disciples of John formed a "Baptist" community, which continued to exist long after his death. (The term "Baptist" will be used in this special sense throughout this article.) Apparently the community produced a literature of its own. Fragments of Baptist literature are preserved in the Synoptic gospel tradition.

The historical reconstruction of what can be known about John the Baptist will be preceded by a literary and historical analysis of our sources of information.

A. Literary-historical analysis of sources
1. The Synoptic gospels
a. Baptist sources
b. Christian sources
i. Q
ii. Mark
iii. M
iv. L
2. John
3. Acts
4. Josephus
B. Historical reconstruction
1. Historical background
2. The wilderness of Judea
3. John's teaching
a. Tax collectors
b. Soldiers
4. John's baptism
5. John's death
6. John the Baptist and Jesus
Bibliography

A. LITERARY-HISTORICAL ANALYSIS OF SOURCES. John the Baptist is mentioned by Josephus and certain NT writers. Most of our information about John in the NT is derived from tradition preserved in the Synoptic gospels. However, there are important references to the Baptist in the Fourth Gospel, and he is also mentioned in Acts.

1. The Synoptic gospels. Information about John the Baptist contained in the Synoptic gospels has come from two different kinds of sources, which should be distinguished: Baptist and Christian.

a. Baptist sources. Paul Winter has shown that Luke 1:5-80 was originally a Baptist document. It was an infancy narrative concerning John. It has been adopted as an introduction to the birth narrative of Jesus, which begins at 2:1. Luke 1:26-46*a* constitutes the single major interpolation in this Baptist document. 1:25 is followed very well by 1:46*b*, and except for vs. 56 the narrative is uninterrupted by further Christian interpolation. It is quite possible, however, that vs. 25 is also secondary, in which case we should proceed directly from vs. 24 to vs. 46*b*. The question is unsettled as to whether vss. 26-46*a* contain material originally found in the Baptist document but now modified by the Christian interpolater, or whether they are wholly secondary.

This Baptist document can be reconstructed as follows: Luke 1:5-24 or 25, 46*b*-55, 57-80. From this source, which contains a great deal of legendary material about John, we may glean the following historically reliable information: John was of priestly descent. His father, a priest of the division of Abijah, was named Zechariah, and his mother Elizabeth (vs. 5). John was born in Judea (vs. 65), and as a youth he had close contacts with the wilderness (vs. 80). We may further infer from the document itself that John's influence did not perish with his death, but rather that he was remembered and honored by a community which regarded him as a messianic forerunner, if not the Messiah. This Baptist community probably produced other literature in which further traditions concerning John were incorporated.

Whatever were the intermediate stages in the development of the Baptist tradition as it has come to us through the gospels, it may be doubted whether these writings contain any reliable information concerning John in the period prior to his baptism of Jesus that has not come originally from Baptist sources. It follows that a comparative study of the relevant passages in Matthew, Mark, and Luke should enable us to reconstruct the most probable form of this Baptist tradition. Such a study produces the following information: John began his ministry in the wilderness (Matt. 3:1; Mark 1:4; Luke 3:2). He proclaimed the judgment of God and called for Israel to repent of its sins. Great numbers of people came to him from Jerusalem and the country of Judea, as well as all the region about the Jordan (Matt. 3:5; Mark 1:5*a;* Luke 3:3, 7). Many of these responded to his message and were baptized by John in the Jordan River, confessing their sins (Matt. 3:6; Mark 1:5*b*). The judgment of God was imminent, and the need for repentance was urgent, for the wrath of God was about to be poured out upon all the unrighteous (Matt. 3:7-10, 11*b*-12; Luke 3:7-9, 16*b*-17).

John's baptism was accompanied by ethical exhortation. "He who has two coats, let him share with him who has none; and he who has food, let him do likewise" (Luke 3:10). Specific instructions were given to meet the exigencies of the moment. Tax collectors were to collect no more than was appointed to them (3:12-13). Soldiers were to be content with their army rations and to refrain from improving their lot at the expense of helpless civilians (3:14). In their present form these ethical teachings no doubt reflect the needs of the primitive Baptist community, which faced the problems which confronted the early Christian church—namely, the delayed consummation of the eschaton and the consequent necessity of giving advice to those who, while awaiting the consummation of the eschaton, still had to face the stern realities of finding daily food and other necessities of life. It is not possible to say to what extent these teachings are from John. They underline John's acknowledged concern for righteousness (cf. Matt. 21:32; Mark 6:20; Jos. Antiq. XVIII.v.2). Perhaps these teachings reflect the kind of charges which John leveled against the people: "You brood of vipers, who warned you to flee from the wrath to come?" You who have two coats do not share with your brothers who have none! You who collect taxes, collect more than is appointed to you! You men under arms are not content with your rations, so you fall upon helpless people! Or perhaps John's teachings reflect his picture of a corrupt society which would soon be swept away—a society characterized by inequality of wealth, oppressive taxation, and abuse of power.

John promised that he would be followed in time by one "mightier" than he, whose sandals he was "not worthy to stoop down and untie" (Mark 1:7; cf. Matt. 3:11; Luke 3:16). It has been assumed that these words were early Christian polemic designed to show the superiority of Jesus over John. But it is possible that this passage belonged originally to a Baptist document in which the coming One referred to was an eschatological figure like the apocalyptic Son of man. Or possibly it referred to the Lord (God) himself, whose way was being prepared in the wilderness through the work of John in accordance with the words of Isaiah (Isa. 40:3; cf. Matt. 3:3; Mark 1:3; Luke 3:4; John 1:23, 27).

In Mark 6:17-29 we may be once again in touch with material which originated in Baptist circles. This passage refers to the circumstances surrounding the arrest, imprisonment, and execution of John. According to this source of information, John had charged that it was unlawful for Herod to live with the wife of his brother Philip (vs. 18). This woman (Herodias) had a grudge against John and wanted to kill him (vs. 19). But Herod feared John, knowing that he was a righteous man and holy, so he kept John safe (vs. 20). Then follows a legendary account of how Herodias used a dance by her daughter to entrap Herod into pronouncing the death sentence (vss. 21-26). This account does not exonerate Herod, for he still bears the responsibility for having issued the order of execution (vs. 27). Furthermore, to picture this oriental monarch allowing his stepdaughter to dance before his guests (vs. 22) was not calculated to improve Herod's reputation. Therefore, this source is definitely not pro-Herodian. Why then would it picture Herod as reluctant to execute John? The answer is probably the same as the answer to the question of why the gospel tradition represents Pilate as being reluctant to execute Jesus. There was, apparently, among the disciples of John as well as among the disciples of Jesus, a reluctance to acknowledge the fact that their teachers had been executed because they were believed by the authorities to constitute a threat to the state as potential leaders of insurrection. The passage closes with an account of the execution—John was beheaded in prison by a soldier (vs. 27), and when John's disciples heard of the execution, "they came and took his body, and laid it in a tomb" (vs. 29).

We may glean from this passage the following information as historically reliable: (a) John was arrested, imprisoned for a period, and finally executed by Herod Antipas; (b) John's disciples were allowed to take his body and give it proper burial; (c) these disciples remembered and passed on to others what they had seen and what they had done, thus accounting for the origin of the authentic tradition about John which has been preserved in this account; (d) it most likely would have been within the Baptist community that these traditions were woven together with other traditions about Herod Antipas' family and court life to form this legendary story.

It should be noted that Matthew parallels Mark, including the story in his gospel (Matt. 14:3-12). But Luke does not include it. Instead, he preserves only a very brief statement which eliminates most of the legendary material, but adds nothing new (Luke 3: 19-20). Possibly Luke did not include the passage as a whole because he recognized some of the difficulties entailed in accommodating certain details in this story with information provided in the histories of Josephus.

b. Christian sources. Traditions about John the Baptist originating in Christian circles (including disciples of John who later became disciples of Jesus) are found in all three Synoptic gospels.

i. Q. Q stands for a hypothetical source of Christian tradition about Jesus which is found in both Matthew and Luke. This source included at least one rather extended passage containing valuable information about John and Jesus' attitude toward him. This passage, preserved in Matt. 11:2-19; Luke 7:18-35, is itself a compilation of heterogeneous literary units which have been placed together because they all contain some reference to John. Three of these literary units are clearly discernible: (a) Matt. 11:2-6 (Luke 7:18-23); (b) Matt. 11:7-11 (Luke 7:24-28); (c) Matt. 11:16-19 (Luke 7:31-35).

Matt. 11:2-6 (Luke 7:18-23): John, who is in prison, sends his disciples to Jesus to inquire: "Are you he who is to come, or shall we look for another?" The reply of Jesus, a paraphrase of Isa. 29:18-19, reflects the christological concern of the primitive church and may be late. But the saying with which the pericope ends: "Blessed is he who takes no offense at me," may well be an authentic logion of Jesus. If an actual incident in the ministry of Jesus is reflected here, we may observe the following: (a) While in prison, John continued to exert his influence in national affairs through his disciples; (b) these disciples are distinguishable from the disciples of Jesus, though not hostile to them or to Jesus; (c) there was a continuing relationship between Jesus and John. John was concerned about the intent and purpose of Jesus, and Jesus was mindful of John's interest in him.

Matt. 11:7-11 (Luke 7:24-28): This literary unit may be analyzed in four parts:

a) Matt. 11:7-9 (Luke 7:24-26): "What did you go out into the wilderness to behold? A reed shaken by the wind? . . . to see a man clothed in soft raiment? . . . Why then did you go out? To see a prophet? Yes, I tell you, and more than a prophet." This saying may be regarded as an authentic utterance of Jesus, since it is opposed to a later Christian tendency to depreciate John. To refer to John as Jesus does here indicates that those who had been to the wilderness to see John held a continuing interest in, and regard for, the Baptist. That they are no longer in the wilderness may mean that John has been arrested. Jesus withdrew when John was arrested (Matt. 4:12; Mark 1:14). Because the first two questions are ironical, we may surmise the following: (a) John was not the kind of man to break under pressure—not a "reed shaken by the wind" (probably a reference to his spirited resistance to Herod even while in prison); (b) John was a man of austere dress (in contrast to those who lived in luxury in Herod's household?).

b) Matt. 11:10 (Luke 7:27): This is a loose quotation of Mal. 3:1 and is generally regarded as a later insert into Q.

c) Matt. 11:11*a* (Luke 7:28*a*): "I say to you, among those born of women there has risen no one greater than John the Baptist." Taken with the first two verses of this pericope, this saying constitutes the strongest kind of endorsement of John. Jesus speaks of John as of one with whom he was closely allied and with whom he seems to feel a strong sense of solidarity.

d) Matt. 11:11*b* (Luke 7:28*b*): "Yet he who is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he." This is commonly regarded as a later addition. But it may form, with the saying which precedes it, a single depreciatory unit. It does not depreciate John in particular. Rather, it depreciates all men in general (of whom John represents the best) in relation to those men in particular who enter the kingdom.

Matt. 11:16-19 (Luke 7:31-35): John is mentioned only in the second half of this pericope: "John came neither eating nor drinking, and they say, 'He has a demon'; the Son of man came eating and drinking, and they say, 'Behold, a glutton and a drunkard, a friend of tax collectors and sinners!' " (Matt. 11:18-19*b*). These verses reflect a situation in the primitive Palestinian church when Christians could protest against the fickleness and inconsistency of the nation in its refusal to accept either John or Jesus. The charge that John had a demon is, no doubt, an authentic tradition. The same charge was leveled against Jesus by those who rejected him (John 7:20; 8:48; 10:20). The charge that Jesus was a glutton (ψάγος) and a drunkard (οἰνοπότης) refers, not to excessive eating and drinking, but to his unlawful eating with tax collectors and sinners who did not observe all the dietary regulations. Translated literally, ἄνθρωπος φάγος καὶ οἰνοπότης means a "man who eats and drinks"—i.e., one who eats and drinks with those who do not keep the law, the tax collectors and sinners. "John came neither eating nor drinking" means that, unlike Jesus, John did not eat with tax collectors and sinners.

The expanded version in Luke 7:33: "John the Baptist has come eating no bread and drinking no wine," is later. It represents an early attempt to interpret the words "neither eating nor drinking" (which, taken literally, are nonsensical) in the light of other traditions about John—i.e., that he had been dedicated as a Nazarite, to whom wine was forbidden (Luke 1:15), and that he lived on an austere diet of locusts and wild honey (Mark 1:6). However, neither these traditions nor Jewish practice in general can be cited to support a prohibition against eating bread.

A comparison of Matthew and Luke indicates that in Q, located between the above-mentioned second and third literary units, there was an additional pericope. Matt. 11:12-14 reads: "From the days of John the Baptist until now the kingdom of heaven has suffered violence, and men of violence take it by force. For all the prophets and the law prophesied until John; and if you are willing to accept it, he is Elijah who is to come." It is clear that John marked the end of one era and the beginning of a new one. But in what way the kingdom has suffered violence, and who the men of violence are who take the kingdom by force, is one of the unsolved mysteries of gospel criticism. The parallel passage in Luke 16:16 only makes the exegetical problem more difficult.

ii. Mark. Mark 1:6 preserves the tradition that John was clothed with camel's hair and wore a leather girdle around his waist, and that he ate locusts and wild honey. John's mode of existence was not primarily that of an ascetic, but that of a legal purist. The food he ate was both ceremonially clean (Lev. 11:21-22) and available in the wilderness, where life was uncontaminated by the legal impurity of life in the towns and cities. This passage is preserved also in Matt. 3:4, but not in the same order as in Mark. There is no reason to doubt its historical authenticity.

Mark 1:14 suggests that the arrest of John was the occasion for Jesus to go to Galilee. The parallel passage in Matthew explicitly says that "when he [Jesus] heard that John had been arrested, he withdrew into Galilee" (Matt. 4:12). It is possible that the imprisonment of John and his subsequent execution had a more determinative effect upon the course of Jesus' ministry than is suggested by the surface impression given in the gospels.

In Mark 2:18 (Matt. 9:14; Luke 5:33) Jesus is asked: "Why do John's disciples and the disciples of the Pharisees fast, but your disciples do not fast?" Luke's fuller version of the question: ". . . fast often and offer prayers," is probably a Lukan expansion made in the light of the tradition that John taught his disciples to pray (Luke 11:1). The question as found in Mark is probably historically genuine, and is important because it informs us, not only that John's disciples fasted, but also that their religious practice paralleled, in this respect, that of the Pharisees.

Mark preserves the tradition that some believed Jesus was John the Baptist raised from the dead (Mark 6:14; 8:28; cf. Matt. 14:1-2; 16:14; Luke 9:7, 19), and that Jesus believed John to be Elijah (Mark 9:12-13; cf. Matt. 17:12-13).

Mark 11:30-32 (Matt. 21:23-27; Luke 20:1-8) records that when Jesus asked the chief priests and elders whether John's baptism was from heaven or from men, they hesitated to answer, because they were afraid of the people, who all held that John was a true prophet. If this is an authentic tradition, as it seems to be, then "the people" were probably mostly former supporters of John now looking to Jesus for leadership. Jesus' act of cleansing the temple would have appeared as a bold messianic act, in complete accord with the priestly concern of John for righteousness.

iii. M. In M, source material peculiar to Matthew, the following logion of Jesus is found: "Truly I say to you, the tax collectors and the harlots go into the kingdom of God before you. For John came to you in the way of righteousness, and you did not believe him, but the tax collectors and the harlots believed him; and even when you saw it, you did not afterward repent and believe him" (Matt. 21:31-32). A parallel passage in Luke 7:29-30 reads "all the people" instead of "harlots." This is more in accord with the usual expression "tax collectors and sinners" (Mark 2:15-16 [Matt. 9:10-11; Luke 5:29-30]; Q: Matt. 11:19; Luke 7:34; L: Luke 15:1), and indicates that "harlots" may have been used metaphorically. In the OT, "harlotry" is used figuratively of improper intercourse with foreign nations (Isa. 23:17; Ezek. 16:26-28; 23:30, 43; Nah. 3:4).

iv. L. In material found only in Luke, sometimes designated L, there are three passages which refer to John:

a) Luke 3:19-20 may be dependent on Mark 6:17-18. It adds nothing new.

b) Luke 7:29-30 preserves a tradition that all the people and the tax collectors justified God when they heard Jesus speak about John, because they had been baptized by John. This implies that many of Jesus' hearers were previously disciples of John.

c) In Luke 11:1 we read that the disciples of Jesus made the following request: "Lord, teach us to pray, as John taught his disciples." This request not only indicates that John taught his disciples to pray, but it also suggests the possibility that in Jesus' response to this request we may be in touch with tradition which preserves in outline a Baptist catechesis on prayer.

2. John. In the first chapter of the Fourth Gospel, John the Baptist is mentioned several times. By a literary device he is made to function as a christological spokesman for the early church: "I am not the Christ" (vs. 20); "I came baptizing with water, that he might be revealed to Israel" (vs. 31); "I have seen and have borne witness that this is the Son of God" (vs. 34; cf. 5:33-36).

John baptized at Bethany E of the Jordan (1:28; cf. 10:40), and at Aenon near Salim (3:23). Bethany has been identified with a site in Perea not far from where a main highway leading from Jerusalem to Transjordan crosses the river. Aenon, meaning "springs," is probably to be located near the headwaters of Wadi Far'ah, where there are numerous springs providing an abundant supply of water. This site is only a few miles from Jacob's well in the direction of the Jordan Valley.

John 10:40-41 represents Jesus returning to the place E of the Jordan where John first baptized. There he remained and was accepted by many as a successor of the Baptist. If historical, this incident probably took place after John's arrest. It may reflect an early Christian attempt to woo into the church disciples of John still living near John's first headquarters.

3. Acts. Acts 11:16 may preserve an original logion of Jesus: "John baptized with water, but you shall be baptized with the Holy Spirit" (cf. 1:5).

Acts 1:22; 10:36-37; 13:24 mention John but add nothing to our knowledge about him.

Acts 19:1-7 gives an account of an incident in Ephesus when Paul found twelve men who had received only the baptism of John. Their rebaptism is evidence that the church faced aggressively the problem of a competing messianic community which had sprung from the ministry and martyrdom of John. It is this situation of rivalry in the early church which accounts for the rigorous subordination of John to Jesus in certain NT passages: "After me comes he . . . whose sandals I am not worthy to stoop down and untie" (Matt. 3:11; Mark 1:7; Luke 3:16; John 1:27; Acts 13:25); "he who comes after me ranks before me" (John 1:15); "he must increase, but I must decrease" (John 3:30; cf. 5:36).

To what extent this rivalry can be traced back to a rivalry between Jesus and John or to their first disciples is difficult to decide. The fact that Jesus had been a disciple of John was an embarrassment to the early church, but there is no evidence that it was an embarrassment to Jesus or to his first disciples. Rather, it seems to have worked in Jesus' favor when he dealt with crowds peopled by the disciples of John. But after the death of Jesus the disciples of John could no longer regard Jesus as the historical bearer of John's message and work. This placed Jesus and John on equal footing as martyred teachers. Those disciples of John who became Christians confessed Jesus to be the Messiah and adopted the view that John was the forerunner. Those disciples of John who did not become Christians resented this relegation of their founder to a secondary role. This resentment aggravated the delicate relationship between the two rival communities and eventually led to the polemical situation reflected in the secondary material in the gospel tradition.

4. Josephus. The single passage from Antiq. XVIII.v.2 is here given in full: "But some of the Jews believed that Herod's army was destroyed by God, God punishing him very justly for John called the Baptist, whom Herod had put to death. For John was a pious man, and he was bidding the Jews who practiced virtue and exercised righteousness toward each other and piety toward God, to come together for baptism. For thus, it seemed to him, would baptismal ablution be acceptable, if it were used not to beg off from sins committed, but for the purification of the body when the soul had previously been cleansed by righteous conduct. And when everybody turned to John—for they were profoundly stirred by what he said—Herod feared that John's so extensive influence over the people might lead to an uprising (for the people seemed likely to do everything he might counsel). He thought it much better, under the circumstances, to get John out of the way in advance, before any insurrection might develop, than for himself to get into trouble and be sorry not to have acted, once an insurrection had begun. So because of Herod's suspicion, John was sent as a prisoner to Macherus, the fortress already mentioned, and there put to death. But the Jews believed that the destruction which overtook the army came as a punishment for Herod, God wishing to do him harm." [1]

In the light of this passage three points may be made: (a) John's imprisonment and execution took place in the Maccabean-Herodian mountain fortress Macherus, near the Dead Sea on the S border of Perea. (b) John was arrested because Herod feared the political consequences of his popularity. This does not preclude the factor of personal resentment against John on the part of members of Herod's family. Any charges he may have made against immorality or riotous living in court circles were subject to being interpreted as incitement to insurrection, since such charges would have tended to undermine confidence in Herod's right to rule. (c) John's memory was honored by some Jews long after his death, for some believed that Herod's defeat was a sign of divine retribution for his unjust execution of John.

Although not a direct source for John the Baptist, another passage in Josephus (Life 2), is so pertinent as to merit quotation: "On hearing of one named Bannus, who dwelt in the wilderness, wearing only such clothing as trees provided, feeding on such things as grew of themselves, and using frequent ablutions of cold water, by day and night, for purity's sake, I became a zealous disciple of him."

This passage is of primary importance in considering the peculiarities of John's dress, diet, and practice of water baptism. They are perfectly explicable in terms of a wilderness sojourn for one concerned with strict obedience to the purity laws of Moses as interpreted in first-century Judaism.

B. HISTORICAL RECONSTRUCTION. 1. Historical background. John the Baptist steps forth on the scene of history as a prophet proclaiming the eschatological day of the Lord. In obedience to the words of Isaiah, John was in the wilderness crying: "Prepare the way of the LORD, make straight in the desert a highway for our God." Of priestly origins, he stands in the prophetic tradition of Elijah, who was expected by the Jews to return and play an important role in the ushering in of the messianic age. John's simple dress and ritually pure diet bespoke his rejection of the corrupt society of his time and his strict adherence to the laws of Moses.

The "sons of Abraham" had been disinherited. The Promised Land was occupied by the legions of Rome, and the chief priests in the temple had "no king but Caesar" (John 19:15). The chief priests, like Herod Antipas, held their offices at the pleasure of their Roman masters.

God had promised Israel the land and political sovereignty (Deut. 15:6). The prophets and seers of Israel had written of a day of judgment when God's wrath would be poured out upon the wicked and his promises fulfilled to the righteous. These divine promises and sacred writings constituted the basis upon which were raised the peoples' hopes for the coming of the kingdom of God.

This would mean deliverance from the clutches of the Gentiles. From the point of view of the righteous, who were zealous for the covenant, those apostate

[1] Reprinted by permission of the publishers and The Loeb Classical Library from Loeb Classical Library Volume: Josephus Antiquities (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1930, 1957).

Jews who had gone over to the side of the Gentiles, such as the chief priests and the supporters of Herod Antipas, had sold their inheritance for a "mess of pottage." They were like a "brood of vipers." In the Day of Wrath they would be baptized with a baptism of fire and be utterly destroyed. Their laxness in observing the laws of Moses, as well as the presence of the Gentiles in the land, rendered life in the cities and towns unclean.

The alternatives for the righteous were limited. Some escaped the unclean and corrupt life of the cities and towns by withdrawing into the wilderness and separating themselves from all impurity. Others banded together and remained in the towns and cities, maintaining their purity by complicated and highly refined systems of ritual washing. However, the vast majority of Jews, either voluntarily or by virtue of their occupations, were inexorably entangled in the web of impurity which was woven into the fabric of political, economic, and social life under the conditions of Gentile occupation. The importance of this fact will be more fully developed in connection with the meaning of John's baptism.

2. The wilderness of Judea. The wilderness of Judea was the center of religious hope as well as a place of refuge. It was the symbol of the wilderness in which God had tabernacled with his people for forty years before bringing them into the Promised Land. In the wilderness the way of the Lord was to be made straight, and some believed the Messiah would first appear here (Matt. 24:23-26).

The DSS community was living in the heart of this wilderness. There they were preparing the way for the Lord's coming through the study of the law and strict obedience to all that had been revealed to the prophets. United by a priestly discipline, the community constituted a "holy of holies" in which, through sacrifices of praise and perfect obedience, atonement was made for the guilt of transgressions, and for the purification of the land. Set apart in this way, the community served as a house of holiness for the priests and a house of community for the Israelites who were obedient to the law until the coming of the Day of the Lord. This day would be marked by the appearance of two messianic figures, an anointed priest and an anointed king for Israel (1QS 8.15; 9.11). See DEAD SEA SCROLLS.

Thus the stage is set, and one can understand the excitement which swept through the towns and cities of Judea with the advent of the news that a young priest, an Elijah, was baptizing in the wilderness. The King Messiah would soon appear, and the Day of Judgment was about to be ushered in.

3. John's teaching. As the multitudes from Jerusalem and the country around Judea flocked to him in the wilderness, John cried out: "You brood of vipers! Who warned you to flee from the wrath to come? Bear fruit that befits repentance."

The radical character of John's ethical teaching is often not fully appreciated. His injunction to share clothing and food strikes at the very heart of an acquisitive society and indicates that John advocated a kind of eschatological brotherhood, perhaps similar to that practiced in Essene communities.

John had been in the wilderness since childhood and no doubt was acquainted with Essene thought and practice. It is known that some Essene communities adopted boys, and it is quite likely that John's childhood in the wilderness was spent with some such religious community.

A strict legalist, John, like the Essenes and Pharisees, refused to eat with those who failed to observe the Mosaic purity laws. The chief offenders in this regard were the tax collectors, whose unrighteous mammon made their well-laden tables doubly offensive. Nonetheless, these people went to hear John. They repented and were baptized by him.

a. Tax collectors. The tax collector was the most obvious agent of collaboration at the local level. He was not a despised social outcast, as is sometimes believed. He could be one of the leading laymen of a synagogue, and could render his fellow Jews important services by virtue of his influence with the Roman officials (Jos. War II.xiv.2-5). But the prevailing system of tax collection encouraged greed and unfairness on the part of the collectors.

The requirement that tax collectors refrain from collecting more than was appointed to them would have set them at odds with the social and economic structures of which they were a part. It would have resulted in a radical reduction in their standard of living and necessitated serious economic and social readjustments on the part of their families. Furthermore, it would have required a complete reorientation of their motivation in accepting the responsibilities of their office. Because, once the prospect of becoming rich has been removed, few would want to continue the onerous duties of collecting unpopular taxes from a resentful people. Especially so when the money directly or indirectly supported the occupation forces and the concomitant collaborating bureaucracy.

b. Soldiers. At the opposite extreme from the tax collectors were the fiery patriots known as Zealots. Because of their refusal to render taxes unto Caesar, these men were forced to hide in caves in the mountains and in the wilderness in order to save their lives. The soldiers who came to hear John are usually assumed to have been under Herod's command, but they may have been part of an organized Jewish resistance to Rome, active ever since the Roman census for taxation was made in A.D. 6. Josephus writes that the seditious ferment which was set in motion in those early years of Roman occupation, when Judea was first made a province of the Empire, increased till at last the entire nation was caught up in the fever of rebellion in A.D. 66.

Jesus numbered among his closest disciples both a tax collector and a Zealot, and there is no reason to think that the response to John's preaching was less inclusive of the social, economic, and political extremes within Israel. These zealous patriot groups sustained themselves in part by forcibly expropriating the property of Gentiles and collaborating Jews. Their abuse of this practice was so widespread that Jesus could take for granted that his hearers would immediately feel themselves involved when he told his parable concerning the good Samaritan. To travel from Jerusalem to Jericho carried one through the very heart of the Judean wilderness. Only a few miles from this road lived the militant but well-disciplined DSS community, which was constrained to include the following restrictive order for its zealous members: "Let no man put forth his hand to shed the blood of a man of the Gentiles for the sake of property and gain; also let him not carry off anything of their property" (Zadokite Document 12.6-7). John's exhortation to the soldiers who came to him is in the same vein: "Rob no one by violence or by false accusation, and be content with your wages." The DSS community qualified their restrictive order by adding "except by the decision of an Israelite court." What is prohibited is unwarranted, privately initiated pillaging. Neither the DSS community nor John forbade organized military efforts to obtain food and supplies. Nevertheless, in an occupation situation, to require that a member of a resistance force voluntarily be content with his military rations, when it was within his power to ameliorate his austere life by forcibly expropriating food and property from the more comfortable, collaborating elements in the population, was to make a very radical ethical demand. It is safe to assume that the cutting edge of Jesus' social teaching was not blunted by his association with John in the wilderness.

4. John's baptism. In addition to the background depicted in § A2 above, the baptism of John is to be seen more particularly in the light of contemporary Jewish ritual bathing. These baths were for the purpose of cleansing the believer from ritual defilement.

Ceremonial washing was widespread in the ancient world, but it is probable that Jewish ritual bathing in the first century was primarily a development of more ancient Jewish practice in the postexilic period. E.g., in Lev. 15 several different forms of bodily discharge (some quite normal), which render the person temporarily unclean, are dealt with. Bathing in water is prescribed to effect ritual purity. Since they were not members of the Mosaic covenant, Gentiles were not bound by such laws. Nonetheless, from the point of view of the strict Jew, Gentiles were virtually in a continuous state of uncleanness. Any contact with a Gentile was as defiling as contact with an unclean Israelite. The dwellings of Gentiles, their lands, and, for some scrupulous Jews, even the air above their lands constituted threatening sources of defilement.

Under the early Maccabees, Judea and its temple had been established as an island of purity in a sea of Gentile uncleanness. But by the beginning of the first century the waters of this sea had gradually encroached on this island until only the forbidding wastelands of the Judean wilderness were left untouched.

The Dead Sea Scroll entitled "The War of the Sons of Light and the Sons of Darkness" reflects the kind of militant eschatological thinking current in the wilderness of Judea in the days of John. According to this document, men are involved in a great cosmic struggle between Light and Darkness. The Children of Light are those obedient to Mosaic law. The Children of Darkness, under the command of Belial, are the Romans and those apostate Jews who do not observe the laws of Moses. Victory was assured to the Children of Light because the God of the Covenant was the Lord of the heavenly hosts.

However, those angelic warriors of the Lord would not abide in the camps of the Children of Light unless these camps were free from all impurity. Therefore, ritual purity baths for all recruits were essential to ensure the assistance of those heavenly battalions so necessary to gain the victory over the otherwise overwhelmingly more powerful armies of Rome.

Within this context, John may be seen as a prophet declaring the advent of this great eschatological conflict. Every son of Abraham was called forth to be a volunteer for the Lord. He must not complacently say, "I have Abraham for my father." He must renounce all uncleanness and unrighteousness and henceforth, in perfect obedience to God, stand ready to march against the forces of Darkness.

John's baptism thus may be seen as an eschatological plenary cleansing of the individual from all ritual defilement; a rite of purification which made it possible for the baptized to take his place within the ranks of the Children of Light. From this point of view, John's baptism would have been a part of, and possibly the high moment in, a ceremony of initiation into a "new covenant" community—an eschatological community which awaited expectantly the advent of the One to Come whom God would quickly send to lead the Children of Light to victory over Belial and his forces of Darkness. Possibly, as seems to have been the case in the DSS "new covenant" community, the effectiveness of John's baptism was conditional upon repentance. It certainly was accompanied by repentance and confession of sins, and was undertaken in a context of ethical exhortation.

5. John's death. It need not be supposed that Herod Antipas and the authorities in Judea were unaware of the danger to their own security which such messianic eschatological belief and activity represented. The beliefs themselves could not be stamped out. But any individual in whom these beliefs were popularly centered could be arrested and imprisoned, and, if need be, put to death. Those who rejected John's message with the charge "He has a demon" could be counted on to give tacit approval to John's arrest and imprisonment, if not his capital punishment. And John's indictment of Herod for his illicit marriage to Herodias would have weighed against him, as his fate was being decided in the court of Herod.

John's execution as recorded in the gospels and by Josephus is perfectly intelligible in the light of our knowledge about conditions in Palestine at that time. And a consideration of John's treatment at the hands of the authorities throws light on otherwise obscure aspects of Jesus' ministry and passion.

6. John the Baptist and Jesus. Jesus had been baptized by John in the Jordan River. Following his baptism, Jesus remained in the wilderness. The forty-day period of the gospels is to be taken figuratively to represent a period of waiting upon the Lord, a period of temptation and discipline corresponding to the forty-year period of preparation Israel spent in the wilderness before entering the Promised Land.

John had been active in widely separated parts of the wilderness. At one time he was E of the Jordan near the main highway running from Jericho to Transjordan. At another time he penetrated northwestward into Samaria and baptized within a few miles of its well-populated towns. Furthermore, some who had been baptized by John were contemporaneously active in other parts of the wilderness. Jesus was preaching and his disciples were baptizing in Judea while John was in Samaria. John had initiated a movement, therefore, which, from the point of view of the authorities, was widespread and growing at an alarming rate.

Consequently, his incarceration in the remote military stronghold of Macherus in the extreme S of Perea may be viewed as a prudent step to stop a menacing messianic movement by removing its instigator as far as possible from the multitudes which flocked to hear him.

The arrest of John must have had a profound effect upon those who had been baptized by him. No doubt, many returned to their homes to await developments. Some stationed themselves near Macherus and kept in touch with their leader. Jesus returned to Galilee and began immediately to preach in its synagogues. This constituted a defiant answer to the repressive measures of the "fox" Herod Antipas. Many who had been baptized by John heard Jesus gladly, and some saw in him the one who was to come to lead Israel into the kingdom.

Through his disciples, John maintained contact with Jesus and followed his activities carefully. His question to Jesus: "Are you he who is to come, or shall we look for another?" indicates that, though in prison, John had not relinquished his role as a guiding hand in Israel's preparation for the eschatological struggle.

John was no "reed shaken by the wind," and his imprisonment failed to thwart his exercising continuing influence in the affairs of the nation. From the point of view of the authorities, it was more expedient for one to die than for the whole nation to perish in some uprising which the Romans were certain to crush (cf. John 11:48-50). But the execution, which was designed to achieve John's political end, turned into a martyrdom, which only stimulated the expectant imagination of the Jewish populace. After his disciples laid his body in a tomb, they continued to wait for the consummation of God's purpose, and while they waited, they fasted and prayed as John had taught them.

Jesus' decision that he too must suffer and die at the hands of wicked men and his determination to set his face steadfast toward Jerusalem may have been in part a response to the news of John's death. Certainly his forthright act in cleansing the temple was in accord with John's priestly concerns. So closely were their ministries associated in popular thinking that some had thought Jesus to be John the Baptist raised from the dead. When the chief priests and elders challenged his authority, Jesus confounded them by asking where John's authority had come from. Thus, at the end as well as at the beginning of his ministry, Jesus publicly identified himself with John. A sufficient number of those gathered in Jerusalem that Passover believed John to have been a true prophet, that the chief priests and elders maintained a discreet silence, rather than risk the wrath of the pilgrims by denying that John's authority was from God.

Clearly, the influence of John did not cease with his death. Six years later the army of Herod Antipas suffered defeat at the hands of the Nabateans. Josephus writes that this defeat was regarded by some Jews as a sign of divine punishment for Herod's unjust treatment of John. There are many indications that disciples of the Baptist continued to exist during the early centuries of this era. John's denial that he is the Messiah, in the gospel tradition, is too strong to permit any doubt that some of his disciples claimed for him messianic rank. In the Clementine Recognitions the statement is found that "one of John's disciples declared John to be the Messiah and not Jesus" (I.60). There is a small Baptist sect alive in Mesopotamia today known as the Mandeans, which claims to perpetuate the movement begun by John the Baptist.

Within the Christian church, John's role, from the earliest times, has been recognized as that of "forerunner." In a quite literal sense, John was the historical figure who ran "before" Jesus. In spite of the later rivalry between their disciples, the memory of the historical solidarity between John and Jesus was never lost. With the passing of time, the polemical need for Christians to minimize the significance of this solidarity has gone. Quite to the contrary, with the rise of modern historical research, a firm grasp of the significance of this solidarity has become an essential first step toward an understanding of the mission and message of Jesus.

Bibliography. For a comprehensive critical study with exhaustive bibliographical references, see C. H. Kraeling, John the Baptist (1951). But see also R. J. Hutcheon, ed., Studies in the NT: Collected Papers of Clayton R. Bowen (1936), pp. 30-76.

On light shed on John the Baptist by the Dead Sea Scrolls, see B. Reicke, "Nytt ljus över Johannes döparens förkunnelse," Religion och Bibel, XI (1952), 5-18. W. H. Brownlee, "John the Baptist in the New Light of Ancient Scrolls," The Scrolls and the NT (1957), pp. 33-53.

On Luke 1:1-80 being based on a Baptist source, see Kraeling, p. 16. P. Winter, "The Proto-Source of Luke I," Novum Testamentum, vol. I, fasc. 3 (1956).

On the topographical identification of "Aenon near Salim" (John 3:23), see W. F. Albright, "Recent Discoveries in Palestine and the Gospel of St. John," The Background of the NT and Its Eschatology (1956), p. 159.

On the background of John's diet of locusts and wild honey (Mark 1:6), see Elijah of Wilna's compilation of "The Rules of Uncleanness," found in H. Danby's translation of the Mishnah (1933), p. 802, 14*c* and 16*e*. And on the uncleanness of Gentiles, see p. 801, 10; p. 803, 19*b*, 19*d*, and 20*b*.

W. R. FARMER

JOHN THE DIVINE, DISCOURSE OF SAINT. A Greek version of the ASSUMPTION OF THE VIRGIN.

JOHN THE EVANGELIST, BOOK OF. A writing used by the Albigenses and commonly regarded as stemming from the Bogomiles. It is in the form of a series of questions and answers propounded to Jesus by "John your brother and partaker in tribulation . . . while I lay on the breast of our Lord Jesus Christ." This pattern—questions propounded by a disciple or disciples to the Lord in the interim after the Resurrection—is very common. Not only is it to be found in the Gospel (Questions) of Bartholomew (see BARTHOLOMEW, GOSPEL OF), but also in many very early Gnostic writings, in part preserved in the Coptic Berlin Papyrus (Codex Berolinensis) and in the many Gnostic texts discovered in 1946 at Chenoboskion in Egypt (see APOCRYPHA, NT).

This present writing is not only of the same general pattern but evidences the same dualism characteristic of both the Gnostics and Marcion. The world was created, not by God, but by Satan, who had fallen from his place of glory and had seduced many other angels. Christ was not born of Mary, who was an angel sent to earth "to receive him." Rather, he "entered in by the ear and came forth by the ear" of Mary. John the Baptist was sent by Satan; his disciples (catholic Christians) are not disciples of Christ. Baptism and apparently—the text at this point is defective—the Lord's Supper are valueless. True disciples of Christ, unlike those of John the Baptist, do not marry.

This curious little late edition of standard Gnostic theology ends with an account of the Last Judgment so conventional and free from heresy as to suggest it has been severely tampered with.

The writing is preserved only in Latin, and in its present form is not earlier than the twelfth century, although its original may well be as early as the seventh century.

Bibliography. The Latin text is to be found in J. C. Thilo, Codex Apocryphus NT (1832). A convenient English translation is available in M. R. James, The Apocryphal NT (1924), pp. 187-93. M. S. ENSLIN

JOIADA joi'ə də [יויד, Yahu knows, abbreviation of יהויד, Jehoiada]. Alternately: JEHOIADA jĭ hoi'ə də (Neh. 13:28; Neh. 3:6 KJV). 1. Son of Paseah, and a builder of the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. 3:6).

2. A postexilic high priest; son of ELIASHIB 2 and father of JOHANAN 9 (cf. JEHOHANAN 4; JONATHAN 12); a contemporary of Nehemiah (Neh. 12:10-11, 22; 13:28). Some scholars find in "Johanan the son of Eliashib" (Neh. 12:23; cf. Ezra 10:6; I Esd. 9:1) an indication that Johanan was Joiada's brother, not his son; but this is needless, since "son of Eliashib" could apply to a grandson—i.e., Johanan. J. M. WARD

JOIAKIM joi'ə kĭm [יויקים, Yahu raises up, abbreviation of יהויקים, Jehoiakim] (Neh. 12:10, 12, 26). A postexilic high priest; son of JESHUA 5 and father of ELIASHIB 2.

JOIARIB joi'ə rĭb [יהויריב, may Yahu contend]. Alternately: JEHOIARIB jĭ hoi'— [יוריב] (I Chr. 9:10; 24:7). 1. A priest in the time of David (I Chr. 24:7).

2. One of those who assisted Ezra in securing temple servants before the return to Palestine (Ezra 8:16); perhaps to be identified with Jarib in the same verse. The name is not found in the parallel in I Esd. 8:44.

3. The name of a priestly house (undoubtedly related to 1 above) that lived in Jerusalem after the Exile (I Chr. 9:10). It is specifically mentioned during the time of Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:6), the high priest Joiakim (12:19), and Nehemiah (11:10).

4. A Judahite ancestor of Maaseiah who lived in Jerusalem after the Exile (Neh. 11:5). M. NEWMAN

JOKDEAM jŏk'dĭ əm [יקדעם] (Josh. 15:56). A village of Judah in the hill-country district of Maon; possibly identifiable with Khirbet Raqa', near Ziph. The LXX B reads JORKEAM, which may be the more original, and which appears in I Chr. 2:44.

JOKIM jō'kĭm [יוקים, probably for יויקים, may Yahu establish; see JOIAKIM] (I Chr. 4:22). A descendant of Judah.

JOKMEAM jŏk'mĭ əm [יקמעם]. 1. A Levitical city in Ephraim (I Chr. 6:68—H 6:53). A parallel passage in Josh. 21:22 has KIBZAIM, and both cities may have originally been at this point in the list.

2. A city of Zebulun (I Kings 4:12); identical with JOKNEAM. W. L. REED

JOKNEAM jŏk'nĭ əm [יקנעם]. Alternately: JOKMEAM jŏk'mĭ əm [יקמעם] (I Kings 4:12). A Levitical town near the border in Zebulun (Josh. 19:11; 21:34). Jokneam is identified with Tell Qeimun (Fig. JOK 23), a mound situated on the N slopes of the Carmel Range approximately seven miles NW of Megiddo, overlooking the Valley of Jezreel. The site is strategically located at the junction of two important routes. One is the chief route through the Valley of Jezreel from Acco to Megiddo, Taanach, and Jenin; the other is the first and lowest pass E of Mount Carmel through the Carmel Range, connecting the Plain of Sharon and the Valley of Jezreel.

Courtesy of Herbert G. May

23. Jokneam (modern Tell Qeimun)

Jokneam is number 113 in the list of towns taken by Thutmose III; it is spelled 'nqn'm in Egyptian; the 'n at the beginning, which means "spring," perhaps refers to the good springs located just E of the mound. According to Josh. 12:22, the town fell to Joshua during the Conquest. Jokneam, corruptly spelled "Jokmeam," was later included in Solomon's fifth administrative district (I Kings 4:12).

Bibliography. C. R. Conder and H. H. Kitchener, SWP, II (1882), 169-70; W. F. Albright, "Contributions to the Historical Geography of Palestine," AASOR, 2-3 (1923), 24, note 10; W. F. Albright, "Review of Abel Géographie . . . II," JBL, 58 (1939), 184; D. Baly, The Geography of the Bible (1956), pp. 115, 151, 153. G. W. VAN BEEK

JOKSHAN jŏk'shăn [יקשן] (Gen. 25:2-3; I Chr. 1:32). A son of Abraham and Keturah, and the father of Sheba and Dedan. It has been suggested that this name is merely the Hebrew equivalent of Joktan in another genealogy (Gen. 10:25), but the equation is phonologically difficult. S. COHEN

JOKTAN jŏk'tăn [יקטן, younger son(?); cf. Arab. Yaqtân, from be watchful]. The younger son of Eber, and the brother of Peleg. His descendants represent a number of Arabian groups (Gen. 10:25-29; I Chr.

1:19-23). These comprise the aboriginal inhabitants of the country, in contrast to the later immigrants, the children of Abraham by Hagar and Keturah. Arabic historians of the Islamic period have tried to identify Joktan with Kahtan, a character of Arab legend, but the consonants are not the same in the Semitic alphabet.

The thirteen peoples enumerated as descendants of Joktan are reported to have lived in the territory which extended from the district of Mesha, in the N part of Arabia, to the mountain of the East, in the S part. The first four names, which include Hazarmaweth (Hadramaut), were evidently located along the coast that faces the Indian Ocean; others may have been in Yemen, while the remainder occupied the area farther N. S. COHEN

JOKTHEEL jŏk'thĭ əl [יקתאל]. 1. A village of Judah in the S Shephelah district of Lachish (Josh. 15:38). Some commentators would read "Joktheel" for "Eshtaol" in vs. 33 also. The site is unknown.

2. When Amaziah of Judah (ca. 800-783) completed his Edomite campaign by storming SELA (Umm el-Bayyarah), the ancient Edomite stronghold, he changed its name to Joktheel (II Kings 14:7). It is of interest to note that when he fled from a conspiracy against him, Amaziah went to Lachish, near which the Joktheel of Josh. 15:38 was located. V. R. GOLD

JONA jō'nə. KJV form of JOHN (5) in John 1:42.

JONADAB jō'nə dăb [יונדב, Yahu is liberal, or Yahu is noble, or Yahu has impelled]. Alternately: JEHONADAB jĭ hō'nə dăb [יהונדב] (II Sam. 13:5; II Kings 10:15, 23; Jer. 35:8, 14, 16, 18). 1. A nephew of David; son of Shimeah. He was the shrewd friend of David's son Amnon who devised the plan whereby the latter tragically seduced his half sister Tamar (II Sam. 13:3, 5). When Tamar's brother Absalom avenged her defilement by killing Amnon, Jonadab corrected a false report brought to David to the effect that Absalom had slain all David's other sons (vss. 32-36). He may have been the man, called Jonathan son of Shimei, who slew one of the Gittite "giants" (II Sam. 21:21; I Chr. 20:7).

2. Son of Rechab, and first of the ultraconservative Rechabites who advocated and maintained an austere antiagriculturalist tradition during the period of the monarchy (II Kings 10:15, 23; Jer. 35:6-19). He was a sympathizer with the bloody reform of Jehu and accompanied him in the final purge of the syncretistic house of Ahab. This group was descended from the Kenites and the Calebites (I Chr. 2:55; 4:11-12), and some of its prohibitions resembled those of the NAZIRITE.

Bibliography. J. A. Montgomery, The Books of Kings, ICC (1951), pp. 409-10. J. M. WARD

JONAH jō'nə [יונה, dove; Ἰωνάς]; KJV Apoc. and NT JONAS —nəs. 1. Son of Amittai (II Kings 14:25), from Gath-hepher of Zebulun. He was a prophet, but the dates of his activity cannot be ascertained. He foretold the restoration of the territory of the N kingdom, from the entrance of Hamath to the Sea of the Arabah (see DEAD SEA)—which, incidentally, were the ideal boundaries for Israel (cf. Amos 6:14). Jeroboam II of Israel successfully recovered these territories and thus fulfilled Jonah's prediction. Later, a prophetic mission to Nineveh was also attributed to this prophet, and on this account he became the central figure of the book of Jonah. See JONAH, BOOK OF. S. SZIKSZAI

2. One of the Levites who were found by Ezra to have foreign wives at the return from the Exile (I Esd. 9:23). In the canonical list at Ezra 10:23 he is called Eliezer.

JONAH, BOOK OF [יונה; Ἰωνᾶς]. The fifth in the collection of short books which form the concluding section of the OT and which are generally known as the Twelve Prophets. It differs from the other eleven in being a story about a prophet rather than a book of prophetic utterances, and its contents, or part of them, are probably more familiar to the world at large than most other OT writings. Unfortunately this notoriety is not based on the intrinsic merit of the book itself, and it is a sad reflection of our misunderstanding of its purpose that a story which has so much of the spirit of the gospel in it should be generally thought of as a story about "a whale" (the text has: "a great fish"), either to be dismissed as ridiculous or to be defended as a proof of our orthodoxy.

The book is now mostly held to have been written ca. the fourth century B.C. by an unknown writer who shared the view of Second Isaiah that God's concern for man was not confined to the Jews but was as wide as the world itself. About that time in Jerusalem, Nehemiah and Ezra (see EZRA AND NEHEMIAH, BOOKS OF) had been pursuing their policy of racial exclusiveness, narrow nationalism, and religious intolerance in a misguided attempt to preserve the unique heritage of the Jewish faith. The book of Jonah, like the book of RUTH, is designed as a counterblast to that policy. Its message is that the real vocation of Israel as the people of God is to spread the good news of God's love among the Gentiles, and not to hoard its religious legacy. The book of Jonah is thus to be reckoned among those OT writings which come closest to the spirit of the Christian gospel.

See map "Palestine: Joel, Obadiah, Jonah," under OBADIAH, BOOK OF.

1. The reluctant prophet
2. The book as a historical narrative
3. Some difficulties
   a. The problem of the miraculous
   b. The problem of Nineveh
   c. The problem of language and form
   d. The problem of Jesus' use of Jonah
   e. The problem of the date
4. The book as an allegory
5. The book as a parable
6. The psalm (2:2-9)

Bibliography

1. The reluctant prophet. The chief character of the book is JONAH the son of Amittai, who is further described in II Kings 14:25 as a prophet from Gath-hepher, near Nazareth, who correctly predicted that Jeroboam II would reconquer from Syria large tracts of territory previously held by Israel. This prophet is summoned by Yahweh to set out for NINEVEH, the capital of Assyria, which not only represented the oppressive power of the war lords of the Near East, but, like Babylon and Rome in later years, was also regarded by Jews of the stricter sort as a synonym for the worst infamies, vicious practices, blasphemy, and irreligion of the Gentile world (cf. Nah. 3).

Jonah's mission to Nineveh is to proclaim the judgment of Yahweh upon it, but the prophet, for reasons which are not disclosed until later in the story, is unwilling to fulfil his assignment. At Joppa he boards a ship bound for TARSHISH, which lay in precisely the opposite direction at the other end of the Mediterranean, hoping thus to escape from Yahweh. Yahweh, however, causes a great storm to arise which threatens to wreck the ship. The pagan sailors invoke the aid of their various gods and throw tackle and cargo overboard. Meantime Jonah, asleep in the hold, is discovered by the captain, who is shocked to find that he is not saying his prayers like the rest, and orders him forthwith to beseech whatever god he believes in to save them all from their peril.

The crew now proceed to draw lots to discover which of them has provoked the gods to such wrath, and Jonah is revealed as the culprit. He discloses his identity and declares himself to be a worshiper of Yahweh, albeit a disobedient one. He admits that it is because of his attempt to escape the obligation laid upon him by Yahweh that the tempest has come upon them all and adds that their only hope lies in throwing him overboard, whereupon the storm will cease. Pagans though they are, the sailors shrink from such a deed and try their hardest to row the ship back to land. But the storm intensifies until at length, with a prayer to Yahweh to save them and to hold them guiltless of the death of his prophet, they throw Jonah into the sea. At once the storm subsides, and the grateful sailors offer an appropriate sacrifice.

Jonah is not to be allowed to escape his mission by death. Yahweh has arranged that a great fish should swallow him and convey him safely to land. After a sojourn of three days and three nights in the belly of the fish, during which time he composes a hymn of thanksgiving for deliverance, Jonah is spewed out on the seashore. Tradition identifies the spot as the "Gate of Jonah" near Alexandretta. For the second time Yahweh commands him to fulfil his mission to denounce the people of Nineveh for their sinful ways, and this time Jonah obeys. He enters this vast city, which takes three days to cross, and at the end of the first day he publicly pronounces Nineveh's impending doom. The effect is instantaneous. The whole city turns to Yahweh and dons the garments of penitence. Even the king of Nineveh joins in this act of devotion and issues a proclamation declaring a general fast for man and beast, and enjoining the wearing of sackcloth for all inhabitants and their cattle (cf. Jth. 4:10), in the hope that Yahweh's wrath may yet be averted.

Moved by this mass conversion, Yahweh stays his hand, and thereby arouses the bitter anger of his prophet, who now discloses the reason why he has sought to evade his original mission. He admits that it was because he knew that Yahweh is a gracious and compassionate God who would be ready to forgive the Ninevites if they turned from their evil ways. His real fear was that the hated Gentiles would not be destroyed after all. Now that his worst premonitions have been realized, Jonah prays for death rather than live to see the Gentiles admitted to Yahweh's favor. Twitted by Yahweh for his petulance, the prophet leaves the city and takes up a position outside it, building himself a flimsy shelter and sulkily hoping against hope for Nineveh's destruction. Then Yahweh causes a large plant, perhaps a castor-oil plant, to spring up overnight; the prophet welcomes it as a shelter from the burning heat of the sun. But no sooner is the plant ready to serve its purpose than Yahweh causes it to be destroyed by a grub. When the sun beats down upon him next morning, assisted by a sirocco—likewise part of Yahweh's plan—the unhappy prophet faints with sunstroke and again asks Yahweh to put him out of his misery.

Yahweh now sees that Jonah is ripe for his final lesson. The apparently senseless destruction of the young plant, to whose creation and growth he contributed nothing, has angered and saddened him, awakening the first symptoms of human sympathy so far displayed in his unattractive nature. Yahweh therefore poses his last question: If you can find it in your heart to have pity on this hapless plant, ought not I to take pity on this great pagan city with its teeming thousands of little children and its helpless dumb creatures as well?

There, abruptly but perfectly, the story ends. The unlovely character of the dour, recalcitrant Hebrew prophet is finely contrasted with the humane and charitable Gentile sailors, and the readiness of the pagan city to respond to the proclamation of the truth about God and his will for man. Yahweh, having issued his initial command to the prophet to pronounce his judgment upon Nineveh, assumes the role of a deus ex machina until the final denouement, when he emerges as the merciful Creator and Father of all men, a conception as lofty as any in the OT.

2. The book as a historical narrative. The story of Jonah may be regarded as history, allegory, or parable, and all three views have found support. It will be most convenient to examine these in turn and then to consider the psalm (2:2-9) separately.

There are various arguments for accepting the book as a historical narrative: (a) Jonah the son of Amittai (II Kings 14:25) was clearly a historical figure in the reign of Jeroboam II (ca. 786-746 B.C.), and the author appears to recount these events as biographical. (b) Jesus (Matt. 12:39-41) speaks of Jonah's sojourn for three days and three nights in the "belly of the whale" as a prefiguring of his own state between the Crucifixion and the Resurrection. He seems to regard the mass repentance of the people of Nineveh as a historical fact. (c) The mission of Jonah to pagan Nineveh is paralleled by similar missions to Sidon and Syria by his immediate predecessors, Elijah and Elisha, and the miraculous features largely in the lives of all three prophets (I Kings 17-19; II Kings 2-9). (d) It is only relatively recently that there has been any suggestion that the book is other than historical narrative, and solutions which differ from the traditional explanation appear to have originated in an attempt to placate incredulous scientists who refused to swallow the whale.

If the narrative is regarded as historical, we should assume a date somewhere between the reign of Jeroboam II and the fall of Nineveh in 612, presumably earlier rather than later—i.e., eighth century B.C.—and an author who, although not necessarily the prophet himself, derived his information from the prophet. This would account for such details as would be known only to Jonah, including his dialogue with Yahweh. The sailors, whose ship presumably returned to port, might perhaps have supplied the account of what happened when the prophet was asleep (1:5) and after he had been thrown overboard (1:16).

3. Some difficulties. a. The problem of the miraculous. The chief difficulty in accepting the story as historical is not that of believing that Jonah reached the belly of "the whale" intact, which appeared to be the main stumbling block in the science-versus-religion controversies. It is known that there are sperm whales in the Mediterranean which have gullets large enough to swallow a man whole. But we should have to believe also that the tempest subsided immediately, that the prophet emerged unscathed from the inside of the monster seventy-two hours later, and that at some point during this time he composed and uttered a psalm of thanksgiving. We have further to believe that he made his way to the center of a foreign and, no doubt, hostile city and denounced its inhabitants, somehow mysteriously knowing their language, and that, far from finding himself clapped in irons, he brought about an instantaneous mass conversion of the whole population from the king downward—of which conversion Assyria's record bears little evidence. The magic plant and the worm which destroyed it suggest the story of "Jack and the Beanstalk" or some such fairy tale rather than history. In short, it is not one miracle but a whole series of miracles that have to be accounted for.

b. The problem of Nineveh. There is further the problem of Nineveh itself, not to speak of the problem of identifying the personage called the "king of Nineveh," which is like talking of the "king of London." The phrase could hardly have been used if the Assyrian Empire had still been in existence. We are told (3:3) that it "was an exceedingly great city," which suggests that at the time of writing it was no longer in existence—i.e., that the book was written after, and not before, 612. This difficulty may be explained away by saying that the whole narrative is cast in the past tense or that this phrase is a later gloss. A more awkward problem is that of the size of the city. We are told that it was "three days' journey in breadth." But we know from archaeological excavations that the circumference of the walls of the ancient city of Nineveh was approximately eight miles. This could certainly not contain a population with 120,000 children, in those days implying probably a total of 1,000,000 inhabitants. Even if we include the neighboring cities of CALAH, REHOBOTH-IR, and RESEN (Gen. 10:11-12) as constituting an urban conglomeration, a traveler would surely have had to walk up and down every street and alley to fill up three days.

c. The problem of language and form. Apart from the Aramaisms in the language and other linguistic features which mostly suggest a postexilic date, and the almost certain dependence on Jeremiah and Joel, which would confirm it (cf. 3:10 with Jer. 18:7-8; 3:5 with Joel 1:13-14; 3:9 with Joel 2:14; 4:2 with Joel 2:13), we may well question the historical view on other grounds. Does it detract from the theological value of the book if it is not regarded as unvarnished history? Does not the OT elsewhere use the imagery and symbolism of myth, legend, allegory, and parable to convey religious truth as freely as it uses the facts of history? Does it deepen our conception of God to think of him as one who on occasion behaves rather like a music-hall magician with an inexhaustible bag of tricks? Should we not rather see this book as an imaginative fantasy, like the stories of DANIEL and Tobias (see TOBIT), which does not ask us to treat it as historical fact at all?

d. The problem of Jesus' use of Jonah. There is no real reason why Jonah the son of Amittai of II Kings should not have been a historical personage, but equally no real reason why this book should be regarded as an excerpt from his biography. Jonah was no doubt chosen by the author as a suitable peg on which to hang his tale, since what little we know of Jonah suggests that he was concerned about the prestige and expansion of Israel at the expense of the Gentiles. As for Jesus' apparent support of the historicity of the book of Jonah in Matt. 12:39-41, his comparison of Jonah's period in the belly of the whale with his own entombment is highly suspect as a Matthean interpolation. It does not occur in the Lukan parallel passage (11:29-32) and is in keeping with the First Evangelist's mechanical use of OT texts to prove that the Scriptures had been fulfilled. In refusing to perform some spectacular "sign" of his messiahship, Jesus compares his own proclamation of the kingdom with the traditional story of how Jonah proclaimed God's judgment at Nineveh, and contrasts the response of Israel to his own preaching with that of the Gentiles to Jonah. It is an illustration based on a popular story, as was his reference to the visit of the Queen of Sheba to Solomon. It is not a pronouncement on the historicity of either event.

e. The problem of the date. If, then, the story is not directly dependent on Jonah the son of Amittai, but is didactic in character, there is no obvious reason why it should date from the time of the monarchy at all. As we have seen, everything appears to point to a much later date, when the prophet of Gath-hepher and the Assyrian Empire alike were but dim memories. Accordingly the great majority of scholars regard the book as postexilic, and find its raison d'être, like that of the book of Ruth, in the situation which obtained in Palestine after the return from exile. The worthy motive of the school of Nehemiah and Ezra to protect the religious heritage of the people of God from syncretism and the infiltration of pagan standards, by attempting to reproduce in Palestine the splendid isolationism of Jewry, which had developed during the Exile, had borne bitter fruit.

When this rigid policy was developed to its logical conclusion, it meant that no member of the Jewish community might have any contact whatever with any person outside the covenant. Mixed marriages were forbidden, and marriages already contracted must be dissolved. The Jews were the people of God;

all Gentiles were to be hated and shunned. The book of Jonah therefore finds its place in the OT as the work of an unknown writer of the fourth century B.C. who, in a little tale of the lesson which Yahweh taught to a harsh and intolerant Jew, protested against this travesty of the message of Second Isaiah, and sought to persuade his countrymen that God's love is wide enough and deep enough to include the hated Gentile. Israel, like Jonah, must learn by bitter experience that Jewry has no prescriptive right to be called God's people. Several centuries later the rigorists in the Jewish-Christian section of the church had likewise to be taught that "to the Gentiles also God has granted repentance unto life" (Acts 11:18).

4. The book as an allegory. It is possible to regard the tale as a complete allegory, with each feature representing an element in Israel's experience. This is perhaps suggested by the fact that "Jonah" means a "dove," a traditional symbol of Israel (Ps. 74:19; Hos. 11:11). If this is taken as the clue, the experiences of the prophet represent the mission and failure of Israel to be the people of God. It was to be its task to bring the pagan world to the knowledge of God. Its stubborn refusal to do so, and its tendency to apply the revelation of God's love jealously to itself, was its traditional failing.

We may see in Jonah's flight to Tarshish Israel's avoidance of its mission before the Exile, turning its back upon God, embarking upon the sea of world politics in the ship of diplomatic intrigue. The storm which broke upon it and upon the Gentile world (the sailors), when the center of power moved from Assyria to Babylon, was followed, for Israel, by the exile in Babylon (the whale; cf. Jer. 51:34). Delivered from this chastening experience, Israel, having turned to God in captivity like Jonah, has the task of proclaiming its faith to its pagan neighbors in Palestine (Nineveh).

It is at this point of history that the author stands. In depicting the instantaneous conversion of the Ninevites, he suggests the readiness of Israel's neighbors to respond to the message, and in the picture of the prophet sulking in his flimsy shelter he depicts the Nehemiahs, Ezras, Joels, and Obadiahs of his day, sheltering under the precarious protection of their recently rebuilt temple, uncompromising in their hatred of the Gentiles, hoping for the apocalyptic judgment of God to fall upon them, and still unwilling to recognize the purpose of God to save the whole world and not only the Jews (cf. Ezek. 38–39, etc.).

5. The book as a parable. It is equally possible to regard the story of Jonah as simply a parable of the same type as that of the ewe lamb (II Sam. 12:1-4) or the good Samaritan (Luke 10:30-37). We should then not expect to find any precise parallelism between Israel's history and the experiences of the prophet. Many may feel that an allegorical interpretation of the story, however plausible, depends too much upon the imaginative fancies of the interpreter. But if Jonah is intended to be no more specific a character than the "certain man" of Jesus' parable, he still remains unmistakably a portrait of the narrow and intolerant Hebrew of Ezra's day, or the narrow, intolerant Christian of our own day, who refuses to face the universalistic implications of the divine revelation and its call to world mission.

Moved neither by the words nor by the works of God, he peers out upon the world from his tiny sanctuary, a forlorn, self-centered figure, clutching his faith to his bosom, while ordinary humanity, with its many likable qualities, waits ready to respond to the message of God's salvation, which his religious dogmatism makes him unwilling to share. The author ends his book with a question mark, because he does not know whether the Jewish church of his day will respond to his challenge. The question mark still stands after two thousand years of Christian history and challenges all branches of the church alike.

6. The psalm (2:2-9). The psalm, which is reminiscent of many others (cf. Pss. 5:7; 18:6; 31:22; 42:7; 120:1; 142:3; 143:4), seems to be unsuited to its present position. It is ostensibly not a prayer for deliverance, as might have been expected, but one of thanksgiving for escape from death by drowning. It would have come more appropriately, therefore, after 2:10 than after 2:1. Possibly not an original part of the book, it may have been inserted later because of the affinity of the idea of SHEOL with that of the whale's belly (2:2) and the similarity of its theme to the experience of Jonah. Most probably it was first intended to be understood figuratively as the thanksgiving of one who has been rescued from the spiritual death of estrangement from God into the living worship and fellowship of his people. Its inclusion or omission makes no difference to the point of the narrative, and most commentators would date it somewhere in the third century B.C.

Bibliography. Commentaries: J. A. Bewer, ICC (1912); R. F. Horton, Cambridge Bible; H. C. O. Lanchester, Cambridge Bible (1915); G. A. Smith, EB (1928); E. Sellin, KAT (1929); G. A. F. Knight, Torch Bible (1952); J. D. Smart, IB (1956). See also Introductions to literature of the OT by Driver, Pfeiffer, Bentzen, etc.

Special studies: H. Schmidt, Jona (1907); A. R. Johnson on Jonah 2:3-10 in H. H. Rowley, ed., Studies in OT Prophecy (1950).

W. NEIL

JONAM jō′nəm ['Ιωνάμ] (Luke 3:30); KJV JONAN —nən. An ancestor of Jesus.

JONAS. KJV form of JOHN 5; JONAH.

JONATH ELEM RECHOKIM jō′năth ē′ləm rĭ-kō′kĭm. See MUSIC § B1*c*.

JONATHAN jŏn′ə thən [יונתן; יהונתן, Yahu has given]. 1. A Levite of the tribe of Judah who served as house priest in the sanctuary which the Ephraimite Micah had established, and who later founded the priesthood which ministered to the tribe of Dan (Judg. 17–18). Jonathan, a native of Bethlehem in Judah, was invested as the resident priest of the house of Micah in the hill country of Ephraim and was supplied by his benefactor with images, ephod, teraphim, and shrine as his priestly accouterment. When a party of spies from the neighboring tribe of Dan arrived at the home of Micah on their way northward to locate a more suitable homestead, they received a favorable oracle from Jonathan regarding the success of their mission. Encouraged by the report of the spies, the Danites dispatched a vanguard of six hundred men, who on their way to Laish seized the religious paraphernalia of Micah and persuaded the rather forward Jonathan to assume the more honorable office of priest to the tribe of Dan. The sanctuary at Dan (Laish) was thus provided with a priesthood, whose founder was the son of Gershom, son of Moses (MT Manasseh, written with a suspended nun, which is generally agreed to be a Masoretic insertion in deference to Moses; see bibliography).

Bibliography. C. D. Ginsburg, Introduction to the Massoretico-critical Edition of the Hebrew Bible (1897), pp. 334 ff.

2. See JONATHAN SON OF SAUL.

3. Son of Abiathar the priest, who rendered important service to David during the rebellion of Absalom by conveying the secret plans of the enemy, but whose career appears to have been later eclipsed by his complicity with the regal ambitions of Adonijah. Jonathan was in the priestly company that brought the ark to David when he had abandoned Jerusalem. At the instance of the king, Zadok and Abiathar returned to the capital to secure information from the spy Hushai, while Jonathan and Ahimaaz, the sons of Abiathar, were stationed as couriers at En-rogel, whence they kept the king informed (II Sam. 15:24 ff). When this espionage was discovered, Jonathan and Ahimaaz fled for their lives to the camp of David at Mahanaim (II Sam. 17:17, 20).

In the closing days of David, when Adonijah invited the sons of the king and the royal officers of Judah to En-rogel to a sacrificial feast, which was certainly planned as the occasion when he would be proclaimed king, Jonathan brought back to the festal gathering the disconcerting news that Solomon had secured the succession and had been anointed in Gihon by the order of the king. Apparently Jonathan was implicated with his father in this attempt of Adonijah to secure the throne and no doubt shared the banishment of Abiathar, who was dismissed from his priestly office by Solomon (I Kings 1:42-43; 2:26-27).

4. An uncle of David. He was a sagacious counselor on the personal staff of the king, as well as the royal scribe. Since he is nowhere else mentioned, he has been identified at times with his namesake, the son of Shimei (see 5 below), and has been represented as sharing with Jehiel, son of Hachmoni, in the tutelage of the royal princes (so RSV), but in each case without sufficient warrant (I Chr. 27:32).

5. Son of Shimea or Shimei, David's brother. He slew a Philistine giant who taunted Israel at Gath (II Sam. 21:21; I Chr. 20:7).

6. Son of Shammah—or, less likely, Shagee—the Hararite; a member of the company of the Mighty Men of David known as the "Thirty" (II Sam. 23:32; I Chr. 11:34).

7. Son of Uzziah. He was in charge of the royal treasuries of David in the cities, villages, and towers outside the capital (I Chr. 27:25; KJV JEHONATHAN).

8. The scribe or secretary whose house was converted into a prison in which Jeremiah was incarcerated many days after his apprehension on the alleged charge of desertion (Jer. 37:15, 20; 38:26).

9. KJV form (following MT) of the name of one of the two sons of Kareah; a captain of a Judean military contingent, stationed in the open country, when the Babylonians captured Judah (Jer. 40:8; RSV Johanan). The name appears to be a dittography of JOHANAN, since it is omitted in the LXX and in the parallel passage of II Kings 25:23.

10. The father of Ebed, who was head of the family of Adin and joined Ezra in his journey to Jerusalem with fifty of his clansmen (Ezra 8:6; I Esd. 8:32).

11. A priest who was the head of the priestly family of Malluchi in the days of the high priesthood of Joiakim (Neh. 12:14).

12. One of the high priests of the postexilic period, whose father was Joiada and whose son was Jaddua (Neh. 12:11). However, in this text the name Jonathan appears to be a corruption of JOHANAN, by which appellation he is called in Ezra 10:6; Neh. 12:22-23; I Esd. 9:1. In these last references he is referred to as the son of Eliashib; however, it appears best to interpret this relationship as meaning generally the descendant of Eliashib, who was actually his grandfather. Johanan is reported to have killed his brother Jesus in the temple because he feared that he might displace him in the high-priestly office with the support of the governor Bagoas (Jos. Antiq. XI.vii.1). While the tenure of his high priesthood cannot be precisely defined, it is certain that it included the years 411-408 B.C. See bibliography.

Ezra betook himself to the chamber of Johanan, where with fasting he mourned over the iniquities of the returned exiles (Ezra 10:6; I Esd. 9:1).

Bibliography. A. E. Cowley, The Aramaic Papyri of the Fifth Century B.C. (1923), nos. 30-31.

13. Son of Shemaiah and father of Zechariah, who participated with other priestly personnel as a trumpeter in the thanksgiving procession when the walls of Jerusalem were rededicated in the days of Nehemiah (Neh. 12:35).

14. Son of Asahel. He opposed the formation of the Jerusalem commission to consider the cases of the Jews who had married foreign wives in the days of Ezra (Ezra 10:15; I Esd. 9:14).

15. A descendant of the family of Jerahmeel of the tribe of Judah; a son of Jada and the father of Peleth and Zaza (I Chr. 2:32-33). E. R. DALGLISH

16. Son of MATTATHIAS 1, and one of the remarkable family under whose leadership the Jewish nation achieved independence from Syria in 166-142 B.C. Mattathias, who initiated the revolt, was succeeded by his third son, Judas Maccabeus, who was followed in turn by Jonathan (I Macc. 9:23–12:53). Upon the latter's death, yet another son of Mattathias, Simon, assumed the leader's role; and it was under his rule that the nation's freedom was finally won. See MACCABEES.

17. Son of ABSALOM 2. He was sent by Simon Maccabeus on an important errand described in I Macc. 13:11. J. KNOX

JONATHAN SON OF SAUL. King Saul's eldest son, whose filial piety and altruistic friendship with David have secured for him the admiration of posterity.

1. His military exploits at Michmash. Jonathan no doubt proved his military prowess in the liberation of Jabesh-gilead from the ultimatum of the Ammonites (I Sam. 11), for in the subsequent Philistine campaign he was placed in charge of one thousand troops, stationed at Geba (cf. I Sam. 13:2 with vs. 16), while Saul commanded two thousand men at Michmash. Jonathan initiated the war with the Philistines by liquidating the prefect (נציב) or garrison of Geba, whereupon Saul dispatched a general summons to all Israel to muster at Gilgal. The Philistines assembled meanwhile their superior forces and occupied the strategic heights of Michmash, while the intimidated Israelites failed to respond to the call to arms, and even the regular soldiers deserted the ranks, reducing the army of Saul from three thousand to six hundred men. At Michmash the Philistines posted a garrison to maintain their position and then dispersed three raiding bands to devastate the surrounding country (I Sam. 13).

It was in this dark hour that Jonathan and his armor-bearer left Geba without the knowledge of Saul and struck a telling blow against the enemy. Discovering themselves to the guard detail the Philistines had stationed above the rocky crag of Bozez, the two followed the omen which the accost of the guard furnished, and routed the garrison when they had climbed the heights. The suddenness of the onslaught combined with an earthquake (?) to throw the entire camp of the Philistines into utter confusion (I Sam. 14:1-15). When Saul saw the wild retreat of the enemy, he pursued them with his forces, now augmented by former deserters and captives, and chased the disorganized foe down to Aijalon before nightfall.

The precipitate king, however—motivated, no doubt, by religious devotion—laid an oath upon the people to abstain from food that day. Being absent from the camp, Jonathan did not hear the oath and refreshed himself with some wild honey as he pursued the enemy. When the abstinent troops informed him of the king's oath, Jonathan replied that his father had troubled Israel, in that, if they had eaten of the food spoils of the enemy, they would have had the strength to enhance the victory. The wisdom of his words was palpably demonstrated at sundown when the famished soldiers violated a religious taboo by eating cattle with their blood. That evening the oracle of Yahweh was silent when the king inquired whether he should continue to pursue the enemy during the night. The divine displeasure, adduced from the silence, was interpreted on the morrow to have been caused by Jonathan's violation of the oath. Saul would have slain his son for his unwitting error had he not been ransomed by the appreciative Israelites (I Sam. 14).

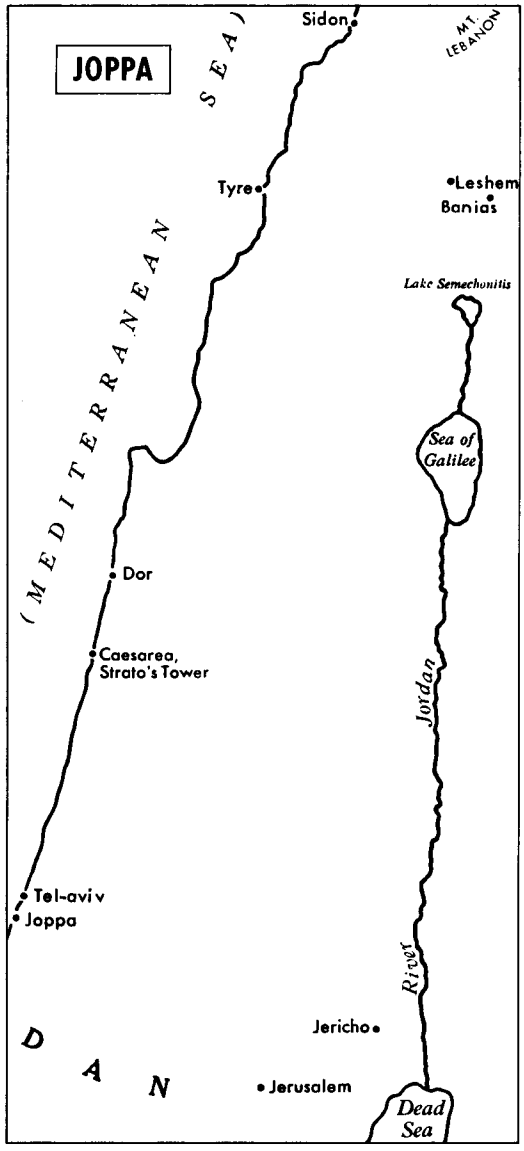
It is fair to assume that Jonathan also participated in the other campaigns of Saul, including the Moabite, Ammonite, Edomite, Amalekite, Philistine, and that against the kings of Zobah (I Sam. 14:47-48).

2. His friendship with David. After David had finished recounting to Saul the exploit of the dispatch of the Philistine giant, Jonathan loved David as his own soul and made a covenant with him, bestowing upon him his own robe and armor (I Sam. 18:1-4). The meteoric success of David in the military service of Saul ultimately proved too much for the mentally disturbed king. No longer did he conceal his intention of slaying David, but he encouraged Jonathan and the courtiers to do away with this potential supplanter. At this juncture Jonathan expostulated with his father concerning the loyal service of David and gained for him a temporary reinstatement at court (I Sam. 19:1-7). The respite was terminated suddenly when the king suffered a mental relapse, and David fled for his life to Naioth in Ramah.

When Jonathan and David next met, they formulated a plan whereby the king's attitude toward David could be ascertained. The foreboding prospect that open hostilities might jeopardize their covenant of friendship prompted Jonathan to exact an oath from David that when Yahweh would cut off all his enemies, David would show kindness to Jonathan and his posterity. At the feast of the New Moon, when Jonathan explained the disconcerting absence of David, he discovered that the hatred of his father toward David was irreparable and conveyed on the morrow this sad information to David at the appointed rendezvous (I Sam. 20).

The final meeting of the two friends was in the Wilderness of Ziph when Jonathan strengthened David's hand in God and made a covenant to the effect that David was to be the next king and Jonathan was to be his first minister (I Sam. 23:16-18).

3. His death at Mount Gilboa. Jonathan was slain in the battle at Mount Gilboa against the Philistines, where his father and his brothers, Abinadab and Malchishua, also fell. Their corpses were despoiled on the day following the battle and were exposed by the Philistines on the wall ("public square" in II Sam. 21:12) of Beth-shan. From this ignominy the royal dead were rescued by the men of Jabesh-gilead, who repaid the kindness of Saul by retrieving the bodies and burying them in Jabesh (I Sam. 31; II Sam. 2:5-7; 21:12; I Chr. 10:1-12). When the news of the Israelite debacle at Mount Gilboa reached the camp of David, it evinced the deepest expressions of grief and a moving elegy, in which David lamented the bitter irony of the fate of the king and the loss of his beloved friend Jonathan (II Sam. 1). Some years later, David reinterred the remains of Saul and his sons in the tomb of Kish in Zela of the land of Benjamin (II Sam. 21:13-14).



4. His family relations. Jonathan had one son, named Meribbaal, or Mephibosheth (see MEPHIBOSHETH 1), who was five years old when the tragedy on Mount Gilboa occurred (II Sam. 4:4). The brotherly covenant between Jonathan and David not only secured for this lame prince the lands of Saul and membership at the royal court but ultimately spared him from the doom which befell the other sons of Saul in the Gibeonite exaction (II Sam. 9; 21:7). In addition to Abinadab and Malchishua, Jonathan had a brother named ISH-BAAL (alternately called Ish-bosheth and Ishvi, a corruption of Ishyahu —I Sam. 14:49) and two sisters, Merab and Michal (I Chr. 8:33; 9:39). The name of his mother was Ahimoan; she was the daughter of Ahimaaz, and was described by Saul in an unguarded moment of furious anger as a "perverse, rebellious woman" (I Sam. 20:30).

5. His character. Swift as an eagle and strong as a lion, this crown prince of the house of Saul, a worthy son of the famed Benjaminite archers, possessed intrepidity that knew no retreat and provided inspiration for his followers. With considerable selfeffacement and amid adverse tension he proved his love for David continually. While the impetuosity and unreasonableness of Saul might furnish a foil for the gentleness and discernment of his son, Jonathan was united with his father in life, and in death they were not divided (II Sam. 1:23). E. R. DALGLISH

JONATHAS. KJV Apoc. form of JATHAN.

JOPPA jŏp'ə [יָפוֹא, יָפוֹ, יָפְוֹ, Yāphô, beauty or beautiful, cf. Egyp. and cuneiform Iapu; Phoen. יפו, יפי; Ἰόππη, from Jope, daughter of Aeolus, god of the winds]; KJV once JAPHO jā'fō (Josh. 19:46). A city thirty-five miles from Jerusalem built on a rock hill 116 feet high which projects beyond the coast line to form a small cape. Its small harbor is formed by a natural breakwater of rocks parallel to the coast line, 300-400 feet offshore. Access from the S is blocked by rocks; the narrow N entrance is shallow and treacherous. A rock ca. 10 feet high at this entrance was said to have been the one to which Andromeda was chained to be devoured by a sea monster, to appease the wrath of Poseidon, only to be rescued in the nick of time by Perseus.

It is possible that in biblical times the harbor was somewhat larger and better protected by the natural breakwater, then in better repair. While the port facilities have recently been somewhat improved, the chief port of modern Israel is Haifa on the Carmel promontory ca. fifty-five miles to the N. Modern Jaffa's (Joppa's) sister city to the N, Tell Aviv, is the cultural, social, and commercial center of modern Israel. Since Jaffa is built on the ruins of its predecessors, little excavation has been possible, and our information is based largely on literary sources.

Joppa first appears in ancient sources in the list of Palestinian cities captured by Thut-mose III (ca. 1490-1436 B.C.) and in the account of its capture at the time by Thut-mose' commander, Thoth, told in the fourteenth-century Papyrus Harris 500. During the Amarna period (mid-fourteenth century), Joppa was ruled by a native prince who needed military support from Abdu-heba, prince of Jerusalem. An Egyptian letter from the same period from a royal official, Hori, to a scribe, Amen-em-Opet, tells of the beauties of Joppa's gardens and the skill of her workers in leather, wood, and metal (ANET 475-79).

Joppa was on the N border of Dan (Josh. 19:46) until the Philistine invasion, when it became the major N city of the Philistine Plain. The Danites then migrated northward to Leshem (LAISH; Josh. 19:46 ff). Solomon apparently developed its facilities so that it became a major port serving Jerusalem. Rafts of cedar logs from Lebanon were floated to Joppa and then shipped to Jerusalem for use in the temple (II Chr. 2:16). Sennacherib listed Joppa as one of the cities he occupied in the course of his campaign of 701 (cf. II Kings 18:13 ff; II Chr. 32:1 ff; Isa. 36:1 ff; ANET 287). Jonah attempted to flee from his responsibility by embarking on a ship sailing from Joppa to Sardinia (Jonah 1:3).

Early in the Persian period, as in Solomon's day, cedar logs from Lebanon were floated to Joppa from Tyre and Sidon and then shipped to Jerusalem for use in rebuilding the temple (Ezra 3:7; I Esd. 5:55). The early-fourth-century Eshmunazar and Ben Abdas inscriptions inform us that Joppa and Dor were dependencies of Sidon and that the cult of Eshmun (=Osiris=Adonis) and Baal Gad had been established there. The cities were probably given to Eshmunazar by Artaxerxes II (ca. 404-358).

At the destruction of Sidon by Artaxerxes III (ca. 358-338), Joppa became an independent city. Alexander the Great established an important mint in Joppa, as well as changed the name of the city from Yapho to Joppa. Joppa suffered during the wars of the Diadochi following Alexander's death. After changing hands three times, it finally returned to Ptolemy I (ca. 323-283) after the Battle of Ipsus in 301 and remained in Egyptian hands until 197, when it was annexed to the Seleucid kingdom by Antiochus III, the Great, after the Battle of Paneion (Banias).

Antiochus IV Epiphanes landed at Joppa in 168 en route to Jerusalem to plunder the temple and enforce his program of Hellenization. In 164, as a result of Judas' successes against the Seleucids, the Jewish minority in Joppa suffered an atrocity at the hands of a spiteful non-Jewish citizenry. Two hundred Jews were drowned after having been induced, for reasons unknown, to board ships in the harbor. Judas avenged the act by burning the harbor installations and the boats moored there, but he was unable to enter Joppa, since he was unable to breach the wall which protected the city on the E (II Macc. 12:3-9). In 147 the high priest Jonathan and his brother Simon defeated the Syrian general Apollonius Taos and occupied Joppa, a prize promised him by Alexander Balas, a contender for the Syrian throne against Demetrius II Nicator. Demetrius was trying to prevent Jonathan's occupation of the maritime plain (I Macc. 10:69-85; Jos. Antiq. XIII.iv.4). In 145, Jonathan paid a state visit to Ptolemy VI at Joppa (I Macc. 11:1-6; Jos. Antiq. VIII.iv.5). After the death of Ptolemy and Alexander Balas, Trypho, acting as regent for Antiochus VI, minor son of Alexander, extended the grant of the coastal plain to Jonathan, but some leaders in Joppa conspired to turn the city over to the generals of Demetrius II. So in 143, Jonathan sent Simon to place a strong Jewish garrison in the city (I Macc. 12:33-34). The next year, after Trypho had treacherously captured (and later killed) Jonathan, Simon renounced his loyalty to Trypho, strengthened Joppa's fortifications, and forced the Greek inhabitants to leave, lest they again try to betray the city into his enemy's hands. This provided the new Jewish state with a reliable seaport (I Macc. 13:11; 14:5; Jos. Antiq. XIII.vi.4). Joppa thus became a Jewish city and remained so for the next two centuries.

Antiochus VII tried to regain control, but Simon routed his troops under Cendebeus in 138 (I Macc. 15:25-31, 35; 16:1-10). Joppa continued to change hands until the Roman occupation under Pompey in 66, when it again became an autonomous city in the subprovince of Phoenicia, the province of Syria, and minted its own coins. In 47 B.C., Julius Caesar returned it to the Jews for services rendered by Antipater, but it retained its autonomous status (Jos. Antiq. XIV.x.6). Herod captured Joppa in 37 (Jos. Antiq. XIV.xv.1), but because of Joppa's opposition to him, he then established a rival port at Straton's Tower, which he renamed Caesarea. After Augustus' banishment of Herod Archelaus to Gaul in A.D. 6, Joppa came under the jurisdiction of Caesarea, the province of Syria (Jos. Antiq. XVII.xiii.2-4).

An early Christian community arose in Joppa, one beloved member of which, Tabitha, or Dorcas, was raised from the dead by Peter (Acts 9:36-42). Peter stayed there for a few days in the house of Simon the tanner, and then went to Caesarea at the invitation of the Roman centurion Cornelius (9:43–10:23). It was a principal center of the First Revolt and was destroyed by Vespasian in 68. Joppa was rebuilt and through the centuries has enjoyed roles of varying importance in the history of Palestine; today it has been annexed to the city of Tel Aviv.

Courtesy of Harriet-Louise H. Patterson

24. Joppa (modern city of Jaffa) on the Mediterranean

Fig. JOP 24.

Bibliography. S. Tolkowsky, The Gateway of Palestine: A History of Jaffa (1924); S. Tolkowsky, "New Light on the History of Jaffa," JPOS, 5 (1925), 82-85; F.-M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine, vol. II (1938), ad loc.; R. North, "Leeds Excavations at Jaffa," Bibl., 34 (1953), 121; J. Pritchard, ed., ANET (2nd ed., 1955); S. Yeivin, "Archaeology in Israel, Nov. 1951–Jan. 1953," AJA, 59 (1955), 163; J. Kaplan, "Notes and News," IEJ, 6 (1956), 259-60. V. R. GOLD

JORAH jôr'ə [יורה, autumn rain] (Ezra 2:18); KJV AZEPHURITH ăz'ə fyŏŏr'ĭth (I Esd. 5:16). Head of a family returning after the Exile. See HARIPH.

JORAI jôr'ī [יורי, possibly hypocoristic for Yahu has seen] (I Chr. 5:13). A Gadite.

JORAM jôr'əm [יורם or ירם, Yahu is high]. Alternately: JEHORAM jĭ hôr'əm [יהורם]. 1. Son of Toi, king of Hamath. He was sent by Toi to bring his congratulations to King David on the occasion of David's victory over Hadadezer king of Zobah (II Sam. 8:9-12). He also brought with him gifts of silver, gold, and bronze.

In I Chr. 18:10 he is called Hadoram. In all probability this represents the true form of the name of the prince. It is a shortened form of "Hadad-ram," "Hadad is exalted." Hadad was the Syrian storm-god. Cf. also the combinations Hadadezer and Benhadad.

2. King of Judah ca. 849-842 B.C.; son and successor of Jehoshaphat.

Jehoram became king at the age of thirty-two and reigned for eight years (II Kings 8:17; II Chr. 21:5). His wife was Athaliah, daughter of Ahab. No mention is made of his mother's name.

The Chronicler records that when he became king, Jehoram put to death six of his brothers, all of whom are mentioned by name. There is no reason to deny the historicity of this event. No motive is given, but the words "who were better than yourself" (II Chr. 21:13) at least hint that in the eyes of the Chronicler his brothers disapproved of the new king's religious attitude. In view of the fact, however, that Jehoram put to death some of the princes of Judah as well, it seems possible that Jehoram had to face a rebellion stirred up by his brothers and their partisans.

With the death of Ahab in Israel and Jehoshaphat in Judah, a change came over the political climate in both kingdoms. This was doubtless due in large measure to the reappearance of Assyria in the West (ca. 848). Edom seized the opportunity to revolt and succeeded in regaining her independence from Judah. The details of what happened in the ensuing war are obscure (II Kings 8:21; II Chr. 21:9), and the location of Zair (II Kings 8:21) is uncertain; but it is clear that the revolt was completely successful. Libnah also rebelled against Judah at the same time. Thus Jehoram had to face revolt both in the East and in the West. Libnah was presumably on the Philistine border.

Chronicles reports an invasion of Judah during Jehoram's reign by Philistines and Arabs (II Chr. 21:16-17). The whole section (vss. 11-19) raises many questions regarding its historicity.

In all probability the Chronicler has based his account on certain historical data: (a) the sharp contrast between the characters of Jehoram and his father, Jehoshaphat—this manifested itself particularly in their differing attitudes toward the worship of Yahweh; (b) an attack on Judah by the Philistines and the Arabs; (c) the severe sickness of Jehoram which brought about his death. The Chronicler has woven around these data his own viewpoint.

As against II Kings 8:24, which declares that Joram "was buried with his fathers in the city of David," the Chronicler records that "he departed with no one's regret. They buried him in the city of David, but not in the tombs of the kings" (II Chr. 21:20*b*). The Chronicler adds, further, that "his people made no fire in his honor, like the fires made for his fathers" (vs. 19*b*). The additions of the Chronicler here are of doubtful historical value. They give the impression of being assumptions.

Bibliography. F.-M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine, II (1938), 369-70; N. Glueck, "The Third Season of Excavation at Tel el-Kheleifeh," BASOR, 79 (1940), 2-18; E. R. Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings (1951), pp. 61-62, 258-59.

3. King of Israel ca. 849-842 B.C.; brother and successor of Ahaziah, murdered by Jehu.

Conflicting data are given in Kings regarding both Jehoram's relationship to Ahaziah and the year of his accession. The MT states that Ahaziah died and "Jehoram . . . became king in his stead" (II Kings 1:17). In the light, however, of the following phrase, "because Ahaziah had no son," אחיו is added with the LXX after "Jehoram." The word may have dropped out because of its similarity to תחתיו ("in his stead").

For the date of his accession II Kings 1:17 gives the "second year of Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat." II Kings 3:1, however, gives the "eighteenth year of Jehoshaphat king of Judah" and states that "he reigned twelve years." Both dates are difficult to reconcile with other given data. Ahab of Israel and Ben-hadad of Syria were allies at the Battle of Qarqar in 853. Jehu of Israel paid tribute to Shalmaneser III in 841 and, therefore, must have begun his reign in 842. Further, according to II Kings 3:7 ff, Jehoram was reigning in Israel before the death of Jehoshaphat. The probable solution to the difficulty is to ascribe to Jehoram a reign of ca. eight years, and to regard II Kings 1:17 as an interpolation in the text.

It is noteworthy that the writer of Kings does not make an outright condemnation of Jehoram, as is his usual custom. "He did what was evil in the eyes of the LORD, only not like his father and mother, for he put away the pillar of Baal which his father had made" (II Kings 3:2). It is probable that the reference here is to an "image" of Baal.

In Jehoram's reign occurred the revolt of Moab from Israel (II Kings 3:4-27). Verification of this revolt is to be found in the evidence of the Moabite Stone, which is perhaps to be dated ca. 830. It is to be noted, however, that the reference here is to a revolt in the time of Omri's "son." But "son" may be used in the sense of "descendant." On the evidence of I Kings 22:47; II Kings 8:20, Edom had no king at this time. Presumably the reference is to the ruler of Edom, who acted on orders from Judah. Jehoram appealed to Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, for assistance. Together with the king of Edom, the allies marched against Mesha king of Moab. The story has come down to us in Kings in the form of a "prophetic" narrative, but the main events are clear. A successful war was waged in S Moab. The Moabite cities were destroyed until only Kirhareseth remained, and it was besieged and surrounded. This fortress is usually identified with Kerak, in the very S of the country. At the height of the siege, when the king of Moab saw that the battle was going against him, he attempted a break-through with seven hundred swordsmen (II Kings 3:26). The purpose of this sortie has been variously interpreted. It may have been made "against" the king of Edom, on the assumption that Edom was an unwilling ally of Israel and Judah. It may have been made "opposite" the king of Edom, on the assumption that this was the weak link in the allied attackers. Or perhaps ארם ("Aram") should be read instead of אדום ("Edom"), through confusion of ד and ר, as often happened. The king of Moab tried to break through to Aram. This last seems to be the best interpretation. The sally was unsuccessful. As a last desperate resort the king of Moab "offered up his eldest son as a burnt offering" on the city wall in full view of the attackers. The effect was such that the allies lost heart and withdrew. Presumably the defenders staged a successful rally and drove off the besiegers.

It is clear that intermittent warfare continued between Israel and Aram, but the details are obscure. The story of the healing of Naaman the Syrian by Elisha (II Kings 5) cannot be dated with accuracy in the reign of Jehoram. The name of the king of Israel is not given (vss. 4 ff). The incident, if historical, may have occurred at any time of peace during this period.

The same judgment holds for the incidents reported in II Kings 6:8-23, dealing with Elisha's ability to foretell the military movements of the king of Aram's army. The historical background of these verses cannot be stated. The reference is to Syrian raids against Israelite territory (vs. 23*b*; cf. 5:2).

II Kings 6:24–7:20 describes a siege of Samaria by Ben-hadad king of Syria. The defenders were reduced to such dire straits by the resultant famine in the city that mothers ate their own children. It is not possible to date this event precisely, but it doubtless contains historical reminiscences (cf. also the mention of Hittites and Musrites in 7:6). It is scarcely possible that the latter reference is to the "kings of Egypt" (מצרים). Rather, it refers to Musur in Anatolia. That Ben-hadad of Syria was murdered by Hazael, who became king in his stead, is certainly historical (8:7-15). The date of Hazael's accession can be fixed within fairly narrow limits from the Assyrian inscriptions of Shalmaneser III—i.e., between 846 and 842. The historicity of Elisha's part in Ben-hadad's murder is open to question.

Jehoram was wounded in battle against Hazael, king of Syria, at Ramoth-gilead (II Kings 8:28), and returned to Jezreel to recover from his wounds. In the meantime a revolt against the Omride Dynasty, inspired by Elisha, had broken out, and Jehu, one of the army commanders, was proclaimed king at Ramoth-gilead. From there he came to Jezreel. As he approached the city, Jehoram and Ahaziah king of Judah, who had come to visit him, went to meet Jehu. Jehoram was killed by an arrow from Jehu's bow, and his body was thrown on the plot of ground that belonged to Naboth the Jezreelite.

Bibliography. N. Glueck, "The Boundaries of Edom," HUCA, XI (1936), 148 ff; F.-M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine, II (1938), 418-19; F. M. Cross, Jr., and D. N. Freedman, Early Hebrew Orthography (1952), pp. 39 ff; J. B. Pritchard, ed., ANET (rev. ed., 1955), pp. 320-21.

4. A Levite; descendant of Eliezer, son of Moses (I Chr. 26:25; cf. 23:15, 17).

5. One of the two priests sent out by Jehoshaphat, along with princes and Levites, to instruct the people of Judah in the law of the Lord (II Chr. 17:8).

H. B. MacLean

JORDAN jôr'dən [ירדן, הירדן]. The longest and most important river of Palestine, traversing the entire country from its sources at the N border to its outlet in the Dead Sea. It is remarkable not only because of its unique natural character but also because of the part that it played in the history of Palestine and the religions that evolved on its soil.

1. Name
2. Geological features
3. Description
   a. Sources
   b. From the sources through the Sea of Galilee
   c. From the Sea of Galilee to the Dead Sea
4. Biblical terms relating to the Jordan
5. History
   a. In the prebiblical period
   b. In OT times
   c. In NT times
Bibliography

1. Name. The oldest form of the name Jordan is found in Egyptian records of the Nineteenth Dynasty, which give it as ya-ar-du-na, the equivalent of a Canaanite yardôn (ירדון). The form which is used throughout the OT, yardēn, is the Aramaic form of the word, which apparently had replaced the former by the time of the patriarchs. The LXX, Apoc., and NT use the Greek form Ιορδάνης, with characteristic modifications of the vowels and addition of a final syllable to make the word more pronounceable to Greek-speakers; it is from this that the modern form, "Jordan," is derived.

The etymology of the word "Jordan" has been much in dispute between those who consider it to be of Indo-Aryan origin and those who regard it as a Semitic word. According to the former, the components of the word are yor, the same root as "year," and don, meaning "river," which is found in such names of rivers in SE Europe as the Danube (German Donau), Don, Dniester, and Dnieper. Jordan would thus mean "perennial river," a term which is the exact equivalent of the Sumerian name Idigna for the Tigris. This derivation has been contested on historical and geographical grounds, but is by no means impossible, as it is known that Palestine was invaded by groups that spoke Indo-Aryan languages and who penetrated the entire country, such as Shuwardata of Keilah, whose name appears in the Amarna Letters.

According to the greater number of scholars who consider the word Semitic, the name Jordan is derived from the root ירד, "to descend," and means "the stream that descends rapidly," a name that is aptly descriptive of the Jordan, especially in the part above the Sea of Galilee.

2. Geological features. The valley of the Jordan lies in a deep rift in the earth, the N part of the same line of weakness in the earth's crust that has produced the Wadi el-'Arabah, the Red Sea, and the Great African Rift.* It resulted from the sinking of a stretch from N to S between two parallel faults and apparently occurred, not all at once, but in successive stages. As early as the Eocene period of the Tertiary era this depression was in existence, but it was for a time covered by an inland sea that extended for a short time into the Transjordan region. During the Miocene and Pliocene periods the mountains to the E and the W began to rise, and the rift between sank lower, so that the inland lake began to be confined to the Jordan Valley, while further crosswise faulting produced the four great river valleys of the Transjordan: the Yarmuk, the Jabbok, the Arnon, and the Zered. Fig. JOR 25.

From Atlas of the Bible (Thomas Nelson & Sons Limited)

25. The Jordan Valley, near the Dead Sea, S of Jericho, looking W

During the Pleistocene period there was considerable volcanic activity in the Jordan Valley, and one of the results was the formation of ridges of basalt above and below the Sea of Galilee. While such activity apparently ceased before historic times, its aftereffects are noticeable in the earthquakes and landslides which occur now and then in the Jordan Valley, as well as the numerous hot springs that are to be found along its course. During the earlier part of this period there were three seas: one in the region of the Dead Sea, one that lay in the area between Tiberias and Beisan, and that in the Huleh basin. In the middle of the Pleistocene period came a period of very heavy rain (the Pluvial period) as a result of which the whole valley filled up, the lakes joined, and there was a single salt sea. Masses of gravel were washed down from the hills and choked up the mouths of all the streams that had been emptying into the rift.

After the rains of the Pluvial period ceased, there followed a drier time, which has lasted till the present. The salt sea gradually shrank into the fresh-water lakes of Huleh and Galilee, and the salt-water lake of the Dead Sea, and the Jordan began to flow in its present course. The lowering of the level which the tributaries had to reach resulted in renewed activity on their part and increased erosion. The Jordan had to carve its way through the basalt dam, and farther S, in the alluvium left by the lake and its streams, it digs its winding way. The tributary valleys, especially to the E, have cut canyons through the rocks or have leaped down from them in great waterfalls. One river, the Zerqa Ma'in, which was unable to make its way along its original course because of the gravel that had choked it, made a new path for itself by cutting through the softer sandstone.

Since the Pleistocene period there have been no essential changes in the climate of the Jordan Valley. The varying nature of its settlement, at times very thin and at others considerably dense, are due solely to such human factors as skill in utilizing the water supply and to the devastations caused by war and neglect.

3. Description. The air-line length from the source of the Jordan to the Dead Sea is ca. eighty miles, but the full length of the river is more than two hundred, on account of the twists and turns of its lower course. Its width below the Sea of Galilee is normally ca. ninety to a hundred feet, its depth from three to ten; in the spring, when it floods, it is naturally wider. No parts of it are navigable, except the lakes; there are numerous fords—at least sixty have been counted —where it can be waded. As there were no bridges in Bible times, the Jordan formed a great military obstacle, and the possession of the fords became an important factor in the warfare of that age.

a. Sources. The four sources that unite to form the Jordan all arise in the parting of the watersheds near Mount Hermon.* From this area the Abana and the Pharpar flow to the E, the Litani to the W, and the Jordan streams to the S. The most eastern source of the latter, the Nahr Banias, six miles in length, bursts forth from the base of Mount Hermon out of a large cave, which from the earliest times was regarded as the home of a god, whom the Greeks identified with Pan and gave the name Paneion, which has survived in the modern Banias. It was here that Philip, the son of Herod the Great, built the city of Caesarea Philippi. Fig. JOR 26.

Courtesy of the Israel Office of Information, New York

26. The Jordan River in upper Galilee, showing Mount Hermon in the background

The second source, ca. two miles farther W, is the Nahr el-Leddan, which arises from the strong springs of 'Ain Leddan, located W and SW of the site of the biblical city of Dan (Tell el-Qadi), which marked the N boundary of Israel. It flows ca. four miles before uniting with the Nahr Banias. The third source is the Nahr Hasbani, ca. twenty-four miles long, which joins the other streams a little below their junction; it arises on the Mount Hermon side of the valley between Hermon and Lebanon, down which it flows. The fourth and most western source, the Nahr Bareighit, is a short stream which comes from the W part of the same valley and empties into the Nahr Hasbani near its end. With the junction of these four sources, the River Jordan begins its flow southward.

b. From the sources through the Sea of Galilee. The Jordan flows ca. seven miles before it enters Lake Huleh (the Semachonitis of Josephus). In this area the water table is very near the surface, and the entire area is rather swampy. The vegetation consists of reeds, bulrushes, and high grass, while the papyrus plant flourishes so abundantly that it must have been a good source for the papyrus which was manufactured at Gebal and other places of Phoenicia and was the chief writing material for centuries. The climate is rather warm, and the animals there include hyenas, jackals, and wild boars. Nearby to the NW is the elevated site of Abel-beth-maacah (Tell Abil), besieged by Joab in the time of David (II Sam. 20).

Lake Huleh, some 230 feet above sea level, is a small body of water, shaped in the form of a triangle with its base at the N. Its broadest width is ca. two miles and its length ca. three; it varies from ca. nine to sixteen feet in depth.

On leaving Lake Huleh, the Jordan flows for ca. ten miles to the Sea of Galilee (see GALILEE, SEA OF), and in this short stretch descends to 696 feet below sea level. It flows fairly steadily for ca. two miles until it reaches the crossing of the highroad between Galilee and Damascus, now the site of the "Bridge of the Daughters of Jacob" (Jisr Banat Yaqub). For the next seven miles it cuts its way through a gorge in the black basalt rock, tumbling and cascading continually, and changing its color from a clear to a muddy stream. It emerges into a plain and in another mile flows through a delta into the waters of the lake.

The Sea of Galilee (Chinnereth) is a heart-shaped body of water, ca. twelve miles long and five miles wide at its broadest part. It is closely shut in by hills around its entire circumference, with only occasional stretches of plain. The warm winters, the long summers, and the abundance of water make the region one where almost any sort of crop can be raised, and it is regarded as one of the most favored areas in the whole of Palestine. It is reasonable to suppose that it was well populated in OT times, though there are comparatively few references to it in the contemporary narratives. Later on, after Galilee had acquired a large Jewish population and the Greek cities of the

Courtesy of the Israel Office of Information, New York

27. The S part of the Jordan River

Decapolis arose to the E, it became a frequently mentioned region. Among the cities that surrounded it were Capernaum, Chorazin, Julias (Beth-saida), Magdala, Tiberias, and Dalmanutha, and the Greek cities of Gerasa (Gergesa) and Gadara (many of these are mentioned in the NT).

c. From the Sea of Galilee to the Dead Sea. This stretch of the Jordan is the one that appears most frequently in the narratives of the OT. The length of the valley is ca. sixty-five miles, but the river curves and twists for three times this distance; the breadth of the valley is from three to fourteen miles. The current is still swift, for the drop from the Sea of Galilee to the Dead Sea is 590 feet, an average of about 9 to the mile; every now and then the river has rapids and whirlpools. Like all alluvial rivers, it meanders in contorted loops and is constantly shifting its banks. It is a dirty brown color and not at all a beautiful stream. Fig. JOR 27.

The closer the river approaches the Dead Sea, the more the Jordan Valley becomes divided into several levels. The lowest, which the Arabs call the Zor, is a trench cut in the soft alluvium which can be as much as 150 feet below the upper level. On both sides of the river there are dense thickets of tamarisks, oleanders, willows, poplars, bushes, and vines, as well as thorns and thistles. This part is utterly desolate, a veritably impenetrable jungle, inhabited by wild beasts, with rare habitable areas. On either side of the Zor are the qattarah hills, desolate badlands of ash-gray marl in all sorts of shapes and forms, completely unsuitable for cultivation. These lead up on both sides to the Ghor, the highest part of the valley.

The Ghor on both sides of the valley is a fertile area that slopes steadily downward from the cliffs that hem in the valley to the edge of the qattarah hills. Here there are plantations and pasturage, especially in the twenty-five-mile stretch from the Sea of Galilee to the point where the valley is narrowed for five miles by the approach of the hills on either side. Most of the wider Ghor below this area is uncultivated at the present time, but was more fruitful in ancient times as the result of irrigation. It is only in the last few miles, when the valley narrows again and the Dead Sea is near, that there is a barren saline stretch, at the end of which the Jordan flows to its outlet through a curving delta.

The stretch below the Sea of Galilee is also notable as the only part of its course in which the Jordan has any tributaries. Not far below the lake the River Yarmuk comes in from the E, bringing down almost as great an amount of water as the Jordan itself. The Jalud, flowing down from the NW past Beth-shan, arrives ca. eight miles farther on. Still lower the Jurm, Yabis, Kufrinjeh, Rajib, and Jabbok enter from the E, the latter also bringing a good volume of water; from the W the Far'ah, after paralleling the Jordan for some distance, makes its junction a few miles below the Jabbok. There are about a dozen other, smaller water courses. The deltas of these streams are always fertile areas which widen the extent of cultivable land in the valley. Many cities of antiquity were built close to the point of junction of the tributaries and the main river, such as Adam, Succoth, Zaphon, Zarethan, Jabesh-gilead, and Pella on the E side, and Jericho, Gilgal and Beth-shan on the W. These, however, were but a fraction of the sites occupied in biblical times. N. Glueck, in his explorations of the region, found at least seventy places where people lived and worked, but the ancient names of which have never been recorded.

4. Biblical terms relating to the Jordan. The River Jordan in the OT is almost always used with the article, הירדן. The expression על ירדן יריחו, usually rendered as "by the Jordan at Jericho" (Num. 26:3, 63; 31:12; 33:48, 50; 35:1; 36:13), really means "by the Jordan of Jericho," the part of the river near that city. See also מעבר לירדן יריחו (Num. 22:1; 34:15; Josh. 13:32; 20:8; I Chr. 6:78—H 6:63), "beyond the Jordan at Jericho," which must mean "beyond the Jordan of Jericho"—i.e., E of the Jordan and across the Jordan from Jericho, as the contexts show; in Josh. 13:32; 20:8 the RSV renders "beyond the Jordan east of Jericho." The other exceptions, ארץ ירדן and ירדן, occur in poetic passages (Ps. 42:6—H 42:7; Job 40:23). In the former case the "land of the Jordan" means the birthplace of the Jordan, using a poetic figure by which the Jordan, like Abraham of old (Gen. 12:1), leaves the place of its origin to travel to distant regions.

הערבה is a term used to denote the Jordan Valley from the Sea of Galilee to the Dead Sea and either the E or the W part of it, but also includes the Dead Sea and the Wadi el-'Arabah that reaches to the Gulf of Aqabah. The plural of the word indicates specific stretches, such as those in Moab or near Jericho. For details, see ARABAH.

גאון הירדן, correctly rendered by the RSV as "jungle of the Jordan," refers to the thicket on either side of the lower river. Jeremiah is asked the pointed question as to how he is to survive in the terrible calamity of which this is a figure (Jer. 12:5); it is also spoken of as a place where lions lurk (Jer. 49:19; 50:44; Zech. 11:3).

ככר הירדן, properly the "round district of the Jordan," is used in general for the broader parts of the Jordan Valley. In the story of Lot, it probably indicates the region of the Dead Sea, regarded as a fruitful plain before the destruction that befell the wicked cities (Gen. 13:10); in the account of the casting of the copper vessels for the temple of Solomon (I Kings 7:46) it is in the neighborhood of Succoth and Zarethan. The shorter form הככר, the "round district," is used with the same meaning (Gen. 19:17, 25; Deut. 34:3). It should be noted, however, that the expression דרך הככר (II Sam. 18:23), used to describe the course taken by Ahimaaz in conveying news of the defeat of Absalom to David, does not refer to a specific district, but is an adverbial expression meaning "by a short cut" (lit., "through the circle, diametrically").

גלילות הירדן, to be translated "districts of the Jordan" (Josh. 22:10-11; RSV "region about the Jordan"; KJV "borders of the Jordan"), indicates separate parts of the Jordan Valley that have names of their own, as is still the practice among the Arabs today.

עמק סכות, the "Vale of Succoth" (Pss. 60:6—H 60:8; 108:7—H 108:8), refers to the lower course of the Jabbok and the regions nearby; בקעת יריחו, the "valley of Jericho" (Deut. 34:3), is a general term for the lower part of the Jordan Valley.

5. History. a. In the prebiblical period. The earliest inhabitants of the Jordan Valley existed at an age when the climate was still a tropical one, and such animals as the elephant and the rhinoceros were plentiful in the land, for their skeletons, together with flint and basalt axes, have been found on the W bank of the Jordan near the "Bridge of the Daughters of Jacob." These men, who were hunters, belonged to the human species known as Paleoanthropus Palestinensis, skeletons of whom have been found at Mount Carmel and who lived perhaps a hundred thousand years ago. As the climate gradually changed to the dry, warm climate that still prevails in modern times, these men wandered off or disappeared before the Natufian civilization of the Mesolithic age and the Ghassulian civilization of the Neolithic age (seventh to fifth millennium B.C.). Agriculture began to flourish, animals were tamed, houses took the place of caves as dwellings, and dolmens were erected for the dead.

The pattern of life in the Jordan Valley now became one of periods of intense development, then of depopulation until a new resettlement, which has continued down to the present day. There were settlements throughout the Chalcolithic period (late fifth millennium to thirty-second century B.C.); and in the latter part of this time, from the thirty-fifth century on, there was a great increase in population, which disappeared toward the end of it. During the Early Bronze Age (thirty-second to twenty-first century B.C.) the greatest development was in the first half of the period. There seems to have been a gradual decline in the latter half of the period, which became very rapid in the latter quarter. When new settlements began in the Middle Bronze Age (twenty-first to sixteenth century B.C.), there had been so little sedentary settlement for so long a period that most of the villages and towns of this period were located on virgin soil. From the nineteenth century to the fourteenth the population seems to have decreased again, but not to the extent of the practical disappearance of permanent settlements that appears in the Transjordan region. This was the condition of agricultural civilization in the Jordan Valley during the age of the patriarchs.

b. In OT times. The first mention of the Jordan in the Bible occurs in the story of Abram and Lot. When the two decided to separate, Lot chose to travel to the "round district of the Jordan" (Gen. 13:10-11) and settled there near Sodom. A short time afterward the cities of the district were taken and plundered and Lot was taken captive, but Abram, hearing of the disaster, summoned his servants and the followers of his friends as far as the region of Dan, at the sources of the Jordan, routed them in a night attack, and rescued both captives and booty (Gen. 14). Since it is unlikely that he could have overcome the massed forces of the eastern kings, it is probable that he attacked the slow-moving and heavily burdened rear division as it was preparing to cross the river—precisely the same sort of stroke that was made by Odenathus of Palmyra against the army of the Persian king Sapor as it was returning across the Euphrates in A.D. 260. Jacob crossed the river twice, on his journey to and his return from Aram; on his richly rewarded way back he relates that he had crossed it with only his staff, perhaps indicating that he used the latter to help him through the ford (Gen. 32:10—H 32:11).

In the account of the conquest of Canaan, the Jordan was the last obstacle to be surmounted before the promise made by God to the Israelites could be fulfilled. The last wish of Moses was to be permitted to pass across the river (Deut. 3:23-25); when this was denied him, he entrusted the task to Joshua, who at the very beginning of his leadership received the command to "go over this Jordan" (Josh. 1:2). The place where the Israelites crossed over was not far below Adam (Tell ed-Damieh), for the biblical account declares that the waters ceased flowing and backed up

Courtesy of Denis Baly

28. The River Jordan near Adam, showing the grayish-marl hills (qattaras) which separate the lower from the upper Jordan Valley as far as Zarethan (Josh. 3:16, where the verse should be rendered: "as far as the side of Zarethan").* This favorable circumstance was probably due to a heavy landslide, as the Jordan has been dammed and its flow curtailed on more than one occasion (as in 1927); but later tradition magnified it into a miracle, and a poet later sang of how the Jordan had "turned back" at the approach of Israel (Ps. 114:3). The consequence of this unexpected breaching of the river barrier was the rapid conquest of Jericho and the central part of W Palestine, which led, in successive stages, to the complete subjugation of the Canaanites. Fig. JOR 28.

During the period of the judges and the early kingdom, the possession of the fords of the Jordan more than once meant the difference between defeat and victory. When the Moabites spread across the river and enslaved the tribe of Benjamin, Eglon's assassination of the king was followed up by the seizing of the fords and the annihilation of the enemy (Judg. 3:28-29). Similarly, when Gideon defeated the Midianites near the hill Moreh in the Valley of Jezreel, the host of the enemy split in two; one half succeeded in getting across the river and attaining the hills, but the others, fleeing southward, were trapped by the Ephraimite militia at the fords and slain or captured (Judg. 7:24-25). When the Ephraimites challenged Jephthah and confidently crossed the river to meet him in battle, he completed their discomfiture by seizing the crossings and dooming them to death by the test of the word "Shibboleth" (Judg. 12:5-6).

From these and other narratives it is apparent that the Jordan was a strong line of defense, not to be easily forced. When Saul marched to the rescue of the city of Jabesh-gilead and when, in gratitude, the men of that city rescued the bodies of Saul and his sons from the walls of Beth-shan, the crossing had to be made at night (I Sam. 11:11; 31:12). Abner and Ishbosheth escaped to safety across the river after the Philistines had won all the W country by their victory at Gilboa (II Sam. 2:8). David sent his father and mother across the river to live in Moab and thus escape the wrath of Saul (I Sam. 22:3-4); later in his life he was to cross the Jordan in haste and at night (II Sam. 17:22). As in the case of Jacob, the ignominy of his flight across the river is contrasted with the splendor of his return (II Sam. 19).

In the remaining historical narratives of the Bible, the scene of the action shifts away from the Jordan, and it is but seldom mentioned. There is no doubt, however, that there was a large settlement in the valley all during the period of the kings, and that at that time it was one of the richest parts of Palestine.

The Jordan is featured, however, in the miracles that are reported of Elijah and Elisha. Jericho is especially mentioned as the place where they and their disciples gathered; it was near there that Elijah, just before his ascension to heaven, took off his cloak, and struck the water, which divided to let him and Elisha pass on dry ground; Elisha, on his return, performed the same feat, to show that he had received a double portion of his master's spirit (II Kings 2). It was in the same neighborhood that Elisha healed the spring of bitter waters (II Kings 2:19-22); according to tradition, this was 'Ain es-Sultan, near Jericho. When Naaman, the commander of the army of Syria, came to Elisha to be cured of his leprosy, the prophet told him to go and bathe seven times in the Jordan. Naaman at first scornfully rejected the prescription, contrasting the dirty, turbid waters of the Jordan with the clear, sparkling streams of his native Damascus; but eventually he took the advice of his servants, obeyed the prophet's command, and was cured (II Kings 5:1-14). It was also in the waters of the Jordan that Elisha brought about the miraculous floating of the iron axe head which one of his disciples had dropped into the river (II Kings 6:1-7).

c. In NT times. The essential story of the gospels begins at the Jordan River. It was there that John the Baptist came out of the wilderness like Elijah to preach the coming of the kingdom of heaven, followed the prescription of Elisha to cure a moral instead of a physical illness, and bade the people to bathe in the Jordan and repent of their sins. It was from John that Jesus, through baptism, received his first mission to go forth to teach and perform miracles (Matt. 3; Mark 1:4-9; Luke 3; John 1:29-34). The traditional site of the baptism of Jesus is below Jericho; but the gospel accounts are not uniform, and it is very possible that this event took place not far below the Sea of Galilee, close to the home of Jesus, as well as to that of John in Peraea, where he was arrested shortly after this event (Luke 3:18-20; cf. Matt. 14:3-12; Mark 6: 14-17).

The first part of the ministry of Jesus was in the cities about the Sea of Galilee. The decisive moment of his career took place at Caesarea Philippi, on the site of the ancient Paneion, the most eastern source of the Jordan, where gods had been worshiped for centuries. There he put to his disciples the question: "Who do men say that I am?" and accepted the answer of Peter: "You are the Christ [Messiah]" (Mark 8:27-30; Luke 9:18-20; with a slightly different version in Matt. 16:13-20). One of the mountains nearby was the site of the Transfiguration, which followed this event (Mark 9:2-8). The second part of his ministry followed as he pursued his course down the E side of the Jordan Valley, performing new miracles, and speaking to the multitudes in parables, especially those of the magnificent collection in Luke 12–18. He crossed the Jordan for the last time at Jericho, and thence set forth for the final part of his ministry in Jerusalem.

Bibliography. G. A. Smith, Historical Geography of the Holy Land (1903; 2nd ed., 1906). F.-M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine, I (1933), pp. 161-78, for hydrography. N. Glueck, The River Jordan (1946), is the most modern account, with fine illustrations; "The Geography of the Jordan," National Geographic Magazine, LXXXVI (1944-45), 719-44, is the same thing in briefer form. D. Baly, Geography of the Bible (1957), pp. 16-26, for geology; pp. 193-202, for description.

S. COHEN

JORIBAS. KJV Apoc. form of JARIB.

JORIM jôr'ĭm ['Ιωρίμ] (Luke 3:29). An ancestor of Jesus.

JORKEAM jôr'kĭ əm [יורקעם] (I Chr. 2:44). A place in Judah occupied by the Calebite family of Hebron. With the LXX B, Jorkeam should perhaps be read for JOKDEAM in Josh. 15:56.

JOSABAD. KJV alternate form of JOZABAD.

JOSAPHAT. KJV NT form of JEHOSHAPHAT.

JOSAPHIAS. KJV Apoc. form of JOSIPHIAH.

JOSE. KJV form of JOSHUA 4.

JOSECH jō′zĭk ['Ιωσήχ] (Luke 3:26); KJV JOSEPH jō′zəf. An ancestor of Jesus.

JOSEDECH; Apoc. JOSEDEC. KJV alternate forms of JOZADAK.

JOSEPH jō′zəf [יוֹסֵף, may (God) add (posterity); יְהוֹסֵף (Ps. 81:5—H 81:6), see JOSEPH SON OF JACOB; 'Ιωσήφ]. Alternately: JOSEPHUS jō sē′fəs (I Esd. 9: 34 KJV); JOSES jō′zĭz ['Ιωσής] (Mark 15:40; KJV also Matt. 13:15; 27:56; Acts 4:36). 1. See JOSEPH SON OF JACOB.

2. The father of Igal, the spy from the tribe of Issachar among the twelve sent by Moses to reconnoiter the land of Canaan (Num. 13:7).

3. A Levite of the "sons of Asaph" (I Chr. 25: 2, 9).

4. One of Ezra's contemporaries listed among those who married foreign wives (Ezra 10:42; cf. I Esd. 9:34).

5. A priest, contemporary with the postexilic high priest Joiakim (Neh. 12:14).

6. Son of a certain Zechariah; a military commander under Judas Maccabeus (ca. 163 B.C.). Judas left him and Azariah in charge of a force to guard Judah while Judas went off to battle in Gilead. Joseph and Azariah were ordered not to initiate any military action, but they did so and were routed in defeat (I Macc. 5:18, 55-62). See JUDAS 10.

7. An ancestor of Judith (Jth. 8:1).

8. An ancestor of Jesus Christ (Luke 3:24).

9. An ancestor of Jesus Christ who lived between the time of King David and Zerubbabel the postexilic governor of Judah (Luke 3:30; cf. vss. 27, 31).

10. See JOSEPH HUSBAND OF MARY.

11. A brother of Jesus Christ, according to Matt. 13:55.

12. A brother of James the younger (Mark 15:40; cf. Matt. 27:56). See bibliography.

13. See JOSEPH OF ARIMATHEA.

14. A Christian in the early church, also called Barsabbas and Justus (not the Barsabbas of Acts 15: 22), who was considered as a candidate to fill the place vacated by Judas Iscariot among the remaining eleven apostles; but the choice fell to another—namely, Matthias (Acts 1:23; cf. vss. 15-26).

15. The given name of BARNABAS (Acts 4:36).

16. KJV form of JOSECH.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 28, 60, 64, 107, 212; V. Taylor, The Gospel According to Mark (1952), p. 598. B. T. DAHLBERG

JOSEPH, DEATH OF. See JOSEPH THE CARPENTER, HISTORY OF.

JOSEPH, PRAYER OF. A Jewish apocalypse, no longer extant except in fragments preserved in Greek quotations by Origen. (For a discussion of this type of literature, see APOCALYPSES, APOCRYPHAL.) From ancient lists we learn that it was about as long as the Wisdom of Solomon. Jacob is represented as preexisting in the form of an angel, Israel. In our fragments he alone is the speaker, and he foretells mankind's fate and makes huge claims for himself: he is the first-born of all living beings.

The work seems to represent a tendency among Jews in the early Christian centuries to exalt Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob above all angels, almost to the extent of deification. This was true of the book of Asenath, e.g. It has been thought that the Prayer of Joseph was decidedly anti-Christian, but this seems improbable to many because of the respect in which Origen held it ("a writing not to be despised"). An extreme view holds it to be pro-Christian, since Israel and Jacob may be names for Jesus Christ, whose angel-appearance (Jacob) is shown to surpass that of the great archangel URIEL. The riddle of the book is not yet solved, but it must have been anti-Christian to some extent at least.

Bibliography. Fabricius, Codex pseudepigrapha V. T., I, 761-71; E. Schürer, History of the Jewish People, vol. II, pt. iii, p. 128 (English trans.; 1891); V. Burch, JTS, XX (1918), 20; M. R. James, Lost Apoc. (1920), pp. 21-31. N. TURNER

JOSEPH HUSBAND OF MARY. The husband of the mother of Jesus.

This Joseph is mentioned only a few times in the NT and almost exclusively in the birth and childhood stories of Matthew and Luke. Mark nowhere refers to him, directly or indirectly (unless we should read in 6:3 "son of the carpenter," as in P45 and a few other MSS). In the Fourth Gospel, Jesus is twice said to be the "son of Joseph" (1:45; 6:42). Since Joseph appears uniformly as the father or foster father of Jesus and the references to him drop out early in the gospel narratives, it is a likely inference that he died before Jesus' ministry began. Otherwise he probably would have left a deeper imprint on the tradition.

The birth and infancy stories of Matthew and Luke express more or less poetically and symbolically the church's faith in Jesus as God's unique act in history for the salvation of all mankind. They are not primarily historical records, though they contain valuable historical data. To insist too narrowly on the accuracy of the stories is to misunderstand their nature and purpose. No fully historical account of Joseph's career or any part of it is possible.

The two genealogies of Joseph (Matt. 1:2-16; Luke 3:23-38), though discrepant, trace his descent through David. Their aim is to show that Jesus belonged to the Davidic line. Matthew and Luke (at least according to the present text of these gospels) wish to affirm, not that Joseph was Jesus' actual father, but that he was his legal (foster) father. Both present the doctrine of the virgin birth.

From Matthew one would conclude that Joseph was a resident of Bethlehem, who settled in Nazareth because conditions were not propitious in Judea under Archelaus (2:22-23). Luke states that he lived in Nazareth prior to the birth of Jesus and journeyed to Bethlehem to meet the requirement of the enrollment (2:1 ff, 39). But both agree that his family's historic connections were with Bethlehem. It has been suggested in the interest of harmonization that his trade (carpentry; Matt. 13:55) took him temporarily to Nazareth before the birth of Jesus.

At the time when Joseph discovered Mary's condition, he was legally betrothed to her. According to Jewish custom betrothal was almost tantamount to marriage. In some cases betrothal was officially entered into through sexual intercourse, though usually —and apparently more honorably—it came about through a declaration made to the prospective bride, accompanied by a small gift, in the presence of two witnesses, or through the delivery to her of a written declaration. The woman henceforth was called "wife." If her betrothed should die before the consummation of the marriage (betrothal in the case of a virgin lasted about a year and in the case of a widow one month), she became a widow. She was subject to the law of Levirate marriage. She could be dismissed from the relationship of betrothal only by a letter of divorce. She was subject to the penalty concerning adultery. From the Matthean account it appears that Joseph suspected her of adultery, though some interpreters (chiefly Roman Catholic) prefer to think that he suspended judgment or feared to consummate marriage with one in whom God had worked so great a miracle. The assurance of the angel that the pregnancy was "of the Holy Spirit" (Matt. 1:20) seems to confirm the first alternative.

Joseph is described as a just (δίκαιος) man (Matt. 1:19), by which is meant that he was a devout servant of God and regulated his life by the standards of the law. He was also kind and wise. Joseph's deep piety is indicated by his glad response to the revelation which came to him through a dream: Mary was quite innocent of wrongdoing; she was to become the mother of the Savior of Israel, through the instrumentality of the Holy Spirit (Matt. 1:20-21); he should have no fear of proceeding with his plans with respect to her.

In Luke 2:1-7 we are told that Joseph and Mary journeyed to Bethlehem to be enrolled for taxation and that the child was born there. Luke further reports the visit of the shepherds to the manger, where they found Mary and Joseph and the babe (vs. 16); the circumcision and naming of the child on the eighth day (vs. 21); the purificatory rites and presentation of the boy in the temple (vss. 22-24); the marveling of the parents over the blessing and prophecy of Simeon (vs. 33); the return to Nazareth (vs. 39); and the yearly journeys of the parents to Jerusalem for the Passover (vs. 41). Joseph is pictured as sharing with Mary the anxiety of the search for Jesus, the astonishment over his association with rabbis in the temple, and the perplexity concerning his statement about belonging in his Father's house (vs. 49). Apparently Joseph's authority in the home at Nazareth was respected by Mary's son (vs. 51). Luke represents Joseph as a faithful and affectionate father to Jesus.

Matthew pictures Joseph as frequently receiving guidance from angels in dreams: to flee into the land of Egypt because of the hostility of Herod, to return from Egypt after his death, and to settle in Galilee rather than Judea (2:13-23). Opinions differ concerning the historical value of these stories, but they at least agree with Luke's in presenting Joseph as a man of deep piety and fine character.

The second-century Book of James (Protevangelium) and the fourth-century History of Joseph the Carpenter (Death of Joseph) present Joseph as a widower with children at the time he espoused Mary, a girl of twelve years. The latter book describes in great detail his death at the age of 111. The Gospel of Thomas (second century) also presents fanciful incidents concerning Jesus and Joseph. In the Middle Ages a cult of Saint Joseph grew up. Today he is honored in the Roman Catholic Church on special festival days.

Bibliography. M. R. James, The Apocryphal NT (1924), pp. 38-70; U. Holzmeister, De sancto Ioseph quaestiones biblicae (1945); R. Bulbeck, "The Doubt of St. Joseph," The Catholic Biblical Quarterly, X (1948), 296-309; D. Buzy, Saint Joseph (1951); S. Morenz, Die Geschichte von Joseph dem Zimmermann (1951); H. Rondet, "Saint Joseph," Nouvelle Revue Theologique, LXXV (1953), 113-40. E. P. BLAIR

JOSEPH OF ARIMATHEA ăr'ə mə thē'ə. A member of the Jewish Sanhedrin, who buried the body of Jesus in a tomb on his own property.

Although he had come from a tiny village in the NW corner of the central hill country of Judea (ARIMATHEA in Greek, probably the same as Ramathaim in Hebrew), Joseph became a "respected member" of the council—either his village council or the Sanhedrin in Jerusalem (Mark 15:43). Matthew (27:57) adds the information that he was rich, an estimate that is supported by the claim that he owned a tomb of his own, rock-hewn and unused. A further detail from John's account (19:41) is that the tomb was located in a garden, not far from the site of the Crucifixion. Perhaps it may be conjectured that Joseph rose to wealth and power in Jerusalem, after moving there from his native village of Arimathea. This conjecture would fit with the report that the tomb was new, since there would probably have been a family tomb for one of the old aristocratic families of Jerusalem. On the other hand, it may have been necessary to use a special tomb, since Jewish law prohibited burying executed criminals in family tombs. Even so, for Joseph to have possessed an extra tomb is a sign of affluence.

The question of the motive for Joseph's request for the body of Jesus is not easily decided. It has been suggested that he made the request of Pilate as a favor to the disciples. But we are then led to ask why a leading Jew, probably a member of the Sanhedrin, would risk his reputation to do a favor for some frightened, despairing Galilean followers of a man condemned by Roman and Jewish authorities alike. One possible answer is implied in Mark 15:42-43: Joseph took seriously the rabbinic tradition that a dead body should not be allowed to remain unburied beyond the day of death. Besides, the explicit command of Deut. 21:23 required immediate burial of any criminal on the day of his execution. Since death by crucifixion did not occur until after the victim had been on the cross for two days or more, the Romans usually left the body of a crucified criminal exposed indefinitely, until vultures destroyed the corpse. But in Jewish lands the Romans bowed to the religious regulation, hastening the death of the victim in order to have the body buried by nightfall. Joseph, therefore, was performing an act of piety—actually preventing the defilement of the land, according to Deut. 21:23—by removing the body of Jesus and burying it.

But the gospels suggest a further, and more urgent, motive for Joseph's action. Although Mark's account of the burial makes no explicit claim for sympathy on the part of Joseph toward Jesus and his followers, it does state that Joseph was "looking for the kingdom of God." In itself, this could mean nothing more than that he was a good Pharisee. But the added information: "[He] took courage and went to Pilate, and asked for the body of Jesus" (Mark 15:43), clearly suggests that he had responded to Jesus' announcement of the dawning of the kingdom, at least to the extent of willingness to risk official disapproval, by performing this last gracious act toward the departed Herald of the kingdom. Luke goes beyond this hint to affirm that Joseph was unsympathetic with the intent of the council and refused to give his consent to the action of the Sanhedrin in condemning Jesus (Luke 23:51). In Matthew's version there is an unequivocal claim that Joseph was one of the circle of Jesus' disciples (Matt. 27:57).

The other gospel accounts agree with Mark (15:46) in his description of Joseph as having bought a linen shroud, and as having laid the body of Jesus in a tomb and rolled a stone against the door. The faithful women, Mary Magdalene and Mary the mother of Joses, saw where he was laid. The Gospel of John adds the information that Nicodemus assisted Joseph in the burial, providing at his own considerable expense the spices for the preparation of the body (John 19:39).

Among the late legends usually included in the NT Apoc. is a narrative of the ASSUMPTION OF THE VIRGIN, ascribed to Joseph of Arimathea, who reports that he cared for Mary during the years between Christ's ascension and her death.

Bibliography. H. L. Strack and P. Billerbeck, Kommentar zum NT, I (1922), 1047-51; J. Klausner, Jesus of Nazareth (1925), p. 355; F.-M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine, II (1938), 428-29.

H. C. KEE

JOSEPH OF ARIMATHEA, NARRATIVE BY. A Latin version of the ASSUMPTION OF THE VIRGIN. This is a totally different work from the Story of Joseph of Arimathea, which latter is an appendix (in Greek) to the Acts of Pilate. See PILATE, ACTS OF.

M. S. ENSLIN

* JOSEPH SON OF JACOB. The name יוסף is "hypocoristic," being the first element of a much longer name. The full form would be composed of: (a) the verb יוסף; (b) the name of a god who is considered to be subject of the verb. The name for God which is supplied in Gen. 30:24 is Yahweh (see GOD, OT), but this is too early for such a formation. We know from ancient extrabiblical examples like Jacob-El and Jacob-Har or Yashub-Dagan and Yashub-El that the divine element used with these hypocoristic forms varied. Unfortunately, we have no such examples of the name Joseph. The supposed town name of Joseph-El in the List of Thut-mose III is a misreading based on ignorance of comparative linguistics. The Egyptian sh was never used to transcribe Hebrew samekh.

The form יהוסף, "May (God) add (yet another son)," which occurs once in the Bible but more frequently on ossuaries and graffiti of the first century A.D., is to be explained as a hypercorrection. The first syllable of this name was improperly expanded from יו to יהו by analogy with the vast number of personal names that contain the divine element in the first syllable. After the time of the Exile it was considered more proper to write these names with the longer form of the theophorous element—namely, יהו. In any case, we must remember that in the name Joseph this variation was purely graphic, and the pronunciation remained the same.

1. The birth of Joseph
   a. The nature of his birth
   b. The date of his birth
   c. The culture of his birthplace
2. Joseph in Hebron
   a. The life of a shepherd boy
   b. Joseph the favored son
   c. The master of dreams
   d. The conspiracy at Dothan
3. Joseph in Potiphar's house
   a. The rise to power
   b. The seduction
   c. The prison
4. Joseph as lord over Egypt
   a. The dreams of Pharaoh
   b. The investiture of Joseph
   c. Joseph as an administrator
5. The descent into Egypt
   a. The famine in Canaan
   b. The reconciliation
   c. The settlement in Goshen
   d. The passing of the patriarchs

Bibliography

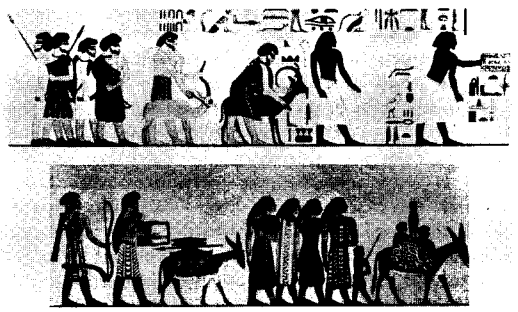
1. The birth of Joseph. Joseph is described as the eleventh son of Jacob and the first-born of Rachel, the favorite wife of Jacob.

a. The nature of his birth. Like his father, Jacob, and his grandfather, Isaac, Joseph was born to a woman who had previously been barren. This often-repeated pattern—cf. the birth of Samuel and of John the Baptist—tends to impress the reader with divine activity in connection with childbirth. It also tends to single out the child thus born as one especially favored by God. The origin of this motif is, of course, uncertain, but it is interesting to compare the biblical accounts with the background of the Ugaritic "Legend of Aqhat." In this Ugaritic tale the hero's father, Danel, is without an heir, and the birth of his son, Aqhat, requires a special sort of divine permission, which is obtained by persistent prayer before the deity. This procedure has been called "incubation." After his unusual birth, the child Aqhat is singled out as the hero of the tale which follows. He is described by one of the gods as n'mn 'mq nšm, "the charming one, strongest of men." We can safely assume that the Joseph story was intent upon enhancing our appreciation of the divine favoritism evident throughout. The story does this by supplying a detail of Joseph's birth which is considered most significant—i.e., the fact that Joseph was the first-born of the favorite, but originally barren, wife.

b. The date of his birth. The cautious student will avoid attempts to date precisely happenings in the "patriarchal age." Before we can fix a date for such an event as the birth of Joseph, we must consider the type of "history" reported in early biblical narratives.

Scholars have offered answers from every conceivable point of view. At one end of the scale there are those who view the Joseph story as a historicized myth; at the other end come those who treat it as a matter-of-fact account such as one might write today. The rapidly accumulating evidence from archaeological sources seems to be tipping the balance strongly in favor of the basic historicity of these accounts, but no serious student of antiquity can fail to perceive that dramatic patterns and didactic applications bring flesh to the dry bones of history. Within the great national saga that lies behind these stories, Joseph was born three generations after Abraham but before the small family of Jacob entered Egypt. Translating this into the frame of secular history, archaeological evidence puts the age of Abraham in the Middle Bronze Age, somewhere in the first half of the second millennium, and the entry into Egypt during the second "intermediate" period (see HYKSOS), which covers a period of over two hundred years. Our only hope for dating Joseph more exactly lies within the realm of archaeology—i.e., the possibility of establishing a convincing synchronism for Gen. 14, or the recovery of more Hyksos documents.

c. The culture of his birthplace. Although we are unable to date the birth of Joseph, we can describe, to some extent, the type of culture into which he was born. An abundance of information concerning the social background of his parents' life and activity in his birthplace, Haran, is offered by the recently discovered Nuzi and Mari documents (see HORITES). These Hurrian documents contain close parallels to the patriarchal life at Haran (see JACOB; ISAAC; ABRAHAM). A further source for our understanding of this culture is the Autobiography of Idri-mi, king of Alalakh (ca. 1480-1450 B.C.). Although the Nuzi and Idri-mi materials come from a period somewhat later than Joseph in the Hyksos period (the seventeenth and first half of the sixteenth centuries), they reflect the customs and practices of an earlier period. The agreement between biblical and extrabiblical mores and practices proves the essential historicity of the biblical account.



2. Joseph in Hebron. Immediately after the birth of Joseph the family left Haran and returned to the land of Canaan. After a series of adventures the small group arrived at Kiriath-arba (Hebron). It is here that Esau and Jacob are said to have buried their father, Isaac, and it was from this area that Joseph was sent forth to seek his brothers. In Num. 13:22 we are offered a very precise basis for dating the foundation of HEBRON. The city of Zoan (Tanis), which was built seven years after Hebron, is generally identified with the Hyksos capital city, and its foundation is dated at the very beginning of the Hyksos period. If we are to believe that Gen. 37:14 reflects the contemporary name of the city, this would indicate that the Hyksos invasion of Egypt was already in the past—contrast, however, 35:27.

a. The life of a shepherd boy. In connecting the family of Jacob with the region of Hebron the biblical writer does not mean to imply that they are to be considered as "city dwellers." The Bible accurately portrays the life of the patriarchs as being "seminomadic." The expression "seminomadic" is purposely intended to contrast, on the one hand, with the true "Bedouin" (camel) culture of a later time; and, on the other hand, with the "sedentary" (farming) culture which existed in the more fertile plains or around some dependable source of water. The shepherd life of Joseph's time was not sedentary, because of the constant need for seeking areas in which to graze flocks. As flocks were moved from pasture to pasture, most, if not all, of the shepherd community moved with them, living in tents. The series of towns by which Jacob's family passed on their way S from Succoth (Gen. 33:17–35:27) is probably typical of the movement of such a shepherd community. The towns listed are within reasonable walking distance of one another. The sheep or goats are in constant need of water, thus limiting the distance that such communities might wander from sedentary (watered) areas. Although shepherds moved from place to place, the life Joseph knew was not strictly nomadic. Jacob built himself a house in Succoth, in contrast to tents for his livestock, and he stayed behind in Hebron with Joseph when the rest of the family followed the flocks in Shechem. It is also significant that the dream of Joseph concerning "sheaves" further betrays close contact with sedentary (farming) life.

b. Joseph the favored son. Gen. 37:3 explains that Joseph was favored by his father, "because he was the son of his old age." This psychological explanation can still be easily understood today. In the world of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries B.C. it was more normal to favor the legitimate heir, who was usually the oldest son; but Jacob, who had purloined his older brother's birthright, seemed determined to by-pass convention by favoring first Joseph, then Benjamin, and finally by setting Ephraim before Manasseh. This pattern of favoring the younger over the older seems to appear quite frequently in the biblical account (cf. ABEL; DAVID; SOLOMON; etc.). Although this type of favoritism is more difficult to find in extrabiblical sources, it is not entirely lacking. It was not unheard of among the Hittites. From the middle of the sixteenth century we have the very famous case of Hattusilis I, who passed the throne to Mursilis I instead of to his oldest son, Labarnas. The exaltation of a younger brother over an older one is also found in the Tale of Two Brothers, which is very close to the Joseph story in some ways (see § 3*b below*). Idri-mi, king of Alalakh, was also younger than the brothers who acted against him. In the Keret Epic from Ugarit we also read: "The youngest [feminine] of them [feminine] I will make the first-born."

The preference of Jacob for Joseph expresses itself in the making of a "long robe with sleeves." The name used for this robe, פַּסִּים, has been the occasion of much discussion. Later Jewish tradition supposes that the robe reached to the hands and feet. This word is used only one other place in the Bible, to describe the robe worn by Tamar (II Sam. 13:18-19). The passage in II Samuel states specifically: "Thus were the virgin daughters of the king clad." The question which arises is, What is the significance of making a woman's garment for Joseph? The answers have been given range everywhere, from a mythical interpretation, which views this as the garment of a "hierodule" placed upon a depotentized god, to the view that Joseph was dressed as a girl to protect him from hard work. Actually there is no a priori reason for holding that this robe was distinctively feminine. As a matter of fact, the distinction between masculine and feminine dress was not at all clearly defined. If one will observe the famous painting of the party of Asiatics depicted on a tomb at Beni-hasan (nineteenth century),* he will notice that there is little difference between the covering worn by the women and that of the more important males in the caravan. Another analogy may be drawn from the annals of the Assyrian kings of a much later date. One of the most famous articles of clothing to come from the area of Syria and Palestine was the colorful garment decorated with birmu, which is a narrow band woven from wool threads of assorted colors. Garments decorated with these narrow, bright strips are described in the Annals of Ashurnasirpal II as the garb of two hundred females. In the Annals of Ashurbanipal, however, a garment decorated with birmu is given to Necho, a puppet ruler of Egypt, as a part of his royal garb. Thus it would seem that the robe Joseph wore could very well have had the significance the Bible attributes to it—namely, that it marked the wearer as a favorite. See CLOTH § 6. Fig. JOS 29.

29. A wall painting from the tomb of an Egyptian noble at Beni-hasan, showing Asiatics bringing him eye paint

c. The master of dreams. DREAMS were very important in the ancient world. In this respect the OT is no exception. Joseph's dreams cannot be separated from those which he interpreted in Egypt. They belong to the same genre: they come in pairs; they require a man of special skill to interpret them; but, once interpreted, their meaning is quite obvious. It is impossible to say where this type of material originates, because of its universal popularity. Since the dreams recorded in the Joseph story are all of the same type, and since the majority of them are said to have been dreamed in Egypt, one may suspect that this was their proper provenience. Indeed, a recently discovered Egyptian papyrus from Thebes gives rules for the interpretation of dreams about such varied subjects as receiving white bread or looking down a well. One of the dreams interpreted is about a man who sees a large cat; the interpretation is that he will have a large harvest, which immediately reminds us of one of the dreams in the Joseph story.

One of the expressions used to describe Joseph is בעל החלמות, "The lord [ba'al] of dreams." It is needless to say that this has been used to support the thesis that Joseph was really a deity, one of the Baals that the prophetic movement was to have so much trouble with later. The word in this context does not require such an interpretation. To be "lord" of something means simply to possess it, to be in charge of it, or to master it. In this context the translation "dreamer" (Gen. 37:19) might not be quite strong enough, for the expression implies one who is able to possess, originate, master (interpret), dreams. We can be quite sure that the older brothers had no idea of flattering Joseph when they used this expression, but what could better describe the peculiar talent that was to bring Joseph both fame and power than to call him the "master of dreams"?

d. The conspiracy at Dothan. Joseph was sent after his brothers at Shechem. Not finding his brothers in Shechem, he follows the directions of a stranger, who was passing by, and went on to Dothan. It was at Dothan that the brothers threw Joseph into a pit and sold him to the Ishmaelites (Midianites). Even the casual reader is aware that there are difficulties in this chapter. The Hebrew text does not state clearly whether Joseph was sold to the Midianites or to the Ishmaelites. It appears at one point that Reuben was the only brother who wished to spare Joseph's life, but in another section it was Judah who spoke out against the murder. Gen. 37 is one of the most convincing illustrations of the "documentary hypothesis" (see PENTATEUCH). Scholars have generally attributed to E the section dealing with Joseph's being cast into a pit, his being drawn out by the Midianites, and his sale in Egypt by them. To J has been attributed the brothers' plan to kill Joseph, the passing of an Ishmaelite caravan, and the report of the brothers to Jacob. Some sort of division along these lines seems quite possible. One ought to be warned, however, of the constant need for reappraisal of this kind of approach. An excellent example of its shortcomings is the case of the double allusion to Midianites and Ishmaelites which may have its origin in poetic parallelism.

3. Joseph in Potiphar's house. After his betrayal Joseph was brought to Egypt, where he was sold to an Egyptian named POTIPHAR. The practice of bringing slaves to Egypt from Canaan is no novelty. The normal means of obtaining slaves was, of course, warfare, but there is no reason to exclude trading expeditions as a second source. We now possess an Egyptian slave list from the eighteenth century B.C. which contains a number of persons bearing Northwest Semitic names—that is to say, names of persons linguistically akin to Joseph.

a. The rise to power. The biblical account implies that Joseph was not long in Potiphar's household before he was promoted to the highest position in the house. G. von Rad in Josephsgeschichte und aeltere Chokma attempted to show that Joseph is the idealized portrait of an official during the time of David and Solomon: he was the "type" of the civil employee, as seen by the earliest wisdom writers. Although the views of von Rad are only conjectural, it must be agreed that Joseph was the very model of an administrator. He is pictured as modest—at least in his Egyptian career—hard-working, honest, wise, and devoted to his superior. All these qualities contributed to the rapid rise of Joseph.

The story of Joseph in the house of Potiphar gives the reader his first hint of the theology presupposed by the Joseph story. It is said that Joseph became a successful man because his master noticed "that the LORD was with him, and that the LORD caused all that he did to prosper in his hands." In the mind of the writer this was the reason Joseph was able to prosper. All other factors are of secondary importance. For the man who is favored by God, there is nothing that cannot be overcome. The most complete expression of this is found at the end of the Joseph story (Gen. 50:20): "As for you, you meant evil against me; but God meant it for good." Thus Joseph, who was favored by a God who could convert the evil directed against him to good, could not be kept down, even in slavery.

b. The seduction. It has long been observed that there are strong affinities between the Joseph story and the famous Egyptian myth of Bata and Anubis, the so-called Tale of Two Brothers. The similarities are most striking in connection with the seduction of the younger brother, Bata.

The relationship between this Egyptian myth and the Joseph story is so remarkable that there are scarcely any scholars who deny it. The only question is, How are the two stories related? There are many answers to this question. The present MS of the Tale of Two Brothers can be dated on the basis of language and orthography to ca. 1225 B.C. Some of the more conservative scholars of the nineteenth century were inclined to take this date at face value, and they considered the Egyptian story to be a pale recollection of the history of Joseph. The nature of the Egyptian story, however, leads one to suspect that it had a long prehistory before it was finally written down in its present form. It is for this reason that many, perhaps most, scholars feel that the Joseph story is dependent upon its Egyptian counterpart. This does not mean that the Joseph story is fiction. There are many ways to account for the similarity. Presupposing a current and extremely popular Egyptian myth about the shepherd deities Bata and Anubis, it is not difficult to see how an incident in the life of a human shepherd would become more and more like that of the deity. Moreover, one can imagine that, once the story was told and a precedent was established, every attempted rape or seduction that ended in failure was explained along the lines of such an illustrious predecessor. Finally, one might even imagine that Potiphar's wife, who would be familiar with the Egyptian story, was pulling an old trick on this "bumpkin" from Hebron.

This incident is not, however, a really vital part of the Joseph story—contrast this with the story of Eve, where her seduction is used to explain the subsequent status of women in society; likewise, consider Tamar, whose seduction is used to explain a complex genealogical relationship. The story of Joseph could have developed quite normally without this rather detailed episode. It would be much easier to understand its retention if there were important literary precedents.

c. The prison. One of the most difficult things to explain about the Joseph story is, Why did Potiphar react by simply imprisoning Joseph? One might suspect that the violent urge to kill, shown by Anubis in the Tale of Two Brothers, would be more characteristic of the times. Unfortunately, no good parallel can be found anywhere. We are in the dark about the legal aspects of the situation. In the first place, we have scarcely any knowledge of Egyptian law. Egypt has bequeathed no great legal corpus such as the ones known from Mesopotamia, nor is there any literary evidence leading us to suspect that such a code ever existed. The king of Egypt was considered a god, and the law of Egypt was the will of this god-king. To codify the demands of one pharaoh might impinge dangerously upon the divine prerogative of the next. This difficulty is further complicated by the fact that if we did have a code of normative Egyptian legal practice, it would be practically useless in dealing with the Hyksos period. Hat-shepsut's charge that the Hyksos ruled without Re, together with what we know of the Hyksos from other sources, indicates that from the Egyptian point of view Hyksos practice was considered anomalous. Finally, the discovery of a legal code might prove disappointing, for there would be little chance that it would mention the case of an attempted seduction of a noble woman by a slave without legal rights.

While in prison Joseph met the royal butler (cupbearer) and baker. The dreams of both were interpreted by Joseph, and the predicted outcome was brought to pass. The baker was executed and the butler restored to his former position. The office of BUTLER was very important in the court of the Pharaoh. In addition to the fact that "he placed the cup in Pharaoh's hand," we know that the butler acted in the capacity of a trusted adviser. That the Egyptian butler might be employed in a variety of official capacities is verified by the report of a trial which resulted from a harem conspiracy in the reign of Ramses III. In this famous trial the king's butlers served with several other officials as judges in the case. It is not surprising, therefore, that when the king sought help in interpreting his dream, the butler was present with the "magicians" (this may be an Egyptian word, although no satisfactory etymology has yet been offered) and "wise men" whom the Pharaoh summoned. It is thus quite understandable that the king would take a butler's advice when he recommended Joseph as an interpreter.

4. Joseph as lord over Egypt. In response to Joseph's suggestion that the Pharaoh "select a man discreet and wise" comes Pharaoh's answer: "Since God has shown you all this, there is none so discreet and wise as you are." Each time that Joseph's social status is improved, we are reminded that it is under the auspices of God.

a. The dreams of Pharaoh. The nature of the dreams of the Pharaoh is quite Egyptian. They sparkle with the color of the time and country to which they were ascribed. It is appropriate that the Pharaoh should dream of cows, since there are a great many paintings from Egypt which depict caring for cattle. This contrasts with the situation in the hill country of Palestine, where the family of Joseph raised sheep. The available pasture in the hill country from Hebron N to Shechem made it impossible to raise cattle to any extent. We are told that shepherds were an abomination in Egypt. This statement about shepherds is subject to a variety of interpretations, but the simplest explanation is to suppose that it is the result of the well-known, natural enmity for sheep on the part of cattle raisers, whose cattle have nothing to eat after the sheep have grazed on their pastures.

A second Egyptianism in the first dream is the use of a word which is translated as "the reed grass." This word, which appears in Hebrew as 'aḥū, is simply the Hebrew transcription of the Egyptian 'ḥ(w). In Egyptian the word is related to the term for "inundation"; hence it is properly the pasture that has been produced in the wake of the annual flood. It is extended from this meaning to include pasture land in general. The word occurs only one other time in the Bible, and then it is found in the book of Job, where it is asked: "Can 'aḥū grow without water?" What could be more appropriate than this to describe the nature of the Egyptian pasture in its dependence upon the flood waters? The same word appears in Ugaritic, where it is employed to describe the alluvial plain of Šmk.

The seven years of famine that are predicted in the dreams of the Pharaoh are the common property of the ancient Near Eastern countries. The Egyptian version is found in an inscription from the Ptolemaic period which purports to tell of a famine during the reign of Djoser in the early Third Dynasty. Although it is conceded that this inscription may be intended to support the territorial claims of a later age, it does clearly show that the Egyptians themselves preserved the tradition of a seven-year famine. The cycle of seven years of "husks" is to be found in the sixth Tablet of the Gilgamesh Epic. There are also seven unfavorable years mentioned in the Autobiography of Idri-mi. The texts from Ugarit also inform us that "Baal will be lacking seven years, eight (years) the Rider of the Clouds: Without rain (and) without dew." The fact that the oldest references to such cycles are poetic, the frequent use of the number seven in other contexts, and the Ugaritic device of matching seven with eight in parallelism leads one to suspect that the number seven in such a context is not to be considered too literally, but is simply a round number which was applied to any short series of years.

b. The investiture of Joseph. Another section of the Joseph story reminiscent of Egypt is the account of Joseph's promotion. There are three words in this brief section that have an Egyptian origin—the word for "signet ring," the word for "fine linen" (lit., "linen of the king"), and the word usually translated "bow the knee." The last word, אברך, appears to be Egyptian, although the exact equivalent has been a matter of speculation.

There are also a number of historical parallels to be drawn from this episode. The "gold of honor," which may well correspond to the golden chain which was put upon Joseph, is a much-mentioned item in Egyptian biography. The chariot in which Joseph was to ride reminds us that it was during the Hyksos period that the horse and chariot were introduced in Egypt. The fact that a foreigner could hold such a high office in the Egyptian government also suggests the rule of the Hyksos, who were themselves foreigners. In fact, one of their rulers bore the name Jacob-Har.

This basic mode of investiture appears to have been familiar in other areas of the Near East. Very similar procedure was followed when Ashurbanipal (seventh century) invested an underling named Necho: "I clothed him with a garment of brightly colored material; a golden chain (allu), the symbol of his kingship, I put upon him. I bound upon his wrists golden bracelets. I wrote my name on the pommel of an iron dagger inlaid in gold, and I gave it to him. I gave him chariots, horses, and mules for his royal riding." The number of items has grown since the time of Joseph, but the symbols are remarkably similar.

The office into which Joseph was being inducted was apparently that of vizier. The Pharaoh's statement concerning the wide powers to be exercised by Joseph corresponds well with what we learn from the Autobiography of Rekh-mi-Re, who was vizier of Egypt during the reign of Thut-mose III (1490-1435).

As a final gesture Joseph was given a new name, ZAPHENATH-PANEAH. He also received a wife, who is called ASENATH and is described as the daughter of POTIPHERA. These names, together with the name of Ramses and the mention of camels, which the Ishmaelites were supposed to possess, form the most striking anachronisms to be found in the Joseph story.

The significance of the fact that Asenath was a daughter of a priest of On (Heliopolis) eludes us. We know far too little about the status of Egyptian shrines during the Hyksos period even to hazard a guess.

c. Joseph as an administrator. The greatness of Joseph's administrative ability is judged in terms of his results in acquiring all the land in Egypt for the king. Although we have no contemporary documents to explain how it was done, we do know from extrabiblical sources that there was just such a shift of land tenure during the Hyksos period.

The report in Gen. 47:22 that the priests were not forced to sell their land is in strict accord with an Egyptian practice that was current as early as the Fifth Dynasty, according to a stele of Nefer-iri-ka-Re which was found at Abydos. This stele was written to exempt the priests of a certain district from the normal labor conscription raised within the district. Just how privileged the priesthood was to become is reflected in the successful resistance to Akh-en-aton and his reforms on the part of the offended priests.

5. The descent into Egypt. The story of Joseph continues with an account of the famine in Canaan and the journey to Egypt to buy grain. From this point on, Joseph is no longer the unique concern of the narrative. The action is now concerned with the whole family of Jacob—with their coming to Egypt, the reconciliation of the brothers, and the settlement in Goshen.

a. The famine in Canaan. The famous Egyptian inscription of Hor-em-heb describes foreigners from famine-stricken lands descending upon Egypt in the manner of their fathers and grandfathers before them. The biblical witness is in full agreement with this testimony from secular history. The Bible relates that Abraham and Isaac and finally the family of Jacob were forced to turn to the land of the Nile in search of grain, which seems constantly in danger of failure in Canaan. It is perhaps just such a reason that brought to Egypt the well-known band of Asiatics depicted on the walls of a Beni-hasan tomb. Although they date from the early nineteenth century, they probably reflect in many ways the type of persons who made up the small caravan of Jacob's family. There may have been a similarity in dress, in the fashion of beards, in weapons, in footwear, and in their use of the dependable little beast of burden, the ass. We must remember, however, that there is a basic difference in the occupation of the two groups, for the caravan depicted on the tomb was probably a roving band of smiths and tinkers, who carried their bellows with them.

b. The reconciliation. The Autobiography of Idri-mi, which has many parallels to the Joseph story, reaches one of its climactic stages when it pauses to tell of the reconciliation which takes place between the hero and his brothers. Like Joseph, Idri-mi generously restores his older brothers to their former brotherly status. We can imply from this parallel that in the world of Joseph and Idri-mi there was probably a well-established set of mores that judged such an action as proper. In the case of Joseph, however, it was exercised within the theological framework of what God had planned in contrast to the brothers' design.

It is easy for us to understand the first approach Joseph used in dealing with his brothers. There is perhaps a natural urge in every man to do a bit of testing before restoring an offender. So it was that Joseph devised a series of tricks to worry his brothers. He accused his brothers of being spies and kept Simeon as a hostage until Benjamin was brought to him. On their second trip to Egypt, Joseph terrified the brothers by planting a silver cup in the baggage of Benjamin and then accusing him of theft. This action brought forth a burst of eloquent pleading from Judah (Gen. 44:16 ff). There is an Egyptian parallel in the story of the Eloquent Peasant, who is detained by officials when he comes to complain about an injustice, in order that they may listen to his eloquence. There is one major difference between the two accounts, because Joseph was not entertained as the officials were. Joseph wept freely because of what he was told, and we are led to suppose that the testing of the brothers had a serious purpose.

c. Settlement in Goshen. We know from Egyptian documents that it was customary for the Egyptians to allow Asiatics to graze their animals in the Delta. It was in accord with this custom that the family of Jacob was allowed to settle there. The number of persons coming to Egypt is listed as seventy (seventy-two is the figure given by the LXX and one Hebrew MS discovered in Qumran). This may be a round number, just as in Ugaritic, where it is listed as the number of sons of Asherah.

d. The passing of the patriarchs. The final days of Jacob in Egypt form an interesting contrast to the old age of an Egyptian named Sinuhe, who found himself far from home, wandering in the land of Canaan. Just as Sinuhe longed to be buried in his homeland, so Jacob requested that Joseph should swear to bury him in the land of his birth. Just as Sinuhe longed to be properly embalmed, so was Jacob embalmed. The forty-day period given for the embalming process is confirmed by our knowledge of the practice from other sources. The same procedure of embalming and removal to Canaan is followed in the case of Joseph. One wonders, however, why Joseph was taken back to Shechem for burial rather than to the traditional burial place at Mamre.

Before the death of Jacob, he had a chance to see his children and grandchildren and bless them. In the first blessing of Jacob, Joseph was replaced by his two sons, Ephraim and Manasseh, thereby doubling Joseph's portion. The name is thus connected with the two strongest of the N tribes. In consequence of this, the name of Joseph is later used to define: (a) the tribe of Ephraim alone (Num. 1:32), (b) the tribe of Manasseh alone (Num. 36:1), (c) the tribe of Ephraim and Manasseh together, (d) the whole N kingdom, and (e) the people as a whole (Ps. 80:1). In both the blessing of Jacob (Gen. 49) and the blessing of Moses (Deut. 33) Joseph is praised far out of proportion to the other tribes, in accordance with the early importance of the Joseph tribes.

The final chapter of the Joseph story is written with the death of Joseph himself; he ended his life in the role of a prophet: "I am about to die; but God will visit you, and bring you up out of this land to the land which he swore to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob." Then after insisting that his "bones" be taken from Egypt, he died at the age of 110, which, as we gather from the Instruction of the Vizier Ptah-Hotep, was an ideal age for any good vizier.

Bibliography. For general information see the Commentaries on Genesis, particularly those by Gunkel, Driver, de Vaux, and von Rad. Other sources of interest are: W. F. Albright, "Historical and Mythical Elements in the Story of Joseph," JBL, XXXVII (1918), 111-43; K. Sethe, "Der Denkstein mit dem Datum des Jahres 400 der Aera von Tanis," ZA, 65 (1930), 85-89; H. G. May, "The Evolution of the Joseph Story," AJSL, XLVII (1931), 83-93; W. F. Albright, The Archaeology of Palestine and the Bible (1932), pp. 143, 148 ff; S. Smith, The Statue of Idri-Mi (1949); O. Eissfeldt, Die ältesten Traditionen Israels (1950); G. von Rad, "Josephsgeschichte und ältere Chokma," Supplements to Vetus Testamentum, vol. I (1953); M. Noth, Geschichte Israels (1954), passim; J. B. Pritchard, ed., ANET (2nd ed., 1955), passim; W. F. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity (2nd ed., 1957), pp. 241-48.

O. S. WINTERMUTE

JOSEPH THE CARPENTER, HISTORY OF. An Egyptian glorification of Joseph, not earlier than the fourth century and heavily indebted to the Protevangelium of James (see JAMES, PROTEVANGELIUM OF). It purports to relate the life and death of Joseph and the eulogy spoken over him by Jesus, who is represented as later recounting the incidents to his disciples on the Mount of Olives. The complete text is preserved in Bohairic and Arabic (of which latter a Latin version was made in the fourteenth century). In addition there are fragments in Sahidic. The statement: "Even thou, O my virgin Mother, must look for the same end of life as other mortals" (ch. 18), suggests that this writing is anterior to the fifth century, when the doctrine of the Assumption began to prevail.

See also APOCRYPHA, NT.

Bibliography. For the full text, see: F. Robinson, Coptic Apocryphal Gospels (1896); P. Peeters, Évangiles apocryphes (1914). A brief summary of the book is given by M. R. James, The Apocryphal NT (1924), pp. 84-86. M. S. ENSLIN

JOSEPHUS, FLAVIUS flā'vĭ əs jō sē'fəs. A historian (Hebrew name, Joseph ben Mattathias), and a commanding officer of the Galilean Jewish forces in the war against Rome, A.D. 66-70. He was born A.D. 37/38 and died sometime after 100.

Despite certain inconsistencies between the account in his Vita, written toward the end of his life, and various autobiographical statements scattered through his earlier History of the Jewish War Against Rome, the general outline of his life is more or less clear. He was of a priestly family and, on his mother's side, a descendant of the Hasmoneans. He reports that already by the age of sixteen he began a study of the chief Jewish sects: PHARISEES; SADDUCEES; and ESSENES. He then attached himself as disciple to a hermit, Bannus, with whom he lived in the wilderness for ca. three years. At the age of nineteen he joined the Pharisees. His writings later reflect an admiration for the Essenes and their way of life; on the other hand, though he reports on the popularity enjoyed by the Pharisees, his language at times reveals a critical, unfavorable estimate of them.

In 64 he journeyed to Rome to plead for the liberation of some priests whom the procurator FELIX had sent to be tried by Nero. As it turned out, this visit to the great city was important, not so much because Josephus succeeded in his mission (with the help of Poppea, Nero's wife, whom Josephus met through one of her favorites, a Jewish actor), but because the splendor and might of Rome impressed him profoundly. On his return to Judea, he found his countrymen dominated by those who pressed for revolt against Rome. Unable to restrain the war party, he reluctantly joined it, hoping that in short time the governor of Syria, Cestius Gallus, would crush the rebellion. But Cestius failed, and his army was thoroughly routed.

Josephus contradicts himself on a number of details regarding his commission and conduct at this point; as a result, his motives and his behavior as commander of the Galilean forces are not clear. Apparently, however, he spent the half year between Cestius' defeat and Vespasian's arrival in reorganizing and administration of Galilee, fortifying a number of cities, storing up provisions, and training his army —though it is unknown where he learned military discipline and tactics.

Before long his enemies began to accuse him of various treacheries, and on several occasions both his commission and his life were in danger. His bitterest enemy was John of Gischala, whom Josephus always speaks of in most abusive terms.

By the spring of 67 Josephus, deserted by most of his army, was driven to the fortified town of Jotapata. The town fell after a siege of forty-seven days. He hid for some time in a cave with a number of survivors, who vowed that they would take their own lives rather than surrender. Either through trickery or by coincidence, Josephus and one companion were the last to remain after the others had killed themselves. With his companion, Josephus emerged from the cave and gave himself up. He was brought before Vespasian as a prisoner. He now predicted to Vespasian that he, Vespasian, would shortly become emperor. When this prediction was fulfilled in 69, Vespasian made Josephus a free man.

From the time of his surrender to the end of his life Josephus remained a client of the Flavian emperors (hence the adoption of the name Flavius). So long as the Great War lasted, he served the Roman forces as interpreter and mediator. After the war he not only received gifts from Titus (see TITUS 3), but also accompanied the Roman commander to Rome, settled there on an imperial pension with the rights of a Roman citizen in a former palace of Vespasian, and devoted himself to a literary career.

His domestic life was not a happy one. He was married four times; his second wife deserted him; his third wife he divorced. By his third wife he had three sons and by his last wife, two.

Josephus' words have survived because of the church's interest in them, most likely because of a debatable passage on the Founder of Christianity in the Antiquities. These works are the principal source for the history of the Jews from Hasmonean times to the fall of Masada in 73. They are also an apologia, at times in behalf of Rome, at times in behalf of the Jews and Judaism, always in his own behalf.

His earliest work was the War—i.e., the history of the Jewish war against Rome—which he wrote shortly after the fall of the Jewish state. It is a revision or new edition in Greek of a work he originally composed in Aramaic. The work is divided into seven books, the first of which is a rapid survey of Jewish history in the Hellenistic-Roman period; a primary source for him was the life of Herod written by Nicholas of Damascus. In the remaining books Josephus takes up the story of the revolt against Rome and its aftermath. Here he had not only his own limited experience to draw on, but also the records kept by the Roman commanders which were at his disposal, as well as information from those who fled Jerusalem and took refuge with the Roman forces. The history is written with dramatic effect. Thucydidean speeches in the mouths of leading persons, echoes of the idiom of Sophocles, descriptive passages (of geographical locations, of particular scenes of suffering or heroism, of fighting stratagems), give the work rhetorical vigor. As in the composition of all his subsequent works, Josephus had the assistance of Greek collaborators, since his own knowledge of Greek was probably never more than mediocre, especially when he was preparing his first work. What stands out above all in the War is its pro-Roman tone: the work was not only produced under Flavian auspices but was also supposed to impress all readers with the futility of rising against the Empire.

There is a Slavonic version of the War, but it is doubtful if this version was based directly on the Aramaic original. Most scholars are still of the opinion that the Slavonic is a secondary translation of the Greek.

Ca. twenty years after the publication of the War, ca. 93-94, during the reign of Domitian, Josephus put out his second great work, the Jewish Antiquities. It is a history of the Jews, in twenty books, modeled after the Roman Antiquities by Dionysius of Halicarnassus, from patriarchal times up to the outbreak of the war with Rome. The first ten books, which bring the story down to the Babylonian captivity, are essentially a paraphrase of the LXX version supplemented by homiletic and haggadic material. The latter ten volumes take up the story from the return to Judea under Cyrus. In these books Josephus drew on biblical and apocryphal sources, haggadic traditions, handbooks of Greek historians, and the writings of Nicholas of Damascus, Strabo, and other Roman historians. The work was designed to portray to the cultivated Greco-Roman world the high antiquity and splendid achievements of the Jews.

It is instructive to compare what Josephus says in the Antiquities with what he says in the War, where subject matter overlaps. In the Antiquities the account is often more ample, the tone less decidedly pro-Roman, and altogether the mood less enthusiastic toward his earlier political attitude and appraisals. Careful analysis of the Greek idiom reveals also where Josephus turned from one of his Greek assistants to another, a slavish imitator of Thucydidean mannerisms. Of special interest also are the documents and edicts incorporated by Josephus in this work.

It was to the Antiquities that Josephus attached his Vita as an appendix. This little work was written as a self-defense against the accusations of a rival historian, Justus of Tiberias, who charged that Josephus was responsible for the outbreak of the war, at least for the revolt of Tiberias against Rome. The autobiography is chiefly an account of Josephus' life during the six months when he "commanded" the forces in Galilee before the arrival of Vespasian.

Finally, he wrote an eloquent apology for Judaism in two books, Against Apion. The work is more than a defense of Judaism against the slanders of Apion; it is a defense against all sorts of Egyptian and Greek calumnies of Jewish morality and culture. In making this defense Josephus also takes an aggressive position, criticizing Gentile morality and teachings as he compares them with "Mosaic law." Against Apion remains one of the classic and most vigorous apologies for Judaism.

In his writings Josephus refers to other works which he planned: a treatise on Jerusalem and the temple, a work on the Mosaic code and the nature of God; but apparently he never produced these. Several works were at one time ascribed to Josephus by the church fathers, of which he is not the author.

Bibliography. The principal edition of the Greek text of Josephus' works is that by B. Niesen (Berlin, 1885-95). Other editions are: N. Bentwich, Josephus (1914); H. St. John Thackeray and R. Marcus, eds., Josephus, Loeb Classical Library, vols. I-VIII (1926); H. St. John Thackeray, Josephus, the Man and the Historian (1929); W. R. Farmer, Maccabees, Zealots, and Josephus (1956). J. GOLDIN

JOSES jō′zīz ['Ιωσῆς]. 1. A brother of Jesus (Mark 6:3).

2. A brother of James the Less, whose mother, Mary, stood by the cross of Jesus and came to his grave (Mark 15:40, 47).

3. KJV form of JOSEPH 15.

JOSHAH jŏsh′ə [יושה] (I Chr. 4:34). A Simeonite.

JOSHAPHAT jŏsh′ə făt [יושפט, Yahu hath judged]; KJV JEHOSHAPHAT jĭ hŏsh′ə făt in I Chr. 15:24. 1. A Mithnite included by the Chronicler among the Mighty Men of David known as the "Thirty" (I Chr. 11:43).

2. One of the priests who were charged with the responsibility of blowing the trumpet before the ark of God, particularly in the procession that accompanied the ark as it was being conveyed into Jerusalem by David (I Chr. 15:24). E. R. DALGLISH

JOSHAVIAH jŏsh′ə vī′ə [יושויה] (I Chr. 11:46). One of the sons of Elnaam who is included by the Chronicler among the Mighty Men of David known as the "Thirty."

JOSHBEKASHAH jŏsh′bĭ kā′shə [יושבקשה]. According to I Chr. 25:4 (cf. vs. 24), one of the singers appointed by David; yet the names in this verse form a liturgical prayer, and may not refer to real persons. See GIDDALTI.

JOSHEB-BASSHEBETH jō′shĭb bă shē′bĭth. See JASHOBEAM.

JOSHIBIAH jŏsh′ə bī′ə [יושביה, may Yahu cause to dwell (safely)] (I Chr. 4:35); KJV JOSIBIAH jŏs′ĭ bī′ə. A Simeonite.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 28, 202.

JOSHUA jŏsh′o͝o ə [יהושע, יהושוע, Yahu is salvation]. 1. See JOSHUA SON OF NUN.

2. The man of Beth-shemesh in whose field the ark, drawn in a cart by two milch cows, came to a halt after it was sent away by the Philistines (I Sam. 6:14). See ARK OF THE COVENANT.

3. A governor of the city of Jerusalem during the reign of King Josiah (II Kings 23:8).

4. Alternate form of JESHUA.

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 16, 18, 70, 106-7, 110, 154. B. T. DAHLBERG

JOSHUA, BOOK OF. The sixth book in the OT, and in the Hebrew Bible the first of the Former Prophets (see CANON OF THE OT). It describes the invasion of Canaan after the Exodus and wilderness wandering and the division and allotment of the land to the tribes of Israel. The central figure in the book is JOSHUA SON OF NUN, from whose name the title (LXX, 'Ιησούς; Vulg. Iosue) comes.

A. Outline of contents
B. Composition
  1. Pentateuchal documents in Joshua
  2. Sanctuary and tribal traditions
    a. Gilgal traditions
    b. Traditions of the tribe of Benjamin
    c. S traditions
    d. N traditions
  3. Border and town lists
  4. The Deuteronomic compilation
  5. Successive editions
C. Joshua in the Deuteronomic history
D. Historical significance
  1. Narratives of conquest
  2. Division of the land

3. Amphictyonic covenant traditions
E. Theology
Bibliography

A. OUTLINE OF CONTENTS.

I. The conquest of Canaan, 1:1–12:24
  A. Crossing the Jordan, 1:1–5:12
    1. Preparation for the crossing, ch. 1
    2. Spies in Jericho, ch. 2
    3. Miraculous crossing, 3:1–5:1
    4. Ceremonies at Gilgal, 5:2-12
  B. First conquests, 5:13–8:35
    1. Appearance of Yahweh's angel, 5:13-15
    2. Capture of Jericho, ch. 6
    3. Campaign to Ai, 7:1–8:29
      a. Failure at Ai, 7:1-5
      b. Punishment of Achan, 7:6-26
      c. Success at Ai, 8:1-29
    4. Covenant ceremony at Shechem, 8:30-35
  C. Success in S-central Canaan, 9:1–10:27
    1. Preparation of kings for war, 9:1-2
    2. Covenant with Gibeonites, 9:3-27
    3. Battle at Gibeon, 10:1-15
    4. Capture of five kings at Makkedah, 10: 16-27
  D. S campaign, 10:28-43
    1. Capture of Makkedah, vs. 28
    2. Capture of Libnah, vss. 29-30
    3. Capture of Lachish, vss. 31-32
    4. Defeat of king of Gezer, vs. 33
    5. Capture of Eglon, vss. 34-35
    6. Capture of Hebron, vss. 36-37
    7. Capture of Debir, vss. 38-39
    8. Summary of S success, vss. 40-43
  E. N campaign, 11:1-15
    1. Preparation of Canaanites for war, vss. 1-5
    2. Battle at Waters of Merom, vss. 6-9
    3. Destruction of Hazor, vss. 10-15
  F. Summary of conquest, 11:16–12:24
    1. Summary of land conquered, 11:16-20
    2. Decimation of the Anakim, 11:21-23
    3. Summary of kings conquered, ch. 12
      a. Transjordanian kings, vss. 1-6
      b. Canaanite kings, vss. 7-24
II. Allotment of the land, chs. 13–21
  A. Land still unconquered, 13:1-7
  B. Inheritance of Transjordanian tribes, 13:8-33
    1. Transjordanian territory, vss. 8-14
    2. Borders of Reuben, vss. 15-23
    3. Cities of Gad, vss. 24-28
    4. Region of Transjordanian Manasseh, vss. 29-31
    5. Summary, vss. 32-33
  C. Allotment of Canaan, chs. 14–19
    1. Introduction, 14:1-5
    2. Allotment to Judah, 14:6–15:63
      a. Claim of Caleb, 14:6-15
      b. Borders of Judah, 15:1-12
      c. Conquests of Caleb and Othniel, 15: 13-19
      d. Cities of Judah, 15:20-63
    3. Allotment to Joseph tribes, chs. 16–17
      a. S boundary, 16:1-4
      b. Borders of Ephraim, 16:5-10
      c. Allotment to Manasseh, 17:1-13
      d. Complaint of Joseph tribes, 17:14-18
    4. Allotment to other tribes, chs. 18–19
      a. Survey of remaining territory, 18:1-10
      b. Borders and cities of Benjamin, 18: 11-28
      c. Cities of Simeon, 19:1-9
      d. Borders of Zebulun, 19:10-16
      e. Cities of Issachar, 19:17-23
      f. Borders of Asher, 19:24-31
      g. Borders and cities of Naphtali, 19: 32-39
      h. Cities of Dan, 19:40-48
      i. Joshua's city, 19:49-50
      j. Completion of allotment, 19:51
  D. Cities of refuge, ch. 20
  E. Levitical cities, ch. 21
III. Departure of Transjordanian tribes, ch. 22
IV. Joshua's last days, chs. 23–24
  A. Joshua's farewell address, ch. 23
  B. Covenant at Shechem, 24:1-28
  C. Death and burial of Joshua, 24:29-31
  D. Two burial traditions, 24:32-33
    1. Burial of Joseph's bones at Shechem, vs. 32
    2. Burial of Eleazar at Gibeah in Ephraim, vs. 33

B. COMPOSITION. The problems of the book of Joshua are numerous and complicated. Not least among them is the problem of composition. Contemporary scholarship dismisses the tradition that Joshua was the author. The book has received its title from the fact that Joshua is the principal actor in it. Most scholars find in the book a multiplicity of authors, though a few students of the problem (notably Yehezkel Kaufmann; see bibliography) conclude that with some additions and subtractions the book was composed by a single author soon after the events which it relates. Inner contradictions in the book and the witness of archaeology sufficiently disprove this view. But among those who assert that the book was compiled, composed, and edited much later, there is by no means unanimity on the process and steps through which it went.

1. Pentateuchal documents in Joshua. A number of scholars discover the documents of the Pentateuch in Joshua, thus giving rise to the term HEXATEUCH. The argument is twofold: (a) the narratives of Joshua provide the climax to the Pentateuchal promise that Israel will possess the land (cf. Gen. 13:14-17; 15:7, 18; 17:8; etc.); (b) the documentary components of Joshua show literary affinities with the Pentateuchal documents.

The kinds of inconsistencies to be observed in the Pentateuch are also visible here: (a) According to Josh. 4:8, twelve stones were carried out of the Jordan and set up at Gilgal. According to vs. 9, the stones were set up in the middle of the Jordan. (b) In 6:5 the order was given to shout at the blast of the trumpet, whereas in vs. 10 the people were not to shout until Joshua gave the command. (c) On the eve of the second attack upon Ai (8:3), Joshua sent thirty thousand men to lie in ambush behind the city. The next morning he sent five thousand to the same place (vs. 12). Such contradictions provide some ground for separation of the sources.

This hypothesis finds the bulk of the conquest narrative (chs. 1–12) to be E and D, with a very few traces of J (e.g., 5:13-14; 9:6-7; 10:12-13*a;* and a few other doubtful places). The editing done by the Deuteronomist has been so thorough that J has virtually been suppressed. It is almost as difficult to discover original remains of E (cf. a substratum in 2:1-9, 12-23; an incomplete stratum of the crossing of the Jordan in chs. 3–4; 5:2-3, 8-9, 13-14; one of the strands of the Jericho story in ch. 6; part of the narrative of the compact with the Gibeonites in 9:3, 6*a*, 8-11[?], 14-15*a;* some of the details of chs. 10–11, perhaps 10:6, 16-24; 11:1-9; etc.). The Deuteronomic editor has so covered up the original JE (or J and E) reports that they are scarcely recoverable.

The P document does not appear, save for some glosses, until the division of the land (chs. 13–21), and most of this section is usually ascribed to P, some of it to an even later time. Most of ch. 22 is also ascribed to P. Ch. 23 is a farewell address composed by the Deuteronomist, while ch. 24 is substantially E with Deuteronomic editing.

Scholars who presuppose the existence of the Pentateuchal documents in Joshua are hard pressed to explain their absence! Analysis is complicated by the complete Deuteronomic rewriting, which obliterated them, and the conclusion is that much of the J and E material has been suppressed. Those who attempt documentary analysis come to radically different conclusions.

The results are so inconclusive that it seems justifiable to doubt that the Pentateuchal documents continue into Joshua. The argument from the promise of the land cannot stand apart from the demonstration of literary contacts. The only literary contact on which everyone agrees is with Deuteronomy and the rest of the Deuteronomic history (Judges–Kings). In its present form Joshua is thoroughly Deuteronomic. As will be seen below, even the ascription to P of the allotment of the land has been undercut by the most recent work.

2. Sanctuary and tribal traditions. Within this category is the pre-Deuteronomic material now contained in chs. 1–12. The Deuteronomic editor has so totally recast the material that it is only with the greatest difficulty and diffidence that one can identify any fragment as unchanged from its original form. The most we can say is that much of Josh. 1–12 originated as tribal and sanctuary traditions. The precise form in which the traditions existed before their recasting by the Deuteronomic editor can no longer be ascertained. But the editor was certainly not creating the narratives from his imagination.

a. Gilgal traditions. After the crossing of the Jordan (chs. 3–4), the center of Israelite activity was the sanctuary of Gilgal. Here the twelve stones from the Jordan were set up as a memorial of the miraculous crossing (4:20-24). Here the circumcision of the nation took place (5:2-9), and the Passover which marked the end of the manna was celebrated (5:10-12). From this point until the survey of the land (18:1), Israel had its permanent camp at Gilgal, and Joshua brought the army back there after each campaign into the hills (cf. 9:6; 10:6, 15, 43; 14:6). Gilgal was apparently the principal Benjaminite sanctuary, for here the Benjaminite Saul was crowned, according to one of the strands of the Saul narrative (I Sam. 11:12-15; cf. 13:2-15*a*). Independent evidence, therefore, shows that for a time, at least, Gilgal took a leading part in the religious and military life of the Israelite confederacy. The material which may most probably be assigned to the Gilgal sanctuary is the substratum underlying the Jericho traditions (Josh. 2; 6), the kernel of the story of crossing the Jordan (3:1–5:12), and perhaps the tradition of the naming of the Valley of Achor (7:1, 6-26; this may possibly be a Judahite story).

b. Traditions of the tribe of Benjamin. The separation of the traditions of Gilgal, the Benjaminite sanctuary, from those of the tribe of Benjamin is somewhat arbitrary, and the distinction must be regarded as tentative at best. The remainder of chs. 2–9 is included in this category—i.e., the traditions of the capture of Ai (7:2-5; 8:1-29) and of the covenant with the Gibeonites (9:3-27). Both these stories take place in the hill country of Benjamin, and they may be regarded as general traditions of the tribe. The story of the covenant with the Gibeonites has been well worked over, and the words "for the house of my God" (9:23*b*) and "for the altar of the LORD" (vs. 27*b*) probably represent Deuteronomic expansion. The Ai tradition is best explained as a folk legend from the Benjaminite area around Ai, connected with the name of the site, which means "ruin."

Whether the battle at Gibeon and in the Valley of Aijalon (10:1-15) belongs with the Benjaminite traditions is uncertain. The close connection of the story with the following narrative of the kings in the cave at Makkedah (vss. 16-27) suggests to some that the two were originally one story, broken now by vs. 15, which is probably an addition (cf. vs. 43). On the other hand, the important part played by Gibeon (Benjaminite) and the Valley of Aijalon (probably Danite) in the fragment from the Book of Jashar (vss. 12*b*-13*a; see* JASHAR, BOOK OF) may indicate that the story of the battle (vss. 1-14) has been arbitrarily connected with that of the five kings. The battle, indeed, may have been concocted to explain the poetic fragment.

c. S traditions. If the two portions of 10:1-27 are originally separate, vss. 16-27 must come from the Shephelah of Judah in the neighborhood of MAKKEDAH, the location of which is uncertain. The introduction of the five kings in 10:3, 5, is the secondary effort to combine the two stories.

From the S comes also the catalogue of S fortresses conquered by Joshua (10:28-43). This campaign is not described with the narrative detail of the other traditions and may come from an ancient annal.

d. N traditions. Josh. 11:1-15 presents the narrative of a N campaign, in which the only details are that the major battle took place at the Waters of Merom (vs. 7) and that Joshua burned only Hazor of all the N fortified cities (vss. 11-13). Again the impression is of annals rather than of folk traditions. The substratum of the whole section, 10:28–11:15 (discounting such a clearly Deuteronomic addition as 10:40-43), may belong to an early catalogue of victories in Joshua's campaign.

3. Border and town lists. Chs. 13–19 present the border and town lists of the twelve tribes, to which are appended the lists of the cities of refuge in ch. 20 (cf. Num. 35:9-28; Deut. 19:1-13) and the Levitical cities in ch. 21 (cf. Num. 35:1-8; I Chr. 6:54-81). A few narrative fragments have also found their way into this section. Most of these are paralleled by other OT narratives (Josh. 14:6-12 [cf. Num. 13–14]; Josh. 15:14-19 [cf. Judg. 1:10-15, 20]; Josh. 17:3-4 [cf. Num. 27:1-7, greatly expanded by priestly editors]). The priority is very hard to determine. The traditions probably go back to early times, when the independent origin of Calebite and Kenizzite clans was still acknowledged in Judah, and when the clans of Manasseh were still known. They probably belong, therefore, to tribal traditions and have been inserted into the boundary lists by the editor.

The lists themselves are of diverse character. In some particulars, border and city lists differ from one another. Kiriath-jearim is on the Benjäminite side of the Judah-Benjamin border (18:28), yet it is mentioned as a Judahite city (15:60). Beth-arabah is listed in both Judah (15:61) and Benjamin (18:22). Benjamin likewise has some towns which are N of the border delineated in 18:11-20—e.g., Zemaraim (vs. 22) and Ophrah (vs. 23). The city list of Judah includes most of the cities of Simeon (cf. 15:26-32; 19:2-7), as well as several of the tribe of Dan (e.g., Eshtaol, Zorah, and Ekron). We do not have border accounts for the tribes of Dan, Issachar, Transjordanian Manasseh, and Simeon (explained in 19:9). The border accounts of Ephraim, Manasseh, Asher, Naphtali, Reuben, and Gad are sketchy in the extreme. We are not given city lists for Ephraim, Manasseh, or Transjordanian Manasseh, and we have brief and obviously incomplete city lists for Zebulun, Asher, and Reuben. The list of Levitical cities in ch. 21 (cf. I Chr. 6:54-81, which differs in some details) contradicts border accounts in four cases: Shechem is placed in Ephraim instead of in Manasseh, Daberath is placed in Issachar instead of in Zebulun (Josh. 19:13), Jokneam is placed in Zebulun instead of in Asher(?), and Heshbon is placed in Gad instead of in Reuben (13:17). These divergences and omissions make the tribal claims of Josh. 13–19 uncertain, at best. Tribal boundaries probably shifted more than once, and the lists of chs. 13–21 represent a multiplicity of sources and ages.

It has been suggested, most persuasively by Alt and Noth (see bibliography), that the lists of chs. 13–19 come from a document which set out tribal boundaries in the premonarchic period. This is true not only of the lists which purport to present boundaries but also of some of the Galilean city lists, which were actually, as Noth says, Grenzfixpunkte, points which lay on the boundary but without the designation of lines between them. These lists have been expanded, in some cases by the addition of lines along the fixed points of the borders and in some cases by the addition of other material such as the city lists of Judah and Benjamin. It has been suggested (by Cross and Wright; see bibliography) that the city list of Benjamin (18:21-28) belongs with that of Judah (15:21-62) as the official description of administrative districts in the time of Jehoshaphat. Alt, on the other hand, feels that these lists are from the time of Josiah, and Kallai-Kleinmann (see bibliography) dates the town list of Judah to the time of Hezekiah and that of Benjamin to the conquests of Abijah (cf. II Chr. 13).

The chief difficulty with Noth's hypothesis lies in the N tribes. It is all but impossible to determine the borders of Ephraim and Manasseh, and Manasseh is said to have possessed towns in Issachar and Asher (17:11; En-dor is in the very center of Issachar). The borders of Dan (19:40-48) are not given, and the list of cities is extremely difficult to analyze as a series of boundary points. Noth explains the Dan list as an extract from the province list of 15:21-62, but Cross and Wright think that it is a mixed list in which are both a boundary description and a town list, with no stylistic distinction between them. With the tribes of the far N, the situation is quite difficult. The Zebulun list (19:10-16) purports to give the boundary, which is most difficult to fix, together with a list of only five towns. That of Issachar (19:17-23) is a city list, of which, in its present order, no sense can be made as a series of boundary points. The same seems to be true of Asher (19:24-31), which appears to have been worked into a border account by someone unfamiliar with the territory (cf., e.g., vs. 27, where the boundary goes N from Beth-emek to Kabul, which is actually S of Beth-emek!). The difficulty with Naphtali (19:32-39) is the uncertainty of the boundary on the S and the W, particularly at Hukkok (vs. 34), which is too far E to touch Asher. The analysis of these Galilean lists as official documents seems hazardous and tenuous, and it is tempting to suggest that they are the work of someone who has listed cities of the N tribes from memory. They have subsequently been worked into boundary descriptions by an editor who had no firsthand knowledge of Galilee.

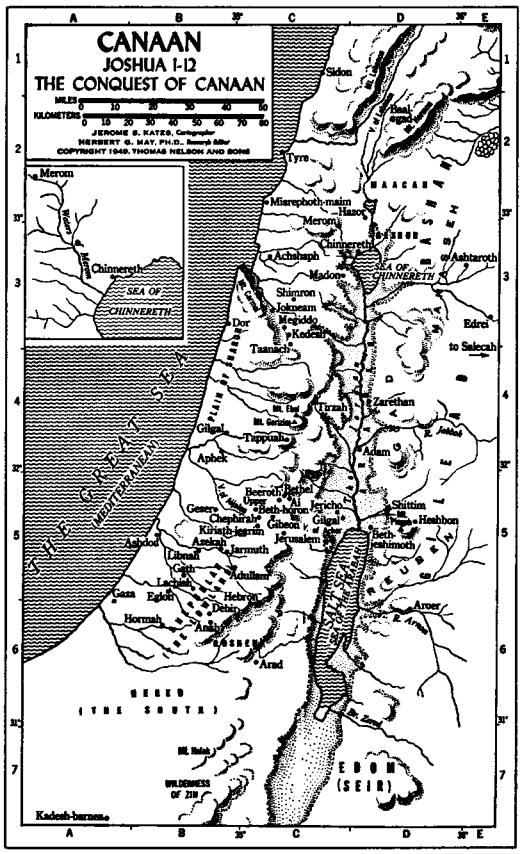
The boundary and town lists, therefore, partake of a double character. Those of Judah and Benjamin are precise, and the town lists reflect administrative districts of monarchic times. The other boundaries are extremely vague. The accounts of Judah and Benjamin, with the city list of Simeon, probably came from Jerusalem archives. The city lists of the N tribes may be from memory, having been worked later into border descriptions. The very sketchy description of the N territory may reflect the period after the destruction of Israel in 721 B.C., when the details were not remembered and the sense of Yahweh's judgment on Israel contributed to the hazy recollection.

4. The Deuteronomic compilation. As we have seen, Joshua is a Deuteronomic book. Probably during the Babylonian exile the work of compiling Israel's history was undertaken. Available to the compiler were a series of Benjaminite traditions, perhaps already in collected form, which may or may not have been attached to Joshua's name, and some annals of the Conquest. He was able to use administrative documents from the government archives in Jerusalem. He rewrote the Benjaminite traditions to a considerable degree, and he placed the boundary descriptions in order, beginning with the Transjordanian territories promised by Moses according to other traditions then extant, and moving on to Judah, Ephraim, and Manasseh, the most influential tribes. Recalling that the sanctuary had at one time been at Shiloh, he placed the report of the survey there (18:1) and put down, in the order in which they occurred to him, the territories of the remaining tribes.

He then appended the lists of cities of refuge (ch. 20), which had probably been traditional for some time, and of the Levitical cities (ch. 21), which may have been drawn up under Josiah (though Albright dates this list in the time of Solomon, on the ground that none of the cities was founded after 950 B.C.). The editor inserted connecting and summarizing links in the recast material, and he wrote the introduction to the book (ch. 1) and Joshua's farewell address (ch. 23).

The narrative of the ceremony at Shechem (ch. 24) is a difficult problem. Most scholars agree that it did not form a part of the Deuteronomic Joshua, at least in its present position. Yet the style is strongly Deuteronomic, and the historical recapitulation (vss. 2-13) is of the same cult-lyric genre as, e.g., Deut. 26:5-11. Placing the ceremony at Shechem reflects the importance of the Shechem sanctuary in the premonarchic period, though Shechem had its importance at later times as well (cf. I Kings 12:1-25). The relation of Josh. 24 to 8:30-35 might shed light on the problem. The latter tradition is purely Deuteronomic in style, and it closely parallels the procedure outlined in ch. 24, but without any ceremonial details. Perhaps ch. 24 stood in the place of 8:30-35 in the original Deuteronomic edition, later being removed to its present position and replaced by the précis of 8:30-35. This, at least, would remove the necessity of postulating a second Deuteronomic hand in ch. 24.

Thus the shape of the book of Joshua comes from the work of a Deuteronomist, who reworked the narrative traditions from Benjamin and some local traditions from Judah and the N, inserted from annalistic sources the outline of the Shephelah and N campaigns (10:28–11:15), wrote campaign summaries (11:16-23), and inserted lists of conquered kings (ch. 12), which may also have come from ancient annals. He organized the division of the land into its present form, recasting some lists and inserting a few narrative traditions and the official town lists of Judah and Benjamin. The whole was concluded with Joshua's farewell address (ch. 23), perhaps also including the tradition of Joshua's burial (24:29-31).



5. Successive editions. Of what remains, we have mostly glosses. It is possible that an editor with a dramatic sense moved the Shechem covenant account (ch. 24) from its original place to its present location. A local tradition of the altar built by the Transjordanian tribes may have been added after the main Deuteronomic compilation (ch. 22). Some see in this tradition the hand of P. It certainly reflects a pan-Israelitism. At the same time, the ascription of this chapter to P is difficult to uphold purely on the basis of style, though there may be some priestly glosses in it (e.g., the "whole assembly of the people of Israel" [vs. 12]; "Phinehas the son of Eleazar the priest" [vss. 13, 30-32]). There are doubtless priestly glosses elsewhere in the book (e.g., 3:4*b*, 12; 4:19; 5:10-11; 9:17-21[?]; 13:21*b*-22; 14:1-5[?]; 19:51 ["Eleazar the priest . . . and the heads of the fathers' houses of the tribes of the people of Israel"]). Certain portions of ch. 21 may also bear the priestly imprint (cf. the lists of Levitical families in 21:4-7; the "descendants of Aaron" in vs. 10*a*; vss. 10*b*-13*a* [to "Aaron the priest"]). To priestly glossators may likewise be assigned the two burial traditions closing the book (24:32-33). But these successive editions scarcely deserve the name. They are little more than occasional glosses, and they are not sufficient to assign to any individual, such as a P author. The book of Joshua had substantially its present form following the work of the Deuteronomic compiler and editor during the period of exile.

C. JOSHUA IN THE DEUTERONOMIC HISTORY. To Martin Noth we owe what has become a commonplace of OT scholarship: the recognition that Deuteronomy–Kings forms a separate historical work. The book of Joshua takes its place as the first stage of the Deuteronomic history of Israel. The Deuteronomist is not interested in the patriarchs at all, save for a somewhat hazy interest in Jacob. Moses forms the beginning of Israel with his giving of the covenantal law. But the conquest of Canaan is the point at which, for the Deuteronomic history, Israel's story really begins. Here the covenant is put to work, renewed, and spread to cover the covenantal people in the Land of Promise. The historian looks back on the Conquest with nostalgia (24:31). Some of its monuments remain "to this day." At the time he is writing his historical work, the nostalgia is the greater, for Israel does not, in fact, possess the land. The story of its conquest with the help of Yahweh is told with the greater zeal, and it betrays a certain eschatological fervor on the part of the historian. For this historian, indeed, the situation worsened after the glorious days of Joshua. The period of the judges, for all its transitory victories, was a period of anarchy (cf. Judg. 21:25), which was removed only by the power of Davidic royalty. Indeed, Joshua foreshadows the monarchy in the Deuteronomist's account (see JOSHUA SON OF NUN; priestly glossators have highlighted this motif by coupling him with Eleazar the priest, as Moses, the royal prototype, had his priestly colleague in Aaron, Zerubbabel his in Jeshua [cf. Ezra 3:2, 8; 5:2; Zech. 4], and Nehemiah, according to the present form of EZRA AND NEHEMIAH, in Ezra).

The book of Joshua, therefore, presents the historian's view of the possession of the land. He knew that Israel had more battles to fight before the land was entirely won (cf. 13:1-6; 15:63; 16:10; 17:12-13, 16-18; Judg. 4–5; 13:2–16:31; II Sam. 5:6-9). Nevertheless, Joshua's conquest is presented as complete (cf. Josh. 11:23), and the parceling out of the land includes territory which never belonged to Israel (e.g., in the far N of Asher) or which belonged to the nation only much later (e.g., the Philistine territory on the S ranges of the Coastal Plain in the town lists of Judah and Dan). There is a visionary character to this stage of the Deuteronomist's history which must not be forgotten. His dream, set down during the dark days of the Babylonian overlordship, is the full possession of the whole land, and he expresses Israel's claim to the land by his ordering of the materials regarding Joshua's conquest.

D. HISTORICAL SIGNIFICANCE. We have seen that the Deuteronomic editor reworked the original materials into his own coherent account of Joshua's achievements. We may now assess these traditions for their historical worth.

1. Narratives of conquest. The greatest controversy has centered around the narratives of chs. 1–12. Alt and Noth (see bibliography) have concluded that the detailed narratives (2:1–10:27) represent local traditions of an etiological character. Albright and his followers (see bibliography) have objected to this rather high-handed treatment of historical documents. They accuse Alt and Noth of dispensing with archaeological information altogether.

When the detailed narratives are examined in the light of the history of traditions and of archaeology, we may only conclude that 2:1–10:27 presents etiological traditions which have no bearing on the history of the Conquest. The tale of the spies, of course (ch. 2), cannot be checked. That it has undergone extensive rewriting is evident in the narrative style. It belongs with the Jericho narrative (ch. 6). The story of the crossing of the Jordan (3:1–5:9) is a complex of traditions involving two versions of the crossing and one circumcision tradition, if not two. The two versions of the crossing cannot be separated into complete strands, as the editing has been very heavy (see § B1 above). Interwoven with them is an interpretation, probably the work of the editor, which makes the story virtually a doublet of the crossing of the sea under Moses (Exod. 14). The circumcision traditions involve both the name of a hill near Gilgal, Gibeath-haaraloth (the "hill of the foreskins"; 5:3), and the name of Gilgal itself (5:9). The interest of these stories lies in these phenomena, though the Deuteronomist has made them more edifying. Archaeology has not yet cast much light on the GILGAL story.

Archaeological evidence at JERICHO is ambiguous. Late Bronze remains are very scarce, and the usual dating of them is during the fourteenth century B.C. At the time usually given for Joshua's invasion (last half of the thirteenth century B.C.) the city could hardly have been more than a hilltop fortification, if it was that much. The great victory of Josh. 6 is highly imaginative. Is it etiological? Noth is reluctant to specify the etiological basis of the story. It probably explains the ruins of the great city in the midst of Benjamin, for Jericho was not rebuilt until the ninth century B.C. Local legend probably dwelt on the city's former glories, and a fall at the hands of Joshua explained their loss.

The story of the treachery and execution of Achan (7:1, 6-26) turns around the naming of the Valley of Achor. No archaeological check can be made on the story, but mention of the heap of stones which "remains to this day" (vs. 26*a*), together with the name of the valley, places the tradition in the realm of etiology. As for Ai, excavations at et-Tell, the undoubted site of Ai, show that, except for a few houses ca. 1000 B.C., Ai had been uninhabited since ca. 2200 B.C. Hence the story cannot be historical, unless we accept the attractive theory of Albright, that the tradition of the capture of Bethel, only ca. 1½ miles distant, has been transferred to the ruin of Ai. But this hypothesis, ingenious as it is, cannot be treated as established fact.

The remaining Benjaminite tradition is that of the covenant with the Gibeonites (ch. 9), which tells how the Gibeonites became servants of Israel (cf. vss. 21, 27). Once again archaeology casts a shadow on the story. Recent campaigns at el-Jib, which hardly anyone doubts is ancient Gibeon, have failed to unearth any remains of the Late Bronze Age or of the first two centuries of the Early Iron Age. The town is mentioned in the campaign report of Sheshonk I, which comes from the second half of the tenth century B.C. (cf. I Kings 14:25-28; see SHISHAK). Thus far, at least, we have no evidence that Gibeon existed at the time of Joshua's campaign. The etiological element of the story becomes, therefore, its literary raison d'être.

It would seem natural to suppose that if these Benjaminite traditions do not reflect the invasion under Joshua, they bear on the entry of Benjamin into Canaan. Yet the archaeological evidence suggests that, save for the narratives of a camp at Gilgal and perhaps the fall of Jericho, the stories are of no more value for a hypothetical Benjaminite invasion than for that under Joshua. The actual course of Israel's conquest of Canaan is shrouded by time and obscurity.

We are still in the realm of legend with the battle at Gibeon (10:1-15) and the five kings in the cave at Makkedah (vss. 16-27). If Gibeon was not in existence, a battle could hardly have been fought over it. The story, indeed, probably took its rise from the quotation of the Book of Jashar, which can only refer to a later battle at Gibeon, possibly aided by dense clouds which obscured the light. Such, at least, is the most probable meaning of the sun and moon "standing still" (עמד; vss. 12*b*-13*a;* cf. Hab. 3:11). The reference to hailstones (vs. 11) points to this interpretation, though a later glossator, perhaps the Deuteronomist, has given a more miraculous cast to the tale by explaining that the sun stayed in the sky for a whole day (vs. 13).

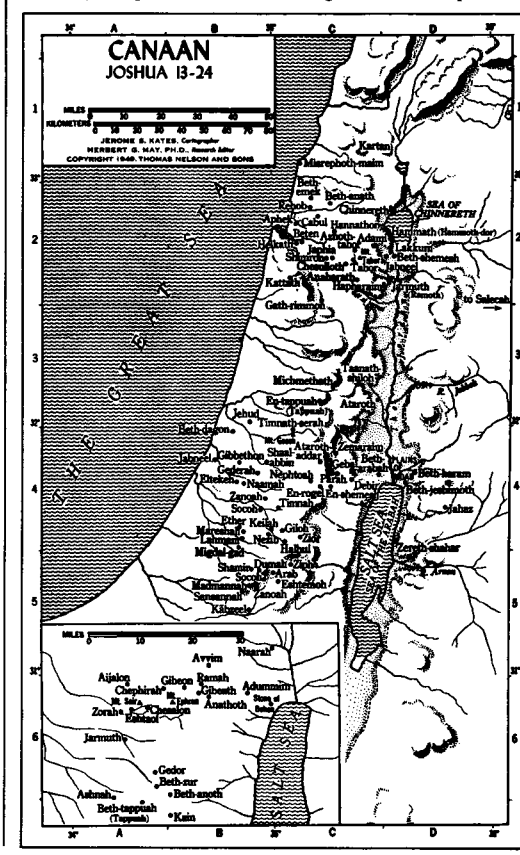
The story of the capture of five kings in the cave at Makkedah (vss. 16-27) rings much truer, and several scholars have severely criticized Noth for his insistence on its etiological character. At the same time, lacking any external check on the story, to say that it is the report of an actual happening is no less hypothetical than to explain it as etiological. The etiological factor is there: the sealed cave with five trees standing near by (vss. 26-27). If we could be certain of the location of Makkedah, some minimal archaeological check might be available.



Criticisms of Alt and Noth, principally from Albright and his followers, lean heavily on archaeological data, which provide strong support for the remainder of Josh. 10–11. Excavations at Lachish (10: 31-32; modern Tell ed-Duweir), Eglon (vss. 34-35; modern Tell el-Hesi), and Debir (vss. 38-39; modern Tell Beit Mirsim) have shown evidence of violent conflagrations in the last half of the thirteenth century B.C. Recent work at Hazor (11:1-11; modern Tell el-Qedah) and Bethel (12:16) yields approximately the same result.

The evidence is clearly not all available. But a campaign in the Shephelah probably took place as reported in Josh. 10:28-39; and a N campaign, as related in 11:1-15, probably occurred at about the same time. But the substantial accuracy of these annalistic narratives cannot be used to uphold the historical accuracy of 2:1–10:27.

2. Division of the land. We have seen above that the documents underlying chs. 13–21 are of little use in reconstructing the history of Joshua's time. Some are official records from a later date; others may be lists of sites set down and put in order from memory. That the territories of the tribes were carefully defined in this early period is most improbable. Border cities move from tribe to tribe in various passages of the OT (cf., e.g., the location of Kiriath-jearim in Benjamin in 18:28, but in Judah in 15:60; Judg. 18: 12). At the same time, the care with which the borders of Judah and Benjamin are drawn in Josh. 15:1-12; 18:11-20 suggests that some effort was made —perhaps in the premonarchic period—to establish and maintain the proper boundaries (cf. the injunctions against removing landmarks in Deut. 19:14; 27:17; Job 24:2; Prov. 22:28; 23:10). That the borders of the N tribes are so doubtful may be due to the fact that the Deuteronomic history is a product of Judah, and the details of these N territories may have been forgotten.

3. Amphictyonic covenant traditions. A great deal of emphasis has been placed in recent study on the so-called amphictyonic relationship of the Israelite tribes after the Conquest (see JUDGES, BOOK OF; ISRAEL, HISTORY OF, § 3). The term is taken from the twelve-clan leagues of ancient Greece, and it denotes a confederacy of independent tribes centered around a sanctuary. In a number of passages, evidence is to be found that SHECHEM was that sanctuary (cf., e.g., Deut. 11:26-32; 27). Josh. 24 is extremely important in this regard, for it presents evidence to suggest that the tribes held a covenant renewal ceremony at Shechem, perhaps yearly.

Before coming directly to Josh. 24, some other factors in the structure of Joshua may be noted. Three main shrines figure in the book as centers of national activity. Gilgal is the base of operations from 4:19 to 17:18, save for the side trip to Shechem in 8:30-35. Gilgal is associated, therefore, with the Conquest and with the allotment of land to the Transjordanian tribes and to Judah, Ephraim, and Manasseh. In chs. 18–23 we may presume the center to be Shiloh (cf. 18:1, 8-10; 22:12). Shiloh, therefore, is associated with land allotment to the remaining seven tribes, with the designation of cities of refuge and Levitical cities, and with the misunderstanding over the altar built by the Transjordanian tribes (ch. 22). In ch. 24 we come to Shechem for the second time. It has been suggested above that perhaps ch. 24 stood in the place of 8:30-35 in the first Deuteronomic edition and that it was subsequently moved to its present position. This would put the Shechem covenant account after the first phase of the Conquest, the capture of Jericho and of Ai. (The fact that in the LXX 8:30-35 follows 9:2 is of no importance. In either position the renewal of the covenant represents a consolidation by the conquering tribes.)

It has often been noted that Joshua relates no conquest of the central portion of Palestine, the territory of Ephraim and most of Manasseh. In this connection the covenant at Shechem is most interesting, for it may represent what was in the first instance the coalition of only a few tribes. Which ones they were is a matter of conjecture. Josh. 19:50; 24:30 make Joshua an Ephraimite. Perhaps the Shechem covenant was the alignment of Ephraim and Manasseh, the latter having been resident in central Palestine since before the descent into Egypt of the tribes involved in the Exodus. Whether other tribes were at first included in the Shechem covenant must remain doubtful. Shechem later became the central sanctuary of the twelve-tribe amphictyony for a time, but the sanctuary was moved, probably to Bethel (cf. Judg. 20:18) and still later to Shiloh (cf. I Sam. 1). The latter situation may be mirrored in Josh. 18–23. But the complexities of location of the Israelite amphictyonic sanctuary have not yet been elucidated.

E. THEOLOGY. Since the book of Joshua in its present form is Deuteronomic, it is informed throughout by the Deuteronomic viewpoint. No other theology can now be discerned beneath the Deuteronomic overlay, if any other was ever there.

This viewpoint sees the keystone to Joshua's work as the gracious act of God in giving Israel the land of Canaan. Though there is much glorification of Joshua, the glory for the Conquest goes to God alone (cf. 1:9*b;* 3:10; 4:23-24; 6:16; 8:1*b;* 10:14; 11:6-8; 13:6*b;* 18:3; 21:43-45; 23:2*b*-16; 24:2-13, 17-18). God has given Israel the land. He has fought for and with the armies, and at his command Israel has taken and divided the territory. The Conquest is not Israel's but Yahweh's. No battles could have been won unless God had fought them; indeed, one was lost because Achan disobeyed God's command (7:1-5). Obedience is demanded because of God's gracious leading (23:5-6; 24:13-14, 16-18), and this obedience is the service of Yahweh "with all your heart and with all your soul" (22:5). With the possession of the Promised Land goes the vast obligation to responsibility (23:14-16; 24:19-20). The allotment of the land is undertaken under the direction of Yahweh (cf. 19:51). At the same time, we do not hear in Joshua, as we do elsewhere (e.g., I Kings 8:36; Ps. 85:1—H 85:2; Isa. 14:25; Jer. 2:7; 16:18; Ezek. 38:16; Joel 2:18; 3:2—H 4:2), that the land belongs in the first instance to Yahweh. Yahweh takes it from the Canaanites in order that Israel may "inherit" it, but "inherit" means "take possession of it and pass it on to your heirs" (see INHERITANCE). The marvel of the Conquest is not that Israel is given that which belongs to no one else, but that Israel is made to displace the previous owners.

This has raised acute questions for the religious conscience. Can a God of justice and mercy condone the arbitrary ascription to his will of bloody conquest? No easy answer is possible. For the editors of the book of Joshua, the holy war was the means by which Israel actualized God's promise (see WAR, IDEAS OF). That Israel ascribed glory to God for it does not mean that she sought to escape moral responsibility. It means only that Israel was well aware that her history did not consist solely of the machinations of men. She recognized and acknowledged with joy and fear that Yahweh directed the course of history for his own inscrutable plans. The glorious conquest of the past meant the possibility in the future of Yahweh's re-establishing Israel in her land. In the meantime, Israel's business was to give him unwavering devotion, trust, and obedience.

Bibliography. Commentaries: J. Garstang (1931); F.-M. Abel, La Sainte Bible (1950); F. Nötscher, Echter-Bibel (1951); J. Bright, IB (1953): the best in English; M. Noth, HAT (2nd ed., 1953): now the standard work; H. W. Hertzberg, ATD (1953). See also Introductions to the OT by Pfeiffer, Bentzen, Weiser, Eissfeldt.

Special studies: A. Alt, "Eine galiläische Ortslist in Josua 19," ZAW, XLV (1927), 59-81. A. Saarisalo, The Boundary Between Issachar and Naphtali (1927). M. Noth, "Studien zu den historisch-geographischen Dokumenten des Josuabuches," ZDPV, LVIII (1935), 185-255. W. F. Albright, "The Israelite Conquest of Canaan," BASOR, 74 (April, 1939), 11-23; "The List of Levitical Cities," Louis Ginzburg Jubilee Volume (1945), pp. 49-73. S. Mowinckel, Zur Frage nach dokumentarischen Quellen in Josua 13–19 (1946). G. E. Wright, "The Literary and Historical Problem of Joshua 10 and Judges 1," JNES, V (1946), 105-14. M. Noth, "Überlieferungsgeschichtliches zur zweiten Hälfte des Josuabuches," Alttestamentliche Studien (Nötscher Festschrift; 1950). H. H. Rowley, From Joseph to Joshua (1950). A. Alt, "Josua," Kleine Schriften, I (1953), 176-92; "Das System der Stammesgrenzen im Buche Josua," Kleine Schriften, I (1953), 193-202; "Judas Gaue unter Josia," Kleine Schriften, II (1953), 276-88. Y. Kaufmann, The Biblical Account of the Conquest of Palestine (1953). A. D. Tushingham, "Excavations at OT Jericho," BA, XVII (1954), 98-104. E. Nielsen, Shechem, a Traditio-Historical Investigation (1955). J. Bright, Early Israel in Recent History Writing, Studies in Biblical Theology (1956): a telling criticism of Alt and Noth from the standpoint of W. F. Albright. F. M. Cross, Jr., and G. E. Wright, "The Boundary and Province Lists of the Kingdom of Judah," JBL, LXXV (1956), 202-26. Z. Kallai-Kleinmann, "The Town Lists of Judah, Simeon, Benjamin, and Dan," Vetus Testamentum, VIII (1958), 135-60.

E. M. GOOD

JOSHUA SON OF NUN. Alternately: HOSHEA hō shē′ə [הוֹשֵׁעַ, salvation] (Num. 13:8, 16; Deut. 32:

44 RSV mg.); JEHOSHUA jĭ hŏsh′ōō ə (Num. 13:16 KJV); JEHOSHUAH (I Chr. 7:27 KJV); OSHEA ō shē′ə [הושע, salvation] (Num. 13:8, 16, KJV); JESUS jē′zəs ['Ιησοῦς, also the LXX form, perhaps presupposing ישוע] (Acts 7:45 KJV; Heb. 4:8 KJV). The major figure in the OT account of the conquest of Canaan. See JOSHUA, BOOK OF.

Joshua first appears as the Israelite general in the battle against Amalek (Exod. 17:8-16), and then as Moses' "servant" (or "lieutenant," משרת; 24:13; 32:17), who serves in the tent of meeting with him (33:11; here described as a "youth," נער). Joshua's main exploit before the Conquest was his participation as the representative of the tribe of Ephraim in the spying out of Canaan (Num. 13:8). With Caleb, he argued that the land could be taken (14:6), and with Caleb he was rewarded by being permitted to enter Canaan (14:30, 38; 26:65; 32:12).

Before Moses' death, Joshua was commissioned as his successor (cf. Num. 27:18-23; Deut. 31:7-29). When Moses died, Israel obeyed Joshua as they had obeyed Moses, because he "was full of the spirit of wisdom" (Deut. 34:9). He then led the Conquest, narrated in the book of Joshua. It has been suggested (see JOSHUA, BOOK OF, § D) that the traditions bearing on Joshua's work are the annalistic accounts of Josh. 10:28–11:15 (now expanded by the Deuteronomist) and perhaps the covenant tradition lying behind 24:1-28. The archaeological data point strongly to the latter half of the thirteenth century B.C. for Joshua's conquest. This rules out the identification of Joshua with the Yashuya of Tell el-Amarna Letter no. 256, which most scholars have denied on linguistic grounds as well. The argument which places Joshua prior to Moses, in the Amarna age, is highly dubious.

Joshua's work in Canaan, therefore, seems to have comprised an alliance with a tribe or tribes of central Canaan at Shechem (perhaps Manasseh, already resident around Shechem, and Ephraim, which was in the Exodus), the conquest of a circle of fortress cities in the Shephelah (Josh. 10:28-43), and at least one foray into N territory (11:1-15). Following this, he settled down in TIMNATH-HERES (Judg. 2:9; Timnath-serah in Josh. 19:50; 24:30), where he died and was buried at the reported age of 110 years (Josh. 24:29; Judg. 2:8).

It has been argued (by Möhlenbrink; see bibliography) that the presence of Joshua in Pentateuchal narratives is secondary. Certainly this is true of some of Joshua's appearances (e.g., Exod. 24:13; 32:17; Num. 14:30). The priestly editors have inserted Joshua at several points (e.g., the change of his name in Num. 13:16 [see below]; the commissioning before Eleazar the priest in 27:18-23; the command to divide the land with Eleazar in 34:17). At the same time, other narratives have a truer ring—e.g., his very general identification in Num. 11:28; the spy narrative of Num. 14 (though it is not impossible that only Caleb is original here); and perhaps the tradition associating Joshua with the tent of meeting (Exod. 33:11). Joshua probably was Moses' successor.

The tradition has, however, been expanded considerably. In some of the notices in the book of Joshua, he is almost a second Moses. He has the presence of Yahweh, as Moses did (1:5); he is obeyed, as Moses was (1:17); he sanctifies Israel before Yahweh's wonders, as Moses did (3:5; cf. Exod. 19:14); he is exalted before Israel as Moses was (Josh. 3:7; 4:14). The miraculous crossing of the Jordan (3:7–4:24) has many reminiscences of the crossing of the Red Sea (cf. the explicit connection in 4:23). When the angel accosted Joshua before Jericho, he spoke to him precisely as Yahweh addressed Moses at the burning bush (5:15). Joshua, like Moses, wrote the law on stones (8:32; cf. 24:26). Yahweh "hearkened to the voice" of Joshua (10:14), as he had to Moses (Deut. 9:19; 10:10). Finally, when Joshua brought the tribes to Shechem for the covenant ceremony, he gave them a summary of Israel's history (24:2-13), perhaps parallel to the summary of Deut. 1:6–3:29, though Josh. 24:2-7 begins farther back than does Deut. 1:6.

The figure of Joshua has also been invested with a certain royal aura. He is described as having the "spirit" (Num. 27:18; Deut. 34:9; cf. I Sam. 10:10; 16:13; Isa. 11:2). He is called the "servant of Yahweh" (Josh. 24:29). He calls the people together for the making of a covenant (Josh. 24:1; cf. II Sam. 5:3). His name is said to have been changed from Hoshea to Joshua (Num. 13:16), recalling the common royal practice of assuming a regnal name (see KING). His division of the land is parallel to the king's erection of administrative districts (I Kings 4:7-19). Likewise, Joshua is called upon to decide claims (cf. Josh. 14:6-15; 17:4, 14-18), a function of the judge which also fell to the king (cf. Isa. 11:3*b*-4). The priestly glossators have heightened this atmosphere by providing Joshua with a priestly associate, Eleazar. Cf. JOSHUA, BOOK OF, § C.

Later legends have somewhat lengthened Joshua's shadow. He is called the "successor of Moses in the prophetic office" (Ecclus. 46:1 LXX [διάδοχος; so also Vulg.]; Hebrew שרת, "minister"). His piety in fulfilling the word (the Torah?) made him a "judge in Israel" (I Macc. 2:55), and he was known as an intercessor for the people (II Esd. 7:107). Joshua received the Torah from Moses and passed it on to the elders (Pirke Aboth 1:1), though another tradition reports that the Torah was sealed in the ark of the covenant from the death of Joshua and Eleazar until it was opened by Zadok (Zadokite Fragment 7:5). In Heb. 4:8, Joshua's invasion is represented as a type of the rest into which the faithful in Christ would enter.

Bibliography. K. Möhlenbrink, "Josua im Pentateuch (Die Josuaüberlieferung ausserhalb des Josuabuches)," ZAW, LIX (1943), 14-58; T. J. Meek, Hebrew Origins (2nd ed., 1950), pp. 1-48. See also histories of Israel by Kittel, Noth, and Oesterley and Robinson. For full bibliography, see JOSHUA, BOOK OF.

E. M. GOOD

JOSIAH jō sī′ə [יאשיה(ו), let (or may) Yahweh give; 'Ιωσίας (Matt. 1:10-11; KJV JOSIAS)]. King of Judah ca. 640-609 B.C.; son and successor of Amon.

The root of the name is the Arabic 'wš, "to give." Cf. also Joash and Yā'ōš of the Lachish Letters (from Yā'ōš-yahu—i.e., Josiah). Alternately, the root may be the Arabic 'asā, "to nurse, cure."

Josiah was made king by the "people of the land" (II Kings 21:24; II Chr. 33:25) after his father, Amon, had been murdered. He came to the throne at the age of eight, and reigned for thirty-one years (II Kings 22:1; II Chr. 34:1). His mother was Jedidah, daughter of Adaiah of Bozkath (cf. Josh. 15:39).

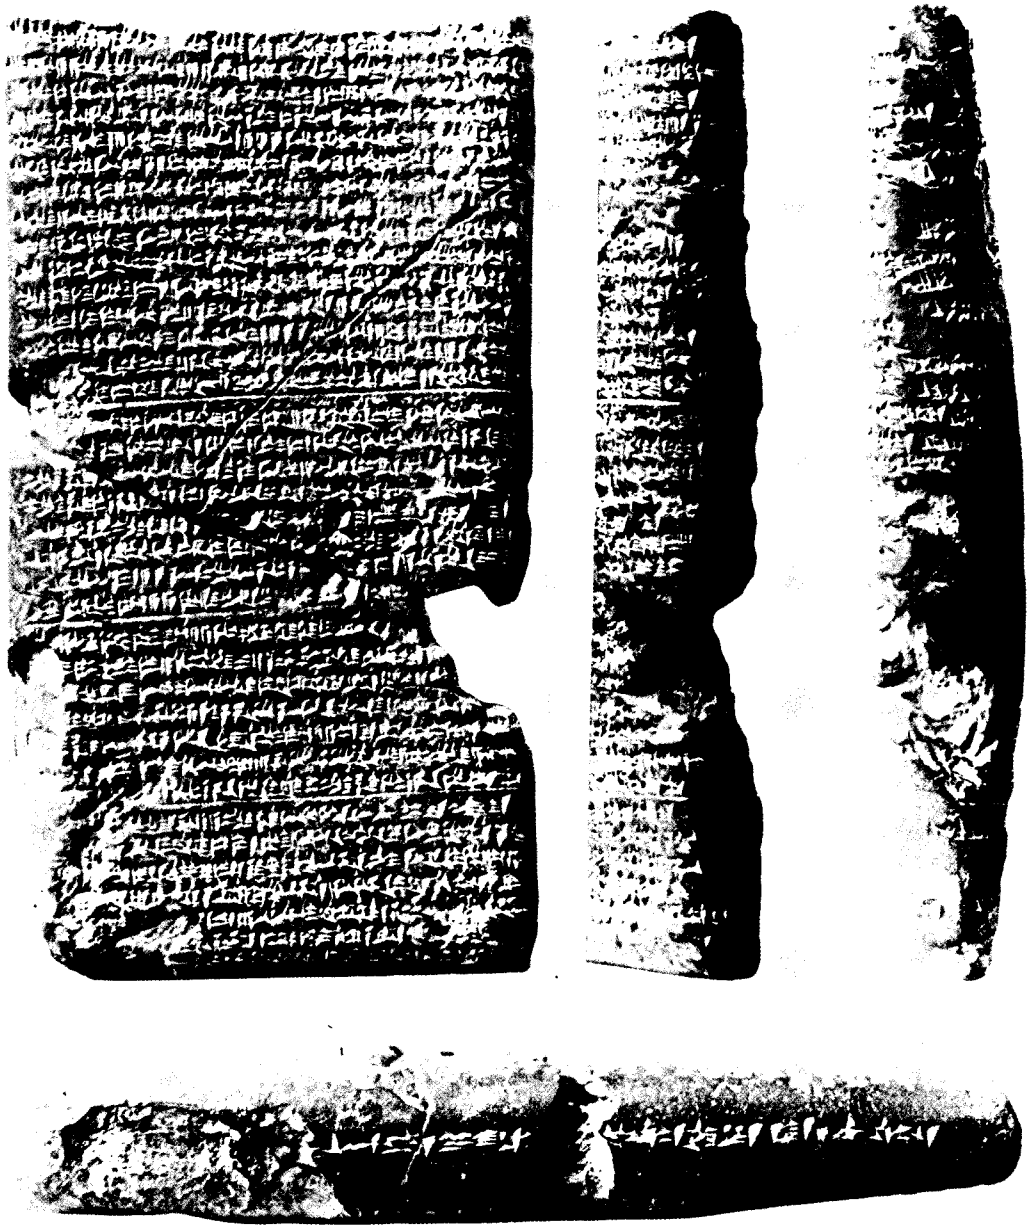
The pictures of the early years of Josiah's reign vary considerably in our sources. The Chronicler presents us with a sequence: (a) In the eighth year of his reign (ca. 632) he began to seek the God of David his father (II Chr. 34:3*a*). This indicates his rejection of the gods of his Assyrian overlord, and may point to a weakening of Assyrian control over the provinces in the W. (b) In the twelfth year of his reign (ca. 628) he began to purge Judah and Jerusalem (vss. 3*b*-5), and then extended his efforts to Manasseh, Ephraim, and as far as Naphtali (vss. 6-7). Such action could have been possible only if Josiah were in effective control of these former Assyrian provinces. But no mention is made in any of the sources that he had already won this control. It may indicate, however, that while still nominally a vassal of Assyria, in reality Josiah had taken advantage of Assyria's clear weakness to establish his claim to the old Davidic empire. Assyria was apparently powerless to intervene. (c) In the eighteenth year of his reign (ca. 622) with the finding of the "book of the law" in the temple, Josiah carried out a great reform program which clearly had political as well as religious overtones (II Chr. 34:8–35:19).

But the author of Kings knows only of the reformation in the eighteenth year of the king (II Kings 22:3). It is noteworthy, however, that this reformation, too, extended beyond the borders of Judah, and included also the "cities of Samaria" (II Kings 23:19).

There is also a difference in the biblical sources at another point. According to II Kings 23, Josiah removed not only the Assyrian cult, but the Canaanite cult as well. According to the Chronicler only the Canaanite cult was removed. Manasseh had already removed the foreign emblems of worship (II Chr. 33:15). Essentially, however, the Chronicler's picture in 34:3*b*-7 is dependent on II Kings 23.

But is it possible, historically, that as early as ca. 628 Josiah exercised control over the Assyrian province of Samaria? The answer to this question depends to a large extent on the date of Ashurbanipal's death, for with his death Assyrian power in the W began to wane. The most likely date appears to be ca. 630. This would have provided an opportunity for the subject nations to revolt. The Babylonian Chronicle gives an exact date for the successful revolt of Babylon against Assyria with the accession of Nabopolassar to the throne of Babylon on November 22/23, 626. For a year previously "there was no king in the land." It is clear that from at least ca. 627 Assyria was fully occupied in the E. In the circumstances it is quite possible that ca. 628, when Josiah came of age, he asserted his independence from Assyria and began a reformation in the land. In the course of time he extended his reform measures to the former N kingdom, as far N as Galilee. Such a course of action would have been impossible unless he also controlled the country politically. It is questionable if he openly broke with Assyria. Rather the picture would appear to be that while still professing loyalty to his Assyrian overlord, he quietly took over the N territory. That an independent Judah should cast longing eyes on the former N kingdom of Israel is altogether understandable. But this shows Josiah in a new light. His goal was a reunited Israel, the restoration of the old Davidic empire.



Josiah's reign was rendered notable, not only because of his reform measures, but also by reason of the discovery of the "book of the law" in the temple. The details of the actual discovery are uncertain and pose many questions. Where was the book found? We are not told either the circumstances of the finding or the place. The most probable explanation seems to be that it was written early in Manasseh's reign. Its author drew upon the lessons of Hezekiah's reformation and prepared a plan over against the time when a suitable occasion should arise to put it into effect. When it was found by Hilkiah some fifty years later, no one knew either its age or its source.

Who was Huldah the prophetess, to whom the deputation went for advice (II Kings 22:14 ff; II Chr. 34:22 ff)? We do not know. Why could not Hilkiah the high priest decide this matter himself? Why did Josiah not go to the temple, as his predecessor Hezekiah had done? Where was Jeremiah at the time? Why was he not consulted? Zephaniah may also have been prophesying at this time. To none of these questions can we give an answer, because of lack of evidence.

The code now forms the kernel of our present book of Deuteronomy. Josiah was also responsible for the collection of the old traditions of Israel from the time of the Conquest to his own day. The whole work of the Deuteronomist was a review of Israel's past history in the light of the great prophetic principle of exclusive loyalty to Yahweh. At the same time it recalled the nation to the great traditions of its classic past, and demonstrated the inevitable sequence of evil-doing and divine punishment. Begun in 622, it was probably not completed for several years. It was revised ca. 560, when additions were made to bring it up to date.

The major interest of the Deuteronomist was in the covenant entered into by king and people alike (II Kings 23:1-3). This was followed by a general cleansing of the land from idolatrous worship—a cleansing which included Bethel as well. But in this connection vs. 19 is to be noted, with its statement that "all the shrines also of the high places that were in the cities of Samaria . . . Josiah removed." On his return to Jerusalem a great Passover feast was held (vss. 21-23). II Chr. 35, on the other hand, enters into a minute and detailed description of the Passover feast (vss. 1-19), with special emphasis on the role of the priests, Levites, and singers.

The events of the intervening years till 609 are completely ignored in the biblical record. But great changes had taken place meantime in the world outside Judah. The Babylonian Chronicle gives us information about the beginning of that kingdom during the years 626-623. A break follows in the record till 616.* Then we find that the Medes have emerged as the leaders against the Assyrians, while Egypt has allied itself to Assyria. In 614 Assur fell to Cyaxares, the Median king. The city had fallen before the arrival of Nabopolassar, but a treaty was made between the Medes and the Babylonians. In 612 Nineveh fell

Courtesy of the Trustees of the British Museum

30. A chronicle of the years 616-609 B.C., from the chronicles of the Chaldean kings to a combined assault, and the Assyrians withdrew to Harran, where Ashuruballit II tried to restore the Assyrian Empire. But he was compelled to withdraw from Harran in 610 despite Egyptian reinforcements, and the Babylonians and Medes captured the city, which they held in face of a strong Assyrian-Egyptian attack in 609. Fig. JOS 30.

What was Josiah's part in the events of the year 609? Details are almost completely lacking, but it is clear that Josiah met his death at Megiddo in a vain attempt to preserve his newly won independence by preventing Pharaoh Neco and the Assyrians from joining forces. In all probability he was acting in conjunction with the Babylonians. Neco had urgent business with the Assyrians, but he found his way barred at Megiddo by Josiah. In the ensuing battle Josiah was killed (II Kings 23:29). His servants brought him back to Jerusalem, where he was buried. The Chronicler has a different account of Josiah's death. In the battle he was seriously wounded, but his servants brought him back to Jerusalem, where he died. "All Judah and Jerusalem mourned for Josiah" (II Chr. 35:24*c*).

Josiah was remembered by later generations as one of Judah's greatest kings. "Before him there was no king like him, who turned to the LORD with all his heart and with all his soul and with all his might, according to all the law of Moses; nor did any like him arise after him" (II Kings 23:25). But why then did Jeremiah take so little notice of him? His verdict is given in the sharp contrast which the prophet draws between Jehoiakim and his father (Jer. 22:15-16). Josiah did "justice and righteousness," and "judged the cause of the poor and needy." But perhaps Jeremiah looked beneath the surface and saw that Josiah's real goal was the establishment of a political kingdom.

Bibliography. W. F. Albright, "The Oldest Hebrew Letters: The Lachish Ostraca," BASOR, 70 (1938), 11-17, especially 12-13, note 6; C. C. Torrey, "A Hebrew Seal from the Reign of Ahaz," BASOR, 79 (1940), 27-28, note 1 on 28-29 by W. F. Albright; M. Noth, Überlieferungsgeschichtliche Studien (1943), pp. 3-110; A. Poebel, "The Assyrian King List from Khorsabad," Journal of Near Eastern Studies, II (1943), 56-90, especially 88 ff; H. H. Rowley, ed., Studies in OT Prophecy (1950), pp. 164 ff; J. A. Montgomery, The Book of Kings, ICC (1951), pp. 523-49; M. B. Rowton, "Jeremiah and the Death of Josiah," Journal of Near Eastern Studies, X (1951), 128-30; A. Alt, Kleine Schriften zur Geschichte des Volkes Israel, II (1953), 250-75, 276-88; F. M. Cross, Jr., and D. N. Freedman, "Josiah's Revolt Against Assyria," Journal of Near Eastern Studies, XII (1953), 56-58; W. Rudolph, Chronikbücher (1955), pp. 318-33; D. N. Freedman, "The Babylonian Chronicle," BA, XIX (1956), 50-60; M. Noth, Geschichte Israels (3rd ed., 1956), pp. 246 ff; D. J. Wiseman, Chronicles of Chaldean Kings (1956), pp. 5-20, 51-65; G. E. Wright, Biblical Archaeology (1957), pp. 172-74. H. B. MacLean

JOSIAS. KJV form of Jeshaiah 4; Josiah.

JOSIBIAH. KJV form of Joshibiah.

JOSIPHIAH jŏs′ə fī′ə [יוספיה, may Yahu increase] (Ezra 8:10; I Esd. 8:36); KJV Apoc. JOSAPHIAS —əs. The father of Shelomith, who returned to Palestine with Ezra.

JOSUE jŏsh′o͞o ē. Douay Version form of Joshua.

JOT. See Iota.

JOTBAH jō̆t′bə [יטבה, pleasantness] (II Kings 21:19). A city mentioned only as the residence of Meshullemeth, the mother of King Amon of Judah. It was probably in Judah, but its site is unknown.

JOTBATHAH jō̆t′bə thə [יטבתה, goodness or pleasantness(?)]; KJV JOTBATH jō̆t′bă̆th in Deut. 10:7. A stopping place of the Israelites in the wilderness (Num. 33:33-34), where they found a "land of brooks of water" (Deut. 10:7). It may have been in the Arabah, N of Ezion-geber. J. L. Mihelic

JOTHAM jō′thəm [יותם, may Y complete; Ἰωάθαμ]; KJV NT JOATHAM jō′ə thəm. 1. A Judahite, son of Jahdai, descendant of Jerahmeel (I Chr. 2:47).

2. Youngest of the seventy sons of Gideon (Judg. 9:5; cf. 8:30).

In the massacre of the sons of Gideon by their half brother Abimelech, Jotham escaped by hiding himself. Thereafter Abimelech was made king at Shechem.

When Jotham heard what had happened, he went to the top of Mount Gerizim, S of Shechem, and addressed to the men of Shechem a fable on the trees' anointing a king (Judg. 9:7-15), together with its interpretation (vss. 16-21). The kingship was first offered to the olive, then to the fig tree, then to the vine. All in turn refused the offer on the ground that they had other, more important tasks to perform. This shows the unimportant character of kingship at the time in Israel. Finally the bramble was approached, and accepted. Abimelech is clearly represented under the figure of the bramble. The application follows. Jotham accuses the men of Shechem of having acted in bad faith toward Jerubbaal (Gideon). He had fought for them and risked his life for them. In return they had slain his sons and given the reward to one who was an upstart, because he was their kinsman. Jotham ends his speech with a curse, which turns out to be prophetic. The reaction of the Shechemites is clear from vs. 21. Jotham was compelled to flee for his life.

* 3. Regent of Judah ca. 750-742 B.C.; king of Judah ca. 742-735; son and successor of Uzziah (Azariah). His mother was Jerusha the daughter of Zadok.

The name is probably a contraction from Yahuyatom, with omission of the divine name. The root is תמם. It may, however, be derived from יתום, meaning "orphan."

Jotham became king at the age of twenty-five and is said to have reigned sixteen years (II Kings 15:33; II Chr. 27:1). The figure of sixteen years may very well be correct if we include the eight-year period when he acted as regent for his father (II Kings 15:5; II Chr. 26:21). Ca. 750 Uzziah was smitten with leprosy. This rendered him unfit to perform his royal duties, and Jotham became regent of Judah (see Uzziah 3). The approximate date when this occurred is indicated by I Chr. 5:17, where Jotham and Jeroboam II (who died ca. 746) are named as contemporaries. Jotham himself reigned as king for ca. eight years.

A curious synchronism occurs in II Kings 15:30, where we are told that Hoshea of Israel became king "in the twentieth year of Jotham the son of Uzziah." This is all the more surprising as the writer of Kings has as yet not dealt with the reign of Jotham. Besides, it contradicts the statement in vs. 33 that Jotham reigned sixteen years, unless to the sixteen years of his own reign is meant to be added the period of his regency. Further, it contradicts II Kings 17:1, where it is said that Hoshea became king in the twelfth year of Ahaz. No adequate explanation of this strange datum has yet been forthcoming.

Of Jotham's building operations the writer of Kings mentions only that "he built the upper gate of the house of the Lord" (II Kings 15:35*b;* cf. II Chr. 27:3*a*). This was in line with the main concern of the Deuteronomist. This upper gate appears to have faced N (cf. Jer. 20:2; Ezek. 8:3; 9:2). The Chronicler tells in addition of extensive building on the wall of Ophel (II Chr. 27:3*b*). This was presumably to strengthen the work on the defense of Jerusalem begun by Uzziah. It is possible that there is here a hint that Jotham extended the city walls—a task which was continued by Hezekiah (II Chr. 32:5) and Manasseh (33:14). Further building also took place in Judah itself. Cities were built in the hill country of Judah, and forts and towers were established on the wooded hills. As in the case of Uzziah, archaeology seems to support this general picture of intense building activity during the eighth century B.C. Jotham's reign was marked by continued prosperity in the land. This view is confirmed in the contemporary prophetic writings of Hosea and Isaiah.

In the military sphere too, Jotham continued to win victories. The Chronicler reports a successful campaign against the Ammonites, who for three years were forced to pay Jotham a very heavy tribute (II Chr. 27:5). This tradition has every appearance of being historical, and may have been at least a partial reason for the Syro-Ephraimitic War. The actual attack on Jerusalem by Rezin the king of Syria and Pekah the son of Remaliah came in the reign of Ahaz, Jotham's son (II Kings 16:5), but already in Jotham's time attacks against Judah by the N allies had begun with the object of forcing Judah to join the anti-Assyrian coalition (II Kings 15:37). Faced by the threat of an Assyrian invasion under Tiglath-pileser III, Aram and Israel forgot their differences and closed their ranks to meet the common foe. Both militarily and economically Judah was perhaps the strongest state in Syria-Palestine at the time, and without her support resistance to Assyria stood little chance of success. But Judah was apparently unwilling to join the alliance.

At Ezion-geber (Elath) was found a signet ring with a seal bearing the letters "ltym" in Hebrew characters—i.e., "belonging to Jotham."* The Jotham in question is almost certainly the son of Uzziah. The omission of any further title, such as "son of the king" or "servant of the king," would be explained if the seal belonged to Jotham, either in his capacity as regent or as king. Archaeology thus confirms the fact that at this time, during the reigns of Uzziah, Jotham, and Ahaz (at the beginning of his reign), Judah exercised control over Elath. Fig. JOT 31.

Courtesy of Nelson Glueck

31. Impression of the seal of Jotham, from Ezion-geber (Tell el-Kheleifeh)

The Chronicler makes no mention of this incident, but it is noteworthy that in the summary of Jotham's reign he tells that Jotham became mighty and speaks of "all his wars" (II Chr. 27:7). This may be a reference to the struggle with Aram and Israel.

Bibliography. N. Glueck, "The Third Season of Excavation at Tell el-Kheleifeh, BASOR, 79 (1940), 13 ff, with a note by W. F. Albright, p. 15; M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 189 ff; G. E. Wright, Biblical Archaeology (1957), p. 160; J. Simons, Jerusalem in the OT (1952), p. 330.

H. B. MacLean

JOURNEY, DAY'S. See Day's Journey.

JOY. The experience of joy, as related to praise and thanksgiving in public worship, or to the quiet confidence of the individual in God, or to the proclamation of God's saving power, is one of the characteristic elements in religious faith as this is described in the Bible.

In the OT thirteen Hebrew roots, found in twenty-seven words, are used primarily for some aspect of joy or joyful participation in the cult. The root which appears most frequently is שמח, the most general term for "joy," either cultic or secular, individual or connected with tumultuous group expression (Exod. 4:14; Ps. 97:1, 12). Other roots are גיל, the usual literary parallel for שמח, and probably connected originally with cultic dance (Ps. 96:11); שיש and אשרי, associated especially with the blessings of prosperity (Ps. 1:1; Isa. 60:15); and רוע, רנן, and הלל, all suggesting shouting or singing in praise of God's power in creation and victory or as part of the more formal pattern of public worship (Ezra 3:10-11; Ps. 100:1-2, 4). Physical expression of joy is often mentioned. Expressions which occur most frequently in connection with the terms for rejoicing are the sounds of singing, shouting, noise, uproar, a loud voice, singing praise; words for musical instruments —the pipe, harp, trumpet, flute, or stringed instruments; or words describing motion—dancing, clapping, leaping, or stamping the feet. The most frequent occasions for joy are feasting and offering sacrifice (Deut. 12:12; Isa. 56:7), celebrating harvest or victory (I Sam. 18:6; Joel 1:16), enjoying prosperity or personal triumph as seen especially in the recovery of health (Ps. 31:7; Isa. 61:3-7); or rejoicing in God as part of public worship (Pss. 33:1-3; 95:1-2).

In the LXX the most common Hebrew term (שמח) is usually translated by εὐφραίνω or εὐφροσύνη, words referring to personal emotion as well as to the occasions for it, especially the joy of feasts or festivals. גיל is usually rendered by ἀγαλλιάω and its derivatives.

In the NT both these terms appear often in connection with joy in God's salvation (I Pet. 1:6) or the joy of eating and drinking or holding festival (Luke 12:19; Acts 7:41), much as they are used in the LXX. The words which appear most frequently in the NT, however, are χαίρω and χαρά, the most common Greek words for joy of all kinds, and καυχάομαι ("to boast, take pride, or rejoice in"). The latter is Paul's favorite term, with which he contrasts man's inclination to boast in himself (Rom. 3:27) with his right to boast in Christ or in his cross (Gal. 6:14; Phil. 3:3). The one real difference between OT and NT attitudes toward joy is that the NT writers go on to the bold statement of joy in suffering as well as in salvation. The OT makes clear that man's cause for rejoicing is in God and not in himself (Jer. 9:23-24). Joy is, however, related primarily to God's triumph over evil, as demonstrated in recovery of health, or in some other victory of national or personal existence. It is in the NT that we find the statement of joy in suffering itself, or in weakness seen in terms of a power of God "made perfect in weakness" (Matt. 5:12; II Cor. 12:9).

Bibliography. A. Wünsche, Die Freude in den Schriften des alten Bundes (1896); P. Humbert, " 'Laetari et exultare' dans le vocabulaire religieux de l'AT," RHPR, XXII (1942), 185-214.
D. HARVEY

JOZABAD jō′zə băd [יוזבד, Yahu has bestowed, same as יהוזבד, JEHOZABAD; 'Ιώζαβδος; Apoc. 'Ιώσαβδος]; KJV JOSABAD in I Chr. 12:4; I Esd. 8:63; JOAZABDUS jō′ə zăb′dəs in I Esd. 9:48. 1. A Benjaminite from GEDERAH who joined David's forces at Ziklag (I Chr. 12:4).

2. A military leader of the tribe of Manasseh who deserted Saul to join forces with David (I Chr. 12:20).

3. Another military leader mentioned with 2 above (I Chr. 12:20).

4. A Levite who shared responsibility for the temple treasury during the reign of King Hezekiah (II Chr. 31:13).

5. A chief of the Levites during the reign of King Josiah (II Chr. 35:9). The parallel I Esd. 1:9 gives Joram ('Ιωράμ).

6. One of the chiefs of the Levites having charge of the "outside work" of the temple (Neh. 11:16; see TEMPLE, JERUSALEM), and presumably the same individual mentioned in Ezra 8:33 (cf. I Esd. 8:63) as being in attendance when Ezra delivered the temple treasures from Babylon to the Jerusalem temple. He is perhaps the same Jozabad listed as having married a foreign wife (Ezra 10:23; cf. I Esd. 9:23), and perhaps also the Levite of this name who with others assisted Ezra at the public reading of the law (Neh. 8:7; cf. I Esd. 9:48).

Bibliography. R. A. Bowman, Exegesis of Nehemiah, IB, III (1954), 736-37, 777.

7. One of the priests who had married foreign wives in the time of Ezra (Ezra 10:22). In I Esd. 9:22, "Gedaliah" stands apparently for this name (KJV "Ocidelus"; 'Ωκίδηλος).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 21, 47, 77.
B. T. DAHLBERG

JOZACAR jō′zə kär [יוזכר] (II Kings 12:21). Son of Shimeath, and one of the servants of King Joash who were responsible for his murder. Some Hebrew MSS and the Syr. read "Jozabad" (cf. "Zabad" in the parallel II Chr. 24:26), but "Jozacar" is preferable.

JOZADAK jō′zə dăk [יוצדק, Yahu has been just]. Alternately: JEHOZADAK jĭ hō′zə dăk [יהוצדק] (I Chr. 6:14-15—H 6:40-41; Hag. 1:1, 12, 14; 2:2, 4; Zech. 6:11); KJV JOSEDECH jō′zə dĕk in Hag. 1:1, 12, 14; 2:2, 4; Zech. 6:11; KJV JOSEDEC in I Esd. 5:5, 48, 56; 6:2; 9:19; Ecclus. 49:12. The father of Jeshua the high priest (Zerubbabel's contemporary), and among those carried into Babylonian exile by Nebuchadnezzar (in the above and Ezra 3:2, 8; 5:2; 10:18; Neh. 12:26).

Bibliography. M. Noth, Die israelitischen Personennamen (1928), pp. 161-62, 189.
B. T. DAHLBERG

JUBAL jōō′bəl [יובל; 'Ιωβαλ, 'Ιουβαλ] (Gen. 4:21). Son of Lamech; credited by the J tradition with the invention of musical instruments. See MUSIC.

JUBILEE, YEAR OF. The final year in a cycle of fifty years, consisting of seven SABBATICAL YEAR periods, or forty-nine years, plus this fiftieth year. The manifestly basic role of the number seven in this reckoning of years and also the perfect parallelism between this fifty-year time unit and the pentecontad, consisting of seven weeks, or forty-nine days, plus an extra day—fifty days in all—suggest strongly that the Jubilee Year had its origin in the pentecontad calendar (see SABBATH). Hence, the fifty-year Jubilee period was the ultimate unit of time reckoning of this primitive, agricultural calendar. If so, it would be a reasonable inference that, just as each fiftieth day was celebrated as a sacred day, the עצרת, the "concluding festival," of its pentecontad, so correspondingly the Jubilee Year was also originally of sacred character and marked, in fitting, festal manner, the close of the fifty-year time unit.

While all this is distinctly probable, it cannot be proved; for, although the pentecontad calendar itself is well attested, the Jubilee Year and the fifty-year Jubilee time unit are mentioned, in all Semitic literature, only in the Bible, and there only infrequently and only in postexilic—i.e., relatively late—writings.

The specific name, "Jubilee Year" (שנת היובל; lit., the "Year of the Ram's Horn"; Lev. 25; 27:18, 23-24) or simply "Jubilee" (היובל; Lev. 25; Num. 36:4), unquestionably derives from the word יובל, "a ram's horn" (Exod. 19:13; Josh. 6:5). The narrative in Josh. 6 distinguishes sharply between the יובל and the שופר, the ordinary trumpet, and ascribes to the former greater sanctity and supernatural effect, in that it was carried and blown only by priests and that it was the blast from it, rather than that from the שופר, carried and blown upon by the people at large, which caused the walls of Jericho to fall. In all likelihood the "great trumpet" (Isa. 27:13), a blast from which would inaugurate a new and happier era for conquered and dispersed Israel, was a יובל. All this suggests cogently that the ram's-horn trumpet was of unusual character, used only upon extraordinary occasions and for some particular purpose (cf. Exod. 19:13*b*). Accordingly it is a very probable inference that the "loud trumpet," which was blown upon the tenth day of the seventh month—the New Year's Day of the solar calendar, the official calendar still in the early postexilic period (see CALENDAR)—and thus heralded the commencement of the Jubilee Year (Lev. 25:9-10) and proclaimed "liberty throughout the land to all its inhabitants," was, as is, even though not specifically so stated, clearly implied in vs. 10*b*, likewise a יובל. This year acquired its name just because this unique, fiftieth year was ushered in by this blast upon the יובל, whereas the commencement of ordinary years was signalized by a blast upon only a שופר (II Sam. 15:10; cf. Lev. 23:24; see NEW YEAR).

The Jubilee Year in principle discharged two primary functions. It effected the automatic release or emancipation of a Jew who, for one reason or another, had at some moment within the preceding forty-nine years become enslaved to a fellow Jew, and likewise the automatic release or return to the original owner or his family of property, whether fields or houses in unwalled—i.e., country—towns, which had been sold to a fellow Jew during the course of a similar forty-nine-year period. Very significantly, the primary legislation for the Jubilee Year is found in the Holiness Code (see PENTATEUCH), the earliest stratum of which must be dated to 516 B.C. Furthermore, the original H legislation for the Jubilee Year was extensively reworked and expanded by priestly legislators from the final quarter of the fifth century B.C. onward.

It is readily apparent that this H legislation for the automatic liberation in the Jubilee Year of Jews enslaved to fellow Jews contradicts absolutely the earlier, pre-exilic legislation (Exod. 21:2-6 [C]; Deut. 15:12-18 [D]) for such liberation at the close of six years of servitude. Furthermore, no pre-exilic, Pentateuchal legislation makes any provision whatsoever for automatic restoration to the original owner of property sold to a fellow Jew. Manifestly this H legislation for the Jubilee Year represents an attempt by early postexilic legislators to solve in an altogether unprecedented manner a problem, or even two problems, of distinctly social character, which had found no effective solution throughout the entire pre-exilic period, and which had presumably become acute once again. It may well be that their appreciation of the complete impracticability of the relatively brief, six-year period of enslavement of one Jew to another, which the pre-exilic legislation sanctioned, induced them to provide for a potentially much longer period of such servitude, and so to link this with the Jubilee Year of their ancient, pentecontad calendar, which they still employed extensively for the regulation of agricultural activities and related matters. But certainly, whatever may have been its specific import previously, the Jubilee Year had never before discharged either of the two functions now assigned to it. And, despite the amplification of the original H legislation for the Jubilee Year by later priestly legislators, abundant evidence indicates unmistakably that this legislation never became effective in any manner. The references to it in Num. 36:4 (P) and in Ezek. 46:17 (from ca. 450 B.C.), where it is called שנת הדרור, the "Year of Liberty," are entirely theoretical and unrealistic. (Undoubtedly upon the basis of this byname, the "Year of Liberty," for the Jubilee Year, Jos. Antiq. III.xii.3 mistakenly interpreted יובל as meaning "Liberty.") And certainly Neh. 5:1-13 proves definitively that in the third quarter of the fifth century B.C. the automatic emancipation in the Jubilee Year of Jews enslaved to fellow Jews, if it had ever been actually practiced, had already fallen into desuetude.

Under any condition the Jubilee Year period persisted in Jewish usage only as the largest unit of time reckoning and nothing more. Such is its only function in the book of JUBILEES, certainly a Jewish sectarian work, and apparently also in the writings of the so-called Qumran sectaries (Zadokite Document XX.1; 1QS X.8; see DEAD SEA SCROLLS). Moreover, in the book of Jubilees a Jubilee period consists of only forty-nine years—i.e., seven sabbatical periods of years. Presumably the forty-ninth year, the final Sabbatical Year of this larger, Jubilee period, functions as the concluding year thereof, while the fiftieth year, the original and true Jubilee Year, is completely disregarded. Furthermore, in the official count of Sabbatical Years in the Maccabean and post-Maccabean periods the Jubilee Year was omitted entirely and the Sabbatical Years followed each other in uninterrupted succession every seven years. Moreover, certain later, rabbinic authorities likewise reckoned a Jubilee period as of only forty-nine years, although the majority adhered, quite naturally, to the biblical reckoning of the period as of fifty years. In rabbinic Judaism and its literature the Jubilee Year had only antiquarian character and import and nothing more. Eventually, as might readily be anticipated, the Jubilee Year became completely obsolete.

Bibliography. F. K. Ginzel, Handbuch der mathematischen u. technischen Chronologie (1911), II, 29-32; A. Jirku, Das israelitische Jobeljahr (1929).

See also bibliography under SABBATH.

J. MORGENSTERN

JUBILEES, BOOK OF [τὰ Ἰωβηλαῖα or οἱ Ἰωβηλαῖοι]. One of the most important books of the PSEUDEPIGRAPHA. It gives a graphic picture of Judaism in the two pre-Christian centuries. Its purpose was to show that Judaism, as it then was, had been the same from the very beginning of known history. It was also concerned to demonstrate that the sacred number seven played a more important part in history than had been before recognized. The whole history of the world is divided into jubilee periods—a plan given to Moses on Mount Sinai. The book is valuable as showing the development of angelology and demonology. Emphasis is also placed on Jewish tenets and customs, and the importance of preserving the difference between Jews and Gentiles is stressed.

1. Title and text
2. Date and authorship
3. Purpose and contents
4. Language
Bibliography

1. Title and text. The book was known by various titles: Jubilees; the Little Genesis; the Apocalypse of Moses; the Testament of Moses; the Book of Adam's Daughters; the Life of Adam.

The existing MSS are in Ethiopic, Greek, Latin, and Syriac (see bibliography). There are four Ethiopic MSS; the first (fifteenth century) and the second (sixteenth century) are the most trustworthy. The book is completely preserved only in the Ethiopic version. The Greek version, with the exception of a few fragments, is lost. One fragment, which consists of 11:2-21, can be found in Charles's edition of the Ethiopic text. About one fourth is preserved in the Latin version. It is almost of equal value with the Ethiopic, but it has suffered at the hands of correctors. The evidence of a Syriac version is very slight and rests on a Syriac fragment entitled "Names of the Wives of the Patriarchs According to the Hebrew Book Called Jubilees."

2. Date and authorship. Jubilees was written between 153 and 105 B.C. Its historical background reflects the period of the Maccabean hegemony, as under Simon and Hyrcanus. The book is generally regarded as the work of one author. He was probably a Pharisee of the strictest sect or a Levite priest, since he held the strictest views on circumcision, the sabbath, and the validity of the law, and believed in angels, demons, and immortality. He also was a supporter of the Maccabean pontificate. He draws freely upon earlier books and traditions, especially the book of Noah, which he uses in a modified form, and also on the book of Enoch, thus helping us place the dates of certain parts of the book.

3. Purpose and contents. The purpose of the author was to do for Genesis what the Chronicler did for Samuel and Kings—to rewrite the facts in such a way that it would appear that the law was rigorously observed by the patriarchs. He attempts to prove that his own book was a revelation of God to Moses, a supplement to the Pentateuch, which he calls the "first law" (vss. 1-22). His desire was to save Judaism from the demoralizing effects of Hellenism by glorifying the law and picturing the patriarchs as irreproachable; by glorifying Israel and urging her to preserve the separateness from the Gentiles; and by denouncing the Gentiles and also Israel's national enemies. The "Angel of the Presence" reveals to Moses on Sinai the history and religious laws of Gen. 1–Exod. 3 in the form of sermonized translations, or midrashic Targums, which show only favorable practices and omit anything derogatory.

The whole history of the world is divided into "jubilee" periods, cycles of seven times seven (see Lev. 25:8-12). From 2:1-2 the book runs parallel to Gen. 1:1–Exod. 14:31, with midrashic expansion. Jewish tenets are emphasized, and great importance is attached to the observance of feasts. The contrast between Jews and Gentiles is sharply drawn, and Israel is warned to keep separate. The development of angelology and demonology has progressed further than in Enoch. Mention is made of Beliar (1:20; 15: 33) and Mastema (10:8). Much legendary matter is introduced, and anything is omitted that would put the patriarchs in an unfavorable light.

The writer of Jubilees had deep veneration for the Torah; nevertheless, he brings to the interpretation of it the method of apocalyptic, used in Daniel and Enoch. Thus Moses receives revelation from an angel. This was a new way of presenting this material, and it makes Jubilees an original and unique book.

4. Language. Charles believes that the book was written in Hebrew, for the following reasons: (a) a book supposed to be written by Moses would naturally be in Hebrew, as it was the sacred and national language; (b) the revival of the national spirit is accompanied by a revival of the national language; (c) the existing text must often be retranslated into Hebrew in order to explain unintelligible expressions.

Charles C. Torrey believes, on the other hand, that the original language was Aramaic.

Bibliography. R. H. Charles, The Ethiopic Version of the Hebrew Book of Jubilees (1895), for a full description of the existing MSS; The Book of Jubilees (1902). C. C. Torrey, The Apocryphal Literature (1945). See also the bibliographies under APOCRYPHA; PSEUDEPIGRAPHA. S. TEDESCHE

JUCAL. Alternate form of JEHUCAL.

JUDA. KJV alternate form of JUDAH; JUDAS; JODA.

JUDAEA. See JUDEA.

*__JUDAH__ jo͞o′də [יהודה, presumably originally a name of a place or a region which has become a tribal name and finally the name of a person (cf. Jehud; also Baal-jehud, which probably was called by the full name Beth-baal-jehud = house of the local numen of Jehud)]. 1. The fourth son of Jacob, and the heros eponymos of the tribe of Judah. Born to Leah (Gen. 29:35; Matt. 1: 2 ff; Luke 3:33; the folk etymology given in Gen. 29 derives the name from ידה, "to praise"). In all lists of the sons of Jacob, Judah is given fourth position (Gen. 35:23; 46:12; Exod. 1:2; I Chr. 2:1). In the Joseph story Judah plays a special role along with Reuben and Benjamin as the spokesman for the brothers (Gen. 37:26; 43:3, 8; 44:14, 16, 18; 46:28). What the Yahwist narrates in Gen. 38 concerning the experiences of the son of Jacob (alluded to in Ruth 4:12) is, in reality, disguised tribal history.

Judah belongs to that first great wave of Israelite tribes of the so-called Leah group which gradually succeeded in occupying (probably from the S upward) the whole Palestinian hill country, so that finally in the N, Issachar and Zebulun dwelt along with Asher; in the middle, Simeon and Levi; in the S, Judah, with Reuben and Gad. The last two of these traveled farther into the land E of the Jordan. The group, which was consolidated to the S of that strong crossbar of Canaanite cities which extended from Jerusalem through Kirjath-jearim, Aijalon, and others toward Gezer, took over, as did Ephraim later, its name (Judah) from a given geographical location. The actual territory in which it settled was not large. It was the mountain ridge between Jerusalem and Hebron, exclusive of the two cities, a territory ca. 15-20 miles in length, still less in breadth, in which, apparently, there were no old cities and which was being cleared of forest to make it usable for agriculture. Genuinely Judean villages in the list of places in Josh. 15, which originates in the time of Josiah, are those of the district of Beth-zur (vss. 58-59) and of Bethlehem (vs. 59 LXX). To the E a natural boundary was set by the E slope of the mountains, the Wilderness of Judah, which was not well suited for settlement. To the N was a political boundary. Jerusalem was first conquered, contrary to Judg. 1:8 (cf. Josh. 15:63; Judg. 1:21), by David and with the mercenaries without the Judeans (II Sam. 5:6 ff). The description of the Judean N boundary, which is derived basically from the period before the kings (Josh. 15:8), is a further unmistakable proof. Furthermore, it is apparent from this that the Judeans, at least in the NE, participated in the settlement of the valley of the Jordan to the S of Jericho (vss. 6 ff). The attempt to expand toward the W led to the downfall of several Judean tribes; this is the sense of the tradition in Gen. 38 which took place in the region of the Canaanite cities Adullam (Khirbet esh-Sheikh Madhkur) and Timnah (Tibnah). Judah certainly did not get down into the coastal plain (Judg. 1:18-19). Judah's expansion had to be toward the S.

But this expansion toward the S signified a new stage in development; Judah became Great Judah, at first a loose alliance of tribes, then a state; for this "drive toward the S" led to a mingling, not only in settlement but also in blood, of the Judean hill clans with other, related clans—from the desert, but, nevertheless, not "Israelite." Above all, it brought to the Judean element the political leadership in an area which exceeded the bounds of its own former territory considerably. Here, where, in the SW, Simeon had found refuge after the catastrophe at Shechem, at the edge of the cultivated land (as the Edomites, the Moabites, and the Ammonites, who also belonged to an earlier wave, had done in the E) several smaller tribes had established themselves, apparently even before the Israelites, who were therefore compelled to take up land farther inland. No one of them possessed much more than the territory of an old city-state: Caleb, the territory around Hebron (Josh. 14:5 ff; 15:13-14; Judg. 1:20); Kenaz, SW of it, the territory around Debir (Khirbet er-Rabud; Josh. 15:15-19=Judg. 1:11-15); Cain, SE of it, the territory around Arad (Tell 'Arad; Judg. 1:16). The position of Jerahmeel's property cannot be determined, but the remnant of Simeon in the neighborhood of Zephath-hormah (Tell es-Seba'; Judg. 1:17) completes the survey. The old notices in Judg. 1 are all already colored by the fact of Great Judah, but they still give evidence of the way in which the tribe of Judah, at least politically, developed toward the S beyond its area proper. The Chronicler in I Chr. 2:4 made use of materials concerning these relationships which have been investigated but slightly up to this time. That the S expansion was successful for Judah is not only based on the gradually developing political superiority of the larger group, but it also has a very real presupposition in the common property which still bound all these groups from the time of the period in the wilderness. Even in David's time there was on the steppe S of Beer-sheba a Negeb of Judah in addition to a Negeb of the Jerahmeelites, of the Kenites, and of the Calebites (I Sam. 27:10; 30:14). Similar economic interests created a feeling of solidarity which ultimately became very active politically in the establishment of the Judean state. This community of interest may have appeared first in the religious sphere in the formation of an amphictyony of six groups. Two famous ancient places presented themselves immediately as common shrines—Mamre, on the border between Judah and Caleb; and Beer-sheba, centrally located between Cain, Kenaz, Simeon, and Jerahmeel.

From the beginning of the occupation of land, the tribe of Judah went through a special development. Because the way to the N was blocked, it oriented itself toward the S. It is not surprising, therefore, that Judah is not mentioned in the Song of Deborah. The rest of the oldest poetry shows Judah in various stages of its development. The item on Judah in the Blessing of Moses sees Judah from the point of view of the N as an insignificant tribe, for whom a double favor from Yahweh is solicited (Deut. 33:7):

> Hear, O LORD, the voice of Judah, > and bring him to his people.
> With thy hands contend for him, > and be a help against his adversaries.

This sounds as though it were about to succumb and is a request for assistance to the tribe and for union with its brothers in the N. The statement stems from a relatively early period (Minor Judah). Very different is the Blessing of Jacob, in which, apparently, several Judean sayings are combined (Gen. 49:8-12). The first (vs. 8) lauds Judah's authority in the circle of the brothers—i.e., Caleb, Cain, etc.; the second (vs. 9), his lion's strength. The third, which extols Judah's economic wealth (vss. 11-12; Judah, not the ruler proclaimed in vs. 10, is the subject), compares the tribe in vs. 10 to one who wields the scepter, and holds out the prospect of the kingdom. Here Great Judah finds itself close to that political consolidation with which the name Judah acquired a new political significance.

As a tribe Judah appears later only occasionally in literature, as in the lists of the Priestly Code, and, in accordance with its importance, often in the first position (Num. 2:3, 9; 7:12; 10:14; 34:19; in the traditional spot after Reuben and Simeon in 1:7; 13:6; also 1:26-27; 26:19-22 [cf. vss. 15-18, where Gad is inserted in order at least to give Judah the leadership of the S camp]). P's skilled craftsman Bezalel was a Judean (Exod. 31:2; 35:30; 38:22). In the list of the Levite cities Judah takes the lead (Josh. 21:4, 9 or 11; I Chr. 6:65 or 55—H 6:50 or 40), but it is Great Judah which is meant, as also, for the most part, in the sections of the Deuteronomic historical work which treat of the time before the kings, where one might still mention the border description of the "tribe of the people of Judah" (Josh. 15:1 ff) and the list of cities appended to it (vss. 21 ff), and also in passages like Deut. 34:2; Josh. 18:5, 11, 14; 19:1, 9; Judg. 1:4, 8-10; 15:10-11; 17:7; I Sam. 11:8; 15:4; 22:5; 23:23; 30:16-26 (cf. vss. 27 ff); II Sam. 1:18; 2:1, 4. The tribe of Judah in the narrower sense may be thought of, in addition to Deut. 27:12, in the tradition of Achan's theft (Josh. 7:1, 16-18) and perhaps in Judg. 1:2 ff, where Judah, as in 20:18, appears as the foremost champion; but it is surely not meant in I Kings 12:20; II Kings 17:18, although the expression "tribe of Judah" occurs there once more. The Chronicler naturally knows the tribe of Judah in lists (I Chr. 12:24—H 12:25; 27:18) and likes to designate the inhabitants of the S as "Judah and Benjamin" (I Chr. 9:3-4, 7; 12:16—H 12:17; II Chr. 11:1, 3, 10, 12, 23; 14:7; 15:2, 8-9; 17:14, 17; 31:1; 34:9; Ezra 1:5; 4:1; 10:9; Neh. 11:4, 25, 31, 36). But it is clear that he is always thinking of Great Judah, a fact which is most clearly evident in the genealogies of I Chr. 2:4. The same is true of the prophets, although Mic. 5:1 may constitute an exception. In Ezek. 48:7, Judah in the N, like Benjamin in the S, acquires the position of honor as the immediate neighbor of the sanctuary. The middle one of the gates of the N is named for Judah as the middle gate in the E is named for Benjamin (vs. 31). In the Psalms the tribe of Judah appears in 60:7—H 60:9 (=108:8—H 108:9); 68:27—H 68:28; 78:68; the actual tribe is no longer intended anywhere in the Psalms.

In the NT, Judah ranks at the head of the list of the sealed (Rev. 7:5). Elsewhere the tribe is mentioned in Heb. 7:14; 8:8; Rev. 5:5.

For the territory of Judah, see TRIBES, TERRITORIES OF, § D1. See bibliography under ASHER.

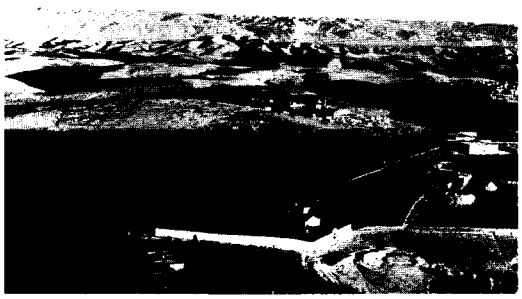
K. ELLIGER

2. A Levite (Ezra 3:9); same as HODAVIAH 4 in Ezra 2:40 and JODA 1 in I Esd. 5:58.

3. A Levite (Ezra 10:23 [LXX B Ιοδομ; LXX A Ιεδομ]; I Esd. 9:23).

4. A Benjaminite (Neh. 11:9); son of Hassenuah.
5. A Levite (Neh. 12:8).
6. A prince of Judah (Neh. 12:34).
7. A priest and musician (Neh. 12:36; lacking in the LXX).
8. An ancestor of Jesus (Luke 3:30). L. HICKS

JUDAH, HILL COUNTRY OF [הר יהודה]; KJV MOUNTAIN OF JUDAH. A district in Palestine which included the central ridge of hills S of the hill country of Ephraim between the Shephelah on the W and the wilderness of Judah on the E. The KJV rendering "the mountain of Judah" is misleading. In view of the fact that the territory included a ridge of hills, most modern English translations use "hill country of Judah" (see Josh. 11:21; 20:7; 21:11; II Chr. 21:11; 27:4). The extent of the district is not defined in the OT. Hebron was located in it (Josh. 20:7; 21:11); and although it is called merely "hill country" in Josh. 15:48; Jer. 32:44; 33:13, these passages make it clear that the district included a number of cities.



Probably the same area is referred to in Luke 1:65, where the "hill country of Judea" (ὀρινός τῆς Ἰουδαίας) is mentioned.

See also PALESTINE, GEOGRAPHY OF.

W. L. REED

JUDAH, KINGDOM OF. See ISRAEL, HISTORY OF.

JUDAH, WILDERNESS OF [מדבר יהודה] (Judg. 1:16; Ps. 63); JUDEA, WILDERNESS OF [ἡ ἔρημος τῆς Ἰουδαίας] (Matt. 3:1). On the basis of the OT passages, the wilderness of Judah is usually located in the desolate area in the Negeb of S Palestine, extending to the W shore of the Dead Sea.*

Copyright: The Matson Photo Service

32. The Wilderness of Judah: in the background are the mountains of Moab and the Dead Sea; in the foreground are Bethphage and Bethany.

In Matt. 3:1 the wilderness of Judea is identified only as the place where John the Baptist started his preaching. Parallel passages in Mark 1:4; Luke 3:2 refer to the area merely as "the wilderness." The context of these passages suggests that the district was in the Jordan Valley at the N end of the Dead Sea. Fig. JUD 32.

See also PALESTINE, GEOGRAPHY OF.

W. L. REED

JUDAISM jo͞o'dĭ ĭz'əm ['Ιουδαϊσμός]; KJV THE JEWS' RELIGION. The belief and life of the Jews. The word does not refer to dogma, but to the total way of life of the Jewish community, elected by God and in covenant relationship with him. The beliefs and practices of the Judaism of Jesus' day differed in various Jewish sects and parties—among them PHARISEES; SADDUCEES; ZEALOTS; ESSENES. But all Jews believed in the one God of Israel and acknowledged the LAW.

The Greek word 'Ιουδαϊσμός occurs only in Gal. 1:13-14. The RSV adds "to Judaism" after "converts" in Acts 13:43, and this surely represents the meaning of the verse.

B. H. THROCKMORTON, JR.

JUDAIZING jo͞o'dĭ īz'ĭng. The Greek word meaning "to Judaize," Ἰουδαΐζειν, occurs in the Bible only in Gal. 2:14, where Paul tells of his rebuking Peter for refusing to eat with the Gentile members of the church at Antioch. It is implied that the food being eaten did not conform to Jewish food laws, and that if the Gentiles had accepted these Jewish laws and practices, Peter would have eaten with them. Peter's action, Paul declares, was, in effect, an attempt to "compel the Gentiles to Judaize"—i.e., "live like Jews" (so RSV).

This is the meaning of the word in the few other cases where the Greek word occurs. The LXX of Esth. 8:17 says that "many of the Gentiles had themselves circumcised, and Judaized [lived as Jews] for fear of the Jews." Plutarch (Cicero 7.6) tells of a freed slave Caecilius, who was said to be "guilty of Judaizing"—i.e., living as a Jew. Josephus tells of a Metilius who saved his life by promising "that he would Judaize even to circumcision," and he also tells of a time in Syria when the Syrians, though they thought they had rid themselves of the Jews, "had under suspicion those who were Judaizing"—i.e., Gentiles following Jewish ways (War II.xvii.10; xviii.2). Ignatius condemns professing Christians "living until now according to Judaism" and says "it is wrong to talk of Jesus Christ and yet to Judaize"—i.e., live as a Jew (Magn. 8:1; 10:3). In the Acts of Pilate 2:1, Pilate tells the Jews that "you know that my wife is god-fearing and more than ever Judaizes with you."

Thus every use of the Greek word applies to Gentiles who live in the Jewish way. It is not enough to say that they "sympathize with" the Jews, or "imitate" the Jews. They "live as Jews"; this is what the word means. As applied to Gentile Christians, it means that they accept the Mosaic law as binding and observe Jewish customs. (The modern use of the word to mean "inculcate or impose Judaism," which Webster's New International Dictionary gives as one meaning, has no basis in the Greek usage.)

Paul maintained that to compel Gentile Christians to "live as Jews" was to lead them to abandon the gospel. The demand that the Gentiles "Judaize" was made in Antioch and Jerusalem (Acts 15:1, 5), as well as in Galatia and probably in other churches founded by Paul. The claim was that the law was of permanent validity; it prescribed these Jewish practices; and no one could be a member of God's people and be saved without observing them. Paul argued that no one can keep the law; a totally new way of salvation is needed; and God's free grace in Christ provides it. Gentiles must not be asked to "live as Jews" as a condition of salvation. The issue is treated in Paul's letters to the GALATIANS and the ROMANS and at the COUNCIL OF JERUSALEM.

F. V. FILSON

JUDAS jo͞o'dəs ['Ιούδας=יהודה, Judah]. 1. See JUDAS MACCABEUS.

2. Son of Chalphi, and one of the commanders of Jonathan's army (I Macc. 11:70). When the troops all fled in battle at Hazor, Mattathias and Judas stood with Jonathan.

3. Son of Simon, and nephew of Judas Maccabeus. Following the death of Judas Maccabeus, the younger brother Jonathan was placed in command. After Jonathan's imprisonment (I Macc. 12:29-53), Simon, second eldest of the "glorious brothers," having been military governor of the coastal district, was elected leader (13:1-11); upon him and his descendants was conferred permanent authority as high priests. When, however, troops under Cendebeus invaded Judea, Simon called in his two older sons, Judas and John, and said: "I have grown old, and you by His mercy are mature in years. Take my place and my brother's, and go out and fight for our nation" (16:3). Though they defeated Cendebeus, Judas was wounded in the battle. Invited to a banquet at Jericho, Judas and another brother, Mattathias, together with their father, Simon, were treacherously killed by their brother-in-law and host, Ptolemy, the son of Abubus (16:11, 15-17).

4. An otherwise unidentified Jew (considered by some to be JUDAS MACCABEUS); one of the senders of a letter addressed to Aristobulus and the Jews in Egypt (II Macc. 1:10).

J. C. SWAIM

5. Judas of Galilee, a Jewish leader who, with a Pharisee named Zadok, promoted a rebellion against Roman authority in A.D. 6 or 7, when ARCHELAUS was deposed and the legate P. Sulpicius Quirinius (see QUIRINIUS) ordered a census taken, thus outraging the religious sensibilities of many Jews. He is mentioned with THEUDAS in Acts 5:37 as an example of futile rebellion against Rome. Josephus speaks of him, his sons, and descendants, in Antiq. XVIII.i.1-6; XX.v.2; War II.viii.1; xvii.8-9; VII.viii.1. Acts calls him a Galilean, and Josephus does the same in several passages, but in Antiq. XVIII.i.1 the latter says that he was from Gamala in Gaulanitis, across Lake Tiberias from Galilee proper; "Galilee" may be used in a broad sense, or that province may have been the seat of his rebellion. Josephus credits Judas with having founded the "fourth sect" of the Jews in his day (in addition to Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes), composed of violent revolutionaries and assassins with religious motivation, later known as Zealots (see ZEALOT) and Sicarii. Josephus (unlike Acts) says nothing about the death of Judas, but he records the violent end which befell his sons Jacob, Simon, and Menahem, and his grandson Eleazar. Josephus also mentions a Judas, son of Hezekiah, who revolted against Rome in 4 B.C. (War II.iv.1). It is impossible to say with certainty whether he was the same man as Judas of Galilee.

Bibliography. J. S. Kennard, Jr., "Judas of Galilee and his Clan," JQR, 36 (1945-46), 281-86; W. R. Farmer, Maccabees, Zealots and Josephus (1956).

6. A person mentioned in Matt. 13:55; Mark 6:3 as one of Jesus' brothers, in whatever sense that term is to be understood (see BROTHERS OF THE LORD). His name is given as Judas in the passages cited above, but in the shortened form JUDE in Jude 1, where the man in question has traditionally been taken to be the Lord's brother. He could not have been the same man as Judas the son (or brother) of James, who is one of the Twelve in Luke 6:16; Acts 1:13 (cf. John 14:22), since he was not a follower of Jesus during his earthly ministry.

In the absence of more exact information, we may assume that Judas' attitude toward Jesus was like that of James and the other brothers. They were critical or indifferent at first (Matt. 12:46-50 and parallels; Mark 3:21, where "relatives" is better than the RSV "friends"; John 7:5 says explicitly that his brothers did not believe in him). After the Resurrection and the appearance to James (I Cor. 15:7) the brothers became ardent Christians and leaders in the early church (Acts 1:14; I Cor. 9:5).

There is an interesting tradition concerning the grandson of this Judas, preserved by Hegesippus and quoted by Eusebius in Hist. III.19-20 (1-6), 32 (6). According to it the Roman emperor Domitian (A.D. 81-96) became afraid of a messianic uprising among the Jews, and ordered that the descendants of David be put to death. Some heretics reported two grandsons of Judas, and they were brought into the emperor's presence. They admitted Davidic descent, but explained that Christ's kingdom was heavenly and angelic, not of this world. When Domitian learned that they were small landowners and saw that they bore every evidence of hard work, he dismissed them and brought the persecution to an end. Later they became "rulers of churches."

F. W. GINGRICH

7. Judas Iscariot, one of the twelve apostles; the betrayer of Jesus.

This apostle is certainly the most enigmatic person in the gospel story. The meaning of his name (or designation), his background, his character, his motive in betraying Jesus, the manner of his death—all are riddles now quite insolvable.

The most diverse explanations have been offered for the name Iscariot: "man from Kerioth"; "the assassin" (from σικάριος); "man from Sychar" (i.e., "a Samaritan"); "man of Issachar"; "man from Jericho"; "carrier of the leather bag" (scortea); "false one, liar, hypocrite." By far the commonest interpretation is the first—"man from Kerioth"—in part because of the D reading in John 12:4; 13:2, 26; 14:22 (ἀπὸ Καρυώτου), seemingly comparable names in Josephus ('Ισταβος—איש טוב) and the Talmud, and the Johannine reference to Judas' father as Simon Iscariot (6:71; 13:26). The uncertainty concerning the location of Kerioth (see Josh. 15:25; Jer. 48:24; Amos 2:2)—usually identified with modern Qaryatein in S Palestine—the strangeness in Greek texts of the untranslated word for "man" (איש), if the designation means "man of Kerioth," and the fact that the popular language was Aramaic, not Hebrew (hence why איש?), have been adduced as arguments against this understanding of the designation. Quite plausible is the suggestion that the term is Aramaic, from a root meaning "false one, liar, hypocrite" (שקר), an apt epithet on the lips of Aramaic-speaking Christians for the betrayer of Jesus. If the name, in spite of difficulties, is taken to mean "man from Kerioth," it may be held that this apostle was thus designated because he was the only Judean among the Twelve.

That Jesus chose Judas because he saw possibilities of nobility and great usefulness in him may be assumed. One scholar hazards the suggestion that he was the brother of Mary, Martha, and Lazarus, whose complaint at the waste of ointment was motivated by a purely selfish interest (John 12:4-6). But whether Judas belonged to this family beloved by Jesus or to some other, the love that knew no bounds reached out to him for good. At the beginning Judas must have responded with enthusiasm to Jesus and his proclamation.

It is probable that Judas was an important member of the apostolic circle. The lists (Mark 3:16-19; Matt. 10:2-4; Luke 6:14-16; Acts 1:13) put his name last, undoubtedly because of the betrayal, but the fact that he was treasurer of the group (John 12:6; 13:29) and may even have been reclining alongside Jesus at the Last Supper (13:21-26), contradicts the lowly listing. Eastern church tradition held that his name once stood higher in the apostolic list (third or sixth).

The motives behind Judas' betrayal of Jesus are unascertainable. So obscure or so obviously slanted are the accounts of Judas' treachery and death that some scholars have doubted the historicity of the betrayal. But the primitive church would hardly have invented an episode so infamous and derogatory to one of the apostles. With the passing of time Judas' name became more and more blackened (the Fourth Gospel practically identifies him with Satan and the Antichrist: John 6:70; 17:12), but the crescendo in hostility should not undermine belief in the historicity of the event itself.

Did Judas' enthusiasm for Jesus gradually cool? Was he disappointed because Jesus failed to strike decisively at his enemies and the enemies of the nation—in fact, even on occasions ran away from them? Did he stumble over Jesus' indifference to many points of the law and perhaps resent his association with the wrong people—tax collectors and sinners? Was the supreme disappointment the failure of Jesus to manifest his power in the Holy City, after he had doggedly journeyed there for a showdown appearance? Did Judas at the last sincerely believe Jesus a false messiah, a deceiver of the people, who according to the law (Deut. 13:1-11) should be done away with?

Or was Judas by the betrayal attempting to force Jesus into a display of power so that the religious and political authorities would be convinced of his messiahship? If he was the Messiah, could he not call on a legion of angels to deliver him? Thus all doubt would be cleared away, and the nation would be won to him.

Perhaps Judas was simply avaricious and dishonest, a man who could not resist an opportunity for personal gain (John 12:4-6; cf. Matt. 26:14-16). But the sum of money appears trivial for a treachery so heinous, and the motive superficial. Nothing short of disillusionment over Jesus, from whom he had hoped so much, and a corresponding zeal to uphold the law and institutions of Judaism against the attacks of false prophets and messiahs would seem to explain a deed so radical.

Exactly what information Judas delivered to the religious authorities is unclear. Was it that Jesus had accepted anointing at Bethany and thus openly claimed messiahship (Mark 14:3-11)? Or was it simply the place of his nocturnal retreat, so that he could be apprehended quietly, without exciting his many sympathizers and supporters (vss. 1-2)? The latter supposition better accords with the gospel representation.

Whether Judas partook of the bread and wine at the Last Supper has been much debated. From Luke one would conclude that he did (Luke 22:14-23). The other gospels leave the matter in doubt. Judas' participation in the covenant fellowship would, of course, raise theological problems. In view of the tendency in the tradition concerning Judas to reduce him to the status of a devil, Luke's more theologically difficult and less tendentious account of the Supper may contain historic fact. If Judas participated in this holy sacrament, his subsequent deed appears the more reprehensible.

Judas' end is shrouded in the same obscurity as the events leading up to it. According to Mark and Luke, Judas offered to betray Jesus to the chief priests and received from them a promise of money. Matthew has them pay Judas on the spot—thirty pieces of silver—a detail derived from Zech. 11:12. Matthew later pictures Judas as repenting and offering to return the money to the priests. On their refusal to accept it, Judas throws down the money in the temple and proceeds to hang himself. The priests, unwilling to put "blood money" in the temple treasury, purchase with it a potter's field, which becomes known as the "Field of Blood." A widely divergent story is told in Acts (1:18-19), according to which Judas himself buys the field and through a headlong fall (or swelling up?) is disemboweled.

The manner of the death of Judas was much commented on by early Christian preachers and writers, who introduced all sorts of gruesome details to make the death more horrible.

Both biblical and postbiblical accounts of the death appear to have been influenced by OT and apocryphal stories of the demise of evil men (cf. the LXX account of the death of Ahithophel [II Sam. 17:23]; Antiochus Epiphanes [II Macc. 9:7-18]; Nadan [the Story of Ahikar]; etc.), or at least by a loose tradition concerning the way traitors and villains should die. The two NT accounts agree only that Judas died violently as a consequence of his perfidy and that a plot of ground in Jerusalem was purchased and became known as the "Field of Blood" as a result of his acts.

Tradition has located this field at the confluence of the Kidron, Tyropoeon, and Hinnom valleys.

Bibliography. J. R. Harris, "Did Judas Really Commit Suicide?" AJT, IV (1900), 490-513. D. Haugg, Judas Iskarioth in den neutestamentlichen Berichten (1930). K. Lake, "The Death of Judas," in F. J. Foakes-Jackson and K. Lake, eds., The Beginnings of Christianity, V (1933), 22-30. C. C. Torrey, "The Name 'Iscariot,'" HTR, XXXVI (1943), 51-62. R. B. Halas, Judas Iscariot (1946). P. Benoit, "La mort de Judas," Synoptische Studien (A. Wikenhauser Festschrift; 1953), pp. 1-19.

K. Lüthi, Judas Iskarioth in der Geschichte der Auslegung von der Reformation bis zur Gegenwart (1955); "Das Problem des Judas Iskariot—neu untersucht," Evangelische Theologie, 16 (1956), 98-144. B. Gärtner, Die Ratselhaften Termini Nazoräer und Iskariot (Horae Soederblomianae, IV; 1957).

8. According to Luke 6:16; Acts 1:13, the son or brother of James, and one of the twelve apostles.

Matt. 10:3; Mark 3:18 have "Thaddaeus" (Western texts have "Lebbaeus") instead of this name. The Textus Receptus in Matthew has "Lebbaeus called Thaddaeus."

Luke probably supplies the true name of this apostle. Thaddaeus (from a root meaning "breast nipple"?) and LEBBAEUS (from a word meaning "heart"?) may be descriptive designations of the apostle, introduced to avoid confusion with the traitor and because of the odium attached to his name. The "Judas (not Iscariot)" of John 14:22 is possibly this apostle.

Bibliography. J. R. Harris, The Twelve Apostles (1927), pp. 28-44; V. Taylor, The Gospel According to St. Mark (1952), pp. 233-34; R. Bultmann, Das Evangelium des Johannes (14 Aufl., 1956), p. 481.

E. P. BLAIR

9. The man to whose house (on the street called "Straight") in Damascus Paul was brought in his blinded condition after his conversion experience (Acts 9:11). It was here that Ananias found him and restored his sight. Judas may have been a Christian; if not, he was not hostile to Christianity.

10. Judas Barsabbas, one of two leading members of the Jewish Christian church in Jerusalem who were commissioned by that church to carry a message to the churches in Antioch, Syria, and Cilicia, acquainting the Christians there with the decision of the COUNCIL OF JERUSALEM that there should be no strife between Jewish and Gentile Christians (Acts 15:22, 27). In 15:32, Judas and Silas are called prophets (see PROPHET IN THE NT); they not only brought the news of the decision to Antioch, but preached to the church as well. The name of Judas Barsabbas is also to be found in the spurious vs. 34.

It is not impossible that Judas Barsabbas and the Joseph Barsabbas of Acts 1:23 were brothers; this is especially probable if Barsabbas means "son of Sabbas" or some such name; further, they were both members of the Jewish Christian group at Jerusalem. If the name means "son of the sabbath," the two men may simply have been born on the sabbath.

Bibliography. H. J. Cadbury, The Book of Acts in History (1955), pp. 97-98, 119 and references there.

F. W. GINGRICH

11. KJV form of JUDAH 1 in Matt. 1:2-3; KJV Apoc. form of JUDAH 3.

JUDAS MACCABEUS măk'ə bē'əs. Leader of the Jewish revolt against Antiochus, and most renowned of intertestamental heroes.

1. Background
2. Campaigns
3. Characteristics
4. Significance

1. Background. Judas was the heir of a family tradition which regarded piety and patriotism as identical. He was the third son of Mattathias, a priest who, having "moved from Jerusalem and settled in Modein" (I Macc. 2:1), watched with horror the encroachments of Antiochus: the plundering of the temple, the introduction of foreign customs (symbolized by wearing the "Greek hat"; II Macc. 4:12), the defiling of the altar, the peaceful words designed to smooth the way for innovation and invasion, and outrage committed upon women and children (Jos. Antiq. XII.v.4). When the invaders offered Mattathias and his sons a supposedly flattering opportunity to become "friends of the king," Mattathias replied that even if everyone else departed from the religion of the fathers, he and his family would not "desert the law and the ordinances" (I Macc. 2:21).

When a collaborationist offered sacrifice according to the king's command, Mattathias slew him on the altar, and the revolt was on. Mattathias and his sons withdrew to the hills and rallied an army. When some in hiding were slain by the invader because of their refusal to fight on the sabbath, the decision was made to do battle whenever the enemy invoked it. In a farewell address, the aging Mattathias recounted the frequent deliverances God had wrought in history for his faithful people, then committed the leadership to his third son: "Judas Maccabeus has been a mighty warrior from his youth; he shall command the army for you and fight the battle against the peoples" (I Macc. 2:66).

2. Campaigns. Those who gathered round Judas "gladly fought for Israel" (I Macc. 3:2), but he who had taken command of the armies found himself beset from every quarter. When Apollonius came with a "large force from Samaria to fight against Israel," Judas not only roundly defeated him but also "took the sword of Apollonius, and used it in battle the rest of his life" (vs. 12). At Beth-horon, Judas with a small force put to rout a large Syrian army under Seron. Antiochus, seeking needed revenues in Persia, entrusted half his army to Lysias and commanded him "to wipe out and destroy the strength of Israel and the remnant of Jerusalem" (I Macc. 3:35). Entrusting command to Ptolemy, Nicanor, and Gorgias, Lysias sent forty thousand infantry and seven thousand calvary against Judah; these troops were reinforced by men from Syria and the land of the Philistines. At Emmaus, Judas routed picked troops under Gorgias, and at Beth-zur he defeated mercenaries and chosen men under Lysias.

The way was now cleared for cleansing the temple of its defilement. Taking Mount Zion, Judas replaced the desecrated altar with one made of unhewn stones; "rebuilt the sanctuary and the interior of the temple, and consecrated the courts" (I Macc. 4:48); and completely refurnished the sanctuary, providing it with curtains, lamps, and holy vessels. The rededication ceremony took place "on the twenty-fifth day of the ninth month." Thus the "reproach of the Gentiles was removed" (vs. 58).

But other Gentile groups still harassed, and Judas fought with the sons of Esau, the sons of Baean, the sons of Ammon, and the Nabateans. He campaigned against Timothy in Gilead, and fought also at Hebron and Ashdod. After battles at Beth-zechariah and the citadel, Lysias agreed to make peace, but his successors conspired with Jewish rebels under Alcimus to carry on the conflict. Judas defeated Nicanor, but lost his own life at Elasa in an engagement with reinforced armies under Bacchides.

3. Characteristics. II Maccabees emphasizes the warrior's resourcefulness. Forced into hiding, Judas "kept himself and his companions alive in the mountains as wild animals do" (II Macc. 5:27). In his military campaigns he would set fire to ships and harbors, make surprise appearances, and attack under cover of night. The words he addressed to his troops "filled them with good courage and made them ready to die for their laws and their country" (8:21; cf. 15:11, 17). Judas, however, never boasted in his own achievements, but believed himself to be an agent of God's deliverance.

Before battle at Mizpah he and his men fasted and "put on sackcloth and sprinkled ashes on their heads, and rent their clothes" (I Macc. 3:47), and his prayers before battle are sometimes reported (I Macc. 4:30-33; II Macc. 15:22-24). At battle's end he and his men "blessed the Lord who shows great kindness to Israel and gives them the victory" (II Macc. 10:38). His rallying cry was: "It is better for us to die in battle than to see the misfortunes of our nation and of the sanctuary. But as his will in heaven may be, so he will do" (I Macc. 3:59-60). II Maccabees represents him as miraculously aided in his exploits by "appearances which came from heaven to those who strove zealously on behalf of Judaism" (2:21).

4. Significance. Judas was careful to observe the provisions of the law regarding classes exempt from military service (I Macc. 3:56) and exemplary in carrying out all the duties of piety, remembering even on his expeditions to send sin offerings to Jerusalem (II Macc. 12:43). One of the enemy generals observed of him and his men "how ready they were either to live or to die nobly" (I Macc. 4:35). In words not unlike those of John 21:25, the author of I Maccabees says of Judas: "The brave deeds that he did, and his greatness, have not been recorded, for they were very many" (I Macc. 9:22). He bequeathed to his people a legacy of courage and devotion to the nation which is not only among the most illustrious in Hebrew annals, but is of significance also for NT study.

The cleansing of the temple from the defilement wrought by Antiochus Epiphanes, carried out at the winter solstice, gave the nation a new festival, that of חנוכה, "Renewal." John 10:22 thus dates one incident in the life of Jesus: "It was the feast of Dedication at Jerusalem." Not alone does the achievement of Maccabeus explain this reference, but it is possible that the spirit of Judas and his brothers lies back of much that takes place in the gospels. Among the followers of Jesus were fierce patriots who longed for a new deliverance from foreign rule. Even after the Resurrection the question still was asked: "Will you at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?" (Acts 1:6). Jesus' driving the money-changers from the temple must have brought to some minds thoughts of an earlier cleansing. Judas' treatment of enemies (e.g., II Macc. 15:28-33), however, is very unlike that enjoined in Matt. 5:44.

When Judas died in battle, the people said:

> How is the mighty fallen,
> the savior of Israel!
> (I Macc. 9:21).

A more sober appraisal is given in 3:3-9:

> He extended the glory of his people.
> . . . . . .
> all the evildoers were confounded.
> . . . . . .
> He made Jacob glad by his deeds, > and his memory is blessed forever.

J. C. Swaim

JUDE, LETTER OF [Ἰούδας, see Judas]. A letter claimed to have been written by Jude, brother of James, to the church at large. It belongs to the "Catholic letters," among which it occupies the last place in our canon. The letter itself is an appeal to uphold the faith against heretical dangers and devotes itself mainly to a polemical characterization of the heretics. Although closely related to II Peter, which makes wide use of it in ch. 2, it did not obtain early recognition and had a disputed place in the canon. This may well be due to its negative character, its use of apocryphal literature, and to the general difficulty of identifying its author, the church(es) to which it is addressed, and the heretics under consideration.

The importance of the letter lies in the contribution it makes to the complex story of heresy within the church. It documents the early struggle of "orthodoxy" versus "heresy," which subsequently forced the church to establish the "apostolic" norms of canon, tradition, and authoritative interpretation.

1. Content and purpose
2. Authorship, date, and destination
3. The heretics
4. Canonicity

1. Content and purpose. The author addresses himself to Christendom at large, "to those who are called, beloved in God the Father and kept for[?] Jesus Christ." It seems that the author intended to write about "our common salvation," but he was interrupted by the urgency of the new heretical threat invading the churches. He therefore changes his plans and directs an urgent appeal to "contend for the faith which was once for all delivered to the saints" (vs. 3). The author himself conceives this fight as a sharp attack on the moral and religious character of the heretics. Their moral turpitude (ἀσελγεια) stands under a sure judgment, as is documented by three OT examples (vss. 4-7). Making use of apocryphal citations from the Assumption of Moses and the book of Enoch and employing symbolic language derived from the OT, the author elaborates the judgment theme (vss. 9-12, 14-15). The heretics reject ethical norms and established order. Apart from their sexual misbehavior (vss. 7-8, 16, 18), they scorn angelic powers (κυριότης, δόξαι; vs. 8), they undermine the ordered life of the church (vs. 16), and they undercut the unity of the church by their religious pride (vs. 19). They boast of visions (vs. 8) and want to be counted as pneumatics (vs. 19), but in reality they are the "hidden rocks" in the love feasts of the faithful (vs. 12). In order to counteract them, the faithful are reminded of the apostolic faith: "You must remember, beloved, the predictions of the apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ" (vs. 17). The apostles predicted that these heresies would come. In fact, they are part of the plan of salvation; for they manifest the tribulations at the close of the eschatological timetable (vs. 18). Sticking faithfully to their confession, the Christians must expect the parousia of Christ (vs. 21; cf. vs. 1). Textual confusion makes it difficult to determine precisely the attitude the faithful must take with respect to the heretics and those influenced by them (vss. 22-23). With Jude's preference for triads (vss. 2, 4, 5-7, 8, 11-12, 19), we may assume a threefold reference and read with the RSV (versus the KJV): "And convince [ἐλέγχετε A.C.] some, who doubt; save some [σώζετε], by snatching them out of the fire; on some have mercy with fear, hating even the garment spotted by the flesh." Since the last clause makes no sense, some critics have made the conjecture to read (for ἐλεᾶτε) ἐλάσατε or ἐκβάλετε, clearly pointing to excommunication (cf. I Cor. 5:5; Tit. 3: 10; I Tim. 1:20). An elaborate liturgical doxology forms the end of the letter. The purpose of the letter, then, is twofold: negatively, it wants to indict the heretics for their moral and religious apostasy from the Christian faith; positively, it contends for the trustworthiness of the apostolic faith and tradition, and for the unity of the church with its established order and authority.

2. Authorship, date, and destination. The questions of authorship, date, and destination are interwoven. The letter claims to have been written by "Jude, a servant of Jesus Christ and brother of James." This is not the apostle Judas, referred to in Luke 6:16; John 14:22; Acts 1:13, who is said to be the son of James; but it must refer to Judas the brother of James and Jesus (Matt. 13:55; Mark 6:3; possibly I Cor. 9:5). This Jude is virtually unknown in the history of early Christianity, except for a story attributed by Eusebius to Hegesippus, who relates that there survived of the family of the Lord grandsons of Judas, who were accused before Domitian, but released by him because of their simple way of life (Euseb. Hist. III.20). Scholarship is divided on the issue of whether to acknowledge the letter as a product of the brother of James and Jesus or to view it as the work of an unknown author who assumed the pseudonym Jude. Some even regard "a brother of James" as a later interpolation—to enhance the authority of his letter. The issue cannot conclusively be solved, since destination and date are obscure. Yet internal evidence militates against an early date and against the ascription of the letter to the brother of Jesus. Although the author employs much OT imagery, apocryphal tradition, and Septuagintal terminology, still an early and/or Palestinian origin of the author seems impossible, because:

a) His language is decidedly Hellenistic, and he abounds in hapax legomena—some twenty-two, if we include II Peter's borrowings from Jude.

b) His salutation diverges from the common one in apostolic times: "Grace and peace" in Paul (cf. also I Peter and Revelation), and is close to the one used by I Timothy, II Timothy, and II John: "Grace, mercy, and peace," but in this form: "May mercy, peace, and love be multiplied"—a form found in the Martyrdom of Polycarp: "May mercy, peace, and love of God the Father and our Lord Jesus Christ be multiplied."

c) The author speaks of faith as a deposit "once for all delivered to the saints" (cf. also vs. 20: "your most holy faith"), which undoubtedly refers to the apostolic tradition or Christian confession.

d) The author speaks from the standpoint of post-apostolic times: "You must remember . . . the predictions of the apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ; they said to you, 'In the last time . . .' " (vss. 17-18). Now the last time has arrived, which the apostles long ago prophesied, the time of scoffers in the history of salvation. And (vs. 5) he does not include himself within the apostolate, which we might have expected of a brother of the Lord (vs. 17).

On these grounds we have reason to believe that the letter was composed sometime in the beginning of the second century; and that the author was not a Palestinian Jew or a brother of the Lord, but either an unknown person named Jude—through interpolation identified as the brother of James—or a person who adopted a pseudonym to give his letter enhanced authority. In this last case it must remain a riddle why he would have chosen the—at least for us—obscure authority of Jude. The destination of the letter cannot be established, although the description of the heretics makes Asia Minor a likely choice.

3. The heretics. It has been a constant problem for scholarship to identify the heretics alluded to in Jude. An exact identification will probably be forever an impossibility, because of the nebulous way in which Jude describes them. The author is not interested in a description of—or, for that matter, in a debate with—the heretics. His work is an invective characterizing and indicting them in blunt but general ways. Two extremes must be avoided. The first is to see the heretics as early Palestinian Christians who have relapsed into moral laxity. The second is to identify the heretics with the fully developed Gnostic systems of the second century. The first extreme denies the fact that we have to do here with an outspoken heretical scheme of definite Gnostic color; the second extreme reads into Jude too much of an elaborate system based on the Gnostic systems described by Irenaeus, Hippolytus, and Epiphanius. In this way the heretics have been identified in the past with the Carpocratians, the Marcosians, or with unknown groups like the Balaamites or Nikolaites.

The important thing is not to associate the heretics with the name of a well-known heresiarch, but to determine, if possible, what stage of the early Christian movement they may illuminate for us. In this way the place of Jude in the history of the struggle of "orthodoxy" against "heresy" can be evaluated. Since II Peter, which was probably written not too long afterward, appropriates much of Jude, most scholars understand II Pet. 2 as being directed to a similar heresy, although probably somewhat more developed (see PETER, SECOND LETTER OF). It is of central importance to recognize with recent scholarship that Gnosticism is not a late offshoot of the Christian gospel, but that a Gnostic climate surrounds the NT from its beginning (see GNOSTICISM), and that already Paul had to struggle with Gnostic tendencies in some of his churches (see COLOSSIANS). It is probable that we witness in Jude that moment of transition in the struggle of ortho-doxy versus heresy in which the church rallies its forces and attempts to drive heretics out of its midst.

The relation of the heretics to the church is not clear. The author describes them in vs. 4 as having "slipped into" the church from the outside; but vs. 12 portrays them as belonging to the church, "hidden rocks" at the love feasts of the Christians. Yet again the reference to "shepherding themselves" (vs. 12) suggests that the heretics are "separatists" who do not submit themselves to apostolic authority. The ambiguous vs. 23 (see the conjecture) may mean that the church is ready to excommunicate them. Notwithstanding their "illegal entrance" (vs. 4), they have gained quite a hearing for their Gnosticizing teachings. The author characterizes their Gnosticism as licentiousness (ἀσέλγεια), which was probably based on their gospel of freedom (ἐλευθερία; II Pet. 2:19; cf. ἑαυτοὺς ποιμαίνοντες in vs. 12). They feel themselves as "spirituals" elevated in a spiritual realm, in which they are free from the moral norms and authorities of this world (vss. 8, 12, 16). As such (vs. 19) they claim special visions (vs. 8) and know themselves separated from the body of believers (vs. 19). This knowledge is based on their claim to be victorious over angelic powers which dominate this created world. At least vs. 8 seems to imply a certain cosmology in which the angels are characterized as the evil(?) powers. The emphasis in Jude on the Judgment and the Parousia (vs. 21[24]) may indicate a teaching of a spiritual resurrection (II Tim. 2:18) and a denial of the Christian judgment and parousia (cf. also ἀφόβως in Jude 12 versus the φόβος of the Christian in vs. 23). It is difficult to determine whether the heretics had a Gnostic Christology. The denial (ἀρνούμενοι) of our only Master and Lord Jesus Christ in vs. 4 may be only a consequence of their perversion of the "grace of our God" into licentiousness. The μόνος reference in vs. 4 (and vs. 25, where it is liturgical) is not strong enough evidence of a Gnostic separation between Christ and the historical Jesus.

On the basis of the otherwise established post-apostolic date of Jude, we should see here, probably, a reflection of the inner-Christian struggle around heresy which with different emphases we see as well in II Peter, the Johannine letters, the Pastorals, Revelation, and Ignatius of Antioch. Since no direct appeal to an established clergy is found in Jude, we surmise it to form a chapter of the struggle with heresy in Asia Minor just prior to the Ignatian epistles. See IGNATIUS, EPISTLES OF.

4. Canonicity. Jude, notwithstanding its brevity and its apocryphal references has, in contrast to II Peter, enjoyed a relatively strong position in the regard of the church. The earliest evidence of its existence and authority is in II Peter, where it largely constitutes the second chapter. Although doubts about its authenticity are voiced later by Eusebius and Origen, it is accepted at the end of the second century in three important church centers: Alexandria, Carthage, and Rome. In Alexandria, Clement of Alexandria (190-202) quotes it as a work of Jude (Paed. III.8), and so does Origen (ca. 230). In Africa, Tertullian mentions it, but Cyprian omits any reference to it. In Rome it received a place in the Muratorian Canon (ca. 190). Eusebius (ca. 324) lists the letter as "spurious" and elsewhere as "disputed" (Euseb. Hist. II.23.24-25; III.25.3; VI.13.6; VI.14.1), but Athanasius (367) ends the ambiguity by including Jude as the last one among the seven Catholic letters.

For bibliography, see PETER, SECOND LETTER OF.

J. C. BEKER

JUDE THE LORD'S BROTHER. See JUDAS 6; BROTHERS OF THE LORD.

JUDEA jo͞o dē'ə ['Ιουδαία=יהודה]; KJV JUDAEA except in Ezra 5:8. The S part of W Palestine, formerly called JUDAH (1) after the tribe of Judah, which settled there. It lay between Samaria and the Nabatean-Arabian Negeb.

1. The region. The name Judea appears first in Greek, in Ezra-Nehemiah and Maccabees, where it denotes the Jewish state after the Exile. In the Persian period it was a very small area around Jerusalem governed by Nehemiah, extending no farther S than Beth-zur (note the districts named in Neh. 3). Under the Maccabees, Judea achieved its first independence and then adopted an expansionist policy. The Maccabean kingdom of Judea assimilated Galilee, Samaria, and Idumea, and the entire coast except Ashkelon, and the whole length of Transjordan to the borders of Arabia. However, this was not considered an enlargement of Judea, but rather the creation of a small empire with Judea ruling over the subject lands. But when the Romans established Herod the Great over much the same territory, he was designated king of Judea, the title referring to the entire realm which he managed to control. But again, when his kingdom was divided, his son Archelaus became the ethnarch of Judea, including only Idumea and Samaria and not the cities of the maritime plain or Galilee or Perea. After Archelaus was removed in A.D. 6, each procurator of Judea controlled the same territory—though no longer from Jerusalem, but from the new capital at Caesarea on the Samaritan coast. It is therefore evident that political circumstances at times extended the area to which the name Judea was applied, although Judea proper was a limited region around Jerusalem. It may be simply described as one of the three main divisions of Palestine: Judea; SAMARIA; GALILEE.

Judea proper was almost a square, ca. forty-five miles on a side. It extended from the Jordan and Dead Sea westward to the coast, excluding ASHKELON and at times the other independent coastal cities of Jamnia, Azotus, and Gaza. Along the coast it reached from below Gaza northward to Joppa, and along the Dead Sea from the fortress of Masada (fifteen miles from the S end) northward beyond Jerusalem. It never extended far N of Jerusalem, this boundary remaining stable in contact with the N kingdom of Israel and later with the district of Samaria. There is a natural demarcation along the Valley of Ajalon, N of the rocky outpost of Gazara (Gezer) where the Valley of Ajalon cuts eastward into the mountains, the line of the wadies continuing S of Bethel and N of Jericho to the Jordan. Judea is chiefly "hill country," a mountainous fortress of limestone ranging between 2,000 and 3,346 feet (N of Hebron). This is the traditional "wilderness" or "DESERT," where the population has always been sparse because the springs are few. But where the mountains fall off to the W, there are the broken foothills of the Shephelah "lowland" (I Macc. 12:38), pierced by intermittent valleys which have been the gates to Judea for both friend and foe.

The highways of commerce have always passed around Judea, and only the deliberate visitor has sought access to her mountain trails, along the wadies that break out into the open, both to the W and to the E. Judea's E gates are three oases: 'Ain Jidi (Engedi) on the W-central shore of the Dead Sea, opposite Hebron; 'Ain Feshkha, ten miles S of Jericho, on the Dead Sea (made famous by the sensational DEAD SEA SCROLLS discoveries in caves near QUMRAN), from which the traveler may reach Bethlehem; and Jericho, with its "fountain of Elisha," the direct approach to Jerusalem. There is only one N-S road over the tableland, which passes from Bethel and Jerusalem to Hebron, to Kirjath-Sepher, and to Beer-sheba.

2. Its life. Judea's livelihood was pastoral and self-contained. The shallow and stony soil yielded olives and grapes, figs and citrus, and some grain in the valleys. The Dead Sea yielded common salt, and in later times other minerals such as potash became profitable. But the greatest wealth of Judea was the annual half-shekel temple tax laid upon all male adult Jews by the Torah, which brought large and regular contributions from the Diaspora. The wealth of Judea, as well as its population, was concentrated about JERUSALEM, which alone held the status of a πόλις. The rest of Judea was organized into ten administrative toparchies (Jos. War III.iii.5). During the Greco-Roman period the Sanhedrin sat in Jerusalem, with autonomous power under the Maccabees and delegated power under the Romans. This governing body ruled directly over all Judea, while its prestige reached also to Jewish towns lying outside. The Jewish population of Judea proper has been estimated to be ca. 200,000, half of whom resided in Jerusalem. Perhaps a fifth of the Jerusalem residents were priests. Pilgrims in great numbers converged upon Jerusalem, especially for the great feasts. In Roman times a small military guard was assigned to Judea, chiefly in Caesarea and Jerusalem. See ARMY.

The town of MODEIN on the N border of Judea proper was where the Maccabean Revolt first flared in 168 B.C. In the Judean hills the war for Jewish independence was fought and won. From this mountain fortress of Judea a small empire was governed by Hyrcanus and Janneus. In Judea also the Herods of conquered Idumea rose to power, with the support of Rome, and ruled when the Christian era began. Jerusalem, ancient fortress and holy city, was the setting for the crucifixion of Jesus of Nazareth—an administrative incident which became central to the Christian faith (I Cor. 2:2). Once again revolt arose in Judea in A.D. 66 and 135, which resulted in the downfall of Jerusalem and the Jewish state. In 451 the Council of Chalcedon created the Patriarchate of Jerusalem, in which Judea became Diocese I. The Muslims seized Judea in 637 and, except for the Crusader kingdom (1099-1187), held it until it was made a British mandate after World War I. In 1948, Palestine was partitioned by the United Nations, and the Shephelah and the Maritime Plain, and a wedge whose point encloses Jerusalem's "new city" on the W, were assigned to the new state of Israel. The remainder of Judea was subsequently incorporated within an expanded Kingdom of Jordan.

Bibliography. E. Huntington, Palestine and Its Transformation (1911), pp. 66-103; G. A. Smith, Historical Geography of the Holy Land (1931), pp. 243-319. K. W. CLARK

JUDGE [דין (RSV PROTECTOR), פלילי, שפט; KJV אלהים (RSV God); δικαστής, κριτής]. An official with authority to administer justice by trying cases in law; also, one who usurps this authority outside court; in a special sense, the war leader in Israel, having temporal authority and the grace of God to deliver his people in the period between Joshua and David. The patriarchs were judges in their own families (Gen. 21–22; 27; etc.).

Men who served as magistrates were called judges. They served God in their judgment (II Chr. 19:6). Moses appointed judges upon the advice of Jethro (Exod. 18:15). Subordinate judges are also known in the Pentateuch (Num. 11:16-17; Deut. 1:9 ff). During the monarchy the king was the supreme judge (II Sam. 15:2-3). There are a few references to royally appointed judges (I Chr. 23:4; II Chr. 19:5), but even in the monarchy they had only local authority (Deut. 16:18; 17:8-9). The priests also were the judges, and so the sanctuary became a place of judgment (Exod. 33:8 ff; Deut. 17:12). The elders of the city could serve as judges at the gate (Judg. 8: 16; Ruth 4:2; Job 29:7-8). A judge might go from town to town, as did Samuel (I Sam. 7:15). Ezra appointed magistrates and judges. In Hellenistic times the high priest was the supreme judge in place of the king (cf. II Chr. 19:8). Christians and Jews were to avoid taking their quarrels before Gentile judges. In NT times the Sanhedrin was the supreme court for the Jews. As in all places and times, bribing a judge was not unknown (Mic. 7:3; etc.). The parable of an unjust judge is given in Luke 18.

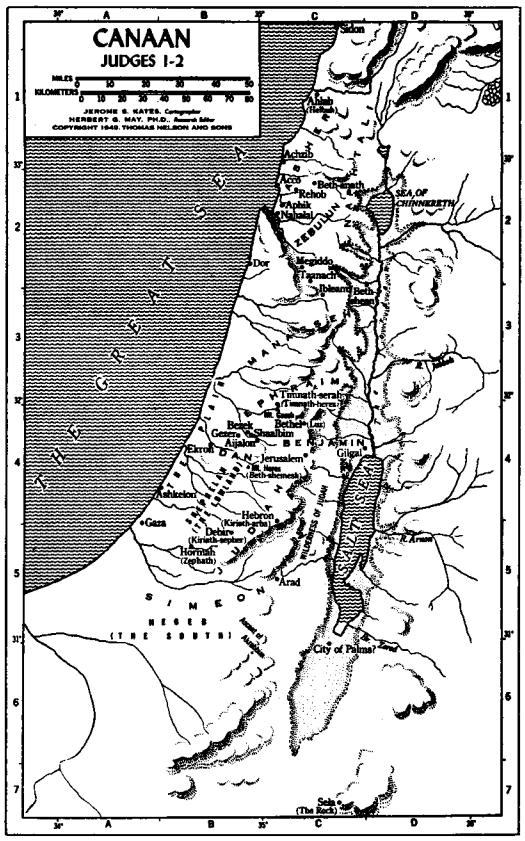
Some men judged their neighbors outside the courts of law. They were condemned for so doing (Gen. 19:9; Exod. 2:14; Lev. 19:15; Acts 7:27). Jesus declared that no one except God should judge (Luke 6:37; cf. Jas. 4:12). Paul, however, requests his hearers to judge his message whether it be true or not (I Cor. 10:15).



The judges (שפטים) were military leaders endowed by the grace of God to deliver and govern his people in time of oppression. In Ps. 2:10 they have parallel authority to kings (cf. Hos. 7:7). These men were not connected with a normal tribal or city government. Perhaps, like the American Indian war chief, their authority was limited to the duration of the crisis. They usually claimed loyalty from the tribes transcending tribal divisions (Judg. 5). Yet their authority could be confined to one tribe, such as that of Samson (Judg. 15). Some of these judges were probably contemporaries of one another. In a way Moses could be called the first judge and Samuel the last. For a list of the judges and the chronological problem, see JUDGES, BOOK OF.

God is a judge. He is called a judge because he is the supreme arbiter pronouncing sentences on man (Gen. 18:25; Isa. 33:22; Jas. 4:12). He is the judge of all the earth (Ps. 94:2; Acts 10:42; Rom. 3:6). He judges between the nations (Isa. 2:4). The sinner seeks to avoid God's judgment by loyalty to the covenant (Pss. 7:8; 50:4-5; 82:8; 96:10; Ezekiel passim; Heb. 10:30; 12:23; etc.). Jesus is called a judge (Jas. 5:9; I Pet. 4:5). He set a new standard of judgment which, if enforced, would allow no one to be guiltless (John 7:24; see SERMON ON THE MOUNT). Jesus claimed during his lifetime to judge for the Father (John 8:16). He judges the whole world (II Tim. 4: 1). At the end of the world (see ESCHATOLOGY) he will be assisted by his saints (I Cor. 6:2-3).

C. U. WOLF

* JUDGES, BOOK OF. A history of the period between Joshua and Samuel; now found as the seventh book in the OT canon. In the Hebrew Bible it is the second book in the second division, which is known as the Former Prophets, and it is preceded by the book of Joshua and followed by Samuel. In the English Bible, as in the LXX and the Vulg., it is classed among the historical books, and it occupies the same position following the book of Joshua, but is followed immediately by Ruth rather than Samuel.

As the only biblical narrative of the Israelites' adventures between their entrance into Canaan and the rise of the monarchy, the book is a valuable historical source for understanding the last stages of the Conquest, the social conditions of the period, intertribal relations and relations with non-Israelites, and the heroes of the era. As essentially religious literature rather than a historical document, the book emphasizes the Spirit of Yahweh as moving through the history of the period and especially in the careers of his chosen heroes or "judges," for whom the book is named.

See map "Canaan: Judges 3-21, Ruth," under RUTH, BOOK OF.

A. Title
B. Text and versions
C. Contents
  1. Preface: Summary of the Conquest
    a. The southern tribes
    b. The central and northern tribes
    c. Religious implications
  2. The careers of the judges
    a. Introduction: The role of the judges
    b. Othniel and Cushan-rishathaim
    c. Ehud and the Moabites
    d. Shamgar and the Philistines
    e. Deborah and the Canaanites
    f. Gideon and the Midianites
    g. Supplement: Abimelech's kingship
    h. Tola and Jair, two "minor" judges
    i. Recapitulation and further introduction
    j. Jephthah and the Ammonites

k. Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon, three "minor" judges
l. Samson and the Philistines
3. Supplement: Two tribal movements
a. The new sanctuary of the Danites
b. War against the Benjaminites
D. Composition and literary structure
1. Sources
2. Pre-Deuteronomic editions
3. Deuteronomic edition
4. Final edition
E. Historical value
1. History of the period
2. Literature of the period
3. Social and cultural conditions
F. Religious significance
1. Religion of the period
2. Prophetic criticism of culture
Bibliography

A. TITLE. The title "Judges" (שפטים; LXX Κριταί; Vulg. Judicum) was given to the book as early as Origen and the Talmud. This name was used because the bulk of the book tells the stories of the chief Israelite leaders who are called "judges" both in the book itself (Judg. 2:16-18) and elsewhere (Ruth 1:1; II Sam. 7:7, 11; II Kings 23:22; I Chr. 17:6, 10; Ecclus. 46:11).

The noun "judge" or "judges" designating an office is used at only two points in the book. It is used once of Yahweh as "the Judge" who should "judge" or "decide" in a territorial dispute between the Israelites and the Ammonites in the days of Jephthah (Judg. 11:27). Six times it is used in an introductory description of these persons as deliverers whom Yahweh would raise up to save the people from their oppressors, during whose lifetime faithful Israel prospered, but at whose death faithless Israel again suffered (2:16-19).

While no person in the book is specifically called a judge, eight are said to have "judged" Israel: Othniel (3:10), Tola (10:2), Jair (10:3), Jephthah (12:7), Ibzan (12:8-9), Elon (12:11), Abdon (12:13-14), and Samson (15:20; 16:31). In each of these cases the connotation of the term, if given at all, is not that of "rendering decisions," but rather that of "delivering Israel from an enemy," usually by war. Thus the judges were not so much legal consultants as champions or heroes vindicating Israel in war and impelled by Yahweh's Spirit. Only in the case of Deborah do both the connotation of the verb form used (שפטה; 4:4) and the statement that "the people of Israel came up to her for judgment" (למשפט; 4:5) indicate that the function was that of judicial decision or arbitration.

However, while the language used emphasizes the savior character of these judges, they usually are said to have "judged" for so many years—from six to forty—most of which time was after the hero's war of deliverance. Of only Jephthah is another term used—viz., "ruler" (קצין; 11:6, 11; RSV "leader")—because he was promised continued rule if successful in driving out the enemy. It is implied that each judge had his period of virtual dictatorship. It is obvious further that the judges were regarded as a series of successive rulers, not a hereditary succession, but each separately appointed by God. Thus in the sense of "ruler" the Hebrew term "judge" (שופט) has been compared to the Akkadian office of a shapitu, the Phoenician shuphetim or "regents," the Carthaginian sufetes or "chief magistrates," and by Livy with the consuls of Rome. See JUDGE.

B. TEXT AND VERSIONS. The Hebrew text of the book of Judges has been unusually well preserved. Except for the Song of Deborah (ch. 5), its oldest portion, its preservation has been perhaps better than that of any other OT book outside the Pentateuch. The relatively few textual corruptions which are evident are those usual in the centuries-long transmission of the text, caused by confusion or transposition of letters, dittography of words, or omission of words or parts of words, etc.

The Greek translation of the book is unique among all OT books, for the wide divergence between the two oldest and best LXX MSS, Codex Alexandrinus and Codex Vaticanus, is so great that many scholars have regarded them as two distinct and almost, if not wholly, independent translations from the Hebrew. Therefore, since 1882 the standard editions of the LXX, except Swete's, have printed both texts side by side. Most scholars have regarded the Alexandrine text as perhaps more nearly the original, but studies showing that this text was influenced by Theod. render this judgment not conclusive. Some scholars lay stress on the preferred readings of Origen's M, N, L, y, b^2, in his Hexapla, especially as over against the Lucianic recensions.

The Vulg., Syr., and Targums, all representing texts closely akin to the Hebrew consonantal text of the MT, are regarded as being more valuable for their interpretations than for their evidence of the original text.

To date, the MT of the book of Judges is considered to be, on the whole, the best evidence for the original text, unrivaled by any version, although obviously individual passages must be judged on their own merits.

C. CONTENTS. The present book of Judges is clearly composed of three parts: (a) a preface summarizing the Conquest and the final settlement of the Israelites in Canaan (1:1–2:5); (b) the stories of the careers of the judges (2:6–16:31); and (c) a supplement recounting two tribal movements—viz., that of the Danites to their new N sanctuary and that of the intertribal war against the Benjaminites (chs. 17–21).

1. Preface: Summary of the Conquest. The prefatory summary of the Conquest and final settlement in Canaan (1:1–2:5) provides a very fitting introduction to the present book of Judges. This is so because it shows how the old Canaanite inhabitants were left in possession of the chief cities. Their religion of Baalism was thus the occasion for the apostasy of Israelites from Yahweh. The failure of the invaders to exterminate both the inhabitants and their gods was the cause of the evils which came upon Israel in subsequent generations.

This section, while fragmentary and possibly a condensation of a longer account, proceeds in fairly orderly fashion. Although many passages are parallel to material found in the book of Joshua, as a whole this record presents a very different picture of the Conquest from that in Joshua. Here the separate tribes conquer territory which has been previously allotted to them, while in Joshua the whole of Israel carries on a united campaign under Joshua's leadership which ends in his parceling out the land to each of the tribes.

The opening words of the book: "After the death of Joshua," indicate that the account is to be understood as a sequel to Joshua's accomplishments. This phrase is obviously an editorial attempt to link the book of Judges with the end of the book of Joshua. The facts that (a) at the opening of the second section of the book of Judges (2:6-10) Joshua's concluding act and death are mentioned as though no previous reference had been made to them in the book, and that (b) this entire first section has many points in common with scattered references in Joshua, show that here is a condensed, parallel account of the invasion. Much of what is ascribed to Joshua in the previous book is here more accurately stated as accomplished by the respective tribes.

The section is composed of three parts: (a) a description of the Conquest by the S tribes (1:1-21); (b) an outline of the accomplishments of the central and N tribes (1:22-36); and (c) the religious implications of the Israelites' failure to exterminate the Canaanites (2:1-5).

a. The southern tribes. The S invasion (1:1-21) was accomplished by (a) the tribe of Judah, together with its clans Caleb and Othniel and friendly non-Israelites, and (b) the lesser tribe of Simeon. The first event of the Conquest was Judah's volunteering to fight against the Canaanites and taking Simeon with him (vss. 1-3). The first city conquered was Jerusalem (vss. 4-9). This was done after their defeating ten thousand Canaanites at Bezek and capturing and mutilating Canaanite king Adoni-bezek (cf. Adoni-zedek, king of Jerusalem, in Josh. 10:1-3; LXX "Adoni-bezek" in both references; cf. Melchizedek, in Gen. 14:18). Later in the account it is stated that "the people of Benjamin did not drive out the Jebusites" from Jerusalem (vs. 21; according to the parallel in Josh. 15:63, "the people of Judah could not drive" them out). Although there might have been two destructions of Jerusalem, the city was not conclusively captured for Israel until the days of David (II Sam. 5:6-9).

In the campaign farther S (Judg. 1:9) the two Judean clans of Caleb and Othniel played the chief roles against, respectively, Hebron and Debir (although both were originally captured by Joshua in Josh. 10:36-39). The city Hebron, assaulted by Judah (Judg. 1:10; by Caleb in vs. 20; Josh. 15:13-14), was given to Caleb. Nearby Debir was taken by Caleb's nephew OTHNIEL, who by this exploit became also Caleb's son-in-law (Judg. 1:11-15; paralleled in Josh. 15:15-19). The points farthest S in the campaign were settled by friendly Kenites and by the weaker tribe Simeon (Judg. 1:16-17; no parallel in Joshua).

Contradictory statements are made concerning the Philistine Plain. The first, perhaps a late editorial gloss, inaccurately states that Judah took three of the five Philistine cities, Gaza, Ashkelon, and Ekron (1:18; but they remained unconquered in Josh. 13:3, as part of Yahweh's design to "test Israel," according to Judg. 3:1-4). The second statement correctly points out that the Judeans were confined to the hill country because they could not compete with the superior Philistine iron chariots (1:19; cf. Joshua's advice to the Joseph tribe in Josh. 17:16-18).

b. The central and northern tribes. The story of the settlement of the central and N tribes (Judg. 1:22-36) deals with (a) the conquest of Bethel (vss. 22-26); (b) the Canaanite strongholds not captured by the Israelites (vss. 27-33); and (c) the struggles on the S border of the central territory (vss. 34-36).

The conquest of Bethel, formerly Luz, by the central tribes, the "house of Joseph," followed the reconnoitering of spies and the escape to a northern Luz of a friendly citizen who helped the invaders (vss. 22-26; cf. Rahab and the spies, in Josh. 2; 6:22-25; and Joshua's capture of Ai, possibly really Bethel, in Josh. 8:1-29).

The Joseph tribe of Manasseh did not ("could not" in parallel Josh. 17:11-13) drive out, but eventually made slaves of, the inhabitants of the strong Canaanite fortresses in their area (Judg. 1:27-28). Such was also the action of the Joseph tribe of Ephraim (vs. 29; parallel in Josh. 16:10) and the N tribes of Zebulun, Asher, and Naphtali (vss. 30-33; no parallel in Joshua).

On the S border of the central tribes' territory it was especially the Danites who had difficulty with the local inhabitants, here called Amorites, a synonym for Canaanites (vss. 34-36; cf. Josh. 19:40-48). Although no mention is made of it here, this presages the migration of the tribe of Dan to its N home described in the final section of the book (Judg. 17–18).

c. Religious implications. The final portion of the preface to the book of Judges is a statement of the religious implications drawn from the factual account of Israel's conquest and settlement (2:1-5). The statement is in the form of a declaration by the angel of Yahweh when he moved on from Gilgal, the first camp of the Israelites after they had crossed the Jordan (Josh. 4:19). In their settlements the Israelites had failed to obey Yahweh's command to make no covenant with the inhabitants of Canaan; therefore, these inhabitants would now become adversaries and their gods snares to Israel. The response of the people gave the name to the new location of the sanctuary as Bochim, "Weepers," possibly really Bethel. Thus by this preface, with its tragic conclusion, the groundwork is laid for the role to be played by the "judges" in the body of the book.

2. The careers of the judges. The stories of the careers of the judges which form the body of the book (2:6–16:31) are organized into the following sections: (a) an introduction defining the role of the judges (2:6–3:6); (b) Othniel and deliverance from Cushan-rishathaim (3:7-11); (c) Ehud and deliverance from the Moabites (3:12-30); (d) Shamgar and the Philistines (3:31); (e) Deborah and deliverance from the Canaanites (chs. 4–5); (f) Gideon and deliverance from the Midianites (chs. 6–8); (g) a supplement to the Gideon story describing Abimelech's abortive kingship (ch. 9); (h) Tola and Jair, two "minor" judges (10:1-5); (i) recapitulation and introduction to the last judges (10:6-16); (j) Jephthah and deliverance from the Ammonites (10:17–12:7); (k) Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon, three "minor" judges (12:8-15); and (l) the adventures of Samson and the beginning of deliverance from the Philistines (chs. 13–16).

Of the thirteen persons included, six whose careers are related in some detail and whose role as deliverers is emphasized—Othniel, Ehud, Deborah, Gideon, Jephthah, and Samson—are usually classified as the "major" judges. Six who are little more than mentioned—Shamgar, Tola, Jair, Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon—are called the "minor" judges. The thirteenth, Abimelech, is recognized as supplemental to the story of Gideon.

However, this customary classification is not that suggested by the order of the judges' appearance in the book itself. Provided with the framework of a traditional chronology and apparently numbering exactly twelve, one from each tribe, these heroes were understood to be a succession of inspired leaders, all God-appointed except for self-appointed Abimelech. Perhaps the shadowy figure of SHAMGAR is really a replacement for Abimelech, whose conduct was unworthy of a judge. See § E1 below.

a. Introduction: The role of the judges. The general theme of the stories of the judges is that Israel's historical experience, from the beginning of Joshua's leadership to the end of Samson's days, was a series of cycles of successive stages: Israel's faithfulness to Yahweh during the days of the leader; their apostasy to the Baals after his death; Yahweh's punishment of permitting oppression by an enemy; the people's cry for deliverance; Yahweh's answer of sending a judge as deliverer; Israel's faithfulness during the days of the judge; their apostasy after his death; Yahweh's punishment; etc. The principles of this theme, which are to be illustrated in the successive stories of the judges, are stated and elaborated in the introduction (2:6–3:6).

This introduction opens with almost exact repetition of the conclusion of the story of Joshua as told in the previous book (2:6-9; cf. Josh. 24:28-31). Then when, after Joshua's death, the new generation arose which had not experienced Yahweh's deeds for Israel—obviously the crossing of the Jordan and the conquest under Joshua—the trouble began (Judg. 2:10). The faithfulness known under Joshua disappeared, and the cycle of apostasy, oppression, prayer, and deliverance was begun.

In addition and in some contradiction to this main theme are the following subsidiary themes: Because of the Israelites' persistent failure to keep their covenant with Yahweh after Joshua's death, Yahweh deliberately left the Canaanite nations in the land instead of driving them out. Thus subsequently these nations could become the means by which Israel might learn the power of Yahweh through their experience of victory in war. On the other hand, these peoples were definitely the means by which Yahweh tested his people's faithfulness to him. Since they intermarried with the peoples, who are enumerated in this introduction, and they served their gods, the Israelites failed the test. Hence the need of judges.

In accord with this introductory explanation there appears at the beginning of the account of each major judge, at least in some form, this characteristic formula: "The people of Israel did what was evil in the sight of the LORD, forgetting the LORD their God, and serving the Baals and the Asheroth. Therefore the anger of the LORD was kindled against Israel, and he sold them into the hand of . . . ; and the people of Israel served . . . [so many] years. But when the people of Israel cried to the LORD, the LORD raised up a deliverer" (3:7-9, 12, 14-15; 4:1-3; 6:1, 7; 13:1). Before the story of Jephthah this formula is enlarged. See § C2*i below*.

The career of each of the major judges except Samson was distinguished by successful deliverance of Israel from an enemy: Othniel from Cushan-rishathaim, Ehud from the Moabites, Deborah from the Canaanites, Gideon from the Midianites, and Jephthah from the Ammonites. Although the life story of each was very different, each was a military leader whose army achieved victory, except for the woman Deborah, whose military leadership was that of being the power behind the action. Only Samson was unique, as a one-man army who succeeded only in beginning deliverance from his foe, the Philistines. The notable features of the account of each of these heroes may be briefly summarized. For detailed discussion, consult the separate articles on each of the judges.

b. Othniel and Cushan-rishathaim. The first-mentioned judge, Othniel (3:7-11), appears as prime example of the philosophy of history just concluded in the introduction to all the judges (2:6–3:6). Because of Yahweh's anger at his people's apostasy, they suffered under Cushan-rishathaim. Then in response to their cry, Yahweh specially raised up this charismatic leader; and, as he was empowered by the Spirit of Yahweh, Othniel's "hand prevailed over" the enemy, and "so the land had rest forty years."

Earlier in the book of Judges, Othniel had been introduced—the only judge, be it noted, to be mentioned prior to this main body of the book—in the story of his capture of Debir and his thus winning his Judean uncle Caleb's daughter as bride (Judg. 1:11-15; see § C1*a above*). As he is the only judge clearly from a S tribe, and as his story is told in the typical formula with no peculiar, authenticating details, some think him to have been a fiction in order to place a Judean hero at the first of the list of judges. On the other hand, he may well have been a historical figure, the head of a Judean clan comparable to the Calebites, who saved S Judean clans from the invasion of a powerful foreign ruler sweeping down from the Upper Euphrates region. See also CUSHAN-RISHATHAIM.

c. Ehud and the Moabites. The story of the second judge, Ehud (3:12-30), has the ring of an old and authentic tradition. This left-handed Benjaminite delivered his people from an eighteen-year oppression of the Moabites by treacherously assassinating their king, Eglon, and cutting off the escape across the Jordan of the Moabite army of occupation. Although he is not called a judge, the God-inspired nature of Ehud's career is probably indicated by his association with the "sculptured stones" near Gilgal (vss. 19, 26; cf. 2:1).

d. Shamgar and the Philistines. Of the six very brief accounts of the so-called minor judges, the one about Shamgar is unique in that he is the only one mentioned twice (3:31; 5:6), and the only one described as delivering Israel by an exploit—viz., killing six hundred Philistines with an oxgoad. Also the reference to Shamgar in 3:31 is awkward, for the immediately following beginning of the Deborah account (4:1) clearly implies that there was no deliverer between Ehud and Deborah. Apparently for this reason some Greek MSS omit the reference to Ehud in 4:1 and repeat this reference to Shamgar after the similar anti-Philistine exploits of Samson (i.e., after 16:31). Because of these uncertainties some scholars consider Shamgar to be an editor's invention, replacing dishonorable Abimelech in order to keep the number of judges at twelve. On the other hand, Shamgar may have been a local twelfth-century-B.C. Galilean hero victorious over some now unknown foe.

e. Deborah and the Canaanites. Unique in the book of Judges is the fact that the story of the third major judge, Deborah, appears in two forms. The first is prose (ch. 4), and the second, poetry (ch. 5). The latter, commonly called the Song of Deborah, is an ode of victory perhaps contemporary with the events. The prose and the poetry both purport to tell essentially the same story of two Israelite heroines: Deborah, prophetess, judge, "mother in Israel," who spurred the military leader Barak on to victory; and Jael, the "wife of Heber the Kenite," who assassinated the fleeing enemy general. However, the differences between the two stories are as instructive as their similarities.

In the prose narrative the enemy is Jabin, "king of Canaan," the commander of whose army is Sisera; in the poem Sisera is not a general but leader of a confederation of Canaanite kings, and Jabin is not mentioned. In the prose account some ten thousand foot soldiers from Zebulun and Barak's tribe of Naphtali are involved, but according to the Song six tribes bordering on the Plain of Esdraelon, where the conflict took place, put forty thousand men into the fray. The prose narrative speaks of Deborah as a prophetess carrying on the judicatory activity of a judge under her sacred palm tree, then summoning Barak to his task, and finally accompanying him in the battle when he has refused to do his duty otherwise; while Deborah and Barak are together the singers of the Song, in which she, "mother in Israel," is summoned to sing, and he to lead away captives. In the prose Barak's troops charge down from Mount Tabor; the Song speaks only of Taanach, the waters of Megiddo, and the Kishon—a torrent sweeping away the enemy chariots.

Most scholars regard the two accounts as differing sharply concerning the fate of fleeing Sisera; the prose narrative tells of his treacherous murder at the hands of Jael while in exhausted sleep, and the poetry vividly pictures his being struck down by the woman while unguardedly drinking the curds she has brought. The prose account ends with the eventual destruction of Jabin; the remarkably authentic poem, which begins with a vivid portrayal of the difficult social situation preceding the struggle and appropriate praise or blame to the various tribes for their participation or nonparticipation in the battle, concludes with an unforgettable picture of Sisera's queen mother consoling herself at her son's delay, and a prayer.

Deborah, then, is the only one of the judges clearly cast in more than one role as judge (see § A above). In the prose account she is judge in the sense of making judicial decisions at a sacred location. While not herself a "deliverer," as were the other major judges, according to both accounts she is the constant inspiration behind and with the military leader Barak. Both her functions are obviously God-inspired. The result is not deliverance from an invader, as in the case of the other major judges, but stopping the last full-scale native Canaanite uprising against the Israelites and winning the all-important Plain of Esdraelon.

f. Gideon and the Midianites. The story of the fourth major judge, Gideon, is probably composite, the longest narrative of those judges who were military leaders (chs. 6–8). It opens with an account of annual Midianite raids and the warning of a nameless prophet who implied that these raids were permitted by Yahweh because of ungrateful Israel's apostasy from him. The call of Gideon is related, first, in the appearance to him of an angel of Yahweh, and, second, in Gideon's breaking down his father's Baal altar and receiving the name Jerubbaal, and then having his call verified by a sign of wet and dry fleece. His rout of the camp of supposedly 135,000 Midianites was accomplished through divinely suggested strategy with an unbelievably small force of 300 men. His pursuit of the Midianite fugitives resulted, first, in capturing and beheading Midianite princes Oreb and Zeeb by jealous Ephraimites, and, second, in Gideon's blood-revenge slaughter of Midianite kings Zebah and Zalmunna and construction of an ephod for permanent memorial. Although a wealthy local potentate of central Palestine, Gideon modestly refused the offer to inaugurate a hereditary monarchy, for Yahweh alone should be ruler (but for the sequel story of Abimelech, see § C2*g below*). Gideon was the true charismatic leader, peculiarly favored with special revelations and unusual power. He succeeded in completely delivering Israel from the annual Midianite raids. Thus he was doubtless the ideal judge.

g. Supplement: Abimelech's kingship. The story of Abimelech (ch. 9) is a supplement to the narratives of Gideon, in this section called only Jerubbaal. Abimelech, son of Gideon by his concubine in Shechem (8:31), persuaded fellow Shechemites to finance the murder of his seventy half brothers from the Baal-berith temple treasury and make himself king. Jotham, the one son of Jerubbaal who escaped being murdered, recited an old fable of the trees' election of a bramble bush and applied it with devastating effect to Abimelech. True to Jotham's interpretation of the fable, "God sent an evil spirit between Abimelech and the men of Shechem," so that the latter deprived their abortive king of his revenue. Abimelech was subsequently able to put down a revolt engineered by Gaal, to destroy Shechem, and to burn its tower, but in an immediately following campaign against Thebez, twelve miles away, Abimelech's three-year reign ended with his ignominious death. His tragic story is concluded with the moral that his fate and that of Shechem were retribution for the crime of murdering the seventy sons of Jerubbaal-Gideon.

That this turbulent period in Israel's life contained such a three-year abortive attempt at local kingship as that of Abimelech is historically probable. Since, however, Abimelech's rule was in no way divinely inspired and his character was unsavory, he was never regarded as a judge. Thus his possible place in the roll of judges was perhaps taken by Shamgar. See § C2*d above*.

h. Tola and Jair, two "minor" judges. Of the five minor judges other than Shamgar, two, Tola and Jair, are mentioned (10:1-5) as having "judged Israel" successively over a forty-five-year period between Abimelech and Jephthah, the fifth major judge. The typical brief formula describing the judge's career mentions only his name, his genealogy or location, his length of service, and the place of his burial. The additional detail about Jair's "thirty sons who rode on thirty asses" and their "thirty cities" probably is a note to point out the judge's wealth and wide influence beyond his clan. On these minor judges, see also § C2*k below*.

i. Recapitulation and further introduction. Before the Jephthah story the characteristic formula introducing each major judge (see § C2*a above*) is enlarged to a recapitulation of the preceding history and a lengthy introduction to the last five judges (10:6-16). This passage restates the theme of the introduction (2:6–3:6). It lists seven foreign gods into whose worship the Israelites have successively fallen and, therefore, seven foreign nations into the hands of whom Yahweh has sold his people until they have cried for deliverance. As special attention is given in this passage to oppression by the Ammonites and the Philistines (vss. 7-9), the section seems to have been intended to introduce the subsequent stories of both Jephthah and Samson.

j. Jephthah and the Ammonites. The story of the only major judge from the E Jordan territory, Jephthah of Gilead, who as fifth major judge delivered Israel from the Ammonites (10:17–12:7), is not only preceded by the long introduction just described. It also contains a long interpolation (11:12-28) which purports to be Jephthah's diplomatic negotiations with the enemy Ammonites, but is actually an account concerning the Moabites, based on Num. 20–22. Unlike the other judges, Jephthah, a man exiled because of illegitimate birth and for years leader of an outlaw band, was called in crisis because of popular demand and was promised permanent position as "chief" or "ruler" if successful in completing his mission (Judg. 10:17–11:11). Upon his consecration in a solemn ceremony (11:11), "the Spirit of Yahweh came upon Jephthah" (vs. 29). When his work was crowned with success, he, in faithful fulfilment of a vow to Yahweh, sacrificed his only child, a virgin daughter, after she had been given time to bewail her virginity and thus establish an Israelite custom (vss. 29-40). Unlike Gideon, who appeased jealous Ephraimites with flattery, Jephthah had them massacred, when at the fords of the Jordan their dialect mispronunciation of the password SHIBBOLETH betrayed them (12:1-7).

k. Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon, three "minor" judges. The brief accounts of the last three minor judges, Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon (12:8-15), like those of Tola and Jair (see § C2*h above*), are given with the simple formula: "After him [so and so] of [such and such] judged Israel; and he judged Israel [so many] years. Then [so and so] died, and was buried at [such and such]." As in the case of Jair (10:3-5), Ibzan and Abdon were evidently men of peculiar prestige, as indicated by their large families and notable possessions.

While some interpreters consider these minor judges to be unhistorical inventions to fill chronological space, others regard this uniquely brief information as based on official records about the office of judge in premonarchical Israel.

l. Samson and the Philistines. The account of the last major judge, Samson the Danite, is most unique in all the Bible (chs. 13–16). It is a cycle of folk tales about a superhumanly strong hero who as a one-man army persistently pestered the nearby Philistines. These stories were adapted to religious motivation by understanding Samson's strength to have been the result of a prenatal Nazirite vow and his exploits and heroically tragic end to have been the beginning of Yahweh's plan for delivering Israel from Philistine oppression.

According to the stories Samson was born as the child promised by an angel to a long-time barren woman who kept the vows of a Nazirite (ch. 13). In connection with his intended marriage to a Philistine woman, Samson, moved by sudden power from Yahweh, tore a lion apart, propounded a riddle about the experience, and took personal revenge by igniting Philistine crops with live-fox-tail torches (14:1–15:8). His exploits provided two place names, the "Hill of the Jawbone" and the "Spring of Him Who Called" (15:9-20). He interrupted a night with a Philistine harlot to pull up and carry away the gates of Gaza nearly forty miles (16:1-3). In illicit love with Delilah he toyed with his sacred vow and lost his hair, his power, his eyes, and his freedom (16:4-22). In a final act of heroism he pulled the temple of Dagon down on his own head and so killed more Philistines in his death than in his whole life (16:23-31).

Unlike the stories of the other judges, the Samson cycle includes riddles, poetic fragments, and folk tales. The characteristic formula of introduction appears only in very brief form (13:1). The typical concluding formula: "And he judged Israel . . . years," appears twice (15:20; 16:31*b*), thus possibly indicating that the cycle originally concluded with ch. 15.

The cycle of adventure stories of this folklore hero, whose exploits merely began Israel's deliverance from the Philistines, closes the stories of the judges and opens the way for the subsequent careers of Samuel, Saul, and David in I–II Samuel.

3. Supplement: Two tribal movements. The concluding section of the book of Judges is the account of two tribal movements, the migration of the Danites and their setting up of a sanctuary in a new N home, and a bitter intertribal war against the Benjaminites (chs. 17–21).

It is notable that this section, which follows immediately after the Samson stories, contains no introductory statements to tie it in with the rest of the book. It simply begins with the story: "There was a man of the hill country of Ephraim." The only expression common to the section is the notation: "In those days there was no king in Israel; every man did what was right in his own eyes." This observation appears four times: soon after the opening of the story (17:6); in briefer form when the tribe of Dan is introduced (18:1*a*); at the transition to the story of the Benjaminites (19:1*a*); and finally in full at the conclusion of the section, which is also the end of the present book of Judges (21:25).

Apparently this concluding section of the book is a supplement to illustrate the tragic results of the relative anarchy which existed when there was only tribal authority and custom—a situation corrected by the subsequent rise of the monarchy. A secondary motif in the section is the significant role of the Levites, as a Levite plays the chief role in each of these tribal affairs. In the first story a certain Levite was raised from private priesthood to become first tribal priest of the Danite sanctuary. In the second, another Levite, his honor injured by the Benjaminites, was vindicated by "all Israel."

a. The new sanctuary of the Danites. The story of the Danites' move to the N and the founding of their sanctuary (chs. 17–18) begins with the simple account of Micah's household shrine with its cultic objects and his replacement of his son as priest with a Levite who would know better how to win Yahweh's favor by performing the proper religious rites (ch. 17). Five Danite spies, originally assured of success in their reconnoitering of land to the N by the Levite's consultation of his oracle, led six hundred warriors to Micah's home, where they stole both his cult objects and his Levite and took them to their new sanctuary at Laish (ch. 18).

The priest's pleasure at his being promoted from his position as priest to a family to that of the officiant for a whole tribe provides significant insight into the development of Israelite priesthood. Thus the tribe of Dan, or a substantial portion of the tribe, even though by thievery, established in its new location a sanctuary whose cult equipment had proven efficacy and whose trained priesthood traced its ancestry back to Moses.

b. War against the Benjaminites. The account of the bitter war against the Benjaminites (chs. 19–21) begins with the reason for the struggle: A certain Levite traveler, on his way home with his repossessed and reconciled concubine, passed up Jerusalem, city of foreigners, to stay in friendly Ephraimite territory; but the Benjaminites of Gibeah not only failed to give him the proper hospitality; instead, like the Sodomites (Gen. 19), they abused his concubine until she was dead; whereupon the Levite sent the twelve pieces into which he had ritually divided her body (cf. Saul in I Sam. 11) throughout all Israel (Judg. 19). Aroused to revenge by the Levite's appeal and the Benjaminites' refusal of their ultimatum that the culprits of Gibeah be handed over, the Israelites, although surprisingly defeated in the first two encounters, finally burned Gibeah and ravaged much Benjaminite territory (ch. 20). When, however, it was understood that the great slaughter of the tribe of Benjamin and the irrevocable oath against intermarriage with Benjaminite women made possible the extinction of the tribe, the Israelites found a way to repopulate Benjamin by seizing virgins from Jabesh-gilead, which naturally had not participated in the struggle against its relative, Benjamin, and by permitting Benjaminites to capture other maidens at the annual festival at Shiloh (ch. 21).

With such obviously rugged primitivity in both these supplemental narratives of tribal adventures, it is small wonder that the book of Judges ends, not with any summary, but with only the cogent comment: "In those days there was no king in Israel; every man did what was right in his own eyes" (21:25).

D. COMPOSITION AND LITERARY STRUCTURE. The present book of Judges is chiefly the product of the Deuteronomic historians of the exile period. However, the strikingly different literary features of each of the three parts of the book, as discussed in the previous section, demonstrate the composite nature of the book. It has no clear unity, nor is there scholarly agreement as to the successive phases of its composition. The following may be a relatively accurate account of its origin and composition.

1. Sources. Back of the present narratives in the book lie, first of all, various oral hero stories. These may have circulated at local centers. Such were the stories of tribal warrior heroes, Benjaminite Ehud of Gilgal, Manassite Gideon of Ophrah, and Gileadite Jephthah of Mizpah, and the tales of the folkloristic Danite hero Samson of Zorah. The story of the migration of the Danites (chs. 17–18) probably originated from traditions at their N sanctuary.

The Song of Deborah (ch. 5) was probably first sung not long after the events it memorializes, in the twelfth century B.C. The recognized antiquity of this masterpiece suggests that other traditions may have received their first written form as narrative poems, transcriptions of a poetic oral tradition, perhaps composed and written down by the tenth century B.C. Jotham's fable (9:7-15) and Samson's riddles (14:14, 18; 15:16) have long been regarded as early poetic fragments used by later prose narrators. Other examples may be: 6:17-18, 30-31; 14:3, 16; 16:6, 15, 17, 23-24. Besides these written poetic traditions there may have been such prose compositions as the earliest form of the summary of the conquest of Canaan, now found in 1:1–2:5.

2. Pre-Deuteronomic editions. It seems likely that at least some of the above-named sources were combined into a single book, possibly in editions with varying contents, sometime between the tenth and seventh centuries B.C. The exact contents of this pre-Deuteronomic book it is impossible to determine, and the question as to whether it is continuous with the J and E sources of the Hexateuch is an unsolved problem. Some scholars have attempted detailed analysis into the strands of material of the Pentateuchal J and E documents and their redactors. Others have seen only general division of the stories of such heroes as Gideon and Jephthah into earlier and later narratives such as the sources of the books of Samuel.

The pre-Deuteronomic book of Judges must have contained in some form the stories of Ehud, Deborah, Gideon, Abimelech, Jephthah, and Samson (i.e., most of 3:12-30; chs. 4–5; 6:11–8:28; 8:29–9:57; 10:17–12:7; chs. 13–16, omitting the Deuteronomic formulas; see § D3 below), as well as brief references to Shamgar, Tola, Jair, Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon (3:31; 10:1-5; 12:8-15). A summary of the Conquest and settlement (1:1–2:5) and narratives of the migration of the Danites and the war against the Benjaminites (chs. 17–21) in some form must also have been in the pre-Deuteronomic book, for these introductory and concluding sections of our present book of Judges contain evidences of early composition.

3. Deuteronomic edition. It is generally agreed that the central core of our present book of Judges (2:6–16:31) was given its form by the Deuteronomic editors of the seventh and sixth centuries B.C. The philosophy of these editors is most clearly seen in the introduction provided for the stories of the judges' careers (2:6–3:6; see § C2*a above*). The binding framework upon which the respective stories were hung was a characteristic formula detailing the usual cycle of apostasy, oppression, prayer, and deliverance (3:7-9, 12, 14-15; 4:1-3; 6:1, 7; 8:28, 33-35; 13:1), which was enlarged into a long recapitulation and further introduction at the opening of the story of Jephthah (10:6-16; see §§ C2*a, i, above*). The account of the peculiarly southern hero Othniel may be the addition of these editors, as his story is told only in the typical language of the formula (3:7-11). See § C2*b above*.

That this edition of the book deliberately omitted the old summary account of the Conquest (1:1–2:5) seems clear from the fact that the Deuteronomists' introduction (2:6-9) connects directly with the end of the book of Joshua (Josh. 24:28-31). It may also be that the Song of Deborah (Judg. 5), the summary references to the minor judges (3:31; 10:1-5; 12:8-15), the last section of the Samson cycle (ch. 16), and the stories of the Danite migration and the Benjaminite war (chs. 17–21) were intentionally omitted, for there is no mark of the Deuteronomic formulas in these sections.

4. Final edition. Our present book of Judges may be the product of possibly late-sixth-century-B.C. restoration of sections of the pre-Deuteronomic book rejected by the Deuteronomists, as suggested above, with a few editorial changes. Thus the core of the book (2:6–16:31) is probably essentially as it left the hands of the Deuteronomic editors.

According to most scholars, the introductory summary of the Conquest providing the preface to the book (1:1–2:5) bears no marks of the restoring priestly editors' redaction. The concluding supplement (chs. 17–21), however, may have been added by postexilic priestly redactors from ancient tribal traditions which the Deuteronomic editors had deliberately omitted. Possibly Deuteronomic loyalty had forbidden even the mention of the N sanctuary of Dan, apostate though it was, or such an unsavory episode as the Benjaminite war. Probably the early postexilic editors restored the rejected material, including the Danite claim to a priesthood of Mosaic origin which had lasted until the Exile (18:30). The mark of these priestly editors' hands may be such touches as: "The congregation assembled as one man to the LORD" (20:1); "So the congregation sent thither" (21:10); and "Then the whole congregation sent word to the Benjaminites" (21:13). Perhaps to these editors the whole final section was important as demonstrating what had happened when "there was no king in Israel; every man did what was right in his own eyes"—viz., a degeneration which required both the subsequent monarchy and the later formation of official, priestly Judaism.

E. HISTORICAL VALUE. The historical value of the book of Judges lies in three areas: (a) its source material for determining the historical events of the period which it describes; (b) its preservation of fragments of literature of great antiquity; and (c) its insight into the social and cultural conditions of the period following the entrance into Canaan and just prior to the rise of the monarchy.

1. History of the period. At least two aspects of the stories of the judges at once raise questions concerning the historical accuracy of these accounts. One is the obviously artificial nature of the chronological scheme. This is seen both in the frequent use of forty, eighty, and twenty years—perhaps respectively indicating in round numbers one generation, two generations, or half a generation—and in the impossibility of correlating the sum total of the chronology with the other biblical or historical evidence concerning the length of the judges period.

After deliverance respectively by Othniel (3:11), Deborah (5:31), and Gideon (8:28), the land rested each time forty years; and the Philistine oppression before Samson's judgeship lasted the same number of years (13:1). For only twenty years the oppression which occasioned Deborah's exploits lasted (4:3), and Samson's judgeship was for a similar brief time (15:20; 16:31); whereas Ehud's deliverance resulted in eighty years of freedom (3:30). The other figures for periods of oppression, judgeship, or deliverance are more realistic: eight (3:8; 12:14), eighteen (3:14; 10:8), seven (6:1; 12:9), three (9:22), twenty-three (10:2), twenty-two (10:3), six (12:7), and ten (12:11).

The sum of these figures, from the second generation after Joshua (2:10; 3:8) through the career of Samson (16:31), is 410 years. This figure is far too large to square with the statement in I Kings 6:1 that Solomon began to build the temple in the 480th year after the Exodus. It seems obvious that the careers of various judges overlapped one another. See also CHRONOLOGY OF THE OT.

The second aspect of the stories of the judges which raises the problem of historical accuracy is the apparent schematization of the tribal origins of the various judges. Each seems to be the representative of a tribe to the total number of twelve. Thus Othniel was from Judah (1:8-15; 3:9), Ehud from Benjamin (3:15), Deborah's general Barak from Naphtali (4:4-6), Gideon from W Manasseh (6:11, 24, 34-35), Tola from Issachar (10:1), Elon from Zebulun (12:11), Abdon from Ephraim (12:13-15), and Samson from Dan (13:2, 24-25). IBZAN was probably the representative of Asher (12:8). Jair (10:3) and Jephthah (11:1) were both Gileadites, but it is possible that Jair represented N Gilead or E Manasseh (Deut. 3:13-14; Josh. 13:29-31), and that Jephthah was originally from S Gilead or Gad (Deut. 3:16; Josh. 13:24-28). Reuben or Simeon, the two remaining unrepresented tribes, might have laid claim to Shamgar, for the brief notation concerning him (Judg. 3:31) appears in the narrative immediately after the story of the conflict with Moab, whose territory was adjacent to Reuben, and Shamgar's anti-Philistine exploits could have located him geographically in the territory of Simeon.

The judges were doubtless tribal heroes portrayed as national champions delivering "all Israel." But that there was exactly one such hero from each of the tribes smacks of artificiality.

Despite these questions, however, the book of Judges is a most valuable source for reconstructing the history of the settlement of Canaan. The essential reliability of the Judges summary of the original conquest by the Israelites (ch. 1), as compared with the Joshua account, has long been maintained. Nevertheless, some recent scholarship has questioned the customary critical disparagement of Josh. 10 and pointed out that Judg. 1 is a collection of fragments rather than a unified document. Even so, the essential accuracy of the Judges picture of the Conquest as accomplished by separate tribes rather than by united Israel is unquestioned, and many of its details may be correct. See § C1 above. See also ISRAEL, HISTORY OF, § 3; JOSHUA, BOOK OF, § 4*a*.

As for the judges themselves, while some may be purely legendary figures, the accomplishments of such heroic persons as Deborah, Othniel, Ehud, Jephthah, and Gideon may be historical. Also there is some ground for regarding the brief fragments of information about the minor judges—Tola, Jair, Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon (10:1-5; 12:8-15)—as based upon official records concerning the office of judge in premonarchical Israel. Biblical and archaeological evidence combine to suggest the following historical reconstruction of the whole turbulent period following the initial conquest.

Perhaps early in the twelfth century B.C. the pressure of invading Philistines upon local Canaanites (1:34) caused the Danites, originally on the seacoast (5:17), to migrate to an inland N home (chs. 17–18). Except for this initial displacement, however, the Philistine occupation of the coastal plain by the mid-twelfth century seems, according to the Samson legends (chs. 13–16), at first to have resulted in free communication, trade, and even intermarriage with the Israelites, including, perhaps, remaining Danites. Such conflicts as occurred during this century were only local disputes. Samson was only to "begin to deliver Israel from the hand of the Philistines" (13:5). It was Samuel and Saul, probably spurred on by Philistine expansion activities, making use of their superior, iron-using culture, who later attempted to confine these foreigners (I Sam. 4–6; 13).

An invasion of S Judah by a foreign ruler from the Upper Euphrates, given the opprobrious Hebrew name CUSHAN-RISHATHAIM, may have taken place early in the twelfth century and been repelled by OTHNIEL (3:8-10). At about the same time a Moabite foothold farther N in W Jordan Benjaminite and Ephraimite territory was lost when Ehud treacherously assassinated the obese Moabite king Eglon (3:12-30).

Perhaps in the last quarter of the twelfth century the crucial battle celebrated in the contemporary Song of Deborah, in which native Canaanite defenders in league with invading sea peoples took their last stand against encroaching Israelites, won for the latter the coveted Plain of Esdraelon (ch. 5).

In perhaps the early eleventh century B.C. the first real defense by the Israelites of Transjordan territory was achieved by Jephthah (11:1–12:7). His repulse of invading Ammonites seems to have been effective until the days of Saul (I Sam. 11). By the middle of the eleventh century the first known raids by camel riders who penetrated from distant Midian through Israelite territory even to Philistine Gaza were an annual menace. Gideon's deliverance may be associated with a Midianite war conducted also by the Edomite king Hadad (Gen. 36:35; Judg. 6:11–8:35). So important was Gideon's success that the phrase "the day of Midian" became an idiom meaning "victory."

2. Literature of the period. One of the greatest historical contributions of the book of Judges is its preservation of fragments of literature of antiquity. Such was the memorable Song of Deborah, doubtless contemporaneous with the events, and such were Jotham's fable, Samson's riddles, and other poetic and prose fragments. See § D1 above.

3. Social and cultural conditions. The frank and colorful picture of Israel's life, when in the twelfth and eleventh centuries the Israelites were on the frontier of agricultural versus nomadic economy, appears in the book of Judges. In fact, it has been suggested that the cycle of Samson stories (chs. 13–16) provides instructive sociological material of more value to the historian than a list of conquered cities on such a significant monument as the Moabite Stone. Here was the ideal rugged folklore hero of the frontier: humorous trickster; conqueror of women, wild beasts, and warriors; possessor of enormous muscular strength, but given to selfish passion and feats of vengeance to restore injured honor. Here were local marriage customs: procurement of the bride; riddles and jesting of the bridegroom's friends during the long wedding festivities; the quick marriage of a forsaken bride to another to save face. Here were the events of a pagan religious festival: the grim sport of watching the antics of a blinded foreign slave.

The essential dangers of the era when only a loose tribal confederacy is in control are obvious: "In those days there was no king in Israel; every man did what was right in his own eyes" (17:6; 21:25). "In the days of Shamgar . . . caravans ceased and travelers kept to the byways" because of marauding bands (5:6). Harassed Israelite farmers fled into caves and mountain hideouts for fear of Midianite camel raiders (6:2-6, 11; 7:12). Blood revenge was a solemn duty (8:7-21).

Devastating tribal feuds took place, as nowhere better illustrated than in the bitter war against the Benjaminites (chs. 19–21). Tribal jealousies flared, as when the proud Ephraimites were incensed at Gideon and at Jephthah (7:24–8:3; 12:1-6). Differences of dialect between tribes were effectively used in intertribal conflict (see SHIBBOLETH) when Jephthah massacred Ephraimites, and Danites recognized Micah's Levite by his accent (18:3). At no time was there complete tribal unity, for even when the coalition joined Deborah and Barak against the common Canaanite enemy, a number of tribes remained aloof (5:13-18, 23).

In times of extreme crisis an outlawed harlot's son, banished to prevent his sharing any family inheritance, could be recalled and as "ruler" be made practical dictator by popular acclaim (10:17–11:11). But neither Jephthah's nor Gideon's popularity in their hours of triumph led to any permanent common rule. In fact, the refusal of such a wealthy local potentate as Gideon to take advantage of popular appeal to inaugurate a hereditary monarchy (8:22-23) shows the true Hebrew tradition of primitive popular democracy. Its tenacity was proved by the abortive attempt at kingship on the part of Abimelech, as roundly criticized in Jotham's fable (ch. 9).

The low level of the morals of the period, even according to ancient standards, is illustrated, not only by the cruel atrocities of war, but also by the stealing of Micah's household gods (18:14-17) and the treatment of the Levite's concubine (19:22-30). Since the capture of defenseless maidens at the Shiloh festival was apparently legitimate (21:16-23), the rape of the concubine was less a sexual offense than a violation of the Bedouin law of hospitality. Similar violation of hospitality in the death of Sisera, while lauded for its patriotic motivation, was nevertheless a serious offense (4:17-22; 5:24-27).

E. RELIGIOUS SIGNIFICANCE. The religious significance of any such quasi-historical OT book as this one is twofold. In revealing something of the state of religious life in Israel in the period of which it speaks, it provides valuable information for a stage in the history of the religion of Israel. By its underlying presuppositions, its selection of facts, its peculiar emphases, its editorial comments, it reveals its theology, its understanding of the total revelation of God to Israel and through Israel to all mankind.

1. Religion of the period. The cultural and moral aspects of the life of Israel, described above, can only artificially be separated from the religious. But one may note the specifically cultic affairs in twelfth- and eleventh-century Israel. While certain place names were explained by etiological legends (15:9-20), other sacred spots marked the presence of deity: Deborah's palm tree (4:5); "sculptured stones" near Gilgal where God inspired Ehud (3:19, 26); the commemorative altar where the angelic messenger appeared to Gideon (6:24). The cultic center of the tribal federation probably moved from Gilgal (2:1) to Shiloh (21:12; note the annual festival in 21:19; cf. I Sam. 1:3; 2:19), but an individual tribe such as the Danites could found their own sanctuary (chs. 17–18).

The simplicity of cultic equipment and organization seems evident in Gideon's ready establishment of a Yahweh altar (6:24), his making a perhaps gold-overlaid ephod as a Yahweh symbol to memorialize his victory (8:24-27), and in Micah's use of various cult objects in his household shrine and his installing one of his sons as priest (17:1-5). The semihumorous elevation of the Levite from family to clan priesthood is an instructive chapter in the history of the slowly emerging priestly organization prior to the monarchy (17:7–18:20; see PRIESTS AND LEVITES).

At the simple family or local level the rarified Yahwism of the fathers was syncretistically Baalized by unconscious or semiconscious indigenous customs. Jephthah's deliberate, hardly rash, sacrifice of his virgin only child, explained as the origin of a four-day customary annual feast of lamentation (11:30-31, 34-40), was doubtless related to the prevalent Near Eastern FERTILITY CULTS.

Occasionally, however, with frenzied zeal a champion of Yahweh would arise to strike out against Baalism. Thus Gideon broke down his family's and community's Baal altar and received the name JERUBBAAL, whereas his son by a Shechemite concubine financed revolt from the Baal-berith temple treasury (6:25-32; 9:4).

It was at the seminational level that the zeal for Yahweh really counted. Thus the tribal coalition joined in Yahweh's holy war against paganism, celebrated in the Song of Deborah (ch. 5). It was not the human troops of Deborah and Barak which brought victory. Rather,

> From heaven fought the stars, > from their courses they fought against Sisera
> (5:20).

It was the awful judgment of God.

Indeed, the power and the intervention in Israel's life by Yahweh were most clearly seen in the essentially charismatic nature of judgeship. While charism was evident in the account of Othniel (3:9-10), it was nowhere more clearly seen than in the story of Gideon. His call was accompanied by or verified by unusual signs—a divine messenger bringing forth divine fire, miraculously wet or dry fleece (6:11-24, 36-40). Literally, "the Spirit of the LORD clothed itself with Gideon" (vs. 34). Therefore, he could be successful against impossible odds—300 against 135,000 (8:4-10). Jephthah's charismatic leadership began with consecration in a solemn ceremony (11:10-11, 29).

Strikingly enough, Samson, a onetime folklore hero raised to religious savior, proved what God's charismatic individual should not do. The Lord's Spirit, given because of his mother's Nazirite vows and evident even in his childhood (13:2-14, 24), showed itself in mighty feats of strength (14:6, 19; 15:14). But when his uncontrolled passion made him forgetful of sacred vows, although the Lord's Spirit came surging back again in response to prayer, Samson's life story ended in grim tragedy (16:20, 28-30).

2. Prophetic criticism of culture. As it left the final editors' hands, the book of Judges was a document of prophetic protest and pride—protest against the repeated disloyalty of God's people in their frequent yielding to the temptations of Canaanite culture, pride in their God's power in his repeated victory over enemies and in his patient providence in disciplining but sustaining his own chosen children.

The basic religious concern and chief motivation of this book is the activity of Yahweh and his people in the struggle with Baalism. The problem of the settling Israelites was Canaanite culture's corrosive effect upon inherited Hebrew faith, the danger of Israel's losing the consciousness of her unique relationship to her God.

The incoming Israelites failed to obey Yahweh's command to make no covenants with local inhabitants. Hence local gods were continual snares to Israel (2:1-5). Israel repeatedly failed the test of faithfulness. Yet in crises her God heeded her prayers and raised up a succession of deliverers (2:6–3:6; 10:

6-16). But despite these lessons of history, despite continued divine patience and providence, popular degeneration sank to the depths of Benjaminite civil war when "there was no king in Israel; every man did what was right in his own eyes" (chs. 19–21).

Therefore, Israel could be saved subsequently from the corrosion of Canaanite culture only by God's anointed monarchy and especially his spokesmen the prophets (cf. 6:7-10).

The great judges were great heroes of faith (cf. their evaluation in I Sam. 12:11; Heb. 11:32), but their role in the developing life of God's people was only temporary. The period between Joshua and Samuel was seen as taking its proper place in the continuing drama of God's revelation and his people's history. Thus the book of Judges took its place in the true succession of the Former Prophets. The Latter Prophets—and the New Covenant—were yet to come.

Bibliography. Commentaries: G. F. Moore, ICC (1895), is still the most useful. C. F. Burney (2nd ed., 1930) is perhaps the most adequate. G. W. Thatcher, New Century Bible (1904). G. A. Cooke, Cambridge Bible (1913). R. Kittel, Heilige Schrift des AT (1922). V. Zapletal (1923). A. Schulz (1926). A. Cohen, Soncino Books of the Bible (1950). J. M. Myers, IB, vol. II (1953). See also Introductions to the literature of the OT by: S. R. Driver, W. O. E. Oesterley and T. R. Robinson, R. Pfeiffer, A. Bentzen, O. Eissfeldt, etc.

General studies: G. F. Moore in P. Haupt, ed., The Sacred Books of the Old and New Testaments (1898); The Sacred Books of the OT (1900). O. Eissfeldt, Die Quellen des Richterbuches (1925). H. M. Wiener, The Composition of Judg. 2:11 to I Kings 2:46 (1929). J. Garstang, The Foundations of Bible History: Joshua, Judges (1931). H. Cazelles in L. Pirot and A. Robert, Supplément au Dictionnaire de la Bible (1949), IV, 1394-1414. N. H. Snaith in H. H. Rowley, ed., The OT and Modern Study (1951), pp. 90-95. Y. Kaufmann, The Biblical Account of the Conquest of Palestine (1953). C. A. Simpson, Composition of the Book of Judges (1957). For historical or cultural aspects, consult the histories by Oesterley and Robinson, Noth, and Bright, and the relevant pages in the following: J. Pedersen, Israel: Its Life and Culture (1926, 1940). W. F. Albright, Archaeology and the Religion of Israel (3rd ed., 1953); From the Stone Age to Christianity (2nd ed., 1957).

Special studies: O. Pretzl, "Septuaginta Problem im Buch Richter," Biblica (1926), pp. 233 ff, 353 ff. K. Wiese, Zur Literarkritik des Buches der Richter, BWANT, vol. 3 (1926). E. Robertson, "The Period of the Judges: A Mystery Period in the History of Israel," Bulletin of the John Rylands Library, XXX (1946), 91-114. G. E. Wright, "The Literary and Historical Problem of Joshua 10 and Judges 1," JNES, V (1946), 105-14. C. M. Cooper, "Theodotion's Influence on the Alexandrian Text of Judges," JBL, LXVII (1948), 63-68. J. Schreiner, Septuaginta-Massora des Buches der Richter (1957). E. Täubler, Biblische Studien: Die Epoche der Richter (1958).

C. F. KRAFT

JUDGMENT. See ESCHATOLOGY OF THE OT § 1*b;* LAW IN THE OT.

JUDGMENT, HALL OF [אלם המשפט] (I Kings 7:7). One of Solomon's buildings. See HALL. For KJV "judgment hall" in John 18:28 ff, see PRAETORIUM.

JUDGMENT SEAT [βῆμα, from βαίνω; KJV κριτήριον (Jas. 2:6; RSV COURT); see COURT OF LAW)]. Alternately: THRONE (Acts 12:21); TRIBUNAL (Acts 18:12, 16-17; 25:6, 10, 17; KJV "judgment seat"); PLATFORM (I Esd. 9:42 [KJV PULPIT]; II Macc. 13:26 [KJV "judgment seat"]). Excavation has identified the βῆμα in Corinth where Paul confronted Gallio as a large, richly decorated rostrum, centrally located in the market place for hearing cases and addressing the populace (see AGORA). For βῆμα as Pilate's seat, see PRAETORIUM; as the seat of final judgment, see ESCHATOLOGY OF THE NT.

Bibliography. O. Broneer, "Corinth: Center of St. Paul's Missionary Work in Greece," BA, XIV (1951), 91-92.

I. W. BATDORF

JUDITH jo͞o′dĭth. 1. יהודית, a foreign wife of Esau (Gen. 26:34).

2. Ἰουδίθ, a wealthy widow whose charms brought deliverance to the Hebrew people, according to the apocryphal book (found in the Alexandrian, but not in the Jerusalem, canon) which bears her name. When drunken Holofernes, general of the invading army, invited her to his tent, she cut off his head. See JUDITH, BOOK OF.

Judith was descended from Merari, one of the sons of Levi (Gen. 46:11; Exod. 6:16, 19). Legend tells that in the wilderness wanderings the sons of Merari carried the heavy portions of the tabernacle. In the War of the Children of Light and the Children of Darkness, the "standard of Merari" bears the legend: "Offering unto God." The name Judith (="Jewess") suggests the personification of that pious devotion to Israel which leads one to offer all to the nation.

J. C. SWAIM

JUDITH, BOOK OF [Ἰουδ(ε)ίθ]. The fourth book in the OT Apoc. It tells how a small Jewish town, inspired by the example of a devout woman, resisted the overwhelming might of a heathen army.

1. Contents
2. Literary character
3. Original language, date of composition, and purpose
4. Theology
5. Canonicity
Bibliography

1. Contents. Nebuchadnezzar, "king of the Assyrians, the Great King, the lord of the whole earth," decides to punish the vassal states that have disregarded his order to supply auxiliary troops to assist him in his war against the Medes. Commanded by HOLOFERNES, the punitive expeditionary force subdues various insubordinate nations, but one people—the Jews—remains stubborn in its recalcitrance. Having encamped in the Plain of Esdraelon (see JEZREEL), at the foot of mountainous central Palestine, Holofernes finds his advance barred by the inhabitants of BETHULIA, a town commanding access to the road to Jerusalem. Surprised by this unexpected resistance of a nation of whom he has never heard, Holofernes calls the chieftains of the MOABITES and the AMMONITES and asks them for information about this strange people that acts unlike others. ACHIOR, the leader of the Ammonites, tells Holofernes in a long speech the whole history of the Jews: Descended from the Chaldeans, they had turned to worship the "God of heaven [cf. Ezra 1:2; 5:12; 6:9-10; 7:21, 23; Neh. 1:4-5; 2:4; Dan. 2:19, 44], the God they had come to know," and, "as long as they did not sin against their God they prospered, for the God who hates iniquity is with them." But when they defected from God's commandments, they were destroyed and carried off as captives to a country not their own. Having repented and returned to the worship of God, they had recently been brought back to their homeland, and had rebuilt Jerusalem. (1:1–5:19.)

Having narrated this history, Achior bids Holofernes to find out "if there is any unwitting error in this people and they sin against their God"; if it is so, he will overcome them easily. But if there is no disobedience to law in their nation, Holofernes should refrain from attacking the Jews, "for their Lord will defend them, and their God will protect them, and we shall be put to shame before the whole world." Enraged by Achior's advice, Holofernes exclaims: "Who is God except Nebuchadnezzar?" He orders Achior to be bound and delivered at the foot of the steep hill on which Bethulia stands, to share the fate of the city's inhabitants when they will be destroyed by his victorious army. The Jews find Achior, and take him to Bethulia. In the meantime, the Assyrian army, 120,000 infantry and 12,000 cavalry troops, augmented by 50,000 auxiliaries from tributary Palestinian tribes, encircle the little town. The chieftains of the pagan neighbors of the Jews advise Holofernes not to risk a frontal attack on the mount on which Bethulia is built, but to seize the spring at the foot of the mountain so as to deprive the inhabitants of their water supply and force the town's capitulation through hunger and thirst. Holofernes does as he is advised. When Bethulia has been under siege for thirty-four days, the cisterns in the city are empty, and the citizens begin to lose heart. They demand of their rulers to parley for terms of surrender, for it seems better to them that they should live as slaves than die with their families in vain. Ozias (Uzziah), the town's headman, is persuaded to agree with their demand provided no relief arrives within five days. (5:20–7:32.)

Judith, a noble widow in Bethulia, as beautiful as she is pious, is perturbed by this decision. Surrender of the town would open up the way to Jerusalem; the sanctuary would thus be exposed to attack and the very existence of the nation imperiled. In an address to the rulers and citizens of Bethulia, she entreats them to persevere, and to "give thanks to the Lord our God, who is putting us to the test as he did our forefathers." Ozias commends Judith for her devotion and bids her to pray for rain so that the cisterns may be filled and the people cease to languish for lack of water. Judith has other plans. She declares that she will leave the town with her maid, and hints that God will through her accomplish Bethulia's delivery. In sackcloth and ashes she offers her prayer to God, and then she anoints herself and puts on festival garments in order to entice any man she might meet. She collects food, and calls her maid to carry it for her in a bag. Thus equipped, she asks that the gate of the city be opened, and she proceeds with her maid to the camp of the heathen enemies. (8:1–10:5.)

The Assyrian guards, entranced by her appearance, escort her upon her request to Holofernes. In the general's presence, Judith assures him that Achior has spoken the truth: the Jews will come to no harm unless they sin against God. Holofernes, however, need not be downcast, because sin has already overtaken them; they intend to appropriate consecrated food to assuage their hunger. Once they have acted on their impious intention, they will be immediately destroyed, and all their resistance will collapse. Pleased by Judith's words no less than by her appearance, Holofernes asks her to stay as his guest. Judith accepts, yet professes that she "serves the God of heaven day and night"; she will eat only of the food she has brought with her; also she must say her prayers and do her ritual washings at the appointed time. For three days she stays in the camp, leaving each night to bathe in the fountain near Bethulia. On the fourth day, Holofernes invites Judith to a banquet in his tent. Her beauty, her finery, her wit, make her the center of attraction. When the subaltern officers have left Holofernes alone with Judith, the general, the worse for drink, falls asleep. Fortified by a prayer, Judith seizes his scimitar, smites his neck twice, and severs his head from his body. She gives the head to her maid to put it in her bag for victuals. Both women leave tent and camp without arousing suspicion. This time, Judith passes the spring and returns to Bethulia. There she shows her trophy to the elders. With newly found courage, the citizens of Bethulia make a sortie at daybreak. The beleaguering army, leaderless, is put to flight, and falls an easy prey to the Jews, who pursue them beyond Damascus. A great thanksgiving takes place, and Judith sings a song of praises to the Lord. (10:6–16:24.)

"And no one ever again spread terror among the people of Israel in the days of Judith, or for a long time after her death" (16:25).

2. Literary character. The narrative is slightly disproportionate in its parts—chs. 1–3 record "Nebuchadnezzar's" wars against non-Jewish nations; chs. 4–7 describe the general situation in Judea and that in Bethulia in particular; only in ch. 8 does Judith, the heroine, enter the story—but the story is nevertheless held together by its central theme and moves swiftly forward to its climax. Strongly Jewish as the writer is in his tendency and thought, his presentation is markedly affected by Hellenistic style and motifs. Extensive speeches, or prayers, a vehicle for conveying religious lessons and exhortation, alternate with narrative sections. This stylistic device, common in Hellenistic literature, is elsewhere in the Bible employed most effectively in the Acts of the Apostles. The book of Judith has been called a "typical Hellenistic novel," which "could have found its place in a collection of novels such as that made by Parthenius." Novelistic traits are reflected in descriptive details, frequently repeated, as to the effect of Judith's beauty. The Assyrian soldiers, under her spell, lead her immediately to the general, and Holofernes, on seeing Judith, loses his head before it has been cut off. There appears to be a nucleus of fact behind the report in chs. 1–3; Holofernes (Orophernes) and Bagoas are names of Persian origin; bearers of these names are known to have taken part in a punitive expedition against Egypt under Artaxerxes III Ochus (359-338 B.C.). The rest of the story is invention. The author thought up the central figure of his story, to whom he attributed all characteristics of piety expected in his own age, and to whom he ascribed the deed of Jael (Judg. 4:21) from Israel's ancient past. Josephus, prone as he is to record Jewish deeds of bravery, never mentions Judith's heroic exploits anywhere. It seems that the writer did not intend his book to be taken as an account of actual happenings; the numerous anachronisms appear to have been intentionally introduced so as to warn readers of the fictional character of the story. As a novel the book has certain literary merits. Composed with a view to encouraging the people to offer resistance to the enemies of their religious and political liberty, it is both entertaining and edifying. The high lights of the story—namely, the speeches by Achior and Judith's prayers and speeches—are well written and express not unworthy sentiments.

3. Original language, date of composition, and purpose. Modern scholarship is agreed that the book was originally composed in Hebrew. The quotations from the OT conform, however, to LXX readings.

Though the scene is set in a time shortly after the return from the Babylonian exile, the period to which the story refers is evidently of a later date. Apparently free from foreign suzerainty, the Jews are governed by a high priest who is assisted by a senate (see SANHEDRIN); little towns have local councils of elders. Galilee and the coastal plain appear not yet to be settled by a Jewish population. A puzzle concerns the locating of Bethulia in what the OT called the "hill country of Ephraim." This region, at the time when the book was written, was inhabited by the SAMARITANS, who are, however, nowhere mentioned in Judith. Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, and the inhabitants of the seacoast are named as the local enemies of the Jews—they are the same nations who figure as Israel's enemies in the Scroll of War from Qumran—but not the Samaritans. This omission is hardly fortuitous. Bethulia itself is identified by most authors with SHECHEM, which was captured in 128 B.C. by John Hyrcanus I. If the book was composed before the city was conquered, one of the aims of the writer may have been to plead with the Samaritans to make common cause with the Jews against pagan enemies. If a later date of composition is preferred, it could be argued that the omission of the Samaritans was due to the writer's conviction that the Samaritans were no longer of any consequence.

Most modern scholars have placed the origin of the book in the period of success of the Maccabean revolt, somewhere between the years 150 and 125 B.C. This view has been challenged; Grintz assigns the story to Persian times, in the reign of Artaxerxes Ochus. Yet, though recollections of this monarch's campaign in the W provinces of his empire may have furnished the author of Judith with materials for chs. 1–3, the rest of the story can hardly be fitted within that period. No Persian king of the Achaemenian (Hakhāmanishya) dynasty could have served as a model for "Nebuchadnezzar," who is said to have wanted "to destroy all the gods of the land, so that all nations should worship Nebuchadnezzar alone" (3:8). This description appears rather to suit Antiochus IV Epiphanes. A Hebrew midrash, reflecting the story of Judith but much abridged and told with more realism (see bibliography), designates Judith's victim by the title hēgemōn and assigns the story to the time of Seleucid oppression. This setting may well be indicated both by the book's spirited determination to resist a numerically superior foe and by the description of the leading persons among Israel's enemies. "Holofernes" possibly stands for NICANOR 1 (cf. II Macc. 15:30), the "Assyrians" for Seleucid Syrians, while "Nineveh" might represent Antioch. The plot as a whole portrays a time of national distress for the Jews ("a people with no strength or power for making war" [5:23]), when partisan resistance—even isolated action by women—would have appeared a justifiable means in the struggle for self-preservation. Although the main elements of his story are fictional, the intention of the writer was to celebrate recent victories, to entertain as well as to inspire resistance.

4. Theology. Judith exemplifies a type of piety which lays great stress on rigorous compliance with ritual requirements. The heroine prepares for her action by fasting and prayer; she religiously observes the sabbaths, the festivals, and the days of the new moon; she eats only food that has been ritually prepared. She says her prayers at the appointed time of day and does her washings regularly. This emphasis on ritual should not, however, be allowed to obscure the genuine spiritual sentiment that comes to the fore in Judith's prayer (9:11-14 orig. tr.):

> Your strength is not in numbers
> nor your might in stout men;
> You are the God of the lowly,
> a helper of the oppressed . . . ,
> Protector of the neglected,
> the savior of those without hope.
> Yes—God of my father, > and God of the inheritance of Israel,
> Lord of the heavens and of the earth,
> creator of the waters,
> King of all your creation,
> . . . . . .
> Make every nation and every tribe of yours realize > that you are God,
> The God of all power and might,
> and that the people of Israel have none to protect > them but you.

There is a keen awareness of God's interest in human affairs. Men's deeds reap their reward. Man is free in his decisions, and accountable for his actions.

The modern reader may feel repelled by the writer's immoderate praise of a woman who resorts to such doubtful means as Judith is reported to have used; he extols the virtue of a woman who first excites the passion of a man and then kills him in his sleep. The story has to be understood against the background of the time which it describes—a period of history in which the Jewish nation depended for its survival upon the resourcefulness and even ruthlessness of individuals.

The work contains no explicit mention of the resurrection faith, but in the triumphal ode at the conclusion a Day of Judgment is mentioned. The Almighty will avenge every evil deed, will put "fire and worms" in the flesh of sinners, and "they shall weep in pain for ever"—an idea elaborated in certain NT descriptions of hell.

Judith's punctilious observance of ritual laws mirrors a type of Pharisaic piety. This does not mean that the Pharisees were on the whole narrow-minded and bloodthirsty. It was also a Pharisee of whom the Talmud records the saying: "The descendants of Haman learned Torah; the Holy One, blessed be He, decided to take them under the wings of the Shechinah" (T.B. Sanh. 96*b*).

5. Canonicity. The Hebrew original of Judith is lost, though later midrashim, based on the story, are extant. No fragments from the book have come to light among the DEAD SEA SCROLLS. One naturally wonders why ESTHER came to enjoy canonical status in the Hebrew canon in preference to Judith. From an aesthetic and literary viewpoint, the story of Judith is of better quality, is told with more verve, and in places rises to true poetry. Both books are similar in aim and spirit. The eclipse of Judith may be due partly to the fact that the story is localized in a small place, in Samaritan territory, while Esther has its setting at the center of the known world, at the court of a Persian king. Of greater importance may be the consideration that the story of Esther is associated with an annual feast in the Jewish calendar. The book of Judith, having no such connection with practical life, soon fell into neglect.

Of the Greek translation, which was made at an early date, there exist three recensions that differ in minor details. There is also a Syr. version and an OL version, both of which are based on the text of one of the three Greek recensions. The Vulg. text differs from all these versions and offers a considerably abridged text with numerous transpositions.

Jerome, in the Vulg. preface to Judith, stated that the Council of Nicea had included the book among holy scriptures. The Forty-seventh Canon of the Third Council of Carthage lists the book among canonical writings. The Council of Trent re-emphasized its inspired character.

The book now enjoys canonical status in the Roman Catholic and the Greek Orthodox churches.

Bibliography. O. F. Fritzsche, Kurzgefasstes exegetisches Handbuch, pt. 2 (1853). For the Hebrew midrash reflecting the story of Judith, see A. Jellinek, Beth Ha-Midrasch (1853-78); German trans. in A. Wünsche, Aus Israels Lehrhallen, vol. II (1908). E. Schürer, A History of the Jewish People, div. 2, vol. III (1886), pp. 32-37. A. V. Scholz, Kommentar zum Buche Judith (1887). C. J. Ball in H. Wace, The Holy Bible, Apoc. (1888). M. Löhr in E. F. Kautzsch, Die Apokryphen und Pseudepigraphen des AT (1900). C. Steuernagel, Lehrbuch (1912). A. E. Cowley in R. H. Charles, The Apoc. and Pseudep. of the OT (1913). O. Eissfeldt, Einleitung in das AT (1st ed., 1934; 2nd ed., 1956). E. J. Goodspeed, The Story of the Apoc. (1939). C. C. Torrey, The Apocryphal Literature (1945). F. Stummer, Geographie des Buches Judith (1947). R. H. Pfeiffer, History of NT Times (1949). J. Klausner, Historiyah shel habayith hasheni, III (1951-52), 184-88. J. M. Grintz, Sefer Yehudith (1957). P. WINTER

JUEL. KJV Apoc. form of JOEL.

JULIA jo͞ol'yə ['Ιουλία; Lat. Julia] (Rom. 16:15). A Christian woman, recipient of a greeting. Cf. vs. 7, where this name is a variant reading for 'Ιουνιᾶν. F. W. GINGRICH JULIUS jo͞ol'yəs ['Ιούλιος]. A Roman centurion, assigned the task of escorting Paul from Palestine to Rome. Julius is a common Roman name, made famous by the Julian family, of which Julius Caesar (see CAESAR, JULIUS) was the most distinguished member. The Julius mentioned by name in Acts 27: 1, 3, 11, and referred to in vs. 43 and (according to some late MSS) in 28:16, was a CENTURION of the AUGUSTAN COHORT stationed at Caesarea on the coast of Palestine. Centurions were advanced in the Roman army by being transferred from cohort to cohort and from legion to legion, in order to allow a centurion to move from commanding troops at the rear of a legion to the highest ranking post open to a centurion: officer of the first centuria (one hundred men) in the first cohort (six hundred men) at the front of a legion (six thousand men). Therefore, even if we knew whether his centuria from the Augustan Cohort was composed of Syrian troops or men from Samaria, we should still be unable to determine the land of origin of Julius the centurion.

Paul had been accused by some of the Jewish leaders of being a disturber of the peace and of having attempted to profane the temple of Jerusalem (Acts 24:1-9). Hearings before the Roman governors had been inconclusive, and Paul had exercised his right as a Roman citizen to appeal to Caesar himself (25:8-12).

The governor, Festus, and the puppet king, Agrippa, agreed that Paul should be sent to Rome for a hearing before Nero (Acts 26:30-32). It was in the custody of Julius that Paul was placed for the trip to Rome (27:1). The journey was made in a merchant ship, rather than a military vessel, so that some of Paul's companions were able to accompany him (vs. 2). Furthermore, Julius' kindness and sympathy for Paul were so great that he allowed the prisoner to go ashore at Sidon, where he visited friends and received from them certain kindnesses, before resuming the journey westward toward Rome.

Bad weather delayed the travelers beyond the time of year when it was safe to travel in the open Mediterranean. Paul's advice to winter in the harbor of Fair Havens in Crete was ignored by the centurion, who seems to have been eager to get his prisoners to their destination in Rome (Acts 27:9-11). Later, after a storm had driven the ship on rocks off Malta, Julius restrained the soldiers aboard from killing Paul and the other prisoners in order to prevent their escape. Acts tells us nothing further about Julius, except in the MSS of the Western text type (see TEXT, NT), where Julius is reported to have turned Paul over to an officer charged with responsibility for prisoners from the provinces (28:16).

Bibliography. T. R. S. Broughton in F. J. Foakes-Jackson and K. Lake, eds., Beginnings of Christianity, V (1933), 427-45; vol. IV gives a full statement about the allusions in Acts to the Roman army. H. C. KEE

JUNGLE OF THE JORDAN [גאון ירדן, pride of the Jordan]; KJV SWELLING OF JORDAN in Jer. 12:5; 49:19; 50:44; PRIDE OF JORDAN in Zech. 11:3. Through the centuries the Jordan has eroded a narrow, winding bed, where the tropical heat and seasonal flooding combine to produce a tangled thicket of tamarisk, willows, and other shrubs. It was a haunt of wild beasts (Jer. 49:19; 50: 44; Zech. 11:3) and a place of danger (Jer. 12:5).

See also JORDAN. L. E. TOOMBS

JUNIAS jo͞o'nĭ əs ['Ιουνιᾶς] (Rom. 16:7); KJV JUNIA —ə ['Ιουνία]. A Jewish Christian, fellow prisoner of Paul. If the name is masculine (so RSV), it is found nowhere else than in this passage, and must be a short form of Junianus. Grammatically it might be a feminine (so KJV), though this seems inherently less probable, partly because the person is referred to as an apostle. F. W. GINGRICH

JUNIPER. KJV translation of רתם, rōthem (RSV BROOM), in I Kings 19:4-5; Job 30:4; Ps. 120:4. This is a mistaken translation, but the ערער, 'ar'ār, of Jer. 17:6 ("shrub"; KJV HEATH) and probably the ערוער, 'ᵃrô'ēr, of Jer. 48:6 (emended to "wild ass," reading עריד, 'ārôd; KJV "heath") refer to the Juniperus phoenicia L., as is evident from the plant's wilderness associations in Jer. 17:6. The Arabs call this shrub 'ar'ar. The RSV emendation in Jer. 48:6 (with the LXX and Aq.) to "wild ass" seems unnecessary. The city AROER was perhaps named after this shrub.

The juniper of the Lebanons is a large, timber-producing tree (Juniperus excelsa Bilb.), which some scholars would identify with the Hebrew berôš (see FLORA § A9*g*), but see PINE.

See also FLORA §§ A9*h*, k.

Bibliography. I. Löw, Die Flora der Juden, III (1924), 33-38.
J. C. TREVER

JUPITER jo͞o'pə tər. The great sky-god of the Latin peoples, worshiped on every hilltop in ancient Italy. Identified with Zeus, he took on many of the anthropomorphic traits of the Greek deity, together

Courtesy of the Arab Information Center, New York

33. Ruins of the temple of Jupiter at Baalbek with his myths. The Latin god is not mentioned in the Bible, but through the influence of the Vulg. and also of the classical practice of the period, the KJV uses his name to render that of ZEUS (Acts 14:12-13; II Macc. 6:2).

Fig. JUP 33. F. W. BEARE

JUSHAB-HESED jo͞o'shĭb hē'sĕd [יושב־חסד, may covenant love be returned] (I Chr. 3:20). A son of Zerubbabel.

JUSTICE. See LAW; RIGHTEOUSNESS; PEACE IN THE OT.

JUSTICE (OFFICER). The translation of πράκτωρ in Luke 12:58 (KJV OFFICER). The Greek word is generally used for an OFFICER of the court who executes sentences, collects fines and revenue, and arraigns prisoners. He is always under a judge's authority. He may be best considered a bailiff.
C. U. WOLF

JUSTIFICATION, JUSTIFY. In biblical thought, the fundamental moral need of man. When rightly understood, the terminology of "justification," though forensic, is seen to describe the basic diagnosis of the human problem and the divinely provided solution of it.

The clearest formulation of the biblical doctrine of justification comes from Paul, whose distinctive thought it expresses.

1. Terminology
2. Biblical usage in general
3. Pauline usage
   a. Sin
   b. Law
   c. Faith
   d. Variation of meaning
4. Summary
Bibliography

1. Terminology. The Hebrew root צדק, "just," is used with reference to rulers and judges and preeminently to Yahweh, in the sense of seeing that men get their right, and this can refer to both accuser and accused. The prominent sense, however, is seeing that justice is done to the accused (e.g., Pss. 35: 24-28; 40:9-17). As a divine activity this takes the form of punishment for sin (Isa. 5:13-16; 10:22; cf. 42:24; Dan. 9:7), but it may also be seen as the vindication of God's oppressed people (Isa. 42:6; 46:13; 62:1-2). The word may be rendered "deliverance" (as in Isa. 51:1, 5, 8; cf. 41:10, where "victorious right hand" is literally "right hand of my צדק"). In later writers the meaning tends to rise above strict justice into something like benevolence, and it is often in the same context as faithfulness, mercy, etc. (e.g., Ps. 40:9-10).

The sense of vindication is clearest in the causative form of the verb, which means "put in the right, give verdict in favor of." It is a bad judge who will pronounce in favor of a wicked man (Exod. 23:7; Prov. 17:15; Isa. 5:23). But the distinctive teaching of the OT comes out in reference to Yahweh's dealing with refractory Israel. God's problem, if we may so put it, is that his people are often guilty, and he must give a verdict against them, because he is just. But equally because he is just, and because the Hebrew conception of justice was a redeeming and not merely a punishing activity, God's punitive judgments are not final, but the means to ultimate redemption. Thus, in a certain sense, he does "justify the ungodly" (Rom. 4:5), though to say no more than this would be to caricature the OT doctrine.

The Greek δικαιόω means "treat rightly" (persons), "regard as right" (things). Its cognate words, particularly the noun δικαιοσύνη, express "justice" or "rightness" more or less in the modern English sense. NT usage is not that of secular Greek, but is strongly influenced by the fact that the LXX used these Greek terms to translate the above Hebrew terms, and thus carried over their connotation into the NT (and incidentally made it difficult for Greek Christians to understand Paul's teaching on justification). The LXX used δικαιόω to translate the causative Hebrew verb הצדיק, and δικαιοσύνη to translate the two cognate nouns צדק, צדקה. This is the background of Paul's usage. The meaning "declare innocent, regard as in the right," for δικαιόω is found in Matt. 12:37; Luke 18:14; I Cor. 4:4—a less theological sense than is characteristic of Paul. See RIGHTEOUSNESS.

2. Biblical usage in general. The dominant biblical thought forming the background for the language of justification may be summarized as follows: God is righteous: "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" (Gen. 18:25). The main contribution of the prophets was their moralizing of the primitive conception of divine holiness (especially in the preexilic period; but cf. also Deut. 32:4; Job 8:3; 37:23; Pss. 50:6; 89:14; 143:1-2; Isa. 45:18-24). This divine justice involved obligations upon man, at least upon Israel, who were in covenant with Yahweh. Israel's failure to rise to these obligations caused Yahweh to punish them, precisely because he was God, and a righteous God at that (cf. Gen. 3; Jer. 7; Ezek. 5; and frequently). After this lesson had been learned through the calamity of 586 B.C. (cf. Isa. 42:24; Ezek. 39:21-24), further reflection raised doubts whether man could achieve the right living God required. God was not insensitive to man's efforts after righteousness, but these efforts fell short. Right relationship with God is not attainable by observing statutes and judgments—Israel does not even keep the first commandment, but goes "a-whoring" after other gods (cf. Hosea, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel)—nor does the elaborate postexilic system of sacrifice really avail (cf. Ps. 143:2; Isa. 64:6).

Thus there is need for divine intervention and help if man is to attain righteousness. Biblical faith holds on to this possibility. God will vindicate his people (Isa. 50:7-9). He will perform an act of deliverance or justification (the meaning of the key verb הצדיק, as explained in § 1 above). Second Isaiah is very significant on this point (cf. Isa. 46:13; 51:4-8). God is Savior (Isa. 43:11), and has not forgotten Israel involved in the consequences of her sins. The book of Job, too, has special significance. It is concerned, not only with the problem of suffering, but even more with the problem of righteousness: How can a man be just before God? (9:2; 25:4). Job is too involved in the difficulties, too aware of the complexities that life's conditions present to the idealist, to be satisfied with the orthodoxy created by the prophetic doctrine that sin is always punished. This orthodoxy, as voiced by his "comforters," who argue that Job's sufferings must be the consequence of his sins, was too easy a dogma, supported perhaps by superficial evidence but not by the deeper realities of man's exposure to the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune.

3. Pauline usage. The chief NT spokesman of salvation in terms of justification is Paul. Presupposing universal sinfulness (Rom. 3:23), he teaches that a right relationship with God must precede right treatment of one's fellow man; and he proclaims as his gospel a divine offer of righteousness for all who take God seriously and give up the assumption that moral effort alone can achieve righteousness. Paul's teaching may be considered under four headings:

a. Sin. In Paul's usage sin is the objective power which impedes man's endeavors to obey the will of God. It is not synonymous with guilt or with the individual's consciousness of sin. It is not individual and subjective, but corporate and objective, a condition of human existence as such (Rom. 3:23; 5:12; cf. Ps. 51:1-5). Humanity as a whole, and without exception, is involved in sin, precisely as it is liable to death. The classic statement of this view is Rom. 5:12-21, which takes it as axiomatic that sin and death mutually imply each other.

Paul is not concerned primarily with sinfulness or remorse. If he wants to deal with these, he speaks of sin's being "imputed" (RSV "counted"—i.e., entered to someone's debit account; Rom. 5:13), or "coming alive" (7:9), or being "shown up" (7:13). In these contexts law—i.e., moral obligation—is the causative factor which awakens the sense of guilt.

If man then is to be "justified," he must be delivered, not merely from a bad conscience, but from the whole nexus of involvement in imperfection, finitude, and death; from what Paul in one place (Rom. 8:21) calls the bondage of corruption, and what he describes more objectively as experience of a strangling power which frustrates his very determination to do good (Rom. 7:15-20). God has provided this deliverance through Christ as his agent and through Christ's death as the means (Rom. 3:24-25; 5:6-9). See SIN.

b. Law. Law, meaning predominantly the Mosaic legislation, but also any moral code and the sense of obligation in whatsoever form apprehended, is not in Pauline teaching a means by which man either (ethically speaking) attains goodness or (religiously speaking) secures right relationship with his Maker (cf. Heb. 7:19).

Simply to know what ought to be done does not automatically convey the will and power to do it. In Pauline thought on this problem law was never intended to produce goodness (Rom. 3:21, 28; 4:14; Gal. 3:21). Its function was a more subsidiary one. This was a dangerous admission to make for a Hebrew whose whole religion was based on the axiom that God's holiness was a moral holiness. Nevertheless, this is Paul's interpretation of how the moral struggle had been resolved for him by his experience of divine grace (Rom. 3:20; Gal. 2:21; 3:11-13, 21-24).

The law brings wrath (Rom. 4:15). Wrath means the consequences of sin, considered not simply as objective penalties such as moral degradation (e.g., Rom. 1:21-32) or ultimately death (Rom. 6:23), but as the divine reaction to sin (Rom. 1:18; 5:9; see WRATH). The law actually causes sins (Rom. 5:20 ["Law came in, to increase the trespass"]; cf. Gal. 3:19). The meaning of these provocative statements must be that simultaneously with the awareness of goodness, which a moral code brings, there comes also knowledge of badness; and moral awareness—not the actual code, but the faculty within man—inevitably carries with it exposure to temptation, so that in practice knowledge of law has as its consequence temptation and submission to temptation—viz., transgression (Rom. 7:7-11). This sequence is familiar to psychology, and daily experience provides abundant confirmation of the truth of Paul's argument. Law imposes a kind of tyranny on mankind, who feel the obligation to obey, but are impotent to fulfil it regularly (Rom. 6:16-23; 8:1-4, 15; Gal. 4:1-9; 4:21–5:1).

Nevertheless, law is not satanic. It is part of God's providential ordering of human affairs (Rom. 7:12-16, 22). The effects of law's domination are intended to bring man to the point where he will have no illusions about his capabilities, but will resign himself (Rom. 7:13*b*, 24) and accept God's offer of superhuman power, by which alone the requirements of righteousness can be met and the limitations arising from the weakness of human nature overcome (Rom. 7:25–8:4). Thus law has a definite function—not, indeed, of bestowing the salvation man needs, but of preparing man for it, of leading him, as it were, to where it can happen, of being "our custodian until Christ came" (Gal. 3:23-25). It is a witness laying out evidence that God's full redemption or gift of righteousness is on the way (Gal. 3:21-22). See LAW.

c. Faith. Faith for Paul was the primary move on man's part toward acceptance of the righteousness which God freely offers. The possibility of righteousness (justification) for man depends, objectively, on God's gracious initiative; and, subjectively, on man's response to that initiative. This response is what Paul means by FAITH. Thus he can write that we are justified by grace (Rom. 3:24), and also that we are justified by faith (vss. 26-28; 5:1; Gal. 2:16; 3:24). Faith means taking God's promise of salvation with simple seriousness, believing that he was savingly operating in the ministry, death, and resurrection of Christ. Faith is centered on Christ (Gal. 2:16), more particularly on his self-sacrifice at Calvary, which Paul conceives as provision of atoning blood (Rom. 3:25). Such faith results in salvation and justification (Rom. 10:9-10). The divine righteousness which is revealed to men is communicated "through faith for faith" (Rom. 1:17). Faith can be said to take the place of the righteousness supposedly attained by "works of law," in the sense that God can do something with a man who trusts him, but can do nothing with one who submits his own moral performance as the basis of acceptance with God, because that performance is nonexistent in God's judgment, and the merit imaginary.

d. Variation of meaning. The actual word δικαιοσύνη in Paul's usage, especially in Romans, is not free from ambiguity. Strictly speaking, three senses can be distinguished—the theological, the forensic, and the ethical. But the way Paul's mind moves from one to the other is often confusing, and the precise meaning of a particular passage may be difficult to determine. Paul is not a precise writer, even when handling terms which are fundamental to his argument.

The variation of meaning in Romans may be indicated as follows: The argument opens at 1:17 with the grand affirmation that a righteousness which is divine in origin is being revealed. The present tense is to be noted, as implying that this revelation is a continuous process. Elsewhere we learn that the point of origin is the cross and resurrection of Christ (Rom. 3:24; 10:9). Comparison with the Synoptic gospels shows that Paul's doctrine of divine righteousness revealed or communicated to man is his restatement of what Christ himself proclaimed as a "coming" of God's kingdom.

This righteousness of God is an activity, not an attitude or quality. It means God's dealing with the human situation where righteousness has proved unattainable. The best human ethics has assumed that the good life consists of doing (Rom. 2:13); but man has to learn that it is possible only on the basis of God's gift (3:24; 5:17), the essential contribution on man's side being, not works, but faith—i.e., a basic attitude of gratitude and receptiveness which recognizes that God has taken the initiative in providing moral incentive. This is the divine GRACE (χάρις; Rom. 5:15).

This is the main presupposition of Paul's thought. But Paul is not insensitive to the ordinary ethical connotation of δικαιοσύνη, and he sometimes uses the word with this meaning in reference to men—viz., of moral goodness, though not perfection. He is not limited to the sense of δικαιοσύνη as a mere status divinely imposed, but unrelated to man's moral experience, which is what scholastic subtlety has sometimes made of Paul's doctrine. He can use it of real moral achievement (e.g., Rom. 5:15-21, where the parallelism between goodness and life and sin and death is very marked; 6:11-19, where justification is tending to be identified with SANCTIFICATION; 8:4*a* ["just requirement," δικαίωμα]; 8:10 [here clarity is sacrificed for the sake of neat antithesis]). The nonmoral, purely theological sense is dominant in 3:21-26; 5:1, 9. The Greek aorist tense in 5:1 ("since we are justified") implies that the justification is past; it has already secured a standing in God's grace (vs. 2); what is still future is "sharing the glory of God," which unredeemed mankind fall short of (3:23)—viz., that divine image in man which sin effaces. The recovery of this image is "our hope" (5:2) and the ultimate outcome of our justification (notice the future tenses in 5:9-10, 17, 19). In Rom. 9:30 we see how Paul can pass from the moral to the theological sense of righteousness within a single verse. But whatever sense is uppermost in his mind, Paul always implies that the righteousness which is part of the believer's experience is due to God's gift rather than his own endeavors. There is no room for self-congratulation (Rom. 3:27), which is encouraged by moralistic religions like Judaism. By Jewish standards Paul had himself claimed perfection (Phil. 3:6: "as to righteousness under the law blameless"), but he gave up this claim in the light of his experience as a Christian (vs. 12).

4. Summary. The forensic metaphor is dropped, and even strict morality transcended, in what the Bible says about God's dealing with sinful man. The comparison of God to a judge carries us part way, but the divine צדק, or righteousness or justification, means much more than punishment of sin. It means that activity wherein God restores the sinner to goodness. This is the deepest insight of the OT and the real truth underlying the logic of the Letter to the Romans. God puts in the way of righteousness men who can claim no actual righteousness but who offer a simple coin stamped on one side PENITENCE and on the other FAITH. Man's ultimate perfection is the gift of God.

Bibliography. E. D. Burton, Galatians (1921), pp. 460-74; C. H. Dodd, The Bible and the Greeks (1935), pp. 42-59; V. Taylor, Forgiveness and Reconciliation (1941), pp. 34-82; N. H. Snaith, Distinctive Ideas of the OT (1944), pp. 51-78, 161-73; R. Bultmann, Theologie des neuen Testaments (1948), pp. 270-80 (trans. K. Grobel; 1952). E. C. BLACKMAN

JUSTUS jŭs'təs ['Ιούστος; Lat. Justus]. 1. A surname of Joseph Barsabbas (Acts 1:23; see BARSABBAS), a candidate (with Matthias) for the place of Judas Iscariot among the Twelve.

2. Titius Justus (Acts 18:7), a "worshiper of God" who invited the Christians of Corinth to meet in his house when they could no longer meet in the synagogue. His name is given in the KJV simply as Justus, and in some MSS as Titus Justus. Goodspeed (see below) would identify him with the Gaius of Rom. 16:23, in whose house the Corinthian church met. In this case Gaius would be his praenomen, Titius his nomen, and Justus his cognomen.

3. A surname of Jesus, who is mentioned by Paul in Col. 4:11 as one of the few Jewish Christians who worked with him and were a comfort to him.

Bibliography. E. J. Goodspeed, "Gaius Titius Justus," JBL, 69 (1950), 382-83. F. W. GINGRICH

JUTTAH jŭt'ə [יוּטָה, extended, inclined] (Josh. 15:55; 21:16). A city of Judah in the SE hill-country district of Maon; identified with Yatta, ca. 5½ miles SW of Hebron. Its assignment to the family of Aaron made it one of the Levitical cities (Josh. 21:16; it is omitted in the parallel I Chr. 6:59).

Eusebius says that Jettan ('Ιέτταν=Juttah) was a very large Jewish village eighteen (Roman) miles from Eleutheropolis (Beit Jibrin) in the middle of the Darome (the Negeb).

A pious tradition once associated Juttah with the city of Judah in the hill country in which Mary visited Elizabeth (Luke 1:39 ff), but most scholars feel there is little substance to this tradition.

V. R. GOLD