by assurances of forensic acquittal. Indeed, the term acquittal is best avoided if it conjures up the notion of treating sinners as though they were not sinners. Plainly, in Paul's theology there is no room for such exonerating considerations. "Amnesty," therefore, is a term preferred by some scholars, and it recalls that justification is above all a royal act by which pardon is freely bestowed on the undeserving. God's royal rule is displayed in releasing offenders from guilt out of respect for his Son, who stands as their sponsor. Jesus Christ by his undertaking arranges a new network of divine-human relations—the element of novelty is seen by Paul's statement that God's righteousness (i.e., his saving power) is shown "apart from law" (Rom. 3.21)—and the whole enterprise springs from his free favor, his "grace" (Rom. 3.24; 11.6). The fresh start made by Christ's action ushers in a new order that consists of a whole series of events involving both forensic and dynamic acts on the part of God. The refusal to delimit justification to the initial act of acquittal and remission of guilt, thought of in exclusively legal terms and played out in a courtroom drama, paves the way for a much richer understanding of the term. It certainly will include a forensic release from sin's penalty, but will also entail the entire process of the rectification of the human relationship to God, who dynamically releases a power to set this relationship in a new orbit. For Paul, the new sphere of living is one of sonship within a family context and no longer that of slavery under the taskmaster's stern eye.

Two consequences flow from these considerations, as Ernst Käsemann has observed. First, God's righteousness is a gift that has the character of power. In fact, the actual term is associated in the Hebrew Bible with other words, such as "love," "peace," "wrath," that are used in personified form and often connote divine power. That is to say, what God does in rectifying sinners is characteristically a regal fiat, announcing a new day when past failures are put away, debts and liabilities canceled, and guilt removed from those who otherwise must pay the price. According to Romans 1.17 and 3.21, a new order has come into existence, one that sets human relationships on a different footing from that of strict justice and merit. The divine power now released and known in human experience is what the Pauline gospel is all about (Rom. 1.16; 1 Thess. 1.5).

Second, God's righteousness is characterized by universality. Paul stands directly in the tradition of the exilic prophet known as Second Isaiah (Isa. 40–55), for whom divine ṣĕdāqâ (righteousness) spills over into Yahweh's saving activity put forth on Israel's behalf and issuing in the promise of a new world. The apocalyptic dimension of Paul's thought is clear in his celebration of God's power in reaching out to capture the entire world for the sovereignty of God. What seems a limited teaching in the Jewish Christian fragment of Romans 3.24–25 is taken over editorially by Paul and enlarged to cover God's faithfulness not only to the covenant people of Israel but also to the whole creation. And that statement of a new creation brought into existence at God's command (2 Cor. 5.17) will play a significant part in Paul's developed teaching on reconciliation as Paul elaborates the cosmic scope of Christ's salvific work (2 Cor. 5.18–21; cf. Col. 1.15–20).

In summary, justification by faith is a relational term. Talk of forensic acquittal, often suggesting a sterile setting free from immediate punishment, is misplaced and merits the criticism brought by some that Paul's teaching is little short of a legal fiction. But such criticism is deflected once we recall how this terminology is basically couched in the framework of interpersonal relationships, and carries for Paul a dynamic nuance of a new attitude of God to human beings, as of humans to God, which in both instances leads to a chain of events. God, for his part, takes steps to carry through the enterprise of human recovery and renewal, while on the human side the initial act of "rightwising"—to use an old English term—begins a process of moral transformation associated with union with Christ that will ultimately reach its goal in the final homecoming of the people of God at the last day (Gal. 5.4; Phil. 1.11).

Paul's teaching was so finely balanced that it was capable of being distorted and misrepresented. The evidence for this comes in Romans 3.8; 6.1–15; Galatians 5.13, where his stress on the sufficiency of God's justifying grace was understood by some as an invitation to moral laxity. Pauline extremists are evidently the subject of James's debate on faith and works (James 2.14–26; see James, The Letter of). The need to have justification by faith set in the context of the call to a new life of obedience and the fruit of holy living (already anticipated in Gal. 5.6) led to the teachings of the Pauline school of the *Pastoral letters and possibly accounts for the stress on good works in 1 *Peter and *Matthew.

RALPH P. MARTIN

K

Kenites. The Kenites are portrayed in biblical tradition as staunch supporters of Israel and Yahwism who were never fully incorporated into Israelite society. Their status as a marginal group is implied in Judges 4.17–22 and 5.24–27, where the house of Heber the Kenite is portrayed as having peaceful relations with the tribes of Israel as well as Jabin the king of *Hazor, Israel's enemy. Some relation to Israel is also suggested in Judges 1.16, where the Kenites are said to have settled with the people of Judah in the Negeb near Arad (cf. 1 Sam. 27.10, "the Negeb of the Kenites"). The positive relationship between the Israelites and the Kenites is further affirmed in 1 Samuel 15.6; 30.29.

The Kenites may have had some connection with nomadic or seminomadic metalsmiths, although they are never explicitly identified as such. A *nomadic or seminomadic mode of life is suggested by references to their presence in various locations throughout Palestine, possibly including northern Sinai (Num. 24.17–22), a region of copper mining and smelting in ancient times. The association with metalworking has been postulated on the basis of the linguistic similarity between their name and *Cain's, the ancestor of Tubal-cain, the first "forger of all instruments of bronze and iron" (Gen. 4.22). The marginal status of the Kenites also supports this hypothesis, as marginality is characteristic of metalworking groups in many traditional societies throughout the Middle East and Africa. (See also Crafts.)

Some interpreters have conjectured that the Kenites were responsible for introducing Yahwism to the Israelites (the "Kenite hypothesis"). This proposal is based on the traditions that *Moses first encountered Yahweh (Exodus 3) while in the service of the priest Jethro (identified in Judges 1.16 and 4.11 as a Kenite), who praises and offers sacrifice to Yahweh and instructs Moses regarding delegation of authority (Exod. 18.10–27).

The Kenites are not mentioned in traditions about the later history of Israel. They may, however, have been related to the *Rechabites (1 Chron. 2.55), another socially marginal group that was fiercely supportive of Yahwism (2 Kings 10.15–28; Jeremiah 35), and to the *Midianites. Moses' father-in-law is identified as a Midianite in the Exodus traditions but as a Kenite in Judges 1.16 and 4.11. And in 1 Samuel 15.6, the Kenites are remembered as loyal supporters of Israel during the *Exodus, a role attributed to the *Midianites in the Pentateuchal narratives.

In Numbers 24.21–22, it is foretold that the Kenites will perish. This is the one instance in which they are viewed unfavorably.

PAULA M. MCNUTT

Ketib and Qere. Aramaic terms meaning "(that which is) written" and "(that which is) to be read," respectively. Both developed as part of the reading tradition for the *Masorah of the Hebrew Bible in ancient Judaism. In seeking to preserve and to transmit the proper pronunciation of the consonantal text of the Hebrew scriptures, ketib and qere indicate the correct reading and pronunciation of the text. Ketib always refers to the particular reading that has been preserved as part of the received Hebrew text, both consonants and vowels as originally recorded in the *Masoretic Text. The qere, which is given in the margin of the text, indicates either corrected pronunciation by means of alternate vowels for the consonants preserved in the received text, or alternate spelling, that is, consonants and vowels to be read instead of the form in the received text. The qere may correct an error in the received text, or it may offer another reading entirely (as with the *name of God Yahweh, and in euphemistic substitutions). Some scholars have maintained that the Qere/Ketib system, in addition to preserving a different reading tradition, was a way to preserve variants that were eliminated when the text of the Hebrew Bible was standardized within Judaism in the first century CE (see Masoretic Text). RUSSELL FULLER

Kingdom of God. There is clear agreement among the *synoptic Gospels that the kingdom of God was the principal theme within Jesus' message (Matt. 4.17, 23; Mark 1.15; Luke 4.42, 43), although each attests to this fact distinctively. In aggregate, they present some fifty sayings and *parables of Jesus concerning the kingdom. In the gospel of John Jesus refers only once to the kingdom expressly, though the saying is repeated (3.3, 5). In that instance, however, the kingdom is presented as something that even the *Pharisee Nicodemus is assumed to understand; the point at issue is not the nature of the kingdom but how it might be entered. It is, then, a matter of consensus within the canon that the kingdom constituted a primary focus of Jesus' theology.

The notion that God is king and as such rules, or wishes to rule, his people is evident in the scriptures of Israel. In the books of *Judges and *Samuel, the Lord's kingship is even held to exclude human monarchy as the appropriate government of the covenantal people (Judg. 8.23; 1 Sam. 8.7–9). It requires a distinctive fiat, by prophetic anointing, to establish Davidic *kingship as the seal of the divine *covenant (2 Sam. 7.5–17; cf. 1 Sam. 16.1–13). In no sense, then, does the Davidic royal house supplant God's ultimate rule. God could still be conceived of as reigning over all things (Ps. 145.13), and as about to reign on behalf of Israel (Isa. 52.7). In both Hebrew and Aramaic the verb "reigns" or "rules" is cognate with the nouns "king" and "kingdom" (all from the root mlk); furthermore, the noun "kingdom" refers more to the fact or force of rule than to the territory governed. The phrasing of the New Testament, although distinctive, is conceptually rooted in the Hebrew Bible.

The future orientation found in Isaiah 52.7 may be perplexing. Alongside the conviction of God's continuing, royal care, there was also the hope that God would finally—and unambiguously—be disclosed as king. Just that hope, in an ultimate and irrefutable exertion of the divine reign, is characteristic of early *eschatology (e.g., Isa. 52.7). Within that perspective, the end of time is not dreaded but is rather the object of longing. The dissolution of the present age is a frightening prospect only for those who enjoy the rewards of this world; for Israel, the chosen people who had been denied the fruits of divine promise as a result of their sin and foreign domination, the end of this age—and the beginning of another—increasingly became an urgent hope. Only then, it was believed, would the promised peace of God reign supreme. Their hope seemed only to increase the more critical became the absence of a Davidic king, the presence of the Romans, and confusing controversies concerning the efficacy of worship in the *Temple. Eschatological urgency was a function of two collateral axioms within the faith of Israel: that God was just and that Israel is the elect people of God. Within their own understanding, the people of Israel could not agree that contemporary circumstances were consistent with either axiom. God, they felt, must be about to act in vindication of both his people and his own integrity.

"The kingdom of God" (or "the kingdom of the Lord") is precisely the phrase used in certain documents of early Judaism in order to express hope in God's ultimate disclosure as king. The Targums use the phrase chiefly to convey that eschatological hope (Targum of Isaiah 24.23; 31.4; 40.9; 52.7). The early (perhaps first-century CE) prayer known as the Kaddish also refers to the kingdom in that sense: "May He make his kingdom reign in your lifetime!" Later rabbinic texts conventionally use the phrase "kingdom of the heavens," as in Matthew. No difference in meaning is implied by replacing the word "God" or "Lord"; "heavens" appears to be a reverential periphrasis. In most rabbinic texts, however, the kingdom appears less as an eschatological than as a moral concept; the language refers to accepting God as one's king (by reciting the *Shema) rather than to readying oneself for his rule.

The preaching of Jesus is far closer to eschatological expectation than to the moral emphasis of later rabbis. Although, in Jesus' thinking, the kingdom "has come near" (Mark 1.15), or has made itself available (Luke 16.16 par.; Matt. 12.28; par.), it was part of his programmatic prayer that the kingdom's coming should be sought (Matt. 6.10 par.). Care must be taken, however, to do justice to Jesus' distinctiveness as a *rabbi or teacher as well as to his context within Judaism. By speaking of the kingdom, Jesus adopted the language of scripture (as used in synagogues) and of prayer and made that language his own. The kingdom in his preaching was not merely promised but announced as a divine activity that demanded repentance and that could be entered into by participating in its divine force. That stance is represented not only by the programmatic descriptions of his teaching but also by the parables. Those that involve images of growth or process (Mark 4.26–29; Matt. 13.24–30, 31–33 par.) particularly insist that the kingdom must not be limited to any single temporality, be it present or future. Such limitation would betray the dynamic unfolding such parables are designed to convey. For that reason, to describe the kingdom in Jesus' expectation as apocalyptic, in the sense of an anticipated calendar of divine unveilings in which God's rule can be dated, is misleading. The dearth of references to the kingdom in *apocalyptic literature undermines that position, and much of the teaching attributed to Jesus militates against it (Luke 17.20, 21; cf. Matt. 24.36 par.; Acts 1.7, in addition to passages cited above).

A last element of Jesus' theology of the kingdom must be mentioned, which also tells against an apocalyptic construal of his message. Jesus' teaching was not simply futuristic in its eschatological orientation; he was also known as an ethical teacher (cf. Matt. 22.34–40; Mark 12.28–34; Luke 10.25–28). Many of his parables show how, within his vision of a single kingdom, Jesus could be both expectant of the future and demanding in the present. Parables of growth or process involve expectant readiness as the appropriate attitude toward the climax (Mark 4.29; Matt. 13.30; 13.32b, c par.; 13.33d par.); a king or lord who invites people to a banquet expects those invited to be prepared (Matt. 22.8, 9, 11, 12; Luke 14.24; cf. Matt. 8.11, 12 par.); even absent rulers anticipate their subjects' willing obedience during their absence (Matt. 25.1–13; 14–30; Luke 12.35–38; 17.7–10; 19.11–27). The ethical themes implicit in such parables make sense once one appreciates that Jesus conveys by them a self-disclosing kingdom whose focus is irreducibly future and whose implications are pressingly present. Just as his claim to speak on behalf of that kingdom is perhaps the most obvious root of Christology, so his message gave to the movement that succeeded him a characteristic attitude of expectancy in respect of the future and, consequently, of responsibility within the present. BRUCE D. CHILTON

Kingdom of Heaven. See Kingdom of God.

Kings, The Books of. The perception of the Greek translation of the Hebrew Bible (the *Septuagint) is that the first and second books of *Samuel and of Kings should be regarded as four books of "Kingdoms," and a similar understanding of them appears in Jerome's view that they constitute four books of "Kings." They deal with the history of the monarchy from its inception and throughout its course. The narrative recounts the false starts beginning with *Saul; the achievement of a united kingdom under *David; the division of the kingdom under Rehoboam; and thereafter the record of two separate lines of kings until the northern kingdom disappears in 722 BCE. The history up to 587/586 BCE then focuses on Judean kings.

Summary of Contents. After a detailed treatment of *Solomon's reign, an account of the circumstances in which the kingdom was divided and the early history of the two kingdoms, the emphasis falls on the northern kingdom (Israel); *Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, enters the narrative only insofar as he is associated with *Ahab (1 Kings 22) and Jehoram (2 Kings 3) in military enterprises. This latter section, which extends from 1 Kings 16.29 to 2 Kings 10.36, predominates in the books of Kings. The first part of it is taken up with the conflict between *Elijah and Ahab, the second with *Elisha's involvement in the overthrow of the house of Omri and his connection with *Jehu. A narrative of the downfall of Athaliah, a Judean counterpart of Ahab (2 Kings 11) is followed by a series of short records of kings of Israel and Judah. After the final collapse of the northern kingdom has been described, there is a transition to kings of Judah: *Hezekiah, who is praised for suppressing the *high places (2 Kings 18); *Manasseh, who is roundly condemned; and *Josiah, in whom special interest is shown, for he is portrayed as an ideal king. The final kings of Judah and the circumstances of their reigns are then reviewed, and the history ends with the fall of *Jerusalem to the *Babylonians under *Nebuchadrezzar.

The Compiler and his Criterion. Josiah is represented (2 Kings 22.1–23.30) as having suppressed all cultic centers of Yahwistic worship within his borders, on the grounds that they were infested with *idolatry, and to have concentrated the worship of Yahweh in the Jerusalem *Temple, as the only legitimate cultic site. This criterion is adopted by the compiler of 1 and 2 Kings. Consequently, when he deals with the reign of Josiah, the compiler has reached the heart of his own convictions; since the aims of the Josianic reformation correlate with some or all of the book of *Deuteronomy's contents, he is revealed as a historian belonging to the Deuteronomic school.

Apart from applying his criterion, which he does by means of introductory and concluding formulae attached to accounts of individual reigns, the Deuteronomic compiler does not interfere much with his sources. He uses this material in order to achieve his effects, but only occasionally does he compose in the interests of his Deuteronomic interpretation of the history of the monarchy in Israel and Judah. For example, the narrative concerning the reform of Josiah may be the compiler's own composition, as also may be the account of the fall of Jerusalem in 587/586 BCE (2 Kings 25). A difference in style has been detected between the narrative of the finding of the book of the law and its effects (2 Kings 22.3–23.3, 9, 21–25), on the one hand, and the narrative of the cultic and political measures initiated by Josiah (23.4–8, 10, 15, 19–20), on the other; it has been supposed that the latter derives from a different source, namely the Book of the Annals of the Kings of Judah (see below).

1 Kings 8 been widely regarded as a case of intervention by the Deuteronomic compiler, for in it Solomon, whose preparation for the building and furnishing of the Temple, with Tyrian cooperation, is described at length (1 Kings 5–7), appears to take on some of the features of Josiah. He is portrayed as presiding over a great religious festival in connection with the Jerusalem Temple's completion and legitimation by dint of the *ark's installation—the ark before which he stood and sacrificed in Jerusalem after the *theophany at Gibeon (1 Kings 3.15). As with the Deuteronomic view of this cult object, it is described as "the ark of the covenant" and is regarded as essentially a container for the stone tablets of the Law. Solomon is drawn as a man of great piety, full of noble religious sentiments and capable of giving utterance to a great prayer. Other compositions by the Deuteronomic compiler in this section of the books of Kings have been detected at 1 Kings 3.2–3, 14 and 11.1–13.

The Compiler's Sources. The sources on which the compiler of 1 and 2 Kings is said to have relied are given as the Book of the Acts of Solomon (1 Kings 11.41), the Book of the Annals of the Kings of Israel (e.g., at 1 Kings 14.19), and the Book of the Annals of the Kings of Judah (e.g., at 1 Kings 14.29). The Solomonic source has a different Hebrew title, and, judging from 1 Kings 11.41, it contains a variety of material and is not correctly described as either "annals" or "chronicles." The expression "Now the rest of the acts of Solomon, all that he did as well as his wisdom" (1 Kings 11.41) suggests that the source contained both annalistic and nonannalistic material (legends and sagas). Examples of the latter are the dream at Gibeon (1 Kings 3.4–15), the Solomonic judgment (3.16–28), and the visit of the Queen of *Sheba (10.1–10,13). The "Book of the Acts of Solomon" was perhaps itself a composite that had been gathered together from other sources.

The other two sources are thought by some to have been essentially annalistic in character, records of particular reigns, registers of achievements, or calendars of events. If they had this form rather than that of a fully articulated historical narrative, there is a great deal in 1 and 2 Kings that could not be fitted into them. In any case, whatever precise literary form these chronicles or annals of the kings of Israel and Judah took, prophetic stories (in which the context is not in any sense royal and national, and which are especially associated with Elijah and Elisha) must be disengaged from them. Nor can we suppose that royal archives are a source for the account of the conflict between Elijah and Ahab or the episode of Naboth's vineyard and the murder of Naboth arranged by *Jezebel, nor for the interventions of Elisha in the wars against *Aram, where he appears as a national savior and his miraculous powers are heavily emphasized. The sources used by the Deuteronomic compiler were diverse and his criterion was not applied so stringently that he shaped all of them into a homogeneous whole. He is not so consumed with his narrow criterion of acceptability that he does not allow his sources to speak with different voices and to indicate concern for other and broader issues.

The Framework Formulae. The compiler's narrowness, however, is particularly evident in the introductory and concluding formulae that bracket the accounts of individual reigns of kings of Israel and Judah. Apart from affording him an opportunity to assess each reign with an introductory formula, these formulae record the accession of individual kings, indicate death and burial, and provide a synchronic *chronology relating the accession of the kings of Israel and Judah.

This chronological element has raised the question whether the formulae in their entirety are the creation of the Deuteronomic compiler or whether he is using a preexisting source comparable to the "Synchronic History" recovered from the library of Ashurbanipal, which correlates events of Babylonian and Assyrian history. The first complete example of these formulae occurs for Rehoboam (1 Kings 14.21–24, 29–31); note that the source is referred to in the conclusion. The concluding formula is missing for Joram and Ahaziah (2 Kings 9.22–28), and the introductory formula is missing for Jehu (2 Kings 10.34–36). Both are lacking for Athaliah (2 Kings 11), and the conclusion is omitted for kings violently deposed: Jehoahaz (2 Kings 23.31–34); Jehoiachin (2 Kings 23.8–17); *Zedekiah (2 Kings 24.18–25.21).

Date of Composition. What is immediately striking about the criterion is its apparently anachronistic character. Insofar as the criterion derives from the Josianic reformation and its program, and therefore could not have been formulated before this event or series of events, it gives us some indication of the date of the Deuteronomic compilation of the books of Kings. One might attempt to date the work more precisely by appealing to individual passages, but the results thus achieved must be treated with reserve: we should not assume that the history is all of a piece, or that it was created in its entirety at one time by a single compiler.

More than this, for reasons that have been indicated, we should not expect reliable consistency from a compilation of this kind and so should not appeal to a single passage in order to reach conclusions about the date of the whole. Thus, because there is a passage (2 Kings 22.20) in which the disastrous death of Josiah at *Megiddo in 609 BCE apparently lies in an unforeseen future should not lead us to conclude that the work must have been completed before that date. Nor does the fact that the work closes with reference to an event that took place in 566 BCE demonstrate that the entire compilation cannot be earlier than that. If, however, we suppose that the *Deuteronomic history contained in 1 and 2 Kings was already under way during Josiah's reign, we have to conclude that there was a subsequent supplement that brought it down to the fall of Jerusalem in 587/586 BCE, and we should then also suppose that 2 Kings 25.27–30 is a final postscript about the fate of Jehoiachin in *exile.

Interpreting the Criterion. The stringent application of the criterion is especially difficult to accept in relation to Israelite kings (as opposed to Judean kings). Too much should not be made of its anachronistic character, though, or, in stressing its apparent illogic, we might lose sight of the endeavor to understand the point of view it represents. The Deuteronomic historian regards the centralization of worship not as a new departure in the reign of Josiah but as the restoration of an ancient legitimacy. That is why the Jerusalem cult features so prominently in the account given of Solomon's reign. Before the Temple was built "he sacrificed and offered incense at the high places" (1 Kings 3.3), and it is only in his old age (so it is represented), under the influence of his foreign wives, that he becomes an idolater (1 Kings 11.1–13). Further, his political failures, which led to the division of the kingdom, are traced to his idolatry (1 Kings 11.14–25).

From this point of view, the division into two kingdoms, a political breach, had idolatry as an inevitable consequence. The political schism can then only have disastrous consequences for Yahwism: the kings of the northern part of Israel do not have Jerusalem within their territory and will set up what they regard as legitimate Yahwistic sanctuaries, which in the Deuteronomic view constitutes idolatrous worship. The narrow point, however, must be widened, otherwise the narrative would become unbearably tedious. It is made against the first of these kings who founded what he supposed to be legitimate Yahwistic sanctuaries at Bethel and *Dan (1 Kings 12.30). The "man of God" who is represented as raising his voice against the sanctuary at Bethel, while Jeroboam is sacrificing at its altar, is expressing a Deuteronomist view (1 Kings 13.1–3).

Ahab and his successors of the house of Omri are charged with a different kind of idolatry. Ahab, on whom attention is especially focused, permits Jezebel, his Tyrian wife, to establish a cult of the Tyrian *Baal in his capital city of *Samaria (compare the case of Solomon and his foreign wives). Hence, what is involved is the importation of the cult of a foreign god into Israel; although this is distinguishable from a contravention of the law of the single sanctuary, it is no doubt regarded as an aggravation of this offense (1 Kings 16.31–33). It is this contest between Yahweh and Baal which is dramatized in 1 Kings 18, where Elijah confronts Ahab and issues his challenge in the name of Yahweh. Elijah's miraculous victory over the prophets of Baal and *Asherah is enhanced by the fact that the wood that has been set alight had been saturated with water; he then acts as a rainmaker, putting an end to the drought he enforced at his first appearance (1 Kings 17.1). Jehu, by whom foreign gods were expelled, and who is Yahwistic in his religion, politics, and cultural preferences, is condemned in terms of the law of the single sanctuary, as he was bound to be insofar as he maintained the cult of Yahweh within his own territory (2 Kings 10.31).

Elijah and Elisha Narratives. The narratives concerned with the conflict between *Elijah and Ahab (1 Kings 18; 19; 21) cannot be satisfactorily interpreted on the assumption that they deal simply with an idolatry whose existence is established by the application of a narrow criterion of religious orthodoxy. We are confronted here with a criticism of a royal regime and style of life that are morally and culturally alien and unacceptable: they cannot be reconciled with the ethos of the Israelite community and its social institutions. The excavation of *Samaria has revealed a grandeur of architecture not achieved by Ahab's predecessors, which certainly is another mark of Tyrian influence (cf. 1 Kings 5).

The story of Naboth's vineyard (1 Kings 21) focuses on a clash between Ahab's royal desires and Naboth's sense of the inalienability of his ancestral land. The way in which this is delineated is not totally unsympathetic to Ahab: he does not simply confiscate Naboth's land with a display of crude power; rather, he offers what he regards as a fair price and is distressed when Naboth refuses to bargain with him. Even so, the fact that he is represented as making an offer indicates the distance between him and an older set of Israelite social values, which separated family land from the marketplace and assumed an abiding connection between the continuation and well-being of the family and its land possessions. The villain of the piece is Jezebel, for whom a peasant's resistance to the will of the king is incomprehensible, and who removes the opposition by poisoning justice at its source and disguising murderous oppressiveness with a bogus legal process. We meet here a foreign *queen who not only has established the worship of her gods in Israel but also, utterly lacking insight into Israelite social values, holds in contempt the right of her subjects to equality under the law.

The legal aspect of this is especially interesting, because there are other passages in the books of Samuel and Kings that emphasize the special responsibility of the king to ensure that justice is done to his subjects. *Absalom fastens on to David's neglect of these matters as a prime source of public discontent (2 Sam. 15.1–6), and in connection with the praise of Solomon's wisdom his legal acumen is particularly illustrated (1 Kings 3.16–28). The relation in respect of motif between 2 Samuel 12.1–7 and 1 Kings 20.35–43 should not be missed (the latter passage stands apart from the other contents of 1 Kings 20 and 22). In both these passages, a king is appealed to as supreme legal authority and he gives a verdict in which he unknowingly passes sentence on himself (cf. 2 Sam. 14).

In a more private context, Elijah is represented as a solitary *prophet who works miracles for a widow of Zarephath, providing for her and her son when they are on the edge of starvation, and who subsequently restores the dead child to life (1 Kings 17.8–24). He is a marvelous provider and life-giver, but he is also a destroyer who calls up fire to consume soldiers sent by Ahaziah to take him, and he comes into the king's presence and tells him that he will die because he has asked guidance from *Baal-zebub, god of Ekron (2 Kings 1.9–17). He runs with such great speed that he can keep up with horse and chariot (1 Kings 18.46), but he is also a prophet who loses heart and who encounters God not in what are usually portrayed as the majestic accompaniments of a *theophany but as a "still small voice" (1 Kings 19.12: AV; NRSV: "sound of sheer silence").

Two chapters stand somewhat apart from the narratives that have just been described, even though prophets play a part in both of them (1 Kings 20.1–34; 22). The motif of provocative behavior by a king of Aram in order to provide a pretext for aggression against Israel (1 Kings 20) is repeated at 2 Kings 5, in connection with the cure of Naaman's leprosy by *Elisha. In 1 Kings 20.1–34, Ahab is portrayed as conciliatory but firm, as capable of proverbial aptness (v. 11), as adopting the strategy advised by a prophet and as magnanimous in victory. Although his conflict with Micaiah, and so with a true prophetic word, is an important factor in 1 Kings 22, the account is not informed with marked animus against him, except at v. 38, where his death is linked to a prophecy uttered against him by Elijah (1 Kings 21.19). Ahab and Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, are allies in an attempt to wrest Ramoth-gilead from Aram, an attempt that ends disastrously. In the Septuagint, 1 Kings 21 follows chap. 19, and chap. 22, which is separated from chap. 20 in the Hebrew text and the English versions, is continuous with it.

Only when he is associated with Elisha is Elijah drawn into the context of prophetic communities (2 Kings 2): there is an audience of fifty prophets and Elijah is addressed by Elisha as "father," that is, perhaps, as leader of a prophetic community who is to be succeeded by Elisha. But it is Elisha's connections with prophetic communities, perhaps at Bethel, *Jericho, and Gilgal (2 Kings 2.1–4), which are more firmly established (2 Kings 4.1–7, 38–41, 42–44; 6.1–7); and although the anointing of Hazael of *Damascus and Jehu are attributed to both Elijah (1 Kings 19.15–18) and Elisha (2 Kings 8.7–9.13), it is Elisha's involvement in political intrigue which is more evident. He lends his prophetic authority to the coup d'état by which Jehu overthrows the house of Ahab, and to the bloodbath that disposes of Jehoram, Jezebel, all the members of the royal family, and all the practitioners of Jezebel's cult (2 Kings 9.14–10.14).

Nevertheless, Elisha is represented as having used his miraculous powers to assist a king of the house of Ahab (Jehoram) in his wars against *Moab (2 Kings 3.4–27) and Aram (2 Kings 6.8–7.19), and on his deathbed he teaches Jehoash, of the line of Jehu, how to work magic against Aram (2 Kings 13.14–19). There are unpleasant features about the portrayal of Elisha: his powers can be malevolent (for example, when he calls up bears to destroy some boys who had called him names; 2 Kings 2.23–25) or sensational (he brings an axe head that had sunk in the Jordan to the surface and makes it float; 2 Kings 6.1–7). This happens in the course of building extensions to a prophetic community, and other miracles have a similar context: a flask of oil is multiplied into a great supply (2 Kings 4.7); Elisha counteracts poison in a communal pot (2 Kings 4.38–41); he feeds a company of a hundred with twenty barley loaves and fresh ears of grain (2 Kings 4.42–44). It is in the setting of a family whose hospitality he has enjoyed that he puts an end to the sterility of the Shunammite woman and then restores her child to life after he dies in the harvest field (2 Kings 4.8–37; cf. 1 Kings 17.8–24).

Conclusion. The contents of 1 and 2 Kings are varied, and there are many topics that are not narrowly related to the law of the single sanctuary. This criterion influences the portrayal of Solomon, and it is influential in the view taken of Hezekiah and, above all, Josiah. The praise of Hezekiah is mixed with a criticism of his behavior during the visit to Jerusalem of Merodach-baladan, king of Babylon (2 Kings 20.12–19). Approval of other Judean kings is mingled with the criticism that they failed the acid test by not suppressing the high places: Asa (1 Kings 15.11–15); Jehoshaphat (1 Kings 22.43–44); Amaziah (2 Kings 14.3–4); Azariah (2 Kings 15.3–4); Jotham (2 Kings 15.34–35). The final kings of Judah, with whom the disaster of exile is linked, are condemned: *Zedekiah did what was wrong in the eyes of the Lord as Jehoiakim had done. Jerusalem and Judah so angered the Lord that in the end he banished them from his sight (2 Kings 24.19–20).

See also Israel, History of; Judah, The Kingdom of; Kingship and Monarchy.

WILLIAM MCKANE

Kingship and Monarchy. Ancient Near Eastern texts almost unanimously presuppose the institution of kingship as a social organizing principle. Kingship in Mesopotamia is "lowered from heaven" or is coeval with *creation. The Assyrian King List, for example, can hypothesize a time when kings "lived in tents," but not a time before kingship. The image of the "first man" as the "image of God" and as lord over creation (Gen. 1.26–28) is not unrelated: YHWH is often portrayed in Israelite literature and iconography in solar terms; just as the sun, the "major" astral body, "rules" over the sky (Gen. 1.16–18), just as YHWH rules over creation, so the relationship between humanity and the world is modeled as one of royal domination from the very outset.

Near Eastern myths, too, principally portray the order of divine organization as monarchic. *Egyptian, Greek, *Hittite, *Ugaritic, and Mesopotamian myths all recount tales of martial conflict whereby one of the gods emerges as their king. In most instances, the monarchic order is portrayed as an innovation, replacing an earlier paternal domination of children. Interestingly, in the cases of Mesopotamian and Greek myth, the new kingship is functionally elective: the pantheon appoint a king-elect from among their number, to lead them into battle; the appointee wins the battle; and, as a result, the appointee wins confirmation on the throne. The royal ideal is thus one of elective autocracy. In Babylonian myth, the winning of the throne is also the starting point for the creation of the cosmos, which is the foundation for the heavenly structure that serves as the high god's palace, the counterpart of his earthly temple.

Kings and other administrators in the ancient Near East regularly portray themselves, like the state gods, as champions of the weak and the oppressed. The king was the upholder of the social order—much like the divine king who resisted the threats and encroachments of *chaos. But fixing the social order, to judge from Mesopotamian law codes, involved attempting to fix prices and attempting to ensure the inviolability of property. It also involved occasional amnesties, and general release from debt. Ultimately, the king presented himself as the personification and defender of what was just, the supreme judicial authority.

Near Eastern kingship was overwhelmingly an urban phenomenon. Cities lent themselves to monarchic organization precisely because of the complexity of administration involved. Kings took responsibility for, and pride in, the fortification of towns: the *Gilgamesh Epic ends with a return to the subject of the mighty walls of Uruk, which were the hero's immortality. Kings thus enjoyed the right not to tax, but to direct corvée and conscription for the public good—for defense, conquest, and the construction of irrigation and navigation systems.

Claiming the right to govern by divine election, kings also relate their temple-building activities. The completion of a temple is modeled by them as a mundane repetition of the heavenly creation myth. The building of a temple also is taken as a sign of the gods' imprimatur on the builder's royal dynasty. Likewise, the New Year ritual in *Babylon, and, later, in *Assyria, combines a rehearsal of the creation myth with a renewal of the high god's temple: the king leads the high god in procession to reoccupy the temple, and at the same time renews his own kingship, after a ritual battle against *chaos. The king consistently presents himself as warrior, builder, creator, favorite, even adoptee of the gods.

Israelite conceptions of kingship reflect both continuity with, and departure from, earlier traditions. For one thing, earliest Israel was decidedly nonurban, consisting of small agricultural settlements principally in the central hill country, Transjordan, and the upper Galilee. It is impossible to identify any major urban center as Israelite before *David's conquest of *Jerusalem. Israelite monarchy, therefore, originated as a national monarchy, not as a city-state kingship. Correspondingly, Israel is the only ancient Near Eastern culture to have preserved written memories of a time before the evolution of kingship or to have constructed any account of a transition from what later tradition would construe as a theocracy to monarchic organization. (There were, however, periods when Assyrian kings presented themselves as stewards of the gods, rather than as kings, and early *Sumerian kings adopted the same recourse.)

In this connection, a number of Israelite texts express reservations about the institution of kingship—a sentiment elsewhere unparalleled. Offered a dynasty, for example, the premonarchic warrior *Gideon makes the paradigmatic reply, "I will not rule over you, and my son will not rule over you; YHWH will rule over you" (Judg. 8.24). Although the text proceeds to condemn Gideon for appropriating priestly status and constructing an *ephod (Judg. 8.24–27), similar sentiments recur in an account of the transition to monarchy (1 Sam. 8.4–20; 10.19; 12.12): the urge to enthrone a human king conflicts on this theory with the ideal of YHWH's kingship over Israel (and Hos. 13.10).

Scholars for the most part find two sources underlying the account of the origins of Israelite kingship in 1 Samuel 8–12, but differ about their precise delineation. Nevertheless, both sources seem to replicate the pattern for divine kingship: in one (1 Sam. 8; 10.17–27; 11; 12), *Saul is elected king with YHWH's approval, defeats *Ammon, and is confirmed as king; in the other (1 Sam. 9.1–10.16; 13–14), Saul is anointed king-designate, defeats the *Philistines, and is said to have "captured the kingship" (1 Sam. 14.47). There is a homology with YHWH's kingship over Israel, said to have originated in his election in order to bring Israel out of Egypt and into *Canaan, and confirmed at the completion of the *Exodus (Exod. 3.16–17; 6.7–8; 19–23); the same pattern already occurs in the Song of the Sea (Exod. 15; twelfth–eleventh century BCE), where YHWH's perpetual kingship and acquisition of a shrine (Exod. 15.18) is predicated on his defeat of Egypt and the establishment of Israel in Canaan.

Numerous psalms follow the same pattern, praising YHWH as the creator or as the victor in some cosmic or mundane martial conflict, in the context of the celebration of his kingship. Likewise, the book of *Judges describes the pattern of mundane leadership in terms of a leader's election by YHWH, defeat of a threat or oppressor, and assumption of administrative power (Judg. 2.11–19; 3.7–12.7). And the books of Samuel-Kings let the same myth inform their historiography: kings whose succession is irregular win battles or overcome obstacles and threats, before their accession formulary (that is, their historiographic confirmation on the throne) appears. The "myth of the Divine Warrior" regularly informs Israelite views of mundane, as well as divine, leadership.

Other Near Eastern conceptions of kingship are equally pervasive among the Israelites. The first Israelite kings eschewed temple-building, no doubt out of deference to their constituents' distributed and varied cultic traditions. David did bring a central icon, the *ark, to his capital. But *Solomon was the first to build a temple, and in the capital, which articulated claims of an eternal Davidic dynasty—as well as claims that Solomon, and the later Davidides, are sons of YHWH, entrants into the court of the divine king (see Son of God). Notably, the Israelite kingdom established by Jeroboam by secession from the kingship of Solomon's successor prescinded from establishing its cultic centers in the political capital. Yet the leader of the secession, Jeroboam, was moved to erect cultic establishments at Bethel and *Dan to establish himself, too, as a temple builder (see Golden Calf). His actions implied independence from *Judah yet disavowed any unchangeable divine election of his dynasty. When Omri's son, *Ahab, later erected a temple in *Samaria, his capital, the same dynamic was in effect. The revolutionary, *Jehu, destroyed the temple in the capital, ensuring a separation of capital and temple in the northern kingdom for the rest of its duration.

In the Israelite ideal, the king is one nominated (or anointed) by YHWH, by prophetic means, and adopted by the people—YHWH proposes and the people dispose. But the opportunity exists, in the aftermath of divine designation, for popular elements responsible for confirming the king to impose conditions on the king's sovereignty. The operation of this principle is evident in 1 Kings 12, where the Israelites propose to elect Rehoboam as their king, on the condition that he lower taxes. Rehoboam refuses; the people therefore reject him as king, and elect Jeroboam. Similarly, both David (2 Sam. 2.4–9; 5.1–3) and *Absalom (2 Sam. 15.1–12) campaign for election; David actually campaigns for reelection after Absalom's revolt (2 Sam. 19.10–44). Although elements of the royal establishment laid claim to a perpetual divine dynastic grant (Ps. 89), even the laws of Deuteronomy 17.14–20 acknowledge that kingship, given divine nomination of the candidate, was elective. In practice, this often meant that the king was made by army democracy—as in the cases of Solomon, Baasha, Omri, Jehu, Uzziah, and others.

The laws of Deuteronomy 17–18 also attempt to limit the king's latitude in forming policy. They limit priesthood to "*Levites," install Levitic priests as the supreme judiciary, and protect the institution of *prophecy. They further attempt to restrict the king's ability to accumulate wealth. Scholars concur that the Deuteronomic law code is late in origin. Still, the attempt to limit the ability to tax, the urge to restrict the king's right to disenfranchise priesthoods, the urge to protect *prophets (Deut. 18.18–22; 1 Kings 22.26–28; Jer. 26.16) all reflect traditional ideals and rural views of central governmental authority.

Notwithstanding popular resistance to royal encroachments on the economy in particular, Israelite kings enjoyed the power both to tax (1 Kings 4.7–19; 12; 2 Kings 15.20; 23.35) and to conscript for warfare (2 Sam. 20.4) and for public works (1 Kings 5.27–30; 11.28; cf. 9.22). Moreover, archaeological remains at important towns, such as *Megiddo and *Hazor, indicate that the kings projected their power into the countryside in the form of massive fortifications and impressive public buildings. To date, this phenomenon is less well represented in the Israelite heartland, the hill country. However, starting in the tenth century BCE, and accelerating in the eighth century, public buildings are constructed in proximity to the gate complexes of some urban centers, such as Tell Beit Mirsim, *Lachish, and Tell el-Farʿah (biblical Tirzah).

In the same period, increasing royal intervention in local economies is documented by the standardization of *weights, and probably, by indications of incipient industrialization, as at the site of Horvat Rosh Zayit, inland from Akko. And, at the end of the eighth century, *Hezekiah of Judah was able to concentrate the rural population of his kingdom in a set of fortresses.

There had always been some tension between the royal establishment and the kinship structures—the rural lineages—which were the seat of succession and conflict resolution before the monarchy and continued to function as such after the introduction of kingship. Early on, the state acknowledged an interest in restricting the feud (2 Sam. 14.11), one of the nonstate forms of conflict resolution in the society. But as the revolt of Absalom ended with the complete triumph of the professional royal army over the irregulars of the countryside, central control could be asserted over not only the succession but other aspects of statecraft as well. As early as the time of Solomon, a system of royal administrators was set in place for the purpose of extracting taxation and corvée (1 Kings 4.7–19; 11.28), bypassing traditional tribal forms of organization. It is likely that Jeroboam and the later kings of the northern kingdom undid this innovation; the Samaria ostraca furnish evidence of at least dabblings in a system of such administrators only in the eighth century (one group of ostraca reflects administration through the lineages at that time). However, even the lineage heads through whom some kings administered taxation would have been royal appointees in some sense, and certainly familiars of the establishment (see 2 Sam. 19.32–41).

It was only in the seventh century, after Hezekiah's emergency urbanization, that the monarchy achieved complete domination over the lineages. The urban geography of that era in Judah (Israel having been deported) reflects the resettlement of Judah, after its depopulation by Assyria in 701 BCE, by state orchestration. Gone are the extended-family compounds that characterize Israelite settlements until the late eighth century. Gone are the large, rambling settlements of that earlier era. Instead, the state, and the kingship, were able to stamp the ideals of the royal cult, the Jerusalem *Temple, onto the country as a whole, resulting in a policy, under *Josiah, of centralization of worship and of power. This development, and the disappearance of the monarchy in the restoration community (538 BCE), paved the way for the detachment of the monarchic ideology from its origins in relations with the agrarian hinterlands of the capital. In the Second Temple period, the idea of YHWH's anointed—the *messiah, notionally a son of YHWH—was transferred from the human king whose election was a matter of negotiation and limitation, to a future king, not wholly human, whose reign would usher in a regime of justice, of the defense of the oppressed, and of requital of the guilty. In the myth of a kingless postexilic Judah, the old, high ideals of Near Eastern kingship took renewed hold, without the brake of political realities to restrain the ambitions or the imaginings of their adherents.

See also Queen and Queen Mother.

BARUCH HALPERN

Kiss. Biblical occurrences of "kiss" can be classified into three groups. First, reference to the kiss as a romantic *gesture is found in the *Song of Solomon (1.2; 7.9; 8.1).

Second, the kiss appears most frequently as a sign of greeting, such as *Joseph kissing his brothers (Gen. 45.15), *Aaron kissing *Moses in the wilderness (Exodus 4.27), and the prodigal son being kissed by his father (Luke 15.20). Several New Testament letters conclude with an admonition to greet one another with a holy kiss (Rom. 16.16; 1 Cor. 16.20; 2 Cor. 13.12; 1 Thess. 5.26) or a kiss of love (1 Pet. 5.14). Kissing can also be part of a ritual. Examples include the *anointing of *Saul by *Samuel (1 Sam. 10.1) and the anointing of Jesus by the woman of Bethany (Luke 7.38).

Third, a kiss can also be a sign of dishonesty and treachery. *Jacob gives a kiss as part of his deception of *Isaac (Gen. 27.26–27), and Joab kisses Amasa while killing him (2 Sam. 20.9–10). Proverbs 27.6 advises that "profuse are the kisses of an enemy," and *Judas betrays Jesus with a kiss (Mark 14.45–46; Matt. 26.48–49; Luke 2.47–48).

DANIEL N. SCHOWALTER

Know. The biblical Hebrew verb most commonly translated "to know" is *yāda*ᶜ. Besides the neutral or secular sense of being aware of or acquainted with (Gen. 30.26; Num. 11.16; Deut. 2.7; Josh. 2.9; 1 Sam. 28.24; Job 42.11), the verb and its derivatives have a complex range of meanings.

Knowledge becomes a biblical topic as early as Genesis 2.9 with the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. The tree's name is probably a merismus, a literary device to describe the totality of something by naming the first and the last in its semantic spectrum (here, the full range of knowledge).

In Genesis 4.1, sexual knowledge comes from *Adam and *Eve's experience of the greatest possible intimacy, namely *sexual intercourse. The verb in this sense may have either a man or a woman as its subject (Gen. 4.1; 19.8; Num. 31.17; cf. Matt. 1.25), includes *homosexual intercourse (Gen 19.5), and can occasionally signify rape (of women and men: Gen. 19.5, 8; Judg. 19.22, 25).

The organ of knowledge is the heart (Jer. 24.7; Ps. 49.3), which suggests that knowledge is experiential and not merely speculative. One knows war (Judg. 3.2) or God's displeasure (Num. 14.34) by experiencing it. Yahweh's special relationship with *Moses is described as knowing Moses face to face (Deut. 34.10; cf. Exod. 33). While *Samuel certainly knows who Yahweh is, he does not know God until he experiences a *theophany (1 Sam. 3.7).

Yahweh wants to be known, reaching out to Israel by revelatory acts, most importantly delivering Israel from Egyptian slavery (Exod. 1–15) and by joining with Israel in the theophanic *covenant ceremony at *Sinai (Exod. 19; 24). In biblical terminology, the response to *revelation is knowledge; knowledge is akin to what elsewhere might be called *faith.

Beginning in the book of Exodus (see especially 6.1–7), the motif of knowing Yahweh becomes a dominant biblical theme, recurring especially in Deuteronomy, Hosea (who deliberately blurs the sexual and religious meanings of knowing to illustrate God's closeness to Israel), Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel. Knowledge and knowing in this case have a technical connection to the language of covenant-making. Hosea 4.1–6 equates knowledge with keeping the covenant laws, the *Ten Commandments: Yahweh will reject those who reject knowledge. Isaiah 5.12–13 warns that *exile, a covenant curse (Lev. 26.33), is the consequence of lack of knowledge. In Jeremiah's famous "new covenant" oracle, Yahweh declares that the law will be written on all hearts and "all shall know me" (Jer. 31.31–34).

In the New Testament, the revealed Christ becomes the source of the knowledge of God, a theme developed most notably in the gospel of John (1.10; 14.7) and in Paul's letters (Eph. 3.4–6; Phil. 3.8–11).

See also Gnosticism.

MARY JOAN WINN LEITH

Koheleth. See Ecclesiastes, The Book of.

Koran. See Qur'ān and the Bible, The.

L

Lachish (Map 1:W5). Modern Tell ed-Duweir, one of the major fortified cities in Israel in the second and first millennia BCE. It has been the focus of several excavations, which have both illuminated and been illuminated by its frequent mention in written and pictorial sources. In biblical traditions, Lachish features prominently in accounts of the *conquest (Josh. 10), and as *Sennacherib's headquarters for his campaign against Judah in 701 BCE; its capture by the Assyrian king is depicted in detail in reliefs from *Nineveh.

Among the most significant discoveries at the site are the Lachish ostraca. In the excavations of J. L. Starcky in the mid 1930s, eighteen inscribed potsherds, apparently military dispatches, were discovered in the ashy debris of a room in the city's gate. They are dated to the final months of the kingdom of *Judah. Their servile tone—for example, "who is your servant but a dog" (cf 1 Sam. 24.15; 2 Sam. 9.8; 2 Kings 8.13)—shows that they were sent from an inferior to a superior, presumably the garrison commander. Letter 3 briefly reports on a mission to *Egypt and alludes to an unnamed prophet who delivered a letter of warning from a royal official. The most famous, Letter 4, ends in pathos: "We are looking for the signals of Lachish, according to all the indications my lord has given, because we do not see Azekah." This letter must have been written just after Jeremiah 34.1–5, an oracle of doom and comfort delivered by the prophet to King *Zedekiah "when the army of the king of Babylon was fighting against Jerusalem and against all the cities of Judah that were left, Lachish and Azekah; for these were the only fortified cities of Judah that remained" (Jer. 34.7). Soon, in 587/586 BCE, *Nebuchadrezzar would take *Jerusalem and raze the *Temple. The Lachish ostraca are valuable to paleographers, since they can be precisely dated, but their chief importance is as mementos of a tragic era in Israelite history.

WILLIAM H. PROPP

Lamb of God. Lambs, being common in the Near East, were one of the most usual sacrificial animals in ancient Israel. Twice per day a lamb was slaughtered in the *Temple (Exod. 29.38–42); a lamb could be offered as a sin offering (Lev. 4.32); each family annually slaughtered a paschal lamb for *Passover (Exod. 12). Thus, the lamb is often a biblical symbol of meekness, obedience, and the need for protection (Isa. 40.11; 53.7; 2 Sam. 12.1–6). In *apocalyptic language, though—probably as an expression of the final victory promised by God to the elect despite their weakness—the lamb is occasionally a conquering figure that is to overcome all the evil beasts that symbolize sin and revolt against God (Testament of Joseph 19.8; 1 Enoch 90.38). Some scholars think that *John the Baptist, as an apocalyptic preacher (Matt. 3.1–12 par.) who announced the one who was mightier than he, may have applied the title "the Lamb of God" to this mysterious person in that sense, whatever nuances later Christian interpretations may have added (John 1.29, 36). The apocalyptic writer of the book of *Revelation used the Greek word arnion, meaning lamb, twenty-eight times to describe the risen Christ as ruler of the world; although in the saying of John the Baptist another term (amnos) is used, the idea is the same. The lamb of Revelation, however, is also a slain lamb (Rev. 5.6, 9, 12), whose death has redeeming power.

The Fourth Evangelist, who adapted to his own purposes a number of traditions concerning John the Baptist, added an extensive commentary to his first mention of the phrase "the lamb of God" (John 1.29–34). In his view, the final words of v. 29, "who takes away the sin of the world," refer to the redemption brought about by Jesus' death; but they might originally have been part of the Baptist's saying, referring to the victory over evil by the apocalyptic "lamb of God" (see Rev. 17.14). Vv. 30–31 have an apologetic flavor: they try to account for the failure of the Baptist to identify Jesus as the apocalyptic lamb and suggest that he did so after the *baptism of Jesus. The designation of Jesus as lamb of God at the beginning of his ministry is balanced by the allusion to the Passover lamb at his death (John 19.33–37; see Exod. 12.46).

See also Sacrifice. ETIENNE TROCMÉ

Lamentations of Jeremiah, The. The book of Lamentations, also commonly known as the Lamentations of Jeremiah, consists of five poems occasioned by the siege and fall of *Jerusalem in 587/586 BCE. Beginning with very early times, perhaps not long after the events (see Jer. 41.5; Zech. 7.3–5; 8.19), these laments have been used in Jewish, and later in Christian worship, as an expression of grief at the destruction of the city and also for more generalized sorrow, as in Christian liturgies of Good Friday, as well as an appeal for divine mercy. The book has attracted special interest among biblical scholars because of its relatively strict poetic form, all the chapters being alphabetic *acrostics or related in some way to the alphabet.

The title "Lamentations" of the English Bible comes from the *Vulgate's threni or Greek thrēnoi, translating a Hebrew title qînoôt, "laments." In Jewish tradition the book is most often called after its first word 'êkâ, "How!"

Contents and Plan. The contents and plan of the book are difficult to summarize, since the form of the poems is dictated more by the alphabetic acrostics than by a narrative or logical sequence. In the first two poems, there is an alternation between the viewpoint of an observer of the calamity and the personified city itself. The third chapter, formally the most elaborate, also reaches heights of poignancy. The anonymous speaker is "one who has seen affliction"; through this persona the causes of the fall of the city are explored, and then the poem moves to a tentative expression of patient hope. Chap. 4 is mostly taken up with recollection of the horrors of the final days before the collapse of the city, and chap. 5 is a kind of liturgical close to the book, ending in an appeal to God for help.

Authorship and Date. One ancient tradition ascribes the book of Lamentations to the prophet *Jeremiah, and this has even affected the traditional depiction of Jeremiah in western art as the "weeping prophet." Another ancient tradition, however, is silent as to the authorship of the book, thus implying that the author was unknown, and this is also the commonly held modern critical opinion.

The *Septuagint, the ancient Greek translation of the Hebrew Bible, groups Lamentations with the book of Jeremiah, and prefaces the book with these words: ". . . Jeremiah sat weeping and composed this lament over Jerusalem and said . . ." Other ancient versions, as well as rabbinic sources, make the same ascription to the prophet. Although there is no explicit warrant for this in the Bible, there is a kind of basis for it in the comment in 2 Chronicles 35.25 that Jeremiah produced a "lament" or "laments" for King *Josiah.

In the Hebrew scriptures themselves, Lamentations is not placed with Jeremiah. It is always placed not among the Prophets but with the Writings, the third division of the Jewish *canon. Within this division its position varies, though it is usually placed somwehre with the five short books known as the five "scrolls" (see Megillot). This position is significant testimony to the original anonymity of Lamentations, for it is difficult to see why the book was separated from that of Jeremiah if from the beginning it was understood to have been composed by the prophet. In modern times, scholars have pointed out elements in Lamentations that seem so much at odds with the views and personality of the prophet Jeremiah that it becomes very difficult to think of him as their author. Lamentations 1.10 refers to the enemies' entry into the *Temple as a thing forbidden by God, whereas Jeremiah (7.14) had predicted it. Jeremiah foresaw the failure of foreign alliances (2.18; 37.5–10), but the author of Lamentations 4.17 shared with his people a frustrated longing for help from "a nation that could not save." Still further evidence of this sort may be pointed out, leading to the common opinion that the book's author—or authors, since the work is not strongly unified—is best regarded as unknown.

It is clear that Lamentations was written after the fall of Jerusalem in 587/586 BCE, but otherwise the date is uncertain. Since it expresses no clear hope for relief from conditions of bondage and humiliation, it probably dates to a time well before 538, when *Cyrus permitted the Jews to return from *exile. The book may have been written in Judah (rather than Babylon or Egypt), since it displays no interest in any other locale.

Acrostic Form. Chaps. 1 and 2 are made up of three-line stanzas, with the first line of the first stanza beginning with the first letter of the alphabet ('ālep), the second with the second (bêt), and so on through the twenty-two letters of the Hebrew alphabet. Chap. 4 follows the same scheme, but with two-line stanzas. Chap. 3 is a tour de force, having three-line stanzas with each of the three lines beginning with the proper letter. Chap. 5 is not an acrostic, but has twenty-two lines, so the alphabet still to some extent determines the form.

The purpose of this alphabetic and acrostic form is unknown. It is unlikely to have been merely a mnemonic device, but no definite meaning or symbolism can confidently be attached to this formal feature, and it is safest to say that the author seems to have aimed at some aesthetic effect. In any case, the acrostics make it possible to be relatively sure where the lines of the poems begin and end, a situation unusual in Hebrew verse, which was ordinarily copied just like prose, without regard for lines of verse (see Poetry, Biblical Hebrew). With this foundation, scholars have found in most of Lamentations a special "lament meter," in which the second of two parallel lines is shorter than the first. Although the complete aptness of this designation may be questioned, Lamentations continues to occupy a prominent place in the study of ancient Hebrew metrics.

Lamentations and Sumerian Laments. The *Sumerians, authors of the world's oldest written literature, cultivated a genre of composition known today as "lament over the ruined city and temple." Laments over the ancient southern Mesopotamian cities *Ur, Sumer and Ur (together), Nippur, Eridu, and Uruk were composed in the early second millennium BCE and were copied in the scribal schools. These texts have survived in whole or in part, and most have been edited and translated. As a result, it is possible to trace parallels in conception and expression between this body of laments and the biblical book of Lamentations.

The subject matter in the two cases is very similar—a holy city is destroyed by the god of that city—and could be expected to produce similarities in diction quite apart from any literary contact, so that some scholars prefer to minimize the significance of parallels between the biblical book and Sumerian laments and their Akkadian descendants. Such a view likely underestimates the force of the evidence, and it is preferable to posit that Lamentations is a representative of an Israelite city-lament genre. This genre is reflected also in the prophetic books, and is related as a genre to the Mesopotamian works, though details of this process are only conjectural. DELBERT R. HILLERS

Laodiceans, The Letter to the. A pseudonymous letter ascribed to *Paul, contained in some early Latin Bibles and mentioned by several ancient Christian authors. The community addressed was located in west-central Asia Minor, not far from Colossae (Map 14:E4). The letter to the Laodiceans is a patchwork of phrases from other letters of Paul, primarily Philippians, Galatians, and Colossians. The reason for forging the letter is puzzling, but may be connected to Colossians 4.16: "Read the letter from Laodicea" (see also Rev. 3.14–22). Though the only surviving manuscripts of the letter to the Laodiceans are in Latin, the letter must originally have been composed in Greek sometime in the second or third century CE. PHILIP SELLEW

Last Supper. See Lord's Supper.

Latin. The language of imperial Rome and ancestor of the Romance languages. Because of its use by the *Roman army and civil administration, Latin had some currency in the eastern Mediterranean in the first century CE, in such provinces as *Syria and Judea. Latin inscriptions marked mileposts on roadways, and warned *gentiles against entry into the *Temple courts in *Jerusalem. Other inscriptions survive from military camps and buildings dedicated by Roman officials, such as the aqueduct and the temple for emperor worship at Caesarea Maritima. The charge for which Jesus was condemned was written on a plaque above his cross in Latin, *Greek, and *Hebrew (*Aramaic), according to John 19.20.

Several words of Latin origin are found in the Greek New Testament. Some had become familiar through the spread of Roman influence in the East, including words like denarius, found in Jesus' parables (Matt. 18.28; 20.2–13; see Money) and in his dispute over paying taxes to Caesar (Mark 12.15 par.). Despite the presences and influence of Roman institutions, some terms of Latin origin, such as praetorium in Philippians 1.13, or census, centurion, legion, and speculator in the gospel of Mark (12.14; 15.39–45; 5.9; 6.27) are though by some scholars to prove that those works were written in Rome.

Most Christians of the Mediterranean basin were Greek speakers at the start (Paul wrote to the Christians of Rome in Greek). Western Christians began to write in Latin only in the third century CE. PHILIP SELLEW Law. This entry consists of two articles, the first on Israelite Law in its ancient Near Eastern context, and the second on New Testament Views of what came to be known as "the Law." For discussion of the influence of the Bible on later legal systems, see Law and the Bible.

Israelite Law

Although laws and the concept of law played an overwhelmingly important role in the Hebrew Bible and in the life of ancient Israel, the Hebrew Bible has no term exactly equivalent to the English word "law." The Hebrew word most often translated as "law," tôrâ (*Torah), actually means teaching or instruction. As such it expresses the morally and socially didactic nature of God's demands on the Israelite people. The misleading translation of tôrâ as law entered Western thought through the Greek translation (*Septuagint) of the term as nomos, as in the name of the book of *Deuteronomy ("the second law"). That the word tôrâ is a loose concept is indicated by its use for the first five books of the Hebrew scriptures, which contain the bulk of ancient Israel's purely legal material, as well as for the Hebrew Bible as a whole. The vibrant nature of the legal tradition is indicated by the later Jewish distinction between the written Torah, namely the Hebrew Bible, and the oral Torah, the legal and religious traditions which were eventually codified in the *Mishnah (ca. 200 CE) and developed in the Gemara (ca. 500 CE; together they form the *Talmud) and later commentaries. The human intermediary between the people and their God in both cases is viewed as *Moses, through the revelation at *Sinai (Exod. 19–Num. 10) and later in a valedictory address in Transjordan before his death (Deuteronomy).

Among other terms employed in the Hebrew Bible that belong to the legal sphere and refer to specific practices and enactments are ḥoq "statute," mišpāṭ "ordinance," miṣwâ "commandment," and dābār "word."

Law in the Ancient Near East. Although it was once felt that biblical Israel's legal and moral traditions were unique in the ancient world, archaeological activity over the course of the last century has brought to light a large number of texts, mainly written in cuneiform script on clay tablets, which help to place biblical law in its ancient Near Eastern context. These include texts that have erroneously been termed "law codes," in addition to international treaties, royal edicts, and documents from the daily legal sphere.

The Babylonian Laws of *Hammurapi (eighteenth century BCE, copies of which have been found dating up to a millennium later) remain the most famous and comprehensive of the ancient legal collections, and include close to three hundred laws, in addition to a lengthy prologue and epilogue in which the divine mission of providing laws for the land is given to Hammurapi. Other important "codes" include: the Laws of Urnammu, a *Sumerian collection dating to ca. 2100 BCE; the Laws of Lipit-Ishtar, also in Sumerian, ca. 1900 BCE, the Laws of the city of Eshnunna, written in Akkadian and to be dated in the nineteenth century; the *Hittite Laws, which date in their original form to ca. 1600 BCE; and the Middle *Assyrian Laws from the reign of Tiglath-pileser I, ca. 1200 BCE.

These so-called law codes are not comprehensive codices in the Roman sense. They are rather miscellaneous collections of laws, compiled in order to enhance the stature of the ruler as the originator of order in his land. Although they preserve important evidence of individual stipulations and of the legal structure of a given society, these legal compilations are best viewed as literary texts. In spite of the ancient fame of a text such as the Babylonian Laws of Hammurapi, it is significant that among the thousands of legal documents known from ancient Mesopotamia not one refers to that collection for a precedent, nor to any other.

Ancient Near Eastern treaties, while important as historical, political, and legal sources, have also played a role in understanding the nature of Israel's *covenant with God as one of vassal with suzerain. Elements in treaties that have been found in the Hebrew Bible include the identification of the parties to the treaty, a historical prologue in which God's actions on behalf of Israel are listed, the treaty stipulations (i.e., the laws), and the *blessings and *curses to be expected as a consequence of obedience or of noncompliance to the terms of the covenant. Among the most important treaties are those of the Hittite empire of the second millennium BCE, to which many scholars look for the origin of the genre as a whole, and the neo-Assyrian vassal treaties, especially those of Esarhaddon (early seventh century BCE).

By far the largest number of ancient documents come from the daily practice of law. Tens of thousands of documents have been found recording economic and social transactions of all kinds, many of which can be compared to biblical practices. The closest biblical parallel to the actual practice of documenting transactions may be found in the account of Jeremiah's purchase of a plot of land in his home town of Anathoth, a transaction recorded in duplicate as were countless cuneiform documents (Jer. 32.9–15). Although most of the documents found were written on cuneiform tablets in Mesopotamia, documents written on papyrus and other perishable materials have been found in Egypt, for example at the site of the Jewish military colony at Elephantine, and in caves in the Judean desert, near the Dead Sea (see Writing in Antiquity).

Israel's Laws in Modern Research. In addition to the comparative study of Israel's legal traditions, which seeks to shed light upon Israel's laws in their ancient context through a comparision of similarities and differences with nonbiblical legal materials, two major trends can be identified in modern research on ancient Israel's legal traditions. The first is form-critical and concerns itself with the classification of Israel's laws according to form and syntax. The second attempts to identify the basic principles of Israel's legal tradition that set it apart from its surrounding cultures.

Basic for the study of the forms of Israelite law is the work of Albrecht Alt. In his essay on "The Origins of Israelite Law" (1934), Alt identified two basic patterns of legal formulations in the Bible. The first he termed "casuistic" law, since it arose from the sphere of case law. These are the laws formulated in the "if . . . then . . ." pattern. Alt sought the origin of these laws in Canaanite and general ancient Near Eastern traditions, which the Israelities took over after their "*conquest" of the land. The second he termed "apodictic" law. These are laws formulated as absolute pronouncements, such as the *Ten Commandments. They are mostly formed in the imperative: "You shall (not) . . ." Alt sought the origin of these formulations in Israel's ancient Yahwistic law, from Israel's preconquest traditions. While Alt's analysis of the origins of these two types of law has not withstood the test of time, since both casuistic and apodictic laws are to be found in most ancient Semitic legal collections in varying relative percentages, his basic form-critical distinction continues to serve as the starting point of contemporary discussion.

Once it could be shown that ancient Israel belonged to the cultural milieu of the world in which it lived, the question arose whether there was any aspect of Israelite law which could be identified as distinguishing it from its neighbors. Two considerations are basic to the discussion.

First is the issue of authority. Although in ancient Mesopotamia the king was guided by divine will in the establishment of (secular) justice, the source of law was the king himself. In the Bible, on the other hand, the source of law was conceived of as God. In distinction to other ancient Near Eastern practice, in Israel the king was not conceived of as the promulgator of law. Moses and others were simply intermediaries who transmitted God's rules to the people. Thus both secular and religious law were given divine origin. Obeying laws was hence both a legal and a religious requirement. Breaking a law was not simply a secular delict, but an infraction of the will of God, hence a sin. (See Kingship and Monarchy.)

The second is the valuation of human life, for which the case of the goring ox (Exod. 21.28–32) may serve as example. The case of an ox that injured or killed a human being appears in a number of ancient legal collections. There are differences between the various laws regarding the liability of the owner of the goring ox according to its prior behavior and to the status of the person gored. However, only in the biblical law, upon which similar medieval European legislation was based, is the ox itself subject to the death penalty for killing a human being, its flesh not to be eaten. Since the ox murdered a human being, it became taboo and hence not fit for human consumption, in spite of the fact that that inflicted a great financial loss on its owner. To give another example, in the code of Hammurapi the death penalty is adduced for theft. The killing of another human being did not necessarily warrant such severe punishment (depending on the relative societal status of the individuals involved). In the Bible, capital punishment is reserved for cultic offenses, which included *murder (see Exod. 21.12–14; Num. 35.29–34). Theft of property, as long it was not cultic or under the *ban (see the story of Achan in Josh. 7), was not punishable by death. Theft of another human being, however, was (Exod. 21.16). Thus it is postulated by Moshe Greenberg that, whereas the protection of property belonging to the upper echelons of society was of paramount concern in Babylonian law, in Israelite law the sanctity of the individual formed in the image of God was primary.

Major Collections of Biblical Laws. Among the many legal passages in the Bible are a number that have been identified as independent units by modern scholars. These include the *Ten Commandments (Decalogue; Exod. 20.2–17; Deut. 5.6–21), the Book of the Covenant (Exod. 20.22 [or 21.1]–23.19), the Holiness Code (Lev. 17–26), and the Deuteronomic laws (Deut. 12–26). The Ten Commandments can be understood as the heart of Israel's convenantal relationship with God, since they include an identification of the suzerain, God's acts on behalf of Israel, and Israel's obligations to God formulated in apodictic style. Most of the obligations incumbent upon Israel in the Decalogue deal not with cultic issues, but with the relations between people in an orderly society. The Book of the Covenant, containing casuistic laws with many parallels in other ancient Near Eastern traditions, is assumed by many to be the oldest collection of laws in the Bible. The Holiness Code forms the oldest core of Priestly (*P) legislation and is so named on account of its concern with Israelite ritual *purity and *holiness. The Deuteronomic laws, although presented as a speech delivered by Moses in Transjordan before his death, are associated in modern scholarship with the cultic reforms of King *Josiah of Judah (640–609 BCE; see 2 Kings 22.1–23.30; 2 Chron. 34–35). The major concern of this corpus of religious legislation is with the centralization and purification of the cult and its sacrificial system in the *Temple in Jerusalem.

CARL S. EHRLICH

New Testament Views

The modern New Testament is a fourth-century anthology of mid- to late first-century documents, composed in Greek and reflecting the social and religious stresses of a new religious movement seeking to define and eventually to distinguish itself from Greek-speaking *synagogue communities. In such a charged and changing context, "the Law" (Grk. nomos) received widely divergent treatments, although its definition remains constant: the Law is God's revelation through *Moses to Israel.

Paul. The earliest and most problematic source is *Paul. Written to predominantly *gentile communities, his letters often address questions of *ethics and authority. On these occasions, Paul's statements concerning the Law can only be seen as unself-consciously positive. The Law is the key to decent community life and the standard for group behavior (Gal. 5.15; 1 Cor. 14.34). Gentiles "in Christ" should strive to fulfill it and keep its commandments (1 Cor. 7.19; Rom. 8.4, 13.8–10; Gal. 5.14, authorizing his instruction by appeal to Lev. 19.18; cf. his defense of his apostolic rights by quoting from "the law of Moses," Deut. 25.4, in 1 Cor. 9.8–9). One can—and Paul did—obtain *righteousness under the Law (Phil. 3.6). *Faith in Christ, Paul says, upholds the Law (Rom. 3.31). In the largest sense, the redemption in Christ comes to gentiles in order to confirm God's promises to Israel's *ancestors as preserved in Genesis, the first of the five books of *Torah (Rom. 15.8–9; cf. 9.4–5).

Yet elsewhere Paul virtually equates the Law with sin, death, and the flesh—the worst aspects of the "old aeon" that, through Christ's death, *resurrection, and imminent *parousia, is about to be overcome (Rom. 6.14; 7.5–6). God gave the Law on account of transgression and in order to condemn: it is the "old dispensation," inglorious and incomplete, compared to the gospel of Christ (Gal. 3.16–21, 24–26; 4.10, 19–22; 5.21–31, a particularly tortured passage; 2 Cor. 3.12–15; Rom. 3.20; 4.15; 5.20; 10.4). How then can this same author possibly maintain that "the Law is holy, and the commandment is holy and just and good" (Rom. 7.12)?

Scholars have attempted to resolve this tension. Some, at one extreme, take Paul's negative statements as definitive of his (hence, the) gospel and his positive statements as the measure of an unthought-out sentimental attachment to his community of origin. Some at the other end maintain that Paul preached a two-covenant theology: Torah for Jews, Christ for gentiles. On this view, his only objection to the Law would be if Christian gentiles chose it, that is, opted as Christians for conversion to Judaism. But Paul's own statements—forceful, passionate, at times intemperate—defy a consistent interpretation. He himself seems aware of the tensions in his position. As Paul saw it, however, history would soon relieve him of the necessity to make sense of God's plan in electing Israel, giving the Torah, and then sending Christ. For Christ, Paul urged, was about to return, end history, and bring all under the dominion of God. This conviction, and not his statements on the Law, is the one consistent theme in all of Paul's letters, from first to last (1 Thess. 1.10; 4.13–17; Phil. 1.10; 2.16; 4.5; 1 Cor. 7.26, 29, 31; 15; Rom. 8; 9–11; 13.11–12; 16.20). It spared him having to work out a "theology" of the Law.

The Gospels. The evangelists, writing some 40–70 years after Jesus' death, turned a negative attitude toward the Law (or the Jewish understanding of it) into the touchstone of Christian identity. This tendency makes for considerable confusion when one tries to reconstruct the views of the historical *Jesus. Jesus of Nazareth, living and working in a predominantly Jewish environment, very likely had his own views on the correct interpretation of Torah, and these views may well have differed from those of his contemporaries. Argument about the Law between Jews was and is a timeless Jewish occupation: controversy implies inclusion. Transposed to a gentile context, however, argument can seem like repudiation.

Thus Mark's Jesus turns an unexceptional observation (people are morally defiled by what they do or say, not by what they eat, 7.15–23) into a repudiation of the Law regarding kosher food ("Thus he declared all foods clean"; v. 19). John's Jesus condemns his Jewish audience as sons of the lower cosmos and children of the devil (chap. 8): the Law, characterized throughout as that "of Moses" is, implicitly, not "of God," from whom comes grace, peace, and the Son (1.16; 7.19–24). In his *Sermon on the Mount, Matthew's Jesus presents his intensification of Torah ethics as if in contradistinction to Torah and Jewish tradition ("You have heard it said . . . but I say"; chap. 5). Luke, although retaining the theme of Jewish guilt for the death of Jesus both in his Gospel and in Acts, nonetheless wishes to present the new movement as continuous with a Jewish view of biblical revelation. Consequently he edits out or softens many of Mark's anti-Law statements. And all the Gospels, no matter how strong their individual polemic against Jews and Judaism (see Anti-Semitism), and hence the Law, still present a Jesus who worships at *synagogue on the *Sabbath, observes Temple sacrifice, pilgrimage holidays, and *Passover rituals, and whose followers, honoring the Sabbath, come to his tomb only on the Sunday after his death.

Later Traditions. Both within the New Testament and without, later traditions are similarly ambivalent. Negative statements tend to occur in those passages where these new communities seek to establish their identity vis-à-vis Jews and Judaism; positive statements emerge where Christians wish to distance themselves from their Greco-Roman environment. Christian ethics are in the latter case a judaizing of gentile populations according to the principles of Torah: shunning *idols, sorcery, astrology, hetero- and *homosexual *fornication; keeping litigation within the community; supporting the *poor, especially *widows; and so on—all themes found especially in Paul's Corinthian correspondence.

In the early decades of the second century, Christian dualists such as Marcion and Valentinus took the position that the God of the Jews, the God of the Law, was a second, lower, cosmic deity; God the father of Jesus, they held, thus had nothing directly to do with material creation and, thus, with the events and legislation given in scripture. Other Christians, committed to the unity of *creation and redemption, argued that the Law was of divine origin: only their particular group, however, knew how to interpret it correctly (that is, for the most part, allegorically: see esp. Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho, and see Interpretation, History of, article on Early Christian Interpretation). The church's ambivalence toward the Law eventually determined the structure of the Christian *canon itself. Retaining the *Septuagint even as it repudiated Judaism, the church incorporated the Law into its "Old" Testament, while maintaining that it was superseded or perfected by the "New."

PAULA FREDRIKSEN

Law and the Bible. Municipal or national law is the set of rules that, within a state, orders its affairs and those of persons under its jurisdiction, and which, when necessary, is enforced by special organs of the state. There may be more than one municipal law in a state, as in the United Kingdom, which contains the Scottish, English, and Northern Irish legal systems, or in the United States, where each state has its own legal system in addition to the federal system. Other states, such as India, have special rules for special communities (e.g., for Christians). International law is the law between states and between states and other international entities.

Municipal law can be divided into the law that regulates the affairs of the state itself and that which deals with the rights and duties, privileges, and immunities of persons within it. This division is often described as one between public and private law, though these categories overlap.

The Bible has influenced all those systems of law that can be traced, sometimes tortuously, to western European sources. By and large, the legal systems of other societies have been less subject to its influence, though sometimes that influence was historically present, as with the Russian system, in which a traditional Christianity molded society in former centuries and is still to be discerned in such rules as those regarding contract.

There are two main groups within the broad European legal tradition. Civilian legal systems form one group. These owe much to the legacy of Roman Civil Law, particularly as that Law was rediscovered and developed by scholars from the twelfth to the sixteenth century. The Civil Law lays emphasis on rationality and principle, and for that reason the civilian tradition has been adopted by many states that have consciously chosen their law. The other group, roughly encompassing the Anglo-American tradition, stems in large part from the English Common Law, and like it has tended to concentrate more on remedies. This group has spread more by conquest and imposition than by conscious adoption. There is also a third group, that of the "mixed" legal systems, which draws from both main traditions. Scots Law and that of Louisiana are examples of these.

The remote history of any legal system is obscure, for much of our understanding of particular influences at specific times is conditional upon the accidental survival of documentation, and deductions therefrom. It is, however, undeniable that the influence of the Bible on the legal systems that trace themselves to a western European root is extensive, though nowadays often diffuse. Biblical principles form a part of the foundations, which, like all good foundations, are well buried. Indeed, many in the twentieth century would deny biblical influence on many legal principles, which in former years were held to be sufficiently justified by the Bible. Much depends upon a willingness to accept parallels as indicative of influence and not a simple coincidence of result. Jews or Christians interpret the evidence differently from those who proceed from rationalist, agnostic, or atheist presuppositions.

When the modern legal systems of the European family were being formed, three main bodies of law influenced their development, namely the indigenous law of the community, Roman law, and canon law. The Bible's influence was mediated through each of these.

Indigenous law was that obtaining within a community, refined in accordance with the expectation of the community as to what was right in a given situation. Naturally, such expectations had much to do with religious belief and presuppositions. In each legal system, therefore, there came to be a body of "common law" manifested and developed through the decisions of judges and the reasoning that supported those decisions. Since the early judges in most countries were in holy orders (though they were not usually canonists), the opportunity for biblical influence was great. Specific recourse to the Bible as authority was unusual, but the principles it contained exercised their influence. Within the English tradition, the common law came to be highly significant, and it is only in comparatively recent times that the legislature has come to be considered of greater authority than the common law in the sense that what Parliament legislates takes precedence over the common law. By contrast, in the American tradition, the Constitution operates as the brake upon the lawmaking power of the Congress or of state legislatures.

Throughout Europe, indigenous law was directly influenced by Roman law, particularly as enunciated in the Corpus Juris Civilis (529–545 CE), the product of scholars working under instructions from the Emperor Justinian. Naturally, the empire having become Christian, there was a desire on the part of these scholars to make the civil law congruent with church teachings. Biblical influences therefore were strong. From the twelfth century onward, scholars (known collectively as the Glossators) worked on the Corpus, expanding its precepts through commentary, with considerable effect on their contemporary municipal law.

The indigenous law was also influenced to a greater or lesser degree by the canon law, a major contribution of the church to civilization. The Roman Catholic church had extended its authority even as the Roman empire waned and disintegrated, and it was considered by many to be the only body that could continue a tradition of universal law. The sources of church law, however, were many and various, and it was only as the church organized itself on a monarchic principle under the papacy that the need for systematization was dealt with. The eleventh-century rediscovery of Roman Law in the form of the Justinianic legislation, and notably the Digest of 533 CE, provided a model that eventually resulted in the Corpus Iuris Canonici, though that was constantly augmented by interpretation and further legislation. Much of the canon law had to do with church organization, but large portions affected the daily life of the laity and influenced the development of national laws in various areas. The aim of the canonists was to make their system of law correspond as closely as possible to right Christian conduct, and to minimize the separation of law and morals. The Bible influenced their deliberations, though its principles were often mediated through the teachings of the Roman Catholic church.

One area of law affected by the canonists was the law of *marriage, an area important in every society and subject to church procedures. Another was the law of wills, where the church rules were much more simple than those of the civil law. Naturally the canonists, keen to keep law and morals together, were concerned with matters of intention and of good and bad faith. In contract, therefore, good faith was made a major requirement, and bargains were enforced through the church courts without the insistence upon the formalities for their constitution that had grown up previously (Matt. 5.34–37). (It has to be said, however, that this development took greater hold in the civilian tradition than in the Anglo-American, which has retained certain elements of formal requirements such as the notion of "consideration," and which does not recognize a unilateral contract unless entered into under appropriate ceremonial.) Again, the canonists' stress on responsibility for the consequences of one's actions helped root the concepts of tort.

In the area of crime, intention also came to be insisted upon as a prerequisite for criminality of conduct (see Matt. 5.28), thereby bringing crime into closer association with notions of *sin and allowing actions to be differently weighed in any consideration of "blame," and therefore also of punishment. (A modern extrapolation from such concepts is the Scottish defense to a criminal charge of "diminished responsibility," which stems from that root, and was only lately taken over into English law.) The emphasis on sin also produced a change in attitude to punishment. In more and more instances, prison as a place of *repentance was accorded a higher priority than vengeance exacted through physical unpleasantness. In criminal procedure, the notion of God as judge, weighing the evidence, came to be accepted as a model, and human judges were given a greater freedom in their conduct of trials than former formalities permitted.

Finally, like the theologians and philosophers, the canonists gave consideration to such social questions as the doctrine of the "just price" and the "just wage." Price fluctuations in response to market forces alone were considered contrary to notions of intrinsic value. Such matters and their attempted solutions are, of course, still with us, and still echo Exodus 20.9; 34.21; 1 Thessalonians 4.11; 2 Thessalonians 3.7, 10–12.

The Reformation produced an interest in principles taken directly from the Bible in contrast to those mediated through church tradition and canon law. In some instances, this interest produced formal legislation. To take examples from one "reformed" jurisdiction, in 1567 in the Scots law the "degrees of relationship" within which marriage could lawfully be contracted were set out in terms of Leviticus 20 and "the Law of God," and the "prohibited degrees of relationship" for the purpose of defining incest were set out specifically in terms of Leviticus 18—though inaccurately, since the Geneva version (1560) of the Bible was the source used. Again, marriage between divorced persons and their paramours was made unlawful (Matt. 5.32; 19.9; Mark 10.11–12), though this was soon administratively avoided, and *adultery was made a crime (Exod. 20.14; Lev. 20:10). *Divorce on the grounds of adultery (Matt. 1.18–19; 5.32; 19.9) or desertion (1 Cor. 7.15) was introduced. In 1563, *witchcraft was made a capital crime in terms of Exodus 22.18, and various Sunday observance statutes were passed (Exod. 20.10–11). In 1649, 1661, and 1695 *blasphemy was made a capital offence, though the full penalty was exacted only once.

The other major element that the Reformation took from the Bible was the concept of the priesthood of all believers (Exod. 19.6; Isa. 61.6; 1 Pet. 2.9; Rev. 1.6; 5.10; 20.6), which eventually filters down to the modern institutions of democratic government.

The law books of the sixteenth to eighteenth centuries, in which the roots of much modern law are laid, contain a considerable mixture of sources for the principles that they assert. The Bible is often quoted, as is the Roman law. However, appeal is also frequently made to a "natural law," containing principles that are treated as axiomatic. At first, such "law" was said by writers to be given by God, but in 1625, in the Prolegomena to his De Iure belli ac pacis ("The Law of War and Peace"), Hugo Grotius pointed out that the legal principles so identified would have a degree of validity even if there were no God. Reason would deduce such principles from a consideration of the nature of human beings and from their needs in society. Others acted on that observation, and drove a wedge between "natural law" and any religious source. This was not, however, a sudden or a complete change of emphasis. Blackstone's Commentaries on the Laws of England (1765), for example, discusses law as stemming from God (Intro. s.2), but makes little appeal to biblical texts. Stair's Institutions of the Law of Scotland (2d ed., 1693), written from a Presbyterian background, also links law to God, making a number of biblical citations in so doing (e.g. Book I, tit. 1, 2–9), but again the bulk of the work treats such matters as a base to be acknowledged and not as an active source of law. In that train, Puritanism influenced English and American law in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, but since then the deduction of legal principle from biblical or theological sources has been largely abandoned by lawyers. The principles remain, but their source is usually not acknowledged or is otherwise explained on bases of social, economic, or political necessity. In Europe, anticlericalism gave that trend further impetus.

In the twentieth century, major advances in securing biblical principles have been made in international law, particularly through the United Nations' Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and other international Human Rights Covenants and Conventions following in its wake. In some measure, these have provided a statement of fundamental principles for human conduct that draw on biblical ideas among their unacknowledged sources. They provide a base from which municipal law can be criticized, and even, under certain human rights treaties, a remedy and change be obtained.

Within the municipal law of most states of the European tradition, the law generally now proceeds upon unexamined assumptions. The biblical roots acknowledged in the early texts are taken for granted, and go unmentioned in modern discussions of matters such as tort, contract, marriage, divorce, wills, and the like, where the canonists did their job well in former centuries. In some areas, however, there has been a revival of appeal to biblical notions, often with explicit citation of biblical texts. Thus medical ethics, euthanasia, *abortion, and surrogacy are controverted legal matters. Curiously, it is in the United States, where the Constitution requires a separation of church and state, that most modern legislation and court action has had a clear biblical base. The debate on such matters as school prayer, abortion, and the teaching of science in schools (creationism verses evolution; see Science and the Bible) has had a considerable emphasis on biblical precept. In other states, the influence of the Bible and of Christianity is left as something inarticulate but nonetheless real. The principles are there, but only those who are willing to do so acknowledge their source. Legislators and judges act on them, but without reference to their origin. As noted, effective foundations are well buried. FRANCIS LYALL

Lawyer. Lawyer is a term used in the gospels of Matthew and Luke for a certain portion of the Jewish leadership portrayed as hostile to Jesus. There is not enough information to determine the role of these lawyers in first-century CE Roman Palestine. Doubtless they were literate officials in or around the corridors of power in the colonial setting of the Greek East (cf. Titus 3.13). The Greek term for lawyer (nomikos) is found only once in Matthew (22.35), and even there it is textually uncertain. Luke seems to have replaced other stereotyped members of the opposition to Jesus, such as the *Sadducees, with the lawyers. Alongside the *Pharisees in Luke, the reader can depend on a nomikos to ask a question that provokes Jesus' instruction or condemnation or a *parable illustrating the nature of the *kingdom of God. J. ANDREW OVERMAN Laying on of Hands. The laying on of hands was a ceremonial act that conferred a special favor or function on the person for whom it was performed.

In the Hebrew Bible the ceremony often conveyed a personal blessing or function. Israel (*Jacob), with his hands crossed on their heads, blessed *Ephraim and *Manasseh (Gen. 48.14–16). Several ideas are related to this. *Aaron's outstretched hands conveyed a blessing on the people (Lev. 9.22), and the psalmist was enraptured after he felt God's hand laid on him (Ps. 139.4–6).

Sometimes the ceremony conveyed the transfer of authority from one person to another (Deut. 34.9). Witnesses laid their hands on criminals to testify against them before judgment for crime (Lev. 24.13–14; Sus. 34–40).

In sacrificial worship either officials in the *Temple or the sacrificers themselves laid their hands on the animals before they were slaughtered (Exod. 29.10; Lev. 1.1–4). The basic idea was that of dedicating the victim to God to obtain the forgiveness of sins. With the scapegoat the ceremony signified the transfer of sins from the sacrificers to the victims (Lev. 16.20–22; see Azazel).

In the New Testament the laying on of hands served some of the same functions. Laying his hands on them, Jesus blessed the children (Mark 10.16; cf. Gen. 48.14–16), and while lifting up his hands he blessed the *disciples (Luke 24.50; cf. Lev. 9.22).

The ceremony occurs most frequently in stories of healing, both by Jesus (Matt. 9.18; Mark

5.23; 6.5; 8.22–25; Luke 4.40; 13.13) and his followers (Acts 28.8; cf. 9.10–17), reflecting the belief that through the ritual act of a person with divine favor healing power passes to a sick person. (See also Medicine.)

According to Acts 8.14–19; 19.6, the ceremony was understood as supplementing *baptism by the giving of the Holy Spirit. The act also conveyed authority to persons who already had the Holy Spirit: the *seven (Acts 6.3–6) and *Barnabas and Saul (*Paul; Acts 13.2–3; cf. Rev. 1.17).

The ceremony became more formal (Heb. 6.2), and officials used it to impart spiritual gifts (1 Tim. 4.14; 2 Tim. 1.6), or, perhaps, as a reconciliation of sinners who no longer were in the church but who wanted to return (1 Tim. 5.22). It is still used in ecclesiastical ceremonies such as ordination and the sacrament of confirmation. EDWIN D. FREED

Leah. Leah, whose name means "cow," was one of the matriarchs of Israel (see Ruth 4.11). She is said to have been buried in the cave at Machpelah (Gen. 49.31). Leah, with "weak" or "delicate" eyes, is contrasted with her younger sister *Rachel, who is "graceful and beautiful" (Gen. 29.16–17). Because of their father Laban's wedding night deception, *Jacob marries both sisters (29.18–30), but loves Rachel more than Leah (see also 33.1–2). Yahweh takes pity on Leah because she is unloved and gives her many children: *Reuben, *Simeon, *Levi, *Judah (29.31–35); *Issachar, *Zebulun, and *Dinah (30.14–21; see also the lists in 35.23; 46.8–15), as well as *Gad and *Asher, the children her maid Zilpah bears to Jacob (30.9–13; 35.26; 46.16–18). Although Leah was the first wife and had several sons, she apparently did not have automatic marital rights, since in one case she is said to bargain with Rachel for Jacob's time by giving Rachel mandrakes to promote conception (30.14–16).
JO ANN HACKETT

Leaven. The translation of two Hebrew terms used in reference to the fermenting of bread dough. One word (śĕʾōr) designates the leavening agent, a piece of old dough set aside to ferment. This produces sourdough, which itself is inedible. The other, more frequently used word (ḥāmēṣ), designates the mixture of flour and water to which a piece of the old or fermented dough is added to facilitate rising.

Leaven in the Bible is most prominent in texts dealing with the annual springtime *Passover (pesaḥ) celebration, which incorporated an ancient and originally separate agricultural festival, the Feast of Unleavened Bread (Exod. 12.15–20; 13.6–7; 23.15; 34.18; Lev. 23.5). During this seven-day feast, a flat unleavened bread called maṣṣâ was to be eaten instead of leavened bread. The Pentateuchal texts historicize this practice by relating it to the *Exodus event, when the haste of the Israelites' departure precluded sufficient time for bread dough to rise.

The Passover ban on leaven can be understood in relation to other biblical rituals forbidding the use of leaven. As a rule, *sacrifices containing leaven were never to be offered (Exod. 23.18; Lev. 2.11; 6.9–10). The only exceptions were offerings meant for the offerer and priest, hence they were not offered to God (Lev. 7.13; 23.17–20). The ban on leaven in sacrifices in general and on maṣṣâ in particular is probably related to the association of leavening with decomposition and putrefaction. Sourdough is clearly unsavory, despite its useful role in bread preparation. Leaven may thus have come to symbolize corruption, and thus an element to be consciously omitted from a feast involving spiritual rejuvenation and also from sacrifices involving communion with God. The Hebrew Bible does not make such a notion explicit, but early Jewish sources and the New Testament (e.g., 1 Cor. 5.8) assume that leaven represents evil.

See Feasts and Festivals. CAROL L. MEYERS

Lebanon. A range of coastal mountains with elevations up to 3,000 m (10,000 ft) stretching northward from Sidon to near Homs, Syria (Map 6:G4). The name means "white," referring probably to its snowcapped peaks in winter (Jer. 18.14). Lebanon already appears as a place name in the mid-third-millennium BCE *Ebla texts. In the Bible, Lebanon denotes both the mountains and the country around them, although it is distinct from the *Phoenician cities in the neighboring coastal plain (Josh. 13.5–6). The Lebanon and Anti-lebanon mountains (a parallel range on the east) enclose the Biqaʿ valley (the "Valley of Lebanon," Josh. 11.17; 12.7). Mount *Hermon, the highest peak in the southern Anti-lebanon chain, stands at the headwaters of the Jordan River. The Bible mentions Lebanon chiefly as a source of timber for large buildings. *Solomon's palace and *Temple were built with Lebanon cedar (1 Kings 4.33; 7.2; 10.17, 21). The Egyptians and Assyrians also knew Lebanon for its cedar and cypress. JOSEPH A. GREENE

Lectionaries. This entry consists of two articles on readings from the Bible in liturgical contexts, the first in Jewish Tradition, and the second in Christian Tradition.

Jewish Tradition

Though it has no lectionary in the formal sense, Jewish liturgy draws extensively on the Hebrew Bible with readings, direct quotations, and textual references to explain the significance of portions of the service.

One of the oldest uses of the biblical text within the liturgy is Deuteronomy 6.4–9, the *Shema. These verses express the essential Jewish belief in a single God and provide a course of action for demonstrating this belief. This paragraph is followed in the traditional prayer service (omitted in Reform Judaism) by two other biblical passages, Deuteronomy 11.13–21 and Numbers 15.37–41, that state the consequences both of following God and of disobeying him. The Shema is the focus of the first part of the service.

Similar to the Christian lectionary is the annual Jewish cycle of *Torah readings. The Torah is a handwritten scroll containing the *Pentateuch. The fifty-four pentateuchal readings progress weekly, with successive portions of the Pentateuch, some weeks having double readings. Special Sabbaths and holy days have their own Torah readings, conveying the meaning of the holy day and replacing the weekly reading. For example, the reading for the holiday of Shavu'ot (*Pentecost) is Exodus 19–20, which includes the *Ten Commandments. This reading emphasizes the meaning of Shavu'ot as celebrating the acceptance of the Torah by the people of Israel. The Torah is traditionally read on Monday, Thursday, and Sabbath mornings. On Sabbath afternoon, the reading for the following week is begun.

On the Sabbath and holy days there is an additional reading from the Prophets called the Haftarah. Each Torah reading has a designated Haftarah that is meant to parallel and illuminate the message of the Torah reading. Thus, the Torah portion mentioning the building of the *tabernacle in the wilderness is accompanied by a Haftarah about the building of the *Temple in Jerusalem. Holy days have special Haftarah readings.

The Torah reading, central to the Jewish service, is accompanied by Devar Torah ("word of Torah"), a sermon drawing upon the weekly portion in order to teach a lesson for daily life. The portion is also used as a focus for study during the week.

Five other biblical books, collectively known as *megillot ("scrolls") are read in full during the year. The scroll of *Esther is read on the festival of Purim, commemorating the salvation of Persian Jewry. *Song of Songs is read on *Passover. In ancient Israel, Passover took place at the early spring harvest, alluded to in Song of Songs. This book is understood as an allegory of God's relationship with the Jewish people, a relationship that began with the *Exodus celebrated on Passover. The book of *Ruth is read on Shavu'ot (Pentecost), a holiday that celebrated the late spring harvest, mentioned in Ruth. In addition, it is the holiday of accepting the Torah, and Ruth in Jewish tradition is an exemplary model of a convert who accepts God's teachings. The book of *Lamentations is read on Tish'ah Be'Av (the ninth of Ab), the day commemorating the destruction of the First and Second Temples in Jerusalem. *Ecclesiastes is read on the holiday of Sukkot (Booths), because the holiday takes place in the fall and Ecclesiastes is written in the autumn of the preacher's life.

The service surrounding the actual reading from the Torah draws on numerous biblical verses. The introductory part of the service on Sabbath and holidays strings together verses thematically emphasizing God's eternal rule and his relationship with the people of Israel (Pss. 86.8; 145.13; 10.16; 93.1; Exod. 15.18; Pss. 29.11; 51.20 [18]). This is followed by a series of verses tied to the idea of bringing out God's teaching. Numbers 10.35 is chanted in imitation of *Moses' action when the *ark traveled. Then Isaiah 2.3 is chanted, describing the Torah as being the word of God emanating from *Zion. This is followed by the Shema (Deut. 6.4), emphasizing God's unity; Psalm 34.4 (3), a call to exalt God's name; and Psalm 99.5, 9, in response to the call. After the Torah reading, Deuteronomy 4.44 and Numbers 9.23 are sung in confirmation that the Torah was given to the people of Israel by God through Moses. As the scroll is returned to its ark, the liturgy mirrors the beginning of the service with a call to exalt God's name (Ps. 148.13–14) followed by a song of exaltation (Ps. 29: Sabbath; Ps. 24: other occasions). When the scroll is placed back in the ark, there is another selection of verses strung together thematically referring to the ark being brought to rest. This selection emphasizes the centrality of the Torah to the relation between God and Israel, reaffirming the Torah as the "tree of life" (Num. 10.36; Ps. 132.8–10; Prov. 4.2; 3.18; 3.17; Lam. 5.21).

Within the central part of the service called the Amidah (standing prayer), Isaiah 6.3, Ezekiel 3.12, and Psalms 146.10 are the focal point in the Kedushah ("sanctification"). The priestly blessing (Num. 6.24–6) appears on special occasions. Numerous other verses are interpolated into the prayers as well.

Psalms are also widely used in Jewish liturgy. There is a psalm for each day of the week, a psalm for the Sabbath day (Ps. 92), a series of psalms recited Friday evening to represent the weekdays (Pss. 95–99), psalms recited in the introductory service on the Sabbath morning (Pss. 145–150). There is also a special addition to the service on holy days called the Hallel ("praise"), consisting of Psalms 113–118. While all the psalms give word to the individual's desire to praise God, those appearing in the introductory portions of the service help prepare the individual spiritually for the service.

Often the influence of the Bible on liturgy is interpretive. The public reading of the Torah is said to be based on Exodus 24.3 and Deuteronomy 5.1 and 31.11–12, all examples of Moses reciting commandments or laws to the people of Israel. The action and wording of the call to prayer at the beginning of the service is based on Nehemiah 9.5. The essential portion of the prayer service is recited standing, attributed to Phinehas's action in Psalm 106.30, the interpretation being that the act of standing will be counted in one's favor. The prayers of supplication in the daily service are based on Daniel 9.3–19; Ezra 9.6–15; and Nehemiah 1.4–11. The inclusion of a prayer for the welfare of the government in the Sabbath service is derived from Jeremiah 29.7, where the exiles are told to seek the welfare of the country in which they reside. Even relatively late additions to the prayer book use biblical verses as their foundation.

MICHAL SHEKEL

Christian Tradition

A lectionary is a set selection of passages from the Bible to be read aloud in public worship over a fixed period of time. The designation may refer to a book in which is actually printed each assigned reading or simply to a list of chapters and verses that are then read from a Bible. Sometimes the specific pericopes (selected passages) for the lay reader, deacon/priest, and cantor are printed in separate books (the Lectionary, the Book of Gospels, and the Gradual, respectively). A community may employ multiple lectionaries, with different sets of readings for Sunday, for weekdays, for celebrations of the Eucharist, and for Services of the Word. Not all Christian communities follow a formal lectionary.

The practice of reading scripture when Christians gather for worship can be traced back very early, and is related to some extent to the Jewish practice of continuous Torah reading in the synagogue (see previous article in this entry on Jewish Tradition). Already in the second century CE, Justin Martyr described how "the memoirs of the apostles and the writings of the prophets are read for as long as possible" (Apol. 67). The pilgrim Egeria, in recounting her visit to Jerusalem in the fourth century, noted that in the church there the biblical readings were chosen so as to be appropriate for the feast or the place. Various early tables of readings are attested from both the Eastern and Western churches and exhibit great diversity in both the number and selection of readings according to language, region, and liturgical rite. In Augustine's church of the fifth century, for instance, the bishop exercised some freedom of choice, but the readings for the major feasts were basically already fixed. More complete lists have survived from the eighth century, most notably the Comes of Wurzburg, the Liber Commicus of Spain, and the Lectionary of Luxeuil from Gaul.

After the Reformation, distinctive lectionary traditions developed in the Lutheran and Anglican communities, while most of the "Free Churches" abandoned the imposition of a lectionary. The Greek churches have largely maintained the Byzantine lectionary of the eighth century. The Roman church of the West retained the Missal of Pope Paul V from 1570, with a one-year cycle of New Testament readings.

In subsequent centuries relatively little attention was paid to the lectionary until the Second Vatican Council of the Roman Catholic church called for a major reform of the entire lectionary, with the intent that "the treasures of the Bible are to be opened up more lavishly" (Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy 51). A complete revision for Sundays, weekdays, feasts, sacraments, and other rites was completed in 1969 and prepared for worldwide use in 1971; some slight revisions and a more extensive introduction were published in 1981. Various Protestant churches, particularly in North America, quickly adopted this lectionary, usually with minor changes (especially in the structure of the liturgical year and substitutions for the apocryphal/deuterocanonical books). The most important of these adaptations of the Roman lectionary is the Common Lectionary of 1983 and the Revised Common Lectionary of 1992, prepared by the Consultation on Common Texts, an ecumenical forum of Christian churches in North America. In addition, numerous other lectionaries, independent of the Roman lectionary, have been developed in the last decades, often on a regional or denominational basis; one of the most widely used is the two-year thematic-type lectionary proposed by the Joint Working Group in Britain in 1967, revised to a four-year cycle in 1990.

Certain fundamental principles guide modern lectionary planning and revision: a desire to read extensively and widely from the Bible in public worship; assignment of the more important biblical passages to Sundays and solemnities; maintenance of certain pericopes that historically have been long associated with major feasts; and a doxological, Christocentric orientation that reflects the doxological nature of liturgy rather than an academic or didactic orientation. In the Roman lectionary and its adaptations, these principles find expression in the Sunday lectionary in the development of a three-year cycle, with one gospel read in a semicontinuous fashion over each year and the gospel of John used to supplement Mark and for much of the Lenten and Easter season. A second New Testament reading from the Epistles is also semicontinuous. The Roman lectionary has a first reading, chosen from the Old Testament (except during the Easter season when it is from Acts) on the basis of a thematic connection with the Gospel; the Revised Common Lectionary now offers an alternative system of semicontinuous reading of Old Testament narratives for the Sundays after Pentecost. In addition, a psalm is provided for each Sunday as a congregational response between the first and second reading. The weekday lectionary is based on a two-year cycle of two semicontinuous pericopes, except for the Advent–Christmas and Lent–Easter cycle, where the readings fit the liturgical season.

Ongoing discussion and critique have focused on the fundamental nature of a lectionary as such and on the specific choices of a certain lectionary. A lectionary implies an inherent element of selectivity; it always excludes as well as includes, and to that extent it establishes its own canon of texts that form the basis for popular knowledge, preaching, and even catechetical instruction. The most problematic issues raised about specific lectionaries are questions concerning the presence or absence of biblical passages about women; the use or nonuse of passages that speak negatively about the Jews (see Anti-Semitism); problems in the *typological use of the Old Testament; and the difficulty of preaching on the basis of two or three virtually independent readings. Yet for many Christians the revised Roman lectionary is recognized as one of the major achievements of the Second Vatican Council. Its adoption and adaptation by many Protestant churches, even those that traditionally had not used a lectionary, has brought an unforeseen degree of ecumenical convergence in the scriptures that are read each Sunday throughout a large portion of the Christian church.

EILEEN SCHULLER

Leprosy. The biblical disorder called "leprosy" is different from the disease known as "leprosy" in the twentieth century. The latter, called Hansen's disease (bacillus mycobacterium leprae), is a serious skin disease that develops over a long period of time and until 1968 was believed to be uncontrollable and incurable. Many victims of the biblical affliction (Hebr. ṣāraʿat; LXX lepra, probably vitiligo), on the other hand, were reportedly healed. Not only human beings, but objects, such as houses and garments (Lev. 13.47; 14.34), were judged "leprous." A leprous house or garment was probably covered with mildew or mold, whereas the human leper had some kind of skin disorder. Although mildew and mold are not like a skin infection, both conditions are characterized by a change in color, and both were under the jurisdiction of the *priest. After the priest determined that the person or object was healed, he offered *sacrifices following a similar liturgy for both (Lev. 14.3–32, 48–53). Some kinds of leprosy occurred when there were white spots on dark skin, and the hair in the spots was also white (Lev. 13.2–3). Swelling was another symptom. Some types of leprosy involved scales or infection, like boils or pimples.

Those who had been diagnosed as lepers by the priest were required to separate themselves from the community. This was not for medical but religious reasons. Biblical lepers were treated not as ill but as ritually unclean. The priest had no technique for healing lepers; he only determined whether or not they had been healed ("cleansed"). When he considered the affliction healed, he then offered the correct sin and guilt offerings so that the former leper might be atoned for this impurity.

Lepers had two colors of skin, which was taboo, as was plowing with two kinds of beasts, raising two kinds of grain in one field, weaving two kinds of thread into one piece of cloth, or cross-breeding two kinds of cattle (Lev. 19.19; Deut. 22.10). Those covered completely with the disease, so that they had only one color of skin, were allowed to return to the community, because they were no longer lepers (Lev. 13.12–13). Once they began to heal, however, they were classified as lepers and were isolated again.

Biblical characters, such as *Moses (Exod. 4.6–7), *Miriam (Num. 12.9–15), and Naaman (2 Kings 5.14) were all healed of leprosy. Jesus reportedly healed lepers (Matt. 8.1–4; Luke 17.17–19), and he commissioned the *twelve to do the same (Matt. 10.8).

See also Purity, Ritual.

GEORGE WESLEY BUCHANAN

Letter-writing in Antiquity. Letter-writing arose in antiquity to serve official purposes. There were three broad types of official correspondence: royal or diplomatic letters, military orders and reports, and administrative correspondence used in managing internal affairs. Most letters embedded in the Hebrew Bible, along with several other nonbiblical Israelite and Jewish letters, are official in nature. *Solomon's correspondence with King Hiram of Tyre, for example, is diplomatic (1 Kings 5.2–6, 8–9; see also 1 Kings 21.8–10; 2 Kings 10.1–6). The *Lachish letters, written when Judah was under siege by *Babylonia, are military communiqués. We may add to these the letter from the Jewish military settlement in Egypt at Elephantine, which was sent to the Persian governor of Judah, requesting his intervention against attacks on a Jewish temple.

Originally, messages were oral, carried by trusted couriers. With the passage of time, the principal message of the letter was delivered in written form, but the letter's sender continued to be identified orally by the messenger with the phrase, "Thus says . . ." (e.g., Ezra 1.1–2). A written message provided confirmation of the letter's authenticity, especially when signed with the sender's seal (1 Kings 21.8–10; Esther 8.10). The written message carried by Uriah from King *David to the military commander Joab was clearly closed, because it commanded Uriah's own death (2 Sam. 11.14–15).

Though professional couriers were used by ancient states from the beginning of recorded history, the first organized postal system was not established until the sixth century BCE, when the Persian king *Cyrus set up a network of highways and relay stations. This postal system served as a model for *Alexander the Great and his successors, as well as for the *Roman empire.

Even when the entirety of the letter was written, the messenger often continued to play a supplemental role. This was certainly the case with *Paul, who usually employed trusted coworkers as couriers and who expected messengers to represent him to his correspondents (1 Cor. 4.17; 16.10–11; 2 Cor. 7.6–16; 8.16–18, 23–24; 12.18).

Various materials were used for written messages. Correspondence in Mesopotamia was written on clay tablets in cuneiform script by means of a reed with a wedge-shaped tip. It was common in a number of places to write with a brush or reed pen on potsherds (ostraca). *Parchment and vellum (skins) were used for more important correspondence. Papyrus was the most widely used material during the Persian and Greco-Roman periods. When Hellenistic rulers proclaimed benefactions and edicts worthy of permanent record, they were inscribed on stone after delivery. (See Books; Writing in Antiquity.)

Gradually, the letter was adapted to serve personal and nonofficial purposes. We know from archaeological discoveries that, at least in Greco-Roman Egypt, all levels of society sent letters. Although many were written by scribes, literacy was not as rare as was formerly believed. Nonetheless, ancient postal systems existed to serve only state business, not private correspondence. Whereas wealthy families and business firms could use employees or servants to carry their mail, ordinary people depended on those traveling on business (e.g., by ship or caravan) or on friends and passing strangers.

Greek and Roman rhetoricians regarded the cultivated letter of friendship as the most authentic form of correspondence. The letter was conceived as a substitute for the sender's actual presence. Since the recipient, however, could not ask for immediate clarification on epistolary subjects, it was recognized that the letter had to be more articulate than face-to-face talk. Despite the more studied style of letter-writing relative to conversation, theorists warned that the discussion of technical subjects was not appropriate in a letter. Nonetheless, the democratization of knowledge in late antiquity, along with the dialogic character of popular philosophy at the time, made it almost inevitable that much philosophical and religious instruction would be communicated in epistolary form.

While none of the books of the Hebrew Bible takes the form of a letter, twenty-one of the twenty-seven New Testament books are letters (also known as "epistles"). This difference stems in part from the fact that New Testament letters were written by Greek-speaking Jewish Christians who were influenced by the Hellenistic practice of writing instruction in the form of letters. Moreover, letters were often used by Christian leaders, such as Paul, to maintain contact with widely separated congregations.

The New Testament letters and patristic letters of the first three centuries CE are much longer than most pieces of ancient Greek correspondence. This length corresponds directly to their purpose as letters of instruction. In this respect, Christian letters are more like philosophical letters of instruction than like ordinary letters. On the other hand, the hortatory rhetoric used in Christian letters differs significantly from that in literary letters. For example, the emphasis on the whole community's spiritual maturation brought about by Christ's return, rather than on building one's individual character, shows that Christian letters were written by a specific religious subgroup with an *apocalyptic Jewish coloring. Their special character is evident in the way traditional Jewish materials are cited within the letter (doxologies, benedictions, hymns), as well as in the tone of familiarity and equality that frequently described Christian recipients and their senders as family members. Later, in the fourth and fifth centuries CE, letters from Christian leaders conformed much more to Greek literary models of letters. JOHN L. WHITE

Levi. Son of *Jacob and *Leah, and one of the twelve *tribes of Israel. Leah associates Levi with the verb "to join" (Gen. 29.34). Aside from his involvement with *Simeon in the attack against *Shechem (Gen. 34.25–26), Levi is best known for the sacerdotal functions of his descendants. The *Levites play a prominent role in assisting Moses quell the *golden calf rebellion (Exod 32.25–29). Whatever Aaron's ancestry, his sons, and not Levi's, dominate the Jerusalem cult from the time of *Solomon (1 Kings 2.26–27) until the overthrow of Onias III by the Seleucids in 174 BCE.

Biblical sources depict the Levites as porters, carrying the *ark (1 Sam. 6.15; 1 Kings 8.4) and the *tabernacle (Num. 1.47–54). Given no inheritance of their own (Num. 18.23–24; Deut. 12.12–19; 14.28–29), the Levites were to reside in forty-eight designated cities (Num 35.1–8; Josh. 21.1–8). Israelites were to support the Levites through tithes and offerings (Deut. 18.1–4).

Scholars disagree whether Levi was originally a secular tribe (Gen. 49.5–7) or whether the Levites were supposed to have secondary status. *P prescribes a rigid division of duties for the descendants of Levi's sons, Gershon, Kohath, and Merari (Num. 4.1–33). Barred as *priests, the Levites function under Aaronid supervision (Num. 3.10). Similarly, Ezekiel denounces the Levites and confirms their lesser status (44.4–14).

In contrast, Deuteronomy defines a priest as a levitical priest and accords Levites an equal share at the central shrine (18.6–8). In Deuteronomy Levites are judges (17.8–9), guardians of the torah scroll (17.18), and they assist in covenant renewal (27.9). In a postexilic context, Malachi predicts Levite renaissance, because of priestly corruption at the Jerusalem *Temple (2.1–9; 3.3–4). Chronicles strikes a mediating position, depicting cooperation between the dominant Aaronids and the Levites and stressing levitical responsibilities as Temple singers, gatekeepers, and teachers of *torah (1 Chron. 6.31–48; 9.22–27; 2 Chron. 17.7–9).

Many commentators see competition between the Levites and the Aaronids as the most plausible explanation for the different duties and kinds of status ascribed to these groups by biblical writers. GARY N. KNOPPERS

Leviathan. A mythological sea monster who is one of the primeval adversaries of the storm god. In the *Ugaritic texts, *Baal defeats Lothan (ltn, a linguistic variant of Leviathan), described as a seven-headed serpent, apparently identified with Baal's adversary Prince Sea. In the Bible Leviathan is also identified with the Sea (Job 3.8) and has many heads (Ps. 74.14), and his defeat by God is a prelude to creation (Ps. 74.15–17). According to *apocalyptic literature, that battle will be rejoined in the end time when the evil Leviathan will be finally defeated (Isa. 27.1; Rev. 12. 3; 17.1–14; 19.20; 21.1), and, according to later tradition, given along with *Behemoth as food to the elect (2 Esd. 6.49–52), another recalling of creation (Ps. 74.14). In Job 41, Leviathan is described as fully under God's control, a divine pet (vv. 4–5; cf. Ps. 104.26). Many commentators have equated the Leviathan of Job 41 with the crocodile, and some elements of the description seem to fit this identification. But others, like his breathing fire (vv. 19–21), do not; in light of the other biblical references as well as the Canaanite antecedents it is better to understand Leviathan as a mythological creature.

In Thomas Hobbes's work by this title (1651), Leviathan is the symbolic name for the absolute power of the political commonwealth, to whose sovereign people must be subordinate but which is ultimately subject to divine control.

MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Levirate Law (from Lat. levir, "brother-in-law"; the Hebr. term is yābam, "to perform the duty of a brother-in-law"). If a man dies without bearing offspring, his *widow is to marry the deceased's brother (her levir). A child born of that union is considered to be perpetuating the "name" (lineage, honor, and inheritance) of the deceased (Deut. 25.5–10). Such a practice is common in traditional societies, promoting social and economic stability. Refusal to fulfill this obligation results in public shame (Deut. 25.9–10), because it indicates a greater concern for one's personal welfare than the welfare of one's extended family.

There are two examples of levirate marriage in the Bible. In Genesis 38, Judah's son Er is killed by God. His second son, *Onan, dies too, for refusing to serve as a levir to Tamar, the widow. When Judah refuses to give her his third son, Tamar dresses as a *prostitute and tricks Judah himself into fathering a child. This initially evokes condemnation on Tamar, but subsequently she is regarded as "righteous" for her actions (Gen. 38.26), which demonstrates the great significance placed on fulfilling this obligation. In the book of *Ruth, Boaz fulfills the obligation of the levir on behalf of Ruth's first husband. A closer kinsman declines to perform this duty, apparently fearful of the economic stress it would place on him (Ruth 4.6; perhaps, too, he was unwilling to marry a foreigner). This shows that a levir's obligations continue until the child he has fathered is able to assume the responsibility of defending the deceased's "name" on his own.

TIMOTHY M. WILLIS

Levites. Priests in ancient Israel were considered descendants of the tribe of *Levi, or, in a broad sense, Levites. Whether such a tribe ever existed is debated. To the tribe they are connected only by *genealogies: some perhaps ancient, one at least the product of postexilic times, drawn up in order to legitimize the existing conditions and the privileges of the *Zadokites (1 Chron. 5.30–34 and 6.35–38). For the word Levite no clear etymology has been found; the most suitable meaning is "devoted to the Lord." Levites, then, are those who are given or have given themselves for the service of the Lord; this is their role in traditions of early Israel (Exod. 32.28; Deut. 33.8–11).

Although Levitical priests are the descendants of Aaron, the Zadokites claimed and eventually obtained the Levitical priesthood. Thus, in general biblical usage, the Levites are subordinate Temple officials, who never obtained full priesthood. They are prominent in later phases of biblical tradition, especially in *Deuteronomy, *P, and *Chronicles. They were charged with the more menial tasks in the Temple cult. This secondary position seems to have started with King *Josiah's reform; after the suppression of the country shrines, where it is often assumed (but is unproven) that they officiated and from which they drew their income, they were deprived of their powers and that income, thus reducing them to poverty. In Deuteronomy they are therefore often mentioned together with *aliens, *widows, and *orphans. The Jerusalem priesthood, on the contrary, increased through the reform in power, dignity, and wealth, which they refused to share. Although Deuteronomy 18.1–8 had granted equal dignity and rights to all members of the tribe of Levi, the Jerusalem priesthood succeeded in nullifying this principle, limiting the Levites as priests of the high places (2 Kings 23.9). Such a division into an upper and a lower clergy was first codified in the reconstruction program of *Ezekiel, where the Zadokites were granted the privileges of the Temple and the *sacrifices (40.46; 44.10–14). This hierarchy is confirmed by P (see Num. 3; 18) and may explain why relatively few Levites returned from the *exile.

As to the length of their service, we have contrasting information. According to an older stratum of P (Num. 4.3; see 1 Chron. 23.3), they started at thirty years of age and finished at fifty; according to a later stratum (Num. 8.23–26) they started at twenty-five, while Ezra 3.8 (= 1 Esd. 5.56) and 1 Chronicles 23.24, 27 mention the twentieth year.

In Chronicles we find traces of a struggle by the Levites to obtain equal dignity with the Zadokites, which would have meant sharing in the sacrifices. This was not obtained, however, and the Levites had to content themselves with sharing in the liturgy only. The struggle between the two groups continued until the destruction of the Second Temple (70 CE), with the Levites trying to improve their position and the Zadokites trying to deprive them of the little they had, such as the revenues of the *tithes.

See also Priests and High Priest.

J. A. SOGGIN

Leviticus, The Book of. Leviticus is the third book of the *Pentateuch, named wayyiqrā' in Hebrew ("and he summoned") from its opening words. The English "Leviticus" is taken over from the Latin *Vulgate's Liber Leviticus derived from the Greek *Septuagint. The contents of Leviticus relate not to the tribe of *Levi but more generally to matters of concern to the *priesthood, especially the proper procedures for various sacrificial offerings, priestly ordination, determinations concerning ritual *purity, and the celebration of holy days. The Pentateuch in its final form is intended to be a single composition, and its division into five books is a later development; however apt the division may be, it should not obscure the fact that Leviticus stands in continuity with what precedes it in the Priestly code (*P) and with what follows; in some cases, it presupposes them. Thus, the ordination of *Aaron and his sons, described in Leviticus 8–9, conforms to instructions given in Exodus 29, and the relation of Aaron's line to other elements of Levi is explicated, in part at least, by the conflict stories in Numbers 16 and the assignment of contributions and *tithes in Numbers 18.

Since Leviticus pertains to P, its contents are thought to have attained a relatively fixed form only in postexilic times; the rituals described therein are basically those of the Second *Temple. Since, however, priestly circles tended to be conservative (especially the Jerusalem priesthood), much of the ritual no doubt reflects that of monarchic times, and some of it possibly even earlier periods. The priestly hierarchy of Leviticus reflects that of postexilic times, as elsewhere in P, with Aaron and his sons alone functioning as priests. Aaron is not called high priest; he is, rather, "the anointed priest" who stands apart from other priests (Lev. 4.3, 5, 16), and his prerogatives pass to another by right of succession (Lev. 6.22; 16.32; cf. Num. 20.25–29). The legal prescriptions in Leviticus, as in other parts of the Pentateuch, are generally introduced by the formula, "The Lord spoke to Moses, saying, 'Speak to the people of Israel' " (1.1–2; 4.1; 7.22–23, 28–29; 12.1–2; 18.1–2; 19.1–2; etc.; cf. Exod. 20.22; 25.1; 31.12–13; Num. 5.1–2, 5–6, 11–12; 6.1–2; 15.1–2, 37–38), but for those that pertain strictly to priests, God commands Moses to speak to Aaron or to Aaron and his sons (6.8–9, 24–25; 16.1–2; 21.1, 16–17; 22.1–2; cf. Num. 6.22–23; 8.1–2); occasionally Aaron, his sons, and all Israel are included under the same rubric (17.1–2; 22.17–18).

In a sense, such formulas bind the contents of the book together. Whether or not one holds P to be a narrative source, the action is advanced very little in Leviticus; Israel, which had already encamped at Mount *Sinai in Exodus 19, remained there through all that is recounted in Leviticus, departing thence only at Numbers 10. The only narrative portions are those that tell of the ordination of Aaron and his sons (chaps. 8–10, by the rite prescribed in Exod. 29) and of a blasphemer and his punishment (24.10–23), the latter narrative occasioning and including a number of laws (vv. 17–20). Although the materials contained in Leviticus are rather disparate in nature, a degree of coherence is provided in the way that many of them are fitted in. Thus, the first *sacrifices narrated in P after the erection of the *tabernacle (Exod. 40) are those relating to the ordination of Aaron and his sons (Lev. 8.14–9.21), and these are logically preceded by extensive instructions on the offering of sacrifice (chaps. 1–7). Thus also, the detailed rules for the distinction between clean and unclean (i.e., that which defiles; see Purity, Ritual) in chaps. 11–15 logically precede the instructions for the great *Day of Atonement (chap. 16), whose primary goal is the cleansing of the sanctuary, meeting tent, and altar from the defilements of the Israelites (16.16–19).

Despite the present title given the book, and despite the book's interest in priestly ritual, extensive portions were directed largely to the lay population, in particular 1.1–6.7, which describes how certain sacrifices are to be carried out; these are initiated by the offerer, who also did the slaughtering, although for the priests are reserved the offering of *blood and burning of whatever parts are to be burned. In 6.8–7.10, on the other hand, many of the same matters are covered, but now from the vantage point of priestly concerns; in the outline below in this article, these sections are labeled "supplement," though in fact they must originally have formed a separate (albeit somewhat disorganized) collection, formulated, preserved, and transmitted in priestly circles. As might be expected, most sections within this block are addressed to Aaron and his sons. (This section, extended to 7.38, is sometimes labeled "manual for the priests," and the previous sections "manual for the laity.")

The Holiness Code (H), chaps. 17–26, probably stood as a separate collection before its insertion into P; it is so named because its provisions aim at maintaining the ritual purity required of God's people, and because of the formula, "You shall be holy, for I the Lord your God am holy" (19.2; cf. 20.7). The idea of *holiness here, as in the rest of Leviticus and the Hebrew Bible generally, is that of being set apart. It is of Yahweh's nature to be apart and therefore holy, but people and even things can be set apart as Yahweh's possession and for his service, and in that sense they can be holy. Israel is to "set apart" the clean from the unclean, just as Yahweh has set Israel apart from the nations (20.25–26; cf. 22.32–33). Priests are set apart in a special way, but so is sacrificial meat, the sanctuary, veil, altar and utensils, the *Sabbath, the jubilee year, *tithes, and things vowed to the Lord—and so all these can be called holy or consecrated (8.10–11; 19.24; 21.6, 8, 15, 23; 22.9; 23.3, 20; 25.10; 27.9, 28, 30). Nevertheless, the concept of holiness is broader than separateness, for the former relates to fitting worship of the all-holy God and to what is in accord with his nature. Some of the provisions, furthermore, especially many of those in chap. 19, express high ethical ideals, for example, concern for the poor, disadvantaged, handicapped, and aged (19.9–10, 13–14, 32), honesty in action, word, and judgment (19.11–12, 15–16, 35–36), and even the command to love one's *neighbor (19.18), including the resident *alien (19.33–34). The unevenness and repetition in H is attributable to the fact that it was made up of several smaller, somewhat overlapping collections before its insertion into P; later additions, intended to bring its provisions into line with those found in P, contributed further to the unevenness. The list of rewards (for obedience) and punishments (for disobedience) with which H concludes (chap. 26) forms an epilogue similar in form, content, and function to that contained in *D (Deut. 28). Some scholars believe that H originally had a historical prologue that was detached when H was inserted into P. In its independent form, then, H may have resembled the treaty form, which is also found in the outline of D.

Chap. 27, on the redemption of votive offerings (i.e., things vowed to God), forms an appendix containing some early material that was probably added after the rest of Leviticus had reached its present form.

The book may be outlined as follows (primary references are given according to the Hebrew text; NRSV and some other translations differ from the Hebrew in parts of chaps. 5 and 6):

I. RITUAL FOR SACRIFICES
- Chap. 1: The burnt offering (ʿōlâ)
- Chap. 2: The cereal offering (minḥâ)
- Chap. 3: The peace offering (zebaḥ šĕlāmîm)
- Chap. 4: The sin offering (ḥaṭṭāʾt) for priests (vv. 1–12)
  - for the community (vv. 13–21)
  - for the princes (vv. 22–26)
  - for private persons (vv. 27–35)
- Chap. 5: The sin offering for special cases (vv. 1–13)
  - The guilt offering ʾāšām (vv. 14–26; NRSV: 5.14–6.7)
- Chap. 6: Supplement on the burnt offering (vv. 1–6; NRSV: vv. 8–13)
  - Supplement on the cereal offering (vv. 7–16; NRSV: vv. 14–23)
  - Supplement on the sin offering (vv. 17–23; NRSV: vv. 24–30)
- Chap. 7: Supplement on the guilt offering (vv. 1–10)
  - Supplement on the peace offering (vv. 11–21)
  - Prohibitions concerning blood and fat (vv. 22–27)
  - Portions for priests (vv. 28–36)
  - Conclusion (vv. 37–38)

II. CEREMONY OF ORDINATION
- Chap. 8: Ordination of Aaron and his sons
- Chap. 9: Their installation
- Chap. 10: Revolt of Nadab and Abihu (vv. 1–7)

Some rules of priestly conduct (vv. 8–11)
Supplement on priestly portions (vv. 12–20)

III. LAWS REGARDING LEGAL PURITY
Chap. 11: Clean and unclean animals
Chap. 12: Purification after childbirth Chap. 13: Leprosy of persons (vv. 1–46) of garments (vv. 47–59)
Chap. 14: Purification after leprosy (vv. 1–32)
Leprosy of houses (vv. 33–57)
Chap. 15: Unclean discharges Chap. 16: Ritual for the Day of Atonement Sacrifices and incense (vv. 1–19)
The scapegoat (vv. 20–28)
Observed as sabbath of rest and affliction (vv. 29–34)

IV. HOLINESS CODE (H)
Chap. 17: Sacredness of blood
Chap. 18: Forbidden sexual relations
Chap. 19: Various rules of conduct Chap. 20: Penalties for various sins
Chap. 21: Holiness of priests Rules of conduct (vv. 1–15)
Irregularities (vv. 16–24)
Chap. 22: The holiness of offerings (vv. 1–16)
Unacceptable victims (vv. 17–33)
Chap. 23: Calendar of feasts
Introduction; Sabbath (vv. 1–4)
Passover (vv. 5–14)
Pentecost (vv. 15–22)
New Year's Day (vv. 23–25)
Day of Atonement (vv. 26–32)
Feast of Booths (vv. 33–44)
Chap. 24: Service of the sanctuary (vv. 1–9)
Sanctuary light (vv. 1–4)
Showbread (vv. 5–9)
A case of blasphemy and its punishment (vv. 10–23)
Chap. 25: Sabbatical year (vv. 1–7)
Jubilee year (vv. 8–55)
Introduction (vv. 8–22)
Redemption of property (vv. 23–34)
Redemption of persons (vv. 35–55)
Chap. 26: Rewards and punishments
False and true worship (vv. 1–2)
Rewards of obedience (vv. 3–13)
Punishment of disobedience (vv. 14–26)

V. APPENDIX
Chap. 27: Votive offerings and their redemption

See also Feast and Festivals.

JOSEPH JENSEN, O.S.B.

Lilith. A female demon who appears in Isaiah 34.14 as part of a description of the Lord's day of vengeance. The figure of Lilith may have evolved out of Babylonian demonology. In some postbiblical Jewish midrashic texts, she is depicted as a slayer of infants and women in pregnancy and childbirth, for which reason amulets were used against her destructive powers. The early medieval Alphabet of Ben Sira draws on traditions that *Adam had a first wife who preceded *Eve and identifies her with Lilith. Noting that both she and Adam were created from the earth, Lilith flies away from Adam after unsuccessfully demanding that she be regarded as his equal. Feminist readings of this and other texts about Lilith have observed that the male authors of the Lilith material created an antithesis to Eve, who is often depicted as more docile and dependent and, unlike Lilith, as a begetter and nurturer of children. These readings also draw positive attention to Lilith's self-reliance and demand for equality in societies in which women were legally and socially subordinated to men.

BARBARA GELLER NATHANSON

Literacy in Ancient Israel. The invention of the alphabet in the Levant in the second millennium BCE and its subsequent adoption as the preferred *writing system in various regions by the beginning of the first millennium led to significant changes in education and literature. The use of a limited acrophonic system of graphemic representation led to relatively widespread literacy in ancient Israel, and everywhere where the originally Canaanite alphabet, spread by the *Phoenicians, was adopted. Nevertheless, the boundary between oral and literate cultures is not sharp, and there is no doubt that orality continued to be important even after literacy became widespread; in Hebrew as in other languages the verb meaning "to read" (qārā') literally means "to say aloud."

The evidence for writing in ancient Israel is fragmentary, largely because of the use of perishable writing materials. Papyrus, leather, and occasionally wood and plaster were the surfaces most frequently used, but these materials were usually destroyed in conflagrations or by natural decomposition over the centuries. Dramatic evidence for this is found in a number of seal impressions from archaeological strata in *Jerusalem dated to the time of the Babylonian destruction of the city in 587/586 BCE. The small globs of clay with their seal impressions have survived, aided by the fire that hardened them, but the documents to which they were attached were burnt; these bullae sometimes still have the impression of the strings used to tie the papyrus and occasionally impressions of the papyrus itself. Only in relatively isolated and dry locales do leather and papyrus documents like the *Dead Sea Scrolls survive. Most of the inscriptions that have been uncovered, therefore, are on stone or pottery, and they represent only a small proportion of written materials produced at any given time.

On the basis of the surviving epigraphic evidence the democratization of literacy can be dated to about the eighth century BCE. Rapid changes in the forms of letters and a statistically significant increase in the number of extant inscriptions suggest frequent and diffuse use of the alphabet beginning in this period. Certainly by the sixth century literacy is so much a reality that, for example, a soldier can boast in a letter to his superior that he has never needed a scribe to read for him (*Lachish Letter 3). Datable references to reading and writing in the Bible also become more frequent in this period (see, e.g., Isa. 8:1; 28:10, 13; 29:11–12; Deuteronomy and Jeremiah passim).

These developments had profound effects on the formation, transmission, and reception of biblical traditions. From the mid-eighth century BCE onward, there are more and more frequent references to reading and writing in both biblical and epigraphic sources; these provide further evidence of the spread of literacy beyond a scribal and socioeconomic elite. In earlier traditions, for example, God is the writer of his commandments (Exod. 24.12; 32.16; 34.1), or *Moses is his scribe (Exod. 34.27). But by the time of the composition of the book of *Deuteronomy, the tôrâ ("teaching," or "law"; see Torah), while read aloud in the universal ancient mode (Deut. 31.11), was accessible in written form to the larger population. They are prohibited from adding to or removing any of its stipulations (Deut. 12.32) and are thus themselves capable of writing. Noteworthy in this connection is the command in Deuteronomy 6.9 (see Shema): "You [pl.] shall write them on the doorposts of your house and on your gates" (cf. 11.19–20).

It is in addition more than coincidental that the rise of "classical" *prophecy in the mid-eighth century BCE is simultaneous with the spread of writing; in other words, the rise of new forms of, literally, literature is due to the availability of writing in the process of composition. The spread of literacy may also mean that the written traditions of which the Bible preserves a sample may have been accessible not only to elite scribal and priestly groups but more and more to ordinary citizens as well; as an example there is the seventh-century letter from Yavneh Yam in which a field hand shows familiarity with the legal traditions found in Exodus 22:26, Deuteronomy 24:12–13, and Amos 2:8.

Scribal schools continued to function and to flourish, especially in the palace and *Temple, but individuals also employed *scribes, the most famous of whom is *Baruch. It is presumably to such professional writers that we should attribute the *acrostic poems in the Bible. But the teaching and learning of reading and writing would have taken place in domestic and village contexts as well. It is significant that one word meaning both "to learn" and in the causal form "to teach" is derived from the name of the first letter of the alphabet (ʾālep); it is attested from the eighth century BCE onward in both *Aramaic and Hebrew (Job 15.5; 33.33; 35.11; Prov. 22.25).

See also Books and Bookmaking in Antiquity; Wisdom Literature. MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Literature and the Bible. This entry consists of four articles that survey, by geographical region, the uses of the Bible in and its influences on literature:

English Literature
British Commonwealth Literature
European Literature
North American Literature

For discussion of the literary interpretation of the Bible, see Literature, The Bible as and Interpretation, History of, article on Modern Biblical Criticism.

English Literature

From the swift Christianization of Britain in the seventh century CE, at the beginning of which native writing of texts had not yet begun, down to the present "post-Christian" era in which textuality is almost exclusively the preserve of literary traditions, the Bible has been by far the most important of foundational texts for English literature. In the earliest days of written English, it may be said that the Bible effectively established the literary canon; and until the time of the Enlightenment, it largely continued to shape its outer contours. In the modern period, though this definitive influence has declined dramatically, we may still say that the Bible remains the most widely alluded to of all texts in works by English-speaking authors.

Anglo-Saxon Period. This vast influence is attributable in part to the formative role "free translation" of the Bible had in the development of self-conscious English narrative style. Bede (673–735), in his Ecclesiastical History of the English People, offers as paradigm the case of Caedmon, an unlettered cowherd who was miraculously transformed overnight into an accomplished poet: Caedmon's first composition was a hymn drawing on *Genesis in praise of *creation, and his name was subsequently attached to the relatively large body of Anglo-Saxon hexameral poetry that reflected patristic commentaries on Genesis (especially the Hexameron of Basil). The chief literary themes of this tradition—the six days of creation, the revolt and fall of the *angels, and the temptation and *fall of Adam and Eve—are felt in the Caedmonian versification of Genesis (A and B), or paraphrase-abridgement of Exodus, Daniel (1–5), and dramatic Christ and Satan, with its three-part relation of the revolt and fall of the angels, Christ's *temptation, and the harrowing of hell. Later Christian poems associated with the author Cynewulf (ninth and tenth century) tend to concern saints' lives, miracles, and lyrical parables, with the notable exception of the three-part poem, Christ. The third section of this poem is a powerful treatment of the contest between Christ and Satan, culminating in the Last Judgment. The Exeter Harrowing of Hell draws heavily on the apocalyptic gospel of Nicodemus, while another tenth-century poem, Solomon and Satan, applies the prevalent theme of holy war between Christ and his adversary in a debate between Christian and non-Christian wisdom. As a type of Christ, *Solomon interprets biblical narratives (e.g., the tower of *Babel) as well as *wisdom literature in such a way as to confound his opponent's resistance to the gospel. All these works, as much as the sermons of Wulfstan and Aelfric, the beautiful Advent Lyrics or more literal translations of the Psalter and Gospels, reflect a desire to transmit biblical knowledge. The authors of Anglo-Saxon literature were for the most part missionaries, monks, or lay brothers trained in monasteries, and much of their work can be seen as an outgrowth of the evangelization of Britain. Even in the great non-Christian epic Beowulf (which occurs in the same manuscript as a retelling of the apocryphal narrative, Judith), biblical allusion is a significant feature.

Later Middle Ages. After 1066, with the massive cultural and linguistic upheaval occasioned by the Norman invasion, there followed a quiet period for English literature. (The great Jeu d'Adam, perhaps the first biblical play in the vernacular to be written in England, was written in Anglo-Norman French.) Yet in the twelfth century, revival of interest in late Roman Christian learning (especially the works of Augustine and Gregory the Great) provided an opportunity for substantial progress in the development of Christian literary theory. Initially, this was applied to reading the Bible itself. But the Augustinian notion that classical literature ought to be appropriated to Christian use, "baptized" by subordination to biblical and catechetical rewriting, had also been defended in his On Christian Doctrine by analogy with the divine command to the Jews exiting from Egypt to take with them vessels of Egyptian gold and silver, later to put them to ordinary uses. Under the continued tutelage of Hugh of St. Victor in France and, in England, John of Salisbury (d. 1180), "Egyptian gold" became a major emphasis in late-medieval Christian ideas about literature, and shaped the interaction of scripture and vernacular writing in England until well into the Renaissance. The principle of discrimination in all reading, non-Christian as well as Christian, was held to be the Augustinian test of *love. Richard de Bury (1287–1345) reflects these ideas in his treatise on the love of books (Philobiblion) in which "the fables of the poets" are integrated with a canon of humane learning whose basis is scriptural and patristic. Ovid, for example, is subjected to biblical allegory, both in vernacular (Ovide moralisé) and Latin versions (Petrus Berchorius). Within the context provided by these developments, as well as by the striking growth of commentary on the Bible itself reflected in central textbooks such as Peter Lombard's Sentences on the Gospels (1150), the Ordinary Gloss, and Nicholas Lyra's extensive commentaries on scripture (early fourteenth century), the influence of the Bible on vernacular English literature that began to flourish again in the fourteenth century split into two main lines of development.

As in the Anglo-Saxon period, there was still a strong tradition of narrative works that may be described as biblical paraphrase and abridgement. This includes works of biblical extrapolation and sacred tradition: Cursor mundi, the South English Legendary, the 10,840-line Stanzaic Life of Christ, and also the famous biblical cycle plays of York, Chester, Wakefield, Lincoln, and Coventry. Multiday pageants covering the biblical history of salvation from creation to the Last Judgment, these plays represent the most extensive adaptation of the Bible to vernacular literary use in the history of English letters. While the Bible provides the principal content, the treatment is free, with more or less skillful interpolation or narrative and dramatic expansion effecting the historiographical or homiletic purpose of the authors. (By 1350, few priests and almost no female religious had sufficient Latin to read the *Vulgate even if available; for many, such vernacular works were accordingly a principal source of their biblical knowledge.) Other writers, sometimes with much greater skill and sophistication, might take individual Bible stories and craft them into romance narratives. Two such poems are by the anonymous "Pearl-poet," probably a north-country priest: Patience, a retelling of the story of *Jonah, and Cleanness, a fierce denunciation of sin which employs biblical narratives (Sodom and Gomorrah; the fall of Babylon; the parable of the wedding feast [Matthew 22.11–13]; Nebuchadnezzar and Belshazzar) to underscore the perils of profanation. Pearl, in the same verse form and by the same author, is an exquisite Gothic exposition of the parables of the pearl of great price and the penny-hire (Matt. 20.1–16), blended with material from the book of *Revelation to address the relationship between present life and future hope, time, and eternity.

The second stream of biblical influence, flowing from the revival of Christian literary theory in the twelfth to the fourteenth centuries, is illustrated well in a fourth poem by the Pearl-poet, Sir Gawain and the Green Knight. In it Celtic myth and the conventions of ancestral romance narrative are blended with New Testament themes. Although neither biblical narrative nor extended biblical allegory is present, biblical interpretation in the Augustinian tradition heavily flavors the treatment of non-Christian narrative.

The preeminent poet of the fourteenth century, Geoffrey Chaucer (1340–1400), reveals a rich appreciation of biblical literature, yet his poetry involves rather a "baptism" of worldly tales by Christian thought and purpose than simple allegory or biblical paraphrase. In his Canterbury Tales, various pilgrim narrators use biblical idiom and figure in such a way as to characterize their attitudes toward justice, mercy, love, and forgiveness. The humor and the "moralite" of the Miller's use of Noah's *Flood and the *Song of Solomon, like the outrageous and funny misreadings of the gospel of *Matthew and the church fathers by the Wife of Bath, equally with the Parson's sober sermon on repentance (from Jeremiah 6), toward which the collection moves, depend both upon a veridical reading of the biblical text and also upon the more elaborate hermeneutic encoding that is the product of later biblical scholarship and commentary. That how one reads the Bible can be a subject for lively cognizance and considerably sophisticated humor in English court circles is a striking measure of biblical literacy in the fourteenth century. Further, in the deliberate superimposing of biblical text over familiar classical myth, as in Chaucer's Maunciples's Tale or in the anonymous Christian reversal of the Orpheus and Eurydice legend, Sir Orfeo, we see a dependence upon Augustinian notions of how the Bible might be expected to transform non-Christian story.

For less cultured readers, the same techniques could be adapted to biblically directed social criticism. In Langland's apocalyptic Piers Plowman (1369; 1378; 1386), simple moral and political allegories are projected from the Gospels and Pauline epistles onto contemporary crises in church and state. Here the reader is invited to refer both text and events of contemporary life to the Bible for understanding; Langland not only assumes biblical knowledge but, much like Richard Rolle (d. 1349) and Walter Hilton (d. 1396) among spiritual writers and John Wycliffe among Oxford academics, urges his readers toward direct, personal reading of the scriptures. The Wycliffite Bible translation (1384; 1396) by Nicholas Hereford, John Purvey, and others not only contributed to but depended upon widespread interest in the Bible among nonclerical readers.

The fifteenth century is almost as unremarkable for English literature as were the years immediately following 1066. With the stiff suppression of Lollardry and condemnation of the Wycliffite Bible, it became unfashionable to exhibit biblical influence with the freedom known in the fourteenth century; one could be arrested on suspicion of heresy even for owning a copy of The Canterbury Tales. With the exception of continuation, for a time, of the cycle plays and allegorical morality plays, the most notable examples of biblical influence may be two surviving saints' plays, The Conversion of St. Paul and The Play of Mary Magdalene. Although true saints' plays in form, they are from the very end of the period and probably owe their preservation in Protestant times to the fact that the principals were biblical figures; the St. Paul play is particularly careful to hew close to the account in *Acts and at pains to advertise this in its preface. Some of the religious poetry of the Scots poets, such as William Dunbar, and that of English writer John Skelton show indebtedness to biblical story, and among the first printed English works of William Caxton is included an apocryphal narrative on the Infancy of Jesus and another translation from Latin, The Mirror of the Blessed Life of Jesus Christ. But central, vital influence of the Bible upon the main fabric of English literature degenerated almost entirely until after the stormiest years of the Reformation.

Reformation and Renaissance. In the sixteenth century, with the translations of Tyndale (1525–30), Coverdale (1535), Rogers, and Taverner, the "Great Bible" (1539), the Geneva Bible (1560), and finally the Bishop's Bible (1568) (see Translations, article on English Language), the combination of controversial interest and accessibility assured a fresh infusion of literary interest. While Cranmer's Book of Common Prayer (1564) aided in the increase of biblical knowledge among ordinary persons, its largely liturgical organization of biblical story no longer governed patterns of influence as had its Latin predecessors. The accessible English Bible now invited reading through, like other books, and the success of the King James Version (1611), rightly regarded as the high-water mark of English literary prose, merely confirmed this new type of literary enjoyment of the Bible. Thus, though there are still examples of poet-translators of scripture, such as Sir Philip Sidney and the Countess of Pembroke in their rendition of the Psalms (1586; 1589), and Joshua Sylvester's translation (1605) of the Frenchman Du Bartas' Divine Weeks and Works (a highly successful Protestantized version of medieval hexameral literature), the true influence of the Bible is in this period is internalized, revealing itself not merely in the emergence of previously neglected themes and narratives (such as the stories of Jephthah, Samson, Ruth, Deborah, and the theme of the covenant) but in the actual force of idiom, phrase, and cadence of the Coverdale, Geneva, and finally King James Versions working their way into English poetic diction. Spenser's sonnets (66; 68; 70) and Epithalamion (1595) offer exquisite examples, as do, somewhat later, many poems of George Herbert in The Temple (1633); biblical idiom shapes also the prose of Hooker's Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity (1593; 1597), Decker's The Seven Deadly Sins of London (1606), the Devotions of John Donne (1624), and, more extravagantly, Jeremy Taylor's Holy Living and Holy Dying (1650; 1651), to cite but a few luminous examples. It can truly be said of the seventeenth century in England that nowhere else has the effect of the Bible on literary language been so all-pervasive. Both writers and readers savor the flavor of "biblical" English; even playwrights are able to depend on an intimate familiarity with the Bible on the part of popular audiences. As Christopher Marlowe in the opening speeches of Dr. Faustus (1604) can characterize his proud and self-damning protagonist by his misquotation of key biblical texts, so also William Shakespeare is able, in Measure for Measure, to critique the theology of the Puritans by setting his text from Matthew 7 in a rich context of quotations from Paul's letter to the *Romans, such as were frequently featured in the Puritans' own sermons. Throughout his work, Shakespeare draws heavily on the Geneva Bible to encode and enrich his work, whether in romances like The Winter's Tale or history plays like Henry IV (Parts 1 and 2).

Biblical allusion in post-Reformation England, at least until the time of Milton and Bunyan, is ubiquitous, and it salts every kind of learned discourse. Poetry in the service of biblical interpretation or theological controversy, though more easily delineated as an expression of the influence of the Bible on the growth of humane letters, is almost as impossible to summarize; it must be kept in mind that between 1480 and 1660 more than half of all books printed in England were devoted to theological or ethical subjects, and typically copiously indebted to biblical "evidences" and discourse. Many of these works were dedicated to lay readership, and a large portion elected one or another genre of poetry as a medium. The younger Giles Fletcher's long serial poem, Christ's Victorie and Triumph in Heaven and Earth (1618) and, to a lesser extent, his brother Phineas's The Locusts of Apollyonists (1627) exemplify Protestant allegorical treatments of major biblical themes.

Such adaptations of the agon motif familiar from earlier English portrayals of the cosmic battle between Christ and Satan may have helped redirect the classically trained John Milton (1608–1674) in his desire to write a great English epic. Milton goes beyond Spenser, not only rejecting a plot from Greek or Roman literature but choosing the biblical story of fall and redemption over the national Arthurian myth. Paradise Lost (1667) and Paradise Regained (1671) represent a high point, then, of biblical influence on English literature, perhaps the greatest exemplar of a national culture that by this point had come to see the Bible as chief amongst its foundational texts. From the "war in heaven" to the "last battle," major epic themes from the Bible were adorned with Latinate diction and humane learning of such a high order as to reinforce the centrality of biblical influence through subsequent, much less religious periods in English letters. In his short drama Samson Agonistes and lesser poems as well, Milton offers a shaping of biblical influence so distinctive that many subsequent authors have effectively read their Bible in Milton's "version"—which is also to say, of course, that the Bible became strongly identified in the minds of some with Milton's brand of Protestant theology.

The once-vigorous tradition of biblical drama did not entirely die out with the Reformation but was substantially adapted to serve the emphases of Protestant interpretations of the Bible. Thus, while the saints' plays probably dominated religious drama in the fifteenth century, they now gave way entirely, to be replaced by plays about heroic figures from the Hebrew Bible; individual Tudor plays, many now lost, were dedicated to the stories of *Ruth, *Esther, *Darius, *Hezekiah, Jephthah, *Joshua, *Samson, *Absalom, and *Susanna, as well as the more familiar *Abraham and Lot, *Jacob and *Esau, and a variety of plays about *Joseph and his brothers. Common to these plays, as to those with New Testament subjects (such as John the Baptist, Pontius Pilate, and The Prodigal Son) is a movement away from salvation history to a focus on individual spiritual struggle of heroic proportions, ending either in repentance, conversion, and triumph or in hardening of the heart and tragedy. Almost the sole Tudor survival of the classical saints' play is the mediocre Life and Repentance of Mary Magdalene (1566) by Lewis Wager. John Bale, protégé of Thomas Cromwell, employed his Antichrist play, King Johan, as anti-Catholic polemic. His God's Promises (1577), an interesting reworking of the earlier prophet plays, concerns itself with promises to the individual believer rather than the fulfillment of salvation history in Christ. Among a smaller number of surviving Elizabethan plays on biblical subjects are Susanna (1578) by Thomas Carter, Absalon by Thomas Watson, David and Bathsabe (1594) by George Peele, and Herod and Antipater (1622) by Markham and Sampson. After this period, until Milton, biblical influence tends to be less direct yet, as J. H. Sims (Dramatic Uses of Biblical Allusions in Marlowe and Shakespeare [1966]) shows, entirely pervasive.

In the late sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, the English sermon was a high art form, and some of the finest examples of biblically influenced prose from this period come from the pens of Lancelot Andrewes, Richard Baxter, Isaac Barrow, the authorized homilists of the Church of England, and from poet-preachers such as John Donne (1572–1631) and George Herbert (1593–1633). The lyric poetry of the latter is replete with biblical imagery and subject, as is Henry Vaughan's postconversion Silex Scintillans (1655). Also, the characteristically apologetic use of the Bible in this period led to its use in political writings too numerous to contemplate here, including those of major figures such as Parker, Baxter, and Harrington. Even Hobbes's Leviathan (1651) is rich in biblical quotation and allusion. In no period of English literary history is literary language in every subject and genre so thoroughly indebted to the Bible; from autobiographies like the magnificent Religio Medici (1642) of Thomas Browne to praises of science and progress like Abraham Cowley's poem To the Royal Society (1677), or Francis Bacon's essay New Atlantis (1627), to Isaac Walton's biography of John Donne, the images, words, and accents of the English Bible echo on nearly every page of English literature.

Enlightenment. After the dismal failure of the Puritan Commonwealth under Oliver Cromwell and the Restoration under Charles II (1660) of Anglican church-state government, there was a marked turning away from anything that resembled piety in public life and the arts. Accordingly, biblical influence upon an increasingly secular literature suffered a sharp demise; while still felt at the level of language and allusion, biblical subject matter and titles almost entirely disappear, or else, in a case like Dryden's satiric political allegory, Absalom and Achitophel (1681), the reference of the allegory is curiously reversed: biblical story becomes a diaphanous screen for contemporary political miscreance. The notable counterpoint in this period is John Bunyan (1628–1688), whose prison writings were directed not to fashionable taste but to persons as humble as their author, whose literacy lay almost exclusively in knowledge of the Bible. Here again the device was allegory but, after Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners (1666), characterized by moral psychomachia rooted in a pattern of familiar biblical *typology. The Pilgrim's Progress (1678; 1684), The Life and Death of Mr. Badman (1680), and The Holy War (1682), though enduring classics, stand apart from rather than represent the pattern of biblical influence on English literature going into the eighteenth century, in that they are undisguisedly a species of evangelical tract. An allied literary form favored by the Puritans, spiritual autobiography, was to receive its best-known popular adaption in Daniel Defoe's Robinson Crusoe (1719), a progenitor of the modern novel, in which the protagonist's experience is a progress from original sin and alienation through exile, wandering, and providential intervention to a discovery and reading of the Bible, which then interprets life retrospectively, bringing about repentance, conversion, and rescue.

Further erosion of biblical influence on the mainstream of English literature was occasioned not only by increasing political isolation of the Puritans, with whom it had now become so closely associated, but by the rise of religious skepticism and critical attack on the scientific reliability of the biblical texts themselves. Thus, the skeptical modernism that began as a trickle in works such as Lord Herbert of Cherbury's protodeist De Veritate (1623), when coupled with biblical criticism such as Richard Simon's Critical History of the Old Testament (translated in 1682) and the philosophical writings of John Locke, was to grow into a flood of challenges to the authority and relevance of the Bible in writers of major influence, such as Shaftesbury, Bolingbroke, and, later, David Hume and Edward Gibbon. Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire (1776–88) celebrates the reinstitution of Roman as opposed to biblical models and values, and English evolution in literature from an era dominated by Christian and biblical influences to one in which they become marginal, from the Puritan to the "Augustan" age. Oliver Goldsmith, who coined the latter term in one of his essays (1759), reflects nostalgically on the fading of core biblical values from contemporary social and literary life in his Vicar of Wakefield (1764); his own oratorio on the *Exodus narrative was not published in his lifetime. As in Jonathan Swift's Tale of a Tub (1704) and Argument against Abolishing Christianity (1711) or the urbane criticism of Alexander Pope's quasi-deistic Essay on Man (1731–35), the residual influence is institutional Christianity rather than biblical narrative or language. Throughout the period a scattering of poems inspired by progress in science employ biblical paraphrases (e.g., passages in Job, or Psalms 8; 19; 104; 139), often in an attempt to show the correspondence of Newton and scripture, and William Broome's A Paraphrase of Parts of Job (ca. 1720) makes the author of Job, in turn, sound like a lecturer to the Royal Society.

Within the Established Church there was a continuing tradition of biblical verse both narrative and lyric, and though much less distinguished than their predecessors, poet-priests like the nonjuror Bishop Thomas Ken (1637–1711), John Norris (1657–1711) and, at a lesser rank, Samuel Wesley the elder, wrote moral, biblically inspired verse. Among influential poets in the biblical tradition, however, Isaac Watts, scion of the dissenting tradition, and Charles Wesley, whose work is a fusion of Puritan and Catholic sensibility, must be counted as of a higher rank. Watts, a favorite of Samuel Johnson, wrote on biblical themes in his Horae lyricae (1706), and is remembered for his imitation of the Psalms (1719) as well as numerous celebrated hymns. Charles Wesley, cofounder of Methodism and Watts's only peer as a writer of hymns in this period, also wrote a distinguished biblical poem, Wrestling Jacob (1742). In eighteenth-century poetry, however, biblical influence was often accompanied by melancholic self-absorption, as in Edward Young's Night Thoughts (1742–45), Robert Blair's The Grave (1743), James Hervey's Meditations and Contemplations (1747), Christopher Smart's Jubilate Agno and Song to David (1763), and, preeminent in this vein, William Cowper's Task (1785) and Olney Hymns (1779), coauthored with the Reverend John Newton. In none of this later poetry is there much of the formative power of the biblical texts so familiar to the seventeenth century and, like the biblical fictions and poems of Elizabeth Rowe (1737) or even the later ones of the considerably more crisp Hannah More (1745–1833), it pales in comparison with Milton or Herbert. As with Johnson's use of biblical allusion to fortify temperate rationalism in Rasselas (1759) or James Thomson's in Aeolus' Harp (1748) to universalize sentiment, not only the focus but also the expectation of readers' familiarity with the Bible has significantly faded. Only rarely in the eighteenth century, and that most memorably in the novel, with Henry Fielding's Joseph Andrews (1742) and Tom Jones (1749), does biblical influence extend to narrative structure, governing paradigms, themes, and substance of the discourse. When this happens, as the adaptation in Joseph Andrews of the *Joseph story from Genesis applied with the aid of New Testament pericopes like the parable of the Good Samaritan, the effect is to create a text with two or more levels, in which the livelier intertextual relationships seem not merely to encode a moral but ally the novel with an earlier tradition of biblically underwritten narrative.

Romanticism and the Modern Era. With William Blake (1757–1827), English literature enters an entirely new phase of relationship with the Bible. Blake, in Songs of Experience (1794) as well as his Book of Thel (1789), Marriage of Heaven and Hell (1793), and the revisionist Milton (1808), Jerusalem (1820), and The Everlasting Gospel (1818), created his "own myth," as he put it, to avoid being "enslaved by that of another man." In Blake's reading, authority is transferred from foundational text to the poet of genius, who creates his own "reading," obliterating traditional understanding: the Bible is "rewritten" to suit his myth. (See also Art and the Bible.) As Northrop Frye (The Great Code [1982]) and others have indicated, Blake becomes in this way a harbinger not only of modernist approaches to the Bible in literature, but also of postmodernism in both literature and criticism. In his reading of Milton's Paradise Lost, Satan becomes the real hero. Subsequent romantic poets, such as Byron in Manfred (1816) and Cain (1821), and Shelley in Prometheus Unbound (1820), follow suit. Coleridge, in his "Satanic Hero," reflects on certain consequences.

Within a more conservative biblical tradition was James Hogg, the Scottish shepherd whose Pilgrims of the Sun (1815) and Private Memoirs and Confessions of a Justified Sinner (1824) afford a glimpse of prevalent tensions between a biblical view of the human condition and the intensely personalistic romantic quest for identity. Walter Scott's novel Old Mortality (1816) studies, in language rich with the Scottish covenanters' fluent biblicism, social strife attendant upon strict literal application of the "Calvinist" Bible to politics.

Coleridge was a theologically sophisticated reader of the Bible, as chapter 13 of his Biographia litteraria suggests; Wordsworth, as may be seen in "Intimations Ode" and "Westminster Bridge" (1807), comparatively naive. With the second wave of Wesleyan revival in the first part of the nineteenth century, however, and the consolidation of religious values in curriculum and canon in the early years of Queen Victoria's reign, the Bible became both more widely acceptable in literary theme or motif, and much more visible in literary language. Yet R. W. Buchanan's "Ballad of Judas Iscariot" (1863) and Thomas Beddoe's "Old Adam the Crow" (1828), like Browning's Saul (1847) or "Death in the Desert," put the Bible to characteristically broad-church purposes. Tennyson's "Rizpah" prefers the Bible to Calvinist interpretations of it, though Tennyson's characteristic reading of the Bible is governed, in fact, by what he called "Higher Pantheism" and other presuppositions similar to Browning's. Browning's analysis of biblical notions of worship in "Epilogue of Dramatis Personae" reveals his interest in German biblical criticism as much as "Abt Volger" does his fascination with Feuerbachian eschatology. In the 1860s a poet like Charles Tennyson might be, as Hoxie Fairchild puts it (in his six-volume Religious Trends in English Poetry: 1700–1965), "much less troubled by Darwinism than by the extension of scientific method to biblical criticism and the comparative study of religion."

Some of the more peculiar adaptations of the Bible as literary influence in this period are to be found in the work of minor poets such as the spiritualist F. W. H. Myers's "St. Paul" or the medieval romanticist R. W. Dixon's Christ's Company (1861) with its angular and psychological poems on Mary *Magdalene, *John, and the Stabat mater theme. An early harbinger of liberation theology is Arthur O'Shaughnessy, especially in "Christ Will Return" from his Songs of a Worker (1881). The evangelical poets of earlier in the period, whose best effort is probably Elizabeth Barrett's tedious The Seraphim (1838) and pseudo-Miltonic A Drama of Exile (1844), are the only ones to contribute work of substantially biblical theme and subject. Robert Pollok's The Course of Time (1827), Robert Montgomery's Satan (1830) and Messiah (1832), and John Heraud's Descent into Hell (1830) and The Judgement of the Flood (1834) illustrate a continuing appetite for Miltonic adaptations of the Bible, but also, as does C. J. Wells's Joseph and His Brethren (1824), an exhaustion of that taste and talent.

The vital continuance of biblical influence upon English literature at the close of the century is in some ways shown less vividly in the popularity of evidently Christian works such as Francis Thompson's "Hound of Heaven" (1893) or the poems of John Cardinal Newman, Arthur Hugh Clough, and the Rossettis than in the rich mastery of biblical idiom, motif, and allusion by writers notably antagonistic to orthodox religion. Partly this owes to a substantial attempt by Matthew Arnold in his Literature and Dogma (1873), St. Paul and Protestantism (1890), and God and the Bible (1899) to separate the Bible from its association with Puritan or Calvinistic religion and grant it supremely literary value in an English canon. Partly it owes to the training in these orthodox traditions, and their subsequent partial or complete rejection by numerous major authors: George Eliot's Silas Marner (1861) and Thomas Hardy's Jude the Obscure (1895), like Swinburne's "Hymn to Proserpine," are rich in biblical influence despite explicit aversion to biblical religion, and George MacDonald in Lilith (1895) treats Jewish apocrypha in a New Testament context in such a way as to challenge his Calvinist colleagues with a hypothesis of universal salvation.

A measure of the literary power of the "English" Bible in overcoming religious considerations is the complete dominance of the King James Version from its first publication until well into the twentieth century; even James Joyce, who makes copious use of the Bible, prefers the cadences of this English translation to facilitate his inversions. This remains the pattern through W. B. Yeats ("Adam's Curse," "The Second Coming") and the fiction of D. H. Lawrence; it is visible in Robert Graves's King Jesus as well as in works such as Edwin Muir's One Foot in Eden (1956) or, more recently, Ted Hughes's, Crow (1970). Blakean rewriting of biblical narrative had become by World War I perhaps the significant tradition in modern English literature. The type of fiction represented by George A. Moore's The Brook Kerith (1916), which interweaves the lives of a Christ who survives the cross with those of *Paul and *Joseph of Arimathea, has grown abundantly in the twentieth century; examples are too numerous to list and most lack significant literary merit. Differing literary responses to the Bible have made their mark, however, including the poems of Gerard Manley Hopkins and perhaps most notably T. S. Eliot's "Ash Wednesday" (1930), "Journey of the Magi" (1927), and the magisterial Four Quartets (1935–42). The Anathemata (1952) of David Jones and R. S. Thomas's Stones of the Field (1946), Pieta (1966), and Laboratories of the Spirit (1975) exemplify a revival of biblical voice in modern British poetry, and may come to be seen as part of a neo-Christian revival of biblical influence. To some extent, the novels of Joyce Carey, notably his second trilogy, Prisoner of Grace (1952), Except the Lord (1953), and Not Honour More (1955), reflect a dissenting tradition, while the fiction of C. S. Lewis, exemplified in his Miltonic retelling of the Eden story, Perelandra, or Voyage to Venus (1940), and the plays of Dorothy Sayers, including The Man Born to Be King (1943) and The Zeal of Thy House (1948), offer explicit representations of biblical narrative. A resonant incorporation of biblical theme, motif, and language is provided by J. R. R. Tolkien's evocation of Nordic saga, The Lord of the Rings (1954–55). Discernably then, the shaping of biblical influence by Miltonic Puritanism, Anglo-Saxon monasticism, Anglican historicism, and Anglo-Catholic sacramentalism, all find continued expression in contemporary literature. Since World War II, however, the influence of the Bible on English literature has been markedly reduced in comparison with its influence on literature being written in America and the Commonwealth (see the corresponding articles in this entry). For a detailed tracing of the development of biblical allusion, narrative, and typology from Anglo-Saxon to contemporary English and American literature, as well as extensive annotated bibliography of critical studies on the use of the Bible by English authors, see D. L. Jeffrey, A Dictionary of Biblical Tradition in English Literature (1992). DAVID LYLE JEFFREY

British Commonwealth Literature

The influence of the Bible on British Commonwealth literature is complicated by the relatively late development of the British empire. The rise of British control of Australia and New Zealand, India, and substantial parts of Africa, accomplished chiefly in the nineteenth century, coincided with the decline of biblical authority in the West, especially among the educated classes responsible for the production of written literature. Thus, one might expect that Commonwealth literature would owe very little to the Bible; this expectation is often, but not always, fulfilled.

In Australia, for instance, literature is dominated, well into the twentieth century, by the overriding themes of that culture's history: the experiences of the convicts who first colonized Australia and of the bushrangers who soon populated the outback. Many writers understood the Bible to have little relevance to their circumstances—but not all: A. D. Hope (b. 1907), though not a believer, often makes vivid use of biblical themes and imagery (see, for instance, his "Imperial Adam"); James McAuley (1917–1976), an adult convert to Catholicism, attempts to reconstitute in modern terms, though in traditional forms, the devotional verse of Donne and Herbert:

Since all our keys are lost or broken,

> Shall it be thought absurd
> If for an art of words I turn > Discreetly to the Word?
> ("An Art of Poetry," II. 1–4)

And the continent's most prominent novelist, Patrick White (b. 1912), is noted for his use of biblical symbolism, for instance in his novel Voss (1957), whose title character is gradually revealed as a Christ-figure of significant dimensions.

In Anglophone Indian literature the situation is much more complex, for three dominant reasons. First is cultural independence: the rise of this literature was simultaneous with a powerful renewal of pride among Indian (especially Hindu) intellectuals in their traditional culture, a renewal strongly encouraged by visitors from the West, especially members of the Theosophical movement. Thus, the typical Anglo-Indian novel—for example, by R. K. Narayan (b. 1907)—will use European forms to express traditionally Indian ideas and ideals. Second is familial resemblance. Some Indian literature, such as the poetry of Rabindranath Tagore (1861–1941), may closely resemble certain kinds of biblical literature, especially the poetry exemplified by the *Song of Solomon; but direct influence is a less likely explanation for this phenomenon than a shared use of sexual and natural imagery. Last is Hindu syncretism; again Tagore will provide an example. His philosophical-poetic meditations on the one God often sound like a variety of Jewish or Christian mysticism, but monotheism has always been one of Hinduism's many facets. It has never been consistently emphasized throughout India, but neither has any other facet of Hinduism. That religion's syncretic ability to absorb multifarious influences makes biblical influences upon it extremely difficult to trace or fix.

In African literature, however, the influence of the Bible has been nothing less than enormous. The oral tradition in Africa is exceptionally powerful, and written literature appeared only after the coming of the Europeans. Since those Europeans, especially the British, favored literacy in the natives chiefly for religious purposes—reading the Bible and the prayer book—it should not be surprising that the earliest written literature in Africa served evangelical aims. This age of didactic literature eventually passed, replaced by novels, plays, and poems that stand at the forefront of post–World War II literature; but the influence of the Bible has remained strong in the countries once or still associated with the British Commonwealth. Nigeria's two best-known writers, the novelist Chinua Achebe (b. 1930) and the Nobel–Prize winning playwright Wole Soyinka (b. 1934), are of different tribes, but both were raised as Christians; biblical themes and language echo throughout their work. For instance, Achebe's second novel No Longer at Ease presents its protagonist Obi Oknokwo in terms of the prodigal son and of the *Magi returning to their kingdoms (as described in T. S. Eliot's poem "Journey of the Magi"); further, it skilfully presents the competing languages of the traditional Ibo proverb-oriented culture and the Christian culture of biblical quotation, sometimes seeing the two in direct conflict but often as witness to the Ibos' ability to synthesize the two. Soyinka repeatedly uses biblical archetypes; he too presents the theme of the prodigal (and the larger biblical theme of two brothers in conflict) in The Swamp Dwellers, and writes a profound variation on the Christ-theme of sacrificial, redemptive death in one of his finest plays, The Strong Breed.

Likewise, in South Africa we see writers, such as the novelist and autobiographer Peter Abrahams, who claim to have learned their prose style and, what is more important, a vocabulary of justice and injustice, power, and oppression, from the King James Bible; and we also see the prodigal once again, this time fused with elements of the *David-Absalom story, in Alan Paton's forthrightly Christian plea for compassion in his land, Cry, the Beloved Country. Paton is white, Abrahams what the South African regime calls "coloured"; it would appear that for South Africans of whatever color, the Bible provides a complex literary vocabulary with which to confront a harsh and difficult society.

ALAN JACOBS

European Literature

The influence of the Bible on continental European literature has been so pervasive as to be almost incalculable. Both as a collection of sacred texts and as the source of the various creeds, codes, and cults of Judaism and Christianity, the Bible is the most essential document in the Western world. To begin with, the spread of Christianity generated a gigantic (and still growing) corpus of liturgies, sermons, pamphlets, prayer books, practical guides, and every conceivable form of theology, which, supplementing and accompanying the Bible, have served as the foundation for Western Christian culture. The bulk of this corpus, as enshrined, for example, in the 383 volumes of Jacques Paul Migne's (1800–75) monumental Patriologiae Cursus Completus, which collects the writings of the church fathers from the apostolic era to the early thirteenth century, may be a dead letter except for historians and students of religion, but significant portions have survived and remain noteworthy.

The Missale Romanum, for instance, which was organized and edited by the Council of Trent (1545–63), contains—apart from many biblical texts arranged to fit the cycle of the liturgical year—some memorable poetry (e.g., the powerful symbols and ceremonies of the Easter Vigil, the "sequences," etc.) and many prayers marked by a distinctive spare eloquence. Missals, breviaries, and books of hours have made the Bible (particularly the Gospels and the Psalms) an integral part of the consciousness of both clergy and pious lay people for centuries. The liturgy, like the cathedrals (each a Biblia pauperum) that were its supreme setting, and the church *music (from before Palestrina to after Fauré) that expressed it, mediated the Bible to the world at large.

The Bible obviously played a key role in the work of early Christian authors. In the pre-Nicene period (i.e., up to 325 CE) perhaps only Tertullian (ca. 160–225), moralist, apologist, and fierce controversialist, has retained an important place in the Western literary canon. He is remembered for, among other things, the notorious paradox, "Certum est quia impossibile," and for asking the pregnant question, "Quid ergo Athenis et Ierosolymis?"

Jerome (ca. 342–420) not only produced the first great translation of the Bible, the *Vulgate, but some of the most brilliantly rhetorical letters in any language. He is generally considered the supreme stylist of Christian Latinity. In a famous nightmare (Letter XXII) Jerome saw himself being dragged before the judgment seat and asked about his condition. Claiming to be a Christian, he was abruptly contradicted, "You lie. You are a Ciceronian. 'Where your treasure is, there will your heart be also' [Matt. 6.21]." The scene aptly conveys Jerome's ambivalence and guilt (and that of countless Christian intellectuals like him) about his love of classical literature—which persisted, despite this warning from on high.

Although, like Tertullian, he was born in North Africa, Augustine (354–430) spent his crucial formative years (384–90) in Italy; and, like Tertullian's, his works became European classics. He is naturally best remembered for his Confessions and for his great rambling encyclopedic philosophy of history, The City of God. Augustine is the direct progenitor of countless spiritual autobiographies, from Teresa of Avila's Libro de su vida (1587) to Leo Tolstoy's A Confession (completed in 1882) and, through Jean-Jacques Rousseau (1712–78), of modern autobiography. Beyond this, the teachings in Augustine's huge oeuvre of ninety-three works reverberated long and fatefully in Western intellectual history—to choose but one example, in the seventeenth-century Jansenist controversy, which in turn spawned such diverse masterpieces as Pascal's Provincial Letters (1656 and after) and Sainte-Beuve's magisterial history of Port-Royal (1840–1859).

One of the most remarkable offshoots of the New Testament was the cult of *Mary. After modest beginnings in early Christianity it made enormous advances once Mary was defined by the Council of Ephesus (431) as "God-bearer" (Grk. theotokos). By the twelfth century Bernard of Clairvaux (1090–1153) could exclaim, "De Maria numquam satis," and medieval Christian writers seem to have taken this maxim to heart. There is an enormous and varied body of Marian literature, with famous tributes from writers from all over the Christian world, from Aimar, bishop of Le Puy (ca. 1087), author of the great hymn "Salve, regina," to Dante (d. 1321), who has Bernard address Mary as, "Vergine madre, figlia di tuo figlio," in the final canto of the Paradiso. And the tradition was continued by many later writers, in works as diverse as Cardinal Duperron's (1556–1618) "Cantique de la Vierge Marie," Anatole France's (1884–1924) Le Jongleur de Notre-Dame, and Rainer Maria Rilke's (1875–1926) Das Marien-Leben.

On a much smaller scale than the patristic writings there is a venerable tradition of hymnology and religious poetry in Latin, from Ambrose's (339–397) "Aeterne rerum conditor" to Thomas Aquinas's (1225–74) "Lauda Sion" and "Pange, lingua, gloriosi." Other names worth recalling here include Caelius Sedulius (fl. ca. 450), Columba (521–597), Venantius Fortunatus (ca. 530–610), Peter Damian (1007–72), Bernard of Cluny (fl. 1140), Adam of St. Victor (fl. 1140), Peter Abelard (1079–1142), Philip the Chancellor (d. 1236), and Thomas of Celano (ca. 1190–1260), author of the immortal "Dies irae," which borrows from Matthew 25:31–46 and other New Testament texts to create a haunting vision of the *day of judgment. There were also many fine anonymous poets, authors of such familiar pieces as "Ave maris stella," "Veni creator spiritus," "Alma redemptoris mater," "Stabat mater," and "Dulcis Iesu memoria." This poetry is simple, direct, and unassuming. Consider the Easter sequence by Wipo (d. ca. 1050), who was chaplain to two Holy Roman Emperors: "Victimae paschali laudes/ immolent Christiani./ Agnus redemit oves:/ Christus innocens Patri/ reconciliavit peccatores./ Mors et vita duello/ conflixere mirando:/ dux vitae mortuus/ regnat vivus," etc. While not true folk art, many of these hymns, heard continually in church services and learned by heart, became an integral part of popular European culture. Some, notably the "Dies irae," which was integrated into the Mass for the Dead, were set to music by composers such as Mozart and Verdi; the Gregorian chant "Dies irae" resounds menacingingly in Berlioz's Symphonie Fantastique. These Latin hymns also introduced the use of rhyme, which was then adopted by writers of vernacular verse.

Another vital element of European literature (in the broad sense) inspired by the Bible was the unique genre of the "rule" for monastic or religious orders, such as Benedict of Nursia's (d. ca. 543) Regula Monachorum, and its many successors, including the rules of the Franciscans, Dominicans, and Jesuits, along with Ignatius Loyola's (1491–1556) extremely influential Spiritual Exercises, with its numerous echoes in later literature, such as James Joyce's Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man (1914–15). This sort of Christian "torah"—with its distinctly utopian cast—was not merely, or even primarily, reading material, though many generations of religious read them over and over again, down through the centuries. They were the constitutions and codes of communities that attempted, despite repeated and inevitable failures (as lampooned, e.g., in Robert Browning's hilarious "Soliloquy of the Spanish Cloister"), to rebuild Jerusalem in the various "green and pleasant lands" of Europe.

Among the founders of religious orders Francis of Assisi (1181–1226) holds a unique literary position. The author of various important works, he is best known for the "Canticle of the Sun" (a sublime variation on Ps. 148 and similar texts), which Ernest Hatch Wilkins called "the first noble composition in an Italian dialect." Francis's idiosyncratic, stunningly literal attempt to live the "evangelical counsels" made him a dubious administrator, but his poetic celebration of "Lady Poverty" (combining the *Sermon on the Mount with courtly love) and his notion of friars as God's minstrels have fired the imagination of countless writers and readers. The Fioretti, an anonymous fourteenth-century collection of Franciscan legends (e.g., how Francis tamed the man-eating wolf of Gubbio), is perhaps the most colorful and charming volume of Western hagiography.

With the rise of the vernacular languages the influence of the Bible was extended through the medieval mystery (or miracle) plays, which began as severely restrained liturgical dramas on the life of Christ and the Virgin Mary, written by clerics and performed in the churches in Latin. They later moved outdoors, shedding both their Latin and their restraint. In the twelfth century, to cite just one example, the Jeu d'Adam dramatized the *Fall, *Cain's fratricide, and the supposed biblical prophecies about Jesus. In the later morality plays (fifteenth century), allegorical figures representing Virtue and Vice struggled for the human soul, sometimes accompanied by crowd-pleasing horseplay. While this primitive theater is little read today (continental literature has nothing to rival the delightful Wakefield Second Shepherds' Play, ca. 1400–50), it served as a bridge to the splendid flowering of drama in the Renaissance.

Religion of a crude chauvinistic sort played a major role in the chansons de geste, with their bellicose bishops and cast-iron conviction, as in The Song of Roland (early twelfth century), that "Paiien ont tort et chrestiens ont dreit." In The Poem of the Cid (ca. 1140), the Cid addresses his Castilian vassals: "I pray to God, to our spiritual Father/ That you who for my sake have left your homes and lands/ May, before I die, get some good of me/ That you may regain double what you have lost." On the enemy side, "The King of Morocco is distressed at my Cid Don Rodrigo:/ 'He has violated my territories/ And gives thanks to no one, except Jesus Christ.' "

In the immense corpus of medieval chivalric literature, religion—that is, mystical Christianity—played a large role, especially in the Arthurian cycle. The quest for the Holy Grail (the cup in which *Joseph of Arimathea supposedly received the blood from Christ's side), which was told in the legend of Parsifal both by Chrétien de Troyes (latter half of twelfth century) and Wolfram von Eschenbach (d. ca. 1220), is one of the most famous chivalric tales. For many years Wagner's Parsifal (1882) was regularly performed on Good Friday. But the heart of chivalry was full of war, lust, and self-aggrandizement—Tristan and Iseult's irreproachable piety is helpless to check their adulterous desire—and hence alien to Christian ideals. This point was irrefutably made by no less a critic than Sancho Panza, who told Don Quixote (Part II, Chap. viii): "And so, my lord, it's better to be a humble little friar, of any order whatever, than a valiant and wandering knight; God gives more credit for two dozen blows with a lash than for two thousand thrusts with a lance—be they at giants, monsters, or dragons." Don Quixote feebly responds that there are many paths to heavenly glory, but Sancho has dogma on his side.

Much more directly inspired by the Bible was the richly varied medieval mystical tradition. Some of its crucial figures include Bernard of Clairvaux, Francis of Assisi, Bonaventure (ca. 1217–74), and the Germans Hildegard of Bingen (1098–1179), Meister Eckhart (ca. 1260–1327), and Nicholas of Cusa (1401–64). Germany undoubtedly had the most highly developed schools of mysticism, but the later Spanish Carmelites Teresa of Avila (1515–82) and John of the Cross (1542–91) reached a wider audience and have a more distinguished place in the literary canon. Teresa's mystical writings include The Path of Perfection and The Interior Castle. John is best known today for three of his poems, "Dark Night of the Soul," a phrase now naturalized in English; "The Spiritual Canticle," based on the Song of Solomon; and "Flame of Living Love," which, like the previous two, borrows the vocabulary of sexual passion to describe the soul's encounter with God. An Augustinian contemporary of John, Luis de León (1527–91), was perhaps an even greater poet, and like him found particular inspiration in the Song of Solomon. For translating that book from the Hebrew (and his "judaizing" tendencies) he was imprisoned for almost five years, during which time he wrote a prose masterpiece, Los Nombres de Cristo, a Platonic dialogue on the meaning of such titles ascribed to Christ as "Prince of Peace" and "Son of God." Fray Luis also wrote a powerful Exposition on the Book of Job. Mystical literature is vast and of considerable importance in the later development of individualism, religious and otherwise. But most of it belongs more properly in the realm of theology or, in some cases, philosophy.

The supreme literary work of the late Middle Ages-early Renaissance is Dante's Divine Comedy (finished some time before 1321), which is literally in a class by itself. Dante's poem draws upon science, philosophy, and history, as well as theology, but it is supremely indebted to the Bible. Dante works leading figures from the Bible into his vast tapestry. For example, he shows us *Judas locked in the jaws of *Satan at the frozen bottom of *hell; in the Purgatorio he evokes the scene of Michal scorning *David's dance before the *ark; and he populates his Paradiso with all sorts of biblical figures, from *Adam and *Eve to *Rachel, *Rebekah, and *Rahab. But the work as a whole is dogged by the devil's disconcerting way of having all the good tunes: just as Satan is, despite everything, the most interesting and eloquent character in Paradise Lost, so Dante's Inferno is superior to the other two cantiche in dramatic power. And Dante's grandest moments come when he has the damned (e.g., Francesca da Rimini, Farinata, Ulysses, and Ugolino) tell their tragic stories—with a greatness of soul not lessened by the fact that they stand under God's eternal condemnation.

The late Middle Ages also witnessed the appearance of what has been perhaps the most popular of all books inspired by the Bible, the Imitation of Christ, written in Latin and commonly attributed to Thomas Hammerken (ca. 1380–1471), a German Augustinian monk known to history as Thomas à Kempis. Kempis was profoundly influenced by the years (1392–97) he spent with the Brothers of the Common Life, a community of pious laymen in Deventer, near Utrecht. In a simple, pellucid style, interwoven with quotations from the New Testament, the Imitation champions an intensely personal love of Jesus (culminating in a quasi-erotic mystical union) that focuses on the Eucharist. The book urges its readers to seek imitation in literal adhesion to the Gospels, particularly stressing humility, self-denial, rejection of the "world," and constant prayer. Kempis's highly individualistic version of Christianity, which no doubt reflects his own retiring nature (see his famous dictum, "Cella continuata dulcescit"), seems to be oblivious of social justice and the outside world in general; and this has contributed to its current status as an unread, or seldom read, classic. Devotional literature since Kempis has been a fantastically prolific but mostly undistinguished genre. One exception to this rule is the Introduction to the Devout Life by Francis de Sales (1567–1622), an agreeably written and more accommodating handbook of Christian piety for the layperson.

During the Middle Ages direct access to the Bible was limited to those who knew Latin. With the coming of the Reformation and the discovery of the *printing press, this would change forever. The act of reading one's own copy of the Bible and shaping one's own interpretation of it would eventually become a kind of sacramental symbol of intellectual freedom. In Germany Martin Luther's (1483–1546) *translation of the Bible, drawing on the chancery style of Saxony, which laid the groundwork for modern High German, was of unparalleled importance. It is partly thanks to Luther that Germany has been and still is the most biblically literate country in the world. His vigorous, earthy, impetuous prose style, in his pamphlets and controversial works, along with his fine hymns ("Ein' feste Burg," "Vom Himmel hoch," etc.) earned him a large niche in German cultural history. At the same time, the power of his pen gave broad currency to his vitriolic anti-Semitism (as in his pamphlet On the Jews and Their Lies.)

The more irenic Desiderius Erasmus (ca. 1469–1536), a peripatetic Dutch Augustinian, published a Greek New Testament with a Latin translation that, while beneath modern standards, helped to focus scholarly attention on the original. His wonderful Praise of Folly (1516) is a satirical hodgepodge, ultimately inspired by 1 Corinthians 1.18–25. And John Calvin's (1509–64) Institutes of the Christian Religion (1536, first written in Latin) is a radical Protestant reading of the Bible, an assault on Catholicism, and a powerful piece of French prose. Partly as the result of Calvin's influence, French Protestant writers, even such a black sheep as André Gide (1869–1951), have been better versed in the Bible than their Catholic or unbelieving counterparts. And the Calvinistic practice of relentless, lonely self-scrutiny bore autobiographical and biographical fruit in later centuries. It is no accident that both Jean-Jacques Rousseau and James Boswell (1740–95) were raised in the Calvinist fortresses of Geneva and Edinburgh.

The seventeenth century saw the last great age of biblically based religious literature. The tradition of religious theater survived in the seventeenth century in Spain, with Calderón (1600–81) and his autos sacramentales, and France, with such masterpieces as Corneille's (1606–84) Polyeucte (1641), and Racine's (1639–99) Esther (1689) and Athalie (1691). The latter, with its exquisite formal artifice and courtly grandeur ("O divine, ô charmante loi! / O justice! ô bonté suprême! / Que de raisons, quelle douceur extrême / D'engager à ce Dieu son amour et sa foi!"), seems far removed from the Bible; but Racine handles his sources in 2 Kings and 2 Chronicles with intelligence and discretion. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries the Jesuits wrote and staged learned, edifying Latin plays on biblical themes all over Europe. Perhaps the last surviving specimens of popular Christian drama are the Passion Play of Oberammergau (which is based in part on a sixteenth-century model and has now been sanitized of its worst anti-Semitic features) and Hugo von Hofmannsthal's Jedermann (1911), an effective reworking of the great fifteenth-century Dutch morality play of the same name (Elckerlijk).

The seventeenth century was also a great age of pulpit oratory. Jacques Bénigne Bossuet (1627–1704) is still remembered for his solemn sermons delivered at the funerals of the aristocracy, full of resonant maxims on the passing of worldly glory ("Tout ce qui se mesure finit, et tout ce qui est né pour finir n'est pas tout à fait sorti du néant, où il est sitôt replongé"). Bossuet retired just about the time that the Jesuit preacher Louis Bourdaloue (1632–1704) was coming into vogue. Bourdaloue may have been the better reasoner and rhetorician, but posterity (although not Voltaire) gave the palm to Bossuet. In Portugal (and later in Brazil and Rome) a still more gifted Jesuit, António Vieira (1608–97) wrote clear, vivid, sharply reasoned sermons that rank with the finest specimens of Portuguese prose.

The age also saw at least two great, if uneven, Protestant poets. Andreas Gryphius (1616–64) lamented the horrors of the Thirty Years War and gave moving expression to his stalwart, deeply humanistic Lutheran piety. In Les Tragiques, a bitterly satirical epic, Agrippa d'Aubigné (1551–1630) anticipated the Last Judgment, as he championed the long-suffering Huguenots and chastised evil Catholic rulers, especially Catherine de Médicis, who launched the St. Bartholomew's Day massacre in 1572.

Pascal's Pensées, one of the most brilliant instances of the French talent for treating serious philosophical questions on a level accessible to the layperson, are an undeniable masterpiece, even though its proof-text treatment of scripture is its least impressive part. Pascal argued that without the apparently irrational Pauline doctrine of original sin there is no way to understand the mysteries of human nature. Pascal's most memorable device is his dramatized figure of the libertin—a seventeenth-century descendant of the ungodly gentiles savaged by Paul in Romans 1:18–32—desperately fleeing thoughts of death in "diversion" and terrified by "the eternal silence of those infinite spaces." Pascal is still read enthusiastically by believers and unbelievers alike, but the fact that the fideistic and pessimistic Pensées were a rear-guard action against an increasingly triumphant secularism did not bode well for the philosophical future of Christianity.

After more than a century of exhausting religious wars, the Enlightenment brought the first large-scale rejection of the Bible and biblical religion, along with numerous apologetic counterattacks. This had the inevitable if paradoxical effect that the philosophes spent a great deal of time discussing Holy Writ. Voltaire (1694–1778), a rebellious product of the Jesuit Collège Louis le Grand, devoted much of his prodigious energy to mocking "l'infâme" (well defined by George Saintsbury as "privileged and persecuting orthodoxy") and everything connected with it. Candide (1759) pronounces all biblical theodicy bankrupt. In one of his gentler pieces, Ingenuous (1767), he taunts contemporary Christians for their deviations from apostolic practice. More benign critics such as Rousseau, in his "Profession of Faith of a Savoyard Vicar" in Émile (1762), tried to rationalize and demythologize the God of the Bible.

In one of the greatest Enlightenment texts, Foundations of the Metaphysics of Morals, Immanuel Kant (1724–1804) claimed to reject all external moral authority (such as churches and scriptures) in favor of a "categorical imperative" that supposedly applied to all rational beings on earth (or anywhere else), but this "universal" ethics had deep and obvious roots in the German Pietism Kant knew from his youth and in the age-old Christian tradition of self-denial.

Even as Kant was condemning all fixed theological statements as "heteronomous," his almost exact contemporary, Friedrich Gottlieb Klopstock (1724–1803) was attempting, in a grandly anachronistic (twenty cantos in hexameter) orthodox epic, Der Messias, to do for Germany what Milton had done for England. Drawing mainly from the New Testament, Paradise Lost, and the topoi of classical and Renaissance epics, the poem recounts the passion, death, resurrection, and enthronement of Jesus at the right hand of the Father. But traditional epic and biblical narrative (as Erich Auerbach showed in Mimesis) are scarcely compatible, and in any case Klopstock was essentially a lyricist; and so Der Messias, except for the first three cantos, is generally acknowledged to be a well-intentioned failure.

The eighteenth century witnessed the Haskalah, the Jewish Enlightenment, which eventually brought millions of European Jews into the mainstream of European culture. It also led to a painful state of deracination that can be observed in two of the greatest modern Jewish writers, Heinrich Heine (1797–1856) and Franz Kafka (1883–1924). Heine cynically accepted baptism, but never found a satisfactory home in Judaism, Christianity, or unbelief. His scintillating, relentlessly ironic prose records the contradiction of his love for the gods of Greece and his sometimes begrudging attachment to his Jewish roots. In his Confessions (1854) he explains: "In my earlier days I hadn't felt any special love for Moses, possibly because I was under the sway of the Hellenic spirit, and I couldn't forgive the Lawgiver of the Jews his hatred for image-making and the plastic arts. I failed to see that . . . he himself was nevertheless a great artist, with the true artistic spirit. Only he, like his Egyptian compatriots, turned his artistic genius exclusively toward the realm of the colossal and the indestructible." Self-exiled in Paris for a quarter-century, Heine summed up his impossible position in his oft-quoted deathbed words, "Dieu me pardonnera: c'est son métier."

Kafka, who has been hailed by some critics as the twentieth-century novelist par excellence, had a love-hate relation with Judaism characteristic of his assimilated contemporaries in Austro-Hungary. Although his work seems to be marked by a blank, uncanny lack of any frame of reference, some pieces, such as his fragment "Before the Law" (later integrated into The Trial) evoke explicitly, as his other stories and novels do implicitly, a haunted, absurd, Job-like demand for justice. Elsewhere in The Trial, Joseph K., searching for the "law books" studied by his mysterious accusers (and later executioners) can find only clumsy pornography. To the extent that Kafka's dark parables refer to the Bible ("In the Penal Colony" speaks of the old and new "Commandant," sacred but unintelligible "scripts," an impossible commandment to "BE JUST!" etc.), the tone is consistently hostile. But while he was free to carp and complain—in eerily reasonable prose—about the failure of his world to resemble the Bible's, this "religious humorist," as Thomas Mann called him, was never free to leave the subject alone.

For Marcel Proust (1871–1922), whose mother was Jewish and who strongly identified with her, religion was only a source of aesthetic sensations—and guilt. Still, Remembrance of Things Past (1913–28) has many biblical echoes, most obviously and painfully in its longest single section, Sodome et Gomorrhe, where Proust projects his own horror of "inversion" onto the doomed inhabitants of The Cities of the Plain (as the original three volumes are called in the Montcrieff translation; see Gen. 19.29). The famous scene of the madeleine cookie and the lime tea in Swann's Way is a nostalgic transformation of both the *Passover seder and the Eucharist: an attempt to redeem lost time (and create "sacred history," in the absence of God and revelation) through art.

For Isaac Bashevis Singer (1904–91), the son of a Polish rabbi, biblical faith, as preserved and embodied in the shtetl, is unspeakably precious (especially in the horrific light of the *Holocaust), but salvation is, at best, a leap in the dark. Singer's Gimpel the fool is a model absurdist, believing for belief's sake. One of Singer's many devout atheists, Rabbi Nechemia in "Something is There," inevitably quotes Ecclesiastes 3:19 to himself, "For the fate of the sons of men and the fate of beasts is the same; as one dies, so dies the other"—before its terrible truth breaks his heart.

The Romantic movement, with its validation of the primitive, the irrational, and the noumenal, often took a positive view of biblical religion. In Italy Saul (very freely adapted from 1 Samuel) by Vittorio Alfieri (1749–1803) may well be the finest modern poetic treatment of any biblical figure. Alfieri's pure, severe style proved a splendid match for his subject. Alessandro Manzoni's I promessi sposi (1825–26) deserves mention because, although perhaps marginally "biblical" (it recounts the successful struggle of a pious Catholic couple in early seventeenth-century Lombardy to get married despite the formidable obstacles placed in their way by a villainous aristocrat and a spineless parish priest), the grandness of its conception and the richness of its execution have led to its being ranked as the greatest Italian novel.

In the early Romantic period Germany had two outstanding poets who grappled with the conflict between the Bible and secular culture (in various guises). Friedrich Hölderlin (1770–1843) is remembered for his impassioned evocation of the gods of Greece. But in his last creative years (he went incurably insane in 1806) Hölderlin wrote enigmatic hymns to an agonizing Christ ("For suffering colors the purity of this man who is as pure as a sword"), the last of the gods, joining them in a hopeful, heretical synthesis against a cruel God the Father.

In Christendom or Europe, Novalis (Friedrich von Hardenberg, 1772–1801) conjured up a "new golden age with dark infinite eyes, a prophetic, wonder-working and wound-healing comforting time that sparks eternal life—a great time of reconciliation." This was not meant to be a reactionary restoration of medieval Catholicism, but a kind of sacred dream come true. Novalis also had a vision of the individual as the locus of literally divine possibilities. "The history of each person," he wrote, "should be a Bible—aims to be a Bible."

In his Essay on Criticism (1711) Alexander Pope mocked people who "to church repair,/ Not for the doctrine, but the music there." This stricture would apply to the many Romantics who loved the Bible primarily for its symbols. A crucial instance of this is Goethe's (1749–1832) Faust (1808, 1832). The "Prologue in Heaven," which frames the entire narrative, is freely adapted from the book of *Job. But "der Herr" is less the Lord than the embodiment of cosmic optimism and paternal benevolence, and Mephistopheles is emphatically not the New Testament *Satan. He represents instead a destructive, cynical antihumanism. Similarly, Goethe borrows from both the Virgin *Mary and *Mary Magdalene to create Gretchen. The "Eternal Feminine" that draws Faust upward is a universal Madonna. T. S. Eliot claimed that bad poets borrow but good poets steal; and Goethe shows no compunction about ransacking the Bible for whatever he needed. In any case, nineteenth-century literature is full of Madonna-substitutes, like Solveig in Ibsen's Peer Gynt (1867), and Magdalene figures, such as Sonya in Dostoyevsky's Crime and Punishment (1866).

Similarly, other Romantic writers could be classified as in one sense or other "religious"; but upon closer inspection the role of the Bible in their work often proves to be secondary. François René de Chateaubriand (1768–1848) was a Romantic apologist for Christianity, who celebrated its aesthetic appeal in an erstwhile classic, The Genius of Christianity, or The Poetic and Moral Beauties of the Christian Religion (1802). In this fervent miscellany Chateaubriand extols the Bible for its "sublimity," but his two most famous works that originally formed part of the book, Atala and René, show him on more congenial ground, describing the sexual torment, guilt, and despair, in awesomely beautiful natural settings, of young Catholic characters who are projections of himself.

One of the greatest nineteenth-century religious writers is Søren Kierkegaard (1813–55), whose work is without parallel. Although essentially a philosopher-theologian, Kierkegaard's style—passionate, prodigiously energetic, dramatic, and often ironic—qualifies him as a literary figure. A sort of Danish Don Quixote, Kierkegaard's reading of the Bible "turned his head" (cf. his famous "teleological suspension of the ethical" interpretation of the binding of Isaac in Gen. 22 [see Aqedah]), and impelled him to spend his short life campaigning against the deformation of Christianity into Christendom, and proclaiming the "contemporaneousness" of the Gospels. But as with Pascal before him and Dostoyevsky after, the secular reader may wonder why Kierkegaard's eloquence is so often fired by anxiety and doubt.

In an entirely different sense Gustave Flaubert (1821–80) found frequent inspiration in the Bible. Religion for Flaubert may be an exploded illusion, but its vivid mythology is immeasurably superior to the desiccation and meanness of contemporary life. Madame Bovary (1857), who has been bitterly disillusioned by her banal, soulless lovers, gives the most passionate kiss of her life to the crucifix proffered to her as she dies. In Flaubert's final masterpiece, Three Tales (1877), the failure of biblical religion is still an open wound. The ironically named Félicité in "A Simple Heart" is a self-immolating (and totally ignorant) believer. Enslaved by her employer, mistreated or abandoned by almost everyone in a nominally Christian society, she dies during a senile fantasy of her stuffed pet parrot as the Holy Ghost. "The Legend of St. Julian the Hospitaller" retells the mysterious, harrowing life of a sort of Christian Oedipus, but the concluding lines dismiss the story as a stained-glass fairy tale. Worst of all, in "Herodias," a skillful fictionalization of the beheading of *John the Baptist, Flaubert curses all parties—Jews, Romans, *Pharisees, *Sadducees, *Essenes, and proto-Christians—as bigoted, brutal, and deluded.

Nineteenth-century Russia produced two great instances of literature shaped by the Bible: the work of the tortured believer Fyodor Dostoyevsky (1821–81) and of the aristocratic convert to evangelical simplicity, Leo Tolstoy (1828–1910). Orthodox critics have praised Dostoyevsky's "Christ-figures," such as Prince Leo Myshkin from The Idiot (1868–69) and the former monk Alyosha Karamazov (1880), but the voice of his nay-sayers, such as the Underground Man (1864) or the antitheist Ivan Karamazov strikes most readers as far more compelling. Ivan, to be sure, is as God-haunted as any Dostoyevskyan character, and in his prose poem, "The Grand Inquisitor," he imagines Jesus returning to sixteenth-century Spain. Yet though he kisses the Grand Inquisitor (who wants to protect his infantilized, anesthetized, but beloved flock from the dangers of Christian freedom), Dostoyevsky's Christ has literally nothing to say.

Tolstoy's peculiar brand of deism, discarding most of Christian dogma but borrowing freely from the New Testament, preaching nonresistance to evil and exalting Christ-like self-donation to others, won followers around the world, but he suffers from the archetypal liberal Christian problem of deriving the inspiration and motivating energy of his work from a source he himself no longer believes in. In two of his best stories, "The Death of Ivan Ilych" (1886) and "Master and Man" (1895), Tolstoy creates blindly materialistic protagonists who transcend their bourgeois egoism on the point of death by imitating their altruistic servants. Tolstoy's acid depiction of the lives of Ivan Ilych Golovin and Vasili Andreevich Brekhunov has an angry prophetic power, but the vague redemption they achieve (in lieu of death Ivan Ilych finds a mysterious "light," and an unnamed "Someone" comes to visit Brekhunov) seems like a biblical deus ex machina.

Then there is the unique and paradoxical case of the "antitheists," the greatest of whom is Friedrich Nietzsche (1844–1900). Like Kierkegaard, Nietzsche has secured a place in the literary canon thanks to his unique brand of philosophizing—"with a hammer," as he put it. While grimly declaring that "God is dead," and brutally insisting that the slave morality of Jews and Christians has to give way to the master morality of "the blond beast," Nietzsche, who was the son of a Lutheran pastor, produced an epochal body of work that weirdly mirrors the Bible. His aphorisms have the alternately angry, exultant, or scornful ring of the prophets. His superman is a secular messiah. His doctrine of eternal recurrence is a fantastic substitute for an eternal afterlife. And Nietzsche's life had both the suicidal courage of the Christian martyr as well as the fierce self-denial and misogynistic celibacy of a Christian hermit.

Miguel de Unamuno (1864–1936) is a paradoxical heir of Pascal, Kierkegaard, and Nietzsche, who turns doubt into a category of religious experience, an ex-believer who cannot stop wrestling with the Bible. Early on in The Agony of Christianity (1924) he writes: "Agony, then, is struggle. And Christ came to bring us agony, struggle, and not peace. He told us as much. 'Do not think that I have come to bring peace on earth' [Matt. 10.34]." And he concludes, "Christ, our Christ! Why hast thou forsaken us?" In Saint Manuel the Good (1931) Unamuno describes an utterly devoted but unbelieving priest whose honesty forces him to keep silent as his congregation recites the Creed but who is (almost) buoyed up and borne ahead by the wave of their faith.

A number of other twentieth-century atheistic writers, such as Jean-Paul Sartre (1905–80), Albert Camus (1913–60), and the practitioners of the "Theatre of the Absurd" (e.g., Luigi Pirandello, Eugène Ionesco, Samuel Beckett), can be seen as conducting a lifelong argument with the biblical version of the world, shaking their fists at an empty heaven. The "nausea" experienced by Sartre's autobiographical hero, Antoine Roquentin (1938), is a kind of metaphysical malaise caused by the fact that "every thing in existence is born without reason, prolongs itself out of weakness, and dies by accident." Although Roquentin, like Proust, decides to seek relief from a godless universe in art, he nevertheless defines himself by what he rejects: the idea of *creation.

Beckett's play Waiting for Godot (1952) is full of futile nostalgia for the world of the Bible. Vladimir wonders why only one of the evangelists tells the story of the good thief, and he can't remember a verse from Proverbs: "Hope deferred maketh the something sick." Although Beckett himself defined Godot as whatever one hopes for, he is clearly a tragicomically incompetent/nonexistent biblical God with an unreliable and very nervous young boy as his angel. Like Kafka, Beckett plays endless variations on the theme of being condemned to hope. But while for Kafka hope is a sort of cruel and crazy mitzvah, for Beckett it is an incurable tic douloureux from which all humans suffer.

Nikos Kazantzakis (1885–1957) is a different and unusual case. At times resembling an incoherent Unamuno, Kazantzakis was a nihilist whose obsession with Christianity knew no bounds (see The Greek Passion, The Last Temptation of Christ, and Report to Greco), but with the passage of time his work strikes many readers as embarrassingly full of sound and fury.

The most significant influence of the Bible on modern literature (roughly from the late eighteenth century to the present) may well be the persistence of Jewish and Christian symbols and allusions—as in Ibsen's Brand (1866), the story of a noble, but self-destructive zealot, or in the title The Road to Damascus (1898–1904) by August Strindberg, who had nothing in common with Paul except a hair-trigger emotional sensitivity.

All in all, this biblical influence is so varied and complex that it is hard to assess. The texts, as we have already seen, run a staggeringly broad gamut, from Nathan der Weise by Gotthold Ephraim Lessing (1729–81), a Christian who idealized his friend, the great maskil and "Jewish Socrates," Moses Mendelssohn (1729–86), to the philo-Christian "Nazarene" novels of the Yiddish writer Sholem Asch (1880–1957). Biblical themes appear in myriad guises. Ernest Renan (1823–92) had an immense scandalous success with his Vie de Jésus (1863) and its vision of Jesus as the "divine charmer" and Jewish Orpheus (cf. the rapturous Hellenism of Renan's "Prayer on the Acropolis" in his Souvenirs d'Enfance et de Jeunesse [1883]) but, although dated, it remains the most widely read popular-scholarly life of Christ. Thomas Mann (1875–1955) created an extraordinarily ambitious, sympathetic, and thoughtful, if not always aesthetically compelling, picture of the world of the *ancestors of Israel in his immense novel Joseph and his Brothers (1934–42). When all is said and done, no one can predict what forms the influence of the Bible on future writers may take, but it may be safe to predict that such influence will be both continuous and attenuated.

PETER D. HEINEGG

North American Literature

American literature, in its use of the Bible, is not notably characterized by medieval or Miltonic retellings of scriptural narratives. Drawing epic and dramatic material rather from frontier life, New World authors often chose to invest immediate and local experience with eternal significance by encoding it with biblical *typology. It is this typological biblicizing of national life, and the theological worldview that such a biblical typology implies, that facilitates the connection of important individual texts to the development of a larger public "myth" in the United States. In Canada, by contrast, where the wilderness seemed more resistant to subjugation, and survival rather than triumph the visible goal, the use of the Bible by literary authors does not follow from a typological worldview; hence it is more tentative, less schematic, and, where involved with questions of identity, more concerned to relate personal rather than public experience to the transvaluation afforded by biblical references.

The United States. American literature branched off from English literature just at that point in the seventeenth century when the influence of the Bible upon secular texts was at its zenith in Britain. The Puritans who settled in New England and dominated its literary culture for several generations, were, moreover, of English speakers among the most biblically literate. Extensive mastery of the entire biblical corpus in the King James (Authorized) Version was common among ordinary people in the colonies, and individuals who had memorized entire books, or, as in the case of John Cotton, large portions of both Testaments, were far from rare.

The writing of the Puritans themselves was confined largely to diaries, chronicles, and well-wrought sermons, but a few, such as Anne Bradstreet, with her sense of struggle between "The Flesh and the Spirit" (1678), and Edward Taylor, so heavily influenced (like his English metaphysical counterparts) by the *Song of Solomon, wrote reflective and devotional poetry rich in biblical theme and idiom. Almost any kind of American text in this period, from chronicle to court judgment, might not only quote the Bible extensively but be characterized throughout by biblical diction.

Biblical typology, as Sacvan Bercovitch (Biblical Typology in Early American Literature [1972]) and others have shown, provided a means whereby life in the colonies became literal realization of scriptural metaphor: *Fall, *exile, *Exodus, pilgrim history, *Promised Land, and even millennial kingdom are worked almost seamlessly into the narratives of William Bradford, John Winthrop, Roger Williams, Michael Wigglesworth (The Day of Doom [1662]), Cotton Mather, Samuel Sewall, and Jonathan Edwards. In Wigglesworth, whose text was buttressed throughout by marginal references to precise biblical texts, or later, in Edwards's dramatic "Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God" (1741), one sees the incipient apocalypticism as well as a hellfire and brimstone call to repentance that the Puritan style of Calvinism was to bequeath to American literary consciousness. In Bradford, Winthrop, and Taylor, one observes paradoxically that America was also seen as a recovered *Eden, a new Canaan, or Promised Land in the here and now. In this early period, it is clearly typology and allusion to the Hebrew Bible that predominates: even a poem such as Edward Taylor's Christographia (ca. 1690), a fourteen-sermon "portrait" of Christ, each sermon preceded by a poetic meditation, tends to be structured according to types, promises, and prophecies of the Hebrew scriptures.

Bercovitch has shown that developmental typology in Puritan literature relates figures from the Hebrew Bible not only to the *incarnation but, in a form of sensus plenior, to the *second coming of Christ. Thus, typical narratives, such as those of the Babylonian captivity and Promised Land, come to prefigure end-time events as well as aspects of the story of Christ. America is Eden "in the last days." This historiographic view is complemented by "the static biographical parallelism offered by correlative typology, in which the focus is not primarily upon Christ but upon certain Old Testament heroes . . . as they become, through Christ, 'redivivus' in contemporary heroes." This second typology, visible in actual names as well as the names of literary characters, relies as much as the first on *covenant theology. Typology thus becomes a link between the concept of "a recurrent national covenant and the concept of an unchanging covenant of grace manifest in succeeding stages of the history of redemption" (Bercovitch, p. 25). Thomas Shepard's The Covenant of Grace (1651) reads current frontier events as if they were superimposed upon the lineated covenant history of the Bible; Cotton Mather's Magnalia Christi Americana (1702) looks back already to the golden age of Puritanism as a lost Eden or New Canaan, as from a pilgrim prospect from which the intervention of providence must be sought to ensure against the temptation to return—even at Harvard College—to the luxurious entrapments of Egypt. For America to realize its destiny as the land of promise, the conversion of American experience into a text about God's unfolding plan of redemption, emergent in Edward Johnson's Wonder-Working Providence of Sion's Savior (1654), was coupled with a tendency to read the text of the Bible itself as though it were chiefly about Americans, or, as Giles Gunn puts it in The Bible and American Arts and Letters (1983), as if "the Bible was proleptically American."

The American jeremiad, a political sermon that joins social criticism to spiritual renewal (as well as public dream to private identity), has come to be recognized as a foundational mythopoeic American literary genre. From the frontier outpost sermons of Peter Bulkeley in the mid-seventeenth century to the television evangelists of the late twentieth century it has tended to read contemporary events as though they were written down in an unfolding text to which the Bible is the master code and ultimate governing form. Characterized not only by biblical rhetoric and diction but also formed upon biblical narrative and dependent for its wide appeal on extensive popular knowledge of the Bible, the jeremiad has in turn had a powerful influence upon other literary genres throughout the history of American letters.

This was less apparent in the second half of the eighteenth century, however, than later. The dominant American writings in this period of consolidation continued to be political, but of a decidedly Enlightenment stripe. Allusions to the Bible occur only rarely in the works of Franklin and Jefferson; classical literature, as in England, usurped the fashion. Even in poetry, dominated by the "Yale poets" (Trumball, Dwight, Barlow, Humphreys, and Hopkins) despite their uniformly Calvinist upbringing, literary use of the Bible is as marginal as it is in the poetry of Philip Freneau who, in the spirit of his time, eulogized "On the Religion of Nature." Timothy Dwight's Miltonic allegorical epic, The Conquest of Canaan (ca. 1775), populated with eighteenth-century Americans with Hebrew names and perhaps the most self-consciously biblical poem of the period, was unsuccessfully archaic, a relic of his grandfather Jonathan Edwards's day, displaced in popularity by Dwight's own rather conventional pastoral verse. Only the black slave poet, Phillis Wheatley ("Thoughts on the Works of Providence" [1770]), wrote popular verse that adhered to the Puritan vision and its biblical themes and language, and it too looked backward, as in her most famous poem, "On the Death of the Rev. Mr. George Whitefield, 1770."

The nineteenth century brought a notable revival in biblical allusion in the works of writers of diverse religious persuasions; easily recognizable from the Calvinist William Cullen Bryant to the Quaker John Greenleaf Whittier, it is richly present in the most popular poet of the nineteenth century, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. Each of these poets wrote verse heavily marked by biblical idiom and diction, if not always devoted to a biblical theme; Whittier, however, in his concern with *slavery, readily invoked the captivity, Exodus, and *wilderness themes in poems such as "Song of Slaves in the Desert" (1847), "Ichabod" (1850), and "First Day Thoughts" (1852), while Longfellow, author of The Divine Tragedy (1871), a Passion drama, related *Pentecost and the atonement in his verse-sermon, "The Children of the Lord's Supper." In James Russell Lowell's then famous Harvard "Oration Ode" (1810), the old Puritan vision of America as "the Promised Land / That flows with Freedom's honey and milk" buttresses both the rhetoric and Lowell's moral: " 'Tis not the grapes of Canaan that repay, / But the high faith that failed not by the way."

Side by side with these sentiments, the growth of romantic naturalism and transcendentalism expressed in Henry David Thoreau and Ralph Waldo Emerson respectively is supported by a subtle recasting of selected biblical verities. Thoreau, in the prophetic sense of mission, evidenced particularly in Walden (1854) and Civil Disobedience (1849), shows familiarity with *Genesis, *Ecclesiastes, and the gospel of *Matthew, though he characteristically edits according to his strong dislike of any emphasis on *repentance. Emerson, son of a Unitarian minister and descended from Puritans, began his career as a Unitarian preacher but, in a crisis of vocation, shortly resigned to pursue an interest in Montaigne and certain writers of the English Romantic movement. As a colloquial philosopher in an era when the popular lecture was displacing the sermon in literary importance, he perceived where his future lay: "I believe that wherever we go, whatever we do, self is the sole subject we study and learn . . . but as self means Devil, so it means God." In his pursuit of the "God within," and despite his railing at "sulphurous Calvinism," he found, in his poem "The Problem" (1839), that "Out from the heart of nature rolled / the burdens of the Bible old." Though his antinomian redefinition of those burdens, most memorably expressed in his famous essay "On Self-Reliance" (1841), is what he has most contributed to the "biblical tradition" in American literature, Emerson could on occasion quickly revert to Puritan humility before an omnipotent God, as in "Grace" (1842).

In prose fiction, the novels of James Fenimore Cooper make extended use of biblical analogy for frontier experience. In a recrudescence of the Puritan pattern, Amer of The Oak Openings (1848) thinks the Bible addresses itself particularly to him, directing that he should lead the Indians, descendants of the lost tribes of Israel, back to Palestine. In The Last of the Mohicans (1826) Gamut is a singer of psalms who idolizes King *David. Yet Cooper is critical of the Puritan instinct for typological autobiography in The Deerslayer (1841), where he rejects the appropriation to the self of divine authority on the basis of forced biblical analogy. Despite their anti-Christian stance, Nathaniel Hawthorne's novels and short stories are rich in biblical allusions, though often as parody: in "Roger Malvin's Burial," the character Reuben is not only a superficial parallel to his biblical namesake, but a type of Israel seeking redemption from "Cyrus." In Herman Melville's epic-novel Moby-Dick (1851), notwithstanding a fierce resistance to Calvinistic religion, a rich synthesis of biblical narrative and typology reveals a knowledge of the Bible that might almost have done credit to a Puritan divine; Melville's text opens with the evocative words, "Call me Ishmael." In Pierre (1852), he explores the theme of failed "imitation of Christ," to which he returns in the posthumously published Billy Budd (1924); in The Confidence Man (1857) he has the prototypical beguiler, Satan himself, come on board the American ship of faith, Fidele, and, by arguing that there are no trustworthy texts (in that the Bible itself is a devilish beguiler), demonstrate that there are in fact no real Christians aboard. The writings of Edgar Allen Poe, who refers to the Qur'ān more approvingly than the Bible, are surprisingly rich in biblicisms, and one story, "The Cask of Amontillado" (1846), has been read as a demonic parody of the Passion.

The work of these major fiction writers illustrates that if resistance to the formidable biblical inclusiveness of Puritan views of history and writing had been largely passive in the years from the mid-eighteenth century through the first quarter of the nineteenth century, it began to take on a more strident antinomian flavor during the period known as the American Literary Renaissance. This is particularly evident in the poets, of whom (beside Poe) Walt Whitman and Emily Dickinson suffice as illustration. The debt of Whitman's prosody, rhythm, and diction to the language of the King James Bible, along with his special interest in Judaism, does not hinder his Emersonian vindication of "the plain old Adam, the simple genuine self against the whole world." In "A Backward Glance O'er Traveled Roads," he tells us that in preparation for Leaves of Grass (1855) he grounded himself in both testaments, and the influence is clear enough at the level of structure. His tendency to see himself as a Christ or prophet, as in the climactic thirty-third section of Song of Myself, "I am the man, I suffered, I was there," is reinforced by his appreciation of the role of biblical prophets as visionary denouncers of social privilege and cultural hypocrisy.

Dickinson, as Herbert Schneidau has observed, presents an extreme case of the familiar paradox so apparent in Melville: "the more antinomian the American poet, the more he or she falls back upon the traditional guidebook." Her poetry requires extensive verbal familiarity with the Bible if its full import as a rejection of conformity with received traditions is to be fully understood. Following her years at Mount Holyoke Female Seminary, she sees the Bible as "an antique volume / Written by faded men / At the suggestion of Holy Spectres," rejecting with bitter ironies the orthodox and Calvinistic appropriation of the Bible in which she had been educated.

The presence of the Bible in nineteenth-century literature is largely a function of educational formation; still living off the spiritual and literary capital of the Puritan era, and possessed thereby of a biblical literacy paralleled today only in certain parts of the English-speaking third world, American writers almost unavoidably wrote in biblical language, whatever their subject. Yet "the one serious Christian novel of the age," and most seriously biblical, was Harriet Beecher Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin (1851–52). Its actual plot turns upon a biblical treatment of the problem of evil, specifically recollected in a crisis reading of Psalm 73, and the hero Tom is made to be the paragon of the imitation of Christ in his nonviolent resistance to persecution and oppression. Yet this enormously popular work—as to a lesser extent the work of George Washington Cable and Joseph Holy Ingraham's epistolary, sensationalist and trivializing life of Christ, The Prince of the House of David (1855)—are, despite their success in the marketplace, exceptions that merely define the literary mainstream of the later nineteenth century, as represented by the realists Mark Twain, W. D. Howells, and Henry James. Twain (Samuel Clemens), especially in Innocents Abroad (1869), Adventures of Huckleberry Finn (1883), and A Connecticut Yankee in King Arthur's Court (1889), offers narrators who seem to know much about the Bible, yet for strategic purposes deploy it incorrectly. Twain's notorious antireligiosity grows steadily less covert and less comic (but note Eve's Diary [1906]) toward the end of his life, obliterating even this use of the Bible in the despairing cynicism of A Mysterious Stranger (1916). W. D. Howells, raised a Swedenborgian and matured as an agnostic, is said to have known much of the Bible by heart, and his Rise of Silas Lapham (1885) loosely rewords the story of *Jacob and *Esau. Henry James, whose "A Passionate Pilgrim" (1871) is heading back to the European "Egypt," makes almost no significant use of the Bible, except perhaps in the title only of The Golden Bowl (1904), which may be an enigmatic residue of Ecclesiastes 12.6. The Bible is largely displaced in the novels of the 1890s—in Hamlin Garland, Kate Chopin, Frank Norris, Jack London; even in the work of Stephen Crane, son of a Methodist minister, there are few traceable echoes. Exceptions to this generalization in "serious" literature were historical novels based upon biblical times, of which General Lew Wallace's Ben-Hur (1880) was the most successful, followed by Henry K. Sienkiewicz's Quo Vadis? (1896), based upon the apostolic labors of *Peter. Even Henry Adams attempted a religious-historical novel, though his Esther (1884) was not popular.

Among the American poets writing between the two world wars, Robert Frost reflects an ambivalent attitude toward the Bible as a source, choosing the painful paradoxes of *Job as the material for his most overtly biblical poem, A Masque of Reason (1945). On the one hand, popular taste was being formed by the popular religious novels of Lloyd C. Douglas, notably The Robe (1942) and The Fisherman (1949), the first of which was made into a movie, and more thoughtfully in the novels of Scholem Asch, including The Nazarene (1939), The Apostle (1943), Mary (1949), and Moses (1951). On the other, the poetry and celebrated conversion of T. S. Eliot was prompting the renewal of intellectual interest in the Bible among poets and dramatists in some ways unprecedented since the Puritans. Marianne Moore was by 1920 the "poet's poet" in America. Her poetry, fluent in biblical story and idiom, reached the height of its achievement toward the end of World War II, and is exemplified in poems rich in allusion to *Jonah ("Sojourn in a Whale") and Job ("In Distrust of Merits"). Biblical allusions nonetheless waned in the poetry of Vachel Lindsay, after General William Booth Enters into Heaven (1913), and is of small consequence in the work of e. e. cummings, Edna St. Vincent Millay and Hart Crane—even John Crowe Ransome and Allen Tate—though biblical phrasing flavors the work of William Carlos Williams. In quite different accents it persists in some of the writers of the Harlem Renaissance, such as Langston Hughes and Countee Cullen.

In the drama, meanwhile, as in the popular novel, there had merged a tradition of modern retelling of biblical stories: George Cabot Lodge's Cain (1904), F. E. Pierce's The World That God Destroyed (1911), William Ford Manley's The Mess of Pottage (1928), Richard Burton's Rahab (1906), Scholem Asch's Jephthah's Daughter (1915), and R. G. Moulton's The Book of Job (1918). Marc Connelly's famous Green Pastures (1929), Eugene O'Neill's Belshazzar (1915), and Archibald MacLeish's acclaimed J.B., a modernization of the Job story (1958), along with his earlier Nobodaddy (1926), a verse play using *Adam, *Eve, *Cain, and Abel (cf. his volume, Songs for Eve [1954]), illustrate something of the diversity of dramatizations of subjects from the Hebrew Bible. Plays on New Testament subjects, though less numerous, were more influential: O'Neill's Lazarus Laughed (1925), Thornton Wilder's Now the Servant's Name Was Malchus (1928) and Hast Thou Considered My Servant Job? (a play about Christ, Satan, and Judas), Robinson Jeffers's dramatic poem Dear Judas (1929), along with Marie Doran's Quo Vadis? (1928), a dramatic adaptation of the novel of Sienkiewicz, highlight a flurry of activity in the 1920s. These plays with their tendency to recharacterize New Testament narratives, are a sharp contrast to the still traditional biblical drama of the prewar period, well represented in Charles Kennedy's The Terrible Meek (1912), and anticipate successful cinematic and musical adaptations of the Christ-Judas-Peter narrative in the 1960s and 1970s.

Biblical motif more than biblical language or narrative plot marks a residual influence of the Bible on American fiction of the modern period, often hearkening back to the old Puritan typology and theology of a "God-blessed America." In Walker Percy's Love in the Ruins (1971), a biblically encoded national mythology is called up nostalgically in a time when it seems actually to have lost much of its cultural and religious power. In titles that are evocative rather than indicative, biblical allusion is often used as if to borrow a mythological authority for writing unsure of how to proceed without a shareable literary foundation: F. Scott Fitzgerald's This Side of Paradise (1920) and The Beautiful and the Damned (1922), John Steinbeck's East of Eden (1952) and Grapes of Wrath (1939), Katherine Anne Porter's Pale Horse, Pale Rider (1939), James Baldwin's The Fire Next Time (1963), William Faulkner's Go Down, Moses (1942), Saul Bellow's The Victim (1947), and Walker Percy's The Second Coming (1980), all indicate a tendency to call upon biblical points of reference—and a specific mode—to express *apocalyptic apprehension. Elsewhere the biblical titles call up a mood of lamentation in Faulkner's Absalom, Absalom! (1936) or, as in Ernest Hemingway's use of Ecclesiastes, an experience of undermined foundations and lost identities in The Sun Also Rises (1926). James Agee's Let Us Now Praise Famous Men (1941), in a related vein, makes use of Sirach 44 to create a jeremiad on a lost sense of national covenant history.

The *parable has become another discernible mode in modern American fiction, with Hemingway's The Old Man and the Sea (1952) as perhaps the most eminent modern example. Biblical titles continue to appear, as in Wright Morris's "The Ram in the Thicket" (1951), with only a loosely allusive function; even in writers with notably religious concerns, such as Percy or Flannery O'Connor ("The Lame Shall Enter First"; The Violent Bear It Away [1960]), substantive use of biblical material is rare.

What Ursula Brumm describes as "the figure of Christ in American literature" (Partisan Review 24 [1957]), notably in Hemingway, Faulkner, and Ralph Ellison's The Invisible Man (1952), is in effect an attempt to give transcendent meaning to the chaotic complexity of ordinary life in which the innocent are made to suffer. Theodore Ziolkowski had identified Gore Vidal's Messiah (1954) and John Barth's Giles Goat Boy (1966) as "demonic parodies of the life of Christ," works in which "all questions of meaning aside, the events as set down immutably in the Gospels prefigure the action of the plot" (Fictional Transfigurations of Jesus [1972], p. 26). Such works, however much narrative analogues to the Bible, are in effect "anti-Gospels"—diametrically opposite to the imitation of Christ such as is represented in American fiction by Charles M. Sheldon's "Bible Belt" classic In His Steps (1896). By the second half of the twentieth century, the "Christ-figure" has often become "Antichrist."

The Bible continues, nonetheless, to shape and texture American fiction in more traditional fashion. John Updike, in novels whose protagonists bear the consistent character of the fallen Adam—Rabbit, Run (1960), Rabbit Redux (1971), Rabbit Is Rich (1981), and Rabbit at Rest (1990)—as well as The Centaur (1963), and Roger's Version (1987), uses biblical allusion and elements of ancestral saga in the shaping of narrative; in his Couples (1968) the hero is identified with *Lot living in the cities of the plain (the coast near Boston), fleeing *Sodom with his two daughters and leaving behind his wife turned to salt. Another writer who demands considerable biblical literacy from his readers and whose use of the Bible extends from title to precept and narrative elements as well as significant allusion, is Chaim Potok, notably in his novels of Jewish life in New York, The Chosen (1967) and The Promise (1969). American Jewish fiction born of more recent immigrant experience readily employs biblical analogue for covenant saga, jeremiad, even apocalyptic (Saul Bellows's Mr. Sammler's Planet [1969]) and, in the stories of Isaac Bashevis Singer, parable. The reemergence of these biblically informed genres lends an appearance of continuity with forms of literary imagination familiar in American literature from its seventeenth-century Puritan beginnings.

Canada. Canadian literature grew up slowly at the end of the eighteenth century and the beginning of the nineteenth; thus, heavily influenced by enlightenment taste and romantic self-consciousness, it did not turn readily to the Bible as a foundational literature. The dramatic poem Jephthah's Daughter (1865), published by Charles Heavysege shortly after his arrival in Canada, is perhaps the only significant example of biblical influence before the twentieth century. Without any equivalent to the Puritan legacy of American writers, English Canadian authors begin to take a significant interest in the Bible only after its "rediscovery," following the influence of Matthew Arnold in Britain, as a "secular" literature, and, subsequently, the success of Jewish writers in Canada following World War II. French Canadian authors have made even less use of scriptural sources, even by way of allusion, although Yves Theriault, in Aaron (1954), a novel about an orthodox Jew who loses his son to gentiles, is a notable parallel to contemporary developments in English Canadian fiction.

While Morley Callaghan incorporated religious ideas and even doctrines into some of his many novels, his conspicuous use of biblical allusion is peripheral: in Such Is My Beloved (1934), for example, the priest-protagonist concludes his frustrated idealism in a mental hospital working on a commentary on the *Song of Solomon; other of Callaghan's suggestively biblical titles fit their plots still more loosely, as is the case in They Shall Inherit the Earth (1935) and More Joy in Heaven (1937). Howard O'Hagan's Tay John (1939) draws on Native American mythology as well as biblical sources in a story of suffering and self-generated attempts at atonement that contrasts sharply with E. J. Pratt's use of similar sources in his poem Brebeuf and His Brethren (1940). Other more or less gratuitously allusive titles include Sinclair Ross's As For Me and My House (1941) and W. O. Mitchell's Who Has Seen the Wind (1947), and, with varying degrees of apropos, Hugh MacLennan's The Watch That Ends the Night (1959) and Marian Engel's The Glassy Sea (1978).

Beyond the echoing allusions of writers such as Archibald Lampman, E. J. Pratt, P. K. Page, and James Reaney, Canadian poetry and drama have produced few examples of formative biblical influence. Among these may be counted Jay Macpherson's The Boatman (1957) and Margaret Avison's Sunblue (1980), in the latter of which the poet still gladly countenances "The Bible to be Believed." Renewal of Canadian literary interest in the Arnoldian tradition, evidenced in Northrop Frye's discussion of the Bible as foundational literature in The Great Code (1982) and Words with Power (1990), is necessarily oblique to the generative power of the Bible for those writing out of an immediate experience of it as textual authority, such as Avison, Rudy Wiebe, or, most centrally, A. M. Klein. Klein's "Five Characters" is a penetrating analysis of the book of *Esther, and his "Koheleth" is a reading back of the dark sayings of *Ecclesiastes into the mind behind the utterances. He writes in imitation of the *Psalms in The Psalter of Avram Haketani (1948) (a volume that has in turn influenced the prose psalms of Jubilee repentance of Leonard Cohen, A Book of Mercy [1984]), in whimsical parody of "Jonah," and in moving evocation of Hebrew apocalyptic in A Voice Was Heard in Ramah (1948).

A revival of more substantial engagement of the Bible in Canadian fiction may be traced to A. M. Klein's novel of Jewish covenant history, The Second Scroll (1951), a "double tale" composed of five books named for those of the *Torah and five "glosses." While Ernest Buckler's The Mountain and the Valley (1952), with its artist protagonist David Canaan, is recognizably influenced by New England writers, it is an exception proving the rule that Puritan covenant theology has had little impact on Canadian literary consciousness. The Second Scroll was followed by another novel of diaspora Jewish life, Adele Wiseman's The Sacrifice (1956), in which Abraham and Sarah flee pogroms in the Ukraine during which their sons Jacob and Moses are murdered at Easter (Passover) by Christians only to have their son of later years, Isaac die while saving a copy of the Torah from the flames. Rudy Wiebe's Peace Shall Destroy Many (1962) and subsequent The Blue Mountains of China (1970), with its own epic recounting of family/covenant history of the Mennonite diaspora, follow Klein and Wiseman in the way in which contemporary life is grafted directly onto biblical narrative, or made to seem an outgrowth of it. Margaret Laurence's The Stone Angel (1964), whose heroine Hagar is a rebel not only against her husband Bram but against God and the world, is a tale from without, a novel molded by the protagonist's sense of covenantal exclusion. It is not, however, like Timothy Findley's grisly and angry redrafting of the story of *Noah, Not Wanted on the Voyage (1984), a demonic parody of the Bible, or like Wiebe's My Lovely Enemy (1983), a desacralization and inversion of biblical salvation history.

Resistance to the influence of the Bible, especially as represented by the American Puritan legacy in political life, reaches its zenith in Margaret Atwood's The Handmaid's Tale (1985), a dystopia in which American fundamentalists have erected a society based on a rigid implementation of biblical law and social custom. Atwood's apocalyptic tale is an antijeremiad, expressing Canadian fears of a biblicist America declaring itself the only "chosen," and serves to indicate much of the basis for the strikingly divergent uses of biblical tradition in Canadian and American literature.

DAVID LYLE JEFFREY

Literature, The Bible As. An appreciation for the literary artistry of the Bible began early in the history of interpretation. It reached a high water mark during the era of the Renaissance and Protestant Reformation, when poets and storytellers viewed the Bible as a literary model to be emulated, and when interpreters of the Bible were sensitive to its literary style and genres.

The idea of the Bible as literature received sporadic attention throughout the twentieth century, but its most notable revival began in the late 1960s, when high school and college courses in the literature of the Bible became popular. By the 1980s, the literary approach had attracted the allegiance of biblical scholars, whose traditional methods became strongly influenced by, and often replaced by, tools of analysis long practiced by literary critics in the humanities.

How Literary Is the Bible? Acceptance of a literary approach to the Bible has always been rendered difficult (and sometimes suspect) because of the mixed nature of biblical writing. Three impulses and three corresponding types of material exist side by side in the Bible: the didactic or theological impulse to teach religious truth, the historical impulse to record and interpret historical events, and the literary/aesthetic impulse to recreate experiences and be artistically beautiful. This combination of religious, documentary, and literary interests in the Bible has made the literary study of the Bible different from the study of other literature. Literary critics of the Bible find themselves sharing the same book with scholars who approach it with very different methods.

Despite this complexity, the literary approach to the Bible can be defined with precision. It is rooted in an awareness that literature is itself a genre with identifying traits. These include the impulse to image reality and human experience instead of conveying abstract information, the presence of literary genres, reliance on figurative language and rhetorical devices, an interest in artistry as something intrinsically valuable (with special emphasis on unity), and stylistic excellence. A literary approach to the Bible begins with these features as its agenda of concerns and proceeds to apply familiar tools of literary analysis to the parts of the Bible that are most thoroughly literary in nature.

An Imaginative Book. To say that the Bible is an imaginative book is to call attention to the most important differentia of literature—its impulse to image reality. Whereas expository or informational writing tends toward abstraction and proposition, the aim of literature is to recreate an experience as concretely as possible. Literature takes human experience rather than abstract thought as its subject, and it puts a reader through an experience instead of appealing primarily to a grasp of ideas. The truth that literature portrays is primarily truthfulness to human experience in the world.

Biblical writing as a whole exists on a continuum between the poles of the expository and the literary, or between propositions and images (including characters and events), but the literary impulse to incarnate meaning—to image experience—probably dominates. Wherever we turn in the Bible, we find appeals to our image-making and image-perceiving capacity. The Bible is consistently rooted in the concrete realities of human life in this world, and a literary approach is sensitive to this experiential dimension.

It is a truism that whereas history tells us what happened, literature tells us what happens. Literature portrays universal human experience and as a result does not go out of date. A literary approach to the Bible is therefore interested in the universal, always-recognizable human experiences that are portrayed. In the Bible, we see ourselves, not only characters and events from the past. *Adam and *Jacob, *David and *Ruth are paradigms of the human condition as well as figures in historical narrative.

Because biblical literature embodies its meanings in characters, events, and images, it communicates by indirectness. It gives example rather than precept. The result is that literature puts a greater burden of interpretation on a reader than straightforward expository prose does. Even such a simple literary form as *metaphor ("God is light") requires a reader to interpret how one thing is like another. Here, too, the Bible shows itself to be a work of imagination. Again and again we find that biblical writers entrust their utterance to a literary medium in order to achieve the memorability, affective power, and truthfulness to lived experience that are characteristic of literature.

Literary Genres in the Bible. The commonest way to define literature is by its genres or literary types. Through the centuries, people have agreed that certain genres (such as story, poetry, and drama) are literary in nature. Other types, such as historical chronicles, theological essays, and genealogies, are expository (informational). Still others can fall into either category. Letters, sermons, and orations, for example, can move in the direction of literature by virtue of experiential concreteness, figurative language, and artistic style.

The Bible is a mixture of genres, some of them literary in nature. The major literary genres in the Bible are narrative or story, *poetry (especially lyric poetry), proverb, and visionary writing (including *prophecy and *apocalypse). The New Testament *letters frequently become literary because of their occasional nature, figurative language, and rhetorical or artistic patterning. Other literary genres of note in the Bible include epic, tragedy, *gospel, *parable, satire, pastoral, oratory, encomium, epithalamion (wedding poem), elegy (funeral poem), and a host of subtypes of lyric poetry (such as nature poem, psalm of praise, lament, love poem, psalm of worship, hymn).

Genre study is central to any literary approach to the Bible because every genre has its own conventions, expectations, and corresponding rules of interpretation. A biblical story, for example, is a sequence of events, not a series of ideas. It is structured around a plot conflict, not a logical argument. It communicates by means of setting, character, and event, not propositions. In short, the literary genres of the Bible require us to approach them in terms of the conventions and procedures that they possess.

Literary Language and Rhetoric. Literature uses distinctive resources of language. This is most evident in poetry. Poets, for example, think in images and figures of speech: God is a shepherd, people are sheep, the tongue is a fire. It is noteworthy how much of the Bible is poetic in form, including books in which it dominates: Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Solomon, and most of the prophets.

The whole realm of figurative language looms large in any consideration of the Bible as literature. Figurative language in the Bible includes *metaphor, simile, symbol, hyperbole, apostrophe (address to someone or something absent as though they or it were present), personification, paradox, pun, *irony, and wordplay. These resources of language are not limited to poetry but pervade the entire Bible, including parts of it that would not be considered primarily literary. Everywhere we turn in the Bible—in narrative, in the prophecy, in the Gospels, in the New Testament epistles, in apocalypse—we find figurative language. In fact, it is hard to find a page of the Bible that does not contain figurative language.

The literary use of language also includes rhetorical devices, or language arranged by stylized patterns. Examples include parallel sentences or clauses (the standard verse form in biblical poetry), any highly patterned arrangement of clauses or words or phrases, rhetorical questions, question and answer constructions, imaginary dialogues, and the aphoristic conciseness of a proverb. These rhetorical forms pervade the Bible, lending a literary quality to the Bible as a whole, giving it qualities of conscious artistry and heightening the audience's attention.

Artistry in the Bible. Literature is an art form, and one of the criteria by which we classify something as literary is the presence of beauty, form, craft, and technique. The elements of artistic form include pattern or design, unity, theme and variation, balance, contrast, symmetry, repetition or recurrence, coherence, and unified progression. The artistic spirit regards these as having inherent value.

When judged by these criteria of aesthetic form or beauty, the Bible contains artistic and literary masterpieces. The stories of the Bible are models of concise shapeliness, with every detail contributing to the total effect. Biblical *poetry, as well as some of its prose (notably the discourses of Jesus), is composed with conscious artistry in the form known as parallelism, in which two or more lines use different words to express the same idea in similar grammatical form. Whole books of the Bible show similar evidence of artistic patterning, with the gospel according to *Matthew, for example, alternating between sections of narrative and sections of discourse.

The most basic of all artistic principles is unity, and one of the things that has set off the literary approach to the Bible from other approaches is a preoccupation with unifying patterns and literary wholes. Literary unity consists of various things: the structure of a work or passage, a dominant theme, an image pattern, or progressive development of a motif. Whatever form it takes, unity is evidence of an artistic urge for order, shapeliness, and wholeness of effect.

Several functions are served by the artistry that we find in the Bible. Artistry intensifies the impact of what is said, but it also serves the purposes of pleasure, delight, and enjoyment. These purposes are abundantly satisfied when we read the Bible, as has been repeatedly shown by literary critics, who assume and find conscious artistry and design there.

The Literary Unity of the Bible. The central protagonist in the overall story of the Bible is God. The characterization of God is the central literary concern of the Bible, and it is pursued from beginning to end. Hardly anything is viewed apart from its relation to the deity.

The Bible is also unified by its religious orientation. It is pervaded by a consciousness of the presence of God. Human experience is constantly viewed in a religious and moral light. One result is that the literature of the Bible invests human experience with a sense of ultimacy. A vivid consciousness of values pervades biblical literature.

Literary archetypes also unify the Bible. Archetypes are master images that recur throughout the Bible and throughout literature. They are either images (light, water, hill), character types (hero, villain, king), or plot motifs (journey, rescue, temptation). The Bible is filled with such archetypes or master images, which lend an elemental quality to the Bible and make its world strongly unified in a reader's imagination.

The Necessity of a Literary Approach. The foregoing discussion suggests why a literary approach to the Bible is necessary. The Bible is, in significant ways, a work of literature. It will yield its meanings fully only if explored in terms of its kinds of writing. Understanding it depends partly on the reader's ability to be receptive to concrete pictures of human experience, to know what to expect from various literary genres, to interpret figurative language and recognize rhetorical patterns. Finally, a literary approach can also enhance the enjoyment of the Bible.

LELAND RYKEN

Loans and Interest. Indebtedness arose variously, but in loans the lender had discretion whether to show "grace and favor" when approached with a request. Terms would naturally tend to depend on one's relationship with the borrower. Because of the Israelites' acceptance of God's plan for their welfare and their remembrance of him (Ezek. 22.12), they must be generous in lending, in taking and keeping any pledge (Exod. 22.25–27; Deut. 24.10–13), and in the use of landed security (Neh. 5.4, 11).

There are three main classes of loan: for use, as distinct from hire (Exod. 3.21–22; 22.14–15; 2 Kings 4.3; 6.5); for consumption (Deut. 23.19; Neh. 5.10; Luke 11.5); and for business. The Bible does not deal with the third. The others demanded attention, for the parties were seldom on equal terms. The sabbatical year (Deut. 15.2–3; Neh. 10.31) was intended to cancel all loans; but so benevolent a provision impaired borrowers' credit (Deut. 15.7–11) until Hillel invented a form of agreement to protect it. Biblical traditions extol the granting of loans, praising all who are ready to lend (Pss. 37.26; 112.5) even though the "wicked" may not repay (Ps. 37.21) or restore a loaned object. The parties' interests tended to be opposed (Isa. 24.2); a loan could sour relationships (Jer. 15.10). Accordingly, "righteous" lenders must not profit from their neighbors by charging interest (KJV "usury"), enriching themselves from others' calamities (Lev. 25.36–37; Deut. 23.19, 20; Ps. 15.5; Ezek. 18.8, 13, 17; 22.12). Usurers did charge interest (Deut. 23.20; Prov. 28.8), although a Jewish court would reject a usurious transaction between Jews. But since the lender had the upper hand (Prov. 22.7) and since "righteousness" was reputable, society favored interest-free loans. God had promised that, if his people obeyed him, they would always lend to foreigners, who would defer to them (Deut. 15.6; 28.12, 44).

The *Torah allowed lending at interest to non-Jews. It certainly protected indigent Jews from exploitation (Exod. 22.25); but all loans, including commercial loans, fell under regulation by *Pharisees. To evade this, capital was sometimes invested with entrepreneurs on the basis that the parties became partners and that the party with capital hired the other as an employee. The return on such capital was not, technically, "usury" (Matt. 25.14, 16, 27; Luke 19.13, 23).

Another scheme obliged debtors who owed rent or advances of cash to acknowledge a duty to supply commodities, the value of which incorporated, in effect, capital and interest—a device found in Egyptian papyri. It would be righteous to scale such debts down (Luke 16.4–8, 9), for concealed usury violated the spirit of the Torah.

The New Testament urges the ready granting of loans (Matt. 5.42) without speculating whether the borrower will ever reciprocate (Luke 6.34–35). The Hebrew Bible distinguishes gifts and loans, but even a loan can be a good deed. He who shows kindness to the poor lends to the Lord (Prov. 19.17). Such is the religious dimension of a legal transaction, that even a thoughtful cancellation of an insolvent's debts (Matt. 18.27; Luke 7.41–42) can prove the creditor's mindfulness of God.

J. DUNCAN M. DERRETT

Logos, Grk. "word." In the prologue of the gospel according to *John, the logos is the divine word, a self-communicating divine presence that existed with God and was uniquely manifested in Jesus Christ. The Johannine logos is strongly parallel to the concept of *wisdom in Hellenistic Jewish thought, where already wisdom and word were associated (Wisd. of Sol. 9.1–2). Wisdom or Word was God's creative presence through which the world came into being. John's gospel affirms that this same divine presence was fully and (in contrast to the usual thinking about wisdom) uniquely present in Jesus Christ. It was a redemptive presence that was necessary because the world had rejected the original creative presence. The word was not in Jesus simply as verbal communication, but entered fully into human life. The *incarnation of the word brought life to human beings, to whom it was otherwise unavailable (John 1.1–18).

The Johannine prologue is the only fully explicit statement of the theme of incarnation in the New Testament, though the rest of the gospel of John shows in narrative form what the coming of the logos meant. The prologue of the gospel is echoed in 1 John 1.1 ("the word of life") and in the imagery of Revelation 19.13, where Christ, "the Word of God," appears as a warrior.

In the Hebrew Bible, the *word of God is both creative (Gen. 1.; Isa. 55.10–11) and commanding (Amos 3.1). This background contributed to the general usage of the term logos in the New Testament, where the "word" often signifies the Christian message (2 Cor. 2.17; cf. 1 Cor. 1.18). This field of meaning was drawn into the interpretation of the logos of John's prologue, but was only indirectly in its background.

In Greek, logos meant both spoken word and pervading principle. *Stoic philosophy, using the latter meaning, saw the logos as the ordering principle of the universe; the wise person aims to live in harmony with it. This meaning, though not a direct background for John's logos, was quickly drawn into the interpretation of John as "logos theology" developed in the second century CE. This was a principal means of making Christian thought intelligible to its environment; but this later logos theology was more rationalistic than was the gospel of John.

Christ as the logos was an important avenue of development of the doctrine of the *Trinity, but logos was eventually largely replaced by other terms ("hypostasis," "person,") because logos appeared to make of Christ a second God.

See also Creation; Philo.

WILLIAM A. BEARDSLEE

Lord's Prayer. Also known as the "Our Father" (Latin Pater noster) from its first words, the Lord's Prayer occurs in the New Testament in two slightly different forms. The longer form is included in Matthew's account of Jesus' *Sermon on the Mount (6.9–13) and reads (in the NRSV):

Our Father in heaven, hallowed be your name.
Your kingdom come.
Your will be done,
on earth as it is in heaven.
Give us this day our daily bread.
And forgive us our debts,
as we also have forgiven our debtors.
And do not bring us to the time of trial, but rescue us from the evil one.

The doxology at the close ("For the kingdom and the power and the glory are yours forever. Amen") is absent in ancient and important Greek manuscripts, and is not mentioned in early commentaries on the Lord's Prayer by Tertullian, Cyprian, and Origen. It occurs in twofold form ("power and glory") in the Didache (8.2). In liturgical use, some kind of doxology (perhaps composed on the model of 1 Chron. 29.11–13) could have concluded such a prayer as this.

The shorter form of the Lord's Prayer is given in Luke 11.2–4, where Jesus responds to a disciple's request, "Lord, teach us to pray," with the following:

Father, hallowed be your name.
Your kingdom come.
Give us each day our daily bread.
And forgive us our sins, for we ourselves forgive everyone indebted to us.
And do not bring us to the time of trial.

Later manuscripts, on which the King James Version depends, include additions that assimilate the Lucan form of the Prayer to that in Matthew. Furthermore, two Greek manuscripts of the Gospels (no. 162, dated 1153 CE, and no. 700, of the eleventh century) replace the petition "Your kingdom come" with "Your holy Spirit come upon us and cleanse us." This adaptation may have been used when celebrating the rite of *baptism or the *laying on of hands.

It is likely that Luke's shorter version is closer to the original and that Matthew's is an elaboration. But, of course, Jesus may well have given the prayer in different forms on different occasions.

It would seem that the mode of address that Jesus habitually used in prayer to God was "*Abba, dear Father" (the only exception is Mark 15.34, itself a quotation from Ps. 22.1). It seems that nowhere in the literature of the *prayers of ancient Judaism does the invocation of God as "Abba" occur. Perhaps there is an intimacy of relationship implied here that others had hesitated to use. However, in teaching his followers to address God in this way, Jesus lets them share in his own communion with God. That they rejoiced to do so is apparent in the letters of Paul (see Gal. 4.6; Rom. 8.15). Ancient Christian liturgies reflect something of the sense of privilege in using this approach when they preface the Lord's Prayer with the words "We are bold to say 'Our Father.' "

But if the address "Our Father" suggests intimacy, not to say familiarity, the next words, "in heaven," speak of the "otherness," the holiness, the awesomeness of God. It is when these two aspects of approach to God are held together in creative tension that real prayer can be engaged in. Further, the plural "our" should be noted—not, at least in this instance, "my." This is the prayer that Jesus' followers as members of one family are bidden to say together (see Matt. 12.49–50 and par.); the Father presides over the family unit.

Following the invocation in the Matthean form of the prayer, the petitions fall into two parts: three "you" petitions are followed by "we" petitions. The former focus on God and his purposes in the world; the latter pertain to our provision, pardon, and protection. In other words, before any thought is given to human need ("our daily bread") or even to divine forgiveness of sins or to the problem of temptation, God's name, God's kingdom, God's will must first engage our attention. This is the order of precedence when human beings engage in communication with the God who is at once immanent and transcendent.

"Your will be done" is not a prayer of resignation, but one for the full accomplishment of the divine purpose (as in Matt. 26.42). The words "on earth as it is in heaven" may be taken with all three preceding petitions.

The Greek adjective (epiousios), usually translated "daily," is extremely rare; it may mean "[the bread we need] for tomorrow." In either case, the sense is that we are to pray for one day's rations, perhaps with the implied suggestion that asking for more would be to engage in needless concern for the future (cf. Matt. 6.25–34).

The petition for God's forgiveness is closely linked with our forgiveness of one another (the difference in tenses between the Matthean and Lucan versions should be noted); Matthew elaborates the teaching in the following verses (6.14–15). The *Aramaic word for "debt" is used in rabbinic writings to mean "sin," and would be so understood by Jesus' hearers.

The petition often translated "lead us not into temptation" is best understood as a prayer to be kept in the hour of severe trial; it is an acknowledgment of spiritual frailty (cf. 1 Cor. 10.12) in the face of the evil one (or evil, for the Greek can mean either; see Satan; Temptation).

DONALD COGGAN

Lord's Supper. In 1 Corinthians 11.20 Paul refers to a gathering of church members at Corinth to eat "the Lord's supper," complaining that the way in which they did so was not consistent with the true character of the meal. What was meant to be a proclamation of the Lord's death was being celebrated as an occasion for gluttony and even *drunkenness. This is the only passage in the New Testament where the meal is described by this name. In what is no doubt a reference to the same meal, Paul states (1 Cor. 10.16) that the Christians came together to "break bread"; hence, we can assume that "the breaking of bread" (Acts 2.46) was another name for the same occasion. The same verse, with its reference to sharing (Grk. koinōnia) in the body and blood of Christ, is the source of the name "(Holy) Communion" for the meal, and the association with thanksgiving (Grk. eucharistoun) in 1 Corinthians 11.24 is the rationale for calling it the Eucharist.

The only full discussion of this meal in the New Testament is in 1 Corinthians 11.17–34, where Paul deals with irregularities that had arisen in the congregation at *Corinth. They met, doubtless in the home of one of their members, to have a communal meal, and it is likely that the practice of meeting weekly on the first day of the week (Acts 20.7; cf. 1 Cor. 16.2) was developing. It was a full meal, but apparently each person brought his or her own food (11.21). Since the church consisted of richer and poorer members, differences in the amount and quality of the food and drink existed, so that the social differences in the church were emphasized rather than diminished by this communal occasion. At some point in the meal there was a more formal sharing in a loaf of bread and a cup of wine, which became the focus of significant symbolism.

Already in 1 Corinthians 10.16–17, Paul commented that those who shared in the loaf and the cup, for which thanks had been given to God, were participating in the body and blood of Christ. The reference must be to experiencing the benefits resulting from the death of Jesus, in which he gave himself and shed his *blood for the sake of others. At the same time Paul emphasized that those who took part in this way constituted one body; their common participation in the gift of salvation, as symbolized by the one loaf, meant that they belonged together in a way that should overcome the social and other differences that had arisen in the church. Thus, the meal was a powerful sign of unity within the local congregation.

The tradition that Paul had passed on to the church at the time of his visit there is found here in its oldest written form. We also have it in slightly divergent forms in the three *synoptic Gospels (Matt. 26.26–29; Mark 14.22–25; Luke 22.15–20, reversing the order of wine and bread). In all of these cases, we have a tradition of what Jesus said and did at his Last Supper with his twelve disciples shortly before his death. Analysis of the differences between the accounts shows that we have two basic forms of the tradition, one given by Mark (who is substantially followed by Matthew), and the other found in 1 Corinthians and Luke (though Luke has also been influenced by Mark). The major difference between the two traditions lies in the two sayings of Jesus:

MARK	1 CORINTHIANS
This is my body.	This is my body that is for you. Do this in remembrance of me.
This is my blood of the covenant	This cup is the new covenant in my blood which is poured out for many.	(Luke: + which is poured out for you.) Do this, as often as you drink it, in remembrance of me.

There is no agreement among scholars as to which is the older form of the tradition, but the differences are not too significant.

What we have here, then, is an account of the essential elements in the Last Supper that formed the pattern for the church's meal. It has been argued that the story in the Gospels is not so much a part of the story of Jesus as a liturgical text that was preserved on its own and then inserted into the gospel narrative. Some scholars would go further and claim that the story is based on early Christian liturgies rather than on history, the accounts of what the church did having been read back into the lifetime of Jesus. Still others claim that the uncertainty in the tradition of Jesus' sayings and how they express early Christian theology suggest that they are the creation of the early church (or at least that the original form has been heavily modified in transmission), with the result that we can no longer be sure what Jesus said. For example, the presence of the command to "do this" in remembrance of Jesus, which is lacking from Mark's account, given once in Luke and twice in 1 Corinthians, could be due to the early church putting into words what it took to be the intention of Jesus. Even if this is the case, we would still be left with a tradition of Jesus' sharing a loaf and a cup with his disciples, and these actions would invite interpretation. In other words, to account for the origin of the church meal and the early Christians' appeal to Jesus we must surely postulate the historicity of some kind of meal he held.

The Gospels all suggest that the Last Supper of Jesus was associated in some way with the Jewish *Passover, though the Synoptics and John disagree on the date of that festival. Like other Jewish formal *meals, it began with the breaking and distribution of bread to the accompaniment of a prayer of thanksgiving, and it included the drinking of *wine. If it was a Passover meal, the main items of food would have been treated as symbols whose significance needed to be explained. There would then be a precedent for Jesus' explaining the significance of the loaf and the cup. Whether or not a Passover *lamb was served (as Luke 22.15 and the story of the preparations for the meal clearly imply), no record has survived of any interpretation of it. Instead, Jesus made three main comments. First, he spoke of this meal as the last that he would eat with his disciples until he ate with them in the *kingdom of God (Luke 22.16). This may suggest his imminent death. Second, he made the loaf a symbol of his body, and his distribution of the broken pieces suggests his giving of himself for others. Third, he made the cup a symbol of his blood. *Blood, however, signifies death. Jesus associated it with a new *covenant, and the echoes of Exodus 24.8 suggest a sacrificial death inaugurating a new covenant. The words "for many" are an allusion to the self-giving of the Servant of the Lord "for many" in Isaiah 53.11–12. And the way in which Jesus performed this act before his death implies that he was giving his disciples a way of remembering him and enjoying some kind of association with him after his death and during the period before they would share together in the kingdom of God. Hence, the meal that his disciples were to celebrate could be regarded as in some sense an anticipation of the meal that the *Messiah would celebrate with his disciples in the new age (cf. Matt. 8.11; Luke 14.15). Such a meal would not be merely a symbol or picture of the future meal but would be a real anticipation of it. This is clear from the language of 1 Corinthians 10.16. Here the believers who receive the loaf and the cup participate in the body and blood of Jesus. The language must not be pressed literally, since the body in fact includes the blood; rather, Paul is saying in two ways that believers have a share in Jesus who died for them. This interpretation is confirmed by his point that it is inconsistent for believers to take part also in meals at which food sacrificed to *idols was consumed: such a meal was a means of being "partners with demons" (1 Cor. 10.20), that is, having some kind of spiritual relationship to them. It is also confirmed by Luke's implication that the "breaking of bread" in Acts (2.42; etc.) was a continuation of the meals described in the appearances of Jesus after the *resurrection.

We can now see how Paul meant the meal to be celebrated at Corinth. It certainly was an occasion for joyful celebration rather than a funeral meal, but some of the Corinthian Christians carried this element to excess. But it was supremely a way of proclaiming the death of Jesus as a sacrifice on their behalf and the inauguration of the new covenant. It was an occasion for bringing believers together in unity rather than in disharmony. It was a meal for the temporary period before the Lord would return in triumph, and during that period it was one of the ways in which the union between the Lord and his people was expressed.

In Acts we have further evidence that the believers met regularly to break bread (2.42, 46; 20.7; and possibly 27.35). Since there is no reference in Acts to the cup or to any relevant sayings of Jesus, it is sometimes argued that here we have evidence of a somewhat different meal from the Pauline Lord's Supper, a joyful celebration of fellowship with the risen Lord rather than a memorial of his death. There is, however, nothing incompatible between the two types of account, and the combination of solemn remembrance of the Lord's death and joyful communion with him is entirely appropriate.

John's account of the Last Supper lacks the eucharistic elements found in the other Gospels, because for John it was not a Passover meal; John recorded elsewhere teaching ascribed to Jesus about eating his flesh and drinking his blood (6.53).

There are other allusions to the Lord's Supper in the New Testament. For example, the way in which the stories of Jesus feeding the multitudes are told (Mark 6.30–44; 8.1–10 par.) suggests that the evangelists saw a parallel between Jesus' feeding the people with bread and his spiritual nourishment of the church. And the development of the understanding of the death of Jesus that we find in the New Testament most probably had its roots in the words of institution where the basic concepts of sacrifice and covenant are to be found.

See also Love-feast; Sacrament.

I. Howard Marshall

Lot. The nephew of *Abraham and ancestor of *Moab and *Ammon. Because Abraham was the oldest son of Terah, and Lot's father, Abraham's brother Haran, had died (Gen. 11.27–28), Abraham was the head of the extended family and Lot was his dependent. As such, he traveled with Abraham to the land of *Canaan (Gen. 11.31); when a dispute arose between the two branches of the family over grazing land, Abraham arbitrated it, giving Lot first choice, and enabling him to settle in the *Jordan Valley (Gen 13.5–10), in the vicinity of *Sodom. When Lot was captured by raiding kings, Abraham led a campaign to rescue him (Gen 14.1–16), and when Sodom was about to be destroyed, Lot was spared (Gen 19.1–23), presumably because of his association with Abraham. Throughout these stories, Lot is portrayed as a less than heroic figure, who has no respect in his own family (Gen 19.14), is hesitant (19.16), and is tricked by his daughters (19.30–38).

This familial history is intertwined with etiological narratives that explain topographic features (the pillar of salt and the desolation of the Dead Sea region) and several names, especially Moab and Ammon. The account of the incestuous origin of these neighbors of Israel (Gen. 19.30–38) is both a genealogical recognition of shared ethnicity and a scurrilous rationalization of Israelite superiority.

In later literature, Lot is recalled as a righteous man, whose goodness saved him from Sodom's punishment (Wisd. of Sol. 10.6; 2 Pet. 2.7–8).

Michael D. Coogan

Love (Hebr. 'āhābâ; ḥesed). Human loves in all their rich variety fill the passages of biblical narrative: love at first sight (Gen. 29.18–20: Jacob and Rachel); sexual obsession (2 Sam. 13: Amnon and Tamar); family affection across generations (Gen. 22.2; 37.3; Ruth 4.15: between mother and daughter-in-law); long marital intimacy (1 Sam. 1: Elkanah and Hannah); servile devotion (Exod. 21.5); intense same-sex friendship (1 Sam. 18.1, 3; 20.17: David and Jonathan); enthusiastic loyalty toward a leader (1 Sam. 18.16, 28: Israel and Judah's love of David). But the religious significance of the Bible's view of love lies preeminently with its ways of speaking about God and most particularly about God's relationship with Israel. Israel's election, their redemption from Egypt (and, eventually, Babylon), the giving of the *Torah, the promise of the land—all are ascribed in biblical narrative and later rabbinic commentary to the fundamental and mysterious fact of God's love for Israel and the people's reciprocal love of God.

Human love serves as the readiest analogy when speaking of this relationship. God loves Israel as a husband loves his wife (Hos. 3.1; Jer.

2.2; Isa. 54.5–8), a father his firstborn son (Hos. 11.1–3; Jer. 31.9), a mother the child of her womb (Isa. 49.15). God manifests his love in and through his saving acts, most especially in his bringing Israel up from Egypt (Exod. 15.13; Deut. 4.37; 33.3; Neh. 9.17; Ps. 106.7; Hos. 11.4). Narratively and theologically, this liberation culminates in the Sinai *covenant, when God gives Israel his tôrâ (literally, "teaching"), instructing Israel on their social and religious obligations in light of their election. Chosen by God's love (Deut. 7.7–8; 10.15), Israel is to respond in kind: loving the God who redeemed them and revealed his will to them, teaching his ways to all future generations (Deut. 6.4–7).

The covenant binding God and Israel likewise binds together society. The individual is charged to "love your neighbor as yourself," kindred and foreigner both (Lev. 19.18, 34). The Bible specifies the concrete actions through which this love is to be expressed: support for the *poor (Lev. 19.9–10); honesty in measurements and in social interactions (v. 11); prompt payment to laborers; just law courts, favoring neither rich nor poor; respect for the elderly (vv. 13, 15, 32). A system of tithes underlay the welfare both of the poor, the fatherless (see Orphan), and the *widowed, and of *priests and *Levites who, unendowed with land, are "the Lord's portion" (Num. 18.20; Deut. 18.1–2). Right behavior, group affection, and communal social responsibility are thus the concrete measure of Israel's commitment to the covenant. And God, in turn, "keeps" or "guards" his steadfast love for Israel (Exod. 34.7; 1 Kings 3.6; Isa. 54.10; 55.3). Ultimately, Israel's confidence in redemption rests in her conviction that God's love is unwavering, his covenant eternal, his promises sure (Ps. 119.41; 130.7; Zeph. 3.17).

Much of this tradition, both social and theological, comes into the earliest strata of New Testament writings. Paul urges his gentiles in Galatia to be "servants of one another through love [Grk. agapē], for the whole law is fulfilled in one word, 'You shall love your neighbor as yourself' " (Gal. 5.13–14, quoting Lev. 19.18). In powerfully poetic language, he exhorts the Corinthians to be knit together as a community through love (1 Cor. 13–14; cf. Rom. 14.15). Mark's Jesus sums up the *Torah with the first line of the *Shema (love of God) and Leviticus 19.18 (love of neighbor; Mark 12.28–31). The *Q material of the later *synoptic Gospels extends this last: followers of Jesus are to love not just their *neighbor but also and even their enemies (Matt. 5.43–48 par.). Perhaps, by the criterion of multiple attestation, this ethic of passive —indeed, even active (Matt. 5.39–41)—nonresistance may go back to the historical Jesus himself. Paul teaches similarly: persecutors should be blessed; vengeance eschewed; injustice tolerated (Rom. 12.9–13.14; cf. 1 Cor. 6.7; so too other first-century Jewish texts, such as Joseph and Asenath 29.3–4 [cf. Prov. 20.22]; Josephus, Ag. Ap. 2.30.212 [cf. Deut. 20.19–20; 21.10–14]).

Love became the theological lodestone of nascent Christianity. Christ's sacrifice on the cross was understood as the ultimate sign of God's love for humanity (John 3.16; cf. Rom. 8.39). The eucharist (a community meal celebrating this sacrifice) was referred to as the agapē, or "*love-feast". Christians exhorted themselves to love one another (see esp. 1–3 John), calling each other brothers and sisters. Such designations and community enthusiasms, misheard at a hostile distance, fueled dislike of the new groups, who were often accused of expressing love carnally at their convocations (Tertullian, Apology; Minucius Felix, Octavius). Yet in their care for both their own poor and the poor of the late Roman city, Christians, like their Jewish contemporaries, distinguished themselves by acts of public philanthropy—a fact noted with some irritation by the non-Christian emperor Julian (the Apostate, ca. 360; Epistle 22). This philanthropy was the social expression of the scriptural injunction to love the neighbor.

The Christian concept of love, in both its social and its theological applications, underwent elaborate and idiosyncratic development in the work of Augustine. In the unprecedented ecclesiastical situation after Constantine (d. 337), with the church increasingly merging with late Roman imperial culture, Augustine argued that the state coercion of heretics (by which he meant most especially his schismatic rivals, the Donatists) at the behest of the church is an act of Christian love, since it is done for their ultimate spiritual welfare. Theologically, he explored the concept of the *Trinity as a dynamic of divine (and, ultimately, of human) loves: the Trinity should be understood on the analogy of the relations between and process of human self-knowledge and self-love (De Trinitate). Finally, and most influentially, Augustine came to analyze all humanity (and thus, given his theological anthropocentrism, all reality) according to loves: those enabled by God's love to love God belong to the "heavenly city"; those whom God leaves to their own fallen state love carnal things and thus belong to the "earthly city."

The City of God, Augustine's great masterwork, may thus be seen as a lengthy survey of the history of love, from angels through pagan culture to Israel and finally to the ultimate revelation of God's love through Christ. Fifteen centuries of Western religious thinkers, such as Bernard, Francis, Dante, and Simone Weil, attest to the power of this essentially Augustinian notion of caritas and amor Dei as the Christian virtues par excellence. PAULA FREDRIKSEN

Love-feast. The love-feast (Grk. agapē, which also means "love") is the common *meal with which Christians first followed Christ's command at the Last Supper to "do this in remembrance of me" (e.g., Luke 22.19, 1 Cor. 11.24), and later to "feed my sheep" (e.g., John 21.17). According to Paul, Christians repeat the "*Lord's supper" to "proclaim the Lord's death until he comes" (1 Cor. 11.20, 26). In Acts (2.43–47; 20.7), "breaking bread . . . with glad and generous hearts" is associated with distributing goods "to all, as any had need"; only Jude 12 uses agapē to refer to the meal. Most scholars agree that Paul is ironic in advising the "hungry," wealthy Corinthians to "eat at home" (1 Cor. 11.34): he sees the loving inseparably from the eating. Eating in agapē (1 Cor. 13), Christians will "discern" Christ's presence in themselves and others together (1 Cor. 11.29, 31), just as the elders of Israel finally "saw God, and ate and drank" in making the first *covenant (Luke 24.30–31, 35–36; John 21.12; see Exod. 24:11).

The love-feasts of early Christians draw on metaphors in Israelite scripture and sectarian practice linking food and law, commensalism, and covenanted communities, with concerns about how to see "face to face" the ineffable, imageless presence of God in daily life (e.g., Exod. 33.11; Deut. 34.10; 1 Cor. 13.12). The New Testament writers' visions of epiphany in loving-eating are inseparable from their sectarian assumptions about incarnation and universalism. Love-feasts were intended less to mark boundaries than to cross them by fostering "loving" relations among infinitely disparate people, Abraham's descendants in the "many nations" (Rom. 4.17; Gen. 17.5).

Paul shows how Corinthians, untutored in midrashic debates about the bodiliness of fleshly spirits whom God may feed or consume in a moment, and committed to their own views of commensalism and community, could be blindly indiscriminate eaters of Jewish-Christian feasts (1 Cor 11.17–23). Reports of Jesus as "a glutton and a drunkard, a friend of tax collectors and sinners" (Matt. 11:19 par.), like Peter's vision (Acts 10.9–11.18), show how Jewish-Christian feasts could be blatantly indiscriminate to fellow Jews who shared their view of the body as a temple but not their abrogation of all the laws epitomized in the dietary rules, except "the law of love" and its new creation.

Underlying the conflicts that New Testament writers attributed to differences among and between Jews and *gentiles are deeper visions of the complexities of humans and their unions seen in the presence of Judas and Peter at Christ's table, a juxtaposition that suggests the kinds of conflicts that led to the historical separation of the "loving" meal (agapē) from the blessing and distribution of the bread and wine, or "thanksgiving" (eucharistia), as Ignatius (ca. 115 CE) called it. With the incorporation of the church into the Roman empire during the fourth century CE, those well fed enough to abstain from millennial dreams of banquets gradually replaced the feast encompassed in the bread and wine with a preparatory fast. GILLIAN FEELEY-HARNIK

Luke. See Luke, The Gospel According to; Acts of the Apostles.

Luke, The Gospel According to. The third gospel is "the first volume" (Acts 1.1) of a two-part work, Luke-Acts, composed by the same author and dedicated to Theophilus. In content, this gospel is related to the Marcan and Matthean gospels; collectively, these three Gospels form the group usually called *synoptic, i.e., the tradition that developed independently of the gospel according to *John.

Content. The content of the Lucan gospel may be summarized under eight headings. (1) A brief prologue (1.1–4), written in a stylized periodic sentence, states the author's purpose in writing. (2) Two chapters are devoted to an infancy narrative (1.5–2.52), recounting in studied parallelism the birth and childhood of *John the Baptist and those of Jesus. (3) One and a half chapters (3.1–4.13) set forth the appearance of John in the desert, his preaching and baptist career, and his imprisonment by Herod Antipas as a prelude to the events inaugurating Jesus' public career, namely, the latter's baptism, sojourn in the desert, and temptation by the devil. (4) The story of Jesus' Galilean ministry (4.14–9.50) begins programmatically in a synagogue in his hometown, *Nazareth, and moves on to *Capernaum and other towns and villages, as Jesus preaches the *kingdom of God, heals those who are afflicted, and associates himself with disciples whom he gradually trains. This Galilean activity serves also as the starting point for his "*exodus," or transit to the Father through death, burial, and resurrection (9.31). (5) There follows the travel account (9.51–19.27), which has both a specifically Lucan form (9.51–18.14) and another form in 18.15–19.27 that parallels Mark 10.13–52. In this account, Jesus is depicted not only as moving without distraction toward *Jerusalem, the city of destiny, but also as instructing crowds of people and especially the *disciples, who would become the foreordained witnesses of his ministry, career, and destiny in Jerusalem (see Acts 10.41). (6) At the end of the travel account, Jesus is accorded a regal welcome as he enters Jerusalem itself, purges its *Temple, and initiates there a period of ministry and teaching in the Temple (19.28–21.38), which serves as a prelude to the events of his last days. (7) The passion narrative (22.1–23.56a) forms the climax of his exodus, as the Jerusalem leaders conspire with Judas against him, and as he eats his last meal with the *twelve and foretells Peter's denial of him. After praying on the Mount of *Olives, Jesus is arrested, brought before a morning session of the *Sanhedrin, delivered to *Pilate, sent to *Herod, and finally handed over for *crucifixion. This narrative ends with the notice of Jesus' death and burial. (8) The Lucan resurrection narrative (23.56b–24.53) tells of the women who discover the empty tomb and of Jesus' appearance as risen to followers on the road to Emmaus and in Jerusalem itself. The Lucan gospel ends with Jesus giving a final commission to the eleven and others and with his *ascension (apparently on the night of the day of the discovery of the empty tomb).

Authorship. Unlike the Pauline letters, which bear the Apostle's name, the third gospel is anonymous, as are the other gospels. Ancient church tradition attributed the third gospel to the Luke who appears in Philemon 24 as Paul's "fellow worker" and is called "the beloved physician" in Collossians 4.14 (cf. 2 Tim. 4.11).

Most modern commentators on the Lucan gospel, however, are skeptical about the validity of this traditional attribution. They regard the tradition as based largely on inferences from the text of the New Testament made when people were first beginning to wonder who had written the Gospels. They further call in question Irenaeus's description of Luke as Paul's "inseparable" collaborator (Adv. haer. 3.14,1), which he inferred from the "we" sections of *Acts (esp. 16.10; 20.6). The nature of these "we" sections has since been questioned. Are they fragments of a diary or notebook that the author of Acts kept as he journeyed with Paul? Or are they, rather, a literary form used by the author to enhance his narrative of sea journeys? A still larger part of the problem is the relationship of the author of Acts to *Paul. In recent decades it has become evident that only with considerable difficulty can one reconcile much of the depiction of Paul in Acts with that which emerges from Paul's own letters. Hence, was the author of Luke-Acts really the "inseparable" collaborator of Paul? The difference between the Lucan Paul and the Pauline Paul is not minor; even though it is largely an issue of Acts and the Pauline letters, it bears on the authorship of the Lucan gospel. The result is that many modern commentators are uncertain about the authorship of Luke-Acts.

A minority of commentators, however, retain the traditional attribution as substantially correct. They recognize that in this tradition one must distinguish between what could have been inferred from the text of the New Testament (Luke as a physician; as Paul's fellow worker; as one who had not personally witnessed the ministry of Jesus; Luke as an author who wrote for gentile converts; who wrote after the Marcan and Matthean gospels; who began his gospel with John the Baptist and was also the author of Acts) and what could not have been so inferred (Luke as a Syrian of Antioch; who wrote in Achaia, Bithynia, or Rome; who died in Boeotia or Thebes, unmarried, childless, and at the age of eighty-four). Many of the latter details are legendary and of no value; but the substance of the tradition—that the author of the third gospel and Acts was Luke, an inhabitant of *Antioch in Syria and a companion of Paul—is far from being untenable.

In this regard, one must read Irenaeus critically. The evidence he used, namely the "we" sections of Acts, may indeed show that the author of Luke-Acts was a companion of Paul, but not that he was "inseparably" so. If one accepts the "we" sections as excerpts from a diary or notebook of the author and reads them at face value, one finds that they reveal only that the author was a sometime companion of Paul. He would have traveled with Paul from Troas to Philippi (Acts 16.10–17), i.e., for a short time toward the middle of Paul's second missionary journey (49–52 CE). He would have stayed in Philippi and joined Paul again only as the latter departed from Philippi at the end of his third journey (when he returns to Jerusalem for the last time [58 CE; Acts 20.6]), and as Paul sailed for Rome to appear before Caesar (Acts 27.1–28.16). Reading the evidence thus, we see that the author was not with Paul during the main part of his evangelizing endeavors, when he faced the major crisis of his missionary activity in the eastern Mediterranean area (the judaizing problem, as he struggled against those who insisted that gentile converts must observe Jewish legal practices), or when he wrote his greatest letters. Moreover, there is no indication that the author of Luke-Acts ever read Paul's letters. Yet his brief association with Paul led him to idealize Paul and make him the hero of the second part of Acts. He has painted his own picture of Paul, which may not agree in all details with the Paul of the uncontested Pauline letters. Yet, since Luke is not prominent in the apostolic age, if the gospel and Acts were not originally written by him, there is no obvious reason why they should have been associated with him. In other words, the ancient tradition which holds that Luke is the author of the third gospel and Acts may in the long run prove to be substantially valid.

Sources. The prologue of the gospel reveals that Luke depends on other gospel narratives and on information gathered from "eyewitnesses" and "servants of the word" (who may or may not represent two distinct sources for him). From an internal analysis of the gospel, one recognizes that Luke used mainly three sources: the Marcan gospel (in a form more or less as we know it today), a postulated Greek written source, often called *Q (some 230 verses common to his and the Matthean gospel but not found in Mark), and a unique source, often designated L, either written or oral (episodes exclusive to the third gospel).

From Mark, Luke has taken over six blocks of material largely in the same order, into which he has inserted matter (from Q and L); he has also omitted some Marcan material and transposed some Marcan episodes. The use of Marcan material can best be seen thus:

(1) Mark 1.1–15 = Luke 3.1–4.15
(2) Mark 1.21–3.19 = Luke 4.31–6.19
Luke's Little Interpolation:
6.20–8.3 (from "Q" and "L")
(3) Mark 4.1–6.44 = Luke 8.4–9.17
Luke's Big Omission at 9.17
(=Mark 6.45–8.26)
(4) Mark 8.27–9.40 = Luke 9.18–50
Luke's Little Omission at 9.50
(=Mark 9.41–10.12)
Luke's Big Interpolation:
9.15–18.14 (from "Q" and "L")
(5) Mark 10.13–13.32 = Luke 18.15–21.33
(6) Mark 14.1–16.8 = Luke 22.1–24.12
The Lucan Ending: 24.13–53 (from "L")

Luke has not slavishly copied this earlier material; he frequently redacts or modifies the Marcan text, improving its Greek style and language. He has also transposed seven Marcan episodes: (1) the imprisonment of John the Baptist (Mark 6.17–18) is moved up to Luke 3.19–20 (to finish the Baptist story before Jesus appears); (2) Jesus' visit to Nazareth (Mark 6.1–6) is moved up to Luke 4.16–30 (to become the programmatic beginning of Jesus' ministry); (3) the call of the disciples (Mark 1.16–20) is postponed to Luke 5.1–11 (to develop a better psychological setting for the call of Simon the fisherman); (4) the choosing of the Twelve (Mark 3.13–19) and the report of the crowds following Jesus (Mark 3.7–12) are reversed in Luke 6.12–16, 17–19 (to improve the psychological setting for the Sermon on the Plain); (5) the episode about Jesus' relatives (Mark 3.31–35) is moved to Luke 8.19–21 (to follow the interpretation of the parable of the seed, thus making Jesus' own relatives examples of the seed sown on good soil); (6) the foretelling of Judas' betrayal of Jesus (Mark 14.18–21) becomes part of the discourse after the meal (Luke 22.21–23); (7) the order of the interrogation of Jesus, his mistreatment, and Peter's denials (Mark 14.55–64a, 64b–65, 66–72) is reversed in Luke 22.54c–62 (Peter's denials), 63–65 (mistreatment), 66–71 (interrogation).

It is often difficult to distinguish between L passages and those that Luke may have freely composed. It is also a matter of debate whether some of the L passages are related to the material in the gospel of John (e.g., the anointing of Jesus' feet by a woman; the single account of the multiplication of the loaves and fish; the mention of Lazarus, Martha, and Mary; one of the twelve named Judas; no night interrogation of Jesus before the high priest; three nonguilty statements of Pilate during Jesus' trial; postresurrection appearances of the risen Christ in the Jerusalem area). Although there is no real evidence that the Johannine evangelist knew the Lucan gospel, some contact in the oral traditions behind both the Johannine and the Lucan gospels is not impossible.

Attempts are sometimes made to associate L with specific persons from whom Luke would have derived information: *Mary, the mother of Jesus (see Luke 2.19, 51); the disciples of John the Baptist (Acts 19.1–3); Joanna, "wife of Chuza, Herod's steward" (Luke 8.3); Cleopas (24.18). Luke could have obtained information from such sources, but such a list of candidates is based on speculation, more pious than critical, about possible informants.

Date and Place of Composition. If the Marcan gospel is rightly included among the sources used by Luke in composing his gospel, then the latter is to be dated after Mark. The Marcan gospel is commonly dated ca. 65–70 CE. How much later is the Lucan gospel? One cannot say for certain. Luke 1.1 refers to "many" others who had previously tried to write the Jesus story; even if Mark is included among the "many," more time must be allowed for the others to whom Luke alludes. Again, since the Lucan Jesus refers to Jerusalem as an "abandoned" house (13.35), this and other references to Jerusalem (21.20, "surrounded by camps"; 19.43–44, with earthworks erected against it) would suggest a date for Luke after the fall of Jerusalem in 70 CE. Some have sought to interpret these references as merely literary imitations of biblical descriptions of the fall of Jerusalem under Nebuchadrezzar, hence lacking in historical references to the Roman destruction. But this interpretation is not without its problems. In any case, it is widely held that the Lucan gospel was composed ca. 80–85 CE, even though one cannot maintain this dating with certainty.

Nothing in the Lucan gospel hints at the place where it was composed. The author's knowledge of Palestine is at times defective, which would suggest that it was not composed there. Ancient tradition mentions Achaia, Boeotia, and Rome; modern conjectures include Caesarea, the *Decapolis, or Asia Minor. No one really knows where it was written.

Intended Readers. Details in the Lucan gospel suggest that Luke was writing for a predominantly gentile Christian community. Among such details are the dedication of his two-volume work to a patron with what is clearly a Greek name (Theophilus), his concern to relate his narrative account of the Jesus story and its sequel to a Greco-Roman literary tradition, his elimination from his source materials of items with a pronounced Jewish preoccupation (e.g., the controversy about what is clean or unclean, Mark 7.1–23; the substitution of Greek titles like kyrios, "Lord," or epistatēs, "master" for rabbi/rabbouni, cf. Mark 9.5; 10.51 with Luke 9.33; 18.41; and the omission of other Semitic words). All such details suggest that Luke envisaged his readers as predominantly gentile Christians in a Greek-speaking setting, but who were not wholly unacquainted with the *Septuagint.

Lucan Teaching. Even a brief summary of Luke's interpretation of the Jesus story must cope with its sequel, for details in Acts sometimes bear on the message of the gospel itself. Though the Lucan picture of Jesus may not be as radical as the Pauline or the Marcan, or as sublime as the Johannine, it is nevertheless one of the major testimonies to Jesus in the New Testament.

The Lucan picture of Jesus is kerygmatic. The Christian "kerygma" has been defined by Rudolf Bultmann as the proclamation of Jesus Christ, crucified and risen, as God's eschatological act of salvation. Luke clearly depicts Jesus proclaiming himself in this way, not only as God's agent of promised salvation (4.16–21) but also as the preacher par excellence of God's kingdom: "that is what I was sent for" (4.43). Luke further depicts, no less than the other evangelists, Jesus' disciples sent out to announce the kingdom and to heal (9.1). Later, in Acts, Peter proclaims Jesus Christ not only as crucified and risen but also as "Lord and *Messiah" (2.36). Indeed, Peter announces further, "Salvation is found in no one else, for there is no other name under heaven given to human beings by which we are to be saved" (Acts 4.12). Although Luke's gospel has become more of a "Life of Christ" than either Mark's or Matthew's, it has not lost its proclamatory character. It accosts Theophilus, and other readers like him, with God's eschatological salvation achieved in Jesus Christ. Luke's picture of Jesus, now rooted in history in a way that none of the other evangelists root it, has played the kerygma in another key; but it still utters a time-transcending, ever-present, existential challenge to its readers to put personal faith in, and to make a deep commitment to, Jesus the risen Lord and "the Messiah of God" (9.20).

The Lucan picture of Jesus is also drawn in a distinctive historical perspective. Luke's concern is evident from the remark that he has Paul utter before King Agrippa, "None of these things has escaped his [the king's] notice, for this was not done in a corner" (Acts 26.26). Jesus' story and its sequel, intended by God's providence to challenge human beings to Christian faith, has been rooted in human history. This is the reason that Luke has not written a "gospel," as does Mark (1.1), a term he never uses in the first part of his work (but only in Acts 15.7; 20.24), preferring instead to designate his two-volume work as a "narrative account" (diēgēsis, Luke 1.1). In this account he roots the Jesus story in a threefold synchronization, connecting it with Roman history, Palestinian history, and church history. Its relation to Roman history is shown by the connection of Jesus' birth with a decree of Caesar Augustus ordering the registration of the whole (Roman) world during the governorship of Quirinius (Luke 2.1–2). The ministry of John the Baptist (and of Jesus, by implication) is connected with the fifteenth year of the reign of the emperor Tiberius (28–29 CE) and with the prefecture of Pontius *Pilate in Judea (26–36 CE; Luke 3.1). Luke further connects events in the early Christian community with the famine in the days of Claudius (ca. 46 CE; Acts 11.18), with Claudius's expulsion of Jews from Rome (49 CE; Acts 18.2), and with the proconsulship of Gallio in Achaia (52 CE; Acts 18.12). Again, he connects the birth of Jesus with Palestinian history by linking it with the days of King *Herod the Great (37–4 BCE; Luke 1.5); and John's and Jesus' ministry to the time of the high priesthood of Annas and *Caiaphas, to the reigns of Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee, of Philip, tetrarch of Ituraea and Trachonitis, and of Lysanias, tetrarch of Abilene (3.1)—even though only Galilee further figures in the Jesus story. Finally, he connects the Jesus story with Christian history in a way that no other evangelist does, by recounting its sequel in Acts. All of this historical perspective, which is exclusively Lucan, is in the long run related to his view of salvation history. Luke sees all of human history divided into three phases: the period of Israel (see Luke 16.16), the period of Jesus (from the coming of John the Baptist to the ascension), and the period of the church under stress (from the ascension to the *parousia). This historical perspective is central to the unique Lucan presentation of the Christian kerygma.

The Lucan picture of Jesus is also drawn in a geographical perspective. Luke is preoccupied in his gospel to depict Jesus as moving resolutely from his Galilean ministry, once the travel account begins (9.51), toward Jerusalem, the city of destiny—where his "exodus" is to be achieved (13.32–33). Such a perspective gives Jerusalem a distinctive centrality; towards it, all in the gospel is aimed. Then in Acts it becomes the focal point from which "the word of the Lord" (8.25) goes forth as Jesus' disciples are commissioned as "witnesses" to carry it from Jerusalem to "all Judea and Samaria" and "to the end of the earth" (1.8). Since the last expression can mean "Rome" (see Ps. Sol. 8.15), and since Rome is where the story of Acts ends (see 28.16), Paul becomes the one who in effect carries the word "about the Lord Jesus Christ openly and unhindered" (28.31) from Jerusalem to that "end." Both the historical and the geographical perspectives enhance the status of the church as the sequel to Jesus' ministry in the Roman world of its time.

The Lucan picture of Jesus' ministry and its sequel also has an apologetic perspective. This is Luke's secondary purpose in writing his "narrative account," for he wanted to show that Christianity had as much right to legitimate recognition in the Roman world as did Judaism. Hence, he was concerned from the outset of the gospel to depict Jesus, the founder of Christianity, as born into a pious Jewish family, circumcised, and faithfully observant of Jewish customs. Later on, it emerges in Luke's account that Christianity, a "sect" of Judaism (Acts 24.5, 14), is the logical outgrowth of Pharisaic Judaism. He depicts Paul as stoutly maintaining his Pharisaic connection, by siding with the *Pharisees against the *Sadducees with respect to "the resurrection of the dead" (Acts 23.6). He further portrays Paul, once he has been taken captive at the end of Acts, as being declared innocent on several occasions (23.9, 29; 25.12, 18–20, 25; 26.31–32). These declarations of innocence imply indirectly that Christianity likewise stands in the same relation to the Roman government.

The key figure in Lucan salvation history is Jesus himself, about whom the evangelist makes not only christological but also soteriological affirmations about who Jesus is and what he has done for humanity. Certain aspects of Jesus, who is otherwise portrayed as a human being, hint at his transcendent condition: his virginal conception through the power of the Holy Spirit; his ministry under the auspices of the holy Spirit; his special relation to his heavenly Father; his resurrection and exaltation to glory. Luke applies many traditional christological titles to Jesus: *Messiah (or Christ), Lord, Savior, *Son of God, *Son of man, Servant, Prophet, King, Son of David, leader, Holy One, Righteous One, Teacher. Particularly noteworthy are the distinctive Lucan use of "Savior" (2.11; Acts 5.31; 13.23), "suffering Messiah" (24.26, 46; Acts 3.18; 17.3; 26.23), and the retrojection of the title "the Lord" (originally used of the risen Christ) even into the infancy narrative (2.11; cf. 1.43) and the ministry account, when the evangelist himself is speaking (7.13, 19; 10.1, 39, 41; 11.39; 12.42a; 13.15; etc.). When Luke speaks of the soteriological function of Jesus Christ and the effects of what he has done for humanity, he depicts them as "salvation" (1.69, 71, 77; 3.6; 19.9; Acts 4.12; 13.26, 47; 16.17; 28.28), "forgiveness of sins" (24.47; Acts 2.38; 5.31; 10.43; 13.38; 26.18), "peace" (2.14; 19.38, 42), and "life" (10.25–28; 24.5; Acts 11.18; 13.46–48), and once even as "justification" (Acts 13.39, where the context provides the interpretation of it as "forgiveness of sins"). In a way that surpasses that of the other evangelists, Luke portrays not only the ministry of Jesus itself but even the movement begun by him as especially Spirit-guided. In at least seventeen instances in the gospel and fifty-seven in Acts the influence of the Spirit is seen both on the activity of Jesus himself and on that of his followers.

Hence, though Luke may have introduced a historical perspective in the gospel tradition, he did not simply imitate Flavius *Josephus, who composed the Jewish Antiquities, by writing merely annalistic Christian Antiquities. He has preserved the proclamatory aim of the gospel tradition, and that is why we refer to it as "the gospel according to Luke." JOSEPH A. FITZMYER, S.J.

LXX. See Septuagint.

M

Maccabees, The Books of the. The four books of the Maccabees are independent works. 1 and 2 Maccabees separately record the Maccabean rebellion and the events leading up to it; 3 Maccabees is a historical novel, which became associated with 1 and 2 Maccabees for thematic reasons; and 4 Maccabees is a discourse on reason which took its cue from the story of the Maccabean martyrs. Because they were either not written or not preserved in Hebrew, they are not part of the Jewish and Protestant *canons, but are accorded varying degrees of canonicity by Roman Catholic and Orthodox churches (see Apocrypha, article on Jewish Apocrypha). They differ greatly in aims and presentation, scope and detail. They also differ in matters of chronology, so reconstructing the precise course of events and their political background has been a major scholarly pursuit. It will help to begin by outlining the history of the Maccabean rebellion.

Historical Summary. In 200 BCE, Antiochus III of *Syria defeated Ptolemy V of *Egypt at Paneion, thus finally winning the Levant, including Judah, for the Seleucid empire. He won Jewish support by granting tax concessions and the right to live in accordance with traditional Jewish law (Antiochus IV's later removal of this concession precipitated rebellion). Antiochus III then tried to extend his empire into Greece, but came into conflict with Rome, which had similar interests. He was defeated and forced in the Peace of Apamea (188 BCE) to pay ruinous indemnities. Syria's financial desperation was another factor contributing to the Jewish rebellion: it caused Seleucus IV (187–175 BCE) to send his minister Heliodorus to raid the Jerusalem *Temple for money (2 Macc. 3), and it caused his successor Antiochus IV (175–164 BCE) to accept bribes from successive candidates for the Jerusalem high priesthood. Rivalry for this office was itself a major factor in the ensuing struggle. When the high priest Onias III, slandered by his rivals, went to Syria to defend his position before Antiochus IV, his brother Jason usurped him by offering to pay more tribute and to turn *Jerusalem into a more typical Hellenistic city-state, of the kind Antiochus favored as conducive to the unity and stability of his empire. In 171 BCE Jason himself was similarly ousted by Menelaus, who, though not of the high priestly family, offered a yet higher tribute to Antiochus and raided the Temple plate to pay it, much to the anger of the people. However, the systemic change brought about by Jason and exacerbated by Menelaus subtly affected the agreement by which the Jews were allowed to regulate their lives by their own laws; a Hellenistic Jerusalem might be expected to organize itself like other cities of the Greek world, with an assembly, a voting citizen body, a gymnasium, and an ephebeion for training young men who would take part in athletic contests at home and abroad. In short, the Jews were under pressure to conform to the life-style of the surrounding world; and this too was a factor in the Maccabean struggle.

The attempt to regularize Jerusalem's position in the Seleucid empire was important to Antiochus because Judah lay between Syria and Egypt, which Antiochus wished to annex. In 172 BCE, the guardians of the newly enthroned minor Ptolemy VI declared war on Antiochus, who sent a diplomat to Rome to meet Roman objections and invaded Egypt in 169 BCE; when he did so again in 168 BCE, the Romans ejected him. Jason meanwhile had attacked Menelaus and tried to reinstate himself in Jerusalem. Antiochus, seeing this as rebellion, attacked Jerusalem and looted the Temple (1 Maccabees dates this to 169 BCE; 2 Maccabees, probably correctly, to 168 BCE), leaving a commissioner in charge. In 167 BCE, the Syrians made an unexpected and vicious attack and established a military garrison in Jerusalem (1 Macc. 1.29–35). Clearly, Antiochus was determined to control Judah, although Egypt, for the time being, was closed to him.

Antiochus's determination led him to one further disastrous political error. In 167 BCE he tried "to compel the Jews to forsake the laws of their ancestors and no longer to live by the laws of God, also to pollute the temple in Jerusalem and to call it the temple of Olympian Zeus" (2 Macc. 6.1–2). According to 1 Maccabees 1.41–50, the king decreed the Jews "to follow customs strange to the land, to forbid burnt offerings and sacrifices and drink offerings in the sanctuary, to profane sabbaths and festivals, to defile the sanctuary and the priests, to build altars and sacred precincts and shrines for idols, to sacrifice swine and other unclean animals, and to leave their sons uncircumcised." This was followed in December 167 BCE by the erection of "a desolating sacrilege upon the altar of burnt offering" (1 Macc. 1.54), the erection of altars throughout Judah, and the proscription of the Jewish *Law. These descriptions show that in Jewish eyes the king was persecuting Jewish religion by attacking the Law and the Temple. By his "decree," however, Antiochus presumably (his original wording is not extant) was withdrawing the Jewish right of self-rule by Jewish law and opening the Jerusalem Temple to all worshipers (as any other Hellenistic city temple would be); but, worse, he was making the positive practice of Jewish law punishable. It has been argued that Antiochus saw the Jews much as the Romans saw the followers of the god Bacchus—as dangerous religious fanatics—and wished to suppress them, but Antiochus was not giving way to mere prejudice; he was punishing the Jews for political rebellion by prohibiting precisely those things that constituted Jewish independence—the concession of self-rule by ancestral laws, and the exclusivity of the Jerusalem Temple.

The result was rebellion, led by Judas called "Maccabeus" ("hammerlike"; 1 Macc. 2.4), son of Mattathias, from Modin, 20 km (17 mi) northwest of Jerusalem (Map 10:X5). The rebellion is described in detail in 1 Maccabees, and cannot be recounted in full here. In outline, however, affairs developed as follows: After several local victories in Judah, Judas occupied the Temple area, purged it of non-Jewish cultic activities, and rededicated it (December 164 BCE); this was the institution of the festival of Hanukkah (called the feast of the Dedication in John 10.22; see Feasts and Festivals). The following year he widened his military activities to Idumea, Galilee, Transjordan, and Philistia; the Seleucid army responded, but, after an initially successful campaign preempted by an attempted coup d'état in Syria, the Syrians offered Judas terms, withdrawing the edict of 167 BCE (1 Macc. 6.58), but leaving the Syrian garrison in Jerusalem and destroying Judas's Temple defenses. They also executed the high priest Menelaus. Thus, in theory the Jews had regained religious independence (with no clear leadership to exercise it), and the Syrians retained political control (with inadequate popular support to maintain it). In 162–161 BCE a new Syrian king, Demetrius, and a new high priest, Alcimus, collaborated to eliminate Judas and his supporters. Judas defeated the new general sent against him, Nicanor, but fell before the more experienced Bacchides in 160 BCE. Bacchides fortified Judah, but failed to make progress against Judas's successor Jonathan and finally withdrew. Alcimus died, and power remained de facto with Jonathan, who began to "judge" the people from his home in Michmash (Map 10: inset); the historian deliberately compares Jonathan with the rulers who preceded the monarchy in Israel. Constitutionally, however, Judah was still under Seleucid rule, symbolized by the garrison in Jerusalem.

Jonathan now proceeded to steer Judah toward independence by diplomacy, bargaining with successive Seleucid rulers for political concessions. In return for Jonathan's support, the Seleucid pretender Alexander Balas gave him the high priesthood (to which Jonathan had no hereditary right) in 152 BCE. Jonathan refused to support Demetrius I and defeated Demetrius II in 147 BCE (thus earning new honors and more territory from Balas); but when Balas was killed in 145 BCE, Jonathan shifted his allegiance to Demetrius II, for which Demetrius transferred to Jonathan three districts from *Samaria. When Antiochus VI and Trypho ousted Demetrius in 145 BCE, they confirmed Jonathan in his position and made his brother Simon governor of the coastal region. Jonathan and Simon now began rapidly to develop Judah's position. The Seleucid garrison at Beth-zur was replaced by a Jewish one, Joppa was garrisoned, Adida fortified, Gaza captured, the Seleucid garrison in Jerusalem blockaded, and the walls of Jerusalem and the fortresses of Judah repaired. Jonathan renewed both the diplomatic links with Rome initiated by Judas in 161 BCE and the links of brotherhood and friendship with Sparta which supposedly were established several generations earlier by Onias the high priest and Arius king of Sparta. Jonathan campaigned, ostensibly against Demetrius II, in Syrian territory near Hamath. Trypho, naturally anxious at this Jewish resurgence, captured Jonathan by treachery, and Simon took over the Jewish leadership. He completed Jonathan's military and diplomatic program, crowning his achievements by expelling the Seleucid garrison from Jerusalem and negotiating the formal abolition of tribute payable to Syria with Demetrius II. In effect, this meant the end of Seleucid rule of Judah, and 1 Maccabees 13.41 notes that in 142 BCE "the yoke of the gentiles was removed from Israel, and the people began to write in their documents and contracts, 'In the first year of Simon the great high priest and commander and leader of the Jews.' " This was the beginning of a new era, which was to last until 63 BCE, when Pompey the Great claimed Judah for Rome.

1 Maccabees. Synopsis. 1 Maccabees presents a coherent and well-organized account of the events just described, emphasizing throughout the leadership of the Hasmonean family. Chaps. 1 and 2 form an introductory section, explaining how Israel reached the humiliating position inflicted upon her by Antiochus. The author blames not only Antiochus but also the "lawless men" who "came forth from Israel, and misled many, saying, 'Let us go and make a covenant with the gentiles around about us, for since we separated from them many disasters have come upon us' " (1 Macc. 1.11). But chap. 2 sets against these hellenizing Jews the priest Mattathias and his sons, whose loyalty to the Law and the *covenant and whose skills in counsel and battle will bring Israel's restoration.

Chaps. 3.1–9.22 recount the first phase of the restoration under the leadership of Judas, who defeats a series of increasingly professional forces sent against him, captures and rededicates the Temple, takes the war into gentile territory, achieves the abolition of the infamous decree, and arranges a treaty with Rome before being killed in battle. Judas is presented as a latter-day Saul or David, not least at his death when Israel laments him in famous words (1 Macc. 9.21; cf. 2 Sam. 1.19):

> How is the mighty fallen, > the savior of Israel.

Chaps. 9.23–12.53 turn to Judas's youngest brother, Jonathan, who is made "ruler and leader, to fight our battle" (1 Macc. 9.30). After some skirmishing, Jonathan concludes the war with Bacchides, and begins to "judge" Israel (1 Macc. 9.73). This judgeship is important, hinting at the Hasmonean monarchy to follow. Similarly, Jonathan's high priesthood was important to the author, for it provided the title and justification for the frequently challenged high priesthood assumed by the Hasmonean monarchy.

The author brings the political story to its climax with the work of Simon (chaps. 13.1–16.17), under whom "the yoke of the gentiles was removed." The particular importance of Simon is that he establishes a new era (1 Macc. 13.41–42), described in terms taken from prophecies of Israel's paradisal future:

> He established peace in the land, > and Israel rejoiced with great joy.
> All the people sat under their own vines and fig trees, > and there was none to make them afraid.
> (1 Macc. 14.11–12)

But the author is at particular pains to underline Simon's position as "high priest, commander, and ethnarch [NRSV: leader] of the Jews" (cf. 1 Macc. 13.41; 14.17, 35, 38, 41, 47; 15.2) and to indicate the position of John Hyrcanus as Simon's heir (1 Macc. 13.53; 14.59; 16.1–3); the book ends with a statement of John's acts, brave deeds, and achievements "from the time that he became high priest after his father" (1 Macc. 16.23–24).

Purpose. 1 Maccabees is, in effect, an apologia for the Hasmonean monarchy, and other families are not allowed to steal the limelight. When Joseph and Azariah, two subordinate commanders, try to emulate Judas's success, they fail disastrously because "they did not belong to the family of those men through whom deliverance was given to Israel" (1 Macc. 5.62). The public citation of Simon and his brothers proclaimed that they "exposed themselves to danger and resisted the enemies of their nation, in order that their sanctuary and the law might be preserved; and they brought great glory to their nation" (1 Macc. 14.29).

Sources, dating, text, and canonicity. The author's political concerns, however, do not negate his historical value. He apparently had access to official state archives and public records (cf. 1 Macc. 14.27, 48–49), from which may derive some of the documents quoted. He refers to official annals at least for the rule of John Hyrcanus (1 Macc. 16.24), during which he probably wrote. In chronological matters he uses the official Seleucid era, dating from October 312 BCE, for events of Seleucid history, and the local Jewish calendar, whose years were dated from spring 312 or 311 BCE, when drawing upon Jewish sources. What these might have been (apart from the annals of Hyrcanus's rule) we can only guess, but an obvious possibility is some account or "acts" of Judas, whose existence has been inferred from 1 Maccabees 9.22. (This might also have been the source for the work of Jason of Cyrene abridged by 2 Maccabees.) The author of 1 Maccabees is not given to pious legend (as is 2 Maccabees), though the story of Mattathias in chap. 2 comes near this, but he does include a number of poetic laments (e.g., 2.7–13) and eulogies (e.g., 3.3–9), which are full of biblical allusions and may be his own compositions.

The style of these poems and the prose narrative, often reminiscent of the books of *Samuel and *Kings, supports Jerome's statement that 1 Maccabees was originally written in Hebrew. The book exists, however, only in a Greek translation; the oldest manuscript containing it is the fourth century CE Codex Sinaiticus. The original title is debated. Origen, quoted by Eusebius, preserved as a title the phrase sarbēth sarbanaiel, a corrupt Greek transliteration of the Aramaic "Book of the House of the Princes of God" (or, "of Israel"), that is, "Book of the Hasmonean Family." Some such title would be more appropriate than "Maccabees," for "Maccabee" was the nickname of Judas alone, but by the end of the second century CE Clement of Alexandria was distinguishing between "the book of Maccabean history" (1 Maccabees) and "the epitome of Maccabean history" (2 Maccabees). The book is considered part of the canon by Roman Catholics and most Orthodox churches.

2 Maccabees. Synopsis. 2 Maccabees is a very different book, as is clear from the prologue (2.19–30) and epilogue (15.37–39). The author intends to tell "the story of Judas Maccabeus and his brothers, and the purification of the great temple, and the dedication of the altar, and further the wars against Antiochus Epiphanes and his son Eupator, and the appearances that came from heaven to those who fought bravely for Judaism, so that though few in number they seized the whole land . . . and regained possession of the temple . . . and liberated the city and re-established the laws" (2 Macc. 2.19–22). This he has condensed from the five-volume work of the otherwise unknown Jason of Cyrene, in such a way that "the style of the story delights the ears of those who read the work" (15.39).

The book begins with two letters. The first (1.1–9) is dated 124 BCE, the second (1.10–2.18) is undated but, if authentic, is possibly from 163 BCE, before the first anniversary of the Temple rededication of 164 BCE. Both letters are from Jerusalem, urging Jews in Egypt to celebrate the feast; the author of 2 Maccabees, by prefixing them to Jason's work, has created a book that could be read at precisely such a festival (cf. Esther; 3 Maccabees).

The account of events summarized from Jason's work differs from 1 Maccabees' account in content, order, and style. It contains more political detail at certain points as well as more legendary material. The narrative has two parallel climaxes: the first is the defeat of Nicanor, the death of Antiochus, and the celebration of the purification of the sanctuary (8.1–10.8); the second is the defeat and death of Nicanor and the decree establishing the future celebration of that day (15.6–36). The summary of Jason's work is arranged between the prologue and epilogue as follows: (1) attacks on the Jewish Temple and religion by Seleucus, Antiochus, and Jewish Hellenists (3.1–6.11); (2) martyrdom of Eleazar, the seven brothers and their mother (6.18–7.42); (3) defeat of Nicanor, death of Antiochus, celebration of the Temple purification (8.1–10.9); (4) "what took place under Antiochus Eupator" (10.10–13.26); (5) defeat and death of Nicanor, decree for future celebration of the day (14.1–15.37). The author has evidently ordered the material in sections (perhaps following the divisions of Jason's five volumes). Concern to balance the sequences of sections (3) and (5) has led to adjustments in chronology; thus, for example, Antiochus IV's death precedes the Temple purification, whereas in 1 Maccabees it follows it (in fact, both events date to December 164 BCE). Three letters from Antiochus IV's reign appear in fact to belong to Antiochus V's (11.16–21; 27–33; 34–38), possibly because the author disliked crediting peace initiatives to Antiochus IV. The work ends with Nicanor's death (cf. 1 Macc. 7.47); Judas's death a year later is unmentioned and his success unclouded. In style, 2 Maccabees is more rhetorical than 1 Maccabees, addressing readers directly and involving their sympathies (see 6.12–17).

Purpose. 2 Maccabees is less concerned with the historical order of events than with the theological opposition between the Judaism represented by "orthodox" high priests like Onias and the hellenizing Judaism of Jason and Menelaus. At the heart of the struggle lies "the most holy temple in all the world" (5.15), firmly protected by God (3.39). The author knows, however, that the nation is even more important: "the Lord did not choose the nation for the sake of the holy place, but the place for the sake of the nation" (5.19). The nation's sufferings under Antiochus are punishment for apostasy (4.13–16), but "these punishments were designed not to destroy but to discipline our people" (6.12). Punishment is often shown as fitting the crime; thus Jason "who had driven many from their own country into exile died in exile" (5.9; cf. especially 9.5–28). The Jewish nation, however, was saved by the faith and prayers of Judas and his men (8.1–5; 15.7–11), which brought victory in battle (e.g., 15.20–27). Such victories were signaled by the dramatic appearance of angelic horsemen (cf. 3.25–26; 5.2–4; 10.29–30; 11.8). Equal faith was shown by martyrs such as Eleazar, the seven brothers and their mother, and the hero Razis (6.18–7.42; 14.37–46), who might expect the reward of resurrection (cf. 7.9, 11, 14, 23, 29; Dan. 12.2–3). An extension of this belief, influential in Christian theology, appears in 12.39–45, where Judas, having discovered that some of his own battle casualties had been wearing idolatrous amulets, provided sin offerings "and made atonement for the dead, so that they might be delivered from their sin," in the expectation that those who had died fighting for the Maccabeean cause might rise again. (See Afterlife and Immortality.)

The author thus uses the story of Judas to affirm what he sees as the central tenets of Judaism: the importance of the Temple, the Law (especially the *Sabbath observance), loyalty under persecution, faith in God's *mercy to his covenant people and in his power of miraculous intervention. 2 Maccabees' outlook is like that of the book of *Daniel and that of the *Qumran War Scroll; these books may have a Hasidean background (cf. 1 Macc 2.42; 7.13; Judas was leader of the Hasideans, 2 Macc. 14.6). The author is more concerned with Judaism than with the monarchic nationalism of the Hasmoneans, whom he ignores, perhaps pointedly. Yet he writes in Greek, not in Hebrew, in a Hellenistic genre, and he is not totally dismissive of *gentiles; even Antiochus IV grieves at the death of Onias (4.37), and Nicanor becomes genuinely friendly toward Judas (14.18–25).

Sources, dating, text, and canonicity. For all its theological concern, 2 Maccabees is an important historical document. The underlying history of Jason shows remarkable knowledge of Jerusalem politics, and perhaps access to Temple archives (from which probably comes the correspondence of 1.1–2.18 and 11.16–38). Jason may have used a Seleucid source for some details of Seleucid history (e.g., 4.21–22, 30–31; 5.1; 9.1, 29; 10.11–13), and an "acts of Judas" (see above), together with some legendary material (6.18–7.42; 14.37–46). Much of this suggests an origin at Jerusalem, though Alexandria or *Antioch has often been proposed. Jason probably wrote in the middle-late second century BCE; 2 Maccabees must be dated between 124 BCE (1.9) and the arrival of Rome in 63 BCE. If the author is deliberately anti-Hasmonean, as some think, he probably belongs to Janneus's reign (103–76 BCE). The text of 2 Maccabees is preserved in the fifth century CE Codex Alexandrinus, and in Old Latin, Syriac, and Armenian translations, and has canonical status in the Roman Catholic and most Orthodox churches.

3 Maccabees. Synopsis. The book begins with Ptolemy IV Philopator's preparations to meet Antiochus III in battle at Raphia (217 BCE). A plot by one Theodotus to assassinate Philopator is thwarted by a lapsed Jew, Dositheus. Philopator wins the battle, and decides to visit his subjects with gifts for their temples. He is prevented by divine intervention from entering the Jerusalem sanctuary (the story is strongly reminiscent of 2 Macc. 3); on returning to Egypt he decrees that the Alexandrian Jews should be reduced to laographia (tax registration) and servitude, and be forced to accept the cult of Dionysus; those who accepted willingly would be given equal citizen rights with the citizens of Alexandria. A few apostatized, but the majority stood firm.

Philopator then ordered all the Jews of the interior to be rounded up and executed; explanations and instructions were issued to the army. The roundup is described with exaggerated pathos. Jews were registered until after forty days pens and paper ran out. The Jews were herded into the hippodrome, and five hundred elephants were excited by drink and incense to trample them to death, but when the moment came to let them loose, the executioner delayed because the king was asleep. After being woken, he dined, and, only then remembering the Jews, deferred the execution until the following day, when, again forgetful, he deferred the matter one more day. Angered by courtiers' criticism, Philopator swore he would massacre the Jews, ravage Judah, and burn the Temple. The next morning the intoxicated elephants were set on the Jews; in response to the prayer of the aged priest Eleazar, two terrible angels caused the elephants to turn in panic and trample the king's soldiers.

Philopator repented, freed the Jews, and prepared a seven-day feast to celebrate the deliverance. He repatriated the Jews, with permission to execute those who had apostatized (over three hundred people). Another seven-day feast was celebrated when the Jews reached Ptolemais in the eastern delta, where they dedicated a house of prayer. The book closes with the blessing: "Blessed be the Deliverer of Israel through all times! Amen!"

Historicity and dating. Clearly, the work postdates Ptolemy IV Philopator (221–204 BCE), who is presented much as pictured by Polybius and Plutarch: given to drinking, a devotee of the god Dionysus, and interested in architecture. The visit to Jerusalem and interest in the Temple here recorded are not impossible, and the account of the battle of Raphia (chap. 1) agrees in outline with that of Polybius (Hist. 5.80, 86). But the story shows no certain firsthand knowledge of events, and it shares some features with other Jewish writings of the second and first centuries BCE. There are clear parallels with the story of *Esther in Dositheus's revelation of the plot to assassinate Philopator (1.3; cf. Esther 2.21–23), in the Egyptian view of the Jews as hostile to the state (3.6–7; cf. Haman's view, Esther 3.8), and in the concluding establishment of a celebratory feast (cf. Esther 9.16–32). This last is also a feature of 2 Maccabees, with which 3 Maccabees has obvious similarities: for example, Philopator's attempt to enter the sanctuary (cf. 2 Macc. 3), the vision that terrified the elephants (3 Macc. 6.18–21; cf. 2 Macc. 3.26), the attempts to hellenize the Jews, the hostility to the Temple, the figure of the aged priest Eleazar, and the use of official correspondence.

There are also close relationships between 3 Maccabees and the Letter of Aristeas, which is usually dated to the mid second century BCE. Both are concerned with the sanctity of the Temple and the importance of the Law; both focus on the status of Jews in Alexandria and Egypt, and the relationship between the Ptolemaic king and the Jews. In Aristeas, Ptolemy II Philadelphus liberates his father's Jewish captives from servitude, and in 3 Maccabees Ptolemy IV threatens to return the Jews to it and worse. Aristeas presents the Alexandrian king and court as sympathetic to the Jews, and the Jews as people whose Law can be seen as rational and whose wisdom and learning can contribute to the good of the state. 3 Maccabees presents the king and court in less friendly light, accepting the Jewish right to live in Egypt only after divine intervention, and it shows the Jews as a people who must resist persecution to the death and punish all who compromise. The author of 3 Maccabees knows Aristeas but he reflects a much more difficult situation than that presupposed by Aristeas, and a much later one. The author also knew the Greek translation of Esther (probably dated 114 or 77 BCE); Philopator's edict (3 Macc. 3.12–29) may derive from Ahasuerus's edict (Esther 13.2–9).

These literary dependencies, together with the use of laographia (see below) suggest that 3 Maccabees is a first-century BCE or even first-century CE Jewish writing from Alexandria, drawing upon a number of stock motifs. This is confirmed by Josephus's attribution (Apion 2.53–54) of the same elephant story to Ptolemy VIII Physcon (145–116 BCE). The story may be exaggerated, but in essence it is historical; Physcon was hostile to the Alexandrian Jews because they had supported his sister Cleopatra against him for the throne. 3 Maccabees may be combining the tradition of this episode with other material about Jewish persecution from 2 Maccabees and the Greek Esther to make his story.

Purpose. The author's concerns are clear: to show how Jews abroad should behave when threatened with persecution. In the face of an attack on the Temple, a threat to Jewish status in Alexandria, and a threat to destroy the whole Jewish population of Egypt, the correct Jewish response is above all prayer (1.16–2.20; 6.1–17; 7.20). The Jews are to hold firm to the Law and destroy apostates (2.33; 7.10–15), to remain hopeful (2.32–33) by trusting in providence (4.20), while remaining loyal to the king despite his persecution (3.3).

The story involves the vexed question of the status of the Jews at Alexandria. The Jewish community there constituted a politeuma (corporation), and was allowed to live in Alexandria ruled by its own elders in accordance with its own laws. Its members were neither native Egyptians (who were forbidden residence in Alexandria) nor full citizens of Alexandria. They were "foreigners in a foreign land" (6.3), yet reasonably privileged ones. This ambiguous position often led to trouble; the Roman emperor Claudius later ruled that the Jews should live peaceably in a city not their own, and that the Alexandrians should allow them this liberty.

In 3 Maccabees, Philopator proposes that, as revenge for his own humiliation, the Jews should either be reduced to laographia and servitude or accept initiation into the Dionysian mysteries (see Mystery Religions) and be rewarded with Alexandrian citizenship (isopoliteia; 2.28–30; 3.21). Laographia originally meant "census," but came to refer to the poll tax that inevitably followed a census. Such payment would reduce the Jews to non-Greek, Egyptian status. Laographia in this sense, however, is otherwise unknown before the census of 24–23 BCE, and it has therefore been proposed that 3 Maccabees was written with reference to this occasion, or to the troubles of Caligula's reign (37–41 CE). In this case, Philopator would represent the unstable Caligula, and Philopator's attempt to desecrate the Temple stands for Caligula's attempt to have his statue placed there.

In short, 3 Maccabees is a historical novel, drawing on familiar material, including popular memories of Philopator and Physcon and several Jewish writings, intended to encourage Alexandrian Jews at a period of renewed trouble over citizenship. The use of laographia with its implications for status may suggest the period of Roman administration after 31 BCE, but does not necessarily exclude a slightly earlier date.

Text and canonicity. 3 Maccabees does not appear in most canons, though the Greek text is found in Codex Alexandrinus, and some Orthodox churches do consider it canonical. Almost certainly of Alexandrian origin, it was known under its present title by Eusebius's time, but previously, perhaps, more accurately as "Ptolemaica" ("Ptolemaic matters"). Association with the Maccabean books came through its concern with persecution of the Jews by a Hellenistic king and because of its obvious similarities with 2 Maccabees.

4 Maccabees. Synopsis. The author begins by proposing to discuss whether religious reason is master of the emotions. He aims to prove his point from the courage of the Maccabean martyrs who died for the sake of virtue. He defines his terms: "reason" is the intellect choosing to live by wisdom, which is education in the Jewish Law (so "religious reason" is in effect the underlying attitude of the Jew who lives by the Law). Such wisdom, however, comprises also the Platonic and *Stoic virtues of rational judgment, justice, courage, and self-control (1.18); it is especially by "rational judgment" that reason rules the emotions. There follow scriptural examples of individuals who ruled themselves by reason (which is assumed to mean, by the Jewish Law). In this way, *Joseph controlled his sexual desire, *Moses his anger, and so on.

The author now turns to the Maccabean history, drawing on 2 Maccabees 3–4 to introduce the stories of Eleazar (chaps. 5–7) and the seven brothers (chaps. 8–12). Eleazar becomes a philosopher and lawgiver, and the story is dramatized by the addition of speeches. King Antiochus ridicules Eleazar for abstaining from the pleasure of eating pork, one of nature's gifts (a Stoic argument); Eleazar responds that Jews must obey the Law in small things as in great; the Law has been divinely established to meet human needs. What is appropriate for one's soul is commanded to be eaten; what is not is prohibited. Antiochus will not rule Eleazar's reason in religious matters. Antiochus meets this defiance with torture; and after refusing to save himself by pretense, Eleazar dies praying that his blood be an expiation for his people, his life a ransom for theirs.

The author adds a lengthy rhetorical eulogy to point up the moral then turns to the martyrdom of the seven brothers and their mother. Antiochus urges them to adopt the Greek way of life, and he shows them the instruments of torture. They consider the arguments for submission, but reject them, being fully in control of their emotions (8.28), commenting that Antiochus has learned nothing from Eleazar. They accept their tortures calmly and philosophically (the author reveals a macabre delight in describing the details), speaking both of their readiness to suffer for the Law's sake and of Antiochus's inability to force them to abandon reason. The author underlines the lesson with a rhetorical sermon (chaps. 13–14). In chap. 15 he praises the mother's control over her natural affections, and in chap. 16 contrasts the arguments of compassion she might have used with those she actually addressed to her children before throwing herself on the fire (17.1).

The book ends with an appeal to Israel to obey the Law, knowing that reason is master of the emotions; with a statement of what the martyrs achieved; with the mother's personal apologia underlining the woman's duty to home, husband, and family; and with a final contrast between the fates of Antiochus and the martyrs, who have "received pure and immortal souls from God, to whom be glory forever and ever. Amen."

Purpose. This lengthy discourse in rhetorical Greek addresses its readers directly, and was possibly a memorial address intended for a diaspora Jewish community, perhaps in *Antioch, on the day commemorating the rededication of the Temple or the death of the Maccabean martyrs. The author strongly approves the martyrs' readiness to die for the Law and their refusal to compromise for the sake of peace with their Hellenistic neighbors. Clearly, he writes for Jews who might be put into this difficult position. Martyrdom is highly valued; martyrs are seen as champions in an athletic contest in which the tyrant is the enemy, and the world and humanity the spectators (11.20; 17.13–14), or as soldiers of God (16.14), overcoming oppressive tyranny (1.11) by their suffering and endurance (9.8, 30). In particular, the martyr's suffering has a sacrificial and atoning value for the people as a whole; thus, Eleazar at the point of death prays, "Be merciful to your people, and let our punishment suffice for them. Make my blood their purification, and take my life in exchange for theirs" (6.28–29; cf. 17.20–21). This emphasis is striking and is underlined by the eternal blessedness promised to the martyr (13.17; 15.3; 17.5, 18; 18.27), though, in sharp contrast with 2 Maccabees 7 this eternal reward does not take the form of bodily resurrection. In the Hellenistic world, this Pharisaic doctrine was not readily accepted (cf. Acts 17.32).

That the author was writing for partly hellenized Jews is also suggested by the pervasive influence of the Stoic belief in the rule of reason over the passions. The Stoics, however, believed that reason should not merely overcome the passions and emotions but subject and destroy them, whereas 4 Maccabees expressly affirms that reason rules over the passions not with the aim of destroying them but with the aim of not yielding to them (1.6; cf. 3.2–3). The author was not a hard-line Stoic—possibly he followed the teaching of Posidonius (ca. 135–50 BCE), who agreed that passions could not be totally eradicated—but commonplace Stoic teaching can nevertheless be seen throughout. The use of the cardinal virtues of prudence (NRSV: "rational judgment"), courage, justice, and temperance (1.8) goes back to Plato and Isocrates, as does the idea that it is better to suffer wrong than to do it (9.7–9; cf. Plato Gorgias 472e).

The author, however, is a deeply committed Jew, whose ideal is not the Stoic philosopher but the God-fearing person who witnesses to the Law, which is the Jewish wisdom and philosophy. Reason chooses wisdom, and *wisdom is education in the Law (1.15–17). Reason and the Law become almost interchangeable. The conduct of martyrs who die for the Law is thus thoroughly reasonable and therefore entirely commendable in the Hellenistic world.

Date and canonicity. 4 Maccabees can be dated between the publication of 2 Maccabees and the fall of Jerusalem in 70 CE, of which there is no hint. The description of Apollonius in 4.2 as governor of Syria, Phoenicia, and Cilicia (cf. 2 Macc. 4.4, which mentions only Coele-Syria and Phoenicia) suggests a date between 18 and 55 CE, when Cilicia was joined with the other two regions for administrative purposes. 4 Maccabees is thus evidence for diaspora Judaism in the time of *Jesus, whose death, like that of the martyrs, was also described as having atoning significance.

4 Maccabees' obvious interest in the Maccabean tradition led to its association with similar books in Codex Sinaiticus and Codex Alexandrinus as 4 Maccabees, although it has generally not been considered canonical. Eusebius (Hist. evang. 3.10.6) and Jerome identify the work with one called "On the Supremacy of Reason," which they wrongly attribute to *Josephus (who would not have approved the martyrs' intransigence). The title, however, described the contents well.

Influence on Christianity. 4 Maccabees had considerable influence on Christian authors, perhaps beginning with the author of the letter to the *Hebrews, who shares with 4 Maccabees an interest in the faith of the martyrs and perhaps some vocabulary (cf. Heb. 12.1–2; 4 Macc. 17.9–10). Cyprian of Carthage stressed the martyrs' faithful relationship to God (Epist. ad Fortunatum 11), and Origen saw them as an example of heroic martyrdom (Exhortation to Martyrdom 22–27). Augustine saw them as Christian in all but name and made the day of their commemoration, 1 August, a specifically Christian festival, since those who died for the Law of Moses died also for Christ (Sermon 300, In Solemnitate martyrum Machabaeorum). Gregory Nazianzus (Oratio in laudem Machabaeorum 15.1) saw them as anticipating Christian martyrdom, and the mother as anticipating *Mary, the mother of sorrows.

JOHN R. BARTLETT

Magdalene, Mary. See Mary Magdalene.

Magi. The term "magi" customarily refers to the anonymous wise men who followed a star until it led them to *Bethlehem (Matt. 2.1–12). While in Luke's gospel shepherds come to worship the child, Matthew introduces mysterious figures from the east who offer gifts from their treasure boxes.

Many details about the Magi are supplied by later tradition. In western Christianity they are assumed to have been three in number since three gifts are mentioned; eastern tradition gives their number as twelve. They traveled by camel, as is normal practice in the desert regions even today. Their names (Balthasar, Melchior, and Caspar, in the west) are supplied later. The fact that they are wealthy and converse with King *Herod leads to their identification as three kings. (See also Names for the Nameless.)

In fact, the Greek word from which "magi" is derived does not refer to royalty but to practitioners of eastern magical arts. The connection between magic and astrology is reflected in the visitors' fascination with the star that had led them to Bethlehem. Elsewhere in the Bible the portrayal of magi is not so positive. Greek versions of the book of *Daniel refer to magi who were ineffective advisers to King *Nebuchadrezzar. In Acts, apostles interact with Simon, a magician in *Samaria (8.9–24), and Bar-Jesus who was a magician and false prophet on Cyprus (13.6–12). DANIEL N. SCHOWALTER

Magic and Divination. Magic is based on the assumption that one can achieve desired results through the recitation of proper formulas or by the performance of certain prescribed actions. In most cases, the effect sought is something that will either harm others (especially an enemy or one who is a potential threat) or ward off harm that an opponent may be plotting. The essential feature for success is to repeat the formulaic words or actions exactly. Magic is evident in many cultures, ancient and modern, and was especially prevalent in the second century CE and subsequent centuries, as the abundance of Greek magical papyri attest.

In the Hebrew Bible, magic can be associated with disbelief in the power and purpose of Yahweh. Thus, in Genesis 41 the power and wisdom of the God of *Joseph are contrasted sharply with the inability of Pharaoh's wise men and magicians to understand his dream. The God who is in control of the world and of history discloses through Joseph what his intention is, thereby thoroughly discrediting the Egyptian magicians and diviners. A similar contest takes place in Exodus 7, where the diviners and magicians gathered by Pharaoh are able to change rods into snakes, as *Aaron did, but Aaron's rod-become-snake swallows all the others. The clear implication is that God's power and purpose are stronger than the powers of the Egyptian magicians. Magical practices are prohibited in the Law of Moses (Lev. 19.26). The contrast between Yahweh's power and the claims of the magicians is set out in *Balaam's song (Num. 23.23), where after recounting God's acts in delivering his people from Egypt, he declares, "Surely there is no enchantment against Jacob, no divination against Israel; now it shall be said of Jacob and Israel, 'See what God has done!' "

The historical and prophetic books contain occasional denunciations of those who practice magic. King *Manasseh of Judah practiced soothsaying and augury, burned his son as an offering, and consulted mediums and wizards (2 Kings 21.6; 2 Chron. 33.6). An important dimension of this kind of occult practice, as we can infer from the *prophets, was divination. This was a means of direct determination of the divine will, usually by the interpretation of some object (perceived as a sign) such as a marked stone or the entrails of a sacrificial animal. Jeremiah groups together false prophets, soothsayers, diviners, and sorcerers as those to whom Judah must not turn for counsel in the face of exile and deportation (Jer. 27.9). Similar warnings are given in Ezekiel 13 and Malachi 3.5. The frequency of references to this practice attests to the continuing appeal that magic and divination held for leaders and populace, and points up the sharp difference that the legal and prophetic traditions of Israel saw between these occult practices and Yahweh's determination of his will for his people.

In the New Testament, the prophecies, visions, and *miracles of Jesus are set within the framework of the present evidence of God's rule, rather than as performances of magic, as has sometimes been asserted. The gospel narratives are characterized by a virtual absence of the formulas and techniques of magic (with the description of the healings by Jesus in the gospel of Mark being a partial exception). Encounters with magic and magicians are explicitly mentioned only in Acts, where their work is denounced (Acts 8.9–24) and the perpetrator is struck blind (Acts 13.8–9).

In the *Law of Moses there were prescribed certain means by which the divine will could be communicated. These include the *Urim and Thummim, the *ephod and the *teraphim. The inability of scholars to agree on the translation of these terms is an indication of uncertainty as to how these items were used and understood. The Urim and Thummim (Exod. 28.30; Num. 27.21) were probably a set of dice or flat stones that were marked in such a way as to indicate "yes" or "no" when thrown down by the priest in order to ascertain God's will in a specific case. The ephod (a sacred garment, perhaps with some special adornment or attachment; 1 Sam. 14.18, 41) and the teraphim (portable representations of deities; Gen. 31; Hos. 3.4–5; Ezek. 21.21) were also consulted by priests and others in order to discover the divine plan at a crucial juncture in personal or national history. The Israelites' persistence in consulting diviners and sorcerers is given as one of the chief reasons for their being carried off to *Babylon (2 Kings 17.17). Yet Ezra 2.63 (= Neh. 7.65) seems to indicate that the use of Urim and Thummim to learn God's will was to be resumed after the return of Israel from the *exile.

The attitude toward diviners in the New Testament is unambiguous: their capacity to discern is the result of their being possessed by evil spirits, as *Paul's *exorcism of the soothsaying spirit that possessed the young slave woman in Acts 16 shows. The subsequent miracle of deliverance, whereby Paul and Silas are released from prison by divine intervention in the form of an earthquake and a loosening of their bonds, demonstrates for the author of Acts that God is the protector of his own.

See also Sortes Biblicae; Witch.

HOWARD CLARK KEE

Malachi, The Book of. Since Malachi in Hebrew means "my messenger," it is unclear whether this is the name of the prophet or a description of his office. Usually the book is dated after the time of *Haggai and *Zechariah but before the coming of *Ezra and *Nehemiah in the mid-fifth century BCE. A postexilic date is indicated by the reference to a "governor" (1.8) and the fact that the *Temple is standing. The abuses Malachi attacks are thought to show the need for the reforms that Ezra and Nehemiah were soon to carry out.

Malachi's question-and-answer style usually begins with a statement from the prophet of some theological truth followed by a question from his hearers. His answer then expounds the original theme. This is a literary device but may contain echoes of the teaching and preaching practices current in the Second Temple.

A theme prominent in the book is *covenant. The stark expression in 1.1–5 of the teaching that God chose Jacob (i.e., Israel) while rejecting *Edom, a nation that became a symbol of oppression during and after the exile, is elaborated in the manner of earlier prophets, that divine choice is not a ground for complacency but for obedience. The *priests (1.6–2.9), for all their status under the covenant (2.8; cf. Jer. 33.21; Num. 25.11–13; Neh. 13.29), have been less zealous in their duties toward God than to the governor. Malachi thinks it would be better for such Temple worship to stop altogether and even contrasts it unfavorably with the offerings of other nations (1.10–11). The whole nation has violated the covenant in their cruel treatment of each other, denying their family status as children of the one God, especially in their practice of casual *divorce (2.10–16; a warning against intermarriage with foreigners has been inserted into this section, vv. 11–12).

Later, Malachi charges them with neglect of payment of *tithes for the upkeep of the Temple and its personnel (3.6–12). Obedience here will result in material prosperity (cf. the words of Haggai about the rebuilding of the Temple, Hag. 1.9–11; 2.15–19). It is important to see that, for Malachi, proper observance of cultic worship was an expression of a true relationship to God ("Return to me," 3.7). Two passages address the despair and disillusionment of his contemporaries as they see no signs of God's activity or of the fulfillment of the old prophetic promises (2.17–3.5; 3.13–4.3). Both bring the assurance that God is about to act in righteousness and that therefore his people should hold the faith. (The passage 3.1b–4, with its switch to the third person and introduction of another figure, "the messenger of the covenant," may be a later insertion.)

The book ends with a call to keep the *Law of Moses (4.4) and a promise that God will send *Elijah the prophet to prepare the people for the final "*day of the Lord" (4.5–6) so that it may prove to be a day of salvation and not a repetition of the old judgment of the "curse" (Hebr. ḥērem, Josh. 6.17; Lev. 27.28; see Ban). Perhaps Elijah was thought of in this role because he had not died but had been taken up to heaven (2 Kings 2). This idea was repeated in Sirach 48.10 and in Mark 9.11.

Malachi shows how the postexilic prophets were deeply concerned for the Temple and its worship and yet held such concern in creative tension with a call for right ethical living. They recognized the dangers the preexilic prophets had warned against, whereby external worship could easily become a substitute for genuine relationship with God, yet challenged their hearers with the call to hold both aspects of the religious life together. Their call was not for mercy rather than sacrifice (cf. Hos. 6.6) but for mercy and sacrifice. They also held together concern for obedience to the Law and a strong eschatological hope of God's future saving action.

The final verses (4.4–6) should be seen as a conclusion not just to the book of Malachi but to the whole prophetic corpus, which ends with "The Book of the Twelve" (i.e., the so-called minor prophets). At a time when the prophetic collections were on the way to being regarded as canonical in status and authority, the function of these verses is to place such collections alongside the Torah as equally authoritative expressions of God's word. REX MASON

Manasseh.

1. Eldest son of *Joseph, brother of *Ephraim, and ancestor of the tribe of Manasseh. According to various territorial lists, the tribe of Manasseh was settled on both sides of the Jordan River, on the east, north of the Jabbok (e.g., Num. 32.39–42; Josh. 13.29–31), and on the west, in the central hill country (Josh. 17; see Map 3:4XY). It was in its later history weaker than Ephraim; this political fact is reflected in the story of Jacob's blessing, in which he reverses the birth order (Gen. 48). Manasseh is also described as the father of Machir, a genealogical explanation of a more complicated history between two apparently separate tribal entities; note that in Judges 5.14, Machir is mentioned along with Ephraim, but Manasseh is not named. (See also Tribes of Israel.)

2. King of Judah (697 [or 687]–642 BCE). His reign was the longest of any Israelite or Judean king, and in the difficult times of Assyrian domination he achieved a measure of autonomy for Judah. This apparently involved some compromises with older ideals, for Manasseh is condemned by the *Deuteronomic history as the worst of the Davidic kings, whose "sin" was responsible for God's punishment of Judah (2 Kings 21.9, 17; 24.3). His portrayal in *Chronicles is less harsh.

See Manasseh, The Prayer of; Judah, The Kingdom of. MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Manasseh, The Prayer of. The account of King *Manasseh's evil reign over Judah in 2 Chronicles 33 contains the account of an episode, almost certainly legendary, in which Manasseh was taken captive by the *Assyrians and carried off to *Babylon where, in his trouble, he became a loyal worshiper of the God of his people (2 Chron. 33.11–13). This story, which has no parallel in the older account in 2 Kings 21.1–18, was no doubt told to give a theological explanation for the length and prosperity of the career of one whose policy was to promote idolatry: for in theory, he should have been punished by God with political failure and come to a disastrous end (Deut. 29.14–21). The author of *Chronicles, having explained the king's paradoxical and puzzling success by a story of his eventual return to the worship of Yahweh, also mentions that his prayer was preserved in "the Annals of the Kings of Israel" (2 Chron. 33.18–19). A devout writer from a much later period, probably the late Hellenistic age, composed a prayer such as the king might have used. The result was the small "book" called the Prayer of Manasseh.

It is a dignified penitential prayer, in traditional Jewish liturgical language, that contains nothing specifically appropriate to Manasseh's situation except the reference to "setting up abominations" in v. 10 (see 2 Chron. 33.3–5). It begins with an address to God as all-powerful and fearsome to sinners (vv. 1–5) but also as compassionate and willing to accept repentance (vv. 6–7). While penitence is unnecessary for the righteous, such as Israel's ancestors (v. 8), the royal penitent knows that his sins are too many to be overlooked and therefore confesses his deep unworthiness, in terms that are quite general except for the phrase previously noted (vv. 9–10); he begs for divine forgiveness (vv. 11–14) and concludes with a promise, similar to those in several of the biblical *psalms of lament, to engage in a formal act of praise when his prayer is answered, as undoubtedly it will be (v. 15; cf. Pss. 22.22–31; 56.12–13).

The Prayer was not part of the original Greek

*Septuagint and is not regarded as canonical by the Roman Catholic church; some Orthodox churches, however, accord it deuterocanonical status, and so it is frequently included among the Apocrypha in English Bibles (see Apocrypha, article on Jewish Apocrypha). In the Greek Codex Alexandrinus, it is included in a collection of "odes" printed as a supplement to the book of Psalms. Jerome seems not to have been acquainted with it, though in modern editions of the *Vulgate it is printed (along with 2 Esdras [= 4 Ezra] and Ps. 151) in an appendix to the New Testament. In some ancient versions, it appears after 2 Chronicles (as it does also in the Geneva Bible of 1560), but it was never incorporated into the text of that book, perhaps because it was found only in Greek or was known for some other reason to be of recent composition. Most scholars would agree in assigning it a very late date, perhaps the first century BCE. There is no unmistakable evidence that the book was composed in any language other than Greek, and some competent scholars continue to believe the Greek text to be the original. The general style, however, suggests a Hebrew original, as does the fact that Hebrew was the normal language of prayer among Jews. This is probably the prevailing view.

The liturgical style makes it suitable for use in public worship, and its inclusion in the collection of odes added to the Psalter in some Septuagint manuscripts and other ancient versions indicates that it was so used in the ancient church. In an abridged form it has been incorporated as a Lenten canticle in the 1979 Prayer Book of the American Episcopal church.

ROBERT C. DENTAN

Manna. Of uncertain origin, in Exodus 16.15 the word "manna" is given a popular etymology by Israelites who asked, when they saw it, "What is it?" (Hebr. mān hû'). This was the miraculous food supplied by the Lord to the Israelites during the forty years of their wandering in the *wilderness from *Egypt to *Canaan. Manna is also called, poetically, "bread of the mighty ones [NRSV: angels]" (Ps. 78.25) and "food of angels" (Wisd. of Sol. 16.20).

Early in their *Exodus from Egypt, the Israelites came to the wilderness of Sin. There the whole congregation accused *Moses and *Aaron of bringing them into the wilderness to kill them with hunger. In response the Lord promised to rain down bread for them from heaven (Exod. 16.4). Manna came six days a week. Only one day's portion was to be gathered except on the sixth day; a double portion gathered that day permitted Israel to keep the *Sabbath rest. Each morning when the dew had vanished, "there on the surface of the wilderness was a fine flaky substance, as fine as frost on the ground" (Exod. 16.14). It was "like coriander seed, white, and the taste of it was like wafers made with honey" (Exod. 16.31). Its appearance was like "gum resin" (Num. 11.7). The people "ground it in mills or beat it in mortars, then boiled it in pots and made cakes of it; and the taste of it was like the taste of cakes baked with oil" (Num. 11.8). An urn containing a quantity of manna was kept in or in front of the *ark of the covenant as a reminder of this divine provision (Exod. 16.32–34; Heb. 9.11).

From ancient to modern times, manna has been linked with natural phenomena in the *Sinai region. The traditional identification has been with a granular type of sweet substance thought to be secreted in early summer by the tamarisk bush. More recent investigations suggest that this "manna" is produced by the excretion of two kinds of scale insects that feed on the sap of the tamarisk. Because the sap is poor in nitrogen, the insects must ingest large amounts of carbohydrate-rich sap in order to consume enough nitrogen. The excess carbohydrate is then excreted as honeydew rich in three basic sugars and pectin. The amount of the substance thus produced would, of course, fall far short of Israel's need for bread; in any case, to give a natural explanation for what the Bible describes as miraculous is perhaps to miss the point.

According to the gospel of *John, when Jesus was challenged to validate his ministry with a sign comparable to that of manna, he identified himself as the "true bread from heaven," come down to give life to the world (John 6.32–35).

JAMES I. COOK

Manuscripts. This entry consists of two articles, the first on manuscripts of the Hebrew Bible and the second on manuscripts of the Greek New Testament. For discussion of types of manuscripts, see Books and Bookmaking. For discussion of the importance of individual manuscripts in establishing the text of the Bible, see Dead Sea Scrolls and Textual Criticism.

Hebrew Bible

Forms. Ancient texts such as the Hebrew Bible were transmitted over the centuries in various forms, at first in scrolls, later in manuscripts of codex format, and in recent centuries in printed editions. Ancient scrolls consist of sheets of leather sewn together, resembling the *Torah scrolls still used today in synagogues. A codex consists of any number of sheets (leather, parchment) bound together into a book. Scrolls contained individual biblical books, while codices could contain most or all of the Hebrew Bible. Hebrew biblical texts were first transmitted in scrolls; after the use of codices for the New Testament and other ancient literature, the codex form began to be used as well.

Development of the Biblical Text. When the composition of a biblical book was completed, in theory there should have been only one master copy of that particular book. In practice, however, even at that stage there may have been several copies which differed from one another, often a great deal; the same is true of relatively modern works as well. These differences increased rather than diminished in the next centuries, as generations of scribes added new details to the manuscripts and scrolls they copied.

At an early stage, biblical Hebrew, like other Semitic languages, was written solely with consonants; in English this would mean that a word like "book" would be written "bk." The first type of difference between biblical texts was thus in consonants, as is still visible from a comparison of early sources such as the *Dead Sea Scrolls. More differences come to light when these texts are compared with the *Samaritan Pentateuch and the *Septuagint translation in Greek, whose underlying Hebrew text can often be reconstructed.

Many of these different texts fell out of use, especially because the religious groups supporting them ceased to exist or diminished in importance. In the Roman period, however, there were many different "families" of texts in use, as the *Qumran texts show; among these was what was to become the official version of the text of the Hebrew Bible ("the received text") in the centuries to follow, the Masoretic Text.

The Masoretic Text. After the destruction of the Second Temple in 70 CE, a particular group of texts was emerging, endorsed by and copied by the central stream of Judaism, that of the *Pharisees, later to be known as the *Masoretic Text (MT). When compared with others, this text-family had no special characteristics, and the only feature that stands out is its careful transmission, though probably other texts were also transmitted as carefully. The antecedents of the MT, found principally at Qumran, are called proto-Masoretic, since the later components of that text had not yet been added to it.

A good example of an early proto-Masoretic source is the shorter Isaiah scroll from Cave 1 at Qumran (1QIsa^b). Comparison of this scroll with the medieval and modern printed text shows that the consonantal framework of the MT changed little after the first century BCE. This is confirmed by the fragments found from Wadi Murabba'ât south of Qumran, dating from about 130 CE, all of which are virtually identical with the medieval text. In addition, the biblical text quoted in the *Talmud and early midrashim is virtually identical with the later texts, though owing to the imprecision of quotation and the nature of the Talmudic context occasional divergences exist. Thus, around the turn of the era there was a strong tendency to create a single unified text, but this ideal was never fully achieved owing to the vicissitudes of textual transmission. In other words, at no time did there exist one "Masoretic Text"; there always were several different "Masoretic Texts."

The Masoretic Text known to us today was created in the early Middle Ages, when other components were added to the consonantal framework. Learned scribes involved in the transmission of the biblical text developed and perpetuated in and around the text various kinds of data, including vocalization and cantillation marks as well as a Masoretic apparatus of remarks in the text. These were the Masoretes who derived their name from the *Masorah (see below).

Vocalization. The use of consonantal spelling meant that any word in Hebrew could be read in different ways; in English this would mean that the letters "sl" could be read "seal," "sill," "sell," "soul," "sale," etc. Such ambiguity was troublesome, especially for an authoritative text; as a result, certain letters (ʾalep, hē, yōd, wāw) were added to the text to indicate which vowels were to be read ("vowel letters"). Later actual vowels were added to the text in the form of newly-invented graphic symbols, so that from then on there was no confusion regarding the reading of the text. Various vocalization systems were developed, but the system finally accepted by all western Jewish communities was the Tiberian system (from Tiberias) developed by Moshe Ben-Asher (tenth century CE). A so-called Babylonian system was adopted by the oriental Jewish communities. In the course of the centuries, however, the Tiberian Ben-Asher tradition has been more or less accepted by all communities, even though traces of other systems persisted in more remote areas, especially in Yemen.

Cantillation. Other signs were added to the consonants as guidance for the liturgical reading of the text in the synagogue. These signs have both musical value and syntactic importance, since they indicate the relationship between any two words in the text in different gradations of conjunctiveness or disjunctiveness. Various cantillation systems were developed, but finally the Ben-Asher system was accepted for this purpose as well. The interpretive tradition embodied in the vocalization and cantillation system was established early, but only from the eighth century CE onward were these transmitted in a written form.

Masorah. In and around the text the Masoretes added an elaborate body of notes and signs for the preservation and correct spelling of the text. In the text itself the Masoretes perpetuated all the special elements that were present in the text when the learned scribes decided to allow no more changes and which therefore became part and parcel of it, such as large and small letters, dots under or above the letters, and suspended letters. In addition, in the margin of the text the Masoretes added an elaborate apparatus of notes (*Masorah, "transmission") on individual words in the text, especially on the number of occurrences of certain forms and spellings, meant as guidance for the scribes.

There are many differences among the various Masoretic manuscripts in all these elements. Scholars consider two manuscripts as the most authentic representatives of the Ben-Asher tradition, since one was apparently vocalized by Moshe Ben-Asher himself (the Aleppo Codex, partially preserved) and another one (the Leningrad Codex) was copied from it. The text of the Leningrad Codex has been reproduced in the modern edition of the Biblia Hebraica Stuttgartensia.

EMANUEL TOV

The Greek New Testament

By 1989 the Münster Institute for New Testament Textual Research had catalogued the number of manuscripts of the Greek New Testament at a total of 5488, in the customary categories: 96 papyri, 299 uncials, 2812 minuscules, and 2281 *lectionaries (containing selected passages arranged according to the liturgical year, for use in church services). Most lectionaries are in minuscule script, but the oldest are in uncial. When compared to the numbers of existing manuscripts of ancient classical writers, these numbers are extraordinarily large. However, most of the papyri are fragmentary; some consist of only one or two leaves. Moreover, only 59 manuscripts contain the entire New Testament, and of these only one (Codex Sinaiticus) is uncial; roughly 1500 contain only the Gospels, and the book of Revelation survives in only 287 copies (many of which alternate between sections of text and patristic commentary).

Date. Very few manuscripts were dated by their scribes, and the exceptions tend to be late. Fortunately, secular documents of various sorts carrying dates have survived, enabling paleographers to compare handwriting and ascertain within broad limits the date of a biblical manuscript.

The oldest known New Testament manuscript is a papyrus fragment, ca. 9 by 6.35 cm (3 1/2 by 2 1/2 in), dated to 100–150 CE, which preserves five verses from John 18. P^{52}, as it is called, is now kept at the John Rylands Library in Manchester, England. The oldest substantial portions of the New Testament are the Bodmer papyrus of John (P^{66}), now in Geneva, and the Chester Beatty papyrus (P^{46}) in Dublin and Ann Arbor, which contains ten Pauline letters; both have been dated to ca. 200 CE. The oldest *parchment New Testament copies are Codex Vaticanus and Codex Sinaiticus, both from the fourth century. From roughly 300–1000 CE, about three hundred manuscripts remain; and from about 1000–1500 (*Gutenberg invented movable-type printing around 1450), about two thousand copies have survived. Since of all these known copies only fifty-nine contain the entire New Testament, it is clear that prior to the invention of *printing relatively few individuals or even congregations possessed a complete New Testament.

Identification of Manuscripts. Previously, a manuscript was identified by the name of the owner (e.g., Codex Bezae), the place where it is now preserved (Codex Vaticanus, Codex Washingtoniensis), or the place of its purported origin (Codex Alexandrinus). A simpler, more systematic nomenclature was invented by a Swiss scholar, Johann Jakob Wettstein (1693–1754), who assigned a capital roman letter to each uncial and an arabic numeral to each minuscule. Over time, however, the letters of the alphabet proved too few for the growing number of known uncial manuscripts, so Hebrew and Greek letters came into use; eventually, however, these too proved insufficient, and Caspar René Gregory (1846–1917) proposed that each uncial manuscript be assigned a numeral prefixed by o. Only for the chief uncials (such as Vaticanus) is the earlier letter system retained.

Format. Early on, Christian communities abandoned use of the scroll in favor of the leaf-book (codex), which was less expensive and more convenient (see Books and Bookmaking in Antiquity). Over time, parchment slowly supplanted papyrus as the material of choice for books. Several deluxe copies of the scriptures survive from the sixth century; these were prepared for nobles and high ecclesiastics on purple-dyed parchment, in script written with silver ink (and in some cases gold for initial letters). Once scribes had finished copying the text, artists added illumination and illustrations (miniatures). The text of the Gospels—and eventually that of other New Testament books—was divided into numbered sections; Eusebius (d. ca. 342) collected these into tables that showed parallel passages in four Gospels, in three Gospels, in two, and finally in those sections unique to each gospel. In some cases, scribes provided information as to the total number of lines in a gospel or letter.

In time individual books of the New Testament were provided with a variety of prologues and other prefatory material, supplying certain information about the author, contents, and character of the work. Some prologues are anonymous, while others are attributed to patristic authors (such as Chrysostom, Theodoret, Euthalius). Occasionally, lectionary notations were entered into straight-text gospel manuscripts. Likewise, musical notations to assist readers in chanting the lessons were placed above the line of text in green or red to contrast with the text's brown or black ink.

Important Manuscripts. The following lists specify the siglum (identification), date, contents, and place of preservation:

Papyri.

P^{38}: ca. 300; portions of Acts 18.27–19.16; Ann Arbor, University of Michigan Library.

P^{45}: third century; portions of the four Gospels and Acts; part in Dublin, Chester Beatty Library, and part in Vienna, Austrian National Library.

P^{46}: ca. 200; ten letters of Paul; part in Dublin, Chester Beatty Library, and part in Ann Arbor, University of Michigan Library.

P^{47}: third century; Revelation 9.10–17.2; Dublin, Chester Beatty Library.

P^{52}: first half of second century; John 18.31–33, 37–38; Manchester, John Rylands Library.

P^{66}: ca. 200; portions of the gospel of John, part in Cologny-Geneva, Bodmer Library, and part in Dublin, Chester Beatty Library.

P^{75}: third century; most of the gospel of Luke and two-thirds of the gospel of John; Cologny-Geneva, Bodmer Library.

Uncial manuscripts.

ℵ: fourth century; entire New Testament; London, British Library (Codex Sinaiticus).

A: fifth century; New Testament, with a few lacunae; London, British Library (Codex Alexandrinus).

B: fourth century; Gospels, Acts, letters (lacking 1 Timothy through Philemon, and Hebrews 9.14 through the end of Revelation); Rome, Vatican Library (Codex Vaticanus).

C: fifth century; New Testament (a palimpsest with many lacunae); Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale (Codex Ephraemi).

D: fifth century; Gospels and Acts in Greek and Latin (with lacunae); Cambridge University Library (Codex Bezae).

W: fifth century; four Gospels (with lacunae) in the order Matthew, John, Luke, Mark; Washington, Smithsonian Institution, Freer Gallery of Art (Codex Washingtoniensis).

Θ: ninth century; four Gospels (with a few lacunae); Tiflis, Manuscript Institute (Codex Koridethi).

0169: fourth century; Rev. 3.19–4.3; Princeton Theological Seminary Library.

0212: third century; Diatessaron, brief portions of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John; New Haven, Yale University, P. Dura 10.

Minuscule manuscripts.

1: twelfth century; New Testament, lacking the book of Revelation; Basel, University Library. Related to manuscripts 118, 131, 209, and others as family 1, reflecting the kind of text used at Caesarea in the fourth century.

13: thirteenth century; four Gospels; Paris; Bibliothèque Nationale. Related to 69 and ten other minuscule manuscripts as family 13 (they have John 7.53–8.12 after Luke 21.38), which goes back to an archetype in Calabria.

33: ninth century; New Testament, lacking the book of Revelation; Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale. Sometimes called "the queen of the minuscules," its text is similar to that in B and ℵ.

461: 835 CE (oldest dated New Testament Greek manuscript); four Gospels; St. Petersburg Public Library.

565: ninth century; four Gospels; St. Petersburg Public Library; a magnificent purple parchment manuscript written in gold letters.

614: thirteenth century; Acts and letters (lacuna in Jude 3–25); Milan, Biblioteca Ambrosiana. Related to the text of Acts in Codex Bezae.

700: eleventh century; four Gospels; London, British Library. In Luke 11.2 it replaces the petition of the *Lord's Prayer, "Thy kingdom come," with "Thy holy Spirit come upon us and cleanse us."

1739: tenth century; Acts, general letters, Pauline letters; Mount Athos, Lavra. Agrees frequently with the text used by Origen (d. ca. 254).

2400: thirteenth century; New Testament but without the book of Revelation; Chicago, University of Chicago Library. A splendid manuscript with ninety-eight miniatures, in a silver case.

Editions. The earliest printed Greek New Testament was volume 5 (1514) of the Complutensian *Polyglot Bible, which was sponsored by Cardinal Ximénes of Alcalá, Spain; however, the pope did not grant permission to publish it until 1520. The first published Greek New Testament, edited by Erasmus of Rotterdam and issued by Johannes Froben of Basel in 1516, relied on only a few very late manuscripts. For the book of Revelation there was only one Greek manuscript available, and it lacked the last six verses; for them, Erasmus translated the Latin *Vulgate into what he supposed the Greek text should read. This type of New Testament text, based on late and sometimes imperfect manuscripts, became the so-called textus receptus ("received text"). Only toward the end of the nineteenth century, once much earlier and superior New Testament manuscripts became available, could scholars produce more accurate editions.

See Textual Criticism. BRUCE M. METZGER

Maps of the Biblical World. Maps in the conventional sense of scale drawings based on accurate ground measurements did not exist before the modern era. There were, however, written maps that served, like drawn maps, as abstract representations of space.

The Hebrew Bible contains three kinds of written maps: administrative maps, campaign itineraries, and historical or ethnographic geographies. These distinctions are based on inferences about their differing origins and functions. The first two concern real places and are approximately contemporary with the landscape they describe; the last are retrospective or anachronizing descriptions of places and peoples either real or imagined.

Administrative maps were either boundary maps defining territorial limits or lists of towns and/or tribes within specific districts. Boundary maps usually follow the formula "from point A to point B, then to point C," and so on, returning ultimately to point A (e.g., Gen. 10.19; 15.18; Exod. 23.31; Num. 13.21; Deut. 11.24). The simplest biblical boundary map, the familiar description of *Canaan "from Dan to Beer-sheba" (2 Sam. 24.2), has only two elements. The most complex, a detailed delineation of Canaan's boundaries in Numbers 34.1–12, enumerates multiple consecutive points. Town lists were not sequences of connected points but inclusive catalogues probably compiled by a central authority for purposes of calculating revenue or population size in a given district. These probably originated in the royal administration begun by *David (e.g. the Levitical cities in Josh. 21; 1 Chron. 6) and continued by *Solomon (1 Kings 4.7–19) (e.g., the Galilean and Transjordanian tribes and northern Benjamin in Josh. 13; 18; 19) and later kings (e.g., the districts of Judah in Josh. 15.18; the towns of Simeon and Dan in Josh. 19; 1 Chron. 4).

Itineraries of military expeditions, based probably on contemporary sources, include the campaign of Ben-hadad of Aram-Damascus into northern Israel (1 Kings 15.20), the invasion of Israel by *Tiglath-pileser III of Assyria (2 Kings 15.29), Uzziah's conquests in Philistia (2 Chron. 26.6), and the *Philistine retaliation against Judah in the reign of Ahaz (2 Chron. 28.18). *Abraham's legendary war with the kings of the east (Gen. 14) contains topographic information about the southern Dead Sea region, although the historicity and geographical details of this account are disputed.

Finally, there are historical and ethnographic geographies that depict, accurately or imperfectly, real places and peoples or portray cosmic realms outside human experience. The former include the "Table of Nations" tracing *Noah's descendants after the *Flood (Gen. 10.1–32), Israelite wanderings after their *Exodus from Egypt (Num. 33.5–49), the roster of Canaanite kings opposing the Israelite invaders (Josh. 12), tribal allotments awarded after the *conquest of Canaan (Josh. 15–19), and the land that remained unconquered (Josh. 13). Ezekiel's oracle against Tyre describes not only the city but also its far-flung trading connections (Ezek. 27). Cosmic geographies include descriptions of the rivers of the *garden of Eden (Gen. 2.10–14) and Ezekiel's vision of the new *Jerusalem coupled with the idealized boundaries of the land of Israel (Ezek. 40–48). Revelation 21 is a New Testament version of Ezekiel's visionary map of the heavenly Jerusalem. Biblical word maps of real or imagined space were perhaps accompanied originally by drawings, but none of these have survived.

Drawn maps from ancient Mesopotamia do however exist. These were inscribed on clay, like most other Mesopotamian written documents. The oldest (late third millennium BCE), excavated at *Nuzi in northeastern Iraq, depicts an agricultural estate east of Nuzi belonging to "Arzala." Two additional maps, both dated to the mid-second millennium BCE, are from Nippur in southern Iraq. One shows the city itself and its adjacent canals; another locates twelve agricultural plots in the vicinity and names their owners. These maps represent cadastral (land measurement) maps, identifying plots to record ownership and perhaps for purposes of taxation, like modern land deeds. In ancient Syria-Palestine such cadastral maps may also have existed. They were probably drawn on perishable parchment or papyrus and thus have not survived.

The existence of maps, whether written or drawn, implies an underlying notion of spatial orientation. In the biblical world that orientation was eastward, not northward as with modern maps. Others directions were related to this primary one. Since east was "front" (Gen. 2.8), west was "behind" (Job 18.20), north was "on the left hand" (Gen. 14.15), and south, "on the right hand" (1 Sam. 23.24). The etymologies of the biblical words frequently used to express cardinal directions conform to this orientation. An alternate orientation, toward the rising of the sun, also existed. East was the direction of the sun's rising (Josh. 12.1), and west, of its setting (Isa. 45.6). The two orientations, one solar and one based on an observer's position, may be connected through the sacral significance, common throughout the ancient Near East, of facing the sunrise.

The best-known extant map of the biblical world is the sixth-century CE mosaic map discovered in Madaba (Medeba), Jordan (Map 1:Y5). Even in its present fragmentary state, the Madaba map is a recognizable although schematic representation of Palestine on both sides of the Dead Sea. Byzantine Jerusalem, labeled "the holy city," is the focal point of the map. Not coincidentally, place names written on it are intended to be read as the viewer looks east, facing the mosaic.

Medieval maps of Palestine, both Jewish and Christian, were, like the Madeba map, created after the region's religious significance had been established. Such maps were concerned primarily with locations mentioned in biblical narrative and not with precise mapping of the landscape.

Modern mapping of the biblical world began in the eighteenth century CE as biblical geographers attempted to relate word maps to contemporary locations in Palestine and neighboring lands. The first accurate topographic maps of Palestine, based on field surveys conducted by C. R. Conder and H. H. Kitchener in 1872–1877, were published by the Palestine Exploration Fund in 1880. After World War I, Britain and France established topographic surveys in Palestine and Syria, respectively, which produced maps of the region that are, with improvements, still the basis for archaeological exploration in the region. (See further R. North, A History of Biblical Map Making, Wiesbaden, 1979.) JOSEPH A. GREENE

Maranatha. An *Aramaic phrase found in 1 Corinthians 16.22. Paul closes his letter with some almost stock expressions common to the genre of ancient *letters; this conclusion includes a threat against "those who do not love the Lord" ("may they be *anathema"), and the prayer or charge "maranatha."

The term maranatha has been variously translated as "Our Lord has come," "Our Lord will come," or "Our Lord, come!" In light of early Christian *apocalyptic expectation, the last, understood as a prayer for the imminent appearance of "the Lord" (see Second Coming of Christ), seems the most likely meaning. The use of Aramaic probably indicates a very early stage in the development of Christian worship. Paul is thus reiterating a liturgical expression apparently well known in early church circles (cf. Rev. 22.20; Didache 10.6). J. ANDREW OVERMAN Mari Tablets. The magnificent palace of Mari with its royal archives of cuneiform tablets is the most significant archaeological find from French excavations at Tell Hariri, which is situated about a mile west of the Middle *Euphrates in Syria.

Most of these tablets, numbering in the tens of thousands, are royal correspondence dealing with domestic and international matters and economic, administrative, and juridical records of the palace. These texts have supplied important historical, chronological, geographic, ethnolinguistic, and cultural data concerning northern Mesopotamia and Syria-Palestine from the mid-nineteenth to the mid-eighteenth century BCE, a period just before the rise of *Hammurapi of Babylon and culminating in the formation of his Old Babylonian Empire.

Part of the significance of the Mari tablets for the interpretation of the Bible stems from the information that they provide about the West Semitic Amurrites (see Amorites), who began a massive infiltration into Mesopotamia at the beginning of the second millennium BCE. The Mari archives document a wide spectrum of Amurrites. They depict confederacies of seminomadic West Semitic tribes such as the Yaminites, who were untouched by Mesopotamian civilization and remained hostile to the central authorities. At the other extreme, they record the rule of thoroughly Mesopotamianized West Semitic kings, such as Shamasi-addu of Assyria, Zimri-lim of Mari, and Hammurapi of Babylon, who remained Amurrite only in name. They also describe the West Semitic Haneans in the process of sedentarization, who accepted the authority of the Mesopotamian kings but retained many of the ways of the Amurrites. In recording the activities of all these Amurrites, the Mari archives provide rich documentation of West Semitic personal *names, vocabulary, tribal structure and organization, and institutions and practices, such as *covenant making and census taking. In the cultic sphere, there is a small but significant group of prophecy texts, which attest to the existence of intuitive divination by "ecstatics" and "answerers" at Mari, who inform the king of the deity's message. (See Prophets, article on Ancient Israel.)

Some scholars have sought to place the events described in Genesis 12–50 within the West Semitic context of Mari, thus dating the *ancestors of Israel to the early second millennium. While one must acknowledge the invaluable contributions of the Mari tablets in illuminating the ancient West Semitic background of biblical traditions, parallels alone cannot establish contemporaneity. Until the distinguishing particularities of Amurrite and *Aramean cultures can be clarified by new discoveries, we must be content to utilize the Mari data for the insights and perspectives they provide without drawing chronological conclusions that cannot be proved.

BARRY L. EICHLER

Mark, The Gospel According to. Mark is the shortest of the four canonical Gospels and was almost certainly the first to be written. Although the use of narrative to record God's salvation of Israel is common in the Hebrew Bible and although there is an obvious correspondence between the story told by Mark and the very brief summaries of the gospel found elsewhere in the New Testament (e.g., Acts 2.22–24), there are no parallels to this precise literary form before early Christianity. In all probability, therefore, the author of this book was responsible for creating the literary genre we know as "*gospel."

Contents. Attempts to analyze this gospel run the risk of imposing our interpretation on it. In explicating a text, it is natural to look for an overall pattern, but Mark's story was almost certainly intended to be read aloud, and the impact it made on its first hearers is more likely to be discerned by noting connections between one paragraph and the next rather than by analyzing it into sections, which may obscure such links. This gospel has been built up out of many short units, and one of the features of Mark's arrangement is the frequent sandwiching together of incidents (e.g., 11.11–25). Notable also is the way in which he builds up evidence by a series of stories (e.g., about outsiders, 1.40–2.17; uncleanness, 7.1–30) or by repetition (three passion predictions, 8.31; 9.31; 10.33; two blind men healed, 8.22–26; 10.46–52; two feeding miracles, 6.31–44; 8.1–10; cf. 8.14–21; three summaries of Jesus' activity 1.32–4; 3.7–12; 6.56). All these devices would help to convey the significance of the story as it was read.

For convenience, the following brief summary is set out in a geographical scheme, but this was not necessarily of particular importance to Mark himself.

The first thirteen verses, which establish Jesus' identity, are set in the *wilderness. In 1.14 Jesus moves into *Galilee, where he proclaims the *kingdom, calls *disciples, teaches, exorcises evil spirits, and heals (1.15–4.34); his activity brings him into conflict with the religious authorities. A series of notable miracles follows, as Jesus moves back and forth across the lake, but they are met with unbelief (4.35–8.26). In 8.27–30 Jesus reaches Caesarea Philippi in the far north, where *Peter declares him to be the *Messiah.

As he moves south, Jesus three times foretells his death and resurrection and explains the meaning of discipleship (8.31–10.52). He reaches *Jerusalem and the *Temple (chaps. 11–13), and the passion narrative unfolds (chaps. 14–15). In the final paragraph (16.1–8), women find the tomb empty. Chapter 16.9–20 and the alternative ending given in the NRSV footnote represent attempts by later writers to "complete" the gospel.

Author and Date. The ascription of the gospel of Mark goes back at least to Papias, Bishop of Hierapolis, who in about 130 CE reported that he had been told that it was written by Mark "the interpreter of Peter"; this is presumably the Mark referred to in 1 Pet. 5.13 as "my son Mark." Traditionally, he has been identified with the John *Mark mentioned in Acts 12.12, but the latter was associated with *Paul and *Barnabas, not Peter (Acts 12.25; 15.37, 39; Col. 4.10; 2 Tim. 4.11), and the name "Mark" was one of the most common in the ancient world.

This gospel is usually dated between 65 and 75 CE. The first of these dates is set by Irenaeus (late second century CE), who said that Mark wrote after Peter's death. If we accept Marcan priority, then we must allow time between the composition of Mark and that of *Matthew and *Luke, which suggests a date before about 75 CE. The only clue in the gospel itself is chap. 13, which predicts the destruction of the Temple; many commentators contrast the vague references to the fate of Jerusalem in Mark 13 with the clear reference to the siege of the city in Luke 21.20 and suggest that this indicates that Mark was written before 70 CE. But Mark 13 is concerned to separate the disasters that are going to overwhelm Judea from the supernatural chaos at the end, and it is arguable that it was written in the period following the former to explain why the end was "still to come" (13.7). The gospel of Mark was probably written, therefore, either immediately before or immediately after the destruction of Jerusalem in 70 CE.

Tradition at least as early as Irenaeus held that it was composed in Rome, but this may have been a deduction from the association with Peter. Support for a Roman origin is sometimes found in Mark's use of Latinisms (e.g., quadrans, a coin, 12.42), but these were probably familiar throughout the *Roman empire. Explanations of Jewish words and customs, together with a poor knowledge of Palestinian geography, suggest that Mark was writing for *gentiles living outside Palestine, but they do not point to any particular place. The emphasis on the inevitability of suffering for Jesus' followers could well be explained if this gospel were written for a community that was suffering for its faith: although the Roman church was persecuted in the time of Nero, it was by no means alone, since persecution of Christians was common at the time.

Sources. Mark's gospel contains very little material that is not included by Matthew, and the earliest explanation, given by Augustine, was that it was an abbreviation of Matthew's gospel. But Luke has to be taken into account also, since he, too, includes a great deal of this material. According to the most commonly held solution to the *synoptic problem, Mark's gospel was used as a major source by Matthew and Luke. This solution is not without problems, and the suggestion that they used an earlier version of Mark (Urmarkus) is an attempt to explain some of the differences from Mark that Matthew and Luke have in common. An alternative theory (known as the Griesbach hypothesis) argues that Mark used both Matthew and Luke as sources, but careful study of the parallels suggests that the Marcan version was probably the earliest.

The belief that Mark's gospel was a record of Peter's reminiscences was challenged by the work of form critics who argued that it was based on short units of oral tradition that had been handed down to the Christian communities and had been shaped by their situations and beliefs. C. H. Dodd suggested that Mark had fitted these units into a chronological outline of the ministry of Jesus, but the supposed outline proved too vague to be of value. It is possible that some of the material used by Mark, such as the conflict stories in 2.1–3.6, had already been gathered together at the oral stage, and it is commonly believed that the passion narrative had already been written down as a continuous narrative. The rise of redaction criticism, however, with its emphasis on the evangelists as authors rather than as mere collectors, has led to the realization that Mark himself may have been responsible for almost all the arrangement of the material and that his only sources may have been the individual units of tradition.

Readers. Mark probably wrote his gospel for one specific Christian community, and the problems and situation of that community will have governed the way in which he has set out the story; but these can only be deduced from the book itself. The way in which the passion narrative dominates the story suggests that the nature of Jesus' death caused Mark's readers difficulty: Mark's answer to the scandal of the crucifixion is seen in the paradoxical revelation of Jesus as *Messiah and *Son of God through his death. The suggestion that Mark was concerned to attack a "false Christology" is an anachronistic notion; we should think rather of a community that had not yet come to terms with the idea of a crucified Messiah. Similarly, the teaching about discipleship may indicate that its members had not grasped what this entailed: warnings that it involved following in the steps of Jesus suggest that persecution was either an imminent danger or had already taken them by surprise, while those warnings in Mark 13 that the end is "still to come" and that suffering will continue, suggest that the community was puzzled by the delay in the promised arrival of the kingdom.

The portrait of the *twelve as slow to comprehend the truth about Jesus has been interpreted as an attack on the church leaders in Mark's day, but it should probably be understood in relation to the "*messianic secret" (see below).

Interpretation. For many centuries Mark was the least used of the gospels, being overshadowed by the longer synoptics, but the theory of Marcan priority, linked with the Petrine tradition, led to the belief that this gospel was the most reliable historically and so brought Mark into the forefront of critical study toward the end of the nineteenth century. In 1901, Wilhelm Wrede challenged this assumption in his study of the secrecy motif in the Gospels and argued that Mark was a theological presentation, not a historical record (see Messianic Secret). In the 1920s, the development of form criticism strengthened the realization that Mark could not be treated as an eyewitness account of Jesus' ministry; attention came to be focused on the beliefs of the community that had shaped the tradition collected by the evangelist. The subsequent growth of redaction criticism shifted scholarly interest to Mark himself and to his role in the final shaping and arranging of the material; the evangelist was now acknowledged to be a theologian rather than a historian or a collector-editor. This led in the 1970s to the recognition that Mark's gospel had to be considered in relation to the community in which Mark lived, since he was influenced by that community and sought to influence it; we may thus hope to learn about the situation and beliefs of the community through him.

In studying this book, therefore, we need to ask questions at several historical levels. We can ask, first, about the way in which Mark understood the gospel and about the circumstances of the community for whom he wrote. Moving backward, we may ask about the traditions he inherited, and about the beliefs of the earliest Christians. Only then should we move to the final stage and raise questions about what Jesus himself may have said and done.

The historical problems are so complex that some commentators have abandoned them altogether and looked for other ways of interpreting Mark. Literary analysts insist that the text itself has a meaning, and some, such as *structuralists, have no concern for the original intention of the author; since, however, the meaning discovered differs from one interpretation to another, it would seem that it is imposed by the reader rather than found in the text. In fact, all interpretation involves a large subjective element, since all readers of Mark's gospel (or any other text) inevitably interpret it in terms of their own experiences, but when historical criticism is abandoned there is no control over the process.

Mark's Presentation of the Gospel. Mark begins by setting out the identity of Jesus: he is the Messiah (1.1); his coming fulfills scripture (1.2–3), since he is the mighty one announced by *John the Baptist, the messenger of the Lord (1.4–8); he is proclaimed by God as his Son, and the Spirit of God is with him (1.9–11); in the power of the Spirit he confronts *Satan in the wilderness (1.12–13).

These first thirteen verses provide vital information that enables us to understand the rest of the story. From this point on, however, the truth about Jesus is stated only rarely, and then obscurely, until the very last chapters. If we compare these opening verses with the prologue of a Greek drama, we will realize that in reading them we have been privileged to receive information that is hidden from the characters of the story, who are bewildered by the events that follow. Although Jesus' identity is known to unclean spirits (1.24) and confirmed again from heaven (9.7), it remains hidden from the religious authorities, the crowds, and even the disciples, who only half comprehend. This is partly because of human obtuseness (8.18), but Mark also depicts Jesus as silencing anyone who comes near the truth (1.25, 34; 3.12; 8.30).

The messianic secret can no longer be explained as historical reporting; nor is it, as Wrede suggested, the result of imposing a messianic interpretation on a nonmessianic tradition. Rather, from the standpoint of Christian faith the significance of Jesus' words and deeds seem clear, and the failure of his contemporaries to recognize him as Messiah needs explanation. Mark's solution is that the truth was concealed from them, partly by divine purpose, partly by their own obstinacy; but to those with eyes to see and ears to hear, all is now plain: Mark's story is thus concerned with messianic revelation as much as messianic secrecy.

*Miracles play an important role in Mark's gospel, and he makes clear in editorial summaries that there were in fact many more healings and *exorcisms than those he describes. The miracles are greeted by onlookers with amazement and incomprehension, though their significance is recognized by unclean spirits (1.24; 3.11; 5.7) and implied by Jesus in 3.22–30: through the power of the Holy Spirit he has defeated Satan and is saving men and women from his clutches. Jesus' authority to heal encompasses not only the exorcism of unclean spirits, but restoration of all kinds: cleansing a leper (1.40–45), forgiving sins (2.1–10), raising the dead and giving new life (5.21–43). His power extends over nature, so that he is able to control the sea (4.35–41; 6.45–52) and give the people bread (6.31–44; 8.1–10), both manifestations of divine power reminiscent of the *Exodus; yet the scribes accuse him of working under Satan (3.22), his family think he is mad (3.21), he meets with disbelief in his hometown (6.1–6), the *Pharisees demand a sign from him (8.11–13), and his own disciples are unable to grasp the significance of what they have seen (8.14–21). To Mark's readers, however, the miracles demonstrate Jesus' authority, since they know the answer to the disciples' bewildered question, "Who then is this?" (4.41).

It is only those with faith who can receive healing (5.34, 36; 6.5–6; 7.29; 9.14–24), and the stories themselves become paradigms for the meaning of faith. The man who has ears but cannot hear until Jesus touches them (7.31–37), the blind man who has eyes but cannot see, and who receives his sight gradually (8.22–26), the man who cries, "I believe; help my unbelief" (9.24), and the beggar who receives his sight and follows Jesus on the way to Jerusalem (10.46–52) all tell us something of what belief in Jesus means.

Mark emphasizes also Jesus' role as teacher and makes use of a considerable amount of teaching, though less is included than in Matthew and Luke. According to Mark 1.14–15, the gospel announced by Jesus concerned the *kingdom of God. Yet by his arrangement of the material, Mark makes it plain that the gospel is about Jesus himself: the kingdom is given to those who become his *disciples. By their response to Jesus, men and women are divided into those who belong to his community and those who remain "outside" (4.11; cf. 3.31–35). Much of the teaching is thus appropriate only to those who are disciples and even they find it difficult to understand. As with the miracles, however, the significance of the teaching is plain to those readers of Mark's gospel who have eyes and ears to understand.

The major block of teaching occurs in chap. 4, in which Jesus teaches the crowd in *parables. Mark believes the teaching to be deliberately enigmatic: the disciples should have understood, yet they require an explanation (4.10–12). In 8.31–10.52, Jesus teaches the disciples about his own destiny as the *Son of man, together with the understanding of discipleship that necessarily follows, but they are unable to comprehend. The final section of teaching (chap. 13), addressed to four disciples, warns them of future judgment on Jerusalem and of persecution for themselves.

Other sayings occur in conflict stories and are thus addressed to Jesus' opponents. Notable examples are the debates about *purity (7.1–23) and *divorce (10.1–12), where Jesus challenges the Pharisees' interpretation of Mosaic teaching, and the parable of the vineyard (12.1–12). All demonstrate Jesus' authority, and because his opponents reject it, they are naturally outraged by this teaching.

Jesus acts with authority, but makes no direct claims for himself; when referring to himself he uses the enigmatic phrase "the Son of man." It is others who, with varying degrees of understanding, declare his identity. The truth is partly grasped by the disciples at Caesarea Philippi: in contrast to outsiders, who regard Jesus as some great prophet figure (8.28; cf. 6.14–16), Peter acknowledges him to be the Messiah; but the need for Jesus to suffer and die cannot yet be understood at this stage (8.27–33), and for Mark, the identity of Jesus is revealed fully only through his death and resurrection (9.9). The great irony of his story is that when we come to the passion narrative, those responsible for Jesus' death unknowingly identify Jesus. The high priest announces the truth when he asks whether he is "the Messiah, the Son of the Blessed One" (14.61); *Pilate executes him on the charge of being "King of the Jews" (15.2, 9, 12, 18, 26, 32); and when he dies, his executioner proclaims him "God's Son" (Mark 15.39). Since this title earlier came from heaven (1.11; 9.7), it may be assumed that Mark believed it to be the fullest expression of the truth about Jesus. In the mouth of the Roman centurion, the phrase is remarkable: Mark appears to be affirming that through the crucifixion Jesus is fully revealed and faith is born. For Mark, the death and resurrection of Jesus provide the key to the whole story. The cross is thus no accident, but part of the divine plan.

The declaration of faith (as Mark interprets it) by a gentile brings to a climax another of Mark's important themes. Jesus proclaims the kingdom to Israel, but he is rejected by his own people—by family (3.21–35), hometown (6.1–6), religious leaders (14.1–2), one of his disciples (14.10–11), and finally by the crowd (15.6–15). He pronounces judgment on the nation's religious leaders (3.28–30; 7.6–13; 11.11–20; 12.1–12, 38–40), and foretells destruction for Jerusalem (13). His ministry appears to end in failure. Yet he dies as "a ransom for many" (10.45; cf. 14.24) and promises future vindication for his disciples (8.35; 13.27). Who, then, are the "many"? The word probably refers to all those who belong to the people of God, and for Mark that means those men and women who have responded to Jesus. There are occasional hints that gentiles will be included: in 7.24–30, a gentile woman receives help because of her faith; in 13.10 we are told that the gospel must be preached "to all nations" (cf. also 14.9); moreover, Mark is clearly writing for gentiles (7.3). The centurion's confession, together with the rending of the Temple curtain, confirms that the vineyard has been taken away from the original tenants and given to others (12.9).

The gospel of Mark ends abruptly, at 16.8, and early attempts to add an ending show that it was felt to be incomplete. It is possible that the book was never finished or that it was damaged at an early stage. Yet it may be our knowledge of the other Gospels that makes us expect this one to end with appearances of the risen Lord. Certainly, it ends in an appropriate way for Mark—with fear, human failure, and the call to discipleship: it is those who respond and who follow the risen Lord who will see him.

MORNA D. HOOKER

Marriage.

Ancient Israel. The institution of marriage is intimately related to kinship in the Hebrew Bible. There are indications that marriage was thought of as an extension of kinship through an informal or written covenant or agreement. Language that is used in connection with the *covenant, such as "love" and "hate" (for the latter, see Deut. 24.3 [NRSV "dislike"]; Judg. 15.2 [NRSV "reject"]), is also used of the marriage relationship and its dissolution. From at least the eighth century BCE onward, the covenantal relationship between Yahweh and Israel is likened to a covenanted marriage; this analogous usage begins in Hosea 1–3 and continues in later materials (e.g., Jer. 3.1–5). By analyzing the analogy we can deduce some of the ideals concerning marriage in ancient Israel, at least for those who produced the texts. Two characteristics may be noted. First, the relationship was monogamous. Israel had only one God, and God had chosen Israel over all other peoples. Second, mutual fidelity was expected. *Adultery was accepted as grounds for dissolving the relationship (see Divorce). Hosea implies that the relationship should be one of mutual love, respect, and fidelity (2.19–20), and that the wife would call her husband "my man" and not "my master (Hebr. baʿal)" (2.16).

The status of *women in ancient Israel is an important factor in understanding the institution of marriage. A woman seems always to have been under the authority and protection of her nearest male kin; for the wife, this was the husband. Some texts may imply that the status of women changed for the better over time.

Although monogamy may have been the ideal, polygamy was accepted and practiced throughout Israel's history (see Deut. 21.15), although to what extent we cannot be sure, since the sources for the most part are derived from and describe the elite ruling and upper classes. The patriarchs took more than one wife, and the kings of Israel and Judah maintained harems, of which *Solomon's was the most notorious (1 Kings 11.1–8). By the Roman period, monogamy seems to have been the common practice.

Endogamy and exogamy. Endogamy is marriage within one's group, however that may be defined, and exogamy is marriage outside it; both are attested in the Bible. In the ancestral narratives, endogamy was apparently the dominant practice; for example, in Genesis 24 *Abraham sends his servant back to *Mesopotamia to find a wife for his son *Isaac from among his own kin (see also Gen. 28.1–2, 9). Yet exogamy is also reported, as by *Esau (Gen. 26.34) and *Joseph (Gen. 41.45). Exogamy was practiced by the kings of Israel and Judah, such as *David, few of whose marriages were endogamous (beginning with Michal, *Saul's daughter; see also 2 Sam. 3.2–5; 1 Chron. 3.1–9), Solomon, and *Ahab.

The Deuteronomic view of exogamy was hostile, expressly because of a fear of apostasy (Deut. 7.1–6; 1 Kings 11.1–8; 16.31–32), a view also found in postexilic literature (Ezra 9–10; Neh. 10.28–30; 13.23–27). The book of *Ruth, on the other hand, has been interpreted as espousing a position in which exogamy is acceptable.

New Testament. No detailed teaching concerning marriage is found in the Gospels; we may infer from discussions concerning *divorce and other passages (see John 2.1–12) that Jesus viewed it positively, with monogamy as the ideal. Paul's views are more developed, and more controversial. The most detailed discussion is in 1 Corinthians 7, where Paul argues that marriage is an antidote to sexual immorality, but that celibacy is preferable. As v. 26 makes clear, in part this view was due to Paul's belief in an imminent *second coming of Christ, but other factors no doubt were also at work, including Paul's own unmarried state (v. 8). The "household codes" (see Ethical Lists) of the post-Pauline letters exhibit a conventional view of marriage, and the subordinate position of *women within it (see, e.g., Col. 3.18–19; Titus 2.3–5; 1 Pet. 3.1–7).

As in the Hebrew Bible, the marriage relationship is used in the New Testament to describe the bond between the community and God, in this case expressed as the church and Christ (Eph. 5.21–33; cf. Rev. 21.2).

See also Sex; Weddings. RUSSELL FULLER

Marx and the Bible. What did Karl Marx (1818–1883) make of the Bible? Was it a book that he knew and used? Did the Bible have any influence on him, a person who became estranged from all religion, especially from Judaism and Christianity? These two religious traditions were part of his heritage, and there is evidence that Marx knew the Bible and used it in various ways for his own purposes. But, of course, a knowledge of the Bible implies neither a regard for its teaching nor a recognition of its authority. No one who was capable of writing, as Marx did in 1844, that "the criticism of religion ends with the precept that the supreme being for man is man" is likely to have had much sympathy for a collection of writings that expresses a distinctly different point of view. He believed that human beings must unite in a revolutionary struggle to free themselves from exploitation, from belief in God, and from the illusory comforts of religion.

Marx's Jewish and Christian Background. Born in Trier on 5 May 1818, Marx was the son of a Jewish lawyer, Heinrich (Heschel) Marx, who converted to Lutheranism in 1817. The law did not permit Jews to work as civil servants or as lawyers, and those who did not convert to Christianity were obliged to accept subordinate positions in society. Conversion was not easy for either of Marx's parents, several of whose forebears in Germany and Holland had served their communities as rabbis. It was not until August 1824 that the children, including Karl, were baptized. Out of respect for her parents, Marx's mother postponed her own baptism for another fifteen months. Marx's early upbringing thus provided him with opportunities to observe both Jewish and Christian traditions.

Like Friedrich Engels, as a young man Marx was by no means hostile to Christianity. In a youthful piece, The Union of Believers with Christ (1835), he speaks of how Christians are able to turn to their fellow believers because they share with them an inner bond, through the sacrificial love of Christ. Union with Christ can bring "inner elevation, comfort in sorrow, calm trust, and a heart susceptible to human love, to everything noble and great, not for the sake of ambition and glory, but only for the sake of Christ." Was this an expression of genuine Christian conviction? Or was it an early example of his ability to parody the devotional language of Christian contemporaries? If it is parody, it helps to account for the apparent shift in Marx from belief to unbelief, from Christian commitment to militant atheism. The change in Marx's beliefs came when his Promethean instincts surfaced. In his doctoral dissertation at Jena (1841) he uses the words of Aeschylus's Prometheus, "In one word—I hate all the gods." Above all, he hated the God of the Bible: the creator God, who created humans in his own image (Gen. 1.27), was, in Marx's analysis, the enemy of humanity, a human projection that served only to delay progress toward final liberation.

Approaches to Alienation. Marx's concept of Entfremdung (alienation) is not unknown in the Bible, although there it finds a very different focus in the estrangement of human beings from their creator. The prophets inveighed against all forms of *idolatry in which human beings rendered to lifeless images the worship due alone to the living God (Hos. 14.8). These idols were the work of human hands (Ps. 135.15–18). For Marx, God was an idol, worshiped by its creator; it distracted men and women from the realization of their own potential. Marx insisted that the alienation experienced by human beings was alienation, not from God, but from themselves. Like the biblical writers, Marx's themes were those of deliverance, liberation, justice, and equality, but his conclusions were different from theirs because he held that we live in a universe without God.

The eschatological aspects of his prophetic vision of the classless society are thus very different from those in the Bible. His was a belief in a secular eschatology, a belief that in the future the difference between human essence and human existence would be eliminated. The theology of the *incarnation would be turned on its head in the deification of the human. Marx believed that salvation lies within history, not beyond it. Insofar as he used biblical concepts, and employed stylistic devices reminiscent of the prophets, Marx was at pains to correct, if not expressly, what the Bible had to say to those looking for justice and liberation from oppression. What is missing in Marx is the biblical recognition of the individual's value in eternity as well as in time. The New Testament's emphasis on the redeeming activity of Jesus (2 Cor. 5.15), on the full life to be enjoyed by the believer (John 10.10), and on the reconciling work of God in Christ (2 Cor. 5.18–19), found neither echo nor acknowledgment in Marx. In place of this he repudiated biblical teaching by means of quotation out of context, carefully selected allusions, a tendentious use of theological interpretation, and outright parody.

All of this served Marx's purpose by diminishing the value of the Bible as a credible historical record of the events it contains or as a repository of wisdom. In this he gained support from an unexpected source. While he did not acknowledge any indebtedness to the criticism of the New Testament which came into prominence in the middle of the nineteenth century in Germany (see Interpretation, History of, article on Modern Biblical Criticism), there is, nonetheless, in the subsequent attention that he gave to theologians like David F. Strauss (1808–1874) and Bruno Bauer (1809–1882), a recognition of the implications of their criticism. The spirit of this criticism was congenial to Marx because it served the interests of his attack on religion.

Marx's Use of the Bible. Several of Marx's works are replete with biblical quotations and allusions. In using them, Marx attempted to expose the naïveté of any lingering religious sentiments in other writers and political activists, employing an idiom with which he presumed them to be familiar, yet in a way that destroyed the original emphasis. To this end he alluded to biblical subjects and themes such as justice, equality, and deliverance, and echoed familiar phrases from the scriptures, well-known hymns, and the language of Christian piety.

The language of the *Sermon on the Mount and of the beatitudes features in his criticism of the attitudes of the poor, who delude themselves with promises of a heavenly inheritance. Texts such as Colossians 1.26 were given an interpretation more in line with his own concept of reality for a new generation of "saints." Similarly, "the time is fulfilled" (Mark 1.15) is interpreted in terms very different from those of the realized eschatology of the gospel. The emphasis on faith rather than works in Romans 3.28 is identified as a weakness typical of those who continue to accept false views of human existence. The struggles for human liberation, and the creation of a new order foreseen in Revelation 21.1, are accommodated to Marx's own vision of the future.

Despite Marx's atheism and his despisal of all religions—Judaism and Christianity especially—because they had become instruments of oppression in the struggle between workers and capitalists, there is little doubt that from time to time biblical memories came back to his consciousness. Later, his daughter Eleanor Marx-Aveling recalled how her father dealt with her "religious qualms" after she had been to a Roman Catholic church "to hear the beautiful music," when she was about six years old. Marx "quietly made everything clear and straight, so that from that hour to this no doubt could ever cross my mind again." But she adds the following note that sheds a different light on Marx's residual memory of a religious revelation that he despised.

> And how I remember his telling the story—I do not think it could ever have been so told before or since—of the carpenter whom rich men killed, and many and many a time saying, "After all we can forgive Christianity much, because it taught us the worship of the child." And Marx could himself have said, "Suffer little children to come unto me," for wherever he went, there children somehow would turn up also.

To the themes of justice, equality, and the value of labor Marx brought his own perceptions. These are also biblical themes, but when Paul, for instance, addressed himself to those in the Christian community who were content to enjoy the fruits of the labors of others (1 Thess. 2.9–12; 2 Thess. 3.6–12), he spoke in response to a different vision. Marx insisted that if anyone would not work, he should not eat, but this was a note of warning, sounded from the logic of his own dualistic anthropology. Marx held that human was set against human, as enemy against enemy, as worker against capitalist.

For the Bible's essential message Marx had only derision. Yet he was obliged to admit that the transformation of the world would require more than reliance on the processes of historical materialism. Above all, it would require a new kind of human creature with the capacity, as well as the desire, to build a society in which swords are beaten into plowshares (see Isa. 2.4).

EDWARD HULMES

Mary Magdalene. Mary Magdalene is one of the inner circle of the followers of Jesus in the Gospel narratives. Her name suggests that she came from Magdala, a large city on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee, also called Taricheae (Map 10:Y3). Magdala was known for its salt trade, for its administrative role as a toparchy, and as a large urban center that was part of the contiguous cities and large villages along the western shore of the lake from Tiberias to Bethsaida/Chorazin.

Mary Magdalene is mentioned sparingly but at crucial points in all four Gospels. During the events surrounding the *crucifixion of Jesus, she is depicted as watching the proceedings and waiting near the tomb to attend to the body (Matt. 27.56, 61; 28.1; par.; John 19.25). She is also one of the first witnesses to the *resurrection (Matt. 28.9; John 20.11–18). These passages probably gave rise to the romantic portrayals of Mary as the devoted follower whom Jesus had saved from her errant ways.

Contrary to subsequent Christian interpretation, reflected in popular belief and recent films, there is no evidence from the Gospels that Mary Magdalene was a prostitute or for the later identification of Mary Magdalene with the women who anoint Jesus' feet (Luke 7.36–50; Matt. 26.6–13 par.) or with Mary of Bethany (Luke 10.38; John 11.1–2). In Luke 8.2 it is said that Mary Magdalene was healed of seven evil spirits by Jesus. But this is in the context of a list of women who were followers of Jesus, who had also been healed, and who supplied the material support for his mission. Since Mary Magdalene, Chuza (the wife of a steward of Herod) and Susanna are the only women mentioned, it is likely that these three were the benefactors of the Jesus movement according to Luke.

J. ANDREW OVERMAN

Mary, Mother of Jesus. According to ancient Christian sources, Mary was the child of Jewish parents Joachim and Anne and was born in Jerusalem or Sepphoris in Galilee. If, as the sources suggest, Mary's first child *Jesus was born around 4 BCE and she was espoused around the age of fourteen, as was common, then Mary was probably born in 18 or 20 BCE.

During her childhood she lived in *Nazareth, where she became engaged to the carpenter *Joseph, who was descended from King *David. The gospel of *Luke relates that an *angel of God appeared to Mary and told her that she would become pregnant with God's son by the Holy Spirit, even though she was not yet married (see Virgin Birth). Mary and Joseph traveled to *Bethlehem where Jesus was born in a stable or, according to later traditions, cave. According to Jewish custom, Jesus was circumcised and then presented at the Temple in Jerusalem. He was raised by Mary and Joseph and perhaps other relatives in Nazareth and probably learned the carpentry trade. One relative specifically mentioned by Luke is Mary's cousin Elizabeth, who in her old age gave birth to *John the Baptist shortly before Jesus' birth. Some of the sources indicate that other children were born to Mary and Joseph after Jesus (e.g., Acts 1.14; see Brothers and Sisters of Jesus).

The gospel of Luke, the principal biblical source for Mary in the narratives of Jesus' infancy and childhood, also tells how, when Jesus was twelve years old, Mary and Joseph took him to the Jerusalem Temple—again, in fulfillment of Jewish law—for initiation into the faith. On the return journey, they lost him in the crowd and subsequently found him in the Temple impressing the religious leaders with his wisdom (Luke 2.41–52).

Joseph, probably considerably older than Mary, disappears from the sources at this time, and Mary's role becomes smaller as Jesus' becomes larger. She is mentioned in the context of the marriage feast at Cana (John 2.1–12), at Jesus' crucifixion (but only by John 19.25–27), and in Acts 1.14, the story of *Pentecost. The accounts of Mary's later years, death, and assumption into heaven are found only in traditions outside the Bible, some as late as the fourth century CE. It is not known where she spent her final years, but it is generally believed that she lived with John the son of Zebedee in Jerusalem and died there. The date of her death is almost impossible to determine.

In addition to the gospel accounts, Mary is mentioned in the writings of some of the church fathers, including Justin Martyr, Ignatius, Tertullian, and Athanasius; in *apocryphal works such as the Protevangelium of James (second century); and in the deliberations of the Council of Ephesus (431 CE), where she was proclaimed Theotokos, "God-bearer." A gnostic gospel of Mary and a Latin work from the Middle Ages called The Gospel of the Birth of Mary also exist.

It is through these and other sources that the powerful cult of Mary was born and grew, especially in the Roman Catholic, Anglo-Catholic, and Orthodox churches. Various feast days commemorate her importance for devotees: the Immaculate Conception (8 December), her purification in the Temple (2 February), the annunciation of the angel (25 March), her visit to Elizabeth when both were pregnant (2 July), and her assumption into heaven (15 August). Throughout the centuries, Mary has been revered not only as the Mother of God but also as a pure, ever-virgin woman, the perfect mother, the intercessor between human beings and God, and one who knows the deepest of human suffering, having borne witness to the agonizing and humiliating death of her firstborn son. She has been the object of pilgrimages and visions even to the present day, and the "Magnificat," attributed to her by Luke at the time of her visit to Elizabeth (Luke 1.46–55), has been part of Christian liturgy and music for centuries. Mary has been widely honored and even worshiped as representing inner strength and the exaltation of the oppressed over the oppressor.

Non-Christian sources are instructive in tracing parallels to the cult of Mary. Virgin Birth stories (e.g., Hera, Rhea Silvia, Brigid) were circulated in other cultures, as were tales of mothers mourning lost and deceased children (e.g., Demeter and Persephone; Isis and Horus). Iconographically, just as Mary was often portrayed holding or nursing the infant Jesus, so too was the Egyptian goddess Isis depicted suckling her infant son, Horus. Even as Mary was called Queen of Heaven and sometimes depicted surrounded by the zodiac and other symbols, so too were the deities Isis, Magna Mater, and Artemis.

Such parallels show that Mary's cult had roots in the cults of the female deities of the Greco-Roman pantheon, cults ultimately eradicated by Christianity. While Mary in some ways represents qualities impossible for human beings, especially women, to emulate—ever-virgin yet motherly; always gentle and obedient to God's will—her attributes nevertheless represent for many devotees important female properties not provided by the traditional all-male *Trinity. For many, the adoration of a female figure is a vital psychological supplement to their faith.

VALERIE ABRAHAMSEN

Maskil. A Hebrew word of uncertain meaning used in the titles to thirteen *Psalms (32, 42, 44, 45, 52–55, 74, 78, 88, 89, 142) and once in context (Ps. 47.7). Although related by some to the root śkl, meaning "to be wise," most of the psalms in which it occurs cannot be classified as *wisdom literature. It is more likely an ancient technical classification whose precise sense is no longer known, like other words used in psalm titles such as "song," "psalm," "prayer," "*miktam," and "shiggaion" (Ps. 7.1; "lament"?).

MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Masorah. The Masorah (Hebr. "tradition") refers to the system of vowel signs, accent markings, and marginal notes devised by early medieval Jewish scribes and scholars and used in copying the text of the Hebrew Bible in order to guard it from changes. The vowel signs and accent marks were integrated by the Masoretes into the received consonantal text, while marginal notes were placed in the lateral margin (masorah qetanah or masorah parva), as well as the top and bottom margins (masorah gedolah or masorah magna) of each column of text; further notes are found at the ends of biblical books (masorah finalis) and often at the beginning and end of a codex. The codex began to replace the scroll after the Talmudic period (ca. 700 CE) except for liturgical purposes, such as synagogue Torah scrolls, which have no Masorah at all (see Books and Bookmaking).

There were three such systems, the Babylonian, Palestinian, and Tiberian, as well as schools within each. The authoritative Masorah since about 1000 CE has been the Tiberian. Of the two great Tiberian schools, the Ben Naftali and the Ben Asher, the latter, especially the Masorah culminating in the work of Aaron ben Asher (ca.

915), was apparently the one approved by Maimonides (twelfth century), which would become the basis for the printed text of the Hebrew Bible. The edition published at Venice, 1524–1525, by Jacob ben Hayyim ben Adoniyahu, using twelfth-century and later manuscripts, became the received text used for printed Bibles until 1937, when late-ninth to eleventh-century Tiberian manuscripts recovered in the nineteenth century began to be used (see Manuscripts, article on Hebrew Bible; Masoretic Text).

The effect of the Masorah was to ensure remarkably accurate transmission of the text, including its inherent anomalies and discrepancies. (The only similar effort was in Syriac manuscripts of both Old Testament and New Testament, but this was limited and ineffective in comparison.) The text was sacred, not a perceived understanding of it, and a scribe was to be neither more nor less than a scribe, no matter how creative or how careless he might be. Unique or rare formations of words or phrases, especially those vulnerable to error, were noted so that the next scribe would not change them to more familiar or more understandable forms. Variant readings for a single word were preserved by carefully guarding both the received consonants for the word *(ketîb) and the vowels for the variant (qerê) as well as by other modes of noting ancient variants, either to be respected or to be avoided. Top and bottom margins contain abbreviated lists of similar words or phrases in other passages, or references to them, thereby preserving for each its own peculiarities. The Masorah, moreover, provides statistics of the number of verses, of lectionary sections, and of words, even noting what word or letter is precisely in the middle of a book or section, so that the next scribe would have full means of guarding the integrity of each letter, each word, each particular phrase, and hence each book that was his charge to copy. While there was no "canon" of the Masorah and though mistakes were made, the masorot (pl.) of the great biblical manuscripts, though different among themselves, provide a remarkable fund of information for *textual criticism. JAMES A. SANDERS Masoretic Text. The Masoretic Text (MT) refers to the textual product elaborated by schools of scholars (Masoretes) who in the early Middle Ages integrated vowel signs, accent markings, and marginal notes (the *Masorah) into the received consonantal text of the Hebrew Bible. It is the text both of rabbinic Bibles and of modern scholarship.

There are thirty-one extant Masoretic *manuscripts of the Hebrew Bible, complete or fragmentary, dating from the late ninth century to 1100 CE, and some three thousand thereafter. In the sixteenth century, Eliahu ha-Levi noted that there were thousands of Masoretes over a long period of time, neither the beginning nor the end of which is known; their work began toward the end of the Talmudic period (ca. 600 CE) and found its crown in the work of the ben Asher family at the beginning of the tenth century.

The complete MT is included in a manuscript discovered in a synagogue in Cairo during the nineteenth century and now housed in the public library in St. Petersburg (formerly Leningrad, hence called Leningradensis [L]). It dates to 1009 CE and derives from the work of Aaron ben Asher. It is the text of the third Kittel-Kahle edition of Biblia Hebraica (1937) and of Biblia Hebraica Stuttgartensia (1976), its successor. A facsimile edition was published by Maqor Press (1970). The printed edition of the Second Rabbinic Bible of Jacob ben Hayyim ben Adoniyahu (Venice, 1524–25), which was based in large part on the ben Asher tradition, had been the text of the first two editions of the Kittel Bible.

Older than L by about three-quarters of a century is the partially preserved Aleppensis (A), which was brought in 1948 to Jerusalem from Aleppo. It is believed that this represents the text of which Maimonides (twelfth century) approved; it is the text of the Hebrew University Bible (1975–).

The oldest *manuscripts of the Hebrew Bible, from the *Dead Sea Scrolls, date from the third century BCE to the beginning of the second century CE, and have only consonants; most are pre-Masoretic; those from other caves in the same area, dating to a period after 70 CE, are proto-Masoretic and reflect the stabilization of the consonantal text taking place at the time. It was this stabilized and exceptionally well-preserved consonantal text to which the *Masorah was later added. JAMES A. SANDERS

Matthew. Matthew is named as one of the original *disciples (Matt. 9.9; 10.3; Mark 3.18; Luke 6.15; Acts 1.13), and he has traditionally been identified as the author of the first (but not the oldest) Gospel in the New Testament (see next entry). In the other Gospels and Acts, the name Matthew simply appears in a list of followers of Jesus, but in the Gospel that bears his name, Matthew is mentioned twice as a tax collector. This association has stuck through subsequent Christian history, although in the parallels to Matthew 9.9 in both Mark 2.14 and Luke 5.27, the tax collector is called Levi, not Matthew.

According to Papias (ca. 130 CE), "Matthew made an ordered arrangement of the sayings in the Hebrew dialect, and each one translated it as he was able" (quoted by Eusebius, the fourth-century bishop of Caesarea, Hist. Eccl. 3.39.16; see also 5.8.2). This leads to the view that Matthew first wrote his Gospel in Hebrew, a view today rejected by almost all scholars. But Papias also gives us the earliest association of Matthew with the first canonical Gospel, an association that probably originated in his being mentioned twice within that Gospel, and continued in the manuscript traditions that add the superscript "according to Matthew."

J. ANDREW OVERMAN

Matthew, The Gospel According to. Matthew's gospel proclaims the message that in Jesus, *Son of God, God has drawn near with his eschatological rule to dwell to the end of time with his people, the church (1.23; 16.16; 28.20). The purpose of this message is to summon the reader or hearer to perceive that God is uniquely present in Jesus and to become Jesus' disciple. As Jesus' disciple, one becomes God's child, lives in the sphere of his end-time kingdom, and engages in mission so that all people may find him in Jesus and also become Jesus' disciples.

Structure. Matthew is a gospel story in three parts. The main divisions derive from the formula that appears in 4.17 and 16.21: "From that time Jesus began to proclaim [to show his disciples] . . ." Embedded in this story are also five great speeches of Jesus. The following outline marks off the three parts of the story and indicates the distribution of the speeches:

I. The presentation of Jesus (1.1–4.16)
II. The ministry of Jesus to Israel (4.17–11.1)
  A. The Sermon on the Mount (5.1–7.29)
  B. The missionary discourse (9.35–10.42) and Israel's repudiation of Jesus (11.2–16.20)
  C. The discourse in parables (13.1–52)
III. The journey of Jesus to Jerusalem and his suffering, death, and resurrection (16.21–28.20)
  A. The ecclesiological discourse (17.24–18.35)
  B. The eschatological discourse (24.1–25.46)

As is apparent, the story that is told is of the life and ministry of Jesus. It begins with his miraculous conception and birth and closes with his death and resurrection.

The temporal setting in which this story of Jesus takes place is the history of salvation. This begins with *Abraham, the father of Israel, and extends to the consummation of the age and the return of Jesus for judgment (1.17; 25.31–46). It divides itself into two distinct epochs. The first epoch is the time of Israel, which is the time of prophecy (e.g., 2.5–6). The second epoch is the time of Jesus (earthly-exalted), which is the time of fulfillment (e.g., 1.22–23). For its part, the time of Jesus (earthly-exalted) encompasses the ministries to Israel of John (3.1–2), of Jesus (4.17), and of the pre-Easter disciples (10.7), as well as the ministry to the nations of the post-Easter disciples (24.14; 28.19–20). Central to this time, however, is the ministry of Jesus himself, for the ministry of John prepares for it and the ministries of the pre-Easter and post-Easter disciples are an extension of it.

In combination, the twin features of structure and view of salvation history advance a weighty theological claim on behalf of Jesus. As was noted, the structure of Matthew's story focuses on the life and ministry of Jesus. The view this story projects of the history of salvation describes Jesus both as the one in whom the time of Israel attains its fulfillment (1.17) and the one who is at the center of the gospel of the kingdom that is to be proclaimed to the nations (24.14; 26.12–13). Accordingly, the theological claim these two features advance is that for the salvation of all people, Jews and *gentiles, the life and ministry of Jesus is of decisive significance.

Author, Date, Place. It is commonly held that Matthew was written about 85 or 90 CE by an unknown Christian who was at home in a church located in *Antioch of Syria. A date toward the end of the first century seems probable because the destruction of *Jerusalem, which occurred in 70 CE, appears to be an event that was rapidly receding into the past (22.7). Although the apostle Matthew may have been active in founding the church in which the gospel story attributed to him arose (9.9; 10.3), it is unlikely that he was the story's author. On the contrary, the author exhibits a theological outlook, command of Greek, and rabbinic training that suggest he was a Jewish Christian of the second rather than the first generation (cf. 13.52). Also, Antioch of Syria commends itself as the place where he may have been at home, because the social conditions reflected in his story correspond with those that seem to have prevailed there: the city was Greek-speaking, urban, and prosperous, and it had a large population of both Jews and gentiles.

Readers. Scholarly opinion holds that the church for which Matthew was written was made up of Christians of both Jewish and gentile origin. Socioculturally, this church was almost certainly living in an atmosphere of religious and social tension. Its mandate was to make disciples of all nations, and this was apparently provoking hostile reactions from both Jews and gentiles. Seemingly, Christians were being hauled into court by gentile authorities, judicially harassed, hated "by all," and even put to death (10.18, 22; 13.21; 24.9). Similar persecutions were likewise taking place at the hands of the Jews: Christians were being made to submit to such ill-treatment as verbal abuse (5.11), arraignment for disturbing the peace (10.17), perjured testimony in court (5.11), flogging in the local synagogues (10.17; 23.34), pursuit from city to city (10.23; 23.34), and even death (10.28; 23.34–35).

As a body, the church of Matthew appears to have achieved organizational autonomy and to have been materially well off. Religiously, these Christians were no longer living under the jurisdiction of contemporary Pharisaic Judaism (15.13; 16.18). Quite the opposite, they already had in place the means for making their own decisions concerning matters of church doctrine and church discipline (16.19; 18.15–20). Identifiable groups within the church were *prophets, or itinerant missionaries, and teachers (10.17–18, 41; 23.34). Socioeconomically, the way in which both monetary matters and ethical and religious questions associated with the topic of riches are treated in Matthew indicates that the church in which it arose was relatively prosperous.

But Matthew's church was also rife with dissension. Under the pressure of persecution, some Christians apostatized (13.21; 24.10), while others betrayed fellow Christians to enemies (24.10); still others fell victim to the "cares of the world and the lure of wealth" (13.22). Hatred broke out among Christians (24.10), false prophets arose who led others astray (7.15; 24.11), and disobedience to the law of God was so rampant that the "love of many was growing cold" (24.12). It was to meet the religious and moral needs of this multiracial, prosperous, yet divided and persecuted church that the author of Matthew told afresh the gospel story.

Sources. Some scholars hold that Matthew was the first gospel story written, that Luke was the second, and that Mark is a synopsis of both Matthew and Luke. Most scholars, however, espouse the two-source hypothesis in resolving the *synoptic problem. According to this view, Mark was the first of the gospel stories, and both Matthew and Luke are based on Mark, a sayings source called "Q," and traditions peculiar to each ("M" and "L," respectively). Although the latter hypothesis is to be preferred, one ought not to be misled by source analysis into thinking that, in its final form, Matthew presents itself simply as a sum of layers of tradition. Instead, it constitutes a coherent story possessing a recognizable beginning, middle, and end.

Story of Jesus. In the first part of the gospel story (1.1–4.16), Jesus is presented to the reader. Initially, the narrator describes him as the *Messiah, son of *David, and son of *Abraham (1.1). Jesus is the Messiah, the Anointed One, Israel's long-awaited King (1.17; 2.2, 4; 11.2–3). He is the son of David because *Joseph adopts him into the line of David (1.16, 18–25), and he fulfills the eschatological expectations associated with David (9.27–31; 12.22–23; 15.21–28; 20.29–21.17). He is the son of Abraham, as well, because in him the entire history of Israel attains to its culmination, and the gentiles, too, find blessing (1.17; 8.11).

Upon Jesus' birth, the *Magi arrive in Jerusalem and ask where they might find the King of the Jews (2.1–2). To *Herod, and later to *Pilate as well, this title denotes that Jesus is a pretender to the throne or an insurrectionist. Thus, Herod plots to have Jesus found and killed (2.13), and Pilate hands him over to be crucified (27.26, 37). In Matthean perspective, Jesus is in truth the King of the Jews, but not because he aspires to the throne of Israel or foments rebellion against Rome, but because he saves his people by submitting to suffering and death (27.27–31, 37, 42).

*John the Baptist is *Elijah returned, the forerunner of Jesus (3.1–12; 11.10, 14). He prepares Israel for the coming of Jesus by calling for repentance in view of the nearness of God's end-time kingdom and the final judgment (3.2, 10–12).

The baptismal scene constitutes the climax of the first part of Matthew's story (3.13–17). After John has baptized Jesus, God empowers Jesus with his Spirit and declares him to be his unique Son whom he had chosen for messianic ministry (3.16–17). This declaration by God reveals that the Matthean Jesus is preeminently the *Son of God. The significance of this title is that it points to the unique filial relationship that Jesus has to God: conceived and empowered by God's Spirit (1.18, 20; 3.16), Jesus is "God with us" (1.23; see Immanuel), the one through whom God reveals himself to humankind (11.25–27) and who is God's supreme agent of salvation (1.21; 21.37; 26.28; 27.54).

Guided by the Spirit, Jesus submits to testing by the *devil (4.1–11). Three times the devil endeavors to get Jesus to break faith with God. Jesus, however, rebuts the tempter and shows himself to be the Son who knows and does his Father's will (see Temptation of Christ). Returning to Galilee, Jesus is poised to begin his public activity (4.12–16).

The second part of Matthew's story (4.17–16.20) tells of Jesus' ministry to Israel (4.17–11.1) and of Israel's repudiation of him (11.2–16.20). Through his ministry of teaching, preaching, and healing (4.23; 9.35; 11.1), Jesus summons Israel to repentance (4.17; 11.20–21). Israel, however, repudiates Jesus (chaps. 11–12), yet wonders and speculates about his identity (11.3; 12.23; 13.55; 14.2; 16.14). In sharp contrast to Israel's false view that Jesus is a prophet of whatever identity (16.14), the disciples correctly confess him to be the Messiah, the Son of God (14.33; 16.16).

The third part of Matthew's story (16.21–28.20) describes Jesus' journey to Jerusalem and his suffering, death, and resurrection. The passion predictions sound this theme (16.21; 17.22–23; 20.17–19; cf. 26.2), and the motif of the journey binds together disparate materials (16.21–21.11). In *Jerusalem, Jesus makes the *Temple the site of his activity, where he teaches, debates, and speaks in parables (21.12–23.39). Addressing the parable of the wicked husbandmen to the Jewish leaders, Jesus raises the claim that he is the Son of God whom the leaders will kill (21.37–39). In wanting to arrest Jesus for telling the parable (21.45–46), the leaders show that they reject Jesus' claim.

At his trial, it is the claim that Jesus made in his parable, to be the Son of God, that the high priest uses to secure Jesus' condemnation (26.63–66). When Jesus replies to the high priest's question in the affirmative (26.64), he is sentenced to death for blaspheming God. The irony is that God has indeed affirmed Jesus to be his Son (3.17; 17.5).

Upon Jesus' death, the Roman soldiers also affirm Jesus to be the Son of God (27.54). What the reader knows and the soldiers do not is that the death of Jesus Son of God constitutes the climax of his earthly ministry and the act whereby he atones for the sins of humankind (1.21; 26.28). Atop the mountain in Galilee, Jesus appears to the disciples as the resurrected Son of God who remains the crucified Son of God (28.5, 16–20). Seeing Jesus as such, the disciples at last perceive not only who he is (16.16) but also what he has accomplished (26.28). In consequence of this, they receive the commission to go and make of all nations Jesus' disciples (28.18–20). Matthew's story ends, therefore, with both the disciples and the reader sharing the same perception of Jesus and receiving his commission.

Story of the Opponents. Entwined with the story line of Jesus in Matthew is the story of his opponents. These are the Jewish leaders, who form a united front against him and comprise such groups as the *Pharisees, *Sadducees, chief *priests, *elders, and *scribes. Not until Jesus' arrest do the Jewish crowds turn on him (26.55).

The story of the Jewish leaders develops in close correlation with that of Jesus. In the first part of Matthew (1.1–4.16), the leaders are presented to the reader and cast in an unfavorable light. Thus, they make their debut as the supporters of King Herod who place their knowledge of scripture in his service (2.1–6). Like Herod and all Jerusalem, they are frightened at hearing the news that the Messiah, the King of the Jews, has been born. Subsequently, as John the Baptist readies Israel for the coming of Jesus (3.1–12), the Jewish leaders too go out to him. Instead of receiving them, however, John denounces them as a "brood of vipers" (3.7) and in so doing characterizes them as "evil" (cf. 12.34). How such evil is to be construed comes to light in the temptation and other pericopes. In the temptation (4.1–11), the devil, the fountainhead of all evil, three times puts Jesus to the test in order to get him to break faith with God (4.1–11). Later in Matthew's story, the Jewish leaders likewise repeatedly put Jesus to the test in order to best him in debate (16.1; 19.3; 22.18, 35). Accordingly, the Jewish leaders are evil in Matthean perspective because they have affinity with *Satan.

In the second part of Matthew's story (4.17–11.1; 11.2–16.20), conflict erupts between Jesus and the Jewish leaders (chap. 9), but it does not immediately become mortal (chap. 12). At the point it does become mortal, three features characterize it: it is sparked by a question having to do with the Mosaic *Law itself (12.1–8, 9–14); it is acutely confrontational in nature, in the sense that Jesus is himself directly attacked for an act he himself is about to perform (12.9–14); and it engenders such rancor in the Jewish leaders that they go off and conspire about how to destroy Jesus (12.15). Once the conflict takes this turn toward irreconcilable hostility, death looms as Jesus' certain fate.

As Jesus journeys toward Jerusalem in the third part of Matthew's story (16.21–28.20), only once does he clash with the Jewish leaders, and the purpose this serves is the instruction of the disciples (19.3–12). Not until after Jesus has reached Jerusalem, therefore, does his last great confrontation with the Jewish leaders prior to his passion take place (21.12–22.46). As Jesus teaches in the Temple, the various groups of Jewish leaders approach him, one after the other, in order to challenge him or, at the last, to be challenged by him (21.15, 23; 22.15–16, 23, 34–35, 41). The note on which all of these controversies end is that Jesus reduces all of the leaders to silence (22.46). The result is that they withdraw from the Temple to plot the immediate arrest and death of Jesus (26.3–5).

From their own standpoint, the Jewish leaders believe that by bringing Jesus to the cross, they are doing the will of God and purging Israel of a fraud (26.65–66; 27.63). Nevertheless, God shows, by raising Jesus from the dead and exalting him to all authority in heaven and on earth, that he puts Jesus in the right in his conflict with the Jewish leaders (28.6, 18). The upshot is that the death of Jesus becomes in Matthew not the occasion of Jesus' destruction but the means whereby God accomplishes the salvation of all humankind, Jew and gentile alike (26.28).

Story of the Disciples. The third story line in Matthew is that of the *disciples. Because Jesus gathers no followers until he begins his public ministry to Israel, it is not until the second part of Matthew's story that the disciples make their appearance (4.17–16.20).

The focus in the first half of the second part of Matthew (4.17–11.1) is on the call and the task of the disciples. As Jesus bids Peter and Andrew and James and John to come after him (4.18–22), he directs attention to the nature and the purpose of discipleship. The purpose of discipleship is as absolute as engaging in worldwide missionary activity (4.19). Its nature reveals itself in the fact that when Jesus summons the four fishermen, they forsake nets, boat, and father (profession, goods, and family) to give him their total allegiance. Through their being "with him" (12.30), he grants them to live in the sphere of God's end-time rule and makes of them a family (12.48–50), or brotherhood (23.8; 28.10), of the "sons of God" (5.9, 45) and of his disciples (10.24–25).

In the *Sermon on the Mount, the Matthean Jesus describes the piety the disciples are to practice. As those who live in the sphere of God's end-time rule, their piety is to be that of the greater righteousness (5.20). To do the greater righteousness, they must be "perfect," that is to say, they must be single-hearted in their devotion to God (5.48). What such single-hearted devotion entails is loving God with heart, soul, and mind, and one's *neighbor as oneself (5.44–48; 7.12, 21; cf. 22.34–40).

Further interaction between Jesus and the disciples or a would-be follower provides additional insight into the significance of the call to discipleship. In turning away the scribe who would arrogate to himself the authority to become a disciple (8.19–20), Jesus shows that one cannot, apart from his enabling call, either enter upon or sustain the life of discipleship. In commanding the disciple who would go bury his father to follow him instead into the boat (8.21–22, 23), Jesus discloses that the life of discipleship brooks no suspension. In chiding the disciples for displaying cowardice in the face of a storm while at the same time calming the winds and sea, Jesus reveals that although he does not condone their succumbing to the weakness of "little faith," he nonetheless stands ever-ready to assist them as they carry out whatever mission he entrusts to them (8.23–27). And in calling the tax collector Matthew to be his disciple (9.9), Jesus teaches all the disciples that he has come to gather not only the good and upright but also the despised.

As Jesus called his first disciples, the task he set before them was that of mission (4.19). With the circle of the *twelve now closed (10.2–4), Jesus summons them for instruction in the first mission they are to undertake, to Israel (10.5–42). This mission is an extension of Jesus' own mission: like him, they too are to go "to the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (10.6; 15.24); and like him, they too are to proclaim the nearness of the kingdom and to heal the sick and exorcise *demons (10.1, 7–8).

In the latter half of the second part of Matthew's story (11.2–16.20), the disciples stand out as the recipients of divine revelation. In contrast to Israel, which repudiates Jesus and shows itself to be uncomprehending, the disciples receive from God the gift of understanding (11.25–26; 13.11, 51). This encompasses insight into the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven (13.11; see Kingdom of God) and knowledge of Jesus' identity: far from being a prophet as the Jewish public imagines, Jesus is, the disciples affirm, the Messiah, the Son of God (14.33; 16.13–16).

In the third part of Matthew (16.21–28.20), the story of the disciples describes how Jesus finally overcomes their unwillingness to accept the truth that the essence of discipleship is servanthood. Although the disciples know that Jesus is the Son of God, they do not know that the fate of the Son of God is suffering and death. In the first word Jesus speaks to the disciples in the third part, he predicts his passion (16.21). Peter takes offense at this (16.22), but Jesus rebukes Peter and solemnly warns all the disciples that only those can belong to him who are prepared to take up their cross and follow him (16.23–24). The proper response to suffering sonship is suffering discipleship or servanthood (20.25–28). Because the disciples resist this notion, they are unable to persevere with Jesus in his passion and fall away: *Judas betrays him (26.49); all desert him (26.56); and Peter denies him (26.69–75).

But though the disciples fall away, the risen Jesus again gathers all of them except Judas (27.3–10) through the word he sends to them that they should meet him in Galilee (28.7, 10, 16). In gathering his scattered disciples, Jesus reconciles them to himself. Moreover, as the disciples, standing on the mountain, see the risen Jesus bearing on his person the marks of crucifixion, they are at last able to comprehend that Jesus' sonship has indeed been suffering sonship. In comprehending this, they likewise comprehend that suffering sonship is a call to suffering discipleship or servanthood. So enlightened, they recast their lives in accord with Jesus' earlier words: "If any want to become my followers, let them deny themselves and take up their cross and follow me" (16.24).

JACK DEAN KINGSBURY

Meals. Meals—from the apple in *Eden to Ezekiel's scroll, from the *Passover to Jesus' Last Supper to the messianic wedding banquet—are still among the Bible's most powerful images, despite centuries of radical change. Indeed, as most explicitly stated in the Lord's command to the Israelites to tell their children about the Passover sacrifice (Exod. 12.26–27) and in Jesus's command "Do this in remembrance of me" (Luke 22.19), these meals embody, translate, and reinterpret scripture. They speak to an ongoing process of turning water into wine, drawing the living *Torah from daily life, but also, in the New Testament, turning the blood and wine of the *crucifixion back into the milk and water of plain speech (see 1 Cor. 3.2). Biblical meals express an intensely dialogic and historical view of religious understanding, in which human responses approach the divine status of the original revelations.

Nineteenth-century evolutionists explained the prominence of food imagery in the Bible by arguing that the ancient Israelites represented earlier stages of the development from concrete to abstract forms of reasoning; taboos on meat were alleged to be the remnants of animal worship antedating *monotheism. Subsequent research has shown that symbolic or metaphorical reasoning is basic to human cognition, and food imagery is central to most known religions. Commensalism is synonymous with community; but particular cultural evaluations of who should eat what with whom, when, where, and why take many different forms, often subject to close scrutiny and debate precisely because of their critical social role.

Most scholarship on biblical meals has focused on the dietary rules concerning "clean" and "unclean" *animals (Lev. 11; Deut.14), probably because of their salience in debates over the *Law that lead to the eventual differentiation of Judaism and Christianity. The most fruitful scholarship follows Leviticus 11.44 and Deuteronomy 14.2, 21, and some early rabbis, in seeing the rules as expressing and achieving *holiness by mandating the consumption of animals that are "clean" because they conform wholly to the cosmic order of the *creation (Gen. 1) and prohibiting the "unclean" anomalies (see e.g., Mary Douglas, Purity and Danger, 1966; R. Bulmer in Man 24 [1989]: 302–20; see also Purity, Ritual).

Other scholars have emphasized the need for open-ended approaches, taking into account the diversity of Israelites, the paradoxical complexity of their Law, and the ways in which the Law has been continuously reinterpreted over time. For Robert Alter (Commentary 68/2 [1979]: 46–52) the holiness achieved by observing the dietary rules includes "vitalism," imitation of God's life-giving powers, expressed in prohibiting blood and creatures found dead, and restricting, but not completely forbidding, the consumption of animals, especially carnivores. Samuel Cooper (in Harvey E. Goldberg, ed., Judaism Viewed from Within and from Without, 1987) sees the "laws of mixture" on the separation of meat and milk, linen and wool, and grain and grape as mediating similar contradictions in life giving and taking. Howard Eilberg-Schwartz (The Savage in Judaism, 1990) is still more comprehensive, seeing Israelite animal and plant classifications as root metaphors about a people brought into being by a God with no body.

Feeley-Harnik (The Lord's Table, 1981) emphasizes the need to look beyond the dietary rules at the broader significance of biblical meals in the light of participants' views of their moral dilemmas—notably, "Who is the true Israelite?" and "Who is my neighbor?"—and in terms of their own modes of analysis—notably midrash—in changing social and historical circumstances. Food, articulated in meals, was the embodiment of God's word, divine *Wisdom, for people who would have no *graven images. The food that God provided was the foundation of the *covenant relationship in scripture and in sectarianism; the food God prohibited was *idolatry. During and after the Babylonian *exile (sixth century BCE), as God's word became increasingly identified with the Law, food law came to represent the whole Law. Sectarianism was expressed above all through differing interpretations of the dietary rules. Christians of the first century CE, as observant Jews, used the language of meals to establish both the legitimacy of Jesus and the novelty of his interpretation of the Law, which required different kinds of relations among human beings and God from those advocated by other sectarians.

Biblical meals are part of a larger semantic field, thought-action as a landscape, laid out in Genesis 1–2. The *creation embodies not only vital categories but also vital creative, transformative processes that endow specific foods with particular social values, conveyed in meals. God, as the preeminent gardener, works to produce vital, edible wisdom-food, engendering and sustaining humans who should respond to God and each other in kind. Biblical meals express bodily processes of understanding and communicating that accompany and may even transcend words in the fullest "face-to-face" encounters (Deut. 34.10; 1 Cor. 13.12). Peter's vision of the sheet filled with clean and unclean animals (Acts 10.9–11.18) is one striking example of how early Jewish-Christians used biblical meals to communicate their "face-to-face" understanding of the Law across the babel of tongues and stomachs that characterize humankind.

See also Lord's Supper.

GILLIAN FEELEY-HARNIK

Measures. See Weights and Measures.

Medes. The Medes (Map 7:J3), like the *Persians, were a people of Aryan (Iranian) speech who probably entered the ancient Near East from the north. They were first encountered by the *Assyrians about 835 BCE; they occupied the north Zagros Mountain region and far eastward. The "strong Medes" bred excellent horses and suffered frequent Assyrian incursions. Sargon II in 713 BCE received the submission of some fifty of their chieftains, but in the 670s a leader named Kashtariti (Khshathrita) of Kar-Kashshi in Media was building a formidable power. With Ecbatana (Achmetha) as capital, the Medes soon rose to be rulers of an empire that reached from the central Zagros to Turkestan and included Persis and, by 600 BCE, Armenia and eastern Anatolia as well. Under the warrior king Cyaxares, after a period of Scythian dominance, they had captured *Nineveh in 612 BCE and shared the Assyrian kingdom with the *Babylonians, thus attracting the attention of Jeremiah (51.11, 28; see also Isa. 13.17; 21.2). But in 550 BCE their elderly king Astyages was conquered by *Cyrus the Persian, whose mother was said to have been a Mede.

Under Cyrus the Medes were to some extent corulers of the empire; in fact, for several centuries the outside world continued to apply the name "Mede" to the imperial power (see, e.g., Esther 1.3). But after *Darius usurped the throne the Medes rose unsuccessfully in revolt (522–521 BCE) and lost such privileged status as they had enjoyed. There does, however, seem to have been a considerable Median legacy in the institutions and titulature of the Persian court, and the *Magi who formed the Iranian clergy were in origin a Median clan. The Medes are also mentioned as a nationality in Acts 2.9.

J. M. COOK

Medicine. Although the existence of survivable surgical procedures on the skull (trephination) is attested from the Neolithic through the Arab periods, it is particularly difficult to identify and evaluate the therapeutic value of most specific treatments mentioned in the Bible. Such healing practices include the use of "balsam" from Gilead (Jer. 46.11), "mandrakes" for infertility (Gen. 30.14), and "bandages" (Ezek. 30.21).

Archaeoparasitologists have recently established the probable existence of certain intestinal diseases (e.g., tapeworm [taenia] and whipworm [trichuris trichiura] infections) in ancient Israel, but the precise identification of most diseases in the Bible has been notoriously difficult, especially in cases of epidemics (Num. 25; 1 Sam. 5.6–12). The condition usually translated as "*leprosy" (Hebr. ṣāraʿat) receives the most attention in the Bible (Lev. 13–14), but it does not have a simple modern equivalent because it probably encompassed a large variety of diseases, especially those manifesting chronic discoloration of the skin. Infertility was viewed as an illness that diminished the social status of the afflicted woman (Gen. 30.1–20).

The Hebrew Bible has at least two principal explanations for illness. One, represented by Deuteronomy 28, affirms that health (Hebr. šālôm) encompasses a physical state associated with the fulfillment of *covenant stipulations that are fully disclosed to the members of the society, and illness stems from the violation of those stipulations. Therapy includes reviewing one's actions in light of the covenant. The book of *Job offers a contrasting yet complementary view, which argues that illness may be rooted in divine plans that may not be disclosed to the patient at all and not in the transgression of published rules. The patient must trust that God's undisclosed reasons are just.

Perhaps the most distinctive feature of the Israelite health-care system depicted in the canonical texts is the division into legitimate and illegitimate consultative options for the patient. This dichotomy is partly related to monolatry, insofar as illness and healing rest ultimately on Yahweh's control (Job 5.18) and insofar as non-Yahwistic options are prohibited. Since it was accessible and inexpensive, *prayer to Yahweh was probably the most common legitimate option for a patient. Petitions and thanksgiving prayers uttered from the viewpoint of the patient are attested in the Bible (Ps. 38; Isa. 38.10–20).

Illegitimate options included consultants designated as "healers" (2 Chron. 16.12: Hebr. rōpĕʾîm, NRSV: "physicians"), non-Yahwistic temples (2 Kings 1.2–4), and probably a large variety of "sorcerers" (Deut. 18.10–12). Warnings in the canonical texts, along with archaeological evidence for fertility cults, indicate that such "illegitimate" options were used widely in ancient Israel.

The foremost legitimate consultants in the canonical texts are commonly designated as *prophets, and they were often in fierce competition with "illegitimate" consultants. Stories of healing *miracles (e.g., 2 Kings 4; 8) may reflect an effort to promote prophets as the legitimate consultants. Their function was to provide prognoses (2 Kings 8.8) and intercede on behalf of the patient (2 Kings 5.11). Unlike some of the principal healing consultants in other Near Eastern societies, the efficacy of the Israelite prophets resided more in their relationship with God than in technical expertise. The demise of the prophetic office early in the Second Temple period probably led to the wide legitimation of the rōpĕʾîm (see Sir. 38.1–15).

Another accepted option for some illnesses, particularly in the preexilic period, was the temple. In 1 Samuel 1, Hannah visited the temple at Shiloh to help reverse her infertility. 2 Kings 18.4 indicates that, prior to *Hezekiah, the bronze serpent made by *Moses as a therapeutic device (Num. 21.6–9) was involved in acceptable therapeutic rituals in the *Temple of Jerusalem. Bronze serpents have been found in temples known to have been used for therapy during the first millennium BCE (e.g., the Asclepieion at Pergamon).

By the postexilic period the Priestly code (*P) severely restricted access to the temple for the chronically ill (e.g., "lepers" in Lev. 13–14; cf. 2 Sam. 5.7 on the blind and the lame) because of fear of "impurity." "Leprosy" alone probably encompassed a wide variety of patients. The theology of impurity, as a system of social boundaries, could serve to remove socioeconomically burdensome populations from society, the chronically ill perhaps being the most prominent. In effect, the Priestly code minimizes state responsibility for the chronically ill, leaving the eradication of illness for the future (Ezek. 47.12; cf. Isa. 35.5–6). (See Purity, Ritual.)

Thanksgiving or "well-being" offerings (Lev. 7.11–36) after an illness were probably always acceptable and economically advantageous for the Temple. Offerings after an illness also may have served as public notice of the readmission of previously ostracized patients to society (Lev. 14.1–32).

The community responsible for the *Dead Sea Scrolls added to the priestly list of illnesses that excluded from the normal community and expanded the restrictions for "leprosy," the blind, and the lame (1QSa II.4–9). Socioeconomic reasons, as well as the fear of magical contamination, may be responsible for such increased restrictions.

Perhaps the most far-reaching consequence of the Priestly code was the growth of chronically ill populations with little access to the Temple. Since *Jesus and his disciples appear to target these populations (Matt. 10.8; Mark 14.3), early Christianity may be seen, in part, as a critique of the priestly health-care system. In early Christianity illness may be caused by numerous *demonic entities who are not always acting at Yahweh's command (Matt. 15.22; Luke 11.14; see also Exorcism; Satan) and not necessarily by the violation of covenant stipulations (John 9.2). Emphasizing that the cure for illness may be found in this world, early Christianity preserved many older Jewish traditions regarding miraculous healings (Acts 5.16; 9.34) and collective health (James 5.16), although the influence of Hellenistic healing cults (e.g., the Asclepius cult) also may be seen.

K. Seybold and U. B. Mueller (Sickness and Healing, 1978) provide a recent study of biblical medicine, although a new comprehensive study is needed to integrate the recent work by paleopathologists (e.g., Joseph Zias, "Death and Disease in Ancient Israel," Biblical Archaeologist 54 [1991]: 146–59) and medical anthropologists (e.g., Arthur Kleinman, Patients and Healers in the Context of Culture: Explorations of the Borderland Between Anthropology, Medicine and Psychiatry, 1980). HECTOR IGNACIO AVALOS Medicine and the Bible. It is generally agreed that modern Western medicine takes its origin from two main sources, the Greek ideals enshrined in the Hippocratic tradition, to which was added the influence of the biblical teaching of love of one's *neighbor (Lev. 19.18; Luke 10.25–37). Thus, although Western medicine owes much to its classical heritage, especially as this has been reinterpreted since the Renaissance, it was the added dimension of a biblically based ethic that gave it a distinctive approach, centered in a profound respect for the person.

The pragmatism of Greek ideals is reflected in writings dealing with the exposure of unwanted or weak infants and with solutions to the problems of the chronically ill. The latter, being useless to themselves and to the state, should be allowed to die without medical attention (Plato, Republic 407). Biblical religion, on the other hand, had the frame of reference of a transcendent God to whom humankind was ultimately answerable; this gives rise to a profound respect for the dignity and innate value of the individual, seen as created in the image of God (Gen. 1.27). The responsibilities of biblical faith, whether Jewish or Christian, in the relations of people with one another are summed up in texts like "you shall love your neighbor as yourself" (Lev. 19.18) and "Do to others as you would have them do to you" (Matt. 7.12; see Golden Rule). From the standpoint of medicine, this was admirably summed up in the prayer of the great Jewish physician Maimonides (1135–1204 CE): "May I never see in my patient anything else than a fellow creature in pain."

The influence of such biblical precepts introduces an element of moral obligation into medical ethics as it developed in parallel with the rising influence of Christianity in the later Roman empire and throughout the medieval period in Europe. It also provided the spur to the church to establish hospitals that provided care for the sick; refuges that gave shelter to the blind, sufferers from leprosy, the mentally ill, and others outcast from society; and dispensaries for the poor. This same obligation, at a much later stage, led to the development of medical missionary work in conjunction with, yet distinct from, the growth of evangelistic concern that took place in the nineteenth century.

In providing a moral base for such developments, the Bible has given to modern medicine a great deal more than it might now care to acknowledge. Nevertheless, the centrality of respect for the person that originates in the Bible has now become enshrined in modern medical codes, such as the Geneva Convention Code of Ethics (1949) and the Helsinki Convention (1964) of the World Medical Association.

On the other hand, as a result of the ways in which the Bible has been interpreted and applied, there have been times when its influence on medicine has been negative. Until there was any proper understanding of the causative factors in disease and the actual disease processes themselves, there was a tendency to see sickness as the result of divine visitations and punishment for wrongdoing. The Bible itself knows little of physicians as such (see Medicine), and in the faith of Israel it was God alone who was the healer and giver of life. Most references to physicians are uncomplimentary (as in Mark 5.25–26, more temperately put in Luke 8.43) or at best neutral. Other than the reference to Luke "the beloved physician" (Col. 4.14), the only positive remarks about medical practitioners occur in Sirach 38.1–15, where the reader is exhorted to "honor physicians for their services." Even in this passage, however, the emphasis is on the need for confession of sin before any true healing could take place and the role of God as healer. (Note the much later dictum of Ambroise Paré [1510–1590]: "I treated the patient, but God healed him.")

In the Bible itself, it is the religious component that dominates in a situation where religion and medicine are inextricably bound together. This is seen particularly in Israel's legal codes, which did not separate physical disease from ritual *purity. Thus, while the sanitary code of the *Torah contains regulations that were of major importance in the promotion of health and the prevention of epidemic diseases in the community, they are set within a religious framework. Ultimately, it was God alone who sent disease and disaster as a punishment for wrongdoing or, alternatively, rewarded the good with health and well-being (see, e.g., Exod. 15.26; Deut. 7.12–15).

The establishment of such a causal relationship between disease and a failure to meet religious and moral obligations was, in some sense, an attempt to answer the unanswerable question, "Why me?" It was seen especially with regard to contagious and disfiguring diseases, of which the best example is the disease complex unfortunately called *leprosy in most English translations. Various ritual prescriptions were applied to such diseases in order to avoid the contamination of the community, which was seen as more important than the healing of the sick person. Similar ritual restrictions were also imposed in relation to normal physiological functions (see, e.g., Lev. 12; 15.16–33). Thus, consulting a physician for help could be construed as denial of the primary role of God and evidence of lack of faith in him, as well as lack of willingness to acknowledge personal sin (2 Chron. 16.12).

Many of these concepts were perpetuated in Christianity, even though such a simplistic viewpoint was challenged in the Bible (e.g., in the book of *Job and John 9.1–3). The early church, however, undoubtedly interpreted such views too literally, and medical treatment was displaced by an emphasis on prayer and fasting in order to chasten the individual. From the Renaissance onward, however, medicine and theology became increasingly divorced from one another, allowing the development of medicine along the now-familiar lines of scientific principles from the sixteenth or seventeenth centuries onward. Nonetheless, there has always been in Christianity a healing ministry that has been seen as biblically based (see, e.g., Luke 10.9). In general, this has not been considered as in competition with orthodox medicine but rather as complementary to it. Some more recent developments in healing ministries derived from biblical literalism, however, seem to be an attempt to return to a prescientific worldview, and will inevitably be in conflict with modern medical practice.

J. KEIR HOWARD

Meek. The English word "meek" is now largely archaic, and recent translations of the Bible use it far less frequently than earlier versions. Its connotations of gentleness and humility are not entirely accurate representations of the word it generally translates in the Hebrew Bible, where ʿānāw and its cognates refer primarily to socioeconomic and political deprivation; the ʿănāwîm are the *poor, the oppressed, whose special protector is God. They are both individuals within the community and Israel as a totality as well: their persecutors will be defeated and they will inherit the land (Ps. 37.11). Earlier suggestions that they were an identifiable political group are now generally rejected.

On occasion the Hebrew words in question seem to refer to an inner attitude of humility as well; the "meek" are somehow closer to God (see Num. 12.3; Zeph. 2.3). This spiritual connotation is dominant in the word used to translate ʿānāw in the *Septuagint. The word praos and its cognates are widely used in Greek literature to describe an admirable moral quality of gentle and genial composure, and this is its dominant sense in the New Testament, where it is used of both Jesus (Matt. 11.29; 2 Cor. 10.1) and his followers (Col. 3.12; 1 Tim. 6.1; 1 Pet. 3.4).

The beatitude in Matthew 5.5 that describes the meek inheriting the earth is clearly derived from Psalm 37.11, and Jesus probably intended its original, concrete sense, but in view of Matthew's spiritualization of other beatitudes with parallels in Luke 6.20–23, the meek seem for Matthew at least to be those who are not only socioeconomically deprived but patiently accepting of their status as well. (See Sermon on the Mount.)

MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Megiddo. Situated southeast of Mount Carmel at the western approach to the Jezreel Valley (Map 1:X3), Megiddo assumed geopolitical significance throughout its long occupation (early fourth millennium to early fourth century BCE). The 5.25-hectare (13-acre) site thrived at the juncture of major international trade routes connecting the northeast (*Hazor, *Damascus), the northern Israelite and *Phoenician coasts (Acco, Tyre, Sidon), and the south-central coast of Israel (Sharon Plain, Philistia, Egypt). Several archaeological expeditions have revealed significant remains from every period, including: Early-Middle Bronze Age Canaanite temple complexes with a circular altar; a Late Bronze Age treasury containing beautifully carved ivories; and multiphased gate structures, palaces, stables (or storerooms), a sophisticated water system, and grain storage facilities from the Israelite period. Besides archaeological data, Egyptian, Assyrian, and biblical records illuminate Megiddo's history. The latter mention the Israelites' inability to control this region during the settlement period (compare Josh. 12.21 with Judg. 1.27–28); *Solomon's royal building activities here during the United Monarchy (1 Kings 9.15–19); and *Josiah's ill-fated attempt to intercept at Megiddo Egyptian military aid for *Assyria against *Babylon (2 Kings 23.28–30). Later eschatological references mention the valley around *Armageddon (Hill of Megiddo) as the site of the final battle between the forces of good and evil (Rev. 16.12–16). RON TAPPY Megillot. The name, meaning "scrolls," given to the collection of the five shortest books of the Writings, the third section of the Hebrew Bible. The Megillot are *Song of Solomon, *Ruth, *Lamentations, *Ecclesiastes, and *Esther. Although the current order of the books in printed Bibles follows their order in the annual Jewish liturgical cycle, in some older traditions they were arranged according to traditional chronology: Ruth, Song of Solomon, Ecclesiastes, Lamentations, Esther (see also b. B. Bat. 14b). The Song of Solomon is read on the feast of *Passover, as well as preceding the service welcoming the *Sabbath on Friday evenings; the love poetry of the Song is thought to represent in the former case the marriage of God and Israel and in the latter the marriage of Israel and Queen Sabbath. Ruth is read at *Pentecost (Shavuʿot); among the reasons given are the setting of Ruth at the time of the barley harvest (Ruth 1.22), the tradition that King *David, one of Ruth's descendants, was born and died at this time, and the relationship between Israel's assumption of the *Torah at Mount Sinai seven weeks after the *Exodus and Ruth's acceptance of Judaism. Lamentations, a series of dirges commemorating the destruction of *Jerusalem and the *Temple, is read on the ninth of the month of Ab, a fast day on which these events, and the destruction of the Second Temple as well, are said to have taken place. The somber mood of Ecclesiastes, read in the fall on the Feast of Booths (Sukkot), is thought to be a reflection of the season. Esther is read on Purim, the joyous holiday celebrating the salvation of the Jews as related in the book.

See also Canon, article on The Order of Books in the Hebrew Bible; Lectionaries, article on Jewish Traditions. CARL S. EHRLICH

Melchizedek. The king of Salem and priest of God Most High (El Elyon; see Names of God) who met Abram when the latter was returning victorious from battle. When Melchizedek met the patriarch, he gave Abram bread and wine, and he blessed him by God Most High. Abram in turn gave the priest a tenth of the spoils (Gen. 14.17–20).

Later tradition identified Salem with *Jerusalem (Ps. 76.2), the city that King *David conquered and transformed into his capital. Apparently David tried to unite royal and sacerdotal power by appropriating the order of Melchizedek, the king-priest (Ps. 110.4).

The author of the letter to the *Hebrews, citing Psalm 110.4, argues that *Jesus is a *priest forever after the order of Melchizedek (Heb. 5.6, 10; 6.20; 7.17). The fact that *Abraham paid him *tithes shows how great Melchizedek was (Heb. 7.4). The fact that Melchizedek blessed Abraham establishes Melchizedek's superiority, for the greater always blesses the inferior (Heb. 7.7). Jesus, being in the same order, is therefore greater than Abraham, too.

One of the *Dead Sea Scrolls (11QMelch) portrays Melchizedek as a heavenly being who will bring salvation (in fulfillment of Isa. 52.7–10 and 61.1–3) and judgment (in fulfillment of Pss. 7.7–8; 82.1–2) at the conclusion of the final jubilee (Lev. 25).

In *gnostic literature, Melchizedek is variously represented as the one who brings the baptismal waters and as one who gathers and emits light. One of the *Nag Hammadi documents describes him as a prominent heavenly priest and warrior figure who, in being baptized, offered himself in sacrifice, in a way reminiscent of Jesus.

In the Slavonic version of 2 *Enoch, Melchizedek's old and sterile mother conceived him miraculously, apart from sexual intercourse. He was taken to *paradise, where he was to be the head of all future priests. The text speaks of the last generation when a new Melchizedek will arise; greater than all his predecessors, he will work miracles and rule as king and priest.

WILLIAM B. NELSON, JR.

Mene, Mene, Tekel, and Parsin. The banquet of King *Belshazzar, described in Daniel 5, was disrupted by a divine apparition; a hand etching the words "Mene Mene Teqel Upharsin" (u being a form of the common Semitic conjunction meaning "and") on the plaster of a wall.

Ancient evidence suggests that the repetiton of "mene" in v. 25 may be scribal error (see v. 26). Others interpret the first "mene" as a verbal form meaning "he has weighed."

The inability of the various diviners to elicit sense from the inscription (Dan. 5.8) was most likely rooted in their failure to understand the meaning behind the words rather than to read the words themselves. In 1886, Charles Clermont-Ganneau suggested that the terms reflect ancient *weights or measures: mina, shekel, and half-shekel; this view is now widely held. The meaning of the inscription as interpreted by *Daniel, however, lies not in these nouns but in the verbal notions behind them: Belshazzar's kingdom was numbered (mnh): he was weighed (tql); his kingdom was divided (prs) between the *Medes and the *Persians.

JAMES H. PLATT

Menorah. The seven-branched candelabrum of the wilderness *tabernacle and Jerusalem *Temples, it was typical of Iron Age elevated metal structures combining the functions of lampstand and lamp. The tabernacle menorah, anachronistically described in the postexilic Priestly code (*P) (Exod. 25.31–40 and 37.17–24), was said to have been hammered, together with all of its lamps and utensils, from one whole talent (ca. 44 kg [96 lb]) of pure gold by the craftsman Bezalel. Based on a tripod, three branches curved from both sides of a vertical shaft; these, with the central stem, were decorated with cups carved in the shape of open almond blossoms, the uppermost holding the lamps. These botanical motifs may reflect tree of life symbolism, common in the ancient Near East.

According to 1 Kings 7.39 (and 2 Chron. 4.7), ten pure gold lampstands, which are not described in detail, together with gold accoutrements, adorned Solomon's Temple, five on the south side of the main hall, and five on the north. The Second Temple, following the priestly directions for the wilderness tabernacle, had one golden menorah. According to Josephus (Ant. 3.8.199), three of its lamps burned all day; the rest were lit in the evening. The *Talmud relates that the westernmost lamp, closest to the Holy of Holies, was never extinguished (b. Yoma 33a). The menorah was removed in 169 BCE by Antiochus Epiphanes IV (1 Macc. 4.49–50) during his desecration of the Temple. Judas Maccabee supplied a new menorah, together with other vessels, during the Temple's cleansing (1 Macc. 4.49–50; 2 Macc. 10.3). Josephus recounts that when Herod's Temple was destroyed in 70 CE, the menorah was carried by the Romans in Titus's triumphal march (War 7.5.148–9). The Temple menorah seems to be depicted on the Arch of Titus in Rome, although there is some controversy over this rendition's accuracy, particularly regarding the double octagonal pedestal, since according to all Jewish sources and considerable archeological evidence, the menorah stood on three legs. After 70 CE, the menorah became an enduring Jewish religious and national symbol, frequently appearing in synagogue, domestic, and funerary art; it appears today on the emblem of the State of Israel.

JUDITH R. BASKIN

Mercy of God. The concept of a loving and merciful god is ancient, found in hymns to Egyptian, Sumerian, and Babylonian deities. In the *Ugaritic texts, the high god El is formulaically described as merciful and compassionate, with a cognate of the same word used two millennia later in Muslim characterization of God. Several Hebrew words have traditionally been translated by the English word "mercy," including ḥānan, ḥesed, and especially rāḥamîm. The last is derived from the word for uterus (reḥem), and is remarkable both for its maternal nuance and for its persistence in biblical and nonbiblical descriptions of male deities. The nuance is made explicit in Isaiah 49.14–15, a rare instance of maternal *metaphor to describe the God of Israel.

One of the oldest characterizations of Yahweh is found in Exodus 34.6–7, quoted or alluded to frequently (e.g., Num. 14.18; Joel 2.13; Pss. 86.15; 103.8; 111.4; 145.8; Neh. 9.17; Jon. 4.2; Eph. 2.4; cf. Ps. 77.7–9). This ancient liturgical fragment describes Yahweh as "merciful (raḥûm) and gracious (ḥannûn), slow to anger, and abounding in steadfast love . . . forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin . . . yet by no means clearing the guilty, but visiting the iniquity of the parents upon the children and the children's children," and thus raises one of the most profound dilemmas of monotheism, the tension between divine mercy and justice. Biblical tradition itself offers a partial corrective to the theory of inherited, and thus implicitly collective, guilt, notably in Ezekiel 18. But the more profound paradox of a God believed to be merciful and forgiving on the one hand and ultimately just on the other remains unresolved. The Bible is of course not an abstract theological treatise, and so it is not surprising that there is no detailed exposition of the problem. But it is one to which biblical writers frequently return, in narratives (Jonah; Luke 15), dialogue (Job; cf. Ecclesiastes; Rom. 9), and especially in *prayers (Ps. 130.3–4; Dan. 9.7–9; cf Hab. 3.2), where the hope of the worshipper is that God's mercy will prevail over his justice (see Hos. 11.8–9; James 2.13). This hope is based on the realization of the essential unworthiness of those chosen by God; the election of Israel, and the *salvation of the Christian, were motivated by gratuitous divine love (Deut. 7.7–8; Ps. 103.6–18; Titus 3.5).

God's mercy is also a model for human conduct. "Those who fear the Lord" are characterized as "gracious (ḥannûn), merciful (raḥûm), and righteous" in Psalm 112.4, phrasing that echoes the immediately preceding description of Yahweh in the similarly *acrostic Psalm 111.4. Resuming this theme, Jesus commands his followers to imitate divine mercy according to Luke 6.36 (cf. Matt. 5.43–48). See also Covenant; Evil; Grace; Suffering. MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Mesopotamia. A Greek name meaning "between the rivers." As used by Greek writers from the second century BCE, it denotes the land between the Tigris and *Euphrates rivers from roughly the northern and western borders of present-day Iraq to where the two rivers came close together near present-day Baghdad (Map 14:H3).

"Mesopotamia" occurs eight times in the NRSV (Deut. 23.4; 1 Chron. 19.6; Jth. 2:24; 5:7–8; 8:26; Acts 2:9; 7.2). In the first two cases, the Hebrew is 'ăram nahărayim, meaning "Aram of the two rivers"; the Hebrew transliterated as Aram-naharaim is used in the NRSV three times (Gen. 24.10; Judg. 3.8; Ps. 60:1). The *Septuagint has "Mesopotamia" at Genesis 24.10 and Deuteronomy 23.4, but "Syria of rivers" at Judges 3.8 and "Syria of Mesopotamia" at 1 Chronicles 19.6.

The phrase "Aram of the two rivers" is similar to "Aram of Bet-Rehov" (2 Sam. 10.6), "Aram of Damascus" (2 Sam. 8.5), and "Aram of Zobah" (2 Sam. 10.6); strictly, it means Aramean territory between the two rivers, that is, northwest Iraq and northeast Syria. Where the Septuagint has "Mesopotamia," this is not a translation of the Hebrew but the use of an equivalent geographical name. Because of the difference in meaning between the modern use of "Mesopotamia" and the ancient use, translations are not consistent in the use of the term, and modern tendency is to avoid the word altogether or to modify it.

For further treatment of the history and cultures of Mesopotamia, see Assyria; Babylon; Sumer.

J. W. ROGERSON

Messiah. The term denotes an expected or longed-for savior, especially in Jewish tradition, where some applied it to the revolutionary Simon Bar Kokhba (d. 135 CE), the mystic Shabbetai Zevi (1626–1676), and other "false messiahs," and in Christianity, where it is exclusively applied to *Jesus Christ.

The word is derived from the common biblical Hebrew word māšîaḥ, meaning "anointed." In Greek it is transcribed as messias and translated as christos. In the Hebrew Bible, the term is most often used of kings, whose investiture was marked especially by *anointing with oil (Judg. 9.8–15; 2 Sam. 5.3; 1 Kings 1.39; Ps. 89.20; Sir. 46.13), and who were given the title "the Lord's anointed" (e.g., 1 Sam. 2.10; 12.3; 2 Sam 23.1; Pss. 2.2; 20.6; 132.17; Lam. 4.20). It is even used of *Cyrus, king of the *Medes and *Persians (Isa. 45.1). There is a possibility that some prophets may have been anointed (see 1 Kings 19.16; cf. Isa. 61.1), and according to some texts the investiture of *priests includes anointing too (Exod. 29.7; Lev. 4.3, 5, 16; Sir. 45.15), though this probably reflects political developments after the fall of the monarchy; the title is not normally given to priests or prophets. In a passage from Zechariah dated 520 BCE, where king and priest are described as "the two anointed ones," the term māšîaḥ is avoided (Zech 4.14; cf. 6.9–14). By Maccabean times, however, it is used of the high priest (Dan. 9.26).

In its primary biblical usage, then, "anointed" is, virtually a synonym for "king," in particular *David and his descendants, and it should be understood in the context of the royal ideology documented in the books of *Samuel, *Kings, and *Psalms, even when it is applied secondarily to priests and others. The king was appointed by divine command (1 Sam 10.1; 16.1–13; Ps. 45.7), and he was adopted as *son of God (2 Sam 7.14; Ps. 2.7; cf. 89.26). His own person was sacrosanct (1 Sam 24.6), the future of his dynasty was divinely protected (2 Sam 7.12–16; 22.51; Ps. 89.4, 36–37), and he was the unique instrument of God's justice on earth (2 Sam. 23.3; 1 Kings 3.28; Pss. 45.4; 72.1–4; cf. 2 Sam. 14.4; 2 Kings 3.28). As with the ideals and the realities of *Zion, the *Temple, the priesthood, and other institutions, the gap between the ideals of Davidic *kingship and historical reality widened (e.g., 1 Kings 11.6; 2 Kings 16.1–4; 21.1–18; cf. Deut. 17.14–17), and eventually royal language and imagery came to be applied primarily to a hoped-for future king, whose reign would be characterized by everlasting justice, security, and peace (Isa. 11.1–5; 32.1; Jer. 33.14–26; Ezek. 37.24–28). Such a figure is popularly known as "the messiah," and biblical texts that describe him are known as "messianic," though the term "messiah" itself does not occur with this sense in the Hebrew Bible.

At the heart of biblical messianism is the idea that God intervenes in history by sending a savior to deliver his people from suffering and injustice. Influenced by the *Exodus tradition (e.g., Exod. 2.19; 3.7–12), the stories of *Joshua and *Judges (cf. Judg. 2.16, 18), and established religious institutions, this messianic hope crystallized into several models. The first is that of a king like David who would conquer the powers of evil by force of arms (Gen 49.10; Num. 24.17; Pss. 2.9; 18.31–42) and establish a reign of justice and peace (Isa. 9.2–7; 11.1–5). In some passages his wisdom is referred to (Isa. 9.6; 11.2; cf. 1 Kings 3.9; Prov. 8.15–16; 24.5–6), in others his gentleness and humility (Isa. 42.2–3; Zech. 9.9–10). Emphasis is on the divine initiative (2 Sam. 7.8–16; Jer. 33.14–16; Hag. 2.21–23) and on the result of the action, so that some visions of a "messianic" age make little or no mention of the messiah himself (e.g., Isa. 2.2–4; 11.6–9; 32.1, 16–20; 65.17–25; Amos 9.11–15).

Belief in a priestly messiah, son of *Aaron, who would arise alongside the Davidic messiah to save Israel, appears in the *Dead Sea Scrolls (e.g., 1QS 9.1). The mysterious figure of *Melchizedek (Gen 14.18) provides a title for one who is at the same time both king and priest (Ps. 110.4; Heb. 7). A third model is that of a prophet, anointed to "bring good news to the oppressed" (Isa. 61.1; 11Q Melch. 18; Luke 4.18). The belief that a prophet like *Moses would arise (Deut. 18.18; Acts 3.22), known as Taheb ("he who brings back"), is central to *Samaritan messianism (cf. John 4.25).

Finally, the tradition that the divinely appointed savior should suffer (Luke 24.26; Acts 3.18) has its roots in numerous *psalms attributed to David (e.g., 22; 55; 88), as well as in the traditional picture of Moses and the prophets as rejected and persecuted by their people (Exod. 16.2; 17.2–4; Jer. 11.18–19; 20.7–10; Matt. 23.37). The notion that his suffering or self-sacrifice is in itself saving (cf. Exod 32.32; Isa. 53.5, 10, 12) is given a unique emphasis in Christian messianism (e.g., Rom. 5.6–8; Gal. 3.13; cf. Acts 8.32; 1 Pet. 2.24–25).

JOHN F. A. SAWYER

Messianic Secret. The use of the term "messianic secret" arose at the beginning of the twentieth century with the publication of Wilhelm Wrede's Das Messiasgeheimnis in den Evangelien (1901), translated into English under the title The Messianic Secret (Cambridge, 1971). Wrede started from an assumption that was widely held in critical biblical studies, namely, that the historical *Jesus was not conscious of being more than a Jewish prophet, and that his claims were in no way messianic. After his *crucifixion, however, his disciples were convinced that he had risen from the dead and therefore must have been the *Messiah who was foretold in scripture.

When looking back, Christians of the first generation were, according to Wrede, puzzled by the lack of consistency between the picture of Jesus of Nazareth that was presented by the traditions of his earthly life and their own belief in a risen Lord. Therefore *Mark, the author of the oldest written gospel, removed the offense by introducing into his narrative sayings in which Jesus told his followers and people he dealt with not to disclose his true nature. The injunctions to silence in different sayings are therefore not historical reminiscences but an editorial device created by the evangelist. This means that Wrede's thesis is one of the earliest attempts to elucidate the process of redaction in the formation of the Gospels. *Matthew and *Luke have retained, though not consistently, the core of Mark's redactional scheme.

According to Wrede, the texts that have been arranged with the intention to portray Jesus as attempting to conceal his messiahship include the following: *exorcisms where Jesus silences the confessions pronounced by *demons (Mark 1.23–25, 34; 3.11–12), miraculous healings (1.43–45; 5.43; 7.36; 8.26), intentional retirement (7.24; 9.30–32), a command to keep silent addressed to a disciple (8.29–30), private teaching given to the *disciples (4.34; 7.18–23; 9.28–29; 9.31–32; 10.32–34; 13.3–37), and the saying about parabolic teaching (4.10–13). All these passages are interpreted in light of Mark 9.9: "He ordered them to tell no one about what they had seen, until the Son of Man had risen from the dead. So they kept the matter to themselves."

Since Wrede published his book it has become evident that the presentation of Jesus in the *synoptic Gospels is more complicated and cannot be explained by assuming a simple redactional pattern. In only one narrative, Peter's confession (Mark 8.29–30), does the injunction to silence refer explicitly to messiahship. On the other hand, there are numerous instances where the "messianic character" of a saying or an action is by no means being concealed: the feeding of the five thousand (Mark 6.32–44), the triumphal entry into Jerusalem (11.1–11), and, not least, the trial and condemnation of Jesus, when he was found guilty of claiming to be the king of the Jews (15.2, 9, 26; cf. 14.61). It can be said that in the public ministry of Jesus there is constant paradox of secrecy and revelation, of concealment and proclamation. Mark reports exorcisms where no command to keep silent is given (5.1–20; 7.24–30; 9.14–29).

The same paradox can be observed in narratives where miraculous healings are reported. In these cases the injunctions to silence, when given, have obviously nothing to do with a messianic secret. Not one of the healing *miracles performed publicly gives the impression that Jesus was the Messiah. When the blind Bartimaeus twice hails him as Son of David, it is not Jesus who silences him (Mark 10.47–49). When Jesus cured sick people, the injunction to secrecy was primarily a matter of privacy. The raising of Jairus's daughter shows the paradox inherent in one single narrative (5.35–43).

Teaching in *parables is another context where the motif of secrecy is apparent, yet in another modulation and without reference to messiahship. As used in Mark 4.1–13, the quotation from Isaiah 6.9 does not simply imply that Jesus' *parables were intended to conceal a mystery. What is meant is that parables were a way by which to test the serious intention of the listeners: "To those who have, more will be given; and from those who have not, even what they have will be taken away" (4.25; cf. 4.33–34). It is a question of response, which is essentially different from concealment as a literary device.

The paradox of secrecy and publicity appears also in Jesus' sayings about the *Son of man, as they are presented by Mark. The reference to Daniel 7 is clear, and in that text a heavenly figure corresponds to the suffering saints. In the sayings that were publicly pronounced, the enigmatic symbol of the Son of man stands for authority (e.g., Mark 2.10, 28; 8.38; 14.62). In the instruction given privately to the disciples, the Son of man and his followers are to face trials, suffering, and death on their way to the final kingdom (8.31–34; 9.12, 31; 10.33–34, 45; 13.24–27; cf. Dan. 7.25–27).

In the final analysis, the paradox of secrecy and publicity is inherent in different layers of reminiscences from the earthly life of Jesus, layers that precede the christological interpretation worked out by the early church. Jesus stands out as possessing more than human authority. His words and his actions are charged with a transcendent rather than a messianic significance. This is intimated in his private teaching, but he did not want it to be proclaimed (Mark 8.29–30; cf. 9.9). When unclean spirits and demons recognized him as more than human, they were silenced and defeated (3.11–12; 5.2–13). The motif of secrecy can thus be discerned in the synoptic Gospels in different variations, apparently more original in Mark, sublimated by continuing christological reflection in Matthew and Luke. The underlying prerequisite is the essential choice by those confronted with Jesus, between belief and unbelief.

HARALD RIESENFELD

Metaphors. The principal subject of the Bible is God in his relation to his world, his people, and humanity. But the God of the Bible is holy, transcendent, other, unlike anything in all creation. It follows, then, that language about God must be figurative, because it attempts to describe in terms of this world one who is totally different from this world.

We can speak about God and our relation to him, however, because he has revealed himself through his own words and deeds in the history recorded in the scriptures. All metaphoric language about God must be consonant with that self-revelation in order to be true.

God is known in the biblical account only in relationship. The five most frequent metaphors of his relationship with his people are king/subject, judge/litigant, husband/wife, father/child, and lord or master/servant. All are commissive metaphors, implying an obligation in the relationship described.

Yet every metaphoric term for God breaks its limits and transforms the way in which it is ordinarily understood. For example, when God is described as father, the term is filled with the meaning given it by God's self-revelation, and human fathers then become responsible for growing up into the measure of God's compassionate and loving fatherhood. In short, metaphors for God come to define the goal of human life, which is to conform to the image of God.

None of the metaphors for God are intended to be taken literally in their human sense, a fact sometimes overlooked. For example, God as father or husband is never literally male, nor does he exercise sexual functions. Similarly, the use of metaphoric language for God says nothing about the historicity of his deeds and words.

Many terms for God participate in metaphoric systems and undergo rich development in the scriptures. God as father is source of life, names, care, love, discipline, family unity, and an example to children; he feeds, clothes, gives *inheritance, legal rights, property, home, and a sense of belonging. Because such a metaphoric system is involved, God is never called mother in the Bible, though he exercises mother-like love and care for his children. Female terms for God are used in the Bible only in similes, pointing to one activity (see Feminism and the Bible). If they are interpreted as metaphors, the deity is then connected with the images of birth and suckling, and they erroneously result in the view of a goddess giving birth to all things and persons, who then participate in the divine being. The distinction that the Bible insists on between creator and creature is then lost.

Figures for God can have a high or low degree of correspondence with their referents. When God is described as like a bear, lion, leopard, moth, withering wind, devouring fire, eagle, or even dry rot, the correspondence is low, and such images are used for their shock or surprise value. More appropriate are the descriptions of God as rock, sun, living water, fortress, refuge; similarly, the descriptions of his actions in terms of those of a healer, potter, vintner, builder, farmer, tailor, shepherd, or warrior yield vivid pictures. Indeed, God is most often portrayed in anthropomorphic terms; this prevents his identification with some diffuse soul of nature, and it expresses the fact that he meets us person to person and demands from us the full depth of our personal devotion and love.

Some metaphors for God have lost their meaning because they have lost their context, such as the metaphor "*redeemer," which originally referred to a relative who bought back a family member from *slavery. The metaphor is recovered when the original context is recalled. Similarly, some figures become objectionable to some groups, for example, those of God as mighty warrior or as judge or, for feminists, as father or lord. But such metaphors are indispensable to the canonical witness to God and should be recovered by an explication of their full biblical content.

Human beings' relation to God is also described metaphorically because it deals with that which is evident only to the eyes of the faithful and must describe the unknown in terms of the known. Thus, God's faithful people are called in the Bible his adopted sons or children, his bride, kingdom of priests, holy nation, peculiar treasure, servants, jewels, witnesses, noble vine, pleasant planting, fruitful trees, and so on.

The church, in the New Testament, is called the new *Jerusalem, the bride of Christ, the true *circumcision, the Israel of God, the body of Christ, God's temple, building, field, his covenant people, new creation, or colony of heaven. Church members are pilgrims, aliens, exiles, strangers on the earth, slaves of righteousness or of Christ, heirs, fools for Christ, citizens of heaven, or ministers of reconciliation. Christ himself is their righteousness, sanctification, redemption, first fruits, covenant, temple, high priest, sacrifice, word, or wisdom and power of God. He is called priest after the order of *Melchizedek, man of heaven, *Son of God, servant, last *Adam, *Son of man, *Messiah, and Lord.

The life of faith is described in an almost limitless stock of pictures. It is soaring or being set in a broad place or on the heights. It is enjoying freedom, light, order, joy, life. It is being granted never-failing water and food, knowing shade and rest. It is experiencing the gift of a new heart and spirit.

On the other hand, the life of faithlessness is described as slavery to sin and death, and sinners are compared to rebels, disobedient sons, adulterous wives, whores, worms, backsliders, dead bones, waterless clouds, fruitless trees, wild waves, wandering stars, restless young camels, plunging horses, wild asses, rudderless ships, stubborn heifers, dogs, wilting grass, and choking tares. They are the old Adam, those of the flesh, cursed by God, and slaves to the principalities and powers of this present evil darkness.

Some metaphor systems permeate the Bible from beginning to end, for example, those connected with the *Exodus, or with the *Temple and sacrificial system, or the *law court. Other metaphors, such as those of light and darkness, are given expression by many different words (cf. morning star, dayspring on high), while others draw on the perennial relationships and rounds of family life, as well as birth and death.

Metaphors may change their meaning from one context to another. Thus, the *wilderness can be an expression of danger and judgment or of love and care; a yoke can be a figure of sin or of faithfulness. Meanings can be determined only by the context and by the intention of the author.

Other metaphorical forms, such as those of synecdoche, eponymy, metonomy, *parable, and allegory are frequent in the scriptures. The Bible is rich in figurative terms, of which we use only a very small portion.

See also Literature, The Bible as; Symbols.

ELIZABETH ACHTEMEIER

Methuselah. One of the long-lived ancestors before the *Flood. In the Sethite *genealogy in Genesis 5.21–27 (see also 1 Chron. 1.3; Luke 3.37), which lists one male for each of the ten generations from *Adam to *Noah, Methuselah is listed eighth, the son of *Enoch and the grandfather of Noah. Methuselah is the longest lived (969 years), but all ten live to remarkably high ages, as do the pre-Flood ancestors of Mesopotamian tradition. The name Methusaleh is very like Methushael, listed as Lamech's father and Enoch's great grandson in the similar genealogy in Genesis 4 (seven male ancestors from *Cain to Noah).

JO ANN HACKETT

Micah, The Book of.

The Author. Micah, a shortened form of Micaiah (which occurs in Jer. 26.18), means "Who is like Yah(weh)?" He was a person of whom we know practically nothing other than his place of origin, which was Moresheth (Mic. 1.1) or Moresheth-gath (1.18), a tiny village in the Judean foothills (Map 8:W5). (Mic. 1.8–16, doubtless Micah's own words, confirms the information in the title of the book supplied late by an editor at 1.1, since here he seems to be speaking of the small part of the world that he knew best.) From other internal evidence it is likely too that the other data of the opening title are valid, namely, that he spoke "in the days of Kings Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah of Judah." He was, in other words, a Judahite seer or prophet, roughly contemporary with the much better known *Isaiah.

Although Micah's comments on Judean society strongly parallel those of his presumed contemporary and supplement them to a large degree, there is a pronounced difference in tone between the prophecies of Isaiah and Micah. Micah's is the voice of the countryside, of one who has empirical knowledge of the result of the evil policies that Isaiah, an aristocrat of *Jerusalem, could only surmise, however much he wanted to empathize with the suffering of his compatriots. Micah was presumably from the common people, one who felt himself called on in that age of turmoil to speak in the name of Israel's God against evils that were no longer tolerable.

The Times. Although the book of Micah may contain much material that was added to or expanded on that of the original prophetic author, its nucleus goes back to Micah of Moresheth, who, in the latter part of the eighth century BCE, was protesting the internal dissolution of his country and of its religious and national nerve. His prophetic career may have begun about 725 BCE when it had become evident that the northern kingdom of *Israel—where prophecy had begun and which had always been the "elder sister" of the kingdom of *Judah to the south (Ezek. 23.1–3)—was now doomed to disappear into the outreaches of the voracious *Assyrian empire. Judah, by a combination of cynical statecraft, collaborationism, and religiously unacceptable compromise, would still be able to hold off the inevitable for a time; indeed, it outlasted the Assyrians only to become prey to their Neo-Babylonian successors. But this was done by the sacrifice of national and religious integrity, and in the end the result was the same, as Ezekiel (chap. 23) pointed out after the fact.

The Book. The book of Micah, as has already been suggested, begins with the work of an eighth-century BCE prophet whose words have been adapted to changed conditions, added to, and amplified in later generations. This process says nothing against the transmission of the biblical word but rather enhances its integrity. The biblical word, in the mind of those who preserved and developed biblical traditions, was not dead, said for one time, but a living word that could continue to inspire the faith community in which it had been engendered to further insights into the mind of God. Accordingly, the contents of the book of Micah can be outlined as follows:

1.1	A title from a later Judahite editor
1.2–7	A judgment on *Samaria: Micah's, but later edited into a universal judgment
1.8–16	Micah's lament over Judah of his day
2.1–5	Micah's particular condemnation of the exploiters
2.6–11	Micah's retort to the "naysayers" of prophecy
2.12–13	Vision of a "new Israel" inspired by Second Isaiah or Ezekiel
3.1–4	Micah's judgment against the rulers of Judah
3.5–8	Against the "prophets of peace" (cf. Jer. 6.14; 8.11)
3.9–12	The end of Jerusalem
4.1–4	The eschatological *Zion: a postexilic hymn (= Isa. 2.2–4)
4.5–8	Yahweh and the gods; probably a postexilic fantasy
4.9–11	An exilic or postexilic realization of Judah's fate in the Babylonian period
4.11–5.1	The siege of Jerusalem: *Sennacherib's in 701?
5.2–6	The ruler to come; possibly Micah's words
5.7–9	The restoration of the *remnant of Jacob; obviously exilic or postexilic
5.10–15	An oracle of judgment, probably Micah's
6.1–8	God's lawsuit against Israel, possibly Micah's
6.9–16	God's judgment on social injustice, especially of the northern kingdom; probably Micah's, at least substantively
7.1–7	Another condemnation of social justice, probably by Micah
7.8–10	Recovery of Zion; some postexilic prophet
7.11–20	Rebuilding of Zion and Zion's prayer; some prophet after 445 BCE.

BRUCE VAWTER, C.M.

Michael. One of the *archangels, whose name is a rhetorical question meaning "Who is like God?" (or, "Who is like El?"). In *apocalyptic literature he is Israel's patron angel (Dan. 12.1), who fights for Israel against the angels of other nations (Dan. 10.13, 21). As such later tradition identifies him as the nameless divine messenger called "the prince of the army of Yahweh" in Joshua 5.13–15 (cf. Exod. 23.23; note also the spiritual "Michael, Row the Boat Ashore"). Michael also becomes the surrogate of a now transcendent storm god, leading the heavenly armies in the fight against the forces of chaos, and thus is the adversary of *Satan (Rev. 12.7; Jude 9). The battle between them becomes a favorite artistic theme and may occur in variant form in the legend of George and the dragon (see Rev. 12.9).

MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Midian. The name of a tribal group that appears to have played a significant role in the premonarchic history of Israel. Very little is known of the Midianites, and even the location and extent of their homeland is a matter of scholarly debate. The only source of information about them is the Bible. No archaeological remains can yet be attributed to them, and, with the exception of references in the inscriptions of *Tiglath-pileser III and Sargon II to Ephah, one of the subtribes of Midian (referred to as a son of Midian, Gen 25.4), they do not appear in extrabiblical inscriptions.

The Midianites are generally portrayed in the Bible as seminomadic and *nomadic shepherds and traders. Their eponymous ancestor is said to have been the son of *Abraham and Keturah and to have been sent by Abraham to the east, along with his brothers (Gen. 25.1–6). In the narratives of Genesis, Numbers, Joshua, and Judges, groups of Midianites appear all across southern Palestine and Sinai, as well as in Transjordan. This is usually interpreted as an indication of the wide range of their regular migrations.

Although the Midianites are usually portrayed as enemies of Israel (see esp. Num. 22; 25.6–18; 31; and Judg. 6–8), Midian is presented in a more positive light in passages dealing with *Moses' sojourn with Jethro/Hobab, a priest of Midian and Moses' father-in-law (Exod. 2.15–3.1). The tradition that Moses received his revelation of Yahweh while living with the Midianites and the influential role that Jethro plays in Exodus 18 have led to speculation that the worship of Yahweh may have been adopted by Israel from the Midianites. Such speculations, however, cannot be confirmed.

The battle led by *Gideon against the Midianites in Judges 6–8 appears to have been the last time that Midian was a significant political threat to Israel. No conflicts are reported between the two in the monarchic period. Midian, however, continued to survive and play a role in the spice and gold trade from *Arabia. In Isaiah 60:6, an early postexilic poem, reference is made to Midianite and Ephaite caravans along the *Arabian trade routes. WAYNE T. PITARD Miktam. A Hebrew word of uncertain meaning used in the titles to six *Psalms (16; 56–60), all of which are attributed to *David and are approximately equal in length, but do not belong to the same genre. Like *maskil and other terms in the headings to the psalms, it is probably a musical or literary classification.

MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Miracles. A miracle is an extraordinary event, perceived to be the result of the direct, purposeful action of a god or the agent of a god. Miracles are a common feature of literature and religious tradition in every culture, from the simplest to the most sophisticated societies, and from earliest historical times to the present. The questions raised by the occurrence of an event that is understood to be a miracle are not only "What happened?" but also "What does it mean?" or more specifically, "What is the divine message imparted through this event?"

It is inappropriate to describe miracle as a violation of natural law, since most societies, including those represented in the Bible, believed in the direct action of God (or gods) in history. What happens in the world and in human experience is seen as the outworking of the divine will rather than an immutable law running its course. Even when among the *Stoics there arose the idea of natural law as a fixed, basic process by which the universe operated, allowance was still made for the direct action of the gods. Thus, for example, in the circumstances surrounding the accession to power of Julius Caesar or in the birth and attainment of the imperial authority by Augustus, contemporary accounts by Roman historians describe the miracles that accompanied these historical developments as an indication of the active interest of the gods in human affairs.

In the Hebrew Bible, several types of miracle are reported. Among these are confirmatory miracles, through which God shows his choice and support of certain individuals or groups. Examples are the direct visions of God that are granted to *Abraham, *Jacob, and especially *Moses. Thus, Abraham is given assurance by the appearance of the smoking fire pot and flaming torch that the *covenant with Yahweh will be fulfilled (Gen. 15.17–20). *Sarah's giving birth to *Isaac after years of infertility is a confirming sign that the covenant will be established (Gen. 18). Similarly, the burning bush confirms Moses' call by God to lead his people out of slavery in Egypt (Exod. 3). The confirmation of God's promise to the covenant people is given in their safe passage through the sea (Exod. 14) and in the provision of *manna and *water for them in the *Sinai desert (Exod. 16). Or again, the power of the God whom *Elijah serves is confirmed by the fire from Yahweh that consumes the altar and the offering upon it (1 Kings 18.38).

A second type of miracle is judgmental, as in the *plagues that befall the Egyptians until the release of the Israelites (Exod. 8–12) or the fall of the walls of *Jericho when its inhabitants resist Israel's entry into the *Promised Land (Josh. 6; cf. 24.11). Another type is the act of mercy, through which some basic human need is met, as in the healings performed by *Elisha (2 Kings 3–4).

Yet another type of miracle is the divine act of deliverance of individuals, as when *Daniel and his friends are preserved from the fiery furnace, from starvation, and from the lion's den (Dan. 1–6). Of a different sort are the miracles of divine vision, in which God and his purposes for his people are disclosed to certain persons, such as *Isaiah (Isa. 6), *Ezekiel (Ezek. 1) and Daniel (Dan. 7). In each case, the miracle is described as taking place in order to reveal God's purpose for his people, or to achieve some form of deliverance or punishment in behalf of individuals, of the Israelite nation, of her enemies, or of the minority who remain faithful to God.

In the New Testament, miracle is central to the earliest understanding of who Jesus is and his role in the inauguration of God's rule in the world. In the *Q source, for example, when *Jesus is asked by the followers of *John the Baptist to explain who he is, he replies by pointing to his miracles of healing as evidences of the fulfillment of the prophetic promises of benefits to the needy and the outcasts (Luke 7.18–23; Isa. 29.18–19; 35.5–6; 61.1). He also points to his *exorcisms as the major sign of the beginning of the defeat of the evil powers and the establishment of the *kingdom of God (Luke 11.20). Indeed, he refers to his own power to heal and to expel demons by the same phrase, "the finger of God," used of God's action in delivering Israel from Egypt (Exod. 8.19). There are miracle stories in the New Testament that directly parallel those in the Hebrew Bible. For example, the feeding of the five thousand (Mark 6.30–44; Matt. 14.13–21; Luke 9.10–17; John 6.1–13) shares details and overall aim with God's miraculous feeding of Israel in the desert. In both cases, a covenant people about to be reconstituted are taken out into a barren territory, where God meets their needs and where they are joined in covenant as his special people; this connection is made explicit in John's version of the story (John 6.31–33). The covenantal significance is underscored by the use within the feeding story of what become technical terms at the Last Supper: he took, he blessed, he broke, he gave (Mark 6.41; 14.22). In the gospel of John, the emphasis of the miracle stories falls on their symbolic significance, as in the story of the healing of the man born blind, who symbolizes the *blindness of traditional Jewish piety as to who Jesus is, and the light of understanding that faith brings (John 9). And the raising of Lazarus from the dead is, of course, the symbol of the triumph over death accomplished through Jesus (John 11.25–26). The symbolic significance of Jesus' miracles for John is made explicit in John 20.30–31, where the writer tells us that he has chosen to report these particular signs in order that readers might see Jesus as the anointed one (*Messiah) of God, through whom new life is given.

In Paul's letters, his encounter with the risen Lord (Gal. 1.15) and his being taken up into the presence of God (2 Cor. 12.1–4) resemble the miracles of revelation and confirmation in the Hebrew Bible. The ability to heal, to perform miracles, and to prophesy is seen by Paul as the gift that God grants through the Spirit (1 Cor. 12.8–11; Gal. 3.5). Paul's apostolic office is confirmed through "signs and wonders and mighty works" (2 Cor. 12.12). It is surprising, therefore, that Paul makes no reference to the miracles performed by Jesus, though the miracle of his *resurrection by God is central to Paul's gospel (1 Cor. 15.12–21).

Miracles of various kinds abound in *Acts. Foremost are the confirmatory type, as when the miraculous hearing of those speaking in tongues at the outpouring of the Spirit enables people from many lands to understand in spite of linguistic differences (Acts 2.1–11; see Glossolalia). The healing of the man at the Temple gate by Peter and John (Acts 3) is interpreted by their followers as God's attestation of the gospel (Acts 4.16, 22). Similarly, Philip's evangelization of the *Samaritans is confirmed through the many healings that accompany his preaching there (Acts 8.6, 13). And the gentile mission as a whole is acknowledged by the Jerusalem leaders to be of God, by virtue of the signs and wonders that accompanied the work of Paul and his associates (Acts 15.12; 19.11). At the same time, judgmental miracles are also depicted, as in the death of Ananias and Sapphira for their duplicity and failure to meet their obligations to the community (Acts 5.1–16). The deliverance of Paul and his associates from the shipwreck and the viper (Acts 27–28) shows God's care and concern for those doing his work, since by thus preserving Paul, he is enabled to reach with the gospel the center of the world, Rome itself.

Throughout the Bible, therefore, miracles are presented as a means by which God discloses and fulfills his purpose in the world, especially in behalf of his people and for the redemption of those who respond in faith to his activity in their behalf. HOWARD CLARK KEE

Miriam. Sister of *Moses and *Aaron. Miriam is presumably the sister who watches over Moses in the bulrushes in the story in Exodus (2.4, 7–8; see Num. 26.59). She is called a prophet in Exodus 15.20, when she leads the women dancing with tambourines after the victory at the Sea of Reeds (cf. Jephthah's daughter in Judg. 11.34). Then in Exodus 15.21 she is said to sing the first verse of the song just attributed to Moses (15.1–18). Since both Moses and Miriam are connected in the text to this "Song of the Sea," it has been speculated that the song was originally attributed to Miriam (cf. the Song of Hannah in 1 Sam. 2.1–10; the Song of Deborah in Judg. 5:1–30; and the reports of women singing victory songs in 1 Sam. 18:7; 21:11; 29:5; 2 Sam. 1:20). The process by which the name of a dominant figure like Moses could become attached to a piece of poetry and supplant the name of a less common figure like Miriam is more easily understood than the converse.

The other major biblical story about Miriam is her and Aaron's criticism of Moses' leadership in Numbers 12. They complain for two reasons, that Moses has married a "Cushite" woman and that Yahweh has spoken through them as well as through Moses (see Exod. 4.14–16; 15.20; Mic. 6.4). The story in fact serves to affirm Moses' position as leader (vv. 6–9). Yahweh is greatly angered by their complaints and punishes Miriam (but not Aaron, despite v. 11) for speaking against Moses. She is afflicted with a skin disease that turns her skin white. Aaron asks Moses to intercede with Yahweh on her behalf, and when he does she is healed after spending seven days outside the camp (see the reference to this story in Deut. 24.9 and cf. Lev. 13–14). The reference to a father spitting in his daughter's face and the seven-day period of purification (v. 14) is obscure. If *Cush in this story is meant to refer to Ethiopia, as it often does in the Bible, then Miriam's white-as-snow skin is an ironic punishment for a complaint that would have included her objection to Moses' taking an African wife. More likely Cush here refers to *Midian (see Cushan in Hab. 3.7) and Moses' marriage to the Midianite woman Zipporah (Exod. 2.11–22) is the source of the criticism, although the reference could still also have suggested the dark skin color of Ethiopians in contrast to Miriam's disease.

Miriam died while the Israelites were at Kadesh, and she was buried there (Num. 20.1). She was remembered in Micah 6.4 as one of the leaders of the *Exodus along with Moses and Aaron.

JO ANN HACKETT

Mishnah. A law code brought to closure ca. 200 CE, the Mishnah is the first document of rabbinic Judaism. Its material is arranged by topic rather than by names of authorities; this system suggests that through order, through the reordering of Israelite life, Israel attains that sanctification which inheres in its very being. The Mishnah is presented in six divisions, embracing sixty-three tractates and 531 chapters, and it encompasses six broad topics.

Agriculture (Zeraʿim). The primary interest of the Mishnah regarding farming encompasses the ways in which farmers should do their work in accord with the rules of sanctification contained within the *Torah. Sanctification involved observing the rules of classification, that is, not mixing diverse seeds, substances, or species.

Appointed Times (Moʿed). The second division of the Mishnah deals generally with holy days in the *Temple and local village. The basic principle is that what is permitted in one place is forbidden in the other.

Women (Našim). The third division concerns the sanctification of the family, with special reference to the holiness of the relationship between *women and men. The basic interest is in those points in a woman's life when she passes from the domain of one man, ordinarily the father, to that of another, the husband.

Damages (Neziqin). The fourth division of the Mishnah deals with political questions: first, institutions of government, and second, resolving questions of conflict, aggression, and property rights so as to preserve the stability of an economy of perfection. Objects have a fixed and intrinsic value, and in commerce that intrinsic worth must govern exchange so that no one will gain more or less.

Holy Things and Purities. The fifth division (Qodašim) deals with sacrifices that are offered regularly, every day, as distinct from those that are prepared on special occasions, for appointed times. The sixth division (Ṭoharot) concerns purity and impurity. Both relate to the Temple and its cult, though the purview of the purity laws is the home as much as the Temple. The sixth deals with three matters: sources of uncleanness, objects and substances that are susceptible to uncleanness, and modes of purification from uncleanness. Sources of contamination, listed mainly in Leviticus 11–15, break the natural balance and order of creation. Also subject to the rules of cultic uncleanness are utensils used in the home, as well as food and drink. Tractates on what is affected by uncleanness are Kelim, for utensils, Ṭoharot and ʿUqṣin for food and drink; tractates on modes of purification are Para, on making the purification water mentioned in Numbers 19, and Miqwaʾot, on purification water.

See also Interpretation, History of, article on Jewish Interpretation; Purity, Ritual; Talmud.

JACOB NEUSNER

Moab. A nation whose affiliation with Israel may have been the closest of all her neighbors. This is indicated by the affinity of the Moabite language and writing tradition to *Hebrew; by *David's ancestry from the Moabite *Ruth and his sending his parents for sanctuary in Moab (1 Sam. 22.3–5); by the legend of Moab's birth through the incestuous union of *Lot and his elder daughter (Gen. 19.30–37); and by religious affinities to Yahwism portrayed in the *Moabite Stone.

Moab (Map 1:Y5–6) lay along the east side of the Dead Sea. North Moab, including the plains of Moab opposite *Jericho (Num. 22.1; 33.48–49), covered an area from just north of the top of the sea to the Arnon 40 km (25 mi) south, which is mostly well-watered tableland, 600–850 mi (2000–2800 ft) above mean sea level; here lay Heshbon, the peaks of *Nebo and Pisgah, Medeba, Beth-meon, Ataroth, and Dibon. South ("true") Moab, from the Arnon to the Zered, the boundary with *Edom, is tableland 300 m (1000 ft) higher and more marginal agriculturally. A text of Pharaoh Ramesses II (early thirteenth century BCE) designates this region by the name Moab. Topographic survey, which at first seemed to display an occupation gap from roughly 2000 to 1300 BCE, has more recently contributed evidence of settlement throughout the second millennium, even in the south. Probably Moab was first a tribal society, then a monarchy.

Relations between Moab and Israel are complex and difficult to discern from the record—whether enmity or amity. The issue is bound up with whether north Moab was under Moabite control. Thus, Numbers 21 depicts the *Amorite king Sihon as having displaced Moab from north of the Arnon and makes Sihon, not Moab, Israel's foe. The Balak/*Balaam story in Numbers 22–24, on the other hand, portrays enmity and puts the action in north Moab. Deuteronomic tradition condemns Moab for inhospitality to Israel during the Transjordanian trek (Deut. 23.34; Judg. 11.17), but asserts that Yahweh granted Moab its (southern?) territory, so Israel is not to harass Moab (Deut. 2.9). Judges 3.12–30 pictures enmity, showing Moab in possession of the north with a foothold at Jericho ("city of palms"); Judges 11, on the other hand, implies amity with Moab (11.24–27).

*Saul reportedly defeated Moab (1 Sam. 14.47–48), but it is David who subjugated it, militarily and by vassal treaty (2 Sam. 8.2). The next explicit information comes from the *Moabite Stone about 830 BCE, where Mesha, king of Moab at Dibon, asserts he liberated north Moab from the control of the Israelite northern kingdom's Omri Dynasty, dispossessing the "men of Gad" during *Ahab's reign or more probably at Ahab's death about 850 BCE (2 Kings 1.1; 3.4–8). Mesha's inscription implies that Omri had regained this control; had Moab escaped subjugation sometime between Solomon and Omri? The accounts in 2 Kings 3 (Jehoram of Israel) and 2 Chronicles 20 (Jehoshaphat of Judah) contribute contemporary episodes of conflict with Moab, further suggesting struggle for independence at the end of the Omri dynasty. And 2 Kings 10.32–33 places Hazael of Damascus in north Moab in this period; perhaps Moab gained freedom from Israel only to lose it to Syria.

Moab came under loose *Assyrian control, probably through vassal treaty, around 732 BCE. In the mid-seventh century, it functioned as loyal vassal by quelling Arab rebellion against Assyria. Moab appears as *Nebuchadrezzar's client (2 Kings 24.2), helping put down Jehoiakim's revolt around 600 BCE. This period of subservience to the great powers is the setting for Amos 2.1–3, Isaiah 15–16, and Jeremiah 48 (cf. Num. 21.27–30), which link Moab to Yahweh's international dominion. These oracles judge Moab, lament over it, and convey to it divine promises. After the Babylonian conquest of the region, Moab disappears from available records, though the *Ezra-*Nehemiah campaign against mixture with foreigners suggests that Moab still designates a people in the late fourth century BCE (Ezra 9.1–2; Neh. 13.23). EDWARD F. CAMPBELL

Moabite Stone. A stele 1.1 m (3½ ft) high, .6–.68 m (2–2¼ ft) wide, containing thirty-four lines of text celebrating the deeds of Mesha, the Moabite king of the mid-ninth century BCE (2 Kings 3.4–5). Controversy followed its discovery in 1868 at Dhiban (biblical Dibon) in Jordan by F. A. Klein, one result of which was its reduction to fragments by Bedouin involved in its sale. While it was still intact, Charles Clermont-Ganneau had a rough impression made, with the aid of which the thirty-nine recovered fragments were pieced together and placed in the Louvre. About seven hundred of some thousand original letters are preserved.

The inscription, dating about 830 BCE, represents most of what is known of the Moabite language. The writing tradition closely resembles that of the earliest *Hebrew inscriptions, while grammar and vocabulary are also close congeners of Hebrew. In the text, Mesha portrays himself recovering northern *Moab from the successors of the Israelite king Omri. Mesha celebrates his public works in Dibon, his capital, and in its subdivision Qarhoh. He boasts of construction in Aroer, Medeba, and other Moabite towns. The final broken lines hint that he regained territory in the south, toward *Edom.

Striking is the account of Mesha's relationship to Moab's national deity Chemosh, to whom the stele dedicates a *high place in Qarhoh. Chemosh's anger with Mesha's predecessor(s) had brought on Omri's oppression of Moab; with Mesha, Chemosh's favor returns, triumph comes over all opposition, and campaigns to regain territory are commanded by the deity. Cultic equipment of Yahweh, seized in war, is presented to Chemosh. All Israelite inhabitants of Ataroth and *Nebo are "devoted"—slain for divine satisfaction (see Ban). In other instances, however, Mesha uses Israelite captives as builders (alternative reading: makes treaty relations with Israelite survivors). Clearly, the Moabite stone throws remarkable light on biblical language, history, and practices.

EDWARD F. CAMPBELL

Monarchy. See Kingship and Monarchy.

Money. As a medium of exchange, originally precious metals were used, according to fixed *weights, such as the talent, the mina, and the shekel, which later became units of currency (see below). (In the NRSV, the Hebrew word for "silver" is often translated as "money," even when the context makes such an interpretation anachronistic [e.g., Gen. 17.12–13; 42.25; 1 Kings 21.2].) Minted coinage seems to have begun in Asia Minor by the seventh century BCE, and its use was spread rapidly by the Greeks and the Persians. The oldest coins found in Palestine are a Macedonian coin from *Shechem and an Athenian coin from *Jerusalem, both dated to the sixth century BCE. By the fifth century BCE coins appear more frequently in occupational strata and are commonplace by the fourth. Coins thus become a valuable means of dating for archaeologists. They are also indices of international trade patterns and political control and provide valuable data about scripts and artistic motifs.

Units of currency in biblical and nonbiblical sources and coins found in the course of excavations are generally foreign, mainly Persian, Greek, Tyrian, and Roman, although in some periods there seem to have been local mints, in places such as Gaza and Ashkelon in the Persian period. During several relatively brief periods, however, distinctive regional coinage was produced.

In the fourth century BCE, while Judah was a province of the Persian empire, a series of coins with the inscription "Judah" (yehud) in *Aramaic script were produced, apparently in Jerusalem; some also give the title and occasionally the name of the Persian-appointed governor. These are apparently the first Jewish coins. Distinctive coins were also minted by the Hasmoneans, beginning with Alexander Janneus in the late second century BCE. *Herod the Great and his successors also issued their own coins, as did some of the Roman procurators, including *Pilate.

During the First Jewish Revolt (66–70 CE), the rebels issued their own currency, an obvious expression of political independence. These coins, in denominations of shekels and half-shekels, are made of silver and are dated from the first to the fifth years of the revolt. Their inscriptions are in Hebrew, another expression of nationalistic sentiment, and include such phrases as "Jerusalem the holy," "the freedom of Zion," and "the redemption of Zion." The coins have such symbols as a chalice, a triple pomegranate, and palm and other branches; the absence of human and animal figures is clearly deliberate, in observance of the commandment prohibiting *graven images, and is in marked contrast with Greek and Roman coinage. Similar coins were issued during the Second Jewish Revolt (132–135 CE), some of which name the leader of the insurgents, Simeon (Simon Bar Kochba). In poignant contrast to these numismatically expressed patriotic hopes are the Roman coins issues by Vespasian and Titus to commemorate their defeat of the First Revolt; some show a mourning figure and have the inscription "Judea captured" in Greek or in Latin.

The coins named in the Bible are listed below; over the centuries, the values of various denominations fluctuated, so that the figures given are only a sample.

as (AV: "farthing"; NRSV: "penny"): Made of bronze, the as (earlier assarius) = 4 quadrans; found only in Matthew 10.29 = Luke 12.6.

daric (AV: "dram"): The standard Persian gold coin, equivalent to a Greek stater, first issued by and named after *Darius I (Ezra 8.27; 1 Chron. 29.7). NRSV also uses daric in Ezra 2.69 and Nehemiah 7.69–71 for a slightly different Hebrew word that some translate as drachma. Its use in 1 Chronicles is an anachronism.

denarius (AV: "penny"): Made of silver, the denarius was approximately a day's pay for an unskilled laborer; its value was 16 as = ¼ tetradrachma = 1/100 mina (Matt 18.28; 20.2; 22.19 par.; Mark 6.37; 14.5; Luke 10.35; Rev. 6.6).

didrachma: A coin worth two drachmas, equated by the *Septuagint with the Hebrew shekel. In Matthew 17.24–27, it apparently means the half-shekel used to pay the Temple tax and is equated with the stater.

drachma: The standard Greek silver coin, equivalent to the Roman denarius, and likewise equivalent to a day's pay (see Tob. 5.15). In the New Testament it is mentioned only in Luke 15.8–9. Larger denominations of the drachma were the didrachma (2 drachmas) and the tetradrachma (4 drachmas).

lepton (AV: "mite"; NRSV: "coin, penny"): The smallest unit of currency in the New Testament, the lepton was originally Greek; in the Roman period it had the value of ½ quadrans (Mark 12.42 par.; Luke 12.59).

mina (Grk. mna; AV: "pound"): As a weight, the equivalent of 50 shekels. As a coin, a mina is the equivalent of 100 drachmas, used in Nehemiah 7.71–72, and in Luke's version of the parable of the talents (Luke 19.11–27).

qesitah (NRSV: "money"): occurring only in Genesis 33.19; Joshua 24.32; Job 42.11, this is probably a weight of unknown value rather than a coin as such.

quadrans (AV: "farthing"; NRSV: "penny"): ¼ as; Matthew 5.26; Mark 12.42.

shekel: The basic unit of weight in Hebrew (from the verb šql, "to weigh"); its monetary value was 1 stater; 30 shekels = 1 mina = 4 denarii.

stater: The equivalent of 4 drachmas (tetradrachma), found only in Matthew 17.27.

talent: The largest weight, equivalent to 3,600 shekels; as a monetary unit it equalled 6,000 drachmas.

See also Money Changers; Weights and Measures.

MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Money Changers. Mentioned only in the account of Jesus' attack on merchants in the *Temple, which according to the *synoptic Gospels took place shortly before his arrest (Matt. 21.12–13 par.) but is set by John at the beginning of Jesus' ministry (John 2.14–22). According to Exodus 30.11–16, every adult male Israelite was to pay half a shekel annually to the sanctuary (see also Neh. 10.32; Matt. 17.24–27). In the period of the Second Temple this tax was paid at *Passover; to assist pilgrims to Jerusalem, money changers apparently functioned within the large open area known as the "Court of Gentiles" (see Map 9) or in the porticoes that framed the Temple enclosure, converting to the proper payment different currencies or those that were religiously offensive because of portraits on coins (see Money). Although rabbinic sources provide some evidence for complaints about profiteering by the money changers, who charged as much as eight percent for their service, the reaction of Jesus seems exaggerated, especially in its fullest form in Mark 11.15–19. It is furthermore unlikely that one person could control all activity within the vast Temple courtyard; the Gospel narratives, written after the destruction of the Temple in 70 CE, are making a theological point about Jesus, depicting him as a prophet in the tradition of Jeremiah and Isaiah, both of whom are quoted directly (see also Zech 14.21).

MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Monotheism. Discussion of monotheism in the ancient world sometimes blurs the distinction between theology and religion. In non-Western settings, religion is a complex of behaviors that mark a culture. Theology, however, involves cohesive ideological speculation to justify behaviors. A single religion can have many competing or complementary theologies.

Scholars have traditionally taken a theological and prescriptive approach to the issue of Israelite monotheism: monotheism is the conviction that only one god exists, and no others. This conviction is, however, difficult to document.

Ancient Near Eastern Background. Egyptian, Mesopotamian, Hittite, Greek, and early Canaanite myths all present developed pantheons. These texts relate how one generation of gods succeeds the next just as humans succeed one another; this succession entails war among the gods. In Mesopotamia, the creation of the universe results from this conflict. Mesopotamian, Hittite, and Canaanite myths relate how the storm god defeats the sea god (in Egypt, the battle is essentially between the *Nile and the desert): a god responsible for life-giving water wins control of the cosmos. The focus in all of these myths is the succession of a patriarchal high god's royal son.

These pantheons all have a high god, under whose direction other gods—of the sun, of pestilence, and so forth—act, often independently. The high god is usually the state god. In some cases, the subordinate gods in the state pantheon represent local high gods, of areas in an empire. Thus different states may share essentially identical pantheons but identify different high gods: in Mesopotamia, the *Babylonian high god was Marduk; the *Assyrian high god was Ashur. *Sennacherib had the Babylonian creation epic rewritten to award Marduk's role in it to Ashur.

Yet state myths did not reflect the subjective experience of a worshiper in a god's cult. Mesopotamian literature is filled with pleas to gods and goddesses, such as Ishtar of Arbela, Ishtar of Nineveh, Shamash (the sun god), and Addu (biblical Hadad). In prayer, the god being addressed is the sole object of devotion.

Scholars refer to this phenomenon as effective henotheism, devotion to one god conceding the potency of others. This principle was elevated to state policy in *Egypt under Akhnaton (ca. 1350 BCE), the pharaoh who channeled resources into the cult of the solar disk at a cost to competing cults. A similar attempt to impose a god atop a state pantheon, under the sixth-century BCE Babylonian king Nabonidus, exhibits the same characteristics, with statues of all the other gods being brought to Babylon, possibly for the New Year. Nabonidus's attempt, like Akhnaton's, proved abortive.

These failures, however, show that the line between monotheism and polytheism should not be too precisely drawn. Akhnaton and Nabonidus, the two great religious reformers of Near Eastern antiquity, focused the cult on their respective gods. Not dissimilar are the monotheistic traditions of Judaism, Christianity, and Islam: all admit the existence of subordinate divinities—*saints, *angels, *demons, and, in Christianity and Islam, *Satan, the eternal antagonist of the high god. But if these traditions are not monotheistic, no religion (as opposed to theology) is. The term monotheism loses its meaning.

Monotheism, Yehezkel Kaufmann observed, postulates multiple deities, subordinated to the one; it tolerates myths of primordial struggle for cosmic supremacy. Two elements distinguish it from polytheism: a conviction that the one controls the pantheon, and the idea of false gods.

Ancient Israel and Its Immediate Neighbors. From the outset, Israelites identified themselves as "the people of YHWH" (Judg. 5.13). The expression implies a societal commitment to a single, national god. Israelite personal *names offer confirmation: these include either the name of a god or a divine epithet. Almost uniformly, the god in Israelite personal names is YHWH or an epithet of YHWH, such as "god" (ʾēl), "lord" (baʿal), or "(divine) kinsman" (ʿamm).

This practice resembles that of the Transjordanian nations of *Ammon, *Moab, and *Edom, Israel's nearest neighbors and, in the folklore of Genesis 12–25, closest relations. Conversely, in Canaanite and Phoenician city-states, personal names include the names and epithets of a variety of gods and goddesses. The ethnic nations that emerged in Canaan in the thirteenth–twelfth centuries BCE, unlike the states of Syria and Mesopotamia, are early tied to national gods.

None of these cultures, however, denied the existence of divinities other than the high god. The ninth-century *Moabite Stone, though treating the national god, Chemosh, as Israel treated YHWH, nevertheless mentions sacrifice to a subordinate of his. An eighth-century inscription from Deir ʿAllā, in the Israelite-Ammonite border area, mentions a pantheon, or group of gods, called Shaddayin. Similarly, many biblical texts, from the twelfth century down to the Babylonian *exile, describe the divine court over which YHWH presides as the council of the gods: these report to and suggest strategy to YHWH, praise YHWH, and are assessed by YHWH (Deut. 32.43b [with 4QDeut^{a}]; 1 Kings 22.19–23; Isa. 6; Pss. 29.1–2; 82.1, 6; Job 1.6–2.10). In monarchic theologies, the subordinate gods administered other nations for YHWH (Deut. 32.8–9 [LXX]; Mic. 4.5; 1 Sam. 26.19). But they also received Israelite homage—the sun, moon, and host of heaven, the stars who fought as YHWH's army against Canaan (Deut. 33.2–3; Josh. 5.13–14; cf. 10.12–13; Judg. 5.20; 1 Kings 19.19–23): the host was YHWH's astral army, and YHWH was regularly represented through solar imagery.

The astral gods—the host of heaven—figure prominently in early sources. The meaning of YHWH's name has long been in dispute. However, the name associated with the *ark of the covenant, and prevalent throughout the era of the monarchy, is YHWH Seba'ot ("Lord of Hosts"). On the most common interpretation of the name YHWH, this means, "He [who] summons the hosts [of heaven] into being." If so, the full name of Israel's god in the Pentateuch's Yahwistic source (*J), YHWH Elohim, means, "He [who] summons the gods into being." And before the revelation of the name YHWH to Moses, the Priestly (*P) source calls the high god El Shadday: originally, this, too, associated YHWH with sky gods, Shaddayin, known from the Deir ʿAllā inscription. (See Names of God in the Hebrew Bible.)

The Israelite cult also embraced the ancestors. Israelites invoked the ancestors for aid in matters familial, agricultural, and political. The ancestral spirits could intervene with YHWH, to the benefit of the family, the landholding corporation that inherited its resources from the fathers. (See Israel, Religion of.)

The Emergence of Monotheism. Starting apparently in the ninth century BCE, Israelites began to distinguish YHWH starkly from other gods. It is unknown whether the distinction originated from the opposition between YHWH and foreign high gods or between YHWH and local ancestral gods. Still, the alienation of the local gods from YHWH ensued, as subordinate gods were identified as foreign.

Our first indications of the cleavage come from a ninth-century nativist revolution against the house of Omri, the ruling dynasty of the northern kingdom of Israel. *Solomon had earlier constructed a *Temple in *Jerusalem. This Temple incorporated representations of *cherubim (1 Kings 6.23–29) and, judging from later developments, probably of YHWH's *asherah, or consort, Ashtoret (*Astarte). Opposite the Temple, Solomon also consecrated shrines to YHWH's subordinates—Ashtoret, Milkom, and Chemosh (1 Kings 11.7; 2 Kings 23.13–14). After seceding from Jerusalem under Jeroboam I, the kingdom of *Israel had maintained a more conservative separation of state shrines from the capital. *Ahab, however, installed a new temple in *Samaria (1 Kings 16.32); in the Near East, a temple in the capital signified a divine grant of dynasty. Jehu's revolt, however, destroyed the temple and reaffirmed Jeroboam's cultic policy (2 Kings 10.18–29; cf. Hos. 1.4). (See Kingship and Monarchy.)

The earliest biblical writer to contrast YHWH with his subordinate deities is *Hosea. This eighth-century prophet rejects calling YHWH Israel's "baal" (lord) and claims that attention to the "baals" (YHWH's subordinate gods) deflects attention from the deity responsible for their ministrations (see especially Hos. 2). The alienation of the subordinates (who in the traditional theology administer other nations for YHWH) from YHWH, who administers Israel, permits Hosea to identify pursuit of the "baals" with foreign political alliances. Intellectually, the same alienation was part of a critique of traditional culture leveled by the "classical," that is, the literary, *prophets.

In the eighth century, Israel enjoyed a trading network embracing the Assyrian empire in western Asia and Phoenician trade outposts around the Mediterranean. As a bridge on the spice trade route to the south, and as a producer of cash crops such as olives and grapes, Israel underwent incipient industrialization, developing capital reserves. Foreign goods, texts, and practices became increasingly familiar to a growing middle class. In reaction, the elite was impelled to define distinctively Israelite values and culture. Groping for its identity, the elite discovered the gap between the elite theology, in which YHWH was completely sovereign, and popular practice, with its devotions to subordinate deities and ancestors; between theology, in which repentance was increasingly individuated, and ritual repentance, a matter of behavior, not attitude; between theology, in which one worshiped an unseen god, and a cult employing icons. The critique by the literary prophets thus predicated that the symbol or manifestation—the icon, the ritual, the subordinate god—was alien from, and not to be mistaken for, the Reality—the high god, or one's own inner essence. (See Graven Image.)

Ahaz of Judah first implemented this critique, removing plastic imagery from the Temple nave (2 Kings 16.17). In preparation for the Assyrian invasion of 701, his successor *Hezekiah concentrated the Judahite population in fortified towns; his ideologians articulated attacks on the *high places, the centers of traditional rural worship, and on the ancestral cult, linked to the agricultural areas he planned to abandon to the aggressor (Isa. 28). Assyria then deported most of the population outside of Jerusalem; Hezekiah's spokesmen took this as YHWH's judgment on the rural cult, which they interpreted to be identical with the cult of the northern kingdom (Isa. 1–5)—Samaria had fallen prey to total deportation in 720. Jerusalem's survival, by contrast, represented YHWH's imprimatur on the state cult.

Some scholars hypothesize that Israelite monotheism was husbanded by a small, "Yahweh-alone" party until the time of Hezekiah or even *Josiah. However, no text indicates such a doctrine before Josiah's reign, and the chief indices suggest its gradual development rather than some perpetual keeping of a flame. Solomon's high places, for example, survived Hezekiah's reform, although the "Mosaic" snake-icon, Nehushtan, did not (Num. 21. 5–9; 2 Kings 18.4). Child sacrifice continued in the Jerusalem *Topheth—an activity directed toward the host of heaven (Jer. 19.13). Personal seals continued to include astronomical imagery, though this was increasingly astral rather than solar as earlier.

In the seventh century, however, Josiah destroyed Solomon's shrines to gods now identified as foreign and dismantled state shrines in the countryside. Josiah's campaign against the ancestral cult included tomb desecration and the exposure of bones for the first time in Israelite history. A term previously reserved for the ancestors, *Rephaim, was now applied to the Canaanite aborigines allegedly proscribed by YHWH. Deuteronomy, the legal program of Josiah's court or of a later extension of it, enjoined the worship of YHWH alone. Deuteronomy, Jeremiah, and Zephaniah explicitly identified the host of heaven as foreign, as objects of apostasy. The Priestly source of the Pentateuch rewrote the traditional ancestral lore, suppressing all references to superhuman agencies other than YHWH; it forbids any imagery in the cult—correspondingly, seals are increasingly aniconic.

Sennacherib's deportations and the processes of industrialization and cash cropping had destroyed the effectiveness of the old kinship groups among whom the traditional religion, with its multiple divinities, was rooted. The imposition of state dogma of exclusive loyalty to the state god reflects the state's ambition to deal directly with the individual, bypassing the centers of resistance, the lineages. Thus, Deuteronomy 13.6–11 instructs the Israelite to inform on brothers, children, or wives who worship other gods, such as the host of heaven.

In this period, not in the exile as earlier scholars claimed, the notion of reliance on a single god took root. That idea survived, as a doctrine distinguishing Israel from other, polytheistic nations, through the exile and over the course of the restoration. Some of the elite, such as Second Isaiah, accepted the implications of philosophical monotheism, identifying YHWH as the source of evil as well as good (Isa. 45.7). Yet even in sources that accept the activity of subordinate deities, such as Job 1–2, the concept of exclusive loyalty to the state god had taken hold. Affirmation of the cult of the one god—the ultimate cause of events—could persist despite the assumption that other divinities existed, too. The doctrine of a *Trinity, or of angels in heaven, or of a devil, coexisted happily with the idea in Judaism, Christianity, and Islam of an enlightened community distinguished from others by its monotheism. BARUCH HALPERN

Mormonism and the Bible. Objecting to views of the Torah as a closed world, Martin Buber wrote, "To you God is One who created once and not again; but to us God is he who 'renews the work of creation every day.' To you God is One who revealed Himself once and no more; but to us He speaks out of the burning thornbush of the present." Buber's passion parallels a quintessential dimension of Mormon thought: a deep respect for biblical revelation supporting an even-higher regard for ongoing revelation.

Mormonism came into being through a man (Joseph Smith, 1805–1844) and a culture (antebellum upstate New York) that shared a profound reverence for the Bible. This reverence was thus genetically part of the movement and has not greatly dissipated in the rapidly expanding tradition even at present. Among other things, this means that Mormons have fundamental allegiances in common with many other Christians and also with Jews. Mormons tend to take what they interpret as the Bible's essential truths for granted. They are enjoined to study the testaments regularly and, excepting errors of transmission and translation, consider them to be inspired, in some sense "the word of God." Their interpretation of the Bible informs their worship, their personal and social ethics, their polity, their theology, and their overall self-consciousness.

It was in fact Joseph Smith's attachment to the Bible that led him to seek God directly during the religious confusion of his youth. This search resulted, Mormons believe, in a vision of God and Jesus (1820) and the organization of a new (or a "restored") religious tradition: The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (1830). This church and its belief system would be incomprehensible without its biblically inspired basis.

Despite this enduring biblical foundation, Mormon attitudes are distinct from those of other biblically based faiths. Most centrally, Mormonism rejects the notion of a closed canon. With what he described as divine guidance, Joseph Smith translated and published (1830) the abridged records of ancient Israelites who had escaped the Babylonian captivity by traveling to the Americas around 600 BCE, spawning a civilization that flourished until about 400 CE. This record, known as the Book of Mormon (after its ancient prophet-editor), was itself scripture and was inextricably entwined with the traditional Bible: at once challenging the Bible's uniqueness and yet witnessing to the Bible's authority, echoing its themes, interpreting its passages, sharing its content, correcting its errors, filling its gaps, adopting its language, and restoring its methods, namely, the prophetic process itself.

Many of Smith's later revelations—saturated with biblical themes, phrases, and figures—were also subsequently canonized (The Doctrine and Covenants; The Pearl of Great Price). This precedent of expanding the canon quickly broadened to belief in an open-ended canon. One basic Mormon tenet is that divine-human contact is an ongoing process not subject to closure at an arbitrary point by any human council: "We believe all that God has revealed, all that he does now reveal, and we believe that He will yet reveal many great and important things."

It is, however, not simply an open canon that distinguishes Mormon biblical usage. Joseph Smith's understanding of the very nature of scripture was expansive. For instance, Smith did not believe that "scripture," despite its etymology, need necessarily be written to be true and authoritative. Thus, said one of his revelations, "Whatsoever [those who hold the priesthood] shall speak when moved upon by the Holy Ghost shall be scripture, shall be the will of the Lord, shall be the mind of the Lord, shall be the word of the Lord, shall be the voice of the Lord, and the power of God unto salvation." The idea of oral scripture contrasts with contemporary Christian practice but bears historical comparison with the treatment of sacred materials in other world religions.

Moreover, scripture for Smith was not the static, final, untouchable word of God that it was for many believers of his time. The Mormon prophet considered scripture to be sacred yet provisional, subject to refinement and addition, as both the evolving texts of his own revelations and the progressive stages of his inspired revision of the Bible (never published in his lifetime) demonstrate. For Mormons, the record of God's actions with humankind is to be highly prized, but this record is necessarily subordinate to direct experience with God—the lifespring of such records—and therefore subject to expansion, clarification, and correction. Mormon leaders further observe that not all of holy writ applies beyond the local and temporal context for which it was formulated.

Since Mormonism is not fond of creeds, Mormon perceptions of scripture are not monolithic. Many Latter-day Saints, for example, assume complete theological harmony within the Bible and between the Bible and other Mormon scriptures. Others champion the priority of modern revelation when apparent conflicts surface or attribute discrepancies to corruptions in the received biblical text. Still others give broad leeway to the human element in both ancient and contemporary revelation. Brigham Young (1801–1877) dismissed parts of the Bible as "baby stories" while remaining loyal to the biblical tradition in general. Joseph Smith, emboldened by his prophetic consciousness, solved various contradictions within the Bible and between his revelations and the biblical text by rewriting portions of the Bible. In the modern context, historical-critical studies of scripture have inspired a predominantly cool, antagonistic, or even oblivious reaction in Mormonism as a whole, particularly where those studies are controlled by naturalistic assumptions. Yet the attitudes of influential leaders and lay members toward serious biblical scholarship have been as divergent as those of any denomination, ranging from enthusiastic to scandalized.

Since the time of Joseph Smith, the Mormon use of scripture has combined a traditional faith in the Bible with more "conservative" elements (like an extra dose of literalism), some liberal components (such as Joseph Smith's insistence, anticipating the thought of Horace Bushnell, on the radical limits of human language), and some radical ingredients (an open canon, an oral scripture, the subjugation of biblical assertions to experiential truth or the pronouncements of living authorities). All of this links the Saints with other religious traditions yet separates them too. Mormons in the modern world remain Bible-believing Christians but with a difference.

PHILIP L. BARLOW

Moses. As primary leader of the Israelites in their *Exodus from *Egypt and during their wanderings in the *wilderness, and as mediator of the *Law, Moses dominates the biblical traditions from *Exodus through *Deuteronomy. In fact, Exodus–Deuteronomy appears to have been edited as a biography of Moses, reporting his birth at the beginning and his death at the end. Between these events the Bible relates many episodes about his life and work.

Born in secret during the oppression in Egypt as the younger of the two sons of a *Levite couple, Amram and Jochebed (Exod. 6.18–20), Moses was hidden away for a time to avoid slaughter at the hands of the Egyptians and then placed in a basket amid the reeds of the *Nile. Discovered by a daughter of Pharaoh who had pity on the child, he was spared and, through the intervention of his older sister (*Miriam: Exod. 15.20; Num. 26.59), was nursed by his own mother. Raised by Pharaoh's daughter as her son, the child received the name Moses (Hebr.

mōšeh, understood as a participle of the verb māšâ, "to draw out"; the name actually appears to be a form of the Egyptian verb msw, "to be born," or the noun mesu, "child, son," appearing in such names as Thut-mose and Ah-mose; Exod. 2.1–10). When grown up, Moses killed an Egyptian whom he saw beating a Hebrew and, when word of his deed spread, he fled the country to save his life (Exod. 2.11–15a). Taking refuge in *Midian (2.15b–21), he married Zipporah, the daughter of a Midianite priest who is variously referred to as Reuel (2.18), Jethro (3.1; 4.18; 18.1), or Hobab (Num. 10.29; Judg. 4.11). While in Midian, she bore him two sons, Gershom and Eliezer (Exod. 2.22; 4.20; 18.3–4).

While Moses was tending his father-in-law's flocks near *Horeb, the mountain of God, God revealed himself in a burning bush and commissioned him to return to Egypt and, with the help of *Aaron, to lead the *Hebrews out of the land of oppression (Exod. 3.1–4.17). Moses returned to Egypt (4.18–31), and he and Aaron produced signs and nine *plagues to persuade Pharaoh to allow the Hebrews to depart Egypt, either to go on a three-day journey into the wilderness to offer sacrifice to God (3.18; 5.1; 7.16; 8.28; 10.7–11, 24–26) or to leave the land for good (6.10–11). The signs and plagues failed to convince Pharaoh, who repeatedly gave and withdrew his permission to leave (5.1–10.29). With the tenth plague, the slaughter of the firstborn, Pharaoh and his people urged the Hebrews to leave (11.1–12.36).

Moses and the people departed (Exod. 12.37–14.4) only to be pursued by Pharaoh, whose army was drowned in the returning waters of the *Red Sea after the waters had parted for the Israelites to cross (14.5–15.21).

During their long stay in the wilderness and on their journey to the *Promised Land (Exod. 12.22–Deut. 34.8), Moses endured the people's recurrent murmuring and complaining. He aided in securing good drinking water (Exod. 15.22–26; 17.1–7; see Num. 20.2–11), oversaw the receipt of quails and *manna (Exod. 16.1–36; see Num. 11.4–5, 31–35), directed their war with the *Amalekites (Exod. 17.8–16), and, at the suggestion of his father-in-law, established judges to hear and adjudicate the people's disputes (18.1–27; see Num. 11.16–30).

At *Sinai (Exod. 19), Moses committed the people (19.3–8) to observe the commandments of God (20.1–23.33), communicated to him during a forty-day stay on the mountain (24.18) and then addressed to the people (24.3) and subsequently written down by either Moses (24.4) or God (24.12). He received instructions for constructing the *tabernacle and its accoutrements (25.1–31.17). The first tablets of the Law presented to Moses (31.18) were smashed by him (32.19) when he returned to the camp to discover that Aaron had supervised the construction of a *golden calf around which the people were celebrating (32.1–35). Moses intervened with God not to destroy the people (33.1–22), and God (34.1) or Moses (34.27–28) again wrote the words of the commandments (34.17–26) during a second forty-day period (34.28), which were again proclaimed to the people (34.29–35). Moses then supervised the construction and erection of the tabernacle (35.1–40.38), received further laws and instructions (Lev. 1–7, 11–27), and consecrated the tabernacle and ordained Aaron and his sons as *priests (Lev. 8–10).

After staying at Sinai for eleven months (Exod. 19.1; Num. 1.1), a census was taken of the non-Levitical males above the military age of twenty, totaling 603,550 (Num. 1.2–54), the Levites one month and older, totaling 22,000 (3.14–39; see 4.1–49), and the firstborn males one month and older, totaling 22,273 (3.40–43). After receiving further commandments from God (2.1–34; 5.1–6.27; 8.1–26; 19.9–14; 10.1–10), consecrating the Levites (3.5–13; 4.46–49), supervising receipt and employment of the leaders' special offerings (7.1–89), Moses and the people observed the *Passover (9.1–8) and departed from Sinai on the twentieth day of the second month of the second year after leaving Egypt (10.11–36).

For the next thirty-nine years, Moses led the people in their journeys (see the itinerary in Num. 33.1–49) in the wilderness. Kadesh (-barnea), an oasis in the northern Sinai desert (Map 2:T2), and its vicinity are the scene of many of the episodes reported in Numbers 11.1–20.21. During this period the people continued their murmuring and complaining (11.1–6; 14.1–4; 20.2–5), were fed with manna and quails (11.4–35), and were supplied with water (20.2–13). Moses was confronted with complaints about his wife (whether Zipporah or not remains uncertain) by Miriam and Aaron (12.1–16) and with a rebellion led by Korah and his associates (16.1–17.13). Spies were sent out to make a reconnaissance of *Canaan but returned with a discouraging report about the strength of the inhabitants (13.1–14.38). A belated attempt to invade the region from the south, apparently without Moses' approval, led to disaster (14.39–45). During these episodes, Moses and Aaron received further ordinances from God to be communicated to the people (15.1–41; 18.1–19.22). After the death and burial of Miriam at Kadesh (20.1), Moses sent messengers to the king of *Edom to request permission to pass through his country but was refused (20.14–21).

The last phase of Moses' life (thirty-eight years, according to Deut. 2.14) was concerned with the movement of the people into and their conquest of Transjordan. Journeying from Kadesh, they defeated the king of Arad (Num. 20.22; 21.1–3) and came to Mount Hor, where Aaron died (20.23–29). Leaving Mount Hor, Moses led the people southward to bypass the land of Edom (21.4). When God sent fiery serpents against the people because of their impatience, Moses constructed a bronze serpent as an instrument of healing (21.4–9). The people eventually arrived in the territory north of the land of *Moab, where they defeated kings Sihon of the *Amorites and Og of Bashan (21.10–35). While the Israelites encamped near the *Jordan across from *Jericho, King Balak of Moab hired *Balaam to curse Israel (22.1–24.25). After a plague ravaged the people because of their worship of the Baal of Peor (25.1–18), Moses ordered a census, which counted 601,730 males above the age of twenty fit for the military (26.1–51). After the census, Moses received instructions from God about dividing the land (26.52–65), about women's inheritance rights (27.1–11; see 36.1–12), the designation of Joshua as his successor (27.12–23), a calendar of sacrifices (28.1–29.40), and women's vows (30.1–16). A battle against the Midianites provided the occasion for divine instructions about the division of battle spoils (31.1–54). Moses allotted the captured territory in Transjordan to the *tribes of *Reuben and *Gad and half of *Manasseh (32.1–42) and transmitted divine instructions about dividing the land west of the Jordan (34.1–29) and setting aside cities for the Levites (35.1–8) and *cities of refuge for those guilty of accidental homicide (35.9–34).

On the eve of his death, the first day of the eleventh month of the fortieth year after the Exodus (Deut. 1.3), Moses delivered a series of farewell addresses to the people, expounding again the *Law and its requirements for living in the land (1.6–4.40; 5.1–29.1; 29.2–30.20), offering a personal adieu (32.1–6), a song (31.30–32.43), and blessings on the tribes (33.1–29). With Joshua properly commissioned as his successor (31.7–8, 14–15, 23), and having inscribed his song (31.16–29) and written and given directions for the reading and safekeeping of the book of the Law (31.9–13, 24–29), at the command of God (32.48–52; see Num. 17.12–23) Moses went up Mount *Nebo, viewed the Promised Land, and died at the age of 120 years, full of life and vigor. He was buried by the Lord, "but no one knows his burial place to this day" (34.1–8). God did not allow Moses to enter the land he viewed, either because of his own failure to provide proper recognition of God (Num. 20.10–13; 27.12–14; Deut. 32.48–52) or because of the sins of the people (Deut. 1.37–38; 3.18–28).

Any critical attempt to assess the historicity of the portrait of Moses presented in Exodus to Deuteronomy must take into account a number of characteristics of this literature and its presentation. First, many of the stories are legendary in character and are built on folktale motifs found in various cultures. The theme of the threatened child who eventually becomes a great figure, for example, was employed from Mesopotamia to Rome and appears in the stories about Sargon the Great, Heracles, Oedipus, Romulus and Remus, *Cyrus, and *Jesus. Second, Israel's theology located the giving of the Law and the formation of the national life outside the land it occupied and thus considered the wilderness period as its constitutional time. Hence, laws and institutions from diverse times and conditions are located in this formative era. Third, the duplications in the texts and the frequent lack of cohesion in the narratives and of consistency in details indicate that the material is composite and multilayered. Fourth, the lack of external frames of reference makes it impossible to connect any of the events depicted about Moses with the history of other cultures. The Egyptian Pharaoh of the oppression, for example, goes unnamed and no contemporary nonbiblical sources mention Moses. Finally, Moses is depicted as the archetype of several offices. Throughout he is representative not only of the good leader but also of the ideal judge and legal administrator, intercessor, cult founder, and *prophet. In all of these he excelled and thus served as the standard by which others were judged.

In biblical literature outside the *Pentateuch, Moses is most often mentioned in the phrases "the book of Moses," "the law of Moses," and "the book of the law of Moses," indicating the development of the concept of the *Torah as such and of its special authority and Mosaic authorship, themes that will become central for subsequent Jewish tradition. The same implication of the special scriptural authority of the first five books of the Bible, the books of Moses, is found in the New Testament, where there are repeated appeals to what Moses said (Matt. 8.4; 19.7; 22.24; Mark 7.10; John 7.22; Rom. 10.5) as well as to the "law of Moses" and the "book of Moses."

Postbiblical tradition elaborated on Moses' biography from his birth to his death in such texts as the Testament of Moses and in haggadic literature. Details of these embellishments are also found in the New Testament in the reference to *Jannes and Jambres (2 Tim. 3.8) and in the account of the dispute between *Michael and the devil over Moses' body (Jude 9; cf. also Acts 7.22).

These haggadic legends were also known to such Hellenistic Jewish writers as *Philo and *Josephus, who added to them the Hellenistic concept of the ideal man, so that the details of Moses' life reveal him to be the consummate human being and as such the appropriate founder of the theocratic state. This may be the background for the parallels drawn in the gospel of Matthew between the lives of Moses and Jesus. Yet for Matthew, as for the author of the letter to the Hebrews, Jesus is superior: Moses' presence at the transfiguration confirms Jesus' sonship (Matt. 17.1–8), and that sonship is clearly superior to Moses' status as God's servant (Heb. 3.1–6; cf. Num. 12.7; Deut. 34.5; Josh. 1.2; Ps. 105.26; Mal. 4.4).

The artistic tradition of depicting Moses with horns on his forehead arose from the understanding by some ancient translators of the Hebrew verb qāran (Exod. 34.29) as related to the noun qeren, "horn"; an alternative is to understand the verb as meaning "to shine" (so NRSV, and most earlier English translations).

JOHN H. HAYES

Mourning. *Death was the supreme cause for grief, and around this ultimate tragic event elaborate mourning customs and practices arose that were more or less mandatory (see 1 Kings 14.13; Jer. 16.4–6). Mourning for those who had died involved all who were immediately affected by their demise, whether family (Gen 23.2), friends (2 Sam. 1.11–12; John 11.33), or an entire nation (1 Sam 25.1; 1 Macc. 9.21).

Mourning began immediately upon death and in the presence of the body (Gen. 23.2; 2 Sam. 3.31; Mark 5.38). Expressions of grief continued along the way to the grave (Luke 7.12), at the burial place (John 11.31), and for some time after burial. The length of the period of mourning depended on prevailing customs—seven days (1 Sam. 31.13), thirty days (Num. 20.29), as many as seventy days (Gen. 50.3), or even longer (Jth. 8.4–6).

Feelings of grief were rarely suppressed. Mourners frequently vented their grief publicly in piercing, tremulous shrieks, shrill cries, wails, chants, loud lamentations, breast-beating, and tears (Gen 50.10; 2 Sam. 3.32–34; Mark 5.38). Personal adornments were removed, clothing was torn, the body was neglected, sackcloth was put on, and ashes were poured on the head (Gen. 37.34; Lev. 10.6; 2 Sam 1.2; 14.2; Jth. 8.4–6). It was customary to hire professional mourners to heighten this display of grief; usually these mourners were women who sang or wailed laments especially composed for the occasion or ones that were standard (2 Chron. 35.25; Jer. 9.17–20; Matt. 9.24). The funerary poems that have been preserved give some idea of the general form of such laments: they included a eulogy that was careful to name the deceased; a recounting of what had caused the person's death; and a word of consolation that focused not on the hope that the deceased lived beyond the grave but on the good name left behind by the deceased and the posterity to perpetuate that name (2 Sam. 1.18–27; 3.33–34; cf. Ezek. 19.1–14; 32.2–16; Rev. 18.9–24).

Musical instruments, principally the flute, were used to accompany the wailing of the mourners as they chanted their dirges (Jer. 48.36; Matt. 9.23). Occasionally, fasting was employed as a means of displaying grief (1 Sam. 31.11–13; Jth. 8.6). Some evidence exists, however, of a funeral feast designed to comfort the bereaved (Jer. 16.5–7).

Certain mourning customs were forbidden in Israel, such as lacerating the body and shaving the head (Lev. 19.28; Deut. 14.1; Jer. 16.6; but see Ezra 9.3; Job 1.20; Jer. 7.29). Such practices may have originated out of fear of the dead, that they might haunt the living to harm them if their funeral rites were not properly performed, but no such explanation is found in the Bible. Very ancient funeral customs remain, and are described, but they are interpreted only as signs of sorrow.

In the New Testament, funeral practices are more subdued, in part because of the eschatological hope of life beyond the grave by virtue of the *resurrection of Christ. Yet there is no denial of death nor any attempt to suppress feelings of grief (John 11.25–35). Christians are asked to weep with those who weep (Rom. 12.15), but they are not to sorrow as those who have not hope (1 Thess. 4.13): death has been conquered (1 Cor. 15.54–57; Heb. 2.14–15), and death and mourning will have no part in the new heavens and the new earth (Rev. 7.17; 21.4).

There are other causes for mourning recorded in the Bible besides death—personal calamities, such as those experienced by Job (Job 1.13–20; 2.11–13), national disasters such as drought (Jer. 14.1–2; Joel 1.13), even impending disasters (Esther 3.13–4.3) and the threat of divine judgment (Jer. 4.5–8). Lamentations for such experiences were often identical in form with those practiced because of death (Exod. 33.4; 2 Sam. 15.32; 2 Kings 19.1–14; Ps. 35.13; Joel 1.8, 13; 2.13). On occasion, mourners also expressed their grief by sitting or lying on the ground (Judg. 20.26; 2 Sam. 12.16; Job 1.20), placing their hands over their mouths (Ps. 39.9), bowing or covering their heads (Lam. 2.10; Esther 6.12), or walking barefoot (2 Sam 15.30). Such actions and the laments that accompanied them were not simply the expected response to pain or disappointment; they were also a way of showing submission to God's will (Job 1.20–21) and contrition before him (Jer. 9.17–19; Joel 2.12–18; Jon. 3.5–10).

See also Afterlife and Immortality; Burial Customs. GERALD F. HAWTHORNE

Murder. The biblical concept of the image of God lay at the heart of abhorrence to the taking of a human life. However the idea of a divine image was understood—physical likeness, self-transcendence, capacity to communicate, authoritative rule—it implied that one dare not destroy another person who bore God's image. The story of the first murder, *Cain's slaying of his brother Abel, insists that spilt *blood cries out to the creator, who acts to ensure vindication but not at the expense of compassion (Gen. 4.8–16). This tension between revenge and mercy produced responses to murder that lack consistency precisely because they take mitigating circumstances into consideration.

The *Ten Commandments prohibit murder categorically (Exod. 20.13; Deut. 5.17) and without exception. Nevertheless, in Israel's day-to-day existence distinctions were made, and killing was held to be justified in at least two situations, warfare and execution for capital offenses. The first of these was fortified by the conviction that Israelites engaged in holy wars, with Yahweh as their commander-in-chief. In these circumstances compassion had no place, particularly when the enemy was placed under ḥērem (the *ban). *Saul's sparing of the *Amalekite king Agag, whatever its motive, was deemed an act of disobedience, and the prophet *Samuel carried out Yahweh's execution of Agag (1 Sam. 15.33). Israel's recorders of sacred history did not balk at depicting Yahweh as sanctioning, even ordering, such action. *Elijah's slaughter of competing prophets raised no objections that were rooted in the Ten Commandments (1 Kings 18.40). The same leniency occurs with respect to cases of capital punishment. In fact, the blessing of *Noah actually contains a stipulation that murderers are to be executed (Gen. 9.6).

The practical implementing of this sentence resulted in elaborate rituals and numerous distinctions. Premeditated violence differed from an act in the heat of anger or from accidental injury. From early times an institution, the *avenger of blood (gō'ēl), assured vindication within each family. The next of kin assumed responsibility for avenging a death, and society sanctioned this means of obtaining revenge for grievous wrong. In time, ransom of the guilty person's life introduced the principle of monetary compensation for the loss.

In cases of accidental homicide, provision was made for the establishment of *cities of refuge, thus enabling society to combine revenge and mercy (Num. 35.9–34). Persons who accidentally caused a death or who killed another person in a fit of anger could flee to a city of refuge and, after satisfactorily convincing officials that asylum was appropriate, entered the city and remained there until the high priest's death; thereafter the individual could return home without harm. Of course, these institutions of a redeemer and of cities of refuge sometimes failed, for not everyone respected the laws governing both.

In cases in which a murder occurred but the murderer was not known, the nearest town had a special ritual by which the people were exonerated of collective guilt (Deut. 21.1–9). The problem of adjudicating responsibility for murder was no simple matter. If an owner of a dangerous ox had been warned because of its habitual goring but failed to keep the ox under control so that it killed someone, the owner was held responsible for the death (Exod 21.29). Similarly, if two persons fought and one was injured but was later able to get up and walk around, the offender could go free even though death occurred a short time later (Exod. 21.18). Owners of *slaves were not culpable if they beat them to death, provided that a day or so lapsed between beating and death (Exod. 21.20–21). Moreover, a person who killed a thief in the night was not held responsible for the action (Exod. 22.2).

The older institution of blood revenge gradually disappeared. By Ezra's time officials of the state handled such matters. The Romans seem to have restricted Jewish authority in case of capital punishment, and by insisting that the murderer had to be warned immediately before the crime, the rabbis made it virtually impossible to take human life. Jesus broadened the prohibition of murder to include anger (Matt. 5.21–22).

JAMES L. CRENSHAW

Music and Musical Instruments. The most significant survival of the music of biblical times is its lyrical material. The Bible gives no indication of the actual melodies used in ancient times by singers for the rendition of the lyrical and only random reference to the range and character of music, musical instruments, and musical patterns. In the Hebrew Bible, however, there are a variety of musical expressions during the monarchic period and a treasure house of hymns after the exile, and the New Testament contains several examples of hymns as well.

The musical tradition of Israel began in the premonarchic period. Israel's *ancestors are depicted as seminomads, traveling long distances within their territorial boundaries in search of grazing land and watering places for their herds of sheep and goats. The Song of the Well (Num. 21.17–18), for example, reveals their constant search for water, and disputes over territory are reflected in their war songs, ranging from shouts associated with the banner (Exod. 17.16) and with the *ark (Num. 10.35–36) to the skillfully composed Song of *Deborah (Judg. 5); note also the reference to the lost "Book of Wars of the Lord" mentioned in Numbers 21.14–15, where a few lines are quoted. The purpose of the brief war shouts was to enable members of a tribe to identify themselves with their own group, and that of the Song of Lamech (Gen. 4.23–24) to incite them to execute the law of blood vengeance. In the case of *Miriam's brief song of triumph (Exod. 15.21) the biblical author reports that women in her entourage danced and beat their tambourines. This suggests a sharp, strident, staccato rendering of brief war refrains. In the case of longer war odes it seems likely that they had a more elaborate instrumental setting, and, as Genesis 4.21 suggests, such instruments as harps and pipes were used from an early time. In fact the reference in Genesis 4.21 to Jubal as the "father of all who play" these instruments is particularly important for its implication of organized guilds of professional musicians in the premonarchic period.

The centralization of the monarchy brought about changes in Israel's social, economic, and cultural life. Court musicians were remembered for their participation in such functions as coronations, weddings, funerals, and banquets; note, for example, 2 Samuel 19.35. The coronation of a king was a joyous occasion: a trumpet's blast gave the signal for the crowd's acclamation (2 Kings 1.34), and the noise of pipes and trumpets was so great that "the earth quaked" (1 Kings 1.40). For celebrations of his enthronement, musicians sang odes of praise for his just rule and victory over the nation's enemies (1 Sam. 18.7; Pss. 2; 21; 72; 110). They also sang laments for slain warriors (2. Sam. 1.19–27). Court musicians performed at royal weddings (Ps. 45; Amos 6.4–6). The summoning of *David to the court to calm *Saul's violent temper by playing the lyre (1 Sam. 16.14–23; 18.10; 19.9) was an exceptional command performance. By the time of *Hezekiah's reign, court singers and instrumentalists had been so widely acclaimed that they had the unfortunate honor of being included among the royal treasures taken from the palace of *Jerusalem by *Sennacherib to his capital at *Nineveh (701 BCE).

During the monarchic period the second important center for the development of Hebrew music was the *Temple at Jerusalem. Familiar in this connection are the stories of how David brought the ark to Jerusalem in a religious procession with dancing, shouts of joy, and the sound of the ram's horn (2 Sam. 6.12–19) and how *Solomon dedicated the sanctuary in which it was housed (1 Kings 8; 2 Chron. 5.2–14). Although the music of the Temple was undoubtedly not as elaborate in Solomonic times as the later, postexilic Chronicler imagined, it is likely that the king had a major role in organizing the musical elements of the service. The blowing of the silver trumpets both summoned the congregation to the Temple and indicated the times for the offering of *sacrifice (Num. 1.1–3, 10; Ps. 98.6). To the accompaniment of stringed instruments (Ps. 98.5) the priestly choir sang hymns, which were probably the familiar ones of praise (Pss. 145–150), petition (Pss. 44; 74; 79; 80; 83), and thanksgiving (Pss. 30; 66; 106–108).

Hymns were composed according to the metrical scheme of traditional Hebrew *poetry: that is, in couplets of two lines having an accentual rhythm of three or four beats to each line and exhibiting a "parallelism of members," whether synonymous, antithetical, or progressive (step-parallelism). A much-used variation of this metrical scheme is the extension of the three-beat line by two beats, which gives the structural unit a limping or elegiac character. The 3:3 accentual pattern of a single structural unit whose lines express an idea in synonymous parallelism may be illustrated by the passage:

> The heavens are telling the glory of God, > and the firmament proclaims his handiwork.
> [Ps. 19.1]

In Psalm 150 the lyricist lists many, but not all, instruments used by musicians: among the strings, the lyre (kinnôr) and the harp with ten strings (nēbel); among the wind instruments, the ram's horn (šōpār) and the flute (ʿûgāb), but not the metal trumpet (ḥăṣōṣĕrâ) and the double oboe (ḥālîl); and among the percussion instruments, the tambourine (tōp) and cymbals (ṣelṣĕlîm), but not the sistrum (mĕnaʿanʿîm).

*Prophecy and the prophetic movement give us two interesting sidelights on the development of music that occurred apart from the king's patronage: first, on the association of religion and music, and second, on the use of secular music. In the early years of the monarchy, guilds of prophets found that the playing of such instruments as harps, lyres, tambourines, and flutes induced a trancelike state during which individuals were seized by God's spirit and prophesied ecstatically (1 Sam. 10.5–7, 11–13; 2 Kings 3.14–20); in the later period none of the prophets whose oracles are recorded is known to have used music for this purpose. This did not deter them from using effectively metrical forms of lyrics for their pronouncements. Amos, for example, used the qînâ meter of professional musicians for his lament over the imminent destruction of Israel:

> Fállen no móre to ríse > is maíden Ísrael;
> fórsaken ón her lánd > with nóne to upraíse her.
> [Amos 5.2]

These later prophets also allude to secular music of urban and rural communities: songs associated with agricultural life (Isa. 9.3; 16.10; Jer. 25.30), *wedding songs (Jer. 7.34) and songs for feasts that were accompanied by such instruments as harps, lyres, tambourines, and flutes (Isa. 23.16). An example of a harvest song is Isaiah's famous Song of the Vineyard (Isa. 5.1–4).

We hear next of the development of music two centuries after the destruction of the Temple, the fall of the monarchy, and the taking captive of its leaders to *Babylon. In the Persian period, exiles returning to Jerusalem were given permission to rebuild the Temple and organize their corporate life under the leadership of the high *priest. It is natural, therefore, that the Temple and the Law became the two foci of Jewish existence. For the development of music during this period the two outstanding sources are the books of *Chronicles and *Psalms, the latter sometimes called the "hymn book of the Second Temple."

According to these two sources it seems that from the fourth century BCE on music became an even more important feature of worship at the Temple than in the earlier period. Vocal and instrumental music was performed by guilds of professional musicians who associated themselves by descent with Heman, Asaph, and Jeduthan (and Korah), and thus ultimately with *Levi, and claimed that they had been commissioned by David himself (1 Chron. 6.16–32). They apparently collected psalms (e.g., Pss. 73–82, attributed to Asaph) and added musical and liturgical notations, some of which are obscure, like, for example, the term *selah, which probably indicates a pause in the singing of a psalm for a brief instrumental interlude. Titles to the psalms were also added to indicate how the lyrics were to be performed and used. Some psalms were to be sung with the accompaniment of stringed instruments (Ps. 4) or flutes (Ps. 5); others sung to known tunes (e.g., "The Deer of the Dawn," Ps. 22); and still others for religious occasions (for pilgrimages, Pss. 120–134; for the dedication of the Temple, Ps. 30; for the *Sabbath, Ps. 92). So well established is the relation of Temple worship and music that the psalmists associated the act of coming to the place of God's presence with that of making "a joyful noise to him with songs of praise" (Ps. 95.2) and of "making melody to him with tambourine and lyre" (Ps. 149.3).

The development of music and its use in early Christianity can be reconstructed only tentatively from materials in the New Testament, which, in comparison with those of the Hebrew Bible, cover a very short span of time and are so closely associated with the purposes of Christian missionary activity that they contain little information about the subject. In general, it seems that the music of early Christians, like that of the *synagogue, was entirely vocal (Mark 14.26; Acts 16.25) and consisted of psalms (1 Cor. 14.26; cf. the frequent quotations from the Psalter in the New Testament) and of their own lyrics, especially those to be used for baptismal and eucharistic rites.

Examples of Christian lyrics appear to represent three types of hymnody that originated in the churches of Palestine or of the Greek world beyond Palestinian borders. For the first, we have five hymnic passages that probably came from the Jewish Christian churches, having been translated into Greek from *Aramaic and exhibiting the characteristics of biblical psalmody. Two are preserved in the infancy narrative of Luke (1.46–55; 2.29–32; cf. 1.68–79, probably sung at one time by disciples of *John the Baptist). Three in the book of Revelation are a song of thanksgiving (Rev. 5.3–4), a song in praise of the slain *Lamb (Rev. 5.9–10), and hymnic material in Revelation 19.1–7, which used responses of "*Hallelujah" and "*Amen" and is about the marriage of the Lamb. The last two were probably used during the eucharistic rite.

From the churches of the Greek world there are no examples in New Testament literature of a hymn using the quantitative metric form of the Greeks, but there is hymnic material that seems to reflect mixed forms developed from the fusion of biblical and Hellenistic elements. An example that may have been translated from Aramaic but departs slightly from Jewish tradition is the fragment of a confessional hymn preserved in 1 Timothy 3.16. Here the structure is still biblical, as probably was the music, but the parallelism is that of Hellenistic rhetorical construction.

The third type of hymn is found in lyrics in praise of Christ as Lord (Phil. 2.6–11), as the image of God (Col. 1.15–20), and as the eternal *Logos (John 1.1–18). These hymns seem to be even more remote from Jewish psalmody, for they are characterized by the absence of parallelism, the brevity and equality of the lines, and the stanza-form. These hymns come from the Christian community in its formative years.

See also Music and the Bible.

LUCETTA MOWRY

Music and the Bible. This entry focuses on the use of the Bible in sacred and secular Western music. For music in biblical times, see Music and Musical Instruments.

The Bible has been used in Western music for several purposes: (1) At worship Christians and Jews frequently sing biblical passages in psalms or hymns. (2) Biblical material in liturgy is also accompanied and, in effect, interpreted by music. (3) The Bible is present in music intended not for worship but for the opera house or concert hall.

Liturgy. Both Judaism and Christianity have used biblical texts for liturgical purposes. The *Psalms were composed for ritual singing, as some of the superscriptions show: "To the Choirmaster" (NRSV: "To the leader"; Pss. 18–22; etc.) probably designates a collection of songs and also suggests organized liturgical music. Exodus 15.1–18 is a psalm concluding the narrative of the *Passover celebration. Early Christians sang "psalms and hymns and spiritual songs" (Eph. 5.19), doubtless psalms in translation and Christian hymnody, such as the Magnificat and Benedictus (Luke 1.46–55, 68–79) or musical outbursts like Revelation 11.17–18; 19.1–2, 5, 6–8.

Though Judaism and Christianity generated other texts for liturgical singing, biblical language had great importance. Not all of the canon of the Mass is derived from the Bible (e.g., Kyrie eleison and Credo), but the opening lines of the Gloria are from Luke 2.14, and the Agnus Dei augments *John the Baptist's remark in John 1.29.

We know very little about the music of late antiquity. Ambrose (Bishop of Milan, 374–397 CE) introduced antiphonal singing of psalms and hymns, and the Ambrosian liturgy strongly influenced liturgical practice in France and Spain. The great figure of medieval liturgical music was Pope Gregory I (590–604 CE), who had chants collected and assigned to liturgical occasions, bringing liturgical music into a systematic whole (hence "Gregorian" chant). Music was understood as the servant of faith; it was not intended to interpret the text. Thus, melismatic embellishments on certain syllables in the chant, far from calling attention to important religious concepts in the text, fell mostly on unstressed syllables. Music, expected to dispose the mind to truth and open the heart to pious feelings, was subordinate to words. Thus, though the psalms refer to instruments, and secular music freely used them, Christian liturgy was purely vocal until the thirteenth-century revival of the organ to accompany singing. The organ, known from Hellenistic times, had been used earlier for ecclesiastical processions, and organs were known in some European churches well before the thirteenth century.

When polyphony (Greek, "many voices") replaced the older monophony ("single voice") with more complex musical textures, around 1000 CE, greater freedom to interpret the text words became possible. Sounding several musical lines simultaneously, polyphony enlarged the expressive potential of the music and became the distinctive mark of European music. It was performed in monasteries, where the monks were trained to sing, or by choirs in churches. Congregations were not expected to sing polyphony, and its introduction made the congregation in most cases the silent partner in worship.

Early polyphony consisted of one to three voices weaving faster-moving melodic lines above a slower voice holding (Lat. tenere, hence "tenor") a Gregorian chant melody. In the thirteenth-century polyphony of the Notre Dame school, the quick rhythms of upper voices above the long notes of the chant produce emotional depth in the psalm text. The effect is not interpretation of the words but a more emotional aspect to the experience. Polyphonic music became even less accessible to ordinary people, and the Reformation aimed to revive congregational hymn-singing. Lutheran chorales and Reformed hymns and psalms continued to be polyphonic, in that voices sang different notes at the same time, but the melody was sung by one voice (originally the tenor), with other voices in chordal accompaniment. Interpretive scope was limited.

Since the Reformation, the liturgical settings of biblical words have been mainly hymns and anthems, the former sung by congregations, the latter by choirs. Hymn melodies are conventionally sung by the soprano, not the tenor, with the other voices accompanying in chords. Many hymns have been metrical paraphrases of psalms (some Protestant, especially Calvinist, groups would sing nothing but psalms). Metrical psalms were often stilted in wording, with the meter taking precedence over clarity of sense. They usually used standardized metrical patterns in order to fit more than one tune. Some perennially favorite hymns are psalm paraphrases. For example, "Our God, our help in ages past" derives from Psalm 90, and "A mighty fortress is our God," for which Martin Luther wrote both words and melody, is a paraphrase of Psalm 46. Tunes might be written for the words, but frequently secular melodies were employed. When a melody has become traditionally associated with certain words, the melody itself is enough to recall the words to those trained in the tradition. The hymn tune "St. Anne" brings immediately to Protestant minds "Our God, our help in ages past," and the association arouses emotional resonance in the hearers.

Since the eighteenth century, congregational singing has usually been accompanied by organs, sometimes by other instruments, though a few sects refuse instruments altogether. Pianos may appear in less formal settings. In the latter twentieth century, many churches have introduced even into major liturgical occasions unison hymns accompanied by a guitar instead of an organ. Increasingly, such hymns are contemporary religious verse and not paraphrases of the Bible.

Musical Interpretation. With polyphony came more complex interpretation in the musical settings of the Bible. Voices accompanying the chant melody (cantus firmus, "fixed song") of the polyphonic motet might sing different, even secular, words. In a thirteenth-century motet on Haec dies quam fecit Dominus ("This is the day that the Lord has made," Ps. 118.24), from a gradual for Easter Sunday, the middle voice sings of the Virgin Mary as bringer of grace, the upper one a plaintive love song about "fair Marion." Easter suggested Christ's grace mediated by the Virgin, and springtime justified a declaration of love for "fair Marion," whose name echoes Mary. Simultaneous different texts might seem confused cacophony, but they lent a symbolic and interpretive depth to the "day that the Lord has made."

Understanding such a work depended on conventional frames of reference. Those who knew the Easter reference of Haec dies would grasp the other symbolism. Music refined its conventions of reference, making interpretive gestures familiar to congregations. Every system of musical style has such conventions. In European-derived music of the last several centuries, a reed instrument playing slowly in a 6/8, 9/8, or 12/8 rhythm conveys the pastoral, a shepherd's song or a meadow scene. Music featuring horns and drums in a heavily accented duple meter is recognized as a march, and so on. The music by itself cannot show whether the shepherd be Greek, Palestinian, or Scandinavian, or whether the marchers are Egyptian soldiers, English constables, or an American marching band.

Complex polyphony has been sung by choirs, which can be trained to sing expressively interpretive music, rather than by congregations. In addition to "anthems" (a word corrupted from the medieval and Renaissance "antiphon") set to biblical words—some of which are no harder than hymns, though others are extremely difficult (e.g., Charles Ives's Psalm 90 [1923])—Christian churches developed more elaborate musical forms to present biblical texts. The term "motet" came to refer to almost any liturgical choral composition, and especially in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, to an unaccompanied choral work on a biblical text. Johann Sebastian Bach's "Jesu, meine Freude" (1723?) has no biblical text, but Johannes Brahms wrote beautiful motets (e.g., Psalm 51 [1860]). In the late Renaissance, cantata meant merely something "sung" (Ital. cantare), whereas in northern Europe, the term came to mean a multimovement religious choral work, accompanied by organ or orchestra, often with solos. In J. S. Bach's busy hands (he wrote hundreds), the cantatas meditated musically on a theme in the lectionary reading for a given Sunday, or focused on an apt chorale (e.g., Cantata no. 140, "Wachet auf" [1731], alluding to Isa. 40.9). The text often refers to the prescribed biblical reading, and the recitatives and arias expand upon its religious meaning to the pious soul. This kind of cantata, especially characteristic of pietistic Lutheranism, was extended in the Passions by Lutheran composers. Bach probably wrote five Passion settings, though only those on St. Matthew (1727) and St. John (1724) are complete, one on St. Mark is reconstructed, and two are lost. They intersperse narration with chorales (possibly sung by congregation and choir), interpretive recitatives, arias, and duets set to devotional words. Solo voices sing words of the characters in recitative, and words of Jesus are always accompanied by the special timbre of the orchestral strings. The chorus sings the words of groups—disciples, priests, or the crowd—to orchestral accompaniment.

A more dramatic form, often with biblical contents, was the oratorio. Originally a musical morality play performed in an oratory, a room devoted to prayer to a saint, the form developed in the seventeenth century into something like a sacred opera. Giacomo Carissimi's Jephtha (1650), based on Judges 11, has recitatives, arias, duets, choruses, and a narrator. Whether oratorios were staged remains uncertain. From the seventeenth century to the present many have been biblical stories or extended comment on biblical themes. The text of George F. Handel's Messiah (1742), the most familiar of the latter kind, is a catena of biblical verses, and the music combines vast choruses, arias, duets, and orchestral pieces. His Saul (1739) and Judas Maccabaeus (1747) dramatically interpret the biblical stories. Hundreds if not thousands of oratorios have biblical content. Franz Joseph Haydn's The Creation (1798), Felix Mendelssohn's Elijah (1846), Hector Berlioz's L'Enfance du Christ (1854), César Franck's Béatitudes (1869–1879), John Knowles Paine's St. Peter (1873), and Charles Gounod's Redemption (1882) are examples from a list that could be extended for pages. Brahms's A German Requiem (1868) is an oratorio like the Messiah, that is, an interpretation of biblical texts about death. Many oratorios, including Handel's, were written for performance not in church but in music halls or concert rooms.

In the nineteenth century, it was sometimes argued that religious music ought to be stylistically distinct from secular music. Some composers were criticized for liturgical works indistinguishable from their operas. Gioacchino Rossini's Stabat mater (second version, 1841) and Giuseppe Verdi's Requiem (1874) are perhaps the textbook examples. The argument rested both on liturgical conservatism perceptible in a Christianity that felt beleaguered by secularity's growing self-confidence and on the theological principle, always present in Christianity, that the life of faith is distinct from the life of the world.

Secular Biblical Music. Early sacred cantatas were like small operas, and oratorios like larger ones. Opera was originally drama continuously accompanied by music, the work of Florentines around 1600 intending to revive Greek drama. As the form moved beyond Florence, we find opera on religious subjects in Rome as early as Stefano Landi's Sant'Alessio (1632). We might have expected North German Protestants to pioneer biblical operas, but there were only sporadic compositions. Hamburg saw such works as Johann Theile's Der erschaffene, gefallene, und wieder aufgerichtete Mensch ("Created, Fallen, and Restored Humanity," 1678). Paris had Marc-Antoine Charpentier's David et Jonathan (1688). Energy that might have gone into biblical opera in the eighteenth century was apparently put mostly into the oratorio (Jephté by Michel Montéclair [1732] is a rare operatic exception). Perhaps the line between "sacred" and "secular" handling of biblical matters was becoming fainter.

Biblical operas proliferated in the nineteenth century, and a long list might begin with Etienne Méhul's Joseph (1807) and continue through such works as Rossini's Moses in Egypt (1818), Verdi's Nabucco (Nebuchadnezzar, 1842), Gounod's The Queen of Sheba (1861), Camille Saint-Saëns's Samson and Delilah (1877), Jules Massenet's Hérodiade (1881), Richard Strauss's Salome (1905, based on Oscar Wilde's one-act play on the New Testament story), Artur Honegger's King David (1921), to Arnold Schoenberg's incomplete masterpiece, Moses und Aron (1931–1932). Carlisle Floyd's Tennessee-mountain setting of the story of *Susanna and the elders in Susannah (1955) is perhaps the most successful American biblical opera.

"Secular" biblical music includes such orchestral works as Ralph Vaughan Williams's Job, A Mask for Dancing (1931), Ernest Bloch's Schelomo (Solomon) for cello and orchestra (1916), and Leonard Bernstein's Jeremiah Symphony (1942), in which a mezzo-soprano sings part of *Lamentations in Hebrew. Some vocal works intended for the concert hall are Zoltán Kodály's Psalmus hungaricus (Ps. 55, an old Hungarian translation [1923]), Igor Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms (1930, rev. 1948), using Vulgate texts, Aaron Copland's "In the Beginning" (1947, Gen. 1.1–2.7), Luigi Dallapiccola's remarkable Job (1950), and Mario Davidovsky's Scenes from Shir Hashirim (1975–1976, Song of Solomon). Dvořák's Biblical Songs (1894) and Brahms's Four Serious Songs (1896), for voice and piano, set biblical passages in a style not different from their other songs.

Johann Kuhnau wrote six sonatas for harpsichord (1700), dramatically narrating biblical episodes: "Saul's Madness Cured by Music," "David and Goliath," and others. Instrumental music conveying biblical atmospheres must use referential conventions or composers' programmatic titles. There are few such works. Jaromír Weinberger published Bible Poems (1939) for organ, and the Black American composer R. Nathaniel Dett wrote Eight Bible Vignettes (1941–43) for solo piano, an attractive set in a Late Romantic style.

Such a survey can only drop a few names and make a few generalities. Western music has used the Bible mostly to enrich the liturgies of Christianity and Judaism. In the past century or two, the Bible has provided composers more comfortably than before with material for music other than "religious." Twentieth-century music shows the Bible's secure place as an artifact of the culture rather than as the exclusive possession of religious associations. EDWIN M. GOOD Myrrh. An aromatic gum-resin of Commiphora myrrha, a tree native to southern *Arabia and eastern Africa. Myrrh trees of Punt (Somalia) appear in fifteenth-century BCE Egyptian royal tomb reliefs. According to the Bible, myrrh was traded from Canaan to Egypt (Gen. 37.25, 43.11). "Liquid myrrh" (myrrh-scented oil) was a cosmetic (Esther 2.12, Song of Sol. 5.5), and in special formulation was used for cultic anointing (Exod. 30.23–25). In the New Testament, myrrh was one of the gifts of the *Magi to the infant Jesus (Matt. 2.11). It was used as a painkiller (mixed with wine, Mark 15.23) and to anoint corpses before burial (with aloes, John 19.39).

JOSEPH A. GREENE

Mystery. In the Aramaic section of *Daniel, the Aramaic word rāz, translated in the *Septuagint by the Greek word mystērion, "mystery," has a specialized meaning, denoting primarily that what God has decreed shall take place in the future, that is, the eschatological secret to be made known. This use in Daniel of "mystery" with the correlative "solution" or "interpretation" is paralleled at *Qumran. Whereas in ordinary discourse "mystery" generally means a secret for which no answer can be found, this is not its sense in Greek, in which the term "mysteries" denotes the sacred rites or teachings of the *mystery religions in which only the initiated shared.

In the New Testament, therefore, mystērion signifies a divine secret that is being (or has been) revealed in God's good time, an open secret in some sense. The word thus paradoxically comes close to the word for revelation, apokalypsis, and can almost be equivalent to the Christian gospel. The only occurrence of the word in the Gospels is Mark 4.11 (= Matt. 13.11; Luke 8.10; plural in both of the latter). It refers to the *kingdom of God, the knowledge of which is reserved for those to whom it is given; at least the Markan usage appears to mean that the secret revealed is that in some sense Jesus himself in his ministry should be identified with the kingdom of God (see Messianic Secret).

If "mystery" is read (instead of "testimony") in 1 Corinthians 2.1, it must mean the gospel, the subject of Paul's proclamation (see also 1 Cor. 2.7; 4.1; Eph. 6.19; Col. 4.3; 1 Tim. 3.9,16; Rev. 10.7). In Romans 11.25, the "mystery" is a special aspect of the divine plan, namely, the partial eclipse of Israel until the *gentiles are won; in Ephesians (1.9–10; 3.3, 9–10) the mystery is, in particular, that aspect of God's plan which consists of the unification of the universe, including Jews and gentiles. Romans 16.25–26 is a clear example of the meaning of "mystery" as the divine plan in the process of being divulged; and in Colossians 1.26–27 and 2.2, this seems to be daringly identified with Christ himself. Perhaps 2 Thessalonians 2.7 should be included here, if by "the mystery of lawlessness" is meant a satanic parody of God's mystery, a sort of demonic gospel to be destroyed by Jesus at his coming.

Elsewhere the word can mean a more private, exclusive, and less generally divulged religious secret (1 Cor. 15.51). According to 1 Corinthians 14.2, a person who utters unintelligible sounds is speaking "mysteries in the Spirit" (cf. 1 Cor. 13.2 and see Glossolalia). In Ephesians 5.32, "mystery" appears to apply to the exegesis of Genesis 2.24, quoted in the preceding verse, thus denoting the inner meaning of a passage whose more obvious sense is something other; there is an analogous sense in Revelation 1.20; 17.5, 13.

The use of the word "mystery" with reference to the *sacraments (the *Vulgate sometimes translates mystērion by sacramentum) is postbiblical, but an understandable development from the above-mentioned usage of the word to denote the inner meaning of a phrase or symbol.

DAVID HILL

Mystery Religions. Mystery religions, practiced throughout the Mediterranean from the seventh century BCE to the fifth century CE, were secret and voluntary rites of initiation entered by those seeking an intensified form of worship in addition to their inherited traditions dedicated to deities of family, community, and place.

The term "mystery" derives from the Greek mystēria, which described the oldest initiation rites at Eleusis. The Eleusinian and Dionysian mysteries were Greek, while those of Isis, Mithras, Kybele, and Attis came from the East. Common to each of the mysteries was the prohibition against revealing its secrets to noninitiates. They were literally unspeakable because it was not knowledge but an experience that was transmitted through specific ritual acts, with each cult offering a different experience through the performance of an initiatory rite.

The participant in the mysteries ritually reenacted the drama and suffering of the deity honored in the rites, which ensured a connection with the deity and a significant change of status for the initiate. The Eleusinian mysteries promised blessedness and a guarantee of immortality, while the mysteries of Isis promised rebirth and freedom from fate.

The influence of the mysteries can be seen in both Judaism and Christianity. Jewish scriptures of the Hellenistic era employed the terminology of the mysteries to portray the *wisdom of God that remains hidden from the ungodly (Wisd. of Sol. 2.22; 6.22). The influence in this case is terminological, as also in Daniel 2.27–30, 47.

Far more problematic is the question of how far the Greco-Roman mysteries influenced the early Christian community not only in terminology but also in the rites that secured salvation with Christ. *Paul's explanation that *baptism united the initiate with the death and *resurrection of Christ (Rom. 6.3–5) has elicited heated debate from scholars who have asserted or denied Paul's dependence on the mysteries. The terminological influence of the mystery cults on early Christianity is not disputed, but the degree to which they influenced the content of Christian baptism and celebration of the Eucharist has still not been resolved.

Like their modern counterparts, early apologists sought to distinguish the Christian rites of initiation from those celebrated by others. Justin Martyr (ca. 150 CE), for example, claimed that the pagan mysteries were demonic counterfeits of the true mysteries of Christ. Yet by the fourth century, as the church adapted to Hellenistic culture, the mystēria of Christ reflected both the terminology and the structure of the ancient mystery cults.

See also Mystery.

GREGORY SHAW

Myth. A story, usually originally transmitted orally, that has as its main actors superhuman beings and that is typically set in otherworldly time and space. Historians of religion, while often differing on how to interpret any specific myth, tend to agree that all myths, through the use of symbolic language, communicate transcendent meaning within a culture, revealing its cosmic dimensions. In the New Testament, however, Greek mythos (Engl. "myth") is used negatively to mean an invented story, a rumor, or a fable

(1 Tim. 1.4; 4.7; 2 Tim. 4.4; Titus 1.14; 2 Pet. 1.16).

Hebrew Bible. At first glance, there seems very little narrative in the Hebrew Bible that can, on the basis of the definition above, be classified as myth. Only Genesis 1.1–2.4a, the story of *creation, is set in cosmic time and space and features a superhuman being, God, as its main actor. Elsewhere biblical narratives ostensibly focus on human actors living on earth during historical time. Still, it can be argued that Genesis 2.4b–11.9, including the stories of the garden of *Eden (Gen. 2.4b–3.24), *Noah (Gen. 6.5–9.17), and the tower of *Babel (Gen. 11.1–9), is myth. Humanity's first home in Eden and the plain of Shinar, where the tower of Babel is built, cannot really be understood as this-worldly locations; the date of the expulsion from *paradise and the year of the *Flood are not points that can be fixed on a historical time line. Moreover, while *Adam, *Eve, Noah, and the people of Babel are not gods, their existence is surely not limited by the kinds of constraints that define normal human experience: they have extraordinarily long life spans, and God makes clothes for Adam and Eve and speaks directly to Noah.

This conclusion concerning the mythic nature of Genesis 1–11 is enhanced by looking at the mythologies of Israel's ancient Near Eastern neighbors: *Egypt, *Canaan, and, in particular, Mesopotamia. The story of creation in Genesis 1.1–2.4a, which begins with the wind of God hovering over a watery *chaos (Hebr. tĕhôm), finds parallels in the *Babylonian creation myth, Enuma elish, which describes a primordial battle between a goddess of watery chaos, Tiamat (etymologically related to Hebr. tĕhôm), and Marduk, a god of wind and storm. The story of Noah should be compared to a fragmentary third-millennium flood myth from *Sumer, the myth of Ziusudra, and to two later Akkadian versions of the same myth found in the epic of Atrahasis and in the epic of *Gilgamesh. Both the Atrahasis and Gilgamesh epics also contain parallels to the story of Eden: in Atrahasis, as in Genesis 2.7, humans are molded from the clay of the earth (this tradition can also be found in Egyptian myths about the potter god of creation, Khnum); in the Gilgamesh epic, as in Genesis 3.22, there is a magical plant that, once eaten, yields a godlike state of immortality. The story of the tower of Babel similarly finds its roots in Mesopotamian sources, as the very name Babel, the Hebrew equivalent of Babylon, suggests.

While it is difficult, beyond Genesis 1–11, to speak of myth as such in Hebrew Bible narrative, scholars have identified ways in which the language and patterns of myths from the ancient Near East are present even in seemingly historical accounts. Most significant is the common Semitic myth of a fight between a storm deity and a sea deity, the Babylonian exemplar of which, Enuma elish, is described above. The same basic plot is known from second-millennium BCE Canaan, in *Ugaritic texts depicting a battle between a god of the waters of chaos, called both Yamm, "Sea," and Nahar, "River," and *Baal, the god of the storm. In the Hebrew Bible, while the overt polytheism of these Mesopotamian and Canaanite prototypes is rejected, scholars have argued that the ancient mythic conception of storm versus sea stands behind Exodus 15.1–18, an account of the Israelite *Exodus from Egypt that culminates with God routing the Egyptians by sending a storm to drown them in the Reed Sea.

This same notion of a battle between Yahweh, the god of Israel, and some sort of watery enemy is also alluded to frequently in poetic passages, particularly in prophetic texts (e.g., Isa. 27.1), in certain psalms (e.g., Ps. 89.9–10), and in Job (e.g., Job 26.12–13). In these texts the foe is most often described as a primordial water monster. Again, the myths of Israel's neighbors provide crucial comparative data: the biblical sea monster is at points called yam, "sea," and nāhār, "river" (e.g., Hab. 3.8), the same names given to Baal's watery foe at Ugarit; also in Ugaritic myth Yamm/Nahar is called Lotan, cognate to Hebrew *Leviathan, and Tannin, cognate to Hebrew tannîn, "serpent," both terms used in biblical poetry of the primordial monster (e.g., Job 41.1; Isa. 51.9). And, as in Psalm 74.13, both Ugaritic Yamm/Nahar and Tiamat, the watery enemy of Enuma elish, are depicted as multiheaded dragons.

Among poetic texts the theme of Yahweh's battle with the dragon often occurs in *apocalyptic literature, both poetry and prose, in which mythological language and imagery are common. For example, the collection of apocalypses found in Daniel 7–12 is full of mythological allusions: Daniel 7.9–10, 13–14 reflects, it has been argued, myths concerning a younger god who assumes power from an older deity; also mythological is the notion that the divine patrons of the nations fight in the heavens while their earthly counterparts battle below (Dan. 10.10–21). Mythic motifs manifest themselves similarly even in protoapocalyptic texts from the exilic and postexilic periods (e.g., Isa. 24–27; 34–35; 40–66; Zech. 9–14). One notable example comes from Isaiah 25.7, which describes how Yahweh, at the eschatological banquet at the end of time, will swallow up death forever; this is an allusion to a passage found in the Baal myth from Ugarit, in which it is said that the god of death, Mot, will swallow up Baal into the underworld. Yet simultaneous with allusion, there is reversal, for in the Canaanite myth, the god of storm and fertility, Baal, is rendered a prisoner through the power of death; in Israel, however, Yahweh, who shares with Baal attributes of fertility and storm god, vanquishes death through swallowing rather than being swallowed up.

The observation concerning attributes Yahweh shares with Baal suggests one final way in which older mythic traditions are reflected in biblical literature: the characteristics of ancient Near Eastern gods, in particular the gods of Canaan, are used in Israel to describe the character of Yahweh. Thus, like Baal, Yahweh is said to ride in a chariot of clouds (Ps. 68.4), to speak with a voice of thunder (2 Sam. 22.14), and to appear in a *theophany of storm (Exod. 19.16–18; Judg. 5.4–5). Yahweh is also depicted as creator and a granter of children (Deut. 32.6), as lawgiver (Exod. 33.7–11), as judge among the divine council of the gods (Psalm 82; see Sons of God), and as a deity of graciousness and compassion (Exod. 34.6), language reminiscent of El, the high god of the Canaanite pantheon.

New Testament. While, as noted above, the term "myth" is used in New Testament literature with negative connotations, much in the New Testament is in fact mythic in character. The New Testament, for example, inherits from the Hebrew Bible a mythological conception of the universe as having three tiers: heaven, earth, and underworld. Each of these three regions, according to New Testament thought, has its proper denizens (God and the *angels, humanity, and *Satan and the *demons, respectively), and this notion of divine and demonic forces also has its antecedents in mythological patternings found in the Hebrew Bible, especially in apocalyptic literature. Apocalyptic also infuses New Testament thought with a mythological view of time, in particular with a belief that time has reached its fullness and the eschaton is imminent.

Moreover, the fundamental narrative that inspires the New Testament, the story of *Jesus, could be understood as mythic in character. Thus various New Testament writers, although they differ in details, depict a Jesus who is superhuman in nature, the product of a miraculous birth, able to effect healings and *exorcisms, and, most important, a being resurrected on the third day after his death. Moreover, according especially to Paul and to the author of the gospel of John, there is found in Jesus even before he is born a cosmic dimension that transcends this-worldly space and time (see Logos). Thus the Jesus of Paul and John is described as one who was preexistent, present in the heavens with God from the beginning of time (John 1.1–18; Phil. 2.5–11). Paul, along with the author of the book of *Revelation and others, adds an eschatological, even apocalyptic component to this cosmic description of Jesus by arguing for the return of Jesus as heavenly judge at the end of creation.

See also Israel, Religion of.

SUSAN ACKERMAN

N

Nabateans.

Origins and Growth. The consensus of modern scholarship no longer relates the Nabateans to the biblical Nebaioth, the firstborn son of *Ishmael (Gen. 25.13, 16; 28.9; 36.3), nor with the Nabatu/Nabaiati of Assyrian records. Rather, they are seen to have originated somewhere in the Arabian peninsula, emerging by at least the fourth century BCE and described by Diodorus Siculus as a sedentarized group of traders occupying the ancient *Edomite site known as Petra (Map 11:G5). Pliny adds some scant details of previous Red Sea island occupation and suggests an original tribal territory between those of the Qedar and Dedan tribes.

By the first century BCE, the group had become fully sedentary, urban, and monarchically organized, controlling the major north-south *trade routes of Coele-*Syria and northern *Arabia. As a result of commerce, their sphere of influence extended far beyond their political borders, and their trading connections embraced the major luxury suppliers and markets of both east and west. Although *frankincense and *myrrh, along with Dead Sea balsams and bitumen, appear foremost in the list of their commercial products, such items as silk, gems, spices, and pharmaceuticals were probably also traded. With the trading routes went also other installations, resulting in more than a thousand sites known to have been established by Nabateans.

Their capital city, Petra, rapidly achieved a sophisticated urbanism, prompted by competition with surrounding people. A monarchic form of government (eleven kings have thus far been identified) further advanced their position as a true political state. The Nabateans seem to have reached their height under Aretas IV (9 BCE–40 CE), whose ethnarch attempted to arrest *Paul at *Damascus (2 Cor 11.32).

Language. Although the extant examples of Nabatean are basically *Aramaic, they contain a large number of Arabisms. The script gradually developed into a semicursive, ligatured form, which ultimately served as the basis for the modern Arabic script.

Hundreds of Nabatean inscriptions have been found, including letters and contracts. No literary works, however, have as yet been recovered, leaving vast gaps in knowledge concerning the ideology, social structure, and even commercial history of the people.

Technology. Despite the lack of documentary data, the material remains of the Nabateans have furnished substantial evidence of high technological skill. Hydraulic engineering, architecture, ceramics, numismatics, metallurgy, along with sculpture and decorative art, are attested throughout Nabatene areas. Especially at Petra, such skills are seen at their best, for the capital city was embellished by succeeding rulers, in addition to being militarily secured and made more generally habitable. Likewise throughout the kingdom, different types of desert-adapted water systems for both agriculture and culinary purposes are found.

Architecturally, the Nabateans show an eclecticism to be attributed to their broad trading connections. Most obvious are the more than eight hundred funerary, cultic, and other architectural features at Petra, and the smaller number, mainly tomb façades, from Medain Selah. The vast majority of these installations are carved into cliff faces, but built structures are being uncovered by recent excavations at a variety of sites. At Petra these have included public secular and religious structures, along with private residential buildings.

Ceramics also reached an extremely high technical and decorative level by the first century CE. Most impressive was the development of a fine, thin red-painted pottery, generally used for open plates. This type has become the principal marker for identifying Nabatean sites throughout the area. Of equal importance, however, were more commercial ceramic vessels, such as unguentaria for oils and related products, which were developed for trade throughout the Roman empire; these have been identified as far west as Spain.

Coinage and other metal production are also noticeably represented at Petra. Coin production among the Nabateans possibly began as early as 90 BCE, and continued until the beginning of the second century CE.

Sculpture, in the round and in relief, along with castings of figurines, lamps, and other objects, appear in great quantities and types, some with marked artistic excellence, at Petra, Et-Tannur and elsewhere. Fresco, appliqué, and other decorative art examples, including the decoration of architectural orders, are also beginning to come to light.

Nabatene functioned as a virtually independent kingdom throughout the Roman period, until the need to consolidate the Near East led Trajan to incorporate the area formally into the empire. In 106 CE Roman forces entered Petra and the Nabatean kingdom ceased to exist. Nabatean life and culture were scarcely affected, however, and continued with little real evidence of Roman or Christian impact.

On the evening of May 19, 363 CE, Petra was struck by a disastrous earthquake and the city fell into ruins. With that calamity, the Nabateans, as such, disappeared from recorded history. Yet their cultural, linguistic, technological, and artistic influence continued, and permeated Near Eastern culture for generations to follow.

PHILIP C. HAMMOND

Nag Hammadi Library. Before the publication of the Berlin Codex 8502, resources for the study of *gnosticism were almost entirely limited to the refutations of the early church fathers, with such extracts and quotations as they chose to include. The only original gnostic material, in Coptic—the Pistis Sophia in the Askew Codex, the two Books of Jeu, and an anonymous treatise in the Bruce Codex—was late and from a time when the movement had long since faltered. The patristic refutations were inevitably open to suspicion as the propaganda of the winning side, while the Coptic material left the impression that the whole movement was both tedious and bizarre. The Berlin Codex, known as far back as 1896 but published only in 1955, yielded three new documents: a fragmentary gospel of Mary, the Apocryphon of John, and the Sophia Jesu Christi. In contrast, the Nag Hammadi library, discovered in 1945 and gradually made available between 1956 and 1977, contains some forty previously unknown documents together with copies of several texts already known. Fragments used to stiffen the binding of some of the codices suggest a date of about the middle of the fourth century CE, but the Greek originals from which these Coptic texts were translated probably go back in some cases to the second century CE. Thus, the library's significance for the study of some aspects of early Christianity is comparable to that of the *Dead Sea Scrolls for the Judaism of an earlier period. The library derives its name from the modern Egyptian town of Nag Hammadi on the Nile north of Luxor, which was the nearest town to the place of the discovery.

The collection consists of twelve codices in their original bindings, plus eight leaves of a thirteenth (Codex XIII), which were apparently found inside the cover of Codex VI. The total amounts to over one thousand pages, in varying states of preservation: some are almost complete, while others are more or less fragmentary. Most of one codex (Codex I = the Jung Codex) was smuggled out of Egypt, but has now been returned for preservation with the others in the Coptic Museum in Cairo. A complete facsimile edition has been published, and translations have been made into various modern languages.

Not all the documents in the library are strictly gnostic. One (Codex VI,5) is a rather poor translation of a short section of Plato's Republic; another (VI,8) is part of the Hermetic tractate Asclepius, previously known from a Latin version. The Teachings of Silvanus (VII,4) is an early Christian wisdom text, while XII,1 is part of the Sentences of Sextus, already known in the original Greek and in versions in other ancient languages. The strongly ascetic tone of the latter work, with the similar ascetic emphasis in other documents, indicates that the collection belonged to a group that stressed asceticism, in contrast to the accusations of libertinism often made against the gnostics in patristic sources. Of the strictly gnostic documents, some are clearly Valentinian in character, such as the gospel of Philip (II,3), the Tripartite Tractate (I,5), and the Valentinian Exposition (XI,2), though there are often variations on the Valentinian system described by Irenaeus. It has been suggested that some texts, such as the Gospel of Truth (I,3) or the Treatise on Resurrection (I,4), may have been written by Valentinus himself, but this is at best speculation. Another major group of documents has been labeled Sethian, because of the prominence given to Seth, the third son of *Adam (Gen. 4.25). These include, among others, the Hypostasis of the Archons (II,4), the Gospel of the Egyptians (III,2), the Apocalypse of Adam (V,5), and the Three Steles of Seth (VII,5). These documents do have a number of features in common, which justifies grouping them together, but the existence of an actual sect of Sethians has been disputed and is by no means certain.

It was noted several years ago that a complete gnostic "New Testament" could be put together from the Christian gnostic texts in the library: the gospel of Thomas or of Philip, the Gospel of Truth, the Acts of Peter and the Twelve Apostles, the Letter of Peter to Philip, two Apocalypses of James, an Apocalypse of Peter, and an Apocalypse of Paul. Despite their titles, however, these texts are not comparable to those in the canonical New Testament: the gospels, for example, do not relate the life and ministry of Jesus, his death and resurrection. The Gospel of Truth is a meditation on the theme of Jesus' message, the gospel of Philip a rather rambling discourse whose continuity seems largely due to catchwords or the association of ideas. The gospel of Thomas is a collection of sayings attributed to Jesus, some parallel to sayings in the canonical Gospels, others completely new, and including all the sayings in the famous Logia papyri found at Oxyrhynchus (see Agrapha). The titles in fact are no sure guide to content: the gospel of the Egyptians and the Apocalypse of Adam have been claimed as non-Christian documents, and the former is not a gospel in the accepted sense, while the latter is more a testament than an apocalypse. Moreover, similarity of title does not mean that the documents are the same: the gospel of Thomas is completely different from the apocryphal infancy gospel of Thomas, the gospel of Philip is not the one known to Epiphanius, the gospel of the Egyptians not the one quoted by Clement of Alexandria. The Nag Hammadi library itself contains two quite different Apocalypses of James. Mention should also be made here of a group of gnostic "gospels" that report revelations given by the risen Jesus to his disciples in the period between his *resurrection and *ascension, which the gnostics extended to eighteen months (in the Pistis Sophia eleven years).

Evaluation of these texts is still in progress, and in some respects they raise as many questions as they answer: the identity of the owners, the purpose of the collection, the reasons for its concealment. The discovery has not solved the problem of gnostic origins, or the vexed question of a pre-Christian gnosticism, but it has enriched our knowledge in several ways. Comparison of different versions of the same document, or different presentations of the same basic system, shows how the gnostics could develop and adapt their ideas, sometimes using older material for their own purposes. Some texts show signs of the Christianization of earlier, possibly non-Christian material, while the Christian gnostic documents often quote or allude to both the Hebrew Bible and the New Testament. The discovery has given fresh stimulus to theories of a Jewish origin for the movement, but however that may be there is no doubt of the significance of the Jewish contribution. Above all, we now have for the first time a comprehensive collection of firsthand gnostic material, from which it is possible to gain some idea of what gnosticism meant to a gnostic: it was not merely bizarre and eccentric but an attempt to deal with the human predicament, to resolve the problem of evil; not a counsel of despair but a religion of hope and deliverance.

See also Apocrypha, article on Christian Apocrypha. ROBERT MCL. WILSON

Nahum, The Book of. The three chapters of this book constitute a powerful poem that interprets events surrounding the fall of *Nineveh in 612 BCE in terms of the Lord's control of history on behalf of his people.

Nahum means "comfort," a name that stands in contrast with the violent vengeance portrayed in the book. He is identified as "the Elkoshite," but the location of Elkosh is unknown. We have no other information about this prophet.

This is the only prophetic work that is called a "book" in the text (1.1). It is also called an oracle or "burden," a term for a prophecy spoken against a nation under judgment, and a "vision," a description it shares with *Isaiah and *Obadiah; the latter term probably means a literary presentation of an inspired experience of being in the heavenly court of God, to observe how God deals with nations and people in history. The book contains some of the most powerful poetry in the Bible, a witness to its inspiration in another sense. The prophet-poet who wrote the book looked beyond the facts of Nin-eveh's destruction to discern and portray God's intentions in it.

The book may be outlined as follows:

I. Yahweh, the avenging God of his people, will destroy Nineveh and bring peace to Judah.
   A. An *acrostic poem: the Lord takes vengeance (1.2–8)
   B. The leaders of Nineveh are addressed (1.9–11)
   C. Good news for Judah: no more invaders (1.12–15)

II. Nineveh's enemies are triumphant.
   A. The last battle (2.1–12)
   B. The Lord's curse on Nineveh (2.13–3.6)
   C. A taunting song over the doomed city (3.7–19).

Israel's relation to *Assyria and its capital city Nineveh extended over more than a century, when the Assyrian empire was at the height of its power. Nineveh (Map 6:H3) was the most important city in Assyria. Its greatest period came during the last century of the empire (730–612 BCE), which coincides with Israel's contacts with it. Great buildings of that period have been excavated, constructed by the emperors *Sennacherib, Esarhaddon, and Ashurbanipal. One palace housed what was at that time the best library in the world. Fortifications included two sets of walls that protected palaces and temples. Ishtar, goddess of love and war, was the city's benefactor. The finest gate was dedicated to her and decorated with her image and symbols, and a magnificent temple housed her statue.

Assyria inherited the crumbling *Hittite and Mitanni empires in the upper Mesopotamian valley in the early second millennium. In the eighth century BCE her emperors, *Tiglath-pileser III, Sargon II, and Sennacherib, sent armies into Syria, then to Judah, and finally into Egypt. Some of the earliest of the Minor Prophets note these movements and interpret them as God's judgment on Israel and the nations (see Amos 3.9). *Samaria fell to Assyrian forces in 722 BCE (2 Kings 17). Judah and her neighbors were vassals to Assyria during the following century; this authority was enforced by Assyrian arms several times (see 2 Kings 18). But Assyrian power began to weaken in the late seventh century, and *Josiah apparently owed his relative freedom of action to this development.

By 614 BCE three powers, *Media, *Babylon, and *Egypt, were prepared to fight for succession to Assyria's empire. Media seized the section east and north of the Euphrates Valley; Babylon seized the south and eventually pushed into Syria; Egypt seized her own territory and extended her control north into Palestine. Babylon laid siege to Nineveh and finally destroyed it in 612 BCE. A small Assyrian army escaped the city and fled toward Haran; it was finally destroyed in 609 BCE.

Nahum's powerful poem portrays the last days of Nineveh. This is seen as good news for Israel, a hope that is short-lived, since Egypt and Babylon turned out to be worse masters than Assyria. But the poem is correct in marking the event as a turning point in history.

There is tension in the Minor Prophets in their views toward Nineveh: repentant and the object of God's care in *Jonah, the instrument of God's judgment on Israel and Judah in *Amos, and the symbol of ultimate evil opposed to God in Nahum. A similar tension exists in Isaiah's portrayal of Assyria as the rod of the Lord's anger against Israel in chap. 10 and God's judgment on Nineveh in 30.27–33 and 31.8–9.

In Nahum a historic event is presented as symbolic of the struggle between God and ultimate evil. In a similar way, Isaiah 47 portrays the fall of Babylon to Persian forces. The book of Revelation speaks of Babylon (or Rome) in similar fashion in chaps. 12–13 and 17–18.

JOHN D. W. WATTS

Names and Namegiving.

Significance. Throughout the Bible, names are full of meaning. Scholars have long recognized that both for ancient Israel and the ancient Near East as well as for early Judaism and Christianity, the name of a person, place, or thing was somehow connected to and descriptive of its essence and/or personality. Thus names of individuals expressed their personality and status or nature. This is reflected in those stories where an individual's name is changed in recognition of a changed nature, personality, or status. Examples include *Jacob's name being changed to Israel following his successful all-night wrestling match with an unnamed (!) divine being (Gen. 32.22–32) and Abram's name being changed to *Abraham after the institution of the *covenant (Gen. 17.1–8). The same phenomenon occurs in the name change or assumption of an additional name or throne name by kings in ancient Israel, as when Mattaniah is renamed *Zedekiah (2 Kings 24.17). The names of a newborn children seem normally to have been carefully chosen to reflect the circumstances of their birth as well as to indicate something of their personality or status.

Types of Names. Names may be divided into two categories: personal names and place names. Within these two categories we may also speak of simple names, consisting of one element, and compound names, consisting of two or more elements. Simple names for individuals may be taken from the names of plants and animals (Deborah = bee/hornet; Huldah = weasel). Compound names may be formed from nouns, but most compounds are sentence names that bring together a form of the divine name (Yo- [Jo-] or Yeho- [Jeho-] and -yah[u], all derived from "Yahweh"; or El; see Names of God in the Hebrew Bible) or a title of God (father, king, etc.) plus a verb, noun, or adjective descriptive of God (e.g., Elijah = Yah[weh] is God [ʾēl]). Names that incorporate a divine name, called theophoric names, can also occur in a short form in which the divine name is omitted; this short form is called a hypocoristicon (e.g., Jonathan/ Nathan; Berechiah/Baruch).

Process of Naming. In the Hebrew Bible, children are regularly named by the mother shortly after birth (Gen. 4.1, 25; 16.11; 19.37–38; 29.32–35; 30.6–24; 35.18; 38.4–5; Judg. 13.24; 1 Sam. 1.20; 1 Chron. 4.9; 7.16), but the father or others could and frequently did also name the child (Gen. 4.26; 5; 3.28–29; 16.15; 17.19; 21.3; 35.18; 41.51–52; Exod. 2.22; Judg. 8.31; 1 Chron. 7.23; Hos. 1.4, 6, 9; Ruth 4.17). Genesis 30.6–24 preserves the stories of the births and namings of seven of the sons and one daughter of Jacob. In each case, punning or wordplay in the giving of the name is evident. Usually English translations supply the reader with notes that elucidate the wordplays found in the Hebrew text. Whether wordplay always played an important role is uncertain.

In the Hebrew Bible children were named shortly after birth, but in the New Testament the practice of waiting eight days to name a male child at his circumcision is attested (Luke 1.59; 2.21). Luke's story of the naming of *John the Baptist also attests to the development within ancient Judaism of naming a newborn boy after either his father or grandfather. In the Second Temple period the latter practice is well attested in the family of the high priests.

From at least the Persian period onward, Jews often were given a non-Hebrew (Babylonian, Greek, Latin, etc.) name in addition to their Hebrew name. Biblical examples include Hadassah/Esther (Esther 2.7), Simon Peter (Matt. 4.18; Acts 10.5), John Mark (Acts 12.12), and Saul/Paul (Acts 13.9). RUSSELL FULLER Names for the Nameless. Although the Bible contains many named persons, it also refers to numerous individuals who are mentioned but not named. Through the ages, readers of the Bible have felt the need to identify these anonymous figures who play a part in scripture, and so names (at times more than one) have been provided for many of these unidentified persons.

Hebrew Bible. At the very beginning of the Bible, readers are prompted to ask: Who was Cain's wife (Gen. 4.7)? An answer is provided by the apocryphal Book of Jubilees, a Jewish text also known as "The Little Genesis" and thought to have been written in the second century BCE. According to Jubilees 4.9, after giving birth to *Cain and then *Abel, *Eve bore a daughter named Awan, who eventually became Cain's wife. After the birth of his son Seth, *Adam fathered another daughter and named her Azura; she later became Seth's wife (4.10–11).

The Book of Jubilees also identifies the wives of the other antediluvian males who appear in Genesis 5.6–31. *Noah, the last of this series, is said to have married Emzara, the daughter of Rakeel, who in turn was the daughter of Noah's father's brother (Jubilees 4.33). Other apocryphal texts give more names for Noah's wife—over a hundred different names are known!

Another imaginative source for names of unidentified women in the Hebrew scriptures are postbiblical Jewish legends. For example, the story of *Joseph recorded in Genesis does not include the name of Potiphar's wife, who tried to seduce the young Joseph (Gen. 39.12). Later tradition supplies her name—Zuleika. Similarly, the book of Exodus details how the baby *Moses, abandoned in a basket and left floating among the reeds of the Nile, was found by Pharaoh's daughter, who was bathing in the river. The young woman adopted the child as her own. Different names have been ascribed to Moses' surrogate mother: one tradition calls her Thematis, while another names her Bithiah.

Postbiblical sources assign two wives to Job. His first wife, who died while Job was undergoing his trials, was named Sitis (or Sitidos), a name derived from the Greek transcription of Job's hometown, Uz. After Job regained his health, he married Jacob's daughter Dinah, with whom he had a second set of children.

The pseudo-Philonic text Liber Antiquitatum Biblicarum (39.8) names the Ammonite ruler with whom Jephthah negotiated (Judg. 11.13) Getal. The daughter whom Jephthah presented as a sacrifice because of his regrettable oath was named Seila (40.1), and she lamented her virginity on a mountain called Stelac (40.5). The same book identifies the medium of Endor, who conjured up *Samuel's spirit for *Saul (1 Sam. 28.7–14), as Sedecla, the daughter of Debin (or Adod) the Midianite (64.3).

New Testament. The New Testament has also been substantially embellished in later Christian tradition. The gospel of Matthew does not specify the number or the names of the *Magi who bring gifts to the infant Jesus (Matt. 2.1–12). Since three gifts were offered, three wise men are assumed. Their names, Balthasar, Melchior, and Gaspar, were assigned in the Excerpta Latina Barbari by as early as the sixth century. Such traditions are expanded in the Exposition of Matthew, thought to have been written by the Venerable Bede, where it is recorded that each of the wise men came from one of the three main continents—Asia, Africa, and Europe. Furthermore, Bede also claims that the Magi were descendants respectively of Shem, Ham, and Japheth, the three sons of Noah. The East provides yet other traditions. In an Ethiopic text known as the Book of Adam (4.15), the Magi are named Hor, king of the Persians, Basanater, king of Saba, and Karsudan, king of the East. A dozen Magi journey to Bethlehem according to Armenian and Syrian traditions, and their names, as well as names for their fathers, are all recorded.

The anonymous shepherds to whom an angel comes to proclaim the news of Jesus' birth (Luke 2.8–18) have also been a subject of traditional interest. A thirteenth-century Syriac compendium collected and edited by Bishop Shelemon and entitled The Book of the Bee declares there were seven shepherds and even lists their names: Asher, Zebulan, Justus, Nicodemus, Joseph, Barshabba, and Jose.

The twelve *apostles are identified by the four Gospels, but the seventy (or seventy-two) disciples sent out by Jesus (Luke 10.1) are unnamed. Yet, over the following centuries, many unfinished lists of their names were compiled. Of several somewhat varied lists of the full group, the first appears in the Chronicon Paschale, a lengthy chronological-historical text produced by about 650 CE. Matthias is the first disciple listed (Acts 1.23–26), followed by Sosthenes and Cephas, and then Linus (2 Tim. 4.21) and Cleopas (Luke 24.18). The list continues with the names of twenty-six people to whom Paul sends salutations at the end of his letter to the Romans (beginning with Aquila in Rom. 16.3 and ending with Quartus in 16.23). After these names come thirty-nine others, all compiled from the remaining Pauline letters and from Acts. Almost none of the names are Palestinian, but this did not seem to bother the compilers, who also allowed the duplication of several names on the list—the result of a somewhat mechanical combining of separate sources.

The Book of the Bee also names various children mentioned in the Gospels. The child whom Jesus sets in the midst of his disciples (Matt. 18.2) is identified as Ignatius, who later ruled as patriarch of *Antioch. Two of the children brought to Jesus so that he would lay his hands on them and bless them (Mark 10.13–16) were Timothy and Titus, who later became bishops.

In Luke 16.19–31, Jesus does not name the rich man who asks for Lazarus's help. An Egyptian tradition of around 200 CE names the rich man *Nineveh, which is symbolic of haughty and indulgent luxury. Nineveh is also cited in an early manuscript of Luke. In the West, a different tradition is found in the pseudo-Cyprianic treatise, De pascha computus (200 or 300 CE), with the identification of the rich man as Phineas. Later he is called *Dives.

Of the women in the New Testament, the one who was probably named earliest in Christian tradition was the Canaanite or Syrophoenician woman who sought out Jesus to help save her daughter who was possessed by a demon (Matt. 15.22–28; Mark 7.25–30). The pseudo-Clementine Homilies of the third century (2.19) call the woman Justa, and her daughter Bernice. The apopcryphal Acts of Pilate (7), also names Bernice as the woman who endured hemorrhages for twelve years (Matt. 9.20–22 par.). However, the later Arabic apocryphal gospel of John (26) identifies her as Yusufiya (Josephia). The widow whose dead son Jesus resurrects as he was being carried by on his bier (Luke 7.11–15) is named Lia (Leah) according to the Coptic text on Christ's Resurrection, ascribed to the apostle Bartholomew. Pilate's wife, who in Matthew 27.19 forewarns her husband to have nothing to do with Jesus, is variously identified as Claudia, Procla, and Perpetua.

Similarly, the robbers crucified on either side of Jesus were also given a variety of names. In the Western tradition, an Old Latin Gospel text names them Zoatham and Camma, while another refers to them as Joathas and Maggatras. In the East, they are called Dysmas and Gestas in the Acts of Pilate, which also identifies the Roman soldier who pierces Jesus' side with a spear (John 19.34) as Longinus. The tenth-century Codex Egberti names the man who tried to ease Jesus' thirst with a sponge filled with sour wine (Matt. 27.48) as Stephaton.

In the second-century Gospel of Peter, after Jesus' burial the soldiers assigned to guard his tomb were supervised by a Roman centurion called Petronius. The Book of the Bee, produced much later, elaborates on the descriptions of the soldiers: "They were five in number, named Issachar, Gad, Matthias, Barnabas, and Simon; but others say they were fifteen, three centurions and their Roman and Jewish soldiers."

Many traditions name the individual who accompanies Cleopas to Emmaus on the afternoon of the first Easter (Luke 24.18); among the identifications are Nathanael, Nicodemus, someone named Simon (not Simon Peter), and the evangelist Luke.

Few if any of these traditions are based on accurate historical data. The readiness to give names to the biblical nameless is a witness to the fertile imaginations of Jewish and Christian writers and to their reluctance to accept unknown elements in biblical history.

See also Apocrypha. BRUCE M. METZGER

Names of God in the Hebrew Bible. The Bible often refers to God by his proper name, which was probably pronounced Yahweh (see Tetragrammaton). In the Hebrew Bible, the consonants yhwh are usually to be read as Adonai (ʾădōnāy), "my Lord," for the sake of reverence, and English versions represent the word by "Lord" or (less often) "God" in capital letters. The Hebrew word is a plural of majesty (with a singular meaning) of ʾādôn, which is translated "Lord" (e.g., Isa. 1.24; 3.1). The name Yahweh often appears in the phrase "Yahweh of hosts," as the Hebrew is probably to be translated (cf. "Yahweh of Teman" or "of Samaria" in the Kuntillet ʿAjrud inscriptions of ca. 800 BCE), or the longer "Yahweh the God of hosts" (e.g., 2 Sam. 5.10). Some have thought that the hosts, Sabaoth (ṣĕbāʾôt), are the armies of Israel (cf. 1 Sam. 17.45), but a reference to these human armies is inappropriate in, for instance, prophetic denunciations of Israel (e.g., Isa. 1.24), and the word probably denotes heavenly or angelic armies. Some maintain that Sabaoth is an epithet in apposition to Yahweh and that it means something like "the Mighty One," but there is no evidence in Hebrew for such a meaning.

The usual Hebrew word for God is Elohim (ʾĕlōhîm), another plural of majesty with a singular meaning when used of Yahweh. The singular form Eloah (ʾĕlōah) appears, mainly in the book of Job, but the most common singular noun for God is El (ʾēl), which has cognates in other Semitic languages and whose *Ugaritic counterpart is used both for the chief god and as a general word for any god. The Israelites adopted this common Semitic word (cf. Gen. 33.20: El-Elohe-Israel, "El the God of Israel"), and some of the divine names compounded with El in the Hebrew Bible were probably originally used of non-Israelite deities. In Genesis 14.18–20, 22, we find El Elyon (ʾēl ʿelyôn), "God Most High," whose priest is *Melchizedek but who is identified by Abram with Yahweh. The word Elyon is used of Yahweh in other places in the Bible (e.g., Pss. 18.13; 87.5). In the fourth century CE, Philo of Byblos is cited by Eusebius of Caesarea as referring to Elioun, the Most High (Greek hupsistos), as a *Phoenician god (Praeparatio Evangelica 1.10.15). The Aramaic cognate of Elyon is ʿlyn (perhaps ʿelyān), and a god with this name appears alongside El in a treaty of the eighth century BCE from Sefire in Syria.

The element El is found in divine names in Genesis, sometimes in connection with various places, such as Bethel, "the house of God" (cf. 28.19, 22), and we find El-Bethel, "God of Bethel" (35.7; cf. 31.13). Thus, at a place in the desert there is El-roi ("a God of seeing," 16.13), and at Beer-sheba there is El Olam ("the Everlasting God," 21.33; cf. špš ʿlm in a Ugaritic letter, and šmš ʿlm in a Phoenician text of ca. 700 BCE, both of which mean "the eternal sun" god or goddess). Another name is El Shaddai, usually translated "God Almighty," and the Priestly writer (*P) in the *Pentateuch maintains that God first made himself known by that name before revealing his name Yahweh (Exod. 6.3; cf. Gen. 17.1; 35.11; 43.14; 48.3). The name is not restricted to P, for it is found in a number of places (Num. 24.4, on the lips of *Balaam, a non-Israelite; Ruth 1.20–21; Job 5.17; etc.), and it is part of the names Zurishaddai and Ammishaddai (Num. 1.6, 12). It is perhaps related to an Akkadian word for "mountain."

It is uncertain whether El-berith ("God of the covenant") in Judges 9.46 refers to Yahweh, for this deity seems to be the same as Baal-berith in 8.33; 9.4, and may be a Canaanite god. On the other hand, Baal, which means "lord," was sometimes used of Yahweh in early times without necessarily always identifying him with the Canaanite god *Baal. In 1 Chronicles 12.6, there is the personal name Bealiah, "Yah is Baal" (cf. yhwbʿl on an unpublished seal). *Saul and Jonathan, who were worshipers of Yahweh, had sons named, respectively, Esh-baal and Merib-baal (1 Chron. 8.33–34), which were changed by editors to Ish-bosheth and Mephibosheth (2 Sam. 2.8; 9.6; etc.), in which "bosheth" ("shame") was substituted for "Baal." Jerubbaal (Jerubbesheth in 2 Sam. 11.21), *Gideon's other name, is probably to be explained similarly, notwithstanding the forced explanation in Judges 6.31–32. *David also had a son named Beeliada (bʿlydʿ, 1 Chron. 14.7), probably identical with Eliada in other lists. Hosea 2.16 says that Israel will call God "my husband" (lit. "my man") and no longer "my Baal" (i.e., "my lord," another word for husband), which may imply that some Israelites addressed God in the latter way.

Both God's holiness and his relation to his people are reflected in the phrase "the Holy One of Israel," which is characteristic of the book of *Isaiah. Although it is not strictly a name, it is relevant to mention this title here.

Yahweh is frequently described as melek, "king" (e.g., Deut. 33.5; Pss. 29.10; 98.6), "a great king over all the earth" (Ps. 47.2; cf. 47.7; 48.2) or "above all gods" (Ps. 95.3), "my" or "our king" (Pss. 5.2; 47.6; 68.24; 74.12), or "the King of glory" (Ps. 24.7–10). He "reigns" or "has become king" (Pss. 47.8; 93.1; 96.10; 97.1; 99.1; Isa. 52.7), and he "will reign forever" (Exod. 15.18). Personal names include Malchiel (Gen. 46.17; Num. 26.45; 1 Chron. 7.31) and Malchiah (Jer. 21.1; 38.1, 6), meaning "El" or "Yah is king." Isaiah sees a vision of "the King, Yahweh of hosts" (6.5).

Various epithets and figures of speech are applied to God, but they cannot all be described as names or titles. In Genesis 15.1, Yahweh says to Abram "I am your shield" (cf. Ps. 84.11), but that does not prove the theory that "the Shield of Abraham" was a title. On the other hand, God is described as "the Fear of Isaac" (Gen. 31.42, 53)—the suggested alternative translation, "the Kinsman of Isaac," lacks sufficient evidence—and as "the Mighty One of Jacob" (Gen. 49.24; etc.); these may be titles reflecting the special relationship of God with particular individuals. His relationship with people is also shown by names containing the element ʾāb, "father," such as Abijah, Abiel, and *Abra(ha)m. Yet although God was viewed thus (Jer. 31.9; Mal. 2.10; cf. 1.6), and could be addressed as "my (or our) Father" (Jer. 3.4; Isa. 63.16; 64.8), it is doubtful whether the evidence suffices to justify the claim that "Father" was a title, let alone a name.

See also Jehovah. J. A. EMERTON

Naphtali. Son of Bilhah, *Rachel's maid, and *Jacob and one of the twelve *tribes of Israel. Rachel's reference to "mighty wrestlings" with her sister *Leah (Gen. 30.7) plays on the name Naphtali ("wrestler"). The tribe is allotted much territory west of the Sea of Galilee and the upper Jordan (Josh. 19.32–39; Map 3:XY2–3). The military prowess of Naphtali is praised in the blessings of Jacob (Gen. 49.21) and Moses (Deut. 33.23). During the reign of *Solomon, Naphtali becomes an administrative district headed by Solomon's own son-in-law (1 Kings 4.15).

During the divided monarchy Naphtali undoubtedly suffered from the wars between Israel and Syria (e.g., 1 Kings 15.20). "All the land of Naphtali" was captured by the *Assyrians in 732 BCE (2 Kings 15.29). GARY N. KNOPPERS

Nathan. The main *prophet in the court of King *David. As such, he set the pattern for the proper functioning of a royal prophet. He is introduced as the prophet through whom God establishes his *covenant with David (2 Sam. 7.5–16). Later, he pronounces God's judgment on David for David's sins against *Bathsheba and Uriah (2 Sam. 12.1–15); but then he reports God's love for *Solomon, the son of David and *Bathsheba (2 Sam. 12.24–25). This sets the stage for Nathan's role in helping Solomon succeed David to the throne (1 Kings 1.11–48). In *Chronicles, Nathan is said to be partly responsible for recording the events of the reigns of David and Solomon (1 Chron. 29.29; 2 Chron. 9.29; 29.25). Though often dismissed as pious tradition, this is not an unreasonable claim. Many of the concerns that Solomon would have faced early in his reign (e.g., defending his claim to the throne)—when Nathan was still influential—are addressed by the stories about Nathan and David. TIMOTHY M. WILLIS Nature and Ecology. Ecology, the study of the relations between people and their environment, has become a topic of interest within biblical studies as a result of the global environmental crisis. Standing at the beginning of Western religious, ethical, and philosophical traditions, the Bible has received considerable attention in the search for the sources of modern attitudes toward nature. The results have been paradoxical, some blaming the Bible for a human-centered ethic that legitimates the exploitation of nature for human ends, others praising it for its reverence for nature and ethic of responsible stewardship of the earth's resources.

The more negative of these assessments of biblical attitudes is based in part on the traditional treatment of biblical religion as uniquely historical. While neighboring religions have been depicted as oriented toward nature, their adherents viewing nature as the place of divine revelation and the realm with which human society had to attune itself through ritual and daily behavior, biblical religion has been described as valuing history supremely, its members seeing human society as the location of divine activity and the arena of primary concern. The result of this approach has been to regard the natural world as separate from and subordinate to human history and to consider nature and human interaction with it of little significance for understanding the genius of biblical religion.

The Bible is without question preeminently about human existence, and in this sense it may be described as historical or human centered in outlook. Yet nature and society are so interdependent in the Bible that to distinguish them sharply or subordinate one to the other misrepresents biblical thought. Biblical languages, for example, possess no terms equivalent to the Western conceptions of nature and history, suggesting that this familiar modern distinction was not a part of biblical thought. A more complex relationship between people and nature is presented in the Bible than either traditional scholarship or recent polemical debates would suggest.

Biblical views of the interrelationship between people and nature are best understood by exploring them within the context of the actual environment within which biblical writers lived and their attitudes were shaped. For the Hebrew Bible, as the texts themselves and archaeological evidence from the Iron Age (1200–587 BCE) both indicate, the ecological setting is a predominantly rural society in the Mediterranean highlands that subsisted on a mixed agricultural economy, including the cultivation of grains and fruits and the herding of sheep and goats. The literature of the Hebrew Bible is the literature of an agricultural society, and this perspective infuses the attitudes toward nature reflected in it.

The essence of the human being and the purpose of human life are both related to agriculture in the Bible's oldest creation story (Gen. 2.4–3.24), in which the first human being ('ādām*) is made out of fertile soil ('ădāmâ) to which it is destined to return at death, and given the primary task of cultivating—literally "serving" ('ābad)—the soil from which it was made (Gen. 2.7, 15; 3.19, 23). Life in such an earthly setting, nourished by the agricultural bounty of the fertile soil, was believed to be the highest form of human experience, not a prelude to a better world. As the source of life, the earth and its produce were viewed as God's creation and inherently good (Gen. 1). Historians, although interested primarily in political affairs, recognized a productive land as the basis for Israelite life and identity (Deut. 8). Prophets saw natural disaster and degradation as punishment for sin and agricultural plenty as the experience of redemption (Hos. 2; Joel 1–2; Amos 4; 9). Psalmists sang of divine activity (Pss. 104; 144) and sages reflected on human wisdom (Prov. 25–29) in such an agricultural environment.

The Israelite sense of dependence on the arable land is reflected in its religious ritual which originated in the cycle of the agricultural year. In its major communal festivals, Israel celebrated the primary harvests of Mediterranean agriculture: barley and wheat in the spring and fruit in the fall (Exod. 23.14–17; 34.18, 22, 23; Lev. 23; Deut. 16). As an acknowledgment of the divine powers believed to make the land and the flock fertile and as an appeal for fertility and bounty in the future, the worshiper presented to the deity the first, best fruits of the harvest and the first, choicest specimens of the flock (Exod. 34.19, 20, 26; Lev. 1.2; Deut. 26.1, 2, 10, 15; Neh. 10.35–37). Integrated with these important seasonal celebrations were the commemorations of political events such as the *Exodus from Egypt, which were held to be formative and unifying (Exod. 23.15; Lev. 23.39–43). (See Feasts and Festivals.)

The natural phenomena on which the lives of Israelite farmers depended took on for them a kind of sacred character. Features of the landscape, believed to provide points of contact between the earth and the divine worlds above and below—springs (Gen. 16.7), rivers (Gen. 32.22– 32), and trees (Gen. 12.6–7; 18.1; Exod. 3.2–4)—marked sites of divine appearances and places of worship. Especially important to Israel were mountains, in particular *Sinai and *Zion, whose ground was considered holy (Exod. 3.5; Ps. 48.1) and whose summits were the points of Israel's great revelations (Exod. 19–24; 1 Kings 8; Ps. 48; Isa. 2; 11). The thunderstorm, the most powerful and essential natural phenomenon for highland farmers dependent on rain-fed agriculture, became one of the most common ways of picturing the presence and activity of the deity in biblical *theophanies (Exod. 19; Pss. 18; 29; Hab. 3).

The traditional village agrarian culture within which Israelite attitudes toward nature were shaped is essentially the setting within which Christianity originated. The life and ministry of *Jesus and his first followers was located in the agricultural world of village peasants who made up the bulk of the population in Roman Palestine. In the New Testament Gospels, the stories about Jesus and the *parables he told present human life in terms of the dynamics of planting and harvesting, of herding flocks, and of fishing, an occupation prominent among Jesus' followers because of the Galilean setting of his ministry. Christianity is thus rooted in the land and agrarian culture of its Hebrew scriptures, and its gospel stories reflect modes of thought about nature much like those in these scriptures.

Yet new social and intellectual forces, shared with certain groups within the Judaism of its time, modified in some significant ways the viewpoint of the first Christians toward the natural world. One of these forces was the early urbanization of the Christian movement. Within a decade or two of Jesus' crucifixion, the center of Christianity shifted from the rural villages of Palestine to the great cities of the *Roman empire. *Paul and his followers were city people and wrote to city churches, and their epistles address issues of religious life in urban settings with little reflection on the world of nature.

A second force was the development in the centuries prior to the birth of Christianity of the notion that humans could hope for a meaningful life in another world. The sources of such thinking were *apocalyptic Judaism that, in its mature form already seen in the book of *Daniel, affirmed the transcendence of *death and a life for the righteous in a better world (Dan. 12:1–4), and Hellenistic dualism, reflected in Neoplatonism and *gnosticism, in which the material world was sharply differentiated from the spiritual world and viewed as alien to authentic human experience. The implication of such thought, more prominent in certain strands of later Christianity than in later Judaism, was that the earthly environment was no longer home for humanity, no longer the setting for true human existence, and was thus dispensable if not downright evil. (See Afterlife and Immortality.)

Influenced by both of these movements, early Christians viewed the highest form of human experience as life beyond death in a heavenly realm free from earthly struggles (Mark 13; John 14; 1 Cor. 15; 1 Thess. 4–5). Yet the New Testament vision of the new world, rooted most deeply within apocalyptic Judaism and its ancient holistic heritage, was modeled closely on the earthly environment. The entire world of nature was to participate in the final *redemption (Rom. 8:19–23; Rev. 21–22), and the individual would not escape the prison of matter (as Neoplatonism and gnosticism held) but would experience the *resurrection of the body, as had Jesus (1 Cor. 15). Thus, even in its vision of another world, the New Testament is deeply rooted in the conceptions of the interrelatedness between people and their environment found in the Hebrew scriptures. THEODORE HIEBERT

Nazareth (Map 12:X3). A town in southern *Galilee about fifteen miles southwest of the Sea of Galilee and twenty miles from the Mediterranean westward. It was probably located at or near the site of the town by the same name in modern Israel. References to it occur in the Gospels and Acts, and all agree that Jesus was from Nazareth (Mark 1.9; Matt. 4.13; 21.11; Luke 4.16; John 1.45; Acts 10:38).

Although not situated on any main commercial roads, Nazareth was not far from them, and it was only several miles from Sepphoris, an important city near the road from Ptolemais to Tiberias. Its secluded position may explain the absence of references to it before Roman times, and this may indicate that it was an insignificant Jewish town (John 1.46). On the other hand, *Luke's references (1.26; 2.4, 39) to it as a city rather than a village may indicate that it was not an insignificant place. Distinctions, however, between the two were not great, and they were sometimes used interchangeably; furthermore, Luke's knowledge of Palestine is not always correct.

Located on a hill in the Plain of Esdraelon, it was about 365 m (1200 ft) above sea level. From its heights one could see mountains in three directions and view the Plain of Esdraelon on the south. The moderate climate, sufficient rainfall, and fertile soil were favorable for growing fruits, grains, and vegetables. The water supply of the town itself was restricted to one spring, supplemented by cisterns. If the spring is to be identified with the "Mary's Well" shown to tourists, it is the only shrine of the many in Nazareth that may go back to Jesus' time.

EDWIN D. FREED

Nazirite (KJV: "Nazarite"). An individual who was dedicated (Hebr. nāzîr) to special sacred service through a vow made by the individual or by a parent. The dedication could last for a lifetime or for only a limited period.

A nazirite in Israel had to fulfill several conditions in order to remain consecrated. The man or woman had to abstain from the fruit of the vine and other intoxicants, avoid defilement by contact with a dead body (even that of a close relative), and not allow a razor to cut the hair (Num. 6.1–7). Rituals were specified to deal with a nazirite's unintentional contact with a corpse (Num. 6.9–12) and to mark the completion of a period of dedication (Num. 6.9–12; Acts 21.23–24). Nazirites could drink *wine when their term was completed, but some were tempted to do so before their vow was fulfilled (Amos 2.10–11).

The best-known nazirite is *Samson (Judg. 13.1–7). His nazirite status was announced by a divine messenger while Samson was still in his mother's womb, and was later acknowledged by Samson himself (Judg. 16.17). Part of the irony of the Samson story is that Samson appears not to keep any of his vows. He attended drinking feasts (Judg. 14.10), touched the carcass of a dead lion (Judg. 14.8–9), and allowed his hair to be cut by Delilah (Judg. 16.15–19).

*Samuel is also called a nazirite (1 Sam. 1.11, 22 in *Septuagint and *Qumran textual traditions; the *Masoretic Text does not contain the word); *Joseph is as well (Gen. 49.26; Deut. 33.16), but this may only be metaphorical in the sense of one separated from his brothers.

DENNIS T. OLSON

Nebo.

1. From Mount Nebo, perhaps modern Jebel Neba just west of Heshbon (Map 1:Y5), *Moses viewed the *Promised Land across the Jordan before he died (Num. 27.12; Deut. 32.49; 34.1; cf. Deut. 3.27 and see Pisgah). Later tradition tells of Jeremiah hiding the *ark of the covenant on Mount Nebo (2 Macc. 2.4–8).

2. Nebo is also the name of a town near Mount Nebo in territory allotted to the tribe of *Reuben (Num. 32.37–38; 1 Chron. 5.8). Israel's enemy *Moab often held this region; hence the prophetic oracles against Nebo (Isa. 15.2; Jer. 48.1, 22). The *Moabite Stone hints at an important early Iron Age sanctuary of Yahweh here.

3. In Isaiah 46.1, Nebo refers to the *Babylonian god of writing, Nabu.

MARY JOAN WINN LEITH

Nebuchadnezzar. See Nebuchadrezzar.

Nebuchadrezzar. The king of *Babylonia (605–562 BCE), frequently named in Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel, as well as by classical writers. The name is also rendered Nebuchadnezzar, a biblical variant; the form Nebuchadrezzar is closer to the Babylonian Nabû-kudurri-uṣur, "the (god) Nabu has protected the succession." He was renowned as the most distinguished ruler of the Neo-Babylonian (Chaldean) Dynasty founded by his father, Nabopolassar, in 627 BCE, and as the conqueror of *Jerusalem who took the Judeans into *exile.

Nebuchadrezzar acted as commander in chief for his aging father when in 605 BCE he took Carchemish from the Egyptians and drove them back to their borders, thus freeing Syria and Palestine. According to the Babylonian Chronicle and Josephus, he broke off this campaign in order to return to take the throne of Babylon on hearing of his father's death. He campaigned frequently in the west, receiving tribute from many rulers and from Tyre, which he subsequently besieged for thirteen years. His vassals included Jehoiakim of Judah who, however, defected in 601, misinterpreting the fierce battle between the Babylonians and Egyptians that year as a victory for the latter. Nebuchadrezzar gained revenge by capturing Jerusalem on 16 March 597, when he set up a new king (Mattaniah/*Zedekiah) sympathetic to him. Jehoiachin, whom he called Yaukin, king of Judah, was taken prisoner to Babylon with the Temple vessels and many Judeans (2 Kings 24.10–17). Nebuchadrezzar also fought against Elam (cf. Jer. 49.38) and the Arabs, and was present in the operations that led to the sack of Jerusalem in August 587/586 BCE as a reprisal for Zedekiah's activity as the focus of anti-Babylonian opposition. At that time, more Judeans were taken into exile, as they also were following a later raid, including one on Egypt attested in a fragmentary Babylonian text dated 568–567 BCE (cf. Jer. 43.8–13).

Little is known of the last thirty years of Nebuchadrezzar's rule. The tale of his madness (Dan. 4.23–33) may be a pejorative account of a period in the reign of his successor Nabonidus. Nebuchadrezzar's character may be reflected in his inscriptions, which do not emphasize his military exploits yet reflect his exercise of law, order, and justice as well as stressing moral qualities and religious devotion. He rightly claims to have rebuilt Babylon, its walls, palaces, temples, and defenses as a wonder to which all peoples came with tribute; the famous "hanging gardens" of Babylon are also attributed to him in some traditions. He died during a period that saw the seeds of economic decline resulting from the cost of his enterprises; he was succeeded by his son Amel-Marduk (Evil-Merodach of 2 Kings 25.27).

DONALD J. WISEMAN

Needle's Eye. The term stands for the smallest imaginable opening in the saying attributed to Jesus (Mark 10.25 par.) which announces that the camel, largest of familiar animals, can pass through the needle's eye more easily than a rich person can enter the *kingdom of God. The shocking image is softened by the comment that with God all things are possible. The whole story draws attention to the difference between human activity and divine *grace. Some patristic interpreters eliminated the mixed metaphor by reading rope (Grk. kamilos) rather than camel (Grk. kamēlos). Talmudic parallels, however, retain the animal imagery and speak of an elephant passing through a needle's eye as something impossible. Medieval fondness for moral allegory generated the suggestion that "needle's eye" referred to a narrow pedestrian gate that a camel could squeeze through only after its burden and saddle had been removed, but there is no evidence for any gate with this name.

ROBERT STOOPS

Negeb. The Negeb is a mountainous desert south of Judah between the Arabah and the Mediterranean Sea (Map 1:V–X6–7). Its name means "dryness" but can also be synonymous with "the south" (Gen. 28.14). *Abraham and *Isaac sojourned there (Gen. 12.9; 13.1–3; 20.1; 24.62; 26.17–23). The *Amalekites (Num 13.29), Jerahmeelites, *Kenites (or Kenizzites), *Chereth-ites, and Calebites (1 Sam. 27.10; 30.14) dwelt there. After the *conquest of Canaan, it was allotted to *Simeon (Josh. 19.1–9; 1 Chron. 4.28–33), but eventually incorporated into Judah (1 Sam. 27.10; "Negeb of Judah at Beer-sheba," 2 Sam. 24.7). The Bible depicts it as desolate (Isa. 21.1; 30.6) although habitable (Jer. 32.44; 33.13; Obad. 1.20). Archaeological evidence shows the Negeb was settled, at times surprisingly thickly, before, during, and after the biblical period.

JOSEPH A. GREENE

Nehemiah, The Book of. It is difficult to determine the precise relationship between the persons of Ezra and Nehemiah. It is understandable that Nehemiah is not mentioned in the memoir of Ezra in Ezra 7–10, because Nehemiah had not yet begun his mission. It is, however, difficult to understand why Ezra is not explicitly referred to in the memoir of Nehemiah, especially after his activities in teaching the Law, especially as it pertained to intermarriage. Because of the paucity of evidence this problem is hard to solve. (See also Ezra, The Book of.)

Historical Background. It is generally accepted that Nehemiah came from Susa (Map 6:J4) in Persia to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem in 445/444 BCE. As the cupbearer of the Persian king Artaxerxes (probably Artaxerxes I, 465–424 BCE), Nehemiah held a high office of some influence at court. It is also probable that Nehemiah, serving in the presence of the queen, was a *eunuch; this may explain why he was unwilling to flee to the Temple of the Lord as protection against his enemies (Neh. 6.10–14). It is clear that Shemaiah tried to lure him to the Temple in order to get him to transgress the stipulation forbidding eunuchs to enter the sanctuary (cf. Deut. 23.1; Lev. 21.17–24). If he had done so, he could have lost his influence with the people and their trust.

After Nehemiah heard of the plight of his people in *Jerusalem and that the city was in ruins without a wall of defense against their enemies, he asked the Persian king's permission to go to Jerusalem in order to see what could be done. This was granted; Nehemiah was sent out as a governor of Judah with all the privileges pertaining to the post of governor of a province in the satrapy of Trans-Euphrates. To secure his safety he was granted an escort of soldiers to accompany him; this stands in contrast to the mission of Ezra, in which no such escort was requested. It is, however, noteworthy that the mission of Nehemiah was of a political nature while that of Ezra was religious.

Artaxerxes's friendly gesture to Nehemiah was made just after a serious revolt broke out in the satrapy of the Trans-Euphrates. Megabyzus, the Persian general in Egypt, who put down the revolt in Egypt in 456 BCE, was also the satrap of the Trans-Euphrates. Megabyzus had generously promised the captured Egyptian king Inarus and certain Greek generals their release after the war. Artaxerxes, however, listened to his mother, the wife of Xerxes, the former king, and commanded their execution. This was a heavy blow to the pride of Megabyzus, and in 449 he fomented a rebellion against the Persian king, which Artaxerxes was unable to put down. Later, however, Megabyzus stopped the revolt and once again became a loyal subject of the king. It was thus politically expedient for Artaxerxes to send out Nehemiah, obviously one of his loyal officials, to Judah, one of the smaller but important provinces of the satrapy.

The Work of Nehemiah. After Nehemiah arrived in Jerusalem he conducted a secret inspection of the walls of the city. It seems that he tried to hide his true intentions from the people so that news about his plans would not reach neighboring enemies. After the inspection Nehemiah decided to organize the Jews and to rebuild the walls. Nehemiah allotted sections of the walls to various persons and groups of persons to rebuild. Some scholars think the period of fifty-two days too brief to rebuild the walls, but if we keep in mind that a significant part of the wall needed only restoration, this time was not too short for such repairs. It has been pointed out that in similar circumstances the Athenians built a wall around Athens in just a month, and, in the face of an imminent attack on Constantinople by Attila after the wall was destroyed by an earthquake, the Eastern Romans restored it in sixty days.

With the building of the wall two serious problems developed for Nehemiah and the Jews. The first was a well-orchestrated attack of psychological warfare to stop building. This was done by neighboring nations, led by Sanballat I, governor of *Samaria, and assisted by Tobiah, probably a Persian official of the *Ammonites; somewhat later, these were joined by Geshem (Gashmu), chieftain of the *Nabateans or Arabs to the south and southeast of Judah, as well as by the Ashdodites of the old *Philistine territory to the west. With *Samaritans to the north and Ammonites to the east, Judah was nearly encircled by its enemies. They made use of rumors and threats to discourage Nehemiah and the Jews. But Nehemiah did not hesitate to take strong measures to ensure the safety of the workers on the walls. The last resort for his enemies was to try to divide the Jewish people by infiltrating their ranks with false rumors and to induce prophets to give false prophecies. But Nehemiah saw through all these attempts. In the end, the wall was completed and his enemies conceded that they had failed to achieve their goal.

The second problem was the poverty of the Jews. At that stage Judah had a weak economic infrastructure and the burden of *taxes was heavy. The satrap collected taxes for the royal treasury, and both the satrap and his officials from the different provinces of the satrapy had to be paid. Furthermore, the governor and his officials collected taxes for their work. (Nehemiah, however, well aware of his subjects' poverty, did not collect taxes for himself and his officials.) Beyond these expenses, there were the *tithes that the Jews were obliged to pay for the maintenance of the service in the Temple. It is thus not surprising that they had to go into debt and often were forced into debt-slavery in order to meet their obligations. After becoming aware of this problem, Nehemiah canceled all debts.

Nehemiah served for twelve years as governor of Judah and then returned to the royal court in Persia. After a few years, ca. 430 BCE, he went once more to Jerusalem, and was shocked by what he saw. The principles he had laid down during his previous service as governor had been neglected. Nehemiah was so dismayed that he took strong action (Neh. 13). Having discovered that a place was furnished in the Temple for Tobiah the Ammonite by Eliashib the priest, Nehemiah threw the furniture of Tobiah out of the room and commanded that the place be purified. As a result of heavy taxes, the paying of tithes had been neglected; Nehemiah reinstituted the levy. Another problem was the desecration of the *Sabbath by foreign traders in Jerusalem; he forbade them to do any business on the Sabbath within or outside the walls of Jerusalem. Finally, Nehemiah vehemently confronted the issue of *marriages with foreigners. He even assaulted some of the men and pulled out their hair.

The book of Nehemiah ends abruptly without telling the reader what happened to either Nehemiah or Ezra. Nothing is said of the success of the measures taken against certain Jews described in Nehemiah 13.

Author, Composition, and Sources. As with the book of Ezra, the great majority of modern scholars consider the book of Nehemiah to have been composed by the later Chronicler sometime in the fourth century BCE. The composition of the book of Nehemiah is, however, full of problems. Nehemiah 1.1–7.5 contains part of the memoir of Nehemiah written in the first person; we may accept this as verbatim quotation by the Chronicler. In Nehemiah 7.6–72, we find a list of returnees to Judah which is essentially the same as the list in Ezra 2. Probably these lists came from the same source, but it remains unexplained why the Chronicler should have repeated it. Nehemiah 8–10 is problematic because it likely represents Ezra's memoir. Several scholars have proposed that these chapters are displaced and must be added after Ezra 10 or must be inserted between Ezra 8 and 9. From a modern point of view this is logical, but it is difficult for a modern scholar to determine what motivated the arrangement of material by an ancient compiler. Nehemiah 9 in the Ezra memoir is a hymn of praise and thanksgiving to God for his guidance of Israel through history, a typical addition of the Chronicler; however, the sense of guilt expressed in this hymn is uncharacteristic of the Chronicler.

In Nehemiah 11–13, we have a variety of sources intermixed by the Chronicler and furnished with commentary, and it is difficult to determine what precisely was taken over from Nehemiah's memoir. Among a variety of proposals made by scholars, it seems possible that Nehemiah 11.1–3; 12.31–43 and 13.4–31 are to be regarded as part of the memoir. In Nehemiah 11.1–3, the third person is used for Nehemiah, but in 12.31–43 and 13.4–31 the first person is used. In 12.31–43, we have the description of the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem. In 13.4–31, the second visit of Nehemiah to Jerusalem is described along with the measures he took to combat certain abuses. It is obvious from the work of the Chronicler in Nehemiah 11–12 that he had a preference for genealogical lists, as we also know from the books of *Chronicles. In the list of high priests in 12.10–11 (which supplements that in 1 Chron. 5.27–41), we are brought to a time well after 400 BCE. Some even regard the high priest Jaddua as a contemporary of Alexander the Great late in the fourth century BCE. One thing, however, is clear: the late Chronicler who did the final editing of this book was active well into the fourth century BCE.

Theology of the Book. Because the book is for the most part derived from Nehemiah's memoir, one can form an excellent idea of his beliefs. The most important feature in the religion of Nehemiah is his sense of a living relationship with God. Despite his high regard for the Law, he did not regard it as the only form of mediation between humans and God. If we accept the authenticity of the prayers of Nehemiah, it becomes evident that he believed in immediate contact with God through prayer. As did other Jews in postexilic times, he believed in the dominant role of the Lord as the God of history: God could move the Persian king to give Nehemiah permission to go to Jerusalem; God determined every step that Nehemiah took after his arrival in Jerusalem. Although the work of Nehemiah was mainly political (see Sir. 49.13), a close relationship between politics and religion was presumed. Nehemiah never doubted that God was on his side and would finally grant him victory over his adversaries.

F. CHARLES FENSHAM

Neighbor. The most frequently occurring Hebrew word translated "neighbor," rēaʿ, has a wide range of meanings, from "lover" (Song. of Sol. 5.16; Jer. 3.1) to "friend" (2 Sam. 16.7; Job 2.11) to "neighbor" in the familiar sense of someone living nearby (Exod. 11.2; cf. 3.22; Prov. 27.10); in general, its semantic field encompasses anyone not considered either a "brother" (a kinsman) or an "enemy." In legal contexts, however, "neighbor" has the more specialized meaning of a member of the same social group, but not as close as a blood relative—in other words, a fellow Israelite. A key text is Leviticus 19.16–18, where the neighbor is grouped with one's "people," one's "brother," the "sons of one's people, one's fellow"; the passage concludes with the command "You shall love your neighbor as yourself." This command is repeated with a significant variation later in the chapter: "You shall love the alien as yourself" (Lev. 19.34), which indicates that legally at least the *alien was not subsumed under the category of neighbor, who would be the "native-born" (Lev. 19.34; NRSV: "citizen").

This sense of "neighbor" as a fellow member of the covenant-community seems also to apply to the occurrences of the word in the *Ten Commandments (Exod. 19.16–17; Deut. 5.20–21), where the Israelites are instructed not to bear false witness against a neighbor nor to plot to expropriate ("covet") a neighbor's property (house, wife, slaves, livestock). It is likely that other commandments dealing with social relations have the same restriction: premeditated murder, adultery, and kidnapping are prohibited when perpetrated by one Israelite against another; the commandments against these crimes are not necessarily universal in scope.

Varying understandings of extent of the obligations of mutual assistance are found in different legal traditions in the *Pentateuch. Thus, while Deuteronomy 22.1–4 enjoins the Israelites to return lost animals and property to their "brother" (NRSV: "neighbor"), and to assist him when a pack animal has fallen under a heavy load, in Exodus 23.4–5 this philanthropic obligation extends even to the enemy, to "one who hates you."

Given the wide range of meanings for the word "neighbor," it is not surprising that debate about its interpretation existed in Jewish tradition. The *lawyer's question to Jesus reported in Luke 10.29 seems to echo that debate: "Who is my neighbor?" Jesus' response to the question is the parable of the Good Samaritan (Luke 10:30–37), in which Jesus extends the obligations of Jews toward each other to include those outside the community as well. By choosing as the hero of the parable a *Samaritan, a member of another group (see John 4.9; cf. Matt. 10.5), Jesus implies a maximalist interpretation of the concept of "neighbor." The same view is expressed in Jesus' saying "Love your enemies, do good to those who hate you" (Luke 56.27; cf. Matt. 6.44), and is generally characteristic of the *ethic demanded of Christians, as derived from Jewish tradition: the command of Leviticus 19.18, "Love your neighbor as yourself," is cited throughout the New Testament as an essential part of, even the very essence of the *Law (Matt. 19.19; Mark 12.31 par.; Rom. 13.9; Gal. 5.14; James 2.8).

MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Nephilim. The Nephilim (from Hebr. nāpal, "to fall," hence probably "the fallen ones") are mentioned in Genesis 6.4 and Numbers 13.33. In Genesis, they are the children of the *sons of God and human women, and are called "heroes of old" and "men of renown." In Numbers, they are described as the giant aboriginal inhabitants of *Canaan, living at the time of Moses. It is not clear why or how the Nephilim survived the *Flood to become the original Canaanites; probably a duality of older oral traditions can be detected in the clash between these two texts. The Nephilim seem to share a common fate in Genesis and in Numbers, perhaps generated by their name—they exist only to die in a great destruction, either the Flood or the Israelite *conquest. The Nephilim seem to be related to the *Rephaim (cf. Num 13.33 and Deut. 2.11), whose name is also connected with the dead, who are also giants, and who are also wiped out by the early Israelites.

RONALD S. HENDEL

New Jerusalem. See Jerusalem, article on Symbolism.

Nile. The exact etymology of the name of the great river of *Egypt derived from the Greek neilos is uncertain. The Egyptian name yoteru (later Coptic eiōr) is probably the basis of Hebrew yĕʾōr. The Nile, the longest river in the world (6540 km [4062] mi), rises in a number of lakes in Central Africa and is joined by a tributary, the Blue Nile, near the city of Khartoum in the Sudan. The facts of its source were unknown to the Egyptians, who imagined that this was at Aswan, where the turbulent waters of the First Cataract were thought to well up from an underground cavern to flow north into Egypt and south into Nubia.

The Nile maintained the vegetation both in the extensive marshes in the north and on the agricultural lands bordering on its banks. From early times, a system of irrigation canals led from the main stream to assist cultivation. In mid July each year the Nile began to rise, overflowing its banks and thus providing natural irrigation. This annual phenomenon, the inundation, also brought with it silt, a natural fertilizer composed of vegetable matter and red mud, largely carried down by the Blue Nile from Ethiopia. The rise of the waters and the deposit of silt accounted for the rich crops of Egypt. The actual height of the rise was important, for too small a rise was disastrous for the farmers (see Isa. 19.5–8), whereas too great a rise would lead to a breakdown of the irrigation system, the breaching of dikes, and the destruction of settlements. The levels of the inundation were carefully recorded by a series of Nilometers positioned along the course of the river. Identified with the inundation was the god Hapi, represented as a pot-bellied hybrid with pendulous breasts and colored green and blue like the flood waters and regarded as the guarantor of all life in Egypt.

In the Delta, the extensive marshes provided a natural habitat for numerous wild birds of all kinds, hunted both for food and for sport. It was in the marshes that the papyrus plant flourished, offering the essential material from which the Egyptians were able to manufacture a satisfactory and durable writing surface. A royal monopoly at one time, the product of the papyrus was exported throughout the ancient world until it was replaced in the ninth century CE by paper (a word that, while denoting a different substance, is derived from "papyrus"; see Books and Bookmaking).

Beyond maintaining ample moisture for successful crops in a land that, apart from the Delta, rarely experiences rain in any great measure, the Nile provided the main highway for travel and transport. Without the Nile it would have been impossible to convey the enormous quantity and weight of stone needed for the construction of the temples and the pyramids. Boats of all descriptions plied on the Nile: warships, cargo vessels, and seagoing ships capable of transporting cedar from Lebanon and copper from Cyprus. In addition, numerous small craft traveled the Nile, some to perform the business of ferries, for there were no bridges across the river, and others (scarcely more than bundles of papyrus plants tied together) to carry fishermen on their tasks. The normally prevailing north wind assisted the passage of sail-fitted boats upstream, while the flow of the river eased the labors of those paddling their crafts downstream.

Roads were unknown in ancient Egypt. There were, however, numerous pathways, mainly along the sides of the irrigation canals, suitable for passage by pedestrians and donkeys, the universal beasts of burden. Wheeled vehicles were almost unknown. Though the horse had been introduced during the period of the Hyksos, it was used only to draw the light war chariot. The camel arrived in the Nile valley only during the time of the Ptolemies. Hence the paramount importance of the Nile for communication and transport.

See Plagues of Egypt. J. MARTIN PLUMLEY

Nimrod. Nimrod (literally, "we will rebel" or "let us rebel" in Hebrew) is described in Genesis 10.8–12 (cf. 1 Chron. 1.10) as a "mighty hunter before Yahweh." The list of the cities of his vast kingdom—Babel, Erech, and Akkad in *Babylon, followed by *Nineveh and Calah in *Assyria—seems to trace Mesopotamian history up to the beginnings of the Neo-Assyrian empire, when Nineveh and then Calah served as imperial capitals. Nimrod's name is likely a polemical distortion of the name of the Mesopotamian god Ninurta, who was a mighty hunter and warrior, a culture hero, and in some texts the ruler of the universe. Ninurta, who had cult centers in Babel, Calah, and other cities, was a divine patron of Neo-Assyrian kings (including Tukulti-Ninurta I, a less likely candidate for the original Nimrod). In Micah 5.5, the "land of Nimrod" is a synonym for Assyria. In postbiblical traditions, Nimrod, the inciter of "rebellion" who ruled Babel, was often identified as a giant (see Nephilim) and as the chief builder of the tower of *Babel. RONALD S. HENDEL

Nineveh (Map 6:H3). The capital of *Assyria in the seventh century BCE, when that empire had annexed the northern kingdom of Israel and forced Judah to pay *tribute. Most biblical references reflect this time, when Nineveh was the center of the Assyria they knew. The book of *Jonah, even if written long afterward, remembers this period of Assyrian glory and Israelite humiliation. *Nahum prophesies the destruction of this enemy (1.1; 2.8; 3.7), as does *Zephaniah (2.13). *Sennacherib is said to have withdrawn to Nineveh after Yahweh inflicted a plague on his army besieging Jerusalem (2 Kings 19.36; Isa. 37.37). Otherwise, Nineveh appears in the description of Assyria in Genesis 10.11–12, where its association with Calah reflects early-first-millennium geography, when Calah (Akkadian Kalḫu) was a major complement to Assur and Nineveh. Archaeological evidence shows that Nineveh already existed in the fifth millennium BCE, and contacts with Sumer and Akkad to the south are recorded in third-millennium texts. Nineveh remained an important Mesopotamian city for the next two thousand years, though it only became capital of Assyria under Sennacherib. DANIEL E. FLEMING

Noah. The son of Lamech, and the father of Shem, Ham, and Japheth (Gen. 5.28–32), Noah was the hero of the biblical *Flood narrative (Gen. 6.9–9.17) and the first vintner (Gen. 9.18–28). After observing the corruption of all creation, God determined to cleanse and purify the earth through a flood (Gen 6.1–7). Noah, however, found favor with God (Gen. 6.8–9), and he, together with his family and the seed of all living creatures, entered the *ark and survived the deluge. From them the earth was then repopulated (Gen. 10).

In many respects Noah was a second *Adam. The *genealogy of Genesis 5 makes his birth the first after the death of the progenitor of humanity. Like Adam, all people are his descendants. God's first command to the primordial pair to "be fruitful, and multiply, and fill the earth" (Gen. 1.28) is echoed in God's first command to Noah and his sons after the Flood (Gen. 9.1).

Other biblical figures in turn look back to Noah and are compared to him. *Moses also had to endure a water ordeal (Exod. 2.1–10); in fact, the only other time that the Hebrew word for ark (tēbâ) is used in the Bible is for the basket in which Moses was saved (Exod. 2.3, 5). In Christian tradition, Noah is viewed as a precursor of Jesus (Luke 17.26–27), and the waters of the Flood are compared to the waters of *baptism (1 Pet. 3.18–22).

Noah has traditionally been viewed as an exemplary righteous person (Ezek. 14.14, 20; Heb. 11.7; 2 Pet. 2.5; and extensive postbiblical Jewish, Christian, and Muslim literature). However, the phrase "righteous in his generation" (Gen. 6.9) has also been interpreted to mean that at any other time Noah's righteousness would not have been viewed as extraordinary (b. Sanh. 108a).

The legend of a hero who survives an inundation to repopulate the earth is one found in many cultures. Most closely related to the biblical account are the stories from ancient Mesopotamia. In the Sumerian flood story, the pious king Ziusudra survives two to three attempts, including a flood, to destroy humanity. After his ordeal, he offers a sacrifice to the gods, repopulates the earth, is granted immortality and sent to live in paradisiacal Dilmun. The eleventh tablet of the *Gilgamesh Epic relates the story of Gilgamesh's ancestor Utnapishtim, who survived the flood to gain immortality through a capricious act of the god Ea/Enki. Many of the images and details of the story parallel the biblical account. Contextually closest to the biblical story is the Atrahasis Epic, which places the flood story in the context of a primeval history. In this version Atrahasis, the "exceedingly wise one" (also an epithet of Utnapishtim), survives three attempts to destroy humanity, the last of which is a flood. The great noise of humanity and the earth's overpopulation are given as reasons for the god Enlil's wish to bring destruction. After the flood, a divine compromise is reached on ways to limit the earth's population, an idea specifically rejected in the biblical account (Gen. 9.1).

See also Ham/Canaan, Cursing of.

CARL S. EHRLICH

Nomads. When the Israelites came before God in *Canaan, the *Promised Land, bearing the first fruits of the harvest, they were to remind themselves of their origin with the words, "A wandering Aramean was my father" (Deut. 26.5)—a reference to *Jacob who, once he left his father-in-law in Haran, had no permanent home. He moved from a settled to a partly nomadic, herder's life; leaving Egypt, his descendants after forty years in the wilderness moved to a settled, agricultural life. Exchanging one way of life for the other was not an unusual act; there were always connections between the two, for nomads always need the town or village crafts and trade.

Nomadic life leaves little trace. The Bible and virtually all other ancient records were written by townsfolk, so our information is usually colored, somewhat hostile to nomads. The Egyptians thought their life-style uncivilized, and the Babylonians about 2000 BCE despised them as those who had no permanent homes, ate their meat raw, and did not bury their dead. At that time, tribes from central Syria moved into *Babylonia. The Babylonian scribes called them *Amorites, or "westerners." They overran the ancient cities and set up new states, at first on a tribal basis. King vied with king, and the famous *Hammurapi briefly dominated them all. Babylonian urban culture overwhelmed the Amorites; apart from the language, no certain Amorite characteristics can be distinguished. Babylonian scribes marked as Amorite some names that have non-Babylonian features. Such names appear in Syria-Palestine, including some in Genesis (e.g., Jacob, Ishmael). Israel's ancestors may be reckoned among these early second-millennium people. Like Israel, other states later traced their history back to nomads "who lived in tents" (see the Assyrian King List). Interaction between townsfolk and nomads, "the desert and the sown," is illustrated by texts from *Mari on the mid-Euphrates written about 1800 BCE. Mari's kings constantly tried to control neighboring tribes by force or diplomacy, lest they overrun the town. Israel faced the same problem with *Amalekites and *Midianites (see, e.g., Judg. 6). Nomadic simplicity appealed to some, and the *wilderness period seemed to be an ideal state, unalloyed by the evils of Canaanite religion (Hos. 2.14–15; 12.9). Jehonadab son of Rechab began such a movement in Israel in the ninth century BCE (2 Kings 10.15; Jer. 35.10) lasting over two centuries, yet ending in the city's shelter (Jer. 35.11; see Rechabites).

In the New Testament, nomadic life is taken as a figure of the spiritual life (Heb. 11.8–10, 13–16), and a reminder that the physical is transitory.

See Social Sciences and the Bible, article on Cultural Anthropology and the Hebrew Bible.

ALAN MILLARD

Numbers, The Book of. The book of Numbers appears in the first major section of literature in the Bible, that section known as *Torah or, in its Greek dress, the *Pentateuch. The name of the book in English reflects the Greek title, arithmoi, and arises from various texts at the beginning of the book that refer to the numbers of people counted in a census of Israel (see 1.2). The title of the book in Jewish tradition, bĕmidbar ("in the wilderness"), appears as a key term in the first verse of the book and locates events about to be described. Indeed, the principal topic in the entire book is *Moses' leadership of the people of Israel "in the wilderness" under the direction of God.

Analysis. The book falls into two major sections, 1.1–10.10 and 10.11–36.13. The first section continues the tradition carried in the last part of the book of *Exodus and the entire book of *Leviticus by reporting items in the legal corpus associated with the gift of the *Law at *Sinai. The second section picks up the narrative tradition from Exodus 19, a tale that recounts the arrival of Israel at Sinai, by reporting Israel's departure from the holy mountain and the continuation of the *wilderness journey. The narrative about the wilderness wanderings does not end with the close of the book of Numbers. Rather, it continues into *Deuteronomy, ending with an account of the death of Moses while the people of Israel are poised before the *Jordan. Indeed, one must ask whether the narrative does not move beyond the classical definition of Torah or Pentateuch in order to recount traditions about Israel's entry into the land of *Canaan in the book of *Joshua. In that case, the larger literary context for the book of Numbers would be the Hexateuch.

As a part of the received text of the Bible, the final form of the book of Numbers does not demand interpretation as an independent and distinct unit. It is an intrinsic part of a larger whole. Perhaps the most important point about the position of Numbers in the canonical shape of the Pentateuch/Hexateuch is the juxtaposition of law (Num. 1.1–10.10) and narrative (Num. 10.11–36.13). For the final shape of the book of Numbers, the law carried by the traditions about the events at Sinai cannot be separated from the narrative that declares God's leadership for Israel through the wilderness. Indeed, the legal corpus appears in Numbers and its larger Pentateuchal context simply as a part of the larger theme about Israel's journey in the wilderness. There is a remarkable unity between the book of Numbers and the larger Pentateuchal/Hexateuchal context. But there is a similar mark of unity within the book itself, a unity that binds 1.1–10.10 with 10.11–36.13. Despite its character as legislation that distinguishes it generically from its larger narrative context, the legal section belongs intrinsically with the narrative. It is simply the detail that identifies the importance of Sinai in the larger narrative about events at various sites in the wilderness.

Yet, despite the formal unity in the book of Numbers, some evidence of disunity in the text can nevertheless be detected. Literary analysis of the Pentateuch/Hexateuch has identified at least four strands of narration used in the composition of the text as it now appears. These four sources, identified classically by the labels *J, *E, *D, and *P, were used by editors, according to the hypothesis, to construct the present form of the Pentateuchal/Hexateuchal text. Some evidence for such different literary sources appears in Numbers, particularly in the second major section of the book. A clear distinction between the sources J and P emerges, for example, when one considers the character of literary unity in the story about the spies sent by Moses to explore the land that lay before the Israelites (Num. 13–14). On the other hand, little if any evidence for the sources D and E appears in the book of Numbers, nor is there any evidence for J in its first section. The issue of literary unity and the sources focuses on the narrative section in 10.11–36.13. But even at this point, problems posed by an editorial combination of the two sources do not detract from the sense of theological unity in the received text, a unity created by combining the law in the first section with the narrative in the second section. That sense of theological unity resides in the sources as well as in the final edition of the Torah.

The origin of the book of Numbers must be described not only in terms of a literary process of editing that combined the sources J and P but also in terms of a process that brought the traditions as story and law over the generations to the point that produced the written sources. Storytellers must have recited the traditions about Moses or Balaam, Baal Peor or Midian through generations before the written sources appeared.

Literary Genres. The tools of the storyteller's trade appear clearly in the narratives of Numbers. The larger narrative context that connects Numbers with the story about *Moses and the people of Israel in the wilderness is a classic example of a heroic saga, an episodic narrative that moves the story of the hero from his birth (Exod. 2) to his death (Deut. 34). The episodes in the saga include tales such as those in Numbers 13–14 and 16 and legends such as those in 12 and 22–24. A tale describes an event that unfolds in the story around the dramatic structure of a plot. A legend describes a person without emphasis on the drama that embroils the person with other people in a series of events. Indeed, a legend emphasizes a virtue in the person's character that can be imitated by subsequent disciples of the hero. But in addition to the tales and legends of the saga, the narrative in the book of Numbers also contains a fable. In 22.21–35, the famous seer, *Balaam, stands under judgment for mistreating his donkey, who can see better than he can. The fable typically demolishes overblown images of the great by showing them in their true colors.

It should be clear that the saga embraces not only the narrative episodes, the tales, legends, and the fable, but also the legal units. In 1.1–10.10, legal genres build the structure of the book just as narrative genres in 10.11–36.13 do. Indeed, some narrative genres appear in the legal section (Num. 6. 21–27); and some legal genres appear in the narrative section (Num. 26.1–65).

The legal genres, like the narrative genres, contribute to the process of developing group identity. The first section in the book, for example, is a legal definition of the people, a list of names that appears as the product of a census. The census no doubt allowed the people as a whole to conscript an army in the face of a crisis. But the more significant feature of the list is its definition of structure in the organization of the people. The twelve-tribe unity of the people as a whole lies at the center of the tradition. The unit is important for the history of the tradition about the structure of the people, however, because *Levi does not appear as a constitutive part of the whole. But in order to hold the number in the organization of the people at twelve, *Ephraim takes over the position of *Joseph, his father, and *Manasseh, the brother of Ephraim, assumes the empty spot in the organization. Numbers 26 contains a parallel to the census text, another census of the people in the wilderness. Again Levi is not counted as one of the tribes in Israel, no doubt a reflection of the same stage in the history of the tradition that appears in chap. 1. In this case, Joseph remains as one of the formal units in the organization of the people. But the same entry, 26.28, breaks the tribe of Joseph into the two constitutive tribes, Ephraim and Manasseh. And 26.35 introduces the sons of Ephraim as a distinct factor in the tribal list. It is essentially the same tradition as the list in chap. 1. In both cases, the census list defines the structure of the people of Israel and thus contributes to specification of national identity, indeed, of legal structure in that national identity. (See Tribes of Israel.)

The concern for identity in terms of statistics continues in chaps. 3–4. Chap. 5 creates a legal structure for securing family stability. Chap. 6 defines the structure of life for the *nazirites. In 6.22–27 the series of ordinances controlling domestic life is broken with a small narrative unit that contains the Aaronic blessing for the whole people. Then, 7.1–10.10 specifies cultic ordinances for the people, a significant qualification for Israelite worship. At the heart of these ordinances are specifications for *Passover, 9.1–14, and for moving the camp, 9.15–10.36. The couplet in 10.35–36 reflects a formula for moving the *ark in whatever context, doubtlessly an ancient formula, but given the meager role for the ark in these narratives, somewhat out of place.

Significance. The historical significance of the book of Numbers belongs to the larger context that embraces the book, the historical significance of the Pentateuch/Hexateuch. For the larger context and thus for the book of Numbers, value does not reside in historical accuracy or the lack of historical accuracy. It is not possible to determine, using the standards of verification basic to scholarship, whether a prophet named Balaam really confronted the Israelites with a plan to curse them. The value for the book lies more sharply in the ability of the narrator to paint a portrait of Israel struggling with Balaam, a product that captures by its aesthetic quality a significant witness to Israel's identity. Its aesthetic quality, its ability to depict identity not only for the Israelites in the wilderness under Moses' leadership but for all future disciples of Moses, gives the story value. Indeed, that very quality confirms the claim of the story as true. The book of Numbers is historically significant not because it recounts who Moses was and what he did for the children of Israel in the wilderness but rather because it tells the descendants of Israel, or any other disciples of Moses, who they are.

That historical significance merges in the book of Numbers, as it does in the larger Pentateuchal/Hexateuchal context, with distinctive theological significance. Both story and law tell the disciples of Moses that they belong not simply to Moses, but also to God. The overall structure for the narrative derives from an itinerary that shows the movement of Israel from Egypt to the Jordan. But the itinerary documents not only the movement of Israel along the way in the wilderness but also the leadership of God in that movement (see 10.11–13).

The emphasis falls, however, not only on the presence and leadership of God but also on the obedience of the people to that divine leadership. One facet of the tradition remembers Israel in the wilderness as faithful, obedient to God and to Moses (see Jer 2.2; Hos. 2.14–15). The focus of the legends on obedience to God's word (Num. 12.22–24) highlights this facet of the tradition. But in contrast, the narrative in Numbers reports that the people in the wilderness were rebels, rejecting Moses and the God whom he served. The double picture of Israelite response to God and Moses in the wilderness reflects Israel's struggles to understand its identity.

The story does not end with the end of the book of Numbers. The itinerary structure puts the Israelites on the plains of *Moab by the Jordan, opposite *Jericho. The conclusion combines that ending of the narrative structure for Numbers with the legal dimension: "These are the commandments and ordinances that the Lord commanded through Moses to the Israelites in the plains of Moab by the Jordan at Jericho" (36.13). At the end of Numbers, the reader must ask: "Where do the people go from here? What will they do with the commandments and ordinances?" The book of Numbers necessarily depends not only on the narrative in Deuteronomy but also on the narrative in Joshua to complete the story. The ending calls for recognition of the major literary and theological context as the Hexateuch.

GEORGE W. COATS

Number Symbolism. In common with most people in the ancient world, the Israelites attached symbolic significance to numbers. So whenever the biblical writers mention a number, it is likely that they had a symbolic meaning in mind; in many cases the numbers must not be taken in their literal sense at all.

One signifies uniqueness or undivided wholeness or both. "Hear, O Israel: YHWH is our God. YHWH is one" (Deut. 6.4; see Shema), means not only that the God of Israel is unique, but also that there is no contradiction within him. The oneness of God therefore calls for the trust and love of his people (Deut. 6.5). As God is one, so, some New Testament writers insist, Christ is one with the Father (John 10.30; 17.21); therefore his people must be one (John 17.11; Eph. 4.4–6).

Two, the smallest number larger than one, was the minimum number of witnesses required to establish the truth (Deut. 19.15; cf. Exod. 31.18; Mark 6.7; John 8.17–18; 2 Cor. 13.1; Rev. 11.3–4).

Three is widely regarded as a divine number. Many religions have triads of gods. Biblical faith has no room for a triad, and the number three is rarely connected directly with God. But in some cases this number hints that God is involved. When *Abraham was visited by three men, this meant that God was calling on him (Gen. 18). The *Temple was divided into three parts (1 Kings 6). Three days were the proper time for a work of God, which meant, by the ancient reckoning of time, that it was completed on the third day (Exod. 19.11; Josh. 1.11; 1 Kings 12.5; 2 Kings 20.5; Jonah 1.17; Luke 2.46; John 2.1; etc.). This is also true of the *resurrection of Christ (Mark 8.31; 1 Cor. 15.4). Time is divided into three parts, past, present and future, and God is he who is, who was, and who is to come (Rev. 1.8). According to Paul there are three chief gifts of the Spirit (1 Cor. 13.13). The expression "Father, Son, and Holy Spirit" is not found in the Bible (1 John 5.7b is found only in very late manuscripts); the closest is Rev. 1.4. Neither is the doctrine of the *Trinity expressed there in so many words.

Three and a half years is a strictly limited period, half the full seven of God's plan. It was regarded as significant that there were three and a half years between the desecration of the Temple and its rededication (Dan. 7.25; 1 Macc. 1.45; 4.52; see also Rev. 11.2–3). The drought under *Ahab was believed to have lasted three and a half years (Luke 4.25; cf. 1 Kings 18.1).

Four is the number of the created world. There are four corners of the earth, four wind-directions, four seasons, and four kinds of living creatures: humans, domestic animals, wild animals, and creatures of sky and sea (Gen. 1.20–27; cf. Ezek. 1.10; Rev. 4.6–7). The four horsemen of the Apocalypse (Rev. 6.1–8) were derived from the four winds, but have a different function. The four Gospels were later regarded as signifying the universality of the gospel, and the evangelists were identified with the living creatures of Revelation 4, but this was long after biblical times.

Five is the number of fingers on one hand, and could stand for a handful, that is, a few.

Six is seven minus one. It is the number of incompleteness. The six days of the *creation were not complete until the seventh day of rest had come. In the book of *Revelation six seals, trumpets, etc. represent the course of the world before God's final seventh act brings about the eternal *Sabbath. And in spite of its seven heads, the number of the beast is only *six hundred sixty-six.

Seven, the sum of three plus four, of heaven and earth, signifies completeness and perfection. There were seven chief heavenly bodies (sun, moon, and the five planets known to the ancients), seven days of the week, seven *archangels. The great festivals lasted seven days, and there were seven weeks between the *Passover and the feast of weeks (*Pentecost). Every seventh year was a sabbath year, when the land would rest and lie fallow, and *Hebrew slaves were allowed to go free; and every fiftieth year was a jubilee, when alienated property had to be returned ("jubilee" from Hebr. yōbēl, the ram's-horn that heralded its beginning). The seventh day represented God's completed work (Gen. 2.2–3), and in the book of *Revelation the seventh seal, trumpet, bowl, etc., represent the completion of God's plan. The seven spirits of God (Rev. 1.4) represent either the seven archangels, or "all spirits," or the Holy Spirit. *Seven churches represent the universal church (Rev. 1.20). It is necessary to forgive, not just seven times, but seventy times seven times (Matt. 18.21–22; cf. Gen. 4.24), that is to say, always.

Outside Israel seven was also known as a significant number, and the monster *Leviathan had seven heads. Later interpreters noted that the Hebrew Bible refers to God by seven different *names: YHWH ("the LORD"); ʾădōnāy (Lord); ʾēl and ʾĕlōhîm (God); ʾehyeh ʾăšer ʾehyeh ("I am who I am"); šadday ("the Almighty"); and ṣĕbāʾôt ("[Lord God of] Hosts"). Later Christian tradition noted that the Gospels report seven last words of Jesus in all.

Eight was later used for God's new creation, the day of the Resurrection being regarded as the eighth day rather than the first, but this plays no role in the Bible.

Ten is simply a round number, the number of fingers on both hands. Some interpreters have found a special significance in the fact that the *Ten Commandments correspond with a ten-times repeated "and God said" in the creation story (Gen. 1.1–2.4): ten words to create the world were matched by ten measures to keep it in order. Generally, however, ten, a thousand, and ten thousand simply signify small or large numbers, or are used by multiplication to enhance the significance of other numbers.

Twelve, like seven, is a number of completeness and perfection. This number in particular must not always be taken literally. Israel always comprised more *tribes than the twelve that were actually counted, and the counting of the twelve was not always uniform (Gen. 49; Josh. 13–19; Rev. 7.7–8), but the twelve meant "all Israel." It was regarded as important that there were twelve *apostles and that their number should be complete, but the lists do not quite tally (see Twelve, The). The twenty-four elders (Rev. 4.4) clearly represent all Israel and the whole church. The twelve cornerstones and gates of the new *Jerusalem not only link the city with the tribes of Israel and the apostles, but also signify its divine perfection, as do its measurements of 12,000 stadia square and its walls of 144 cubits. The 144,000 of Revelation 7 and 14 in each case mean that the number is complete and not one of the elect is lost; in Revelation 7 John hears the 144,000 from Israel (all Israel) being counted, but sees "a great multitude that no one could count, from every nation, from all tribes and peoples and languages" (the redeemed gentiles).

Thirty was the age at which one was believed to reach full maturity (Gen. 41.46; Num. 4.3; 2 Sam. 5.4; Luke 3.23).

Forty days was a strictly limited period of time (for six, not seven, weeks?; Gen. 7.4; Exod. 24.18; 1 Sam. 17.16; Jon. 3.4; Matt. 4.2; Mark 1.13; Luke 4.2; Acts 1.3). Forty years was the length of one generation (Exod. 16.35; Num. 14.33; 32.13; Ezek. 4.6; 29.11). It was regarded as significant if a king reigned for this number of years (2 Sam. 5.4; 1 Kings 11.42).

Seventy meant a comprehensive number, and should not normally be taken literally. Seventy descendants of *Jacob moved to Egypt (Gen. 46.8–27; an overliteral scribe added some absurd names to make up the number); seventy *elders led the Israelites in the wilderness (Exod. 24.1); the Temple lay in ruins for seventy years (Jer. 25.11; Zech. 1.12); the Greek version of the Hebrew Bible was believed to have been translated by seventy (or seventy-two) men, hence its name, the *Septuagint, and its abbreviation, LXX; there were believed to be seventy nations (see Judg. 1.7; Luke 10.1); and the *Sanhedrin had seventy members.

In spite of the significance attached by its writers to numbers, the Bible contains no speculation about numbers of the kind found among the Pythagoreans, or later in the Qabbalah.

DAVID H. VAN DAALEN

Nuzi Tablets. Dating to the second half of the fifteenth century BCE, the Nuzi tablets are some thousands of texts recovered from the Hurrian levels of Yorghan Tepe, situated about 10 mi southwest of modern Kirkuk in Iraq. During this period the site bore the Hurrian name Nuzi, and the entire area was a province of Mitanni. Other sites in the area, such as Kirkuk (ancient Arrapḫa) and Tell al-Faḫḫār (ancient Kurruḫanni), have also yielded texts of the Nuzi type, all written in the same Akkadian patois, reflecting the native Hurrian background of the scribes. Some of the Nuzi tablets comprised part of the official archives of the palace and include administrative inventories and letters. Others stemmed from private archives of wealthy Nuzi families and include business contracts involving real estate, loans, and servitude; family records of marriage, adoption, and property settlement; and transcripts of litigations and court proceedings.

It is the Hurrian setting of the Nuzi tablets that has attracted the attention of biblical scholars, for the texts, replete with Hurrian personal names and terminology, show certain affinities with biblical customs. The providing of a slave girl to one's husband by a sterile wife, the ranking of heirs and the preferential treatment of the designated eldest, the association of household gods with the disposition of family property, the conditional sale into slavery of freeborn daughters, and the institution of ḫābiru-servitude (see Hebrews) were some of the Nuzi customs attributed to Hurrian practice. Growing evidence from *Ugarit, *Mari, and Alalakh of a substantial Hurrian presence in the ancestral homeland of Aram-naharaim in the Middle Euphrates region further revealed strong signs of Hurrian influence. On the basis of the Nuzi data, some scholars have dated the ancestral period to the middle of the second millennium BCE.

Reexamination of the Nuzi material in the last twenty-five years has seriously challenged the validity of some proposed parallels between the Nuzi texts and the Bible and their relevance for dating the period of the *ancestors. Furthermore, the uniquely Hurrian character of Nuzi legal traditions can no longer be accepted. Nevertheless, the Nuzi tablets remain a major primary source for the study of Mesopotamian socioeconomic legal practices and thus help to illuminate biblical *law, institutions, and customs.

BARRY L. EICHLER

O

Obadiah, The Book of. This book of twenty-one verses, the shortest in the Hebrew Bible, is formed of three distinct parts. Vv. 1–4 announce the Lord's decision to destroy *Edom because of its pride and its betrayal of *Judah. Vv. 15–18 announce the *day of the Lord for all nations. And vv. 19–21 proclaim that the Lord's dominion will be demonstrated by the return of dispersed Israelites to live in *Canaan.

The title gives us no information about the author except a name; Obadiah means "servant of the Lord." It gives no help in dating the book, though internal references imply that the destruction of *Jerusalem of 587/586 BCE had already occurred.

The book's concentration on Edom calls for a review of the relation of that country to Judah and Israel. Biblical tradition sees the Edomites as distant relatives of Israel through a common ancestor, *Isaac. The Edomites are understood to be the descendants of *Esau, as Israelites are descendants of *Jacob (Gen. 25.19–26; 36). Already settled in Edom when *Moses led the Israelites toward Canaan, they refused the Israelites passage through their territory (Num. 20.14–19). Edom and Judah were rivals for territory and power through the period of the monarchy. Although neither 2 Kings nor 2 Chronicles mentions Edom's participation in the sack of Jerusalem in 587/586 BCE, other books imply their guilt (e.g., Ps. 137.7; Lam. 4.21–22; Isa. 63.1–6; Joel 3.19; Mal. 1.4). All mention of Edom ends during the early part of the fifth century BCE, but no account of its destruction is available.

The book is called a "vision"; the books of *Isaiah and *Nahum share that description. It apparently describes a literary form that allows the readers to hear God announcing his decisions relating to history. All the forms are highly dramatic and include insights into the happenings of the heavenly court where the Lord reigns.

Obadiah's position among the Minor Prophets is stable in most texts. It is a pivotal book in the ascending scale toward *Micah in the center. It is an exponent of the return-from-exile style of *eschatology (vv. 19–21), also found in Amos 9, *Jeremiah, and *Ezekiel. This contrasts with the view in *Hosea, *Joel, and the books after Micah, in which the future of Israel is seen as being a worshiping people among the empires, hoping for a rebuilt *Temple but not expecting a return to political power.

The first part of the book (vv. 1–18) proclaims the Lord's readiness to exact retribution from Edom for wrongs done to Judah, her neighbor.

The last section (vv. 19–21) proclaims the hope that the kingdom of God will be established, that the dispersed people of Israel and Judah will return to their homelands, and that they will have power over their neighbors, especially Edom.

The central message of the book is found in v. 21: the dominion of God is sure and secure. The book should be read in the context of the Minor Prophets and of Isaiah, for Obadiah's views are balanced by *Habakkuk and other books from Micah through *Malachi. They put much more emphasis on the future Israel's worship of the Lord in Jerusalem than on political power over others. JOHN D. W. WATTS Olives, Mount of. The Mount of Olives is part of a ridge east of *Jerusalem directly across the Kidron Valley in the direction of Bethany and Jericho (Map 9); the ridge's northern extension is called Mount Scopus (Josephus, War 2.19.527), and its lower slopes *Gethsemane. With an elevation of approximately 850 m (2,800 ft), the ridge is higher than the Temple Mount across the Kidron Valley to the west.

In the Hebrew Bible the Mount of Olives is mentioned by name twice. In 2 Samuel 15.30–32 we are told of a sanctuary there (cf. 1 Kings 11.7; 2 Kings 23.13). Zechariah 14:4 claims this is where the Lord's feet will stand on the apocalyptic *day of the Lord.

In the Gospels, the Mount of Olives is the place where Jesus goes for rest or prayer when he is in or around Jerusalem (Matt. 24.3; 26.30 par; Luke 21.37; John 8.1). Jesus enters Jerusalem from the Mount of Olives (Matt. 21.9 par.), and it is there that the apocalyptic discourses in Mark and Matthew are set; Mark 13.3 may be an allusion to Zechariah 14.4. In Acts 1:12 the Mount is implied as the site of Jesus' *ascension. These events in the narrative of the last days of Jesus in and around the Mount of Olives has made it a site for pilgrims to Jerusalem since the fourth century CE, when a small church was founded there; this may have been the basilica built by Constantine's mother Helena, mentioned by Eusebius (Vita Const. 3.43).

J. ANDREW OVERMAN

Omega. See Alpha and Omega.

Onan. The second son of Judah and his Canaanite wife Bath-shua (or "the daughter of Shua"; Gen. 38.2; 46.12; Num. 26.19; 1 Chron. 2.3). After the death of his older brother Er without progeny, Judah ordered Onan to impregnate Er's wife Tamar. Although Onan did cohabit with Tamar, "he spilled his seed on the ground"; for this he was put to death by God (Gen. 38.6–10). Onan's effort to avoid impregnating his sister-in-law has given rise to the term "onanism," a synonym for masturbation. This passage is then employed by some to indicate divine condemnation of autoeroticism. This interpretation, however, completely misses the point of the passage. Onan's sin was not sexual. Rather, it was his refusal to fulfill the obligation of *levirate marriage (Deut. 25.5–10; see also Ruth 4), according to which a man was obligated to impregnate the wife of his brother if his brother had died without an heir, thus ensuring the continuation of his brother's line and inheritance. That fulfilling this obligation often raised additional questions regarding the apportioning of the familial inheritance is indicated by the above passages from Deuteronomy and Ruth. Thus Onan's sexual act, most probably coitus interruptus, was the means whereby he avoided his fraternal duty, in spite of the fact that he seemed to be fulfilling it by cohabiting with Tamar. For this deception he was punished.

CARL S. EHRLICH

Oracle. A communication from a deity on some particular matter. The documentation from the ancient Mediterranean world, both biblical and extrabiblical, preserves many citations of, or allusions to, such oracles. Frequently, oracles are conveyed in the setting of a sanctuary, for example, the temple of Apollo at Delphi in Greece, or the *high place of Gibeon where *Solomon received a divine message in a dream (1 Kings 3.4–15). In communicating its oracles, the deity may make use of either mechanical devices—for example, the lots known as *Urim (1 Sam. 28.6; cf. Acts 1.26)—or of a human intermediary, the "prophet." Oracles may come in response to a human "inquiry" (Jer. 21.2) or at the divine initiative. In either case, however, it is recognized that God remains free either to give or withhold the oracle (2 Sam. 14.37; 28.6; Ezek. 20.3).

In content, biblical oracles range from one-word responses to yes-or-no questions (2 Sam. 2.1) to the extended discourses mediated by prophets like *Jeremiah or *Ezekiel. Like extrabiblical oracles, the latter are characterized by an elevated, poetic style, evidencing a certain ambiguity and indeterminacy.

In terms of purpose, the oracles of the prophetic books can be classified generally as either "judgment speeches" or "oracles of salvation." The former have as their intention the announcement of the evil fate awaiting the addressee. They typically consist of an accusation that serves to motivate the following statement of the punishment that God will bring on the guilty individual, group, or nation (see, e.g., 2 Kings 2.3–4; Amos 4.1–3; 8.4–14; Mic. 3.7–12). This type predominates in the material of the preexilic prophets. The oracle of salvation, which comes to the fore during the *exile (with Second Isaiah) and afterward, announces God's coming positive interventions for those addressed. These may concern both the improvement of their external circumstances (return to the land, restoration of the Davidic line, etc.) as well as their internal purification or revitalization (see, e.g., Isa. 43.1–7; Jer. 31.31–34; Ezek. 16.59–63; 37.1–14; Hag. 2.20–23). Oracles of salvation are sometimes conditional on a prior human initiative of *repentance (Mal. 3.6–12), but more often are grounded solely on God's impenetrable *mercy.

CHRISTOPHER T. BEGG

Orphan. In biblical Israel, as in the ancient Near East in general, the socioeconomic well-being of a community depended primarily on the ability of adult males to provide financially for those around them, to protect them from physical harm, and, in general, to uphold their honor ("name"). Persons without a specific male to fulfill these obligations were at greatest risk in the community; therefore, there are many calls for the protection and proper treatment of the husbandless ("*widows") and the fatherless ("orphans"), as well as others at risk in an Israelite community. In the Hebrew Bible, "widows" are mentioned alongside "orphans" in thirty-four of the forty-two occurrences of the latter. This pairing continues into the *Apocrypha (e.g., 2 Macc. 3.10), the New Testament (James 1.27), and early church writings (e.g., 1 Clem. 8.4). Other individuals at risk mentioned less frequently with "orphans" are *aliens (Deut. 24.17, 20, 21), the weak, the needy, the *poor, the destitute (Ps. 82.3–4; Isa. 10.1–2; Zech. 7.9–10), and *Levites (Deut. 14.29; 16.11, 14). The greatest concerns of these individuals are that they will be unable to protect the property they have (Job 24.3; Prov. 23.10), unable to support themselves financially (2 Kings 4.1), and unable to maintain the "name" of their deceased husband or father (Deut. 25.5–7; 2 Sam. 14.7). They are not, however, necessarily propertyless (see Prov. 23.10; 2 Macc. 3.10).

To provide care for these individuals is to "do justice" to them (Deut. 10.18; 24.17; 27.19; Ps. 10.18). Tragically, the males in a community often shirk this responsibility (Deut. 25.5–10; Ruth 4.6) or even exploit their neighbors and relatives who are at risk (2 Sam. 14.4–11; cf. Judg. 11.1–3). Those who perpetrate such injustices are called "fools" (Prov. 23.10) and "wicked" (Pss. 82.3; 146.9). The failure or inability of "orphans" and others at risk to gain support forces them to turn to royal administrators for help (2 Kings 4.13; 8.5; Jer 22.1–3). So, a primary responsibility of Israel's kings is to care for needy persons, like orphans (Ps. 72.1–4, 12–14). Unfortunately, this responsibility is mentioned most often in prophetic condemnations of the royal bureaucracy for failing to fulfill it (Isa. 1.23; 10.2; Jer. 5.28; Ezek. 22.7). The theological foundation for these condemnations is important to recognize. God is the ultimate example of one who is concerned for the welfare of individuals like orphans (Deut. 10.18; Pss. 10.14, 18; 94.6; 146.9); he is the ultimate "*redeemer" for the orphan (Prov. 23.10–11; cf. Ps. 68.6). The king and his officials are watched and criticized more than others because they have been designated as God's overseers of the people, including orphans. The failure of the king and his officials to "do justice" to orphans not only reflects badly on them but also on the God who established them.

In the New Testament, besides the exhortation to "care for orphans and widows in their distress" (James 1.27), the only reference to "orphans" appears in John 14.18 ("I will not leave you orphaned"). The imagery suggests that Jesus' followers, by themselves, would not be able to maintain their "inheritance" from God; but Jesus is saying that he will act as their protector and provider.

TIMOTHY M. WILLIS

P

P. The abbreviation for the Priestly source in the *Pentateuch. Definitively identified in the nineteenth century, P is classically described as a creation of the exilic or postexilic period (sixth or fifth century BCE) that stresses Israelite ritual and religious observance. As such, its narratives, especially in the book of *Genesis, are often etiological, providing explanations for the *Sabbath (Gen. 2.2–3), *circumcision (Gen. 17.9–14), and dietary laws (Gen. 9.4). This priestly tradition describes in detail the *Passover ritual, the ordination ceremonies and vestments of the high *priest, and the *tabernacle and its furnishings. Much of this material is derived from older sources that have been shaped by the priestly writers; this is evident in the prominence given to *Aaron in P, in contrast with the dominant role of *Moses in *J and *E, and the legal materials in the books of *Leviticus and *Numbers. Priestly tradition unites its own contribution and the older material (including J and E) it incorporates by *genealogies and by a series of *covenants, those with *Noah, *Abraham, and finally all Israel on Mount *Sinai. P's deity is more transcendent and less anthropomorphic than J's; his *glory both reveals and conceals him.

Recently some scholars have proposed that the date of the primary work of the priestly writers was preexilic, perhaps even as early as the reign of *Hezekiah (late eighth/early seventh centuries BCE).

The most significant contribution of priestly tradition is the *Torah in its present shape: Genesis begins with the P account of creation, and Deuteronomy ends with the P account of the death of Moses. MICHAEL D. COOGAN Palestine, Geography of. See Geography of Palestine.

Parables. A parable is a picturesque figure of language in which an analogy refers to a similar but different reality. In the Hebrew Bible, the word "parable" (Hebr. māšāl) can refer to a proverb (Ezek. 18.2–3), taunt (Isa. 14.3–4), riddle (Ezek. 17.2–10), or allegory (Ezek. 24.2–5). Although story parables (2 Sam. 12.1–4; Isa. 5.1–7) are not specifically called parables, we should include them in any definition. It is not surprising that in the New Testament "parable" covers a broad semantic range as well, for the Greek term parabolē was used to translate māšāl in the *Septuagint in all but two instances. In the Gospels it can refer to a proverb (Luke 4.23), aphorism (Mark 9.5), metaphor (Mark 7.14–17), similitude (Mark 4.30–32), story parable (Luke 14.16–24), example parable (Luke 10.29–37), or allegory (Mark 12.1–11). In contrast to Aristotelian tradition, no sharp distinction is drawn in the Bible between simile/allegory and metaphor/parable. This is true also in rabbinic tradition. In view of the broad semantic range of the term, it is impossible to give an exact list of Jesus' parables. Although parabolē is used explicitly to designate thirty different sayings of Jesus, when one adds other clear examples in which the term is not used (e.g., Luke 10.29–35) and other likely possibilities, the total number is about eighty. If the instances of the paroimia or "figure" of John are added, the number becomes still greater. Moreover, if one includes every simile, proverb, and aphorism that Jesus taught, then almost everything Jesus said falls into the category of parable (see Mark 4.34).

Numerous attempts have been made to classify the parables. These involve the use of specific chronological periods in Jesus' ministry, distinctive subject matter, as well as literary, theological, and existential categories. None of these attempts, however, has been very successful.

In his parables Jesus repeatedly used illustrations from daily life. These often contain a distinctly Palestinian and even Galilean flavor. This was originally intended to make the parables more understandable for Jesus' audience, but today it serves also to authenticate them. It is clear, for example, that the Sower (Mark 4.2–20) reveals a Palestinian method of farming in which sowing preceded plowing. Likewise, the references to a *priest, *Levite, *Samaritan, a road going from Jerusalem to Jericho (Luke 10.19–35), as well as a *Pharisee, *publican, and *Temple (Luke 18.9–14), indicate that such parables originated in Palestine. The portrayal of a fishing environment in the parable of the Great Net (Matt. 13.47–50), where good fish are separated from bad, strongly suggests that this parable originated around the Sea of *Galilee. The example of farm laborers being paid at the end of the day (Matt. 20.8) according to biblical law (Lev. 19.14; Deut. 24.15) shows the contrast between Palestinian farming, which often employed laborers, and the farming in most of the Mediterranean world, which relied on slaves. Most scholars agree that in the parables one stands on the bedrock of authentic Jesus tradition.

Although the parables are drawn from daily life, they do not necessarily portray normal, everyday actions. On the contrary, at times one encounters both exaggeration and unexpected behavior. The forgiveness of the enormous sum of a thousand talents (Matt. 18.24–27), the fact that all ten maidens are sleeping (Matt. 25.5), and that all the invited guests refused the banquet invitation (Luke 14.18) suggests the intentional use of exaggeration. In the commendation of the Unjust Steward as well (Luke 16.1–8), the hearer is taken by surprise. These forms of exaggeration, however, are fairly specific; nowhere in the parables of Jesus does one find fables in which animals speak or trees sing.

The artistic character of the parables should be noted. Jesus' portrayal of the Prodigal Son is most memorable: Having squandered his fortune, starving and destitute in a far country, "joined" to a gentile (Luke 15.15), feeding the forbidden pigs, he wishes that he could fill his stomach by sharing the food of the pigs he feeds! And how beautifully the father's love is described. Laying aside his dignity, he runs to embrace his son, refuses to hear out his confession, reclothes him in appropriately filial garments, and joyfully celebrates having regained his lost son. The artistry and descriptive power of the parables often require only a single hearing for them to be forever remembered. Such parables as the Prodigal Son and the Good Samaritan must by any standard be recognized as literary masterpieces.

The primary reason that Jesus taught in parables appears to be self-evident: he used them to illustrate. Can one find a better illustration of the love of God for the outcast than the parable of the Prodigal Son? Some of Jesus' parables are clearly "example" parables and require no explanation. Yet Mark 4.10–12 gives a different reason why Jesus taught in parables—in order to conceal his message. The reason given for concealing his message is more difficult still: Jesus did so in order that his hearers would not believe lest they repent and be forgiven. Numerous attempts have been made to explain this difficult passage, but none is truly convincing and without problems. The most common explanation is to see the lack of understanding as being the result rather than the cause of the unbelief of those "outside" (see also Messianic Secret). That the meaning of certain parables was not in fact self-evident is clear from the various explanations associated with them (Mark 7.17; Matt. 13.36). Parables served a useful purpose in concealing Jesus' message from those hostile to him: by his parables he could publicly teach about the *kingdom of God, but the representatives of the *Roman empire could find nothing in them that was seditious. A third reason Jesus taught in parables was to disarm his listeners and allow the truth of the divine message to penetrate their resistance. Often hearers could be challenged to pass judgment on a story before discovering that in so doing they had in fact condemned themselves (cf. 2 Sam. 12.1–4; Matt 21.28–31; Luke 7.36–50). A fourth reason for the use of parables was to aid memory: since Jesus' listeners preserved his teachings by memorizing them, the memorable quality of the parables proved useful.

The early church saw in the parables (and in all scripture) three distinct levels of meaning: the literal, the moral, and the spiritual. In the Middle Ages an additional level was added, the heavenly. These deeper levels of meaning were discoverable by allegorical interpretation (see Interpretation, History of, article on Early Christian Interpretation). A famous example of this is the parable of the Good Samaritan (Luke 10.30–35), in which each detail was seen as meaningful, so that: the man going down to Jericho = Adam; Jerusalem = heaven; Jericho = our mortality; robbers = the devil and his angels; priest = the Law; Levite = the prophets; Good Samaritan = Christ; beast = the body of Christ; inn = the church; two denarii = two commandments of love; innkeeper = the apostle Paul; return of the Good Samaritan = the resurrection or the *second coming; and so on. Of course, such an interpretation lost sight of the original question of what it means to be a neighbor!

Although interpreters of the Reformation sought to end allegorical methods of interpreting scripture, the parables continued to allegorize. More recently, however, new insight has been gained as to the difference between parables and allegories. An allegory consists of a string of *metaphors that have individual meanings, whereas a parable is essentially a single metaphor possessing a single meaning. The details of parable, then, should not be pressed for meaning; rather, one should seek only its basic point of comparison. Although some parables do contain details that have allegorical significance, this distinction between allegory and parable is useful and provides an important rule for interpretation: seek the main point of the parable and do not seek meaning in details unless it is necessary.

In identifying the main point of a parable, several questions prove helpful: (1) What comes at the end? This rule of end stress recognizes that the main emphasis of a parable, as in most stories, comes at the end. (2) What is spoken in direct discourse? In a parable what is found within quotation marks is especially important. (3) To what or whom is the most space devoted? Usually the most space is given to the main point of the parable.

A second rule for interpreting the parables is to try to understand its meaning in its original setting. Jesus did not address his parables to modern readers but to a first-century Jewish audience. The parables take on new life and vitality when one tries to understand them as Jesus' original audience would have. In this regard, the following questions prove helpful: (1) What is the general theological framework of Jesus' teachings? Each parable of Jesus should be interpreted in light of the totality of his teachings. (2) To what possible audience did Jesus address this parable? If addressed to Pharisees and *scribes, its emphasis might be quite different than if addressed to publicans and sinners. The discovery of the Coptic Gospel of Thomas at *Nag Hammadi has provided additional help for ascertaining the original form and meaning of the parables. Since this collection of 114 sayings and parables of Jesus did not stem from any canonical Gospel, it offers an independent tradition for investigating the original form of numerous parables.

A parable may have a specific meaning not only for its original situation of Jesus but also for that of the evangelist. One example is the parable of the Lost Sheep: in Luke 15.3–7 the parable is addressed to Pharisees and scribes, but in Matthew 18.10–14 it is addressed to the church and the "wandering" within Matthew's community. At times the evangelists added allegorical details to the parables that reveal a particular emphasis (e.g., Matt. 21.39). This leads to a third rule of parable interpretation: Seek to understand how the evangelists interpreted Jesus' parables.

Recently, the focus in research on the parables has shifted to literary-aesthetic interpretation. Parables are seen as autonomous works that possess multiple meanings and power in themselves, completely apart from their author. Although it is important to appreciate the aesthetic quality of the parables, the parables of Jesus have been treasured and loved primarily because they are parables of Jesus.

MAJOR PARABLES OF JESUS
(GT = Gospel of Thomas)

Parables found in four gospels
- Soils Mark 4.2–9, 13–20/Matt. 13.3–9, 18–23/Luke 8.4–8, 11–14/GT 9
- Mustard Seed Mark 4.30–32/Matt. 13.31–32/Luke 13.18–19/GT 20
- Evil Tenants Mark 12.1–11/Matt. 21.33–43/Luke 20.9–17/GT 65

Parables found in three gospels
- Divided House Mark 3.23–26/Matt. 12.25–26/Luke 11.17–18
- Fig Tree Mark 13.28–29/Matt. 24.32–33/Luke 21.29–31
- Leaven Matt. 13.33/Luke 13.20/GT 96
- Marriage Feast Matt. 22.1–10/cf. Luke 14.15–24/GT 64
- Lost Sheep Luke 15.3–7/Matt. 18.12–14/GT 107

Parables found in two gospels
- Wise and Foolish Builders Matt. 7.24–27/Luke 6.47–49
- Wise and Foolish Servants Matt. 24.45–51/Luke 12.42–46
- Talents Matt. 25.14–30/cf. Luke 19.12–27
- Wheat and Weeds Matt. 13.24–30, 36–43/GT 57
- Hidden Treasure Matt. 13.44/GT 109
- Pearl Matt. 13.45–46/GT 76
- Great Net Matt. 13.47–50/GT 8
- Rich Fool Luke 12.16–21/GT 63

Parables found in one gospel
- Seed Growing Secretly Mark 4.26–29

Unforgiving Servant Matt. 18.23–35
Generous Employer Matt. 20.1–16
Two Sons Matt. 21.28–31
Lack of Wedding Garment Matt. 22.11–14
Wise and Foolish Maidens Matt. 25.1–13
Sheep and Goats Matt. 25.31–46
Good Samaritan Luke 10.30–35
Barren Fig Tree Luke 13.6–9
Lost Coin Luke 15.8–10
Prodigal Son Luke 15.11–32
Unjust Steward Luke 16.1–8
Rich Man and Lazarus Luke 16.19–31
Unjust Judge Luke 18.1–8
Pharisee and Publican Luke 18.9–14

ROBERT H. STEIN

Paraclete. See Holy Spirit.

Paradise. Originally a Persian word meaning "park" or "enclosure," paradise first appears in the *Septuagint with reference to the garden of *Eden (Gen. 2) and became associated with a pristine state of perfection free of suffering. In *apocalyptic literature the loss of this original paradise represented the loss of the presence of God in human experience, and therefore redemption was imagined as the recovery of paradise whether it was on earth or in heaven. At the end of the world the righteous would be rewarded by a return to paradise.

Although paradise was initially an earthly garden, New Testament writers lifted it above the evils of this world. Paul says that his visionary flight to the "third heaven" carried him into paradise (2 Cor. 12.1–4), and according to Luke 23.43 Jesus tells the penitent thief that at the moment of death they will be together in paradise. Yet Jesus also is reported to have said that the eschatological paradise described by Isaiah (35.5) was manifested in his ministry (Matt. 11.5) and that the qualities of Eden were revealed in his person (John 4.10–14). Clearly, early Christian writers believed that the traditions of paradise were fulfilled in Jesus and his ministry.

GREGORY SHAW

Paraphrases. Paraphrase is a restatement of a text or passage in another form or other words, often to clarify meaning. It is generally restricted to a restatement made in the same language, rather than in another language. As applied to Bible translation, it usually means a version that often alters the original cultural and literary setting of the original, sometimes adding or omitting material in order to make the text more intelligible and acceptable to intended readers. What is sometimes called "paraphrase" in Bible translation is actually a legitimate and necessary device to represent the meaning clearly and faithfully in the target language. As C. H. Dodd noted, the line between translation and paraphrase is a fine one: "But if the best commentary is a good translation, it is also true that every intelligent translation is in a sense a paraphrase." And Ronald Knox made the cutting comment, "The word 'paraphrase' is a bogey of the half-educated. . . . It is a paraphrase when you translate Comment vous portez-vous? by 'How are you?' " No self-respecting translator would translate that French question by "How are you carrying yourselves?"

The earliest scriptures in English, the oral renditions of Caedmon (seventh century CE) and the written works of Aelfric (ca. 1000), were paraphrases. In the sixteenth century, several paraphrases were produced. Jan van den Campen did a Latin paraphrase of the Psalms in 1532, which was translated into English in 1535 (perhaps by Coverdale). The English version of Erasmus's New Testament Paraphrase appeared in 1549. He begins Romans as follows: "I am Paul, though formerly Saul, that is, I have become peaceful, though formerly restless, until recently subject to the law of Moses, now freed from Moses, I have been made a servant of Jesus Christ." In 1653 Henry Hammond, president of Magdalen College, Oxford, produced a paraphrase of the New Testament, which was printed alongside the KJV.

Edward Harwood's Bible (1768) was, as he stated, "not a verbal translation, but a liberal and diffusive version of the sacred classics." His rendition of Luke 1.46–47 is typical: "My soul with reverence adores my Creator, and all my faculties with transport join in celebrating the goodness of God my Saviour, who hath in so signal a manner condescended to regard my poor and humble station. Transcendent goodness! Every future age will now conjoin in celebrating my happiness!" Ferrar Fenton's Bible (1903) may be considered a paraphrase, at least in some passages. It begins: "By Periods God created that which produced the Solar System; then that which produced the Earth." However, because of criticism of the rendering "periods," in the fifth edition Fenton replaced it with "ages," which is also paraphrastic.

Most paraphrases are limited to one book and are usually included by their author in the commentary on that book. Such is the case of J. B. Mayor's paraphrases in his commentaries on James (1892) and on Jude and 2 Peter (1907), and W. O. Carver's paraphrase in his commentary on Ephesians (1949).

F. F. Bruce published his paraphrase of Galatians in the Evangelical Quarterly (January–March 1957), and of other Pauline letters in subsequent issues. In 1965 they were all published in one volume, An Expanded Paraphrase of the Epistles of Paul, together with the text of the Revised Version. In light of current modern language translations, Bruce's work appears quite conservative, hardly qualifying as a paraphrase. Romans 1.16–17 reads: "Believe me, I have no reason to be ashamed of the good news which I proclaim. No indeed; it is God's effective means for the salvation of all who believe, for Jews in the first place but for the Gentiles too. Why? Because in this good news there is a revelation of God's righteousness—a way of righteousness based on the principle of faith, and offered to all men for acceptance by faith, in accordance with the words of the prophet: 'It is he who is righteous by faith that will live.' "

The most popular English Bible paraphrase of all times is Kenneth N. Taylor's The Living Bible Paraphrased (1971). In his preface he explains that, in attempting to be faithful in paraphrasing the text, he has been guided by "the theological lodestar [of] a rigid evangelical position." It must be stated, however, that Taylor's penchant for adding to or deleting from the text, without any justification other than what is dictated by his "rigid evangelical position," effectively removes The Living Bible from being regarded as a trustworthy rendering. It is not that every passage in his paraphrase is tainted (in fact, some are very well done, e.g., 1 John 2.16); it is that readers who are not acquainted with the biblical text will too often be misled by Taylor's handling of it. From dozens of examples that could be cited, two must suffice here. Whereas the Hebrew of 2 Samuel 24.1 states that Yahweh incited David to take a census of the people, Taylor exonerates Yahweh from any responsibility by editing the passage, "and David was moved to harm them." Contrary to what the *synoptic Gospels report, John 12.14 states that Jesus himself found the donkey on which he rode into Jerusalem; Taylor takes care of that problem by eliminating the passage completely!

Paraphrases of biblical texts, responsibly made, are a legitimate and useful way of making the meaning of the text clearer to the reader. When produced by translators who are ruled by rigid tenets of whatever kind, however, they serve only to confirm the truth of the Italian aphorism, "Translators are traitors" (Traduttori traditori).

See also Translations, article on English Language.

ROBERT G. BRATCHER

Parchment. A superior quality of writing material produced from animal skins by a process of cleaning, stretching, and rubbing with chalk or pumice. Parchment is durable and holds ink well on both sides. From the second century BCE, parchment and leather were preferred for *Torah scrolls intended for public reading. Parchment gradually replaced papyrus for most purposes during the first two centuries CE, and it remained the standard writing material in Europe until the advent of mechanical printing. Thus, the great majority of biblical *manuscripts are written on parchment. The membrana mentioned in 2 Timothy 4.13 were parchment or leather documents of unknown content.

See also Books and Bookmaking in Antiquity.

ROBERT STOOPS

Parousia. "Arrival" or "presence," a Greek word used both of ordinary persons and of an emperor or a god. The term is used in early Christianity for the anticipated return of Jesus, when he was expected to judge humankind as triumphant *Son of man (see Second Coming of Christ). The word parousia is found with this meaning in the eschatological *parables of Matthew 24, but otherwise chiefly outside the Gospels, as in 1 Corinthians 15.23, 1 Thessalonians 2.19, and the urgently apocalyptic 2 Peter (1.16; 3.4, 12). *Paul also uses the term to mean the arrival of an ordinary person (1 Cor. 16.17; 2 Cor. 7.6; Phil. 1.26, 2.12).

PHILIP SELLEW

Passover. This festival, observed on the fourteenth day of the month of Nisan (March/April), commemorates the *Exodus of the *Hebrews from *Egypt. Of the five lists of festivals in the Hebrew Bible (Exod. 23.14–17; 34.18–25; Lev. 23.1–37; Num. 28–29; Deut. 16.1–6), only the last three make reference to Passover (Lev. 23.5; Num. 26.16; Deut. 16.1–8), and all of these associate the celebration with the seven-day festival of unleavened bread, which commences on the fifteenth of the month. Exodus 23.14–17 and 34.18–23 mention only the festival of unleavened bread as an early spring celebration. The narrative in Exodus 12.1–36 provides an explanation of the origin of Passover as well as the features involved in its celebration; this narrative also associates Passover (12.1–14) with the festival of unleavened bread (12.15–20).

According to Exodus 12.1–13, the following were characteristic of Passover. On the tenth day of the month, the animal to be slaughtered was selected and set aside for safekeeping; according to Exodus 12.5, the animal was an unblemished, one-year-old goat or lamb, although Deuteronomy 16.2 includes calves. The animal was slaughtered on the fourteenth day late in the afternoon. Some *blood of the animal was smeared on the doorposts and lintels of the houses. The animal was roasted whole (see Exod. 12.46 and Num. 9.12; Deut. 16.7 specifies boiling, which would have required dismemberment). The flesh was eaten, along with unleavened bread and bitter herbs, by members of the household or associated households. The meal was eaten in haste, with the participants dressed for flight. Any uneaten meat, should there be any, was to be burned the next morning.

The eating of unleavened bread at the meal is explained by the haste with which the Israelites had to flee (Exod. 12.34, 39), but no biblical explanation is offered for the consumption of bitter herbs. The daubing of the blood on the doorposts, later assumed to have been part of only the original episode, is described as marking the houses of the Israelites so that God would bypass their homes in the slaughter of the firstborn. (Note the similar substitution of a ram for the firstborn in Gen. 22, and the similar use of a red marker to avoid death in Josh. 2.17–21.)

If people were ritually unclean or away on a journey when Passover was observed in Nisan, they could celebrate the festival in the second month in similar fashion (Num. 9.1–13). Foreigners and thus non-Jews who had settled among the people were allowed to keep the Passover, provided they were circumcised (Exod. 12.48–49; Num. 9.14).

Although Exodus 12 seems to imply that Passover was a home festival and thus could be observed apart from a pilgrimage to a sanctuary, Deuteronomy 16.5–7 requires that the slaughter of the animal and the meal occur at a place (sanctuary) that God would choose. The same pilgrimage requirement seems assumed by Exodus 34.25 and Leviticus 23.4–7.

The Hebrew name of the festival, Pesah, is derived from the verb that means "to protect," "to have compassion," "to pass over," and is used to describe the action of God in the Exodus narrative (12.13, 23, 27). The English designation "passover" shows the influence of the *Vulgate translation.

Most scholars assume that Passover was originally a spring festival, associated with a shepherding culture, that was secondarily related to the Exodus story (note the reference to a festival in Exod. 5.1 before the Exodus). Such a celebration would have been connected with either the annual spring change of pastures or the sacrifice of the firstborn to insure the continued fertility of the flocks (see Exod. 22.29–30) or both. Characteristics pointing to such an origin for the festival in Exodus 12 are the lamb or goat to be slaughtered, cooking by roasting, the time of the year (which coincides with the lambing season and the change of pastures), the absence of priest and altar, the lack of dedicating any part of the edible flesh to God, the family nature of the celebration, and the nocturnal observance at the time of full moon.

The tractate Pesaḥim in the *Mishnah provides a description of the way that the rabbis (about 200 CE) understood Passover to have been celebrated before the destruction of the Second Temple (70 CE). Many of the features reflected in Pesaḥim are thus characteristic of the observance at the time of Jesus (see Lord's Supper), and some have continued in Jewish tradition to the present. The following elements in the celebration are noteworthy.

The people brought their Passover animals to the *Temple in the late afternoon and, because of the numbers of worshipers, were admitted to the sanctuary in three separate groups. The worshipers slaughtered their animals and the priests caught the blood and tossed it against the altar. The animals were flayed and cleaned in the Temple courtyard, with the required fat and internal portions being burned on the *altar (Lev. 3.3–4). While each group was performing these functions, the *Levites sang the Egyptian Hallel psalms (Pss. 113–118) and repeated them if time allowed (Pesaḥ. 5.5–10).

The animals were carried from the Temple precincts and cooked for the Passover meal. Cooking was done by roasting so as not to break any bone in the animal (Pesaḥ. 7.1,11; see Exod. 12.46; John 19.36).

At the meal, everyone ate at least a portion of the Passover animal. The flesh was eaten along with varied herbs (Pesaḥ. 2.6), unleavened bread, a dip (ḥărôset) composed of pounded nuts and fruits mixed with vinegar, and four cups of wine. After the second cup, a son asked the father, "Why is this night different from all other nights?" and the father instructed the son on the basis of Deuteronomy 26.5–11. Between the second and third cups, Psalm 113 (or 113–114) was sung. After the fourth cup, the Hallel was concluded. At the conclusion of the meal, the people departed but not to join in revelry (Pesaḥ. 10.1–8).

The people sought to celebrate the meal as if they themselves had come out of Egypt—"out of bondage to freedom, from sorrow to gladness, and from mourning to festival day, and from darkness to great light, and from servitude to redemption" (Pesaḥ. 10.5).

See also Feasts and Festivals; Leaven.

JOHN H. HAYES

Pastoral Letters, The. Since the second half of the eighteenth century the two letters to Timothy and the letter to Titus have been known as the Pastoral Letters. The three are closely related in both content and form and offer advice about the exercise of the pastoral office in the care and oversight of congregations.

Outline.

1 TIMOTHY

I. Opening (1.1–2)
II. Body of instructions (1.3–6.21a):
  A. The authority of Paul to give instructions to Timothy in the face of false teachers (1.3–20)
  B. The instructions (2.1–6.21a):
    1. On prayer for all (2.1–7)
    2. On the inner connection between the prayer of men and women and their conduct (2.8–10)
    3. On women who are false teachers (2.9–15)
    4. On bishops (3.1–7)
    5. On deacons (3.8–13)
    6. Interlude: basis of and need for instructions for the household of God in the face of false teachers who deny the goodness of marriage and creation (3.14–4.5)
    7. To Timothy to teach Paul's instructions (4.6–5.2)
    8. On widows (5.3–16)
    9. On elders (5.17–25)
    10. To slaves (6.1–2a)
    11. To Timothy to teach the foregoing instructions in the face of greedy false teachers (6.2b–21a)
III. Closing (6.21b)

2 TIMOTHY

I. Opening (1.1–2)
II. Thanksgiving (1.3–5)
III. Body of letter: Paul's example, exhortations, and predictions form his last will and testament for Timothy (1.6–4.18):
  A. Paul bequeaths to Timothy the deposit of faith for which he suffers (1.6–18)
  B. Exhortation to Timothy to be prepared to suffer, like Paul, as a teacher (2.1–7)
  C. Example of Paul who draws strength from the gospel as he suffers (2.8–13)
  D. Exhortation to Timothy to teach faithfully in the face of the evil conduct of false teachers (2.14–26)
  E. Prediction that false teachers will abound in the last times (3.1–9)
  F. Example of Paul's life of teaching amid great persecution (3.10–17)
  G. Exhortation to Timothy to teach persistently; prediction that people will give little heed to sound teaching (4.1–5)
  H. Example of Paul, who at death's door trusts in God to save him (4.6–18)
IV. Final greetings and closing (4.19–22)

TITUS

I. Opening (1.1–4)
II. Body of instructions (1.5–3.11):
  A. Instruction to Titus to appoint elders and bishops in Crete who will promote sound teaching in the face of those teaching Jewish myths (1.5–16)
  B. Instructions that accord with sound doctrine (2.1–15):
    1. On older men and women (2.1–3)
    2. On younger women and men (2.4–8)
    3. On slaves (2.9–10)
    4. Theological and christological bases of the instructions (2.11–15)
  C. Additional instructions (3.1–11):
    1. Instruction to live a harmonious, generous, and gracious life with all (3.1–7)

2. Instruction to do good deeds and to avoid idle words (3.8–11)

III. Closing (3.12–15)

Authorship. The authorship of these letters, called pastoral because they deal largely with pastoral or practical matters and grouped together because they address the same issues in a uniform style, is contested. While the Pastoral Letters have a noticeable Pauline character, there are five major areas in which they differ from the indisputedly genuine Pauline letters. First, the vocabulary (e.g., "the saying is sure" [1 Tim. 1.15; 3.1; 4.9; 2 Tim. 2.11; Titus 3.8]) and style vary greatly from those of the letters to the *Romans and *Corinthians and are closer to those of the apostolic fathers such as Polycarp. Second, the theological concepts (e.g., "the faith") and the stress on public respectability differ markedly from emphases in the undisputed Pauline letters. Third, church order—*bishops, *elders, *widows, *deacons—does not correspond to that found in the genuine Pauline letters but is more like that in evidence toward the end of the first century CE. Fourth, the author relies much more heavily on traditions, both creedal and hortatory, than the *Paul of the authentic letters; unlike Paul in *Galatians, for example, he rarely argues theologically with opponents but merely upbraids them. Finally, the Pastoral Letters do not fit into the career of Paul as detailed in *Acts and Romans. The chronology of the Pastoral Letters presupposes that Paul was freed from his imprisonment in Rome, changed his plans to go to Spain, journeyed back to the East on another missionary enterprise, was imprisoned a second time, and was then martyred.

Theories that attempt to account for these differences are as follows. First, accepting the Pastoral Letters as fully authentic, it is felt that Paul was indeed freed from his first imprisonment and returned to the East for further missionary work. 1 Timothy and Titus reflect this mission. Arrested again, Paul was imprisoned, tried, and executed in Rome. 2 Timothy issues from the time of this second imprisonment. Paul's need to establish church order in communities and to counteract false teachers accounts for the different vocabulary of the Pastoral Letters. These last letters date to ca. 65 CE, and because they stem from an aged Paul, they lack the theological acumen of a vibrant and young Paul.

Another theory also presupposes further missionary work by Paul in the East, but it accounts for the high incidence of uncharacteristic Pauline elements in the Pastoral Letters by postulating that Paul employed a secretary to whom he gave greater responsibility in creating these letters ca. 65 CE.

A third theory holds that the Pastoral Letters contain so many un-Pauline words and concepts because they were written by a later author, who, ca. 85 CE, desired to apply the teaching of Paul to new situations in the Pauline missionary territory. This author worked into his letters fragments of genuine Pauline letters, such as 2 Timothy 1.15–18, 4.6–22, and Titus 3.12–14. These authentic fragments account for the personal notes, which a later author presumably would not have invented.

A fourth theory is more radical and maintains that the letters are completely pseudonymous and are in this regard like the contemporary pseudonymous Socratic letters, which are written under Socrates' name and apply his teaching to a later time. In writing three letters, the author was influenced by the trend in evidence in Cicero, Seneca, and Pliny of publishing a collection of letters. Writing ca. 100 CE, the author uses personal notes to add verisimilitude to the letters and to present Paul as an example to be imitated. Thus, for example, the personal note of 2 Timothy 4.13, which depicts the imprisoned Paul asking that the cloak he left behind in Troas be brought to him, adds local color to the letter and also shows how Paul embodies his teaching of contentment with the basic necessities of life (1 Tim. 6.8). The view adopted here is a modification of this fourth position and dates the Pastoral Letters ca. 85 CE.

Purpose. The goal of the Pastoral Letters is to provide instructions on how the household of God should live in Paul's spirit during the post-Pauline era, when the expectation of the Lord's imminent coming has receded and teachers are propounding false doctrine in the apostle's name. In this situation the author writes to two of Paul's most trusted collaborators with a message that is actually addressed to an entire church, be it a long-standing gentile church like that of *Ephesus addressed in 1 Timothy or a new Jewish Christian church like that of Crete addressed in Titus. The instructions that are to govern the churches addressed in 1 Timothy and Titus have Paul's apostolic authority behind them (note the imperatives that run throughout the letters, e.g., 1 Tim. 2.1, 8, 12; Titus 2.1, 6; 3.1). By obeying these imperatives, the entire church, but especially its leaders, will inculcate sound teaching in the face of false teachers (1 Tim. 6.1; Titus 2.5). Paul's last will and testament in 2 Timothy requires that the church imitate Paul's example (especially his willingness to suffer for the faith, 1.8; 3.10–11), follow his instructions (4.1–5), hold on faithfully to the deposit of faith (1.13–14), and be guided by his predictions (3.1–10). In doing so, they will be able to combat false teaching (14–19).

It is somewhat difficult to ascertain the exact nature of the false teaching countered in the Pastoral Letters. This is because, unlike Paul, the author rarely argues with the false teachers but is content to hurl stereotyped charges against them, paralleled primarily in popular philosophy. These charges follow a set schema: the false teachers are greedy (1 Tim. 6.5; Titus 1.11), do not practice what they preach (2 Tim. 3.5; Titus 1.16; 3.8–9), are involved in verbal quibbles (1 Tim. 1.4, 6; 4.2; 6.4; 2 Tim. 2.14, 16, 23; Titus 1.10; 3.9), are guilty of many vices (1 Tim. 1.9–10; 2 Tim. 3.2–4), and take advantage of women (2 Tim. 3.6).

Once the stereotypical aspects of the polemic are discounted, the following picture of false teachers emerges. They are Jewish Christians who emphasize the *Law (1 Tim. 1.7; Titus 3.9; cf. Titus 1.14), Jewish myths (Titus 1.14; cf. 1 Tim. 1.4; 4.7; 2 Tim. 4.4), and *genealogies (1 Tim. 4.3–5). They teach that the resurrection has already occurred (2 Tim. 2.18). Some of the proponents of their doctrine are women (1 Tim. 2.9–15). If this false teaching with its emphasis on speculation and depreciation of the material is to be called *gnosticism, then it would be advisable to call it proto-gnosticism, for it cannot be identified with any later known gnostic system or group.

Theology. While the Pastoral Letters were not written by Paul, there is no doubt of their Pauline character. The image of Paul as a prisoner for the faith, known from *Philippians and *Philemon, is reflected throughout 2 Timothy (1.8, 12; 2.8–13; 3.11–13). The Pauline emphasis on the universality of the gospel (see Rom. 1.5) is prominent (1 Tim. 2.4–7; 3.16; 4.10; 2 Tim. 4.17; Titus 2.11). The Pauline accent of God's fidelity to promise (see Rom. 3.3) finds expression in 2 Tim. 2.13; Titus 1.2. That redemption is through Jesus Christ (see Rom. 3.24–25) is underscored (1 Tim. 2.5–6; 2 Tim. 2.11–12; Titus 2.14). The Pauline hallmark that *salvation and *justification are by faith alone and not by works (see Rom. 3.28) echoes in 1 Tim. 1.13–16; 2 Tim. 1.9–10; Titus 3.5–7. The creative theologizing of the Paul of Romans may be past, but the results of that creativity live on in traditions and are actualized by the Pastoral Letters for Pauline churches of the generation after Paul.

In combating the doctrines of the false teachers, the author develops a theology of creation. The theology of the Pastoral Letters fears a benevolent God, who wills life, goodness, and salvation for all men and women (Titus 3.4–7). All that this God has created is good: marriage (1 Tim. 2.15; 4.3), food (1 Tim. 4.3), wine (1 Tim. 5.23), possessions (1 Tim. 6.17–19), the round of humdrum daily human chores (Titus 2.1–10). The instructions that form much of 1 Timothy and Titus demonstrate that this God does not desire that chaos exist in God's world; order in human affairs is willed by the divine creator.

As a corollary of his teaching on creation, the author stresses the human side of "Christ Jesus our Savior" (Titus 1.4). He is also the mediator between God and individual men and women; he is the human being who has given himself up as a ransom for all persons (1 Tim. 2.4–6). Christ Jesus, in the face of the opposition of Pontius *Pilate in his earthly life, remained steadfastly obedient to God's will and made the good confession (1 Tim. 6.13). In Titus 2.13–14 we find dynamically juxtaposed the divinity and humanity of Jesus, the great god and savior who died to redeem men and women from all iniquity and to gather them into a people.

Some of the ethical teaching in the Pastoral Letters has been evaluated as a middle-class or bourgeois ethic, which does not challenge the status quo but strives to live by its norms. Thus, for example, the qualities required of a bishop in 1 Timothy 3.1–7 are basically those required of a general by Onosander (died 59 CE). Similarly, the norms of Titus 2.1–10 are largely those of the patriarchal model of the author's society.

The author's world-affirming ethic and desire to conform to society's standards are also evident in his great concern that the conduct of church leaders should be irreproachable in the eyes of the larger public: bishops (1 Tim. 3.7; Titus 1.6, 7), deacons (1 Tim. 3.10), and widows (1 Tim. 5.7, 10). He takes great pains to ensure that the conduct of *slaves (1 Tim. 6.1; Titus 2.10) and of young wives (Titus 2.5) should not bring discredit on the word of God or on the sound teaching.

The church order of the Pastoral Letters is not that of Ignatius of Antioch (ca. 110 CE) with his insistence of the monarchical bishop with elders and deacons under him. It reflects rather the somewhat loose structure evident in 1 Clement (ca. 95 CE), in which bishops and elders exist side by side. With their offices of bishop (1 Tim. 3.1–7; Titus 1.7–9), elders (1 Tim. 5.17–22; Titus 1.5–6), deacons, both men (1 Tim. 3.8–10, 12–13) and women (1 Tim. 3.11), and widows (1 Tim. 5.3–16), the Pastoral Letters reflect the transition period between Paul, who taught that the church was animated with diverse charismata, and Ignatius, who insisted that one individual be in charge of the churches of a distinct area. In the Pastoral Letters the leaders' task, as demonstrated by the instructions to the two representative leaders, Timothy and Titus, is to guard the deposit of faith (2 Tim. 1.14) and to be apt teachers of sound doctrine, capable of refuting false teachers and revilers (1 Tim. 3.3; 5.17; 2 Tim. 4.1–2; Titus 1.9).

ROBERT J. KARRIS, O.F.M.

Patriarchs. This term has been used in most scholarship to designate the ancestors of Israel, especially in Genesis 12–50, and its adjectival form is also generally employed, as in "patriarchal history," "patriarchal narratives," etc. These designations, however, are misleading, for in the traditions perserved in Genesis 12–50 and elsewhere in the Bible the "matriarchs" are also prominent. The Companion *thus uses the more inclusive terms ancestor(s) and ancestral for the biblical patriarchs and matriarchs, i.e., *Abraham, *Sarah, and *Hagar; *Isaac and *Rebekah; and *Jacob, *Leah, Rachel, Bilhah, and Zilpah, and their children. For a discussion of the ancestral narratives, see Ancestors, The, and Genesis, The Book of.

Paul. Paul was born at Tarsus in Cilicia (Map 7:F3), at about the beginning of the common era. A member of a Hellenistic Jewish family, which could trace its descent to the tribe of *Benjamin (Rom. 11.1; Phil. 3.5), he was given the Hebrew name Saul, as well as the name Paul. Unlike many Jews, he was also a Roman citizen (Acts 16.37; 22.25–28).

As a child, Paul would learn of his Jewish heritage in the local *synagogue at Tarsus. He received at least the final stages of his education in Jerusalem, though, under the guidance of Rabbi *Gamaliel (Acts 22.3; 26.4). He soon rose to a position of some eminence as a *Pharisee, perhaps even becoming a member of the *Sanhedrin (Acts 26.5; Phil. 3.5).

When Christianity first came to prominence in *Jerusalem, he was strongly opposed to it and was prepared to take personal responsibility for ensuring its extermination (Acts 9.1–2; 1 Cor. 15.9; Gal. 1.13). But while on his way to *Damascus in *Syria, chasing Jewish Christians who had fled there, he had a remarkable experience that changed the course of his life. Looking back on it twenty years later, he compared it to the appearances of *Jesus to the disciples after the *Resurrection (1 Cor. 15.1–11); as a result of that encounter, his fervent devotion to biblical faith as understood by the Pharisees was augmented by an unqualified commitment to the gospel.

From this point, his life took a new direction, as he threw himself into missionary work throughout Asia Minor and Greece. He established many churches, and saw himself as God's chosen agent to take the gospel to the *gentiles (Gal. 1.15–16, 2.7–8). The New Testament nowhere mentions his death, but reliable traditions depict him as a martyr in Rome, beheaded during the persecution of Nero in the mid 60s CE.

Sources. We have two major sources of information about Paul: his letters and the book of *Acts. There has been much debate concerning their relative worth. Paul's own writings must obviously have priority, though it is certainly not easy to reconstruct the story of someone's life on the basis of a miscellaneous and incomplete collection of occasional letters. Acts at least appears to provide a plausible framework, but is not always easy to correlate with what can be deduced from the letters.

Both sources must be treated with some caution, for neither was intended to be a biography. He features prominently in Acts, but the main focus there is on the rapid spread of Christianity from Jerusalem to Rome. The letters are mainly concerned with specific circumstances in the life of various churches, and inevitably reflect more of these than they do of Paul's own life. They contain limited personal details and report very few incidents.

Additionally, Acts and the letters deal with different aspects of Paul's life. Acts shows him as a great missionary pioneer, taking the gospel to far-flung corners of the empire. It therefore reports his initial preaching of the gospel to non-Christians and their reactions to it, but it never mentions the letters! But they were written to Christians, and show how Paul related to those already in the church. For this reason alone it is difficult to draw direct comparisons between the two sources of information.

Yet we have little alternative but to try to combine the two sources. Acts provides the one really useful clue to the *chronology of Paul's life. The reference to his encounter with Gallio at *Corinth (Acts 18.12–17) dates this incident somewhere between 1 July 51 and 1 July 52, and by judicious deductions from that it is possible to work out a general outline of Paul's life. But there are still problems. There is no agreement on the number and sequence of his early contacts with the Jerusalem Christians (Acts 11–15; Gal. 1–2). There is also doubt over the number of times he was imprisoned, with Paul apparently implying an imprisonment at Ephesus not mentioned in Acts (Rom. 16.7; 1 Cor. 15.32; 2 Cor. 1.8; 11.23).

Background. Tarsus was a typical Hellenistic city, with a cosmopolitan population and a variety of religious options for its people. Its citizens were well known for their interest in philosophy, and Tarsus was home to several prominent *Stoics, including Athenodorus, adviser to Augustus. No doubt, Paul had at least a passing acquaintance with their thinking, as well as some knowledge of the various *mystery religions and of Greek philosophy in general. He occasionally makes specific reference to *Stoic writers (1 Cor. 15.33), and some have thought his letters show influence from Stoic and Cynic debating styles. But it is unlikely that he had a formal education in such subjects. He did, however, enjoy and appreciate life in the Hellenistic cities, and his metaphors demonstrate close knowledge of urban activities (1 Cor. 3.10–15; 4.9; 9.25–27).

Throughout his letters, Paul exhibits a passionate devotion to his Jewish heritage (Rom. 11.1–6; Gal. 1.13–14; Phil. 3.4–6). He was always at pains to demonstrate that his understanding of the gospel was quite consistent with biblical faith, and that Christian believers were spiritual heirs to ancient Israel. Toward the end of his ministry, he invested much time and energy in maintaining good relations between gentile Christians and the church in Jerusalem (2 Cor. 8.1–15; Rom. 15.25–33). It was his insistence that gentile churches give financial aid to the church in Jerusalem that ultimately led to his arrest and transportation to Rome (Acts 21–28).

His thinking also owed a good deal to the beliefs of the original *disciples. Admittedly, he could declare himself independent of the Jewish *apostles (Gal. 1.11–12, 17), but that was a tactical move in the face of strident opposition. When his presentation of the gospel is compared with other parts of the New Testament, it turns out to have the same basic structure as the preaching of Peter and other leading apostles. Moreover, the practical advice he gave his converts is surprisingly similar to that of other New Testament writers.

The nineteenth-century Tübingen school dismissed this picture as a harmonization produced by the writer of Acts in the interests of the later catholic church. They thought Paul radically different from Jerusalem and Jewish Christianity. More recently, things have turned full circle and some have argued that Paul was actually under the control of the Jewish church, and took his orders from Jerusalem; that too seems unlikely. Nevertheless, Paul was concerned for the unity of Jews and gentiles in the church, and we misunderstand him if we place his life and thinking outside the mainstream of first-generation Christianity.

Missionary Activity. Paul was convinced that on the Damascus road God had commissioned him to take the gospel to the gentiles. Both tactically and theologically he felt it was important that the gospel also be proclaimed to Jews (Acts 13.46–48; Rom. 1.16; 9–11; 1 Cor. 9.20–21), and, according to Acts, his usual practice was to go first to the local synagogue. Galatians 2.7–9, however, indicates that his activity was apparently directed exclusively to gentiles.

In his travels, Paul took advantage of the fine highway system built by the Romans, and in the course of three extended tours he visited most of the key centers in Greece and Asia Minor. Although he had a physical weakness (2 Cor. 12.7–8), he must have been incredibly tough, judging from the list of hardships he survived (2 Cor. 11. 23–27).

Paul seems to have had a carefully designed strategy for evangelism. He aimed to establish churches in the largest population centers, which he could easily reach on the paved Roman roads. From there, local converts could take the message into more remote towns and villages. This was evidently successful. At least one of his letters (*Colossians) was written to a church founded in this way, and later in the first century most of the areas he visited had many flourishing congregations.

Paul's converts were a typical cross section of Roman society. Many Christians were slaves, though the gospel also attracted cultured upper-class Romans. Some were clearly influential people (Rom. 16.23), the kind who would take personal disputes to law courts (1 Cor. 6.1–11) and who could afford to make donations for good causes (2 Cor. 8.1–15; Rom. 15.25–33). Paul's coworkers also enjoyed the typically mobile lifestyle of the upper classes; in the absence of church buildings, the Christian community depended on the generosity of its richer members to provide facilities for corporate worship and *hospitality for wandering preachers (Rom. 16.3–16; Philem. 2, 22; 1 Cor. 16.19). At the same time, Paul was certain that the gospel transcended the barriers of race, sex, and class, and insisted on the equality of all believers (Gal. 3.28; 1 Cor. 12.1–31).

The Letters. Literary epistles were common in the Roman world (see Letter-writing). Though Paul followed the style of the day, in some ways his letters are not literary works. He was essentially a speaker, and his letters contain what he would have said had he been physically present (2 Cor. 1.15–2.4). This no doubt explains his often uneven style. It also highlights some of the problems faced by the modern reader. At least one of Paul's letters (1 *Corinthians) was clearly written in answer to previous correspondence from the church at Corinth (1 Cor. 8.1), and most of the others are a response to information that had reached him in one way or another. But of course we only have one side of the correspondence. And we may not even know that as well as we think, for ancient letter writers often entrusted significant parts of their message to the bearer of the letter to deliver orally. At best, therefore, reading Paul's letters is like overhearing one side of a telephone conversation: it is possible to pick up the general drift, but specific details are more elusive.

Not all of Paul's letters are like this. Some think *Romans a more considered statement of Paul's thinking. *Ephesians seems to have been a circular letter, sent to several churches. And in many letters, Paul shows that his writing can be sophisticated (1 Cor. 13), while his detailed arguments must have been carefully worked out before they were written down (e.g., Rom. 5–8).

Scholars disagree on whether all thirteen letters attributed to Paul are genuine. He regularly used a secretary, and wrote along with associates, so we may expect variations in style. But most doubt that the *Pastoral letters come from Paul (1–2 Timothy, Titus), while others have questioned Ephesians, Colossians, and 2 *Thessalonians, on a variety of theological, stylistic, and literary grounds.

The letters certainly give us an insight into Paul's character. He was a formidable opponent (*Galatians), but he also had a remarkable capacity for deep concern and true friendship (Rom. 16.1–6; 1 Thess. 2.6–9). He had a realistic understanding of human relationships, and was sensitive to those less robust than himself (1 Cor. 7–8). He also had an uninhibited sense of humor (Gal. 5.12).

Theology. Paul did not become a Christian because he was disillusioned with Judaism. He was totally dedicated to biblical faith, and quite certain that it made sense (Gal. 1.14; Phil. 3.6). It was his *conversion experience that changed his life and played a major part in the development of his theology.

He discovered that Jesus was no longer dead, but alive—and must be "the Son of God" (Gal. 1.15–16; 2 Cor. 4.6). He realized that the *Law was not central to salvation, for on the Damascus road God had burst into his life not because of his obedience to the Law but in spite of it. All he could do was to respond to this demonstration of God's freely given love. As he did so, Paul became aware of a moral and spiritual transformation taking place within him, a process that would ultimately remake him to be like Jesus (2 Cor. 2.18; Gal. 2.19–20).

This challenged his preconceptions, especially his attitude to the Law. How could he reconcile his previous understanding of God's will with his new perspective? He did so most eloquently in the conflict with the judaizers of Galatia, arguing from the Bible itself that the Law had always been intended as merely a temporary word from God (Gal. 3.24), and that faith had always been the true basis of salvation, as far back as the time of Abraham (Gal. 3.6–9). This was why he was prepared to argue with such force that gentile converts did not need to become Jews in order to be proper Christians.

But this was not the only way Paul described his beliefs. Elsewhere he refers to the Christian life as "a new creation" (2 Cor. 5.17), in which men and women have been "rescued from the power of darkness and transferred to the kingdom of God's beloved son" (Col. 1.13–14). The "age to come" was not locked up in the future; it had burst into the present through the life, death, resurrection of Jesus, and the coming of the *Holy Spirit.

Paul knew well enough that God's will was not yet fully effective on earth, and he expected a future divine intervention when the power of evil would finally be crushed, and when Jesus would return in glory (1 Cor. 15.20–28; 1 Thess. 4.13–5.11; see Second Coming of Christ). But he was certain that Christians were already a part of God's new order, and the church was to be an outpost of the kingdom in which God's will might become a reality in the lives of ordinary people. Through the work of God's Spirit, individuals (Gal. 5.22–23), society (Gal. 3.28), and the whole structure of human relationships (1 Cor. 12–14), could be radically transformed, so that in the context of a physically renewed world system (Rom. 8.18–23; Col. 1.15–20), God's people should grow to "the measure of the full stature of Christ" (Eph. 4.14). JOHN W. DRANE

Peace. The Hebrew word translated "peace," šālôm, occurs more than 250 times in the Bible, and its richness is shown in its many usages. It is used as a courteous greeting (Gen. 43.23; see Salutations), and also to refer to health or to restoration to health, to general well-being such as sound sleep, length of life, a tranquil death, and even to the physical safety of an individual (Gen. 15.15; 43.27; Exod. 18.7; Josh. 10.21; 1 Kings 22.17; Job 5.23; Pss. 4.8; 38.3; Prov. 3.2; Isa. 38.17).

Šālôm is also used to describe good relations between peoples and nations (Judg. 4.17; 1 Kings 5.26). Thus, it has important social dimensions that can also be seen from the association of peace with righteousness, law, judgment, and the actions of public officials (Isa. 48.18; 60.17; Zech. 8.16).

Šālôm is used, too, to describe quiet tranquillity and contentment (Ps. 119.165; Isa. 32.17; Isa. 48.22). It can also be almost synonymous with friendship (1 Chron. 12.17; Zech. 6.13). The root ideas of the Hebrew word are well-being, wholeness, soundness, completeness.

Šālôm also has theological dimensions. God is described as peace (Judg. 6.24), and its creator and source, who gives it to his people (Lev. 26.6; Num. 6.26; 1 Kings 2.33; 1 Chron. 22.9; Ps. 29.11; Isa. 26.12). Peace in its fullest sense thus cannot be had apart from God (Ps. 4.8; Isa. 45.7; Zech. 8.10–12), a conclusion especially prominent in exilic and postexilic literature (Isa. 54.10; Ezek. 37.26; Mal. 2.5).

The usual Greek word for "peace" is eirēnē. In classical literature it denoted the opposite of war or conflict; later it came to describe a harmonious state of mind, an imperturbability that could exist irrespective of external circumstances. In the New Testament, eirēnē has these overtones as well as meanings derived from šālôm.

The distinctive idea about eirēnē in the New Testament is its mediation through Jesus Christ. He is described as the peace which ultimately unifies humanity (Eph. 2.14–17), reconciling humanity with God (Rom. 5.1) through his death (Col. 1.20). GERALD F. HAWTHORNE Pelethites. See Cherethites and Pelethites.

Pentateuch.

Form. The first five books of the Bible (see Genesis; Exodus; Leviticus; Numbers; Deuteronomy), known as the Pentateuch (Grk. "five-volumed work"), are essentially in the form of a narrative running from the *creation to the death of *Moses just before the entry of the Israelites into the *Promised Land. Although these books contain a great deal of *law (principally in Exod. 20–40, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy), they are not law books in essence. The Hebrew term *Torah, by which the Pentateuch is known, is indeed conventionally translated as "law," but its meaning is better represented as "instruction" or "guidance." Thus, the narratives of the *ancestors in Genesis 12–50 are as much "torah" as are the *Ten Commandments of Exodus 20, since they too offer instruction about the nature of Israel's God, the relationship of Israel to him, and the moral behavior appropriate to life in relationship to him. The "guidance" offered by the more legal parts of the Pentateuch is explicitly directive, as in the many social laws, whether in the style of legal maxims (e.g., Exod. 21.16) or of hypothetical cases (Exod. 21.2–6). Only in a few cases, though, as in the rules governing *sacrifice (Lev. 1–7) or in the instructions for the building of the *tabernacle (Exod. 25–27), is the legislation systematic. In the book of Deuteronomy, chaps. 1–26 being represented as a farewell speech of Moses, there is indeed a distinct hortatory tone in the recollection of the nation's past history (chaps. 1–11) and in the presentation of laws for life in the Promised Land (chaps. 12–26), but the historical setting keeps before the reader the fact that a particular generation in the nation's history is here directly addressed. In the more narrative materials, the "instruction" is indirect and implicit. In some cases the reader is presented with models for imitation (as in the case of Abraham's faithfulness or Joseph's uprightness), but even here, and more especially in the stories like those of *Abraham's deceptions or *Jacob's trickery, there is little direct moralizing. So the Pentateuch does not present itself as a comprehensive set of rules for life, nor does it develop a cohesive theological system, nor does it typically narrate the past for the sake of illustrating obvious or explicit moral truths.

Authorship. Although the Pentateuch has in most centuries been known as "the five books of Moses," perhaps because he is the major human figure in the narrative, it has long been recognized that he cannot have been the author, and that the Pentateuch is in fact anonymous. The Jewish tradition of referring to everything in the Pentateuch as the work of Moses, which is reflected in the New Testament (Matt. 8.4; Luke 20.37; Acts 3.22), proves nothing about its authorship, since it had obviously become customary to refer to these books as "Moses" (Luke 24.27; 2 Cor. 3.15). Within the Pentateuch itself, *Moses is indeed credited with the authorship of a relatively small portion of its content: Exodus 21–23, the laws known as the "Book of the Covenant" (Exod. 24.4–8); Numbers 33, the itinerary of Israel in the wilderness (see Num. 33.2); Deuteronomy 5.6–21, the Ten Commandments (see Deut. 31.24). These sections are, as it happens, among the elements generally considered most ancient by historical scholars. Whether or not Moses can be called the author in a literal sense of anything in the Pentateuch, it is reasonable to hold that his work and teaching were the initial stimulus for the creation of the Pentateuch.

Origins and Date. The overwhelming tendency in biblical scholarship has been to explain the origin of the Pentateuch as the outcome of a process of compilation of various documents from different periods in Israelite history. According to the classical Documentary Theory of the Pentateuch, formulated by Julius Wellhausen and others in the nineteenth century (see Interpretation, History of, article on Modern Biblical Criticism), the oldest written source of the Pentateuch was the document *J (so-called from its author, the Jahwist or Yahwist, who used the name Yahweh for God) from the ninth century BCE. The *E document (from the Elohist, who employed the Hebrew term 'ēlōhîm for God) came from the eighth century, and the J and E sources were combined by an editor in the mid-seventh century. The book of Deuteronomy, a separate source dating from 621 BCE, was added to the JE material in the mid-sixth century. The final major source, the Priestly Work (*P), was combined with the earlier sources about 400 BCE. The Pentateuch as we know it thus came into existence no earlier than the end of the fifth century BCE.

No item in the foregoing reconstruction remains unchallenged, and indeed the theory as a whole can no longer be called the consensus view; nevertheless, no other theory has gained any wide support, so this one remains the point of departure for all study of the date and origins of the Pentateuch. Among those who still hold that it is essentially correct, there has been a tendency to date the Yahwist's work a century earlier, in the time of the united monarchy, to favor an eighth-century rather than a seventh-century date for the composition of at least the core of Deuteronomy, and to allow that the Priestly work, set down in writing during the *exile in the sixth century rather than after the exile in the fifth, may well preserve much older material. More radical revisions of the theory include the proposal that the Yahwist's work should be seen as the latest, not the earliest contribution to the Pentateuch, and that it rather than the Priestly work gave the definitive shape to the whole.

A valuable development of the theory in recent decades has been the attempt to reconstruct the intentions of the authors of the presumed sources as theologians anxious to convey by their presentation of Israel's traditional history a message to their contemporaries. Thus, the Yahwist's message has come to be seen as an address to the age of *Solomon, urging Israel to prove itself to be a blessing to the nations in accord with the command to Abraham of Genesis 12; the Elohist's work is an appeal to ninth-century Israel to live in the "fear" of God in the face of persuasive foreign cults. The Deuteronomist's work is seen as a program for national reform, emphasizing the unity of Israel despite the political reality of the divided kingdom and calling for a unified worship of Yahweh. The Priestly work, then, is addressed to the Babylonian exiles, reiterating the authenticity of Israel's religious and cultic traditions and renewing the divine promise of blessing and superabundance in the land (Gen. 1.26) to a generation who had all but given up hope for the future.

Other techniques of analysis beside the detection of sources can sometimes be integrated with the documentary analysis, and sometimes run counter to it. The form-critical approach, by which the literary forms (such as saga, tale, and moral story—sometimes called legend) are analyzed in order to discover the role they played in everyday life, has on the whole proved congenial to the documentary analysis. Its concern has been to press back behind the literary sources of the Pentateuch to reconstruct the original life settings of its diverse materials, and to postulate patterns of growth of the traditions prior to the existence of any written source. Thus, for example, one influential analysis, by Martin Noth, fully accepted the documentary reconstruction but detected behind them five major "themes" or organizing ideas around which the total material of the Pentateuch had gradually gathered: the promise to the ancestors, the *Exodus from Egypt, the guidance in the *wilderness, the giving of the Law, the guidance into the land.

On the other hand, studies in the techniques of oral composition and transmission of oral literature have tended to call into question the theory of an essentially or ultimately literary growth of the Pentateuch. It is possible, for example, to see the whole of Genesis as one large oral composition, in which differing influences have left their mark in the form of relatively minor discrepancies and disagreements in representation, but which was intended to be heard as a whole, later elements in the story deliberately reflecting and building on earlier (so, for example, with the so-called ancestress in danger stories of Gen. 12.10–20; 20.1–18; 26.1–16). Other researches on the processes of literary composition as disclosed by the present shape of the Pentateuch have suggested that we should envisage individual authors creating large blocks of its material rather than editors interweaving a number of narrative strands, as the documentary theory supposed.

Themes. The question here is, what is the organizing principle of the Pentateuch as a whole, considered as a literary entity? An initial answer is, of course, that the subject matter of the Pentateuch is sufficiently unified to create the impression of general coherence in the work. The last four books in particular, beginning as they do with the birth of Moses (Exod. 2), and ending with his death (Deut. 34), have a strong narrative connection. But it would be wrong to regard the Pentateuch as primarily a biography of Moses, for then there would be no evident connection between its last four books and Genesis, for Genesis is a narrative of the ancestors of Israel in general and not especially of Moses' forebears.

Some have suggested that certain brief summaries of the Pentateuchal narrative found at Deuteronomy 26.5–10 and 6.20–24 (cf. Josh. 24.2–13), having the character of Israelite confessions of faith in the God who had directed their history, indicate the fundamental story line of the Pentateuch as a whole. The essential elements in this "little creed" (Gerhard von Rad) are the forebears' origins and divine election, their descent into Egypt, and the entry of the people into the *promised land. This outline does indeed correspond roughly with the content of the Pentateuch, though it makes the remarkable omission of the events at *Sinai, which constitute a major section of the Pentateuchal narrative. We may perhaps seek a more conceptually unified theme in the Pentateuch than a mere summary of its narrative.

The mainspring of the action of the Pentateuch seems to be the divine promise of Genesis 12.1–3 (repeated with varying emphases in 15.4–5, 13–16, 18–21; 17.4–8; 22.16–18; and alluded to in scores of passages throughout the Pentateuch). This promise contains three elements: a posterity ("I will make of you a great nation"), a relationship ("I will bless you"), and a gift of land ("the land I will show you"). It is the fulfillment, and the partial nonfulfillment, of these promises that may be said to be the theme of the Pentateuch.

The theme of the posterity is plainly the theme of Genesis. In the Abraham cycle of stories, the theme appears mostly in the shape of anxious questions: Will there be a son at all? What will become of him? Here lies the significance of the many Genesis narratives of threats to the family's survival: the sterility of matriarchs, the strife between brothers, often with near-fatal consequences, and the repeated famines in the land of promise.

The theme of the divine-human relationship comes most strongly to expression in Exodus and Leviticus. Both at the Exodus and at Sinai it becomes plain what the words of the promise ("I will bless you," "I will make my covenant between me and you," "I will be your God") meant. The blessing comes in the form of salvation from Egypt and in the gift of the law. The *covenant of Sinai, of which the opening words are "I am Yahweh your God," formalizes the relationship adumbrated by the covenant with the forebears. Leviticus spells out how the relationship now established by Yahweh is to be maintained: the sacrificial system is to exist, not as a human means of access to God, but as the divinely ordered method whereby breaches of the covenant may be repaired and atoned for.

The theme of the land dominates Numbers and Deuteronomy. Numbers begins with preparations for the occupation of the land, and ends with the actual occupation of that part of it lying to the east of Jordan by two and a half of the tribes. Deuteronomy sets before the people laws for their life under God, explicitly "in the land which Yahweh, God of your fathers, is giving to you" (Deut. 4.1).

None of the promises is fully realized within the Pentateuch itself: the posterity as numerous as the sand on the seashore (Gen. 22.17) is a promise that has only begun to achieve fulfillment by the time the Pentateuch is over, the relationship of *blessing and of covenant is a continuing and never wholly fulfilled promise, and the land, at the end of the Pentateuch, is a promise that is only partly fulfilled. The whole structure of the Pentateuch, then, is shaped by the promises to Abraham, which are never final but always point beyond themselves to a future yet to be realized. DAVID J. A. CLINES

Pentecost. The word Pentecost (Greek "fiftieth") appears twice in the *Septuagint as one of the designations of the "feast of weeks" (Exod. 34.22; Deut. 16.10;), which comes between *Passover and Tabernacles (see Feasts and Festivals). In the Hellenistic period, the feast also called for renewal of the *covenant God made with *Noah (Gen. 9.8–17). Later, after the destruction of the *Temple in 70 CE, the feast began to lose its agricultural association and became linked with Israel's sacred history by celebrating the giving of the *Torah on *Sinai. In synagogue worship, it became customary to read the book of *Ruth and Exodus 19–20 (see Lectionaries, article on Jewish Tradition).

Luke gives new significance to the first Pentecost following the *resurrection and *ascension of Jesus. For Luke (Acts 2) it is the fulfillment of Jesus' promise that his followers would receive power when the Holy Spirit would come upon them (Luke 24.49; Acts 1.5, 8; and see also Acts 2.16–21, quoting Joel 2.28–32).

The narrative is replete with allusions to biblical traditions, including *creation and the *Flood, the tower of *Babel (Gen. 11.1–9), and various *theophanies, especially that at *Sinai. Luke does not tell us where the followers of Jesus were assembled when the Spirit came, but the subsequent scene seems to be in the Temple court. The Spirit's coming was attended by "a sound like the rush of a violent wind" filling the house where they were gathered, and is marked by the appearance of "tongues, as of fire"; then the followers "were filled with the Holy Spirit and began to speak in other languages" (Acts 2.2–4). While the reported charge of drunkenness (v. 13) may suggest the kind of ecstatic speech that Paul describes in 1 Corinthians 12–14 (see Glossolalia), Luke understands these "other tongues" as foreign languages and articulate witness. Within Israel, near and distant neighbors are finding their unity in the gospel. For Luke, what happens at Pentecost is a promise of what will happen among all the nations when the gospel will be preached to the *gentiles (see Acts 1.8; 10).

For Christianity, *Easter as the new Passover and Whitsunday as the new Pentecost became the basis for the liturgical year.

JOHN FREDERICK JANSEN

Periodization. See Chronology.

Persia (Map 7:K4–5). The home territory of the ancient Persians was the mainly mountainous terrain east of the head of the Persian Gulf. They called it Parsa (Grk. Persis); it was roughly equivalent to the modern Fars. The first appearance of this name (Parsua) in history, however, on the Black Obelisk of the Assyrian king Shalmaneser III (ca. 843 BCE) and followed eight years later by a mention of twenty-seven chiefs there, indicates a position somewhere in Iranian Kurdistan; but a similar name is recorded somewhere to the southeast a generation later. In 692–691 BCE, the name is cited in an alliance of peoples against *Sennacherib, which seems to have been centered in the Zagros further to the southeast.

By about 640 BCE, when a king named Kurash (Cyrus) appears in Assyrian annals, the Persians seem to have been established in Parsa; this ruling family was Achaemenid (descended from a semilegendary ancestor Achaemenes). It has been supposed that there were two Achaemenid royal lines, one (that of *Darius) in Parsa, the other (that of *Cyrus the Great) in a land called Anshan; but in 1972 it was discovered that Anshan lay in the middle of Parsa. These Persians were Indo-Iranian speakers like the *Medes (Darius spoke of himself as Ariya, i.e., Aryan or Iranian). They may perhaps have reached Parsa in stages from beyond the Caucasus; but some at least could have gradually infiltrated by way of northeastern Iran and Carmania. They were subject to the Medes before Cyrus the Great overthrew King Astyages in 550 BCE; according to Herodotus, they had been subject for the best part of a century.

Under Cyrus and his son Cambyses great conquests occurred in rapid succession: the Median empire in 550 BCE, western Asia Minor (the Lydian kingdom of Croesus) about 546 BCE, the *Babylonian empire with Elam and the Levant in 539 BCE, and (under Cambyses) *Egypt in 525 BCE. Darius I added Sind (Hindush) about 516 BCE. Thus the three great river lands of the Tigris and *Euphrates, the Indus, and (until 402 BCE) the *Nile were subject, and the resulting empire was the most extensive that the world had known.

Efficiency in military preparations and fighting skills had given the Medes and Persians a reputation for invincibility. But the failure to subdue the Scythians about 513 BCE and serious reverses in Greece between 492 and (under Xerxes) 480–479 BCE caused a collapse in confidence. After this, the sole successful major expedition in one hundred years was that in which the heroic marshal Megabyxos reconquered the Delta after a revolt (459–454 BCE). The later kings relied largely on Greek mercenaries and even fleets in their military operations in the west, with no great success, however, until the ruthless Artaxerxes III was able to bring his revolting satraps (governors) under control and in 345–343 BCE to reconquer *Phoenicia and Egypt. In the east of the empire and the Arabian fringes, however, peace seems to have generally been maintained with little exertion of force.

The system of imperial government set up by Darius I continued with little change until the end of Persian rule. In the Iranian and Anatolian satrapies noble Persian fief-holders kept household brigades and maintained order except in mountain regions where occasional punitive expeditions would be launched. Communication with the imperial chanceries was normally in *Aramaic.

In Babylonia and Egypt, a developed administrative system was in existence and was taken over. The kings appointed fiscal overseers in the temples and normally enjoyed the cooperation of the priesthoods. Confiscation after conquest and revolts gave rise to great estates belonging to the king, royal relatives, and leading nobles or court officials. In Babylonia, many fiefs were related to obligations of military service. In what had once been *Solomon's kingdom west of the Euphrates, deportation in *Assyrian times had resulted in a mixed population with little nationalistic feeling except in Judah and Phoenicia; prompt acquiescence to Persian rule had saved the "people of the land" from confiscations after Cyrus's conquest of Babylon.

The Achaemenids worshiped Zoroaster's god Ahuramazda with his polarization of Justice (or Order) and the Lie; but this did not lead to religious intolerance. The deities Anahita and Mithra were hardly less revered by the Persians, and fire was worshiped as a god. The officiants were *Magi. Among gods of the subject peoples the Greek Apollo, the Syrian goddess Alilat, and Yahweh seem to have been specially favored. Thanks to Cyrus and Darius I, the new *Temple in Jerusalem was completed (515 BCE); subsequently *Nehemiah (445 BCE) and *Ezra (either 428 or 398 BCE) were sent there on special missions, and Darius II seems to have yielded to objections from the Jerusalem priesthood about the right of the Jewish garrison at Yeb (Elephantine, in Upper Egypt) to rebuild its temple and also to keep its own special feast of the *Passover.

Persian rule thus allowed considerable cultural assimilation and religious syncretism, Babylon above all becoming a cosmopolitan center. Their art was a composite in which different traditions merged. The court style, which (like the Old Persian script) was devised by Darius I, exalted the grandeur of the king in a timeless setting; as seen in the Persepolis friezes it is impressive in its composure.

After the conquest by *Alexander the Great (334–323 BCE) the lands of the empire were ruled by Macedonian successor kings, Parthians, and Romans. Persia had no further importance in biblical history. J. M. Cook Peter. See Simon Peter.

Peter, The Letters of. This entry consists of two articles, the first on 1 Peter and the second on 2 Peter.

1 Peter

Content and Structure. After opening greetings (1.1–2) the writer moves to a prayer of thanksgiving for the Christians' hope of *salvation (1.3–12). Reborn through the *resurrection of Christ (1.3–5) they can await the end in hope (1.6–9), for they know more than the prophets (1.10–12). Consequently, they are summoned to a life of holy endeavor and to the avoidance of sin against one another (1.13–21); all this they can achieve because they have been born of the Word and continue to feed on it (1.22–2.3), are members of a holy people built on Christ, and have roots lying in God's choice of Israel (2.4–10).

Building on this, the writer then details the kind of behavior that should distinguish the readers as God's people (2.11–3.12) and lead unbelievers to glorify him (2.11–12). He outlines the duties of free citizens (2.13–17), slaves (2.18–25; Christ should be their example), and wives and husbands (3.1–7), and finally reminds them of their need to hold together and to react gently to outside provocation (3.8–12).

When they suffer, however, it should be because of doing good and not because they have committed some crime (3.13–17). Christ himself, although innocent, had suffered for their salvation; God vindicated him, and they may also expect to be vindicated (3.18–22). They must therefore separate themselves from their former ways of life (4.1–6) and stay together in love, for the end is not far off (4.7–11). They ought not, however, be surprised if, before it arrives, they are persecuted; if persecuted, it must not be as criminals but as Christians (4.12–19). Finally, leaders of the church are addressed (5.1–5), and all are reminded yet once again to stand firm against outside forces (5.6–11). In 5.12–14, the writer gives the closing greetings.

Although it is structured like other letters of the period, 1 Peter contains little of a personal nature; addressed to Christians in a wide area (1.1), it reads more like an address than a letter. Some scholars have therefore viewed it as a baptismal sermon or as a letter that includes, or was derived from, such a sermon or baptismal liturgy. It is preferable to regard it as a letter of a general nature, directed to readers far distant from the writer, who is unfamiliar with the details of their situation. In writing it, he makes considerable use of existing Christian tradition in the way of creedal (3.18, 21b, 22) and catechetical (2.13–3.7) material, as well as of the *Septuagint and the traditions about Jesus.

Recipients. Paul's preaching led to the beginning of the church in the Roman province of *Asia (Acts 19.1–20) and in Galatia (see Galatians, The Letter of Paul to the). It is not known how the churches in the other areas mentioned in 1.1 came into existence. Those addressed in the letter had almost all been converted from Greco-Roman religions (1.14, 18; 4.3) and came from a wide range of social, economic, and educational backgrounds. The churches would not have been large bodies but consisted instead of little knots of believers dispersed over a wide area. They have already been persecuted and expect to be persecuted again; these persecutions, however, were not directed by the state. Those of Nero (64 CE) and Domitian (in the last decade of the first century CE) did not affect the areas to which the letter was addressed; those described by the Roman writer Pliny the Younger as taking place in part of the area are too late (112 CE). The Christians were persecuted rather by members of their own families (3.6), neighbors, and city authorities because of their withdrawal from many common activities and because of their distinctive life-style (2.12, 20; 3.14–17; 4.3–4, 14–16). Their isolation is reflected in the many exhortations to support one another with mutual love (1.22; 2.17; 4.8) and in their feeling that they are exiles (1.1; 2.11). They need to stand firm and not to retaliate against their persecutors (2.21–24; 3.13–17; 4.12–14).

Authorship. Three views have been held. According to the first, the letter was written by the apostle Peter (see Simon Peter) because his name appears on it, it has reminiscences of the teaching of Jesus that he could have provided, and 5.1 may suggest the writer was an eyewitness to the death of Jesus. But the Greek in which the letter is written suggests an educated author rather than a simple fisherman; the Septuagint, to which Peter would not have been accustomed, is used in biblical quotations in the way someone brought up with it would use it; the account of the death of Jesus (2.22–24) is not that of an eyewitness but is drawn from Isaiah 53. So it has been suggested that Silvanus (5.12) acted as secretary to Peter; the general thought in the letter would have been that of Peter, but its actual expression that of Silvanus. Since, however, the main support for Peter's authorship comes from the detail of the letter and not its general thought, this makes difficult the idea of Silvanus as secretary. If he had been secretary, we might expect him to add his own greetings (cf. Rom. 16.22). It has been suggested that he wrote it after the death of Peter to preserve Peter's teaching, but it is hardly likely that he would then have introduced the self-praise of 5.12. Increasingly, therefore, scholars have come to believe that the letter is pseudonymous (writing in the name of another person was not unknown in the ancient world). Disciples of Peter after his death may have continued to expound the special themes of his teaching, believing it should be made known to a wider circle. Each of these theories fits with the belief that the letter was written from Rome (Babylon in 5.13 is probably a code name for Rome) where Peter died.

Date. The letter must have been written prior to 120–130 CE, for by then other writers know it. It shows the influence of Pauline ideas and terms, and this suggests it must be later than 60 CE, for it was about this time that *Paul came to Rome. If Peter himself wrote it from Rome, it was also about this time that he arrived there. The sporadic and local nature of the persecutions means they cannot help in determining the date. Their strength together with the areas to which the letter was written, most of which do not appear to have been evangelized early, suggest a period later than the death of Peter, perhaps around 80 CE.

Significant Features. In 2.13–3.7 and 5.2–5, we have an example of a type of instruction in common use among the early Christians (see Eph. 5.22–6.9; Col. 3.18–4.1; 1 Tim. 2.8–15; 5.3–8; 6.1–2; Tit. 2.1–10); a code of duties is provided for various areas of behavior in the household, society in general, and the church (see Ethical Lists). These codes came to the church from the Hellenistic world via Judaism. While the areas for which advice was required did not vary in passing from secular writers to Christian, the advice itself did. It relates necessarily to the situation and period of the letter: 2.13–17 presupposes a nondemocratic government, 2.18–25 the existence of *slaves, and 3.1–6 a male-dominated society. In each case, a strong element of subjection is present and a careful attitude toward the non-Christian world is demanded (cf. 2.11–12). Indeed, one of the main themes of the letter concerns the relation of the Christian community to secular society (2.11–12); such a concern is inevitable where a community is being persecuted.

One of the most puzzling passages in the letter is 3.19, and no agreement exists as to its precise meaning. From it and other New Testament passages (Acts 2.27; Rom. 10.7; Eph. 4.9) the phrase in the Apostles' Creed, "descended into hell" was derived (see Descent into Hell). There are many stories in ancient literature, both Greek and Jewish, of visits to the underworld. The "spirits in prison" have been understood as either the unrepentant dead of *Noah's time or the fallen *angels ("*sons of God") of Genesis 6.1–4. These angels featured largely in contemporary Jewish thought, especially in 1 *Enoch, a writing that some Christians regarded highly (see Jude, The Letter of). It is normally supposed that Christ made the journey mentioned in 3.19 during the period between his crucifixion and resurrection, but it is possible that it is that of his *ascension. Whichever it was, on it he preached to "the spirits in prison." This preaching may have been either of judgment or salvation; if the former, it implied that the power of the spirits was finally broken (cf. v. 22); if the latter, there is no indication that they accepted it, repented, and were saved. The reference in 4.6 may or may not deal with the same event. In it, the "dead" are neither the spiritually dead nor the righteous dead of the Hebrew Bible, but either Christians who have already died (the delay in the return of Christ worried many Christians as to the fate of their dead; cf. 1 Thess. 4.13) or all the physically dead who died before Christ could be preached to them.

Although the letter does not contain the word "church," it is penetrated throughout by a strong sense of togetherness. Its recipients are being persecuted. This has estranged them from the society in which they live and forced them to cling closely to one another. To sustain them, the writer reminds them that, even if they seem small in number, they belong to a body whose roots lie in the Bible. He does so by applying to them texts that were originally written in relation to Israel (see especially 2.4–10). In an age when antiquity was revered, this gave them a standing both in their own eyes and in those of outsiders. At the same time they are also reminded that they have been chosen by God to be his people. As such, they are depicted as the stones of his temple with Christ the cornerstone, and they themselves also as priests within the temple offering the sacrifice of holy living. The realization of their new position before him should compensate for any loss of position in the secular world and enable them to withstand the physical and verbal abuse of their neighbors. Certainly they should give no offence to those outside but should be continually seeking to win them to their number by declaring God's wonderful deeds. Even the wife who is abused by her husband because she is a Christian may win him for Christ by her meek and sober behavior (3.1).

The main purpose of the letter, however, is not to encourage the recipients into missionary activity or to teach them the relation of the Christian church to non-Christian society. The letter is not primarily a handbook of Christian *ethics, although it contains much on this subject; nor is it a tract on the nature of the atoning death of Christ. Rather, it is written to give its readers *hope in a situation that may terrify them because of its hostility. The situation will not continue for long, because Christ will soon return (1.6; 4.7; 5.10). Let them then rejoice even though they suffer (1.8; 4.13), for they have been born anew to a fresh hope (1.3) in God (1.21), which will be fulfilled when Christ returns. ERNEST BEST

2 Peter

2 Peter presents itself as a testament or farewell discourse of the apostle Peter (see Simon Peter), written in the form of a letter shortly before his death (1.14). Its object is to remind readers of Peter's teaching and to defend it against false teachers, who were casting doubt on the Lord's coming to judgment (the *parousia) and advocating ethical libertinism.

Structure. (For the symbols, see below, Genre.)

Address and Greeting (1.1–2)
T^1 Theme: a summary of Peter's message (1.3–11)
T^2 Occasion: Peter's testament (1.12–15)
A^1 First apologetic section (1.16–21)
  Reply to Objection 1: the apostles based their preaching of the parousia on myths (1.16–19)
  Reply to Objection 2: biblical prophecies were the products of human minds (1.20–21)
T^3 Peter's prediction of false teachers (2.1–3a)
A^2 Second apologetic section (2.3b–10a)
  Reply to Objection 3: divine judgment never happens (2.3b–10a)
E^1 Denunciation of the false teachers (2.10b–22)
T^4 Peter's prediction of scoffers (3.1–4) (including Objection 4: v. 4)
A^3 Third apologetic section (3.5–10)
  Two replies to Objection 4: that the expectation of the parousia is disproved by its delay (3.5–10)
E^2 Exhortation to holy living (3.11–16)
Conclusion (3.17–18)

Genre. 2 Peter is clearly a letter (1.1–2). But it also belongs to the literary genre of "testament," which was well known in Jewish literature of the period. In such testaments a biblical figure, such as *Moses or *Ezra, knowing that his death is approaching, gives a final message to his people, which typically includes ethical exhortation and prophetic revelations of the future. In 2 Peter, four passages (marked T^1–T^4 in the analysis) particularly resemble the testament literature and clearly identify the work as Peter's testament. In 1.12–15, a passage full of conventional testament language, Peter describes the occasion for writing as his awareness of approaching death and his desire to provide for his teaching to be remembered after his death. This teaching is summarized in 1.3–11, which is in form a miniature homily, following a pattern used in farewell speeches. There are also two passages of prophecy (2.1–3a; 3.1–4) in which Peter foresees that after his death his message will be challenged by false teachers.

The rest of 2 Peter is structured around the four passages belonging to the testament genre. It includes three apologetic sections (A^1–A^3), which give the work a polemical character and whose aim is to answer the objections the false teachers raise against Peter's teaching. There are four such objections, only the last of which is explicitly stated as such (3.4). In the other three cases, the objection is implied in the author's denial of it (1.16a, 20; 2.3b). Finally, there are two passages (E^1, E^2) that contrast the libertine behavior of the false teachers, denounced in 2.10b–22, with the holy living expected of readers faithful to Peter's teaching (3.11–16).

Author and Date. Testaments were generally pseudepigraphal, attributed to biblical figures long dead, and probably understood as exercises in historical imagination. The use of the genre suggests that 2 Peter is a work written in Peter's name by someone else after his death, though it is possible that the testament genre could have been used by Peter to write his own, real testament. But it should also be noticed how the predictive character of the testament is used in 2 Peter. Nothing in the letter reflects the situation in which Peter is said to be writing; the whole work is addressed to a situation after Peter's death. The predictions of false teachers function as pegs on which is hung the apologetic debate about the validity of Peter's message. Moreover, whereas the testamentary passages speak of the false teachers in the future tense, predicting their rise after Peter's death (2.1–3a; 3.1–4; cf. 3.17), the apologetic sections and the denunciation of the false teachers refer to them in the present tense (2.3b–22; 3.5–10, 16b). It is scarcely possible to read 2 Peter without supposing the false teachers to be contemporaries of the author. The alternation of predictive and present-tense references to them is therefore best understood as a deliberate stylistic device to convey the message that these apostolic prophecies are now being fulfilled. In other words, Petrine authorship is a fiction, but one that the author does not feel obliged to maintain throughout his work. In that case, it must be a transparent fiction, a literary convention that the author expected his readers to recognize as such.

For these and other reasons, most modern scholars consider 2 Peter to be pseudepigraphal, though some still defend Petrine authorship. The most cogent additional reasons for denying Peter's authorship are the Hellenistic religious language and ideas, and the evidence for dating the work after Peter's death in the mid-60s CE. Scholars differ widely on the date of 2 Peter, which many consider to be the latest New Testament writing, written well into the second century CE. But the clearest evidence for a postapostolic date is 3.4, which indicates that the first Christian generation has died, and this passage may well suggest that the letter was written at the time when this had only just become true, around 80–90 CE. This was the time when those who had expected the *parousia during the lifetime of the apostolic generation would face the problem of the nonfulfillment of that expectation, but there is no evidence that this continued to be felt as a problem in the second century.

The literary relationship between 2 Peter and *Jude is another consideration relevant to the date of 2 Peter. There are such close resemblances (especially between Jude 4–13, 16–18 and 2 Peter 2.1–18; 3.1–3) that some kind of literary relationship seems certain. Some scholars have held that Jude is dependent on 2 Peter or that both depend on a common source, but most conclude that 2 Peter has used Jude as a source. Of course, this requires a late date for 2 Peter only if Jude is dated late.

If 2 Peter was written not by Peter, but after his death, why did the author present his work in the form of Peter's testament? Probably because his intention was to defend the apostolic message in the period after the death of the apostles (cf. 3.4) against teachers who held that, in important respects, the teaching of the apostles was now discredited. By writing in Peter's name he claims no authority of his own, except as a faithful mediator of the apostolic message, which he defends against attacks. The form of the letter as an apostolic testament is therefore closely connected with its apologetic purpose as a vindication of the normative authority of the apostolic teaching. That the author chose to write Peter's testament is probably best explained if he was a leader of the Roman church, which had counted Peter as the most prestigious of its leaders in the previous generation.

Opponents. The opponents have usually been identified as *gnostics, but this identification, as recent scholarship has recognized, is insecure. The only features of their teaching that are clear from our author's refutation of it are eschatological skepticism and moral libertinism. The parousia had been expected during the lifetime of the apostles, but the first generation had passed away and in the opponents' view this proved the early Christian eschatological hope mistaken (3.4, 9a). This attitude seems to have been based on a rationalistic denial of divine intervention in history (cf. 3.4b) as well as on the nonfulfillment of the parousia prophecy. But it was also related to the ethical libertinism of the opponents. Claiming to be emancipating people from fear of divine judgment, they felt free to indulge in sexual immorality and sensual excesses generally (2.2, 10a, 13–14, 18).

There is no basis in 2 Peter itself for supposing that these teachings of the opponents had a gnostic basis. They are more plausibly attributed to the influence of popular Greco-Roman attitudes. The false teachers probably aimed to disencumber Christianity of elements which seemed to them an embarrassment in their larger cultural environment: its apocalyptic *eschatology, always alien to Hellenistic thinking and especially embarrassing after the apparent failure of the parousia hope, and its ethical rigorism.

In response to this challenge the author of 2 Peter mounts a defense of the apostolic expectation of judgment and salvation at the parousia and of the motivation for righteous living which this provides. The author argues that the apostles' preaching of the parousia was soundly based on their witnessing of the transfiguration, when God appointed Jesus to be the eschatological judge and ruler (1.16–18), and on divinely inspired prophecies (1.19–21). Scriptural examples prove that divine judgment does happen and prefigure the eschatological judgment (2.3b–10a). As God decreed the destruction of the ancient world in the *Flood, so he has decreed the destruction of the present world in the fire of his eschatological judgment (3.5–7, 10). The problem of the delay of the parousia is met by arguments drawn from Jewish tradition: that the delay is long only by human standards, not in the perspective of God's eternity, and should be seen as God's gracious withholding of judgment so that sinners may repent (3.8–9). Throughout his work, the author is concerned that the hope for the vindication and establishment of God's righteousness in the future (cf. 2.9; 3.7, 13) necessarily motivates the attempt to realize that righteousness in Christian lives (3.11, 14).

Theology. The peculiar theological character of 2 Peter lies in its remarkable combination of Hellenistic religious language and Jewish *apocalyptic ideas and imagery. For example, the author summarizes Peter's teaching in a passage that, in its ethical and religious terminology, is perhaps the most Hellenistic in the New Testament (1.3–11). On the other hand, he accurately and effectively reproduces Jewish apocalyptic ideas, especially in 3.3–13. This combination of theological styles is to be explained by the author's intention of interpreting and defending the apostolic message in a postapostolic and Hellenistic cultural situation. But this is a delicate task; in the author's view, in his opponents' attempt to adapt Christianity to Hellenistic culture they were compromising essential features of the apostolic message. In order to defend the gospel against this excessive Hellenization, therefore, the author resorts to sources and ideas close to the apocalyptic outlook of early Christianity, including the letter of Jude. The author thus keeps a careful balance between a degree of Hellenization of the gospel message, and a protest, in the name of apocalyptic eschatology, against extreme Hellenization that would dissolve the substance of the message. The letter is a valuable witness to Christianity's difficult transition from a Jewish to a Hellenistic environment, and provides an instructive example of how the message of the gospel was preserved through the process of cultural translation.

RICHARD J. BAUCKHAM

Pharisees.

Sources. References to the Pharisees occur widely throughout Jewish and Christian literature of the first two centuries CE. *Josephus lists them as one of the main Jewish parties emerging during the Hasmonean period (War 2.8.162–63; Ant. 13.5.171–73; 18.1.11–15). The New Testament portrays them principally as opponents of Jesus and the early Christian movement (Mark 3.6; 7.1; 10.2; Matt. 23; John 11.47), although it is from their ranks that Paul comes (Phil 3.5; Acts 23.6; 26.5). Rabbinical literature contains many references to pĕrûšîm, partly as those who were opposed to the *Sadducees and partly as those opposed by the sages and the rabbis.

Name. Greek pharisaioi and Hebrew pĕrûšîm can both be loosely transliterated as "Pharisees." The root prš in Hebrew can mean "to separate"; this may indicate that they were seen as sectarians (but by whom?) or that they sought holiness by the avoidance of what was unclean. Possibly the name was given to them by Sadducees, who thought of them as opposed to their ways.

History. The Pharisees' origin lie in the period of the Maccabean revolt (166–159 BCE), where we hear of the emergence of a group of Jews zealous for the *Law, the Hasideans (1 Macc. 2.42), who opposed the way in which the high priests were accommodating to the intrusion of Hellenistic ways into Judaism. This renewal movement spawned not only the Pharisees but also the *Essenes. It is likely that the Pharisees saw the establishment of the Hasmonean monarchy (140 BCE) as an opportunity for national renewal and the restoration of true observance of the Law. Certainly, unlike the Essenes, they remained in Jerusalem after the usurpation of the high priesthood by the Hasmoneans (152 BCE). They probably shared the popular enthusiasm for the successful campaign for Jewish independence, recorded in 1 Maccabees 14.27–49, when a great synagogue of the Jews conferred the kingship and the high priesthood on Simon. Interestingly there is no sanction for such a synagogue, or assembly, in the *Pentateuch, and this may have been justified by the oral tradition of the elders that the Pharisees cultivated. The Pharisees thus have their origins in a popular movement based on scribal traditions for interpreting the Law. They legitimated the Hasmonean monarchy by allowing it to control the *Temple and subsequently sought to influence the monarchy both at court and in the *Sanhedrin, the council in Jerusalem that was the continuation of the great synagogue. In this they were by no means always successful, falling foul of John Hyrcanus (134–104) and Alexander Jannaeus (103–76) but being restored to favor by Salome Alexandra (76–67). As their authority at the royal court diminished they sought to influence the people through the local courts and synagogues where they enjoyed considerable success. They were not a uniform movement; over the years different schools of interpretation of the Law grew up around different teachers, notably Hillel and Shammai. After the First Jewish Revolt (66–70 CE) they emerged as the leaders, under Jonathan ben Zakkai, of the academy at Jamnia, which laid the foundation of rabbinic Judaism.

Beliefs. Central to their teaching is the belief in the twofold Law: the written and the oral *Torah. What this in effect meant was the recognition of a continuing tradition of interpretation of the Law in the debates and sayings of the elders. Ultimately this would itself be written down in the *Mishnah; but even then there was a continuing tradition of debate that found its documentation in the *Talmud. Thus while some sources portray them as legalistic, it is perhaps fairer to say that they had a zeal for legal debate and for keeping alive the tradition of meditation and study of the Law. Importantly this also meant that they were able to relate the Laws to new areas of life not already dealt with, as well as to introduce new institutions such as the *synagogues and schools.

They also seem to have been involved in the beginning of a concentration of *purity rules and regulations that would subsequently play such an important part in the Mishnah and Talmud. In this way they began to relocate the center of holiness in the home and the local community. This prepared the way for the transition from a Temple state to a communal piety that could survive the destruction of the Temple.

The Pharisees also believed in the resurrection and in future rewards and punishments. They did not believe all received their just deserts in this age; only in a future age when God acted decisively to establish his rule would justice be done. This radical expectation of a new age indicates something of the revolutionary nature of the Pharisees that has often been overlooked. Once they themselves gained power, albeit in communities that were localized and that operated under the general protection of Rome, such radical hopes could be allowed to recede, although they would not disappear altogether.

See also Judaisms of the First Century CE.

JOHN RICHES

Philemon, The Letter of Paul to. Philemon was a Christian who lived in the Phrygian town of Colossae (Map 14:E3) in the middle of the first century CE. The chief concern of the brief letter is the fate of Philemon's slave Onesimus. That name meant "useful," and it was frequently given to slaves. It seems that this slave had at first been useful to his master, but had become useless because, having found conditions intolerable, he had fled from Colossae, probably taking with him certain valuables belonging to the owner (v. 11).

The letter speaks of what followed that escape. Making his way to a larger city, Onesimus had been arrested and thrown into prison, where he met *Paul. Here the slave was converted (v. 10) and soon made himself useful to Paul. On his release, the new Christian had to decide what to do about the claims of his defrauded master. To return to him was to risk severe punishment, for escape from *slavery was a capital offence and Philemon would have every right to select his own penalty. Encouraged by Paul, however, the slave decided to return and set out for Colossae, accompanied by Tychicus (Col. 4.9) and bearing this letter from Paul. Such a decision must have been the result of intense inner struggle; on the one hand, there was the risk of punishment, at the very least the loss of freedom; on the other, the urging of Paul and the authority of his new master, Christ.

On the delivery of the letter, the master must also have faced a difficult decision. There would have been resentment over the violation of his property rights, supported as they were by Roman law and universal custom. Yet the letter was an appeal from an *apostle through whom Philemon, as well as his slave, had been converted (v. 19). Paul asked the owner to welcome his slave as a brother, to accept restitution for former losses, and to treat him as if he were Paul himself. As master, Philemon must recognize the supreme authority of his own master, Christ. Even more than forgiveness was at stake, for Paul seems to have asked Philemon not only to free Onesimus but even to send him back to Paul to help in the mission work as a substitute for his onetime owner. Reading between the lines of the letter, we can see that each member of this triangle was taking a risk and making a sacrifice stemming from his allegiance to Christ.

For Paul this was no private matter but a communal concern. By including the greetings of his colleagues, he claimed their support for his request. In addition to Timothy (v.1), he mentioned five fellow workers, including the prisoner Epaphras, to whom the church in Colossae may have owed its origin (Col. 4.12). He also wanted the members of the church in Colossae to become involved (v. 2). To help them understand the issues at stake, Paul probably sent, in the same mail as it were, another letter, the longer *Colossians (Col. 4.7, 9), in which he made the radical claim that all social distinctions have been erased among those who belong to Christ (3.11–21).

In this letter, as in all ancient documents, many points remain uncertain. The hometown may have been Laodicea and not Colossae. The location of the prison is uncertain: Rome, or more likely *Ephesus. The slaveowner may have been Archippus and not Philemon. Nothing is known of the later history of the major characters, though it is barely possible that the onetime slave later became the bishop in Ephesus (Ignatius, Eph. 1.3). What is certain, however, is the radical character of conversion, not only of people but of their attitudes toward their own property, their rights, and their obligations. Brief as it is, the note gives a colorful vignette of life in a congregation in western Asia Minor.

PAUL S. MINEAR

Philippians, The Letter of Paul to the.

The Church at Philippi. The letter that bears the title "To the Philippians" was addressed to the church in Philippi, an important city in Macedonia (Map 14:D2). The emperor Octavian had made Philippi a Roman colony and gave to its citizens the rights and privileges of those born and living in Rome. According to the account in *Acts, the church in Philippi began as follows: *Paul, on his second missionary journey, left Asia Minor for Macedonia, came to Philippi, preached the gospel; Lydia, a prominent woman from that area, and a few others became Christians. The church apparently was first housed in Lydia's home (Acts 16.9–40). In spite of its small beginnings, it grew and became an active Christian community, taking an important part in evangelism (Phil. 1.3–8), readily sharing its own material possessions, even out of deep poverty (4.16; cf. 2 Cor. 8.1–5), and generously sending one of its own people to assist Paul in his work and to aid him while he was in prison (2.25–30). Paul visited this church on at least three occasions (Acts 16.12; 2 Cor. 2.13; Acts 20.6).

Author and Date. No writer in ancient times and scarcely any today question that *Paul wrote the letter to the Philippians. But from where did he write it, and when? On these questions there is divergence of opinion. Most scholars hold that Paul wrote the letter from Rome; others have suggested *Corinth or *Ephesus; a good case can also be made for Caesarea. But from wherever Paul wrote, it had to be a place where he was in prison, where there was a Roman praetorium (i.e., emperor's palace, or a provincial governor's official residence; see 1.12, 13), and where there were members of Caesar's household (i.e., the royal entourage at the palace or at any provincial capital; see 4.22). Hence, Rome (ca. 60 CE) or Caesarea (ca. 58 CE) are the most likely places, since each had a praetorium with its royal staff, and in each Paul is reported to have been jailed.

Integrity. An increasing number of scholars consider Philippians to be not a single letter but several—at least two, possibly three—woven into one. The disjointed nature of the letter as it stands (note the abrupt transition in tone and content between 3.1 and 3.2); Paul's leaving his "thank you" to the end (4.10–20); and Polycarp's reference in his own letter to the Philippians (3.21) to Paul's having written them several letters, are some of the reasons for suggesting that Philippians is a composite made up of different letters, or letter fragments. But the abruptness noted above is hardly an argument against the integrity of Philippians, for it is not inconsistent with the characteristics of private speech, nor with Paul's style (cf. Rom. 16.16–18; 1 Thess. 2.13–16). And though Polycarp mentions that Paul wrote several letters to the Philippians, he apparently knew and used none other than this.

Contents of the Letter. Paul begins his letter with the typical greeting (1.1–2), and continues with thanksgiving to God and prayer for the Philippians' continued growth in love and good works (1.3–11). He makes known to them how the gospel has advanced even while he is in prison (1.12–18), and assures them that he will be released and will return to Philippi (1.19–26). He begs them to live worthily of the gospel in unity, harmony, and generosity without grumbling or complaining, keeping always before themselves Jesus Christ as the supreme model for any moral action (1.27–2.18). He exhorts them further by describing the qualities of Timothy and Epaphroditus, and he promises to send both to Philippi (2.19–30). He warns them against evangelistic Jews or judaizers, whose teaching and practices are contrary to the gospel (3.1–19), and concludes the letter by making a final appeal for unity (4.1–3), offering suggestions as to how Christians should think and act (4.4–9) and thanking the Philippians for their numerous gifts to him (4.10–20). He closes with salutations (4.21–23).

The Hymn. Philippians 2.6–11 is an exquisite example of an early Christian hymn, used and probably modified by Paul for his purposes here. Its interpretation has long been debated. Differences in interpretation revolve primarily around two Greek words, harpagmos (2.6) and kenoō (2.7). Some understand the former to mean "a thing to be held on to," and understand Christ as possessing equality with God, but not clinging to it as something he might lose (see the Jerusalem Bible). Others understand it to mean "a snatching after" and see Christ as a second *Adam, who unlike the first refused to grasp after being equal with God (see the NEB, and cf. Gen. 3.5). More recently, some have shown that harpagmos is part of an idiomatic expression referring to an attitude of mind one has toward that which is already possessed. Thus, Christ is seen as not regarding his being equal with God as a condition to be used (NRSV: "exploited") for his own benefit.

The other word, kenoō, often translated as "to empty," also means, "to make powerless," "to pour out." Some see this as an act of the human will of Jesus, the last Adam. "He made himself powerless," that is, he deliberately chose the lot of fallen humanity. Others, however, understand this as an act of the will of the preexistent, divine Christ.

The vocabulary and tone of the hymn, as well as the context in which it is placed, argue for the interpretation that sees Jesus Christ as preexistent, divine ("in the form of God"), equal with God, but who nevertheless refused to take advantage of all this for his personal gain. Instead, in that preexistent state, he willed to pour himself out, to serve by becoming human. He considered being equal with God not as an excuse for avoiding service and redemptive suffering but as that which uniquely qualified him for these tasks. Thus, God exalted him and gave him the highest name in heaven and on earth, the name "Lord."

If the hymn is about Christ, it is also about God, making clear the true nature of God. The Christ of the hymn shows by both his attitude and actions that for him to be in the "form of God," to be "equal with God," meant that he must give and spend himself. The hymn, then, makes it clear that God's true nature is not selfishly to seize but openhandedly to give.

Understood in this way the hymn fits perfectly into the context of chap. 2. Whereas the Philippians were acting selfishly, living with a grasping attitude (2.3–4), Christ's attitude and actions were exactly the opposite. So Paul appeals to them to bring their conduct into harmony with the conduct of Christ. Here is a splendid example of Paul's method of encouraging the Christian life by presenting sublime theological truth.

GERALD F. HAWTHORNE

Philistines. A group of Aegean origin, the Philistines were one of the Sea Peoples who ravaged the eastern Mediterranean world subsequent to the collapse of Mycenean civilization at the end of the Late Bronze Age. Attempting to land in Egypt, they were repulsed in a great land and sea battle by Ramesses III (ca. 1190 BCE), after which they settled on the southwestern coastal strip of Canaan (Map 3:W5). There they established a confederation of five city-states, the pentapolis consisting of Ashdod, Ashkelon, and Gaza on the coast, and Ekron and Gath inland (Josh. 13.3; 1 Sam. 7–14). Their expansion inland brought them into conflict with the Israelite tribes (Judg. 3.31; 13–16; 1 Sam. 4–6), who attempted to counter the threat by organizing themselves into a kingdom (1 Sam. 7–14). Although the Philistines were able to prevail against *Saul, the first Israelite king (1 Sam. 31), *David, Saul's successor and an erstwhile vassal of Achish, the Philistine king of Gath (1 Sam. 27; 29), decisively defeated them and halted their expansion (2 Sam. 5.17–25; 8.1; 21.15–22; 23.9–17; 1 Chron. 11.12–19; 14.8–17; 18.1; 20.4–8). Over the next few centuries their relations with Israel were for the most part in the form of border skirmishes (1 Kings 15.27; 16.15–17; 2 Chron. 26.6–7; 28.18). In the tenth century Philistia came under loose Egyptian hegemony. As a consequence of the imperialistic ambitions of the Neo-Assyrian empire, the Philistines came under *Assyrian rule in 734 BCE. Despite occasional revolts against their overlords, they remained part of the Assyrian imperium, even prospering during the seventh century, until the fall of Assyria (612 BCE). Subsequently caught between Egypt and Babylonia, Philistia was conquered and ravaged by *Nebuchadrezzar in 604 BCE. This effectively ended the history of the Philistine people, although their name as handed down through Greek and Latin eventually became a name for the whole of the land they were never able to subdue, namely, Palestine.

Archaeological activity focusing on recovering the material remains of the Philistines has been intense in recent years. Ashdod, Ashkelon, and Ekron (Tel Miqne), as well as smaller sites such as Tel Qasile on the coast and Tel Batash (ancient Timnah) inland, have been or are still being investigated. A picture has emerged of an extremely rich and highly developed civilization, putting a lie to the modern usage of the term "philistine." CARL S. EHRLICH

Philo. Philo of Alexandria (ca. 15 BCE–50 CE), also known as Philo Judaeus, is the most important representative of the Greek-speaking variety of Judaism that flourished in Alexandria from ca. 200 BCE to 100 CE. The historian *Josephus tells us that he was highly respected in the Jewish community and was "not unskilled in philosophy." The only event of his life known to us is his leadership of an embassy of Alexandrian Jews that appeared before the Emperor Gaius Caligula in 40 CE to protest against anti-Jewish mob violence. Vivid descriptions of this event and its background are given in his treatises In Flaccum and Legatio ad Gaium.

By far the majority of his writings concentrate on the interpretation of the *Law of Moses, or *Pentateuch, as found in the *Septuagint translation. These treatises can be divided into three lengthy series: the Allegorical Commentary, the Exposition of the Law, and Questions and Answers. In the Allegorical Commentary, Philo gives a very detailed and complex exegesis of Genesis 1–17, interpreting early history and *Abraham's wanderings in terms of the moral life and religious quest of the soul. The Exposition of the Law is a more varied work, containing biographies of the patriarchs and an explanation of the *Ten Commandments and the other ordinances of Mosaic law, with emphasis both on literal observance and symbolic interpretation. The third series, imperfectly preserved in an Armenian translation, poses questions and gives answers on the text of Genesis and Exodus; most of the usually short chapters contain literal followed by figurative or allegorical exegeses.

Philo's attention centers on the interpretation of scripture, but in his exegesis he demonstrates his considerable knowledge of Greek philosophy. Through the use of allegorical and symbolic interpretation, *Moses is presented as the lawgiver, prophet, and even philosopher par excellence, who is the source of all later philosophy. The apologetic motive is clear: in his Alexandrian context Philo is eager to show that Jewish culture is not inferior to Hellenistic culture. In his doctrine of God, Platonic ideas of transcendence and immanence are prominent. God as Being (Exod. 3.14) is distinguished from his powers at work in the cosmos. Highly influential is the doctrine of the *Logos, which builds upon Hellenistic Jewish wisdom speculation. The Logos can be described as that aspect of God which stands in relation to created reality. But Philo often talks about the Logos as if it were an entity with a separate existence from God himself, that is, a divine hypostasis.

Philo's thought and writings were warmly embraced by the early Christian church. His allegorical themes and theological ideas exerted a strong influence on Clement of Alexandria, Origen, and later patristic authors. In Byzantine manuscripts Philo is often called "the Bishop." It was his popularity in Christian circles that caused his writings to be preserved.

See also Judaisms of the First Century CE; Interpretation, History of, article on Jewish Interpretation. DAVID T. RUNIA

Phoenicia (Map 7:G4). The Greek word phoinix, from which apparently the geographical region of Phoenicia is named, means, literally, "red purple." Thus, the name is derived from one product of the region, red dye, for which Phoenicia was famed throughout the ancient world. It was a shared interest in commerce and trade by the inhabitants of the region rather than any tightly knit political system that gave the Phoenicians their distinctive characteristics and ethos in the ancient world.

The territory inhabited by this people, Semitic in origin and Mediterranean in outlook and activity, was the narrow coastal plain extending from the Eleutherus river in the north to the Carmel range in the south, a distance of about 260 km (160 mi) in all, approximately the extent of modern *Lebanon with an extension to the south. From ancient times kings ruled the region centered in such cities as Byblos, Berytus (Beirut), Sidon, and Tyre. Physical features give the whole region a very distinctive character, as the coastal plain is narrow, and sometimes, as at the Ladder of Tyre, the mountains form a promontory into the sea. Elsewhere they rise sharply, separating the coast from the interior, even though at certain historical periods there was a natural tendency for the various city-states to include some of that hinterland in their territory. This was certainly true in the case of Tyre, whose territory at times included parts of Galilee (1 Kings 9.11; see also Josephus, Ant. 5.1.63). It was probably due to the peculiar physical layout of the region inhabited by the Phoenicians that the territory as a whole never attained a fully cohesive political structure but instead comprised a number of city-states, which left them vulnerable to the more centralized political powers in the region.

There were geographical advantages also. The coastline of the Phoenician territory had a number of excellent harbors, unlike Israel further to the south, and thus *shipping was a significant aspect of the Phoenician way of life. In the ancient world, the Phoenicians were celebrated navigators (see Ezek. 27); Herodotus also attributes to them the circumnavigation of Africa. A number of important Phoenician colonies were established in the western Mediterranean, Carthage in North Africa being the most famous. This westward orientation also led to the spread of the linear Phoenician alphabet to the west (see Writing). In addition the climate, though warm, had good rainfall, and there was a rich vegetation with the famous cedars of Lebanon being particularly important as a supply of timber. *Solomon's building projects benefited from such a supply from King Hiram of Tyre (1 Kings 5), and there is even older evidence of Egyptian interest. Vitreous glass has been found in the region near Ptolemais, and there appears to have been a thriving fine-ware industry in Hellenistic times in the region.

Phoenician connections with the northern kingdom of Israel were generally close, as the marriage between *Ahab and *Jezebel, the daughter of the Tyrian king Ethbaal, illustrates. A distinctive Phoenician style of masonry is also characteristic of royal and public architecture at cities such as *Samaria and *Megiddo in the period. But like Israel and other states in the region, the Phoenician cities had strained relations with the *Assyrian and Neo-Babylonian rulers, and as they attempted to assert their independence, Sidon was destroyed and Tyre defeated after a thirteen-year siege by *Nebuchadrezzar. The *Persians adopted a more tolerant attitude toward their vassal states, and they utilized the navigational skills of the Phoenicians in their various campaigns to the west, most notably against the confederation of Greek city-states, until the Persian defeat at the famous naval battle of Salamis in 481 BCE.

It was during this period of relative autonomy that the various Phoenician states achieved a greater degree of harmony among themselves, and a confederation of Tyre, Sidon, and Arvad was formed, leading to a revolt against Persian rule and the consequent destruction of Sidon in 351 BCE. As *Alexander the Great began his conquest of the East, Tyre offered stout resistance to his advance on Egypt but was eventually destroyed in 332 BCE. In line with later Hellenistic policy, however, these cities, as well as Acco/Ptolemais closer to Jewish territory, were reestablished as Greek city-states and became important centers for the diffusion of Greek culture in Palestine and Syria. The games at Tyre in honor of Zeus Olympus were highly regarded, and some Jews, contrary to their religious beliefs, were tempted to participate (2 Macc. 4.18). Nevertheless, inscriptions show that Phoenician as well as Greek was spoken in Tyre as late as the first century BCE.

In line with the process of hellenization elsewhere in the ancient world, the emerging culture was a mixture of the old and the new. Particularly in the sphere of religion, various deities that were worshiped in Hellenistic times, such as Zeus and Heracles, are the older Phoenician deities Baal Shamem (Lord of the Heavens) and Melqart in Greek dress. Both were closely associated with the older Canaanite deities such as El, known to us from discoveries at Ras Shamra (see Ugaritic), thus suggesting ancient and close links between the Phoenicians and the *Canaanites. Even prior to the Hellenistic age, Phoenician culture had been influenced by features from many quarters, including Greece, thus underlining the many contacts that had been established through trade and commerce. This can be seen both in their art and architecture, which apparently provided a blueprint for Solomon's *Temple.

Under the Romans, the various cities in Phoenician territory continued as they had been, but now as part of the network of urban centers that Rome utilized in controlling the east. Phoenicia is named as one of the regions to which the Christian movement spread from Jerusalem after the Hellenists had been forced out (Acts 11.19). It is doubtful, however, whether the old Phoenician culture had persisted to any great degree in the area. This combination of a memory of the ethnic background and recognition of the current cultural affiliation of the territory is found in Mark's description of the woman who came to Jesus requesting to have her daughter healed. She is described as being "Greek, Syrophoenician by birth" (Mark 7.26). The Tyrian shekel, because of its stability in a volatile currency market, remained the offering for the sanctuary in Jerusalem that every male Jew was expected to make throughout the Second Temple period (see Money), and recent archaeological evidence from Upper Galilee gives abundant evidence of the trading links that a religiously conservative Jewish population continued to have with Tyre in the early centuries CE. Thus, long-established patterns of religious diversity and commercial and trading links (see Ezekiel 27) were maintained between the Jewish population and its Phoenician coastal neighbors—one example among many of human need transcending religious and cultural diversity. SEÁN FREYNE

Phylacteries. Small receptacles, generally called tefillin, attached by leather thongs to the upper left arm (or right, for a left-handed person) and the forehead. Normally rectangular in shape, both tefillin contain tiny slips of *parchment inscribed with short portions of the Bible. There are usually four interior compartments into which the slips are placed open-side up, tied round with a goat-hair thread.

The custom of praying with phylacteries on a daily basis and not on holidays is based on Exodus 13.9, 16, and Deuteronomy 6.8; 11.18. Because no explicit or detailed injunctions are provided, divergent traditions developed very early in the postexilic period. The four texts that were originally inscribed on the parchment slips are Exodus 20.2–17 (the *Ten Commandments), Deuteronomy 6.4–9 (the *Shema), Deuteronomy 11.13–21 (the second paragraph of the Shema), and Numbers 15.37–41 (the commandment to wear tassels or *fringes). The first and last passages were ultimately excluded for fear that unorthodox views would creep into Judaism, and they were replaced by Exodus 13.2–10, 11–16.

According to rabbinic tradition, both tefillin and mezuzot (small boxes containing scrolls attached to the doorpost of a house or room; see Deut. 6.9) could be written from memory. Hence it is not surprising that many of the texts found from *Qumran and the Judean wilderness caves contain departures from the *Masoretic Text. In addition, there is great variation in the passages selected from the Bible that were inserted into the compartments.

Some have argued that in antiquity only distinguished persons put on tefillin, either daily or occasionally. Even though in rabbinic times it became obligatory to wear them, the practice was ignored in some countries of the Diaspora. One view holds that even women, minors, and slaves should pray with phylacteries.

The extensive archaeological evidence of tefillin suggests that their use was already widespread in late Second Temple times. Before prayer capsules were attached to leather thongs, as attested in the archaeological record, phylacteries probably consisted merely of inscribed scrolls attached to the head and arm in order to fulfill the biblical precept: "Keep these words that I am commanding you today in your heart. . . . Bind them as a sign on your hand, fix them as an emblem on your forehead" (Deut. 6.6, 8).

ERIC M. MEYERS

Pilate, Pontius. Governor of Judea (Luke 3.1) under Tiberius Caesar, he ruled the province 26–36 CE. In addition to details about him occurring in the literary sources discussed below, he is also mentioned in an inscription found at Caesarea in 1961.

The first mention of Pilate in the Gospels concerns "the Galileans whose blood Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices" (Luke 13.1), who were presumably visiting Jerusalem for *Passover; this atrocity may explain the enmity (Luke 23.12) between him and *Herod Antipas, ruler of Galilee. At the next Passover (3 April 33 CE, rather than 7 April 30 CE?), Pilate was again in Jerusalem to keep order, when the case of *Jesus was brought before him for review (Luke 23.1). Only now is he mentioned in the other three Gospels (Matt. 27.2; Mark 15.1; John 18.29); since the last two do not even explain who he was, he must already have been fixed in the apostolic preaching (see Acts 2.23; 3.13; 4.28; 13.28; 1 Tim. 6.13) as a historical anchor.

All four gospel accounts focus on Pilate's question, "Are you the King of the Jews?" In John (18.36) Jesus claims that his kingdom was "not of this world." In Luke (23.2, 5) the Jewish authorities assert that he was a rebel. According to John, *Caiaphas, as high *priest, had long foreseen the need to act against Jesus in the political interest of the nation (John 11.48–50, 53), but only Pilate could impose the death penalty (18.30–31). Pilate's skepticism about the political charge was neatly turned into a threat to his own status as "Caesar's friend" (John 19.12). Pilate washed his hands before the crowd to make clear where the moral onus lay (Matt. 27.24) and ironically retaliated against the authorities by identifying Jesus on the cross as "King of the Jews" (John 19.19).

The New Testament has Pilate maneuvered against his better judgment into authorizing what Jewish authorities had planned. Within two centuries he could be seen (by Tertullian) as in effect a Christian, and by the sixth century CE he had become a saint and martyr in the Coptic Church. Some modern analyses have attempted to shift responsibility back onto him: Jesus (or part of his following) was indeed revolutionary; it was a Roman detachment that arrested him (John 18.12); the *Sanhedrin was capable of carrying out a death penalty had it needed to and may not even have met formally on this occasion. The momentum of this argument arises partly from the monstrous price exacted in our age for the cry "His blood be on us and on our children," found only in Matthew (27.25) and to be understood in terms of that writer's own perspective as well as first-century politics. (See Anti-Semitism.)

The "procurator" (see Tacitus Annals 15.44) of Judea was responsible for the estates of Tiberius Caesar there and for the Roman taxes (see Tribute and Taxation). The Sanhedrin and other local authorities handled most other administration. In his military capacity, Pilate was also referred to as "prefect," that is, in command of the province, his powers including the supervision of justice. But being only of second (or equestrian) rank, he was subordinate to the senatorial legate of *Syria. Pilate's long term implies an understanding with the high priestly dynasty of Annas. He shares their success in keeping the peace, earning the oblique compliment of Tacitus (Histories 5.9), "under Tiberius nothing happened." His coinage, unlike Herod's and Caesar's (Matt. 22.20), did not offend the second commandment by carrying a human likeness. He yielded to a suicidal protest by the Jews against the medallions on the military standards even though he had veiled them when brought into Jerusalem (Josephus War 2.9.169–74). But when they protested against the expenditure of Temple funds on an aqueduct for the city, he showed no mercy (War 2.9.175–77). When similarly brutal tactics were used against the *Samaritans in 36 CE, the latter appealed to Vitellius, the legate of Syria, who ordered Pilate to Rome to explain himself (Josephus Ant. 18.4.85–97).

In 41 CE *Philo published a "letter" of *Herod Agrippa to Gaius Caesar, successor of Tiberius, denouncing Pilate as "inflexible, stubborn, and cruel" (Leg. 299–305) and citing an episode when Tiberius had ordered him to remove from the palace in Jerusalem some shields that offended Jewish scruples. Clearly in the end Pilate lost the support of the Jewish leaders. Their threat to report him to Tiberius (John 19.12) may imply that he was under suspicion as an appointee of Sejanus, the head of government whom Tiberius overturned in Rome in 31 CE. Certainly Philo's tirade would not have been possible if Pilate had been granted an honorable retirement.

EDWIN A. JUDGE

Pisgah. A ridge or mountain in *Moab, at the northeast corner of the Dead Sea (Map 1:Y5), from which *Balaam viewed Israel (Num. 23.14) and *Moses viewed the *Promised Land before his death (Deut. 3.27; 34.1–4). It is in the vicinity of, if not identical with, Mount *Nebo.

MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Plagues of Egypt. The story of the ten plagues of Egypt (Exod. 7.14–12.36) is based on the ancient Israelite tradition of the "great and awesome signs and wonders against Egypt" (Deut. 6.22) that God accomplished in order to force Pharaoh to allow the Israelites to leave that country. Each plague, except the last, has a basis in natural phenomena or diseases that occur in *Egypt, either annually or at intervals, between July and April. They form an orderly series, each related to its successor; and their rapid and cumulative severity mounts to a climax in the death of Egypt's firstborn. In these partly ordinary events, the Israelites saw the hand of God active in their behalf.

All three strands composing the book of *Exodus told of plagues, though no single source lists all the plagues; *J gives eight (1–2, 4–5, 7–10); *E, five (1, 7–10); and *P, five (1–3, 6, 10). All agree on the first and the last. Sometimes God is shown as directly effecting the plague (Exod. 9.6; 12.29); sometimes *Aaron, at *Moses' command, is the agent (7.9–10; 8.16–17); and sometimes Moses himself calls down the plague (7.14–18; 9.8, 22–23).

The ten plagues of the final form of the Exodus narrative are as follows:

1. Nile water turns to blood (7.14–15). The annual rise of the river normally brings life to Egypt's soil, but on rare occasions putrid waters carrying decaying algae from the vast swamplands of the Sudan join with the waters from Ethiopia's Blue Nile into which volcanoes—active in those days—had spewed sulphuric lava and ash. Thus, once per century or so the water of the *Nile would turn red in color and become undrinkable (Exod. 7.14–24).

2. Frogs (Exod. 7.25–8.14). When the flooding Nile subsided it left heaps of dead frogs over the land, so many that some were even piled in people's homes. The Egyptians may have believed that their magicians could prevent such a disaster from falling upon the common people.

3. Gnats (Exod. 8.16–19). Swarms of "gnats" (whatever noisome insect this name represents) had bred and multiplied in the stagnant pools of water. The magicians confess that "this is the finger of God."

4. Flies (Exod. 8.20–32). The plague of "flies" (the word simply means "insects") appears to be a variant of the preceding plague; note the poetic parallelism in Psalm 105.31. The sign was not just the coming of myriads of flies but the isolation of Goshen, so that the *Hebrews were not affected.

5. Cattle murrain (Exod. 9.1–7). Anthrax, hoof-and-mouth, or some such disease, resulting from conditions created by former plagues, struck Egypt's farm animals, a principal source of food.

6. Boils (Exod. 9.8–12). Ashes from the kiln were thrown into the air and caused boils breaking out in sores on humans and animals alike. The magicians could not stand before Moses because of the boils.

7. Hail (Exod. 9.18–35). The scourge of hail (a rare occurrence in Egypt) and thunderstorm destroyed both a whole season's crops and the mudbrick homes of the disease-ridden peasantry.

8. Locusts (Exod. 10.3–20). Always a bane of the Middle East, a plague of locusts devoured whatever was left after the storm was over. The Lord "brought" the locusts by an east wind; when Pharaoh confessed his sin (10.16) God "drove" the locusts by a west wind into the Red Sea.

9. Darkness (Exod. 10.21–23). Thick darkness that could be felt may have been brought on by the wind from the desert, carrying with it much dust and sand; but the Israelites had light. The Lord was clearly confronting Amon-Ra, the sun god, whom the Egyptians worshiped as their divine father.

10. Death of the Egyptian firstborn (Exod. 11.1–8). The announcement of the final plague, the death of the firstborn in Egyptian families, from Pharaoh's down even to those of slave girls (11.4–9), is linked with what took place at the first *Passover ceremony (12.1–32). It was then that the Lord "chose" Israel, which he had "passed over," as his firstborn son (Exod. 4.22–23).

The popular theme of the superiority of the Lord's power over that of pagan gods and magicians has here found expression in one of the most characteristic products of Israelite skill in narrative prose. The account has been the source of poetic summaries in Psalms 78.43–51; 105.28–36; of the homily on them in Wisdom of Solomon 11.1–12.2; and the general references to them elsewhere in the Bible (Deut. 6.22; 7.18–19; 11.3; 29.2–3; 1 Sam. 4.8). Several features of the Egyptian plagues reappear in the account of the "seven last plagues" in the book of Revelation (15.1–16.21; 21.9).

See also Exodus, The. GEORGE A. F. KNIGHT

Plants. Despite its relatively small size, ancient Israel had a rich and varied flora, a function of its topographic and climatic diversity and the associated variations in soil type and rainfall (see Geography of Palestine). The Bible, however, mentions only 110 names of plants, for many of which the identification is unknown or uncertain, notwithstanding the recent advances of archaeologists, botanists, and biblical scholars. Thus, the tappûaḥ (e.g., Song of Sol. 2.3, 5; 7.8; Prov. 25.11; Joel 1.12) has been identified as an apricot, quince, and apple, the ambiguity stemming both from the vagueness of the biblical texts and the lack of certainty concerning the dates when these fruits were present in Israel. Similarly, the famed šôšannâ of the Song of Solomon (2.6; 4.5; 5.13; 6.2–3; 7.2; šôšannâ of the valleys, 2.1) has been identified as a white lily, hyacinth, narcissus, crowfoot, chamomile, and rose; one can state with certainty only that it was a showy flower, or group of flowers, of some kind. Furthermore, there is no necessary correlation between the number of times, if any, that a plant is mentioned in the Bible and its importance in the *agriculture or ecology of Israel. For example, the foreign cedar of *Lebanon, the wood of gods and kings, topics of special interest to biblical authors, appears seventy times, more than twice the number of references to wheat, one of the major cereal crops of ancient Israel and an essential dietary staple. The probably abundant carob tree is not mentioned at all in the Bible. In general, the Bible mentions plants only in passing. It contains no system of plant classification (though such may have existed: see 1 Kings 4.33), and rarely offers descriptions of sufficient detail for identification. It is not always certain whether a plant name refers to an individual species or to a larger category such as thorns and thistles. A study of the plant terminology in such ancient *translations as the *Septuagint and the *Vulgate and in the commentaries of the rabbis and church fathers often adds to the uncertainty, since translators and commentators frequently identified biblical plant names with local flora with which they were familiar, many of which were not even found in Israel. Over the centuries, many peoples outside the region have given biblically sounding names to flora that are not native to Israel (such as the Joshua tree [Yucca brevifolia] of North America), again contributing to the confusion. On the other hand, the botanic data that can be derived from present-day studies, given the absence of significant climatic change in Israel since the Bronze Age, the growing body of evidence from archaeological excavations concerning the dates by which many wild and cultivated plants were present, and comparative data from Egypt and Mesopotamia have all contributed substantially to the current understanding of the biblical flora. Exhaustive compilations of biblical plant names and their possible or probable identifications can be found in a number of Bible dictionaries and encyclopedia articles and in such books as Michael Zohary's Plants of the Bible (Cambridge, England, 1982).

Although the biblical authors did not mention specific plants in great number or detail, they vividly portrayed the centrality of plants and their cultivation for ancient Israel, whose well-being depended on the successful harvesting of such cereal crops as wheat, barley, and emmer, as well as varieties of legumes, fruit trees, and vines (see Deut. 8.8). Plants are described as the basic food in the first creation account (Gen. 1.29). The well-watered and fruitful garden was understood as the best of all places (Gen. 2.4–3.24; Song of Sol.). This characterization is not surprising: the early Israelite community sought sustenance from land often beset by drought and composed of poor soil, with a topography that necessitated such labor-intensive forms of cultivation as terrace-farming. The challenges and frustrations of the Israelites may be reflected in the punishment meted out by God to the first man at the end of the second creation account: "Cursed is the ground because of you; in toil you shall eat of it all the days of your life; thorns and thistles it shall bring forth for you; and you shall eat the plants of the field" (Gen. 3.17–18). The biblical authors envisioned God's blessings and favor as yielding rainfall and abundant harvests. Thus, Micah 4.4 depicts peace and prosperity as all sitting "under their own vines and under their own fig trees" (cf. 2 Kings 18.31; Zech. 3.10; 1 Macc. 14.12). But when Israel violated her *covenant with God, she experienced drought, blight, and barren fields (Deut. 28.22–24; Isa. 17.10–11; Amos 4.9; 5.11).

Israelite *law reflected a concern with and some understanding of the ways in which crop production could be well managed. Thus, the Israelite farmer was forbidden to harvest immature fruit trees (Lev. 19.19), and was expected to allow his fields to remain fallow during the sabbatical year. Vegetable and *incense offerings were an essential component of the system of *sacrifice and atonement, a central piece of Israelite religion until the destruction of the *Temple by the Roman army in 70 CE (Exod. 30.34–48; Lev. 2; 7.9–10; 16.12–13; 24.5–9; Num. 15.1–10). The Bible also abounds with similes, *metaphors, and *parables rooted in the plant world. The images are as diverse as the flora itself. Thus, in addition to fertility, abundance, and continuity, plants are used to represent life's frailty, brevity, and transitory nature (Isa. 40.6–8; Job 14.2; Ps. 90.6; 1 Pet. 1.24). Biblical symbolism draws also on the characteristics of individual plants, such as the great height and longevity of the cedar tree (Ps. 92.12; see similarly the parable of Jotham, Judg. 9.8–15, and the parable of the mustard seed, Matt. 13.31–32 par.). The New Testament is replete with agricultural imagery; see, for example, Mark 4.3–8, 26–29; Matthew 9.37–38; Luke 13.6–9.

Representations of plants adorned the columns and carvings of the Solomonic Temple (1 Kings 6.18; 7.19, 26). Plants appeared also on Hasmonean and Herodian coinage, and on the coins issued by the rebels in the anti-Roman Palestinian Jewish revolts of the first and second centuries CE (see Money). To commemorate the defeat of the Jewish rebels in the First Jewish Revolt, the Roman government issued coins, in circulation by 71 CE, with the inscription "JUDAEA CAPTA" ("Judea captured"). The coin depicts a palm tree, perhaps in recognition of the importance of the date palm in Israel. On one side of the tree is a Roman legionary, on the other a woman in mourning seated under the palm. The mosaics of the *synagogues and churches of Roman and Byzantine Palestine were rich with representations of plants, depicted both realistically and in highly stylized forms.

BARBARA GELLER NATHANSON

Poetry, Biblical Hebrew. Poetry is the elevated style in which songs, hymns, lamentations, proverbs, wisdom, and prophetic speeches are composed. Biblical poems tend to be of short or medium length, ranging from two to about sixty lines. Longer poems exist, such as Psalm 119, but they are rare, and there is no continuous poem of epic proportion. Unlike most epic traditions, the Bible contains few narrative poems: its major narratives are in prose. Nevertheless, close to one-third of the Hebrew Bible is poetry, distributed in small amounts among the narrative books, in greater amounts in the prophetic books, and predominant in the collections of *Psalms, *Proverbs, and *Lamentations, and in the wisdom books of *Job and *Ecclesiastes.

Biblical poetry is characterized by a terse, binary form of expression that is eloquent and evocative. The terseness is effected by the juxtaposition of short lines with few specific connectives between them. The connective may be lacking altogether, or may consist of the multipurpose conjunction wāw, meaning "and," "but," "or," and so forth. Thus, the exact relationship between lines is often not made explicit. The lines themselves are short, usually three or four words, and their terseness is enhanced by the omission, in many cases, of the definite article, the relative pronoun, and other grammatical particles. Two examples, the first from a narrative poem and the second from a psalm, illustrate the terseness and parataxis of biblical poetry:

> Water he asked:
> Milk she gave:
> In a lordly cup she offered cream.
> (Judg. 5.25)

> You give to them, they gather:
> You open your hand, they are satisfied well.
> (Ps. 104.28)

These two excerpts also illustrate the most prominent feature of biblical poetry, its binary form of expression known as parallelism. Parallelism is the pairing of a line (or part of a line) with one or more lines that are in some way linguistically equivalent. The equivalence is often grammatical—that is, both parts of the parallelism may have the same syntactic structure, as in "Water he asked: Milk she gave." In many cases, however, the grammatical structure is not identical, at least on the surface level. In Judges 5.25, the third line expands and rearranges the syntax of the first two lines. Similarly, in Psalm 104.28 there is partial grammatical equivalence by virtue of the "you-they || you-they" pattern, but the syntax of the lines is different. Grammar has many facets, and any one of these facets may be brought into play in parallelism.

Another common form of equivalence is semantic equivalence; the meaning of the lines is somehow related: perhaps synonymous, perhaps reflecting the converse or reverse, or perhaps extending the meaning in any one of a number of ways. Again, equivalence does not imply identity. The second line of a parallelism rarely expresses exactly the same thought as the first; it is more likely to expand or intensify it. The relationship between "they gather" and "they are satisfied well" in Psalm 104.28 is a progression. The relationship between "water he asked" and "milk she gave" in Judges 5.25 is more than a progression—it sets up an opposition, a conflict, between the request and its fulfillment.

Grammatical and/or semantic equivalence account for most parallelisms, but because there are so many equivalent permutations for any given line, the number of potential parallelisms is enormous if not infinite. Although readers/listeners may learn to anticipate a parallelism, they cannot, except in the most formulaic of expressions, predict exactly what the parallelism will be. Each parallelism is cast to fit its context, and the effect of each must be evaluated individually.

There are, however, several general effects that parallelism has. For one thing, it helps to bind together the otherwise paratactic lines, so that the basic structure of the poem is not a single line but rather sets of lines (often called a couplet or a bicolon). Another by-product of parallelism is the rhythm or balance that it creates. Scholars have long sought metric regularity in biblical poetry, but no system—be it syllable counting, stress counting, thought-rhythm, or syntactic constraints—has met with unanimous acceptance. If there is such a metric form, it continues to elude us. It is more likely that the Hebrew poets embraced a looser system—one in which many lines of a poem are more or less the same length and partake of the rhythm of their parallelisms, but without the requirement of precise measurement.

Beyond the level of specific parallel lines it is possible to find a larger structural unit that is often called a strophe or stanza. This is identified by dividing the poem into its major sections, based on contents or on structural or lexical repetitions. Although a longer poem is likely to have more strophes, that is, more subdivisions, the strophe is less well defined than the couplet and seems less basic to the overall poetic structure. The principles whereby couplets are combined into longer segments or entire poems is not well understood, but it is clear that poems have movement and development, and that their lines and couplets cohere as unified compositions. Psalm 104, for example, portrays the creation of the world by means of a description of God's habitat, the sky, and then moves to various natural habitats and the creatures that occupy them. The progression in the poem is obvious even though its strophic divisions may not be.

In addition to their main characteristics, terseness, and parallelism, biblical poems often employ devices such as word repetition, word association, ellipsis, sound play, chiasm (an A-B B-A pattern of words, grammatical structures, or lines), inclusio (frame or ring composition), and imagery. Although these devices are not limited to poetry, and are not poetic requirements, they do enhance the poeticality, that is, the sense of elevated style and rhetoric associated with poetry. We draw again on Psalm 104 to illustrate:

> Wrapped in light as (in) a garment:
> Spreading the sky like a curtain.
> (Ps. 104.2)

Through similes, the first elements of creation, light, and the heavens become the personal effects of God, the glory surrounding and enhancing him. There is also a good deal of assonance in the Hebrew in these two lines, as there is elsewhere in the poem. The psalm begins and ends with "Bless the Lord, O my soul," which provides a sense of closure.

The rhetorical impact of biblical poetry is considerable and its aesthetic dimensions manifold. The prophets used it to convince, the wise to instruct, the psalmists to offer praise. In the Bible, language—that is, forms of verbal expression—takes on paramount importance; and it is in poetry that verbal expression reaches its epitome.

See also Acrostic. ADELE BERLIN

Politics and the Bible. The Bible is not a purely religious book; its pages are full of kings and empires, armies and wars, cries for justice. Its political implications have had great influence on the way in which it has been interpreted.

The Bible does not, however, present any systematic or unambiguous teaching about political matters. Its books were written over many centuries and under widely differing political systems, from Israelite tribal society to the *Roman empire. Many remarks that have political implications are brief hints rather than clearly stated principles. Later tradition, however, has tended to draw from the Bible certain great architectonic images of political life, and many have taken one such image to be the dominant one, even when the Bible itself furnishes counterindications. This article will sketch some of these classic images.

The Theocratic Image. Perhaps the most influential such image in history has been the theocratic image. God has laid down the way in which society ought to be governed; the essential constitution for human society has been written by God. The Mosaic *law exemplifies this. Basic norms were explicitly laid down by God: how to deal with homicide, which animals might be eaten, what to do if a corpse was found in the fields. Even if such rules could not be exactly followed within the very different world of Christendom, they continued to support a theocratic image. The Middle Ages struggled with the problem of interest upon *loans because "usury" was understood to be directly forbidden by God (Deut. 23.19; Luke 6.35[?]). And not only the laws, but also the centrality of persons with divine authority—kings, judges, patriarchs—reinforced the theocratic idea. Hence came the establishment of religion, the linkage of church and state, religious sanction for *war, and the divine right of kings. Later, some of these connections were weakened: monarchy was challenged, church and state could be separated, but the force of the theocratic paradigm continued; the belief that direct divine instructions for state and politics exist enshrined in the Bible lingers on. A central text was Romans 13.1: "The powers that be are ordained of God" (KJV).

In fact, the Bible's support for the theocratic image is ambiguous. *Kingship and state were not there from the beginning; when kingship, much later, was proposed, it was regarded in some circles as a rebellion against God (1 Sam. 8.7)—a principle that might have led toward a pious anarchism. Royalty is limited in theory (Deut. 17.14–20), and in historical event it was often condemned; yet democracy is hardly considered an alternative—if monarchy was revolt against God, it was the people's voice that had demanded it.

The Alien State. The great empires could at times be seen as blessed by God and as serving his purposes, but at the best they were heathen empires and their polity did not derive from the God of Israel. In Judea in the first century CE, Roman rule was often bitterly resented, and the war of 66–70 was approaching.

Thus *Jesus, with his talk of the *kingdom of God, and people's belief that he was the son of David, might easily raise political questions. The position he takes up is depicted as a strikingly neutralist one; asked if it is lawful to pay taxes to the emperor, he commands, "Render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and to God the things that are God's" (Mark 12.17). He does not define what is Caesar's and what is God's, but at least there is something that is Caesar's; there is a certain dualism in society; not everything is God's, nor can everything be derived from the theocratic idea. When asked to decide about an inheritance, Jesus asked, "Who made me a judge or divider over you?" (Luke 12.14); some things are human business, and Jesus refuses to involve God in people's partisan struggles. He does not encourage nationalist yearnings for revolt against Rome. Some New Testament sources, such as Luke-Acts, seem to give a favorable picture of Rome (e.g., the Roman administration protects Paul against Jewish violence). Roman persecutions of the church, however, pointed in the other direction: is Rome the beast of Revelation 13, the *Babylon of Revelation 18?

Some have thought that the historical Jesus was much more involved in the nationalist politics of his time, as indicated by the superscription "the King of the Jews" on the cross, suggesting that Jesus was put to death for political sedition; the reality of this was then covered up in the Gospels as we have them. The New Testament, seen in this way, is sometimes taken to support involvement in political conflict and violence, contrasting with the neutralist image conveyed by the existing Gospels.

The Prophetic Image. From the nineteenth century onward, the *prophets have been seen in the context of their own times as those who demanded social justice and warned of divine judgment if this demand was not met; the heathen empires would serve God in punishing his own people. The "prophetic" task of the church was thus to protest against the evils and injustices of society. Since the New Testament had not done much of this—Paul in *Philemon touches upon *slavery but does not attack the institution as such—the example of the Israelite prophets was appealed to all the more.

The prophetic image often clashes with the theocratic: God will not hesitate to overthrow that which has theocratic legitimacy if by its inaction it favors the powerful and leaves the weak to suffer. Much progressive, reformist, politically activist religion has thus relied on the prophetic image. Yet the prophets rarely proposed reform, and after early times they did little to foster political action within the nation; God's action came rather through forces from without.

The Eschatological Image. Allied with the prophetic, and still more evident in the *apocalyptic movement, is the image of the coming of a new world in which war and evil will be no more (Isa. 2.4; 11.1–9; Rev. 21.1–5)—and one that may come to pass very soon. Political upheavals and international violence may be birth pangs of this new era (Mark 13.1–30). This vision of immediate catastrophe and a new world nourishes two hostile but related tendencies: millenarianism, which almost welcomes catastrophe because it ushers in the end, and sympathy for Marxist revolution.

The Image of Migration. The Hebrew Bible emphasizes the migrations of *Abraham, of the *Hebrews from *Egypt to the *Promised Land, of the returning exiles; the New Testament also pictures the church as a pilgrim people (Hebr. 13.14). This biblical image of migration and return was the motive power for modern Zionism. Christian nations often saw themselves in the same way: they were Israel, going out to find a land where they could build a life in the pattern ordained by God—the Puritan settlers of New England and the Afrikaners in South Africa are examples.

The Image of Liberation. New Testament passages often emphasize freedom or liberty (e.g., John 8.36; Rom. 8.21; Gal. 4.26), and modern scholarly trends have emphasized the *Exodus as the dominant event of the Hebrew Bible. In Egypt, the Hebrews were enslaved and subjected to forced labor; their male population was threatened by infanticide. They looked back on the time in Egypt with horror, and their escape from Egypt was the great event, ever afterward to be celebrated. No biblical theme has received more attention for its political importance in recent years than liberation. This theme was taken up by and on behalf of the exploited and oppressed of Latin America, Asia, and Africa, and made into the keystone of liberation theology. The church must take the side of the *poor and oppressed, stand with them in their struggle, join with their cry to God for deliverance, and read the Bible from within that context. Neutrality in relation to this situation is intolerable.

This use of the Exodus theme, powerful as it seems, has also been questioned on the ground that it implies a peculiar selectivity within the biblical traditions and a neglect of contrary aspects. Why did the Hebrews not organize politically to resist oppression? Why is their demand not a call for social justice but a request to leave Egypt in order to worship God in the wilderness? If the Exodus theme is so authoritative, what about its sequel when the liberated Hebrews enter Canaan and destroy or reduce to slavery the entire population of that land? Why should one aspect be more authoritative than the other? Liberation theologians generally answer by an appeal to the context of the interpreter: if the context is right, then it will be obvious which aspects of the biblical materials are relevant.

Conclusion. The Bible is certainly deeply interested in human political, social, and historical existence, and it presents powerful images relevant for understanding it. But all of these images have a somewhat relative character within the Bible and are limited through inner qualifications and through the coexistence of other, different images. It is doubtful therefore whether any clear and unitary political view can be derived from the Bible taken alone and as an entirety. If we appeal to the contextual situation of the interpreter, then the source is not the Bible as a whole but one's contextual selection. Or is it intrinsically mistaken to appeal so directly to the Bible at all? May the biblical images be valid and salutary only insofar as they are taken up into a total religious and philosophical position that includes, but goes beyond, the actual material of the Bible? These are fundamental questions posed by a consideration of politics and the Bible.

JAMES BARR

Polyglot Bibles. Polyglot Bibles are editions that contain the biblical text in several languages, usually in parallel columns. The term is used especially with reference to four great editions of the complete Bible published in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries: the Complutensian, Antwerp, Paris, and London polyglots. Other editions (Nuremburg, 1599 [Hutter]; London, 1831 [Bagster]; Bielefeld, 1864 [Stier/Theile]) have since followed such a pattern, but these four spanned a critical period in the development of western biblical studies, marking the transition from an appreciation of the original languages of the Bible to the realization of the need for critical editions of the text in each of the original languages.

The Complutensian Polyglot (1514–1517). The early sixteenth century saw a growing demand for sound knowledge of the Bible, not only among the scholarly clergy but also among leaders of the commercial and political communities. Humanist scholars, seeking the authentic text of the Latin *Vulgate scriptures, began studying its original languages, *Hebrew and *Greek. Centers for the study of biblical languages were established at Oxford, Paris, Basel, Geneva, Wittemberg, and elsewhere. Cardinal Francisco Ximénes de Cisneros (1436–1517) of Toledo founded a university at Complutum (Alcalá de Henares) in 1500, and in 1502 he undertook the editing of the Complutensian Polyglot to provide the necessary texts and tools for biblical studies. Eminent scholars were assembled, including Antonio de Lebrija, Lopez de Zuñiga, and the converted Jews Alphonso of Alcalá and Alphonso of Zamora. Some biblical manuscripts were purchased, others were borrowed; even the Vatican loaned from its treasures. In 1514, the New Testament was printed, and two years later the Old Testament was completed, but the whole was not formally published until 1522. The work includes not only the text of the complete Bible in five volumes, but also a Greek-Latin lexicon of the New Testament at the end of the fifth volume, and in an appended sixth volume a Hebrew-Latin dictionary with a Latin-Hebrew index and an etymological dictionary of biblical proper names. The Old Testament page format is in three columns, with the Latin Vulgate centered and the Hebrew text (the first Christian printed edition) and Greek *Septuagint (the first printed edition) in the outer and inner columns respectively. The Septuagint is provided with a literal interlinear Latin translation, and each word in the parallel Vulgate and Hebrew columns is marked with a superscript letter to show their correspondence; Hebrew roots are indicated in the margins. In the Pentateuch, the Targum of Onkelos and its Latin translation are placed at the foot of the page. The New Testament page format is in two columns, Greek and Latin. Only six hundred copies of the polyglot were printed, and within decades copies were so scarce that Philip II of Spain commissioned the preparation of the Antwerp Polyglot.

The Antwerp Polyglot (1569–1572). Edited by Benedictus Arias Montanus (1527–1598) and printed by Christopher Plantin (1514–1589), the "Royal Polyglot" of Antwerp reproduced essentially the Complutensian text, expanding it to eight volumes. Participating scholars included Franciscus Raphelengius, Guido and Nicolaus Fabricius, and Daniel Bomberg. The biblical texts remained largely unchanged, though the Hebrew text was corrected from the Bomberg Venice edition and the Septuagint from the Aldine edition; the only significant addition is the Syriac text of the New Testament, based on Widmanstadt's 1555 edition. The Old Testament page format was changed to display four columns over two pages, with the Hebrew and Latin Vulgate texts to the left and to the right a literal Latin translation of the Septuagint followed by the Greek Septuagint text, while below them the Onkelos Targum in Chaldee (Aramaic) is on the left page and a literal Latin translation of it to the right. In the New Testament the Peshitta Syriac and its literal Latin translation are on the left and the Vulgate and Greek (Erasmus's fourth edition) are on the right; the Syriac text is repeated in Hebrew characters below, with word roots identified in the margins. Scholarly helps were considerably expanded: volume six provides grammars and lexicons for Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, and Greek; in volume seven the Hebrew and Greek Testaments have interlinear Latin texts from Sanctes Pagninus's version and the Vulgate respectively, with notes and alternative renderings added in the margin; volume eight contains seventeen chapters of helps on topics ranging from weights and measures, biblical geography, and priestly vestments, to accounts of the *Masorah, variant readings in the Old and New Testaments and the Psalms (four, seven, and eleven pages respectively), and a review by Louvain theologians comparing the variants in the Vulgate tradition with the other traditions. Twelve hundred copies were issued on paper, and thirteen on velum.

The Paris Polyglot (1629–1645). Preparations for the ill-fated Paris Polyglot were begun by Cardinal Du Perron in 1615, halted at his death in 1617, and resumed several years later by Guy Michel Le Jay, a Parisian lawyer, who completed it at his own expense. Among his assistants were Jean Morin and Godefridus Hermant of Blois, the Maronites Gabriel Sionita and Joannes Hesronita, and Jerome Parent of the Sorbonne. Cardinal Richelieu offered to sponsor the work under his own name, but threw his influence against it when Le Jay refused. Printed by Antoine Vitré, the ten-volume work is remarkable mainly for its initials, maps, and plates. It expanded the range of resources for biblical scholarship with the first printed edition of not only the Samaritan Pentateuch and the Samaritan Targum but also of the Syriac Peshitta Old Testament, and even completed the Syriac New Testament with the lesser Catholic letters (from Pococke, 1630) and Revelation (from de Dieu, 1627), but ultimately it was a failure. Its text followed the Antwerp Polyglot closely for the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin texts, earning severe criticism for ignoring the officially authorized Roman editions of both the Septuagint (1586–1587) and the Latin Vulgate (1592). Although the Chaldee Targum of the Pentateuch was ostensibly revised, its Latin rendering was not. Further, the biblical text was accompanied by neither helps nor apparatus, and finally it was soon overshadowed by the London Polyglot. Suffering from both political and scholarly disfavor, the work's circulation was severely hampered; rather than offer it at a reduced price, though, Le Jay sold a large number of sheets as waste paper.

The London Polyglot (1655–1657). Brian Walton designed in 1647 a plan for an improved polyglot Bible, which would (as he described it later) "not only . . . exhibit to the reader all the ancient and chief Translations, together with the Originals, but also the chief Copies, MSS., or others, of both, so that in this Edition the reader might have all or most other editions, and the best MSS. which he might consult at pleasure." This most comprehensive and important of the great polyglots is still valuable today for biblical scholarship. Walton's preface duly acknowledges the cooperation of such scholars as James Ussher, Gilbert Sheldon, John Lightfoot, Abraham Wheelocke, Edmund Castell, and Edward Pococke, and the expense of publication was met by subscription. It was dedicated to Oliver Cromwell (the republican edition), but copies issued after the accession of Charles II (29 May 1660) have a revised dedication (the loyalist edition). The first three volumes present the texts of the Old Testament, followed by the *Apocrypha and the Pseudo-Jonathan and Jerusalem Targums in the fourth volume, and the New Testament in the fifth. The texts are printed across two pages: the Hebrew text with Pagninus's Latin revised by Arias on the left paralleled by the Clementine Latin Vulgate to the right; below these come the Greek Septuagint with its Latin translation in two columns on the left, both from the 1628 Roman authorized edition and with the variants of Codex Alexandrinus added at the foot of the Greek column, facing on the right the Onkelos Targum with its Latin translation on the right; beneath these are the Syriac and the Arabic versions, each with its Latin translation; and in the Pentateuch there is added the Samaritan Hebrew and the Samaritan Targum, with a single Latin translation but with variations footnoted. Particularly valuable is the sixth volume, which is reserved for a critical apparatus to the texts, as well as the learned prolegomena in the first volume, which devotes nearly two hundred densely packed folio pages to such topics as biblical chronology, geography, measures, and idioms, illustrated with maps and plans, and a survey of the nature of language, of alphabets, and the history of the biblical text, its editions and versions.

See also Printing and Publishing.

ERROLL F. RHODES

Pontifical Biblical Commission. By his Apostolic Letter Vigilantiae (30 Oct. 1902), Pope Leo XIII established the Pontifical Biblical Commission to promote biblical studies in the Roman Catholic Church, "that God's words will both be given, everywhere among us, that thorough study that our times demand and be shielded not only from every breath of error but even from every rash opinion." The commission was to study biblical questions in the light of modern trends and recent discoveries and to disseminate for the service of all whatever was useful for biblical interpretation. The first-word title of the Apostolic Letter, "vigilance," however, sounded a note that was to mark the activity of the commission, which sought above all to safeguard the authority of the Bible against the exaggerated criticism of early-twentieth-century Modernism. Though the commission was not strictly a Roman congregation, it was organized, as were Vatican commissions of that period, with five cardinal members and thirty-nine consultors (biblical scholars from many nations).

Pope Pius X (1903–1914) furthered the work of the commission. During his reign it issued thirteen responsa (often popularly called "decrees"), and subsequently others (until 1933), with various other declarations about biblical studies in seminaries and requirements for ecclesiastical biblical degrees.

The responsa were issued in the form of brief answers (affirmative or negative) to long, intricate, often "loaded" questions. They dealt with such topics as the theory of implicit quotations in the Bible; the theory of apparently historical narratives; the Mosaic authorship of the *Pentateuch; the authorship and historicity of the Fourth Gospel; the authorship and character of the book of Isaiah; the historicity of Genesis 1–3; the authorship, date of composition, and character of the Psalms or of Matthew; of the Marcan and Lucan Gospels; the *synoptic problem; the authorship, date of composition, and historicity of Acts; the authenticity, integrity, and date of composition of the Pastoral Letters; the authorship and composition of the letter to the Hebrews; the *parousia in Pauline writings; the interpretation of two texts (Ps. 16.10–11 and Matt. 16.26 = Luke 9.25). These responsa caused a dark cloud of reactionary conservatism to settle over Roman Catholic biblical scholarship in the first half of the twentieth century.

The commission's responsa were never understood to have been infallibly issued. Pius X in his Motuproprio Praestantia sacrae scripturae considered them to be "useful for the proper progress and guidance of biblical scholarship along safe lines." But he did require the same submission of Catholics to these responsa as to similar papally approved decrees of other Roman congregations.

In 1943, Pope Pius XII issued an encyclical, Divino afflante spiritu, on the promotion of biblical studies. Since that time, the Biblical Commission has played a more open-minded role in encouraging such studies. Its responsa have given way to "letters" and "instructions," in which it has gradually assumed a more positive stance, though concern is still expressed about some errors or excessive tendencies.

To many people, however, both inside and outside the Roman Catholic Church, the responsa have seemed to be still in effect. This, however, is not true. In 1955, a semiofficial explanation of the character of the responsa was issued by the secretary and the subsecretary of the commission, distinguishing responsa that touched on faith and morals from those that dealt with literary questions, authorship, integrity, date of composition, and so on. The former were to be regarded as still valid, whereas the latter were recognized as time-conditioned, corresponding to a historical context that no longer existed. Both secretaries explained that in matters pertaining to the responsa of the second category Catholic interpreters were to pursue their research and interpretation "with full freedom." Significantly, almost all of the above-mentioned responsa belong to the second category.

In 1964, the Biblical Commission issued an instruction "On the Historical Truth of the Gospels," in which it dealt concretely and in a positive way with a problem that has vexed modern students of the Gospels both within and without the Roman Catholic Church. Instead of merely reiterating the historical character of the Gospels, it adopted valid aspects of form criticism and distinguished three stages of the gospel tradition: (i) what Jesus of Nazareth did and said; (ii) what his disciples preached after his death and resurrection about him, his message, and his deeds; and (iii) what the evangelists selected and synthesized from that preaching and explicated for the needs of their churches. Whereas the instruction insinuated a continuum between the first and third stages, it did not in any way (fundamentalistically) identify them. (The essential content of that instruction was briefly repeated in chapter 5 of the dogmatic constitution of Vatican Council II, Dei verbum.)

In 1971, Pope Paul VI revamped the commission, making it a counterpart of the International Theological Commission and associating it with the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith. The members of the Biblical Commission are no longer cardinals, but twenty biblical scholars from across the world, appointed for five years, most of them of widely acclaimed competence. JOSEPH A. FITZMYER, S.J.

Poor. As the formulaic association of the poor with *widows and *orphans in ancient Near Eastern literature in general and in the Hebrew Bible in particular shows, poverty was an undesirable condition and not an ascetic discipline to be embraced for a higher goal. Protection and special care for these economically deprived members of society was a responsibility of kings, who demonstrated their power in part by their ability to help those unable to help themselves (see Kingship and Monarchy). This royal responsibility is found in Israel as well, as the interchange between *David and *Nathan in 2 Samuel 12.1–6 implies and the royal instruction in Proverbs 31.8–9 makes explicit; see also Psalms 72.2, 12–14; Proverbs 29.14.

In premonarchic Israel this obligation was incumbent on the nation as a whole. In some of its earliest legislation, Israel is instructed to ensure that the poor have both a fair hearing in judicial contexts and food from the harvest and sabbatical fallowness (Exod. 23.6, 11; see Lev. 19.10; 23.22), and to lend money to the poor without interest (Exod. 22.25; see Loans and Interest). The prophets repeatedly reminded Israel of these obligations; see Isaiah 10.1–4; 58.7; Amos 2.6–7; 4.1; Ezekiel 18.

What was incumbent on the nation as a whole was also required of the individual. *Job's passionate declaration of innocence is a summary of the individual Israelite's moral code; as part of his assertion of complete righteousness, Job details his concern for the poor (Job 29.11–17; 31.16–22; see also Deut. 15.11). This ethical obligation continues to be stressed in the New Testament and in the Qur'ān.

Those who oppressed the poor, then, were the wicked (Ps. 37.14; Prov. 14.31), and God was the protector of the poor (Ps. 140.12). He would reward those who gave to the poor (Prov. 19.17) and would ultimately provide for them himself (Isa. 41.17).

All of these texts make it clear that poverty was an unfortunate state. Its origins are explored only in wisdom literature, where it is often attributed to moral shortcomings or at least to a lack of industry, an example of the dominant biblical view that God rewards goodness and punishes wickedness. It must be noted, however, that this point of view is found in literature originating in well-to-do circles, mainly in Proverbs (10.4; 13.18; 14.23; 20.13; 23.21; 29.19).

In the New Testament as well, poverty, especially self-impoverishment, is not an ideal in itself, but rather a condition temporarily assumed for the sake of some higher goal. Paul illustrates this when he speaks of "the generous act of our Lord Jesus Christ, that though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, so that by his poverty you might become rich" (2 Cor. 8.9). The larger context of the verse is the collection for the poor of the church in Jerusalem, an effort to which Paul was committed (see Gal. 2.1–10; 1 Cor. 16.1–4; Rom. 15.25–27); Paul appeals to the Christians of Corinth to imitate the selfless love of Jesus, out of concern for their more needy brothers and sisters. This idea of the "imitation of Christ," also present in Philippians 2.5–8, is made a general ideal in later, monastic Christianity, where poverty is embraced not just or not even primarily for the sake of others but as a means of freedom from material goods that enables one to attain a higher spiritual state in union with Jesus, who in an apparently hyperbolic proverb, said to one who would follow him: "Foxes have holes and birds of the air have nests, but the Son of man has nowhere to lay his head" (Matt. 8.20; Luke 9.58).

The advice of Jesus to the rich young man to "sell all and give to the poor" (Mark 10.21 par.; cf. 10.23–31) must be interpreted in the light of the eschatological urgency felt by early Christians and probably by Jesus himself, as well as the narrative context, despite later abstraction of that command into an ideal of "evangelical poverty." Following earlier biblical descriptions of divine judgment, Jesus is apparently anticipating a reversal of fortune when the *kingdom of God appears: the undesirable conditions of the poor, hungry, mourning and persecuted will be altered (Luke 6.20–23; cf. 1 Sam. 2.4–8 and Luke 1.51–53; Isa. 61.1–4 and Luke 4.16–21).

See Alms; Meek. MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Popular Culture and the Bible. The Bible has been a fixture in American popular culture from the first European settlements to the present. Mentioning only a few random facts is enough to suggest the breadth of the Bible's presence in American civilization. The first English book published in North America was The Whole Booke of Psalmes Faithfully Translated into English Meter (1640). The American Bible Society, founded in 1816, has distributed well over four billion copies of the Bible or biblical portions (see Bible Societies). Throughout the nineteenth century, American settlers regularly named their communities after biblical places, like Zoar, Ohio (Gen. 13.10), or Mount Tirzah, North Carolina (Josh. 12.24), as well as forty-seven variations on Bethel, sixty-one on Eden, and ninety-five on Salem. When in 1842 the Roman Catholic Bishop of Philadelphia, Francis Patrick Kenrick, petitioned city officials to allow schoolchildren of his faith to hear readings from the Douay-Rheims translation of the Bible instead of the Protestant King James Version, the city's Protestants rioted and tried to burn down Philadelphia's Catholic churches. In 1964, a thought-provoking book was published on the biblical content of a famous comic strip (Robert Short, The Gospel According to Peanuts). Two of the most popular rock-operas of the 1970s, Jesus Christ Superstar and Godspell, were based on the biblical Gospels. During the same decade, the best-selling book of any kind (except the Bible itself) was Hal Lindsey's The Late Great Planet Earth, which attempted to show how current events were fulfilling prophetic passages of scripture. In 1990, at least seven thousand different editions of the Bible were available from hundreds of publishers. However difficult it may be to define the impact of the Bible on ordinary people precisely, scripture has always been a vital element in American popular life.

From the first colonists, the Bible provided themes for Americans to define themselves as a people, and then as a nation. Puritans in New England believed they were in *covenant with God just like the ancient Israelites. The first public political campaigns of the 1830s were modeled directly on the organized enthusiasm and passionate rhetoric of the religious revival. In the intense sectional strife leading to the Civil War, the Bible became a weapon put to use by both sides. In the South, passages like Leviticus 25:45 ("the children of the strangers that do sojourn among you . . . they shall be your possession") defined the righteousness of their cause. In the North, favored passages, usually from the New Testament, like Galatians 5:1 ("Stand fast . . . in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free"), did the same. (See Slavery and the Bible.) Abraham Lincoln, in his Second Inaugural Address, put the Civil War into perspective by quoting Matthew 18:7 and Psalm 19:9, and by noting that "both [sides] read the same Bible." Biblical phrases and conceptions, particularly with politicians from the South like Woodrow Wilson or Jimmy Carter, have continued to exert a political force even in the more secular twentieth century.

If anything, the Bible has been more obviously at work in the popular culture of *African Americans than among whites. Slaves made a sharp distinction between the Bible their owners preached to them and the Bible they discovered for themselves. Under slavery, stringent regulations often existed against unsupervised preaching, and sometimes even against owning Bibles. But with or without permission, slaves made special efforts to hear black preachers. One slave left this striking testimony: "a yellow [light-complexioned] man preached to us. She [the slave owner] had him preach how we ought to obey our master and missy if we want to go to heaven, but when she wasn't there, he came out with straight preachin' from the Bible."

Blacks sang and preached about *Adam and *Eve and the *Fall, about "wrestlin' Jacob" who "would not let [God] go," about *Moses and the *Exodus from Egypt, about *Daniel in the lions' den, about *Jonah in the belly of the fish, about the birth of *Jesus and his death and future return. The slaves' profound embrace of scripture created a climate for Bible reading and biblical preaching that has continued among African Americans since the Civil War. (See also African American Traditions and the Bible.)

In the popular media, scripture has been as omnipresent as in politics. Fiction, hymns, and poetry employing biblical themes have always made up a huge proportion of American publishing. Composers William Billings (1746–1800), John Knowles Paine (1839–1906), and many in the twentieth century, such as Charles Ives and Aaron Copland, followed earlier precedents by writing musical settings for the psalms. Among the populace at large, the flood of sheet music, hymnals, chorus books, and gospel songs has never ebbed. In the nineteenth century, one of the most frequently reprinted sheet-music titles was "My Mother's Bible." Its first appearance (1843) evoked an emotional domestic ideal: "My mother's hands this Bible clasped, / She dying gave it me." At another level, millions of Sunday school students have learned songs like "The B-I-B-L-E, / Yes, that's the book for me, / I stand alone on the word of God, / The B-I-B-L-E." (See also Music and the Bible.)

American writers of popular fiction have always drawn on biblical materials. Biblical allusions feature prominently in works such as Herman Melville's Moby-Dick (which begins, "Call me Ishmael"), William Faulkner's Absalom, Absalom! (1936) and Go Down Moses (1942), James Baldwin's Go Tell It on the Mountain (1953), and Peter Devries's The Blood of the Lamb (1961). The American people have never been able to get enough of popular fiction inspired directly by the Bible. The first important novel of this kind was William Ware's Julian: Or, Scenes in Judea (1856), which described gospel events through the letters of its fictional protagonist. General Lew Wallace's Ben Hur (1880), which climaxed in a breathtaking chariot race, is probably the supreme example of biblical fiction. President Garfield wrote his personal thanks to Wallace from the White House, and it soon became a huge success with the public at large (in part because Sears, Roebuck printed up a million inexpensive copies). Ben Hur was also the inspiration for an immensely successful touring drama (complete with surging horses on a treadmill) and two motion pictures. Other similar books have had nearly as much success, including Henryk Sienkiewicz's Quo Vadis? (1896), Lloyd Douglas's The Robe (1942) and The Big Fisherman (1949), Marjorie Holmes's Two from Galilee (1972), and several novels of both Taylor Caldwell and Frank G. Slaughter. One of the most unusual examples of this fiction was written first in Yiddish by a Jewish author, Sholem Asch. When published in English in 1939, The Nazarene won praise from Christians for its sensitive portrayal of contemporary customs at the time of Jesus. (See also Literature and the Bible, article on North American Literature.)

Many of the blockbuster biblical novels eventually found their way to the screen. Cecil B. de Mille's The King of Kings from 1927 (with H. B. Warner as a diffident Jesus) and George Stevens's The Greatest Story Ever Told from 1965 (with Max von Sydow as a Jesus who was allowed to show traces of humor) were among the most memorable, but there have been many others.

The Bible as a theme in popular communications is hardly exhausted by songs, poems, stories, and movies. In the visual arts, biblical materials have provided inspiration for German immigrants embellishing needle work with Fraktur print, lithographers such as Currier and Ives, countless painters at countless levels of ability, and a few masters acclaimed by both public and critics, such as Edward Hicks, who in the mid nineteenth century painted several versions of The Peaceable Kingdom. (See Art and the Bible.) Since the beginning of mass-marketed religious objects about the time of the Civil War, both Catholics and Protestants have purchased immense quantities of pictures, statues, games, children's toys, paperweights, refrigerator magnets, jewelry, T-shirts, greeting cards, calendars, and business cards decorated with biblical motifs.

Allene Stuart Phy, editor of the best book on the subject, once observed that there is often a "ludicrous discrepancy . . . between the ancient wisdom of the scriptures and the vulgarities of American popular culture" (The Bible and Popular Culture in America, 1985). But Phy also saw clearly that even these "vulgarities" show the "profound ways in which the holy books of the Jewish and Christian religions relate to [the] lives of Americans."

See also Everyday Expressions from the Bible.

MARK A. NOLL

Pottery. See Archaeology and the Bible; Crafts; Houses, Furniture, Utensils.

Poverty. See Poor.

Prayer(s). The Bible both talks about prayer and gives the texts of specific prayers to God. Underlying the biblical story is the conviction, so fundamental that it rarely needs to be voiced explicitly, that it is both possible and desirable for humans to address the Divine and that the Divine both can and will respond. Indeed the God of the Bible is characterized as "you who answer prayer" (Ps. 65.2; cf. 1 Kings 9.3; Matt. 7.11).

Yet the very terminology of "prayer" is much more problematic than might seem at first glance. Sometimes, in modern usage, the term is used to include any form of address to God or even outbursts of praise about God, such as hymnic compositions in which God is not addressed directly but talked about in the third person. Furthermore, communication with God can be expressed not only in words but in acts of *sacrifice, dance, ritual bodily *gestures, and other nonverbal modes of communication, and in a broad sense all of these are often included in the category of prayer. Biblical scholars usually define the term more narrowly and precisely, distinguishing between "psalms" as sung poetic compositions in formulaic language that belong to the formal, public *worship in the Temple and "prayers" as prose compositions, usually with some component of petition. Often it is difficult to draw a line between conversation with God (e.g., Gen. 18; Exod. 3–4) and the more formalized style of address and content that should be termed a "prayer."

Both prayer and sacrifice are understood in the Bible as service (Hebr. ʿăbōdâ) rendered to God as king. It is debated whether set words of prayer may have accompanied sacrifice in the Temple; certainly no such texts have been preserved. Sometimes the language of prayer and sacrifice is brought together (e.g., Ps. 141.2), and the *Temple itself came to be called a "house of prayer" (Isa. 56.7; 1 Kings 8; Luke 18.10). Little is known about origin of the practice of set statutory prayers for the community (particularly for morning and evening), although the process certainly began in the postexilic period. Among the *Dead Sea Scrolls there are, albeit preserved only in an extremely fragmentary state, the actual texts of prayers from perhaps the mid-third century BCE, prayers for each day of the week, each month of the year, and for special feasts (1Q34; 4Q503–509); in these certain features that came to be standard in subsequent Jewish prayer are already attested (in particular the blessing formulary at beginning and end of each prayer and the practice of petitionary prayer on weekdays and prayer of praise on the *Sabbath).

When we turn to actual texts of prayers given in the Bible, much study has focused on the *Psalms and on the *Lord's Prayer; yet these are by no means the only prayers in the Bible. In the Hebrew Bible alone there are over ninety prose prayers in which individuals address God directly in a time of need. These range from a short simple petition (like that of Moses' "O God, please heal her," Num. 12.13; see also Jth. 13.8; 2 Sam. 15.31; 2 Kings 6.17), to more lengthy and formal prayers blending elements of praise and petition (2 Sam. 7.18–29; 1 Kings 8.22–61; 2 Chron. 20.6–12), to communal confession of sin and lament (Jth. 10.10). Such prayers are presented as spontaneous, unrepeatable, and arising out of the immediate situation, although as Moshe Greenberg (Biblical Prose Prayer as a Window to the Popular Religion of Ancient Israel [Berkeley and Los Angeles, 1983]) has shown, there are links in contact, structure, and vocabulary between these prayers of individuals and the more formal psalms and public prayers. Of special interest are those narratives that portray an individual drawing on a psalm from the cultic realm as a personal prayer in time of need (1 Sam. 2.1–10; 2 Sam. 22.2–51; Jon. 2.1–9) and, from the postexilic period, a special collection of extended prayers of confession of sin and penitence (Ezra 9.6–15; Neh. 9.5–37; Dan. 9.3–19).

The *Apocrypha is especially rich in actual prayer texts, including the prayers of Esther and Mordecai added on to the Greek text of *Esther; the prayers of *Azariah and the three youths in the fire in Daniel 3; Tobit 3.2–7, 11–15; 8.5–7, 15–17; 13; Judith 9.2–14; 13.4–5; 16.1–17; and many other short prayers (see also Manasseh, The Prayer of). These provide a window into the continuing development of prayer forms in the Persian and Hellenistic periods, such as the increased use of the blessing formulary to begin a prayer, and give evidence of a number of new concepts about prayer that find expression in this period, such as the introduction of an angelic intermediary who presents prayers to God (Tob. 12.12) and the possibility of prayers for the dead (2 Macc. 12.41–45).

In the New Testament we continue to find both statements about prayer and the text of prayers, especially on the lips of Jesus and Paul. Thus Jesus not only teaches his disciples about prayer and gives them words to pray "like this" (Luke 1.2–4; Matt. 6.5–13; see Lord's Prayer) but he himself is portrayed as praying at each of the decisive moments of his life (Luke 3.21; 6.12; 9.29; 22.39–46; 23.46; John 15–17). Much of what the New Testament says about prayer continues and reiterates what is said in earlier sections of the Bible about the necessity and efficacy of prayer and the characteristics of humility and persistence to be brought to prayer. Distinctively Christian is the emphasis that prayer, though directed to God (Rom. 1.8; 1 Cor. 1.4; Col. 1.3), is to be "through Jesus Christ" (Rom. 1.8) or in the name of Jesus (John 15.17), and the role of the Spirit in making prayer possible (Rom. 8.26–28; Gal. 4.6).

See also Lectionaries. EILEEN SCHULLER

Predestination. The notion of predestination, God's foreknowledge and arrangement of events, has been an important doctrine in certain forms of Christianity, mostly Protestantism, and particularly in forms historically and theologically related to John Calvin, the sixteenth-century reformer from Geneva. In particular this doctrine refers to God's predetermining who is elected and therefore, naturally, who is not. In the ancient world, however, the idea of predestination and foreknowledge had a wider connotation and was common in secular as well as religious writings.

God's providence or forethought was a common feature of ancient Greek writers from the time of Plato (Timaeus 30b; 44c) and Xenophon (Memorabilia 1.4.6; 4.3.6), and later in the writings of Diogenes Laertius (3.24k) and Plutarch (Moralia 425f; 436d). It is therefore not surprising to find that foreknowledge (Grk. pronoia) figures prominently in such first-century writers as *Josephus and *Philo. Josephus claims that it may have been pronoia that somehow allowed him to avoid participating in the mass suicide at Jotopata at the outbreak of the Jewish revolt in 67 CE (War 3.8.391); while others died or killed each other, Josephus was spared, taken captive by Vespasian, and lived to write his multivolume works The Jewish War and The Antiquities of the Jews. Philo wrote an entire treatise on pronoia. That a person should be able to ascertain God's plan and will or enjoy the predestination of the divine was a claim to one's own influence and position. Such claims were not nearly as fanciful to ancient writers and philosophers as they may seem to many moderns.

In the New Testament the few times this concept is employed it involves trying to figure out how God's actions embodied in Jesus of Nazareth can be understood in the context of and reconciled with God's plans. The writers who took this point up were deeply steeped in the Hellenistic milieu of the cities of Asia Minor and the Greek East. The speculative and philosophical nature of this discussion accords well with the ethos of these eastern urban Greek centers. Thus, the author of 1 Peter says that the elect were chosen by the foreknowledge of God (1.2) and also claims that Jesus was foreknown before the foundation of the world (1.20). Likewise, Acts 2.23, in a speech attributed to Peter, asserts that Jesus was delivered up "by the predestined plan and foreknowledge of God."

Paul utilized this language to articulate what he believed God had done in Jesus of Nazareth and what this means for Jews, *gentiles, and current believers in Jesus. To the church in Rome he says God foreknew and predestined those whom he called to become the image of his son (Rom. 8.29). In both Romans 11.2 and Galatians 3.8 Paul tries to reconcile God's predestiny of Israel with the predestiny of believers who are not Jews. This is a difficult argument. He claims finally that God has both chosen and foreordained Israel, and God predestined non-Jews or gentiles to be included in Israel through his selection of *Abraham to be a light to the nations. God was able to foresee that the gentiles would be justified by faith through the gospel preached to Abraham beforehand when he said, "All the nations shall be blessed in you" (Gal.3.8, quoting Gen. 12.3).

In the New Testament, then, the rather common Greek notions of foreknowledge and predestiny were used by writers comfortable with the Greek philosophical milieu to reconcile the events that had taken place recently in Jesus of Nazareth with the historic events and promises of Israel's past.

Over the centuries the notion of pronoia itself was modified and utilized for a host of theological and social conflicts that the Greek and Jewish writers of the first century CE could not have anticipated and probably would never have imagined. J. ANDREW OVERMAN

Priestly Writers. See P.

Priests and High Priest. The major cultic persons in Israel. Through the centuries documented in the Bible, priestly duties and activities varied somewhat, but primary in the early period, and always basic, was the idea that a priest is a person attached to the service of God in a sanctuary, God's house. The original concept of the priest as server or minister of God in the sanctuary was analogous to that of a king's minister in the palace. As ministers in a palace set food on the table of an earthly king, early Israelite priests set holy bread on a table before God (1 Sam. 21.4–6), a practice that underlay the provisions for the bread of the presence (see Showbread). As ministers of a king served as intermediaries for citizens wishing to ask the king what course of action to take, or what the king's mind might be, early Israelite priests, using the *Urim and Thummim in the *ephod, asked God the same sorts of questions for others, including the leaders of the people (Judg. 18.5; 1 Sam. 14.3, 36–42; 22.9–10, 13, 15, 18; 23.9–12; 30.7–8), a practice which evolved into the priestly giving of tôrâ, or law, as manifestation of the divine mind. It was as intermediary between God in his holy place and the people outside that a priest communicated God's blessing to the people (Num. 6.22–27; Deut. 10.8; 21.5).

Priests and Sacrifice. In early narratives, including *J and *E, it was perfectly right for someone who was not a priest to offer a *sacrifice on an *altar not attached to a sanctuary, without any priestly intervention. When sacrifice was offered at a sanctuary, however, the priests of that sanctuary were involved in it already in the premonarchic period (1 Sam. 2.12–17), and their sacrificial prerogatives increased during the monarchic period. In Deuteronomy 33.10, bringing *incense and burnt offerings before God is mentioned among the activities characteristic of priests, but it is in last place. In Ezekiel's prescriptions for priests as they are to function after the *exile (Ezek. 44.15–31), their sacrificial activity is in first place (44.15–16), and in Jeremiah 33.18, within a postexilic addition to the book, priests are characterized entirely in terms of sacrificial work. This extension of the sacrificial role of priests can be correlated with an extension of the high degree of *holiness proper to the interior of the sanctuary, the place where God's presence was focused, to the open-air altar in the courtyard in front of the sanctuary. The prerogatives of priests to perform all acts inside the house of God was extended to include any act entailing contact with the altar of sacrifice in the courtyard outside. In all of this the fundamental principle remained that the highest degree of holiness among human beings was that of priests, and that only they could rightly enter the spaces whose degree of spatial holiness was the highest.

Priests and the Divine Will. In early texts a priest is characterized not as a person engaged in sacrifice but as one who carries the oracular ephod (1 Sam. 22.18) containing the Urim and Thummim, which were manipulated in order to provide an expression of God's mind or will in answer to a question put to him. In the oldest part of the blessing of Moses for *Levi, the Urim and Thummim are still characteristic of a priest (Deut. 33.8), but in 33.10, generally taken as part of a later expansion of the blessing for Levi added toward the middle of the monarchic period, God's ordinances and God's law (Hebr. tôrâ) are the primary objects of priestly responsibility, mentioned before incense and burnt offering. The word tôrâ may originally have been the word designating the divine response, communicated through a priest with his Urim and Thummim, to a question put to him; the Akkadian word têrtu, akin to Hebrew tôrâ, signified the response procured in certain types of Mesopotamian divination. If so, Israelite tôrâ evolved from a simple manifestation of God's will in the form of an answer "Yes" or "No" (through the Urim and Thummim) into a more complex pronouncement expressing the divine will in cultic matters based on such questions as the distinction of the holy from the profane, the pure from the impure (see the tôrâ described in Hag. 2.10–14), and in ethical matters too, because of the divine requirement of right behavior on the part of persons approaching what is holy, or, more profoundly, persons divinely expected to be holy (Ps. 15.2, 5; Lev. 19.2). By the end of the monarchic period the meaning of tôrâ had been extended to include all divinely sanctioned law, of the types codified in the *Pentateuch, and it was then as typically associated with a priest as the word of God was with a *prophet (Jer. 18.18). In this expanded sense of "law," sacred because it was an expression of the divine will, tôrâ, something in which priests had always been the rightful experts, became something in which they were competent for deciding questions and settling disputes. Ultimately they became responsible not only for upholding all divine law but also for all casuistry and jurisprudence based on it (Lev. 10.10–11; Deut. 17.8–13; 21.5; Ezek. 44.24). This is not to say that priests became teachers or preachers, unless by that, one has in mind their communicating law and legal decisions to the people. In the postexilic centuries priestly involvement with law weakened in the general consciousness, and priests increasingly came to be associated with sacrifice. The traditional idea of priests as persons making statutes and legal judgments known to the people (i.e., as persons with judiciary duties) was alive in the second century BCE (Sir. 45.14–17), but as jurists learned in the law they were by then being supplanted by the *scribes (Sir. 39.1–11). Membership of priests in commissions having judicial duties as well as administrative ones in the Roman period may have been due in large part to their social and political connections. (See Law; Torah.)

Historical Evolution of Priesthood. The historical roots of early Israelite priesthood probably lie, culturally, in the cultic systems of the Canaanites and other Northwest Semitic peoples, whose usual word for priest is essentially the same as the Hebrew word. Israelite settlements in Palestine had their Yahwist sanctuaries, and throughout the land there continued to be a multitude of such sanctuaries, each with one or more priests, until the ultimate suppression of all but the *Temple in *Jerusalem in the reign of *Josiah left Jerusalem the only place where anyone could actually function as a priest (2 Kings 23.5, 8–9, 15–20). In the period of the judges and in the early monarchic period one could be a priest without being a member of the tribe of Levi (Judg. 17.5; 1 Sam. 7.1; 2 Sam. 8.18; 20.26; 1 Kings 12.31), and yet a *Levite was particularly desirable as a priest (Judg. 17–18). If the unnamed ancestor of Eli in 1 Sam. 2.27–28 is Levi, as the context strongly suggests, then the priests of the sanctuary of the *ark at Shiloh were Levites. Of the personal origins of *Zadok, the founding head of the priesthood of Jerusalem (1 Kings 2.35; 4.2), nothing at all is said in the narratives in which he appears, or in any preexilic text. In some scholarly hypotheses concerning his undocumented origins he is held to have been a Levite, in others not.

By the time of Josiah's abolition of all sanctuaries except that of Jerusalem three centuries later, there was no longer any question of anyone's functioning as a priest unless he was a Levite, and the Levitical quality of the Jerusalemite "sons of Zadok" seems at that time not to have been called into question. Later still, when all priests were considered "sons of *Aaron," the postexilic Chronicler arranged things by presenting Zadok as an aide to an Aaronite commander in David's time (1 Chron. 12.27–29), and by giving Zadok himself an Aaronite genealogy (1 Chron. 24.1–6); the purpose of this is clearly that of giving the priests of Jerusalem Aaronite legitimacy, and its historicity is dubious. In any case, while any Levite, according to Deuteronomy, might in principle function as a priest if he were admitted to do so at the sole remaining sanctuary, in Ezekiel 40–48 only members of traditionally priestly families of Jerusalem (the "sons of Zadok") are admitted to the exclusively priestly service of the altar; all other Levites are relegated to a lower status with functions of Temple service that, except in 40.45, were not reckoned as priestly. The distinction between priests and subordinated Levites was firmly established in the postexilic restoration, but the fact that in *P the priests are not called sons of the clearly Jerusalemite Zadok but "sons of Aaron" may indicate that some members of Levitical families not originally of Jerusalem, but of other cities in the south, were admitted to priestly service together with the "sons of Zadok" after the exile, as they had perhaps been admitted before the exile, before or after Josiah's reform. All of the cities assigned to the sons of Aaron in the final form of the lists of Levitical cities (Josh. 21.9–19; 1 Chron. 6.54–60) are indeed in the south.

In the actual division of duties between priests and Levites prescribed by P, the priests did everything that entailed contact with the altars and with the offerings after they had contracted holiness (Lev. 1–7; 10.16–20; 16; 17). They were responsible for rites of purification, because of the sacrifices and sacrificial blood involved (Lev. 11–16; Num. 19). In the Persian, Hellenistic, and Roman periods each priest did his Temple service as a member of one of twenty-four divisions (1 Chron. 24.7–19), each division functioning only during a short period of the year (see Luke 1.5, 8). When leadership in matters of piety passed largely to the *Pharisees around the second century BCE, priests retained respected and in many cases high social status. Some ordinary priests, in order to make ends meet, engaged in secular occupations, and many lived outside Jerusalem.

The High Priest. Priesthood in Jerusalem in the days of the monarchy had been hierarchically structured, under a head, usually called simply "the priest" (1 Kings 4.2; 2 Kings 11.9–11; 12.8; 16.10–12; 22.12, 14; Isa. 8.2), or, if he needed to be distinguished from the "second priest," he might be called the "chief priest" (2 Kings 25.18). The head of the priesthood of Jerusalem had always held a high place in the kingdom's administrative circles, but after the exile the high priest quickly became the head of the Jewish nation, both civilly and religiously. The presence of a Jewish civil administrator appointed by the Persian imperial government at certain times (ca. 520 BCE, and during the last half of the fifth century) did little to alter the high priest's position as far as the nation itself was concerned. Although Hasmonean rulers of the second and first centuries BCE assumed the title "king," they retained the high priesthood and its title, which was more important within the Jewish community itself. From this time on, the high priests and those close to them, rather worldly in their interests, were of the aristocratic party of the *Sadducees. With *Herod the Great (37–4 BCE) ruling power in Judah passed completely out of priestly families, life tenure in high priesthood was abolished, and each appointment to the office of high priest was thereafter made by the Herodian ruler or, between 6–41 CE, by the Roman procurator. In the New Testament the plural "the high priests" refers to high priestly families as a group, or at times (e.g., Acts 9.14) to the *Sanhedrin or some other group possessing official jurisdiction under the leadership or presidency of the high priest.

In the distribution of ritual responsibilities codified in P, on the basis of degrees of holiness, only the high priest, whose degree of holiness as a person was supreme, could enter the holy of holies, the innermost part of the Temple building and the place whose degree of spatial holiness was the highest, for the rites to be performed there on the annual *Day of Atonement (Lev. 16.2–3, 15, 32–34; see Sir. 50.5–21; Heb. 9.6–7).

AELRED CODY, O.S.B.

Prince of the Power of the Air. Found only in Ephesians 2.2 (NRSV: "ruler of . . ."), this phrase reflects the common belief in the hierarchical organization of *angels and *demons. In the first century CE, "prince" generally refers to a political power, whether human or spirit. "Air" represents the region between earth and heaven, which is the traditional sphere of demonic activity. In this case, "power" refers to the realm within which power is exercised. Hence, the prince of the power of the air is the spiritual ruler over this hierarchical realm of demons, to which those who are not in Christ are also subject.

PATRICK A. TILLER

Printing and Publishing. This entry consists of five articles:

The Printed Bible
Production and Manufacturing
Economics
Royal Printers' Patent
Red Letter Bible

The first article surveys the history of the printed Bible. The second and third articles describe the modern processes of production and manufacturing and their cost. The remaining articles deal with particular aspects of the history and composition of printed Bibles. The reproduction of the Bible prior to the invention of printing is treated in Books and Bookmaking in Antiquity and Manuscripts. For further discussion of the history of printing and the design of printed Bibles, see Chapter and Verse Divisions; Children's Bibles; Curious Bibles; Family Bible; Gutenberg, Johann Gensfleisch zum; Illustrated Bibles; Italics; Polyglot Bibles; and Scofield Reference Bibles.

The Printed Bible

The Significance of Printing. The process of printing from movable types was developed in Mainz in the 1450s by a partnership that included Johannes *Gutenberg. Among the first printed books were the forty-two-line Latin Bible (folio, ?Mainz, ?1455) called the "Gutenberg" or "Mazarin," and the thirty-six-line Bible that may have followed it (folio, ?Mainz or Bamberg, ?1457–1461). Both books are in "gothic" or blackletter types, in two columns, in a single size of type; they are simplifications of contemporary manuscript formats, in that they leave headings and initials for the rubricator to fill in by hand. Printing was at first seen as a means of speedy duplication, making relative cheapness possible. Later, it was understood that printing theoretically permitted a series of editions in which each copy could be identical and each edition could improve upon the previous one; but this ideal could not be fully realized until the nineteenth century. Early printers were under severe constraints: none had enough type to set up a whole Bible, so they followed a rhythm of setting and printing one "sheet" of four or eight pages, dispersing the type, and setting the next sheet. Correction took place as the sheets were printed, so that variant states of each sheet were mixed in infinite permutations through the whole edition. In keeping with the same rhythm, early edition sizes were small—normally between 250 and 1500 copies, rarely as large as 3000 or 4000. A new biblical text (e.g., Erasmus's or Luther's) was disseminated in a rapid succession of small reprints, many of which were unauthorized, since copyright protection was rudimentary; as a result, the text was quickly corrupted. While translators were alive, they could supervise corrected editions; after their death, safeguarding the text of its version of the scriptures gradually became a concern for each church. In such supervision the Vatican (from 1590) and the Lutheran church (from 1580) were pioneers.

The Fifteenth Century. As printing spread, the international trade for the leading houses was in the *Vulgate, the Bible of the European church in the language of the educated, therefore an obvious best-seller. By the end of the century, over a hundred editions had been printed, in Germany, Switzerland, Venice, and France. Unwieldy formats and the drastically simple design originally imposed by a single size of type and primitive skills gave way to smaller formats (e.g., Froben's first octavo of 1491) and a more complex international page-layout based on the traditional manuscript two-column format, using two or three sizes of type, with marginal notes and ample prefatory matter (the plenus apparatus). Books were entirely reproduced from type, so the rubricator was dispensed with. For a national sale, vernacular texts were also printed: between 1466 and 1522, fourteen High German and four Low German editions, some with illustrations; Italian Bibles in Mallermi's Version from 1471; the French Bible Historiée from the early 1470s (complete in 1478); a Catalan version in 1478; portions of a Dutch Bible in 1477; Czech Bibles in 1488 and 1499. These versions all used a national variant of black-letter, considered appropriate to the use of the vernacular; roman type was still associated with classical learning and Latin eloquence, but was also used for Italian Bibles. Printing did not reach England until 1476; since Wycliffe, English translations had been discouraged, so readers in England (essentially scholars) could use only the Vulgate, in imported copies. (See also Translations.)

Hebrew printing began in Italy before 1475; a Psalter was printed at Bologna in 1477, and a Pentateuch in 1482. The Soncino press in 1488 printed the whole Hebrew Bible with vowel points and accents. Greek-Latin psalters were printed in Milan in 1481 and by Aldus at Venice before 1498.

The Sixteenth Century. Renaissance scholarship and Reformation translation coincided with the great age of scholar-printers. The new movements meant that the Bible, always a steady seller, became available in its new versions in unprecedented numbers, since it was now a burning political-religious issue as well as an article of mass consumption. By the end of the century, literate laypeople of Reformed churches of Calvinist tendency would expect to possess a personal copy of the scriptures in English, French, or Italian: usually a handy octavo in roman type, in double-column for compactness, with numbered verses for easy reference, with Calvinist marginal notes, "arguments" to each book, maps, diagrams, and indexes; usually with a metrical psalter bound in, and often a form of common prayer and a catechism. In territories of Lutheran tendency—the North German territories and North America—the old black-letter continued to be used for several centuries, and the Bibles were never so portable or so adapted to study.

At the beginning of the sixteenth century, the black-letter Vulgate was the staple of a popular trade dominated by Parisian printers. Scholarship and reform came mostly from elsewhere, but one Parisian (later Genevan) stands out as the greatest of all Bible printers, Robert Stephanus (Estienne). It was he who took the standard small Vulgate and first printed it in roman type (octavo, 1534); he took the device of verse numbering first used in a whole Bible by Pagnini in 1528, and applied it to the French text of Olivetan in 1553 and to the Vulgate in 1555 (see Chapter and Verse Divisions). His layout for small Bibles, in some ways traditional, was above all economical. Because he moved to Geneva in 1550 as the result of opposition from the Faculty of Paris, he transferred to Calvinist printing a repertory of skills and, basically, the fundamental design of most cheap Bibles in roman type up to recent times. Before he left Paris he had also printed in 1528, 1532, and 1540 a series of noble folio Vulgates that are among the most beautiful and original ever printed, as well as important contributions to the Latin text.

In Basel in 1516, Froben printed Erasmus's Greek-Latin New Testament using roman for the Latin and Greek types for the first complete Greek New Testament. Aldus printed a complete Greek Bible in Venice in 1518/19 using the Septuagint and Erasmus's New Testament. Printed before Erasmus but issued later, the Complutensian *Polyglot (Alcalá, 6 volumes, 1514–17, issued 1522) uses Hebrew, Greek, black-letter, and roman types in an exceedingly complicated layout—the greatest achievement of printing thus far. It was not matched until 1569–72, by Plantin's Royal Polyglot, which uses two sizes of italic and roman, three sizes of Hebrew, and Greek, all with decorated initials, in a demonstration of the repertory of Europe's (by then) leading printer.

Luther's September and December Testaments (Wittenberg, 1522) were in a distinctively large format, in single-column black-letter with a characteristic arrangement of elements, including illustrations, which were at once imitated by followers and opponents. Whereas perhaps eight to ten thousand copies of the old German text had been printed since 1466, and sold at high prices, Luther's official printers at Wittenberg produced a hundred large editions of his complete Bible between 1534 and 1620—perhaps two hundred thousand copies. Another three hundred editions came from other towns. Such an output required capital; a partnership of booksellers bought the "privilege" (the sole right to sell in a defined area) and administered it until 1626.

Similar problems later affected the English Bible. Tyndale's first English New Testaments (Worms, 1526; Antwerp, 1534) would have struck the contemporary observer as obviously Lutheran because of their typography. By the time Coverdale's Bible was printed (Cologne, 1535), Luther had completed his translation, and his printers, faced with a whole Bible, were forced into a two-column design that looked archaic; Coverdale's followed this pattern, as did "Matthew" in 1537, the first Bible printed in England. The subsequent "Great" and "Bishops' " Bibles were also large double-column folios in black-letter, reflecting the desire of the authorities to provide only a lectern-sized format, for reading in church. Meanwhile, in France, Stephanus's design in roman type was developed further, and in 1559 Barbier printed in Geneva a French octavo that gives the whole Genevan apparatus, to be repeated in countless editions—Latin, French, Spanish, Italian, and especially English. When Rowland Hall printed his English Geneva Bible (quarto, Geneva, 1560), it reproduced this pattern, and rivaled official English Bibles both with a more radical text and apparatus and also an intrinsically portable, more usable commodity: a layperson's Bible for private reading and devotion, visibly more modern than the competition. The handiness of the format contributed to the popularity of the version, which went on being printed until the 1640s. The King James Version of 1611 was originally a large folio in black-letter on the antique pattern; its commercial success was in doubt until smaller formats in roman type eliminated the disadvantage.

The Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries. After the great period of the sixteenth century, Bible printing dwindled into a national concern, though for a while Antwerp remained what Geneva had been—an exporter of Bibles in several languages, including the English Geneva Version. The Protestant countries now supplied themselves with their authorized version in the vernacular; in Catholic countries, the vernacular was not encouraged, and the Vulgate had been overproduced in the previous era. There are few monuments of printing skill: the London Polyglot of Roycroft (folio, 1655–7, 6 volumes) adds Arabic and Samaritan to Hebrew, Greek, and their Latin versions, and is more impressive editorially than typographically. In England, the success of the 1611 version meant that money was to be made by supplying it, and the peculiar conditions governing Bible printing led to combinations and lawsuits (see the article in this entry on Royal Printers' Patent). European wars, especially in Germany, led to economic decline, which affected standards of materials and workmanship. The major economic constraint, that even if printers had had enough type to set a whole Bible, they could not afford to keep the text, once set, for more than one impression, was met head-on by the philanthropist Karl Hildebrand Baron von Canstein, who founded the Cansteinsche Bibelanstalt at Halle in 1710. This was a prototype Bible Society, designed to supply very cheap Bibles at no profit or even at a loss (see Bible Societies). The types of the New Testament of 1712 and the Bible of 1715 were kept standing, so that subsequent impressions could be corrected. The type was replaced when it wore out, usually after some thirty impressions. By 1803 the society had circulated three million copies of the scriptures, mostly in German. A Canstein Bible was the copy text for the Bible printed by Christoph Saur at Germantown, Pennsylvania, in 1743 in twelve hundred copies—the second American Bible (the first being John Eliot's Algonquin text, printed at Cambridge, Massachusetts, in 1663).

The rise of the missionary movement, especially of the British and Foreign Bible Society (1804) and its daughter societies, meant that for a century or more England became the major manufacturer of Bibles, for a market once again conceived as European-wide, and then worldwide. Effective and economical production on that scale was the consequence of technological development. (See the article in this entry on Economics.)

The Nineteenth Century. For four hundred years, printing had changed very little, remaining a handcraft, and permitting limited economies of scale. Mechanization produced a dramatic increase of production and so remarkable cheapness for the first time, just when missionary activity and the spread of literacy opened a vast market. The invention of stereotyping, first applied to the Bible at Cambridge in 1805–6 in time to supply the British and Foreign Bible Society (BFBS), meant that type need no longer be kept standing: the whole surface of the page of type was molded, and a cast made from the mold. Later, electrotyping gave the cast plate a very hard surface, so that hundreds of thousands of copies could be printed before there were signs of wear.

Presses began to be made of iron before 1800, giving greater pressure over a wider area and more precision of register. But the revolutionary printing machine of König and Bauer and the application of steam power meant that from 1814 it was possible to print over a thousand copies an hour. By 1849 major Bible printers had converted to steam-driven machinery. Paper had been machine-produced since 1815, and by the 1860s wood pulp and esparto-grass had replaced linen rag as the basis of paper. Composition of type was not mechanized until the end of the century and was not universal until this century; but since a single setting could now produce millions of copies, composition had become a minor factor. By the 1860s the Oxford University Press, the world's major manufacturer, regularly produced over a million Bibles a year, of which at least half went to the BFBS. Because of the scale of production, unit costs were minimal, and the strange monopoly situation in England was countered by the charitable activity of the BFBS and competition between the privileged presses.

Modern Times. The late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries saw the ultimate development of Gutenberg's process, by which individually cast metal types were set up together to make a page, inked, and impressed onto paper. Molding the surface of the type, wrapping the paper around a reciprocating cylinder, or even running it in a continuous sheet from a roll, were just some of the developments within the process that increased speed and cheapness; mechanical composition and binding changed no basic principle. Since 1945, printing has been revolutionized, abandoning "hot metal" in favor of computerized photocomposition, so that in place of metal type photographic images of letter shapes are used. Reproduction is effected by lithography, which uses chemical reactions to transfer an ink image from a flat surface. Printing takes place on large "web-fed" machines that print both sides of the paper at great speed, many pages at a time, so that whole "book blocks"—the printed and stacked pages—are delivered, folded, and ready for simple "casing" in an uninterrupted process. The data bank in the computer memory and associated programming facilities mean that a text of almost infinite length and complexity can be stored and printed out at will in any format that the program permits. In principle, stability of the text is guaranteed, or rather a correction facility promotes constant improvement. The Bible has ceased to be what it once was, a mountain that few printers could climb. It is now merely a long text with a number of special features. The rapid succession of popular modern versions (especially in the United States) is easily permitted, and the systematic development of a classic or authorized version is greatly facilitated. (See the article in this entry on Production and Manufacturing.)

Aesthetics. The great age of Bible printing was the sixteenth century. Froben, Stephanus, De Tournes, Oporinus, Froschauer, Plantin—the scholar-printers—produced typographical treatments of marked originality and beauty. Greatest of them all was Stephanus, whose Latin folio Bibles of 1532 and 1540 are the most original. Paradoxically, his introduction of verse-numbers and roman type fixed Bible design in the classic Genevan format for centuries. Many verses are short and would not fill a whole line in a single-column format. Over the course of an entire Bible, this would waste much space, so for economic reasons double-column became the rule. Bibles therefore looked "like Bibles" from the late sixteenth century to the middle of the twentieth. Distinguished printers like Baskerville (Cambridge, folio, 1763) could use their own type, refine the conventions, and insist on good paper, ink, and presswork, but could not break the classic mold. During the nineteenth century the *Family Bible—that mark of respectability—often incorporated engraved illustrations and encyclopedic notes; and the elaborate bindings broke away from the standard black cloth of the early publisher's bindings. The Arts and Crafts movement of the 1890s first went back behind the sixteenth century to revive the type-designs of early printing and broke away from "Bible" typefaces. The Doves Press Bible (1903) used a mixture of old scribal and early humanist conventions to produce an eclectic result—handsome but not readable. Bruce Roger's folio lectern Bible (Oxford, 1935) modifies the classic design by using Stephanus's headings, and is worthy to stand alongside its original.

New versions in the twentieth century proclaim their newness by modifying, even rejecting, the old typography. The Library Edition of the New English Bible achieved an elegant page in a modest format. But it is the lectern bible that offers the possibility of magnificence or monumentality, and since Rogers no printer has challenged the sixteenth century.

M. H. BLACK

Production and Manufacturing

The production and manufacturing of a Bible, though in outline the same as that of any other book, is affected by its length (as much as five times longer than an average novel) and by the extra use it must withstand. These factors have their effect throughout the entire process.

A Bible's production may be conveniently divided into five parts: setting the type; manufacturing the paper; printing the pages; manufacturing the binding materials; and binding the pages into a single volume.

Setting the Type. The text of a full Bible can contain over eight hundred thousand words (for the Hebrew Bible and the New Testament), and close to one million words (if the *Apocrypha are added). In addition are nearly twelve hundred chapter numbers and over thirty-one thousand verse numbers; in editions including the Apocrypha, there are almost two thousand chapters and close to forty thousand verses.

With punctuation included, any typesetting of a Bible translation requires millions of separate keyboard entries, all of which must be checked carefully. For this reason, among others, nearly all Bible translations are now prepared in electronic form. These electronic databases include not only the letters and chapter and verse numbers, but coding to specify capitalization and other special type elements. Once a database is in final form, a given version with a specific type design can be produced relatively quickly, by specifying all of the different elements and giving the instructions to the computer typesetting machine. The machine imposes the design elements on the database, sets the type to the specified width of the type column (breaking words at the ends of lines as necessary to fit), and then produces typeset pages. The typesetting for a full Bible can now be done in a few hours.

Once this typesetting is finished, a high-contrast printout of the pages is produced on glossy paper. This reproduction proof, or "repro," is photographed and the film is laid out in "forms" of 32-, 48-, 64-, or 128-page units. From these forms the printing plates are manufactured.

Paper Manufacture. Because Bibles are so long, the paper used for them must be thin; but because Bibles must be able to withstand repeated use, it must be strong as well. Modern paper manufacturing has developed a sheet that is very thin, highly opaque, and strong. The paper begins as a wet pulp mixture that is poured over a moving fine wire mesh, which allows the water to run through but retains the pulp. After most of the water has been shaken free, the matted pulp is fed into a series of heated rollers that dry out the remaining water and smooth the surface of the paper. The paper is produced in a continuous roll and the rolls are shipped to the printing plant.

Printing. Most Bibles today are printed in 64-page or 128-page forms, to produce "signatures" of 64 pages. A 64-page signature consists of a large sheet of paper that is printed on both sides and is then folded in half, then in half again, five times in all. This results in a packet of paper that, when fastened through the middle and trimmed around the edges, will become one 64-page section of the finished Bible.

Most full Bibles are longer than one thousand pages, and many of the Bibles with study apparatus included can be longer than two thousand pages. Each Bible, therefore, will contain from 16 to over 30 separate 64-page signatures. These are printed one at a time, usually on a web offset machine, which receives the paper in a continuous roll at one end, prints it on both sides simultaneously, cuts it into individual sheets, and folds it into signatures.

After all the signatures have been printed (for a large printing of a lengthy Bible this can take over a week), they are "gathered," that is, collated in order on a gathering machine. All the gathered signatures for one book are called the "book block." Once the signatures have been gathered, the manufacturing process differs, depending on the kind of binding that will ultimately be done.

Binding Materials. There are three basic types of bindings: paperback, hardcover, and leather. Paperback covers are made of thick, coated paper. Hardcovers are made of "boards" (cardboard), either two or three pieces, that are covered with cloth or textured paper. Leather covers are made of a single piece of leather or leatherlike material. The leather is either the whole skin of an animal (genuine leather), leather fibers held together with a polymer bonding (bonded leather), or plastic textured to look like leather (imitation leather). The leather cover is stamped or cut (clicked) out of a larger piece, the edges are trimmed to allow them to be turned over at the corners, and the title and other designs are stamped (and sometimes outlined with metallic foil) onto the finished cover. At this point the covers are ready to be joined to the finished book blocks in the binding process.

Binding. In paperback and some hardcover Bible bindings, the book block itself is held together with glue. This is done in one of two ways: either the inner edges of the pages are trimmed and glue is applied to that edge ("perfect binding"), or notches are cut in the inner edge and glue is applied to that edge and forced into the notches ("burst binding"). The outer pages of the book block are then glued to the case of a hardcover book; the spine of the paper cover is glued to the spine of the book block.

In other hardcover bindings, and in most leather bindings, the signatures are "sewn"; that is, the pages are held together by thread that is passed through the central fold, and the book block itself is attached to a backing. The book block is then "smashed" (compressed to drive out the air between the pages), "trimmed," and "round cornered." The edges are sanded and burnished, and metallic foil is bonded to the edges by heat. The back of the book block is then "rounded," or curved outward by the application of pressure to the page edges. The book block itself is then attached to the board or leather cover by gluing the endpapers to it. Leatherbound books may be bound in two ways: either "glued-off," as just described, or "lined-to-the-edge." Lined-to-the-edge bindings are different in two respects. The cover is lined by turning the outer edges of the cover material over the lining, with a flap of the lining left at the inner edge, front and back. The flap is glued between a second piece of lining and the white endsheet attached to the book block. Then a hollow tube is glued to the spine of the book block on one side and to the cover on the other, which provides strength and flexibility to the binding. This is the most sturdy kind of binding, since the book block is attached to the leather cover over its entire surface, including the spine.

Books may be reinforced in several ways. Hardcovers and leatherbound books have a piece of woven material called "crash" glued to the spine, with flaps on either edge that are glued between the endpaper and the board. Leatherbound books may have the first and last signatures "whipstitched": that is, the signature is stitched along the inner edge, to provide reinforcement at the hinges of the book, which receive the most wear and tear. This stitching is visible in the finished product. Some binders, instead of whipstitching, use eight pages of heavy white endsheet (instead of four pages). A piece of cambric may also be wrapped around the endpapers and first signature.

The entire process, from the beginning of composition to the delivery of finished leatherbound books, can take over a year.

DONALD KRAUS AND LYNN STANLEY

Economics

Bibles have always been an expensive commodity. As early as 1641 a London bookseller, Michael Sparke, wrote a tract entitled "Scintilla" in which he maintained that the high cost of Bibles was due to monopolies among Bible publishers (see the article in this entry on Royal Printers' Patent). Some of the factors contributing to the costs over three hundred years ago continue to operate today, making the world's most popular book also one of the most difficult and costly to produce.

Bible production presents the manufacturer with some of the most exacting and unusual challenges in the book industry. It also requires of the editorial staff rigorous quality standards that are time-consuming and costly. The following analysis of the specialized process of creating printed Bibles will indicate why the costs remain high.

The Editorial Process. Translating. The largest expense can be the work of translating the text. If it is to be highly accurate, this may take from several years to several decades and consume millions of dollars, though an individual occasionally may pursue this task as a hobby and a "labor of love." (Translators have frequently volunteered their time and expertise, for example with the KJV, RSV, and NRSV.)

Typesetting. Computers and databases for typesetting the Bible have certainly reduced the very great amount of time ordinarily needed for composing the Bible text. Typesetting the text in various styles of type and in different sizes of page now requires hours rather than months or years. What once was costly because of the labor involved is now costly in technical equipment.

Only a few typesetting companies in the world can meet the high-volume, high-quality demands of Bible composition at a reasonable price. Composing a basic text Bible is in itself a technically exacting task. Even more difficult is the process of composing a complex study-Bible. Combining footnotes, commentary, and a reference system with the text while keeping all pertinent information together on the same page requires either a labor-intensive manual process or a highly sophisticated computerized system. Either way, the expense is high.

Proofreading. Accuracy can be accomplished only through proofreading. The use of a master database for computer typesetting has made the tedious process of word-for-word proofreading optional, yet nothing has been found as reliable as the human eye and mind for guaranteeing an accurate text. Because of the quantity of information contained in a Bible and the accuracy demanded and expected in such a book, the proofreading process takes hundreds of hours and costs thousands of dollars.

Development of new materials. Basic text Bibles will always be popular, but the most popular and bestselling editions contain some or all of the following: reference system, concordance, commentary, maps, charts, articles, dictionary, and pictures. The cost of creating, writing, and editing new materials can range from a few hundred to hundreds of thousands of dollars.

The editorial cost of Bible creation is substantial. In general, however, it is a one-time, fixed-cost investment that may be spread over several printings, several years, or even several products. The editorial expense represents, however, only the first half of the Bible publishing sequence. Once the contents of the book have been determined, the actual books must then be created.

The Production Process. The following costs vary from year to year, and are affected by inflation, labor disputes, and quality requirements. The percentage that each step in the process adds to the total cost of a Bible varies in accord with the style of binding. Each step will be described separately.

Paper. Paper that is strong, thin, lightweight, and opaque is difficult and expensive to make. The high cost of such lightweight paper, coupled with the high page count of Bibles, makes paper one of the largest factors of cost in Bible manufacturing.

Printing. High-speed, high-quality web presses designed to handle lightweight paper are available at only a few specialized printing houses. Printing on lightweight paper is an exacting science and art requiring skilled press operators and finely tuned machines. Such factors mean that the cost of printing a Bible exceeds by a large percentage the usual cost of printing an ordinary book.

Cover Style	Paper	Printing	Binding	Packaging
softcover	55%	20%	20%	5%
hardcover	50%	15%	30%	5%
bonded leather	20%	10%	60%	10%
top grain leather	15%	5%	75%	5%

Binding. Binding involves both the cover-material used for a Bible and the actual process of putting the book blocks and covers together. Some Bibles have inexpensive paper covers, others cloth or Kivar covers. The deluxe, expensive editions are bound in imitation leather or in real leather, drastically increasing the sales price. Although modern technology has to some extent replaced the skilled artisans who bound Bibles in the past, the cost of creating a beautifully bound leather Bible is still high.

Packaging. Almost every Bible must be wrapped, boxed, slipcased, banded, or jacketed. These packaging items must not only be designed and printed, but some, such as a box, also must be assembled. Each of these items adds to the cost of a Bible.

The chart above indicates how the percentages of cost shift according to the nature and style of the cover. BRUCE E. RYSKAMP AND STAFF

Royal Printers' Patent

In England, the printing of the Authorized or King James Version of the Bible (KJV) and the Book of Common Prayer (BCP) of 1662 is the monopoly of the Royal Printer, by virtue of a patent first granted to Christopher Barker in 1577. Only the University Presses of Cambridge and Oxford are permitted by royal charter to override this monopoly; one other publisher, originally Scottish, is an accepted interloper.

Originally the office of Royal Printer, instituted in Henry VII's reign, brought with it only the right to print statutes, proclamations, injunctions, and Acts of Parliament. The first officially sanctioned Bibles in English had the normal "privilege," granted to whomever was the printer—the original form of copyright, which protected the printer of a single title from competition, usually in a specific territory, and for a specific term. Since the Great Bible and later the Bishops' Bible were "appointed to be read in the churches," and the Geneva Bible, though officially disapproved, was very popular (see Translations, article on English Language), printing them became an attractive commercial enterprise; and the right to print them in various formats was shared in the 1560s and 1570s by important members of the Stationers' Company, the guild that regulated the English book trade. But during the reign of Elizabeth I, trading monopolies in various commodities were granted or sold by the Crown to deserving or rich individuals, and certain whole categories of books became the exclusive monopolies of individual printers. In 1577, Christopher Barker became Royal Printer, and the terms of his patent gave him the right to print all Bibles and Testaments whatsoever, and the BCP. This patent, renewed, was left to heirs, so it fell to Barker's son to finance the collation, revision, and printing of the KJV in 1609–11.

So sweeping a monopoly was contested by other printers, deprived of the market for the best-selling printed book. The weakness of the royal printers' position was that the capital required to exercise their right was very large; so they were often forced to take partners, or even to lease to the company itself, which ran a cooperative part-charitable venture called the English Stock, later the Bible Stock, which among other titles printed Bibles, by agreement (usually) with the monopolists.

By its royal charter of 1534, the University of Cambridge had acquired the perpetual right to appoint three printers, who could print "all manner of books." The right preexisted Barker's patent, and was taken to cover Bibles, so Cambridge printed a Geneva Bible in 1591 and its first KJV in 1629. Oxford acquired a similar charter in 1636, and in the 1670s printed Bibles. During a large part of the seventeenth century, there were disputes and lawsuits between Royal Printers and Stationers about the patent but the two contestants tended to combine against the interloping universities. All the rights of all the parties were more than once pronounced valid by the courts, and accommodations followed; by the end of the century, the two universities were at times either compensated for not exercising their right, or the right was leased and farmed by the richer London printers who had control of the market. The supreme monopolist of the time was John Baskett, who bought a share of the royal printer's patent in 1710, leased the Oxford Privilege in 1711, and bought a third-share of the similar Scottish royal printer's patent. The Baskett family remained printers until 1769, when they were bought out by Eyre and Strahan, the forebears of the later patent-holders Eyre and Spottiswoode. After the mid eighteenth century, the position stabilized: the Stationers' Company ceased to trade; the monopoly was accepted, as was the overriding right of the universities. In Scotland, the royal printer's patent lapsed in 1839, and the right to print Bibles was subject to license by a supervising body. Scottish Bibles were not allowed south of the border until 1858, when William Collins set up an office in London and sold his product. Until then, the only permitted infringements of the monopoly were commentaries on the Bible that included the text, and the *polyglots of Bagster. In particular, the British and Foreign *Bible Society had had to buy its supplies from the privileged presses—though it also offered serious competition by selling at subsidized prices.

The monopoly had always been resented. It was investigated by a Parliamentary Committee in 1859–60, when the expected criticisms of principle were made. But the system was found to work well; supplies were ample, and Collins's intervention had forced prices down further. The patent was renewed in 1860, and is not now subject to review. The terms of the original patent were tested in 1961 when the New English Bible (NEB) was published by Cambridge and Oxford, who had previously financed and published the Revised Version without the opposition or participation of the royal printer. The Queen's Printer now attempted to include the NEB within the scope of the old monopoly by printing an unauthorized Gospel of John. The universities brought action for breach of copyright, and won their case. The old monopoly is now limited to the KJV and the BCP (1662) and is sometimes defended on the twin grounds that the first is perpetual Crown Copyright and the second, its use in England being required by Act of Parliament, is indeed an Act of State. The two university presses showed that the right could be operated for the public good, since for centuries Bible printing helped to provide them, as charities, with funds to finance learned publications: moreover they had, since the eighteenth century, in their own recensions of the KJV text provided standard editions of the national classic, the Bible of 1611. Stability of the text was not required or secured by the monopoly itself. With the demise of Eyre and Spottiswoode in 1990, the patent passed to Cambridge.

See also article on The Printed Bible in this entry. M. H. BLACK

Red Letter Bible

A Bible or New Testament with all the words spoken by *Jesus printed in red. This practice has been traced to the journalist Louis Klopsch, publisher of The Christian Herald in the late nineteenth century. Klopsch was inspired by the words of Jesus in Luke 22.20: "This cup that is poured out for you is the new testament in my blood." Luxurious Bible manuscripts of the Middle Ages would use specially colored inks to mark chapter headings or prominent words; Codex 16 used crimson, blue, and black inks for the words of different characters. Some Red Letter Bibles print only the words of the earthly Jesus in red, leaving the words of Jesus as heard in visions (as in the books of Acts and Revelation) in black ink. Others use red ink for those sayings of God or angels in the Old Testament that have been interpreted by Christian theology as inspired by the preexistent Christ. A modern effort to determine the authentic words of Jesus on historical-critical grounds (the Jesus Seminar) has led to the production of new Red Letter Gospel editions, beginning with Robert W. Funk, The Gospel of Mark: Red Letter Edition (1991).

PHILIP SELLEW

Promised Land. When God called *Abraham, one of the things promised was land (Gen. 12.1–2). Though the passage perhaps dates from the tenth century BCE, the promised territory specified in Genesis 15.18 is the land of *Canaan from the *river of Egypt to the *Euphrates River (cf. Deut. 11.24); other boundaries given for the land are more modest. Genesis also records that the promise was subsequently reaffirmed to Abraham's descendants: *Isaac (Gen. 26.3), *Jacob (Gen. 28.4, 13; 35.11–12), *Joseph (Gen. 48.4), and Jacob's other sons (Gen. 50.24).

In biblical narrative, the promise was also renewed in the time of *Moses (Exod. 6.5–8). According to Leviticus 25.23, however, the land belonged to God; the Israelites were merely tenants. Deuteronomy represents the land as a gift (Deut. 5.31; 9.6; 11.17; 6.10–11) and describes it in somewhat hyperbolic terms (8.7–9), but continuance on the land was conditional upon obedience to the law. Both Leviticus and Deuteronomy offer the threat of *exile and scattering among the nations if the Israelites break the law (Lev. 26.21, 32–33; Deut. 28.63–64) as well as the hope of restoration to the land should they subsequently repent (Lev. 26.42; Deut. 30.1–16). The *Pentateuch thus contains different attitudes toward the land, reflecting the historical contexts of its authors, attitudes modeled in part at least on such ancient Near Eastern practices as royal grants of land as rewards to individual subjects.

*Joshua began the *conquest of Canaan. While some passages indicate complete victory in his time (Josh. 10.40; 11.16–17; 21.43–44) followed by "rest from war" (Josh. 11.23), others make it clear that it was not that quick. When Joshua was an old man, there was still much territory left to seize (Josh. 13.1; Judg. 1.21–36). It was actually *David who completed the conquest in the tenth century BCE (2 Sam. 8).

In about 921 BCE, the nation of Israel split into two kingdoms: *Israel in the north and *Judah in the south. Because of sin, prophets arose to warn the people of judgment. Amos addressed the northerners, threatening them with exile (Amos 5.27; 7.17). Israel, the northern kingdom, fell to *Assyria in 721 BCE. Many were taken away to other parts of the Assyrian empire. Jeremiah, in the last days of the kingdom of Judah, predicted exile (Jer. 25.11–12). Judah fell to Babylon in 587 BCE, with the result that many of the leaders were exiled to *Babylon. The book of Kings was written in the sixth century BCE to explain the two catastrophes: both kingdoms fell because of idolatry (2 Kgs. 17; 2 Kgs. 21.1–16). Although the prophets pronounced the judgment of land loss, they also looked beyond the disasters to future times of healing and restoration (Amos 9.14–15; Jer. 16.15 = 23.7–8; 24.6; 29.10; 32.41; Ezek. 20.41–42; 34.11–17; 36.24; 37.12–14, 21–22).

During the exile, the Jews longed to return to their land but they learned to maintain their identity without it. While they could not offer animal *sacrifice, since that could only be done in *Jerusalem, they could preserve their distinctive religion through *prayer, *Sabbath keeping, *circumcision, and observing dietary laws.

In 538 BCE, King *Cyrus of Persia, having conquered Babylon a year earlier, allowed the Jews to return and rebuild their *Temple in Jerusalem (Ezra 1.1–4; 6.3–5), yet not all the Jews returned. Some became established in Babylon, giving rise to a community that thrived there for centuries. Those in the *Dispersion contributed money to support the Temple. Land and sacrifice, now restored, were elevated in importance again, but Israelite religion was not exclusively tied to the land.

In 70 CE, the Temple was destroyed again, this time by the Romans, and the Jews were once more dispersed abroad. They survived this tragedy by maintaining their traditions wherever they went. It would be wrong to say that Judaism is indifferent to the land, however, for the devout Jew prays daily that Jerusalem will be rebuilt speedily, and part of the *Passover celebration includes the hope that next year the feast will be eaten in Jerusalem.

In the late nineteenth century, Zionism developed. Largely a secular movement, its goal of the establishment of a homeland for the Jewish people was not primarily to fulfill biblical prophecy but to have a country where Jews could live in security, safe from persecution.

In the New Testament, there is little emphasis on geography, but the imagery of the promised land is symbolically used in the letter to the Hebrews. Abraham is a paradigm for Christians: just as he left his home country by faith, seeking a new one, so Christians should seek the heavenly country or city that God is preparing for them (Heb. 11.8–16).

Hebrews also alludes to the *wilderness wandering and the conquest. A whole generation was denied entrance into the land because of rebellion, disobedience, and unbelief (Heb. 3.7–19). The admonition, then, is not to be apostate like them. Hebrews also suggests that Joshua did not really give the people rest (Heb. 4.8–9); rather, God offers rest to those who are obedient and faithful. The author then encourages his audience to enter that rest, which refers not to conquering land and enjoying the ensuing peace, as it did earlier (Josh. 11.23), but rather to trusting in God's works and ceasing from one's own (Heb. 4.9–10).

Nationhood and land are not always spiritualized in the New Testament. Though Paul viewed those Jews who did not embrace Jesus as *Messiah to be outside of God's favor (Rom. 9–11), he looked forward to a day when the Jewish people as a nation would turn back to God and be forgiven (Rom. 11.26). Jesus also affirmed that the *meek would inherit the earth (Matt. 5.5; Ps. 37.11). The book of Revelation tells of a thousand-year period when martyrs of the church would rule with Jesus (Rev. 20). It also predicts the creation of a new heaven and a new earth (Rev. 21.1–4).

Despite this spiritualization of the concept of the promised land, Christians too have on occasion seen themselves as "heirs according to the promise" (Gal. 3.29) in a territorial sense. Both the Boers of South Africa and the Puritan colonizers of New England saw themselves as a new Israel, led by God to a new Canaan, a "providence plantation."

See also Inheritance.

WILLIAM B. NELSON, JR.

Prophets. This entry consists of two articles, the first on prophets in Ancient Israel, and the second on the phenomenon of prophecy in Early Christianity. For further discussion of this topic, see Social Sciences and the Bible, and for discussion of individual prophets, see the entries under their names or the books that bear their names.

Ancient Israel

No comprehensive definition of an Israelite prophet is possible. The persons conventionally included in this category appear to have manifested great diversity of character and function. They are referred to by a number of terms that in some texts are used interchangeably, and some of these shed some light on their functions: "seer" implies a recipient of visions, and "man of God" suggests some kind of close relationship with the deity. But the most common designation; nābî', usually translated as "prophet," is of uncertain derivation. The prophets of the eighth century BCE seem to have avoided terminological classification altogether.

In general, it may be said that prophets were men or women believed to be recipients through audition, vision, or dream of divine messages that they passed on to others by means of speech or symbolic action. The persons they addressed might be individuals, particular groups of Israelites, the whole nation, or foreign nations. The prophets, then, were divine messengers, as is indicated by the formula, "Thus Yahweh has said," which precedes many of their utterances. Frequently, these messages were unsolicited and were delivered under divine compulsion, though on some occasions a prophet was consulted by persons who inquired whether there was a message from God for them. Several of the prophetic books contain "call narratives" in which the prophets express their conviction that they have received a particular summons to prophesy (Isa. 6; Jer. 1; Ezek. 1.1–3.15; Amos 7.15). Several prophets, notably Jeremiah, recorded their reluctance and even strong resistance to this divine constraint. These call narratives, however, belong to a literary genre (see also Exod. 3.1–12; Judg. 6.11–17), and may not be simply (auto)biographical.

Prophetic activity was not confined to Israel, nor were all prophets prophets of Yahweh. Although the term nābî' is not found elsewhere in the ancient Near East, activities comparable with those of the Israelite prophets are attested among other Semitic peoples, notably at *Mari in the eighteenth century BCE. In Israel an early reference to prophets (1 Sam. 10.5–11) is found in a narrative that associates their activity with the founding of the Israelite kingdom by *Saul. For the next four centuries, both in northern Israel and in Judah, prophets are mainly found in close connection with the kings and with political events generally.

It is not possible to give a systematic account of this early prophecy—or indeed of much of the prophetic activity in the ensuing period—because the information available is so diverse. One can only note certain rather disparate scraps of information. There was the solitary prophet, liable to appear suddenly to confront the king (1 Kings 18; 21.17–24), in contrast with the groups known as the "sons of the prophets" (NRSV: "company of prophets") who lived in isolated communities under a leader (2 Kings 4.38–41; 6.1–7; see also Amos 7.14); these are in turn to be differentiated from groups of prophets maintained at the royal court (1 Kings 22). Other individuals appear to have been local seers or prophets (the explanatory note in 1 Sam. 9.9 does not throw much light on the distinction) who might be consulted in cases of lost property but might also serve in some local cultic capacity (1 Sam. 9). While in some cases prophetic activity took the form of apparently insane behavior attributed to seizure by the spirit of God (1 Sam. 10.10–13) and prophets could simply be dismissed as "mad" (2 Kings 9.11), others acted as military advisers to the king (1 Kings 22; 2 Kings 3) or confronted kings with their moral or religious misdeeds (1 Kings 18; 21), condemning them in God's name; in some cases, they were even capable of fomenting a coup d'état, deposing one king and choosing and consecrating another (2 Kings 9). As miracle workers, they might make an ax head float (2 Kings 6.6) but might also call down fire from heaven (1 Kings 18.36–39; 2 Kings 1.10) or raise a dead person to life (1 Kings 17.17–24; 2 Kings 4).

Such examples of contrasting behavior and activity could be multiplied from the evidence of the books of *Samuel and *Kings and, to some extent, from the prophetic books. These stories, which represent popular views of prophets, are to a large extent legendary in character; but they show clearly that Israelite prophecy was a many-sided phenomenon. Apart from some accounts of rather trivial miracle-working, however, they have one common characteristic: they represent the true prophet as the agent and defender of Yahweh in opposition both to religious apostasy and syncretism and to the authority of kings when these failed to uphold the cause of Yahweh or flouted his moral demands. This is especially true of the ninth-century prophets *Elijah and *Elisha.

The prophets of the eighth and seventh centuries BCE stood for the same principles as their predecessors. For this period, however, our sources of information are mainly of a different kind. The prophetic books (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the books of the twelve "minor" prophets) contain far fewer stories about prophets, and consist mainly of what purport to be records of words spoken by the prophets whose names they bear. The *word of God received and transmitted by the prophet now assumes primary importance. It is, however, no easy matter to identify these words and to distinguish them from other material. In their present form, the prophetic books have all become repositories of other and later material, both prophetic and nonprophetic. This additional matter has its own importance and should not be regarded as in any way inferior to the words of the original prophet; but its presence makes it difficult to form a correct notion of his message.

The extent to which the prophecy of the eighth century BCE marks a decisive change in the character of Israelite prophecy is disputed. Two features, however, call for notice: first, the eighth- and seventh-century prophets addressed themselves not only to kings and other individuals and particular groups but also to the whole people; second, they were, as far as our information enables us to judge, the first to prophesy the destruction of the entire nation as a punishment for its sins. This prophecy of national disaster, sometimes presented as avoidable through *repentance but sometimes not, was the main feature of the message of the prophets of the eighth century BCE (Hosea, Amos, Isaiah, and Micah) and also of Jeremiah and Ezekiel in the late seventh/early sixth. The latter, however, who survived the destruction of Judah and Jerusalem in 587/586 BCE, also offered hope for the future beyond the disaster. The prophets of the *exile and the postexilic period were chiefly concerned with the hope of a restoration of the nation's fortunes and with current problems of the postexilic community.

The prophets were not primarily theologians; but some of them, in their attempt to present their message coherently and persuasively, achieved profound insights into divine and human natures and the relationship between God and his people Israel. (The theological teachings of the individual prophets are described in more detail in the articles on each prophet.)

The prophets whose words have been preserved were only a small and probably unrepresentative minority. Other prophets are frequently mentioned by them, usually unfavorably. It is clear that, especially in the time of Jeremiah, there were two groups of prophets opposed to one another. Jeremiah regarded his opponents, who offered the people a comforting message of national security based on the belief that God would protect them irrespective of their conduct, as false or lying prophets (Jer. 14.13–16). Passages such as this reflect the problem faced by the people when two groups of prophets, each claiming to speak in Yahweh's name, proclaimed diametrically opposite messages. Attempts were made to establish criteria for identifying the genuine prophet (e.g., Jer. 28.8–9; Deut. 13.1–5; 18.15–22), but these were unable to resolve the problem.

Prophets who delivered unpalatable messages not only encountered difficulties in gaining acceptance as authentic messengers of Yahweh but were liable to suffer humiliation (Amos 7.10–13) and even threats to their lives (Jer. 26; 36–40). Yet insofar as they were believed to have an intimate relationship with God they were feared. Even kings were unable to ignore them. On the other hand, it is unlikely that prophets generally enjoyed an official status in either the religious or the political establishment. Recently, attempts have been made to define their role in sociological terms (see Social Sciences and the Bible). Whatever results may eventually emerge from this kind of study, it can be safely asserted that the prophets about whom we have any detailed information came from a wide variety of social backgrounds, and functioned in a variety of ways.

R. N. WHYBRAY

Early Christianity

Prophecy in the New Testament is the reception and subsequent communication of spontaneous and divinely given revelations; normally, those who were designated "prophets" in early Christianity were specialists in mediating divine *revelation rather than those who prophesied occasionally or only once. The exhortation to desire earnestly to prophesy (1 Cor. 14.1) may be best explained as a call to all those who regarded themselves as gifted with inspired utterance (the "spiritual" ones of 14.37) to aspire to prophesy rather than to speak in tongues: none are excluded a priori from the gift, but God will not in fact distribute any one gift to all. From what we can deduce about them from *Acts and the Letters, as well as from the book of *Revelation (a document that self-consciously presents itself as Christian prophecy in written form), prophets might conduct their ministry in one congregation or throughout a region (Acts 15.22, 32), singly or more often in groups (Acts 11.27; 13.1; 21.10–11 cf. Rev. 22.9). In the lists of ministries (1 Cor. 12.28–30; Eph. 4.11) they are mentioned next after *apostles; they are associated with teachers in the church at Antioch (Acts 13.1).

In the context of the church meeting (1 Cor. 14.26–33) the ministry of the prophet is spoken of as "revelation," and such an utterance is associated with the Spirit of God (cf. 1 Thess. 5.19). This prophetic speech is not the same as speaking in tongues (see 1 Cor. 14.22–25, 27–29), nor is it the interpretation of tongues (see Glossolalia); it is some perception of the truth of God intelligibly communicated to the congregation. In Paul's view, it is an abuse of prophecy to pretend to an ecstatic frenzy so that prophets become, so to speak, out of hand; he insists that "the spirits of prophets are subject to the prophets" (1 Cor. 14.32), that is to say, each is in full possession of his or her faculties and is able to restrain the impulse to speak if the interests of order so require.

Most important, prophets were not to be given undiscerning credence. The utterances required "testing" or "evaluation" by other prophets (1 Cor. 14.29); only then were they to be received as the word of the Lord. This testing is not only to distinguish the Spirit's word from the speaker's natural impulses, but also to identify and exclude false prophecy. The most important criterion put forward by Paul for the evaluation of prophetic speech (or indeed for viewpoints expressed through a variety of oral and written forms of communication) was the content of the message, which should agree with the generally accepted beliefs and customs of the Christian community (Rom. 12.6; 1 Cor. 12.3).

The gift of prophecy gradually fell into disuse and, in spite of occasional revivals, into a measure of disrepute because of the continuing presence of false prophecy and the difficulties or uncertainties involved in discerning it. Other factors contributing to the decline of prophecy were the increasing authority of an official ministry in a church becoming more institutionalized, and the tendency to rely more on rational and didactic forms of spiritual utterance; the latter led to the place of prophets being taken by teachers, catechists, scholars, and theologians, whose authority depended not on any revelation directly received but on the exposition of an existing authoritative tradition, especially the Bible. DAVID HILL

Proselyte. An essentially religious term used to describe a convert from one form of belief to another. It is more appropriate to use the term only for the period when the Jews were a religious community rather than an independent nation-state, that is to say, from the postexilic period onward. The *Septuagint, the Greek translation of the Hebrew Bible, rendered the Hebrew word gēr, which means "sojourner" or "resident alien" (see Alien), as prosēlytos; in later Hebrew gēr came to have a religious rather than an ethnic meaning.

The word "proselyte" is found four times in the New Testament (Matt. 23.15; Acts 2.10; 6.5; 13.43; the first and last references are translated "convert" in the NRSV). The reference in Matthew makes it clear that some Jewish groups regarded missionary work as an important part of their practice, and the presence of proselytes at the Feast of Weeks (*Pentecost) in Jerusalem (Acts 2) implies the success of such efforts. One of the basic requirements laid upon potential converts will have been *circumcision, and some groups in the Hellenistic world condemned this as a form of mutilation incompatible with the ideal of bodily perfection. Nevertheless, the rite was almost certainly required as a means of entry to the covenant community. From roughly the first century CE (and possibly earlier) a form of water ceremony ("proselyte baptism") was also required. Our earliest descriptions of this come from rabbinic sources, though it is possible that *John the Baptist's practice was a related rite (see Baptism).

The references in Matthew and Acts support the likely hypothesis that the great majority of proselytes will have come from the *Diaspora, attracted by the lifestyle of Jewish communities in different parts of the Greek and later Roman world. *Synagogues, which first developed in the diaspora, will have been the natural context for the beginning of an acquaintance with Judaism.

It has often been argued that alongside proselytes there existed a further group of sympathetic gentiles known as "God-fearers," who were attracted to Judaism but reluctant to be circumcised. It would probably be wrong, however, to see in this a technical term; "those who feared God" is simply a way of describing those pious people who were attracted to Judaism and subsequently to Christianity (see Acts 10.2, 22; 13.16, 26).

What kind of reception might proselytes expect among those already Jews? Rabbinic texts show that they were often regarded with suspicion, as is commonly the case with converts in many religions. It is in this light that varying traditions in the Hebrew Bible relating to converts can best be understood: the story of *Ruth, whatever its original point, clearly illustrates an open attitude to those who came to Judaism in adult life, whereas the concerns in the books of *Ezra and *Nehemiah for the dangers of mixed marriage (at least insofar as it involved non-Jewish women) show a more restrictive attitude.

See also Conversion. RICHARD COGGINS

Prostitution. The granting of sexual access for payment is disparaged in the Bible and is associated linguistically with a variety of forms of sexual immorality. A metaphorical use of language related to prostitution dominates much of the Hebrew Bible, following *Hosea, who characterizes Israel's relations with foreign gods and nations as the actions of a promiscuous bride or a prostitute seeking lovers (Hos. 1.2; 2.2–13; cf. Lev. 20.5; Judg. 2.17; Jer. 3.1). This polemical usage often makes it impossible to determine the exact nature of the practices designated as "harlotry."

In its primary form, prostitution is an institution of patriarchal society that permits males to enjoy sexual relations outside of marriage while preserving exclusive right of access to their spouses. Hence the prostitute is normally female, and male (homosexual) prostitution is weakly, and differently, attested. While the prostitute was tolerated, she always bore a degree of opprobrium (Gen. 34.31; 1 Kings 22.38), even when praised for noble character or action (*Rahab, Josh. 2.1–21; cf. 1 Kings 3.16–26). Men are warned against the wiles and waste of prostitutes (Prov. 29.3; 7.10; 23.27; cf. Luke 15.30), and wages from prostitution are prohibited as payment of vows (Deut. 23.18). Priests were forbidden to marry a prostitute (Lev. 21.7) or to force a daughter into prostitution (Lev. 19.29).

The Hebrew term for prostitute, zônâ (a feminine participle with no masculine counterpart), is derived from the verb zānâ, which describes promiscuous sexual activity in general and more specifically *fornication by an unmarried female, a crime punishable by death (Gen. 38.24; Deut. 22.20–21; Lev. 21.9). What is tolerated for prostitutes, as a class set apart, is strictly proscribed for other *women.

It is widely assumed that some form of "sacred" or "cultic prostitution" characterized Canaanite religion; however, the language of prostitution is never used to describe cultic offices or activity in ancient Near Eastern texts outside the Bible's polemical usage. The Hebrew term sometimes rendered "sacred prostitute," qĕdēšâ (f.)/ qādēš (m.), simply means "consecrated (person)" (cf. qādôš, "holy"). Association with prostitution, or sexual activity of any sort, is inferred from biblical contexts and has no parallel in extrabiblical texts.

New Testament texts group prostitutes (pornē, f.) with tax collectors as representing the lowest class in moral terms (Matt. 21.31–32; cf. Luke 15.30). The masculine form of the noun (pornos, meaning male prostitute in classical Greek) is used in the New Testament only in the general sense of "fornicator" or "one who practices sexual immorality" (Eph. 5.5; 1 Tim. 1.10; Rev. 21.8) and may be extended to describe immorality in general (Heb. 12.16). A similar sense is conveyed by the verb porneuō and the abstract noun porneia ("fornication"), which is frequent in *ethical lists (Mark 7.21; Gal. 5.19; cf. 1 Cor. 5.9, 11) and is often associated with gentile cults and culture. The book of *Revelation continues the figurative usage of the Hebrew Bible in characterizing *Babylon as the "great whore" and its offenses as "fornication" (Rev. 17.1; 18.3; cf. Isa. 1.21).

See also Sex.

PHYLLIS A. BIRD

Proverbs, The Book of. A teaching compendium for postexilic Judaism, Proverbs is traditionally placed among the "Writings" and considered part of the *wisdom literature. It consists in part of short sayings expressing in pithy form insights into human affairs, especially of a social and religious nature. The Hebrew word (māšāl) translated "proverb" can mean comparison, and many of the proverbs contain a metaphor or simile. The dates of the material within the book range over a wide period of time; while the final edition was made after the exile, probably in the fifth century BCE, much of the actual contents is earlier and some of it is even premonarchic. The oral origins are often obvious.

Most scholars recognize five separate collections in the book. The first collection (1.1–9.18), labeled "Proverbs of Solomon," is really instruction genre, a series of essays on the nature of wisdom, the meaning of life, and the path to success. *Solomon's legendary wisdom (see 1 Kings 3; 4.29–34) resulted in a number of later works being attributed to his authorship; but there is little reason to doubt the essential accuracy of the tradition (see 1 Kings 4.32–33) that he did compose proverbs, just as his father *David composed songs. This collection, however, is probably the work of the final editors who placed it at the beginning of their compilation as a statement of intent, and so it probably dates to the fifth century BCE. It presents the ideal of a fully integrated human being, one who is liberally educated and morally stable. Perhaps written for a generation that had become estranged from its cultural and religious roots, it sets out to inculcate human and religious values. To do so it presents wisdom under two guises: parental instruction (aimed at reason) and a personalized *Wisdom who appeals directly in her own name (aimed at the emotions). The key to a fruitful integration of the secular and the religious is "fear of the Lord," a sense of the divine that permeates every aspect of life and impregnates the secular. These nine chapters, more theological than the rest, present a highly sophisticated worldview with a high regard for human capacity to achieve fulfillment.

The second collection (10.1–22.16), also attributed to Solomon, is simpler in style than the first and is probably preexilic. It is a gathering of heterogeneous, semi-independent proverbs, maxims, and precepts—really a literature of the schools dealing mainly with moral life and virtue. It suggests how best to live in the world. More secular than chaps. 1–9, it inculcates control of the tongue, social awareness, and respect for the mystery of existence. In the efforts to master life one must recognize that there are limits not just of volition but to human knowledge, which is finite (16.1, 9; 19.14, 21; 21.30). Justice seems to be inspired by a concern for equity rather than religion.

The third collection (22.17–24.22), entitled "the words of the wise," is a compilation of thirty instructions probably modeled on an Egyptian source, the Instruction of Amen-em-ope, probably to be dated ca. 1000 BCE. Although it has the appearance of a textbook, it warms to an intimate, parental style and may date to the same period as the editorial project itself. After a brief introduction (22.17–21) comes a series of warnings, counsels, and appeals to the reader's moral sense. Integration of the secular and religious, which was evident in chaps. 1–9, appears again. Good graces, culture, and social bearing are not alien to holiness. "Fear of the Lord" is part of education (23.12–18).

The fourth collection (24.23–34), much shorter than, although similar to, the third, bears the title "these also are sayings of the wise"; it represents an addition to the previous collection and may be by the same editor. Certainly the tone remains consistent. Social awareness is its topic. It presents the practical aspects of justice in a legal maxim (24.23b–29) and appends a portrait of one who neglects his social duties (24.30–34).

The fifth collection (25.1–29.27) has a clear attribution: "proverbs of Solomon that the officials of King Hezekiah of Judah copied," which places the collection, if not the composition, of these proverbs in the late eighth or early seventh century BCE. It represents what might be called an editorial program, sophisticated and quite unified. Again there is a concern to integrate secular and religious wisdom. It deals with the structure of society—government administration (25.1–7a), social responsibility (27.11–14), and human conduct (28.1–22). To a greater extent than usual God is invoked as arbiter of morality, and the traditional concept of retribution loses its overtly dogmatic tone: the human act itself has its own repercussions.

Four appendices (30.1–31.31) close the book. Although containing older elements, these appear to be a later redactional effort, perhaps intended as a general conclusion. The first (30.1–9) is an essay on skepticism; the second (30.10–33) deals with the mysterious dimensions of life, the inexplicable and therefore the fascinating; the third (31.1–9) is a "manual for rulers" personalized by being put in the form of a *queen mother's teaching—moral rather than administrative; and the final appendix (31.10–31) is a carefully drawn portrait of the ideal woman, which leaves us with the question, "Have we arrived at the practical expression of 'Lady Wisdom' presented in chaps. 1–9?"

The book is an ambitious undertaking, offering the reader "wisdom" and opening up to the willing student a world of learning. It shows how to cope with life by organizing the range of human experience so as to evolve practical rules of comportment and to develop balanced judgment, as the editorial introduction makes clear (1.2–7). On this basis of personal and inherited experience and by means of different kinds of literature—sentence, instruction, maxim, proverb—it shows "what really works" and how to achieve success in the business of living a full life. Thus, it is didactic literature in the truest sense of the term. It represents a sage, parent, or teacher, who, out of her or his treasury of experience and knowledge of the mysteries of life, speaks to a pupil in the name of natural or social values and good sense. A frequent formula is "Hear, my child" (1.8; 2.1; 3.1, 11, 21; 4.1, 10; etc.), an indication that the teaching is seldom directly imperative; the hearer reacts on the basis of personal judgment and a personal assessment of the situation. The aim is to urge the individual to think realistically about life; it does so by making the learner personally face up to the problems that besiege humanity: ignorance and poverty (9.7–12; 22.7–8), right and wrong (16.10–15), the need to adapt oneself to life in society (22.1–4), and finally, although somewhat indirectly, the need to accommodate to a mysterious divinity (16.1–19). Sometimes, indeed, contradictory proverbs are placed side by side (26.4–5) so as to provoke thought: which applies in my situation? The different kinds of literature found here share common aims: the desire to impart knowledge (1.2–7) and to form character (1.8–19), to encourage a learner to achieve maturity. Since the pupil's experience may often differ from that of the parent or teacher, it is essential to learn how to think for oneself to survive. This is suggestive, for the verbal root from which the word "proverb" derives (māšal) has the significance of "dominating something." These proverbs are frequently artistic, and humor is not absent (25.11; 23.29–35), but the ultimate function of wisdom, and the dominant intention of the editors, was the mastery of the human environment by the acquisition of a personal standard of values and an effective "know-how," both of which could be derived from an appreciation of cosmic order and design.

What at first sight appears to be a collection of heterogeneous instructions, proverbs, and wise sayings in fact enjoys a certain coherence, imposed, it is true, by editorial intention, to which is due the powerful educational impact the book made on later generations. As it now stands, it represents a many-faceted ideal of religious humanism, in which many disparate kinds of teaching contribute to one purpose—the formation of a whole person by leading a student on paths of uprightness, intelligence, and conviction to human fulfillment. DERMOT COX, O.F.M.

Psalms, The Book of.

Introduction. The book of Psalms derives its name from the ancient Greek translation, psalmoi, which designates instrumental music and, by extension, the words that accompany the music. In Hebrew it is known as "the book of praises." One hundred and fifty psalms were numbered consecutively in the Hebrew tradition. The same number is found in the Greek and Latin versions, though there is a variation of usually one digit within Psalms 10–147 (e.g., Ps. 72 is 71 in the Greek). One of the *Dead Sea Scrolls and many Greek manuscripts have other psalms as well, especially Psalm 151, which is recognized as canonical by some Orthodox churches. By the Hellenistic period, the psalms were provided with superscriptions indicating authorship ("by" or possibly "concerning" David), musical annotations (e.g., "with stringed instruments"), and even the setting (e.g., Ps. 51, after David's sin with Bathsheba). Titles exist for 116 psalms, but the information contained in most of them is no longer understood (e.g., Ps. 69, "according to Lilies"). Nothing much can be said about the psalms as musical compositions. There are many references to musical accompaniment, and one may infer that the words were sung, but nothing is known about melody or orchestration. (See Music and Musical Instruments.)

There is evidence of a complicated history behind the present form of the psalter. It seems to be divided into five "books" by the insertion of doxologies: 41.13; 72.18–19; 89.52; 106.48; 150.6 (or perhaps all of Ps. 150). Behind this stand earlier collections: Psalms of David (73 in all), of Asaph (Pss. 73–83), of the Korahites (Pss. 42; 44–49; 84; 85; 87; 88), and so on. The fact that the generic name for God, Hebrew ʾĕlōhîm, outnumbers the sacred name (yhwh, probably pronounced Yahweh; see Tetragrammaton) by about four to one in Psalms 42–83 suggests a separate collection of psalms; hence, this section has been called the "Elohistic psalter." Another sign of earlier compilation is the presence of duplicate psalms (14=53; 40.13–20=70).

Modern English translations are irregular in verse references. Some follow the Hebrew numbering, while others, such as the New Revised Standard Version (NRSV), follow the tradition of the Authorized Version, which does not count the title as a verse. Hence, there is often a difference of one digit or more between the Hebrew and English references to the verse numbers (thus, NRSV 51.1 = Hebr. 51.3). In this article, the NRSV numbering is followed.

More significant are the differences in rendering that can be found in all translations. At many points, the traditional *Masoretic text of the Psalms is corrupt and in need of emendation. Such correction is based on the usual sources, especially the ancient *translations. But these are not always trustworthy; the rendering of the tenses in the *Septuagint is particularly misleading. In order to restore the supposedly original form of the text, scholars also have recourse to the resources of related Semitic languages, especially for the meanings of words. In modern times, the discovery of *Ugaritic language and literature has provided a window on the Hebrew text that has led to improved translation.

Literary Types. Modern scholarship is skeptical about two aspects of the traditional titles: authorship (hence dating) and setting. There is no hard evidence for Davidic authorship of any of the psalms. *David's reputation as a musician (1 Sam. 16.23; Amos 6.5) makes it reasonable to associate him with the psalms, but it is not possible to prove authorship. As regards the setting, modern scholarship is much more modest in its claims. The ancients were overspecific. Rather, one can only describe the setting in a very generic way: a lament of an individual or community, a song of praise in the *Temple, and so on. In other words, literary classification has replaced the historicizing tendency that the titles display.

Hermann Gunkel (1862–1932) originated the modern literary analysis of the psalter. His conclusions have been modified somewhat by subsequent scholars, but his classification of the psalms remains basic. Many psalms resist easy classification, but the following description is helpful.

Hymns. The hymn, or song of praise, begins on a joyful note in which the psalmist summons self (Pss. 103–104) or a community (Ps. 117) to praise the Lord. Usually two reasons are given, and they constitute the heart of the prayer: God's creative activity and saving intervention is Israel's history. The pattern is: "praise the Lord, because. . . ." As far as *creation is concerned, one must be ready for the skilled and imaginative portrayal of the divine creativity, recorded throughout the Bible. One thinks of the majestic description of the effortless activity in Genesis 1, a creation by word, but there is also the picture of the divine potter in Genesis 2.7. Another mode of representation was the battle with chaos, personified in the redoubtable *Leviathan (Pss. 74.14; 104.26; cf. Isa. 27.1; Job 3.8; 41.1–34), or *Rahab (Ps. 89.9–10; Job 9.13; 26.12–13), or characterized simply as "Sea" (probably to be understood against the background of Baal's conflict with Yamm ["Sea"] in Ugaritic literature; cf. Ps. 74.13). Attention is not limited to the action of God at the beginning; creation is also continuous (Ps. 104). The Israelites obviously were able to relish and savor the creative activity of God.

Another reason for solemn praise is the divine intervention in history on behalf of Israel, especially the *Exodus (Pss. 78; 114; cf. Exod. 15.1–18). This sacred history could also be commemorated in such a way as to teach Israel a lesson (Ps. 78) or to move the people to penitence (Ps. 106). This "history" was not antiquarianism. It was re-presented in the liturgy and re-created in the hearts of the people, for whom it also guaranteed a future.

The structure of the song of praise is simple: after the initial invocation, certain themes are developed as the reason for praising the Lord. The psalm often ends on the general note of praise. But certain hymns have received special classification due to their content.

The first of these are the "Songs of Zion" (Pss. 46; 48; 84; 87; 122). They are clearly hymns, but the praise is centered on *Jerusalem. They do not view Jerusalem apart from the Lord; the Holy City is preeminently the divine dwelling place among the people, where the divine "name" (Deut. 12.11) or presence is to be found. A frequent theme is the invincibility of *Zion (Pss. 46; 48). This attitude can turn out to be a trap for those who place a false confidence in the "city of God" (cf. Jer. 7.1–15; 24.1–10). But Israel saw truly that her greatness was connected with the Lord's presence.

The second type deals with the enthronement of the Lord: "the Lord is king" (or, "has become king"). These psalms (most clearly, 47; 93; 95–99) celebrate the Lord as king, and have as themes the divine creative power as well as the divine domination of history. The kingship of the Lord is not conceived as a recent claim; it is rooted in the past and is re-presented in the liturgical celebration itself.

Thanksgiving psalms. Gunkel regarded these as the prayers offered up after deliverance from distress—a counterpart to the laments (see next paragraph): e.g., Psalms 18; 30; 40; 66; 116; 118; cf. Jonah 2.2–9. They begin like a song of praise and then quickly acknowledge that the Lord is the rescuer. This confession is sometimes expanded into a witness directed to bystanders (see Ps. 30.4–5), who may share in the thanksgiving *sacrifice offered by the psalmist. At times there is a flashback, as the psalmist recounts the difficult period before deliverance (Ps. 116.10–11). Psalm 100 is entitled a song for thanksgiving, and vv. 4–5 (cf. Jer. 33.11) are found in variant form in Psalms 106.1; 107.1; 118.1; and 136.1.

Laments. The psalms of lament can be considered from an individual or from a collective point of view. Most of them are psalms of individual lament, and indeed this literary type is the most frequent in the psalter (some forty psalms, e.g., 22; 42–43; 69). The prayer usually begins with a cry for help to the Lord ("my God"), followed by a description of the distress of the psalmist. This can be manifold: sin (Ps. 51), sickness and death (Pss. 6; 38), false accusation (Ps. 7), and especially persecution by enemies (Pss. 38.12–20; 41.5–11). It is paradoxical but true that in most cases one cannot pinpoint the precise reason for the complaint. This is because the imagery is so extravagant; Psalm 22, for example, mentions "bulls of Bashan," dogs, the sword, the lion, and wild oxen. But this can be an advantage for modern readers, who can interpret the vivid language of the psalmist in the light of their own distress. What at first sight seems to be a disadvantage turns out to be profitable, provided the modern reader develops an appreciation for the symbolic language (the *abyss, Sheol, the pit, the "waves" and "billows" of the Lord, etc.). Biblical writers are fond of extremes. *Death is not a static mystery at the end of one's days; death is parallel to Sheol, the place of the dead (see Hell), and both are visualized as a power that affects a human being in this life. To the extent that a person experiences nonlife (suffering, etc.)—to that extent one is in Sheol. Hence, the psalmist can express joy over deliverance by saying "You brought me up from Sheol" (Ps. 30.3). There has not been a resuscitation or resurrection; the psalmist has been delivered from the nonlife of suffering and distress.

The grim portrayal of personal agony in the individual lament is lightened by frequent cries for help, and especially by motifs of why the Lord should intervene. Appeals are made to the divine "steadfast love" (Hebr. hesed), which binds together the Lord and the covenanted Israelite. The psalmist even alleges personal integrity and loyalty (Pss. 17; 26) and also trust (Pss. 13.5; 25.1) as motives to induce the Lord to act.

In almost all the individual laments (Ps. 88 is a significant exception) a centainty is expressed that the Lord has heard the prayer, but the explanation for the change in mood is not obvious. Is it due to the psychological strength of the psalmist's trust? Or could it be that there are two moments here: the before and the after of deliverance, which have been joined together? A promising solution, which has gathered wide support, is to recognize here the liturgical background of the prayer. When one uttered a lament in the Temple, it was followed by an oracle of *salvation from one of the Temple personnel, and then the response to this was the proclamation of certainty. There are some hints of oracular assurance in several psalms (12.5; 35.3; 85.8; 91.14–16), but the lament has not retained the oracle as part of its structure.

Gunkel regarded the motif of trust, so frequent in the individual laments, as the seed of another type of psalm, the psalms of confidence (e.g., 4; 11; 16; 23; 62; 131). The motif of trust becomes the heart of the prayer.

National laments would have been characteristic of special days of crisis, such as a drought or military defeat (cf. Joel 1.13–14; 2 Chron. 20.3–12). The community would be summoned to the rites celebrated in the Temple for a day of national *mourning. There is no fixed structure, but most of the elements that appear in an individual lament are present here: a cry for help, the challenge of "why?", a description of the distress, and often a vow to praise the Lord (perhaps akin to the motif of certainty). Among these psalms can be included 44, 74, and 79.

Royal psalms. This classification derives from content, not from literary factors. Indeed, many settings and moods are reflected in them: a royal coronation or anniversary (Pss. 2; 72; perhaps 110); a royal thanksgiving (Ps. 18; cf. Ps. 144); prayers before (Ps. 20) and after (Ps. 21) military operations; a royal wedding (Ps. 45), a "mirror of princes" (Ps. 101). In the course of time such psalms would have become "democratized." Although originally featuring the monarch as the main figure, they came to be applied to and used by the average person (e.g., Pss. 28; 61; 63).

Why were the distinctly royal psalms preserved after the fall of Jerusalem in 587/586 BCE? Monarchy disappeared until the short-lived triumphs of Simon Maccabee and the Hasmonean rulers (142–63 BCE). The most reasonable answer is that the royal psalms were reinterpreted, always bearing in mind the promise of 2 Samuel 7 (cf. Pss. 89; 132). The temporary awakening of messianism in the time of *Zerubbabel (Hag. 2.2–9, 20–23; Zech. 3.8; 4.8–11; 6.11–12), if it met the aspirations of the people, did not receive the approval of the *Persian authorities.

The royal psalms are not predictive; in their literal historical meaning they refer to the currently reigning king. Nonetheless, they were perceived as open-ended in Jewish and Christian tradition, and from that point of view can be considered as messianic in the future sense of that word (see Messiah).

Wisdom psalms. Not all would agree that this classification is proper, and there is a wide variation in determining which of the psalms might come under this rubric. The criteria for the classification remain somewhat vague: typical wisdom language (such as "teach" and "fear of the Lord"); *acrostic patterns (e.g., Pss. 34; 37); the contrast between the just and the wicked (Ps. 1); the problem of retribution (Pss. 37; 73); a meditative style (Ps. 90). If the literary genre remains difficult to pin down, perhaps it is better to speak of wisdom influence on such psalms as 1; 32; 34; 37; 49; 73. (See also Wisdom Literature)

Liturgies. In a broad sense, most of the psalms can be considered liturgical, but certain poems capture the spirit of a liturgy more obviously, particularly those in which oracles, questions, and litany response are featured. A liturgical format (question and answer) is conspicuous in the gate or entrance liturgies of Psalms 14 and 23 (cf. Isa. 33.14–16; Mic. 6.8). Prophetic oracles appear in Psalms 50; 75; 85. Psalm 136 is virtually a litany, with the repetition of the enduring "steadfast love" in each verse.

Recent Developments. Since the pioneering work of Gunkel, certain refinements in literary classification have been proposed. Sigmund Mowinckel (The Psalms in Israel's Worship [1951; Engl. trans. 1967]) went beyond Gunkel's analysis in his emphasis on the liturgical background of the psalter, not merely in its use in the period of the Second Temple but in its origins as well. It seems that most of the psalms were written in the first instance for liturgical performance in the Temple. There is not sufficient evidence for the feast of Yahweh's enthronement, which Mowinckel postulated, and with which he associated about forty psalms. However, the idea of the enthronement of Yahweh certainly dominates many psalms (e.g., 47; 93; 96–99).

Claus Westermann (Praise and Lament in the Psalms [1977; Engl. trans. 1981]) proposed to incorporate the traditional thanksgiving psalm into the class of hymns. He regarded such psalms as declarative songs of praise (e.g., Ps. 30), as opposed to descriptive songs of praise (e.g., Ps. 136). Indeed, he regarded the hymn (praise) and lament as the dominant categories of the psalter, and he presented the psalms as a movement from lament to praise.

Walter Brueggemann (The Message of the Psalms [1984]) has added another dimension to the interpretation of the psalter. While recognizing the traditional literary types established by Gunkel, he placed a new grid on the classification, based upon the categories of the philosopher Paul Ricoeur. He distinguished between psalms of orientation (all is right with the world; hymns such as Pss. 8; 33; 104), or disorientation (laments such as Pss. 13, 74, 88), and of new orientation (e.g., Pss. 23; 30; 66). These three categories are not univocal, since traces of movement from one stage to another can be found in many psalms. Neither is his approach merely psychological; it helps the reader to see things that may not be seen otherwise, by underscoring the dimension of personal experience.

Importance. These prayers illustrate the theology and worship of the Israelites across the six centuries in which they were composed and collected. No other book in the Bible has this kind of origin and orientation. One learns what kind of God Israel worshiped and both the history and the mystery of the covenanted relationship. At the same time, one learns much about the warmth and dynamism of Israel's faith. An important mix of theology and anthropology is the result.

In both Jewish and Christian tradition, the psalter is one of the most treasured books. It is aptly considered a school of *prayer, not simply because it contains prayers that can be appropriated for personal use but because it also teaches one to pray. The familiarity and the frankness of the lament, the enthusiasm of the hymn, the confessional character of the thanksgiving—all these characteristics speak to the human heart before God. ROLAND E. MURPHY, O. CARM.

Pseudepigrapha.

Definition. The term Pseudepigrapha refers to a body of diverse Jewish or Jewish-Christian writings (there are others also of specifically Christian origin) that (a) are not included in the Hebrew Bible, the New Testament, the *Apocrypha, and rabbinic literature; (b) are associated with biblical books or biblical characters; (c) are more often than not written in the name of some ancient biblical worthy; (d) convey a message from God that is relevant to the time in which the books were written; and (e) were written during the period 250 BCE to 200 CE or, if later than this, preserve Jewish traditions of that period.

The word pseudepigrapha is the transliteration of a Greek word meaning "with false subscriptions," referring to books written under an assumed name. Although it is true that many of the writings in question are indeed pseudepigraphical, the word is inappropriate and misleading for at least two reasons: there are also nonpseudepigraphical books in any such list and there are pseudepigraphical books outside it!

It is much less confusing to use the word apocryphal, commonly found in ancient Christian usage, or the rabbinic expression "the outside books" (Hebr. ḥîṣônîm, "external") signifying those books outside the *canon. Certain of these "apocryphal" books that found their way into Greek and Latin manuscripts of the scriptures treasured by the church are known as the *Apocrypha (among Protestants) or the Deuterocanonical books (among Roman Catholics and in Eastern Orthodox churches). Those that did not gain entry, together with others subsequently written, were much later designated "pseudepigraphical"

(among Protestants) or retained the designation "apocryphal" (among Roman Catholics).

There is no agreed list of such writings if only because there are no agreed criteria by which they should be determined. The situation is all the more complex because there is no agreement concerning the content of the Apocrypha itself. It would seem best to include in the Apocrypha those "extra" books which appear in most *Septuagint manuscripts but not those which appear only in the *Vulgate.

Genres. The writings of the Pseudepigrapha are varied in both content and literary form. A number of them are apocalypses, which emphasize the revelation of divine secrets relating to the cosmos and "the end of the age" (see Apocalyptic Literature). Among these are 1 *Enoch, the Apocalypse of Zephaniah, the Apocalypse of Abraham, 2 *Enoch, 2 Esdras 3–14 (= 4 Ezra) [traditionally included in the Apocrypha in English Bibles], 2 Baruch, and 3 Baruch. Some, like 1 Enoch, are composite in character and range over a period of some centuries.

Others take the form of testaments, purporting to be the words of the ancient worthy in whose name the book was written. Some of these contain apocalyptic sections or elements. The best-known writing of this kind is the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, which, though Christian in its present form, is in the opinion of many scholars a redaction of a Jewish work of the second century BCE. Other writings in this category are the Testaments of Job, Moses, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Adam, and Solomon, ranging from the first century BCE to the second or third century CE.

A third category comprises midrashic-type comments on scripture, often in the form of stories picking up but going beyond the Hebrew texts. The most significant of these is the book of Jubilees, which comments on *Genesis and part of *Exodus. To this can be added the Genesis Apocryphon from *Qumran, which comments on the story of *Abraham in Genesis 12 and 13, embellishing the biblical text with colorful amplifications. Other books of this type are the Letter of Aristeas, the Apocryphon of Ezekiel, the Martyrdom of Isaiah, the Life of Adam and Eve, and Lives of the Prophets, Joseph and Asenath, the Book of Biblical Antiquities, 4 Baruch, *Jannes and Jambres, Eldad and Modad, and the Ladder of Jacob.

The tradition of Israelite wisdom literature expresses itself in folklore and in philosophical musings in the story of Ahikar, 3 Maccabees, 4 Maccabees, Pseudo-Phocylides, and Syriac Menander. The religion evidenced here shows the influence of Greek thought.

Hymns and *prayers are also a medium of literary expression. Most important in this connection are the Psalms of Solomon dating from the middle of the first century BCE. To these may be added the moving Prayer of *Manasseh, five apocryphal Syriac Psalms, the Prayer of Joseph, and the Prayer of Jacob.

The influence of the surrounding Greco-Roman culture can be seen in many of these writings, not least perhaps in such books as the Sibylline Oracles (from the second century BCE onward) with their prophetlike predictions of gloom, and in the Treatise of Shem (perhaps first century BCE), which describes the characteristics of the year based on the twelve signs of the zodiac.

All these books named as "pseudepigrapha" are only part of a much larger literature produced from the second century BCE onward, including the *Dead Sea Scrolls. It is a continuing point of debate which of the latter, if any, should be considered as belonging to this classification. It may be conceded that the commentaries and other works peculiar to the life and ordering of the Qumran community ought not to be included; but there is good reason to include others that have much in common with the recognized pseudepigraphical writings. Mention has already been made of the Genesis Apocryphon, to which may well be added the Temple Scroll and the Book of Giants, together with certain other writings with an apocalyptic interest, such as the Book of Mysteries and the Description of the New Jerusalem. It is of significance that among the Dead Sea Scrolls many fragments have been found of 1 Enoch and the book of Jubilees, together with a Testament of Levi and a Testament of Naphtali. But whether or not they are to be classified as pseudepigrapha, it is clear that the scrolls and the known pseudepigraphical writings must be studied together if we are to gain a true picture of Judaism in the centuries immediately preceding and following the beginning of the common era.

Preservation. For the most part, the Pseudepigrapha were preserved within Christianity, which went on to produce its own pseudepigraphical texts based on the model of the New Testament writings. Their preservation within this setting in the course of time created two problems difficult to solve, one linguistic and the other textual. Although written originally in Hebrew, Aramaic, or Greek (in Palestine or in the *Dispersion), such was their popularity in Christianity, especially in the east, that many survived only in such languages as Ethiopic, Coptic, Syriac, Georgian, Armenian, and Slavonic. This means that in a number of cases the language in which a book now appears may be once or twice or even three times removed from the language in which it was composed.

Not a few of them, moreover, are composite in character, containing Christian interpolations or substantial additions, or representing a fundamental redrafting of the entire book. The exact dating of such writings is not always easy to determine; but it must be borne in mind that late additions or even late documents may contain elements that illuminate an earlier period of Jewish history, and so should not be summarily dismissed.

The identification of these books is helped by quotations and other references in the early church fathers and by certain stichometries that emerged in Christianity which help to differentiate between canonical and apocryphal writings. Most of the books referred to are identifiable and already available, though a few remain unknown.

Significance. It is increasingly recognized that the pseudepigraphical writings, taken in conjunction with other literature of the same period, are of considerable importance for a study of the growth of Judaism and the origins of Christianity.

The picture of Judaism presented here of the period 250 BCE–200 CE is complex, unlike the "normative" Judaism of later years when it came to be deeply influenced by rabbinic teaching. It is thus misleading to speak of heresy or of sects during this time, as if these could be set over against an accepted orthodoxy. What we have is a religion in ferment, true to the scriptures and tradition and yet open to winds of change blowing from many quarters. Alongside deep traditional piety we find a cosmopolitan concern that probes the mysteries of God's workings not only in the world but also through the whole cosmos. Indeed, one of the marks of this literature is that of cosmic speculation that reveals a surprising sophistication in religious thought and expression. The picture presented is that of a Judaism far from merely parochial and very much alive. (See also Judaisms of the First Century CE.)

Speculative theology is seldom systematic, and with vitality went variety. The Pseudepigrapha, and not least those books among them of an apocalyptic kind, show certain areas of particular concern: the perennial problem of the origin of *evil and its outworking in the life of the world, the consequences of this for the Jews and indeed for the whole universe, the cataclysmic end that will result in the defeat and eradication of evil, and the final triumph of God in the coming of his kingdom and the age to come. Variety, not consistency, remains the hallmark of such speculations.

Christianity grew out of the soil of Judaism, and so the Pseudepigrapha, as expressions of Judaism, are of importance for an understanding of Christian origins also. Their relation to what came to be regarded as the *canon of scripture is a particularly intriguing one. The letter of *Jude is a case in point. There, in v. 9, allusion is made to an apocryphal story about a dispute between the devil and the archangel *Michael over the body of *Moses that may have come from a lost Assumption (or Testament) of Moses, and in vv. 5–7 and 14–15 reference is made to 1 Enoch, which is quoted as prophecy. This strongly suggests that, to Jude and no doubt to many other Christians, there was in fact no clear line of demarcation between certain of the Pseudepigrapha, regarded as inspired works, and other books that in the course of time came to be regarded as canonical. This is hardly surprising because, as we know from other sources, the limits of that part of the canon known as the Writings remained somewhat indeterminate for some time in contrast to the other two parts, the Torah and the Prophets. D. S. RUSSELL

Publicans. The word "publicans" in some English versions of the New Testament comes from the Latin publicani, which is in a sense a mistranslation of the Greek telōnai; the NRSV translates the term as "tax collector." Both Greek states and Rome had only a rudimentary civil service and budgeting process. Hence minor taxes were regularly sold to a private company, which would pay the agreed price to the treasury and collect (in principle, at the fixed rate) from the taxpayers. These telōnai had long been known and disliked in the Greek East (an Alexandrian comic poet calls them "birds of prey"). Roman publicani, while they always performed this service, had an essentially different origin. They were state contractors who would buy at auction both performance contracts (e.g., building contracts or contracts for army supplies) and collection contracts (as for taxes or the revenues of mines or ponds or forests). During the age of Roman expansion and public building, in the Middle Republic, they made most of their money from the former and, as Polybius tells us, they widely distributed prosperity among Roman citizens. This changed when the reformer Gaius Gracchus in 123 BCE entrusted them with the collection of the principal tax (the tithe on produce) of the province of *Asia, which Rome had just acquired, and also with staffing the criminal courts, which tried senators for maladministration and, in due course, for other crimes. This vastly increased the scale of their undertakings, and made them a major power in the state, though they always narrowly defended their economic interests. Their power in the courts was temporarily removed by Sulla (81 BCE), but was soon essentially restored. As a result, governors and their staffs, instead of regulating their activities, tended to become their partners—often in collusion with the provincial upper class, which could pass the burden on to those below—in grossly exploiting the provinces, especially in the east, where Pompey introduced the Asian system to all the new provinces he organized, including Syria. On one occasion, a governor of Syria tried to take the system over for his own benefit, with some relief for the provincials, who had fewer appetities to satisfy. His enemy Cicero complains that he had handed the publicani over to Syrians and Jews, "nations born to be slaves." Although by no means the chief or only exploiters, they and their huge staffs were the most visible, at the point of collection, and caused most of the widespread anti-Roman feeling in the eastern provinces.

They were organized as companies of shareholders (in the late Republic shares were widely traded), under a board of directors (magistri) who were always equestrian in standing. In the provinces, a promagister (not a shareholder) was in charge of a large establishment, mostly of natives, and they were what provincials called publicani, the vastly better organized successors of the local telōnai.

In the civil wars they lost their power and their fortunes, as rival commanders freely confiscated their accumulated wealth in the provinces. Caesar removed the main tax of Asia from them, collecting it directly through state officials, and Augustus in due course extended this to other provinces. When the province of Judea was annexed, after the deposition of Archelaus in 6 CE (see Herodian Dynasty), the publicani were given only the minor taxes (chiefly tariffs, again) to collect. Such tariffs were traditionally imposed, purely for purposes of revenue, at various points along main roads, as well as in all ports, as import, export, and transit dues.

In the late Republic, the power of the publicani led to major abuses, which we know from Cicero's speeches. Illegal extra charges were widely added, and permitted by the governor, and violence was used to extort compliance. Although there was more control under Augustus, this is the background to what we find in Judea. The Jews soon hated the Roman occupation even more than they had hated Archelaus, whose deposition they had demanded. Native collectors of taxes were now seen as collaborators with the oppressor, using his backing for their illegal profits. The problem was apparently worse in Judea than elsewhere, presumably because of the religious element in the national resistance; it is interesting that the "publicans" appear only in the Gospels, not in the rest of the New Testament, even though they were of course active in all the provinces. They are regularly coupled with sinners (note that where Matt. 5.46 has "publicans" Luke 6.32 has "sinners"), with *prostitutes, and with *gentiles. In the parable of the Pharisee and the publican (Luke 18.9–14), the latter knows his low place, whereas the former is the type of establishment respectability, despising him as an outcast. *Talmudic literature continues this aversion, until it was forbidden even to accept *alms from a tax collector. Yet wealth clearly conferred respectability. The chief tax collector (architelōnēs) at Jericho (perhaps a promagister) who followed *Jesus was treated by him like any other wealthy man (Luke 19.1–9), and in *Josephus (War 2.14.287) we find a telōnēs who is a notable of the Jewish community at Caesarea, working for the benefit of his community and trying to use his influence and his fortune on their behalf.

Most of the time we hear of the humble and despised publicans, whom Jesus made a point of treating, as he did other outcasts, like human beings who could be saved. This astonished and shocked (especially) the *Pharisees, which suggests a religious element in the aversion: dining with Levi (Mark 2.14–17 par.) was like dining with a gentile. It seems, however, that for ordinary people it was the exactions that were most disliked. Publicans who came to be baptized were told by *John the Baptist (just as soldiers were) to do what was their duty and not to abuse their power (Luke 3.12–13). This corresponds to the injunction to sin no more (John 5.14), which was all that Jesus required of humble people.

It is interesting that Matthew (9.9) sets the story of the call of Matthew (Levi) the tax collector at *Capernaum (the other accounts do not specify the location). If so, the telōnēs would be in the employ of Herod Antipas and would uniquely attest precisely similar aversion to telōnai who were not agents of Rome. But it must be suspected that Capernaum was wrongly introduced into the story, as one of Jesus' favorite towns.

See also Roman Empire; Tribute and Taxation, article on Roman Empire. E. BADIAN

Purity, Ritual. Throughout the Bible reference is made to a system of ritual purity that had both social and theological significance for the Israelites. While its specific origins are not known, it can be related to practices in other ancient Near Eastern cultures in which cultic functionaries followed similar regulations, involving, for example, ritual washing and food restrictions. What appears to be unparalleled about the biblical system, however, is its extension beyond the *priesthood to the general population.

In addition to cultic activity, texts describing ritual purity focus on food and individual status related to specific events. With regard to priestly behavior, those participating in *sacrifice are required to purify themselves beforehand. This purification is achieved through ritual immersion. In Leviticus 11 and Deuteronomy 14, detailed lists are given of *animals that are ritually pure and therefore permitted for consumption, and of those that are ritually impure and therefore prohibited. Leviticus and Numbers also contain regulations concerning the purification of individuals, regardless of cultic status, after childbirth, menstruation, ejaculation, disease, and contact with corpses.

While the regulations concerning ritual purity may be clear, their significance has been variously interpreted. The Hebrew words ṭāhôr and ṭāmēʾ are commonly translated "clean and "unclean" respectively, renderings which imply associations with dirt or hygiene not present in the original. Additional confusion results from the fact that while in our culture the difference between the human and the divine is often identified with the difference between the material and the spiritual, that was not the case in early Israel. Ritual purity and impurity could be considered spiritual states, yet they are inextricably linked to physical processes. In turn, physical acts such as sacrifice and sprinkling are used to alter relationships with the divine.

Following the lead of anthropologists such as Mary Douglas, many contemporary biblical scholars consider the status of being ṭāmēʾ as one of pollution resulting from a disruption of divine order. Thus, animals prohibited for food are those that cross paradigmatic boundaries of sky, earth, and sea. Shellfish, for example, live in the ocean but crawl like land animals. From this perspective, human ritual impurities are connected with disorder since they involve uncontrolled bodily emissions or death.

Another interpretation of biblical notions of ritual purity focuses on impurity as a state of power rather than pollution. Again using anthropological models, this view examines the relationships between human ritual impurity and liminal states, transitions between one status and another or between life and death. In a biblical context, it is argued, these moments are linked to the nature and power of the divine, a power that contains death and destruction as well as life and creation. They are also tied to actions, such as procreation and care for the dead, which are positive and necessary for social order. Thus, rather than being "unclean" or "impure" in a negative sense, the biblical state of ritual impurity is the result of contact with the sacred. This sense of ritual impurity is evident in the later rabbinic definition of canonical (i.e., sacred) texts as those which "render the hands ritually impure." Biblical rituals of purification may have been the result of a belief that direct contact with divine power could be dangerous if sustained too long. This conception of divinity is supported by passages such as Exodus 33.20, where God warns Moses, "You cannot see my face; for no one shall see me and live." Another possibility is that ritual purifications served as a consistent reminder that the power of life and death is not human but divine.

A third interpretation addresses the social implications of the ritual purity system. The sociologist Nancy Jay has pointed out the priestly control involved in purifications and its retribution of reproductive powers from the individual women who exhibit them in menstruation and childbirth to the male (imaged) deity represented by male priests. Food prohibitions can also be interpreted functionally as a means of social separation.

While it may be argued that legislative texts concerning ritual purity are descriptive and relational in their uses of the terms ṭāhôr and ṭāmē', other biblical writings imply a more polarized viewpoint. Ezekiel, for example, frequently uses ṭāmē' in contexts that clearly indicate a notion of defilement not only of persons but also of places, an impurity that is rooted in apostasy. Texts such as Lamentations 1.9 associate negative concepts of defilement with female sexuality as exemplified by menstruation. These different perspectives may be due to historical change, since the legislative materials are generally dated to earlier periods than the historical and prophetic texts.

With the destruction of the First and Second Temples, the cultic basis of the system of ritual purity was first disrupted and then destroyed. Remnants of the system were preserved in rabbinic practices such as ritual immersion for conversion or following menstruation, handwashing, and the separation of implements as well as categories of food in keeping kosher. While Christianity rejected the system as a whole, it retained ritual immersion in *baptism.

See also Social Sciences and the Bible, article on Cultural Anthropology and the Hebrew Bible.

DRORAH O'DONNELL SETEL

Q

Q. From German Quelle ("source"), the hypothetical common source used by the authors of the gospels of Matthew and Luke. It consists almost entirely of sayings of Jesus. See Synoptic Problem.

Qere. See Ketib and Qere.

Qoheleth. See Ecclesiastes, The Book of.

Queen and Queen Mother. Although several Hebrew words are translated "queen," they denote different statuses or types of royal women. The two primary terms are malkâ and gĕbîrâ. Malkâ seems not to have been used, even as a descriptive title, for any Judean or Israelite ruler's wife. Instead, the Bible commonly refers to the "king's wife" or the "king's mother" (1 Kings 1.11; 2.13, 19; Prov. 31.1). Malkâ may connote foreignness; the queen of *Sheba, Vashti and *Esther (wives of the Persian king: Esther 1.9; 2.22), and the abominated *queen of heaven are all called malkâ. Gĕbîrâ seems to refer to the mother of the acknowledged heir to the throne or to the mother of the reigning king, hence "queen mother" (Maacah: 1 Kings 15.13; *Jezebel: 2 Kings 10.13; Nehushta: Jer. 13.18). She may also be the chief wife (1 Kings 11.19; 2 Kings 10.13).

In a dynastic succession, heredity is the crucial factor. Almost every accession notice of a Judahite king includes not only his father's but also his mother's name (e.g., 1 Kings 15.2, 10). The queen mother's identity seems to have been relevant in establishing the legitimacy of the new Davidide. The gĕbîrâ frequently appears to come from a rich and well-connected Israelite family. It has been suggested that important provincial power groups ("the people of the land") had a vested interest in promoting a local woman to be the king's wife and subsequently pressuring the king to make her the gĕbîrâ.

With a power base of sorts behind her, a gĕbîrâ would have been able to exert some independent, if informal authority. Underlying Asa's removal of Maacah from being gĕbîrâ (1 Kings 15.13) was probably a power struggle between court factions. The formal notice of the demotion suggests its unprecedented nature; it also implies that the gĕbîrâ enjoyed not only prestige but tangible privileges.

Several episodes have led scholars to conclude that the queen mother had official status (1 Kings 2.13–25: *Bathsheba; 1 Kings 15.13: Maacah; 2 Kings 24.15: Nehushta). But recent studies have pointed out, on the basis of extrabiblical parallels, that the queen mothers involved in these episodes were unusual in having maneuvered their own sons into power even though the son had no legitimate claim to the throne. In such cases the new king owed a debt to his mother that he could scarcely ignore, and the queen mother's power might grow even greater.

Besides marrying women from local families, Israelite kings, like their ancient Near Eastern counterparts, had an eye to advantageous alliances and often chose wives from neighboring royalty. *Solomon's foreign wives are proverbial (1 Kings 11.1–8). Jezebel was the daughter of the king of Tyre (1 Kings 16.31), and her daughter Athaliah married Jehoram of Judah (2 Kings 8.18).

Kings' daughters generally receive little mention, although a Hebrew seal inscribed "Maadanah, daughter of the king" has come to light. Michal, *Saul's daughter and *David's wife (1 Sam. 18.20–27; 19.11–17; 25.44; 2 Sam. 3.13–16; 6.16–23) is exceptional, as is Athaliah's enterprising rebel daughter Jehosheba (2 Kings 11.12).

With their status and wealth, wives of rulers throughout the ancient Near East were often able to transcend the otherwise static boundaries determined by gender and society (see Women, article on Ancient Near East and Israel). In Mesopotamia, rulers' wives supervised their own households, administered palace industries, engaged in diplomacy, and participated in religious rituals apart from their husbands. This recalls the experience of the most documented biblical queen, *Jezebel. She ran her own religious establishment (1 Kings 18.19) and used her authority to initiate and execute policy (18.4). She sent official messages (19.2; cf. Prov. 9.3), counseled her husband (1 Kings 21.5–7; cf. Esther 4.16–17; 6.14–7.6), and, although 1 Kings 21.8 says that she arranged Naboth's death in *Ahab's name, elsewhere the wording may mean that the murder was committed on Jezebel's own authority (21.11, 14–15).

Occasionally women ruled independently in the ancient Near East. The queen of *Sheba, who conducted economic negotiations with Solomon, may have belonged to a dynasty of queens who ruled in North Arabia, and during the Hasmonean period *Salome was for a brief time queen of Judea (76–67 BCE). Ancient records, however, tend to look with disfavor on women who ruled in their own name, whether it is the *Sumerian "king" KU.BAU (third millennium BCE), the Egyptian Pharaoh Hatshepsut (1486–1468 BCE), or Athaliah of Judah (843–837 BCE), whose six-year reign (2 Kings 11.3) was the only break in the Davidic succession of Judahite kings.

In its attitude toward the historical queens of Israel and Judah, the Bible is either neutral (the royal accession notices), suspiciously laconic (e.g., Bathsheba and the wife of Jeroboam I), or decidedly negative (Maacah, Jezebel, Athaliah). Only Esther, in what is essentially a morale-raising fiction, merits an unequivocally favorable portrayal. From a literary point of view, however, *Sarah seems to be a positive paradigm for the gĕbîrâ, just as *Abraham is a paradigm for David. The narrative's insistence (Gen. 17.19–21; 21.12–13) that Sarah, not *Hagar, will bear the son of the promise (cf. Rom. 9.9), is reminiscent of the attention paid to the identity of the king's mother in the royal accession notices. The gospels of Matthew and Luke may reflect this when they stress *Mary's role in bearing Jesus, another son of the promise and a future king. The later tradition of Mary as the heavenly queen, however, derives not from biblical but from imperial Roman political vocabulary.

See also Kingship and Monarchy.

MARY JOAN WINN LEITH

Queen of Heaven. A goddess who, according to the prophet Jeremiah (7.16–20; 44.15–28), was worshiped in Judah in the late seventh and early sixth centuries BCE. Jeremiah's remarks associate the goddess with fertility and, to some degree, with war; as her title "Queen of Heaven" indicates, she also has astral characteristics. Her cult is described as one that is particularly attractive to women, who bake offering cakes called kawwānîm in the goddess's image.

The Canaanite goddess who best fits this description is *Astarte, a goddess associated with both fertility and war and who has astral features. *Phoenician inscriptions also ascribe to Astarte the title "queen." Astarte's cult, however, is not known to be one in which women played a special role. Women on the other hand did have an important place in the cult of Astarte's Mesopotamian counterpart, Ishtar, whose female devotees ritually wept in imitation of the goddess's mourning over her dead lover, *Tammuz (see Ezek. 8.14). Ishtar's cult also involved the offering of cakes called kamānu, a word cognate with Hebrew kawwānîm. The Queen of Heaven thus should be identified as a syncretism of Canaanite Astarte and Mesopotamian Ishtar.

SUSAN ACKERMAN

Queen of Sheba. See Sheba, Queen of.

Qumran (Map 12:X5). Khirbet Qumran is the modern Arabic name of the site at the northwest corner of the *Dead Sea, ca. 13 km (9 mi) south of Jericho, near which the *Dead Sea Scrolls were discovered beginning in 1947. Subsequent excavations revealed occupation at the site from the mid-second century BCE until the First Jewish Revolt (66–70 CE). The structures found are generally thought to have been built by the *Essenes and are chiefly of a communal nature, such as cisterns fed by aqueducts, kitchens, a dining hall, and a large room containing long rectangular tables at which some have thought the scrolls were written. A cemetary is located nearby.

MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Quotations of the Old Testament in the New Testament. All the writers of the New Testament regarded the Old Testament as their Bible. They would not have thought of it as an Old Testament at all. They sought in it confirmation of their beliefs, and often used it to prove their point in argument. To a large extent, knowledge of how the New Testament writers used the Old enables one to understand their modes of thought.

New Testament writers inherited a long tradition of Jewish exegesis of the Bible (see Interpretation, History of, article on Jewish Interpretation). Although they differed in some important respects from the principles of this exegesis because they were Christians and not, or not only, Jews, this was their starting point, and they saw no reason to repudiate a great deal in that tradition. Jewish exegetical tradition was in no way monochrome: various schools of exegesis can be distinguished. There were certainly some Jews who were more open toward the *gentile world than others; they would put more emphasis on those parts of the Bible that look forward to a time when Israel's God would be made known to the whole world. Again, there was in Alexandria a school of exegesis that used very extensively the allegorical method of interpretation, which had originated in a purely Greek milieu; of these, *Philo is by far the most important representative. And contemporary with the beginning of Christianity there also existed in Palestine the *Qumran community, which produced the *Dead Sea Scrolls. This sect believed that they could discover in the scriptures, both in the *Law and in the prophets, hidden prophecies of the history of their own sect. Nor must we forget the influence of the Targums, the Aramaic paraphrases of the Hebrew Bible, used in *synagogues for the benefit of worshipers who could not understand Hebrew (see Translations, article on Targums). These writings aimed above all to make the sacred text relevant to contemporary conditions, and frequently incorporated edifying legends or elaborations of the biblical narrative. We must also bear in mind that most early Christians seem to have read their scriptures in a Greek translation (the *Septuagint), which was not always an accurate rendering of the Hebrew.

All the authors of the New Testament shared certain assumptions about the Bible. The scriptures, they held, were entirely true and infallible, internally consistent, with no contradictions. Above all, the scriptures were filled with references to, and prophecies of, *Jesus Christ. The primary feature that distinguishes New Testament interpreters of the Old Testament from Jewish exegesis is that the New Testament exegesis was christocentric.

*Paul was a master of *typology; he often takes for granted that his readers will know about and believe Jewish traditions of exegesis. For example, in Galatians 4.29, a parallel is drawn between the relations of *Isaac and *Ishmael, on the one hand, and those of Christians and Jews in Paul's day, on the other. Paul writes, "But just as at that time the child who was born according to the flesh persecuted the child who was born according to the Spirit, so it is now." Paul is referring to Genesis 21.8–14, where *Sarah sees Ishmael and Isaac playing. Some Jewish scholars, wishing to justify Sarah's harsh treatment of Ishmael and *Hagar, argued that the Hebrew word "playing" in Genesis 21.9 really meant "persecuting"; Paul takes this interpretation for granted. Paul's interpretation of scripture also helps him with the problem of the Law. In Galatians 3 and Romans 4, he appeals to the text of Genesis 15.6 in order to prove that faith came before the Law; *Abraham was justified by faith before he underwent *circumcision. Again and again Paul finds in the scriptures texts that, so he believes, identify Christ with the suffering servant of God; see, for example, Romans 15.3, where he sees a verse from Psalm 69.9 as being the utterance of Christ to the Father. Or again, in 1 Corinthians 15.45 he quotes Genesis 2.7 in order to show that Christ was the second *Adam. In fact, a great deal of Paul's doctrine about Christ is based on biblical exegesis.

The author of Matthew's gospel uses quotations from the Old Testament freely in order to prove that Jesus was the promised *Messiah. He has a set of eleven quotations that he introduces with some such phrase as, "All this was done to fulfill what was spoken by the prophet" (Matt. 1.22–23; 2.5–6, 15, 17–18, 23; 4.14–16; 8.17; 12.17–21; 13.34–35; 21.4–5; 27.9–10). This usage strikes the modern reader as rather literalistic. But in a much more general sense, Matthew represents Jesus as the fulfillment, in certain respects, of *Moses: like Moses, he has to be hidden by his parents to escape persecution; like Moses, he is a great teacher; and like Moses, he gives out his teaching on a mountain. Matthew, however, is capable of using scripture in what we would regard as a more sensitive way. Thus, in Matthew 8.17 he quotes Isaiah 53.4 of Jesus, suggesting that Jesus' healing activities were in some sense vicarious, because his healings meant that he bore our diseases.

The Fourth Gospel does not have many explicit biblical quotations, but the text is full of allusions and echoes. As well as the standard texts that all the evangelists quote, John employs several allusions in a unique way. One such is in 3.14, where the episode of the brazen serpent (Num. 21.9) is presented as a foreshadowing of the cross. In several places, John uses biblical allusions to support his contention that the preexistent Christ was present on occasions during Israel's history. Thus, in 8.40, Abraham is described as one who believed a man sent from God to tell him the truth. This alludes no doubt to Genesis 18.1–15, where three men visit Abraham, one of whom he addresses as "my Lord." When in 8.51–58 we read that Abraham saw Jesus' day and that before Abraham was Jesus is, we can have no doubt that John identifies the preexistent Christ with this angel. John's characterization of Jesus as *lamb of God also draws heavily on biblical models, even to the extent of quoting the description of the *Passover lamb (Exod. 12.46) in his account of the *crucifixion (19.36).

The usage of the Bible in the book of *Revelation is also unique. There are no explicit citations, but the symbols and images employed by John the seer are nearly all taken from the Hebrew Bible, especially from *Ezekiel and *Daniel, so that John weaves out of these materials a brilliant tapestry proclaiming the events of the new dispensation.

The way in which New Testament writers use the Old Testament is very different from the way most Christians understand it today. Where they found prophecies and foreshadowings, and even occasional appearances of the preexistent Christ, Christians today see a developing revelation of God's nature and purpose, a revelation that is complete in the life, teaching, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ. Much in the Old Testament that they believed to be history is held today to be legend or *myth. But myth and legend are vehicles of expression for the faith of Israel, and readers cannot dispense with the evidence of the Old Testament in seeking to understand the meaning of the New.

ANTHONY TYRRELL HANSON

Qur'ān and the Bible, The. The belief that God speaks through scripture he has inspired is shared by Jews, Christians, and Muslims. In spite of the considerable differences among them, these three monotheistic communities lay claim to a common distinction that links them as "People of the Book." Each community deems itself to be in possession of a written record of God's will, revealed at moments of crisis in history, recorded for the instruction of future generations, and constantly reinterpreted in acts of individual and corporate remembrance. Each community is founded upon a faithful response to the word it has received, using as its model of obedience to the divine call the example of *Abraham.

The Qur'ān (Koran) is the holy book of Islam. Muslims believe that it was revealed by God to the prophet Muhammad, through the agency of the angel *Gabriel. These revelations came to Muhammad between 610 CE (the year of his call to be the messenger of God) and 632, the year of his death. The Qur'ān consists of 114 sūrahs, or chapters. The length of the complete book is about two-thirds that of the New Testament. The Arabic word qur'ān most probably means "that which is to be read aloud." The first sūrah to be revealed to Muhammad starts with the command "Read! [aloud] in the name of your Lord who creates." In the Arabic the opening imperative iqra' ("Read!") contains the same consonantal elements that form the word Qur'ān.

The sūrahs are named. Some of the names are familiar to readers of the Bible: "Jonah" (10), "Joseph" (12), "Abraham" (14), "Mary" (19), "The Prophets" (21), "The Resurrection" (75). Others are unfamiliar: "The Cow" (2), "The Pilgrimage" (22), "The Pen" (68), "The Dawn" (89). Others are introduced by combinations of letters, the precise significance of which is unknown. In addition to its name, each sūrah is prefaced by an indication of the place where it was revealed, either Mecca or Medina. The language of the Meccan sūrahs is appropriate for summoning an unbelieving people to accept Islam as a matter of immediate and urgent decision. At the last day, unbelievers will be given the reward merited by their unbelief, and cast into jahannam (*Gehenna), which is graphically described. On the other hand, the reward for believers on the day of reckoning will be the *afterlife in *paradise, a place described with comparable vividness. The Medinan sūrahs are longer, and chiefly concerned with the organization of life in the developing Islamic community.

In 622 CE, Muhammad and his small group of Muslim converts were obliged to leave Mecca because of persecution; this event is called the hijrah (hegira). They moved to Yathrib, about 465 km (290 mi) to the northeast. In honor of Muhammad, the place was renamed madīnat (al-nabī), "City (of the Prophet)." Medina, the name by which it is still known, is the city in which Muhammad lies buried. The year 622 CE divides the Meccan from the Medinan period in the life of the prophet Muhammad, and is the year from which the Islamic community dates the beginning of a new era, whose dates are sometimes given the designation A.H. (Latin Anno Hejirae).

Unlike the Bible, which emerged over a period of centuries as the work of many different (and often unnamed) witnesses to God's redemptive activity, the Qur'ān passed from the oral tradition to its written form in just over a decade after the death of Muhammad. The revelations were passed on by Muhammad orally, and those who listened to him wrote them down on whatever materials were to hand, including dried leaves, sun-bleached animal bones, and stones. This written material was finally brought together during the caliphate of 'Uthmān (644–656 CE), the third "Rightly Guided Caliph" (Arabic khalīfah, "successor" of the prophet Muhammad), to form the authoritative written text of the Qur'ān. No additions or deletions have ever been permitted by Muslim authorities, though many textual variations in the manuscripts have been collected by western scholars. After the first short sūrah, which is a brief exordium of praise to God, who is both creator and guide, and which is sometimes compared to the *Lord's Prayer, the other sūrahs follow each other in an order of decreasing length. The first sūrah to be revealed is numbered 96 in the final sequence.

Both Jews and Christians were present in parts of Arabia prior to the time of Muhammad. In Mecca and in Medina (as well as in his travels north and south over the ancient caravan routes), Muhammad would have come in contact with some of them. But the internal evidence of the Qur'ān provides little evidence to support the view that Muhammad had any direct knowledge of the Jewish and Christian scriptures. According to Islamic tradition he was, in any case, unable to read or write. That such an unlettered man was able to "read" the revelations has always been accepted by Muslims as a special sign of God's favor.

The similarities between the biblical and the Qur'ānic material suggest that, even had there been any direct borrowing from the former to the latter, it was highly selective. Major prophets like *Amos and *Jeremiah, for example, do not appear in the Qur'ān. And the Qur'ānic interpretation of trinitarian orthodoxy as belief in the Father, the Son, and the Virgin Mary, may owe less to a misunderstanding of the New Testament itself than to a recognition of the role accorded by local Christians to *Mary as mother in a special sense.

The use of historical criticism in studying the Qur'ān has been resisted by Muslims. For them, the Qur'ān is the sure guide to right belief, thinking, and action. The guidance it furnishes is complemented by guidance about what constitutes knowledge, and about the way knowledge is to be attained. Knowledge consists of that which God has revealed. The path to knowledge is that of submission (islām) to the revealed will of God. There are limits to human speculation, precisely because of what God has revealed. Intellect, will, and reason are all to be schooled by the revelation. To study the Qur'ān according to methods developed in a non-Muslim society is not encouraged in Islam. Discussion about whether or not the Qur'ān is "the Word of God" belongs to a different intellectual tradition.

According to Islamic belief, each sacred "Book" was revealed at the appropriate time and place by God, through the agency of human messengers. The message of all scriptural revelation is essentially the same; it could not be otherwise, since God himself is the author. Thus, any differences between the scriptures of the "People of the Book" are to be attributed to human distortion, and not to divine caprice. To *Moses and his people was given the Tawrah (the *Torah); to *David and his people was given the Zabūr (the book of *Psalms); to *Jesus and his people God gave the Injīl (the *gospel); and finally, to Muhammad was revealed the Qur'ān, the restatement of the eternal and unchanging purposes of God, to which all the messengers originally bore witness. Muslims believe that the Qur'ān is God's authoritative final word, with a particular significance for Muhammad's own people, but also a universal message for humankind.

The designation "People of the Book," viewed from outside the Islamic community, is as much a reminder of the differences as of the similarities that exist between Jews, Christians, and Muslims in their understanding of what constitutes scripture. Yet despite this there are still points of contact between the Bible and the Qur'ān, as the references to *monotheism and to Abraham, Moses, David, and Jesus indicate. In the Bible and in the Qur'ān, the themes of God's creative and re-creative activity are taken up. The reader is confronted by the one true God, besides whom there is no other. In these different scriptures are revealed the divine will and plan for humankind, the service required by God of those whom he has created, the way of salvation, and the penalty for self-imposed separation from God.

Other names and incidents are recorded in both the Bible and the Qur'ān. Two examples can be mentioned to provide a start for further reading. The first is the story of *Joseph in Genesis 37–50 compared with the story of Yūsuf ("the fairest of stories" in the Qur'ān, sūrah 12). Common to both accounts is Joseph's rise to power and authority in Egypt after being brutally treated by his brothers, his faithfulness to God through periods of suffering, his careful use of the gifts given to him by God, and his reconciliation with his family following their appeal for food in time of famine. In the Qur'ānic account, Joseph finds favor because of his exemplary acceptance of everything that God willed for him, both in times of adversity and in times of success. His submission to the will of God is held up to succeeding generations of Muslims as an example worthy of imitation.

The second example is that of *Mary, the mother of Jesus. Sūrah 19, called Maryam (Mary), may be compared with Matthew 1.8–2.23 and Luke 1.5–2.51. To anyone familiar with the New Testament passages in which Mary appears, this holds a twofold interest. The first point of interest is that the Qur'ānic account acknowledges the *virgin birth of the child Jesus ('Īsā). The second is in the Qur'ānic denial of the implications of *trinitarian theology. In the Qur'ān, Jesus is a human being, a messenger of God, but still a creature; he is not God incarnate. In associating the creature with the Creator, Christians are, therefore, guilty of the gravest impropriety. The belief of Muslims is expressed in sūrah 4.171: "O People of the Book! Commit no excesses in your religion: nor say of God (Allāh) aught but truth. Christ Jesus, the son of Mary, was (no more than) an Apostle of Allāh, and his (Allāh's) Word, which he bestowed on Mary. And (Jesus was) a spirit proceeding from him (Allāh). So believe in Allāh and his apostles. Say not 'Trinity.' Desist, it will be better for you. For Allāh is one (Allāh). Glory be to him. He is far exalted above having a son. To him belong all things in the heavens and on earth."

EDWARD HULMES

R

Rabbi. A term that arose in the first century CE for those ordained to be authoritative in their study, exposition, and practice of Jewish law. The rabbi could be found expounding the *Torah in the *synagogue, much as Jesus did (Mark 1.21; 6.2), although the application of the title to him (Matt. 26.25, 49; Mark 9.5; 11.21; etc.) was early and preserved its etymological meaning of "my master" (see John 1.38). The rabbi functioned as an interpreter of Torah and as a judge, most often of the claims of the poor. By the third century, the rabbi was regarded as having magical powers such as the ability to communicate with the dead.

Rabbis generally worked part-time at a trade, as carpenters, cobblers, and the like. Not until the Middle Ages did the rabbinate become a profession. The rabbis were not a separate caste. They mixed with the common folk on a regular basis and usually came from the ranks of ordinary people, as in the case of the most eminent of all rabbis, Akiva. The rabbis believed that all Jews could live a holy life through observance of Torah, and they said that, if all Jews observed just two *Sabbaths completely, salvation would come. Thus, common folk played an important part in the rabbinate's scheme. Rabbis could be entrusted with great responsibilities far removed from the world of Torah study in the rabbinical schools. There are instances of rabbis assuming public health responsibilities, including disaster prevention so that buildings would not collapse in a storm, and the rabbi would act to see that no one in his village lacked food to eat. Such was the central role of rabbis in late antiquity.

The earliest literary monument of the rabbis is the *Mishnah. Completed around 200 CE, the Mishnah is basically a rambling legal compilation, striking in its ahistorical character as compared with earlier Jewish writings and in its lack of reference to scripture to support its rulings. Nevertheless, it was authoritative and became the basis for the Jerusalem *Talmud (ca. 400 CE) and the Babylonian Talmud (ca. 500 CE), which comment on the Mishnah and supply its wants, ideological as well as scriptural (e.g., the Mishnah does not talk of the *Messiah).

The rabbis essentially shared the traditions and views of the *Pharisees. They embraced an all-knowing, all-wise, just, merciful, and loving God who supervised the lives of individuals and decreed the fates, even while giving room for free will to choose between good and evil. A world to come existed where recompense for the evils of this world could be expected. Both this world and the next revolved around Torah. The religion of the rabbis exalted the holy faith, the holy man, and the pursuit of a holy way of life. A part of that holy existence involved daily prayer, and the roots of the current Jewish prayerbook are to be found in the Mishnah. It was only by pursuing the holy on a daily basis that salvation could be achieved and the Messiah would come.

PHILIP STERN

Rachel. Rachel, whose name means "ewe," was the younger daughter of Laban (brother of *Rebekah) and the wife of *Jacob. The account of the meeting and subsequent marriage of Rachel and Jacob is a love story, succinct in its narration. Jacob was charged by his father *Isaac to find a wife among his mother's people at Haran in *Mesopotamia (Gen. 27.46–28.5). At the end of his journey, he came to a well where shepherds gathered to water their flocks. When he learned that they were from Haran, he asked them if they knew Laban; the shepherds pointed out to Jacob that Laban's daughter Rachel was approaching with her father's sheep. As soon as Jacob saw Rachel, he rolled the stone from the mouth of the well and watered the flock of Laban, his uncle. He kissed Rachel and made himself known to her as a relative. She then returned home and gave her father the news of the arrival of Jacob. Laban went to Jacob, greeted him, and brought him to his house, where he stayed a month helping with the daily chores. At the end of this time, his uncle suggested that even as a relative he should not serve for nothing. When he asked Jacob what his wages should be, Jacob, who loved Rachel, said, "I will serve you seven years for your younger daughter Rachel" (Gen. 29.18); this was agreed upon. At the end of the term, which passed quickly for him because of his love, he asked Laban for her hand in marriage.

A feast was prepared and Jacob received his wife who according to custom was veiled. In the morning he discovered that he had been deceived into accepting Rachel's elder sister, *Leah. When he confronted Laban, he was told that in that country the younger daughter was not given in marriage before the elder; disappointed but undaunted, Jacob worked another seven years for Rachel. Needless to say, she was his favorite wife and eventually became the mother of *Joseph and *Benjamin.

Some time later after a quarrel between Laban and Jacob, in which Rachel took her husband's part and then stole her father's household gods (see Teraphim), the entire clan departed stealthily on the long journey to Canaan (Gen. 31.14–21), where she died at Ephrath giving birth to her younger son Benjamin (Gen. 35.19).

See also Ancestors, The; Genesis, The Book of. ISOBEL MACKAY METZGER

Rahab.

1. The name (Hebr. rāḥāb) of the Canaanite prostitute who saved the spies sent by Joshua to *Jericho, and who, along with her extended family, was subsequently incorporated into Israel (Josh. 2; 6.22–25; Heb. 11.31; James 2.25). According to Matthew's *genealogy of Jesus, she was the mother of Boaz, who married *Ruth, and thus the ancestor of *David (Matt. 1.5).

2. A name (Hebr. rahab) for the primeval adversary of Yahweh in the battle prior to *creation (Isa. 51.9; Ps. 89.10; Job 9.13; 26.12; Sir. 43.23–25; see Israel, Religion of; Myth), also known as the sea, the deep, the dragon, the serpent, and *Leviathan; this name, unlike the others, is not found in ancient Near Eastern sources outside the Bible. It is applied by extension to Egypt as the deity's quintessential historical enemy (Ps. 87.4; Isa. 30.7). MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Rainbow. The meteorological event called the rainbow was of course well known in ancient times, and it is referred to occasionally in the Bible. In Sirach 43.11 it is mentioned in a catalog of God's creative wonders, and elsewhere its multicolored splendor is used metaphorically (Ezek. 1.28; Rev. 4.3; Sir. 50.7). The most familiar passage in which the rainbow occurs is the conclusion to the *Flood story in *P (Gen. 9.12–16), where it is a sign of the *covenant between God and *Noah and all living creatures. The Hebrew word used here and elsewhere is qešet, which is also the ordinary word for the weapon called the bow. There is a mythological background to P's use of the rainbow in the Flood narrative. Like other ancient Near Eastern deities, the God of Israel was frequently depicted as a warrior-god, especially in his role as god of the storm; lightning bolts are his arrows, which he shoots from his bow (see, e.g., Pss. 18.14; 77.17; Hab. 3.9–12; Wisd. of Sol. 5.21). The rainbow after the Flood is then a sign that the deity of the storm will never again use his most powerful weapon for total destruction. He has put it in the clouds as if for storage; the bow's visible presence in the clouds is a guarantee that it is not being used. MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Raphael. An *archangel mentioned in the Bible only in the book of *Tobit, in which he is sent to cure the blindness of Tobit and to free the hapless Sarah from the power of a demon (Tob. 3.17); to accomplish these tasks he acts as the companion and protector of Tobit's son Tobias on his journey. Raphael's name means "God has healed"; this explains his curative activity in Tobit and in postbiblical Jewish literature, such as 1 Enoch, in which he is sent to remove *Azazel and to heal the earth (1 Enoch 10.5–7) and is set over diseases and wounds (40.9). Later traditions identify Raphael as one of the divine messengers in Genesis 18.1–2, and as the angel who stirs the waters of the pool Beth-zatha (Bethesda; John 5.2–4). MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Rebekah (in Rom. 9.10, Rebecca). A woman of insight and determination, Rebekah was the daughter of Bethuel (Gen. 24.15) and the sister of Laban the Aramean (25.20). She was brought from Haran to be the wife of *Isaac, the son of *Abraham, in the following way. After the death of *Sarah, Abraham commissioned his oldest servant to find a wife for Isaac from Abraham's kindred. The servant traveled to Haran in *Mesopotamia, the city of Abraham's brother, Nahor. On arrival outside the city in the evening about the time when the women usually came to draw water from the well, the servant made the ten camels he had brought with him kneel down nearby. He then prayed that God would guide him in making the right choice of a wife for Isaac. It so happened that Rebekah was the one thus identified. After she had given water to the camels, the servant introduced himself, gave her a gold ring and two bracelets (see Jewelry), inquired whose daughter she was, and discovered that she was the daughter of Bethuel, son of Nahor (Abraham's brother). She immediately ran off to tell her mother's household about her encounter at the well. Her brother Laban, on hearing the news, went out to the servant and offered him hospitality. The servant would not accept any food until he had disclosed his mission. On hearing his words, Laban and Bethuel agreed that "the thing comes from the Lord" (Gen. 24.50), so they were willing to have Rebekah go back with the servant to become Isaac's wife.

Isaac and Rebekah were married and became the parents of twin sons, *Esau and *Jacob (Gen. 25.24), who were later to vie for their father's blessing when he was old and blind (chap. 27). Rebekah favored Jacob and helped him through deceit to win the father's blessing. She died apparently while Jacob was in Mesopotamia and was buried in the cave of Machpelah (Gen. 49.31).

See also Ancestors, The; Genesis, The Book of. ISOBEL MACKAY METZGER

Rechabites. The Rechabites were an Israelite group known for their distinctive lifestyle. Drinking *wine was proscribed. They refused houses, choosing instead to live in tents; they rejected agriculture, especially the cultivation of grapes. Jeremiah commended the Rechabites for obeying their strict rule, contrasting them with the other people of Judah who disobeyed God's laws (Jer. 35).

Biblical tradition derives their name from Rechab, the father of Jonadab, although it was the latter who imposed the regulations (Jer. 35.6; 2 Kings 10.15–28). Possibly their lifestyle manifested an idealization of the *wilderness period when the Israelites lived in tents, worshiped God in a tent (2 Sam. 7.4–7), and were faithful (Jer. 2.1–2; Hos. 2.14–15). But the Hebrew word for chariot comes from the same root as Rechab, and it may be that the Rechabites were a guild of chariot-makers. If so, their preference for tents might have resulted from their need to travel to the sources of metal ore.

In other references, we learn that the Rechabites may have been related to the seminomadic *Kenites (1 Chron. 2.55). Malchijah, the son of Rechab, governed a district in the postexilic period (Neh. 3.14). The *Mishnah indicates that in the Second Temple period a special day was set aside for the Rechabites to bring the wood offering (Ta'an. 4.5). WILLIAM B. NELSON, JR.

Red Cow. Numbers 19 describes an unusual ritual, to be performed in cases of impurity resulting from contact with a corpse, requiring a red cow (Hebr. pārâ, whose usual translation "heifer" is probably too precise; cf. Gen. 15.9; 1 Sam. 16.2). Remarkable aspects of the passage include that it specifies not only the sex but the color of the animal, that the whole animal be burned, and that participants in the act of purification are themselves rendered ritually impure (see Purity, Ritual). The ashes of the sacrifice are mixed with running (literally, "living") water to produce a substance called mê niddâ.

Hyam Maccoby has interpreted these puzzling aspects of the ritual by focusing on the term mê niddâ. Usually the phrase is translated "water for cleansing" (NRSV), but it can also be rendered "water of separation." The word niddâ is also used for a menstruating woman, "separate" from normal spheres of activity because her physical state demonstrates her participation in the divine process of giving life. Similarly, contact with the equally sacred power of death also separates individuals from the community. The red cow ritual uses "waters of separation" to counteract the effects of such contact. The substance is a symbolic substitute for *blood, the sign of life. The requirement that the sacrifice be both red and female suggests that it represents the blood of potential life, of menstruation or birth. Like the divine, it is inherently powerful, and can therefore have a different effect on those who prepare it and those who receive it.

Other scholars have connected the ritual with a cult of the dead (cf. Homer, Odyssey 11.23–50; see Afterlife and Immortality, article on Ancient Israel; Israel, Religion of). The tractate Para of the *Mishnah is devoted to the ritual described in Leviticus 19. DRORAH O'DONNELL SETEL

Redeem. The Hebrew verb generally translated "to redeem" is gā'al. Its basic idea involves doing something on behalf of others because they are unable to do it for themselves (see Jer. 31.11). The motivation to redeem someone is most often familial obligation. If no relative steps forward, however, the king (2 Sam. 14.1–11; Ps. 72.12–14) or God (Jer. 15.21; 50.33–34; Prov. 23.10–11) is expected to take up that person's duty. Whoever the redeemer is, in the act of redemption, he or she is providing for the redeemed as a man would provide for his own immediate family.

The most common situation in which redemption arises is when property or persons have been confiscated to reconcile a debt. A redeemer is one who pays the debt for the debtor, thus buying back what was confiscated (Lev. 25.24–34, 47–55; 27.13–33; Jer. 32.7–8). Similarly, a prisoner, perhaps of war (Lev. 27.28–29), can be redeemed through payment of a ransom. It is not surprising, then, to find the term pādâ ("to ransom, buy back") used in the same sense (Exod. 21.8; 34.20; Lev. 27.27, 29; Jer. 31.11).

The Hebrew idea of redemption, however, extends beyond payment of money. Redemption occurs in *levirate marriage (Ruth 4.4–7). One who seeks revenge for a man who has been murdered is a "redeemer of blood" (Num. 35.16–27; Deut. 19.1–13; Josh. 20.1–9; see Avenger of Blood). In fact, redemption is sometimes used to refer to rescue or deliverance in general. In this vein, God is the ultimate redeemer. He redeems persons from Death (Job 33.28; Ps. 103.4; Hos. 13.14). He redeems Israel from Egypt (Exod. 6.6; 15.13; Prov. 23.10–11 [gā'al]; Deut. 7.8; 9.26; Mic. 6.4 [pādâ]) and Babylon (Isa. 43.1; 44.22–23; 48.20; 51.10). He also redeems in a more typical way, helping those in financial distress (Jer. 15.21; cf. Ps. 72.14). He is seen as a good husband (Isa. 54.5) and father (Isa. 63.16) when he acts as redeemer.

These ideas set the stage for the ways in which New Testament writers use the Greek verb (apo)lutromai. Redemption is most often spoken of as a ransom (Col. 1:13–14; 1 Pet. 1.18–19; Heb. 11.35); but the idea entails more than a figurative business transaction. Christ redeems by his death (1 Pet 1:18–19), in that he gives humanity the forgiveness that humanity could not give itself (Eph. 1.7; Col. 1.13–14; Titus 2.14; Heb. 9.11–14). Moreover, God redeems Christians from slavery to *sin in order to adopt them as his children (Rom. 8.12–23; Gal. 4.1–7), thus perpetuating the idea that the redeemer assumes the role of familial protector over the redeemed. TIMOTHY M. WILLIS

Red Sea. The traditional translation (beginning with the *Septuagint) of the Hebrew expression yam sûf, Red Sea is the name of the body of water crossed by the Israelites in their *Exodus from Egypt. This translation, followed by later Greek biblical tradition (Jth. 5.13; Wisd. of Sol. 10.18; 1 Macc. 4.9; Acts 7.36; Heb. 11.29) and the *Vulgate, would connect the miracle of the crossing (Exod. 14–15) with either the western (the Gulf of Suez; Map 2:R3–4) or the eastern (the Gulf of Aqaba/Eilat; Map 2:T3–4) branch of the Red Sea. But in Exodus 2.3–5 (and elsewhere in the Bible) sûf means "reed," and this is how the Septuagint and Vulgate translate it there; yam sûf refers to the eastern branch of the Red Sea in only two other texts (1 Kings 9.26; Jer. 49.21). Most contemporary scholars, and a few modern translations (e.g., NJV), therefore prefer to translate the phrase "Reed Sea" or "Sea of Reeds" (see NRSV textual notes).

The record of Israel's miraculous crossing is a complex one. According to what has been taken as the more ancient stratum of Exodus 14.21–22, perhaps from *J, "The Lord drove the Sea back by a strong east wind all night, and turned the sea into dry land." Another stratum, possibly from *P, reads: "Then Moses stretched out his hand over the sea . . . and the waters were divided. The Israelites went into the sea on dry ground, the waters forming a wall for them on their right and on their left," after which the waters enveloped the Egyptians. A third version, perhaps from *E (14.24–25), reads, "At the morning watch the Lord in the pillar of fire and cloud looked down upon the Egyptian army, and threw the Egyptian army into panic. He clogged their chariot wheels so they turned with difficulty. The Egyptians said: 'Let us flee from the Israelites, for the Lord is fighting for them against Egypt.' " In the first case we have a natural event, where the miracle lies in the synchronism of natural forces; in the second we deal with a miracle in the absolute sense, so that any explanation is immaterial; in the third we have neither water nor a miracle proper; the Egyptians realize that something is going wrong and withdraw. A variant of the second version is found in chap. 15. Any connection with volcanic or seismic phenomena should therefore be excluded.

The term "Sea of Reeds" or "Reed Sea" seems to mean a marshy area or a large body of water abundant in reeds in the eastern delta. One possible localization of the event, among the many that have been proposed, is Lake Sirbonis (Map 2:R–S1), where, depending on the tides, fresh water and saltwater can be found; another is the swampy region in the vicinity of the "Bitter Lakes" (Map 2:R2). We must remember, however, that we are dealing here, as in the desert wanderings, with mythical data (see Ps. 114.3–6), so with few exceptions, the localities mentioned cannot and perhaps should not be identified. J. A. SOGGIN

Reed Sea. See Red Sea.

Refuge, Cities of. See Cities of Refuge.

Regeneration. Regeneration has played a larger role in theology than would be expected from its scant use in the Bible. In the King James Version, it is used at Matthew 19.28 and Titus 3.5 to translate the Greek paliggenesia, which occurs only in these two passages and literally means "rebirth." The RSV interprets the first occurrence by translating "new world," and NRSV uses "renewal" for the first and "rebirth" for the second.

The concept of a new creation is found in passages such as Isaiah 65.17; 66.22; Rev. 21.1; and it is this hope to which Matthew 19.28 alludes. Just as after the corruption of the first creation by human sin, God destroyed it and created a new world (Gen. 6–9), so apocalyptic writers looked for a similar renewal following divine judgment (see also 2 Cor. 5.17; Gal. 6.15).

The language of birth is applied to this renewal in the New Testament, as in Romans 8.22 (cf. 1 Pet. 1.3). Elsewhere the image of being born again is related to *baptism by water and by the Spirit (John 3.3–8; Titus 3.5).

DOUGLAS R. A. HARE

Religion. Narrowly understood, religion means actions, especially cultic or ceremonial, that express reverence for the gods. The usual Greek word for this is thrēskeia, which can also have a negative sense when used of deviant or suspect cults. The word is rare in the *Septuagint, and is never used to translate a Hebrew original. It is applied to idolatrous worship in Wisdom of Solomon 14.18, 27, but to Jewish worship in 4 Maccabees 5.6, 13 and Acts 26.5, as well as by *Josephus. (A Greek word with similar connotations is used of Judaism in Acts 25.19, and of the Athenian cult of the *unknown god in Acts 17.22.) Thrēskeia is also rare in the New Testament. In Colossians, the "worship of angels" is condemned (2.18; cf. 2.23), but the letter of *James speaks of "pure religion" (1.27), perhaps implying a contrast between the expression of religion in cultic forms and its expression in acts of charity and self-control.

More broadly, religion involves a complex of faith and conduct. For this the common Greek term is eusebeia, "piety," that is, reverence for the gods and for the social or moral order, which they uphold. This term is also rare in most of the Septuagint, though in Proverbs 1.7 and Isaiah 11.2 it translates "fear of the Lord." Ben Sira writes of the "godly" (Sir. 11.17 [NRSV: devout]; 37.12), using the adjective eusebēs, and the whole word group is frequent in the Hellenized 4 *Maccabees. In the New Testament, the related words are used in Acts, especially of the "god-fearer" Cornelius and his household (10.2, 7, 22), but elsewhere the language is confined to the *Pastoral Letters and 2 *Peter. In the Pastorals it is related to correct belief (e.g., 1 Tim. 3.16; 6.3; Titus 1.1), and in both to a way of life deemed to result from Christian belief (e.g., 1 Tim. 2.2, 10; 5.4; 2 Pet. 1.5–7; 3.11). In neither is it directly associated with acts of worship.

Theological conclusions are sometimes drawn from this linguistic evidence. The relative rarity of words for "religion" in the Bible, and the confining of the broader terms to what are generally considered the latest writings of the New Testament, has been used to argue that "religion," with its connotations of outward activity or generalized piety, is inappropriate language to use of ancient Israel or of earliest Christianity. "Faith," as the inner response to God's call, would be more proper. To use the term "religion" of the *Pentateuch is, however, appropriate, since there the correct performance of cultic activity, as well as ethical duty, is essential in Israel's response to God. In the New Testament there is no comparable concern with the correct performance of ritual acts, but it is clear that both *Jesus and *Paul expected that a new way of living would result from acceptance of their teaching. SOPHIE LAWS Remnant. The various terms used to express the concept of remnant in the Bible represent two closely linked ideas. On the one hand, the word indicates those who are "left over" after some great catastrophe; on the other, those who have "escaped" the disaster and are able to continue the community's life. In a theological sense, the emphasis can fall primarily either on God's judgment on his sinful people or on his *mercy in still preserving a nucleus of them as a hope for the future, and these differing emphases are reflected in various biblical writers.

Perhaps the earliest occurrence of the idea is in the *Flood story (Gen. 7.23), where the stress is on the scale of the judgment, although with the implication that the survivors will constitute a new beginning. But it is with the prophets that the concept of remnant is really developed. In *Amos, the remnant is above all the hopeless residue of the nation's utter destruction (Amos 3.12; 5.3), although there is a faint hint that repentance may yet avert the fullness of judgment (Amos 5.15).

It is in the book of *Isaiah that the idea of remnant assumes particular prominence. In the basic message of the prophet, it is a sign of doom (Isa. 10.19; 17.5–6), and the name of his son, "a remnant shall return" (Isa. 7.3), originally signified the same. However, in what are probably postexilic supplements, the remnant is the group that returns to God and so embodies hope for the future (Isa. 10.20–21), where the son's name is reinterpreted (11.11–16). This group consists of the "needy," who trust in God alone (Isa. 14.32), as is most clearly brought out in *Zephaniah (2.3; 3.12). *Jeremiah and *Ezekiel display the same phenomenon as Isaiah, the remnant as evidence of utter destruction (Jer. 8.3; Ezek. 14.21–23) but also as a promise of a future hope (Jer. 23.3; Ezek. 11.13–20).

Hence those who survived the *exile identified themselves as the remnant (Ezra 9.15). But, in the postexilic period, dissident groups emerged, such as the *Qumran community, who saw themselves as the true remnant to be vindicated at the end (e.g., 2 Esd. 12.34). So Paul, in the long argument of *Romans 9–11, citing biblical prophecies, concludes that the Jews who follow Christ are the remnant of Israel, "chosen by grace" (Rom. 11.5). J. R. PORTER

Repentance. Sincere contrition, involving acknowledgment of wrongdoing in the sense of both admitting guilt and feeling guilty (Lev. 5.5, 17; 6.4). The sinner might signal repentance through *fasting, weeping, rending garments, and donning sackcloth and ashes (2 Sam. 12.13–17; Jon. 3.5–10). Such emotional and even public acknowledgment of prior wrongdoing is but the first step toward forgiveness: remorse must be accompanied by resolve to cease doing wrong and do what is right (Isa. 1.17–18, 27; Amos 5.14–15). In biblical idiom, the sinner is called on to "circumcise the heart" (Deut. 30.6; Jer. 4.4), "wash the heart" (Jer. 4.14), or become "single-hearted" (Jer. 32.39); to make a new heart (Ezek. 18.31), a heart of flesh, not stone (Ezek. 36.26). These ideas are summed up in the great prophetic concept šûb, "turn" (cf. rabbinic tĕšûbâ, "repentance"), meaning both a turning from *sin and a returning to right action, *Torah, and God.

From the earliest biblical narratives through the Roman destruction of Jerusalem in 70 CE, Jewish ideas of repentance were allied to the great system of *sacrifice detailed in the Torah and centered especially in the Temple cult. Rites of communal and national repentance were enacted on the *Day of Atonement; but at any time penitent individuals could make offerings at the Temple to atone for transgressions. Full repentance for voluntary wrongdoing against one's *neighbor required, beyond remorse, restitution (plus, where pertinent, one-fifth more of the value of the thing restored, Lev. 6.5). Only then could one make the Temple offering for remission of sin. Sources stress that these offerings did not effect atonement automatically: the sinner's inner repentance is the necessary precondition of forgiveness (see Philo, Special Laws 1.234–38; Josephus, Ant. 3.9.232; cf. Matt. 5.24–25).

In the *Septuagint, metanoia and metanoeō (literally, "a change of mind") often express "repentance" and "repent," and both appear frequently in the New Testament. Mark's Jesus begins his ministry with a call for repentance in the face of the coming *kingdom of God (1.14; cf. Matt. 3.2, where the call is transposed to *John the Baptist). Luke presents Jesus' mission as particularly a call to sinners to repent in order to receive forgiveness (e.g., 5.32).

Paul scarcely speaks of repentance at all in his letters, but his audiences were for the most part *gentiles who, unlike Jews, were under no obligation to live and worship according to the Torah. Hence Paul summons these gentiles to God: they are called not to "repent" as such, that is, to return, but to turn (Grk. epistrephō) for the first time. This term appears in prophetic passages both in the Septuagint and in Hellenistic Jewish literature as the anticipated response of the nations once the God of Israel reveals himself in glory at the end of days (Tobit 14.6; cf. 1 Thess. 1.9–10). In the context of Christianity, the "turning from" idols meant a "turning to" Christ, and so epistrephō comes to mean "to convert" (e.g., Acts 15.3); see Conversion.

Christian thinkers eventually expressed an elaborate theology of atonement and expiation for sin centering around the sacrifice of Christ, yet the emphasis on the importance of individual repentance remained. In his commentary on Paul's letter to the Romans, written in 395 CE, Augustine observed that the only sin against the Holy Spirit that could never be forgiven is despair. Despair, he argued, inhibits repentance; if one does not repent, he cannot repudiate his sin and so be forgiven. In taking this position, Augustine came close to the view of the rabbis: "Let the sinner repent, and he will find atonement" (y. Mak. 2:7, 31d). PAULA FREDRIKSEN

Rephaim. In several biblical texts (e.g., Isa. 26.14; Prov. 2.18) dead "shades" (NRSV) who inhabit the underworld; in other texts a race of fearsome giants who once lived in parts of Palestine and Transjordan (e.g., Deut. 2.20; 3.11, 13; Josh. 12.4; 13.12). Scholars have in the past considered these two meanings distinct, but texts from *Ugarit suggest they may be related. At Ugarit Rephaim most often refers to members of the aristocracy (military, political, or religious) who, as a result of their status while alive, attain some sort of superhuman, even semidivine, standing in the underworld. The probable etymology of Rephaim, from the verb meaning "to heal," also suggests that these dead Rephaim were thought to have power to help the living. The term Rephaim in the Bible likewise may refer to those among the deceased (e.g., the ancestral giants) who demonstrated extraordinary prowess during life and continue to exercise some sort of power after death. Notable in this regard is Isaiah 14.9, where the Rephaim of the underworld are described as those "who were leaders of the earth" and those "who were kings of the nations."

See also Nephilim. SUSAN ACKERMAN

Resurrection of Christ.

Biblical Background. In all but the latest parts of the Hebrew Bible, the concept of resurrection was applied not to the life of the individual after death but metaphorically to the renewal of Israel corporately after the return from *exile (see Isa. 26.19; Ezek. 37.1–14, where the resurrection language, especially in v. 13, is clearly metaphorical). In *apocalyptic literature, beginning with Daniel 12.2, resurrection language is applied literally, denoting coming to life again after death through an act of God in a transcendental mode of existence beyond history. This new existence, however, is not conceived in an individualistic fashion; it is the elect people of God (Dan. 12.1) who are corporately resurrected. The transcendental character of this resurrection life is indicated by such similes as "shine like the brightness of the sky" (Dan. 12.3).

*Jesus proclaimed the *kingdom of God, a concept couched in apocalyptic terms and involving a new cosmic order. It was to arrive shortly; God was already at work in Jesus' ministry to bring it about. Jesus' proclamation thus implied impending corporate resurrection of the people of God, or at least of those who responded positively to his message. In the controversy with the *Sadducees, Jesus used a simile reminiscent of Daniel 12.3 to describe the transcendental character of the resurrection life; the resurrection will be "like angels in heaven" (Mark 12.25). Critical scholarship regards the predictions by Jesus of his own resurrection (Mark 8.31; etc.) as creations of the post-Easter community after the event. Since, however, Jesus' preaching of the kingdom implied resurrection, there can be no question that he foresaw the corporate resurrection of God's people as lying beyond his own death (Mark 14.25). But there is nothing in his authentic preaching to suggest that he expected an individual resurrection for himself.

The Easter Event. It is in this framework that the Easter event should be understood. Jesus appeared alive to his disciples after his *crucifixion. The earliest record of these appearances is to be found in 1 Corinthians 15.3–7, a tradition that *Paul "received" after his apostolic call, certainly not later than his visit to Jerusalem in 35 CE, when he saw Cephas (Peter) and James (Gal. 1.18–19), who, like him, were recipients of appearances. The early community adopted three models to interpret this fact: rapture, resurrection, and exaltation. According to the first model, Jesus was "taken up" (Acts 1.11; Luke 9.51; Mark 16.19) or "received" in heaven (Acts 3.21; see Ascension of Christ). According to the second, God "raised Jesus from the dead" (1 Cor. 15.4, where the passive "was raised" is a divine passive denoting an act of God; cf. Acts 2.24). The third model, exaltation, is found by itself, without a preceding reference to the resurrection, in a pre-Pauline hymn (Phil. 2.6–11). The letter to the Hebrews operates almost exclusively with the exaltation model (a reference to the resurrection occurs only in the benediction at Heb. 13.20). In Acts, exaltation occurs in combination with resurrection (2.32–33; 5.30–31). In John, the exaltation language is applied both to death and to resurrection (3.14; etc.). Of these three models, resurrection is the one that proved most persistent; it either absorbed or replaced the others. Its advantage was that it brought out the corporate and cosmic significance of the Easter event. Jesus was raised by God as the first and determinative instance of the resurrection of the elect people of God and the renewal of the whole cosmos (1 Cor. 15.20, 23). His resurrection will make possible all the other resurrections that will occur at the end.

The resurrection, while a real event according to the unanimous testimony of the New Testament, is not historical in the sense that ordinary events are. It occurs at the point where history ends and God's end-time kingdom begins. And it is not in itself an observable occurrence. No one saw God raise Jesus from the dead. Nor can it be verified. In a sense, it is an inference from the disciples' Easter visions (and to a lesser degree from the empty tomb; see below).

The Easter Traditions. The early community, beyond asserting in its proclamation that God raised Jesus, further organized the appearances in lists (1 Cor. 15.3–8; cf. Mark 16.7; Luke 24.34). It did not at this stage tell stories of the appearances, probably because the recipients found themselves at a loss to find language to express the ineffable (as is probably the case with Paul). The word "appeared" denotes a visionary experience, for the same word is used of angelic appearances (Luke 1.11). On the other hand, the appearances are not to be downgraded as mere subjective experiences or hallucinations. The word "appeared" denotes a disclosure from God in heaven. The most accurate description of the appearances would be "revelatory encounters." They revealed Jesus as alive.

The appearances had several effects. First, they restored the disciples' faith and hope in Jesus (cf. Luke 24.21, which accurately captures the mood of the disciples after Good Friday). Second, this faith was expressed by means of christological titles: God had vindicated Jesus and made him Lord and *Messiah (Acts 2.36). Having deserted Jesus at his arrest, the disciples were now reassembled and welded into a community that soon described itself as the *church, that is, God's end-time people. Third, their Easter faith impelled them to embark on a mission, first to Israel, and ultimately to the *gentile world. Fourth, the leaders of the mission became *apostles, which is to say, envoys, sent ones.

Alongside the lists of appearances there existed a story of the empty tomb (Mark 16.1–8 par.). This story apparently was part of the passion narrative, and functioned as the framework for the angelic proclamation of the resurrection at the conclusion of the reading of the passion during the Christian *passover. Its presence in at least two traditions (Mark/Matthew and John; behind the Lucan account there may lie yet another independent version) indicates that the basic nucleus of the tradition, that certain women discovered Jesus' empty tomb on the Sunday after his death, is very early, despite its absence from Paul. There is also indication that the disciples verifed the women's discovery (Luke 24.12, 24; John 20.3–10). Probably this followed the disciples' return to Jerusalem, after their visions in *Galilee; they must have welcomed the empty tomb as congruous with the Easter faith, which they had already arrived at through the visions. The empty tomb did not create the Easter faith, and in any case it is in itself an ambiguous fact, susceptible of other explanations alluded to in the New Testament itself (e.g., Matt. 27.64; John 20.15). The Gospels, however, are at pains to insist that the women took note of the tomb on Good Friday evening, and therefore did not go to the wrong tomb on Easter morning (Mark 15.47 par.).

Appearance Stories. *Mark, generally regarded as the earliest Gospel, originally contained no appearance stories, but merely pointed forward to subsequent appearances in Galilee (16.7). Appearance stories seem to have grown up as isolated units (pericopes), like the bulk of the gospel material. Inevitably, what was originally indescribable came to be described in earthly terms. The risen Christ talked, walked, and even ate with the disciples, as he had while on earth (Matt. 28; Luke 24; John 20; 21; Mark 16.9–20). Clearly, the only way the postapostolic community could construct appearance stories was to model them on the stories from the earthly ministry. These stores were more than simple narratives, though. They were expressions of the impact of the appearances, as they were first experienced by the original recipients and as the community subsequently came to understand them. This impact is expressed in the words attributed to the risen one. They include a missionary charge, a command to baptize, a promise of abiding presence or the gift of the Spirit, instruction about the fulfillment of biblical promises in his death and resurrection, the assurance of his presence in the breaking of the bread, and finally the hope of his coming again. The church and its whole faith and life are seen to have originated in the Easter event.

A particularly acute problem is created by the portrayal of the physical reality of the Lord's risen body in some of the later stories. This seems to run counter to the earlier tradition (see above), to Pauline teaching on the nature of the postresurrectional existence (1 Cor. 15.35–49), and to the categorical statement in 1 Corinthians 15.50. We must ask, however, what exactly these narratives are saying. Their purpose is to assert that, in the resurrection, Jesus did not leave his earthly life behind but took it with him. As a result, his whole "being for us," which characterized his earthly ministry and which culminated on the cross, are forever present and available to us. The wounds of the nails and the hole in his side are still there in the risen body (John 20.20, 24–29). These stories are not to be dismissed merely as later materializations, for they convey important truths about the resurrection. In the risen one, the incarnate, earthly, crucified one, with all the saving benefits that result from his being in the flesh, is present for us.

The Resurrection of Believers. With all the concentration of the later Easter narratives upon the personal fate of Jesus, it must never be forgotten that resurrection is a corporate event. Jesus was raised as the firstfruits. Believers share in his resurrection initially through *baptism. Paul is very cautious about this: believers share his death but their resurrection is conditional upon their present obedience and will not be complete until the parousia or *second coming (Rom. 6.3–11; 1 Thess. 4.15–17; see also Biblical Theology, article on New Testament).

The deutero-Pauline *Colossians and *Ephesians are less cautious. Colossians asserts that we are already risen with Christ through baptism, though this risen state carries with it present moral responsibilities and its full consummation is not realized until the end (Col. 3.1–4), while in Ephesians believers are already raised to life and made to sit at Christ's right hand in heavenly places (Eph. 2.5–6). Ethical obedience is still required in Ephesians, as the exhortation in chaps. 4–6 shows, and there is still a final consummation (Eph. 4.13). Similarly, the Fourth Gospel teaches that resurrection and eternal life are already realized for believers (John 5.24; etc.), though here again there is a future consummation to be awaited (John 6.39; etc.). The corporate and cosmic dimensions of resurrection are thus never completely lost in the New Testament.

See also Afterlife and Immortality; Easter.

REGINALD H. FULLER

Reuben. The firstborn son of *Jacob and *Leah and one of the twelve *tribes of Israel (Gen. 29.32). Reuben's primogeniture indicates that in early Israel Reuben was a preeminent tribe (Gen. 46.8–9; Exod. 6.14–16). Reuben is guilty of incest with his mother's concubine Bilhah (Gen. 35.22) and is prominent in the rebellion against *Moses (Num. 16.1); the former is blamed for Reuben's later decline (Gen. 49.3–4; 1 Chron. 5.1–2). The Reubenites, together with Gad, settle in the Transjordan (Num 32.25–38). An early manuscript of the books of Samuel among the *Dead Sea Scrolls mentions Reuben and *Gad's subjugation by Nahash, king of the *Ammonites, elucidating *Saul's deliverance of Jabesh-gilead (1 Samuel 10.27). Scholars disagree whether Reuben was absorbed into Gad during the divided monarchy (2 Kings 10.33) or retained its identity (1 Chron. 5.22) until the *Assyrian conquest (732 BCE).

GARY N. KNOPPERS

Revelation. Revelation has to do with disclosing, uncovering, or unveiling what previously was hidden, making known what had been secret. Sometimes the biblical terms for revelation have common usages (Ezek. 13.14; 16.36, 57; Isa. 47.3; Exod. 20.26). When used theologically, however, revelation refers to God's deliberate manifestation of his plans, his character, and himself.

The Israelites were not alone in their desire to discern divine mysteries. Other ancient Near Eastern peoples sought to discover the wills of their gods, and many diverse methods were employed to this end. Looking for omens in the universe, astrologers considered the movements of sun, moon, and stars when making predictions. Significance could be found in ordinary positions of heavenly bodies, but extraordinary occurrences such as eclipses were especially noteworthy. Similarly, usual natural phenomena like the movements of birds, animals, or clouds could be interpreted, but so could the unusual, like floods, plagues, or babies born with defects. Animals were cut open so that their entrails might be examined, the livers of sheep being subject to special scrutiny. Distinguishing features such as the shape of the liver would portend future events. Certain individuals were trained to read and analyze these omens. Others were skilled in the interpretation of visions and *dreams. Sometimes people consulted the deity by casting lots: they threw bones or stones on the ground as dice are thrown today. The way they landed signified certain things. Prophecy also was practiced; gods would give oracles through human messengers, whether cultic functionaries or otherwise. Mediums were consulted to summon spirits from the underworld. Similar practices are attested in the Greco-Roman world. (See Magic and Divination.)

Some of the above were allowed in Israel, while others were not. The God of the Bible is one who hides himself (Isa. 45.15). There is a boundary between God and humanity, and between what God knows and what humans may know. Some things are to remain secret while others are revealed (Deut. 29.29). This line cannot be crossed, nor should humans attempt to cross it. Therefore, certain occult avenues to the transcendent were closed. *Witchcraft, necromancy, augury, soothsaying, and sorcery were forbidden to the Israelites (Lev. 19.26, 31; Deut. 18.10–12). Sometimes God revealed to his messengers secrets that could not be transmitted to others (2 Cor. 12.4), and sometimes knowledge was given which was to remain sealed until a later time (Isa. 8.16; 30.8; Dan. 12.4, 9); otherwise, the revelations were transmitted to successive generations in perpetuity (Deut. 29.29).

Knowledge of God may be gained from the natural world. *Creation implies a creator; therefore, something of the existence and power of God can be grasped by observing the universe (Ps. 19.1–6; Acts 14.8–18; 17.16–34; Rom. 1.18–32; 2.12–16). But this means of information is limited, and other ways are therefore required.

Sometimes revelation is through God's actions in history. This might involve direct intervention, as when he delivered his people from Egypt (Exod. 3.20; Deut. 26.5–9; see Exodus, The), or it might be more indirect, as when he used the *Assyrians (Isa. 10.5–6) and *Babylonians (Hab. 1.5–6) to punish them. In either case, the history can be ambiguous—hence the need for someone to interpret the ways of God to the people, a need filled in part by *prophets. God communicated verbally to his prophets (Deut. 18.15–19), and, according to Amos 3.7, he would not do anything without first revealing it to his human messengers.

Concerning the content of revelation, God makes known his plans, as when he told *Noah he was about to destroy the world in a *flood (Gen. 6.13–14); or when he disclosed to *Abraham that he was about to destroy *Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen. 18.16–33). He gave Daniel and John visions of the end of the world (Dan. 10.14; Rev. 21.1–5). He also reveals his nature, as when he declared his name to *Moses, proclaiming that he is Yahweh, merciful and compassionate, yet holding the guilty responsible (Exod. 34.6–7); or as when he revealed himself to Isaiah as the Holy One of Israel (Isa. 6.1–5).

Regarding modes of revelation, sometimes the casting of lots was employed: to choose a king (1 Sam. 10), or to choose a disciple to replace Judas (Acts 1.24–26). A special type of lot was the priestly *Urim and Thummim (Deut. 33.8; 1 Sam. 14.36–42; 28.6). God also communicated through visions (1 Kings 22.17–23), auditions (1 Sam. 3.1–14; Isa. 22.14), *dreams (Gen. 28.10–17), the interpretation of dreams (Gen. 40–41; Dan. 2; 10.1), and *angels (Judg. 13.15–20). Sometimes the text simply says that God revealed himself, as when he appeared to *Jacob (Gen. 35.7, 9) or *Samuel (1 Sam. 3.21). While some passages assert that no one can see God and live (Exod. 33.20), it seems that God appeared in human form to Abraham (Gen. 18.1–19.1), and Jacob wrestled with God (Gen. 32.24–30). One tradition has it that Moses saw only the back parts of God (Exod. 33.21–23) but others aver that God spoke to him "mouth to mouth" (Num. 12.8) or "face to face" (Deut. 34.10). Sometimes one can prepare oneself to receive revelation by waiting in a holy place (1 Sam. 3.2–4) or by playing *music (2 Kings 3.15).

In the New Testament revelation centers on Jesus Christ. For Matthew, Jesus controls the knowledge of God absolutely: "No one knows the Father except the Son and anyone to whom the Son chooses to reveal him" (Matt. 11.27). While many opinions abounded about who Jesus was, *Simon Peter recognized that Jesus was the *Messiah and the *Son of God. In response, Jesus told Peter that this insight did not have a human source; rather it came to him by divine revelation (Matt. 16.17).

Jesus often taught in *parables. This was partly, no doubt, to use common things around him such as plant seed and different types of soil to illustrate the truths of the *kingdom of God. But another reason may have been to conceal those truths from those who were not serious about following him. He offered the parables publicly but explained their meanings privately to his inner circle of disciples (Matt. 13.10–17, 34–35; Mark 4.10–12). (See Messianic Secret.)

John calls Jesus "the Word" because he is the complete revelation of God (John 1.1; see Logos). The *word of God came to the prophets, especially Moses (John 1.17), but now the Word has become a human being (John 1.17). Only Jesus, the Son of God, the very Word of God, has seen God; now that he has taken on flesh, he has fully explained God to the rest of humanity (John 1.18). To know Jesus is to know God (John 14.9). Likewise, the letter to the Hebrews acknowledges that God previously revealed himself in various ways, but that history of revelation has culminated in Jesus (Heb. 1.1–2).

When Jesus departed from the earth, according to John, the *Holy Spirit was sent to the Church to continue the revelatory function of the Son (John 14.25–26; 16.12–15; 1 John 2.20, 26–27; 3.24). Paul concurs. Things never before known have now been revealed by the Spirit to the church. The Spirit of God, who fully comprehends the depths of the knowledge of God, lives inside the Christian believers so that it may be said that they have the mind of Christ (1 Cor. 2.9–16).

In the early church, certain individuals were considered to be endowed with spiritual gifts, such as utterances of knowledge, utterances of wisdom, revelation, and prophecy (1 Cor. 12.8, 10; 14.26). When the New Testament *canon was completed, these special charisms became less important. Emphasis shifted to the interpretation of existing revelation. Sporadically throughout the history of Christianity, there have been those who claimed to have personal revelations. The orthodox churches have always tested these by and subordinated them to scripture. The Roman Catholic church has allowed that new revelation also exists in the form of church tradition and is as binding as scripture, while Protestants consider the Bible to be the sole *authority.

In Judaism there have been similar developments. Toward the end of the biblical period, the Jewish community came to be less interested in new revelation and more interested in studying the books that had already achieved authoritative status. There was a belief that when the messianic age arrived, it would be accompanied by new revelation, but in the meantime prophecies, visions, and dreams were not to be trusted. The oral law in Judaism is somewhat akin to church tradition in Catholicism in that it is a later elaboration of the Bible yet is also a form of revelation and hence authoritative.

See also Inspiration and Inerrancy.

WILLIAM B. NELSON, JR.

Revelation, The Book of.

Content and Structures. The book calls itself an *apocalypse (1.1) or revelation, which Jesus gave, for his servants, through his angel to John, but it begins in letter form, "John to the seven churches that are in Asia, grace to you and peace" (1.4), and ends like a Pauline letter with the "grace" (22.21). The risen Christ appears to John on the island of Patmos, off the coast of the Roman province of *Asia, and orders him to write to the *seven churches (chaps. 2 and 3); the messages warn the complacent and the worldly, and encourage the faithful. Summoned up into heaven, John sees God enthroned, holding a sealed scroll no one can open. He hears that the lion of the tribe of *Judah has won the right to open it, and he sees standing by the throne a *lamb bearing the marks of sacrificial slaughter (chaps. 4 and 5).

The Lamb's opening of the seals unleashes the first of three series of disasters, which represent God's wrath against an idolatrous and impenitent world: seven seals opened (6; 8.1), seven trumpets blown (chaps. 8 and 9), and seven bowls poured out (chap. 16). Symbolic visions in between depict the opposing forces in cosmic war, which comes to a climax in chap. 19: the Lamb and the 144,000 who bear his name and God's seal, over against the seven-headed beast, Satan's emissary (the *Antichrist), and those who bear his mark. The beast's city, *Babylon, the "great whore," is destroyed, the beast is defeated, *Satan is bound and the *saints reign for a thousand years (the millennium), until Satan is released for his final assault (19.11–20.10). Then follows God's judgment of the world, and a new heaven and earth replace the old. The holy city, *Jerusalem, the bride, comes down from God, and all earth's splendor is gathered into it.

It is a bewildering kaleidoscope of scenes, punctuated by voices and bursts of heavenly hymnody. Scholars have seen a variety of structural patterns, based on liturgy (Jewish or Christian), or drama (each city had its theater), or astrology or numerology (both staple diet for first-century folk). Each suggestion may contain some truth, but none has won general assent. The clearest structural element is the four series of seven (letters, seals, trumpets, bowls). The background for this structure is the apocalyptic discourse of Jesus on the Mount of Olives (Matt. 24; Mark 13; Luke 21), of which John's apocalypse may be seen as an updating.

Outline.

Chaps. 1–3. Seven letters warning against deception and lawlessness (cf. Matt. 24.4, 5, 9–12)

Chaps. 4–7. Seven seals on a heavenly scroll, opened by the Lamb

- 6 War, famine, plague (Matt. 24.6–8; birthpangs of the new age)
- 7 God's servants sealed: 144,000

Chaps. 8–14. Seven trumpets of warning

- 8–9 Disasters modeled on the *plagues of Egypt (Exod. 7–11)
- 10–11 Counterpoint of witness (the little scroll)
- 12–13 Victory in heaven, disaster for earth—Antichrist and false prophet (Matt. 24.15–24)
- 14 The 144,000 over against worshipers of the beast. Judgment Chaps. 15–22. Seven bowls of God's final wrath

- 16 Disasters for the beast's worshipers and city (Exod. 7–11 again)
- 17–18 Destruction of the whore, Babylon
- 19–20 Coming of Christ, the millennium, and the last judgment (Matt. 24.27–31)
- 21 Descent of the bride, New Jerusalem, in counterpoint with the fall of Babylon (17.1 and 21.9)

In the three series of disasters there is both recapitulation—each covers the same ground—and development. The seals serve as overture, centering on the "beginning of the birthpangs" (Matt. 24.8). The trumpets lead up to the "desolating sacrilege" (Matt. 24.15), Rome and its emperor. The bowls set out their destruction and the "coming of the Son of Man" (Matt. 24.27)—bridegroom and bride over against beast and harlot.

Two further structural points are important for interpreting the book. Enclosing the scenes of destruction are the visions of God, creator and redeemer (chaps. 4 and 5), and of the new creation (chap. 21): the destructions are not simply negative; the rebelliousness of earth is finally overcome. Enclosing all the visions is the epistolary opening and ending: the whole disclosure is a message to Christians of the day in their particular situations. Scattered among the visions are calls for discernment and fidelity (13.9, 10, 18; 14.12; 16.15; 17.9).

This analysis suggests that the aim of John's revelation was to warn the churches against compromise with the religious, social, and economic values of a world heading for self-destruction because of its idolatry, and to encourage them in the witness to God and purity of life which alone could defeat the deceptions of Satan and his minions. The letters to the churches show that some were sliding into a worldly lifestyle (2.14, 20), while others were asleep (3.2), complacent (3.17), or lacking in love (2.4). There is wholehearted praise only for Smyrna (2.8–11) and Philadelphia (3.7–13), where faithful Christians were suffering on behalf of Christ.

Recipients. At first sight, John is writing to seven particular congregations; many other cities in the Roman province of Asia are known to have had Christians (see Acts 19.10, 26; 1 Cor. 16.19; 2 Cor. 1.8). But seven is the number symbolic of wholeness (see below), and these churches probably represent the whole church. The seven cities were all centers of communication, set on a circular route beginning at *Ephesus, the nearest to Patmos. The writer knows the geography and traditions of each city, and clearly is acquainted with the circumstances of each church. But the particular warnings and encouragements add up to a message for all the churches (2.23; cf. 22.16), and he claims divine authority for his book (22.18, 19).

What kind of Christians were they? The warnings against Nicolaitans and others who teach Christians to "eat food sacrificed to idols and practice fornication" (2.6, 14–15, 20) remind us of issues at *Corinth (1 Cor. 6.12–20; 8; 10.14–30). Later writers connected the Nicolaitans with *gnosticism. It looks as if there was an influential movement for compromise with the world, based perhaps on Pauline teaching about Christian freedom and the divine mandate of the state (Rom. 13.1–7), and on gnostic belief in present spiritual salvation to which behavior in the material world is irrelevant. The emphasis on Christ's imminent coming may be directed against an assumption that eternal life is already here, which might have been drawn from the teaching of the Fourth Gospel. *Paul, and later the apostle John according to tradition, had both been active at Ephesus. The book seems to be recalling Christians to the apostolic standard; there is perhaps an echo of the decree of the *Apostolic Council (Acts 15.28) in the letter to Thyatira (2.24).

Situation and Date. Irenaeus (ca. 180 CE), who came from Asia and had known Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna (ca. 70–150 CE), and others of his generation, dated the book of Revelation toward the end of the reign of Domitian (81–96 CE; cf. Against the Heresies 5.30.3, as usually interpreted). The picture of the *Antichrist reflects popular belief that Nero, who had stabbed himself in the throat, would return from the dead (13.3, 12, 14), and many scholars see Revelation as a response to the enforcement on Christians of Domitian's demand for worship as "Lord and God." But the evidence that he persecuted the church, as opposed to a few individuals who may or may not have been Christians, dissolves on inspection, and the letters to the churches reveal no state persecution, only Jewish "slander" (2.9; 3.9). The only martyr mentioned is Antipas (2.13—referring to a past event), and the general picture is of affluence and complacency.

On the other hand, Nero's mysterious death evoked immediate rumors that he was still alive, and would return with an army from the east; and the civil wars that followed his death (68–69 CE, the Year of Four Emperors), coinciding with the Jewish War (66–70 CE), seem to lie behind the breakup of the Roman world depicted in chaps. 6–18. Consequently, some scholars date Revelation about 68–70 CE: the intensity of hatred against Rome (17.6; 18.24; 19.2) does at first seem to demand a date close to the fire at Rome (64 CE) and Nero's massacre of Christians (Tacitus Annals 15.44). Irenaeus's date is open to question.

There is an apparent clue to the date in the interpretation of the beast's seven heads as emperors, "of whom five have fallen" (17.7–11), but in fact there is no telling which emperor the series starts with, and seven is probably again symbolic. The seven heads represent the empire as a whole, and the beast that "ascends from the bottomless pit" is "an eighth, but belongs to the seven"; it is the quintessence of imperial power, latent now but soon to be revealed in its true colors.

But this is not yet. The present is a time when the beast-like character of the empire is out of sight. In the Roman province of Asia, the Flavian emperors (Vespasian and his sons, Titus and Domitian) were popular, being efficient and generous administrators. Inscriptions hail them as "savior," "benefactor," "son of God," and there was a local zeal for the emperor cult. So Irenaeus's date in fact fits the evidence from the letters well: a time of patriotic enthusiasm, expressed in terms of religious veneration, from which Christians were not holding aloof. There was as yet no state compulsion for ordinary people to take part in the emperor cult, as long as they kept clear of law courts and the taking of oaths. Pliny's letter to the Emperor Trajan (ca. 112 CE; Letters 10.96), about people being accused of being Christians in the neighboring province of Bithynia, shows the danger; once accused they had the choice either of cursing Christ, worshiping the gods, and praying to the emperor's statue, or of cruel execution. Trajan agreed, but said they should not be sought out. So if Christians did not provoke their neighbors by active witness and by nonparticipation in the ordinary social and patriotic decencies, then they would come to no harm. But in John's view they would be buying temporal safety at the cost of eternal loss (14.9–11). The chief threat to the church was not physical danger, as at Smyrna, but social, economic, and religious temptation. Its chief need was discernment: "let anyone who has an ear listen to what the Spirit is saying to the churches" (2.7, 11; 13.9).

Author and Sources. Irenaeus and most later writers assumed that the author was the *John who wrote the Gospel and letters, and that he was the son of Zebedee. But some, like Dionysius of Alexandria (third century), anticipated the majority of modern scholars by questioning this identification because of differences of thought, style, and language. Dionysius relied on hints that there had been two writers named John in Ephesus; and Papias (ca. 140 CE) mentions a John who was an *elder, as well as the apostle.

Another possibility is that Revelation is pseudonymous, claiming a great figure of the past as author, like much other *apocalyptic literature. There is a later tradition that the apostle John was martyred as his brother *James had been (Acts 12.2; cf. Mark 10.39; Matt. 20.23, which may be the source of the tradition); as one of the inner circle, associated as he was with Jesus at the Transfiguration and on the Mount of Olives (Mark 13.3), he would have been a good figurehead for an apocalypse calling Christians to face martyrdom. If it was published ca. 95 CE, its later acceptance as genuine could have given rise to the widely held belief that John lived to a great age in Ephesus.

But the evidence for John's martyrdom is flimsy, and if "John" is a fiction, it is odd that no capital is made out of it; the author is simply "your brother," and mentions the twelve *apostles of the Lamb (21.14) without hint that he is one of them. The only status he claims is, by implication, that of *prophet (1.3; 22.9). This tells also against genuinely apostolic authorship, but not decisively; and Dionysius's comment concerning differences in thought and style may be due to differences in situation and genre; there are also many marks of Johannine theology and expression. John's language is indeed extraordinary, breaking all sorts of grammatical rules—but not out of incompetence; he can write correct and powerful Greek. He seems to be echoing Hebrew constructions, perhaps to give a biblical feel to the book.

The whole book purports to be what John has seen and heard, but it is clear that his visionary experience has been shaped both by canonical and apocalyptic writings like *Enoch and by the *Gospels (or the traditions on which they depend)—so much so that some see the book as a scriptural meditation, based perhaps on the Sabbath readings from the *Law and the Prophets (see Lectionaries, article on Jewish Tradition), which has been cast in visionary form. Probably it is a mixture of genuine experience and literary elaboration. Biblical metaphors and images—dragon, lamb, harlot, bride—come to new life in his imagination. There are allusions to or echoes of practically every book in the Hebrew Bible. *Daniel and *Ezekiel are particularly formative; *Isaiah, *Jeremiah, *Zechariah, and the *Psalms are pervasive influences; so too are the stories of *creation and *Exodus, and of the return from Babylon and rebuilding of Jerusalem, which Isaiah depicted as a new Exodus and act of creation. Revelation is a rereading of biblical tradition in the light of the death of Jesus, and though no doubt Jewish, the author is also a citizen of the Greco-Roman world and knows its myths and astrology (see, for example, commentaries on 12.1–6).

Unity. Visionary experience and scriptural meditation may indeed be inextricably woven together, but is the book as it stands a unity? At first sight it is full of loose ends, inconsistencies, and repetitions, and many scholars have detected interpolations, revisions, and dislocations of the text. For example, there are two "last battles" (19.9; 20.8), and two visions of the holy city coming down (21.2, 10). "See, I am coming like a thief! . . ." (16.15) seems manifestly out of place in the middle of the vision of the sixth bowl, but at home in the letter to Sardis (3.3). There are obvious glosses, interpreting the heavenly incense as "the prayers of the saints" (5.8), or the bride's fine linen as "the righteous deeds of the saints" (19.8).

But the glosses may come from the author himself. The apocalyptic genre is by nature dreamlike, and thus apparently incoherent; it is best to try to make sense of what we have on its own terms, in the absence of evidence in the manuscripts for disorder.

Symbolism and Interpretation. The symbolism of Revelation is kaleidoscopic and multivalent. One picture melts into another. God's people can appear as a woman (who can be virgin, wife, or mother) or a city, and the great city where the two witnesses are killed is "spiritually called Sodom and Egypt, where also their Lord was crucified" (11.8).

*Satan is both God's ancient enemy and has a place in heaven (12.7–9); likewise the sea is both an adornment of heaven (4.6), and the abode of the seven-headed beast, which represents the powers of chaos (13.1). Here is implicit the belief that evil is a corruption of what God has created good, a corruption that he can redeem; if Jerusalem can become the "great city" that murders the Lord and his witnesses, cannot the great city become the holy city? In the final vision, the kings of the earth bring in all the glory of the nations (21.24–26), though they have been slain by the *Word of God (19.13, 21). In the new creation, the dualism of this age, the gap between God's will and earth's obedience, has been overcome; there is no more sea (21.1).

Numbers, like places, are also symbolic (see Number Symbolism). There are twelve months, signs of the zodiac, *tribes of Israel, apostles of the lamb (21.12–14). There are seven planets, days of the week, colors of the *rainbow. These are numbers of wholeness. The slain Lamb has seven horns and seven eyes (5.6); the slain beast, the Antichrist that parodies his death and resurrection, has seven heads (13.1, 3, 14). His number is six, one short of seven. Satan was created the highest of the *angels, but the good claiming to be the best is the very devil. His number is intensified as *666 (13.18). Second, the ancients did not have Arabic numerals, but used the letters of the alphabet (A = 1, B = 2, etc.). So by adding up numerical values (gematria) a number could represent a name. Nero Caesar, written in Hebrew letters, adds up to 666; Jesus, in Greek letters, makes 888. He died on the sixth day of the week, and rose on the eighth, the first day of the new age.

John wrote to illuminate his own situation.

Later, when his specific circumstances were forgotten, some took Revelation as a literal prediction of the future; others, in reaction against crude literalism, especially with regard to the millennium, interpreted it allegorically and saw the millennium as the present age of the church. In the twelfth century, Joachim of Fiore drew from Revelation (along with the rest of scripture) an understanding of the whole movement of history; his vision came to be widely influential. At various times, people have seen Revelation as a veiled picture of the subsequent history of the world or of the church, placing themselves at the penultimate moment and identifying beast and harlot with current bogeys, whether emperor or pope, church or sect. But it is now clear that John wrote for a past situation and that to look for literal fulfillments in the events of our day is misguided.

In spite of Alexandrian doubts, Revelation has had a firm place within the New Testament *canon; it has had an immense influence on later Christianity. It can be seen as the most un-Christian book—the Judas Iscariot of the New Testament, according to D. H. Lawrence (Apocalypse [1931])—but, with its echoes of the beginning, the tree of life restored and no more curse (22.2, 3), it is a fitting climax to the whole Bible story.

JOHN SWEET

Righteousness. The Hebrew word translated "righteous" (ṣādîq) and its related nominal and verbal forms has the basic meaning of someone or something proven true, especially in a legal context. It therefore has the meaning "innocent" and is applied in the Bible especially to moral conduct and character. But the scope of righteousness is much wider than judicial procedures and embraces the whole covenanted life of the people under God. The specific meaning depends on circumstances: for a ruler, it means good government and the deliverance of true judgment (Isa. 32.1; Jer. 23.5); for ordinary people, it means treating one's neighbor as a covenant partner, neither oppressing nor being oppressed (Amos 5.6–7, 21–4); and for everyone it means keeping God's will as conveyed in the *Torah (Deut. 6.25). Sometimes human righteousness is seen as a response to or reflection of the divine righteousness or graciousness (Isa. 56.1; 58.8), and essentially it is the acknowledgment of God in worship of him alone and in living as he wants (Ezek. 18.5, 9).

God's righteousness means that he is a just and reliable judge (Ps. 9.4) who keeps his side of the *covenant and who thus delivers Israel from her enemies, so that they experience that righteousness as punishment, while Israel experiences it as *salvation and vindication (Judg. 5.11). Indeed in some places God's righteousness and salvation are virtually synonymous (Isa. 51.1–3), and from the *exile onward we find God's righteousness as an object of hope (Jer. 23.5; Dan. 9.24).

In rabbinic literature of the Tannaitic period, righteousness is often specified to mean generosity in general and almsgiving in particular. There is also development of the biblical tendency for righteous to refer to Israel, or a group within Israel, everyone else being at least relatively unrighteous; this may reflect experience of oppression. In the *Dead Sea Scrolls we find the Qumran sect regarding themselves as the only truly righteous. Righteousness is still, however, essentially conformity to the divine ordinances, that is, covenantal obedience. In the *Septuagint there is very high consistency in rendering the derivatives of the Hebrew root ṣdq by the Greek dikaiosunē and its cognates, whose semantic field overlaps considerably with that of the Hebrew words.

In the New Testament, righteousness occurs with greatest frequency in the gospel of Matthew and in Paul's letters. In the case of Matthew, there is discussion about whether he uses the word for life under God in the Christian community or reserves it for life under God before Christ came and outside the Christian community, and whether righteousness is not only a divine requirement but also a divine gift, especially in 3.25; 5.6; 6.33.

For Paul, the issues are even more widely debated. It is usually agreed that sometimes he uses righteousness in a broadly biblical fashion but in a Christian context for the life of the people of God (Phil. 4.8; 2 Cor. 5.14; 9.10). It is also usually agreed that "the righteousness of God," whether or not we can speak of a fixed formula, means God's saving activity (Rom. 1.18), characteristically seen in *justification by his *grace through *faith (Rom. 3.21–6). Indeed one of the reasons why the apostle is often held to be quoting a pre-Pauline formula in the last passage is that in v. 25 God's righteousness can be held to mean God's justice in a strictly judicial sense and not his saving activity. Under the influence particularly of Galatians 3 and Romans 4 and the terminology of reckoning, there has traditionally been a view that in justification Christ's righteousness is placed to the account of sinners (is "imputed" to them).

The question remains whether in some places righteousness and justification are synonymous in Paul or at least that righteousness can sometimes be a purely forensic or relational word. The best evidence for this is Galatians 2.21, but it is widely held for other passages as well. Nevertheless, it has also been maintained that Paul consistently uses "justify" (dikaioō) for the restoration and maintenance of the relationship with God and "righteousness" (dikaiosunē) for the consequent life as his people, with both justification and righteousness being by faith. But there is disagreement about the exact meaning of most of the relevant passages. Some scholars find the key to the whole matter in the idea of God's righteousness as a power, with the gift of righteousness being inseparable from God, the giver, so that the believer is drawn into the sphere of his power.

In the New Testament apart from Paul and Matthew, righteousness normally means life as God wants it and in relation to him. It is not surprising that righteousness is sometimes found as a particular predicate of Jesus Christ (e.g., 1 John 2.1, 29; 1 Pet. 3.18). JOHN ZIESLER River of Egypt. The river of Egypt is the traditional southwestern boundary of the *Promised Land (Num. 34.5; Josh. 15.4; 1 Kings 8.65; Ezek. 47.19), generally identified with the Wadi el-ʿArish (Map 2:S1 ["Brook of Egypt"]), ca. 80 km (48 mi) southeast of Gaza. This "river of Egypt" is not to be confused with the *Nile, for which the word nāhār, which properly means "river," is employed. The Hebrew phrase naḥal miṣrayim is normally used for this watercourse, and cognate wording is found in Assyrian records; it is translated by the NRSV as "the Wadi of Egypt." The only exception is Genesis 15.18, where nāhār is used, but this may be an error (cf. Jth. 1.9).

MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Roman Army. The most famous units in the Roman army were the legions or divisions stationed in the frontier provinces. They were supplemented by a (numerically equal) force of auxiliaries. In the city of Rome itself, there were several forces, especially the elite praetorian guard that protected the *emperor.

The army carried out many duties in addition to those purely military; besides policing, there were bureaucratic functions (cf. the requisitioning in Matt. 5.41; 27.32; for temptation to corruption, see Luke 3.14). Officers, often assisted by small detachments of troops, performed many administrative and judicial tasks.

A legion was commanded by a senator called an imperial legate; under him were six military tribunes and sixty *centurions. The full complement of a legion consisted of 5,500 to 6,000 men, who were Roman citizens. There were between twenty-five and thirty legions, but none was stationed in Judea until the Tenth Legion was sent there in 70 CE after the First Jewish Revolt. But there were four in Syria to the north, deployed in Judea when large-scale military intervention became necessary.

Legionaries were heavy infantry and were assisted by auxiliaries, especially cavalry, light-armed troops, and archers; it is not clear which of the latter the dexiolaboi of Acts 23.23 were. Auxiliaries were not Roman citizens, but it became customary to give them Roman citizenship after twenty-five years of service. The auxilia, as they were collectively known, were grouped into regiments of five hundred (in a few special cases a thousand) strong, called alae if cavalry, cohortes if infantry. Their commanders were prefects (tribunes in the case of regiments a thousand strong), usually drawn from the second order of the Roman nobility. Subordinate officers were called decurions in the alae, centurions in the cohorts.

The Romans also made use of the armed forces of semi-independent local kings (called "client" kings) within the Roman ambit, such as the *Herods. Soldiers from such armies are mentioned in Matthew 2.16 and Mark 6.17. Client kings often organized their armies on the Roman pattern.

The Roman forces mentioned in the New Testament were all auxiliaries. As Jews were excused from conscription into the Roman army for religious reasons, the soldiers at the *crucifixion and in *Acts were probably Syrian, *Samaritan, or Caesarean (from the non-Jewish population in Caesarea, the administrative capital of Judea): certainly, Herod the Great had Samaritans and Caesareans in his army, who were later incorporated into the Roman forces. Two regiments are named in the New Testament, the Italian and the Augustan Cohort (Acts 10.1; 27.1). These can be compared or equated with the Cohors II Italica Civium Romanorum and the Cohors Augusta I of the eastern command at the time. Both were of higher status than other auxiliary regiments (like those of Syrians or Thracians) and were stationed in Judea, possibly because no legion was there. Claudius Lysias (Acts 21.31; 23.26) is called a chiliarch or tribune, implying that his cohort was a thousand strong (and part of it mounted, if the cavalry escorting Paul came from it).

DENIS BAIN SADDINGTON

Roman Empire. Later Christian writers looked back to the origin of their faith and saw the work of divine providence in the coincidence of the birth of Jesus and the reign of Augustus, the first Roman emperor. Under Augustus and his successors, the empire stretched from the northwest corner of Europe to Egypt and from Mauritania to the Black Sea. It brought fifty million or more inhabitants under relatively stable rule—an ideal setting for the growth of a new religion.

Rome Before the Emperors. Roman imperial institutions and ideas of citizenship went back to the Republic and Rome's origin as a city-state. According to tradition, the city of Rome (Map 14:B2) was founded by Romulus and Remus in 753 BCE at the northern edge of the plain of Latium in central peninsular Italy. Initially, the city-state was ruled by a king with the advice of the Senate, a council of elders from Rome's leading families who served for life. Important decisions, such as declarations of war, were ratified by an assembly of citizen-soldiers. The last king was expelled in 509 BCE, and his function was assumed by a pair of consuls elected annually by the citizen assembly from the body of senators. Later political thinkers interpreted these institutions as a mixed constitution with elements of monarchy (consuls), aristocracy (senate), and democracy (assembly), but in reality the senatorial aristocracy seems to have been most influential in making decisions.

Rome began its expansion in Latium as early as the regal period, but it was not until 338 BCE that Roman hegemony there was secured. From that base Rome came to dominate Italy by 270 BCE and the western Mediterranean following the two great wars against Carthage (264–241 BCE and 218–201 BCE); then the Romans moved quickly to establish hegemony over the whole Mediterranean basin with the defeat of Philip V of Macedonia (197 BCE) and Antiochus III of the Seleucid empire in Syria (189 BCE). Rome dominated from the early second century BCE but annexed these areas as provinces only slowly over the next century and a half. Syria and parts of Asia Minor came under direct Roman rule as a result of Pompey's eastern campaigns in the 60s BCE.

Rome's unparalleled victories yielded vast concentrations of wealth and power in the hands of some citizens. The world empire left the city-state constitution and idea of citizenship outdated. Roman citizenship, a status inherited from citizen parents, had formerly entailed privileges of participation in politics in the city and responsibility for military service. As Roman power spread, though, citizenship was diffused well beyond the city by the establishment of citizen colonies in Italy and abroad and by selective grant to the conquered (first to their Latin neighbors, then to all free Italians). Participation in voting assemblies in the city of Rome was impracticable for most of these new citizens, yet citizenship continued to bestow privileged status, legal rights to marry and make contracts under Roman law, and provocatio (protection of a citizen from arbitrary whipping or execution by magistrates through appeal to higher authorities).

The traditional Republican constitution was ultimately inadequate to the tasks of governing a vast empire abroad and of containing political competition at home. In striving with each other to attain the highest honors, senators resorted to escalating violence, culminating in two decades of civil war initiated by Julius Caesar in 49 BCE and finished by his adopted son, Augustus, who established himself as the first *emperor.

Roman Imperial Social Structure. Augustus sought to legitimize his new regime by claiming to restore the Respublica and incorporating Republican institutions and aristocratic families. He styled himself princeps or first citizen, a traditional title for the leader of the Senate that avoided drawing attention to his autocracy. As part of his program of restoration, Augustus reaffirmed the traditional social order and strengthened its hierarchical divisions. It was a hierarchy based on wealth, respectable birth, and citizenship. High rank was marked by special clothing, the best seats at public spectacles, and various legal privileges.

At the top of the hierarchy were six hundred senators, propertied citizens of great wealth (at least one million sesterces or about one thousand times the annual salary of a legionary) who were chosen for the traditional senatorial offices at Rome. Equestrians or knights held second rank; they were citizens of free birth who possessed a census of at least four hundred thousand sesterces. Through the centuries of the empire they were recruited to serve in the imperial administration in increasing numbers. In addition to this imperial elite, each of the thousands of cities of the empire had its own local aristocracy from which was chosen a governing council consisting of a hundred or so of the town's wealthiest men (many of whom did not have Roman citizenship). These leisured elites became collectively known by the early second century CE as the honestiores or "more honorable men," in contrast to the humbler masses or humiliores, who constituted more than 90 percent of the population.

Several important distinctions of status divided ordinary working people. There were the citizens, concentrated mainly in Italy in Augustus's day but increasingly scattered throughout the provinces by the settlement of colonies and by imperial grant to favored individuals and communities. Noncitizen free provincials formed a huge amorphous group. The empire encompassed enormous cultural variation between city and countryside, and between regions. If *Latin was spoken by the urban elites of the western empire and *Greek was the primary tongue in the eastern cities, ordinary provincials continued to speak their native tongues, whether it be *Aramaic in Palestine or the Punic language around Carthage. They also continued to worship their own gods, which in some cases were assimilated to the Roman gods. Roman emperors and officials could be sensitive to the cultural diversity: the early governors of Judea tried to avoid affronts to Jewish *monotheism, but later ones were less careful. When Florus attempted to take a large sum from the *Temple treasury in Jerusalem in 66 CE, he provoked a fierce rebellion that required seven years, the destruction of *Jerusalem, and widespread slaughter to suppress.

Beneath the free population in the social hierarchy were slaves. *Slavery as an institution was taken for granted; there were no serious abolitionist movements in antiquity. Slaves formed a substantial proportion of the population in Italy (perhaps one-third), where they were heavily involved in all aspects of economic production. In most of the provinces slaves were common only as domestic servants. By law, slaves were property who could be bought or sold, beaten or tortured at the owner's whim. As the attitudes of owners varied, so also did the living conditions of slaves.

Imperial Political and Administrative Structures. The emperor ruled the peoples of the empire from Rome with the help of men chosen from the elites; with the demise of Republican elections, the popular voice in politics was lost. The capital city had a population of about one million and encompassed extremes of wealth and poverty, lavish public monuments and filthy, cramped apartments. Much of the population, perhaps even a majority, was made up of slaves and freedmen from the eastern Mediterranean, Germany, and elsewhere. Rome was able to grow to be the largest city of pre-industrial Europe because of the privileges of conquest: provincial agriculture was taxed, and part of the grain was sent to Rome to feed the masses. To keep the urban plebs quiet, the emperor also put on various spectacles, including the gladiatorial fights and wild beast hunts, in which some Christians met their end. Despite the food distributions and public entertainment, violence occasionally broke out in the city, prompting emperors to expel foreigners or to find scapegoats. So Claudius expelled the Jews from Rome (see Acts 18.2), and Nero began the official persecution of Christians when he needed scapegoats to blame for the great fire of 64 CE.

Italy was the land of citizens. As such, it was privileged with exemption from the land tax until the late third century CE. No governors were set over Italy; administration was largely left to the municipalities, with important matters referred to imperial officials in Rome.

Beyond Italy lay the Roman imperium, including client kings and directly ruled provinces. The Romans were slow to annex areas around the Mediterranean as provinces because they lacked a developed administrative apparatus. It was convenient to leave the governing of some peripheral areas to local kings in return for support of Rome in matters of foreign policy through occasional *tribute and troops for Roman wars. Client kings paid heed to the authority of the emperor and the senior governors of nearby provinces. Accounts of the reign of *Herod the Great, the best-known client king, illustrate how dependent he was on the continuing goodwill of the emperor and his officials, which he curried by careful attention to their wishes as well as by gifts and bribes. Gradually, as in Palestine, the client kingdoms were added to the list of directly ruled provinces.

The several dozen provinces were administered by governors sent out from Rome. Their two principal concerns were the maintenance of law and order and the collection of taxes. Roman administration can be characterized as general oversight by a handful of imperial officials who relied on local leaders. The major provinces were governed by senators in different capacities. Provinces with legions were administered by imperial legates appointed by the emperor from among those senators he considered most reliable. *Syria, with the largest legionary army of the eastern empire, was a province of this type. Major provinces without armies, such as Achaea, where supervised by senatorial proconsuls chosen in the Senate. Judea from 6 CE was one of those lesser provinces administered by equestrians (initially army officers called prefects, then imperial agents with the title of procurator). All governors held broad authority, limited by their responsibility to the emperor, who issued some instructions for administration (mandata); equestrian procurators also occasionally received guidance from senatorial governors of neighboring provinces.

Governors were accompanied to their provinces by minimal staffs, including friends and relatives who acted as advisory councils. The meager staffs were supplemented by military officers and soldiers acting as major figures of authority in provincial administration (as in Acts 22.23–30; 27.1). In their judicial capacity, governors heard the cases of Roman citizens who were subject to Roman law, and also adjudicated some other serious cases. For the most part, noncitizens were subject to local law and custom, and were left to local magistrates (Acts 16.19–23). Roman governors, reluctant to become entangled in squabbles among the natives, were often content to hold local leaders responsible for the preservation of order in their noncitizen communities. This tacit arrangement explains both the worry of *Caiaphas that disorder would provoke violent suppression from Rome (John 11.49–50) and the aloofness of the Roman proconsul Gallio when Paul was brought before him (Acts 18.12–17). It also accounts for the slow and sporadic pattern of persecution of the Christians before 250 CE. Roman governors were instructed to punish with death anyone brought before them who persistently admitted to being a Christian, but they were not actively to seek out Christians. As a result, in the province of Africa the first execution on the charge of Christianity did not come until about 180 CE.

Most provincials encountered Roman government over the matter of taxes—taxes on the land, on the people who worked the land, on goods moving across provincial borders, on inheritances, on sales in the market, to name but a few. The Romans did not impose a uniform tax system on conquest, but usually took over local arrangements and contracted out the collection to private agents, the publicani, infamous for their rapacious methods of enrichment (see Publicans). Julius Caesar began to phase out these middlemen at the highest levels, but they continued into the Principate to collect indirect taxes, such as custom duties. In order to assess the main land and head taxes, imperial officials occasionally carried out censuses in which provincials were required to register themselves and their property. The imperial legate Quirinius oversaw such a census in Judea in 6 CE, which, on grounds of date and Roman administrative procedures, seems to be impossible to reconcile with the account in Luke 2.1–5 (see Christmas; Chronology, article on Early Christian Chronology).

In Augustus's day, the resources of the Roman empire were sufficient to fulfill the relatively light demands of the state, but they were limited by the agricultural base and the stagnant technology of the economy. Under the Christian emperors of the later empire, increasing demands for money and recruits to support the growing army and bureaucracy were met by more determined resistance. As the "barbarian" tribes pressed ever-harder against the frontiers, the limits left emperors unable to ward off the threats. In 410 CE, the Eternal City was sacked by Alaric and his Visigoths; the last Roman emperor of the west, Romulus Augustulus, was deposed by the German leader Odoacer in 476 CE.

See also Roman Army; Tribute and Taxation, article on Roman Empire. RICHARD P. SALLER

Romans, The Letter of Paul to the.

Circumstances of the Letter. Romans, the longest of Paul's letters and the only one in which the apostle does not name a companion or coauthor, is the most carefully worked out statement of his view of the Christian faith. Although Paul had never visited the Christian community in Rome, despite his repeated hope to do so (1.11, 13), and hence cannot have been one of the founders of Christianity in the capital city of the *Roman empire, he intended to visit it soon, both to encourage the believers and be encouraged by them (1.12).

Also in Paul's mind as he dictated this letter (16.22) was his plan to carry his mission to the western half of the Mediterranean world, as far as Spain (15.24), after he had delivered a gift of money to the "poor among the saints at Jerusalem" (15.26; cf. Gal. 2.10). Paul probably hoped that the Christians in Rome would underwrite this mission (15.28–29). Acts, however, reports nothing of this mission to Spain, and the danger that Paul feared in Jerusalem from nonbelievers (15.31) in fact materialized in a different way with his arrest there (cf. Acts 21.30).

It is probable that there was more than one Christian community in Rome, since Paul refers to a "house church" (16.5); others may have been in the houses of Prisca and Aquila (16.3; cf. 1 Cor. 16.19 for the house church they sponsored in Corinth), of Aristobulus (16.10), and of Narcissus (16.11). It is also probable that the Christian community there was composed of converted Jews as well as *gentiles, despite an earlier order by the Emperor Claudius that all Jews be expelled from Rome (41 or 49 CE). That this also affected Christians is evident from the reference in Acts 18.2 to Prisca and Aquila, who were Jewish Christians. Paul's direct address to Jews (e.g., 2.17), and his concern with their history (e.g., 3.1; 4.1; 9–11), owes more to the content of his own faith and the style of his argument than to actual debates he anticipated with Jews in Rome.

Although Paul had never been to Rome, he knew many Christians who lived there, and included greetings to them at the end of his letter (chap. 16). Arguments to the effect that these greetings could not have belonged to the original letter are not persuasive, since mobility within the Roman empire was great, and there were many who migrated to Rome during this period. The extent to which *women played a key role within the early church is evident also from the same chapter: for example, Phoebe, a *deacon, 16.1; Prisca, 16.3 (cf. 1 Cor. 16.19, Acts 18.2); Mary, 16.6; *Junia, an *apostle, 16.7—all of whom, as the language indicates, were active in the Christian mission.

Specific information is not available concerning the circumstances surrounding the composition of the letter, such as the place from which it was written or the exact date of its composition. Scholars are not in agreement on a chronology of *Paul's life, and the most that can be said is that the letter seems to have been written toward the end of his life. Since it is not known how well Paul was acquainted with the circumstances of Christians in Rome, we are unable to determine whether his ethical discussions in the letter (cf. 14.1–15.13) refer to specific problems, or whether they are the kind of general admonition he thought any group of Christians might read with profit. That the problem was not between Jewish and gentile Christians about dietary matters is clear from the fact that no Jewish dietary laws forbade the general eating of meat (14.2) or the drinking of *wine (14.21). The admonitions read like a generalized account of the problem that Paul faced in *Corinth (see 1 Cor. 8), and hence they are probably intended, as is the rest of the letter, to be a summary of Christian faith and practice.

Content of the Letter. A more detailed outline of Paul's letter to the Christian communities in Rome is the following:

I. God's lordship and the problem of the past: wrath and grace (1.1–4.22)
   A. Opening (1.1–13)
   B. The gospel and God's wrath (1.14–3.20)
   C. The gospel and God's grace (3.21–4.22)
II. God's lordship and the problem of the present: grace and law (4.23–8.39)
   A. Sin and grace: Adam and Christ (4.23–5.21)
   B. Sin, grace and law (6.1–7.25)
   C. The spirit and the surety of grace (8.1–39)
III. God's lordship and the problem of the future: Israel and God's gracious plan (9.1–11.36)
   A. God's grace and Israel's rejection (9.1–29)
   B. Grace, faith, and the purpose of the law (9.30–10.21)
   C. Israel and her future with God (11.1–36)
IV. God's lordship and the problems of daily living: grace and the structures of life (12.1–16.27)
   A. Grace and the community (12.1–21)
   B. Grace and the state (13.1–7)
   C. Grace and the neighbor (13.8–14)
   D. Grace and unity in the faith (14.1–15.13)
   E. Grace and Paul's plans (15.14–33)
   F. Conclusion (16.1–27)

The central theme of Paul's letter to the Christian communities in Rome is the universal scope of God's redemptive act in Jesus Christ, offered to all who accept it in trust. That redemption, by which God reestablishes his gracious lordship over his rebellious creation, is offered not only to Jews but also to gentiles.

First Section (1.1–4.22). Paul assumes that apart from Christ, all humanity has rebelled against God, the characteristic form of that rebellion being to set something other than God at the center of one's life. Such substitution of some part of creation for the true God, whether self or some other reality, Paul understands as *idolatry (1.22–23, 25). Because there was enough evidence from the created universe itself to warn human beings away from idolatry (1.19–20), such rebellion against God is culpable (1.21) and brings wrath (1.18, 24–31). Although gentiles show by their actions that they possess a sense of morality (2.14–16), they will not be saved by being morally pure, since moral purity cannot reconcile them to the God they have rejected. Similarly, though Jews belong to God's *chosen people (3.1) and possess the *Law (2.17–20), these features will not deliver them from divine wrath brought on by their rejection of God's act of redemption in his Son, Jesus Christ. Hence all people stand in rebellion before God (3.9–18), including those who belong to the chosen people, to whom the Law was given (3.19–20).

In Christ, however, God has come in *grace to rebellious humanity, and he offers a remedy as universal as the malady (3.23–24). That remedy is to be received in *faith (3.25), a remedy open to all, of whatever origin, since God is the God of all, and he offers a restored relationship to himself through trust in the love he has shown in his Son (3.28–30). In fact, a right relationship with God on the basis of trust is not something new, but was already the case with *Abraham (chap. 4). It was Abraham's trust in God that allowed him to stand in a positive relationship to God (4.18–22); that positive relationship is what Paul calls "righteousness." Such *righteousness, based on trust, came to Abraham before he was circumcised; hence, faith is open to all, whether uncircumcised, as Abraham was when he first trusted, or circumcised, as Abraham later became (4.9–12, 16).

The record of Abraham's trust in God has, however, more than historical interest; Paul affirms that it also bears directly on his readers (4.23). With that announcement, Paul begins the second major part of his letter.

Second Section (4.23–8.39). Turning his attention to the present, Paul explains what his readers may now experience (5.1–5) as a result of the new opportunity for forgiveness of sin and a restored relationship to God which is offered in Christ (4.24–25). That new relationship is based on God's initiative in opening the way through Christ to *righteousness in the present and to *salvation in the future (5.6–11). The divine initiative remains necessary in the present, since the present continues to suffer from the inheritance of *Adam, namely, the rebellion mentioned earlier (5.12–14): the universality of sharing in Adam's rebellion is demonstrated for Paul by the universal fate of death for all people (5.12). It was from that rebellion and its negative results that Christ has saved human beings (5.15–19).

Where does God's *law fit into all this? Paul raises that question (5.20–21) and then considers it in the next two chapters. Discussing the relationship of law, *sin, and *grace in every possible combination (6.1: sin and grace; 6.15: law and grace; 7.7: law and sin), Paul argues that *baptism into Christ's death breaks the power of sin (6.1–11), and hence Christians are now free not to sin (6.12–14). Paul next argues that everyone, whether Christian or not, is under the power of some force, whether of sin or of grace (6.16–23), and that only God's grace releases a person from the power of sin through the death of Christ (7.1–17). Third, Paul argues that the close relationship of sin and law shows that those under the Law are incapable of extricating themselves from it (7.7–23). Only Christ is able to do that (7.24), as Paul had already stated in 6.1–14.

The section 7.13–23 is thus Paul's reflection on the past, namely what life under the Mosaic law looks like from a Christian perspective; 8.1–39, on the other hand, is his reflection on the present, namely what life under Christ and freed from law looks like from a Christian perspective. Thus, a life restored under the gracious lordship of God through Christ is a life wherein the enmity between God and human beings is at an end (8.1–11), and where they, restored to the family of God (8.12–17), may look beyond present deprivation (8.18–25) to the presence of God's Spirit with them (8.26–27). Life in such a situation is safe from any hazard (8.28–39).

Third Section, 9.1–11.36. One problem remains, however, and that is the rejection by the chosen people, the Jews, of God's plan for their redemption in Jesus Christ. Since God had promised them blessing through Abraham, does not their rejection of the fulfillment of that promise in Christ mean that God's promise, and thus his word, has failed (9.6)? Paul answers this question by pointing out that since God has always worked with a *remnant in Israel, it should not be surprising that he continues to do so in the case of the small minority in Israel who believe in Christ (9.1–29). Furthermore, by putting the Law ahead of Christ as an expression of God's will, the Jews have continued to resist trust in God as the way of salvation (9.20–10.4).

Yet such trust, not limited by birth, as was the Law, is God's chosen way of the redemption of sinners (10.5–13), a way that has been proclaimed to Jews as well as gentiles (10.14–21). Despite the Jews' rejection, however, God has not rejected the Jews (11.1–10), nor will the rejection of Christ by the Jews be final. Rather, that rejection is part of God's merciful plan: by rejecting Christ, the Jews have created the opportunity for gentiles to hear the proclamation of salvation. When that proclamation has been completed, the Jews will also finally accept trust in God through Christ (11.11–16). Using the analogy of grafting branches into an olive tree (11.17–24), Paul makes the point that the hardened attitude of Jews toward Christ is not the final word; in the end, they too will share in God's gracious lordship established through trust in Christ (11.25–31). All of this is part of God's merciful plan (11.32), knowledge of which calls forth praise to God, who works in such strange yet gracious ways (11.33–36).

Fourth Section, 12.1–16.27. Having ended the third section with hymnic praise to the God whose gracious ways with sinful humanity are mysterious and past finding out, Paul gives attention to the ways in which God's gracious lordship, established through trust in Christ, relates to the structures of everyday life. Showing successively how that gracious lordship impinges on life in the community (12.1–21), in the state (13.1–7), and on one's relationship with one's *neighbor (13.8–14), Paul then considers how Christians should deal with differences among themselves (14.1–15.13). Taking as his example the distinction between the "weak" (those who have scruples about eating meat, 15.2, or observing the *Sabbath, 15.5–6, or drinking *wine, 15.14) and the "strong" (those who regard such scruples as unnecessary), Paul affirms that the personal preferences of the strong are to be laid aside lest the weak be offended, and thus be lost to the Christian community (14.15; 15.1).

In the final verses, Paul outlines his travel plans (15.14–33) and sends greetings (16.1–16, 21–23) along with final exhortations (16.17–20) and a benediction (16.25–27).

Influence. Because of the range and depth of theological topics discussed in it, the letter to the Romans has played a key role at critical junctures in the history of Christianity. Amid the crumbling institutions of a Roman empire which had embraced the church, Augustine learned from Romans a view of human nature and of the state that could survive the demise of civilization. Amid the pomp of a church grown self-important, Luther and Calvin found in this letter, particularly its treatment of *justification by faith alone, a way to construct a worshiping community that allowed God's gracious lordship to be more clearly expressed. In a period of naive identification of cultural progress with God's will, Karl Barth heard in Romans the divine "no" to any attempt to equate human accomplishment with divine grace. Paul's acknowledgement of the continuing validity of God's special relationship to the Jews (e.g., 3.1–2; 11.29) stands in the way of any Christian exaltation over the modern heirs of ancient Israel. To those who pay careful heed, Romans continues to be an important guide for all who seek to make sense of their lives in the midst of historical change and cultural conflict.

PAUL J. ACHTEMEIER

Ruth, The Book of. Ruth is a gripping short story, incorporating folkloric features that make for ease of appreciation as common human experience, as well as distinctive cultural features commending Israel's theology and ethics. Ruth stands eighth, between Judges and 1 Samuel, in the *canon of the Bible familiar to Christians, but first among the five small festival scrolls (*megillot) of the Hebrew canon, usually right after Proverbs. Ruth is the festal reading for Shavu'ot (*Pentecost) in Jewish tradition.

The book begins with a background scenario of a Bethlehemite family, two parents and their two sons, sojourning in *Moab because of famine back home. The sons marry Moabites. Father and two sons die, leaving three widows, Naomi, Orpah, and Ruth. Naomi, choosing to return home, urges her daughters-in-law to remain in Moab. Orpah does so, but Ruth cleaves to Naomi. Naomi, lamenting bitterly, arrives in *Bethlehem with Ruth accompanying her; she sees little prospect of fullness of life. Scene two (chap. 2) has Ruth initiate efforts to support herself and Naomi by gleaning at the harvest, where she chances upon the field of Boaz, a worthy Bethlehemite. Boaz notices her, at first makes minimal provision, then moves to progressively greater care for this woman who has displayed such loyalty to her family.

In scene three (chap. 3), Naomi, encouraged by the success of Ruth's first steps, directs her how to move things from a temporary to a long-term resolution: marriage and offspring for Ruth, redeemer care for Naomi. Ruth forces the matter with Boaz in a provocative scene at the threshing-floor, only to learn that the redeemer responsibility falls first upon a person other than Boaz. In the final scene (4.1–17), while Ruth and Naomi wait, Boaz maneuvers this other person to yield his role at a public forum in the town gate. The way is clear for Boaz to marry Ruth, provide an heir to Ruth's first husband, and provide a redeemer for Naomi. The redeemer is Obed, David's grandfather—this information is the striking climax of a chorus by the Bethlehem townspeople celebrating first Boaz, then Ruth and Naomi. The story closes (4.18–20) with a *genealogy connecting *David through Obed and Boaz to Perez, Judah's offspring (Gen. 38).

Scholarly efforts to reconstruct earlier stages in the development of the story or to identify additions to the original have yielded little insight into its meaning; even the conclusion that the genealogy at the end (cf. 1 Chron. 2.5–15) is an appendix is now regularly challenged, and interpreters study the book as a carefully crafted whole.

Almost two-thirds of the story is conveyed in conversation, a characteristic of biblical storytelling artistry. Both conversation and narration include captivating literary devices. For example, on the road back to Bethlehem, the hesitation of Orpah and Ruth, the combined urging and complaint of Naomi, and the commitment of Ruth are all handled with superb pacing and beautiful language. Guide words such as "return" in scene one and "glean" in scene two bind episodes internally. Key words in pairs are used to link scene to scene and connect the posing of plot problems to their resolutions (e.g., "lads" Naomi has lost in 1.5 with the "lad" Naomi gains in 4.16; Yahweh's "wings" of care in 2.12 with Boaz's "wings" of marital commitment in 3.9). The storyteller is sparing in detail, providing only the essentials and sometimes leaving gaps: we are taken by surprise in 4.3 by a field that Naomi can sell, and are not told whether Boaz and Naomi ever meet.

Emphasizing these literary characteristics follows the trend of current scholarship on Ruth, and it means playing down questions of historicity on the one hand or of the book's role as polemic on the other. In the past, Ruth was often seen as composed in the fourth century BCE to oppose the Ezra-Nehemiah effort to dissolve mixed marriages. Instead, interpretation now focuses on Ruth as historical fiction, serving as an edifying and entertaining encounter with typical events in a typical town. Clearly, care for those in danger of being left on society's margins is a crucial concern—in the Ruth story typified by two *widows, one a foreigner. Structures exist to meet this concern: the gleaning provision (cf. Lev. 19.9–10; Deut. 24.19–22); marriage to one's husband's relative (Ruth 2.12–13; 4.5); *redeeming, which involves responsibility for property recovery and care of persons; responsibilities devolving upon members of a wider circle designated by Hebrew words translated "kinsman" in 2.1 and 3.2. The story brings all these customs to bear, assuming that the audience knows how they worked. Among these, the particular practice called *levirate marriage (Deut. 25.5–10; Gen. 38) may pertain; alternatively, Ruth 1.12–13 and 4.5 may point to some allied custom otherwise unattested in the Bible. What the story does portray clearly is the interplay of agents of care and recipients of care within society: in turn, the three principal characters both give and receive. Orpah and the potential redeemer in 4.3–6 are ready to give some help; the drama lies with the greater risk and commitment required of Ruth and Boaz to bring good out of bad, a theme expressed in the key concept ḥesed, "kindness," in 1.8; 2.20; and 3.10.

Theology is muted in Ruth. The book participates in an exploration of divine providence also seen in the *Joseph cycle (Gen. 37–50), in 2 Samuel 9–20, and in *Job. Only Ruth 1.6, 4.13, and probably 2.20 assert divine intervention, but the greetings and blessings and outcries of the characters keep deity present. The sharp outcry against God by Naomi in 1.20–21 sounds the prominent biblical theme of lament.

The climax, which comes with the note about David in 4.17, suggests that blessing of Israel's royal line is an issue here. The blessing speeches in 4.13–17 are comparable to other Near Eastern royal blessings. If the David theme is intrinsic to the book—this was often debated in the past—then it provides the historical datum that David had a Moabite ancestor. The book is quite probably part of a cycle of stories about David's ancestry, which would include Genesis 38 and other episodes now lost—for instance, about Perez and Zerah prepared for by Genesis 38.27–30, and about Obed prepared for by Ruth 4.16–17.

To decide about the date and audience of Ruth is difficult. Linguistic criteria and judgments about its place in the development of thought, invoked in the past as pointers to a late date, have lost their cogency. A date anywhere in the time of the Judean monarchy is plausible. The audience was probably village people and the storyteller a professional bard, quite possibly a wise woman (cf. 2 Sam. 14.1–20). Alternatively, the story may be a self-conscious imitation of a folktale, written at the royal court.

The universal appeal and the plausible presentation of typical Israelite life mask precise time and place, and release the story of Ruth for the pleasure and edification of all. The Targumic tradition and rabbinic commentary build the relation between Naomi and Ruth into a paradigm for the education of a *proselyte. They celebrate the portrayal of "kindness" and probe the institutions of levirate, shoe transfer (4.6–8), and redemption. Down the centuries, more modern literary allusions give us Dante's "gleaner-maid, meek ancestress" of David, Bunyan's "Mercy," Milton's chooser of the better part, Keats's recipient of the nightingale's solace "amid the alien corn," and Goethe's accolade: the most beautiful "little whole" of the Hebrew Bible.

EDWARD F. CAMPBELL

S

Sabbath (Hebr. šabbāt). The last day of the week; the only day bearing a name, the others being merely numbered. It is considered the absolute day of rest without exceptions. Its observance is probably very old but is attested only since the eighth century BCE (Amos 8.5; Hos. 2.13; Isa. 1.13, 2 Kings 4.23). An earlier date is suggested by Israelite legal traditions (Exod. 23.12; 34.21); the references in the *Ten Commandments (Exod. 20.8–11; Deut. 5.12–15) may not be older than Deuteronomy itself.

The etymology of šabbāt is uncertain. A relation to the verb šbt, to which it has naturally been connected (see Gen 2.2–3; Exod. 20.11), is questionable, since šbt is never attested in the intensive form or in connection with the practice of resting from work, while its meaning is "coming/bringing to an end." A connection with the Akkadian šab/pattu, the day of the full moon, falling on the fifteenth of the lunar month, or with the seventh, fourteenth, twenty-first, and twenty-eighth days should probably be rejected, as they are unpropitious days, the opposite of what the Sabbath seems to be. Nevertheless, the former connection is so obvious etymologically that one should ask whether the abstention from work on such a day does not lead, eventually, to the Israelite concept of rest. Sometimes the Sabbath is connected with the feast of the new moon (Amos 8.5; Hos. 2.13; Isa. 1.13); what this means we do not know.

The origins of the Sabbath are also obscure. Biblical tradition (but in late texts) attributes it to *Moses; this, however, cannot be verified and, since the practice presupposes a relatively advanced agricultural society, is improbable. In preexilic times its observance cannot have been very strict; 2 Kings 11.5–9 tells us, without any criticism, of the arrest and execution on the Sabbath of the Queen Mother Athaliah, who had been usurping the kingship, something inconceivable in later times.

By postexilic times keeping the Sabbath had become one of the distinctive practices of observant Jews. During this period detailed regulations developed so as to make its observance absolute, a tendency already evident in the explanations in the Ten Commandments. The Sabbath was also a socioeconomic institution and meant feeding humans and animals although they were not working, besides losing profit; thus attempts were made to circumvent the law, and these needed to be countered. In Maccabean times the problem of fighting on the Sabbath arose (1 Macc. 2.32–38; 2 Macc. 6.11), the faithful preferring to be killed rather than desecrate the Sabbath.

In the New Testament and in rabbinic Judaism we hear echoes of the debates that developed around the observance of Sabbath until finally a criterion was proposed: "Every case of danger of life allows for the suspension of the Sabbath" (Yoma 8.6). According to Rabbi Akiba, one should not desecrate the Sabbath for things that can be done the day before or the day after, but no desecration exists when such a possibility is not offered. Therefore a midwife can function and should be helped on the Sabbath. Rabbinic teaching differs from the New Testament in that healing in the New Testament is considered to fall under the principle of "danger of life," a point that later rabbinic teaching did not accept. The rabbis concluded: "Sabbath has been given to you; you have not been given to the Sabbath" (Mekilta to Exod. 31.13; cf. Mark 2.27). Some sectarians thought otherwise; so at *Qumran on the Sabbath one was not supposed to help an animal when it was giving birth or involved in an accident.

New Testament discussions about the Sabbath seem therefore to be inner-Jewish discussions. By the end of the first century CE, the first day of the week was celebrated as the day of the Lord, to which Christian observance of the Sabbath was transferred (see Rev 1.10; also Acts 20.7; 1 Cor. 16.2). Some Christian groups, notably the Seventh-day Adventists, following biblical legislation exactly, observe the seventh day of the week, the original (and continuing) Jewish Sabbath. J. A. SOGGIN

Sabeans. See Sheba, Queen of.

Sacrament. The term is not found in the New Testament, though the *Vulgate sometimes uses sacramentum to render the Greek word for *mystery (mystērion), as in Ephesians 1.19. The word may have been suggested by its secular meaning, the oath of allegiance taken by a Roman soldier on enlistment. The Roman governor Pliny (ca. 112 CE) described Christians as those who bound themselves by an oath (sacramentum) not to commit crimes.

By the third century CE, the word was being used to describe *baptism and eucharist (see Lord's Supper) as specific acts of Christian worship, and it was later extended to include other official liturgical acts of the church. In 1564 the Council of Trent defined seven sacraments as instituted by Christ, namely, Baptism, Confirmation, Eucharist, Penance, Extreme Unction, Holy Orders, and Marriage. The Reformers with their biblical emphasis preferred to confine the term to baptism and eucharist, which are generally recognized as the two gospel sacraments.

The development of sacramental theology reflects different views found in the New Testament concerning the relation between God and human beings, where some stress God's *grace and others *faith. The Donatist controversy of the third century led to the use of the phrase ex opere operato to indicate that the efficacy and value of the sacrament did not depend on the worthiness of the minister but on the promise of God to the church. Therefore, as long as the church was obedient to its Lord and used the right "matter" (e.g., water in baptism, bread and wine at the eucharist) and the right "form" (the words or prayer expressing the meaning of the action), participants could be assured of God's presence and action in the sacrament. To avoid the mechanical understanding to which this view could easily lead, the Reformers emphasized faith in differing ways. Some, like Ulrich Zwingli, thought of the sacraments as signs of God's action in the past, whereas others regarded them as means of grace assured by the outward sign and the promise of Christ.

Modern theology tends to describe the sacraments as occasions of encounter between God and the believer, where the reality of God's gracious actions needs to be accepted in faith to effect a true meeting. This accords with New Testament teaching, which sees God's grace focused in the person of Jesus and his death and resurrection. This is the "mystery" of Christ (Col. 4.3), in the sense that God's secret purpose has been declared and made known in Christ. The sacraments therefore are means of grace insofar as they are occasions when the gracious act of God is made present to the believer. Paul expresses this understanding with regard to both the eucharist (1 Cor. 11.26) and baptism (Rom. 6.3–4).

The use of the term "the holy mysteries" (encouraged by 1 Cor. 4.1) to refer to the sacraments, especially in the Eastern Orthodox churches, shows more clearly the connection between the redemptive acts of Christ and their liturgical representation. JOHN N. SUGGIT Sacrifice. The offering of some commodity to God, generally making use of the services of a cultic official, a *priest. In the Bible, the various kinds of sacrifices are presented most systematically in Leviticus 1–7 (cf. Num. 15). The different sacrifices cited there can be classified in several ways. Most prominent are those utilizing clean animals (cattle, sheep, goats, doves, pigeons). All such animal sacrifices have a number of features in common: killing/dismemberment of the victim, burning of at least some part of it (the fat in particular) on the *altar, application of the *blood to the altar by the priest in some manner (sprinkling or smearing).

The burnt offering or *holocaust is particularly distinctive (Lev. 1.3–17; 6.8–13). As the latter name implies, a complete consumption of the victim's remains (except for the skin, which was given to the priest: Lev. 7.8) by fire was involved here. The rite opened with the offerer's laying his hand on the victim's head (Lev. 1.4a); this gesture of self-identification signifies that, through the beast, he is offering himself to God. The intended purpose of the holocaust was to effect atonement with Yahweh for the offerer (Lev. 1.4b).

Another major animal sacrifice is the peace offering (NRSV: "offering of well-being"; the differently translated Hebrew word is šĕlāmîm), described in Leviticus 3.1–17; 7.11–36. In this instance, the designation employed points to the ritual's aim, that is, to (re-)establish "peace," fellowship between the divine and human parties. In line with this end, the victim's remains are divided between God (for whom the fat is burned on the altar), the assisting priest, and the offerer's household. The peace offering can further be specified, in accordance with the motive prompting it, as a thanksgiving, votive, or free-will offering. In the first instance, the victim's flesh must be consumed on the day of the sacrifice itself (Lev. 7.15); in the latter two, the time allotted for this extends through the following day (Lev. 7.16).

Two further animal sacrifices are the sin offering and the guilt offering (Lev. 4.1–6.7; 6.25–7.10). The Bible does not clearly distinguish these in terms of either their ritual or the situations that necessitate them (see Lev. 7.17). Both are designed to effect atonement in cases of a nondeliberate offense (e.g., bodily discharges, contact with the unclean), and in both it is only the victim's fat that is burned on the altar. The sin offering is, however, the more public of the two, being offered on the major *feasts of the year (Num. 28–29), while the guilt offering functions as part of a process of reparation undertaken by an individual (Lev. 5.16; 6.4).

The Bible also prescribes various nonbloody sacrifices; these utilize cereals (Lev. 2.1–15), *frankincense, and *wine. Of these, the last must accompany other sacrifices, whereas the first two may be offered separately. Finally, biblical narratives evidence familiarity with the practice of human sacrifice (see, e.g., Gen. 22; Judg. 10.30–40; 1 Kings 16.34; 2 Kings 3.27); this, however, is strongly condemned in the laws of the Pentateuch (e.g., Lev. 18.14).

Taken as a whole, the Hebrew Bible manifests a certain ambivalence regarding sacrifice. In the Pentateuch, it is solemnly enjoined as a positive divine requirement, while other passages seem to articulate God's rejection of the practice as a whole (e.g., Amos 5.21–27; Isa. 1.10–20; Ps. 51.16–17). The latter formulations are best seen as hyperbolic reminders of the truth that cultic sacrifice is pleasing to God only when offered by one whose whole life is lived in accordance with God's will.

In the New Testament, particularly in *Hebrews, the death of *Jesus is described as a sacrifice that definitively secures for the whole of humanity the effects (atonement, fellowship with God) that older sacrifices brought about only temporarily (Heb. 9.23–28). Likewise in the New Testament, the notion of a spiritual sacrifice comes to the fore (Rom. 12.1; 15.16; Phil. 2.17; 4.18; 1 Pet. 2.5). In this conception, every action of a Christian's life has the capacity, when performed in faith, to be an offering acceptable to God.

CHRISTOPHER T. BEGG

Sadducees. The Sadducees were one of the Jewish parties referred to by *Josephus (War 2.8.164–66; Ant. 13.5.173; 18.1.16–17). Disputes between them and the *Pharisees are mentioned in later Jewish writings (m. Yad. 4.6–7; m. ʿErub. 6.2; m. Para 3.7; m. Nid. 4.2; b. Yoma 2a, 19b, 53a; b. Sukk. 48). They are depicted in the New Testament as opponents of *Jesus who, together with the Pharisees, tested him with questions (Mark 12.18; Matt. 16.1, 6). In *Acts they feature as opponents of the early Christians (4.1; 5.17).

The name (probably Hebr. ṣaddūqîm) is derived from *Zadok. The most likely association is with the high priest under David; although it is just possible, as one tradition suggests, that they were connected with a later Zadok, pupil of one of the Sages, Antigonus of Socho (early second century BCE), who, as they believed, rejected belief in the resurrection. There were of course Zadokites, descendants of the original high *priest, who controlled the *Temple in Jerusalem for many centuries before the second century BCE, which is when Josephus introduces them. Possibly the emergence of Sadducees as a party is the result of a crisis occasioned by the usurpation of the high priesthood by Jonathan in 152 BCE; possibly this is also the point at which the *Essenes broke away from the high-priestly group and moved out into the desert. In any case the Sadducees and the Pharisees both strove for influence at court and for control over the Temple, which would of course give them the power required to exercise an important role in national affairs. Fortunes changed not infrequently; doubtless the power of the Temple aristocracy was substantially limited under Roman rule, but the Sadducees were prepared to accept a measure of compromise with the Roman authorities and probably had influence with them. Once they lost their cultic function as a result of the destruction of the Temple (70 CE) they ceased to exist as a group. This may reflect the extent to which they had lost popular support.

We learn of their beliefs only from others' writings. Whereas the Pharisees accepted the authority of the Tradition of the Elders as a valuable tool for extending and interpreting the Law, the Sadducees did not (Ant. 18.1.16). Nor did they, as the New Testament also attests, believe in the resurrection of the dead (Ant. 18.1.16–17; War 2.8.165; Mark 12.18; Acts 23.8; see Afterlife and Immortality, article on Second Temple Judaism and Early Christianity). Josephus also reports that they did not believe in fate but thought that men and women were in control of their actions. They are also said to have rejected belief in *angels and *demons (Acts 23.8).

The sense of all this is elusive. In their development of an oral tradition of legal interpretation, the Pharisees and Sages were in one way doing no more than what had been done throughout Jewish history, that is, adapting their legal traditions to changing circumstance. Why should the Sadducees oppose this? Possibly because the written Law reinforced their control over the Temple; possibly too because the Pharisees were attempting to undermine that position by transferring some of the priestly rituals and practices away from Jerusalem to the towns and villages outside. Certainly the Sadducees were concerned principally to uphold the Temple and its sacrifices: for them it was the proper observance of Temple ritual that maintained the *covenant relationship between Israel and God.

Rejection of belief in the resurrection again indicates a traditionalist stance. Jews had long believed that so long as Israel obeyed the Law then God would rule over them and reward the righteous and punish the wicked in this life. Belief in the resurrection, on the other hand, was linked to beliefs that the present age was in the grip of dark powers, so that in this life the righteous would suffer, although God would ultimately vindicate them. Those who had died would be raised so that they too could receive their due rewards (Dan. 12.2). To reject belief in the resurrection and, indeed, possibly also in demonic powers who controlled this world in the present age, was then also to reject the belief that this present age was radically corrupted; in fact, from the Sadducees' point of view, those who argued the contrary view may have appeared to deny the continued existence of the covenant between God and Israel. This may also explain their denial of fate. They believed that Jews were free to influence their destiny; if they obeyed the Law and repented and made due restitution when they sinned, then all would be well. The darker views of the world associated with belief in the resurrection also entailed beliefs in the pervasiveness of the power of sin (see Rom. 5.12–21, which may owe more than a little to Paul's Pharisaic background, although such beliefs should not be thought of as specifically Pharisaic), such that men and women were no longer in control of their fate. It is such views that the Sadducees rejected.

This may suggest a further reason why the Sadducees disappeared after 70 CE. Not only was their position as the Temple aristocracy fundamentally destroyed; their belief that the maintenance of the Temple cult would suffice to stave off real disaster for Israel had also been proven false.

See also Judaisms of the First Century CE.

JOHN RICHES

Sailing. See Ships and Sailing.

Saint(s). "Saint" most frequently translates some derivative of Hebrew qādôš and Greek hagios. Both words apply primarily to the gods as those beings who rightly deserved awe, or who were worthy of worship; their extended meaning includes those persons and things that had a unique relation to these gods. Because of this relationship, such persons and things were set apart from the unhallowed world about them so that they might be ceremonially clean, sufficiently pure to be of special service in the worship of the gods.

In the Hebrew Bible, the Lord God is holy (Lev. 19.2), meaning that he is set apart from, different from, and transcendent over everything in the created order, and is therefore uniquely worthy of awe and worship (Isa. 6.1–5). But because God stands in special relation to parts of his creation, certain things can be holy, such as *Jerusalem (Isa. 48.2), the *Temple (Isa. 64.10), the *Sabbath (Exod. 31.14), garments (Exod. 28.2), *water (Numb. 5.17), and oil (Exod. 30.25); and people can be holy (Lev. 19.2), even an entire nation. Israel is called holy, elect, a people separated from all other peoples, set apart to the Lord God, that is, God's own people (Exod. 19.5, 6; Lev. 11.44, 45; cf. Hos. 2.23; Ezek. 37.27).

In the Bible, therefore, the word "saints" refers to "holy people"—holy, however, not primarily in the moral sense, but in the sense of being specially marked out as God's people. Thus, just as the people of Israel are "saints," "holy ones," a nation set apart by God for the worship and service of God, so in the New Testament those who comprise the church are also called holy, "saints," because they too are set apart to God, God's own people (Rom. 1.7; Phil. 1.1; passim). The church is seen as the new Israel, the new community separated from the world around it and dedicated to God, the people of the end times to whom God will make good his promises (cf. Dan. 7.18, 27; see also John 17.11; Acts 9.13; 1 Pet. 2.9, 10). The term is also applied to dead members of the community (Matt. 27.52; Rev. 16.6; etc.), though this is not its primary biblical usage.

Moral or ethical ideas were never wholly absent from the word "saints," both in the Hebrew Bible (Lev. 17–26; 19.2–18) and in the New Testament (1 Pet. 1.16; cf. Matt. 5.8; 1 Tim. 1.5; 2 Tim. 2.22). Because God is holy, that is, because God is perfect in goodness and justice and love and purity (Lev. 19.2), it is expected that his special people will pattern their lives accordingly (Lev. 19.2–18; 1 Pet. 1.16). Hence, *ethics belongs together with *religion. Relationship with the God of the Bible demands a moral response in accord with the character of God.

See also Holiness. GERALD F. HAWTHORNE

Salem. See Jerusalem.

Salome. The name of two women appearing in the New Testament:

1. The daughter of Herodias and Herod (Philip), and thus the granddaughter of *Herod the Great, famous as the performer of the dance (Matt. 14.1–12 par.) for which, at her mother's instigation, she was rewarded with the head of *John the Baptist on a platter. She is not named in the Gospels, but Josephus identifies her and also reports her marriage to Herod's son, her uncle Philip (Ant. 18.5.137–38). Salome's dance is a favorite theme in *dance, art, and literature, as in Gustave Flaubert's story Hérodias and Richard Strauss's opera and Oscar Wilde's play, both called Salome.

2. A disciple of Jesus, present at the *crucifixion and at the tomb on the following Sunday (Mark 15.40; 16.1). She is identified by Matthew (27.56) as the mother of *James and John and would therefore have been the wife of Zebedee as well as Jesus' aunt (see John 19.25).

MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Salutations. A salutation is a greeting when people meet. In biblical times this greeting was understood as an actual blessing bestowed on the person(s) greeted; see, for example, Genesis 43.29; Ruth 2.4; 3.10; Daniel 6.21. While most greetings were indications of good will, there are instances when the salutation was negative, if not derogatory, as in 1 Kings 18.17.

In Hebrew (as in other Semitic languages), greetings often include the word šālôm ("*peace"). The word signifies totality and wholeness, the sum of all good things. To greet someone with peace was thus to wish for that person all good (Judg. 6.23; 1 Chron. 12.18). At times, as in modern Hebrew, šālôm was also used as a parting blessing (e.g., Exod. 4.18).

In Greek, a common greeting was chaire ("hail," literally, "rejoice") (e.g., Matt. 26.49; Luke 1.28). At the beginning of his *letters Paul regularly used the related noun charis ("*grace") in combination with the Greek word for "peace" (eirēnē).

In the ancient world oral salutations were frequently accompanied by other types of physical actions to express good wishes, such as raising the hand, prostrating oneself on the ground, kissing, or embracing (see Gestures).

JAMES M. EFIRD

Salvation. The primary meaning of the Hebrew and Greek words translated "salvation" is nonreligious. Thus, the derivatives of the Hebrew root *yš*ᶜ are used frequently in military contexts, as of victories by *Gideon (Judg. 8.22), *Samson (Judg. 15.18), Jonathan (1 Sam. 14.45), and *David (1 Sam. 23.5; 2 Sam. 19.3); of projected defeats of Aram (2 Kings 13.17) and of the enemies of Gibeon (Josh 10.6); and of victory in general. In fact, recent translations often translate nominal derivatives of *yš*ᶜ with "victory." An analogous sense is found in Deuteronomy 22.27: a woman who has been raped "in the field" is not guilty, because there would have been no "rescuer" (Hebr. *môšia*ᶜ) to hear her cry for help. And, in poetry, synonyms used in poetic parallelism for *yš*ᶜ often mean "to rescue, to deliver, to help escape, to protect."

This sense of victory or rescue from danger, defeat, or distress is also primary when God is the agent. Thus, in the clearly military metaphors of Psalm 91, the conclusion sums up the divine promise of protection as follows: "I will satisfy him with length of days, and show him my victory (yešûᶜātî)"; the NRSV is inconsistent both here and in other places where God is the source of the victory, often using the theologically weighty word "salvation." In fact, when God is the source of "salvation" in the Hebrew Bible the meaning is overwhelmingly physical rather than spiritual, and in this life rather than in some *afterlife (Exod. 14.30; 2 Sam. 8.6; Pss. 44.3; 144.10; Isa. 59.16; Zeph. 3.17). It is difficult to stress this too much, since Christian readers of the Bible especially have understandably read back into the Hebrew Bible the spiritual and eschatological nuances of the concept of salvation found in the New Testament. Despite the fact that in a great majority of the occurrences of the root *yš*ʿ in the Hebrew Bible God is the agent of "salvation," it rarely if ever has an unambiguously spiritual nuance. An eschatological sense is of course present in such passages as Ezekiel 34.22 and throughout Second Isaiah, but the "salvation" prophesied is the restoration of Israel in its land, not some otherworldly bliss. Even in the New Testament salvation can be physical and this-worldly. In the healings of both the woman with the hemorrhage (Mark 5.34 par.) and the blind Bartimaeus (Mark 10.52 par.), Jesus proclaims that their faith has "saved" them; most recent translations correctly render the Greek verb sōzō "has made you well"; cf. Mark 3.4; 5.23, 28; 6.56; Luke 17.19; Matt. 27.42 par.). Likewise, sōzō is used by the disciples when they thought they were drowning (Matt. 8.25; cf. 14.30) and (in a compound form) of Paul's escape from shipwreck (Acts 27.44; 28.1).

But the majority of occurrences in the New Testament of the Greek verb sōzō ("to save") and its derivatives, especially the noun sōtēria ("salvation") have to do with the ultimate salvation of believers in Christ Jesus. The same phrase used in the stories of healing is also used of forgiveness of sin (Luke 7.48–50; cf. 18.52), and in the account of the paralytic (Matt. 9.2–8 par.) forgiveness of sin is a spiritual kind of healing concomitant with the physical restoration of health. For the one forgiven this spiritual healing is thus "salvation," in the sense of admission into the *kingdom of God understood as both a present and a future reality. The salvation of individuals is the principal focus of the earlier New Testament writings. In Paul this salvation is both present and future; the two are closely linked, in part at least because of Paul's expectation of a prompt *Second Coming (Rom. 5.8–11; 8.18–25; 13.11). So Paul can speak of those "who are being saved" (1 Cor. 1.18; 15.2; 2 Cor. 2.15), as well as those who will be "saved in the day of the Lord" (1 Cor. 5.5), both Jews (Rom. 11.26) and gentiles (1 Thess. 2.16). This same kind of "realized eschatology" is also found in the *synoptic Gospels and in Acts, though in both it is a future salvation that dominates (Mark 8.35; 13.13 par.; Acts 15.11; contrast Luke 19.9: "Today salvation has come to this house" and cf. Acts 2.47).

In the gospel of John not only is Jesus identified as "savior," an interpretation of his name (see below), but the object of salvation is frequently identified as "the world" (Grk. kosmos), the created order now at enmity with God and therefore in need of salvation through Jesus (John 3.16–17; 12.47; cf. Rev. 12.10–12).

A large number of personal *names are derived from the Hebrew root *yš*ʿ, including those of Moses' successor Joshua, the prophets Hosea, Isaiah, and probably Elisha, the *Moabite king Mesha, and Jesus (a Grk. form of Hebr. *yēšûa*ʿ; see Matt. 1.21; John 4.42; Acts 5.31; Phil. 3.20; Eph. 5.23; Titus 1.4; 2 Pet. 1.1); in all of these names God rather than the person with the name is explicitly or implicitly the agent of salvation. The exclamation transliterated "*Hosanna" is also from this root.

MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Samaria. Omri (885–873 BCE), the sixth king of the northern kingdom of *Israel, founded his new capital Samaria (Hebr. šōmrôn) on land purchased for the high price of two silver talents (7,200 shekels; cf. 2 Sam. 24.24) from the family of Shemer (1 Kings 16.23–24). Archaeologists have found traces of a rural estate from the eleventh to the early ninth centuries on the hill of Samaria, on which Omri's new city was built; it was easily defended and located near important trade routes (Map 5:X4). Like the names Israel and Ephraim, Samaria may have become an alternate name for the northern kingdom as a whole (1 Kings 21.1; 2 Kings 1.3).

Although the principal temple cities of the kingdom were Bethel and *Dan (1 Kings 12.29; see Golden Calf), an inscriptional reference (ca. 800 BCE) from Kuntillet ʿAjrud (northern Sinai) to "Yahweh of Samaria and his Asherah" suggests that a shrine to Yahweh also stood in Samaria (cf. Hos. 8.5). Omri's son *Ahab built a temple to *Baal there (1 Kings 16.32), perhaps for his Phoenician queen *Jezebel. When *Jehu overthrew the Omride dynasty, he demolished Baal's temple and turned it into a latrine (2 Kings 10.27), but a shrine to the goddess *Asherah continued to exist (1 Kings 16.33; 2 Kings 13.6; Amos 8.14?).

Samaria flourished in the time of Omri and Ahab and again during the reign of Jeroboam

II in the mid-eighth century. During the latter period Samaria symbolized the entire northern kingdom for the prophets *Amos and *Hosea, who condemned Israel's religious and social ills. The Samaria Ostraca, a cache of sixty-three inscribed potsherds recording what may be tax receipts, illustrates the concentration of wealth that the prophets criticized.

Kings of Samaria alternately allied themselves with or fought against *Damascus (1 Kings 20.34; 2 Kings 5.5; 16.5) and *Judah (1 Kings 22.2; 2 Kings 8.26). They enjoyed trade and diplomatic relations with the *Phoenicians, whose artistic influence is apparent in references to Ahab's ivory house (1 Kings 22.39) and in the hundreds of eighth-century ivory furniture inlays (see Amos 6.4) excavated at Samaria. Splendid walls of local limestone cut in the precise Phoenician style surrounded Samaria's royal precinct. In later times pottery, bronzes, seal impressions, and locally minted coinage from the Persian period (sixth–fourth centuries) indicate that Samaria continued to be more open than Judea to foreign influences.

*Assyria conquered Samaria in 722 BCE, transforming it into the capital of the province of Samerina. The Assyrians deported Samaria's leading citizens and resettled conquered peoples from Syria and Mesopotamia there (2 Kings 17). Nevertheless, a large population of Israelites probably remained. The Judean kings *Hezekkiah and *Josiah made political overtures to these surviving Israelites (2 Chron. 30.1–11, 18; 34.3–7; cf. Jer. 41.4–6), and prophets describe a future reunited Israel (Jer. 31.1–6; Ezek. 16.51–55).

After the Babylonian exile, *Samaritans led by the governor Sanballat opposed *Nehemiah's attempts to rebuild Jerusalem (Neh. 4; 6). These Samaritans were probably Jews living both in Judea and in Samaria (cf. Ezra 4.4) who had continued to worship and to administer the territory of ancient Israel in the exiles' absence; their quarrel with Nehemiah was political, not religious. It is notable that Samaritan women are not mentioned among those whom Jews have wrongfully married (Neh. 13.23), although for priests such intermarriage was unacceptable (13.28).

From the many Yahwistic names on Wadi Daliyeh papyri (375–335 BCE), it seems that ruling-class Samaritans of the Persian period revered Yahweh. Late in the fifth century, Jews living in Egypt wrote for help in rebuilding their temple at Elephantine to leaders both in Jerusalem and in Samaria. Sometime after the arrival of *Alexander the Great (332 BCE), the Samaritans constructed on Mount Gerizim near *Shechem a temple of Yahweh to rival Jerusalem's, but evidence from the *Dead Sea Scrolls suggests that the definitive religious break (the "Samaritan schism") between Samaria and Jerusalem, so apparent in the New Testament, did not occur before the Hasmonean period (second century BCE).

Alexander the Great's army destroyed Samaria in 331 after a rebellion. It was rebuilt to become a wealthy Hellenistic city surrounded by a massive wall with a series of monumental round watchtowers (one, ca. 19 m [63 ft] in diameter, still stands to a height of over 8 m [27 ft]). The Hasmonean John Hyrcanus destroyed the city in 108 BCE, but it began to revive after Rome took over Palestine (63 BCE). *Herod the Great embellished the city on a grand scale, renaming it Sebaste after the Greek title of the emperor Augustus. This magnificent city, with its colonnaded streets, stadium, theater, and temples, was demolished during the First Jewish Revolt (66–70 CE), but it soon revived and flourished until finally declining during the Byzantine period.

*Samaritans appear in key episodes in the *Gospels and in Acts. Some reject Jesus (Luke 9.52–53), but he portrays a Samaritan as a good *neighbor (Luke 10.29–37). Jesus' friendly meeting with the Samaritan woman (John 4) demonstrates his openness to women; by her testimony she becomes one of the earliest missionaries (4.39). Philip's ministry to Samaria (Acts 8) is the first by an apostle outside strictly Jewish territory; Samaria is a symbolically transitional place between Judaism and the gentile world into which the Christian movement will travel.

MARY JOAN WINN LEITH

Samaritans. The Samaritans are unique among the many religious groups described in the Bible apart from traditional Judaism and Christianity: the others have long passed into oblivion, but the Samaritans still survive in our own day, as a community preserving its ancient rites on its holy site, Mount Gerizim (Map 1:X4), near the ancient site of *Shechem and the modern city of Nablus.

The Samaritans are best understood as a conservative group within the total spectrum of Judaism. This rather clumsy definition is necessary because of the ambiguity of the word "Judaism." The word is sometimes used in a biblical context to denote the community owing allegiance to the Jerusalem authorities, with the Jerusalem *Temple its chief holy place; sometimes it refers to a broader complex of beliefs and practices, united mainly by reverence for the holy traditions enshrined in scripture. The Samaritans should be included in the Judaism of the second type but not of the first. (See Judaisms of the First Century CE.)

We can obtain some knowledge of the Samaritans from the Bible, but because these references are not free of polemic, it is best to begin by noting that our sources of knowledge include important material handed down by the Samaritans themselves. Chief among this is the Samaritan *Pentateuch. The scroll preserved by the present-day Samaritan community is claimed by them to date back to Abishua, the great-grandson of *Aaron mentioned in 1 Chronicles 6.4; it is actually a medieval scroll, although it certainly preserves older traditions sometimes valued by textual critics (e.g., at Deut. 27.4 the reading "Gerizim" for "Ebal" is often preferred). The fact that the scroll contains only the Pentateuch is doubly significant: it reminds us that this is the extent of the writings regarded by the Samaritans as scripture; and it illustrates the conservative nature of the group, deeply distrustful of anything that smacked of innovation and modernizing.

Other features of their religious practice illustrate this point also. They have observed the *Sabbath with great strictness, spurning those devices that Jews developed to facilitate ordinary life on the Sabbath. Ritual requirements, in particular those relating to food laws, have been understood and imposed with a greater degree of literalism than has been usual in Judaism as a whole. They claim that their holy mountain, Mount Gerizim, which is mentioned in the Pentateuch (Deut. 11.29; 27.12), has a greater claim to veneration than does Mount *Zion, for Jerusalem entered the people's history only relatively late, at the time of *David.

In these characteristic features it is possible to see the Samaritans as having a recognizable position within the spectrum of Judaism at the beginning of the common era. New Testament references, especially in *Luke and *Acts, make it clear that by that time the Samaritans were an established group.

Unambiguous earlier references are few, the clearest being found in the *Apocrypha. In Sirach 50.26, "the foolish people that dwell in Shechem" are condemned as if they were an alien group; 2 Maccabees 6.2 makes a slighting reference to their willingness to compromise their ancestral traditions. Each of these statements is polemical, a hostile comment from a rival religious position. Much the same can be said of *Josephus, who has frequent and almost invariably hostile references to the Samaritans, particularly in his Antiquities. Although the historicity of his description of the building of the Samaritan temple on Mount Gerizim in the time of *Alexander the Great has been much doubted, its destruction by the Jewish king John Hyrcanus late in the second century BCE is beyond serious dispute.

Samaritan origins have often been described in terms of a schism, as if there were some specific event that separated them from the Jews. The Samaritans' own Chronicles date that event as early as the time of Eli, before the establishment of the monarchy. That is unlikely to be historical; equally improbable is the Jewish version, preserved in 2 Kings 17, which pictures the Samaritans as descended from aliens of non-Yahwistic origin, from which the true Israel was bound to distance itself. (This story gave rise to the later, contemptuous name for the Samaritans, "Kuthim" [from "Cuthah" in v. 24] and is also the only place in most English translations of the Hebrew Bible where the word "Samaritans" is found [v. 29].) This is religious polemic; nothing in Samaritan practice suggests any link with *Assyrian or other foreign origin. Nor should the Samaritans be identified, as is sometimes done, with those left in the land at the time of the Babylonian *exile, or with the opponents of *Ezra and *Nehemiah. Their distinctive identity emerged later, and it is unlikely that any single event precipitated a schism.

How far they preserved characteristically northern traditions is difficult to decide. As the Hebrew Bible is a Jerusalem collection, hostile to the north, it is not easy to identify any distinctive northern traditions that the later Samaritans might have inherited. In any case, their characteristic features arise from the Judaism of the postexilic period, since all that we know of Samaritanism relates to religious rather than political or national characteristics: which books were holy, where might sacrifice properly be offered, which families might legitimately exercise the priesthood.

Some scholars have claimed to detect similarities between the Samaritans and the *Dead Sea Scrolls community, but these are also widely questioned. More striking is the obvious sympathy toward the Samaritans shown by the author of Luke-Acts, who twice in the Gospel goes out of his way to praise a Samaritan (Luke 10.33–36; 17.15–18). It has also been suggested, though this is less certain, that *Stephen, the central figure of Acts 6–7, was of Samaritan origin; certainly Simon Magus (Acts 8.9–13) came to be associated with a heterodox form of Samaritanism. It is therefore clear that in the Roman period the Samaritans were an identifiable group, comparable with, but distinct from, the larger Jewish community; John 4.9, though the accuracy of the rendering has been questioned, expresses the situation clearly. There was a Samaritan diaspora, and the community maintained its existence, with a rebuilt temple, through the changing political circumstances that affected Palestine. The fourth century CE was a time of revival, with many of their theological and literary traditions reaching definitive form at that time. In the centuries since, their numbers have declined and they have suffered persecution, but they retain something of their distinctive identity and their ancestral home, despite all the political and religious turmoil that has affected Palestine.

See also Judaisms of the First Century CE; Samaria.

RICHARD COGGINS

Samson. Samson (whose name is derived from the word for "sun") was the twelfth and last judge of Israel (Judg. 13–16) before civil war threatened to tear the tribes apart (Judg. 17–21). He harassed the *Philistines in the border country between his native *Dan, Judah, and Philistia. Besides killing thousands of Philistines, Samson ripped a lion apart with his bare hands (14.5–6) and told a riddle about it (14.14), loved two women who betrayed him for very different reasons (14.15–17; 16.5–6), burned Philistine crops (15.4–5), visited a Philistine prostitute and carried off the city gates of Gaza on the same night (16.1–3), was blinded and enslaved by the Philistines (16.21), and caused his own death by toppling the pillars of the Philistines' temple upon himself and his foes (16.28–30).

With his powerful libido, Samson resembles other judges who fell outside the behavioral norms of Israelite society (left-handed Ehud, the woman *Deborah, young *Gideon, the bastard Jephthah). Unlike other judges, however, Samson was neither an adjudicator nor (despite Judg. 13.5) a "deliverer" of his people. Personal vengeance was the motive for his single-handed forays against the Philistines. Samson's obliviousness to the requirements of his *Nazirite status (Judg. 14.8–9, 10; 15.15) suggests that it is not original to the Samson legend, although it is important in the literary framework of the biblical narrative.

The Samson story reflects an early stage of actual Philistine-Israelite confrontations, but it is rooted in Danite folktales and perhaps Philistine story traditions. It resembles tales of intertribal relations told in other areas where neighboring groups borrow story lines from each other. The Philistines were related to Homer's Mycenaean Greeks, and the Samson saga has motifs in common with Greek and other Indo-European literatures. Samson also resembles *Gilgamesh, as well as tricksters like *Jacob.

*Josephus is typical of early Jewish and Christian interpreters in his verdict that Samson's heroic death transcended the sins of his life (Ant. 5.8.317). Samson's questionable morality could even be glossed over (Heb. 11.32), or, as later for Milton in Samson Agonistes, superseded by his heroic death.

Judges 13–16 is one of the most artfully composed tales in the Bible. It is framed by a prediction of Samson's birth to his barren mother (Judg. 13; cf. Gen. 17.15–19; 18; 1 Sam. 1) and his spectacular death (Judg. 16.22–30), episodes that mirror each other (e.g., in the obtuseness of both Manoah and the Philistines, and the rituals for Yahweh and Dagon). There is an exuberance of wordplay, including etiologies (15.17, 19), riddling couplets (14.12–14, 18), and ring compositions (especially Judges 13). One finds foreshadowing (13.7), crisp characterizations (Samson, his mother and father), and clever inversions from episode to episode (compare the restraining of Samson by the men of Judah and by Delilah). Most of all, the narrative presents a subtle study of deception and betrayal, by humans and by God, for good and for ill.

See also Judges, The Book of.

MARY JOAN WINN LEITH

Samuel. The son of Elkanah and Hannah, Samuel was Israel's leader in the transition from the premonarchic to the monarchic period. The books of Samuel (see next entry) preserve various traditions about him, and he is described in several roles. He was a judge, in both the judicial (1 Sam. 7.15–8.3) and military (1 Sam. 7.13–14; 12.11 [MT]) senses of that office in the Bible; as the last of the judges, he was unable to defeat the *Philistines, and their threat to Israel's existence was the primary historical reason for the establishment of the monarchy (see Kingship and Monarchy). He was apparently a *priest (1 Sam. 2.11; see also Ps. 99.6; Sir. 46.13) and probably a *nazirite (1 Sam. 1.11, 22, according to LXX and Qumran texts). Most frequently, however, he is called a *prophet.

According to the *Deuteronomic historians, for whom the prophets are key actors in their narrative, Samuel illustrates some of the key roles of later prophets. He was both king maker (for *Saul and *David) and king breaker (Saul), like *Nathan, *Elijah, and *Elisha; he rebuked both kings and people for their violations of *covenant (see especially 1 Sam 15.22, a saying that would fit well into the collections of the eighth-century prophets).

Because of this idealized portrait, drawn from Israel's later institutions and traditions and shaped by the Deuteronomic historians, it is difficult to say much about Samuel historically, especially on the key issue of the monarchy: was he for or against it? Our sources give both perspectives. But of his importance in the crucial period of the mid-eleventh century BCE there can be no doubt, and he is linked with *Moses as one of Israel's preeminent leaders (Ps. 99.6; Jer. 15.1). MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Samuel, The Books of.

Title. The two books are in reality one (cf. *Kings, *Chronicles): in the Hebrew text, they run continuously, with the counting of words and sections characteristic of the Hebrew tradition coming only at the end. The division into two appears first in the Greek translation (the *Septuagint) and then in the Latin *Vulgate: from there it came to be used in other translations, and by the sixteenth century also in printed Hebrew Bibles. The traditional title "Samuel" reflects the fact that he dominates much of the material, particularly in the establishing of the monarchy; hence he came to be seen as the author. The Greek and Latin texts use titles that cover also the following books of Kings—thus either "four books of kingdoms" or "four books of kings." Since these four books together cover the whole period of the monarchy, these latter titles are really more appropriate.

Contents. Briefly the contents are:

1 Samuel 1–15: Samuel and Saul
1 Samuel 16–31: Saul and David
2 Samuel 1–8: David's rise to power
2 Samuel 9–20: David's reign
2 Samuel 21–24: narratives, psalms, and lists.

Such an outline does not show the complex interweaving of themes which the books reveal, and for a proper understanding we also need to consider both what precedes and follows, as well as the subdivisions and interlinkages within the books themselves.

What precedes in the Hebrew text is the book of *Judges. (*Ruth in that text stands in the third section of the *canon, as one of the Five Scrolls, with Song of Solomon, Ecclesiastes, Lamentations, and Esther.) The sequence in this form is clearly right for the narratives: Eli the priest at Shiloh, who appears in the first four chapters, is depicted so as to fit into the series of "judges," his activity rounded off at his death (4.18) with the statement that "he had judged Israel forty years." In addition, the refrain in Judges 17–21, "in those days there was no king in Israel; all the people did what was right in their own eyes" (17.6; 18.1; 19.1; 21.25), may be seen as an appropriate preface to the establishment of the monarchy. The order in the English text places Ruth after Judges: this derives from the Greek and Latin versions and is also intelligible—not only is the book of Ruth set "in the days when the judges ruled" (1.1), but it has its climax in the birth of a son to Ruth who was to be the grandfather of *David. The story of Ruth prepares for the appearance of David as king.

There is no break between Samuel and Kings; the story of David does not end, as we might have expected, at the end of 2 Samuel; it continues into 1 Kings 1–2. A commonly held view is that the group of chapters from 2 Samuel 9 to 1 Kings 2—ignoring for the moment 2 Samuel 21–24—forms a continuous unit, often called the "Succession Story" or the "Court History of David" (see below).

The recognition of continuity into 1 Kings and of the link back to Judges, itself continuous with *Joshua, points to the understanding of the whole group of books from Joshua to Kings. They form a "history" from the conquest of Canaan to the fall of Judah. Because of many links of language and thought with the book of *Deuteronomy, which precedes them, they are often termed the *Deuteronomic (or Deuteronomistic) history, though it is evident that the differences between the books, in particular in their style of presenting the narratives, raise many questions about the nature of this whole compilation.

Nevertheless, whatever the processes involved, we are invited to read the books as a sequence, and at many points later parts of the story can only be fully understood by reference back to earlier, as well as back to the presentation of Israel and its laws offered by Deuteronomy.

A closer look at the material within the main sections as set out above shows many different kinds of writing now woven together. The proper understanding of the books involves the recognition of these different elements and a discussion of their possible origin and significance, but also an appreciation of the overall presentation, its patterns and its functions. The date of the books of Samuel can only be determined within this broader framework: its final shaping must belong at the earliest in the sixth century BCE.

The Text of the Books of Samuel. The detailed problems of the Hebrew text and its relationship to alternative forms, attested by the early Greek translation and by the fragmentary manuscripts from *Qumran, are a matter for a full commentary. There are passages where the evidence points to the existence of more than one recension, and, as may be seen from the brief notes in NRSV and from similar notes in other modern translations, there are many instances of small variations between the alternative texts. For example, the last verses of 1 Samuel 1 differ considerably in the Greek, and the psalm in 1 Samuel 2.1–10 is there followed by the addition of a passage found also in Jeremiah 9.23–24, expounding the ideas of knowledge of God and of divine justice. In addition, some parts of the Samuel text—the death of Saul and sections of the David story—are to be found in a different form and arrangement in 1 Chronicles, and the psalm in 2 Samuel 22 appears also as Psalm 18. Textual questions arise in all such duplicate texts.

Sources. As mentioned above, various types of material are found in the final form of the books of Samuel. The psalm in 2 Samuel 22 may be set alongside that in 1 Samuel 2.1–10; the latter does not appear in the book of *Psalms, but it is clearly a psalm, used in the narrative to draw out the significance of the birth of Samuel in relation to the establishment of the monarchy. (The hymn in Luke 2.46–55 is closely related to this poem.) 2 Samuel 22 is immediately followed by another short poetic passage (2 Sam. 23.1–7), which depicts David as prophetic spokesman, though it also has considerable links with psalms relating Davidic *kingship to the rule of God. Two poems of a quite different kind, laments over the dead, appear in 2 Samuel 1.19–27 and 3.33–34. These seem likely to be early: the first is cited from the Book of *Jashar, the second has a gnomic quality. Some material in the books is of archival character: the family and officials of Saul are noted in 1 Samuel 14.49–51; the family of David in 2 Samuel 3.2–5 and 5.13–16, distinguishing his kingship in *Hebron from that in *Jerusalem; and David's officials in two slightly variant forms in 2 Samuel 8.15–18 and 20.23–26. The *genealogical material is paralleled in the much more elaborate lists in 1 *Chronicles; the lists of officials (cf. also 1 Kings 4.1–6 and 7–20) function as markers at the end of narrative sections. Lists of David's warriors, found in 2 Samuel 21.15–22 and 23.8–39, appear also, and in part more fully, in 1 Chronicles 21.4–8 and 11.10–47.

The major part of the two books consists of narratives. These are grouped around the main characters or associated with particular themes. Thus, 1 Samuel 1–4 are associated with Eli, head of the priestly house at Shiloh and linked to a first defeat by the *Philistines and the loss of the *ark of God: in part they are more concerned with the appearance of *Samuel and the interweaving of the downfall of Eli's priesthood with the anticipation of a new and lasting priesthood alongside a royal house (2.27–36, also 3.10–18). The ark theme of 1 Samuel 4 continues in 5–6, and reappears in 2 Samuel 6: this has led to the supposition of an "ark source," though it may be doubted whether such a source existed independently of other material. Various stories, clearly not all of one piece, have gathered around the figure of *Samuel: he is depicted as a prophet (so, for example, in 1 Sam. 2; 9–12), a judge (so 1 Sam. 7.15–8.3), and a military leader (1 Sam. 7.3–14). As a prophet, he continues to appear in the narratives, or in some measure to overshadow them, not only through to his death (1 Sam. 25.1) but beyond it, in his appearance to pronounce doom on Saul in 1 Samuel 29. *Saul, as also his son Jonathan, appears in heroic stories such as 1 Samuel 11 and 13–15. They appear as foils to David in 1 Samuel 16–31, in stories gathered more closely around the figure of David as the true king increasingly recognized as designated to replace Saul, who had been divinely chosen but then divinely rejected. With the death of Saul, told in two forms in 1 Samuel 31 and 2 Samuel 1, the way is clear for David to establish his kingship, over the south at Hebron, over the north with the death of Saul's feeble son Ishbaal (Ishbosheth), and with victories over the Philistines and the surrounding lands (2 Sam. 5 and 6). The stories of his reign in 2 Samuel 9–20; 21; 24 reveal further aspects of his achievements and his weaknesses, in effect brought to a conclusion when the succession of *Solomon is defined in 1 Kings 1–2.

The two stories in 2 Samuel 21 and 24 are concerned with the consequences of religious disobedience (cf. also 1 Sam. 13 and 15): 2 Samuel 21.1–14 records a failure by Saul which had dire repercussions rectified by David; 2 Samuel 24 a failure by David resulting both in disaster and in the establishment of a new holy place.

The variety in style and level of the many stories suggests various origins. If we may judge from what is told of other heroic figures, both biblical and nonbiblical, it is likely that some are popular legends now attracted to a particular figure. Some may be early; others are evidently late, at least in their present form (so, for example, the Samuel war story in 1 Sam. 7). How much of actual history they contain is debated; precision of detail, such as is to be found in the intimate accounts of the life of David and his court, for example in 2 Samuel 12 and 13, are often thought to have eyewitness character. But this is deceptive; a good storyteller will provide the details that makes a story vivid, whether or not it is closely linked to actual events.

A Literary Work. Various theories have been propounded to account for the present shape of the books of Samuel and to describe their literary evolution. Older views saw the possibility of parallel sources combined; the stories of the establishment of the monarchy in 1 Samuel 9–12, showing both favorable and unfavorable attitudes, seem to point clearly in that direction. But there is little evidence of continuous sources; alternative traditions have been brought together (so, for example, 1 Sam. 24 and 26: David's sparing of Saul's life; and 1 Sam. 31 and 2 Sam. 1: the death of Saul). Attempting harmonization in such cases is not satisfactory. An attempt has also been made to discover blocks of material, such as the Samuel birth narratives, the ark narratives, the story of David's rise to power, the Succession Story or Court History of David. It is difficult to determine where such blocks begin and end, and to understand the function of such blocks before they were incorporated into the final work. 2 Samuel 9–20 with 1 Kings 1–2, most often recently designated the "succession story" and the one most widely accepted as an ancient source, presents substantial problems; those who have studied it most closely do not agree on its function: Is it a pro-Solomon apology or a virulent anti-Solomon polemic? Is it virtually the work of an eyewitness (with candidates for authorship from the entourage of David) or a later reflective compilation? Did it originally stand in the work, or, bearing in mind that most of it is absent in 1–2 Chronicles, was it a late insertion? It may be proper to recognize that this, sometimes hailed as the earliest piece of real historical writing in the Bible and on occasion used as evidence for a supposed period of Davidic-Solomonic enlightenment, is perhaps more a construction of modern scholarship than an actual ancient independent work.

More recently, there has been a tendency to think rather in terms of a great wealth of stories, naturally attached to that period in which monarchy came to be instituted and looking to the almost legendary characters of David and Solomon, which have been worked over to produce a now vivid literary work, highly structured and skillfully woven together, to be read as one: the unevennesses and discrepancies that exist, which a modern reader notes, reveal both something of the diversity of origin and also much of a literary technique not concerned with historical evaluation but with meaning and impact.

Discerning larger patterns in the arrangement and handling of the material has led to illuminating insights: the stories of David, for example, have been thought to be so ordered as to depict him as first under divine blessing and protection and then under a divine curse (cf. also the changing picture of Saul in 1 Sam.); but not everything fits so easily into a single pattern. *Structuralist approaches, though sometimes so elaborate as to be unconvincing, have nevertheless pointed to the literary skill of the work: the narrator anticipates, provides occasional résumes, offers comment on the meaning of events (so for example in 1 Sam. 12 and 2 Sam. 7), and, sometimes explicitly but more often implicitly, points to the significance of what is being told. The comments are often religiously based, and in some measure linked to the thought of Deuteronomy; more clearly, they show the attempt of a compiler concerned to understand the contemporary situation in which the community now exists by relating the story of the past. Some clues (so, for example, in 1 Sam. 4–6) may point to the sixth-century BCE period of Babylonian conquest and *exile for leading members of the Judean state; the victory of the captive God of the ark in a foreign land (that of the Philistines in the story) suggests hope for a defeated people, deprived of political and religious leadership and institutions: their God might be thought defeated and captive, but in reality he mocks his powerless opponents. Such an interpretation would also fit with the overall impression of the Deuteronomic history, which reflects on Israel's failures but has a climax at the end of 2 Kings in the release of the captive Davidic king, suggesting some hope of restored life.

At first sight there is a certain miscellaneous quality about the various elements in 2 Samuel 21–24, but they should not be seen merely as an "appendix": there is a similar collection in Judges 17–21. A closely knit structure is evident in 2 Samuel: two narratives (21.1–14 and 24) enclose two lists and brief anecdotes of heroes (21.15–22 and 23.8–39), which in their turn enclose two psalms (22 and 23.1–7). The first narrative finally resolves the problem of the royal family of Saul; the first hero list provides a link passage associated with the Philistine wars, which brought the downfall of Saul and the triumph of David (cf. 1 Sam. 17–18 and 31; 2 Sam. 1; 5). The first psalm is associated by its heading with the deliverance of David from "all his enemies . . . and from Saul" (22.1). The second psalm depicts the kingship of David and points to a final kingdom; its military theme is drawn out in the hero lists and stories of 23.8–39. The second narrative in chap. 24 draws together the theme of David's failures and that of his establishment of kingdom and Temple—for though the *Temple is not here mentioned, the placing of this narrative as a lead-in to the succession of Solomon is clearly designed to imply what later (1 Chron. 22.1) was regarded as established fact.

History and Interpretation. In the light of the comments already made, it is clear that questions about the actual history of the period with which it deals are difficult to answer. Estimates vary greatly. There are those who would claim that much of the material lies very close to the events, and therefore believe that reasonably firm statements can be made about events and characters. Some would see particular sections or narratives as authentic in this sense, and others, such as 1 Samuel 7, as late inventions. Other commentators, while recognizing the presence of stories based on ancient traditions, would doubt the possibility of a historical reconstruction. The work presents considerable chronological difficulties. Eli belongs within the judge style of presentation, with his forty year period of rule; Samuel is similarly described, but without any figure given (cf. 1 Sam. 12.1–2; 25.1). The reign of Saul is problematic, since clearly the "two years" of 1 Samuel 13.1 is an error. David (like Solomon) again has forty years; the division of the reign into seven years in Hebron and thirty-three in Jerusalem does not suggest good chronological information. Problems arise when the attempt is made to order events alluded to or described: the stories of 2 Samuel 9–20, together with those of 21 and 24, do not make up a satisfactory sequence. Unlike the material of 1 Kings 15 to 2 Kings 25, there is no overall archival framework into which the individual sections are fitted. Numerous stories could derive from popular legend, now applied to particular figures. The story of *Absalom's rebellion looks like history, but is in many respects more stylized than real.

The view taken by an individual reader or by a historian will often depend on the degree to which some measure of harmonization is undertaken. But it may be doubted whether such historical uncertainty is a serious disadvantage in reading the books. What appears to be more important, for writer and reader alike, is the overall picture. We may observe the development and interpretation of a number of interrelated themes. Within the whole story, from the *conquest of Canaan to the fall of Judah, changes clearly took place in the life of Israel: the shift from tribal life with local leaders to national life under the monarchy; the question of true *kingship arose; the one shrine was established, *Jerusalem; a true priestly line emerged, to stand alongside the royal dynasty—a theme that was to become vital during the period of the exile and to result in various claims and counterclaims in the postexilic community.

All these issues are dominant in the books of Samuel. Ostensibly, the story is one of the past. But in reality, its final shaping has drawn together themes that serve not simply to describe what was believed about the past; claims are being made about the present, to depict for a community that has its own questions and uncertainties the meaning of that age which had brought into being the major institutions of the monarchical period and to invite a revaluation of these institutions in a later time of change.

PETER R. ACKROYD

Sanhedrin. The Gospels and Acts utilize this Greek term for council, which literally means "sitting together," both for the locus of opposition to Jesus and his movement, often in combination with elders and chief priests, and for the venue where both Jesus and his followers make their defense (Matt. 26.59 par.; John 11.47; Acts 4.5–22; 5.17–43; 6.12–15; 22.30–23.10).

This term for a kind of judicial and administrative body goes back in Roman Palestine at least to Pompey the Great. When Pompey was pulled into a domestic dispute between two quarreling Hasmonean brothers in 66 BCE, the Romans decided to run Palestine directly. Pompey reorganized Palestine as part of his larger project of subduing and organizing the entire Greek East for the Roman Senate, dividing it into five councils (synedria; Josephus, Ant. 14.5.91; War 1.8.170).

The fact that this neutral administrative term becomes firmly imbedded in the Gospel tradition as a place of local officials hostile to the Jesus movement and with the power to do something about it highlights the utilization of local elites by Rome in their ever-expanding colonial rule. The Sanhedrin was a court made up of local elite, probably with some sort of Roman oversight, that handled census, *tax, and other administrative and military responsibilities. In the divided socioeconomic context of Roman imperial rule, as time went on the Sanhedrin had a negative connotation for many who had to pay an increasing amount in taxes, stood a good chance of losing their land, and had to contend regularly with the reality of foreign occupation.

In the rabbinic period (ca. 200 CE) Sanhedrin became a technical term for the rabbinic court. This court and its leaders adjudicated many of the rulings that made their way into the *Mishnah, the first codification of rabbinic law and debate. There is an entire tractate in the Mishnah devoted to Sanhedrin.

J. ANDREW OVERMAN

Sarah. The wife of *Abraham and mother of *Isaac. Before Genesis 17.15 she is called Sarai; the two forms of the name are linguistic variants, both meaning "princess." The book of Genesis describes her as a beautiful woman (12.11, 14), a theme elaborated by later tradition, especially the Genesis Apocryphon from *Qumran. According to the biblical narrator, Abraham was so conscious of her beauty that before they entered Egypt at the time of a severe famine in their own land, he begged her not to reveal to the Egyptians that she was his wife but rather his sister, lest he be killed. Indeed, as it turned out, the Egyptians thought her so beautiful that she was taken into Pharaoh's house to be his wife (Gen. 12.15), and for her sake Abraham prospered. In time, however, after great plagues had afflicted Pharaoh and his household (Gen. 12.17; cf. Exod. 7–12), the true identity of Sarah was revealed to Pharaoh, who ordered Abraham to be gone with his wife and all his possessions. A variant of this story is found in Genesis 20.1–14 (cf. also Gen. 26.6–11).

During their years of wandering, Sarah was childless, and so God's promise that she would be the ancestor of nations (Gen. 17.16) was unfulfilled. Accordingly she persuaded Abraham to take her Egyptian slave, *Hagar, as his wife. He did so, and she bore him *Ishmael. At the age of ninety, however, Sarah bore *Isaac, thus fulfilling the divine promise. Sarah lived to be 127 years old, died in the land of Canaan, and was buried at Machpelah (Gen. 23.1–20).

In Isaiah 51.2 Sarah is referred to as the great mother of the nation; in the New Testament she is held up as an example of a wife's proper respect for her husband (1 Pet. 3.6). Paul uses the account of the birth of a son to Sarah by divine promise to develop an allegory of the new covenant in Christ and the heavenly Jerusalem (Gal. 4.22–31).

See also Ancestors, The; Genesis, The Book of.

ISOBEL MACKAY METZGER

Satan. The name of the archenemy of God and the personification of *evil, particularly in Christian tradition. The name may derive from a Semitic root śṭn, but the primitive meaning is still debated, the most popular suggestions being "to be remote" and "to obstruct." Some alternative roots include śwṭ (cf. Hebr. "to rove") and šyṭ (cf. Arabic "to burn," especially of food).

In the Hebrew Bible śāṭān could refer to any human being who played the role of an accuser or enemy (1 Sam. 29.4; 2 Sam. 19.22; 1 Kings 5.4; 1 Kings 11.14). In Numbers 22.32 śāṭān refers to a divine messenger who was sent to obstruct *Balaam's rash journey.

Job 1–2, Zechariah 3, and 1 Chronicles 21.1 have been central in past efforts to chart an evolution of the concept of śāṭān that culminates in a single archenemy of God. However, such evolutionary views have not gained general acceptance because śāṭān in these passages does not necessarily refer to a single archenemy of God and because the relative dating of the texts remains problematic. In Job 1–2, the śāṭān seems to be a legitimate member of God's council. In Zechariah 3.1–7 śāṭān may refer to a member of God's council who objected to the appointment of Joshua as chief priest. The mention of śāṭān without the definite article in 1 Chronicles 21.1 has led some scholars to interpret it as a proper name, but one could also interpret it as "an adversary" or "an accuser" acting on God's behalf.

Most scholars agree that in the writings of the third/second centuries BCE are the first examples of a character who is the archenemy of Yahweh and humankind. Nonetheless, the flexibility of the tradition is still apparent in the variety of figures who, although not necessarily identical with each other, are each apparently regarded as the principal archenemy of God and humankind in Second Temple literature. Such figures include Mastemah (Jubilees 10.8), Semyaz (1 Enoch 6.3), and *Belial at *Qumran (Zadokite Document 4.13). Still undetermined is the extent to which the concept of the Hebrew śāṭān was influenced by *Persian dualism, which posited the existence of two primal and independent personifications of good and evil.

Although it shares with contemporaneous Jewish literature many of its ideas about demonology, the New Testament is probably more responsible for standardizing "Satan" (Greek satanas) as the name for the archenemy of God in Western culture. However, the devil (the usual translation of "Satan" in the *Septuagint), Beelzebul ("the prince of demons," Matt. 12.24; see Baal-zebub), "the tempter" (Matt. 4.3), Beliar (2 Cor. 6.15), "the evil one" (1 John 5.18), and Apollyon (Rev. 9.11) are other names for Satan in the New Testament. Lucifer, a name for Satan popularized in the Middle Ages, derives ultimately from the merging of the New Testament tradition of the fall of Satan from heaven (Luke 10.18) with an originally separate biblical tradition concerning the Morning Star (cf. Isa. 14.12).

According to the New Testament, Satan and his *demons may enter human beings in order to incite evil deeds (Luke 22.3) and to cause illness (Matt. 15.22; Luke 11.14). Satan can imitate "an angel of light" (2 Cor. 11.14), has command of the air (Eph. 2.2), and accuses the faithful day and night before God (Rev. 12.10). Jude 9 mentions the struggle between Satan and the archangel *Michael for the body of *Moses. Revelation 20.2, among other texts, equates "the Devil and Satan" with "the dragon," thus reflecting the merging of ancient myths concerning gigantic primordial beasts that wreak havoc on God's creation with the traditions concerning Satan. Satan's destiny is to be cast into a lake of fire (Rev. 20.10–15).

In 563 CE the Council of Braga helped to define the official Christian view of Satan that, in contrast to dualism, denied his independent origin and his creation of the material universe. As J. B. Russell (Lucifer: The Devil in the Middle Ages, 1984) notes, writers and theologians of the medieval period popularized many of the characteristics of Satan that remain standard today and that have roots in, among other sources, Greek, Roman, and Teutonic mythology. Although the Enlightenment produced explanations of evil that do not refer to a mythological being, the imagery and concept of Satan continues to thrive within many religious traditions.

See also Exorcism. HECTOR IGNACIO AVALOS

Saul. The first king of Israel, who ruled ca. 1020–1000 BCE. His story is part of the larger account, in the books of *Samuel, of how Israel became a nation-state. Saul is one of the few biblical characters of whom the term "tragic" has often been used. Glimpsing this dimension, D. H. Lawrence in his play David has Saul say of himself, "I am a man given over to trouble and tossed between two winds."

His story begins in 1 Samuel 8 with the elders of Israel asking *Samuel, priestly prophet and judge, to appoint a king to judge (govern) them "like all the nations." For the people, the theocratic rule that Samuel delegates to his corrupt sons portends disaster. Only a generation earlier such corruption in the house of Eli had incurred Yahweh's anger and brought Israel defeat. For the deity, however, the request spells yet again the people's failure to see Yahweh's sovereignty and providential care. To an equally affronted Samuel, Yahweh observes that it is "not you they have rejected, but me they have rejected from being king over them" (1 Sam. 8.7). Yet, surprisingly, Yahweh decrees that the prophet obey the people and appoint for them a king. And so it transpires, much against Samuel's better judgment, which he expresses in mighty counterblasts against both king and people (1 Sam. 8; 12). Thus, the *kingship is grounded in conflict between deity, prophet, and people.

Saul (whose name means "asked for"), the handsome son of a wealthy Benjaminite, is Yahweh's "designate" (Hebr. nāgîd; NRSV: "ruler").

He goes looking for his father's livestock and finds kingship instead (1 Sam. 9–10).

Saul is made king before Yahweh at the cult center in Gilgal, and in Gilgal his kingship begins to unravel (1 Sam. 13). Pressed to act decisively when a great host of *Philistines threatens his fearful and deserting army, he refuses to wait for Samuel beyond a time previously appointed by the prophet (10.8), and he offers a sacrifice. Samuel, as though waiting in the wings, immediately appears and, ignoring the king's explanation, condemns him outright. Saul, asserts the prophet, has not kept Yahweh's commandment, and his kingdom will not continue. Yahweh has sought out another "designate," a man sought out according to the divinity's own intention ("heart").

Commentators have long debated the reason for the condemnation. Other texts in Samuel and Kings make it unlikely that it is simply a matter of cultic law, involving the king's intrusion upon a priestly or prophetic office (cf. 1 Sam. 14.33–35; 1 Kings 3.3). Rather, the immediate cause appears to be Saul's breaking of Samuel's ambiguous instruction to wait—as interpreted by Samuel. But lying behind Samuel's readiness to condemn lurks perhaps a more pertinent reason rooted in the origins of Saul's kingship. Saul, asked for by the people, represents rejection for both prophet and deity. For the sake of theocracy this king must, in turn, be rejected.

In Gilgal comes final rejection (1 Sam. 15). Returning from a campaign against the *Amalekites with the captured king, Agag, and the best of the livestock, Saul once again meets a vehement Samuel. Why, demands the prophet, has Saul not done as instructed and "devoted [by destruction]" to Yahweh all living things? Saul responds that he has done what he was commanded to do, and that the animals have been brought to Gilgal for sacrifice. The issue turns on the difference between "devotion" and "sacrifice" (see Ban). Samuel, however, ignores Saul's explanation and invokes Yahweh's judgment upon him. Before such unrelenting opposition Saul acquiesces and asks pardon. But spurning him, Samuel declares that he is rejected as king—Yahweh has chosen "a neighbor" who is "better" than he. The reader soon learns that this man is *David, son of Jesse (1 Sam. 16).

The remainder of the king's story is played out against this backdrop. Saul knows that the deity has rejected him, but he does not know his successor's identity. Yahweh, soon to be so eloquent for David (see 1 Sam. 23.6–14; 30.7–8), remains silent before Saul. That silence produces the irony of the young David being introduced into Saul's court in order to make him well. It also feeds the king's growing suspicion and jealousy of the successful and admired young captain (1 Sam. 17–18). Yet, as if that corrosive silence were not enough, the deity provokes Saul directly: an "evil spirit from God" goads him to violence (1 Sam. 18.10–11) and disrupts his son Jonathan's attempt at reconciliation (1 Sam. 19.1–11).

David's fortune is Saul's fate: whatever Saul attempts to turn against David rebounds against Saul. Using as bait his own daughter, Michal, Saul seeks to entice David into a suicide mission; instead, he gains two hundred Philistine foreskins and loses his daughter, who will herself later betray her father to save the husband she loves (1 Sam. 18–19); her subsequent story is poignant (1 Sam. 25.44; 2 Sam. 3; 6). Likewise, Saul's savage revenge upon the priests of Nob for having helped the fleeing David only displaces into the fugitive's hand the oracular *ephod (1 Sam. 21–22).

Both Jonathan with goodwill and Saul with resentment come to see David's succession as inevitable (1 Sam. 20.12–17, 30–33; 23.16–18; 24.16–22; 26.25). Saul, moreover, spared twice by his elusive rival (1 Sam. 24; 26), confesses publicly the superior justice of David's actions. King and competitor each forswear all hostile intent toward the other, but they keep their distance and go their own way (26.25). As David works for the Philistines and accumulates power (1 Sam. 27–29), Saul faces them in battle (chap. 28). He seeks again a word from the silent Yahweh and, in desperation, has a medium conjure up the spirit of Samuel. The word he receives is a reiteration of rejection, but with one addition: on the next day he and his sons will die. So it happens that as David carries off booty from the Amalekites (1 Sam. 30), Saul and his sons fall to the Philistines on Mount Gilboa among the slain men of Israel (1 Sam. 31).

The king asked for by the people has failed: the way is now open for the king offered by Yahweh. Yet the people's king never forfeits their loyalty. The book ends with a moving epilogue. The inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead, delivered by Saul as his reign began, now risk their lives to close his reign with dignity. Retrieving his body from the walls of Philistine Beth-shan, they claim him as their own and honor him with burial in Jabesh. David, too, pays his own homage in a poem of beauty and irony (2 Sam. 1.17–27), a poem perhaps more beautiful than honest.

See also Israel, History of; Judah, The Kingdom of.

DAVID M. GUNN

Scapegoat. See Azazel.

Science and the Bible. The dramatic conflicts between Galileo and the Roman Inquisition and between Darwin and his biblicist opponents have understandably dominated the perception of the relation between science and religion in the popular imagination. But this perception is distorted because it neglects the indispensable role that religious beliefs played in the Western approach to *nature that led to the rise of modern science. On the other hand, emphasis on the integration of scientific and religious beliefs has often led to facile syntheses, provoking reactions that emphasize the separation of science and religion. Even if this separation were philosophically sound, it provides little basis for understanding the historical interaction, often constructive on both sides, between science and religion.

On the relation of science to the Bible, the diversity of views and interpretations is vast, but representatives can usefully serve to indicate the variety of types of reactions found in the Judeo-Christian tradition. In De Doctrina Christiana (DDC) and De Genesi ad Litteram (DGL), Augustine (354–430 CE) makes clear the relative insignificance of specialized sciences as compared with understanding scripture, yet Augustine does not suggest that all knowledge can be found in scripture. In DDC, Augustine provides general rules for the interpretation of ambiguous terms. It is a mistake to read figurative signs literally (a rule that covers anthropomorphisms) and literal signs figuratively. The method of determining whether a particular expression is literal or figurative is that an expression that does not literally pertain to virtuous behavior or to the truth of faith must be taken figuratively. If the meaning of an expression is absurd when taken verbally, then we must examine its figurative possibilities. It follows from these guidelines that the believer should not read the Bible to learn facts about the natural world unrelated to salvation. In DGL, however, Augustine seems to require the certain truth of a new claim about nature in order to revise the apparently plain meaning of the biblical text, but even in DGL Augustine reiterates the principle that God did not wish to teach men and women things of no relevance to their salvation. It was clear to Augustine that secular knowledge was indispensable for the correct interpretation of scripture. Although not a license for the autonomy of science, the principle in Augustine's approval of secular disciplines was expanded by later authors into arguments legitimating knowledge of the natural universe as another way of honoring God. Such authors, like William of Conches (1080–1154), presumably did not foresee the developments that would contribute to the autonomy of the sciences, but they were confident that natural science would still perform its proper role when rightly interpreted.

The revival of Aristotle in the medieval Latin West prompted scholars like Thomas Aquinas (1225–1274) to construe theology by analogy with Aristotelian science. Even so, in the context of medieval society, the definitive resolution of anomalies in the understanding of the cosmos was impossible and hence generated a resignation to the limitations of human knowledge. Nicholas Oresme (1320–1382) took seriously the hypothesis of the diurnal rotation of the earth but rejected it because no confirmation seemed possible; he fell back on the Bible in this case as providing persuasive confirmation of the greater probability of the geocentric view.

In De Revolutionibus (1543) Copernicus's arguments for the heliocentric theory rely partly on his religious point of view. Copernicus (1473–1543) shared not only the traditional beliefs about the intrinsic rationality and harmonious design of God's creation but also another traditional belief that God had made the universe for human beings; he then concluded, perhaps originally, that it therefore must be knowable. Copernicus had no reason to believe that the heliocentric theory would ever be empirically confirmed by some neutral test or observation, but he believed that criteria already existed for preferring the heliocentric hypothesis, namely, the ordering of the planets and the spheres that arose from the mathematical coherence between period of planetary orbit and distance from the sun, and the natural relation between hypothesis and some observations. In the preface dedicated to Pope Paul III (d. 1549), Copernicus denigrates those ignorant of astronomy who distort some passage of scripture in order to censure his undertaking. The biblical texts most often cited in later controversies are Joshua 10.12–14, Ecclesiastes 1.5, and Psalms 19.4–6; 93.1; 104.5.

There is evidence of early official Catholic opposition to Copernicus, but plans to censure the theory in the mid-1540s were supposedly frustrated by the death of the master of the Sacred Palace, Bartolomeo Spina, in 1547. Lutheran reactions to the Copernican theory permitted use of the Copernican models even as the system was rejected as a literal truth. One of Tycho Brahe's (1546–1601) reasons for rejecting the Copernican theory was its incompatibility with texts of scripture, but Tycho's other reasons were astronomical and physical. Nevertheless, there is no question that Johannes Kepler (1571–1630) shared Copernicus's beliefs in divine design, the knowability of the universe, and the clues provided by mathematical coherence and commensurability for determining the order of the planets and even the true shape of their orbital paths.

Likewise, Galileo (1564–1642) shared the views of Copernicus and Kepler on mathematical coherence, but he also felt the need to demonstrate the truth of the Copernican theory, and his personal relations with several theologians, cardinals, popes, and political leaders introduced further complications into the story.

The text in which Galileo most directly and fully addresses questions about the Bible and science is the Letter to the Grand Duchess Christina (1615). Galileo cites Augustine several times, and he initially adopts the traditional view, emphasizing the principle of accommodation and arguing that it is not the purpose of the Bible to teach science. Where Joshua 10.12–14, then, reports the sun standing still, we are not to read the text as a literal description of the motions of the heavenly bodies.

Almost immediately, however, Galileo apparently accepts the criterion proposed by Cardinal Robert Bellarmine (1542–1621) earlier in 1615 in a letter to Paolo Antonio Foscarini (1580–1616), a theologian who supported the Copernican theory, that only in cases in which a scientific conclusion is demonstrated, and not merely probable, are we authorized to reinterpret the plain meaning of the biblical text. Later in his letter Galileo presses the attack further. If geocentrists insist on the literal interpretation of scripture, the passage from Joshua requires that the motion of the sun be stopped. According to the Ptolemaic theory, however, the proper motion of the sun is its annual motion on the ecliptic. Stopping the sun's annual motion would shorten the day, not lengthen it, argues Galileo. Then Galileo suggests a literal interpretation of the text of Joshua consistent with the Copernican theory. The very idea is astounding; it is hardly surprising that theologians were shocked, and even less surprising that they misinterpreted the point of Galileo's critique.

Although Galileo's intention was to demonstrate the absurd consequence of insisting on using scripture for proof of a scientific hypothesis, it does appear that Galileo got carried away by his telescopic observations, his discovery of the sunspots, the cleverness of his own literal reading of the text of Joshua, and by his conviction that he could demonstrate the truth of Copernican theory. If Galileo intended to forestall official restrictions being placed on the Copernican theory, then his acceptance of Bellarmine's challenge and the introduction of the second reading seems to have provoked the very reaction he was trying to deflect.

In 1616 the Congregation of the Index condemned Foscarini's work supporting the Copernican theory, and it suspended Copernicus's De Revolutionibus and Diego de Zuñiga's (1536–1597) Copernican interpretation of texts of scripture until they were corrected. The decree followed the decision of the Congregation of the Holy Office, which accepted the arguments propounded by Bellarmine, who in a letter to Foscarini had expanded the Augustinian criterion about faith and morals to include under faith any natural assertion declared by the Holy Spirit. Hence, the text of Joshua had to be interpreted plainly as asserting the geocentric view, and because it was declared by the Holy Spirit, the conclusion had to be accepted as pertaining to faith. Bellarmine's reasoning was faulty, and through adoption by the Holy Office it set a dangerous precedent. Galileo was issued a warning, but one that also confirmed that his views had not been censured.

By the end of 1616, however, the premises for the eventual case against Galileo were in place: the Copernican theory was under censure and it appears that Galileo had been warned against defending it. From a narrow, legal point of view, Galileo's Two Chief World Systems (1632), even with the license that he was granted, violated the spirit, if not the letter, of the earlier injunction. Historians tend to excuse the Inquisition's mistake in condemning Galileo in 1633 on the grounds that the Roman Catholic church felt itself under pressure from some Protestant critics to guard against individual interpretations of scripture, thus abandoning its traditional, sound view for a narrower, literalist interpretation of the biblical text. In spite of Pope John Paul II's public acknowledgments in 1983 of Galileo's mistreatment at the hands of church authorities in 1633, and in 1992 of the correctness of Galileo's views, the Vatican continues to refuse scholars complete access to the Vatican archival records on the Galileo case, fueling further speculation about the case.

The Catholic reaction partly provoked by Protestant literalistic criticisms lent the more open approaches of yet other Protestants an air of free inquiry. Scholars still debate the concreteness of supposed Puritan or Anglican influences on scientific activity, but there seems little question that, in England and Holland, religious ideology played a role in the advancement of empirical science. Francis Bacon's (1561–1626) appeal to the recovery of the garden of *Eden in a technological paradise, Robert Boyles's (1627–1691) efforts to Christianize Epicurean atomism, the development of a natural theology supportive of scientific activity, the legitimation of science as a profession, and other similar consequences, however diverse and however loosely connected with any official doctrine, cannot be dismissed as irrelevant. Isaac Newton's (1642–1727) religious beliefs, even if not orthodox, and his extensive biblical commentaries attest to the importance that he himself attached to the Bible and to the partly religious foundations of his own conception of the universe. The later separation of the legitimation of science from religious motivations does not argue against the importance of religion for science prior to the eighteenth century.

In the nineteenth century, the controversies provoked by Charles Darwin's (1809–1882) theory of evolution were viewed as the focal point for a much broader perception of conflicting loyalties—to the belief in a universe divinely created with purpose or to the belief that the universe is the result of chance. The notion that the human eye could be the result of millions of years of evolution seems as improbable to those who believe in a special divine *creation as the biblical story of *Eve's creation from *Adam's rib seems to the paleontologist. The official Roman Catholic response of the late nineteenth century was subordinated to the church's antimodernist reaction, constituting a position between liberal Protestantism and *fundamentalism. In 1950 Pope Pius XII declared the belief in monogenesis as a foundation for the biblical account of original sin and its universal consequences. The a priori proscription of polygenesis on theological grounds has restricted Catholic evolutionists' options. Liberal Protestants have not seen fit to restrict God's options on this question. The impact of the theory of evolution on biblical interpretation is undeniably clear from the further developments in historical-critical method and the emphasis on the social-ethical message of scripture. Literalistic creationists have rightly pointed out problems with the theory of evolution, but to most scientists the theory remains the best available and is strongly supported by evidence from physics and astronomy. Some scientists speak of evolution dogmatically as a fact, but such a dogmatic stance seems partly provoked by the educational threat posed by fundamentalists—efforts in America to legislate the teaching of religious alternatives to the theory of evolution and the effect of such efforts on textbook publishers demonstrate the reality of such threats. Ironically, in the case of Teilhard de Chardin (1881–1955), the French Jesuit paleontologist, the Roman Catholic church was concerned with tying Christian dogma to scientific theory and hence advocated more circumspect theological discussions of evolution, thus demonstrating the caution it had painfully learned from the Galileo case.

There is always a theoretical background to empirical research, but the danger for theology lies in the use of science to advance a particular interpretation of the Bible and the danger for science lies in the use of dogma to obstruct scientific theorizing; it does not lie in the use of dogma or the Bible to promote scientific research or to question a specific interpretation of the Bible. The advance of science depends to some extent on skeptical questioning of established views. The recognition of the contingency of nature is consistent with the belief in creation and in the dependence of nature on God's sustaining and controlling presence. Contemporary theologians who advocate the revival of traditional natural theology seem unaware of its earlier fate. The preference of some cosmologists for the anthropic principle requires the theological assumption that human beings are the goal of God's creation in order for the anthropic principle to be regarded as explanatory. But even from a theological point of view, such an account is unsatisfactory for it places a priori limitations on how God could have accomplished the divine purposes. The principles enunciated by Augustine seem susceptible of a broad interpretation with modern amendments: the Bible does not teach natural science; theology makes legitimate knowledge claims; our understanding of the meaning of the Bible has changed with our growth in knowledge of the physical universe; belief in the divine origin of the universe has often motivated and sustained confidence in the ability of humans to penetrate the secrets of the universe; the failures of science and the excesses of human intervention alert us to the relevance of values for decisions in science and technology; historical experience enjoins us to admit the possibly ultimate futility of human achievements; biblical homage to the sacredness of nature and human responsibility is harmonious with the awe and wonder expressed by cosmologists and environmentalists; and the search for meaning in human existence supports the limited aim of consonance between theological and scientific interpretations of the cosmos.

ANDRÉ L. GODDU

Scofield Reference Bible. A popular and influential reference Bible published by Oxford University Press early in the twentieth century. The editor, C. I. Scofield (1843–1921), was a successful lawyer, but after his religious conversion in 1879 he devoted himself to Bible study and Christian service, eventually becoming an ordained Congregational minister of some prominence. In 1909 he published The Scofield Reference Bible, with a second, revised edition in 1917. By 1930, total sales of the two editions had exceeded one million copies.

Utilizing the King James Version with Scofield's notes and comments in the margins, The Scofield Reference Bible featured the so-called dispensational system of biblical interpretation. Dispensationalists claim that God's dealings with humankind have varied throughout the different eras or "dispensations" of biblical history. They emphasize their "literal" interpretation of the Bible, suggesting, for example, that some of the prophecies concerning the land of Israel are yet to be fulfilled. A controversial feature of this system is the nearly total separation of God's relationship with Israel and the Jewish people from that of the Christian church. Dispensationalism has been and remains a significant force in Protestant Christianity in North America.

In 1967, Oxford University Press published The New Scofield Reference Bible under the editorial direction of E. Schuyler English; this edition was also based on the King James Version and retained the dispensational flavor of Scofield's notes. More recently, editions based on the New International Version and the New American Standard Bible have also been published.

See also Fundamentalism.

WILLIAM H. BARNES

Scribes. Scribes were distinguished professional people throughout the ancient world. Although they were called scribes because they could read and write, they were not only copyists. In Israel, some were officials who had authority to draw up legal documents (Jer. 32.12–15; 36.26). Some held special positions in the royal palace (2 Kings 18.18; Jer. 36.12) and functioned as ministers of finance or secretaries of state (2 Kings 22.3; Isa. 36.3). Some were academic advisers to the king. During the Diaspora (see Dispersion) in *Babylon, scribes became responsible for preserving and interpreting scripture. Later, scribes were also called "the wise" and described as those with special knowledge of the *Law (Dan. 11.33, 35; 12.3; Sir. 39.6–11; Ezra 7.6, 10). Early in the conflict with Antiochus Epiphanes (ca. 168 BCE), a group of Jewish scribes met with Antiochus's agents to negotiate justice (1 Macc. 7.12). They were probably local politicians with legal training.

In the New Testament, scribes are described functioning as *lawyers (Luke 5.17; 7.30) and judges (Matt. 23.2), and they are shown arguing with *Jesus over legal matters—authority to forgive (Matt. 9.3; Luke 5.21), traditions of the elders (Matt. 15.1), dietary laws (Mark 2.16; 3.22; Luke 5.30; 15.2), *purity laws (Mark 7.1–2), interpretation of scripture (Matt. 17.10; Mark 9.11; 12.28, 35; Luke 20.39; John 8.2), and *Sabbath observance (Luke 6.7). Scribes were often associated with *Pharisees, but the two were not identical. The "scribes of the Pharisees" (Mark 2.16; Luke 5.30; Acts 23.9) were probably legal counselors employed by the Pharisees. Chief priests also employed scribes (Mark 15.31; Acts 4.6) as their legal counselors.

Scribes were associated with the *Sanhedrin, probably as clerks, legal counselors for participants in trials, and judges. The fact that Jesus was reported arguing with the scribes at the same time that he was refuting the Pharisees does not prove that scribes were Pharisaic. Since the scribes whom Jesus attacked were defending the Pharisees, Jesus opposed them as well as the clients they represented.

The authority of scribes was delegated. They interpreted existing law; they did not create it. Well-trained scribes were acquainted with all kinds of law, both ancient and contemporary (Matt. 13.52). When Jesus was distinguished from the scribes as one who had authority (Matt. 7.29; Mark 1.22), the implication was that, as the *Messiah, he had authority to make law, just as *David and other kings did. This gave him authority over the Sabbath (Matt. 12.8) and all other national laws. He also had authority to pardon (Matt. 9.6), as other kings did.

Some scribes also copied biblical texts. The care with which this was done has been recognized with the discovery of the *Dead Sea Scrolls, which allow scholars to compare medieval texts with examples copied a thousand years earlier. The relatively few differences disclosed are not so often scribal errors as variant texts. At the ends of some books, the scribe gave the total number of words in the book and told which word was the exact middle, so that later scribes could count both ways to be sure they had not omitted a single letter; this tradition was continued by the *Masoretes.

See also Books and Bookmaking in Antiquity; Judaisms of the First Century CE; Textual Criticism; Writing in Antiquity.

GEORGE WESLEY BUCHANAN

Seba. *A part of the kingdom of Sheba, perhaps a colony in northeast Africa.

Second Coming of Christ. "He will come again to judge the living and the dead": in this way, the Apostles' Creed summarizes the Christian hope that God will complete his purpose for the world in a final, triumphant coming of Christ. The parallel terms "first coming" and "second coming" (suggested in Heb. 9.26–28) highlight the theological connection between these two chief moments of Christ's work.

The *prophets had declared that God's purpose in history would reach its goal in a future period of blessing under God's rule, a rule that would be righteous, peaceful, universal, and permanent (Isa. 11.2–5; 60; 65–66; Mic. 4.3–4). Often God was said to exercise his rule through an earthly king descended from *David (Isa. 9.6–7; Zech. 9.9–10).

*Jesus taught that this longed-for time of salvation had dawned, the *kingdom of God had drawn near (Mark 1.15). The promises were now being fulfilled in him, and his possession of God's spirit, his *miracles and *exorcisms were evidence of this (Matt. 11.2–6; 12.28). Yet God's kingdom had not fully arrived. For although through his ministry the blessings of God were experienced with a new immediacy, still death and suffering and the ambiguities of life remained for his followers. The complete realization of the kingdom was in the future. Thus he taught his disciples to pray, "Your kingdom come" (Luke 11.2; see Lord's Prayer), and proclaimed that the coming of the *Son of man would mark the dividing line between the present course of history and the full realization of God's kingdom (Mark 13.26).

The so-called apocalyptic discourse of Mark 13 (and the related passages in Matt. 24; Luke 17.22–37; 21) warns of the sufferings and conflicts that Jesus' followers should expect before his final coming as Son of man. Both here (Mark 13.30) and elsewhere (Rom. 13.11–12; 1 Pet. 4.7) the nearness of Christ's coming is stressed. But there is also an expectation that certain events must take place before the end comes (Mark 13.10; 2 Thess. 2.2–8), and an insistence that the date cannot be predicted (Mark 13.32–33; Luke 17.20; Acts 1.7). So the statements about nearness are best understood as vivid assertions of the certainty that God's purpose, begun in Christ's first coming, will be completed in his second coming.

Similarly, the New Testament writers are more concerned with the purpose of Christ's coming than with its manner, which is variously described. Christ will come to complete the work of rescuing humankind, which began with his first coming (Heb. 9.26–28). He will come to pass judgment on the whole human race (Matt. 25.31–46; 1 Cor. 4.5), to welcome into his presence those who have lived by trust in him (Mark 13.27), while those who have rejected him will find themselves shut out (2 Thess 1.7–10). Thus his coming will mark his final conquest over evil (1 Cor. 15.24–25), and the realization of his kingdom of peace, righteousness, and love. This is described as "new heavens and a new earth, where righteousness is at home" (2 Pet. 3.13; cf. Rev. 21.3–4).

Not all interpreters take the New Testament's message of the second coming at face value. Some argue that Jesus' sayings about the coming of the Son of man are not authentic to him, or that he intended them as symbols of God's triumph rather than as promises of an actual future coming; in that case, the hope of the early Christians would be based on a misunderstanding of Jesus' teaching. Others argue that since the expectation of Christ's coming within a generation of his lifetime did not materialize, it must be interpreted symbolically to mean that Christ "comes to me" in my decision for him and his rule. In contrast, some understand all references to the second coming quite literally, and believe the passages about "the signs of the times" (e.g. Mark 13) enable its timing to be calculated precisely. In any case, it is possible to affirm the basic structure of Christian hope, with its emphasis on the second coming as the goal and fulfillment of God's past work in Christ, without committing oneself to any precise view about its nature or when it will be.

See also Biblical Theology, article on New Testament; Maranatha; Parousia.

STEPHEN H. TRAVIS

Second Isaiah. See Isaiah, The Book of.

Selah. A (transliterated) Hebrew word of uncertain meaning which occurs seventy-one times in the *Psalms and three times in Habakkuk 3. It often appears at the end of a psalm (Ps. 3.8), though also at the end of a section within a psalm (Ps. 3.2, 4). The word also occurs in the postcanonical Psalms of Solomon (17.29 [31]; 18.9 [10]). The *Septuagint translated selah into Greek as diapsalma, which may mean "interlude," though the sense of this word is also uncertain.

Selah is probably a liturgical direction, added to the original text of a psalm. It may mean "lift up," either to indicate the lifting up of the voices of the singers in a doxology, or to call for "lifted-up" instrumental music in an interlude in the singing.

WILLIAM A. BEARDSLEE

Sennacherib (Sin-aḫḫe-eriba). King of *Assyria (705–681 BCE). Sennacherib, as crown prince under his father Sargon II (722–705 BCE), served as administrator in the Assyrian heartland while his father was on campaign. After Sargon had been killed in battle, Sennacherib viewed this as a sign of divine disfavor and dissociated himself from his father. He abandoned Sargon's newly built capital and, contrary to Assyrian custom, omitted his genealogy in official inscriptions. Sennacherib chose as his capital the old city of *Nineveh, which he embellished by installing wide boulevards, bringing in mountain water by aqueduct, planting trees, and laying out parks. Sennacherib campaigned actively in foreign lands, chiefly against *Babylon (dominated at this time by Chaldeans) and Elam. His struggles with Babylon reached a crisis after the Babylonians had handed over his crown prince, Ashur-nadin-shumi, to the Elamites; Sennacherib eventually besieged, captured, and ruthlessly destroyed the city, diverting a watercourse through the ruins so that the site would be permanently obliterated.

In 701 BCE, Sennacherib led an expedition into Palestine to reinstate his ally Padi of Ekron, who had been deposed by his subjects. The siege of *Lachish during this campaign is vividly illustrated in the reliefs from the royal palace at Nineveh. After the fall of Lachish, Sennacherib besieged *Hezekiah in *Jerusalem, imprisoning him, as the Assyrian annals report, "like a bird in a cage"; Hezekiah made peace only by paying extensive tribute (cf. 2 Kings 18–19; Isa. 36–37; 2 Chron. 32). Because of apparent discrepancies in the biblical and extrabiblical accounts of Sennacherib's activities in Palestine, it has sometimes been proposed that Sennacherib mounted another, less successful expedition—not recorded in the cuneiform records—against the area at some time after 689 BCE; but this is unlikely. Nevertheless, the survival of Jerusalem was viewed as the equivalent of a victory by some biblical writers, and this led to the narrative of the city's miraculous deliverance (see Isa. 37.33–37 = 2 Kings 19.32–36), celebrated in Byron's "The Destruction of Sennacherib." Sennacherib was assassinated in 681 BCE by his son Arda-Mulishshi (cf. 2 Kings 19.36–37; 2 Chron. 32.21).

JOHN A. BRINKMAN

Septuagint. The traditional term for the translations of the Hebrew Bible into *Greek. Meaning "seventy" and often abbreviated by the Roman numeral LXX, it is derived from the second-century BCE legend that, at the request of Ptolemy II (285–246 BCE), seventy-two elders of Israel translated the Hebrew Bible into Greek in seventy-two days in Alexandria in Egypt. Most scholars accept the substance of the legend, that the earliest Greek versions of the Bible were created in the third century in Egypt for Greek-speaking Jews. The earliest manuscripts of the Septuagint are from *Qumran and are dated to the second century BCE. The relationship between the Greek and Hebrew textual traditions was complicated and fluid, with frequent revision of the Greek to bring it closer to the Hebrew as the latter developed.

The Septuagint includes a number of writings not found in the traditional Hebrew canon, some translations from Hebrew or Aramaic originals and others composed in Greek. These become the *Apocrypha, accepted by some Christian churches as canonical but not part of the Bible for Jews and Protestants.

The Septuagint was the primary form of the Bible for Hellenized Jewish communities and thus was that used by most early Christians. When the Bible is quoted in the New Testament, it is almost always from the Septuagint version, which elevated its status for Christian theologians.

See also Translations, article on Ancient Languages. MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Seraph, Seraphim. Hebrew singular and plural for supernatural beings associated with the presence of God, and in postbiblical tradition identified as one of the choirs of *angels. They appear only once in the Bible, in the call-vision of Isaiah (chap. 6), where they sing praise to God in the now-famous words of the "Thrice Holy" hymn. Isaiah saw the Lord on his throne, surrounded by seraphim in the same way that early rulers were surrounded by a courtly retinue. Like the derivative four living creatures of Revelation 4.8, the seraphim had three pairs of wings, one for flying, one for covering their eyes (for apparently not even these beings could look directly on God), and one to cover their feet (almost certainly a euphemism for genitalia).

The noun śārāp is usually related to the verb śārap, "to burn." Because the term appears several times with reference to the serpents encountered in the *wilderness (Num. 21.8; Deut. 8.15; Isa. 14.29; 30.6), it has often been understood to refer to "fiery serpents." From this it has also often been proposed that the seraphim were serpentine in form and in some sense "fiery" creatures or associated with fire. In Isaiah 6.6 one of the seraphs brings the prophet a live coal from the fire on the altar; note, however, that the seraph uses tongs. DAVID G. BURKE

Sermon on the Mount. In popular thought the Sermon on the Mount epitomizes Jesus' ethical teaching; it is the first of five discourses by *Jesus in *Matthew's gospel and is found in Matthew 5–7. Augustine first called this discourse the "Sermon on the Mount" because of its setting in Matthew 5.1. Matthew describes it as a speech or teaching (5.2; 7.28) given by Jesus while seated, the typical Jewish position for teaching (cf. 23.2).

The sermon shares a striking structural and material parallel with Luke 6.20–49, often called the "Sermon on the Plain" because of its setting. Each opens with a series of beatitudes (Matt. 5.3–12; Luke 6.20–23) followed by a series of demands for conduct (Matt. 5.21–7.12; Luke 6.27–42) and concludes with a series of alternatives, the last being a parable of two builders (Matt. 7.13–27; Luke 6.43–49). Although some have attributed these similarities to Jesus' use of the same "sermon" on more than one occasion, most explain them as the evangelists' use of a common tradition that had already taken its basic shape.

Why then the extensive differences between the two accounts, such as length (Matthew has over a hundred verses, Luke thirty)? Careful examination of the material indicates that some of the differences arose in the development of the tradition used by each evangelist respectively, and some, especially in wording, arose from the evangelists' adaptation of the tradition for their purposes. Much of Matthew's additional material, however, appears elsewhere in Luke's gospel (e.g., 7.7–11, 13–14, 22–23; Luke 11.2–4, 9–13, 34–36; 12.22–34; 13.23–27) and suggests that Matthew thematically combined other parts of the tradition common to Matthew and Luke (*Q) to expand the "sermon" tradition. And if Matthew has drawn from the larger, common tradition with Luke, it is likely that he also drew from other traditions to fill out this discourse (e.g., 5.17–19, 21–24, 27–28, 33–37; 6.1–8, 9–13, 16–18). Consequently Matthew's Sermon on the Mount represents an underlying "sermon" tradition expanded by the use of other traditions.

Does then the Sermon on the Mount come from Jesus? If one precisely defines the Sermon as the discourse found in Matthew 5–7, the answer is no. Matthew 5–7 as it now stands is the evangelist's final product of an oral/literary process involving several traditions. Yet analysis of the traditions found in the Sermon indicates their strong claim to being rooted in Jesus' own ministry, and to represent his teaching faithfully.

Some have drawn a parallel between Matthew's structure with five discourses (5–7; 10; 13; 18; 23–25) and the five books of Moses (the *Torah). Consequently, the mountain setting and the apparently ethical content of the Sermon have naturally led to interpreting the Sermon as a new law or the messianic Torah given by Jesus, the new *Moses. This view, however, fails to do justice to Matthew's gospel as a whole by relegating the infancy, baptism, and temptation narratives (chaps. 1–4) to the status of a preamble and the passion narrative (chaps. 26–28) to that of an epilogue. It suffers from the lack of evidence that Jesus' role either in the Sermon or in the gospel was that of a new Moses.

Others have found the clue to Matthew's structure in the transitional statement, "From that time on, Jesus began . . ." (4.17; 16.21), which divides Matthew's portrait of Jesus into three parts, the first focused on the person of Jesus Messiah, the second on the presentation of Jesus Messiah, and the third on the passion of Jesus Messiah. In this schema, the Sermon comes as part of Jesus' presentation of himself and his summons to the Kingdom in 4.17–16.20. This reading concurs with Matthew's immediate setting for the Sermon. The discourse in 5–7 and the miraculous deeds in 8–9 are enclosed by the identical programmatic summary in 4.23 and transitional summary in 9.35. These summaries point to Jesus as the promised *Messiah presenting the message of the Kingdom and effecting its work.

The audience of the Sermon is the *disciples, a group that for Matthew has a dual significance. In the context of Jesus' ministry the disciples always refers to the *twelve. But the disciples also represent a model or paradigm of the followers of Jesus in general (28.19; cf. 27.57). They are the community of the Messiah, who have responded to Jesus' message of the Kingdom, and in whose lives the Kingdom is at work. Therefore, the Sermon is also a statement about the identity of the new people of God (5.3–16; 7.13–27) and their conduct in relationship to each other (5.21–48) and to God (6.1–7.11).

The beatitudes (Matt. 5.3–12) bear witness to Jesus and identify the people of the Kingdom. Although Matthew appears to have spiritualized or ethicized the beatitudes to the *poor, the hungry, and the weeping (cf. Luke 6.20b–23), his first four beatitudes reflect a deliberate alignment in wording and order with Isaiah 61 to show Jesus to be the fulfillment of Isaiah's promised messenger anointed by the Spirit (Matt. 3.16) to proclaim the good news of God's deliverance (cf. Matt. 4.23; Luke 4.18–21).

At the same time the beatitudes identify the people of the Kingdom as those who stand before God empty-handed, vulnerable, seeking a right relationship with him and others, open to receive and express his *mercy and *forgiveness with integrity, ready to experience and to establish peace. These are the people of the Kingdom who find themselves at odds with this world. Yet they are the "salt of the earth" (5.13) and the "light of the world" (5.14–15) whose "good works" bring glory to God (5.16).

The demands of the Sermon (5.17–7.12) set forth the "greater righteousness" (5.20) of the followers of Jesus. But Matthew prefaces these demands by noting again that Jesus' coming meant the fulfillment of biblical promises, "the law and the prophets" (5.17).

The first set of demands (5.21–48), often referred to as the "antitheses," assumes a new relationship between individuals that issues in conduct that supersedes the Law. These six demands, like much biblical *law as well as other teachings of Jesus, are more illustrative than comprehensive.

The second set of demands (6.1–7.11) reflects a right relationship with God. These demands fall into two groups, the first of which has three illustrations of traditional Jewish piety (6.1–18). The second group consists of a series of apparently miscellaneous exhortations (6.19–7.11). The connecting link between these two groups of demands may lie in the petitions of the *Lord's Prayer, which was inserted (6.8–15) into the first group (6.1–18) as an example of how to pray. Each exhortation corresponds to a petition of the Lord's Prayer (6.9b–10 = 6.19–24; 6.11 = 6.25–34; 6.12 = 7.1–4; 6.13 = 7.6), and the series concludes with a promise for answered prayer (7.7–11).

Matthew rounds off the demands of the Sermon (5.21–7.11) with the *Golden Rule (7.12). Drawn most likely from the context of love for one's enemy (5.43–48; cf. Luke 6.27–35), this demand, now located after the second set of demands pertaining to one's relationship with God (6.1–7.11), resumes the first set of demands regarding one's relationship with others (5.21–48). Therefore, the heart of the Sermon defines the life of the Kingdom in terms of horizontal (5.21–28) and vertical relationships (6.1–7.11).

The Sermon concludes with three sets of alternatives—two ways, two trees, and two builders (7.13–27). One alternative offers life, the other death or destruction. Jesus' way, followed by few, is the more difficult (7.13–14) but is productive (7.16–17) and capable of weathering the storm of judgment (7.24–25).

But can one really "hear" and "do" Jesus' words as the Sermon suggests? Apart from the beatitudes that appear to bless conduct contrary to what it takes to survive in the real world, can one today love the enemy and live with anger

(5.22), evil thoughts (5.28), the guarantee of one's word (5.34–37), the recourse to legal justice (5.29–40), or even *divorce (5.32)? To understand the Sermon, one must read it in its biblical context woven into the fabric of Matthew's gospel as a statement, above all, about who Jesus is. In this initial discourse, one "hears" Jesus whose words support his preaching about the presence of the Kingdom and point to his person in whom God is acting in keeping with the promise of Isaiah 61. With these words, Jesus declares that a new day has dawned in human relationships because God is offering new relationships with those who are willing to let God be sovereign in their lives (5.3–10). Thus the Sermon is the message of the "good news," the "gospel of the kingdom," that declares "blessed" those who have nothing to claim or cling to before God.

At the same time, the Sermon does offer, in a sense, the ethic of the Kingdom. It sets forth how the people of the Kingdom live in relationship with God and others. When accepting Jesus' words of God's gracious acceptance in the beatitudes, one does not "perform" to achieve God's reward (6.1–18), but, placing one's life in God's hands (6.19–7.6), one responds to God out of gratitude and love. Furthermore, in light of the recognition of God's rule, one is free to leave one's best interest in God's hands and to respond to others out of love rather than self-interest. Only then does the prohibition of anger, lust, and use of legal justice and divorce, or the demand for total honesty and love for the enemy (5.21–48) avoid being utopian.

ROBERT A. GUELICH

Seven Churches, The. The *Revelation to John was addressed to seven churches in the Roman province of *Asia. There were other churches in the province (Colossae and Troas), but seven were chosen to represent the entire church (see Number Symbolism). The letters to these churches (Rev. 2–3) present a picture of diversity in Christianity. The church of *Ephesus, which had been founded by *Paul, and remained for many centuries one of the chief centers of the eastern church, was zealous in guarding against heresy (that of the Nicolaitans), but lacking in Christian love. The church of Smyrna appears to have stood up well under harassment and, sometimes, the imprisonment of its members. Pergamum was an important religious center, with a famous shrine of Zeus, a temple of Asklepios with a renowned medical school, and a temple of Augustus; "Satan's throne" may mean any of these, but probably refers to emperor worship. The church had suffered some persecution but it had remained faithful, though there was some laxity with regard to the Nicolaitans. The church of Thyatira abounded in love and faith, service and patient endurance, but allowed the evil teachings of a prophetess *Jezebel. The church of Sardis was outwardly flourishing, but not without serious damage to its spiritual life. Philadelphia, on the other hand, was a city where Christians were isolated in the community; but the church had remained faithful. At Laodicea the church seemed to be flourishing, but was spiritually poor. (See Map 14:E3.)

Each letter is specific and contains praise and criticism, warning and encouragement as appropriate. But the plural "churches" at the end of each letter shows that they were meant to be read by every church. They are part of the opening vision of Revelation, where John saw the heavenly *Son of man surrounded by seven lampstands, which were the seven churches. The letters show that this was not meant as a picture of an ideal church, but as a means of showing the churches as they really are, with their heresies, quarrels, and weak faith, but also with their faith and hope and love. This introduction to the Revelation plays an essential part in the book's purpose of warning and comfort.

DAVID H. VAN DAALEN

Seven, The. According to Acts 6.1–6, a dispute arose between "Hellenists" and "Hebrews" over the distribution of food to *widows. The *twelve decided that "seven men of good standing" be chosen to oversee the task. In some later Christian traditions this decision is understood as the institution of the office of *deacon, though that title does not occur in the passage.

This passage has traditionally been interpreted as reflecting tension between Jewish and *gentile Christians. But recent scholarship has shown the fine line that existed between Jews and Greeks in this part of the world in the Roman period. Even Acts itself warns against too glib an approach to ethnic and religious identities. The "God-fearers" in Acts (10.2; 13.16, 36) are just such a group who stand on the border between putative Greek and Jewish culture. It is more likely then, that both groups are Jewish Christians, the Hebrews being Aramaic-speakers and the Hellenists perhaps originally from the *Dispersion but now living in Jerusalem. The episode would thus reflect tension between them, a tension resolved by the establishment of a new form of leadership in some ways parallel to the twelve; two of the seven, *Stephen and Philip, are active preachers just like the twelve (Acts 6:8–8.40). The narrative may also be inspired by the accounts of Moses' sharing of leadership (Exod. 18.123–27; Num. 11.16–25).

J. ANDREW OVERMAN

Sex. An appreciation of the biblical concern with the establishment of a holy people—the "children of Abraham," variously understood—reveals the relationship between sexuality and such related issues as virginity, pre- and extramarital sexual behavior, *marriage, polygyny, concubinage, *adultery, and *homosexuality.

Sexual Behavior in the Hebrew Bible. The paradigmatic biblical statement on sexuality and sexual behavior is found in Genesis 1.26–28, the creation of human beings in God's image as male and female with the duty to "be fruitful and multiply," and it reflects the vigorous pronatalist worldview that characterized most of the period of the composition of the Hebrew Bible. From the call of *Abraham in Genesis 12 to the death of *Joseph in Genesis 50, the combined promises of land, heir, and many descendants provide the scaffolding by which the history of earliest Israel is erected (Gen. 12.2; 13.16; 22.17; 24.60; etc.). Israel shared this desire for offspring with its ancient Near Eastern neighbors, as evidenced in the fourteenth-century BCE *Ugaritic epic of Kirta. The threat of the extinction of one's biological line is a commonplace in ancient Near Eastern treaty curses, and was appropriated directly by biblical writers (Deut. 28.18, 32; Josh. 6.26; Ps. 109.13; etc.).

All sexual behavior that did not produce legitimate Israelite offspring to the holy commonwealth was, in varying degrees, censured or controlled, and there was a concomitant double standard with regard to sexual behavior. Premarital virginity, for example, was incumbent only upon females; there is no indication that males were expected to be virgins at marriage, and there is no provision in the Hebrew Bible for lifelong virginity. If a husband accused his wife of not having been a virgin at the time of her marriage, and if his charges were substantiated, the woman was stoned. If, on the other hand, the man's charges were refuted, he was merely flogged and fined (Deut. 22.13–21).

Marriage was regarded as the normal estate of adults by the biblical writers, although in actuality the closing of the Israelite frontier and concomitant laws granting patrimony to the firstborn son would almost certainly have deprived some sons and daughters of the economic resources necessary to establish families of their own. Such unmarried sons were shunted into military, bureaucratic, or clerical careers (e.g., the landless *Levites). Some unmarried women may have found a social role among the temple functionaries termed qādēš/qĕdēšâ (literally, "set apart," but usually translated "sacred prostitute" on the basis of such passages as Gen. 38.21–22 and Deut. 23.18). There is no direct evidence, however, that the wages of such persons were derived from sexual activity (see Prostitution).

The function of marriage in the Hebrew Bible was (a) social (the regulation of sexual behavior, especially of *women); (b) psychological and emotional (to provide companionship for the partners); (c) economic (through family agrarian and artisan enterprises); (d) religious (since the majority of festivals centered on household participation); and, most important, (e) theological (through the procreation, legitimation, and socialization of children, the basis of the people of God). In the majority of biblical writings, children were the supreme example of divine favor (Gen. 12.2; Deut. 28.9–11; Ps. 127.3–5), and childlessness was understood to be a curse (Gen. 15.2, Deut. 28.18, 30).

Endogamy was prescribed (Exod. 34.15–16; Deut. 7.3–6; Josh. 23.11–13), but intermarriage was routine in actuality, especially by kings. The *Samson cycle (Judg. 13–16) vividly illustrated the perceived danger of exogamy. Ezra and Nehemiah (Ezra 9–10; Neh. 10.28–30) attempted to restore ethnic endogamy after the exile, but by Hellenistic times intermarriage was again recorded as a practice among diaspora Jews (Acts 16.1–3; 24.24).

The conviction that procreation is an unqualified good is also reflected in three well-known institutions regulating sexual behavior: polygyny, concubinage, and levirate marriage.

Polygyny seems to have been practiced since the earliest periods of Israelite history, but was probably never statistically prevalent due to the relative affluence necessary to support more than one wife; note *Jacob's fourteen-year indenture for his two wives and two concubines (Gen. 29.20–29). Both *David and *Solomon practiced polygyny on a grand scale (1 Sam. 25.39–43; 27.3; 2 Sam. 3.2–5), although the Deuteronomic theologians admonished even royalty to refrain from the practice because of its religiously adulterating possibilities (Deut. 17.17; cf. 1 Kings 11.1–7).

Although concubines did not enjoy the same rights as a wife, they were socially and legally recognized in ancient Israel. A concubine's children did not share the rights of a wife's children, unless, like *Hagar, sexual contact with the concubine was for the explicit purpose of producing heirs, in which case the children became the wife's children (Gen. 21.14; 25.5–6). Wives and concubines of a deposed or conquered king were considered war booty (2 Sam. 12.8; 1 Kings 20.3). Thus, *Absalom's public intercourse with David's concubines during the latter's flight from Jerusalem was considered treasonous (2 Sam. 16.20–22), and Adonijah's request for the concubine Abishag amounted to insurrection (1 Kings 2.13–25).

Although the legislation concerning *levirate marriage (Deut. 25.5–10) specifies the brother of the deceased as bearer of the responsibility to marry his widowed sister-in-law, the story of Judah and Tamar in Genesis 38 indicates that the responsibility to the widow rested with the dead man's family, not merely with his brother (v. 26). Further, "to preserve the name" refers to the dead man's property, not merely to his nominal existence, as is clear from the account in Ruth 4. *Josephus is probably correct, then, in seeing the purpose of levirate marriage to be threefold: to continue a lineage, to prevent the alienation of family property, and to provide for the social and economic welfare of *widows (Ant. 4.8.254). Levirate marriage was at least known (if not actually practiced) into the Hellenistic period (cf. Matt. 22.22–33).

All sexual behavior that did not contribute to the biblical notion of "the children of Israel" was proscribed. *Homosexuality, bestiality, contraception, and masturbation were all prohibited, directly or by inference. *Adultery—sexual activity between a married woman and a man of any marital status—is consistently condemned in the biblical writings (Exod. 20.14, 17; Lev. 18.20, 20.10; Num. 5.11–31; Deut. 22.22–29; Matt. 5.32). Sexual activity by an unmarried woman, whether for hire or not, was termed *prostitution (the same Hebrew words, zānâ and its derivatives, are also translated as "to fornicate," "to be a harlot, a whore") and the response ranged from toleration (in the case of *Rahab, Josh. 2) to burning (in the case of a priest's daughter, Lev. 21.9; cf. Gen. 38.24). Harlotry as a metaphor for spiritual unfaithfulness was used by the prophets to denounce Israel's apostasy.

A conspicuous exception to the dominant sexual ideology of the Bible is the *Song of Solomon. The Song's frank erotic imagery, its indifference to social proprieties such as marriage and reproduction, and its lack of overtly religious sentiments have forced generations of exegetes to allegorize its sensuality to bring it into harmony with the social control of sexuality sought by most biblical authors.

Sexual Behavior in the Greco-Roman Period. Beginning in the later books of the Hebrew Bible and continuing through the New Testament, there is a general decline in the value of sexuality and a tendency toward exaggerating its sinfulness. This shift in attitude resulted less from the influence of apocalyptic religious thought than from the Greco-Roman cultural hegemony of the third century BCE to the second century CE. *Philo (ca. 20 BCE–ca. 50 CE) interpreted the *Septuagint's reordering of the *Ten Commandments to place adultery at the top of the list of sins against one's neighbor, before murder and theft (Exod. 20.13–15: LXX; Deut. 5.17–19: LXX), to indicate that adultery was the most serious of all sins (De Dec. 121, 131). Philo also condemned any expression of sexuality, even within marriage, that was not for the purpose of procreation (Spec. Leg. 3.32–36).

The *Essenes at *Qumran, who believed that they were living on the eve of the final eschatological battle between "the children of light and the children of darkness," considered themselves especially susceptible to pollution from sexual contact (1QM 7.4–7), and so some of them, according to statements of Philo (Apol. 14–17), Josephus (War 2.8.120–21; Ant. 18.121) and other ancient sources, renounced marriage and reproduction. The paucity of juvenile and female skeletons in the Qumran cemetery lends credence to these statements.

Early Christian attitudes toward sexuality arose from this background of Hellenistic asceticism, Jewish *apocalypticism, and *ethics inherited from the Hebrew Bible. Adultery and homosexuality are forbidden, for example (e.g., Rom. 1.26–27; 1 Tim. 1.10), and other sexual activities are proscribed, such as fornication by males as well as females (1 Cor. 6.9). We find in the *synoptic Gospels antimarital and antifamilial sentiments attributed to Jesus (Matt. 8.21–22; 10.34–37; 19.10–12; Luke 8.19–21; 11.27–28), and *Paul unambiguously counseled the Corinthian Christians that marriage represented a compromise of the spiritual life, the highest degree of which was attainable only by celibates like Paul (1 Cor. 7.1, 7–9; cf. Matt. 19.10–12; Rev. 14.4).

New Testament endorsement of marital sexuality and *family life is clearest in the Deutero-Pauline and pastoral letters, where the patriarchal household current in the Mediterranean world of the first century CE (with such modifications as premarital chastity for males) was assumed as the Christian norm (Eph. 5.22–24; 1 Tim. 2.15; 4.1–4; 5.14; cf. Heb. 13.4). The tension between sexual renunciation and full participation in married life was not decisively resolved in early Christianity, however, as both apocryphal and patristic writings attest (e.g., Acts of Paul and Thecla; Tertullian, Exhort. Chast. 3; Jerome, Jov. 1.40).

See also Know. GENE MCAFEE

Shalmaneser V. Shulmanu-ashared, King of *Assyria (727–722 BCE); otherwise known as Ululayu ("born in the month Ululu"). As son of his predecessor, *Tiglath-pileser III (745–727 BCE), Shalmaneser served as administrator in Calah, the Assyrian capital, while his father campaigned in foreign lands. After Tiglath-pileser's death, Shalmaneser inherited the dual monarchy of Assyria and *Babylonia and ruled for almost five years. Because Shalmaneser's reign was unexpectedly brief, court scribes had not drafted an official account of his campaigns and building achievements before his death; accordingly, his known royal inscriptions consist chiefly of eight Assyrian-Aramaic bilingual texts on lion weights from Calah. Thus, the events of his reign must be reconstructed at present principally from later cuneiform inscriptions, the Assur Ostracon, brief references in 2 Kings, and Hellenistic texts such as *Josephus's Antiquities. Shalmaneser was on the throne when *Samaria fell to the Assyrians in 722 after a three-year siege (Babylonian Chronicle, I.28; 2 Kings 17.5–6, 18.9–10); but the subsequent deportation of the Israelites probably took place in 720 under his successor, Sargon II (722–705 BCE). JOHN A. BRINKMAN

Sheba, Queen of. A ruler of a people called the Sabeans, who occupied a territory in southwest Arabia, approximately where Yemen is today (see Map 6:G6). The Semitic inhabitants of Sheba built up a far-reaching trade, especially in spices and precious metals and stones; they colonized nearby parts of Africa, including the Ethiopian coast. Sheba was a prosperous land and thus a symbol of wealth (Isa. 43.3; 45.14; Joel 3.8; Ps. 72.10).

In the tenth century BCE, Sheba's queen is said to have visited *Solomon, the king of Israel (1 Kings 10.1–13; 2 Chron. 9.1–12). She arrived with extravagant gifts and with questions to test Solomon's wisdom. Her visit reflects several important and interrelated features of Solomonic rule: internationalism, diplomacy, and sagacity. Solomon's peaceful domination of far-flung territories was sustained through his skill as a diplomat rather than through the repeated show of military force, and his close ties with foreign nations is evident in the numerous relationships he is said to have established with women from outside his native land. Such diplomatic skill, particularly on the international level, is associated throughout the ancient Near East with wisdom. The Queen of Sheba's interaction with Solomon exemplifies that connection. The report of her visit to *Jerusalem is a vehicle for the biblical author to extol Solomon's wealth and wisdom. Furthermore, the Queen of Sheba, by transporting some of her nation's wealth to Jerusalem, thus aggrandizes the capital of Solomon's empire and contributes to the assertion of Jerusalem's prominence in the Near East at that time.

According to later legend, the relationship between Solomon and the queen was more intimate, and their son was the founder of the (former) royal house of Ethiopia.

CAROL L. MEYERS

Shechem. A major Canaanite and Israelite city in the hill country of Ephraim (Map 1:X4), Shechem first appears in the historical record as an enemy of *Egypt in an execration text and on a stele of the nineteenth century BCE. During the *Amarna period (fourteenth century), Shechem, under its ruler, Labayu, and his sons, asserted itself against the other Canaanite city-states and, hence, against the weakening Egyptian hegemony in Canaan.

Shechem appears prominently in the ancestral narratives. *Abraham had a *theophany near Shechem and built an altar there (Gen. 12.6–7), as did *Jacob (Gen. 33.18–20). In Genesis 34, *Simeon and *Levi kill the inhabitants of Shechem and plunder it in retaliation for the rape of their sister Dinah by Shechem, son of Hamor (cf. Gen. 49.5–7). *Joseph's body was brought back from Egypt and buried at Shechem (Josh. 24.32; see also the somewhat erroneous Acts 7.16), and *Joshua's great *covenant renewal ceremony took place there (Josh. 24). The first abortive Israelite attempt at *kingship under Abimelech was centered at Shechem, but Abimelech exacted a terrible revenge in the city after a mutual falling out (Judg. 9). It was to Shechem that Jeroboam I went to be crowned first king of *Israel (1 Kings 12.1), and it served as his first capital (1 Kings 12.25).

Shechem has been located at the site of Tell Balatah, guarding the pass between Mount Ebal to the north and Mount Gerezim to the south, near modern Nablus. After earlier village occupation of the site in the Chalcolithic period, a large and well-fortified urban center developed at Shechem in the Middle Bronze Age (ca. 1850–1550 BCE). Of particular interest are the temples found at the site, including one designated the "fortress temple" because of its massive walls. After a violent destruction at the end of the Middle Bronze Age, presumably by one of the early pharaohs of Dynasty XVIII, Shechem lay uninhabited for close to a century. Completely rebuilt, probably with Egyptian consent, the city prospered during the first part of the Late Bronze Age, only to suffer destruction at the hands of Labayu's enemies, whether Egyptian or Canaanite or both. The subsequent Late Bronze Age city was not as prosperous, yet it managed to survive into the early Iron Age, when it probably passed peacefully into Israelite hands. The destruction of Shechem in the late twelfth century is generally attributed to Abimelech. Shechem recovered to some extent during the following centuries, becoming a town of some importance, until it was once again destroyed, this time by the *Assyrians in their campaign of conquest of the northern kingdom Israel (724–722 BCE). The habitation of Shechem remained poor and sparse throughout the remainder of the Iron Age and the first part of the Persian period. During the Hellenistic period (as of ca. 330 BCE) Shechem regained some of its ancient importance and glory as the *Samaritan rival of Jerusalem. The city was finally destroyed in 107 BCE by the Hasmonean John Hyrcanus. CARL S. EHRLICH

Shema. The first word of Deuteronomy 6.4 in Hebrew, "Shema" is used as the name of the verse as a whole ("Hear, O Israel, YHWH is our God, YHWH alone/is one"). While acknowledging that the Shema was a central confessional statement of ancient Israel, modern scholars do not agree on its interpretation. If it is connected with the centralization of the cult in Jerusalem during the reforms of *Josiah in the late sixth century BCE, then it could mean that there is only one acceptable manifestation of YHWH, namely in Jerusalem. The Shema could also imply that among all gods Israel is to worship only YHWH (henotheism), or that YHWH is the only God (*monotheism). It is in this latter sense that the Shema has become the central Jewish declaration of faith in one God. The Shema in its expanded form includes Deuteronomy 6.5–9 (love of God); 11.13–21 (rewards and punishments for observance); and Numbers 15.37–41 (duty of remembrance). It is recited by observant Jews as part of the morning and evening prayers (Deut. 6.7), as well as before going to sleep. Deuteronomy 6.4–9 and 11.13–21, written on parchment, are also to be found in *phylacteries (Exod. 13.9, 16; Deut. 6.8; 11.18) and on doorposts (mězûzôt; Deut. 6.9; 11.20). Following the lead of Rabbi Akiba (died ca. 135 CE), the Shema is to be recited before death, especially in cases of martyrdom. The early and great importance of the Shema is underlined by Jesus' reference to it as the greatest commandment (Matt. 22.34–40 par.). CARL S. EHRLICH

Sheol. See Hell.

Shibboleth ("flowing stream" or "ear of grain"). In Judges 12.1–4, troops from *Ephraim crossed the Jordan, angry with the east-bank Gileadites for not including them in the Ammonite war reported in Judges 11 (ca. 1100 BCE). The Gileadites fought the Ephraimites, defeated them, and secured the fords by which the surviving Ephraimites would cross back to their own land. Ephraimites who wanted to escape would simply claim not to be Ephraimites; the Gileadites discovered these impostors by having them pronounce the word written in the Hebrew text as šibbolet. The Ephraimites could not pronounce the word properly; the Hebrew text represents their pronunciation as sibbolet (Judg. 12.6). The two dialects had different pronunciations for the same word, and the story might mean that the Ephraimites simply slipped and used their own pronunciation. The text implies, however, that the Ephraimites were not able to pronounce a consonant that existed in the Gileadite dialect (the initial sibilant of the word in question).

JO ANN HACKETT

Ships and Sailing. Despite Israel's proximity to the Mediterranean, the Israelites were never a seafaring people. By contrast, Canaanites in the Late Bronze Age (ca. 1500–1200 BCE) seem to have traded extensively by sea, and the *Philistines came by sea to establish themselves in Palestine simultaneously with the emergence of Israel. In the first millennium BCE Israel's *Phoenician neighbors to the north controlled several excellent harbors and became the great maritime people of the ancient world.

Southern Palestine's coastal *geography was generally unsuited for harborage, and Israel seldom controlled the modest harbor towns of Acco, Dor, Joppa, and Ashkelon. Before the tenth century BCE the tribes of *Zebulun (Gen. 49.13) and *Dan and *Asher (Judg. 5.17) possibly went to sea, but in the Bible, ships often belong to foreigners, and Israel's attitude toward them can be wary (Isa. 33.21; Deut. 28.68; Judg. 5.17; Prov. 30.19).

Only during the reign of *Solomon in the tenth century BCE does Israel seem to have engaged in significant sea trade (1 Kings 9.26–28; 10.11, 22; 2 Chron. 8.18; 9.21). Israel and Tyre joined fleets to sail the lucrative Red Sea trade route to Ophir (southern Arabia and/or East Africa) and possibly to the Indian Ocean for such valuable commodities as spices and gold. Subsequent rulers of Judah and Israel failed to revive this maritime commerce (1 Kings 22.48, 49; 2 Chron. 20.35–37; 26.2).

The recurring phrase "ships of Tarshish" (1 Kings 10.22; Ps. 48.7; Isa. 2.16; 23.1; 60.9; cf. Jon. 1.3) seems to be a generic term referring to foreign (probably Phoenician) ships propelled by a combination of sails and oars. It derives from Phoenician trade with a place called Tarshish whose exact location was perhaps Anatolia, Cyprus, or the Mediterranean coast of Spain. Ezekiel 27 contains an elaborate description of these vessels (see also Isa. 33.23).

Many poetic references to ships and sailors relate to the ancient mythic tradition of Yahweh's power over the sea (Exod. 15; Pss. 48.7; 77.19; 104.25–26; 107.23; Ezek. 27.26; Jon. 1). Isaiah 60.9 reflects this theme in the promise that Israel will return to *Zion in ships of Tarshish (cf. Dan. 11.30). Later echoes appear in Wisdom of Solomon 14.1–4, and in the New Testament when Jesus calms the storm that threatens his disciples' boat (Mark 6.47–52; cf. Isa. 43.16). (See also Israel, Religion of.)

The tale of *Noah's ark (Gen 6.5–9.19) belongs to a story tradition that Israel shared with Mesopotamia, where boats and towed barges were common forms of transport. The description of the *ark, however, suggests that it was not a boat at all but a sort of enclosed box with no sail or oars and with a single window. For later Christians the ark came to symbolize the church and its salvation.

Several of Jesus' disciples sailed fishing boats on the freshwater Sea of *Galilee (Matt. 4.18–22), and Jesus often made use of these craft (Luke 5.3; Matt. 9.1). In 1986 archaeologists discovered a well-preserved example of such a boat from the first century BCE, just below shore level in the Sea of Galilee.

*Paul is the most famous sea traveler of the New Testament. His Mediterranean journeys profited from Roman domination of the seas and improvements in shipbuilding techniques. Even so, he was shipwrecked several times (2 Cor. 11.25; cf. Acts 27).

MARY JOAN WINN LEITH

Showbread. Also "shewbread" (KJV) or "bread of the Presence" (NRSV). The showbread in the *tabernacle and *Temple lay on a table in the holy place and was replaced weekly (1 Sam. 21.6; cf. Exod 25.30; 1 Chron. 9.32; 2 Chron. 13.11). Made of choice flour, topped with pure *frankincense, and arranged in two rows of six loaves each, the showbread was to be eaten only by the Aaronid *priests (Lev. 24.5–9). The giving of showbread by the priest of Nob to *David and his men was therefore exceptional (1 Sam. 21.1–6; Matt. 12.3–4 par.). GARY N. KNOPPERS

Silas. As representatives of the church in Jerusalem, Silas and Judas/Barsabbas are sent to Antioch to report on the decree of the *Apostolic Council (Acts 15.22). They are then said to return to Jerusalem (15.33), but several verses later, Silas is chosen to accompany *Paul on a new missionary journey. Silas is described as a *prophet (15.32), but in Acts he follows Paul silently through Macedonia until Beroea, and rejoins him in Corinth (18.5), after which he is not mentioned again. Paul refers to a coworker named Silvanus in some of his letters (2 Cor. 1.19; 1 Thess. 1.1; 2 Thess. 1.1; cf. 1 Pet. 5:12), leading to the common assumption that the Silvanus named in the letters is identical with the Silas described in Acts.

DANIEL N. SCHOWALTER

Silvanus. See Silas.

Simeon.

1. The name given to *Jacob's second oldest son, born to *Leah (Gen. 29.33). After the *conquest, the tribe descended from Simeon was given territory in the south of *Canaan, within the land later controlled by Judah (Josh. 19.1–9).

2. In the New Testament, Simeon is the name of a devout man, said to be waiting for the "consolation of Israel," introduced by Luke (2.25–35). When he sees the infant Jesus being brought into the Temple, he gives praise for having seen God's salvation; his brief words are traditionally known by the first two words of the Latin translation, Nunc Dimittis. Simeon also informs *Mary that Jesus' coming would have an impact on all of Israel and that she would suffer as well.

DANIEL N. SCHOWALTER

Simon Peter. The son of Jonah (Matt. 16.17) or John (John 1.42); originally he was known as Simon (or Simeon, Acts 15.12). According to the Gospels, Jesus gave him the name Peter, the Greek translation of an Aramaic word "Cepha(s)" meaning "stone, rock" (Mark 3.16; Matt. 16.18; John 1.42). He and his brother Andrew were fishermen (Mark 1.16) of the poorer class, since apparently they did not own a boat. He was among the first disciples whom Jesus called (Mark 1.17; John 1.40–42). Married (Mark 1.29–31), his wife later traveled with him on some of his missionary journeys (1 Cor. 9.5).

An *apostle and one of the *twelve (Mark 3.14–19), he was prominent among them, belonging to a small inner group (Mark 5.37; 9.2; 13.3; 14.33). He often acted as their spokesperson (Mark 8.29; 11.21; 14.29), especially in acknowledging Jesus as the *Messiah, though he did not understand Jesus would have to suffer (Mark 8.27–33). On several other occasions he is presented in a poor light (Matt. 14.28–31; Mark 9.5–6; 14.29–31), particularly in the gospel of *Mark and especially in his denial of Jesus (Mark 14.66–72). We should, however, remember that the purpose of the Gospels is to inform us about Jesus, not to give a biography of Peter. Peter's failures serve to highlight Jesus' courage and compassion.

After the resurrection, Peter was the first male disciple to see the risen Jesus (Luke 24.34; 1 Cor. 15.5), and he quickly took a leading position in the young church (Acts 1–12, 15; Gal. 1.18–19; 2.1–10). According to Luke, he preached (Acts 2.14–36; 3.12–26; etc.), healed the sick (Acts 3.1–10; 9.32–42), went as envoy from Jerusalem to oversee the work of other missionaries (Acts 8.14–25), and suffered for his faith (Acts 4.13–22; 5.17–41; 12.1–11). Guided by a vision, he was the first to preach to and convert *gentiles (Acts 10.1–11.18), and he supported *Paul on this matter in the council of Acts 15. Paul's own account of Peter's position in the controversy differs somewhat; in Galatians we are told that on a visit to Antioch, Peter refused to have full fellowship with gentile Christians (Gal. 2.11–14). At either the council of Acts 15 or another (Gal. 2.1–10), Paul was allotted the gentiles as his missionary concern and Peter the Jews. After this Peter disappears from the New Testament story. *James, the brother of Jesus, apparently became the sole leader of the Jerusalem church, and Peter went traveling (1 Cor. 9.5). He may have visited *Corinth and/or the areas mentioned in 1 Peter 1.1 and came to Rome shortly before his death. Extrabiblical tradition says that he was martyred when Nero persecuted the Christians there (64 CE). Yet later tradition claims that St. Peter's in Rome was built over his burial place.

The meaning of Jesus' words to Peter in Matthew 16.17–19 have been disputed. Is the rock Peter himself, his confession, or Peter as confessor? Is the power of the keys that of ecclesiastical discipline or of admitting to the church through preaching? Is binding and loosing the determination of what is correct and orthodox or the power to excommunicate? Is this power restricted to Peter alone or given to the whole church (Matt. 18.18)? Were the words of 16.17–19 spoken by the incarnate Jesus, the risen Jesus (cf. John 21.15–19), or did they come into being later to represent the position Peter actually attained?

Two of the writings of the New Testament are attributed to him (see Peter, The Letters of). Early tradition associates him with the gospel of *Mark. Some later *apocryphal writings were written in his name, a gospel of Peter and at least two apocalypses. There was also an Acts of Peter. Their appearance indicates his importance for the second-century church. In the first century, there was a group that strongly supported him (1 Cor. 1.12; 3.22; 9.5).

ERNEST BEST

Sin. Sin is basically an offense against God. Although by sinning people cannot do God any actual harm, they do act against God by despising him and his commandments, and by injuring others (or themselves), since the person injured is also an object of divine providence and protection. The principal Hebrew words for sin express these basic notions. The verb ḥāṭā' and the nouns related to it, such as its Greek translation hamartanō and its derivatives, means originally to miss a target or to fail to reach it; with the connotation "to sin," it is used most frequently in relation to God, as a violation of his law. The verb pāša' and the noun peša' mean rebellion, either against a human being, such as a king (1 Kings 12.19), or against God (Isa. 1.2). Both of the words just discussed are used together in Isaiah 43.27 and Job 34.37. A third main word for sin in Hebrew is 'āwōn, which can mean an offense, the guilt resulting from it, or the punishment that follows (see Gen. 4.13).

In the *Dead Sea Scrolls and other postbiblical Jewish literature, there is a tendency to speak of sin less as an individual deed than as a power that governs men and women and inspires their conduct. This is particularly the case with the nouns 'āwel and 'awlâ, meaning "wickedness." Correspondingly, the role of the opposite force, the "holy spirit," is stressed in these writings. Depending on such passages as Isaiah 11.1–9; Jeremiah 31.33–34; and Ezekiel 36.26–27, several passages speak of this "holy spirit" as repairing the broken relationship between God and human beings (see, e.g., 1QS IV.20–23).

The New Testament vocabulary for sin is largely that of the *Septuagint, where the word hamartanō and its derivatives can translate all three Hebrew terms discussed above. Another important word is anomia, literally meaning lawlessness, which mainly translates 'āwōn but can also be used for peša' and rāšā', "wicked." Also used to translate peša' are asebeia, meaning impiety, and its derivatives.

In the Gospels, sin is often understood as a kind of debt. This metaphor is found in Jewish tradition and is developed in the *Lord's Prayer, whose fifth petition links divine forgiveness of human sins to a corresponding human forgiveness of others; see also Matthew 6.14–15; 18.23–25; and note especially Sirach 28.2. The *synoptic Gospels speak of sins to be forgiven in the plural (e.g., Mark 2.5), but this plural form is found only three times in the gospel of *John (8.24; 9.34; 20.23), probably in dependence on earlier traditions. More often hamartia, in the singular, means not just a particular sinful deed (as in Matt. 12.31), but a state or even a power that separates a person and the world as a whole from God. This power is personified as the devil, or *Satan, who is the adversary of God's Son and his followers (1 John 3.8–10; cf. 2 Thess. 2.1–12).

In Romans 5–7, *Paul elaborates the view that sin, like death, originated with *Adam; long dormant, its power emerged simultaneously with the giving of the *Law. Christ's death was the expiatory sacrifice (Rom. 8.3; cf. 2 Cor. 5.21) that liberated human beings from their enslavement to the power of sin.

See also Fall, The; Temptation.

LEOPOLD SABOURIN, S.J.

Sinai (Map 2:S–T2–4). A triangular peninsula, bordered on the north by the Mediterranean Sea, on the west by the Gulf of Suez and the Suez Canal, and on the east by the Gulf of Aqaba/Eilat. Moving from the coastland south, the terrain gradually rises to the Ijma Plateau, near the center of the peninsula. The region south of the plateau becomes mountainous before the terrain descends to a narrow coastland between the mountains and the gulfs. From the fourth millennium BCE the mountains have been mined for copper, which was exported to both Egypt and Canaan.

It is generally assumed that somewhere on this peninsula is Mount Sinai, the mountain from which Moses reputedly delivered the *Ten Commandments to the Israelites, but evidence is scant for determining which of the many mountains was called Mount Sinai during the time of the wilderness wanderings. Since Sinai is the wilderness nearest Egypt, this seems the most likely place for Mount Sinai (Num. 33.8–10; Deut. 1.1; Josephus, Apion 2.2.25), but there are problems. The mountain from which Moses received the commandments is sometimes called Sinai (generally in *J and *P) and sometimes *Horeb (*E and *D). It is also labeled "the mountain of God" (Exod. 3.1; 4.27; etc.) and simply "the mountain." It is not certain whether these were different names for the same place or different mountains. Some have thought it was initially Horeb but was renamed Sinai after the peninsula, but no one knows when the peninsula was named "Sinai"; neither Josephus nor Paul (Gal. 4.25) calls it by that name.

One of the ways scholars have tried to identify Mount Sinai has been to conjecture the route the Israelites traveled on their way to Canaan. Since the most direct route from Egypt follows the Mediterranean coastline, some have assumed that the Israelites took this route, and that one of the nearby mountains in the northern lowland or southern Canaan was Mount Sinai, but archaeological remains show that the Egyptians had this well-traveled route fortified (and see Exod. 13.17); consequently, refugees probably avoided such confrontation. It is more likely that they turned south (see Num. 33.8–10). Since they reportedly lived in this wilderness for about forty years, they may not have planned originally to settle in Canaan.

The most popular candidate for Mount Sinai is Jebel Musa ("the mountain of Moses"; Map 2:S4) near Saint Catherine's Monastery. This identification was apparently first made by Byzantine monks in the fourth century CE, and there is no evidence to show that they had any local data that are not known today for choosing the site. Most of the modern sites are named after plants, trees, and topographical features, and they provide no clues to ancient Israelite history. Other possible sites include several mountains in northwestern Arabia, and Mount Karkom in Machtesh Ramon just west of the Arabah; the latter conjecture, made in 1985, was based on art and architecture found on and around Karkom, but it depends on a date for the *Exodus in the third millennium BCE.

When Byzantine monks settled in Sinai (300–600 CE) they were able to dig wells, make terraces and direct rainfall, and raise gardens and orchards in valleys. The Emperor Justinian had a church constructed and a monastery fortified (527 CE); this was later called Saint Catherine's Convent. Within an area of two square miles is the Byzantine identification of the site of the burning bush, the place where Moses struck the rock, the mountain where God spoke to Moses, and the hill where Aaron made the golden calf. The monks apparently found an isolated location in this historic peninsula where they could survive. They then identified biblical sites with places in their immediate surroundings.

GEORGE WESLEY BUCHANAN

Sirach (Ecclesiasticus). One of the earliest of the deuterocanonical/apocryphal books (see Apocrypha, article on Jewish Apocrypha), Sirach is the most extensive portion of Israelite *wisdom literature preserved in the Bible. Modeled in great part on *Proverbs, Sirach is a compilation of materials that include moral and ethical maxims, folk proverbs, psalms of praise and lament, theological reflections, homiletic exhortations, and pointed observations about Jewish life and religious mores in the second century BCE. It is one of the longest books of the Bible.

Authorship and Unity. Sirach is one of the rare books of the Hebrew Bible that was actually written by the author to whom the book is ascribed. In 50.27, he identifies himself as "Jesus (Hebr. yēšûaʿ), son of Eleazar, son of (Hebr. ben) Sira (Grk. S[e]irach)"; hence, the name Ben Sira, or Sirach, which is found in the title of the book in Greek. Since the extant Hebrew manuscripts begin with 3.6b, we do not know what title the book had in Hebrew. The Latin title, Ecclesiasticus, probably means "the ecclesiastical (or church) [book]," because it was used so widely in the Christian liturgy.

After the introduction (1.1–10), the book opens (1.11–30) with a carefully crafted twenty-two-line nonalphabetic poem (there are twenty-two letters in the Hebrew alphabet) on the fear of the Lord as the foundation and source of true wisdom and closes, like Proverbs (31.10–31), with an elegant alphabetic *acrostic poem (51.13–30) in which Ben Sira tells how he prayed for wisdom and sought after her (here, as elsewhere in the Bible, wisdom is personified as a woman; see Wisdom), not for himself alone but also to impart her to others who came to him. This major inclusion (1.11–30 and 51.13–30) clearly suggests that all the material between the two poems is by the same author. From his youth, Ben Sira had been a pious and devoted student of the Law and of the traditions of Israel, and he became a professional *scribe, a vocation he extols in 38.34–39.11. According to 50.27 (Greek text), he lived in Jerusalem, but like many other educated persons of his day he traveled widely (34.12; cf. 39.4) and acquired "much cleverness" (34.11). Ben Sira was also willing to learn the wisdom of other nations (cf. 39.2–4). He composed his book not for personal gain (cf. 51.25) but "for all who seek instruction" (33.18). He ran a school or academy (cf. 51.23) for young men; this fact accounts for the male orientation found throughout the book (see below, Contents and Theology).

Date and Authenticity. The book was written originally in Hebrew, as Ben Sira's grandson states explicitly in the foreword to his Greek translation. But the Hebrew text, apart from some quotations in rabbinic literature, had been lost for centuries. Between 1896 and 1900, four fragmentary Hebrew manuscripts (called A, B, C, and D), which could be dated from the tenth to the twelfth centuries CE, were recovered from the Geniza (storage room) of the Qaraite synagogue in Old Cairo. A fifth manuscript (E) was discovered in 1931, a sixth (F) in 1982, and more leaves of manuscripts B and C in 1958 and 1960. Several scholars have questioned the authenticity of the Geniza text because of the presence of some retroversions from Syriac and Greek. But the common scholarly opinion favors authenticity. Further Hebrew fragments, found at *Qumran and dating from the second half of the first century BCE and the first half of the first century CE, and at Masada (first half of the first century BCE) have corroborated the substantial authenticity of the Hebrew text found in the six Geniza manuscripts. Nonetheless, since these manuscripts do contain some retroversions from Syriac and probably a few from Greek, one must take into account all the principal witnesses before deciding on the best form of a text. About two-thirds of the book is now extant in Hebrew.

The date when Ben Sira composed the book can be calculated on the basis of information provided in the foreword. The grandson writes that he "came to Egypt in the thirty-eighth year of the reign of Euergetes and stayed for some time." The year would be 132 BCE, in the reign of Ptolemy VII Physcon Euergetes who began his rule in 170 BCE as co-regent with his brother Ptolemy VI. If we allow sufficient time between grandson and grandfather, we arrive at a date ca. 180 BCE for the composition of the book. This date receives support from the book itself. In 50.1–21, Ben Sira writes a lengthy panegyric on Simeon II, who was high priest from 219–196 BCE. This poem gives the impression that Simeon had been dead for several years. The Greek translation was published in Egypt some time after 117 BCE. The Greek is the most important witness to the text whenever the Hebrew is not extant.

Canonicity. Although written in Hebrew and published in Jerusalem even before the book of *Daniel, Sirach was excluded from the Jewish *canon despite the fact that it was employed in the ancient synagogue services. The probable reason is that the *Pharisees who defined the Jewish canon near the end of the first century CE disliked some of Ben Sira's theology (e.g., his denial of retribution in the afterlife), which resembled the teachings of the *Sadducees. Nevertheless, Sirach was often cited by the later rabbis, some of whom even introduced quotations from it with the words "(as) it is written," a phrase that was used exclusively for quotations from scripture. The church from as early as the second and third centuries (e.g., Didache, Clement of Rome, Polycarp, Irenaeus, Tertullian) accepted into its canon Sirach and all the other deuterocanonical books found in the *Septuagint. In the sixteenth century, Martin Luther decided in favor of the Jewish canon of the Hebrew Bible; other Protestants followed his lead in rejecting the canonicity of the deuterocanonical books. Like the Orthodox churches, the Roman Catholic church, however, has retained the older Christian canon, which was formally defined at the Council of Trent in 1546.

Contents and Theology. Being a typical work of Hebrew wisdom, Sirach offers advice and gnomic sayings on a wide variety of topics of concern to the Jewish community. Like Proverbs, Sirach generally manifests no discernible order of subject matter, nor is there any obvious coherence. The only exception is found in chaps. 44–50, which in Hebrew manuscript B are entitled appropriately "Praise of the Ancestors of Old"; the opening line of this section is the well-known "Let us now praise famous men" (KJV). Unlike Proverbs, however, Sirach consists of larger units, generally from ten lines (or bicola) to the classic twenty-two- and twenty-three-line lengths (e.g., 1.11–30; 6.18–37; 21.1–21; 29.1–20; 38.24–34; 49.1–16 [the closing poem on Israel's great ancestors]; 51.13–30). Ben Sira learned the twenty-two- and twenty-three-line poetic convention from such compositions as Proverbs 2; 6.20–7.6; 7.7–27; 31.10–31; Psalms 9–10; 25; 33; 34; 94; 145; Lamentations 5.

In addition to several major poems extolling wisdom and the Lord as source of wisdom (1.1–10, 11–30; 4.11–19; 6.18–37; 16.24–17.23; 19.20–30; 24.1–31; 37.16–26; 39.12–35; 42.15–43.33), Ben Sira offers aphorisms and comments on such subjects as humility (3.17–24; 4.8; 7.16–17; 10.26–28), charity (3.30–4.6, 8–10; 7.32–36; 12.1–7; 29.8–13), pride, folly, and other sins (3.26–28; 10.6–18; 16.5–23; 20.2–31; 21.1–22.2), virtues and vices of the tongue (5.6–6.1; 19.5–17; 20.5–8, 13, 16–20, 24–31; 22.6, 27–23.4, 7–15; 27.4–7; 28.12–26), anger, malice, and vengeance (27.22–28.11). He also gives practical advice on such topics as one's attitude and behavior regarding parents (3.1–16; 7.27–28), children (7.23–25; 16.1–4; 30.1–13; 41.5–10), friends and associates (6.5–17; 11.29–34; 12.8–13.23; 22.19–26; 27.16–21; 37.1–15), wealth (11.10–11, 14, 18–19, 23–28; 13.15–14.10; 31.1–11), poverty (10.30–11.6, 14; 13.18–14.2; 25.2–3), enjoying life (14.11–19), loans (29.1–7, 14–20); health and physicians (30.14–20; 38.1–15), death (38.16–23), table etiquette (31.12–32.13; 37.27–31), shame (41.14–42.1d).

In various sections of the book, he writes at length about *women (3.2–6; 7.19, 24–26; 9.1–9; 19.2–4; 22.3–5; 23.22–26; 25.1, 8, 13–26.18; 28.15; 33.20; 36.26–31; 40.19, 23; 42.6, 9–14). He deals with woman as daughter, wife, mother, adulteress, or prostitute, and much of what he says is offensive to the contemporary western reader. But in the society for which he wrote, Ben Sira would not have been considered an extremist; rather, he was a typical Jewish male of the period, who lived in a patriarchal society in which women had few rights as free and autonomous human beings. A female was subject to either her father or her husband. In Exodus 20.17, a wife is even listed with a husband's property. It must be remembered that Ben Sira was writing only for young Jewish men in a male-centered society; it was not his intention to instruct women. It is in this context that his (often deplorable) statements about women are to be evaluated.

The theology of Sirach is essentially Deuteronomic; hence, it is traditional and conservative. He reflects the teachings of earlier biblical books on such subjects as God, the election of Israel, retribution, morality, kindness to the *poor and disadvantaged, the centrality of fear of the Lord. The expression "fear of the Lord/God" occurs about sixty times in Sirach, and the term "wisdom" about fifty-five times. In 1.1–2.18 there is a detailed treatise on wisdom as fear of the Lord. The fundamental thesis of Sirach is that wisdom, which is identified with the *Law (chap. 24), is bestowed only on one who fears the Lord (19.20). God grants wisdom to those who love him (1.10), that is, those who "keep the commandments" (1.26). Fear of the Lord, which is "the beginning of wisdom" (1.14; cf. Prov. 9.10), "gives gladness and joy and long life" (1.12). Fear of the Lord and wisdom make life meaningful and worthwhile (34.14–20). Sinners or fools—the terms are synonyms for Ben Sira—can never attain wisdom (15.7–8).

The doctrine of God reflects earlier biblical traditions. God is one and the same from all eternity (42.21). He created all things by simply uttering his almighty word (39.17–18; cf. Gen. 1.3–24). He knows all things, even the deepest mysteries of the universe, and sees all things even before they occur (15.18–19; 23.19–20; 39.19–20; 42.18–20). God is merciful not only to his chosen people but to other nations as well (18.13; cf. 17.29). Believers may address God as Father (23.1, 4; 51.10), confident that he will listen to their prayer. Ben Sira denies that God is responsible in any way for human sin (15.11–13, 20; cf. Exod. 11.10; 2 Sam. 24.1–10). Virtue and vice result from human free choice (15.14–17). But the origin of sin according to Genesis 3.1–6 is also alluded to in Sirach (25.24). Since human beings are free, there is hope even for sinners, for they can turn away from sin and repent (17.25–26, 29).

Ben Sira teaches the traditional doctrine of retribution: reward for fidelity to the Law (1.20; 34.14–20) or punishment for infidelity (9.12; 11.24, 26, 27–28) takes place in one's lifetime here on earth; after death saint and sinner alike are thought to go to Sheol, the nether world, where they share a dark, listless, dismal survival separated from the Lord (17.27–28). The grandson's Greek translation, however, makes definite allusions to retribution in the *afterlife (7.17b; 48.11bc), and a later recension, called Greek II, makes even more allusions (cf. 2.9c; 16.22c; 19.19) as do the still later Latin and Syriac versions. One survives in one's children (30.4–5) and in one's good name (41.11–13). Prayer, being the language of faith, is found in several places in Sirach (22.27–23.6; 36.1–22; 39.12–35; 42.15–43.33; 51.1–12). Respect for the priests and the offering of *sacrifices are enjoined (7.29–31), but these are useless if one is guilty of injustice (34.21–27). Observance of the Law, especially with regard to charity, is the best form of sacrifice and worship (35.1–5). The sacrifices of the wicked who oppress the poor are not acceptable to God (35.14–15). Ben Sira speaks emphatically of the need to practice social justice and to assist the weak and the defenseless (3.30–31; 4.2–6, 8–10); he derived this teaching from Exod. 22.22; Deut. 24.17–22; Lev. 19.9–10; Job 29.11–16; Prov. 14.13; Amos 5.10–15.

ALEXANDER A. DI LELLA, O.F.M.

Six Hundred Sixty-six. This number, mentioned in Revelation 13.18, is not, as is sometimes thought, a conundrum to be solved by readers in order to discover the identity of the beast described in that chapter. The identity of the beast is clear: it is the absolutist state as personified in the Roman Emperor Nero. The emperors claimed divine authority and their power seemed invincible. John wanted his readers to understand that the state and its rulers were neither divine nor invincible. They were human and carried the seed of their own destruction: their number is only 666, and does not reach the completion of seven (see Number Symbolism). The number was arrived at by presenting Nero's Greek name Kaisar Nerōn in Hebrew letters, which also function as numbers: qsr nrwn; q = 60, s = 100, r = 200, n = 50, w = 6, so qsr nrwn adds up to 666. (Some western manuscripts read "six hundred sixteen"; the scribes possibly did not understand John's usage of Hebrew numbers, and thought in terms of the Greek kaisar theos, the "god-emperor," which would add up to 616 using the Greek letters as numerals; but it is more likely that they simply dropped the final n: qsr nrw for Kaisar Nerō, making 616.) DAVID H. VAN DAALEN

Slavery. The socioeconomic institution of slavery was present in both Israel and early Christianity. Slavery among the Israelites shared many of the features present in other ancient Near Eastern cultures, just as slavery among Christians was similar to the practices prevailing in the *Roman empire. Throughout the Bible, however, distinctive humanitarian impulses regulate the treatment of slaves.

Exodus 21.1–11, Leviticus 25.39–55, and Deuteronomy 15.12–18 define the status and regulate the treatment of slaves. Each text is literarily framed by Israel's moral obligations to God's order for their lives: Exodus 21 by the *Ten Commandments (20.1–17), which put the Covenant Code laws (chaps. 21–23) under sole allegiance to Yahweh (note that the rights of the slave's release are guaranteed as the code's first stipulation); Leviticus 25 and Deuteronomy 15 by *Sabbath and sabbatical regulations, which include the obligation to treat the *poor generously. Rather than viewing slavery as a divinely sanctioned institution, as proslavery writers argued over a century ago, the biblical texts accent how God's commands protect slaves from cruel and capricious treatment. (See Slavery and the Bible.)

Three types of servile status are identifiable in Israel's practice: an Israelite became a servant to a fellow Israelite voluntarily as security against poverty, or by birth or purchase (Exod. 21.32 sets the compensation for a slave's death at thirty shekels); Israelites took non-Israelites as slaves through capture in war or purchase; Israelites sold themselves to non-Israelites as security against debt. In the first category, servants were guaranteed both the seventh-year sabbatical and fiftieth year jubilee releases (Exod. 21.2–6; Lev. 25.10, 38–41). In the second category, slaves, though circumcised and sworn into covenant membership (Gen. 17.9–14, 23; Deut. 29.10–15), did not receive the benefit of these releases (Lev. 25.44–46), but were protected against oppression (Exod. 22.21; 23.9). In the third category, slaves were eligible for redemption by a relative at any time, and were mandatorily freed in the jubilee year (Lev. 25.47–55). Slaves in all categories enjoyed Sabbath rest and participated in Israel's religious festivals. (See Hebrews.)

The moral imperative that mercy and kindness be shown toward slaves was based upon God's deliverance of Israel from slavery in Egypt: "Remember that you were a slave in the land of Egypt, and the Lord your God redeemed you; for this reason I lay this command upon you today" (Deut. 15.15; see also Lev. 25.42–43). The prophets also criticized injustices in Israel's slavery: forbidding King Ahaz to enslave captives from Judah (2 Chron. 28.8–15), attributing Israel's *exile to failure to give sabbatical release to the slaves (Jer. 34.8–20), calling Israel to "let the oppressed go free and to break every yoke" (Isa. 58.6). In the eschatological vision of Joel (2.29), God's spirit would be poured out also on slaves.

Jesus' ministry and the writing of the New Testament literature occurred within the cultural practice of slavery, both Jewish and Roman. The *Talmud indicates that various types of servile status continued among Jews from around 200 BCE to 400 CE. Many events and teachings in the Gospels reflect the presence of slaves, especially in the household (Luke 7.1–10; 12.37–46; Matt. 26.51; 24.45–51; 25.14–30).

The New Testament letters frequently regulate the conduct of masters and slaves (Eph. 6.5–9; Col. 3.22–4.1; 1 Tim. 6.1–2; Titus 2.9–10; 1 Pet. 2.18–19). Although the gospel of Jesus Christ abolished distinctions between slave and free (Gal. 3.28; 1 Cor. 12.13; Col. 3.11), slaves were instructed not to presume upon their new standing to legitimate careless work or disrespect toward masters. Slaves were called to direct accountability to God for proper conduct within the existing social institution. Masters similarly were told to treat their slaves justly and kindly. Paul sent the runaway slave, Onesimus, back to his owner *Philemon, instructing Philemon to receive Onesimus as a brother "both in the flesh and in the Lord" even "as you would welcome me" (Philem. 16–17).

The biblical vocabulary for slavery, in both its noun (Hebr. ʿebed, Grk. doulos) and verb forms (ʿābad; douloō), carries a wide range of meaning, from domestic service to enforced labor (1 Kings 9.15–22), and is metaphorically extended to the relationship of humans to God. Thus, both *Moses (Deut 34.5; etc.) and *David (Ps. 18.1) are called the "servant [Hebr. ʿebed] of the Lord," and Israel and others are instructed to "serve" (ʿābad) the Lord (Deut. 11.12; Ps. 2.11; etc.; see Worship). The same imagery is found in the New Testament. Just as Jesus took upon himself "the form of a slave" (Phil. 2.7), so Jesus' followers are also to think and do (Phil. 2.5; cf. Mark 10.42–45); thus, *Paul identified himself as a slave of Christ (Rom. 1.1; Phil. 1.1).

WILLARD M. SWARTLEY

Slavery and the Bible. Slavery in the New World produced one of the great biblical controversies of early modern times. Especially in sixteenth-century Spain and in the United States between 1730 and 1860, biblical texts were used on both sides of the protracted debates over the institution of slavery. The Spanish controversy was largely about encomienda, a form of labor slavery imposed on the native peoples of New Spain by the Laws of Burgos (1513). Court spokesmen cited the *conquest of Canaan (Deut. 20), the destruction of *Sodom (Gen. 18.16–19.29), and Jesus' parable of the wedding feast (Matt. 22.1–14) to advocate encomienda as part of a just Christian war against New World "barbarians." Reform-minded missionaries led by Bartolomé de Las Casas, a Dominican friar and the bishop of Chiapas in Mexico, condemned encomienda as unjust and rejected its biblical defense. In his treatise In Defense of the Indians (1550), Las Casas insisted that all three texts were historically conditioned commands superseded by Jesus' teaching of love to neighbors and enemies.

Meanwhile, a new kind of slavery—the importation and ownership of Africans as property—spread quickly in the seventeenth century to Portuguese, Dutch, French, and British colonies in the New World. The Church of England was the legally established religion in the British colonies of Virginia, Barbados, and the Carolinas, but planter elites there guaranteed that Anglican priests neither opposed slavery nor missionized the slaves. Instead, the church used biblical authority to depict Africans as bearers of the mark of *Cain (Gen. 4.10–15) and as children of *Ham, cursed by Noah to be the "servants of servants" (Gen. 9.25, AV; NRSV: "lowest of slaves"). Anglican support for slavery went largely unquestioned until the 1730s, when Evangelicals in Britain and America launched a new biblical critique of slavery. John Wesley and George Whitefield, founders of Methodism, condemned slaveholding as a grave sin inconsistent with their theology of spiritual rebirth (John 3.1–8), sanctification (Matt. 5.48), and evangelism (Mark 16.15). Truly born-again Christians, they taught, will know through the Spirit to free their slaves and evangelize them.

During the Revolutionary era, the major evangelical Calvinist denominations in America—Congregationalists, Presbyterians, and Baptists—joined the antislavery cause. These churches added the argument that slavery violated America's covenant with God as the new chosen people. In his Dialogue Concerning the Slavery of the Africans (1776), the Congregationalist Samuel Hopkins established the scriptural ground for this contention by invoking the prophets' vision of justice and mercy (Isa. 1.16–18; 33.15–16; 58.6; Jer. 7.1–7; 22.3–5; Amos 5.24), and judgment (Jer. 21.12; Ezek. 22.29–31; Amos 2.6; Zech. 7.9–12). At the same time, the Society of Friends in America also undertook a powerful witness against slavery led by the preaching and writing of John Woolman, especially in his Considerations on the Keeping of Negroes (1754/1762) and his Journal (1774). Warning that slaveholding was disobedience to the characteristic Quaker doctrines of plainness and peace, Woolman cited Jesus' warnings against materialistic greed (Matt. 6.19) and violence toward poor strangers (Matt. 25.44) as his principal biblical evidence.

By 1825, however, thriving cotton plantations had revived American slavery, and southern evangelicals, both Methodist and Calvinist, began to construct new biblical arguments justifying Christian slaveholding. A classic example is A Scriptural View of Slavery (1856), a sermon by Thornton Stringfellow, a Virginia Baptist, who held that God had sanctioned slavery through Noah, Abraham, and Joseph (Gen. 9.25–27; 14.14; 16.9; 17.12–13; 24.35–36; 26.13–14; 47.14–25), that slavery was "incorporated" in the Mosaic law (Exod. 20.17; 21.2–4, 20–21; Lev.

25.39–46), and that Jesus and the apostles recognized slavery as a "lawful institution among men" (2 Cor. 11.20; Eph. 6.5; Col. 3.22).

Evangelical abolitionists answered these proslavery arguments in writings like Angelina Grimké's Appeal to the Christian Women of the South (1836). Grimké claimed that Hebrew slavery differed in nature and kind from American slavery and therefore could not justify it. In Mosaic law she found six warrants for Hebrew slavery, all more limited than America's chattel slave system (e.g., Exod. 21.4, 7; Lev. 25.39, 47–55; 2 Kings 4.1), along with substantial legal protections for slaves lacking in American law (e.g., Exod. 21.3–6, 20–21, 26–27). Other abolitionists contrasted Greco-Roman and American slavery to obviate the Pauline instruction that slaves obey their masters (Eph. 6.5).

Slaves and free blacks in the antebellum period created their own radical vision of evangelical Christianity, understanding their condition as analogous to Israel in Egypt. African American preachers ceaselessly proclaimed the victorious Exodus as the slaves' destiny here on earth. This oral tradition inspired some leaders, including Gabriel Prosser, Denmark Vesey, and Nat Turner—all Methodists—to lead slave rebellions in the name of God. African American protest found its classic literary voice in David Walker, whose Appeal to the Coloured Citizens of the World (1829) arraigned hypocritical evangelical slaveholders for not observing the Christian mandate of peace (Acts 10.36–27), calling down on them the judgment of the returning Christ (Rev. 22.11).

Britain abolished slavery peacefully in 1833, but in the United States these disputes over slavery brought Presbyterians, Methodists, and Baptists to schism by 1845, and encouraged the fratricidal Civil War that finally resolved the crisis. One of the chief ironies of the conflict over slavery was the confrontation of America's largest Protestant denominations with the hitherto unthinkable idea that the Bible could be divided against itself. But divided it had been by intractable theological, political, and economic forces. Never again would the Bible completely recover its traditional authority in American culture.

See also African American Traditions and the Bible; Exodus, The; Hebrews; Slavery.

STEPHEN A. MARINI

Social Sciences and the Bible. This entry deals with the application of anthropology and sociology to the Bible, and consists of two articles, the first on Cultural Anthropology and the Hebrew Bible, and the second on Sociology of the New Testament.

Cultural Anthropology and the Hebrew Bible

Cultural anthropology as understood in the United States, and its British counterpart social anthropology, is the study of the material culture and the beliefs and social organization of preindustrial societies. Although it did not obtain the status of a distinct discipline until the nineteenth century and did not establish methodological precision until the twentieth, it has a long prehistory, some of which deeply affected the study of the Bible.

Travelers to Palestine, Egypt, and Mesopotamia over many centuries recorded their observations of life and customs in those lands, and these were often used to help interpret biblical texts. Further, the Hebrew Bible contains material that invites speculation of an anthropological nature. How were Israelite *tribes organized? How did *sacrifices achieve their desired ends? In the second half of the nineteenth century, when general theories of the evolution of culture and religion were propounded, the Bible was fitted into the resultant schemes. Israelite religion, it was thought, had evolved from animism (belief in spirits) through polytheism to *monotheism, and there had been both a progressive elaboration of the sacrificial cult, and a spiritualization of that religion in terms of social justice.

These evolutionary schemes were largely abandoned after World War II, but until around 1970 it was commonplace to regard the people of ancient Israel as quasi primitives who knew little about scientific causality, and who thus lived in a mystical and magical world in which any event was potentially a miracle. A variation on this view was that the *Canaanites, among whom the Israelites lived, had an essentially magical worldview, whereas Israel had broken with this outlook thanks to God's revelation to them through historical events.

Since 1970 there has been a renewal of interest in social anthropology among biblical scholars, and the work done has been based upon thorough and up-to-date knowledge of anthropological literature. Special attention has been focused on the following areas, each of which will be discussed in turn: Israel's origins and social organization, Israel's classification of the world and its sacrificial system, and the social dimensions of prophecy.

Israel's Origins and Social Organization. Visitors to Arabia and Palestine in the sixteenth through the nineteenth centuries were able to observe tribes of bedouin who were predominantly camel *nomads. It was understandable that such visitors thought they were seeing people living the same kind of life as Abraham, and many comparisons were made between the bedouin and the people of biblical times. With the rise of theories about the evolution of culture, the early Israelites were described as seminomads, people some way along the road from "pure" nomadism to being fully settled. In the 1930s, it was suggested that the Israelite occupation of Canaan was in fact a largely peaceful process of sedentarization in which Israelite seminomads ceased to move from winter to summer pasturages and settled down in one area.

Recent studies have shown that "pure" nomadism is a late phenomenon in the ancient Near East, and that seminomadism is not a staging post along an evolutionary road from nomadism to being permanently settled. Indeed, settled peoples can become seminomads by being expelled from their lands, or because of small changes in the climate. There is, however, growing agreement that the Israelites were, from the mid-thirteenth century BCE, settled farmers living in villages in the central highlands of Canaan remote from the main cities and loosely associated in an acephalous society, that is, one without a central political organization.

Exactly how Israel came into being in this form is a hotly debated issue. Norman Gottwald (The Tribes of Yahweh, 1979) has argued that Israelite society was the result of a retribalization process that enabled groups oppressed by the Canaanite city-states to form an alternative, liberated, and egalitarian society. He has focused attention upon the nature of Israelite tribes and of their political organization. Niels Lemche (Early Israel, 1985) disagrees with Gottwald on anthropological grounds, arguing against the retribalization view and pointing out that acephalous societies are not necessarily egalitarian.

From the viewpoint of the evidence of the Bible, Lemche is probably correct. The lists of "minor judges" in Judges 10.1–5; 12.8–15 indicate that these "judges" (probably the heads of dominant families who arbitrated disputes) had considerable wealth and prestige in return for the responsibilities that they bore. This evidence also militates against another theory, that early Israel was a segmentary lineage society, that is, a society in which power was distributed horizontally among equally ranked segments. This theory has been adopted from the influential book by Christian Sigrist (Regulierte Anarchie, 1967), and has been used to explain why opposition to monarchy continued for long after that institution became established in Israel. However, segmentary lineage societies as described by Sigrist have features that can hardly have existed in early Israel, such as indifference to murder within the family groups and avoidance of the inheritance rights of the eldest son. The persistence of opposition to monarchy can best be explained in terms of Jürgen Habermas's theory of conflict between belief systems and social mechanisms of integration (Theorie des kommunikativen Handelns, vol. 2, 1981). Israelite tribes could well have been simple chiefdoms, ruled by dominant families. Economic and external political pressure combined to make these chiefdoms accept a form of monarchy at the close of the eleventh century BCE, but Israel's belief systems remained critical of the institution for many genrations. (See also Conquest of Canaan; Kingship and Monarchy.)

Israel's Classification of the World and Its Sacrificial System. One of the largest changes in perception of the ancient Israelites brought about by social anthropology has been in relation to "the Hebrew mind." Studies in the early part of the twentieth century suggested that the Israelites were like contemporary "primitives," unable to distinguish clearly the limits of a group or of individuals, and attributing many natural events to supernatural causes. Attempts to explain the logic of sacrifice concentrated upon the psychology of individual Israelites: how did they think that sacrifices achieved their aims? As a result of the structural-functional study of preindustrial peoples, given classical expression in the work of E. E. Evans-Pritchard, a different picture of "primitives" emerged. They were seen to be no less rational than people in industrial societies, provided their overall framework of understanding was appreciated. This framework was articulated in sacred traditions and worked out in social networks and corporate activities.

The application of such an approach to the Hebrew Bible (Mary Douglas, Purity and Danger, 1967) has drawn attention to Israel's classification of reality as detailed in Genesis 1, in the prohibitions of clean and unclean animals (Lev. 11; Deut. 14.3–20; see Purity, Ritual), and in the regulations for dealing with the violation of sacred boundaries in Leviticus generally. It has emerged that, for Israel as for other ancient peoples, *creation meant order: the dividing of reality into distinct spheres such as sky/earth/sea, clean/unclean, life/death, Israel/other nations, holy/profane. To violate these distinctions was to run the risk of offending God, who would withhold his blessing by not sending the rains necessary for producing food. Thus, far from living in a chaotic universe where distinctions familiar to us were not made, the Israelites made distinctions and organized them into a particular worldview. Their difference from us lies not in their supposed inability to divide reality into categories, but rather in the organization of the categories. They regarded holy places and objects as the property of the deity, to be approached only by properly designated people. They had a sense that *blood was the property of the deity, that it was not to be eaten, and that it should be carefully handled. This "danger" also inhered in corpses, which no longer strictly belonged to human society, and contact with which required washing with water medicated with special ashes (Num. 19).

*Sacrifice has come to be interpreted by scholars not from the viewpoint of the psychology of individual worshipers, but as communal, symbolic action set within the framework of a strongly delineated world. Sacrifices enabled boundaries to be crossed: by *priests moving from the ordinary to the sacred (Lev. 8) and by "*lepers" moving from exclusion to acceptance in the community (Lev. 14). They removed the defilement believed to infect the sanctuary when offenses occurred for which a sin or guilt offering was required (Lev. 4—7). On the *Day of Atonement (Lev. 16), all types of moral uncleanness and social disharmony were identified with a goat, whose journey through the community and out into the desert symbolized and effected the removal of these factors from the society (see Azazel). The view just outlined was not, however, necessarily true for all Israelites in all periods. It is clear that in the premonarchic period there was no priesthood in Israel with exclusive rights, and that the predominant sacrifice was the burnt offering, given as a communal activity on occasions such as preparing to fight a battle (1 Sam. 13.9). The view of reality and order implied in Genesis 1 and in Leviticus is that of the postexilic community, which was a Temple-based community living in close proximity to *Jerusalem. Although the details of sacrifices no doubt contain elements much older than the postexilic community, in their present form they take their meaning from the story of God's deliverance of Israel from slavery in Egypt. Thus, social anthropology can shed light on many details of these rituals, but cannot supply the religious ideology of the traditions in their final form.

The Social Dimension of Prophecy. We often think of *prophets as individuals with an abnormal or unusual psychology, despite the evidence that *Elijah, *Elisha, and *Samuel were the heads of prophetic guilds, that *Isaiah had a group of disciples (Isa. 8.16), and that *Jeremiah was supported by the family of Shaphan (Jer. 26.24). Research into the roles of prophets in many cultures has indicated the importance both of support groups and of the expectations that such support groups, as well as the societies in which prophets function, held. David Petersen (The Roles of Israel's Prophets, 1981) has suggested two main types of prophets: peripheral prophets and central morality prophets. The former operate on the margins of society, supported by their own groups, often acting amorally. Such a description fits well with Elijah, who was a marginal figure at the head of groups of prophets withdrawn from society, and whose conduct in calling down fire on those who sought to capture him was certainly amoral (2 Kings 1). A good example of a central morality prophet would be Isaiah, who moved in royal circles (Isa. 7.3—17) and who, though critical of the king, also provided support for the state when it was attacked by the *Assyrians in 701 BCE (Isa. 37.21—29). Researches of this kind illustrate the shift that has been noted above—from the study of the psychology of individual prophets to a study of the corporate functioning of social groups and activities. Whereas earlier studies were concerned with the psychology of prophecy, recent study concentrates on its social dimensions. While this is valuable, drawing upon models taken from general observations of social phenomena, it must be noted that such studies illuminate only the outer aspects of the phenomena. As with sacrifice, it is the task of theology to illuminate the distinctive beliefs that formed the basis for the social actions of prophets. J. W. ROGERSON

Sociology of the New Testament

Although it is possible to trace earlier roots, the sociological perspective became embedded in the soil of New Testament studies in the 1970s. Sociology is the disciplined study of social relationships and the changes that occur in them over time. It will be readily seen how the application of the techniques and perspectives of sociology to the New Testament holds much promise for our understanding of it. The disciples of Jesus originated from the rural hinterland of *Galilee and served as a renewal sect within Judaism before spreading throughout the Roman world and becoming most successful in the urban environment of Greek civilization.

Sociological explanations should not supplant a theological explanation of the New Testament, rather they should complement it, enriching the theological understanding of the text by bringing the real social content and the actual social relationships to the fore. Theological explanations alone too easily become abstract and academic. For example, the tensions in the church at *Corinth are usually attributed by theologians either to the presence of incipient *gnosticism or to overrealized *eschatology. Without rejecting the value of such insights, one can also appreciate how the diversity of the social classes that rubbed closely together in a church—unusual for clubs and guilds in Roman society—illuminates the divisions that are mentioned in 1 *Corinthians. The "strong" were the socially powerful who would act as hosts at the Lord's table and would see no difficulty in eating meat offered to idols, whereas the "weak" were the poor (1 Cor. 8.1–13; see also Meals).

The application of sociology to the New Testament is not without difficulty. There is danger that the birth and growth of Christianity might be reduced purely to explanation in social terms, and theology might not be given sufficient weight as an independent factor in explanation. Sociology tends to compress unique historical events and processes into general models and recurring patterns. The data with which the sociologist must work are limited and not selected originally for the benefit of the sociologist. Given the limited data, it is tempting to draw parallels between the social behavior of early churches and other contemporary social institutions where such parallels may not be legitimate. Nonetheless, for all the caution that needs to be exercised, a sociological perspective has much value for New Testament studies.

Several major areas of interest may be identified, though they cannot be distinguished neatly from each other. One is the description of the social context in which the disciples of Jesus came together and developed into a worldwide movement. This is most akin to social history but can never be divorced completely from sociological interpretation. The Roman occupation of Palestine had major political and economic implications for the Jews of that region, many of which are evident in the Gospels (e.g., references to "a house divided against itself," the existence of beggars, robbers, and absentee landlords, and paying taxes to Caesar). But the presence of Rome also posed major questions for the Jews' self-understanding as the covenant people of God who had a unique destiny in the world. Several movements had offered solutions to that cultural crisis, including the *Herodians, the *Pharisees, the *Essenes, and the *Zealots; *Jesus offered another that was to meet with a tremendous response.

Contributions have been made to our understanding of specific aspects of Pauline Christianity by describing such features as city life, mobility, the place of *women, and the nature of urban Judaism. There is a growing consensus that early Christianity was not a proletarian movement but was very mixed in its social composition. Its members maintained their strength and purity through their leadership, through procedures for handling conflicts, rituals of initiation (*baptism) and of solidarity (communion), common beliefs, and common life.

A second major area of study has been contemporary social institutions. An understanding of the nature and functioning of the household is vital to the interpretation of the leadership, organization, mission, training, place of women, and ethical teaching of early Christianity. The household was a large inclusive unit in which freedmen, *slaves, and other dependent families grouped around a principal family. Often these people were economically dependent on the principal family and expressed their solidarity by adopting a common religion. The household structure had an impact even on the entire Roman empire, which saw itself as one vast household. In addition to the household, there were many unofficial associations, guilds, and cults through which people found personal identity and fellowship in the empire.

An extension of that area is the investigation of Christianity as a social organization. The primary understanding of Jesus, in this regard, is to see him as the founder of a millenarian movement. Such movements, frequently found among disinherited people, cater to a desire for change, offer a radically new interpretation of life and center in a prophet whose role is to bring heaven into being on earth and to vindicate his followers. Although this model when applied to the mission of Jesus has its difficulties, it largely fits and has the merit of rooting the ministry of Jesus in the real social world of his time.

After the death of the charismatic founder, the movement is usually seen in terms of a sect, that is, a small voluntary religious institution with an exclusive membership, clearly separated from the world as well as world-rejecting in outlook. This provides us with a framework for understanding not only the early church in Jerusalem but also some of the developments in structure and theology that took place as it spread and eventually became acceptable to more people.

A number of secondary issues are raised by the study of social organization. In relation to Jesus, these concern the relationship between those who leave everything to follow him and those, such as Mary and Martha, who remain settled in their homes, as well as the structure of the band of *twelve disciples. In the study of early Christianity, much has been done to explore the nature of apostolic authority and to set wandering preachers and prophets in the broader context of wandering philosophers of whose style of teaching and means of support we know. The relationship of the Pauline mission, originating in *Antioch, to the church of Jerusalem, and this, in turn, to the authority of the original *apostles is of special interest here.

The sociological insights mentioned so far aid the task of exegesis. But in addition to illuminating particular aspects of the text there is a growing body of literature concerned with sociological redaction. An excellent example is Philip Eschler's work on Luke/Acts, where he demonstrates the way in which the material has been shaped to answer questions posed by the mixed sociological situation of its readers (Jew/gentile, rich/poor, and so on).

A further major area is the tentative offering of sociological explanations for events described in the New Testament. The above-mentioned concept of the millenarian movement when applied to Jesus is not just a description but ventures toward an explanation as well. John Gager has also proposed an explanation as to why the dispirited apostles turned into zealous missionaries after the day of *Pentecost. According to the theory of cognitive dissonance, when a specific belief that many hold has been proved wrong (in the case of the early disciples, that Jesus would usher in his kingdom on earth), rather than giving up the belief people lessen their unease (dissonance) by converting others to their way of thinking. The addition of new members suggests to them that they could not have been wrong! Such an explanation is debatable. Less controversial, but still debatable, is the explanation that many joined the Christian movement because of status inconsistency. To be a woman of wealth, or a wealthy Jew in a gentile environment, or a skilled freedman stigmatized by one's origin, involved status contradictions. These could be resolved by joining a church, for there the sufferer would find a welcoming home that would provide an emotional buttress against the loneliness of a status-ridden world. Much is also made of the process of institutionalization and its effect on the development of early Christianity. Such explanations vary in effectiveness but can prove illuminating, provided one does not resort to the view that the growth of Christianity was due to nothing but the operation of such social forces.

A final area may be identified as the sociology of knowledge. Everyone inherits as pregiven an interpretation of the world. But one's experience may raise questions, leading to modification or sometimes even to radical replacement. One's interpretation of life is formed in response to one's social location. Potentially, this is the most enriching perspective: already it has led to a deeper understanding of the way in which the gospel writers variously express the same life of Jesus, to a fuller understanding of the title "*Son of man," and to a fresh understanding of miracles. The perspective has also been used to relate the "ascent/descent" motif in *John's gospel to the social location of John's readers; the idea of homelessness in 1 *Peter to those who were literally displaced persons; and the cosmic conflicts of *Revelation to the persecuted Christians.

Others have expressed interest in the social functions of literature and in the insights of anthropology. The sociology of the New Testament is a diverse discipline and is still in a youthful stage of development. Some theologians remain skeptical of its value, preferring to tread the well-worn paths of more traditional approaches, but many have welcomed its perspective. As a youthful discipline, it will doubtless make many mistakes, not the least of which will be the mistake of thinking the traffic should all be one-way, from sociology to the New Testament, rather than two-way, enabling our understanding of the New Testament to enrich sociology in general and sociology of religion in particular. But the perspective these approaches offer will be ignored only at great cost to New Testament studies. It cannot be overstressed that the formation of earliest Christianity took place in a real social context and was inhabited by real flesh-and-blood people, not by abstract theologizers. DEREK J. TIDBALL

Sociology and the Bible. See Social Sciences and the Bible.

Sodom and Gomorrah. Two cities, legendary for their incorrigible wickedness (Gen. 13.13) and for their ultimate annihilation by God in a cataclysm of "brimstone and fire" (Gen. 19.24–25). In the story of *Abraham's war against the kings of the east (Gen. 14), Sodom and Gomorrah are numbered among the "five cities" in the "Valley of Siddim," along with Admah, Zeboiim, and Zoar. Abraham's nephew *Lot sojourned for a time in Sodom but fled at divine instigation before the city's final devastation (Gen. 19.15–22). Passages mentioning Sodom and Gomorrah generally agree in locating them along the southern shore of the Dead Sea, but so far no archaeological evidence for their existence has been found there. Suppositions that their remains may yet be discovered beneath the shallow waters of the southern Dead Sea are unlikely ever to be proved. Early Bronze Age (third millennium BCE) settlements and cemeteries at Bab edh-Dhra and Numeira on the southeastern edge of the Dead Sea do, however, provide evidence for very early pre-Israelite occupation in the region. The presence of these ruins, abandoned long before the advent of the Israelites in Canaan, may have given rise much later to local legends that their destruction resulted from divine wrath. At a subsequent stage these legends may have become attached to stories of the wanderings of Abraham and Lot in Canaan.

Whatever the origin of these legends, Sodom and Gomorrah become powerful symbols of human wickedness and divine retribution. Sodom and Gomorrah together (or more frequently, Sodom alone) are held up as archetypes of sinfulness, justly deserving and finally receiving God's punishment. This theme is prominent in prophetic writings (Isa. 1.9; Jer. 23.14; Ezek. 16.44–58; Amos 4.11) and in the New Testament (Matt. 10.15; Luke 10.12; Rom. 9.29; 2 Pet. 2.6; Rev. 11.8). JOSEPH A. GREENE Solomon. The son of *David and *Bathsheba, Solomon ruled over Israel ca. 962–922 BCE. His exploits are detailed in 1 Kings 1–11 and 1 Chronicles 28–2 Chronicles 9. Supported by *Bathsheba, *Nathan, and Benaiah, he came to power in a coup d'état that sidetracked his older brother Adonijah and Joab. His reign was marked by prosperity and prestige, grandiose building projects, and a cultural transformation.

The prosperity is portrayed in the fulsome description given in 1 Kings 4.20–28 and 10.14–29, in the marriage with Pharaoh's daughter (and there was a considerable harem; 1 Kings 11.3), in the international role indicated by his dealings with Hiram of Tyre (1 Kings 9.26–28; 10.11–12) and the visit of the Queen of *Sheba (1 Kings 10.1–10), as well as the extensive international trade (a fleet at Ezion-geber, 1 Kings 9.26; "Tarshish" ships, 10.22; trading in horses and chariots, 10.26–29).

Solomon's building program consisted principally in the *Temple as well as the palace complex (the palace, the "House of the Forest of Lebanon"—a kind of armory—and even a palace for his Egyptian wife). In addition, he built up a corps of chariots and cavalry that functioned out of chariot cities in the realm (1 Kings 10.26). Such opulence was sustained by a revision of the administrative areas in the kingdom (1 Kings 4.7–19), which led to increased revenue for the crown, as well as to a weakening of the old tribal ties and to further assimilation of the Canaanite population. All this was obtained at a price, as is suggested by Solomon's having to cede land to Hiram of Tyre (1 Kings 9.10–14; but contrast 2 Chron. 8.2) and by the corvée. Despite 1 Kings 9.20–22, it appears that Israelites as well as Canaanites were involved in forced labor, and this became a major complaint against Solomon (5.13–14; cf. 4.6; 12.18).

The cultural transformation of the population must have been considerable, though it is largely a matter of historical inference. But political centralization won out over the old tribalization; a new wealthy class emerged, and cleavage between rich and poor increased. This aspect of Solomon's reign is not reflected in the tradition. Rather, his reign is acclaimed, and his personal wisdom is underlined. His wisdom is compared to that of the Egyptians (4.29–34), and is illustrated by the famous incident of the two prostitutes (3.16–28). Hence he has come down in the tradition as the wise man par excellence, to whom several works were eventually attributed: Psalms 72 and 127, the book of *Proverbs, the *Song of Solomon, and *Ecclesiastes within the Hebrew Bible; *Wisdom of Solomon among the *apocrypha; Psalms and Odes among the *pseudepigrapha. Scholars have inferred that such compositions as the Yahwist history (*J) probably date to the Solomonic period.

The theological judgment passed upon Solomon is mixed. The name Jedidiah (beloved of Yah or the Lord) was given him by the prophet Nathan ("the Lord loved him," 2 Sam. 12.24–25). The description of his sincerity and simplicity is highlighted in the sacrifice at Gibeon (1 Kings 3). He asks for a "listening heart" (1 Kings 3.9; NRSV: "understanding mind") whereby to rule the people, and the Lord assures him of this as well as of riches and glory. On the other hand, the typical Deuteronomic judgment on royalty is also passed upon Solomon (1 Kings 11), and notice is taken of the "adversaries" whom the Lord raised up: Hadad the Edomite, Rezon of Damascus, and especially Jeroboam, who was to lead the rebellion against Rehoboam, Solomon's son.

Nothing is known of "the Book of the Acts of Solomon" (1 Kings 11.41), which might have cast a fuller light on the reign of the fabled monarch. But the immediate dissolution of the united monarchy in the lifetime of his son is surely suggestive of the inadequacies of Solomon's reign (1 Kings 12.14).

ROLAND E. MURPHY, O. CARM.

Song of Solomon. The Song of Solomon follows the book of *Ruth in the Hebrew Bible and *Ecclesiastes in the *Septuagint. Also called the Song of Songs (i.e., the most excellent song) and the Canticle (of Canticles), it was divided in the Middle Ages arbitrarily into eight *chapters, which do not correspond to significant units of content. This brief composition of fewer than two hundred poetic verses has always been an enigma, and little agreement exists concerning such questions as origin, date of composition, structure, and unity.

Authorship and Date. The attribution "to *Solomon" affixed to the Song is an editorial superscription that links this poetry to Israel's famous poet and sage rather than a declaration of authorship. No hint of actual author or authors appears in the text. The intense style of poetry belongs to the genre of love lyrics found in ancient Egyptian collections. Lush, extravagant imagery appealing to the senses of smell, taste, and touch, detailed descriptions of the human body, male and female, and highly stylized terms of endearment like dove, sister, and king link the Song to other ancient Near Eastern cultures.

The Song of Solomon displays striking metaphors from a variety of flora and fauna, some twenty-five species of *plants and ten of *animals, mentioned not as a display of learning but for the images they invoke. It also exploits the evocative power of place names like *Lebanon, home of fragrant cedars (3.9), Gilead, famous for its balm (4.1), snow-covered Amana (4.8), and Tirzah, ancient capital of the northern kingdom of Israel (6.4).

Nothing in the Song itself proves its date of composition. It seems to be made up of lyrics that came down in oral tradition long before they were gathered into their canonical form. The appealing subject matter and vivid imagery, like the woman being compared to a mare that throws the war stallions of the pharaoh's chariots into disorder (1.9), explain why these lyrics were preserved in the schools of the Temple of Jerusalem. They proved to be a useful teaching tool. Boldness of imagery, repetitions, and variations on erotic themes point to frequent recital before they were edited in the final form, possibly between 450–400 BCE. This date is plausible because of widespread scribal activity at that time, because the syntax exhibits *Aramaic constructions, and because the *Persian loan word for *paradise is found in 4.13.

After the destruction of the Second Temple in 70 CE, the Song of Solomon was incorporated into the Jewish *canon over the objections of some rabbis, who found its subject matter unsuitable for Israel's sacred literature. Once it became part of the official scriptures, commentators both Jewish and Christian attempted to interpret it in religious terms. Eventually it was recited as part of the services for the final day of the *Passover celebration.

Structure and Nature. Commentators are divided concerning the structure of the Song of Solomon. Three approaches persist: that it is a literary unity; that it is a systematic organization of love poems; and that it is a random collection of lyrics. Some find as many as eighty distinct units. The literal sense of the verses describes movements of passion and affection between a man and a woman, who is called "my darling" (Hebr. ra'yātî; NRSV: "my love") nine times, a term never found elsewhere in the Bible. Poetic features like chiasm, inclusion, historical allusions, refrains, and thematic repetition provide a basis for the variety of theories about the Song's structure. Both Jewish and Christian exegetes have found deeper meaning in its verses. Medieval qabbalists proposed a sacred code as key to its interpretation.

The theories about the nature of the Song can be divided into five headings.

Allegorical. The Aramaic *translations called Targums preserve traditions that read the Song as an allegory of the Lord's love for Israel. On this basis allusions to events in Israel's history are found throughout. Christian mystical tradition as early as Origen took a similar approach. His commentary, part of which is extant in Latin translation, interprets the Song as celebrating Christ's love for his church or for the believing soul. The most famous medieval example of the allegorical method of reading the Song is the eighty-six homilies of Bernard of Clairvaux, covering only the first two chapters.

Dramatic. A few ancient Greek manuscripts assign sections of the lyrics to specific speakers. Following that tradition, some exegetes read the Song as describing a shepherd's courtship of the Shulammite maid (6.13). They often introduce Solomon as rival suitor. They disagree about how to assign the dramatis personae and where to place the climaxes. They usually find from five to eight scenes. The dramatic theory was especially popular in the nineteenth century.

Literal-historical. By far the most common interpretation of the Song of Solomon is that it is a collection of lyrics celebrating human love. This approach, based on affinities with ancient Near Eastern love poetry, seeks to do justice to the plastic language and sensuous imagery that reveal vivid imagination and artistic skill. As lyric poetry the Song employs language that functions simultaneously on a literal and a symbolic level. The garden and vineyard are places of nurture, whether for plants or for sexual capacity. The pasture is a place for feeding the shepherd's flock and for nourishing human intimacy. Eating applies to both physical and sexual satisfaction. Such flexibility of language is the stuff of masterpieces that attract readers of every generation.

Some scholars suggest that the Song was a collection of songs assembled as a repertoire for *wedding celebrations. The vivid portrayal of the body of the woman (4.1–7; 6.4–7; 7.1–6) and of the man (5.10–16) resemble Arabic wasfs sung at weddings. This genre includes vivid metaphors: hair falling like descending flocks of mountain goats; teeth sparkling like newly shorn goats; cheeks glistening like the inside of a pomegranate covered by a thin veil. Stylized royal imagery explains the designation of the lover as king.

Other scholars search for the origin of these lyrics in dream fantasy, because the woman speaks of having a dream in 5.2, and possibly in 3.1–4. Such an origin could account for the stream-of-consciousness succession of events from city streets to wine cellars to country landscapes to remote deserts and mountain tops inhabited by hostile animals.

Other students of the Song of Solomon feel that the nature of these lyrics does not point to a specific point of origin. Rather, they share the universal language of love poetry with such commonplace themes as the excitement of seeking and finding or the terror of seeking and not finding the loved one. Their appeals to such a wide range of smells and shapes and colors are ways of portraying the universal presence of love. The scribe who finally brought these lyrics together proclaims love to be "strong as death" (8.6), so powerful that even floods cannot drown it. That comment encouraged efforts to find deeper meaning in the Song.

Cultic or ritualistic. The mention of death as well as unusual situations pictured have led some commentators to see the Song as originating in an ancient ritual, possibly a sacred marriage or fertility rite or in ceremonies to ward off death. They find cultic origins for the elaborate procession of 3.6–11 and the phrase "house of my mother" (3.4; 8.2).

Parabolic or typological. Some commentators have made ingenious efforts to tie these lyrics, which never mention God, closer to his saving plan. They read the Song of Solomon in terms of certain topics of Israelite theology, like the *covenant relationship between Yahweh and Israel, which was compared to marriage in the prophetic tradition. This interpretation finds a variety of second-level meanings in the imagery: for example, the man signifies the Lord and the woman Israel; their coming together portrays the restoration of intimacy lost in the garden of *Eden; the woman's spontaneity recalls original innocence.

Significance. The Song of Solomon embodies a surplus of meaning in its artistic unfolding of lyrics that portray a poetic genius and emotional warmth of universal impact and appeal. Its unusual vocabulary (almost fifty words appear nowhere else in the Bible) adds excitement to the swift pace and evocative scenes. A minority of critics read it as containing some kind of narrative or thematic unity reflected in repetitions like "caresses sweeter than wine" (1.2 and 4.10) and the refrain in 2.7; 3.5; 5.8; 8.4. But most modern editors present it as a collection of related lyrics loosely united, composed not to teach but to touch, to please, and to delight. The power of its beauty is its celebration of and appeal to love.

No apparent order governs the flow of its verse, except perhaps the final verses that point to the reflective bent of the sage inviting readers to resonate to the power of love. The New Testament contains no reference to the Song.

JAMES M. REESE, O.S.F.S.

Song of Songs. See Song of Solomon.

Son of God. The Hebrew ben* and Aramaic bar, "son," designate not only a male descendant but also a relationship to a community, a country, a species (e.g., animals), etc. "Son of God" can thus mean both a mythological figure of divine origin, a being belonging to the divine sphere (such as an *angel), or a human being having a special relationship to a god. In antiquity, son of god was used predicatively of kings begotten by a god (in Egypt) or endowed with divine power (in Mesopotamia). In the Roman period, it also was used in the East as a title for the emperor.

In the Hebrew Bible, *sons of God occur in Genesis 6.1–4, where they marry human women and became fathers of the giants (KJV) or *Nephilim (NRSV); in Job 1.6; 2.1 (NRSV: "heavenly beings"), where they make up the court of God; and also in Deuteronomy 32.8 (NRSV: "gods"); Psalms 29.1 and 89.6 (NRSV: "heavenly beings"); cf. Psalm 82.6 "sons of the Most High" (NRSV: "children of the Most High"). Elsewhere, the designation son of God is used especially of the king. Thus, in the primary passage of the Israelite ideology of divine *kingship, it is said of *Solomon, "I will be his father, and he will be my son" (2 Sam. 7.14; cf. 1 Chron. 17.13). Neither in 2 Samuel 7.12–14 nor in Psalm 89.26–29 does the designation son of God express anything more than a special relationship; there is no question of deification. This also applies to Psalm 2.7, where God says to the king, "You are my son; today I have begotten you"; "today" rules out a mythological interpretation. The title son of God indicates that the king has his kingdom from God, and the saying belongs to the coronation day or its anniversary. (See also Kingship and Monarchy; Messiah.)

This manner of speaking of God as a father and the correlative usage, son or sons of God, has also been extended to cover the people of God. In Exodus 4.22 and Jeremiah 31.9, God calls Israel his firstborn son; in Exodus 4.23 and Hosea 11.1 his "son." Correspondingly, in Deuteronomy 32.6, 18 and Jeremiah 3.4, God is called the people's "father," and in Deuteronomy 14.1; 32.5, 19 the Israelites appear as "sons" (and "daughters") of God. Finally, the plural form may designate a special group, like the pious (Ps. 73.15) or the priests (Mal. 1.6).

In postbiblical literature, "son of God" designates either the pious (Sir. 4.10) or the suffering righteous (Wisd. of Sol. 2.18; cf. 2.13, 16; 5.5; cf. also Psalms of Solomon 13.9), while the plural denotes the elect people (Wisd. of Sol. 9.7; 12.19, 21; Psalms of Solomon 17.27). Obviously, son of God was not a common messianic title in Judaism before Roman times. Passages like 2 Esd. 7.28–29; 13.32, 37, 52; 14.9, which speak of "my son [the Messiah]," and 1 Enoch 105.2, do not alter this, since both are influenced by the "servant of the Lord" in Second *Isaiah. Messianic usage of the expression outside the New Testament from this period does occur in the *Dead Sea Scrolls, as in a fragment of a Daniel Apocryphon from Qumran (4QpsDan A^a) and in 4Q246, another fragment, which has a close parallel in Luke 1.32, 35. But the fact that the title was used for the king makes it understandable that it could also be applied to the Messiah.

In the New Testament, Son of God (and its abbreviated form, "the Son") is a title often used in christological confessions. From the beginning it seems to have been used in connection with the belief in the *resurrection and exaltation of *Jesus. The confessional fragment in Romans 1.3–4 speaks of the gospel "concerning his Son, who was descended from David according to the flesh and was declared to be Son of God with power according to the spirit of holiness by resurrection from the dead." The originally exchangeable expressions Son of David and Son of God are here conferred on the earthly Jesus and the risen Lord, it being presupposed that before his death Jesus was Messiah-designate, and that the resurrection implied a new position (cf. Acts 2.36). The authors of Acts 13.33 and Hebrews 1.5; 5.5 also quote Psalm 2.7 in this connection. Yet it is still possible to speak of a special "Son of God" Christology insofar as the designation expresses Jesus' unique relationship to God. From an early stage, this belief included the idea of a preexistence and the sending of Jesus to the world (cf. Gal. 4.4 and also Phil. 2.6–11; John 1.1). The title seems to have attracted to it ideas connected with *wisdom as well.

In the *synoptic Gospels we may observe how the title Son of God has penetrated into the traditions about the life of Jesus. In *Mark, it is used only by God and the demons (cf. 1.11; 9.7; 3.11; 5.7); the one time it is used by a human (15.39), the past tense ("was") suggests a distinction between the confession of the centurion to the deceased Jesus, and later on, to the risen Lord. In *Matthew we also find it in the confessions of the disciples (14.33; 16.16; cf. also 26.63), in the story of the *temptation (4.3, 6), and the story of the mocking at the cross (27.43; cf. also Matt. 11.27). In *Luke, it is mostly found in traditional material; the idea of a *virgin birth probably does not belong here. In *John, the Son of God, together with the title the Son, plays a central role in depicting Jesus as being one with the Father (e.g., 3.35–36 and 1.18; 10.30).

The origin of the title seems, in the first place, to be Jesus' unique addressing God as father (see especially Mark 14.36, where the Aramaic abba* is preserved), and second, its connection with kingship ideology in view of the conviction that Jesus was the anticipated son of David. Yet characteristically in the New Testament it stands beside the usage of the phrase sons of God, referring to those whom Jesus has brought to salvation (Rom. 8.14–21; 9.8, 26; Gal. 3.26; Matt. 5.9, 45; John 1.12; 1 John 3.1). In the apostolic fathers, the designation describes the divine nature of Jesus as apart from his human nature (e.g., Ignatius, Ephesians 20.2; Epistle of Barnabas 12.10, where it corresponds to son of man).

To summarize the evidence in the New Testament, it might be said that the title Son of God primarily expresses Jesus' unique relation to God, while the Lord, the christological title preferred by *Paul (see 1 Cor. 12.3; Phil. 2.11), emphasizes his position in the church and in the world.

MOGENS MÜLLER

Son of Man. The self-designation most often used by *Jesus in the Gospels. It occurs seventy-two times in the *synoptics; two passages (Matt. 18.11; Luke 9.56) are, however, textually uncertain, and if parallels are not counted, the number of different Son of man sayings is forty-three. To these may be added thirteen in the Fourth Gospel. John 12.34, like Luke 24.7, is only an apparent exception to the rule that the expression is always uttered by Jesus himself, the only genuine exception being Acts 7.56. Apart from John 5.27, the designation in all these passages is literally "the son of the man." In the New Testament the undetermined form, "a son of man," is found in Hebrews 2.6 (quoting Ps. 8.5) and in Revelation 1.13 (the exalted Christ) and 14.14 (an angel).

The Son of man sayings in the synoptics fall into two groups, those about the Son of man's mission and his fate on earth (e.g., Mark 2.10 par.; 2.28 par.; 10.45 par.) together with the passion predictions (Mark 8.31 par.; 9.31 par.; 10.33 par.), and those concerning the position and role of the risen and exalted Son of man and his *parousia (e.g., Mark 8.3 par.; 13.26 par.; 14.62 par.). All Son of man sayings are christologically significant. Nevertheless, in the synoptics there are many passages without the expression where textually and linguistically there could be no objection to it (e.g., Mark 2.17 par.), and such passages sometimes have synoptic parallels containing the expression (e.g., Luke 22.27; cf. Mark 10.45 and Matt. 20.28). In the synoptics, there seems to be an increasing monopolization of the expression in sayings of Jesus about his mission, his fate, and his position beyond the resurrection. In the Fourth Gospel the situation is different: here Son of man sayings compete with the "I am" sayings and the self-designation "the Son." The distinction in usage is always significant; "Son of man" is always used in major statements.

Being central in the Gospel tradition, then, it is no wonder that Son of man is one of the most debated expressions in the New Testament. Its seemingly enigmatic character can be measured by the endless attempts to find an acceptable solution as to its meaning, and despite tendencies apparent in more recent research, it is not accurate to speak of a growing consensus. It is possible, however, to distinguish between two main views: (1) The expression was current and, under certain circumstances, understandable as a messianic title at the time of Jesus. (2) Such usage must be excluded on linguistic grounds alone. There is also the question whether the expression as it now stands in the Gospels is to be understood as a messianic title or not. And in the case of the former, are we to presume a development in meaning from Jesus to the Gospel tradition?

The New Testament itself does not give us the slightest hint as to the meaning of the expression, and there is no evidence for the double-determined form ("the Son of the man") before it appears in the New Testament. In the *Greek of the *Septuagint it appears only in the undetermined form, which, similar to the *Hebrew original ben ʾādām, conveys a generic meaning synonymous with "man," that is, human being (Ps. 8.5; Ezek. 2.1; Dan. 8.17). In the Hebrew Bible, the expression occurs 108 times, 93 of which are in Ezekiel as God's way of addressing the prophet. The *Aramaic equivalent, bar ʾĕnāš, occurs only once, in Daniel 7.13, which speaks of "one like a (son of) man." This saying has had a decisive impact on the understanding of Son of man in the New Testament, and it is quoted or alluded to many times (see Mark 13.26 par.; 14.62 par.; but also Rev. 1.7, which does not actually mention any son of man). The imagery of Daniel 7.13–14 may be the foundation of the Son of man sayings relating to the status of the exalted Christ.

Now, "one like a man" in Daniel 7.13 is by no means a messianic figure, but a symbol of the victorious Israel, the kingdom of the saints of the Most High, which succeeded the four world empires (Dan. 7.18, 22, 25, 27). Thus, when we find in 1 Enoch 46–71 and 4 Ezra 13 similar imageries of a son of man or simply a man, these cannot be independent witnesses of a special concept, but uses of the imagery of Daniel to describe a messianic figure. The comprehensive attempt earlier this century to verify the existence of a special son of man conception, sometimes assumed to be a variant of the ancient Near Eastern myth of the primeval man, universal and transcendent in its outlook (in contrast to the nationalistic and earthly expectation of a Davidic messiah), has obviously failed.

Another question is whether the expression in the Gospels and Acts 7.56 is to be understood as a title. With the exception of Matthew 16.13 and John 9.35, this is possible. On the other hand, the title never occurs in confessions (e.g., Jesus is the Son of man), nor is it used predicatively (Jesus, the Son of man). The determined form must not be taken as a reference to the expression "like a son of man" in Daniel 7.13.

There is, however, yet another possibility. Granted that the Greek form of the expression originates in Aramaic, it may be explained as a direct extension of the idiomatic use of the expression bar ʾĕnāš. It is now almost universally agreed that at Jesus' time this expression was in general usage in Galilean Aramaic both as a noun (meaning "a human being") and as a substitute for the indefinite pronoun and as a periphrasis for "I," the actual meaning depending on the context. The double entendre may express a generalization, meaning "one," "a human," or it may be a self-reference provoked by awe, modesty, or humility, in accord with the content of the actual saying. In that case, the double entendre is deceptive, a near parallel being Paul's way of speaking of himself in 2 Corinthians 12.2–3. It is possible to understand the Gospel Son of man sayings in accordance with this Aramaic idiom. But the double entendre has been done away with by the Greek rendering with its awkward literalness ("the son of the man"), which substitutes an explicit indication of the identity of the subject speaking. This does not mean, however, that the expression has become a title. In the Gospels it is, at the same time, Jesus' periphrasis for "I" and a way to emphasize who is speaking. In other words, it is not the expression "son of man" that tells us who Jesus is, but on the contrary, it is Jesus who tells us who the Son of man is.

It is thus reasonable to suppose that the usage of the expression in the Gospels originates in the way in which Jesus spoke of himself. The question of the genuineness of the individual Son of man sayings must therefore depend on their content: are they understandable in the mouth of the historical Jesus or not? Naturally, the answer will depend upon the individual interpreter's idea of what Jesus believed and preached about himself, and what may be referred to the early community. It seems probable that the sayings about the risen and exalted Son of man and his parousia, depending on Daniel 7.13–14 for their imagery, were created in the process of interpreting the faith in the *resurrection of Jesus, and that they were shaped in analogy to other sayings of Jesus about himself. As indicated by 1 Thessalonians 4.15–17, this interpretation is early and reflects the same tradition expressed later in Mark 13.26 and especially Matthew 24.30–31.

The uncomplicated way in which the expression is used in the Gospels indicates an early foothold in the Greek gospel tradition, which is confirmed by its occurrence also in the Fourth Gospel. In this gospel, one can perceive a beginning of reflection upon its wording, which transcends the purely idiomatic meaning it had in Aramaic (see especially John 5.27). In the apostolic fathers, it is understood as a statement of Christ's human nature and corresponds to the title *Son of God (see Ignatius Ephesians 20.2; cf. Epistle of Barnabas 12.10). Later, it is seen as a reference to the figure in Daniel 7.13 and is read as a messianic prophecy (Justin, Apology I.51). Not until the nineteenth century do we find an attempt to see a specific conception behind the expression. MOGENS MÜLLER Sons of God. The sons of God (or children of God; Hebr. bĕnê ʾĕlōhîm, and variants) are divine members of God's heavenly assembly. They are depicted in many roles: praising God at the dawn of creation (Job 38.7); praising God in heaven (Ps 29.1); meeting in the heavenly assembly before God (Job 1.6, 2.1; cf. Pss. 82.1, 6; 89.6–8); representing the foreign nations (Deut. 32.8, following a text from *Qumran and the *LXX); and, most curiously, marrying and having offspring with human women (Gen. 6.1–4). Other terms, such as *seraphim, *angels (i.e., "messengers"), and hosts of heaven also refer to these members of God's heavenly assembly (see 1 Kgs. 22.19; Isa. 6; Ezek. 13.25). The sons of God are also identified with the stars in heaven (Job 38.7; cf. Judg. 5.20). The title "sons/children of God" is familiar from *Ugaritic mythology, in which the gods collectively are called the "children of El (literally, God)" (bn ʾil). One of El's titles is "Father of the Children of God," indicating that the term refers to the gods as his physical offspring, with *Asherah (called "Creatress of the Gods") as their mother. The sons/children of God are also found in Phoenician and Ammonite inscriptions, referring to the pantheon of subordinate deities, indicating that the term was widespread in West Semitic religions. Beginning in the seventh and sixth centuries BCE, several Israelite writers (especially Jeremiah, the Deuteronomist, and Second Isaiah) explicitly rejected the notion that there were gods other than Yahweh, and depicted the "hosts of heaven" as a foreign intrusion in Israelite *monotheism.

RONALD S. HENDEL

Sortes Biblicae. In the ancient world, a method of fortune-telling called sortilege was performed by randomly choosing one of several slips on which were written verses of a poet, such as Homer or Virgil (sortes Homericae or sortes Vergilianae). Another soothsaying system involved randomly opening a copy of Homer's Iliad or Virgil's Aeneid and interpreting as prophetic the first line upon which the eye settled. Even though Christianity denounced augury and the related practice of sortilege, many continued to use such practices in the early church. A specific type of soothsaying (sortes biblicae) pursued by Christians involved using the Bible to divine their destiny by "sacred lots." After randomly opening the Bible and selecting the first line their eye fell upon, early Christians considered the passage a divine message to be applied to the problem that had caused them to employ such means of divination. The widespread use of sortes biblicae is confirmed by its repeated condemnation. For example, in France, the Gallican synods of Vannes (465 CE), Agde (506), Orléans (511), and Auxerre (570–590) passed ordinances vowing to excommunicate any Christian who "should be detected in the practice of this art, either as consulting or teaching it."

Along with gleaning messages from randomly chosen texts of scripture, early Christians also sometimes consulted specially prepared copies of the Bible, especially the Gospels, to learn their fortunes. In the lower margin of successive manuscript pages there occasionally appear brief comments, before each of which the Greek word hermēneia ("interpretation") is written. And so early Christians opened the Bible at random, or even cast dice to determine page numbers, in order to divine their fortunes. Such "interpretations" are found, for example, on eight Greek manuscript copies of John's gospel from the third or fourth century to the eighth century. Similarly, the fifth-century Codex Bezae bears such comments written in the lower margins of the gospel of Mark. Dating perhaps from the ninth or tenth century, these sixty-nine successive short statements include "You will be saved from danger," "Expect a great miracle," "You will receive joy from God," "Seek something else," "After ten days it will happen," and "What you seek will be found." An Old Latin codex of the Gospels of the eighth century is also inscribed along the margins of the gospel of John with a similar collection of sayings.

Sortilege was the influencing factor of St. Augustine's conversion; Augustine himself, however, credits a providential calling. His account (Confessions 8.12) reveals that, upon hearing a child's voice urging Tolle, lege; tolle lege ("Take up, read; take up, read"), he opened up a copy of the scriptures and his eyes were drawn to Romans 13.13–14, a passage that caused him to repudiate his former life. Later Augustine looked unfavorably on using the scriptures for divination: "As to those who read futurity by taking at random a text from the pages of the Gospels, it is better that they should do this than go to consult spirits of divination; nevertheless I am displeased with this custom, which turns the divine oracles, which were intended to teach us concerning the higher life, to the business of the world and the vanities of the present life" (Epistle 55.20.37).

Undoubtedly, the use of the lot to select Matthias as the twelfth *apostle after Judas' suicide (Acts 1.26), along with the verse "The lot is cast into the lap, but the decision is wholly from the Lord" (Prov. 16:33), stimulated the practice of biblical sortilege. John Wesley and early Methodists were known to take seriously this method of consulting the scriptures, and it is still practiced from time to time in various places.

See Magic and Divination.

BRUCE M. METZGER

Spirit, Flesh and. See Flesh and Spirit.

Spirit, Holy. See Holy Spirit.

Stephen. The first Christian martyr, Stephen appears only in *Acts. He is first mentioned as one of the *seven appointed to ensure equitable distribution of food between "Hebrews" and "Hellenists" (Acts 6.1–6). The seven were probably leaders of the Hellenistic group in the Jerusalem church.

According to Acts 6, in an explicit literary parallel to Luke's story of Jesus, Stephen was charged with blasphemy and summoned to defend himself before the supreme *Sanhedrin (Acts 6.8–15).

His defense (Acts 7.2–53) is a detailed exposition of the teaching that had provoked the charges against him. The speech may be regarded as a manifesto of early Hellenistic Christianity or at least of one phase of it. It does not represent Luke's point of view: for most of Luke's narrative, his appraisal of the *Temple is much more positive than Stephen's. Quoting the scriptures in support of his position, Stephen argues that to speak of the Temple as an institution to be destroyed or superseded was not to commit blasphemy, because God is independent of any building. It was commonly held by many early Christians that in Christ the Temple order had given way to something better, but Stephen's assertion that the Temple was a mistake from the beginning is without parallel in the New Testament. The position nearest to it is in the letter to the *Hebrews, but its author simply ignores the Temple and bases his exposition of the high-priestly ministry of Christ on the biblical account of the wilderness *tabernacle.

Stephen was apparently found guilty of *blasphemy and sentenced to death. His execution took the form of a judicial stoning, carried out in accordance with the Law (Lev. 24.15–16). Those who bore witness against him had the duty of throwing the first stones (see Deut 17.7); on this occasion "a young man named Saul" guarded their cloaks as they did so, and thus *Paul makes his first appearance.

Analogies have been found to Stephen's position among the *Samaritans, the *Qumran community, and the Ebionites. These groups, for various reasons, expressed a negative attitude to the Jerusalem Temple and its ceremonial. But Stephen's critique is distinctive; not only is it rooted in the preexilic prophets but it has a new basis in the Christ event. The radical Hellenistic theology represented by his speech survived particularly in Alexandrian Christianity, where its best-known expression is the letter of Barnabas (late first/early second century CE).

Stephen's impeachment and execution are said to have precipitated a persecution of the Jerusalem church, especially its Hellenistic members, who were forced to leave Jerusalem and Judea. But they preached the gospel wherever they went. Stephen's fellow-almoner Philip preached it in *Samaria; others, unnamed, preached it to the Greeks of *Antioch. Stephen's blood proved to be the seed of gentile Christianity.

F. F. BRUCE

Stoics. A philosophical school founded in Athens by Zeno of Citium (335–263 BCE) which became the most influential philosophic sect in the Greco-Roman world. Stoics conceived of philosophy as the knowledge of things divine and human, and its goal as a life in harmony with nature. They thought that the universe was permeated by the *Logos or Reason, also referred to as God or Providence. Human beings, they held, are particles of God, for divine Reason is manifested in a special way in human reason. As one rationally develops those conceptions of the divine that are innate in all people, one more clearly discerns the nature of things, including oneself. Stoics who make progress in this manner advance from ignorance, which is responsible for vice, to knowledge of reality, which makes virtue possible. Virtue and vice they delineated in extensive lists. Stoics disregarded all matters external to themselves, and cultivated an impassivity which made them self-sufficient or content (autarkēs). Hardships that befell them therefore did not affect their true selves, but merely showed their true character. Their view of divine kinship gave a devotional cast to their language, and their doctrine that all things in the universe are in harmonious relationship to each other accommodated much of popular religion, including the veneration of religious images. As a messenger of the divine, the Stoic sage sought to show others their error and to lead them to the good. This included instruction in civic responsibility, which Stoics, as did other philosophers, summarized in lists of duties of members of a household (see Ethical Lists).

In Jewish thought, *wisdom was personified and increasingly related to the doctrine of *creation. Stoic echoes of the cosmic wisdom are present in the *Septuagint translation of Proverbs 8.22–31, and other Stoic elements begin to appear in Jewish literature, partly, perhaps, in reaction to Epicurean tendencies in such works as *Ecclesiastes. *Sirach advances a Stoic-like view of God as "the all" (43.27) who is responsible for every human experience (11.14), yet differs from Stoic pantheism in deeming God greater than his works (43.28). Wisdom, like the Stoic Logos, permeates the universe (24.5–6), but is identified with the *Law of Moses (24.23), which is thus elevated to something suprahistorical and rational. The *Wisdom of Solomon similarly describes all-pervading Wisdom as the agent of *creation (7.22–26), which is directed by divine providence (6.7; 14.3). Using the Stoic notion of natural theology, Wisdom of Solomon argues that, while knowledge of God is possible by observing creation, human failure to attain this knowledge resulted in an unpardonable ignorance (13.8) that plunged humanity into idolatry and immorality (14.12). Stoic influence is also clearly discernible in 4 *Maccabees, which defines wisdom as the knowledge of divine and human things (1.16–17) and sets out to determine whether devout reason is master of the passions (1.1). Unlike the Stoics, however, the author advocates the mastery, not eradication, of the passions (1.30–35; 3.2).

Stoics are mentioned explicitly in the Bible only in Acts 17.18, where, according to Luke, in company with their opponents the *Epicureans they encounter *Paul. The sermon that follows (17.22–31) has Paul making extensive use of popular Stoicism: the veneration of images as an expression of human religiosity, providence, kinship with the creator God, and the quotation of writers who represent Stoic views. Since Stoics focused on the material world, Paul's reference to the resurrection is mocked by his audience. Similar Stoic thought, perhaps mediated by Jewish wisdom traditions, is used in Romans 1.18–32. But, where in Acts 17 Paul is represented as using Stoicism positively, excusing former ignorance, in Romans he uses it to indict, as Wisdom 13 does: God had granted knowledge of himself in creation, but that knowledge was rejected and humanity was therefore given over to immorality. The Stoic interpretation of Wisdom as the agent of creation may also have influenced the view of the Logos in John 1.1–2. Paul further uses Stoic lists, many of which may have come to him by way of Hellenistic Judaism, such as lists of virtues and vices (1 Cor. 6.9–10; Gal. 5.19–23) and of hardships (1 Cor. 4.9–13; 2 Cor. 6.4–10). Paul christianizes such lists, as he does the Stoic view of self-sufficiency. In Philippians 4.11–13, he claims to be content (autarkēs), which does not mean that he is impassive or had attained self-sufficiency on his own; on the contrary, he is able to experience all things fully because God empowers him. The Stoic lists of social responsibilities are similarly christianized (Eph. 5.22–6.9; Col. 3.18–4.1). God's initiative and the eschatological perspective also place the Stoic-sounding language of 2 Peter 1.3–4 in a different Christian perspective.

ABRAHAM J. MALHERBE

Structuralism.

Characteristics. Structuralism is interdisciplinary, involving a variety of methods. It is not concerned with the intent of the author, the observable phenomena, or the organization of the text (rhetorical criticism), but with constraints and cultural codes that impose themselves on any speaker or author (deep structures). It studies structure as a totality in which the whole and the parts are integrally related; the fundamental structures are those "below" the surface of the empirical manifestation.

The dichotomy expression/content (signifier/signified) is basic. Structuralism emphasizes the synchronic dimension (the timeless aspect of a text), as opposed to the diachronic aspect, which focuses on its historical development; modern biblical studies have traditionally emphasized the diachronic dimension. The syntagmatic and paradigmatic features of a text are also important. The syntagmatic order, the chainlike manifestation of what precedes and what follows, primarily reflects the intention of the author. A paradigmatic reading presupposes various systems, but manifests only a certain section of these systems or paradigms. Further essential features are the emphasis on fundamental binary oppositions, as well as the challenge to penetrate through the surface structure of spoken discourse (la parole) in order to reach the basic laws of language (la langue).

Background and Proponents. The roots of structuralism go back to the linguistic theories of Ferdinand de Saussure (1915) and the influence of the Russian formalists, with their emphasis on linguistics and the poetics of the text, how it is made. Roman Jakobson was influential in the shift in European criticism from Russian formalism to structuralism; he placed the study of poetics within the context of linguistics by describing six basic external factors and corresponding internal functions.

The roots of structuralism can further be traced to anthropology, especially to the pioneering work of Claude Lévi-Strauss. The influence of de Saussure (culture as a generalized version of language-as-system model) and Jakobson (binary opposition) can be detected in his work. He claims that literature gives evidence of the unconscious structuring patterns of society. In myths, the binary oppositions of life are mediated and transformed. So, for example, the opposition between life and death is mediated by the concept of hunting (to kill in order to live). Myth consists of both langue (reversible time, the synchronic element) as well as parole (nonreversible time, the diachronic element). The meaning of myth is to be found not in the intrinsic content of the actions but rather in the combination of the synchronic and diachronic elements.

Structuralism is also related to three different streams of literary studies: Russian (Vladimir Propp), French (Roland Barthes and A. J. Greimas), and American. Barthes was one of the most important proponents of structuralism, though he later abandoned this approach. For him there is no antithesis between history and structure: the structure of the sentence serves as a model for the structure of discourse. Barthes abandons the inductive model, and opts for a deductive approach, seeing a text as a homogeneous unit. He proceeds with a sequential analysis (division of the text into basic units), as well as a structural analysis of sequences. Barthes distinguishes three levels of narrative structure: functions (Propp), actions (Greimas), and narration (Tzvetan Todorov). He concentrates on a specific text, underlining its plurality of meanings, rather than inferring common structures from a number of texts.

Greimas, with his deductive and scientific methodology, is concerned not with the meaning of the text as such but rather with the semantic structures underlying the narrative. Three levels of text are to be distinguished. The level of manifestation concentrates on performance, the competence of the author as it is realized in the empirical text. The level of narrative structure deals with functions (Propp) and actants, as well as the axes of communication, volition, and power. On the discursive or thematic level, isotopies as levels of coherence constructed from classemes allow the reader to discern the interaction of various levels of meaning. Paradigmatic meaning is related not in a syntagmatic manner to the context of the rest of the sentence but rather, in a binary or ternary fashion, to oppositions of meaning.

Structuralism and Biblical Studies. In 1961 Edmund Leach was the first to apply the approach of Lévi-Strauss to the text of Genesis 1–3, explicating myths that are the product of universal structures of human thought, involving binary oppositions and their reconciliation. Lévi-Strauss himself did not consider this exercise to be successful. In a comparison made by Leach of *Jesus and *John the Baptist, he points out various parallel and opposite features. Beneath the surface structure of the text, which seems to deal with Jesus, the geological substratum of universal structure deals with humankind.

Roland Barthes addressed the account of Jacob's struggle with the angel (Gen. 32.22–32). He emphasizes the element of ambiguity and paradox in the Genesis account, and shows how imagining a countertext can illuminate the narrative. He also uses the actantial model of Greimas: Barthes takes this narrative to be typical of a common Russian folk-narrative in which a hostile spirit guards a difficult passage over a ford.

Jean Calloud applied the methodology of Greimas to Matthew 4.1–11. First, a syntactic or narrative analysis is given of the lexies of the text, as well as its functional and actantial schemes. Jesus is the Receiver of a mandate given by the Spirit. The devil as Sender then sends tests to Jesus. The Word as Helper gives assistance to Jesus. In the glorifying test Jesus proves to be the Hero. The consequent semantic analysis deals with the paradigmatic aspect of the text. The functioning of the semantic contents, skillfully woven around the two main actors Jesus and Satan, is then interrelated with the analysis of the narrative structure.

Robert C. Culley is more interested in the "syntagmatic" narrative structures, the linear and rhetorical tradition, the repetition of patterns in seven miracle stories from the Hebrew Bible. Jean Starobinski's analysis of Mark 5.1–20 is also an example of a purely synchronous reading of the text from a literary point of view. He demonstrates the oppositions in the text between the unchanging singularity of Jesus and the pluralization of the demoniac.

The approach of Erhardt Güttgemanns is called generative poetics or linguistic theology. He sees a particular text as the result of grammatical rather than historical forces. Generative poetics is a deductive method, which aims to free theology from its traditional confinement by means of a scientific and interdisciplinary approach. The narrative analysis is interested not in the performance text but in the deep text, the underlying semantic content of the narrative. This is arrived at by way of two separate analyses, a motifemic and an actantial analysis.

Daniel Patte, applying the methodology of Lévi-Strauss to biblical texts, aims to study the symbolic and connotative dimension of language, which should be distinguished from the informational dimension of language. By describing the system of convictions and symbolic values of the authors of biblical texts, structural exegesis aims to open up hermeneutic possibilities.

In his analysis of Galatians 1.1–10, Patte shows that mythical structures can be discovered in nonmythical texts. In Galatia there is a conflict between two mythical structures—the gospel of Paul and the antigospel of his opponents. By a syntagmatic reading, the text is tentatively deconstructed into elements of a mythical system. By a subsequent paradigmatic reading, the structure that governs these mythical elements is discerned: through the mediating of the oppositions of this mythical structure, it becomes clear that Christ is the mediation of the fundamental opposition between the divine and the human.

In his structural introduction to the letter, Patte deals with Paul's faith as a system of convictions. Faith and theology are to be distinguished in the light of semiotic and structural research. In order to describe Paul's faith, attention is given to the convictional pattern that underlies and validates his arguments, as well as to the motivating factors presupposed.

Discourse Analysis. Besides analyzing the universal "deep" structures of a text (as described above), more attention should be given to the "surface" structure, and to the function of a text's stylistic, organizational, and rhetorical features. This implies an awareness of the importance of different discourse patterns in the text as a whole. The text must therefore be mapped in a way that will allow us to discern the syntactic, semantic, and pragmatic relationships of the various constituent parts. This approach includes attention to the inter- and extratextual dimensions of the text.

Building on the metatheory of structural semiotics of Greimas, Patte has recently proposed a six-step method incorporating the main features of different structural exegetical methods. Through a multiplicity of underlying structures, the reader is guided to a close reading of the surface structure of the text. In this way, the specific features of a discourse unit as well as the basic convictions of the author are conveyed.

Evaluation. On the negative side, one can point to the lack of unity and clarity among proponents, their neologisms, and the methodological complexity. Although the universal dimensions and internal relations of a text are emphasized, the more specific forms of a given culture or of the biblical text are often played down. The message becomes only a quotation of the underlying code, and specific saving acts of God are reduced to general truths. The methodology of Propp, devised for the description of Russian folktales, cannot simply be applied to the Bible, for the folktales do not have universal validity. Lévi-Strauss himself had reservations about applying his approach to the Bible. Without detracting anything from the grammaticality and literality of the text, the specific context of the Bible should also be taken into account.

On the positive side, structuralism can be an aid to biblical exegesis and *hermeneutics within the context of semiotics. A text and its structural analysis collectively form a sign-system. Codes should not be deemed more important than the message itself; therefore adequate emphasis should be given to the surface structure of the text. Attention to deep structures underlines the depth of meaning and the coherence of different books. The synchronic approach serves as a corrective to the one-sided emphasis of the genetic (diachronic) paradigm. The integrity of the text as object is emphasized.

The critic/reader acquires a new role in the process of reading the text. Structuralism and *hermeneutics can be complementary when the text is seen again as message, parole. While structuralism reveals the multiplicity of readings, it also controls them by means of a structural analysis of the text. Hermeneutics limits the possibilities by confronting the vertical aspect of meaning (diachronic) with the synchronic coexistence of meanings.

See also Interpretation, History of, article on Modern Biblical Criticism.

H. J. BERNARD COMBRINK

Suffering. Like prosperity, suffering introduces a test into human lives, both disclosing and forming character. For religious people, suffering comes as a special trial, particularly its unjust distribution. Belief in the goodness and power of God implies a just distribution of misery. When good persons experience undeserved suffering, it becomes difficult to maintain the conviction that God controls a universe that operates on a principle of reward and retribution. One biblical response to this dilemma was daring: chosen individuals voluntarily take upon themselves the suffering of the guilty. Less bold, but also significant, is the view that suffering offers an opportunity to learn something worthwhile, especially patience (James 1.2–4).

The world of suffering is special, causing everyone to think that the experience of pain is unique and consequently focusing the ego inward, which heightens self-centeredness. Suffering takes place in solitude, isolating one from the community and generating a sense of alienation. At the same time, suffering strives toward the building of community, for its power extends from the greatest to the least. Genuine sympathy is possible precisely because others have felt pain and isolation. Hence the language of suffering is readily comprehended by all who are searching for meaning in a hostile world.

In ancient literature suffering was often expressed in lyrical poetry. Emotion-laden speech tends to exaggerate, but even such hyperbole fails to evoke the full range of feelings in suffering. Personal pronouns abound in laments, focusing remembered joy and present pain, individualizing both in a powerful manner. Simile and *metaphor call attention to language's poverty in describing the misery resulting from invasion from outside by hostile forces.

Drawing on ancient insights from Mesopotamia to some degree, biblical attempts to explain suffering throw considerable light on the problem, although failing to clarify the mystery altogether. An early explanation seized the partial truth (well articulated much later by Paul in Rom. 7.15) that most individuals do evil even when willing good, and hence suffering is in a very real sense punishment for sin. The book of *Proverbs regularly insists on this retributive understanding of *evil, and the same view is shared by the *Deuteronomic history and by Israel's *prophets. When reportedly offered an opportunity to endorse this view of suffering, *Jesus refused to do so (John 9.3). Job's friends appealed to parental discipline of children, assuming by analogy that God punishes those who enjoy divine favor. The profound story about the divine test of Abraham (Gen. 22.1–18; see Aqedah) and the prologue to the book of *Job suggest that adversity may indicate a divine test to which God's "favorites" are submitted.

Confidence in God's integrity and character resulted in an *eschatological hope that deliverance would come in the end, setting all things right. *Apocalyptic literature found this view compatible because of the extreme suffering of the periods in which it arose. Injustice could elicit the daring hope in survival beyond earthly existence (Dan. 12.2; see Afterlife and Immortality). In some circles suffering was seen as redemptive, both for self and for others. Doxologies of judgment dared to praise God in the face of execution (Josh. 7.19), and the "servant poems" in Second *Isaiah (especially Isa. 53) envisioned the death of their leader as vicarious, a view that Christians shared in reflecting on Jesus' passion.

In some instances biblical writers thought of suffering as transitory, resulting from an illusion that resembles a dream, while others believed that God's revelatory presence in suffering compensated adequately for any amount of misery (Ps. 73). The astonishing conclusion to the dialogue in the book of Job acknowledges a seeing of God that corrects hearsay information and leaves the sufferer speechless but content (42.5–6). At the same time, the poet admits that an adequate answer to Job's suffering cannot be offered, and hence the mystery remains. A wholly different response occurs in *Ecclesiastes, in which the author accuses the distant, divine despot of indifference to the human suffering that distresses him, a mere human being (4.1).

Both Judaism and Christianity find the problem of suffering especially acute because of their elevated view of God as ethical, that is, their belief in theodicy. These religions further suggest that suffering is not merely a human phenomenon, for God also suffers because of rebellion on the part of men and women. The prophets emphasized divine pathos, and Christianity adopted this understanding of God. The suffering of Christ manifests the divine response to evil, culminating in victorious *resurrection. Christians are called on to enter into the suffering of Christ for the sake of the Kingdom.

Suffering, therefore, is rooted in divine mystery, and at the same time it is profoundly human. God's redemption of the world employs suffering in its numerous forms to enable persons to recognize their own humanity and to acknowledge their true selves. As a result of this divine pedagogy, suffering offers potential for enriching faith and life itself. Nevertheless, some suffering, by its very intensity, lacks this positive dimension, introducing destructive powers that ultimately triumph over its victim. In the face of this kind of suffering, believers find their faith tested to the limit. Neither Judaism nor Christianity has denied the existence of such suffering, nor did they trivialize it by offering simple answers. Instead, moving beyond tragedy, they insisted that evil is under the dominion of God.

JAMES L. CRENSHAW

Sumer (Map 6:J4). Shumer (conventionally: Sumer) is the name given to the lower Mesopotamian plain by its Akkadian neighbors; in its own Sumerian language, the land was called Kengir. It occupied the area between the city of Nippur in the northwest and the shoreline of the Persian (or Arabian) Gulf in the southeast; upstream from Nippur lay the land of Akkad. Together, Sumer and Akkad occupied all the land between the rivers *Euphrates and Tigris below their nearest convergence around modern Baghdad. In this relatively constricted area (the later *Babylonia), there arose not only the world's first civilization but also one of its great ancient cultures, destined to influence all Near Eastern cultures, including Israel, and to bequeath a lasting legacy to civilization as a whole.

The origin of the Sumerians is uncertain. They themselves looked to Dilmun, that is, the islands and Arabian shore of the Persian Gulf, as a kind a paradise, and may have originated from there, or even further east. They regarded Eridu, then on the northern edge of the Gulf, as their first city, and perhaps this was indeed their first foothold in Mesopotamia. Traces of this tradition survive in Genesis 4.17b, which may be understood thus: "And he [Enoch] became the [first] builder of a city, and he named it after his son [i.e., Irad], did Enoch."

The basic ingredients of civilization as it emerged in Sumer at the end of the fourth millennium BCE included cities, *writing, and the formation of capital. Building on the earlier agricultural revolution and its domestication of plants and animals (symbolized in the biblical account by *Cain and Abel respectively; cf. Gen. 4.2), the urban revolution in Sumer soon brought in its train such secondary developments as craft specialization, metallurgy, and the emergence of *kingship. A rich documentation in cuneiform preserves the records of these achievements as well as the Sumerians' own interpretation of them in literary texts. Long after Sumerian itself had ceased to be spoken, these literary texts continued to be studied and translated in the scribal schools of Babylonia and the rest of the Near East. Some of them are thus echoed in the Bible, whose primeval history (Gen. 1–11) is situated in Sumer.

The centerpiece of Sumerian historiography is the "Sumerian King List," perhaps better described as a Sumerian city list, which records the eleven cities that exercised hegemony over all of Sumer and Akkad, together with the names of their kings, their length of rule, and occasional biographical notes. It begins in legendary times, when kingship "descended from heaven," and ends with the destruction of the city of Isin in 1794 BCE, one year before the accession of King *Hammurapi of Babylon. Its antediluvian rulers, in most recensions eight in number, and the wise counselors associated with them (in other sources), bear an undeniable resemblance to the lines of Seth and Cain in Genesis 5 and 4 respectively.

The Sumerian story of the *flood is preserved in a single fragmentary tablet that, via various Akkadian intermediaries, no doubt helped shape the biblical version in Genesis 6–8. After the flood, kingship was believed to have come down from heaven again, first to the city of Kish and then to Uruk, the Erech of the "table of nations" (Gen. 10.10). Its fourth ruler, Dumuzi, is celebrated in poems about his sacred marriage with the goddess Inanna, and passed into Akkadian—and Hebrew (cf. Ezek. 8.14)—as the deified *Tammuz. The epic of "Enmerkar and the lord of Aratta" includes a passage reminiscent of the biblical tale of the confusion of tongues that, in Genesis 11, is linked to the building of "a city and a tower" clearly modeled on the *ziggurat (stepped temple tower) characteristic of Sumerian cities (see Tower of Babel). The end of the "Early Dynastic Period" in Sumer (ca. 2900–2300 BCE) is marked by the conflict of two other city-states (Lagash and Umma) over the edin, a fertile area lying between them that may have inspired the biblical tale of the garden of *Eden (Gen. 2–3).

There followed an interval of subjugation to the Semitic-speaking Akkadians (ca. 2300–2150 BCE), so named after the city of Akkad whose greatest rulers, Sargon and especially his grandson Naram-Sin, may conceivably have provided the model for Nimrod and Akkad in Genesis 10.8–12. Then the Sumerians reasserted themselves under local rulers such as Gudea of Lagash, who left a magnificent legacy of both literary and sculptural remains, and under the hegemony of *Ur, which reunited all of Sumer and Akkad for a century (ca. 2100–2000 BCE) under the city recalled in the Bible as the birthplace of *Abraham (Gen. 11.28, 31; etc.).

After the fall of Ur (ca. 2000 BCE), Sumerian traditions were preserved intact by the dynasty of Isin (ca. 2000–1800 BCE) and thereafter by the schools and temples of Babylonia and *Assyria. Among the Sumerian innovations thus passed on to later ages are the sexagesimal system of counting and computation (using the base 60), irrigation agriculture, and a variety of literary genres.

The Akkadian language, and the civilization of the Babylonians and Assyrians who inherited and preserved Sumerian culture, transmitted the Sumerian legacy, or portions of it, to posterity. Among the heirs of this legacy was biblical Israel. While the name of Sumer itself is no longer thought to lurk behind the biblical Shinar (Gen. 10.10; etc.), other Hebrew words and names can be traced to Sumerian, such as hêkāl ("palace, temple"), tipsār ("scribe"), mallāḥ ("sailor"), and numerous names of spices, plants, minerals, and other commodities whose names traveled with the products they identified. Many ideas too can be traced from their biblical formulation back to Sumerian origins, for example the casuistic (conditional) formulation of precedent *law. When the Bible placed the origins of (civilized) humankind, and of Israelite prehistory, in the lower valley of the Tigris and Euphrates, it was anticipating the modern rediscovery of the Sumerians and their formative contributions to civilization.

WILLIAM W. HALLO

Susanna. A devout and beautiful Jewish woman, whose name means "lily." She was falsely accused of adultery, but saved from sentence of death by the young Daniel, who presented in court an unorthodox but clever defense; and she is the heroine of the small book of the Apocrypha that goes by her name. (See Apocrypha, article on Jewish Apocrypha.)

In Theodotion's edition of the Greek and in several ancient versions based upon it, Susanna appears as a prefix to chap. 1 of the book of *Daniel, but in the older Greek *Septuagint and the Latin *Vulgate it is placed in an appendix after chap. 12 along with the story of *Bel and the Dragon. It seems almost certain that it was originally an independent work, since neither the style and setting of the story nor the character of Daniel, its hero, seem to harmonize with the rest of the book. Other independent stories about Daniel were current in antiquity, as is evidenced by the discovery of fragments of Daniel legends among the *Dead Sea Scrolls.

The story is interesting and well told. Susanna, the wife of Joakim, a wealthy and highly respected Jew who lived in Babylonia during the *exile, used to walk every afternoon in the garden of her house, and attracted the lecherous interest of two elders of the community who had been appointed judges and were frequent visitors to Joakim's home. Separately bent on seducing her, they met by chance in the hiding place where each had her under observation, and concocted a plot against her virtue. One day when she was bathing in the garden and the doors to the house had been shut by her two maids, the elders rushed out of their place of concealment and demanded that she lie with them; otherwise they would publicly accuse her of committing adultery with a young man, and would declare that they had witnessed the act. Susanna, true to her principles, refused their request and said she was willing to accept the consequences. When the inevitable trial began, they carried out their threat and, as a result, she was condemned to die. But at the critical moment God inspired the youthful Daniel to protest against the sentence and to undertake to cross-examine the two elders separately. In an anticipation of the technique of the classic detective story, he caught them in a clear contradiction about the kind of tree under which the alleged crime was committed, with the result that Susanna was acquitted and the accusers suffered the fate they had intended for her (cf. the similar ironic reversal in *Esther).

The tale is commonly accepted as fiction, but there has been no general agreement on its purpose. Some scholars have thought the story a kind of midrash dealing with the fate of the two false prophets, Ahab and Zedekiah, who were the objects of a curse by Jeremiah, and were accused by him, incidentally, of adulterous conduct (Jer. 29.21–23). Others regard it as a partisan polemic calling for an improvement in the commonly accepted procedures of the rabbinic courts. The prevailing view, however, sees it as simply a popular tale, probably secular, and perhaps even non-Jewish in origin, which has been provided with edifying religious motifs and adapted for Jewish readers. Some scholars who assert that specific elements in the story have been taken from traditional folklore, notably the theme of the "wise child"—the youth who displays more insight than his elders and is able to correct some flagrant injustice—but the evidence is vague and indecisive.

Until comparatively recent times, it was the common view that the original language was Greek; this seems especially persuasive because of the puns on the names of the two trees in vv. 54–55 and 58–59 (see text notes b and c in NRSV), which make sense only in Greek. Recently, however, the book has increasingly been thought a translation from an original Semitic text, probably Hebrew but possibly Aramaic, though there is no supporting external evidence. The book does, however, contain a number of apparent Hebraisms, and the social ambience suggests a Palestinian origin. The puns could have been introduced by the Greek translator. The date could be as early as the Persian period and certainly no later than ca. 100 BCE, when the Septuagint translation was completed. The story of Susanna was a popular subject of later Christian art and literature, and poetic versions of the tale are known in several European languages.

For other additions to Daniel, see Azariah, The Prayer of and Bel and the Dragon.

ROBERT C. DENTAN

Symbols. A symbol entails the use of a specific entity to represent or parallel an idea, concept, or reality. Usually there is some likeness between the object used as a symbol and its intended parallel. Symbols in the Bible are drawn from everyday life or from a specific cultural setting and are especially frequent in *apocalyptic literature.

Symbols drawn from everyday life are easily illustrated. A person who observes the *Law and with whom God is pleased can be described as a tree or garden that grows and blossoms. The struggle against evil can be viewed as warfare (Wisd. of Sol. 5.17–20; Eph. 6.11–17; 1 Tim. 6.12; 2 Tim. 4.7; Rev. 12.17). Fire is used in various ways, most significantly perhaps in *theophany narratives, in which God's presence is symbolized by fire (e.g., Exod. 3.1–6; 19.16–19; 1 Kings 18.38; Acts 2.1–4; see Metaphors).

In Judaism and Christianity certain symbols are drawn from their historical and cultural backgrounds. Thus, *circumcision is the sign of entrance into the community for Jews, as *baptism is for Christians. The seven-branched lampstand or *menorah used in the Temple can symbolize the Jewish community, while the cross can stand for the Christian community.

Finally, symbols are used extensively in apocalyptic literature. Animals and fantastic beasts can represent other nations; *numbers and colors have symbolic importance.

Ancient writers assumed that their audience would correctly interpet a symbol by making the necessary comparison. Later interpreters, however, can read too much (or too little) into a symbol, applying to it an anachronistically modern understanding. Thus, knowledge of the actual setting and of the literary genres used by ancient writers is necessary for interpretation of the Bible's many and marvelous symbols.

See also Number Symbolism.

JAMES M. EFIRD

Synagogue. The emergence of the synagogue constituted a revolutionary development in the history of Judaism. The synagogue represented not only a wholly new concept of religious observance but also a new form of communal institution. With the synagogue the nature of official worship shifted dramatically, with *prayer, study, and exhortation replacing sacrifice as the way to serve God. Officiating on behalf of the community was no longer confined to a small coterie of *priests but was open to all. Ceremonies were conducted in full view of the participants, with the masses of people no longer being relegated to outer courtyards, as was the case in the Jerusalem *Temple. Moreover, the synagogue was a universal institution and not confined to any one specific locale.

Despite its importance in Jewish history, the origins of the synagogue and its early development are shrouded in mystery. Only during and after the first century CE does literary and archaeological evidence appear for Palestine. As for the Roman Diaspora, references before then are practically nonexistent (and what does exist refers to the Diaspora). Synagogue inscriptions from third- and second-century BCE Egypt have been preserved, as have remains of a Delos synagogue building dating from the first century BCE.

Owing to the paucity of sources, opinions have varied widely as to when, where, and why the synagogue developed. Theories have ranged from the late First Temple period (eighth-seventh century BCE), through the exilic (sixth century) and postexilic (fifth century) eras, and down to the late Persian (fourth century) and Hellenistic times (third or second century). Most scholars have assumed a midway position, one that posits the emergence of the synagogue closely following the destruction of the First Temple in 587/586 BCE, either during the Babylonian *exile or soon after, when the Jews returned to Judea during the era of restoration.

Over the centuries the synagogue became a fully developed communal institution and apparently the central one in most communities. It served as a place for study, sacred meals, court proceedings, depositing communal funds, and political and social meetings, as a hostel, and as a residence for certain synagogue officials. Of central importance, of course, were the religious services. At first these consisted primarily of the Torah-reading ceremony and its accompanying activities: translation of the *Torah into the vernacular, be it Aramaic (Targums) or Greek (see Translations, articles on Ancient Languages and Targums), the haftarah or a selected reading from the prophets, and a sermon. The sources from the Second Temple period—*Josephus, *Philo, rabbinic writings, and the Theodotus inscription—point to this centrality. The existence of regular communal prayers at this time is unclear. While prayer appears to have been an integral part of the religious service in the Diaspora, its presence in Palestinian synagogue settings before 70 CE is unattested. Only after this date are we on firm ground in assuming the importance and centrality of public prayer in all synagogue settings.

These two components of the religious service—Torah reading and prayer—were characterized in antiquity by their fluidity no less than their uniformity. While Torah reading was accepted as normative on *Sabbaths and holidays and later on Mondays and Thursdays as well, the division into weekly portions varied considerably. In Palestine the Torah was read over a three- or three-and-a-half-year period with a plethora of local traditions on the precise divisions of the weekly portions (141, 154, 161, 167, and 175). Moreover, the practice in Babylonian communities living in late Roman and Byzantine Palestine only added to this diversity: They concluded the Torah reading in one year. How widespread the custom was of translating the Torah portion into the vernacular is unknown, but the use of Greek in addition to Aramaic cannot be denied. The place of the sermon in the synagogue service was likewise diverse. The content, of course, might have varied considerably from one of an expository nature to one of ethical, political, halakhic, or even eschatological dimensions. When sermons were delivered on the Sabbath (Friday evening, Saturday morning, or Saturday afternoon), or when during the service (before or after the Torah reading), might differ widely from one congregation to another.

The diversity is found also with regard to prayer. Undoubtedly by the post-70 era the two main foci of the prayer service had crystallized. The *Shema prayer (Deut. 6.4–9) with its accompanying paragraphs (Deut. 11.13–21; Num. 15.37–41) had been adopted from Temple practice and was now supplemented by three blessings, each focusing on a central theme, respectively—*creation, *revelation, and *redemption. Together this unit provided the central ideational portion of the prayer experience and was recited in the synagogue twice daily, during the morning and evening services. The second focus of the prayer service was the Shemoneh Esreh (literally, "eighteen" blessings, although a nineteenth was added some time in late antiquity) or the Amidah (standing prayer). When precisely this prayer came into usage is unknown, but by the second century CE it held a central position. Recited three times daily, no special prayer service, be it on the Sabbath, Holiday, or High Holiday, was complete without it. The Amidah consisted of three parts: the first three benedic-tions were in praise of God, the last three were expressions of thanks, while the middle section changed each day. On a weekday, twelve (later thirteen) petionary blessings were recited; on Sabbaths and holidays this section expressed the unique message of that particular day. During the early centuries CE prayers were added to the morning service, such as prayers of supplication, morning blessings, psalms of praise, and others.

During the Byzantine period, the recitation of liturgical poems—pîyyûṭîm—was added to the service, particularly those for the Sabbath and holidays. When and from where the pîyyûṭ developed has been a subject of scholarly debate. Some claim it evolved from earlier midrashim, prayers, or songs recited in the Temple and synagogue, others see it as the adoption and adaptation of liturgical poems recited in Byzantine churches, and still others as a protest against organized, fixed prayers. Whatever the explanation, the pîyyûṭ made its appearance in fourth- and fifth-century Palestine, and today we know of at least twenty poets who functioned in the pre-Muslim era. These pîyyûṭîm were recited during the morning service, either in addition to or in place of the fixed liturgy.

Archaeological remains of the ancient synagogue abound. In Palestine alone traces of over a hundred structures have been identified, and in the Diaspora some fifteen. The latter stretch from Dura Europos on the Euphrates River in the east, to Tunisia on the North African coast in the west. The overwhelming majority of synagogue remains in Palestine are located in the *Galilee and Golan regions; others are to be found in Beth-shean, coastal areas, and Judea. Architecturally, these synagogues can be divided into three types. The Galilean type, characterized by a monumental and richly decorated facade, was oriented towards Jerusalem, often with three entrances. Fine ashlar masonry of either limestone or basalt was characteristic of these buildings, and their rectangular interiors were simple, with two or three colonnades dividing the hall into a central nave with two or three aisles. Entablatures, pilasters, and friezes typical of Roman art of late antiquity decorated the buildings, along with molded stucco and painted plaster. With but few exceptions, no permanent shrines for the Torah scrolls have been found.

The second type of synagogue modelled itself after the basilical plan used extensively in Byzantine churches, and was modest on the exterior, reserving its splendor for the interior. In contrast to the Galilean type with its splendid entrance on the facade facing Jerusalem, the entrance in the basilica type shifted to the wall opposite the direction of prayer. A round or square apse was set in the wall facing Jerusalem in which the Torah ark rested on a raised platform (bîmâ). Only two rows of columns lined the elongated character of the prayer hall. Most notable in the basilica type of synagogue was its richly decorated mosaic floor, often in clear imitation of regnant Byzantine patterns and not infrequently with unique Jewish symbols, such as a *menorah, Torah ark, lulav, ethrog, and shofar. Such symbols were practically nonexistent in buildings of the Galilean type. Finally, a third type of building which appears in but a few locales of Palestine and the Diaspora is the broadhouse synagogue. The uniqueness of these buildings is that their focus of worship, either an apse, bîmâ, or shrine—which is located along the long wall of the synagogue. These buildings share features common to the other types in most other respects.

Aside from the Jewish symbols mentioned above, Jewish figural art is represented in only a few synagogues: the *Aqedah (Genesis 22) at Beth Alpha, *Noah at Gerasa, *David at Gaza, and *Daniel at Naʿaran and Susiya. Of an entirely different order is the third-century CE synagogue of Dura Europos, whose walls are covered from floor to ceiling with decorated panels. These panels depict scenes from the Bible, using Greek and Persian artistic motifs and incorporating a significant amount of midrash (rabbinic or otherwise) in their interpretations and representations. One of the most striking examples of synagogue art, at Hammath Tiberias and elsewhere, represents Helios, the zodiac signs, and the four seasons. Interpretations of these motifs vary considerably. The first reaction was to interpret them as the gift of the emperor or as an expression of some fringe group in Judaism. With the discovery, however, of such pavements all over Israel, it became clear that this was a popular and accepted form of artistic expression. Among the interpretations proposed of the zodiac motif are: it was simply a decorative motif; it reflects the importance of the Jewish calendar; it represents the power of God in creating the world each day; it stands for the Divine himself; it reflects belief in *angels, especially Helios, who was well known within certain Jewish circles of the period. Of these several explanations, none has won general acceptance. (See also Art and the Bible.)

Owing to the centrality of the synagogue as the primary Jewish communal institution and to the extensive remains that have survived, the study of this institution is of paramount importance for those wishing to gain as complete a picture of ancient Judaism as possible. Patterns of Jewish settlements, the diversity of religious practices, the influence of surrounding cultures, Jewish artistic expression, Jewish prosography, titles and professions among synagogue donors are areas well attested in synagogue remains.

See also Lectionaries, article on Jewish Tradition.

LEE LEVINE

Synoptic Problem. The synoptic Gospels are those of *Matthew, *Mark, and *Luke. They are called "synoptic" ("seen together") because of their close similarities, which enable the texts to be set out in parallel for comparison. It is generally agreed that there is a literary relationship among them, but the phenomena are complex and judgments on them are conflicting. Dominant in modern critical scholarship is the Two Document Hypothesis (TDH), namely, that Mark was the first gospel and was one of two sources used by both Matthew and Luke, the other being "Q" (German Quelle, "source"). But the TDH has not shaken off challenges from the older view that the earliest gospel was that of Matthew.

All four Gospels reflect a common tradition about *Jesus. But *John is sharply distinguished—in style and wording, structure, and especially theological emphasis. It may show knowledge of the synoptics; but the "Johannine problem" is a separate one. This article will summarize the synoptic phenomena, the leading hypotheses, and the main arguments. For a detailed study, readers should use one of the various synopses or harmonies that print the texts in parallel columns and highlight the verbal similarities by positioning the words skillfully or using distinctive type or colors. They are available in Greek and in translation; some include John as well as the synoptics. Details of content and order can be checked by reference to their analytic index.

The Phenomena. It is convenient to take the shortest gospel (Mark) as the norm, and use words like "agree" and "omit" when making comparisons, but the question of relative priority must not be prejudged thereby.

Content. It has been calculated that of Mark's 661 verses all except 31 (six sections or pericopes) are paralleled—over 600 in Matthew and at least 350 in Luke. There are some 200 verses common to Matthew and Luke, but absent from Mark. These are commonly labelled "Q material," but some scholars restrict the symbol "Q" to the hypothetical source. "M" and "L" are used to denote material peculiar (or special) to Matthew and Luke.

Structure and order. Mark's structure is simple: *John the Baptist, Jesus' baptism and *temptation, his Galilean ministry, the journey to Judea, and the climax in *Jerusalem, culminating with the narrative of the passion and the discovery of the empty tomb.

Matthew and Luke share this framework, with some differences. Both preface their works with infancy narratives (but these are strikingly different) and conclude with appearances of the risen Christ (again, very different). Both have much non-Marcan material. Matthew inserts most of his Q and M material in five blocks of discourse at appropriate points, the most notable being the *Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5–7). Luke omits Mark 6.45–8.26 (his "great omission") and concentrates Q and L material into two sections (6.20–8.3; 9.51–18.14), dubbed his "lesser" and "greater interpolations." The latter begins at the point where Jesus sets out for Judea (Luke's route is different), and is called his "travel narrative."

Luke scarcely deviates from Mark's order in his closer parallels, though he makes omissions. But he has a number of remote parallels, remote both in context and in substance (4.16–30; 5.1–11; 11.17–23; 13.18–19; 22.24–30); this group plays a significant part in synoptic criticism. Luke's passion narrative raises special problems: much of it resembles Mark, much differs strikingly.

Matthew follows Mark's order from Mark 6.14 onward, but his earlier chapters contain an almost unbroken sequence of miracle stories (8.1–9.34), some of which occur elsewhere in Mark.

Mark's order is always supported by at least one of the others; that is, Matthew and Luke never agree against Mark with respect to the order of the pericopes. To this there are only tiny exceptions.

The order of the Q material is harder to define; much of it comes in different places in Matthew and Luke. Nevertheless, of 23 pericopes some 13 come in the same relative order. For the first two of these (John's preaching and Jesus' temptations), the Marcan framework supplies a fixed place. But after that, Matthew and Luke never again coincide in choosing the same Marcan context for the same piece of Q material. Any Q order is thus distinguishable from the Marcan order.

Wording. Select list of representative passages:

	MATTHEW	MARK	LUKE
I.	———	1.23–26	4.33–35
	9.6	2.10	5.24
	16.24–28	8.34–9.1	9.23–27
	21.12–13	11.15–17	19.45–46
II.	17.1–8	9.2–8	9.28–36
	28.1–8	16.1–8	24.1–9
III.	16.13–15	8.27–29	9.18–20
	22.23	12.8	20.27
IV.	11.2–22	———	7.18–35;10.13–15, 21–22
V.	10.34–36	———	12.51–53
	22.2–14	———	14.6–24

Verbal similarity varies greatly: from near identity in groups I and IV to a low degree in II and V. It is in group IV, that is, non-Marcan passages, that the highest degree of sustained identity occurs. We have, then, the paradox (aptly named "the Marcan cross-factor") that, whereas the presence of a passage in Mark makes agreement in order more likely, identity of wording is most striking in some Q passages, that is, passages absent from Mark.

In Marcan passages, wording tends to follow the same pattern as order: it is exceptional to find Matthew and Luke in agreement against Mark. But there are exceptions, dubbed "the minor agreements," a label that must not be allowed to disguise their importance and extent. Very different are Luke's remote parallels; they provide the major agreements with Matthew, which heavily outweigh Luke's agreement with Mark.

The examples in groups I and IV put it beyond reasonable doubt that the Gospels have some close literary connection, and those in III put it beyond any doubt whatever that the connection is in Greek, since the identity extends to the Greek syntax and sentence structure. Only here does Mark use the accusative and infinitive construction for indirect statement—a construction used in these passages by all three Gospels. Notice especially that Mark 8.28 and Luke 9.19 both switch to the alternative construction, with the conjunction "that" at precisely the same point.

Leading Hypotheses. Independent knowledge of a common tradition and independent translation from Hebrew or Aramaic originals have doubtless contributed to the synoptic Gospels. But neither will suffice as a hypothesis to account for the close similarities. Equally inadequate is the hypothesis supported at one time that all the synoptics draw on a single basic gospel; this fails to account for the Marcan cross-factor.

Leaving aside more complicated reconstructions, we may pick out three hypotheses that have had wide support and do justice to many of the phenomena. For the first two the earliest gospel is Matthew, for the third it is Mark.

The hypothesis of Augustine (AH) put the gospels in their canonical order; Mark is an abbreviation of Matthew, and Luke writes with knowledge of both. AH has had backing from ecclesiastical authority; in modern times it has been powerfully advocated by, for example, B. C. Butler and, more recently, by John Wenham. A modified form of it assigns priority to an Aramaic Matthew, used by Mark, but allows that Mark influenced our Greek Matthew. The arguments about relative priority are summarized below. But even if the direct arguments for Marcan priority are dismissed, AH has difficulty with the Marcan cross-factor.

The hypothesis of J. J. Griesbach (1789) (GH) was accepted in the nineteenth century and revived in modern times by William R. Farmer, Bernard Orchard, and others: the order is Matthew, Luke, Mark; Mark, the latest, utilizes both Matthew and Luke, sometimes preferring one and sometimes the other. Arguments for and against GH are summarized below.

The Two-Document hypothesis (TDH), widely accepted by modern scholars, holds that the two documents, namely Mark and Q, were utilized independently by Matthew and Luke. B. H. Streeter gave classical expression to it in English (1924), along with some refinements, especially that L and Q had already been combined in Proto-Luke before the Marcan material was added; a full discussion would require detailed examination of the passion narratives. Other variants of TDH are that one document was an earlier edition of Mark ("Ur-Markus") and that the Q material comes from more than one document.

Leading Arguments. The only second-century statements about the Gospels early enough to have any weight are the traditions transmitted through Papias (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 3.39): that Matthew "composed the oracles in Hebrew," and that Mark reproduced the firsthand testimony of Peter. This evidence is obscure (what are "the oracles"?—one speculation among many is that the original reference might be to Q) and also ambivalent. Argument must therefore rest on the internal evidence of the Gospels.

The main arguments for Marcan priority. The priority of Mark, advocated since the eighteenth century, came to be hailed as the one assured result of criticism. That claim was excessive, but though challenged it has retained majority support.

Content. Mark is the shortest gospel, and omits much striking teaching; if the author had been drawing on Matthew and Luke, would he have omitted Matthew's Sermon (chaps. 5–7), and Luke's most famous parables?

Vividness. Mark is rich in circumstantial detail, and has a vividness compatible with eyewitness testimony (e.g., 2.2–4; 4.35–8). Matthew is less vivid; although his accounts sometimes include extra points of substance, these often look like insertions of alien material (e.g., 15.12–14; 16.17–19).

Wording. When variations in language are examined, it is usually easy to suggest why Matthew or Luke might want to alter Mark: to improve the Greek, to eliminate criticism of disciples (Mark 10.35) or apparent disrespect toward Jesus (4.38; 10.18), to simplify or clarify (8.21; 9.12–13). Sometimes a distortion or improbability is introduced (Matthew 9.18; Luke 8.51); and sometimes—a weighty argument—Matthew retains a Marcan phrase incompatible with a change he has made, and thus betrays knowledge of Mark (Matt. 14.9; cf. 14.5).

General character. These arguments have considerable force, for example, from Christology, Matthew's apologetic and ecclesiastical interests, and Luke's literary quality. But not every passage points the same way; discussion would be lengthy and inconclusive.

Order. These arguments are both controversial and important. Because Mark's order is always supported by at least one of the others, many have argued that Mark's priority is immediately proved. But that is not so: the same formal relationships could result if Mark were the middle or last of the three. But the argument gains weight when combined with the Marcan cross-factor: why should Luke (according to AH) sometimes follow Matthew's wording slavishly but not his order, and at other times his order but not his wording? Or why should Mark (according to GH) omit just those verses where Matthew and Luke are almost identical (see especially Matt. 12.27–28, 30)?

The case for Q. The simplest explanation of similarities in so-called Q material is direct use of Matthew by Luke, or vice versa. But to this there are two series of objections, and these ipso facto constitute arguments for the alternative explanation, a common source (or sources) used independently by both—in other words, the case for Q.

If Matthew is Luke's source, there seems to be no commonsense explanation for his order and procedure. True, it is possible to suggest interesting and subtle—perhaps overly subtle—reasons why he might rearrange material to bring out his distinctive themes. But the question remains, why should he do so for only part of the time, or adhere most closely to wording when he is showing least respect for order?

If Luke were Matthew's source, this difficulty would be less acute, for Matthew seems in any case to conflate and rearrange his material. Advocates of Lucan priority have been few, though, and space forbids further discussion. The second objection would still hold.

If one gospel were the source for the other, the older gospel would presumably be closer to the original wording, though arguments on relative originality are often disputed. Matthew's wording is often conceded to be the older; but there are a number of sayings where the verdict is commonly given in favor of Luke (e.g., 6.20; cf. Matt. 5.9)—and it must surely be Luke who gives the original setting for the parable of the lost sheep (15.2; cf. Matt. 18.10–14). Q accounts for these phenomena perfectly. True, it is hypothetical; but, in any case, Luke 1.1 is evidence that written documents now lost once existed.

It should be noted that acceptance of Q does not rule out the further possibility that one evangelist may have known, and made some use of, the other gospel.

Counterarguments. First, Matthew seems to have been the best-known gospel. Second, Matthew has a conspicuously Jewish and conservative character (see 5.17–20), in contrast with Mark's hints that the *Law is no longer binding (e.g., 7.19, 27). Third, Mark sometimes is clearly abbreviating a fuller version (e.g., 1.8, 12–13). This may be in Q; it undoubtedly is in Matthew.

Above all, there are the minor agreements of Matthew and Luke against Mark in passages where no appeal to Q can legitimately be made. Many can be explained away as obvious grammatical improvements, others as the result of textual corruptions. But some contain points of substance (not always in identical wording, e.g., Matt. 14.17; Luke 9.13), and these are too numerous to be lightly dismissed, especially if account is taken of negative agreements (i.e., agreements in omitting some Marcan words) and agreements in word order (see also below).

The Griesbach hypothesis. According to GH, the minor agreements of Matthew and Luke, and the more frequent agreements of Mark with one or the other, are easily explained as the result of Mark's editorial activity.

In some passages, Mark (e.g., 1.32) may be conflating Matthew and Luke; but there are none that demand this explanation.

The fact that either Matthew or Luke always supports Mark's order can be construed as a strong argument for GH, since according to TDH there should be a statistical expectation that both of them, if acting independently, would sometimes coincidentally make a change at the same point. The statistics that result from a study of some 32 pericopes in Mark 1.16–6.44 are striking, particularly if it is assumed, per TDH, that the changes made by Matthew and Luke were random. But that would be unwarranted: Matthew's changes of order are a single operation, and create his sequence of miracle stories. Furthermore, Matthew and Luke do occasionally coincide in making the same omission.

Against GH stand all the arguments given above for Marcan priority, including the strange procedure implied for Mark in, for example, 3.23–30. In addition, though, it faces extreme difficulty in supplying a credible reason why anyone, given Matthew and Luke, ever wrote Mark.

Concluding Comments. AH, GH, and TDH all meet the conditions that there must be a literary connection between the Greek texts, and that Mark has a position in the middle: chronologically (AH), or a pendant from Matthew and Luke (GH), or a peg from which both hang (TDH). Both AH and GH have difficulty in meeting the strong arguments for Marcan priority, which remain strong even if Q stands under question.

TDH is more satisfactory. Q is hypothetical and might be one source or many; though embarrassing, this is not a fatal objection. The chief difficulty comes from the minor agreements, only partially met by appeal to linguistic improvements and textual corrections. Some further explanation seems necessary, and can be only be speculative—an alternative parallel tradition, or even secondary knowledge and use of, say, Matthew by Luke. The once-popular "Ur-Markus" theory unfortunately fails to account for the fact that Matthew's and Luke's changes are often improvements.

If none of this is acceptable, the remaining possibility is that a plurality of documents were used and combined in successive stages. Such theses are complicated and speculative, hard either to establish or to disprove. The synoptic "problem" therefore remains. G. M. STYLER

Syria (Map 6:G4). Syria is a geographical area bounded by the *Euphrates River on the east, Palestine on the south, and the Mediterranean Sea on the west. It has been assumed that the name Syria derived from Tyre, which was the port of entry for Romans, Greeks, and others who explored or expanded eastward. Syria's major centers were *Damascus, *Antioch on the Orontes, and the region of the two rivers, the Tigris and the Euphrates.

In the Hebrew Bible, *David extends his kingdom up to Damascus in Syria (2 Sam. 8.6; 1 Chron. 18.6). Syria, generally called *Aram, is clearly a foreign country, but close enough to go in and out of, know quite a lot about, and seriously compete with, both religiously and economically. Syrian gods are criticized (Judg. 10.6; Isa. 7.1), and there are wars with numerous Syrian kings and cities.

The region was captured by *Tiglath-pileser III in the eighth century BCE, conquered by *Alexander the Great, and later became a center for the Seleucid dynasty that ultimately provoked the Maccabean revolt in Palestine in 165 BCE. Roman writers could frequently lump Palestine and Syria together without distinction under the name Coele-Syria. Pompey and leaders after him, including *Herod the Great, used Damascus as a center for military and bureaucratic expansion. It was from Damascus that Pompey launched his pacification of Palestine in 66 BCE in the wake of the Hasmonean civil war. Both cities were among the leading cultural, religious, and economic centers of the entire Roman empire.

Syria is rarely mentioned by name in the New Testament. On several occasions, Syria is referred to as proof that Jesus' fame is spreading (e.g., Matt. 4.24); in Acts, Syria is mentioned in the context of the spread of Christianity.

There were numerous and sizable Jewish communities in Syria. The Jews of Antioch are singled out by *Josephus as a vibrant community who were constantly attracting *gentiles to their religious ceremonies (War 7.3.43–45). In the fourth century CE, the sermons delivered by John Chrysostom against the Jews make it clear that the Jewish community in Antioch was still large, popular, and a threat to Christians like Chrysostom.

Similarly Syria and its larger cities became centers for early Christianity. The early second-century writer Ignatius of Antioch emerged as an important figure in the early church, as did Chrysostom, and many early Christian texts, including some of the Gospels, have been associated with Syria.

Syria in history and today remains an intriguing if enigmatic country and culture, which represents and joins city and village, east and west, Jew, Christian, and Muslim. It has played a pivotal role in the development and definition of Jewish and Christian belief and identity.

J. ANDREW OVERMAN

T

Tabernacle. The portable sanctuary constructed by *Moses at *Sinai and primarily associated with the people's wilderness wandering. Various expressions are used in referring to this sanctuary—"tent," "tent of meeting," "tabernacle," "tabernacle of the testimony [NRSV: covenant]." Conceived as a movable shrine, the tabernacle was constructed so that it could be assembled, dismantled, and reassembled as the people moved from one place to another.

The account of the construction of the tabernacle is found in the book of *Exodus: in chaps. 25–31, God provides instructions to Moses for its construction, and chaps. 35–40 report how these were carried out. Included in these texts are directions for the construction of the cultic furniture used in conjunction with the tabernacle. These include the *ark (25.10–22; 37.1–9), table of *showbread (25.23–30; 37.10–16), the lampstand or *menorah (25.31–40; 37.17–24), the altar of burnt offering (27.1–8; 38.1–7), the altar of *incense (30.1–10; 37.1–10), and the bronze basin (30.17–21; 38.8. In addition, directions are given for preparing priestly garments (28.1–43; 39.1–31), for ordaining *Aaron and his sons as *priests (29.1–46; see Lev. 8), for collecting the sanctuary tax (30.11–16), for mixing the anointing oil and incense (30.22–38; 37.29), and for other matters associated with the ritual of the tabernacle.

The tabernacle and its furnishings were made of materials and with labor contributed voluntarily by members of the community (25.2–7; 35.4–36.7) under the supervision of Bezalel of the tribe of Judah and Oholiab of the tribe of Dan (31.1–11; 35.30–36.1). The tabernacle complex was rectangular in shape, measuring 100 by 50 cubits (27.9–18). The exact dimensions expressed in modern equivalents are uncertain, since the length of the ancient cubit (the distance from the point of the elbow to the end of the middle finger) remains in doubt; estimates range from 45 to 52 cm (17.5 to 20.4 in). The approximate dimensions of the sanctuary were 32 by 23 m (105 by 75 ft). The complex was oriented so that the short sides faced east and west with a 20-cubit entrance on the east protected by the embroidered screen (26.36–37; 27.16).

The tabernacle was divided into three distinct zones of increasing *holiness: the courtyard, the holy place, and the holy of holies. The courtyard was divisible into two 50-cubit squares. The eastern square contained the *altar of burnt offering where *sacrifices and offerings were burned (5 × 5 × 3 cubits), located at its center, and the basin, to the west of the altar, which held water for the priests to wash their hands and feet before officiating. The western square contained the tent of meeting or tabernacle proper. This was a separate enclosure measuring 30 × 30 × 10 cubits subdivided into the holy place (20 × 10 × 10 cubits) and the holy of holies (10 × 10 × 10 cubits).

Located within the holy place were the table of showbread (2 × 1 × 1.5 cubits) situated on the north side; the menorah on the south side, and the altar of incense or holden altar (1 × 1 × 2 cubits) located between the table and lampstand immediately in front of the veil to the holy of holies. Every *Sabbath twelve freshly baked loaves were placed on the table, arranged in two rows (Lev. 24.5–9; Exod. 25.30). The lamps on the menorah were lit each evening by the high priest and allowed to burn all night (Lev. 24.1–4). Every morning and evening, at the time when the lamps of the menorah were tended, the high priest burned incense on the golden altar (Exod. 30.7–9).

The holy of holies, separated from the holy place by an embroidered curtain (Exod. 26.31–33), housed only the ark (2.5 × 1.5 × 1.5 cubits) containing the "testimony" (25.21; 40.20), assumed to be the tablets of the *Law. A special lid or "mercy seat" covered the top of the ark and was ornamented with two *cherubim whose outspread wings overarched the cover and touched one another (25.17–20; 26.34; 37.6–9). The covering of the ark was the place where God promised to meet and communicate with the representative of the community (25.22). Only the high priest was to enter the holy of holies (30.10; Lev. 16.2, 29–34).

The entire courtyard of the enclosure with its perimeter of 300 cubits, with the exception of the entryway, was surrounded by hangings of twisted linen, 5 cubits high, hung on upright posts placed at intervals of 5 cubits (Exod. 27.9–19). The inner rectangle, the tabernacle proper, was enclosed, except on the eastern end, by forty-eight wooden frames (Exod. 26.15–29; 36.20–34). The assembled frames were overlaid first by a covering of sheets of linen (26.1–6) and then by a covering of goats' hair curtains (26.7–13), which was overlaid by a covering of tanned ram skins (26.14).

Gradations of holiness are reflected in the layout, building materials, and use of the tabernacle enclosure. The less holy area, the outer courtyard, was open to the laity, and the metal associated with its construction was bronze. Only priests and *Levites were admitted to the holy place in which the items were overlaid with gold (except for the menorah, which was of pure gold). The contents of the holy of holies were gold plated outside and inside (the ark) or else were of pure gold (the mercy seat). The sacredness of the entire precinct is evident from the command that the priests and Levites should camp between the tabernacle and the tents of the tribes on their journeys in the wilderness (Num. 1.53; 2.1–34).

The tabernacle was the place where God was present among his people (Exod. 25.8), where he met with them and communicated with them (25.22; 29.43–46). The symmetry and wholeness of the tabernacle (see 26.6, 11; 36.13, 18) were reflective of the unity and perfection of God and of the divine relationship to *creation. Note the association of the construction of the tabernacle with the Sabbath (31.12–17; 35.1–3) and the presence of six formulas of divine address to Moses dividing the material into six units (25.1; 30.11, 17, 22, 34; 31.1), thus paralleling the six days in the account of creation in Genesis 1.1–2.3.

Questions have been raised about whether an edifice as elaborate as the tabernacle existed in the *wilderness. Scholars have pointed to a number of difficulties. Could the Israelites, newly out of slavery in Egypt, have possessed the necessary artistic skills to produce such a structure when later Solomon had to hire the *Phoenicians to build the Jerusalem *Temple (1 Kings 5.1–6)? Would they have had sufficient precious metals, gems, and fabrics to make the cultic furniture and priestly garments? (Estimates indicate the need for at least 1,000 kg [1 ton] of gold, 3,000 kg [3 tons] of silver, and 2,500 kg [2.5 tons] of bronze.) Could such a massive and heavy structure have been dismantled and reassembled with any practicability? Why is there no mention of carrying the tabernacle across the *Jordan in the account of the entry into the *Promised Land (Josh. 3) and such infrequent reference to the structure in the narratives after the entry (see Josh. 18.1; 1 Sam. 2.22; 1 Kings 8.4; 2 Chron. 1.3)? How is the tabernacle, situated in the center of the tribal camp and guarded by thousands of Levites, related to the wilderness tent that was pitched outside the camp, guarded by a single individual, and used to communicate with the deity (Exod. 33.7–11)? Such questions have led to the theory that the tabernacle was an idealized version of the Jerusalem Temple projected back into the wilderness and that the portable shrine was much simpler.

In support of the historicity of the tabernacle or at least some modified version of it, scholars have pointed to the use of portable shrines among other cultures, especially Arab Bedouin cultures, to the fact that Egyptian armies camped encircling the sacred tent and artifacts associated with the Pharaoh, and to the "despoiling of the Egyptians" as a source of the wealth required for the tabernacle (see Gen. 15.13–14; Exod. 11.2; 12.35–36; Ps. 105.37).

See also Hebrews, The Letter to the.

JOHN H. HAYES

Talmud. The Talmuds are systematic commentaries on the *Mishnah, the law code of Judaism formulated in the late second century CE. Two Talmuds developed, one in the land of Israel ca. 400 CE, the other in Babylonia, between ca. 500 and 600 CE. The Palestinian Talmud comments on the divisions of the Mishnah that concern Agriculture, Appointed Times, Women (family law and personal status), and Damages, but it ignored Holy Things. The Babylonian Talmud covers Appointed Times, Women, Damges, and Holy Things (Temple Law) but omits reference to Agriculture. Neither Talmud deals with Purities, excluding the tractate Niddah, on the woman's menstrual period. The first Talmud stresses Mishnah exegesis, with 90 percent of its volume devoted to that task. The second Talmud is not continuous with the first, although it does follow a shared program of exegesis of the Mishnah. In addition to Mishnah exegesis, the Babylonian Talmud devotes substantial attention to the explanation of blocks of biblical materials. In Mishnah exegesis both Talmuds take up words and phrases, the biblical sources of the Mishnah's laws, contradictions in cases and rules that require harmonizations, and similar problems. They engage in speculation on principles behind case laws of the Mishnah and bring into harmony diverse cases that present contradictions in the application of those unifying principles. The Babylonian Talmud differs from the Palestinian in one important respect. In the Palestinian Talmud the fundamental editorial structure derives solely from the Mishnah, but in the Babylonian Talmud, not only the Mishnah but also long passages of scripture serve to organize and unify discourse.

The Talmuds fill vast gaps in the Mishnah's discourse. They account for the authority of the Mishnah by systematically linking its rules and laws to scripture. The need to explain the standing and origin of the Mishnah led sages to posit, first, that God's revelation of the *Torah at *Sinai encompassed the Mishnah as much as scripture, and second, that the Mishnah was handed on through oral formulation and oral transmission from Sinai to the framers of the document as we have it. Consequently, the two Talmuds, along with a variety of other books of exegesis of the Mishnah and of scripture, came to be called the oral Torah. The twin explanations for the status of the Mishnah first surfaced in the Palestinian Talmud, which contains clear allusions to the dual Torah, one part in writing, the other, oral, and now in the Mishnah.

The two Talmuds make use of further documents that fall into the classification of (oral) Torah. They cite and regularly explain the Tosefta, a collection of supplements to the laws of the Mishnah. The Tosefta presents materials of three types: citation and gloss of a passage of the Mishnah; amplification of a Mishnah passage not cited verbatim; and a small amount of material essentially unrelated to the Mishnah. The Talmuds further know commentaries to the written Torah by sages of the time, such as Sifra to Leviticus, Sifre to Numbers, another Sifre, this one to Deuteronomy, Genesis Rabbah, Leviticus Rabbah, and the like. All of these other documents, but especially the Mishnah and its two great Talmuds, contain the teachings of the sages of late antiquity, from the first through the sixth centuries CE. The final statement of the whole is in the Talmud of Babylonia, the encyclopedia of Judaism that from the sixth century CE to the present has provided the focus for authoritative opinion. JACOB NEUSNER Tammuz. Tammuz corresponds to the *Sumerian deity Dumuzi, who figures prominently in myths, sacred marriage texts, and laments. Largely a tragic figure, he is the lover of the goddess Inanna who consigned him to the netherworld. The presence of two kings named Dumuzi in the Sumerian King List, one before the flood and one after, suggests that there may have been a historical person with that name.

Much of the early scholarly attention concerning Tammuz focused on James G. Frazier's interpretation (The Golden Bough), in which Tammuz was connected to the motif of the dying god. In this understanding, now largely abandoned, the death and resurrection of the god corresponds to the seasonal cycle with its alternation of decay and revival of plant life.

In the single biblical occurrence of Tammuz (Ezek. 8.14), the prophet sees women at the Temple court weeping for Tammuz. The ample first-millennium BCE cuneiform documentation pertaining to mourning rites for Dumuzi provides a suitable backdrop for the passage in Ezekiel.

In Judaism, the fourth month of the year (June/July) is called Tammuz.

JAMES H. PLATT

Targums. See Translations, article on Targums.

Taxation. See Tribute and Taxation.

Tax Collectors. See Publicans.

Temple. A building or place symbolizing the presence of a deity or deities, intended for the purpose of worship. In the Bible, "temple" usually refers to the Temple erected by *Solomon or the Temple of *Zerubbabel that was enlarged and refurbished by *Herod.

Terminology. Hebrew hêkāl comes from Akkadian ekallu, which in turn is derived from *Sumerian É.GAL, "great house." The term is generic, and can apply to the house of a god (a temple) or to the house of a king (a palace). It is used of Ahab's palace (1 Kings 21.1) and that of the king of Babylon (2 Kings 20.18). As Israel's king, Yahweh dwelt in a palace, seated on a throne (Isa. 6.1). The word is also used of the house of Yahweh at Shiloh (1 Sam. 1.9; 3.3); of Solomon's Temple (2 Chron. 3.17); of the Second Temple, built by Zerubbabel (Zech. 8.9); of the Temple of Ezekiel's vision (Ezek. 40–48); and of God's heavenly dwelling place (Ps. 11.4).

Hebrew bayit, "house," by itself, is used very often of the Temple, or in combination, "house of God" (1 Chron. 9.11), and especially "house of Yahweh" (1 Kings 6–8). This word was also used of the tent of worship (Judg. 18.31), of a local shrine (1 Chron. 9.23), and of temples of other gods (Judg. 9.4; 1 Sam. 5.5). The term "house," referring to the Temple at Jerusalem, is a broader term, including the nave (strictly speaking, the hêkāl) and the inner sanctuary (the holy of holies). The Temple mount is known as "the mountain of the Lord's house" (Isa. 2.2) or even "the mountain of the house" (Jer. 26.18; Mic. 3.12).

Greek hieron, "sanctuary, temple," in the New Testament is used once of the temple of Artemis (Acts 19.27), but otherwise of the Temple at Jerusalem. The term includes the whole Temple complex. Unfortunately, both this and the next term (naos) are translated "temple," which leads to confusion. Jesus, who was not a priest, could not enter the "temple" (naos), nor could the money changers (Matt. 21.12), nor could Paul (Acts 21.26). The word used in each instance is hieron, which might be more accurately translated "temple mount."

Greek naos, "temple," is used in the New Testament of Herod's Temple, that is, the sanctuary itself and not the entire Temple area (Matt. 27.51; Luke 1.21; John 2.20), and of the heavenly sanctuary (Rev. 11.19; 14.17; but there is no temple in the New Jerusalem, for the Lord God himself is the temple, Rev. 21.22). The word is also used of sanctuaries of other gods (Acts 17.24; 19.24, translated "shrines"; hieron is used in 19.27). Used figuratively, naos refers to the human body (John 2.21; 1 Cor. 3.16–17; 6.19) and to the church (Eph. 2.21).

Greek oikos, "house" (referring to the Temple), except for Luke 11.51 and Hebrews 10.21, occurs only in quotations in the New Testament of passages in the Hebrew Bible where bayit is used.

Solomon's Temple. The *tabernacle had served as the center of worship from the time of *Moses to *David (2 Sam. 6.17; 7.6). David wanted to build a more permanent structure, but the Lord forbade it (1 Chron. 22.7–8). David set about collecting materials and making plans for the building to be built by his son, Solomon (2 Sam. 7.13; 1 Chron. 22.2–5; 28.11–19).

The Temple was located on the eastern hill, north of the city of David, where the Dome of the Rock is located today. (See Jerusalem; Map 9.) At that time the Temple mount was considerably smaller, Solomon having enlarged it somewhat (Josephus, War, 5.5.185) and Herod having enlarged it still more to the present size of the platform known as Haram esh-Sharif. This is "the threshing floor of Araunah the Jebusite" (2 Sam. 24.18), "Mount Moriah" (2 Chron. 3.1), and probably the *Zion of the Psalms and the prophets (Pss. 110.2; 128.5; 134.3; Isa. 2.3; Joel 3.16 [MT 4.16]; Amos 1.2; Zech. 8.3) although the term belonged to the city of David (1 Kings 8.1).

The general plan of the Temple was similar to that given for the tabernacle: rectangular, with a porch or vestibule ('ûlām, 1 Kings 6.3) facing east, a nave (hêkāl), and an inner sanctuary (dĕbîr, 6.5) or holy of holies (8.6). The dimensions were double those of the tabernacle: 60 cubits by 20 (1 cubit = 0.5 m [19.7 in]), but triple its height (30 cubits). The building was of hewn stone, dressed at the quarry (1 Kings 6.7). The porch was 10 cubits deep (1 Kings 6.3) and 120 cubits high (2 Chron. 3.4)—a numeral that may have suffered textual corruption. Two columns, Jachin and Boaz, made of hollow bronze, 35 or 40 cubits high, stood at each side of the entrance (2 Chron. 3.15–17). The inner walls of the hêkāl were lined with cedar brought from *Lebanon (1 Kings 5.6–10; 6.15–16), and the entire structure was lined with gold (v. 22). The holy of holies was overlaid with "pure" gold (v. 20). The skilled work was done by Tyrian artisans supplied by King Hiram (5.1) and under the supervision of a person also named Hiram (7.13) or Huram-Abi (2 Chron. 2.13).

The holiest place contained the *ark of the covenant (1 Kings 6.19) and two winged figures (*cherubim) of olive wood overlaid with gold (v. 23) that stretched from wall to wall. Doors of olive wood, covered with gold, separated the holy of holies from the nave (v. 31), and similar doors separated the nave from the porch (v. 33). The nave contained the golden altar (7.48, to distinguish it from the bronze altar in the courtyard) made of cedar (6.20) or the "altar of incense" (1 Chron. 28.18), which stood before the holy of holies; the golden table for the bread of the Presence ("*showbread"); the golden lampstands and other items (1 Kings 6.48–50).

The building was surrounded by two courts, the inner one constructed of three courses of stone and one of cedar beams (v. 36; also called the court of the priests, 2 Chron. 4.9), and the great court (1 Kings 7.9), which probably also enclosed the royal buildings. The size of the inner court is not given, but if it was double the size of the court of the tabernacle, it would have been 200 by 100 cubits. The inner court contained the bronze altar (2 Chron. 4.1) where sacrifices were offered, the ten bronze basins on ten stands, five on each side of the house, and the great sea (the molten or bronze sea) on the southeast corner of the house. The bronze work was cast in the Jordan valley (1 Kings 7.46), the most impressive being the great sea, 10 cubits in diameter and 5 cubits high, with a capacity of 2,000 baths (approximately 40,000 liters [10,000 gal]). The water was used for supplying the lavers for washing the parts of the sacrificial victims and for the priests' ablutions (2 Chron. 4.6).

The First Temple, having been plundered several times, was finally destroyed by *Nebuchadrezzar in 587/586 BCE (2 Kings 25.8–17; Jer. 52.12–23).

Ezekiel's Temple. The Temple in Ezekiel 40–48 is presented as a vision, and so the details may be assumed to be symbolic rather than material. The plan in general follows closely that of Solomon's Temple, although it is markedly symmetrical. Some of the description is more detailed than that given in Kings or Chronicles, and such details as the plan and dimensions of the gates (Ezek. 40.6–16) have been indirectly confirmed by archaeological discoveries at *Gezer, *Hazor, and *Megiddo.

Zerubbabel's Temple. When the Jews returned from *exile (538 BCE) there was an effort to rebuild the Temple (2 Chron. 36.23; Ezra 1.1–4). The work was begun (Ezra 3) but languished until 520, when as a result of the encouragement of *Haggai and *Zechariah, it was resumed and the Temple was finished on the third day of Adar in the sixth year of *Darius (12 March 515; Ezra 6.15). It was comparable in size to Solomon's Temple (6.3) and probably also in its ground plan, with the holy of holies and the sanctuary with the golden altar, table lampstand, and other furnishings (1 Macc. 1.22; 4.48–51). It was surrounded by an inner court with the altar of burnt offering and an outer court. According to *Josephus, reporting Hecateus, the outer court was approximately 150 by 45 m (500 by 150 ft), and the altar of unhewn stones was 20 cubits square and 10 cubits in height (Ag. Ap. 1.198). According to the *Talmud (Yoma 21b), five things were missing from the Second Temple: the ark, the sacred fire, the shekinah, the holy spirit, and the *Urim and Thummim.

Herod's Temple. Herod did not tear down the Second Temple—that would surely have instigated a revolt, as Herod recognized (Josephus, Ant. 15.11.387). He rebuilt and refurbished it by preparing materials for parts, using priests as carpenters and masons in the sacred areas, and doing the work by sections. The building was made new without ever destroying the old and without interrupting the sacred offerings and sacrifices. Begun in Herod's twentieth year (20 BCE), it was finished in a year and a half (Ant. 15.11.420).

Work on the Temple platform may have begun in Herod's fifteenth year (Josephus, War 1.21.401), and it continued until ca. 64 CE (Ant. 20.9.219). The Kidron valley was partially filled, shifting its bed eastward; likewise the central (Tyropoeon) valley was partially filled, shifting it several hundred feet to the west. Using huge ashlars ("Herodian" stones, ca. 1 m [40 in] high, 1–3 m [3 to 10 ft] long [one measures 12 m (39 ft) in length!], and 4 m [13 ft] wide), the western, southern, and eastern walls were built, and the Temple mount was extended to a width of 280 m (915 ft) across the southern end, 310 m (1,017 ft) across the northern, and approximately 450 m (1,500 ft) north to south. At the southeastern corner, the wall rose 48 m (158 ft) above the Kidron valley. A stoa or portico was built along all four sides, with marble columns 25 cubits high, and ceiled with cedar panels; the royal stoa at the south had four rows of columns, the others had double rows of columns. The stoa along the eastern side was attributed by Josephus (Ant. 20.9.221) to Solomon (see John 10.23; Acts 3.11; 5.12).

The Temple itself (Map 9) was surrounded by a wall or balustrade, 3 cubits high, separating the holy place from the court of the gentiles. It was 322 cubits east to west by 135 cubits north to south, raised by 14 and 5 steps (all steps were 1/2 cubit). The holy place was not in the center of the Temple mount, but more to the north and west. On the surrounding wall were warnings, some in Greek, others in Latin, forbidding the entry of any gentile under penalty of death; two of these have been found. Ten cubits inside the balustrade a wall of 25 cubits high surrounded the sacred area, with seven gates: three each on the north and south sides, one on the east (Mid. 1.4).

Within this holy place, there were increasingly sacred areas: the court of the women at the east, the court of the Israelites (i.e., males only), the court of the priests, then the Temple (naos). This area was separated from the Women's Court, being 15 steps higher, and could be entered through the Nicanor Gate. The Temple was still higher by another 12 steps; it consisted of the porch (100 by 100 cubits, 11 cubits wide), the nave (40 by 20 cubits) containing the table of the Presence, the lampstand or *menorah (taken to Rome by Titus and portrayed on the Arch of Titus), and the altar of incense, and behind that the holy of holies (20 by 20 cubits), which was empty except for a sacred stone. Built into the wall around the Temple were rooms or chambers, increasing the size of the Temple by 70 to 100 cubits. To the east and south of the Temple was the altar, 32 cubits square, and north of the altar the place of slaughtering.

Only the priests could enter the Temple, and only the high priest could enter the holy of holies, and that only on the *Day of Atonement (m. Kelim 1.9; cf. Heb. 9.25). The priests were divided into twenty-four "courses," each course serving twice a year for a week (see Luke 1.8). A veil of Babylonian tapestry hung in the opening to the nave (War 5.5.212); a second veil separated the nave from the holy of holies (219). It would seem that it was the outer veil that was torn at the time of the death of Jesus (Mark 15.38), since the inner veil would not be seen by bystanders.

There were eight gates leading into the Temple mount: one on the north, four on the west, two on the south, and one on the east (Ant. 15.11.410); the Mishnah says five [Mid. 1.3], naming only one on the west). Along the western wall was the deep central valley, with a paved walk that continued around the southern end of the Temple. A great staircase led up to the triple Huldah gate, and next to the stairs was a structure containing a large number of immersion pools for ceremonial cleansing (Hebr. miqwā'ôt). The worshiper, after his or her purification, entered the right of the two double gates and passed through a tunnel leading upward into the Temple area. A second entrance could be made by a large staircase that led to the royal stoa ("Robinson's Arch" marks this entrance), but no purification was available here. Leading from the western hill to the Temple mount was a bridge ("Wilson's Arch" marks this). Details of the other entrances are not clear; they were possibly located where Barclay's and Warren's Gates are now. The Tadi Gate was in the northern wall; possibly the sacrificial animals were brought in by this entrance, since it was near the Sheep Pool and Market. The Susa gate in the eastern wall was used only by the high priest and priests in connection with the ceremony of burning the *red cow at a location on the Mount of *Olives from which the high priest could look directly into the entrance of the sanctuary.

Destruction of the Temple. There is a full account of the capture of Jerusalem in War 5–6, according to which Titus commissioned Josephus to urge the Jews to surrender in order to spare the Temple, but to no avail. The Antonia was razed to the ground in August 70 CE, and the continual sacrifice ceased to be offered. Josephus made a second appeal. Titus then decided to destroy the Temple. This occurred on the tenth day of the fifth month (Ab; according to Jewish tradition, the ninth of Ab), the same day on which the First Temple had been burned by the king of Babylon. Josephus portrays the Romans as trying to extinguish the fire that had been started by the insurgents. Widespread plundering, murder, and finally the burning of all structures on the Temple mount ended the history of the Temple.

WILLIAM SANFORD LASOR

Temptation. In biblical traditions, temptation is generally a test or trial to which the tempter subjects another person, often by confusing what is good with what is evil. Along with strength of will, the capacity to discern good is being tested, and the tester is usually the God of Israel or occasionally the adversary, *Satan. Less frequent is the understanding of temptation as the conscious desire of individuals to do what they know to be wrong, though this does occur (Gal. 6.1; James 1.14).

In the Hebrew Bible, the most famous example of God's setting a specific trial for an individual is the testing of Abraham (Gen. 22; see Aqedah). Another is God's permission to Satan to put *Job to the test (Job 1.6–12). In the New Testament, God is likewise the ultimate initiator of the temptation of Jesus (see next entry), for it is the Spirit that drove Jesus into the wilderness, where Satan's offers would serve as a maximum test of Jesus' discernment and courage (Mark 1.12–13; Matt. 4.1–11 par.). Similarly, God is pictured as setting tests for Jesus' followers (Luke 22.28; James 1.2; 1 Pet. 1.6).

The Bible also speaks of putting God to the test. Israel presumes that because God has delivered it from earlier crises, he will do so again (Exod 17.2–7; Num. 14.20–25; Deut. 6.16; Pss. 78.18; 95.9). Evildoers challenge God to punish them, but they escape unscathed (Mal. 3.15). The same language is used in the New Testament, where Jesus refuses to test God (Matt. 4.7; cf. 26.53); Christians may test him by their improper conduct (Acts 5.9; 15.10; 1 Cor. 10.9).

A larger role is assigned to Satan in the New Testament than in the Hebrew Bible. God uses Satan to tempt people; Satan uses them to tempt God. The afflictions believers suffered because of their faith were often understood as an opportunity for the tempter (Mark 4.14–17 par.; 1 Thess. 3.4–5). This provides a background for interpreting the climactic petitions designed by Jesus for his followers as they faced persecutions (Matt. 6.13). These petitions can be understood as asking, "Father . . . do not bring us to the time of trial by the Evil One, but rescue us from his power" (see Lord's Prayer). It was because Jesus had also been tempted that he was able to help those struggling against the same foe (Heb. 2.14–18; 4.15). PAUL S. MINEAR Temptation of Christ. Each of the *synoptic Gospels gives an account of the temptation of Christ (Matt.4.1–11; Mark 1.13; Luke 4.1–13), and all three place the temptation within the same sequence, following Jesus' *baptism by John, and preceding the first statement of Jesus' preaching of the *kingdom of God (Matt. 4.17; Mark 1.14–15; Luke 4.14–15, 43). Luke has interrupted the sequence with the insertion of Jesus' *genealogy (3.23–38), but the common themes of Spirit and Sonship together with the geographical reference establish the close connection between Luke's baptism story (3.2, 21–22) and his account of the temptation.

This agreement in sequence should not hide the fact that we have two very different types of narrative in *Mark, on the one hand, and in *Matthew and *Luke, on the other. Mark includes the temptation in a single sentence that is more a cryptogram than a narrative, while Matthew and Luke write of three scenes in which a minimum of action provides the setting for three verbal exchanges between *Jesus and *Satan, all of which center in quotations from Deuteronomy 6 and 8 (from the *Septuagint). The quotations are the climax of each scene so that the narrative as a whole resembles a midrash. The stories cannot be derived one from the other; they represent the literary result of two different traditions about Jesus' temptation, and efforts to interpret them should refrain from harmonizing one version with the other.

Both narratives combine topics that had grown through centuries of Israelite and early Jewish tradition. They had, therefore, become so rich in associations with traditional themes that the expositor is faced with a wide array of interpretive possibilities, and no single governing theme can do justice to them.

Mark includes the temptation in a single, terse statement (1.13): "He was in the wilderness forty days, tempted by Satan; and he was with the wild beasts; and the angels waited on him." There is no narrative or dialogue; no fasting is mentioned; but Jesus is placed in the presence of wild beasts, which goes beyond the record of Matthew and Luke. The forms of the four verbs are sufficiently ambiguous to leave unclear whether they comprise a sequence of episodes or are simultaneous aspects of one event. There are two major interpretations of Mark's cryptic sentence: Jesus as the second *Adam who restores *paradise, and Jesus as the protagonist in God's struggle against Satan. Both rely on Jewish adaptations of biblical themes.

According to the first, the temptation is only one motif alongside others, which renders it doubtful whether Mark 1.13 is exclusively a temptation story. The picture of a peaceful coexistence of humans with wild animals is a well-attested eschatological theme (e.g., Isa. 11.6–9; 65.25), and the idea of service of *angels to Adam and Eve in paradise is found in Jewish tradition (e.g., b. Sanh. 59b). According to the principle that the world to come would restore the conditions of the original creation, ideas about creation and about the end time became interchangeable. The introduction of the *wilderness and the temptation by Satan does not necessarily provide a discordant note to the image of paradise restored, because satanic temptation is an element of the story of Adam and Eve (Gen. 3; the identification of the serpent with Satan had already been made), and the wilderness is a place not only of horror and judgment but also of ultimate restoration. The coordination of three (or four?) equal motifs therefore provides a reading of Mark 1.13 that sees Jesus, in consequence of his declaration as God's Son in his baptism and prior to the beginning of his public activity, as the new Adam who triumphs over Satan (in contrast to the first Adam) and thereby inaugurates a promised new condition in which wild animals are no longer a threat and the angels render service.

The alternate understanding of Mark 1.13 relies more on a similarity to the accounts of the temptation in Matthew and Luke: the forty days are part of a *typology alluding to Israel's forty years in the desert (Deut. 8.2), the wilderness is the haunt of demons and terrifying animals, and the service of the angels is regarded (as in Matt. 4.11) as the resolution of the conflict after the devil's departure. This assumes that the motifs of the wild animals and the angels are subordinate to that of the wilderness, which represents the time and the place controlled by powers hostile to God. Mark 1.13 thus presents Christ as the protagonist of God's fight against satanic forces, who invades the stronghold of the enemy and thus overcomes him (see Mark 3.27).

Matthew and Luke differ in the order of the second and third temptations and in some details, but generally the content of their three temptation scenes is the same, so that a common tradition behind them (*Q?) must be assumed. Since the vocabulary in Luke, where he differs from Matthew, shows clear traces of Lucan style, and since Luke's sequence of the scenes can be explained by his tendency to emphasize the crucial role of Jerusalem, it is probable that Matthew preserves the more original order and wording. The following comments are therefore based on the Matthean order. Matthew's scenes shift from the wilderness to the *Temple and finally to a very high mountain, each culminating in Jesus's quoting Deuteronomy (8.3, 6.16, and 6.13, respectively, all close in content and position to the *Shema, whose first part contains Deut. 6.4–9).

Attempts have been made to understand the whole temptation story in Matthew as a logically constructed unit with one organizing idea. This has been variously described as: the demand of Deuteronomy 6.5 to love God with one's whole heart, soul, and might, so that the tripartite division of human faculties is explicated in the three episodes of Jesus' temptation, describing him as one who lives in total dedication to the one God of Israel; or the fullness of the messianic office, which combines a prophetic *messiah (*Moses in the wilderness, the prophet par excellence according to Deut. 18.18), a priestly messiah (the Temple as center of the priestly office), and a political messiah (world dominion offered on the mountain), each episode containing a strong antithesis to popular conceptions of these messianic offices; or a thoroughgoing Israel-typology that coordinates the climactic quotation in each scene of the temptation with an analogous situation in Israel's wilderness sojourn, patterned after the textual sequence in the Exodus story (Deut. 8.3 – Manna – Exod. 16; Deut. 6.16 – provocation of God at Massah – Exod. 17; Deut. 6.13 – promise of land, warning against idolatry – Exod. 23.20–33; 34.11–14), portraying Jesus as the true Israelite who did not yield to temptation precisely at the point of Israel's failure.

Each of these unifying interpretations draws on a wealth of pertinent evidence in Jewish tradition, but none is conclusive. A variety of complex motifs coalesce, forming a confessional narrative in which four intentions merge. First, the title *Son of God binds together baptism and temptation (3.17; 4.3, 6); the baptism of Jesus culminates in his being declared Son of God, the temptation describes the cost of this Sonship. Second, in the temptation narrative Jesus is presented as the authentic interpreter and doer of God's will in scripture. Third, the dominance of the title Son of God marks the temptation as a christologically and soteriologically oriented narrative. Finally, factually, and perhaps intentionally, the story implies a radical criticism of popular conceptions about the eschatological agent of God. The true Son of God does not abuse his status for self-preservation, he refrains from using his power for protection against death (cf. Matt. 26.53; 27.42–43), and he refuses to exercise world dominion in any form other than that bestowed on him by God in consequence of his death and resurrection (Matt. 28.18).

ULRICH W. MAUSER

Ten Commandments. Also called the Decalogue ("the ten words"; see Exod. 34.28), the Ten Commandments comprise a short list of religious and ethical demands laid by the Deity on the people of ancient Israel and are of continuing authority for the religious Jewish community and the Christian community. They appear in two places in the Bible (Exod. 20.1–17 and Deut. 5.6–21) and are alluded to or quoted in part in several places in the Hebrew Bible and in the New Testament.

The commandments prohibit the worship of any God other than Israel's God, held to be the true God of the other nations as well (see Monotheism). They rule out the making of images of the Deity in any plastic form (see Graven Image; Idols); the misuse of the divine Name and the power associated with it; and they require observance of the *Sabbath day and the honoring of one's parents (especially in view are the elderly parents of adults, not the parents of young children). They also prohibit *murder, *adultery, stealing, false testimony (not primarily the telling of untruths in general), and the coveting of the life and goods of others.

The enumeration of the commandments varies among the religious communities. Worshiping other Gods and making images of the Deity are placed together in a number of religious communities (Jewish, Roman Catholic, Lutheran), while Reformed and Orthodox Christian communities treat these as the first two commandments. For the Jewish community, the first commandment is "I am the LORD your God who brought you out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage," while the ninth and tenth commandments for Roman Catholic and Lutheran communions are the two prohibitions of coveting: the household (commandment 9) and the remainder of the list in Exod. 20.17 (commandment 10). The contents of the Ten Commandments are, however, the same for all of the religious communities, despite the differences in their enumeration. The differences between the contents of Exodus 20 and Deuteronomy 5 are quite small, reflecting changes over time in the way in which the commandments were understood and applied.

The commandments are of enormous value and influence—on the community of Israel, within the Christian community, and throughout the entire world today. The commandments fall into four groups. The first three, the commandments demanding the worship of God alone, against image-making, and against the use of God's name to do harm, are commandments stressing God's exclusive claim over the lives of the people. God will brook no rivalry; as Israel's savior, God demands a commitment that preserves the people from divided loyalties, protects them from supposing that anything in the whole of creation could adequately represent the Deity, the Creator of all, and also protects persons from the religious community's misuse of divine power to serve its own ends.

The next two commandments, calling for observing every seventh day as a day of rest and for honoring parents even when they might no longer be of significant economic value within the community, are special institutions for the protection of basic realities in society—human need for rest from labor as well as for labor and the preservation of human dignity against any kind of exploitation.

The next three commandments focus especially on the life of the individual or the family in the larger community. They insist on the sanctity of human life, the sanctity of marriage and of sexual life, and the necessity to maintain a community in which the extension of the self into one's property is recognized and respected.

The last two commandments are more social and public, calling for speaking the truth before the courts or the community's elders and for living a life not distorted or corrupted by the lust for other persons' goods or lives.

*Moses is identified as the great lawgiver in ancient Israel. The Ten Commandments are understood by the community to have been handed down from God through Moses. It is clear, however, that the legal materials of the Hebrew Bible have developed over centuries, reflected changes in religious understanding and practice, and incorporated those changed perspectives into the legal heritage assigned to Moses and to Moses' God.

The substance of the Ten Commandments probably does originate in the work and discernments of Moses. The unique understanding of idolatry reflected in the Ten Commandments, and the requirement that one day in seven be characterized by an absolute break with the other days—by cessation from normal pursuits for a full day—these are without precedent in the ancient Near Eastern world. Other commandments are not unique, but this tenfold collection of short, primarily negative, statements is unique. It stems from a person of extraordinary religious discernment—and Moses was such a person.

The Ten Commandments probably had a place in family life, as a means by which the young were introduced to the fundamental requirements of the covenant between God and people. They also had a place in public religious life and in the great festivals when the bond between people and God was regularly reaffirmed and confirmed (see Feasts and Festivals).

The Ten Commandments were of great value as summations of the demands of God, easily remembered by reference to the ten fingers of the hand. As negative statements, they helped shape the community's recognition of those kinds of conduct that simply ruined life in community and so could not be allowed. They were not intended to be legalistic in character or in effect; they were to ward off conduct from the community that could be its ruin. Positive law must develop in association with these pithy, negatively put demands. Rather than such "dos and don'ts" encouraging oppressive control of a society by its leaders, they are a summons to a life freed to enjoy existence in community.

See also Neighbor. WALTER HARRELSON

Teraphim. A cult object or objects, mentioned fifteen times in the Bible, generally translated "household god(s)." The word can be either singular (1 Sam 19.13, 16) or plural (Gen 31.32, 34; Zech 10.2) in meaning. A plausible etymology is from *Hittite tarpi(š), which means some sort of benevolent or malevolent spirit, perhaps analogous to the penates of Roman religion. On occasion they apparently have human shape and are apparently life-size (1 Sam. 19.13–16), though in Genesis 31 the teraphim are small enough so that Rachel can sit on them; they may have been statues or perhaps only masks. The function of the teraphim is also not entirely clear; often it seems to be divinatory (1 Sam. 15.23; Ezek. 21.21; Zech. 10.2; note the association with the *ephod in Judg. 17.5; 18.14–20; Hos. 3.4); but in Genesis 31 it has been suggested on the basis of Hurrian parallels from *Nuzi that they were the equivalent of deeds or legal title to property. In most contexts the use of teraphim is at least implicitly condemned, although it was apparently known from premonarchic times to at least the sixth century BCE.

See Magic and Divination.

MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Tetragrammaton. A Greek word meaning "four letters," used to designate the consonants of the divine name Yahweh. This *name of God is so sacred that Jews traditionally do not pronounce it but use a substitute, and the vowels of Adonai (ʾādōnāy), "my Lord," are written in the Hebrew Bible (with "e" as the first vowel instead of "a") with the four letters yhwh (whence "Jehovah"), though they are not pronounced with those consonants. (See Jehovah.)

Outside the Bible, yhwh is first found in the *Moabite Stone (ca. 830 BCE) and in inscriptions from Khirbet el-Qom and Kuntillet ʿAjrud (late ninth or early eighth century BCE). In the Bible, we also find the related form yāh, and the elements yĕhô-, yô-, -yāhû, and -yâ in personal names. Jews in Egypt in the fifth century BCE wrote yhw (yāhû) and yhh (yāhōh).

It is probable that the first part of yhwh was pronounced yah- (cf. the "a" vowel in related forms and in Greek transcriptions in Christian times), and the second -eh (cf. the assonance with ʾehyeh ["I AM" in the NRSV] in Exod. 3.14), hence yahweh. If yahweh is shortened by the omission of -eh, the natural result in Hebrew is yāhû, whereas the former cannot easily be derived from the latter. The name yahweh looks like the third-person singular of the verb hāwâ, a rare alternative to the usual hāyâ, "to be." The "a" vowel suggests the causative theme of the verb ("he causes" or "will cause to be"), but that theme is not used with this verb in the Bible. If, however, the name is archaic or of non-Israelite origin, then another meaning is possible, and some have sought a meaning found in Aramaic ("to fall" [cf. Job 37.6] as well as "to be") or in Arabic ("to fall, blow," etc.), but firm evidence is lacking.

Some have suggested a connection with the element ya in cuneiform personal names at *Ebla and in Mesopotamian texts, but this interpretation is disputed, and a connection with yw in a *Ugaritic name is also questionable. More plausible—though still uncertain—is a connection with yhw (perhaps yahweh) in Egyptian texts from ca. 1400–1200 BCE, which may be a place (the site of a shrine?) associated with pastoral nomads in or near the *Sinai peninsula. What is important, however, is not the origin of the name but the nature of the God who bore it in the Bible.

J. A. EMERTON

Tetrarch. A title originating in Greece, the only place where its literal meaning of "ruler of a fourth (part)" applied, and used throughout the Near East in the Hellenistic and Roman periods for subordinate rulers. In the *Roman empire a tetrarch was of lower rank than an ethnarch ("ruler of a people"), who in turn was lower than a king. According to *Josephus, *Herod the Great was first appointed tetrarch over Judea in 42 BCE by Mark Antony (Ant. 14.13.326) and shortly thereafter named king. On Herod's death, his sons Philip and Antipas were named tetrarchs over *Galilee and Perea, and Gaulanitis (the modern Golan), respectively (see Luke 3.1 and Map 13), while Archelaus was promised that his rank of ethnarch over Judea would be elevated to king if he proved worthy (War 2.6.93).

Both the New Testament and other ancient sources use these titles inconsistently; for example, Herod Antipas is called tetrarch in Matthew 14.1 but king in 14.9 and in the parallels in Mark 6. The NRSV uses "ethnarch" in 1 Maccabees (14.47; 15.1–2) but "governor" for the same term in 2 Corinthians 11.32, and it always translates "tetrarch" by the generic "ruler."

MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Textual Criticism. Because at times the word "criticism" can mean "finding fault with," it is important to note that when it is used here it means "evaluation," the analysis of something with the intent of determining its value. The wording of the *manuscripts of the Hebrew Bible and of the Greek New Testament varies here and there to a greater or lesser degree. It is necessary, therefore, to employ the criteria of textual criticism in order to evaluate the various readings so as to determine, if possible, the original author's text prior to the modifications that appear in extant manuscripts—for the original autographs were lost long ago. There are three classes of sources that scholars use in textual criticism of biblical texts: the Hebrew or Greek manuscripts; ancient *translations in other languages; and quotations made by rabbis and church fathers.

The first step in the determination of the original text involves a scrupulous comparison of all the witnesses (or, at least, the important witnesses) in these three classes of texts, and then producing a compilation of the differing readings. Such a compilation is known as a critical apparatus. At times this process sheds light on how and why a scribe introduced a textual variation. The majority of differing readings occurred because of unintentional error; in other instances, the text may have been intentionally altered. Accidental variations can result from one letter being mistaken for another; from the reversal of the sequence of two letters (metathesis); from exchanging letters and words that sound similar; from confusing two successive lines that begin with the same letters or words (homoeoarchton) or that end with the same letters or words (homoeoteleuton), by allowing the eye to skip from the first to the second line (parablepsis), thus omitting the intermediate text (haplography); and from the eye accidently processing the same word or groups of words twice so that the scribe writes for a second time a text that was meant to be read only once (dittography).

Oddly enough, scribes who thought about the text were more likely to make emendations than those who simply wanted to produce an accurate copy. Deliberate changes include correcting spelling and grammar; conforming a reading to a parallel passage; expanding or polishing the text by adding a familiar word or phrase where one seemed to be called for; combining similar phrases; clarifying historical and geographical problems; substituting synonymous words or expressions; and modifying or deleting expressions considered objectionable by the scribe.

The textual critic's fundamental considerations when assessing variant readings involve both external and internal evidence. External evidence relates to the date of the witnesses, the geographical distribution of the witnesses that agree, and the family relationship (if determinable) of manuscripts and groups of witnesses. Internal evidence is concerned with transcriptional probabilities, which require analysis of paleographical details and the scribe's habits, and intrinsic probabilities, which necessitate examination of the author's style and vocabulary throughout the book.

The differing conclusions of textual critics can usually be traced to one's judgment as to which criteria are deemed most significant. For example, for the Hebrew Bible most scholars use the *Masoretic text as a point of departure for textual criticism because it is a complete, established text that was scrupulously transcribed. In some cases, however, readings in the *Qumran Hebrew manuscripts are considered superior to the Masoretic text by virtue of their agreement with ancient translations. The Qumran manuscripts, however, are not complete, and some were negligently copied.

As a general rule, the more difficult reading is usually to be preferred, as is also the less smooth or unassimilated reading—since in both instances scribes resisted the urge to produce a more polished, harmonious text. The shorter reading is also favored by the majority of textual scholars (unless specific omissions can be traced to homoeoteleuton, or unless the shorter reading does not conform to the character, style, or scope of the author), since scribes tended to supplement the text with explanations or material from parallel passages rather than to abridge it. Simply stated, the reading that best explains the origin of the other readings should be preferred as the original. BRUCE M. METZGER Theology. See Biblical Theology.

Theophany. A deity's physical manifestation that is seen by human beings. The appearance of gods and their involvement with humans are common motifs in ancient Near Eastern and classical mythology. That similar phenomena are found in the Bible seems problematic at first, for a persistent tradition in the Hebrew Bible affirmed that death comes to any human who sees God (Gen. 16.13; 32.30; 24.10–11; 33.20; Deut. 5.24–26; 18.16; Judg. 6.22–23; 13.22; cf. Exod. 20.19; Isa. 6.5). In most of these contexts, however, the narration undermines this sentiment by depicting the pleasant surprise of those who survive. The text presents this perspective as a misperception to which human beings subscribe, for no humans in the Bible ever die simply because they have seen God. On the contrary, throughout the Bible God wants to communicate intimately with humans. The problem of how God can adequately show himself to humankind without harm is a conundrum that is never really resolved in the Bible.

The ease and frequency with which God visits and talks with humans in the early biblical narratives underscore how comfortable ancient Israelites were in depicting God's confrontation with humanity. Such theophanies are unspectacular, for God appears in form as an undistinguished human being (Gen. 18.1–2) who walks (Gen. 3.8) and stands (1 Sam. 3.10). Humans speak freely of seeing God's face (Gen. 33.10; Pss. 11.7; 17.15), and it is possible that the phrase used to describe a pilgrimage to the Temple ("to appear in the presence of Yahweh") has been modified by later tradition from an original vocalization that should be translated as "to see the face of Yahweh" (e.g., Exod. 23.15; 34.23; Deut. 16.16; 31.11; 1 Sam. 1.22; Ps. 42.2). In the scores of cases where the text simply reads, "God said," it is not clear if a theophany is to be presumed. Only when the narrative clarifies that "God appeared" is a theophany explicit (Gen. 12.7; 17.1; 26.24; 35.9; 48.3). Occasionally, God is described as descending when the theophany begins (Exod. 19.11, 18–20; 34.5) and/or ascending when it ends (Gen. 17.22; 35.13).

Although God may reveal himself whenever and to whomever he wishes, it is only to select individuals and in isolated places that God repeatedly appears. *Moses, for example, is depicted as having a unique relationship with God, who knew and spoke with Moses face to face (Num. 12.6–8; Deut. 34.10). The most common types of places where theophanies occur are near trees (Gen. 12.6–7; 13.18; 18.1) and mountains (Gen. 12.8; 22.2, 14; Ex. 19.2–3; Num. 23.3; Deut. 33.2; Ps. 3.4; Joel 3.16; Hab. 3.3; Mic. 1.3).

Because God characteristically reveals himself at such places, they become places of pilgrimage for humans seeking divine guidance or assistance. Shrines and temples, along with their sacred objects (such as the *ark), are built to formalize, protect, and regulate the approach to the divine presence. Those who enter such sacred precincts may experience a dramatic revelation of God's presence (Isa. 6.1), particularly those who spend the night (1 Sam. 3.1–15; 1 Kings 3.4–5). God's presence in this institutionalized framework can be confirmed by the theophanic cloud inside the shrine (Exod. 33.9; 40.34; 1 Kings 8.10–11). Here it is common to find people dying not because they have seen God but because they have not followed the rules in approaching him (1 Sam. 6.19; Lev. 10.2; 16.2; 2 Sam. 6.7).

As in other ancient Near Eastern traditions, one of the common forms in which God is depicted as appearing is as a warrior (Exod. 15.1–3; Judg. 5.4–5), garbed with battle armor and weapons (Isa. 34.5–6; 59.17; Zeph. 2.12; Hab. 3.9–15; Zech. 9.13–14), smiting his foes and saving his people (Isa. 42.13; Zeph. 3.17; Zech. 14.3). He may go into battle alone (Isa. 59.16; 63.3, 5) or he may be accompanied by an army or entourage (Isa. 5.26–30; 13.3–5; Joel 2.1–11; Hab. 3.5) as he rides upon horses and chariot (Hab. 3.8, 15; Zech. 10.3). He returns from battle drenched in the enemy's blood (Isa. 63.1–6). When God makes such a dramatic appearance, characteristic visible phenomena that accompany his presence include clouds, lightning, earthquakes, and fire (Gen. 15.17; Exod. 13.21; 19.9, 16; Nah. 1.3; Zech. 9.14; Job 38.1). Particularly when God marches into battle, he rocks creation with convulsions that shatter rocks and mountains (Isa. 13.3; Joel 2.10; 3.16; Mic. 1.4; Nah. 1.5–6; Hab. 3.6, 10; Zech. 14.4–5), creating an upheaval and diminution of sun, moon, stars, and heavens (Isa. 13.10; 37.4; Joel 2.10; 3.15; Hab. 3.11; Zech. 14.6); see War.

The book of Kings explains why earlier manifestations of God were dramatic in contrast to the more subdued revelation of the later writing *prophets. In 1 Kings 19.8–13, the ninth-century BCE prophet *Elijah returns to Mount *Horeb and witnesses the typical convulsions of nature that accompany a theophany (storm, earthquake, fire), but this time God is in none of them. Instead, it is only a subdued, calm voice that testifies to God's presence. This narrative accounts for the gradual cessation of the classical theophanies and a rise in importance of the prophetic word as the medium of God's self-revelation. It is in the following century that the first of the known so-called writing prophets, *Amos, appears in Israel.

The New Testament affirms that *Jesus is the only adequate manifestation of God (John 1.1, 14–18; Col. 1.15; 2.9). Jesus' transfiguration (Mark 9.2–8 par.) and *ascension (Acts 1.9–12) correspond to theophanies of the Hebrew Bible (on a mountain, voice from a cloud, radiance) in order to stress the continuity of God's self-revelation (Matt. 17.1–8). SAMUEL A. MEIER Thessalonians, The Letters of Paul to the. The New Testament includes two letters ascribed to *Paul and addressed to the church at Thessalonica in Macedonia (Map 14:D2).

The first follows the normal pattern of Pauline letters in beginning with a formal greeting (1.1), followed by a report of how Paul remembers the church in his prayers; he thanks God for the positive response of its members to his initial preaching of the gospel (1.2–10). He then discusses this work in the town, claiming that he and his companions acted uprightly and lovingly (2.1–12). He returns to the topic of the church's warm response despite disincentives caused by those opposed to the spread of the gospel (2.13–16); his defense of his own conduct may be a reply to slanders current in the town. The continuation of opposition to the church since his departure had worried him so much that he had wished to go back to see how things were; finding this impossible for reasons that he does not divulge, beyond saying that "Satan blocked our way" (2.18), he sent Timothy as his representative, and the latter has now returned full of enthusiasm for the healthy state of the church (2.17–3.13). In the remainder of the letter, Paul gives the church the kind of teaching and practical advice that he would have liked to share with them in person. He encourages the believers to live holy lives—with special reference to the avoidance of sexual immorality—and to continue to grow in love (4.1–12). He gives instruction to comfort Christians who are fearful about the fate of those of their number who had died and assures them that, when the Lord returns, the resurrection of the dead will take place, so that those who "fell asleep" (NRSV: "died") will come with Christ and be united with those still alive. Believers need not worry when this will take place; if they are truly "awake," they will not be taken by surprise (4.13–5.11). Finally, Paul commends brotherly love and encourages the use of spiritual gifts (5.12–24), closing the letter with personal greetings (5.25–28).

The second letter follows the same pattern. The opening greeting (1.1–2) is followed by a prayer report, which also functions as encouragement and teaching: the church is still suffering from opposition, but is bearing it steadfastly, and Paul assures the believers that God will judge those who oppose them and will prepare the church to share in his glory when Christ comes (1.3–12). The center of the letter is teaching about the return of Christ, directed against people who were claiming Paul's authority for asserting that the *day of the Lord had begun and that the return of Christ could be expected immediately. Paul replies by stating that a period of Satanic opposition to God on an unparalleled scale must first happen, and then Christ will come to bring it to an end; meanwhile, the church must hold firm (2.1–17). The final part of the letter is exhortation: the church is asked to pray for Paul, and attention is drawn to some Christians who had abandoned their daily work and were living off the generosity of their good-natured friends. Paul condemns this idleness and the consequent nuisance of the idlers strongly (3.1–16). There is a brief closing greeting (3.17–18).

Thessalonica was one of the towns in Macedonia that was visited by Paul, *Silas, and Timothy during the second of the missionary tours described by Luke in Acts 16–18. It was in fact the capital of the Roman province, an important commercial center situated on the major highway, the Via Egnatia. Not surprisingly, its population included Jews (Acts 17.1, 5). Paul and his companions spent a brief time here after leaving Philippi, but sufficiently long to gain a number of converts from Jewish and Greek attenders at the *synagogue and so to establish a church. According to Luke, Jewish opposition forced the missionaries to leave precipitately. They moved into Achaia and worked briefly at *Athens and then for a longer period at *Corinth. It was during this period that Timothy paid the visit mentioned in 1 Thessalonians 3.1–6, and that Paul wrote the first letter, doubtless from Corinth.

The history of the church between its foundation and the composition of the letter is known only from allusions in the letter. The picture that emerges is of a church free from groups opposed to Paul, and developing in faith and love. Certainly, Paul was worried about whether the church could stand up to attacks from outside, but this concern arose more from the recent foundation of the congregation than because of any inherent defects.

The major point where Paul felt the need to give instructions was the future advent (or *parousia) of the Lord Jesus. It is unlikely that there were any false teachings; it appears rather that the Thessalonian Christians had not fully understood Paul's teaching about the parousia and the resurrection of the dead. The *second coming of the Lord played a prominent part in Paul's preaching, for he refers to it with remarkable frequency in the letter (1.10; 2.19; 3.13; 4.13–5.11; 5.23). Otherwise, the letter reflects the typical characteristics of Paul's thought, including the distinctive use of the phrase "in Christ" to characterize the nature of the Christian life.

There is no doubt that Paul was the author of this letter. Theories that it is a forgery need not be taken seriously. Some scholars have argued that the letter has a peculiar shape, and attempt to explain it as a combination of two or more documents or as a document that had been subjected to interpolations, but these theories are more ingenious than convincing.

The second letter raises problems to which there are no generally agreed answers. Its language and content are sufficiently similar to those of 1 Thessalonians to indicate that, if authentic, it was probably written not long after the first letter. Yet it lacks concrete references to the situation of the readers or of the writer. From chap. 1, it appears that attack from outside must have worsened. The pungency of Paul's language may also suggest that he himself was the object of particular attack from people outside the church (see 3.2).

The situation behind chap. 2 is difficult to reconstruct. There must have been a group in the church who believed that they were living in the very last days. They appear to have been encouraged in this view by some statement that was alleged to have come from Paul himself. Paul, however, stopped short of affirming that the end had actually arrived, and he referred to other events that must happen before the return of the Lord. There is no unanimity as to what Paul envisaged by the apostasy and the man of lawlessness, or what he meant by the force that was at present restraining the lawless one from appearing (2 Thess. 2.9; see Antichrist). The language used has a mythological character and may reflect *apocalyptic literature in which a heavenly force restrains the powers of evil. But whether Paul used this language to refer to specific persons or beings is not certain. One view is that Paul saw the Roman emperor and/or empire as embodying the forces of law and order that restrained the forces of chaos from taking over. Another view, perhaps more persuasive, sees God himself or the preaching of the gospel as the force holding back the full impact of the forces of evil. Paul wrote allusively, even for his first readers, and therefore it is not surprising that we are at a loss to know precisely what he had in mind.

In the final part of the letter we find evidence that some members of the church were living in idleness at others' expense. Although no explicit connection is made, it is hard not to believe that the apocalyptic excitement reflected in chap. 2 contributed to this situation. It called forth strong censure from Paul, who firmly believed that Christians should work for their living. Apparently, discipline in the church consisted of exclusion from the privileges of fellowship.

These comments on 2 Thessalonians have been made in terms of the ostensible historical context of the document as a genuine letter from Paul to the church at Thessalonica. In this view, we must assume that in the period after the writing of 1 Thessalonians a kind of apocalyptic fervor, whose origins can be detected in the earlier letter, developed in the church. Paul does not deal with it in terms of castigating a group of opponents, as in other letters; rather, he writes to believers who may have been misled by a misinterpretation of his teaching.

Such a situation appears to be quite plausible. Yet it does not appear so to some commentators, for whom there is sharp contrast between the nearness of the parousia in 1 Thessalonians and its delay in 2 Thessalonians. This alerts them to other odd features in the latter, such as the lack of personal, concrete allusions, the peculiar repetition of phraseology from 1 Thessalonians, and some differences in language and thought. In the judgment of numerous scholars these differences are incompatible with the traditional understanding of the letter as authentically Pauline. Attempts to solve the problem by arguing that the letters were written in reverse chronological order or that they are compositions of fragments originally written in a different order have not commanded assent. So it is argued that 2 Thessalonians is a later composition by another writer who wished to use Paul's name to correct his teaching or false inferences from it, perhaps even to claim that this letter alone was authentic (cf. 3.17) and that 1 Thessalonians was to be rejected. A solution of this kind can be defended by concentrating on the unusual features of 2 Thessalonians. Its major weakness, however, is the lack of a convincing and plausible reconstruction of the circumstances in which such a letter could have been composed—and directed to Thessalonica in particular. The letter, for example, appears to assume that the *Temple in Jerusalem is still standing (2.4). The language refuting the claim that the *day of the Lord had already arrived is so cryptic that it is hard to envisage a later writer expressing himself in this fashion if he wanted to persuade his readers. The brazenness of the hypothetical author in writing 2 Thessalonians 3.17 is also remarkable. Although it must be granted that there are some oddities in the language, structure, and thought of the letter, the difficulties in considering it pseudonymous are greater.

I. Howard Marshall

Third Isaiah. See Isaiah, The Book of.

Thomas. An *apostle, named in all lists of the *twelve, but a major character only in the gospel of John. Mentioned in John 11.16 and 14.5, Thomas is prominent in John 20.24–29, where his insistence on physical proofs for Jesus's *resurrection has led to the phrase "doubting Thomas." Several *apocryphal works are ascribed to or are about Thomas, including the *gnostic gospel of Thomas and the Acts of Thomas. In the latter, his name, which means "twin" in Aramaic, is the basis for his identification as Jesus' twin brother. He is also said to have preached the gospel as far east as India.

Michael D. Coogan

Three Young Men, Song of the. See Azariah, The Prayer of, and The Song of the Three Young Men.

Thummin. See Urim and Thummin.

Tiglath-Pileser III. Tukulti-apil-Esharra, King of *Assyria 745–727 BCE, sometimes known by the hypocoristic Pul or Pulu. Having risen to power after a revolt against Ashur-nirari V (755–745 BCE), Tiglath-pileser reversed decades of Assyrian political decline and ousted Urartu as the principal power in Western Asia. He laid the foundations for the most expansive phase of the Neo-Assyrian empire by a prolonged series of annual campaigns, by reorganizing and geographically extending the Assyrian provincial system, and by massive deportations of troublesome subject populations.

After early campaigns against Arameans in *Babylonia and against western Iran (745–744 BCE), Tiglath-pileser turned his attention to the more crucial northern and western fronts. He defeated Urartu in 743 and 735 BCE and crushed its Syrian allies, particularly Arpad (742–740 BCE). He invaded Syria and Palestine in 738 and 734 BCE, reaching almost to the border of Egypt and receiving the submission of Zabibe, queen of Arabia. Menahem of Israel paid tribute to Tiglath-pileser, who withdrew from his kingdom (2 Kings 15.19). When Pekah had succeeded to the throne, Tiglath-pileser captured part of the northern section of Israel (2 Kings 15.29) and later deported some of the population to Assyria (1 Chron. 5.26). On behalf of Ahaz of Judah, who had sent him munificent gifts, Tiglath-pileser campaigned against *Damascus and Israel (2 Kings 16.7–9). After Tiglath-pileser had captured Damascus, Ahaz met him there; Ahaz was subsequently accused of changing cult paraphernalia because of the Assyrian king (2 Kings 16.10–18).

Tiglath-pileser campaigned in Babylonia in 731 and 729 BCE and then himself became king of Babylonia in 728. After his death in 727 BCE, he was succeeded by his son, *Shalmaneser V.

John A. Brinkman

Time, Units of. The universal division of time into past, present, and future is expressed in Hebrew (as in other Semitic languages) by a spatial metaphor. Contrary to Western usage, the past is what lies ahead (Hebr. qedem) and is therefore known; the future is unknown and is behind (Hebr. 'āḥôr; 'aḥărôn).

There is no clear evidence for division of the day into smaller, equal parts in ancient Israel, though such systems were known elsewhere in the ancient Near East (and see perhaps Neh. 9.3). By the Roman period, a system of twelve hours of daylight was in use (3 Macc. 5.14; Matt. 20.3–6). Generally in the Bible the term "hour" is used in a nonspecific sense. The day was either the period of sunlight, contrasted with the night (see John 11.9) or the whole period of twenty-four hours, although not defined as such in the Bible. In earlier traditions a day apparently began at sunrise (e.g., Lev. 7.15–17; Judg. 19.4–19), but later its beginning was at sunset and its end at the following sunset. Thus, in Genesis 1, the six days of *creation are each described as follows: "there was evening, and there was morning." It should be stressed that this clear description makes impossible any understanding of the days of creation in Genesis 1 as longer periods, such as geological eras. This system became normative (see Exod. 12.18; Lev. 23.32; Neh. 13.19) and is still observed in Jewish tradition, where, for example, the *Sabbath begins on Friday evening at sunset and ends Saturday at sunset. The word "day" can also be used metaphorically, referring to a critical time, such as the day of birth or death (Eccles. 7.1), the *day of the Lord, and the day of Christ (Phil. 1.10). The plural form can be used in a looser sense, equivalent to the general notion of time, as in phrases like "in those days" and "days of old."

The night was apparently divided into watches, three of which are implied in Judges 7.19 and four apparently named in Mark 13.35.

The week consisted of seven days, the last of which was the *Sabbath, the only one to be named. The first six days are designated by ordinal numbers.

The two Hebrew words for month (yeraḥ and ḥodeš) are both related to the moon and its cycle (cf. yārēaḥ "moon" and ḥādāš "new"). Different names are used for the months in different periods, as follows (those in parentheses are not attested in the Bible but are found in other ancient sources):

CANAANITE NAME	BABYLONIAN NAME	MODERN EQUIVALENT
Abib	Nisan	March/April
Ziv	(Iyyar)	April/May
	Siwan	May/June
	(Tammuz)	June/July
	(Ab)	July/August
	Elul	August/September
Ethanim	(Tishri)	September/October
Bul	(Marheshvan)	October/November
	Chislev	November/December
	Tebeth	December/January
	Shebat	January/February
	Adar	February/March

Four of the months have Canaanite names: Abib, used only in connection with the *Exodus and its commemoration in the festival of unleavened bread or *Passover (Exod. 13.4; 23.15; Deut. 16.1), and the remaining three in the account of the dedication of the *Temple in 1 Kings (6.1, 37–38; 8.2). The Babylonian names are used in texts dating from the sixth century BCE on. Often months are simply indicated by their ordinal number, with Abib/Nisan being the first (Exod. 12.2), at the time of the vernal equinox. But this also seems to be a relatively late innovation, patterned after the Babylonian system; earlier traditions imply that the new year was celebrated in the fall, at the autumnal equinox (see Exod. 23.16; 34.22), apparently in agreement with Canaanite practice. A tenth-century BCE calendar from *Gezer lists the agricultural activities characteristic of twelve months, beginning with the fall harvest.

The year was apparently based on the lunar cycle and consisted of twelve months (1 Chron. 27.15; Rev. 22.2), apparently of twenty-nine or thirty days each. The use of an intercalary month is disputed but may have occurred (see 1 Kings 12.33). It is possible that there was also use of a true solar year, although the evidence is fragmentary.

No absolute system of *chronology is used in the Bible, most systems referring either to the regnal years of various rulers or to key events (e.g., 1 Kings 6.1), although the figures given in various sources are frequently inconsistent. Contrary to modern practice, in totaling units both the first and the last were usually counted.

MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Timothy, The Letters to. See Pastoral Letters, The.

Tithe. Attested in ancient Near Eastern sources apart from the Bible, in Israel the development of the practice of tithing (Hebr. maʿăśēr, meaning a tenth) is unknown and not all the particulars are mutually reconcilable. According to Genesis, tithes were voluntarily offered by *Abraham to *Melchizedek and accepted by him on God's behalf, long before the *Temple (Gen. 14.20; Heb. 7.4–10). This was confirmed as an obligation by *Jacob in his vow (Gen. 28.22): "Of all that you give me, I will surely give one tenth to you," God being the universal donor. In other traditions, the chief purpose of tithe was to maintain *priests and *Levites, who had not been allotted a share in realty in *Canaan (Num. 18.21–24; Josh. 14.3–4). Tithe was assessed on the fruits of the land of Israel and (see Jubilees 32.15) herds and flocks there, such tithes not being redeemable for money (Lev. 27.30–33). The Levites at one time received tithe and passed on a tenth to the priests or for the use of the Temple (Num. 18.25–32; Neh. 10.37–39); but by the first century CE priests collected for themselves. It is not unknown for some priests to forestall others forcibly. The king no longer collected tithes, if he ever did (cf. 1 Sam. 8.15).

Particularity about tithing, as required in the *Mishnah, was not inconsistent with neglect of other commandments not so easily quantified (Matt. 23.23; Luke 11.42). Priests obtained income from other sources, but failure to pay tithes (cf. Neh. 13.10) was a spiritual offense (Deut. 12.6), so as to excite God's anger (Mal. 3.8, 10). A perfect Israel would proudly contribute to the cult with its tithes (2 Chron. 31.5–6; Neh. 12.44–47), and *Pharisees could boast of their reliability (Luke 18.12). But there was a discrepancy between such observances and spirituality (Amos 4.4–5). What accretions and what gains, natural and otherwise, must be submitted to Pentateuchal tithe could be argued, but the Mishnah declares all cultivated and edible growths liable. Pharisees regarded food that might not have been tithed as unfit for consumption by the righteous.

Another tithe of produce is required at Deuteronomy 14.22–23 to be realized by its owners and spent in Jerusalem to subsidize the city, its Temple, and the Levites. This may refer to the first fruits or the money received from their sale, which the producers had to take to Jerusalem (cf. Deut. 26.1–15), but this is doubtful. It is important that that "second tithe" was to be spent on servants, *orphans, *widows, and *aliens as well as Levites (cf. Deut. 12.17–19; 14.22–29). A regular collection for the *poor was known by the second century BCE (Tob. 1.8), and the Mishnah speaks of a tithe for the poor even though payment of it was voluntary (cf. Sir. 7.32). On the other hand it rules that the animals of Leviticus 27.30–33 are subject to the "second tithe."

Luke 11.41–42 suggests the probability that, in at least some churches, the Pentateuchal precepts were applied by analogy for the benefit of the Christian poor. Matthew 23.23 suggests that the custom of tithing was preserved somehow. The New Testament nowhere explicitly requires tithing to maintain a ministry or a place of assembly. J. DUNCAN M. DERRETT

Titus, The Letter to. See Pastoral Letters, The.

Tobit, The Book of. The book of Tobit, regarded by Jews and Protestants as apocryphal and by Roman Catholics and some Orthodox churches as deuterocanonical (see Apocrypha, article on Jewish Apocrypha), is named after its alleged author Tobit, a generous and God-fearing Jew whose blindness and poverty in *Nineveh (Map 6:H3) are the direct result of his performing one of his most characteristic good deeds, namely, burying an executed compatriot.

But thanks to the courageous efforts of his devoted son, Tobias (who unknown to both of them was assisted by the angel *Raphael masquerading as Azariah), Tobit ultimately recovers his sight and fortune and also gains a virtuous daughter-in-law, Sarah, a Medean relative from whom Tobias has exorcised Asmodeus, the demon who had claimed the lives of each of her seven previous husbands on their wedding night. Shortly before his death as a very old man, Tobit has Tobias and his large family move from Nineveh to Ecbatana (Map 6:J4), where Tobias lives to a very rich old age.

Although the book has all the outer trappings of a historical account, including mention of well-known historical personages (e.g., *Shalmaneser V in 1.13; *Sennacherib in 1.15) and places (e.g., Nineveh, 1.3; Ecbatana, 3.7; and Rages, 4.1), the narrative is best understood as a novella or, more specifically, a Diaspora romance, centering on a successful quest. The story is intended to edify and to inspire faith in God and human effort; for without Tobias's own devotion and courage (5.1–8; 6.2–3, 14–18; 7.9–13; 8.1–3), neither his father nor his wife would have been delivered, the help of the angel Raphael notwithstanding (6.4–9; 8.3).

In creating this charming pastiche about everyday Jewish "saints" in the *Dispersion, the ancient narrator utilized as his basic fabrics three well-known folktales: the ubiquitous story of the Grateful Dead, the tale about a man who was at first impoverished but ultimately was rewarded for burying an abused corpse; the Monster in the Bridal Chamber, a widespread tale featuring an evil creature who is in love with a beautiful maiden and kills her husband on their wedding night; and the Ahiqar Story, the last-named being a wise courtier who, though betrayed by his adopted son, is ultimately vindicated.

Although the author of Tobit wove these folktales together quite skillfully, their seams are occasionally discernable in certain loose or incompatible threads: e.g., the gratuitous mention of Tobias's dog, an unclean animal (Tob. 6.2 and 11.4); and Tobit's injunction to his son to pour his wine on the grave of the righteous (4.17), which, while contrary to biblical teaching (Deut. 26.14), is included in the counsels of the nonbiblical Ahiqar.

Even though the basic fabrics of the book are secular folktales, their designs and colors are distinctly biblical, being patterned after stories in Genesis (e.g., the story of Joseph [Gen. 37 and 39–50] and the betrothal stories of Isaac and Jacob [cf. Tob. 5.17–22; 7.1–16; 10.7–13 with Gen. 24 and 29]) and colored by the theology of the book of Deuteronomy in general, and its doctrine of just deserts in particular. The author of Tobit subscribed to the Deuteronomic equation (cf. Deut. 28) that righteousness ultimately results in material prosperity (so Tob. 11.14–18; 13.10–11; 14.1–2), while wickedness always brings punishment and material disaster (so Tob. 1.21; 3.3–6; 13.12; 14.4, 10).

The author of Tobit also used the biblical *Job as the model for Tobit; the two characters are both men of outstandingly good deeds and piety who, though they suffered and were tested (cf. Job. 1.6–2.10 and Tob. 12.14), did not lose their faith (so Job 31.37 and Tob. 3.2–6) and ultimately were rewarded with even greater blessings (so Job 42.10–16 and Tob. 14.1–2). While the author of Tobit expressly mentions Amos (2.6) and Nahum (14.4), it is prophets who are not mentioned by name, notably Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Third Isaiah, who exerted the strongest influence on him, especially in Tobit 13–14, where Israel's *exile and return are predicted.

The book of Tobit, like the meaning of his name ("[God] is my good"), is essentially ironic. Although Tobit fed the hungry, clothed the naked, and buried exposed corpses (cf. 1.16–18)—all of which he insisted delivers one from death and keeps one "from going into the Darkness" (Tob. 4.10)—he lost both his wealth and his sight. Sarah, too, is an ironic figure: a virtuous, loving, and level-headed young maiden, she was plagued by an evil that almost drove her to suicide (3.10–15).

The story has little tension or suspense, for quite early in the narrative the reader learns not only that Sarah and Tobit will be healed (3.16–17) but even how (6.6–9). But this special knowledge also enables the reader better to appreciate various ironies in the story, including Tobit's assurance to his son that "an angel" will accompany him and Azariah (5.17), Raguel furtively digging a grave for the apparently doomed Tobias (8.9–12), and the conviction of Tobias's mother that her long-delayed son is dead (10.4–7).

Given the tragic circumstances of Tobit and Sarah at the height of their miseries, many of the names in the story are highly ironic. Tobit's father was Tobiel ("God is my good"); Tobit's sharp-tongued wife (2.14; 5.18–20; 10.7) is called Anna ("Grace"); the angel Raphael ("God heals") poses as Azariah ("Yahweh has helped"); the mother of the demon-possessed Sarah is Edna ("Pleasure").

The narrator's theological views are clearly and effectively expressed in the book's plot as well as in its characters' monologues (e.g., 1.3–3.6, 10), conversations (e.g., 2.11–14; 5.18–22; 6.16–18), speeches (4.3–21; 12.6–15, 17–20; 14.3–11), and especially their prayers (3.1–6, 11–15; 8.5–8; 13.1–17).

The century-long debate by scholars as to whether the book was originally composed in Greek or in a Semitic language has been resolved by the discovery of one Hebrew and four Aramaic manuscripts of the book among the *Dead Sea Scrolls at Qumran. Because the manuscripts are very fragmentary and not fully published, certainty is denied us; but it would appear that *Aramaic was the original language of the book, though the Septuagint may be based upon a Hebrew version. In the Qumran texts, Tobit's name is Tobi; his son's name, Tobiyah.

In spite of Tobit's obvious literary and theological merits, it was excluded from the Jewish canon, probably because of the late date of its composition (see below), though it does also contradict the rabbinic halakah on marriage, whereby the groom, not the bride's father as in Tobit 7.12–13, writes out the marriage contract.

As for the Christian canon, more often than not Eastern church fathers denied Tobit canonicity, while Western councils and fathers, starting with Pseudo-Clement (2 Clem. 16.4) ca. 150 CE, nearly always accepted the book.

Converging lines of evidence suggest that the book was composed sometime ca. 225–175 BCE. The phrase "the law/book of Moses" (Tob. 6.13; 7.11, 12, 13) is late, occurring first in 2 Chronicles (23.18); and not until ca. 200 BCE were the prophetic books regarded as the word of God (cf. Tob. 14.4). A date of composition later than 175 BCE is precluded by the total absence from the book of any of the strife and turmoil associated with the days of Antiochus IV Epiphanes (175–164 BCE) and the Maccabees (164–135 BCE). Then too, by the first century BCE, Jewish concern for endogamy, which is so prominent in Tobit (4.12–13; 6.10–12, 16; 7.8–15), had diminished. The book's presence at Qumran virtually rules out a first-century BCE date.

Whether the book originated in Mesopotamia, Egypt, or Palestine is unclear, though arguments for a Palestinian provenance may be gaining support.

Of the three major versions of Tobit used by Christian churches down through the millennia, the so-called longer recension (longer by 1700 Greek words as preserved by Codex Sinaiticus, and the Old Latin version) is the most authentic and is the basis for the NEB and the NRSV; the "shorter recension," used by the RSV, is an abbreviation of the longer, while, as Jerome himself reports, his Vulgate was based upon an Aramaic text. CAREY A. MOORE

Tongues, Speaking in. See Glossolalia.

Topheth. A site southwest of *Jerusalem in the Valley of Hinnom (see Gehenna) where, according to Jeremiah, worshipers burned their sons and daughters as offerings (Jer. 7.31; 19.5). Jeremiah associates this ritual of child sacrifice with the god *Baal; elsewhere the god to whom children are sacrificed at the Topheth is called Molech (2 Kings 23.10). Inscriptional evidence from cemeteries of infants and young children found at Carthage and elsewhere in the Phoenician world, however, suggests that Molech may be a common noun meaning "sacrificial offering"; also, Jeremiah's prophecies associating the cult with Baal may not be historically accurate. At least some people apparently sacrificed their children to Yahweh, including Kings Ahaz (2 Chron. 33.6) and *Manasseh (2 Chron. 33.6). The great reformer king of Judah, *Josiah (ca. 640–609 BCE), is said to have destroyed the Topheth as part of his purification of the Yahwistic cult (2 Kings 23.10). SUSAN ACKERMAN Torah. One of the basic concepts of biblical religion and rabbinic literature. The meaning of "torah" (Hebr. tôrâ) is "instruction, teaching." "Torah" is often rendered "law," as consistently in the *Septuagint, although Greek nomos had broader meaning than simply "law." This rendering has been deplored, but it has validity. For example, Exodus 12.49 reads, "There shall be one torah for the native and for the resident alien." Clearly the translator must render "torah" here as "law." "Law" is an extension of the basic meaning of "torah," for divine instruction assumes the force of law. In Leviticus and Numbers particularly, the individual divine laws are referred to as "torahs" (Hebr. tôrôt). Underlying the biblical concept of Torah is another concept, one of these being a way of God that had to be followed, a concept that finds its fullest expression in the prophets and in the Psalms.

If the divinity is the promulgator of Torah as law, Torah in its broadest sense may be promulgated by kings, *priests, wise men, and even wise *women (Prov. 1.8; 6.20). Most significant historically is the promulgation of Torah through *Moses, an idea found already in the *Pentateuch, as in Deuteronomy 4.44: "This is the torah that Moses set before the Israelites." The tractate of the *Mishnah known as "the Ethics of the Fathers" (Pirqe ʾAbot) begins with the statement "Moses received the Torah at Mount Sinai," one of the fundamental precepts of rabbinic Judaism. Not only were the *Ten Commandments given at *Sinai, but, as we shall see, the Torah in a wider sense.

The development of the concept of Torah proceeded as follows: (1) the promulgation of individual divinely directed tôrôt; (2) the Torah of the divinely inspired figure of Moses; (3) a definite idea of Torah as the book of the Torah, which by the days of Ezra and Nehemiah meant the Pentateuch in an early form; (4) in the rabbinic period, the Torah as Pentateuch, in a form not unlike the Pentateuch of the present day (see Canon). Rabbinic usage of the term was quite broad. It could refer to the five books of Moses or to the totality of divine revelation. It included two basic types of materials: legal (halakhic) and literary (aggadic), with the latter including everything from stories to poetry to nonlegal interpretation of biblical texts and more. The rabbis extended Torah to include another dichotomy: the written Torah and the oral Torah, the latter consisting of traditions that were transmitted orally until they were given written expression in the Mishnah, the basis of the *Talmud (cf. the "Temple Scroll" from *Qumran, which may have functioned as an additional book of Torah). Both Torahs were considered to have descended from heaven; there was even a rabbinic tradition that the Torah preexisted *creation, and another that through it God effected creation (cf. Sir. 24.1–23; Prov. 9.22–31). Rabbinic Judaism stressed the joy of fulfilling the Torah's commandments; Torah observance ensured salvation. It is difficult to overstate the importance of Torah in early Judaism, an emphasis that has continued to the present.

In biblical tradition the role of the king in relation to Torah is specified in Deuteronomy 17.18: "When he [the king] is seated on his royal throne, he shall have written for himself a copy of this torah on a book before the levitical priests." No king of Israel or Judah is known to have followed this law, with the partial exception of *Josiah, who read the book without actually having it written out (2 Kings 23.3). The king's role in relation to Torah is hinted at in the lament of Lamentations 2.9: "Her king and her princes are among the nations; there is no torah." Priests as well are upholders of God's Torah and its interpreters as part of their everyday functions (Jer. 18.18; Hag. 2.11–13). The *prophets too were greatly concerned with Torah, especially when the people failed to follow the divine way (Isa. 1.10; 5.24; Jer. 2.8; 9.12). Malachi 4.4 is the only prophetic reference to the Torah of Moses, showing that the early conception of Torah as direct divine teaching had precedence for the prophets over the concept of the Mosaic Torah.

The earliest Christian attitudes toward Torah were ambivalent. One view is found in Jesus' saying in Matthew 5.17: "Do not think that I have come to abolish the law or the prophets; I have come not to abolish but to fulfill. For truly I tell you, until heaven and earth pass away, not one letter, not one stroke of a letter, will pass from the law until all is accomplished." But this clear-cut and positive view is not that of the entire New Testament. *Paul, though expressing the belief that the law may be fulfilled through love (Rom. 13.8–10), also asserts that "a person is justified not by the works of the law but through faith in Jesus Christ" (Gal. 2.16) and that "the power of sin is the law" (1 Cor. 15.56); see Justification. With these radical doctrines, Paul was able to sever the Judaic umbilical cord and to set Christianity on its present track.

See Interpretation, History of, article on Jewish Interpretation; Law; Lectionaries, article on Jewish Tradition; Synagogue. PHILIP STERN Tower of Babel. See Babel, Tower of.

Trade and Transport.

Trade. Palestine is a bridge between Africa and Asia as well as a land passage between Europe and Egypt. Thus local trade in Palestine has been supplemented across the millennia by international trade, and archaeological evidence of imported goods is found from the Neolithic period onward. Biblical authors generally take notice of trade as they comment on ethics and theology related to it.

Ezekiel's informative summary of the trading patterns of his day (27.12–25) lists the products of Judah and Israel as "wheat from Minneth, millet, honey, oil, and balm" (v. 17). Wheat and millet are easily transportable. Olive trees need little water, and the oil can be extracted and traded easily. The Hebrew word for "honey" is dĕbaš, which means both honey and syrup. Grape juice was and is made into *wine or boiled into a tasty syrup. The "land flowing with milk and honey" thus means a land with extensive pasture for flocks of sheep and goats and with hillsides where grapes can be grown that will produce large quantities of syrup/honey. Wool and wool products also became exportable merchandise.

*Solomon developed copper mining in the south of the country, and from *David onward the Philistine restriction of blacksmithing was ended, but the extent of iron technology in Palestine is uncertain. In the Hellenistic period asphalt was gathered and marketed from the Dead Sea. In Roman times trade was widespread but was not very significant to the authors of the New Testament.

The prophets are especially interested in speaking to the human problems created by manufacturing and trade. *Amos cries out against merchants who make the grain measure (the ephah) small and the payment ingot (the shekel; see Money) large, and who are eager for the *Sabbath to be over so that they may return to their trading (8.4–6). The injustice caused by accumulated wealth is a major topic throughout his prophecy. Metallurgy becomes a parable for Isaiah as he describes how God will refine the people through punishment (1.25). The oppression of workers is sharply criticized (Isa. 58.3–8), a passage partially quoted in Luke 4.17–20. Then, in the parables of Jesus, trading becomes a framework within which to discuss faithfulness to an absent master (Luke 19.11–27). The kingdom of God is not compared to a "pearl of great price" but rather to a merchant searching for such a pearl (Matt. 13.44–45).

Barter as a means of exchange gradually gave way to payment in gold and silver ingots, bars, and rings. Coins began to circulate during Persian times but came into common uses only after *Alexander the Great (see Money). Banking flourished in the Roman period and is mentioned in Luke 19.23. From David and Solomon onward the authorities in Palestine could collect significant sums of money in customs charges on goods passing through the country. Much of *Herod the Great's considerable wealth may have come from such sources. The neighboring *Nabateans and Palmyra flourished because of their dominant positions along trade routes.

Transport. Transport during the biblical periods was facilitated by means of porters, donkeys, camels, carts, and ships.

Porters have been a major part of the transport system in the Near East since ancient times, carrying goods of any kind from one place to another. This was and is done on the back, often with a strap around the bottom of the burden up over the top of the head to keep the weight from slipping. A second method of carrying goods was with the use of a yoke across the shoulders. Jesus' often-quoted saying "My yoke is easy" (Matt. 11.30) refers to a yoke for porters, not for oxen.

The lowly donkey was in extensive use by the second millennium BCE and remains a basic means of transport in villages all across the Middle East. Egyptian tomb paintings in Beni Hassan (ca. 1890 BCE) depict travelers from Palestine with goods arriving by donkey. The donkey is surefooted, patient, and easy to manage. It can carry over 135 kg (300 lb) and as a riding animal can easily travel more than 32 km (20 mi) a day.

The camel was domesticated at least by the second millennium BCE and was known in Palestine before the first. It has been used extensively for transport ever since (cf. Gen. 37.25; Job 6.18–19; Isa. 21.13; 60.6). The camel can carry up to 225 kg (500 lb) and is able to travel long distances without food or water. Its greatest weakness is its need for smooth footing. Yet for long distances and/or heavy loads, over smooth ground, the camel is superb and has remained a primary method of transport in the Middle East.

Crude carts from Palestine are depicted on the walls of the temple of Ramesses III (early twelfth century BCE) at Medinet Habu in Luxor, Egypt. Carts are mentioned in historical narratives (e.g., 1 Sam. 6.7; 2 Sam. 6.3) and in the prophets (e.g., Amos 2.13). With the building of the Roman road system carts came into their own as an important transport alternative.

The *ships of the ancient world were small craft that usually hugged the coasts and beached each night. Gradually navigational skills and boat construction made it possible for larger ships to venture across the Mediterranean (Jon. 1.3; Acts 27). The *Phoenicians were famous for their skill and daring in the art of sailing (cf. Ezek. 27.1–9). Because the Palestinian coast has no natural harbors and because it was frequently under the control of others, the Israelites generally relied on the Phoenicians for maritime commerce (see 1 Kings 9.26–28; 10.11, 22).

Horses were used for war and as a means of travel for the upper classes but rarely for transport. There is no record of the use of elephants for transportation in the Middle East.

KENNETH E. BAILEY

Translations. *This entry deals with translations, or "versions," of the Bible from the original *Hebrew, *Aramaic, and Greek, and consists of ten articles:

Theory and Practice
Ancient Languages
Targums
Medieval Versions
English Language
Modern European Languages
African Languages
Asiatic Languages
Australian Aboriginal Languages
Native American Languages

The first article deals with general theories and problems of translation. The second article discusses all ancient versions, except for the Targums, which are the subject of the third article. The remaining articles survey medieval versions and translations into other languages, first English, then groups of languages ordered by continent. Related discussion is found in Circulation of the Bible; Paraphrases; Polyglot Bibles; Septuagint; Vulgate; and Wycliffe Bible Translators.

Theory and Practice

The theory and practice of scripture translation represent three different traditions with distinctive but largely complementary sets of principles. These three primary approaches to translating may be designated as philological, linguistic, and communicative.

The Philological Approach focuses on such features as the author's background, distinctive features of style, literary genres, the history of text transmission, literary criticism, and the manner in which a text has been interpreted through the years. The first Bible translator to deal overtly with these issues was Jerome, who in accordance with the best classical tradition realized that the sense must have priority over the words. This represented a radical departure from the Old Latin practice.

Luther's translation of the Bible into German also broke with tradition and the dominance of the *Vulgate by translating directly from Greek and Hebrew and by using the ordinary words of common people. In the English language, Tyndale likewise insisted that the message of the scriptures should be understood by everyone, and with this intent he produced what later proved to be a major contribution to the King James Version.

The committee that produced the King James Version was especially concerned for the stylistic quality of a text for public reading, and they were surprisingly successful in producing a translation that not only dominated the use of scriptures in English for almost two centuries but greatly influenced the production of early translations by missionaries in Asia, Africa, and the Americas.

The latter part of the nineteenth century and the beginning of the twentieth century were marked by intense interest in archaeological finds and the discovery of many ancient manuscripts, which inevitably led to new insights in interpretation of many biblical passages. The English Revised Version (1885) and the corresponding American Standard Version (1901) represented the best in nineteenth-century biblical scholarship, but the many awkward literalisms in these translations greatly limited their acceptability for English-speaking people.

During this same period certain individual translators produced versions that were stylistically more in line with present-day usage in English, such as Weymouth's New Testament in Modern Speech (1902), Moffatt's The Bible: A New Translation (1928), and Goodspeed's The New Testament: An American Translation (1935). Such translations inevitably influenced the demand for more standard texts that would have a wider range of acceptance, including the Revised Standard Version (1946, 1952), the New English Bible (1970), and the New American Bible (1970). Similar developments occurred in a number of other major languages, for example, La Bible de Jérusalem (1956), Die Einheitsübersetzung (1974), and Nueva Biblia Española (1975).

The Linguistic Approach became an important factor after 1945, when there was a rapid expansion of missionary work in hundreds of minor languages without any written literary tradition or even system of writing. Most missionary translators had little to guide them in formulating alphabets, analyzing complex grammars, determining the meanings of words in quite different cultures, and learning to appreciate some of the remarkable stylistic features of oral literatures.

To determine what could and should be done, the Netherlands Bible Society organized for the United *Bible Societies the first international conference of Bible translators held in Woudschoten, Netherlands, in 1946. The journal The Bible Translator began publication the next year, and this was followed by a number of books: Bible Translating (1947), Toward a Science of Translating (1964), The Theory and Practice of Translation (1969), and From One Language to Another (1986), as well as a series of Translators' Handbooks providing detailed information on exegetical and cultural problems. The Summer Institute of Linguistics, also known as the *Wycliffe Bible Translators, has also published a number of helps for Bible translators.

A major problem in producing revisions or new translations in languages having a long biblical tradition is the change of meaning that has often taken place in words and idioms. For example, most English speakers understand the terms "justify" and "justification" as meaning "using questionable means for making something seem right or correct, even when it is not." Accordingly, some English translations now use expressions such as "to be put right with" or "to make acceptable to." Some of the most creative attempts to express the meaning of the scriptures in present-day language are The New Tes- tament in Modern English (J. B. Phillips, 1958), La Version Popular in Spanish (1979), Today's English Version (1976), Gute Nachricht in German (1982), La Bonne Nouvelle d'Aujourd'hui in French (1982), and The Contemporary English Version (New Testament, 1991).

The linguistic approach to translating may be viewed as a four-phase process: analysis (determining the meaning of the biblical text on the most explicit level), transfer (shifting from the source to the target language on this explicit level), restructuring (reproducing the message on the appropriate language level for the intended audience), and testing (to determine the accuracy and degree of natural equivalence based on readers' responses).

The Communicative Approach to translating (based in large measure on communication theory) has been a natural outgrowth of the linguistic orientation. The key factors in communication are source (for the Bible, both divine and human), message (form and content), receptors (addressees and the wider audience), noise (anything altering the text in the process of transmission, e.g., copyist errors), feedback (how people have reacted to the message), and setting (the original, as well as present-day circumstances of communication). Such an approach to Bible translation depends heavily on insights from cultural anthropology.

The concept of closest natural equivalence has sometimes been discussed in terms of "dynamic equivalence," but unfortunately some have assumed that any dynamic expression can be an equivalence. Accordingly, it is better to speak of "functional equivalence" in order to specify more clearly the relation between an original text and its translation into another language. Interlingual equivalence can never be an absolute or mathematical equivalence. There can, however, be a communicative equivalence, something that is effective in obtaining an appropriate response.

A definition of translation on a maximal level of communicative equivalence may be stated as follows: "The readers of a translation should understand and appreciate the text in essentially the same way as the original audience understood and appreciated it." But since no two cultures or languages are ever identical, a maximal level is unattainable, even though it can be a helpful theoretical goal. The more practical minimal definition of equivalence would be the following: "The readers or hearers of a translation should be able to comprehend how the original readers or hearers of a text must have understood and appreciated it." Bible translating should fall somewhere between these maximal and minimal levels.

The practical implications of these complementary philological, linguistic, and communicative approaches to scripture translation can be readily seen on the three levels of language: words, grammar, and discourse. Translation problems are more conspicuous on the lexical level, because the boundaries of meaning of words and idioms are almost always uncertain and fuzzy. For most speakers of English the term "grace" represents pleasing form or movement, the name of a girl, or a period of time before a bill must be paid. Accordingly, some translations of the Bible employ "kindness" or "goodness" in order to more accurately represent the meaning of the Hebrew and Greek terms traditionally rendered by "*grace."

In some languages relative clauses always precede rather than follow, and many languages have two forms of "we," inclusive and exclusive of the audience, while a number of languages do not specify a subject when it is evident from the context. All such grammatical features require extensive formal adjustments in translating, as is also evident in most present-day renderings of Ephesians 1.3–14, which in Greek is one sentence but in an English translation must normally be broken up into six to ten different sentences.

On the level of discourse some languages require the order of clauses and sentences to follow the historical sequence. This requires considerable restructuring of Mark 6.16–18. A literal rendering of Hebrew poetic parallelism is regarded in some languages as an insult to hearers because it suggests that the people are not intelligent enough to understand the first expression, but in other languages the lack of parallelism is regarded as a serious mistake. Some languages require rhetorical questions to be changed into emphatic statements and indirect discourse to be altered into direct discourse.

Because Bible translations serve quite distinct purposes for different audiences under varying circumstances, most major languages with marked social-class dialects require at least three different kinds of scripture texts: a traditional type of translation to meet the needs of those whose religious experience has been deeply influenced by a particular kind of "holy language"; a common-language translation (a modern koine) representing a relatively narrow overlapping of literary and colloquial usage; and a translation that fully exploits the total resources of a language and in this way does justice to the literary diversities of the Greek and Hebrew texts.

See also Circulation of the Bible.

EUGENE A. NIDA

Ancient Languages

The Hebrew Bible. In antiquity, the Hebrew Bible was translated into Greek (Septuagint [= LXX]), Syriac, Jewish Aramaic (the Targums), and Latin (Vulgate). The earliest of these was into Greek, where no precedent existed for any large-scale translation of a Near Eastern religious text. These ancient versions were to exert an enormous and enduring cultural and linguistic influence, above all in Christianity (though two, and perhaps three, of them began as Jewish undertakings). From them a large number of daughter versions were produced. Since the Septuagint in particular dates from a time prior to the stabilization of the Hebrew text (late first century CE), it serves as an important witness, alongside the biblical manuscripts from Qumran (see Dead Sea Scrolls), to early textual forms of the Hebrew Bible (see Manuscripts, article on Hebrew Bible).

After an initial period of experimentation, "word for word" translation soon came to be regarded as the ideal for biblical texts (whereas literary translations from Greek into Latin were "sense for sense"). This norm, formulated by Jerome, influenced all subsequent translation until the end of the Middle Ages; a different approach only came in during the Reformation, partly as a result of the invention of printing (see Printing and Publishing, article on The Printed Bible).

Greek: The *Septuagint. According to tradition, recorded first in the Letter of Aristeas to Philocrates (late second century BCE) the translation of the Pentateuch into Greek was commissioned by Ptolemy II (282–246); for this purpose an accurate Hebrew manuscript was sent from Jerusalem to Alexandria where the work was undertaken by seventy-two elders from the twelve tribes (rounded off to seventy, whence the term LXX, later extended to cover the entire Greek translation of the Hebrew Bible). Though a direct connection with Ptolemy II is implausible, it is likely that the first group of books to be translated was the *Pentateuch, and that this took place in the early third century BCE in Egypt, probably as a result of the liturgical and educational needs of the large Jewish community there. The translation of other books was carried out piecemeal over the next two centuries and included books of the *Apocrypha whose Hebrew original has been either lost, or recovered in part only in modern times (e.g., *Sirach). The style of translation varies from book to book, and some books (notably 1 Samuel and Jeremiah) were translated from editions of the Hebrew text that differ from those surviving in the *Masoretic text.

Two attitudes developed among Hellenistic Jews with regard to the Greek translation once it had come into existence. Some (probably mainly in Palestine), considering the original translations to be too free, undertook to correct and revise them, bringing them into closer line with the current Hebrew text (itself developing); the culmination of this approach was the ultraliteral version by Aquila (early second century CE). Others (notably *Philo) held that the Greek translators were themselves inspired, and so for them the LXX shared equal authority with the Hebrew (thus obviating any need for correction).

Early Christianity inherited from Hellenistic Judaism both the LXX and Philo's attitude to it; Greek-speaking Jews as a result abandoned the LXX in favor of various revised versions, above all that of Aquila. The resulting differences between Jewish and Christian texts of the Greek Old Testament led Origen to undertake a massive revision of the LXX, bringing it into line with the Hebrew and the Jewish Greek versions, and producing the Hexapla. Although Origen probably intended his revised LXX only for scholarly use, it came to exercise an extensive influence, thanks to its propagation by Eusebius and Pamphilus. Other Christian recensions of the fourth century, attributed to Lucian and Hesychius, were primarily stylistic in character.

The LXX remains to this day the authoritative biblical text of the Greek Orthodox church (see Eastern Orthodoxy and the Bible).

As regards manuscripts of the Septuagint, the earliest fragments, on papyrus, date from the second century BCE. Manuscripts normally contain groups of books, rather than the whole Bible; notable exceptions are three fourth- and fifth-century CE codices, Vaticanus, Alexandrinus, and Sinaiticus (Old Testament and New Testament, all nearly complete, each with slightly different contents). The order of books differs from that of the Hebrew Bible (see Canon).

Syriac: The Peshitta. The origins of the Syriac version are shrouded in uncertainty. As was the case with the LXX, different books were translated at different times (probably first and second centuries CE), and perhaps at different places (Edessa, Nisibis, and Adiabene have been suggested). At least some books were translated by Jews, and there are links with the Targum tradition especially in the Pentateuch; the Targum of Proverbs actually derives from the Peshitta. Although the translators worked basically from the Hebrew, in some books they evidently occasionally consulted the LXX. Apart from some stylistic improvement, there appear to have been no subsequent revisions of the Peshitta text, which is remarkably stable (unlike the LXX where there are many variations between manuscripts). With the exception of Sirach, based on Hebrew, the books of the Apocrypha were translated from Greek.

The Peshitta remains the authoritative biblical text of the Syriac churches (Syrian Orthodox, Church of the East, Maronite). The oldest manuscripts are of fifth and sixth centuries CE; these normally contain groups of books, and only five complete Bibles earlier than the seventeenth century are known, the earliest being Codex Ambrosianus of the sixth/seventh century. The term "Peshitta," meaning "simple," distinguishes this version (made from Hebrew) from the Syrohexapla (made from Greek; see below).

Latin: The *Vulgate. Jerome's earliest biblical translations were made from Origen's revision of the LXX (a few books, notably the Gallican Psalter, survive), but in ca. 393 he boldly turned to the Hebrew original as a better source, and in the course of a dozen years he produced a Latin version that quickly became the standard version of the Western church (hence the term Vulgata), replacing the Old Latin, translated from the LXX. Jerome's undertaking was both remarkable and revolutionary: remarkable in that he achieved a knowledge of Hebrew unique for a Christian at that period (it went well beyond Origen's), revolutionary in that he successfully overthrew the authority of the LXX within the Latin church. Of the many Vulgate manuscripts, the Codex Amiatinus, a complete Bible of the early eighth century, is one of the most important.

Daughter translations. Since LXX, Peshitta, and Vulgate became the official Old Testament texts for the Greek-, Syriac-, and Latin-speaking churches, they became the bases for subsequent translations into many other languages for the use of daughter churches. The most important are:

1. From the Septuagint (in approximate chronological order): Old Latin, Coptic, Ethiopic, Armenian, Georgian, Christian Palestinian Aramaic, Syriac (the Syrohexapla, translated ca. 616 from Origen's revised LXX text), Arabic, and Slavonic. Not all of these are preserved complete.

2. From the Peshitta: Persian and Sogdian (mostly lost), Arabic.

3. From the Vulgate: the medieval western vernacular translations and some of the earlier Reformation translations (see article below on Medieval Versions).

The New Testament. The most important translations of the Greek New Testament are the Latin and the Syriac, both of which go back to the second century CE.

Old Latin. The earliest translations that constitute the Old Latin were probably made in the second half of the second century CE, and perhaps in North Africa rather than Rome. They are of considerable textual interest. The extant manuscripts (mostly fragmentary and some going back to the fourth century) exhibit many variations among themselves, and the version was subject to constant sporadic revision from the Greek. Jerome's revision of the Old Latin New Testament, known as the Vulgate, was completed ca. 384; the gospel text was the most revised. The oldest Vulgate gospel manuscript may belong to the fifth century.

Syriac. The oldest Syriac version is probably the Diatessaron (Gospel Harmony), made by Tatian ca. 160. In Syriac (which may even be its original language), the Diatessaron at first enjoyed wide popularity, but as a result of its suppression in the early fifth century only quotations survive. The subsequent translation of the four Gospels (late second–early third centuries), known as the Old Syriac, survives in two early manuscripts, the Curetonianus and Sinaiticus; the translation was made from an early Greek text form with many "western" features (see Manuscripts, article on New Testament; Textual Criticism). In due course, the rather free translation of the Old Syriac was revised on the basis of an early form of the Koine, or Byzantine, Greek text; this revision, eventually called the Peshitta (to distinguish it from the Harclean), emerged ca. 400 to become the standard New Testament text of the Syriac churches. The Peshitta covers the whole New Testament, apart from 2–3 John, 2 Peter, Jude, and Revelation (none of which formed part of the early Syriac canon). It is preserved in many manuscripts (some of the fifth century), and the text is very stable.

A further revision of the Syriac New Testament was sponsored by Philoxenus of Mabbug in 507/8, but of this only quotations survive (a sixth-century translation of the minor Catholic Epistles and Revelation may also belong). The Philoxenian was itself revised in 616 by Thomas of Harkel, who produced a mirror version of the Greek. Surprisingly, this version, known as the Harclean, was often used for *lectionary purposes. The oldest manuscripts of the Harclean Gospels date to the eighth or even the seventh century.

Other versions. Other ancient versions of the New Testament include translations into Coptic, Gothic, Ethiopic, Armenian, Georgian, Slavonic, and Arabic.

Coptic. The translations into various Coptic dialects were first made in the third or fourth century CE and subsequently revised. Several gospel manuscripts of the fourth century survive.

Gothic. This was made by Ulfilas (fourth century), and the earliest manuscripts date from the sixth century.

Ethiopic. The version probably goes back to the fifth century, but the earliest manuscripts date to about the fourteenth century.

Armenian. The translation is traditionally associated with the patriarchs Mesrop and Sahak (early fifth century); though it was made from Greek, some use may have been made of an earlier translation from Syriac, now lost. The oldest dated manuscripts are of the ninth century.

Georgian. It is not certain whether the original translation, which may go back to the fifth century, was made from Greek, Armenian, or Syriac; subsequently, it was thoroughly revised on the basis of the Greek. The oldest dated manuscripts are of the ninth and tenth centuries, though earlier fragments exist.

Arabic. The earliest translations probably date from the eighth century (some were made from Syriac or Coptic, rather than Greek). The oldest manuscripts are of the ninth century.

Slavonic. The translation goes back to Cyril and Methodius (ninth century). The oldest manuscripts (written in Glagolitic rather than Cyrillic script) are of late tenth/eleventh century.

Several of these translations continue in liturgical use.

S. P. BROCK

Targums

The Targums are interpretive renderings of the books of the Hebrew Bible into *Aramaic; the Aramaic word targûm means "translation" or "interpretation." The origin of Targum as institution is to be traced to the Second Temple period, when Jews living in Palestine and elsewhere in the Near East were no longer familiar with their ancestral tongue, having adopted Aramaic, the official language of the *Persian administration. The Targums cover the whole of the Hebrew Bible, with the exception of the books of *Ezra, *Nehemiah, and *Daniel. In general, their place of origin is Palestine, though in the form in which we have them, Targums Onqelos to the Pentateuch and Jonathan to the Prophets bear signs of substantial revision in Babylonia, where by the second or third century CE they were recognized as "official" Targums. During the same period, the Targum tradition continued to flourish in Palestine, so that there are extant two complete Palestinian Targums to the Pentateuch (Neofiti and Pseudo-Jonathan) and a substantial number of fragments representing other Palestinian Pentateuchal Targums (or, as some would have it, other versions of the one Palestinian Targum). In addition to the "Babylonianized" Targum to the Prophets, there are in later writings many references to and quotations from a "Jerusalem" Targum to the Prophets, but whether these point to the existence at one time of a complete Palestinian version is debatable. The *Dead Sea Scrolls include substantial fragments of a Targum to the book of *Job, in a version significantly different from that already known. There are also small fragments of a Targum to Leviticus.

Talmudic tradition traces the institution of Targum to the occasion described in Nehemiah 8.8 when the law of Moses was read "with interpretation" so that the assembled congregation might understand. Whether or not translation into Aramaic was involved, the need for such a provision in *synagogues will have become apparent at an early stage. The *Mishnah (ca. 200 CE) lays down rules in connection with the reading and translation of scripture in the synagogue; these include a ban on written Targum texts, evidently lest the authority of the original be compromised. Thus, the developing Targum corpus owed much to synagogal traditions of interpretation, but depended for its literary crystallization and transmission upon other means of support. Some evidence points to the Jewish schools, which often shared buildings and personnel with the synagogue, as the preservers of this written Targum tradition.

All translations of the Bible are necessarily interpretive to a degree, but the Targums differ in that they are interpretive as a matter of policy, and often to an extent that far exceeds the bounds of "translation" or even "paraphrase." Even the "Babylonian" Targums, which over long stretches give the appearance of being fairly literal, often compress in a word or short phrase an allusion to a tradition of interpretation represented elsewhere in rabbinic (usually Talmudic or Midrashic) literature. At those points in the Pentateuch and the historical books where prose gives way to poetry (e.g., Gen. 49; Deut. 32; 33; Judg. 5; 1 Sam. 2) the Targums tend to be more expansive and more pronouncedly "targumic" in the doctrines and views they superimpose upon the biblical text. Basically, the Targums set themselves to inculcate reverence for God (witness the frequent introduction of the mêmrā ["Word"] of God to avoid any derogation of the truth of divine transcendence); to resolve discrepancies in the sacred text; to contemporize in matters of geography, law, or theology; and to promote teachings beloved of rabbinic authorities but not necessarily present in the biblical text or not as prominent as was wished (e.g., *prayer, meritorious deeds, messianism, resurrection). The tone is often moralistic and the intention obviously pedagogical, as would befit either a synagogal or school constituency. Another feature characteristic of the Targums perhaps more than of any other Bible translation ancient or modern is their reliance upon a number of stock words and expressions that are especially likely to occur where the underlying Hebrew text is obscure. Words like "strong," "strength," "destroy," and "plunder" are very common and often have been the basis of reconstructed readings of the Hebrew text where no such variant readings actually existed. Recurrent expressions like "the rich in possessions" or "cause the Shekinah to dwell" may likewise be translational ciphers, as well as having sociological or theological significance in inner Targumic terms.

There is an extensive literature on the contribution of the Targums to the understanding of the New Testament. The extent of such influence can easily be exaggerated, and the theory has depended to a considerable extent upon the assumption of an early (not later than the first century CE) date of origin for the Palestinian Targum(s) to the Pentateuch in particular. It is not possible, however, to date the Targums with any such degree of precision; the extant texts are probably best viewed as the product of several centuries of development. Thus the grounds for distinguishing between the Targums and other types of rabbinic literature as potential sources of light on the New Testament are questionable. There are nevertheless occasional points of contact, such as Mark 4.12 where "and be forgiven" interprets the reference to healing in Isaiah 6.10 exactly as does the Targum. Similarly, the exposition of Psalm 68.18 in Ephesians 4.8 reflects an interpretation that is represented in Targum but is scarcely deducible from the standard Hebrew text.

See also Interpretation, History of, article on Jewish Interpretation. ROBERT P. GORDON

Medieval Versions

Latin was the universal language of learning in the West during the Middle Ages, and the principal version of the Bible was the Latin *Vulgate. Yet the common people of the period were not limited to the art and drama of the church, or to homilies and mystery plays, for a knowledge of the Bible in their vernaculars. Educational and devotional needs both of monastic schools and of the laity were served by the glossing of Latin texts. The first books to be glossed or translated were usually the Psalter, the Gospels, and some Old Testament narratives. Before the fourteenth century, complete Testaments were rare, but by the middle of the fifteenth century, when the art of printing from movable type was developed, vernacular versions of the Bible were no longer uncommon. These were generally not translations of the Bible in the modern critical sense, but were either extremely literal or free renderings, frequently paraphrased or expanded with explanations for the reader. The stages of this development in several major European languages are reviewed in the following paragraphs in alphabetical order.

Dutch. The earliest surviving fragment of the scriptures in a Dutch vernacular version is of a paraphrase of the Psalms that dates from the early part of the tenth century. In the twelfth century, the religious revival of the Beguines and the Beghards in the Netherlands and Belgium, which subsequently spread to Germany and France, led to other biblical translations. The Liège Diatessaron, a vernacular translation of Tatian's harmony, was one of the earliest biblical translations in Dutch. It has been compared with Luther's German version for its vigorous idiomatic quality. Other Dutch translations include the book of Revelation in West Flemish (ca. 1280), a Southern Dutch Psalter, and by 1300 the New Testament Gospels and Epistles. In 1271 the poet Jacob van Maerlant published his Rijmbijbel, a free translation that was based on Comestor's Historia scholastica and enjoyed considerable popularity. While paraphrases and adaptations continued to appear, the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries showed an increasing demand for more precise biblical versions, with comments and additions clearly distinguished from the biblical text.

English. The earliest surviving examples of Old English literature are the poetic paraphrases attributed by tradition to Caedmon, the seventh-century cowherd, who sang of the creation of the world, the wanderings of the Israelites, and of the gospel stories he learned from the monks of Whitby. This school of poetry survived to the tenth century. King Alfred's (849–899) educational policies and monastic reforms undoubtedly did much to promote the status of the vernacular as well as the level of learning among the clergy. The ninth-century Vespasian Psalter, the earliest known English gloss on a biblical text, was followed by the continuous gloss by Aldred in the Lindisfarne Gospels (ca. 950). The Rushworth Gloss (ca. 975), based in part on the Lindisfarne gloss, is in a continuous prose form and is probably the earliest surviving example of English biblical translation. Although Aelfric (955–1020), the most important English biblical writer before Wycliffe, wrote homilies, Lives of the Saints, and a free rendering of the Heptateuch, he remained a biblical expositor and not a translator. An anonymous contemporary produced the West-Saxon Gospels, a literal but readable translation of the four Gospels.

With the Norman conquest, a new Anglo-Norman vernacular developed with a more sophisticated literature. From the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, several versions of the Psalter and a number of passion narratives are known. The medieval Latin Psalter had three forms: the Vulgate, or Old Latin text based on the Greek Septuagint, the Roman revision of it by Jerome, and Jerome's fresh translation made from the Hebrew. The Eadwine Psalter (ca. 1160) contained all three, accompanying the Vulgate with the glossa ordinaria, the Roman with an interlinear Old English gloss, and the Hebrew with an interlinear Old French gloss. But the homily cycles and biblical versifications of the period (especially the Cursor mundi) reflect a general withdrawal from direct biblical study and an increased dependence on scholastic theology, especially the Glossa ordinaria and the theological schemes of Peter Comestor's Historia scholastica, a digest of biblical history.

In the fourteenth century, when the Franciscan emphasis on spiritual activity gave rise to a demand among lay contemplatives for vernacular scriptures as a guide and ground for private mystical experience, the English Psalter of Richard Rolle (1300–1349) proved the vernacular an adequate medium of religious expression. Several decades later (about 1382), the Lollard John Wycliffe (1329–1384) and his colleagues at Oxford began work on the first complete translation of the Bible from the Latin Vulgate into English. The first form of the translation was a quite literal rendering of the Latin Vulgate, and it was soon revised to conform more nearly to idiomatic English usage. In 1407, Archbishop Arundel issued a "constitution" against Lollardy, condemning the private translation of scripture "into English or any other language," and specifically forbidding the use of any translation associated with Wycliffe under pain of excommunication. The popularity of the version, however, may be gauged from the fact that nearly two hundred copies of it have survived.

French. In the twelfth century, the Psalter was widely known in a very literal French vernacular gloss; it is found in a continuous form in the Montebourg Psalter and the Arundel Psalter, among others. Not until the Metz Psalter (ca. 1300) and the Psalter of Raoul de Presles (ca. 1380) does the gloss become more idiomatic in its syntax and vocabulary. In contrast, there was a late-twelfth-century prose version of Samuel and Kings in an excellent style, though quite free and with considerable commentary added to the biblical text. In Provence, the followers of Peter Waldo (d. 1217), who claimed the scriptures as their sole rule of life and faith, translated the Psalms and other books of the Old Testament and the complete New Testament into Provençal by the early thirteenth century. Pope Innocent III attempted to suppress the movement, but their influence was felt not only in France but also in the Netherlands and Germany and in Italy. Vernacular translations of Judges and other books were being made, and by the mid-thirteenth century, compilations of these were assembled and illuminated for wealthy patrons and royalty—examples are the Acre Bible of Saint Louis (1250–1254), which contained over a dozen Old Testament books (including the earliest vernacular version of Job in a European language), and the De Thou Bible (ca. 1280), with a different selection of Old Testament books and parts of the New Testament (Gospels, Acts, and Catholic Epistles). The complete thirteenth-century French vernacular of the whole Bible survives in very few copies (British Library, Pierpont Morgan Library, Chantilly). It was a compilation, uneven in its glossing, its style, and its quality; but the translation movement it inaugurated climaxed in the Biblia historiale (1291–1295) of Guyart des Moulins. This expanded translation of Comestor's Historia scholastica incorporated versions of many biblical books and developed into a veritable medieval biblical encyclopedia. It appeared in many editions, and was both abridged and revised. The Renaissance scholar Jacques Lefèvre d'Etaples, who published the first printed French Bible in 1530, made use of the text of the Biblia historiale, revising it literally and eliminating its medieval glosses.

German. Apart from fragments of a Gothic version of the scriptures, translated by Ulfilas in the second half of the fourth century and probably revised under Latin influences during the next two centuries, Germanic theological literature dates from the Carolingian Renaissance. Fragments of the gospel of Matthew written in the Bavarian dialect and surviving in an eighth-century manuscript written at the monastery of Monsee, near Salzburg, have been associated with Charlemagne's reputed concern that Latin works be translated into the German vernacular. In the reign of his successor, Louis the Pious, an East Frankish dialect version of Tatian's Diatessaron was made at Fulda about 830, written together with its Latin base in parallel columns, but it was so literal a translation as to be nearly interlinear in character. The contemporary versified Old Saxon epic Heliand ("Savior") of about six thousand alliterative lines was also based on the Diatessaron, freely combined with material from commentaries, apocrypha, and legend. The Liber evangeliorum of Otfrid of Weissenberg in Alsace was based on gospel lessons from a *lectionary and written in South Rhine Frankish; it expanded the lectionary lessons liberally, adding whole chapters of commentary to them. Notker Labeo (950–1022), one of the founders of German vernacular literature, translated the Psalter, adding the Latin text, a German translation, and a German commentary in sequential rather than interlinear arrangement. The paraphrase of the Vulgate Song of Songs by Williram of Ebersburg (ca. 1060), arranged in parallel columns of Latin hexameters and a German prose rendering mixed with Latin, was remarkably popular and was copied and emulated through the fifteenth century.

By the end of the fourteenth century, German possessed a complete vernacular New Testament (1350, "Augsburg Bible") and Old Testament (ca. 1389–1400, "Wenzel Bible"). The Codex Teplensis (ca. 1400), a New Testament written in Bohemia, may reflect Waldensian associations. Opposition to the vernacular scriptures was not altogether lacking. In 1369, Charles IV issued an edict prohibiting the translation of religious books, and a papal rescript in 1375 forbade vernacular scriptures in Germany. Although the tide of scripture circulation could not be stemmed, creative efforts were discouraged, and the first printed German Bible, published by Mentel in 1466, still reflected the language and translation techniques of the early fourteenth century.

Italian. In Italy, vernacular translations of the Gospels and the Psalter may have existed by the mid-thirteenth century if not earlier, and of the entire Bible in the fourteenth century, though the earliest biblical manuscripts are from the fourteenth century, and the earliest surviving complete Bible is from the fifteenth century. Almost invariably these versions were in the Tuscan dialect, made from Latin, usually from the Vulgate text. The Gospels were mostly harmonies based on the Latin translation of Tatian's Diatessaron found in the Codex Fuldensis, but a freely glossed Venetian version of the Gospels has survived based on an earlier form of the Latin Diatessaron. A Venetian version of the Psalter is also known. There is evidence of a thirteenth-century Jewish-Italian version of substantial parts of the Hebrew Bible preserved in manuscripts of the fifteenth or sixteenth century written in Hebrew characters. Vernacular biblical translations otherwise show dependence on the Latin Vulgate text current in southern France in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries and traces of contact with French and Provençal translations. Although they may originally have been the work of Waldensians, they were adopted by the Dominicans and Franciscans and freely glossed for doctrinal instruction. It is interesting that Dante (1265–1321), when referring to the scripture versions, never mentions any in Italian, and that when he cites the scriptures he makes his own translation from the Vulgate. The first printed Italian Bible, attributed to the Venetian monk Nicolo Malermi, was essentially a compilation of fourteenth-century Tuscan texts adapted to Venetian usage.

Spanish. The existence of Spanish vernacular texts in the early thirteenth century need not be inferred from the edict issued by Juan I of Aragon at the Council of Tarragona in 1233 forbidding the possession of a vernacular Bible by anyone, cleric or lay: this edict simply repeats a similar decree of the Council of Toulouse in 1229 directed against the Albigensians. Alfonso X of Castille (1221–1284) is said to have authorized a vernacular translation of the Bible in the 1270s as part of a Grande e general estoria, designed as an expanded and monumental Bible historiale. In its execution some portions were literal translations of the Vulgate while others were freely paraphrased, with commentary drawn from both Christian and non-Christian sources. The fourteen extant biblical manuscripts, mostly from the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, reflect a varied and complex tradition of translation. The Osuna Bible is patterned after the French Bibles moralisées illustrées. Many translations of the Hebrew Bible were based not on the Latin Vulgate but on the Hebrew *Masoretic Text, observing the Hebrew *canonical arrangement of the Law, followed by the Former and Latter Prophets, yet preserving reminiscences of the Vulgate. The Alba Bible, commissioned in 1422 by Luis de Guzman and completed in 1433, included a fresh version of the Hebrew Bible made from the Hebrew by Rabbi Moses Arragel, and is remarkable for combining Jewish and Christian exegetical lore in its commentary. Scripture versions in Catalan are known from references in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, but the earliest surviving copies are from the fifteenth century. ERROLL F. RHODES

English Language

Beginnings. As was the case with other languages, the translation of the scriptures into English was at first an oral process. The Venerable Bede tells how Caedmon (seventh century CE) retold Bible stories in alliterative verses in Anglo-Saxon: "He sang of the world's creation, the origin of the human race, and all the story of Genesis; he sang of Israel's Exodus from Egypt and entry into the promised land, of very many other stories from Holy Writ, of our Lord's incarnation, passion, resurrection, and ascension into heaven, of the coming of the Holy Spirit and the apostles' teaching."

Bede himself (d. 735) is said to have translated the gospel of John into Anglo-Saxon, which may be the earliest written translation in English of any portion of the Bible. Alfred the Great (reigned 871–901) is credited with having translated part of the *Ten Commandments and other passages from Exodus 21–23. The Lindisfarne Gospels are interlinear glosses written in the Northumbrian dialect around 950 on a seventh-century Latin manuscript. The Wessex Gospels, a tenth-century translation into West Saxon, is the earliest extant Old English version of the Gospels.

The first complete translation of the Bible into English (1382; New Testament 1380) is credited to John Wycliffe (Wyclif) (ca. 1330–84). His translation work was part of his larger task of reforming the church, for which he earned the title "Morning Star of the Reformation." It was his contention that the church could be reformed only if everyone knew God's law, and this required that the Bible be translated into the language of the people. Said Wycliffe: "No man was so rude a scholar but that he might learn the Gospel according to its simplicity." There are two Wycliffite versions, the second of which appeared after Wycliffe's death. It is uncertain how much of either version is the work of Wycliffe himself and how much is the work of his colleagues, John Purvey and Nicholas of Hereford. Although the later version is more idiomatic than the earlier one, the Wycliffe Bible is almost a word-for-word equivalent of the Vulgate. For 150 years this was the only Bible in English, and some 107 manuscript copies have survived. In 1415 the Wycliffe Bible was condemned and burned. Purvey and Nicholas were jailed and forced to recant their Lollard principles; and in 1428 Wycliffe's body was exhumed and burned. The earliest printed edition of Wycliffe's New Testament was published in 160 copies at London in 1731; the first printed edition of the complete Wycliffite version was issued at Oxford in 1850.

Tyndale and His Successors. William Tyndale, "the Father of the English Bible," was born (1494?) in Gloucestershire and educated at Oxford (B.A. 1512, M.A. 1515), and at Cambridge, where he may have studied Greek. As chaplain and tutor in the household of Sir John Walsh, he got into debates with various clergy and other "learned men," and was soon accused of espousing heretical ideas. His opponent in one dispute argued that Christians were better off without God's law (the scriptures) than without the Pope's laws (Canon Law), to which Tyndale replied, "If God spare my life, ere many yeares I wyl cause a boye that dryveth the plough shall know more of the scripture than thou doest!"

Unable to get authorization in England to produce his translation, Tyndale went to the Continent (April or May 1524), staying in Wittenberg for almost a year, after which he moved to Hamburg and finally to Cologne (August 1525). There he gave his translation to Peter Quentel, a printer, but the city senate forbade the printing. Tyndale got the printed sheets, went up the Rhine to Worms, and toward the end of February 1526 the complete New Testament was published. About a month later copies began to appear in England.

Tyndale's translation was the first printed New Testament in English and was also the first English New Testament translated from the original Greek. About eighteen thousand copies of the original 1526 edition and the revisions of 1534 and 1535 were printed, of which only two are known to survive. Cuthbert Tunstall, Bishop of London, bought copies in great numbers and burned them publicly, and Sir Thomas More, the Lord High Chancellor, published a Dialogue in which he denounced Tyndale's translation as "not worthy to be called Christ's testament, but either Tyndale's own testament or the testament of his master Antichrist."

Tyndale next began the work of translating the Hebrew Bible: the Pentateuch was published in 1530, and Jonah in 1531. During this time he was living in Antwerp, and many attempts were made to lure him back to England. He was betrayed on 21 May 1535, arrested by agents of Emperor Charles V, and taken to Vilvorde, six miles north of Brussels, where he was imprisoned in a fortress. In August 1536 he was tried, found guilty of heresy, and turned over to the secular power for execution. On 6 October 1536, he was strangled and burned at the stake. According to John Foxe his last words were, "Lord, open the King of England's eyes!"

Before Tyndale's death a complete English Bible, dedicated to Henry VIII, was edited by Miles Coverdale and published on the continent in 1535. The New Testament was essentially a revision of Tyndale's New Testament, and his translation of portions of the Old Testament was used. The first authorized Bible was published in 1537, the so-called Thomas Matthew Bible, edited by John Rogers, a friend of Tyndale. The New Testament and Pentateuch were Tyndale's, and his manuscripts of Joshua through 2 Chronicles were used. In 1539 Richard Taverner, a lawyer, published a revision of the Matthew Bible, the first to be completely printed in England. Coverdale's revision of the Matthew Bible, known as the Great Bible (its pages measured 23 × 38 cm [9 × 15 in]), was printed in Paris in 1539 and was enthusiastically received by Tunstall, now bishop of Durham.

In the reign of Queen Mary (1553–1558) all printing of English Bibles in England was stopped, and the English Bible could not be used in church services. Many Protestant leaders sought refuge on the Continent. William Whittingham, pastor of the English Church in Geneva, translated the New Testament (published 1557) and served as editor of the Old Testament translation; the Geneva Bible of 1560 was dedicated to Queen Elizabeth (whose reign began in 1558). It was printed in roman type, bound in small octavo size, and was the first English Bible to have verse numbers. It became immensely popular: it was the Bible of Shakespeare and Bunyan, of the pilgrims to the New World and the Mayflower Compact, of Oliver Cromwell and his army. It was the first Bible published in Scotland (1579) and was dedicated to James VI, King of Scotland. Over 150 editions were published, and it remained popular for nearly a hundred years. Its extremely Protestant notes were offensive to the bishops, and in 1568 a revision of the Great Bible was published, which became known as the Bishops' Bible, owing to the great number of bishops on the committee. In 1570 the Convocation of Canterbury ordered it to be placed in all cathedrals, and so it became the second Authorized Version. It ran through twenty editions before 1606, but did not replace the Geneva Bible in popular esteem.

The King James Version (KJV) and Its Revisions. When James VI of Scotland ascended to the throne of England in 1603 as James I, there were two competing Bibles: the Bishops' Bible, preferred by the church authorities, and the Geneva Bible, the favorite of the people.

At a conference of theologians and churchmen at Hampton Court in January 1604, called by King James "for the hearing, and for the determining, things pretended to be amiss in the Church," the Puritan leader John Reynolds proposed that a new translation be made, which would replace the two Bibles. The king approved of the plan and on 10 February he ordered that "a translation be made of the whole Bible, as consonant as can be to the original Hebrew and Greek, and this is to be set out and printed without any marginal notes and only to be used in all Churches of England in time of Divine Service." Fifty-four "learned men" were divided into six panels: three for the Old Testament, two for the New Testament, and one for the Apocrypha. They began their work in 1606, meeting at Oxford, Cambridge, and Westminster Abbey. A list of fifteen rules to guide the translation was drawn up, the first of which was, "The ordinary Bible read in the Church, commonly called the Bishops' Bible, to be followed, and as little altered as the truth of the original will permit." Rule fourteen listed the translations that could be followed "when they agree better with the Text than the Bishops' Bible": Tyndale, Matthew, Coverdale, Whitchurch [that is, the Great Bible], and Geneva.

The translation was published in 1611 and rapidly went through several editions, nearly all of which had changes in the text. The edition of 1614, for example, differs from the original in over four hundred places. The most careful and comprehensive revision was made in 1769 by Dr. Benjamin Blayney of Oxford, who worked for nearly four years on the task. Although never formally authorized by King or Parliament, it became known as "the Authorized Version."

It took some forty years before the 1611 Bible replaced the Geneva Bible in the affection of the people. But once established it became the Bible of the English-speaking people. In its various forms and editions it continues to be one of the most widely read Bibles in English.

In 1870, the Church of England authorized a revision of the King James Bible. The work was entrusted to fifty scholars, most of whom were Anglicans, but it included Baptists, Congregationalists, Methodists, Presbyterians, and one Unitarian. They were divided into two companies for the revision of the two Testaments. Of the eight rules drawn up to guide their work, the first specified that changes were to be made only if required by the need to be faithful to the original text. American scholars were invited to participate, by correspondence, with the proviso that an American edition not be published until fourteen years after the publication of the British edition.

The work was done carefully, and in the New Testament alone about thirty thousand changes were made, over five thousand of them on the basis of a better Greek text. The New Testament was published in May 1881 and was enthusiastically received. In the first year three million copies of the New Testament were sold in Great Britain and the United States. In 1885 the complete Revised Version appeared, with an appendix that listed the changes preferred by the American scholars. The Apocrypha appeared in 1895. In 1901 the Americans published their edition, the American Standard Edition of the Revised Version, popularly known as the American Standard Version. It removed many archaisms, replaced a large number of obsolescent words, and substituted American English terminology for words and expressions peculiarly British.

Rheims-Douai Bible. While not conceding the right of the laity to read the Bible in the vernacular without ecclesiastical sanction, Roman Catholic authorities felt the need for an officially approved English version for Catholics. In 1565, William Allen, a fellow of Oriel College, Oxford, like many other Roman Catholics, was forced to leave England. In Douai, Flanders, he founded a college for the purpose of training priests who would eventually go to England, and it was there that the translation of the Bible from the Latin *Vulgate was begun. In 1578, the college moved to Rheims, where the New Testament was completed in 1582; eventually the college returned to Douai, and the Old Testament was published there in 1609–10. In 1738 Bishop Challoner of London assisted in a thorough revision of the New Testament and made extensive revisions of the whole Bible in his 1749–52 editions. The Challoner revision of the Rheims-Douai Bible was authorized for use in the United States in 1810.

Translations Independent of the KJV. Many Bibles and more than 250 translations of the New Testament in English have appeared since 1611. Robert Young, an Edinburgh bookseller who is famous for his Analytical Concordance to the Bible, in 1862 published a literal translation of the Bible, which is practically a word-for-word equivalent of the original. In the United States Charles Thomson, Secretary of the Continental Congress, translated the Greek Septuagint and the New Testament after retiring at the age of sixty from politics and business. After almost twenty years' work his translation was published in 1808. Thomson holds the distinction of having made the first English translation of the Septuagint and of having produced the first English New Testament to be translated and published in America. Ferrar Fenton, an English businessman, published his translation of the Bible in 1903 (New Testament 1895). He claimed it was the most accurate translation ever made, "not only in words, but in editing, spirit, and sense." It enjoyed considerable success, and as late as 1944 a new edition was published. In 1876 Julia E. Smith, an American, produced a translation of the whole Bible, in which she attempted to use one and the same English word or phrase for every Hebrew and Greek word. One odd principle she followed was that of rendering the imperfect tense of the Hebrew verbs by the future tense in English, even in the account of creation. Genesis 1.3 reads: "And God will say there shall be light, and there will be light." In 1885 Helen Spurrel, of London, translated the Hebrew Bible. She began her study of Hebrew after turning fifty, and in her translation she kept to the unpointed consonantal text, disregarding the vowel points of the Masoretic text.

Modern Translations. The modern era of Bible translation into English began with the Twentieth Century New Testament, which was first issued as a tentative edition in separate parts in 1898–1901 and appeared in its definitive form in 1904. The translators, mostly laywomen and laymen, included Anglicans, Methodists, Congregationalists, Presbyterians, and Baptists. The project was begun through the efforts of Mary K. Higgs, the wife of a Congregational minister, and Mr. Ernest Malan, a signal and telegraph engineer, both of whom were troubled by the fact that the language of the KJV was so difficult for young people to understand. One of their advisors was Richard Francis Weymouth, a classical scholar, fellow of University College, London; his New Testament in Modern Speech was published posthumously in 1902. His purpose was to produce a translation that lay people could understand. "Alas, the great majority of even 'new translations,' so called, are in reality only Tyndale's immortal work a little—and often very little—modernized!" He intended his translation to be used for private reading, not for public worship.

The translation that made the greatest impact upon the Bible-reading public, though, was that of the Scottish scholar James Moffatt. He began with a rendering included in his textbook, The Historical New Testament (1901), and in 1913 published The New Testament: A New Translation. His translation of the Old Testament appeared in 1924 and the whole Bible was revised in 1935. He spent the last years of his life as Professor of Church History at Union Theological Seminary, New York, and at the time of his death (1944) he was working on a translation of the Apocrypha.

Edgar J. Goodspeed, of the University of Chicago, answered the long-felt need for a New Testament in American English. "For American readers . . . who have had to depend so long upon versions made in Great Britain," he wrote, "there is room for a New Testament free from expressions which . . . are strange to American ears." His New Testament, An American Translation appeared in 1923. In 1927 a group of scholars headed by J. M. Powis Smith produced a translation of the Old Testament, which in 1935 was published with Goodspeed's New Testament as The Bible, An American Translation. In 1938 Goodspeed translated the Apocrypha, and The Complete Bible: An American Translation appeared in 1939.

Two important translations of the New Testament in the twentieth century are those of J. B. Phillips and William Barclay. As rector of a church in London, Phillips first translated Paul's epistles into modern English under the title Letters to Young Churches (1947). Eventually, his complete New Testament appeared, The New Testament in Modern English (1958). In 1972, Phillips brought out a thoroughly revised second edition. All translators of the Bible into modern English owe an incalculable debt to Phillips. For clarity of thought, vividness of language, and imaginative use of figures, he is rarely equaled and never surpassed. Professor Barclay's The New Testament: A New Translation (two vols., 1968, 1969) is more traditional in language, but embodies a wealth of scholarship from which all readers can profit. Mention should also be made of Hugh J. Schonfield's Authentic New Testament (1955), which was reissued, with very few changes in the text, in 1985 under the title Original New Testament. Schonfield's translation claims to be the first one made into English by a Jew. The footnotes, with a wealth of information for the careful reader, are the best feature of his work.

In 1961, the Jehovah's Witnesses (Watch Tower Bible and Tract Society) published a translation of the Bible under the title New World Translation of the Holy Scriptures, which reflects the unitarian bias of the Witnesses, most vividly displayed in John 1.1, "and the Word was a god." In 1972, the Watch Tower Bible and Tract Society posthumously published a translation by Steven T. Byington, mainly, it appears, because Byington used *Jehovah as the proper name of God.

An attempt to make the English text accessible to all who speak or read English was made in The New Testament in Basic English (1941). The term "basic" is an acronym for "British American Scientific International Commercial" (English), which consists of a vocabulary of 850 words compiled by the linguist C. K. Ogden as an international auxiliary language and as an aid in learning English. A committee chaired by S. H. Hooke, of the University of London, used this vocabulary with the addition of another hundred words, plus fifty special Bible words. The complete Bible appeared in 1949.

The latest Bible in the Tyndale–King James tradition is the Revised Standard Version. In 1937, the International Council of Religious Education authorized a revision of the American Standard Version, stating that it should "embody the best results of modern scholarship as to the meaning of the scriptures, and express this meaning in English diction which is designed for use in public and private worship and preserves those qualities which have given to the King James Version a supreme place in English literature." The work was done by thirty scholars, headed by Luther A. Weigle. The New Testament appeared in 1946, the Old Testament in 1952, and the Apocrypha in 1957. In 1977 an "Expanded Edition" appeared, which included not only the Roman Catholic deuterocanonical books, but also 3 and 4 Maccabees and Psalm 151, thus making it acceptable to Eastern Orthodox churches. The New Revised Standard Version (NRSV), published in 1990, is a model of what a revision of an existing translation should be. In matters of text, exegesis, and language it goes a long way toward becoming the Bible of English-speaking readers for generations to come. It has dropped archaic terms and obsolete language, including the pronouns and verb forms used in addressing God. With notable success it has tackled the difficult task of making the English text inclusive where the original is not exclusive. The revisers did their work remarkably well; at times, however, one wishes that in the application of their guiding maxim "as literal as possible, as free as necessary," they had more often favored freedom over literalism.

The New King James Bible (1982), falsely claiming to be "the first major revision of the KJV since 1867," aims to maintain the supremacy of the KJV as the Bible of conservative Protestants.

What may justly be called a landmark in Bible translation was achieved with the publication, in 1970, of the New English Bible (NEB; New Testament 1961). Representing nearly all major Christian denominations in Great Britain and Ireland, this translation broke away completely from the Tyndale–King James tradition. As explained by the Chairman, Prof. C. H. Dodd, in the introduction to the New Testament: "We have conceived our task to be that of understanding the original as precisely as we could (using all available aids), and then saying again in our own native idiom what we believed the author to be saying in his." Using all resources of the English language, the translators produced an English Bible whose language is fresh and natural, but not slangy or undignified. Passage after passage may be read with pleasure and profit. At times the vocabulary is a bit too British for Americans, and many of its textual decisions, especially in the Hebrew Bible, have been criticized as idiosyncratic. The Revised English Bible (REB) was published in 1989 with the aim of providing a translation that would be even more faithful and understandable. In textual matters the revision is considerably more conservative than the original NEB, especially in the Old Testament. The same conservative restraint is detectable in exegetical and linguistic decisions. The NEB rendering of Genesis 1.1 was fresh and vivid; the REB rendering is hardly distinguishable from that of the King James version. The delicate and frustrating task of trying to make the English text inclusive seems not to have ranked as high with the revisers as it did with the revisers of the NRSV. In comparison with the stunning achievement of the NEB in 1970, the 1989 revision is a disappointment.

In 1966 Good News for Modern Man (the New Testament in Today's English) was published by the American Bible Society. Its main features were the use of "common language," easily accessible to all who read English, whether as their own tongue or as an acquired language, and the systematic application of the principles of "dynamic equivalence" translation (as opposed to "formal equivalence"). The translator, Robert G. Bratcher, was assisted in his task by a panel of specialists. One novel feature of this translation was the imaginative line-drawings by the Swiss artist, Annie Vallotton. A committee of seven translated the Hebrew Bible, and the Good News Bible was published in 1976. The deuterocanonical books (Apocrypha) were added in 1979.

When the Revised Standard Version was published in 1952, it was received not only with appreciation and gratitude but also with bitter criticism and condemnation, especially from conservative Protestants. Because of its sponsorship by the National Council of Churches, this Bible was seen by some as tainted by liberal, if not heretical, beliefs. It was even said that the translation committee included Communist sympathizers. Conservatives felt a strong need for a modern translation that they could trust. Several appeared, among them The Amplified Bible (1965) and The Modern Language Bible (The New Berkeley Version) in 1969 (New Testament 1945). In 1971 the New American Standard Bible was offered (New Testament 1963), intending to preserve and perpetuate the American Standard Version as the most faithful Bible translation in English. All were well received, but none achieved the status of the Bible acceptable to a majority of conservative Protestants, most of whom were still using the KJV. (For The Living Bible, see Paraphrases.) Finally in 1978 the New International Version was published (New Testament 1973), the culmination of a process that had begun in 1956–1957. The intense advertisement campaign focused on the trustworthiness of the translators, all of whom, it was claimed, had "a high view of Scripture," believing that the Bible, in its entirety, "is the Word of God written and is therefore inerrant in the autographs." In its various editions this Bible is now widely used, and bids fair to become the Bible for those who still view the RSV (and other modern translations) with suspicion.

Roman Catholic Translations. Roman Catholics have produced their share of modern translations. In 1955 Monsignor Ronald Knox, of Great Britain, published a translation of the Bible from the Latin Vulgate, "in the light of the Hebrew and Greek originals." It was a remarkable tour de force and may possibly be the last translation of the Bible into English made by one individual. In 1966, the English version of La Bible de Jérusalem (one-volume edition) was published under the title The Jerusalem Bible; a revised edition, The New Jerusalem Bible, based on the 1973 revised French edition, appeared in 1985. American Roman Catholics began a fresh translation of the Vulgate in 1937, and in 1941 the New Testament was printed. Work was being done on the Old Testament, but with the publication in 1942 of the encyclical Divino afflante spiritu, authorizing vernacular translations made directly from the original Hebrew, Aramaic, and Greek texts, the translation was begun anew, and in 1970 The New American Bible was published, the first English Bible translated directly from the original texts by American Catholic scholars. The first step for producing a revision of this translation was taken in 1989 with the publication of the revised edition of the New Testament. One of its main purposes was to eliminate exclusive language in passages that are not exclusive in the original text. Somewhat ingenuously, however, the revisers claim that "brothers," which is retained, still has its inclusive sense. Of greater significance is the deliberate return to the principle of formal equivalence in translation, in place of dynamic equivalence. So now Jesus says "Amen, amen, I say to you" (John 3.3) and the obsolete "behold" is found. After the bold step forward in 1970, this revision represents a timorous step backward.

Jewish Translations. One of the earliest Jewish translations of the Pentateuch into English (1785) was the work of Alexander Alexander, of Great Britain. In 1861, Abraham Benisch published a translation of the Hebrew Bible that was called Jewish School and Family Bible, and in 1881 the translation by Michael Friedlander, also of England, was published. In the United States the earliest translation of the Hebrew Bible was done by Isaac Leeser (1854), which became the accepted version in all synagogues in the United States; a revised edition was published in London in 1865. Under the sponsorship of the Jewish Publication Society of America, a group of Jewish scholars headed by Marcus Jastrow produced a new translation, which became known as the Jewish Publication Society Bible (1917). This translation became the standard Bible of the American Jewish community until the appearance of what is known as the New Jewish Version, which was published in stages. A committee headed by Harry M. Orlinsky translated the Torah (1962); the final volume, The Writings, appeared in 1981. The complete translation, under the title Tanakh, was published in one volume in 1985.

At no other time in history have English-speaking people had such a variety of good translations of the Jewish and Christian scriptures, and those who care to read them will be able clearly to see "the process, order, and meaning of the text," in fulfillment of Tyndale's fervent desire.

See also Paraphrases. ROBERT G. BRATCHER

Modern European Languages

Modern versions of the Bible date from the Renaissance and the Reformation, when humanistic studies brought a fresh appreciation of the Greek and Hebrew languages to biblical scholarship. By 1500, the Bible had been printed in four languages besides Latin and Hebrew: German, Italian, Catalan, and Czech. As national languages developed, Bibles were translated and revised. From the sixteenth to the twentieth centuries, discoveries of biblical manuscripts led to new critical editions of the biblical texts with new generations of translations and revisions. In the twentieth century, rapid cultural change has prompted "common language" translations, using a range of vocabulary and style common to all speakers of a language, regardless of their social class or formal education, while the pace of linguistic change now requires that standard versions be reviewed every thirty-five years. Interconfessional versions also witness to growing ecumenical cooperation in Bible translating.

Today the complete Bible is read in more than forty European languages other than English, as listed in the table below in the chronological order of their first published Bibles. The following paragraphs sketch this history by the major language groups represented, though limitation of space precludes consideration of all the languages individually.

Germanic. German. The first fourteen editions of the German Bible (1466–1518) printed a version based on the Latin *Vulgate that had circulated in manuscripts since the fourteenth century. Martin Luther's translation of the New Testament in September 1522 marked the beginning of a new era characterized by a commitment to translating from the original languages of the scriptures. Relying on the Greek New Testament edited by Desiderius Erasmus (second edition, 1519), the Soncino edition of the Hebrew Bible (Brescia, 1495), and the linguistic counsel of his scholarly colleagues Philipp Melanchthon and Matthäus Aurogallus, in twelve years Luther translated the entire Bible into a vigorous popular German. Revised eleven times during his lifetime, Luther's Bible established the Reformation, created literary German, and became the model for translations in many other languages. With significant revisions in 1581, 1695, 1883, 1912, 1956, and 1984, it remains the standard Bible of German Protestant churches.

Independent Protestant versions were few. The Zwingli Bible (Zürich, 1524–29) adapted Luther's version to Swiss usage, supplementing it with an independent version of the Prophets; in successive revisions it deviated increasingly from Luther. Johann Piscator's Bible (1602–06) was based on the Latin Vulgate and was replete with Latinisms. J. Friedrich Haug's pietistic eight-volume Bible (Berlenberg, 1726–48) drew on Luther, but included New Testament apocrypha and other postapostolic books. Twentieth-century Protestant Bibles include versions by Franz Eu-

1466	German	1584	Slovenian	1739	Estonian	1875	Russian
1471	Italian	1588	Welsh	1751	Portuguese	1889	Tréguier Breton
1478	Catalan	1590	Hungarian	1796	Lower Sorbian	1895	Norwegian Saami
1488	Czech	1642	Finnish	1801	Gaelic	1903	Ukrainian
1526	Dutch	1679	Ladin Sut Romansch	1804	Serbo-Croatian	1921	Nynorsk
1530	French	1685	Irish	1811	Swedish Saami	1943	Frisian
1541	Swedish	1688	Romanian	1832	Slovak	1948	Faroese
1550	Danish	1689	Latvian	1834	Norwegian	1958	Guipuzcoan Basque
1553	Spanish	1718	Sursilvan Romansch	1840	Modern Greek	1973	Byelorussian
1561	Polish	1728	Upper Sorbian	1865	Labourdin Basque	1990	Macedonian
1581	Slavonic	1733	Manx	1866	Léon Breton
1584	Icelandic	1735	Lithuanian	1871	Bulgarian

gen Schlachter (1905), Hermann Menge (1926), Hans Bruns (1962), and the common language translation Die gute Nachricht (1967).

Roman Catholic versions have been numerous. Hieronymus Emser's New Testament (1527) altered Luther's text only slightly. Johann Dietenberger (1534) relied heavily on Emser's New Testament and Luther's Old Testament, modifying them according to the Vulgate. Johann Eck (1537) used Emser's New Testament and the pre-Luther Old Testament, with unfortunate results. Caspar Ulenberg's revision of Dietenberger (1630), further revised in Mainz (1662), became known as the "Catholic Bible of Mainz." A version begun by Heinrich Braun (1788–1807) and revised by J. F. Allioli (1830–37) became the standard Catholic version, and was further revised by B. Weinhart (1865) and S. Weber (1911). This and a New Testament by J. H. Kistemacher (1825) were widely circulated by the British and Foreign Bible Society. Twentieth-century Catholic versions include Bibles by Konstantin Rösch and Eugen Henne (1934), Pius Parsch "Klosterneuberg," (1934), the Herder Bible (1966), and the Bishops' Bible "Einheitsübersetzung" (1980).

The first Jewish biblical translation into German was Moses Mendelssonhn's Pentateuch (1783). This was opposed at first by Orthodox Jews, but Mendelssohn's colleagues completed the Hebrew Bible in Moses Israel Landau's edition of 1833–37. Further versions were produced by Leopold Zunz (1837) and Ludwig Philippson (1854). Significant twentieth-century versions include those of Martin Buber and Franz Rosenzweig (1925–29) and Harry Torczyner (Tur-Sinai; 1935–58).

Dutch and Frisian. The first printed Dutch New Testament (1522) was based on the Latin Vulgate. Anonymous translations of Luther's German New Testament appeared the following year, and in 1526 the first complete Dutch Bible was published by J. van Liesveldt, based on what had been published of Luther's German version, supplementing it at first with a translation of the Prophets from the Vulgate. Revised in 1558 ("Biestkins Bible"), in 1648 (by Adolf Visscher), in 1750 (by Nicholas Haas), and in 1823 (by J. T. Plüschke), it remained the Bible of Dutch Lutherans until the Netherlands Bible Society version of 1951.

The Bible edited by J. Gheylliaert in 1556, based on the German Zürich version, was popular in the Dutch Reformed Church, but Govaert van Wingen's version of 1561–62 ("Deux Aes Bible") became the Bible of the Reformed Church until 1637. The States-General version of 1637 commissioned by the Synod of Dort (1618–19) is still in use today, most recently revised in 1977 by a committee under the direction of W. L. Tukker and P. den Butter.

Nicholas van Winghe and his colleagues at Louvain found M. Vorsterman's (1528) adaptation of the Liesveldt Bible inadequate, and prepared a revision of the 1477 Delft Bible for the use of Roman Catholics. Revised in 1599 to accord with the 1592 Clementine Vulgate text, the Louvain Bible served Dutch Catholics for centuries. The Peter Canisius Society version by B. Alfrink, R. Jansen, J. Cook, and others (1929–39) enjoyed several printings; the 1939 Bible by Laetus Himmelreich and Crispinus Smits was less successful. The present standard text for Dutch Catholics is a fresh translation in modern Dutch published at Boxtel in 1961–73, with notes patterned after the French Jerusalem Bible. A joint Catholic–Protestant publication of the complete Bible in a common language version (1982), edited by A. W. G. Jaakke and a committee, should also be noted.

The earliest modern scripture portion in Frisian was a metrical Psalter begun by Gijsbert Japiks (1668) and completed by Simon and Jan Althuysen (1755). In the twentieth century, a Protestant translation of the New Testament by G. A. Wumkes and E. B. Folkertsma was published in 1933, followed by the complete Bible in 1943. In 1978, a common language version of the entire Frisian Bible was prepared and published jointly by Catholics and Protestants.

Scandinavian: Swedish, Danish, Norwegian, Faroese, Icelandic. The first Swedish Bible ("Gustavus Vasa's"), translated by Laurentius Petri, archbishop of Uppsala, assisted by his brother Olaus and others (1541), was based primarily on Luther's German Bible. Official revisions commissioned by Gustavus Adolphus (1618) and Charles XII (1703) achieved only minor changes in format and orthography, with few other alterations. The Charles XII Bible remained the standard text until 1917 when the Royal Commission of Gustavus V, working from critical editions of the Hebrew and Greek texts, produced a completely new version that was approved as the Swedish Church Bible. A new official version of the New Testament was translated by David Hedegard in 1965, and work on a new revision of the Old Testament is under way.

The earliest Danish New Testament (1524), commissioned by King Christian II, was translated by Hans Mikkelsen and Christiern Vinter from the Vulgate and Luther's German in a mixture of Danish and Swedish. Christiern Pedersen, the "Father of Danish literature," produced the first truly Danish New Testament (1529), based on the Latin Vulgate, and also a draft of the entire Bible (1543). Pedersen's work probably underlay the Reformation Bible (1550), which was commissioned by Christian III with instructions to follow Luther's text as closely as possible. Revised in 1589 (Frederick II Bible), and in 1633 (Christian IV Bible), with further editions into the nineteenth century, this remained the standard Bible of the Danish church. Meanwhile Hans Poulsen Resen, bishop of Zealand, prepared a Danish version of the Bible (1607) based on Hebrew and Greek texts; revised by Hans Svane (later archbishop) in 1647, the Svaning-Resen Bible was a "scholarly" Bible, with further revisions in 1712 and 1732 (Orphan House "Mission Bible"), 1824, and 1829. The 1907 Danish Bible Society revision of the Svaning-Resen New Testament served as the standard church text until 1948, when a new revision was issued with the Old Testament revision of 1931. This remained the official Bible of the National Danish Church until February 1992, when Queen Margarethe II gave official authorization to a new version of the complete Bible prepared by the Danish Bible Society under the direction of Neils Jørgen Cappelørn. The religious revival of the nineteenth century produced a number of individual translations, such as the Bible by J. C. Lindberg (1837–56), and the annotated New Testament by Bishop Skat Rørdam (1885). Roman Catholic New Testaments include versions by J. V. L. Hansen (1893) and Peter Schindler (1953).

When Norway became independent of Denmark in 1814, there were two Norwegian languages: the Riksmål or Bokmål of the majority, a kind of "Danish-Norwegian" spoken in urban areas and the southeast, and the Landsmål or Nynorsk (New Norwegian) or the rural regions in central and western Norway. The first Riksmål Bible was a revision of the Danish Svaning-Resen version by W. A. Wexels (1834), which the Norwegian Bible Society issued in further revised editions (Old Testament 1869, 1887, 1891; New Testament 1873, 1904). A new revision of the Bible was issued in 1930. A Roman Catholic version of the Bible in Riksmål was published in 1902 (revised 1938 from the original texts).

The first New Testament in New Norwegian (1889) was translated by J. Belsheim, E. Blix, and M. Skard; the complete Bible followed in 1921. In 1938 the Bible was revised, corrected by R. Indrebø to the 1930 Riksmål revision. The present standard Bibles in both Riksmål and New Norwegian were both prepared for the Norwegian Bible Society by committees headed by Magne Saebø and Sverre Aalen, and were published simultaneously (New Testament 1975, Old Testament 1978).

The first scripture publication in Faroese was a diglot gospel of Matthew with Danish (Randers, 1823), prepared by J. H. Schroeter, a Faroese pastor. Jacob Dahl undertook a translation of the Bible from the original languages, but completed only the New Testament (1937) and several books of the Old Testament. His work was completed by a group of pastors and published by the Danish Bible Society in 1961. Meanwhile, Victor Danielsen aided by a committee prepared a Faroese Bible based on a number of modern European versions (New Testament 1937, Bible 1948).

The first Icelandic New Testament (1540) was translated by Oddur Gottskalksson from the Vulgate and Luther's German. Parts of the Old Testament were translated by Gissur Einarsson (1580). These were revised and the Old Testament completed by Gudbrandur Thorlaksson to produce the Reformation Bible (1584), an outstanding example of Icelandic literary and book production. The Gudbrand Bible was replaced by Thorlakur Skulason's revision (1644), based on the Danish Svaning-Resen version, which became popular through the eighteenth century. The Icelandic Bible Society revision of 1841 was further revised in 1866 by Petur Petursson, and further again in 1912 by Haraldur Nielsson and others from the original languages. The present Church Bible of Iceland was published in 1981, prepared by Thorir Thordarsson, Jon Sveinnjørnsson, and others.

Romance. Italian. The first printed Italian Bible (Venice 1471) was translated from the Latin Vulgate by Nicolo Malermi (or Malerbi). Antonio Brucioli, a Catholic layman with Protestant tendencies, published a Bible (Venice 1532) based on the original languages which was widely influential and often reprinted. In Geneva in 1562, Filippo Rustici revised the Brucioli Old Testament and the Massimo Teofilo 1551 New Testament (translated from Greek) for the first Italian Protestant Bible. In 1564 Pope Pius IV prohibited the use of vernacular scriptures, effectively discouraging further translations until 1757, when Pope Benedict XIV gave them a qualified approval and prompted Antonio Martini to prepare a vernacular translation (1769–81). The Martini version became the standard Catholic Bible, an Italian classic. Meanwhile in Geneva, the scholar Giovanni Diodati published a Bible (1607, revised 1641) that gained immediate popularity and through many revisions (d'Erberg 1711, G. Muller 1744, G. Rolandi 1819, T.P. Rosetti 1850) has remained the standard Italian Protestant Bible.

Twentieth-century Catholic versions have been issued by the Cardinal Ferrari Society (1929), the Pontifical Biblical Institute (Old Testament 1958, New Testament 1965), and the Italian Episcopal Conference (1971), and there are individual translations by Marco Sales (1931) and Eusebio Tintori (1931); Protestant versions include a revision of Diodati by the Waldensian scholar Giovanni Luzzi and others (1924; Luzzi published his own version independently in 1930); ecumenical versions include the Italian Bible Society's Bibbia Concordata (1968), translated by a committee of Catholic, Orthodox, Protestant, and Jewish scholars, and a common language Bible (1985) produced by Catholic and Protestant scholars.

Romansch. The first scripture publication in Romansch was a New Testament translated by J. Bifrum from the Latin Vulgate (1560) in Ladin Sura of the Upper Engadine Valley. Later translations were made from the Greek text by J. L. Griti (1640) and J. Menni (1861). The first complete Romansch Bible, translated into Ladin Sut of the Lower Engladine Valley by Jacob Dorta and J. A. Vulpius (1679), was later revised by J. Andreer and N. Vital (1867–70). A new version of the Bible by J. U. Gaudenz and R. Filli appeared in 1953. The Sursilvan Romansch Bible comprising the New Testament by L. Gabriel (1648, revised 1856) and the Old Testament of P. Saluz, was revised by J. M. Darms and L. Candrian for the British Bible Society in 1869–70.

French. The first printed French Bible (Antwerp, 1530), a literalistic version by Jacques Lefèvre d'Étaples based on the Biblia historiale, was printed abroad because of suspicions of a Protestant bias aroused by his earlier New Testament (Paris, 1523). The first Protestant French Bible (Geneva, 1535) was translated by Pierre Robert Olivétan. The 1553 edition was the first modern version to incorporate *chapter and verse numbers throughout. Constantly revised by the Geneva pastors, the definitive Geneva Bible was edited by Theodore Beza (1588). Revisions were made in the seventeenth century by Jean Diodati (1644) and Samuel de Marets (1669), more significantly in the eighteenth by David Martin (Amsterdam, 1707) and J.-F. Ostervald (Amsterdam, 1744). The Synodal version (Paris, 1910) of the Synod of Reformed Churches is a revision of Ostervald, while the widely popular version of Louis Segond (Geneva, 1874 Old Testament, 1880 New Testament) was based on Martin and Ostervald, and was further revised in 1975 and 1978.

The first French Catholic Bible (Louvain, 1550), which was edited by Nicholas de Leuze and François de Larben and which reproduced the text of Lefèvre slightly revised with some borrowings from Olivétan, was often revised and reprinted. The Port-Royal version (1667–95), prepared by Antoine and his brother Louis Isaac Lemaistre (de Sacy, pseudonym), was a masterpiece of French literary classicism, achieving popularity among both Catholics and Protestants. Richard Simon's translation of the New Testament (Trévoux, 1702) from the Vulgate deserves mention for its nonsectarian scholarship. Among twentieth-century Catholic Bibles should be noted those of Abbé Crampon (Tournai, 1894–1904), revised by J. Touzard and E. Levesque in 1939, by J. Bonsirven and A. Tricot in 1952; the Pieuse Société Saint Paul (1932); Paul George Passelecq and the monks of Maredsous (1950, revised 1968); A. Liénart (Ligue Catholique de l'Évangile, 1951); and especially that by the École Biblique of Jerusalem (Paris, 1954, revised 1973; the Bible de Jérusalem ["Jerusalem Bible"]), whose concise scholarly and exegetical notes have inspired similar editions in many other languages. Other versions of interest include the scholarly Pléiade version (Paris, 1959 Old Testament, 1971 New Testament), the Traduction oecuménique (Paris, 1975) of A. Bea and M. Boegner, and the common language Français Courant (Paris, 1982) by Jean-Claude Margot.

A Jewish version of the Hebrew scriptures was produced by Samuel Cahen (1831–51), which was superseded by La Bible du rabbinat français (1899–1906, revised 1966). An independent version of both Testaments was published by André Chouraqui (Paris, 1975–77).

Spanish; Catalan. Although the Spanish Inquisition allowed biblical themes in the classical Spanish theater of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, it acted as an effective check on the spread of vernacular Bibles in Spain. Yet the influence of the Reformation was felt. The first Spanish New Testament (1543), translated in Wittenberg by Francisco Enzinas from Erasmus's Greek text, was published in Antwerp; the second (1556) by Juan Perez de Pineda, a refugee monk from Seville, was published in Geneva. Meanwhile, in 1553 a literal translation of the Hebrew Bible into Spanish, which Protestant and Catholic translators found useful, was printed by a Jewish press at Ferrara, translated by Abraham Usque and published by Yomtob Atias under ducal patronage.

The first complete Spanish Bible (Basel, 1569, the "Bear Bible") was translated by Cassiodoro de Reina. Revised by Cipriano de Valera (Amsterdam, 1602), this text has been frequently revised (in 1960 by the Bible Societies) and is still a standard Protestant Bible today. The first complete Bible printed in Spain was translated from the Latin Vulgate by Felipe Scio de San Miguel (Valencia, 1793). Another Catholic version (Madrid, 1825) was translated by Felix Torres Amat, who probably revised an unpublished translation by the Jesuit J. M. Petisco. Twentieth-century Catholic versions of the complete Bible include revisions of the Amat text (by Severiano del Paramo in 1928, by Serafin de Ausejo in 1965), and new versions by E. Nacar Fusta and A. Colunga (Madrid, 1944), José Maria Bover and F. Cantera Burgos (Madrid, 1947, revised 1966), Juan Straubinger (Buenos Aires, 1951), E. Martin Nieto (Madrid, 1961), Pedro Franquesa and Jose M. Sole (Barcelona, 1966), Jose Angel Ubieta on the basis of the French Jerusalem Bible (Brussels, 1967), Ramon Ricciardi (Madrid, 1971), and Luís Alonso Schökel and others (1975, revised 1982).

Mention is also due an ecumenical version (Barcelona, 1975) prepared by S. de Ausejo and F. de Fuenterrabia and revised by Catholic and Protestant scholars, and, Dios habla hoy (1979), a Bible Society common language version.

The first printed Bible in Catalan, the dialect of northeastern Spain and the official language of Andorra, was translated by Bonifacio Ferrer from the Latin Vulgate (Valencia, 1478); it was so thoroughly destroyed by the Spanish Inquisition that only the last page of one copy has survived. The next scripture publication was the New Testament (London, 1832) translated by J. Prat, which enjoyed several reprints. In the twentieth century three complete Bibles have appeared: two by Benedictines of Montserrat (Barcelona, 1926–66, with commentary; and Andorra, 1970), and one by the Catalan Biblical Foundation (Barcelona, 1968).

Portuguese. The first printed Portuguese New Testament (1681) was translated by João Ferreira d'Almeida in the East Indies and published in Amsterdam; his translation of the Old Testament remained unpublished until it was revised by Danish missionaries at Tranquebar (1751). It was repeatedly revised (1753–73 by J. M. Mohr, 1847 by G. Bush, 1875 by Manoel Soares), and remains a popular Protestant version today, especially in Brazil, where it was revised first in 1917 (based on the 1901 American Standard Version) and again in 1958. The earliest Portuguese Bible published in Portugal (Lisbon, 1781), translated by Anton Pereira de Figueiredo from the Latin Vulgate, has also been frequently revised and widely circulated. In the twentieth century, the Bible Society of Brazil published a common language Bible in 1988, and Roman Catholic versions of the complete Bible have been produced by Matos Soares (Porto, 1930–34) based on the Latin Vulgate, the Catholic Biblical Center of São Paolo (1959) based on the French Maredsous version, and L. Garmus (Petropolis, 1983) based on the New American Bible.

Romanian. The first printed book in Romania was a catechism (1541?) containing scripture selections; the second was the Gospels (1561), translated by Coresi, a Wallachian deacon. The first New Testament (1648) was begun by the monk Silvestru and completed by others. The complete Bible (1688) by Nicolae Milescu is considered the supreme achievement of seventeenth-century Romanian literature. Revised by Samuil Micu Clain (1795), it was reprinted even into the nineteenth century. Further translations of the complete Bible, sponsored by the British and Foreign Bible Society, were made by Ion Eliade Radulescu (1858), N. Balasescu and others (1867–73), and D. Cornilescu (1921). A new version by Vasile Radu and Grigorie Pisculescu (Gala Galaction) was published by the Romanian Orthodox church in 1938, and further revised in 1968 and 1975. Romanian was written in the Cyrillic alphabet until 1860, when the Roman alphabet was adopted. In 1984, however, the Cornilescu version was printed also in Cyrillic for use in Moldavia.

Slavonic. The first printed (Old Church) Slavonic Bible (Ostrog, 1581) was prepared for Prince Konstantin of Ostrog from a manuscript Bible dated 1499 and attributed to Archbishop Gennadius of Novgorod. Revised successively in 1633, in 1712 for Peter the Great, and in 1751 for the Tsarina Elizabeth, this remains the standard Slavonic Bible of the Russian Orthodox church.

East Slavic: Byelorussian, Ukrainian, Russian. The earliest scripture printed in East Slavic was an incomplete Bible in Byelorussian (Prague, 1517–25) translated from Slavonic, Latin, and Czech sources by Franciscus Skoryna to supply the laity with a vernacular version. The next Byelorussian scripture publications to appear were the New Testament and Psalms of L. Dziekuć-Malej and A. M. Luckiewič (Helsinki, 1931), and the complete Bible by Moses Gitlin and J. Stankievič (New York, 1970–73).

Ukrainian versions of the Bible were first based on the Russian Synodal text of 1751 (Pochayev, 1798; Peremyshl, 1859). Modern versions have been translated from the original languages by Ivan Ohienko (London, 1962), and Ivan Khomenko (Rome, 1963).

The earliest scripture portion in modern Russian was Archbishop Mefodiy's translation of Romans (Moscow, 1792). The New Testament was published in 1821 and the Old Testament through Ruth in 1825 by the Russian Bible Society (founded 1814, dissolved 1826), translated by a committee appointed by the Holy Synod at the request of Tsar Alexander I. The complete Bible was published by the Holy Synod in 1875, translated by E. I. Lovyagin, D. A. Khvolson, and others; this remains the standard Bible of the church in Russia. Jewish versions of the Pentateuch were published by Leon I. Mandelstamm (Berlin, 1862), J. Herstein and J. L. Gordon (1875), and J. Steinberg (Vilna, 1899), and the complete Hebrew Bible by D. Yosippon (Jerusalem, 1978).

West Slavic: Czech, Slovak, Polish. The first printed Czech New Testament (Plzeň, 1475) was based on a Hussite revision of the Church Slavonic text by the Latin Vulgate, as was also the first complete Bible (Prague, 1488; revised in Venice 1506). The Moravian bishop Jan Blahoslav translated the New Testament (Ivančice, 1564) from Greek with concern for both scholarly accuracy and practical clarity; the complete Bible produced by his successors (Kralice, 1579–94) became the standard Protestant Bible, and a definitive influence in the history of the Czech language. Through successive revision it has remained the standard Czech Bible. The Wenceslaus Bible (1677–1715) of the Counter-Reformation, prepared by Jesuits J. Barner, J. Constantius, and M. V. Steyer, was based on the 1506 Venice revision and the Latin Vulgate but influenced also by the Kralice text. Modern versions which should be noted include a Catholic Bible (1917–25) translated by Jan Hejč and Jan Sýkora from the Vulgate (New Testament revised by R. Col, 1947, 1970), a Catholic Old Testament (1955–58) based on the Hebrew by J. Heger, a Catholic New Testament (1948) based on the Greek by Pavel Škrábal; an ecumenical Bible (1979) prepared by M. Bič and J. B. Souček of the Czech Brethren Evangelical church, and a literary Jewish trnaslation of the Hebrew Bible (1947–51) by Vladimír Šrámek.

The earliest Bible printed in Slovak (1829–32) was translated by Jiři Palkovič, Catholic canon of Gran, from the Latin Vulgate. This was superseded by a new translation from the Vulgate made by Jan Donoval (Trnava, 1926). Modern Protestant versions of the complete Bible include a translation from the original languages by Josef Roháček (1936) and the Tranoscius version (1978), based on the Czech Kralice text.

The first printed New Testament in Polish (Königsberg, 1553) was translated from Greek by Jan Seklucjan, a Lutheran pastor, but the first complete Bible (Krakow, 1561) was attributed to the Roman Catholic theologian Jan Leopolita (of Lwów) and ostensibly based on the Latin Vulgate. A scholarly Protestant Bible (Brest, 1563) translated from Hebrew and Greek by Jan Laski, F. Stankarus, and others under the patronage of Nicolas Radziwill was criticized for Socinianism in its notes, but revised by Daniel Mikolajewski and Jan Turnowski (Danzig, 1632) it became the standard Bible of Polish Protestants. Meanwhile, a Bible translated by Jakub Wujek from the Vulgate (Krakow, 1599) was accepted by the Synod of Piotrkow in 1607 as the official Polish Catholic version. Modern editions include revisions of the Wujek version (1935 by S. Styś and J. Rostworowski; 1962 by S. Styś and W. Lohn), two new Catholic versions (1965 "Millennium Bible," revised 1971, now the official Catholic text; and 1975, by M. Peter and M. Molniewicz); and an ecumenical "Millennium Bible" (1975) prepared by scholars of the Lutheran, Reformed, Orthodox, Old Catholic, and Protestant Free churches.

South Slavic: Bulgarian, Serbo-Croatian, Slovenian. The first biblical portion in modern Bulgarian was the Russian Bible Society edition of Matthew (St. Petersburg, 1823) from the New Testament translated by Archimandrite Theodosius from Church Slavonic; the project was discontinued when the Russian Bible Society was suppressed. The first printed New Testament based on the Slavonic (Smyrna, 1840) by Neophyt Rilski and revised from the Greek (1849), as well as the first complete Bible (Istanbul, 1871), were sponsored by the British and Foreign Bible Society, with revisions prepared by Robert Thomson (1914, 1923), and Gavrail Tsetanov (1940). The Bulgarian Synod version begun in 1891 was issued in 1925, the work of five successive translation committees. The first New Testament in Macedonian was published in 1967 in the Bulgarian usage, prepared by a committee of the Macedonian Orthodox Church including Georgi Milošev. Protestant and Roman Catholic scholars participated in its revision in 1976, and in 1980 the Bible was completed with a translation of the Old Testament prepared under the supervision of Archbishop Gavril.

Although Serbo-Croatian is linguistically homogeneous, the Serbs are mainly Eastern Orthodox and use the Cyrillic script, while the majority of the Croats are Roman Catholic and use the Roman alphabet. However, the first New Testament in Serbo-Croatian (1563), translated by Antun Dalmatin and Stipan K. Istrianin from Erasmus's Latin version and Luther's German, was printed in Glagolitic characters. A second printing (1563) was in Cyrillic, and the Prophets (1564) was printed in Roman letters. The translator of the first complete Bible in Serbian (Budapest, 1804) is unknown; the first Bible in Croatian (Budapest, 1831) was a literal translation made from the Latin Vulgate by M. P. Katančić. The linguistic reformer Vuk S. Karadžić sought to promote a common literary language with his Serbian translation of the New Testament (1847); although not approved by the Serbian church, it was later issued together with an Old Testament prepared by his colleague G. Daničić (1868) simultaneously in both Serbian and Croatian. The Vuk-Daničić Bible remains popular in both scripts. Other significant Bibles were issued by Lujo Bakotić (Belgrade, 1933), I. E. Šarić (Sarajevo, 1942, New Testament revised by an ecumenical committee in 1969), and the Stvarnost edition (Zagreb, 1968) based on the French Jerusalem Bible.

The first Slovenian Bible (Wittenberg, 1584) combined the New Testament of the Reformed preacher Primus Truber (Tübingen, 1582) with the Old Testament of the Lutheran Juri Dalmatin, both translated from the original languages with close reference to Luther's German version. The first Roman Catholic Bible (Ljubljana, 1784–1802), was translated from the Vulgate by Juri Japel, Blaz Kumerdey, and others; a second Catholic version (1859) was based on the German Allioli version. Renewed interest in the Slovenian language in the early twentieth century led to a revision of the Truber-Dalmatin version by Anton Chraska (Bible, 1914; New Testament, 1946), and a new Catholic version of the Bible (New Testament, 1929; Old Testament, 1961), which was revised by Lutheran and Roman Catholic scholars and issued as an ecumenical Bible in 1974.

Others. Greek. The first modern Greek New Testament (Geneva, 1638) was translated by a monk from Gallipoli, edited by Cyril Lucar, Patriarch of Constantinople, and published at the expense of the Dutch States General. It has often been revised and reprinted: by Seraphim of Mitylene (London, 1703), Anastasius Michael (Halle, 1710), Demetrius Schinas (1827), and others. The Bible translated by N. Bambas (London, 1840 Old Testament, 1844 New Testament) has become the standard Protestant Modern Greek Bible. A vernacular version of the Gospels by Alexander Pallis from the fourth century Codex Vaticanus (Liverpool, 1902) provoked legislation prohibiting all modern versions (repealed in 1924). Modern editions include a Bible translated by Athanasios Chastoupis and Nikolaos Louvaris (Athens 1955, a paraphrase), and New Testaments by B. Vellas (Athens, 1967) and S. Agourides, J. Karavidopoulos, and others (Athens, 1985; an interconfessional version).

Uralic: Hungarian, Estonian, Finnish, Saami. The first printed Hungarian New Testament (Új Sziget, 1541) was translated by Janos Erdösi (Sylvester), a pupil of Melanchthon. The first complete Bible (Vizsoly, 1590), translated by Caspar Karoli, Reformed pastor at Göncz, played a decisive role in the national life and literature of Hungary comparable to that of Luther's Bible in Germany. Through successive revisions, most recently by Kalman Kallay and Jozsef Pongracz for the Joint Bible Commission of Lutheran and Reformed Churches (Budapest, 1975), it has remained the standard Protestant Bible of Hungary. The first Catholic Bible (Vienna, 1626) was an excellent rendering of the Vulgate by György Csipkes (revised by Bela Jozsef Tarkanyi, 1865). Modern Hungarian translations of the complete Bible were made by the Reformed scholar Sandor Czgledy (Gyor, 1938), and the Roman Catholic scholars A. Szöreny, Ferenc Gal, and Istvan Kosztolanyi (Budapest, 1976), translated from the original languages and based on the Jerusalem Bible.

The first Estonian New Testament (Riga, 1686) was in the southern dialect of Tartu (Dorpat), begun by Johann Gutsleff and completed by N. von Hardungen, Adrian Virginius, and Marco Schütz. Revisions were made by Ferdinand Meyer (Mitau, 1836) and Uku Masing (Dorpat, 1896). The first Estonian Bible (Tallinn, 1739) was in the northern dialect of Tallinn (Reval), translated by Anton Thor Helle, Heinrich Gutsleff, and others; it was later revised by C. Malm (Berlin, 1878), then by Uku Masing and John V. Veski (Tallinn, 1938). After World War II, a new version of the Old Testament and a further revision of the New Testament (London, 1968) was sponsored by the Swedish church, prepared by Endel Köpp and Toomas Pöld for Estonian refugees in Sweden.

The first Finnish New Testament (Stockholm, 1548) was translated by Michael Agricola on the basis of Luther's German text. The complete Bible (Stockholm, 1642) was published under the patronage of Queen Christina of Sweden, translated from the original languages by M. Martin Stodius, Gregory Matthaei, and Heinrich J. Hoffman. Frequently revised (Turku, 1685, the "War Bible," by Henrik Florinus; 1776, by Anders Lizelius; Helsinki, 1932–38, by E. Stenij, J. Schwartzberg, and others), this version remains the standard Finnish Bible. The Finnish Bible Society has published a common language translation of the New Testament (Turku, 1972), translated by Esko Rintala, R. Huikuri, and H. Räisänen.

The earliest scripture portion in Saami (Stockholm, 1648) was an edition of Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Ecclesiasticus (Sirach), translated in Swedish Saami by J. J. Tornaeus. The first New Testament (Stockholm, 1755) was translated by Pehr Fjellström, and the first complete Bible (Hernösand, 1811) by S. Öhrling, E. J. Grönlund, E. Öhrling, and N. Fjellström. The first New Testament in Norwegian Saami (Christiania, 1840) was the work of N. J. C. V. Stockfleth, which was revised for the first complete Bible (Christiania, 1895), prepared by L. J. Haetta, J. A. Friis, and J. K. Qvigstad.

Baltic: Latvian, Lithuanian. The first Latvian Bible (Riga, 1689) was translated by the Lutheran scholars Ernst Glück and C. B. Witten. Revised often (Königsberg, 1739; Mitau, 1877 and 1898; Riga, 1960 New Testament; London, 1965), it remains the standard Bible of the Latvian church. In 1937, a New Testament was published in Latgalian, the Eastern dialect of Latvian, translated from the Latin Vulgate by Aloizijs Broks.

The earliest biblical publication in Lithuanian was a Psalter (Königsberg, 1625), revised by J. Rhesa from an unpublished 1590 version of the Bible by J. Bretken which was based on Luther's German. Samuel B. Chyliński's version of Genesis to Job (London, 1662) was based on the Polish Danzig version; his translation of the New Testament was discovered in 1934 and published by C. Kudzinowski in 1958. The first complete Bible (Königsberg, 1735) was translated by J. J. Quandt and P. Ruhig; a revision by L. J. Rhesa in 1816 was often reprinted. A Roman Catholic version of the New Testament was published in 1816, and a new version of the complete Bible (Kaunas, 1936) was translated from the original languages by Juozapas Skvireckas.

Celtic: Breton. The first Breton New Testament (Angoulême, 1827) was translated from the Latin Vulgate in the Léon dialect by Jean François Le Gonidec, who later completed the Bible (St. Brieuc, 1866). A revision of this New Testament (Brest, 1847) by J. Jenkins, who corrected it from the Greek, was often revised and reprinted (1866, 1870, 1885, 1897). More recently, a new Catholic New Testament (Guingamp, 1971) was translated by Maodez Glanndour. Meanwhile a New Testament (Guingamp, 1853) appeared in the Tréguier dialect under the patronage of the Catholic bishop of St. Brieuc, and a Bible (Tremel, 1889) was translated by G. Le Coat, the Protestant pastor at Tremel.

Basque. One of the earliest publications in Basque was the New Testament in Labourdin Basque (La Rochelle, 1571), translated by Jean Leiçarraga under the patronage of Jeanne d'Albret, the Protestant Queen of Navarre (reprinted by the Trinitarian Bible Society, 1908). A Roman Catholic New Testament was translated from the Vulgate by Jean Haraneder, but only the Gospels were published (Bayonne, 1855), edited by Abbé Maurice Harriet of Halsou. The complete Bible (London, 1865) was translated by Captain Duvoisin for Louis-Lucien Bonaparte. In Guipuzcoan Basque, the gospel of Luke (Madrid, 1838) was translated by Oteiza, a physician, and edited by George Barrow; the first New Testament (Bilbao, 1931) and Bible (Bilbao, 1958) were translated by Raimondo Olabide and José F. Echeverria. ERROLL F. RHODES

African Languages

African translations of the Bible are used in the most complex ethnic, linguistic, and culturally diverse human mosaic on earth. About two thousand languages are spoken in fifty-nine different countries by five hundred million people. Scripture versions (of which over a hundred are complete Bibles) in five hundred languages are available to the seven thousand denominations on the African continent. Arabic scriptures are available in some five different script forms. The Tuareq people of Niger Republic speak the language they themselves call Tayrt, but it is part of the Tamahaq language of nomads in the Sahara; several portions of scriptures in at least three alphabetic systems are available in this complex language. In about eight hundred places on the continent, linguistic groups are separated by political boundaries. This creates special challenges for translators; for example, portions of the scriptures for the Borana people living in Kenya are written in Roman characters while the same version for the Boranas living in Ethiopia requires Amharic characters.

By the end of the eighteenth century the complete Bible was available in two African languages, namely Geʿez (Ethiopic) and Arabic, while a New Testament was available in Coptic. During the nineteenth century, growing Christian missionary activity generated a steady stream of versions of the Bible, or parts thereof, in the indigenous languages of Africa. Pioneering missionaries used available European versions to reach unevangelized Africans. For example, a Dutch New Testament (printed in the Netherlands in 1692) provided the foundation for the work of the Lutheran church in Southern Africa. Georg Schmidt left this Testament in the early eighteenth century with five converts in a valley some eighty miles from the Cape of Good Hope. The Khoisan speaking community used it for nearly fifty years without any missionaries present, because Schmidt had to go back to Europe. The only complete Bible available in a Khoisan language, namely Nama—still the living language of some fifty thousand people in Namibia—was published in 1966. It took more than 140 years to complete this translation.

In the 1980s the complete Bible (sixty-six books) became available in 121 indigenous versions in Africa, amounting to 38 percent of complete Bible versions available around the globe. Many of these versions also contain the expanded *canon used by the Roman Catholic and other churches. The first Bible in Africa published by *Bible Societies that was accepted in unaltered form and sanctioned for use by Roman Catholics was the Afrikaans version, in 1965, with the chiChewa version approved shortly afterward.

Some eighteen indigenous languages in Africa (and offshore islands) are spoken by five million people or more. These languages (in alphabetical order) are: Afrikaans, Amharic, Arabic, chiShona, Fulfulde, Hausa, isiXhosa, isiZulu, kinyaRwanda, kiRundi, kiSwahili (Central), kiSwahili (Zaire), liNgala, Malagasy, Oromo (Western), Somali, Yoruba. Complete Bibles are available in all these languages. Because of language development and refinement of translation techniques, retranslations continue to be made in most of these languages, mostly by indigenous speakers.

A noteworthy trend in linguistic development in Africa has been the merging of languages used in Bible versions into the "Union Versions." For example, in the Xhosa version elements of some seven dialects are merged. By the middle of the twentieth century, there were at least fourteen union language versions available, namely in chiChewa, chiShona, chiTonga, ichiMambwe, Igbo, Kalenjin, kiSwahili (Ngwana—Zaire), loMongo, Nuer, oluLuyia, Omyene, runyaNkore, isiXhosa, seTswana. In kiSwahili—the lingua franca of East Africa—a complete Bible was published in 1914.

The first complete Bible version translated and printed by movable type on the continent of Africa itself was the seTswana Bible, published in 1857 at Kuruman, Southern Africa. Space allows more extended discussion of only a few versions.

Arabic. Although various complete Bible versions in this language already existed, the translation by Eli Smith and Cornelius van Dyck attained the status of a standard edition after its publication in 1865. The complex dialectal, orthographical, and denominational needs within Arabic-speaking communities provide an ongoing challenge for the various geographical areas. The spread of Islam south of the Sahara, especially in the twentieth century, with its emphasis on its scripture, the *Qurʾān, has stimulated the program for Bible versions in Arabic.

Hausa. The Hausa Bible is available in both Arabic and roman script. This version had a complex translation history from 1857 to 1932, when the complete Bible was published. Missionaries of Sudan Interior Mission, with the help of Hausa-speaking Christians under the guidance of the British and Foreign Bible Society (BFBS), produced a version that has maintained record levels of distribution over the years.

Malagasy. The Malagasy Bible, published by the BFBS in 1835, was the first version of the Bible for an African country that was printed by movable type—although in England.

Tiv. Although the Tiv people (of Northern Nigeria) numbered only about two million, the publication of the New Testament in this language in 1936 provided a stimulus for this language group to convert from Islam to Christianity; in 1940, less than 1 percent of the people were Christian, but by 1972, 95 percent were Christian.

Amharic. Amharic is the official language of Ethiopia and has been in existence as a literary language since the fourteenth century. Parts of the Bible have been published since 1824 in a diglot version together with the ancient language of Ethiopia, Geʿez. An official version of the Bible was published in 1961 through the work of a joint committee appointed by Emperor Haile Selassie and the BFBS.

seTswana. In 1830 the gospel of Luke in seTswana was published. Through the perseverance of Robert Moffat and his Batswana helpers during the early part of the nineteenth century, the translation was completed and ten thousand copies of the Old Testament printed on a hand press at Kuruman in 1857. These copies of the Old Testament were attached to available printed New Testament sections. The press used by Moffat was carted by ox wagon over more than eight hundred miles of the most difficult terrain from the Cape of Good Hope into the interior.

isiZulu. The complete Bible was published in 1883 by the American Bible Society. The people speaking the related Nguni languages of siSwati and Ndebele (both Southern and Northern) have used this version for many years. Translation into these related languages of various individual books of the Bible has been in progress during the twentieth century. The complete Bible in Ndebele (Northern) was published in 1978, while versions of the New Testament and Psalms in siSwati and in Ndebele (Southern) were published in 1986. The complete Bible in isiZulu was retranslated and published in 1959. In 1986, a new version of the New Testament and Psalms in isiZulu was published. This edition is unique because the type was set in such a way that hyphenation was eliminated and lines were carefully segmented into meaningful sentences and word clusters.

Afrikaans. This Indo-Germanic language came into being on the African continent over the last three centuries and has generated an extensive literature. The complete Bible was published in 1933, and some six million copies were distributed in fifty years. It is the only African version in which the translation directly from the original Hebrew and Greek was done exclusively by native speakers. In 1983, a new translation was published, of which one million copies were distributed within a period of three years.

GERRIT E. VAN DER MERWE

Asiatic Languages

In addition to the Syriac, Armenian, Georgian, and Arabic versions (see the article on Ancient Languages earlier in this entry) there are also other, less well known, early versions of the Bible in Asia, some still extant. For example, in China a version of the Gospels, prepared by Nestorian missionaries for Emperor Taizong of the Tang Dynasty, is known to have existed as early as 640 CE. When the Jesuit missionary Francis Xavier arrived in Japan in 1549, he reportedly brought with him a translation of Matthew prepared by a Japanese convert in India. The Dutch traders were instrumental in translating several early versions: examples include the gospel of Matthew in High Malay (1629), which was the first translation in a non-European language made expressly for the purpose of evangelism; the gospels of Matthew and John (1661) in the now extinct Sinkang dialect of Taiwan; and the Gospels in Sinhalese (1739). Ziegenbalg, the first missionary sent to India by the Danish-Halle Mission, published the Tamil New Testament in 1715, and, assisted by B. Schultz, the Bible in 1727.

A flurry of Bible translation followed on the heels of the great missionary movement inspired by Pietism and the Great Awakening. Starting from the Middle East, the Arabic "Smith–Van Dyck Version" (New Testament 1860, Bible 1865), which has gone through successive revisions, is still in use today. Franz Delitzsch's New Testament in Hebrew (1877) has appeared in several revised editions. The first complete Turkish Bible (New Testament 1819, Bible 1827), known as the "Ali Bey Version," was originally translated in the mid-seventeenth century. Ali Bey, a Pole sold at Constantinople as a slave, was requested by the Dutch ambassador to Constantinople to translate the Bible because of his exceptional linguistic skills. Henry Martyn translated the most influential Persian version; his New Testament (1815), translated in Calcutta, has remained the basis of subsequent revisions. The common-language Persian New Testament appeared in 1973. Martyn also translated the first New Testament into Urdu (1814), the state language of Pakistan. The first Urdu Bible, translated by the Benares Committee, appeared in 1843. Pashto, one of the official languages of Afghanistan, had its first New Testament in 1818, and a full Bible in 1895. Dari, the other official language of Afghanistan, had its first New Testament published in 1982.

India has the Bible or a portion of it in 142 of its languages and dialects. William Carey is reported to have translated the Bible into six languages, and parts of it into twenty-nine more. The Serampore Press, which he established, has published scriptures in no fewer than forty-five languages, of which thirty-five are languages of India. The first Bengali New Testament, which he translated, appeared in 1801, and the complete Bible in 1809. It was due largely to his work and influence that most of the major languages in India got their first Bible in the early nineteenth century—for example, Oriya (1815), Marathi (1821), Sanskrit (1822), Gujarati (1823), Kannada (1831), Assamese (1833), Hindi (1835), Malayalam (1841), Urdu (1843), Telugu (1854). Although Panjabi had the first New Testament in 1815, the Bible did not appear until 1959. Common-language Bibles include Hindi (1978), Panjabi (1985), Sema Haga (1985), Marathi (1987), Rongmei Naga (1989), Boro (1991), and Gangte (1991). Nepali, a language used both in Nepal and India, had its first New Testament in 1821 and Old Testament in 1914. The common-language New Testament was published in 1981, and the complete Bible is expected in 1992. A notable version from Bangladesh is the common language New Testament (1980) in Musalmani Bengali, a form of language spoken by its Muslim population.

Adoniram Judson translated the first Burmese New Testament in 1832 and the Bible in 1835. Due to Burmese hostility to Europeans, he spent twenty-one months in prison while translating the New Testament. The first Hwa Lisu New Testament (1938), by J. O. Fraser in the syllabic script that he developed, is an example of the Bible translator as an inaugurator of vernacular literature. The new common-language Lisu Bible appeared in 1987. In Thailand, the gospel of Luke (1834), translated by Karl Gutzlaff, was the first scripture published in Thai. The first New Testament appeared in 1843, the Bible in one volume 1891–96, and an interconfessional common-language Bible in 1981. In Laos, the first Lao New Testament was released in 1926, the Bible in 1932, and the common-language New Testament in 1975 and Shorter Old Testament in 1980. In Kampuchea, the first Khmer scripture was the gospel of Luke (1899), translated by a king's interpreter, and the next publication, Luke-Acts (1900), by a Buddhist monk. The first New Testament appeared in 1929, and the Bible in 1954. The first Vietnamese Bible (1913–16) was translated from the Latin Vulgate by a Catholic priest. A Protestant version followed, the New Testament in 1923, and the Old Testament in 1925; the New Testament, revised in 1954, is still in circulation. In Malaysia, the first complete Malay Bible (1733), translated by Melchior Leidekker, was the basis for several subsequent revisions. Another version, consisting of the 1879 Old Testament and 1938 New Testament, is still in use today. The common-language New Testament was published in 1976, and the Bible in 1987.

In Indonesia, the Bible or a portion of it has been translated into seventy-two languages and dialects. The first language of Indonesia to have the complete Bible was Javanese (1854). Another version by P. Jansz (New Testament 1890, Old Testament 1893) has undergone several revisions and appeared in Javanese, Arabic, and Roman scripts. Indonesian, the national language, had its first New Testament only in 1968, and the Bible in 1974; the common-language New Testament followed in 1977, and the Bible in 1985. Other major language versions include Bugis and Makassar (New Testament 1888, Old Testament 1891–1901), Sundanese (New Testament 1877, Bible 1891), and Toba (New Testament 1878, Old Testament 1894). In addition to Indonesian, other common-language Bibles published include Batak Koro (1987), Batak Toba (1989), Bali (1990), Batak Angkola (1991), and Sunda (1991).

In the Philippines, the Bible or a portion of it has been translated into eighty-three languages and dialects. The Pangasinan Luke (1887) was the first portion to appear. Pilipino, or Tagalog, the national language, had its first New Testament in 1902 and Old Testament in 1905. Most of the major languages had their first Bible in the first half of the twentieth century: Bikol (1914), Cebuano (1917), Hiligaynon (1912), Ilokano (1909), Pampango (1917), Pangasinan (1915), and Samarenyo (1937). Being a dominantly Roman Catholic country, it is very active in interconfessional translations. Thus far, interconfessional Bibles in common language have appeared in Tagalog, Bikol, Cebuano, Hiligaynon, Ilokano, Pangasinan, and Samarenyo.

In China, the Bible or a portion of it has been translated into fifty-eight languages and dialects. Marshman and Lassar produced the first Chinese literary Wenli Bible in 1822; however, the 1823 Bible by Morrison and Milne made a greater impact. W. H. Medhurst, Karl Guszlaff, and Elijah Bridgman also exerted considerable influence when they produced the 1838 Bible; they left their mark on several subsequent versions, some of which bear their names. The 1855 Delegates' Version is still in circulation. Among the Easy Wenli versions, the 1902 Bible by Joseph Schereschewsky deserves special mention. Stricken with paralysis in 1881 and unable to hold a pen, he continued to work on the translation of the entire Bible, typing with one finger of each hand. Hence this Bible is known as the "Two-finger Edition." Important Mandarin versions include the 1878 Bible (Old Testament by Schereschewsky and New Testament by Peking Committee) and the 1919 Union Version, which continues to be the standard Bible today. The Today's Chinese Version in common language, translated entirely by Chinese scholars, appeared in 1985. The Bible (Old Testament 1946–52, New Testament 1957–59), translated by Franciscan Fathers, is widely used by Roman Catholics. Schereschewsky was also involved in producing the first Bible portion (Matthew, 1872) in Khalka Mongolian (the official language of the People's Republic of Mongolia), based on the literary Mongolian New Testament published in 1846. The common-language New Testament, in Cyrillic script, appeared in 1990. In Taiwan, the Amoy Bible (1882–84), revised by Thomas Barclay in 1933, remains the standard Bible for Taiwanese speakers in Taiwan. Common-language translation is in progress in Taiwanese and Hakka. For the tribal people, the common-language Old Testament with a shorter New Testament has appeared in Amis (1981) and Taroko (1988), and the New Testament in Bunun (1973), Paiwan (1973), and Tayal (1974).

In Korea, the first portion (Luke and John) appeared in 1882, the New Testament in 1887. This translation, in Hankul characters, was done by John Ross in Manchuria. The 1911 Bible, revised in 1938 and 1956, is still in use today. Korea is also the first country in the world to have published the common-language and interconfessional Bible (1977). In Japan, Karl Gutzlaff, an influential figure in the history of Chinese and Thai Bible translation, in 1837 translated the first ever portions (John and 1–3 John). J. C. Hepburn, the originator of the Hepburnian system of romanization, translated the first New Testament (1880), which formed the basis of the Standard Version Bible (1887). In 1917 a revised New Testament was released. The Colloquial Version Bible (1955), translated entirely by Japanese scholars, is still the standard Bible. However, the circulation of the New Interconfessional Translation Bible (1987) has passed one million copies.

In Micronesia, Hildegard Thiem and Harold Hanlin made an outstanding contribution. The former translated the Palauan New Testament (1964), Shorter Old Testament (1985), and the Yapese Shorter Bible (1981); the latter, the Trukese New Testament (1957) as well as the Ponapean New Testament (1972) and Shorter Old Testament (1977). Hanlin also helped in the preparation of the Marshallese Shorter Bible (1983). In Papua New Guinea, the Bible or a portion of it has been translated into 198 languages and dialects. The first Bible in the national language (Tok Pisin) was published in 1989. Translation in Pijin, the lingua franca of the Solomon Islands, is in progress. In the rest of the Pacific Islands, most of the major areas had their first Bible by the mid-nineteenth century—for example, Tahitian (1838), Hawaiian (1839), Rarotongan (1851), Samoan (1855), and Maori (1858). Bislama, the national language of the new Republic of Vanuatu, had its first New Testament in 1980, and is expected to have the Bible in 1993. Because of their expertise, the translators were called upon to help translate the Constitution of the new republic.

According to a report compiled by the United Bible Societies, as of the end of 1991, complete Bibles, New Testaments, and portions of the Bible have been published in 811 different languages and dialects from Asia and the Pacific Islands, comprising 125 Bibles, 304 New Testaments, and 382 portions. I-JIN LOH

Australian Aboriginal Languages

At the time of the arrival of the Europeans in Australia at the end of the eighteenth century, there were at least three hundred thousand aborigines speaking more than five hundred languages and dialects; the present aboriginal population (tribal and other, including many with European blood) is about half that, or one percent of the total population of Australia. Portions of the Bible have been translated over the last century into approximately thirty Australian languages. Most translations cover only small parts of scripture; no full Bible has been published as yet and only a few full New Testaments. This selective approach is because the number of speakers of most aboriginal languages is lower than one thousand, often far less.

One reason for the activity of Bible translators is, of course, their desire to evangelize. Among churches and missionary organizations, however, a much greater appreciation of aboriginal culture has replaced earlier attitudes that were intent on eradicating tribal customs and traditions. The aborigines themselves are aware of their non-European position in relation to scripture. Although most tribal aborigines have received a traditional Christian education from white ministers and teachers at aboriginal mission stations, as aboriginal people become more assertive they discover the similarity between their own position and that of the people of God in the Bible. The stories of *creation, of the *ancestors, of the oppression under Pharaoh, of the *Exodus, the *conquest, the *exile, and the return have a special appeal. In their struggle for land rights they discover that the biblical concept of land as a gift from God and as something with which humanity is inseparably united is much more closely related to their own aboriginal understanding than to the European understanding of land as a commodity to be bought and sold. Similarly, the concept of *covenant, with its strong emphasis on community and on corporate life, appeals to them much more than the individualistic thinking of Europeans.

Djiniyini Gondarra, a prominent aboriginal United Church Minister, the first aboriginal theologian and vice president of the United and Islander Christian Congress, provides a good illustration of the new assertiveness of aboriginal Christians. Two important addresses given by him in 1983 and 1985 were entitled, respectively, "Let my people go" and "Overcoming the captivities of the western church context" (the latter being based on Galatians 5.1). Djiniyini, as a black theologian, sees God as black, and he is most conscious of the European wrapping in which the aborigines have received Christianity and the Bible. He is therefore a strong supporter of the movement to translate the biblical message into aboriginal cultural forms.

It would be incorrect to assume that all aboriginal Christians are critical of the Western wrapping in which the biblical message is received. Many aborigines still receive the biblical message as it was presented fifty and even a hundred years ago. Until very recently, the destruction of all aboriginal culture was propagated, and in some cases this may still occur. Nevertheless, the new developments may be the sign of a new era in biblical interpretation: they will influence not only aborigines, as they try to understand Christianity in their own cultural setting, but also European traditional understandings. The latter may be noted in two particular points.

First, the biblical and theological interpretation of land has stimulated aboriginal Christians to new understandings. Is it valid, some ask, to use the Hebrew Bible in the current debate on land rights? Does this not impose the life and thought of an ancient culture upon modern times? Should the Old Testament not be interpreted in the light of the New Testament, and if this cannot be done (because the New Testament does not offer any thought on the matter in discussion), should we then not abandon all attempts to make connections between the Old Testament and our present world? Others argue that the Old Testament is not subservient to the New Testament, that the difference in culture does not necessarily mean a difference in ethos, and that it is this ethos with which the church has to wrestle when it interprets the biblical message.

Second, a significant outcome of the new developments in aboriginal biblical understandings for the Europeans is that they are forced to reconsider some of their own assumptions. The thought that there is only one way of understanding scripture is challenged, and the question is raised whether Western biblical interpretations are not more influenced by prejudices related to Western civilization and culture than has often been thought. The newer aboriginal understandings challenge and stimulate those whose prerogative it has been for many centuries to interpret scripture.

HENDRIK C. SPYKERBOER

Native American Languages

At the end of 1990, 399 native American languages (Indian, Eskimo, and Aleut) had at least one book of the scriptures in published form. One hundred ninety-seven of these languages have complete New Testaments, and fifteen have complete Bibles. Out of a total population of approximately twenty million, some ninety-eight percent have at least something of the Bible in a form meaningful to them, provided they can read. In addition to these strictly native American languages, there are publications in seven creole languages, including an entire Bible in Haitian Creole, based on French and spoken by more than six million people, a New Testament in Sranan, an English-based creole spoken by some 300,000 people in Surinam, and a New Testament in Papiamento, a Portuguese-based creole with heavy Spanish borrowings spoken in the Netherlands West Indies by more than 250,000 people.

Evaluating this important development in the translation of the scriptures is extremely difficult in view of a number of crucial factors: (1) in many instances lack of adequate field surveys for determining the degrees of mutual intelligibility between languages and dialects; (2) extreme differences in population sizes (e.g., in Ecuador, Peru, and Bolivia six million Quechuas are divided into some twenty different dialects, while in Brazil 77 languages out of 136 have less than 200 speakers); (3) extent of literacy (e.g., 600,000 literate Aymaras out of a total population of 1.7 million in contrast with ninety percent illiteracy in some other language areas); (4) ninety-two percent bilingualism in the Mexican Indian population and less than forty percent in a number of the Quechua dialects of Peru; and (5) significant differences in the quality of translations depending on the linguistic training of missionaries and the theological training of indigenous translators.

The majority of translations published in the languages of North America took place prior to 1900, while in Latin America and the Caribbean only thirteen out of 337 translations were published by that date, and most of the translations have appeared in print since World War II.

The first Bible to be translated and published in the Western Hemisphere was in the Massachusetts Indian language, spoken by a tribe of Indians settled along the Atlantic Coast north of Boston. John Eliot, a Roxbury minister originally from England, spent fifteen years learning the Indian language before beginning to translate. Genesis and Matthew were published in 1655 and the entire Bible in 1663. Eliot's decision to translate the Bible for the Indians living nearby was without precedent in modern times. Not since the eighth century CE had anyone undertaken to translate the entire Bible primarily for missionary purposes. Unfortunately, there are no Indians who still speak this language. But in Mohawk, an Iroquoian language, the gospel of Mark was first published in 1787, and later in the nineteenth century the rest of the New Testament appeared. These scriptures continue to be used by Mohawk Indians, many of whom live in New York City.

A fascinating story of biblical translation in North America concerns the Cherokee language and an orthography designed to represent the many distinctive sounds. Although an Indian named Sequoya could not read or write in English, he was deeply impressed by the power of written words. "If I could make things fast on paper, it would be like catching a wild animal and taming it," he said. Finally, he devised a remarkably accurate syllabary, completed in 1821 and subsequently used by missionaries to translate the New Testament in a version still widely used and cherished by Cherokees, who constitute the second-largest tribe in the United States.

In Latin America and the Caribbean the translation of the scriptures has been carried out by Christian missionaries representing a number of denominations as well as several so-called Faith Missions, such as the South American Indian Mission, New Tribes Mission, and the *Wycliffe Bible Translators, also known as the Summer Institute of Linguistics. The Wycliffe Bible Translators have been responsible for the production of New Testaments in 180 languages and have plans to undertake translations of the New Testament in twenty more languages and to complete work in thirty-five other languages in which work was begun but not completed.

Because of the limited educational opportunities for most native people in the Americas, Bible translating has generally been carried out by missionaries, but in some cases translation committees consist entirely of indigenous people. An example is the manuscript of the New Testament in the Inuktitut dialect of Eskimo (Eastern Arctic), which went to the printers in 1992; almost forty percent of the Old Testament is in first draft for some 20,000 Inuktitut speakers, of whom ninety percent are members of the Anglican church.

The languages of the Americas are remarkably diverse and in many instances are structurally very complex. Linguists have classified these languages into more than thirty families, each with distinctive structural features and different vocabularies. A number of languages in southern Mexico have even more tones than Cantonese Chinese and must employ a complex system of tone marks to indicate crucial differences of meaning. Some languages, like Eskimo and Quechua, have exceptionally long words, consisting of as many as a dozen syllables. Verbs in Quechua begin with a root and may be followed by a number of different suffixes and clitics in as many as eight positions in some dialects, with the result of many verbs having more than ten thousand forms.

Because of the linguistic problems faced by translators working in languages not previously reduced to writing, missionary translators have generally invested a great deal of time and effort in the development of scientific alphabets, the analysis of unusual grammatical constructions, and the study of oral literature. The Summer Institute of Linguistics has been particularly active and creative in this area of research.

Because of the linguistic and cultural differences between the biblical text and the indigenous ways of life, some people have seriously doubted the possibility of effective functional equivalence in translating, but the resources of language and culture are generally adequate. In fact, in one language there are two expressions for the ambiguous English expression "love of God." God's love for people is expressed as "God hides them in his heart" and people's love for God is "their hearts go away with God."

But for a full understanding of the biblical message there are serious cultural differences. Many Indians in South America see no reason "to fear God." He is generally regarded as being too far away to be of any real concern for people. What they fear are the malicious spirits of the forests, streams, and caves, which must be placated with gifts.

A traditional syncretistic Christopaganism also poses real problems for communication. In many areas a name such as Tata Dios, literally, "Father God," is really a name for the sun, and Mama Dios, literally "Mother God," is in some places a triple reference to the moon, the earth, and the Virgin Mary.

For a variety of reasons the publication of the scriptures in some Indian languages has not been a success, but where there have been missionaries or leaders of national churches who have encouraged literacy, instructed people in the meaning and relevance of the Bible message, and trained local leadership, the response has been remarkable.

The production of the scriptures in indigenous languages of the Americas has produced three important byproducts: literacy by believers anxious to learn to read the scriptures; concern for further education in their own language as well as in the dominant language of the area (Spanish, Portuguese, English, or French); and a sense of ethnic pride, so important for socially and economically exploited people. As one Totonac Indian said when he first purchased a New Testament in his own language, "Now we are a people because we have a book."

EUGENE A. NIDA

Tribes of Israel. The Hebrew Bible in its final form takes it for granted that the Israelite people is descended from the twelve sons of *Jacob, each being the ancestor of the tribe named after him (1 Kings 18.31). This tradition has persisted into later times. The book of Genesis records the births of Jacob's twelve sons (chaps. 29–35), and then provides a list of them arranged under the names of their mothers: *Reuben, *Simeon, *Levi, *Judah, *Issachar, and *Zebulun were the sons of *Leah; *Joseph and *Benjamin the sons of *Rachel; *Dan and *Naphtali the sons of Jacob's concubine Bilhah; *Gad and *Asher the sons of his concubine Zilpah (35.22–26). After Joseph, in Egypt, brought his family from Canaan (Gen. 46–47), the twelve brothers and their families continued to reside in Egypt and there increased in numbers, becoming the people of Israel, literally the "sons of Israel" (Exod. 1.1–7), Jacob's name having been changed by God to *Israel (Gen. 32.28; 35.10). This united people, after many vicissitudes, took possession of the land of Canaan and established their home there, with each tribe assigned its own territory (Josh. 13–19; Map 3).

The Bible is, however, not consistent with regard to either the number or the names of the tribes. In the numerous tribal lists found in the various books of the Bible, the number varies from eleven to thirteen. These variations are mainly due to the appearance in some lists of the two sons of Joseph, *Ephraim and *Manasseh (Gen. 48.8–20) as separate tribes, and to the omission of Simeon or Levi from others. In the Song of Deborah (Judg. 5), which is not necessarily a complete roll call of the tribes, Judah and Gad are missing, while Machir, the son of Manasseh (Josh. 17.1) appears to take the place of his "father." The variations are presumed to reflect fluctuations in the constitution and history of the tribes and their relative size and importance.

Very little is known of the early history of the tribes. The "blessing of Jacob" (Gen. 49) and the "blessing of Moses" (Deut. 33) contain some very ancient, but also very cryptic, allusions to early tribal events and characteristics, but these passages have also undergone later expansions and editing, especially in the blessing of Judah (Gen. 49.8–12), which is a "prophecy" of the kingdom of *David, and that of Joseph (Deut. 33.13–17), which reflects the special prominence at some time of the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh. Parts of the books of Joshua and Judges preserve traditions of the early history of some of the tribes during and after their settlement in Canaan. Some of these passages (especially Judg. 1) suggest that the tribes, rather than conquering and settling the entire country as a united people (the impression given by the book of Joshua in its present form), possessed no military or political unity at the time of the settlement, but were independent units each making its way into the country, in some cases encountering opposition from the local population. (See Conquest of Canaan; Social Sciences and the Bible, article on Cultural Anthropology and the Hebrew Bible.)

There can be little doubt that the concept of Israel as a close-knit family of twelve tribes acting in concert before, during, and after the settlement in Canaan is an elaboration of a later period. Although the tribes probably entered the country from outside, they did so for the most part in a piecemeal way, over a long period of time; the people of Israel was in fact constituted for the first time on Canaanite soil. Indeed, some of the tribes, such as Ephraim and Judah, appear to have acquired their names after their arrival in Canaan.

Little is known of the lives of the tribes after their arrival in Canaan, and of the process by which they may have moved toward some kind of national consciousness before the institution of the monarchy; scholarly opinions differ widely. Two groups, Judah (which seems to have been composed of several originally distinct elements) in the south, and the "house of Joseph" (which at some point constituted two distinct tribes, Ephraim and Manasseh) in the central highlands, seem to have been especially prominent. Less is known of the history of the other tribes further north and to the east of the Jordan, with the exception of Dan, which moved, probably under *Philistine pressure, from its original territory to the extreme north of the country (Judg. 18; compare chaps. 13–16). The tribe of Levi is an enigma. According to some traditions (Num. 1.47–54; Deut. 10.8–9; 18.1–2; 33.8–11; Josh. 13.14, 33) it was distinguished from all other tribes in that it was given no territorial rights but had special sacerdotal functions that entitled it to material support from the other tribes, among whom its members moved. In other passages (Gen. 34.25–31 and 49.5–7), however, it is portrayed as being on the same footing as the other tribes. (See Levites.)

It is important to realize that the word "tribe" does not necessarily suggest a nomadic or seminomadic existence or origin: in the ancient Near East and elsewhere, it frequently denotes a territorial group of settled agricultural or even urban people who claim a common ancestry. Moreover, despite the impression given by many passages in the Bible, the tribe was not the basic social or economic unit in Israel in either premonarchic or later times; the basic units were the family and the village, which were bound together by local agricultural and other common concerns. The larger body, the tribe, was a much looser unit whose main function was apparently, in the period before the monarchy, to provide a militia in times of danger. With the advent of the monarchy, the tribes lost this function and were henceforth little more than a means of genealogical identification. The division of the kingdom after the death of *Solomon was a political rather than a tribal matter.

See Israel, History of.

R. N. WHYBRAY

Tribute and Taxation. This entry deals with payments exacted upon subject populations by imperial powers, and consists of two articles, the first on the Ancient Near East, and the second on the Roman Empire.

Ancient Near East

Tribute and taxation encompass all obligations in precious metals, other goods, or service imposed by a central government on its own people, on visiting traders, or on regions that submitted to it. Tribute generally refers to payments made by one state to another dominant state to prevent attack or in ongoing submission. Taxation would then describe obligations within a state, including payments by visiting merchants. In the empires conquered by *Assyria (ninth to seventh centuries BCE), *Babylon (605–539 BCE), and *Persia (539 to the late fourth century BCE), payments by distant territories incorporated into the realm as provinces might still be called tribute, but with sovereignty lost this simply represented the highest stage in a pyramid of taxation required to support the central authority.

In the biblical portrayal of Israel's *conquest of the *Promised Land, the defeated peoples are annihilated when possible in holy *war, without negotiation. This extreme policy only applied where the goal was to occupy the land (see Deut. 20.16–18). When the *Canaanites managed a negotiated settlement, the obligation was not tribute but forced labor (Deut. 20.11; Josh. 9.26; 16.10; 17.13; Judg. 1.28). In the period of the judges, Israel repeatedly suffered defeat and is once said to have paid tribute, to Eglon of *Moab (Judg. 3.15–18).

By contrast, *David (ca. 1000–961 BCE) carved out a small empire that brought a flow of booty and tribute to the new capital at *Jerusalem, from Moab, *Aram, and Hamath (2 Sam. 8.2–10). This income continued under *Solomon (ca. 961–922; 1 Kings 4.21), supplemented by gifts and taxes received from foreign trade (1 Kings 10.14–15). David's new dynasty not only brought Israel great wealth but building projects, a standing army, and a palace bureaucracy, all of which required support by internal taxation along with the foreign revenue. There is no mention of civil taxation before the monarchy, although legal traditions provide for support of the religious institutions by payments such as offerings of first fruits (Exod. 23.19; Deut. 26.2–10) and *tithes (Lev. 27.30; Num. 18.21–32; Deut. 14.22–29).

The institution of *kingship in Israel is remembered by this negative side of success (1 Sam. 8), and the Bible acknowledges painful new taxation while boasting of Solomon's wealth. Solomon divided Israel into twelve (nontribal) districts to supply the monthly needs of the palace (1 Kings 4.7–19, 22–23, 27–28) and appointed high-ranking administrators (v. 56). He made the Israelites contribute forced labor for building the palace (1 Kings 5.13–14). 1 Samuel 8.11–17 lists further demands of royal taxation, including military conscription to support a chariot army and forced service as craftsmen, palace workers, and farmers. The burden of taxation is remembered as the principal cause of the separation by the northern tribes after Solomon, under Jeroboam I (922–901; 1 Kings 12). Even under David, a census for possible conscription of fighting men is treated as a crime (2 Sam. 24.1–17).

After the split into two kingdoms, there is little mention of internal taxation, although the kings surely continued the system at some level, in order to sustain palace and army. The Bible's depiction of the divided monarchy focuses once more on tribute, this time paid by Israel and Judah to hold off foreign attack. In the ninth century this consisted of one-time payments to the Aramean kingdom centered at *Damascus by Asa (913–873) and Joash (837–800) of Judah (1 Kings 15.19; 2 Kings 12.18), and *Ahab (869–850) of Israel (1 Kings 20.3–7). Aram gave way to the more distant but more serious threat from Assyria. Menahem (745–737) of Israel paid "Pul" (*Tiglath-pileser III, 745–727) to withdraw (2 Kings 15.19–20), and one-time payments are recorded for Ahaz (735–715) and *Hezekiah (715–687) of Judah to Tiglath-pileser and *Sennacherib (704–681; 2 Kings 16.8; 18.14–16). Assyrian royal annals also claim such tribute from *Jehu (843–815) of Israel to Shalmaneser III (858–824) and from Israel to Adad-nirari III (809–782).

Traumatic as it was, one-time payment represented the least of obligations in a hierarchy that proceeded to annual tribute and finally incorporation as a province of the empire. The first biblical indication of annual tribute occurs just before the fall of the north, when Hoshea (732–724) pays *Shalmaneser V (726–722; 2 Kings 17.4; cf. 18.9–11). Before their revolts, Johaiakim (609–598) and *Zedekiah (597–587) of Judah probably paid annual tribute in becoming vassals of Babylon (cf. 2 Kings 24.1, 17–18).

Detailed records from Assyria show us the system into which Israel and Judah were drawn. The Assyrian king received payments from foreign rulers as "tribute" (Akkadian maddattu) and namurtu, originally a gift brought for a royal audience. Payments from territories annexed to the empire were no longer called maddattu, but obligations increased, including various taxes on agricultural produce, animals, and other materials, along with the ilku, or personal service to the state. The ilku might involve military service or forced labor for public projects (canals, building repair, etc.), and it could be avoided by paying and supplying a replacement.

The provincial administration of the Assyrian empire was taken over by *Nebuchadrezzar (605–562) of Babylon, who could not otherwise have consolidated his new realm. Innovation was left to the Persians, who further expanded the empire. *Darius I (522–486) set up twenty satrapies, which combined existing provinces into larger units, including "Across-the-(Euphrates) River," or Syria-Palestine (Herodotus 3.89). Each satrapy then made a fixed payment according to its productive capacity, which actually protected the populace from local officials who might curry favor by promising higher revenue. Persian regulation of taxation was designed to produce stable submission, and complemented the measured local autonomy allowed in matters of religion and administration. Within each satrapy, however, enforcement of obligations for payments or service was handled mainly by local lords.

The sum of tax obligations in the district of Yehud (Judea) is described as "tribute, custom, and toll" in the complaint to the king by those who opposed reconstruction of Jerusalem, with the claim that a revolt would stop payment (Ezra 4.13, 20). The one concern of the empire was that its authority be recognized by an uninterrupted flow of revenue. There was ample opportunity for oppressive local taxation, as Nehemiah acknowledged when he refused the standard governor's levy for maintaining his household (Neh. 5.14–15).

Persian rule was brought to an abrupt end with *Alexander's sweep across the empire, but he simply took over the existing administrative systems. The dynasties of his generals, the Ptolemies in Egypt and the Seleucids in Mesopotamia and Syria, competed for control of Palestine, and eventual Seleucid domination in the second century BCE brought increased taxation, with collection rights sold to whomever promised the highest revenue (Josephus Ant. 12.4.1–5). Standard taxes are described in 1 Maccabees 10.29–30 as tribute, salt tax, crown levy, one-third of grain, and one-half of fruit.

DANIEL E. FLEMING

Roman Empire

Rome acquired its first province (part of Sicily) in the middle of the third century BCE after defeating the Carthaginians, and took over the system of taxation they had instituted there. Similarly, as more provinces were added during the next two centuries, local systems were for the most part taken over without any attempt to introduce uniformity. A new general tax was instituted only where there had been no previous control or systematic taxation by any power. The chief purpose of direct taxation was to pay the costs of the wars of conquest and of continuing control. Thus, the tax in Spain was called stipendium, that is, "soldiers' pay." Although government monopolies and indirect taxes, farmed out to *publicans, were often profitable, and although a great deal of wealth flowed in various ways from the provinces both to Roman individuals and to the state, no major profit seems to have been derived from direct taxation before the annexation of the kingdom of Pergamum.

The gradual annexation of the kingdoms around the eastern Mediterranean, from Pergamum (133 BCE) to Egypt (30 BCE), produced a major change. Most of them had been thoroughly organized by their Hellenistic monarchs for their own profit, and Rome inherited both the organization and the profits, often simplifying collection by using the experienced publicani. In the 60s BCE, Pompey annexed some of these territories and reorganized others, greatly increasing public revenues. He also initiated the practice of imposing tribute on minor client rulers, thus increasing public profit without assuming any direct administration of intractable populations.

The result, by the end of the Republic, was an aggregate of provinces in which direct taxes were levied at different rates and collected in different ways (either by officials or by publicani), and each province was a mosaic of political entities of varying degrees of administrative and fiscal subjection. Extortion and dissatisfaction increased as the state proved unable to control either its administrators (members of its governing body, the Senate) or the powerful corporations of publicani, and the civil wars of the 40s and 30s BCE greatly increased the financial burdens of the provinces while disrupting their administration and economy.

Augustus tried to tighten control and begin some systematization. Censuses of people were taken in new and in some old provinces (thus the famous one of Sulpicius Quirinius in Syria and Judea: see Luke 2.1–4, with some chronological confusion, and cf. Acts 5.37; see also Chronology, article on Early Christian Chronology); and, following a limited example set by Caesar, he continued the removal of publicani from the collection of direct taxes and had them collected instead by officials in new provinces. His immediate successors completed these measures, but the large variety of local statuses and the farming of the numerous indirect taxes (see below) by publicani were only very slowly reduced. On the whole these changes benefited the government and not the taxpayers.

In Palestine, *Herod paid a fixed tribute to Rome and could collect his own taxes as he saw fit. We know little about how he did so, and the protests to Augustus after his death about his administration do not dwell on fiscal oppression. His sons inherited his obligations and his privilege, and although we are told the total of their revenues (Josephus, Ant. 17.11.318–20), we do not know much about their method of collection. In outline, though, their system did not differ much from that introduced by Augustus into Judea after its annexation (6 CE) or from that of Roman Syria, since both were descended from Hellenistic models.

In Judea there were two regular direct taxes: a tax on agricultural produce, still levied in kind, but during the early empire converted into a fixed amount of money as in all other provinces; and a poll tax, about which we know little in detail. Perhaps paid only by those not liable to the produce tax, it consisted of a flat-rate personal tax on all men from age fourteen and women from age twelve to age sixty-five and was levied at least at the rate of one denarius (about a day's wage) per year (see the tribute *money of the Gospels: Matt. 22.15–22 par.). Later (we do not know when) it was combined with a percentage tax on property. These were paid to Roman officials, but we do not know who collected them from the taxpayers. (Income taxes were unknown in antiquity.) By 17 CE they were so burdensome that a joint deputation from Syria and Judea asked Tiberius for relief (Tacitus, Annals 2.42.5). We casually hear of other taxes, for example, a house tax in Jerusalem, and we must assume the impositions known from other provinces: the notorious aurum coronarium, originally a contribution to a governor's Roman triumph, but later demanded by emperors on various occasions; lavish free hospitality for governors and their staffs and friends; perhaps quartering of soldiers; and—an item subject to unsuccessful regulation ever since Augustus—responsibility for the transport of official parties by communities along the roads. The incidence of the total of direct taxation was thus uneven and unpredictable.

Indirect taxes were probably worse. Government monopolies (such as salt, the produce of lakes and rivers, and the famed Judean balm) were farmed out to publicani, as were the Roman customs duties and road tolls at provincial boundaries (and perhaps elsewhere) and harbor dues. On top of these, cities were free to impose charges for their own revenues. The result was great disparity in the cost of the same products between communities, as well as the usual bribery at the point of collection, and the highest cost of living in the Near East. The poor naturally suffered most, and this social and economic component merged with religious and nationalist feelings in the revolts against Rome. Each failed revolt resulted in harsher exactions and an increase in distress and dissatisfaction.

E. BADIAN

Trinity. Because the Trinity is such an important part of later Christian doctrine, it is striking that the term does not appear in the New Testament. Likewise, the developed concept of three coequal partners in the Godhead found in later creedal formulations cannot be clearly detected within the confines of the *canon.

Later believers systematized the diverse references to God, *Jesus, and the Spirit found in the New Testament in order to fight against heretical tendencies of how the three are related. Elaboration on the concept of a Trinity also serves to defend the church against charges of di- or tritheism. Since the Christians have come to worship Jesus as a god (Pliny, Epistles 96.7), how can they claim to be continuing the *monotheistic tradition of the God of Israel? Various answers are suggested, debated, and rejected as heretical, but the idea of a Trinity—one God subsisting in three persons and one substance—ultimately prevails.

While the New Testament writers say a great deal about God, Jesus, and the Spirit of each, no New Testament writer expounds on the relationship among the three in the detail that later Christian writers do.

The earliest New Testament evidence for a tripartite formula comes in 2 Corinthians 13.13, where Paul wishes that "the grace of the Lord Jesus, the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Spirit" be with the people of Corinth. It is possible that this three-part formula derives from later liturgical usage and was added to the text of 2 Corinthians as it was copied. In support of the authenticity of the passage, however, it must be said that the phrasing is much closer to Paul's understandings of God, Jesus, and the Holy Spirit than to a more fully developed concept of the Trinity. Jesus, referred to not as Son but as Lord and Christ, is mentioned first and is connected with the central Pauline theme of *grace. God is referred to as a source of love, not as father, and the Spirit promotes sharing within the community. The word "holy" does not appear before "spirit" in the earliest manuscript evidence for this passage.

A more familiar formulation is found in Matthew 28.19, where Jesus commands the disciples to go out and baptize "in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit." The phrasing probably reflects baptismal practice in churches at Matthew's time or later if the line is interpolated. Elsewhere Matthew records a special connection between God the Father and Jesus the Son (e.g., 11.27), but he falls short of claiming that Jesus is equal with God (cf. 24.36).

It is John's gospel that suggests the idea of equality between Jesus and God ("I and the Father are one"; 10.30). The Gospel starts with the affirmation that in the beginning Jesus as Word (see Logos) "was with God and . . . was God" (1.1), and ends (chap. 21 is most likely a later addition) with Thomas's confession of faith to Jesus, "My Lord and my God!" (20.28). The Fourth Gospel also elaborates on the role of the Holy Spirit as the Paraclete sent to be an advocate for the believers (John 14.15–26).

For the community of John's gospel, these passages provide assurance of the presence and power of God both in the ministry of Jesus and in the ongoing life of the community. Beyond this immediate context, however, such references raise the question of how Father, Son, and Spirit can be distinct and yet the same. This issue is debated over the following centuries and is only resolved by agreement and exclusion during the christological disputes and creedal councils of the fourth century and beyond.

While there are other New Testament texts where God, Jesus, and the Spirit are referred to in the same passage (e.g., Jude 20–21), it is important to avoid reading the Trinity into places where it does not appear. An example is 1 Peter 1.1–2, in which the salutation is addressed to those who have been chosen "according to the foreknowledge of God the Father in holiness of spirit." This reference may be to the holiness of spirit of the believers, but translators consistently take it as the Holy Spirit in order to complete the assumed trinitarian character of the verse: "who have been chosen and destined by God the Father and sanctified by the Spirit" (NRSV). This translation not only imposes later trinitarian perspectives on the text but also diminishes the important use of the spirit of human beings elsewhere in 1 Peter (e.g., 3.4, 19).

DANIEL N. SCHOWALTER

Twelve, The. "The twelve" is an expression employed by all the Gospel writers, and once by Paul (1 Cor. 15.5), to denote an inner, more intimate circle of followers of Jesus. They are listed by name in Matthew 10.2–4, Mark 3.16–19, Luke 6.14–16, and Acts 1.13, and although these lists do not always agree in either the names or their order, the reader is always told that Jesus chose twelve disciples in particular. While these twelve are *disciples, they are further distinguished by the designation "the twelve." This is especially the case in Acts 6.1–2, where the disciples and the twelve are juxtaposed; the latter are clearly the authorities in the story. As readers, we know who the twelve are, including *Judas Iscariot—a point stressed by all the authors, and we see that they are the recipients of special instruction, have certain expectations from Jesus, and bear the burden of gathering the community of his followers together after the upheaval of the *crucifixion and *resurrection.

Whether the names and the widespread agreement among the Gospel writers about the number twelve are historical facts is difficult to say. Did Jesus really call twelve followers initially who then called others? This is possible. Did Jesus consciously act as if he were establishing the new Israel by selecting twelve representatives? The symbolic significance of the number twelve is difficult to miss. But there are others in the story who are just as close or closer to him than the twelve, such as some women and others who are called disciples. The twelve do get special teaching; perhaps Jesus was training leaders to carry on in his stead. In Mark, however, the twelve hardly understand anything (see Messianic Secret); the special teaching apparently does not pay off. The roles of the disciples and the twelve are so important in the stories, and they have received so much attention from both the authors and the interpreters, that what actually transpired historically is impossible to retrieve. Matthew himself, for example, uses the terms disciple, *apostle, and the twelve interchangeably in chap. 10, as if these were all equivalent or the distinctions were needless.

The symbolism of the number twelve was certainly clear to the authors, and it has not been lost on subsequent interpreters (see Number Symbolism). A program of the renewal if not the reconstitution of Israel by the Jesus movement is strongly suggested by the number itself, as well as the collection of twelve baskets at the multiplication of the loaves and fishes (Matt. 14.20 par; John 6.13), the portrayal of the disciples sitting on twelve thrones judging Israel (Matt. 19.28; cf. Luke 22.30), and the repeated use of the number twelve in the book of *Revelation (7.5–8; 12.1; 21.12–14; 21.21; 22.2). The usurpation of Israel's symbols and heroic figures (see Tribes of Israel) along with Israel's scriptures and myths, and in particular use of the potent symbol twelve, points in this direction for early Christianity. Ultimately, however, the church claimed through Melito, Justin, and others to be a "third race" and not the renewed Israel the number twelve suggested.

J. ANDREW OVERMAN

Typology. The practice in the New Testament and the early church whereby a person or a series of events occurring in the Old Testament is interpreted as a type or foreshadowing of some person (almost invariably Christ) or feature in the Christian dispensation. For example, in 1 Peter 3.19–21 the story of *Noah's *ark is taken as a type of *baptism, and in Hebrews 11.17–19 *Abraham's willingness to sacrifice his son *Isaac (see Aqedah) is understood as a type of Christ's resurrection. These two examples also show that the word "type" need not be used for a typological comparison to be made.

The very possibility of such typology depends on the Christian assumption that the Bible recounts the course of salvation history. By this is meant the Bible as a record of the long development by which God, with a redemptive purpose always in mind, called Israel into being out of Egypt, led her through the *wilderness, made a *covenant with her, brought her into *Canaan, guided and admonished her through her troubled history (including the traumatic experience of the Babylonian *exile), and consummated his relationship by sending his Son in Jesus Christ—thereby effecting an eternal salvation by establishing a people of God whose membership is open to all. What justifies understanding the Bible typologically (if it can be justified) is the conviction that God is always the same. If he is fully known in Jesus Christ, then when he revealed himself under the old dispensation, he must in some sense have been known as the God of Jesus Christ. It is, therefore, justifiable to seek in his revelation of himself under the old dispensation some similarity with his revelation under the new. In fact, a sort of typology can be found in the Hebrew Bible itself: see, for example, Isaiah 43.1–19; 51.9–11, where God's action of old in creation and redemption from Egypt are treated as types of the new deliverance from exile about to occur (see Exodus, The).

Clear examples of typology occur in 1 Corinthians 10.1–11, where the events of the crossing of the *Red Sea, the giving of the *manna, and the water issuing miraculously from the rock are taken as types of baptism and of the bread and wine in the Eucharist. What is more, the presence of the preexistent Christ with Israel in the wilderness is implied.

If used excessively or indiscriminately, typology can pass over into allegory. Allegory means using any person, event, or object in the Old Testament arbitrarily to signify a corresponding event or thing in the New Testament. The difference lies in the authenticity of the analogy. Allegory does sometimes appear in the New Testament; in Galatians 4.21–30, for example, *Paul launches into an elaborate comparison of *Ishmael and Isaac, on the one hand, with Judaism and Christianity, on the other. But he brings in so many terms of comparison that the meaning merges into an unconvincing allegory. Again, in 1 Corinthians 9.9–10 Paul argues that apostles have a right to be supported because, according to the Law, an ox is allowed to eat the grain as it treads it out. The comparison fails to carry much conviction, however, because oxen are not apostles.

Some modern Roman Catholic scholars have used the medieval concept of sensus plenior to justify a modern use of typology. This was the idea that the words of inspired writers in the Old Testament might bear a deeper or fuller sense than they were aware of, and that this deeper sense can be perceived in the New Testament. This can be a helpful and illuminating way of reading the Bible as long as it is kept within reasonable bounds. For example, in Psalm 119.105 the psalmist exclaims, "Your word is a lamp to my feet." A Christian, who knows of the Word made flesh, may reasonably and profitably apply this to Christ, as long as one does not claim that the psalmist knew about Christ in writing the words.

See also Interpretation, History of, article on Early Christian Interpretation.

ANTHONY TYRRELL HANSON

U

Ugaritic. In 1928 a Syrian farmer accidentally uncovered ancient tombs on the Mediterranean coast, directly opposite the northeastern tip of Cyprus. This led to the excavation of the main city at nearby Ras Shamra, which yielded one of the most sensational archaeological finds of the twentieth century: the political and religious texts of archives of the ancient kingdom of Ugarit. The French excavators uncovered numerous cuneiform tablets, many of which were written in a hitherto unknown alphabetic script. On decipherment of that alphabet, it was seen that the language of Ugarit belongs, with *Hebrew and *Aramaic, to the family of Northwest Semitic languages. Dating roughly from the fifteenth to the thirteenth centuries BCE, these tablets now include a large collection of various kinds of texts: literary, religious, epistolary, administrative, and economic. Together they form the single most important archaeological contribution in the twentieth century to our knowledge of the language and symbol world of ancient Israel.

In the first place, the discovery of the Ugaritic tablets has greatly enhanced, and at times corrected, our understanding of biblical Hebrew. Many Hebrew words whose meanings had been unknown or merely conjectured have been clarified by Ugaritic cognates. The close relationship of Hebrew with Ugaritic, moreover, allows one to reconstruct still more accurately the early history of the Hebrew language and to discern some early linguistic features in (and hence the relative dates of) parts of the Hebrew Bible. The identification of certain grammatical elements in Northwest Semitic languages has greatly facilitated the task of translating the Hebrew Bible; texts that were hitherto grammatically awkward, if not impossible, can now be explained (e.g., Pss. 29.6; 68.2; 89.18; Isa. 9.19; 10.2). On the basis of Ugaritic literature too, scholars have been able to make advances in the study of Hebrew prosody, for the two languages apparently share the same poetic structures and utilize the same stylistic devices (see Poetry, Biblical Hebrew).

Beyond the details of language and prosody, the tablets also contribute to our knowledge of Canaanite religion. The Ugaritic pantheon includes many of the gods already known to us from the Hebrew Bible as Canaanite deities against whom the prophets inveighed. Much more is now known, for example, about *Baal and *Asherah (Athirat in Ugaritic) and the fertility cult with which they are associated. Thus, in *Elijah's encounter with the prophets of Baal (1 Kings 18), the failure of the latter to bring rain demonstrates the impotence of Baal even in what was thought to be his domain; instead, it is Yahweh who controls nature. But the value of the Ugaritic texts goes beyond the horizons of Canaanite faith. The evidence suggests that Israelite theology was not as radically discontinuous with Canaanite religions as was once thought. Yahweh was imbued with characteristics associated with El and Baal. Like El, the chief deity of the Ugaritic pantheon, Israel's God is regarded as the Most High (Pss. 47.2; 97.9; Deut. 32.8; Gen. 14.19) who presides over the divine council and judges other gods (cf. Ps. 82; 89.5–7). The Ugaritic descriptions of El's abode (a tent) in "the far north" (see Zaphon) and "at the source of the two-rivers" correspond to the biblical depiction of the divine abode (Isa. 14.13; 33.20–22; Ezek. 47.1–12; Joel 4.18; Zech. 14.8), which, according to Judean theology, was on Mount *Zion (2 Sam. 6–7; Ps. 46.4). Like the storm-god Baal, Yahweh is portrayed as a divine warrior who sets out to fight the cosmic forces of chaos most commonly depicted as the flood(s) (e.g., Pss. 29.10; 93.3; 98.8) and "mighty waters" (Pss. 29.3; 77.19; 93.4; Hab. 3.15), as sea and river (corresponding to the Ugaritic synonymous parallelism Prince Sea/Judge River; Pss 24.2; 89.25; 114. 3; Isa. 50.2; Hab. 3.8), and as sea monsters, including *Leviathan (Ugaritic ltn). Accordingly, the manifestation of divine presence is often couched in the language of a storm *theophany (Ps. 29; 97.1–6; 2 Sam. 22.8–16). Indeed, the language and content of Psalm 29 are so reminiscent of Ugaritic that scholars are generally agreed that it was originally a Canaanite hymn to Baal adapted for Yahwistic worship. As in the Ugaritic myths and hymns, the divine warrior in the Bible is enthroned in the sanctuary as a consequence of the victory over enemies. It has also become clear that Isaiah's metaphor of the fallen "Day Star" (Isa. 14.12–15) is to be located in the Ugaritic myth of the fallen astral deities, notably Athtar, who presumed to usurp the throne of Baal; the persistence of this theme is seen in the later development of traditions about *Satan (Luke 10.18).

From the Ugaritic tablets, much can also be learned about the social institutions and structure of the region. The legends and administrative texts provide insights into the Israelite understanding of divine and human *kingship. Among other things, it was the king's task to "decide the case of the widow" and to "judge the suit of the orphan"; failure to do so was tantamount to surrender of royal prerogative. Besides the king, one learns about various cultic functionaries, military personnel, and people of various social strata. Among the military elite and powerful nobility are people designated "bulls," "gazelles," "boars," and the like (cf. Exod. 15.15; Isa. 14.9; Ezek. 34.17; Amos 4.1; 2 Sam. 1.19). In the Ugaritic texts, one encounters a respected group known as the nqdm, a class or guild to which Mesha the king of *Moab and *Amos belong, calling into question the traditional translation of nqd as "shepherd" (Amos 1.1).

In minute details of the Hebrew language as well as in our understanding of broad themes and literary forms in the Bible, Ugaritic has had an impact. Several commentaries and numerous reference works have been written with the explicit purpose of elucidating the biblical text through the advances made possible by the discoveries at Ras Shamra. Although the correspondences between the Ugaritic texts and the Bible have at times been exaggerated in scholarly works, the study of Ugaritic is an indispensable discipline in biblical scholarship.

See also Canaan; Israel, Religion of; Myth.

C. L. SEOW

Unknown God. A dedication found on an Athenian altar according to Acts 17.23. Altars belonging to unknown gods (plural) at Olympia and elsewhere were probably aimed at satisfying divinities who had been overlooked, but they do not explain the singular formulation in Acts. Because votive offerings were connected to specific prayers, it is unlikely that an individual who had received aid would make a dedication to an unknown divinity. There is no evidence that either *Stoics or *gnostics addressed or worshiped the supreme being as an unknown god. The most likely reference is to the anonymous altars (i.e., bearing no inscription) erected to local divinities throughout *Athens under Solon. In Roman literature, these altars are sometimes cited as dedications to unknown gods (always plural). Whatever the source, the *Areopagus speech reveals both the importance of relating the Christian message to broader cultural assumptions and the distinctiveness of Christian *monotheism.

ROBERT STOOPS

Urim and Thummim. These two words usually occur together (Exod. 28.30; Lev. 8.8; Deut. 33.8; Ezra 2.63; Neh. 7.65; 1 Esd. 5.40; Sir. 45.10; and the LXX of 1 Sam. 14.41); in Numbers 27.21 and 1 Samuel 28.6 only the word Urim occurs. The meaning of the words is not certain. Although both are plural in form, they seem to refer to single objects that functioned as sacred lots and may have had the form of dice, pebbles, or sticks. Another possibility is that they were two stones, one white and the other black. According to the texts in Exodus and Leviticus Moses put the Urim and Thummim into Aaron's breastpiece, a small square pocket attached to the *ephod, an outer covering. Uncertainty about the meaning and function of the ephod complicates the matter further. What is clear is that they were associated with the priestly office and were used when people came to seek divine consultation. Apparently, therefore, it was thought possible for the high priest and the Levites to give a divine oracle with the help of the Urim and Thummim. From 1 Samuel 14.41 we may conclude that these sacred lots provided a "yes" or "no" answer. Saul's inquiry of the Lord in 1 Samuel 28.6 shows that a positive or negative answer was not guaranteed, and it may mean that the procedure followed was not as simple as our "heads or tails" method.

The contexts where the Urim and Thummim are mentioned seem to indicate that these lots fell into disuse when the monarchy was established. The parallel texts in Ezra 2.63, Nehemiah 7.65, and 1 Esdras 5.40 may imply that a return to the use of the Urim and Thummim was not expected.

In Hebrew letters the words are the motto of Yale University.

See Magic and Divination.

HENDRIK C. SPYKERBOER

Ur of the Chaldeans. The homeland of *Abraham and the starting point of his *migration to Canaan (Gen. 11.28, 31; 15.7; Neh. 9.7), Ur of the Chaldeans (AV: Chaldees) is traditionally identified with the southern Mesopotamian site Tell el-Muqayyar (Maps 6, 7:J4), on the *Euphrates river. The site was systematically excavated from 1922 to 1934 by Sir Leonard Woolley. Among his discoveries were the *ziggurat constructed by Ur-nammu, the founder of the Ur III Dynasty, in the late third millennium BCE and, in the royal cemetery, the burial of queen Pu-abi, whose grave had never been robbed.

The identification of "Ur of the Chaldees" with Tell el-Muqayyar is not universally accepted. Some scholars have suggested that it is Urfa (Edessa), while others have proposed a connection with a city named Ura. It has also been suggested that Ur in this context may reflect the generic Sumerian word for city, URU; note that in the *Septuagint "Ur of the Chaldeans" is translated "land of the Chaldeans" (cf. Acts 7.4).

The Chaldeans were a group of five tribes who became dominant in *Babylonia during the late sixth century BCE. They are not mentioned by name in any source before the ninth century, which makes the biblical phrase "Ur of the Chaldeans" relatively late. JAMES H. PLATT Utensils. See Houses, Furniture, Utensils.

V

Vengeance. In biblical thought, God's vengeance is an expression of his *holiness. Rendering vengeance to his adversaries is essentially a response to evil. Vengeance is punishment in retribution for injury and so is often linked with the wrath of God (Isa. 59.17; 63.4; Nah. 1.2). Vengeance was understood as God's way of redressing wrongs, and the word seldom has a connotation of vindictiveness. Cries to Yahweh for vengeance (Jer. 11.20; 15.15; 20.12; 50.15; Ps. 94.1–3) are cries for healing and redemption—even though a restoration may call for retributive justice. God's vengeance is balanced by his *mercy (Ps. 103.10). Vengeance, then, is very much a part of God's character and does not contradict his love.

God's vengeance is directed at those who oppose him and who refuse to acknowledge his commands. These include his enemies (Deut. 32.41, 43; Nah. 1.2), who are often other nations (Ps. 149.7; Mic. 5.15), or a single nation that has done evil (Ezek. 25.14, 17), especially toward Israel, God's people (Deut. 32.35, 36). When, however, Israel becomes unfaithful to Yahweh and breaks *covenant, God's vengeance exacts punishment also on Israel (Lev. 26.25; Isa. 1.24; Jer. 5.9,12). In the absence of justice in the land, God puts on his "garments of vengeance" (Isa. 59.17), ready to punish Israel, ready to display his wrath. Vengeance, then, is a sign of God's working in history, fulfilling his purposes. Although vengeance belongs to him alone (Deut. 32.35; Rom. 12.19; Heb. 10.30), God can authorize people to act as agents of his vengeance (Num. 31.2–3; 2 Kings 9.7; Ezek. 25.14).

Since wrongs are not always righted in the present and God's vengeance is delayed because of his patience, later prophets look forward to a "day of vengeance" in the future—an apocalyptic day that will mark the beginning of a new age (Isa. 34.8; 35.4; Jer.46.10; see Day of the Lord).

Although the Hebrew Bible has little to say about life after death (see Afterlife and Immortality), the hope that sin will be punished and faithfulness be rewarded in the life to come is stated in Daniel 12.2, 3. In the New Testament divine vengeance is closely tied to the *day of judgment at the end of the age, when Christ will return in glory (see Second Coming of Christ). For the wicked he appears "in flaming fire, inflicting vengeance" (2 Thess. 1.8; Jude 7), but innocent sufferers who wonder why God does not act on their behalf (Rev. 6.10) have the assurance that in the end he will vindicate his servants (Rev. 19.2).

Vengeance as a principle of *law was well established in ancient Israel: "life for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth" (Exod. 21.23–24; cf. Deut. 19.21); this is known as the lex talionis (the law of equivalent retribution). On its face it seems brutal, but it was an advance in legal thinking. It shut the door to unlimited revenge and kept the punishment from exceeding the crime. It established the principle of equity in punishment and allowed for no favoritism. The law functioned under the jurisdiction of judges (Exod. 21.22; Deut. 19.17–18).

The New Testament upholds the right of the governing authorities to avenge wrongs, acting as God's servants for the well-being of the community (Rom. 13.4; 1 Pet. 2.14). As in ancient Israel, personal vengeance was forbidden (Lev. 19.18; Rom. 12.19); indeed, doing an enemy good was considered to be a part of wisdom (Prov. 25.21; Rom. 12.20). Jesus not only taught nonretaliation, exhorting his followers to suffer loss rather than resort to personal vindictiveness (Matt. 5.38–48 par.), but he also modeled it (1 Pet. 2.23).

See also Avenger of Blood. DAVID EWERT

Verse Division. See Chapter and Verse Divisions.

Versions. See Translations.

Vine and Vineyard. The "Song of the Vineyard" (Isa. 5.1–7) describes the different steps that were required to plant a vineyard and successfully harvest its grapes. First the soil had to be cleared of stones before planting the vine stocks in it. The stones could be used to build a wall to keep out animals such as boars (Ps. 80.13) and foxes (Song of Sol. 2.15). A watchtower might also be constructed to ensure the safety of the crop, especially at harvest time (Isa. 5.2). The vinedresser would prune away the new small shoots so that the main fruit-bearing stems would obtain greater nourishment (Lev. 25.3; Isa. 18.5; John 15.2). A wine press would be constructed (usually hewn of rock), for the main purpose of raising grapes in ancient times was for the making of *wine.

The symbolic use of the vine occurs throughout the Bible. In Psalm 80.8 Israel is identified as a vine: "You brought a vine out of Egypt; you drove out the nations and planted it." While this imagery is used positively to indicate how Israel will bear fruit as a vine (Hos. 14.7; cf. Ps. 128.3), more commonly Israel is described as an unproductive vine (Jer. 8.13; cf. 6.9), a vine that is plucked up and left to wither away (Ezek. 19.12), a choice vine that has become wild (Jer. 2.21). Closely related to this imagery is the portrayal of Israel as a vineyard, as in Isaiah 5.1–7. Here Israel, whom Yahweh planted looking for choice grapes, has yielded wild grapes (Jer. 12.10–11). Many have understood John's image of Jesus as "the true vine" (John 15.1) as a deliberate contrast to the portrayal of Israel as a vine/vineyard that has not proved fruitful.

In the Gospels, Jesus is quoted as using the vineyard in two *parables: the parable of the laborers in the vineyard who were hired at different hours of the day (Matt. 20.1–16), and the parable of the wicked vinedressers (Matt. 21.33–41 par.); the description in the latter of the work done in the vineyard is derived from Isaiah 5.1–7. EDGAR W. CONRAD Virgin Birth of Christ. As a major tenet of Roman Catholic teaching and a foundation for fundamentalist belief, the virgin birth remains an essential doctrine for many Christians. Since the advent of modern historical criticism, however, others have been skeptical about the virgin birth. Ultimately, the issue will be decided by a person's faith stance and view of scripture.

Belief in the virgin birth of Christ is based on the stories of Jesus' birth found in the gospels of Matthew and Luke. In Luke 1.5–38, shortly after Elizabeth miraculously conceives in her old age, the angel *Gabriel appears to *Mary who is specifically described as a virgin (Grk. parthenos). He tells Mary that she will conceive and bear a son who will inherit the throne of *David. Mary, surprised by this news, asks "How can this be, since I do not know a man?" Gabriel reassures her that she will be impregnated by the Holy Spirit and cites as proof the fact that Elizabeth is now with child. There is no confusion possible in Luke's account. The author wants it to be clear that this is a miraculous impregnation of a woman who had not had sexual relations. The detailed nature of this dialogue between Mary and Gabriel suggests that the author of Luke was responding to specific questions about the virgin birth of Christ. Luke also alludes to the virgin birth in his *genealogy of Jesus when he says that Jesus was "the son (as was supposed) of Joseph" (Luke 3.23).

Matthew 1.18–25 takes the tradition about Jesus' miraculous conception and develops it in a slightly different way. The angel, who is not named, appears not to Mary but to *Joseph, who has discovered that Mary is pregnant. Although Joseph plans to break off his engagement, the angel commands him to go through with the marriage since the child is from the Holy Spirit. As in Luke, Matthew wishes to make it clear that Mary and Joseph had not had sexual relations prior to this announcement (1.18). In fact, the author stresses that Joseph "did not know her until she had borne a son" (Matt. 1.25).

The author of Matthew often attempts to prove that Jesus is the *Messiah by showing how the details of his life fulfill the Hebrew scriptures. In this case, Matthew presents a passage from Isaiah 7 in which the prophet is speaking to Ahaz, king of Judah. Ahaz faces attack from the forces of *Syria and Israel (734 BCE), and so he is contemplating an alliance with the king of *Assyria. God makes it clear to Ahaz that such an alliance should not take place. Isaiah declares that the Lord will provide a sign that will make known the Lord's will in spite of Ahaz's recalcitrance. A young woman who is pregnant will bear a son, and before that child is old enough to tell the difference between good and evil, the powers that threaten Judah will be defeated. Ahaz refuses to believe the sign and sends tribute to the Assyrian king who destroys *Damascus and kills the king of Syria (2 Kings 16.9). The other threatening force, Israel, is conquered by Assyria twelve years after the occasion of this sign at about the time that the child mentioned in the sign would have reached the age of maturity.

Isaiah's intent in discussing this child is clearly to set a time frame for the destruction of Israel. There is nothing miraculous about the mother or the conception process. The Hebrew word used, ʿalmâ, means simply "young woman," without any implication of virginity. The Greek word parthenos used to translate ʿalmâ can mean either a young woman or a virgin. Matthew used a Greek Bible, so he naturally reinterpreted Isaiah 7:14 as a prophecy referring to the virgin birth of Jesus. For the evangelist, Isaiah's original meaning was superseded by the identification of Jesus as *Immanuel (Grk. Emmanouēl).

One of the most frequently raised objections to the virgin birth is that, with the exception of Matthew and Luke, New Testament authors do not make explicit mention of it. Other alleged references are at best vague allusions (Mark 6.3; John 1.13–14; 6.42). Such an argument from silence cannot be determinative, but it is an important consideration for people who see the virgin birth as a feature created within the early traditions about Jesus rather than a historical occurrence.

Those who doubt the historicity of the virgin birth argue that it was created by the early church as a way of honoring the coming of Jesus as the *Son of God or of explaining the idea of God becoming flesh. Miraculous human birth stories are common in biblical tradition, going back to Abraham and Sarah (Gen. 17.15–19, 18.9–15, 21.1–7), and numerous references to deities impregnating women are found within the Greco-Roman tradition. The mother of Heracles, for instance, was said to have been impregnated by Zeus (Diodorus Siculus, 4.9,1–10).

Affirmation of the virgin birth by the apostolic father Ignatius (Smyrneans 1) confirms that the concept was an early and strongly held belief. As Christian doctrine developed, the virgin birth became a preeminent statement of faith and the ultimate test of belief in biblical inerrancy. It was also expanded in several directions. The veneration of Mary is related to the virgin birth, as is the tradition that Mary was ever virgin. Belief in this latter concept requires that the *brothers and sisters of Jesus mentioned in the New Testament must have been stepbrothers and stepsisters or cousins. Mary's virginity also becomes an important factor in ascetic Christianity and in the promotion of a life of celibacy.

DANIEL N. SCHOWALTER

Vulgate. The translation of the Bible into Latin by Jerome. Pope Damascus commissioned the work in 382 CE because previous Latin translations had been piecemeal, inelegant, and sometimes unreliable. Jerome spent twenty years on the project. For the Old Testament he produced an entirely fresh translation, taking the revolutionary step of relying largely on the original *Hebrew and *Aramaic, rather than the customary Greek version, the *Septuagint (except in the Psalms). Jerome's work on the New Testament followed his predecessors much more closely. The whole project was complete in 405 CE.

Pious tradition prevented Jerome's version from entirely supplanting the older Latin translations for many years, but the Vulgate eventually gained broad acceptance among the Latin-speaking Christian public. It thus came to be called the versio vulgata, the "common translation," and to this day remains the official scriptural text of the Roman Catholic church. The first printed book was the Vulgate Bible (see Gutenberg). The Renaissance, with its interest in Greek antiquity, and then later the Enlightenment, with its interest in historical inquiry, were ultimately to challenge the primacy of the Vulgate in the Western church for purposes of critical biblical scholarship.

See also Translations, article on Ancient Languages.

PHILIP SELLEW

W

Wadi. An Arabic word meaning a deep gully or streambed that is dry except during the winter rains. These gullies are ubiquitous in the Palestinian landscape and are similar to the arroyos of the American Southwest. The word "wadi" is used, inconsistently and somewhat inappropriately, in the NRSV, to translate Hebrew naḥal, especially in the names of individual valleys; but when the term is generic, NRSV uses words like "valley," "brook," "river," and "torrent" for the same Hebrew word, following the practice of other translations for all its occurrences.

See also River of Egypt.

MICHAEL D. COOGAN

War. In the Hebrew Bible war almost always refers to armed struggle between nations; in the New Testament the word more often refers to spiritual or cosmic conflict against evil.

Hebrew Bible. It is important to recognize that Israel was both a nation and a people of Yahweh its God. As a nation, it lived among other nations and was subject to the struggles—military, economic, social, and political—that are common to all nations. As a people of God, the Israelites were constantly being reminded that they were to put their trust in the Lord (cf. Ps. 20.7).

Since God had chosen them to be his "treasured possession" (Deut. 14.2) and had entered into *covenant with them (Exod. 19.5–6), he fought their battles and drove out the enemy before them (Deut. 9.4–6). Yahweh is called a warrior (Exod. 15.3), and the expression "the Lord of hosts" (1 Sam. 17.45; Isa. 1.24; "God of hosts," Amos 5.27) is sometimes interpreted to mean that he leads an army or wages a war; another interpretation conveys the idea of heavenly hosts, either the sun, moon, and stars (Deut. 4.19) or the heavenly beings (1 Kings 22.19). For theological or sentimental reasons, this concept is repulsive to many moderns. Yet, according to treaties from the ancient Near East, the ruler who made such a covenant with a people was obligated to protect and defend them. On another line of reasoning, the only way Yahweh could preserve the identity of this small nation against the more powerful nations surrounding them was by fighting their battles for them.

Particularly objectionable to many are the wars in which the Israelites were commanded by Yahweh to exterminate (or "devote"; see Ban) a people, "men and women, young and old, oxen, sheep, and donkeys" (Josh. 6.21) with the sword; this command is explained in Deuteronomy 20.16–18 as a safeguard against idolatry. It must also be noted that Yahweh punished his people similarly for their transgressions against him. Accordingly, *Amos grouped the rebellions of Judah and Israel with those of other nations (Amos 1.3–2.16).

War, both in Israel and in the ancient Near East, was in some respects a religious act. God was to be consulted before going to war (1 Kings 22.5). Perhaps this was the reason for God's anger when *David held a census, the method of mustering an army for war (2 Sam. 24.2–9), without first seeking God's will. The leader was possessed of "the spirit of the Lord" (Judg. 6.34), and when the spirit departed, the leader was powerless before the enemy (16.20). Sacrifice was offered before the conflict began (1 Sam. 7.8–10). War was "sanctified" (Hebr. qiddaš; NRSV "prepare"). The camp was a holy place where God himself was present (Deut. 20.4; 23.14), therefore there was to be nothing unclean (e.g., a nocturnal emission or human excrement; Deut. 23.10, 13). The warrior refrained from sexual intercourse (1 Sam. 21.4–5), which is why Uriah refused to comply with David's devious request (2 Sam. 11.6–12). The priest gave counsel and encouragement (Deut. 20.2), and those who could not devote themselves fully to the conflict were sent back home (vv. 5–8). Terms of peace were to be offered, but if rejected, then the Israelite army was to carry out the Lord's judgment (vv. 10–14; cf. 20.19–21.9).

After the return from *exile, Israel was no longer an independent nation—although there was a tolerated independence resulting from the wars of the *Maccabees for about a century. The idea of war became more eschatological: it represented freedom from the oppressor. Two ways to this freedom were envisaged; the one was by the *Messiah, the son of David, who would lead the armies to victory (Pss. Sol. 17.23–27); the other was by divine intervention, a heavenly "*son of man" and his angels (Dan. 7.13; Enoch 37–71). The *Apocrypha and *Pseudepigrapha furnish many and varied details of this hope for deliverance.

A remarkable picture is drawn in the War of the Sons of Light with the Sons of Darkness (the "War Scroll," 1QM), one of the *Dead Sea Scrolls. In this document, dating from the first century BCE, there are detailed plans for the final battle, including the location of the tribes in the camp, the standards, and many other points. The son-of-man concept is apparently not found in the Qumran documents, but the final battle is suddenly ended by the appearance of the archangel *Michael (1QM 17.6).

In the New Testament. Contrary to a widely held view, the position of the New Testament is not total pacifism: that was the product of church fathers, principally Tertullian, Origen, and Cyprian. According to Matthew, Jesus stated that "wars and rumors of wars" are part of the present world order (Matt. 24.6–7) and said bluntly that he had not come to "bring peace to the earth, but a sword" (Matt. 10.34). According to Luke (3.14), John the Baptist did not forbid the soldiers to participate in war. When Jesus' disciples were about to face the hostile world, he advised them to sell their robes to buy a sword (Luke 22.35–36, 38). Paul recognized that the governing authorities maintain order with the sword and urged his readers to be subject to such authorities (Rom. 13.1–7).

At the same time, Jesus is not reported to have commanded his followers to use warfare as a means of conquest (contrary to the method of the emperor Constantine). He apparently rejected the implication that he lead a messianic war (John 6.15; Acts 1.6); he rebuked the disciple who used the sword against those who had come to arrest him (Matt. 26.51–53); he pointedly told *Pilate that, if his kingdom "were from this world," his soldiers would be fighting to defend him (John 18.36).

Like ancient Israel, the church is composed of the people of God and is under attack from enemy forces. Unlike Israel, the church is not one of the nations of the world; rather it is transnational, composed of peoples from all nations. Its warfare was not against "enemies of blood and flesh" but rather against demonic forces intent on destroying God's redemptive work (Eph. 6.12); hence its defense must be spiritual (vv. 11–17). The author of 1 *Peter urged his readers to "abstain from the desires of the flesh that wage war against the soul"; yet at the same time they were told to submit "for the Lord's sake" to "every human institution," whether emperor or governor (1 Pet. 2.11–14).

According to the apocalyptic view of the book of *Daniel, the kingdoms of this world—each more terrible than the preceding—would be defeated by the action of God himself (Dan. 2.36–45). The book of *Revelation likewise proclaims that the final triumph will be brought about by One who is called Faithful and True, who comes with the armies of heaven to smite the nations (Rev. 19.11–15). At last the dreams of the prophets of old will come true: "they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more" (Isa. 2.4; Mic. 4.3).

WILLIAM SANFORD LASOR

Water. Compared to the alluvial plains of *Egypt and *Mesopotamia, hilly Syria-Palestine relies more upon ground- and rainwater for its fertility (Deut. 11.10–11). Its peoples venerated storm gods, among them Yahweh, often accompanied by the tempest (Exod. 14.21; 15.8, 10; 19.16, 19; Judg. 5.4–5; 1 Sam. 12.17–18; 2 Sam. 22.8–16; Isa. 66.15–16; Ezek. 1; Zech. 9.14; Pss. 29.3–9; 68.7–9; 77.16–18; 97.2–5; 144.5–6; Job 38.1). Water is God's gift par excellence (Gen. 27.28; Isa. 30.23; 44.3–4; Jer. 5.24; 14.22; Ezek. 34.26; Hos. 6.3; Joel 2.23; Pss. 68.9; 104.10–13; Job 5.10; 12.15; 36.27–28; 37.2–11; 38.25–30), which he may withhold in punishment (Lev. 26.19; Deut. 11.17; 28.23–24; 1 Kings 8.35 [= 2 Chron. 6.26]; 17.1; Isa. 5.6; Jer. 3.3; Ezek. 22.24; Amos 5.28; Hag. 1.10–11; Zech. 14.17; Job 12.15; 2 Chron. 7.13). Running water is called "living" in Hebrew; in the New Testament this image becomes "water of life" (John 4.7–15; 7.37–38; Rev. 21.6; 22.17).

In the Israelite conception, boundless water was the original constituent of the universe (Gen. 1.2; 2 Pet. 3.5), perhaps coeval with God himself (Gen. 1.1, by one interpretation); compare Egyptian Nun, Sumerian Nammu, Babylonian Apsu and Tiamat, all personifying primordial waters. God's first act of *creation was to suffuse a diurnally pulsating light through the aqueous void (Gen. 1.3–5). Next he restricted the waters, creating a bubble bounded by water below and the firmament above (Gen. 1.6–8; cf. Amos 9.6; Pss. 104.3, 5–9; 148.4; Job 26.8). The lower waters were restricted, and the flat earth emerged, surrounded by seas and floating upon the deep (Gen. 1.9–10; cf. Pss. 24.2; 136.6). The dry land and the crystalline firmament were semipermeable, penetrated by springs and precipitation (Gen. 7.11; 8.2; Deut. 8.7; Isa. 24.18; Mal. 3.10; Pss. 74.15; 104.10–13; Prov. 3.20).

Water has four primary connotations in the Bible: birth, fertility, danger, and cleansing. More than one aspect can operate in any given passage.

Birth imagery is dimly present in Genesis 1, with the world emerging from the grammatically feminine "Deep." *Moses is drawn from water by his foster mother (Exod. 2.1–10). The Israelite nation is "born" in the *Red Sea (Exod. 14–15). After crossing the *Jordan, the Israelites *circumcise themselves (Josh. 3.1–5.9), a rite that is associated with birth (Gen. 17.10–14).

The fertility motif is clear in Genesis 2.6, 10–14, where Yahweh moistens the earth with ground water and rivers. Similarly, a fertilizing river will one day flow from *Jerusalem (Ezek. 47.1–12; Joel 4.18; Zech. 14.8; Pss. 36.8–10; 46.4; cf. Rev. 22.1), granting Israel prosperity comparable to that of Egypt and Mesopotamia; compare the *Temple's bronze sea (1 Kings 7.23–26), and also the Canaanite image of El's dwelling "at the source of the two rivers, in the midst of the channels of the two deeps." Yahweh's gift of drinking water in the desert (Exod. 17.1–7; Num. 20.1–13; cf. Deut. 8.15; Isa. 48.21; Pss. 78.15–16; 105.41; 114.8; Neh. 9.15) seems also to symbolize fructification (Deut. 32.13–14, Isa. 35; 41.17–19; 43.19–20; Pss. 107.35–38).

The waters treated so far are passive or benign, but other texts describe a hostile Sea or aquatic monster that God kills, tramples, or confines (Isa. 51.9–10, Nah. 1.4; Hab. 3.8, 10, 15; Pss. 74.13–15; 77.16–18; 89.9–10; 93.3–4; Job 7.12; 9.13; 26.12–13) and will one day defeat anew (Isa. 27.1; Dan. 7; Rev. 12–13; 21.1; see Leviathan). This story has antecedents in Mesopotamian and Canaanite *myths of creation, wherein a storm god defeats the Sea. The image of Jesus mastering the wind (Matt. 8.23–27 par.) and treading upon the sea (Matt. 14.22–33; Mark 6.45–52; John 6.16–21) may echo these motifs.

We see the danger of water in the *Flood (Gen. 6–9), likewise a popular Near Eastern myth. Israelite fear of the water is also reflected in awestruck descriptions of the sea and navigation (Jon. 1–2; Ps. 107.23–30; Prov. 30.19; see Ships and Sailing).

Water cleanses actually and symbolically, as when *Pilate washes his hands (Matt. 27.24). Water is a key ingredient in purification and healing rites in both the Bible (Exod. 19.10; 29.4; 30.17–21; 40.12, 30–32; Lev. 6.27–28; 11.25, 28, 32, 40; 14–15; 16.4, 24, 26, 28; Num. 8.6–7; 19; 31.23–24; Deut. 23.11; Matt. 15.2; Mark 7.2–4; John 2.6; 5.2–7) and the *Dead Sea Scrolls; some writers refer metaphorically to spiritual cleansing (Isa. 1.16; Ezek. 36.25; Ps. 51.2, 7; Eph. 5.26; Titus 3.5).

Purification imagery combines readily with (re)birth imagery. Naaman immerses himself and his leprous skin becomes "like that of a small child" (2 Kings 5.10, 14). *Baptism, like the Jewish conversion rite of immersion, signifies spiritual rebirth (Mark 1.9–11; Luke 3.21–22; John 1.33–34; 3.5; Rom. 6.4; Gal. 3.26–27); note the reference to "water and blood" in 1 John 5.6, 8. And the images of birth and cleansing are combined with danger when God rescues a sufferer from metaphorical drowning (Jon. 2.2–9, Pss. 18.16; 88.17). WILLIAM H. PROPP

Way, The. As a word having literal, metaphorical, and theological connotations, "way" is used in the Bible with a variety of meanings. The specific term "the Way," though, can be attributed to *Luke, who used it in *Acts to designate the early Christian movement (9.2; 19.2, 23; 22.4; 24.14, 22); according to Luke it was known in both Palestine and Ephesus and also to the Roman procurator, Felix (24.22). The theology of the Way is further developed by Luke in the form of a travel narrative in two stages, first from Galilee to Jerusalem (Luke 9.51–19.27), and from Jerusalem to the end of the earth (Acts 1.8).

The specific use of the Way as another name for Christianity seems to have its background in various sources, including the *Qumran community. In the document known as the Manual of Discipline, the *Essene way of life is referred to as "the Way" (1QS 8.13–16; 9.16–21), and it consists in the strict observance of the *law. The inspiration for this comes from Isaiah 40.3, with its invitation to prepare the way of the Lord in the wilderness, used also by the synoptic Gospels as the starting point of the New Testament preaching by *John the Baptist. Later *John identifies Jesus as the way, the truth, and the life (John 14.6). JOSEPH PATHRAPANKAL, C.M.I.

Weapons. Almost every kind of weapon known in the ancient Near East is mentioned in the Bible, largely owing to its origin in a region where armies from the north and from the south marched and fought. Mentioned most frequently is the sword, a word that from Genesis to Revelation occurs over four hundred times. The names of several weapons are also used figuratively with political or religious significance (e.g., Rom. 13.4, 12).

Weapons are of two main kinds, defensive and offensive, with some overlap in actual use. Defensive weapons, used to protect the body, include the shield, helmet, and armor of various kinds. Offensive weapons include those for battering, piercing, throwing or hurling, or shooting (in antiquity meaning the bow and arrow). The horse and chariot may be included as an instrument (a mobile platform) that in effect becomes a weapon.

Defensive Weapons. To protect the entire body, the large, oblong shield was used. *Goliath's shield was so large that a shield bearer went before him (1 Sam. 17.41). The small, round shield or buckler was held in the left hand (by right-handed warriors; note the apparent strategic advantage in being left-handed [Judg. 3.15; 20.16]). The large shield was protection against javelin and arrows; the buckler was more useful for hand-to-hand combat. Yahweh's faithfulness is both a shield and a buckler (Ps. 91.4)—however, the unusual word here translated "buckler" is built on a root that suggests something like a cuirass, a protection that encircles the body. Shields and bucklers were made of leather stretched on wooden frames; hence few have been found in excavations.

The helmet protected the head and was made of cloth, felt, wood, leather, or bronze. The body was protected with armor, most likely a breastplate made of plates of leather or bronze fastened together by thongs (1 Kings 22.34). Greaves protected the legs from the knee to the ankle (1 Sam. 17.6); they were made of wood, leather, or bronze. The belt around the loins supported the sheath in which the sword was kept (2 Sam. 20.8). Normally the sheath was on the left side, but Ehud, who was left-handed, wore his on the right thigh (Judg. 3.16). The "whole armor of God" (Greek panoplia) in Ephesians 6.11–17 consisted of defensive weapons, except for the "sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God."

Offensive Weapons. Some could be used only at short range. The warclub was used to shatter heads (Jer. 51.20). The sword or dagger was used to slash, cut, or stab the enemy. A very short sword is a dirk or dagger, usually shorter than .25 m (10 in). Because of the relative weakness of bronze, longer swords did not come into use until the Iron Age. They varied in shape, some having two sharp edges (Judg. 3.16), either straight or curved, narrow or broad. The sword is symbolic of the word of God (Eph. 6.16; Heb. 4.12; Rev. 1.16; 19.15).

Other weapons could be used at longer range. The staff was used by shepherds, as was the rod, but both could also be used as a club or lance against an enemy (2 Sam. 23.21; Isa. 10.5). The spear or lance was used to pierce an enemy (1 Sam. 18.10; Judg. 5.8). Strictly speaking, the spear was held while piercing, whereas the javelin was hurled; the distinction, however, is not observed in the Hebrew Bible or in some English translations.

An effective middle-distance weapon was the sling and slingstones (Job 41.28). The sling consisted of a piece of cloth or leather with strings into which (the "hollow," 1 Sam. 25.29) a small stone was placed. The strings were held by the fingers and the sling was whirled around several times; one string was released and the stone flew rapidly at the target. Such was *David's weapon against Goliath (1 Sam. 17.49). The accuracy of some slingers was remarkable (Judg. 20.16). For greater distance the bow and arrows were used. The bow, made of wood shaped in a single or double arc, was strung by holding the lower end with the foot while pulling down the upper, hence to "tread" the bow (Isa. 5.28; NRSV "bent"). Arrows were made of reeds, usually with a stone or metal head. WILLIAM SANFORD LASOR

Weddings. Given the importance of *marriage, the rituals marking it must have been both splendid and complex. But since everyone in biblical times knew how weddings should be celebrated, biblical authors do not bother to describe them in detail. So we are forced to build up a composite picture from bits of information scattered throughout the Bible and to fill in the gaps on the basis of customs attested in parallel cultures.

This means that it is impossible to say how wedding ceremonies changed over the biblical period, and even some key aspects of the ceremony remain obscure.

The wedding itself represented the culmination of long discussions between the two families involved. When at last the issues of the "marriage present," dowry, and the terms of the marriage contract were agreed, and both parties thought that the time was right for the bride to set up house with her husband, the wedding took place. In comparison with modern Western weddings, the ceremonies were more elaborate and took much longer.

Both bride and groom bathed, anointed themselves with oil and perfume and dressed in special clothes (Ps. 45.7–14). *Jewelry and garlands were also worn. In the New Testament the *kingdom of God is compared to a marriage feast, and it is possible that the white robes of the *saints reflect the practice of wearing white at weddings (Rev. 19.8). Throughout the ceremony the bride was veiled (Gen. 24.65).

The bride was accompanied by bridesmaids (Ps. 45.14) and the groom had attendants too; the chief of these, the friend of the bridegroom, acted as best man (Judg. 14.20; John 3.29).

The public ceremonies began with the groom and his companions processing to the bride's home. After greeting her family, giving and receiving presents, and some drinks, all returned to the groom's house in a lively processional dance accompanied by music, and lanterns if night had already fallen (Ps. 45.15; 1 Macc. 9.39; Matt. 25.1–10).

Sometime before the meal was eaten, the marriage contract was read out and a public declaration made by the groom. One formula may be preserved in Hosea 2.19–20a; another is found in a fifth-century BCE Aramaic document from the Jewish community at Elephantine in Egypt: "She is my wife and I am her husband from this day and forever." Whether the woman had to make any declaration is uncertain. Then all the guests blessed the couple with words such as "May the God of heaven keep you safe and give you peace and prosperity" (Tob. 7.13).

There followed the wedding breakfast, a great meal attended by all the friends and relatives of the families involved. They too came in their best clothes; it was an insult to decline a wedding invitation or not to dress properly for the occasion (Matt. 22.7, 11–12). At the feast *wine flowed freely (John 2.1–11) and songs were sung in honor of marriage and the wedded couple.

Finally, the evening concluded with the groom symbolically wrapping his cloak around the bride (Ezek. 16.8) and, escorted by the parents and bridal attendants, leading her to the specially prepared marriage chamber. Presumably this was usually an inner part of the bridegroom's house, though the word used (cf. Ps. 19.5; Num. 25.8) suggests a special tent. There at last the bride removed her veil and the marriage was consummated (Gen. 29.23–25).

This, however, was not the end of the celebration. Festivities continued for another week, or sometimes two. These consisted of eating, drinking, making music, and telling riddles (Gen. 29.27; Judg. 14.12–18). The *Song of Solomon may reflect songs sung at these occasions.

Both the Hebrew Bible and the New Testament view marriage as an image of the relationship between God and his people. It is therefore appropriate that the prophets, Jesus, and the book of *Revelation use the imagery of weddings to describe the end of time, when God will be united with his people forever (Isa. 25.6–9; Matt. 22.1–13; 25.1–12; Rev. 18.6–10; 21.1–4).

GORDON J. WENHAM

Weights and Measures. See tables on pages 796 and 797.

Widows. The term "widow," the usual translation of Hebrew ʾalmānâ and Greek chēra, has a more specific meaning in the biblical texts than the English word conveys. The woman designated by these terms was not merely someone whose husband had died; she lived outside of the normal social structure in which every female lived under the authority of some male; she was responsible to and for herself.

The structure of ancient society was kinship-based and patriarchal. *Marriage within this society represented a contract made between two families rather than between two individuals. When a woman married, she passed from the authority of her father's household to the authority of her husband's household. When her husband died, her status was determined in relation to the surviving members of his household.

Biblical *law provided for a woman of childbearing age whose husband had died without male issue. By means of a *levirate marriage (Deut. 25.5–10) the dead man's wife was given to a relative of the husband's family in order that a child be produced to inherit the dead

Weights and Measures in the Bible

I. HEBREW MEASURES OF LENGTH

Hebrew	NRSV	Equivalence	U.S. Measures	Metric Units
'ammâ	cubit	2 spans	17.49 in	.443 m
zeret	span	3 handbreadths	8.745 in	.221 m
ṭōpaḥ, ṭepaḥ	handbreadth	4 fingers	2.915 in	.074 m
'eṣba'	finger		0.728 in	.019 m

The cubit described in Ezekiel (40.5; 43.13) is equal to seven (not six) handbreadths, namely 20.405 inches.

II. MEASURES OF LENGTH IN THE NEW TESTAMENT

Greek	NRSV	U.S. Measures	Metric Units
pēchus	cubit	about 1½ ft	.456 m
orguia	fathom	about 72.44 in	1.839 m
stadion	stadia, or the equivalent in miles	about 606 ft	184.7 m
milion	mile	about 4,854 ft	1.482 km

III. HEBREW MEASURES OF CAPACITY

DRY MEASURES

Hebrew	NRSV	Equivalence	U.S. Measures	Metric Units
ḥōmer	homer	2 lethechs	6.524 bu	229.7 l
kōr	measure, cor
letek	lethech	5 ephahs	3.262 bu	114.8 l
'êpâ	ephah, measure	3 seahs	20.878 qts	22.9 l
ṣĕ'â	measure	3⅓ omers	6.959 qts	7.7 l
'ōmer	omer	1⅕ kabs	2.087 qts	2.3 l
'iśśārôn	tenth part (of ephah)
qab	kab		1.159 qts	1.3 l

LIQUID MEASURES

Hebrew	NRSV	Equivalence	U.S. Measures	Metric Units
kōr	measure, cor	10 baths	60.738 gallons	230 l
bat	bath	6 hins	6.073 gallons	23 l
hîn	hin	3 kabs	1.012 gallons	3.829 l
qab	kab	4 logs	1.349 quarts	1.276 l
lōg	log		0.674 pint	.32 l

IV. MEASURES OF CAPACITY IN THE NEW TESTAMENT

Greek	NRSV	Equivalence	U.S. Measures	Metric Units
batos	measure	(Hebrew) bat
koros	measure	(Hebrew) kōr	see Table III
saton	measure	(Hebrew) sĕ'â
metrētēs	measure		10.3 gallons	39 l

IV. MEASURES OF CAPACITY IN THE NEW TESTAMENT

Greek	NRSV	Equivalence	U.S. Measures	Metric Units
choinix	quart		0.98 dry quart	1.079 l
modios	bushel	(Latin) modius	7.68 dry quarts	8.458 l
xestēs	pot	(Latin) sextarius	0.96 dry pint, or 1.12 fluid pints	.53 l

V. HEBREW WEIGHTS

Hebrew	NRSV	Equivalence	U.S. Avoirdupois	Metric Units
kikkār	talent	60 minas	75.558 pounds	34.3 kg māneh	mina	50 shekels	20.148 ounces	571.2 g
šeqel	shekel	2 bekas	176.29 grains	11.42 g
pîm (or payim)	pim	⅔ shekel	117.52 grains	7.61 g
beqa'	beka, half a shekel	10 gerahs	88.14 grains	5.71 g
gērâ	gerah		8.81 grains	.57 g

The practice of weighing unmarked ingots of metal used in commercial transactions prior to the invention of *money explains that the names of the units of weight were used later as indications of value, and as names for monetary standards. There is, however, no direct relation between the shekel-weight and the weight of a shekel piece.

VI. WEIGHTS IN THE NEW TESTAMENT

Greek	NRSV	Equivalence	U.S. Avoirdupois	Metric Units
talenton	talent	(Hebrew) talent	see Table V
mna	pound	(Hebrew) mina	see Table V
litra	pound	(Latin) libra	0.719 pound	326.4 g husband's estate. This practice not only provided for inheritance rights but also secured the well-being of the woman. However, a man could legally refuse to carry out this obligation. For example, concern for the diminution of his own inheritance might prompt the dead husband's relative to forgo a levirate marriage. The stories of Tamar, Judah's daughter-in-law who was temporarily an 'almānâ, and *Ruth illustrate the implementation of levirate marriage (Gen. 38; Ruth).

While the Hebrew Bible identifies certain women as 'almānôt (plural of 'almānâ; 1 Kings 7.14; 11.26; 17) and specifies their distinctive clothing (Gen 38.19; 2 Sam. 14.5), its depiction of them is sketchy. Laws from ancient Mesopotamia provide some details. In the Middle Assyrian Laws, the almattu (cognate with 'almānâ) emerges as a woman whose husband and father-in-law were deceased, and who had no son capable of providing for her. A woman in this state was issued a document verifying her new status, and henceforth could act on her own. Presumably, the document gave her access to a society that normally excluded women from the public sphere.

There is evidence that the biblical 'almānâ may have been similar to the Mesopotamian almattu. That she was a woman living beyond male authority is illustrated by the law regarding women's vows (Num. 30.1–15): while the validity of a vow made by a woman depended ordinarily upon the approval of either her father or her husband, the validity of an 'almānâ's vow stood on its own (Num. 30.10).

The 'almānâ's independence from male authority was at the same time a sign of her precarious social position. In more than half of its occurrences, the 'almānâ is linked with the *orphan or with the orphan and the client (see Alien). Existing outside of the normal social structure, these three groups were susceptible to oppression, injustice, and exploitation. Because the 'almānâ had no male protector, Yahweh was pictured as her primary defender and every Israelite was supposed to treat her justly. The Bible legislates the protection and support of the 'almānâ and exhorts against oppressing her. Prophetic texts claim that the welfare of the defenseless 'almānâ, orphan, and alien was the measure by which Yahweh determined the moral fiber of his people. The vulnerability and isolation of the 'almānâ suggested a metaphorical use of the term, and prophetic texts (Isa. 47.8–9; 54.4; Jer. 51.5; Lam. 1.1) describe a vulnerable city (Babylon, Jerusalem) or land (Israel, Judah) as an 'almānâ.

The vulnerable and unconventional social position of the 'almānâ is also evident in laws regulating the priesthood. The affiliation of a *priest with such a woman was a source of concern. While Leviticus 21.14 implicitly permits a priest to marry an 'almānâ but forbids a high priest from doing so, in Ezekiel 44.22 no priest is allowed to marry an 'almānâ unless her husband had been a priest. Other legislation (Lev. 22.13) permits a priest's daughter who is an 'almānâ to eat at his table.

From the mention of the widow (Grk. chēra) in the Gospels (Mark 12.40, 42–44 par.; Luke 7.12; 18.3–5), it is evident that the Hebrew 'almānâ's precarious and threatened existence persisted into the first century CE. Early Christianity singled out widows as recipients of social welfare, establishing an organized means of caring for this group of women. In the Jerusalem church, a food distribution program is specified (Acts 6.1). 1 Timothy 5 mentions an official list of widows with eligibility requirements that included age and certain religious and moral behavior in addition to the absence of a responsible family member (see Ethical Lists).

See also Poor; Women. PAULA S. HIEBERT

Wilderness. Hebrew midbār, "wilderness, desert," originally meant "place of herding." Since many wilderness areas of Palestine were sparsely vegetated, in contrast to the barren Syro-Arabian desert, *nomads could traverse them with asses and flocks (1 Sam. 17.28; 25.4, 21; Isa. 27.10; Jer. 23.10; Joel 2.22; Ps. 65.12). Oases sustained concentrated settlements of pastoralists and agriculturalists.

The wilderness has mostly negative associations in the Bible. It is a bad place (Num. 20.5; Prov. 21.19) of hunger, thirst, and deprivation (Ps. 107.4–5; Job 30.3); it is unsettled (Jer. 2.6; Job 38.26), nonarable (Jer. 2.2), windswept (Isa. 21.1; Hos. 13.15; Job 1.19), haunted by noxious beasts and demons (Deut. 8.15; Isa. 13.21; 34.14), and echoing with frightful noises (Deut. 32.10). It is the domain of *Cain (Gen. 4.12–16), *Ishmael (Gen. 16.12; 21.20–21; 25.6, 18), *Esau (Gen. 27.39–40), and raiders (Luke 10.30; Acts 21.38) such as the *Arabs (Jer. 3.2), *Midianites (Judg. 6–8), and *Amalekites (Exod. 17.8–16; Deut. 25.17–19; Judg. 6.3, 33; 7.12; 10.12; 1 Sam. 15). Apart from nomads and the lawless, only the mad inhabit the wilderness (Luke 8.29), or those with no other recourse (Gen. 16.6–14; Exod. 2.15; 1 Sam. 22.2; 1 Kings 19; Jer. 9.1; 48.6; Ps. 55.7–8; Rev. 12.6). The wilderness is figuratively dark (Jer. 2.6, 31), recalling the primordial state of the universe (cf. Deut. 32.10). To punish a people God may "uncreate" a country, converting arable land to wilderness (Isa. 6.11–12; 14.17; 34; Jer. 9.11; 22.6; 50.39–40; 51.43; Ezek. 6.6; Hos. 2.3, 6; Joel 2.3; Zeph. 2.13; Ps. 107.33–34).

On the other hand, there is nostalgia for aspects of the seminomadic lifestyle of the ancestral and *Exodus periods. The *Rechabites continue to build no houses, plant no fields, and live in tents (Jer. 35.6–7). The tent in particular remains a powerful symbol: God's proper dwelling is a tent (Exod. 26; 33.7–11; 36; 40.34–38; Josh. 18.1; 2 Sam. 6.17; 7.2, 6; cf. Pss. 27.5; 74.7; 1 Chron. 6.32; 9.23); the cry of secession from the Davidic kingdom is "To your tents, O Israel" (2 Sam. 20.1; 1 Kings 12.16), and Hosea predicts a return to tents (Hos. 12.9). Pastoralism, too, has positive associations. Both God (Isa. 40.11; Jer. 23.1, 3; Ezek. 34; Pss. 23; 78.52; Rev. 7.17) and the king (1 Sam. 16.11–13; 17.34–37; 2 Sam. 7.8; Jer. 23.2, 4; Ezek. 34; 37.24; Ps. 78.70–72) are shepherds, a common royal epithet in antiquity. As divine king, *Jesus, too, is shepherd (John 10.1–30; Heb. 13.20).

The wilderness is also a place for spiritual renewal. *Hagar (Gen. 16.7; 21.19), *Moses (Exod. 3.1–4.17), and *Elijah (1 Kings 19) flee there and meet God. Jesus similarly seeks solitude in the desert (Matt. 4.1 par.; Mark 1.35 par.; Luke 5.16; John 11.54). The wilderness is above all associated with the wanderings of Israel narrated in Exodus-Deuteronomy. Most texts recall this as a time of tension between God and his people (Exod. 15.22–26; 16; 32; Lev. 10; Num. 11–14; 16–17; 20.1–13; 21.4–9, Deut. 1.19–46; 6.16; 9.7–10.11; Jer. 7.24–26; Ezek. 20; Pss. 78; 106; Neh. 9; Acts 7.39–43; 1 Cor. 10.5–12; Heb. 3–4), but Jeremiah 2.2–3 and Hosea 2.15 idealize it as a time of piety. Some sources maintain that God simply found Israel in the desert and brought them to the land (Deut. 32.10; Ezek. 16; Hos. 9.10), apparently ignoring the Exodus proper. It was in this wilderness, at Mount *Sinai/Horeb, that God entered into a *covenant with Israel (Exod. 19.1 – Num. 10.10), a covenant reaffirmed on the wilderness borders of the *Promised Land (Deuteronomy).

Nostalgia for desert life and the negative associations of the wilderness are, ironically, compatible. Israel is forced to rely upon God in the most inhospitable of climates, and God shows his power to sustain them (Exod. 16; 17.1–7; Num. 11; Deut. 8.3–4, 15–16; 29.5–6; Ps. 78.19–20, 23–29; 1 Cor. 10.3–4); just as *Jesus feeds the multitudes in the desert (Mark 6.30–44; 8:1–10; par.). The desert is also God's crucible, in which he tests Israel (Exod. 15.25–26; Deut. 8.2–3, 5, 16; 33.8) and eliminates the unwanted.

Some prophets believe that Israel must return to the desert for renewal and purification (Hos. 2.14–15; 12.9; Isa. 35.3–4, 8–10; 40.3–4, 41.17; 43.19–20; 48.21; 49.9–12; Jer. 31.2–3, 9; Ezek. 20.35; 34.25). Second *Isaiah, encouraging Babylonian Jews to cross the desert and rebuild Judah (Isa. 49.8; 51.3), envisions the desert negated, turned into a *paradise (Isa. 35.1–2, 6–7; 41.18–19; cf. Isa. 32.15; Ps. 107.35).

The *Qumran community conceived of itself as fulfilling the call of Isaiah 40.3 (1QS 8.13–14; 9.19–20), to make a way in the desert in preparation for a national rebirth. *John the Baptist was viewed in the same light (Matt. 3.3 par.; John 1.23). The tradition of desert monasteries continues to this day. WILLIAM H. PROPP

Wine. The cultivation of the grape *vine and the fermentation of grape juice into wine seem to have occurred in prehistoric times in Eurasia; the Semitic words related to the word "wine" are apparently loanwords from ancient *Greek or its predecessors. Cultivated (rather than wild) grapes are found in deposits from the fourth millennium BCE onward throughout the Near East, and there is archaeological evidence for wine making by the third millennium. In biblical times, the production and consumption of wine were familiar aspects of everyday life, to which the Bible refers repeatedly and, for the most part, positively.

To produce wine, harvested grapes were placed in a wine vat, often carved out of bedrock for that purpose (Isa. 5.2), where the juice was squeezed from the grapes by foot (Isa. 16.10; 63.1–3; Amos 9.13). From this first vat the juice was drained into a lower vat, where the pulpy liquid could be pressed again, often with a stone weight. The juice was then placed in skins or in large storage jars; the latter may have a capacity of 40 liters (10 gallons) or more and are often inscribed with the name of the place of origin. A well-preserved winery with most of these features was excavated at Gibeon (el-Jib). Stamped jar handles attest to wine production (and standard royal measurement) in the kingdom of Judah and to the import of wine from Rhodes and other Greek islands, beginning in the Persian period; wine jars from Italy have been found in a late first-century BCE house in Jerusalem.

Wine is metaphorically called "the blood of grapes/the grape" (Gen. 49.11; Deut. 32.14; Sir. 39.26; 50.15), and so the trampling of grapes can be a figure for destructive divine fury (Isa. 63.1–6; Rev. 19.15; cf. Julia Ward Howe's biblicizing phrasing "He is trampling out the vintage where the grapes of wrath are stored").

Wine was a staple of life (Sir. 39.26), as the formula "grain, wine, and oil" shows (Deut. 11.14; Joel 1.10). It was a source of pleasure for both humans (Eccles. 10.19; Sir. 31.27–28; 32.5–6; 40.20) and the gods (Judg. 9.13) and was thus a regular component of ritual (Exod. 29.40; Lev. 23.13). Wine was a divine gift (Deut. 7.13; Ps. 104.15; Hos. 2.8) and would be provided abundantly in the end time (Jer. 31.12; Joel. 3.18; Amos 9.13–14).

Overindulgence in wine is condemned in the Bible by both precept and example (see Drunkenness). Total abstinence, however, is not advanced as a general ideal, although it was practiced, either for a time, by *nazirite vow (Num. 6.2–4), or as a lifelong commitment, as by the *Rechabites (Jer. 35; see also 1 Sam 1.11 LXX).

The generally positive attitude of biblical writers toward moderate consumption of wine posed a problem for modern advocates of total abstinence ("temperance") as both a personal and a social ideal. How could those who accepted the Bible as supreme authority reject its teaching that wine was good, a teaching exemplified by the practice of Jesus (Luke 7.34; Mark 14.23 par; John 2.1–11) and others? Was the use of wine at the Christian Eucharist defensible? Some made a distinction between naturally fermented wines and distilled spirits, including fortified wines, although biblical support for such a distinction was questionable. Others argued that social changes since biblical times made the legal prohibition of any alcoholic beverage necessary, citing not only general biblical norms but also such passages as Romans 14.21.

One curious influence of the Bible on the use of wine is in the names given to ascending sizes of bottles used for champagne. After a magnum (the equivalent of two bottles [1.5 liters]), the sizes are as follows: Jeroboam (four bottles), named for the first king of the northern kingdom of Israel; Rehoboam (six bottles), *Solomon's son and successor as king of Judah (see especially 1 Kings 12.10–12); *Methuselah (eight bottles) (Gen. 5.21–27); and the three largest for kings of Assyria and Babylon: Salmanazar (*Shalmaneser, 2 Kings 17.3; twelve bottles), Balthazar (*Belshazzar, Dan. 7.1; sixteen bottles), and Nebuchadnezzar (see Nebuchadrezzar; twenty bottles), who destroyed *Jerusalem.

Along with wine, "strong drink" (Hebr. šēkār, probably beer or ale made from barley and other grains) is mentioned in the Bible (e.g., Lev. 10.9; Prov. 20.1) and is well attested in both archaeological and literary sources throughout the Near East. MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Wisdom. Biblical *wisdom literature emphasizes the desirability and the elusiveness of true wisdom (Hebr. hokmâ, a feminine noun). Job 28.25–27 even locates wisdom with God at *creation. Thus it is of interest that a series of poems in Proverbs 1–9 metaphorically personifies wisdom as a woman in a variety of positive female roles; see Women, article on Ancient Near East and Israel.

The female figure of Wisdom first appears in Proverbs speaking as a *prophet (Prov. 1.20–33), a profession to which both men and women were called. In Proverbs 9.1–6, Wisdom is a high-ranking woman who can employ a messenger (cf. 1 Kings 19.2; 21.8–11); on her own initiative (cf. Esther 5.4) she invites the "simple" to a banquet in her substantial seven-pillared house.

Wisdom is also a "sister" (Prov. 7.4), a word with two connotations: a literal sister with whom a man may associate on the intimate level of family, or alternately a wife or lover (as in the *Song of Solomon). In the book of Proverbs, both the ideal wife (31.10) and the woman Wisdom (3.15; 8.11) are "more precious than jewels," and Proverbs 4.6 enjoins the listener not to forsake Wisdom just as Proverbs 5.15–17 demands marital fidelity. Like wives and mothers in ancient Israel (Prov. 1.8; 4.6–9; 6.20; 31.1, 26), Wisdom is a counsellor and teacher (8.6–10, 14). Interestingly, she is not a child-bearer, although she is regularly described as a life-giver or life-preserver (Prov. 3.16, 18, 22; 4.13; 9.6).

The dividing line between Wisdom the woman and God can grow hazy. Without the introductory verses to Proverbs 1.22–33 one might easily assume that the speaker is not Wisdom but God! Theologians have observed that Wisdom functions as a mediator between God and humanity. She is God's companion (Prov. 3.19; 8.22–31) before the beginning of creation; yet God offers her, as she offers herself, to God's human subjects. If they accept her, they will find that God is protecting and guiding them (Prov. 3.26). Scholarly consensus places the book of *Proverbs in the postexilic period (fifth-fourth centuries BCE), although it is generally agreed that Proverbs contains motifs and themes that were part of preexilic Israelite culture. Wisdom's mediating role may have answered a spiritual need earlier fulfilled by the king (see Ps. 72; 1 Kings 8.22–53).

Scholars have pursued the theory that Wisdom the woman is in some way related to an ancient Near Eastern goddess or goddesses. Evidence is lacking for the suggestion that a goddess, Wisdom, was worshiped in preexilic times in Israelite scribal schools. She does however share some attributes with the Egyptian goddess Maat, "Truth," and with certain ancient Near Eastern goddesses who protected the king and his officials (cf. Prov. 8.1–21).

Wisdom the woman's most striking affinities, however, are with *Asherah, the Canaanite fertility goddess. Wisdom is the tree of life (Prov. 3.8), and Asherah's primary symbol was a tree of life. Wisdom's banquet invitation (Prov. 9.1–6) recalls Asherah's banquet in the *Ugaritic myth of *Baal. Proverbs 9 may consciously play on the ambiguities of the word "house," which can also mean temple (see 2 Sam. 7.5–6); in ancient Near Eastern mythology, the construction of a house/temple for the gods is often the climax of cosmogony, notably also the theme of Wisdom's preceding address in Proverbs 8.22–31.

At the same time, there are clearly similarities between Wisdom's corrupt counterpart, the "foolish woman" of Proverbs 9.13–18, and several goddesses in ancient Near Eastern myths whose seductive blandishments and promises of life to the young male hero can lead to death (cf. Prov. 9.18; also 2.18–19; 5.5; 6.26; 7.26–27). It has been suggested that throughout Proverbs 1–9, in a particularly Israelite twist, the description of the evil seductive/adulterous woman (Prov. 2.16; 5.3–20; 6.24–35; 7.5–27) may deliberately employ Canaanite goddess imagery in order to undercut it.

It is not impossible that Lady Wisdom represents an irruption in the Bible of the persistent but biblically suppressed Israelite worship of a female counterpart to Yahweh (see Israel, Religion of). In the book of Proverbs, however, both Wisdom the woman and the "foolish woman" seem to be literary creations in which goddess language has been artfully transformed and recombined with imagery from other elements of Israelite female experience.

The motif of Wisdom the woman subsequently played a notable part in Jewish and Christian thought. She appears, for example, in the *Wisdom of Solomon, in *Sirach, in *Baruch 3:9–4:4, and in the nonbiblical texts from *Qumran, and her words are echoed in the New Testament (e.g., Matt. 11.28). Perhaps most resonant of all was Wisdom's speech in Proverbs 8.22–31, stressing her presence at the beginning of creation. *Sirach equates Wisdom with the creative word of God (24.3) and with *Torah (24.23). Readers of the Jewish philosopher Philo of Alexandria (first century CE) have found it difficult to disentangle the properties of God's word (logos) from wisdom (sophia). *Paul calls Christ the wisdom (sophia) of God (1 Cor. 1.24). The mini-creation story in John 1.1–3 consciously evokes Proverbs 8. And for *gnostic Jews and Christians, the female principle Sophia was a figure of great complexity and primary importance.

MARY JOAN WINN LEITH

Wisdom Literature. The scope of biblical wisdom is disputed, but three books are almost universally included in this category: *Proverbs, *Job, and *Ecclesiastes. To these are added *Sirach (Ecclesiasticus) and *Wisdom of Solomon from the Deutero-canon, often called the *Apocrypha. These five books resemble an extensive literary corpus in Egypt identified by the expression seboyet ("instruction") and in Mesopotamia. Some significant Instructions from Egypt are those of Ptahhotep, Merikare, Ani, Amenemopet, Insinger, and Onksheshonky. Mesopotamian wisdom includes instructions of Shuruppak, proverbs (Sumerian and Akkadian), and reflections on life's meaning (the Sumerian "Man and his God," and the Babylonian "I Will Praise the Lord of Wisdom," "The Babylonian Theodicy," and "The Dialogue between a Master and Slave"). In addition, omen texts, onomastica (name lists), and scribal texts can be classified as wisdom literature.

Other biblical texts contain vocabulary and ideas similar to those found in wisdom literature. This common usage has prompted some modern interpreters to enlarge the wisdom corpus or to magnify its influence greatly. Many canonical books have been placed under the sage's domain, including Genesis 1–11, 37–50; Exodus 32; Deuteronomy; Amos; Micah; Isaiah; Jonah; Habakkuk; Esther; 2 Samuel 9–20; 1 Kings 1–2; Song of Solomon; and Psalms. The result of this effort is unclear, although many claims are exaggerated or lack adequate criteria to be persuasive.

It therefore remains fundamentally correct to label wisdom literature as an alien body within the Hebrew scriptures. That judgment rests partly on what is missing in these texts: the promises to the *ancestors, the *Exodus from Egypt and the Mosaic *covenant, the centrality of *Jerusalem and the Davidic dynasty, and much more. The situation changed when Sirach and Wisdom of Solomon entered the picture, for with them a decisive transition occurred as a result of the combination between wisdom and traditional Yahwism. However, the assessment of alienness also arises from a consideration of the unique form and content of Proverbs, Job, and Ecclesiastes. These books represent a human search for knowledge that enriches life or makes existence bearable. A self-revealing deity manages one brief appearance (Job 38–41), and Ecclesiastes rejects revelation on principle.

Wisdom literature can be divided into four categories: natural, experiential, judicial, and theological. Encyclopedic name lists did not survive in Israel, although 1 Kings 4.33 (MT 5.13) may allude to them. The widespread folktale about *Solomon's judgment (1 Kings 3.16–28) exemplifies judicial wisdom. The distinction between theological wisdom and experiential is not an absolute one, for some lessons from experience use religious reinforcements. The difference is therefore one of degree, and certain texts (Job and Ecclesiastes) are more theological than others. In Egypt the wisdom corpus aimed at training courtiers and equipping pharaohs for effective leadership. Mesopotamian wisdom was in part an attempt to manipulate the gods to ensure prosperity; cult and magic thus lay at the heart of some of these nonbiblical texts.

When did Israel's wisdom literature come into existence? Centuries of observations went into the compilation of the book of Proverbs, a process that probably began in the early monarchy and ended in postexilic times. The probable sequence of the several collections is as follows: chaps. 25–29; 10.1–22.16; 22.17–24.22; 24.23–34; 30.1–9; 30.10–33; 31.1–9; 1–9; 31.10–31. The book of Job dates from the late sixth or fifth century BCE, although the prose tale existed much earlier. Ecclesiastes best fits in the mid- or late third century, Sirach at the beginning of the second (ca. 190), and Wisdom of Solomon in the first century BCE.

What was the occasion for writing these texts? The collections in Proverbs were the accumulation of valuable insight within various settings, particularly the family. Ecclesiastes and Sirach, on the other hand, comprise the teaching of scholars to pupils, presumably young men from wealthy families. Both Job and Wisdom of Solomon may also have functioned to expand the horizons of students. However, the appeal of such school texts as these four books certainly reached beyond the academy, and even Proverbs may have assisted in training professional courtiers during *Hezekiah's reign (see Prov. 25.1). It is noteworthy that the first epilogist in Ecclesiastes states that Qoheleth taught the people, which may suggest a democratization of learning in his day (12.9–12). Certain themes come to prominence within these five books: *creation as an ordering of the universe, the *fear of Yahweh as the beginning and end of knowledge, the contrast between fools and wise persons as an ethical distinction, and the literary expression of personified wisdom and folly. The universal character of wisdom requires a grounding of its theology in creation rather than in Israel's particularistic traditions. *Revelation occurred at creation, and individuals drew analogies between the natural realm and the social. This search for analogies presupposed an ordering principle of the universe that manifested itself in reward for virtue and punishment for base action. All knowledge rested on a religious commitment, at least for the collection in Proverbs 1–9. But the most radical thinkers, Job and Ecclesiastes, did not dispense with the theistic assumption. The adjective "wise" was an ethical term rather than a cognitive judgment. Fools were not ignorant: they were scoundrels—lazy, hot-headed, disrespectful, lustful. The personification of wisdom, demanded by her active role at creation, enabled her to address young men and to woo them away from her rival, Dame Folly. This symbolism also mediated between a searching humanity and a transcendent deity. In Sirach a correlation between *Torah and Wisdom brought God closer to human subjects and introduced the category of *mercy where strict justice had prevailed as a desideratum. (See Wisdom.)

If one takes content into consideration, the wisdom corpus used its own distinctive literary forms. These include aphoristic sayings and instructions (in Proverbs mainly), dispute (in Job), reflection (in Ecclesiastes), a school text (Sirach), and a diatribe (Wisdom of Solomon). Within these broader types many other categories exist, for example, royal fiction, autobiographical narrative, numerical proverb, allegory, *prayer, hymn, and midrash-like interpretation. Three settings for the resulting literature were the family, court, and school. Little is known about any of these sociological contexts, although the clan was probably the earliest, followed by the royal court and finally the scribal (priestly?) school.

Of course, some of the above literary types also occur in prophetic and narrative literature (e.g., disputes, allegory, prayer, hymn). What then is distinctive about the wisdom corpus? Answering this question is complicated by concepts that the sages shared with prophets and the priestly guilds, especially the principle of reward and punishment. The mere allusion to this principle cannot identify wisdom, nor can a reference to creation.

The first identifying characteristic of wisdom literature is its anthropocentric base. The sages asked about human good, which they perceived to rest in long life, health, wealth, children, and reputation. Furthermore, the focus was on each individual rather than on larger groups or the nation itself. Indeed, truth was believed to be universal, which ruled out exclusive claims by special interest groups. Insights from abroad were equally valid, and membership in the Jewish nation was not a prerequisite for contributing to the wisdom corpus. Hence a small portion of the Egyptian Instruction of Amenemopet was included in the book of Proverbs (22.17–24.22), together with two collections by foreign authors (30.1–4; 31.1–9). Even the hero of the book of Job is probably depicted as a non-Jew. Because of the individualistic emphasis, wisdom placed no stress on historical events as the arena of divine disclosure. The primary concern was existential, often expressing itself in self-gratification but also asking hard questions about life's meaning in the face of undeserved *suffering and the oppressive shadow of *death.

A second feature of wisdom literature is its reliance on the intellect to cope with every eventuality. Hidden within the natural universe and the behavior of animals and people were secrets that enriched human existence. The goal of wisdom was to discover these insights and to draw correct analogies that would enable one to live long and well. It follows that such a quest presupposes a cosmos, a reliable order from which to draw lessons with predictable outcomes. Insights gained from nature or from the behavior of animals carried over into the human arena, and these truths perdured through the ages.

This reliance on one's ability to act and to think in a manner that yielded life's richest rewards did not last. Thus, we come to a third feature of the wisdom corpus, its conscious reflection on the injustices of earthly existence and on the limits of the human intellect. To be sure, wrestling with the issue of theodicy was the prerogative of sensitive prophets, psalmists, and historiographers as well. But the crown of theodicy is surely worn by the author of the book of Job, and the radical exposure of life's enigmas in Ecclesiastes brooks no rival. A bankrupt morality and intellect yielded opposite responses in these two masterpieces. Job fell to his knees in repentance and submission before a mystery that defied understanding, and the author of Ecclesiastes ventured the conclusion that life was utterly absurd because the deity's will and actions escaped detection in a world where death and probable extinction were sovereign.

Some emphases of wisdom literature are present in the New Testament and in *gnosticism. *Jesus' teachings take the form of aphorisms; he invites disciples to take his yoke on them in the same way that Dame Wisdom issues an invitation for her subjects to accept the statutes of the Torah. The Fourth Gospel describes Jesus in the language of the divine *logos, just as wisdom was equated with the logos. In addition, *Paul uses the language of traditional wisdom in hymns about Jesus as the agent of creation, and the letter of *James resembles wisdom literature in form and substance. Within *gnosticism, three texts belong to the category of wisdom: the gospel of Thomas, the Sentences of Sextus, and the Teachings of Silvanus (see Nag Hammadi Library).

JAMES L. CRENSHAW

Wisdom of Solomon. The Wisdom of Solomon, a Greek work of a Hellenistic Jewish author, is not found in the Hebrew Bible. In the *Septuagint it follows the book of *Job; in the *Vulgate it follows the *Song of Solomon. The book is thus considered one of the *Apocrypha by Jews and Protestants but is accepted as canonical by the Roman Catholic and most Orthodox churches. It is never quoted in the New Testament, but some commentators find allusions to the vocabulary of Wisdom 7.26 in Hebrews 1.3 and to its description of the "son of God" mocked and persecuted by his enemies (2.18–20) in the passion narratives of the Gospels.

Scholars have dated the work from 100 BCE to 100 CE on the basis of links to Hellenistic philosophy, literature, and science. Cultured readers of that period would have been familiar with its terminology, such as "intelligent spirit" that "pervades" and "penetrates" all (7.22, 24), "living spirit" (15.11), with its description of the human body as an "earthly tent" (9.15), and with references to the cosmic god Aeon. They would applaud the use of compound terms, including over seventy beginning with the negative prefix equivalent to the English "non-."

Allusions to Jewish scripture, especially the *Psalms and *Isaiah, show that the author used the Septuagint rather than a Hebrew text. The style is that of a writer familiar with textbook rhetoric and literary figures like balance, personification, irony, and ring style; he is skillful in making plays on words, even to the point of creating new compounds. A good example of rhetoric appears in the vivid contrasts between true and apparent sterility, true and apparent fruitfulness, and true and apparent stability (3.1–5.1) In translation the style at times appears heavy and prolix.

Content and Structure. The overall literary form of the work was popular in Hellenistic Greek, namely, the protreptic or rhetorical exhortation. This complex form served the author's purpose, which was to glorify traditional faith and to encourage Israel's future leaders to commit themselves to God's saving presence in history. The opening address to "rulers of the earth" is a literary fiction in keeping with the goal of arousing enthusiasm for Israel's covenant-God and for its historical mission.

The author uses this literary form, which goes back as far as Aristotle, with great flexibility, skillfully integrating a variety of minor literary genres. Its four major developments are connected by interweaving them to avoid abrupt breaks in continuity. Part I (1.1–6.11) begins with a carefully structured and tightly argued prologue urging readers to seek that divine "righteousness" that is "immortal" (1.1–15). Motivation to do so is steeped in biblical tradition and assumes familiarity with values of the Mosaic *covenant. The appeal is further developed by a series of descriptions contrasting persons who faithfully pursue uprightness with the conduct of their arrogant foes. Such polemical contrasts identify those who seek God's will as the truly wise, for they will reign with God forever.

This identification of righteousness with wisdom leads into Part II of the book (6.12–10.21), which is devoted to singing the praises of Lady Wisdom, partner of both God and the author (6.14; 9.4). It is in this part that the author assumes the person of King *Solomon and builds on his famous dream asking for a listening heart to serve God's people (1 Kings 3.6–9).

In an extended explanation of his life, Solomon tells how, while praying for prudence, Lady Wisdom came to him as his bride. She is God's craftswoman who gave him such gifts as scientific knowledge, her own spirit with its twenty-one desirable qualities, the four cardinal virtues prized by Hellenistic philosophy, and even immortality (7.1–8.2). This lyrical celebration of Lady Wisdom recalls the Greek aretalogies or prose poems honoring the Egyptian goddess Isis, patron of wisdom, who was worshiped in many Hellenistic shrines. With good reason, then, Part II of the book has been called "the Book of Wisdom proper." (See Wisdom.)

After praising Lady Wisdom, Solomon offers a fervent prayer to God to continue to let her be the delight of his life, guide of his reign, and teacher of salvation to all on earth (9.1–18). The conclusion of the prayer employs for the first time the verb "save" that will dominate the activity portrayed in the rest of the book. A long description of the saving work of Lady Wisdom on behalf of biblical heroes from *Adam to *Moses, although none are mentioned by name, brings Part II to a close (10.1–21).

The power of God's saving presence dominates the rest of the book, but in ways that enfold its relation to the entire universe. This shift in perspective mirrors the author's preoccupation with the relation of the *chosen people to all creation. He starts to reflect on God's saving intervention for Israel in the *Exodus, which he presents in a series of seven contrasts. God's activity in rescuing the chosen people took the form of using elements of creation to favor them and to punish their enemies. But after describing God's first intervention, the author interrupts the contrasts to formulate a polemic that makes up the third part of the book, its richest theological development (11.15–15.19).

Part III of the book serves a double purpose. First, it provides an apologia for God's justice in ruling the world (11.15–12.27). God's way of punishing sinners is not capricious or vindicative but displays how he manages all events "by measure and number and weight" (11.20). God shows wisdom by allowing the effects of sin to take place, because sin includes its own punishment (11.16). Second, Part III appeals to Jewish readers to reject false religions. The elaborate condemnation of various forms of *idolatry warns readers not to be trapped by such foolish practices that have harmed the gentiles.

Nature worship is a display of ignorance in that it refuses to recognize the world as handiwork of a wise creator (13.1–9). Idol worship is still worse in that it places hope in the weak works of mortals and seeks salvation in helpless objects (13.10–14.8). The *Egyptians, identified only as enemies of the chosen people, merit special condemnation because they worship gods in the form of animals (15.14–19). Included in this polemic is an explanation of the origin of idolatry according to the theory of Euhemerus (ca. 300 BCE), namely, that the first gods were deified mortals (14.9–15.6).

Part IV of the book begins at 16.1 with the second of the seven contrasts based on the Exodus. These are remarkable for their poetic descriptions portraying God's care for his chosen people amid the *plagues sent against Egypt. These contrasts are addressed to God to remind him how he once used the same creatures and situations, such as water, animals, sudden death, light, and darkness, to save the Israelites and punish their foes. The author updates the biblical narratives by introducing psychological details that captured the Hellenistic religious imagination. For example, he describes darkness as creating a prison of fear for the Egyptians (17.2–21).

Teaching and Significance. An analysis of the content of the Wisdom of Solomon reveals that, as the book progresses, its style shows less clear-cut parallel phrasing. The contrasts based on the Exodus become overloaded and obscure. For this reason some scholars have postulated a different author for the latter part. Yet the large number of flashbacks and deliberate allusions to earlier chapters point to composition by the same author. The complexity results from the double polemic: against unbelieving gentiles and against Jewish apostates falling under the spell of Hel-lenism. Possibly the author was unable to revise and polish the final chapters.

The book is pseudonymous: its author's identity is hidden by the literary technique of writing in the person of Israel's great wisdom-figure, Solomon. This approach fit the author's purpose: to compose an apologia for Israel's traditional religious beliefs in a cosmopolitan setting. Such a procedure would not have misled the cultured audience to whom this sophisticated composition was directed. Omission of proper names assumes that readers were familiar with Israelite tradition. The style and religious intensity identify its author as a pious teacher.

The "autobiography" of the idealized Solomon, whose life was a search for Lady Wisdom, describes the plan of action necessary for Israel's future leaders. Wisdom's gifts to the devout include qualities and skills valued in Hellenistic Alexandria. Enthusiasm for Israel's tradition is no barrier to cultural progress. The author believed that Israel's role as God's chosen people was as important as ever and guaranteed by constant divine protection (19.22). The Wisdom of Solomon preserves the carefully planned appeal of a learned and imaginative Jewish teacher to his cultured students to cultivate loyalty to their revealed faith in an environment threatening their religious identity. Only fidelity to their received revelation wins eternal life with God (1.15; 15.3). JAMES M. REESE, O.S.F.S.

Wise Men, The Three. See Magi.

Witch. Biblical references to witches reflect a category of ritual specialist whose status and function are now virtually unknown. Texts from other ancient Near Eastern cultures provide evidence of a variety of both male and female cultic functionaries, and there is evidence of ritual practitioners, such as oracular speakers, who were not part of a temple cult. The Hebrew Bible, by contrast, accords official cultic status to only two related categories of males, *Levites (temple functionaries) and sacrificial *priests, while portraying all other ritual experts pejoratively.

Several Hebrew terms are associated with the English word "witch." These can also be translated "sorcerer," "sorceress," "medium," or "necromancer." Most appear in references to prohibited practices (e.g., Deut. 18.9–11; 2 Kings 23.24) and seem to be concerned with divination or necromancy. *Women may have been especially involved in such activities since they were excluded from those of the official cult. Specific association with women is found in Exodus 22.18, Leviticus 20.27, and 2 Kings 9.22. A phrase meaning "a woman proficient in necromancy" is used in 1 Samuel 28.7; commonly known as "the witch of Endor" (wording not found in the Bible), this woman is able to make the dead prophet *Samuel appear before *Saul, even though he had prohibited the practice.

The strong condemnation of witches and other ritual specialists with whom they are often grouped may be the result of an attempt by ancient Israelites to distinguish their religious practices and beliefs from those of surrounding cultures, as well as to provide central state control of all forms of religious observance. But both the legal prohibitions and the prophetic attacks (Jer. 27.9; Mic. 5.11; Mal. 3.5) on various forms of *magic, sorcery, divination, and necromancy indicate that they were a perennial aspect of popular religion in ancient Israel, as they have been in postbiblical Jewish and Christian traditions.

The injunction "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live" (Exod. 22.18, KJV) was invoked in enforcing the death penalty against women accused of witchcraft in Europe and England from the sixteenth to the eighteenth centuries, and in Salem, Massachusetts, in 1692.

See also Afterlife and Immortality, article on Ancient Israel; Israel, Religion of.

DRORAH O'DONNELL SETEL

Witness. As a juridical term, a witness is one who has direct knowledge about certain facts and can declare before a court of law what he or she has seen or heard. In the Bible, witnesses are used to attest contracts and to certify proceedings (Jer. 32.10, 12; Ruth 4.9–11; Isa. 8.2). Sometimes, inanimate objects provide the evidence that an agreement has been concluded (Gen. 31.44–54; Josh. 24.27). The tables of the law in the *ark are described as the "tables of testimony," for they are inscribed with God's commandments; sometimes the ark itself is termed "the testimony" (Exod. 25.16; 31.18; Num. 17.4).

False or malicious witness was prohibited, and sanctions were imposed against it (Exod. 20.16; 23.1–3; Deut. 19.15–19). False witnesses are mentioned in the New Testament in the trials of Jesus and Stephen (Matt. 26.60; Acts 6.13; 7.58).

Israelite law required the evidence of several witnesses to convict a person of a capital offense (Deut. 17.6–7; 19.15; Num. 35.30). This principle is alluded to in the New Testament (John 8.13–18; 1 John 5.7–8), and was apparently honored in questions of church discipline (Matt. 18.16; 2 Cor. 13.1; 1 Tim. 5.19).

An important use of this terminology is its application to the role of Israel and of Jesus and his followers as God's witnesses before the world. Israel's mission is to bear witness to God as his chosen servant: "You are my witnesses," Yahweh emphatically declares (Isa. 43.10, 12; 44.8). Israel is to take God's side and bear witness to him as the lord of history, the only true God, and her redeemer and savior. Here the controversy language comes alive with freshness and power.

In the New Testament the witness theme is central in the gospel of John, Acts, and Revelation. In John's gospel, God in Christ has a controversy with the world. A cosmic lawsuit is underway, and each side presents its evidence and argues its case. The different witnesses to Jesus present their testimony to refute the hostile charges of his enemies (5.31–47). Jesus himself bears witness to the truth (3.31–33; 18.37), as will the *Holy Spirit as the "Advocate" (15.26).

In Acts the witness of the apostles is of prime importance (1.8, 21–22; 4.33; 10.38–43), as is that of *Paul (22.14–15; 26.16). The center of their witness is the resurrection (2.32; 3.15; 5.30–32; cf. 1 Cor. 15.3–11).

In the book of Revelation, witness is set against the background of persecution. The seer of Patmos presents Jesus as the model witness, whose example Christians must follow. "The testimony of Jesus" probably refers not to the testimony concerning him but to the testimony borne by him (Rev. 1.9; 12.17). Jesus is "the faithful and true witness" (1.5; 3.14), and loyalty to him may mean martyrdom (2.13). Here one traces the first steps of the process by which the Greek word for witness (martys) developed into the later sense of "martyr." ALLISON A. TRITES

Women. This entry on the roles and status of women consists of four articles:

An Overview
Ancient Near East and Israel
Second Temple Period
Early Christianity

The introductory article is an overview of the status of women in biblical times, and the remaining articles are more detailed discussions of women in the Ancient Near East and Israel, in Judaism of the Second Temple Period, and in Early Christianity. Related discussion is found in entries on individual women named in the Bible, and the impact of the Bible's images of women on modern views is discussed in Feminism and the Bible.

An Overview

Before the Babylonian *exile in 587/586 BCE, women in Israel enjoyed a status and freedom comparable to that of men. Israel lived in a patriarchal world, but her society was always informed by a faith that gave equality to women in the eyes of God. Thus, the woman is understood in the tenth-century BCE story of Genesis 2.18 as the necessary complement of the man and as his helper in a relationship of mutual companionship (cf. Mal. 2.14) and assistance, just as male and female both are necessary to the image of God in the sixth-century BCE account of Genesis 1.27. The subordination of women to men is considered to be the result of human sin (Gen. 3), and the subsequent practice of polygamy (Gen. 4.19) is a manifestation of the spread of sin.

Women are found serving as *prophets (Exod. 15.20; 2 Kings 22.14–20), judges (Judg. 4–5), and *queens (1 Kings 19; 2 Kings 11) in preexilic Israel. They are never excluded from the worship of God (Deut. 16.13–14; 1 Sam. 1–2). They are sometimes honored as models of wisdom (2 Sam. 14; 20.16–22). The honor of mothers ranks with that of fathers in Israel's basic law, the *Ten Commandments (Exod. 20.12; Deut. 5.16). The family rights of wives and mothers are protected by law (Gen. 16.5–6; 38). The woman who engages in profitable commercial enterprises, who teaches with wisdom, and who serves the community through deeds of charity is honored as an ideal (Prov. 31.10–31).

Though single females lived under the authority of their fathers in Israel, love and choice in *marriage were known (Gen. 24.57, 67; 29.20), and the woman was never considered a piece of property to be bartered. Sexual love was celebrated as a gift of God (Gen. 2.23; *Song of Solomon), and the marital relationship was so prized that it could serve as a metaphor of the love between God and his covenant people (Jer. 2.2; Hos. 2.14–20)—an impossibility if marriage had been a repressive relationship for the woman.

Those preexilic stories in the Bible that exhibit cruelty toward women and treat them as objects of degradation reflect the environment in which Israel lived and are intended as protests against it (Gen. 19.8; Judg. 11; 19.22–30).

When Israel was carried into Babylonian exile, her priests in exile determined that they would draw up a plan for Israel's life that would ensure that she would never again be judged by God. They therefore collected together and wrote priestly legislation that would ensure Israel's ritual and social *purity. At the same time, they emphasized the importance of *circumcision as a sign of the covenant (Gen. 17). This emphasis brought sexuality into the realm of the cult and related females to the covenant community only through their males. The blood of the sacrifice on the altar became the means of atonement for sin (Lev. 10.17–18; 16; 17.10–11), and blood outside of the cult became ritually unclean (Gen. 9.4). Thus, women were excluded from the cult during their menstruation (Lev. 15.19–31) and childbirth (Lev. 12.2–5). Indeed, they were increasingly segregated in worship and society. They had access to the holy only through their males. A woman's court was added to the *Temple to distance them from the sanctuary. Their vows to God were no longer considered as valuable as those of males (Num. 27.1–8), and a husband could annul the vow of his wife (Num. 30.1–5). In the Second Temple period, women were excluded from testifying in a court trial; they were not to be seen in public or to speak with strangers, and outside their homes they were to be doubly veiled. They could not even teach or be taught the *Torah in their homes—a far cry from that time when Huldah the prophet interpreted *Deuteronomy for King *Josiah (2 Kings 22.14–20)—and they were not to be educated. They had become second-class Jews, excluded from the worship and teaching of God, with status scarcely above that of slaves.

The actions of *Jesus of Nazareth toward women were therefore revolutionary. He did not hesitate to engage even unclean foreign women in public conversation (John 4.27). He ignored all strictures of ritual impurity (Mark 5.25–34, 35–43). He himself taught women (Luke 10.38–42), gave them an equal rank with men as daughters of *Abraham (Luke 13.10–17), openly ministered to them as "children of wisdom" (Luke 7.35–50), and afforded them the highest respect as persons (Matt. 5.28). Women belonged to the inner circle of the disciples (Luke 8.1–3), and they are attested as the first witnesses of the *resurrection (Luke 24.1–11; John 20.18). The Fourth Gospel begins and ends with the testimony of a woman to the Christ (John 4.29; 20.18).

Women therefore played a leading role in earliest Christianity, being baptized and receiving the Spirit (Acts 2.17; 5.14; 8.12; 16.15), doing acts of charity (9.36), suffering imprisonment for their faith (8.3; 9.1–2), and serving as ministers of the church (Rom. 16.1–7). They were allowed to preach and to pray in worship (1 Cor. 11.5), as well as to prophesy (Acts 21.8–9) and to teach (18.25–26). Their equal status in Christ was strongly affirmed by Paul, who considered the ancient subordination of women in Genesis 3.16 to have been overcome by Christ (Gal. 3.27–28). When Paul was faced with the misuse of Christian freedom in his churches, however, he could revert to his Pharisaic background to silence both contentious men and women in his congregations (1 Cor. 14.28, 33–36).

As Christianity spread through the Roman world of the late first and early second centuries CE, it faced the necessity of consolidating its doctrine and regularizing its polity, over against judaizers and *gnostics. Unfortunately, in an alien environment, the church bought these developments at the price of the freedom of females. Because some women fell prey to gnostic teachings, they were forbidden leadership in some churches, on the basis of rabbinic interpretations of the scriptures (1 Tim. 2.11–15; 2 Tim. 3.6–9; Tit. 2.1–10). Patriarchal patterns of marriage reasserted themselves (1 Pet. 3.1–6; Col. 3.18), though these were often tempered by a high view of marriage and of the mutual subjection of both husband and wife to Christ (Eph. 5.21–33). Most importantly, political power struggles for control of ecclesiastical districts (cf. 3 John) led to the formation of a male hierarchy in the church that often continues to this day, in opposition to the witness of much of the Bible.

ELIZABETH ACHTEMEIER

Ancient Near East and Israel

The images of women in the Bible were shaped by literary genres and colored by historical circumstances and political ideologies. Furthermore, over the last two and a half millennia the Bible has accumulated additional resonances from the religious traditions that take it as a foundation. In essence, however, the Bible is an ancient Near Eastern document and can best be studied and understood in that context.

Women and the Family. Family and family ties determined the status and fate of women as well as men. An Israelite man or woman's formal name customarily included the name of the father (2 Sam. 20.1; 21.8); alternatively, a woman might be referred to as "PN (personal name) the wife of PN" (Judg. 4.4). Children were subject to their father (but see Deut. 21.18–21; Exod. 21.15) until the parents arranged for their *marriage (e.g., *Isaac in Gen. 24; *Rachel and *Leah in Gen. 29). Nevertheless, love poetry from Mesopotamia, Egypt, and Israel (the *Song of Solomon) implies that children may have had some influence on their parents' selection. At her marriage the Israelite bride moved to her husband's household (Gen. 24) and was thenceforth subject to him.

The strains in a society so rooted in the family are occasionally apparent in the Bible. The outrages against *Hagar (Gen. 16; 21), *Dinah (Gen. 34), and the two Tamars (Gen. 38; 1 Kings 13) arise partly out of the sexual dynamics of the family. A childless *widow had little autonomy and was supposed to return to her father's house (Lev. 22.13; but cf. Ruth 1.8). Widows with sons, *divorced women (Num. 30.9), and *prostitutes (Josh. 6.22) were probably less dependent on male authority, but if they were poor, their lives could become precarious in the absence of a related male protector (Ruth 1.4–6).

The Bible reflects Israel's double standard in its attitude toward male and female *sexuality. Virginity was required of the bride but not of the groom (Deut. 22.13–21); by contrast, in Babylon before the sixth century BCE the bride's virginity was not an important part of marriage agreements. Husbands were free to visit prostitutes even as they enjoyed exclusive rights to their wives' sexuality. In Israel *adultery with a married woman meant death for both offenders (Lev. 20.10; Exod. 20.14; Deut. 22.22), but a man who raped an unbetrothed virgin was simply compelled to marry her (Deut. 22.28–29; Exod. 22.16–17; cf. 2 Sam. 13.15–16). Deuteronomy 24.1–4 implies that only men initiated divorces (cf. Jer. 3.8; Isa. 50.1). In only one book of the Bible, the *Song of Solomon, are male and female sexuality described in an equally positive manner.

The limitations placed on ancient Near Eastern women can be regarded in part as a function of patrilineal systems that try to keep children and property within the family, rather than as an example of low female status. Families usually traced their *genealogies through the male line, with sons inheriting the bulk of the father's property. The biblical term for the family household, "the father's house" (Exod. 6.14; Num. 1.2), reflects the priority of the paternal family line. A wife suspected of infidelity thus threatened more than just the husband's honor; the identity of her children could no longer be securely tied to the husband and his lineage.

When there were no sons, daughters could play a role in preserving the integrity of the family property. At *Nuzi in eastern Assyria and at Emar in Syria, a father without sons could declare his daughter legally a son and heir. Similarly, Numbers 36 provides for the daughters of Zelophehad to inherit their father's estate (cf. Job 42.15), but with the qualification that they must marry within their father's clan. The fact that the patriarchs were related to their spouses may be a reflex of these sorts of concerns.

It is not surprising that most biblical references to women concern mothers. Whereas *Abraham's servant enumerates his master's greatness in terms of property (Gen. 24.35), *Sarah's prominence comes from being potentially, then actually, *Isaac's mother. Rachel (Gen. 29.31–30.24; 35.16–20) and Hannah (1 Sam. 1) suffer for their apparent sterility. The only stipulation in the *Ten Commandments that treats women and men equally is the command to honor both father and mother (Exod. 20.12; Deut. 5.16; cf. Lev. 20.9; Prov. 30.17).

The Bible's focus on male-dominated institutions and values ignores the details of a woman's everyday life in the home. Although the Bible portrays men and women preparing food (Gen. 18.6–7;Gen. 27), it is assumed that women did the cooking for their families. Mothers provided the primary care and nurture for children until they were weaned at about three years old (1 Sam. 1.22, 24). From Proverbs 1.8 and 31.1 and by ethnographic analogy, it appears that mothers were also responsible for the socialization and much of the moral education of their small children (Prov. 6.20).

Mothers are particularly prominent in one of the most familiar biblical stories, that of the miraculous birth of a son to a sterile mother. Despite its primary focus on God and the child, the genre is careful to mark the mother as special. For example, Pharaoh, the most powerful man in the world, cannot resist Sarah's beauty (Gen. 12.12–20; cf. the similar stories of Rachel, Gen. 29.10–30; 31.19, 34–37; *Samson's mother, Judg. 13.1–20; and Hannah, 1 Sam. 1.9–2.10). This theme reappears in the Gospel accounts of Elizabeth (Luke 1) and of *Mary (Luke 1.26–56; Matt. 1.18–25), whose virginity, rather than sterility, serves to imply that *Jesus' birth is the most miraculous of all.

Social Patterns and Female Power. By combining ethnography and archaeology, scholars are reassessing the nature of the premonarchic Israelite community (1200–1000 BCE) and of women's roles in this period. The pattern of complex households in small villages was probably a response to the labor needs generated by early Israel's agrarian environment. Micah's household (Judg. 17–18), with living units occupied by Micah, his mother, his sons (and perhaps their wives), a hired priest, and servants, mirrors the archaeological evidence. Because each household member made a crucial contribution to the household, there was greater scope for women to exercise informal authority (Gen. 25.28; 27.5–17, 42–46; 28.4, 6–7; 1 Sam. 1.22–28; 2 Sam. 25; 2 Kings 4.8–10; 8.8). Indeed, the Bible accepts as normative the phenomenon of wives counseling and influencing their husbands (e.g., *Eve; Samson's mother; Abigail; the Shunammite woman; Job's wife).

*Samuel is reported to have predicted in the late eleventh century BCE that *kingship would break up the rural family and disrupt old patterns of formal and informal family authority (1 Sam. 8.11–13). And, in fact, small freeholds did give way to landed estates (1 Sam. 8.14; 1 Kings 21; Isa. 5.8), although Israel's economy remained agriculturally based, and rural women probably influenced their families more than their urban counterparts. Urban male-dominated royal, military, economic, and religious institutions took the lead in shaping Israelite culture and defining its norms and values. The Bible is rooted in these institutions; this explains why so much of Israelite women's lives, experiences, and values have remained hidden and inaccessible.

Women's Legal Status. Cuneiform tablets show that wealthy Mesopotamian wives and widows throughout history made business contracts and appeared in court as plaintiffs, defendants, and witnesses. They borrowed and lent money, and bought and sold property. Almost always, however, the woman is acting in concert with or on behalf of her husband or another male family member. In Egypt, women from different social strata engaged in litigation and owned houses and fields, which they seem to have been able to bequeath as they liked (but usually within the family).

Israelite seals and seal impressions with women's names provide important evidence that in Israel, as in Mesopotamia and Egypt, women had the right to sign documents, a fact that the Bible never hints at. Relatively egalitarian ideals underlie the old *laws of Exodus 21.26–32, where a value is placed on an injury irrespective of the sex of the injured party. But casuistic laws that begin "If a man . . ." usually refer to the man with the Hebrew word 'îš ("a male") rather than with the generic 'ādām ("human being"). When an occasional law clearly applies to both men and women, 'iššâ ("woman") may be added (Lev. 13.38; Num. 6.2). Apodictic laws are declared in second person masculine verb forms and may implicitly exclude women, as do many collective social terms. For example, in Exodus 19.14 Moses returns to "the people," who in the next verse are ordered to stay away from women (cf. 2 Sam. 5.1; 19.15; 1 Kings 12.1; 2 Kings 21.24).

Women's Activities Outside the Home. Besides being wives, concubines, and mothers, the Bible shows women working in the fields (Ruth 2.21–23), fetching water (Gen. 24.11, 15), and tending flocks (Gen. 29.9; Exod. 2.16, 21). They were midwives (Gen. 35.17; Exod. 1.15) and nurses (Ruth 4.16; 1 Kings 1.2, 4). Royal establishments employed women as perfumers, bakers, cooks (1 Sam. 8.13), and singers (2 Sam. 19.35). Although only men are mentioned as potters in the Bible, ethnographic analogies suggest that women were skilled in this important craft, and in weaving as well. There are references to enslaved women, some of whom would have been debt-slaves (Deut. 15.12) or war-captives (Deut. 20.14). Prostitutes were tolerated but, as in Mesopotamia, they were relegated to the margins of society (Deut. 23.17 outlaws only prostitutes associated with non-Yahwistic cults).

Wives of rulers, *queens, and women of the nobility were able to act with a relative degree of autonomy (1 Kings 21.1–16). The queen of *Sheba, who may have belonged to a dynasty of Arabian queens, negotiated with King *Solomon (1 Kings 10). Biblical accession formulas in 1 and 2 Kings are careful to note the name of each new Judahite king's mother (e.g., 1 Kings 15.2, 10), and the queen mother may have had quasi-official status.

Women's Religious Practice and Experience. All biblical evidence for women's religious experience has been filtered through male eyes; thus much remains hidden. The description of the ideal wife (Prov. 31.10–31), for example, mentions her wise advice, but is mute about religious activity. Men and women incurred temporary ritual impurity, and thus exclusion from the cult, for genital emissions (Lev. 12.2–5; 15.1–33), but menstruation especially penalized women. A woman after the birth of a son was impure for seven days, but for fourteen after a daughter's birth (Lev. 12.2–5).

Biblical laws obliged only men to attend the three primary pilgrimage *feasts (Exod. 23.17; 34.23; Deut 16.16), but women such as Hannah clearly participated as well. During the festival she prays and makes a vow (1 Sam. 1–13, 27), and when Samuel is born she praises God with a song of thanksgiving (1 Sam. 2.1–10; cf. Exod. 15.20–21). The detailed legislation regarding women's vows (Num. 30) suggests that this was a significant form of female piety. The personal piety of several women appears in accounts of wives or widows consulting or helping prophets (1 Kings 14.1–6; 17.8–16; 2 Kings 4.1–37). The motif in the Gospels of women appealing to and following Jesus (e.g., Mark 7.24–30; John.11.1–44) derives in part from these stories.

Monotheistic Israel differed from Mesopotamia and Egypt, where women served many deities as priestesses and even as high priestesses. The Israelite *priesthood consisted of men who inherited the office from their fathers. Some women in Israel, called qedēšôt (formerly translated as "sacred *prostitutes") were apparently consecrated to non-Yahwistic cults (Hos. 4.14; Deut. 23.19–20), but their function is unclear. Women served in some unexplained capacity at the tent shrine (Exod. 38.8; 1 Sam. 2.22), and after the *exile the *Temple employed female singers (Ezra 2.65; Neh. 7.67.).

What Israelite women did at the pilgrim feasts and how their worship differed from that of men is unclear, but it is an instructive question. Recognizing that gender differentiation—in tandem with the preconceptions of the observer—plays a role in determining what is considered "religious," scholars are beginning to reassess the ancient forms of women's piety. For example, Hannah stays home from the feast to nurse Samuel (1 Sam. 1.22), which might suggest that women's spirituality was contingent upon and secondary to men's. Is she temporarily cutting herself off from God, or were there compensatory home-centered rituals?

Besides the preparation of the corpse (cf. Mark 16.1; Luke 23.55–24.1) and funerary lamentations (Jer. 9.17), Israelite women no doubt participated in additional rituals related to the life-cycle. One suspects that midwives performed birth rituals (Gen. 35.17). The tradition of mourning for Jephthah's daughter (Judg. 11.37–40) may have been a rite of passage for adolescent girls. Zipporah performs a marriage-related *circumcision (Exod. 4.24–26). The prophets *Deborah (Judg. 4.4) and Huldah (2 Kings 22.14) were married women; perhaps they should be compared to postmenopausal women in other societies who become religious practitioners.

*Miriam (Exod. 15.20), Deborah (Judg. 4.4), Huldah (2 Kings 22.14), and Noadiah (Neh. 6.14) are called *prophets (see also Ezek. 13.17; Joel 2.28). Deborah's and Huldah's prophecy seems to differ in no way from male prophecy. Contemporaneously with Huldah (seventh century BCE), the *Assyrians were very interested in and influenced by prophecy; texts mention female prophets, many of whom apparently operated independently of any temple cult.

Power struggles among priestly families may underlie the account in Numbers 12 of Miriam's and *Aaron's revolt. Micah 6.4 is mute on the subject of any wrongdoing, and equally commends Miriam, *Moses, and Aaron as deliverers. Miriam's very presence in the account of the *Exodus (Exod. 15.20–21) and *wilderness wanderings, complete with death notice in Numbers 20.1, suggests that she was an important cultic leader in Israelite memory.

Certain practices that the Bible considers abhorrent may at times have constituted mainstream Israelite religious activity. Significant female participation may be sought in lost, hidden, or forbidden categories of worship. The Bible condemns *Saul for consulting Samuel's ghost through the female medium at Endor (1 Sam. 28; see Witch), and disapproves of what seems to be a cult of the dead (Isa. 65.4); yet recent research has shown that the cult of dead ancestors was important to many Israelites (see Afterlife and Immortality). In the two biblical episodes involving *teraphim (household gods related to the cult of dead ancestors), the persons handling them are women (Gen. 31.19; 1 Sam. 19.13).

The numerous female clay figurines (often called Asherah figurines) found in Israelite domestic and tomb contexts must have had a religious function, perhaps related to a mother-goddess cult. Evidence from Kuntillet Ajrud in the Sinai and elsewhere, in combination with reassessments of the biblical text, suggests that many Israelites during the monarchy worshiped the Canaanite goddess *Asherah, possibly even as a consort of Yahweh.

It is worth noting two exceptions to the Bible's tendency to treat women as lesser members of the religious congregation; both mark the inauguration in *Jerusalem of a new religious era. When *David installs the *ark in Jerusalem, women and men share in the ritual meal (2 Sam.

6.9), and when Ezra conducts his public reading of the *Torah (Neh. 8.2–3), the text stresses that his audience consists of understanding men and women. Reminiscent of the latter passage is Genesis 1's assumption of the equal status of male and female (v. 27); the gender-inclusiveness of this text (generally dated to the exilic period) may reflect the importance of women among the exiles in maintaining the cohesion of family, community, and religion in the absence of male-dominated institutions such as the *kingship and the Temple *priesthood, which could no longer be regarded as keepers of the national identity.

Female Symbolism. Women play an important role in the Bible's symbolic repertory. One of the most striking and influential *metaphors in the Bible is the personification of *Wisdom as a woman (Prov. 1; 8; 9). Jeremiah 31.15 describes war-ravaged Israel as a mother, Rachel, weeping for her dead children. In a familiar biblical metaphor, God too becomes a parent who feels exasperation but also compassion—literally "womb-feeling" (Hos. 2.23; Jer. 31.20; see Mercy of God)—for the child Israel. Israel, Jerusalem, and even foreign nations and cities may be personified as daughters (see Isa. 1.8; 23.12; Lamentations). Marriage becomes a central metaphor to describe the past and future intimacy of God the husband and Israel the wife (e.g., Hos. 2.14–20; Ezek. 16.1–4; Jer. 2.2), who all too often turns into an adulteress ("playing the harlot") with other gods (Hos. 2; Jer. 3.6–10; Ezek 16.15). Political considerations help to explain the function of some women in the Bible. Abishag is actually a symbolic pawn, first of the northern tribes (1 Kings 1.3), then of Adonijah (1 Kings 2.17). The story of *Rahab (Josh. 2; 6.22–25) and the presence of women in *genealogies (1 Chron. 1–9; cf. Matt. 1.1–16) served to imply that the descendants of these women belonged to kinship groups considered subordinate by more dominant Israelite tribes.

Biblical laws against a man lying "with a male as with a woman" (Lev. 18.22) and against cross-dressing (Deut. 22.5) suggest that the borders between male and female realms are not to be crossed. Women are not warriors; thus it is ultimate humiliation for Sisera and Abimelech to die at the hands of a woman (cf. Judith). Jeremiah's oracle against Babylon even threatens Babylonian mercenaries with becoming women (Jer. 50.37). At the same time, in the deliberately shocking imagery that characterizes prophetic discourse, Jeremiah epitomizes the newness of the era when Jerusalem will be restored by suggesting some sort of gender reversal (Jer. 31.22).

Negative Views of Women. Women in the Bible are generally less important than men and subject to male authority, but paradoxically women are also very powerful in one respect, their seductive persuasiveness. The Bible singles out foreign women as dangerous, liable to lead their partners away from exclusive Yahwism (Deut. 7.1–4; 23.17–18; Num. 25; 1 Kings 11.1–6; Ezek. 8.14–15; Ezra 9.2–10.44; Neh. 13.23–27). The Bible condemns Phoenician *Jezebel for persuading Ahab to neglect the Israelite *covenant with Yahweh (1 Kings 16.31–33; 21). Canaanite *Rahab (Josh. 2.9–11) and *Ruth the Moabite are exceptions as good foreign women who take Yahweh as their God. The opposite phenomenon—Israelite women led to apostasy by foreign men—is addressed only metaphorically, when Israel is personified as a adulterous wife who has been unfaithful to her husband, Yahweh (Hos. 1–3; Ezek. 16).

The prophets denounce vain and selfish women (Isa. 3.16–23; Amos 4.1), and Proverbs scorns contentious and headstrong women (Prov. 21.19; 27.15; 11.22). The "strange" woman of Proverbs 1–9, a combination of every possible negative female type (an adulteress, a cult-related prostitute, a goddess, a foreign woman), is a literary creation who functions rhetorically as the exact opposite of a positive female figure, Lady *Wisdom.

The Bible's negative assessment of several women may arise from an unspoken political or rhetorical subtext (e.g., Michal, Jezebel, Athaliah, Gomer). Potiphar's wife (Gen. 39.6–21) and Delilah (Judg. 16.4–21) are bad women indeed, but folklorists recognize that these "evil" women play a crucial role in propelling the central character toward hero status, a story pattern repeated in countless folktales.

Genesis never refers to a woman as the cause of the human condition (see Eve). The earliest biblical reference to this concept occurs in Sirach 25.24 (early second century BCE). It is a doctrine, like the related ones of original sin and *Satan, that developed during the Second Temple Period (ca. 500 BCE – 70 CE), to be taken up in turn by early Christianity (1 Tim. 2.12–14; cf. Rom. 5.12).

Social Reality and Narrative Patterns. Investigators of women's history view with interest the intersection between religious symbols and narrative patterns on the one hand and social reality on the other. The fact that Ishtar or Hathor is an authoritative female deity does not mean that real-life women could achieve comparable power in Egyptian or Mesopotamian society.

Nevertheless, in actual society and in literature, women who function on the upper or lower margins of normative society—queens, wealthy widows, priestesses, prostitutes—may transcend otherwise static boundaries determined by gender. As high priestess of the Sumerian moon god, the princess Enheduanna (twenty-third century BCE) composed hymns which may have provided a model for later hymnists. The prostitute Rahab negotiates successfully for the common good of her family and Israel (Josh. 2; 6). In the *Gilgamesh Epic, the prostitute Shamhat is pivotal in bringing Enkidu from bestiality to civilization; her role may usefully be compared to that of *Eve in Genesis 3. Anthropologists have observed that this mediating quality is often a distinctive aspect of femaleness.

A recurrent pattern in biblical stories about women is their use of indirection, even subterfuge, to achieve divinely sanctioned ends (e.g., *Rebekah, Gen. 27; Tamar, Gen. 38; Shiphrah and Puah, Exod. 1.15–21; *Esther). By seemingly devious actions which invert or overthrow established but restrictive social hierarchies, women often bring about a new order of life and freedom. MARY JOAN WINN LEITH

Second Temple Period

Interest in the role and status of women in Second Temple Judaism (and generally in Judaism and Christianity) has increased exponentially in the past twenty-five years. As research has progressed, however, the difficulty of reclaiming women's voices from a largely silent patriarchal textual tradition has been acknowledged. The major groups of texts of the Second Temple period are androcentric in focus, written by male authors for a male audience, and they mention women only rarely and usually in peripheral contexts. A second body of evidence that can be utilized in the search for women's lives is archaeological, the material remains of society both in Palestine and in the Diaspora. But material remains are generally silent as to the gender of their owners, and so are subject to the potentially biased interpretation of the excavator. These limitations make the recovery of women's lives from the Second Temple period fraught with difficulty.

Women's Daily Lives. The beginning of the Second Temple period was the era of *Persian domination of the ancient Near East (538–332 BCE). During this time Jewish settlement was concentrated in Babylon, Judea, and to a more limited extent in Egypt. Judea in this period was poor, with a rural, agrarian economy. Extended families (the "father's house") worked their own fields and were self-reliant in most matters of daily existence. Both women's and men's work was essential to the survival of the family unit. Women's tasks included agricultural labor, food processing, textile manufacture, and child care (women would often have ten or more pregnancies to insure that a minimum number of children survived to adulthood). Because of the interdependent nature of the family unit, gender roles were not sharply defined except for biological function.

As Greek culture spread over the ancient Near East, especially in the Hellenistic period (332 – ca. 200 BCE), the mingling of the two worlds produced the unique blend of culture called Hellenism. Hellenism created a more urban, mobile society, and also saw the rise of an extensive Diaspora community, particularly in Alexandria in Egypt and in Asia Minor. Urban life brought with it smaller families and specialized economic roles, so that women's roles became more circumscribed. While men performed their tasks in the public sphere, women became more confined to the home, limited to their maternal and housekeeping roles (this is primarily true for upper- and middle-class women). Spinning and weaving continued to be women's work. Upper-class women evidently could and did play active roles in the Greco-Roman Jewish Diaspora, but for the vast majority of women such occasions were limited. Educational opportunities expanded for women in this period, but a good part of the population remained illiterate. The visual arts reveal a new interest in the eroticism of women. So women as women are both more visible, in art and literature, and less visible, being more and more confined to the home. This created a tension in Hellenistic society's view of women, reflected in Jewish literature of the period.

Women in Postexilic Biblical Literature. The group of canonical works from the Persian period is small, and few of those are concerned with women; notable exceptions are the books of Esther, Ruth, and the Song of Solomon, all of which contain positive portrayals of women.

The book of *Esther, written in the late Persian–early Hellenistic period, is a fictional account of events leading up to the Jewish festival of Purim. Set in the eastern Diaspora, the book describes how a young Jewish girl named Esther became the consort of the Persian king and saved her people from destruction by her resourcefulness and courage. Notorious for its lack of interest in religious matters (it never mentions God, although the author clearly believes in a divine providence at work in human affairs), the book focuses on the Jews as an ethnic group and on Esther as a human heroine who saves her people by her own actions and thus as a role model for Jews in the Diaspora.

The date of the book of *Ruth is disputed, but sometime in the fifth century BCE is reasonable, understanding the book as a response to the postexilic decrees by Ezra and Nehemiah against intermarriage. The main character is Ruth the Moabite, who accompanies her Israelite mother-in-law Naomi back to Judea after the death of their husbands, and eventually, through her own praiseworthy actions, becomes the ancestress of king *David. The book concerns itself with the mundane things of life: food, *marriage, offspring, and particularly the covenant-loyalty of one (foreign) woman for another. Ruth becomes the paradigm of loyalty for all women and men, and her attachment to Naomi resembles the marriage vow: "Where you go, I will go; where you lodge, I will lodge; your people shall be my people, and your God my God. Where you die, I will die—there will I be buried. May the Lord do thus and so to me, and more as well, if even death parts me from you!" (1.16–17).

The *Song of Solomon (of uncertain date, but with final redaction in the Second Temple period) is the only book in the Bible partly written in a woman's voice. It is a series of love songs that are frankly erotic in character, celebrating the sexual life between an unnamed woman and a man, with the woman acting as a free agent, pursuing her lover, initiating their encounters, and glorying in their physical love. Conspicuously absent are the usual biblical roles for women, those of wife and mother. The couple functions as equals in their erotic union, resulting in an unusual and compelling portrayal of the woman.

Women in the Apocrypha. The *Apocrypha are writings considered canonical by the Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox churches, but not by Judaism and the Protestant churches. Like the Hebrew Bible, the Apocrypha comprise various types of literature, and also like the Hebrew Bible, they are androcentric, mentioning women only occasionally, when their lives impinge on the activities of men. Two important portraits of women are found in the Additions to Esther and the book of Judith.

The Additions to *Esther are six major blocks of material added to the Hebrew book of Esther, along with minor changes in the text, when it was translated into Greek, probably in 78 BCE. The Additions attempt to remedy problems perceived in the Hebrew book: the lack of mention of God and Esther's non-Jewish lifestyle. The changes make Esther a pious but passive girl, relying on God instead of herself, so that God becomes the true hero of the story. Esther's beauty is emphasized and her brains and skill downplayed. The changes may have rendered Esther more palatable as a heroine to a Hellenistic audience accustomed to passive romantic heroines. This, then, is an example of conscious downgrading of the role of a woman.

The book of *Judith, probably composed in the second century BCE, presents an unambiguous female hero. In this fictitious narrative, Judith (whose name is a feminine form of the word for "Jew"), a beautiful, wealthy, and pious widow, leaves her quiet existence to save her town of Bethulia from the besieging Assyrians. She does this by pretending to desert to the enemy and then seducing the Assyrian general Holofernes; when he is drunk, she cuts off his head and returns to Bethulia in triumph. Thus "one Hebrew woman has brought disgrace on the house of King Nebuchadnezzar" (14.18). However, this behavior by a woman is acceptable only in national emergencies; after the Assyrians are defeated, Judith returns to her quiet existence, remaining a widow until her death. Women's power is expressed in Judith, but only within the confines of patriarchy.

Women in the Pseudepigrapha. Similarly ambivalent attitudes toward women also exists in the eclectic collection of Jewish writings known as the *Pseudepigrapha. The Conversion of Asenath and The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs are two examples of the wide variety of portraits of women in this literature.

The Conversion of Asenath was written to answer the question of how *Joseph, the quintessential man of God, could have married an Egyptian, "Asenath daughter of Potiphera, priest of On" (Gen. 41.45). According to the story, Joseph does indeed refuse to marry Asenath at first, because she is an idol worshipper. But Asenath, who the text emphasizes is a virgin, is so stricken by Joseph's refusal that she repents and converts to the worship of Joseph's God. The bulk of the story is the account of Asenath's conversion. She retires to her chamber, puts on mourning garments, and laments and fasts for seven days. On the eighth day she repents of her idolatry and confesses to God. In response an archangel appears to her, declares that her repentance has been accepted, and gives her a mysterious honeycomb to eat. Her marriage to Joseph follows, and she lives (basically) happily ever after. Asenath is the prototype for all future proselytes, an important role for a woman. However, once again her prominence is within the context of patriarchy, for the purpose of her conversion is to enable her to marry Joseph.

The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs are part of the genre of pseudepigraphical literature known as testaments, which are the deathbed words of prominent figures from Israel's past, in this case the eponymous ancestors of the twelve *tribes. Each testament is concerned with particular virtues or vices, which the patriarch instructs his offspring to practice or ignore. The theme of chastity enjoys special prominence in the Testaments. Therefore in the Testaments women exist chiefly as temptations for pious men, their lewdness often coupled with drunkenness as an aid to fornication. For example, Judah, telling of his intercourse with his daughter-in-law Tamar, says, "Since I was drunk with wine, I did not recognize her and her beauty enticed me because of her manner of tricking herself out" (12.3; The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha [ed. James H. Charlesworth, Doubleday, 1983] 1, 798). *Reuben, while discussing his sin with his father's concubine Bilhah, says, "Do not devote your attention to a woman's looks, nor live with a woman who is already married, nor become involved in affairs with women" (3.1; ibid., 783). In the Testaments, women exist only as objects to trip up heedless men.

All of the above examples are from literature that in some way features women prominently. But we know almost nothing about the communities that produced this literature and their relation to one another. With classical sources, we are on firmer ground, for we know more about the authors and their audiences.

Women in the Classical Sources. *Josephus and *Philo are the main sources for Jewish thought about women in classical literature. Josephus, who wrote in Rome under the patronage of the Flavian emperors after the First Jewish Revolt (66–70 CE), wrote several works, including The Antiquities of the Jews, which is essentially a rewriting of the biblical text for apologetic purposes. In attempting to present Jews and Judaism in a favorable light to his Greco-Roman audience, Josephus makes many changes in the presentation of biblical narratives, including their portrayals of women. One example will suffice. When Josephus rewrites the story of Esther, he has before him both the Hebrew and the *Septuagint versions of the book. He chooses to retain most of the changes introduced by the latter, heightening the erotic aspect even more, and downplaying Esther's active role in the story. Thus, the Jewish people are saved, but mainly because Esther is beautiful and the king desires her sexually, not because of her intelligence and resourcefulness.

Philo, a first-century CE Alexandrian Jew with an extensive knowledge of Greek philosophy and literature, undertakes an allegorical interpretation of the biblical text that is a fusion of Jewish thought and Greek philosophy. Therefore, the women and men in the biblical stories become symbols for higher philosophical realities. In the process the women are completely denigrated. Philo draws his dichotomy of male/female from Pythagorean and Aristotelian schemes. Man is nous or "mind," the higher intellectual capacity; woman, on the other hand, is aisthēsis or "sense-impression," the lower form of perception. Man (nous) is immortal, in the image of God, while woman is mortal, closely connected with sōma, "body." Since the goal of nous is to be free of the troubles of the body, woman is automatically placed in the category of undesirable and wrong. Philo's are the most systematically misogynist of all the writings we have surveyed.

Conclusion. A pattern has emerged in this survey. The earlier literature, stemming from a period when gender roles were more egalitarian and both men and women had essential economic and social roles to play, allows women greater freedom of action and a louder voice (Esther, Ruth, Song of Solomon). The later literature, influenced by Hellenistic culture with its more restricted view of women's roles, allows women to act only in relation to men, or in situations of crisis (Asenath, Judith). Finally, in literature written by men on whom the influence of Greek thought is clear, women are more thoroughly denigrated and swept from the stage of an all-male world (Josephus, Philo).

SIDNIE ANN WHITE

Early Christianity

Information on early Christian women is found in the New Testament, writings of the early church fathers, apocryphal and gnostic literature, and archaeological finds such as inscriptions and papyri. In recent years, these sources, historically overlooked for data on women, have been exploited by scholars, resulting in dozens of important secondary works. While the evidence must be treated carefully by the historian and theologian, it furnishes proof that data on the women of antiquity do exist; in fact, the study of women in the New Testament and early church constitutes one of the liveliest and most fruitful areas of biblical scholarship today.

The Greco-Roman and Jewish Heritage. Like Christians in general, women in the early church were products of the wider culture. In general, women were dependent both financially and legally on the men in their lives—fathers, husbands, uncles, brothers, and sons. Women generally married while still teenagers, bore one or more children, and died young (the average life expectancy was thirty-four years), often in childbirth. If a girl survived childhood (i.e., was not exposed), and a woman survived childbirth, she might live a long life and bury her husband: women were the primary caretakers of the graves of family members, including those of in-laws. It was also women who passed on the household (usually the men's) religious practices such as ancestor worship to their descendants.

Except in the most outlying rural areas, women were not isolated from each other or from other men. Middle- and upper-class women living in villas or in urban areas often functioned as chief household managers, especially when their husbands were absent for long periods of time on commerce or at war. While there is considerable evidence for independent and wealthy women, most women lived in slavery, near poverty, or middle-class stability; therefore, most worked for wages for their own economic survival and that of their families, even if they were married to a merchant or freedman. In some cases, women may have been secluded in their homes, but for the most part they moved freely in many spheres of the Greco-Roman world—the agora, baths, businesses, and religious associations.

With regard to religious background, some early Christian women were Jewish, since Christianity was a sect of Judaism for a time. Other women converted from Greco-Roman cults, while still others, often in the same family or neighborhood, remained non-Christian. This coexistence of adherents of different religions systems was often peaceful but could lead to conflict, often over the issue of appropriate roles of women in the various groups.

Evidence from both Jewish and Greco-Roman circles shows that women held leadership roles in these groups. In Judaism, archaeological and other evidence demonstrates that some women in the first few centuries CE held positions such as head of a synagogue (archisynagōgis), leader (archēgissa), elder (presbytis), "mother of the synagogue" (mater synagogae), and priest (hiereia). The exact functions of these women are difficult to ascertain, but they were probably equivalent to the functions of men bearing parallel titles. The evidence further demonstrates that women were integrated into regular services, not segregated in "women's galleries" or separate rooms, and that some were major financial contributors to local synagogues.

Similarly, women held leadership roles in many, if not most, of the myriad Greco-Roman cults that allowed women members. Some of their functions included priest, musician, stolist, prophet, torchbearer, dancer, and mourner. Outside of religion, women worked as midwives, lawyers, merchants, artists, teachers, physicians, prostitutes, and laborers and professionals of all sorts.

Women in positions of authority in religion and society did not constitute a majority: the culture was still patriarchal, that is, controlled primarily by men. However, the fact that women did play some leadership roles in both Judaism and the larger society became significant for the growth of Christianity: women who were drawn to it undoubtedly would have expected to be active participants in the new cult if not leaders. Their presence had a definite effect on the development of the *canon, the emerging role of the *priest and *bishop, as well as liturgy, theology, and battles with heresy and *gnosticism.

Women in the Early Christian Movement. The New Testament and early church fathers provide preliminary data on women. The earliest evidence, from *Paul's letters, suggests that women functioned as dynamic leaders of the movement (Phil. 4.2–3; Rom. 16), *deacons (Rom. 16.1–2), *apostles (Rom. 16.7), and missionaries (1 Cor. 16.19; Rom. 16.3–4). The Gospels relate that Jesus had women followers as well as men (Mark 15.40–41; Matt. 27.55; Luke 8.1–3) and treated women as equals (cf. John 4.9, 27; Luke 10.38–42); it was also women who were the first to bear witness to his *resurrection. The Acts of the Apostles mention the four daughters of Philip who prophesied (21.9); Lydia from Thyatira, a merchant and the head of her household (16.14– 15); the missionary couple, Priscilla and Aquila (chap. 18); house-church leaders (12.12); and prominent converts (17.4, 12).

Thus, in pre-Pauline and Pauline Christian communities, women appear to have functioned almost identically to men. In fact, it is possible that more women than men were house-church leaders, hosting vital prayer meetings that became the kernel of the movement. At least one woman deacon, Phoebe, is recorded in the New Testament (Rom. 16.1–2), and she functioned as an official teacher and missionary in the church of Cenchreae. Euodia and Syntyche from Philippi (Phil. 4.2–3) were prominent leaders of that community, and *Junia served the church at Rome as an apostle (Rom. 16.7). The most prominent woman in the New Testament is Prisca/Priscilla, who worked alongside her husband and was probably the more renowned of the pair (1 Cor. 16.19; Rom. 16.3–4; Acts 18). The women Mary, Tryphaena, Tryphosa, and Persis in Romans 16 are described as having labored (kopian) for the Lord, the same term Paul used to describe his own evangelizing and teaching activities. (See Elizabeth Schüssler Fiorenza, In Memory of Her, New York, 1983.)

Celibacy became a major life-style choice for both men and women early in the Christian movement, and by the third and fourth centuries men and women were living in houses and monasteries (a term that includes convents) segregated by gender. Renunciation by men was not deemed problematic, but the popularity of female celibacy led to fears that women's independence would undermine the very fabric of home and society. Early attestations of this popularity and the subsequent social tensions it created are found in many of the apocryphal Acts of the second and third centuries, including the Acts of Paul and Thecla, the Acts of Andrew, the Acts of Peter, and the Acts of Thomas (see Apocrypha, article on Christian Apocrypha). In the stories in these Acts, celibacy was idealized, and many women were portrayed as heroines for breaking off engagements and leaving husbands and traditional home situations for the sake of the gospel. While many of the stories in the Acts may be fictitious, they probably originated in oral form in circles of independent women and reflect actual people, events, and trends.

Other threats to the survival of the young church in the eyes of male leaders included the leadership of independent women in gnostic and heretical groups. Two prophets, Priscilla and Maximilla, were prominent in the Montanist sect of the second century, and women in those groups may have baptized and celebrated the Eucharist (Cyprian, Ep. 75[74].10; Epiphanius, Haer. 49.2). Some gnostic sects also allowed women to serve as priests and to baptize (Hippolytus, Haer. 6.35; Irenaeus, Haer. 1.13.1–2; Epiphanius, Haer. 42.4; Tertullian, Praescr. 41). Bishop Atto of Vercelli (ca. 885–961) wrote in several tracts that women were ordained just like men in the ancient church, were leaders of communities, were called elders (presbyterae), and fulfilled the duties of preaching, directing, and teaching.

Female celibacy and other acts of independence led male leaders to disseminate countertreatises in which they prescribed strict behavior for all women and attempted to bring the entire Christian movement more in line with the overall culture's ideal of the patriarchal family and household. The New Testament "household codes" (Eph. 5.21–6.9; Col. 3.18–25; 1 Peter 2.18–3.7; see Ethical Lists), written by followers of Paul, not Paul himself, clearly urged women's subordination to men. The so-called *Pastoral letters (1 and 2 Timothy and Titus) are also early works accepted into the New Testament canon. 1 Timothy 2.11–12 forbade women from speaking in church, and Titus 1.7–9 assumed that only men would be bishops.

Retrenchment and Later Trends. The church fathers of the second through fourth centuries, being among those who agitated against women's independence, decreed that women could only minister to other women as deacons or be enrolled as virgins or *widows. Women deacons as described in third- and fourth-century documents were at least fifty or sixty years of age, ministered to sick and poor women, were present at interviews of women with (male) bishops, priests, or deacons, and instructed women catechumens. Before the decline of adult *baptism, women deacons assisted at the baptisms of women, probably their most important role. Women deacons may have been the only women admitted into ministry in the orthodox church by the laying-on of hands by the bishop. In the earliest church, however, female deacons may have functioned much more similarly to male deacons, since the sources are not always clear.

Widows and virgins, while not ordained, had recognized status and privileges in the early church. However, there were restrictions placed on them. Widows in New Testament times had to be at least sixty years of age and married only once; younger widows were expected to remarry. The references to virgins in the New Testament are more vague (Acts 21.9; 1 Cor. 7.1, 8, 25–38), but the order seems to be closely linked to that of widows.

Meanwhile, the male leaders reserved for themselves the right to serve the whole church in the more important and powerful roles such as *elder (presbyteros) and *bishop (episkopos) and adhered to the ideal of the monarchical episcopate: the high reverence due the bishop and the subordination of others to that office. Bishops in these fathers' minds could, of course, only be fellow men, and the directives they set down toward women could be stringent.

Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, writing to the Philippians around 110 CE, attempted to limit women's behavior by clearly delineating their roles as virgins, widows, and ever-faithful wives. Ignatius of Antioch urged Polycarp to be the "protector" of widows and exhorted women to be "altogether contented with their husbands" (Ep. Polycarp 4,5). Libanius (314–95) complained that women distract men from their religious duties (Ep. 1057). Canons from the Council of Gangra in 340 declare *anathema women who wear male attire, who leave their husbands, and who cut off their hair, a sign of their subjection.

Tertullian, perhaps the most misogynist of all the early fathers, wrote four lengthy treatises dealing with women: On the Apparel of Women (ca. 202), On the Veiling of Virgins (ca. 204), To His Wife (ca. 207), and On Monogamy (ca. 208). In On the Apparel of Women 1.1, he described women as "the gateway of the devil" and blamed them for leading men astray through their sexual wiles. In chap. 9 of On the Veiling of Women, he wrote, "It is not permitted to a woman to speak in the church; but neither is it permitted her to teach, nor to baptize, nor to offer, nor to claim to herself a lot in any manly function, not to say in any sacerdotal office." To Tertullian's way of thinking, the ideal woman was a totally subservient being, completely regulated by strict rules governing every facet of her life—a far cry from the autonomous woman of many of the nascent Christian communities.

One early church leader who was more positive toward women in some ways was Jerome (342–420). In a number of letters between him and the many women of his social circle, Jerome appears as a sort of mentor and father figure to upper-class women who had chosen the celibate life-style. One of his Roman disciples, Paula, founded a monastery near *Bethlehem.

However, even some of Jerome's saintly women were admired for leading lives that followed strict rules of behavior, rules not generally applied to men. Fabiola, a young Christian woman from Rome, divorced her husband because he was a sinner; this was applauded by other Christians. However, these same Christians, including Jerome, condemned her for subsequently remarrying: "She did not know that the rigor of the gospel takes away from women all pretext for remarriage, so long as their former husbands are alive." When she finally realized her "mistake," she publically confessed and was restored to communion. Then, being wealthy, she sold her property and, with the money, founded a hospital to nurse the poor and sick (Ep. 77).

Monasticism became increasingly important for women in the face of these restrictions and the eradication of heretical and gnostic groups that had promoted women's independence. A number of women besides Paula, mostly from the upper strata of society, founded or cofounded all-women houses, communities, and nunneries where young women learned to read, write, paint, and draw. Such houses, like those of men, followed rules of order and were self-supporting and devoted to prayer and good works. At first the houses were independent of local church authorities, but over time they were brought under the jurisdiction of the bishop.

While female monasteries may have been centers of opportunity primarily for members of the upper classes, thereby restricting most other women to marriage in patriarchal households or to lives as virgins and widows dependent on men, these communities nevertheless made important contributions to the entire church that have historically been overlooked. While the evidence is meager, especially compared with evidence from all-male enclaves, it suggests that all-women groups produced high-quality illuminated manuscripts; wove many of the tapestries that adorned the great basilicas, as well as the ornate robes worn by clergy; crafted at least some of the silver Communion ware and jewelry used in the liturgy; and contributed to sketch books that served imperial architects as blueprints for exquisite mosaics that decorated many basilicas. Also, women in some communities taught men reading, writing, and drawing; dispensed wisdom to male leaders; and became renowned as leaders of centers of learning.

Significantly, despite attempts by the hierarchy through the ages to conceal the evidence, there is attestation for women priests into the Byzantine era. An epistle of Pope Gelasius I (492–96) to bishops in Italy and Sicily mentions in annoyance that women were officiating at the sacred altars and taking part in ecclesiastical affairs imputed only to men. An inscription from Bruttium dating to the end of the fifth century mentions the presbytera Leta (Corpus incriptionum latinarum 10.8079), and another from Salona in Dalmatia (425 CE) mentions the presbytera Flavia Vitalia. While these attestations are rare, they confirm that women functioned sacerdotally—and that male bishops occasionally ordained them. VALERIE ABRAHAMSEN

Word. See Logos.

Word of God. "The Word of God" is a common expression for *revelation. In biblical tradition, the term is first applied to prophecy and later comes to describe the *Law as communication from God; in the New Testament, it is used for scripture and also for the gospel and the person of Jesus Christ. In Christian tradition, the expression occurs in a loose, popular sense that implies the *inspiration of the Bible, and in a stricter way, particularly in modern Protestant *hermeneutics (see below).

In preexilic Israel, the phrase "the word of Yahweh" denotes the source of prophetic inspiration, not necessarily its character as verbal or rational. The word may be received in visionary form by a prophet whose own mental processes are temporarily suspended (Num. 24.4). In the exilic prophets and exilic redaction of earlier traditions, however, the transcendence of the divine self-disclosure comes into sharper focus. Thus, Jeremiah can speak of his struggle with God's word (Jer. 20.8–9), and Second Isaiah contrasts its effective purpose with the transience of human nature (Isa. 40.8). While for Jeremiah the prophetic word and the Law remain distinct (Jer. 18.8), in Deuteronomy they are brought into closer conjunction (Deut. 30.14). In the postexilic period, the word of God becomes an overarching concept comprising revelation through abidingly valid legal commandments, through prophetic interpretation of historical experience, and through creation (Ps. 147.15). The latter two understandings are especially prominent in *apocalyptic literature and in Hellenistic Judaism, respectively.

In the New Testament, the word of God, along with equivalents like "God says," "it was spoken," and so on, is used in connection with biblical *quotations (e.g., John 10.35; Rom. 15.10, and Mark 7.13, where the phrase implies the idea that written law is superior to the oral tradition of the scribes). Echoing prophetic language, in the prologue to Luke's gospel, the motif of a new era of active prophecy is evoked by the coming of the word of God to *Simeon and *John the Baptist (Luke 2.29; 3.2). Moreover, the word of God, or variants such as "the word of the Lord" or "the Word," is applied especially in Luke-Acts (but frequently elsewhere as well) to the gospel message of salvation through Jesus (Mark 4.14, cf. Luke 8.11; Acts 4.31; 8.25; 11.19; 1 Thess. 1.6; 1 Cor. 14.36; 1 Tim. 1.15). Because of this it is occasionally difficult to decide whether the word refers to Jewish scripture or to the gospel (e.g., Heb. 4.12; Eph. 6.17). The word in the sense of the gospel message is closely paralleled with the person of Christ as the content of preaching (Rom. 10.8, 1 Cor. 1.23). It is therefore but a small step to identify Jesus himself as the divine Word or *Logos incarnate (John 1.14; cf. Rev. 19.9).

Throughout postbiblical tradition, the word of God is regularly found as a pious periphrasis for the Bible. At the Reformation, however, the phrase acquired a new, controversial emphasis, and often carries the implication of the supremacy of scripture over both tradition and the sacraments in the theology and practice of the church. Whereas Luther, following Augustine, still maintained a distinction between the transcendent Word of God and the biblical text, holding the preaching of the gospel to be its essential mediation, other reformers tended to identify the two more closely and saw revelation as conveyed inwardly to the individual through the text itself. As a result, in the following centuries, the word of God came to be understood in terms of a propositional view of revelation and the verbal inspiration of scripture. In the twentieth century, this understanding was challenged by dialectical theology, which is sometimes known as "the Theology of the Word of God," associated especially with Karl Barth and Rudolf Bultmann. They emphasized the contrast between God's Word as sovereign address and human response to it in faith. While Barth attempted a complex system of interrelation between the Word of God in three senses, Jesus Christ, the witness of scripture, and preaching, Bultmann's existentialist philosophy led him to stress preaching as the occasion for actualizing the divine word. Recent developments have tended in different directions, emphasizing variously the historical and eschatological or the linguistic and symbolic aspects of revelation, so that it is no longer possible to speak of a coherent concept of the word of God in Protestant thought. JOHN MUDDIMAN

Worship. In teaching that "man's chief end is to glorify God and to enjoy him forever," the Westminster Catechism of 1647 faithfully captured the developed biblical vision. As creator and redeemer, God calls for worship on the part of humankind. Human salvation consists in communion with the beneficent God. The first commandment is to worship the Lord God alone (Exod. 20.1–6 = Deut. 5.6–10; Matt. 4.10 = Luke 4.8). The content of that worship, according to the *Shema, is total devotion: "You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, soul, and might" (Deut. 6.5; Mark 12.30 par.). The idolatry of the *golden calf epitomizes the perennial human tendency to turn from the creator and worship the creature (Ps. 96.5; Rom. 1.21–25). Nevertheless, God visits and redeems his people. The prophets picture the future time of salvation as a flocking of the nations to the *Temple (Zech. 14.16–21; cf. Isa. 2.2–4), a banquet on God's holy mountain when death will have been destroyed (Isa. 25.6–9). According to the book of Revelation, salvation will be marked by worship in the heavenly city where there is no temple apart from the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb (Rev. 21.22; 19.6–10).

When the Lord called on Pharaoh to let his people go, it was so that they might "worship" or "serve" him (Exod. 3.13). The Lord who commissioned *Moses to lead Israel out of Egypt was the God who had appeared to the *ancestors as God Almighty and had been worshiped by them (Exod. 3.6, 15; 6.2–3; cf. Gen. 12.7; 13.18; 22.1–14; 28.10–22). Safely delivered through the *Red Sea, Israel worshiped the Lord on Mount *Sinai and there received the terms of the Lord's *covenant with them, including their sole obligation to Yahweh, their "jealous" God (Exod. 19–31). The deliverance was to be commemorated each year in the *Passover rite (Exod. 12–13; Lev. 23.5–8; Deut. 16.1–8), and the covenant would be renewed regularly as under Joshua at *Shechem (if Gerhard von Rad is correct in his interpretation of Josh. 24; cf. Deut. 31.10–13). In the *Promised Land, agricultural festivals would be related to the events of Israel's history, for example, the feast of weeks (Lev. 23.15–21; Deut. 16.9–12) to the whole ancestral story as far as the entry into the land flowing with milk and honey (cf. Deut. 26), and the feast of booths or tabernacles (sukkôt: Deut. 16.13–15; Neh. 8.13–18) to the dwelling in tents in the wilderness (Lev. 23.33–36, 39–43; see Feasts and Festivals). Nevertheless, the gods of the land remained a permanent temptation to Israel; the conflict between *Elijah and the prophets of Baal is emblematic (1 Kings 18.20–42). The book of *Deuteronomy records an attempt to reform, purify, and control Israel's worship by centering it in one place, presumably the Jerusalem Temple, which had been built under *Solomon as a focus of the Lord's presence amid the nation (1 Kings 5–8). *Prophets kept reminding the nation of the unacceptability of worship that was not matched by the performance of God's will in daily living (Amos 5.21–24; Hos. 6.6; Isa. 1.10–17; Jer. 7).

The Babylonian *exile, itself seen as divine punishment for infidelity, affected the worship of Israel in various ways. The nation's experience led it to recognize Yahweh as the one, universal God (Isa. 45). The older *sacrifices had been the whole burnt offering (ʿōlâ or kālîl), symbolizing total consecration, and the communion sacrifice (zebaḥ šĕlāmîm), in which the meal was shared by God and the worshipers with the intention of either thanksgiving or a vow or a freewill offering. To these were added, in the rebuilt Temple, the sin offering (ḥaṭṭāʾt) and the guilt offering (ʾāšām). The *Day of Atonement (Lev. 16) is also postexilic. The Psalter has been called "the hymnbook of the second Temple." Doubtless much of its material is older, and the *Psalms have continued in liturgical use among Jews and Christians: the praises, thanksgivings, confessions, complaints, and prayers are suited to recurrent events and situations in the life of a people and of individuals.

From its earliest days, Christianity interpreted the Psalms christologically, seeing in them messianic prophecies and prayers that could be addressed either to Christ or, with Christ, to the God he addressed as "*Abba, Father." The dispute between Jews and Christians as to whether Jesus was the Messiah is at heart a dispute about worship, since it concerns the identity of God. Christians believed that the God of Israel, the one true God, had acted decisively in Jesus, and indeed in such a personal way that Jesus was not only the mediator of salvation but did himself, as "the Word made flesh" (John 1.14), call forth worship ("My Lord and my God!" John 20.28). "Worship in spirit and in truth" (John 4.19–26) would no longer take place in the Temple in Jerusalem (itself destroyed in 70 CE), but the temple was now Christ's body (John 2.19–22), into which believers were incorporated and themselves became temples of the Holy Spirit (1 Cor. 6.19–20). The letter to the *Hebrews argues that Jesus' death fulfilled the sacrifices of the old covenant by achieving what its foreshadowings were not able to deliver (Heb. 7–10). After Jesus' self-offering (Heb. 9.14), believers now approach "the throne of grace" through him as their great high priest in the heavens (Heb. 4.14–16; cf. Eph. 2.18). In several hymnic passages of the New Testament, Jesus is included in the worship rendered to God (Phil. 2.5–11; Rev. 1.5–6; 5.13; cf. 2 Pet. 3.18).

The earliest Christians in Jerusalem continued to worship in the Temple (Luke 24.53; Acts 2.46). Fairly soon, however, Christian worship took on a clearly independent character, marked particularly by the fact that Christians assembled "in the name of Jesus" (cf. Matt. 18.20). When Christians gathered together as a church, the most characteristic thing they did was to celebrate the *Lord's Supper (1 Cor. 11.17–34), the rite that Paul and the *synoptic Gospels (Mark 14.22–25 par.) describe Jesus as instituting at the Last Supper. It is debated whether or not the Last Supper was a Passover meal, but it seems clear from the narratives that the Christian meal was intended to commemorate the "exodus" and the new "covenant" inaugurated by the death of Jesus; the word "*exodus" is used of Jesus' death at Luke 9.31, and the Gospels speak of his covenant blood poured out for the many. At their liturgical assemblies, the early Christians hailed the presence of the risen Jesus and called for his return: "*Maranatha" (1 Cor. 16.22; cf. Rev. 22.20; 1 Cor. 11.26).

The earliest deliberate description we have of Christian worship dates from the second century. Justin Martyr in his First Apology (66.1–3) describes Christians as gathering from town and country on "the first day of the week," the day of Christ's resurrection and so the beginning of a new creation. They would listen to "the writings of the prophets" and "the memoirs of the apostles." The president of the assembly interpreted these scriptures (the sermon). Prayers were said for church and world. Bread and a cup of mixed wine were brought to the president, who gave thanks to God over them for creation and redemption. The bread and the wine, signs of the body and the blood of Christ, were distributed and consumed. *Deacons took them to the absent. In light of this description, it may be possible to see already the reflections of such a "service of word and sacrament" in such passages as Luke 24.13–32, where the risen Jesus expounds the scriptures to the two travelers on the road to Emmaus and is made "known to them in the breaking of the bread," and Acts 20.7–12, where the Christians of Troas gather on the first of the week and Paul preaches all night to them before they break bread.

In fact, little is known about the "service of the word" in New Testament times. Later evidence suggests influence from the *synagogue, in the form of readings and prayers. Christians sang "hymns, psalms, and spiritual songs" (Eph. 5.18; Col. 3.16), and 1 Corinthians 14 includes some ecstatic elements among "prophecy," "revelations," "speaking in tongues," "interpretations," and "teaching."

Since for Paul the greatest spiritual gift was love (1 Cor. 13), like the prophets he implied an ethical test for true worship. He used cultic language to exhort Christians to appropriate conduct: "I appeal to you . . . to present your bodies as a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable to God, which is your spiritual worship" (Rom. 12.1; cf. 1 Cor. 6.18–20; 2 Cor. 6.6–7.1). Paul also spoke of his apostolic labors in liturgical terms (Rom. 15.15–16; Phil. 2.17; cf. 2 Tim 4.6).

Twentieth-century scholarship has rediscovered how much material in the Bible arose from and was shaped by the worship practiced by the Israelite, Jewish, and Christian communities. It is the continuing use of the Bible in worship that preserves it as a sacred and "living" book.

See also Lectionaries; Prayers; Priests and High Priest.

GEOFFREY WAINWRIGHT

Writing in Antiquity. The invention of writing in the strict sense of the word was preceded by a series of earlier developments that gradually led up to it. Soon after the invention of pottery in the neolithic period (ca. 8000 BCE) in the Near East, excavations reveal the existence of a system of clay counters and tokens that, in their earliest form, appear to have served to identify the number and kinds of goods traded, entrusted to second parties, or otherwise dealt with. By the fourth millennium BCE, such counters were being enclosed in hollow clay envelopes (bullae) which, after drying, constituted a sealed physical record of the transaction; but until and unless the envelope was broken open, this record could not be verified or retrieved. Before long it was realized that, like the seals, the counters could be impressed on the surface of the bulla before it dried, thus providing an ever-present record of the counters enclosed in it; only if their number and character needed to be verified was it necessary actually to break the bulla open. Next it must have been seen that the counters could be dispensed with altogether, and thereafter it became logical to abandon the hollow bulla format as well, in favor of a more or less flat clay tablet with an only slightly rounded writing surface. Finally, the counters themselves were abandoned and their approximate shapes reproduced instead by means of a stylus made of reed. This final development seems to have occurred first in *Sumer, where clay and reeds were both abundant; it signaled the emergence of writing in its full sense and may probably be dated about 3100 BCE.

Within a century or so, the system expanded from the depiction of concrete objects by means of pictograms to the expression of sounds or syllables by means of syllabograms, a first application of the rebus principle. An example is the name ^{d}En-lil-ti, "the god Enlil lives (or gives life)," in which the first three signs may be described as logograms (word signs) but the last is a picture of an arrow whose pronunciation in Sumerian is ti, as is (more or less) the pronunciation of the Sumerian word for "life, live" (actually til).

No further significant innovations in the inner structure of the cuneiform script were needed beyond this point, nor indeed were they forthcoming. All subsequent changes involved only phonetic adjustments to the needs of other dialects and languages, or the external forms of the signs, whose total number was stabilized at about six hundred. From their pictographic origins, they rapidly evolved into stylized linear representations. Gradually, these were replaced in turn by the wedge-shaped characters that result from the impression of a split reed (shaped like a prism) into wet clay and that justify the modern designation "cuneiform" first applied to them by Thomas Hyde in 1700 CE.

The newly invented cuneiform script remained in use in the Near East for three millennia (until ca. 100 CE), undergoing considerable changes in external appearance as it spread rapidly from its Sumerian base. In Elam (southwestern Persia) to the east and Egypt to the west, it stimulated native writing systems ("proto-Elamite" and hieroglyphics respectively) that owed no more than their basic inspiration to the original invention. Elsewhere, the borrowing was more direct. The syllabic values of the cuneiform script were taken over in their entirety for writing Akkadian by *Babylonians and *Assyrians; the Sumerian logograms were given their Akkadian equivalents; some new syllabic values were assigned to existing cuneiform signs on the basis of such equivalents, others by convention to render sounds not found in the Sumerian phonemic roster. A little later in the third millennium BCE, the Elamites also adopted the Sumerian system.

In Anatolia (central Turkey) the first attested writing, early in the second millennium BCE, consists of Old Assyrian texts and a few native inscriptions modeled on them. But the conquest of the area by the *Hittites about 1700 BCE led to the adoption of a Babylonian version of cuneiform, probably from *Mari, and its adaptation to the special requirements of their Indo-European language. A distinct script was developed by Luvian, a language (closely related to Hittite) that survived the fall of the Hittite empire about 1200 BCE, especially in northern Syria. This script is pictographic in form and essentially syllabic in structure. It is conventionally designated as Hieroglyphic Hittite, though it has nothing to do with Egyptian hieroglyphics (see below) and is not, strictly speaking, used for Hittite. Mesopotamian cuneiform also provided the vehicle for Urartian (see *Ararat), the language of eastern Anatolia from ca. 1300–600 BCE.

While the Elamite, Hittite, and Urartian adaptations retained the essential forms and functions of Mesopotamian writing, a wholly new cuneiform script was devised about 520 BCE to record Old Persian. Its individual characters were wedge-shaped, but beyond that they owed nothing to Mesopotamian cuneiform; they were nearly all syllabograms of the form consonant-plus-vowel (or simply vowel) and numbered no more than forty; only four of them were logograms. And while Persia thus continually experimented with new scripts inspired by Mesopotamian models, native factors predominated in the further development of writing in Egypt. From its origins before the end of the fourth millennium BCE, it quickly evolved into the elaborate logo-syllabic system known by its Greek designation as hieroglyphics (literally "sacred carvings"). Its syllabograms were indifferent as to vowels; they distinguished only the consonants and must therefore be transliterated without vowels (or with the vowel e conventionally inserted between the consonants). Extensive use was made of logograms and (to a greater extent than in cuneiform) of determinatives or "semantic indicators," that is, signs not pronounced in speech but alerting the reader to the meaning class of the ensuing word.

Like Mesopotamian cuneiform, Egyptian hieroglyphics survived for over three millennia, their last use dating from the Roman period. On monumental texts, the hieroglyphic signs retained their essentially pictographic character, and even elaborated on it secondarily by adding color or direction to the individual signs. But before the end of the third millennium BCE, a cursive adaptation of hieroglyphic, the hieratic script, began to evolve for use on papyrus and ostraca (potsherds). Early in the first millennium BCE, the Demotic dialect of Egyptian developed its own cursive script, while, at the end of the millennium, twenty-three hieroglyphic signs and their Demotic equivalents were adopted for the unrelated Meroitic language of Nubia, south of Egypt. The various Coptic dialects of Egyptian were written in a modified Greek alphabet.

The internal development of hieroglyphic also continued. By the side of the traditional logo-syllabic script, there developed in the second millennium a so-called syllabic orthography, particularly for foreign names, which attempted to indicate vowel quality by means of semiconsonants. It is this form of syllabic hieroglyphic writing which is generally thought to have inspired the first attempts at the written recording of Northwest Semitic speech, beginning in the Sinai peninsula, where speakers of Canaanite (or proto-Canaanite) came in contact with Egyptian culture in the middle of the second millennium BCE. At the Sinaitic site of Serabit el-Khadim, where Canaanite laborers (or slaves) worked copper and turquoise mines under Egyptian overseers, graffiti and other inscriptions in the "proto-Sinaitic" script employed clearly pictographic characters (which in some cases may have been conventionalized replicas of hieroglyphic signs) to represent the Northwest Semitic roster of phonemes. According to the acrophonic theory advocated by many scholars, the Canaanite word represented by the sign provided its name, and the first syllable of that word became the pronunciation of the sign. This principle works better for some signs than for others; it may therefore be best to regard the decipherment of proto-Sinaitic as provisional and the assignment of letter names as a later development.

Meantime Northwest Semitic also came into contact with the cuneiform tradition of writing, knowledge of which had spread through the Near East in the Late Bronze Age (ca. 1550–1200 BCE), at least among scribes trained at scribal schools on the Babylonian model that are known from El-*Amarna in Egypt to Hattusha in Anatolia and along the entire Levantine littoral in between, especially at Ugarit on the north Syrian coast. Here, some time after 1400 BCE, thirty cuneiform signs were newly devised to represent the consonantal phonemes of *Ugaritic (which represents another early form of Canaanite), its three basic vowels (when preceded by the glottal stop) and a Hurrian phoneme for words and names in that non-Semitic language. Outside Ugarit itself, scattered examples of the new script have been found as far away as Israel. The spread of the invention was helped by the mnemonic device of arranging the signs in a conventional sequence and inscribing them in this sequence on practice tablets today referred to (like their later Latin counterparts) as abecedaries (from a-b-c-d-arium); allowing for the intervening reduction in the number of signs, this sequence already equals that of the subsequent Hebrew and Greek alphabet (from the latter's first two letters, alpha, beta), the former attested in the alphabetic *acrostics-poems of the Bible (Pss. 9–10; 25; 34; 37; 111; 112; 119; 145; Prov. 31.10–31; Lam. 1–4).

Both Ugaritic and proto-Sinaitic served as prototypes and possibly as inspirations of the earliest forms of what is loosely called *Phoenician script, the ancestor of all later alphabets. This script was not, however, a true alphabet, but more properly a syllabary, which continued to ignore vocalic quality in favor of syllables of the type consonant-plus-(any or no)-vowel. It was adopted without essential modifications for the writing of such Northwest Semitic languages as *Hebrew and *Aramaic as well as Phoenician, the last probably responsible for spreading its knowledge westward as early as the beginning of the first millennium BCE to Greece and beyond, as *Greek sources state. The Greek world had evolved an earlier system of writing in the Late Bronze Age, the Linear B known from archival texts found on Crete and the Greek mainland. These texts were written on clay and thus may represent a response to a Mesopotamian, or at least a cuneiform, stimulus. (The contemporary Linear A and the Phaistos Disc have not yet been satisfactorily deciphered.) But the greater simplicity of the new script recommended itself to the Greeks as it had to the Phoenicians.

The Greeks, moreover, turned the new invention into a true alphabet by employing some of the otiose consonantal phonemes into signs for vowels; they also took advantage of the fixed order of the letters to assign them numerical values. Both of these ideas were subsequently adopted, with modifications, for the original Northwest Semitic signs, notably in Hebrew. But the vowel signs (matres lectionis, or mothers of reading), never fully succeeded in distinguishing vowel quality, so that later Hebrew, Aramaic and, eventually, Arabic developed a system of (optional) diacritics for this purpose.

Via the Greeks, the alphabet was transmitted to the Romans and to the rest of the European world. Meantime the Aramaic version of the Northwest Semitic script inspired the Indic writing of Asoka and, indirectly, Sanskrit and other scripts of Asia to the east, and North Arabic, South Arabic, and Ethiopic to the south. The alphabet was thus truly ready to conquer the world, with the notable exception of China and Japan. But in antiquity, the older scripts of Mesopotamia and Egypt continued side by side with it. The last datable cuneiform text is an astronomical tablet for 75 CE. The last Egyptian texts are rock inscriptions from the island of Elephantine (Philae), below the Aswan Dam, and are dated 394 and 425 CE for hieroglyphic and hieratic respectively.

See also Books and Bookmaking in Antiquity; Literacy in Ancient Israel. WILLIAM W. HALLO

Wycliffe Bible Translators. A nondenominational missionary agency devoted to the *translation of the Bible for those peoples who lack it in their native languages. Founded by William Cameron Townsend in 1934, Wycliffe Bible Translators (WBT) takes its name from the famous fourteenth-century British reformer John Wycliffe, who was responsible for the first complete English translation of the Bible. Wycliffe Bible Translators was incorporated in 1942 along with its sister organization, the Summer Institute of Linguistics (SIL). Although closely aligned with WBT (members of SIL must belong to WBT and vice versa), SIL presents itself as a secular linguistics institute, thus enabling it to enter countries otherwise restricted to missionary activity. This strategy, pioneered by Townsend in Mexico in the 1930s, has engendered some controversy in missiological circles in recent years. Nevertheless WBT/SIL has long been recognized as the world's largest organization for the translation of the scriptures, with more than six thousand members currently working with more that 850 different languages in fifty countries. WILLIAM H. BARNES

Y

Yahweh. See Names of God in the Hebrew Bible.

Yahwist. See J.

Yam Suf. See Red Sea.

Yom Kippur. See Day of Atonement.

Z

Zadok, Zadokites. Zadok was one of *David's two *priests (2 Sam. 15.24–29, 36; 17.15; 19.11; 20.25; 1 Chron. 15.11; 16.39; cf. 2 Sam. 8.17; 1 Chron. 18.16; 24.3, 6, 31). He sided with *Solomon against Adonijah in the succession struggle late in David's life and anointed Solomon king at David's request (1 Kings 1). As a result, he was the sole chief priest under Solomon, while Abiathar was banished to Anathoth (1 Kings 2.35; 1 Chron. 29.22). Zadok's descendants controlled the priesthood in *Jerusalem from this time on until the *exile (the chief priest in *Hezekiah's time is said to be from the house of Zadok, 2 Chron. 31.10), and in *Ezekiel's vision of the restoration, all the priests in charge of the altar are Zadokites (Ezek. 40.46; 43.19; 44.15; and especially 48.11, where Zadokites are separated from other Levites). While there is some controversy about Zadok's origins, his lineage in 1 Chronicles 6.1–8, 49–53 ties him to *Aaron through Eleazar, and there is a Zadok from the house of Aaron mentioned as part of David's army at *Hebron (1 Chron. 12.27–29; see also Josh. 21.9–13; 1 Chron. 6.54–57), so it would seem that he was an Aaronite priest.

After the exile, the Zadokites apparently controlled the high priesthood (1 Chron. 9.10–11 and Neh. 11.10–11, with a slightly different genealogy) until the time of Antiochus IV Epiphanes in the second century BCE. The *Qumran sect was dedicated to the Zadokite priesthood, as well, and it has been suggested that the name of the priestly *Sadducees is derived from Zadok.

JO ANN HACKETT

Zaphon. The Hebrew word ṣāpôn is one of the ordinary words for "north"; this is its most frequent meaning in the Bible, but it is derived from its primary sense. Zaphon was the name (meaning "lookout") of a mountain on the Mediterranean coast ca. 10 km (6 mi) north of *Ugarit, later called Mount Casius and now Jebel el-ʾAqraʿ. As a prominent peak in the northern part of the *Canaanite world, its name was used as a synonym for the direction north, just as one of the words for "west" literally means the (Mediterranean) Sea. It is primarily identified with *Baal, as widespread references to Baal-zephon (see Exod. 14.2) indicate; it was his home and as such could also be deified.

There are several passages in the Bible in which the original sense of ṣāpôn as the mountain home of the storm god is meant. Job 26.7 and Isaiah 14.13 are both in contexts permeated with references to Canaanite mythology. Psalm 89.12 may refer to Zaphon and Amanus, rather than north and south, as parallel to Tabor and *Hermon. The usual translation "Mount Zion in the far north" in Psalm 48.2 is a geographical absurdity; but the identification of Yahweh's home, *Zion, with Baal's home, Zaphon, makes sense in light of the Canaanite origins of the Jerusalem *Temple and its ideology. The verse should therefore be rendered: "Mount Zion, the heights of Zaphon, is the city of the great king." The name of the prophet *Zephaniah is probably also derived from this meaning.

Zaphon is also the name of an important town in the Jordan Valley (Josh. 13.27; Judg. 12.1).

MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Zealot. Zealot is a term that has been associated with a movement of revolutionaries active throughout the first century CE in Roman Palestine and thus during the time of Jesus' ministry. These Zealots supposedly played the major role in the social unrest which ultimately erupted in the First Jewish Revolt against Rome in 66 CE. Jesus' teaching, and in particular speeches such as the *Sermon on the Mount, have been read against the Zealots' advocacy of armed resistance against and the overthrow of the Roman occupational forces and administrators. In fact, one of Jesus' followers, Simon, was called "zealot" (Luke 6.15; Acts 1.13), but this may simply be a descriptive epithet rather than meaning a member of an organized group.

However, this older and disturbingly tidy scholarly reconstruction concerning the Zealots has recently been overturned. The Jewish revolt in 66–70 is not now viewed as the work of a longstanding group called the Zealots. A much closer reading of *Josephus reveals that such an organized group did not exist for the six decades before the revolt. The Zealots only emerge at the outset of the revolt, and then only as a coalition of popular groups seeking the overthrow of Rome, including numerous bandit groups (Grk. lastai), Sicarii or dagger people (urban terrorists), as well as groups lead by messianic figures and popular kings. The pioneering work of Richard A. Horsley, particularly in his work, Bandits, Prophets, and Messiahs: Popular Movements at the Time of Jesus (New York, 1985) has demonstrated this with great clarity. During the first century the colonial situation brought on by Roman domination and exacerbated by the ruling *Herodian dynasty escalated into a socioeconomic malaise characterized by great debt, unemployment, social division, crime, banditry, and finally revolt; the Jesus movement developed in this context, and many of Jesus' sayings are only understandable when placed in it. Josephus describes these social ills and the movements which arose in *Galilee and Judea with disdain. "Zealot" became one term to describe the brief coalition of such movements. As the coalition fragmented, some groups went to Masada in the south to await the outcome of the struggle, some killed each other, and others fought the Romans to the death. There was thus no single, monolithic group called the Zealots against whom other perspectives can be easily measured.

See Judaisms of the First Century CE.

J. ANDREW OVERMAN

Zebulun. Son of *Jacob and *Leah and one of the twelve *tribes of Israel (Gen 30.19–20). The tribe settled in the region of Galilee between *Asher and *Naphtali to the north and *Manasseh and *Issachar to the south (Map 3:X3). Zebulun figures prominently in the wars of Judges (4.6, 10; 5.14, 18; 6.35). According to the Chronicler, Zebulun continues to play a major role during *David's reign (1 Chron. 12.34). Members of this tribe seem to have survived the *Assyrian conquest (Isa. 9.1; 2 Chron. 30.6, 10–11). King Josiah's wife, Zebidah, came from Rumah in Zebulun (2 Kings 23.36).

The Jewish community of *Galilee in the Second Temple period perhaps stemmed in part from Zebulun. After the destruction of the Second Temple, the Jewish academic centers of learning located in this area were pivotal to the survival of Jewish tradition.

GARY N. KNOPPERS

Zechariah, The Book of.

Chaps. 1–8. The first eight chapters of the book contain the teaching of Zechariah in a series of eight visions of the night (1.7–6.15) together with accompanying oracles. These are sandwiched between accounts of his preaching in 1.1–6 and chaps. 7–8. Like *Haggai, Zechariah is said to have prophesied in the second year of *Darius the Persian (520 BCE), but his ministry extended to the fourth year (518 BCE). Like Haggai, therefore, he is addressing and seeking to encourage the postexilic community in Judah in all their frustrations and difficulties.

Several visions and oracles assure the people of God's imminent action on their behalf. While the first vision, that of the horsemen (1.8–13), shows that nothing can yet be seen to be happening (v. 11), the oracle brings assurance that God is deeply concerned for the welfare of *Jerusalem, which he is about to "choose" again and to which he will come to resume his dwelling. He will punish the nations that have destroyed the city and taken its citizens into *exile, the theme also of the second vision of the "horns" and "smiths" (1.18–20). The third (2.1–5) takes up Second *Isaiah's picture of the unlimited size of the restored city (Isa. 49.19–21) and assures them that God's *glory (his presence) will be in the city (cf. Ezek. 43.1–5; Hag. 2.9). God will protect them as he did when he led the Israelites in the *wilderness by a pillar of fire (Exod. 13.21). The oracle that follows (2.6–13) calls on the exiles to return, for Yahweh is about to dwell in the city to which not only Jews, but all nations, will come. The fourth vision (3.1–10) shows the cleansing of Joshua, the high priest (called Jeshua in Ezra and Nehemiah), a sign that God is now determined to forgive and cleanse the community. The fifth (4.1–14) suggests a joint leadership of *Zerubbabel as civil governor and Joshua, and contains a promise that Zerubbabel will complete the rebuilding of the *Temple, but also a warning that he must do so only in complete reliance on God's spirit (vv. 6–10a). The two visions in chap. 5 announce the cleansing of the restored community, while a final vision (6.1–8), echoing the first, pictures horsemen and chariots patrolling the earth, reporting that God's spirit is now at rest in the north country (traditionally the direction from which Israel's enemies have come in judgment from God; see Jer. 1.14). Now, however, this is the peace, not of inaction, as in the first vision, but of the resolution of the people's problems by God's saving actions. The passage 6.9–15, along with 3.6–10, seems to describe a situation in which the priestly line has assumed preeminence, while messianic hope now attaches to an unnamed and future figure called the Branch (see Isa. 11.1)

The surrounding oracles contain warnings against repeating the sins of preexilic generations who ignored the teaching of the prophets (1.1–6; 7.7–14; 8.14–17). They reinforce the promises of the visions of an imminent new age by assuring questioners (7.1–3) that all mourning fasts for the fall of Jerusalem are about to be replaced by joyful festivals of celebration (8.18–19).

The fact that 1.1–6 and chaps. 7–8 contain echoes of some of the "sermons" in the books of *Chronicles (e.g., 2 Chron. 30.6–9) may suggest that the teaching of Zechariah was handed down by preaching and teaching personnel of the postexilic Temple. This is strengthened by the presence of teaching on such subjects as true fasting (7.4–6), found elsewhere in postexilic literature (e.g., Isa. 58). Again, oracles of Zechariah are taken up and expounded afresh in 8.1–8 (cf. 1.14, 16), while 8.9–13 appears to be exposition of Haggai 2.15–19. The universalist tone in Zechariah's teaching (2.11) is strongly and splendidly renewed in 8.20–23.

Zechariah, like Haggai, was thus remembered as a prophet who encouraged the immediate postexilic community by assuring them of God's imminent action in terms that echoed the preaching of *Ezekiel and Second Isaiah and took up themes of the preexilic *Zion/David theology expressed in many psalms. His picture of a joint messiahship of civil and religious leaders was to reappear in the teaching of the *Qumran community. The form of the teaching in a series of visions is reminiscent of one test of a true *prophet in some of the earlier literature, namely, that he had been admitted to the council of heaven (Jer. 23.18). The stronger sense here, however, that what is happening on earth is a projection of what is happening in heaven, has suggested to some that in Zechariah 1–8 we have an early hint of *apocalyptic.

Chaps. 9–14. In Zechariah 9–14 no mention is made of the building of the Temple that now is standing, nor of the time of Darius I, while there is a reference to "Yawan" (literally, Ionia; NRSV: "Greece") in 9.13. There is nothing corresponding to the visions of chaps. 1–8 or to the ethical teaching of 1.1–6 and chaps. 7–8. For these reasons most scholars assign these chapters to a later time and another hand or hands. Broad thematic features are, however, common to both parts of the book, such as a strongly Zion-centered interest, God's cleansing of the community in preparation for his final act of salvation, a marked universalism, dependance on earlier prophecy, and a concern for a true and proper leadership as one sign of the new age. These suggest that the later parts of the book came from circles that maintained the traditions of Zechariah's teaching.

Many attempts have been made to date these chapters by the supposed historical allusions found in them, but these attempts have yielded such widely differing results that we must question their validity. It is more likely that we have here exposition of earlier prophetic themes in general terms in which particular countries, personalities, and events are now seen as typical or symbolic of the clash of the forces of evil with God's universal kingship. By such means earlier prophecies are related to the writer's own time and their relevance for people of later generations demonstrated.

The material is broadly of two kinds: eschatological passages that look forward to the triumph of God over evil and controversy passages in which strong attacks are made on those who are seen as false leaders of the community, in the manner of some earlier prophetic books.

Chap. 9 speaks of the advance of an enemy, echoing oracles of *Amos and Ezekiel (vv. 1–7). God, however, defends Jerusalem, to which her king comes in triumph bringing peace among all nations (vv. 9–10), words later quoted in the New Testament and used of the triumphal entry of Jesus into Jerusalem (Matt. 21.1–9 par.) Vv. 11–17 speak of God's ultimate victory, taking up earlier prophetic themes and the imagery of the enthronement psalms, a note continued in 10.3b–12.

Chaps. 12–14 introduce new themes. In 12.1–13.6 the nations have gathered to attack Jerusalem. Yahweh, however, intervenes to defeat them and delivers both Judah and Jerusalem, this resulting in an act of divine cleansing and renewal of the whole community. Chap. 14 paints an even more cosmic picture, with God himself gathering the nations who come to lay siege to Jerusalem. Only after half the population has been exiled does God come to the aid of his stricken city (vv. 2–3). He appears on the Mount of *Olives; the mountain is connected to the city by a great earthquake so that Yahweh once more enters Jerusalem (vv. 4–5). Thereafter all nature is renewed, and God is acclaimed as universal king (v. 9). Jerusalem becomes the highest point in the land (vv. 10–11; cf. Isa. 2.2); all who oppose God's rule are defeated (vv. 12–15) and all nations come to worship him in Jerusalem (vv. 16–21). Because the *eschatology of chaps. 12–14 tends more toward that of apocalyptic and because the heading "Oracle" is found, not only at 9.1 but again at 12.1, some scholars hold that these chapters are later than chaps. 9–11. Since, however, the same degree of dependence on earlier prophecy is found in each section and controversy passages occur in both, they may be more closely connected than some have thought.

The controversy passages (10.1–3a; 11.13; 11.4–17; 13.7–9) express increasingly severe condemnation of false shepherds, presumably the priestly leaders of the community at some point, or points, in the postexilic period.

So much is obscure in these chapters that interpretation of them can be only tentative. The view that they came from a sharply eschatological party that found itself increasingly at odds with the official priesthood and Temple, and so looked for a more and more radical intervention of God, would account for much that is here. If that were so, it would mean that some of the factors that later gave rise to the Qumran community were already being felt by those from whom chaps. 9–14 came, perhaps in the third century BCE. REX MASON

Zedekiah. Last king of *Judah (597–587/586 BCE). A younger son of *Josiah, he was placed on the throne by *Nebuchadrezzar of *Babylon to replace his uncle, Jehoiachin, whom Nebuchadrezzar had deposed. Nine years later, Zedekiah rebelled against Nebuchadrezzar, prompting him to besiege and destroy *Jerusalem (2 Kings 24.18–25.7; 2 Chron. 36.11–14).

In the book of *Jeremiah, Zedekiah's reign is described in fatalistic tones: destruction by Babylon is inevitable (Jer. 21.1–7; 24.1–10; 32.1–5; 34.1–3; 37.6–10); submission to Nebuchadnezzar is Zedekiah's only option (27.12–15); he and the people refuse to heed Jeremiah's warnings and should expect punishment (37.2); the insincerity of repentance is exposed (34.8–22). On one occasion, Zedekiah reveals his belief in the truth of Jeremiah's warnings, yet he fears certain Judahites more than God's wrath (38.14–28). In the end, he attempts to escape under cover of darkness, but is captured by the Babylonians and led away in shame (Jer. 39.1–7; see Ezek. 12.1–16). TIMOTHY M. WILLIS

Zephaniah, The Book of. The ninth book of the Minor Prophets proclaims the coming *day of the Lord, with its judgment on Israel and the nations, to be the best hope for salvation.

The prophet's name means "Yah(weh) protects"; in an earlier form it may have been a confession, "Zaphon is Yahweh," *Zaphon being the deified Canaanite mountain who is thus identified with Israel's Yahweh. The superscription goes to unusual lengths in giving the prophet's ancestry, which is traced back to *Hezekiah, the great Judean king.

The prophecy is dated to the reign of King *Josiah (640–609 BCE), who was responsible for major reforms in Judah's worship (2 Kings 22–23; 2 Chron. 34–35). Josiah was the "son of Ammon," who was murdered by revolutionaries (2 Kings 21.23). But a group called "the people of the land" rose up to quell the revolution and put his son Josiah on the throne. This group supported Josiah in his reforms and *Jeremiah in his preaching. Zephaniah seems to be very close to their goals and aims.

Zephaniah fought against foreign influences and against the worship of other gods. His message is close to that of the great eighth-century prophets, especially *Isaiah. He taught that pride was the major sin of humankind, and that it leads to rebellion against divine authority. He understood God's judgment to be universal. Hope for him lay beyond the great *day of judgment. The book serves as a bridge between the eighth-century prophets of judgment such as *Hosea and *Amos, and the prophets after the exile, such as *Haggai and *Zechariah, who proclaimed a coming salvation of God.

The book is composed as a dramatic dialogue between Yahweh and someone else, possibly the prophet. Each of the seven parts of the book includes a speech by Yahweh and one by the prophet, except the last, which has only Yahweh's speech.

1. Yahweh's speech (1.2–6) announces a total judgment over all creation. People have stopped serving the Lord and worship other gods. The prophet calls for silence (1.7) and puts a name on the judgment: "the day of the Lord."

2. Yahweh's anger still is hot (1.8–13) as he condemns everyone in Israel, from the rulers to the skeptics. Then the prophet develops his picture of the day of the Lord (1.14–16), verses that serve as the starting point for the medieval hymn Dies irae.

3. Yahweh's third speech is more calm (1.17) but still insists that sin will make the people become "dust" and "dung." The prophet's speech is longer (1.18–2.7). He introduces two new themes: that there is a possible way to escape the judgment, and that other nations are to be condemned. The "humble of the land" (2.3) may escape the devastation.

4. Yahweh fills out the prophet's message (2.8–10) by announcing judgment on *Ammon and *Moab for their pride and promising that the surviving remnant of Israel will plunder their enemies. The prophet continues by noting that the nations are judged because of their *idols (2.11). This pair of speeches is a kind of pause in the action.

5. Yahweh speaks out to include Ethiopia in the judgment (2.12). His dialogue partner compares Israel with *Assyria (2.13–3.5), which will be completely devastated; Israel is also wicked and will be destroyed.

6. Yahweh's speech begins to resolve the problem (3.6–13). After judgment and destruction comes God's mercy. All the nations are offered the opportunity to "call on the name of the Lord and serve him with one accord" (3.9). Then the Lord will purify their speech; he will remove Israel's shame and forgive her sin (3.13). The prophet calls on Israel to rejoice in God's presence (3.14–17).

7. Yahweh's final speech (3.18–20) summarizes the salvation that he promises Israel, dealing with her oppressors, saving those who are lame, and restoring those in the dispersion.

The book has developed a plot that seems to promise only doom for all creation, including Israel. Such a fate is thoroughly deserved. Then a slight hope is raised for some to survive when specifically identified peoples are marked for the judgment; some hope for the "humble of the land" is disclosed. Finally the Lord's mercy offers a way of escape for the nations and for Israel.

Zephaniah makes a strong contribution to the understanding of the day of the Lord. In the Minor Prophets, this day is understood as a decisive turning point in which the Lord's judgment falls upon Israel and the nations for their idolatry and pride. The events that lead up to *Jerusalem's final destruction in 587/586 BCE are clearly in mind. Zephaniah shows that this terrible moment can bring the opportunity for a new beginning, for both Israel and the nations. The true opportunity is for those who are "humble and lowly" (3.12). The book opens the door to the messages that the following three books of the collection will bring. In Haggai and Zechariah, God leads in rebuilding the *Temple a full century after Zephaniah's time, and the final chapters of Zechariah as well as *Malachi look to the opportunities and responsibilities of the people of God in the postexilic age.

JOHN D. W. WATTS

Zerubbabel. The name, meaning "offspring of Babylon," of a descendant of *David who returned from the Babylonian *exile (Ezra 2.2) to become governor of the Persian province of Yehud (Judah) under *Darius I (522–486 BCE). He was a grandson of Jehoiachin (Jeconiah), the exiled king of Judah (1 Chron. 3.17–19). Zerubbabel and Joshua the high priest were responsible for the completion of the rebuilding of the *Temple. Hopes for the restoration of the nation were probably attached to him because of his ancestry. Haggai 2.23 calls him the "servant of Yahweh" and the one he has "chosen." The prophet Zechariah (3.8; 6.12) mentions a "branch," which also may refer to Zerubbabel. Although the Temple was only begun in 520 BCE and was finished in 515 BCE, there is no mention of Zerubbabel at its dedication (Ezra 6.16–18). It may be that he was removed from power by the Persian authorities because of the threat of rebellion in Yehud. Zerubbabel appears in the *genealogies of Jesus in Matthew 1 and Luke 3.

RUSSELL FULLER

Ziggurat. The Akkadian word ziqqurratu (cf. zaqru, "high") refers to the sacred stepped tower built of sun-baked bricks that was part of the temple complex in many Mesopotamian cities. At the top of the tower was a chapel or shrine, which was depicted with blue facing and surmounted by large horns. The earliest ziggurats were constructed during the reign of Ur-Nammu (ca. 2100 BCE). Their design transformed the older architectural tradition of temples set on platforms, and may have been influenced by the Egyptian pyramids. The most famous ziggurat of antiquity was Etemenanki ("house that is the foundation of heaven and earth") of the temple complex of Marduk at *Babylon. This seven-staged ziggurat was probably built during the First Dynasty of Babylon (ca. 1900–1600 BCE), or possibly during the reign of Nebuchadrezzar I (ca. 1100 BCE; see Enuma Elish VI.63). It is likely that the fabled *tower of Babel of Genesis 11 is a reminiscence of this ziggurat, retrojected to the dawn of human history.

RONALD S. HENDEL

Zion. A name of *Jerusalem (Map 9). The etymology of the Hebrew term is unknown. Perhaps the earliest reference to Zion is the account in 2 Samuel 5 of *David's conquest of Jerusalem, then under the control of the *Jebusites; v. 7 speaks of "the stronghold of Zion." This and other texts, as well as recent archaeological research, suggest that Zion was limited originally to the Jebusite fortress located on the crest of a hill at the southeast corner of Jerusalem, also called the Ophel (2 Chron. 27.3; etc.). After his victory, David renamed the stronghold "the city of David" (2 Sam. 5.9). With its physical features and the presence of the fresh-water spring of Gihon nearby, the site was of strategic importance. The city of Jerusalem soon expanded north along the eastern ridge to include what became the Temple mount, but even then the name Zion could be restricted to the city of David to the south. According to 1 Kings 8.1, at the dedication of the *Temple *Solomon had the *ark of the covenant brought up to the Temple from "the city of David, which is Zion."

Later, poetry recalled that it was David who had found the ark and brought it to Zion, the place Yahweh desired for "his habitation" (Ps. 132.13). Already in early texts from the book of Psalms, however, Zion refers not to David's city but preeminently to Yahweh's dwelling place, Yahweh's "holy hill" (Ps. 2.6). This extension of the term is probably connected with the transfer of the ark from the city of David to the Temple newly constructed by Solomon. The ark represented the footstool of Yahweh's royal throne, and the Temple enshrining it symbolized the presence of Yahweh as king. In this way the term Zion lost its originally precise geographic designation and came to refer to the Temple area and even to the entire city of Jerusalem (Ps. 76.1–2). In later times the name Zion was erroneously restricted to the western hill, still called Mount Zion, but this was uninhabited until the eighth century BCE (see Jerusalem). But what it lost in geographic precision Zion more than regained in the rich symbolism associated with it.

That symbolism centered on Zion as the dwelling place of Yahweh as king. Since it was viewed as the site of Yahweh's throne, Zion was portrayed as a lofty peak extending into heaven, the point at which heaven and earth meet. Thus, Psalm 48.1–2 depicts Zion as Yahweh's holy mountain "on the heights of Zaphon" (NRSV: "in the far north"). *Zaphon was the mountain home of the Canaanite god *Baal, and imagery from Canaanite religion is applied to Zion in Psalm 48 and elsewhere. True to its original designation of "stronghold," but especially because Yahweh reigned there as king, Zion was also a symbol of security. Yahweh was Zion's defender against the threats of kings and nations (e.g., Pss. 46; 48; 76). For that reason Zion was also portrayed as the place of refuge, especially for the *poor (Isa 14.32; cf. Ps. 9).

All of this seems to have given rise to a notion of Zion's inviolability, as reflected in Micah 3.9–12 and Jeremiah 7.1–15. According to these prophets, the people of Jerusalem believed the city's security against *Assyrian and *Babylonian threats to be guaranteed. The book of *Isaiah accepts the notion of Zion's inviolability (8.9–10, 16; 17.12–14) but distinguishes between the security promised to Zion and the destruction with which Yahweh threatens Jerusalem (1.21–26; 29.1–8). Zion will endure even beyond Jerusalem's destruction.

After Jerusalem and the Temple were destroyed in 587/586 BCE, hope for the future was often expressed in terms of the restoration of Zion (Isa. 51.1–6); because of this hope, the modern Zionist movement took the ancient designation as its own. In some texts from the exilic and postexilic periods, Zion/Jerusalem is addressed in royal language common to the Near East (Isa. 45.14–17; 49.22–23; 60.4–7); in others, Zion is portrayed as a mother (Isa. 66.7–11). Occasionally, Zion is identified with the community itself: "saying to Zion, 'You are my people' " (Isa. 51.16). 2 Esdras speaks of Zion in referring to the heavenly Jerusalem that would ultimately replace the earthly one (13.36; cf. Rev. 21.1–17). In Hebrews 12.22, Zion refers to the "new covenant" of Jesus. In all of these diverse ways, Zion is the "city of God" (Ps. 87.3).

BEN C. OLLENBURGER

Bibliography

To assist readers, the editors have prepared this bibliography of some important and useful books about the Bible available in English.

Critical Introductions. These provide summaries of modern scholarly research on the formation of the Bible from the smallest literary units to the final canonical arrangement, as well as a bibliographic starting point.

Childs, Brevard S. Introduction to the Old Testament as Scripture. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979.

Childs, Brevard S. The New Testament as Canon: An Introduction. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985.

Collins, Raymond F. Introduction to the New Testament. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1983.

Hayes, John H. An Introduction to Old Testament Study. Nashville, Tenn.: Abingdon, 1979.

Koester, Helmut. Introduction to the New Testament, vol. 2: History and Literature of Early Christianity. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1982.

Kaümmel, Werner G. Introduction to the New Testament, Rev. ed. Nashville, Tenn.: Abingdon, 1975.

Popular Introductions. These are frequently used as text in undergraduate courses, and provide readable surveys of the development of the Bible and of the history of the biblical world.

Alter, Robert, and Frank Kermode. The Literary Guide to the Bible. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap, 1987.

Anderson, Bernard W. Understanding the Old Testament. 4th ed. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1985.

Barr, David L. New Testament Story: An Introduction. Belmont, Calif.: Wadsworth, 1987.

Court, John M. and Kathleen M. Court. The New Testament World. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1990.

Crenshaw, James L. Old Testament Story and Faith: A Literary and Theological Introduction. Peabody, Mass.: Hendrickson, 1992 (repr. of 1986 ed.).

Freed, Edwin D. The New Testament: A Critical Introduction. 2d ed. Belmont, Calif.: Wadsworth, 1991.

Gottwald, Norman K. The Hebrew Bible: A Socio-Literary Introduction. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985.

Harrington, Daniel J. Interpreting the New Testament: A Practical Guide. Wilmington, Dela.: Michael Glazier, 1979.

Harris, Stephen L. The New Testament: A Student's Introduction. Mountain View, Calif.: Mayfield, 1988.

Johnson, Luke T. The Writing of the New Testament: An Interpretation. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986.

Kee, Howard C. Understanding the New Testament. 5th ed. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1993.

Metzger, Bruce M. The New Testament: Its Background, Growth, and Content. 2nd. ed. enlarged. Nashville, Tenn.: Abingdon, 1983.

Perrin, Norman, and Dennis C. Duling. The New Testament: An Introduction. 2d ed. New York: Hartcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1982.

Rendtorff, Rolf. The Old Testament: An Introduction. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986.

Rogerson, John W., and Philip Davies. The Old Testament World. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1989.

Sandmel, Samuel. The Hebrew Scriptures: An Introduction to their Literature and Religious Ideas. New York: Oxford University, 1978.

History

Bickerman, Elias J. The Jews in the Greek Age. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University, 1988.

Bright, John. A History of Israel. 3d ed. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1971.

Cohen, Shaye J. D. From the Maccabees to the Mishnah. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1987.

Edwards, I. E. S., ed. The Cambridge Ancient History. 3d ed. Cambridge University, 1970–.

Herrmann, Siegfried. A History of Israel in Old Testament Times 2 ed. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1981.

Jagersma, Henk. A History of Israel in the Old Testament Period. Philadelphia: Trinity, 1983.

———. A History of Israel from Alexander the Great to Bar Kochba. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986.

Koester, Helmut. Introduction to the New Testament, vol. 1: History, Culture, and Religion of the Hellenistic Age. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1982.

Miller, J. Maxwell, and John H. Hayes. A History of Ancient Israel and Judah. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1986.

Safrai, Shmuel, and Menahem Stern, eds. The Jewish People in the First Century: Historical, Geography, Political History, Social, Cultural and Religious Life and Institutions. 2 vols. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974, 1976.

Schürer, Emil. The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ. 4 vols. Rev. and ed. by Geza Vermes and Fergus Millar. Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark, 1973–87.

Shanks, Hershel, ed. Ancient Israel: A Short History from Abraham to the Roman Destruction of the Temple. Washington, D.C.: Biblical Archaeology Society, 1988.

———, ed. Christianity and Rabbinic Judaism: A Parallel History of Their Origins and Early Development. Washington, D.C.: Biblical Archaeology Society, 1992.

Soggin, J. Alberto. A History of Ancient Israel from the Beginnings to the Bar Kochba Revolt, A.D. 135. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1985.

de Vaux, Roland. The Early History of Israel. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1978.

Nonbiblical Texts. These standard anthologies and surveys provide introductions to the literatures of the ancient Near Eastern and Greco-Roman neighbors of ancient Israel and earliest Christianity, as well as to early Jewish and early Christian writings not included in the canon.

Barrett, C. K., ed. The New Testament Background: Selected Documents. Rev. ed. San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1989.

Cameron, Ron, ed. The Other Gospels: Non-Canonical Gospel Texts. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1982.

Charlesworth, James H., ed. The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha. 2 vols. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1983, 1985.

Coogan, Michael D. Stories from Ancient Canaan. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1978.
Miller, Robert J., ed. The Complete Gospels: Annotated Scholars Version, Sonoma, Calif.: Polebridge, 1992.
Nickelsburg, George W. E. Jewish Literature between the Bible and the Mishnah: A Historical and Literary Introduction. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1981.
Pritchard, James B., ed. Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament [ANET]; The Ancient Near East in Pictures Relating to the Old Testament [ANEP]. Princeton: Princeton University, rev. ed., 1969. (There is an abridged version of both: The Ancient Near East: An Anthology of Texts and Pictures [ANETP], 2 vols., 1958, 1975.)
Robinson, James M., ed. The Nag Hammadi Library. Rev. ed. San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1988
Schneemelcher, Wilhelm, ed. New Testament Apocrypha. Ed. Robert McL. Wilson. 2 vols. Nashville: Westminster/John Knox, 1991 (1965).
Sparks, H. F. D., ed. The Apocryphal Old Testament. Oxford: Clarendon, 1984.
Stone, Michael E., ed. Jewish Writings of the Second Temple Period: Apocrypha, Pseudepigrapha, Qumran, Sectarian Writings, Philo, Josephus. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984.
Vermes, Geza. The Dead Sea Scrolls in English. 3d ed. Sheffield, Eng.: JSOT Press, 1987.

Archaeology

Aharoni, Yohanan. The Archaeology of the Land of Israel. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1982.
Ben-Tor, Amnon, ed. The Archaeology of Ancient Israel. New Haven: Yale University, 1991.
Kenyon, Kathleen M. The Bible and Recent Archaeology. Rev. ed. by P. R. S. Moorey. Atlanta: John Knox, 1987.
Mazar, Amihai. Archaeology of the Land of the Bible: 10,000–586 B.C.E. New York: Doubleday, 1990.
Stern, Ephraim, ed. The New Encyclopedia of Archaeological Excavations in the Holy Land. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1993.
Stillwell, Richard et al., eds. The Princeton Encyclopedia of Classical Sites. Princeton: Princeton University, 1976.
Wilkinson, John. The Jerusalem Jesus Knew: An Archaeological Guide to the Gospels. New York: Thomas Nelson, 1983.

Geography

Aharoni, Yohanan. The Land of the Bible: A Historical Geography. Rev. ed. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1979.
Aharoni, Yohanan, and Michael Avi-Yonah. The Macmillan Bible Atlas. 3d ed. New York: Macmillan, 1992.
Baly, Denis. The Geography of the Bible. Rev. ed. New York: Harper and Row, 1974.
May, Herbert G. Oxford Bible Atlas. 3rd ed. rev. by John Day, New York: Oxford University, 1984.
Orni, Ephraim, and E. Ephrat. Geography of Israel. 4th ed. Jerusalem: Israel Universities, 1980.
Pritchard, James B. The Harper Atlas of the Bible. New York: Harper and Row, 1987.

Religion and Society. All of the following are major contributions to the study of Israelite, early Jewish, and early Christian religion, literature, and culture. While the discussion is frequently technical, they will repay serious reading.

Cross, Frank Moore. Canaanite Myth and Hebrew Epic: Essays in the History of the Religion of Israel. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University, 1973.
Kaufmann, Yehezkel. The Religion of Israel from Its Beginnings to the Babylonian Exile. Chicago: University of Chicago, 1960.
Kraemer, Ross Shepard. Her Share of the Blessings: Women's Religions among Pagans, Jews, and Christians in the Greco-Roman World. New York: Oxford University, 1992.
Kraus, Hans-Joachim. Worship in Israel: A Cultic History of the Old Testament. Richmond, Va.: John Knox, 1966.
Noth, Martin. A History of Pentateuchal Traditions. Trans. Bernhard W. Anderson. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1972.
Sandmel, Samuel. Judaism and Christian Beginnings. New York: Oxford University, 1978.
Segal, Alan F. Rebecca's Children: Judaism and Christianity in the Roman World. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University, 1986.
Schiffman, Lawrence H. From Text to Tradition: A History of Second Temple and Rabbinic Judaism. Hoboken, N.J.: Ktav, 1991.
Stambaugh, John E., and David L. Balch. The New Testament in Its Social Environment. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1986.
de Vaux, Roland. Ancient Israel: Its Life and Institutions. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1965.
Weber, Max. Ancient Judaism. New York: Free Press, 1952.

Biblical Theology

Botterweck, G. Johannes, and Helmer Ringgren, eds. Theological Dictionary of the New Testament. Grand Rapids, Mich.: Eerdmans, 1977–.
Bultmann, Rudolf. Theology of the New Testament. New York: Scribner's, 1955.
Conzelmann, Hans. An Outline of the Theology of the New Testament. New York: Harper and Row, 1969.
Eichrodt, Walther. Theology of the Old Testament. 2 vols. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1961–1967.
Fredricksen, Paula. From Jesus to Christ: The Origins of New Testament Images of Jesus. New Haven: Yale University, 1988.
Fuller, Reginald H. The Foundations of New Testament Christology. New York: Scribner's, 1965.
Hanson, Paul D. The People Called: The Growth of Community in the Bible. San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1986.
Kittel, Gerhard, and Gerhard Friedrich, eds. Theological Dictionary of the New Testament. Grand Rapids, Mich.: Eerdmans, 1985.
Levenson, Jon D. The Hebrew Bible, the Old Testament, and Historical Criticism. Louisville, Ky.: Westminster/John Knox, 1993.
von Rad, Gerhard. Old Testament Theology. 2 vols. New York: Harper and Row, 1962–1965.
Wright, G. Ernest. God Who Acts: Biblical Theology as Recital. Chicago, Ill.: Regnery, 1952.

Methodology. A series of useful "Guides to Biblical Scholarship" is published by Fortress Press (Minneapolis). More detailed surveys are found in three volumes on "The Bible and Its Modern Interpreters," published by the Society of Biblical Literature and Scholars Press (Atlanta); they are:

Knight, Douglas A., and Gene M. Tucker, eds. The Hebrew Bible and Its Modern Interpreters. 1985.
Kraft, Robert A., and George W. E. Nickelsburg, eds. Early Judaism and Its Modern Interpreters. 1986.
Epp, Eldon Jay, and George W. MacRae, eds. The New Testament and Its Modern Interpreters. 1989.

Textual Criticism

Aland, Kurt, and Barbara Aland. The Text of the New Testament: An Introduction to the Critical Editions and to the Theory and Practice of Modern Textual Criticism. 2d ed. Grand Rapids, Mich.: Eerdmans, 1989.
Metzger, Bruce M. The Text of the New Testament: Its Transmission, Corruption, and Restoration. 3d ed. New York: Oxford University, 1992.
Tov, Emanuel. Textual Criticism of the Hebrew Bible. Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992.

History of Interpretation. In addition to articles in ABD and IDB and IDPSup (see next heading), good starting points are:

Baird, William. History of New Testament Research, vol. 1: From Deism to Tübingen. Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992.

Coggins, R. J., and J. L. Houlden. A Dictionary of Biblical Interpretation. Philadelphia: Trinity, 1990.

Greenslade, S. L., et al. The Cambridge History of the Bible. 3 vols. Cambridge University, 1963–1970.

Kümmel, Werner Georg. The New Testament: The History of the Investigation of Its Problems. Nashville: Abingdon, 1972.

Kugel, James L., and Rowan A. Greer. Early Biblical Interpretation. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1986.

Morgan, Robert, and John Barton. Biblical Interpretation. New York: Oxford University, 1988.

Neill, Stephen, and N. T. Wright. The Interpretation of the New Testament, 1861–1986. 2d ed. New York: Oxford University, 1988.

Orlinsky, Harry M., and Robert G. Bratcher. A History of Bible Translation and the North American Contribution. Atlanta: Scholars, 1991.

Reference

Encyclopedic Dictionaries. Of the many Bible dictionaries available, these are some of the better and most recent. All provide extensive bibliography for further reading.

Achtemeier, Paul J., ed. Harper's Bible Dictionary. San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1985.

Buttrick, George A., ed. The Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible [IDB], 4 vols., with Supplementary Volume [IDBSup] (ed. K. Crim). Nashville: Abingdon, 1963, 1976.

Freedman, David Noel et al., The Anchor Bible Dictionary [ABD]. New York: Doubleday, 1992.

Mills, Watson E., ed. Mercer Dictionary of the Bible. Macon, Ga.: Mercer University, 1990.

Myers, Allen C., ed. Eerdmans Bible Dictionary. Grand Rapids, Mich.: William B. Eerdman, 1987.

Concise Commentaries.

Anderson, Bernhard W., ed. The Book of the Bible. 2 vols. New York: Scribner's, 1989.

Brown, Raymond E., et al., eds. The New Jerome Biblical Commentary. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 1990.

Laymon, Charles M., ed. The Interpreter's One Volume Commentary on the Bible. Nashville: Abingdon, 1971.

Mays, James L., ed. Harper's Bible Commentary. San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1988.

Newsom, Carol A., and Sharon H. Ringe, eds. The Women's Bible Commentary. Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1992.

Other Useful Reference Works. These more general encyclopedias have a large number of articles on the Bible and related topics.

Eliade, Mircea et al. eds. The Encyclopedia of Religion. New York: Macmillan, 1987.

Roth Cecil, ed. Encyclopaedia Judaica. New York: Macmillan, 1972.

Bibliographies

Fitzmyer, Joseph A. An Introductory Bibliography for the Study of Scripture. 3d ed. Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1990.

Harrington, Daniel J. The New Testament: A Bibliography. Wilmington, Dela.: Michael Glazier, 1985.

Stuart, Douglas. Old Testament Exegesis: A Primer for Students and Pastors. 2d ed. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1984.

Zannoni, Arthur E. The Old Testament: A Bibliography. Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical, 1992.

Index

N.B.: Page numbers in boldface indicate a major discussion.

Aaron, 3
  Azazel and, 69
  as brother of Moses, 3
  as chosen by God, 110
  golden calf and, 3, 257
  high priesthood and, 3
  as Levite, 3
  Moses and, 529
  in P (Priestly Source), 3, 567 plagues of Egypt and, 595
  rod of, and ark, 55
Aaronite priesthood 3, 110, 610
Abaddon, 3. See also Abyss; Sheol; Hell
Abba, 3–4
  Barabbas and, 74 as child's word, 4 in letters of Paul, 3
  Lord's Prayer and, 3, 464
Abel. See Cain and Abel Abimelech, 5, 51
  in book of Judges, 398
  kingship and, 253
Abolitionists, 702
Abomination that makes desolate, 193
Abortion, 4
Abraham, 3–4
  Aqedah and, 43
  archaeology and, 50
  ascension and, 61
  as chosen by God, 109
  covenant and, 84, 138–139
  depiction of, in art, 57
  and Deuteronomic history, 5 and Elohist traditions, 5 as father of all nations, 5 in Galatians, 239
  in Genesis, 247–248
  and gentiles, 249
  the Hebrew, 273–274 migration of, 600 as model of faith, 5, 222
  in Muslim tradition, 5, 638 and Priestly traditions, 5 promise to, 5, 619 in pseudepigrapha, 5 in Romans, 661 testing of, 734
  tithes and, 745
  and unity of humankind, 10
  at Ur and Haran, 50
Abraham and Sarah
  exodus and, 211
  irony and, 324
Abraham cycle, 26
Abrahamsen, Valerie, as contributor, 499–500, 814–818
Abram. See Abraham Abrogation
  Islam and, 307
Absalom, 6, 11 rebellion of, against David, 331 Absurdity
  Ecclesiastes and, 177
Abyss, 6. See also Abaddon; Hell; Sheol Abaddon and, 3
  associated with chaos and death, 6
Accuser, 208. See also Satan
Achtemeier, Elizabeth, as contributor, 265–266, 515–517, 806–807
Achtemeier, Paul J., as contributor, 659–662
Ackerman, Susan, as contributor, 62, 64, 539–541, 636, 647, 747 Ackroyd, Peter R., as contributor, 113–116, 674–677
Acropolis, 65
Acrostic, 6. See also Poetry
  Lamentations and, 419–420
  Sirach and, 697
  in wisdom psalms, 628
Actium, battle of, 181
Acts of Andrew, 40
Acts of Andrew and Matthias among the Cannibals, 41
Acts of Andrew and Paul, 41
Acts of Barnabas, 41
Acts of James the Great, 41
Acts of John, 40
Acts of John by Prochorus, 41
Acts of Paul, 40
Acts of Peter, 40
Acts of Peter and the Twelve Apostles, 544
Acts of Philip, 41
Acts of Pilate, 40, 41
Acts of the Apostles, 6–10 apologetic emphasis of, 9 author's acquaintance with Paul, 7 authorship and sources of, 6, 7 canonical significance of, 9–10 date of, 8
  Galatians and, 239
  historical significance of, 8–9
  "Paulinism" of, 7 recipients of, 8
  as sequel to Luke, 6 as source for life of Paul, 576–577 speeches and letters in, 7–8 Stephen's speech in, 7 theological significance of, 9 Acts of the Apostles Peter and Andrew, 41 Acts of Thomas, 40
Acts of Thaddaeus, 41
Acts, Apocryphal, 40–41
Adam, 10
  creation and, 141
  2 Esdras and, 196
  Gilgamesh and, 254
  Golgotha and, 258
  as "last Adam," 10 meaning of, 10
  new, 141
  as proper name for first man, 10 as type of Christ in New Testament, 10 Adam and Eve
  depiction of, in art, 57
  Fall and, 223
  Garden of Eden and, 178
Additions to the Book of Esther, 10
  as apocryphal book, 38 portrayal of women in, 813
Adonai
  as name of God, 548
Adulterous Bible, 143
Adultery, 10 in ancient Israel, 10
  divorce and, 170
  marriage and, 496
Adversary, 208. See also Satan Aelfric, 756
Aelia Capitolina, 354
Aeneid and Apocalypse of Peter, 41
Africa, 11–12
African American traditions and the Bible, 12–13 creativity and adaptability of, 12 critique and accommodation, 13–14 critique from the margins, 14–15 leaving race behind, 14–15 in the New World, 12–13 and Pentecostal movement, 14 and reading the Bible, 12 and spiritual churches, 14 African Americans use of the Bible and, 605–606 Afterlife and immortality, 15–17, 277–278. See also Heaven; Hell
  in ancient Israel, 15–16
  in early Christianity, 15–16 and Platonism, 16
  rabbinic view of, 17 in Second Temple Judaism, 16–17
'aggādâ, 310
  midrashim and, 305

Agrapha, 17–18
evaluation of, 18
origin of, 18
sources of, 17–18
Agrarian culture reflected in gospel stories, 551 Agriculture, 18–19
Cain and Abel and, 97
creation and, 141 crops in, 19
in Egypt, 179–180
festivals and, 18 land preparation and, 18–19
Mishnah and, 521
in Palestine, 18 tools used in, 18–19
water and, 18
Agrippa I, 283
Agrippa II, 283–284
and use of the term "Christian," 111 Ahab, 19, 52, 411–412, 670
archaeology and, 50
Assyria and, 63
Baal and, 70
Elijah and, 182
Aharoni, Yohanan
archaeology and, 47, 52
Ahasuerus
Esther and, 198
Ahaz of Judah
Assyria and, 64
Ahaziah, 70
Elijah and, 182
Ahikar, 630
Ahuramazda, 583
Ai and conquest of Canaan, 132
Akeldama
Aramaic and, 46
Akhetaten (Tell el-Amarna), 22
Akhnaton, 11, 22, 261 and Egyptian religion, 180
Akkad
Sumer and, 719–720
Akkadian
Aramaic and, 45
Akko
Amarna Letters and, 22
Akra
Jerusalem and, 350
al-Quds. See Jerusalem Alalakh
archaeology and, 50
Alaric
sack of Rome and, 659
Albertus Magnus
biblical interpretation and, 316
Albright, William Foxwell and history of Israel, 47, 50, 333 Aleppo Codex and Masoretic Text, 501 and order of biblical books, 99
Masorah and, 488
Alexander III ("The Great"), 16, 19–20, 161 and cities, 124
Egyptians and, 181
Alexander Janneus, 281
crucifixion and, 142
Alexander, Alexander
as Bible translator, 763
Alexander, Philip S., as contributor, 305–310
Alexandria, 124
biblical interpretation and, 313
Alexandrian school and allegorical interpretation, 279, 313 Alexandrinus, Codex, 489
and order of biblical books, 100
Alfred the Great and English Bible translation, 758
Alien, 20
Alienation from God
in Genesis, 246
Aliyan Baal, 70
Allegorical interpretation. See also Interpretation, History of; Typology as obstacle to criticism, 319
of the parables, 568 Allegorizing. See Interpretation, History of; Typology Allegory
biblical interpretation and, 311
in Ezekiel, 218
parable and, 569
Alleluia. See Hallelujah
Alms, 20–21
Alpha and Omega, 21
Alphabet
Hebrew, 271
Phoenician, 593
Phoenician script and, 822
Alt, Albecht and study of Israelite law, 422 Altar of Yahweh as place of refuge, 68 Altars, 21–22 associated fixtures and paraphernalia, 21 in biblical narrative, 21 materials for constructing, 21 ritual acts and, 21 types of, 21
Amalek, 22
Amalekites, 22, 73
Arabia and, 44
as destroyers of Ziklag, 22
Amarna Letters, 11, 22, 30, 78
Akhnaton and, 181
archaeology and, 47
and conquest of Canaan, 51
name of Jerusalem and, 349 Ambrosian liturgy music and, 535
Amen, 22–23
in Hebrew Bible, 22–23
in New Testament, 23
Amenhotep IV. See Akhnaton
Amenophis III
Amarna Letters and, 22
American Bible Society, 81, 605
American Council of Christian Churches, 236 American Literature. See Literature and the Bible, North American Literature American Standard Version, 760 Ammon, 23–24 ancestors of, 27 tribe of, 23
Amnon, 6
Amorite language, 24
Amorites, 4, 24, 268
Canaanites and, 98
Mari tablets and, 492
name of, 22
Amos (prophet) career of, 24–25
Amos, The Book of, 24–26
authorship of, 25
Book of Visions in, 25 Book of Woes in, 25
date of, 24–25
eschatology and, 192 historical perspective of, 25 literary materials in, 25 structure of, 25 vocabulary and grammar of, 25 Amplified Bible, The, 762
Amraphel, 5
Amurru, 22
Amygdalon reservoir, 351
Anachronistic reading of the Bible. See Interpretation, History of Ananias, 26
Anathema, 26
Ancestors, The, 26–27, 50–51
archaeology and, 50–51
covenant and, 139
cult of the dead in Israel, 810
Edom and, 178
Hebron and, 277
history of, 27, 247–249
inheritance and, 302
Jacob as one of, 338 religion of, 248
Shechem and, 692–693
Ancient Versions. See Translations
Andersen, Francis I., as contributor, 24–26, 290–292
Anderson, Bernhard W., as contributor, 82–87, 138–139
Andrew, 27
Andrew of Caesarea, Archbishop and chapter-and-verse divisions in Revelation, 106 Andrew of St. Victor
biblical interpretation and, 316
Angel of the Abyss, 3
Angels, 27–28, 611
apocalyptic literature and, 34, 36 and cherubim, 107 in Christian texts, 238 in Christian theology, 28
Colossians and, 128
as communicators of Torah, 65 as divine mediators, 28
Enoch and, 184
fallen, 163 hierarchy of, 28 in Letter to the Hebrews, 275 in the divine council, 27–28 as messengers, 28
in the New Testament, 28
in postexilic literature, 238 as revealers and interpreters, 238 seraphim and, 687 sons of God and, 713
Anicetus
Easter and, 173
Aniconism, 261, 297–298
Animal skins and bookmaking, 94

Animals, 29–30 classification system of, 29 clean and unclean, 29 creation myths and, 29 dietary laws and, 29 imagery of, 29–30 naming of, 141 origin of, 29
relationship with humans, 29 sacrifice of, 29, 666 use of, 29
Anoint, 30–31. See also Anointing Anointed one, 31
Anointing of corpses, 30
Messiah and, 513
as part of medical practice, 30 by a priest, 30 of priests, 30 as religious practice, 30 of the sick, 182 symbolism of, 30–31
Anselm of Laon
biblical interpretation and, 316
Anthropology and the Bible. See Social Sciences and the Bible Anthropomorphism, 261 in J (Yahwist) source, 10, 338 Anti-Judaism. See Anti-Semitism Anti-Lebanon mountains, 44
Anti-Semitism, 32–34
Augustine and,
Christian biblical interpretation and, 33
as Christian heresy, 34 in Christianity, 32–33
circumcision and, 32
Gospel of John and, 33
Paul and, 33
pre-Christian, 32
Second Vatican Council and, 34
Antichrist, 31–32
in book of Revelation, 651, 653
in the Middle Ages, 32
Antigonids (rulers of Macedon), 20 Antinomians letter of Jude and, 397
Antioch in Pisidia, 32, 125
Antioch of Syria, 6, 32, 124
Apostolic Council and, 42
biblical interpretation and, 313 church of, 7
gentile Christians in, 8 and name of Christians, 110 Antiochus III relations with Jews, 475
Antiochus IV Epiphanes, 20, 32, 35, 151, 228 Antichrist and, 31 and books of the Maccabees, 475–476
circumcision and, 123
temple and, 476
Antislavery movement
American churches and, 701
Antonia fortress, 351
Antony, 281–282
Antony of Padua
concordances and, 131
Antwerp Polyglot, 601–602 scholars involved in, 602
texts used in, 602
Aphoristic sayings wisdom literature and, 802
Aphrodite, 64
'apiru, 274
Amarna Letters, 22
Apocalypse, 34–36 horizontal, 34 as literary genre, 35–36 type of writing, 34 vertical, 34
Apocalypse of Abraham, 35, 360
Apocalypse of Adam, 544
Apocalypse of Paul, 35, 41, 544
Apocalypse of Peter, 35, 41, 544
Apocalypse of Zephaniah, 35, 630
Apocalypses, Apocryphal, 41
Apocalypses of James, 41, 544 Apocalyptic imagery
book of Isaiah and, 326 second coming of Christ and, 685 Apocalyptic language
book of Isaiah and, 326
lamb and, 418
Apocalyptic literature, 34–36, 86 biblical apocalypses and, 34–35
biblical interpretation and, 314 biblical prophecy and, 34–35 and book of Daniel, 151 Christian apocalypses and, 35 common themes of, 36 consummation in, 37 cosmic cataclysm in, 36
eschatology and, 192
2 Esdras and, 196
extrabiblical apocalyptic books, 35
Ezekiel and, 219
history and "the end," 36
Jerusalem and, 353
Jewish apocalypses and, 35
Leviathan and, 433–434 literary features of, 35–36
Michael and, 518
myth and, 541
new creation and, 141 revelation through visionary experience in, 35 symbolic imagery of, 35–36 2 Thessalonians and, 742 wisdom tradition and, 34–35
Zechariah and, 827
Apocalyptic prophetic movement
canon of scripture and, 103
Apocalyptic traditions
Enoch and, 184–185
Apocalyptists
eschatology and, 193
Apocrypha, 37–41, 629–630
Additions to Esther and, 200
Agrapha and, 17–18
book of Judith as, 399–400
book of Tobit as, 745
Christian, 39–41, 500, 743 editions of the Bible and, 38
Esdras and, 194
influence of, on biblical interpretation, 312
Jewish, 37–39
Letter of Jeremiah and, 347
Mary and, 500
modern, 41
Prayer of Azariah, 68
Simon Peter and, 695–696
Sirach as, 697
Song of the Three Young Men, 68 as source for Judaisms in the First Century, 392
Thomas and, 743
women in, 813
Apocryphal Acts. See Acts, Apocryphal
Apocryphal Apocalypses. See Apocalypses, Apocryphal
Apocryphal Gospels. See Gospels, Apocryphal
Apocryphal Letters. See Letters, Apocryphal
Apocryphon of Ezekiel, 630
Apocryphon of James, 40
Apollonius of Tyana
Ephesus and, 189
Apollos, 41
as author of Hebrews, 275
1 Corinthians and, 136
Apollyon
as name for Satan, 679
Apologetics
biblical interpretation and, 312
Apostasy book of Judges and, 397
Apostle, 41–42
Junia as, 405
Semitic messenger and, 41–42
Simon Peter as, 695
Thomas as, 743
as title of Paul, 10 Apostles, 89
canon of scripture and, 102 and election, 110
women as, 815
Apostles Creed and descent into hell, 163
Apostleship
2 Corinthians and, 137
Apostolic Constitutions
canon of scripture and, 104
Apostolic Council, 42–43, 250 and chronology, 121
Silas and, 694
Apostolic Decree
Apostolic Council and, 42–43
Apostolic fathers
biblical interpretation and, 311
canon of scripture and, 103
elder and, 182
Apostolic tradition
canon of scripture and, 102
Eastern Orthodoxy and, 175
Apostolic witness
canon of scripture and, 102, 104
Appearances (of Christ) lists of, 648
resurrection and, 648–649 to women, 648
Apple of the Eye, 43
Appointed times
Mishnah and, 521
Aqedah, 43–44
depiction of, in art, 56, 57, 60
Isaac and, 325
Ishmael and, 329
in New Testament, 43
testing and, 734
Aquarian Gospel, 41

Aquila, 293
Apollos and, 41
biblical translation and, 752
Aquileian Creed
and descent into hell, 163
Arabia, 11, 44
Arabic
language, 542
Arabic Gospel of the Infancy, 39
Arad, 52
archaeology and, 49
identification of, 47
ostraca from, 53
Aram, 44–45
as ancestor of Arameans, 44
Aram-Damascus
Ammon and, 23
Aram-maachah, 44
Aram-zobah, 44, 45
Aramaic language, 24, 45–46, 150, 272, Aram and, 45
Assyria and, 63
Babylonian, 46
and book of Ezra, 221
Christian Palestinian, 46 dialects of, 46
Imperial, 45
Jewish Palestinian, 46
Nabateans and, 542
Official, 45
targums and, 305, 754–755
Arameans
Aram as ancestor of, 44
Assyria and, 63
wars against, 19
Ararat, 46
Aratus, 65
Archaeology and the Bible, 46–54
altars and, 22
Ammon and, 23–24
ancestral age and, 50–51 aniconic tradition and, 335 archaeological evidence and biblical traditions, 49–53 archaeological finds, 49 archaeological methods, 47–49
Artemis and, 60–61
Asherah and, 62
Athens and, 65
Capernaum and, 104 chronological terms in, 50 clothing and, 126
computers and, 129
and conquest of Canaan, 132
Corinth and, 134
crucifixion and, 142
Cyrus and, 146 debris analysis and, 47 divided monarchy and, 52
Edom and, 178–179
El-Amarna and, 22
Ephesus and, 189
the exodus and, 51 funding of, 47–48
Gospel of John and, 374
Hellenistic and Roman periods and, 53–54
history of, 46–47
and history of Israel, 330–331 human skeletons and, 49 idols and, 297
invasions of Judah and, 52–53 and Israelite religion, 333
Jerusalem and, 349
jewelry and, 367 judges and, 51
Megiddo and, 511
pottery and, 140 primeval history and, 50
at Qumran, 198
and religion of Israel, 332 seals and, 49 soil analysis and, 47 synagogues and, 722, 723
textiles and, 49 tomb of Caiaphas and, 97 tools used in, 48
underwater, 49 united monarchy and, 51–52
women and, 812
volunteer workers in, 47 Archaic period
in Egypt, 180
Archangels, 54, 238
Michael and, 518
Raphael and, 642
Archelaus, 125, 282–283
Archko Volume, 41
Arena chapel frescoes in, 59
Areopagus, 54–55, 65
Paul's speech at, 8
Ark (of the covenant), 55–56, 84, 167
cherubim and, 107
cover of, 55–56 as cult object, 298
of God, 55
Jerusalem and, 349
and presence of Yahweh, 216
Temple and, 732
of the Lord, 107
Zion and, 830
Ark (of Noah), 46
Flood and, 231
Arles
art and, 58
Armageddon, 56
Army, Israelite
Cherethites in, 107
Pelethites in, 107
'Ărôn (ark), 55
Arslan Tash
archaeology and, 49
Art and the Bible, 56–60
Aqedah and, 44
Assyria and, 64
in early period, 56–57 in Gothic period, 58–59 in Middle Ages, 57–59 in modern period, 60 Renaissance and Reformation, 59–60 Romanesque art, 57–58
synagogues and, 723
typology in, 56
Artaxerxes, 53, 72
and book of Ezra, 219, 220
Esdras and, 194
Artemis, 9, 54, 60–61, 189 temple of, 61
Arundel Psalter, 756
As (coin), 523
Ascension of Christ, 61–62, 277, 565
depiction of, in art, 58
Enoch and, 185
in the Hellenistic world, 61 and Jewish tradition, 61 Asceticism in Christian Apocrypha, 40 at Colossae, 128
Ashdod, 51
Asher, 62
Asherah, 62, 166, 261, 411 associated with Asher, 62
Elijah and, 182
idolatry and, 297–298
monotheism and, 526
and religion of Israel, 334–335
wisdom and, 800
Ashkelon
Amarna Letters and, 22
archaeology and, 48
Ashtaroth. See Astarte
Ashtoreth. See Astarte
Ashur-nadin-shumi, 64
Ashur-uballit I, 63
Ashur-uballit II, 64
Ashurbanipal, 64, 71
Ashurnasirpal II, 52, 63
Asia, 9, 62, 189
Asia Minor, 6
Paul's journeys in, 9
Asklepius, 73
Association Internationale Bible et Informatique, 131 Assumption of Moses. See Testament of Moses Assyria, 22, 63–64
exile and, 209
history of Israel and, 330
Sennacherib and, 686
Shalmaneser and, 692
Tiglath-Pileser III and, 743 tribute and taxation and, 780 Assyrian empire book of Jeremiah and, 343
Assyrian period
Ammon in, 23–24
Assyrian records
Edom and, 178
Assyrians, 11
Aram and, 45
book of Isaiah and, 326
Astarte, 64
Queen of Heaven, 636
Astruc, Jean
biblical interpretation and, 322
Asylum and cities of refuge, 125
Atbash, 64–65
Athaliah, 389–390
Athanasius
canon of scripture and, 103–104
Athenagoras
inspiration and, 304
Athens, 8, 65, 124
Epicureans in, 190
Athias, Joseph chapter-and-verse divisions of scripture and, 106 Athletic facilities
archaeology and, 54

Atonement. See Day of Atonement Atrahasis, 50
Atrahasis Epic, 558
Auditions revelation and, 650
Augustan Cohort, 656
Augustine
 anti-Semitism and, 33
 biblical interpretation and, 314
 canon of scripture and, 104
 Fall and, 223
 Letter to the Romans and, 662
 and literature, 447
 love and, 468–469
 repentance in, 647
 science and the Bible and, 681
 sortilege and, 713
Augustus, Emperor, 32, 657–658 Auschwitz
 art and, 60 Authority and laying on of hands, 427
Authority of the Bible, 65–68 approaches to, 66–68
 Eastern Orthodoxy and, 175
 feminist interpretation and, 230–231
 fundamentalism, 236
 inerrancy and, 303
 inspiration and, 66
 scribes and, 684–685
Authorized Version, 760
Avalos, Hector Ignacio, as contributor, 29–30, 191–192, 258, 507–509, 678–679 Avenger of Blood, 68
Avigad, Nahman, 47
 Jerusalem and, 350
Azariah, The Prayer of, 68–69
Azazel, 69, 157 and Day of Atonement, 156

Baal, 30, 70, 166, 280, 290 and Bel, 77 and Dagon, 70, 147 and Deuteronomic literature, 70
 Elijah and, 182
 fertility religion and, 85 and Hadad, 70
 Israel's prophets and, 70 and Mot, 70 as name of Yahweh, 549 names compounded with, 70, 549 of Peor, 70 storms and, 70 of Tyre, 70
 Ugaritic epics and, 70 worship of, 343
 Yahweh and, 411
 and Yamm, 70
 Zaphon and, 825
Baal Shamem, 593
Baal-zebub, 70
 as Lord of Flies, 70
 in New Testament, 70
 Satan and, 70
 in Ugaritic texts, 70
Babel, 255
 Hebrew etymology of, 71
 Mesopotamian ziggurats and, 71 relation of, to Babylon, 70 Sumerian Enmerkar Epic and, 71 tower of Nanna and, 71
Babel, Tower of, 70–71
Babylon, 20, 31, 53, 71–72, 77, 124, 268
 Akkadian etymology of, 71
 archaeology and, 49
 Assyria and, 64
 book of Isaiah and, 326
 book of Revelation and, 651 cuneiform source interpretation of, 71 and Cush, 145 hanging gardens of, 71
 history of, 71
 Lilith and demons of, 437
 Marduk as patron of, 71
 in New Testament, 72
 Rome and, 72
 Tower of Babel and, 72 Babylonia, 22
 exile and, 209
 idols of, 297
Babylonian Aramaic. See Aramaic, Babylonian Babylonian Chronicle, 5, 53, 72, 78
 exile and, 209
Babylonian exile, 72, 75, 76
 book of Isaiah and, 327
 book of Joshua and, 387
 Esdras and, 194
 Ezekiel and, 217
 inheritance and, 302
 letter of Jeremiah and, 347
Babylonian language
 Amarna Letters and, 22
Babylonians, 265
Bacon, Francis, 683
Bacon, Roger
 biblical interpretation and, 317
Bactria, 19
Badian, E., as contributor, 631–633, 781–782
Bailey, Kenneth E., as contributor, 18–19, 95–96, 125–127, 139–140, 293–295, 748–749
Balaam, 51, 72–73, 548, 560–561 Deir 'Allā and, 72 as evil diviner, 72 favorable portrait of, in Numbers, 72 messiah of Israel and, 73 Balak
 Balaam and, 72
Baldwin, James, 606
Baldwin, Lewis and children's study of the Bible, 109 Ballet, classical and the Bible, 148
Balthasar, 78
Bamberg Bible, 611
Ban, 22, 73 anathema and, 26 holy war and, 73, 791 relation of, to harem, 73
Banking, 749
Baptism, 4, 73–74, 89–90, 287, 288 of adults, 74
 ascension and, 61–62
 of children, 74 into Christ, 90 Christian rituals of the dead and, 74 and death, 160
 exodus and, 212
 gnostic interpretation of, 62
 Greco-Roman religions and, 73
 Holy Spirit and, 73
 by immersion or sprinkling, 74 of infants, 74
 Jesus and, 356–357
 John the Baptist and, 73, 372
 in Letter to the Romans, 661
 Moses at the Red Sea and, 74
 in New Testament, 73–74
 Noah's ark and, 74
 Qumran and, 73 regeneration and, 645 of repentance, 73 resurrection of believers and, 649 of the Spirit, 89
 water and, 89, 793
Baptist Missionary Society, 80
Baptist, John the. See John the Baptist Baptist. See John the Baptist Bar-Jona
 Aramaic and, 45
Barabbas, 74
 Aramaic and, 45
 crucifixion and, 142
Barak and book of Judges, 398 Barclay, William
 as Bible translator, 761
Bark as early writing material, 93
Barker, Robert and Geneva Bible, 143 Bar Kokhba
 Aramaic letters of, 46
Bar Kosiba. See Bar Kokhba
Barlow, Philip L., as contributor, 527–528
Barnabas, 9, 32, 74–75, 239, 240
 as apostle, 42
 Apostolic Council and, 42
 as author of Hebrews, 275
Barnabas, Epistle of, 75
Barnes, William H., as contributor, 54, 56, 236–237, 256–257, 302–304, 684, 823
Barr, James, as contributor, 116–119, 318–324, 599–601 Barter trade and, 749
Barth, Karl, 82
 authority of the Bible and, 67
 Letter to the Romans and, 662
Barth, Markus K., as contributor, 185–189 Barthes, Roland
 structuralism and, 716
Bartholomew, 75
 Aramaic and, 45
 Nathanael and Philip and, 75
Bartimaeus
 Aramaic and, 45
Bartlett, John R., as contributor, 475–482
Barton, John, as contributor, 325, 338
Baruch (person), 53, 75
Baruch, The Book of, 75–76
 as apocryphal book, 39
 authorship of, 75
 Christian canon and, 75 contact of, with Job and Sirach, 76
 contents of, 75
 date of, 75
 original language of, 76
 unity of, 75

Baruch, The Book of (cont.)
in the Vulgate, 75, 76 and wisdom, 76
Baruch literature
2 Baruch, 35, 630
3 Baruch, 35, 630
4 Baruch, 630
Basilides, 256
Baskerville
Bible printing and, 614
Baskin, Judith R., as contributor, 236, 342, 512
Bath (measure), 796
Bathsheba, 6, 76, 153 Battle
eschatological, 192, 193
Bauckham, Richard J., as contributor, 395–397, 586–588
Baur, Ferdinand Christian, 50
biblical interpretation and, 322
Beardslee, William A, as contributor, 3–4, 22–23, 301, 463–464, 686 Bearers of God's Throne cherubim as, 107–108
Beast
in book of Revelation, 654
Beatitudes, 688
and blessing, 92
Sermon on the Mount and, 687
Beckett, Samuel, 454
Beckwith, Roger T., as contributor, 100–102
Bede, Venerable
biblical interpretation and, 315
and English Bible translation, 758
Magi and, 547
Beds, 294
Beelzebub. See Baal-zebub
Beel-zebul, 162. See also Baal-zebub
as name for Satan, 679
Begg, Christopher T., as contributor, 217–219, 565, 666–667 Behemoth, 76–77
in Job, 76
Leviathan and, 76
Yahweh and, 76
Beka (weight), 797
Bel relation of, to Baal, 77
Bel and the Dragon, 77, 150, 266
as apocryphal book, 39
Daniel, book of, and, 77 original language of, 77
Septuagint and, 77
Belial, 77, 679
in King James Version, 77
Satan and, 77
underworld and, 77
Beliar
as name for Satan, 679
Belief. See Faith
Bellarmine, Robert, 682
Belshazzar, 53, 72, 77–78
Belteshazzar, 78
Belzoni, Giovanni, 46 Ben, 78 bar and, 78 use of, in patronymics, 78
Ben-Ammi
as eponymous ancestor of Ammonites, 23 Ben-Asher
cantillation and, 488
Ben Asher, Aaron and Masorah, 501 Ben Asher, Bahya
biblical interpretation and, 309
Ben-Asher, Moshe and Tiberian system of vocalization, 487 Ben David, Anan
Karaism and, 309
Benedicite, 68–69
Benedictus es, 68–69
Benisch, Abraham
as Bible translator, 763 Benjamin, 78
in Mari texts, 78
Benjamin, tribe of. See also Tribes of Israel Benjaminites
Amorites and, 24
Ben Kalonymos, Rabbi Isaac Nathan
concordances and, 131
Ben Kosiba. See Bar Kokhba
Bennett, Robert A., as contributor, 11–12
Ben Sira
Sirach and, 697
Bensley, Thomas errors in Bible and, 143
Bentley, G. E., Jr., as contributor, 298–300
Bentley, Jerry H., as contributor, 315–318 Bercovitch, Sacvan typology and, 455
Berlin, Adele, as contributor, 597–599
Berossos, 72
Best, Ernest, as contributor, 583–586, 695–696
Beth Alpha, 44
art at, 56
Bethel, 3, 52
Asherah and, 62
associated with Jacob, 27 Bethesda pools of, 53
Bethlehem, 78, 251 in Christian tradition, 78 etymology of, 78
as home of David, 153
Bethsaida Julias, 125
Beth-shan, 162, 251
archaeology and, 47, 49
Beth Shearim
and burial customs, 96
Betz, Otto, as contributor, 41–42, 141–142
Bible, 78–80. See also Curious Bibles; Interpretation; Translations
African American Traditions and, 12
American cinema and the, 606
American fiction writers and the, 606 American musicians and the, 606
Anglican church and, 79
Apocrypha and, 79
binding materials used in production of the, 615–616
canon and, 79
Catholic church and, 79 chapter division in, 79 and Christian Science, 111–112
and computer technology, 129–131
contents of, 79
copied in scriptoria, 80 distribution of, 253–254, 263 eccentric translations of, 143 Ethiopic church and, 79 etymology of, 78
and feminism, 228–231 format of, 79
Greek Orthodox church and, 79 hieroglyphic format, 143–144 Jewish canon of, 79 manufacture of, 615–617 paper manufacture for the, 615 printing of, 80, 611–615 proliferation of copies of, in sixteenth century, 612 Protestant canon of, 79
Samaritan, 79
scholar-printers of the, 614 translation of, and feminism, 230 translation of, and literature, 449–450 typesetting of the, 615 use of, among African Americans, 605–606 visual arts and, 606
Bible de Jérusalem, La, 763 Bible Moralisée
and Bible illustration, 299
Bible Societies, 80–82, 109 and circulation of the Bible, 122 Bibles children's, 108–109 curious, 143–144 oddities in printing and translation of, 143 polyglot, 601–603 unusual formats of, 143–144 Biblia pauperum
and Bible illustration, 299
Biblical history
depiction of, in art, 57
Biblical theology, 82–91
authority of the Bible and, 67
Bilhah, 26
as mother of Dan, 148 Bilingual interference in New Testament Greek, 263 Binding. See Aqedah Biography as gospel genre, 259 Birck, Sixtus
concordances and, 131
Bird, Phyllis A., as contributor, 623–624 Birkat Israel reservoir in Jerusalem, 351 Birth imagery
water and, 793
Birthright
Esau and, 192
Birth stories and virgin birth of Christ, 790 Bishop, 91 deacons and, 158 meaning of word, 91 requirements for, 91 responsibilities of, 91
Bishops' Bible, 613, 617, 759
Black Jews and African American traditions, 14
Black Obelisk, 52, 343
Black, M. H., as contributor, 611–615, 616–619

Black, Matthew, as contributor, 184-185
Blake, William, 60, 256
 and biblical themes, 444
Blasphemy, 91-92 against the Holy Spirit, 91
 crucifixion and, 142
 of opponents of Jesus, 91 Stephen and, 714
Blavatsky, Madame, 256 Blessing, 84, 86, 92, 138 of Abraham, 92
 covenant and, 92
 cup of, 92 and curse, 144 and God's grace, 92 and laying on of hands, 427 saints and, 92 in song, dance, music, 92 in temple and synagogue worship, 92 Blindness, 92
 as divine punishment, 92 healing of, by Jesus, 92 of the Pharisees, 92 priesthood and, 92
 as ritual blemish, 92 Blood, 92-93, 295-296 altar and, 22
 crucifixion and, 93
 and death of Christ, 88 life and, 93
 Nile water turns to, 595
 Passover and, 572
 sacrifice and, 93 taboo and, 93
Boanerges
 James as, 339
Boasting
 Paul and, 137
Boaz
 in book of Ruth, 662-663 Body risen, and resurrection of Christ, 649 and soul, 295-296
Body and blood of Christ, 90
Body of Christ, 89
Boers, 620
Boethusians
 Sadducees and, 393
Boghazköy excavations at, 285
Bōhû, 105
Boils
 as Egyptian plague, 596
Book of Common Prayer, 617-618 Book of Consolation book of Jeremiah and, 344, 345
Book of Giants, 630
Book of Jashar, 41
Book of Kells and Bible illustrations, 299
Book of Life, 93
Book of Mormon, 527
Book of Mysteries, 630
Book of the Acts of Solomon, 410
Book of the Annals of the Kings of Israel, 410 Book of the Annals of the Kings of Judah, 410 Book of the Bee, 547
Book of the Covenant, 214, 423
Book of the Giants
 Manichean, 185
Book of the Wars of Yahweh, 342
Book of Thomas, 40 Books and bookmaking in antiquity, 93-95 Booths festival of, 228 Bosom of Abraham, 5-6
Botta, Paul Emile, 46 Boundaries, sacred social sciences and, 703-704
Bourges
 Gothic art and, 58
Bowing the head, 252
Boyles, Robert, 683
Brahe, Tycho
 science and the Bible and, 682 Brancacci chapel
 frescoes in, 59
Bratcher, Robert G., as contributor, 570-571, 758-763 Bread, 95, 295 baking of, in homes, 95 and biblical religion, 95 breaking of the, 95 festival of unleavened, 95 manna and, 95 sacrificial system and, 95 symbolic meaning of, 95 in tabernacle and Temple, 95
 unleavened, 225
Bread of the Presence. See Showbread Breeches Bible, 143
Bremer, Paul L., as contributor, 26, 91-92
Briggs, Charles A.
 biblical interpretation and, 322
Brinkman, John A., as contributor, 63-64, 686, 692, 743
British and Foreign Bible Society, 81, 613
Brock, S. P., as contributor, 752-754 Bronze plates
 as writing materials, 94
Brooten, Bernadette J., as contributor, 288-289, 405 Brothers
 as appellation of Christians, 111
 names of, of Jesus, 95 Brothers and sisters of Jesus, 95 virgin birth and, 95
Bruce, F. F., as contributor, 6-10, 238-240, 714
Brueggemann, Walter, 629
Bryan, William Jennings, 237
Buchanan, George Wesley, as contributor, 123-124, 431-432, 684-685, 696-697 Builders, 139
Bultmann, Rudolf, 280 biblical criticism and, 323 Bunyan, John, 279
 and biblical themes, 442-443
Burgmair, Hans and Bible illustration, 299
Burial anointing and, 30 of criminals, 96 during the Dispersion, 96 funerary offerings and, 16
 of Jesus, 96 preparation of body for, 96 and Promised Land, 96 secondary, 96
Burial customs, 95-96
 and Abraham, 96
 Egyptians and, 96
 and immortality, 96 inscriptions and, 96 instruments used in, 96 laments and, 96 resurrection and, 96
Burial places pyramids as, 180
Burke, David G., as contributor, 70, 70-71, 107-108, 687
Burnt Offering (holocaust), 666
Buseira (Bozrah), 179
Bushel (measure), 797 Buxtorf, John
 concordances and, 131
Byzantine period synagogues in, 723

Caedmon and English Bible translation, 758
 and literature, 439
Caesarea, 7, 125
 archaeology and, 49
Caesarea Philippi, 125
Cahspe (modern Apocrypha), 41
Caiaphas, 97
Cain mark of, 701
 wife of, 97, 546
Cain and Abel, 97
 depiction of, in art, 57
 murder and, 532
Cain's Wife. See Names for the Nameless Cajetan, Cardinal
 biblical interpretation and, 317, 318
Calah (Nimrud)
 capital of Assyria, 52, 63
Calendar. See also Time, Units of Deuteronomy and, 165 feasts and festivals in, 225-228 Jewish religious, and order of biblical books, 99 units of time and, 744
Call conversion and, 133
Calloud, Jean
 structuralism and, 716
Calvary. See Golgotha
Calvin, John, 86
 authority of the Bible and, 67
 biblical interpretation and, 317
 inspiration and, 304
 Letter to the Romans and, 662 predestination and, 608
Calvinists
 Apocrypha and, 38
Cambridge University Press, 617-619
Cambyses edict of, 221
Camels
 transport and, 749
Campbell, Edward F., as contributor, 259-261, 521-522, 522-523, 662-664
Camus, Albert, 454

Canaan, 11, 84, 85, 96, 98, 164
Amorites in, 24
Ebla and, 176
promise of land of, 619 Canaanites, 24, 98
cults of, and D source, 147 gods of, 70, 297
and sea trade, 694
Canadian Literature. See Literature and the Bible Candace, 11
Canonical criticism, 324 Canonicity criteria of, 104
Canon law and European legal tradition, 425-426
Canon Muratori, 312
Canon of Scripture, 98-104
and Agrapha, 17-18
Apocrypha and, 37
of apostolic writings, 89 and authority of the Bible, 66
and books of Chronicles, 115
Ecclesiastes and, 178
Esdras and, 194
Ezra and, 100, 196
formation of, 102-104 Hebrew Bible and Old Testament, 100-102
Midrash and, 306
Mormonism and, 527
of the New Testament, 10, 102-104 Protestant, and African Americans, 13, 15
Septuagint and, 686-687
Song of Solomon and, 708
Susanna and, 720
Canon within the canon, 90 and feminist interpretation, 231
Canstein, Karl Hildebrand Baron von, 613
Canstein Bible, 613
Canticle of Canticles. See Song of Solomon
Capernaum, 104
exorcism of demoniac at, 217 synagogue at, 53
Captivity epistles, 128
Caravaggio
Aqedah and, 44
Carbon-14 dating, 47
Carchemish, battle of, 390
Carey, William, 80
as Bible translator, 774
Carmel, 251
Carpenters, 139
Carter, Howard as discoverer of Tutankhamnu's tomb, 181 Carter, Jimmy, 237, 605
Cassiodorus
biblical interpretation and, 313
Cassuto, Umberto
biblical interpretation and, 323
Catacombs and art, 56
Cathedral schools
biblical interpretation and, 316
Catholic letters, 10, 104-105 Cattle murrain
as Egyptian plague, 596
Celibacy
in early Christianity, 816
Essenes and, 393
Judith and, 400
Therapeutae and, 394
Cenchreae, 54
Central sanctuary as theme of books of Kings, 411-413
Centurion, 105
Chagall, Marc, 60
and Bible illustration, 299
Chairs, 294
Chalcedon christology of, 90
Chaldeans, 787
Chaldeans, Ur of the. See Ur of the Chaldeans Chaos, 105
creation and, 140
myth of, and Israelite religion, 335 Chapter-and-verse divisions, 105-107, 612 in the Greek text, 106 in the Hebrew Bible, 105-106
modern, 106-107
Charinus, Leucius, 40 Chariot-throne of God
cherubim as, 108
Charismata, 288
Charismatic leaders conversion and, 133
judges as, 398
Charismatic teachers letter of Jude and, 395 Chartres art of cathedral at, 58 Chaucer, Geoffrey and biblical themes, 440
Cherethites and Pelethites, 107
Cherub(im), 28, 30, 107-108, 261
ark and, 56
as cult objects, 298
monotheism and, 526
Chief priest, 610-611
Child sacrifice
Topheth and, 747 Child's Bible Reader, 109
Childbirth, 4 cult and, 807
purity and, 809-810
Children's Bibles, 108-109 hieroglyphic format and, 143-144
Childs, Brevard S.
biblical interpretation and, 324
Chilton, Bruce D., as contributor, 408-409 Chorazin synagogue at, 53
Chosen People, 109-110
Christ. See Jesus Christ
Christ event, 87
Christian, 110-111
Christian Apocrypha. See Apocrypha, Christian Christianity circumcision and early, 124 expansion of, 8 rejected by Jews, 269 as social organization, 705-706 Christian life in Letter to the Romans, 661
in theology of Paul, 578 Christian movement urbanization of, 551
The Way as, 793
Christian origins
2 Esdras and, 196-197
Christian Palestinian Aramaic. See Aramaic, Christian Palestinian Christians
Epicureans and, 190
and interpretation of scripture, 66 Christian Science and the Bible, 111-112
Christmas, 112-113
Christology, 87-88
adoptionist, 361
Chronicler, 86
book of Ezra and, 221
book of Nehemiah and, 555 Chronicles, The Books of, 113-116
canon and, 115
contents of, 113
Elijah in, 183
Esdras and, 194
interpretation of, 115
as a literary work, 115 sources and integrity of, 114 text of, 113 title of, 113
Chronology, 116-121 dating systems and, 117 Egyptian period and, 117 entrance of Jacob into Egypt and, 117
exodus and, 117
from Abraham's migration, 117 historical or scientific, 117 Israelite, 117-119
Solomon's Temple and, 117 theoretical or theological, 117
units of time and, 744
Church, 121-122 architecture and art, 57 authority of, 7, 175
as body of Christ in Colossians, 127 doctrine of, 89
in Ephesians, 188
family and, 224
images of, 89 institutional, 89 in Rome, 660 Church fathers
Agrapha and, 18
Eastern Orthodoxy and, 175
Church of England
Apocrypha and, 38
Church order in the Pastoral letters, 574, 576
Cicero reference in, to Judaism, 32
Cilicia, 8
Apostolic Decree and church of, 42
Circulation of the Bible, 122-123
Circumcision, 5, 123-124
anti-Semitism and, 32
Apostolic Council and, 42-43
2 Corinthians and, 137
covenant and, 139
letter to the Galatians, 238, 240 of men of Shechem, 168 as mutilation, 623
P source and, 567

Circumcision (cont.)
significance of, during exile, 619
as symbol, 721
Cities, 124–125
Cities of refuge, 68, 125
lists of, in Joshua, 386
murder and, 532
City of David. See Jerusalem City-state in Asia Minor and Greece, 124 Classical writings
women in, 814
Clay tablets
as writing materials, 94
Clean and Unclean. See Purity, Ritual Clement of Alexandria
canon of scripture and, 103
Clement of Rome, 275, 279
canon of scripture and, 103
Clements, Ronald E., as contributor, 164–168 Cleopatra as ruler of Egypt, 181
Clermont-Ganneau, Charles
Moabite Stone and, 522
Clifford, Richard J., as contributor, 182–183, 183–184, 382–383
Clines, David J. A., as contributor, 368–370, 579–582 Clothing, 125–127
ephod and, 189 garments and, 127
manufacture of, 126–127
materials used in, 126
Coastal plain of Palestine, 250
Coats, George W., as contributor, 559–561
Code of Hammurapi. See Hammurapi
Codex, 94
Christianity and, 94–95 as form of writing, 99
as manuscript form, 487
Codex Alexandrinus. See Alexandrinus, Codex
Codex Bezae, 489
Codex D
and Agrapha, 17
Codex Ephraimi, 489
Codex Koridethi, 489
Codex Sinaiticus, 489
Codex Vaticanus, 489
chapter and verse divisions in, 106
and order of biblical books, 100
Codex Washingtoniensis, 489
Cody, Aelred, O.S.B., as contributor, 3, 608–611
Coggan, Donald, as contributor, 464–465
Coggins, Richard, as contributor, 623, 671–672
Coins. See Money
Coleridge, Samuel Taylor and biblical themes, 444
Collation. See Manuscripts Collection, 136, 137
Colossae, 62
Christian community at, 128
Colossians, The Letter of Paul to the, 127–129 authenticity of, 127
church of, 128
Colossian heresy and, 128
date of, 128
dependence of Ephesians on, 187 ethical teaching of, 129 occasion of, 128
outline of, 127
Paul's reply in, 128–129
Combrink, H. J. Bernard, as contributor, 715–718
Coming of God. See Day of the Lord Commentaries rewritten Bible and, 305 Complutensian Polyglot, 601, 612 scholars involved in, 601
texts used in, 601
Computers and the Bible, 129–131
concordances and, 131–132
Concordances, 131–132
computers and, 130
dynamic, and computer technology, 130
Concubines, 691
Confessional formulae, 87
Confessions of Pontius Pilate, 41 Conquest of Canaan, 132 begun by Joshua, 619 completed by David, 619
date of, 51
Conrad of Halberstadt chapter and verse divisions and, 106
Conrad, Edgar W., as contributor, 73, 144–145, 171–172, 788–789
Constantelos, Demetrios J., as contributor, 174–176 Constantine, Emperor, 33, 78, 354
Consubstantiality, 90
Contarini, Gasparo
biblical interpretation and, 318
Conversion, 132–134
Conversion of Asenath
portrayal of women in, 813–814
Coogan, Michael D., as contributor, 6, 62, 64–65, 75, 76–77, 78, 97, 105, 173, 184, 209–212, 253, 258, 277, 280, 290, 296, 329, 338, 342, 433–434, 437–438, 467, 485, 500, 512–513, 518, 519, 523–524, 555–556, 567, 604–605, 636, 642, 656, 669–670, 686–687, 738–739, 743–744, 791, 799–800
Cook, J. M., as contributor, 153, 507, 582–583
Cook, James I., as contributor, 95, 486 Cooper, James Fenimore biblical analogy and, 456 Copernicus
science and the Bible and, 681–682
Copland, Aaron, 606
Copper Scroll, 272
Coptic language, 180
Coptic writings, 543–544
Cor (measure), 796
Corban, 134
Corinth, 9, 125, 134–135 church at, 135
and ecstatic religion, 89 Corinthians, The Letter of Paul to the, 135–138
Ephesus and, 189
significance of, 137
1 Corinthians, 135–136
situation of, 135–136
structure and content of, 136
2 Corinthians, 137–138
situation of, 136
structure and content of, 137
Cornelius, 74, 250
Corpse crucifixion and exposition of, 141, 142
Correspondence between Paul and Seneca, 41
Cosmetics, 295
Cosmic upheaval
apocalyptic literature and, 36
Cosmology
modern biblical criticism and, 320 Cotton clothing and, 126
Council at Jerusalem
James and, 339
Council of Gangra statements of, about women, 817 Council of Trent, 59
biblical interpretation and, 318
Court History of David, 674 Court eunuchs in royal, 205
Cousteau, Jacques-Yves, 49 Covenant, 138–139, 247 with Abraham, 5, 84 between Midian and Israel, 3
book of Joshua and, 387
book of Malachi and, 484
circumcision and, 124
curse and, 145 with David, 84 election and, 110 of El-Shaddai, 5 ethics and, 202–203
in Haggai, 267 illness and, 508
inheritance as, 302 justification and, 405
love and, 468
marriage and, 496
with Moses, 84
new, 85
Noah and, 84 and prophecy, 85–86 royal, 84, 85
at Sinai, 3, 84, 581 and theology of Exodus, 215 and war, 791
Covenant, Book of the. See Book of the Covenant Covenant, Mosaic
2 Corinthians and, 137
Covenant history in OT theology, 83–85 Covenants
in P, 567
Cover, Robin C., as contributor, 129–131 Coverdale, Miles and Bible translation, 759
Cox, Dermot, O.F.M., as contributor, 176–178, 624–626 Crafts, 139–140
Creation, 140–141
chaos and, 105
Exodus and, 211
Ezekiel and, 219
in Genesis, 246
in God's likeness, 246 of heaven, 270

Creation (cont.)
of humankind, 246 kingship and, 413
myth and, 540
and Mesopotamian literature, 50
new, 141
Rahab and, 642 scientific controversy about, 683
units of time and, 744
water and, 792–793
wisdom and, 800, 802
of the world, 246
Creationists vs. evolutionists, 683
Cremation, 96
Crenshaw, James L., as contributor, 160–161, 380–381, 532–533, 718–719, 801–803
Cretans
Cherethites as, 107
Crime, capital witnesses and, 805–806 Critical apparatus textual criticism and, 739 Critical editions of the Bible
and computer technology, 129
Criticism, biblical, 318–320 higher, 319–320 lower, 319–320
Cromwell, Oliver, 602
Cross, Frank Moore, 164 Crucifixion, 87, 141–142
archaeology and, 53–54
depiction of, in art, 56–57, 59, 60
Jesus and, 360
Mary Magdalene and, 499
Cruden, Alexander
concordances and, 131
Cubit (measure), 796
Culley, Robert C. structuralism and, 716
Cult of the dead, 160 objects of, and tabernacle, 729 of Yahweh, and D source, 147 Cultural differences and Bible translation, 122
Cuneiform, 821
Ebla and, 176
Mari tablets and, 491–492
Ugaritic and, 785
Curse, 84, 144–145, 268
covenant and, 138
of the Law, in Galatians, 239
'lh as, 144–145
'rr as, 145
Cush, 11, 145, 268
Cutting hair, 253
Cyprian
biblical interpretation and, 311
Cyprus, 6, 9, 74
Cyrene, 11
Cyrus (II) the Great, 31, 53, 72, 77, 78, 145–146, 169, 582–583
book of Ezra and, 220
book of Isaiah and, 328 end of exile and, 619
Esdras and, 194
Second Isaiah and, 327

D, 147
date of composition of, 147
Pentateuchal sources and, 147, 580
D, Codex. See Codex D
Dagon, 70, 147
Baal and, 147
temple of, at Gaza, 147 in Ugaritic tablets, 147 d'Ailly, Pierre
biblical interpretation and, 317
Damages
Mishnah and, 521
Damascus, 32, 44, 63, 125, 147, 252
and Jehu dynasty, 332
Jewish and Christian communities at, 147
Paul and, 147
temple of Jupiter at, 147
Damascus Covenant, 159
Damasus, Pope
Apocrypha and, 37–38
Dan, 3, 78, 148, 284 ancient sanctuary at, 148
archaeology and, 52 history of tribe of, 148
identification of, 47
Dance and the Bible, 148–149 and Israeli choreographers, 149
Salome and, 148
Yemenite dance traditions (Jewish), 149
Daniel (person)
Bel and, 77
Canaanite Dan'il and, 149
depiction of, in art, 57 in extracanonical materials, 50 hero of book of, 149 mention of, with Noah and Job, 149 Daniel, The Book of, 149–152 additions to book of, 150
apocalyptic literature, 151
Aramaic language and, 45 audience of, 151–152
Babylon in, 72 bilingual character of, 150–151 content of, 149–150
date of, 151
in Dead Sea Scrolls, 150–151 diaspora outlook of, 151
eschatology and, 193
Hasideans and, 151–152
Jerusalem Temple and, 151
Maccabees and, 151
Masoretic text of, 150
Near Eastern politics and, 151
Pharisees and, 152
Prayer of Azariah and, 68 prediction of the future, 152 prophecy and, 151
Qumranites, 152
Song of the Three Young Men and, 68
Son of man in, 712
Susanna and, 720 symbolic interpretation and, 152 in Theodotion, 150
timetable in apocalyptic scenario and, 152 traditions of, in Septuagint, 150 unity and language of, 150–151 war and, 792
wisdom and, 149
Zealots and, 152

Dante
Bible and Divine Comedy, 449
Daric (coin), 523
Darius, 152–153
book of Ezra and, 219, 220
Esdras and, 194
history of, 152
monotheism and, 153
political administration of, 152 reconstruction of the Temple and, 153 religion of, 153
Darkness
as Egyptian plague, 596 Darwin, Charles
science and the Bible and, 683
Data bases for biblical study, 129 Dating extrabiblical information and, 118 theoretical chronology and, 118 Dating systems from datum point of creation, 117 modern Jewish reckoning of, 117 regnal years of kings and, 117
Seleucid era and, 117
David, 30, 70, 76, 96, 153–156, 251, 415, 675, 676
Absalom and, 153
altar and, 22
Ammonites and, 23
Aram and, 45
ark and, 55
as author of Psalms, 626 books of Chronicles and, 114–116
as chosen by God, 110
conflicting traditions about, 154–155 conquest of land and, 619
covenant and, 139
depiction of, in art, 60
early history of, 153
Edom and, 179
eschatology and, 192
forces of, capturing Jerusalem, 11 Goliath and, 153, 324
history of Israel and, 330
introduction of, into royal court, 680
Jerusalem and, 153, 349
Jesus and, 154, 245
and kingship in Israel, 154 and Messiah, 154
in Muslim tradition, 639
and Nathan the prophet, 153, 324, 549
in New Testament, 155
Ophel and, 52
oracle of Balaam and, 73 relation of, to Bethlehem, 78 relation of, to the Philistines, 153 relation of Saul and, 153, 680 in Samuel and Kings, 153–154 theme of, in book of Ruth, 663–664 tribe of Judah and, 388 and united monarchy, 51
Zion and, 830
David and Goliath irony and, 324
David and Nathan irony and, 324
Davidic dynasty, 267
Jesus and, 360
Davidic savior
book of Isaiah and, 326

Davids, Peter H., as contributor, 339-340, 340-342
Davidson, Robert, as contributor, 343-347
Day of Atonement, 88, 89, 156, 228, 276
Azazel and, 69
incense and, 301
repentance and, 646
rites for, 156 synagogue liturgy and, 156 Day of Judgment, 156-157 and Day of the Lord, 156 in early Judaism, 156-157
in 2 Esdras, 157 foreign influence on, 156
in Hebrew Bible, 156 and later Christian tradition, 157
in New Testament, 157
and rebel angels, 156-157 and Son of man, 157
vengeance and, 788
on Yom Kippur, 156
Day of the Lord, 157-158
Day of the Son of man and, 158
Elijah and, 183
eschatology and, 192 images associated with, 158
Twelve and, 158
Zephaniah and, 828-829
Deacon, 158. See also Seven, The as general term for minister, 158 Jesus as servant and, 158
in the Pastoral letters, 158 Phoebe as, 158 qualifications of, 158 Deacons bishops and, 91
Lord's Supper and, 158
the Seven and, 689
women as, 815-816
Dead Sea, 251-252
Dead Sea Scrolls, 159-160. See also Qumran apocalyptic material in, 35 apocryphal and pseudepigraphical works in, 37, 159, 630
archaeology and, 47
biblical manuscripts and, 159-160, 487
book of Jeremiah and, 344-345 chapter and verse division in biblical text, 105 crucifixion and 4QpNah, 142 crucifixion and Temple Scroll, 142 dating of, 159
discovery of, at Qumran, 636
Enoch literature and, 185
Essenes and, 159, 198, 393-394
Exodus and, 211
Gospel of John and, 374
Hebrew language and, 271
Hebrews and, 276
illness and, 508-509
Masoretic text and, 160, 501
Melchizedek and, 511
Messiah and, 514
order of biblical books and, 99
pesharim, 305
Prayer of Nabonidus, 45 prayers in the, 607
Qumran and, 159
Samaritan Pentateuch and, 160
Samuel and Chronicles, 114
scribes and, 685
Septuagint and, 160
sin and, 696
Sirach and, 698
Son of God in, 710
as source for Judaisms of the first century, 392
targums and, 754
Torah and, 748
types of compositions in, 159
War Scroll, 792
writing material of, 94
Death, 88, 160-161, 295. See also Afterlife and Immortality; Burial customs afterlife and, 15 apocalyptic thinking and, 161 baptism and, 160
as combatant, 160 customs related to, 15 hope for resurrection and, 160-161
of Jesus, 160, 667
mourning and, 531
in prophetic and wisdom literature, 160 in Psalms, 160
as punishment, 10, 160 and resurrection, 87 suicide and, 161 wishes, 161
Debir, 47
Deborah, 161
in book of Judges, 398
Issachar and, 336
as judge, 161
as military leader, 161 women in family life and, 161 Debt
slavery and, 700
de Bury, Richard and English literature and the Bible, 439
Decalogue. See Ten Commandments Decapolis, 125, 161-162, 242 archaeology and cities of the, 162 cosmopolitan milieu of, 162 list of cities of, 162 Dedication feast of, 228
Defoe, Daniel and spiritual autobiography, 443 Deir 'Allā, 72 inscription from, 51
de Leon, Moses as compiler of Zohar, 309
Delobel, Joël, as contributor, 17-18
Demon(s), 162-163, 611
Azazel and, 69
as cause of spiritual and physical maladies, 162, 509
epilepsy and, 191
exorcism and, 216
human behavior and, 162 incense and, 301
Jesus and, 162
and Messiah, 163
in New Testament, 162
as servants of Satan, 162 wilderness and, 798
Denarius (coin), 523-524
Dentan, Robert C., as contributor, 37-39, 68-69, 75-76, 77, 194-195, 347-348, 485-486, 720-721 Deportation of Israel, 64
Deportations
Assyria and, 63
de Preales, Raoul as biblical translator, 756 Derrett, J. Duncan M., as contributor, 463, 745 de Saussure, Ferdinand
structuralism and, 716
Descent into Hell, 163
Enoch and, 163
Greek mythology and, 163
Near Eastern mythology and, 163
in New Testament, 163
in 1 Peter, 585
in psalms of Qumran, 163 Destiny, human
Ecclesiastes and, 177
Deutero-Isaiah, 163, 327. See also Isaiah, The Book of Deuterocanonical books, 629
Apocrypha and, 38
book of Judith as, 399-400
book of Tobit as, 745
Eastern Orthodoxy and, 174
Prayer of Azariah as, 68
Sirach as, 697
Song of the Three Young Men and, 68
Deuteronomic historian
Jehu and, 343
Deuteronomic history, 19, 84, 163-164, 410-411
book of Joshua and, 385
book of Judges and, 397, 399
books of Kings as part of, 674-675 books of Samuel as part of, 674-675
Elijah and, 182
Elisha and, 183
eunuchs in, 205
Manasseh and, 485 relation of, to traditions in the Pentateuch, 164 relation of Deuteronomy to, 165 suffering and, 718
Deuteronomic school and book of Ezra, 221
Deuteronomic style book of Jeremiah and, 346
Deuteronomic theology
Sirach and, 699
Deuteronomistic History. See Deuteronomic History Deuteronomy, The Book of, 47, 164-168
audience of, 165 authorship and readership of, 167 content of, 164-165
covenant and, 138, 139
crucifixion and, 142
D as author of, 147
date of composition of, 165-166
and Deuteronomic History, 165 distinctive features of, 166-167 foreigners and, 166 influence of, on Jeremiah, 167

Deuteronomy, The Book of (cont.)
Jerusalem and, 166
oral teaching and, 167 purity of worship and, 166 regulation of worship and, 166 religious reformers and, 167
significance of, 167–168
sources of, 165
speeches of Moses in, 164 spiritual inwardness and, 166 Torah as concern of, 164 views of prophecy of, 167
Dever, William G., 47
Devil, 88, 679. See also Satan
Dhiban
Moabite Stone and, 522
Diachronic interpretation
structuralism and, 716
Dialogue of the Savior, 40
Diana of the Ephesians. See Artemis Diaspora, The, 391–392. See also Dispersion book of Esther and, 198
book of Tobit and, 745
Pharisees and, 392
as place of origin of proselytes, 623
Samaritan, 673
Diatribe
wisdom literature and, 802
Dibelius, Martin, 8
Dickinson, Emily biblical allusions and, 457 Didache
canon of scripture and, 103
Didrachma (coin), 524
Didymus the Blind
biblical interpretation and, 313 Dietary rules meals and, 506–507
significance of, during exile, 619
Di Lella, Alexander A., O.F.M., as contributor, 697–699
Dilthey, Wilhelm, 280
Dinah, 168
Diodore
biblical interpretation and, 313
Diodorus Siculus
crucifixion and, 141
Dionysius Exiguus
chronology and, 119
Disciple, 168–169
in the gospels, 168–169 portrayal of, in Matthew, 169 and the Twelve, 168 Disciples
as appellation of Christians, 111
as chosen, 110
of Jesus, 168–169
Disciples, seventy names of, 547
Disease(s) in the Bible, 508 causes of, 510 ritual purity and, 510
Dispensation. See Covenant Dispensationalism and biblical interpretation, 684
Dispersion, 169. See also Exile
Assyrian conquest and, 169 attitude toward, in Judith, 169
Deuteronomy and, 168
in 597, 587/586 BCE, 169
in the New Testament, 169
Dispute wisdom literature and, 802
Dives, 169
Divided monarchy, 619
archaeology and, 52
Divination. See Magic and Divination Divine Comedy and apocryphal apocalypses, 41
Divine Council
angels and, 27–28
and authority of the Bible, 66
Divine warrior theophany and, 740
Divine will priests and, 609
Divino afflante spiritu, 763
biblical interpretation and, 323
Divorce, 169–171
adultery and, 10, 170 attitude of Hillelites toward, 170 attitude of Shammaites toward, 170 in Deuteronomy, 170 expense of, 170 fornication and, 232
Jesus and, 170, 357
laws dealing with, 170 in Leviticus, 170
Paul and, 171
Pharisees and, 170
remarriage and, 170
women and, 808
Dix, T. Keith, as contributor, 93–95
Documentary Theory, 580
Dodd, C. H., 570
Domitian book of Revelation and, 653
Donatello
Aqedah and, 44
depiction of the resurrection, 59 Donkey transport and, 749
Doré, Gustave
and Bible illustration, 299
Dostoyevsky, Fyodor, 453
Dothan
archaeology and, 47, 49
Douai-Rheims Bible. See Rheims-Douai Bible
Douglas, Mary, 633
Douglass, Frederick, 13
Dowry
marriage and, 795
Doxologies
and blessing, 92
Drachma (coin), 524 Dragon
equated with Satan, 679
Drane, John W., as contributor, 576–579 Dream interpretation
Joseph and, 383
Qumran pesharim and, 305 Dreams, 171
apocalyptic literature and, 34
Daniel stories and, 171
E and, 173
false dreamers and, 171 in Greek world, 171 interpreters and, 171 Joseph stories and, 171
in New Testament, 171
Paul and, 171
revelation and, 650
as vehicles of revelation, 171 Driver, Samuel Rolles
biblical interpretation and, 322
Drunkenness, 171–172
Lord's Supper and, 172
nations as victims of, 172
in New Testament, 172
of Noah, 171
and second coming, 172 as theme in prophetic writings, 171–172 Dualism, 246
incarnation and, 301
Du Perron, Cardinal, 602
Dura-Europos
Aqedah and, 44
art at, 56
Christian art at, 56
synagogue at, 56
Dürer, Albrecht, 59
Durham, John I., as contributor, 212–216
Du Toit, Andrie B., as contributor, 102–104 Duumvir, 9
Dyeing, 126
Dynamic equivalence translation, 751

E, 173
as pentateuchal source, 580
Ea/Enki, 558
Eadwine Psalter, 756 Early Bronze Age
dates of, 50
Early Catholicism
Ephesians and, 187
Early Christianity
women in, 814–818
Easter, 90, 173–174, 288
Eastern Orthodoxy and the Bible, 174–176 canon and authority of the Bible, 174–175 ecclesial authority and biblical authority, 175 life of the individual and, 175–176 worship of the church and, 175–176
Ebed-melek, 11
Ebeling, Gerhard, 280
Ebla, 5, 176
Eblaite language, 176
Ecclesiastes, The Book of, 176–178
Epicureans and, 190
Gilgamesh and, 254
unity of authorship and, 177 Ecclesiastical doctrine and authority of the Bible, 66–67
Ecclesiasticus. See Sirach Ecclesiology, 89
in Ephesians, 187
Ecology. See Nature and Ecology Ecumenical councils
Eastern Orthodoxy and, 175
Eddy, Mary Baker and Christian Science, 111–112
Eden, The Garden of, 178, 223 expulsion of Adam and Eve from, 246 location of sources of Nile River, 11, 178 paradise and, 570

Edict of Cyrus, 145, 220
Edict of Milan, 56
Edom, 178–179, 252
in book of Obadiah, 564
Esau as ancestor of, 27 and the exodus, 51
oracle against, in Ezekiel, 218
Edomites
Amorites and, 24
Esau and, 192
Education
the Bible and, 108
Efird, James M., as contributor, 252–253, 669, 721 Egerton Papyrus
and date of John, 375
Egypt, 4, 31, 32, 48, 179–182, 248–249
and afterlife, 15
Amarna Letters and, 22
archaeology and, 46 cities of, 124
doom of, in Ezekiel, 218 geographical isolation of, 179
history of, 180
idols of, 297
language of, 180
plagues in, 595–596
religion of, 181
ruled by Ptolemies, 20
Egypt Exploration Fund, 48
Egyptian empire Canaan as province of, 98
Egyptian Execration Texts and name of Jerusalem, 349
Ehrlich, Carl S., as contributor, 46, 107, 190, 253, 366, 421–423, 511, 557–558, 565, 591–592, 692–693 Ehud
in book of Judges, 78, 397
Eichhorn, Johann Gottfried
biblical interpretation and, 322
Eichler, Barry L., as contributor, 491–492, 563
Eichrodt, Walter, 82, 83
Eight
symbolism of number, 562
Ekallate, 63
Ekklesia, 89, 121
Eastern Orthodoxy and, 175
synagogue and, 121
El and Abraham, 5
and Israelite religion, 333
names compounded with, 548–549
El-Amarna
Amarna Letters and, 22
El-Bethel, 548
Eldad and Modad, 630
Elder, 182
Elders of Ephesian church, 8 Eleazar
Maccabees and, 481
Elect, the, 89. See also Chosen People; Predestination; Saints Election, 110. See also Chosen People; Predestination; Saint Electronic texts, 129
El Elyon, 548
Elephantine
Aramaic language and, 45
Elephantine papyri, 53
Elhanan as slayer of Goliath, 258
Eli, 77, 675
Elijah, 15, 30, 182–183, 411–413, 621
ascension and, 61
conversion and, 133
Jericho and, 348
Elisha, 30, 183–184, 411–413, 621
conversion and, 133
Jericho and, 348
Elohim
as name of God, 548
E and, 173
Elohist. See E
Elohistic psalter, 626
Eloi, Eloi, Lema Sabachthani, 184
El Olam, 548
El Shaddai, 548
Embalming, 96
Emerson, Ralph Waldo biblical themes and, 456
Emerton, J. A., as contributor, 45–46, 271–273, 548–549, 738
Emmanuel. See Immanuel Emperor, 184
Empty-tomb narratives resurrection and, 648
End of the world
eschatology and, 192
End, the apocalyptic literature and, 36
End-time events, 193
Endogamy, 496–497 and sexual behavior, 690
English Common Law
and European legal tradition, 425
English Geneva Version, 613
English Literature. See Literature and the Bible Enki of Eridu, 71
Enkidu, 254
Enlil, 71, 163
Enoch and the Books of Enoch, 15, 35, 184–185, 238, 630
Apocrypha and, 39
Aramaic, 185
ascension and, 61
connection of, with Day of Judgment, 156
1 Enoch (Ethiopic), 35, 69, 184–185, 630
2 Enoch (Slavonic), 35, 185, 630
3 Enoch (Hebrew), 185
Greek, 185
letter of Jude and, 396
Enuma Elish, 50
myth and, 540
Epaphras and church at Colossae, 128
Ephah, 796
Ephesians, The Letter of Paul to the, 185–189 date and authorship, 186–188 highlights and influence, 188–189 structure and contents, 185–186 style of, 186 theology of, 187–188
Ephesus, 9, 189
Apollos in, 41
archaeology and, 54
Artemis and, 60–61
as capital of Asia, 62, 124
church at, 182
Gospel of John and, 375
letters of John and, 380
Paul in, 135, 136
Pauline activity in, 186
Ephod, 189
as cult object, 298
magic and, 484
teraphim and, 738
Ephraim, 6, 78, 190
in Hosea, 291
Ephraimi, Codex. See Codex Ephraimi
Ephraim of Bonn, 43
Epicureans, 190
Epicurus, 190
Epilepsy, 190–191
exorcism and, 217
Epiphany
Christmas and, 112
Epistle. See Letter-writing in Antiquity Epistle of the Apostles, 40
Epistle of Titus, 41
Epistles of Christ and Abgar, 41
Equestrians
in Roman empire, 657–658
Equinox, spring
Easter and, 173
Erasmus, 171
biblical interpretation and, 317, 322
Errors, typographical curious Bibles and, 143
Esarhaddon, 64, 71
Esau, 83, 191–192
Edom and, 178
in Genesis, 248
Jacob and, 27, 643
Eschatological expectation
apocalyptic literature and, 36
and chronology, 119
Eschatology, 90, 192–194
in book of Obadiah, 564
consistent, 193 corporate, and 2 Esdras, 197 inaugurated, 193 individual and, 197 inheritance and, 302
Jerusalem and, 354
mystery and, 538 prophetic, 192 realized, 193 2 Thessalonians and, 742
war and, 792
Zechariah and, 827–828
Esdras, The Books of, 194–198
apocalyptic literature and, 35
as apocryphal books, 38 day of judgment and 2 Esdras, 157
1 Esdras, 194–195
2 Esdras (B), 194–195
5 Esdras, 196
unity of 1 Esdras, 194 value for the general reader, 197–198
Essenes, 159, 198, 393–394
biblical interpretation and, 66, 310
canon of scripture and, 102
Hasideans and, 588
Josephus and, 383
name of, 198
Essenism, 276

Esther, Additions to the book of. See Additions to the Book of Esther Esther, The Book of, 198–201
Hebrew, 198–200
portrayal of women in, 812–813
Purim and, 228
Etemenanki
Ziggurat at, 830
Ethical lists, 172, 201–202
Ethical teaching in Colossians, 129
Ecclesiastes and, 177
Sermon on the Mount and, 687
Ethics, 202–205
in the New Testament, 204–205
prophets and, 203–204
Torah and, 202–203
wisdom literature and, 204
Ethiopia, 11
as Cush, 145
Ethiopian church
canon of scripture and, 104
Ethiopian eunuch, 74
Ethiopic Apocalypse of Enoch, 35
Ethiopic Enoch. See Enoch and the Books of Enoch Ethnarch. See Tetrarch Eucharist, 89. See also Lord's Supper and cup of blessing, 92
depiction of, in art, 57
and kingdom of God, 90
love and, 468
Eunuch, 171, 205–206
Euphrates River, 206
garden of Eden and, 178
European Literature. See Literature and the Bible Eusebius, 8
canon of scripture and, 103
chapter and verse divisions of Gospels in, 106
Essenes in, 198
Evangelist, 206
Evangelists
depiction of, in art, 58
Eve, 10, 206–207. See also Adam Everyday Expressions from the Bible, 207–208
Evil, 208–209
God as the source of, 208 problem of, 86
Evil One, 208 Evil spirits
exorcism and, 216
Evil-merodach, 72
Evolution, 683
fundamentalism and, 237
Genesis creation story and, 10 religious controversy about, 683
Ewert, David, as contributor, 68, 788 Execution
crucifixion and, 141–142
Exegesis
Alexandrian school of, 637 by early Christians, 637 by Philo of Alexandria, 637
by Qumran community, 637
Exile, 209. See also Babylonian exile Babylonian, 267
eschatology and, 192
longing to return to land and, 619 Exiles return of, 169
Exilic literature, 209
Exodus, The, 12, 22, 209–212, 214–215 allusions to, 211–212
archaeology and, 51
book of Amos and, 25
book of Isaiah and, 328
chronology of, 117
commemoration of, 225–226
covenant and, 139
crossing of Red Sea and, 644–645
date of, 51
and Egyptian history, 181 historical context of, 209–210
manna and, 486
Moses and, 528–529
narratives of, 210–211
new, 327
Passover and, 571–573
political image of, 600–601 route of, 51
Second Isaiah and, 327
slavery and, 700
Torah and, in Old Testament theology, 83 tradition, 86
and Wisdom of Solomon, 804 Exodus, The Book of, 212–216 composition and compilation, 214–215 literary structure, 213–214 sources in, 213–214
theology of, 215–216
Exogamy, 496–497
Exorcism, 163, 216–217
eschatology and, 217
in Hebrew Bible, 216
Jesus and, 358
Expiation, 88 day of, 228
rites of, 228
Extracanonical sayings of Jesus. See Agrapha Eye of the Needle. See Needle's Eye Ezekiel (person), 85 in Babylon, 72
epilepsy and, 191
Ezekiel, The Book of, 217–219 anthropology, 219 arrangement/divisions, 217–218 author, 217 biblical affinities, 219 idolatry and, 298 literary features, 218 theology, 218–219
Ezion-geber, 47
Ezra (person)
ascension and, 61
and books of Chronicles, 115
Nehemiah and, 219
Ezra and Nehemiah (books) and books of Chronicles, 115
unity of, 116
Ezra, Confessions of, 196
Ezra, The Book of, 219–221 author, composition, and sources, 221
Esdras and, 194
historical background, 219–220 theology, 221
4 Ezra as 2 Esdras, 195
Faith, 222–223. See also Justification in/of Christ, 222
in Galatians, 239
in Gospel of John, 223
Hebrew words translated by, 222
James and Paul and, 341 justification by, 655–656
in Paul, 222–223, 266
in synoptic Gospels, 223
in theology of Paul, 578
translation of, in Greek, 222
Fall, The, 223. See also Adam Augustine and, 223
of divine beings, 223 expulsion from paradise and, 223 in gnosticism, 256
in the New Testament, 223
suffering and, 223
Fallen angels, 163
Falwell, Jerry, 237 Family, 223–224
as analogy for relationship between God and Israel, 224 authority of father in, 223 church and, 224 extended, 223 household codes and, 224
marriage and, 223
in New Testament, 224
as paradigm for human community, 247
Passover and, 223
respect for parents in, 223–224 in teachings of Jesus, 224 understanding of, in ancient Israel, 223 Family Bible, 108, 224–225, 614 family devotion and, 224 influence of vernacular translations on, 224 invention of printing and, 224 as preserver of family records, 224 as source of social and religious history, 224 Fara
archaeology and, 50
Fasting, 225 days of, 225 differences between disciples and Jesus and John on, 225
in early Christianity, 225
Messiah and, 225
origin of Lenten, 225
in Paul, 225
Pharisees and, 225
reasons for, 225 teaching of Jesus and, 225
Father
Lord's Prayer and, 464
Father, God as Jesus and, 358
and son of God, 710–711 Father Divine and Peace Mission Movement, 14
Fatherhood of God, 87
Faulkner, William, 606 Fear, 225
of God, 225
relation of, to Son of man, 225 Fear of Isaac as epithet for God, 225

Feast of Booths, 18
Feast of Unleavened Bread, 166
Feast of Weeks, 18, 581 Feasts and Festivals, 225–228 agriculture and, 18 calendar and, 225–228 celebration of, at central sanctuary, 226–227 pilgrimage, 226–228
Federal (National) Council of Churches of Christ, 236 Feeding the multitudes
 Lord's Supper and, 467
Feeley-Harnik, Gillian, as contributor, 469, 506–507
Female Bible Society of Geneva, 81 Feminism and the Bible, 228–231 areas of inquiry in, 229–231
 Bible translation and, 230 and biblical authority, 230–231 hermeneutical options and, 230
 history of, 228–229
 portrait of God and, 229–230
Fensham, F. Charles, as contributor, 219–221, 553–555 Fenton, Ferrar
 as Bible translator, 760
Fertility
 water and, 793
Festivals. See Feasts and Festivals Fields, John and errors in Bible, 143
Finger (measure), 796
Firstborn, 266 death of, as Egyptian plague, 596 inheritance and, 302
First Jewish Revolt
 Zealots and, 825–826
First Peter. See Peter Fish salting of, and Sea of Galilee, 242 Fishbane, Michael
 and history of Israel, 335
Fisher, Clarence S., 46
Fitzmyer, Joseph A., S.J., as contributor, 469–474, 603–604 Five
 symbolism of number, 562
Flaubert, Gustave, 453
Flax
 and clothing, 126
Fleming, Daniel E., as contributor, 147, 206, 557, 779–781
Flesh, 295–296
Flesh and Spirit, 231 body/soul dichotomy and, 231
 meaning of, 231
 in New Testament, 231
Flies
 as Egyptian plague, 596
Flood, The, 231–232, 793 ancient stories about, 231 Babylonian stories about, 231
 chronology of, 117 covenant with Noah and, 232 Epic of Atrahasis and, 231 Epic of Gilgamesh and, 231, 254
 in Genesis, 246
 historicity of, 231–232
 Mesopotamian literature and, 50
 myth and, 55
 Noah ark and, 46, 55, 557–558 rainbow and, 642 remnant and, 646
 Sumerian story, 719
Folktales book of Judith as, 400
 book of Tobit and, 746
 creation and, 141
 Esau and, 192
Food imagery of, in the Bible, 506 Footwear, 127
Foreskin
 circumcision and, 123–124
Forgiveness, 232. See also Mercy of God in the Lord's Prayer, 232 meaning of, 232
 metaphors for, 232
Form criticism, 323
Former Prophets
 and order of biblical books, 99
Fornication, 232
 as justification for divorce, 232 warnings against, in New Testament, 232 Fortress Antonia, 53 Forty
 symbolism of number, 562–563
Foscarini, Paolo Antonio, 682 Four
 symbolism of number, 562
Fourth Gospel. See John, The Gospel According to Fourth Philosophy, 394
Francis of Assisi literature and, 448
Frankincense, 232, 301, 542. See also Myrrh; Incense Fraser, J. O.
 as Bible translator, 774
Fredriksen, Paula, as contributor, 423–424, 467–469, 646–647
Free, Joseph, 49
Freed, Edwin D., as contributor, 20–21, 110–111, 395, 427–428, 551–552 Free-will offering corban and, 134
Frerichs, Ernest S., as contributor, 108–109
Fresco painting, 56, 57, 58
Freud, Sigmund, 232–236, 280 attitude toward Bible, 233–234 exposure of, to traditional Judaism, 233 and Moses, 234–235 use of the Bible by, 234
Freyne, Seán, as contributor, 240–242, 592–594 Friedlander, Michael
 as Bible translator, 763 Friesen, Steven, as contributor, 3, 238, 343 Fringes, 236
Froelich, Karlfried, as contributor, 310–315 Frogs
 as Egyptian plague, 596
Fuchs, Ernst, 280
Fuller, Reginald H., as contributor, 87–91, 356–366, 647–649
Fuller, Russell, as contributor, 10, 43, 163–164, 407–408, 496–497, 545–546, 829
Fullers, 140
Fundamentalism, 236–237
 and American religion and politics, 237
 authority of the Bible and, 67, 236 and ban on prayer in public schools, 236 conservative Protestantism and, 236–237 enemies of Christianity and, 236 impulse toward separatism of, 236
 inerrancy and, 303
 personal piety and, 236 premillennialism of, 236 repudiation of modern biblical criticism by, 236 Funerary offerings, 15, 16
Furniture. See Houses, Furniture, Utensils

Gabbatha
 Aramaic and, 46
Gabriel, 238
 archangel, 54
 Qur'an and, 638
Gad, 238
 as foreign deity, 238
Gadamer, Hans-Georg, 280
Gadara, 125
Gadites settlement of, 238
Gagnan, Emile, 49
Galatians, The Letter of Paul to the, 238–240 and Acts, 239
 authorship of, 239
 circumcision and, 238
 date of, 239–240
 Gnosticism and, 240
 law and, 239 liberty and, 239
 Paul's opponents in, 240 recipients of, 239
 Zealots and, 240
Galatians (people), 239
Galilee, 240–242, 251
 agriculture in, 251
 Aramaic in, 45 association of Jesus with, 241–242 fertility of, 241 and First Jewish Revolt, 241 gentiles in, 241 in Hellenistic period, 241
 history of, 240–241
 Jewish presence in, 241
 Jewish scribal schools in, 241 rainfall in, 251 tribes allotted territory in, 240 under Roman rule, 241
 Zealots and, 241
Galilee, Sea of, 242, 252 commercial importance of, 242
 in the gospels, 242
Galileo science and the Bible and, 682
Gallio, 9
 Corinth and, 134
Gallio inscription, 54, 135

Gamaliel, Rabbi, 242–243, 576
in Acts, 242–243
Aramaic and, 46
Gamla, 53
Ganymede
ascension and, 61
Gaon, Saadiah
biblical interpretation and, 309
Gaon, Sherira
exegetical norms of, 308 Garden of Eden. See Eden, The Garden of Gardens of Epicurus, 65
Garvey Movement
African American traditions and, 14
Gaza
Amarna Letters and, 22
art and, 56
Gedaliah, 53
Gedrosian desert, 19
Gehazi
as servant of Elisha, 184
Gehenna, 3, 243, 277
Jewish apocalypticism and, 243
in Muslim tradition, 638
in New Testament, 243
as place of punishment, 243 valley of Hinnom and, 243 Genealogies, 243–245
chronology and, 117
in Hebrew Bible, 243–245 importance of, in Genesis 1–11, 243–244
in New Testament, 245
in P, 567
Genealogy books of Chronicles and, 113
of Jesus, 245
as a literary genre, 244
General Bible Society, 81
Genesis, The Book of, 245–249. See also Adam creation in, 246 development of, 246–247 historicity and, 246–247
Jacob in, 248
oral traditions in, 247 Genesis Apocryphon, 45, 630
apocalyptic literature and, 35
Geneva Bible, 143, 617, 759 error in, 143 Genre of gospel, 258–259
Gentiles, 20, 74, 249–259
Apostolic Council and, 42–43
in Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, 250 conversion of, in Christianity, 6, 250 conversion of, in Judaism, 249 early Christian views of, 250
in Ephesians, 186, 188
Jewish reactions to, 249–250 and Jonah, 249 marriage to, 249
and promise to Abraham, 249
Geography of Palestine, 250–252
George, St., and the dragon, 77
Gerah, 797
Gerar, 5
Gerasa (modern Jerash), 125 exorcism of demoniac, 217 synagogue art at, 56 Gerizim, Mount in Samaritan tradition, 672 Gestures, 252–253
mourning and, 253
in prayer, 252–253
Gethsemane, 253, 564
Jesus and, 359
Gezer, 52, 253, 284
Amarna Letters and, 22, 253
archaeology and, 47, 253
history of, 253
identification of, 47
Gezer Calendar, 271
Ghiberti
Aqedah and, 44
Giants
Enoch and, 185
Gibeah
archaeology and, 52
Gibeah
men of, 77
Gibeon
archaeology and, 49
identification of, 47 winery at, 799 Gideon, 253, 414
in book of Judges, 398 golden ephod and, 189 Gideons, The Bible distribution and, 253–254
Gift. See Corban
Gignac, Francis T., as contributor, 262–263
Gilboa, battle of, 331, 388 Gilgal, 680
book of Joshua and, 386
Gilgamesh, Epic of, 48, 50, 55, 254–255, 558
Adam and, 254 biblical flood story and, 231, 254 death and, 160, 254
Ecclesiastes and, 254
myth and, 540
triumph over evil and, 254 Giotto, 59
Glassmaking, 140
Glasson, Taomas Francis, as contributor, 5–6, 270–271 Glory of God, 254–255, 267
in gospel of John, 255
holiness and, 254
in Paul, 254–255
wisdom and, 255
Glossolalia, 89, 255
1 Corinthians and, 136
as manifestation of the Holy Spirit, 255
in New Testament, 255
Pentecost and, 582
Glueck, Nelson, 47, 51
Gnats
as Egyptian plague, 596
Gnostic gospels
Agrapha and, 17–18
Gnostic literature
Melchizedek and, 511–512
Gnosticism, 255–256, 543–544
book of Revelation and, 652
characteristics of, 256
1 and 2 Corinthians and, 135, 138
and Ephesians, 186–187
and Galatians, 240
gospel of John and, 256 influence of, on New Testament, 256 1 John and, 377 knowledge and, 255 origins of, 255–256, 544
wisdom literature and, 803
women in, 816
Gnostics, 255–256
ascension and, 62
baptism and, 62
biblical interpretation and, 279, 312
canon of scripture and, 102, 103
letter of Jude and, 397
as opponents in 2 Peter, 587 Goats
Azazel and, 69
God in ancestral religion, 248 as creator and lord of history, 87 designated as "holy," 668 doctrine of, 87
glory of, 254–255
in gnosticism, 256 as king, 408 as parent, 85 in Priestly tradition, 254 in Yahwist tradition, 254 God-fearers as disputed technical term, 623
God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, 87 God's presence tabernacle and, 730
Goddu, André L., as contributor, 684
Gog, 256–257
Magog and, 256
Golan Heights
archaeology and, 47
Golden calf, 216, 257, 261
Aaron and, 257
idolatry and, 297
Jeroboam and, 257
Moses and, 529
in Near Eastern art, 257 Golden Rule, 257–258
in Didache, 258
Jesus and, 257
in New Testament, 257–258
Rabbi Hillel and, 257
Sermon on the Mount and, 688
Golgotha, 258
Aramaic and, 45
as burial place of Adam, 258 location of, 350–351 tomb of Jesus and, 258 Goliath, 258
in Dead Sea Scrolls, 258
in Septuagint, 258
Gomer, 290–292
Gomorrah. See Sodom and Gomorrah Good news evangelist and, 206
Good News for Modern Man, 762
Good, Edwin M., as contributor, 535–538 Goodspeed, Edgar J.
as Bible translator, 761
Gordon, Cyrus H., as contributor, 176, 254
Gordon, Robert P., as contributor, 754–755

Gospel, genre, 258–259
aretalogy and, 259 biographical literature and, 259 Hellenistic literature and, 259 kerygma and, 259
Gospel of Bartholomew, 40 Gospel of Josephus, 41
Gospel of Nicodemus, 40 Gospel of Philip, 544
Gospel of the Ebionites, 40 Gospel of the Egyptians, 544
Gospel of the Hebrews, 40 Gospel of the Nazarenes, 40 Gospel of Thomas, 40, 554
and Agrapha, 18
Gospel of Truth, 543–544
Gospels, 87
form and content of, 258 literary relations among synoptic, 259
sources of, 356
Gospels
apocryphal, 39–40
gnostic, 40 Gottwald, Norman and social sciences, 703 Governors, Roman authority of, 659
concerns of, 658–659 role of, 659
Gozan, 52
Grünewald, Mathias, 59, 60
Grace, 259–261
covenant and, 139
Ezekiel and, 219
as gift of Jesus Christ, 261
God's, 260
Hebrew and Greek words for, 260 in liturgical passages, 260 Graham, Billy, 237 Grain harvest festival and, 227 Graven images, 261–262 and emperor worship, 261
Great Bible, The, 613, 617, 759
Grech, Prosper, as contributor, 92
Greek, 262–263
alphabet, 21 Attic dialect of, 262 biblical, 263 early dialectic, 262
history of, 262–263
Koine, 262–263
Greek Apocalypse of Baruch, 35 Greek Bible
and order of biblical books, 99–100 Greek New Testament
date of manuscripts of, 488 editions of, 490 identification of manuscripts of, 488–489 important manuscripts of, 489–490 minuscule manuscripts of, 488–489 uncial manuscripts of, 488–489
Greene, Joseph A., as contributor, 24, 44, 44–45, 232, 428–429, 490–491, 538, 553, 707
Gregorian chant, 535
Gregory I, Pope
music and, 535
Gregory of Nyssa
biblical interpretation and, 313
Gregory of Tours, 40
Greimas, A. J.
structuralism and, 716
Griesbach, J. J. and synoptic problem, 725, 727 Grotius, Hugo
biblical interpretation and, 322
Guardians of Paradise, 107
Guelich, Robert A., as contributor, 257–258, 687–689
Guilt offering, 667
Gunkel, Hermann, 626–629
biblical interpretation and, 323
Gunn, David M., as contributor, 153–156, 679–681
Gutenberg, Johannes Gensfleisch, 263–264, 611 Gutenberg Bible, 263–264, 299, 611
and circulation of the Bible, 122
Vulgate and, 790
Güttgemanns, Erhardt
structuralism and, 717
Gutzlaff, Karl
as Bible translator, 774

Habakkuk (prophet), 265–266
Habakkuk, The Book of, 77, 265–266 quoted by Paul, 266 and writing materials, 94
Habiru, 51
Hackett, Jo Ann, as contributor, 168, 368, 428, 517, 520–521, 693, 825
Hadad, 70
Edom and, 179
Hades, 163, 243, 277. See also Hell; Sheol
Hagar, 26, 266, 678
in Paul, 266
Sarah and, 266
Haggai (prophet), 266–267
Haggai, The Book of, 266–267
and book of Ezra, 219
eschatology and, 192
Hail
as Egyptian plague, 596
Halaka, 310
Midrash and, 305
Hallel psalms sung at Passover, 572–573 Hallelujah, 267–268
in the New Testament, 267–268
Hallo, William W., as contributor, 71–72, 719–720, 820–823
Halpern, Baruch, as contributor, 416, 524–527
Ham, 268
as Hebrew term for dark-skinned people, 11 as synonym for Egypt, 11 Ham/Canaan cursing of, 268 Haman in book of Esther, 199
Hamath, 63
Hamitic language, 180
Hammer, Raymond, as contributor, 65–68
Hammerschlag, Samuel, 233
Hammond, Philip C., as contributor, 21–22, 542–543 Hammurabi. See Hammurapi.
Hammurapi, 5, 71, 268–269
archaeology and, 49
Code of, 50 law and, 421
Hananiah
book of Jeremiah and, 347
Handbreadth, 796
Hands, Laying on of. See Laying on of Hands
Hanson, Anthony Tyrrell, as contributor, 636–638, 783–784 Hanukkah, 228
Maccabees and, 228, 476
practices associated with, 228 Hanun, 23
Hapax legomena
in Colossians, 127
Hapiru. See 'apiru
Haran, 50, 64
Hardening of Heart, 269
Hare, Douglas R. A., as contributor, 231, 645 Harlotry
as metaphor, 691 Harmonization
as obstacle to criticism, 319
Harrelson, Walter, as contributor, 736–738
Harvest festival, 227, 550
Hasideans
Essenes and, 198
Judas Maccabeus and, 479
Pharisees and, 588
Hasmoneans, 228, 281
high priesthood and, 611
Jericho and, 348
1 Maccabees and, 477
Hatch, Edwin
concordances and, 131
Hatti, 22
Haustafeln, 202. See also Ethical Lists
in Ephesians, 186
Hawthorne, Gerald F., as contributor, 531–532, 579, 590–591, 668–669 Hawthorne, Nathaniel biblical allusions and, 456
Hay, David M., as contributor, 158
Hayes, John H., as contributor, 528–531, 571–573, 729–730
Hazael, 23, 30
Hazor, 52, 240, 269–270, 284
Amarna Letters and, 22
archaeology and, 47
conquest of Canaan and, 132
Head coverings, 127
1 Corinthians and, 134–136
Healing and laying on of hands, 427–428 Healing, Christian and Christian Science, 111–112
Heaven, 270–271. See also Paradise creation of, 270
as dwelling place of God, 270 kingdom of, 271 popular conceptions of, 270–271 as sky, 270
as substitute for name of God, 271 Heavenly assembly sons of God and, 713 Heavenly court
book of Isaiah and, 326

Heber the Kenite, 407
Hebrew Bible administrative maps in, 490 biblical translation and, 752
cantillation and, 488
Christian acceptance of, 66
Christian scriptures and, 279 cultural anthropology and, 702-704 development of the biblical text, 487 divisions of, 100-101 incense in, 301
Israel's origins and social organization and, 333, 702
Jesus and, 279
magic in, 483 manuscript forms of, 486-488
Masorah and, 488, 501
Masoretic Text of, 487, 501 miracles in, 519
myth and, 540-541
sexual behavior in, 690-691
Tiberian system of vocalization, 487-488 written maps in, 490 Hebrew language, 24, 271-273
Amarna Letters and, 22
Aramaic and, 45
classical, 271 rabbinical, 272
Ugaritic and, 785
Hebrews (people), 273-274
Egypt and, 273
in New Testament, 274
Philistines and, 273
slavery and, 274
Hebrews, The Letter to the, 274-277
author of, 275
christology of, 365
destination of, 276
occasion of, 276
recipients and date of, 275 theme and content of, 274-275
Hebron, 5, 6, 277
Abraham and, 27
ancestors and, 277
Heidegger, Martin, 280
Heine, Heinrich, 451
Heinegg, Peter D., as contributor, 446-454 Hell, 277-279. See also Abaddon afterlife and, 15
location of, 277
in New Testament, 277
as place of punishment, 277-278
in postexilic Judaism, 278
Hellenism
Alexander the Great and, 20
Hellenistic period
archaeology and, 53
dates of, 50
Edom in, 179
Hellenists, 6, 7
Hendel, Ronald S., as contributor, 97, 556, 557, 713, 829-830
Hendry, George S., as contributor, 287-288 Henotheism, 525
and religion of Israel, 334
Shema and, 693
Heracleon
biblical interpretation and, 315
Heracles ascension of, 61
Hermas
canon of scripture and, 104
Hermeneutics, 279-280
Eastern Orthodoxy and, 174
feminist interpretation and, 230, 280 liberation theology and, 280 Hermon, Mount, 280
Herod Antipas, 125, 283
Herod the Great, 281-282, 294
archaeology and, 50 building projects of, 53, 125, 282 domestic troubles of, 282
Edom and, 179
enemies of, 281
Jerusalem and, 282, 350
Josephus and, 384
Herodian Dynasty, 280-284
Herodians
history of, 280-281
Herodium, 53
Herodotus
crucifixion and, 141 Heroes, tribal book of Judges and, 397
Hexateuch, 385
Numbers as part of, 561
Hezekiah, 11, 52, 226, 271, 284
Assyria and, 64
book of Isaiah and, 326
Cushites and, 145 fortification of Jerusalem by, 284
idolatry and, 298
Sennacherib and, 284
tunnel of, 140, 350 wall of Jerusalem and, 350
Hiebert, Paula, as contributor, 795, 797-798
Hiebert, Theodore, as contributor, 549-551
Hieroglyphics, 180, 821-822
High Places, 284-285 sacrifice at, 285 worship of foreign gods and, 285 High Priest, 276, 610-611 responsibilities of, 611
High priesthood Caiaphas and, 97 rivalry for, 475
Hill of Ares, 54-55
Hill, David, as contributor, 171, 538-539, 622-623 Hillel, 307-309, 588
seven rules of, 310
Hillers, Delbert R., as contributor, 419-420 Hin, 796
Hippicus, tower of, 351
Hippocratic school of medicine
epilepsy and, 191
Hippodamus of Miletus, 124
Hippolytus
biblical interpretation and, 314
inspiration and, 304
Hiram of Tyre, 124
metal working and, 139
Historicity
Genesis and, 246-247
History
apocalyptic literature and, 36
Ebla discoveries and, 176
modern biblical criticism and, 320 understanding of, in Additions to Esther, 201 History of Joseph the Carpenter, 39 History of religions school
biblical interpretation and, 323
Hittite language
Amarna Letters and, 22
Hittite laws, 421
Hittites, 24, 71, 285 treaty form and, 285 Hobbes, Thomas
biblical interpretation and, 322
Hoehner, Harold W., as contributor, 280-284 Holbein, Hans
and Bible illustration, 299
Holiness, 285-286 book of Leviticus and, 436
in Ezekiel, 218
in New Testament, 286
tabernacle and, 729-730
vengeance and, 788
Holiness Code adultery in, 10
book of Leviticus and, 436
and Ezekiel, 219
Israelite law and, 423
Holladay, Carl R., as contributor, 135-138
Holmgren, Laton E., as contributor, 80-82 Holocaust, 33, 286-287
Israelite sacrifice and, 286
Nazi murder of European Jewry as, 286-287
in New Testament, 286
in rabbinic literature, 286
Holy One of Israel
Isaiah and, 328
Holy Spirit, 9, 73, 74, 89, 287-288, 296 emphasis on, in Acts, 8 gifts of, 288
inspiration and, 303 mission of, 288
in New Testament, 287-288
Pentecost and, 582
relation of, to Christ, 288
revelation and, 651
in theology of Paul, 578-579
Holy Things/Purities
Mishnah and, 521
Holy War. See War
Homer (measure), 796
Homicide blood revenge and, 68 cities of refuge and, 125 Homosexuality, 288-289
in Paul, 289
in postbiblical Jewish writings, 289 in the Roman world, 289
Hooker, Morna D., as contributor, 492-496 Hope, 289-290. See also Afterlife and Immortality apocalyptic, of a new heaven and new earth, 87 in apocalyptic writings, 290 in book of Jeremiah, 347

Hope (cont.)
in Hebrew Bible, 289
in New Testament, 289
Hoppe, Leslie J., O.F.M., as contributor, 397–399 Horeb, 290
Elijah at, 183
identification of, with Sinai, 290
Horne, Thomas Hartwell, 80 Horns altars and, 22
Horsley, Richard A., 826
Hosanna, 290
Hosanna, 290
Hosea (person), 290–292 life and family of, 290–292 Hosea, The Book of, 290–292
content of, 290
covenant tradition and, 85
dating of, 290–291
northern kingdom in, 291 Hospitality, 292–293
among early Christians, 293 among Greeks and Romans, 292 laws of, 292
in New Testament, 292–293
teaching of Jesus and, 292–293
Houlden, J. L., as contributor, 132–134 House church at Capernaum, 104 Household
in ancient Israel, 809
Household codes and family, 224 Household gods stolen by Rachel, 642 House of David election and, 110
Houses of nomads, 293
types of, 293–294
Houses, Furniture, Utensils, 293–295
Howard, J. Keir, as contributor, 190–191, 216–217, 509–510
Hugh of St. Cher, 79
biblical interpretation and, 316
chapter and verse divisions of scripture, 106
Hugh of St. Victor
biblical interpretation and, 316
Hughes, Philip Edgcumbe, as contributor, 274–277 Hugo of St. Caro
concordances and, 131
Hulmes, Edward, as contributor, 497–499, 638–640 Human limitations
wisdom literature and, 803
Human person, 295–296. See also Afterlife and Immortality corporate identity of, 295 Essenes' beliefs about, 296 fate of, after death, 295 Hellenistic idea of, 295–296
in New Testament, 296
nepeš and, 295
Pharisees' beliefs about, 296 soul and, 295 spirit and, 296
Human race creation of, 140, 141
in gnosticism, 256
Humor. See Irony and Humor Hurrian language
Amarna Letters and, 22
Hurrians, 563
Hus, John
biblical interpretation and, 317
Hyksos
in Egypt, 180
Hyksos period and Joseph story, 50
Hymn of the Pearl in Acts of Thomas, 40
Hymn of the Soul in Acts of Thomas, 40 Hymns
music and, 534
Psalms as, 627 of Qumran, and apocalyptic literature, 35 Hypermedia and computer technology, 130
Hypertext, 130
Hyphasis, 19
Hypostasis of the Archons, 544
Hyssop, 296

Ibn Ezra, Abraham
biblical interpretation and, 309
Idolatry, 261
Idols, Idolatry, 261, 297–298
incense and, 301
meat sacrificed to, in Paul, 298 Idumea
as Greek form of Edom, 179
Ignatius of Antioch, 32, 122
Ikhnaton. See Akhnaton Illness
covenant and, 508
demons and, 509 offerings after, 508 Illumination of manuscripts and Bible illustrations, 299
Illustrated Bibles, 298–300
Image. See Graven Image
Image of God
creation and, 140
Images in Christianity, 262
in Jewish ritual art, 262 Immanuel (Emmanuel), 300
book of Isaiah and, 326
Immortality, 17. See Afterlife and Immortality
Gilgamesh and, 254
Imperial Aramaic. See Aramaic, Imperial Impurity red cow and removal of, 643
Inanna, 163
Incarnation, 301 of Christ, and Christmas, 112
depiction of, in art, 58
Logos and, 463
Incense, 301–302
Inclusive Language Lectionary, The and feminist concerns, 230
Indian Ocean, 44
Indus River, 19
Inerrancy
authority of the Bible and, 66
Midrash and, 306
as obstacle to criticism, 319
virgin birth of Christ and, 790 Infallibility of the Bible
inerrancy and, 303
Infancy Gospel of Thomas, 39
Infancy narratives, 88
Luke and, 469
Ingathering
Autumn festival of, 227–228 Inheritance, 302
women and, 808
Injustice wisdom literature and, 803 Ink and writing, 94 Inner-biblical exegesis and books of Chronicles, 114
Inscriptions
Aram in, 44–45
Assyria and, 63
cuneiform, Ebla and, 176
Old Aramaic, 45 Inspiration authority of the Bible and, 66
Eastern Orthodoxy and, 174
inerrancy and, 66
infallibility and, 66 plenary, 304 verbal, 304
word of God and, 818
Inspiration and Inerrancy, 302–304
Instruction of Amen-em-ope, 12, 625
wisdom literature and, 802
Interest, Loans and. See Loans and Interest Intermarriage
book of Esther and, 200
book of Ezra and, 220
sexual behavior and, 690
International Children's Bible, New Century Version, 109 International Children's Version (New Testament), 109 International Lesson System, 109 Interpretation, 305–324. See also Hermeneutics allegorical, 67, 279
Alexandrian school and, 279 anachronistic reading of the Bible and, 319 biblical theology and, 323 canon and modern biblical criticism, 320–321
canonical criticism, 324
Christian interpretation from the Middle Ages to the Reformation, 315–318 classical hermeneutics, 305–309 cosmology and miracle, 320 dispensational system, 684 earliest Jewish commentaries, 305–309 early Christian interpretation, 310–315
form criticism, 323
Jewish interpretation, 305–310 literal vs. figurative, 681 literary criticism, 323–324 medieval developments, 309–310 modern biblical criticism, 318–324 obstacles to modern criticism, 318–319 redaction criticism, 323

Interpretation (cont.)
sortes biblicae and, 713
targums and, 754–755
theological roots of biblical criticism, 321 tradition criticism, 323 Iraq ancient Assyria and, 63 Irenaeus, 279
book of Revelation and, 653
and canon of scripture, 103
Iron Age Ammon in, 23
dates of, 50
Edom and, 178
Irony and Humor, 324–325
book of Judith and, 399–401
Isaac, 5, 26, 325
Aqedah and, 43
archaeology and, 50
Esau and, 192
Rebekah and, 642–643
Isaac cycle, 26
Isaac Nathan, Rabbi
chapter and verse divisions of scripture, 106
Isaiah (person)
ascension and, 61
conversion and, 133
depiction of, in art, 57
Isaiah apocalypse, 326
eschatology and, 192
Isaiah, The Book of, 325–329
author of, 327–328
chapter 7 and virgin birth of Christ, 789–790
contents of, 326–327
Cyrus and, 145
Deutero Isaiah, 72
Immanuel and, 300 influence, 328–329 key concepts, 328
Isbet Sartah, 51
Isenheim altarpiece, 59
Ishbaal (Ishbosheth), 388
Ishmael, 5, 266, 329
Aqedah and, 43–44
Ishmael, Rabbi and Hebrew Enoch, 185
Ishmaelites
Arabia and, 44
Ishme-Dagan I (ruler of Assyria), 63
Ishtar, 163, 254, 545
Astarte and, 64
Queen of Heaven and, 636
Ishtar Gate, 53
Isin, 71
Islam. See also Muslims
Aramaic and, 46
exodus and, 212
Jerusalem and, 355
Israel, 329
as chosen, 110
Jacob and, 27, 329, 338
as a mother, 811 name, 330 nomadism in, 703 and Old Testament theology, 83 suffering of, in Esdras, 197 twelve tribes of, 62, 329
and unity of humankind, 10
as a vineyard, 789
Israel, conquest of, 24, 331
Lachish and, 418
Israel, history of, 329–332 biblical story of, 329–330 contemporary views of, 331–332 historical uncertainties and extra-biblical sources, 330–331 Israel, religion of, 332–336
in ancient Near Eastern setting, 332–333 aniconic tradition of, 297, 335
Asherah and, 334–335
Canaanite heritage of, 333, 785 cult and abode of the dead, 335–336 formative period of, 332–336 key concepts of, 334–336
monotheism and, 334 nature and scope, 333
sources of, 333
war and, 791
worship and, 819
Issachar, 336
Isthmia, 54
Italian Cohort, 656
Italics, 336–337
Italy
Paul's voyage to, 9
Ives, Charles, 606 Ivory carving, 140

J, 338. See also Yahwist
creation and, 29, 141
as pentateuchal source, 580
Jaazaniah, 53
Jabesh-gilead, 23
Jabneh, synod and divisions of Hebrew Bible, 101
Jachin and Boaz
Temple and, 732
Jacob, 26, 62, 78, 83, 338 blessing of, 338
as chosen by God, 109–110
conversion and, 133
Esau and, 27, 643
in Genesis, 248
Laban and, 27
Rachel and, 641–642
tithes and, 745
Jacob, blessing of Isaac and, 325
Jacob and Laban
covenant and, 138
Jacob cycle, 26
Jacob-Esau cycle, 248
Jacob-Israel, 545
Jacobs, Alan, as contributor, 445–446
Jakobson, Roman, 716
Jambres. See Jannes and Jambres James, 8, 10, 339–340
as apostle, 42
Apostolic Council and, 42 authority of, in Jerusalem, 339 Catholic letters and, 10 execution of, 33
James, Father of Judas, 339
James, Son of Alphaeus, 339
James, Son of Zebedee, 339
James, The Letter of, 339, 340–342
authorship and date, 340
James and Paul, 341–342
language, 340
outline, 340
theology, 341
unity, 341
James the brother of Jesus legends about, 339–340
James the Younger
James, Son of Alphaeus as, 339
Jannes and Jambres, 342, 630
Jansen, John Frederick, as contributor, 255, 582 Jansz, P.
as Bible translator, 774
Jashar, Book of. See Book of Jashar Jason
high priesthood and, 475
Jastrow, Marcus
as Bible translator, 763
Jay, Nancy, 633
Jebel Musa
Sinai and, 697
Jebus, 342
Jebusite priesthood, 11
Jebusites, 24, 342
Jeconiah, 75
Jeffrey, David Lyle, as contributor, 438–445, 454–460
Jehoahaz
Elisha and, 183–184
Jehoiachin, 72, 75
Esdras and, 194
Jehoiakim, 11
Esdras and, 194
Jehoram
Elijah and, 182
Elisha and, 183–184
Jehoshaphat, 342–343
Jehovah, 343
Jehovah's Witnesses and Bible translation, 761
Jehu, 30, 52, 343
Elisha and, 183–184
kingdom of Judah and, 389
Jehu dynasty, 332
Jehudi messenger of African heritage, 11
Jensen, Joseph, O.S.B., as contributor, 435–437 Jephthah
in book of Judges, 398
Jerahmeel, 53
Jeremiah (person), 11, 53, 72, 75, 78
depiction of, in art, 57
Jeremiah, The Book of, 343–347
Astarte and, 64
Atbash in, 64–65
background, 343–344 biographical narratives in, 346 content and sources, 345 covenant tradition and, 85 and Deuteronomic circle, 168
idols and, 298
key religious issues in, 347 poetic material in, 345–346 problem of the book, 344–345 prose passages in, 346–347 text, 344–345
Jeremiah, The Letter of, 347–348
Jericho, 252, 348–349
archaeology and, 47, 48

Jericho (cont.)
burial customs and, 96
conquest of Canaan and, 132
as oldest discovered city, 124
Jeroboam I, 3, 52
Jeroboam II of Israel, 24
Jerome, 38, 78, 409
biblical interpretation and, 315
biblical translation and, 750, 752, 753
literature and, 447
Vulgate and, 790
writing of, about women, 817
Jerubbaal. See Gideon
Jerusalem, 6, 21, 52, 84, 166, 251, 349-356
Abdu-heba as king of, 11 after Herod the Great, 351-352 after the exile, 350
Amarna Letters and, 22
as Amorite town, 24
Apostolic Council and, 42
archaeology and, 47, 48, 49
Assyria and, 64
book of Isaiah and, 326
as capital, 331
Christians and, 354-355 church in, 8, 182
and conquest of Canaan, 132 date of destruction of, 118 the exile and, 349-350
Ezekiel and, 217
fall of, in 587, 429 as fortified town, 124 heavenly, 353
Herod's buildings, 350-351
history of, 349-352
Isaiah and, 328
and J source, 338
Jebusites and, 342
Mount of Olives in, 564-565 name and description, 349
new, 35, 196, 630
Paul's last journey to, 7 rebuilding of city walls of, 554
symbolism of, 352-356
theme of, in Psalms, 627 under Persians, 125
Zechariah and, 826
Jerusalem Targums. See Targum, Jerusalem
Jesus Christ, 73, 74, 356-366, 418 apocryphal gospels and, 39-40
archaeology and, 50
arrest of, 253 attitude of, toward tax collectors, 632 authority of, 360
biblical interpretation and, 310
biblical theology and, 86-89 birth of, 78, 119-120, 356 burial of, 96
canon of scripture and, 102
as chosen by God, 110
christology and, 87-88 conduct of, 358
conversion and, 133
crucifixion of, and archaeology, 50 Davidic ancestry of, 245 death of, 120, 184, 364, 365
demons and, 162
depiction of, in art, 56, 57, 58, 60 descent into hell and, 163 divorce statements of, 170 earthly, 87 as end-time prophet, 88
eschatology and, 193
as eternal high priest, 89, 276
exorcism and, 216-217
Galilean ministry of, 358-359 genealogy of, 245 golden rule and, 257-258 hardness of heart and, 269
as Holy One of God, 286
Immanuel and, 300
as incarnate revealer, 88 incarnation and, 301
inheritance and, 302 journey to Jerusalem of, 359 kingdom of God and, 408-409 as lamb of God, 356
language of, 46, 272
Lord's Supper and, 363 method of studying life of, 356 ministry in Jerusalem, 359-360 mission of, as call to repentance, 288, 646 mother and brothers of, 95
in Muslim tradition, 639
nationalist politics and, 600
new creation and, 141
as new Moses, 88 opposed by Sanhedrin, 678 as Passover lamb, 88 person and work of, 87-88, 361-366 proclamation of resurrection and, 647 as prophet, 86, 360 public ministry and message, 356-357 relation of, to Holy Spirit, 288 resurrection of, 278
sacrifice of, 276
as savior, 670 sayings attributed to, 17-18 scriptures of Israel and, 82 self-understanding of, 360-361 as son of David, 154 as Son of God, 245
soteriology and, 363
Spirit and, 287
teaching in parables and, 567-570 teaching of, about family, 224 teaching of, about fasting, 225 teaching of, about God, 357-358 teaching of, about neighbor, 556 teaching of, about prayer, 607-608 temptation and, 734-735
titles of, 361 victory of, over demons, 162 as vine, 789 women in genealogy of, 245 as the Word in John, 651 words of, 46, 184, 619
Jewelry, 141, 366-367
Jewish Apocrypha. See Apocrypha, Jewish Jewish leaders gospel of Matthew and, 504-505
Jewish liturgy
Jerusalem in, 353 use of scripture in, 429-430
Jewish Palestinian Aramaic. See Aramaic, Jewish Palestinian Jewish religious life
Josephus and, 383
Jewish tradition
view of Eve in, 207
Jewish worship
Shema and, 693
synagogue and, 721-722
Jews
as chosen people in Letter to the Romans, 661 and God's plan for redemption, 661-662 rejection of Christ by, in Romans, 662-663 Jezebel, 52, 368, 411-412, 670 and Baal, 70
Elijah and, 183
Jezreel, plain of Issachar and, 336
Jezreel Valley, 51
Joab (commander of David's forces), 6
Joash, 52
Elisha and, 183-184
kingdom of Judah and, 389-390
Job (person)
depiction of, in art, 57, 60, 298
testing and, 734
two wives of, 546-547 Job, The Book of, 368-370 argument, 369
Carl Jung and, 404-405
in dance, 148, 149
origins, 369-370 structure, 368-369
Tobit and, 746
wisdom literature and, 370, 381
Joel, The Book of, 370-371 author and his times, 371
eschatology and, 193
interpretation, 371
outline, 371
Johannes Cocceius, 84
John
Catholic letters and, 10
John, The Gospel According to, 372-377 composition, 374-375 date, 375-376 irony and, 325
origin, 374 prologue, 373 purpose, 376 signs, 375 sources, 375 structure and content, 373-374 teaching, 376-377
John, The Letters of, 377-380
authorship, 379
character, 378-379 date and place of origin, 379-380 situation, 377 structure, 379
John (evangelist) disputed authorship of Revelation and, 653-654 John Cassian
biblical interpretation and, 314
John Chrysostom
biblical interpretation and, 313
John Mark, 75
John Scotus Erigena
biblical interpretation and, 315

John the Baptist, 9, 283, 371–373, 546
Andrew and, 27
and chronology, 120
conversion and, 134
depiction of, in art, 59
Jesus and, 356
repentance and, 646
Salome and, 669
John the Seer, 21
Johnson, Sherman Elbridge, as contributor, 32, 78, 123–124, 147
Jonah (person)
depiction of, in art, 56
Jonah, The Book of, 380–381 gentiles and, 249
Jonathan, 96, 675
Essenes and, 198
Maccabean revolt and, 476–477
Jonathan ben Zakkai, 589
Jonsson, Jakob, as contributor, 324–325
Jordan River, 18, 23, 252, 381–383
and conquest of Canaan, 132
Dan and, 148
Jordan Valley, 44, 252, 381–382
Joseph (ancestor), 382–383
archaeology and, 50–51
burial of, 96
in dance, 148
depiction of, in art, 60
Ephraim and, 190
in Genesis, 248–249
in Muslim and biblical tradition, 640
tribe of, 383
Joseph (husband of Mary), 382
Joseph and Asenath, 630
Joseph cycle, 248–249
Joseph of Arimathea, 383
Joseph story, 26
Egypt and, 180
and wisdom literature, 249 Josephus, Flavius, 33, 241, 383–384
canon of scripture and, 102
crucifixion and, 142
Essenes and, 198, 393
high priesthood in, 97 and Judaisms of the first century, 392
portrayal of women in, 814
as source of Herodian history, 280–281 Joshua (person), 267 conquest and, 619
history of Israel and, 330
Joshua, The Book of, 384–387
conquest of Canaan and, 132, 386–387 history of composition, 385–386 older traditions, 386 structure and literary characteristics, 384–385 theological themes, 387
Josiah, 165, 226, 243, 284, 285, 387–388, 409
Esdras and, 194
idolatry and, 298
monotheism and, 526–527
priesthood and, 610 reform of, and cities of refuge, 125
Shema and, 693
Jothan, 23
Jubilee year
slavery and, 700
Jubilees, The Book of, 630
as apocalypse, 35
Apocrypha and, 39
chronology and, 118–119
exegetical techniques in, 308–309 Judah, The Kingdom of, 388–391
Assyrian domination of, 390
Babylonian domination of, 390
David's Judean kingdom, 388–389
Egyptian domination, 390
Hasmoneans, 390–391
invasions of, 52–53 post-Solomonic kingdom, 389–390 Judah, The Tribe of, 388
Abraham as ancestor of, 27
Judaisms of the First Century, 391–395
Essenes, 393–394
Pharisees, 392–393
Sadducees, 393
sources, 392
Judaizers, 186, 240
Judas Iscariot, 33, 395
Judas Maccabeus
canon of scripture and, 102
and Jerusalem, 125
Maccabean revolt and, 476
Jude, The Letter of, 395–397
Catholic letters and, 10 relation of 2 Peter to, 587 Judea, 251–252
agriculture in, 251
Aramaic in, 45
rainfall in, 251
as Roman province, 659
Judean Desert, 251–252
Judge
Deborah as, 161
Gideon as, 253
Samson as, 673
Samuel as, 673–674
Judge, Edwin A., as contributor, 594–595 Judges elders as, 182
women as, 806
Judges, The Book of, 397–399
archaeology and, 51
and conquest of Canaan, 132
ephod in, 189
and history of Israel, 330
Judgment
apocalyptic literature and, 36 after death, 278
oracles concerning, 565
remnant and, 646
Judgment. See also Day of Judgment Judith, The Book of, 399–402
as apocryphal book, 38
portrayal of women in, 813
Judson, Adoniram
as Bible translator, 774
Julian calendar winter solstice and, 112
Jung, Carl J., 234, 256, 402–405
Jung and the Bible, 402–405
Jung Codex, 543
Junia, 405
Junius Bassus sarcophagus of, 57
Justice. See Righteousness Justification, 88, 405–406
James and Paul and, 341
Jesus and, 364
Justification by faith, 7
in Paul, 655–656
Justin Martyr
biblical interpretation and, 311
and birthplace of Jesus, 113
canon of scripture and, 103
description of Christian worship, 820
Ephesus and, 189
Justinian, 78

Kab (measure), 796
Kafka, Franz religious writing of, 451 Kant, Immanuel and religion, 451
Karaism, 309
Karnak, 52 inscription at, 181
Karris, Robert J., O.F.M., as contributor, 573–576
Kaufmann, Yehezkel
biblical interpretation and, 323
and history of Israel, 333, 335
Kazantzakis, Nikos, 454
Kee, Howard Clark, as contributor, 483–484, 519–520
Kemuel
Aram as son of, 44
Kenites, 407
Cain and, 97 relation of, to Israel, 407
Yahwism and, 407
Kenyon, Kathleen, 47–48
Jerusalem and, 349
Kepler, Johannes
science and the Bible and, 682
Kerygma, 87
Lucan gospel and, 472
Ketib and Qere, 407–408
Khirbet Beit Lei, 53
Khirbet el-Qom inscription and Asherah, 334
tetragrammaton and, 738
Khirbet Qumran. See Qumran
Kierkegaard, Søren, 452
Aqedah and, 44
Kimḥi, David
biblical interpretation and, 309
King. See also Kingship and Monarchy role of, in ancient Near East, 413–414
King James Version, 75, 80, 613, 617–618, 759–760
biblical translation and, 750
English literature and, 441
King's Highway, 252
King, Martin Luther, Jr., 13 Kingdom of God, 86, 265, 408–409 apocalyptic understanding of, 409
in early Judaism, 408
eschatology and, 192, 193
ethics and, 204
and Eucharist, 90
Jesus and, 357, 408
in rabbinic texts, 408
in synoptic Gospels, 408
in targums, 408
teaching in parables and, 650–651
Kingdom of Heaven. See Kingdom of God
Kings of Israel and Judah chronological list of, 391

Kings of Israel and Judah (cont.)
as military victors, 414-415
as sons of God, 415 Kings, The Books of, 409-413
books of Chronicles and, 113-114
books of Samuel as part of, 409, 674
content of, 409
date of composition of, 411
Elijah and, 182-183
Elisha in, 183-184
formulae in, 410-411
in Septuagint, 409
sources of, 410
Kingsbury, Jack Dean, as contributor, 502-506
Kingship and Monarchy, 413-416. See also Monarchy Abimelech and, 253
biblical politics and, 599
books of Chronicles and, 116
creation and, 413
David and, 154, 408
in Israel, 414-416
in Judges, 414 limitations on power of, 415 in Mesopotamia, 413
messiah and, 416
origins of, in Israel, 414 power of, 415 in the Psalms, 414-415 reservations about, 414 temple building and, 414 as urban phenomenon, 414 Kish
archaeology and, 47, 50
Kiss ritual, 416
as sign of dishonesty, 416 as sign of greeting, 416
Klopstock, Friedrich Gottlieb, 451
Knight, Douglas A., as contributor, 273-274, 297-298
Knight, George A. F., as contributor, 55-56, 267-268, 595-596
Knoppers, Gary N., as contributor, 62, 147, 238, 329, 336, 342-343, 433, 549, 649, 694, 826
Know, 416-417
Yahweh, 417
Knowing sexual intercourse as, 416 Knowledge
gnosticism and, 255
Knowledge of God through the natural world, 650 Knox, Ronald, 6, 570
as Bible translator, 763 Koheleth. See Ecclesiastes, The Book of Koldewey, Robert, 49 Koran. See Qur'an and the Bible, The Koridethi, Codex. See Codex Koridethi
Körner, J. G., 17
Kraus, Donald, as contributor, 615-616
Kuntillet 'Ajrud
Asherah and, 334
inscription from, 52
tetragrammaton and, 738
Kuthim
as contemptuous name for Samaritans, 672
KWIC. See Concordances Lévi-Strauss, Claude
structuralism and, 716
Laban, 641-642
Jacob and, 27
Lachish, 52, 418
Amarna Letters and, 22
archaeology and, 48, 49
identification of, 47 ostracon from, 53
Lachish letters and ancient letter writing, 432 Lachish ostraca, 272, 418
exile and, 209
Ladder of Jacob, 630
Laish, 51
Lake of Gennesaret. See Galilee, Sea of Lake of Tarichaeae. See Galilee, Sea of Lake of Tiberias. See Galilee, Sea of Lake Van, 46
Lamb
Jesus Christ as, 366
Lamb of God, 418-419
as title, 418
Lambert, W. G., 50
Lamentations of Jeremiah, The, 419-420
acrostic form and, 419-420
authorship and date, 419 contents and plan, 419
Sumerian laments and, 420 Laments characteristics of, 627-628 communal, 628 individual, 627-628 as type of Psalm, 627 Land
book of Joshua and, 387
as pentateuchal theme, 581-582
Langton, Stephen
biblical interpretation and, 316
chapter and verse divisions of scripture, 106
Language centers for study of biblical, 601 Laodiceans, The Letter to the, 420
Laon
Gothic art and, 58
LaSor, William Sanford, as contributor, 731-734, 791-792, 794
Last Judgment
eschatology and, 192
Last Supper. See Lord's Supper
Last things, 90
eschatology and, 192
Late Bronze Age
dates of, 50
Edom and, 179
Lathrop, Dorothy, 109
Latin, 420
Latter Prophets
and order of biblical books, 99
Latter-day Saints. See Mormonism and the Bible Law, 421-427
in ancient Near East, 421-422 association with Moses, 101
Babylonian, 421
book of Esther and, 200
as division of Hebrew Bible, 100-101
in Galatians, 239
given at Sinai, 559
Israelite, 421-423
in Letter to the Romans, 661
New Testament views of, 423-424
Pharisees and, 667
Sadducees and, 667
Sumerian, 421
in theology of Paul, 578
Torah as, 747 Law, Israelite
apodictic law, 203, 422
authority of the Bible and, 65-66
casuistic, 422 form criticism of, 422
major collections of biblical laws, 422-423 modern research on, 422 principles of, 422
Law, Mosaic
Apostolic Council and, 42-43
biblical politics and, 599
Law, natural miracles and, 519
Law, tablets of and ark, 55
Laws of Lipit-Ishtar, 421
Laws of Urnammu, 421
Laws, Sophie, as contributor, 30-31, 645 Lawyer, 427
Layard, Austin Henry, 46 Laying on of hands, 90, 427-428
elder and, 182
Lazarus and Abraham's bosom, 5
Le Jay, Guy Michel, 602 Leach, Edmund
structuralism and, 716
Leah, 26, 62, 428, 642
Jacob and, 338
Leaney, A. R. C., as contributor, 112-113, 173-174
Leaven, 428
Lebanon, 428-429
Lectionaries, 429-431
Christian tradition, 430-431
Jewish tradition, 429-430
order of biblical books and, 99
Lectionary cycle chapter and verse divisions of the Bible and, 105 Legion, Roman, 656 Leidekker, Melchior
as Bible translator, 774
Leith, Mary Joan Winn, as contributor, 416-417, 552, 635-636, 671, 673, 694, 800-801, 807-812 Lemche, Niels and social sciences, 703
Leningrad Codex
Masorah and, 488
Masoretic Text and, 501 order of biblical books and, 99
Leo XIII, Pope
Pontifical Biblical Commission and, 603
Leonardo da Vinci, 59
Leprosy, 431-432, 508
Lepton (coin), 524
Lethech (measure), 796
Letter from Heaven, The, 41
Letter of Aristeas, 630
3 Maccabees and, 480

Letter of Aristeas (cont.)
Septuagint and, 752
Letter of Benan, 41 Letter of Jeremiah. See Jeremiah, The Letter of Letter of Peter to Philip, 544 Letter-writing in Antiquity, 432–433
Letters, apocryphal, 41
Letters of Paul, 578
authenticity of, 578
as sources for life of Paul, 576–577 Leusden, Jan
chapter and verse divisions of scripture, 106
Levi, 168, 433
priesthood and, 433
Levi, Leon, 48
Levi, tribe of
as chosen, 110
Leviathan, 30, 76, 77, 433–434
chaos and, 105
and Israelite religion, 335
Rahab as, 642
Levine, Amy-Jill, as contributor, 249–250, 383
Levine, Baruch A., as contributor, 225–228
Levine, Lee, as contributor, 721–724
Levirate law, 434
Levirate marriage in book of Ruth, 663
in Hebrew Bible, 691
Onan and, 565
Levites, 3, 167, 433, 434–435
alms and, 20
duties of, 610 election, 110
priesthood and, 610
returning exiles, in Ezra, 220
tithes and, 745
Levitical cities
lists of, in Joshua, 386
Leviticus, The Book of, 435–437
Lewis, Theodore J., as contributor, 332–336 Lex talionis
vengeance and, 788
Liège Diatessaron as Dutch medieval translation, 755 Libanius writing of, about women, 817 Liberation image of, 600–601 Libertinism
letter of Jude and, 395
in 2 Peter, 587
Liberty and Galatians, 239
Libraries in Hellenistic world, 99
Libya, 11
Life of Adam and Eve, 630
Lilith, 437
Lindisfarne Gospels, 756, 758
and Bible illustrations, 299
Linzey, A., 30
Literacy, 167
Literacy in ancient Israel, 437–438
Literary criticism, 323–324
Literature
Assyria and, 64
Literature, The Bible as, 460–463 artistry in the Bible, 462 figurative language in, 462 and human experience, 461 literary genres in the Bible, 461 literary language and rhetoric, 461–462 literary unity of the Bible, 462 necessity of a literary approach, 462 Literature and the Bible, 438–460
American jeremiad, 455–456
Anglo-Saxon English literature and, 439
British Commonwealth literature, 445–446
Canada, 459–460
English literature, 438–446
English literature in the later Middle Ages, 439–441
Enlightenment and English literature, 442–444
European literature, 446–454
modern American drama, 458 modern American poets and the Bible, 458 North American literature, 454–460
parables and, 459
Puritans in America and, 455
Reformation and Renaissance English literature, 441–442
Romantic movement in Germany, 452
Romantic movement in Italy, 452
Romanticism and the modern era, English literature, 444–445
United States, 454–459
Literature, medieval chivalric
Bible and, 448
Liturgical terms, 267–268
Lives of the Prophets, 630
Living Bible, The, 571
Loans and Interest, 463
Locke, John
authority of the Bible and, 443
biblical interpretation and, 322
Locusts
as Egyptian plague, 596
Log (measure), 796
Logia of Jesus, 18
Logos, 86, 87, 463–464
Eastern Orthodoxy and, 174
Jesus as, 141, 362
in Johannine Gospel, 463
in Philo, 592
Stoics and, 714–715
Loh, I-Jin, as contributor, 773–775
Loincloth, 127
Loisy, Alfred F.
biblical interpretation and, 323
Lombard, Peter
biblical interpretation and, 316
and English literature and the Bible, 439
London Missionary Society, 81
London Polyglot, 602–603, 613
scholars involved in, 602
texts used in, 602–603
Longfellow, Henry Wadsworth
biblical themes and, 456
Lord's Prayer, 285–286, 464–465, 607
Lord's Supper, 88, 90, 363, 465–467
1 Corinthians and, 136
and drunkenness, 172 love-feast and, 469
as Sunday evening Eucharist, 173
worship and, 820
Lost Books of the Bible, The, 41
Lot, 5, 247, 467
Ammonites and, 23
Louw, Johannes P., as contributor, 225, 232
Love, 467–469
Love-feast, 469
Lucifer, 679
Lucius, 11
Luke as theologian of "salvation history," 8–9 Luke, The Gospel According to, 469–474
Acts and, 7 authorship, 470–471
content, 469–470 date and place of composition, 472 intended readers, 472 Lucan teaching, 472–474
sources, 471–472
Luther, Martin, 56, 66, 75, 275, 279
art and, 59
authority of the Bible and, 67
Bible printing and, 612–613
biblical interpretation and, 317, 321
biblical translation and, 750, 764
inspiration and, 304
Lutherans
Apocrypha and, 38
Lyall, Francis, as contributor, 424–427
Lyceum, 65
Lycus Valley
Christian congregations in, 128
Lydia, 590

Maccabean revolt, 476–477
Maccabees
and book of Daniel, 151 revolt of, against Seleucids, 390–391 Maccabees, The Books of the, 475–482
Alexander the Great and, 20
Apocrypha and, 39
book of Daniel and, 151
canon of scripture and, 37 historical summary, 475–477 Macedon ruled by Antigonids, 20 Macedonia
Paul in, 136
Machen, John Gresham, 237 Machpelah, 5 cave of, 277
Magi, 73, 232, 483, 583
names of, 547
Venerable Bede and, 547
Magic and Divination, 483–484
Ephesus and, 189
exorcism and, 216
Jannes and Jambres, 342
Maimonides
biblical interpretation and, 309, 310
Mainz Bible, 611
Malachi, The Book of, 484–485
Malherbe, Abraham J., as contributor, 190, 292–293, 714–715

Malta
Paul's shipwreck at, 9
Mamre, 5
Manasseh, 226, 485
in Chronicles, 116
Ephraim and, 190
Manasseh, The Prayer of, 485–486
Manasseh, tribe of, 485
Mandaic
as dialect of Aramaic, 46 Mandean sect language of, 46
Manetho
as writer of history of Egypt, 180
Manicheism, 256
Manna, 55, 90, 215, 486
and ark, 55
Manor, Giora, as contributor, 148–149 Manual of Discipline, 159
apocalyptic literature and, 35
Manuscripts of the Bible, 486–490 computers and collation of, 129 Dead Sea Scrolls and, 159–160
illumination and, 58
and order of biblical books, 99
Manutius, Aldus
italics and, 336
Maps of the biblical world, 490–491 geographical orientation of, 491 medieval and modern, 491
Mesopotamia, 491
Maranatha, 90, 491
Marbeck, John
concordances and, 131
Marcion, 82, 279 attitude of, toward Acts, 10
biblical interpretation and, 312
canon of scripture and, 102, 103
Colossians and, 128
Marduk, 50, 77, 268 temple of, in Babylon, 71
Marduk-apal-iddina II, 71, 72
Mare, Walter de la, 109
Mari, 24, 63, 268
archaeology and, 50
Mari Tablets, 491–492
Mariamne, tower of, 351
Marini, Stephen A., as contributor, 224–225, 701–702
Mark, The Gospel According to, 492–496
author and date of, 493 contents, 492–493
interpretation, 494
Mark's presentation of the gospel, 494–495 readers, 493–494
sources of, 493
Marr, Wilhelm, 32
Marriage, 496, 795, 796. See also Adultery in ancient Israel, 496–497
1 Corinthians and, 136
creation and, 141
endogamy and exogamy, 496–497
in Ephesians, 188–189
Esdras and, 194
family and, 223 imagery of, in Ezekiel, 218 and levirate law, 434
New Testament, 497 sacred, 85 and sexual behavior in the Hebrew Bible, 690
as symbol, 811
weddings and, 794–795
women and, 808
Marshall, I. Howard, as contributor, 465–467, 741–743
Marston, Charles, 48
Martin, Ralph P., as contributor, 405–406 Martyn, Henry
as Bible translator, 773
Martyrdom of Isaiah, 630
Martyrdom of St. Andrew, 40
Martyrs, 142, 339, 714
Marx and the Bible, 497–499 approaches to alienation, 497–498
Marx's Jewish and Christian background, 497
Marx's use of the Bible, 498–499
Marx, Karl. See Marx and the Bible Mary, Mother of Jesus, 499–500
literature and, 447
in Muslim and biblical tradition, 640
role of, 636
Mary Magdalene, 499
Masaccio (painter), 59
Masada, 53, 159
archaeology and, 47
Maskil, 500
Mason, Rex, as contributor, 266–267, 484–485, 826–828
Masonry, 140
Masorah, 500–501 and biblical transmission, 306
Masoretes, 79
Masorah and, 500
Masoretic Text, 407–408, 501
Atbash in, 64–65
Mastemah, 679
Masturbation, 565
Maternal imagery mercy of God and, 512 Mather, Cotton and children's Bibles, 108
Matthew, The Gospel According to, 502–506 author, date, place, 502–503 readers, 503
sources, 503
story of Jesus, 503–504 story of the disciples, 505–506 story of the opponents, 504–505 structure, 502
Matthiae, Paolo
as excavator of Ebla, 176
Maurer, Ulrich W., as contributor, 735–736
Mazar, Benjamin, 47
Mazarin Bible, 611
McAfee, Gene, as contributor, 205–206, 690–692
McCarter, P. Kyle, Jr., as contributor, 98, 132, 284–285
McGovern, Patrick E., as contributor, 366–367
McGuffey's Readers, 108–109
McKane, W., as contributor, 409–413
McKenzie, Steven L., as contributor, 145, 268, 343
McNutt, Paula M., as contributor, 407 Meal, sacred
covenant and, 138
Meals, 506–507
Measures. See Weights and Measures
Meat offered to idols
1 Corinthians and, 136
Medes, 46, 64, 507
Medical ethics
the Bible and, 509
Medicine, 507–509
Medicine and the Bible, 509–510
Mediterranean Sea, 11
Medium. See Witch
Meek, 510
Megiddo, 56, 251, 511
Amarna Letters and, 22
archaeology and, 47, 48, 49, 126 high place at, 284 ivory and clothing and, 127
Solomonic palaces at, 52
Megillot, 511
Ecclesiastes and, 177
Meier, Samuel A., as contributor, 27–28, 208–209, 300, 740–741
Meissner, William W., S.J., as contributor, 232–236, 402–405 Melchizedek, 5, 276, 511–512
depiction of, in art, 57
Enoch and, 185
tithes and, 745
Melito of Sardis
biblical interpretation and, 311
Melqart, 593
Melville, Herman, 606 biblical typology and, 456–457
Mene, Mene, Tekel, and Parsin, 512 Menelaus
high priesthood and, 475
Menes founder of first dynasty of Egypt, 180 Menorah, 512
Menstruation
cult and, 807
purity and, 809–810
Mercy
vengeance and, 788
Mercy of God, 512–513
remnant and, 646
Merneptah inscription, 51 and name of Israel, 132, 181, 329, 330, 331 Merodach-baladan, 64, 71 Mesha, inscription of and Israel, 330
Mesha, king of Moab, 52, 73, 238
Mesopotamia, 44, 513
afterlife and, 15
ancestors and, 26
Aramaic inscriptions in, 45
archaeology and, 46
Euphrates River and, 206
Garden of Eden and, 178
laws of, 797 literature, 50
Messengers
and ancient letter writing, 432 Messiah, 31, 84, 86, 87, 513–514
apocalyptic literature and, 36
book of Isaiah and, 326
crucifixion and, 142

Messiah (cont.)
Cyrus as, 145
in Ephesians, 188
eschatoloogy and, 192
2 Esdras and, 197
fasting and, 225
fundamentalism and, 236
Gog and, 257
in Hebrews, 275
Jesus as, 12, 688
kingship and, 416
royal psalms and, 628
war and, 792
Messiahs, false, 158
Messianic age and bodily resurrection, 17
Messianic expectation
Elijah and, 183
Messianic secret, 88, 514–515
gospel of Mark and, 494
Metal workers, 139
Metaphors, 18, 515–517
Metatron
archangel, 185
as Enoch, 185
Methuselah, 517
Mettinger, Tryvge N. D.
and history of Israel, 335
Metz Psalter, 756
Metzger, Bruce M., as contributor, 39–41, 78–80, 122–123, 143–144, 207–208, 245, 263–264, 486–488, 546–548, 713–714, 739–740
Metzger, Isobel Mackay, as contributor, 641–642, 642–643, 678
Meyers, Carol L., as contributor, 161, 266, 428, 692
Meyers, Eric M., as contributor, 381–382, 594
Mezuzot, 594
Micah, The Book of, 517–518
author, 517
setting, 517
Michael (archangel), 28, 54, 238, 276, 518
Michal, 153
Michelangelo, 59
Middle Assyrian empire, 63 Middle Bronze Age
dates of, 50
Exodus and, 210
Middle Kingdom
in Egypt, 180
Midian, 518–519
Midianites
Arabia and, 44
Midrash
Azazel and, 69
biblical interpretation and, 310
book of Jonah and, 380
Enoch in, 184 rules of, 307
Miktam, 519
Milcom
as patron deity of Ammon, 24
Mile, 796
Millard, Alan, 50, 231–232, 268–269, 285, 558–559
Millenarian movement, 600, 706
Miller, J. Maxwell, as contributor, 329–332, 388–391
Mina, 524, 797
Minear, Paul S., as contributor, 92, 93, 157–158, 162–163, 589–590, 734–735
Minor Prophets
and order of biblical books, 99
Minuscules of Greek New Testament, 489–490 Miracles, 89, 519–520
gospel of Mark and, 495
illness and, 508
Jesus and, 358
messianic secret and, 515
modern biblical criticism and, 320
Miraculous stories
Elisha and, 184
Mirandola, Pico della
biblical interpretation and, 317
Miriam, 3, 520–521
Mishnah, 18, 241, 272, 521, 589
Azazel and, 69
corban and, 134
crucifixion and, 142
as monument of the rabbis, 641 Talmud and, 730–731
tithes and, 745
Torah and, 747
Missale Romanum and Bible, 447 Missionaries
biblical translation and, 750
2 Corinthians and, 137
women as, 815
Missionary movement and circulation of the Bible, 122
Missionary preaching
biblical interpretation and, 312
Missionary work among African American slaves, 12
Mitanni, 22, 63
Moab, 252, 521–522
ancestors of, 27
and the exodus, 51
Moabite language, 521, 522
Moabite Stone, 52, 522–523, 525
tetragrammaton and, 738
Moabites
Amorites and, 24
Modern Language Bible, The, 762 Modernism
biblical interpretation and, 323
Moffat, Robert, 81
Moffatt, James
as Bible translator, 761
Molech child sacrifice and, 747 Monarchy, 331. See also Kingship and Monarchy
covenant and, 139
Davidic, 84, 85 divided, 411
eschatology and, 192
history of, 409–413
in Near Eastern myths, 413–414 references to eunuchs in, 205 as theme in royal psalms, 628 tribute and taxation and, 780 view of, of Samuel, 674 Monastic schools
biblical interpretation and, 316
Monasticism
women and, 817
Money, 523–524
archaeology and, 49
Money Changers, 524
Monogamy, 496
Monogenesis vs. polygenesis, 683
Monolatry
Israelite religion and, 297, 334
Monotheism, 166, 524–527 ancient Near Eastern background, 524–525 emergence of, 526–527 of Jews, Christians, Muslims, 638
Shema and, 693
Montanists
canon of scripture and, 102, 103
inspiration and, 304
Montanus, Benedictus Arias, 601
Montebourg Psalter, 756 Months, names of, 744 Moon units of time and, 744 Moon stroke
epilepsy and, 191
Moore, Carey A., as contributor, 399–402, 745–747 Mordecai, 198
Mormonism and the Bible, 527–528
Morris, Leon, as contributor, 92–93
Morrison, Robert, 80
Mosaic Law. See Law, Mosaic
Mosaics, 56–57
Mosca, Paul G., as contributor, 156–157
Moses, 3, 286, 528–531
ark and, 55
ascension and, 61
authority of the Bible and, 65
as chosen by God, 110
conversion and, 133
covenant and, 84
Cushite wife of, 12, 145
depiction of, in art, 56, 57 directing the plagues of Egypt, 595 as divinely appointed lawgiver, 65 dominant role of, in J and E, 567
exodus and, 644
Freud and, 234–235
historicity of, 214
Midianite family and, 215
in Muslim tradition, 639
in Philo, 592
promise of land and, 619
Sabbath and, 665
Sermon on the Mount and, 687–688 speeches of, in Deuteronomy, 164
tabernacle and, 729
Ten Commandments and, 737
theophany and, 740
Torah and, 747
as traditional author of Pentateuch, 214, 580 Mot, 160
Motherhood
in ancient Israel, 808
Moulins, Guyart des Biblia historiale, 757
Mount Carmel, 250
Mount Moriah
Aqedah and, 43
Mount Nebo
ark and, 56
Mount Scopus, 564

Mount Sinai location of, 51
Mourners professional, 96, 531 Mourning, 531–532 causes for, 532 gestures of, 253
Mowinckel, Sigmund, 629
Mowry, Lucetta, as contributor, 533–535
Muddiman, John, as contributor, 818–819
Muhammad, 638–640
life history of, 638–639
Müller, Mogens, as contributor, 710–711, 711–713 Münster, Sebastian and edition of Hebrew Bible, 336
Murabba'at, 159
Murashu texts, 53
Muratori, Canon of, 103, 104
Murder, 532–533
and blood revenge, 68
Murderers Bible, 143
Murphy, Roland E., O.Carm., as contributor, 626–629, 707–708
Murphy-O'Connor, Jerome, as contributor, 348–349, 349–352 Music
mourning and, 531
Music and Musical Instruments, 139, 533–535
Music and the Bible, 535–538 liturgy, 535–536 musical interpretation, 536–537 secular biblical music, 537–538 Musicians, 533
Muslims
Abraham and, 5, 638
Ishmael and, 329
Mycenae
archaeology and, 46
Myrrh, 538
Mysteries
apocalyptic literature and, 35–36
Mystery, 538–539
in Ephesians, 188
of God's kingdom, 86
Mystery Religions, 539 Mysticism, Jewish
at Colossae, 128
Mysticism, medieval biblical interpretation and, 309
Myth, 539–541
Hebrew Bible, 540–541
New Testament and, 541 sea and, 694
sons of God and, 710
Mythologizing
Exodus and, 210
Mythology, 105, 140, 713 Myths, 219, 413

Naaman the leper, 412
Naaran
art at, 56
Nabateans, 542–543
architecture of, 542 art of, 543 ceramics of, 542–543
language of, 542 origins and growth of, 542 technology of, 542–543
Nabonidus, 45, 53, 72, 77, 78
Naboth, 412
Nadab, 3
Nag Hammadi
archaeology and, 47
Nag Hammadi library, 543–544
Agrapha and, 17–18
and apocryphal apocalypses, 41
Christian Apocrypha and, 40
and Ephesians, 187
Nahash, 23
Nahor, 44, 642–643
Nahum lament of, over Thebes, 11
Nahum, The Book of, 544–545
Names and Namegiving, 545–546
divine element in, 546 non-Hebrew and Hebrew, 546 prophetic messages in, 300
and religion of Israel, 333–334
significance of, 545–546
types of, 546
Names for the Nameless, 546–548
Names of God
in Hebrew Bible, 89, 548–549
Naomi, 78, 662–664
Naphtali, 549
Naram-Sin, 44
Ebla and, 176
Nathan, 549
Nathanael, 75
Nathanson, Barbara Geller, as contributor, 43–44, 286–287, 352–356, 437, 596–597 Nation of Islam
and African American traditions, 14
National Association of Evangelicals, 237
National Bible Society of Scotland, 82 Nature and Ecology, 549–551 biblical attitudes toward, 550–551
Garden of Eden and, 178
sacred character of, 550–551
Nazarene Gospel, The, 41
Nazareth, 54, 95, 551–552
Nazareth inscription, 54
Nazirite, 552
Samson as, 552, 673
Nazirite vow wine and, 799
Nea Paphos, 54
Neapolis, 7
Nebo, 552
as Babylonian god, 552
Mount, 552
Pisgah and, 595
as town, 552
Nebuchadnezzar. See Nebuchadrezzar
Nebuchadrezzar, 24, 72, 149, 265, 552–553
archaeology and, 49
Babylonian Chronicles and, 52–53 in book of Judith, 400
Edom and, 179
exile and, 209
history of, 552–553
madness of, 553
Prayer of Nabonidus and, 45
Song of the Three Young Men and, 68
Necromancer. See Witch
Necromancy, 16
Needle's Eye, 553
Negeb, 44, 553
archaeology and, 50
Nehemiah, 53
Esdras and, 194
Ezra and, 220, 553
history of, 553
memoirs of, 555 rebuilding of Jerusalem and, 350, 671 work of, 554–555
Nehemiah, The Book of, 553–555
author of, 555
sources of, 555
theology of, 555
Nehushtan, 262
as cult object, 298
Neighbor, 555–556
Neirynck, Frans, as contributor, 258–259
Nelson, William B., Jr., as contributor, 192–194, 342, 511–512, 619–620, 643, 649–651
Neo-Assyrian empire, 63
Neo-Babylonian period
Ammon in, 24
Nephilim, 556 fate of, 556 relation of Rephaim to, 556
Neriah, 75
Nero, 31, 658
book of Revelation and, 653
Nestorian church
canon of scripture and, 104
Netherlands Bible Society, 82
Neusner, Jacob, as contributor, 521, 730–731
New American Bible, The, 763
New American Standard Bible, 763
New covenant
2 Corinthians and, 137
New Earth
eschatology and, 193
New English Bible, 618, 762
New heaven
eschatology and, 193
New International Version, 763
New King James Bible, 762
New Kingdom
in Egypt, 180
New Moon, 226
New Revised Standard Version and feminist concerns, 230
New Testament
biblical theology, 86–87
covenant and, 138
creation and, 141
of Erasmus, 612
ethics and, 204–205
idols and, 298
irony in, 325
miracles and, 519–520
myth and, 541
social institutions in, 705
son of God in, 710
targums and, 755
theology of, 87–91
view of Eve in, 207
New world
eschatology and, 192
Newton, Isaac
biblical interpretation and, 322

Newton, Isaac (cont.)
science and the Bible and, 683
Nicea
christology of, 90
Nicholas of Lyra
biblical interpretation and, 317
Nicodemus, 408
Nicolaitans
in book of Revelation, 652
Nicolaus of Damascus
Josephus and, 384
Nida, Eugene A., as contributor, 749-752, 776-778
Nietzsche, Friedrich, 280, 453
Niger
Latin word for "black," 11 Nile River, 11, 556-557
commercial importance of, 557 confused with River of Egypt, 656 Delta region of, 179 irrigation and, 556 as source for papyrus, 557 Nineveh, 11, 52, 124, 557
archaeology and, 46 attitude of Minor Prophets toward, 545 in book of Jonah, 557 in book of Nahum, 544-545 library at, 64
as name of rich man, 547 prophecies of destruction of, 557 Nippur, 72
Noah, 11, 268, 557-558
altar and, 21
Ararat and, 46
ark and, 55
Canaan as descendant of, 98
covenant and, 84, 138
depiction of, in art, 56
English literature and, 440
flood and, 232, 557-558
Noah's ark, 55
depiction of, in art, 56
Noll, Mark A., as contributor, 253-254, 605-606
Nomads, 293, 407, 558-559
Amorites as, 24
Arabia and, 44
hospitality laws of, 292 hostile attitudes toward, 558 Israel's ancestors as, 558 pastoral, 247
symbolism of, 559
wilderness and, 798
North, Robert, as contributor, 4-5, 10, 209, 284
Northern kingdom
E and, 173
Elijah in, 182
Elisha and, 183
Ephraim as, 190 establishment of, 331
history of Israel and, 330
Israel as, 329
Northwest Semitic languages
Amorite, 24
Aramaic, 24, 45
Eblaite, 176
Hebrew, 24
Ugaritic, 24, 785
Noth, Martin, 163-164, 385, 581
Number symbolism, 561-563. See also Numerology
in book of Revelation, 654 Numbers, The Book of, 559-561 analysis of, 559-560 literary genres in, 560
significance of, 560-561
sources of, 559-560
twelve tribes in, 560
Numerology. See also Number symbolism
apocalyptic literature and, 36 six hundred sixty-six and, 700 Numismatics
Nabateans and, 543
Pontius Pilate and, 595
Tyrian shekel and, 593
Nuzi
archaeology and, 50
Canaan and, 98
Nuzi tablets, 563 biblical customs reflected in, 563

Oath
covenant and, 138
Obadiah (prophet), 564
Obadiah, The Book of, 564
Obed, 653
O'Brien, Peter T., as contributor, 127-129
Octavius, 281-282
Odyssey
and Apocalypse of Peter, 41
Offering. See Corban
Official Aramaic. See Aramaic, Official Old Kingdom
in Egypt, 180
Old Testament
biblical theology and, 86-87
Christian faith and, 86
covenant and, 83-85, 138
relation between God and people in, 83 synchronic vs. diachronic method in, 83 use of, by New Testament writers, 637-638 Olives, Mount of, 564-565
Ollenburger, Ben C., as contributor, 830
Olson, Dennis T., as contributor, 72-73, 178, 552
Omega. See Alpha and Omega
Omer (measure), 796
Omri, 411, 670
father of Ahab, 19 house of, 183, 332, 389 and Omride dynasty, 332
Onan, 565
One
symbolism of number, 561
Onesimus, 589-590
as author of Ephesians, 186 Onias III
high priesthood and, 475
Ophel, 52
Oracle, 565 in prophetic books, 565 of salvation, 565 setting of, 565
Urim and Thummim and, 786-787
Oral tradition
Agrapha and, 18
canon of scripture and, 103
in Genesis, 247
Pharisees and, 668
Sadducees and, 668
Oral transmission
Mishnah and, 731
Order of Books in Hebrew Bible, 98-100
Oresme, Nicholas, 681
Origen, 66, 279 biblical commentaries and, 315
biblical interpretation and, 311-312
biblical translation and, 752
canon of scripture and, 103
inspiration and, 304
Orontes River, 19, 32
Orphans, 20, 565-566
alms and, 20
responsibility of king to care for, 566 widow mentioned with, 566 Orthodox churches
Apocrypha and, 38
Ossuary, 96
Oster, Richard E., Jr., as contributor, 60-61, 65, 134-135, 189 Ostraca as writings materials, 94
Osuna Bible, 758
Otherworldly journey
apocalyptic literature and, 34
Othniel
book of Judges and, 397
Otto, Rudolph, 286
Our Father. See Lord's Prayer
Ovens, 295
Overman, J. Andrew, as contributor, 91, 161-162, 168-169, 182, 242-243, 427, 491, 499, 501-502, 564-565, 608, 677-678, 689-690, 727-728, 783, 825-826
Oxford University Press, 617-619 printing of Bibles and, 614 Oxyrhynchus papyri, 544 and Agrapha, 17-18

P, 567
account of creation in, 10, 29, 140
date of, 567
dietary laws as concern of, 567 formation of Torah and, 567
as pentateuchal source, 567, 580
Paginus, Sanctes
chapter and verse divisions of scripture, 106, 107 Palestine, 32, 44
agriculture in, 18
Aramaic in, 45
archaeology and, 46
borders of, 250 designation of, 250 geography of, 18 rain in, 18
Palestine Exploration Fund, 48
Palmyra
Aramaic and, 46
Pantheons
monotheism and, 524
Paper commercial production of, from papyrus, 94

Papyri
and Agrapha, 17-18
Papyrus bookmaking and, 93
Jordan Valley and, 382 origin of, along Nile, 557 Parables, 567-570
allegory and, 569 artistic character of, 568
depiction of, in art, 58-59
exaggeration in, 568
gospel of Mark and, 495
interpretation of, in early church, 568-569 list of, of Jesus, 569-570 meaning of, in Hebrew Bible, 567 meaning of, in New Testament, 567 meaning of, in Septuagint, 567
messianic secret and, 515 reason for Jesus' teaching in, 568 rules for interpretation of, 569 teaching in, 409 used to authenticate Jesus' sayings, 567-568 Paraclete, 89, 288. See also Holy Spirit Paradise, 570
in apocalyptic literature, 570 garden of Eden as, 178, 570
in Muslim tradition, 638
in New Testament, 570
as place where righteous souls go, 17 Parallelism in biblical poetry, 598-599 Paraphrases, 570-571
in history of biblical translations, 570-571 Parchment, 571
bookmaking and, 94
Torah written on, 571
PaRDeS
biblical interpretation, 309 Paris Polyglot, 602
scholars involved in, 602
texts used in, 602
Parousia, 87, 90, 571. See also Second Coming delay of, 90
in 2 Peter, 587
Son of man and, 571, 711
1 Thessalonians and, 742
Paschal lamb. See Passover lamb Passover, 18, 74, 95, 166, 216, 225-226, 284, 290, 571-573 blood and, 572 chronology of Jesus' death and, 120
D and, 147
Easter and, 173
Elijah at table of, 183
exodus and, 210, 571-573
family and, 223
half shekel tax and, 524
Jerusalem Temple and, 227
Lord's Supper and, 466
in the Mishnah, 572
as observed at time of Jesus, 572-573
origin of, 572
plagues of Egypt and, 596 relation of, to unleavened bread festival, 572 ritual for celebrating, 572
Passover lamb, 88, 365, 418
Passover papyrus, 221
Pastoral Letters, The, 573-576 church order in, 574 disputed authorship of, 574
elder and, 182
ethical teaching in, 575 false teaching combatted in, 575
outline of, 573-574
Pauline character of, 575 purpose of, 574-575 theological concepts of, 574-576 vocabulary and style of, 574
Pathrapankal, Joseph, C.M.I., as contributor, 206, 793-794 Patriarchs. See also Ancestors chronology and, 117
Patriarchy
creation and, 141
women and, 808
Patte, Daniel
structuralism and, 717
Paul, 5, 6, 8, 9, 32, 74, 78, 576-579
as apostle, 41-42
Apostolic Council and, 42-43
in Arabia, 44 appearance of Jesus to, 576
Areopagus and, 55
Athens and, 65
attitude of, toward Law, 423, 578 author of Acts and, 7
biblical interpretation and, 310, 311
Caesarean imprisonment of, and Ephesians, 186 chronology and, 121, 135
circumcision and, 124 conversion experience of, 42, 120-121, 133, 578 converts of, 577-578
divorce statements of, 171
Ephesian ministry of, 128
Epicureans and, 190
epilepsy and, 191
eschatology and, 193
faith and, 222
fasting and, 225
Gallio inscription and, 135 glossolalia and, 255 house arrest in Rome, 8 imprisonment of, 128 Jewish heritage of, 577 justification and, 405-406
letters of, 578
Lord's Supper and, 465-467
Luke and, 470
marriage and, 497
martyrdom of, in Rome, 576 meaning of "flesh and spirit" in, 231 ministry in Corinth, 54 missionary activity of, 189, 576-578 mystery and, 538-539
Roman citizenship of, 9
Saul as Hebrew name of, 576 sea travel and, 694
Silas and, 694
slavery and, 701
sources for life of, 576-577
theology of, 578-579
Trinity and, 782
Paul VI, Pope
Pontifical Biblical Commission and, 604
Pauline corpus and canon of scripture, 103
Peace, 579
mediated through Jesus Christ, 579 theological dimensions of, 579
Peace Mission Movement and African American traditions, 14
Peace offering, 666-667
Pelethites. See Cherethites and Pelethites
Peloponnesian War, 65
Pentateuch, 579-582
attitude of, toward promised land, 619 authorship of, 580
canon and, 98
confessions of faith in, 581 divine promises in, 581
E and, 173
form of, 579 oral composition and, 581 origins and date of, 580
sources of, 165
themes of, 581 Pentecost, 73, 89, 582
glossolalia and, 255, 582
Holy Spirit and, 582
reading of book of Ruth and, 662 significance of, in Luke-Acts, 582
People of God, 89
Perfume, 140 incense as, 301
Persepolis, 19, 53
Persia, 582-583
gods of, 583
history of, 582-583
Persian dualism and concept of Satan, 679 Persian empire
Cyrus and, 145
Esther and, 198
Persian Gulf, 44
Persian period
Ammon in, 24
book of Ezra and, 219, 220
Edom in, 179
Egypt in, 181
tribute and taxation and, 781
Pesharim
biblical interpretation and, 159, 305
Peshitta
biblical translation and, 752-753
canon of scripture and, 104
Peter, 7, 8, 9, 10, 73. See also Simon Peter
as apostle, 42
Apostolic Council and, 42-43
as author of 1 Peter, 584 Catholic letters and, 10
death of, 121
in Galatians, 239
house of, in Capernaum, 104
Peter, The Letters of, 583-588
Petra, 542-543 and Paul's travels, 125
Petrie, William Matthew Flinders, 46, 47
Pfeiffer, Robert H.
1 Esdras and, 194
Pharaohs, 3, 181, 248-249
Pharisaism
book of Judith and, 401

Pharisees, 159, 168, 392-393, 588-589
beliefs of, 589, 667-668
canon of scripture and, 102
crucifixion of, 142 disputes between Sadducees and, 667-668 elders and, 182
exorcism and, 216
history of, 588-589
interpretation of the Law and, 588
Jesus and, 357
Josephus and, 383
leadership of, 610 meaning of name, 588 oral tradition and, 588 rabbis and, 393
scribes and, 684
sources of information about, 588
synagogues and, 589
zeal for legal debate and, 589
Philemon (person), 589-590
Philemon, The Letter of Paul to, 589-590
Philip, 11, 12, 74, 75, 125
Philip the Tetrarch, 283 Philippi, 7, 9, 125
church at, 590
Philippians, The Letter of Paul to the, 590-591
author and date of, 590
christological hymn in, 590-591
contents of, 590
integrity of, 590
Philistines, 51, 258, 591-592
archaeology and, 591-592
ark and, 55
Dagon as national god of, 147
David and, 388
five city-states of, 591
Hebrews and, 273
history of, 591-592
Pelethites as, 107
Samson and, 673
sea travel and, 694
Phillips, J. B.
as Bible translator, 761
Philo of Alexandria, 256, 592
biblical interpretation and, 66, 311, 592
biblical translation and, 752
canon of scripture and, 1-2 commentaries of, 305
crucifixion and, 142 denunciation of Pontius Pilate by, 595
Essenes and, 198, 393
human person in, 295-296
inspiration and, 304
portrayal of women in, 814
as source for Judaisms of the first century, 392
Philocalian Calendar
Christmas and, 112
Philosophy
Ecclesiastes and, 177
Epicureans and, 190
medieval, 309
Platonism and biblical interpretation, 310
Stoicism and biblical interpretation, 310 Phinehas grandson of Aaron, 11 Phoenicia, 592-594 commerce of, 593 gods of, 593
history of region of, 593
in New Testament, 593
physical features of, 592-593 Phoenician alphabet
Aramaic and, 45
Phoenician script, 822
Phoenicians
Canaanites as, 98
Samaria and, 671 seafaring and, 693
Phylacteries, 594
Pictograms writing and, 821
Pilate, Pontius, 9, 33, 34, 53, 65, 74, 594-595 administration of, 595 brutality of, 595 coinage of, 595
crucifixion of, 142
denounced by Philo, 595
depiction of, in art, 57
in early Christianity, 595
in gospel accounts, 594
Jesus and, 359
Pilgrim people image of, 600
Pilgrims feasts and festivals and, 226-228
Jerusalem and, 355
Pillars of the church, 239
Pim (measure), 797
Pisgah, 595
Pit
as abode of the dead, 336
Pitard, Wayne T., as contributor, 15-16, 23-24, 178-179, 518-519 Pitman, Isaac and shorthand Bible, 144
Pius X, Pope modernism and, 323
Pontifical Biblical Commission and, 603
Pius XII, Pope
Pontifical Biblical Commission and, 603
Plagues of Egypt, 595-596
miracles and, 519
Plants, 596-597 biblical symbolism of, 597 coinage and, 597 crop management and, 597 difficulty in identifying, 596-597 representation of, in architecture, 597 sacrificial system, 597
Plato's Academy, 65 Platonism
ascension and, 61 middle, 305
Platt, James H., as contributor, 512, 731, 787 Pleasure
Ecclesiastes and, 177
Epicureans and, 190
Pliny the Elder
Essenes and, 198, 393
Plumley, J. Martin, as contributor, 179-182, 556-557
Pneumatology, 89
Poetry, Biblical Hebrew, 597-599 characteristics of, 598-599
parallelism in, 598-599 poetic devices in, 599 terseness as characteristic of, 598 Pole, Cardinal Reginald
biblical interpretation and, 318
Politics and the Bible, 599-601 fundamentalism and American, 237 theocratic image in biblical, 599
Polycarp
Easter and, 173
writing of, about women, 817
Polygamy, 496
Polyglot Bibles, 601-603
Polygyny
in Hebrew Bible, 690 Polyphony
music and, 536
Polytheism
in Israel and Judah, 52
Pontifical Biblical Commission, 603-604
Pontius Pilate. See Pilate, Pontius Pool of Siloam, 351 Poor, 604-605
almsgiving and, 20
associated with orphans and widows, 604
Jesus and the, 604-605
in New Testament, 604-605
Paul and, 604
royal responsibility to care for, 604
wisdom and, 604
Pope, Alexander, 443, 452
Popular Culture and the Bible, 605-606
Porrée, Gilbert de la
biblical interpretation and, 316
Porter, J. R., as contributor, 140-141, 302, 645-646 Porters transport and, 749
Possession
exorcism and, 216
Posterity
as pentateuchal theme, 581
Postexilic period
eschatology and, 192
women in, 806-807
Pot (measure), 797
Potiphar
Joseph and, 382
wife of, 546
Pottery, 139-140. See also Archaeology and the Bible; Crafts
archaeology and, 46-47, 49
writing and, 94
Pound, 797
Poverty. See Poor
Praetor, 9
Praetorium, 53
Prayer, 606-608
angelic mediators of, 607 in the Apocrypha, 607 for the dead, 607 in the Dead Sea Scrolls, 607
of Jesus, 607
in the New Testament, 607-608 nonverbal communication and, 607

Prayer (cont.)
sacrifice and, 609
significance of, during exile, 619
synagogue and, 722
Prayer of Azariah, 39, 77, 150
Prayer of Jacob, 630
Prayer of Joseph, 630
Prayer of Manasseh, 39, 630
Prayer of Nabonidus, 45, 150
Preacher, The. See Ecclesiastes Preaching
in Acts, 87
themes in black biblical, 605-606 Precursor
Elijah as, 183
Predestination, 608
Calvinism and, 111
Esau and, 192
in New Testament, 608
in Paul, 608
Preexistence
incarnation and, 301
Jesus and, 362-363
Preller, Scott F., as contributor, 111-112 Priesthood. See also Priests and High Priest of Bethel, 3
book of Leviticus and, 435 historical evolution of, 610 of Jerusalem, 3, 610
Jesus Christ and, 365
Levites and, 276, 434-435, 610
Melchizedek and, 511
synagogue and, 721-722
Urim and Thummim and, 786-787
women and, in Israel, 810
Zadok and, 825
Priestly tradition book of Leviticus and, 435
Priestly Writer. See P Priests and High Priest, 167, 608-611 divine will and, 609 duties of, 610
ephod and, 189
involvement of, with Law, 609-610 Qumran community and, 198 and returning exiles, in Ezra, 220 role of, in Temple, 609 sacrifice and, 609
showbread and, 694
tithes and, 745
women as, 817-818
Primeval History
in Genesis, 245-246
Prince of the Power of the Air, 611 Printing and Publishing, 611-619 aesthetics of Bible and, 614-615 and Bible distribution, 263
curious Bibles and, 143
significance of, 611
Prisca, 293
Prisca and Aquila and church in Rome, 660 Priscilla
Apollos and, 41
Pritchard, James, 49
Procopius of Gaza
biblical interpretation and, 315
Procreation, 4 Promise
covenant and, 139
Davidic kings and, 85
and theology of Exodus, 215 Promised Land, 72, 619-620
image of, in New Testament, 620
Moses and, 529
spiritualization of concept of, 620
Proof texts, 83
Prophecy. See also Prophets Amos and, 24
book of Daniel and, 151
book of Jonah and, 380
and covenant, 85-86
E and, 173
as issue in book of Jeremiah, 347
Jesus and, 357
Midrash and, 306
of national disaster, 621-622
in New Testament, 622-623
social sciences and, 704
women and, 810
as word of God, 818 Prophecy, Christian
canon of scripture and, 102
Prophecy and fulfillment
Christian biblical interpretation and, 310
Prophet like Moses, 85
Samuel as, 674
Prophetic guilds
Elisha and, 183
Prophets, 620-623
as agents of Yahweh, 621
and authority of the Bible, 65-66
biblical politics and, 600
call narratives of, 620-621
canon and, 98-99
as divine messengers, 620-621
as division of Hebrew Bible, 100-101
in early Christianity, 622-623 ecstatic behavior of, 621
ethics and, 203-204 false or lying, 158, 622 kings and, 621
as miracle workers, 621 Miriam as, 520 postexilic, 267 as recorded in prophetic books, 621-622 among Semitic peoples, 621 Spirit of God and, 622
suffering and, 718
testing of, 622
as transmitters of God's word, 621
women as, 806
of Yahweh, 183 Propp, Vladimir
structuralism and, 716
Propp, William H., as contributor, 22, 109-110, 257, 261-262, 268-269, 418, 792-793, 798-799 Proselyte(s), 623. See also Conversion attitude of Ezra and Nehemiah toward, 623 baptism, 623
circumcision and, 123
reception of, among Jews, 623 requirement of circumcision and, 623 Prostitutes attitude of New Testament toward, 624 men warned against, 624 priests forbidden to marry, 624 tax collectors grouped with, in New Testament, 624 Prostitution, 623-624 in extrabiblical Near Eastern texts, 624 image of, in Hosea, 623 male, 624 in patriarchal society, 623-624 polemical usage of cultic, 624 Protestantism
Apocrypha and, 38
fundamentalism and, 236-237
Protevangelium of James, 39 birthplace of Jesus and, 113
Joseph and, 382
Proust, Marcel biblichal echoes in, 451-452 Proverbs, The Book of, 624-626
irony in, 324-325
literary forms in, 625 modeled on Egyptian work, 12 parent-child relationship in, 625 sage-student relationship in, 625 themes in, 624-625
wisdom literature and, 624-625, 801, 802
Providence of God in ancient Greek writers, 608
Ecclesiastes and, 177
in first-century writers, 608 Psalm 151
canonicity of, 626
Psalms, The Book of, 626-629
apocryphal Syriac, 630
authorship of, 155, 626
in Dead Sea Scrolls, 626 differences in rendering of, 626 enthronement of the Lord in, 627 hallelujah in, 267 hymns as type of, 627 individual and national laments as type of, 627-628 laments as type of, 627 literary types of, 626-629 liturgy and, 628-629 musical annotations in, 626 numbering of, 626 recent developments in study of, 629
royal, 628
Selah and, 686 settings for, 626 song of praise as type of, 627 thanksgiving, 627
wisdom and, 626, 628
Psalms of Asaph, 626
Psalms of David, 626
Psalms of Solomon, 630
Apocrypha and, 39
Psalms of the Korahites, 626
Psalterium Quincuplex, 106
Pseudepigrapha, 37, 629-631
apocalypses among, 630
canon and, 631
Christian interpolations in, 631
Christian origins and, 631 definition of, 629
in early church fathers, 631 genres in, 630 hymns and prayers among, 630

Pseudepigrapha (cont.) influence of Greco-Roman culture on, 630 Judaism reflected in, 631 midrashic-type literature among, 630 preservation of, in Christianity, 630
significance of, 631
as source for Judaisms of the first century, 392 testaments among, 630 wisdom literature among, 630
women in, 813–814
Pseudepigraphy and modern biblical criticism, 319
2 Peter and, 586–587
Pseudo-Phocylides, 630 Pseudonymity in ancient writings, 574
apocalyptic Literature and, 35–36
book of Revelation and, 653
and 1 Peter, 584–585
Ptah, 297
Ptolemaic period
in Egypt, 180
Ptolemies, 20
Ptolemy
Egypt and, 181
Ptolemy II
Septuagint and, 686
Publicans, 631–633
Purification rites, 296
Purim, 228
book of Esther and, 198, 200, 228
Puritan culture, 605
Puritans, 620
Purity
water and, 793
Purity, Ritual, 633–634
interpretation of, 633 leprosy and, 431–432 priestly behavior and, 633 regulations concerning, 633 social sciences and, 703–704
Puteoli, 7
Pyramids, 180

Q, 259, 635
synoptic problem and, 724
Qabbalah
biblical interpretation and, 309, 317
and Hebrew Enoch, 185
Qarqar, battle of, 52, 63
Qaus/Qos
as primary deity of Edom, 179
Qere. See Kethib and Qere
Qesitah (money), 524
Qoheleth. See Ecclesiastes, The Book of Qorban. See Corban
Quadrans (money), 524
Quart, 797
Quartodecimans
Easter and, 173
Queen and Queen Mother, 635 foreign alliances and, 635 official status of, 635 religious rituals and, 636 role of, in ancient Near East, 636 terminology for, 635
Queen of Heaven, 636 astral characteristics of, 636
Astarte as, 64
Queen of Sheba. See Sheba, Queen of Queens, 806
Quelle. See Q
Quest for the historical Jesus, 322 Quimby, Phineas and Christian healing, 111
Quirinius, enrollment by Christmas and, 112
chronology and, 120
Qumran, 636
archaeology and, 47
description of settlement at, 159
Essenes and, 198, 393–394, 636
John the Baptist and, 372–373
sexual behavior in, 691
tefillin at, 594
Zadokite priesthood and, 825 Qumran community hope for anointed ones, 31 as The Way, 793
wilderness and, 799
Zechariah and, 827
Qumran literature. See Dead Sea Scrolls Quotations of the Hebrew Bible Jewish exegesis and, 637
Quotation of the Old Testament in the New Testament, 636–638 typology of Paul and, 637 used by Matthew to prove messiahship of Jesus, 637 Qur'an and the Bible, 638–640
Agrapha and, 18
Aqedah and, 43–44
historical criticism and, 639 as holy book of Islam, 638

Rabbat-bene-ammon as capital of Ammon, 23
Rabbi, 641
as interpreter of Torah, 641
as judge, 641
as a profession, 641 regarded as having magical powers, 641 role of, in antiquity, 641 title of, applied to Jesus, 641
Rabbinic Judaism
Mishnah and, 521
Rabbinic literature corban in, 134
crucifixion in, 142
exorcism and, 216–217
Israel in, 329
Jerusalem and, 353
and Judaisms of the first century, 392
Rabbinic tradition inspiration of scripture and, 304 name of Eve in, 207
order of biblical books and, 98–99
Torah and, 747–748
Rachel, 26, 78, 641–642 household gods and, 297
Jacob and, 641–642
Racism, 268
Raguel (archangel), 54
Rahab (primeval adversary of Yahweh), 335, 642
Rahab (prostitute), 642 Rainbow as sign of covenant, 84, 642 Ramesses, 51
Ramesses II
Egyptian expansion and, 181
exodus and, 210
Ramesses III, 181
Ramsay, William M., 50 Ransom redemption as, 644
Raphael (archangel), 54, 642 connection of, with Day of Judgment, 156 in later traditions, 642 Raphael (painter)
and Bible illustration, 299 depiction of crucifixion, 59 Ras Shamra
archaeology and, 47
Ugaritic and, 785
Rashi
biblical interpretation and, 309
Nicholas of Lyra and, 317
Ravenna
art at, 57
Reagan, Ronald, 237
Reason
Stoics and, 714–715
Rebekah, 26, 642–643
Isaac and, 325, 642–643
Rechabites, 407, 643 lifestyle of, 643
in the Mishnah, 643 Reconciliation, 88
in Ephesians, 188
Red Cow, 643 ritual of the, 643
Red Heifer. See Red Cow
Red Letter Bible, 619
Red Sea, 44, 644–645
Redaction criticism, 323
Redeem, 643–644 in levirate marriage, 644
in New Testament, 644
Redeemer. See also Avenger of Blood Christ as, 44 and familial protector, 644
God as ultimate, 644 and payment of debt, 644
Redemption, 88
Redpath, Henry concordances and, 131
Reed
as writing instrument, 94
Reed Sea. See Red Sea
Reese, James M., O.S.F.S., as contributor, 708–710, 803–805 Reformation
Apocrypha and, 38
biblical interpretation and, 279, 317, 321
Reformed tradition
art and, 59–60
Reforms of Josiah
D and, 147
Refuge, Cities of. See Cities of Refuge Regeneration, 645
baptism and, 645
Rehoboam, 52
kingdom of Judah and, 389
Reicke, Bo, 163
Reicke, Bo, as contributor, 119–121, 243, 277–279

Reisner, George A., 46 Religion, 645 of the ancestors, 248 use of term, in Greek literature, 645 use of term, in New Testament, 645 Rembrandt, 59-60
Aqedah and, 44
Remiel (archangel), 54
Remigius of Auxerre
biblical interpretation and, 315
Remnant, 645-646 in Amos, 646
in Ezekiel, 646
flood and, 646
in Isaiah, 646 in Jeremiah, 646
in Letter to the Romans, 646, 662 in postexilic period, 646
Qumran community as, 646
Repentance, 646-647
conversion and, 133
Day of Atonement and, 646 despair and, 647
John the Baptist and, 372, 646 mission of Jesus and, 646
in Paul, 646-647
rites of, 646
sacrificial system and, 646 signs of, 646
Rephaim, 647. See also Nephilim as dead "shades," 647 as race of giants, 647 relation of Nephilim to, 556 at Ugarit, 647 Republic of Plato in Nag Hammadi library, 543
Resch, Alfred, 17
Resurrection, 74, 87, 90, 270, 647-649. See also Afterlife and Immortality apocalyptic literature and, 36, 647 bodily, 296
and burial customs, 96
of the dead, 278
eschatology and, 192-193
as metaphor for Israel's renewal, 647 in proclamation of Jesus, 647 Resurrection of believers
baptism and, 649
in deutero-Pauline letters, 649
in Paul, 649
Resurrection of Christ appearance stories and, 648-649 biblical background of, 647 bodily resurrection and, 17
1 Corinthians and, 136, 647
Easter and, 173, 648
empty-tomb narratives and, 648 exaltation model of, in Hebrews, 647-648
historicity of, 648
Mary Magdalene and, 499 models for interpreting, 647 predicted by Jesus, 647 women as first witnesses of, 815 Resurrection of the dead
eschatology and, 192, 193
rejection of, by Sadducees, 667-668 Reuben, 649
Reuchlin, Johann
biblical interpretation and, 317
Revelation, 649-651
after close of New Testament canon, 651
angels and, 650
authority of the Bible and, 66-67 centered on Jesus Christ, 650
Eastern Orthodoxy and, 174
in Greco-Roman world, 650
Holy Spirit and, 651
in Israel, 650
and Jesus' teaching in parables, 650-651 in Judaism, 651
in New Testament, 650-651
prophets and, 650
of the Qur'an to Muhammad, 638 spiritual gifts and, 651 theological meaning of, 649 understanding of, among ancient Near Eastern peoples, 649-650 Revelation, The Book of, 651-655
allusions of, to biblical literature, 654 Alpha and Omega, 21
apocalyptic and, 34-35
art and, 58
Asia and, 62
author and sources of, 653-654 biblical metaphors and images in, 654
canon of scripture and, 103
depiction of, in art, 59
eschatology and, 193
interpretation of, 654-655
lamb and, 418
recipients of, 652-653
seven churches and, 689 situation and date of, 653 symbolism in, 654-655
unity of, 654
visionary experiences in, 654
Revised Standard Version, 762
Revised Version, 760
Rewritten Bible, 760
Genesis Apocryphon as, 305
Josephus's Antiquities, 305
Jubilees as, 305
Liber antiquitatum biblicarum, 305
Temple Scroll as, 305
Rheims-Douai Bible, 760
Rhetorical criticism, 715
Rhodes, Erroll F., as contributor, 601-603, 755-758, 763-771 Rich, Jeremiah
and shorthand Bible, 144
Richard of St. Victor
biblical interpretation and, 316
Richelieu, Cardinal, 602
Riches, John, as contributor, 198, 588-589, 667-668
Ricoeur, Paul, 280, 629
Riesenfeld, Harald, as contributor, 514-515
Rift Valley, 381 Righteousness, 655-656
alms and, 20
in Dead Sea Scrolls, 655
in Hebrew Bible, 655
in letters of Paul, 655-656, 661 in Matthew, 655
in New Testament, 655
as predicate of Jesus Christ, 656
in rabbinic literature, 655
wisdom and, 804
River of Egypt, 656
confused with Nile, 656 Wadi el-'Arish as, 656 Robbers
crucifixion and, 142
Robert McL. Wilson, as contributor, 543-544
Robert of Melun
biblical interpretation and, 316
Robertson, Pat, 237
Robinson, Edward, 47
Rockefeller, John D., 48
Rogers, Guy MacLean, as contributor, 19-20, 54-55
Rogerson, J. W., as contributor, 26-27, 513, 702-704 Rolle, Richard
as Bible translator, 756
Roman army, 656-657 auxiliaries and, 656 centurion and, 105
duties of, 656
Jews excused from, 656
in New Testament, 656
Roman Catholic church
Apocrypha and, 38
Roman Empire, 8, 657-659 administrative structures of, 658-659 citizenship in, 657-658 client kings in, 658-659
crucifixion in, 142
Egypt in, 181
elites in, 658 emperor and, 184 governors of provinces in, 658-659 hierarchical divisions of, 657-658
history of, 657-658
languages used in, 658 persecution of Christians in, 658 slaves in, 658 taxation in, 659 tetrarch and, 738
under Augustus, 657-658 worship of local gods in, 658 Roman period
archaeology and, 53
Romans, The Letter of Paul to the, 659-662 central theme of, 660 circumstances of, 659-660 content of, 660-662 influence of, 662
Rome, 8, 125
as capital city of Roman Empire, 658 Paul's journey to, 7 as place of publication of Acts, 8 population of, 658 Romulus Augustulus as last Roman emperor, 659
Rosh Hashanah
Aqedah and, 43
and day of judgment, 156
Rothenberg, Benno, 47
Rouault, Georges, 60
and Bible illustration, 299
Royal Polyglot, 612
Royal Printers' Patent, 617-619
Rubens, 60
Rule of faith
canon of scripture and, 104

Rules of religious orders, 448
Runia, David T., as contributor, 592
Rushworth Gloss, 756
Russell, D. S., as contributor, 34–36, 629–631
Ruth
levirate marriage and, 434, 797 Ruth, The Book of, 662–664 attitude toward proselytes and, 623 conversation style of, 663 date and audience of, 663–664 Davidic theme in, 663–664
levirate marriage and, 434, 797 literary allusions to, 664 literary characteristics of, 663
portrayal of women in, 813
in targumic and rabbinic tradition, 664
Ryken, Leland, as contributor, 460–463 Rylands Papyrus
and date of John, 375
Ryskamp, Bruce E., as contributor, 616–617

Sabbath, 96, 665–666
in book of Nehemiah, 554
covenant and, 84
creation and, 140–141
etymology of, 665
in Genesis, 246
in New Testament debates, 665 observance of, 665 origins of, 665
P and, 567 presence of Yahweh and, 216
at Qumran, 665
in rabbinic Judaism, 665 relation of, to New Moon, 226 significance of, during exile, 619
units of time and, 744 Sabbatical year cancellation of debt in, 463
slavery and, 700
Sabeans. See Sheba, Queen of Sabourin, Leopold, as contributor, 254–255, 696 Sacrament, 666
baptism and eucharist as, 666
Council of Trent and, 666
Donatist controversy and, 666 in Eastern Orthodox churches, 666 Reformers' understanding of, 666 sacramental theology and, 666 used for "mysterium" in Vulgate, 666 Sacrifice, 666–667
altar and, 22
of a clean animal, 666
covenant and, 138
death of Jesus as, 647, 667 feasts and festivals and, 226
in Hebrews, 276
human, 667
incense and, 301
lamb as, 418
and laying on of hands, 427
in the New Testament, 667
nonbloody types of, 667 in the Pentateuch, 667 priests and, 609
rejection of, by God, 667
social sciences and, 704 spiritual, 667
repentance and, 647
Saddington, D. B., as contributor, 105, 656–657
Sadducees, 159, 281, 393, 667–668
beliefs of, 667–668
canon of scripture and, 102 disappearance of, 668 disputes between Pharisees and, 667–668
high priesthood and, 611
as opponents of Jesus, 667 and priestly establishment, 393
Zadok and, 667, 825
Sailing. See Ships and Sailing
Saint(s), 89, 668–669
as appellation of Christians, 111 applied to gods, 668 church as, 668
in Hebrew Bible, 668
as reference to holy people, 668–669
Sakenfeld, Katharine Doob, as contributor, 206–207, 228–231
Salem. See Jerusalem
Saller, Richard P., as contributor, 657–659 Salome (daughter of Herodias), 669 dance and, 148, 669
Salome (disciple of Jesus), 669 Salutations, 669 actions accompanying, 669 in Greek, 669 in Hebrew, 669
Salvation, 669–670
of believers in Christ, 670 endtime, 89
eschatological sense of, 670
God as agent of, 669–670
Jesus Christ and, 364 meaning of, in Hebrew and Greek, 669 names derived from Hebrew root for, 670 oracle of, 565 physical, in New Testament, 670 present and future, 670
Second Coming and, 670
this-worldly sense of, 669–670
Salvation history
Lucan teaching and, 473
Samaria, 19, 74, 124, 251, 411, 670–671
archaeology and, 46–47, 48, 49, 52
Asherah and, 62
Assyria and, 64, 332, 671
destruction of, 118, 671
as name for northern kingdom, 670 prophetic criticism of, 671 rebuilding temple at, 671 Yahweh of, 670
Samaria Ostraca, 671
Samaritan language
as dialect of Aramaic, 46
Samaritan Pentateuch, 672
Dead Sea Scrolls and, 160
Samaritans, 159, 394, 671–673
canon and, 101, 102
intermarriage with, 671
Nehemiah and, 554
in the New Testament, 671 opposition of, to rebuilding of Jerusalem, 671 origins of, 672
religious practices of, 672
Shechem and, 693
sympathy of Luke-Acts for, 672–673 temple of, on Mount Gerizim, 671 Sammael, 97
Samson, 673
as judge, 398, 673
as nazirite, 552, 673
Samsu-iluna, 71
Samuel, 16, 30, 73, 78, 673–674, 675
conversion and, 133
as judge, 673–674
history of Israel and, 330 origins of monarchy and, 679–680 sa prophet, 674 view of monarchy of, 674
Samuel, The Books of, 674–677
and books of Chronicles, 113–114
contents of, 674–675
continuity between books of Kings and, 674
historicity and, 676, 677
interpretation of, 677 legendary stories in, 676
as a literary work, 676–677 problems with text of, 675
sources of, 675–676
structuralist approach to, 676 various titles of, 674 San Isodoro in Leon
art and, 58
San Vitale, church
art and, 57
Sanballat, 671
Sanctes Paginus of Lucca, 106
Sanctuaries
Yahwistic, 410–411
Sanders, James A., as contributor, 500–501, 501 Sanhedrin, 611, 677–678
crucifixion and, 142 death penalty and, 595 as hostile to Jesus, 678
Jesus and, 359
Pompey and origin of, 678 in rabbinic period, 678 responsibilities of, 678
scribes and, 684
Sant' Angelo in Formis
art and, 58
Sant' Apollinare in Classe
art and, 57
Sant' Apollinare Nuovo
art and, 57, 58
Santo Domingo de Silos, cloister
art and, 58
Sarah, 26, 83, 84, 96, 266, 678
archaeology and, 50
covenant and, 138–139
in Paul, 678
in Qumran literature, 678 Sarcophagi
art and, 56–57
Sargon II (ruler of Assyria), 52, 64
Sargon of Akkad age of Ebla and, 176
Sariel (archangel), 54
Sarna, Nahum M., as contributor, 98–100
Sartre, Jean-Paul, 454

Satan, 28, 70, 208, 269, 678–679
apocalyptic literature and, 36
Aqedah and, 43
as archenemy of Yahweh, 679 Belial and, 77
in book of Revelation, 654
eschatology and, 193, 217
etymology of the name, 678
exorcism and, 216
in Hebrew Bible, 678–679
Michael and, 518
mythology and, 679
in New Testament, 679
as personification of evil, 678–679 struggle between Michael and, 679
temptation and, 734
Saul, 16, 30, 70, 73, 74, 78, 96, 414, 675, 679–681
altar and, 22
Amalekites and, 22
Ammonites and, 23
as chosen by God, 110
David and, 153, 680
depiction of, in art, 60
Edom and, 179
epilepsy and, 191
evil spirit and, 216
history of Israel and, 330 honored by burial, 680–681 origins of monarchy and, 679–680 rejection of, 680 relation of David and, 680 sacrifice of, condemned by Samuel, 680 Saul. See Paul Savior
Jesus as, 670
Sawyer, John F. A., as contributor, 325–329, 513–514
Scapegoat. See Azazel
Schiff, Jacob, 48
Schleiermacher, Friedrich, 280
Schliemann, Heinrich, 46
Schochet, E. J., 30
Schools
Jewish scribal, in Galilee, 241
Schowalter, Daniel N., as contributor, 26, 41, 95, 121–122, 416, 483, 694–695, 782–783, 789–790
Schuller, Eileen, as contributor, 430–431, 606–608 Science and the Bible, 681–684
Aristotle and, 681
Augustine and, 681
Charles Darwin and, 683
Copernicus and, 681
Galileo and, 682
Isaac Newton and, 683
Johannes Kepler and, 682
Thomas Aquinas and, 681
Tycho Brahe and, 682
Scofield Reference Bible, 684
fundamentalism and, 236
Scopes Monkey Trial, 237 Scourging
crucifixion and, 142
Scribal schools literacy and, 438
Scribes, 167, 684–685
biblical interpretation and, 306 and Judaisms in the first century, 394 Scroll
as manuscript form, 99, 486–487 relation of, to books, 93–94
Scythopolis, 162
Sea of Reeds, 210. See also Red Sea Sea Peoples, 107
Seafaring
Phoenicians and, 593
Seba, 685
Sebaste, 125
Second Coming of Christ, 172, 685–686
Second Isaiah, 327. See also Isaiah, The Book of eschatology and, 192
exodus and, 211
idols and, 298
Second Jewish Revolt
Aramaic documents and, 46 Second Temple half shekel tax and, 524
Second Temple period
women in, 807
Second Vatican Council
biblical interpretation and, 323
Seelim, 159
Segal, Moses Hirsch
biblical interpretation and, 323
Selah, 686
Seleucid empire
Asia and, 62
and books of the Maccabees, 475 Seleucids rulers of Syria, 20 Seleucus I Nicator
as founder of Antioch, 32
Sellew, Philip, as contributor, 21, 27, 74, 104–105, 382, 420, 571, 619, 790
Sellin, Ernst, 235
Semitic language family, 271–272
Semler, Johann S.
biblical interpretation and, 320
Semyaz, 679
Sennacherib, 52, 64, 71, 686
Lachish and, 418
Sensus plenior typology and, 784
Sentences of Sixtus, 543
Seow, C. L., as contributor, 785–786
Sepphoris, 125
Septuagint, 80, 93, 563, 686–687
Apocrypha and, 37
Azazel and, 69
biblical translation and, 752 book of Daniel in, 68
book of Judith and, 401
chapter and verse divisions in, 106
Dead Sea Scrolls and, 160
Eastern Orthodoxy and, 174
Esdras and, 194
exile and, 209
inspiration and, 310
Lamentations and, 419
and name of Jerusalem, 349
pseudepigrapha and, 630
Reed Sea in, 210
Vulgate and, 790
Wisdom of Solomon and, 803
Seraph, Seraphim, 28, 30, 261, 285, 687, 713
Sergius Paulus, 9, 54
Seripando, Girolamo
biblical interpretation and, 318
Sermon on the Mount, 360, 687–689
almsgiving and, 21
Sermon on the Plain
Sermon on the Mount and, 687
Sermons and biblical literature, 450 Serpent as source of temptation, 246 Servant songs
book of Isaiah and, 328
Setel, Drorah O'Donnell, as contributor, 4, 633–634, 643, 805
Seth, 10
Sethian writings, 544
Seven
symbolism of number, 562, 652–654
Seven, The, 689–690
Seven Churches, The, 689
Seventh-day Adventists
Sabbath and, 665–666
Seventy
symbolism of number, 563
Sex, 690–692. See also Adultery in the Greco-Roman Period, 691–692 in the Hebrew Bible, 690–691
sexual immorality
1 Corinthians and, 134, 135, 136
Sexuality
women and, 808
Shakespeare and biblical language, 441
Shalmaneser II, 63
Shalmaneser III, 52
Jehu and, 343
Shalmaneser V, 64, 692
Shamash-shum-ukin, 64, 71
Shammai, 588
Shamshi-Adad I, 63
Shaw, Gregory, as contributor, 61–62, 74, 223, 539, 570
Sheba, 44
Sheba, Queen of, 11, 52, 692
Shechem, 251, 692–693
archaeology and, 47
Amarna Letters and, 22 and judges, 51 sons of Jacob and, 27
Shekel, 524, 797
Shekel, Michal, as contributor, 429–430
Shema, 166, 429, 693
on phylacteries, 594
Sheol, 3, 16, 270, 277. See also Hell as abode of the dead, 277–278, 336
and afterlife, 15
Shephelah, 51, 250
Shepherd of Hermas
canon of scripture and, 103
Sheshbazzar
and book of Ezra, 219, 220
Sheshonq I. See Shishak
Shibboleth, 272, 398, 693
Shiloh, Yigal, 47, 52
Jerusalem and, 349
Ships and Sailing, 694
in Acts, 9
transport and, 749
Shishak, 52 and invasion of Palestine, 181
Rehoboam and, 389

Shofar
Aqedah and, 43
Showalter, Daniel N., as contributor, 73-74, 222-223
Showbread, 95, 694
Shubat-Enlil (modern Tell Leilan), 63
Sibylline Oracles, 35, 630
Sicarii, 394
Sidon, 124
Silas, 9, 694-695
Siloam, pool of, 53
Siloam inscription, 52, 271, 350
Silvanus. See also Silas as secretary of Peter, 584
Simeon, 168, 250, 695
African identified as Niger, 11
Simeon, tribe of, 22
Simon Bar Kokhba. See also Bar Kokhba
Messiah and, 513
Simon Maccabeus, 476-477 and refortification of Jerusalem, 350 Simon Magus, 673
in Acts of Peter, 40
Simon of Cyrene, 11
Simon Peter, 27, 695-696. See also Peter in Acts of Peter, 40
Simon, Richard
biblical interpretation and, 322
Simundson, Daniel J., as contributor, 289-290 Sin, 88, 696
Azazel and, 69
in covenantal theology, 86
hardness of heart and, 269
origin of, 269
Sin offering, 667
Azazel as, 69
lamb as, 418
Sinai, 83, 551, 696-697
covenant and, 139
identification of, with Horeb, 290
Moses and, 529
tabernacle and, 729
Sinaiticus, Codex. See Codex Sinaiticus
Singer, Isaac Bashevis, 452 Sirach, 697
as apocryphal book, 39
authorship and unity, 697
canon of scripture and, 37, 698
date and authenticity, 698
Epicureanism and, 190 Sisters of Jesus, 95
Sistine Chapel
art and, 59
Sitting as a gesture, 253
Six
symbolism of number, 562
Six Hundred Sixty-Six, 699-700
Skin, animal as clothing, 126
Slavery, 268, 274, 605, 700-702
and African Americans, 12 in Paul's letter to Philemon, 589-590
in Roman Empire, 658
Slaves
manumission of, as metaphor for redemption, 88
Slavonic Acts of Peter, 41
Slavonic Apocalypse of Enoch, 35
Smalley, Stephen S., as contributor, 372-377, 377-380
Smith, E. Boyd, 109
Smith, Eli
as Bible translator, 772
Smith, Eli, 47
Smith, George A., 50
Smith, Joseph
Mormonism and, 527-528
Smith, Julia E.
as Bible translator, 760-761
Smith, W. Robertson
biblical interpretation and, 322
Social institutions
Ugaritic tablets and, 786
Social position widows and, 798
Social Sciences and the Bible, 702-707
1 and 2 Corinthians and, 138
cultural anthropology and the Hebrew Bible, 702-704
Israel's classification of the world, 703-704
Israel's origins and social organization, 702
Israel's sacrificial system, 703-704 social dimension of prophecy, 704 sociology and the New Testament, 704-707
Socrates, 65
Sodom, 5, 158, 247, 289
Sodom and Gomorrah, 707
Sodomy, 288-289
Sogdiana, 19
Soggin, J. A., as contributor, 434-435, 644-645, 665-666
Sojourner. See Alien
Solomon, 11, 30, 62, 76, 415, 676, 707-708
Ammonites and, 23
Aram and, 45
archaeology and, 50
Astarte and, 64
as chosen by God, 110
composition of proverbs and, 624 date of accession of, 118 death of, and kingdom of Judah, 389
Ecclesiastes and, 177
Edom and, 179
history of Israel and, 330
as legendary author of wisdom literature, 624-625 Ophel and, 52
as patron of wisdom, 12 Queen of Sheba and, 692 sea trade and, 694
trade and, 748
united monarchy and, 51
wisdom and, 804
Son of God, 7, 84, 87, 245, 287, 710
as title of Jesus, 361, 736 Son of man, 31, 86, 90, 711-713
apocalyptic literature and, 36
in Daniel, 152
Enoch and, 185
eschatology and, 193
in Ezekiel, 218
Jesus as, 360
messianic secret and, 515
parousia and, 571
Second Coming and, 685
war and, 792
Song of Deborah, 51, 398
music and, 533
Song of Solomon, 708-710
allegory and, 709
authorship and date, 708
drama and, 709
portrayal of women in, 813
sexual behavior and, 691
significance of, 709-710 structure and nature, 708-709 typology and, 709
weddings and, 795
Song of the Sea, 210
Canaanite parallels to, 51
Miriam and, 520
Song of the Three Young Men, The, 39, 68-69, 77, 150
Song of the Vineyard, 788-789
Song of the Well, 533
Songs of Zion, 627
Sons of God, 713
Nephilim as children of, 556
Sons of the prophets, 621
Soothsaying
Sortes biblicae and, 713
Sophia of Jesus Christ, 40
Sorcerer. See Witch
Sortes biblicae, 713-714
Sortilege
Sortes biblicae and, 713
Soteriology, 88-89
Soul and body, 295-296
Source criticism and modern biblical interpretation, 319-320 Southern kingdom
history of Israel and, 330
Southwestern Company and distribution of Bibles, 109
Span (measure), 796
Speaking in tongues. See Glossolalia
Specht, Walter F., as contributor, 105-107, 336-337
Spinning wheel, 126
Spinoza, Baruch, 232
biblical interpretation and, 309
Spirit. See also Holy Spirit
in Acts, 288
ecstatic speech and, 287 evil, lying, 287 flesh and, 231
in Fourth Gospel, 89 of God in the Hebrew Bible, 287
Jesus and the, 287
in messianic era, 287 outpouring of, in last days, 89 as Paraclete, 288
prophecy and, 287
as wind, 287
Spirit, Flesh and. See Flesh and Spirit Spirits, evil
epilepsy and, 191
Spirits, unclean
epilepsy and, 191
Spiritual gifts
1 Corinthians and, 136
Spitting, 253

Sprinkling dust on the head
as a gesture, 253
Spurrel, Helen
as Bible translator, 761
Spykerboer, Hendrik C., as contributor, 775-776, 786-787 Square script
Aramaic and, 45
St. Chef
art and, 58
St. Gilles-du-Gard
art and, 58
St. Savin-sur-Gartempe
art and, 58
Stadia, 796
Standing
as a gesture, 253
Stanley, Lynn, as contributor, 615-616
Stanton, Elizabeth Cady, 229-230
Stapulensis, Faber and Psalterium Quincuplex, 106 Starcky, J. L.
Lachish and, 418
State
Jesus' attitude toward the, 600
Paul's attitude toward the, 600 prophetic clash with the, 600
Stater (money), 524
Stein, Robert H., as contributor, 567-570
Steiner, Rudolf, 256
Stendahl, Krister, as contributor, 32-34
Stephanus, Henry, 106
Stephanus, Robert, 79, 612, 614
chapter and verse divisions of scripture, 107
Stephen, 7, 673, 714
death of, 9, 120-121
Stephen Langton, 79
Stern, Philip, as contributor, 22, 69, 169, 189, 641, 747-748
Stoic philosophy and afterlife, 17
Logos and, 464
4 Maccabees and, 482
Stoics, 714-715
in Tarsus, 577
Stone as writing material, 94
Stoning
as method of execution for adultery, 10
Stoops, Robert, as contributor, 6, 70, 42-43, 553, 571, 786
Storm god
Zaphon and, 825
Striking the thigh
as a gesture, 253
Structuralism, 715-718
background and proponents, 716 biblical studies and, 324, 716-717 characteristics, 715-716 discourse analysis, 717
evaluation of, 717
Stumbling block crucifixion as, 142
Styler, G. M., as contributor, 195-198
Stylus
as writing instrument, 94
Succession story, 674
Suetonius, 8 use of the term "Christian" by, 111 Suffering, 718-719
book of Job and, 369
in covenantal theology, 86
Suggit, John N., as contibutor, 225, 301-302, 666
Sumer, 719-720
Sumerian culture
Assyria and, 63
Sumerian flood story, 558
Sumerian King List, 719
Sumerian writings
Lamentations and, 420
Sunday School
and Bible study, 109
Sunday School
and children's reading of the Bible, 108
Sunday, Billy, 237
Susa, 20
archaeology and, 48
Susanna, 39, 77, 150, 720-721
Sutherland, Graham, 60
Suzerainty treaty, 84
Swartley, Willard M., as contributor, 700-701
Sweet, John, as contributor, 31-32, 651-655
Swift, Jonathan, 443 Sword, 794 Symbolic language myths and, 539 Symbolism
apocalyptic literature and, 35-36
and Bible illustrations, 298
Carl Jung and, 402-405
cherubim and, 107-108
and crucifixion, 298 of numbers in book of Revelation, 654 vine and, 789
Symbols, 721
Synagogue, 721-724
Capernaum, 104
Corinth and, 135
Synagogues ornamentation of, and idols, 298
Pharisees and, 589
Synchronic interpretation structuralism and, 715-716
Syncretism
book of Joshua and, 387
Synod of Carthage
canon of scripture and, 104
Synod of Hippo Regius
canon of scripture and, 104
Synod of Rome
canon of scripture and, 104
Synopsis
Thumb Bible and, 144
Synoptic apocalypse, 193
Synoptic problem, 724-727
Augustine's hypothesis, 725
Griesbach hypothesis, 725, 727
Marcan priority and, 726 order of gospel materials and, 724-725 two document hypothesis, 725
Syria, 8, 22, 44, 724-727
Aramaic inscriptions in, 45
Aram and, 44
as Roman province, 659
ruled by Seleucids, 20 Syria, church of Apostolic Decree and, 42
Syriac Apocalypse of Baruch, 35 Syriac language
as dialect of Aramaic, 46
Syriac Menander, 630

Taanach, 51
Amarna Letters and, 22
Tabernacle, 729-730
Moses and, 529
and presence of Yahweh, 216
showbread and, 694
Table fellowship, 90
Tacitus, 8
use of term "Christian" by, 111
Taharqa. See Tirhakah Talent (money), 524, 797
Talmud, 241, 589, 730-731
Agrapha and, 18
Babylonian, 101, 169, 641, 730-731
Palestinian/Jerusalem, 641, 730-731
slavery, 700
Talmudic tradition
targums and, 754
Tamar, 6
levirate marriage and, 434, 797 Tammuz, 731
and descent into hell, 163
Tanak, 98
Tanning, 140
Tanzer, Sarah J., as contributor, 391-395
Tappy, Ron, as contributor, 19, 269-270, 511
Targum, Jerusalem
Aramaic dialect in, 46
Targum, Palestinian
Aramaic dialect in, 46
Targum Jonathan, 754
Aramaic dialect in, 46
Targum Neofiti, 754
Targum of Job, 45
Targum Onqelos, 754
Aramaic dialect in, 46
Targum Pseudo-Jonathan, 754
Targums. See also Translations
Aramaic dialects in, 46
biblical interpretation and, 305
Job, 45
Tarsus as Hellenistic city, 577 as home of Paul, 576
Stoics at home in, 577
Tatian
canon of scripture and, 104
Diatessaron, 104, 753
Tax collectors. See also Publicans associated with sinners, prostitutes, and gentiles, 632 attitude of Jesus toward, 632 attitude of people toward, 632 attitude of Talmud toward, 632
John the Baptist and, 632
Taxes. See also Tribute and Taxation history of collection of, 631-632 payment of, 600
in Roman empire, 631-632, 659
Taylor, John
Thumb Bible and, 144
Taylor, Kenneth N.
Living Bible and, 571

Teacher of Righteousness, 159, 198
Teachings of Silvanus, 543 Tearing garments
as a gesture, 253
Tefillin. See Phylacteries
Teilhard de Chardin, Pierre, 683
Tel Qedesh, 51
Tel Qiri, 51
Tell Balatah
Shechem and, 693
Tell Beit Mirsim
archaeology and, 47
identification of, 47
Tell Brak
archaeology and, 47
Tell ed-Duweir. See Lachish
Tell el-Amarna
Akhnaton and, 180
Tell el-Hesi
archaeology and, 46
Tell el-Kheleifeh
identification of, 47
Tell el-Muqayyar. See Ur of the Chaldeans Tell el-Qasile, 51, 52
Tell en-Nasbeh
archaeology and, 49
Tell esh-Shari'a, 52
Tell Jemmeh fortress at, 52
Tell Mardikh. See Ebla
Tema, 44
Temple, 52, 731–734
altars and, 21 animal sacrifice and, 29
Aqedah and, 43
ark and, 55
Asherah and, 62
book of Malachi and, 484–485
books of Chronicles and, 116 building and kingship, 414
cherubim and, 108
chronology, 117
Cyrus and, 145
destruction of, 37, 620, 734
eschatology and, 192 1 Esdras in, 194 of Ezekiel, 733 in Hebrews, 275
of Herod, 733–734
as house of prayer, 607
Jerusalem, 70, 84, 85, 267, 285 music and worship, 534
new, 267
rebuilding of, 219–220, 267, 350, 619–620, 829 royal theology and, 85
showbread and, 694
of Solomon, 349, 593, 707, 732–733 terminology concerning, 731–732 worship in, by earliest Christians, 820 Zadokites and, 667 of Zerubbabel, 733, 829
Temple of Baal at Samaria, 670
Temple Scroll, 159, 630
Temple, cleansing of, 359
Temptation, 734–735
of Christ, 735–736 Ten
symbolism of number, 562
Ten Commandments, 164, 167, 214–215, 736–738
adultery and, 10
ark and, 56
art and, 59 ethical lists and, 201
idolatry and, 297
Israelite law and, 422–423
murder and, 532
on phylacteries, 594
Sinai and, 696–697
women and, 808
Tent wilderness and, 798
Tents construction of, 293
Terah
at Ur and Haran, 50
Teraphim, 261, 738
as cult objects, 298
magic and, 484
women and, 810
Terseness
as characteristic of biblical poetry, 598
Tertullian, 40
Aqedah and, 43
attitude of, toward women, 817 inspiration and, 304
Testament
2 Peter as, 586
Testament (Assumption) of Moses, 35 Testament of Abraham, 35, 630 Testament of Adam, 630
Testament of Isaac, 630 Testament of Jacob, 630
Testament of Job, 630 Testament of Levi, 35 Testament of Moses, 630 Testament of Naphtali, 35
Testament of Solomon, 630
Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, 630
as apocalypse, 35
Apocrypha and, 39
portrayal of women in, 814
Testimonia, 311
Tetragrammaton, 738
Tetrarch, 738–739
Text families
computers and, 129
Textual criticism, 739–740
Textual transmission computers and, 130
Thanksgiving psalms, 627
Thaumaturgy
Ephesus and, 189
Thebes
Nathan's lament over, 11
Thecla, 40
Theodicy, 86
book of Jonah and, 380
Theology. See Biblical Theology
Theology of New Testament, 87–91
Theology of Old Testament, 82–87
Theophany, 256–266, 740–741
Elijah and, 183
Theophilus
as recipient of Acts, 8
Therapeutae, 394
Thessalonians, The Letters of Paul to the, 741–743
Thessalonica, 9
Paul and, 741–742
Third Isaiah, 328. See also Isaiah, The Book of
eschatology and, 192–193
influence of, on Revelation, 193 Thirty
symbolism of number, 562
Thiselton, Anthony C., as contributor, 279–280
Thomas, 743
Thomas à Kempis
Imitation of Christ, 449
Thomas Aquinas
biblical interpretation and, 316
science and the Bible and, 681
Thomas Matthew Bible, 759
Thomas, doubting
depiction of, in art, 57
Thomson, Charles
as Bible translator, 760
Thoreau, Henry David biblical themes and, 456
Three
symbolism of number, 561
Three Steles of Seth, 544
Thucydides, 7
Thumb Bible, 144
Thummim. See Urim and Thummim
Tiamat, 50, 77
Tiberias
as capital, 125
Tiberius, 32
Tidball, Derek J., as contributor, 704–707
Tiepolo, 60
Tiglath-pileser I, 45, 63
Tiglath-pileser III, 23, 46, 52, 63–64, 743
and Jehu dynasty, 332
Tigris River, 63
garden of Eden and, 178
Tiller, Patrick A., as contributor, 169, 184
Time, Units of, 743–744
Timothy, The Letters to, 573–576. See also Pastoral Letters, The Tinsley, John, as contributor, 56–60 Tishbe
as birthplace of Elijah, 182
Tissot, James, 60
Tithe, 745
Titian
Aqedah and, 44
Titles
christological, 87
Titus, The Letter to, 573–576. See also Pastoral Letters, The Tobit blindness of, cured by Raphael, 642 Tobit, The Book of, 745–747
Tolstoy, 453
Tombs
construction of, 96
Tongues, Speaking in. See Glossolalia Topheth, 747
Torah, 579–582, 747–748
authority of the Bible and, 65–66
ethics and, 202–203
formation of, and P, 567 Jewish liturgy and, 429–430
law and, 421
lending and, 463

Torah (cont.)
Old Testament theology and, 83 oral, and Talmuds, 731, 748
Pentecost and, 581
reading in synagogue, 722 writing material of, 94
written, 748
Torrey, C. C.
1 Esdras and, 194
Tosefta
Talmud and, 731
Tov, Emanuel, as contributor, 159–160, 486–488 Tower of Babel. See also Babel, Tower of ziggurat and, 830
Towner, W. Sibley, as contributor, 149–152
Trade and Transport, 748–749
Assyria and, 63
Egypt and, 180
Traders
Nabateans as, 542
Tradition versus scripture in feminist interpretation, 231 Tradition criticism, 323
Transcendence of God
angels and, 28
Transfiguration of Jesus
theophany and, 741 Transjordan, 44
archaeology and, 47
Transjordanian Plateau, 252 Translation, 749–778 for children, 108
and circulation of the Bible, 122 communicative approach to, 751 and cultural differences, 122 and feminist inquiry, 231 linguistic approach to, 750–751 philological approach to, 750 theory and practice of, 750–752 Translations, 749–778
African languages, 771–773
Afrikaans, 773
Amharic, 773
ancient languages, 752–754
Arabic, 754, 772
Armenian, New Testament, 754
Asiatic Languages, 773–775
Australian aboriginal languages, 775–776
Baltic, modern, 771
Basque, modern, 771
Celtic, modern, 771
Chinese languages, 774–775
Coptic, New Testament, 754
Dutch and Frisian, modern, 765
Dutch, medieval, 755–756
English language, 758–763
English, medieval, 756
Ethiopic, New Testament, 754
French, medieval, 756–757
French, modern, 767
Georgian, 754
German, medieval, 757
German, modern, 764–765
Gothic New Testament, 754 Hausa, 772
of Hebrew Bible, 752–753 Indian languages, 774
isiZuhu, 773
Italian, medieval, 757
Jewish, 763
Korean, 775
Malagasy, 772
medieval versions, 755–758
Micronesia, 775
Modern Greek, 770
Native American languages, 776–778
Portuguese, modern, 768
Rheims-Douai Bible, 760
Roman Catholic, 763 Romance and Italian, modern, 766–767
Romanian, modern, 768
Romansch, modern, 767
Scandinavian, modern, 765–766 seTswana, 773
Slavonic, modern, 768–770
Spanish and Catalan, modern, 767–768
Spanish medieval, 757–758 Syriac, 752–753
targums, 754–755
Tiv, 772–773
Uralic, modern, 770–771
Vulgate, 753
Transport. See Trade and Transport Travis, Stephen H., as contributor, 685–686 Treaties
covenant and, 138–139
overlord, 138 parity, 138 suzerainty, 138, 139 Treatise of Shem, 35, 630
Treatise on Resurrection, 543 Tree of life
garden of Eden and, 178
Tree of the knowledge of good and evil
garden of Eden and, 178
Trial by ordeal accusation of adultery and, 10 Tribes in Galilee, 240
Tribes of Israel, 238, 778–779
Tribute and Taxation, 779–781
ancient Near East, 779–781
Assyria and, 63
Roman empire, 781–782
Trickster
Jacob as, 338
Laban as, 338
Trinity, 782–783
incarnation and, 301
love and, 468
Tripartite Tractate, 543
Trites, Allison A., as contributor, 805–806 Troas, 7
Trocmé, Etienne, as contributor, 134, 418–419
Trommius, Abraham
concordances and, 131
Troy, 46
Trullan Synod
Eastern Orthodox canon and, 174
Trust. See Faith
Tucker, Gene M., as contributor, 198–201, 384–387 Tutankhamun tomb of, 181
Tuthmose I
Egyptian expansion and, 180
Tuthmose III
Egyptian expansion and, 180
Twelve, 75
symbolism of number, 562
Twelve, The
Andrew and, 27
apostles and, 42
Day of the Lord and, 158
exorcism and, 217
Minor prophets, 99
Simon Peter and, 695
Thomas and, 743
Two
symbolism of number, 561
Two Document Hypothesis
synoptic problem and, 724
Tyconius the Donatist
biblical interpretation and, 314
Tyndale, William
as Bible translator, 750, 758–759
Tyndale's English New Testament, 613 Typology, 85, 783–784
Abel and, 97
Aqedah and, 43
art and, 56–57, 58
and Bible illustration, 299
biblical interpretation and, 311
and Christian art, 311 and North American literature, 454–455
Song of Solomon and, 709 Tyre, 124, 592–594
book of Isaiah and, 326
doom of, in Ezekiel, 218

Ugarit
archaeology and, 47 texts from, 51, 105
Ugaritic, 785–786
language, 24 pantheon, 785 poetry, 52 texts, 105 Uncials of Greek New Testament, 489
Underworld, 277–278
United Bible Societies, 82, 750
and children's Bibles, 109
United monarchy
archaeology and, 51–52
Universalism
Zechariah and, 827
Universality of salvation and African American traditions, 14
Unknown God, 786
Unleavened Bread, feast of, 216, 226–227, 572
Exodus and, 210
Passover and, 226–227, 428, 572
Ur, 4, 5, 124
archaeology and, 50
Ur of the Chaldeans, 787
Ur-nammu, 50
Urartu, 63. See also Ararat
Uriah the Hittite, 6, 76, 153 Uriel
archangel, 54

Uriel (cont.)
and Ezra, 196
Urim and Thummim, 609, 786–787
ephod and, 189
magic and, 484
oracles and, 565 revelation and, 650
Ussher, James and chronology, 119
Usury, 463 Utensils
types of, 295
Utnapishtim, 55, 254, 558
Uzziah of Judah, 23, 24

Valdés, Juan de
biblical interpretation and, 318
Valentinian Exposition, 543
Valentinian writings, 543
Valentinus, 256, 543
Valla, Lorenzo
biblical interpretation and, 317
Valley of the Kings, 181 van Daalen, David H., as contributor, 561–563, 689, 699–700 van der Merwe, Gerrit E., as contributor, 771–773 van Dyck, Cornelius
as Bible translator, 772
van Maerlant, Jacob medieval translator into Dutch, 756 Vanity
Ecclesiastes and, 177
Vashti, Queen, 199
Vassal kings
Amarna Letters and, 22
Vatican Council, Second anti-Semitism and, 34
Vatican grottoes and art, 57
Vaticanus, Codex. See Codex Vaticanus
Vawter, Bruce, C.M., as contributor, 370–371, 517–518
Vengeance, 788. See also Avenger of blood Verbum Sempiternum
as Thumb Bible, 144
Verhey, Allen D., as contributor, 201–202, 202–205
Verse Division. See Chapter and Verse Divisions
Versions. See Translations
Vespasian, 8
Josephus and, 383
Vespasian Psalter, 756
Vices, 172
lists of, 202
Vine and Vineyard, 788–789
symbolism of, 789
Vineyard parables of, 789
Virgin birth of Christ, 287, 789–790 and brothers and sisters of Jesus, 95 Virginity in early church, 816
sex and, 690
Virtues lists of, in New Testament, 202 Visigoths
sack of Rome and, 659
Visions
apocalyptic literature and, 34
in Ezekiel, 218
Visscher, Jan
and Bible illustration, 299
Voltaire
and the Bible, 451 von Canstein Bible Institution, 80 von Rad, Gerhard, 83, 581 and book of Joshua, 385 Vows
women and, 810
Vulgate, 78, 80, 93, 755, 790
Additions to Esther in, 200
Apocrypha and, 38
biblical translation and, 753
chapter and verse divisions in, 106
Esdras and, 194
Letter of Jeremiah in, 348 printing of, by Robert Stephanus, 612 printing of, in fifteenth century, 611–612
pseudepigrapha and, 630
Rheims-Douai Bible and, 760
Wycliffe Bible and, 758

Wacholder, Ben Zion, as contributor, 156, 383–384
Wadi, 791
Wadi Daliyeh papyri, 671 Wadi el-'Arish as River of Egypt, 656
Wadi Jabbok
Israel and, 329
Wainwright, Geoffrey, as contributor, 285–286, 819–829
Walton, Brian, 602 War, 791–792
in Hebrew Bible, 791–792
in the New Testament, 792
slavery and, 700
War Scroll, 159
apocalyptic literature and, 35
Washingtoniensis, Codex. See Codex Washingtoniensis Watchers
Enoch and, 185
Water, 792–793
baptism and, 73
Water systems
Gezer and, 140
Gibeon and, 140
Hazor and, 140
Megiddo and, 140
Watts, John D. W., as contributor, 544–545, 564, 828–829
Wax and writing, 94
Way, The, 793–794
as appellation of Christians, 111
Wealth
Letter of James and, 341
Weapons, 794 defensive, 794 offensive, 794
Weaving, 126–127
Weddings, 794–795
Weeks feast of, 227
Weever, John
Thumb Bible and, 144
Weights and Measures (chart), 796–797 Weiss, Johannes
biblical interpretation and, 322
Wellhausen, Julius, 50, 580
biblical interpretation, 320, 322
history of Israel and, 333
Wenham, Gordon J., as contributor, 169–171, 794–795
Wesley, Charles, 80 as author of hymns, 443
Wesley, John, 80
Wessex Gospels, 758
West Bank
archaeology and, 47
Westermann, Claus, 629
Westermann, Claus, as contributor, 243–245, 245–249 Western church
biblical interpretation and, 313–314
Westminster Confession
Apocrypha and, 38
Wette, Wilhelm Martin Leberecht de
biblical interpretation and, 165, 322
Wheatley, Phyllis, 15 Whig Bible, 143
Whitaker, Richard E., as contributor, 131–132
White, John L., as contributor, 432–433
White, Sidney Ann, as contributor, 16–17, 295–296, 812–814
Whitefield, George, 80 Whitman, Walt
the Bible and, 457
Whittier, John Greenleaf
biblical themes and, 456
Whybray, R. N., as contributor, 620–622, 778–779
Widow of Zarephath, 412 Widows, 795, 797–798
alms and, 20
in early church, 816
levirate law and, 434 orphans and, 566
Wife-Hater Bible, 143
Wilderness, 798–799
Azazel and, 69
chaos and, 105
John the Baptist and, 371 journey in, 559–560
manna and, 486
Moses and, 529
motif, in Isaiah, 328
tabernacle and, 729
temptation and, 735–736
Wilkin, R.
Thumb Bible and, 144
Willis, Timothy M., as contributor, 6, 20, 76, 125, 253, 387–388, 434, 549, 565–566, 643–644, 828
Wilson, Robert McL., as contributor, 255–256
Wilson, Woodrow, 605
Wimbush, Vincent, as contributor, 12–15 Windows in houses, 294 Wine, 799–800
forbidden to Rechabites, 643
Wink, Walter, as contributor, 371–373
Winter solstice
Christmas and, 112

Wisdom, 800–801
creation and, 141
glory of God and, 255
incarnation and, 301
Jesus as, 362
Letter of James and, 341
Logos and, 463
personification of, 141
Stoics and, 715
as a woman, 811 Wisdom literature, 800–803 book of Baruch and, 75
book of Job and, 370 book of Proverbs and, 624–625
Ecclesiastes and, 177
ethics and, 204
Joseph story and, 249 notions of afterlife and, 16–17
Sirach as, 698
Wisdom of Solomon, 76, 803–805
as apocryphal book, 38–39
content and structure, 803–804 teaching and significance, 804–805 as wisdom literature, 801 Wisdom psalms, 628
acrostic pattern in, 628
Wise Men, The Three. See Magi
Wiseman, Donald J., as contributor, 77, 145–146, 552–553
Witch, 805
Witness, 805–806
Witness, false, 805
Woe oracles, 265
Woman wisdom as, 800–801
Woman's Bible, The, 229–230
Womanist biblical interpretation, 15 Women, 806–818
ancient Near East and Israel, 807–812
in the Apocrypha, 813 appearances of risen Christ to, 648 in classical sources, 814 daily lives of, in Second Temple period, 812
in early Christianity, 814–818 education and, 812 family and, in ancient Near East, 807–808 female symbolism, 811 in genealogy of Jesus, 245
Greco-Roman and Jewish heritage, 815 Hellenism and, 812 legal status of, 809
marriage and, 496
Mishnah and, 521
negative views of, 811 outside the house, 809 in postexilic biblical literature, 812–813
in pseudepigrapha, 813–814 regulation of, by church fathers, 816 religious practices of, in the ancient Near East, 809–811 Second Temple period, 812–814
Sirach and, 699
social patterns of, and female power, 808–809 social reality of, and narrative patterns, 811–812 Wood carving, 140
Wood tablets
as writing materials, 94
Wood, J. T., 54
Wool and clothing, 126
Woolley, Leonard, 50 and excavation of Ur, 787 Word of God, 818–819
Jesus as, 87
Words of Jesus, 184
Works
James and Paul and, 341
Worship, 819–820
centralization of, and Deuteronomy, 166
Eastern Orthodoxy and, 175
Wrath of God
Day of the Lord and, 158
Wrede, Wilhelm
messianic secret and, 514–515
Wright, David F., as contributor, 223–224, 232
Wright, G. Ernest, 47 Writing
literacy and, 437–438
Writing in Antiquity, 820–823 instruments for, 94 materials, 432
Writings, The
Apocrypha and, 37
and authority of the Bible, 66
canon and, 98–99
as division of Hebrew Bible, 100–101
Lamentations and, 419
and order of biblical books, 99
Wycliffe Bible Translators, 750, 823
Wycliffe, John, 823
as Bible translator, 756, 758
biblical interpretation and, 317

Xanthos inscription, 53
Xerxes
Esther and, 198
invasion of Greece, 19
Ximénes de Cisneros, Cardinal Francisco, 601

Yadin, Yigael, 47, 52, 276
Yahweh, 84. See also Names of God in the Hebrew Bible
Asherah and, 271
Baal and, 411
ban and, 73 Behemoth and, 76
as divine warrior, 791 golden calf as symbol of, 257 graven images and, 261–262 as Holy One of Israel, 286 of hosts, 548 images of, 261–262
monotheism and, 166, 525
as name of God, 334, 548 presence of, in Israel, 215–216 represented in solar terms, 413
tetragrammaton and, 738
as weapon, 794
Yahwism, 409, 411
Elijah and, 183
Kenites and, 407
Yahwist, 338. See also J Abraham traditions and, 5 creation narrative of, 10
Yam Suf. See Red Sea
Yamauchi, Edwin M., as contributor, 46–54
Yeats, W. B., 256
Yemen, 44
YHWH. See Yahweh
Yom Kippur, 228. See also Day of Atonement influence of, on New Testament formulations, 156 in the Jubilee year, 156
Yonge, Charlotte M., 109
Yosef be Mattityahu. See Josephus, Flavius Young, Brigham, 528
Young, Robert
as Bible translator, 760

Zadok, Zadokites, 3, 30, 610, 667, 825
Levites and, 434
Sadducees and, 667
Zaphon, 825
Zealot, 825–826
Zealots, 394
Galatians and, 240
Zebulun, 826
Zechariah, The Book of, 826–828
book of Ezra and, 219
eschatology and, 192
Zedekiah, 11, 194, 828
Zephaniah (person)
as "son of Cushi," 12
Zephaniah, The Book of, 828–829
Zerubbabel, 267, 829
book of Ezra and, 219, 220
as chosen by God, 110
eschatology and, 192
Esdras and, 194
and rebuilding of Temple, 350 Zeus, 593
as friend of strangers, 292
Ziesler, John, as contributor, 655–656
Ziggurat, 829–830
Ziklag destroyed by Amalekites, 22
Zilpah, 26, 62
Zion, 267, 551, 830
covenant and, 139
as mother of nations, 12
Mount, 85
Zionism, 353, 600, 620, 830
Zipporah as Cushite, 145
Ziusudra, 558
Zohar
biblical interpretation and, 309, 310
Zoroaster, 583
Zwingli, Ulrich sacramental understanding of, 666
Zwingli Bible, 764