Introduction

For nearly two millennia, the Bible has been the cardinal text for Judaism and Christianity. Its stories and characters are part of both the repertoire of Western literature and the vocabulary of educated women and men. It is, however, more than a collection of ancient tales. Even before a canonical list of books considered sacred scripture or holy writ was established, the writings we now call the Bible were considered normative: they laid down the essential principles of how human beings should deal with God and with each other. The practice of quoting from, and alluding to, earlier texts as authoritative is found within the Bible itself and has continued unabated in subsequent Jewish and Christian writings. At the same time, the Bible has also been formative; subsequent generations of believers have seen themselves as descended from, and in continuity with, those to whom God had spoken and for whom he had acted definitively in the past, and the recital of those words and events has been instrumental in shaping the religious communities of succeeding generations. The Bible has thus had an immeasurable influence on Judaism and Christianity, on the cultures of which they have formed a part, and on all those traditions in some ways derived from them, such as Islam.

Although the word "Bible" means "book," and the Bible has been treated as a single book for much of its history, it is in fact many books, an anthology of the literatures of ancient Israel, and, for Christians, also of earliest Christianity. The Bible thus speaks with many voices, and, from the time of its emergence as an authoritative sacred text, readers and interpreters have noted its many repetitions, inconsistencies, and contradictions. Since the Enlightenment especially, critical consideration of the Bible—that is, study of it insofar as possible without presuppositions—has irreversibly affected what may be called the "precritical" understanding of the Bible as simply a unified text, God's eternal, infallible, and complete word. Discoveries of ancient manuscripts (such as the Dead Sea Scrolls) and of literatures contemporaneous with, or earlier than, those preserved in the Bible (such as stories of creation and the Flood from ancient Babylonia and the gospels of Thomas and Philip from Nag Hammadi in Egypt), as well as innumerable archaeological finds, have deepened our understanding of the Bible and the historical and cultural contexts in which its constituent parts were written. This new understanding of the Bible has resulted in continuous scholarly attention and popular interest.

The Oxford Companion to the Bible is an authoritative reference for key persons, places, events, concepts, institutions, and realities of biblical times. In addition, the Companion provides up-to-date discussions of the interpretation of these topics by modern scholars, bringing to bear the most recent findings of archaeologists and current research methods from such disciplines as anthropology, sociology, and literary criticism. Interpretation of the Bible has of course not been consistent, and throughout history the Bible has been used to support contradictory positions on such issues as slavery, the role of women, war and peace, forms of government, and finance. The Companion reflects this diversity: it is consciously pluralistic, and its more than 250 contributors, as well as its editors and editorial advisory board, encompass a wide spectrum of intellectual and confessional perspectives. They represent the international community of scholars, coming from some twenty countries, on five continents. No attempt has been made by the editors to produce any dogmatic unanimity; readers should not be surprised to find differing interpretations in different entries. Contributors have been urged to present their own scholarly views while noting diverse perspectives. In general, the articles aim to present the consensus of interpretation, or its lack, attained by the most recent scholarship, and to avoid partisanship and polemic.

Recognizing that different communities of faith have different understandings of which books form their Bibles, the Companion has deliberately adopted a maximalist position: any book or part of a book that is recognized as canonical by any religious community is treated in this volume. A similarly inclusive and ecumenical view has led to the use of neutral terminology whenever possible; thus, following increasingly frequent scholarly practice, the term "Hebrew Bible" is used in preference to "Old Testament," and the abbreviations BCE (Before the Common Era) and CE (Common Era) are in place of BC and AD.

The Companion differs from comparable volumes in its sustained and systematic attention to the role the Bible has played in the ongoing life of various communities of faith, and in the development of the civilizations for which biblical traditions are in part formative. Thus, in addition to lengthy articles on the interpretation of the Bible in Jewish, Christian, and Muslim traditions, there are entries that trace the Bible's ongoing significance in such areas as the arts, law, politics, and literature. There are more than twenty lengthy entries of this type, identified by the phrase "and the Bible"; titles such as African American Traditions and the Bible, Dance and the Bible, Feminism and the Bible, Freud and the Bible, Medicine and the Bible, Music and the Bible, Popular Culture and the Bible, and Science and the Bible indicate the range of these articles. Furthermore, to show the trajectories of biblical traditions, many other entries trace the uses (and abuses) of the Bible from ancient times to the present.

The Companion is thus more comprehensive than the usual Bible dictionary, and provides in alphabetical sequence a broad range of more than seven hundred articles, each signed by the contributor. Articles vary in length from short summaries of what the Bible says about a topic and how biblical traditions have been interpreted and used, to major interpretive essays. The latter often take the form of composite entries, consisting of two or more articles by specialists on various periods and regions: Afterlife and Immortality; Chronology; Interpretation, History of; Literature and the Bible; Translations; and Women are just a few examples. In planning the volume, the editors used the following categories; they illustrate how the development, understanding, and influence of the Bible receive comprehensive coverage in the Companion:

- The Formation of the Bible
  The Bible is the final product of a series of stages, including orally transmitted traditions, shorter and longer written units, collections edited and in some cases translated in ancient times, and final selection by various religious communities as canonical scriptures. There is treatment of all of these processes, and detailed discussion of how the various parts of books and the books themselves were collected, passed on, edited, selected, and arranged, as well as articles on all the books of the Bible, and on the Apocrypha and the Pseudepigrapha.
- The Transmission, Diffusion, and Circulation of the Bible
  Once selected as an authoritative sacred text, the Bible has been continuously translated, reproduced, and disseminated. There are full entries on ancient writing, manuscripts, and bookmaking; on chapter and verse divisions; on the history and processes of printing and publishing the Bible; and on illustrated, children's, and "curious" Bibles. There are also detailed treatments of ancient, medieval, and modern translations of the Bible into hundreds of languages and into all major language groups; of the work of Bible Societies in this regard; and of the role of the translation and diffusion of the Bible in the development of linguistic theory and the spread of literacy.

- The Biblical World

  Under this heading are included key individuals, events, dates, institutions, and realities of daily life in ancient Israel and the earliest Christian communities, understood within the larger contexts of the ancient Near East, Hellenistic Judaism, and Greco-Roman culture. There are, in addition, articles on broader topics, such as the brothers and sisters of Jesus, chronology, circumcision, the Flood, geography, rabbi, the Sabbath, and units of time; and synthetic interpretive essays on subjects such as the history of ancient Israel and Judah, feasts and festivals, kingship and monarchy, letter-writing in antiquity, medicine in biblical times, and animals and plants.

- Biblical Concepts

  The Bible has been both the basis for and stimulus to reflection on a wide range of theological topics and human concerns. Under this rubric the Companion examines biblical theology as such, as well as biblical views of such perennial issues as afterlife and immortality, creation, death, faith, hope, love, monotheism, and Satan. In addition, there are detailed discussions of biblical views of numerous issues that have been the subject of contemporary attention and controversy, such as abortion, homosexuality, marriage, nature and ecology, sex, and women.

- The Interpretation of the Bible

  Every article in the Companion is, of course, interpretive, and considers how biblical traditions have been understood by Jewish and Christian interpreters throughout history. The Companion further provides extensive separate treatments of the history, theory, and practice of the interpretation of the Bible, under such topics as the history of interpretation, quotations from the Hebrew Bible in the New Testament, typology, fundamentalism, and anti-Semitism. There are also articles on how fields such as archaeology and the social sciences, as well as methods such as structuralism, have enhanced understanding of the Bible; discussions of the uses of computers and concordances in biblical studies; and major interpretive essays on such topics as the religion of Israel, myth, and the authority of the Bible.

- The Uses and Influence of the Bible

  Since its formation, the Bible has been a primary resource for Western culture. Its immense influence on British, North American, European, and other literatures is traced in an extensive composite entry on Literature and the Bible. There are also major interpretive surveys of the use of the Bible in art, dance, law, and music, and on the complex interplay between the Bible and such areas as feminism, medicine, politics, and science. Other articles survey the role of the Bible in African American traditions and in Eastern Orthodoxy; its significance for Islam, Mormonism, and other postbiblical religious traditions; its influence on the ideas of Freud, Jung, and Marx; the practice of reading from it in Jewish and Christian liturgical contexts; its continuing role in popular culture; and its use as family record and educational instrument.

The Companion is thus an authoritative and comprehensive reference for a wide audience, including general readers; students and teachers in high schools, colleges, seminaries, and divinity schools; rabbis, ministers, and religious educators; participants in religious education and Bible study programs; and scholars in the variety of disciplines for which the Bible is in some way pertinent.

The Companion does not aim to be an encyclopedia or encyclopedic dictionary, and is not intended as a substitute either for the Bible itself or for a concordance to the Bible. Quotations from the Bible have deliberately been kept to a minimum, and biblical references are illustrative, not exhaustive. Nor has it been thought necessary to include every name found in the Bible, but only those judged important within the biblical traditions or by later readers. This is especially true of persons and places about whom little if anything is known other than what appears in the Bible. Within the scope of one volume, then, the Companion is a reliable guide, from Aaron or Zion, to what the Bible says about a topic and how scholars have interpreted biblical traditions. It explores as well how those traditions have been used since the books of the Bible became scripture.

Use of the Companion

The Companion is arranged alphabetically. Extensive cross-references guide the reader to related entries; these cross-references are of three types:

1. Within an entry, the first occurrence of a name, word, or phrase that has its own entry, is marked with an asterisk (*).

2. When a topic treated in an entry or a related topic is discussed elsewhere in the volume, the italicized words "see" or "see also" refer the reader to the appropriate entry term(s).

3. "Blind entries," that is, entry terms that have no accompanying text but are terms that readers might expect to find discussed, appear alphabetically in the volume and refer to the entries where the topics are actually treated. Thus, the blind entry Decalogue refers readers to Ten Commandments, and Kingdom of Heaven (a term found only in the gospel of Matthew) refers readers to the more frequently used term Kingdom of God.

Further investigation of particular topics is made possible by a detailed index, which provides page references for pertinent subjects and for ancient and modern proper names. Very few volumes comparable to the Companion have such an index; its use will enable readers to locate topics throughout the book.

When appropriate, references are made within entries to the maps found at the end of the Companion, so that readers may locate places named in the text more precisely. There is also a separate index to the maps, enabling more detailed study of historical geography.

At the end of the volume, there is an extensive annotated bibliography, which will enable readers to explore in more detail topics covered in the Companion. The bibliography is divided into categories for easier use, such as the history, geography, and archaeology of biblical times; anthologies of nonbiblical texts; critical and popular introductions to the Bible; reference works; surveys of the history of interpretation; and methodologies used in biblical scholarship.

The translation used in the Companion is The New Revised Standard Version (NRSV), the most recent authoritative translation of the Bible into English, produced by an interfaith committee of scholars and published in 1990. The renderings of the NRSV are the basis for entry titles. Within individual entries, contributors have on occasion used other published translations or their own; in these cases, differences from the NRSV are noted.

Acknowledgments

The Companion has seen a long developmental process, and we wish to thank contributors for their ongoing support of the project. We are most grateful, of course, for their expert contributions, which are the essence of the volume; their names are listed after this introduction.

The advisory editors have been extraordinarily helpful in assuring that the Companion maintains its balanced perspective, proportion, and scope. Jo Ann Hackett, Barbara Geller Nathanson, William Propp, and Philip Sellew have been generous with their advice and time in suggesting contributors, reviewing the list of entries and individual articles, and a variety of other tasks.

Many people at Oxford University Press have been indispensable in the development and completion of the Companion. Invaluable support and wise counsel were provided by Linda Halvorson Morse and Claude Conyers. Stephen Chasteen and Ann Toback were project editors; their coordination of authors, editors, editorial board, copy editors, and production was characterized by skill and tact. We are also grateful to Mark Cummings, Nancy Davis, Liza Ewell, and Donald Kraus for their continuing assistance.

We especially thank Ted Byfield and Eric C. Banks for their meticulous copyediting, Vida Petronis for her diligent proofreading, and Paul Kobelski and Maurya Horgan for their detailed indexing, all of which resulted in a more consistent and accessible book.

Thanks are due to Johanna Froelich, a graduate student at Princeton University, who translated into English a number of articles written in German. Thanks are also due to Shawn Anglim, Anne Brock, Ah Seng Choo, Andrew Gilman, Julia Weaver, and Karen-Marie Yust, students at Harvard Divinity School, and Elsa Stanger, who typed the original manuscript onto disk, and to Gene McAfee, who directed that process as well as typing a great deal himself.

THE OXFORD COMPANION TO THE BIBLE

A

Aaron. A major figure in Israel's origins and the first of its high *priests. In very ancient narratives, he appears without specifically priestly features, as a leader with Hur (Exod. 17.9–16; 24.14), or as *Miriam's brother with no mention of their being related to *Moses (Exod. 15.20), to whom they even appear opposed (Num. 12). Later, but still in fairly early stages of the *Pentateuch's formation, Aaron is said to be Moses' brother and a *Levite (Exod. 4.14), and he begins to appear with features that implicitly suggest a tie with priesthood. He is with Moses when Pharaoh asks for intercession with Israel's God (Exod. 8.25; 9.27–28; 10.16–17); in Exodus 18.12, he may have been added to the account of the *covenant between *Midian and Israel because a later editor may have felt that the covenant sacrifice required a priest; his presence with his sons Nadab and Abihu, reckoned elsewhere as priestly sons, seems also to have been added to the covenant-making scene at *Sinai (Exod. 24.1, 9). The important question of Aaron's role in the episode of the *golden calf (Exod. 32) is problematic. The incident is almost certainly told with the sanctuaries in mind established by Jeroboam I at Bethel and *Dan in the northern kingdom of Israel (1 Kings 12.26–32), but in the story Aaron is not presented as a *priest or as a Levite; his guilt is brought out mainly in Exodus 32.25b, 35b, evident additions to a text in which the behavior of the people, looking to Aaron for leadership, was already contrasted negatively with the religiously correct zeal of Levites (32.25–29). In the Priestly components of the Pentateuch (*P), Aaron's role as Moses' companion in Egypt and in the *wilderness is heightened, but in P he is above all Israel's first high priest, and the other priests inaugurated with him are called his sons (Exod. 28–29; 39; Lev. 8–10; Num. 3.5–4.49; 16–18). The historical background of this development in the figure of Aaron is not clear. Although legitimate priests are called sons of *Zadok in Ezekiel (40.46; 43.19; 44.15; 48.11), with Aaron's name quite unused in that exilic book, some suspect that the preexilic priesthood of *Jerusalem itself claimed an Aaronite origin; others believe that the first group to do so was the priesthood of Bethel, or a Levitical group in *Judah not originally identical with the priesthood of Jerusalem. In any case, the postexilic priests of Jerusalem settled peacefully into their own claim to be the sons of Aaron.

AELRED CODY, O.S.B.

Abaddon. Meaning literally "place of destruction," Abaddon refers to the realm of the dead in the Hebrew Bible. Occurring mainly in *wisdom literature, Abaddon is synonymous with Sheol (Job 26.6.; Prov. 15.11; 27.20), with Death personified (Job 28.22), and with the grave (Ps. 88.10–12). Occasionally the imagery suggests punishment; more often it indicates the inevitability and finality of death. In the New Testament, Abaddon is mentioned once (Rev. 9.11), not as the place of the dead but rather as the name of the *angel of the *abyss who leads a demonic horde of monstrous locusts against most of humanity. Rabbinic literature later describes Abaddon as part of *Gehenna.

Abba. The word for "my father" or "the father." This *Aramaic word appears three times in the New Testament, followed by a translation into Greek: once in Jesus' prayer in *Gethsemane (Mark 14.36) and twice in the letters of Paul, where it is an ecstatic cry of believers in *prayer (Rom. 8.15; Gal. 4.6).

The *prayers of Jesus in the Gospels regularly address God as "Father" (Matt. 11.25, 26; 26.42; Luke 10.21; 23.34, 46; John 11.41; 12.27, 28; 17.1, 5, 11, 21, 24, 25); probably the Aramaic word 'abbā' lies behind the Greek word for father in these prayers. Christian liturgical usage, which drew on reflection about the relation between the "Son" and the "Father," may have shaped the language of some or even all of these passages.

Originally, abba was probably a child's word, but it had become an accepted way of speaking to or about one's father. It expresses a close relation to God on the part of Jesus, a relation that is also expected of the disciples, who were told by Jesus to pray, "Our Father . . ." (Matt. 6.9; see Lord's Prayer). Some scholars have held that the relation between God and Jesus as father and child, which this language expresses, was highly distinctive and original with Jesus, but others point to similar language in Jewish prayers of the period.

In early Christianity, this Aramaic word was retained as an address to God in prayer even after Greek had become the language of worship. It expressed the newly found relation to God as father, a relationship assured by the presence of the Spirit. The original setting for this exclamation may have been *baptism, but it probably also functioned as a response to preaching.

The word also underlies the English word "abbot" (cf. French abbé), a monastic title originating in Syriac Christian usage.

Abortion. Abortion as such is not discussed in the Bible, so any explanation of why it is not legislated or commented on is speculative. One possibility is that the cultural preoccupation with procreation evident in the Hebrew Bible ruled out consideration of terminating pregnancy. Archaeological evidence indicates that in ancient Israel the infant mortality rate was as high as fifty percent. It is also possible that, given the diet and living conditions at the time, female fertility was low. Male control of reproduction and a belief that numerous decendants are a sign of divine blessing are also found in the Bible. These factors support the view that abortion would not have been common.

Alternatively, it can be argued that abortion was practiced without censure. Many women died in childbirth, a strong incentive to avoid carrying a pregnancy to term. Biblical legislation, as in Leviticus 27.3–7, indicates that the lives of children as well as women were not valued as highly as those of adult men, while no value whatsoever was given to a child under the age of one month. There is no indication that a fetus had any status.

A key text for examining ancient Israelite attitudes is Exodus 21:22–25: "When people who are fighting injure a pregnant woman so that there is a miscarriage, and yet no further harm follows, the one responsible shall be fined what the woman's husband demands, paying as much as the judges determine. If any harm follows, then you shall give life for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot, burn for burn, wound for wound, stripe for stripe." Several observations can be made about this passage. The Hebrew text at v. 22 literally reads "and there is no harm," implying that contrary to current sensibilities, the miscarriage itself was not considered serious injury. The monetary judgment given to the woman's husband indicates that the woman's experience of the miscarriage is not of significance, and that the damage is considered one to property rather than to human life. This latter observation is further supported by the contrast with the penalties for harm to the woman herself.

Several texts have been influential in late discussions of abortion. Both Jewish and Christian traditions have regarded the divine command "Be fruitful and multiply" (Gen. 1.28) as demanding a high rate of procreation incompatible with abortion in a non-life-threatening situation. Like Leviticus 27, later rabbinic teachings differentiated between life under and over the age of one month, while relying on biblical injunctions to respect and choose life in determining that abortions could be performed to preserve the life of the mother. Christians opposed to abortion have referred to Luke 1.41–44 as evidence that a child is cognizant in the uterus.

DRORAH O'DONNELL SETEL

Abraham. Abraham is the earliest biblical character who is delineated clearly enough to be correlated, to a limited extent, within world history. His homeland on the Fertile Crescent (possibly at Haran, at least in Gen. 12.1–5) and movements southeast toward Chaldean *Ur (Gen. 11.31), then west to *Canaan and *Egypt, correspond to known *Amorite migratory and commercial routes. He may have been a caravan merchant, though the Bible presents him only as a pastoralist. This vague relation of Abraham to history does not exclude debate as to how much of his biography might have been worked up for vividness or as retrojection of a later tribal unity. More insistent claims of historicity presume contemporaneity with *Hammurapi (despite the discredited equation of the latter with Amraphel [Gen 14.1]). An even earlier date was put forward on the basis of some premature interpretations of *Sodom at *Ebla. The name Abram (= Abiram, as Abner = Abiner), used in Genesis from 11.27 to 17.5, is there ritually changed to Abraham, a normal dialectal variant, though explained in relation to 'ab-hāmôn, "father of many."

A certain unity in the whole Abraham saga (Gen. 11.27–25.11) involves a rich variety of peoples and individuals conditioning his activity; twenty-two separate episodes are discernible (see L. Hicks, Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible 1.16). Eleven are attributed to the Yahwist (*J): base around Haran, Genesis 11.28–30; call westward, 12.1–3; Canaan pause, 12.4–9; separation from Lot, 13.1–13; promise involving Mamre, 13.14–18; progeny like stars, covenant-incubation, 15.1–6, 7–24; *Hagar, 16; the three at Mamre, 18.1–15; vain plea for Sodom, 18.16–33; birth of *Isaac, 21.1–7; and old age, 24.1–25.11. Five other episodes suggest the Elohist (*E): parts of the narrative of the covenant in chapter 15, especially verses 13–16; Gerar, 20; *Ishmael expelled, 21.6–21; Abimelech 21.22–34; and the call to sacrifice Isaac, 22 (see Aqedah). The Priestly (*P) additions include: journey to Canaan, parts of Genesis 11–12; birth of Ishmael, 16.1–16; covenant of El-Shaddai and *circumcision, 17; birth of Isaac, 21.1–3; Machpelah, 23; death, 25.7–11; and, less clearly, the unique episode concerning *Melchizedek (chap. 14).

The three strands respectively see Abraham as "father of all nations" (*J); "model of faith" (E; see Rom. 4.9; Heb. 11.8); and "guarantor of Israel's survival" (P, in the context of exile). The *covenant with Abraham is also a blessing for all the peoples of the earth (Gen. 12.3; 18.18) and especially a bond of religious unity with his other descendants, the Ishmaelites (Arabs: Gen. 21.21; 25.12). Abraham's progress from (Ur or) Haran through Canaan into Egypt involves numerous theophanies (Gen. 12.6, Shechem; 12.8, Bethel; 13.18, Hebron; 21.33, Beer-sheba; 22.14, Moriah), justifying his eventual takeover of the whole area (Gen. 13.14–17) or, more sweepingly, the takeover by "his god" (El) of the cult of the local El, not clearly seen as either identical or different.

In Deuteronomy, Abraham is associated with Isaac and *Jacob (Deut. 1.8; 6.10); the three are often generalized as "your fathers" (9.18; 11.9; NRSV: "your ancestors"), especially as those with whom God made a *covenant (7.12; 8.18), a covenant still in force (5.3). The *Deuteronomic history recalls Abraham in Joshua 24.2–3; 1 Kings 18.36; 2 Kings 13.23; but it is surprising how seldom he is mentioned there, as well as in the Psalms (only 47.9; 105.6, 9, 42) and the preexilic prophets (only Mic. 7.20, probably a late addition). The poorer classes of Judah who never were sent into exile justified their inheritance as the promise to Abraham (Ezek. 33.24), but the stronger group of returnees attributed their own liberation to God's faithfulness to Abraham "my friend" (Isa. 41.8, prominent in James 2.23 and in Muslim tradition, notably as the name of *Hebron, al-Halil). Abraham is often mentioned in the book of Jubilees and sometimes in other *pseudepigrapha.

Abraham is second only to *Moses among New Testament mentions of biblical heroes. Sometimes this is in a slightly belittling sense, when he is claimed as father of the impious (Matt. 3.9; John 8.39). More often the truly Abrahamic descent of the Jews is acknowledged as a stimulus for them to live up to their heritage (Luke 19.9; 16.24; Heb. 6.13). This true but qualified descent from Abraham forms a key factor in *Paul's anguished efforts to determine how and in what sense Christianity can claim the promises made to Israel (Rom. 4.1, 13; Gal. 3.7; 4.22). Ultimately, as father of all believers (Gal. 3.7), Abraham is to be looked to as a source of unity and harmony rather than dissent among Jews, Christians, and Muslims.

Abraham's Bosom. This expression occurs in the *parable of the Rich Man (*Dives) and Lazarus (Luke 16.19–31); after his death, Lazarus is carried by angels to Abraham's bosom (NRSV: "to be with Abraham"). One view is that the imagery is drawn from a child lying in the parent's lap (cf. John 1.18). It is more likely that Lazarus is thought of as sitting next to *Abraham at the heavenly feast. It will be recalled that in John 13.23 the beloved disciple is described as "lying close to the breast of Jesus" (NRSV: "reclining next to Jesus") at the meal. Future bliss was sometimes depicted as a banquet (Isa. 25.6), and this imagery lies behind such sayings as Matthew 8.11, where *gentiles "eat with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven."

Abraham was regarded as the father of the faithful, and the idea that the souls of God's people are after death welcomed by Israel's *ancestors is referred to in 4 *Maccabees, where brothers about to be martyred declare, "If we so die, Abraham and Isaac and Jacob will welcome us" (13.17).

Absalom. Third son of King *David (2 Sam. 3.3). The story of Absalom is presented as a subplot of the life of David, a consequence of David's adultery with *Bathsheba and murder of Uriah (see 2 Sam. 12.7–12; 16.20–22). He kills David's oldest son, Amnon (Absalom's half-brother), for raping his sister, Tamar (2 Sam. 13.1–29). After a brief exile in Geshur, his mother's home, he is allowed to return to *Jerusalem (2 Sam. 14). Apparently fearful that David's judicial inactivity is creating enough discontent to endanger his—or any son's—chances to succeed his father, Absalom conspires against David. He wins a sizable following in Israel, has himself declared king in *Hebron, and chases David out of Jerusalem (2 Sam. 15–16). He soon attacks David in a wooded area of Ephraim, where he is defeated and, contrary to David's wishes, is killed by Joab, the commander of David's forces (2 Sam. 17–18). David's grief at his son's death is characteristically intense (2 Sam. 18.33–19.8). TIMOTHY M. WILLIS

Abyss. The abyss, or bottomless depth, appears in biblical tradition in several related senses. In the Hebrew Bible, tĕhôm (NRSV: "the deep") usually refers to the primordial waters upon which the ordered world of God's creation floats. Related terms are used to describe the depth of springs, the sea, or the earth. The abyss can also stand for the depth of the underworld understood as the realm of the dead. Because of its associations with *chaos and death, the abyss is identified in postbiblical Jewish literature as the realm, or more often prison, of rebellious spirits. This usage appears in the New Testament in Luke 8.31 and throughout the book of Revelation (NRSV: "bottomless pit").

Acrostic. An acrostic is a poem in which the initial letters of each successive line form a word, phrase, or pattern. Acrostics are found in several ancient Near Eastern literatures; in the Bible the only poems of this type are alphabetic acrostics, in which each consecutive line or group of lines begins with a successive letter of the alphabet in the order of the letters in Hebrew. The acrostic poems in the Bible are Psalms 9–10, 25, 34, 37, 111, 112, 145; Proverbs 31.10–31; Lamentations 1, 2, 3, 4; Nahum 1.2–8 (incomplete); Sirach 51.13–30; and the most elaborate, as well as the longest chapter in the Bible, Psalm 119. Because of the structural device of the acrostic, the content of these poems is not developmental. The purpose of the acrostic may have been mnemonic; it also may have been intended to convey the idea that the entire range of sentiment is being expressed, "from A to Z," as it were. Few English translations have attempted to reproduce this formal device; one that does is by Ronald Knox.

Acts of the Apostles. The fifth book of the New Testament in the common arrangement, Acts records certain phases of the progress of Christianity for a period of some thirty years after Jesus' death and resurrection. Acts was originally written as a sequel to the gospel of *Luke; both are clearly from the same author, who apparently planned the complete work from the outset.

Structure. Seven main divisions may be discerned in Acts: the formation and development of the church of *Jerusalem (1.1–5.42); the rise and activity of the Hellenists in the church, which led to their persecution and expulsion from Jerusalem (6.1–8.3); the dissemination of the gospel by these Hellenists, culminating in the evangelizing of *gentiles in the Syrian city of *Antioch (8.4–12.25); the extension of gentile Christianity from Antioch into Cyprus and Asia Minor (13.1–14.28); the decision reached by the Jerusalem church on problems raised by the influx of gentile converts (15.1–16.5); the carrying of the gospel by *Paul and his colleagues to the provinces bordering on the Aegean Sea (16.6–19.20);

Paul's last journey to Jerusalem, his arrest there, and his journey to Rome under armed guard to have his case heard before the emperor (19.21–28.31).

Acts, in short, is concerned with the advance of the gospel from Jerusalem to Rome; its simultaneous advance in other directions is ignored. The narrative reaches its goal when Paul arrives in Rome and, while under house arrest, preaches the gospel there without interference to all who came to visit him (28.30–31).

Authorship and Sources. For Acts, as for the gospel of Luke, the author was dependent on the information handed down by others (see Luke 1.2). But he probably made further inquiry on his own account (Luke 1.3), and he may have been present at some of the events recorded in the later part of the book of Acts. This is the prima facie inference to be drawn from the "we" sections—those sections in which the third-person pronouns "they" and "them" give way to the first-person "we" and "us." There are three such sections: Acts 16.10–17; 20.5–21.18; 27.1–28.16. All three are largely devoted to journeys by sea—from Troas to Neapolis, and then by road to Philippi; from Philippi (Neapolis) to Caesarea, and then by road to Jerusalem; from Caesarea to Puteoli, and then by road to Rome—and may have been extracted from a travel diary. The traditional view, which still has much to commend it, is that the "we" of those sections includes the "I" of Acts 1.1—that the transition from "they" to "we" is the author's unobtrusive way of indicating that he himself was a participant in the events he narrates.

Ever since the second century CE the author has been traditionally identified with the Luke mentioned in Colossians 4.14 as "Luke the beloved physician." The attribution of the twofold work to such an obscure New Testament character has been thought to speak for the genuineness of the tradition. The only question of consequence to be considered is the degree of likelihood that the author of Acts was personally acquainted with Paul, whose missionary activity forms the main subject of the second half of the book. The critical judgment of several scholars is that such personal acquaintance is highly unlikely—that the "Paulinism" of Acts is too dissimilar to the teaching of Paul's letters for the idea to be entertained that the author of Acts knew Paul or spent any time in his company. On the other hand, many authorities maintain that, when account is taken of the difference between the picture of him as seen through the eyes of an admirer and, indeed, hero-worshiper, the Paul of Acts is identical with the real Paul.

The identification of other sources than the "we" narrative is precarious. A new source is sometimes indicated by such transitional formulas as "now during these days" (6.1), "after some days" (15.36), "about that time" (19.23), or by the sudden introduction of terms or names for which no advance explanation has been given, such as Hellenists and Hebrews in 6.1 or King Herod in 12.1. The abruptness of a transition from one source to another may be made smoother by an editorial paragraph, for example, 15.1–5. Occasionally the author follows one source for some time, then breaks off to follow another, and turns back later to resume the earlier one. Thus a source relating the early Hellenistic mission is followed by 8.4–40, a section beginning: "Now those who were scattered went from place to place preaching the word." The author then leaves it to relate the conversion of Paul and *Peter's evangelistic ministry (9.1–11.18); he returns to it in 11.19, "Now those who were scattered because of the persecution that took place over Stephen," and goes on to tell of the founding of the church of Antioch.

From 15.35 on there is a continuous narrative of Paul's missionary work, broken only by occasional speeches (notably, to the Athenians, 17.22–31, and to the elders of the Ephesian church, 20.18–35). A new departure is marked in 19.21, at which Paul's plan to visit Rome is first announced; the remainder of the work tells how that plan was fulfilled in unforeseen ways.

Speeches and Letters. Luke does not appear to have been dependent on written sources for the speeches that play an important part in his work. These conform to the policy inherited by Greek historians from Thucydides (ca. 400 BCE), who explains that he has "put into the mouth of each speaker the sentiments appropriate for the occasion, expressed as I thought he would be likely to express them, while at the same time I endeavored, as nearly as I could, to give the general purport of what was actually said" (History, 1.20.1). Following this principle, Luke introduces speeches with proper regard for the speakers and the setting. *Stephen's defense in Acts 7.2–53, for example, presents a wholly negative appraisal of the Jerusalem Temple, whereas Luke himself, for the greater part of his narrative, treats it with respect. It is not by accident that Paul is the only speaker in Acts to call Jesus "the *Son of God" (Acts 9.20) or to mention *justification by faith (13.38, 39) or redemption by the blood of Christ (20.28). It is widely maintained that Paul's speech to the court of the *Areopagus at *Athens (Acts 17.22–31) cannot in any sense be credited to Paul. But, if the author of Romans 1–3 were brought to Athens and invited to expound the basis of the gospel to its cultured and sophisticated members in terms that they might in some degree understand, it can be argued that he was bound to say something not wholly different from what Luke represents Paul as saying on that occasion. Both here and elsewhere in Acts the speeches are appropriate to the occasion, to the speaker, and to the audience.

What is true of speeches is true also of the letters cited by Luke—the letter from the leaders of the Jerusalem church to the gentile Christians of Antioch and other places in Syria and Cilicia (Acts 15.23–29; see Apostolic Council) and the letter from the commanding officer of the Roman garrison in Jerusalem to the procurator of Judea explaining the circumstances of Paul's arrest (23.26–30). Even if Luke is the composer of those letters as we have them, their contents fit the settings in which they are placed.

Date. The latest event to be recorded in Acts is Paul's spending two years under house arrest in Rome (28.30). This period begins with his arrival in the city, probably in the early spring of 60 CE. Most of the book deals with the twenty years preceding that date, and the book as a whole is true to its "dramatic" date, that is, it reflects the situation of the middle of the first century CE, especially with regard to the administration of the *Roman empire. But the date of writing is not the same as the "dramatic" date. Some scholars have argued that it was written very shortly after that event, possibly even before Paul's appeal came up for hearing in the imperial court. Paul's death is not recorded: would it not have been mentioned (it is asked) if in fact it had taken place?

But the goal of Luke's narrative is not the outcome of Paul's appeal, whether favorable or otherwise, or the end of Paul's life: it is Paul's unmolested preaching of the gospel at the heart of the empire (Acts 28.30–31). In fact Paul's death is alluded to, by implication, in his speech to the *elders of the Ephesian church (Acts 20.24, 25), in a manner that suggests that Luke knew of it. And in general Luke appears to record the apostolic history from a perspective of one or two decades after the events. By the time he wrote, Paul, Peter, and *James had all died; and the controversies in which they were involved, while important enough at the time (as Paul's letters bear witness), had lost much of their relevance for Luke's purpose, so he ignored them.

The date of Acts cannot be considered in isolation from that of the gospel of *Luke. A date later rather than earlier than 70 CE is probable for the gospel. If we date the composition of the twofold work toward the end of Vespasian's rule (69–79 CE), most of the evidence will be satisfied.

Recipients. The one recipient of Acts named explicitly is Theophilus, to whom Luke's gospel also was dedicated (Luke 1.3). We know virtually nothing about him. His designation "most excellent" may mark him as a member of the equestrian order (the second-highest order in Roman society), or it may simply be a courtesy title.

One could regard him as a representative of the intelligent middle-class public of Rome, to whom Luke wished to present a reliable account of the rise and progress of Christianity. As late as the time when Tacitus, Suetonius, and Pliny were writing (ca. 110 CE), Christians enjoyed no good repute in Roman society; writing some decades earlier, Luke hoped to bring his readers to a less prejudiced judgment. There is much to be said for the view of Martin Dibelius that, unlike the other New Testament books, Luke and Acts were written for the book market. Perhaps there was already a positive interest in Christianity in the class of readers Luke had in mind; this could account for the substantial theological content of the work, especially its emphasis on the *Holy Spirit.

Rome is the most likely place for the first publication of the work. Not only is Rome the goal toward which it moves, but with Paul's arrival there, Rome implicitly replaces Jerusalem as the center from which the faith is to spread.

Historical Significance. Whereas the gospel of Luke has at least partial parallels in the other Gospels, all of which are concerned with Jesus' activity from his baptism to his death and resurrection, Acts is unparalleled as a record of events. Its only parallels are occasional passages in the letters of Paul (notably Gal. 1.13–2.14), in which the apostle reviews phases of his career or mentions his travel plans. Apart from Acts, we have no other continuous record of the expansion of Christianity during the thirty years after Jesus' death and resurrection. It is necessary to wait two and a half centuries for the next Christian historian—Eusebius, bishop of Caesarea in Palestine.

Even in his gospel, Luke indicates his interest in relating the gospel to world history when he introduces the ministry of *John the Baptist with an elaborate synchronism (Luke 3.1, 2). This interest becomes more evident in Acts, when the gospel moves into the gentile world. Luke is the only New Testament writer who so much as names a Roman emperor; in addition to emperors, he introduces provincial governors, client kings, civic magistrates, and other local officials. Scholars have drawn attention to the accuracy with which these officials are designated by their correct titles—an accuracy the more noteworthy because some of those titles changed from time to time. Provinces under the nominal control of the Roman senate, for example, are governed by proconsuls, like Sergius Paulus in Cyprus and Gallio in Achaia; Philippi has praetors or duumvirs as its chief magistrates, because it is a Roman colony; Thessalonica is administered by politarchs, a title attested on a number of inscriptions as borne by the chief magistrates of Macedonian cities.

The record of Acts is interrelated with contemporary world history in a way that entitles it to be cited as an authority in its own right. Its authority has also been acknowledged in the matter of travel conditions, on land and sea, in the Roman empire in the period that it covers. Its reports of Paul's journeys in Asia Minor provide unrivaled evidence for lines of communication in that area and for the comparative ease with which they could be used. The "ease" was enjoyed more along the main roads, which were well policed; travel along other roads exposed one to hazards from robbers and others. As for travel by sea, the account of Paul's stormy voyage to Italy and shipwreck at Malta has long been recognized as a valuable document for our knowledge of seafaring in the Greco-Roman world (see Ships and Sailing).

Theological Significance. Luke is no mere chronicler: he envisages a pattern in the events he records. His interest is concentrated on the advance of the gospel: it has been launched into the world by the *resurrection of Jesus and the coming of the Spirit, and nothing can stop it. Paul and others may plan their journeys, but they would achieve little without the guidance of the Spirit of God, directing the course of events by occasionally diverting the missionaries from the path they intend to take and leading them into another (e.g., 16.6–10). Luke has been called the theologian of "salvation history"; Peter and Paul are the principal human agents, but the dominant part is played by the Spirit.

Apologetic Emphasis. In commending Christianity to the good will of his readers, Luke insists that it presents no threat to imperial law and order. He adduces in evidence the judgments expressed by officials of higher and lower degree throughout the empire. Already in the Third Gospel Pontius *Pilate, the Roman governor who hears the charges against Jesus, finds him not guilty of any capital offense (Luke 23.13–17); he sentences him to death because he gives in weakly to the chief priests and their colleagues. In the early chapters of Acts the apostles are flogged by order of the supreme court of Israel (5.40), a body dominated by the chief-priestly families; and Stephen, leader of the Hellenists, is stoned to death after their rejection of his defense (Acts 7.58). But when the heralds of Christianity move out into the gentile world, they receive fairer treatment.

Sergius Paulus, proconsul of Cyprus, gives Paul and *Barnabas a courteous hearing and is impressed by their teaching (Acts 13.7, 12). The praetors of Philippi sentence Paul and *Silas to be beaten and locked up overnight, but on learning that the two men are Roman citizens they apologize for their illegal conduct (16.22–24, 35–39). The politarchs of Thessalonica respond to the serious charge of high treason brought against Paul and his companions by making Paul's friends in the city guarantee his peaceful departure (17.6–9). At *Corinth Paul is accused before Gallio, proconsul of Achaia, of propagating an illegal form of religion, but Gallio, seeing the issue as a dispute between the local Jews and a Jewish visitor, refuses to take up the matter: so far as he is concerned, Paul must be tolerated as long as no breach of law or public morals is committed (18.12–16). In *Ephesus some leading citizens of the province of *Asia befriend Paul, and when an unruly assembly demonstrates against him, the town clerk, the chief executive officer of the city, absolves him of any offense against the cult of Ephesian *Artemis (19.23–41).

All this builds up a case in favor of Paul, who at the end of Acts, charged with offenses against public order, is about to have his appeal heard by the emperor; it also builds up a case for Christians throughout the empire, who will still be around when Paul is no longer alive.

Canonical Significance. Early in the second century CE, when the four Gospels began to circulate as one collection, Acts was detached from Luke's gospel. But when, about the middle of that century, decisions were made about the New Testament *canon, Acts came into its own as the "hinge" that joined the gospel collection to the collection of Pauline letters. Those like Marcion, who ascribed apostolic authority to Paul alone, had no use for Acts. Acts, while not giving Paul the title *apostle in a distinctive sense, provided ample evidence that he was all that his letters claimed him to be; at the same time, it gave Peter and his colleagues full apostolic status. There is an impressive series of parallels in Acts between Paul and Peter, as though Luke planned to show that the status and ministry of both had equal divine attestation. James of Jerusalem, whose claims were exalted above those of Peter and Paul in at least one branch of second-century Christianity, plays a minor part in Acts (15.13–21).

Acts, in short, is a thoroughly catholic work, catering to all legitimate viewpoints in the church. Perhaps it was this aspect of Acts that stimulated the inclusion in the canon, alongside the Pauline collection, of another collection of letters, the catholic letters as they are traditionally called, bearing the names of James, Peter, John, and Jude. It is a matter of further interest that Acts was closely associated with these catholic letters in the copying and transmission of the New Testament, regularly sharing one codex with them or, in a more comprehensive codex, being followed immediately by them. Adam. Adam (possibly meaning "ruddy" or "earth") is the common noun in Hebrew for "human(-kind)"; only in Genesis 1–5 (when used without the article) and 1 Chronicles 1.1 is it the proper name for the first man. This usage highlights the unity of humankind, leaving no special apartness for Israel or Abraham. The stylized Priestly (*P) account of the creation of humans in Genesis 1.26 and more anthropomorphic narrative of the Yahwist (*J) in Genesis 2.7 neither disprove nor suggest (the) Adam's origin by evolution, a question that simply did not arise. God's image is in "the man" in Genesis 1.26, as "the man's" in turn is in Seth (Gen. 5.3; but cf. the different perspective in 1 Cor. 11.7). Normal human toil and *death as a punishment for (the) Adam's sin is the focus in Genesis 3 rather than either its propagation or the "protoevangelium." In the New Testament, Adam is chiefly a type of Christ (Rom. 5.14; cf. "last Adam," 1 Cor. 15.45) in relation to release by resurrection from an original sin (1 Cor. 15.22, 45), perhaps taking up Adam as the ideal man (Sir. 49.16; Wisd. of Sol. 10.1).

Adultery. Adultery is voluntary sexual intercourse by either a married man or a married woman with someone other than his or her spouse. In ancient Israel, both the man and the woman would be considered guilty. It was prohibited by both versions of the *Ten Commandments (Exod. 20.14; Deut. 5.18) as well as by the Holiness Code of Leviticus (18.20). According to Leviticus 20.10, which prohibits adultery with the wife of one's *neighbor, the penalty for this crime was death. The mode of execution was probably the same as that specified in Deuteronomy 22.23–24, which deals with the case of a young woman, a virgin, who was engaged to be married but met and had sexual intercourse with another man in the city. Both were guilty of adultery and were to be taken to the gate and stoned to death. This punishment is also assumed in the New Testament story of Jesus and the young woman accused of adultery, where Jesus says, "Let anyone among you who is without sin be the first to throw a stone at her" (John 8.7).

Adultery was probably considered sufficient grounds for *divorce in ancient Israel. This is implied in Deuteronomy 24.1, an introduction to the law concerned with remarriage, where one interpretation of the phrase "something objectionable" has been that it refers to adultery on the part of the woman and that only this behavior justified a divorce. If a man suspected his wife of adultery but did not have any evidence, he could require her to submit to trial by ordeal, which would both determine her guilt or innocence and incorporate a physical punishment in the case of her guilt (Num. 5.11–31). In the Gospels, adultery is the only acceptable reason for divorce, although some scholars think that the phrase "except on the ground of unchastity" (Matt. 5.32) is an addition to earlier tradition (cf. Mark 10.2–12; Luke 16.18; 1 Cor. 7.10–13; Rom. 7.3).

Africa.

Names and Words for Africa. Africa appears throughout the Bible from Genesis 2.11–13, where the sources of the *Nile River are located in the garden of *Eden, to the apostle Philip's baptism of the African official in Acts 8.26–39. To recover these numerous references in the original Hebrew and Greek of the Bible, sometimes lost or obscured in English translation, one must first identify the key biblical names for Africa and its people.

"*Cush" in Hebrew and "Ethiopia" in Greek designate the land and people of the upper Nile River from modern southern Egypt into Sudan (Map 7:F6). The more indigenous term for this region is Nubia. "Ham" is another Hebrew term for the darker-hued people of antiquity. In Genesis 10, *Ham is son of *Noah who populates Africa, *Canaan, and *Arabia after the *Flood. In poetry, the name Ham is a synonym for Egypt (e.g., Ps. 78.51).

"Niger," the Latin word for "black," is used in Acts 13.1 to identify an African named Simeon. Simeon's companion Lucius was also African as is indicated by his place of origin, Cyrene, in Libya (Map 14:D4; see Acts 2.10). Jesus' cross is carried by Simon, also from Cyrene (Matt. 27.32).

In addition to Hebrew, Greek, and Latin terms for Africa, the Bible also uses Egyptian and Nubian names for the land and its people. The references to Africa encompass the length of the Nile Valley from the deep southern origins of the Nile down to the delta where it empties into the Mediterranean Sea. From the Lower Nile in the north to the Upper Nile in the south, the African skin color varied from brown to copper-brown to black. For the Egyptians used to these color variations, the term for their southern neighbors was Neḥesi, "southerner," which eventually also came to mean "the black" or "the Nubian." This Egyptian root (nḥsj, with the preformative p^{3} as a definite article) appears in Exodus 6.25 as the personal name of Aaron's grandson Phinehas (= Pa-neḥas). In Acts 8.27, the first non-Jewish convert to Christianity is an African official of the Nubian queen, whose title, Candace, meaning "queen mother," is mistaken for her personal name.

Africa and Egypt. *Egypt is in Africa, and both the Bible and the early Greek and Roman explorers and historians viewed this great civilization of the Nile as African. Before the modern idea of color prejudice, the distinctions noted in antiquity between the brown Egyptians and their darker-hued neighbors to the south did not contain the racial and cultural connotations that exist today. The Bible therefore classified Egypt, along with Canaan and Arabia, as African in the Genesis account of the restored family of peoples after the Flood (Gen. 10).

This linkage between Egypt and its southern neighbor Nubia/Cush is reinforced by the presence of these darker southerners in Canaan during the ancestral period and afterward as major elements in the Egyptian army garrisoned there. The early-fourteenth-century BCE *Amarna Letters, correspondence from Canaanite kings to Pharaoh Akhnaton, testify to the early African presence there. One letter, from Abdu-heba, king of pre-Israelite *Jerusalem, complains of the rebellious Nubian troops stationed there. One can speculate that an African presence remained in the area, and that maintaining their tradition of military prowess, later generations of Nubians/Cushites either became part of *David's forces which captured Jerusalem, or remained part of Jerusalem's militia which David incorporated as his own, as he did with the older *Jebusite priesthood.

Still later in Israelite history, during the reign of *Hezekiah of Judah (727–698 BCE), Nubia ruled Egypt as its Twenty-fifth Dynasty (751–656 BCE), and forged a close alliance with Judah in a common effort to ward off capture by the *Assyrians. Even as the prophet Isaiah protested that the king should trust in God rather than in the Egyptians for the defense of Jerusalem, his oracle on the Cushite emissaries (Isa. 18.1–2) fixed in biblical tradition the Egypt/African common identity. This same equation is expressed in Nahum's lament over the fall of the Egyptian capital Thebes (Nah. 3.8–9), even as he exults over the destruction of Assyria's capital *Nineveh.

Africa at the Royal Court and in the Wisdom Tradition. The Africans who are named in the Hebrew Bible are closely aligned with the royal court and *wisdom traditions of ancient Israel. One of David's Cushite soldiers brought news of the death of his son *Absalom (2 Sam. 18.21–32), and *Solomon, already married to an Egyptian princess (1 Kings 3.1), entertained the Queen of *Sheba who had come to visit him on a trade mission (1 Kings 10.1–13). *Jeremiah was saved from death under King *Zedekiah by an African court official Ebed-melek ("servant of the king"; Jer. 38–39), while in an earlier incident under King Jehoiakim a messenger of African heritage named Jehudi communicated with the prophet (Jer. 36.14). The prophet *Zephaniah is called "son of Cushi" (Zeph. 1.1) in his genealogy, which extends back to Hezekiah.

Solomon as patron of wisdom opened the door to Egyptian proverbs and poetry as evidenced in segments of the book of *Proverbs modeled upon the Egyptian "Instructions of Amen-em-ope" (Prov. 22.17–24.34), and in Psalm 104, which echoes an Egyptian hymn to Aton. Hezekiah, who aligned himself with the Cushite Dynasty, is also listed as a royal patron of Israel's proverbial wisdom (Prov. 25.1). The maiden in Song of Solomon 1.5 proclaims, "I am black and beautiful, O daughters of Jerusalem, like the tents of Kedar, like the curtains of Solomon." The dual imagery is clear: dark hue is paralleled by the black goat-skin tents, and beauty is matched by the sumptuous royal curtains. (The Hebrew connector wĕ is taken in its normal sense as a conjunctive "and" rather than the less usual disjunctive "but").

Africa in Israelite Worship and Messianic Thought. Among those known to God under the imagery of *Zion as mother of nations is Cush (Ps. 87.4), who also brings tribute to the Temple (Ps. 68.31). This concern for Cush and the other nations may extend from the formative experience of the *Exodus and wilderness sojourn, where Hebrews were accompanied by a "mixed multitude" (Exod. 12.38), including Phinehas (Exod. 6.25) and *Moses' Cushite wife (Num. 12.1).

In prophetic literature, after God's wrath is vindicated on the nations of the earth, God will change their speech so all can worship God, and "from beyond the rivers of Ethiopia my suppliants, the daughter of my dispersed ones, shall bring my offering" (Zeph. 3.10). This refers to the African diaspora, to Israelite exiles in Africa returning with gifts of thanksgiving to God. Africa then with its people seen as converts shall come to worship God in Zion, along with dispersed Israelite exiles. It is in this context of God's universal reign that the prophet Amos proclaims, "Are you not like the Ethiopians to me, O people of Israel? says the Lord" (Amos 9.7). God is judge and ultimately redeemer of all nations.

The New Testament proclamation of Jesus as *Messiah continues in the early mission of the apostle Philip who baptizes the African official in Acts 8.26–39. It is significant that in this incident the term "messiah" is interpreted in light of Isaiah 53.7–8 as God's suffering servant. That the African was reading Isaiah suggests that the emissary was a recent convert or a *proselyte.

In the light of the Psalms and the prophets, then, Africans can be viewed both as diaspora and as proselytes among Israel's dispersed people, and also as forerunners of the conversion of all the nations of the earth.

African American Traditions and the Bible.

Introduction: Reading the Bible = Reading the Self and the World. African Americans' engagement of the Bible is complex and dynamic. It is a fascinating historical drama, beginning with the Africans' involuntary arrival in the New World. But as sign of the creativity and adaptability of the Africans and of the evocative power of the Bible, the drama continues to the present day, notwithstanding the complexity and controversies of intervening periods. Thus, there is in African Americans' engagement of the Bible potential not only for an interpretive history of their readings as a history of their collective self-understandings, visions, hopes, challenges, and agenda, but also—because of their singular experience at least in the United States—for significant, even singular challenges for critical biblical interpretation in the late twentieth century.

First Reading: Awe and Fear—Initial Negotiation of the Bible and the New World. From the beginning of their captive experience in what became the United States, Africans were confronted with the missionizing efforts of whites to convert slaves to the religions of the slavers. These religions or denominations—especially Anglicanism—were for the most part the establishment religions of the landed gentry; they did not appeal much to the slaves. Numerous testimonies from clerics, teachers, and missionaries of the eighteenth century register frustration and shock over the Africans' lack of understanding of and uneasy socialization into their religious cultures. The formality and the literacy presupposed by these cultures—in catechetical training and Bible study, for example—clearly frustrated the easy or enthusiastic "conversion" of the African masses. Not only were the Africans, on the whole, according to custom and law, deemed (and made) incapable of meeting the presupposed literacy requirements, but they did not seem emotionally or psychically disposed toward the customary sensibilities and orientations of the establishment religions. These missionary efforts were not very successful.

The Bible did have a place in these initial missionary efforts. But that place was not primary: its presence was indirect, embedded within catechetical materials, or muted and domesticated within doctrinaire or catechetical, and mostly formal, preaching. But it needs to be stressed that the Africans' introduction to "the Bible," or "the scriptures," by whatever agency, would have been difficult, according to available evidence. Cultures steeped in oral traditions at first generally find frightful and absurd the concept of a religion and religious power circumscribed by a book, then certainly difficult to accept and fathom; later, perhaps, they may find it awesome and fascinating.

Second Reading: Critique and Accommodation. It was not until the late eighteenth century, with the growth of nonestablishment, evangelical, and free-church and camp-meeting revivalistic movements in the North and South, that African Americans began to encounter and engage the Bible on a large scale and on a more intimate basis, minus the bewilderment. Finding themselves directly appealed to by the new evangelicals and revivalists in vivid, emotional biblical language, and noting that nearly the entire white world explained its power and authority by appeal to the Bible, the Africans could hardly fail to be drawn closer to it. They embraced the Bible, transforming it from the Book of the religion of the whites—whether aristocratic slavers or lower-class exhorters—into a source of psychic-spiritual power and of hope, a source of inspiration for learning and affirmation, and into a language capable of articulating strong hopes and veiling stinging critique. The narratives of the Hebrew Bible and the stories of Jesus, the New Testament's persecuted but victorious one, captured the collective African imagination. This was the beginning of the African American historical encounter with the Bible, and the foundation for the cultivation of the phenomenological, sociopolitical, and cultural presupposition(s) for its different, even conflicting historical readings of the Bible to come.

From the late eighteenth century through the end of slavery, the period of Reconstruction, and into the modern Civil Rights era of the 1950s and 1960s, African Americans continued their engagement with or readings of the Bible. These readings reflected major dynamics in the self-understandings and orientations of a major segment of African American culture, if not the majority. The founding of the independent churches and denominations beginning in the late eighteenth century historically postdates and logically presupposes the cultivation of certain identifiable African diaspora religious worldviews and orientations. The Bible played a fundamental role in the cultivation and articulation of such worldviews and orientations. It was discovered as a type of language world full of drama and proclamation such that the slave or freedperson could be provided with certain powerful rhetorics and visions that fired the imagination.

The most popular reading of the Bible was one in which the Protestant *canon provided the rhetorics and visions of prophetic critique, the blueprints for "racial uplift," and social and political peace (integration) as the ultimate goal, in addition to steps toward personal salvation. This reading of the Bible reflected the dominant sociopolitical views and orientations among African Americans in this period. The "reading"—both of the Bible and of American culture—expressed considerable ambivalence: it was both critical and accommodationist: on the one hand, its respect for the Protestant canon reflected its desire to accommodate and be included within the American (socioeconomic, political, and religious) mainstream; on the other hand, its interpretation of the Bible was on the whole from a social and ideological location "from below," as it were, and reflected a blistering critique of Bible-believing, slave-holding, racist America. Important personalities—from Frederick Douglass to Martin Luther King, Jr.—are among the powerful articulators of the reading. But the popular sources, some anonymous, some by not-very-well-known individuals—the songs, conversion narratives, poetry, prayers, diaries, and the like—are a truer, more powerful reflection of history.

That this reading reflected considerable ambivalence about being in America on the part of a considerable segment of African Americans over a long period of history is indisputable. That it reflects class-specific leanings within the African American population is also indisputable. Those who continued to "read" the Bible and America in this way continued to hope that some accommodation should and could be made. Those most ardent in this hope on the whole saw themselves as close enough to the mainstream to make accommodation (integration) always seem feasible.

The great interest in the dramatic narratives of the Hebrew Bible notwithstanding, it was the motifs of a certain cluster of passages from the New Testament, especially Galatians 3:26–28 and Acts 2 and 10:34–36, that provided the hermeneutic foundation for this dominant "mainstream" African American reading of the Bible—and American culture. These passages were important because of their emphasis on the themes centering around the hope for the realization of the universality of salvation and the kinship of humanity. The passages were quoted and/or paraphrased in efforts to relate them to the racial situation in the United States by generations of African Americans—from the famous to those known only in statistics, stereotypes, and generalizations, in settings ranging from pulpits and lecture halls to nightclubs and street corners, in the rhetoric of the sermon and in the music of the streets.

That this reading continues to reflect the ethos and orientation of a considerable number, perhaps the majority, of African Americans, can be seen in its institutionalization in most African American institutions and associations—from the churches to civil rights organizations. Further, some of the most powerful and influential voices among African Americans continue to accept the ethos reflected by the reading. This suggests the continuing power of the ethos, even if it be argued that it is no longer the singular dominant ethos.

Third Reading: Critique from the Margins. Another reading was cultivated in the early decades of the twentieth century, primarily in the urban centers of the North and South. It reflected the sentiments of displaced and disoriented rural and small-town residents who moved to the big cities in search of better job opportunities. These individuals formed new religious communities that gave them a sense of belonging and solidarity missing in the established "mainline" churches and communities. A very different reading of the Bible is in evidence among such groups, one that was also reflective of a different attitude about society and culture. It was a more critical, even radical attitude about America; there was little hope of full integration into the mainstream. America was seen as racist and arrogant; its "mainstream" religious groups—including the African American groups—were seen as worldly and perfidious.

The engagement of the Bible and of religious texts in general more clearly reflects and articulates this attitude. The latter was not held by one single group; it was held by a number of groups—the Garvey Movement, Father Divine and the Peace Mission Movement, the Black Jews, the Nation of Islam, the Spiritual churches, the Pentecostal movement, among the most prominent. What they had in common were sensibilities, attitudes about the world, which were reflected not only in their more radical (Afrocentric or racialist) interpretation of the (Protestant-defined and -delimited) Bible, but also in their acceptance of other esoteric authoritative texts that, of course, justified their sensibilities and agenda. Whether through the radical reading of the (Protestant) Bible, the rejection or manipulation of its canonical delimitations, or through acceptance of other esoteric authoritative texts, these groups expressed their rejection of the racist and worldly religious ways of America and of the accommodationist and integrationist agenda of the African American religious mainstream. Many of them focused, to degrees far beyond anything on record among the African American establishment churches, on the utter perfidy and hopelessness of whites (e.g., Nation of Islam, Garvey movement) as well as the destiny and salvation of African peoples (especially Black Jews).

Fourth Reading: Leaving Race Behind. Another African American reading of the Bible and American culture is emerging as a dominant one in the late twentieth century. It is in many respects a reaction to both the integrationist/accommodationist and the separatist readings discussed above. Its use of the Bible is a sharp departure from the traditional African American engagement of the Bible. To be sure, African Americans have historically been evangelical in their religious sensibilities, including the attachment of primary importance to the Bible as guide. But there has heretofore generally been a looseness, a kind of playfulness with the Bible. The letters of the Bible and its literal sense were less important than the evocative power of the stories, poetry, and prophetic proclamations. What generally mattered most was the power of the Bible to function as a language, even a language world, into which African American visionaries, prophets, rhetors, and politicians could retreat in order to find the materials needed for the articulation of their own and their communities' views. Now there are many African Americans whose engagement to the Bible is more doctrinaire and literal, even fundamentalist. And the hermeneutic foundation or presupposition, too, has shifted from historical and cultural experience, from being race-specific (as with the mainstream groups) or radical (as with the "sects" and "cults"), to being (as it is claimed) "Bible-based," that is, focused upon true doctrine in the letters of the Bible, relativizing racial identity and experience.

In this reading of the (Protestant) Bible, which is considered the deracialized and depoliticized quest for the truth and salvation, the most radical criticism of African American religious communities and culture is expressed. Insofar as the Protestant canon is not questioned, and insofar as the foundation or presupposition for reading the canon is claimed to be other than historical experience, then a total rejection of African American existence is expressed. In much the same way that the rise of fundamentalism among whites in the early decades of the twentieth century represented a rejection of modernism, so within the world of African Americans a turn toward fundamentalism represents a rejection of African Americans' special historical experiences and claims. That in religious matters African American religious communities are being abandoned or are being transformed into fundamentalist camps on the order of white fundamentalist camps, that religious truth can now be claimed to be unrelated to experience, is a most significant development. The proliferation of new fundamentalist churches and denominational groups among African Americans, as well as the new alliances with white fundamentalist groups, is astounding.

The phenomenon begs further comprehensive investigation. But it is very clear that it represents a most significant turn in African American religious and cultural history.

Women's Reading. In evidence throughout this history of African American "readings" of the Bible are the special readings of African American women. From Phyllis Wheatley to modern "womanist" and other interpreters, women are part of each of the "readings" distinguished above. But across each of these readings, differences in historical periods, locations, classes, and other factors notwithstanding, collectively women have for the most part added special emphases. Especially poignant among them is the radical challenge of consistency in prophetic communal self-judgment as African American religious communities apply the moral imperative to define the universality of God's economy of salvation.

Afterlife and Immortality. This entry consists of two articles on views of life after death within the historical communities of Ancient Israel and Second Temple Judaism and Early Christianity. For related discussion, see Death; Israel, Religion of.

Ancient Israel

Israelite views of the afterlife underwent substantial changes during the first millennium BCE, as concepts popular during the preexilic period eventually came to be rejected by the religious leadership of the exilic and postexilic communities, and new theological stances replaced them. Because many elements of preexilic beliefs and practices concerning the dead were eventually repudiated, the Hebrew Bible hardly discusses preexilic concepts at all; only scant and disconnected references to afterlife and the condition of the dead appear in the texts. A few passages from late-eighth through sixth-century sources are illuminating, however, because they attack various aspects of the popular notions about the dead during that period. With these data, a general though sketchy picture of Israelite views can be proposed.

Like all cultures in the ancient Near East, the Israelites believed that persons continued to exist after *death. It was thought that following death, one's spirit went down to a land below the earth, most often called Sheol, but sometimes merely "Earth," or "the Pit" (see Hell). In the preexilic period, there was no notion of a judgment of the dead based on their actions during life, nor is there any evidence for a belief that the righteous dead go to live in God's presence. The two persons in the Hebrew Bible who are taken to heaven to live with God, Enoch (Gen. 5.24) and Elijah (2 Kings 2.11), do not die. All who die, righteous or wicked, go to Sheol (see Gen. 42:38; Num. 16.30–33).

The exact relationship between the body of a dead person and the spirit that lived on in Sheol is unclear, since the Bible does not discuss this issue. Many scholars assume that the Israelites did not fully distinguish between the body and the spirit, and thus believed that the deceased continued to have many of the same basic needs they had when they were alive, especially for food and drink. Unless these needs were met, the dead would find existence in Sheol to be unending misery. Such a close connection between feeding the dead through funerary offerings and their happiness in the afterlife is well attested in Mesopotamia and Egypt. It is assumed that Israelite funerary practices were similar and included long-term, regular provision of food and drink offerings for the dead.

Other scholars have pointed out the lack of evidence in the Bible for such funerary offerings. Two passages often quoted in reference to such offerings, Deuteronomy 26.14 and Psalm 106.28, are ambiguous and can be interpreted in different ways. Archaeological evidence from Iron Age tombs suggests that food and drink were provided at the tomb only when the *burial took place. There is no evidence for regular post-funeral offerings of food at tombs in Israel. It is possible that the Israelites assumed that Sheol had its own food supply, and that the food placed in the tomb was conceived as provisions for the journey of the deceased to Sheol, but this is speculative.

Virtually no discussion of what existence in Sheol was thought to be like is preserved in preexilic literature. The few datable texts in the Bible that describe Sheol tend to be late and belong to authors who opposed important aspects of the popular view. They present Sheol in negative terms, as a place of darkness and gloom, where the dead exist without thought, strength, or even consciousness (Ps. 88.3–12; Isa. 38.18–19; Job 10.21–22; Eccles. 9.10).

These texts appear to be reactions against a considerably more positive view of existence in Sheol that was held in the preexilic period. There is evidence that many Israelites thought that the dead continued to play an active role in the world of the living, possessing the power to grant blessings to their relatives and to reveal the future. This was done through the process of necromancy, the consultation of the dead by a medium, and related practices, which appear to have been quite popular in Israel. Evidence for this is found in the substantial number of vehement denunciations of necromancy in the prophetic and legal literature of the eighth through sixth centuries BCE (e.g., Lev. 19.31; 20.6, 27; Deut. 18.10–14; Isa 8.19–20). Only one narrative account of a necromantic session has been preserved in the Bible—the story of *Samuel's ghostly consultation with *Saul at Endor (1 Sam. 28), and Saul is roundly criticized by the seventh-century editor of the books of Samuel for having resorted to this practice (see Witch).

Necromancy was particularly opposed by the religious group that supported the worship of Yahweh alone. This group argued that blessings and the telling of the future were prerogatives of Yahweh, not of the dead, and that consultation with the dead for such purposes was an abomination against Yahweh. The popular views of afterlife and the dead came under increasing attack during the late eighth and seventh centuries. The laws against necromancy date to this period, and a number of outright attacks and satires on the older ideas about the nature of existence in Sheol appear in the literature of the time (e.g., Isa. 8.19–22; 14:9–11). It is interesting to note, however, that the laws against necromancy in Deuteronomy and Leviticus still assume not that it was impossible to summon the dead from Sheol but that it was inappropriate.

These laws apparently did not have the desired effect on the Judean population. During the exile, when the "Yahweh alone" party finally came to control the religious leadership of Judah, a further step was taken. Several texts appearing to date from the exilic and postexilic periods suggest that it is not only improper to consult the dead but actually impossible to do so. A new theology developed that argued there is no conscious existence in Sheol at all. At death all contact with the world, and even with God, comes to an end. This notion explicitly appears in several late Psalms (6.5; 30.8–10; 88.3–12; etc.), Job (3.11–19; 14.10–14; 21.19–21), and Ecclesiastes (9.3–10). This startling idea was not new in the Near East. Skepticism about the afterlife is found in some Egyptian texts as early as the Middle Kingdom (ca. 2000–1750 BCE), but such notions were never adopted as an official doctrine there. In postexilic Judah, however, this became the authoritative stance of the religious leadership, though it was probably not widely held by most Judeans.

WAYNE T. PITARD

Second Temple Judaism and Early Christianity

In the postexilic period, and particularly in the Hellenistic period following the conquest of *Alexander the Great in 332 BCE, Jewish thought concerning *death and afterlife underwent a major change, owing to the widespread influence of the Platonic idea of the immortality of the soul (see Human Person). Whereas prior to the period of the Hellenistic empires the official religious stance of Israel acknowledged some form of shadowy existence in Sheol for the person after death (see Hell; also the previous article in this entry), beginning in the third century we find a flowering of literature describing the fate of the human soul after death, often in vivid and moving terms. This change is best illustrated by two passages from the *wisdom literature. The book of Ecclesiastes (ca. third century BCE) illustrates the dominant view at the end of the *exile: "Whoever is joined with all the living has hope, for a living dog is better than a dead lion. The living know that they will die, but the dead know nothing; they have no more reward, and even the memory of them is lost. . . . Whatever your hand finds to do, do with your might; for there is no work or thought or knowledge or wisdom in Sheol, to which you are going" (Eccles. 9.4–5, 10). The Wisdom of Solomon, written during the Hellenistic period, shows strong influence of Greek, especially *Stoic, thought: "God created us for incorruption, and made us in the image of his own eternity, but through the devil's envy death entered the world, and those who belong to his company experience it. But the souls of the righteous are in the hand of God, and no torment will ever touch them. In the sight of the foolish they seemed to have died, and their departure was thought to be a disaster, and their going from us to be their destruction; but they are at peace. For though in the sight of others they were punished, their hope is full of immortality" (Wisd. of Sol. 2.23–3.4).

Two ideas concerning the fate of the soul after death were held in tension during the Hellenistic and Roman periods. The first was that of resurrection, that is, that at the end of time the soul would be rejoined with the body and each person would then receive reward or punishment. The concept is found in the Hebrew Bible only at Daniel 12.2: "And many of those who sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt." A modification of this idea was that only the righteous dead would be resurrected to share in the messianic age.

The second idea was that the immortal soul lived on after the death of the body, and immediately received its reward or punishment. This idea is vividly illustrated in the Testament of Abraham (ca. 100 CE), which depicts the judgment of souls after death. Each soul is brought before Abel, son of *Adam, for judgment. The deeds of the soul are weighed in the balance; the righteous receive salvation, but the wicked are given over to fiery torments (Test. Abr. 12–13).

The tension between these two ideas continued in rabbinic Judaism and early Christianity. References to the rabbis' views of the afterlife are scattered, but may be summarized thus: at death, the soul leaves the body, but may return from time to time until the body disintegrates. The righteous souls go to *paradise, but the wicked to hell. Finally, in the messianic age there will be a bodily resurrection.

In early Christianity, the tension of the "already" of immortality and the "not yet" of resurrection continued to exist, but was transformed by the death and *resurrection of Jesus. This is best illustrated by the teaching of Paul: "But if Christ is in you, though the body is dead because of sin, the spirit is life because of righteousness. If the Spirit of him who raised Jesus from the dead dwells in you, he who raised Christ from the dead will give life to your mortal bodies also through his Spirit that dwells in you" (Rom. 8.10–12). In certain groups, such as the community of John, the notion of the bodily resurrection was overridden by the spiritual life of the believer in Christ: "Very truly, I tell you, anyone who hears my word and believes him who sent me has eternal life, and does not come under judgment, but has passed from death to life" (John 5.24). Neither view has become dominant, and both continue to exist in tension in Judaism and Christianity until the present.

Agrapha (Extracanonical Sayings of Jesus). Since the publication of J. G. Körner's De sermonibus Christi "agraphois" (1778), "agrapha" (literally "unwritten things") has become the name for sayings attributed to *Jesus, but not found (i.e., "not written") in the canonical *Gospels. Interest in collecting such sayings started in the sixteenth century, but Alfred Resch was the first to present the results of a systematic research in 1889. His extensive collection of more than three hundred extracanonical sayings has been substantially enriched in the twentieth century by new manuscript discoveries.

Sources. Within the New Testament, but outside the Gospels, there are a few sayings attributed to Jesus (Acts 1.4–8; 11.16; 20.35; cf. 1 Cor. 7.10 and 1 Thess. 4.15). Some sayings, though transmitted in some manuscripts of the Gospels, have not been adopted into the *canon, and have been relegated to the critical apparatus of the various editions of the Greek New Testament (e.g., Matt. 6.13; 20.28; Mark 9.49 [codex D]; Luke 6.5 [codex D]; 9.55–56a; 11.2c [codex 700]; John 6.56 [codex D]). The fragmentary papyri (especially those from Oxyrhynchus in Egypt) discovered since the end of the nineteenth century, and the more extensive apocryphal gospels (especially the *gnostic gospels discovered in 1945 at *Nag Hammadi), contain a rich collection of "logia." The most important is the Gospel of Thomas; other gnostic writings containing revelations and hymns also provide a large range of peculiar sayings. Numerous church fathers, from the second century on, quote words of Jesus that are only partially present in the Gospels, if at all. A few words have been found in ancient liturgies and church orders. The *Talmud preserves two unparalleled sayings of Jesus (ʿAbod. Zar. 16b, 17a; Šabb. 116 a–b). The *Qurʾān and later Islamic writings also refer to several unknown sayings.

Origin. Oral tradition preceded and even for some time accompanied the written tradition of the Gospels. Therefore, in principle at least, some ancient sayings may have survived in oral form even after the Gospels were written, and later authors may have integrated them into their works. But it is also likely that an important figure like Jesus himself became the center of a creative tradition. Others' statements were attributed to him, and new sayings were created.

Evaluation. Taking into account the plurality of sources, spread over several centuries, there is naturally a great variety among the agrapha. They vary from possibly authentic sayings, through adaptations and combinations of sayings from the Gospels, to pure fantasy and tendentious creations. Several of them have been forged for a particular situation, for example, to support with Jesus' own authority a later (orthodox or heretical) concept or practice.

Each saying is in some way a witness to a certain concept and a particular setting. Certain collections, especially the gnostic logia, provide valuable information about various tendencies in early Christianity. In most cases, differences from the form and content of the canonical sayings, together with some evident peculiarity, clearly exclude authenticity. Among the several hundred agrapha, only a few have some chance of being really ancient and perhaps authentic. This complex documentation, therefore, adds little to a better knowledge of the historical Jesus or the earliest Christian tradition.

Examples of agrapha that have often been thought to be authentic sayings of Jesus are:

"Be approved money changers."

"The one who is near me is near the fire; the one who is far from me is far from the kingdom."

"No one can obtain the kingdom of heaven who has not passed through temptation."

"There shall be divisions and heresies."

Agriculture. In the Bible agriculture and religion are intimately connected. Of the three major festivals two were clearly connected with the agricultural year. The Feast of Weeks was associated with the first fruits and the end of the grain harvest. The Feast of Booths was an occasion of joy at the completion of the harvesting of fruits. Some have connected the *Passover with the beginning of the grain harvest. (See also Feasts and Festivals.) Furthermore, the poetic imagery of the Bible is heavily freighted with agricultural *metaphors. The blessing of God was perceived in agricultural abundance and his cursing in drought. The golden age was described in terms of agricultural productivity. The singer in the *Song of Solomon uses agricultural images to portray his beloved. Renewal for the author of the later part of Isaiah (chaps. 40–66) was expressed visually in miraculous agricultural phenomena. Jesus' teachings include many agricultural metaphors. The New Testament often uses agricultural images for the church.

Water. Palestine has almost no rain for six months of the year (15 April to 15 October). In late October and November the "early rain" begins. Precipitation then slackens in December and January only to intensify again in March (the "later rain"). The *Mishnah prescribes a series of fasts if the rain fails to appear in October and November (m. Taʿan. 1.4–7). The dew in May and June triggers the final ripening process of the grain and renders the stalks soft enough to facilitate reaping.

Snow usually falls each winter on the hill country. The snow is seen as a special blessing and is called in Arabic "the salt of the earth." It kills the insects and is absorbed rather than running off. From ancient times there has been some irrigation from the *Jordan River, from its tributaries, and from the great spring of En-gedi. (See also Geography of Palestine; Water.)

Land Preparation. The soil is rich and deep in the valleys, but most of the land is rocky hills that must be terraced to be used for agriculture. Solid rock is but a few inches below the surface. A wall is built on the slope, then stones are removed and earth carried in to level the ground (see Isa. 5.1–2). Thus the rocky ground in the parable of the sower indicates an area where the soil covering is too thin to support a mature plant (Luke 8.6). Plowing is done with a light one-handled plow. The farmer's other hand holds a thin pole with a small spade on one end used for cleaning the plow point and a spike on the other end used for driving the oxen. The point of the plow is covered with iron. This metal sleeve is held together with strips of iron about the shape of a sword (cf. Isa. 2.4). After plowing, the large clods are generally broken up with heavy hoes. The land is plowed in preparation for the rain. After the first rains the seed is scattered by hand, and then the seed is covered by a second plowing. If this second plowing is done carelessly the birds will eat the seeds (see Luke 8.5). Grain is cut by hand and transported to threshing floors near the villages.

The Farmer's Enemies. Drought was an ever-present threat. A locust plague was rare (Joel 1.2–4) but devastating. There were no sprays for blight (see Amos 4.9). Fire could destroy a crop at harvest time. The hot southeast desert winds of May and June can critically damage a number of crops. Thus, remembering past losses, the farmer would "sow in tears" (Ps. 126.5–6).

Crops. Among the food-producing trees, the hardy olive bears fruit each year after six months of drought. The oil was used for food, medicine, soap, and light. Figs were a major source of sugar. The tree's deep shade was a convenient place to study (John 1.48); it symbolized peace (Mic. 4.4). The sycamore fig is small and tasteless; only the poor dress and gather them (see Amos 7.14). The tasty red pomegranate grows on a large shrub; this fruit is referred to metaphorically in love poetry (Song of Sol. 4.3). The almond blooms first in the spring (see Jer. 1.11–12). The word apple (quince?) figures prominently in the Song of Solomon. A tasty molasses is boiled out of carob pods, and the remaining husks become animal feed (Luke 15.16). Date palms flourished in the Jordan valley.

The common grains were wheat, barley, and spelt (KJV: rye). The wheat was cut and transported to the threshing floor where it was systematically trodden by animals and flailed with sticks or crushed with a threshing sledge. The latter is made of two wide boards joined on the top with two cross arms. The bottom is embedded with rows of sharp-edged flint nodules. The sledge is dragged by animals in a circle over the wheat with the driver standing on the sledge to add weight. Occasionally pieces of iron were used rather than flint (Amos 1.3). The wheat was then winnowed by throwing it into the air on a windy day (Ps. 1.4; Luke 3.17). Finally the wheat was put through a sieve to remove the remaining impurities (see Luke 22.31). Flax was grown for *clothing and rope. Sesame produced cooking oil. Lentils and chick-peas supplemented the protein available. Onions, garlic, cucumbers, and melons were among the vegetables cultivated. Herbs included mint and cumin. The Mishnah lists the bitter herbs to be eaten at Passover as lettuce, chicory, pepperwort, snakeroot, and dandelion (m. Pesah. 2.6).

Ahab. The son and successor of Omri, Ahab ruled as one of Israel's most powerful kings from roughly 873 to 851 BCE. After expanding the summit of *Samaria, his capital city, he constructed a massive casemate fortification wall enclosing lavishly appointed royal buildings, including the "ivory house" (1 Kings 22.39). Ahab brought Israel to the fore of international politics by marrying the Sidonian princess *Jezebel (1 Kings 16:31), fighting protracted wars against the *Arameans of *Damascus (1 Kings 20), struggling for hegemony over Transjordan (1 Kings 22; *Moabite Stone), and participating in the anti-Assyrian league at Qarqar in the Orontes Valley (Assyrian records). But deeply rooted north-south tensions and the Judahite perspective of the final *Deuteronomic history resulted in a critical treatment of Ahab in the Bible (1 Kings 16.29–22.40); narratives describing the antagonism between Ahab and the prophet *Elijah (1 Kings 17–19) constitute the sharpest polemic against him.

Alexander III ("The Great"). Macedonian, born in 356 BCE. After the assassination of his father, Philip II, at Aegae in 336, Alexander ascended to the throne and took over his father's plan of a crusade to punish the *Persians for Xerxes' invasion of Greece almost a century and a half earlier. Alexander crossed the Hellespont with a total force of about fifty thousand in 334 and defeated the Persian army in three major battles, the last in 331.

These victories opened the heart of the Persian empire to Alexander. Persepolis was sacked and the palace of Xerxes burned. From Persepolis and Media, Alexander conquered Bactria and Sogdiana (330–329) and then extended his eastern frontier to the Hyphasis (Beas) and the lower Indus River (327–325). At the Hyphasis, the Macedonian army refused to march farther east. From the Indus Delta, Alexander marched west with part of his army across the Gedrosian desert, where his army suffered great losses during the fall of 325. He reached Susa in March of 324, where he and ninety-one members of his court married wives from the Persian nobility. During the final year of his life, Alexander discharged ten thousand Macedonian veterans at Opis, and then at *Babylon, in 323, made plans for future conquests (especially Arabia). He died, probably of a fever following a drinking party, on 10 June 323.

Alexander undoubtedly was the greatest general in Greek history; he made the army forged by his father into an irresistible force by a combination of uncanny strategic insight, versatility, and courage beyond reason. The cities he founded (reportedly over seventy) planted pockets of Hellenism throughout the Near East. He also made monarchy central to the politics of the Greek world; his kin and generals fought to establish themselves as his heir until about 275, when there emerged the three kingdoms that dominated the eastern Mediterranean until the advance of Rome: Macedon, ruled by the Antigonids until 168 BCE; *Egypt, ruled by the Ptolemies until 31 BCE; and *Syria, ruled by the Seleucids until 64 BCE. It is against the background of the origins of the Seleucid dynasty that the author of 1 *Maccabees presents a sketch of Alexander's conquests (1.1–7) and the character of Antiochus Epiphanes (1.10–64).

Alien. Also translated "sojourner," "resident alien," and "stranger," an alien (Hebr. gēr) is technically a person in a community who is not part of its traditional lineages. In the Hebrew Bible, "aliens" usually are non-Israelites living ("sojourning") in Israel (Exod. 12.19; Isa. 16.4; Jer. 42.15), but they can also be Israelites of one tribe "sojourning" in the territory of another tribe (Judg. 19.16; 2 Sam. 4.3; 2 Chron. 15.9). Such persons were often financially distressed, forced to be dependents of "native" residents (but see Lev. 25.45, 47). Thus, aliens are often mentioned alongside *widows, *orphans, and the *poor as typically in need of assistance (Deut. 24.17–21; Jer. 7.6; Zech. 7.10). Aliens could be subjected to manual labor (Deut 29.11); yet, special attention is given to accord them equal status with native Israelites (Num. 15.14–16; Ezek. 47.21–23), making them corecipients of God's blessings (Deut. 10.18) and curses (Num. 15.26; Deut. 31.12; Josh. 8.35). The Israelites are commanded to treat aliens well, because they were once aliens in Egypt (Exod. 22.21; 23.9; Deut. 10.19). In fact, they are to view themselves as aliens "sojourning" on God's land (Lev. 25.23; 1 Chron. 29.15; Ps. 39.12), thereby furthering their sense of dependence on God.

New Testament writers describe their Israelite ancestors as aliens in Egypt (Acts 7.6; 13.17) and the exile in Babylon as the time of "sojourning" (Matt. 1.11, 12, 17). In dealing with the problem of incorporating *gentiles into an all-Jewish community, Paul says that they are "no longer strangers and aliens, but . . . citizens . . . of the household of God" (Eph. 2.19). Any hint of separation is thereby eliminated. On the other hand, all who have become members of God's "people" must disavow allegiance to other groups, considering themselves aliens in the world around them (1 Pet. 2.11). In this regard, *Abraham is held up as an ancient model (Heb. 11.9; cf. Gen. 23.4).

Alms. There is no word for "alms" or "almsgiving" in the Hebrew Bible, and there are almost no specific references to the practice of giving alms as such. Generosity to the *poor and needy was, however, required and praised (see, e.g., Deut. 15.11; Job 29.11–16). There are many commands to show benevolence to the poor, a group that included *Levites, foreigners living among Israelites (see Alien), *widows, and *orphans, for whom there was also a special *tithe (Deut. 14.28–29). Those who gave to the poor were thought to be blessed or happy (see Ps. 41.1; Prov. 14.21, 31; 31.20; cf. CD 6.21; 14.13–15).

The Greek word for alms is eleēmosynē, which comes from the basic verb eleeō, meaning "to pity" or "have mercy on" someone. In the *Septuagint eleēmosynē frequently translates the Hebrew words for "loving kindness" (ḥesed) and "*righteousness" (ṣĕdāqâ) (Deut. 6.25; 24.13; Prov. 3.3; 14.22). It is used of both God (Ps. 103.6; Isa. 1.27) and humans (Gen. 47.29; Prov. 20.28) having mercy toward others. Almsgiving came to be regarded as a particular form of righteousness (Tob. 1.3) and could gain merit and forgiveness of sins for the giver (Dan. 4.24; Sir. 3.30; Tob. 12.9).

In the New Testament eleēmosynē is always used in the sense of giving alms. In the *Sermon on the Mount piety and almsgiving are synonymous (Matt. 6.1–4). Elsewhere eleēmosynē occurs in the New Testament only in Luke and Acts, where it refers either to the gift or to the process of giving. In Luke 11.41 and 12.33 the expression "give alms" corresponds to the rabbinic "give righteousness" (Abot 5.15; cf. Matt. 19.21; see also Acts 9.36; 10.2, 31). Paul exhorted his communities to make special efforts to remember the poor (1 Cor. 16.1–3; 2 Cor. 8–9; cf. Acts 24.17).

Alpha and Omega. The first and last letters of the Greek alphabet, spoken in the book of *Revelation to John as the self-disclosure of God (Rev. 1.8; 21.6) and also of Jesus Christ (Rev. 22.13). Letters of the Greek alphabet could have numerical value, though in Revelation the focus is on the full scope of divine concern and control. "Alpha and Omega" refers to God's place at the beginning of the world, as its creator, and at the end, as its judge. John the Seer's use of these terms evokes the language of the *prophets, like Isaiah 44.6: "Thus says the LORD . . . I am the first and the last; besides me there is no god." Other New Testament writers discuss Jesus's role in the world's origin, alluding to the *creation account in Genesis (John 1; Col. 1.15–20; Phil. 2.6–11), and at its final judgment (Matt. 24).

PHILIP SELLEW

Altars. References to altars appear in the Bible some four hundred times, including their construction, materials (e.g., unhewn stone, wood, earth, brass/bronze, gold), types (especially for burnt offerings in the majority of cases, with a smaller number of references to incense altars), ritual acts (especially the slaughter and burning of animal sacrifices, and the sprinkling of blood), associated fixtures and paraphernalia (e.g., staves, rings, grates, horns, and vessels used), as well as more casual aspects.

The ordinary Hebrew word for altar is mizbēaḥ, meaning "slaughtering place"; the Greek word thusiastērion has a similar meaning. In biblical and nonbiblical traditions, an altar is not a natural object but rather a built structure. It is not inhabited by a supernatural force, though it attracts that force; thus, the altar is not the same as a sacred stone.

In biblical narrative, altars are built at a location where divine-human contact has been, or presumably could be, encountered. They are not habitation places; rather, they provide cultic access to the deity. They may be overturned, displaced, or rebuilt without any impact upon their use or meaning. Profaning them does not, therefore, affect the deity; instead, it precludes their use for proper ritual access, at least temporarily.

The altar in the Bible is a constructed platform, initially intended for slaughtering sacrifices for the God of Israel next to or upon its surface, who would visit the site regardless of its location (see Exod. 20.24). An altar, then, could be located anywhere needful or appropriate, and its installation and purpose would be accepted by the deity. Thus, the early proliferation of such installations posed no theological problem. It was only when, due to sociopolitical necessity, the cult was centralized at the *Temple in *Jerusalem and exclusive access to the deity was located there, that, theoretically at least, other altars were no longer permitted.

Other aspects of altars were similarly rather loosely conceived. How an altar was to be constructed—its materials, its permanency of location, and even its precise use—seem not to have been uniformly fixed. In all probability, the occasional demand for simplicity (e.g., unhewn stone for construction) can be explained only on the basis of real or fictive practice acquiring the weight of tradition, and therefore becoming proper, or on the basis of anachronistic insistence on purity.

The variation in types of altars, and the precise ritual involved for each, is perfectly explicable on both developmental and institutional grounds, as the cult developed in sophistication. However, the generic altar continued to be a point of access to the deity, regardless of the specific sacrifice made upon it to attract divine attention.

Other uses of the altar, such as a place of sanctuary or asylum place (see 1 Kings 1.50–53; 2.28–34), or for the declaration of binding oaths (Josh. 22.26–28, 34), are secondary. Since the deity could be met at altars, divine protection or divine witness could be sought at the same location.

Certain altars, especially those constructed or repaired by important people, are specifically mentioned in the Bible, either to enhance the concept, or because of the prominence of their builders. The idea of altar construction is thus carried back to *Noah (Gen. 8.20), with subsequent reinforcement of the tradition attributed to *Abraham and others of the ancestral family.

Several kings, likewise, are singled out for having performed the same pious act: *Saul, *David, *Solomon, and other monarchs are specifically noted.

Just as construction and use varied through time, the correct rituals for offering *sacrifices varied. Various references deal with sprinkling or pouring the *blood of slaughtered animals upon the altar, upon its "horns" or sides, and to burning the entire sacrifice or only the fat upon it. Uniformity developed principally with the centralization of the cult, and was read back into the time of *Moses and *Aaron in order to authenticate the practice.

The appearance of altars is complicated by references to "horns" (e.g., Exod. 29.12; 1 Kings 1.50; Amos 3.14). When these appurtenances first appear is difficult to judge, as is their precise use. On the basis of archaeological finds from somewhat later periods, these corner uprights may have served to support vessels containing the sacrifices, beneath which the coals of the altar were placed on grates. Such a utilitarian construction would have facilitated cleaning, as well as the actual placement of various kinds of offerings on separate occasions. This view is supported to some extent by references to the vessels of the altars as separate items.

PHILIP C. HAMMOND

Amalek. One of Israel's most unrelenting enemies, at least in the early periods, Amalek is first referred to in Abraham's day, in Genesis 14.7, which speaks of the Amalekite field. But later in Genesis (36.12), Amalek is made the son of Eliphaz, son of *Esau, rendering the earlier reference anachronistic.

Shortly after the *Exodus, the Amalekites attacked Israel (Exod. 17.8–16), but Israel succeeded in repulsing the attack. The enmity created is reflected in the bloodthirsty declaration "I will blot out the name of Amalek. . . . The Lord's war against Amalek is from generation to generation" (Exod. 17.14, 16; see Deut. 25.17–19).

The Amalekites raided the Israelites in the days of the judges (Judg. 3.13; 6.3, 33; etc.). Later, King *Saul made a concerted effort to destroy Amalek, following the prophet *Samuel's call for the *ban (1 Sam. 15), but enough Amalekites survived to destroy *David's city of Ziklag (1 Sam. 30.1). Nevertheless, after Ziklag the Amalekites ceased to trouble Israel. 1 Chronicles 4.42–43 depicts the tribe of *Simeon as eradicating the remnant of Amalek, fulfilling God's earlier promise.

PHILIP STERN

Amarna Letters. Discovered in 1887, the archive of El-Amarna in *Egypt has yielded 379 cuneiform tablets that are among the most precious finds of Near Eastern archaeology. Tell el-Amarna, located about 500 km (310 mi) up the Nile from the Mediterranean, is the modern name of ancient Akhetaten, King Akhnaton's capital. The letters constitute diplomatic correspondence from the reigns of Amenophis III and Akhnaton in the first half of the fourteenth century BCE. Except for two in *Hittite and one in Hurrian (see Nuzi Tablets, The), their language is Babylonian. Some are from the rulers of the other great powers of the day—*Babylonia, *Assyria, Mitanni, and Hatti—but most are written by Egyptian vassals in *Canaan and Syria. The former group largely concerns exchanges of ambassadors and expensive gifts, but the letters from Canaanite vassals bespeak a period of unrest, as the vassal kings, caught in the power struggles of the great kingdoms, form short-lived coalitions against one another. The texts frequently refer to a disruptive group called the ḫapiru (pronounced ʿapiru), a word equated by many with the Hebrew ʿibrî, "Hebrew" (see Hebrews, The). Although the name may be the same, the nature of the ʿapiru precludes a simple identification with the Israelites. Scholars are divided on whether the term refers properly to a specific people or to a social class; most see them as militant outcasts, that is, as brigands or mercenaries. We also read of the depredations of the Syrian kingdom of Amurru, later to give its name to the *Amorites of the Bible. The Amarna letters describe the vicissitudes of cities such as *Hazor, Akko, *Megiddo, Taanach, *Shechem, *Gezer, Ashkelon, Gaza, *Lachish, and *Jerusalem in the pre-Israelite period. Because the Canaanite scribes had an imperfect command of Babylonian, their lapses have also taught scholars much about their native dialects, and thus about the prehistory of the closely related *Hebrew language.

Though they do not mention the still inchoate Israelites, the Amarna letters are an invaluable window on the world from which Israel was to emerge in the following century.

WILLIAM H. PROPP

Amen. A Hebrew word meaning "certainly" or "may it be so." In the Hebrew Bible amen appears as a response to someone else's statement. Sometimes it appears in a liturgical setting as a response of the people (Deut. 27.15–26; Ps. 106.48), sometimes as a solemn response to another person's statement (1 Kings 1.36; Jer. 28.6 [an ironic response]), sometimes as a response to God's word (Jer. 11.5). The doubled form, amen, amen (Num. 5.22; Neh. 8.6) also occurs; compare "amen and amen" (Ps. 41.13). Amen may be used as a substantive: "the God of amen" = "the God of faithfulness" (Isa. 65.16); this meaning is reflected in the New Testament (Rev. 3.14).

The Hebrew amen was retained among early Greek-speaking Christians as a confirmatory response to prayer, whether one's own (Rom. 16.27) or someone else's (1 Cor. 14.16). This continues in Christian liturgical usage.

In the speech of Jesus in the Gospels, amen often appears not as a closing response but as an opening affirmation of the validity and seriousness of what follows: "Amen ('Truly') I tell you . . ." (Matt. 5.18). In the Gospel of John, the amen that frequently introduces Jesus' speech is doubled: "Amen, amen ('Truly, truly' [NRSV: 'Very truly']) I say to you . . ." (John 1.51; etc.). The opening amen indicates the solemn claim of the speaker to authority. Many scholars see in this introductory amen a clear reflection of Jesus' sense of his own authority. The introductory amen was not completely new in the words of Jesus, however; there are a few instances of similar speech in contemporary sources. It is possible, however, that the language of early Christian worship influenced these passages.

Ammon. A tribal state located to the east of the *Jordan River (Map 1:Y-Z4) that played a marginally significant role in the history of Palestine during the Iron Age. Relatively little is known about Ammon, its history, and its culture. Our main sources of information about it are the Bible and Assyrian inscriptions, both of which deal almost exclusively with Ammon's external affairs. Only a few substantive Ammonite inscriptions have been discovered so far, and excavations are just beginning to illuminate Ammonite culture.

The origins of the tribe of Ammon are obscure. Genesis 19:30–38 presents an artificial and satiric legend that portrays the eponymous ancestor of the Ammonites, Ben-ammi, as the offspring of the incestuous union of *Lot and his daughter. But this provides no insight into the initial development of Ammon. The region that became the land of Ammon was occupied fairly densely during the Middle and Late Bronze Ages, but there is no evidence whether the tribe of Ammon was already a distinct ethnic group during that time.

By the early part of the Iron Age (ca. 1200–1000 BCE), however, both archaeological and literary evidence indicates that a somewhat centralized state began to form around the capital city of Rabbat-bene-ammon ("Rabbah of the sons of Ammon"; modern Amman, Jordan). Conflict arose during this period between the Ammonites and the Israelites who lived to the east of the Jordan River (Judg. 11 and 1 Sam. 11). The earliest Ammonite king whose name is preserved is Nahash, who besieged the Israelite town of Jabesh-gilead and was defeated by Israelite troops rallied by the young *Saul (1 Sam. 11). Nahash's son, Hanun, provoked a war with Israel during the reign of *David, which led to Ammon's defeat and incorporation into David's empire as a vassal (2 Sam. 10; 12.26–31).

After the death of *Solomon and the breakup of the united kingdom of Israel, Ammon presumably became independent again. Little is known of the kingdom during the ninth century, but it likely came under the domination of *Aram-Damascus, especially during the reign of Hazael (ca. 842–800 BCE), as did most of Palestine. During the eighth century, Damascus declined, and Israel and Judah experienced a resurgence of political power. Ammon appears to have come under the control of Judah during the reigns of Uzziah and Jotham (2 Chron. 26.8; 27.5), but with the arrival of the Assyrian king *Tiglath-pileser III, Ammon, like the other small kingdoms, became an Assyrian vassal.

The Assyrian period (late eighth to late seventh century) was a prosperous period for Ammon. The Assyrians guaranteed its position on the international trade routes and helped protect its flanks from the various nomadic groups that threatened the security of the routes. Excavations and Assyrian texts indicate that Ammon extended its boundaries during this period, westward to the Jordan River, northward into Gilead, and southward toward Heshbon. The most substantial ruins of the Iron Age date to this period, and seals, inscriptions, and statuary indicate the kingdom's wealth. A number of stone towers found in several regions of Ammon appear to date to this period. Once thought to be a system of Ammonite fortresses, recent studies now identify most of them as agricultural towers such as the one described in Isaiah 5.2.

There is uncertainty about the situation of Ammon during the Neo-Babylonian period. It is probable that Ammon was involved in the great rebellion against *Nebuchadrezzar in 589–586 BCE, and that, as a result, it was annexed into the Babylonian provincial system. By the succeeding Persian period only the name of the kingdom of Ammon survived, largely as a geographical rather than as a political term (Map 10:Y5). Recent excavations and surveys indicate that a modest population continued to inhabit the region through this period.

Ammonite religion and culture remain little known. Even the characteristics of its patron deity, Milcom, are uncertain.

WAYNE T. PITARD

Amorites. The Amorites were among the original inhabitants of *Canaan before the Israelite *conquest, along with *Hittites, Canaanites, *Jebusites, and others (Gen. 15.18–21). The entire aboriginal population of Canaan is also called "Amorite" (Gen. 15.13–16), and *Jerusalem was perhaps an Amorite town (Ezek. 16.3). There were Amorites east of the *Jordan River at Heshbon in *Ammon (Num. 21.25–26) and at Bashan in Gilead (Josh. 2.10; 1 Kings 4.19). These were related to the Ammonites of central Transjordan, but not to the *Moabites or *Edomites in the south (Num. 21.13).

The Bible mentions Amorites as settled in Canaan and Transjordan. These were elements of an earlier, larger, more diverse Amorite group that originated apparently in the *Euphrates region of eastern Syria. Cuneiform texts of the third millennium BCE refer to a land west of the Euphrates known as MAR.TU in Sumerian or Amurru in Akkadian. Amurru included Syria and possibly parts of Palestine. Its inhabitants were considered foreign to Mesopotamia in language and culture. The Amorite language belongs to the linguistic family of Northwest Semitic, like *Ugaritic, *Aramaic, and *Hebrew, and Amorite material culture in Syria shows affinities with that of Palestine in the Middle Bronze Age (first half of the second millennium BCE). *Mari, a second-millennium Syrian city on the Euphrates, can be considered an Amorite town, though the Akkadian-language Mari texts do not refer to the city's inhabitants specifically as "Amorites." Some Amorites were not town-dwellers but *nomads, and the Mari texts frequently mention one such group, the "Banu-yamina," who resembled, in name and nomadic habits, the later biblical Benjaminites (Gen. 49.27).

JOSEPH A. GREENE

Amos, The Book of. The early prophets of Israel—*Samuel, *Elijah, *Elisha, and many others—are known from stories included in the historical books of *Samuel and *Kings. Amos was the first of the prophets whose name goes with a book entirely concerned with his life and message; nothing is known about him from any other source. The composition of his prophecy represented the creation of a new kind of literature. It was followed by other books that carry the names of a succession of prophets: three large books ("major" prophets) and twelve small ones ("minor").

The authors behind these shorter books were by no means "minor" in stature. Amos himself is one of the giants of the ancient world, one of the most powerful of the biblical prophets. He brought the prophetic word against social injustice and international terrorism and he preached repentance—and, when that failed, he denounced the impenitents. As a visionary ("seer": 1.1; 7.12) he located the domestic wrongs within Israel, and the crimes within the community of nations in a global, indeed cosmic setting. He held the rulers responsible for the evils in the world (1.3–2.16) and addressed his messages primarily to them. He placed Israel, the *chosen people of Yahweh, on the same footing as other nations (3.9; 4.11; 6.2; 9.7). God expects the same morality from them all; but the words of reproach, condemnation, and judgment are addressed most directly to Israel because of its domestic wrongs.

Amos was not only a prophet of doom; he also called the people to reform, and when they failed and disaster became inescapable, he pointed to the hope of future restoration (9.11–15).

Amos's career is set in the time of two kings, Uzziah of Judah and Jeroboam II of Israel. Both monarchs had exceptionally long reigns, covering most of the first half of the eighth century BCE. Many scholars date Amos toward the end of that period (about 750 BCE), or even later; but recent research into the political situation disclosed by the book suggests that it could be earlier than that. *Assyria is nowhere recognized as a factor (except in the *Septuagint text of 3.9), and the six nations surrounding Israel are addressed in 1.3–2.3 as if they are all still independent: this more accurately describes the early decades of the eighth century.

On first reading, the literary materials in the book of Amos seem to be diverse and poorly coordinated. There is some narrative in chaps. 7–9, but the main ingredients are prophetic oracles of many different kinds. In addition, the book contains a considerable number of wisdom sayings as well as several liturgical hymns.

The vocabulary and grammar are closer to standard Hebrew prose than to the lyrical poetry of *Psalms, or even to the prophecy in *Hosea. It is, nevertheless, highly rhythmic in form and rhetorical in artistry, a distinctive medium that may be identified as "prophetic oratory." The originally oral message has been transformed into literature by skillful editing that has integrated the variegated material into a coherent composition. The result is a real book. Each constituent oracle may have had a limited application when it was originally delivered, but their arrangement brings these pieces together into a comprehensive statement about Amos's lifework, and one that is of enduring value and significance.

Scholars who expect Amos's message to be consistent, almost uniform, have doubted his authorship of some portions because they differ from the rest. Several of the oracles against the nations (Tyre, Edom, Judah) have been bracketed out by some scholars because they seem more appropriate to later times; but all eight are needed, not only for complete geographical coverage, but also to secure the intricate and remarkably symmetrical design that unifies the great speech of chaps. 1–2 and secures its total impact on ancient hearer and modern reader alike.

The three short poems that celebrate the power of Yahweh in creation and history (4.13; 5.8–9; 9.5–6) are distinct hymnal-credal statements, possibly fragments of earlier epic recitals. They have been skillfully used in the final composition of Amos's message so as to secure a vital theological component. Their scope is cosmic; God's claims on the whole world—all nations, not just Israel—are grounded in his relationship and interest as creator, owner, and judge of the universe.

The historical perspective is likewise vast. God's dealings with Israel are reviewed in the light of events that have taken place over centuries, with the *Exodus as a major point of reference (2.10; 3.1; 5.25; 9.7).

The book falls into three distinct sections, each with its own message and mood. The last, the Book of Visions (7.1–9.8) contains the only narrative material. The autobiographical report of five visions (7.1–9; 8.1–3; 9.1) provides a framework that carries the dramatic report of Amos's confrontation with Amaziah, priest of Bethel (7.10–17), as well as prophetic oracles.

In the first pair of visions (7.1–6), Amos is able to secure a reprieve for Israel by his intercession. This situation, in which there is still some hope, corresponds to the central message of the Book of Woes (5.1–6.14), which is built around the exhortation (at 5.24):

> Let justice roll down like waters, > and righteousness like an everflowing stream.

There is still time for repentance. The plagues reported in chap. 4 were intended as chastisements that would lead to contrition and reparation; but they failed to achieve this, and turned into destructive judgments.

In the second pair of visions (7.7–9; 8.1–3) the situation has completely changed. There is no intercession; rather, the Lord says twice that he will never pass by them again. This new attitude corresponds to the message of certain doom that pervades the first four chapters, and especially the opening speech, with its note of finality. The situation has become hopeless. Amos's early messages, corresponding to the intercessions of the first two visions, have been presented in the middle of the final book (chaps. 5–6); his final message comes first (chaps. 1–2), with the following material analyzing the causes and justifying the decision.

The major cause of the change in attitude between the first and second pairs of visions, the final proof that repentance will never be forthcoming, is the refusal to listen to the prophets, and worse, the attempt to silence them altogether (2.12; 3.8; 7.10–17). Amaziah's ban is the turning point: when the highest religious leader rejects the word of God and his messenger, judgment is inevitable (4.12). The fifth vision and the oracles that go with it (9.1–10) predict the total destruction of "all the sinners of my people" (9.10).

That is not the end of everything, however. As elsewhere in the Bible, death can be overcome by the miracle of resurrection; and Amos promises the recovery of Israel's life and institutions in a new age of prosperity and bliss (9.11–15).

FRANCIS I. ANDERSEN

Ananias. Three different characters in the book of Acts are named Ananias:

(1) A member of the Jerusalem church who violates its communal principles and is struck down after denying the transgression (Acts 5.1–11; cf. Josh. 7).

(2) The disciple who reluctantly restores Saul's vision after the road to Damascus experience (Acts 9.10–19; see Paul).

(3) The high *priest who presides when Paul is brought before the Council in Jerusalem (Acts 23.1–5). Later this Ananias leads a delegation from the Council to the governor in Caesarea to plead for Paul's condemnation (Acts 24.1–23).

DANIEL N. SCHOWALTER

Anathema. A Greek word corresponding to Hebr. ḥērem (see Ban) and designating an object dedicated or devoted to a deity either for consecration or to be cursed (devoted to destruction). In the former sense, objects were devoted to God and belonged to him (Lev. 27.28); offerings were given to God to adorn the Temple (Luke 21.5). Most occurrences of the term, however, describe something or someone accursed or given to God for destruction. According to Leviticus 27.29, no one who had been devoted to God for destruction could be ransomed, nor could devoted things be used by human beings (Josh. 7.11–15). According to Paul, if someone preaches a gospel contrary to the one that he preached (Gal. 1.8, 9), that person is anathema (NRSV: "cursed"; see also 1 Corinthians 16.22).

In Romans 9.3, Paul affirms his strong ties to the Jewish people and asserts that he is prepared to be "anathema from Christ" (NRSV: "accursed and cut off from Christ"), if that would benefit them—a statement similar in thought to that of Moses being willing to have his name blotted out of God's book for the sake of the Israelites (Exod. 32.32).

Individuals also invoked anathema on themselves to ensure that they would keep an oath (see Acts 23.12, 14, 21, where the Greek verb is a form of anathema). Such individuals called on God to curse them if they did not perform the oath they had made.

In later usage, anathema becomes virtually synonymous with excommunication.

Ancestors, The. Genesis 12–50 relates in the fullest form the traditions about the ancestors of Israel, frequently called the patriarchs (*Abraham, *Isaac, and *Jacob) and the matriarchs (*Sarah, *Rebekah, *Leah, *Rachel, Bilhah, and Zilpah). These chapters are part of a larger narrative that covers the period from the *creation of the world (Gen. 1) to the fall of Jerusalem in 587/586 BCE (2 Kings 24–25), and they have the specific purpose of presenting the story of the *Hebrews from their beginnings, with the call of Abraham, to their presence in Egypt following *Joseph's rise to power.

Within Genesis 12–50 can be discerned the Abraham cycle (12.7–25.11), the Isaac cycle (25.19–26.34), the Jacob cycle (27.1–35.29), and the Joseph story (37–48; 50). Each section differs markedly from the others. The Joseph story is a highly artistic and skilled narrative, leading to a climax in which Joseph, the ruler of Egypt, discloses his identity to his brothers, who had sold him into slavery. The Isaac cycle is by far the shortest, and the only one of its narratives that deals exclusively with Isaac (chap. 26) closely resembles two stories about Abraham (12.10–16; 20.1–17). While the Abraham and Jacob cycles show every sign of having been compiled from traditions that were originally separate (see Pentateuch), the Jacob cycle has the more integrated narrative structure.

The predominant theological theme that runs through these disparate sections is that of the fulfillment of God's purpose and promise in spite of all hindrances. After God has promised to Abraham that he will become a great nation (12.2), Abraham goes to Egypt, where God must intervene to rescue Sarah from the Pharaoh's harem. Sarah is next presented as being sterile, and in order to get offspring, Abraham considers adoption (15.1–6), only to produce a son by Sarah's Egyptian maid *Hagar (16.1–6). When Sarah finally produces a son it is in her old age (21.1–7); almost immediately (22.1–19), though, Abraham is ordered to offer the son, Isaac, as a sacrifice. Abraham's obedience is rewarded by the sparing of Isaac's life, and the first cycle ends with Rebekah being brought from Abraham's home of northeast *Mesopotamia as a wife for Isaac.

Rebekah is also sterile (25.21), so that her children, like Sarah's child, are a special divine gift. The Isaac cycle is quickly swallowed up into the conflict between his sons Jacob and *Esau, with the latter threatening the life of Jacob, who is designated as the successor of Abraham and Isaac (chap. 28). In Haran, Abraham's original home to which Jacob flees (chap. 29), Jacob comes into conflict with his uncle Laban, and is tricked into marrying Leah before he can obtain his true love, Rachel. Like Sarah and Rebekah, Rachel turns out to be barren (29.31); the son she eventually does have, Joseph (30.23–24), will later be sold into slavery by his brothers, some of whom would have preferred to kill him (37.18–28). In the meantime Jacob, who has fled from Laban and is returning home, must survive the danger of being reunited with Esau (chaps. 32–33). Prior to this meeting, his name is changed by God to *Israel.

Joseph's words to his brothers, "It was not you who sent me here, but God" (45.8), sums up the main theological theme of the ancestral narratives: God's fulfillment of his purpose and promise. But there are subsidiary themes, prominent among which is God's rejection of parts of Abraham's family. His nephew, *Lot, has two sons who are the ancestors of the nations *Moab and *Ammon; but their rejection is indicated by their incestuous origin (19.30–38). Similarly, Esau, the ancestor of the nation of *Edom, is rejected for marrying non-Hebrew wives (28.34–5, 28.6–9, 36.1–43). Jacob's triumphs over Laban (chaps. 30–31) indicate the rejection of the northeastern branch of the family.

This subsidiary theme no doubt reflects the political realities of the time in which the narratives were being combined, the period of *David or *Solomon. In the tenth century BCE, Ammon, Moab, Edom, and kingdoms to the northeast were subject to Israelite rule (2 Sam. 8.1–14; 10.15–19; 12.26–31). This raises the question of the relation between the ancestors as historical figures and the traditions about them. Although some scholars argue that the ancestral narratives were not written until after the *exile (which is certainly when they reached their final form), a majority would accept that Abraham and Jacob were ancestors around whom traditions gathered in Israel's premonarchic period. It should be noted that Abraham is associated with *Hebron (Gen. 23) while Jacob is connected with Bethel (Gen. 28) and his sons with *Shechem (Gen. 34). This suggests that Abraham was an ancestor of the tribe of *Judah, and had migrated from northeast Mesopotamia together with groups that later became Moab and Ammon. Jacob was the ancestor of Israel, which was originally an association of tribes, not including Judah, in the central highlands of Canaan. The odd fact that, whereas Jacob is the ancestor of Israel, the real father of the nation is the Judahite figure Abraham, is best explained by Judah's dominant position over Israel when the Abraham and Jacob traditions were united in the tenth century BCE. For a people experiencing relief from oppression for the first time in many decades, the figures of the ancestors provided the focus for stories that articulated the identity of the people, marked them off from their neighbors, and interpreted their peace and their possession of the land as the fulfillment of a divinely executed promise.

Andrew. A disciple of *Jesus and brother of *Simon Peter. The two are pictured as fishermen working beside the sea when Jesus summons them to follow him and become "fishers of people" (Mark 1.16–18; Matt. 4.18–20). In John's gospel (1.35–42) Andrew first appears as a disciple of *John the Baptist.

Although less prominent than his brother, Andrew is present for Jesus' bread miracle (John 6) and the apocalyptic speech on the Mount of Olives (Mark 13.3–37). Lists of the *Twelve name Andrew second (Matt. 10.2; Luke 6.14) or fourth (Mark 3.18; Acts 1.13). According to late medieval tradition, Andrew was martyred by being crucified on an ×-shaped cross, which later appears on the flag of Great Britain representing Scotland, whose patron is Andrew.

Angels. In Israel's early traditions, God was perceived as administering the cosmos with a retinue of divine assistants. The members of this divine council were identified generally as "*sons of God" and "morning stars" (Job 1.6; 38.7), "gods" (Ps. 82) or the "host of heaven" (Neh. 9.6; cf. Rev. 1.20), and they functioned as God's vicegerents and administrators in a hierarchical bureaucracy over the world (Deut. 32.8 [LXX]; cf. 4.19; 29.26). Where Israel's polytheistic neighbors perceived these beings as simply a part of the pantheon, the Bible depicts them as subordinate and in no way comparable to the God of Israel.

The most ancient Israelites would probably have felt uncomfortable in describing all these beings as "angels," for the English word "angel" comes from the Greek aggelos, which at first simply meant "messenger" (as does the Hebrew term for angel, mal'āk). God's divine assistants were often more than mere messengers. *Cherubim and *seraphim, for example, never function as God's messengers, for their bizarre appearance would unnecessarily frighten humans. On the contrary, God is frequently depicted in early narratives as dispensing with divine messengers, for he deals directly with humans without intermediaries (see Theophany).

As time passed, however, an increasing emphasis on God's transcendence correlated with an increasing need for divine mediators. These beings who brought God's messages to humans are typically portrayed as anthropomorphic in form, and such a being may often be called a "man" (Gen. 18.2; Josh. 5.13; Ezek. 9.2, 11; Dan. 9.21; 12.6–7; Zech. 1.8; Luke 24.4). The members of God's council are the envoys who relay God's messages and perform tasks appropriate to their status as messengers (1 Kings 22.19–22; Job 1.6–12). In some narratives of encounters with supernatural beings, there is reluctance to identify them by name (Gen. 32.29; Judg. 13.17–18). But as these messengers become more and more frequent, they eventually are provided with individual names and assigned increasingly specific tasks that go beyond that of a messenger. The only two angels named in the Hebrew Bible are in the book of *Daniel: *Gabriel reveals the future (Dan. 8–9; cf. Luke 1) while *Michael has a more combative role, opposing the forces of evil (Dan. 10, 12; Jude 9; Rev. 12.7). The angelic hierarchy becomes more and more explicit and elaborate (Dan. 10.13; Eph. 6.12; Jude 9; 1 Pet. 3.22; see Archangels), and each human being has his or her own protecting angel (Matt. 18.10; Acts 12.15). The term "messenger" (Grk. aggelos; Hebr. mal'āk) is used so frequently to depict these beings in their encounters with humans that it becomes a generic term to describe all supernatural beings apart from God, whether or not they actually functioned as messengers.

Angels are depicted as having the freedom to make moral choices, for they require judicial supervision (1 Cor. 6.3; Jude 6) and God himself is reluctant to trust them (Job 4.18). The Bible records a number of angelic rebellions or perversions (Gen. 6.1–4; Ps. 82; Isa. 14.12–15; Ezek. 28; 2 Pet. 2.4; Rev. 12.4–9), as a result of which some rebel angels are already incarcerated (Jude 6).

"The Angel [or Messenger] of the Lord" is a problematic figure. The ambiguous Hebrew phrase is best translated without the definite article, that is, "an angel [messenger] of Yahweh" (as do the Septuagint and NJV; cf. Matt. 1.20; 2.13, 19; 28.2; Acts 8.26). Later Christian theology tended to see the preincarnate Christ in this figure (hence the definite article), but the phrase probably referred vaguely to any mediator sent by God. He may be human (Hag. 1.13; Mal. 2.7). When the figure is clearly referred to as superhuman, he does not always function as a messenger but instead talks and behaves as if he were God, even failing to introduce his words as the message of another who sent him. Since early stories are internally inconsistent, identifying the figure as both God and God's messenger (Gen. 16.7–13; 22.11–12; 31.11–13; Exod. 3.2–4; Judg. 6.11–23), it is probable that some of these stories originally described God at work but were modified through time to accommodate God's increasing transcendence as one who no longer casually confronted humankind.

The increasing role played by angels in the later stages of the Hebrew Bible is found everywhere in the New Testament. The voice of God (the Father) is only exceptionally heard in the New Testament, unlike earlier biblical traditions. Instead, angels bring God's message to humans (Matt. 1.20; Luke 1.11, 26; 2.9; Acts 8.26; 10.3) and assist Jesus (Matt. 4.1; Luke 22.43) and his followers (Acts 5.19; 12.7). Angels have limited knowledge (Matt. 24.36; 1 Pet. 1.12), and when they appear to human beings, they may be described as descending from heaven (Matt. 28.2; John 1.51; cf. Gen. 28.12). Although Jesus alludes to the absence of the institution of marriage among angels (Matt. 22.30), angels are sexual beings (Gen. 6.4; Zech. 5.9). Some Jews, particularly the most conservative, denied their existence (Acts 23.8). But among Jews and Christians in general, angelology continued to develop so that not only was *Satan provided with his own retinue of angels as a counterpart to God (Matt. 25.41; 2 Cor. 12.7), but hundreds of names and functions are also applied to angels in extrabiblical texts such as the books of *Enoch.

SAMUEL A. MEIER

Animals. As a modern general designation for all living creatures other than plants, "animal" does not always have a simple equivalent in the Bible. The closest equivalents in the Hebrew Bible include ḥayyâ ("living [creature]," Lev. 11.2), and bĕhēmâ, which usually refers to all quadrupeds (Gen. 6.7), or more specifically to domesticated animals (Exod. 22.9–10). Yet even these Hebrew terms do not usually include birds or fish. The *Septuagint and the New Testament frequently use tetrapous ("quadruped") or thērion to translate both Hebrew terms.

Classification Systems. Aside from problems in basic terminology, the differences between biblical and modern Linnaean systems of animal classification sometimes create uncertainties in translation. For example, the Hebrew dîšōn (Deut. 14.5) has been translated by different versions or scholars as "ibex," "white-rumped deer," "pygarg," or "Arabian oryx," all representing completely different genera in most modern classifications. More than one species of predatory birds (e.g., eagles and vultures) may be subsumed under the Hebrew term nešer.

Dietary laws in Leviticus 11 and Deuteronomy 14.3–20, as well as the sacrificial system, depended on a system of classification which distinguished clean and unclean animals. In general, a clean land animal had cloven hoofs and chewed its cud (a ruminant artiodactyl in modern zoology), thus eliminating reptiles, amphibians, rodents and carnivorous animals from the diet. Animals that only chewed their cud (e.g., the hare) or only had cloven hoofs (e.g., the pig) also were eliminated. Most insects are unclean (the locust being one exception), and only those aquatic animals with fins and scales are fit to eat (Lev. 11.9–10). The logic underlying the clean/unclean dichotomy in Leviticus remains unclear. Other ancient Near Eastern cultures had views similar to those found in Leviticus and Deuteronomy regarding unclean animals, including the pig. Not surprisingly, for the Jewish sect that became known as Christianity, Levitical animal classification was a major issue in the debate about observance of dietary laws (Acts 11.5–9). (See also Purity, Ritual.)

Origin, Use, and Relationship with Humans. Biblical views concerning animals are linked closely with the two principal myths of *creation. In the first account, generally ascribed to *P, all the animals were created before both man and woman (Gen. 1.20–30). In the other account (Gen. 2.7–22), usually ascribed to *J, the creation of all the animals follows that of the first man, and God creates the first woman only after none of the animals was found helpful to the man. In both accounts animals were created to serve the needs of human beings, though Genesis 9.3 (cf. Gen. 1.30) indicates that humans were not expected to use animals for food before the *Flood. Psalm 104.10–30 depicts Yahweh, not human beings, as responsible for the general welfare of the animal kingdom.

Sheep, goats, cattle, and pigs are the most extensively attested domestic animals from the Neolithic period onward in ancient Palestine. The camel may have been domesticated by the early third millennium BCE in some portions of Asia, but the geographical extent of domestication by the second millennium remains undetermined.

Aside from providing a ready reserve of fresh meat and milk, most domestic animals could provide hides, bone implements, transportation, and other commodities. Wealth and status were often measured by the number of animals that a person owned (Job 1.3). The raising and trading of horses played an important role in achieving and maintaining military power in the Near East (1 Kings 4.26; 10.28–29).

Although offering animals to appease a deity has a strong magico-religious basis, animal *sacrifice formed an important part of the economy in ancient Israel. Ordinances that required that only the best of the flock be brought to the *Temple for sacrifice (Lev. 1.2; Deut. 15.21) in effect demanded the allocation of the best animal resources (especially cattle, sheep, and goats) for the priesthood. Smaller animals such as pigeons were acceptable if the worshipper was too poor to offer larger animals (Lev. 5.7). Christian writers argued that Jesus' death nullified the need for animal sacrifice altogether (Heb. 10.1–18).

The Bible also mentions various animals that were considered harmful. Some of the *plagues sent upon Egypt (Exod. 7–11) included the uncontrolled multiplication of frogs, gnats, flies, and locusts. Locusts were particularly feared because they could destroy agriculture and so cause a famine (Joel 1.4). Rituals sometimes were devised for protection from poisonous animals (e.g., snakes in Num. 21.1–4).

Animal Imagery. Biblical authors often use animal imagery to express aspects of their culture. Sheep imagery is used to depict a future messianic utopia (Isa. 11.6–7), as well as the Israelite community (Pss. 44.11; 79.13; 80.1). In the New Testament Jesus was portrayed as a *lamb (John 1.29), and he warned his disciples about wolves dressed in sheep's clothing (Matt. 7.15).

Lions and other ferocious animals are often used to speak of hostile armies or personal enemies (Ps. 22.21; 1 Pet. 5.8), though lions may also symbolize positive figures (e.g., Judah in Gen. 49.9). Certain birds are associated with desolation (Ps. 102.6). Dogs usually are represented negatively in the Bible (Prov. 26.11; Matt. 7.6), though a recently discovered dog cemetery from the Persian period at Ashkelon may suggest the existence of non-Israelite cults that viewed the dog positively.

The Bible is also stocked with a variety of mythological creatures such as the *cherubim (1 Kings 8.6–7) and *seraphim (Isa. 6.2), which combine human and animal traits. *Leviathan (Isa. 27.1) and *Rahab (Isa. 51.9) are primordial beasts that were believed to threaten God's creation. As was the case with El, *Baal and other Canaanite deities, Yahweh may have been depicted as a bull (Exod. 32.4–6; see Golden Calf). Bull figurines from the second and first millennia BCE have been found at, among other places, *Hazor and Ashkelon, though it is difficult to determine which deity, if any, is represented by the figurines.

Aside from biblical scholars and archaeologists, ecologists and ethicists have recently become interested in the extent to which the biblical view of animals has influenced the relationship of modern civilizations with *nature (see A. Linzey, Christianity and the Rights of Animals, 1987; and E. J. Schochet, Animal Life in the Jewish Tradition: Attitudes and Relationships, 1984). HECTOR IGNACIO AVALOS

Anoint. To touch, smear, or rub an object or person with oil. The use of scented oils on the body was enjoyed as a cosmetic luxury in Near Eastern and Hellenistic societies (and sometimes condemned as such, Amos 6.6). It was especially used on festive occasions and, conversely, refrained from in times of *mourning (2 Sam. 14.2; Dan. 10.3) or *fasting (Matt. 6.17). The soothing qualities of oil made anointing part of medical practice (Luke 10.34), but as most *medicine involved an invoking of divine power, anointing in that context might have the character of a religious rite (Mark 6.13; James 5.14; Rev. 3.18). Similarly, the anointing of corpses for *burial (Mark 16.1) might be viewed both as a last gesture of affection toward the dead and as part of the religious ritual of burial. The woman who anointed Jesus with precious scented oil probably did so as an extravagant gesture of joy at his presence, and he receives it as such in Luke 7.36–50, while in Mark 14.8 and John 12.7 he sees it as an anticipation of his death.

Anointing has a firm place in religious practice. Objects are anointed as a sign of their dedication to the deity, such as *Jacob's pillar at Bethel (Gen. 28.18; 31.13). The book of Exodus prescribes the anointing of the *tabernacle and its furnishings, especially the *altar (Exod. 29.36; 30.22–29; 40.9–11). With the institution of *kingship in Israel, anointing rather than coronation was the ceremony in which the king took office. This rite was widely practiced in the ancient Near East; the *Amarna letters suggest that anointing was a rite of kingship in Syria-Palestine in the fourteenth century BCE, and Jotham's parable assumes its familiarity (Judg. 9.8, 15). Once kingship was established, the anointing was probably performed by a priest, as *Zadok anointed *Solomon (1 Kings 1.39). *Samuel, a prophet and probably also a priest, is said to have anointed *Saul and *David (1 Sam. 10.1; 16.13), though according to 2 Sam. 2.4; 5.3, David was anointed by the people of Judah and Israel respectively (cf. 2 Kings 23.30). According to 1 Kings 19:15–16, *Elijah the prophet is instructed to anoint Hazael as king of *Damascus and *Jehu as king of Israel; *Elisha carries out the latter task by proxy (2 Kings 9.1–13). The king's anointing symbolized his special relationship with God and was seen as the occasion when he received God's spirit; it therefore made his person sacrosanct, so that David, with Saul in his power, will not touch "the Lord's anointed" (1 Sam. 24.6,10; 26.9–11,16,23; cf. 2 Sam. 1.14–16; 19.21; Lam. 4.20).

The anointing of *priests is prescribed only in the later, Priestly, strata of the *Pentateuch. The anointing of the high priest (Exod. 29.4–7; Lev. 8.12) probably began in the postexilic period, when the high priest assumed many of the leadership functions that had belonged to the king. It was only perhaps later still extended to other priests (Exod. 28.14, 30.30, 40.12–15; Lev. 7.35–36; Num. 3.3). The ritual was not practiced in the Roman period in *Herod's Temple, where the high priest's institution was by investiture.

As anointing symbolized the special responsibility and relationship to God of king and priest, so the language might be used metaphorically of anyone thought to stand in a similar position. Thus, the prophet of Isaiah 60.1 is said to be anointed (though for the possibility that prophets were actually anointed, see 1 Kings 19.16; Ps. 105.15). King *Cyrus of Persia is God's anointed in Isaiah 45.1, as is the whole people of Israel in Habakkuk 3.13 (cf. Ps. 105.15). Jesus is described as "anointed with the Holy Spirit and with power" in Acts 10.38.

By the Roman period, some Jews had come to hope that God would restore them a king, and because anointing was remembered primarily as the sign of kingship, this hope was expressed as hope for the "anointed one," Hebr. māšîaḥ (English "*messiah"), Grk. christos (John 1.41). The *Qumran community looked for two "anointed ones," priest and king, the Messiahs of Aaron and Israel (cf. Zech. 4.14). A more generalized hope for a future leader whose precise functions were unclear might still be expressed as hope for a "Messiah," but the primary association of the title with kingship would inevitably suggest political aspirations, and it may be for this reason that Jesus appears reluctant to accept the title for himself (Mark 8.29–30; Luke 23.2–3).

Anointing remains an essential part of the English coronation ritual, in direct dependence on the Bible. SOPHIE LAWS

Antichrist. The word "antichrist" occurs in the Bible only in 1 and 2 John. The prefix anti- in Greek means "over against," "instead of," and so may imply usurpation as well as substitution. In 1 John, the coming of Antichrist is referred to as a standard sign of the "last hour," which has already happened in people who deny that Jesus is the Christ who has come in the flesh, and have seceded from the community; they are "false prophets" who embody the "spirit of antichrist" (1 John 2.18–22; 4.1–3; 2 John 7). (See also John, The Letters of.)

On the other hand, 2 *Thessalonians warns, again as standard teaching, that the *day of the Lord cannot come until the "lawless one," "the one destined for destruction," has appeared. He will usurp God's place in his Temple, and deceive people with Satan-inspired signs and wonders, until the Lord Jesus appears and destroys him (2 Thess. 2.1–12). There are links with the prophecies of a desolating sacrilege in the holy place (Dan. 9.27; 12.11; Matt. 24.15; Mark 13.14), and of false messiahs and false prophets, which must precede the coming of the *Son of Man (Mark 13.21–22; Matt. 24.23–24). Luke has historicized the picture in terms of the fall of Jerusalem in 70 CE (21.20); and John sees the "one destined for destruction" not as a future figure but as *Judas Iscariot (17.12).

The marks of the figure of Thessalonians recur in the two beasts of Revelation 13: the beast from the sea, which in its death and resurrection is a parody of Christ, and claims divine honors; and the beast from the earth, which deceives people into worshiping the first beast, and with its lamblike voice and signs and wonders is a parody of the Holy Spirit. But there is also here an element of political coercion, and the sea beast's healed wound and his number identify him as Nero, returned from the dead, the persecuting emperor who was worshiped as a god.

The antecedents of this figure lie in Daniel 7, which was immensely important for New Testament writers. This vision relates that before the coming of God's kingdom there would be a time of disasters, persecution, and apostasy, and that opposition to God and his people would be summed up in a nation or person, human or superhuman, whom God or his agent would destroy. The vision is related to the Near Eastern *myth of God's conflict with the dragon of the *chaos waters, out of which this world was created. The myth celebrated the victory of order over chaos in nature; in some biblical passages the powers of chaos were historicized as nations opposed to God and his people—*Egypt (Ezek. 29.3) and *Babylon (Jer. 51.34)—and in Daniel 7 the four beasts arising out of the sea (on which the sea beast of Rev. 13 is modeled) represent persecuting empires. They culminate in the "little horn" on the fourth beast, which represents the Greek king Antiochus Epiphanes, who tried to hellenize Judaism, and set up his statue in the Temple (the desolating sacrilege referred to at Mark 13.14 and Matt. 24.15). The book of Revelation updates this picture in terms of the Roman empire, the emperor cult, and collaborating Christians (Rev. 2.14–29; 13.1–18).

On the other hand, those who accepted the state as God's ordinance (Rom. 13.1–7) saw the expected Antichrist as the embodiment of a specious spirit of lawlessness, which the state was keeping in check (2 Thess. 2.6, 7, according to one interpretation). After the Christianization of the Roman empire, this understanding became popular and even Revelation was read in this light, but corruptions in church and state led people back to Revelation's original sense.

The Antichrist expectation, with its attendant disasters, apostasy, and martyrdom of the faithful, dominated the Middle Ages and the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The myth expresses both the speciousness of evil and its apparent omnipotence, while asserting the imminence of God's final victory and the value of faithful witness in its achievement. From another point of view, it has provided a forceful way of characterizing opponents in church or state, and dignifying resistance to them.

Antioch of Syria (Map 11:G3). Present-day Antakya in Turkey, to be distinguished from the less important Antioch in Pisidia (Map 14:F3; Acts 13.14–14.28; 2 Tim. 3.11). In the first century CE, Antioch was the third-largest city of the Roman empire and capital of the proconsular province of Syria. Seleucus I Nicator founded it shortly after 300 BCE and named it for his father, Antiochus the Great. Antioch was settled by Macedonians, Greeks, native Syrians, and Jewish veterans of the army of Seleucus I. Located in the fertile Amuk plain on the Orontes River, which could be navigated to this point, it was at the junction of trade routes to *Damascus, Palestine, *Egypt, and the Aegean. By the second century BCE, it had a great public library, and under Antiochus IV Epiphanes (175–164/163 BCE) and the emperors Augustus and Tiberius fine public buildings were constructed. Excavations have disclosed splendid mosaic floors and a colonnaded main street.

The large Jewish population was generally loyal to the Seleucid monarchs and the *Roman empire. According to *Acts, a Christian mission among Antiochene Jews began when refugees from persecution arrived after the martyrdom of *Stephen (Acts 11.19). Soon gentiles were also evangelized, and here the term "*Christians" was first used (Acts 11.25–26). The new church subsequently sent *Barnabas and *Paul to Jerusalem with famine relief (Acts 11.27–30), as well as to discuss the issue of observance of the *Law by gentile converts (Acts 15; Gal. 2; see Apostolic Council).

For many centuries, Antioch was a great center of Christian learning. Ignatius, who was martyred early in the second century CE, was its third bishop according to tradition.

Anti-Semitism. Anti-Semitism has become the term commonly used for attitudes and actions against Jews. It was coined in the 1870s by the German agitator Wilhelm Marr in the campaign to eradicate Jewish influences in German culture. Sometimes the valid distinction is made between anti-Semitism as a secular term built on racial and cultural thinking out of the Enlightenment, and anti-Judaism as the earlier theologically grounded forms of contempt for Jews and things Jewish. Not least with the contemporary Arab-Israeli conflict, the term anti-Semitism is a sign of the narrow Western perspective in which the term was coined—both Jews and Muslims being Semites. Yet for the victims of anti-Semitism, such distinctions, though valid, carry little weight.

The record of pre-Christian anti-Semitism in the Greco-Roman world is mixed. The Jews were seen as a people of philosophers and the wisdom of *Moses was highly respected. But there was also criticism of their rituals and their keeping to themselves, and the *Sabbath was seen as laziness. The Roman satirists especially ridiculed *circumcision. Yet on balance it seems that Cicero's reference to Judaism as a "barbarous superstition" (Pro Flacco 28[67]) has been wrongly taken as representative of attitudes toward the Jews. In the history of anti-Semitism the continuity between Christian and Greco-Roman anti-Semitism is often stressed in order to minimize Christian responsibility.

While at times making use of themes found in Greco-Roman writers, Christian anti-Semitism differs in one fundamental respect: Christianity claims to be the fulfillment of the prophecies and aspirations of Israel as they are expressed in Israel's own scriptures, which became the Old Testament of the church, now interpreted in the light of the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ.

The Jesus-movement was a totally Jewish event—the Gospels know of few contacts of Jesus with *gentiles. Christianity begins as a Jewish reform movement, and the formative conflicts by which the Christian identity is formed are conflicts within Judaism. The very Jewishness of Jesus and the *apostles gives anti-Semitism its intensity. The scars of the intra-Jewish conflicts with *Pharisees in Galilee and the chief priests and elders of Jerusalem, and with synagogue leaders in the Jewish Diaspora, are clearly visible in the New Testament, now from the perspective of churches where the "no" of the Jewish majority to the Christian claims is often contrasted with the "yes" of gentiles.

Jesus—and *John the Baptist—speak the harsh language of the prophets, ridiculing or condemning the foibles of their contemporaries, cursing their unwillingness to listen and to repent. Woes are uttered and the listeners are called. The rhetoric is heavy: "brood of vipers" (Matt. 3.7; 12.34; 23.33; Luke 3.7), and so forth. When such words are spoken they are spoken by a Jewish prophet for a Jewish people. Jesus identifies with his people; it has been said that a true prophet of doom prays intensely that his prophecy be proven wrong, that it be a warning toward repentance.

Such discourse from within the Jewish communities fell into the hands of increasingly gentile churches when the vast majority of Jews did not accept Christian claims for Jesus of Nazareth. The gentile churches began to hurl the words of Jesus at the Jewish communities. What Jesus had said with prophetic pathos, identifying with his people, was now spoken by gentiles against "the Jews," gentiles who felt that the fall of the Jerusalem *Temple (70 CE) had proven them right and the Jewish people wrong. In that shift of setting lie the roots of Christian and New Testament anti-Semitism. For the Jewish disciples there were the sadness, the disappointment, perhaps the frustration over the "no" of the majority of their fellow Jews; hence the need for a new identity, as the Jewish communities sometimes treated them harshly. The gospel of John already lives in that perception, sharpened into a literal demonizing of "the Jews" as having the devil for father (John 8.44). Jewish Christianity—by any account the nucleus of Christianity—is marginalized and declared unacceptable by both synagogue and church. The "we and they" dichotomy does not allow such complications.

The first to have discerned the specter of gentile Christian contempt for the Jews was *Paul, the Jew who understood himself to be the apostle to the gentiles. In his final reflection on how his mission fits into God's total plan (Rom. 9–11), he warns his gentile converts against their haughty attitude toward Israel by affirming that all Israel shall be saved. He does so not by affirming that they will become Christians but rather refers to God's *mystery (Rom. 11.25). Perhaps Paul's sensitivity was due to his personal history: it was religious zeal that had made him a persecutor of Christians.

In spite of Paul's warning, anti-Semitism follows Christianity as its dark shadow. This anti-Semitism remains basically rhetorical until the church becomes wedded to the political power of empires and governments. About a century after the emperor Constantine's conversion to Christianity (312 CE), Augustine lays down the principles on which Jews are allowed to exist in the Christian empire, yet with inferior status (City of God 18.46). His interpretation of Psalm 59.11 ("Do not slay them, lest my people forget; scatter them . . .") established the status of the Jews as both protected and suppressed—a pattern that makes of the Jews a necessary negative witness to the truth of Christianity. Within this pattern of Christian anti-Semitism, two motifs become prominent, both argued on biblical grounds: the Jews are guilty of deicide, of being godkillers (of having killed God), and Judaism is the wrong way to relate to God (by law rather than by faith). While the former charge is more prominent in Catholic and Orthodox lands, the latter dominates in Protestant cultures.

How can Christians read the Bible in a manner which guards against anti-Semitism? Perhaps the majority of Christians have read and do read the New Testament's critique of Jews and things Jewish as directed to themselves: it is my hypocrisy, my boasting, my self-righteousness that is attacked; it is my sin and lack of faith that swings from "Hosanna" to "Crucify, crucify." Yet history shows that when calamities and frustrations call for scapegoats, these very texts have preconditioned Christian cultures toward anti-Semitism.

To counteract such an effect of the Christian Bible—not least after the *Holocaust—different strategies have been devised. A renewed study of the passion narratives makes it clear that Jesus was crucified by the Roman authorities. *Crucifixion was a Roman means of execution. Also in the accounts of the Gospels it is the Jerusalem establishment, not "the Jews," who collaborate. This agrees with Josephus's notes about the execution of James in 62 CE that the *Sadducees are the harsh judges, while the *Pharisees plead mercy (Ant. 20.9.199–202). As the story is told in the Gospels, the responsibility of the Jewish leadership is stressed and that of Pontius *Pilate minimized, as he washes his hands and the crowd accepts the responsibility: "His blood be on us and on our children" (Matt. 27.25). And Judas usually looks more Jewish than do Jesus and the other disciples in the history of Christian art; one may ask: Why? The shift of emphasis from the Romans to the Jews is often explained by the need of Christianity to present itself as acceptable to the Roman authorities. A deeper reason may well be the theological need for understanding the passion as a fulfillment of the scriptures of the Jews and thus as an inner Jewish event. Yet there can be no historical doubt that Jesus was crucified under and by Pontius Pilate as a Jewish threat to Roman law and order.

When the New Testament and especially the gospel of John gives the impression that "the Jews" are the constant enemies and opponents, we must remember that both believers and unbelievers in the Jesus story are Jews. In order to make that more clear some translators choose to use words like "Judeans" or "the Jewish leaders." One could even think of "the establishment," for there is really nothing especially Jewish in the attitudes of those leaders. While such moves help to correct the historical understanding of the events and put them into perspective, it still remains a fact that the Gospels did perceive the controversies as part of Israel's refusal to accept God's offer of redemption in Jesus Christ. Judaism, on its part, understands the Christian claim for Jesus as false, while sometimes willing to recognize Jesus as a teacher among teachers in Judaism.

But Christians burdened by the horrendous history of anti-Semitism have urgent reasons to recognize how the rhetoric of a fledgling and beleaguered minority turned into the aiding and abetting of lethal hatred when endowed with the power of being in the majority. Anti-Semitism could be branded the most persistent heresy of Christian theology and practice. To unmask it is the first step. And the second is to complete and further develop the work begun in the Second Vatican Council: a vigilant audit of Christian preaching, teaching, Bible study, and liturgy as to what perpetuates and engenders contempt for Jews and Judaism. In such a task, dialogue with Jews is indispensable. In dialogue it becomes impossible for Christians to treat Jews and Judaism as obsolete or as a nonentity after the coming of the church. Yet such patterns of so-called supersessionism have functioned as a major factor in the history of Christian anti-Semitism.

Apocalyptic Literature. The words "apocalyptic" and "apocalypse" (from a Greek root meaning "to uncover," "to reveal") are terms that came to be used from the second century CE onward to indicate a type of Jewish and Christian literature akin to the New Testament Apocalypse (an alternative title of the book of *Revelation), which gave its name to this style of writing.

The term "apocalyptic literature" is taken to refer to a body of revelatory writing produced in Jewish circles between 250 BCE and 200 CE and subsequently taken up and perpetuated by Christianity. It includes not only the genre "apocalypse" but may also include other related types of literature, such as testaments, hymns, and *prayers, which share some of its more important characteristics and motifs; that is, it does not have a common literary form but is diverse and even hybrid in its literary expression. The apocalypse type of writing, which forms the core of this literature, is a record of divine disclosures made known through the agency of *angels, *dreams, and visions. These may take different forms: an otherworldly journey in which the "secrets" of the cosmos are made known (the so-called vertical apocalypses), or a survey of history often leading to an eschatological crisis in which the cosmic powers of evil are destroyed, the cosmos is restored, and Israel (or "the righteous") is redeemed (the so-called horizontal or historical apocalypses).

Biblical Apocalypses. The scholarly consensus sees a strong link between the apocalypse and biblical *prophecy, and regards such writings as Ezekiel 38–39, Isaiah 24–27, Zechariah 12–14, and Joel 3 if not as apocalypses per se then as forerunners of them. The *wisdom tradition undoubtedly also influenced the apocalyptic in its growth and development, but arguments that its origins lie there rather than in prophecy remain unconvincing. However closely related prophecy and apocalyptic may be, they are to be distinguished from each other in at least two respects: whereas the prophets for the most part declare God's word to his or her own generation, the apocalyptists record revelations said to have been made known by God to some great hero in earlier times and now to be revealed in a "secret" book at the end of the days; and whereas the prophets see the realization of God's purpose within the historical process, the apocalyptists see that purpose reaching its culmination not just within history but above and beyond history in that supramundane realm where God dwells.

Within the Bible itself there are two great apocalypses: *Daniel and *Revelation. In the first of these, five stories are told of a wise man, Daniel, who remained faithful to his Jewish religion during the Babylonian *exile in the sixth century BCE, and was enabled by God to interpret dreams and visions. In the second half of the book, four of Daniel's visions are recorded, along with their interpretations, which give a survey of history from the exile (when the writer is reckoned to have lived) to its denouement in the second century BCE in the time of Antiochus IV, when the book in its present form was actually written. In this sense, the book of Daniel is addressed to the writer's own contemporaries, but the method and approach are altogether different from those of the prophets. So too with his hope for the coming kingdom: in keeping with the prophets, he sees it established here on earth as the climax of history, but in no way is it to be separated from that transcendent, heavenly realm where God dwells with his holy angels.

The book of Revelation follows a somewhat similar form, for it too reveals the future course of events by means of visions and declares the triumph of God's purpose. In the course of time other Christian apocalypses appeared, some as independent works, such as the Apocalypses of Peter and Paul, and others as interpolations in or additions to existing Jewish apocalyptic books.

Extrabiblical Apocalyptic Books. A number of extrabiblical Jewish apocalypses appeared during the Greco-Roman period which, for the most part, have survived only in translation, having been preserved within the Christian tradition. They are of considerable value for the light they throw on the four hundred and fifty or so years between 250 BCE and 200 CE and not least on our understanding of the background of the New Testament. There is no agreed list of such books, but the following works are generally so regarded: 1 *Enoch (Ethiopic Apocalypse of Enoch), third century BCE to first century CE; Apocalypse of Zephaniah, first century BCE to first century CE; Apocalypse of Abraham, first to second century CE; 2 *Enoch (Slavonic Apocalypse of Enoch), late first century CE; 2 *Esdras (= 4 Ezra) 3–14, ca. 100 CE; 2 Baruch (Syriac Apocalypse of Baruch), early second century CE; 3 Baruch (Greek Apocalypse of Baruch), first to third century CE.

Besides these, there are from this period certain other Jewish writings that, though not themselves apocalypses, belong to the same milieu and are generally recognized as part of the apocalyptic literature. They are as follows: Jubilees, second century BCE; Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, second century BCE; Jewish Sibylline Oracles, second century BCE to seventh century CE; Treatise of Shem, first century BCE; Testament (Assumption) of Moses, first century CE; Testament of Abraham, first to second century CE.

To this list may be added material found among the *Dead Sea Scrolls: fragments of a Testament of Levi (related to a late and redacted Greek Testament of that name) and a Testament of Naphtali, and likewise fragments of the (composite) first book of Enoch and the book of Jubilees. Other writings and fragments belonging to the Qumran community indicate a close relationship between the religious outlook of the apocalyptic writers and that expressed in the scrolls, such as certain passages in the Manual of Discipline, the War Scroll, the Hymns, and such works as the book of Mysteries, the Genesis Apocryphon, and the Description of the New Jerusalem.

Literary Features. The apocalypse is recognized by many scholars as a distinct literary genre expressing itself, as we have seen, in terms of divine disclosure, transcendent reality, and final redemption. As such, it shares with other related apocalyptic books certain literary features that are worthy of note:

Revelation through visionary experience. This is a stock-in-trade of these writings, though visions may be replaced by dreams, trances, auditions, and visual/physical transference to the ends of the earth or to heaven itself. The ancient seer (in whose name the author writes) is confronted with the heavenly mysteries, either directly or as mediated by an angel, and is bidden to record what he has seen and heard.

In so doing, the writer often makes use of two literary devices that, though not confined to the apocalyptic writings, are a common feature. The first is that of secret books, in which the seer is bidden to conceal these mysteries until the end time, when he will reveal them to the wise as a sign that the end is now at hand. The second is that of pseudonymity, whereby the author writes in the name of some honored person of antiquity, such as *Adam, *Enoch, *Abraham, *Moses, or *Ezra. The intention is not to deceive but rather to strengthen the conviction that the apocalyptist is transmitting a long and authoritative tradition. The same device is followed in Christian apocalypses, such as those of Peter and Paul, but not in the book of Revelation, where it is enough that the writer should declare in his own name the revelations he himself has received directly from his risen Lord.

Symbolic imagery. Symbolism, it has been said, is the language of the apocalyptic style of writing, a code language rich in imagery culled both from biblical and from Canaanite and Babylonian traditions. Generally speaking, the code is fairly easily recognizable: wild beasts represent the gentile nations, animal horns are gentile rulers, people are angels, and so on. Elsewhere it is less easily broken, particularly where vestiges of early myths have no obvious relation to the content of the book itself.

Tracts for the times. The apocalyptic books, particularly those "historical" apocalypses of Palestinian origin, were in many cases the product of their age and its political and economic climate. As tracts for the times, they were written to encourage those who were oppressed and saw little or no hope in terms of either politics or armed might. Their message was that God himself would intervene and reverse the situation in which they found themselves, delivering the godly from the hands of the wicked and establishing his rule for all to see. Sometimes such encouragement is given in the form of discourse in which the revelation of God's sovereignty is disclosed; at other times, as in the book of Daniel, it takes the form of a story or legend concerning the ancient worthy in whose name the book is written.

Such features are not peculiar to the apocalyptic books, but their form of presentation, together with their recurring theme of revealed secrets and divine intervention, indicates an identifiable and distinct body of literature within Judaism that, though sharing the ideals of prophecy, is nevertheless markedly different from it.

Common Themes. Certain well-marked themes run through the apocalyptic writings:

History and "the end." The whole of history is a unity under the overarching purpose of God. It is divided, however, into great epochs that must run their predetermined course; only then will the end come, and with it the dawning of the messianic kingdom and the age to come when evil will be routed and righteousness established forever.

Present troubles are in fact birth pangs heralding the end. Calculations, involving the use of numerology (see Number Symbolism), demonstrate that soon, very soon, earth's invincible empires will disappear and be replaced by God's eternal rule: "The coming of the times is very near. . . . The pitcher is near the well and the ship to the harbor, and the journey to the city, and life to its end" (2 Bar. 85.10). The writer of Daniel tries to be more precise, interpreting Jeremiah's seventy years' captivity as seventy weeks of years, ending in the writer's own day (9.21–27; cf. Jer. 25.11–12; 29.10). The Christian expectation is no less eager, though less precise: " 'Surely, I am coming soon.' Amen. Come, Lord Jesus!" (Rev. 22.20, see Second Coming of Christ).

Cosmic cataclysm. The coming end will be "a time of anguish, such as has never occurred since nations first came into existence" (Dan. 12.1). Sometimes this is described in terms of political action and military struggle; at other times the conflict assumes cosmic proportions involving mysterious happenings on earth and in the heavens—earthquakes, famine, fearful celestial portents, and destruction by fire. Such things find an echo in the New Testament, where it is said that in the last days there will be an eclipse of the sun, and the stars will fall from heaven (Mark 13.24–25).

This cosmic upheaval is closely related to the concept of cosmic powers in the form of *angels and *demons. The angel hosts are drawn up in battle array against the demon hosts under the command of *Satan. In the final battle the powers of evil, together with the evil nations they represent, will be utterly destroyed.

The consummation. The coming kingdom is, generally speaking, to be established here on this earth; in some instances it has a temporary duration, and is followed by the age to come for, as 2 Esdras puts it, "The Most High has made not one world but two" (7.50). In this new divine order, the end will be as the beginning and *paradise will be restored. "Dualism" is sometimes used to describe the discontinuity between this age and the age to come, but continuity remains: generally speaking, this earth (albeit renewed or restored) is the scene of God's deliverance.

In some of these writings the figures of *Messiah and *Son of man, among others, are introduced as agents of the coming kingdom. These probably represent two originally distinct strands of eschatological expectation which, in the course of time, became intertwined.

One significant development is the prevailing belief in a resurrection, a coming judgment, and the life to come (see Dan. 12.2 for an early reference). It is by this means that the gap, as it were, between the eschatology of the nation and the eschatology of the individual is finally bridged. Both together find their fulfillment in God's final redemption when all wrongs are to be righted and justice and peace are established forever.

Apocrypha. This entry consists of two articles dealing with books or parts of books not considered canonical by every community of faith, Jewish Apocrypha and Christian Apocrypha. The first article, Jewish Apocrypha, surveys Jewish religious writings not recognized as part of the Bible in Jewish tradition nor by some Christian churches (see Canon*). Among the latter these are commonly referred to as the Apocrypha of the Old Testament; those churches that do include some or all of these writings in their canon frequently refer to them as "deuterocanonical." Each of these books has a separate entry devoted to it; see also* Apocalyptic Literature and Pseudepigrapha. The second article, Christian Apocrypha, deals with early Christian writings not included in the canon of the New Testament but which contain similar types of literature often attributed to figures of the apostolic age.

Jewish Apocrypha

The word apocrypha, a Greek neuter plural (singular, apocryphon), is used to designate a group of important religious writings from antiquity that are not universally regarded as belonging to the authentic *canon of Scripture, though many of them have been so regarded by particular communities. The word is applied primarily to the fifteen (or fourteen) books that are included in many editions of the English Bible as a supplement, usually printed between the Hebrew scriptures and the New Testament. The name, which means "things hidden away," is inappropriate, since none of these books (with the possible exception of 2 Esdras) was ever regarded as hidden or secret. For the most part, they are simply those books found only in manuscripts of the *Septuagint (LXX), the ancient Greek translation of the Hebrew scriptures, and therefore possibly regarded as "canonical" by Greek-speaking Alexandrian Jews, though ultimately rejected by the Jewish community of Palestine and rabbinic authorities of later times (2 Esdras and the Prayer of Manasseh are not covered by this definition). Their preservation is largely due to the Christian community, which, for most of the first four centuries CE, accepted the Greek Old Testament as normative for its life and thought. In modern times the term "apocrypha" has been extended more loosely to other books from the later Hellenistic and early Roman periods but which, so far as we know, never attained even quasi-canonical status (these books are more commonly designated as *pseudepigrapha), and has also been extended by analogy to a large group of early Christian writings excluded from the New Testament canon in its final form. In this article we shall be concerned principally with the fifteen books described at the beginning of the paragraph; for the analogous early Christian writings, see the second article in this entry.

Until recently it was commonly assumed that Jews of the period immediately before and after the beginning of the common era had two canons, one that was current in Palestine and another in Alexandria, the greatest center of Jewish life in the Hellenistic world. But newer evidence, including that from *Qumran, suggests a more complex reconstruction, and indeed the use of the word "canon" may be somewhat inappropriate, since the list of included books was not explicitly fixed until the second century CE. The contents of the first two parts (Law and Prophets) of what would ultimately be called the canon had been accepted as sacred and authoritative since at least 200 BCE, but the works that constitute the third part of the Hebrew Bible (the Writings) have a less authoritative status and have been individually evaluated in quite different ways. It is to this last class that the books of the Apocrypha belong. Their one common denominator is the fact that all are contained, in Greek, in some manuscript of the Septuagint (with the exception, once again, of 2 Esdras and Prayer of Manasseh, to which we shall return).

The definition and final closing of the Jewish canon was in large measure due to the inner restructuring of Jewish society and the tightening of standards that resulted both from the destruction of the Temple in 70 CE and from the need for self-definition in the face of the threat presented by the rise of an aggressive Christian church. Christians, increasingly of gentile origin, naturally accepted the scriptures in the form most accessible to them, the Greek Septuagint. Jews, quite as naturally, reacted by emphatically rejecting the Septuagint and insisting that only those ancient books that were written in Hebrew could be regarded as authoritative. Even such books as *Sirach and 1 *Maccabees, which had clearly been written originally in Hebrew, were rejected, since internal evidence showed that they had been composed long after the time of Ezra, when, it was believed, prophecy had ceased.

Among Christians, the Old Testament continued for a long time to be tacitly accepted in its Greek form, even though objections were occasionally voiced by theologians and other scholars who were familiar with the Jewish position. The question of the canonicity of the "extra books" became acute only with Pope Damasus's choice of Jerome, in 382 CE, to make an authoritative translation of the Bible into Latin. As he worked on the Old Testament, Jerome became convinced that the Hebrew text alone was definitive and he therefore felt obliged to reject those books found only in Greek; these books he called "apocrypha." Whatever precise meaning he attached to that word, it was certainly intended to be pejorative. Strangely, his views were not accepted, and to the present the books he designated as "apocryphal" are incorporated in the canon of the Roman Catholic church and distributed, according to their type, among the other books of the Old Testament. The formal designation for these books among Roman Catholics is "deuterocanonical," meaning books that belong to a second layer of the canon, but with no implication that they are of less worth than the others. The view of the Orthodox churches, for most of which the Septuagint continues to be the authoritative form of scripture, is substantially the same, though the list of books they regard as at least liturgically useful tends to be somewhat longer and can include such works as 1 Esdras, 3 and 4 Maccabees, and Psalm 151. (See Eastern Orthodoxy and the Bible.)

It was only with the Reformation and its emphasis upon the sole authority of scripture that Jerome's view came into its own. Protestants were unanimous in accepting the Jewish definition of the Old Testament canon. They were agreed that the extra books of the Greek canon, which was also that of the Latin *Vulgate, should be gathered together and removed from among the books of the Hebrew canon; if included in the Bible at all, they should be placed in a separate section between the Testaments clearly labeled "Apocrypha." But they were not of one opinion with regard to the value of these books. Calvinists took the most extreme view, asserting in the Westminster Confession that they were of no more value than any other human writings, and their use was discouraged. Lutherans were inclined to value them more highly and to encourage their study, though not with any sense that they were of equal value with the authoritative books of the Hebrew canon. The Church of England requires the books of the Apocrypha to be included in any edition of the Bible authorized for use in public worship, and provides for considerable use of them in its lectionary while also insisting (in Art. 3 of the Thirty-Nine Articles) that they cannot be used to prove any point of doctrine. In the early seventeenth century some Protestant editions of the Bible were published without the Apocrypha and, since 1827, when the British and Foreign Bible Society, followed shortly by the American Bible Society, under pressure from the Calvinist (Presbyterian) churches, decided to omit the apocryphal books from all its editions, omitting them has become the common practice. In the middle of the twentieth century, however, there began a considerable revival of interest in these books among both Protestants and Jews, based partly upon a more relaxed view of the nature of the canon, but even more upon a realization of the importance of the apocryphal literature for biblical research and interpretation. As a result, numerous editions of the Apocrypha have become available and a number of significant new commentaries on the apocryphal books have been published. Newer translations (e.g., GNB, NRSV) often include them in at least some editions.

Briefly described, the books of the standard Apocrypha are as follows: 1 *Esdras is an alternative version of the Hebrew book of Ezra that includes a short extract from 2 Chronicles at the beginning and from Nehemiah at the end. It is found in manuscripts of the Septuagint, but is not considered one of the deuterocanonical books by the Latin church; in the Vulgate it is called 3 Esdras and is printed, for purely historical reasons, in an appendix after the New Testament. The *apocalyptic work traditionally called 2 *Esdras is of Jewish origin, with some Christian additions, and was never part of the Septuagint. Except for a tiny fragment, the Greek text is lost, so it is best known in the Latin version that (like 1 Esdras) is printed in an appendix to the Vulgate, where it is called 4 Esdras; it is not considered deuterocanonical. *Tobit is a romantic oriental tale, best known for its very human characters, its high ethical teaching, and its use of magic and demonology. *Judith is the fictitious story of a heroic Jewish woman who delivers her people by using feminine wiles to accomplish the assassination of the general of a pagan army that was besieging them. The Additions to the Book of *Esther consists of a series of discontinuous passages that appear only in the Greek version of that book, apparently added, for the most part, to give a religious tone to that embarrassingly secular work. Two of the apocryphal books fall into the category of wisdom literature: there is, first of all, the *Wisdom of Solomon, a patently pseudonymous work that deals with such basic themes as immortality and the nature of divine wisdom in language that is a mixture of Jewish theology and Greek philosophy; and, second, *Sirach (or Ecclesiasticus), a much more traditional work, originally composed in Hebrew, that has its closest analogue in the book of *Proverbs. The second part of the confused composition called *Baruch (3.9–4.4) also belongs to wisdom literature, being a poem in praise of wisdom as God's special gift to Israel, while the preceding prose section consists of a brief narrative introducing a lengthy confession of Israel's sins as the cause of the Babylonian exile; the concluding poem (4:5–5.9) deals with the theme of Israel's restoration. If the Letter of *Jeremiah is counted as chap. 6 of Baruch, as is often done, there are fourteen rather than fifteen apocryphal books, but it is clearly a separate work having for its theme the foolishness of idolatry. The Prayer of *Azariah and the Song of the Three Young Men, *Susanna, and *Bel and the Dragon are additions that appear in the Greek version of *Daniel, the first containing two widely used liturgical hymns, while the other two are popular tales in which Daniel is the hero. A Greek form of the *Prayer of Manasseh exists, but was not part of the original Septuagint, and it is deuterocanonical for only some eastern churches. The books called 1 and 2 *Maccabees are two entirely independent and disparate historical narratives that record the heroic struggles that led to a brief period of independence for Jews in the second and first centuries BCE.

The importance of these books arises first of all from the fact that they were composed later than the canonical books of the Hebrew Bible and, apart from 2 Esdras, before the books of the New Testament. They therefore shed a welcome light on political, religious, and cultural developments in the later Hellenistic and early Roman periods and thus on the background of the New Testament. Furthermore, when regarded for their own sake, the Wisdom of Solomon is an important theological treatise, representing the first attempt to fuse two different intellectual strains, the Israelite and the Greek; and, for most readers, Sirach is at least as interesting as Proverbs and perhaps more accessible; Tobit, Judith, and Susanna are splendid examples of narrative art; and 1 Maccabees is a fine specimen of sober historical writing.

Among other ancient works sometimes classified as "apocrypha" are 3 and 4 *Maccabees, the Psalms of Solomon, the several books of *Enoch, the Baruch apocalypse (2 Baruch), the Book of Jubilees, and the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs.

Christian Apocrypha

Beyond the twenty-seven books collected in the New Testament canon, many other examples were produced of each of the four types of New Testament literature: gospels, acts, letters, and apocalypses. The intentions of the authors of these books, which are now known as New Testament Apocrypha, were diverse; some sought to supplement works already in circulation, while others sought to supplant them. In some cases, these books simply served as light entertainment for Christian believers; in others, the authors wanted to promulgate practices and ideas condemned by the church.

Apocryphal Gospels. Of the roughly two dozen gospels produced during the early centuries of Christianity, those concerning on the one hand Jesus' infancy and childhood, and on the other his *descent into hell between his death and his *resurrection clearly augment the canonical Gospels, which pass over these matters in almost total silence (Luke 2.42–51 relates one incident when Jesus was a boy of twelve). Naturally, however, early Christians were curious about both of these periods; not surprisingly, traditions grew up around each and were recorded (see Names for the Nameless). The Protevangelium of James and the Infancy Gospel of Thomas, two second-century infancy gospels, were developed over the following centuries into the History of Joseph the Carpenter and the Arabic Gospel of the Infancy, as well as other similar writings describing Jesus' early years and the miracles surrounding contact with the infant, his clothing, and even his bathwater.

In these works, the young Jesus is portrayed as possessing miraculous powers. The uses to which such powers are put, though, is often incompatible with the character found in the canonical Gospels. For example, while playing with other children on the Sabbath, Jesus molded twelve clay birds. When an elder reported Jesus' desecration of the Sabbath to *Joseph, Jesus clapped his hands and the birds came to life. Another time, when Jesus was walking through a crowd, someone bumped him, whereupon Jesus turned and said, "You will never get to where you are going," and the person fell down dead.

Apocryphal accounts of Christ's descent into the underworld and his victory over its powers are more rare. One of the earliest can be found in the fourth-century Gospel of Nicodemus (also called the Acts of Pilate); another, from the next century, is the Gospel of Bartholomew.

With the discovery in 1945 of the *Nag Hammadi library, several previously unknown (or known only by name) gnostic gospels have come to light. These and related works (e.g., the Epistle of the Apostles) commonly present the risen Christ's revelations to the disciples during the period between his resurrection and *ascension (a period that the gnostics expanded from 40 days [Acts 1.3] to 550 days). Often these accounts are related as a dialogue in which the disciples question Jesus about subjects that remained obscure in his earlier teaching. Most often, however, the discussion goes beyond the Gospel traditions to speculations about cosmology, gnostic interpretations of the creation accounts of Genesis, and the fate of the different classes of humanity. Notable examples preserved at Nag Hammadi are the Apocryphon of James, the Sophia of Jesus Christ, the Book of Thomas, and the Dialogue of the Savior. Among the most significant of the Nag Hammadi documents, and very different in character, is a Coptic version of the Gospel of Thomas, a collection of 114 sayings (logia) of Jesus, many similar to logia in the synoptic Gospels and in a late second-century CE papyrus; see further Agrapha.

Still other gospels are known only by name or from brief patristic quotations. Some of these originated among early Jewish-Christian sects, as is clear from their titles (Gospel of the Hebrews; Gospel of the Ebionites; Gospel of the Nazarenes).

Apocryphal Acts. Since the canonical Acts of the Apostles record in detail the activities of only a few of the *apostles, second- and third-century Christian authors drew up narratives of the other apostles' activities. Even apostles portrayed in Acts had further exploits recounted, sometimes in minute detail. The most notable are five works from the second and third centuries, attributed to Leucius Charinus, alleged to have been a disciple of John; scholars agree, however, that the actual authors of these and all other apocryphal acts remain unknown.

The Acts of Peter (ca. 180–190 CE) describes the rivalry between *Simon Peter and Simon Magus. Among Peter's miracles are a speaking dog, a dried fish restored to life, and resurrections from the dead. The comical climax of the contest takes place in the Roman forum, when the magician attempts to fly to heaven. The document closes with an account of Peter's martyrdom by crucifixion.

The Acts of John (ca. 150–180) purports to be an eyewitness account of John's missionary travels in Asia Minor. The sermons attributed to him evince docetic tendencies: Jesus had no proper shape or body, only an appearance, so to one person he appeared in one shape, and to another in a totally different shape; when he walked, he left no footprints. Besides a droll tale about bedbugs, the work has a Hymn of Christ as well as the apostles dancing in a circle.

The Acts of Andrew (early third century?) is known chiefly through a long epitome prepared by Gregory of Tours (sixth century). To judge by the extant portions, the Acts are in essence a narrative of *Andrew's journey from Pontus to Achaia, during which he performed many miracles and delivered many lengthy, severely ascetic exhortations. The Martyrdom of St. Andrew, a variant text of part of the work, describes the apostle's death by crucifixion.

The Acts of Thomas (first half of the third century), is the only apocryphal Acts preserved in its entirety, surviving in Greek, Syriac, Ethiopic, Armenian, and Latin versions. It tells of *Thomas's missionary work in India, his healing miracles, and martyrdom. It also contains several fine liturgical hymns; the best-known is the "Hymn of the Soul" (also called the "Hymn of the Pearl"), which has suggestive allegorical overtones.

The Acts of Paul, according to Tertullian, was written by a presbyter of Asia Minor with the purpose of honoring the apostle. Despite ecclesiastical disapproval, his book become quite popular with the laity. Among the surviving episodes is one that tells of *Paul and Thecla, a noblewoman and follower of Paul who preached and administered *baptism; in this section we find the famous description of Paul: "little in stature, with a bald head and crooked legs . . . with eyebrows meeting, and a nose somewhat hooked." Another episode, discovered in 1936, gives a detailed account of Paul's encounter in the amphitheater at Ephesus with a lion to which he had earlier preached the gospel and had baptized.

These works are generally sectarian in character, whether orthodox or theologically deviant (Docetic, Gnostic, Manichean). Sectarian influence can especially be seen in emphasis on sexual asceticism and martyrdom. Other legendary Acts dating from the fourth to the sixth century are the Acts of Andrew and Matthias among the Cannibals, Acts of Andrew and Paul, Acts of Barnabas, Acts of James the Great, Acts of John by Prochorus, Acts of the Apostles Peter and Andrew, Slavonic Acts of Peter, Acts of Philip, Acts of Pilate, and Acts of Thaddaeus. This type of literature may be seen as paralleling the novels of antiquity.

Apocryphal Letters. The apocryphal epistles are relatively few in number. The spurious Third Letter of Paul to the Corinthians, with an introductory note to Paul from presbyters at Corinth, is part of the Acts of Paul, and came to be highly regarded in the Armenian and Syrian churches. It addresses doctrinal issues such as prophecy, creation, the human nature of Christ, and the resurrection of the body.

In the west, Paul's Letter to the *Laodiceans was disseminated widely and is actually included in the all eighteen printed German Bibles prior to Luther's translation. The Correspondence between Paul and Seneca, consisting of fourteen letters between the *Stoic philosopher Seneca and Paul, has come down to us in more than three hundred manuscripts; the banal content and colorless style of the letters show that they cannot come from the hands of either the moralist or the apostle. Other apocryphal letters are the Epistle of Titus and the Epistles of Christ and Abgar.

Apocryphal Apocalypses. In addition to the *Revelation of John, there are several apocalypses attributed to other apostles. The earliest is the Apocalypse of Peter (ca. 125–150 CE), preserved in part in Greek and fully in Ethiopic. Making use of beliefs about the afterlife from the Odyssey and the Aeneid, it tells of the delights of the redeemed in heaven and (at much greater length) the torments of the damned in hell. These ideas were elaborated extensively in the following century by the author of the Apocalypse of Paul, who describes how Paul is caught up to paradise (see 2 Cor. 12.1–4) and witnesses the judgment of two souls, one righteous and the other wicked. He is then led through hell, where he sees the tortures of the wicked and intercedes on their behalf, obtaining for them relief every Lord's day. A visit to paradise ensues, during which Paul meets the patriarchs, the major prophets, Enoch, and finally *Adam. Some of these themes became part of medieval beliefs given wider dissemination through Dante's Divine Comedy. With the discovery in 1946 of the *Nag Hammadi library, the number of apocryphal apocalypses increased: another Apocalypse of Peter, another of Paul, the First and Second Apocalypses of James, and others.

Modern Apocrypha. The urge to supplement the Bible has continued down through the ages. In modern times, fraudulent productions continue to excite the hopes of naive readers that priceless treasures have been uncovered. Despite repeated claims of authenticity, such productions invariably lack historical or literary value. Among the most often published are The Aquarian Gospel, The Archko Volume, The Letter of Benan, The Description of Christ, The Confessions of Pontius Pilate, The Gospel of Josephus, The Book of Jasher, The Lost Books of the Bible, The Nazarene Gospel, The Letter from Heaven, Cahspe, and The Twenty-ninth Chapter of Acts.

BRUCE M. METZGER

Apollos. The book of Acts records that an Alexandrian Jew named Apollos was active as a missionary in *Ephesus and Achaia (18:24–28). Although skillful in communicating and knowledgeable concerning scripture, his teaching on *baptism was incomplete. Priscilla and Aquila needed to provide him with a "more accurate" understanding, and when *Paul visited Ephesus after Apollos's departure (Acts 19.1–7), he had to rebaptize some people who had known John's baptism for repentance but not baptism in the name of Jesus.

In 1 Corinthians, Paul's references to Apollos and his teachings betray some tension between the two leaders (1 Cor 1.12; 3.4–6; 4.6; 16.12).

DANIEL N. SCHOWALTER

Apostle. The Greek word apostolos ("someone who has been sent") is seldom used in classical Greek, but it occurs eighty times in the New Testament, where it means "delegate" of Jesus Christ and "messenger" of the gospel. Paul lists apostles first among the members of the body of Christ (1 Cor. 12.29; cf. Eph. 4.11).

The corresponding word in Hebrew (šālîaḥ) was especially used to denote someone given full authority, for some particular purpose and for a limited time, to represent the person or persons from whom the delegate comes; the rabbis said that "a man's šālîaḥ is as himself." The legal status of such a delegate has its roots in Semitic customs pertaining to a messenger (see 1 Sam. 25.40; 2 Sam. 10.1–5). The mission of *Paul to *Damascus (Acts 9.1–2) and the delegation of *Barnabas and Paul by the church of *Antioch (Acts 11.30; 13.2; see 14.4, 14) are to be understood in terms of a rabbinic šālîaḥ. The same holds true for the sending of the *disciples by Jesus, who included the "apostles" (Mark 3.14 par.). They went two by two (Mark 6.7; Luke 10.1); their task of proclaiming the gospel and casting out *demons was limited as to sphere and time (Matt. 10.5–8), and they had to return to the sender and report about their task (Mark 6.30; Luke 10.17).

Although Jesus is called "apostle" only once in the New Testament (Heb. 3.1), in his "*Son of man" sayings he presents himself as the agent of God for salvation (Mark 2.17; 10.45; Luke 5.32; 7.34; 19.10; see also Matt 10.40). The divine commission of the Son is elaborated in the gospel of John, where the evangelist more than once uses the law concerning the authority of the šālîaḥ (7.33; 16.5; 17 passim).

The status of a post-Easter apostle of Christ transcends that of a Jewish šālîaḥ. In his letters, Paul often defends and defines his apostolic authority. He mentions the apostles before him (Gal. 1.17), specifying *Peter, the *twelve, James, and all the apostles (1 Cor. 15.5, 7). Though Paul was called last of all and considered himself to be the least of them (1 Cor 15.8–9), he was convinced that God had set him apart before he was born (Gal. 1.15); thus, Paul repeated the claim of the prophet Jeremiah (1.5) and of the servant of the Lord (Isa. 49.1–5). This means that the apostles of Christ had to serve during their whole lives as did the biblical *prophets, who were called by God and spoke as his messengers. Paul may have used the narrative of Isaiah's call as a key for interpreting his vision near Damascus. The motifs of Isaiah 6 can be discovered in scattered statements in which Paul speaks about the call and about the nature of his apostleship. The rhetorical questions "Am I not an apostle? Have I not seen Jesus our Lord?" (1 Cor. 9.1) get their force from Isa. 6.1, 8: "I saw the Lord . . . send me!" Moreover, Paul understood his call to apostleship as an act of the *grace of God (Rom. 1.5). As a persecutor of the Christians he was not worthy of it (1 Cor. 15.9); in a similar way, Isaiah had confessed his unworthiness (6.5–7). Isaiah had been told to bring a message of doom to the Israelites that would harden them (6.8–10); Paul experienced disobedience to the gospel by his fellow Jews (Rom. 10.16; 11.7–10), which is why he brought it to the gentiles (see Acts 28.25–28). He felt the necessity to preach his message (1 Cor. 9.16) as Jeremiah had (20.9).

Besides the limited group of apostles (the twelve) in Jerusalem (1 Cor. 15.5, 7; Gal. 1.17, 19), Paul knew another circle of apostolic preachers (1 Cor. 9.5; 12.28; 2 Cor. 11.13; Rom. 16.7). Therefore, one may distinguish between two types of New Testament apostles in Paul's view: those called through an appearance of the risen Lord; and charismatic preachers, who were delegated by a church such as that at Antioch (see Acts 13.1–3; Rev. 2.2; Did. 11.3–6), including both men and women (Rom. 16.7; see Junia). But both types were united in a figure such as Paul. On the other hand, Luke reserves the designation "apostle" for the twelve disciples of Jesus who became the leaders of the Jerusalem church. For him, the apostle has to be a companion of Jesus and a witness to the resurrection (Acts 1.21–22). This seems to be the view of Mark (6.30; see 6.7) as well as that of Matthew (10.2).

Apostolic Council. The gathering of the Jerusalem church under the leadership of apostles and elders reported in Acts 15.4–29. The meeting took place after unnamed Judeans raised questions in *Antioch concerning the status of converted *gentiles and the need for their *circumcision and observance of Mosaic *law. *Paul and *Barnabas came to Jerusalem as representatives of the Antiochene church, probably in 49/50 CE. A discussion among the *apostles and *elders takes place in front of the assembled church. *Peter apparently settles the question by appeal to his own experience: converted gentiles had already received the Holy Spirit apart from the Law (cf. Acts 10.1–48). *James supports this position with prooftexts from the prophets, but then suggests a set of minimum obligations that gentile Christians ought to observe. This proposal is formally adopted by the whole church and incorporated into a letter (the Apostolic Decree) addressed to the churches of Antioch, Syria, and Cilicia. The majority text tradition presents these requirements as "abstinence from idolatry, blood, meat that is strangled, and sexual immorality," which probably reflects the requirements placed on *aliens residing in Israel in Leviticus 17–18. Whether these practices would have been sufficient to facilitate fellowship between gentiles and Jews among Christians is unclear. They may represent the practices of the author's largely gentile community at a time when most Jewish Christians had been forced out of the synagogues. A later text tradition drops the reference to strangled flesh, probably takes "blood" to mean "murder," and adds the golden rule, thereby converting the requirements to a minimal moral code without reference to the issues separating Jews from gentiles within the church.

The Apostolic Council should almost certainly be identified with the events reported by Paul in *Galatians 2.1–10, although the differences between the two accounts have led some interpreters to posit distinct events. For historical reconstruction, Paul's account is to be preferred since he was a participant, though hardly a neutral observer. Paul reports a less formal meeting with Peter which settled the question of circumcision. Some scholars prefer to connect this meeting to Paul's visit to Jerusalem reported in Acts 11.29–30. Paul places the dispute concerning table fellowship in Antioch and seems to indicate that his differences with Peter on this issue were not resolved (Gal. 2.11–14).

Debate continues concerning the possibility that one or more early sources lie behind the report in Acts. The placement of the Apostolic Council at the center of *Acts underscores the importance of the theological issues raised by the success of the gentile mission. It reflects the author's interest in the relationship between Israel and the Christian church, and it integrates the Pauline mission into the larger picture of the spread of the Christian faith from Jerusalem to the rest of the world. The Apostolic Council is portrayed as affirming gentile freedom from the Mosaic law while making social relations between Jews and gentiles possible within the church.

ROBERT STOOPS

Apple of the Eye. The translation "apple of the eye" corresponds to several related phrases, all of which mean the pupil of the eye and indicate something near and dear which is to be protected. In Hebrew, these expressions ('îšôn ʿayin ["little man of the eye"]: Deut. 32.10; Prov. 7.2; bat ʿayin ["daughter of the eye"]: Lam. 2.18; Zech. 2.8; 'îšôn bat ʿayin [a double reading]: Ps. 17.8) refer to the reflected human image that appears in the pupil of the eye. The same idiom is found in Sirach 17.22, in classical Greek, and in Latin (pupilla, from which the English word "pupil" is derived). The English phrase "apple of the eye" is a periphrastic translation, using a different metaphoric idiom. RUSSELL FULLER

Aqedah. The Hebrew word for "binding," and the common designation for Genesis 22.1–19, in which God tests *Abraham by commanding that he sacrifice his son *Isaac. Abraham binds Isaac (v. 9). When he is about to slaughter him, an angel calls to him to desist, whereupon Abraham offers a ram instead. Although the Aqedah is the climax of the Genesis narratives about Abraham, a final testimony to his faith in, obedience to, and fear of God, it is not mentioned elsewhere in the Hebrew Bible. Isaac's role in Genesis 22 is passive, but postbiblical Jewish interpretations of the first to the eighth centuries CE transform him into an adult, voluntary sacrificial offering. Some texts give reasons for the episode, including Satan's questioning of Abraham's devotion to God (b. Sanh. 89b; cf. Job 1–2) and Isaac's and *Ishmael's arguments concerning who was the more righteous (Gen. Rab. 55.4). During this period, the Aqedah became associated with the Ro'sh ha-shanah liturgy, with the shofar recalling the substituted ram. Mount Moriah, where the Aqedah took place, was identified with the site of the *Temple. Isaac emerges both as the paradigm of the martyr and as the perfect sacrifice whose act brings merit to and has redemptive value for his own descendants. Some rabbinic traditions maintain that Isaac, as a sacrificial victim, shed blood, and others conclude that he also died and was resurrected; thus wrote the twelfth-century rabbi Ephraim of Bonn, in the context of the martyrdom of many Rhineland Jews and the destruction of their communities.

The New Testament refers to the Aqedah not as an example of a redemptive sacrificial death but rather as an example of faith (James 2.21; Heb. 11.17–19; possibly Rom. 4.16–18). Echoes of the former may however be found in Paul's understanding of the significance of the death and *resurrection of *Jesus, and the *Septuagint of Genesis 22 may be alluded to in Romans 8.32, Mark 1.11, and Matthew 3.17. Early church fathers such as Clement and Tertullian understood Isaac's sacrifice as a prototype of the sacrifice of Jesus (see Typology). The divine testing of Abraham and the subsequent near sacrifice of his son also appear in the *Qur'ān (37.101–113). Early Muslim exegetes disagreed as to whether the son, unnamed in the Qur'ānic passage, is Isaac or Ishmael. Some of the earliest traditions declare him to be Isaac, but by the ninth or tenth century the consensus was that Ishmael, increasingly associated with Mecca and identified as the ancestor of the northern Arabs, was the voluntary sacrificial offering.

From antiquity to the present, the Aqedah has been portrayed in the arts. For example, it appears on a wall painting of the third-century CE synagogue at Dura-Europos and on a floor mosaic of the sixth-century synagogue at Beth Alpha. During the Renaissance, such sculptors and painters as Ghiberti, Donatello, Titian, Caravaggio, and Rembrandt included the Aqedah among their depictions of biblical subjects. Among notable modern literary treatments of the Aqedah is Søren Kierkegaard's Fear and Trembling (1843).

BARBARA GELLER NATHANSON

Arabia. Arabia is a large, predominately arid peninsula bounded on the east by Mesopotamia and the Persian Gulf, on the north by the Mediterranean coastal highlands of Syria and Palestine, and on the west and south by the *Red Sea and Indian Ocean (Maps 1, 2: G–K 4–6). Northwest Arabia is mountainous, stony desert. Like the neighboring *Negeb, it is desolate but habitable for sheep/goat *nomads. The sandy deserts of interior Arabia remained impenetrable until domestication of the camel allowed its scattered oases to be linked by means of caravan routes in the first millennium BCE. Southern Arabia (Yemen) is, by contrast, a well-watered highland where terraced agriculture has supported permanent settlement from at least the second millennium BCE.

The Bible reflects close familiarity with the desert places and nomadic peoples of northwestern Arabia, and southern Arabia (*Sheba, 1 Kings 10.1; Job 6.19; or Seba, Gen. 10.7; Ps. 72.10; Isa. 43.3) was also known as a source of camels, gold, *frankincense, and *myrrh. Some places, like Dumah (Josh. 15.52; Isa. 21.11; modern Jawf) and Tema (Gen. 25.15; Job 6.19; Isa. 21.14; Jer. 25.23; modern Tayma), can be identified with sites in northern Arabia; however, recent attempts to relocate the ancestral narratives wholesale from Palestine to northern Arabia must be rejected. The Hebrew word ʿărābâ means "desert," but in one form it also means "nomad" (Isa. 13.20; Jer. 3.2). The phrase "all the kings of Arabia" (1 Kings 10.15; 2 Chron. 9.14; Jer. 25.24) can mean "all the kings of the Arabs" or "all the kings of the nomads." Few of the numerous nomadic peoples mentioned in the Bible are called "Arabs," and only rarely is their territory called "Arabia." Rather, they are identified by their geographic or ethnic origin: *Amalekites (1 Sam. 15.6–8; 30.1; Judg. 6.5; 7.12), Ishmaelites (Gen. 37.25), *Midianites (Judg. 6.5; 7.12).

In the New Testament, "Arabians" (denoting probably Arabic speakers) were among the polyglot crowd gathered in Jerusalem at *Pentecost (Acts 2.5–11). For a time after his call, *Paul "went away into Arabia," perhaps to eastern Syria or Transjordan (Gal. 1.17). JOSEPH A. GREENE

Aram. Aram is a name of both places and persons. As a place name it refers usually to Aram-Damascus (Map 1:Z2), a powerful Aramean state in southern Syria during the early first millennium BCE (see Damascus). Aram also designates other contemporary Aramean states along the northern border of Israel, including Aram-zobah northeast of the Anti-lebanon mountains (2 Sam. 8.3; Ps. 60.0) and Aram-maachah in the upper Jordan valley (1 Chron. 19.6). Some English translations follow the *Septuagint and put "Syria" or "Syrian" where the Hebrew text has "Aram" (place) or "Arami" (person of Aram, an Aramean). The Greek words, however, are not precise equivalents of the Hebrew (see Syria).

As a personal name, Aram is one of the five sons of Shem and the eponymous ancestor of the Arameans (Gen. 10.22–23). Genesis 22.20–21 identifies another Aram as son of Kemuel and grandson of Nahor, brother of the patriarch *Abraham. Abraham's son *Isaac married a granddaughter of Nahor who was sister to Laban "the Aramean" (Gen. 25.20). Abraham's grandson *Jacob wed *Rachel and *Leah, both daughters of this same Laban (Gen. 28–31). These and other accounts in Genesis that associate the *ancestors of Israel with people and places in the upper *Euphrates region (Aram-naharaim, translated "*Mesopotamia," Gen. 24.10; or Paddan-aram, Gen. 28.2) suggest a close relationship between the Israelite ancestors and the Arameans (Deut. 26.5).

Outside the Bible, Aram is mentioned in a cuneiform inscription of Naram-Sin of Akkad (ca. 2300 BCE) as a place along the upper Euphrates. Cuneiform texts from Drehem in southern Mesopotamia also name Aram as a city in the upper Euphrates region ca. 2000 BCE. Annals of the Assyrian king Tiglath-pileser I speak of punitive campaigns in his fourth year of reign (1112 BCE) against nomadic Ahlamu-Arameans who reached as far west as Tadmor (Palmyra in Syria) and the Lebanon mountains.

In the reign of *David (tenth century BCE), Aram-zobah ruled southern Syria but was eventually defeated by the Israelite king (2 Sam. 8.3–12). Aram-Damascus assumed control of southern Syria during the reign of *Solomon (1 Kings 11.23–25) and was a recurrent opponent of Israel throughout ninth–eighth centuries BCE, although it was also sometimes Israel's ally against the *Assyrians (1 Kings 22.1). Aram-Damascus and the other Aramean cities of Syria were ultimately destroyed by the Assyrians in the late eighth century BCE (Amos 1.3–5; Isa. 17.1–3; Jer. 49.23–27).

In both biblical and extrabiblical sources, Aram denotes lands occupied by speakers of *Aramaic, a Northwest Semitic language related to Hebrew and Phoenician that was widely spoken in Syria in the first millennium BCE. Aramaic language and script survived the destruction of the Aramean states in Syria. Aramaic became the lingua franca of Persian empire, and dialects of Aramaic continued to be widely spoken in Palestine and Syria into the Roman period (see Mark 5.41). JOSEPH A. GREENE

Aramaic. A Northwest Semitic language related to *Hebrew. It was usually written in the twenty-two letters of the Phoenician alphabet, although originally some letters had to represent more than one Aramaic consonant. The shapes of the letters used for Aramaic developed into the square script, which was adopted for Hebrew too in the Persian period. Aramaic differs from Hebrew in various ways. For example: the vocabulary is different, although some words are similar (e.g., Hebrew šālôm, "peace," but Aramaic šĕlām); Hebrew uses the prefix ha- as the definite article, but Aramaic uses the suffix -ā; some consonants in Hebrew correspond to different ones in Aramaic (e.g., Hebrew hā'āreṣ, "the land" or "earth," but Aramaic 'arqā', later 'ar'ā').

A number of Old Aramaic inscriptions are known from the tenth or ninth century BCE onward from Syria and Mesopotamia, and in the latter region it replaced Akkadian (Babylonian and Assyrian) as the language of everyday speech.

According to Deuteronomy 26.5, the Israelites were of Aramean descent, but the Bible nowhere represents Aramaic as their language, and Genesis 31.47–48 tells how *Jacob called a pillar Galeed ("heap of witness"), whereas his Aramean father-in-law Laban used the Aramaic equivalent, Jegar-sahadutha. In 2 Kings 18.26 (= Isa. 36.11) officials of Judah plead with an Assyrian official during the siege of Jerusalem in 701 BCE not to speak "in the language of Judah" (i.e., Hebrew) in the hearing of the ordinary people of the city, but to use Aramaic. Aramaic had thus become the language of diplomacy (one understood by Judean leaders), while ordinary people understood only Hebrew; and the Assyrian wanted such ordinary people to understand his call to surrender.

From the sixth century BCE Aramaic continued to spread as the vernacular in the Palestinian region. Jeremiah 10.11 is in Aramaic, as is Ezra 4.8–6.18; 7.12–26. The Aramaic passages in Ezra are primarily official documents, and they reflect the fact that the *Persian empire recognized the position of Aramaic by making one form of it an official language—the so-called Imperial or Official Aramaic. A Jewish colony at Elephantine (Yeb) in Upper Egypt (Map 7:F6) has left many Aramaic papyri from the fifth century BCE (including letters about the rebuilding of a Jewish temple there and about the *Passover); other documents in Aramaic from Egypt, Palestine, and other Near Eastern countries of this century and succeeding centuries have been found. Daniel 2.4b–7.28 is in Aramaic, and the book is usually dated around 164 BCE, though the author probably used earlier sources. Some scholars postulate a connection between the story of *Nebuchadnezzar's madness in Daniel 4 and the Prayer of Nabonidus, an Aramaic text from *Qumran which tells how Nabonidus, the last king of Babylon, was ill in Tema in North Arabia and was healed by the intercession of a Jew. Among other Aramaic texts from Qumran are the Genesis Apocryphon (the story of Abraham, in general dependence on Genesis), parts of 1 Enoch, and a Targum (a free translation) of Job, which differs from the Targum of later times (see Translations, article on Targums).

By the first century CE, Aramaic was in general use in Palestine, especially in Galilee, although Hebrew was also spoken as a vernacular, especially in Judea (see Hebrew). In the New Testament we find bar, the Aramaic word for "son," instead of Hebrew ben, in several personal names (e.g., *Barabbas, *Bartholomew, Bartimaeus) and in the patronymic of *Simon Peter, Bar-Jona (Matt. 16:17 [RSV]), and Aramaic words are used even in Jerusalem: *Golgotha (Mark 14.72, etc.), Gabbatha (John 19.13: "in Hebrew" probably means "in the language of the Hebrews" and can thus denote Aramaic), and Akeldama (Acts 1.19). Some of the words of Jesus are Aramaic: "Talitha cum" (Mark 5.41), and "*Eloi, Eloi, lema sabachthani" (Mark 15.34; cf. Matt. 27.46, but there is a variant reading in Hebrew); but "Ephphatha" (Mark 7.34) and "*Abba" (Mark 14.36; cf. Rom. 8.15) can be explained as either Hebrew or Aramaic. The statement in Matthew 26.73 that Peter's speech showed him to be a Galilean has been illustrated by rabbinic references to the inability of Galileans to pronounce guttural consonants correctly. As a Galilean, Jesus spoke Aramaic, and on the cross he quoted Psalm 22.1 in Aramaic, not in the Hebrew original, but he probably also spoke Hebrew. When Rabban Gamaliel wrote to Jews in Galilee—probably in the late first century CE—he wrote in Aramaic, according to the Babylonian Talmud (Sanh. 11b).

Many Aramaic documents from the early centuries CE have been preserved. The *Nabatean Arabs, who lived to the east and south of Palestine, used an Aramaic dialect, as did the inhabitants of Palmyra in the Syrian desert. Some letters and other documents from the Second Jewish Revolt against the Romans in 132–35 CE are written in Aramaic, some in Hebrew, and some in *Greek. They include letters from the leader of the revolt, who has usually been known as Bar Kokhba ("the son of the star" in Aramaic; cf. Num. 24.17), but whose real name was Bar or Ben Kosiba. Texts of the following centuries show differences between western and eastern dialects of Aramaic. The distinction appears, for example, in the Targums: the Jerusalem or Palestinian Targums (on the Pentateuch) are in western Aramaic, whereas the Targums of Onkelos (the Pentateuch) and Jonathan (the Former and Latter Prophets) reached their final form in the east, though they were probably originally composed in Palestine. Western dialects include Jewish Palestinian Aramaic (e.g., the Jerusalem Talmud) and Samaritan and Christian Palestinian Aramaic; and eastern dialects include Babylonian Aramaic (e.g., the Babylonian Talmud), Syriac, and Mandaic (the language used of the texts of the gnostic Mandean sect).

Syriac reached its present form ca. 200 CE. Although there are earlier, non-Christian inscriptions, most of the Syriac literature is Christian, because it became the standard language of many eastern churches. They carried its use as far as South India and even China.

Aramaic was eventually replaced by Arabic in the Near East as a result of the spread of Islam. A western form survives in a few Syrian villages, and there is still a vernacular form of Syriac.

Ararat. A mountainous country surrounding Lake Van in Armenia (Map 6:H3). It is commonly referred to as Urartu in *Assyrian texts, in which it first appears as a conglomeration of kingdoms in the thirteenth century BCE. A unified kingdom reached its zenith in the late ninth century under the dynasty founded by Sarduri I; its decline began when Sarduri II was defeated by *Tiglath-pileser III in 743 BCE. The end came in the early sixth century, when Urartu was conquered by the *Medes. In the Bible Ararat can be an enemy of Assyria (2 Kings 19.37; Isa. 37.38) or Babylon (Jer. 51.27). It is best known, however, as the region ("the mountains of Ararat," not "Mount Ararat"; Gen. 8.4) in which *Noah's *ark came to rest after the *Flood. In spite of later Jewish, Christian, and Muslim traditions that sought to identify the mountain on which Noah landed, all attempts to do so have ended in failure.

Archaeology and the Bible.

History of Archaeology. Archaeology is the study of the remains of ancient civilizations uncovered through excavations. It is a relatively young discipline, for the first excavations in Mesopotamia were those of Paul Emile Botta at *Nineveh in 1842 and Austin Henry Layard at Nimrud in 1845, while the first in the Aegean area were conducted by Heinrich Schliemann at Troy in 1870 and at Mycenae in 1876.

Egyptian antiquities had been brought to the attention of Europe by Napoleon's invasion in 1798. Most of the activities in Egypt in the nineteenth century, such as those by Giovanni Belzoni, were treasure hunts and not excavations. At the end of the nineteenth century, William Matthew Flinders Petrie introduced some semblance of order.

It was Petrie who was the first to excavate in Palestine at Tell el-Hesi in 1890. From his prior experiences in Egypt, Petrie recognized the value of pottery for dating the strata. The first American excavations in Palestine were at *Samaria in 1908–1910 by George A. Reisner and Clarence S. Fisher, who introduced systematic methods of recording discoveries.

William Foxwell Albright, the dean of American archaeologists in the first half of the twentieth century, established a sound basis for pottery chronology in his excavations at Tell Beit Mirsim in 1926–1932. Nelson Glueck, Albright's student, conducted extensive surface surveys in Transjordan from 1933, and in Israel's Negeb from 1952.

At excavations at *Samaria (1931–1935) and at *Jericho (1952–1958), Kathleen Kenyon introduced more precise methods of analyzing soils and debris. She later excavated in *Jerusalem (1961–1967). Significant work has also been carried on by many French and German scholars.

Since 1948, Israeli scholars have assumed leading roles in the exploration of their homeland. Yigael Yadin conducted large-scale excavations at *Hazor (1956–1958) and at Masada (1963–1965). At the latter site, Yadin initiated the practice of using volunteers rather than paid workers. After 1968, Benjamin Mazar, Nahman Avigad, and Yigal Shiloh directed major excavations in *Jerusalem.

G. Ernest Wright, in his excavations at *Shechem (1956–1964), and William G. Dever, in his work at Gezer (1964–1971), trained scores of young American excavators. It was in the 1966 season at Shechem that a geologist was first added to the staff. Since 1970, Palestinian archaeologists, influenced by New World archaeology, have also enlisted the help of architects, photographers, and pottery restorers, numerous scientific specialists such as osteologists, paleobotanists, and paleozoologists to reconstruct ancient ecologies and societies. Specialized laboratories are used for such processes as carbon-14 dating and neutron activation of pottery to determine its place of origin.

Ironically, often the most spectacular discoveries have been made by chance rather than by scientific deduction. At Ras Shamra in Syria a peasant's plow struck a tomb, which led to the discovery of ancient *Ugarit. Bedouin in search of a lost goat discovered the cave at *Qumran which contained the *Dead Sea Scrolls. Peasants seeking fertilizer in Egypt discovered the *Amarna tablets in 1887 and the Coptic Gnostic codices at *Nag Hammadi in 1945.

Archeological Methods. The first important attempt to identify sites in Palestine with biblical cities was made by Edward Robinson and Eli Smith in 1838 on the basis of modern Arabic place names. In a few cases, inscriptions have confirmed the identity of ancient sites, as at Gibeon, *Gezer, Arad, *Lachish, *Dan, and Abila. In some cases, proposed identifications are in dispute, such as Albright's identification of Tell Beit Mirsim as Debir and Glueck's identification of Tell el-Kheleifeh as Ezion-geber. According to Yohanan Aharoni, out of the approximately 475 place names mentioned in the Bible only slightly more than half have been identified with any degree of certainty.

Recent surveys indicate how many new sites of ancient settlements may be discovered by systematic searches. Israeli surveys in 1965 in the Haifa area and the Negeb uncovered two hundred previously unknown sites. Benno Rothenberg discovered two hundred new sites in the Negeb and Arabah and a hundred in the Sinai in 1966–68. Surveys of the Golan Heights and the West Bank since 1968 have plotted hundreds of other new sites.

Most ancient Near Eastern cities have left their remains behind in stratified mounds called "tells" ("tell" is the transliteration of the Arabic, while the spelling "tel" is from Hebrew; cf. Josh. 11.13). These trapezoidal mounds are to be found in the Near East because settled urban populations have existed there for millennia, with generation after generation rebuilding upon earlier rubble; the debris was kept in a compact shape by the city wall. The height of a tell can be considerable. In Mesopotamia the tells range from 17 m (56 ft) at Kish up to 43 m (140 ft) at Tell Brak. In Palestine, the depth of debris at Jericho is about 18 m (60 ft), and at Beth-shan and *Megiddo about 21 m (70 ft).

The excavator's first step is to secure permission from the country's Department of Antiquities. The next step, if the land is privately owned, is either to purchase the area to be excavated, as at Megiddo and Dothan, or more usually to rent it with the understanding that the land will be restored to its former condition after the termination of the excavations. Not only must rent be paid for the use of the land but compensation must be given for the crops destroyed. The cost of excavating areas occupied with houses is prohibitive. Only where generous funding is available, such as for the excavations of the Athenian Agora, is this possible.

The cost of financing excavations has varied greatly. At one extreme was the luxury of the University of Chicago's expedition after World War I at Megiddo with its budget of sixteen million dollars. At the other extreme was the fabled austerity of Petrie's camp in Egypt, where a little more than a dollar per week was spent for provisions. Kenyon's excavations at Jericho cost about twelve thousand dollars per year, and her later work at Jerusalem about thirty thousand dollars per year. On average, the cost of a season's expedition now runs well over one hundred thousand dollars.

In the nineteenth century, individual subscribers in Britain supported the Palestine Exploration Fund and the Egypt Exploration Fund, which sponsored surveys, excavations, and publications. Wealthy patrons such as John D. Rockefeller, Charles Marston, Jacob Schiff, and Leon Levy have helped pay for excavations respectively at Megiddo, Lachish, Samaria, and Ashkelon.

Recent excavations have depended upon consortia of schools and other organizations. Funds for Kenyon's work at Jericho came from forty-three universities, societies, and museums. Along with securing the necessary funds the director must assemble a staff of trained supervisors and a work crew of laborers.

The site to be excavated is surveyed, both horizontally, in a grid marked with pegs, and vertically, in elevations from a benchmark. The supervisor then determines which fields should be excavated, for example, over the probable sites of the gate, the wall, the chief residences. In some recent cases, the use of a magnetometer or aerial/satellite photography has facilitated the location of such structures. Each field is then subdivided, often into a series of six-meter (ca. 20 ft) squares. Each of the square areas will be worked by an area supervisor and six or eight workers or volunteers.

The digging season varies from two weeks to six months. Most expeditions take place in the summer for the sake of participating professors and students. The exception would be work at sites such as Jericho or Susa, which are unbearably hot in the summer.

The average workday is a strenuous one, beginning long before sunrise to avoid having to work in the hot afternoon. Workers often rise before five A.M., dig for three hours, have breakfast, and then work for another three hours before lunch. After lunch, pottery is washed and sorted. The director and his staff will often work late into the night, recording their finds.

The object of the excavator is to dig stratigraphically, that is, to remove the debris and associated objects layer by layer. Bulldozers have sometimes been used to remove modern remains or ancient fill. But even those who are interested chiefly in earlier levels are obliged to record carefully later occupations, such as those of Byzantine and Islamic periods.

Since successive strata were not deposited at a uniformly level rate over a flat surface, absolute heights are not chronologically meaningful. Added complications arise from intrusions such as pits. The archaeologist often finds "robber trenches," where stones have been removed for reuse.

Picks are used to break up the soil, and large oversized hoes to scoop up the dirt into baskets. For finer work a small pick is used together with a trowel and a brush. Also essential are metersticks, levels, strings, tags, and labels for measuring and recording; computers are being used more and more in the field for registering excavated materials, as well as in preparing them for publication after the digging has come to an end. When a special object is found, its exact location and level are recorded. Ordinary sherds are placed in carefully labeled buckets for washing and later examination.

It is often worth sieving the soil to retrieve small objects such as coins. Most bronze coins appear as tiny spots of green in the soil. During the first three years of the Mazar excavation at Jerusalem ten thousand coins were found.

The earlier Fisher-Reisner methods had included the careful recording of objects and of building levels. But between levels their diagrams often showed empty spaces where attribution to a stratum was made according to the absolute height of the deposits. Kenyon introduced improved methods, which involved the careful cutting of balks (unexcavated strips between squares) and the minute analysis of the different types of soils that appeared in the vertical sections created by the balks. Her methods are best suited to small areas where sizable architecture is not present, although attention to stratigraphy is essential in any context.

One of the important problems facing the excavator is the location of the dump for depositing the earth that has been dug up. Care must be taken that nothing of value is thrown away. From the Chicago dump at Megiddo, for example, Israeli shepherds recovered an invaluable fragment of the Babylonian *Gilgamesh Epic.

Special difficulty attends the excavations of sites where buildings are made of stones, which are almost invariably reused. On the other hand, the detection of mud brick walls is also difficult. Tombs present special problems: they have often been reused and may be tightly packed with skeletons and objects that must be removed with special care. Tombs often reward the excavator with whole vessels and even jewelry. Caves are often packed deep with noxious bat droppings.

It is highly desirable that the areas excavated should, if possible, be tested to bedrock or to virgin soil. When, however, the water table is reached, the entire trench turns quickly into a quagmire. This is why Robert Koldewey in his work at *Babylon could explore only the later Neo-Babylonian level of *Nebuchadrezzar and not the Old Babylonian level of *Hammurapi.

The development of underwater archaeology was made possible by the invention in 1942 by Jacques-Yves Cousteau and Emile Gagnan of the aqualung and depth-compensating regulator. The advent of scuba (Self-Contained Underwater Breathing Apparatus) diving made the process much cheaper and simpler. Underwater explorations have clarified the Herodian seaport of Caesarea, and other coastal sites and harbors throughout the Mediterranean.

Archaeological Finds. The most common objects to be found are sherds of broken pottery in enormous quantities. James Pritchard estimated that four seasons at Gibeon produced in excess of two hundred thousand sherds. All the pieces of pottery are washed and sorted, but often only a fraction are saved and recorded. Of almost one hundred fifty thousand sherds washed in the first season at Dothan, Joseph Free recorded six thousand pieces.

A tiny fraction of sherds may have inscriptions on them. Over fifty thousand pieces were washed at Gibeon before an inscribed ostracon appeared. Important inscriptions have been preserved on ostraca from Samaria, Arad, and Lachish.

An ivory from Megiddo depicts nude captives being brought before a king seated on a throne. Hundreds of decorated ivory fragments have been found, fittingly enough, at Samaria in view of the reference to Ahab's "ivory house" (1 Kings 22.39). These illustrate the "beds of ivory" denounced by Amos (6.4). Carved ivories from Arslan Tash and elsewhere depict an alluring goddess or woman peering out of a window (cf. 2 Kings 9.30).

From the Assyrian siege at Lachish in 701 BCE excavators found an extraordinary assemblage of fifteen hundred to two thousand skeletons over which animal bones, mostly of pigs, had been scattered. Human skeletons can provide medical information. Three skulls from Lachish had been trephined, that is, holes had been cut into their skulls, perhaps to drain fluids resulting from trauma or disease. Evidence of gold, silver, and even bronze implants have been found in teeth from Egypt, Phoenicia, and Palestine. Measurements of skeletons found in tombs of the Herodian period indicate that the average person of that day was quite short, about 1.6 m (5 ft 3 in) tall.

Highly perishable objects, such as textiles, have been found but rarely in Palestine, and only in the dry Dead Sea region. For example, wooden boxes, coils of flax, basketry, and the oldest preserved toga were found in the caves occupied during the Second Jewish Revolt (ca. 135 CE). Even the tresses of a woman were preserved at Masada.

The many figurines found are generally interpreted as cultic, especially the nude female figurines. Representations of riders and horses found at Jerusalem may have been related to a solar cult; animal figurines from Beth-shan may have emanated from the cult of Nergal/Mekal/Seth.

Many small seals bear not only important inscriptions but also fine artistic representations. The seal of Shema found at Megiddo has a magnificent engraving of a roaring lion, the seal of Jaazaniah from Tell en-Nasbeh depicts a fighting cock, and a seal from Arad bears the outline plan of the citadel.

Metal objects vary greatly in their state of preservation. Gold objects are the best preserved; silver is usually covered with black tarnish, and bronze with a greenish patina. Iron rusts badly—often to a residue of reddish powder. Among the most significant objects in silver ever found are two amulets (ca. 600 BCE) inscribed with the priestly benediction of Numbers 6.24–26—the oldest biblical text discovered to date.

Among the most valuable metal objects are coins, usually made of silver, copper, or bronze. Coinage, which was invented in the seventh century BCE, was introduced into the Levant by the sixth century and was being minted locally by the fifth. Discoveries of coins in Palestine from the Persian period indicate that references to coins in Ezra 2.69; 8.27 and Nehemiah 7.70–72, whether they are interpreted as Persian darics or Greek drachmas, are not anachronistic. The earliest Greek coins (sixth century BCE) found in Palestine include one from Thasos found at Shechem, one from Athens, and another from Cos found at Jerusalem. (See also Money.)

has had on our understanding of biblical history and times, one must recall that pervasive skepticism about ancient traditions prevailed among biblical scholars in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Working only with the literary sources, Julius Wellhausen and Ferdinand C. Baur respectively discounted the historical validity of the *Pentateuch and *Acts (see Interpretation, History of, article on Modern Biblical Criticism). Archaeological discoveries subsequently convinced scholars such as William Foxwell Albright and William M. Ramsay of the presence of sound traditions preserved in those biblical texts.

In some cases, the lack of expected archaeological data still poses problems. Often, however, excavations illuminate the background of the biblical narratives, and occasionally dramatically confirm them. But archaeology cannot "prove" the Bible: archaeological materials are for the most part rubble whose survival, discovery, and publication is fragmentary. Without inscriptional finds, the evidence is mute and requires interpretation. Furthermore, the biblical perspective is essentially religious. Archaeology may uncover the splendid structures built by *Solomon, *Ahab, or *Herod, but will not help us understand why the Bible condemns those monarchs. Archaeology may give us a better understanding of the *crucifixion and the tomb of Jesus Christ, but can say nothing of his *resurrection.

Chronological terms. Beginning with the fourth millennium BCE, the following is the usual division of eras for the Levant: Early Bronze Age (EB) = ca. 3200–2000 BCE; Middle Bronze Age (MB) = ca. 2000–1550 BCE; Late Bronze Age (LB) = ca. 1550–1225 BCE; Iron Age = ca. 1225–539 BCE; Persian Period = 539–332 BCE; Hellenistic Period = 332–363 BCE; Roman Period = 63 BCE – 324 CE.

Primeval history. Mesopotamian literature provides some parallels to the biblical stories of the *creation and the *Flood. Genesis, however, differs from the polytheistic cosmology of Enuma Elish, the "Babylonian creation epic" (ca. 1100 BCE), which describes how Marduk, the god of *Babylon, created the heavens and the earth from the carcass of Tiamat, the goddess of the deep.

The publication by George A. Smith in 1872 of the Babylonian flood story from the *Gilgamesh Epic created something of a sensation because of its parallels with the biblical Flood story (Gen. 6–9). In 1965, W. G. Lambert and Alan Millard published another epic, Atrahasis, which contains both a creation and a flood account. The Babylonian gods sent the flood because they could not sleep due to the noisy tumult of human beings.

Leonard Woolley believed that he had found evidence of the flood in a three m (ten ft) waterborne layer of sediment at *Ur dated to roughly 4000 BCE. But this does not correlate with other flood deposits, such as those at Fara and Kish, dated to about 2700 BCE, and flooding in the Mesopotamian river basin was a frequent occurrence. Thus, while there is general support for a background of catastrophic flooding, there is no certain correlation of a sediment layer with the biblical Flood.

Ancestral age. Although Julius Wellhausen and many later scholars have questioned the historicity of the narratives of the *ancestors of Israel as found in Genesis 12–50, evidence from Mesopotamia and Syria tends to support the antiquity and authenticity of many of the biblical traditions.

Woolley's excavations revealed the advanced civilization of *Ur in the third millennium BCE. Ur-nammu, a king at the end of the third millennium, promulgated the earliest known law code. Ur and Haran, where *Abraham and Terah are said to have sojourned, were both centers of the worship of Sin, the moon god.

The MB royal palace at *Mari on the Euphrates has yielded an archive of twenty-five thousand tablets, which provide evidence that names in Abraham's *genealogy were current in the area in the early second millennium CE. The Mari texts illustrate the system of power alliances prior to the rise of *Hammurapi, similar to the alliance related in Genesis 14.

Texts from Alalakh (eighteenth century BCE) and *Nuzi (fifteenth century BCE) have been cited to illuminate the social customs of the ancestors. *Sarah's provision of her handmaid to Abraham (Gen. 16) to procure a son was an accepted custom, also attested in the Code of Hammurapi.

Many scholars date Abraham and Isaac to the MB I period (also called EB IV and Intermediate EB/MB). A number of nonwalled villages and hundreds of smaller settlements from this period in the Negeb may illustrate the kind of seminomadic sites implied in Genesis.

The story of *Joseph (Gen. 37–50), which contains what may be called "Egyptianisms," can be set in the Hyksos period (seventeenth century BCE) or earlier. A papyrus in the Brooklyn Museum dated to the eighteenth century BCE contains a list of Semites sold as slaves to Egypt; a Ugaritic text tells of a man who was sold by his companions to some passing Egyptians (Gen. 37.25–28). Many scholars, however, date to the first millennium the Joseph narrative because of its attestation of the personal names. But one should note the loss of papyri from the Delta region, which may have contained earlier evidence.

The Exodus. The sojourn of the Israelites in Egypt is not recorded in Egyptian documents. The sole reference to Israel comes from the stele of Merneptah (late thirteenth century BCE), which refers to them in the land of *Canaan. The storehouse of Ramesses (Exod. 1.11) has been identified with Qantir (Map 2:Q2).

Canaanite parallels have led many scholars to argue for the antiquity of the Song of the Sea (Exod. 15). Literary comparisons between the Mosaic *covenant and second-millennium treaties, especially those of the *Hittites, support arguments for its antiquity.

Two dates for the *Exodus have been proposed: an early date of about 1440 BCE, and a late date of about 1270. No definitive archaeological evidence confirms the traditional southern route through the Sinai peninsula or the location of Mount *Sinai.

The Israelites passed from the Sinai through the Transjordanian kingdoms of *Edom and of *Moab. A glistening bronze snake found at Timnah illustrates the episode recorded in Numbers 21.9. The account concerning the prophet *Balaam, called by the king of Moab to curse the Israelites (Num. 22–24), is remarkably paralleled by an Aramaic inscription from Deir ʿAlla in Transjordan, dating from the late eighth century BCE.

One of the arguments for the late date of the Exodus was Nelson Glueck's conclusion from his surveys of Transjordan that there were no settled populations in Edom and Moab in the Middle and Late Bronze Ages. More recently, evidence of settlement in these periods has been found.

The conquest. Palestine before its conquest by the Israelites was occupied by the Canaanites, whose culture has been illuminated by texts from the Syrian coastal site of *Ugarit, destroyed around 1200 BCE. Ugaritic literary texts feature such Canaanite deities as *Baal, El, and *Astarte. Canaanite temples have been uncovered at many sites, including several at *Hazor, the greatest city in ancient Palestine.

The date of the *conquest of Canaan hinges on the date of the Exodus. The fourteenth-century BCE *Amarna letters discovered in Egypt include correspondence from Palestinian kings, asking for Egyptian aid against the Habiru. Although it is not possible to equate the *Hebrews with the Habiru, the former may have been a part of the larger movement of the Habiru.

Archaeological evidence for the conquest is problematic. Evidence for LB settlements at *Jericho, Gibeon, and Ai are nonexistent, scanty, eroded, or not yet discovered. The destruction in the thirteenth and twelfth centuries of strong Canaanite cities such as Hazor, Bethel, and Tell Beit Mirsim has been attributed to the Israelites. Some of the destructions of western cities at this time may have been caused by the Egyptians or invading *Philistines. The evidence of early Iron Age newcomers in Upper Galilee and in the Negeb may indicate a peaceful infiltration of Israelites in those areas. Since *Shechem shows no evidence of destruction in this period, it may have passed peacefully into Israelite hands (see Josh. 24).

The judges. The archaeological record of random destructions correlates with the picture of political chaos that prevailed in the era of the judges. The miraculous victory over Canaanite chariots celebrated in the archaic Song of *Deborah (Judg. 5) may be the explanation of the destructions around 1125 BCE of the sites of Taanach and Tel Qedesh in the Jezreel Valley. A twelfth-century ostracon with an abecedary from Izbet Sartah demonstrates the literacy of the day (cf. Judg. 8.14). The late twelfth-century destruction at Shechem may come from the violent episode of Abimelech (Judg. 9). Micah's household shrine (Judg. 17.5) may be compared to a shrine found at Tel Qiri. The destruction of the Canaanite city of Laish (Dan) may be attributed to the migration of the tribe of Dan (Judg. 18.29).

Much of Judges and 1 Samuel are occupied with the conflict between the coastal *Philistines and the Israelites over the Shephelah territory between them. The plan of the Philistine temple that Samson overthrew (Judg. 16.29) has been illuminated by the discovery of such a temple with two column bases at Tell el-Qasile. Philistine pottery from Ashdod and elsewhere, which resembles Mycenean prototypes, betrays their Aegean origins (Amos 9.7).

The united monarchy. The twelve Israelite *tribes were united briefly under three kings, *Saul, *David, and *Solomon. Saul won renown by his triumphs over the Philistines, who had dominated the Israelites by their monopoly of metallurgical technology (1 Sam. 13.19–22). An iron plow point was discovered in the excavations of Saul's fortress at Gibeah.

David succeeded in capturing the *Jebusite city of *Jerusalem. Kenyon's excavations at the base of Ophel, the city of David, uncovered a corner of the wall of the Jebusite city. A sloping, stepped structure on Ophel has been attributed to David by Shiloh. The "filling" (Hebr. millô') built both by David (2 Sam. 5.9) and by Solomon (1 Kings 9.15) was identified by Kenyon as the series of terraces on the slope of Ophel.

Earlier scholars had doubted the attribution of many of the *Psalms to David, and had dated many to a late period of Israel's history. Striking word parallels to *Ugaritic poetry now indicate that many of the Psalms may indeed date to a period as early as David's era. Ugarit has also produced the oldest musical annotation.

Solomon's celebration (1 Kings 8.65) may be compared with the feast that Ashurnasirpal II gave at Nimrud for 69,574 guests! Though Solomon built a splendid *Temple and palace in Jerusalem, no remains of these have been found. Solomonic palaces have been uncovered at *Megiddo. With brilliant insight, Yadin proved that identical triple gates were built by Solomon at Hazor, Megiddo, and *Gezer (1 Kings 9.15–17). A sanctuary at Arad was dated by its excavator Aharoni to the Solomonic period.

Solomon's trading and fame were on an international scale. An ostracon from Tell Qasile speaks of "the gold of Ophir" (1 Kings 10.11), imported by Solomon. A ninth-century South Arabian stamp seal found at Bethel may be evidence of the trade established by the queen of *Sheba. Solomon's prestige is highlighted by his marriage to the daughter of a pharaoh (1 Kings 9.16), probably Siamun.

The divided monarchy. Jeroboam I, who led the revolt against Rehoboam, Solomon's son, had taken refuge in Egypt under Shishak. In the fifth year after Solomon's death, Shishak invaded Palestine, as the Bible (1 Kings 14.25–26) and his own inscriptions at Karnak attest. A stele of Shishak has been found at Megiddo.

The polytheism that characterized popular religion in both Israel and Judah has been amply attested. A startling example from the eighth century BCE is a painting with an inscription of "Yahweh and his Asherah" found at Kuntillet ʿAjrud near Kadesh-barnea. Images of riders on horses found at Jerusalem may have belonged to a cult of the sun.

Jeroboam's northern city of Dan has yielded impressive structures, including a monumental gate with benches, a pedestal for a throne, and a *high place. Excavators found at *Samaria magnificent buildings of *Ahab and his Phoenician wife *Jezebel, including Proto-Aeolic columns and ivory fragments.

From Ahab's reign come also the elaborate underground water system at Hazor and the "stables" at Megiddo. Ahab's military might is attested outside the Bible by texts of the Assyrian king Shalmaneser III, which credit Ahab with two thousand chariots and ten thousand infantry at the battle of Qarqar (853). One of the rare monumental inscriptions from the area is the *Moabite Stone of Ahab's enemy, King Mesha (cf. 2 Kings 3.27).

The famous Black Obelisk depicts King *Jehu (843–816 BCE) of Israel prostrating himself before Shalmaneser III. A stele of Adad-nirari III lists Joash of Samaria as offering tribute to the *Assyrians. Menahem of Israel also paid tribute to *Tiglath-pileser III (2 Kings 15.19–20).

Sargon II claimed that he captured 27,290 prisoners and "their gods," when Samaria fell in 722 BCE. The exiles were taken to places like Gozan and Calah (2 Kings 17.6); ostraca from these places list Israelite names like Menahem, Elisha, and Haggai. Sargon's army later (712) invaded Judah (Isa. 20.1), as a fragment of his stele at Ashdod confirms. The Assyrian presence is evidenced by a fortress at Tell Jemmeh, and a standard found at Tell esh-Shariʿa.

The Assyrian juggernaut of *Sennacherib invaded Judah in 701 and overwhelmed city after city, including the key southern fort of *Lachish (2 Kings 18.13–17). The assault with battering rams up a ramp is illustrated in detail by reliefs from Sennacherib's palace at *Nineveh. Excavations at Lachish have uncovered the siege ramp, a counter ramp, arrowheads, the crest of a helmet, chain mail, and a chain used by the defenders against the ram.

Sennacherib, though he claims to have received tribute, does not claim the capture of Jerusalem. *Hezekiah had built the Siloam Tunnel to provide water to the city. His inscription describes how workers dug from both ends to meet in the center. Segments of the "broad wall" (Neh. 3.8), which he probably built to the west of the Temple area to enclose the "Second Quarter" (2 Kings 22.14) have been discovered. A funerary inscription from Silwan may belong to Shebna(yahu), who was rebuked by the prophet Isaiah (22.15–16) for building an ostentatious tomb.

Invasions of Judah. The early reign of *Neb-uchadrezzar, including his attack on Syria and Palestine in his first year in 605 BCE, has been greatly illuminated by the publication in 1956 of the Babylonian Chronicles. These reveal a hitherto unknown battle of 601 BCE that may have misled the Judeans to rely on help from Egypt, against the advice of Jeremiah (Jer. 37.6–10). The Chronicles also describe the Babylonian attack on Jerusalem in 597 (2 Kings 24.8–17), but the portion describing the final attack in 587/586 is missing.

The advance of the Babylonian army is dramatically announced by a *Lachish ostracon, which reports "we cannot see Azekah" (see Jer. 34.7). Evidences of the devastation wrought by the Babylonians have been found at numerous Judean sites, including Jerusalem itself.

A number of seals or seal impressions probably belong to personages from this era; these bear names of such biblical figures as *Baruch, son of Neriah, Jeremiah's scribe (Jer. 36.4); Jerahmeel, Jehoiakim's son (Jer. 36.26); Jaazaniah (Jer. 40.8); and Gedaliah (Jer. 40.8).

An ostracon from Arad implies an imminent attack from the direction of *Edom. The reason *Obadiah denounced the Edomites must stem from their taking advantage of Judah during the Babylonian attack. A poignant expression in Yahweh's faithfulness even after the destruction of Jerusalem has been found at Khirbet Beit Lei (cf. Lam. 3.22–23).

Some of the splendors of the great city of *Babylon erected by Nebuchadrezzar (Dan. 4.30), such as the Ishtar Gate, have been recovered. At Babylon tablets dated 595–570 BCE explicitly confirm the biblical account that the exiled Jewish king Jehoiachin received rations from the Babylonian court (2 Kings 25.30).

The puzzling role of Belshazzar (instead of his father Nabonidus) in the book of *Daniel has been clarified by Babylonian and Aramaic documents that reveal that Nabonidus spent ten years in self-imposed exile in Arabia.

The capture of Babylon by the *Persians in 539 BCE resulted in the liberation of the Jews by *Cyrus. The magnanimity of the Persian king (Ezra 1) to other religions is fully corroborated by such documents as the Cyrus Cylinder. The Murashu texts, which list about a hundred Jewish names from the reigns of Artaxerxes I and Darius II, document the prosperity of the Jews who chose to remain in Mesopotamia.

The events recounted in Ezra-Nehemiah have been illuminated by the Elephantine papyri from Egypt, by the Xanthos inscription from Lydia, and by tablets from Persepolis. Inscriptions or papyri can be correlated with Nehemiah's opponents (Neh. 2.19)—Geshem, Tobiah, and Sanballat. Some seventy bullae acquired in 1970 reveal the names of governors of Judah who preceded Nehemiah (Neh. 5.15). Kenyon's excavations in Jerusalem clarified the line of the wall that was rebuilt (Neh. 3) and uncovered the tumble that blocked Nehemiah's donkey (Neh. 2.14).

The Hellenistic and Roman periods. The greatest discovery is the cache of *Dead Sea Scrolls, which includes our oldest manuscripts of the Hebrew Bible. In addition, Hebrew and Aramaic originals of *apocryphal works such as *Sirach and *pseudepigraphical works such as *Enoch were found.

The extensive building projects of *Herod the Great are found everywhere in Palestine: at *Jerusalem, Sebaste, Caesarea, Masada, Machaerus, *Jericho, and Herodium. The magnificent ashlars (see Mark 13.1) are visible at the *Temple platform in Jerusalem. Excavations nearby have uncovered a 64 m (210 ft) wide stairway, a limestone object inscribed qrbn (see Mark 7.11; see Corban), and debris from Titus's capture of Jerusalem. Work in the Upper City has revealed homes of the wealthy high priests, including an inscription of Bar Kathros, the head of a priestly family accused in the *Talmud of exploitation.

The magnificent remains of the synagogue at *Capernaum (Mark 1.21) have been dated to the fourth century CE on the basis of coins. Basalt remains of an earlier synagogue are visible. The second/third-century synagogue at Chorazin contains a so-called seat of Moses (Matt. 23.2). Buildings or structures identified as rare first-century CE synagogues have been found at Gamla, Herodium, and Masada. Near the Capernaum synagogue, a first-century CE fisherman's house, later venerated as Peter's house, has been uncovered.

In Jerusalem the twin pools of Bethesda (John 5.2) and the pool of Siloam (John 9.7–11) have been identified. Some scholars have placed the site of the praetorium (John 18.28), where Jesus was tried before Pilate, north of the Temple area, where flagstones under the Sisters of Zion building have been identified as the lithostraton (John 19.13) of the Fortress Antonia. The more probable site of the trial, however, is near the Jaffa Gate, where remains of Herod's palace have been found in the citadel area. In 1961, an inscription of *Pilate was found at Caesarea.

In 1968, Israeli archaeologists discovered the first physical evidence of a victim of *crucifixion. In an ossuary, a limestone box for the redeposition of bones, were discovered a young man's calcanei or heel bones still pierced by an iron nail. His right tibia or shin bone had been fractured into slivers by a blow (cf. John 19.32). A crease in the radius indicates that the victim had been pinioned in the forearms rather than in the palms. Accordingly, the Greek word cheiras in Luke 24.39–40 and John 20.20, 25, 27, usually translated "hands," should perhaps be translated "arms."

Several rolling-stone type tombs may be seen in Jerusalem. Excavations in and around the Church of the Holy Sepulcher suggest that the site was outside the walls in Jesus' day. The Greek "Nazareth" inscription, thought by some to date from the reign of Claudius, warns against tampering with tombs (Matt. 28.13–15).

Many discoveries have illuminated the far-flung missions of *Paul. Excavations at Nea Paphos have uncovered an inscription of Sergius Paulus (Acts 13.7), the governor of Cyprus converted by Paul. A text dedicated to Zeus and Hermes near Lystra illustrates the episode of Acts 14.12. Inscriptions from Thessalonica confirm the accuracy of Luke's use of the term "politarchs" for rulers of that city (Acts 17.6).

Paul's speech at *Athens may have been addressed to the *Areopagus council (Acts 17.22), which met in the royal stoa recently uncovered in the agora. The reference in Paul's speech to the "*unknown God" (Acts 17.23) is illustrated by an inscription from Pergamon referring to "unknown gods."

The date of Paul's ministry in *Corinth (51 CE) has been fixed by the inscription of Gallio, the governor who tried him (Acts 18.12–17). An inscription of Erastus is probably that of one of the few wealthy members of the Corinthian church (Acts 19.22; Rom. 16.23). An inscription of a butcher marks the site of the "meat market" (1 Cor. 10.25). At Corinth, the average space available in typical triclinia (dining rooms) and atria not only limited the size of the house churches but could cause divisions when the wealthier Christians would be invited into the triclinium for the *love-feast, leaving the rest of the Christians outside in the atrium (1 Cor. 11.20–22).

Athletic facilities have been excavated at Isthmia, east of Corinth, the site of the Pan-Hellenic games probably observed by Paul (1 Cor. 9.24–27). A first-century harbor has been traced at Corinth's eastern harbor, Cenchreae, the home of Phoebe (Rom. 16.1).

Magnificent remains have been exposed at *Ephesus. The foundation of the temple of *Artemis, one of the seven wonders of the ancient world, was discovered after a search of six years by J. T. Wood. In front of the temple a U-shaped altar has been uncovered. Inscriptions speak about the silver images of Artemis (Acts 19.24), and the garment dedicated to the goddess. Statues of the famed goddess (Acts 19.27) have been found in thirty different places, including Caesarea. One can observe the theater that Luke gives as the scene for the assembly provoked by Paul's preaching (Acts 19.29). A fresco from a house nearby depicts scenes from Greek dramatists, including Menander, whom Paul cites (1 Cor. 15.33).

Though most New Testament cities have been excavated, there are still a number of key sites associated with Paul, such as Derbe and Colossae, which have been identified but are as yet unexcavated. EDWIN M. YAMAUCHI

Archangels. From Greek archaggeloi, "chief angels" or "angels of high rank." The plural form is not found in the Bible, but in Tobit 12.15, *Raphael describes himself as "one of the seven angels who stand ready and enter before the glory of the Lord" (cf. Rev. 8.2). Further information concerning these seven angels is found in 1 *Enoch 20, whose Greek version describes them as "archangels" and lists their names as follows: Uriel, Raphael, Raguel, *Michael, Sariel, *Gabriel, and Remiel, the last name probably corresponding to the "archangel Jeremiel" of 2 Esdras 4.36. In the New Testament there are two references to individual archangels: in 1 Thessalonians 4.16 the call of the (unnamed) archangel is to herald the Lord's return, and in Jude 9 reference is made to the archangel Michael's contending with the devil over the body of Moses. But the paucity of these scriptural references is in sharp contrast to the elaborately developed angelology of the later church fathers.

Areopagus. This term refers both to the "Hill of Ares" located northwest of the Acropolis in *Athens and to the Council that met on the hill until the fourth century CE. During the seventh century BCE, the Council probably watched over the laws of the city; in 462/461 BCE, the Areopagus lost its guardianship of the laws. According to the author of the Athenian Constitution, it retained the power to hear cases of deliberate wounding, homicide, poisoning that resulted in death, arson, and digging up or cutting down of the sacred olive trees of Athena. During the late fourth century BCE, the Council investigated allegations of treasonable offenses.

The judicial functions of the Council were extended during the Roman imperial period. In Acts 17.16–21, *Paul is reported to have been brought to the Hill of Ares by some *Epicurean and *Stoic philosophers because he was preaching about *Jesus and the *resurrection; there he delivered his speech about the altar of the *unknown god (17.22–32). The scene of Paul on the Areopagus constructed by the author of *Acts does not reflect an official judicial procedure or inquiry. Rather, the author of Acts has created an idealized scene of Athenian life, based upon stock motifs of Athenian topography, culture, and history, intended especially to recall the trial of Socrates. In this scene, Paul has been cast as a latter-day Socrates who discloses the true identity and plans of the unknown god to the listening *gentiles. GUY ROGERS Ark. The English word "ark" translates two Hebrew words that differ from each other both in form and in usage, though the *Septuagint employs one Greek word (kibōtos) for both.

Tēbâ means "box" or "chest." Apart from its use to designate the papyrus basket in which *Moses, as an infant, was left to float among the bulrushes of the Nile (Exod. 2.3, 5), this word is used in the Bible solely as the designation of the vessel that God commanded *Noah to construct of gopher wood (Gen. 6.14), a wood not mentioned elsewhere. It was to be large enough to contain one representative human family along with one pair of every species of animals (Gen. 6.18–21). Another form of the story speaks of seven pairs of clean animals, sufficient quantity for the sacrifice after the *Flood, and one pair of unclean animals (Gen. 7.2–3). These would ride out the rainstorm of the wrath of God. The description of Noah's ark (Gen. 6.14–16) is rather hard to understand. Its dimensions, roughly 140 m (450 ft) long, 22 m (75 ft) wide, and 12 m (45 ft) high, make it literally a very large "box." The ark had three decks (Gen. 6.16), and also naturally a door. An opening, about .5 m (18 in) high, apparently ran all around the ark just below the roof and gave light and air to the vessel. There are certain points of resemblance, but more of dissimilarity, between Noah's ark and Utnapishtim's gigantic boat of the *Gilgamesh flood story.

In 1 Peter 3.20–21, Noah's ark prefigures *baptism.

ʾĂrôn, apart from its use in the sense of "coffin" (Gen. 50.26) and in the sense of "chest" for receiving money offerings (2 Kings 12.9–10; 2 Chron. 24.8, 10–11), is employed as the name of the sacred box that is variously called the ark of God, the ark of the Lord, the ark of the covenant, and so on. Data concerning this ark come from different sources and periods. It was in form a rectangular box or chest, measuring about 1 by .7 by .7 m (45 by 27 by 27 in), and made of acacia or shittim wood.

As the years went by this object became evermore venerated. It symbolized the presence of the living God at one particular spot on earth; for the God who dwelled "in the high and holy place" was also present at the ark in the midst of his people. As a result, later generations embellished descriptions of it in their traditions, seeing it as overlaid with gold both within and without (Exod. 25.10–16). The ark was transportable; it could be carried on poles overlaid with gold, which passed through rings on its side. It was considered to be of such sanctity that were an unauthorized person to touch it, even accidentally, this infraction would be punishable by death (2 Sam. 6.6).

The ark seems at one time to have contained only the two tablets of the *law (1 Kings 8.9), but according to other traditions (Heb. 9.4) it contained also *Aaron's rod that budded (Num. 17.1–10) and a golden urn holding *manna (Exod. 16.32–34).

The history of the ark parallels many of the vicissitudes of Israel. It was carried by the sons of Levi on the wilderness wanderings (Deut. 31.9); borne over the Jordan by the priests (Josh. 8.1); captured by the *Philistines (1 Sam. 4); brought to *Jerusalem by *David (2 Sam 6; 1 Chron. 13.3–14; 15.1–18). After being kept in a tentlike sanctuary (see Tabernacle), it was finally installed in the holiest chamber of Solomon's *Temple.

The ark had a cover or lid. Its name (Hebr. kappōret) is actually a theological term (cf. kippēr, "to purify, atone"), so we do not know what this cover looked like (Lev. 16.2, 13–15). Martin Luther described it in his German Bible as the "mercy seat" because the Lord "sat" enthroned over it in mercy, invisibly present where the wingtips of two *cherubim met above it, guarding the divine presence. So the ark represented for Israel the localized presence of God in judgment, mercy, forgiveness, and love; and because it contained the *Ten Commandments, it was a visible reminder that their life was to be lived in obedience to the expressed will of God. Since the Ten Commandments were incised on stone so as to last for all time, Israel carried in her midst God's demands for total loyalty and obedience to himself and for social justice and love of neighbor.

The ark is thought to have been captured when Jerusalem fell in 587/586 BCE, and nothing is known of its later history. Later legend reports that Jeremiah rescued it and hid it on Mount *Nebo (2 Macc. 2.4–8; but cf. Jer. 3.16).

Armageddon. A place name found only in Revelation 16.16, where it is identified as the "Hebrew" name for the location where the kings of the earth will assemble to fight against God. Scholars generally explain Armageddon (NRSV: "Harmagedon") as a Greek transliteration of the Hebrew phrase har mĕgiddô ("the mountain of Megiddo"). The city of *Megiddo, strategically located in the western part of the Esdraelon valley at the crossroads of two trade routes (Map 1:X3), was the site of several important battles in ancient times. The reference to the "mountain" of Megiddo is, however, more problematic, corresponding to no evident geographical feature in the area. Although Armageddon appears only once in the Bible, it has become a familiar designation for the future final battle between the forces of good and evil.

Art and the Bible.

Early Art. Stories from the Bible had become the subject of a developed narrative art by the middle of the third century CE in the *synagogue discovered at Dura-Europos, where dozens of biblical scenes are depicted in frescoes; the Christian church there from the same period also has paintings representing both Old and New Testament subjects. In the sixth century, mosaics in a number of synagogues also represent biblical subjects, such as at Gerasa (modern Jerash), from the fourth or fifth century, where the procession of animals into *Noah's ark is depicted, and from the sixth century, those at Beth Alpha (the sacrifice of *Isaac), Naaran (*Daniel in the lions' den), and Gaza (*David as Orpheus). Other early illustrations of the influence of the Bible on Christian art are the mosaics in churches throughout the Near East and especially the sequence of paintings in the Roman catacombs that extend chiefly from the third to the fourth centuries CE. The purpose of these fresco paintings is not primarily to illustrate biblical material but rather to interpret them. The subjects are those that could be *typologically linked with what "fulfills" them in Christ: *Moses striking water from the rock, Noah delivered from the flood, the three men escaping from the fiery furnace, Daniel saved from the lions' den—all are juxtaposed or depicted in such a way as to indicate their anticipation of the saving, healing, releasing power of Christ as exhibited in the healing of the paralytic, the woman with the issue of blood, the Samaritan woman at the well, the miracle of the loaves, or the raising of Lazarus. No attempt is made in this painting at descriptive realism, to represent how the incident looked when it happened. Christ and the other figures are taken from contemporary art; indeed Christ is sometimes presented as a new Orpheus or Hercules, and if he appears as the good shepherd he is depicted in terms of the Hellenistic models of the day. Early Christian art is a symbolic language, and this gives it a certain indirectness; only the Christian initiate would be able to decipher in full its powerful inner meaning.

The move toward a comprehensive theological program by typological juxtapositioning of material from the Old and New Testaments is developed in the relief sculpture that began to appear on the sides of sarcophagi particularly after the Edict of Milan (313 CE). The unifying theme of these works is again salvation through Christ, and again it is treated cryptically and indirectly. On a sarcophagus in Santa Maria Antiqua in the Roman forum (third century CE) Christ appears unobtrusively as the good shepherd and as a young boy being baptized; the key to the whole work (Christianity as the new philosophy of salvation, here being pondered by a seated philosopher figure) is indicated by the extensive treatment of *Jonah, reclining like the Greek god Endymion, as a type of the saved soul. This presentation of Christian salvation does not use the *crucifixion. The same kind of typological arrangement, but more substantial and integrated into an artistic whole, is seen on the sarcophagus of Junius Bassus in the Vatican Grottoes (fourth century CE). In two panels, Christ (enthroned or entering Jerusalem) is flanked by the sacrifice of Isaac (see Aqedah), *Adam and *Eve, the sufferings of *Job, Daniel in the lions' den. The only scene from the passion of Christ is the trial before *Pilate; again, there is no crucifixion.

A particularly mature and instructive treatment of the theme of salvation, with allusions to the crucifixion, is to be seen on a Vatican sarcophagus of the middle of the fifth century CE. In the center a plain Greek equal-armed cross is surmounted by the chi-rho monogram which is encircled by a laurel victory wreath. There is no body of Christ on the cross, but on either side of it below are sleeping soldiers. To the left of the center panel are the episodes of Simon of Cyrene carrying the cross and the mock crowning of Jesus by the soldiers. To the right a double panel is devoted to the trial of Jesus before Pilate. In this sequence the artist has integrated the themes of crucifixion and *resurrection. This ability to present two themes simultaneously is one of the great strengths of visual art. The crucifixion is present in this sculptural program but only indirectly; in organic relation to the resurrection it comprises the real, though hidden, crowning of Christ in contrast to the vicarious cross-bearing of Simon, the simulated crowning of the soldiers, or the trial before Pilate—where Christ is, despite appearances, the real king who judges.

With the development of church architecture following the Edict of Milan, art soon becomes an important vehicle linking the Bible and liturgy. This is particularly the case with mosaic decoration that is organically related to its architectural setting. The best example of this is to be found in the cluster of fifth- and sixth-century Christian buildings at Ravenna, particularly the church of Sant'Apollinare Nuovo in Ravenna. In this early Byzantine church, along the north and south sides of the nave, a series of mosaic panels uses episodes from the Gospels in relation to the eucharistic celebration, which would be focused in the apse of this basilica. On the north side are scenes from the life of Jesus (including the parable of the Pharisee and the publican) leading up to the miracle at Cana of Galilee (John 2.1–12) at the edge of the sanctuary. The series on the south side starts with the Last Supper and goes through the story of the passion (omitting the crucifixion) ending with the episode of doubting *Thomas (John 20.24–29). It is likely that the choice of these subjects was determined by the liturgical calendar in use at the time. As in the catacombs and sarcophagi, the unifying theme of the whole program is the salvation brought by Christ, with particular emphasis on martyrdom as the response to this in human life. The historiated panels just described are closely linked with two very lively processions of male and female martyrs making their way to the sanctuary; the mosaics convey a vivid sensation of movement. Martyrdom as the classic expression of following in the way of the cross is also the theme in the two baptisteries in Ravenna (of the Arians and of the Orthodox). The crucifixion is not given as a separable episode, but its meaning is diffused, so to speak, throughout the whole scheme, indicating the source of the life of the Christian martyr-follower. In the apse of the church of Sant'Apollinare in Classe (just outside Ravenna) the crucifixion is again obliquely presented, this time in the context of the transfiguration, implying that it is not an episode only of the past but is reenacted sacramentally in the eucharistic action performed in the body of the church.

Another vivid presentation in mosaic of typological themes in relation to the Eucharist is to be found in the sanctuary of the sixth-century church of San Vitale in Ravenna. On the north side, there is an integrated scene comprising *Abraham receiving the three heavenly visitors (to what looks like a eucharistic meal) and the sacrifice of Isaac, a common typological pointer to the sacrifice of Christ. Above this are Moses receiving the *law and *Jeremiah with a martyr's crown and scroll. On the south side the prefigurations of the Eucharist are *Abel offering his sacrificial lamb, and *Melchizedek. Above are Moses as shepherd and at the burning bush, and *Isaiah with martyr's crown and scroll.

The Ravenna mosaics throw light on early Christian attitudes to biblical history. The historical incidents are sketched in such a way as to suggest their permanent significance, and through the liturgy these past events become present realities.

The Middle Ages. During the Middle Ages, two very significant phases take place in the development of art: Romanesque and Gothic.

Romanesque is a term that covers the art and architecture of the eleventh and twelfth centuries, which developed from various and very different sources: classical, Byzantine, Islamic, and Mesopotamian. It thus became an art admirably equipped to express both the narrative and the symbolic requirements of a Christianity based on the Bible. Perhaps the best surviving fully articulated biblical and theological program in the Romanesque tradition is the sculpture on the royal portal of the cathedral at Chartres. The central tympanum has the seated Christ in glory surrounded by the symbols of the evangelists (Matthew: young man; Mark: lion; Luke: ox; John: eagle) and the seated elders. This derives from the visions of the book of *Revelation and is very prominent in Romanesque sculpture and painting. The adjacent bays are given over to the *ascension and the *incarnation. The latter is deliberately designed to stress the incarnation as itself God's act of self-sacrifice (the child lies on an altarlike structure and the presentation of Christ in the Temple is over an altar); no doubt this reflects eucharistic preaching of the time. As well as being a divine sacrifice, the incarnation is presented as the crown of human culture and the key to the universal meaning of all time by having the liberal arts and the signs of the zodiac in the archivolts. Somewhat in the manner of Sant'Apollinare Nuovo, a series of historiated capitals giving episodes from the life of Jesus binds the three bays together. The biblical antecedents of the New Testament story are suggested in the pillar figures of kings, queens, priests, and prophets on the columns of all three bays. Other outstanding Romanesque sculptural treatments of biblical themes in France are to be found at Vézelay, Moissac, Arles, and St. Gilles-du-Gard. The tympanum at Vézelay is especially interesting for the way it blends into one scene Christ's mission charge to the *apostles with scenes of all kinds of strange and deformed creatures drawn from early medieval fables and bestiaries, thus making a very striking interpretation of the universal Christ. In Spain, the sculptures in the cloister of Santo Domingo de Silos also relate Christ to biblical history and to a strange, somewhat surrealistic, natural world of birds with animal heads. Particularly profound at Silos is a sculptured relief that, in a way reminiscent of the Vatican sarcophagus, works into one artistic whole both crucifixion and resurrection.

The Romanesque period also saw a marked development in the use of biblical themes in painting, both in illuminated manuscripts and in fresco painting in church interiors. Some extensive examples of fresco painting are to be found in France at St. Savin-sur-Gartempe (with an impressive series of scenes from the Hebrew Bible on the ceiling of the nave), at Vicq and St. Chef; in Spain at San Isidoro in Leon; in Italy at Sant'Angelo in Formis; and in Germany on the island of Reichenau.

Extending from the thirteenth to the fifteenth centuries, the Gothic period is the high-water mark in the evolution of medieval art and architecture. In comparison with Romanesque the tendency now is toward greater realism in representation. This is well illustrated if one compares the Romanesque royal portal at Chartres with the sculpture of the north and south porches. Not that this means that the motive has become solely to illustrate the biblical narrative more strikingly by showing in more detail how the event actually happened. Rather, the typological and allegorical relating of Old and New Testament subjects still predominates, and the aim is to present as a unified whole an encyclopedia of Christian doctrine and ethics. France, where the Gothic style originated, again supplies the best examples. Chartres is the finest remaining example of this attempt to integrate architecture, sculpture, and stained glass into one comprehensive scheme. Bourges and Laon are other notable examples. The typological treatment of subjects from the Hebrew Bible remains basically that of the catacombs: biblical anticipations are juxtaposed with their fulfillment in the birth, passion, and death of Christ. The more realistic treatment of scenes from the Gospels does not indicate an interest in history for its own sake; in fact, the use of material from the Gospels in the Gothic period shows a surprising austerity compared with previous centuries. Healings, hitherto very common (the paralytic, the woman with the issue of blood, the blind man), are conspicuously absent in the Gothic period. Incidents from the life of Jesus prior to the passion story are confined to the baptism, the temptation, the sign at Cana of Galilee, and the transfiguration. This is true of illuminated manuscripts, stained glass, and sculpture. Remarkable, too, is the paucity of parables that appear in the art of this period. The emphasis falls on four parables: the good Samaritan, the ten virgins, the prodigal son, and *Dives and Lazarus—all of which were christologically interpreted in patristic and medieval preaching. Artists were not intent on giving a fully illustrated version of the biblical story, but rather on providing an accompaniment to the liturgy and on embodying the teaching of the preachers and theological commentators. The motive is still to make a doctrinal point, but not until the Italian Renaissance do we find anything like a descriptive treatment of the nativity. Throughout the Gothic period, the scene of the nativity is mysterious and troubled: the mother of Christ lies apart from her son who appears not in a manger but on a sacrificial altar.

The Renaissance and Reformation. As far as the influence of the Bible on art is concerned, the Renaissance and the Reformation are best considered together. The early Italian Renaissance led to a fresh development of the classical tradition in art, already discernible in the Gothic sculpture at Chartres, and to a renewed emphasis on humanism and textual studies. As the Reformation proceeded, the authority of the Bible became more isolated; there was also a revival of the aniconic principle found in the *Ten Commandments, so that the visual arts were regarded at best as unnecessary decoration to the biblical text and at worst as a misleading distraction. The Counter-Reformation saw a deliberate attempt to restore the position of the arts as ancillary to the Bible and subject to the rules laid down by the Council of Trent in 1563.

The great change noticeable in the use of biblical subjects at the Renaissance is the move from a largely two-dimensional hieratic art to something more realistic and more three-dimensional in perspective. Byzantine and medieval art as a whole had presented biblical subjects in their transcendental and theological perspective, especially in the light of the Last Judgment. Renaissance art, while not denying this reference, gave more prominence to the natural and the human. The change of mood is well illustrated by the sequence of biblical scenes by Giotto (1266/7–1337) in the frescoes of the Arena chapel at Padua. Such scenes as the betrayal or the lamentation have a depth of human feeling and a realism that herald developments to come in Renaissance painting. This new accent affected the treatment of New Testament subjects. One can say that a certain kind of "quest of the historical Jesus" began in art in, for example, a painter like Masaccio (1401–1428?) in his frescoes in the Brancacci chapel of Santa Maria del Carmine in Florence. These, whether the Expulsion from the Garden of Eden or The Tribute Money, show a new kind of bodily realism and a new interest in the happening for its own sake rather than its symbolic, didactic, or doctrinal significance. A compellingly realistic treatment of the resurrection by Donatello (1386–1466) in San Lorenzo, Florence, has also great religious depth. It succeeds in linking resurrection with crucifixion; the austere Christ who emerges from the slime of the tomb is a risen Christ who has really suffered and really died. This is in great contrast to the crucifixion of Raphael (1483–1520) in the National Gallery, London, where the interest of the artist is more in classical harmony, design, and symmetry. Leonardo da Vinci (1452–1519) is more successful (e.g., in his Madonna of the Rocks and The Last Supper) in combining technique of design with religious depth. Michelangelo (1476–1564) shows the late Renaissance exuberance in the human body and composition on the grand scale. His treatment of *creation and Last Judgment in the Sistine chapel in the Vatican contrasts sharply with the handling of these themes in Romanesque art.

Something of Luther's realism in Christology ("You can't drag Christ down too deeply into our human nature") finds its way into the work of an artist who was much influenced by his teaching, Albrecht Dürer (1471–1528), especially his woodcuts and engravings. His series on the passion, in which he sees himself involved in the situation of Christ, is very Lutheran in feel. Equally striking are his woodcuts on the book of Revelation, with their realistic detail and the way Dürer contextualizes the apocalyptic scenes in contemporary society. Dürer's contemporary, Mathias Grünewald (ca. 1470/80–1528), was also influenced by Luther, and his famous Isenheim altarpiece of the crucifixion in the Unterlinden Museum in Colmar, France, marks a turning point in the iconography of that subject. It is a crucifixion that in its grim detail would not have been possible in the patristic period, when the victory of the crucified Christ was emphasized. While Luther, too, saw the atonement in terms of a great divine victory over death and sin, he felt that such a theology of glory could play down the stark realities of human life in its suffering. Grünewald's Isenheim crucifixion, with its gangrenous-looking flesh and clawlike hands, is a powerful statement of what Luther would have called a theology of the cross. Grünewald's crucifixion is not only realistic representation but it also retains symbolic elements with its unusual introduction of *John the Baptist to the scene (against a background of the text: "He must increase, but I must decrease" [John 3.30]) and the lamb with the vexillum of victory.

The Reformed tradition attains its most considerable expression in art in the work of Rembrandt (1606–1669), who must be classed as one of the great artistic commentators on the Bible. Biblical events and personalities were for Rembrandt more than a source of material for dramatic illustration, as they tended to be for Rubens. Rembrandt came to see in the biblical history his own and everyone's personal story. His painting of subjects from both testaments have a deeply felt interior quality, and his biblical work as a whole embodies a profound sense that the Bible is not only past history, but also present and universal experience. This is particularly true of the paintings and etchings of his later years, for example his crucifixions, where, like Dürer, he sees his own tribulations as a participation in those of Christ. The Hebrew Bible for Rembrandt is important in its own right and not simply as a preface to the New Testament, and no artist had hitherto entered with such intensity into the spirit of such subjects as the sacrifice of Isaac (before this time treated for the most part typologically), *Joseph interpreting his dreams, or the relations between *Saul and *David. Memorable New Testament subjects are Christ healing the sick, the return of the prodigal son, the crucifixion (especially those of his later years), and Christ at Emmaus.

The Modern Period. The eighteenth century did not produce many works of significance for appreciating the use of the Bible in art. The biblical paintings of Tiepolo (1695–1770) are on a rich and dramatic scale but remain primarily decorative. Idiosyncratic as may have been the personal religion of William Blake (1757–1827), his watercolors and etchings of biblical subjects have a sweep and intensity of great power. Especially worthy of mention are his engravings for the book of Job.

The nineteenth century, however, saw a new attempt at authentic realism and feeling in the work of the pre-Raphaelites and the painstaking attempts to reproduce accurately the Palestinian scene in the work of systematic illustrators of the Bible, such as James Tissot (1836–1902).

The twentieth century has proved to be a creative period for the use of biblical themes in art, and especially of new interpretations of the crucifixion. Graham Sutherland (1903–1980) has said that no one in the twentieth century can conceive of the crucifixion apart from Auschwitz. His crucifixions in St. Matthew, Northampton, and in Coventry Cathedral fuse event and symbol in a way that is reminiscent of Grünewald.

The two most significant artists in the twentieth century influenced by the Bible are Georges Rouault and Marc Chagall. Rouault (1871–1958), in his portraits of Christ and especially in his scenes from the passion, draws on the Byzantine tradition of the icon, and in his "biblical landscapes" he makes an innovative attempt to convey the nature of salvation in terms of landscapes, which, while they appear threatening to human life, nevertheless contain space for human beings to experience the accompanying presence of Christ.

Marc Chagall (1887–1985) is an outstanding commentator in art on biblical subjects. Drawing on both Jewish and Christian traditions and developing, like Blake, his own personal mythology, his work in painting, etching, and stained glass constitutes a uniquely important interpretation of the Bible. No painter since Rembrandt has so entered into the spirit of the Bible. Examples of how he relates, for example, creation and crucifixion are to be found in the series Message biblique housed in the Musée National in Nice. Chagall is also a significant figure in the evolution of the iconography of the crucifixion. He combines the suffering and hope in a new and compelling manner by relating the *Torah and the crucifixion of Christ. In a way reminiscent of Rouault's biblical landscapes, Chagall's volcanic and tumultuous scenes yet suggest the possibility of deliverance and hope, in, for instance, Obsession (1943), by the insertion of a green crucifix, recalling very effectively the cross as the tree of life in medieval art.

Artemis of the Ephesians. Artemis was the Greek goddess of the woods and hunting, as well as the patron of women in childbirth, identified with the Roman goddess Diana. The early background of Artemis of the Ephesians is hidden in legends and sources related to the Greek colonization of Ionia. It seems reasonable, however, to conclude that the original goddess was an amalgam of the imported Greek Artemis and an indigenous goddess, perhaps an Anatolian mother goddess.

The Ephesian Artemis functioned primarily as the tutelary deity of *Ephesus. Although she was the deity "whom all Asia and the whole world worship" (Acts 19.27), her central shrine was located in and protected by the city. Religious artifacts from this cult have been found as far west as Spain and as far east as Palestine, but only "the city of the Ephesians [was] the temple keeper of the great Artemis, and of the statue that fell from heaven" (Acts 19.35).

There has been much confusion and misunderstanding of the goddess, arising largely from a polemical Christian misnomer that labeled the egg-shaped objects attached to certain depictions of the goddess as female breasts. From the epithet "multi-breasted" it was a short, but incorrect, leap to the conclusion that the goddess was primarily a fertility goddess. In fact, there is no scholarly consensus that the egg-shaped objects attached to the goddess represented breasts. Even if they did and this mammary/fertility symbol lay at the heart of the religion, it is difficult to explain why this depiction appeared so late in the development of the cult. In addition, the Ephesians, particularly in the Greco-Roman era, associated their goddess with the chaste Greek Artemis rather than a mother goddess of Anatolia or one of the fertility goddesses of the East. The primary internal sources of the religion itself, such as texts, coins, statuary, and inscriptions, offer no cogent evidence for depicting this goddess or her cult as principally a symbol of sexuality and fecundity.

The goddess was well known for her wealth, which stemmed from two circumstances. Her temple served as a bank both for the safe deposit of others' wealth and for loans at a profitable rate of interest. The goddess also owned extensive lands and fisheries that contributed to her great wealth. Others, such as manufacturers of devotional items involving the goddess (Acts 19.23–27), received income as long as the goddess's reputation flourished.

Because of its size and wealth, the temple of Artemis was acclaimed as one of the seven wonders of the ancient world. It was constructed of marble (127 columns, each 18 m [60 ft] tall), possessed an external horseshoe-shaped altar (29 by 20 m [96 by 66 ft]) and was the largest Greek temple in antiquity (67 by 130 m [220 by 425 ft]). It was damaged by invading Gothic raiders during the mid-third century CE and finally fell into disuse because of Christian ascendancy in the fourth and fifth centuries. The temple no longer stands, and its exact location was unknown for centuries until its foundations were unearthed in the late nineteenth century.

Ascension of Christ. Despite the great importance and influence of the early church's belief in the ascension of Christ, it is described explicitly in the New Testament only twice. In Acts, after the resurrected Christ reminded his apostles that they will be empowered by the Holy Spirit, he was "lifted up, and a cloud took him out of their sight" (Acts 1.9). The second-century CE addition to the conclusion of Mark adds that after Christ's ascension he "sat down at the right hand of God" (Mark 16.19).

In the Hellenistic world the ascent of a king, prophet, hero, or holy man to the heavens, the place of the gods, was a well-known motif signifying the divine status of the one who ascended. Heracles was deified through an ascension to heaven, and Ganymede became immortal when Zeus lifted him into heaven to serve as cupbearer to the gods. More generally, under the influence of Platonism, all human souls were believed to be immortal and returned to the heavens when cleansed of their mortal attachments. Christ's ascension similarly demonstrated his divinity, but more importantly, through the church's prophetic *interpretation of the Jewish scriptures, the ascension of Christ also signaled the beginning of a messianic kingdom and the empowerment of Christ's followers by virtue of their identification with him through the rite of *baptism.

Although rare in Jewish tradition, ascent into heaven is recorded in the case of *Enoch, who "walked with God; then he was no more, because God took him" (Gen. 5.24), and the prophet *Elijah, "who ascended in a whirlwind into heaven" (2 Kings 2.11); noncanonical writings also record the ascensions of Abraham, Moses, Isaiah, and Ezra. The ascension of Christ was unique, however, because of its eschatological significance for early Christianity. The authors of the New Testament believed that Psalm 110, celebrating the king seated at the right hand of God, referred to the ascended and victorious Christ who was exalted over all heavenly powers. The ascension was also seen as an elevated form of priestly sacrifice, for Christ is described as "the great high priest who has passed through the heavens" (Heb. 4.14), the sanctuary made by God.

The earliest kerygma of the church thus proclaimed not only Christ's *resurrection but also his ascension into heaven and enthronement at God's right hand. Christians celebrated the inauguration of this messianic kingdom and the demise of the present eon, for when Christ was given dominion over the demonic powers of this age, so were the members of his church. The letter to the *Ephesians speaks of the "immeasurable greatness of God's power for us who believe" (Eph. 1.19), for the members of the church were united with Christ who is "above all rule and authority and power and dominion" (Eph. 1.21).

The *exorcisms and miraculous cures performed by the apostles in Acts were understood to be manifestations of the *Holy Spirit that Christ "poured out" (Acts 2.33) on his apostles after his ascension, sharing his dominion over the *demons of this world with all members of his church. Thus, Paul says: "So, if you have been raised with Christ, seek the things that are above, where Christ is, seated at the right hand of God. . . . For you have died, and your life is hidden with Christ in God" (Col. 3.1–3). This "death" and hidden exaltation of Christians was effected through the ritual of baptism, which Paul compared to a burial and rebirth with Christ (Col. 2.12; Rom. 6.3–4); baptism thus elevated the members of the church into Christ's heavenly kingdom.

Among gnosticizing Christians, baptism was understood to be a rite of immortalization that deified its initiates. According to the *gnostics, if baptism initiated Christians into the death and resurrection of Christ, as Paul argued, then it also united them with Christ's ascension and enthronement, separating the baptized entirely from the mortal sphere. The gnostics' radically transcendent interpretation of baptism was opposed by Paul, who argued that Christ's exaltation was achieved through his humiliation and suffering on the cross and that the ascension of Christians would not come until the *parousia.

Nevertheless, otherworldly speculations on the ascension and immortalization of the soul developed rapidly among gnostic Christians for whom the ascension of Christ established the pattern for their visionary journeys. The gnostics' elaborate portrayals of the soul's ascent, although influenced by Hellenistic thought, in turn came to influence the understanding of the ascent and deification of the soul in Platonic, Hermetic, and other philosophical circles from the second to the fourth centuries CE.

Asher. The second son of *Jacob and Zilpah, *Leah's maid (Gen. 30.12), and one of the twelve *tribes of Israel. In Genesis 30.13, the name Asher is associated with the Hebrew word for blessing, but many scholars associate the name's origin with the goddess *Asherah.

According to Joshua 19.24–31, the tribe of Asher settled in northwest *Canaan (Map 3: X2–3). Biblical sources praise Asher's fertile land (Gen. 49.20; Deut. 33.24–25). The authors of Judges claim that Asher failed to occupy all of its territory (Judg. 1.31–32). *Solomon reorganized Asher's territory into an administrative district (1 Kings 4.16) and later ceded twenty Galilean cities (1 Kings 9.11–13) to the king of Tyre. After the Assyrian exile Asher's territory remained in foreign hands, but the tribe, as witnessed by its *genealogies, endured (e.g., 1 Chron. 7.30–39; cf. 2 Chron. 30.11; Luke 2.36). GARY N. Asherah. The Canaanite mother goddess, associated with lions, serpents, and sacred trees. The word "asherah" in the Bible most often refers to a stylized wooden tree.

The biblical writers generally condemn worship of the goddess, but there is evidence that many in Israel devoted themselves to Asherah, perhaps even worshiping her as consort of Yahweh. At several times an asherah stood in Yahweh's *Temple in Jerusalem (2 Kings 18.4; 21.7; 23.6); there were in the Temple, moreover, vessels dedicated to Asherah (2 Kings 23.4) and a compound in which women wove garments for her statue (2 Kings 23.7). An asherah also stood in *Samaria, the capital of the northern kingdom of Israel (1 Kings 16.33; 2 Kings 13.6) and in Yahweh's temple in Bethel (2 Kings 23.15). Recent archaeological discoveries have confirmed that the cult of Asherah was a part of Yahwistic tradition for at least some Israelites.

Asia. In the Hellenistic period, Asia is a term for the Seleucid Empire (Map 11; e.g., 1 Macc. 11.13; 13.32). In the Roman period, Asia means the province of that name, in the western part of what is now Turkey (Map 14:E3; see, e.g., 2 Esd. 16.1; Acts 19.6; 1 Cor. 16.19; 1 Pet. 1.1). It was an important province, containing within its boundaries a number of wealthy cities, including *Ephesus, its capital. The *seven churches of the opening chapters of the book of *Revelation are all in the province of Asia (Rev. 1.4), as is Colossae, to whose church the letter to the *Colossians was sent. MICHAEL D. Assyria. The ancient land of Assyria (Map 6: H3–4), located in what is now northeastern Iraq, drew its name from the small settlement of Assur (or Ashur) built on a sandstone cliff on the west bank of the Tigris about 35 km (24 mi) north of its confluence with the lower Zab River. Situated at a major river crossing but outside the zone for reliable annual rainfall, Assur early attracted settlements by pastoralists, since it was easily defensible and had ready access to water. Early levels of a small shrine there dating to ca. 2800–2200 BCE show affinities with *Sumerian culture to the south in furnishings and statuary.

The earliest independent ruler of the city-state of Assur attested in a contemporary inscription is Shalim-ahum, who reigned about 1900 BCE. At this time, firms of merchants in Assur established branches in several Anatolian cities and traded textiles and tin from Assur for silver.

About 1813 BCE, Shamshi-Adad I, an Amorite prince from the middle Euphrates, took possession of Assur and subsequently founded an empire with its capital at Shubat-Enlil (modern Tell Leilan in northeast Syria), with two sons reigning as subkings in *Mari and in Ekallate (just north of Assur). Under Shamshi-Adad's son Ishme-Dagan I, the empire was quickly lost; and the dynasty of Shamshi-Adad was replaced within a few decades by native Assyrians, who ruled—in relative obscurity—during the next four centuries, at times as vassals of Mitanni.

Under the dynamic Ashur-uballit I (1364–1328 BCE), Assyria reemerged as a major power, and in the next century conquered and gradually annexed much of the old heartland of Mitanni to the west, setting up an extensive provincial system and then briefly taking over much of Babylonia to the south. Its imperialist ethic was embodied in the Middle Assyrian coronation ritual, in which the officiating priest solemnly charged the king: "Expand your land!" After 1200 BCE, amid widespread upheavals and population movements in Western Asia, the Middle Assyrian empire declined both politically and territorially. An extensive if short-lived revival in the time of Tiglath-pileser I (1115–1076 BCE) dissipated under the pressure of invading Arameans, who confined Assyrian political power to a narrow strip along the Tigris until the late tenth century.

After 935 BCE, Assyrians kings reclaimed lost sections of the Assyrian heartland from the Arameans and began to expand militarily, especially to the west. Over the next three centuries, these monarchs created an extensive Neo-Assyrian empire, which at its height (ca. 660 BCE) embraced a substantial part of the ancient Near East from southern Egypt, Cyprus, and western Anatolia through Palestine-Syria and Mesopotamia to Elam and the Iranian plateau (see Map 6). The foundations of Assyrian imperial power were effectively laid by Ashurnasirpal II (884–859 BCE), who built a splendid new capital at Calah (Nimrud), restructured the Assyrian army into a fighting force without peer in southwestern Asia, reorganized the Assyrian provincial system, and earned a reputation for ruthless treatment of rebels and prisoners. His massive deportations from conquered lands, continued by his successors, brought large numbers of western Arameans into the heartland of Assyria, swelling the ranks of the court and army, influencing artistic and architectural styles, and, by the early seventh century, replacing the Assyrian language with *Aramaic as the vernacular. Ashurnasirpal's campaigns consolidated Assyrian territorial gains as far west as the Upper Euphrates and extracted tribute from these areas; his trading ventures, with military escort, succeeded in reaching the Mediterranean. His son, Shalmaneser II (859–824 BCE), began to extend Assyrian control into northern Syria; but his advance was checked temporarily at the battle of Qarqar (853 BCE) by a broad coalition of states led by *Damascus and Hamath and including Arab tribes and Israel (under *Ahab). Shalmaneser's subsequent campaigns, which reached into Cilicia, secured north Syria and brought the *Phoenician cities Tyre and Sidon into the Assyrian orbit. Despite a revolt of the major cities in Assyria (827–821 BCE) and an ensuing weakness in monarchic power, Assyria continued to be active in the west until about 785 BCE.

Meanwhile, in the late ninth and early eighth centuries in the mountains to the north of Assyria, the rival power of Urartu had risen to prominence. As the fortunes of Assyria declined after 783 BCE under weak kings and strong provincial governors, the Urartians pushed south into Iran and west across the Euphrates into northern Syria. By 745 BCE, Urartu had conquered or concluded alliances with most of the important states in south-central Anatolia and northern Syria and had assumed hegemony over the region. A revolt in Calah brought to the Assyrian throne *Tiglath-pileser III (745–727 BCE), a vigorous monarch who checked encroaching Aramean and Chaldean tribesmen in *Babylonia, restricted Urartu to its homeland, and marched across Syria and Palestine (once in response to a request from Ahaz of Judah for intervention [2 Kings 16:7–9]) as far as Gaza. His son, *Shalmaneser V (727–722 BCE), besieged Tyre and captured *Samaria, bringing the kingdom of *Israel to an end. Sargon II (722–705 BCE), a usurper, deported the population of Israel to various parts of the empire, campaigned as far as the border of Egypt, brought Babylonia under his control, and built a magnificent capital at Dur-Sharrukin (Khorsabad) in the north of the country. His son, *Sennacherib (705–681 BCE), expanded further into Anatolia. Faced with perennial unrest in Babylonia (fomented for the most part by Merodach-baladan and his fellow Chaldeans) and smarting from the murder of his crown prince, Ashur-nadin-shumi, who had been king there from 700 to 694 BCE, Sennacherib eventually sacked and depopulated Babylon. In Palestine, he received the submission of *Hezekiah, who had rebelled in collusion with Merodach-baladan, and, after a siege, extracted tribute from *Jerusalem (2 Kings 18:13–16). Assassinated by one of his sons, Sennacherib was succeeded by another son, Esarhaddon (681–669 BCE), who invaded the Iranian plateau and Egypt, but died prematurely of illness while on campaign. His empire was inherited principally by his son Ashurbanipal (669–627 BCE), who reigned in Assyria; but another son, Shamash-shum-ukin (668–648 BCE), was installed as king in Babylon. Ashurbanipal campaigned extensively in Egypt, reaching as far as Thebes, and brought the empire to its territorial apogee in about 660 BCE. In 652 BCE, Shamash-shum-ukin launched a massive revolt, which won support from Elamites, Arabs, and other disaffected Assyrian subjects. Ashurbanipal spent more than ten years defeating and wreaking reprisals on the dissidents, exhausting the empire in the process.

After Ashurbanipal's death in 627 BCE, civil war broke out in Assyria between three contenders for the throne; it took several years before Sin-shar-ishkun (623?–612 BCE) emerged as the victor. Within a decade he was faced with a coalition of *Medes and Babylonians, who invaded and destroyed the central provinces of Assyria. A final king, Ashur-uballit II (612–609 BCE), ruled briefly in the western provincial capital of Haran with the support of Egyptian armies; but he was driven out by the Babylonians. The fledgling empires of Babylon and Media divided the territories of the Assyrian empire, which disappeared with barely a trace even in its former heartland.

Assyria in the first millennium BCE, though renowned primarily as a massive military power that overwhelmed and intimidated much of southwestern Asia, had a vigorous cultural and economic life. In the decorative arts, its craftsmen displayed creative sensitivity in such diverse media as ivories, seals, and palace wall reliefs; the latter depict an astonishing variety of subjects, including formal protective deities, scenes of battlefield and siege, daily life at court, and the botanical zoological parks created in and around the Assyrian capitals. Literature also flourished, its most notable monument being the large library amassed by Ashurbanipal (669–627 BCE) at *Nineveh, whose excavation in the mid-nineteenth century led to the rediscovery of Mesopotamian literature. On the economic side, trade prospered throughout the empire as new markets were opened to entrepreneurs even from the conquered territories. Booty, tribute, and trade goods poured into the Assyrian heartland, financing the erection and renovation of resplendent urban capitals as well as the maintenance of the military machine that made the empire possible. Astarte (AV: Ashtoreth, Ashtaroth). The Greek form of Ashtart, one of the three great Canaanite goddesses. Astarte was primarily a goddess of fertility and love, the counterpart of Greek Aphrodite. She was also associated with war, and, like her Mesopotamian equivalent Ishtar, had astral features.

In the Bible, worship of the goddess is repeatedly condemned: twice in the book of Judges the Israelites are punished for straying after the *Baals and Astartes (Judg. 2.13–14; 10.6–7); *Solomon is criticized for worshiping Astarte (1 Kings 11.5, 33); and Jeremiah castigates the people for making offerings to the *Queen of Heaven, a syncretism of Astarte and Ishtar (Jer. 7.16–20; 44.15–28). Atbash. A cryptic device in which the first letter of the Hebrew alphabet (ʾālep) is replaced by the last (tāw), the second (bêt) by the second from last (šîn), and so forth. In the *Masoretic text of the Hebrew Bible this device occurs in Jeremiah 25.26 and 51.41, where Sheshach (ššk) stands for Babylon (bbl), and in 51.1, where Leb-qamai (lb-qmy) stands for Chaldeans (kśdym). This code is apparently not original, since the *Septuagint gives the plain forms in chap. 51 (the key words in 25.26 are not found in the Greek), and both names are used frequently elsewhere in Jeremiah. The reason for the code in these cases is unknown. MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Athens. Excavations of ancient Athens (Map 7:D3) (named after its patron goddess Athena) reveal its settlement since the Neolithic period. The easy defense of the Acropolis and the proximity of the Saronic Gulf to the south explain the importance of the site in the history of Attica. In the fifth century BCE, despite defeats in the Peloponnesian War, Athens emerged as the cultural and intellectual center of the Greek world. Innovative techniques in art and sculpture, powerful developments in Greek drama, and significant progress in political reform characterized the glory of fifth-century Athens. The wellspring for later Greek philosophical inquiry flowed from the life and thought of Socrates (ca. 470–399). Ironically, the virtual destruction of the Acropolis in the early fifth century by the Persians made way for an era of architectural creativity in the last half of the century, when the Parthenon, Erechtheion, and numerous other temples were constructed on the Acropolis.

Acts 17.16–34 contains the only extended reference in the New Testament to Athens. The plot of this narrative is structured around some of the best-known aspects of Athenian culture and local color. The city's religiousness, expressed in temples, shrines, and altars, was proverbial in both Greek and Roman thought. The travelogue composed by the Greek geographer Pausanias (second century CE) depicts a city replete with sacred edifices and statues. This facet of Athenian culture is reflected in Luke's statement that "the city was full of idols" (Acts 17.16) and *Paul's reference to the Athenians' piety (17.22) and an altar "to an *unknown god" (17.23).

From the time of Socrates until the Emperor Justinian closed the schools of philosophy in 529 CE, the name of Athens was synonymous with philosophical pursuit of truth. The city had, in fact, been the home not only for Socrates but also for Plato's Academy, Aristotle's Lyceum, the Painted Porch of Stoicism, and the Gardens of Epicurus. As a university town in Paul's time, Athens continued to attract philosophical and philhellenic intellectuals. The account of Paul's efforts there is interwoven with allusions to the city's philosophical traditions. Paul encounters "Epicurean and Stoic philosophers" (17.18), argues for the true nature of God on the basis of natural revelation (17.24–28), and quotes the Stoic poet Aratus (17.28). (See also Epicureans; Stoics.) The scrutiny of Paul's doctrine of God by the council of the *Areopagus deliberately echoes the trial of Socrates for proclaiming new deities and leading the populace to question its beliefs in the traditional gods.

Beyond Acts 17, 1 Thessalonians 3.1, in which Paul mentions his stay in Athens, is the only other New Testament reference to the city. Athens was the home of several second-century Christian apologists, but otherwise did not exert much direct influence in early Christian history. RICHARD E. OSTER, JR.

Authority of the Bible. This terminology is characteristic of Christian theology, and so the following entry appropriately discusses the issue from a Christian perspective. For consideration of the topic in Jewish tradition, see Interpretation, History of, article on Jewish Interpretation; Torah. For related discussion, see Inspiration and Inerrancy and Revelation.

"Here is Wisdom; this is the royal Law; these are the lively oracles of God": these are the words used when the Bible, described as "the most valuable thing that this world affords," is presented to the British monarch in the course of the coronation ceremony. They illustrate the value ascribed to the Bible and indicate that its authority is ultimately the authority attributed to God. It is therefore not an authority intrinsic to the book but one linked to the conviction that the book somehow or other emanates from God. Because God was held to be holy, the Bible too is described as holy, and terms like "holy scriptures" and "sacred writings" become commonplace.

The Israelites believed that it was possible to receive a divine communication, and so the book of the Law (see Torah) was invested with divine authority. Later rabbinic piety came to think of the Torah as eternal in the heavens but communicated through *angels to *Moses, the divinely appointed lawgiver. The sanctity of the communication was associated with the manuscripts as well so that infinite care was demanded in copying the text. The *prophets, too, saw themselves as called into the divine council, and their utterance was consequently regarded as the very utterance of God. They were held to be God's own mouthpieces, inspired by him, and the fulfillment of their message validated its truth.

Because they conveyed God's revelation for Israel, the writings, as collected, were revered as authoritative. As the authors had been "inspired," their writings, in turn, were held to share in the *inspiration, and it became customary to speak of them as the *word of God.

The Hebrew Bible was accepted as "holy scripture" by the early Christian communities, for *Jesus had set the seal of his authority on these writings. The early church saw them as the preparation for the coming of Jesus. It was not a matter of affirming every detail (although some would argue this) but rather the tenor and ethos of the writings that were seen as authentically indicating God's will and purpose. The early Christians saw in Jesus the climax of all that the Jewish scriptures taught. It was felt that everything had been written down in the light of the critical events associated with Jesus; hence a new interpretation came into being. While *Philo could read his own philosophical understanding and mystical experience into the scriptures, the Pharisaic rabbis (see Pharisees) see their own rules for life emanating from them, and the *Essenes reinterpret them in the light of the fortunes of the founder of their sect and the continuing destinies of their community, the Christians likewise read the scriptures in terms of their own faith and experience. Christ came to be seen as the center of scripture; he was the key to its understanding and its continuing validity. As Martin Luther (1483–1546) was to put it, "Christ is the Lord and King of the scriptures." The writer of 2 Timothy can accordingly speak of "the sacred writings that are able to instruct you for salvation through faith in Christ Jesus" (3.1) and can thus affirm that "all scripture is inspired by God" (3.16).

Gradually the same authority was granted to the New Testament writings, for they were the factual sources for his life and teaching and encapsulated the early apostolic preaching and instruction. Over against views regarded as illegitimate and later condemned as heretical, the New Testament documents were seen as pointing to an authentic faith. Fixing the *canon of the New Testament thus involved discrimination between those books seen as authoritative and so part of the sacred tradition and those that were not. It was felt to be a case not of the church's conveying authority but recognizing an intrinsic authority already present. As Origen (ca. 185–254) put it, "The sacred books were not the works of human beings; they were written by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit at the will of the Father of all through Jesus Christ" (De principiis 4.9). Just as the writings bear witness to the acts of God in history, so the church points to the Bible, preaching and teaching from its pages and subjecting itself to its guidance. But it also interprets it, providing the mainstream of tradition. The church recognizes in the scriptures the classical, normative account of Christian origins. So a sense of identity between the present and the church's roots is guaranteed and a measure of stability secured.

Inspiration. The Bible speaks of *inspiration or the divine breath as the source of vitality and power. Genesis 2.7 asserts that the Lord God "breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and the man became a living being." Ezekiel 37.10 says of lifeless bones that "the breath came into them, and they lived, and stood on their feet." So Paul can say, "Our message of the gospel came to you not in word only, but also in power and in the Holy Spirit" (1 Thess. 1.5). The implication is that, just as divine inspiration had made the prophetic message a living one, so the words of scripture are mere signposts to something that goes beyond words.

Some have linked the notion of verbal inspiration with inerrancy and infallibility (see Inspiration and Inerrancy), but it is significant that, while Luther can speak of the Bible as "the Holy Spirit's very own book," with "God . . . in every syllable," he can also affirm that mistakes and inconsistencies do not affect the heart of the gospel. "The Holy Spirit," he affirms, "has an eye only to the substance and is not bound by words." We may agree that inspiration is no guarantee against human fallibility, nor does it affirm uniformity in quality and authority. There are levels in the scriptures: the kernel is encased in a shell; the baby lies in a manger.

Approaches to Biblical Authority. In early Christianity, the scriptures were used "for teaching, for reproof, for correction, and for training in righteousness" (2 Tim. 3.16). In the West, during the Dark Ages and the Middle Ages, the documents were viewed as the raw materials of *revelation, a veritable mine of doctrinal statements. Isolated verses could be picked at random and used for the authoritative establishment of dogma. The Bible was often used as a sourcebook for the support of ecclesiastical doctrine, but scriptural authority was largely subordinated to the authority of the church. Contradictions in the text were smoothed out by an elaborate and even overly subtle system of allegorical interpretations. (See also Interpretation, History of, article on Christian Interpretation from the Middle Ages to the Reformation.)

The Reformation saw the overthrow of ecclesiastical power structures, and scripture seemed to be substituted for the church. The revival of learning was instrumental in initiating intensive biblical study. Luther saw the Bible as "the crib in which Christ lay," a sacrament by which the living God addressed the individual soul. "All sound books agree in this, that they witness to Christ," he said. "That which does not preach Christ is not apostolic though it came from St. Peter or St. Paul. Contrariwise that which preaches Christ would be apostolic even though it came from Judas or Annas or Pilate or Herod." Luther also declared that the truth of God's self-revelation through scripture was written "inwardly in our hearts" by the Holy Spirit. This point was subsequently taken up by John Calvin (1509–64), who wrote of the "inner witness of the Holy Spirit," leading to the conviction that not only was the Bible an authentic, dependable record of God's encounter with humanity in the past but also the means of his contemporary encounter with us. At the same time, his position suggested that it is not possible to prove that God speaks through the scriptures.

It was the post-Reformation period that saw the rise of a kind of *fundamentalism, in which emphasis was laid on the very words of scripture and concerns about infallibility and inerrancy arose. Bibles were now more readily available, and "scripture alone" (sola scriptura) became a clarion call. What was often forgotten was that the principles of interpretation followed created a tradition of their own.

Liberal criticism of the Bible in the nineteenth century seemed to many to undermine the authority that had been attached to scripture. It appeared to turn the Bible into an ordinary collection of Near Eastern documents that had to be placed within their own historical contexts.

A different approach is undertaken by Karl Barth (1886–1968) and "*biblical theology," in which stress is laid on the act of proclamation, within which the Bible becomes the word of God. The Bible is not identified with past revelation but bears witness to a revelation in the past, as it becomes the means of hearing the voice of God today.

Contemporary thought also emphasizes the empirical test and accepts that God does speak through the scriptures and that faith is nourished by it. Charismatic movements hold that the Bible comes alive through the action of the Holy Spirit. The words become a vehicle through which a vivid awareness of the presence and activity of God is developed.

An unwarranted authority would be attributed to the Bible if the words were stressed and the human origins of the documents neglected. Just as in Christology the church rejected a docetic viewpoint that tried to support the assertion of Christ's divinity by denying the full reality of his humanity, so, with the Bible, it is important to reject an equation with the divine word, which neglects the very human character of the words of its authors. If the Bible were precisely the *word of God, questions of authority would not arise and one would expect an immediately recognizable meaning within the words of scriptures. The biblical language that speaks of the dynamic character of the word suggests that it is preferable to speak of the Bible as conveying or mediating the word of God. This then points to the experience of the community of faith through the centuries. To treat the Bible simply as a compendium of ancient literature and to limit oneself to a critical, historical analysis of its contents would be a denial of believers' experience that in the Bible they have found the word of God addressing them with "transforming and liberating power," as Thomas Merton put it. The words of scripture take on the character of the preacher who bears witness to the reality of what has been experienced. There is a need, then, for a mediating position between a fundamentalism that almost invites a worship of the Bible instead of the God of the Bible and a purely rationalistic exegesis. A claim to discover God's word and so God's own authority within the Bible must not obscure the truth of the humanity and so the limitations of its authors. Different authors have different styles, interests, and emphases and express their convictions in different ways; their language and mode of expression are not ageless. And what is true of the writers is also true of the reader. If Christianity is a religion of the spirit rather than of the letter (see 2 Cor. 3.6), we should expect a degree of variety in interpretation. There must be a subjective element in interpretation just as there was in the writing. The more one brings of human experience, spiritual sensitivity, and common sense to the Bible, the more one will get from it. And, since life is lived in community, so the experiences and insights of others illuminate the understanding of the individual reader. Finally, the biblical message is addressed to the whole person and not simply to the intellect. Hence, to recognize the authority of the Bible is to respond to the imperatives made by the God of the Bible. For ultimately what is looked for is an encounter not with language but with a person.

Avenger of Blood. In ancient Israel, as in tribal societies in general, the members of the clan were responsible for avenging the death of innocent victims. Unavenged *blood cries out to the Lord (Gen. 4.10). Innocent blood defiles the land and must be expiated (Num. 35.31–34), and this is the duty of the avenger.

As government became more centralized, the prerogative of blood revenge was slowly taken out of the hands of the clan. Under the monarchy it appears that the king had the power to intervene and even to grant immunity from the avenger (2 Sam. 14.8–11), but the right of "blood redemption" remained a sacred duty. In Roman times the Jews were no longer permitted to carry out blood revenge (John 18.31). According to Paul, it is not the duty of the individual but that of the state to avenge evil on behalf of God (Rom. 13.4; cf. Ps. 9.12; 2 Kings 9.7; Rev. 19.2).

The execution of a criminal by the authorized authorities did not of course call for blood revenge, nor did the killing of a person in self-defense. Only *murder and involuntary homicide demanded it. Even a homicidal beast was considered bloodguilty and had to be stoned (Exod. 21.28–32). The next of kin, usually the nearest male relative, who put a person who committed homicide to death, was called "the redeemer of blood" (Num. 35.19: Hebr. gō'ēl haddām; cf. the use of gō'el in Ruth 3.9–4.8; see Redeem).

For those who accidentally killed an innocent person there were provisions of asylum. The *altar of Yahweh was such a refuge (Exod. 21.12–14; 1 Kings 1.50–53; 2.28–34). More important were the Levitical *cities of refuge, three on either side of Jordan, to which the person who killed someone accidentally could flee (Num. 35.6–15). Those guilty of murder had no refuge but were to be executed after a judicial inquiry (Deut. 19.11–13). Since life was viewed as sacred (Gen. 9.6), no amount of money could be given as recompense for the loss of the life of an innocent person; it had to be "life for life" (Exod. 21.23; Deut. 19.21). By observing this law of retribution Israel was spared violence and endless blood feuds.

Azariah, The Prayer of, and the Song of the Three Young Men. The Greek translation (*Septuagint) of the book of *Daniel inserts between vv. 23 and 24 of chap. 3 a section embracing sixty-eight verses, which is not found in the Semitic original; this section is seen by Protestants as one of the Apocrypha, but is considered deuterocanonical by Roman Catholics and some Orthodox churches (see Apocrypha, article on Jewish Apocrypha). It consists of a brief connecting narrative (vv. 1–2, 23–28) and two (or perhaps more correctly three) poems of liturgical character. The poems purport to be the words recited or sung by the three young men whom King *Nebuchadrezzar caused to be thrown into a fiery furnace when they refused to worship the golden image that he had set up.

The first of the poems is in the form of a *prayer and is placed upon the lips of Azariah, the Hebrew name of the youth also called by his Babylonian name, Abednego (Dan. 1.6–7). The prayer is not specifically appropriate to the situation of the fiery furnace, being simply a national lament like Psalms 74 and 79, which are petitions for the deliverance of Israel after the destruction of the Jerusalem Temple. The prayer differs from these psalms by stating that the disaster was a justified punishment for the sins of the nation (vv. 5–8), an emphasis quite incongruous with the situation of the young men, who were being punished precisely for their religious integrity. The concluding verses of the prayer (19–22) would be suitable for anyone suffering oppression and are doubtless the reason the prayer was felt to be suitable.

The much longer poem that begins in verse 29 also is irrelevant to the particular situation of the youths, except for v. 66, which may well have been added when the hymn was interpolated into the book of Daniel. It falls naturally into two parts, which may originally have constituted two separate hymns. They are known in the liturgical tradition of the Western church as, respectively, the Benedictus es and the Benedicite, from the opening words of the Latin version of each. The first consists of general words of praise addressed to God in his glory; in the second section (vv. 35–68) the various parts of creation, the heavens, the forces of nature below them, and the inhabitants of earth are summoned to join in a chorus of praise, following a pattern established by Psalm 148. The whole of verses 29–68 is unified by a refrain repeated after each line, somewhat in the manner of Psalm 136, but with an appropriately different form in each of the two parts.

It has plausibly been suggested that the reason for the introduction of this material in the middle of Daniel 3 was to correct the inartistic and perhaps religiously offensive emphasis of the original text on King Nebuchadrezzar and his reactions; the addition of the prayer and the hymns transfers the center of attention from the Babylonian king to the God of Israel and his faithful worshipers.

There are no unambiguous clues to the language in which this material was composed, but the general tone and atmosphere of the prayer and the hymn(s) suggest that it was *Hebrew, and this impression is reinforced by the fact that Hebrew was the normal language of prayer among Jews. Their lack of specific appropriateness to the situation of the three young men suggests that they were previously independent compositions arbitrarily inserted by an editor who then composed the brief narrative section, perhaps in *Aramaic, which is the language of this part of Daniel. It would follow, then, that the place of composition would likely be Palestine and the author a Palestinian Jew. The same set of suppositions would hold for the editor who introduced the poems into the book and produced the Semitic text from which the Greek translation was made.

With regard to the date of composition of the poems, there is also no clear evidence, except for v. 15, which speaks of the absence of civil government and the cessation of Temple worship. In their present context, of course, the words are intended to apply to the putative situation of the youths in the Babylonian *exile, but they would be even more appropriate in the early second century BCE when Antiochus Epiphanes desecrated the *Temple (164 BCE; 1 Macc. 1.20–61) and when, indeed, there was no prophet or native government.

Azazel. Appears only in the *Day of Atonement ritual in Leviticus 16. Two goats were designated by lot (16.8), one for the Lord and one for Azazel, perhaps the name of a *demon. The Lord's goat became a sacrificial sin-offering, while the scapegoat was sent into the *wilderness after *Aaron placed his hands on it and confessed the people's sins (16.21). The latter verse uses three words for *sin, but does not mention impurity (unlike 16.16). Thus, the scapegoat ritual is for sins alone, and reveals the sacrificial cult's inability to achieve complete atonement by itself.

Some scholars suspect that the scapegoat was added to the chapter; if so, it has been well integrated into the text. In 16.17, Aaron makes atonement "for the assembly of Israel," making the scapegoat seem unnecessary. Yet it was necessary: this involves the riddance of something profoundly unwanted. The sin offering could not carry the sins away like the scapegoat. The magical Azazel ritual assured that the sins were sent away.

The *Septuagint rendered Azazel as "sending away." In the Ethiopian book of *Enoch, Azazel is a fallen *angel. The Midrash and many modern commentators see Azazel as the demon to whom the scapegoat was sent. In the *Mishnah, the practice was to throw the scapegoat over a cliff; the rabbis derived from this an etymology, accepted by some (NEB: Azazel = "precipice"). Scholars have proposed other etymologies, but the origin and meaning of Azazel remain uncertain. PHILIP STERN

Baal. A common Semitic word meaning "owner, lord, husband." As "lord" it is applied to various *Canaanite gods, such as the Baal of Peor (Num. 25.3) and the Baals (Judg. 2.11), which were largely local manifestations of the storm god Baal. Although the head of the Canaanite pantheon was El, Baal was the most important god because of his association with the storms that annually brought revival of vegetation and fertility. Baal is prominent in the great complex of fifteenth century BCE *Ugaritic epics, where he is called son of *Dagon and is named some 250 times, sometimes interchangeably with Hadad, the widely known Semitic storm god whose symbol, like Baal's, was the bull.

In art, Baal is depicted as the storm god Aliyan ("triumphant") Baal, who holds a thunderbolt in one hand and swings a mace with the other. Baal is the champion of divine order over earthly chaos—over deadly drought, represented by the deity Mot ("death"), and the unruly forces of the sea (the god Yamm). The Ugaritic epics tell how Baal defeats these powers and wins the title "rider on the clouds" (the same title ascribed to the God of Israel in Ps. 68.4).

The theme of opposition to Baal worship runs throughout the *Deuteronomic literature and the *prophets. By the ninth century BCE, Baalism had deeply pervaded Israelite life. Personal names formed with Baal appear already in the time of the Judges (6.25–32). Even *Saul and *David had sons with Baal names (1 Chron. 8.33; 14.7). Intense conflict appeared with the introduction of the Baal of Tyre into Israel by *Ahab's queen, *Jezebel, daughter of Ethbaal of Sidon (1 Kings 16.31–32; 18.17–19). Even as late as the time of *Manasseh, altars to Baal were still among the appointments in the Jerusalem *Temple (2 Kings 21.2–4).

Opposition to Baalism was led by Israel's prophets. The fertility rites associated with Baal worship corrupted the faith in Yahweh, and the *myths undergirding them wrongly deified aspects of *nature. The prophets endeavored to show Yahweh as a transcendent, universal God who provides rains and fertility yet who is no "nature god" trapped in unvarying seasonal cycles. Because *agriculture was so vital and so precariously dependent on the weather, it became important to show that Yahweh, not Baal, was the one who rode the clouds, controlled the storms, and brought freshening rains (Pss. 29; 68.4, 9; 104.3). That the struggle against Baalism was finally successful is signalled by the replacement of the Baal element in some proper names by the word bōšet ("shame"; 2 Sam. 2.8; cf. Hos. 9.10).

Baal-zebub. The *Phoenician god at Ekron consulted by King Ahaziah (2 Kings 1.2–18). The name in Hebrew means "Lord of Flies," but no evidence exists for a *Philistine god who either drove off flies or gave oracles through their buzzing. The Hebrew form is probably a derogatory transformation of Baal-zebul, which appears in *Ugaritic texts meaning "Lord *Baal," but could also be understood as "Master of the Heavenly House" (cf. Matt. 10.25). In *Aramaic, Beel-zebul may have been construed as "Lord of Dung," Beel-zebub possibly as "Enemy." During the Greco-Roman period, Beel-zebul came to be used for a leader among the *demons opposed to God. Jesus denies that he casts out demons by authority of Beelzebul, the ruler of demons (Matt. 12.24–27 par.). Some translations employ Beelzebub in the New Testament passages, following the text of 2 Kings. Christian interpreters identified Beelzebul with *Satan on the basis of the Gospel passages.

Babel, Tower of. Babel is the Hebrew word for *Babylon, which the Babylonians themselves explained as meaning "gate of God." This etymology is probably not original, but the meaning is significant for a famous city whose central temple tower was said to reach the heavens (Gen.

11.4). In Genesis 11.9 the meaning of Babel is explained by the Hebrew verb bālal, "to confuse, mix," and the confusion of speech.

The brief narrative in Genesis 11.1–9 also explains how there could exist such a variety of languages among the earth's people. The understanding that the earliest humans shared a common language is found in the *Sumerian Enmerkar Epic (141–46). Genesis 11.1–9 tells how *Noah's descendants wandered to the plain of Shinar (Babylonia), where they perfected the techniques for monumental brick architecture and built the renowned tower of Babel. Building the tower is interpreted as an act of arrogance, and human history is here understood to take a decisive turn from a common thread to many strands as God descends to confuse human speech and scatter the people all over the earth.

The enormous *ziggurats of Mesopotamia could easily have symbolized the presumptuousness of the urban elite, and their ruin the judgment of God. Even as ruins their massive dimensions would have been striking. The Sumerian temple tower of the moon god Nanna at *Ur could have been the model for the tower of Babel. This huge terraced mountain of brick, with the god's temple on top, at least 21 m (70 ft) above ground level, was built ca. 2100 BCE. Of similar construction, the great temple of Marduk in Babylon, the E-sagila, is possibly the referent of the Genesis narrative; according to the Babylonian epic Enuma Elish (6.60–62), it took a year just to make the bricks for this colossally high structure. DAVID G. BURKE

Babylon (Map 2:H4). Babylon is the rendering of Akkadian Babilum (Babilim), the city that for centuries served as capital of the "land of Babylon" (Jer. 50.28). Cuneiform sources interpret its name as bāb-ilim, "gate of the deity." The Bible rejected this popular etymology in favor of a more scurrilous one that linked the name to the confusion of tongues (Gen. 11.9, Hebr. bālal, "[God] confused"), and so the city is called Babel.

Not until around 1900 BCE did an independent dynasty establish itself at Babylon. Like most of their contemporaries, its rulers bore Amorite (Northwest Semitic) names, but unlike some of them, they enjoyed lengthy reigns, passing the succession from father to son without a break; this may have helped Babylon survive its rivals in the period of warring states (ca. 1860–1760 BCE). Under the adroit *Hammurapi (ca. 1792–1750 BCE), Babylon succeeded in restoring the unity of Mesopotamia under its own hegemony.

Babylon's triumph was short-lived, though: under its next king, Samsu-iluna (ca. 1749–1712 BCE), the extreme south was lost to the new Sealand Dynasty and the north to the Kassites at Hana. About 1600 BCE, the city itself was sacked by an invading army of Hittites from distant Anatolia (modern Turkey), and these rivals took it over, the Sealanders only briefly, but the Kassites for almost half a millennium (ca. 1590–1160 BCE).

It remained for the Second Dynasty of Isin (ca. 1156–1025 BCE) to restore Babylon to its earlier prominence. The recapture of the cult statue of Marduk from Elamite captivity by Nebuchadrezzar I (ca. 1124–1103 BCE) probably capped this development. Babylon was henceforth regarded as the heir to the millennial traditions of the ancient Sumerian centers of cult and culture. Marduk, the local patron deity of Babylon, was endowed with the attributes of the ancient Sumerian deities of those centers—notably Enki of Eridu and Enlil of Nippur—and exalted to the head of the pantheon. This exaltation was celebrated in new compositions such as enūma elish ("when above"; conventionally known as the "Babylonian Epic of Creation") and can be compared in certain respects with the exaltation of the God of Israel as celebrated in the roughly contemporary Song of the Sea (Exod. 15).

In the early first millennium, Babylon could not sustain a military and political posture to match these cultural and religious pretensions, and it gradually declined into the status of a vassal state to *Assyria, the powerful neighbor to the north. Occasional alliances with Elam in the east or, notably under Marduk-apal-iddina II (the biblical Merodach-baladan), with Judah in the west (2 Kings 20.12–19; cf. Isa. 39), provided brief periods of precarious independence. The city was devastated by the Assyrian king *Sennacherib (704–681 BCE) not long after his abortive siege of *Jerusalem in 701 BCE (2 Kings 18.13–19.37; cf. Isa. 36–37). It was restored by that king's son and successor Esarhaddon (680–669 BCE), only to be caught up again in the violent civil war (652–648 BCE) between the two sons of Esarhaddon that pitted Shamash-shum-ukin of Babylonia against Assurbanipal of Assyria. The resultant weakening of the Assyrian empire no doubt helped clear the path for the accession of the last and in some ways greatest Babylonian dynasty, that of the Chaldeans, sometimes referred to as the Tenth Babylonian Dynasty (625–539 BCE).

With this restoration, Babylon ranked as one of the major cities, indeed, in Greek eyes, as one or even two of the seven wonders of the ancient world, by virtue of its walls in some accounts and invariably for its famous "hanging gardens." The gardens were more likely the work of Marduk-apal-iddina II than of *Nebuchadrezzar II (as claimed by Berossos in one Hellenistic tradition), but the latter certainly rebuilt the city most grandly during his forty-four-year reign (605–562 BCE). He is remembered in biblical historiography as the conqueror of Jerusalem in 597 and 587/586 BCE (2 Kings 24–25; cf. 2 Chron. 36). The biblical record is supported and supplemented by the Babylonian Chronicle and other cuneiform documents. But the stories told in the book of Daniel about Nebuchadrezzar (especially chap. 4), as well as about *Belshazzar (chap. 5), should rather be referred to Nabonidus, who proved to be not only the last king of the dynasty (555–539 BCE) but the last ruler of any independent polity in Babylon. The city surrendered to *Cyrus the Persian in a bloodless takeover and thereafter, while continuing as a metropolis of the successive Achaemenid, Seleucid, and Parthian empires, ceased to play an independent role in ancient politics.

In the Bible, Babylon plays a dual role, positively as the setting for a potentially creative diaspora, negatively as a metaphor for certain forms of degeneracy. The "Babylonian exile" imposed by Nebuchadrezzar on the Judeans removed the center of Jewish life to Babylon for fifty or sixty years, if not the seventy predicted by the prophet Jeremiah (Jer. 29.10, cf. 2 Chron. 36.21). The exiled king Jehoiachin was released from prison by Nebuchadrezzar's son and successor Amel-Marduk, the Evil-merodach of 2 Kings 25.27 (cf. Jer. 52.31), and provided for from the royal stores, as indicated also by cuneiform sources. Jeremiah wrote to the exiles in God's name, advising them to enjoy the positive aspects of life in Babylon and to pray for its welfare (Jer. 29.4–7; contrast Ps. 122.6). Ezekiel lived among the exiles and prepared them for the restoration, while Second Isaiah welcomed the arrival of Cyrus (Isa. 44.28–45.1), which paved the way for the return of those exiles who chose to accept his proclamation (2 Chron. 36.22f.; Ezra 1.1–3).

Under Persian rule, Babylon continued to flourish as the seat of one of the most important satrapies of the Persian empire (cf. Ezra 7.16; Dan. 2.49; etc.), and the Achaemenid Artaxerxes I could still be called "king of Babylon" (Neh. 13.6). The Jews who chose to remain there enjoyed considerable prosperity, as indicated by business documents from nearby Nippur in which individuals identified as Judeans or bearing Jewish names (in Hebrew or Aramaic) engage in various agricultural and commercial activities. The foundations were thus laid for the creative role that Babylonia was to play in the Jewish life of the postbiblical period.

The Bible also reflects a negative view of Babylon. Already in the primeval history, the *tower of Babel (Gen. 11.1–9) uses the traditional *ziggurat present in each city of *Sumer as a metaphor for the excesses of human ambition that led to, and accounted for, the confusion of tongues and dispersion of peoples. The Psalmists emphasized the negative aspects of exile (Ps. 137), and the fall of the "arrogant" city (Jer. 50.31) and "its sinners" (Isa. 13.9) was predicted confidently, even gleefully, by the prophets. In the New Testament, Babylon became the epitome of wickedness (Rev. 17.5) and a symbolic name for Rome (Rev. 17–18; cf. 1 Pet. 5.13).

WILLIAM W. HALLO

Balaam. A non-Israelite *prophet who figures most prominently in the narratives of Numbers 22–24; there is also a lengthy prophecy of the same Balaam in the text from Deir ʿAllā in the Jordan Valley dating to around 700 BCE.

The Bible evaluates Balaam's character in two quite different ways. On the one hand, Balaam is often portrayed as an example of an evil diviner who would sell his prophetic powers to the highest bidder, often in conflict with God's will (Num. 31.8, 16; Deut. 23.4–5; Josh. 13.22; 24.9–10; Neh. 13.2; Mic. 6.5; 2 Pet. 2.15; Jude 11; Rev 2.14). In a particularly humorous scene, Numbers 22.21–35 makes fun of Balaam's powers as a seer; he is repeatedly unable to see the divine messenger that even his donkey can see.

On the other hand, Numbers 22–24 as a whole portrays Balaam in a favorable light. When the *Moabite king Balak hires Balaam to curse his enemy Israel as they cross his territory on the way to the *Promised Land, Balaam replies piously that as a prophet he can speak only the words that God gives to him (Num. 22.18; see also Num. 24.13).

On four occasions when Balak asks Balaam to curse the Israelites, Balaam instead obeys God and speaks only words of great blessing upon Israel. The most famous of these oracles of blessing includes a prophecy about a great future king or *messiah of Israel. The oracle may originally have applied to *David, but later it was interpreted as the promise of a ruler who would come as a deliverer in the end time. Using royal images, Balaam proclaims, "A star shall come out of Jacob, and a scepter shall rise out of Israel" (Num. 24.17); this text probably underlies the account of the star followed by the *Magi (Matt. 2.1–12).

A passage from Balaam's final oracle was quoted in the first telegraph message: "What hath God wrought!" (Num. 23.23 KJV).

Ban. The Hebrew word ḥērem is generally translated "ban" or "devoted (thing)" and means something set apart as belonging to Yahweh and therefore forbidden for profane use; the English word "harem" is derived from the Arabic cognate. It may refer to something set apart for cultic use (Lev. 27.21, 28), to be used only by priests, and thus understood as being holy. The word is also used in accounts of the early wars of Israel to mean the war booty, also understood as devoted to Yahweh and therefore not to be used by the Israelites. In victory nothing is to be spared; Israel must "utterly destroy" (Hebr. ḥḥrm) everything (Deut. 7.2; 20.16–17; etc.). It is this notion of the ban that characterizes the narratives of the *conquest in *Joshua (e.g., 6.17–18).

The story of the rejection of *Saul as king of Israel in 1 Samuel 15 provides a vivid example of the ban. Yahweh commands Saul through *Samuel to utterly destroy the *Amalekites, "man and woman, child and infant, ox and sheep, camel and donkey" (v. 3). When Saul spares the king, Agag, and the best of the possessions of the Amalekites, he is pictured as having failed to obey Yahweh concerning the ban, and as a consequence Yahweh repents of having made Saul king over Israel. The story ends with Samuel taking his sword and hewing Agag to pieces, thus obeying the command to destroy utterly everything devoted to Yahweh.

The institution of the ban was not unique in Israel; the same terminology is used by the Moabite king Mesha (see Moabite Stone, The), and analogous practices are attested elsewhere.

Baptism. A term first appearing in the New Testament as a purification ritual used by an unorthodox Jewish figure named *John (the Baptist). All four Gospels and the book of Acts describe him "preaching a baptism of repentance for the forgiveness of sins" (Mark 1.4; Luke 3.3).

Scholars have speculated how John's mission might be related to other Jewish separatist groups such as the *Qumran community, but exact origins remain unclear. There is abundant evidence that lustral bathing was an important aspect of Greco-Roman religions, especially related to healing divinities such as Asklepius. In the Hebrew Bible, cleansing with *water is an important part of purification rites, especially after sexual activity or contact with a corpse (Lev. 15.18, Num. 19.13; see Purity, Ritual). John the Baptist calls for a more general repentance symbolized by baptism.

The report that *Jesus himself was baptized in the *Jordan by John (Mark 1.9–11) raises the possibility that Jesus was a disciple of John who broke off and started his own movement. It is clear that later followers of Jesus were concerned about this perception. Matthew's gospel includes a dialogue in which John recognizes Jesus' spiritual superiority and baptizes him reluctantly only after Jesus insists (Matt. 3.13–17). Luke goes a step further by excluding John from the account of Jesus' baptism (Luke 3.21) and telling the story of John's imprisonment immediately before the event takes place (Luke 3.19–20). Thus, in Luke, Jesus is baptized, but the story line indicates that the baptism could not have been performed by John.

In the Gospels, John is of interest only as he is related to the ministry of Jesus (Mark 1.2–3, 7–9; Matt. 3.11–12; Luke 3.15–17), but the baptism symbol used by John becomes a central image for the developing churches. Matthew's gospel concludes with the charge to "make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit" (Matt. 28.19). The book of Acts elaborates further when *Peter says to the crowd gathered on *Pentecost, "Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ so that your sins may be forgiven" (Acts 2.38).

Baptism in Acts takes place immediately after someone comes to believe in Christ, and it is usually followed by receiving the *Holy Spirit. This two-stage process is founded on the contrast between John's water baptism and "being baptized by the Holy Spirit" (Acts 1.5; cf. Mark 1.8; Matt. 3.11; Luke 3.16; John 1.33). It is so important that the leaders of the Jerusalem church send Peter and John to *lay hands on believers in *Samaria who had "only been baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus," after which they receive the Holy Spirit (Acts 8.14–17). The situation is reversed when the *gentiles of Cornelius's house come to believe. They receive the Holy Spirit and speak in tongues as a sign of God's acceptance of gentile converts (see Glossolalia), so Peter asks, "Can anyone withhold the water for baptizing these people who have received the Holy Spirit just as we have?" (Acts 10.44–48).

*Paul's letters provide the earliest evidence about baptism among the Jesus followers. It is striking, therefore, that Paul makes no mention of John the Baptist or of baptism and receiving the Holy Spirit as a dual process. Paul sees that the person who has been baptized is "in Christ," no longer subject to the divisions of human society (Gal. 3.27), and part of a unified body (1 Cor. 12.13; cf. Eph. 4.5). Emphasis is on the state that has been achieved, not the way in which it has been accomplished. In fact, Paul is concerned that the Corinthians are putting too much stake in the person by whom they were baptized, and he is grateful that he baptized only a few of them: "For Christ did not send me to baptize but to proclaim the gospel" (1 Cor. 1.17).

In 1 Corinthians 15, Paul is using every possible argument to convince his readers that a resurrection of the dead will take place. In doing so he asks why people are baptized on behalf of the dead if there will be no resurrection (15.29). This brief allusion indicates that within the early churches it was possible to receive baptism in order to include in the body of Christ a friend or relative who was already dead. Paul does not specifically condemn the practice here, but it did not become an accepted part of Christian ritual.

Paul equates baptism symbolically with the death of Jesus (Rom. 6.3–4, cf. Col. 2.12), and he insists that rituals such as baptism are not spiritual guarantees, since God was not pleased with the Hebrews even though they went through a proto-baptism with *Moses at the *Red Sea (1 Cor. 10.1–5). This latter point is also made in the letter to the *Hebrews (9.9–10), while 1 *Peter contends that the story of Noah's *ark prefigures the saving value of baptism (1 Pet. 3.21).

The New Testament evidence is used in debating later Christian baptismal practice, but it is rarely definitive. Certainly the majority of people who are baptized in the New Testament are adults who are entering the community. The exception might be children included in some of the households baptized in Acts (11.14; 16.15, 33). The baptism of infants became a more routine practice within the church as the doctrine of original sin became more widely accepted.

Another controversy concerns baptism by immersion or by the sprinkling of water on the participant. The descriptions of specific New Testament baptisms indicate that the person being baptized was dipped under the water. Jesus is said to come out of the water (Mark 1.10; Matt. 3.16), while Philip and the Ethiopian eunuch go down into the water (Acts 8.38). Going under the water also fits best with the image of being buried with Christ in baptism (Col. 2.12). At the same time baptisms in the New Testament are not described in specific terms, so diverse interpretations and practices develop.

Baptist, John the. See John the Baptist.

Barabbas. Outside the Gospels nothing is known of Barabbas. His name is *Aramaic and means "son of the father" (*Abba), ironically denoting the status given exclusively to Jesus. Barabbas was imprisoned for robbery (John 18.40) or for insurrection and murder (Mark 15.7; Luke 23.19), crimes not uncommon in the turbulent Palestine of the first century CE. In the account of the trial of Jesus, the Roman prefect Pontius *Pilate is portrayed sympathetically, finding no fault in Jesus and recognizing that Jewish priests plotted his arrest. Following a *Passover custom unknown outside the Gospels, Pilate offered to free a Jewish prisoner and suggested Jesus, but the crowd (in John, "the Jews") demanded that Pilate release Barabbas and crucify Jesus. This helped establish a negative attitude toward Jews in Christian tradition (see Anti-Semitism).

GREGORY SHAW

Barnabas. Acts describes Joseph "Barnabas" as a Hellenized Jew from Cyprus who played a leading role in the gentile mission. The apostles call this Joseph "son of encouragement" when he makes a large donation to the Jerusalem church (Acts 4.36–37). Barnabas introduces Saul (*Paul) to Jesus' original apostles in Acts 9.27 and journeys to *Antioch in Acts 11.22–24 as their representative.

In the letter to the *Galatians, Paul describes how he and Barnabas were given "the right hand of fellowship" by the Jerusalem leadership and had their mission to the gentiles approved (Gal. 2.9; cf. Acts 15). Acts portrays Barnabas as Paul's senior partner in evangelizing Cyprus and Iconium (Acts 13.1–3; 14.1, 14) until their split over the role of John Mark (15.36–41: probably the Mark called Barnabas's cousin in Col. 4.10). Although Barnabas plays no further role in the New Testament, the second-century Epistle of Barnabas is written in his name.

PHILIP SELLEW

Bartholomew. A follower of Jesus and one of the *Twelve (Mark 3.18 par.). Other than his *Aramaic name, which means "son of Tolmai," nothing is recorded about him in the New Testament. Because Nathanael is not mentioned in the *synoptic Gospels, and Bartholomew does not occur in the gospel of John, but both are linked with *Philip, it has been suggested that they are the same person, in which case Bartholomew would be Nathanael's patronymic. Later tradition ascribes an apocryphal gospel to Bartholomew and describes his missionary activities in Egypt, Persia, India, and Armenia, where he was reportedly martyred by being flayed alive. Hence he is the patron of tanners.

MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Baruch. Son of Neriah, the scribe of *Jeremiah (see, e.g., Jer. 36.4–5, 32) and the purported author of the book of Baruch (Bar. 1.1; see next entry). The name is a shortened form of names like Berechiah and Barachel; all three forms are well attested in biblical and extrabiblical sources. In its full form Baruch's name also occurs on a clay seal impression (bulla) from the late seventh century BCE. The full inscription reads "[belonging] to Berechiah, son of Neriah, the scribe" and is a relatively rare example of the occurrence of the name of a biblical person in a nonbiblical source from the individual's own time. Other bullae from the same period name Seriah, Baruch's brother (Jer. 51.59), and Gemariah, son of Shaphan (Jer. 36.12). MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Baruch, The Book of. According to the Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox churches, this book, which purports to be the work of *Baruch, Jeremiah's friend and secretary (Jer. 32.12–16; 36.4–32; 45), is a work of canonical scripture, but Protestants include it among the *Apocrypha. For Jews it is no more important than any other pseudepigraphical writing from antiquity. As even the casual reader will note, it is divided into at least three distinct parts (1.1–3.8; 3.9–4.4; 4.5–5.9), each with its characteristic style and point of view. This observation leads naturally to the view that Baruch is not a unified composition, but a compendium of works from several authors. The only unifying factor is the supposed common background of the Babylonian *exile.

The first part (1.1–3.8) is in prose and tells how Baruch, in Babylon, composed a prayer of confession and petition (1.15–3.8), which he read to the deposed king, Jeconiah (or Jehoiachin; 2 Kings 24.8–17), and the other exiles. The prayer was then sent to Jerusalem, with an explanatory letter (1.10–14) giving directions as to when it should be used. The second part (3.9–4.4) is a poem in the style of the *wisdom literature, in which Israel is reproached for having forsaken the wisdom that God had given her, which is then identified with the Mosaic Law, the *Torah (4.1; see Sir. 24.23). This act of apostasy is said to explain Israel's unhappy lot in exile. The third part (4.5–5.9) is a poem, partly in the style of Isaiah 40–66, encouraging the exiles to believe that God will not only deliver them but provide for them a glorious future. Characteristic of this poem is the repeated exhortation, "Take courage" (4.5, 21, 27, 30). In the first part of Baruch, the deity is frequently referred to by the title "Lord" (equivalent to Hebrew "Yahweh" or "Adonai"); the title does not occur in the rest of the book. In the third part, God is several times described as "the Everlasting" (e.g., 4.10, 14; 5.2). The *Letter of Jeremiah, although plainly a separate book, is included in Baruch as chap. 6 by the *Vulgate and by translations dependent upon it, as well as by Luther and the King James Verson.

The usual critical questions of date, authorship, original language, and provenance must be raised in connection with each of the individual parts of the book, though evidence with which to answer them is on the whole rather sparse. The date of the completed work is obviously later than that of the latest of its component parts.

The explicit claim that Baruch is the author appears only in the opening verses (1.1–10), but the context in which it appears is marked by such imprecision and demonstrable error that it can hardly be taken seriously. The fact that the book was never accepted into the Jewish canon is strong evidence against any part of it being the work of Baruch, Jeremiah's companion. Modern commentators are almost unanimous in regarding this attribution as fictitious and the work as a typical *pseudepigraphon.

All extant texts and versions of Baruch are based upon the Greek of the *Septuagint. Nevertheless, scholars are generally convinced, on the basis of internal evidence, that the original language was *Hebrew or *Aramaic, most probably the former. A frequently quoted example of the kind of evidence for this is found in 3.4, where the inappropriate word "dead," if translated back into Hebrew, would be represented by a word, almost identical in appearance, that means "men" (NRSV: "people"), which is almost certainly the correct reading, the difference being a single vowel. The assumption is that the Greek translator, using a Hebrew text without vowels, misinterpreted the form. Baruch, moreover, is full of Hebrew constructions and turns of phrase.

If the book was written in Hebrew (or even Aramaic), it follows that the various authors were Palestinian Jews, and there is no evidence to controvert that supposition. The first and last sections of the book have close affinities with prophetic traditions, but the middle section (3.9–4.4) is unmistakably a product of traditional Israelite wisdom, with obvious points of contact with works such as *Job and *Sirach (Ecclesiasticus), but not with the more Hellenistic *Wisdom of Solomon. The author of this section must have been a "wise man" of the type of Ben Sira. While the dates of the various sections of the book cannot be determined with any precision, most scholars would date them within the second or early first century BCE. The parallels alleged between the prayer that begins in 2.6 and the similar prayer in Daniel 9 have sometimes been adduced to date at least this section later than the Maccabean revolt of 164 BCE, with which the book of *Daniel is certainly connected; unfortunately, through, even this evidence can be interpreted in a variety of ways.

Despite the ostensible setting of Baruch in the Babylonian exile, its purpose seems to have been to bring a message of reconciliation and hope to the worldwide Jewish community of the Hellenistic period, in which exile, in a sense, had become permanent. The book is not marked by any great originality of thought, and its language is undistinguished and filled with expressions derived from older literature. This no doubt explains the relatively few references to it in early Christian writers. The one passage that had special significance for the church is 3.37, where the subject of the words "appeared on earth" was mistakenly taken to be God rather than *Wisdom (the passage is so translated in the Vulgate and Peshitta) and the verse was therefore understood as a prophecy of the *incarnation. From the historical point of view, 4.1 provides important confirmatory evidence of the growing tendency to identify the personified *Wisdom (see Proverbs 8 and 9) with the *Torah.

In addition to this book of Baruch, several other books of that name were at one time in circulation, of which by far the most important is an apocalypse in Syriac, often designated as 2 Baruch and generally dated late in the first century CE.

Bathsheba. Wife of King *David, mother of *Solomon. Bathsheba was the wife of Uriah the Hittite, one of David's "mighty men" (2 Sam. 23.39), but she became David's wife after David killed Uriah to cover up his affair with her (2 Sam. 11). God's displeasure over the affair is seen when the child conceived in the affair dies as an infant (2 Sam. 12.14–23). However, Solomon, David and Bathsheba's fourth child (2 Sam. 5.14; 1 Chron. 3.5), succeeds David to the throne. Solomon's successful bid for the throne is attributed in part to the efforts of Bathsheba, who apparently had risen to the status of *queen mother (1 Kings 1.11–31).

Behemoth. A mythical beast described in Job 40.15–24 as the first of God's creations, an animal of enormous strength that inhabits the river valleys. Although frequently identified with the hippopotamus (as *Leviathan is with the crocodile), not all the details of the creature's physiology fit that well-known mammal. In view of the references to Behemoth in the *apocrypha and *pseudepigrapha, it is more likely that it is a form of the primeval monster of *chaos, defeated by Yahweh at the beginning of the process of creation; in fact, according to Job 40.24, the monster is represented as tamed by him and with a ring through his lip, so that like Leviathan he has become a divine pet. According to later Jewish tradition, at the end time Behemoth and Leviathan will become food for the righteous (see 2 Esd. 6.52). MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Bel and the Dragon. This small "book" of the *Apocrypha is one of the three additions to the book of *Daniel found only in its Greek translation (the *Septuagint), but not in the original Hebrew-Aramaic text; the other two are the *Prayer of Azariah and the Song of the Three Young Men, and *Susanna. Unlike Susanna, which is a well-told, plausible story, these two tales of Daniel's detective work in exposing the fraudulent claims of the priests of Bel, and his destruction of the dragon (or, better, "snake") are obvious polemical fabrications intended to demonstrate the foolishness of Babylonian religion and the superiority of the faith of Israel. The story of Bel is at least a good story, but the story of the dragon is so preposterous as to verge on the grotesque.

Bel, equivalent to Hebrew *Baal, was another name for Marduk, the chief god of Babylon. When challenged by the king (*Cyrus!) for his failure to worship Bel, who each day proves himself to be truly a god by the enormous quantity of food he consumes, Daniel undertakes to demonstrate that Bel does nothing of the kind. After the priests have set out the regular offering of food in the temple for the god's enjoyment, Daniel sprinkles the floor with ashes in the presence of the king alone. When they return the next morning, they see in the ashes the footprints of the priests and their families who had entered by a secret trap door during the night and consumed the food. The king then, acknowledging that Daniel was right, has the priests and their families executed, and gives Daniel permission to demolish the statue and the temple.

The other story tells how Daniel destroyed the living snake (the "dragon"), though there is no evidence from antiquity that the worship of live snakes was ever a feature of Babylonian religion. Daniel feeds the snake a mixture of pitch, fat, and hair (an unpleasant but hardly lethal concoction), which, it is said, causes the snake to explode. Under compulsion from the snake's worshipers, the king has Daniel thrown into a lions' den for six days (a device borrowed from chap. 6 of the book of Daniel). While there he is fed by the prophet Habakkuk, who is miraculously transported from Judea for the purpose. On the seventh day, an unharmed Daniel is released by the king, who immediately confesses that there is no god but the God of Daniel.

Like the other stories in Daniel 1–6, these two are examples of a partly satirical polemic against other religions, which must have been popular in the later Hellenistic period, when the attraction of Greek culture for Jews was strong. The strength of the appeal is illustrated by a passage such as 1 Maccabees 1.11–15, which describes the apostasy of a segment of the Jewish population of Jerusalem.

There is no external evidence as to the original language of the stories, but it was presumably *Hebrew, less likely *Aramaic. Palestine was probably the place of their composition, although one can point to no unambiguous clues. The time of writing is probably the second century BCE; the writer is, of course, unknown. Some critics profess to find in the stories faint echoes of the story of Marduk and his slaying of the monster Tiamat in Babylonian mythology, or of some early version of the story of Saint George and the dragon, but the points of contact are few and remote. The manner of Habakkuk's miraculous journey to Babylon is an outright borrowing from Ezekiel 8.3.

ROBERT C. DENTAN

Belial. A word that occurs two dozen times in the Hebrew Bible, frequently in the *pseudepigrapha and other Jewish literature of the Greco-Roman period, and once in the New Testament. In the Hebrew Bible it is used to characterize the wicked or worthless, such as idolaters (Deut. 13.13), the men of Gibeah (Judg. 19.22; 20.13), the sons of Eli (1 Sam. 2.12), Nabal (1 Sam. 25.17, 25), and Shimei (2 Sam. 20.1); in later literature it is a title of *Satan. The etymology of the term is unclear. The most widely held view is that it is a compound meaning "without worth." Another possibility is to understand it as a term for the underworld, literally, "[the place of] no return" (see esp. Ps. 18.4–5). More recent translations generally paraphrase the word, while older translations more often transliterated it. In the KJV, for example, "Belial" occurs fifteen times, whereas in the NRSV it is found only in 2 Corinthians 6.15, in the variant form Beliar.

MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Belshazzar. The name of the eldest son of the last Neo-Babylonian king, Nabonidus (556–539 BCE), who for ten years acted as co-regent during his father's absence in Arabia. Belshazzar (Babylonian Bēl-sharra-uṣur, "Bel has protected the kingship") follows the Aramaic form of the name; elsewhere he is referred to as Balthasar (Bar. 1.11–12) or Baltasar (Josephus), but he should not be confused with the name Belteshazzar applied to Daniel in Babylon (Dan. 1.7).

In his third regnal year, Nabonidus entrusted his army to his eldest son and put under his command troops levied from all lands. The king relinquished all control and entrusted the kingship to Belshazzar while he himself went on a long journey to Tema in the West (Persian Verse Account). Belshazzar, as crown prince and co-regent, exercised genuine royal powers; he is named in texts dated early in Nabonidus's reign (first, fifth, and seventh years) as controlling his own household and business, and he is associated with Nabonidus in oaths taken by their names in legal transactions in his twelfth-thirteenth regnal years. He issued an edict outlining a scheme in which land would be managed by specified chief revenue officials. Belshazzar's death at the time of the fall of Babylon to *Cyrus in October 539 BCE (Dan. 5.30) is likely, though not mentioned in the Babylonian (Nabonidus) Chronicle, which does refer specifically to the capture but not the death of Nabonidus (he was exiled to Carmania). Attempts to read a broken passage of the Chronicle as telling of Belshazzar's death a month after the Persian entry into Babylon in 539 BCE remain conjectural. There is no extrabiblical confirmation of Belshazzar's feast (Dan. 5).

Ben. The Hebrew word for "son," used frequently in patronymics and also in phrases indicating quality, age, or the like. Thus, a "son of strength" is a warrior, a "son of death" is someone guilty of a capital offense, and a person or animal can be the son (or daughter) of a night (Jon. 4.10), of a year, or of any number of years. Its Aramaic equivalent is bar.

Benjamin. The youngest son of *Jacob, by *Rachel; *Joseph's full brother; and the ancestor of the tribe of Benjamin. The name means literally "son of the right hand," and should be understood geographically, in the sense of "southern"; the same name is used of a different group in the *Mari texts. Though the smallest of the tribes (Map 3:X5), it had an importance disproportionate to its size (see Ps. 68.27). The narratives in Joshua 3–9 are all set in Benjaminite territory, and members of the tribe were reputated to be fierce warriors (Gen. 49.27; Judg. 5.14; 19–20; 1 Chron. 8.40; 12.1–2). Notable Benjaminites include Ehud the judge; *Saul, the first king of Israel; *Jeremiah the prophet; and *Paul.

Bethlehem (Map 1:X5). Village in Judah, ca. 10 km (6 mi) south of *Jerusalem. The site was settled in the Paleolithic era, but is first mentioned in the *Amarna letters (fourteenth century BCE); the meaning of its name is probably "house of (the deity) Lahmu" rather than the traditional "house of bread." It appears first in the Bible as home of a Levite who became a household priest in the hill country of Ephraim and was carried off by the Danites to their new city *Dan (Judg. 17–18). *Ruth came to Bethlehem with her mother Naomi, married Boaz, and became the ancestor of *David (Ruth 4.13–22).

One account of how David's career began says that he was brought to play the lyre for *Saul (1 Sam. 16.14–23), the other that he was a shepherd whom *Samuel anointed as king (1 Sam. 16.1–13). Hope for a king like David persisted in the postexilic period, and Micah 5.2–4 prophesies a shepherd king from Bethlehem. According to Matthew 2 and Luke 2, *Jesus was born in Bethlehem, and Matthew interpreted this as the fulfillment of Micah's prophecy.

Christian tradition, perhaps as early as the second century CE, identified a cave as the site of Jesus' birth. About 338 CE, Constantine had a church built over the grotto (and Justinian reconstructed it in the early sixth century). Jerome settled in Bethlehem in 386; here he made the Latin *Vulgate translation of the Bible.

Among other traditional sites in or near Bethlehem are the shepherds' field, the tomb of *Rachel (Gen. 35.19), and the well from which David's warriors brought him water (2 Sam. 23.13–17; 1 Chron. 11.15–19).

SHERMAN ELBRIDGE JOHNSON

Bible. The English word "Bible" is derived from the Greek word biblia (neuter plural), which means simply "books." As the collections of Jewish and Christian texts came increasingly to be considered as one unit, the same plural term in medieval Latin began to be understood in popular usage as feminine singular, no longer denoting "The Books" but "The Book." By the second century BCE the adjective "holy" had come to be used to designate some of these books (see 1 Macc. 12.9), and so now "Holy Bible" means a collection of sacred books.

Contents. The number of these sacred and/or authoritative books varies in different religious traditions. The *Samaritans recognize only five books (Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy) as their canon. Twenty-four books, classified in three groupings, make up the Hebrew *canon: the Law (*Torah: Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy); the Prophets, comprising the Former Prophets (Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings) and the Latter Prophets (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Twelve Prophets); the Writings (Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra-Nehemiah, and Chronicles). Samuel, Kings, the Twelve, Ezra-Nehemiah, and Chronicles are each counted as one book.

Historically, Protestant churches have recognized the Hebrew canon as their Old Testament, although differently ordered, and with some books divided so that the total number of books is thirty-nine. These books, as arranged in the traditional English Bible, fall into three types of literature: seventeen historical books (Genesis to Esther), five poetical books (Job to Song of Solomon), and seventeen prophetical books. With the addition of another twenty-seven books (the four Gospels, Acts, twenty-one letters, and the book of Revelation), called the New Testament, the Christian scriptures are complete.

The Protestant canon took shape by rejecting a number of books and parts of books that had for centuries been part of the Old Testament in the Greek *Septuagint and in the Latin *Vulgate, and had gained wide acceptance within the Roman Catholic church. In response to the Protestant Reformation, at the Council of Trent (1546) the Catholic church accepted, as deuterocanonical, Tobit, Judith, the Greek additions to Esther, the Wisdom of Solomon, Sirach, Baruch, the Letter of Jeremiah, three Greek additions to Daniel (the Prayer of Azariah and the Song of the Three Jews, Susanna, and Bel and the Dragon), and 1 and 2 Maccabees (see Apocrypha, article on Jewish Apocrypha). These books, together with those in the Jewish canon and the New Testament, constitute the total of seventy-three books accepted by the Roman Catholic church.

The Anglican church falls between the Catholic church and many Protestant denominations by accepting only the Jewish canon and the New Testament as authoritative, but also by accepting segments of the apocryphal writings in the lectionary and liturgy. At one time all copies of the Authorized or King James Version of 1611 included the Apocrypha between the Old and New Testaments.

The Bible of the Greek Orthodox church comprises all of the books accepted by the Roman Catholic church, plus 1 Esdras, the Prayer of Manasseh, Psalm 151, and 3 Maccabees. The Slavonic canon adds 2 Esdras, but designates 1 and 2 Esdras as 2 and 3 Esdras. Other Eastern churches have 4 Maccabees as well. (See Eastern Orthodoxy and the Bible.)

The Ethiopic church has the largest Bible of all, and distinguishes different canons, the "narrower" and the "broader," according to the extent of the New Testament. The Ethiopic Old Testament comprises the books of the Hebrew Bible as well as all of the deuterocanonical books listed above, along with Jubilees, 1 Enoch, and Joseph ben Gorion's (Josippon's) medieval history of the Jews and other nations. The New Testament in what is referred to as the "broader" canon is made up of thirty-five books, joining to the usual twenty-seven books eight additional texts, namely four sections of church order from a compilation called Sinodos, two sections from the Ethiopic Book of the Covenant, Ethiopic Clement, and Ethiopic Didascalia. When the "narrower" New Testament canon is followed, it is made up of only the familiar twenty-seven books, but then the Old Testament books are divided differently so that they make up 54 books instead of 46. In both the narrower and broader canon, the total number of books comes to 81.

Format. The traditional division of chapters (previously ascribed to Hugh of St. Cher and dated about 1262) is now attributed to Stephen Langton, a lecturer at the University of Paris and subsequently Archbishop of Canterbury (d. 1228). The present method employed for verses was originated by the scholarly printer Robert Stephanus (Estienne), whose Greek New Testament with numbered verses was issued in Geneva in 1551. The first English Bible to employ Stephanus's system of numbering verses was the Geneva version (New Testament 1556; Old Testament 1560). (See Chapter and Verse Divisions).

The English Revised Version of 1881–85 relinquished the separate verse division of older versions in favor of a format employing paragraphs; however, verse numbers were still provided in the margin for ease of reference. Before the employment of this modern system the many verses, or texts, of the Bible were the subject of much statistical and even superstitious research. Fortunes were divined or the "will of God" learned by random selection of biblical passages (see Sortes Biblicae). Some individuals undertook the daunting task of tallying the verses, words, and even the letters of the words, as though some all-important information was encoded in the result. The example below is a typical compilation, made by Thomas Hartwell Horne (1780–1862) over a three-year period. According to Horne's computations, the Authorized or King James Version of the Bible is comprised of:

	Old Testament	New Testament	Total
Books	39	27	66
Chapters	929	260	1,189
Verses	33,214	7,959	41,173
Words	593,493	181,253	774,746
Letters	2,728,100	838,380	3,566,480

This type of analysis has also brought to light miscellaneous information such as the following: the word "and" occurs in the Bible 46,227 times; the word "Lord" 1,855 times; "reverend" only once; "girl" also only once; "everlasting fire" twice; also, no words are longer than six syllables. These students of the letter of the Bible (like the Masoretes in ancient times; see Masorah) inform us that the middle book is that of Proverbs; the middle chapter, Job 39; the middle verse, 2 Chronicles 20.17; that the longest verse is Esther 8.9, and the shortest John 11.35 ("Jesus wept").

Bible Societies. With their concern for the translation, production, and distribution of the scriptures, Bible societies are relatively recent institutions, but the concept underlying their worldwide activity is ancient. The notion that the Bible should be in the language of the people prompted the Hellenistic Jewish community of the third century BCE to produce a Greek translation (*Septuagint) of the Hebrew Bible. Inspired by this example, the early eastern Greek-speaking church began to produce translations of the Bible in a variety of languages so as to make sure that the gospel would be known as widely as possible. Likewise, the Roman church produced its own edition of the Bible, in the "vulgar" Latin of the common people, which became the most widely used translation in the western church for a thousand years, the *Vulgate.

Although there were some attempts in medieval scriptoria to mass-produce copies of the Bible, the process was slow, and the handwritten copies issued were enormously expensive. With the invention of movable type for *printing (about 1456), the situation changed, and the Bible began to be translated into vernacular languages and commercially produced for general circulation. It was, however, not until the evangelical revival in the eighteenth century and the consequent formation of missionary societies, principally in the United Kingdom, that the importance of scripture translation and publication began to be fully recognized. These missionary societies placed special emphasis on the use of the scriptures in preaching and teaching ministries, and included scripture distribution among their ongoing programs.

The organization of this period which most completely resembled the later Bible societies was a direct outgrowth of the Pietistic movement, the von Canstein Bible Institution of Halle, organized in 1710 to supply inexpensive scriptures to the poor of Germany. Although the von Canstein group confined its efforts to Germany and eastern Europe, by the end of the eighteenth century it had achieved the remarkable record of circulating over three million low-cost Bibles and New Testaments.

Meanwhile, across the English Channel a great awakening had begun, generated in large part by the preaching of John and Charles Wesley and George Whitefield. Missionary societies were formed to spread the gospel, and often their first assignment was to master the local language in order to translate the Bible. Thus William Carey (1761–1843), a shoemaker who had taught himself both Hebrew and Greek, went to India under the auspices of his Baptist Missionary Society and launched a translations program at Serampore; he participated in thirty-five translations. Robert Morrison (1782–1834), sponsored by the London Missionary Society, produced in Canton and Macao the first Chinese translation of the Bible, though he was broken in health and working against incredible odds. A bit later, Robert Moffat (1795–1883), David Livingstone's father-in-law, went to Capetown to begin his distinguished career as a pioneer missionary, his first duty being to produce a translation of the Bible in seTswana. Still others followed, and as their numbers increased and their tasks became more demanding, they and their parent societies at home found themselves, in view of their many other commitments, unable to meet the rapidly growing needs for Bible translation and production. It became clear that a new strategy was required, calling for an organization that would be concerned solely with the translation and production of scriptures for the missions in Asia, Africa, and Latin America.

The British and Foreign Bible Society. The formation of the British and Foreign Bible Society (BFBS) on 7 March 1804, was the answer. Nearly three hundred people met in the London Tavern to discuss the place of Bible distribution in Christian work and witness. Despite their deep doctrinal and ecclesiological differences they agreed to form a society whose single purpose would be to print the scriptures, without note or comment, and to distribute them without financial gain, in the British Isles and throughout the world.

The new Society grew rapidly, and within a decade there were throughout the British Isles over two hundred local groups called auxiliaries that were committed to supporting the cause. Equally important, other Bible societies, patterned after the BFBS, were being formed on the European continent and in North America.

American Bible Society. Meanwhile, in the United States, Bible societies were being organized in several states and in many county seats and principal cities of the fledgling republic. In a period of less than ten years, more than 130 such regional Bible societies were established. There were fifteen "female" Bible societies among them, the first being the Female Bible Society of Geneva, New York (1813). A similar development took place in Canada, where auxiliaries of the British and Foreign Bible Society were established.

The resulting situation was far from satisfactory, for while some communities were well served, others were destitute of scriptures. This was particularly true of the growing West in the United States, where it was reported that not a single Bible could be found in many of the new settlements and where vernacular scriptures were desperately needed in the former French and Spanish territories. The need for some kind of a central organization became increasingly evident, and a call finally went out to create a "General Bible Society." Fifty-six delegates met in New York on 8 May 1816, agreed to establish a new national organization called the American Bible Society (ABS), adopted a constitution modeled on the British one, and issued an "address" to the people of the United States in which they said of the new society that "local feelings, party prejudices, sectarian jealousies are excluded by its very nature. Its members are leagued in that, and in that alone, which calls up every hallowed, and puts down every unhallowed, principle—the dissemination of the scriptures in the received versions where they exist, and in the most faithful where they may be required." Many of the provincial societies merged at once with the new national body, but some preferred an "auxiliary" status and a few opted to remain independent, some maintaining separate organizations to the present.

Thus, by the end of the second decade of the nineteenth century, Bible societies were firmly established in Europe and North America, and their distinctive purpose and mission had become widely recognized and generally approved. As they developed, they became noted for the involvement of large numbers of lay men and women, often giving them precedence over their clergy members. They also became widely respected for the ecumenical composition of their boards and staff, for they were careful to maintain close relationships with all Protestant groups; active Roman Catholic participation in their programs did not occur until the middle of the twentieth century. They also developed an enviable reputation for careful scholarship both in publishing source texts and in providing quality translations in an incredible number of languages; they also have been (and continue to be) a significant presence in the development of linguistic theory and practice. Similarly, they maintained through the years a policy of strict impartiality in offering their services and productions to all; to that end they remained extremely cautious in avoiding the inclusion of doctrinal notes or comments in their publications. Throughout they held fast to their founding principle to present to all persons an opportunity to possess the scriptures in their own tongues, with price as no barrier to ownership.

The United Bible Societies. Throughout the nineteenth century, most of the Bible societies confined their activities to work within their national borders. The ABS and BFBS, and to a lesser extent the National Bible Society of Scotland (NBSS) and the Netherlands Bible Society, were a conspicuous exception. These four "missionary" Societies met needs not only in their own countries but also moved out across the world to engage in scripture translation and distribution, largely following the missionaries of their own national churches, with little communication or consultation among themselves. At first there was little friction, but as the overseas outreach of these larger societies continued to expand, areas of duplication and tension began to appear. Some experimental comity arrangements were made in the early years of the twentieth century, preparing the way for a formal consultation in London in 1932 involving three of the principal societies at work in overseas areas, namely, the ABS, BFBS, and NBSS. The London meeting led to innovative cooperative efforts, particularly between the ABS and BFBS in places such as Brazil and Japan, and to a larger conference in 1939 at Amsterdam, when it was proposed to create a kind of world council of Bible societies. The outbreak of war in Europe, however, made it impossible to carry out those plans.

Following the war, in 1946 at a conference held at Haywards Heath in England, sixty-three delegates from twelve European Bible societies and the ABS brought into being the United Bible Societies (UBS), a loose federation of national societies. The UBS has flourished and serves today as a valuable center of coordination, appraisal, and strategic planning.

Working in concert through the UBS, more than seventy-five Bible societies worldwide have been able to improve their service to churches and missions through greatly improved and accelerated translation techniques, efficiently coordinated production centers, wider interconfessional relationships, and the use of more scientific marketing methods.

Biblical Theology. This entry consists of two articles, one on the Old Testament and one on the New Testament. (The term "Old Testament" is appropriate in this context, since biblical theology has been an almost exclusively Christian enterprise.) For related discussion, see Interpretation, History of, article on Modern Biblical Criticism, and Israel, Religion of.

Old Testament

Strictly speaking, Old Testament theology is a Christian discipline, for it presupposes the *canon of the Christian Bible, which is divided into two parts, the Old and New Testaments. In this scriptural context, Old Testament theology is part of the larger discipline of biblical theology.

The early Christian community interpreted the life, death, and resurrection of *Jesus Christ in the perspective of the scriptures of Israel (Law, Prophets, Writings). In the New Testament, almost without exception, "scripture(s)" refers to these sacred writings. From time to time, beginning with Marcion in the second century CE, questions have been raised as to whether Israel's scriptures belong in the Christian Bible; but the church has steadfastly maintained that the Old Testament as well as the New bears witness to God's *revelation and hence has an indispensable place in Christian life, thought, and worship.

The Nature and Method of Old Testament Theology. The separation of Old Testament theology as an independent discipline occurred fairly late in the history of biblical interpretation, specifically in the period of the Enlightenment when modern views of historical development emerged. The revival of biblical theology in the twentieth century, which began in the 1920s under the leadership of such theologians as Karl Barth (dogmatic theology) and Walter Eichrodt (Old Testament theology), challenged the view of theological liberalism, in which the relation between the Testaments was understood as a unilinear historical development from lower to higher stages of spiritual evolution. Once again theologians in various ways began to address themselves to the overall theological witness of the bipartite canon of Christian scripture. Nevertheless, the earlier separation between Old Testament and New Testament theology has persisted. In part this separation is justified by the vast expansion of knowledge that requires a division of labor among biblical theologians. More important, the Old Testament has a quasi-independent role within the Christian Bible, contributing theological dimensions that supplement, enrich, and at points even qualify the witness of the New Testament. The church considers both testaments to be necessary for a full understanding of God's self-disclosure and human response to the divine initiative.

Since the Old Testament is a vast and diverse body of literature, the question immediately arises: how should one present a theology of the Old Testament? One way is to organize the material according to a structure or principle derived from the outside. This method was dominant in the late medieval and Protestant scholastic periods, when the task of biblical theology was to provide the proof texts (dicta probantia) for the support of the dogmas of the church. The method is still advocated by theologians who structure Old Testament theology according to the topics of systematic theology (God, humanity, salvation, etc.) or who interpret the Bible according to a modern philosophical perspective (evolutionary development, existentialism, Marxist social philosophy, etc.). Another approach is to try to let the Bible set the issues and determine the method, in which case theology of (subjective genitive) the Old Testament refers to what belongs to, and inheres in, the Old Testament itself.

If the latter way is followed, one immediately faces a methodological problem as to whether Old Testament theology should be presented synchronically (structurally) or diachronically (historically). The debate over method is seen in the works of two leading Old Testament theologians of the twentieth century. The Swiss theologian Walter Eichrodt (Theologie des Alten Testaments, issued 1933–1939) attempted to present the "structural unity" of Old Testament belief by using the relational model of *covenant. The German theologian Gerhard von Rad (Theologie des Alten Testaments, published 1957–1961) attempted to understand the Old Testament dynamically as a history of traditions, and in this sense a Heilsgeschichte ("salvation history"). Probably a combination of both methods is required. On the one hand much of the Old Testament is story/history; indeed it begins with a history that extends from *creation to the *exile of the Israelite people (Genesis—2 Kings). On the other hand, patterns of organization and symbolism are discernible in this historical presentation and elsewhere.

The Relationship between God and People. The starting point in an exposition of Old Testament theology is the self-disclosure of the holy God, who chooses to enter into relationship with a particular people, Israel, called to be the means through whom other peoples may know and glorify God, the creator and redeemer. The term Israel, both in biblical times and today, may be used of a political state, (e.g., the kingdoms of Israel and Judah), but basically it is a sacral term which refers to "the people of God." In its inclusive sense the term is often used in the Old Testament (e.g., Amos 3.1; Hos. 11.1), and in this larger sense *Paul could speak of the Christian community as being essentially related to, and indeed part of, Israel, the people of God (Rom. 9—11).

In the scriptures of Israel, primacy is given to the *Torah, traditionally called the "five books of Moses." In the view of the community of faith, God gave torah or instruction to the people, so that they may properly serve (worship) God and live faithfully and obediently in God's presence. This Torah has the form of an overall story or history, which includes within it commandments, or *law in the narrower sense of the term. God's self-disclosure as creator and sovereign established a relation between God and human beings, who are made in the divine image (Gen. 1.26–28), and particularly a relationship with one people, whose election is portrayed in the calling of *Abraham and *Sarah to respond in faith to the divine promise (Gen. 11.31–12.9) and the choice of *Jacob, also called Israel, over his twin brother *Esau (Gen. 25.19–28).

The heart of the Torah story, however, is found in the tradition that begins with the book of *Exodus. The disclosure of God's name, that is, identity (Exod. 6.2–9), is associated primarily with fundamental root experiences that constitute the fountainhead of the Mosaic tradition, namely Exodus and *Sinai. These core traditions, which signify the inseparably related dimensions of divine initiative and human responsibility, of *salvation and obligation, are paradigmatic for Israel's knowledge of who God is and how the people are to live faithfully in God's presence. The holy God whom Israel knows and worships is characterized as one, jealous (zealous), righteous, gracious, faithful, and trustworthy, whose judgment falls, however, upon those who betray their religious loyalty and turn to iniquity (Exod. 34.6–8). This knowledge of God is further elaborated in the preaching of *prophets, the teaching of *priests, and the counsel of sages (cf. Jer. 18.18).

Covenant History. The relationship between God and people, often expressed in the language "your God" and "my people" (e.g., Exod. 6.7; Lev. 26.12; Isa. 40.1; Jer. 31.33), is understood in the Old Testament as that of a covenant. The significance of covenant is far greater than a statistical count of the occurrences of the term would indicate. Eichrodt took this concept, understood in the broad sense of relationship, as the organizing principle in his theology. In the Reformed tradition there is precedent for this, reaching back at least to the federal (covenantal) theology of the Dutch Calvinist, Johannes Cocceius (1603–1669). In the Old Testament, however, covenant is not a univocal term, nor is it a theological umbrella that covers everything. Three major covenantal perspectives or patterns of symbolization are evident. All of these are covenants of *grace, for they rest upon the initiative and superior status of the divine covenant maker, but each nuances the relationship between God and people differently.

The Torah gives primacy to the covenant with Abraham (Gen. 17; cf. chap. 15). This covenant is based on God's gracious commitment, unconditioned by human performance. Therefore, it is designated an "everlasting covenant," one that has perpetual validity. Characteristic of this type of covenant is the giving of divine promises, not the imposition of obligations. In the priestly (see P) perspective that governs the Torah in its final form, the Abrahamic covenant belongs to a periodized history that is punctuated with three divine covenants, each of which is termed an everlasting covenant. The first period extends from creation to the covenant with *Noah after the *flood (Gen. 9), a universal, ecological covenant embracing all human beings, animals and birds, and the earth itself. The second extends from Noah to Abra[ha]m, and includes the divine promises of the land of *Canaan as an everlasting possession, a numerous posterity, and a special relationship between God and the descendants of Abraham and *Sarah ("I will be your/their God"). The third period extends from Abraham to *Moses, the mediator of the Sinai covenant, also designated as everlasting. These covenants are accompanied by three signs: the *rainbow, *circumcision, and the *Sabbath, respectively, the latter harking back to God's creation (Exod. 31.12–17). In this perspective, the Sinai covenant is regarded as the ratification or fulfillment of the ancestral covenant that God "remembers" (Exod. 2.24; Lev. 26.44–45). The special relationship with God, promised in the Abrahamic covenant, finds expression in the disclosure of the cultic name, Yahweh (see Names of God in the Hebrew Bible), and the "tabernacling presence" of God in the midst of the people (Exod. 29.45–46). The whole cult is regarded as the God-given means of grace that enables a holy people to live faithfully in the presence of the holy God. *Sacrifices are provided (the book of *Leviticus) for the expiation of sin and reconciliation to God.

A second covenantal pattern of symbolization, following the sequence of the Hebrew Bible, is associated with Moses. It is set forth classically in the book of *Deuteronomy, canonically joined to the priestly Torah discussed above, and provides the dominant theological perspective in the Former Prophets (Joshua through 2 Kings), that is, the *Deuteronomic history. In contrast to the Abrahamic covenant, which was based unilaterally on God's gracious commitment and promise, this covenant is more of a two-way affair, and places greater emphasis on human obligation. The covenantal pattern, on the analogy of ancient suzerainty treaties, includes several characteristic elements: the story of the saving deeds of the covenant initiator, the stipulations that are binding on the covenant recipient, and the sanctions of *blessing and *curse in case of obedience or disobedience. Like the Abrahamic covenant, this too is a covenant of grace, but it carries within it "the curse of the law" (cf. Gal. 3.10, 13), for the judgment of God could bring severe punishment upon the people or even annul the relationship if the people fail in their covenant responsibilities (Hos. 1.8–10).

A third covenantal pattern of symbolization is also found in the Deuteronomic history, where it is introduced as a theme secondary to the Mosaic covenant. This is the royal covenant theology, according to which Yahweh made an everlasting covenant with *David, promising perpetual divine grace (hesed) to the throne, even though particular kings performed badly in office and had to be chastised (2 Sam. 7; Ps. 89). This Davidic covenant did not supersede the Mosaic covenant; indeed, the *ark of the covenant—the sacred symbol of Mosaic tradition—was escorted into *Jerusalem and eventually was placed in the holy of holies of the *Temple (cf. Pss. 24; 132). This covenant perspective, however, moves beyond the horizon of Israel's sacred history into the cosmic dimension of God's sovereignty as creator of the universe and ruler of history. As in other religions of the ancient Near East, the two salvific institutions are *kingship and Temple (Ps. 78.67–72), both of which were alien to the Mosaic tradition. The reigning monarch is Yahweh's anointed ("*messiah") and is elected to the special role of *son of God (Ps. 2.7). When the king is gifted with wisdom, divine blessing flows into Israel's society and overflows to other nations (Ps. 72). The Temple, in Davidic theology, also has cosmic significance, for it is founded at the cosmic center—the meeting place of heaven and earth, where God is present in the midst of the people (Ps. 46.4–5). This covenantal perspective is dominant in the books of *Chronicles, and is a major factor in the *Psalms, which in their final form were issued under the aegis of David, regarded as the type of God's anointed one or messiah.

These three covenants, associated with Abraham, Moses, and David respectively, should not be understood as following one another chronologically but as existing side by side, like overlapping theological circles. In the Torah the Mosaic covenant fulfills the promissory Abrahamic covenant; the Deuteronomic history emphasizes the Mosaic covenant, but also includes the promissory Davidic covenant (1 Kings 8.23–24); and the Chronicler's history gives priority to the Davidic covenant (this historian bypasses the Mosaic period), but also includes elements of the Priestly tradition and the Mosaic torah understood in its halakic or legal sense. Indeed, to express the relationship between God and human beings all three theological perspectives are required. Each nuances in its own way polarities of the divine-human relationship: God's sovereignty and human freedom, God's transcendence (distance) and immanence (presence), and God's relation to the particular people, Israel, and God's universal sway as cosmic creator and sovereign. All three include promises and obligations, but the Abrahamic and Davidic covenants are primarily promissory, while the Mosaic covenant is primarily one of obligation.

Prophecy and Covenant. The interrelation of these covenant perspectives is evident in the second part of the canon of the Prophets: the so-called Latter Prophets, namely the books of Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Twelve. The message of the eighth-century prophet, *Isaiah of Jerusalem (Isa. 1–39), was based primarily on royal covenant theology. Virtually ignoring Exodus and Sinai, this prophet proclaimed that Yahweh is the cosmic king, whose rule is manifest on earth through the Davidic monarch and whose dwelling place is on Mount *Zion. The imminent *day of the Lord would manifest divine judgment against all presumptuous claims of earthly powers (2.6–22) and would purge Zion, the city of God, of corruption, so that it would be the center of a social order that corresponds to the order of God's cosmic rule. Later interpreters enriched Isaiah's message with the *typology of a new exodus (Isa. 43.14–21) and transferred to the people the promises of grace made to David (55.3–5). This synthesis of covenant traditions provided the theological basis for proclaiming the coming of the *kingdom of God—a new age, indeed a new creation, in which Israel and all nations would participate.

Two of the prophets of Israel, *Hosea and *Jeremiah, stood primarily in the Mosaic covenant tradition. Both opposed the allurements of Canaanite culture, particularly the *Baal fertility religion. In the case of Hosea, however, who was active in the northern kingdom just before its fall in 722 BCE, the contact with Canaanite culture served to enrich covenant theology. He poetically portrayed the relationship between God and Israel in terms of a sacred marriage, in which the "wife," after experiencing divine discipline for her infidelity, eventually is reconciled with her "husband" in a new covenant, like the one made in "the days of her youth" (the time of the Exodus). In this restored relationship, the land will become fertile and yield abundant agricultural blessings (Hos. 2.8–15). Shifting to another family *metaphor, this poet portrayed God's relationship to the people as that of a parent who disciplines and nurtures a child (Hos. 11.1–9).

Jeremiah, at the time of the collapse of the southern kingdom of Judah, was also an interpreter of the Mosaic covenant. Portrayed as a "prophet like Moses" (Deut. 18.18; cf. Jer. 1.9), he attacked the weaknesses of royal covenant theology, as evident in the exploitative policies of Davidic kings and false confidence in the Temple. Recalling the story of Yahweh's saving action in the Mosaic period (Jer. 2.6–7), he indicted the people for their violation of the covenant commandments (7.1–15, the "Temple sermon") and summoned them, under the threat of divine judgment, to repent, that is, to turn away from false loyalties and to return to loyalty to Yahweh and the demands of the covenant. The book of Jeremiah also includes conditional promises to Davidic kings (22.1–5) and messianic hope for a coming Davidic ruler (23.5–6). The new covenant, to supersede the Mosaic covenant, which the people broke (31.31–33), would be based on God's forgiving grace and would introduce an everlasting covenant (32.36–41).

The interaction of theological perspectives is especially evident in the message of *Ezekiel. Basically this prophet stood in the priestly tradition that provided the overarching theological perspective of the Torah in its final form. This is evident in Ezekiel's sense of the divine holiness that separates God from mortal human beings, the tabernacling presence of God in the Temple, and the cultic and ethical laws designed to insure the holiness of the people. As in the priestly recension of the Torah, the Exodus tradition is important, but is invoked to demonstrate that from the very first Israel had been a sinful people under the judgment of God (Ezek. 20.6–8). The Mosaic covenant, broken by the people, will be superseded by a new covenant which, because it is based on the faithfulness and forgiveness of God and not on the people's behavior, will be an everlasting covenant (16.59–63). Portrayals of the divine restoration beyond the day of judgment include elements of royal covenant theology: the raising up of a Davidic leader who will be a "good shepherd" of the people (34.23–24; 37.24–25).

The Justice of God and the Problem of Evil. Taken together, the Torah and the Prophets (Former and Latter) portray a temporal movement from creation to final consummation under the governance of God, whose providence is evident in nature and history, and whose will is made known to, and through, Israel, the people of God. The covenantal perspectives described above accompanied Israel's sacred history, as evident in the Psalms that contain the hymns, laments, and thanksgivings of the pilgrim people.

The intensification of Israel's sufferings, owing to the fall of the nation and the exile of the people, called into question the adequacy of covenantal theology, which consistently explained *suffering as the deserved consequence of human sin or failure. The third part of the Hebrew canon, the Writings, reflects two major theological shifts of emphasis. One was the movement from torah to *wisdom. Wisdom had always been a major ingredient in covenantal theology, as evident in the Mosaic tradition with its appeal to walk in the way that yields *blessing (Deuteronomy; cf. Jer. 17.5–8), and was especially at home in royal covenant theology, which sought to align the social order with the righteousness and peace of God's cosmic kingdom. In the postexilic period the shift to the halakhic dimension of the Mosaic torah, evident in the Chronicler's writing, facilitated the identification of torah and prudential wisdom (as in torah and wisdom psalms, e.g., 1, 37, 119; see the book of *Proverbs). Facing the question of theodicy, however, some sages maintained that the divine wisdom hidden in creation is beyond human grasp (*Ecclesiastes; *Job). *Wisdom was even accorded a cosmic role as the agent of God in creation (Prov. 8.22–31).

The other major development was the movement from prophecy to *apocalyptic, which can be traced within the book of Isaiah. Although human wisdom cannot grasp the divine secret, the mystery of God's kingdom, i.e., the time and manner of its coming, is revealed to a seer (the book of *Daniel). In apocalyptic the scene is not restricted to Israel's sacred history but unfolds into a universal drama in which the kingdom of God is triumphant over all powers of evil, including *death itself. Apocalyptic writers eclectically drew upon all of Israel's covenantal traditions, as well as extrabiblical motifs, to portray the final consummation.

The Relation between the Testaments. There is no smooth and easy transition from the Old Testament to the New, as evident from the fact that the very scriptures of Israel that nourished the early Christian community have proved to be problematic. Nevertheless, New Testament writers appropriated Israel's scriptures in various ways to interpret and elaborate the good news about Jesus, who was confessed to be the Messiah or Christ. Viewed in Christian perspective, the sacred history of Israel is part of "the story of our life"; indeed, the whole biblical narrative, extending from creation to consummation, has its center in Jesus Christ.

Accordingly, the early Christian community affirmed that God's covenants with Israel are ratified in Jesus Christ, though preference is usually given to the promissory covenants associated with Abraham and David (cf. "the covenants of promise," Eph. 2.12). To invoke the typology of Calvin, Jesus Christ is prophet, priest, and king—that is, the eschatological "prophet like Moses" of the Mosaic covenant tradition, the "son of God" of the royal or messianic tradition, and the priestly mediator who effects reconciliation with God (Letter to the Hebrews). Furthermore, in him converge the wisdom movement (cf. the *Logos of the prologue to the Fourth Gospel) and the apocalyptic expectation of the heavenly *Son of man. Finally, the Old Testament, functioning as Christian scripture, offers to the Christian community supplementary theological dimensions that are vital for a full understanding of Christian faith, such as creation theology, a healthy this-worldliness, the role of nationhood in God's economy, expostulation with God in times of human distress and perplexity, and the insistence that the command to love God and one another must be informed by God's demand for justice and *mercy in political, social, and economic relations (Mic. 6.8).

BERNHARD W. ANDERSON

New Testament

Strictly speaking there is no theology of the New Testament, but as many theologies as there are authors. Theology is systematized reflection, and only *Romans has some claim to be that. All the New Testament books are occasional in character, i.e., written for specific situations, not statements of timeless truths. Nevertheless, underlying all the books of the New Testament there is a coherent center, the proclamation (Grk. kerygma) of *Jesus crucified and risen. This coherent center may itself be expressed in different ways, even in the same author (e.g., in Paul, compare 1 Cor. 15.3–5; Rom. 10.9; 14.9). Sometimes only the *crucifixion is mentioned (Gal. 3.1; 1 Cor. 1.13; 2.2), sometimes only the *resurrection (1 Thess. 1.10). But each always implies the other. Sometimes *Paul gives brief statements of the kerygma, sometimes extended confessional formulae. The preaching in *Acts (Acts 2; 3; 10; 13) is similarly focused on Jesus' death and resurrection. The four Gospels are structured so as to bring out the centrality of the cross and resurrection (cf. the three passion predictions in Mark 8.31; 9.31; 10.33–34 par.) and the importance of the "hour" of Jesus' death and glorification throughout the Fourth Gospel.

This death and resurrection of Jesus constitutes the "Christ event," in which God acted definitively for the salvation (or condemnation) first of Israel, then of the human race, and finally of the whole cosmos. It is a proclamation set in the framework of Jewish *apocalyptic hope of a new heaven and a new earth. This consummation has now been inaugurated in the Christ event and will be completed when Christ returns (the *parousia).

The Doctrine of God (Theology). The New Testament offers no new doctrine of *God, but simply proclaims that the Old Testament God has now acted definitively. The God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob is now the God and Father of Jesus Christ. Even the fatherhood of God is not new (Isa. 64.8). Thus all Old Testament theology is implied in the New Testament: God is the creator and Lord of history, the God who acts, who calls Israel into covenant, who promises the redemption of his people. The New Testament proclaims that these promises have now been fulfilled, or rather are now in the process of being fulfilled.

The Earthly Jesus. Although the coherent center of the New Testament focuses upon the death and resurrection of Jesus, his earthly ministry is an integral part of the Christ event. For the earthly ministry of Jesus gives shape and contours to the cross. There were hundreds of crosses in Palestine in the first century CE, but only in this cross did God act for the salvation of humankind. That is not an arbitrary claim, but is legitimated by the fact that the earthly Jesus had preached the in-breaking of God's kingdom, i.e., God's definitive salvation. Hence the four Gospels, four versions of the Good News, encapsulate the earthly ministry of Jesus in their proclamation of his death and resurrection. And although Paul seldom alludes to the earthly ministry of Jesus—only a few echoes of his sayings (1 Cor. 7.10; 9.14; 11.24–25) and an occasional reference to his character and lifestyle (2 Cor. 8.9; 10.1; Rom. 15.8; Phil. 2.8)—nevertheless Paul's frequent use of the human name "Jesus" in significant contexts is testimony to his conviction of the importance of Jesus' earthly history (see especially 1 Cor. 12.3). Moreover, the resurrection does not relegate the earthly Jesus to the archives; rather it perpetuates him, making the salvation that he offered on earth forever available through the preaching of the kerygma.

The Person of Christ (Christology). There is no single Christology in the New Testament but a variety of Christologies. But these Christologies do have a coherent center. Jesus is always interpreted christologically in the New Testament; he is always the one in whom God has decisively acted for us and for our salvation: "In Christ God was reconciling the world to himself" (2 Cor. 5.19). This coherent center of Christology is given contingent application by a variety of christological titles, patterns, and, in the Gospels, portraits. Jesus is the final prophet and servant of Yahweh; he is *Messiah (Christ, anointed one), Lord, *Son of God. In later books he is the *incarnation of the preexistent *Logos or Word of God. Some early patterns have two foci, looking back to his first coming and forward to his return (Acts 3.20–21). Some patterns depict two stages, his earthly career and his subsequent exaltation (Acts 2.36; Rom. 1.3–4). Some patterns are threefold, speaking of his preexistence, incarnate life, and exaltation (Phil. 2.6–11, though some interpret this as a two-stage Christology; Col. 1.15–20; Heb. 1.2–3; John 1.1–18, though here the exaltation is implied rather than asserted). Each Gospel has its own portrait of Jesus. *Mark emphasizes the *messianic secret; Jesus' messiahship is hidden on earth, and can be confessed only after the cross and resurrection. For *Matthew Jesus is the new *Moses; as such, he gives the definitive interpretation of the *Law and founds a church, the true Israel. For *Luke Jesus is the end-time prophet who shows human sympathy and compassion for the poor, for the outcast and the sick, and for women. For *John Jesus is the incarnate revealer whose revelation, when received, confers salvation. These various portraits are directed toward the specific situations for which the respective evangelists wrote. Some Christologies emphasize the death and resurrection (paschal Christologies); others (like the sending formula) are focused upon the beginning and purpose of Jesus' career (God sent his son, plus a statement of saving purpose; e.g., Gal. 4.4–5). The infancy stories at the beginning of Matthew and Luke (Matthew 1–2; Luke 1–2) give narrative expression to this type of Christology, and the incarnation pattern is a more developed form of it. These Christologies emphasize the divine initiative in the Christ event, of which the *virginal conception is a powerful symbolic expression.

The Work of Christ (Soteriology). At the outset, it was the total career of Jesus that was interpreted as the saving act of God (so the earliest preaching as recorded in Acts). Very soon the death of Christ was interpreted as the focal point of God's saving act. This was expressed by means of the hyper- (Grk. "for, on behalf of") formula, which was particularly at home in the tradition of the *Lord's Supper, in the bread and cup words (1 Cor. 11.24–25), though it also figures in some forms of the kerygma (1 Cor. 15.3). The hyper-formula does not mean that the death of Jesus was vicarious or substitutionary, as though the human Christ were appeasing the wrath of an angry deity and rendering him propitious toward humankind. Rather, in Christ God was acting to liberate humanity from the bondage of sin.

Often, though not invariably, combined with the hyper-formula is the language of "giving" or "giving up": God gave (up) his son to the death on the cross (John 3.16). Often the verb is in the passive: "he was given up," but this is a so-called divine passive (Rom. 4.25), a phrase implying that it was God who gave him up. Sometimes too the subject is Jesus himself ("who gave himself for me," Gal. 2.20). These formulae emphasize the cost of Christ's death, both to the Father and to himself. But whether God or Christ is the subject, the cross is primarily an act of God, initiated by him.

Christ's death was interpreted in earliest tradition as a sacrifice like that of the *Day of Atonement (cf. the pre-Pauline hymn in Rom. 3.25) or that of the *Passover lamb (1 Cor. 5.7). Subsequent references to *blood in connection with the death of Christ echo both of these traditions, and also the cup word in the Supper tradition (e.g., Rom. 5.9; 1 John 1.7). Blood denotes not a material substance, but the event of Christ's death in its saving significance.

Most New Testament writers are content simply to repeat or to echo such traditional formulae. Only Paul and the author of Hebrews reflect further upon the meaning of Christ's death and apply their insights to their churches' situations. Paul reflects particularly on the saving benefits of the cross in response to the judaizing (Galatians; Romans; Phil. 3) and gnosticizing (Corinthian correspondence) controversies.

Paul uses many images to describe the saving effects of Christ's death. They include *justification, reconciliation, *redemption, and expiation. These metaphors are derived from various sources. Justification originates in the law courts where it means acquittal. It denotes neither making people ethically righteous nor merely treating them as righteous, but bringing them into a right relationship with God. This sets the believer on the road to obedience. Reconciliation comes from international or personal relations. It presupposes that human beings were in a state of enmity with God and affirms that God in Christ has overcome that enmity and brought the believers into a right relationship with God. Redemption is a metaphor from the manumission of *slaves. It also occurs in the Hebrew Bible as a metaphor for salvation in connection with the *Exodus and with the powers of evil, including *sin, *death, and the devil. Expiation is a sacrificial term, not developed by Paul but occurring in the hymn whose imagery is derived from the day of atonement (Rom. 3.25). It denotes that the death of Christ covers or wipes away sin.

The letter to the *Hebrews is also a contingent application of the central affirmation of the saving death of Christ. It was written to revive the flagging enthusiasm of second- or third-generation Christians and asserts the once-and-for-all quality of Christ's saving death. There is no further sacrifice for sin and no return after apostasy. To make this point the author develops a Christology of Christ as eternal high priest (an image based on Ps. 110.4), and his sacrifice as the fulfillment of the Levitical ceremonies of the Day of Atonement with an occasional glance at the daily sacrifice.

The Holy Spirit (Pneumatology). Although only Acts casts the giving of the Holy Spirit into a story, it is the general belief of the New Testament writers that the Spirit came as a result of the Christ event. The Hebrew Bible and Jewish tradition expected an outpouring of the spirit in the last days (Ezek. 36.26; Joel 2.28–29), and the early Christian community saw in its post-Easter experiences the fulfillment of this promise (Rom. 5.5) and a foretaste of the full endtime salvation. Paul expresses this general conviction when he calls the Spirit the "first fruits" (Rom. 8.23) or "down payment" (2 Cor. 1.22 [NRSV: "first installment"]; 5.5 [NRSV: "guarantee"]) of final redemption. In the early community the presence of the Spirit was seen primarily in ecstatic phenomena, such as *miracles and speaking in tongues (see Glossolalia). Paul had problems in this connection at *Corinth, where the gifts of the Spirit were allowed to run riot, and he found it necessary to grade the gifts, giving priority to prophecy, and making love (Grk. agapē) the gift which must inform all the other gifts (1 Cor. 12—14; see also Gal. 5.22). The Fourth Gospel developed the doctrine of the Spirit (called "Paraclete"; NRSV: "Advocate") in a theological rather than ethical direction: the function of the Spirit is to lead the community into truth, not away from the truth revealed in Jesus but to an even deeper apprehension of it (John 14.16–17, 26; 15.26; 16.7, 13–14).

The Church (Ecclesiology). Jesus' intention was the end-time renewal of God's people. As a result of his saving deed in the cross and resurrection and the subsequent outpouring of the Spirit there came into being a new community that understood itself to be the *saints, the elect, and the ekklēsia (translating Hebr. qāhāl, "assembly"), the church or people of God. Sociologically the church was as yet only a sect within Judaism, but it was conscious of being the true Israel, now definitively renewed. Throughout the apostolic age the word ekklēsia was used primarily for the locally gathered community, especially in house-churches, but in the subapostolic period, e.g., in the deutero-Pauline *Ephesians, it was used for the universal church. But the universal church was arrived at not by adding the local congregations together; rather, each local congregation was the visible embodiment of the one universal ekklēsia.

Paul developed the image of the church as the body of Christ in order to emphasize the mutual responsibility of the members for one another. The image first occurs in connection with the Eucharist (1 Cor. 10.17)—by partaking of the sacramental body the believers become the ecclesial body. The theme is developed in 1 Corinthians 12.12–31, and summarized in Romans 12.4–8. There was no formalized ministry in the apostolic age; members exercised their various gifts ministerially, though under the control of the *apostles. A more institutionalized church order first developed in the Jewish-Christian communities, beginning at Jerusalem (Acts 11.30; etc.) and in the subapostolic age was taken over in the Pauline churches (Titus, 1 Timothy; see Pastoral Letters, The). At this period (ca. 70–110 CE) the institutional ministry takes over the task of preserving and transmitting the apostolic tradition, encapsulated in creedal forms, together with an incipient *canon of apostolic writings (Pastorals; 2 *Peter). A reaction occurred in the Johannine community, which saw itself as a loosely gathered society of "friends," and only later accepted a more formal ministry (cf. the role played by Peter in relation to the beloved disciple in the appendix, John 21). Prior to this (John 15) the Johannine circles developed the image of Christ and the church as a vine and branches, characterized by their mutual indwelling ("I in them and they in me"), a parallel to the Pauline image of the body of Christ.

Baptism. The foundation members of the community received a direct baptism of the Spirit at *Pentecost (cf. Acts 2.1–4). But all others henceforth became members of the community and participants in the Holy Spirit through water *baptism (Acts 2.38; etc.). The community believed it had been led to this practice by the risen One, and expressed this conviction in story form by the command to baptize (Matt. 28.19; cf. Mark 16.15–16). Baptism was performed in the name of Jesus, i.e., under his authority. As a result believers were "added" (a divine passive denoting that baptism is the occasion of an act of God, i.e., in later church language a *sacrament) and became partakers of the Holy Spirit in the already established Spirit-filled community (Acts 2.38).

In response to new situations in his Hellenistic communities Paul developed the doctrine of baptism further. The believers were now baptized into Christ, made over to his ownership. For Paul this meant being baptized into Christ's death, with the hope of future *resurrection (Rom. 6.3–11). Note too that Paul carefully refrains from saying that they are already participating in his resurrection; that would not come until the end, and was conditional on their walking in newness of life. Paul also speaks of the believers as being baptized into one body (1 Cor. 12.13). Although the texts are not very clear, it appears from some New Testament writings (Acts 19.5–6; Titus 3.5.; Heb. 6.2) that the custom arose of marking the connection of baptism with the gift of the Spirit by adding to water baptism the additional act of the *laying on of hands. This was probably not a separate rite, but an attempt to underline part of the rich meaning of water baptism itself.

The Lord's Supper. The earthly Jesus had regularly celebrated meals with his disciples. These *meals were foretastes of the *kingdom of God, which was frequently depicted as a banquet. This table fellowship was renewed after Easter and some of the post-resurrectional appearances are associated with meals (e.g., Luke 24.28–32). Common meals were continued by the early community after the Easter event, and were characterized by exuberant joy (Acts 2.46), the focus being on the risen One's coming in anticipation of his coming at the end (cf. the acclamation *Maranatha ("Our Lord, come!"; 1 Cor. 16.22). Another strain in the tradition, perhaps originally associated with Passover, stressed the connection between the Supper and Christ's death (1 Cor. 11.23–26; Luke 22.19–20; Mark 14.22–24 par.). This tradition interpreted the act as a proclamation (Grk. anamnēsis, "memorial" [NRSV: "remembrance"]) of Christ's death. Its effect was to make the benefits of his death presently operative for the participants (koinōnia) in the body and blood of Christ. Paul further develops the ecclesial significance of this act: by partaking of the one loaf the believers become one body. The Johannine tradition emphasizes eternal life already here and now through eating the bread (John 6.35–51a—note the *manna *typology), while John 6.51b-58 speaks of eating the flesh and drinking the blood of the *Son of man, an act that nourishes the mutual indwelling of Christ and the believers.

The Last Things (Eschatology). Throughout the New Testament there is a tension between the "already" and the "not yet." On the one hand, the end-time kingdom has come as a result of the Christ event, while on the other hand it awaits final consummation. In Jesus' proclamation the kingdom is already breaking through (Matt. 12.28 par.) in Jesus' activity; yet his disciples are to pray, "Your kingdom come," and Jesus faces death with the conviction that after it that kingdom will shortly be consummated (Mark 14.25). The Easter event was in a sense an inauguration of the end-time rule of the kingdom of God (see above), though the final coming of the kingdom and the general *resurrection were still outstanding. This expectation was expressed in imaginative language in the hope of Christ's "parousia" or return as judge and savior (1 Thess. 1.10; Mark 14.62 par.), which the early Christians believed would take place shortly. It was the sense of what had happened already in the Christ event that enabled the early communities to weather the storm of the delay of the parousia, while maintaining the tension between the already and the not yet, though the weight placed on either side of the balance varied from writer to writer. Thus in *Ephesians and *John the emphasis is placed on the already; the future hope practically disappears, though never quite (see, e.g., Eph. 4.13; John 5.25–29; 6.39; etc.). Other writings (such as 2 *Thessalonians, *Jude, 2 *Peter and *Revelation) place the primary emphasis on the future coming, though without losing the sense that something of the end has already occurred through the Christ event.

The Normative Character of New Testament Theology. While the pluralism of New Testament theology appears to undermine its normative character, the coherent center, which we have defined as the kerygma of Christ crucified and risen, provides a criterion for the developments of theology through contingent application within the New Testament, a canon within the canon. The way in which writers like Paul move from coherent center to contingent application provides a pattern for a similar movement in contemporary theology, belief, and practice. Furthermore, the pluralism of the New Testament moves forward on certain trajectories to convergences lying beyond the New Testament period. We see that particularly with the varieties of New Testament Christology that eventually converge in the Christologies of Nicea and Chalcedon, in the doctrines of the consubstantiality of the Son with the Father, and of Christ as truly divine and truly human, with two natures and one person. The remaining problem is whether earlier Christologies, e.g., the functional Christologies of Jesus as the end-time prophet, or as the servant who is now enthroned as Christ and Lord, still have any role to play, and whether the later christological definitions represent an impoverishment. Whereas the New Testament Christologies focus upon Jesus' earthly career, his exaltation, and his parousia, and were thus concerned with God's redemptive act in the Christ event, the later definitions concentrated upon the eternal being of the Son of God and the moment of his entry as a human being into the world. The Fourth Gospel perhaps points the way for the solution of the modern dilemma in that it retains earlier christological perspectives, such as the sending of the Son for the purpose of redemption, alongside the later Christologies of preexistence and incarnation.

In short, New Testament theology does not provide a static norm, but a dynamic one, inviting the church and theology to return continually to the coherent center of the New Testament, and to move forward to its contingent application today, using the contingent applications in the New Testament as a model.

Bishop. In pre-Christian and extra-Christian usage the Greek word rendered "bishop," episkopos, and its cognates, refers primarily to caring for something or someone. This can involve a person's oversight of a task or a group of people, such as priests in a temple, or God's own oversight of a person or an event.

The word occurs rarely in the New Testament and only in later documents with the exception of Philippians 1.1; the other passages are Acts 1.20; 20.28; 1 Peter 2.25; 1 Timothy 3.1–2; Titus 1.7. Acts 1.20 is a citation from Psalm 109.8 used to legitimate the selection of a replacement for Judas among the disciples. Acts 20.28 is from a speech by Paul encouraging his audience to "keep watch . . . over all the flock, of which the Holy Spirit has made you overseers to shepherd the church of God." The three citations from the *Pastoral Letters have to do with requirements for the position or role of episkopos within the church.

Much of the debate about the usage of the term in the New Testament and early Christianity has been concerned with the evolution of an office called "bishop." Is it an authoritative role within the church that existed from apostolic times? Or should it be understood as a general term giving some measure of honor and perhaps authority to any believer? Naturally, different Christian traditions have various stakes in how these questions are answered.

With the exception of Philippians 1.1, all of the texts cited above probably come from the very end of the first or the beginning of the second century CE. Acts 20.28 and the citations from the Pastoral Letters seem to have in mind a specific group of leaders who look out for the well-being of the larger church. Philippians 1.1 seems to have a similar sense; the overseers are mentioned together with *deacons, but there is no further indication of how they might have functioned. The Pastorals associate certain responsibilities with the office. The episkopos is a teacher, a good host, possesses only one wife, is above reproach, and perhaps is good in a debate (Titus 1.7); there is no evidence that this overseer had responsibility outside the local church.

The letters of Clement of Rome (ca. 95 CE) and Ignatius of Antioch (ca. 115 CE) demonstrate the development of a hierarchical office that eventually became dominant. The office of bishop is thus an indicator of the evolution of Christianity from a popular Palestinian movement to a sophisticated institution with offices, authorities, and hierarchy.

Blasphemy. Speech that is abusive to humans or derogatory to God. Blasphemy against humans occurs when people speak words harmful to one another (Matt. 15.19; Col. 3.8; NRSV: "slander"). Blasphemy also occurs when a person speaks against God in a way that fails to recognize the sacredness and honor of God's person and name. According to Leviticus 24.10–16, it was punishable by death.

Blasphemy was also used to describe a claim to a divine prerogative. According to Mark 2.7 (par.), Jesus was accused of blasphemy when he claimed to forgive sins; see also John 10.33–36; Mark 14.64.

The gospel writers also describe Jesus' opponents as blasphemous when they mocked him (Mark 15.29; Luke 22.65). Similarly, 1 Timothy says that Paul blasphemed Jesus when he persecuted the church (1.13), and that those who deserted the gospel were also guilty of blasphemy (1.20).

In a passage that has elicited much debate, the synoptic Gospels (Mark 3.28–29 par.) speak of blasphemy against the (Holy) Spirit as a sin that cannot be forgiven. The context indicates that this sin is not committed unintentionally by Jesus' followers, but is ascribed to the adversaries of Jesus, who had attributed his success to an evil spirit. PAUL L. BREMER

Blessing. In most biblical texts, the associated verbs (to bless), adjectives (blessed), and nouns (blessing, blessedness) express a reciprocity pertaining between God and his chosen people. God blesses them as a mark of his *grace and favor; their blessing of God is a recognition of his presence among them. His blessing conveys to his people a share in his own vitality and ageless purpose. Their blessing of him, often in song, dance, and instrumental *music, celebrates their gratitude for his goodness and help. Each movement in this mutual activity elicits the other, so that the words point to the conjunction of two activities, especially in *worship.

This intersection is especially prominent in four types of literature. First are the historical narratives of the *Pentateuch, which describe God's choice and guidance of the *ancestors of Israel. Typical is God's promise to *Abraham, "I will make of you a great nation, and I will bless you . . . and by you all the families of the earth shall bless themselves" (Gen. 12.2–3; NRSV: "shall be blessed"); the importance of this tradition is made clear in Romans 4.6–9. The intersection is prominent, second, in *Deuteronomy, which records the *covenant sealed between God and *Moses. Here the command "You shall bless the Lord" (8.10) is linked to the promise "The Lord your God will bless you" (15.10). Third, the hymnbook used in *Temple and *synagogue shows how dominant this reciprocal action appears in regular worship. We frequently hear the injunction "Bless the Lord, O my soul" (Ps. 103.1), as well as the assurance "The Lord will bless you from Zion" (Ps 128.5). This dual motif may be found in more than a third of the *Psalms. Then there is a fourth type of literature, the writings of the *prophets and apocalyptists. The visions given to *Daniel, for instance, made him bless the name of the Lord (Dan. 2.19–20), and in response he declares as blessed by God all who persevere until "the end of the days" (Dan. 12.12–13). So too in the Christian apocalypse, the book of *Revelation, faithful *saints receive beatitudes (Rev. 1.3; 14.13; 16.15; 22.7) and join in grateful doxologies addressed to God (5.12–13; 7.12). Significant in the Christian Eucharist are the word and the cup of blessing (Matt. 14.19; Luke 24.50–51; 1 Cor. 10.16). Further, Jesus' followers are enjoined to respond to *curses with blessings as an imitation of generous divine blessing (Matt. 5.44–48).

In the Bible the idea of blessing forms an important link between theology and liturgy, theology and ethics, theology and a way of looking at all human history and experience. Literary documents are introduced by extensive liturgical preludes that bless God for what he has done (e.g., Eph. 1.3; 1 Pet. 1.3). The beatitudes pronounced by Jesus become well-remembered clues to his entire legacy (Matt. 5.3–12; Luke 6.2–23; see Sermon on the Mount); translators of these beatitudes despair of finding equivalents in English (should "blessed" be replaced by "happy" or "fortunate"?). The problem remains: How to do justice to the conjunction of divine and human activity in a language that limits itself to human relationships. PAUL S. MINEAR

Blindness. Due to several causes, blindness was common in the ancient world. The blind were one of the groups to whom special protection was due; it was true piety to help them (Job 29.15) and a severe violation to mislead them (Lev. 19.14; Deut. 27.18). Blindness was a ritual blemish: the blind could not function as *priests (Lev. 21.18), nor could blind animals be offered in *sacrifice (Lev. 22.22; Deut. 15.21; Mal. 1.8). Although blindness was attributed to various physical causes, including old age (1 Kings 14.4; cf. Gen. 27.1; Deut. 34.7) and trauma (Tob. 2.10), it could be interpreted as divine punishment (Deut. 28.28; John 9.2). In the Gospels, healing the blind is one of the characteristic activities of Jesus (Matt. 9.27–30 par.; 11.5; 21.14; Mark 8.22–25; John 9.1–7), and it was interpreted as a messianic sign (Matt. 11.4 par.; Luke 4.18–21; see Isa. 35.5; 61.1–2).

Blindness is also used metaphorically throughout the Bible. Isaiah 6.9 is a classical illustration, taken up repeatedly in the New Testament (Matt. 13.13–15 par.; John 12.39–41; Acts 28.26–27). The *Pharisees are denounced in Matthew 15.14 as "blind guides of the blind" (cf. John 9.40–41), but for the author of the gospel of *John, Jesus is the "light of the world" (8.12), that helps the blind see but can also blind the sighted (9.39). PROSPER GRECH

Blood. Words translated "blood" occur nearly four hundred times in the Hebrew Bible and nearly a hundred times in the New Testament. Of these occurrences, more than half in the Hebrew Bible and more than a quarter in the New Testament have to do with death by violence, by far the most frequent reference.

There are some passages in which life and blood are connected, principally in connection with the prohibition of eating meat with blood still in it (Gen 9.4–6; Lev. 17.11). This association has led some scholars to conclude that in the offering of *sacrifice, the death of the victim is unimportant; sacrificial atonement does not depend on an animal dying in place of the worshiper but rather on life set free from the body and offered to God. Similarly, in the New Testament it is not the death of Jesus that is the atonement, but his life.

Such a view scarcely accords with the statistical evidence summarized above, nor with the obvious fact that it is death that occurs when an animal is offered in sacrifice. Leviticus 17.11 and similar passages are to be understood in the sense that it is the life given up in death, rather than the life set free from the flesh, that is the atonement. And in the New Testament, phrases like "the blood of his cross" (Col. 1.20) cannot point to the release of life, for relatively little blood was shed in *crucifixion. Similarly, "justified by his blood" is parallel to "reconciled to God through the death of his son" (Rom. 5.9–10). In the Bible, therefore, blood normally points to the undergoing of death rather than to the release of life.

This association of blood and death partially explains the concept of blood taboo. Just as those who had contact with a corpse became unclean (Num 11.11–13), so contact with the blood of the slain rendered a warrior ritually impure (1 Chron. 22.8; 28.3).

LEON MORRIS

Book of Life. This symbolic phrase is parallel in meaning to other terms that the Bible associates with the phrase "of life": tree, *bread, *water, fountain, river, path, word, crown. In each case, God is the source and giver of this life, which is more than the years between birth and death.

The image of book suggests a roster of names (Neh. 7.5, 64), the names of those who through grace and obedience become members of God's family and share his life (Dan. 7.10; 12.1, 4; Luke 10.20; Phil. 4.3; Heb. 12.23; Rev. 21.27). Conversely, death is the destiny of those who have been erased from this roll call (Exod. 32.32–33; Ps. 69.28; Rev. 20.12–15). The book image also indicates the record that God keeps of human debits and credits, in preparation for a final accounting (Mal. 3.16–18; Rev. 20.12–14). Finally, the book of life can be visualized as containing the plans of God for his people, all that has happened and will happen to the community and to each of its members (Ps. 56.8; Ps. 139.16).

One reason why this image remained current was that in every service of worship from at least the *exile onward, whether in synagogue or church, the scripture would be read as God's word to his people (see Neh. 8.1–8). The act of opening and closing the scroll carried symbolic force (Rev. 5.1–5; 8.1).

PAUL S. MINEAR

Books and Bookmaking in Antiquity. "This word came to Jeremiah from the Lord: Take a scroll and write on it all the words that I have spoken to you" (Jer. 36.1–2). This passage illustrates the various words in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin translated into English as "book," "scroll," or "roll." In the Hebrew phrase mĕgillat sēper, the word mĕgillâ designates a roll. While the word sēper seems to mean "book" in this and other passages, it can also designate a letter, a legal or private document, or even an inscription. The *Septuagint (LXX) renders the Hebrew phrase with the Greek chartion bibliou, "roll of a book." The word chartēs and its diminutive chartion designated paper made from the papyrus plant; both could be used for a piece of paper of any size, including a roll. Biblos was the Greek name for the papyrus plant; biblos and its diminutive biblion acquired the transferred meanings of a roll of paper made from the papyrus plant and the work written on a papyrus roll, that is, a book; the word "bible" is also derived from biblos. The *Vulgate uses the Latin phrase volumen libri, "roll of a book." Volumen comes from the verb volvo, "to roll," and so refers originally to the form of the writing material. Liber designated the bark or inner rind of a tree; thus, from the supposed use of tree bark as a primitive writing material, liber came to be the standard Latin word for "book."

The phrases used in all three languages point to the roll as the standard form of the "book," at least for longer and more formal texts. The reader needed both hands to handle a roll, one to unroll a new section for reading, the other to roll up the section already read. Luke's account of Jesus' visit to the *synagogue at *Nazareth mentions this procedure: "He stood up to read, and the scroll of the prophet Isaiah was given to him. He unrolled the scroll and found the place where it is written: 'The Spirit of the Lord is upon me. . .' And he rolled up the scroll, gave it back to the attendant, and sat down" (Luke 4.16–20).

A roll might be made up of sheets either of papyrus or animal skin. Papyrus is a marsh plant (Cyperus papyrus) which grew at various spots in Africa and the Near East, including the Sea of *Galilee in Israel; but the commercial production of paper from the papyrus plant was probably always the monopoly of the *Nile Valley of *Egypt. Two layers of strips from the soft interior of the plant, with the upper layer at a right angle to the one below, were pressed together; this pressing released a natural gummy substance which bonded together the strips and layers. Finished dried sheets of paper would then be glued together into a roll. Animal skins (primarily of sheep, goats, and cattle) might be tanned to produce leather, or they might undergo a more complicated process of washing, depilating, soaking in lime, and stretching and drying on a frame, to produce *parchment. To form a roll, the sheets of skin would be sewn together.

The Septuagint phrase chartion bibliou suggests that the Greeks preferred papyrus as a writing material. In Palestine, however, the preferred material seems to have been animal skin, at least for the writing of the scriptures. The great majority of the *Dead Sea Scrolls, for example, are on skin. The reasons for this preference are unclear; it may simply be that animal skins were available locally, while papyrus had to be imported from Egypt. The *Talmud apparently reflects earlier tradition when it directs that the *Torah be written on animal skin, saying this rule was given to *Moses at *Sinai.

The writing instrument used since early pharaonic Egypt was a reed that had been chewed or frayed to produce a brush. The Greeks preferred a reed pen with a split nib, resembling a modern fountain pen. The simplest form of black ink was made by mixing soot or lampblack with gum.

Other writing materials are mentioned in the Bible or are known from archaeology. Public documents that were to be preserved or displayed might be inscribed on stone (as were the *Ten Commandments) or on bronze plates (as was the decree honoring Simon the high priest, 1 Macc. 14.48). For school lessons, rough drafts, record keeping, and other temporary or personal documents, wood tablets with wax surfaces were used. The tablets consisted of two or more boards hinged to close flat. Wax filled a recess formed by a raised ridge. A stylus made of metal, wood, or bone served as the writing instrument; one end was sharpened to incise the wax, while the other end was blunt or flattened to rub out mistakes and resmooth the surface. The prophets Isaiah and Habakkuk may have recorded their oracles on such tablets (Isa. 30.8; Hab. 2.2), and the mute Zacharias, father of *John the Baptist, asked for a writing tablet to write the name of his son (Luke 1.63).

These writing tablets with their hinges and multiple leaves resembled a modern book; and the Latin name for a set of wooden writing tablets, codex (from caudex, "block of wood") became the name of the modern book form. By the late first century CE, the Romans had devised another type of notebook, consisting of sheets of parchment sewed or fastened together at the spine. The Romans called these notebooks membranae ("skins"). Paul seems to refer to such parchment notebooks when he asks Timothy to bring him a cloak left behind at Troas, "also the books, and above all the parchments" (2 Tim 4.13).

Two other writing materials were used in antiquity. Clay tablets were the principal medium for cuneiform, the writing system of wedge-shaped signs that originated in Mesopotamia. A broad-headed stylus was used to impress the signs on wet clay tablets; those tablets with temporary texts, such as letters and receipts, were baked in the sun, while those containing laws, history, or literary works were fired in a kiln to make them more durable. Fragments of broken pottery, called ostraca (from their Greek name) were free for the picking in ancient rubbish heaps and provided a cheap and convenient medium for writing notes or receipts.

Christianity brought with it a startling change in ancient bookmaking, namely, the rise of the codex; see Colin H. Roberts and T. C. Skeat, The Birth of the Codex (London, 1983). A codex—the form of modern books—is a collection of sheets fastened at the back or spine, usually protected by covers. By the second century CE, the papyrus codex had become the exclusive form for the books of the Christian Bible. For the Jewish scriptures, on the other hand, the roll continued to be the only acceptable form; in the case of Greek literature, the codex achieved parity with the roll about 300 CE and then surpassed it in popularity.

The reasons for the Christian adoption of the codex form remain a matter for speculation. The practical advantages of the codex over the roll seem obvious to the reader accustomed only to the modern book. The codex ought to have been less expensive, since it uses both sides of the writing material, while the roll rarely used both sides; for the same reason, the codex is more compact, therefore easier to store; and its compactness would allow the collection in one volume of previously separate texts. The roll seems cumbersome to read, given the need to unroll and reroll it. Such practical considerations must have played a role in the triumph of the codex in non-Christian as well as in Christian literature; yet they seem insufficient to explain (in the words of Roberts and Skeat) the "instant and universal" adoption of the codex by Christians as early as 100 CE. Pointing to the Jewish custom of committing isolated decisions of the oral law or rabbinic sayings to tablets or small rolls, Roberts and Skeat suggest that papyrus tablets similarly were used to record the oral law as pronounced by Jesus and that these tablets developed into a primitive form of codex. In whatever way the papyrus codex first came into being and came to be used for Christian texts, Christians may have favored the codex because its use differentiated them from Jews and other non-Christians.

Bread. Because the Bible portrays ordinary people in the round of daily life, bread is a common word in its pages from the beginning of Genesis (3.19). Every day was baking day in the homes of Palestine. Barley or wheat flour was mixed with water and salt, then baked in simple ovens. The loaves produced were such a staple of the diet that bread and food are sometimes interchangeable terms (e.g., Gen. 37.25; Judg. 13.16; Prov. 27.27). When in judgment God threatened to break the people's "staff of bread" (Lev. 26.26), it was the very basis of their life that was imperiled. Conversely, when God promised them "a land where you may eat bread without scarcity" (Deut. 8.9), it was the promise of life itself. This virtual identification of bread with existence led biblical authors to speak metaphorically about the bread of anxious toil (Ps. 127.2), of wickedness (Prov. 4.17), of idleness (Prov. 31.27), and of tears (Ps. 80.5).

Bread also occupied a significant place in biblical religion. The sacrificial system included cereal offerings (Lev. 2.4). Both *tabernacle and *Temple required the permanent display of *showbread, or "bread of the Presence" (Exod. 25.30; 1 Chron. 28.16). The festival of unleavened bread lay at the heart of Israel's remembrance of the *Exodus (see Feasts and Festivals; Passover). Equally linked with God's protective and providential activity was the provision of *manna, the "bread from heaven" (Exod. 16.4), which sustained Israel's life in the *wilderness.

According to the Gospels, Jesus acknowledged the importance of bread by quoting Deuteronomy 8.3, "one does not live by bread alone" (see Matt. 4.4; Luke 4.4), and then by identifying himself as the true bread from heaven that gives life to the world (John 6.33). At the Last Supper, he interpreted the breaking of the unleavened bread of Passover as symbolizing the offering of himself; this was commemorated by early Christians in the ceremony of the "breaking of the bread" (Acts 2.42; see Lord's Supper, The).

Brothers and Sisters of Jesus. Siblings of *Jesus are referred to collectively twice in the Gospels. In the account of the "true kindred" (Matt. 12.46–50 par.), Jesus' mother and brothers come to speak to him while he is teaching. Jesus refuses to see them, however, saying that his true sister, brother, and mother are those who do the will of God.

When Jesus teaches at the *synagogue in his hometown of *Nazareth, the listeners react angrily to his wisdom and mighty works (Matt. 13.53–58; Mark 6.1–6). The crowd doubts that a local person could be endowed with such power, and they cite the presence of his parents, brothers, and sisters as proof. The brothers are listed by name (*James, Joseph [Mark reads Joses], Simon, and Judas) but the sisters only as a group. In Luke 4.22, the crowd asks simply, "Is not this Joseph's son?"

References to brothers and sisters of Jesus conflict with some understandings of the *virgin birth. For those who feel that Jesus' mother *Mary remained a virgin for life, brothers and sisters must be read as cousins or as stepbrothers and stepsisters fathered by *Joseph in another, unmentioned, marriage.

DANIEL N. SCHOWALTER

Burial Customs. A part of the story of *Abraham is the record of his concern and care for the burying of *Sarah (Gen. 23). He buys a cave for her tomb; this purchase is his first land acquisition in the land of *Canaan. The *Hittites offered one of their sepulchers, but Abraham preferred to buy and utilize his own cave. For those outside the *Promised Land, burial in the ancestral territory continued to be important. For example, the body of *Joseph was embalmed in Egypt and returned to Canaan (Gen. 50.26). In like manner, many Jews of the *Dispersion of the Roman period preferred to be buried in the Holy Land. The burial customs and practices, as with Abraham, were carried out amid outside cultural influences but yet maintained their own distinctiveness.

Tomb construction saw considerable change and variety. Abraham, as noted above, used a cave. In later periods tombs were cut from the rock. Jesus mentions "whitewashed tombs" (Matt. 23.27), which implies buildings. One of the few monuments from the first century CE still intact in Jerusalem is the so-called Tomb of Absalom, a monument that exhibits both Greek and *Nabatean influence. Extended families often had a single connected cluster of underground tombs with niches for the various individuals or families. Often these were reused. Individual rock-cut tombs were also common. The bodies were generally not enclosed in coffins; after decomposition the remaining bones were then removed to a bone chamber in the floor or at the side of the burial ledge and the space reused. Rock tombs were sealed with a hinged door or a heavy wheel-shaped stone. Criminals were buried under a pile of stones.

With regard to the preparation of the body for burial, neither embalming (an Egyptian custom) nor cremation (called idolatry in m. 'Abod. Zar. 1.3) was allowed. The body was washed (Acts 9.37) and enclosed (John 19.40), and finally a napkin was placed over the face (John 20.7). The Greek custom of individual coffins was occasionally followed in New Testament times; the earlier period did not use coffins.

Secondary burial, in which the remains, after decomposition, were placed in a small stone or clay box called an ossuary, gradually increased over time. A coffin (sarcophagus) averaged 1.8 m (6 ft) in length, while the ossuary was often only .8 m (2.5 ft) long. Many tombs had numerous small niches (Hebr. kôkîm) into which the ossuaries were placed. Considerable new evidence on burial customs has been gleaned from the excavations of the extensive Jewish cemetery at Beth Shearim, where secondary burials dominated. Often the ossuaries were decorated with various geometrical patterns. Roman *Jericho has yielded a significant collection of wooden coffins. It seems likely that the biblical phrase "to sleep with [or to be gathered to] one's ancestors" refers to secondary burial in the family tomb.

Burial in the Middle East has always taken place without delay; almost always the person is buried the same day. The warm climate and the lack of embalming has necessitated this practice. In the case of the burial of Jesus, the approaching *Sabbath added to the desire to complete the burial formalities before sundown (cf. Deut. 21.23).

The Middle East has long known the tradition of demonstrative *mourning. The walls of ancient Egyptian tombs often depict groups of professional women mourners as a part of the funeral procession. This profession was also known in Israel; Jeremiah explains the purpose of the presence of evocative funeral songs sung by the professionals: "that our eyes may run down with tears" (Jer. 9.18). Instruments used at funerals included the flute (Matt. 9.23); Rabbi Judah (140–165 CE) said, "Even the poorest in Israel should hire not less than two flutes and one wailing woman" (m. Ketub. 4.4).

The Bible records a number of poems composed for the deceased, the most famous being *David's lament over *Saul and *Jonathan (2 Sam. 1.18–27). The prophets use the funeral lament satirically in speaking of the ruin of nations such as *Babylon, Tyre, and *Egypt (e.g., Isa. 14.4–21; Ezek. 27; 32), and the book of *Lamentations uses the genre for *Jerusalem after its destruction in 587/586 BCE.

In biblical tradition mourning continued for seven days (Gen. 50.10). The places of burial were generally apart from the dwellings of the people; in earlier periods some burials took place within the house. While the Egyptians made elaborate preparations for the dead and placed the surroundings of life in the tomb of the deceased, these customs were kept to a minimum in Palestine. Tombs were comparatively modest and ostentation was criticized (Isa. 22.15–16). Eighty percent of the tomb inscriptions in the Beth Shearim cemetery are in Greek, yet the inscriptions themselves display a minimum of Greek ideological influence. Resurrection as a concept remains dominant over the idea of the immortality of the soul (see also Afterlife and Immortality).

Caiaphas. Also named Joseph, Caiaphas was high *priest at the time of Jesus' death. According to *Josephus, he was appointed in 18 CE by Valerius Gratus, the Roman procurator before *Pilate; his father-in-law, Annas, had preceded him, as had, for very short terms, several of Annas's sons (Ant. 18.2.35). He was removed from office in 37 CE and replaced by another of Annas's sons (Ant. 18.4.95). There is some confusion in the New Testament about whether Annas or Caiaphas was high priest at the end of Jesus' life and about their role in his death, but the Gospels are consistent in their depiction of hostility toward Jesus by the high priest.

In 1990 the family tomb of Caiaphas was found in Jerusalem. It contained twelve ossuaries, one of which had inscriptions with the full name of Caiaphas in Aramaic (yhwsp br qyp' and yhwsp br qp': Joseph, son of Caiaphas), and another with simply the family name (qp').

MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Cain and Abel. Genesis 4.1–16 relates the curious story of Cain and Abel. Cain (meaning perhaps "smith," possibly related to the *Kenites), is the firstborn of *Adam and *Eve, and Abel (meaning "emptiness") is his younger brother or twin. As is generally the case among biblical siblings, they come into conflict. Cain, a farmer, offers a sacrifice of grain to Yahweh, while Abel, a shepherd, offers a sacrifice from the firstborn of his flocks. For no obvious reason, Yahweh rejects Cain's sacrifice; this appears to be a literary gap or blank. After some moral advice from Yahweh, Cain murders Abel in the field, which Yahweh discovers from Abel's blood "crying out" from the ground. Yahweh confronts Cain with Abel's absence, to which Cain feigns ignorance. As punishment, Yahweh condemns Cain to wander the earth, decreeing that the earth will no longer bear crops for him. In fear for his life, Cain pleads for mercy, which Yahweh grants by placing an unspecified sign on Cain so that no one will murder him. Cain finally departs to wander in a land called Nod ("wandering"), east of *Eden.

Many themes appear in this story, including sibling rivalry, the attraction of sin, crime met with punishment, the futility of pretense before God, and the moral distinction between civilization and barbarism. Cain begins as a farmer, plying the fruitful earth, and because of his unchecked passion he commits a heinous crime, only to separate himself and be separated—morally, economically, and geographically—from the proper realm of civilized life. Only a plea for God's mercy (perhaps implying a degree of repentance) saves his life, signaling the small worth of life outside of civilization, where one is "hidden" from God's face.

In later interpretation, the cause of Cain's evil nature is frequently explored, with a tendency to identify Cain as the son of either *Satan (1 John 3.12), the wicked angel Sammael (Targum Pseudo-Jonathan on Gen. 4.1 and 5.3), or the serpent in Eden (4 Macc. 18.8). Other gaps in the story also receive much attention, such as the origin of Cain's wife (in Jubilees 4.9 she is his sister, Awan, meaning "Wickedness") and the fate of Cain and his offspring (identified as demons in the Zohar and medieval legend). An early *gnostic sect, the Cainites, may have regarded Cain as a savior figure.

In the New Testament, Abel is the prototypical martyr, who died for his faith (Matt. 23.35 par.; Heb. 11.4; 12.24).

Canaan. An ancient name for the region occupied today by Lebanon and Israel (Map 1). The origin of the term "Canaan" is obscure. It was used at *Nuzi in Upper *Mesopotamia as a term for red or purple dye, a product for which the coastal Canaanites were famous. Although it has been suggested that the geographical name Canaan was derived from the name of the dye, it is more likely that the Nuzi dyes were named for their Canaanite manufacturers. Similarly, the rare meaning "merchants" for "Canaanites" in biblical Hebrew (Zech. 14.21; Prov. 31.24) is probably a secondary development, based on the mercantile reputation of the coastal Canaanites, rather than a clue to the origin of the word.

"Canaan" was in use as a geographical designation as early as the third millennium BCE. In the latter half of the second millennium it referred to a province of the *Egyptian empire in western Asia. The province of Canaan was bordered on the north by the land of Amurru, which lay in southern *Syria west of the middle Orontes, and on the east by the province of Upe, which included the region of *Damascus and northern Transjordan. The Israelites seem to have adopted this older usage of the name when they took control of the land. The frontiers of Canaan described in Numbers 34.1–12 correspond closely to those of the Egyptian province; the eastern and western boundaries are formed by the Mediterranean coast and the Jordan rift respectively, the southern boundary extends from the southern end of the Dead Sea west to the *Wadi of Egypt near Gaza, and the northern boundary traverses the Pass of Hamath on the upper Orontes north of the Lebanon.

The biblical writers sometimes use "Canaanites" as a general designation for all indigenous inhabitants of ancient Palestine without ethnic or political distinction (Exod. 13.11; Judg. 1). Elsewhere the same peoples are collectively called "*Amorites" (Gen. 15.16; Amos 2.9, 10). This general usage of "Canaanites" was most important as a term marking ethnic boundaries, distinguishing the Israelites from the indigenous peoples with whom intermarriage was to be avoided (Gen. 24.3; 28.1). The ethnic position in which the Israelites placed the Canaanites is expressed genealogically in Genesis 10.6, 15–18, in which Canaan is said to have been a son of *Noah's second son Ham, a brother of *Cush (Ethiopia), *Egypt, and Put (Libya?), and the father of the Sidonians (the *Phoenicians), the *Hittites, the *Jebusites, the Amorites, and the other pre-Israelite inhabitants of Canaan.

Elsewhere in the Bible, the *Promised Land is thought of as having been ethnically diverse, and the Canaanites are presented as one of several peoples who lived there before the arrival of Israel (Gen. 15.18–21; Exod. 3.8, 17). According to Deuteronomy 7.1, the Canaanites were one of seven nations driven out before the Israelites. In still other passages the pre-Israelite population is said to have had regional ethnic divisions, of which the Canaanites were the coastal component (Num. 13.29; Deut. 1,7; Josh. 5.1). In this last usage the term "Canaanites" corresponds exactly to "Phoenicians."

Canon. This entry discusses how various writings and collections of writings were officially accepted by various religious authorities and communities as scripture; it consists of three articles:

Order of Books in the Hebrew Bible
Canon of the Hebrew Bible and the Old Testament
New Testament

The first article deals with the arrangement of books in the sacred text of Judaism, and the second article describes the processes by which those (and other) books were accepted as canonical by both Jewish and Christian communities, in the latter case as the Old Testament. The last article deals with the canonization of the New Testament.

Order of Books in the Hebrew Bible

No traditions have survived concerning the authorities who fixed the canon of Hebrew scriptures, or about the internal order of the books, or about the underlying principles that determined their sequence. It is probable, but not certain, that the three distinct collections known as the *Pentateuch, the Prophets, and the Writings (Hebr. tôrâ [*Torah], nĕbîîm, and kĕtûbîm, respectively, the initial letters of which form the acronym tanak, used in Jewish tradition for the Bible) represent the three successive stages of canonization. Apart from the Pentateuch, the order of whose five books is invariable, the arrangement of the contents of the other two corpora was not uniform in *manuscripts and printed editions until fairly recently.

An anonymous tannaitic tradition (Bab. Bat. 14b), no later than ca. 200 CE, lists the order of the books of the Prophets and the Writings. This presents a problem because the codex form was not adopted by Jews before the fifth century CE and because the general and favored scribal practice—with one exception—was to restrict each scroll to a single biblical book. What then is the meaning of term "order" in the rabbinic text? The most likely explanation is that it refers to the manner of storage and the system of classification and cataloguing in vogue in the libraries and schools of Palestine. The library procedures of the Hellenistic world would have required each of the three collections of canonical works to be placed in a separate armarium, with the scrolls arranged in their appropriately assigned order.

The sequence of the Former Prophets following the Pentateuch is: Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings. This arrangement never varies and presents one long continuous history of Israel from the beginning of the *conquest to the fall of the Judean kingdom, the Babylonian *exile, and the release of King Jehoiachin from prison in 561 BCE. (See Deuteronomic History.)

The variations in the order of the books occur in the Latter Prophets and particularly in the Writings. A majority of manuscripts and most printed Bibles feature Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, which is the proper historical order. The above-cited source, however, followed by some manuscripts, lists Isaiah in third place in juxtaposition with its contemporary Hosea. Another tradition has Jeremiah after Kings and before Isaiah and Ezekiel. This is because that prophet was active during the last years of the monarchy, and Jeremiah 39 and 52 largely duplicate 2 Kings 25.

The small prophetic books, generally known as the "Minor Prophets," were habitually transcribed onto a single scroll and were collectively designated "The Twelve" (so already in Sir. 49.10, ca. 180 BCE). Their internal arrangement is: Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi. This is also the order of a scroll of the second century CE from Wadi Murabba'at (see Dead Sea Scrolls) containing the Hebrew Minor Prophets, and it apparently reflected traditional views about their historical sequence. The same order, but with Micah following Amos and succeeded by Joel, is given in 2 Esdras 1.39–40. This groups together three prophets of the eighth century BCE.

The order of the Writings in Hebrew printed Bibles is: Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, Chronicles. Passages like 2 Maccabees 2.13–14 and Luke 24.44 seem to attest to the great antiquity of the initial place of Psalms. The aforementioned tannaitic source has Ruth before Psalms due to the concluding genealogy of *David, the reputed author of the Psalter. The Aleppo Codex (end of ninth century CE and the Leningrad Codex of 1008 CE both open the Writings with Chronicles, probably because that work duplicates the Pentateuchal genealogies and much of the Former Prophets.

The tannaitic practice, also found in manuscripts and ultimately standardized in the printed editions, was to conclude the Hebrew scriptures with Chronicles following Ezra-Nehemiah. This must have been a very early tradition, for it is reflected in Matthew 23.35 and Luke 11.51. The inversion of the chronological order must have arisen out of a desire to close the canon on a note of consolation, and to make the statement that the fulfillment of biblical prophecy involves the return of the Jewish people to its ancestral land. Apart from this messianic exegesis, it also serves to encase the Hebrew scriptures within a framework of historical narrative, for Chronicles begins with *Adam and its last sentence contains the same two key Hebrew verbs of redemption with which Genesis concludes (pqd, 'lh, Gen. 50.24–25; 2 Chron. 36.23).

Christian editions reverse the order of Prophets-Writings, so that the closing words of Malachi (4.5–6 [Heb. 3.23–24]) concerning *Elijah become transitional to the New Testament, and connect with the role of *John the Baptist (see Matt. 11.13–14; Mark 1.2; 9.11–13; Luke 1.16–17).

Least stable in respect of order are the small books in the corpus of the Writings. The tannaitic source follows Proverbs with Ecclesiastes and the Song of Solomon because all three are attributed to King *Solomon. Most medieval manuscripts preserve this association in one way or another. Lamentations, Daniel, and Esther are grouped together since they all belong to the period of the exile. In medieval times, the Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther were all clustered together in that order, based upon their use as *lectionaries in the cycle of the Jewish religious calendar, commencing with *Passover. This system became the rule in the printed editions. Greek Bibles differ considerably from the Hebrew scriptures in that the books are arranged according to genres of literature. Ignoring the additional *Apocrypha that are interspersed among the canonical works, the following classification emerges. First comes a narrative-historical collection that comprises the Pentateuch and Former Prophets, with Ruth attached to Judges, and Chronicles following Kings. Second is a prophetic collection consisting of: Isaiah; Jeremiah, to which is adjoined Lamentations for thematic reasons and traditions of authorship; Ezekiel; Daniel, because he is regarded as a prophet, a contemporary of Ezekiel, and is identified with the personality of that name mentioned in Ezekiel 14.14, 20; 28.3; and the Twelve in a slightly different internal order. The two complete Greek codices, the fourth-century CE Vaticanus and the fifth-century CE Alexandrinus, share these characteristics. However, the latter has Esther and Ezra-Nehemiah immediately after the prophetical collection, while the former places Ezra-Nehemiah after Chronicles. The third part is a poetic-didactic collection. Codex Vaticanus has Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Solomon, Job, and Esther. The order of Codex Alexandrinus is Psalms, Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Song of Solomon. Also the sequence of the second and third collections interchanges in the two codices.

Other Greek codices feature different arrangements and there is no uniformity in the traditions of the churches. All extant Greek codices and lists are of Christian origin, and it is uncertain whether or not any represent alternative Jewish conventions about the order of the biblical books. NAHUM M. SARNA

From the fourth century CE, the word "canon" (from a Greek word meaning "a rule") has been used to denote the correct list of the biblical books, and in consequence the collection of books thus listed. It is important to distinguish between the composition of the biblical books and their recognition as scripture. Scholars sometimes envisage a five-stage process of composition, circulation, revision, collection, and recognition as canonical, and such a long process may indeed have been involved for some books. Others of the books may have been much more rapidly acknowledged. But if we may judge from the history of the New Testament canon (see the next article in this entry), some books were probably recognized as having divine authority more slowly than others. It was at one time widely believed that the whole canon had been recognized by the time of *Ezra, and this idea is already reflected in 2 Esdras 14.44–48, where Ezra is said to have "made public" twenty-four books (the standard Jewish count of the canonical books). The idea that Ezra knew the canon is probably not entirely without foundation, for most of it had then been written, and an older tradition speaks of Ezra's contemporary *Nehemiah, after the calamity of the *exile, gathering together in a library "the books about the kings and prophets, and the writings of David, and letters of kings about votive offerings" (2 Macc. 2.13). In addition, Ezra would have known the books of the *Pentateuch, which must also have been gathered together by this time, so most scholars agree, and which were the basis of his reforming work. A few of the latest books, however, had not yet been written, and they at least would obviously have had to be added to the sacred collection later. Moreover, there is reason to believe that *Esther and *Daniel were not finally accepted into the canon until the crisis of the second century BCE, related in the following verse of 2 *Maccabees, where we are told that "in the same way Judas also collected all the books that had been lost on account of the war that had come upon us" (2 Macc. 2.14). This would have taken place about 164 BCE. The Judas in question is Judas Maccabeus, and the war is the persecuting campaign of the Hellenistic Syrian king Antiochus Epiphanes, who attempted to destroy the scriptures (1 Macc. 1.56).

Many factors contributed to the recognition of certain books as canonical; among them are the following: the tradition that many of the books came from *Moses or one of the other acknowledged prophets; the spiritual authority of the books themselves, as it was experienced in public or private reading, and in exposition; the fact that the books had come to be laid up in the *Temple as sacred; the opinions of religious leaders and the common convictions of the people about the books. And for Christians, there was the additional consideration that Jesus himself and his apostles, in the pages of the New Testament, often refer to the Jewish scriptures in general, and to many of the individual books, as having the authority of God.

The division of the Hebrew Bible into three sections (not four or five, as in Greek, Latin, and English translations), known as the Law, the Prophets, and the Writings, can be traced back to the second century BCE, when it is three times referred to in the prologue of *Sirach, added by the Greek translator of the book in about 130

BCE. He refers to the three sections as "the Law and the Prophets and the others that have followed them," "the Law and the Prophets and the other books of our ancestors," "the Law and the Prophecies and the rest of the books." It should be noted that the third section had not yet been given a definite name, though the use of the definite article and the expression "the rest of" suggests that it already had a fixed content. In other early references to the three sections (in Luke 24.44, the *Dead Sea Scrolls, and *Philo), the third section seems to be called "the Psalms," taking its name from one of the chief books it included. The later Jewish name, the Writings (Hebr. kĕtûbîm, translated into Greek as hagiographa), is first found in rabbinic literature.

For the past hundred years it had been commonly believed that the three sections do not really have any distinct identity, but are accidents of history, reflecting the different stages at which books were accepted as canonical: the Law in the fifth century BCE, the Prophets in the third century BCE, and the Hagiographa at the "synod" of Jabneh or Jamnia, about 90 CE (an academic debate that discussed, among other things, the canonicity of Ecclesiastes and the Song of Solomon). The Law, however, clearly does have a distinct identity, consisting of the four books that comprise the life of Moses and the legislation bearing his name (Exodus to Deuteronomy), together with a historical introduction (Genesis) tracing the course of events between creation and his own day. This leads one to suspect that the other two sections may also have a logical rationale, even if it is less obvious; and, especially if one takes the books in traditional order, recorded in an early quotation in the Babylonian *Talmud, it is not too difficult to see what this rationale is. Both sections, like the Law, include narrative books (covering the two subsequent periods of history) and books of another kind, not legislative, but in the case of the prophets oracular, and in the case of the Hagiographa lyrical and sapiential (*wisdom literature). The four narrative books in the Prophets are Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings, carrying on the history from the death of Moses to the end of the monarchy; these are followed by the four oracular books Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Isaiah, and the Twelve (the Minor Prophets). In the Writings the four narrative books Daniel, Esther, Ezra-Nehemiah, and Chronicles continue Jewish history by covering the period of the exile and return, Chronicles being put last probably because it begins with *Adam and ends with the return, thus recapitulating the whole of Israel's history. Preceding these are the six lyrical and sapiential books in the Hagiographa, Psalms, Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Solomon, and Lamentations, with Ruth prefixed to Psalms (but counted separately) because it ends with the genealogy of the psalmist *David. Thus, there is nothing irrational (as has usually been supposed) in the isolation of Chronicles from Samuel and Kings, and of Daniel from the Prophets, in a different section of the canon.

The belief that the Law was the first complete section to be recognized as canonical is very likely true, given its traditional association with Moses. It is quite possible, however, that some of the earlier books in the other two sections were recognized as canonical alongside the Law; and these may originally have been a single collection of non-Mosaic books, like Nehemiah's "library," which gradually increased and was only organized in two sections after it was complete. The view that the canon of the *Samaritans, which consists of the Law alone, shows that when their schism with the Jews took place this was all the Jewish canon consisted of, cannot be sustained. *Qumran evidence has now made it probable that the schism did not become final until the destruction of the Samaritan temple on Mount Gerizim by the Jews in about 120 BCE. So the Samaritans of that period must certainly have rejected books which were already canonical among the Jews, probably because many of those books explicitly recognized the Jerusalem Temple.

One of the main reasons for supposing that the Hagiographa were not received into the canon until a late date is that four of them (Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, the Song of Solomon, and Esther) raise serious problems that were debated among the rabbis of the first few centuries CE. We know, however, from rabbinic literature that similar problems were raised by most of the other canonical books, and that it was only because in these books they were particularly intractable that they were taken so seriously. Moreover, there was a fifth book that raised equally serious problems, Ezekiel, which is in the Prophets. If the canonicity of this book could be debated after the first century CE, clearly the question was not one of adding books to the canon but of removing books from it. Needless to say, nothing of the kind was actually done.

It has been widely supposed that certain schools of thought had divergent canons. Some of the church fathers say that the *Sadducees accepted only the Law, like the Samaritans. The Sadducees may have joined up with the Samaritans during the century after the destruction of the Jerusalem Temple (the center of their influence) by the Romans in 70 CE, but prior to that time their canon seems to have been the same as that of the *Pharisees. Again, the presence of books of the *Apocrypha in *Septuagint manuscripts has led to the suggestion that the Hellenistic Jews of Alexandria had a wider canon than that of the Jews of Palestine. However, the voluminous writings of the first-century CE Alexandrian Jew *Philo are against this theory. Moreover, the manuscripts in question were produced by Christian scribes, at a date when knowledge of the Jewish canon was becoming somewhat vague in Christian circles; and in any case they are evidence of what Christians regarded as edifying reading rather than as strictly canonical. Finally, the *Essenes have been supposed to have included in their canon congenial pseudonymous apocalypses such as 1 Enoch and Jubilees. In fact, they seem rather to have treated these as a sort of interpretive appendix to the canon, on a lower level of inspiration. Jude 14–15, which quotes 1 Enoch, is certainly not saying more than this about it, and in Jude's Christian (not Essene) context is probably saying less, that is, he may be using the quotation as an ad hominem argument.

The New Testament shows Jesus and his apostles endorsing a canon wider than that of the Samaritans and indistinguishable from that of the Pharisees, which now seems to have been the standard (if not, indeed, the only) Jewish canon. It had probably closed, in the form found in the Hebrew Bible, not later than the second century BCE. The threefold division of the canon, the traditional order of the books, and their standard Jewish numeration as twenty-four may well be due to Judas Maccabeus and his advisors (see 2 Macc. 2.14, and above); the slightly later numeration of the books as twenty-two, found in *Josephus, is based on the number of letters in the Hebrew alphabet, and appends Ruth to Judges and Lamentations to Jeremiah, thus reducing the number by two.

Today, the canon exists in two main forms: that found in the Hebrew Bible, followed by Jews, Protestants, and some Orthodox churches, and that found in the *Septuagint, which includes the *Apocrypha, followed by Roman Catholics and also some Orthodox churches. (See also Bible.)

New Testament

The canon of the New Testament resulted from the interplay of various theological and historical factors. The decisive factor was the impact of the person and message of *Jesus Christ, together with the Christian conviction that in him as the Lord, God had spoken his final and authoritative word in history. As the Christian movement was confronted with philosophical and religious trends current in the Mediterranean world of its time, the need for an authentic expression and preservation of the foundation of its belief became the basic motivation toward the realization of the New Testament canon. This grew the more acute after the demise of the first generation of eyewitnesses. Certainly the idea of an Old Testament canon functioned as an analogy and, to a certain extent, as a stimulus in this regard. Few factors, however, expedited the growth of the idea of the canon more than the attacks from heterodox quarters, like those of Marcion, the *gnostics, and the Montanists (see below). Finally the need for one, universally accepted holy book for the whole church also played a role.

Historical Survey. Historical processes do not lend themselves to neat chronological delineations. Nevertheless, we can roughly divide the far-reaching process through which the twenty-seven books of the New Testament were brought into a normative, carefully delineated, and ecclesiastically accepted unit, with an authority equivalent to that of the Hebrew Bible, into four periods:

The first phase (latter part of first century CE): Creation of various early Christian documents. Initially the gospel message was transmitted orally. In this period the young church was guided, in addition to the Old Testament, first by the apostolic witness, which developed into the apostolic tradition, and second by early Christian *prophecy. In particular, the first of these factors was destined to play a decisive role in the eventual decisions about the extent of the New Testament canon. The authoritative writings would be those emanating from the *apostles or the circle of those standing in a not too indirect relation to them. The prophetic witness is represented in the New Testament canon by the book of *Revelation, although its ultimate recognition was determined by its association with *John the apostle. The authors of the early Christian documents did not visualize their writings as part of a future canon. Rather they intended merely to give pastoral guidance to young churches. But as foundational documents, standing so close to the origin of Christianity, they possessed the inherent possibility of later becoming part of a normative collection.

The second phase (roughly from the close of the first century to the middle of the second): Growing recognition of the normative character and collection into groups of a basic number of writings. This period, demarcated by Clement of Rome (ca. 96 CE) on the one hand and Justin Martyr (ca. 150 CE) on the other, finds oral tradition increasingly replaced by the written *Gospels. Initially oral tradition was used alongside and even preferred to the Gospels. But as the reliability of the former declined, it was gradually replaced by the four Gospels. In 1 Clement, the Didache, Ignatius, and Papias, the "living voice" (as Papias terms it) of the oral tradition still enjoys preference, while in Polycarp's letter to the Philippians (ca. 135 CE) the scale tips in favor of the written Gospels. In 2 Clement (ca. 140 CE) we have at least twice as many quotations from the written Gospels as from all other sources, and from the middle of the second century the written Gospels are predominant. The gnostic Gospel of Truth, for example, knows all four Gospels, while only uncertain traces of the oral tradition occur. The same holds true for Justin Martyr who makes only sporadic use of the oral tradition. Parallel to this development is the increasing use of the written Gospels for liturgical readings. Justin (Apology I.67.3–4) reports that the memoirs of the apostles (i.e., the Gospels) are not only read but also commented upon in public worship, which would put them on a par with the Old Testament books. The growing recognition of a substantial number of writings is also evidenced by the way references to them are made. In 2 Clement 2.4 and Barnabas 4.14 the gospel of *Matthew, for instance, is referred to as on equal footing with Old Testament writings. At this stage we also find the collecting of early Christian writings around two foci, the Pauline correspondence and the Gospels. We can reasonably accept that by the middle of the second century the Pauline corpus as well as the four gospels were available in collections. All these factors serve to illustrate that they were increasingly recognized as normative ecclesiastical documents. The idea of a New Testament canon was beginning to emerge.

The third phase (ca. mid-second century to 190 CE): The New Testament canon becomes a reality. Marcion was the first person, as far as we know, who actually visualized the idea of a New Testament canon. He deliberately excluded the Old Testament from his normative collection and included only *Luke and ten Pauline letters (which he purged of Jewish traits). The official church reacted by emphasizing the normative character of all four Gospels as well as all thirteen letters ascribed to *Paul. Irenaeus reflects this position. In addition he probably accepted all the other New Testament books (though he does not mention all the *Catholic letters) and, perhaps, also Hermas. His evaluation of 1 Clement and the *Wisdom of Solomon is positive, but it is doubtful whether he regarded them as "holy scripture." It is clear, however, that by now the idea of the canon has materialized; its broad base is fixed, but uncertainty still exists over the books on its periphery.

Final stage (ca. 190–400 CE): The closing of the canon. It was particularly the claims to having received new revelations made by the gnostics (against whom Irenaeus already had reacted) and the Montanists, members of an apocalyptic prophetic movement, that stressed the need for a clear demarcation of the canon. Whereas the canon of Clement of Alexandria was still open, Origen and Eusebius in the Eastern church, as well as the author of the Canon of Muratori, a late second-century list, in the West, were convinced of the necessity of a clearly demarcated canon. For that reason both the former two writers, each in their own way, differentiated between three groups of writings: the generally accepted, the uncertain, and those that should be definitely excluded. In the wake of the vehement anti-Montanist reaction, many Eastern churches now began to question the position of the one prophetic-apocalyptic book in the canon, namely Revelation, a question sporadically recurring until the Middle Ages. In the West the anti-Montanist reaction took another course: in reaction against their accent on passages like Hebrews 6.4–6, the authenticity of the letter to the *Hebrews became a matter of dispute which lasted until the fourth century. Uncertainty still existed in various quarters over some of the Catholic letters and also over books like the Didache, the Shepherd of Hermas, and the Wisdom of Solomon.

In the East the uncertainty was cleared up by the thirty-ninth Paschal Letter of Athanasius, metropolitan of Alexandria, written in 367 CE, which listed all the books of the present New Testament. The writings of the apostolic fathers are excluded, but allowance is made for Hermas, the Didache, and the Wisdom of Solomon (as well as certain Old Testament *apocrypha) to be read privately. It is also noteworthy that in this letter the Greek equivalent for the verb "to canonize" (in the sense of: "officially recognize as normative") is used three times of the biblical books. (Some fifteen years earlier Athanasius had used the word "canon" in a technical sense of the Bible—the first certain occurrence of this use of the word.) Although only intended for the churches under his supervision, Athanasius's influence was such that his canon was widely approved in the East, and it greatly expedited the movement towards uniformity in the whole church. In the Western church the canon of Athanasius was probably approved at the Synod of Rome in 382 CE and definitely confirmed by a papal declaration of the year 405. Under Augustine's influence the North African church followed suit at the Synods of Hippo Regius (393) and Carthage (397), and, owing to persisting uncertainties regarding Hebrews, *James, and *Jude, reiterated its decisions at Carthage (419). By now the New Testament canon, with its twenty-seven books, was almost universally accepted as the second part of the Christian Bible. The one exception was the Syrian National Church where the popular Diatessaron of Tatian, a second-century harmonization of the Gospels, had held sway for centuries at the cost of the four "separate gospels," and where initially strong resistance existed against some general epistles and Revelation. Here it would still take some time for the Peshitta, the official Syriac translation, to oust the Diatessaron. The small East-Syrian Nestorian church, however, persisted with a canon of twenty-two books (excluding 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, Jude, and Revelation). The other exception was the Ethiopian church, which included Hermas, the two Clementine epistles, and the Apostolic Constitutions, and whose New Testament canon consists, up to our own day, of thirty-eight books (see Bible).

Criteria of Canonicity. In determining the content and scope of the canon various criteria were applied, e.g., that of apostolicity, the rule of faith (regula fidei), and the consensus of the churches. Of these the first played the most important role. It would be a mistake, however, to deduce from this that apostolicity was, at least initially, treated as a merely formal criterion. As attested, for instance, by the Canon of Muratori, the real consideration was rather that of reliability. As primary sources the apostles and their followers were seen as the trustworthy exponents of the original revelation given in *Jesus Christ. It would also be a mistake to regard the official recognition of our present twenty-seven books by the church as the act which gave them their canonical status. The decisions of the church were in reality the acknowledgement of the intrinsic authority and power of these writings.

Capernaum. A village on the northwest shore of the Sea of Galilee (Map 12: X2). The Greek name Kapharnaoum evidently represents a Semitic original, "village of Nahum." It is identified as Tell Hum, a mound that has now been extensively excavated.

Jesus is reported to have settled in Capernaum (Matt. 4.13) and made his home there at the beginning of his ministry (Mark 2.1). From here he carried on his early preaching and healed many, beginning with an *exorcism in the synagogue (Mark 1.21–28). Here he healed the slave of the *centurion who had built the synagogue (Luke 7.1–10; Matt. 8.5–13). The synagogue is also the scene of the discourse on the *bread of life (John 6.22–59).

The first archaeological discovery was a magnificent *synagogue, now dated to the fourth century CE. It is constructed of limestone, enclosed by columns and adorned with fine carvings, and the facade faces Jerusalem.

More recently a large area has been excavated, in which single-story basalt dwellings were grouped in squares, with streets in between. In this complex there is an octagonal church from about 450 CE. Beneath it is a house church (about 350 CE), which was remodeled from a dwelling that the Franciscan archaeologists identify as Peter's house (Mark 1.29). Near the great synagogue there is a smaller one, built of basalt, probably from the first century CE.

Capernaum was evidently a fishing village when its houses were built in the first century BCE and had a population of not more than one thousand. SHERMAN ELBRIDGE JOHNSON

Catholic Letters. "General" (Grk. katholikos) epistles written to early Christianity at large, rather than to specific congregations (like the letters of *Paul and Rev. 2–3). The New Testament contains seven catholic letters: *James, traditionally ascribed to "the brother of Jesus" (Mark 6.3; cf. Gal 1.19; 1 Cor. 9.5; Acts 1.14); 1 and 2 *Peter, ascribed to Jesus' disciple; 1, 2, and 3 *John, which are related to the gospel of John; and *Jude, ascribed to the brother of James.

PHILIP SELLEW

Centurion. A century in the *Roman army was nominally a hundred, in practice usually eighty strong. There were sixty centurions in a Roman legion. They were of officer rank, corresponding to company commanders. They were men of status in the community and had a wide range of expertise and experience. Their duties often ranged beyond the strictly regimental, even to judicial functions and the administration of small military districts.

Centurions were also found in the auxiliary regiments supplementing the legions. These were either promoted from the ranks or transferred from a legion, and they might be Roman citizens (often recently enfranchised) or noncitizens.

The centurion at *Capernaum (Matt. 8.5) was probably a member of the armed forces of the *tetrarch *Herod, organized on the Roman pattern. The centurion at the death of Jesus (Mark 15.39 par.) was serving in a Roman auxiliary unit, as were the centurions at the arrest of Paul (Acts 21.32). So too were Cornelius (10.1) and Julius (27.1), both probably Roman citizens.

Chaos. The Hebrew word tōhû is generally translated in two ways. It can denote the arid *wilderness, where *wadis disappear (Job 6.18), the deranged wander (Job 12.24; cf. Isa. 40.23), and Israel was found (Deut. 32.10). It can also mean the chaotic state before *creation (Job 26.7); in this sense it can be paired with bōhû (Gen. 1.2; Isa. 34.11; Jer. 4.23) and by extension can mean any empty, formless reality, especially other gods (1 Sam. 12.21; Isa. 41.29; 44.9), or defeated nations (Isa. 24.10; 34.11; 40.17).

These two concepts are linked in biblical tradition (Isa. 45.18) and in underlying mythology. Ancient Near Eastern *myths of creation frequently describe a battle between the creator, generally a storm god, and primeval forces, most frequently watery; reflexes in biblical traditions include the sea, the deep, and *Leviathan, whose chaotic powers must be kept under control (see Job 9.8; 26.8–13; 38.8–11; Pss. 89.8–11; 104.6–9; Isa. 27.1). Canaanite tradition in the texts from *Ugarit and elsewhere also narrates a conflict between *Baal, the Canaanite storm god, and the god Mot (Death); the domain of the latter is the arid desert as well as the underworld. In biblical tradition creation can be depicted as the triumph of Yahweh over the sterile forces of drought (see Gen 2.4–5); this is then applied to the creation of Israel (Deut. 32.10) and to its restoration (Isa. 35.6–7; 43.20; 51.3). Thus God's defeat of the forces of chaos, both water and desert, is a necessary prelude to creation as well as an ongoing activity. (See also Israel, Religion of.)

The Hebrew pair tōhû wābōhû is also the basis of the English and French word tohu-bohu, meaning "chaos and confusion."

Chapter and Verse Divisions. The complete Bible of today is ordinarily divided into chapters and verses, but such divisions were not part of the original texts. They were developed at a much later date, primarily in the interest of facilitating reference; consequently they do not always agree with the natural development of thought in the text.

Divisions in the Hebrew Text. The earliest biblical manuscripts, from *Qumran, have certain divisions in the text, although they are not yet standardized and may occur at different places in copies of the same book. Eventually a system was developed (except in the Psalter) involving what are called open and closed paragraphs (pārāšâ, plural pārāšiyyôt), the purpose of which was to give assistance in understanding the flow of thought. An open (pĕtûḥâ) paragraph is one that begins a new line after an empty or incomplete line; a closed (sĕtûmâ) paragraph is separated from the preceding paragraph by a short space within the line. Later scribes ignored this distinction in the actual written format but prefixed the Hebrew letter p or s to indicate the distinction. In the Psalter the verse division depends on the parallelism (see Poetry, Biblical Hebrew).

Another division of the text into more lengthy sections was developed by Palestinian scholars, who provided 452 sĕdārîm (weekly lessons) for a three-year *lectionary cycle. In Babylonia, where the *Torah (see Canon, article on Order of Books in the Hebrew Bib... ad through each year, the division wa... into fifty-four (or fifty-three) weekly lessons.

Divisions in the Greek Text. Division within books in *Septuagint *manuscripts was also in use at an early period. The variety in the systems used suggests that they were drawn up independently by a number of different scribes and/or editors.

In New Testament Greek manuscripts we find several different systems of division. The oldest seems to be that contained in Codex Vaticanus, in which the divisions into sections were made with reference to breaks in the sense. There are 170 in Matthew, 62 in Mark, 152 in Luke, and 80 in John.

Many manuscripts of the Gospels are provided with an ingenious system developed by Eusebius of Caesarea (ca. 260–ca. 340 CE) to aid the reader in locating parallel passages. Each gospel was divided into longer or shorter sections, depending on the relation of each section to one or more parallels in the other Gospels: 355 for Matthew, 233 for Mark, 343 for Luke, and 232 for John. Then Eusebius prepared tables, called canons. The first contains a list in which all four Gospels agree; the second, passages common to Matthew, Mark, and Luke; the third, passages in which Matthew, Luke, and John agree; the fourth, passages in which Matthew, Mark, and John agree; and so on until almost all the possible combinations were exhausted. Finally, there were references to material in each gospel alone—62 in Matthew, 19 in Mark, 72 in Luke, and 96 in John.

For the book of Acts several systems of chapter divisions are found in the manuscripts. Codex Vaticanus has two sets of chapters, one of thirty-six, the other of sixty-nine. Most of the manuscripts of the book have a system of forty chapters.

The Pauline and general letters were also divided into chapters. Codex Vaticanus has two sets of chapters—an earlier and a later. In the Pauline letters, according to the earlier division of the text, the numeration of the chapters runs continuously through the whole corpus as though the letters were regarded as constituting one book. Because of a break in the numbering between pages 70 and 93 of the codex, it is evident that in an ancestor of Vaticanus the letter to the Hebrews stood between Galatians and Ephesians.

Some manuscripts of the book of Revelation are supplied with a system of divisions that was developed by Archbishop Andrew of Caesarea in Cappadocia (ca. 600), who wrote a commentary on the book that gives a "spiritual" exegesis. He divided the book into twenty-four discourses (Gk. logoi) and each of these into three smaller divisions, thus making seventy-two of the latter. According to Andrew's explanation, the number of the discourses corresponds to the number of elders sitting on thrones about the throne of God (Rev. 4.4), and the three subdivisions symbolize the tripartite nature of the elders (body, soul, and spirit).

Development of Modern Chapter and Verse Divisions. The introduction of the present system of chapter divisions has sometimes been attributed to Cardinal Hugo of St. Cher (d. 1263) for use in his concordance to the Latin *Vulgate. Before Hugo, however, the system that, with small modifications, is still in use today was introduced into the Latin Bible by a lecturer at the University of Paris, Stephen Langton, later Archbishop of Canterbury (d. 1228). Even before the invention of *printing (ca. 1456) the system began to be adopted for manuscripts of the Bible in languages other than Latin.

The chapters were at first subdivided (probably by Hugo of St. Cher) into seven portions (not paragraphs), marked in the margin by the letters A, B, C, D, E, F, G. In the shorter Psalms, however, the division did not always extend to seven. This division (except in the Psalms) was modified by Conrad of Halberstadt (ca. 1290), who reduced the divisions of the shorter chapters from seven to four, so that the letters were always A–G or A–D. This subdivision continued long after the introduction of the present verses.

Numbered verses (for a Hebrew concordance to the *Masoretic text) were first worked out by Rabbi Isaac Nathan in about 1440. In the earlier printed Hebrew Bibles each fifth verse is marked with its Hebrew numeral. Arabic numerals were first added for the intervening verses by Joseph Athias at Amsterdam in 1661 at the suggestion of Jan Leusden. The first portion of the Bible printed with the Masoretic verses numbered was the Psalterium Quincuplex of Faber Stapulensis. The Psalterium was beautifully printed at Paris in 1509 by Henry, father of Robert Stephanus, each verse commencing the line with a red letter and a numeral prefixed. In 1527 (or 1528) the Dominican Sanctes Paginus of Lucca published at Lyons, in quarto, his accurate translation of the Bible into Latin from the Hebrew and Greek. The verses are marked with Arabic numerals in the margin.

The current verse division in the New Testament was introduced by Robert Stephanus (Estienne), who in 1551 published at Geneva a Greek and Latin edition of the New Testament with the text of the chapters divided into separate verses. The first whole Bible divided into the present verses, and the first in which they were introduced into the *Apocrypha, was Stephanus's Latin Vulgate issued at Geneva in 1555. In the books of the Hebrew Bible Stephanus followed Paginus, but in the New Testament and in the Apocrypha he increased the number of verses. Thus, in the gospel of Matthew, Paginus has 577 verses, and Stephanus 1071; in Tobit Paginus has but 76 verses, while Stephanus has 292. According to Stephanus's son, his father made the divisions into verses inter equitandum on a journey from Paris to Lyons. Although some have taken this to mean "on horseback" (and have explained occasionally inappropriate verse divisions as originating when the horse bumped his pen into the wrong place!), a better interpretation is that the task was accomplished at intervals while he rested at inns along the road.

The verse divisions devised by Stephanus were widely and rapidly adopted and first appeared, for example, in English in the Geneva Bible (New Testament, 1557; Bible, 1560). Despite its utility, the system has often been criticized not only because the division sometimes occurs in the middle of a sentence, thus breaking the natural flow of thought, but also because to the reader the text appears to be a series of separate and detached statements. While it is too late to change the system to correct unfortunate verse divisions, at least the verses should never be printed each as a separate paragraph (as in most editions of the King James or Authorized Version), but the text should be continuous, in logical paragraphs, with the numerals in the margin or printed inconspicuously in the text.

WALTER F. SPECHT

Cherethites and Pelethites. A group of mercenaries loyal to *David. As a military unit separate from the regular army, the Cherethites and the Pelethites were under the command of Benaiah (2 Sam. 8.18; 20.23). They followed David on his flight from *Absalom (2 Sam. 15.18), fought for him during the revolt of Sheba (2 Sam. 20.7), and supported Benaiah's efforts to crown *Solomon as his father's successor (1 Kings 1.38, 44). Although this personal mercenary unit seems to disappear after David's death and the elevation of Benaiah to commander-in-chief of Solomon's army (1 Kings 2.29–35), some scholars connect the Cherethites with the Carites mentioned in 2 Kings 11.4, 19.

Research on the Cherethites and the Pelethites has focused on their origins and ethnic affiliations. Most commonly, but by no means universally, the terms are understood as Cretans and *Philistines, respectively. In two later prophetic passages (Ezek. 25.16; Zeph. 2.5) the Cherethites appear in poetic parallelism with the Philistines. Oracles of doom against the Philistines also make use of word play on the Hebrew root krt, "to (be) cut off," with which the word for Cherethites was associated (e.g., Jer. 47.4; Amos 1.8). From 1 Samuel 30.14 it can be surmised that the Cherethites were settled in southern Philistia and were engaged by David while he was in Ziklag as a vassal to Achish, the Philistine king of Gath (1 Sam. 27; 29). Although the exact relationship between the Cherethites and the Pelethites and the Philistines is unresolved, it is likely that they were all descended from the various sea peoples of Aegean origin who first settled on the southwestern coastal strip of Palestine at the beginning of the Iron Age (twelfth century BCE).

CARL S. EHRLICH

Cherub, Cherubim. Hebrew singular and plural for hybrid supernatural creatures associated with the presence of God, and in postbiblical tradition identified as one of the choirs of *angels. Among the nearly one hundred occurrences of the word in the Bible, the usual image is that of a huge eagle-winged, human-faced bull-lion, iconographic features familiar in Assyrian and Canaanite sources. Four interrelated roles for the cherubim can be identified.

Guardians of Paradise. As guardians of the entrance to *Eden (Gen 3.24; Ezek. 28.14–16) they are the functional counterparts of the colossal, human-faced winged bulls used in Mesopotamian architecture to guard the entrance to temples and palaces.

Protective Bearers of God's Throne. In descriptions of the *ark, a three-dimensional cherub stands at either side with wings protectively outstretched over its cover (e.g., Exod. 25.18–20). Before the *Temple was built, when the ark was still a portable shrine and housed in the tent of meeting (see Tabernacle), the Lord spoke to Moses "from between the two cherubim" (Exod. 25.22; Num. 7.89), where he was understood to sit invisibly enthroned (1 Sam 4.4; 2 Sam 6.2; Isa. 37.16; Pss. 80.1; 99.1). Portable shrines similar to Israel's ark are known from Egypt, Mesopotamia, Canaan, and Arabia, and some also feature cherubim as a decorative motif. In Solomon's Temple the ark became a permanent fixture (1 Kings 8.4–8), and the size of the cherubim increased dramatically (1 Kings 6.23–28). Notable Canaanite parallels are the Megiddo ivory reliefs (ca. 1200 BCE) and the Ahiram sarcophagus from Phoenicia (ca. 1000), both of which depict winged cherubim supporting the throne of the local king.

Decorative Elements. The walls and doors of the Temple were carved with cherubim and palm trees (1 Kings 6.29–35). In many ways the art and symbolism of the Temple replicated the garden of Eden, where the cherubim guarded the tree of life, widely depicted as the date palm.

Means of Yahweh's Mobility. In the theophanic visions of Ezekiel 1 and 10, the cherubim become the power by which God's chariot-throne is able to fly. In 2 Samuel 22.11 (= Ps. 18.10) the Lord is said to ride on a cherub, equated in poetic parallelism with flying on the wings of the wind.

The etymology of the Hebrew word kĕrûb is uncertain, but some connection with Akkadian kāribu, the intercessor guardian creature, seems probable. The cherubim of the Bible have no relationship with the winged infants or putti often featured in Renaissance art. DAVID G. BURKE

Children's Bibles. The recasting of the Bible to meet the needs of children has been a topic of increasing interest in the twentieth century. Although children were always included within the concern of the religious communities for which the Bible served as scripture, they were understood as parts of families within which the Bible would be read and explained. In Christian circles, such an assumption lies behind the widespread production of *family Bibles and their use by parents in reading to their children. But the view of the Bible as a work to be read independently by children and the accompanying challenges for a child reading an adult book reflect a recent approach to children's Bibles. Attempts to translate the Bible in language comprehensible to children have been significant only from about 1970 on.

The education of children included a knowledge of the Bible, a goal to be carried out in the home, the church, and the school, until the nineteenth century. Since it was regularly believed that the goals of education were piety, civility, and learning, children and youth were expected to be familiar with the Bible. The necessary knowledge of the Bible included not only its contents but also an affirmation of the *authority of scripture.

After the invention of *printing by movable type and the rise of vernacular Bibles, the widespread dissemination of Bibles was accompanied by significant study helps such as chapter summaries (Coverdale Bible, 1535) and marginal notes (Geneva Bible, 1560). A Puritan divine such as Cotton Mather (1663–1728), in his Bonifacius: An Essay upon the Good, proposed a number of methods intended to enable children to learn the contents of the Bible. These included Bible storytelling at the dinner table and rewards for Bible memorization—with appropriate attention to the age, interests, and abilities of particular children. The study of the Bible by children also included catechisms, psalters, and liturgies, intended to prepare them for a knowledge of the Christian faith and participation in public worship.

Among the ways used to teach children the Bible, one of the most important in England and the United States beginning in the late eighteenth century was the Sunday School in its own right and as a forerunner of the common school. Two of the popular texts used in Sunday Schools were The Sunday School Spelling Book (1822) and The Union Spelling Book (1838), both containing biblical texts and biblical diction.

In areas such as the United States where Protestants predominated through the middle of the nineteenth century, there was agreement that the reading of the Bible should be a central aspect of the public-school curriculum. The increasing religious pluralism of the United States would question this assumption and its accompanying presupposition that public reading of the Bible would be from the Authorized Version of 1611. In the United States the publication of both Roman Catholic and Jewish versions in the nineteenth century was intended, in part, to offset the exclusive use of the Authorized Version in public-school education.

By 1850 McGuffey's Eclectic Readers (1836) was the basic school reader in some thirty-seven states. Eighty percent of the schoolchildren of the United States used McGuffey's Readers for some seventy-five years. Although the majority of the material in McGuffey was nonbiblical, there was still a significant degree of biblical content in the six readers.

During the nineteenth century Sunday Schools evolved a systematic approach to Bible study. The need for children's Bibles received little attention when the focus of the child's Bible study was either the memorization of Bible verses or catechetical learning that had subsumed the Bible into affirmations of the Christian faith. In the case of memorization much attention was paid to the selection of particular verses, and contextual reading of the Bible played little role. When the Bible was the primary source of moral example, this became the strongest influence in the education of children in the Sunday Schools. Initially started as interdenominational agencies, these shifted in the course of the nineteenth century to a denominational basis. Their early goals had been to improve the moral life of their students as expressed in effective citizenship. Increasingly a knowledge of the Bible was viewed as essential for personal salvation and social stability; the Bible was a source of texts to be memorized. The texts might reflect moral themes drawn from Jesus' ministry or the lives of the ancestors and prophets. Lewis Baldwin's The Bible Interrogatory (1816) was one of the first attempts to systematize biblical study in Sunday Schools. The greatest achievement of interdenominational Sunday Schools was the creation of the International Lesson System. A post–Civil War development, these plans stressed uniform lessons for all ages. Critics of the lesson plans noted that they ignored child psychology, and in 1894 the Lesson Committee developed a separate course for younger children.

The establishment of *Bible Societies and the dissemination of Bibles, or parts of Bibles (see Circulation of the Bible), contributed to a consideration of the forms of Bibles for children. One result was to ensure that children have their own Bibles. This could be accomplished within the Sunday School movement by giving children Bibles as they completed one part of the Sunday School and moved to another. These presentation Bibles were usually an existing adult translation with a presentation nameplate and occasional illustrations.

Another form of children's Bible was a collection of Bible stories, selected for various emphases, and either paraphrased or completely rewritten. This has been the most popular form of children's Bible and accounts for a large part of juvenile Bibles available at any time.

A well-known example of the storybook Bible was Child's Bible Reader (1898), a work widely employed by three generations of Protestant Sunday School teachers in the southeastern United States. The stories in the Reader were attributed to the popular British writer, Charlotte M. Yonge. Thousands of southern homes owned copies of this Reader, distributed by door-to-door salesmen of the Southwestern Company of Nashville, Tennessee. Equally popular in a later generation was Walter de la Mare's Stories from the Bible.

The storybook approach to children's Bibles inevitably involves the selection of stories considered to be appealing or appropriate to children. Perennial favorites include *Noah, *Moses, *Samson, *David, *Jonah, and *Jesus. Common to these collections are also stories about birth and childhood, animals, and adventure stories. Such storybook Bibles generally avoid events, persons, or narratives seen as inappropriate or incomprehensible to children, such as the story of *Joshua, the letters of *Paul, and the book of *Revelation.

The storybook Bible has encouraged the use of illustrations to complement the biblical narratives and to increase their appeal for children. Examples that have been publicly recognized for their aesthetic achievement include E. Boyd Smith's writing and illustrating of The Story of Noah's Ark (1905) and Dorothy Lathrop's Animals of the Bible (1937). (See Illustrated Bibles.)

The most recent development has been the production of translations specifically for children, with considerable initiative coming from the United Bible Societies. Based on the understanding of psychological, social, and intellectual development, this movement has attempted to produce readable Bibles to match the abilities and interests of various ages. In 1983 the Sweet Publishing Company issued the pioneering International Children's Version (New Testament) as the first translation for children. In 1986, the Worthy Publishing Company issued the International Children's Bible, New Century Version, noting that this was not a storybook or a paraphrased Bible but the first translation of the whole Bible prepared specifically for children. Because of its specialized vocabulary, the publishers claim that their Bible translation can be understood by children with a grade-three reading level.

Chosen People. The Bible describes various individuals as "chosen" by God: *Abraham, *Jacob, *Moses, *Aaron, *Saul, *David, *Solomon, *Zerubbabel, and *Jesus; Jesus, in turn, chose his *disciples. These individuals are not chosen, so far as we know, for their previous virtue. All are depicted as fallible, except the shadowy Zerubbabel and the perfect Jesus. Election is usually linked with heredity; the chosen belongs to a dynasty, often as its founder. God may also choose a larger group, such as the tribe of *Levi.

The most common function of this election motif is the legitimation of groups: the house of David, the Aaronic *priests, the Levites, the *apostles. But what does it mean to be "chosen"? There is no sign of being chosen; the election theme is primarily an assertion of God's favor.

Another body called "chosen" is Israel itself (Isa. 41.8–9; 44.1–2; cf. 14.1; Ps. 105.6 [= 1 Chron. 16.13]; 106.5; 135.4; Rom. 9.11). Some consider this a later development; priestly and royal election are democratized, as all Israel becomes a "kingdom of priests" (Exod. 19.5).

The classic statement of Israel's election is Deuteronomy 7.6–9 (cf. 10.15; 14.2; 26.18; Mal. 3.17; Ps. 135.4): "The Lord your God has chosen you out of all the peoples on earth to be his people, his treasured possession. It was not because you were more numerous . . . it was because the LORD loved you, and kept the oath that he swore to your ancestors." Although the verb "choose" does not appear in Deuteronomy 32.8, according to that text God gave each nation its own god (thus the *Septuagint and Qumran versions; cf. Judges 11.24), keeping Israel for himself. Ideally, this election elicits reciprocity from Israel, which in turn chooses God (Josh. 24.22).

Election entails responsibility and risk as well as privilege; Deuteronomy 7.10–11 threatens punishment should Israel violate the *covenant; compare Amos 3.2. According to Amos 9:7–10, Israel's uniqueness lies in the fact that God will never utterly destroy it (cf. Lev. 26.44).

It is unclear when God chose Israel; one might cite the call of Abram (Gen. 12.1–3), Jacob's vision (Gen. 28.13–15), or the experience at *Sinai (Exod. 19, 20, 24). Ezekiel 20.5 dates Israel's election to God's revelation in Egypt (cf. Exod. 6.2–8).

Second *Isaiah's concept of chosenness poses special problems. Sometimes he explicitly calls Israel "chosen" (Isa. 41.8–9; 43.10; 44.1–2; 45.4; 48.10 [text uncertain]; 65.9, 15, 22), promising divine succor and numerous, pious offspring. But the prophet also describes one chosen to be a "light to the nations" (Isa. 42.1, 6; cf. 49.5–9), whose suffering atones for others' sins (Isa. 53). Scholars debate whether this is the nation of Israel, a segment thereof, or a particular member; Christianity traditionally applies these oracles to Jesus.

While the Bible does not associate Israel's election with its intrinsic merit, later Judaism reacted to its often dire circumstances by developing a belief in the spiritual superiority of all Jews, whether by birth or by choice. Thus, the *Torah was offered to various peoples but accepted only by Israel; the eroticism of the *Song of Solomon expresses God's unique love for Israel; only Israel's history is governed directly by God, other nations being subject to the laws of nature; Jewish souls derive directly from God, while the souls of *gentiles are of lesser matter. Such theories, however, have never been central Jewish doctrines. The basic concept of "chosenness" has remained, as in biblical terms, that of covenant: God chose the Jews by imposing certain restrictions upon them and holding them to a higher ethical and ritual standard. Many contemporary Jewish thinkers reject even this more modest claim as irrelevant or harmful in today's pluralistic society.

The early church called its adherents "chosen," implying that they succeeded Israel as God's favored. All who embrace Jesus, Jew and gentile alike, become "chosen" (Matt. 22.14; 24.22, 24, 31; Mark 13.20, 22, 27; Luke 18.7; Rom. 8.33; Eph. 1.4; 1 Thess. 1.4; 2 Tim. 2.10; Titus 1.1; 1 Pet. 1.10; 2 John 1.1; Rev. 17.14). *Paul does not infer from the Christians' election any intrinsic greatness or virtue (1 Cor. 1.26–29; cf. James 2.5), and he insists that Israel retains its special status (Rom. 9–11). Ironically, while many liberal Jewish thinkers disavow "chosenness," some Christian theologians today reaffirm the continuing election of the Jews. WILLIAM H. PROPP

Christ. See Jesus Christ; Messiah.

Christian. According to Acts 11.26, Jesus' disciples were first called Christians in *Antioch. Elsewhere in the New Testament the word "Christian" occurs in Acts 26.28 and 1 Peter 4.14–16.

The origin of the term "Christian" is uncertain. It comprises the word "Christ," the Greek word meaning "anointed one" (see Messiah) with an ending meaning "followers of" or "partisans of." Jews who did not accept Jesus as the Messiah would hardly refer to Jesus' disciples as Christians—the Messiah's followers. According to Acts 24.5, such Jews referred to Jesus' followers as "the sect of the Nazarenes," apparently regarding Christians as a Jewish group.

Because followers of Jesus used "*saints" (2 Cor. 1.1; Rom. 12.13; Acts 9.13, 32), "brothers" (1 Cor. 1.10; Rom. 1.13; Acts 1.16), "the *Way" (Acts 9.2; 19.9), "*disciples" (often in the Gospels; Acts 6.1–2; 11.26), and other designations when referring to themselves, it is unlikely that the term "Christian" originated among Christians.

In Acts 26.28 Agrippa uses "Christian" sarcastically; in 1 Peter 4.14–16 it is a term of reproach used during persecution. Thus, the term seems to have been derogatory. The contemporary Roman historians Tacitus (Annals 15.44) and Suetonius (Lives of the Caesars 6.16) use the term that way. Tacitus refers to Christians as people hated for their evil deeds, and Suetonius calls them "a new and evil superstition."

If first applied to Jesus' followers in Antioch, Roman officials may have coined the word to distinguish the Christian group from Judaism. Perhaps "Christian" was used to designate the Christian movement as hostile toward Agrippa. No matter where the term originated, it was first a word of scorn or ridicule. But by the end of the first century CE Christians accepted the name as a comforting sign of God's glory (1 Pet. 4.14–16; Ignatius, Romans 3.2). EDWIN D. FREED Christian Science and the Bible. Christian Science began in the United States during the latter half of the nineteenth century, appearing first as a religious teaching and later as an organized denomination. Known primarily for its practice of Christian healing, Christian Science teaches that the Bible's dominant theme is the superiority of spiritual over physical power, and that this power can be reliably—even "scientifically"—demonstrated in the lives of people today. It was founded by Mary Baker Eddy (1821–1910), a New England woman with a staunch Calvinist background and a devotion to regular study of the Bible.

Several social and personal factors help to explain the emergence of Christian Science. First, much of Mrs. Eddy's early religious life was shaped by her rebellion against her Calvinist upbringing, specifically its doctine of *predestination. Also, by midcentury, society was entering a new and scientific era, where reason, experimentation, and observable results were becoming the standard means of measuring progress and assessing truth claims. Yet for Eddy, the void left by her dissatisfaction with what she called "cruel creeds," could not be fulfilled by rational advances alone. Throughout her life she retained a characteristic Puritan piety, noted by several of her biographers, which she referred to as "a hunger and thirst for divine things."

This left her satisfied neither with the doctrinal interpretation of the Bible offered by the church nor with the more scientifically based historical-critical method of Bible analysis then gaining prominence, although she insisted that she retained whatever was valid in both. But what finally impelled her to take a radically different view of the meaning of the biblical revelation was her own suffering, including the years of near invalidism that dominated the first four decades of her life.

While she initially sought relief through almost every healing or medical system that promised comfort, including the suggestive therapeutics of the Maine mental healer Phineas Quimby, her bedrock conviction was that only the Bible offered the answer to "the great problem of being." According to her own account, she was healed of the effects of a serious accident in 1866 by reading of Jesus' healing works in the Gospels. Reflecting on her experience, she felt that she had discovered something of the underlying power, or spiritual law, that was at the very root of Christianity.

The nine years following her own healing were spent studying the Bible, writing, teaching, healing—all aimed at finding ways to articulate a metaphysics that she felt would make the Bible practical in a scientific age. Central to her view was the belief that undergirding the events of the Bible was a spiritual law, which, far from being a relic of ancient history, was dynamic and applicable in all time to bring about healing of disease and redemption from sin. She explicated her metaphysical interpretation of the Bible in her major work, Science and Health, first published in 1875 and eventually titled Science and Health, with Key to the Scriptures. She would revise and edit the book throughout the rest of her life, but it would remain the definitive statement of Christian Science.

The book became an immediate source of controversy. Critics charged that Science and Health, written by a woman with no formal training, included language not found in the Bible and deviated from orthodox Christianity in its teachings. They charged Eddy with elevating her writing to the status of the Bible.

For her part, Eddy acknowledged that her book departed from certain church doctrines, but she maintained that these doctrines originated less in the Bible than in church councils, which were often guilty of "teaching as doctrines the precepts of men" (see Isa. 29.13 AV). She asserted that the way to validate an individual's understanding of God and the Bible was by examining the fruits of that understanding. Do they demonstrate a practical grasp of the power of God's word by healing and regenerating the individual? To her, this was the acid test of biblical interpretation.

In her view, from *Moses' commandments to have no idols and to worship God alone, to the prophets' call for *repentance, to Christ Jesus' description of the presence of the *kingdom of God "within you," the Bible presented the *word of God, revealing the supremacy of God, Spirit, and the wholly spiritual nature of God's creation. Eddy felt that faith in this supreme and infinitely good God also implied that the very existence of *evil and *suffering, so evident in the material world, could be challenged as having no God-derived cause or legitimacy.

Eddy saw the nature of Godlike as being most perfectly manifested in the life of Christ Jesus. For her, Jesus' life was itself the unique revelation of what it means to live in authentic relation to God. She saw her own work, Science and Health, not as a second kind of Bible or as a replacement for it but as an offering of what she saw as the Bible's permanent and continuing meaning, making Christian discipleship a practicable possibility in the modern age. She felt that her "scientific" approach to Christianity merely made explicit what was implicit in the Bible all along, opening its message in a new and powerful way.

Today, regular study of the Bible and Science and Health remains central to the practice of Christian Science. Each day its adherents read a lesson made up of passages from these two books. This same lesson is read as the sermon in Sunday church services, and changes weekly.

Christian Scientists tend to reject the narrow literalism of *fundamentalism, as well as the liberal tendency to reduce biblical accounts to stories with intended morals. Instead, they assert that the Bible presents what might be called a "spiritual literal" account of the supremacy of God in human history. For example, Christian Scientists regard the *crucifixion, *resurrection, and *ascension of Christ Jesus as the central events of human history, embodying the supremacy of the law of God over all mortal existence. The first of six tenets left to the church by Mrs. Eddy reads, "As adherents of Truth, we take the inspired word of the Bible as our sufficient guide to eternal Life."

Christmas. The English word Christmas means Christ's Mass, the festival of Christ's birthday. 25 December was by the fourth century CE the date of the winter solstice, celebrated in antiquity as the birthday of Mithras and of Sol Invictus. In the Julian calendar the solstice fell on 6 January, when the birthday of Osiris was celebrated at Alexandria. By about 300 CE, 6 January was the date of Epiphany in the East, a feast always closely related to Christmas. The earliest mention of 25 December for Christmas is in the Philocalian Calendar of 354, part of which reflects Roman practice in 336. Celebration of Christ's birthday was not general until the fourth century; in fact, as late as the fifth century the Old Armenian Lectionary of Jerusalem still commemorated James and David on 25 December, noting "in other towns they keep the birth of Christ." When celebrated, the theme was the *Incarnation, and the scriptures were not confined to the birth or infancy narratives. To Luke 2.1–14 and Matthew 1.18–25 were added not only John 1.1–18 but also, for example, Titus 2.11–14.

The year of Christ's birth is hard to determine. The enrollment by Quirinius in that year according to Luke 2.1–5 is dated by Josephus as equivalent to 6–7 CE (Ant. 18.2.26), but this enrollment was not of "all the world" (Luke 2.1), would not have taken place under *Herod, during whose lifetime Quirinius was not governor of Syria, and would not have required the presence of *Joseph, and still less of *Mary, in *Bethlehem. Although Luke 3.1–2 suggests no exact year, the passage seems to indicate between 27 and 29 CE as the times of John's baptizing and of Jesus' being about thirty years of age (Luke 3.23). Jesus' birth would then be about 4–1 BCE. The time of year is nowhere indicated. (See also Chronology, article on Early Christian Chronology.)

The place of Jesus' birth also raises problems. If we had only the gospels of *Mark and *John we would assume that it was *Nazareth (Mark 1.9; John 1.45–46; cf. Luke 2.4, 39). Luke 2.1– 20 tells the story of the birth in Bethlehem and Matthew 2.1 follows a similar tradition, though introducing not a birth narrative but an infancy narrative, for the account of the wise men (see Magi) implies that Jesus might have been as much as two years old when they arrived (Matt. 2.16).

The exact place at Bethlehem is doubtful; the manger of Luke 2.7 may be rather a stall with almost no covering, or even a feeding trough in the open, the "inn" itself not being a building but a yard with partial shelter at its sides. The ox and ass of subsequent art are not in Luke's story but enter from Isaiah 1.3. Another early tradition, recorded in the second century apocryphal Protoevangelium of James (18–21) and Justin (Trypho 78.657), tells of a cave as the birthplace. It was apparently shown to Origen ca. 246, and by 333 Constantine had built a basilica over it, which was replaced under Justinian ca. 531. Still extant, the cave claims a stone as the manger. In early liturgies both the manger and the shepherds' fields play a part, but at the inclusive feast of the Epiphany rather than at a celebration solely of Christ's birthday.

Chronicles, The Books of.

Title. As with *Samuel and *Kings, the two books of Chronicles are in reality one: the counting of words and sections customary in the Hebrew text appears only at the end of 2 Chronicles. The division was first made in the *Septuagint and thence in the Latin *Vulgate; hence it was adopted in other translations and by the sixteenth century also in printed Hebrew Bibles. The Hebrew title is "book of the acts of the days," that is, annals, a phrase used frequently in this sense to describe royal acts or records (e.g., 1 Kings 14.29, and cf. Esther 6.1). The title is not entirely appropriate: there is much material of other kinds to be found in Chronicles. Even if it reasonably fits the larger part of the work, it too easily gives the impression that we are dealing with a work of history, which is only very partially the case. In the Greek, the title given is "the thing(s) left out" (paralipomenon); this is intelligible on the common assumption that Chronicles was intended to supplement the books of Samuel and Kings by providing information not given there, but it is an inaccurate description for what the work really is. Indeed, it may be recognized that this misunderstanding has often led to a use of Chronicles, for example in simplified histories of Israel and in church *lectionaries, that does not do justice to a writing that needs to be read for its own sake and in the light of its own style of approach and not just to fill gaps in a differently conceived presentation.

Contents. Briefly, the contents are:

1 Chronicles 1.1–9.34: *Genealogies from Adam onward, culminating in lists of those who returned from exile in Babylon
1 Chronicles 9.35–29.30: The kingship of David
2 Chronicles 1–9: The kingship of Solomon
2 Chronicles 10–36: The kingdom of Judah to its destruction by the Babylonians and the beginning of restoration under Cyrus the Persian.

The outline suggests a twofold approach to the story. In the first, the opening chapters (1 Chron. 1–8), consisting almost entirely of lists of names, offer a survey from the earliest figures of Israelite tradition, through a concentration on the *tribes of Israel to the family of *Saul, the first king: this ushers in chap. 9, where there is a leap forward to *Judah's unfaithfulness that led to *exile in *Babylon, and to the return, listing family groups, priests, and other religious officials. In the second approach, the story begins over again (at 9.35), with a repetition of the Saul genealogy (cf. 8.29–40), which here serves to introduce Saul's failure as a foil to the establishment and achievements of *David in chapters 10–29. With its sequel in 2 Chronicles, this second approach offers a survey covering the whole period of the monarchy, itself to end with a short reference to *Cyrus, and the promise of a return from exile. The question whether the books of *Ezra and *Nehemiah, which continue the story, are to be regarded as part of the same work or are independent of Chronicles will be considered subsequently.

Text. Like all other biblical books, the text of Chronicles presents numerous problems resulting from errors in transmission. But the more serious difficulties here arise from the considerable degree to which these books offer duplicate texts of material found elsewhere in the Bible. The main overlaps are with sections of Samuel and Kings: a substantial part of 1 Chronicles 10 to 2 Chronicles 36 contains such parallels. The relationship is not all at one level: there are passages where the Chronicles and Samuel or Kings texts are virtually the same, but many more where numerous smaller and larger differences are to be seen. Some of these differences may derive from the simple substitution of more familiar words or forms than those found in what are clearly the older texts; some of the exact coincidences may be due to cross-influence from one text to the other at a relatively late stage. Some differences are evidently the result of exegetical activity, as indeed at least some of the additional material, unparalleled in the older texts, is likely to be due to the interpretive inventiveness of the author of Chronicles. The study of the relationship is complicated by some evidence in the *Qumran texts of Samuel which suggests that the text known to the writer of Chronicles may have been closer to those texts than to Samuel as it appears in the Hebrew Bible.

There are numerous other textual overlaps. Much of the genealogical material in 1 Chronicles 1–9 is paralleled in the *Pentateuch or elsewhere. The psalm passage in 1 Chronicles 16.8–36 is paralleled in parts of Psalms 105, 96, and 106; and there are numerous other quotations or allusions to psalms and to other works, especially to various prophetic writings (e.g., 2 Chron. 20.20; cf. Isa. 7.9). These last are usually of greater interest as representing the exegesis of earlier material than for textual relationship.

Sources and Integrity. As has just been indicated, we may recognize the books of Samuel and Kings as the major source for Chronicles, allowing for the probability that the text used was not exactly the same as that familiar to us; other materials provided further sources on which the writer drew. In addition, however, we find a substantial number of passages where no parallel is known. Thus, in 2 Chronicles 28, in relating the reign of Ahaz, the Chronicler clearly knows the parallel in 2 Kings 16; but there is additional material not found there. In this particular case, we may note the probability that some of the smaller differences—but no less important for that—are due to the Chronicler's own exposition of the already familiar material. But the whole of the war narrative in 28.5–15 is not so easy to explain. The same is true of archival material about fortifications (e.g., 2 Chron. 11.5–12) and of a good deal of what is devoted to modifications in the Jerusalem *Temple, regarded favorably or unfavorably (e.g., 2 Chron. 28.24–25: Ahaz's antireforms; 2 Chron. 29.3–31.21: *Hezekiah's reforms). These extra passages have been variously assessed. Some would regard them as genuine extracts from archival and other sources that existed alongside the books of Samuel and Kings. Others would see in such unparalleled material evidence of the Chronicler's imaginative inventiveness; but it is not easy to see why some of this material should be pure invention. It is more important that we attempt to link such embellishments of the narratives with what may be detected of the main purposes of the work, and at the same time recognize that Chronicles does not simply reuse older material but offers exegeses of it. Thus, the portrayals of Ahaz and Hezekiah, already alluded to, may serve as examples of an interpretive process by which a bad king, according to 2 Kings, becomes the worst representative of the Judean monarchy; while a good king, again as 2 Kings describes him, has become a virtually ideal figure. For the latter, it is instructive to observe not only the enormous additional account of religious reform in 2 Chronicles 29–31 (contrast the extreme brevity of 2 Kings 18.4), but also the skilled reworking of the narrative material of 2 Kings 18–20 in 2 Chronicles 32.

It is in the light of this that the sources named in the books of Chronicles should be considered. At a number of points, in the summaries of the kings' reigns, allusion is made to the sources employed; thus 1 Chronicles 29.29–30 refers to "the records of the seer Samuel, and . . . the records of the prophet Nathan, and . . . the records of the seer Gad" (cf. the similar statement for Solomon in 2 Chron. 9.29, and for Hezekiah in 2 Chron. 32.32). In other instances, as in the books of Kings, reference is made simply to annals—"the Book of the Kings of Judah and Israel" and the like. It would appear that the Chronicler is here both following the pattern of the books of Kings in citing such annalistic works, and also developing the understanding of the earlier writings and emphasizing the relationship between their stories of kings and the activity of prophets. The earlier works, from Joshua to 2 Kings, came in time to be known as the "Former Prophets" and were to stand alongside the "Latter Prophets," namely the prophetic books, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Twelve (see Canon, article on Order of Books in the Hebrew Bible). Such a description of the earlier writings suggests that, whatever precisely the Chronicler may have had at his disposal, he was accepting and developing a particular understanding of the writings familiar to him; whatever sources unknown to us were available, we must expect that they too were handled with the same kind of creative reinterpretation.

One further question needs a brief mention here: Does the work exist essentially as it came from its author, or has it been modified to a greater or lesser extent? Various theories of stages in its formation have been proposed, but none appears entirely convincing; there is insufficient evidence to support the idea of a "first" and a "second" Chronicler, or that of a first stage belonging to the early Persian period and second and third stages from a later date. The possibility that 1 Chronicles 1–9 is a later addition has also found some supporters; but the relationship between these chapters and what follows makes that view difficult. Perhaps, and this has been particularly argued for 1 Chronicles 24–27, some expansions have been made; but unless it is possible to see clear evidence of a shift in standpoint, it is difficult to be sure. And even with such an apparent shift, we cannot be certain how far such a different emphasis was inherent in material being taken over from another source and incorporated by the author in spite of the fact that its outlook did not agree at every point with that of the main work.

The Place of Chronicles in the *Canon. In English translations, Chronicles is placed, as in the *Septuagint and the *Vulgate, in the group of books that may be roughly described as "historical." Thus, it follows the books of Kings and is in turn followed by Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther. (The canons of some churches include Tobit, Judith, and 1 and 2 Maccabees in this group as well). There is clear logic in this arrangement: all these writings, whatever their differences, are mainly narratives of one kind or another. The Hebrew Bible offers a different picture. As has been noted, the "historical" books from Joshua to Kings there appear as the Former Prophets. Chronicles, as also Ezra-Nehemiah (as one book) and Esther, appear in the third part of the Hebrew canon, entitled the Writings. Most commonly, in manuscripts and printed editions, Chronicles stands last, preceded by Ezra-Nehemiah; this is problematic, since clearly Ezra-Nehemiah provides a continuation of the Chronicles narrative. In some manuscripts, Chronicles stands first among the Writings, immediately before Psalms; in such a position it provides a context for the Psalter, traditionally associated with David, for much of 1 Chronicles is concerned with David and lays great stress on his organization of Temple worship and singing (for the latter, see especially 1 Chron. 16). When placed at the end of the Writings, it may be regarded as setting out by both warning and example how the true Temple and true worship must be maintained. It then follows Daniel, ostensibly concerned with the disasters of the sixth century BCE and the destruction of Temple and worship then—though, in reality (see especially Dan. 9), it points to the defilement and hoped-for reestablishment of the Temple in the second century BCE in the period of Antiochus IV Epiphanes; and Ezra-Nehemiah, which relates various stages in the restoration of Temple and people in the Persian period. By placing Chronicles at the end, the Hebrew Bible, which eventually reflects later concerns of the Jewish community, may be seen to look to a future restoration of Jerusalem and its shrine, beyond the still later disasters of Roman rule (especially the events of 70 and 135 CE).

A Literary Work and an Interpretation. The term "the Chronicler" is often used as a convenient shorthand to refer to the unknown author of the books of Chronicles. It has the advantage of simplicity, but it can too easily seem to imply that we know who the author was. In fact, nothing at all is known; the traditional view named Ezra, but there is no real evidence for this, and it must be regarded as part of the process by which the authority of biblical writings was associated with noteworthy biblical characters. Nor do we know when Chronicles was compiled. In part, a decision on this is connected with the relationship between Chronicles and Ezra-Nehemiah; if these together form a unity, then the final shaping must be later than the events there described, which would point to the late fifth or the fourth century BCE, or perhaps later still. It is clear that, with its dependence on Samuel and Kings, whose final form cannot be earlier than the sixth century BCE, we must look in all probability in the Persian period: there is no clear evidence of the change to Greek rule. A fourth century BCE date is reasonable, but remains a balanced guess.

There can be no certainty on whether the work is the product of a single author or was produced within a particular circle whose members shared views and ideals about the nature of their community. The very fact that so much earlier material has been reused makes the assessment of literary unity very difficult. Indeed, we may wonder how far the idea of literary unity is really appropriate to such a writing. The supposition that an ancient writer would endeavor to produce a completely unified and consistent work is too much based on modern conceptions of how an editor should update older material. We should more probably expect to find general consistency, but expressed in a variety of ways.

This is particularly relevant to the debated question of whether the books of Ezra and Nehemiah are separate or belong to the same work. They are treated as separate in the Hebrew Bible, and, as noted above, they normally stand in the reverse order from that found in the Greek and derived translations. There is a small overlap between the two (2 Chron. 36.22–23 = Ezra 1.1–3a); in the alternative form in 1 *Esdras, which covers from 2 Chronicles 35 to Ezra 10 plus Nehemiah 7.73b–8.13, the material runs continuously, but the evidence of 1 Esdras is problematic. It seems clear that, whatever the actual relationship, the reader is intended to see Ezra-Nehemiah as a sequel. Alternative views range from the assumption of unity, so that Chronicles-Ezra-Nehemiah are referred to as the Chronicler's work; to the maintenance of single authorship, but with the two parts written at different times, with either order of writing proposed; and to stress disunity, the marked differences between the two works in language, style, and ideology. Such differences of view suggest that certainty cannot be achieved. In part, the decision comes down to assessing whether and to what extent the differences within the books are too great for the books to be considered other than superficially related; to what extent unity in the literary sense demands complete unity of thought and style; and to what extent disunity is related to the use in all parts of the work of source material that has its own language and style and has often been taken over virtually unaltered. If we demand very strict unity of thought and style, then we will decide to separate them; but if we think in terms of a circle of thought, in which the main lines are shared but with differences of view on many matters of detail, then an overall unity may embrace variety of approach.

Whatever the decision in this delicate matter, it seems clear that the author of the books of Chronicles, as we know them, was setting out to give to his contemporaries an understanding of their current position as a small subject people under alien (Persian) rule, in the light of his interpretation of the past. This involved seeing that small community in the light of the whole story from *creation to the restoration under Cyrus (so in 1 Chron. 1–9); a similar approach may be seen in the *Pentateuch, which traces the story from creation to *conquest. It also involved offering an understanding of the contemporary significance of the two major institutions of that history: *kingship and Temple. The total loss of the former, with no realistic possibility of its recovery, is explained through a retelling of the story with the stress laid on *David as creator, and on his worthy successors as continuers, of the religious life of the Jerusalem Temple; in this view, the real function of the monarchy was religious. The restoration of the Temple under *Persian rule described in Ezra 1–6 is implicit in the material of 1 Chronicles 9 and set in motion in the final verses of 2 Chronicles. Whoever was responsible for Ezra-Nehemiah was providing the logical conclusion to the story. At the same time, the books of Chronicles provide an idealized picture of the true people, loyal to their God and to the law of Moses (*Torah); the story does not shirk the recognition of failures by rulers and people, from the disastrous disloyalty of *Saul (1 Chron. 10), to the secession of the north from the true inheritance (2 Chron. 10), to the apostasy of other rulers, reaching a climax in Ahaz (2 Chron. 28), and so to the final disobedience that led to the exiling of the people to Babylon, leaving an empty land to recover by observing its forgotten sabbaths (2 Chron. 36.17–21). But the author does not merely paint a gloomy picture; numerous instances of repentance are included, the most remarkable being the total reinterpretation of the reign of *Manasseh who, from being the worst of the kings of Judah in 2 Kings, now becomes an exemplar—punished for evil by captivity in Babylon, he returns in repentance and becomes a reformer (2 Chron. 33.1–20), an interpretation that clearly understands Manasseh as a symbol of Judah in exile and return. Within the broad sweep of interpretation, which gives the work a clear unity of purpose, there is a rich mixture of story and comment, of homiletic development and imaginative depiction, almost like a series of sermons, all on central themes but developed in a variety of ways.

This is not a history of Judah; attempts to prove historical accuracy are as misguided as criticisms of it as fabrication. It is a work of literary skill, significant for its theological relevance to the needs of the postexilic community and to any period that demands the rethinking of long-held beliefs.

Chronology. This entry consists of two articles on dating systems used in the Bible and their correlation with modern historiography. The first article is on Israelite Chronology and the second, Early Christian Chronology.

Israelite Chronology

Biblical chronology may be considered under two aspects: historical or scientific chronology, which deals with the real chronology of actual events, and theoretical or theological chronology, which considers the meanings and purposes of chronological schemes used as a literary vehicle of religious conceptions. Individual statements may often be considered from either point of view; both aspects will be taken into account here.

Dating Systems. The Hebrew Bible has no universal dating system like our BCE/CE system. There are several modes in which chronological information is given:

Simple addition from the datum point of creation: For example, Adam was 130 years old when his son Seth was born, Seth was 105 when his first son Enosh was born (Gen. 5.3,6). By such addition, we can reckon that the flood began in the year 1656 AM (= Anno Mundi, i.e., from creation); however, this figure is not made explicit, and readers must do their own addition. Such reckoning can produce a clear chronology, with only some uncertainties, from creation down to the start of *Solomon's *Temple.

Regnal years of kings, often synchronically correlated with another line of kings (e.g., years of a Judean king are stated along with years of a contemporary king of Israel). Such dates are relative, not absolute; they were doubtless adequate for people of the time, but they do not tell us the actual date unless we can bring some other source to bear.

Later books used the Seleucid era, commencing 312/311 BCE, for example, "in the one hundred thirty-seventh year of the kingdom of the Greeks" (1 Macc. 1.10); this was used long and widely in Jewish life.

Modern Jewish reckoning, by years from creation: the Jewish year 5754 is 1993–1994 CE, implying that the world was created in 3761 BCE. Although figures going back to creation were important, dates are not stated in this way in the Bible; this mode of stating dates did not come into use until long after biblical times.

Basic Data. The main body of chronological material in the Hebrew Bible falls into three great segments:

From creation to Abraham's migration from Haran into Canaan. This is easily fixed by addition of the ages of the patriarchs, mainly in the *genealogies of Genesis 5 and 11. The period is split by the central event of the *flood. The figures differ in various texts, being mainly lower in the Samaritan and higher in the *Septuagint (LXX); thus the flood, which is 1656 AM in the Hebrew *Masoretic text, is 1307 AM in the Samaritan and 2242 AM in the LXX. One obscurity is the "two years after the flood" of Arpachshad's birth (Gen. 11.10), which is difficult to reconcile with the dates of his father Shem (Gen. 5.32).

From Abraham's migration to the start of Solomon's Temple. This segment falls into three smaller sections:

From Abraham's entry into Canaan to the entry of Jacob and his family into Egypt. This is easily calculated from the ages of the patriarchs and amounts to 215 years.

The period spent in Egypt is expressly given by Exodus 12.40 as 430 years. The Samaritan and the LXX, however, have the extra words "and in the land of Canaan" or the like; this means that the 430 years stretch back to Abraham's entry 215 years earlier, thus reducing the time in Egypt to 215 years. This reading, 430 years from Abraham to Moses, is followed by Paul (Gal. 3.17). According to the Hebrew text, subject to some minor uncertainties, the *Exodus was probably in 2666 AM.

The time from the Exodus to the start of the Temple (not its completion) is clearly stated as 480 years (1 Kings 6.1). This comprehensive statement bridges over the times of *Joshua, the *Judges, *Samuel, *Saul, and *David, for which there are many detailed chronological statements (e.g., the years of each of the Judges), but also many gaps (e.g., the dates of Joshua, Samuel, or Saul). The total of 480 bridges these uncertainties and provides a clear overarching connection between creation and Temple. The Temple building probably began in 3146 AM.

From Solomon onward we have figures for the years of each king. If we simply add up the figures for the Judean kings, from Solomon's fourth year, when the Temple construction began, to the destruction of Temple and kingdom, the figures in themselves are 430. Here, however, we can compare the figures with historical facts, and the period cannot have been more than about 372 years (Solomon's accession 962 BCE; start of Temple 958 BCE; destruction 587/586 BCE). The figures amounting to 430 have been accounted for through overlaps of reigns, co-regencies, textual errors, historical mistakes, and schematic periodization.

In addition, it is difficult to make the years of the Israelite kings fit exactly with those of the Judean.

After the destruction of kingdom and Temple, chronological information in the Hebrew Bible is fragmentary and sporadic. Some dates are given by the year of a *Persian emperor (e.g., Zech. 1.1; Ezra 1.1; Neh. 2.1), but the Hebrew Bible itself does not tell us how long these kings reigned or in what order they came, nor did later writers preserve an accurate memory of this. Later Jewish chronography assigned only thirty-two or fifty-two years to the entire Persian empire, which had in fact lasted over two hundred years, and similarly the number of actual Persian monarchs was unknown, hence the "four" kings of Persia (Dan. 7.6; 11.2). This leads to another aspect.

Dependence on Extrabiblical Information. Chronology cannot be worked out from biblical data alone; it depends on some synchronism with points established from sources other than the Bible. Traditional biblical chronology dovetailed biblical data into Greek and Roman history. Classical sources give a fairly exact dating of events back to the sixth century BCE, and this can be synchronized with the latest events recorded in Kings, thus providing an entry from extrabiblical history into biblical chronology. In modern times, knowledge of ancient *Egypt and *Mesopotamia, as well as *archaeological discovery, have provided a much richer network of evidence against which events reported in the Hebrew Bible can be set. Thus, an inscription of Shalmaneser III of *Assyria mentions *Ahab, king of Israel, in a battle (not mentioned in the Bible!) of 853 BCE, and *Jehu in 841; Jehu's revolt against the dynasty of Omri (2 Kings 9–10) is now placed in 842 BCE. This correlation of biblical data with extrabiblical information carries us back to about 1000 BCE, and without it we would not know the true duration of the kingdom. Key dates to remember are:

962 BCE	accession of Solomon
842	revolt of Jehu and crisis in royal house of both kingdoms
722	destruction of *Samaria and end of kingdom of *Israel
587/586	destruction of *Jerusalem and end of kingdom of *Judah

(For a chronological table of the Kings of Israel and Judah, see Judah, The Kingdom of.)

When we go back beyond the time of David, extrabiblical information is often not sufficiently specific to provide chronological exactitude; it may suggest nothing more precise than historical circumstances or social conditions that might have fitted with an event mentioned in the Bible. Biblical dates in the earlier stages, taken alone, leave us to question whether they rest on accurate memory or on theoretical schematism. Later, in the Persian period, though the dates of kings are well known from Persian and Greek sources, the Hebrew Bible may leave it vague as to which king of a certain name was involved—for example, whether Artaxerxes I or II, an uncertainty that affects the content of *Ezra and *Nehemiah.

Theoretical Chronology. Taken as a whole, the chronology of the Hebrew Bible, though containing true historical data, may have been theological rather than historical in its interest, a literary or legendary device that bore a religious message. Thus, the Genesis figures are part of the genealogies, in which persons live to ages like 930 or 969 years; this is true of Mesopotamian legend as well, in which a king in the beginnings of the world might reign for thirty-six thousand years or more (and eight kings might last 241,000 years down to the flood), with the figures dropping rapidly after the flood. Chronology of this sort belongs to legend or myth.

Some essential dates have strikingly round figures: 215 years from Abraham to Egypt, 430 years in Egypt, 430 for the figures of the kings when added up; 40 on the march from Egypt to Canaan, 480 from the Exodus to the Temple. Are not such figures theoretical? If, as is possible, the Exodus took place in 2666 AM, is it perhaps significant that this is almost exactly two-thirds of 4000?

While some chronological material comes from ancient legend, there are signs that figures were being adjusted and modified at a late date, such as the variations between the Masoretic, Samaritan, and Greek texts in Genesis 5. The book of Jubilees, a rewriting of Genesis and Exodus 1–14 from the second century BCE with an intense chronological interest, measures time in "jubilees" of forty-nine years, and ends at the entry of Israel into Canaan, exactly fifty jubilees or 2450 years from creation; like the Samaritan Pentateuch, it dates the flood to 1307 AM.

*Enoch, the seventh from Adam, lived 365 years—obviously a very significant number, and markedly different from others in the same genealogy—before he was taken away by God (Gen. 5.21–24). The book of Enoch has many contacts with Jubilees, and it is concerned with the calendar and the movement of the heavenly bodies; the number of days in a year was hotly debated in this period.

Eschatological expectation forms another likely aspect; it might be thought that the world would last a total round number of years. Major events like the Flood, the Exodus, and the construction of the Temple, were linked with that coming end by significant number sequences. Such sequences might also lead not to the final end of the world but to the establishment of a basic constitution (e.g., completion of Mosaic legislation and start of tabernacle worship), or to a decisive historical stage (the entry into Canaan in Jubilees). If, as has been suggested, a figure of 4000 was held in mind, the present biblical chronology might be predicated upon the rededication of the Temple (about 164 BCE) after its profanation by Antiochus, which would establish a connection with Daniel, as well as with the books of Enoch and Jubilees.

The antiquity of the Jewish people was an issue in Hellenistic times, when they were sometimes regarded as newcomers on the scene of world culture. Against this, *Josephus insisted on the ancient origins of the Jews; their possession of books that went back without interruption to the beginnings of the world could be a powerful argument. This may have motivated the higher figures of the chronology in the LXX.

Conclusion. Chronological interest is a very important element in the Hebrew Bible, though it is not obtrusive as in Jubilees and not all biblical sources were equally interested in it. The chronology formed an important part of the total shape of the Bible. New Testament authors were well aware of its details: Paul quoted the 430 years exactly, though he did not need the precise figure for his argument; Acts 7.4 is precise, though contrary to the natural sense of the Hebrew, in saying that Abraham migrated from Haran "after his father died" (cf. Gen. 11.26–32; 12.4). After New Testament times, biblical chronology continued as a normal and essential aspect of Christian culture, and was cultivated by such writers as Eusebius and Bede. Histories began with creation and continued up to what were then modern times. In the Reformation, Luther's Supputatio annorum mundi or chronological summary was regulative for German-speaking Protestantism. In the English-speaking world, James Ussher, Archbishop of Armagh (1581–1656), wrote his detailed chronology from creation (which he fixed in 4004 BCE) to just after the destruction of the Temple in 70 CE. In this he integrated biblical data with all known material of Greek and Roman chronology. Many English Bibles have enshrined his dates in their margins. Only in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries did biblical chronology lose its charm and come to be largely forgotten; even the more conservative and literalist reader of the Bible was no longer literal enough to take seriously the precision of biblical chronology. Now is the time for its literary and theological character to be appreciated once again. JAMES BARR

Early Christian Chronology

No special era is used by the New Testament writers. While Jewish authors were familiar with the Syrian era, which began on 1 October 312 BCE (e.g., 1 Macc. 1.20, the year 143 = 169 BCE), no references of this kind are found in the New Testament. Here, as in the works of *Josephus, dates are given simply with regard to the number of years during which a contemporary ruler had been governing when the event in question happened. Thus, John the Baptist is said to have begun preaching "in the fifteenth year of the reign of Emperor Tiberius" (Luke 3.1), which corresponds to 28 CE. Christian writers of subsequent centuries took over the Roman era in which the years were counted from the presumed foundation of Rome on 21 April 753 BCE ("ab urbe condita"*). In the sixth century CE this era was replaced by the Christian era which is based on calculations of the Greek monk Dionysius Exiguus in Rome. Commissioned around 532 CE to coordinate the festival calendar of the church, he dated the *incarnation of Christ to 25 March of the Roman year 754, and this year became the year 1, starting from 1 January. Dionysius Exiguus made a slight error, since Matthew 2.1 dates the birth of Jesus to the days of King *Herod, who died in 4 BCE.

*Matthew explicitly connects the birth of Jesus with the government of King Herod (Matt. 2.1), and the reference to this ruler's successor Archelaus (2.22) proves that he meant Herod the Great (see Herodian Dynasty). The years during which Herod was the king of the Jews are known from Josephus. According to his colorful reports, Herod was elected king of the Jews by the Roman senate in 40 BCE (Josephus, Ant. 14.14.385, confirmed by Strabo, Tacitus, and Appian), and he died at springtime thirty-six years later, which gives us the year 4 BCE (Ant. 17.8.191; War 1.33.665). Matthew thus reports that Jesus was born some time before the year 4 BCE. Attempts have also been made to base a more specific dating on the star discovered by the *Magi (Matt. 2.2), but all identifications with a comet, a constellation, or a nova seem arbitrary, so that Matthew's reference to Herod remains the only fixed datum.

*Luke likewise regarded Jesus as born under Herod when he dated the birth of *John the Baptist to the days of this king (Luke 1.5) and indicated that Jesus was six months younger (1.26). In his infancy narrative, however, Luke connected the birth of Jesus with an enrollment for taxation ordered by Augustus and carried out under Quirinius (2.1–2). An enrollment arranged by Quirinius as governor of *Syria is known only from 6 CE, when Judea was made the property of Augustus to be administered by a procurator in Caesarea whose task it was to collect taxes for the emperor. This taxation of 6 CE caused a revolt in Judea (War 7.8.253–56; Ant. 18.1.3–10, 23–25), but did not involve the population of *Galilee, where *Joseph and *Mary lived and where Herod Antipas ruled as *tetrarch. Luke had probably heard of an earlier registration within the whole kingdom of Herod the Great, but was attracted by the famous taxation under Quirinius. (See Christmas; Roman Empire; Tribute and Taxation, article on Roman Empire.)

Concerning the ministries of John the Baptist and Jesus, the only chronological information available is the above-mentioned reference to John's first preaching in 28 CE (Luke 3.1) and a notice that Jesus was reproached for speaking with authority though he was not yet a senior of fifty years (John 8.57).

The capital punishment of the Baptist resulted from his criticism of the marriage between Herod Antipas and Herodias, whom he accused of adultery because the latter had been the wife of the former's brother (Matt. 14.4 par.). A further consequence of this marriage was that Antipas was attacked in the year 36 by the army of the *Nabatean king, whose daughter the tetrarch had divorced in order to marry Herodias (Josephus, Ant. 18.5.109–15). John's criticism of the tetrarch cannot have been uttered many years earlier, so that his death (ibid. 116–19) will have taken place around 32 CE.

Accordingly, the death of Jesus is preferably to be dated 33 CE, and in this year the political situation favored the trial against him. Shortly before, in 31 CE, Tiberius had deposed and executed Sejanus, who had been a cruel dictator in Rome and an especially great antagonist of the Jews; subsequently and most likely in 32 the emperor had ordered his representatives in the provinces to pay attention to Jewish interests (Philo, Legation to Gaius 161). This explains the exceptional rapport between *Pilate and the *Pharisees that led to the *crucifixion of Jesus.

As to a more exact dating of Jesus' last supper and his death, it has first to be observed that in Jewish tradition each day begins in the evening so that both events belonged to the same day (see Time, Units of). According to all four Gospels, the eucharist and the crucifixion took place just before *Passover on the so-called day of preparation (Grk. paraskeuē), which that year was a Friday, so that it served to prepare Passover and the Sabbath at the same time (Matt. 27.62; Mark 15.42; Luke 23.54; John 19.31). Contrary to what is often stated, the *synoptic and Johannine reports do not contradict each other in this point. In the Jewish calendar, the day of preparation for Passover, to which all four Gospels refer, had to be 14 Nisan. The beginning of this lunar month was established year by year according to the first visibility of the crescent moon in March, and though no exact timing was possible in those days, modern studies have shown that 14 Nisan fell on a Friday in two of the years in question: ca. 7 April in the year 30 and ca. 3 April in the year 33. The political factors mentioned above speak in favor of dating Jesus' last supper and crucifixion to an evening and the subsequent day around 3 April of the year 33. (See also Jesus Christ.)

The next New Testament events to be dated are the martyrdom of *Stephen and the conversion of *Paul (Acts 7.58; 9.4), and here the circumstances justify a dating to 36 CE. In this year, troubles with the Parthians led Vitellius, the governor of Syria, to secure Jewish goodwill: he deposed Pilate in Caesarea and appointed a dynamic high priest. He allowed the latter to rule independently, and thus created a Jewish interregnum until 37 CE, when a less powerful high priest was installed and subordinated to a new imperial procurator (Josephus, Ant. 18.4–5.88–125). Since, according to Luke, the high priest who sentenced Stephen to death is not reported to have sought consent from the Roman procurator as normally would have been required, and since he sent Paul as far as *Damascus in order to arrest dissidents, he must have had unusual political authority. Thus he can be identified with the above-mentioned high priest of 36 CE, so that Stephen's martyrdom in Jerusalem and Paul's conversion at Damascus took place in that year.

Starting from the year 36, two later visits of Paul to Jerusalem can be dated with the aid of his letter to the *Galatians, where he refers to a first visit "after three years" and to a second "after fourteen years" (Gal. 1.18; 2.1). As usual, the initial year is included in the numbers, so that the apostle refers to visits occurring two and thirteen years after his conversion; he thus came to Jerusalem in 38 and 49 CE. The latter date is that of the *Apostolic Council, described from different perspectives by Luke and Paul (Acts 15.1–29; Gal. 2.1–10).

Before the Apostolic Council, Paul had undertaken his first missionary journey under the leadership of *Barnabas (Acts 13.1–14.28), and for this a suitable date is 47–48 CE. Paul's second journey (Acts 15.36–18.22) can be supposed to have lasted from 50 to 54 for the following reasons: He probably came in 52 to *Corinth and there met Aquila and Priscilla (Acts 18.2), who, together with other Jews, had been expelled from Rome by the emperor Claudius in 50 CE (Suetonius, Claudius 25.24). At any rate, it was in 52 that Paul was confronted with the proconsul Gallio in Corinth (Acts 18.12), because this governor of Greece is mentioned in an inscription at Delphi as holding office during that year. The eighteen months that Paul is said to have spent in Corinth (18.11) thus probably covered parts of the years 52 and 53, and so the whole second journey will have included the years 50–54.

The third journey of Paul (Acts 18.23–21.16) began shortly after his second journey, or around the year 55, and it probably ended in 58 CE. During this journey the apostle spent two years in the Roman province of *Asia (19.10), then a considerable time in Troas and Macedonia (2 Cor. 2.12–13), and three months in Greece (Acts 20.3). The subsequent captivity in Caesarea lasted for two years, as long as Felix was procurator there (Acts 24.27), and when the new procurator Festus had sent Paul to the emperor, the apostle had to spend two more years in Roman custody (28.30). Since Felix was deposed in 60 CE (when Nero had overthrown his powerful brother Pallas in Rome), Paul's captivity can be dated to parts of the years 58–60. The continuation of his trial under Festus and his journey to Rome thus probably took place in the year 60, and so the date of his custody for two years in Rome will have been 61–62.

It is also possible to give approximate dates for the death of some early Christian leaders. The apostle *James was killed around 42 CE during a persecution arranged by King Agrippa I (called Herod in Acts 12.2). James, the brother of Jesus, who had presided at the Apostolic Council held in Jerusalem in 49 CE, was stoned in the year 62 on the initiative of the high priest (Josephus, Ant. 20.9.197–203). According to later sources, Peter and Paul were killed in Rome. This happened some time after the city's destruction by fire in 64 CE, which caused Nero to persecute the Christians there (Tacitus, Annals 15.44.4), probably at the beginning of the year 65.

Shortly before the Jewish war of 66–70 CE broke out, the Christians of Palestine are said to have emigrated to Transjordan (Eusebius, Church History 3.5.3). After the destruction of Jerusalem in 70 CE the separation of Judaism and Christianity became even more evident. Domitian's persecution of Christians (Rev. 1.9; etc.), which took place around 94–95 (1 Clement 1.1, 7.1; cf. Pliny, Epistles 10.96.6: twenty years before 114), is the last datable event referred to in the New Testament.

Since the New Testament books do not indicate when they were composed, their literary origin can be dated only approximately by such historical events as those mentioned above. Without this support all scholarly theories on the age of New Testament writings are speculative, and one should not accept any general tendency or common opinion as established truth.

BO REICKE

Church. In the Greek world, the term ekklēsia meant a group of citizens "called out" to assemble for political purposes. In the New Testament, ekklēsia signifies a group of believers in Jesus who are called together, and is translated as "church." The original Greek sense survives, however, when the author of Acts describes an assembly at *Ephesus in which citizens have a heated discussion about Paul and his preaching (Acts 19.32, 39, 41). The city clerk finally tells people to suspend their debate until the next regular ekklēsia.

In the *Septuagint ekklēsia is used interchangeably with synagogē to render Hebrew terms that mean assembly. One such occurrence from Psalm 22.22 is cited by the author of Hebrews: "in the midst of the congregation (ekklēsia) I will praise you" (Heb. 2.12).

*Paul regularly uses the term church (ekklēsia)

in his letters to address individual communities of believers (Rom. 16.1; 1 Cor. 1.2; 2 Cor. 1.1; 1 Thess. 1.1; 2 Thess. 1.1), and he uses the plural form to speak in general about groups such as "the churches of God in Christ Jesus that are in Judea" (1 Thess 2.14) and "all the churches of the saints" (1 Cor. 14.33). Paul does not have a developed sense of the church as a universal institution but rather sees local assemblies of believers functioning independently in separate locations. In a few cases, however, especially in reference to his persecution of the church of God (Gal. 1.3, 1 Cor. 15.9, Phil. 3.6), Paul's use of the term seems more generalized.

The term church appears only two times in the Gospels, both in *Matthew. One occurrence refers to a local community's role in disputes between believers (Matt. 18.17), while in the other, Jesus uses the term church in a much more expansive sense. Matthew's Jesus responds to *Peter's confession by saying "on this rock I will build my church" (Matt. 16.18). Whether the "rock" refers to Peter or to his confession is strongly debated, but either way, the verse conveys a sense of the church as a universal institution.

This universal sense is developed further in the Deutero-Pauline letters. *Ephesians and *Colossians elaborate on a Pauline image by referring to the church as the body of Christ (Eph. 1.22; Col. 1.24) and to Christ as the head of that body (Eph. 5.23, Col. 1.18). In Ephesians 5.23, Christ's headship of the church is used as justification for a husband's authority over his wife.

Ignatius of Antioch (ca. 100 CE) is the earliest known author to use the phrase "catholic church" when referring to the universality of the body of Christ (Smyrneans, 8). Unanimity becomes a key concept in later discussions of the church, as orthodox leaders stress catholicity in the face of challenges from various heterodox groups. Some versions of the Nicene Creed conclude with the formula "one holy catholic and apostolic church."

DANIEL N. SCHOWALTER

Circulation of the Bible. By the end of 1992, *translations of the entire Bible had been published in 329 languages, the New Testament in 758 additional languages, and individual books of the Bible in 910 other dialects and languages. All told, these 2,009 languages account for over eighty percent of the world's population. Yet with an estimated three thousand to six thousand languages in the world, *Bible Societies still face a major task in translating the scriptures.

The earliest translation of the Hebrew scriptures was into Greek (the *Septuagint), made in Alexandria in the third century BCE, and it was this form that New Testament writers knew and quoted. Ensuing translations followed fairly slowly in succeeding centuries. By 600 CE, the Gospels had been translated into eight languages: Latin, Gothic, Syriac, Coptic, Armenian, Georgian, Ethiopic, and Sogdian.

When Johannes *Gutenberg invented the art of printing with movable type in about 1450, a mere thirty-three languages had any translations of the scriptures. In fact, when the Bible Society movement began early in the nineteenth century, the Bible had been translated into only sixty-seven languages. Soon thereafter, however, the number skyrocketed: with the rise of the missionary movement in the nineteenth century, over four hundred languages received some part of the scriptures. By the end of the first half of the twentieth century, parts of the Bible had been published in five hundred additional languages. In many cases, the language in question had no alphabet before the Bible translator undertook to encode the language in written form.

Until relatively recently, missionaries, with the assistance of native speakers, were generally responsible for translating the Bible. Now, however, native speakers often assume primary responsibility, with missionaries sometimes serving as consultants. This has many virtues, since it is invariably easier for properly trained people to translate into their own mother tongue than into a foreign language, and the end product is likely to be more effective.

A crucial aspect of recent developments in Bible translation is the realization that cultural differences among peoples must be considered in order to assure that the text is meaningfully and accurately rendered. Often, a literal translation will result in wholly erroneous understanding; for instance, "the wicked will not stand in the judgment" (Ps. 1.6) was understood in one African language to mean that evil people will not be judged; and "smiting one's breast"—a sign of contrition and repentance in biblical times—was taken to mean self-congratulation. Alternately, a given language's syntax may be ill suited to convey, for example, rhetorical questions. In Hebrews 2.3, the writer is not actually looking for an escape when he asks, "How can we escape if we neglect such a great salvation?" Rather, he is declaring emphatically that there can be no escape whatsoever. In some languages and dialects, then, one must employ a negative formulation such as "There is no possible escape if we . . ."

In spite of such difficulties, the task of translators is to reproduce the message of the original text with the closest natural equivalent—an assignment that sounds simpler than it is. For instance, Amos 4.6, "I gave you cleanness of teeth in all your cities," is potentially perplexing, for it refers not to dental hygiene but to the results of a severe famine.

Over the past generation, biblical translators and revisers have often justified the preparation of several translations within a single language area, depending on the use that the rendering will serve. Basic types of translations to meet different needs are: simplified translations for new readers; common language translations for evangelistic purposes; standard or traditional translations to meet the needs of traditionally oriented readers; literary-liturgical translations employing the total resources of the language and intended primarily for church use.

As of the beginning of 1992, the United Bible Societies and associated groups were involved in approximately 608 language projects, of which 312 were languages in which at least one segment of the biblical text was being translated for the first time. The following statistical summary (see Table below) shows the number of different languages and dialects in which publication of at least one book of the Bible (designated "portions") had been registered as of 31 December 1992.

Circumcision. Circumcision is the ritualistic removal of the male's foreskin, practiced by many African, South American, and Middle Eastern peoples. Often performed at puberty, it may have originated as a rite of passage from childhood to adulthood; some biblical texts have been interpreted in this way (Gen. 17.25; Exod 4.24–26). In Jewish tradition, following biblical commandments (Gen. 17.12; 21.4; Lev. 12.3), males are normally circumcised at eight days of age. Proselyte males are circumcised before admission into the community.

Although some rabbis held that males who had been born Jews could maintain their status without circumcision, across the centuries others demanded excommunication for those not circumcised (e.g., Gen. 17.14). According to one passage, even Moses would have died had his son not been circumcised (Exod. 4.24–26). Nevertheless, according to Joshua 5.2–9, apparently those born in the wilderness were not circumcised until they entered Canaan. Then the Lord required that they be circumcised, presumably to enable them to celebrate *Passover (Josh. 5.10; see Exod. 12.48). Later scribes modified this tradition by improbably having them be circumcised "a second time" (Josh. 5.2).

Antiochus Epiphanes had women and their sons who had been circumcised despite his proscription killed (1 Macc. 1.60). Some Palestinian Jews managed to undo their circumcisions, stood apart from the holy contract, yoked themselves to the *gentiles, and sold themselves to do evil (1 Macc. 1.15). This does not necessarily mean that they performed some sort of surgical reconstruction, for these four items are all parallel ways of making the same statement, that liberal Jews became so completely Hellenized that orthodox Jews said they were no longer circumcised. This was probably insult rather than fact, just as male Jews who mingled with gentiles socially and in business were called "harlots," as if they had mingled sexually. There may, however, have been liberal Jews and Jewish Christians who stretched the remaining foreskin to make circumcision less obvious (1 Cor. 7.18). "Circumcision" was also used metaphorically. Someone who did not accept divine teaching was said to have an uncircumcised ear (Jer. 6.10), and a stubborn person had an uncircumcised heart (Lev. 26.41; Jer. 9.25–26).

Circumcision was traced back to the *covenant or contract God made with *Abraham, and thus is widely practiced by Muslims as well as Jews. It was called the "sign of the covenant" (Gen. 17.11), the covenant in the flesh (Gen. 17.13), and the "covenant of circumcision" (Acts 7.8); the traditional European Jewish (i.e., Yiddish) term for circumcision, bris, is an alternate pronunciation of the word for "covenant" (Hebr. bĕrît). In earliest Christianity, there was considerable debate over the requirement of circumcision (Acts 15.1–21; Gal. 2.3–14); Paul, however, held that circumcision was part of the old contract that had been superseded and was therefore no longer required (Gal. 6.15), and his view ultimately became normative for Christians (see Law, article on New Testament Views).

Cities. A city, as distinguished from a large village, reflects a more complex social organization. It typically exhibits improved technology, manufacture for sale, international commerce, and literate *scribes who produce written records. Political power extends over a wider area and is maintained by an army; walls and towers normally protect a city. In ancient times, every city had one or more temples, and the rulers typically claimed that one or more gods supported their authority.

The Israelites were curious about the origin of a city such as *Babylon, as the legend of the tower of *Babel shows (Gen. 11.1–9). Indeed, the earliest complete cities known to us, such as *Ur, arose in Mesopotamia. Babylon had straight, narrow streets at right angles, sumptuously adorned gates, a *ziggurat (the "tower"), and a processional street.

Egyptian cities were essentially residences of the Pharaohs or storage depots for a centralized agricultural economy. All were on the *Nile or in the delta and carried on international trade. Thebes had monumental temples and sacred precincts.

*Jericho, in the Jordan valley, was fortified with walls and towers in the prepottery Neolithic period (perhaps 7000 BCE) and is thus the earliest such settlement discovered anywhere.

At the time of the Israelite entry into Canaan, there were fortified towns with local rulers. *Jerusalem was such a place when *David conquered it from the *Jebusites and made it his capital (2 Sam. 5.6–10). His son *Solomon built a temple in Syrian style, engaged in international commerce, and made Jerusalem the administrative seat of a large realm, which he divided into districts. His models were the great *Phoenician cities of Tyre and Sidon; Hiram of Tyre provided building materials and skilled workmen for the *Temple (1 Kings 5–6). At that time, Jerusalem had an area of thirteen hectares (thirty-three acres) and a population of about five thousand. *Nineveh in Assyria was more than fifty times larger.

After Solomon's death, the revolt of the northern tribes, and the founding of the kingdom of *Israel, Omri ultimately established his capital at *Samaria (1 Kings 16.23–24). The northern kings were in close commercial and cultural relations with Syria and Phoenicia, and Samaria was a small fortified city.

Beginning perhaps in the eighth century BCE, a unique type of city-state developed in Greece. The citizens normally included merchants, free workmen, and landowners in the surrounding countryside. In *Athens and some other cities, a tyrant or an oligarchy sometimes ruled, at other times a democratic assembly. The pattern is found in Asia Minor and in colonies established by the older cities. Each city-state tended to be fiercely independent and jealous of its rivals, yet in some regions cities formed themselves into leagues.

Hippodamus of Miletus, the first Greek city-planner known to us (ca. 450 BCE), seems to have established the pattern of a rectangular grid for city streets. A typical Hellenistic city had an agora or marketplace, porticoes, temples, and other public buildings, all arranged for convenience and artistic effect.

The conquests of *Alexander the Great led to the founding of many cities on the Greek model. In general, he respected the autonomy of city-states that had been loyal to him. His successors in Egypt, the Ptolemies, built Alexandria as a Macedonian-Greek city that was not only a capital but also became a great center of learning. The Seleucids of Syria founded *Antioch and made it the capital of their large empire. Older cities such as Tyre and Sidon continued to be commercially important. When Rome took control of Asia Minor in the second century BCE, the forms of city autonomy were preserved, if not the substance. At this time, *Ephesus was capital of the province of *Asia.

Palestine was affected by these changes. After the *exile, Jerusalem was ruled by high priests under *Persian overlordship; this continued under the Ptolemies and Seleucids. Judas Maccabeus and his successors made Jerusalem and Judea more or less independent from 165 to 63 BCE (see Maccabees, The Books of the). After this, Rome controlled the region and after a few years installed *Herod the Great as a client king. It was he who reconstructed Jerusalem on the model of a Greco-Roman city, with a principal north-south street (cardo) and a main east-west street (decumanus) crossing it. He built aqueducts, a theater and an amphitheater, and a magnificent new temple. By this time, nearly ten thousand people lived in Jerusalem. Caesarea on the seacoast was transformed into a commercial city and one of the greatest ports of the Mediterranean. Herod also rebuilt Samaria and named it Sebaste in honor of the emperor Augustus. Most other settlements in his realm were only large towns or villages.

After Herod's death and the deposition of his son Archelaus, Judea became a minor Roman province. *Galilee and Perea (Transjordan) went to his son Herod Antipas as tetrarch. At first his capital was at Sepphoris, north of *Nazareth, but he rebuilt Tiberias and moved his capital there.

The northeast region was ruled by Philip, another son of Herod the Great, who built the cities of Bethsaida Julias and Caesarea Philippi. Within this area there was also the *Decapolis, a league of about ten city-states, of which *Damascus was the northernmost and greatest. All but one (Scythopolis, or Bethshan) were east of the *Jordan. Gadara and Gerasa are mentioned in the Gospels (Matt. 8.28; Mark 5.1). These cities were all Hellenistic in culture, and they preserved a measure of autonomy under the Roman province of Syria.

Paul's travels took him into *Arabia, perhaps near the *Nabatean caravan city of Petra, and to many of the chief cities in Asia Minor and Greece. Among these, Antioch in Pisidia and Philippi were Roman colonies. *Corinth, like Ephesus, was a great port. It was refounded by Julius Caesar after it had been destroyed by the Romans a century before.

Rome was the center of government for the whole empire, and was its most populous city. The early emperors had magnificent public buildings constructed. Rome produced little; rather it consumed, and goods and wealth flowed there from all parts of the empire.

SHERMAN ELBRIDGE JOHNSON

Cities of Refuge. Six cities set aside to provide safe haven for someone guilty of an accidental killing. There is some uncertainty about who decided the fate of the manslayer, whether the *elders of his hometown (Deut. 19.11–13) or the elders of the city to which he had fled (Josh. 20.4) or "the congregation" (Josh. 20.6). In any case, if the killing was judged to be premeditated, the manslayer was returned to his hometown for execution; if it was judged accidental, he was allowed to reside in the city of refuge until the death of the high priest (which constituted, in a sense, exile).

Most scholars agree that in the Bible the basic principle of asylum (Exod. 21.12–14; 1 Kings 2.28–34) evolved into the specification of six cities of refuge (Deut. 4.41–43; 19.1–13; Josh. 20.1–9) and into the linking of these with the forty-eight levitical cities (Num. 35; Josh. 21; 1 Chron. 6.54–81). Opinions as to the historicity of the actual use of these cities of refuge vary. Some hold that these cities never actually served as cities of refuge but were part of a utopian restoration program developed by priestly circles after the destruction of Judah (ca. 550–400 BCE). Others think that they served as part of the reform of King *Josiah (ca. 640–609 BCE). A third group believes that this institution was a reality, but fully so only during the United Monarchy (ca. 1025–925 BCE), because some of the cities were lost to invaders after the kingdom split (1 Kings 22; 2 Kings 15.29). One nagging question for proponents of each view is the exclusion of *Jerusalem from the lists of cities of refuge, particularly after *David had moved the central *altar there (see Exod. 21.12–14; 1 Kings 2.28–34).

Clothing. The nations around Palestine in the ancient Near East have left stone monuments depicting the life of the people and their garments. From Palestine we have few such monuments. Cloth disintegrates, and thus the identification of cloth and clothing is a difficult task. Fortunately, the nations that did leave stone monuments occasionally depicted people from the region of Palestine and Syria. The clothing of the surrounding nations is instructive but not necessarily normative. Yet some significant archaeological evidence does exist, including an ivory carving from *Megiddo, from about the thirteenth century BCE, depicting a victory celebration (see J. B. Pritchard, The Ancient Near East in Pictures [1969], no. 332). This carving not only displays actual Palestinian dress but also exhibits the Middle Eastern cultural attitude toward clothing itself. From the court there are the king, wearing an ankle-length robe (decorated around the neck and on the lower fringe), a knee-length cloak, and a togalike shawl over one shoulder (decorated similar to a garment worn by the officer in the chariot; thus, this garment may be related to the king's position as head of the military); a prince or priest, wearing a decorated head covering (servants had to cover their heads in the presence of their masters; before the king even the naked prisoners have their heads covered), a decorated cloak that covers his arms to the wrists, a cassock-type garment that comes to just above the knees, and an embroidered long robe reaching almost to the ground; a musician, with a plain cassock and a lightly decorated long robe; and palace servants wearing a single long robe that reaches to the ankles and to the elbows. Related to the military are a military officer in a chariot wearing an elbow-length cloak, something covering his arms, and protection over his thighs; a lower-ranking officer with headgear and short kilt; an armed soldier with headgear; and naked prisoners. The higher-ranking people wore more clothes; nakedness meant humiliation. Men of dignity cover the entire body, even the legs; the shame of uncovering the legs is described, for example, in 2 Samuel 10.4–5 and Isaiah 47.2.

Materials. The earliest form of clothing in the Middle East as elsewhere was apparently leaves. Tribes in the southern highlands of Ethiopia still wear leaves for working in streams and fields. Such clothing is indicated in Genesis 3.7.

The skins of animals were used for clothing at a very early stage and continued in use as a symbol of an ascetic life-style (see Mark 1.6; cf. 2 Kings 1.8).

Before the development of metals, hair could only be plucked from animals. In spite of this, goat-hair tents were constructed and felt was pounded out for caps and other uses. Some wool was plucked during the Bronze Age for clothing, but with the coming of the Iron Age shears were invented, which greatly assisted the development of woolen cloth.

Flax, and later cotton, were grown and manufactured into clothing.

Manufacture. The spinning wheel has never reached the Middle East. Spinning was and in some isolated areas still is done by a simple handheld spindle. The wool/cotton is first "carded" to make the fibers parallel. It is then formed into long, continuous strips of fibers. These strips are then loosely wound onto a U-shaped bent stick. The spinner's hand slips through the lower part of the U and the loosely wound strips of fibers extend out of the top of the hand. The second piece of equipment is a thin dowel about 35 cm (14 in) in length, with a wooden or stone crosspiece/weight near the top. The spinner twists the end of the strip of loose fibers into a length of thread, attaches it to the lower end of the weighted spindle, and then hooks the developing thread into a metal catch on the upper end. With a deft flip of the spindle the weighted stick is set spinning and gradually feeds the loose fibers from the other hand into the thread as it forms. The spindle drops as the thread forms. In the meantime the spindle loses speed. The spinner then grasps the spindle, unhooks the thread from the metal catch at the upper end of the spindle, winds up the newly formed thread onto the lower end of that same spindle, again hooks the thread into the metal catch at the upper end of the spindle, and once more twirls the spindle between the thumb and forefinger, releasing it to spin suspended in air like a top, and starts again to feed the fibers into the twist as new thread is formed. The evenness and thickness of the thread formed is related to the style and skill of the spinner. After months of spinning the family will have enough thread to approach the village weaver for the making of a piece of cloth.

Both the vertical loom and the simpler horizontal loom seem to have been used, the latter probably being more prevalent. Four cubits seems to have been a standard width (cf. Exod. 26.1–2, 7–8). Cloth could be made in long pieces for curtains and hangings, or a single garment could be woven entirely on the loom. Thus a seamless robe (see John 19.23) could come from the loom needing only to be trimmed and finished.

Cloth was made more beautiful and attractive in a variety of ways. Patterns in the weave itself were possible. Dyeing was extensively used. Indigo on white wool produced blue, and on yellow wool, green. Madder or kermes created reds. The Tyrian purple was famous for royal robes. The robes seen in the Megiddo ivory described above demonstrate extensive use of embroidery.

Garments. Dress in different ages was inevitably influenced by the wide variety of cultures that dealt with or ruled Palestine. Furthermore, specialized clothing existed for special classes and occasions. There were garments for kings, priests, and prisoners, as well as for mourners.

The dress of men was made up of a loincloth, a shirt/robe, and a cloak. Footwear, belt, and headdress completed their attire. Women wore various types of headcovering and in certain periods veils to cover the face.

The loincloth could be cloth or leather and was common to the military (note the soldier in the Megiddo ivory). The shirt/robe was the standard indoor dress for all classes of people; all of the people around the throne in the Megiddo ivory are wearing them. The outer, heavier cloak was the basic garment of the poor; it was doubled for a blanket at night. Thus, the law demanded that such a cloak be returned before nightfall to anyone who had left such a garment in pledge for a debt (Exod. 22.26; Deut. 24.10–13; cf. Amos 2.8). A belt or sash was essential to hold in the loose-fitting robe, both to protect the garment and to allow for freedom of movement. If in danger of being soiled by menial tasks, a worker would "gird up his loins," taking the lower edge of the robe and tucking it into the belt.

Women traditionally covered their heads. Such a standard was demanded by the rabbis of the first century CE, because the hair was considered a critical part of a woman's beauty, which should not be on display to the common eye. Paul urges Corinthian women to be sensitive to the cultural traditions of the community and not give unnecessary offense (cf. 1 Cor. 11.2–16).

Across the centuries sandals have been the traditional foot covering. Lack of any such covering gradually became a sign of servanthood; hus the prodigal son was given sandals (Luke 15.22).

Authenticity. The Pauline authorship of Colossians has often been challenged over the last hundred and fifty years. The grounds for this questioning concern the language and style of the letter; more recently it has been argued that there are major differences between Colossians and the theology of the main Pauline letters, particularly in relation to the person and cosmic work of Christ, the church as the body of Christ, and early Christian tradition.

But such arguments against the authenticity of Colossians are not conclusive. First of all, it must be admitted that many expressions used in Colossians show decided Pauline peculiarities of style. The similarities and points of contact extend to theological terminology, such as the expressions "in Christ" (1.2, 4, 28), "in the Lord" (3.18, 20; 4.7, 17), and "with Christ" (2.12, 20; 3.1, 3), including exposition about being united with Christ in *baptism (2.11–12). Second, the thirty-four words that occur in Colossians but nowhere else in the New Testament ought to be considered in light of the fact that such hapax legomena also turn up in considerable numbers in other letters that are acknowledged to be Pauline (*Galatians, for example, has thirty-one words that recur nowhere else in the New Testament). It is reasonable to assume that several unusual terms appear in Colossians because of the heresy that Paul is combating. Third, the theological developments are consistent with the apostle's earlier teaching.

Colossians, as well as its companion letter Philemon, is present in the Pauline corpus as far back as we can trace its existence, that is, at least as early as Marcion, about 140 CE.

Date. Colossians is one of three or four letters written by *Paul at about the same time and sent to various churches in the Roman province of *Asia. He was then in prison (probably in Rome), and so these letters are called the captivity epistles. Colossians seems to have been written fairly early in this imprisonment, about 60–61 CE.

The Church at Colossae. The Christian community at Colossae came into existence during a period of vigorous missionary activity associated with Paul's Ephesian ministry (ca. 52–55 CE), recorded in Acts 19. Paul was assisted by several coworkers through whom a number of churches were planted in the province of Asia. Among these were the congregations of the Lycus Valley, Colossae, Laodicea, and Hierapolis (Map 14:E3), which were the fruit of Epaphras's endeavor (Col. 1.7, 8; 4.12, 13). A native of Colossae (4.12) who probably became a Christian during a visit to Ephesus, Epaphras was "a faithful minister of Christ"; as Paul's representative (1.7) he had taught the Colossians the gospel.

The many allusions to the former lives of the readers suggest that most were *gentile converts. They had once been utterly out of harmony with God, enmeshed in *idolatry and slavery to sin, but God had reconciled them to himself (1.21–22). As gentiles who had previously been without God and without hope, they had been united to Christ in his death, burial, and *resurrection (2.11, 12, 20; 3.1, 3). As members of his body, they had his life within them and could look forward to the day when they would share in the fullness of his glory (3.4).

The picture is thus drawn of a Christian congregation obedient to the apostolic gospel, and for which the apostle can give heartfelt thanks to God (1.4–6). He knows of their "love in the Spirit" (1.8) and is delighted to learn of their orderly Christian lives and the stability of their faith in Christ (2.5).

Occasion of the Letter. Epaphras had paid Paul a visit in Rome and informed him of the state of the churches in the Lycus Valley. While much of the report was encouraging, one disquieting feature was the attractive but false teaching recently introduced into the congregation; if unchecked, it would subvert the gospel and bring the Colossians into spiritual bondage. Paul's letter, then, is written as a response to this urgent need.

The Colossians' "Heresy." Nowhere in the letter does Paul give a formal exposition of the Colossians' "heresy"; its chief features can be detected only by piecing together and interpreting his counterarguments. Some have questioned whether there was a "Colossian heresy" at all. But in light of 2.8–23 with its references to "fullness," specific ascetic injunctions ("Do not handle!" etc., v. 21), regulations about food and holy days, unusual phrases that seem to be catchwords of Paul's opponents, and the author's strong emphasis on what Christ has already achieved by his death and resurrection, it is appropriate to speak of a "heresy" that had just begun to make inroads into the congregation.

The teaching was set forth as "philosophy" (2.8), based on "tradition" (an expression that denotes its antiquity, dignity, and revelatory character), which was supposed to impart true knowledge (2.18, 23). Basically, the heresy seems to have been Jewish, because of the references to food regulations, the *Sabbath, and other prescriptions of the Jewish calendar. *Circumcision is mentioned (2.11) but did not appear as one of the legal requirements.

This Judaism was different from that against which the churches of Galatia had to be warned; rather, it was one in which asceticism and mysticism were featured, and where *angels, principalities, and powers played a prominent role in *creation and the giving of the *Law. They were regarded as controlling the lines of communication between God and humankind, and so needed to be placated by strict observances. This teaching is to be read against the background of ascetic and mystical forms of Jewish piety (as evidenced, for example, at *Qumran). It was for a spiritual elite who were being urged to press on in wisdom and knowledge so as to attain true "fullness." "Self-abasement" (2.18, 23) was a term used by the opponents to denote ascetic practices that were effective for receiving visions of heavenly mysteries and participating in mystical experiences. The "mature" were thus deemed able to gain spiritual entrance into heaven and join in the angelic worship of God as part of their present experience (2.18).

Paul's Reply. The apostle issues a strong warning to the Colossians to be on their guard lest the false teachers carry them off as spoil "by philosophy and empty deceit" (2.8), from the truth into the slavery of error. Although they had set forth their teaching as "tradition," Paul rejects any suggestion of its divine origin. It was a human fabrication, and in reply he sets it over against the tradition of Christ—not merely the tradition that stems from the teaching of Christ, but that which finds its embodiment in Christ (2.6). Jesus Christ is the image of the invisible God (1.15), the one who incorporates the fullness of the divine essence (2.9). In a magnificent hymnic passage in praise of Christ as the Lord in creation and in reconciliation (1.15–20), it is asserted that Christ is the one through whom all things were created, including the principalities and powers that figured so prominently in the Colossian heresy. All things have been made in him as the sphere, through him as the agent, and for him as the ultimate goal of all creation (v. 16).

Those who have been incorporated into Christ have come to fullness of life in the one who is master over every principality and power (2.10). They need not seek perfection anywhere else but in him. It is in him, the one in whose death, burial, and resurrection they have been united (2.11, 12), that the totality of wisdom and knowledge is concentrated and made available to all his people—and not just in some elite group.

The apostle's criticisms are trenchant, even devastating (2.16–23). To place oneself under rules and regulations like those of v. 21 is to return to slavery to the forces overthrown by Christ (v. 20). Any teachers who lay claim to exalted heavenly visions as a prelude to fresh revelations are puffed up. Worst of all, the arrogance in these private religious experiences comes from not maintaining contact with Christ the head: they are severed from the source of life and unity (v. 19).

Ethical Teaching. Often in Paul's letters, doctrinal instruction is followed by ethical teaching (cf. Rom. 12.1; Gal. 5.1). The same feature is evident in Colossians where the conjunction "therefore" (3.5) links the practical injunctions with the theological basis for right behavior. A lengthy hortatory section (3.5–4.6) follows, with four distinctive catchwords of early Christian catechesis at the head of each paragraph: "put to death" (3.5–11; cf. also "put away," v. 8); "put on" (3.12–17); "be subject" (3.18–4.1); and "watch and pray" (4.2–6). In the third of these, "be subject," directions about the mutual duties of members of a Christian household are given. (See also Ethical Lists.) PETER T. O'BRIEN

Computers and the Bible. Just as all humanistic study of ancient texts is enhanced by the application of computing technologies, the modern study of biblical texts is increasingly being transformed by the microcomputer revolution. In particular, electronic digital media and computer programs are ideally suited to the tasks of organization, manipulation, storage, and dissemination of textual information. The democratization of "personal computer" technology enables anyone who uses a computer for writing or accounting tasks to explore scriptural texts with associated linguistic data bases and reference tools in a digital environment.

Manuscript Collation and Production of Critical Editions. Computer programs help scholars reconstruct whole "texts" from ancient manuscript fragments in the same way that programs assist archaeologists in reconstructing ceramic vessels: once the physical and textual features of manuscript fragments are described, pattern-matching programs may be used to hypothesize text reconstruction based upon groupings and physical joins. When individual texts are restored and fully encoded, programs using "genetic" knowledge may be used to suggest stemmatic (genealogical) and typological relationships, dividing texts or recensions into families. Manuscript evidence may then be manipulated programmatically to create critical editions of the text, whether on a small scale or in the production of a major edition. The advantages of creating paper critical editions from electronic data bases are great: far fewer mistakes are made in printing, and the logical and physical formats of print editions are entirely negotiable, being defined in variable sets of rules similar to electronic style sheets. (See also Printing and Publishing, articles on Production and Manufacturing and Economics.)

Data Bases for Linguistic and Literary Annotation. Biblical texts held in simple electronic format are immediately useful since they may be edited, queried, and displayed in various ways. More subtle inquiry into the text requires that words, clauses, sentences, paragraphs, pericopes—even individual characters within words—be supplied with linguistic and literary description. Computer programs have been used to "parse" texts, assigning lexical and grammatical features to words, but in general these annotations must be made manually. Morphological data bases have been created for the Hebrew Bible, New Testament, *Septuagint, and related corpora. Each word might be lemmatized (given a normalized spelling and dictionary form), augmented with a morphological description and similar linguistic-literary annotations. Literary structural markers are placed within the texts, in addition to markers used in canonical referencing schemes such as *chapters and verses. Once descriptive enhancements are made to the text, scholars may frame queries in terms of lexical, grammatical and syntactic textual features, not merely in terms of a fixed character stream. Of course, all assignment of literary and linguistic markup is subjective, so the results of searches, however quantified, must also be qualified. In addition to the widely accessible linguistic data bases for biblical texts, rich collections of rabbinic, Greek and Latin (classical, medieval, epigraphic-ephemeral), Muslim, and Buddhist text materials are also publicly available.

Dynamic Concording. Perhaps the most popular computer applications for general users are programs that permit dynamic "concording" of texts and user-specified displays of text in *concordance formats. Whereas printed concordances are static (i.e., based upon a dictionary form or other organizing principle), a computer concordance program is dynamic. Thus, rather than scan excerpted passages containing the single word "compassion," a user specifies the search criteria, limited only by the research goals and imagination. These are some examples of searches: all sentences containing "wine" or "strong drink," as well as "joy"; all verses in the Septuagint containing more than two imperative verb forms; all conditional clauses in the book of Exodus; all interrogative sentences in the NRSV version of the book of Job. Of course, the concordance query may address only those features supported by the data base and search program.

Hypertext and Hypermedia Displays. Because the Bible has been the object of intensive textual focus for many centuries, a rich network of commentary and linguistic annotation has grown up around it. A relatively new technology for managing this network of knowledge is called "hypertext." Hypertext, and hypermedia, which includes digitized graphic images and other media formats, exploits a primary distinguishing feature of "electronic" text: nonlinearity. An electronic document may be rearranged, compressed, expanded, split into logical subdocuments, or in other ways liberated from its linear-sequential format as determined in traditional books. The concept of linking primary text with its reference works (grammar, lexicon, encyclopedia, commentary, theological wordbook) and with "parallel" texts has led to the creation of electronic books, usually scanned or keypunched, using standard reference tools. In a hypertext computer environment, each biblical verse or single word of base text is linked to portions of documents in the associated works. A hypertext application with several windows makes it possible to enjoy synchronous scrolling of several parallel texts or text versions or synchronized display of commentary text with base text. Control and navigation within such networks are not yet perfected, but hypertext technology shows great promise for individualized and interdisciplinary study of biblical texts.

Critical Study of the Bible. Most computer applications described above are general, conceptually simple, and noncontroversial. The use of quantitative and computational linguistics methodologies for the critical study of biblical texts is still immature by comparison. Within small corners of the world of biblical studies, computing techniques have been used to study such historical- and literary-critical features as textual transmission (subtle trends in spelling), authorship (unity or composite character of texts, measuring subconscious parameters of authorial style), metrical systems, translational features in ancient versions, and syntax (word order, clause patterns). The impact on mainline biblical studies has been minimal, though not insignificant. Some of the chief obstacles to acceptance of quantitative and computational methods are the difficulty of providing formal conceptual models and text representation schemes for critical inquiry; the greater appropriateness of currently understood methods to synchronic study of texts, rather than to higher-order analytic investigation; and the preference of biblical scholars for older, proven methods of research and publishing, with concomitant slowness to embrace newer methods of working in the global electronic workspace.

Conclusion. The growing popularity of international academic networks for collaborative research, the rapidly improving software for electronic publishing, and newer conceptual models for managing multilingual text all promise a bright future for computing in biblical studies. A point of critical mass has already been reached in the popular sector among Bible enthusiasts; the equivalent threshold of scholarly involvement has nearly been crossed. As trends increase toward compact mass storage (one CD-ROM disk now contains the equivalent of 150 books) and smaller, more powerful microcomputers, the growth of humanities computing appears certain. Current reports on these developments may be found in the conference activities and publication organs of the Society of Biblical Literature's Computer Assisted Research Group (CARG) and the Association Internationale Bible et Informatique (AIBI), and in annual sections of the Humanities Computing Yearbook (Oxford).

Concordances. The understanding of a concordance is well reflected in the title of the first concordance of the complete Bible in English, published in 1550 by John Marbeck: A Concordance, that is to saie, a work wherein by the ordre of the letters A B C, ye maie reddly find any words conteigned in the whole Bible, so often as it is there expressed or mensioned. A concordance lists alphabetically and in their context the words that occur in a specified writing or group of writings, with citations of where they may be found.

Concordances in general vary in what words from a corpus they include. Exhaustive concordances include every word. Some concordances exclude very frequent words, or include only words of importance for some particular purpose, or specific types of words. Thus, there can be a concordance of words that occur fewer than a hundred times, of theological terms, or of proper names.

Concordances vary in how much context they provide for each word. Works giving no context but providing citations of where the words occur have historically been called concordances, but they might more properly be called indexes.

Concordances also vary in how they list words. Graphic concordances list the form of a word as it occurs in the text. They are often satisfactory for languages that have few prefixes, like English, since most related forms of a word are listed in fairly close proximity. Lexical concordances list words by the dictionary form of the word. These are necessary for languages like Hebrew, in which the tense and person of verbs may be changed by adding prefixes.

In addition, biblical concordances vary in what books (Hebrew Bible, New Testament, Apocrypha) and what language version of the Bible (Hebrew, Greek, Latin, King James Version English, etc.) they include.

The fact that the Bible exists in many *translations has meant that users of a translation are often interested not only in a word and the contexts in which it is found, but in what word or words in the original language of the texts are being translated. A monumental work of this type is A Concordance to the Septuagint, begun by Edwin Hatch, completed by Henry Redpath, and published in 1897. It included several Greek versions of the Old Testament with the Hebrew words that presumably were being translated. Such a concordance is referred to as a dual language or analytical concordance.

The earliest biblical concordance known is to the Latin Bible by Antony of Padua made in the early thirteenth century. More influential, however, was the Concordantia S. Jacobi compiled in 1230 under the direction of Hugo of St. Caro. It was the source on which later Latin concordances were based.

The earliest Hebrew concordance was produced by Rabbi Isaac Nathan ben Kalonymos in 1448 and published in 1523. The revision by John Buxtorf in 1632 was the basis for most later Hebrew concordances.

While earlier concordances in manuscript form are mentioned, the earliest published Greek concordance of the Old Testament is Concordantiae Graecae versionis vulgo dictae LXX interpretum by Abraham Trommius in 1718. The first concordance of the Greek New Testament was that of Sixtus Birck (Xystus Betulejus) in 1546.

Probably the most influential and broadly published English concordance was Alexander Cruden's A Complete Concordance to the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments (1737).

Because of the labor and time involved and the frequency of errors, in the past it was natural that once a concordance of a text was published, later concordances of that text tended to be based on earlier concordances. This has changed radically with the introduction of the *computer and the encoding of large numbers of texts in electronic form.

The earliest computer-generated concordances were the KWIC (KEY WORD IN CONTEXT) concordances that were generated without reference to the language of the text, except to know whether the writing goes from right to left or vice versa. The usefulness of these graphic concordances depends on the nature of the language involved.

A process called "tagging" (introducing into a text codes that give information about the individual words) has made possible the automatic production of lexical concordances. These are very similar to the KWIC concordances. In addition to information about the dictionary forms of words, tags may also include morphological and syntactic information. This creates the possibility of generating "concordances" of information other than words. One may have a concordance that arranges all the nouns in the Bible together, subdividing them by how they are used in the sentence. Subjects, objects of verbs, and objects of prepositions are listed together rather than with other occurrences of the same word.

The "aligning" of texts, in which the words in two or more texts are correlated, has made possible the automatic creation of dual language or analytic concordances. By both aligning and tagging texts, a wide range of concordances can be created.

The computer has also made it practical to produce and publish concordances of other languages and groups of texts that are important to students of the Bible. Concordances exist for the *Ugaritic literature and the nonbiblical *Dead Sea Scrolls.

With tagged and/or aligned texts available in electronic form, it is possible to develop computer programs that allow the user to define the kind of concordance desired and to have the concordances generated on the spot and displayed on the screen. Today the electronic texts created by earlier scholars, rather than their concordances, are the source for new concordances.

Concordances are useful to the casual reader who wants to know where a familiar quotation is found, to the student who wants to see Paul's use of a theological term, to the preacher who is examining a biblical theme for a sermon, and to the scholar who is interested in whether the *Dead Sea Scrolls use words with the same meaning that Jesus gave to them. The range of concordances is increasing at a tremendous rate, and this is likely to continue.

Conquest of Canaan. The biblical story of the conquest of *Canaan is found in Joshua 1–11 and Judges 1. The Joshua account continues the story of the conquest of the Transjordan given in Numbers 21; it depicts the conquest as quick and complete. The Israelites cross into Canaan and capture *Jericho (Josh. 6) and Ai (Josh. 8). Although tricked into an alliance with the Gibeonites (Map 3:X5; Josh. 9), they defeat a coalition of cities led by *Jerusalem (Josh. 10.1–27) and sweep through the southern part of the country, destroying everything in their path (Josh. 10.28–42). This southern campaign is followed by a victory over an alliance of northern cities led by *Hazor (Josh. 11.1–5). The subjugation of Canaan takes only five years (see Josh. 14.7, 10), and most of the indigenous population is destroyed (Josh. 11.16–20). Judges 1, however, gives the impression that the conquest was a matter of individual tribal actions occurring over an extended period and often with inconclusive results.

Modern historians have attempted to describe the process by which Israel came into control of Canaan. It seems to have had two phases, one of peaceful settlement in the hills and one of conflict with the cities of the lowlands. Surveys of Israel and Jordan show that the central highlands were sparsely populated before 1200 BCE, when a marked expansion began. Most of the newcomers were agriculturalists, not *nomads. They seem to have been of mixed origin, arriving from several directions and settling in villages. Certain continuities in material culture, including pottery and architecture, suggest that a substantial number came from the Canaanite cities of the lowlands. These peoples made up the bulk of the population of later Israel. They aligned themselves with an existing group called Israel, who were already living in the region, as shown by a reference made to them in about 1207 BCE by the Egyptian king Merneptah. The resulting larger community developed a strong sense of ethnic identity, sharply separating themselves from the peoples of the neighboring lowland cities, whom they eventually grew strong enough to conquer or assimilate in a process that was not complete until *David's capture of Jerusalem in the tenth century BCE. It was probably the memory of this process that gave rise to the tradition of Joshua's conquest.

*Archaeology has cast doubt on the historicity of many of the specific victories described in Joshua, including especially the battle of *Jericho, which was not fortified at the time of the Israelites' arrival. The story of the crossing of the *Jordan and the first victory serves the theological purpose of presenting the conquest as a part of Yahweh's plan for Israel, the means by which the land promised to the ancestors was acquired. The crossing into the sacred realm and siege of the first Canaanite city are presented in ritual terms, while the divine participation in the war is made clear (Josh. 5.13–15; cf. 10.12).

Conversion. Conversion refers to two different kinds of "turning" to God: the change of allegiance from one religion (or branch of a religion) to another; and the movement from lack of faith or purely formal faith to commitment, or, with a more moral emphasis, from a life of sin to one of attempted virtue in obedience to God. In trying to understand conversion in the Bible, it is temping to find modern individualism operating in situations where matters of group loyalty were in fact more salient. It is also easy for the modern reader to see certain biblical episodes as conversions when they are better taken as calls by God to new roles.

The complex play of these factors may be illustrated by several examples. The stories of God's encounters with figures such as *Abraham (Gen. 12; 17), *Jacob (Gen. 28.10–17), and *Moses (Exod. 3) may, in their origins, reflect transfers of tribal allegiance to a new deity, though in their final form they appear as calls to deeper loyalty or to a new phase in the relationship between God and his people or a particular leader. Similarly, stories such as that in Joshua 9 describe the adherence of whole groups to Israel's deity, Yahweh, inspired by what appear to us to be political and social motives. In the much later setting of the New Testament, there is evidence of people moving from other religions to Judaism, just as they moved to the Christian movement (see references to *proselytes, Acts 2.10; and to *gentiles on the edge of Judaism, such as Cornelius, Acts 10).

The story of *Isaiah of Jerusalem (Isa. 6.1–8) is best seen as a call to a more profound allegiance to Yahweh. While it is wholly personal in its reference, it nevertheless places Isaiah in a well-authenticated tradition of holy individuals, among whom *Samuel, *Elijah, and *Elisha are in many ways comparable earlier examples. Such figures, themselves "converted" in a charismatic act, become charismatic leaders, stirring the people, on the basis of their God-given authority, to military zeal (as in the case of Samuel or *Saul), to faithfulness to Yahweh as opposed to other gods (Elijah and Elisha), or to cultic and moral purity (Isaiah, Amos, Hosea, Jeremiah). It is noteworthy that in the story of Isaiah's "conversion" a moral element is explicit (6.5) as God's purity is brought home.

The so-called conversion of *Paul (described in Acts 9; 22; 26; and more intimately in his own words in Gal. 1.15–16) is in many ways comparable to such prophetic calls; indeed, "call" (Grk. kaleō) is Paul's own most characteristic word for the summons of God both to himself and to others (1 Cor. 1.1–2; 7.17–24). It is certainly not conversion in the sense of a move from irreligion to belief, or from a life of vice to one of virtue (Phil. 3.6), nor was it perceived by Paul as a move from one religion to another; there is scarcely any sign that Paul saw the new faith as other than the true Judaism, the realization of God's plan for his people (Rom. 9–11). Rather, it was a call from God to serve as emissary (*apostle) of Jesus Christ, whom God had sent for the purpose of drawing Jews and gentiles alike into his people.

With deep-seated origins in stories of transferred tribal allegiance and the rise of charismatic military and political leaders, there emerges in the prophetic literature—whose attitudes so deeply color the final form these stories take—a pervasive sense of God's call both to individuals and, through their activity, to his people, a call for a new loyalty to him and for a more profound moral obedience. It is evident in the preexilic prophets' summons to Israel to "turn" (see Repentance), as well as in the later optimistic promise of restoration in Second Isaiah (Isa. 40–55).

This tradition of God's urgent call to turn again reaches new intensity in the ministry of Jesus. In the light of the coming *kingdom of God, Jesus summons people to unconditioned and simple (Matt. 18.3) allegiance to God, brushing aside competing claims such as wealth (Mark 10.17–31) and family ties (Mark 1.16–20; Matt. 8.21–22; Luke 14.26). The outcome of his summons is *salvation, seen in terms not only of the coming new age, but also of forgiveness and healing here and now. It is likely that many of the Gospel stories of healings by Jesus and other encounters with him were told and heard in terms of conversion responses to Jesus' call. It is noteworthy that precisely the same Greek words, "Your faith has saved you," are used in relation to an act of forgiveness (Luke 7.50) and an act of healing (18.42). This activity is consciously set against the prophetic background (Luke 4.18–21), as indeed is the language in which the subsequent preaching of early Christian leaders is described (Acts 9.35; 11.21; 14.15; 26.18, 20).

Although the element of repentance and "turning" is present in much biblical material concerning people's coming to God's service, the element of "call" is more fundamental; this is clear in the portrayal of Jesus' own ministry as inaugurated by such an episode (Mark 1.9–11). Here, charisma and divine recognition are bestowed with a view to his acting as God's agent.

Adopting a perspective more keenly aware of the social realities of the world of the first century CE, we may note that in Palestine the appeal of Jesus was akin to that of a number of leaders of reform and renewal within Judaism of that period; note especially *John the Baptist. In Greco-Roman society, where the Christian movement was unique among these Palestinian groups in its success in moving beyond its original setting, both the appeal and the process of "joining" were different. It is likely that a number of those attracted were people who, in one respect or another, were on the margins of society or felt themselves to be so. As Acts indicates, a number were "God-fearers," gentiles already attracted to Jewish *synagogues but never able to be more than fringe members. Others may have been aliens living far from their native lands; and the power to attract *women may have been linked to aspirations in earliest Christianity toward gender equality (Gal. 3.28).

Such changes of religious alliance were not common in the ancient world: the open, tolerant, and undemanding nature of Greco-Roman religion made them largely incomprehensible. But there was some parallel in decisions to adhere to philosophical groups, a decision that might involve a measure of commitment to a specific way of life, and in the adoption of some of the mystical paths available within the religious spectrum. In any case, the strong group identity of the Christians must have been a powerful force; and if we ask what it felt like to join the Christians in a Greek city, then the provision of a "home," centered on Christ, was a major factor, not unlike the similar provision which might be found in the synagogue or in the many guilds or clubs that abounded in city life.

Corban. A Hebrew word meaning "gift" or "offering," corban is used in the Hebrew Bible in the sense of a cultic offering made as a free-will gesture (e.g., Lev. 1.2). Later writings, particularly the *Mishnah, still frequently use this substantive in just such a sense. But in rabbinic literature corban can also mean a form of oath that turns whatever it is applied to into a cultic offering no longer suitable for its normal purpose (see the whole tractacte Nedarim of the Mishnah). This reflects a common custom that the Mishnah tries to discourage because it has led to serious abuse; according to Mark 7.11 (the only occurrence of the word in the New Testament), Jesus shared this view. In a controversy with the *scribes and *Pharisees, Jesus accuses them of declaring such oaths binding even when they conflicted with one's legal duties toward parents, thus placing their tradition higher than the commandments of the Mosaic Law.

ETIENNE TROCMÉ

Corinth (Map 7:D3). A major city in Greece, mentioned in the Iliad and occupied throughout most of the first millennium BCE and until 521 CE. Located on the isthmus separating the harbor towns of Lechaeum on the Corinthian Gulf from Cenchreae (see Rom. 16.1) on the Saronic Gulf, Corinth owed much to its geography. Even though efforts to connect the two gulfs by a canal failed in antiquity, Corinth was still located at a crossroads of travel and commerce. Another important geographical factor was the citadel of the Acrocorinth (elevation ca. 550 m [1,800 ft]), situated directly south of Corinth.

Among important events in the city's history were its destruction by the Roman consul Mummius in 146 BCE and its reestablishment as a Roman colony in 44 BCE by Julius Caesar. Archaeological excavations have demonstrated that the traditional picture of Corinth as a city totally deserted during the period 146–44 BCE is inaccurate. Not only was the site populated, although sparsely, but several structures (e.g., stoas, archaic temple, Asclepieum, and the sanctuary of Demeter and Kore) were still in use after the defeat of the city in 146.

Certain aspects of Corinthian culture complement our understanding of nascent Christianity there. The city was apparently the provincial capital of the Roman province of Achaia and therefore the residence of the proconsul Gallio (Acts 18.12). This explains the importance of the city in *Paul's ministry (Acts 18.1–17) and why a circular letter to "all the saints throughout Achaia" (2 Cor. 1.1) would be addressed to Corinth.

The problem of sexual immorality (incest and fornication) among Paul's converts in Corinth is noteworthy (1 Cor. 5.1–13; 6.9–20), as illustrated by the fact that one of the Greek verbs meaning "to practice fornication" was korinthiazomai, a derivative of the city's name. The city's reputation in this matter probably owed more to being adjacent to two bustling seaports than to its temple of Aphrodite.

The practice of certain Christian men at Corinth of wearing head coverings while praying and prophesying (1 Cor. 11.4) probably mirrors the widespread Roman custom of wearing devotional head coverings during worship. Another practice mentioned by Paul as having disruptive consequences was that "strong" Christians at Corinth would be participants at meals in an idol's temple (1 Cor. 8.10), thereby creating a scandal in the eyes of "weak" Christians. Numerous banquet halls attached to temples have been excavated at Corinth. The specific location, the physical size, and the social function of these banquet rooms associated with a "temple of an idol" shed light on Paul's discussion of the strong and weak consciences of his converts.

Against the backdrop of a plethora of cults, where claims of miracles, healings, ecstatic prophecies, interpretations of prophecies, and visions abounded, one understands how gentile Christians in Corinth could easily be ignorant and misinformed about their own spiritual gifts (1 Cor. 12.1–14.40).

Although Acts 18 refers to a *synagogue in Corinth, the famous synagogue lintel inscription found there ("Synagogue of the Hebrews") cannot be dated precisely.

RICHARD E. OSTER, JR.

Corinthians, The Letters of Paul to the. Though edited as two separate letters, the canonical letters of 1 and 2 Corinthians most likely consist of several shorter letters or notes written by Paul to the church at *Corinth in the early 50s CE. Because of their length, content, and influence they rank among the major Pauline letters. Except for certain subsections, Pauline authorship is undisputed.

The Corinthian Church. Not only do the letters contain reminiscences of his founding visit (1 Cor. 1.14–16; 2.1–5; 2 Cor. 11.9; 12.12), but the narrative account in Acts also provides independent confirmation of certain details about the church's beginning (Acts 18.1–17). Especially valuable for dating the letters is the mention in Acts of Paul's appearance before Gallio (Acts 18.12–17), whose proconsulship is reliably dated ca. 51–53 CE on the basis of an inscription discovered in 1905 at Delphi. Accordingly, Paul's founding visit, which lasted eighteen months (Acts 18.11), could have occurred as early as 50–51 CE during his ministry in the Aegean. After Paul's departure from Corinth, he remained in continual contact with the church, even though he was engaged in a mission in *Ephesus, from which he wrote 1 Corinthians and at least part of 2 Corinthians (1 Cor. 16.8, 19; Acts 19.1–40; 2 Cor. 1.8; 7.6, 13). The letters reflect at least two different stages in Paul's relationship to the church after his founding visit.

In the first stage, Paul responds to the needs and questions of a fledgling church experiencing internal tensions (1 Cor. 1.10–13; 3.3; 11.18–19) and trying to work out the implications of Paul's gospel in a heterogenous setting. The relationship between Paul and the church is still, for the most part, amicable, even though his departure and absence seem to have diminished the church's loyalty to him. In the second stage, Paul's relationship with the church is severely strained, primarily because of the arrival in the church of outside teachers whom Paul regards as opponents of his gospel. He now has to deal with issues relating to the source, nature, legitimacy, and extent of his apostolic authority. Generally, 1 Corinthians relates to the first period, whereas 2 Corinthians relates to the second.

1 Corinthians. A letter preceded the writing of 1 Corinthians (1 Cor. 5.9, 11). This letter may be preserved in 2 Corinthians 6.14–7.1, a self-contained literary unit that calls for Christians to keep their distance from non-Christians.

Situation addressed. 1 Corinthians addresses a church divided not so much by doctrinal differences as by personal loyalties to different religious teachers and by interpersonal tensions (1 Cor. 1.10–13; 3.3; 11.18–19). Some in the church were self-confident, indeed arrogant (4.19; 5.2), probably because they claimed special knowledge and spiritual wisdom (3.18; 8.1–2). Whether this outlook is "gnostic" in the nontechnical sense that it merely placed an unusually high premium on "knowledge" (gnōsis) and "wisdom" (sophia) or in the more technical sense that it stemmed from a system of thought resembling second-century *gnosticism is a matter of ongoing debate. In any case, such a claim to spiritual superiority grounded in a higher wisdom seems to be a common denominator of several problems addressed in the letter: the fragmentation beginning to appear within the church (1.10–13), the sense of perfection some were claiming to have achieved (4.8), a blasé attitude toward *sexual immorality (5.1–2), a refusal to be conciliatory in dealing with internal disputes (6.1–8), an insistence on individual freedom (6.12; 10.23–30), an expressed preference for celibacy over *marriage (chap. 7), an inability, or refusal, to consider the needs of weaker Christians in deciding how to behave (chaps. 8–10), an urge to be unconventional (11.2–16), a lack of sensitivity to the needs of others within worship (11.17–34), and an insistence on the superiority of the more visible gifts, most notably speaking in tongues (chaps. 12–14; see Glossolalia). Whether there is one group within the church whose theological outlook and ethic are the underlying problem or whether there are actually several groups with different theological outlooks and ethics it is difficult to say. But it is clear that the church is faced with an almost bewildering variety of pressing questions on which it needs further instruction.

Structure and content. The letter exhibits three clear divisions: chaps. 1–4, 5–6, and 7–16.

The first section, introduced by Paul's characteristic greeting and opening prayer of thanksgiving (1 Cor. 1.1–9), is a formally constructed Pauline exhortation. It opens with an exhortation to unity (1.10–17) and closes with an exhortation to heed Paul's teaching, follow his example, and listen to his messenger Timothy (4.14–21). Within this exhortation, Paul articulates his theology of the cross as a message of divine power and wisdom (1.18–2.5), expounds the nature of the higher wisdom reserved for the mature (2.6–16), and delineates his own role and that of *Apollos as God's ministers (3.1–4.13). Throughout this first section, Paul insists on the radical priority of God and thereby undercuts the arrogant self-sufficiency that he sees within the church (1.18–2.5; 3.9, 23).

In the second section (1 Cor. 5–6), Paul provides the church with what appears to be unsolicited instruction. Two questions are treated: how the congregation should deal with a case of blatant sexual immorality (5.1–13) and how the congregation should resolve disputes that have been taken before courts (6.1–11). Paul then provides further teachings on sexual morality (6.12–20).

In the third section (1 Cor. 7–16), Paul addresses a list of questions that the church had written to him (7.1). His first response concerns marriage (7.1–40). A second extended response is given to the question of eating meat offered to *idols (chaps. 8–10). A third topic treated is congregational worship (11.2–34). Two issues are treated: the proper attire (veils) to be worn in worship (11.2–16), and the proper observance of the *Lord's Supper (11.17–34). The Corinthians had also inquired about spiritual gifts (or persons), to which Paul devotes extended treatment (chaps. 12–14). The final major topic treated is the *Resurrection (15.1–58), in which Christ's own resurrection is presented as the basis for the resurrection of Christians (15.12–58). A final question concerned the collection for the *poor Christians in Jerusalem, about which Paul provides brief procedural instructions (16.1–4). This third major section is then concluded with miscellaneous exhortations and personal greetings (16.5–24).

2 Corinthians. Scattered references in 2 Corinthians suggest that after the writing of 1 Corinthians, the situations of both the church and Paul had changed dramatically. Their relationship became severely strained, and the resulting turbulence is mirrored within the letter itself, which is much more uneven than 1 Corinthians. Abrupt changes in style, tone, and content suggest several self-contained sections (6.14–7.1; chaps. 8–9; chaps. 10–13; perhaps 2.14–6.13), which some scholars regard as separate letters written by Paul to the church throughout this second period, as well as, in some cases, earlier. Consequently, numerous theories of composition have been suggested for this letter. The relationship between the historical situation and the literary structure of 2 Corinthians is a major question in interpreting the letter.

Situation addressed. Generally, the letter reflects a worsened situation that was directly related to the arrival of outside teachers within the church (2 Cor. 3.2; 10.2, 7–12; 11.4–6, 11–15; 12.11). So seriously was Paul alienated from the church that he made a "painful," and apparently unsuccessful, visit from Ephesus to the Corinthian church (2.1, 5–8; 13.2). This was followed by a "severe letter" sent by Paul to the church (2.4, 9; 7.9, 12).

One widely accepted reconstruction regards 2 Corinthians 10–13 as the "severe letter," written from Ephesus after the unsuccessful "painful" visit. Shortly thereafter, Paul was forced to leave Ephesus (1.8–11), and journeyed to Troas anxious about the letter's reception (2.12–13). Still unrelieved, he went to Macedonia, where he eventually learned from Titus that the letter had been well received (7.5–16). Buoyed by this good news, while still in Macedonia he wrote to the church a much more positive letter of reconciliation (1.1–6.13; 7.2–16; perhaps 6.14–7.1 and chaps. 8–9), in which one still hears echoes of the earlier controversy.

Regardless of the theory of composition one adopts, and the historical reconstruction into which it is fitted, the canonical letter of 2 Corinthians reflects different concerns from those mentioned in 1 Corinthians. Throughout the letter, Paul himself is the focus of controversy.

Criticism of Paul, which was subdued in the first letter (1 Cor. 4.3–5; 9.3), is much more open and pronounced. He is accused of being vacillating and acting inconsistently (2 Cor. 1.17; 10.1), of being intimidating (2 Cor. 10.9), crude in speech (2 Cor. 10.10; 11.6), and calculating and manipulative (12.16). "Acting according to the flesh" (2 Cor. 10.2) may serve as the general rubric for several criticisms, pointing to what his critics believed to be a boorish life-style unbecoming someone with apostolic status.

As criticisms of Paul's behavior are more explicit in 2 Corinthians, so are polemical references to his opponents, who are Christian missionaries (2 Cor. 11.4, 23, 33) of Jewish background (2 Cor. 11.22). Whether they originated in Palestine or the *Dispersion is much debated and still unresolved, as is their relationship to the original apostolic circle, most notably *Simon Peter. Because they had gained an entrance into the church, Paul viewed them as evil forces set on undermining his authority. The opponents appear not to have been judaizing teachers who insisted on *circumcision as a prerequisite to salvation, as was the case in Galatia (Gal. 5.1–12). The issue may have been one of territorial infringement (2 Cor. 10.13–16), which threatened the success of Paul's collection for the Jerusalem poor (2 Cor. 11.7–11; 12.14). In any case, what emerges from the letter is a debate about apostolic legitimacy: whether true *apostleship is more properly authenticated by dazzling signs, rhetorical ability, and displays of power (2 Cor. 12.1–7, 12), or by divine power experienced through suffering, weakness, and deprivation (2 Cor. 11.23–33; 12.8–10; 13.3–4).

Structure and content of the letter. The canonical form of the letter can be divided into three sections: chaps. 1–7, 8–9, and 10–13. Each of these sections may be a composite of smaller letters or fragments of letters.

The first section (chaps. 1–7) is introduced by a Pauline greeting and opening prayer of blessing (2 Cor. 1.1–7). This is followed by recollections of mortal threats experienced in Ephesus (1.8–11) and a defense of his recent behavior toward the church and actions on their behalf, including the "painful visit" and writing the "severe letter" (2.13).

There follows an extended set of reflections on Paul's theology of ministry (2 Cor. 2.14–6.13). The tone is apologetic (2.17–3.3; 4.2–3), but what unfolds is a positive treatment of Paul's self-understanding. Basic features include his theology of the new covenant of Christ as superior to the old, Mosaic *covenant (3.4–18), a ministry illuminated by the light of the new creation (4.1–6), Paul's suffering as manifesting the death and life of Jesus (4.7–15), outward change and inward transformation grounded in a future hope (4.16–5.10), ministry compelled by the love of Christ (5.11–15), existence in Christ and the ministry of reconciliation (5.16–21), and working with God in the new age as servants embodying the paradox of power experienced through suffering (6.1–10).

This first section concludes with Paul's final appeal for the Corinthians to receive him affectionately (2 Cor. 6.11–13; 7.2–4). His recollections of the encouraging report received from Titus and the effects of the "severe letter" (7.5–16) echo sentiments expressed earlier (1.8–2.13). Also included in this section is an arguably parenthetical set of instructions urging the separation of believers from unbelievers (2 Cor. 6.14–7.1).

The second section (chaps. 8–9) consists of instructions concerning the collection, a program of relief for poor Christians in Jerusalem.

The third section (chaps. 10–13) is marked by a conspicuous change in tone and content. The pervasive mood of the section is apologetic, as Paul defends his apostolic commission against the charges of detractors (e.g., 2 Cor. 10.1–12). Prominent within this section is the "fool's speech" (11.1–12.13), in which Paul insists that he has been motivated to act toward the Corinthians out of genuine love (11.1–6), as seen in his willingness to forfeit financial support for their sake (11.7–11). After characterizing the opponents as fraudulent apostles (11.12–15) and the church as undiscriminating hearers (11.16–21), Paul engages in "foolish boasting" by listing his vicissitudes (11.16–33). His supreme boast is of a heavenly vision (12.1–10), from which he learned the paradox of gaining strength through weakness. He concludes his defense by insisting on the adequacy of his apostolic witness within the church (12.11–13). Toward the conclusion of this section, Paul discusses his future plans with respect to the Corinthian church (12.14–13.10) and closes with miscellaneous appeals and a benediction (13.11–14).

Significance. Naturally these letters have figured prominently as sources for understanding Paul's life and thought. Because of the variety of topics treated, they touch on almost every aspect of Pauline theology, ranging from his theology of the cross to his theology of ministry, even though some major Pauline themes, such as *justification by faith, play only a minor role. While he provides concrete instructions about such matters as sexual morality, settling disputes, marriage, eating sacrificial meats, liturgical protocol, and the collection, they are intended for congregational praxis. To be sure, Pauline theology emerges in these letters, but it does so in the service of the congregation. Even in those sections in which he treats more broadly his theology of ministry, he does so in order to clarify the nature of his apostolic commission vis-à-vis a local church.

Specifically, they serve as valuable sources for reconstructing Pauline Christianity and especially Christianity at Corinth. Sociological analysis of the New Testament and efforts at constructive social history of early Christianity have found the Corinthian letters to be especially valuable as sources. (See Social Sciences and the Bible, article on Sociology of the New Testament.)

The Corinthian letters have also figured prominently in discussions about gnostic influence in the New Testament. Such passages as 2 Corinthians 1–4 and 2 Corinthians 12 have figured centrally in such discussions. Another debate in which these letters have played a central role is the identification of Paul's opponents and their relationship to early Christian heresies; in particular, the polemical section of 2 Corinthians 10–13 has received extensive attention. Because of the amount of space devoted to the collection (1 Cor. 16.1–4; 2 Cor. 8–9), these letters are a primary source for understanding this project.

Covenant. One of the fundamental theological motifs of the Hebrew and Christian scriptures. Eventually the expressions "old covenant" and "new covenant," which once referred to two eras (Jer. 31.31–33) or dispensations (2 Cor. 3.4–11), came to designate the two parts of the Christian Bible, the Old Testament (Covenant) and the New.

The Hebrew term for covenant (bĕrît) seems to have the root meaning of "bond, fetter," indicating a binding relationship; the idea of "binding, putting together" is also suggested in the Greek term synthēkē. Another term used in the New Testament is diathēkē ("will, testament"), pointing more to the obligatory or legal aspect of a covenant. The meaning of covenant, however, is not determined primarily by etymology but by how these and related terms function in various literary contexts. In general, covenant signifies a relationship based on commitment, which includes both promises and obligations, and which has the quality of reliability and durability. The relationship is usually sealed by a rite—for example, an oath, sacred *meal, blood *sacrifice, invocation of *blessings and *curses—which makes it binding.

In the Hebrew Bible, various secular covenants are mentioned: covenants between leaders of two peoples (Abraham and Abimelech, Gen. 21.25–32), between two heads of state (Ahab and Ben-hadad, 1 Kings 20.34), between king and people (David and the elders of Israel, 1 Chron. 11.3), between a revolutionary priest and the army (Jehoiada, 2 Kings 11.4), between a conquering king and a vassal (Nebuchadrezzar and a Judean prince, Ezek. 17.13–19; cf. 1 Sam. 11.1). These treaties or pacts were usually thought to be supervised by the deity. This was the case for instance, in the covenant between *Jacob and Laban, which was sealed with a sacred meal and which concluded with a prayer that God would see to it that both sides lived up to the terms of the agreement (Gen. 31.44–54). Likewise the covenant between Jonathan and David, based on the loyalty (ḥesed) of friendship, was "a covenant before Yahweh" (1 Sam. 23.18).

In the ancient world, covenants or treaties often governed the relations between peoples. There were parity treaties between two equal sovereign states, and there were overlord treaties between a powerful monarch and a vassal state. Illustrative of the latter is the suzerainty treaty form of the second and first millennia, which apparently influenced Israel's Mosaic covenant theology found in the book of *Deuteronomy. These treaties included such elements as a summary of the benevolent deeds of the overlord, the stipulations binding on the vassal who receives favor and protection, and the sanctions of blessings and curses in case of obedience or disobedience.

Covenant expresses a novel element of the religion of ancient Israel: the people are bound in relationship to the one God, Yahweh, who makes an exclusive ("jealous") claim upon their loyalty in worship and social life. In a larger sense, the relationship between all creatures and their creator is expressed in the universal covenant with *Noah (Gen. 9.1–17), which assures God's faithful pledge to humanity, to nonhuman creatures, and to the earth itself. In the *Pentateuch, however, primary emphasis is given to God's covenant with the Israelite people, portrayed in the migration of *Abraham and *Sarah in response to the divine promise (Gen. 11.31–12.7) and the special relationship between God and their descendants (Gen. 15.1–21; 17.1–22). In the biblical narrative, the covenant with Israel's *ancestors is the prelude to the crucial events of the *Exodus and the Mosaic covenant at *Sinai and is supplemented by the covenant between God and the Davidic monarch, who mediates God's cosmic rule, manifest in the anointed one (the reigning ruler) and in the Temple of *Zion (Ps. 78.67–72; 2 Sam. 7).

The covenants between God and the people are all covenants of divine favor or *grace (Hebr. ḥesed). They express God's gracious commitment and faithfulness and thus establish a continuing relationship. They differ from one another theologically at the point of whether the accent falls upon God's loyalty, which endows the relationship with constancy and durability, or upon the people's response, which is subject to human weakness and sin. The Abrahamic and Davidic covenants belong to the type of the "everlasting covenant" (bĕrît ʿōlām), for they rest upon divine grace alone and are not conditioned by human behavior. On the other hand, the Mosaic covenant, set forth classically in the book of *Deuteronomy, has a strong conditional note, for its endurance depends on the people's obedience to the covenant commandments.

Furthermore, all of God's covenants with Israel include divine promises, as well as human obligations, though they differ as to which is emphasized. The Abrahamic covenant is primarily a promissory covenant. In it God imposes no conditions (*circumcision is a sign, not a legal condition of the relationship) but rather gives promises: the land as an everlasting possession, numerous posterity, and a special relationship between God and the descendants of Abraham and Sarah (Gen. 17.7–8). Similarly, the Davidic covenant, perhaps on the analogy of royal grants of the ancient Near East, does not impose legal conditions, but offers a gracious promise of an unbroken succession of kings upon the throne of David (2 Sam. 7). Although unfaithful kings will be chastised if they behave badly in office, God will not abrogate the covenant promises of grace made to *David (Ps. 89; see also Kingship and Monarchy). The Mosaic covenant, however, like the suzerainty treaties of the ancient world, is a covenant of obligation, subject to the sanctions of blessings and curses (Deut. 30.15–20). If the people are unfaithful and disobey the covenant stipulations, they will be punished for breaking the covenant. Carried to the extreme, this covenant could even be annulled, so that no longer would Yahweh be their God and no longer would Israel be God's people (Hos. 1.9). The renewal of the covenant, in this view, would be based solely on God's forgiving grace (Exod. 34.6–9; Jer. 31.31–33; Ezek. 16.59–63).

The New Testament draws upon all of these covenant traditions. In some circles, however, there was a strong preference for the promissory covenants associated with Abraham and David (cf. "the covenants of promise," Eph. 2.12). Paul's interpretation of the new relationship between God and people, shown by the display of God's grace in Jesus Christ, sent him back beyond the Mosaic covenant of obligation to the Abrahamic promissory covenant (Gal. 3.6–18). And the promissory Davidic covenant, found especially in the prophecy of the book of *Isaiah, provided a theological context for the announcement that Jesus is the *Messiah (Christ), the *Son of God.

Crafts. The crafts were critical to the needs of the community. Aristocrats may have looked down on craftspersons, but they paid tribute to their necessity (cf. Sir. 38.24–34).

Carpenters or builders constructed the doors and windows of all the houses, manufactured the farm implements (yokes, plows, threshing sledges, and pitchforks; see Agriculture), constructed the carts, and occasionally fashioned a chest or table (see Houses, Furniture, Utensils). No village could function without one. *Jesus is described by the Greek word tektōn (Mark 6.3), better understood as a carpenter/builder than a cabinet maker; many of his *parables refer to building but none to furniture making. The carpenter's tools included the hammer, adze, ax, plane, bow-drill, chisel, and saw; see the description of carpentry in Isaiah 44.13–17.

Metal workers labored with copper, bronze, and iron, with the appropriate technologies developed in that order. For village use they shaped the cutting edges of tools. Some metal kitchen utensils, sewing equipment, and *musical instruments have been found. Most of the metal was used for weapons. King Hiram of Tyre supplied an amazing list of large items of "burnished bronze" for Solomon's temple (1 Kings 7.40–47). There are descriptions of blacksmithing in Isaiah 44.12 and Sirach 38.28. (See also Kenites.)

Potters produced utensils for storing, cooking, and eating food. Water was carried, stored, and cooled in pots. Lamps, cosmetic jars, votive vessels, and small idols were all made of pottery. A simple potter's wheel came into use about 3000 BCE. A type used later was two wheels joined by an axle. This unit was mounted vertically in a shallow pit. The lower wheel was turned with the foot of the seated potter; the wares were fashioned on the upper wheel (see Sir. 38.29–30). Pottery is the primary indicator for dating in *archaeology.

Tanners made leather available for shields, helmets, quivers, and other military articles. It was used also for sandals, shoes, belts, clothing, and storage skins for wine and water. Odors from tanning obliged the tanner to live at the outskirts of the town (Acts 9.43; 10.6, 32).

Jewelers worked with gold and silver. Engravers produced scarabs, signet rings, and seals of various types (see Sir. 38.27). (See Jewelry.)

Stone masons built buildings and excavated spaces in rock. Rough-cut and dressed stones were used. Palaces incorporated pillars, stone carving, and decorative capitals. Tombs, cisterns, and community water systems required excavation. The latter are extensive and remarkable. Their purpose was to ensure access to the city water supply from within the walls. Large tunnels, pits, and passageways were carved out to achieve this goal. The tools were the hammer, chisel, saw, and adze. Hezekiah's tunnel in *Jerusalem has the long sweeping marks of the adze or pick on its walls; other notable water systems are at *Gezer, Gibeon, *Hazor, and *Megiddo.

Carving in ivory and wood produced luxury items. Glassmaking was rare before Roman times. Roman glassmakers introduced a range of delicate bottles and vials previously made of pottery or alabaster.

Fullers kept the clothes white while the dyers added color. Various shades of red, a yellow from ground pomegranate rind, and the famous purple from Tyre were the main colors available. The latter took on royal significance.

The perfumer/cosmetologist was known, and Ben Sira mentions seven types of perfume (Sir. 24.15).

Creation. The biblical accounts of the creation of the world have their background in ancient Near Eastern mythology, in which creation is often depicted as the deity's victory over the forces of *chaos, represented by threatening waters, as a result of which the god is established as a supreme king. A large number of references (e.g., Pss. 74.12–17; 89.9–13) show that this concept was well-known in Israel also. Its immediate source was probably Canaanite mythology, and it was particularly associated with the Jerusalem *Temple, where it seems likely that God's victory over primeval chaos and his royal enthronement were celebrated in a great annual festival.

Since the extended descriptions of creation in the first chapters of Genesis similarly reflect this background (see Myth), they are not to be viewed as providing a scientific account of the origin of the universe. They are religious statements, designed to show God's glory and greatness, the result of theological reflection by which the older mythology was radically transformed to express Israel's distinctive faith. The two accounts found together in these chapters, Genesis 1.1–2.4a and 2.4b–25, both tell of the creation of the physical world and the creation of humanity, though these were originally independent elements. The first account is generally considered to be from the hand of a sixth-century BCE priestly writer (*P) who, however, depends on a much older tradition. In form it is a poem or a hymn, as the repeated refrain indicates, and its seven-day structure may be due to its having been recited during the period of the annual festival mentioned above. Although the watery chaos is still there, there is no conflict between it and God, as in ancient myth. God creates in unfettered freedom by his word or command, and creation is brought about by the separation of the elements of the universe, which produces an ordered and habitable world. Hence creation is not so much dealing with absolute beginning, creation from nothing—though this idea appears later, as in 2 Maccabees 7.28—as with the world order as perceived by human beings. An originally separate account of the creation of humankind (Gen. 1.26–30)—it does not appear as creation through the word—has been added to show human beings as the crown of creation. Humanity too is created by separation into male and female made in the image of God, a much discussed expression that probably means that God makes beings with whom he can communicate and who can respond, because, in contrast to the rest of nature, they are like him. So humanity receives the divine blessing and is given the role of God's vice-regent, in language drawn from *kingship vocabulary, to have dominion or control over the future course of the world. The final verses, which tell of God's seeing all he has made and his rest on the *Sabbath, emphasize the completeness and perfection of the created order.

The outlook of the second creation account (generally attributed to *J) is essentially similar but its form is very different. It is older and it is a folktale, reflecting the concerns and interests of a peasant society, and God is described in human terms; but behind its apparent naïveté lie profound insights. It deals primarily with the creation of humanity, and the creation of the world is directed to providing a suitable agricultural environment for human beings. God molds the first man (see Adam) from the dust of the ground, an idea found in many other cultures; that is, he is part of the natural order, but he is given a unique status when God breathes into him the divine breath and he becomes a living being. His naming of the animals means that he appropriates them, corresponding to the notion of dominion in Genesis 1, and the command about the trees in the garden implies responsibility toward his maker, which is part of what is meant by humanity as the image of God. No doubt the fact that woman (see Eve) is created secondarily from man corresponds to the position of the male in a patriarchal society. Yet even more strongly the story stresses the unity of the sexes and their mutual, complementary need. So the first creation account, with its cultic background, ends with the religious institution of the Sabbath; the second, which is directed to humankind in community, with the social institution of *marriage.

Explicit references to creation may appear to be comparatively rare in the Bible. But the creation accounts in Genesis are the starting point for the history that follows and are inseparably linked with it in the biblical narrative. The *prophets and the *wisdom literature also both presuppose a comprehensive world order to which they summon men and women to conform. There are, however, two particular developments in later texts to which special attention may be called.

First, the idea grows that the goal of history is to be a new creation, a return to the beginning when the creator's original intention, frustrated by human sin and rebellion, will be fulfilled. The visions of the end of time are pictured in terms of the first things. Such is a dominant theme in the later chapters of Isaiah (e.g., 65.17; 66.22), and it is further developed in succeeding *apocalyptic literature.

Second, in certain parts of the wisdom tradition, *Wisdom comes to be represented as already existing before the creation of the world and, parallel to the divine word in Genesis 1, the means of God's creative activity (e.g., Job 28.12–27). Wisdom can be strongly personified and viewed as God's personal agent in creation (Prov. 8.22–31); in Sirach 24.3 the figure of Wisdom is identified both with the word of Genesis 1 and the primary act of creation in Genesis 2.6.

It is these two developments that determine the way in which the idea of creation is transposed into a new key in the New Testament. The New Testament writers inherited the Jewish belief in the creation of the world by the one God and frequently appeal to the ordering of the world and human life that he established at the beginning (e.g., Mark 10.6; Rom. 1.20). But the advent of Christ inaugurates the long awaited new creation (Rev. 21.1–4), both of the universe (Rom. 8.19–21) and of humanity (2 Cor. 5.17). This comes about because, on the one hand, Jesus recapitulates the former creation: he is the new Adam (1 Cor. 15.45), and the image and likeness of God (Col. 1.15; 2 Cor. 4.4). On the other hand, Christ is the agent and sustainer of all creation (Col. 1.16) and is described as the word of God (Rev. 19.13) and the wisdom of God (1 Cor. 1.24). But it is the figure of creative Wisdom that seems to have been most influential for the understanding of Jesus; so, like Wisdom, he is preexistent (Col. 1.17) and the reflection of God's *glory (Heb. 1.3; compare Wisd. of Sol. 7.24). Most striking is the first chapter of John's gospel, the opening words of which echo the beginning of Genesis, with its picture of Jesus as the *Logos. This term unites the concept of the creative word of the Hebrew Bible and, from its use in Greek philosophy, the concept of Wisdom as the mediator in creation. J. R. PORTER

Crucifixion. The act of nailing or binding a person to a cross or tree, whether for executing or for exposing the corpse. It was considered the cruelest and most shameful method of capital punishment.

According to ancient historians such as Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus, various kinds of crucifixion (e.g., impalement) were used by the Assyrians, Scythians, Phoenicians, and Persians (see also Ezra 6.11). The practice of crucifixion was taken over by Alexander the Great and his successors, and especially by the Romans, who reserved it for slaves in cases of robbery and rebellion. Roman citizens could be punished in this way only for the crime of high treason. In the Roman provinces crucifixion served as a means of punishing unruly people who were sentenced as "robbers." *Josephus tells of mass crucifixions in Judea under several Roman prefects, in particular Titus during the siege of *Jerusalem; the same also occurred in the Jewish quarter of Alexandria, according to *Philo. Before the execution, the victim was scourged (Mark 15.15; War 5.11.449–51). He then had to carry the transverse beam (patibulum) to the place of execution (John 19.17), and was nailed through hands and feet to the cross (see Luke 24.39; John 20.25), from which a wooden peg protruded to support the body; some of these literary details are confirmed by archaeological finds of the bones of crucifixion victims.

Crucifixion, though not mentioned in the list of death penalties in Jewish law (m. Sanh. 7.1), might be suggested in Deuteronomy 21.22–23, which requires that a person put to death must be hung on a tree and buried on the same day. While this is interpreted by the Mishnah (m. Sanh. 6.4) as the exposure of the corpse of a man who was stoned because of blasphemy or idolatry, the order of the verbs is reversed in the Temple Scroll of *Qumran: the delinquent must be hung up so that he dies (11QTemple 64.8), which amounts to crucifixion. The same source also specifies that it must be applied in a case of high treason, for example, if an Israelite curses his people or delivers it to a foreign nation. Though such a crime is not mentioned in the Hebrew Bible, it must be derived from the ambiguous term "God's curse" (Deut. 21.23). Delivering up or cursing Israel is also regarded as blasphemy, because the nation belongs to God.

The same interpretation of Deuteronomy 21.22–23 underlies 4QpNah, which mentions "hanging men up alive [on the tree]," presumably a reference to the atrocious deed of Alexander Janneus when he crucified eight hundred of his Pharisean enemies who, in his view, had committed high treason (Josephus, War 1.4.92–97; Ant. 13.14.378–81). Other references to crucifixion include the hanging of eighty "witches" (probably Sadducees) by Rabbi Shimon ben Shetah (m. Sanh. 6.5; see War 1.3.79–80), the crucifixion of Rabbi Jose ben Joezer (Gen. Rab. 65 [141a]), and Matthew 23.34.

In rabbinic writings crucifixion is the death penalty for "robbers" (bandits [t. Sanh. 9.7, Qoh. Rab. 7:26 (109b)]) and for martyrs (Gen. Rab. 65 [141a]; Mek. 68b). Isaac, carrying the wood for his sacrifice, was compared to a man bearing the cross on his shoulders (Gen Rab. 56 [118b]). Similarly, a disciple of Jesus must take up his cross and follow him (Mark 8.34 par.; Matt. 10.38).

According to Matthew 20.19 and 26.2, Jesus said that once delivered to the gentiles he would suffer crucifixion. The predictions of suffering by Jesus are not necessarily prophecies after the fact. The inscription on the cross told that Jesus was crucified as "king of the Jews" (Mark 15.26). In his trial before the high priest (Mark 14.62) and before *Pilate (15.2), Jesus had admitted to being the *Messiah of Israel and *Son of God. The members of the *Sanhedrin declared that Jesus deserved death because he had uttered blasphemy (Mark 14.63–64); they must have understood Deuteronomy 21.22–23 in a way similar to the Temple Scroll (cf. John 19.7, 15). A false messiah could deliver the people of Israel and the Temple to the gentiles (see John 11.48–50). According to the Babylonian Talmud (b. Sanh. 43a), Jesus was executed because he had led Israel astray, a judgment based on Deuteronomy 13.1–11.

By delivering Jesus to Pilate (Mark 15.1), the members of the Sanhedrin could expect the sentence "death by crucifixion," for the claim to be the Messiah could be understood as a rebellion against Rome. It is for this reason that Jesus was compared with the revolutionary *Barabbas (Mark 15.7). After the people had asked for Barabbas (v. 11), Pilate had no other choice than to crucify Jesus, who was scourged (v. 15), mocked by the legionaries (vv. 16–19), and crucified together with two "robbers" (vv. 25–27).

Before the crucifixion Jesus had refused wine mingled with myrrh, which was intended to ease the pain (Mark 15.23). The mockery (vv. 29–32), in which the guilt of Jesus is reiterated, may have been intended in the first place to make him understand his error and to lead him to a confession of sins (see m. Sanh. 6.2). While the crucifixion was carried out by Roman soldiers, the burial in the evening of this day was done by a Jew in accordance with Deuteronomy 21.23 (Mark 15.42–46; see John 19.31).

Deuteronomy 21.22–23 is also related to crucifixion by Paul in Galatians 3.13 (see Acts 5.30; 10.39). Because a person hanging on a tree is cursed by God (Deut. 21.23), the cross of Jesus became a stumbling block to Jews (1 Cor. 1.23).

Curious Bibles. The term "curious Bibles" is used of two types of Bibles: those that are noteworthy because of a typographical error or a peculiar translation, and those with an unusual format.

Oddities in Printing and Translation. In spite of the extreme care in proofreading Bibles, typographical errors have been found in them since the beginning of *printing history. In the 1562 folio edition of the Geneva Bible of 1560, there is an error in Matthew 5.9, which reads "Blessed are the place makers" instead of "peace makers"; hence this edition has been called the "Whig Bible." The same edition has another error in its indication of the contents of Luke 21: "Christ condemneth the poore widdowe" (for "commendeth"). Several editions of the Geneva Bible, issued by Robert Barker in London from 1608 to 1611, erroneously read "Judas" for "Jesus" at John 6.67. The first octavo edition of the King James Version (1612) reads at Psalm 119.161, "Printers have persecuted me without cause," instead of "princes."

A Bible issued in London in 1631 contains one of the most well-known typographical errors to date. This edition is known as the "Adulterous Bible" because of its omission of the word "not" in the seventh (sometimes numbered sixth) commandment, which then read, "Thou shalt commit adultery" (Exod. 20.14). For this mistake the printers, Robert Barker and associates, were fined £300 and ordered to suppress the thousand copies of the edition. Ironically, the same printers in 1641 published a Bible that omitted the word "no" in Revelation 21.1, so that it read, "And there was more sea."

John Fields of London published a Bible in 1653 that is marked by many careless errors, including the omission of "not" in 1 Corinthians 6.9, so that it reads, "Know ye not that the unrighteous shall inherit the kingdom of God?" In 1795, Thomas Bensley, also of London, issued a Bible in which Mark 7.27 read "Let the children first be killed" (instead of "filled").

The 1801 "Murderers" Bible was so named because of its use of "murderers" for "murmurers" in Jude 16. In Bibles printed in 1806, "fishers" in Ezekiel 47.10 is altered so that the text reads, "It shall come to pass that the fishes shall stand upon it." An edition of 1810 was dubbed the "Wife-Hater" Bible for its substitution of the letter w for l in Luke 14.26, so that the text reads, "If any . . . hate not . . . his own wife also."

More recent editions with noteworthy typographical errors include the first printing of volume 1 of the Old Testament published by the Episcopal Committee of the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine in 1950, in which Leviticus 11.30 includes the skunk as one of the animals that swarm upon the ground. The translation read "skink," which is a type of lizard, but the typesetter mistakenly made an unauthorized "correction" and changed i to u. Psalm 122.6 of the 1966 Jerusalem Bible instructs its readers to "Pay for peace" instead of "Pray." A less obvious error in the New American Bible's first edition of 1970 omits the last verse of the letter to the Hebrews. Early printings of the 1990 New Revised Standard Version omitted the words "having ten horns and seven heads" from Revelation 13.1.

In addition to typographical errors, unusual or eccentric translations can make an edition noteworthy. Of course, many renderings are thought unusual because their use of archaic English strikes the modern reader as odd. For example, the traditional rendering "Is there no balm in Gilead?" (Jer. 8.22) appears with the word "treacle" in both the 1535 Coverdale Bible and the 1568 Bishops' Bible, and as "Is there noe rosin in Galaad?" in the 1609 Douay Bible. The use of the word "breeches" (for "aprons") in Genesis 3.7 earned the 1560 Geneva Bible and its later printings the name "Breeches Bible." (In fact, the fourteenth-century Wycliffe Bible used the same word.)

There are also twentieth-century English Bibles with eccentric renderings. In Ferrar Fenton's 1903 Bible, Acts 19.3 finds Paul and Apollos "by profession landscape painters" instead of tentmakers. In James Moffatt's revised edition of the New Testament (1935), two people sleep in "a single bed" [i.e., not a double bed] (Luke 17.34), while the first edition reads "the one bed." And, in the New English Bible (1970), Paul warns the Corinthian faithful to "have nothing to do with loose livers" (1 Cor. 5.9).

Unusual Formats. There are many examples of printed Bibles in curious formats. One such grouping is hieroglyphic Bibles, which are children's picture books citing brief scripture verses, with some words of the passages represented by small pictures. The first English hieroglyphic Bible was printed before 1784, although similar volumes had already been published in Latin,

German, and Dutch. A second printing, entitled A Curious Hieroglyphic Bible, appeared in London in 1784. Its subtitle is:

"Select Passages in the Old and New Testaments, represented with Emblematical Figures, for the Amusement of Youth: designed chiefly to familiarize tender Age, in a pleasing and diverting Manner, with early Ideas of the Holy Scriptures. To which are subjoined, a short Account of the Lives of the Evangelists, and other pieces, illustrated with Cuts."

This version of the Bible must have had popular appeal since it soon appeared in a number of editions and printings.

There exist two varieties of shorthand Bibles. The New Testament in Shorthand, prepared by Jeremiah Rich and issued in London in about 1665, used Rich's shorthand system throughout, except for the two dedication pages and the list of subscribers at the end. Another Bible in shorthand was published in 1904 in London by Sir Isaac Pitman and Sons Ltd., using the Pitman method.

The term "Thumb Bible" has been used to designate a synopsis, an epitome, or an abridgment of the Bible. Thumb Bibles are usually meant for children and are therefore printed in miniature volumes and decorated with pictures. The oldest recognized Thumb Bible, entitled An Agnus Dei, is also one of the smallest: it measures 3.3 × 2.7 cm (1 5/16 × 1 1/16 in) and was issued in London in 1601. The book is made up of 128 leaves, and on each page is set about six lines of text, along with the running title and catch word. The text of this miniature volume, a rhymed account of Christ's life, was written by John Weever (1576–1632).

The second oldest and probably most well-known Thumb Bible is the Verbum Sempiternum, published in London in 1614. Presenting the Old and New Testament in versified summaries, this miniature Bible was the handiwork of John Taylor (1580–1653). Verbum Sempiternum was still being reprinted well into the 1800s. The first American edition (labelled "The Twelvth Edition, with Amendments") of this particular miniature Bible was published in Boston in 1786, with dimensions of 5.4 × 3.8 cm (2½ × 1½ in). The page facing the title page reads:

"Reader, come buy this Book, for tho' it's small,
'Tis worthy the perusal of all."

Only in 1727 was the Thumb Bible published in prose. Printed in London by R. Wilkin and entitled Biblia or a Practical Summary of ye Old & New Testaments, this edition comprises close to three hundred pages (with sixteen engraved plates) and measures 3.6 × 2.4 cm (1 7/16 × 15/16 in).

Longman and Co. of London seem to have originated the term "Thumb Bible," which is found on the title page of an 1849 edition. Most likely this name was borrowed from General Tom Thumb (Charles Stratton), the famous midget who visited England with P. T. Barnum in 1844. Thumb Bibles were also printed in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries in France, Germany, Holland, and Sweden. In all, almost three hundred separate editions are known.

In 1896 the Glasgow University Press photographically reduced the complete Oxford Nonpareil Bible (Authorized Version). David Bryce and Son of Glasgow and Henry Frowde of London issued it in a printing of 25,000 copies. This version is made up of 876 pages, each of which measures 4.2 × 2.8 cm (1 5/8 × 1 1/8 in). In a pocket inside the front cover a magnifying glass was provided. In the same year Bryce and Frowde also published a facsimile edition of the New Testament that was even smaller, just 2 × 1.5 cm (3/4 × 9/16 in), and there have been many other miniature editions.

Two other curious Bibles deserve mention. The first, published in London in 1698 by Benjamin Harris, is best described by its title: The Holy Bible in Verse, Containing the Old and New Testaments, with the Apocripha [sic]. For the Benefit of Weak Memories. The Whole Containing above one thousand lines, with Cuts. In 1988, Tyndale House Publishers reprinted Kenneth Taylor's The Living Bible, Paraphrased (1971; see Paraphrases), with the books of the Bible arranged in alphabetical order, so that the volume begins with Acts of the Apostles, and ends with the book of Zephaniah.

Curse. A curse, the opposite of a *blessing, is the pronouncement of evil on someone or something. In the Hebrew Bible, nouns and verbs associated with the Hebrew roots 'lh, 'rr, and qll are all translated by the English word "curse." While the meanings of these three roots are related and can be interchangeable, a separate treatment of each will highlight the full range of meanings of the word "curse."

The root 'lh occurs most frequently in legal contexts, associated with an oath and the protection of legal rights. Pronouncing a curse on a potential thief will protect property (Judg. 17.2; cf. Prov. 29.24). A curse pronounced on an accused person will, if it takes effect, establish the person's guilt (Num. 5.21–28; cf. 1 Kings 8.31; 2 Chron. 6.22). Pronouncing a curse on anyone who may disobey enforces a command by persons in authority (1 Sam. 14.24; cf. Gen. 24.41). Pronouncing a curse on anyone who may break a treaty guarantees loyalty to a treaty (Gen. 26.28). It is in this last sense that curse is used in connection with Israel's *covenant with the Lord, which has similarities to a treaty (Deut. 29.18). In all these senses, the curse is understood as conditional, that is, efficacious only if some legal right or agreement has been violated. Sometimes a person may be referred to as a curse (Num. 5.21; Jer. 29.18), meaning that such a person is in so calamitous a situation that he or she embodies the consequence of a curse that one might wish on another.

The root 'rr occurs most frequently in formulas that begin "Cursed be . . ." (Deut. 27.15–25; 28.16–19). In these situations, the formula is spoken by a person in authority and is directed against a subordinate (Gen. 4.11; 1 Sam. 14.24, 28). This formula functions as a way of maintaining stability within the community. Pronouncing a curse on one who has acted in ways that violate accepted social responsibility is a way of expelling that person from the community. In this sense, curse is also related to the maintenance of the covenant that the Lord made with Israel (Jer. 11.3; Deut. 27.15–25).

The root qll occurs in less technical situations; a curse can be made by private individuals against God (Lev. 24.15; 1 Sam. 3.13) or the king (2 Sam. 16.9).

In the New Testament the general usage is similar; see Mark 14.71 par.; Luke 6.28; James 3.9. For *Paul, those who adhere to the *Law are understood as being under the curse (Gal. 3.10, quoting Deut. 27.26). Furthermore, it is Christ who, on the cross (Gal. 3.13, quoting Deut. 21.23), became a curse in order to redeem those who live under the curse of the Law.

Cush. Often translated "Ethiopia," Cush refers principally to the land of Nubia, south of Egypt (Map 7:F6). Cush's political apex came when the Nubians conquered and ruled *Egypt as its Dynasty XXV (716–656 BCE). According to 2 Kings 19.9, the Cushites saved King *Hezekiah of Judah from the *Assyrians in 701 BCE. In Genesis 2.13, Cush probably refers to *Babylon, which was occupied by Kassites in the second half of the first millennium BCE, and in Genesis 10.6–14 Cush (Babylon) has been confused with Cush (Nubia).

If *Moses' Cushite wife (Num. 12.1) was Zipporah (Exod. 2.15–22), there may have been another Cush in *Midian (whose poetic parallel is Cushan in Hab. 3.7). But *Miriam's becoming "as white as snow" with *leprosy (Num. 12.10) seems appropriately ironic punishment for her criticism of Moses' marriage to a black woman. Jeremiah 13.23 contends that Judah can no more change its penchant to sin than a Cushite can change skin color. Amos 9.7 mentions the Cushites as an example of God's universal concern. The name of Phinehas, *Aaron's grandson, is Egyptian for "the Nubian."

Cyrus. Cyrus (II) "the Great" founded the Persian (Achemenid) empire in 559 BCE and controlled the ancient Near East by the time of his death in 530. "Cyrus" may have been a dynastic rather than a personal name, for his grandfather Cyrus (I) was king of Anshan and a contemporary of Ashurbanipal, king of *Assyria (669–627 BCE). Cyrus took over the territories of the *Medes around 550 BCE and united them into a strong alliance, which clashed with Croesus of Lydia and captured Sardis, thus inaugurating a prolonged war with the Greek states. Cyrus's empire, which extended far to the east as well, was administered by local district governors (satraps).

In October 539, Cyrus defeated the *Babylonians at Opis, and his troops took control of the capital into which the gods from surrounding cult centers had been withdrawn for safety. When Cyrus entered the city he was warmly welcomed as a man of peace, and he demonstrated his religious tolerance with decrees returning the exiled deities to their shrines. In an edict he allowed the exiled Judeans to return home (Ezra 1.1; 2 Chron. 36.23) and later supported the restoration of the *Temple in Jerusalem. The references to Cyrus in *Isaiah (44.28; 45.1, 13) are significant, both for the usual dating of Isaiah 40–55 ("Second Isaiah") to the mid-sixth century BCE and for their description of him as the divinely designated shepherd and as the Lord's anointed ("*messiah"), the agent of the divine plan for Israel. Parts of the narrative of the book of *Daniel are also set in the reign of Cyrus, but this has been interpreted as the use of Cyrus as a dynastic name, as is the case with Darius in the same context (Dan. 6.28).

Cyrus is depicted on sculptures in his palace at Susa. He was buried in Pasargadae in 530 BCE and succeeded by his son and co-regent, Cambyses II.

D

D. Scholarly shorthand for the author of *Deuteronomy, the fourth source in the *Pentateuch. D depicts *Moses giving a series of speeches, which urge Israel to follow the "*torah." But the law of which Moses speaks represents a massive revision of earlier laws. Among the Pentateuchal sources (J, E, D, and P), D is unique in mandating the centralization of the Yahwistic cult and the suppression of all Canaanite cults (Deut. 12).

Most scholars believe that Deuteronomy achieved its final form as the result of a long process of composition. Since the nineteenth century CE, they have identified "the book of the law" (2 Kings 22.8) discovered during the eighteenth year of *Josiah's reign (ca. 621 BCE) as an early form of Deuteronomy. The books of Kings mention other reformers (e.g., *Hezekiah, 2 Kings 18.4), but Josiah's exhaustive reforms and national *Passover (2 Kings 23.4–23) explicitly conform to Deuteronomic prescriptions. Hence, dating the substance of the D source (i.e., the laws in Deut. 12–26) to the seventh century BCE seems sound. A minority of scholars view the description of Josiah's reforms as a utopian projection and date D to the exilic or early postexilic age (mid- to late sixth century).

Dagon. The national god of the *Philistines, according to the Bible. Judges 16.23 identifies a temple of Dagon at Gaza, which *Samson pulls down; the captured *ark of Yahweh is placed in another temple of Dagon at Ashdod (1 Sam. 5.2; see also 1 Macc. 10.83). The divine name also appears in the town name Beth-dagon (Josh. 15.41; 19.27). Dagon is not mentioned in inscriptions from southern Syria or Palestine, but occurs frequently in texts from north Syria and Mesopotamia as Dagan, the chief god of the middle Euphrates region; in the *Ugaritic tablets, *Baal is often referred to by the patronymic "son of Dagan." The Philistines thus probably borrowed the Semitic deity through direct contact with the coast of Syria rather than from southern Canaan. DANIEL E. FLEMING Damascus. A city of *Syria (*Aram); Map 1:Z1. It lies in an oasis formed by the Nahr el-Barada, which flows through the city from the anti-Lebanon range, and the Nahr el-Aʿwaj south of Damascus, fed by springs on Mount *Hermon. These are the Abana and Pharpar of 2 Kings 5.12. The region has been inhabited since prehistoric times, and the city is mentioned in nonbiblical sources by the mid-second millennium BCE. A comprehensive history is difficult to establish because no major excavations have taken place within the city, in part because it has been continuously inhabited.

*David subjected Damascus to tribute, but only briefly (2 Sam. 5.5–8; 1 Kings 11.23–25). Several wars were fought between the Aramean kingdom and Israel and Judah, and at one time Jeroboam II conquered Damascus (2 Kings 14.28). *Tiglath-Pileser III brought it into the *Assyrian empire (732 BCE), and subsequently it was under Neo-Babylonian and *Persian rule. After *Alexander the Great's conquests it fell to his successors, the Seleucids, until in 85 BCE it became briefly the capital of a *Nabatean kingdom. Rome conquered Syria in 65 BCE. Under the *Roman empire, Damascus was considered one of the city-states of the *Decapolis.

By the mid-first century CE there was a Jewish community in Damascus, among whom were Christians (Acts 9.1–25). Damascus was evidently under the control of the Nabatean King Aretas IV when *Paul escaped from his local governor (2 Cor. 11.32–33; cf. Acts 9.25).

A temple of Jupiter Damascenus was built on the site of the old temple of Hadad-Rimmon. This was superseded by the Church of Saint John the Baptist, built by Theodosius the Great (late fourth century CE), which was remodeled to become the Great Mosque.

SHERMAN ELBRIDGE JOHNSON

Dan. The fifth son of *Jacob and one of the twelve *tribes of Israel. Dan's mother is *Rachel's maid Bilhah (Gen. 30.1–6). The name Dan seems to be derived from the Hebrew verb meaning "to judge or vindicate." The tribe of Dan's first settlement is depicted as lying between the territories of Ephraim to the north, Benjamin to the east, and Judah to the south (Josh. 19.40–48). Dan was renowned for its verve (Gen. 49.16–17; Deut. 33.22).

Already at an early time, a majority of the tribe migrated northward to a site near the source of the *Jordan river (Josh. 19.47–48; Judg. 1.34). Hence, Dan often marks the northern border of Israel (1 Sam. 3.20; 2 Sam. 24.15). If the stories of the Danite hero *Samson (Judges 13–16) and the song of *Deborah (Judg. 5.17) have a historical core, however, some members of the tribe must have remained in the south. With the rise of the monarchy, these southern clans were apparently assimilated into the kingdoms of Israel and Judah.

Dan can also refer to a city (e.g., Gen. 14.14), originally called Laish (Judg. 18.7, 27–29) or Leshem (Josh. 19.47), which was captured and renamed by the Danite tribe. Dan's northern clans were probably located around this city (Map 3:Y2). The ancient sanctuary at Dan (Judg. 18.2, 30) was designated by King Jeroboam I of Israel as one of his two national shrines (1 Kings 12.29–30; see Golden Calf). Archeological work at Dan has revealed a substantial cult center dating to the tenth century BCE, the era of Jeroboam I. During the reign of Pekah, king of Israel, the territories of Dan and *Naphtali were conquered by *Tiglath-pileser III of Assyria, who exiled many of their residents (2 Kings 15.29).

Dance and the Bible. The Bible has provided choreographers with themes and topics for their dances, and not always in a religious context: biblical characters—heroes and heroines, kings and sinners—and stories, often those with a compelling moral, provide excellent material for stage dance. They do not require copious explanatory program notes, and carry with them overtones and associations from childhood, as material learned at home or in religious education. The terse style of storytelling found in the Bible, often abounding in physical action and illuminating philosophical or moral issues, is well suited to the artistic ways and means available to the choreographer, who must deal with human movement to express aesthetic-kinetic ideas.

*Salome, the daughter of Herodias who danced before Herod Antipas, is perhaps the biblical character most often encountered in the annals of choreography. She has danced onstage from medieval passion plays right to the advent of modern dance at the beginning of the twentieth century, and she has continued to dance ever since.

In 1462, René, the king of Provence, organized a choreographic religious procession called "Lou Gue" in which there was a "minuet of the Queen of Sheba," along with other biblical dances. In 1475, the Jews of the Italian town of Pesaro used the Queen of *Sheba as part of their choreographic presentation at the wedding feast of the ruler of the region.

There are only a few examples of biblical subject matter to be found in the early French court ballets of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. One is Les balet [sic] de la Tour de Babel, chosen perhaps because God does not appear in the story at all, and the various languages are easily represented by folk dances from diverse countries.

Audiences as well as creators of classical ballet regarded their art as profane, if not altogether sinful and sacrilegious, and biblical subjects are rarely found in it. The revolutionaries of modern dance—Isadora Duncan, Maud Allen, and Loie Fuller, to name a few—who brought modern dance from their native America to Europe in the first decade of the twentieth century, had no such qualms, and soon a whole flurry of Salomes occupied the dance stage.

Many other biblical figures also attracted modern choreographers. Loie Fuller used the diaphanous veils and lighting effects she invented to depict the waters in Miriam's Dance and The Deluge. Ruth St. Denis and Ted Shawn choreographed a "Salome" dance, Jephthah's Daughter, and their ballet Dancer at the Court of Ahasuerus (the story of Queen *Esther) in the 1920s.

Classical ballet choreographers of the early twentieth century also turned to biblical subjects. Michel Fokine created his Legend of Joseph in 1914 for Diaghilev's Ballet Russe, and George Balanchine composed The Prodigal Son for the same company in 1929. Kassian Goleizovsky choreographed his innovative Joseph the Beautiful for the Experimental Stage of the Bolshoi Ballet in 1925. Even such philosophical writings as the book of *Job served choreographers, as in Ted Shawn's Job, a Masque for Dancing in 1931 in the United States, and Job (1931) by Ninette de Valois, the founder of the British Royal Ballet.

For many leaders of American modern dance, such as Lester Horton, José Limón, and Martha Graham, the Bible was a chief source of inspiration. In particular, Graham's Embattled Garden and Limon's There Is a Time are the most perfectly wrought biblical choreographies of our time.

Not surprisingly, Israeli choreographers make frequent use of biblical themes and characters. Since the beginning of Jewish immigration to Palestine in the early part of the twentieth century, choreographers have often turned to the Bible for subjects. In the 1930s, the Russian-born ballerina Rina Nikova founded her Biblical Ballet company in Jerusalem. Several of her students were girls who had immigrated from Yemen. She soon discovered the special dance rhythms of Yemenite Jews. The teacher thus became her pupils' student, because she realized that their movement vocabulary suited the biblical stories she endeavored to depict in her works much better than did the European danse d'école.

Jewish-Yemenite dance traditions were also to play a decisive role in the work of the most important Israeli choreographer of her generation, Sara Levi-Tanai. She founded the Inbal Dance Theatre in 1949, and created many works based on biblical subjects, using traditional Yemenite tunes and steps to forge a personal, modern movement style that served her biblical ballets well.

The connection between ancient Yemenite artistic tradition and biblical choreography has created a commonly held fallacy, that Yemenite dance is somehow representative of dance in biblical times, of which we know little despite the many instances of dancing in the Bible. There are no less than eleven biblical Hebrew terms for dance, but hardly any further evidence that modern choreographers could use when dealing with biblical subjects.

Biblical themes also served as a source of inspiration for Israeli choreographers who since the 1940s had staged pageants, often at the very sites of the biblical events they dealt with. They combined biblical texts, music, and mass movement, in the manner and stage techniques devised by Rudolf von Laban and influenced by the "Theater of the Masses" in Soviet Russia in the 1920s and 1930s, for the kibbutzim (collective settlements). These were biblical multimedia events, staged before the term had been coined.

There is scarcely a modern choreographer of note who has not dealt with biblical materials. In recent times these include John Neumeier, Jiri Kylian, Anna Sokolow, and Laura Dean, in addition to those already mentioned. Perhaps one of the reasons modern dance artists have turned to biblical subjects is that there are so many female dramatis personae in the Bible, providing the choreographers with roles for the women in their companies.

While the Bible provides a wide cultural common denominator for all of western culture, for Israel it is in a special sense a national heritage; hence the wealth of Israeli choreographic works based on it. The Bible is indeed an excellent libretto for choreography, providing the artist with moving metaphors, in both religious and nonreligious contexts. GIORA MANOR

Daniel, The Book of. According to the book that bears his name, Daniel was a pious and wise Jewish youth who was deported to *Babylon by King *Nebuchadrezzar (spelled Nebuchadnezzar in the book), together with his three young friends, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, the royal household, and other prominent citizens. Presumably, this was the first deportation ordered by Nebuchadrezzar in 597 BCE (2 Kings 24.10–16; the date implied in Dan. 1.1 is 606 BCE). In Ezekiel 14.14, 20, a Daniel (Hebr. dānī'ēl) is mentioned alongside *Noah and *Job as one of the outstandingly righteous men of history; in Ezekiel 28.3, the wisdom of the king of Tyre is said to exceed even that of this Daniel. Many commentators believe that the Daniel of the Ezekiel text is to be identified with the Canaanite Dan'il (dn'il) of "The Tale of Aqhat" preserved among the fourteenth-century BCE texts found at Ras Shamra (*Ugarit) in Syria. There, Dan'il is described as one who "judges the cause of the widow / tries the case of the orphan." It would therefore appear that Daniel was a legendary figure, represented in this book as a youth of outstanding wisdom and piety who matures into a seer capable of receiving visions of the future.

Content. The structure of the book of Daniel is straightforward:

I. Six tales from the Babylonian exile
   A. Daniel and his friends at the table of the king (chap. 1)
   B. Daniel interprets the king's dream of the colossal statue (chap. 2)
   C. Three young men in the fiery furnace (chap. 3)

D. Nebuchadnezzar's madness (chap. 4)
E. The handwriting on the wall (chap. 5)
F. Daniel in the lions' den (chap. 6)

II. Apocalyptic visions and Daniel's prayer
A. The vision of "the one like a son of man" (chap. 7)
B. The vision of the ram and the he-goat (chap. 8)
C. Daniel's prayer and the meaning of the seventy years of "the devastation of Jerusalem" (chap. 9)
D. The final vision and the promise of resurrection (chaps. 10–12).

The internal dates throughout the book show that the narratives of Part I partially overlap the visions of Part II. The latter culminates in the final vision dated in "the third year of King Cyrus of Persia" (10.1), 535 BCE. In effect, the book records both the external and the internal history of Daniel, the former (chaps. 1–6) consisting of the stories of his virtuous deeds and wonders, and the latter (chaps. 7–12) his visionary experiences and revelations regarding the future of the world.

It should be noted that the Daniel tradition in ancient Israel was considerably larger than what is now preserved in our canonical text. We know this from the additions to the book of Daniel found in the *Septuagint (the older Greek translation of the book of Daniel, ca. 100 BCE) and in Theodotion (a more literal Greek version of the first century CE, and the one usually included in ancient Greek manuscripts). These include the Prayer of *Azariah and Song of the Three Young Men (inserted after 3.23 of the Hebrew text); the story of *Susanna and the elders (chap. 13 in the Septuagint), and the story of *Bel and the Dragon (chap. 14 in the Septuagint). (See also Apocrypha, article on Jewish Apocrypha.) In addition, a number of extracanonical Daniel materials have appeared among the *Dead Sea Scrolls at Qumran, the most interesting of which is the "Prayer of Nabonidus." Although put in the mouth of a different Babylonian king, this text parallels the story of Nebuchadnezzar's madness and recovery found in Daniel 4.

Unity and Language. The artful arrangement of the diverse subject matter of the book might suggest a single redaction, if not a single author. But the problem is further complicated by the circumstance that the book of Daniel is written in two languages, *Hebrew and *Aramaic.

The Hebrew text of Daniel 2.4a begins: "The Chaldeans said to the king (in Aramaic)." From that point until the end of chap. 7, the *Masoretic text of Daniel is written entirely in Aramaic, in the same dialect as that found in the other Aramaic texts of the Hebrew Bible (Ezra 4.8–6.18; 7.12–26, the single verse Jer. 10.11, and two words in Gen. 31.47). Why the text of Daniel switches so suddenly from Hebrew to Aramaic and back again, no one has ever been able to determine. One obvious solution would be that another writer, living at a different time and place and more deeply rooted in the literary culture of Official Aramaic, composed these chapters. Composite authorship is not the only possible solution, though. For centuries, Aramaic, a linguistic cousin to Hebrew and possibly even the language of the ancestral period (see Gen. 31.47; Deut. 26.5), was the lingua franca of the Babylonian and Persian empires, and it continued in use throughout the Hellenistic period in Palestine. Jews knew it well and used it freely—so freely, in fact, that by the Roman period it was displacing Hebrew as the language of Palestine. Perhaps a single writer of Daniel freely moved from Hebrew to Aramaic for no reason other than to tell the stories of the Babylonian diaspora in the language that was in fact being used there at the time.

Were the Aramaic portion of Daniel exactly coequal with the narrative portion, chaps. 1–6, the case for at least dual authorship would be almost irresistible—but it is not. Not only is the first tale (down to Dan. 2.4a) written in a late biblical Hebrew enriched by Persian loan words, but chap. 7, the first of the apocalyptic visions and in many ways the most central chapter in the whole book, is written in Aramaic. Literary genre and theological intention thus do not correlate with language.

One of the most frequently offered explanations of the bilingual character of Daniel is that the entire book (except for the prayer of 9.4–20) was originally written in Aramaic, and that 1.1–2.4a and chaps. 8–12 were later translated into Hebrew, perhaps in the interest of rendering the book more acceptable and authoritative to a community whose estimate of the sacredness of the Hebrew tongue waxed even as its vernacular use of that language waned. The case is supported by the fact that the Hebrew of the last five chapters in particular contains many Aramaisms and can often be clarified by translation "back" into Aramaic. While such a view of the bilingualism of the book would certainly imply an ongoing history of development of Daniel even after the text was essentially fixed, it would not necessarily demand that the book be regarded as composite in authorship. And even this modest theory faces the difficulty that the earliest fragments of the text of Daniel among the Dead Sea Scrolls of Qumran, written perhaps little more than a century after the composition of the book itself, already exhibit the same Hebrew/Aramaic/Hebrew transitions at the same points in the book.

The strongest arguments for multiple authorship are these. First, the literary style of chaps. 1–6 differs radically from that of chaps. 7–12. The former have all the flavor of heroic tales of the kind that would emanate from courtly or *wisdom circles (compare Daniel 2 with the *Joseph story and with *Esther); the latter chapters belong to that late descendant of prophetic eschatology, *apocalyptic literature. Second, the stories about Daniel in chapters 1–6 reflect a *diaspora outlook. By their language and their knowledge of cultural details, they show considerable exposure to both Persian and Hellenistic influences. In their essentials, these stories are assumed to come from the third century BCE or even somewhat earlier. The apocalypses of Daniel 7–12, on the other hand, focus on Judah, *Jerusalem, and the sanctuary. They can be dated rather more precisely (see below) to the first quarter of the second century BCE. If they were not composed by one writer who supplemented and revised the earlier work several times during a period of two or three years, then they were composed by persons working in close proximity in time and place. The writer(s) of Daniel 7–12 knew of the earlier cycle of Daniel stories, and for reasons of their own they used that collection as a basis from which to extend its ministry into their own realm of apocalyptic dreams and visions.

Date. The book of Daniel is one of the few books of the Bible that can be dated with precision. That dating makes it the latest of all the books of the Hebrew Bible, and yet it is still early enough to have been known by the sectarian community at *Qumran, which flourished between the second century BCE and 68 CE.

The lengthy apocalypse of Daniel 10–12 provides the best evidence for date and authorship. This great review of the political maelstrom of ancient Near Eastern politics swirling around the tiny Judean community accurately portrays history from the rise of the *Persian empire down to a time somewhat after the desecration of the Jerusalem *Temple and the erection there of the "abomination that makes desolate" (Dan. 11.31) in the late autumn of 167 BCE by the Greco-Syrian king Antiochus IV Epiphanes. (The story of this first of all pogroms of the Jews is told in 1 Macc. 1.41–61; see Maccabees, The Books of the.) The portrayal is expressed as *prophecy about the future course of events, given by a seer in Babylonian captivity; however, the prevailing scholarly opinion is that this is mostly prophecy after the fact. Only from 11.39 onward does the historical survey cease accurately to reproduce the events known to have taken place in the latter years of the reign of Antiochus IV. The most obvious explanation for this shift is that the point of the writer's own lifetime had been reached. Had the writer known, for example, about the success of the Jewish freedom fighters led by Judas Maccabeus in driving the garrison of the hated Antiochus from the temple precincts (an event that occurred on 25 Kislev, 164 BCE, according to 1 Macc. 4.34–31), the fact would surely have been mentioned. But evidently it had not yet happened!

The discussion of the date of the book of Daniel can be summed up as follows. With the possible exception of minor glosses, the book reached its present canonical form approximately in the middle of 164 BCE, though the translation of 1.1–2.4a and chaps. 8–12 from Aramaic into Hebrew may have taken place later. One of the best pieces of evidence available for the rapid acceptance of the book of Daniel as scripture is the inclusion of Daniel and his three friends in the list of the heroes of the Jewish faith in 1 Maccabees 2.59–60, thought to have been written in Hebrew about 100 BCE. In contrast, in Ben Sira's similar list (Sir. 44–49), written about 180 BCE, Daniel figures not at all.

Audience. To determine to whom the book was addressed in the first place, and in what circles the author or authors might have moved, two bits of internal evidence must be taken into account. First of all, the heroes of the stories of chaps. 1–6 must represent the kind of piety that would have been considered exemplary by the book's audience. These were observant Jews, heroes of the faith who refused to compromise with idolatry or, to put it another way, to participate in the syncretizing practices of the upper classes of their people during the Hellenistic reign of Antiochus IV Epiphanes (see 1 Macc. 1.41–43). In Daniel 7–12, the heroes are "the people who are loyal to their God" (11.32), "those who are wise . . . those who lead many to righteousness" (12.3). To these "holy ones of the Most High" (Dan. 7.18) is awarded the everlasting kingdom to be their dominion forever.

Given these clues internal to the book, modern commentators have frequently identified the authors of Daniel and the audience to which they spoke with the observant party of the "Hasideans" or hasidim, a title variously translated "the righteous ones," "the godly ones," or even "the saints." These people are known from 1 Maccabees 2.42 and 7.13–17, where they are presented as devout persons who reluctantly join in the war of liberation raised by the Maccabean rebels and who stay with that rebellion until they are convinced that the desecration of the Temple has been removed and that the authentic *Zadokite priestly line has been restored. According to some scholars, their descendants among the observant wing of Judaism of the first century BCE branched into the covenanters at Qumran, on the one hand, and into the *Pharisees, and perhaps even the *Zealots, on the other. For several centuries, this party in Judaism stood against syncretism and accommodation and may even have organized themselves into secret conventicles to oppose the corruptions in worship and in politics indulged in by the priestly classes.

Significance. The theological value of the book of Daniel does not lie in its ability to predict the future. According to the text of Daniel 7.9–27, the great judgment of the kingdoms of the earth and the establishment of "one like a *son of man [NRSV: human being]" (7.13)—who may be "the holy ones of the Most High" themselves (7.19)—should have occurred during the reign of Antiochus IV Epiphanes, the "little horn" with the "mouth speaking arrogantly" (7.8). Such an eschatological crisis did not, of course, happen in the reign of Antiochus. The canonizers themselves must have known this; perhaps they had already reinterpreted the four beasts who rise out of the sea in chap. 7 in such a way as to make Rome the fourth beast and the little horn some Roman emperor. By means of reinterpretation of the symbols of the apocalypse, it would have been possible to keep the timetable of events leading up to the last judgment open, and it was that openness that enabled the writer of Revelation 20 to transform Daniel 7 into a vision of the imminent worldwide crisis known as the *day of judgment.

But all attempts to discern an actual timetable in the apocalyptic scenario of Daniel finally are doomed to failure. As Jews and Christians affirm, the Bible is a human word, and therefore cannot accurately predict events of the distant future in the manner of history written in advance. As Jews and Christians also affirm, however, the book of Daniel is at the same time a word from God to God's people. It teaches that the God of justice and righteousness is not mocked by the powers of oppression that hold sway in the world. God will emerge from history as the victor, and those who choose to serve the causes of justice and righteousness are on the victor's side. In their own lives they can give a foretaste of life in the kingdom of heaven, just as Daniel and his three friends do in the stories of chaps. 1–6. In prayer and proclamation, God's people can announce the good news that those who hope for equity and the vindication of the just need not wait forever. Although our age no longer shares the confidence of an earlier age that it is possible to give a timetable or to write a historylike narrative about God's coming victory, the deep faith remains fundamental to our western theological tradition that history is meaningful. It gains its meaning from the end of history, which is God's triumphant intervention on behalf of God's own goodness. And it gains its meaning in movements along the way in which the saints have opportunities to enact in their own lives of righteousness and obedience the reality of God's coming kingdom.

Darius. The son of Hystaspes, an Achaemenid, Darius was ruler of the *Persian empire from 522 BCE (when he usurped the kingship in Parsa) until his death in 486 BCE. After a year spent quelling revolts in Mesopotamia, Elam, Iran, and Armenia, he conquered the Indus Valley (about 516 BCE), invaded Scythia north of the Danube without success, and conquered the southeastern corner of Europe (about 514–512 BCE). Part of Libya was subdued; but campaigns against Greece in 492 and 490 failed, and with Egypt in revolt (486) Darius died before his final expedition could be launched. Under his rule, the Persian empire reached its greatest extent.

He had a talent for administration. The empire was divided by him into twenty provinces (satrapies) whose governors (satraps) were responsible for law and order, the delivery of fixed tribute, and local military operations. A leading part was played by an elite increasingly composed of Persian nobles; but in *Egypt and *Babylonia natives could hold important offices, and in Syria and *Phoenicia city kings and local rulers were responsible to the satrap. For provincial affairs, Darius seems also to have used expert advisers whom he could keep beside him or send out as agents. To *Jerusalem *Zerubbabel seems to have been dispatched as local governor; and the *Temple, whose reconstruction had been ordered by *Cyrus and allowed to lapse, was completed under his rule in 515 BCE (Ezra 4–6). The prophets *Haggai and *Zechariah prophesied during his reign (Hag. 1.1; 2.1, 10, 18; Zech. 1.1, 7; 7.1).

In his court style, Darius seems to have set himself on a pinnacle high above his subjects. He had a script invented for his royal inscriptions (in Old Persian), in which he showed himself remarkably introspective. Presumably a Zoroastrian by upbringing, he claimed an intimate relationship with the god Ahuramazda, whose universal omnipotence was matched by his own on earth. He could be called a monotheist, but he supported the established religions of the conquered peoples (including that of Yahweh). As a ruler he was dynamic (his own words at Behistun were "What was said to them by me, night and day it was done"), and though implacable he was generally just. He molded an imperial system that his successors, who prided themselves on their descent from him, were too inclined to preserve unchanged.

He was born either about 550 BCE or some eight years earlier. His principal palace was at Susa (Map 11:J4), but his rock-cut tomb is near Persepolis (Map 11:K5).

Two later Persian kings of the same name were Darius II (423–404 BCE) and Darius III (336–330 BCE). The reference in Nehemiah 12.22 to Darius the Persian could be to either Darius II or Darius III. "Darius the Mede," mentioned only in Daniel 5.31 and 9.1, is understood by most scholars to be a composite created by the author of the book of *Daniel because, they argue, texts like Isaiah 13.17 and 21.2, as well as Jeremiah 51.11, had looked forward to a Median capture of *Babylon. David. One of the best-known biblical characters, David is a curiously elusive figure. The Bible tells of his carving out an empire unmatched in ancient Israel's history. Elsewhere, however, in historical records from near that period (tenth century BCE), he is not so much as mentioned. He is known to generations of scripture readers as "the sweet psalmist of Israel" (2 Sam 23:1 KJV) and the man whom God had chosen (1 Sam. 16.12; 2 Sam, 10.5). Yet his story in the books of *Samuel pivots on the episode of his adultery with *Bathsheba and murder of her husband, Uriah.

The Books of Samuel and Kings. David's story emerges primarily in the books of Samuel, concluding in 1 Kings 1–2. Scholarly attempts to reconstruct the history of the composition of these books remain highly speculative. On the one hand, there is general agreement that the final form of the work belongs to the period of *exile in the sixth century BCE. On the other hand, dates for individual component units of the work vary from near the time of the events depicted to the time of final compilation, a span of some five hundred years.

Few critics, however, would deny David a significant place in the history of the ancient Israelite state. Recent scholarship views him as a paramount chief with a genius for mediation, a man supremely able to command diverse tribal, economic, and cultic allegiances and to consolidate them into the centralized power needed for the formation of a nation-state.

According to Samuel and *Kings, this youngest son of a *Bethlehem farmer is sought out and anointed by the prophet *Samuel on behalf of the Lord (1 Sam. 16). He gains access to the court of *Saul, first king of Israel, initially by virtue of his musical prowess (1 Sam. 16.14–23) and then by defeating the Philistine champion *Goliath (1 Sam. 17)—there is some inconsistency in the plot here. Jonathan, Saul's son, loves him. A period of deadly rivalry with Saul, however, ensues. During this time, he marries Saul's daughter, Michal, and establishes his own independent military power as an outlaw in the Judean wilderness and as an ally of the *Philistines (1 Sam. 18–30).

After Saul's death (1 Sam. 31), David becomes king over *Judah in the south (2 Sam. 1–2) and then over *Israel in the north (2 Sam. 3–5), hence king over "all Israel." In 2 Samuel 5–10, he is depicted as coming to the peak of his power: he wins victories over external enemies, including the Philistines, establishes *Jerusalem as a capital and a cult center, and is assured by the prophet *Nathan of an enduring dynasty (2 Sam. 7). His dealings with *Bathsheba and Uriah (2 Sam. 11–12), however, elicit divine denunciation, conveyed by Nathan. Rape and murder now erupt within David's own house (2 Sam. 13–14), his son *Absalom rebels, and civil war ensues (2 Sam. 15–20).

A coda of short stories, anecdotes, and poetry (2 Sam. 21–24), connected to what has preceded by theme and allusion rather than by plot, caps the books of Samuel. The main plot itself is brought to a close with the story of David's death and *Solomon's succession at the beginning of the next book (1 Kings 1–2).

This story of David belongs to the larger story, told in Genesis through 2 Kings, of Israel's origins, nationhood, and eventual removal from the *Promised Land. David's story belongs with the account of the emerging nation-state's attempt to adapt religious and political institutions, especially leadership, to changing circumstances. His story is also part of the story of Yahweh's attempt to maintain or re-create a relationship of loyalty between deity and people. The people's desire for a human king is taken as a rejection of divine sovereignty. Thus Saul, designated by God at the people's insistence, must be rejected in favor of David, the one whom God has chosen freely (1 Sam. 13.14).

In a sense, the reader's first glimpse of David comes even earlier in 1 Samuel (2.1–10). The childless Hannah gives thanks for the gift of a baby (Samuel) and speaks, prophetically, of the king, the "anointed one" (see *Messiah) to whom Yahweh will give power. As the child is a special gift to the woman, so the kingdom is a special gift to David. Both gifts are freely given by God.

Giving and grasping lie at the story's heart. At critical moments David seems to allow choice to rest with others, especially Yahweh. At those moments he moves with a favorable tide; he may provoke a reader to contemplate forbearance, to consider providence as reality (e.g., 1 Sam. 14 and 26; 2 Sam. 15–16). At other times he falters, unwilling to take the risk, or to accept injured esteem issuing from rejection (e.g., 1 Sam. 25; 2 Sam. 11–12). In these instances, a reader may be confronted with a more familiar reality, the reality of deceit, greed, and violence that makes many judge the David story in Samuel realistic and plausible.

God gives David the kingdom, the house of Israel and Judah (cf. 2 Sam. 12.8). David's life, however, has a private as well as public dimension. What happens, privately, in his own house (palace and family) impinges on the nation. While his mighty men are besieging Rabbah, the *Ammonite capital, David seizes Bathsheba (2 Sam. 10–12). Thus, as the one house (the house of Israel) is secured, another (the house of David) begins to crumble. In the brutal story of Amnon, Tamar, and *Absalom that follows, first Tamar, David's daughter (2 Sam. 13), then both family and nation will be rent (2 Sam. 14–20).

The kingship arose out of the people's search for security, but security readily generates corruption. David's son, the builder of Yahweh's house, falters in turn: the great Solomon falls prey to the expanding glory of his own house (see 1 Kings 11). *Kingship—even Davidic kingship, Yahweh's gift—turns out to be no talisman (see 1 Sam. 8 and Deut. 17). In Yahweh alone, the story suggests, is true power and security to be found. The larger story (Genesis—2 Kings) ends with the house of Yahweh ruined, the people dispersed. A brief note about the house (dynasty) of David concludes the work (2 Kings 15.27–30): the exiled Davidic king sits powerless in the house of his *Babylonian conqueror, like Mephibosheth, grandson of Saul, in the house of David (2 Sam. 9.13). The wheel has turned full circle. The promise of an enduring house for David seems, in 2 Samuel 7, to be unconditional. It turns out to have limits; Yahweh, after all, is unwilling to be taken for granted.

The New Testament designation of *Jesus as "son of David" has predisposed many Christian readers to idealize the king. Yet David in Samuel and Kings is a complex character. Often, to be sure, the narrator elicits for David the admiration of readers—as the heroic slayer of Goliath (1 Sam. 17), for example, or the man who twice spares Saul, his persecutor (1 Sam. 24, 26), or the king who denounces Joab for killing Abner, the enemy general (2 Sam. 3), or who grants life to the cursing Shimei (2 Sam. 16, 19). Yet, equally, the narrator opens other possible perspectives even in these same narratives; David is a man with an eye for the main chance, adept at clothing his power-seeking and self-interest in the rhetoric of piety and morality, but exposed for all to see in the story of Bathsheba and Uriah.

The undercutting of the hero is ubiquitous. The account of his incarceration ("until the day of their death") of the ten concubines whom he abandoned to be raped on the roof of the house he fled hardly conjures a character of courage or responsibility (2 Sam. 15; 16; 20). The story of Solomon's accession in 1 Kings 1 pictures the king in gray tones as the dupe of a Solomonic faction's power play. His dying charge to Solomon (1 Kings 2.1–9) to kill Joab, his long-serving general, and Shimei, to whom he had granted pardon, evokes admiration only for its tidy ruthlessness. Or the coda to 2 Samuel (chaps. 21–24) may prompt a reader to ponder, for example, the difference between Rizpah's courage and David's compliance (2 Sam. 21), or the incongruity between David's treatment of Bathsheba and Uriah and the psalmist king's proclamation of his innocent righteousness ("I was blameless before [Yahweh] and I kept myself from guilt," 2 Sam. 22.24). Is this perhaps not righteousness but self-righteousness, not piety but hypocrisy? Even the tale of the slaying of Goliath, the foundation story of the heroic David, is placed in question by the coda. Without warning, tucked in amongst miscellaneous anecdotes, is the narrator's devastating remark that it was Elhanan who slew the mighty Gittite (2 Sam. 21.19).

In the subsequent narrative (1 and 2 Kings) David is viewed as a standard by which most other kings are judged unfavorably (e.g., 1 Kings 14.8; 15.3–5, 11), yet even these passages harbor a sardonic quality. David, the narrator informs us, "did what was right in the sight of Yahweh and did not turn aside from anything that he commanded him all the days of his life, except in the matter of Uriah the Hittite" (1 Kings 15.5). That little word "except" is powerfully subversive.

In Samuel and Kings the tensions in the depiction of David are never resolved. They are, perhaps, what give him life.

The Books of Chronicles. 1 and 2 *Chronicles offers quite a different version of David's life. This work is later than Samuel-Kings, composed perhaps in the fifth century BCE, and draws upon a version of those books which it revises and supplements.

After a genealogical prologue, the main story line starts (1 Chron. 10–12) with the death of Saul and David's crowning as king of all Israel; gone are the divisions between north and south. Jerusalem is taken. A great muster of mighty men is transformed into a cultic congregation conducting David and the *ark to the new capital with singing and celebration (1 Chron. 12–16). Battles (1 Chron. 14; 18–20) and plague (1 Chron. 21) are mentioned but bracketed by this greater purpose of establishing the place where Yahweh will be worshiped. From 1 Chronicles 22 to the end of the book and David's death, the focus is upon worship. David gathers the congregation once more and issues plans for the building of Yahweh's house and the organization of those who will sustain it. *Priests and *Levites, musicians and gatekeepers, commanders of this, chief officers of that, all are ordered to such an end. It is in ordering and implementing the great praise due to God that David finds life in the Chronicler's narrative.

The Psalms. Elsewhere in the Bible, the theme of a promise to continue David's line (the Davidic covenant) surfaces, for example, in the prophecy of Isaiah 9.7 and in Isaiah 55.3–4, a message of hope addressed to the Judean community in exile. Otherwise, David's presence is most marked in the *Psalms where many of the psalm titles use the term lĕdāwīd—of, to, or about David.

Modern scholars (and a few in ancient times) have generally considered these psalm ascriptions to be later additions to material that is itself mostly post-Davidic. Most interpreters over the centuries, however, have read the psalms in the light of these Davidic titles. In western iconography, for example, David is instantly recognizable as the man with crown and harp or psaltery, David the psalmist king; in popular culture he is often found with these attributes as the king of spades in playing cards. The image connects with the story of David's coming to Saul's court in 1 Samuel 16, but much more with 1 Chronicles, where the king's concern with the promulgation of *music in the temple worship is such a dominant theme (see also Amos 6.5). Moreover, one psalm is shared by both the Psalter and 2 Samuel (Ps. 18 = 2 Sam. 22).

Davidic authorship of the psalms has a special attraction for those who would flesh out the inner life of David, especially the David of Samuel-Kings whose piety is so tenuously pictured. Thus Psalm 51, linked by its title to the crucial Bathsheba episode, may be read as a window into the soul of the great king. His repentance, indicated in the narrative with but a few words (2 Sam. 12.13), is here paraded impressively. Problems of interpretation remain, however. The last verses of Psalm 51, for example, conjure a postexilic context (sixth century BCE or later) and strain any reading that takes the poem too literally as the outpourings of the tenth-century king.

The New Testament. The New Testament shows little interest in the personality of David, though the account of Jesus' plucking of the ears of grain on the *Sabbath (Mark 2.23–28 par.) explicitly recalls David's taking the holy bread from the priest at Nob (1 Sam. 21) and is in character with the David of the books of Samuel. In the Gospels, Jesus is linked to the royal dynasty of Judah and to the Davidic covenant by both *genealogy (Matt. 1.1–17; Luke 3.23–38) and address—he is called son of David, mostly in the context of healing/exorcism stories (e.g., Matt. 15.21–28; 20.29–34). Above all, in the New Testament, David is author—and prophet—of the psalms (see, e.g., Mark 12.36; Acts 1.16– 20), which are interpreted where possible as messianic prophecies fulfilled by Jesus.

Day of Atonement. Known in Hebrew as yôm (ha)kippūr(îm), the Day of Atonement is the most solemn festival in the Jewish religious calendar. It is celebrated on the tenth day of the seventh month, Tishri (= September/October). The name is found in Leviticus 23.27–28; 25.9 and is explained in Leviticus 16.30: "for on that day the Lord will make atonement (yĕkappēr) for you to purify you from all your sins." Leviticus 16 describes the elaborate rites performed by the high *priest in the *Temple at Jerusalem. The priest drew lots between two goats, one of which was presented as a sin offering to God, and the other dispatched to *Azazel in the *wilderness. It was only on this day that the high priest entered the holy of holies, the most sacred part of the Temple enclosure in which the *ark of the covenant was situated. He would enter bearing *incense whose fragrance symbolized God's forgiveness of the sins of Israel.

In antiquity as well as today Yom Kippur was considered a festival of spiritual accounting. Leviticus 16.29, 31 ordains that "you shall afflict yourselves." This term was interpreted to signify a day of *fasting when all food and drink were avoided. Tradition has added to these abstentions other deprivations, such as refraining from bathing, the use of cosmetics, and sexual intercourse. The people spend the day within the *synagogue reciting and chanting a specially composed liturgy, the core of which includes confessional prayers, thanksgiving hymns, and petitions to God for favor in the coming year. According to Leviticus 25.9–10, Yom Kippur was the day of the jubilee year (i.e., the fiftieth year) when slaves were freed, debts canceled, and land returned to its original owners. This aspect of the ancient festival is preserved in the modern collection of pledge contributions for the assistance of those in need.

Jewish tradition regards Yom Kippur as a day of judgment. On this day God passes judgment on the past deeds of every individual and decrees who shall live and who shall die during the ensuing year. The judgment process actually begins ten days before Yom Kippur, on the first day of Tishri, or Rosh Hashanah, the Jewish New Year, and reaches its culmination on Yom Kippur.

Even after the early Christians ceased to observe the day of fasting, some of the symbolism of Yom Kippur was retained in certain formulations. Note, for example, such New Testament expressions as "the blood of Christ" or "the *day of judgment," as well as the parallel made in Hebrews 9.1–14.

Day of Judgment. The "last day," the end of the present world, when God or his agent will preside over a final, universal judgment of the living and the resurrected dead. A definitive assessment of human actions will be made, and each person rewarded or punished accordingly.

Hebrew Bible. Neither the phrase "day of judgment" nor the full-blown apocalyptic *eschatology supporting it is found in the Hebrew Bible. But the cluster of ideas and images surrounding the *day of the Lord contribute significantly to its eventual development: the forensic character of "that day" when God will judge his enemies (Joel 3.2, 1, 14); its universal perspective, with judgment directed against both Israel's enemies, "the nations," and Israel herself, or at least the enemies of God in her midst (Isa. 2.6–19); and the opposing imagery of light and darkness (Amos 5.18–20), with far greater emphasis placed on the latter (Zeph. 1.14–16; the somber medieval hymn Dies irae draws its opening line from the *Vulgate rendering of v. 15).

Early Judaism. The factors that lead eventually to the emergence of the idea of a final day of judgment in particular are as disputed as those that lead to apocalyptic eschatology in general. Some degree of foreign influence (Persian, Egyptian, and/or Hellenistic) is plausible, but difficult to prove. What is clear is that both the phrase "day of judgment" and its substance appear in a wide variety of Jewish texts of the Greco-Roman period, along with the first undisputed reference to the resurrection of the dead (Dan. 12.2; see Afterlife and Immortality, article on Second Temple Judaism and Early Christianity). In Daniel the link between resurrection (12.2) and judgment (7.9–27) is implicit. In becomes explicit in 1 Enoch, where the angel *Raphael shows *Enoch the places appointed for all human souls "until the day of their judgment" (22.4); this is "the great judgment" (22.5), "the great day of judgment and punishment and torment" (22.11) that will affect even the rebel angels (10.6; cf. 90.24–27). In these earlier strata of 1 Enoch, judgment will apparently come from God himself (91.7); in the later Similitudes, however, God's "chosen one" is repeatedly named as judge (45–55).

The apocryphal book of 2 Esdras (4 Ezra) contains the most coherent account of the day of judgment. Judgment day will be preceded by a temporary messianic kingdom (7.28–29), a week of "primeval silence" (7.30), and the resurrection of the dead (7.32). Only then will the Most High sit in judgment; both righteous and unrighteous deeds shall stand forth clear and unchangeable, and *paradise and *hell be disclosed (7.33–36). Without sun, moon, or stars, noon or night, this "day" will in fact last "as though for a week of years" (7.43). During it, God will judge all nations, the few righteous and the many ungodly (7.51). This "day of judgment" will be definitive because it marks "the end of this age and the beginning of the immortal age to come" (7.43 [113]).

Other early Jewish texts that speak of a day of judgment include the *Septuagint of Isaiah 34.8 (rendering the Hebrew for "day of vengeance"); Judith 16.17 (against the nations); Jubilees 5.10–14 (the great day of judgment that awaits the generation of the giants and all creation) and 22.21 (against Canaan and all his descendants); Testament of Levi 3.2–3 (the second and third heavens prepared to punish unrighteous humans and spirits at the day of judgment); and Pseudo-Philo's Biblical Antiquities 3.10 (following a pattern similar to that of 2 Esdras 7.30–33, 43 [113]).

New Testament. The New Testament references to the day of judgment are rooted in contemporary Jewish apocalyptic thought. This is evident from such texts as 2 Peter and Jude, in both of which the fate of the rebel angel *Azazel (1 Enoch 10.4–6) is extended to his fellow rebels. In Jude 6, these angels are enchained "in deepest darkness for the judgment of the great Day"; in 2 Peter 2.4, the rebels are to be kept in hellish pits "until the judgment" (expanded in 2.9 to "until the day of judgment"). And, as in 1 Enoch 22 and other texts, that same day of judgment will signal the "destruction of the godless."

In two noticeable respects, however, early Christian views of the last judgment tend to distance themselves from traditional Jewish apocalyptic. Judgment is now seen almost exclusively in individual rather than national terms (Matt. 10.15 is something of an exception), and the judge is increasingly identified as Jesus, returned to serve as God's agent (Rom. 2.16; see Second Coming of Christ), rather than God himself. Both of these features are present in Matthew 25.31–46, where it is the *Son of man who sits on the throne of judgment, and where the nations are judged not communally but individually, based on their treatment of the needy. The second development leads also to an expansion in terminology particularly noticeable in Pauline literature. Alongside "the day" (Rom. 2.16; 1 Cor. 3.13), "that day" (2 Tim. 1.12; 4.8; cf. 4.1), and "the day of wrath" (Rom. 2.5), we find "the day of Christ" (Phil. 1.10; 2.16), "the day of Jesus Christ" (Phil. 1.6), the "day of the Lord" (1 Thess. 5.2; 2 Thess. 2.2), "the day of the Lord Jesus" (1 Cor. 5.5; 2 Cor. 1.14), and "the day of our Lord Jesus Christ" (1 Cor. 1.8). The forensic role of Jesus on the day of judgment becomes central in later Christian tradition. In the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds, Jesus "will come again (in glory) to judge the living and the dead"; and artists from Giotto and Michelangelo to William Blake have placed him at the center of their depictions of the Last Judgment.

PAUL G. MOSCA

Day of the Lord. This phrase combines a strictly temporal reference to the day and a reference to the eternal (Lord). This combination, quite typical of the Bible, is an apparent contradiction that can be resolved either by giving priority to the temporal component (whether day or year)—thus imprisoning God within the slots on human calendars—or prioritizing the eternal component by thinking of this day as chosen by God to fulfill his purposes. This second option is characteristic of the Bible. The God of Israel, having created his people by sealing *covenants with them, retained authority to set a term to the period when their truancy or faithfulness would be disclosed. Typically, he would choose a time that would surprise them, whether earlier or later than they expected. His verdicts also would be surprising, often condemnation where approval was expected, or vindication where the penitent expected punishment. The primary concern of God's spokespersons was not with the date of the accounting but with its certainty.

Often, the day of the Lord is announced as "coming." That verb denotes movement, but not a movement of Israel toward a date on the calendar, but rather movement of God toward his people in order to call them to account. Where rebellion flourishes, *prophets announce God's imminent coming to lay bare the secrets of hearts (Ezek. 30; Isa. 2.12; 3.18). Where loyalty flourishes in the midst of suffering, they provide consolation and courage by promising speedy intervention by the Most High (Isa. 11–12). The approach of the day would thus be marked by both deep darkness and the shining of the dawn.

The frequent references to God's coming explain the flexibility in the use of terms. The same event could be announced as the hour, the day, the year, or the time (see Time, Units of). The importance of the event could be indicated by articles and adjectives: the day, that day, the great day, the last day. The fearfulness of God's judgment released an array of surreal images: lightning, thunder, earthquake, tidal waves, tumults among nations, all intended to express how terrible it is to fall into the hands of the living God (Isa. 13; 22; Jer. 46.10; Lam. 2; Heb. 10.31; Rev. 16.12–21). *Sodom and Gomorrah become stock examples of destruction (Gen 13.10; Matt. 10.15; Luke 17.22–30). It is impossible to organize or harmonize all pictures of God's wrath (Joel 2). But the expectations of doom could be reversed by surprising mercies (Hos. 2; Amos 9:11–15).

In biblical as in later times, false prophets and false messiahs exploited desires to know in advance the signs of the times (Mark 13.6), but others stressed divine secrecy (Mark 13.32; 1 Thess. 5.2–3). God's reckoning of time differs completely from human calculations (Ps. 90.4; 2 Pet. 3.8). It was therefore wrong either to spread panic because of the day's nearness or to counsel despair because of its distance. The function of the references to the day was thus both to warn unsuspecting rebels to watch (e.g., Matt. 24.42–44) and to assure the faithful of the nearness of their salvation (1 Thess. 5.4–11).

Early Christians commonly identified the biblical day of the Lord with the day of the *Son of man (Matt. 24.42–44; Luke 17.24, 30; Acts 17.31; Rom. 2.16), when the risen Jesus would act as judge in the heavenly trial of his followers (Matt. 25.31–46). The *twelve are also pictured as sharing the throne of judgment (Luke 22.30). Some authors, however, understood the last days to have begun with the ministry of Jesus (John 12.31; 16.8–11; Acts 2.16–21; Heb. 1.2).

PAUL S. MINEAR

Deacon. The Greek noun diakonos underlying the English word "deacon" has in general usage the meaning of "servant," especially in the sense of one who waits on tables (cf. Matt. 22.13; John 2.5, 9). Perhaps the word was originally applied to early Christian leaders who assisted at celebrations of the *Lord's supper. It has often been suggested that the establishment of the diaconate is sketched in Acts 6.1–6, and this may be Luke's intention, although neither here nor elsewhere does he use the noun diakonos (see Seven, The).

The understanding of *Jesus as servant (e.g., Mark 10.45, using the verb diakonein) informs later Christian concepts of ministry, though the New Testament applies diakonos to Jesus in a positive sense only once (Rom. 15.8). The term occurs twenty-eight other times in the New Testament but only rarely in relation to a special church office.

In Philippians 1.1 Paul addresses a letter to all the Philippian saints "with the bishops and deacons." Generally the Pauline letters do not imply the existence of fixed church offices with distinctive functions, but in this passage "deacons" clearly refers to a particular group of church leaders. No function is specified, but perhaps Paul mentions them here (along with *bishops) because they helped provide the material assistance that partly occasions his letter (4.10–18).

In Romans 16.1–3 Paul mentions a certain Phoebe as a diakonos of the church at Cenchreae (a port city of *Corinth) and "benefactor" of many Christians, himself included. Nothing specific is said about her work, but there is no indication that she is a deacon in a lesser or different sense from that of the persons addressed in Philippians 1.1.

One passage in the *Pastoral letters (1 Tim. 3.8–13) follows a list of qualifications for bishops with those for deacons. Deacons must be of good character, not avaricious, and good managers of their private households. Such requirements suggest that deacons are administrators with special responsibility for money. Nothing is said about teaching ability. A sentence about *women (1 Tim. 3.11) may allude to women deacons or to the wives of male deacons.

Although the Pastoral letters seem to reflect an advanced stage in the development of church organization and differentiation of clerical roles, it is noteworthy that here and elsewhere diakonos can also be used as a general term for Christian "minister" (1 Tim. 4.6). Paul several times applies the term in this broad sense to himself and to other church leaders (1 Cor. 3.5; 2 Cor. 3.6; 6.4; 11.23; cf. Eph. 3.7; Col. 1.23, 25).

DAVID M. HAY

Dead Sea Scrolls. Since 1947, hundreds of Hebrew and Aramaic scrolls have been discovered near the *Dead Sea, at first in unorganized searches by Bedouins and later in orderly archaeological excavations. The main location where these scrolls were found is Qumran (Map 12:X5), roughly 16 km (10 mi) south of *Jericho; other sites still farther to the south include Murabba'ât, Seelim, and Masada (Map 12:X5). Some of these locations are more inland, so that the term "Judean Desert Scrolls" is more appropriate than "Dead Sea Scrolls." In eleven caves at Qumran, hundreds of scrolls were discovered, some in jars and almost complete, such as the large Isaiah scroll from Cave 1, but others mere fragments, often very difficult to read. Their antiquity, disputed at first by a few scholars, is now beyond doubt, and dates between 250 BCE and 70 CE have been secured by carbon-14 tests, archaeological evidence, and paleography. The scrolls are kept in the Rockefeller and Israel Museums in Jerusalem, and only the major ones are shown to the public.

The caves in which the scrolls were found are located near the ruins of a settlement near the Dead Sea. These ruins (Khirbet Qumran) have been excavated; they consist of a walled site comprising various community buildings, such as a bakery, a potter's workshop, a dining hall, and possibly a scriptorium.

No external evidence on the settlement is available, but probably there was a close link between its buildings and the scrolls found in nearby caves. Some of the artifacts found near the scrolls are identical with artifacts found in the community buildings. Furthermore, the sectarian writings found in the caves describe the lifestyle of a community that would suit the buildings.

The identity and nature of the community of the scrolls has often been discussed by scholars, and most now agree that they are the *Essenes described in ancient sources. The Essenes were an ancient Jewish sect with a status similar to that of the *Samaritans, *Sadducees, and early Christians, all of whom departed from mainstream Judaism, embodied in the *Pharisees (see Judaisms of the First Century CE). While most of the Essenes lived elsewhere in Palestine, the Qumran group decided to depart physically from society when they chose to dwell in the desert of Judea. The characteristics of the Essenes (the origin of the name is unknown), described in detail by *Philo and *Josephus, agree in general with the evidence from the scrolls. These are of three types: sectarian compositions, apocryphal works, and biblical scrolls.

The sectarian compositions found in Qumran reflect a secretive community about whose life much is still unknown. The main information is found in the so-called Manual of Discipline (in Hebrew, "The Rule of the Community"), detailing the daily life, behavior, and hierarchy of the sect. The principal source for the history of the community is a letter supposedly written by its leader, the "Teacher of Righteousness," to the priests of Jerusalem, outlining points of difference between both groups (4QMMT).

Other details can be learned from the Damascus Covenant, which tells about the beginning of the sect's existence, and from pĕšārîm. The special laws of the community are outlined in the Damascus Covenant and in smaller legal collections. The sect's views are reflected especially in the pĕšārîm, exegetical writings focusing on the relevance of biblical books to the sect. The Temple Scroll, the largest preserved scroll, rewrites the laws of the *Pentateuch in apparent agreement with some of the sect's views. The War Scroll depicts the future war of the "Sons of Light" (i.e., members of the sect) against the "Sons of Darkness." The sect's expectations and grievances are expressed in the Thanksgiving Hymns.

Among the scrolls found in Qumran and at Masada are several Hebrew and Aramaic *apocryphal and *pseudepigraphal works, previously known only in ancient translations or from medieval sources. Of these, the books of Jubilees, *Enoch, *Sirach, and the Testament of Levi are now known in their original Hebrew or Aramaic form.

A large group of scrolls found in Qumran and at other places in the Judean desert consists of biblical manuscripts, dating from 250 BCE until 70 CE. Similar scrolls from the beginning of the second century CE have been found in other places in the Judean Desert. These finds inaugurated a new era in the study of the text of the Hebrew Bible, previously known almost exclusively from medieval sources (see Manuscripts, article on Hebrew Bible; Textual Criticism).

In eleven Qumran caves, roughly 190 biblical scrolls have been found, some almost complete and others very fragmentary. Different scrolls are distinguished by their script. With the exception of Esther, all books of the Hebrew Bible are represented at Qumran, some by many scrolls (Deuteronomy, Isaiah, Psalms), others by a single copy. The great majority of the scrolls are written in the Aramaic script, while sixteen are written in the paleo-Hebrew (or Old Hebrew) script.

Most of the scrolls have the same spelling as the *Masoretic Text (MT), but a significant number are written with a previously unknown form of spelling, which frequently uses letters to indicate vowels. Some scholars argue that the scrolls displaying this special spelling were written by the Qumran scribes, for all the sectarian scrolls are written in this spelling as well. The biblical scrolls from the Dead Sea area show what the biblical text looked like in the last three centuries BCE and the first century CE.

Of similar importance are the new data about the content of the biblical scrolls, since different texts are recognizable. Some texts reflect precisely the consonantal framework of the medieval MT. Others reflect the basic framework of the MT, although their spelling is different. Still others differ in many details from the MT, while agreeing with the *Septuagint or *Samaritan Pentateuch. Some texts do not agree with any previously known text at all, and should be considered independent textual traditions. Thus, the textual picture presented by the Qumran scrolls represents a textual variety that was probably typical for the period.

Although most of the scrolls have been analyzed, the nature of the collection of scrolls found in the Qumran caves is still not known. While some scholars continue to refer to the contents of these caves as the "library" of the sect, others consider it a haphazard collection of works deposited there for posterity in the difficult days of the destruction of Jerusalem in 67–70 CE.

Because the nature of the collection is not known, it is also not clear how one should evaluate the fact that biblical, apocryphal, and sectarian works were found in the same caves. Probably this does not show anything about the sect's views, but some scholars believe that the sect's concept of scripture was more encompassing than the collection that eventually became the Jewish *canon.

EMANUEL TOV

Death. The biblical concept of death is complex, like the reality it seeks to describe. Death is both natural and intrusive; it occasions no undue anxiety except in unusual circumstances such as premature departure, violence, or childless demise, and it is the greatest enemy facing humankind. In Genesis 3, death acts as punishment for primeval rebellion (see Fall, The). In the New Testament, one special death, that of *Jesus, cancels every claim against guilty persons; hence each negative feature regarding death is balanced by its opposite. Ultimately, death is robbed of its power, and its elimination is anticipated (see Hos. 13.14; 1 Cor. 15.55–56).

Belief in the solidarity of the *family enabled ancient Israelites to accept death calmly, for in death a person simply slept with one's ancestors. Nevertheless, this sleep was subject to disturbance, prompting a cult of the dead and the effort to contact the departed. Official Yahwism condemned both activities (Lev. 19.31; 20.27; Deut. 18.11), while implicitly acknowledging their efficacy (1 Sam. 28; cf. 1 Chron. 10.13). The conviction that a deed was met with an appropriate consequence gained ascendancy, particularly in prophetic and *wisdom literature. This popular notion eventuated in an understanding of death as punishment (Gen. 2–3), theoretically implying that humankind could have lived forever. A *Ugaritic text, Aqhat, denies the seductive suggestion that a mortal could live forever. Such reflection about death, though rare, does occur elsewhere, especially in 2 Esdras 7 and in Paul (Rom. 5.12–21). A mythological idea of Death as combatant lies behind this development. Yahweh does battle with Mot, the Canaanite name for this foe, and subjugates the enemy. Henceforth death acts on orders from Israel's God, the ultimate source of good and evil. The result is a problem of monumental proportions, that of theodicy.

References to death in the Bible presuppose a worldview that differs from modern concepts. Life consists of well-being, and death signifies diminished life. Consequently, one must speak about degrees of death. A sick person, or a persecuted one, described the peril as death and characterized deliverance as emergence from death's grip; this convention clarifies much of the languages of the *Psalms. A symbolic meaning of death thus developed. The Deuteronomist urges Israel to choose life, not death (Deut. 30.19), and *Ezekiel denies that God desires death for anyone (Ezek. 18.31). This powerful imagery for death carries over into the New Testament, where *baptism (Rom. 6.3) and discipleship are illuminated by speech about dying (2 Cor. 4.11; 1 Pet. 2.24; Rev. 12.11).

At first Israelites assumed that death was the end, at least of life as we know it. This somber message underlies the epic of *Gilgamesh, a story about a heroic king's efforts to obtain eternal life. Once water was spilled on the ground, none could retrieve it, to use a metaphor employed by the woman of Tekoa (2 Sam. 14.14). Emerging individualism and harsh political realities forged a bold hope that a resurrection would take place, at least in rare instances (Isa. 26.19; Dan. 12.2, prefigured by Hos. 6.2 and Ezek. 37). Greek belief in body and soul as separate entities enabled this hope to become strong conviction by Roman times (see Human Person).

Israel's theologians believed that God alone had authority to terminate life; those responsible for executing criminals acted in God's behalf. Suicide is rarely mentioned in the Bible (1 Sam. 31.4; 2 Sam. 17.23; 1 Kings 16.18; Matt. 27.5; Acts. 1.18), in contrast to texts from Egypt and Mesopotamia, in which suicide occurs in dire straits occasioned by shame or impending torture. In his misery *Job entertains thoughts of suicide (Job 3.21; 7.15), and the author of *Ecclesiastes has a fascination for death (Eccles. 4.2–3), but neither opts for early departure. *Sirach recognizes that personal circumstances determine one's attitude toward death (41.1–2). Occasional death wishes occur—Elijah (1 Kings 19.4), Tobit (3.6), Jonah (4.8)—and Paul confesses to having mixed feelings about death, which held many attractive features for him, in that he would then be with Christ (Phil. 1.23).

*Apocalyptic thinking posits the dawn of a new age, a resurrection, and a final reckoning. The gospel of *John views Jesus' presence as proof of the resurrection, and the book of *Revelation proclaims the complete eradication of death (21.4), which Paul also declares (1 Cor. 15.54). Christians therefore need not fear the isolation of death, for nothing can separate the believer from God (Rom. 8.38–39). This attitude is not a denial of death, the plague of the human spirit, but a recognition of the sovereignty of the covenant of God despite the grim fact of death.

JAMES L. CRENSHAW

Deborah. A name which means "bee" in Hebrew, Deborah is the name of two women mentioned in the Hebrew Bible. Two passages (Gen. 35.8; 24.59) call Rebekah's nurse Deborah. Much more prominent is the Deborah mentioned in Judges 4 and 5, whose fame in the biblical record emerges from her role as a military leader. With her general, Barak, she successfully led a coalition of Israelite tribal militias to victory over a superior Canaanite army commanded by Sisera. The battle was fought in the plain of Esdraelon (Map 13:X3), and the mortal blow to the Canaanite general was delivered by another female figure, Jael.

The account of this war, ending with an important victory for the Israelites in their struggle to control central and northern Palestine, is recounted in two versions, a prose narrative in Judges 4 and a poetic form in Judges 5. The literary and chronological relationship of these two versions is a matter of debate; but most scholars see in the archaic language of the poem evidence that it comes from a very early stage of biblical literature and may be the oldest extant Israelite poem, perhaps dating from the late twelfth century BCE, not long after the battle it recounts.

Deborah occupies a unique role in Israelite history. Not only is she a judge in the sense of a military leader, but also she is the only judge in the law-court sense of that title (Judg. 4.5) in the book of *Judges. Of all the military leaders of the book, only Deborah is called a "prophet." She is also the only judge to "sing" of the victory, illustrating the creative role played by women as shapers of tradition (cf. Exod. 15.20–21). While some would see Deborah, a female, as an anomaly in all these roles, her contributions should be set alongside those of other women who are pivotal figures in the premonarchic period (*Miriam, Jael, Jephthah's daughter, *Samson's mother). All emerge as strong women with no negative valuation, perhaps because during the period of the judges, a time of social and political crisis, able people of any status could contribute to group efforts. In the rural, agrarian setting of the period of the judges, with the *family as the dominant social institution, the important role of *women in family life was more readily transferred to matters of public concern than during the monarchy, with its more formal and hierarchical power structures. Deborah as a strong woman reflects her own gifts as well as a relatively open phase of Israelite society.

Decapolis. The Decapolis was a league of ten cities founded by *Alexander the Great and his successors around 323 BCE. By the first century CE, according to both the Gospels (Matt. 4.25; Mark 5.20, 7.31) and Pliny (Natural History 5.16.74), the term refers both to the cities and to the region in which they were situated (Map 12:Y3–5). The earliest list of the cities appears in Pliny; most scholars agree on these ten: Scythopolis/Beth-shan, Hippo, Philadelphia (modern Amman), Gerasa (Jerash), Gadara, Pella, Dion, Canatha, Raphana, and *Damascus. According to both Josephus and Polybius, by the dawn of Seleucid rule in the region of Palestine and the Transjordan at least four of the cities were of real importance (Gadara, Scythopolis, Pella, and Abila).

This region is perhaps the paramount example of the role of urbanization in the development and dominance of the Greek East by colonial empires. In both the Ptolemaic (ca. 300–200 BCE) and the Seleucid periods (200–130 BCE) these cities were built or expanded. With the conquest of the region by Pompey on behalf of Rome (ca. 63 BCE), their importance increased. They were a vital means of Roman control, both economic and military. Pompey made the capital of the league, Scythopolis/Beth-shan, the seat of the regional court (the *Sanhedrin) and utilized other cities in the region in a similar fashion. These urban centers almost invariably sided with the colonial power in revolts by the indigenous population (whether Maccabean, resistance to Pompey, or the First Jewish Revolt against Rome in 66–70 CE) and frequently put down native resistance brutally.

A number of the cities have been excavated (Pella, Gerasa, Abila), with the most recent significant project being at Scythopolis/Beth-shan. Excavations at these sites reflect a diverse, cosmopolitan milieu. Several languages were used (*Greek, *Hebrew, and *Aramaic), temples and monuments stood almost side by side with *synagogues and early churches, and local culture and trade took place within the larger setting of Roman military and economic hegemony.

J. ANDREW OVERMAN

Demons. In all cultures, fabulous notions may be found about the work of evil spirits, more or less capricious, more or less baleful. Such concepts are also found in the Bible, at times echoing extrabiblical thinking, at times reverberating with overtones charcteristic of the Bible.

Ideas about demons in the Hebrew Bible are too diverse to be systematized. Animistic notions may be discerned in the recognition of spirits inhabiting trees, animals, mountains, rivers, and storms. Allusions are found to belief in fertility deities, or in divine beings, who, through sinning, lost their heavenly home (Gen. 6.1–4; see Sons of God). More often the narratives focus upon the role of evil spirits in producing erratic and unexpected behavior; they arouse explosive jealousies (Num. 5.14), powerful desires for vengeance (Judg. 9.23), or shocking mental confusions (1 Sam. 16.14). The words of a prophet could be attributed to lying spirits sent by God (1 Kings 22.22). The worship of *idols could be explained by the influence of such spirits on the gullible (Hos. 4.12).

In the New Testament, though, the picture is different. References are much more numerous, reflecting developments in the Hellenistic and Roman periods. Attitudes are more unified, reflecting the influence of stories about *Jesus. Now demons are viewed as evil by nature, since they are obedient servants of *Satan who is the ultimate adversary of God. Their power to deceive and torment is viewed as coterminous with "this evil age," so that any restriction on their movements is viewed as an intrusion of a new age.

It was the authority of Jesus over demons that posed this possibility. According to the Gospels, that authority was first demonstrated when Jesus overcame Satan's most persuasive offers (Matt. 4.1–11 par.; see Temptation of Christ). This victory qualified him to begin evicting demons from their human homes (Matt. 4.24). Those spirits manifested their evil power by causing spiritual and physical *blindness, deafness, paralysis, *epilepsy, and madness. Debates over Jesus' healings centered not on whether they were real but on the authority by which they were accomplished: were they a sign of Satan's fall from heaven (Luke 10.17; cf. Rev. 12.9), of God's own intervention into human affairs, of faith in Jesus' word (Matt. 17.20), or were they rather a sign of Jesus' affilation with *Beelzebul, the ruler of demons (Matt. 9.34)?

The first option was the conviction of the Gospel narrators. And for them, the healings were not limited to Jesus. Even before his death he had shared with *disciples the power over demons (Luke 9.1); after his death they continued his work (Matt. 7.22; Acts 19.11–16). Evil spirits continued to resist the power of the Holy Spirit, but faith continued to bring liberation. As a result, a more or less standard attitude toward demons emerged: (1) Their primary activity lies in blinding and paralyzing human beings, who become captives of Satan. (2) Demons are forces external to human beings, yet their power also depends on internal forces operating at subconscious levels. (3) This conjunction of demonic and human wills creates a captivity that has been granted by God and can therefore be terminated by God. (4) That is why God's word, by evoking the faith of captives, can liberate them from their demonic captors. (5) The *exorcisms attributed to Jesus point to him as authorized to speak that word. (6) After his death and resurrection, the Holy Spirit enabled his representatives to continue that work of liberation; this gift did not, however, make them immune to demonic counterattack (2 Cor. 12.7). (7) There was a widespread expectation that this counterattack would reach its deceptive maximum in the endtime, immediately before the return of the *Messiah (1 Tim. 4.1; Rev. 16.13–14; 18.2).

PAUL S. MINEAR

Descent into Hell. The visit of a god or a hero to the underworld and the realm of death; in Christian contexts ascribed to Jesus.

Ancient Near Eastern and Greek myths know of several gods and heroes who had been in the underworld among the dead without being kept there. *Sumerian traditions include narratives of this kind about Enlil and Inanna, and in Babylonian form the motif was connected with the goddess Ishtar and the young god *Tammuz. An old Egyptian text, called Amduat, depicts the sun god's journey through the underworld in a boat every night. Greek folklore cherished descent stories about heroes such as Heracles, Odysseus, Orpheus, and the daughter of Demeter called Kore or Persephone, though their visits to Hades served different purposes. Similar stories were known in the biblical world, but none of these examples are direct sources of descent motifs in the Bible.

In the Hebrew Bible certain analogies to descent ideas appear in texts dealing with the struggle of the elect in the infernal gulfs and torrents of suffering and death. This "de profundis" motif is often found in the *Psalms (e.g., 18.4, 16; 42.7; 69.2, 14–15). The prophet *Jonah had reason to sing a similar psalm (Jon. 2.2–6).

In nonbiblical literature, the psalms of *Qumran develop this concept of a descent into the infernal realm of suffering and death (1QH III.6–10, 19–20, 25–27, VI. 22–24). Another form of the descent topic is found in apocalyptic teaching ascribed to *Enoch. The patriarch is said to have received this message (1 Enoch 12.4–5, following the Greek text): "Enoch, you scribe of righteousness, go and tell those heavenly watchers who have left the lofty heaven [i.e., according to 1 Enoch 10.4, the fallen angels of Gen. 6.1–4, now bound in a dark prison] . . . : 'You will find neither peace nor forgiveness.' " Afterward the apocalypse describes visits of Enoch to the underworld.

In the New Testament some of the relevant biblical and nonbiblical Jewish texts were applied to Jesus. He was said to have presented himself as fulfilling the sign of Jonah (Matt. 12.38–41; 16.4; Luke 11.29–32). These and other reports presuppose or indicate that Jesus was in the underworld between his death and resurrection (Matt. 12.40; Acts 2.24, 27, 31; Rom. 10.7; Eph. 4.8–9). Sometimes the descent was also described as implying a messianic activity under one of three different aspects: Hades was subdued (Rev. 1.18); righteous people were delivered (Matt. 27.51–53); Christ preached to the so-called spirits in prison and to all in the realm of death (1 Pet. 3.19; 4.6). These "spirits in prison" were meant to be understood as the fallen angels of Gen. 6.1–4, who in the Enoch tradition were treated as the initiators of paganism; the reference to Christ's going to them (1 Pet. 3.19) therefore was intended to strengthen the preceding exhortation to confess one's faith in front of Roman authorities (3.15).

These aspects inspired later theologians to develop doctrines of Christ's descent in corresponding ways. The affirmation "He descended into hell" first appears in the Aquileian Creed of Rufinus (ca. 400 CE); from there it gradually spread throughout the West and found a place in the Apostles' Creed.

Deutero-Isaiah. See Isaiah, The Book of.

Deuteronomic History. "Deuteronomic history" is a term used by biblical scholars for a hypothetical work composed in ancient times that consisted of the books of *Deuteronomy through 2 *Kings. A variant form used by some scholars is "Deuteronomistic history."

The hypothesis was proposed by Martin Noth, who in 1943 pointed to the common phrasing and theological themes that permeated those books, and argued convincingly that these similarities were evidence of a single author. This author compiled already existing traditions and supplied his own framework and connecting material, as well as speeches for key characters (e.g., Josh. 24; 1 Sam. 8; 12), to express his view of the history of the people of Israel from the time of *Moses to the *exile in Babylon. The book of Deuteronomy forms a kind of theological preface for the history, with an introduction (chaps. 1–3) and a conclusion (31.1–13 and parts of chap. 34) supplied. Noth dated this Deuteronomic history to the exilic period because it concludes (2 Kings 25.27–30) with the release of the Judean king Jehoiachin from prison in Babylon (561 BCE). According to Noth, the purpose of the history was to show the exiles that their situation was the result of infidelity to the *covenant as set forth in the Deuteronomic laws.

Noth's theory has been widely accepted. It explains why the literary traditions (*J, *E, and *P) found in the first four books of the *Pentateuch are absent in subsequent books, and why those traditions end with some abruptness without the fulfillment of the promises made in them. As the biblical books were collected, edited, and arranged, the Deuteronomic history replaced the original endings of the Pentateuchal traditions.

Subsequent scholars have elaborated positive themes in what Noth had suggested was essentially a negative work. One of the most influential refinements of Noth's hypothesis is that of Frank Moore Cross. He began by tracing two contrasting themes throughout the books of Kings: the sin of Jeroboam (1 Kings 13.34; 15.34; 16.19; 22.52; 2 Kings 3.3; 13.2; 14.24; 15.9; etc.), which culminates in the fall of the northern kingdom of *Israel and the destruction of *Samaria (2 Kings 17), and the faithfulness of David, grounded in the covenantal theology of the southern kingdom of *Judah (1 Kings 3.6; 14.8; 15.11; 2 Kings 14.3; etc.). Only two kings meet the standard set by David: *Hezekiah (2 Kings 18.3–7) and *Josiah (2 Kings 22.2). Since the reforms of Josiah (2 Kings 22.11–23.25) are the culmination of the second theme, Cross argued that the Deuteronomic history had two editions, the first during that king's reign in the late seventh century BCE, serving as a support for his political and religious programs. After Josiah's untimely death in 609 and the fall of Jerusalem in 587/586, the first edition was rewritten to explain and even to justify the exile, as Noth had originally suggested. Other modifications of Noth's hypothesis continue to be proposed, implicitly demonstrating the strength of his original insight. RUSSELL FULLER

Deuteronomy, The Book of.

Content. The book of Deuteronomy received its title from the Greek translation of Deuteronomy 17.18, where the Hebrew word indicating "copy" has been understood as meaning "second law" (deuteronomion, hence "Deuteronomy"); in Hebrew it is called dĕbārîm, "words," from the opening verse. Despite the misunderstanding, this is a good description of a book whose main part is a second corpus of laws given to Israel through *Moses, supplementing those given at *Horeb (see 29.1). This second corpus was delivered to the Israelites in the plains of *Moab on the eve of their entry into the land of *Canaan. The central part of the book lies between 4.44 and 30.20, which must once have formed its beginning and ending. Deuteronomy 29.1 describes them as "the words of the covenant [between God and Israel]," and 4.45 describes them as made up of "decrees, statutes, and ordinances." Presenting "law" or *Torah (Hebr. tôrâ) is the major concern of the book as it formulates the *covenant between God and Israel, the basis for the nation's life in the land of Canaan. Because such laws are to be found primarily in chaps. 12–26, the material of 4.44–11.32 can be seen as a general introduction made up of Moses' exhortations in the form of long speeches directing Israel to obey the laws; 27.1–30.20 is an epilogue with admonitions, warnings, and curses against failing to do so. The whole of the book may be described as "preaching law": often the laws themselves take the central place, but at other times a passionate preaching and admonitory manner are foremost.

The laws at the heart of the book are in many cases laws in our familiar juridical sense, specifying offenses and defining the appropriate punishments for them. At other times, however, they are essentially religious instructions and regulations for worship, as in the festival calendar of 16.1–17, or an even broader type of ethical admonition and instruction, as in the *Ten Commandments of 5.6–21. The speeches broaden this sense of the demands for godly living still further by emphasizing the need for a right attitude toward God and society. Consequently, there is much urgent warning to remember God and his dealings with Israel, not to forget the divine gifts, and to love God with a deep love in the heart (esp. 6.5).

The book thus aims to provide both the framework for a national constitution of Israel and a basic summary of every citizen's rights and duties, as well as to exhort the proper feelings and attitudes toward God and fellow citizens; it strongly endeavors to bring all of life—its private, social, and more openly religious aspects—under an awareness of obligation and duty toward God.

Sources. The sources of the book can be determined only with a degree of probability, since in many cases there is limited evidence on which to base conclusions. Clearly, a significant part of the central law collection in chaps. 12–26 repeats, with additions and modifications, many of the laws given earlier in the Book of the Covenant (Exod. 20.22–23.19). Approximately half of the laws are covered, and in a way that shows the Deuteronomic version to be later, either fuller or adapted to a more complex economic and social order. These laws provide a handbook for administration in civil or criminal cases where wrongs have been perpetrated and society must act against the wrongdoers. Why all the cases present in the earlier laws are not dealt with remains unclear.

The book's brief historical framework presupposes an earlier *Pentateuchal narrative tradition, which scholars have usually assigned to the sources *J and *E. Where a few traces of the *P (Priestly) source are to be found, these are thought to have been added after the main book of Deuteronomy had been completed. The detailed festival calendar similarly presupposes earlier forms of this material (Exod. 23.14–17; 24.18–23), now elaborated extensively (see Feasts and Festivals). We must assume that much of the contents of Deuteronomy rests on far older tradition, partly oral and partly written, which has not otherwise survived in biblical tradition.

The consistency of style and continuity of dominant themes suggests strongly that there was a community of scribes and legislators, often loosely described as the Deuteronomists or the Deuteronomic School, who composed the present work. This undoubtedly took place over a long period of time, perhaps as much as a century, for the book shows signs of having been elaborated, adapted, and extended until it attained its present form.

Most important from a literary perspective is the variety of patterns of addresses to the audience, which is variously referred to in the singular and the plural. In all cases, however, the reader is assumed to be an ordinary Israelite, rather than a priest, prophet, or administrator; the book is addressed to the laity, both men and women. Furthermore, it is evident that this lawbook of Deuteronomy provided the opening part of the historical narrative of Israel's fortunes as a nation, which is continued in the books of Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel, 1 and 2 Kings. This corpus has come to be known as the *Deuteronomic (or Deuteronomistic) History because it presupposes throughout the lawbook of Deuteronomy as the primary constitution of Israel, which is frequently referred to as the "law" and sometimes as "the covenant." Deuteronomy 1.1–4.43 can best be regarded as an introduction to the whole work consisting of both law and historical narrative. Only at a late stage was this lawbook detached from its subsequent history and combined with the other laws and traditions about Israel's origins, now found in Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers, in order to compose the *Pentateuch. This must have taken place after the Babylonian *exile, in order to bring together in one work all the primary instructional material about the origins, nature, and responsibilities of Israel.

Date of Composition. We read in 2 Kings 22.8–20 that a lawbook was found in the Jerusalem *Temple while the Temple was undergoing repairs in the eighteenth year of the reign of King *Josiah. The authors of this narrative and of the account of the subsequent kingdom-wide reform of worship undertaken in accordance with this lawbook (2 Kings 23) intend it to be understood as the lawbook of Deuteronomy in some form. Since 1805, when the German scholar W. M. L. de Wette briefly noted the point, scholars have recognized that the date of this reform (622 BCE) has some bearing on the date of the composition of Deuteronomy. The main part of the book was most likely composed during the previous half-century, in the reigns of *Manasseh (696–642 BCE) and Josiah (639–609 BCE). A probable time is the early years of the latter's reign, when the century-long *Assyrian domination of Judah and Israel was coming to an end. Other elements of the book were composed in the later years of Josiah, and it was undoubtedly still being supplemented after his death in 609 BCE.

This period can be viewed confidently as the time when Deuteronomy was composed, and serves to explain many of its most distinctive features. Although the book evinces an air of crisis that has not passed, it does not presuppose the catastrophes that took place in the years of Babylonian rule, when the Temple was destroyed and the Davidic dynasty removed (587/586 BCE). It regards the land of Israel, the demand for national unity ("all Israel"), the gift of *kingship, and the very "name" of God dwelling in the sanctuary as the supreme spiritual endowments of the nation. These precious institutions are threatened and may even have been neglected, but clearly they had not been lost when the major part of the book was composed. It is, when viewed comprehensively, a last appeal to Israel to regain its sense of a God-given destiny, which Mesopotamian imperialism and internal apostasy were weakening perilously.

Distinctive Feature. A distinctive feature of the book is its stress on the three great unities. First, Israel is one people, which Moses can address as such (Deut. 5.1, 6.4, etc.), and which is viewed as remaining one through all its subsequent generations. Second, it must worship one God alone, the God who reveals himself to Moses on Mount Horeb; this finds expression in the great formulation (the *Shema) "Hear, O Israel: The Lord our God is one Lord" (6.4). This should not be understood as originally implying that there is only one God (see Monotheism), though it later came to be interpreted in this fashion. Rather, it declares that the Lord (Yahweh) is a deity who is not to be worshipped alongside, or in conjunction with, any other deity. Furthermore, though there were many sanctuaries where the Lord God was worshipped, this was not to be taken as implying that he existed in different forms or manifestations, as was the case with *Baal. The third great unity is the sole place of worship where an altar is to be set up and sacrifices offered (12.5–14). This is described as "the place that the Lord your God will choose out of all your tribes as his habitation to put his name there" (12.5). This location is not further defined, but Jerusalem was obviously intended and is later identified by the historians of the Deuteronomic school (1 Kings 8.16–21; etc.).

These three great unities of people, God, and sanctuary form the visible and outward expression of the one purpose of God first revealed to the ancestors of Israel (6.3) and confirmed and realized through the covenant made through Moses on Horeb (5.1–5). The concern for centralization of worship and a kingdomwide consistency of religious observance provide keynotes for all that the book of Deuteronomy understands by "law" (tôrâ). To tolerate, let alone to encourage, the worship of other gods is capital offense (13.1–18; 17.2–7). Thus, an insistence on the purity of religious observance pervades all the Deuteronomic legislation, and appears to have given rise to the desire to control the administration of worship. Even the king, the supreme head of the people, must subject himself and his conduct wholly to the terms laid down in the Deuteronomic law (17.18–20). This concern to regulate the administration and observance of all forms of religion is extended further to cover the activity of *prophets, who fulfill a role like that of Moses (18.15). The danger of false prophets is noted (13.1–5; 18.20–22), but the true prophet's teaching conforms to that of Moses.

Alongside this stress on purity of worship, there is a surprising and far-reaching emphasis on its essential inwardness. The primary purpose of a festival even so great and deeply rooted as *Passover, with the Feast of Unleavened Bread—which Deuteronomy now for the first time firmly conjoins with it (16.1–8)—is to serve as an occasion for remembering the great acts of God toward the people's ancestors: "so that all the days of your life you may remember the day of your departure from the land of Egypt" (16.3). Worship itself, then, is valued primarily for its spiritual and psychological potential as a remembrance of the goodness of God and a demonstration of gratitude toward him. Particularly appropriate is a special concern for the oppressed and downtrodden members of the community: "Remember that you were a slave in Egypt; and diligently observe these statutes" (16.12). This deep and religiously motivated attention to the *poor is a prominent moral feature of Deuteronomy (15.7–11).

The combination of an inward psychologizing and spiritualizing of worship with a regard for the poor leads to a remarkable desacralising of *tithes, the offering of which becomes a holy opportunity for rejoicing before God and for sharing gifts with the poor and disadvantaged (14.22–29). The entire people is conceived as a single entity, whose members are regarded as being "brothers," from the king at the head (17.20) to the slave at the bottom of the social ladder (15.12–18). Likewise, the foreigner is to be accorded a certain status providing the possibility of full entry into the people (23.7–8).

The target of the religious hostility expressed in the Deuteronomic legislation is the worship of *Baal and *Asherah, more often described as the male and female deities who represent the older forms of religion practiced by the previous inhabitants of the land (7.4–5, 16, 25; 11.28; etc.). In view of the period when the Deuteronomic legislation was probably composed, it is surprising that the book never explicitly condemns the symbols and evidence of Assyrian imperial control over Judah. To what extent there had been such visible signs of Assyrian rule is not known, but the aims of the Deuteronomic reform were established when this rule was in serious decline and had largely disappeared. Deuteronomy regards the great variety of religious traditions that had survived in the land of Israel as the cause of the divine anger that led God to punish the Israelites by bringing "a nation from far away" (28.49).

In sharp contrast with this emphasis upon the inwardness of true religion and a just and caring social order is the vehement condemnation of any deviation from absolute loyalty to God. Veneration of other gods is to be ruthlessly opposed and its practitioners exterminated (7.2, 16; 13.8–10; etc.).

The most enduring expression of concern for complete loyalty of religious practice and a just social order is to be found in the *Ten Commandments (5.6–21). Since this series of injunctions, with only minor modifications, is also found in Exodus 20.2–17, scholars have been divided in their views as to whether the collection is of Deuteronomic origin or derives from a much earlier time. Clearly, the subject matter of the commandments reflects ancient and fundamental concerns in any society, but this recognition does not itself suffice to determine the actual date when this short didactic compendium of ten basic religious and moral duties was brought together. Many think that such a brief teaching form was of early date, but underwent revision and modification over a long period of time. In any case, they wholly accord with the aim of Deuteronomy to bring as much of life as possible under a sense of obligation toward God.

Authorship and Readership. The book of Deuteronomy, formulated as an address by Moses to all Israel, presupposes a literate reading public who could benefit from a book of instruction. It also recognizes, however, the need for orally teaching the law (esp. 6.7, 31.10–13) and regards the preservation of the lawbook and its placement beside the *ark in the Temple (31:24–26) as serving primarily as a "witness." Since the Levitical *priests are made the custodians of this lawbook (31.9), it is certain that they were expected to fulfill some teaching role in promulgating its contents. Clearly, *Levites would form the bridge between the custodians of the law and the laity of Israel. This suggests that some elements of the Levitical priesthood were closely linked to, and supportive of, the lawbook's authors.

The presumption of *literacy by the lawbook's originators, combined with the pronounced rhetorical style of persons skilled in public speechmaking, also points to *scribes. There are, in addition, numerous indications of expertise in legal affairs, which leads us to conclude that the Deuteronomic authors included among their number several major state officials. It is the only law collection in the Bible to include a statute defining the office of the king (17.14–20; see Kingship and Monarchy). All of this suggests strongly that the authors of Deuteronomy formed a body of religiously motivated reformers, drawn from a circle close to the centers of state administration but apparently not directly associated with the king and royal household. They are, in any case, too critical of many of the basic assumptions regarding priestly service and its ritual obligations to have been priests themselves.

It is important to recognize the warm interest in prophecy and the belief that certain prophets continued to fulfill a role in Israel comparable to that of Moses. Such interest, which becomes more marked in the history that elaborates the lawbook, suggests that some prophetic element may also have contributed to the Deuteronomic movement for reform in Israel. Yet the understanding of prophecy is highly distinctive, and too removed from its most fundamental forms, for the authors of the book to have been prophets themselves. Prophecy is viewed essentially as a means of promoting the knowledge and claims of the Deuteronomic law.

As to the first readers of the book, we must assume that these were the lay men and women of Judah who so eagerly watched the decline of Assyrian control during the years of Josiah's reign. With the king's untimely death, the setbacks caused by Egyptian attempts to fill the power vacuum in Judah, and then the firm assertion of Babylonian rule over Judah from 604 BCE, the first expectation of the reformers presumably gave way to a more considered hope. There is much to indicate that this took effect by a sharp shift of emphasis from the sought-after outward political changes to striving for a basic change of heart and a renewal of faith among Judah's citizens. All of this finds expression in the numerous expansions, modifications, and exhortations that were added over a long period to the original lawbook.

The Significance of the Book. The significance of the book in the growth of biblical tradition is considerable. More than any other book, it establishes the general tone and character of the Pentateuch, and it is likely that the Deuteronomic classification of "law" (tôrâ) gave this title to the Pentateuch more generally. In many prominent features, it was Deuteronomy's claims to represent an embodiment of Israel's religious tradition superior to that of prophet, priest, or king that established the notion of a canon of sacred legislative tradition.

In literary influence, it is demonstrable that the historical work consisting of Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel, and 1 and 2 Kings (the *Deuteronomic History) was a direct development of the lawbook of Deuteronomy and emanates from the same general circle of authors. Furthermore, the edited book of the prophecies of *Jeremiah, which now constitutes one of the major texts dealing with the final downfall of the state of Judah at Babylonian hands (604–587/586 BCE), has also been shaped by the Deuteronomic circle of reformers. Jeremiah's prophecies are presented as the final proof of the Deuteronomic interpretation of the reasons for the collapse of Israel as a nation; they serve also as the vehicle of hope and guidance for the nation's renewal and eventual restoration.

Deuteronomy's religious ideas, which more directly than any prior element in Israel's religious traditions express a coherent and comprehensive theology, are a milestone in Israel's intellectual development. It is surprising that when the restoration of a fully organized religious life took place in Judah and Jerusalem after the initial returns from Babylonian *exile, the Deuteronomic legislation was much altered and left aside. A staunchly priestly tradition, more conducive to the thinking and aims of a traditional pattern of ritual, merged with it, heavily modifying the relatively rational and spiritualized features of Deuteronomic religion. Among the Jews of the *dispersion, however, who formed an increasing element of the surviving Jewish people after 587/586 BCE, the currency and clarity of a simple lawbook able to embody so many aspects of the Jewish tradition was of inestimable importance. With Deuteronomy, the first major step had been taken to promote the existence of Judaism as a religion of a book. Formal worship in a temple came to be simply an adjunct to a more comprehensive code of religious attitudes and duties prescribed in an instructional text.

Dinah. *Jacob and *Leah's daughter, Leah's seventh child, born after her six sons (Gen. 30.21; 46.15); her name, like that of her half-brother *Dan, is derived from a root meaning "to judge." In Genesis 34, Dinah is raped by Shechem, who then falls in love and wants to marry her. Enraged at their sister's treatment, Dinah's brothers agree to intermarriage, but only if the men of *Shechem (the city) will be circumcised. While they recuperate, *Simeon and *Levi (full brothers to Dinah) kill them, and Jacob's other sons plunder the city, taking women and children as well as wealth and livestock and risking retaliation from neighboring groups.

The narrative in Genesis 34 gives a remarkable glimpse into Israelite history and customs, including the complicated relationships between the "sons of Israel" and the inhabitants of the land of *Canaan and the association of *circumcision with marriage (cf. Exod. 4.25–26).

Disciple. The term disciple (Grk. mathētēs) occurs many times in the New Testament, but only in the Gospels and Acts. It is used both of the *twelve who according to the Gospels originally followed Jesus, and also of a wide range of Jesus' followers. The Gospels speak not only of disciples of Jesus but also of *Moses (John 9.28), *John the Baptist (Mark 2.18; Luke 11.1; John 1.35), and the *Pharisees (Matt. 22.16). But above all the term refers to followers of Jesus, who are literally "learners," students of Jesus of Nazareth.

The somewhat amorphous group called disciples constitutes a vital feature of all the Gospel narratives, but the authors used the term to communicate different aspects of being a follower of Jesus. In *Mark the disciples are agents of instruction for the author, but as negative examples. They teach the audience or readers, but mostly through the things they do wrong or fail to understand. The constant questions and concerns of the disciples, particularly in the central section of Mark's gospel, provide an opportunity for the author to explain the purpose of Jesus' mission and the hidden meanings of his teaching. Discipleship in Mark involves fear, doubt, and suffering, as 8.31, 9.31, and 10.33 make explicit; nowhere is this more poignantly captured than in the character of *Simon Peter. The disciples in Mark, whomever this broad term may include, never fully understand and never quite overcome their fear and apprehensions. There is actually the hint in Mark that the disciples' fear is in some sense the beginning of wisdom.

The gospel of *Matthew on the other hand offers a rather different portrayal of the band of disciples, a term he uses with much greater frequency than the other Gospels (forty-five times without parallel in Mark or Luke). A disciple in Matthew is one who understands, teaches, and does (5.19) what Jesus taught and did. Discipleship in Matthew is not a distinctive office or role but rather describes the life of an ordinary follower of Jesus in the Matthean community. Disciples have authority to teach (5.19; 13.52; 23.8–10; 28.20), and so naturally, unlike the Marcan disciples, they understand the teachings of Jesus, himself portrayed as the authoritative teacher, as the *Sermon on the Mount illustrates. Matthew alone among the Gospel writers ascribes the authority to forgive sins to the disciples (6.15; 9.8; 16.19; 18.18). As in Mark, the figure of Peter embodies all aspects of discipleship, but in contrast to the Marcan Peter, in Matthew he understands, can teach, and is granted unusual authority (16.16–19; cf. 18.18).

The meaning and content of the term "disciple" varies in the four Gospels. Each writer uses this broad term, which tends simply to designate a follower of Jesus, in ways that support their understanding of the community of the followers of Jesus and impress on their audience the contours and complexities of the life of a contemporary disciple. Dispersion, Diaspora. Diaspora is a Greek word meaning "dispersion." The first dispersion of Israel followed the *Assyrian conquest of the northern kingdom in 722 BCE; the deportees did not, however, form a living diaspora community. It was the deportation of a part of the population of Judah by the *Babylonians in 597 and 587/586 BCE that resulted in the creation of a permanent community, which later produced the Babylonian *Talmud. The prophet *Jeremiah advised the new exiles to pray for Babylon, "for in its welfare will be your welfare" (Jer. 29.7). The prophet *Ezekiel preached to Israel from the newly formed Babylonian Diaspora.

After the Babylonian empire fell, the Persian king *Cyrus allowed the Judeans to return home. A commonwealth of exiles was created. The books of *Ezra and *Nehemiah treat only the returned exiles as legitimate Israelites. Those who had remained in the land or who lived elsewhere were disenfranchised. It was at this time that Judaism in effect began. Despite the return, a Jewish community continued in Babylon. Diaspora had become a way of life, one that would continue into the Greco-Roman period, when Jews were scattered over much of the ancient world. The first book of *Maccabees records a letter of the Roman Senate that reflects Jewish habitation in Egypt, Syria, Pergamum, Parthia, Cappadocia, and many individual Greek cities and islands (1 Macc. 15.16–24). Jews had begun to take pride in diaspora, although Judith 5.19 still reflects the pain, speaking of a repentance followed by a return from all the places of the dispersion to retake Jerusalem and other places left deserted. Here the dispersion is portrayed as something to be overcome.

In the New Testament, James 1.1 identifies its recipients as "the twelve tribes in the Dispersion." This may mean Jewish Christians of the Diaspora, but may also be symbolic; 1 *Peter, a letter clearly written to *gentiles, is similarly addressed (1 Pet. 1.1).

Dives. In the *parable of the rich man and Lazarus (Luke 16.19–31), one character is named (probably to facilitate dialogue between the rich man and Abraham), but the other is not. This has led to various attempts to supply the perceived deficiency. In relatively modern times, the rich man has traditionally been called "Dives," the Latin word for "rich" used in the *Vulgate. Names assigned in antiquity include Nineves (or Neves), Finaeus, Tantalus, and Amonofis.

Divination. See Magic and Divination.

Divorce. In the Hebrew Bible the right of divorce is presupposed. However, like many other customs associated with family life (see Marriage; Weddings), exactly how it was done and under what circumstances is obscure. It seems likely that Israel's practice with regard to divorce was broadly similar to that of its neighbors; certainly the laws on sexual offenses were very similar, so we can use other ancient Near Eastern laws to fill in the background to the biblical statements.

Although divorce was legitimate, it was evidently disapproved of. Genesis 2.24, the formula used at weddings ("I am [your] husband . . . forever"), and the elaborateness of the wedding ceremony itself all convey the hope that marriage would be for life. Malachi 2.16 probably reflects widespread popular antipathy to divorce. In practice divorce must have been quite rare, for it was not only socially reprehensible but expensive. If a man (normally only the husband could initiate divorce proceedings; see Women) wanted to divorce his wife for anything short of major sexual misconduct, he had to repay the dowry. This was the bride's wedding present from her father, usually larger even than the "marriage present" given by the groom's family. The dowry was given jointly to the bride and groom, but as long as the marriage remained intact, he had the use of it. However, on divorce he had to give the dowry in full to his wife and often make other large payments as well. This must have made divorce a rarity.

Laws explicitly dealing with divorce are rare. In two cases, perhaps cases in which the man has shown himself hotheaded, divorce is permanently prohibited (Deut. 22.19, 29). Some laws limit the right of a divorcée to remarry. The rules of Leviticus 18.6–18 covering the choice of marriage partners could affect divorcées as much as widow(er)s and the unmarried. But the most interesting law of all is Deuteronomy 24.1–4.

The purpose of this law is stated in v. 4, which prohibits a divorcée who has remarried from ever going back to her first husband should her second husband die or divorce her. Why this should be forbidden is obscure. Perhaps such a return would make the second marriage look like *adultery. Or perhaps because the first marriage made the couple as closely related as brother and sister (they had become one flesh), a second marriage would appear incestuous; similar principles underlie some rules in Leviticus 18.

This law also sheds light on the practice of divorce. It was initiated by the husband for whatever reasons he saw fit: "she finds no favor in his eyes" (Deut. 24.1; NRSV: "she does not please him"). "Some indecency" (NRSV: "something objectionable") is presumably something less than proven adultery, for which the death penalty was available. The husband had to give his wife a written statement of her divorce and put it in her hand. This protected her from an accusation of adultery should she later remarry, for the key phrase in a bill of divorce was "You are free to marry any man." Freedom to remarry is the essence of divorce, as opposed to separation.

By the first century CE this Deuteronomic law was the center of debate among the *Pharisees. Some (the Hillelites) said it warranted divorce for any reason, for example, bad cooking. Others (the Shammaites) held that it allowed divorce only for serious sexual misconduct. According to Matthew 19 and Mark 10 Jesus was asked to comment on this controversy: "Is it lawful for a man to divorce his wife?" (Mark 10.2).

Jesus' reply dismisses the Mosaic divorce law as a concession to human sinfulness (Mark 10.3–5); the ideal expressed in Genesis (2.24) is that "the two shall become one flesh" and thus "what God has joined together, let no one separate" (vv. 8–9). In other words, divorce is wrong, whatever the *Law does to regulate it. According to Mark, Jesus opposed divorce more vigorously than any of the Pharisees. This is reemphasized in Mark 10.11: "Whoever divorces his wife and marries another commits adultery against her" (cf. Luke 16.18), a revolutionary statement that puts wives on an equal basis within marriage.

Matthew's account of Jesus' teaching on divorce is geared more closely to the Jewish scene and more pointedly addresses the male chauvinism that blamed women for adultery and divorce. A man may commit adultery in the heart by looking lustfully at a woman, but by divorcing an innocent wife a man causes her to commit adultery (Matt. 5.28–32). But Matthew also includes an exception clause that apparently modifies Jesus' total rejection of divorce in Mark: "whoever divorces his wife, except for unchastity, and marries another commits adultery" (Matt. 19.9; cf. 5.32). This has generated much discussion: what constitutes "unchastity," and does divorce after it allow one to remarry? The early church (up to 500 CE) took "unchastity" to mean serious sexual sin, typically adultery, but said that this did not allow the innocent party to remarry. Many Protestants, following Erasmus (1519), have taken "unchastity" to mean adultery, but suppose that remarriage is allowed. Many modern scholars take "unchastity" to mean marriage within the forbidden degrees of Leviticus 18, or premarital unchastity. This view sees the exception clause as specifying grounds for annulling a marriage. In this case remarriage would be allowed.

All views have their difficulties. Hardest to accept is that of Erasmus, since it makes Jesus' view little different from that of the Pharisees with whom he has just disagreed. It also fails to explain the disciples' astonishment at Jesus' harsh new teaching (v. 10) and the subsequent discussion of *eunuchs, that is, single people who do not marry.

*Paul quotes a word of Jesus opposing divorce and insisting on singleness for those who do separate (1 Cor. 7.10–11; cf. Rom. 7.1–3). In the case of a marriage between a Christian and an unbeliever, Paul says the Christian may grant his or her partner a divorce, if the latter demands it (1 Cor. 7.15). But he does not say that the Christian may then remarry.

Dreams. In ancient Israel, in Judaism, in the Greek world, and in the ancient Near East generally, dreams were frequently regarded as vehicles of divine *revelation, especially the dreams experienced by priests and kings. Although there is no clear example in the Hebrew Bible of this kind of revelation being sought intentionally, dreams with divine content often occurred at sanctuaries (Gen. 28.12; 1 Sam. 3; 1 Kings 3.4–15). In the book of Job, Elihu expresses the generally held view that dreams are an authentic means of divine communication (Job 33.15–17). The dream was also a medium by which truth was conveyed to a prophet (Num. 12.6), though its value was thought to be inferior to revelation received from God at firsthand. According to Joel 2.28, the dreams of old men will form part of the universal and direct contact with God to be experienced in the last days (cf. Acts 2.17).

In most cases, the content of the divine message is conveyed to the dreamer clearly and unambiguously, but in two cycles of stories—the *Joseph stories and the *Daniel narratives, both of which include dream phenomena reported by non-Israelites—the skills of experts or professional interpreters are required. These interpretative skills are God-given (Gen. 40.8; Dan. 2.27–28) and involve an ability to construe the pattern of future events from symbolic features of the dream. In the Greek world, dreams were accorded similar respect, and subtly developed systems of interpretation were employed. Dreams and their interpretation, however, were not accepted uncritically by all. Both Jeremiah (23.32; 27.9) and Zechariah (10.2) make scathing comments on empty or false dreamers, thus implying that the "word of the Lord" that came to a prophet in his intimate communion with God was superior to communication through dreams. A dreamer whose message encourages apostasy is, in the view of the Deuteronomic law, to be put to death (Deut. 13.2–6). The fleeting and insubstantial character of the dream is occasionally remarked upon (Job 20.8; Ps. 73.20; 90.5).

In the New Testament, interest in dreams is confined almost exclusively to *Matthew's gospel, and especially its birth narratives (1.20; 2.12, 13; 2.19; 2.22). For Matthew, the dream is an illustration of divine intervention and guidance operating on Jesus' life from its outset; this emphasizes the distinctive Matthean theme that Jesus is God's chosen and anointed one. These dreams in Matthew 1 and 2 conform to the Greco-Roman dream pattern in which the contents of the dream usually are narrated as the dream takes place, whereas the standard pattern in the Hebrew Bible is to state a person "dreamed a dream" and then to give the contents only after the dreamer awakes (see Gen. 37. 5–7, 9; 40.5; Dan. 2.7). In Matthew 27.19, *Pilate's wife reports to her husband the distress she suffered in a dream on account of Jesus, but the precise content of her dream is not given. In Acts, *Paul receives instructions and encouragement in visions of the night (Acts 16.9; 18.9), but it is not certain whether these are dreams or some other form of revelatory phenomenon. DAVID HILL

Drunkenness. A state that is almost always viewed in a negative way. *Wisdom literature associates intoxication with foolish, impractical acts (Prov. 20.1; 26.9), and the impropriety that emerges as a consequence is exemplified in the well-known stories of *Noah (Gen. 9:20–27; see Ham/Canaan, Cursing of) and *Lot (Gen. 19.30–38). Kings are sometimes portrayed as being undone by their drunkenness, as is the case with Elah (1 Kings 16.9) and Ben-hadad (1 Kings 20.16).

Drunkenness, frequently in a figurative sense, is a theme that recurs in the prophetic literature of Israel. On the one hand, the leaders of Israel (including prophets, priests, and kings) are portrayed as being drunk because their acts are viewed as irresponsible (Isa. 28.1, 3; 29.9). On the other hand, those who experience the wrath of Yahweh are depicted as staggering and dazed as a drunkard. This image is applied to Israel

(Isa. 51.21; Jer. 13.13; Ezek. 23.33; Lam. 4.21), to the nations generally (Isa. 24.20; 49.26; Ezek. 39.19), and to specific nations such as *Babylon (Jer. 51.39, 57), *Nineveh (Nah. 3.11), *Egypt (Isa. 19.24), and *Moab (Jer. 48.26). Those drunk with Yahweh's judgment are sometimes pictured as having drunk from the cup or bowl of his wrath (Isa. 51.22; Jer. 25.27; Lam. 4.21; Ezek. 23.33) and sometimes as being drunk with their own blood (Isa. 49.26; cf. Ezek. 39.19). Jeremiah 23.9 represents a unique image in the prophetic literature: Jeremiah likens himself, as a prophet of Yahweh overcome with the power of Yahweh's words, to a drunken man overcome with wine; note the daring application of the same image to Yahweh himself in Psalm 78.65.

In the New Testament references to drunkenness and drunkards often occur in lists of vices (see Ethical Lists), and, as in the Hebrew Bible, drunken behavior is viewed negatively (Luke 21.34; Rom. 13.13; 1 Cor. 6.10; 1 Pet. 4.3). Those awaiting the *second coming of Christ should not be drunk (1 Thess. 5.7; Luke 12.45; Matt. 24.49). Paul admonishes the Corinthians not to be drunk at the *Lord's supper (1 Cor. 11.12). In Revelation 17.2, 6 "to be drunk" is used in a figurative sense of Babylon.

E

E. The abbreviation for the Elohist source or tradition in the *Pentateuch. The term "Elohist" is derived from 'ĕlōhîm, a Hebrew word for God. Eighteenth-century analysis of the book of Genesis distinguished two "documents," one in which God was referred to as Elohim, and another in which he was called Yahweh (see J; Names of God in the Hebrew Bible); later scholars concluded that in Genesis two different sources used the name Elohim (E and *P), and that the Elohist tradition was to be found beyond the book of Genesis (all sources use Yahweh after the first revelation to Moses; see Exod. 3.13–15 [E]; 6.2–3 [P]). The Elohist tradition is generally thought to have originated in the northern kingdom of Israel in the ninth or eighth century BCE. Its characteristics include a northern setting for most of its narratives in Genesis, divine communication with humans by means of *dreams or messengers (see Angels), and an emphasis on *prophecy. These views are widely held by scholars, though recently some have questioned various details and even the very existence of the Elohist. MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Easter. From Eostre, a Saxon goddess celebrated at the spring equinox. In Christianity Easter is the annual festival commemorating the *resurrection of Christ, observed on a day related to the *Passover full moon but calculated differently in eastern and western churches.

In the Bible the Passover (Hebr. pesah, Grk. and late Lat. pascha, hence the adjective "paschal") is part of the divine order, Israel's annual commemoration of deliverance (Exod. 12; Deut. 16; Heb. 11.28). For New Testament writers, Christ is the Christian Passover victim (1 Cor. 5.7), and the Gospel presentation has often a Passover background; see Luke 2.41 and the *synoptic passion narrative (Matt. 26.2 par.), according to which the Last Supper appears to be a Passover. In John there are three Passovers: John 2.13, which is associated with the cleansing of the *Temple; John 6, where the feeding of the five thousand has paschal and eucharistic echoes (the synoptic accounts may also have a paschal origin); John 11–13; 18.28, 39; and 19.23–37, where Jesus dies on the cross according to this Gospel's chronology at the time when the Passover lambs were being slaughtered in preparation (19.31) for the feast. Christ is thus the eternal paschal lamb; see John 19.36 (cf. Exod. 12.46) and John 1.29, 36; see Lamb of God.

Easter is therefore the Christian Passover, celebrated for some time on the night of fourteenth of the Jewish month Nisan (Passover night) on whatever day of the week that date fell. This custom continued long in Asia Minor (as in Celtic Britain), with those maintaining it being called Quartodecimans ("fourteeners"), but in Rome Easter was observed on a Sunday from a date that is difficult to determine but earlier than 154 CE, when Polycarp of Smyrna, a Quartodeciman, on a visit discussed the different observances with Anicetus, head of the Roman church.

The transfer of Easter to the first day of the week was no doubt because Sunday had become the Christian weekly day for worship. That this was owing to the Lord's resurrection on Sunday is not provable but suggested strongly by the New Testament evidence and the absence of any convincing alternative theory. The first day of the week marks the discovery of the empty tomb (Matt. 28.1 par.), while on the same evening the meal recalls the Last Supper (Luke 24.30). See also John 20.1, 19 and 26, the last being the Sunday a week later, and Acts 20.7, which again suggests the custom of a Sunday evening Eucharist. Paul calls the Eucharist the *Lord's supper (1 Cor. 11.20); the word for "Lord's" recurs in the New Testament only in Revelation 1.10 in "the Lord's day." It was probably "the Lord's" because it was the day for the Lord's supper or Eucharist, at which the Lord had been physically present before his crucifixion, and especially on the day of his resurrection and subsequent days (to which Acts 1.4 and 10.41 probably refer), and invisibly ever since, anticipating his final coming. A. R. C. LEANEY

Eastern Orthodoxy and the Bible. The Eastern Orthodox churches consider the Bible as the written memory of God's activity in history and of God's relationship to humankind. It does not reveal everything that God is or is not; in many respects, it is a mystery, and the main purpose why it was written is so that human beings may believe and have life (John 20.30). There is much diversity in its accounts, style, chronologies, descriptions, poetry. But there is also unity, a centrality in its message and in its purpose. It introduces a linear approach to history and looks forward to fulfillments and the eschaton—the end of time.

As a partial memory recorded in history by human beings, the Bible cannot be understood divorced from the historical experience and the consciousness of the communities of believers, whether ancient Israel and Judaism or Christianity. It is for this reason that the Bible is considered the book of the community, depending on the community's authority and approval of its authenticity, its inspiration, and interpretation.

It was written for practical needs and under different historical circumstances. This means that the Bible is not the totality of God's word or *revelation. God's word has been revealed "in many and various ways" (Heb. 1.1), including the order and beauty of the cosmos, human conscience and natural law, the words of philosophers, poets, and prophets of many peoples, culminating in the words of the God-made-man, the incarnate *Logos of God. Thus, the *word of God can be discerned within but also outside the Bible. Natural revelation, however, is propaedeutic and preparatory to the supernatural, more direct revelation given through God's chosen *prophets and finally through God's Son.

The first part of the Bible reveals that God exists, creates, and intervenes through signs and symbols, individuals, prophets and priests, kings and shepherds—in particular, through a people who serve as an example of God's providence and concern for humankind. From a Christian perspective, the Old Testament points toward a goal and a fulfillment. Its role was to prepare the way for the New Testament, which is viewed as the high point of God's revelation in Jesus Christ, who is the end of an era and the beginning of a new one.

Whether in the Old or the New Testament, divine revelation was recorded under the *inspiration of God's *Holy Spirit. But inspiration is understood in a dynamic way. The writers of the biblical books were not passive receivers of messages but energetic and conscious instruments recording the revealed message in their own styles, and through their own intellectual and linguistic presuppositions. For the Orthodox, inspiration (theopneustia) is an elevated state of being that makes it possible to grasp and record revelation. The Holy Spirit inspires the writers, but it is the writers who write and speak, not as mechanical, passive instruments but in full control of their senses. Thus, biblical authors may display human shortcomings, broad or limited education, and their own specific intellectual backgrounds.

For the Eastern Orthodox, then, the Bible is the inspired word of God in terms of content rather than style, grammar, history, or frame. Very few if any Orthodox theologians accept the word-by-word inspiration of scripture. It is for this reason that the Orthodox church has never had serious disputes concerning the application of the historical-critical method in its approach to exegesis and *hermeneutics.

The Canon and the Authority of the Bible. The Bible includes the Hebrew Palestinian canon of thirty-nine books; ten Deuterocanonicals or Anaginoskomena ("books that are read"; see Apocrypha, article on Jewish Apocrypha; Canon); and the New Testament of twenty-seven books.

The Greek translation of the Old Testament (*Septuagint), including the Deuterocanonical books, was the Bible used by the early Christian community, and it remains the official text of the Eastern Orthodox church. The early church as a whole did not take a definite position for or against the Deuterocanonicals. Church leaders and ecclesiastical writers of both the Greek east and Latin west were not in full agreement. Some preferred the Hebrew canon, while others accepted the longer canon that included the Deuterocanonicals. The ambivalence of ecumenical and local synods (Nicea, 325 CE; Rome, 382; Laodicea, 365; Hippo, 393) was resolved by the Trullan Synod (692). It adopted deliberations of councils that had favored the shorter list, and decisions of other synods that had advocated the longer list. Ultimately, the Deuterocanonicals were adopted as inspired books, good for reading and spiritual edification and on occasions even as sources of doctrine. The most serious justification for the adoption of the Deuterocanonicals was their frequent use in the worship and life of the early church. Books such as *Tobit, *Judith, *Wisdom of Solomon, and *Sirach (or Ecclesiasticus) are frequently used in liturgical prayers and hymns.

The official text of the Old Testament used by the Eastern Orthodox churches includes the following Deuterocanonicals: 1 *Esdras, *Tobit, *Judith, *Wisdom of Solomon, *Sirach, *Baruch; 1–3 *Maccabees; and the Letter of Jeremiah (see Jeremiah, The Letter of). Other Deuterocanonical texts such as *Susanna, The Song of the Three Children (see Azariah, The Prayer of), and *Bel and the Dragon appear as parts of the book of *Daniel. The canonicity of the Deuterocanonical books is still a disputed topic in Orthodox biblical theology.

The question whether or not the authority of the Bible stands above the authority of the church it serves is a serious theological issue. The prevailing opinion is that once the canon of the Bible has been established, its authority becomes absolute, but the church remains its continuous and watchful guardian. The Bible's inspiration, canonicity, and authenticity depend on the church's consent. The Bible is the book of the church. Revealed truth preexisted the written word, and the community in the sense of both the old and the new Israel (synagogue and church) preceded the writing of scripture.

The Orthodox Church continues in its teaching that revealed truth is incorporated in the apostolic tradition, in the decisions of the ecumenical councils, in the theological consensus of the church fathers, and in the sacramental life and worship of the church. The Holy Spirit that reveals the word of God cannot be confined to the pages of a book. Nevertheless, all facets of belief and life of the church have been saturated with the teachings of the scriptures. Doctrines, ethical teachings, and liturgical worship have scriptural foundations and are always in agreement with the scripture.

Ecclesial Authority and Biblical Authority. The distinction between revealed truth as written word and as tradition explains the reason why Eastern Orthodoxy emphasizes the importance of ecclesial authority. The church is the "pillar and bulwark of the truth" (1 Tim. 3.14); it proclaims and guards those divine truths, written and unwritten, scripture and tradition, which coexist in complete harmony with each other. The ekklēsia as a people called out by God to be God's instrument and witness existed long before the Bible's writing and codification. Whether as "the people of God" in ancient Israel or as "the new people of God" in the Christian church, it was God's people who first witnessed to God's mighty deeds in history through his prophets and finally his own Logos, who became human in order to save humanity. The Bible itself was produced within the ekklēsia for specific reasons and for the needs of its members. What was not incorporated in the book remained a fluid living testimony that found its way in the experience of the church as writings and commentaries of chuch fathers, prayers and liturgical texts, and decisions of ecumenical councils. The totality of that part of God's revelation necessary for salvation saturates the life of the church.

Notwithstanding this holistic understanding of revelation, the Bible still occupies the central position in the Orthodox church's faith and life. Doctrinal truths, ethical teachings, liturgical and prayer life all have biblical foundations. The Bible's *authority is not minimized by ecclesial authority. The church, however, remains the lawful custodian and authentic interpreter of revelation, whether it presents itself as holy scripture or sacred tradition. The indwelling Holy Spirit guides and directs the church, especially when it is assembled in a council (Matt. 18.20), an ecumenical council in particular, which is the supreme authority on matters of doctrinal truth.

The Bible in the Worship of the Church and the Life of the Individual. Revelation through God's word in prophecy, mighty deeds, and especially God's incarnate Logos, his teachings, death, and resurrection was relived by the early church assembled in worship. The human being is not only a rational animal but also a worshiping being. And worship has been of primary importance to Eastern Orthodoxy. Orthodox worship consists of the liturgy of the word and the liturgy of the mystery, the Eucharist.

The example was set by the early church. The believers devoted themselves to the teachings of the apostles, to prayers and the breaking of bread (Acts 2.42). It is not only symbolic that the book of the Gospels occupies the central place on the altar table; there is no service in the Orthodox church that does not include readings from the Psalms, prophets, and especially the Gospels and other New Testament books. Liturgical texts, hymns, and prayers are filled with biblical passages, or inspired and saturated with the spirit, images, and symbols of the Bible.

But on the same altar table we find the chalice, the tabernacle with sacred host. The liturgy of the word and the liturgy of the Eucharist are the basis of the sermons and catechetical instruction. Listening to the exposition of the written word and participating in the mystery within the community constitute the supreme religious experience for the Eastern Orthodox. The interpretation of scripture and the celebration of the eucharist are the two principal bonds between the ancient and the ongoing life and thought of the Eastern Orthodox church.

With very few exceptions, Eastern Orthodoxy has always encouraged individual Bible reading for inspiration, edification, and the strengthening of the individual's spiritual life. "May the sun on rising find you with a Bible in your hand": these words of Evagrius Ponticus (d. 399 CE) summarize the patristic and traditional stand of Eastern Orthodoxy toward individual reading. But reading the Bible assumes a state of prayer and presupposes a sense of humility. The word of God is at once easy to understand and mysterious.

The Bible is everyone's book but not for everyone's interpretation. Subjective interpretation, which may lead to misunderstanding and extreme individualism, should be subject to the objective interpretation of the church. Subjective interpretation, usually the task of the pastor or preacher, is expected to rely on the objective exegesis of the church's theology. And there is no authentic theology outside the historic experience of the church and its teachings. It is not possible for the modern believer and the church collectively to turn their back on past centuries of accumulated wisdom and historical investigation—hence the emphasis on the value of the patristic mind and the biblical ethos of the church. DEMETRIOS J. CONSTANTELOS

Ebla. Tell Mardikh is located about 55 km (34 mi) south and slightly west of Aleppo in Syria (Map 6:G3). In antiquity it was called Ebla in cuneiform inscriptions. Naram-Sin, a conquering king of Mesopotamia in the twenty-third century BCE, records that he captured and burned Ebla.

The Italian archeologist Paolo Matthiae began work at the site in 1964 because of its size, monumental city walls, and prominent acropolis; in 1974–1975 he discovered about fifteen thousand cuneiform tablets dating from around 2300 BCE. The script is Mesopotamian cuneiform, but the language is, as a rule, Eblaite, a Semitic dialect intermediate between Babylonian and Northwest Semitic (which includes *Hebrew).

Ebla was a commercial city-state and cultural center that included a school of learned scribes who trained students in the arts and sciences not only to write the administrative records for the palace and temples but, more generally, to master and transmit a rich tradition. The brief "Age of Ebla" is contemporary with the dynasty of Sargon of Akkad (to which Naram-Sin belonged) in Mesopotamia and the Old Kingdom in *Egypt (hieroglyphic names and titles of Chefren of Dynasty IV and Pepi I of Dynasty VI have been unearthed at Ebla).

From Ebla students were sent abroad to cities like *Mari; and scholars, such as a mathematician from the Mesopotamian city of Kish, were also brought to Ebla. Textbooks in various subjects (including bilingual vocabularies, religion, and geography) were used at Ebla in slightly different editions than those used in Mesopotamia.

The Ebla archives have changed our concept of the background of biblical history. It used to be thought that, before the Israelites, *Canaan (or Syria-Palestine) was relatively primitive, with a nomadic, or seminomadic, population. Canaan was thus regarded as a sort of cultural backwash of Mesopotamia and Egypt. Ebla shows that this was not so: the largest library that has come down to us from this period is from Ebla. The Ebla archives show that the culture of the land was urbanized; *nomads did exist but were not the controlling factor.

Because the Ebla archives predate *Abraham, the high level of Hebrew civilization from its outset is historically explicable: the biblical Hebrews did not go through a "primitive" period in civilization or literature. Rather, they built on the high culture that had long existed in Canaan, when Abraham migrated from Haran to the *Promised Land. CYRUS H. GORDON

Ecclesiastes, The Book of. The title of the book in Hebrew is qōhelet (also transliterated qōheleth and koheleth), a particular form of the verb "to assemble," which led to the *Septuagint translation Ekklēsiastēs, one who addresses an assembly, frequently rendered "The Preacher." The content of this short treatise, however, is less ecclesial than sapiential, displaying a skepticism and dry wit that would be incongruous in a formal religious gathering. Even the ethical theory of moderation smacks of the academic, and the editorial epilogue, by another hand (12.8–10), shows the author in the guise of a scribe-teacher, adding the definite article: haqqôhelet, or "The Assembler," suggesting that it may well be a student's nickname for a well-known character.

Written probably in the third century BCE, it belongs among the *wisdom books, being one of the *Megillot. Its unity is much disputed, ranging from twofold or fourfold authorship to a loose collection of short sections or chapters attributed to different hands. However, the recurrence of idiosyncratic phrases and sophistication of language may point to a single author. In spite of what appears to be a lack of sequence and an overlapping of ideas, there is real unity in the thought pattern. It presents a running dialectic: the "vanity of things" set over against the goodness of life. Being to some extent gnomic wisdom, an extended proverb, it restructures accepted truths about life, death, pleasure, and toil, and reevaluates them realistically, holding experience up to the light and refracting it. The seeming contradictions are a deliberate teaching tool, and the heterodox atmosphere comes from this dialectical style rather than from the ideas.

Philosophical more than religious, the work consists of a sequence of reactions to the question presented in 1.2–3: "What does one gain by all one's toil?" Beginning and ending with this theme, the book falls into two parts: a philosophical treatise on life and the absurd (chaps. 1–6), and an ethical discussion on how one should live one's life as a result (chaps. 7–12). Quite often a traditional maxim of the schools serves as a launching pad for a personal observation. The thesis of 1.2–3 is the starting point: "vanity," or universal contingency, qualifies cosmos, human environment, and all human effort. The idea refers more to the way Qoheleth experiences life than to a clear metaphysic. There follows a demonstration of this thesis by a study of cosmic circularity (1.4–11). All things are in perpetual flux, ending where they began—an order presumably fixed by God but to mortals quite arbitrary. One finds oneself swept up in a flood of time and destiny that cannot be controlled. Even the human desire for knowledge is contingent. The subsequent proof of this thesis (1.12–2.26) begins in typical sapiential style, from experience. Adopting the mantle of *Solomon and thus vested with perfect wisdom (1.1, 12, 16), the author looks for meaning where traditionally it is to be found: in pleasure, in riches, in work. All end in *death. Even wisdom itself avails nothing. Absurdity remains, and not simply in personal experience but rooted in human nature: "God has given to human beings" the innate urge to reason why, but even this is "vanity." Paradoxically, the inevitability of death focuses the mind on the "now," and so human life, with its limitations and pleasures, takes center stage. Indeed, 2.16–26 suggests that the only norm is the individual. Although time rolls around fruitlessly, again and again (3.1–9), and people can find no permanent foothold, yet they still study and inquire and dream, for God "has made everything beautiful in its time, and has put eternity into their minds, yet they cannot find out what God has done from beginning to end" (3.11). From chap. 3 on the thesis is viewed from every side, philosophical and existential (3.1–12 is answered in 3.13–15; 3.16–21 in 3.22; 4.1–5.17 in 5.18–20). The mystery of existence is seen in the pattern of the cosmos and in time, both of which impose themselves on humanity, though to some extent one can control the latter and limit its mystery by judging the propitious moment. There is further the enigma of right and wrong: good is not invariably rewarded (3.16–20; 7.15); the same end comes to all (3.19–20), and all that results from human effort is bitterness (6.2–3). Contingency is as near a rule of life as one can find.

The practical conclusion is drawn in the second half of the book (7.1–11.6) in what is effectively a moral treatise, proverbial in style. If effort and toil, if even piety and justice avail so little, the only profitable attitude to adopt is to live in the world as one finds it, to be moderate in all things (even piety), and to enjoy the good pleasure that life gives, for even this is a gift, and fulfillment may not come with success (7.15–25; 8.14–17). In these chapters many familiar themes reappear, such as human destiny, God's providence, wisdom, and folly; but now they are given a moral twist, and Ecclesiastes becomes a wisdom dialectic in the service of a humanistic ethic. The fact of death and the problematic nature of moral retribution lead to the belief that life remains the only good—as long as one recognizes its precarious nature and lives within the sane limits of prudence. The presence of God acts as a moderating influence on the harder skepticism of the contemporary scene, while a strong belief in free will and human responsibility modifies its determinism. The author does of course present an enjoyment ethic, but he is quite careful to impose restrictions on the enjoyment of life's good things, which must never exceed human limits. Abuse is never acceptable. Pleasure is a practical ideal, not an absolute. This appears to be the best solution to the vanity of things.

The final word, suitably, is found in an allegory of youth and age (11.7–12.8). Life is short, and youth in particular should enjoy it, for soon will come old age when energy fades and passions die. The editorial epilogue (12.9–14), perhaps by two hands, is an orthodox footnote, sympathetic but cautious.

Ecclesiastes represents an individual's experiential view of the world and human existence and a resultant ethic based on reason applied to that experience. Without rejecting his tradition, the author's rational, universalistic tendencies made blind allegiance to that tradition impossible. God remains the God of Judaism, but the author sees him rather as Elohim, the universal creator and sovereign who remains beyond human understanding. It is this that makes the ethic so important; in an unpredictable world one maintains human values of integrity and decency. One maintains one's humanity, and perhaps this is the only certain value.

How this book found a place in the Hebrew *canon remains a puzzle. Perhaps it is a tribute to the fact that a religious scholar, heir to a tradition, could face a world of cultural ferment and make a personal contribution by offering an intellectually valid answer to the problem of existence.

Eden, The Garden of. A garden of trees and lush vegetation planted by God and occupied by *Adam and *Eve (Gen. 2–3). The meaning of the word "Eden" in Hebrew is uncertain. Some scholars connect it with a Sumerian word meaning "wilderness" or "plain," while others have proposed a derivation from the Hebrew word for "delight" or "pleasure." Thus, Eden came to be identified as an ideal garden of delight, or *paradise.

The location of the garden of Eden that the author of Genesis had in mind is difficult to determine. Genesis 2.8 places the garden "in the east," which in general indicates *Mesopotamia. Genesis 2.10–14 appears to draw from a Near Eastern tradition of an idyllic garden from which rivers flowed. Two of the four rivers named in Genesis are known, the Tigris and the Euphrates. The other two are not known (although Gihon, meaning "gusher," is also the name of *Jerusalem's primary spring), making any precise geographical location hypothetical.

In Genesis 2–3, the garden of Eden has at its center the tree of life and the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. The garden is not simply a luxurious paradise but a place created by God in which human beings live and eat and work (Gen. 2.15). Eden functioned as a paradigm of the unbroken relationships between God and humans, and between humans and *nature, which no longer obtained after the first couple's disobedience (see Fall, The).

The image of the garden of Eden reappears in somewhat altered form in the later prophets. The expulsion from Eden functions as a metaphor for the coming judgment against the nations (Tyre: Ezek. 28.11–19; Egypt: Ezek. 31.8, 9, 16, 18), and for the coming judgment of the *day of the Lord (Joel 2.3). The garden of Eden is also an image of promise: in parallel with "the garden of the Lord," Eden appears in Isaiah 51.3 as a metaphor for the renewal of the land of Israel after the Babylonian *exile (see also Ezekiel 36.35; Revelation 22.2–3).

Edom. A kingdom that neighbored Judah on its southeastern border during the Iron Age. It encompassed the area southward from the Wadi Hesa in Jordan to the Gulf of Aqaba, and, during part of this period, included the area called Seir, southwest of the Dead Sea and south of Kadesh-barnea (see Map 1:Y7).

Very little is known about Edom. Virtually no Edomite inscriptions have been found, apart from some seals and a few ostraca. The primary literary source for the history of Edom is the Bible, but only the barest outline can be constructed from that source. Some information comes from Assyrian records, and archaeological excavations and surveys have enabled a general picture of the development of the region to be sketched.

The early development of Edom remains largely unknown. The stories in Genesis that describe family relationships between Israel's *ancestors and those of all the surrounding kingdoms are generally understood to be artificial. For Edom this is particularly clear, since the connection between *Isaac's brother *Esau and Edom is tenuous and awkward in the narratives of Genesis 25:19–34 and is almost certainly a later imposition on the stories.

Archaeological surveys indicate that the land of Edom was occupied fairly sparsely during the Late Bronze Age (ca. 1550–1200 BCE), with only a few small fortified towns and some tiny villages. The geographic name Edom appears for the first time in an Egyptian document of the thirteenth century BCE.

Numbers 20.14–21 suggests that Edom was already a monarchy at the time of the *Exodus in the thirteenth century. Recent studies, however, have cast considerable doubt about the historicity of this and related stories. Even the so-called Edomite king list in Genesis 36.31–39 has been shown to be garbled and unreliable.

*Saul is said to have fought Edom successfully (1 Sam. 14:47), but it was *David who conquered it and incorporated it into his empire, setting up garrisons throughout the land (2 Sam. 8.14). Although a certain Hadad tried to rebel against *Solomon, he does not appear to have been successful (1 Kings 11.14–22). Edom remained under Israelite control, ruled by an Israelite governor until the reign of Jehoram of Judah in the mid-ninth century (2 Kings 8.20). At that time the Edomites successfully rebelled and set up their own king.

During the reigns of Amaziah of Judah (797–769) and Uzziah (769–734) Edom again came under Judean domination. Uzziah recaptured and rebuilt Elath on the Gulf of Aqaba early in his reign. But in the reign of Ahaz Edom decisively threw off Judean control and remained independent of Judah from that time on.

In Judah's place, however, came *Assyrian domination, but as was the case also for *Ammon and *Moab, the Assyrian presence appears to have been economically and politically beneficial to Edom. Excavations at Buseira (probably the Edomite capital Bozrah), Tawilan, and Tell el-Kheleifeh (Elath), show that the late eighth through the mid-sixth centuries BCE saw the peak of Edomite prosperity and expansion. It is from these centuries that monumental architecture is known, and there are indications that Edom expanded its influence into the southern hinterlands of Judah.

Edom seems to have survived the violence of the *Babylonian campaigns under *Nebuchadrezzar, and, although Buseira, Tawilan, and other sites suffered destruction later in the sixth century, the region recovered and continued to play a role in international trade during the Persian period. With the rise of the *Nabateans, a significant proportion of the Edomites seem to have moved westward, so that, by the Hellenistic period, Idumea (the Greek form of Edom) was the name of the region directly to the south of Judah (Map 10:W-X5–6; see 1 Macc. 4.29). The most famous Idumean was *Herod the Great.

Attested Edomite names suggest that the Edomites worshiped the well-known West Semitic gods, Hadad/*Baal and El. But it appears that the primary deity of Edom was a god named Qaus/Qos. Little is known of this god, and even his basic characteristics (is he a war god or a storm god?) are debated. Some scholars have speculated that in the late second/early first millennium BCE, Yahweh may have been an important deity in Edomite religion, since a few biblical passages link Yahweh closely with Edom and Seir (Judg. 5.4; Deut. 33.2; Hab. 3.3).

Although Deuteronomy 23.8 expresses a tolerant attitude toward the Edomites, most biblical passages dealing with the kingdom display a severe hostility toward it, reflecting the almost constant conflict between Judah and Edom. Considerable bitterness is evident in the biblical texts concerning Edom's attitudes and actions after the destruction of Jerusalem in 587/586 BCE (see, e.g., Jer. 49.7–22; Obad.; Isa. 34). Edom, in fact, became a symbol of Israel's enemies in postexilic literature.

Egypt (Map 6:E–F5). The name is derived from the Greek Aiguptos, itself a rendering of the Egyptian Ḥwt-Ptaḥ, "Temple of Ptah." The Egyptian name for the country was Keme, "the Black Land"; in Hebrew it appears as Miṣrayim.

Apart from the delta region, formed by silt deposited for millennia by the *Nile, the rest of Egypt consists of a narrow river valley, bounded on its eastern and western sides by vast arid and inhospitable deserts. The delta is similarly bounded on the east by the Sinai desert and on the west by the Libyan desert. In the south, the turbulent waters of the First Cataract at Aswan form a natural boundary, as does the Mediterranean Sea in the north. In ancient times these natural geographical borders effectively isolated Egypt from the rest of the Near East, thereby favoring the uninterrupted development of the civilization distinctive to the Egyptians, generally undisturbed by foreign invasions. Blessed with a stable climate and extremely fertile lands, regularly watered by the river Nile, the Egyptians developed a rich agricultural economy, producing wheat, barley, vegetables of many kinds, various fruits, and grapes (see Num. 11.5). Very early on, Egypt became the granary of the ancient Near East, especially in times of famine (see Gen. 41.57). Although rich in fine types of stone suitable for building and carving—among them, limestone, alabaster, sandstone, and granite—Egypt was poor in metal ores workable at the time. The one exception was gold from the eastern desert, Nubia, and the northern Sudan. Egypt also was and still is poor in trees suitable for woodworking. External trade in this commodity dates back to early times.

The exact origin of the Egyptians is uncertain. They themselves claimed that their ancestors migrated northward from a region bordering on the Red Sea. Their language, essentially Hamitic, nevertheless reveals certain affinities with the Semitic family of languages. The latest form of Egyptian is Coptic, developed during the early period of Christianity in Egypt. It is still used in the liturgy of the Coptic church, though since the Arab conquest in the seventh century CE the ordinary language of the people has been Arabic.

Egypt's geography, largely a river valley some six hundred miles in length, led to the development of many local dialects of the native language. During the early pharaonic era, in order to overcome the difficulties caused by this diversity of speech, a special form of *writing was developed. Based on many hieroglyphic figures, it was a kind of Mandarin written language, strictly consonantal but capable of coping with the vocalic differences of the various dialects. The work of interpreting and more particularly writing the hieroglyphs was performed by a large body of trained scribes, who might be described as forming an early civil service that maintained the successful administration of Egypt.

Both from original sources and from a history written in Greek ca. 300 BCE by an Egyptian priest, Manetho, it appears that the unification of the two ancient kingdoms of the north and the south was effected by Menes, the founder of the first historical dynasty and the builder of the city of Memphis. In his history, Manetho lists the rulers of Egypt under thirty dynasties, but many of the kings he names have left no tangible records of their reigns. A simpler scheme of the long history is provided by these divisions: the Archaic Period, ca. 3100–2700 BCE; the Old Kingdom, ca. 2700–2500 BCE; the Middle Kingdom, ca. 2134–1786 BCE; the New Kingdom, ca. 1575–1087 BCE; the Late Period, until the beginning of the Greek or Ptolemaic Period, ca. 1087–332 BCE.

The Old Kingdom was a period of remarkable building and artistic excellence. In particular, the rulers of Dynasty IV erected the immense pyramids at Giza, reckoned by classical antiquity as one of the seven wonders of the world. The drain on the kingdom's economy in building the pyramids, intended as the secure burial places of the rulers, eventually so weakened the succeeding dynasties that at the end of Dynasty VI a period of anarchy and decline occurred.

Able monarchs, originating from Thebes, during Dynasty XI established effective control over the whole of Egypt and founded the Middle Kingdom. The most powerful rulers were those of Dynasty XII, who conquered and held Nubia. During the Middle Kingdom there was a revival of artistic excellence, especially in portraiture.

As had been the case with the Old Kingdom, toward the end of the Middle Kingdom a period of weakness in the central government allowed the entry into the delta region of a group of foreigners, known as the Hyksos or "Chieftains of Foreign Lands," probably of pastoral origin. They were powerful enough to hold northern Egypt for a considerable time; some ancient and modern scholars regard this period as the setting of the *Joseph narratives in Genesis. During the same period, people from Nubia (the northern Sudan) overran most of the region south of Aswan.

Despite these reverses, the rulers of Thebes eventually succeeded in defeating the forces in Nubia and expelling the Hyksos from the delta. With the founding of the powerful Dynasty XVIII, a period of military advance into Palestine and Syria began. Under warlike kings such as Tuthmose I and his later successor Tuthmose III, greatest of all the pharaohs, Egyptian armies advanced as far as the headwaters of the Euphrates. Conquest brought vast quantities of booty into Egypt to swell the treasury of the state god, Amun-Re. This period also witnessed the entry of many foreign artisans into the country, and with them new ideas. Toward the end of the dynasty, internal religious strife and external administrative weakness followed the accession of Amenhotep IV, better known as Akhnaton (also spelled Akhenaton and Ikhnaton). He attempted to change the long-established religion, bitterly opposing the priesthood and eventually removing his capital city from Thebes to Tell el-Amarna. Opinions about Akhnaton have varied from seeing him as the first monotheist to a pleasure-loving materialist. It is not easy to form a just assessment, for after his death his capital city was abandoned, the ancient religion restored, and every possible record of him destroyed. Some correspondence with Asiatic rulers in such cities as Byblos, *Jerusalem, and *Shechem has survived and is known as the *Amarna letters; it is an important source for our understanding of Syria-Palestine in this period. Among his successors was the youthful Tutankhamun, who reigned briefly, and whose tomb, filled with splendid treasures, was found in the Valley of the Kings by Howard Carter in 1922.

A significant restoration of Egypt's former glory was achieved during Dynasty XIX under the Kings Seti I and his son Ramesses II, both of whom advanced once more into Palestine and Syria; the *Exodus of the Hebrews from Egypt is dated to this period by many scholars. Ramesses warred inconclusively with the *Hittites in northern Syria, but his greatest achievements during a long reign were his building projects, especially at Thebes, and his massive rock-cut temples at Abu Simbel in Nubia. His successor, Merneptah, had to deal with foreign invasion in the north. On a triumphal stele from his reign occurs the first mention of the name of Israel, as a defeated people (see Israel, History of). In Dynasty XX, a far more serious invasion of northern Egypt by land and sea occurred. This was crushed by Ramesses III, not generally recognized as militarily the greatest of the kings bearing that name. Among the various people who attempted the invasion by sea were the group known in the Bible as the *Philistines.

A succession of kings bearing the name Ramesses followed, but each proved weaker than his predecessor, and Egypt declined in power. The geographical barriers that in times past ensured so many centuries of isolation no longer sufficed to prevent foreign invasion. Thus, Dynasty XXII was founded by a Libyan general, Sheshonq I. Called Shishak in the Bible, he invaded Palestine during the reign of Rehoboam, ca. 920 BCE, removing some of the vessels of the Temple (1 Kings 11.40; 14.25–26). A record of some of the places he claimed to have captured appears on one of the walls of the temple at Karnak. Dynasty XXV originated from Nubia. In the time of Taharqa (the Tirhakah of 2 Kings 19.9), the fourth ruler of the Dynasty, Egypt faced invasions by the *Assyrians. During the last of the Assyrian invasions in the time of Taharqa's successor, in 663 BCE, the great city of Thebes, No-Amon, was captured and sacked (Nah. 3.8).

For a period after the withdrawal of the Assyrians, Egypt revived under a number of able rulers only to fall eventually to the *Persians under Cambyses. In 332 BCE *Alexander the Great was welcomed by the Egyptians as their deliverer from the rule of the hated Persians. Following Alexander's death and the division of his empire among his generals, Ptolemy gained Egypt in 322 BCE, becoming the first ruler of the Ptolemaic or Greek Dynasty. The last of the Dynasty was Cleopatra, who like her lover Antony committed suicide after their defeat at the Battle of Actium (31 CE). Egypt then became part of the *Roman empire.

Under the Pharaohs, the government of Egypt was essentially theocratic, the king as a child of the gods being semidivine, and as such high priest of the land. His general title, pharaoh, meaning "the Great House," can be compared with "the Palace" or "the Sublime Porte." It is not until the time of the Pharaoh Sheshonq that the throne name of the ruler of Egypt is recorded in the Bible. Two other names of rulers recorded are So (2 Kings 17.4) and Neco (2 Kings 23.29; Jer. 46.2). The order of precedence in Egyptian society can be illustrated by the figure of a pyramid: the pharaoh at the apex, and, in descending layers, the royal family and the local princes, the priests, the scribes, the artisans, and at the base the workers of the land.

To modern minds, the religion of ancient Egypt appears to be a strange, chaotic mixture of pantheism and animal worship, frequently full of contradictory beliefs. Long isolation from the rest of the ancient Near East had tended to breed in the Egyptians a strongly conservative outlook with a deep reverence for the past, so that what might seem to be contradictory was accepted as complementary. Over the centuries, purely local deities merged into larger groupings so that the god of one locality might be regarded as the husband of the goddess of another locality. In some instances, the deity of a third locality, merged into a larger grouping, might be regarded as the child of a divine marriage, thus creating a triad. In many instances, the only clues to the former existence of local gods are their names alone. It should be noted that the many gods of Egypt were essentially deities of the Nile Valley, and that of their vast number only one, the goddess Isis, was successfully translated abroad.

The many temples, supported by great estates, were established to serve the various gods, who in their turn served humankind by preserving the physical fabric of the world. The temples were in fact state institutions and not places of individual devotion and prayer. The temples played a very practical role by training able boys, regardless of their social standing, to become scribes in the service of the state. There was a widespread belief in a resurrection and a future realm of rewards and punishments, presided over by the god Osiris, who had been slain by his evil brother Set, but who was afterward restored to life. From various writings it appears that at all times there existed a sense of personal religious morality as distinct from the state religion. J. MARTIN PLUMLEY

Elder. The designation and role of the elder (Hebr. zāqēn; Grk. presbyteros) dates to premonarchic times in Israel. In the legislation concerning the *Passover in Exodus 12.21 Moses addresses "all the elders of Israel." Similarly, in Numbers 11.16 Moses is commanded to gather together "seventy of the elders of Israel whom you know to be the elders of the people and officers over them" and bring them to the tent of meeting. As this passage and others suggest, the elder, as head of the extended family, had authority over it and also represented it in larger assemblies. These elders functioned primarily on the local level as judges, leaders in battle, and intermediaries between the people and their leaders or God. These functions continued during the monarchy, as the story of Naboth's vineyard (1 Kings 21.8–14) and other passages (e.g., Jer. 26.17; Prov. 31.23) make clear, and in the Second Temple period as well (see Ezra 6.7–8; 10.14), both in Judea (1 Macc. 12.35) and in the Diaspora (Sus. 5).

In the New Testament, the "elders of the people" figure throughout the Gospels (e.g., Mark 15.1 par.) and Acts (5.21; 22.5) as leaders of the Judean community who frequently counsel with other leadership groups and have some role in judging capital crimes. Perhaps related to such a group is the phrase "the tradition of the elders" (Mark 7.3, 5 par.) against which Jesus argues and which is associated with the *Pharisees in both the Gospels and *Josephus.

When Christianity began to institutionalize in a formal sense, it understandably drew on Jewish tradition to accomplish this task; thus the title and office of elder make their way into New Testament history and texts. Though not found in the authentic Pauline letters, there are elders mentioned in Acts in the churches at *Antioch (14.21), *Jerusalem (15.6; 21.18), and *Ephesus (20.17). The author of 2 and 3 John identifies himself as a presbyteros, as does the writer of 1 Peter (5.1). The office of elder occurs frequently in the *Pastoral Letters. 1 Timothy 5.1 uses the term in the context of one who is deserving of respect, but not necessarily as a technical term; in 5.17, however, an office is clearly meant, and an elder is defined as one who both teaches and preaches. Functions such as *laying on of hands (1 Tim 4.14), anointing the sick (James 5.14), and general governance (Tit. 1.5; 1 Pet. 5.2–3) are also mentioned. There are also repeated references to the office of elder in the apostolic fathers, but as time went on hierarchical episcopacy became the normative form of church administration (see Bishop); the English word "priest," however, is ultimately derived from the Greek word presbyteros.

The title, and to some extent the functions, of elder were revived by the sixteenth-century reformer John Calvin, and the Greek word was adopted for the name of the Presbyterian church. J. ANDREW OVERMAN

Elijah. Elijah ("Yah[weh] is my God") was a prophet in the northern kingdom of the divided monarchy during the reigns of Ahab, Ahaziah, and Jehoram (873–843 BCE). The circumstances of his birth and early life are not recorded, nor, somewhat unusually, is the name of his father. He was a native of Tishbe in Gilead, an unknown Transjordanian site.

The stories about Elijah, which once circulated separately, have been incorporated into the *Deuteronomic history as part of its extensive account of the reign of Ahab of Israel (1 Kings 16.29–22.40) and of its briefer account of the reign of his short-lived son Ahaziah (1 Kings 22.51—2 Kings 1.18). Elijah's translation to heaven and his sucession by *Elisha in 2 Kings 2.1–18 are outside the regnal frame and are part of the Elisha cycle; they take place sometime in Jehoram's reign.

The Elijah cycle records the battle in the north for the survival of authentic Yahwism. Both Ahab and his successor Ahaziah looked not only to Yahweh but also to *Baal and to his consort *Asherah for the winter rains and summer dew that fertilized the land (1 Kings 17–19), and for healing (2 Kings 1). Elijah had to contend not only with the many prophets of Baal and Asherah but with other prophets of Yahweh; 1 Kings 20 and 22 (though not mentioning Elijah) show disagreements among prophets speaking in Yahweh's name. To Elijah, Yahwism involved more than proper worship; the king was accountable to Yahweh's word delivered through prophets such as Elijah, and was bound by Mosaic laws protecting the poor (chap. 21). The royal house, influenced by the Phoenician Queen *Jezebel, looked to non-Israelite models of kingship, in which the patron gods supported the dynasty.

The section 1 Kings 17–19 is artfully arranged from short stories into a coherent demonstration of Yahweh's control of fertility and protection of his prophet. Elijah announces a drought in 17.1, then in 17.2–24 is protected from its effects and from the king. In 18.1–40 Elijah challenged Ahab and his prophets to a contest to determine which deity could end the drought. Yahweh's consumption of the bull offered to him proves that he alone is God; the rain of vv. 40–46 is therefore from Yahweh and not from Baal.

The prophetic word ending the drought, like the word that began it (17.1), puts Elijah in danger from the king. Chap. 19 tells how Yahweh protected Elijah at *Horeb, the source of authentic Yahwism. Like Moses, he encounters God. The *theophany, however, is not in the traditional storm but in "a still small voice" (19.12; NRSV: "a sound of sheer silence"), commissioning him to anoint new kings in Syria and Israel (Hazael in place of Ben-Hadad and *Jehu in place of Ahab), and a prophetic successor, Elisha. The sole divinity of Yahweh, proved in the drought-ending storm at Carmel, is asserted in a different way at Horeb; the God of Israel has authority to reject and appoint kings and to provide for a continuing prophetic word.

Chap. 21 is another confrontation of king and prophet, this time about the judicial murder of Naboth, who, in accord with the Israelite conception of land tenure, had refused to sell his family plot to Ahab. Elijah's curse upon Ahab takes effect only in the next generation, occasioning Elijah's last recorded confrontation, with Ahaziah in 2 Kings 1. The king in his illness had sent to Baal of Ekron for healing, and so he must die.

Outside the books of Kings, the Chronicler reports a letter from Elijah condemning Jeroboam (2 Chron. 21.12–15). Malachi (4.5 [Heb. 3.23], commenting on 3.1) identifies the messenger of the last days with Elijah; taken up to heaven (2 Kings 2.11), the prophet shall return to prepare the nation for the *day of the Lord in judgment. Elijah's role as precursor continues in Jewish tradition, with the development of messianic expectations; at the Passover table a place is set for Elijah in case he returns to inaugurate the messianic age. This belief is also present in the New Testament; Mark (6.15; 8.28; 9.11–13; pars.) and John (1.21, 25) speak of Elijah as the precursor of the last days. The Elijah of the book of Kings appears in Luke 4.25–27; Rom. 11.2; James 5.17; and is dramatically presented in Felix Mendelssohn's oratorio Elijah.

RICHARD J. CLIFFORD

Elisha. Elisha ("God has granted salvation"), son of Shaphat, a native of Abel-Meholah in the northern kingdom of Israel (Map 3:x4), was a prophet during the reigns of Jehoram, Jehu, Jehoahaz, and Joash (849–785 BCE). The stories about him in 2 Kings 2–9 and 13.14–21 directly continue those about his prophetic predecessor *Elijah in 1 Kings 17—2 Kings 1. The *Deuteronomic history (Deuteronomy to 2 Kings), a vast work narrating the story of Israel from Moses to Josiah and into the sixth century BCE, incorporated these stories with little editing. Most scholars assume there was once a cycle of stories about Elisha, perhaps more extensive than those preserved in 2 Kings, which was then joined to the slightly older Elijah cycle before being incorporated into the Deuteronomic history. Elisha is portrayed as a disciple of Elijah (1 Kings 19.16–21; 2 Kings 2.1–18; 3.11). Elisha, however, is quite different from the solitary Elijah with his unswerving hostility toward the house of Omri. He leads prophetic guilds, "the sons of the prophets" (NRSV: "company of prophets"; 2 Kings 2.15–18; 4.38–44; 6.1–7; 9:1), and is sometimes, though by no means always, in friendly contact with the Israelite kings.

Elisha is first mentioned in 1 Kings 19. Elijah, renewed by his visit to the source of Yahwism at Mount *Horeb, is commissioned to three momentous tasks: to anoint Hazael to be king of Syria in place of Ben-Hadad, to anoint Jehu to be king in Israel in place of Jehoram, and to anoint Elisha "as prophet in your place . . . and whoever who escapes from the sword of Jehu, Elisha shall kill" (vv. 16–17). Elijah thereupon seeks out Elisha, who is plowing, and casts his mantle, the symbol of his prophetic office, upon him; Elisha becomes his servant and eventually his successor, when Elijah's mantle definitively is given into his hands (2 Kings 2.1–18). The first two tasks given to Elijah—the anointing of Hazael in 2 Kings 8.7–15 and of Jehu in 2 Kings 9—were in fact performed by Elisha.

There are two types of Elisha stories. One type is the lengthy narratives in which the prophet, sometimes with his servant Gehazi, is involved with the great figures of the day. He advises the kings of Israel, Judah, and Edom in their war with Moab (2 Kings 3.4–27); he assists the king of Israel in the matter of Naaman the Syrian (2 Kings 5); he plays a role in wars between Syria and Israel (6.8–7.20); and he foments the rebellion of *Jehu (2 Kings 9). The other type is brief stories in which Elisha alleviates the distress of individuals: he makes a spring's water nontoxic (2 Kings 2.19–22); he punishes irreverent boys (vv. 23–25); he feeds the Shunammite widow and raises her son from the dead (2 Kings 4.8–37; 8.1–6); he detoxifies a cooking pot and multiplies loaves of bread (2 Kings 4.38–44); and he makes an ax head float (2 Kings 6.1–7). Both types of stories, especially the latter, emphasize the miraculous. Their emphasis upon the extraordinary resembles that of the Elijah stories and the *plague narratives in Exodus; biblical signs and wonders, generally, are more soberly portrayed.

Elisha is mentioned only once in the New Testament, in Luke 4.27, which cites the cure of Naaman the Syrian as an instance of God's caring for non-Israelites. The miracles of Elisha, like those of Elijah, have, however, influenced the narratives of Jesus' miracles, especially in Luke, such as the raising of the widow's son (2 Kings 4.32–37; cf. Luke 7:11–17) and the multiplication of loaves (2 Kings 4.42–44; cf. Mark 6:30–44; 8:1–10; par.). RICHARD J. CLIFFORD Elohist. See E.

Eloi, Eloi, Lema Sabachthani ("My God, my God, why have you forsaken me"). According to Mark 15.34 and Matthew 27.46, this phrase, a citation of the *Hebrew or *Aramaic text of Psalm 22.1, was uttered by Jesus from the cross after a three-hour period of darkness. The Aramaic form of the saying is more sound textually, but the Hebrew form of the address ("Eli, Eli") better explains the subsequent confusion with *Elijah. The tradition may have circulated in both a Hebrew and an Aramaic form, resulting in a corruption of the manuscripts.

This citation interprets the darkness either as a sign of God's absence from Jesus or, perhaps more likely, as a sign of God's curse upon Jesus. It is one of several allusions to Psalm 22 in the narratives of the death of Jesus (e.g., Mark 15.24 par. = Ps. 22.18; Mark 15.29 par. = Ps. 22.7).

Emperor. The English word "emperor" is derived from Latin imperator, first given by soldiers in the field to a successful general, later a permanent title of Julius Caesar (100–44 BCE) and his successors, the equivalent of "commander-in-chief." It has no exact correspondent in Greek and is not used in the New Testament. In the NRSV, "emperor" is used to translate two different terms. The most frequent is the Greek word kaisar, itself a transliteration of the Latin Caesar. This was the family name of Julius Caesar, assumed by his great-nephew Octavius (Augustus) (63 BCE–14 CE) and used as a title by subsequent Roman rulers. "Emperor" is also used for Greek basileus, "king," in 1 Peter 2.13, 17. In neither case is the NRSV's use of "emperor" entirely accurate.

Enoch and the Books of Enoch. Of Enoch, son of Jared and father of *Methuselah (not to be confused with Enoch, son of Cain, mentioned in Gen. 4.17), it is written that, after walking "with God" for 365 years, "he was no more, because God took him" (Gen. 5.22–24; cf. Sir. 44.16; 49.14). From these words has grown the Enoch legend and its literature, the books of Enoch. Traces of the legend are found in Hebrews 11.5, where Enoch has become a hero of faith. The brief reference in Genesis is further elaborated in Jewish Midrashic tradition; his wife's name was Edni, and he spent hidden years with the *angels before he was taken up to heaven. There are parallels to the latter in Greek and Near Eastern sources, and the later picture of Enoch as omniscient sage and seer probably owes more to Babylonian than to Israelite ideas.

The Ethiopic book of Enoch, or 1 Enoch, is a collection of mainly apocalyptic traditions, arranged as a pentateuch. They include the following: the Watcher Legend, the story of the fall of the angels (Gen. 6.1–4); the Parables, visions of the *son of man/elect one; Astronomica; the Dream Visions, a "zoomorphic" history; the Epistle of Enoch, the "Apocalypse of Weeks," and visions of the judgment. An appendix includes the story of the miraculous birth of *Noah.

Substantial Greek portions of the book, amounting to about one-third of the closely related Ethiopic text, have been known for many years. To them have now been added numerous fragments of an *Aramaic Enoch among the *Dead Sea Scrolls from *Qumran, attesting the existence in the second and first centuries BCE of each of the Enoch tractate collections, with the exception of the Parables. Aramaic coverage of the Ethiopic has been estimated at no more than five percent, but there are substantial pieces in all four sections. There are also fragments on "the giants," offspring of the Watchers (Gen. 6.4), the probable source of the Manichean Book of the Giants. (The view that this is the second tractate collection, ousted in the common era by the Parables, is hypothetical.) The Aramaic fragments undoubtedly represent the original Enoch, while the Greek is a primary and the Ethiopic a secondary translation, always based on a Greek text. Thus the text of 1 Enoch 1.9, quoted in Jude 14–15, is now extant in Aramaic, Greek, and Ethiopic.

The absence of the Parables in the Enoch literature found at Qumran has been used to support the theory of their Christian composition, inspired by the Gospels. This argument from silence has not been deemed conclusive; there remains the insuperable difficulty that the *son of man in the Parables is identified not with *Jesus but with Enoch, in a collection of tractates now generally dated to about the first century BCE or the first century CE.

The Slavonic Enoch, or 2 Enoch, is found only in Old Slavonic manuscripts, none earlier than the fourteenth century CE. It is extant in both a longer and a shorter, earlier recension. The tractate collection falls into three main sections. Enoch ascends thorough seven heavens, each with its own special secrets, some purely natural phenomena, others eschatological, like *paradise for the righteous in the third heaven (cf. 2 Cor. 12.2–4), and others astronomical. In the second part, Enoch is confronted by the Lord himself in the seventh heaven and is shown the secrets of creation and human history down to his own time. Finally, Enoch returns to earth to brief his posterity before ascending again to the heavenly world. An appendix lists Enoch's priestly successors, Methuselah, Nir (younger brother of Noah), and the miraculously born *Melchizedek.

The book has clearly been profoundly influenced by 1 Enoch, and it is widely accepted that it depends on a Greek Enoch, where Hebrew or Aramaic could lie behind the Greek; other explanations of "semitisms," however, are also possible. The date of the work is uncertain, with proposals ranging from the first century CE (the prevailing view), or even earlier, down to the Middle Ages.

The Hebrew Enoch, or 3 Enoch, is a heterogeneous collection of qabbalistic materials attributed to Rabbi Ishmael (second century CE). Like Enoch in 2 Enoch, Ishmael ascends to the seventh heaven, where he is admitted by the *archangel Metatron, who informs Ishmael that he, Metatron, is really Enoch, son of Jared, translated to heaven to become a vice-regent of deity, "the lesser YHWH." The rest of the book is a miscellany of the mysteries of the heavenly world. The author is familiar with 1 and 2 Enoch, but the date of composition is uncertain. Recent research suggests the fifth to sixth century CE. The main theological contribution of the book is its identification of Enoch with the qabbalistic Metatron.

MATTHEW BLACK

Ephesians, The Letter of Paul to the.

Structure and Contents. I. God's great work is completed through Jesus Christ and his Spirit (chaps. 1–2). (a) 1.3–14: God's love has been poured out as an abundant blessing; through *grace and forgiveness Jews and *gentiles now praise God's *glory (1.6, 12, 14). (b) 1.15–23: Thanksgiving and intercession for the congregation issue in praise of God's power, which has raised *Jesus Christ from death and made him the head over all things, especially over the church. (c) 2.1–10: Christ's *resurrection reveals the omnipotence of God's love; all were dead in their sins, but they are freed by grace to do works pleasing to God. (d) 2.11–22: Peace between the divided, hostile parts of humanity, and peace of all with God, was established by the *crucifixion of Jesus and his announcement of peace. The church, as yet the unfinished house of God, is evidence of God's presence among all peoples.

II. The publication and continuation of God's work (3.1–4.16). (a) 3.1–13: To Paul and other *apostles before him it was revealed that Jews and gentiles are common heirs of God's fulfilled promises. The suffering of the apostle in prison, for the sake of this message, is reason for joy, not despair. (b) 3.14–21: In his prayer Paul asks the Father for Christ's presence in every heart, and for increased appreciation of the love bestowed through Christ. (c) 4.1–16: A call to unity prepares the way for an outline of the constitution of the universal church. The one and only God (Deut. 6.4) has now revealed himself as Spirit, Lord (Jesus), and Father. The exalted Lord provides the church with diverse gifts to maintain its unity. The diversity of the members of his body supports its harmony.

III. The testimony of daily life (4.17–6.22). (a) 4.17–32: The only way to affirm God's full revelation in Christ is to make a radical break with non-Christian behavior and to put on Christ. (b) 5.1–20: By experience Christians will learn to discern and do God's will, being inspired by God's Holy Spirit rather than by alcoholic spirits! (c) 5.21–6.9: The so-called Haustafeln (home rules; see Ethical Lists) deal with the three essentials of the human condition: sexuality (husband-wife relationship), historicity (generation problems), and economics (owner/slave; rich/poor; strong/weak). While Greek philosophers and other teachers used to direct their moral advice to the stronger groups only (fathers, kings, slaveholders), in Ephesians the weaker are addressed more extensively than are their stronger counterparts. They are declared worthy and capable of a voluntary co-responsibility for the common good (cf. Rom. 13.1–7; 1 Cor. 7.21–23). (d) 6.10–20: Threatened by the attacks of superhuman forces, Christians can trust God to provide them with an armor first used by himself, then given to the *Messiah. Their active life and the tribulations they suffer reveal their solidarity with Paul's mission and suffering.

Date and Authorship. According to 1.1; 3.1–13; 4.1; and 6.19–22, the letter was written while the author was in prison. A very few postscripts to ancient Greek manuscripts state that Ephesians was written in Rome; if this is true, the date of the letter would be about 61–63 CE. However, the Caesarean imprisonment of the apostle (between 58 and 60?; see Acts 23–26) and an Ephesian captivity (in the mid 50s) have also been suggested.

In 1792 the English divine Edward Evanson first questioned Pauline authorship. During the nineteenth century, German scholars gathered arguments in favor of pseudonymous origin, and today most researchers treat the letter as non-Pauline, dating it between 70 and 100 CE, mainly in the 90s. Some think that the author was Onesimus, the runaway slave mentioned in Paul's letter to *Philemon, who is then further identified with the bishop of Ephesus bearing the name Onesimus (mentioned in Ignatius's letter to the Ephesians 1.3; 2.1; 6.2). The arguments against Pauline origin include the following, which are balanced with counterarguments.

Style. Ephesians has to a large extent a liturgical and/or hymnic style; it has a tendency to be heavy, baroque, if not bombastic (e.g., 1.18–19, 21; 3.5; 4.15–16, 30). Extremely long sentences frequently contain vocabulary not found in unquestioned Pauline letters; well-known words occur with a new meaning; favorite Pauline terms and phrases are missing. On the other hand, whenever in his undisputed letters (such as in Romans 8.38, 39; 11.33–36) Paul breaks out in prayer, his diction is similarly pleonastic and/or liturgical. Since Ephesians contains numerous citations of or allusions to pre-Pauline confessional and hymnic elements (see 2.4–8, 10, 14–18; 3.5, 20–21; 4.4a, 5–6, 9, 21c-24, 25b-27), it is not astonishing that its style and vocabulary differ from Pauline prose usage.

Historical reasons are spearheaded by the observation that a mutual acquaintance between Paul and the readers is denied in 1.15; 3.23; 4.21. But Acts 18.17–20.1, 17 clearly speaks of short and lengthy periods of Pauline activity in *Ephesus. The alternatives seem inescapable: either this is a genuine Pauline letter that was addressed not to Ephesus but to an unknown city that Paul never visited, or Ephesus is the correct address, as it were, but Paul is not the author. Still, even this dilemma can be resolved if one assumes that Paul wrote to only a part of the congregation in Ephesus, namely to former gentiles (2.2, 11, 19; 4.17–19; 5.8) who had joined the church after the apostle's departure. Just as Paul warns against triumphalism over the Jews in Romans 11.17–24, so Ephesians is a call to remember that the church owes its existence to inclusion of gentiles into God's people Israel.

Other arguments against authenticity are based upon historical developments. The absence of a sharp dispute with judaizers seems to presuppose that the struggle about *justification by faith, not the *Law, belongs to the past. The dynamic Pauline preaching of justification appears to be replaced by the proclamation of apostolic and church authority, transmitted in a fixed tradition. Dualistic, deterministic, and mythical *gnostic elements are said to have invaded formerly pure doctrines of *sin, Christ, *salvation, and the church. Although it is acknowledged that the letter contains elements of antignostic reaction, it is yet considered a victim of the enemy it tried to battle: since no one wants to burden Paul with such weakness and defeat, the letter is not considered Pauline. On the other hand, since about 1960 the *Nag Hammadi documents have shown that the composition and the spread of the "gnostic myth" is to be dated no earlier than the second century CE. In consequence, Ephesians could neither have fought it nor have fallen prey to it.

Personal elements in Ephesians, together with original elaborations on doctrines less developed elsewhere, discourage the notion that Ephesians is no more than a composite of quotations from genuine Pauline letters. Paul was not bound always to speak of justification, nor to lash out against misuse of the Law. In other letters he also speaks of reconciliation and peace. A development of his teaching about the church's relation to Israel cannot be excluded on historical grounds: it is certainly a long way from sharp reference to God's wrath upon the Jews in 1 Thessalonians 2.14–16, to the statement that the legalistic part of Israel was driven out (Gal. 4.30), to the proclamation of God's faithfulness to his promises, which even finally may lead to the regrafting of cut-off branches (Rom. 9–11), and finally to the irenic stance taken in Ephesians 1–3, where the gentiles are described as adopted into God's eternally beloved people, Israel. At the same time, it cannot be proven that Paul was unable to learn, to develop, even to correct himself. Paul changed his teachings about the presence of salvation, the nature of the church (universal rather than local), marriage, and other issues. A plagiarist would hardly have dared to be so independent of earlier Pauline letters.

Literary dependence of Ephesians upon the Pauline letters, especially *Colossians, revealed by many almost identically phrased sentences, seems to exclude the pen of a man who in his undisputed letters is a wellspring of ever-new ideas and formulations. Thus, 6.21–22 appears to be copied to a large extent from Colossians 4.7–9. In Colossians 1 and Ephesians 1 and 3, Christ, the head of the church and the world, is described in similar terminology, though in Colossians Christ's cosmic rulership is emphasized more than in Ephesians. The latter concentrates attention upon the universal church's function, and it contains several explicit biblical quotations, together with interpretive sentences or hints (see 1.18–22; 2.13–17; 4.8–10; 5.31–33; 6.14–17), while Colossians never explicitly cites the Bible. Scholars tend to favor dependence of Ephesians upon Colossians, making Colossians more likely to be authentic. A secretary or a later disciple of Paul may have written the letter. Pseudonymous authorship was often a sign of respect toward the one whose name was put at the head of a document; to speak of falsification and plagiarism misses the point.

Still, not even the undisputed letters (except *Galatians) were written without secretarial help. The similarity between Ephesians and Colossians might have a simple reason: at about the same time of his life, Paul may have used the same general outline to address the Colossians in polemical terms and to send a peaceful message to the Ephesian church, a kind of encyclical to all the churches in Asia Minor.

Theology. The distinct theology of Ephesians appears to tip the scale in favor of pseudonymity. Protestant scholars point out that in this letter ecclesiology overshadows Christology; that gnosticizing knowledge and cosmological speculation encroach upon the genuine, existential faith; that institution and tradition replace trust in grace and eschatological hope; that biblical ethics have yielded to petit-bourgeois moralism. In short, though under protest by Orthodox and many Roman Catholic scholars, Ephesians is considered, together with the *Pastoral Epistles and *Acts, to expound what is called "early Catholicism." Others have dubbed it a "Marseillaise of church triumphalism."

Indeed, if the theology of Paul has been fully grasped and described by the Augustinian, Lutheran, and existentialist understanding of justification, then salvation has to do primarily with the encounter between God and the individual. Because in Ephesians salvation is a social event with cosmic dimensions, the letter is thought to contradict the core of Paul's message and to be spurious. On the other hand, even in undisputed letters Paul not only speaks of justification but also of the reconciliation and solidarity of Jews and gentiles under God's grace. He also speaks of peace, of mission, of the final liberation of the whole cosmos, though these topics often receive only minor attention. The special theological features of Ephesians may reveal how much there is still to learn of Paul's complete message.

In conclusion, Ephesians should be considered an authentic Pauline letter. Its irenic and embracing character distinguishes it among the more bellicose letters of Paul. It deserves to be called his testament.

Highlights and Influence. At least four traits distinguish Ephesians from most other Pauline writings. First, this letter speaks of only one *mystery. This mystērion is unlike the numerous apocalyptic-historical and theological-interpretative mysteries that will be disclosed only at the end of time. Whenever the term "mystery" occurs in this letter (1.9; 3.3–4, 9; 9.19; cf. "wisdom" in 3.10), it designates a secret that has recently been disclosed, first to a few chosen people and now to be communicated to all. Its substance is the eternal will of God to save the gentiles as well as the Jews, to whom alone he had first given the hope of an *inheritance and of the *Messiah to come. Especially in 1.10 and 2.11–12, God's means to carry out his will are described: since the time of fulfillment has come, the Messiah, long ago promised to Israel, has come and has died on the cross to make peace between formerly hostile groups. The Holy Spirit continuously confirms ("seals" 1.13–14; 4.30), based upon Christ's completed work, that all sinners are forgiven and now enjoy equal rights as children in one family and as citizens of God's kingdom (2.1–19). In this letter, the "new person" is not an individual, but two former enemies (of one another and of God) now joined together in peace by the removal of what had formed a legal wall of separation (2.14–16). Even more clearly than in Romans 3.21–31 and 9–11, Ephesians reveals that the intervention of the God-sent mediator terminates segregation, hostility, and strife. Nowhere is it denied that salvation pertains also to persons and their souls. According to Ephesians, however, the liberation of individuals takes place within the framework of God's kingdom, in the victory of his love and righteousness over all injustice and misery.

Second, together with Matthew 16.17–19 and John 17.17–22, Ephesians is, within the New Testament, the magna carta of the one, holy, apostolic, and catholic church (4.4–6). The church is the palpable evidence of the work of unification accomplished by Jesus Christ (2.20–22). It is a beacon for all the world (5.8) and is the still-incomplete structure of God's house, waiting for the insertion of the capstone, that is, Christ who will come again (2.20; 4.13, 15–16).

Since the Jews have been and remain the first members of God's people, there is no unity of the church available without them. When the church is depicted as Christ's bride (5.25–27, 31–32), and when the relationship between Christ and his church is explained in terms of the union of a man and a woman (Gen. 2.24 is quoted), then love is shown to be the bond of unity. On the other hand, it is also made clear that an identification of Christ and the church is not in question. Further, Ephesians does not support the claim that certain sacraments are to be administered exclusively by ordained clergy, nor that the difference between clergy and laity constitutes the church. In this letter, God's love for Jews and gentiles, not the church, is the "mystery of God," "mystery of Christ," and "mystery of the gospel." Since the reconciliation of Jews and gentiles with one another and with God is the paradigm of the unification of all human groups (as the Haustafel in 5.21–33, compared with the text about the broken wall in 2.11–22, shows), in this letter the doctrine of the church is identified with social and personal ethics.

Third, in Ephesians, the situation of the church in the world is described in an apparently antiquated way. Above, around, and perhaps even within the church and its male and female, older and younger, free and dependent members, and in the same position over against all human beings, there are good and evil principalities and powers, and a devilish realm high up in the air (1.21; 2.2, 7; 3.10; 6.11–12; see Prince of the Power of the Air; Satan). Rather than imposing a mythological or demonic worldview upon the readers, the author of Ephesians probably means by these terms biological and psychological, social and political, cultural and religious forces that are unseen and yet encountered in human existence (cf. Rom. 8.38–39; also Colossians and Revelation). Ephesians intends to assure the tempted, suffering, and desperate among humankind that God has made his own cause not only the suffering that must be endured, but also the resistance, combat, and victory over the superhuman ruling powers.

Finally, traditional interpretations of the passage about husbands and wives (5.21–33) have required *women to be submissive toward men. Feminists disdain this part of Ephesians and call for removal of allusions to it in marriage liturgies. The biblical text, however, speaks first of mutual subordination (5.21), never of submission, and only of married persons. It controls and qualifies the husband's headship by making it clear that only an unselfish and self-giving love characterizes such a "head." Speaking to wives, the text is far from requiring a forced subordination: Ephesians encourages wives to place themselves at the disposition of the common good. In the same way, which has nothing to do with loss of honor and selfhood, Christ subordinates himself to the Father (1 Cor. 15.28; cf. Phil. 2.6–8), and the church to Christ when it acknowledges the love he has bestowed upon it (Eph. 5.24). Since already in 1 Corinthians 7 and Galatians 3.28 Paul has spoken of the interrelationship of equally free partners under the unifying lordship of Christ, his marriage counseling in Ephesians must not serve to substantiate male superiority; rather, it promotes the partnership of those married. Ephesus (Map 7:E3). Commonly acknowledged to be the first and greatest metropolis of the Roman province of *Asia, Ephesus played a historic part in the movement of Christianity from Palestine to Rome. *Acts depicts Ephesus as the zenith of *Paul's missionary activity (Acts 19.1–41; 20.17–35), and it was from Ephesus that Paul wrote the *Corinthian letters (1 Cor. 16.8). The *Pastoral letters (1 Tim. 1.3) and the book of *Revelation (Rev. 2.1–7) associate the city with *Timothy and *John, respectively. Later traditions held that *Mary, the mother of Jesus, lived and died there.

From the classical into the Byzantine period, Ephesus exercised hegemony in the Ionian region. It was well known for its philosophers, artists, poets, historians, and rhetoricians. Ephesus made distinctive contributions to intellectual and religious history from the pre-Socratic period down to the philosophical revivals of the later Roman empire. Small wonder that Paul is seen teaching "daily in the lecture hall of Tyrannus" at Ephesus for two years (Acts 19.9–10), that John reportedly wrote the Fourth Gospel at Ephesus, and that this was the site of the conversion of Justin Martyr, the first Christian philosopher.

The importance of Ephesus stemmed from its location on the western coast of Asia Minor at the nexus of river, land, and sea routes. The city's size at the time of early Christianity has been estimated at 250,000, and during the early empire it was one of the fastest-growing urban and commercial centers in the Roman east. Although the harbors at Ephesus were plagued by alluvium, they were still serviceable in the later empire and early Byzantine period.

According to *Josephus there was a significant Jewish community there, although few Jewish material remains have been discovered. The city was famous as a site for *magic and thaumaturgy. The Greek phrase Ephesia grammata (Ephesian letters) became a generic label for all types of magical words and apotropaic incantations. The city attracted Jewish exorcists (Acts 19.11–20) as well as their gentile counterparts, such as Apollonius of Tyana.

Although the Greek and Egyptian pantheons were well represented in imperial Ephesus, the religious focal point of the city was the goddess *Artemis of Ephesus. From Ephesus her worship had spread throughout the Mediterranean basin, and her Ephesian sanctuary was widely recognized as one of the seven wonders of antiquity. The site of Ephesus is exceptionally well excavated and reconstructed. Most of the excavated areas shed light on the Roman and Byzantine city rather than the Hellenistic one. Noteworthy monuments include the foundations of the Artemis temple and its altar (see Acts 19.27), the 25,000-seat theater (Acts 19.29), temples for the imperial cult, the library of Celsus, numerous baths and gymnasia, the "slope houses" dating from the early empire to the Byzantine era, and the temple of the Egyptian deities. The thousands of coins and inscriptions that have been found have illuminated many facets of the history and culture of Ephesus that was contemporary with early Christianity. Prominent Christian monuments date from the Byzantine era and include the Church of Saint John, purportedly constructed over the site of the apostle's grave, the Church of Saint Mary, traditionally claimed as the site of the Council of Ephesus in 431 CE, and the legendary Cave of the Seven Sleepers. RICHARD E. OSTER, JR.

Ephod. For the most part, ephod refers to a garment worn by the *priests. The word has been derived from the Akkadian epattu (pl. epadātu), which was an expensive garment of some kind, and connected with Syriac peṭā, a sacerdotal vestment. The *Septuagint generally renders ephod by a word meaning the shoulder strap of a tunic. In the high priest's garb, the ephod connected with the breastplate of judgment, which contained the lots of divination, the *Urim and Thummim. This association led to the ephod sometimes being spoken of as if it were the agent of divination, which it was not. (See Magic and Divination.)

A totally different usage comes in the book of Judges, where *Gideon (and later others) constructed a gold ephod as a *graven image (Judg. 8.27; 17.5; 18.14–20). PHILIP STERN

Ephraim. Ephraim first appears in the Bible as the name of the younger son of *Joseph, born to him in Egypt of his wife Asenath (Gen. 41.52; 46.20). In Genesis 48 the dying patriarch *Jacob blesses Joseph's two sons, *Manasseh and Ephraim, crossing his hands and giving the birthright to Ephraim. This continues the well-known biblical pattern of the lesser inheriting before the elder (Abel, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, etc.). In the case of Ephraim this probably reflects the eventual domination of the tribe of Manasseh by the tribe of Ephraim, both of which claimed descent from the respective sons of Joseph (see Tribes of Israel). The tribe of Ephraim came to inhabit the central hill country of Canaan north of Jerusalem, the so-called hill country of Ephraim (Judg. 7.24; 17.8; etc.; Map 3:X4), from which the tribe probably received its name. The ancient cities of Bethel, *Shechem, and Shiloh are all to be found in its territory. Its importance is highlighted by the use of the name of Ephraim as an alternate literary designation for the whole northern kingdom of *Israel by the mid-eighth century BCE. This pivotal position is underlined by the names of some of the tribe's leading personages: *Joshua, *Deborah, *Samuel, and Jeroboam I (1 Kings 11.26), the founder of the secessionist northern kingdom. A town by the name of Ephraim is mentioned in 2 Samuel 13.23 (Map 4:X5); it may be the same as the Ephraim to which Jesus went after raising Lazarus (John 11.54). CARL S. EHRLICH

Epicureans. Epicurus (341–270 BCE) formed a community of friends in *Athens, who held that philosophy had the practical aim of securing happiness. Believing that pleasure is the sum total of happiness, they conceived of pleasure not as sensual indulgence, as their opponents charged, but as a tranquility like that of the gods. Contrary to the popular view, they claimed that the gods exercised no providential oversight in human affairs. People therefore need not fear the gods, nor need they fear death, for it simply marks the end of human existence and should have no bearing on one's manner of life. The Epicureans sought security in organized communities where, in the company of friends, including women and slaves, they sought to "live unnoticed" by withdrawing from society, which they held in contempt. Opposition to the Epicureans was sharp and slanderous. Because they did not believe in the popular gods they were called atheists or, at best, believers in gods who were idle or asleep; their social attitude was regarded as misanthropic and irresponsible; and the motto "eat, drink" (because there is no life after death), became a shorthand reference to supposed Epicurean hedonism.

Epicureans were associated with Gadara, Gaza, and Caesarea, and it is not surprising that traces of Epicureanism have been detected in biblical and other Jewish writings dating from the third century BCE onward. Epicureanism was not, as some have maintained, a bridge between Greek philosophy, on the one hand, and Christianity and rabbinic Judaism, on the other; some Jews and Christians, however, were aware of the alternative options presented by Epicureans and of the polemic against them. The pessimistic view of death in *Ecclesiastes (2.14–16; 4.2–2) and the advice to eat, drink, and find enjoyment in this life (2.24–25; 3.12–13) have been thought to reflect Epicurean influence, despite the expressed conviction that it is God who makes enjoyment possible. On the other hand, *Sirach's opposition to libertinism and to the view that God does not intervene in human affairs (Sir. 5.1–7; 16.17–23) suggests that the author rejects behavior and views like those attributed to Epicureans.

The only explicit reference to Epicureans in the Bible is Acts 17.18, where Paul is described as encountering Epicureans and *Stoics in Athens. These were the two major philosophical sects of the time, and they presented radically opposed views. Paul is protrayed as more congenial to the Stoic view of divine providence, which is reflected in both his argument and the sources he quotes in the sermon that follows. Paul also uses language derived from anti-Epicurean polemic in 1 Corinthians 15.32–34, where he clarifies the hope of resurrection and opposes libertinism. The attack in 2 *Peter on teachers who reject divine providence similarly reflects such polemic, particularly in the denial that the Lord is slow (2.3) and that their destruction by God is asleep (2.3). Despite these views, Christians' emphasis on love between members of their communities, their opposition to popular religion, and their reputation for antisocial behavior caused them on occasion to be lumped together with the Epicureans.

ABRAHAM J. MALHERBE

Epilepsy. Epilepsy in its grand mal or major form was a well-known illness of the ancient world. Its frightening and bizarre nature seemed to defy anything other than a supernatural explanation, and it was frequently put down to the influence of evil spirits. The Greeks, however, referred to it as the "divine" or "sacred disease," considering its effects to derive from the activities of the gods; the Hippocratic school of medicine, on the other hand, considered that epilepsy was as much due to natural causes as any other illness. In view of the widespread occurrence of the disease, it is surprising that there are only two clear references to epilepsy in the Bible. There is a full account of the condition in the story of the epileptic boy (Mark 9.14–29 par.) and a passing reference at Matthew 4.24. In both cases the disease is represented as being due to the influence of unclean spirits. Such a view mirrored contemporary thought, and in Palestinian Judaism in particular there was a tendency to ascribe all illness to the influence of *demons, although the rabbis were also aware of the familial nature of epilepsy and placed a ban on marrying a woman from an epileptic family (Yebam. 64.2).

The description of the epileptic boy at Mark 9, supplemented by the parallels in the other *synoptic Gospels, provides such a full summary of the events of a grand mal epileptic seizure that any other diagnosis is unlikely. The account notes the immediate tonic phase of the fit with collapse and rigidity, followed by the clonic phase with its jerking convulsions, and finally a flaccid phase of deep coma before the eventual recovery of consciousness. Mark also notes the loss of weight and exhaustion characteristic of the severe form of the disease, with repeated and uncontrolled seizures. The danger to life and limb from falling into the fire or into water, which so distressed the boy's father, are well documented in such cases. In the phase of deep coma even the most painful stimuli may elicit no response from the patient and severe burns may result. Other injuries are not uncommon during an unrestrained fit.

Both Mark and Luke emphasize the demonic elements of the story, but Matthew plays down this interest and uses the verb selēniazetai, meaning "to be moonstruck" (a word occurring only here and at Matt. 4.24 in the New Testament). The verb is derived from the concept that epilepsy was under the influence of the moon, a view that persisted at least to the seventeenth century in Europe. All three versions of the story, however, preserve the tradition that Jesus ordered an unclean spirit to leave the boy in order to effect the cure.

The Markan account provides the additional information that the boy was also deaf and dumb. It is likely that this represents a conflation of two separate incidents, but if the tradition is accurate it suggests that the boy may well have suffered from some severe congenital handicap, of which epilepsy was but one sign. Although epileptiform convulsions may sometimes be a feature of hysterical (dissociative) states, together with deafness and mutism, such a diagnosis is untenable in this case in view of the classical picture presented and the presence of the self-destructive incidents that are not found in hysterical illnesses.

The only other certain reference to epilepsy is the note at Matthew 4.24, where again the verb "to be moonstruck" is used. The text links together those who were possessed, epileptics, and those suffering from paralysis. The two latter categories should probably be construed as being descriptive of the former, so that the phrase would mean "those who were demon-possessed, such as epileptics and paralyzed persons." Although there are other references to convulsive illnesses in the synoptic Gospels (e.g., Mark 1.26), these are not presented as epilepsy and are more likely to be due to functional causes rather than organic disease.

*Paul's "thorn in the flesh" (2 Cor. 12.7) has also been identified with epilepsy by some scholars. It is unlikely that this would have been idiopathic epilepsy in view of the late onset, but its clear temporal relationship to an "out of the body" experience (2 Cor. 12.2–4), possibly induced by the severe trauma of one of his many beatings or stonings (2 Cor. 11.23–25), would suggest that posttraumatic epilepsy cannot be ruled out.

There is no clear evidence of epilepsy in the Hebrew Bible, although the reference to "moon stroke" in Psalm 121.6 may possibly relate to epilepsy, particularly as it is placed in parallel to "sun stroke," another serious, at times, fatal condition. It has been suggested that *Saul and *Ezekiel may both have suffered from epilepsy, but their abnormal behavior patterns are best explained in other ways.

Epistle. See Letter-writing in Antiquity.

Esau. The older son of *Isaac and *Rebekah, and the twin brother of *Jacob (Gen. 25.24–26).

His ruddy and hairy appearance, as well as his preference for hunting and the outdoor life, distinguished him from his brother. Despite the apparent connection between his name and his hairiness in Genesis 25.25, the etymology of Esau remains uncertain. Esau also is considered the ancestor of the *Edomites (Gen. 36.9).

Genesis 25.29–34 relates how Esau foolishly sold his birthright to Jacob for the price of a meal whose name in Hebrew ('ādōm) resembles Edom, another name for Esau (Gen. 36.1). Jacob, acting on the advice of Rebekah, then tricked Isaac into making him the principal heir by disguising himself as his older brother and obtaining his father's blessing (Gen. 27). Esau eventually shunned revenge, was reconciled with Jacob, and settled in Seir (Gen. 33).

Most scholars view the stories of Jacob and Esau not only as folktales about fraternal relationships and reversals of fortune but also as Israelite depictions of the ambivalent and sometimes treacherous relationship between Edomites (sons of Esau) and Israelites (sons of Jacob) over territorial claims and other ethnopolitical issues (2 Sam. 8.12–14; 2 Kings 8.20–22; Obad.). Ethnopolitical relationships are ostensibly reflected in notices about Esau's marriages to women of various ethnic origins (Gen. 26.34; 28.9) and about his progeny (Gen. 36).

Within Christianity Esau became a central example in debates concerning the right of Christians to the blessings promised by God to the descendants of Isaac (Rom. 9.6–14) and in debates about *predestination.

Eschatology. The teaching concerning last things, such as the resurrection of the dead, the Last Judgment, the end of this world, and the creation of a new one. A fully formed eschatology with all of these features emerged only late in the development of biblical traditions.

During the period of the Israelite monarchy (tenth to sixth centuries BCE), some hoped that a descendant of *David would one day conquer all of Israel's enemies (Pss. 2; 110). They envisioned a righteous king in David's line governing a continually expanding kingdom of righteousness and peace (Isa. 9.1–7; 11.1–9; see Messiah). No Israelite king attained this messianic ideal.

The eighth-century prophet *Amos predicted the fall of the northern kingdom of *Israel, utilizing the image of the *day of the Lord. This had been understood as a time when God defeated Israel's enemies, but Amos transformed the motif into one of judgment against Israel itself (Amos 5.18–20). The Lord indeed had a day when he would defeat his enemy, but the enemy was now his own wayward people (Amos 8.2–14). The book of Amos ends with a promise of a new era of salvation after the time of judgment (Amos 9.11–15). Amos, then, is an example of prophetic eschatology; he looked for an end—not the end of the world as in later *apocalyptic literature, but the end of Israel. Beyond this end, there would be not a new world but a new period of blessing.

In 722 BCE the *Assyrians crushed the northern kingdom, and in 587/586 BCE the *Babylonians destroyed the southern kingdom of *Judah. In the subsequent exilic period new prophetic voices arose. An anonymous prophet, known as Second Isaiah (Isa. 40–55), promised a glorious return of the Jews to the land (Isa. 43.18–21; 48.20–21; 51.9–11). Ezekiel also looked to a time when the Jews would return home (Ezek. 34.11–16). A supernatural river would flow from the rebuilt *Temple eastward into the saline waters of the Dead Sea, making it a freshwater lake where healing trees would grow (Ezek. 47). Ezekiel foretold the transformation of ruined Judah into a new *Eden (Ezek 36.35) and an eschatological battle in which the nations would gather against Israel and be defeated by God (Ezek. 38–39).

Toward the end of the sixth century the Jews were released from captivity. But in the Israel to which they returned conditions were far from paradisiacal. Yet they held on to the prophetic visions. During the postexilic period the prophets *Haggai and *Zechariah encouraged the rebuilding of the Temple. They also stimulated messianic hope by putting their confidence in *Zerubbabel, a Davidic descendant, whom they apparently expected to rule with the imminent arrival of God's kingdom (Hag. 2.6–9; 2.23; Zech. 3.8; 4.6–14; 6.9–15). But the nations were not overthrown, the *kingdom of God did not materialize, and Zerubbabel was not crowned king. Messianic hope had to be deferred.

As time went on, some persecuted members of the Jewish community became pessimistic about an earthly kingdom of God and looked for salvation from above through direct intervention from God. This led to the development of apocalyptic eschatology, found in the Isaianic apocalypse (Isa. 24–27) and Third Isaiah (Isa. 56– 66). These chapters list the following end-time events: a great cataclysm (Isa. 24.1–13); a judgment accompanied by heavenly portents (Isa. 24.21–23); the Lord's arrival as king on Mount *Zion (Isa. 24.23); an eschatological banquet (Isa. 25.6); the abolition of death and sorrow (Isa. 25.8); the resurrection of the dead (Isa. 26.19); the destruction of *Leviathan, the chaos monster (Isa. 27.1); the creation of a new heaven and a new earth (Isa. 65.17; 66.22); a return to *paradise (Isa. 65.25); and eternal punishment for God's enemies (Isa. 66.15–16, 24).

The prophet Joel's vision of the day of the Lord is likewise filled with destruction. The sun, moon, and stars will cease shining (Joel 2.10; 2.31; 3.15), and there will be a great battle involving all the nations who gather against Jerusalem (Joel 3.9–11), but the Lord will come down with his warriors to judge them (Joel 3.12). On the positive side, God's spirit will be given to all (Joel 2.28–29).

The book of *Daniel was written to encourage the oppressed Jews in the second century BCE. God's kingdom would soon appear, resulting in the deliverance of the *saints and the destruction of the evil kingdoms of the world. In a vision Daniel saw "one like a son of man" coming in the clouds (Dan. 7.13). Daniel speaks of an abomination that makes desolate, a time of great tribulation, a resurrection of the dead, and a Last Judgment (Dan. 12.1–3). But once again, the kingdom of God did not arrive (Dan. 12.5–13).

Like the prophets, apocalyptists expected an end followed by a new era of God's saving activity. But the apocalyptists saw the end as complete. The judgment would be not only on Israel but on all nations. There would be not just a restoration of Israel in the land but a resurrection from the dead and the creation of a new heaven and a new earth, not just the defeat of earthly foes but destruction of the cosmic forces of evil. Many of these elements can be found in New Testament eschatology as well.

To understand Jesus, some scholars have argued for "consistent eschatology," meaning that Jesus' eschatological teaching as presented in the Gospels refers only to what will happen at the end of the world. By contrast, "realized eschatology" holds that Jesus understood the kingdom of God to have arrived with himself. Perhaps the best viewpoint is what has been called "inaugurated eschatology." Jesus brought the dawning of the kingdom of God (Matt. 12.22–28; Luke 17.20–21). Some aspects of God's reign were present in him, but other elements of the kingdom would not appear until the very end (Matt. 26.29; Mark 14.25).

Jesus is described as announcing the near arrival of the kingdom of God (Matt. 4.17). By casting out *demons, Jesus manifested his power over *Satan and showed that the kingdom had begun (Matt. 12.22–28; Luke 11.20; 17.20–21). Yet there would also be a future arrival of the kingdom in all its fullness. In the eschatological discourse found in Matthew 24–25 (par.; also called the synoptic apocalypse), the signs of the end are given: false prophets and false messiahs (24.5, 11, 23–26), wars (24.6–7), famines and earthquakes (24.8), intense persecution of Jesus' followers (24.9), apostasy (24.10), and the worldwide preaching of the gospel of the kingdom (24.14). Daniel's predictions of the abomination that makes desolate (24.15; Dan. 11.31) and the period of great tribulation (24.21; Dan. 12.1) will be fulfilled. Joel's vision of the failure of sun, moon, and stars will also come to pass (24.29; Joel 2.10, 30–31). These signs will be followed by the appearance of the *Son of man in heaven (understood as Jesus himself) coming in the clouds with great power and glory accompanied by the gathering together of his chosen ones out of all the earth (24.30–31). According to the Gospels, Jesus' eschatological teaching also included a resurrection of the dead (Luke 20.34–40; Mark 12.18–27) and a final judgment resulting in eternal life for the righteous but eternal punishment for the unrighteous (Matt. 25.31–46).

*Paul's eschatology emphasizes the resurrection. As Jesus first rose from the dead, so his followers will be raised when he comes again (1 Cor. 15.20–28; 1 Thess. 4.15–17). As a guarantee of the coming resurrection, God has given the *Holy Spirit (Rom. 8.23; Eph. 1.14; 2 Cor. 1.22; 5.5; cf. Acts 2.1–21).

The book of *Revelation is the main eschatological work of the New Testament. From Daniel it utilizes the great tribulation (Rev. 7.9–14), the coming of the Son of man (Rev. 14.14), and the resurrection and final judgment (Rev. 20.11–15). Like Joel it contains signs of the sun, moon, and stars (Rev. 8.10–12). Third Isaiah's influence can be seen in the new heaven and new earth (Rev. 21.1). The living waters (Rev. 22.1) and the return to paradise with the tree of life (Rev. 22.2) of Ezekiel are alluded to. The eschatological battle (Rev. 20.7–10) is from the books of Ezekiel and Joel. The prophetic day of the Lord becomes "the great day of God the Almighty" (Rev. 16.14). Revelation also draws on messianic tradition, identifying Jesus as the son of David, a conquering king (Rev. 5.5; 11.15; 17.14; 19.11–16).

For the writers of the New Testament, Jesus' followers are situated between the inauguration of the kingdom of God and its consummation. In the meantime they are to be busy preaching the gospel, doing good works, and purifying themselves (Matt. 24.36–25.46; 1 John 3.1–3).

Esdras, The Books of. This entry consists of two articles, on 1 Esdras and on 2 Esdras.

1 Esdras

There is no connection between 1 and 2 Esdras of the Apocrypha (see Apocrypha, article on Jewish Apocrypha) beyond the fact that Esdras (Greek form of *Ezra) is a central figure in each. 2 Esdras is most readily characterized as an "apocalypse"; 1 Esdras is a book of history, though it has sometimes been doubted that it should be called a book at all, since it may quite plausibly be regarded as a mere torso. The nature, history, and purpose of the book are among the perennial, and perhaps insoluble, problems of apocryphal literature.

In simplest terms, the book is an alternative version of the canonical book of *Ezra, to which are prefixed and subjoined brief sections of, respectively, the books of *Chronicles and *Nehemiah; it also contains one major section (3.1–5.6) not found in the Hebrew Bible at all. In manuscripts of the Greek *Septuagint this composite book (called Esdras A) stands just before the book called Esdras B, which is in fact a literal, unexpanded translation of the canonical Hebrew Ezra-Nehemiah. In effect, then, the Septuagint contains two versions of the book of Ezra, one of which (1 Esdras) diverges considerably in matters of detail from the canonical book. Eventually, 1 Esdras was dropped from the canon of the western church and is included in the standard Apocrypha only because it appears, for purely historical reasons (under the title of 3 Esdras) in an appendix to the Latin *Vulgate. It is not counted as one of the deuterocanonical books by the Roman Catholic church, but it is recognized as such by some Orthodox churches.

The contents of the book are as follows: (1) King *Josiah celebrates the *Passover in Jerusalem in a manner unseen since the early days of Israel; afterward, he is killed in a battle with the Egyptians, and is succeeded by Jehoiakim and Jehoiachin, both of whom are eventually exiled to *Babylonia; in the reign of *Zedekiah, the *Temple is destroyed and the Babylonian *exile begins (chap. 1; except for vv. 23–24, which are wholly original, this material is substantially identical with 2 Chron. 35.1–36.21). (2) *Cyrus of Persia issues a decree permitting the Jews to return to Jerusalem and rebuild the Temple (2.1–15; [= Ezra 1]). (3) Persian officials in Palestine and neighboring areas succeed in getting King Artaxerxes to block the efforts of the Jews to rebuild the city and the Temple (2.16–30 [= Ezra 4.7–24]; not in chronological sequence in either position). (4) In the reign of *Darius, three of his bodyguards debate the question of what is the greatest force in the world. The first says "wine," the second "the king," but the third, who is identified as *Zerubbabel, says "women," but then changes and argues for "truth." The king awards the prize to the third speaker, Zerubbabel, who is thereupon given permission to build both the city and the Temple of Jerusalem (3.1–5.6; this story is found nowhere else). (5) A list of returning exiles is given, after which is related how the Temple was in fact rebuilt in the reign of Darius, and how, in the time of Artaxerxes, Ezra the scribe came to Jerusalem with his copy of the *Torah and forced the dissolution of all marriages with non-Jews (5.7–9.36; this is a translation of Ezra 2.1–10.44, with some differences, and the omission of 4.7–24, which had been included earlier [see (3) above]. Ezra 4.6 is omitted entirely). (6) The Torah that Ezra had brought is publicly read (9.37–55; this is Neh. 7.73–8.12, plus a fragment of 8.13). Note that the name of Nehemiah, which occurs in Nehemiah 8.9, does not appear in the translation. Nothing else from the book of Nehemiah is included.

Three principal problems have concerned scholars in connection with 1 Esdras: (1) Its character and purpose: Is it indeed a book, that is, a purposeful collection of items from Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah, intended to support a particular viewpoint or special cause, or is it simply a mutilated remnant of a complete translation of those books, which has survived as if by accident? (2) What is the relation of this Greek text to that of the original Hebrew? How can one explain the numerous minor differences and the two major differences—the change in position of Ezra 4.7–24, and the presence in the Greek of the story of the three guardsmen, which has no parallel in the current Hebrew text? (3) What is the relation of this work to the canonical Greek 2 Esdras (i.e., the official translation of Ezra-Nehemiah, which is also contained in the Septuagint)? Obviously, though these are three separate questions, they are interrelated and cannot be discussed in isolation.

Some scholars have maintained that 1 Esdras is a unified composition intended to give a history of the Temple from the late monarchy to its restoration in the time of Darius I, or to exalt the role of Zerubbabel over against Sheshbazzar, or of Ezra rather than Nehemiah in the life of the restored community. Reasonable arguments can be advanced in support of views such as these; but the stronger argument appears to be on the side of those, like C. C. Torrey and Robert H. Pfeiffer, who believe the book has no unity in itself and is merely the much-abbreviated torso of an originally complete translation of the entire Hebrew-Aramaic text of Chronicles and Ezra-Nehemiah. According to this view, when the present Septuagint translation (Esdras B, or the 2 Esdras of the Septuagint) was made from a later Hebrew-Aramaic edition—one that included the authentic memoirs of Nehemiah (Neh. 1.1–7.5a; 12.27–13.31) but omitted the story of the three guardsmen—the now-outmoded older translation fell into disuse and would have been lost entirely, had it not been for the preservation of one mutilated copy, which survived by accident, by someone's special interest in the events surrounding the destruction and restoration of the Temple and its ritual, or—perhaps more plausibly—by someone's desire to preserve the story of the three guardsmen. Since that story is an element alien to the original text (an improbable, garrulous oriental wisdom tale in the context of a somewhat pedestrian historical narrative), and since its connection with Zerubbabel is clearly secondary, it may have been omitted in lieu of the obviously authentic memoirs of Nehemiah, which were of enormous historical value. That no great care was taken in the work of preservation is indicated by the ragged ending of 1 Esdras, which suggests something like a tear across the face of a manuscript.

As to the literary character of the two Greek translations, there can be no doubt that they are totally independent, though occasionally some slight influence (perhaps secondary) of one upon the other may be detected. 1 Esdras is a smooth, flowing, idiomatic rendering of the underlying Semitic text, whereas the Septuagint 2 Esdras (B) is woodenly literal. They come from different scribes, different circles of interest, and, almost certainly, different historical periods.

The fact that Ezra 4.7–24 appears at an early point in 1 Esdras (where it follows 2.15) may simply be a matter of different editorial tastes, since the passage is placed out of chronological order in both books. It could be that the circumstances it describes, namely, the antagonism of Persian officials in neighboring territories to the rebuilding of Jerusalem and the consequent frustration of the Jews, is meant merely to illustrate the difficulties faced by the returned exiles throughout the period of national reconstruction, irrespective of the immediate chronological sequence.

The value the book may have for the modern reader is largely confined to the story of the three guardsmen, the only item in it not duplicated elsewhere—and the reason, perhaps, for the survival of the "book" at all. The story itself presents some quite special problems. For example, is it an originally Persian tale, written in *Aramaic, adapted to its present use by the addition of 4.43–5.6 and the identification of the hero with Zerubbabel (4.13)? This seems the most likely hypothesis, but some continue to maintain that it is of Jewish origin. The surprising, and artificial, shift of the third speaker from a defense of women to "the truth" as the strongest force in the world is taken by some scholars to be part of the Persian color of the story ("truth" being paramount in Persian religion), while others insist upon its significance also in ancient Judaism (e.g., Pss. 15.2; 51.6). The story is frequently referred to in early Christian literature and its climactic words, "Great is truth, and strongest of all" (4.41; Latin "magna est veritas et praevalet"), provide one of the great texts of the Bible.

2 Esdras

2 Esdras, one of the Apocrypha, is commonly referred to as "4 Ezra" after the enumeration in many manuscripts and the Latin *Vulgate, where it has stood since 1560 in an appendix after the New Testament. "Esdras" is the Greek form of "Ezra"; Latin can use either form. The book was never a part of the Hebrew or Greek *canon. Our principal authority is the Latin text, of which there are several old manuscripts and many late ones. It was translated from a Greek text, of which a few scattered verses remain, preserved on papyrus or in patristic citations.

The core of the book (chaps. 3–14) is a Jewish *apocalypse, originally written around 100 CE in Hebrew or Aramaic. The date is indicated roughly by the historical allusions in chap. 12, and more precisely by the phrase "the thirtieth year after the destruction" of *Jerusalem (3.1); this is doubtless a veiled reference to the calamity of 70 CE, though ostensibly it refers to that of 587/586 BCE. For these chapters, there are versions in several languages based on the Greek, the most important of which are the Syriac and the Ethiopic. These ancient translations frequently supply a satisfactory sense where the Latin is defective or obscure, as reference to the NRSV footnotes will show.

The first two chapters are generally held to be a Christian addition, preserved in two Old Latin recensions. The replacement of Israel by a new people is foretold in language reminiscent both of the prophets and of the New Testament (cf. 1.30, 32 with Matt. 23.34–37, and 2.42–48 with Rev. 7.9). The last two chapters (15–16) are a further addition, with dire warnings and invective against enemies of God's people; they appear to reflect a knowledge of events in the third century CE. In the manuscripts, these pairs of chapters are often designated 2 Esdras and 5 Esdras respectively, and modern scholars have sometimes advocated these or similar labels. Except for one Greek fragment preserving the text of 15.57–59, they exist only in Latin.

The Ezra-Apocalypse (chaps. 3–14) relates revelations given to Ezra in seven visions by the angel Uriel. The general theme is the suffering and restoration of Israel in light of God's justice and *mercy, but it is widened to include the sin and destiny of all humanity and the fate of individual souls. In the first three visions, these problems are examined at length. Ezra begins each time by pouring out his troubled thoughts and prayers; one of these has been particularly admired (8.20–36), and many manuscripts of the Vulgate include it among other canticles as a separate item entitled "Confession of Ezra." The angel replies with arguments and discourses, often illustrated with parables or riddles. With Ezra pressing his questions, this is the most valuable part of the book (see below).

In the fourth vision (9.26–10.59), Ezra encounters a woman mourning for her husband and son; she represents *Zion in her desolation, and is transformed into a glorious new city. The fifth vision (chaps. 11–12) is closely modeled on Daniel 7, where the fourth beast with many horns symbolizes Hellenistic kings; the image here is of an eagle with many wings and three heads, evidently representing Roman emperors and usurpers, from Julius Caesar to Domitian. The eagle's doom is pronounced by a lion, symbol of the *Messiah, who comes to destroy the godless and to deliver the righteous remnant. In the sixth vision (chap. 13), the Messiah is depicted as a man rising from the sea (some of the language reflects Dan. 7.13), and his victory is described in some detail; standing on a huge mountain, he confronts a great concourse of enemies and destroys them, not with any weapon but with a stream of fire from his mouth.

In the final vision (chap. 14), the tone changes; Ezra becomes the inspired writer who dictates ninety-four books to five scribes. Twenty-four of them are the canonical scriptures, which (it is said) had been burned when the *Temple was destroyed (14.21; cf. 10.22); these are now restored, and published in a new script (i.e., the Aramaic square characters now used for writing Hebrew); the other seventy books are esoteric writings for "the wise" alone to read, for they contain the secrets that had been revealed to Ezra.

Ezra is portrayed as a man of great piety, who prepares for his visions by seven-day fasts (5.20; 6.35; 12.51); he is called "the prophet" and is the shepherd, as it were, on whom the people depend for leadership and support (5.18; 12.42). But the picture is a conventional one, and has little in common with the historical *Ezra of the Hebrew Bible; there is perhaps one deliberate point of contact in the story of the restoration of the scriptures, since the historical Ezra was scribe of the *law of Moses (Ezra 7.6; Neh. 8.1). "Ezra" is in fact a pen name, in accordance with the custom of apocalyptic writers, who present their insights in the form of discourses to holy men of old. Like *Enoch and *Elijah (and *Moses according to postbiblical tradition), Ezra is destined not to die but to be "taken up" (8.19; 14.9).

Points of Special Interest. 2 Esdras is an important book for students of Jewish apocalyptic; it throws light on developments parallel to Christianity, and therefore, at least indirectly, on Christian origins. A few points may be mentioned here.

(1) Human sin is traced back to *Adam (3.21–2; 4.30; 7.48 [118]; cf. Rom. 5.12; 1 Cor. 15.21–22). Ezra bewails the "evil heart" implanted in Adam, and the calamitous consequences he bequeathed, apparently inevitably. In striking contrast is the affirmation of individual responsibility found in another Jewish apocalypse, closely similar to 2 Esdras in date and character: "each of us has become our own Adam" (2 Baruch 54.19).

(2) The seventy verses that follow 7.35 in the RV (1895), RSV, NRSV, NEB, and REB give a uniquely detailed account of what happens in the seven days after death. The soul's destiny is by then irrevocably fixed, and no intercession for the dead will avail. The reader will not find this passage in the AV; one page of an archetypal Latin manuscript was deliberately cut out, presumably in an attempt to suppress this harsh doctrine. Consequently the passage is absent from later manuscripts, and remained virtually unknown until the nineteenth century, when it was rediscovered in some other old Latin manuscripts and in some ancient versions. It has a further remarkable feature of theological importance: it presents an "eschatology of the individual."

(3) In other sections, the traditional corporate *eschatology prevails: the hope that God will bring deliverance to Israel. This will be brought about by his Son, the preexistent *Messiah, "whom the Most High has been keeping for many ages" (13.26; cf. 12.32). In the eagle vision, the hope takes an almost political form. In 7.28–29, the Messiah will bring four hundred years of felicity for the righteous, after which, before the final resurrection and judgment, all will die, including the Messiah. This striking statement rules out Christian authorship. It should be noted, though, that Christians preserved the book, that there are some parallels with the language and ideas of the New Testament, and that there is one unmistakable Christian interpolation, namely at 7.28, where the Latin manuscripts read "my son Jesus."

(4) In 2 Esdras, the Messiah is son of the Most High, and is described (at 13.3) in language strongly reminiscent of Daniel 7.13—more obviously so in the versions than in the Latin. It has long been a matter of controversy whether for Daniel the "one like a son of man" is the preexistent Messiah, and whether it was so interpreted at a time earlier than Jesus and the Gospels. It is therefore important to note that this equation is made in 2 Esdras, though it and the other document that makes this equation unambiguously (the Parables of Enoch [1 Enoch 37–71]) are assigned to a date too late to settle the question whether "*Son of Man" as applied to Jesus reflects a vocabulary that was already established. Since 2 Esdras may be composite, and may in any case incorporate older writings or traditions, the problem remains.

Value for the General Reader. What is most likely to impress the general reader is the determined way in which Ezra tries to probe the problems of human sin and destiny, and of God's mercy and justice. The far-ranging discussions with the angel, especially in the first three visions, have a depth of faith, honesty, and compassion that it is hard to express in a brief summary.

Ezra presses the questions persistently. First, the suffering of Israel: True, Israel's sins deserve punishment, but surely the other nations, Israel's oppressors, have defied God's laws far more flagrantly; in comparison, Israel is almost a model of obedience. But, even if the righteous are promised a glorious age of virtue and prosperity in the future, the fact remains that the majority are not virtuous; can God's mercy reach them? Are there, indeed, any who have escaped the corruption inherited from Adam? Ezra confesses himself a sinner, and asks what hope there can be for him. Finally, if judgment is all that the vast majority of humanity can expect, what picture of God are we left with? What has become of the mercy with which he is credited in scripture? Is intercession useless? Surely, if damnation is to be the general fate, God has wasted all his work in creation, as well as all his patient efforts to build up obedience and virtue. The problems of theodicy, of justifying God's ways, have seldom been put more vividly and honestly.

In reply, the angel makes many detailed points. His first answer is perhaps the best: These things lie beyond the limit of human experience and comprehension. But his attempts to silence Ezra with puzzling riddles fail; Ezra maintains that from our human experience we know quite enough about good and evil, right and wrong, to ask for answers. The angel assures him that deliverance will come, the reign of virtue is sure, but the harvest of good requires time to grow, and we must be patient; the time, however, is now short. Those who have died will not lose their reward. The wicked deserve their punishment, and they have had ample warning. Few will be saved—enough, however, to make God's work worthwhile; after all, precious stones are rarer than base metal. Ezra himself has a balance of good works to his credit and must stop being anxious.

The angel's answers hardly match the depth of Ezra's questions. But though he does not succeed in reconciling God's justice and love, he will not abandon either of them. The most precious of the angel's words are the reminders (5.33; 8.47) that the creator loves Israel and the creation better than Ezra can. G. M. STYLER

Essenes. References to the Essenes occur in a number ancient sources: in *Josephus (War 2.8.119–61; Ant. 13.5.171–2; 15.10.371–9; 18.1.11, 18–22), *Philo (Quod omnis probus 12–13 [75–91]; Hypothetica, in Eusebius, Praeparatio evangelica 11.1–18), and Pliny the Elder (Natural History 5.15.73). What Josephus and Philo describe is a quite widespread group in Palestine living in communities in towns or villages and distinguished by their love for each other, their simplicity of life, and their strict adherence to the *Law. Pliny by contrast describes a community living in the desert by the Dead Sea. Josephus also describes their strict examination of initiates, their ritual baths and meals, their strict observance of the *Sabbath, their common ownership of property, and a number of other customs.

It is widely accepted that the Essenes referred to by these ancient authors were part of the same movement whose library and the ruins of whose buildings were discovered at Khirbet *Qumran on the Dead Sea in the late 1940s and early 1950s. The name Essenes itself is obscure and does not occur in the *Dead Sea Scrolls. It is said by Philo to refer to their holiness; another view suggests that the name reflects their reputation as healers.

The origins of the Essenes are not clear but probably lie in the group of Hasideans, who sought to renew the Law at the time of the Maccabean revolt (166–59 BCE; see 1 Macc. 2.42). It was not, however, until twenty years later, according to the Damascus Document (1.10–11), that they emerged as a separate group under the leadership of the Teacher of Righteousness. The occasion of this split within the movement was probably the usurpation of the high priesthood by the Maccabean king, Jonathan (152 BCE). The buildings at Qumran date from this time. They were occupied, possibly with a short interruption after an earthquake in 31 BCE, until their destruction in the First Jewish Revolt in 68 CE.

The Essene communities were tightly structured. Each group had a leader who controlled membership, administered the common goods and property, and ruled in matters of law (see CD 13–14; 1QS 6; the leader of the community is spoken of both as a priest and a guardian, but it is not always clear whether this refers to one or two persons). The community at Qumran had a council into which members were admitted only after long schooling in the ways of the community (1QS 6–9). Ultimate authority in the community lay with the priests (1QS 6.8). The community saw itself as administering the true understanding of the Law that had been entrusted by revelation to the Teacher of Righteousness (CD 3.13–15). Only the men of the community possessed such an understanding, and as such they, and only they, were the true men of the covenant of God and Israel. They were the "sons of light"; all others, including all other Jews, were "sons of darkness" (1QS 3.13–4.26).

Esther, The Book of.

The Hebrew Book. Deriving its title from the name of its heroine, the book of Esther presents the story of an unsuccessful attempt to kill the Jews living in the *Persian empire during the reign of a certain Ahasuerus, probably meant to be Xerxes (486–465 BCE). The threat was averted by the courage and shrewdness of Esther and her cousin Mordecai, with the aid of a series of fortuitous circumstances. Since it purports to explain the origin of the festival of Purim (see Feasts and Festivals), the book has been read aloud in the synagogue at that feast since antiquity.

Neither the date nor the location of the book's composition can be determined with any precision. While it is clearly one of the latest books in the Hebrew Bible, the absence of clear historical allusions or perspectives renders the questions uncertain; nor is there sufficient linguistic evidence to resolve them. It may be as late as the second century BCE, just before the Maccabean period, or as early as the late fifth century, from the Persian period. Doubtless, it contains traditions and information that go back to the Persian period. In part because of its lack of interest in Palestinian religious institutions and its concern with the problems of Jews in foreign lands, it is likely that the book was composed in the eastern Diaspora.

As a well-constructed story that creates interest by developing and resolving tension, the book of Esther's plot structure includes the following elements:

I. Exposition, or setting the scene (1.1–2.23)
   A. Life in the Persian palace: the king banishes Queen Vashti (1.1–22)
   B. Esther becomes queen, and her cousin Mordecai exposes a plot against the king (2.1–23)
II. The crises and their resolution: the lives of Mordecai and of all the Jews are in jeopardy but they are saved (3.1–8.14)
   A. Haman plots to kill Mordecai and all the Jews (3.1–4.17)
   B. Esther and Mordecai take actions that avert the threat (5.1–8.14)
III. The resolution and the results (8.15–10.3)
   A. The Jews celebrate the edict (8.15–17)
   B. The Jews' victory over their enemies (9.1–15)
   C. Date of the celebration (9.16–19)
   D. Mordecai's records and letter scheduling the feast of Purim (9.20–28)
   E. Esther's letter concerning the feast (9.29–32)
   F. Epilogue in praise of Mordecai (10.1–3)

Although the details of its setting are entirely plausible and the story may even have some basis in actual events, in terms of literary genre the book is not history. Nor is it legend, though the sequence of events is as unlikely as those in legends, and folkloristic traditions probably underlie the story. Missing are the conventional legendary features of the miraculous, as are characters who reveal the power of God in human affairs and thereby serve as models for future generations. Rather, because of the extended and well-developed plot and its point of view, the book is best understood as a novella, a type that arose not as oral tradition but as a written composition. The closest biblical parallels are the story of *Joseph (Gen. 37–50) and the books of *Ruth, *Jonah, and *Tobit.

The author sacrifices characterization and, to a lesser extent, description of setting in order to emphasize the plot. Three main characters (Esther, Mordecai, and Haman) and two lesser ones (King Ahasuerus and Queen Vashti) are set forth in the account; all lack depth and complexity. The author deals only in passing with the actors' motivations and feelings, drawing them in such sharp profile that they are almost caricatures. Haman is evil incarnate, while Esther and Mordecai are synonymous with beauty, wisdom, and the good. The storyteller gives us no opportunity to sympathize with Haman, nor to criticize or question Mordecai and Esther. The king is shown to be something of a buffoon, always acting on the spur of the moment, at the mercy of his emotions and whims.

Most of the action transpires in the palace, and is organized in series of scenes, with relatively clear markers indicating changes of time and location. The author takes pains to provide the reader with every reason to believe in the circumstances, giving particularly detailed descriptions of the palace and the king's frequent banquets.

By means of a relatively straightforward plot, the book of Esther tells the story of how the Jews were saved from persecution and death. It is a simple story of the triumph of good over evil, but the narrator takes some care to pace the tale, keeping the outcome in doubt as long as possible. Ironic twists appear—first, when Haman hears the king ask, "What shall be done for the man whom the king wishes to honor?" and, assuming the monarch has him in mind, he answers only to discover that the king intends to honor Mordecai (6.6–11). The final irony for Haman is that he is hanged on the gallows he had built for Mordecai (7.9–10). Moreover, the story is not without humor, and possibly satire as well, particularly in the portrayal of Ahasuerus.

As the outline above indicates, the first two chapters set the scene and mood for the events of the story itself. In chap. 1, though the main characters have not yet appeared, we learn how the king behaves capriciously, how much plotting and conflict there is in the court, and that when the king banishes Vashti he will need a new queen. Two events equally important for the outcome of the story are reported in chap. 2: after an empirewide search, the Jewish girl Esther becomes the queen; and her cousin Mordecai discovers a plot against Ahasuerus and reports it.

Two distinct but related threads run through the body of the story: the threat against Mordecai and the threat against the Jewish people as a whole. The first is set in motion when Mordecai refuses to bow down before Haman (3.1–3), thus disobeying one of the king's laws. The story does not state directly why Mordecai puts his life in danger, but it implies that he does so because he is a Jew. When Haman learns this (3.4–6), he vows to kill all the Jews. Then Haman schemes to accomplish his goal, bribing the king to proclaim the destruction of the Jews (3.7–15) on a date set by the casting of a lot (Hebr. pûr; hence the festival is called Purim [the plural form]). The first thread of the plot is brought to a climax when Ahasuerus, finding Haman in what he takes to be a compromising position with Esther, decrees Haman's death (7.1–10). It was not just Esther's appeal but a chance encounter that brought the enemy's downfall.

Still, the terrifying danger hangs over the Jews, for the king's edict has gone out and cannot be recalled. As the book stresses more than once, royal proclamations cannot be changed (1.19; 3.12–15; 8.8). Ahasuerus can and does, however, promulgate another edict, this one authorizing the Jews to defend themselves. When this document is circulated (8.11–14), the main plot has reached its resolution. What follows, including the extermination of the Jews' enemies, is the denouement of the conclusion's results.

On the surface, the book's theme is a simple one, that good triumphs over evil. The more specific form of this theme is one of the favorites of oppressed and persecuted people everywhere, that their persecutors are defeated by their own hostile plans. Moreover, the good triumph over the evil so long as they are shrewd, courageous, and fortunate. More significant, the story encourages those who see themselves threatened by hostile oppressors, and teaches those who wield authority over the weak how contemptible they are in the eyes of the powerless.

Although the story proceeds as the conflict between a Jewish minority and others bent on genocide, the book's attitudes toward foreigners and toward power are by no means unambiguous. Neither the Persians in general nor the Persian authorities are evil, but only the "enemies of the Jews" (9.1), epitomized by Haman. On the one hand, the capricious king and the immutable Persian laws are ridiculed, but on the other, Esther and Mordecai work through the channels of power to save their people. As in the book of Ruth, intermarriage between Jews and *gentiles is not only condoned but even approved.

One of the major issues in the book concerns the relation between law and justice. Mordecai disobeys the law, and on that basis he and all his people are jeopardized; Esther likewise violates the law by entering the king's presence (4.11; 5.1). But the storyteller leaves no doubt in the minds of the readers that these laws are unjust, and not simply by the standards of the Mosaic Law—which is never mentioned—but by common sense. Haman is held in contempt for his self-serving legalism; the king's laws are shown to be petty and capricious. Thus, the book criticizes a narrow legalism with neither heart and soul, nor justice.

Behind the story stand certain views of how human history moves. The book is optimistic about the future, for history moves in a beneficent direction. Moreover, the development of events is viewed as the interaction of human wills with chance or destiny (and the latter is not a hidden reference to the will of God, who is never mentioned in the book). On the one hand, the Jews, through the hero and heroine, take care of themselves; on the other hand, they are fortunate, as is seen most clearly in Haman's downfall, when his foolish attempt to plead with the queen is misinterpreted by the king (7.7–8). These two forces, destiny and human initiative, are explicitly linked in Mordecai's words to Esther, "Who knows? Perhaps you have come to royal dignity for just such a time as this?" (4.14). In the right time and place, human individuals can hold the destiny of their people in their hands.

Additions to the Book. Jerome, in preparing his Latin *Vulgate, recognized some 107 verses as additions to the book of Esther. Since the passages in question appeared in his Greek text but not in the Hebrew, he removed them from the body of the book and placed them at its end. A further step was taken during the Protestant Reformation, when the Apocrypha was created by placing in a separate part of the Bible those books found in the Greek Old Testament but not in the Hebrew. It was then that the Additions to the Book of Esther became a separate book (see Apocrypha, article on Jewish Apocrypha).

The traditional Greek text (Codex Vaticanus) of Esther contains six additions not found in the Masoretic Hebrew text. One appears at the beginning, another at the end, and the others are interspersed through the book at appropriate points in the narrative. Their versification is somewhat confusing because when Jerome moved the additions to the end, he left the last one in place as the book's conclusion, thus disrupting the chronology of the closing passages.

The six additions, with their traditional English chapters and verses, are:

A (11.2–12.6): The beginning of the Greek version, before Hebrew 1.1. The first unit (11.2–12) reports Mordecai's dream of what will transpire in the Esther story, and the second (12.1–

6) is a variation on the account of Mordecai's discovery of the plot against the king (Esther 2.19–23).

B (13.1–7): Following Hebrew 3.13, this addition contains the text of the king's decree ordering that the Jews be killed.

C (13.8–14.9): Following Hebrew 4.17, the first part (13.8–18) is Mordecai's prayer, and the second (14.1–19) is Esther's prayer.

D (15.1–16): Replacing Hebrew 5.1–2, this is an expanded report of Esther's appeal to the king.

E (16.1–24): Following Hebrew 8.12, this gives the contents of the king's second decree, allowing the Jews to defend themselves.

F (10.4–11.1): Following Hebrew 10.3, this addition tells how Mordecai recalls his dream, which has now come true, and interprets the meaning of the figures in it; 11.1 is a colophon validating the copy of the book, called here "The Letter of Purim," brought to Egypt in the time of Ptolemy and Cleopatra.

Four of the additions, A, C, D, and F, generally are considered to rest upon a Hebrew original, but B and E, the proclamations of the king, were composed in Greek. Therefore, if one considers only the textual differences between the traditional Hebrew (*Masoretic Text) and the Septuagint B (Vaticanus), there were three clear stages of composition: the short Hebrew text, the Hebrew with four additions, and the Greek with two further expansions. The process of the text's growth and composition would have been even more complicated than that, for another Septuagint text (A [Codex Alexandrinus]) appears to rest on a different Hebrew tradition.

It follows, then, that the Additions to the Book of Esther were composed at different times and by different persons. The original book would have been written perhaps as early as the late fifth century BCE but no later than the early second century BCE. The fullest form of the book, represented in the two Greek editions, probably was written not long before when it claims to have been brought to Egypt in the "fourth year of the reign of Ptolemy and Cleopatra" (11.1), probably 114 BCE. In any case, the additions show that the book of Esther did not stabilize until relatively late.

The additions make the book of Esther a dramatically different work, and indicate that some of those who transmitted it were uneasy with the original. What had been a tale of the triumph of good over evil through the skills and courage of the hero and heroine, assisted by fortuitous circumstances, becomes a religious story stressing piety and the will of God. Whereas the book of Esther does not mention God, the additions constantly refer to the deity, to prayer, and to the sacred traditions and practices of Judaism.

The important human qualities are not shrewdness or power or royal position, but piety and humility. If Esther is eloquent before the king, it is because God has answered her prayer (14.1–9). The exercise of genuine religion leads to the salvation of the people. The authors of the additions must have been offended by all the story's pomp and circumstance, for they present Esther belittling her royal position and apologizing for her royal garb.

In the additions, one finds a significantly different understanding of history. In the first place, the story is now set between Mordecai's almost apocalyptic dream and its interpretation. This framework tells the reader that God not only knows the future but reveals it to the elect. Second, it is not chance or heroic actions that saves the Jews from extermination, but divine intervention. To be sure, that intervention was not by means of a dramatic miracle, but through influencing the human heart. Ahasuerus issued his second proclamation because "God changed the spirit of the king to gentleness" (15.8).

Ethical Lists. There is a wide variety of lists in the Bible. Some deal explicitly with behavior and with dispositions toward others, and so may be designated "ethical lists." There are lists of commandments and offenses, numerical lists of moral wisdom, lists of virtues and vices, and lists of duties in the household (Haustafeln) or the community (Gemeindetafeln).

Among the lists of commandments or offenses are the *Ten Commandments (Exod. 20.2–17; Deut. 5.6–21), the twelve crimes that bring the curse of God (Deut. 27.15–26), twelve sexual offenses (Lev. 18.6–18), and perhaps the crimes punishable by death now scattered in the text (Exod. 21.12, 15–17; 22.18, 19; 31.15). These lists of apodictic laws are certainly older than the texts within which they are found, and they may have originated in a cultic ceremony like that described in Deuteronomy 27, in which the people solemnly take upon themselves *covenant responsibilities. The same kind of ceremony provides the context for a much later list in Nehemiah 10.28–39, which is based on the Deuteronomic legislation and represents the whole of the Mosaic law ("all the commandments") while it focuses on items relevant to Nehemiah's reform. Other late lists shift the focus from the community to the individual (Ezek. 18.5–18; Job 31.1–40; 1 Sam. 12.2–5; and the entrance liturgies in Pss. 15.2–5; 24.3–6; Isa. 33.14–16; Mic. 6.6–8). The lists remain representative of covenant faithfulness rather than exhaustive, focusing the *law rather than displacing it.

The wisdom teachers based their moral advice on experience, not directly on law. Their stylistic fondness for numerical lists along with their pedagogical concern for the formation of character and conduct yielded a number of ethical lists, for example, four kinds of sinners (Prov. 30.11–14), seven abominations (Prov. 6.16–19), three things delightful and three persons offensive to wisdom (Sir. 25.1–2). (The prophet *Amos uses this form in his indictment of the nations [1.3–3.2].)

In the New Testament there are many lists of virtues (2 Cor. 6.6–7; Gal. 5.22–23; Eph. 4.2–3, 32; Phil. 4.8; Col. 3.12; 1 Tim. 4.12; 6.11; 2 Tim. 2.22; 3.10; 2 Pet. 1.5–7) and vices (Mark 7.21–22 par.; Rom. 1.29–31; 13.13; 1 Cor. 5.10–11; 6.9–10; 2 Cor. 12.20–21; Gal. 5.19–21; Eph. 4.31; 5.3–5; Col. 3.5, 8; 1 Tim. 1.9–10; 2 Tim. 3.2–5; Titus 3.3; 1 Pet. 2.1; 4.3, 15; Rev. 21.8; 22.15). Lists of duties in the household and in the community also occur frequently (Eph. 5.21–6.9; Col. 3.18–4.1; 1 Tim. 2.1–15; 5.1–21; 6.1–2; Titus 2.2–10; 3.1–2; 1 Pet. 2.13–3.8; 5.1–5).

Such lists were a popular form of moral instruction in diverse schools of thought in the first century CE and were evidently a common part of the Christian moral tradition. Various origins have been proposed for them: Hellenistic Judaism (cf. the lists of vices in Wisd. of Sol. 14.25–26 and Rom. 1.29–30, and their association with *idolatry); *Stoicism and other Greek philosophies (Phil. 4.8; 2 Tim. 3.2–5); *Qumran (cf. 1QS 4.3–14 and Gal. 5.19–23); and Persian mythology (note the five-member structure of the lists in Colossians and the pairing of lists of vices and virtues). The lists of duties have usually been traced to the Stoic emphasis on role responsibilities, but recently they have been attributed to the renewal in the first century CE of the Aristotelian view that in household management and politics relations between ruler and ruled are "natural."

However the question of sources might be settled, it is clear that Christian moral tradition was not created out of nothing. But preexisting traditions are transformed: they are oriented to Christ and to the *neighbor's good rather than to nature and reason, as in Greek philosophy, or to law, as in Hellenistic Judaism, or even to a cosmic battle between two equally powerful angels, as in Persian myth.

The lists of virtues and vices are not exhaustive; they point beyond themselves to other qualities (sometimes explicitly, as in Gal. 5.21), and finally to Christ. The lists are largely random, but sometimes the selection of qualities is especially relevant to the community addressed (e.g., the problems of sexual immorality and factions in the Corinthian church influence the selection of vices in 2 Cor. 12.20–21). The Haustafeln are not timeless codes; they bring existing relationships under the critical and transforming spirit of Christ, to whom all, both ruler and ruled, are to submit.

Ethics. Biblical ethics is inalienably religious. Reflection on issues of moral conduct and character in scripture is always qualified by religious convictions and commitments. To abstract biblical ethics from its religious context is to distort it.

Biblical ethics is unyieldingly diverse. The Bible contains many books, and more traditions, each addressed in a specific cultural and social context to a particular community facing concrete questions of moral conduct and character. Biblical ethics does not provide an autonomous and timeless and coherent set of rules; it provides an account of the work and will and way of the one God, and it evokes the creative and faithful response of those who would be God's people. The one God of scripture assures the unity of biblical ethics, but there is no simple unitive understanding even of that one God or of that one God's will. To force biblical ethics into a timeless, systematic unity is to impoverish it.

The Torah. The one God of scripture stands behind the formation and continuation of a people as liberator and ruler. The story was told in countless recitals of faith: the God of Abraham heard our groaning when we were slaves, rescued us from Egypt, and made us a people with a covenant.

The *covenant of God and the people was like an ancient suzerainty treaty, acknowledging and confirming that God will be their great king and they will be God's faithful people. Like other suzerainty treaties, the covenant begins by identifying the great king and reciting his works (e.g., Exod. 20.2), continues with stipulations forbidding conflicting loyalties and assuring peace in the land (e.g., Exod. 20.3–17), and ends with provisions for periodic renewal of the covenant and assurances of faithful blessings upon faithful observance and curses upon infidelity (e.g., Exod. 23.22–33).

This story and covenant provided a framework for the gathering of stories and stipulations until the literary formation of the *Torah or *Pentateuch, the first five books of the Bible, and its acceptance as having Mosaic authority.

"Torah" is often translated "law," and much of it is legal material. Various collections can be identified (e.g., Exod. 20.22–23.19, the Book of the Covenant; Lev. 17–26, the Holiness Code; Deut. 4.44–28.68, the Deuteronomic Book of the Law) and associated with particular social contexts of Israel's history. The later collections sometimes included older material, but it is not the case that the whole Law was given once as a timeless code. Rather, the lawmakers were evidently both creative with, and faithful to, the legal traditions.

There are two forms of *law, casuistic and apodictic. The casuistic regulations are similar in form and content to other Near Eastern law codes. The apodictic prohibitions, rejecting other gods and marking out the boundaries of freedom (and so securing it), seem an innovation.

There is no simple differentiation in the Law between ceremonial and civil and moral laws. All of life is covenanted. Ceremonially, the Torah struggles against the temptations to commit infidelity in foreign cults and nurtures a communal memory and commitment to covenant. Civilly, the Torah is fundamentally theocratic, and the theocratic conviction that the rulers are ruled too, that they are subject to law, not the final creators of it, has a democratizing effect. Morally, the Torah protects the *family and its economic participation in God's gift of the land, protects persons and property (but persons more than property), requires fairness in settling disputes and economic transactions, and provides for the care and special protection of the vulnerable, such as *widows, *orphans, sojourners (see Alien), and the *poor. This last characteristic is perhaps the most remarkable (though it is not absent from other ancient codes), but it is hardly surprising, given the story that surrounds the stipulations.

The legal materials never escape the story and its covenant, and "Torah" is, ultimately, better rendered "teachings." The narrative and covenant preserve the responsiveness of obedience to the Law; gratitude then stands behind obedience as its fundamental motive. The story, moreover, forms and informs the Law and its use. The concern about the vulnerable reflects the story of one God who heard the cries of slaves (e.g., Exod. 22.21–23; Lev. 19.33–34). And the stories of *Moses as the champion of the oppressed were intended to shape the use of the Law by any who honored its Mosaic authority.

The narratives of the Torah, it needs finally to be said, were morally significant in their own right; artfully told, they nurtured dispositions more effectively than the stipulations themselves. The Yahwist (see J), for example, had told the stories of the *ancestors not only to trace the blessings of *David's empire to God but to evoke the readiness to use the power of empire to bless the subject nations (e.g., Gen. 12.1–2; 18–19; 26; 30.27–28).

The Prophets. The one God who rescued and established a people visited them in the *prophets. They came always with a particular word for a particular time, but the word they brought was always related to covenant. Their "Thus says the Lord" was the familiar language of diplomacy in the ancient Near East for the announcements of a messenger of a suzerain. The prophets were not social reformers, nor were they necessarily skilled in the craft and compromise of politics; they were messengers of the great king and announced his word of judgment.

The sum of that judgment was always the same: the people have forsaken the covenant (1 Kings 19.10, 14; Hos. 8.1; etc.). Concretely—and the message of the prophet was always concrete—some specific idolatry or injustice was condemned as infidelity to the covenant. The infidelity of *idolatry was never merely religious. The claims of *Baal involved the fertility of wombs and land as well as a theory of ownership. The prophet's announcement of God's greater power freed the people to farm a land stripped of divinity but acknowledged as God's gift, and bound them to leave the edges unharvested for the poor. The infidelity of injustice was never merely moral, for faithfulness to the covenant acts justly, and the welfare of the poor and powerless is the best index of fidelity and justice. So the prophets denounced unjust rulers, greedy merchants, corrupt judges, the complacent rich, but they saved their harshest words for those who celebrated covenant in ritual and ceremony without caring about justice, without protecting the powerless, without faithfulness (e.g., Amos 5.21–24).

On the other side of God's judgment, the prophets saw and announced God's faithfulness to God's own good future. God will reign and establish both peace and justice—not only in Israel but among all the nations, and not only among the nations but in nature itself. That future is not contingent on human striving, but it already affects human vision and dispositions and actions, readying the faithful even to suffer for the sake of God's cause in the world.

Wisdom Literature. The way and will of the one God can be known not only in the great events of liberation and covenant, not only in the great oracles of God's messengers, but also in the regularities of nature and experience. The moral counsel of the sage was not founded on the Torah or the covenant; reflection on moral character and conduct among the wise was grounded and tested, rather, in experience.

Careful attention to nature and experience allowed the wise to comprehend the basic principles operative in the world, the regularities to which it was both prudent and moral to conform. The one God is the creator who established and secures the order and stability of ordinary life. So the sage could give counsel about eating and drinking and sleeping and working, the way to handle money and anger, the way to relate to friends and enemies and women and kings and fools, when to speak and when to be still—in short, about everything that was a part of experience.

The ethics of *wisdom literature tends to be conservative, for the experience of a community over time provides a fund of wisdom, but the immediacy of experience keeps the tradition open to challenge and revision. The ethics of wisdom tends to be prudential, but a little experience is enough to teach that the righteous may suffer and that there is no neat fit between morality and prudence (*Job). The ethics of wisdom tends to delight both in the simple things of life, like the love of a man and woman (*Song of Solomon), and in the quest for wisdom itself, but experience itself teaches the hard lessons that wisdom has its limit in the inscrutable (Job 28) and that the regularities of nature and experience cannot simply be identified with the cause of a covenanted god (*Ecclesiastes).

Wisdom reflects about conduct and character quite differently than the Torah and the Prophets, but "the end of the matter," like "the beginning of knowledge" (Prov. 1.7), is a reminder of covenant: "Fear God, and keep his commandments" (Eccles. 12.13). That beginning and end keeps the wisdom literature in touch with the Torah; between that beginning and end, wisdom struggles mightily to keep Torah in touch with experience and covenant in touch with creation.

The New Testament. *Jesus of Nazareth came announcing that the *kingdom of God was at hand and already making its power felt in his words and deeds. He called the people to repent, to form their conduct and character in response to the good news of that coming future.

To welcome a future where the last will be first (Mark 10.31), a future already prefigured in Jesus' humble service, is to be ready to be "servant of all" (Mark 9.35). To delight in a kingdom where the poor will be blessed is now to be carefree about riches and to give *alms. To repent before a kingdom that belongs to children, that is already prefigured in table fellowship with sinners, and that is signaled in open conversation with women, is to turn from conventional standards to bless children, welcome sinners, and treat women as equals.

Because Jesus announced and already unveiled the coming reign of God, he spoke with authority, not simply on the basis of law and tradition. And because the coming reign of God demanded a response of the whole person and not merely external observance of the Law, his words made radical demands. So Jesus' radical demand for truthfulness replaced (and fulfilled) legal casuistry about oaths. The readiness to forgive and be reconciled set aside (and fulfilled) legal limitations on revenge. The disposition to love even enemies put aside legal debates about the meaning of "*neighbor." The ethics was based neither on the precepts of law nor the regularities of experience, nor did it discard them; law and wisdom were both qualified and fulfilled in this ethic of response to the future reign of the one God of scripture.

Jesus died on a Roman cross, but his followers proclaimed that God had raised him up in an act of power that was at once his vindication and the prelude to God's final triumph. Moral reflection in the New Testament always looks back to the vindicated Jesus and forward to God's cosmic sovereignty.

The Gospels used the traditions of Jesus' words and deeds to tell his story creatively and so to shape the conduct and character of the particular communities they addressed. Each has a distinctive emphasis. *Mark represents Jesus as calling for heroic discipleship, ready to suffer and die and ready as well to live in ordinary relationships with heroic confidence in God. In *Matthew, the Law holds: Jesus is presented as upholding the Law and as its best interpreter even as he demands a righteousness that "exceeds that of the scribes and Pharisees" (Matt. 5.20). *Luke's emphasis falls on care for the poor, women, and sinners, as well as on the mutual respect due Jew and *gentile in the community. *John tells the story quite differently so that his reader might "have life" (John 20.31) and might know that this entails love for one another.

The letters of *Paul make little use of the traditions of Jesus' words and deeds. Paul proclaims the gospel of the cross and *resurrection as "the power of God for salvation" (Rom. 1.16) to his churches, sometimes in the indicative mood and sometimes in the imperative. The indicative describes the power of God in the crucified and risen Christ to provide an eschatological *salvation of which Christians have the "first fruits" (Rom. 8.23) and "guarantee" (2 Cor. 5.5) in the Spirit. The imperative acknowledges that the powers of the old age still threaten Christians; so, "if we live by the Spirit, let us also be guided by the Spirit" (Gal. 5.25).

Reflection about conduct and character ought to be radically affected by God's power in the cross and resurrection. Paul provides no recipe for this new discernment, but some features are clear. Christians' self-understanding as moral agents was determined by their incorporation into Christ (Gal. 2.20; Rom. 6.1–11). Their perspective was eschatological; the *Corinthian enthusiasts who claimed to be already fully in the new age were reminded of the "not yet" character of their existence, while the *Colossians, tempted to submit again to angelic powers, were told that Christ was already Lord. Freedom (Gal. 5.1; 2 Cor. 3.17) and *love (1 Cor 13; Phil. 1.9) were values that provided tokens of the new age. The moral traditions of the church, the synagogue, and the Greek schools were not to be discarded, but selected, assimilated, and qualified by the gospel. Such discernment is applied to various moral issues: the relations of Jew and gentile, slave and free, male and female, rich and poor, the individual and the state. The judgments are not timeless truths in the style of either a philosopher or a code maker; they are timely applications of the gospel to specific problems in particular contexts.

The unyielding diversity of biblical ethics is only confirmed by other New Testament writings. The *pastoral letters use common hellenistic moral vocabulary and urge commonplace moral judgment against the *gnostics. The letter of *James is a didactic text collecting instructions into a moral miscellany. The book of *Revelation provides a symbolic universe to make intelligible both the experience of injustice at the hands of the Roman emperor and the conviction that Jesus is Lord, and to make plausible both patient endurance of suffering and faithful resistance to the values of the empire.

Eunuch. A castrated male. The Hebrew word sārîs is derived from an Akkadian phrase, ša rēši, literally, "(the one) of the head," meaning a royal attendant or official. Context largely determines whether the Hebrew should be translated "eunuch" or simply "official."

In early biblical writings, eunuchs appear as members of the royal court with no mention of their physical condition. The first references occur in texts coincident with the Davidic monarchy of the tenth century BCE (e.g., Gen. 37.36; 39.1; 40.2, 7). References increase in the seventh-century *Deuteronomic history (e.g., 1 Sam. 8.15; 1 Kings 22.9; 2 Kings 8.6; 9.32; 23.11) and are most frequent in literature of the sixth century BCE and later (e.g., Jer. 29.2; 34.19; 38.7; 41.16), especially in narratives depicting the Babylonian and Persian courts (Dan. 1; Esther). This distribution does not support the view that the use of eunuchs was a custom imported into Israel from neighboring cultures. The inclusion of eunuchs among the royal entourage (e.g., 2 Kings 24.15, in which the context implies "eunuchs" rather than NRSV's "officials") suggests that eunuchs were native to ancient Israel.

Later writings are preoccupied with the physical condition of the eunuch. In Isaiah 56.5, the eunuch who fears oblivion because of his childlessness is reassured that the eschatological commonwealth holds for him a "monument and a name (yād wāšēm) better than sons and daughters." In Sirach 30.20, the eunuch's inability to consummate his desire is a metaphor for an invalid's frustration in enjoying life (cf. 20.4).

In the New Testament, the eunuch is a potent ascetic symbol. Matthew 19.12 recognizes that eunuchs come from differing circumstances, including those "who have made themselves eunuchs for the sake of the kingdom of heaven." In Acts 8.27, Philip converts an Ethiopian court eunuch who is reading from the book of Isaiah; the passage may be an allusion to the eunuch of Isaiah 56.

Euphrates. The southernmost of the two rivers that, along with the Tigris, define *Mesopotamia. The Euphrates begins from two tributaries in mountainous eastern Turkey, crosses into Syria at Carchemish, and flows south roughly 160 km (100 mi) from the Mediterranean before turning east at Emar. It then proceeds southeast past *Mari to *Babylonia and into the Persian Gulf (see Map 6). This portion of the river served as an important trade route between Egypt, Syria-Palestine, and southern Mesopotamia.

In the Bible, the Euphrates is treated as the farthest northern horizon of Israelite territory in the promise to *Abraham (Gen 15.18; see Promised Land), in the *conquest instructions to *Moses and *Joshua (Deut. 1.7; 11.24; Josh 1.4), and in the description of *David's success in *Syria (2 Sam. 8.3). Though Israelite territory never properly extended across Syria, the ambitious ideal suggests a sense of vocation to be the major inland power between Egypt and the Euphrates, as David and *Solomon may briefly have been. The river boundary did not assume control of the northern coast, which belonged to the *Phoenicians (2 Sam. 5.11; 1 Kings 5.1). The Euphrates boundary is also evident in the Persian province in Syria-Palestine called "Beyond the River," which included the district of Yehud, in earlier Judah (see Ezra 4.11; etc.).

Evangelist. Evangelist (Grk. euaggelistēs) derived from the verb euaggelizomai, meaning "to announce good news" (euaggelion), is a primary New Testament concept. In the Hebrew Bible we find a similar figure in the messenger who brings good news (mĕbaśśēr) and proclaims peace (Nah. 1.15). The "prophet of consolation" in Second Isaiah is also a messenger of good news, announcing the deliverance of the people (Isa. 40.1–2). Consequently, Jerusalem is exhorted to convey the good news to the neighboring cities that their God is coming to take care of his flock (Isa. 40.9–11) and to bring with him peace, happiness, and salvation (52.7–8).

In the Greco-Roman world the words euaggelion and euaggelizomai had acquired technical connotations associated with important events in the *Roman empire. In the New Testament the word euaggelistēs occurs only three times, whereas the substantive euaggelion and the verb euaggelizomai occur seventy-six and fifty-four times respectively. In the Gospels, *Jesus is presented as a preacher of the good news of the *kingdom of God (Mark 1.14–15; Luke 20.1). He tells the disciples of *John the Baptist that the poor are being evangelized, recalling Isaiah 61.1 (Matt. 11.5; Luke 7.22); the same text is referred to in Luke 4.17–19. (See Gospel, Genre of.)

Outside the Gospels, the word "evangelist" has three different meanings. First, it was a title for early preachers of the gospel. In a certain sense, all *apostles were evangelists, since their duty was to preach the gospel (Gal. 1.8; Rom. 1.15). Gradually, the term came to be confined to the disciples of the apostles. In Ephesians 4.11, "evangelist" is third in a list of offices in the church, after apostles and *prophets but before pastors and teachers. Timothy is referred to as someone performing the work of an evangelist (2 Tim. 4.5), probably because of the role he played in establishing the believers in their faith (1 Thess. 3.2). Philip, one of the *seven, is also called an evangelist (Acts 21.8) because he preached the gospel to the *Samaritans and those outside Judea (Acts 8.4–40). In a more restricted sense, the word denotes the author of one of the four canonical Gospels; this usage first appears in the third century CE. Traditionally, the four evangelists are symbolized by a man, a lion, an ox, and an eagle, on the basis of Revelation 4.6–10 (cf. Ezek. 1.10). Finally, in modern times, the word has developed a more specialized meaning, referring to a traveling preacher or revivalist.

JOSEPH PATHRAPANKAL, C.M.I.

Eve. The name given to the first woman by the first man (Gen. 3.20). The Bible interprets this name to mean "the mother of all living," both because Eve is, through her sons, the female ancestor of the entire human race and because the name sounds similar to the Hebrew word for "living being." The wordplay is probably etymologically incorrect, and later rabbinic tradition proposed a connection with the *Aramaic word for "serpent." The actual linguistic derivation of the name remains uncertain.

According to the account in Genesis 2–3, the woman is created to be a companion corresponding to (not originally subordinate to) the man. Because the two of them eat the forbidden fruit (see Fall, The), the man is destined to toil as a farmer in fields of thorns and thistles, and the woman is destined to suffer pain in childbearing. It is in the aftermath of these divine pronouncements that the man names the woman as he had earlier named the animals, thus indicating dominion over her.

Both Jewish tradition and the New Testament offer a very negative view of Eve, presenting her as representative of the alleged weaknesses of women. Paul feared that the Corinthian Christians would be led astray from Christ as Eve was deceived by the serpent (2 Cor. 11.3). In 1 Timothy 2.13–15, Eve's deception by the serpent and also her creation subsequent to the man are cited as reasons that women must keep silent in church (cf. 1 Cor. 14.34–35) and hold no authority over men. Early Christian theologians contrasted Eve's sinfulness with the perfection of the "new Eve," *Mary, the mother of Jesus.

This traditional emphasis on the gullibility of Eve and her tendency toward sin is one possible interpretation of the Genesis narrative; it is not, however, inherent in the text of the narrative itself. Genesis 3 gives no indication why the serpent addressed the woman and even indicates that the man and the woman were together when the serpent spoke. It has been suggested that the serpent might have addressed the woman as provider of food or as theological thinker, not as the more gullible of the couple, and that the woman's addition to the divine prohibition about the fruit ("we may not touch it") represents not a lie, but a desirable exaggeration meant to make sure that the basic command would not be broken. The man and the woman together discover their nakedness, together make fig leaf garments, and together hide from the deity. Both are destined to a life of pain (neither is cursed) because of their actions, and together they are expelled from the garden. Thus, once the reader sets aside the portrait of Eve based on later traditions, the great skill of the Genesis narrator in presenting a character open to diverse interpretation becomes apparent.

Everyday Expressions from the Bible. Over the centuries, biblical phrases and expressions have become part of the vocabulary of those for whose culture the Bible is a central text. Some idea of the Bible's influence on the English language may be gleaned from the following sample of everyday expressions, all of biblical origin, chiefly in the Authorized or King James Version (1611).

A person may be said to behave like the great I Am (Exod. 3.14), or to have "the mark of Cain" (Gen. 4:15). People are tempted to eat forbidden fruit (Gen. 2.17), desire the fleshpots of Egypt (Exod. 16.3), and give up something worth having for a mess of pottage (Gen. 25.29–34).

Yet "one does not live by bread alone" (Deut. 8.3), and finally each must go the way of all flesh (cf. Gen. 6.12; Josh. 23.14) and return to the dust (Gen. 3.19). For the moment, those who find themselves "at their wits' end" (Ps. 107.27) may still escape by the skin of their teeth (Job 19.20), but others find themselves in the position of a scapegoat (Lev. 16.8–10; see Azazel). Nevertheless, "a soft answer turns away wrath" (Prov. 15.1). Unfortunately, a leopard cannot change its spots (Jer. 13.23). The wicked sow the wind and reap the whirlwind (Hos. 8.7), and because they ignore the writing on the wall (Dan. 5.24), they are fated to "lick the dust" (Ps. 72.9). Inevitably "pride goeth . . . before a fall" (Prov. 16.18), and anything that hinders success is a fly in the ointment (Eccles. 10.1). The wise recall that life lasts "but threescore years and ten" (Ps. 90.10), and so they gird their loins (Job 38.3) and teach their children "the good and the right way" (1 Sam. 12.23). Such people know that "you can't take it with you" (cf. Eccles. 5.15), and that "there is nothing new under the sun" (Eccles. 1.9).

Everyday expressions from the New Testament are largely derived from the parables and other teachings of Jesus. Who has not known a good *Samaritan (Luke 10.30–37), a person that will "go a second mile" (Matt. 5.41)? These individuals are "the salt of the earth" (Matt. 5.13) and often "turn the other cheek" (Matt. 5.38). Some seek the "pearl of great price" (Matt. 13.46), while others, like the Prodigal Son, waste their lives "in riotous living" (Luke 15.13). "No one can serve two masters" (Matt. 6.24). "A house divided against itself will not stand" (Mark 3.25), nor can "the blind lead the blind" (Matt. 15.14).

It is useless to "cast pearls before swine" (Matt. 7.6).

In antiquity a "talent" was a unit of *weight or *money, but because of Jesus' parable of the talents (Matt. 25.14–30), the word has come to mean natural endowment or ability. To disregard these abilities is to hide one's light under a bushel (Matt. 5.15). Even those who have never opened a Bible recognize the *golden rule of doing to others as we would have them do to us (Matt. 7.12; Luke 6.31).

The letters of Paul are also a source of several expressions now in everyday use: "The letter kills, but the spirit gives life" (2 Cor. 3.6); "The love of money is the root of all evil" (1 Tim. 6.10); "to see through a glass darkly" (1 Cor. 13.12); "a thorn in the flesh" (2 Cor. 12.7).

Evil. In Israel's earliest traditions, the presence of evil in the world is taken for granted as a reality that is philosophically nonproblematic. There is no terminological distinction between moral evil and calamity, for the same Hebrew word (raʿ or rāʿâ) is used for both. Evil is anything that is unpleasant, repulsive, or distorted (Gen. 41.3–4).

Genesis 1 shows how in the beginning there already exists the darkness and the cosmic sea, pervasive symbols of evil requiring God's subjugation (cf. Job 38.8–11; Matt. 8.24–27; Rev. 21.1), and no attempt is made to explain their origin. God perceives the world as "very good" (Gen. 1.31), even though it also includes the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, along with a subtle serpent who encourages the consumption of its fruit (Gen. 2–3). Although God subdues evil in the cosmos, a number of texts in the Hebrew Bible are not reluctant to identify God as the source of evil (e.g., Isa. 45.7; Jer. 4.6; Amos 3.6; Mic. 2.3; Eccles. 1.13; Job 2.10). A standard complaint when humans suffer is that God is the one who has brought the calamity on them (e.g., 1 Kings 17.20; Job 9.17–18; 13.24; 16.7–14; 19.21–22; Pss. 39.10; 51.8; 60.1–3; Lam. 3.1–16). Since God was the undisputed master of creation, it was assumed that every occurrence was through his explicit command. It was not that God merely allowed evil to happen, for God directs evil through the mediation of supernatural beings who afflict, deceive, bring harm, and do evil in general at God's command (1 Sam. 16.14–16; 1 Kings 22.19–23; Job 1.12; Ps. 78.49). Both good and evil were in God's control, and he actively employed both to accomplish his ends. Although God is often depicted in conflict with evil (Isa. 27.1; Hab. 3.8–15), there is never really any doubt that God will be victorious. Philosophical dualism finds no place in biblical literature, for God has no equal and the cosmic order that he endorses, although often in jeopardy, must inevitably be established.

There is, however, one place where evil exasperates God: the human heart (Gen. 6.5–6; Jer. 17.9; Ezek. 6.9; Eccles. 9.3), that is, a man or woman's intellectual, emotional, and spiritual center. Even here the Bible pictures God as able to manipulate humankind (Exod. 4.21; cf. Ps. 141.4; Isa. 63.17; Ezek. 36.26; Prov. 21.1; Rom. 9.18–21), but there remains a mystery that is not further explored, namely, the freedom that human beings have to direct their own hearts for good or evil (Exod. 8.15; Jer. 18.12; Ezek. 18.31; Zech. 7.12).

Evil is not an intrinsic feature of the physical world, for everywhere in the Hebrew Bible creation is seen as good and submissive to the will of God (Gen. 1.32). The story of *Jonah is representative, for although even a prophet may stubbornly resist God, it is the fish, the winds, the plants, and the worm that dutifully cooperate. It is therefore not surprising that later *gnostic thought, which perceived the physical world as inherently evil, rejected the God of the Hebrew Bible as an evil being.

The notion that evil can characteristically be associated with a supernatural being opposed to God and God's people has roots in the Hebrew Bible (Isa. 14.12–15; Ezek. 28.11–19) but only becomes common in the New Testament. There this figure is appropriately called the "Evil One" (Eph. 6.16; 1 John 2.13–14) and bears the distinctive appellatives "Adversary" (Hebr. śāṭān; see Satan) and "Accuser" (Grk. diabolos). He is accompanied by a retinue of lesser supernatural creatures with a similar ethical orientation whose origins can be traced to rare references to "evil spirits," "deceiving spirits," or "evil angels" that do God's bidding (1 Sam. 18.10; 19.9; 1 Kings 22.22–23; Ps. 78.49; see Demons).

In the New Testament, these beings are more explicitly responsible for a greater share of the evil in the world. When illness, tragedy, or calamity occurred in ancient Israel, one tended to see God at work; in the New Testament Satan and demons are generally seen as responsible (Matt. 17.14–18; Acts 5.3; 2 Cor. 12.7). Humanity is locked in a struggle with these unseen beings (Eph. 6.12) who seek to crush the righteous (1 Pet. 5.8) and can manipulate human hearts (John 13.2). A climactic confrontation between the cosmic forces of good and evil at some time in the future will result in the eradication of all evil along with those creatures (human or otherwise) who aligned themselves with it (Rev. 19–21).

Evil as a philosophical problem is never really addressed in biblical literature. Attempts in Judaism and Christianity to resolve the logical problem of the existence of evil in a world created by a compassionate, just, omnipotent, and omniscient God belong to postbiblical reflections on the text.

Exile. In biblical studies, more than in the Bible itself, "the exile" looms large as a chronological hinge around 600 BCE. The decisive "preexilic" events of *covenant, *Exodus, and *kingship occupy far more space than the scanty postexilic events, but of the latter, *Ezra, Haggai-Malachi, and the deuterocanonical books (see Apocrypha) are taken as the key to the final editing of the prophets and the *Pentateuch. Exile as a place was *Babylonia; the earlier exile (2 Kings 17.6) was rather an exchange of populations between the northern kingdom of Israel and subject areas of *Assyria; mistrust of "the *Samaritans" is justified by Jerusalemite biblical authors because of the "pagan" element thus mingled among them, and this mistrust is extended by postexilic returnees to those residents of Judah who had never gone into exile but had been ruled as a district of "Samaria" (Ezra 4.4).

The interchangeable Hebrew terms for exile are gôlâ and gālût, generally rendered in the *Septuagint as "captivity" or "deportation." The chief deportations took place under *Nebuchadrezzar in 597 BCE (2 Kings 24.14: ten thousand including all upper classes; different figures are given in Jer. 52.28–30) and in 587/586 (2 Kings 25.11–13: "all the rest," except the poorest). Historical details have been clarified by the *Lachish ostraca and by Babylonian chronicles; also, the language of the decree of return (Ezra 1.1–4 = 2 Chron. 36.22) conforms to usages attested in the Persian chancery. Dated oracles of *Ezekiel fall during his life in Babylonia; he was a priest and his diction contributed to the original dating and identification of the exilic Holiness Code (Lev. 17–24). Jeremiah describes the exile from within Judah (chaps. 50–51 as Babylon's downfall and the restoration; chap. 52 a historical appendix). Isaiah 40–66 is the chief biblical portrayal of the restoration insofar as its inner unity and relation to Isaiah 1–39 can be clarified. The "law" of Ezra (7.6, 26; Neh. 8.2) was either the Priestly (*P) code alone (its materials being largely early) or, more probably, its incorporation into a whole Pentateuch definitely edited toward the end of the exile. *Deuteronomy also, and with it the reedited Joshua-Judges-Samuel-Kings, are varyingly related to exilic experiences; after *Jerusalem and the *Temple were destroyed, and *David's last royal descendants executed (2 Kings 25.7), it could no longer be repeated that God's fidelity precluded abandoning his chosen people and land; but admission of guilt and of just punishment carried hope of restoration and a "new covenant" (Jer. 31.31).

Exodus, The. The Exodus, the escape of the *Hebrews from slavery in *Egypt under the leadership of *Moses, is the central event of the Hebrew Bible. More space is devoted to the generation of Moses than to any other period in Israel's history, and the event itself became a model for subsequent experiences of liberation in biblical, Jewish, Christian, and Muslim traditions. The Exodus is ancient Israel's national epic, retold throughout its history, with each new narration reflecting the context in which it was rendered. The Exodus entails not only the actual events in Egypt but all those encompassed within the period from Moses to Joshua, from the actual escape from Egypt to the *conquest of the land of Canaan, including the wilderness wanderings. This epic is not preserved in the *Pentateuch as such; within its boundaries the promise of land made to *Abraham remains unfulfilled. But the structure of Pentateuchal narrative presumes it, and indeed the conclusion of the story is found in the book of Joshua, the beginning of the *Deuteronomic History that has apparently displaced an earlier ending to Israel's original epic. The full story is also found in summary form in other passages (Exod. 15; Deut. 26.5–9; Josh. 24; Pss. 78; 80; 105; 114; cf. Ezek 20.6), some of which are quite old.

Historical Context. The Bible itself is virtually devoid of concrete detail that would enable the Exodus to be dated securely. It names none of the Pharaohs with whom Joseph, the "sons of Israel," and Moses and Aaron are reported to have dealt. Egyptian records are also silent about the events described in the later chapters of the book of Genesis and the first half of the book of Exodus; they make no mention of Joseph, Moses, the *Hebrews, the *plagues, or a catastrophic defeat of Pharaoh and his army. The first mention of Israel in a source other than the Bible is in an inscription written to commemorate the victory of the Egyptian Pharaoh Merneptah at the end of the thirteenth century BCE; there Israel is associated with places in Canaan rather than in Egypt. Because of this lack of direct correlation between biblical and nonbiblical sources, scholars have to resort to indirect evidence in assigning a date to the Exodus. Two principal views have been proposed. The first associates the flight of the Hebrews with the expulsion of the Hyksos kings from Egypt at the end of the Middle Bronze Age (ca. 1550 BCE). First proposed by *Josephus (Against Apion 1.103), this date approximates the figure of 480 years from the Exodus to the dedication of the *Temple by *Solomon (1 Kings 6.1; cf. Judg. 11.26) and, with some variations, is held by a minority of modern scholars. Biblical *chronology itself is, however, not consistent, and most scholars date the event to the mid-thirteenth century BCE, during the reign of Ramesses II, because of a convergence of probabilities, including the identification of the store cities of Pithom and Rameses (Exod. 1.11) with recently excavated sites in the Egyptian delta and the larger context of the history of Egypt and of the Levant.

The Narratives. The account of the Exodus in the Pentateuch is multilayered, being composed of various traditions, some very ancient, such as the "Song of the Sea" in Exodus 15, and the bulk a prose narrative combining the Pentateuchal sources *J, *E, and *P, to be dated from the tenth to perhaps as late as the sixth century BCE. The existence of these traditions enables us to observe a virtually continuous process of revision; thus, for example, the place names vary, apparently reflecting those current when a particular tradition was set down.

Embellishment, heightening, and exaggeration can also be observed. The simplest account of the event at the Sea of Reeds (see Red Sea) is found in Exodus 14.24–25. This passage may be understood in its simplest terms as a summary of how a group of Hebrew slaves escaping on foot was pursued by Egyptian guards, who were forced to give up the chase when their chariots became mired in the swampy region east of the Nile delta (see Map 2). This account is ultimately transformed into a miraculous intervention of Yahweh at the sea, when through the agency of Moses he makes a path through the sea, with walls of water on both sides (Exod. 14.21–23). Still later, in the *Septuagint, the Hebrew phrase meaning "sea of reeds" is translated as "Red Sea," further enhancing the miracle. Likewise, the number of those escaping, according to Exodus 1.15 a small group whose obstetrical needs could be handled by only two midwives, becomes six hundred thousand men, as well as women and children (Exod. 12.37), an impossible population of several million.

Another tendency is to mythologize. The escape of the Hebrews at the sea is recast as a historical enactment of an ancient cosmogonic *myth of a battle between the storm god and the sea, found also in biblical texts having to do with *creation (Job 26.12–13; Jer. 31.35; Pss. 74.12–17; 89.9–12; 93; 104; see Israel, Religion of). This mythology is explicitly applied to the Exodus in Psalm 114, where the adversaries of the deity are the personified Sea and Jordan River, who flee at God's approach at the head of Israel (cf. Judg. 5.4–5; Ps. 68.7–8; Hab. 3.3–15); Sea and Jordan are clearly related to Prince Sea and Judge River, the parallel titles of the adversary of the Canaanite storm god *Baal in *Ugaritic mythology (note the echoes of this motif in the New Testament, in such passages as Mark 4.35–41 par.; Rev. 21.1). The adversaries of the God of Israel, however, are not cosmic but historical—the Egyptian Pharaoh and his army, and sea and river are not primeval forces but geographical realities.

The same historicizing tendency is apparent in the treatment of the *Passover, originally two separate springtime *feasts from different socioeconomic contexts now given historical etiology associated with the Exodus. The "festival of unleavened bread" was originally an agrarian pilgrimage feast in which the first spring harvest of barley was offered to a deity without being contaminated with older leaven. In the Exodus narrative, the unleavened bread is explained by the need for haste as the Hebrews left Egypt (Exod. 12.34, 39; Deut. 16.3; cf. Isa. 52.12). Similarly, the slaughter of the firstborn lamb, originally an offering by pastoralists to the deity thought responsible for their flocks' increase, is linked to the protective mark of the lamb's blood on the doorposts of the Hebrews, which spared them from the last plague.

In a similar way, other laws and institutions that developed later in Israel's history were legitimated by placing their origins in the formative period of the Exodus; the formative period thus became normative. This is one way of understanding the large amount of legal and ritual material found in the books of Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy: set in a narrative context, these laws and religious practices are thereby linked with the central event of the Exodus and with Moses, the mediator of the divinely ordained instructions.

In view of these multiple tendencies, it is impossible to determine with any certainty what may actually have occurred to Hebrews in Egypt, probably during the thirteenth century. Literary analysis of the narratives suggests that what may in fact have been several movements out of Egypt by Semitic peoples have been collapsed into one. But whatever happened, this event was also formative in the sense that ancient Israel saw its origins here. A group of runaway slaves acquired an identity that, against all odds, they have maintained to today. It is understandable, then, that the event would be magnified in song and story, in part to praise the God thought responsible for it. It is also understandable why the Exodus became a dominant theme of later writers, who saw in the events of their times a kind of reenactment of the original Exodus.

Allusions to the Exodus. Hebrew Bible. Much of biblical narrative can be seen as shaped by or alluding to the Exodus both by anticipation and in retrospect. Thus, the division of the waters and the appearance of dry land at *creation (Gen. 1.6–10) foreshadows the division of the Reed Sea (Exod. 14.21; both passages are P); the allusion to the P account of creation in Exodus 14 is an interpretation of the Exodus itself as a new creation. Likewise, the brief story of Abram (*Abraham) and Sarai (*Sarah) in Egypt (Gen. 12.10–20) is a proleptic summary of the longer narrative of Israel in Egypt that will be told later in the Pentateuch: the two ancestors go down to Egypt as aliens because of a famine (Gen 12.10; cf. 47.4); subsequently Yahweh afflicts Pharaoh and his house with great plagues (12.17; Exod. 11.1) so that the Egyptian ruler lets them go (12.19; Exod. 12.32).

The linking of Exodus and conquest in biblical poetry (Exod. 15; Ps. 114) is elaborately developed in Joshua 3–4. The Deuteronomic narrative of the crossing of the Jordan River parallels that at the Reed Sea, as the conclusion to the narrative explicitly states (Josh. 4.23).

Biblical literature as a whole is permeated by allusions to the Exodus. The prophet *Elijah is described as returning in the darkest moment of his life to the mountain of God, called *Horeb in Deuteronomic style, where the *theophany experienced by Moses is repeated, but with a difference: Yahweh is not in the wind, the earthquake, or the fire, all manifestations of his presence in Exodus (19.18; 24.17; cf. Deut. 4.12; etc.), but in the "still small voice" (1 Kings 19.12). The prophet Hosea sees hope for Israel's restoration in a return to the wilderness (Hos. 2.14–15), the scene of Israel's honeymoon with its God (see Jer. 2.2). Scholars have also seen echoes of the Exodus in such texts as Jonah and Psalm 23.

The most sustained set of references to the Exodus in the prophets is found in the collection of oracles attributed to Second Isaiah. Writing in the context of the Babylonian captivity in the sixth century BCE, this anonymous prophet foresaw a return of Israel to its land, describing it as a new Exodus (43.2, 19–21; 52.4–5). Yahweh, who had shown his power in the defeat of the primeval sea and at the Sea of Reeds, would act again to bring his people in joy through a wilderness to Zion (51.9–11; 40.3; 41.17–20; 44.3).

Dead Sea Scrolls. The *Essene community at *Qumran in its sectarian writings continued the interpretive tradition of applying the experience of the Exodus to itself. These self-styled "covenanters" saw themselves as the new Israel, living in camps in the wilderness at the very edge of the *promised land, preparing for the ultimate triumph of God after a war of forty years, reliving both Israel's original formative experience and that of the Babylonian exile, in fulfillment of the "new covenant" of Jeremiah 31.31.

New Testament. The appropriation of the Exodus as the model for prior and subsequent events in Israel's history was continued in the New Testament. The life of Jesus is frequently understood in the Gospels as a reenactment of Israel's experience. Luke 9.31 describes Jesus' passion, death, and resurrection as an "exodus" (NRSV: "departure"), the subject of his conversation with Moses and Elijah, both associated with the original Exodus of Israel (see above). Among the *quotations from the Old Testament in the gospel of Matthew which the evangelist explicitly describes Jesus as fulfilling, one identifies Jesus as the new Israel, come out of Egypt just as the old Israel had (Matt. 2.15; cf. Hos. 11.1; Exod. 4.22). There are many other allusions to events and figures of Israel's Exodus throughout Matthew's gospel. Jesus is represented as another Moses, rescued at an early age from persecutors (2.21; cf. Exod. 4.19). He gives his teaching in five major discourses like the five books of Moses (the *Torah), of which the first is a proclamation of the new law for the new Israel, the *Sermon on the Mount, just as Moses had proclaimed the original law at Mount Sinai. Like Israel in the wilderness, Jesus' followers are fed miraculously in a deserted place (Matt. 14.13; 15.33; par.; cf. Exod. 16.4; John 6.31–32). The gospel of John carries this *typology further by identifying Jesus with the Passover lamb (1.29; 19.36, quoting Exod. 12.46), an equation made earlier by Paul (1 Cor. 5.7) and later considerably amplified in the book of *Revelation (5.6; etc.). Paul also identifies Christ with the rock from which water miraculously flowed in the wilderness (1 Cor. 10.4; cf. Exod. 17.1–7; Num. 20.2–13).

Postbiblical traditions. It is not surprising that a similar correspondence was made between the experience of ancient Israel and the life of the Christian. *Baptism is understood as a personal exodus from slavery to sin to a new life of holiness made possible by passage through water; in the Roman liturgy the second reading of the ritual for blessing the baptismal water during the Easter vigil is Exodus 14.24–15.3. Thus, Christians, like Moses (Exod. 34.29–35), behold the "*glory of the Lord" unveiled (2 Cor. 3.16–18). Likewise, at death, a traditional prayer asks that God save the soul of the dying person as he once saved Moses from Pharaoh. The Christian Eucharist is directly descended from the Passover service, because the Last Supper of Jesus was itself a Passover meal; the bread (often unleavened; see Leaven) and the wine of the Passover assume a specifically Christian symbolism, but the older Exodus themes are still present (1 Cor. 10.16–18; 11.23–25; see Lord's Supper).

In Islam, the *Qur'ān and subsequent traditions echo the biblical account of the Exodus in their description of the Hejira, the flight of Muhammad from Mecca to Medina.

The self-identification with the ancient community of Hebrews has continued into modern times. Various groups experiencing oppression have identified themselves with the Hebrew slaves in Egypt. Throughout the centuries of persecution and attempts at extermination, Jews have seen in the original Exodus a reason for hope: the God who had saved their ancestors would also save them. In the Diaspora, since the Roman destruction of Jerusalem in 70 CE, the longing for a return to the land of Israel has been expressed by the words "Next year in Jerusalem!" at the end of the Passover meal. Exodus symbolism was also adopted by the Zionist movement, especially in the aftermath of World War II and the *Holocaust, and continues to be used by Jews seeking to emigrate from oppressive situations.

In the ideology of the Puritans immigrating to the "New World," the Exodus also served as a model and a divine guarantee: once again a divinely chosen group had escaped from oppression across a body of water to a new Canaan, a "providence plantation"; note the many biblical place names used in New England and throughout the United States. This conviction has continued to shape the American self-image, notably in the notion of "manifest destiny": the view that the Americans of the United States are a chosen people is commonplace in American political discourse. Ironically, in the early nineteenth century, after the founding of Liberia, American blacks used the same imagery in their spirituals; the "river" to be crossed was the Atlantic Ocean, but in the opposite direction from the Pilgrims, and Africa became the goal of their journey, the "greener pastures on the other side."

In the latter part of the twentieth century, the Exodus has been paradigmatic for liberation theology, a radical Christian movement of Latin American origin whose goals are political and social reform. Liberation theology has been criticized for its appropriation of the Exodus as sanction for views and actions espoused for other, quite legitimate, reasons. The appeal to biblical authority is highly selective and raises complicated questions: how, for example, can a God who rescues the Hebrews from Egyptian bondage be reconciled with one who immediately thereafter gives explicit commands in which the institution of slavery is not just presumed but condoned? Still, there is no denying the power of the Exodus story as a model for hope and even action to counter oppression. (See Politics and the Bible.) MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Exodus, The Book of. Wĕ'ēlleh šĕmôt begins the book of Exodus, "And these are the names." This phrase serves as the Hebrew name for Exodus, and as a convenient linking of its narrative with the preceding narratives in the canon. Indeed, the beginning of the list of the descendants of Israel in Genesis 46.8 employs precisely the same words as does Exodus 1.1, and much as the narrative of *Genesis 12–50 is concerned with the promise of Yahweh to *Abraham, *Isaac, and *Jacob of progeny and land, the narrative of the book of Exodus is concerned with various dimensions of the fulfillment of that promise.

Contents. Most of the book of Exodus is prose, as straightforward narrative, as lists of laws in apodictic (universal) or casuistic (specific case) form, or as instructions related in one way or another to worship. One important section is *poetry (15.1b–18, 21), and there is one three-line poetic stanza at 32.18.

The subject matter of the book of Exodus is far more disparate in content than in form. There are narratives about *Moses alongside narratives of Israel's oppression, and narratives of the intransigence of the Pharaoh of *Egypt alongside narratives of rescue and provision by Yahweh. There are instructions appropriate to an agricultural setting alongside instructions appropriate to an urban life. There are dramatic accounts of the coming and appearance of Yahweh alongside the most elaborate descriptions of the objects designed to suggest and memorialize Yahweh's nearness. There are stories intended to prove that Yahweh is present alongside stories of Israel's fear of both his presence and his absence. And there are reports of the authentication of Yahweh's representative alongside the instructions for the ordination and the specifications of the vestments designed to symbolize that authority.

All these quite different sequences are set into a loose geographical and chronological framework. For roughly the first third of the book of Exodus, the setting is Egypt (1.1–13.16). For the next five chapters, the setting is the *wilderness en route to *Sinai (13.17–18.27). And for just over the second half of the book, as also for *Leviticus and nearly the first third of *Numbers (through Num. 10.11), the setting is the plain before Mount Sinai (19.1–40.38). The chronological sequence of the book extends from the rise of a new dynasty in Egypt some time after *Joseph's death to the birth of Moses in the context of a bitter oppression of Israel, through Moses' growth to maturity, his flight to *Midian, his call there and his return to Egypt to lead Israel, through the sequence of the mighty acts demonstrating Yahweh's presence with his people, through the event of the Exodus and Israel's deliverance at the sea (see Red Sea) to the subsequent journey in the wilderness to Sinai. There, after an appropriate preparation, Israel experienced the advent of Yahweh, received the revelation of the "ten words" (Exod. 34.28; see Ten Commandments) and the gift of *covenant relationship. The remainder of the sequence of Exodus, involving special instructions for the apparatus and personnel of worship, the rebellion involving the *golden calf, Yahweh's punishment and *mercy, the renewal of the covenant relationship, and the execution of the special instructions all occurs within what is represented as a brief period of time.

Unfortunately, there is no way to locate this admittedly loose chronological sequence with any precision, either in an Egyptian setting or in a wilderness setting. A wide variety of dates has been suggested, from the first half of the fifteenth century BCE to the early part of the thirteenth century BCE.

Literary Structure. From the beginning of critical inquiry into the Bible, the disparity of the various sections of the book of Exodus has been noted, and during the latter third of the nineteenth century and the first third of the twentieth, this disparity was generally attributed to the differences in vocabulary, style, and interest of the Pentateuchal or, more recently, Tetrateuchal sources. The Yahwistic (*J) and Elohistic (*E) sources were regarded as present, usually in a kind of foundational amalgam onto which the Priestly (*P) material had been grafted or attached as extended addenda here and there. In commentaries published in the sixty years following 1875, the assignment of verses and verse fragments to these "documentary" sources was made with both assurance and precision. This procedure sometimes led, however, to an absurd fragmentation of the text of Exodus, so much so that the source hypothesis came to be put forward with more caution, and eventually to be emphasized or deemphasized according to the format of a given commentary series and the interests of individual authors.

Attention to the motifs underlying these sources has led to a larger view of the book of Exodus, both as a part of a continuing narrative and also as a whole within itself. Exodus continues a narrative begun by Genesis and provides the foundation for another continued by Numbers and *Deuteronomy (see Pentateuch). Indeed, Exodus is a foundation for the entire Bible, for it sets forth a kind of first presentation of the themes of coming and presence, relationship and responsibility, which are so much a part of the biblical message. (See Exodus, The.)

The literary structure of the book of Exodus is certainly composite, whether by that one means the joining of traditions, the weaving of sources, or the exposition of themes. There is, however, an important sense in which Exodus is in itself a whole, one that needs to be taken seriously. Whatever may lie behind the book, in a literary history that can only be speculated, the canonical text of Exodus presents a whole that cannot be denied, whether or not it can be understood. On a first reading, that whole may appear somewhat more disjointed than it really is, in part because of the prejudice of years of thinking of the book of Exodus in pieces. A closer reading reveals a literary structure that is not only deliberate but also quite effective in organization.

Composition and Compilation. The composition of the book of Exodus took place over a long period of time. That much is established by the patchwork nature of the book's literary structure. Yet just how long that period of time may have been, or just when it may have begun, can only be speculated. No assignment of any part of the book of Exodus to a definite author can be made; many minds are evident in the forty chapters that comprise the book.

Tradition has ascribed Exodus, along with the other four of the first five books of the Bible, to Moses, both because of his significant role as Yahweh's representative and also on the basis of such references as Deuteronomy 1.1; 2 Kings 14.6; Ezra 6.18; 2 Chronicles 25.4; and Mark 12.26. This tradition and such references were probably never intended to suggest a Mosaic authorship, but rather to establish a Mosaic authority, a kind of guarantee of an ancient and accurate record. From the earliest history of the Bible, the book of Exodus has been recognized as a collage of sometimes conflicting and often very different traditions. Also from an early period, both Jewish (*Philo, *Josephus, the *Talmud) and Christian literature have connected Moses with the Pentateuch, and for appropriate reasons. The historicity of Moses is the most reasonable assumption to be made about him. There is no viable argument why Moses should be regarded as a fiction of pious necessity. His removal from the scene of Israel's beginnings as a theocratic community would leave a vacuum that simply could not be explained away. Moses may be connected with the earliest substratum of the book of Exodus, specifically with the accounts of call and *theophany and perhaps also with the Ten Commandments. What cannot be said, of course, is that there are, anywhere in Exodus or in the Bible, words that can be said certainly to be Moses' own.

What may be proposed in theoretical reconstruction of the composition of the book of Exodus is a substratum of narrative, cultic instruction, covenant formulary, hymnody, authorization sequences, etiological legends, and wilderness routes, gathered across the years from the time of the Exodus itself until at least the postexilic period of Israel's history. Through that period of approximately seven centuries, the book of Exodus was being composed and, in a sense, recomposed, as the gathering strata that comprise the canonical book were created, then joined, often in new arrangement. It is through these centuries that the process of composition became a process of compilation, and the canonical book is the product of this latter process.

The compilation of Exodus was by no means the haphazard arbitrary shuffle frequently implied by literary-critical essayists and commentators. Too much attention is given to the book of Exodus that might have been, and not enough to the book that is. The discontinuity and disparity in content, style, vocabulary, and organization are the result of an inevitable variation in source material, along with the growth of the book to its present form across a lengthy period of time. By no means are they the sign of careless or ignorant editorial work. Indeed, given this inevitable variation, the book of Exodus displays a remarkable unity of purpose and wholeness of organization.

The material often regarded as intrusive and even disruptive of the sequence of Exodus, such as the "Book of the Covenant" (20.22–23.33), and the two Priestly sections dealing with the media of Israel's worship (25.1–31.18 and 35.1–40.38), may be seen as deliberately placed pieces of a whole concept. The "Book of the Covenant" functions not as a displaced collection of loosely assembled laws, but as a practical and specific application of the principles of relationship set forth in the Ten Commandments. And the section on the symbols and acts and ministers of worship in Yahweh's presence are logically located, even in a narrative sequence that they disrupt. The revelation of the instructions for the creation of the media of such worship is placed immediately after the long composite narrative describing the promise of Yahweh's presence, the demonstration of Yahweh's presence, and the advent of Yahweh's presence, brought to a climax by the establishment of the covenant between Yahweh and Israel. The report of the fulfillment of those instructions is appropriately placed after the narratives describing the breaking of the covenant relationship, the consequent judgment upon Israel, the return of Yahweh's presence, and the renewal of the covenant commitment. The places of worship and their furnishings are not to be constructed until the relationship between Yahweh and Israel has been reestablished, and only when all the work of building has been determined to be in exact accord with Yahweh's direction does his presence settle upon the *tabernacle (Exod. 39.42–43; 40.34).

An even more dramatic example of the literary and thematic unity of Exodus as a compilation is provided by Exodus 18, a chapter often considered dislocated in the narrative sequence of the book because it describes events that occur in the camp at the foot of Sinai/*Horeb before Israel is said to have reached there and because it is concerned with the administration of Yahweh's requirements before they have actually been given. These inconsistencies of narrative sequence cannot, of course, have gone unnoticed by the compilers of the book of Exodus, so some other reason must be sought for the location of Exodus 18 where it now stands in the received text instead of after chap. 24 or even after chap. 34—a reason that sets aside the advantages of logical or chronological sequence. That reason is to be found in a thematic consideration: the reunion of Moses with his *Midianite family, specifically Jethro, particularly in company with his people Israel freed from bondage in Egypt, amounts to an important reuniting of the two parts of a family divided by the expulsion of *Cain (Gen. 4.10–16), by Abraham's sending forth of Keturah's sons (Gen. 25.1–6) and his disinheriting of *Hagar and *Ishmael (Gen. 21.8–21), and by the conflict between *Jacob and *Esau (Gen. 25.19–34; 27.1–45; 28.6–9; 32.3–6; 33.1–20). The redactors who compiled the book of Exodus were eager to have a reunited family of Israel before the great theophany and covenant-making at Sinai, and so they set what is now Exodus 18 where they did, ignoring other considerations.

Theology. What makes the book of Exodus as it stands a carefully organized whole is neither literary form nor authorship, neither historical sequence nor uniformity of content. Exodus is bound together by a theological intention: the presentation by narrative, by didactic device, by song, by dialogue, by legal specification, by liturgical arrangement, by a round of festival and solemn ceremony, by high drama, by symbol, by a witty and very direct picture of human nature, and by a soaring depiction of the majesty and the mystery of God, of theological themes that are foundational to the Bible and to Judaism and Christianity, as well as to Islam.

The most important of these theological themes is the repeated assertion that Yahweh is present in the ongoing daily life of Israel, his people of promise and covenant. This theme functions as a kind of center from and to which other themes are connected, as spokes to a hub. Yahweh, who made promises to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, is present and hence those promises are being kept; with the development of that assertion, the book of Exodus is begun. Yahweh, to be present with his people, must come to them, must bring them to himself; thus, there are in Exodus the narratives of his advent, in chaps. 3 and 4, 19 and 20, 24, 33 and 34, and 40. Yahweh must be known to be present, by his people and by those who would oppose them alike: therefore a proof-of-the-presence sequence, dramatically moved forward by Pharaoh's recalcitrance, increasing in seriousness and brought to a climax in the deliverance at the sea, is provided.

If Yahweh is present, his people will be cared for; so there are accounts of guidance through a great and terrible wilderness, and stories of the provision of water and foodstuff in the form of the *manna and the quails. Because Yahweh is present, the enemies of his people must be bested; as a result, the Egyptian learned men are in due course frustrated, the Egyptians are humbled and despoiled, Pharaoh himself is defeated, and *Amalek is vanquished at Rephidim. Since Yahweh is present, his people should know that presence in a unique manner; hence, he prepares them and comes to them at Sinai/Horeb, having given them already through Moses his unique and descriptive name, a name suggesting his very nature as the "one who really is" (see Tetragrammaton). The presence of Yahweh realized can only mean a response of some kind; thus, Yahweh gives his guidance for life in his presence, in the Ten Commandments, and opens himself to his people in covenant with them. The direction of life in Yahweh's presence involves a concrete application of the broad principles of life in relationship with him; therefore the Ten Commandments are applied by a rambling collection of specific case provisions.

The living memory of Yahweh's proof of his presence to Israel is essential for the generations to come; thus, provision is made for the seasonal reenactment of event, in the ritual testimony of the requirement of the firstborn, the feast of unleavened bread, the feast of the *Passover, and perhaps even a covenant-renewal festival (see Exod. 19.4–6 and 24.3–8). (See Feasts and Festivals). A constant reminder of Yahweh present among his people is also important; hence, the lengthy and detailed chapters on the media of worship, media that symbolize the circles of nearness to Yahweh's presence in the *tabernacle of Israel's devotional life, moving from the primary symbol of Yahweh's presence, the *Ark in the holiest space, to the *altar of wholly consumed offerings in the circle of the outer court, the area of preparation for entry into Yahweh's presence in worship. The instructions for the creation of the media of worship (Exod. 25–31) are ended with the specification of the *Sabbath as a sign in perpetuity of relationship with Yahweh present. The narrative of the fulfillment of those instructions (Exod. 35–40) is begun with this emphasis on the Sabbath, and ended with an account of the settling of Yahweh's presence onto the place of worship erected in their midst. Thus, the theology of Yahweh present is asserted in the book of Exodus as a presence incarnate in both the worship and the life of Israel.

Appropriately, the extended sequence of symbol is interrupted, between instruction and fulfillment of instruction, by a narrative of disobedience and forgiveness that affords a context for still other motifs of the theology of coming and nearness. Israel's sin of the *golden calf is a fundamental violation of the covenant relationship, involving disobedience to at least the first two of the Ten Commandments. As a result, Israel falls under the threat of the cancellation of the gift of Yahweh's presence, in effect a negation of the remainder of the book of Exodus. In a narrative filled with tension, Israel is judged and forgiven, and Moses witnesses a unique revelation, by Yahweh, of his own nature and attitude (Exod. 34.6–7), a revelation that extends the earlier revelation of his unique name, at the time of Moses' call. It is a sequence that provides a setting for two additional symbols of Yahweh's nearness, the tent of promised presence (Exod. 33.7–11) and the shining face of Moses (Exod. 34.29–35).

In the book of Exodus, one is brought to the thematic beginning of the Bible. For in Exodus, the biblical story and its major themes are presented, in narrative, in symbol, in expectation, or in promise. The book that begins "And these are the names" ends with a declaration that the cloud of Yahweh's presence, filling the tabernacle, provided for all Israel a vision of Yahweh's nearness to them by day and by night. And there, given all that lies between that beginning and that ending, one is in the middle of a story that is unfolding still. JOHN I DURHAM

Exorcism. A belief in the existence of evil spirits or *demons and their ability both to cause disease and to take possession of people has been common to most societies. Side by side with such beliefs there has usually been a recognition of the power of certain individuals to exorcise such spirits, freeing the sufferer from their malign influence. Such concepts occur in the Bible, though relatively infrequently; they are almost entirely restricted to the accounts of the ministry of Jesus in the *synoptic Gospels.

There are no unequivocal examples of exorcism in the Hebrew Bible. *David's use of music to calm *Saul, who is described as being troubled by "an evil spirit from Yahweh" (1 Sam. 16.14–23), bears none of the characteristics of the later accounts of exorcism with their essential underlying component of a violent "casting out" of an evil spirit. Saul's behavior suggests a severe manic-depressive psychosis with marked paranoid overtones that gave rise to episodes of impulsive homicidal violence. Music could be expected to have a beneficial effect on the depression (1 Sam. 16.23), but not on the manic paranoia (1 Sam. 18.10–12).

In preexilic biblical traditions, the idea of *evil cosmic forces separate from, and over against, the rule of God is not prominent. By the first century CE, however, *Satan was generally viewed as ruler of the present age, having gained temporary control of the earth and holding sway over its kingdoms (a view reflected in the New Testament at Matt. 4.8–9; Luke 4.5–6; John 14.30; 2 Cor. 4.4; Eph. 6.12). This power was exercised in individual lives through demons, either in a general malevolent influence or by direct "possession." In the latter instance, the demon had to be "cast out," and thus exorcism became a dominant feature of first-century Judaism, with the professional exorcist having a recognized status. The *Pharisees apparently played a significant role as adepts in exorcisms, and there is a passing reference to this at Mark 12.27. The approach was strongly *magical, using invocations and spells (foreshadowed as early as Tobit 6.17–18). In later rabbinic literature and other sources, individual demons responsible for specific illnesses are named.

Exorcism was an undisputed feature of the ministry of Jesus. The various references in the synoptic Gospels are little more than vague and generalized comments about the healing ministry of Jesus, often being simply editorial link statements in the narrative. Six specific cases of exorcism are mentioned: the Capernaum demoniac (Mark 1.21–28 = Luke 4.31–37); the Gerasene demoniac (Mark 5.1–20 = Matt. 8.28–34 = Luke 8.26–39); the dumb demoniac (Matt. 9.32–33); the blind and dumb demoniac (Matt. 12.22); the Syrophoenician demoniac (Mark 7.24–30 = Matt. 15.21–28); the epileptic boy (Mark 9.14–29 = Matt. 17.14–21 = Luke 9.37–43). The evangelists seem to have been selective in their use of the terminology of exorcism, reserving it for conditions inexplicable for them in other ways and outside the general categories of illness that Jesus healed. Although clinical details are meager, there is suggestive evidence that the synoptic exorcisms were restricted to *epilepsy and the abnormal behavior patterns that occur in hysterical (dissociative) states.

Outside the synoptic Gospels, exorcism is mentioned only in Acts: twice in general terms (5.16 and 8.7) and twice of specific incidents (16.16–18 and 19.11–19). There are no further references in the New Testament; it is noteworthy that the Jesus of the Fourth Gospel is not an exorcist, nor does he come into contact with "possessed" people. It should also be noted that in none of the discussions of spiritual gifts in the Pauline correspondence is mention made of exorcism. A general gift of healing is recognized, but there is no suggestion that this includes exorcism. The synoptic tradition is unique in suggesting that Jesus gave the *twelve authority to exorcise, and this appears to have been limited to his lifetime (Mark 3.16 = Matt. 10.1, 8, and also Luke 9.1).

Exorcism in the Bible is thus essentially a feature of the synoptic Gospels in which it is presented as an eschatological activity of Jesus, either as evidence of the arrival of God's *kingdom or in preparation for its immediate appearance. His own explanation of the phenomenon, that he cast out demons through the spirit of God (Matt. 12.27–28; cf. Mark 3.28–30), underlines this, pointing to the arrival of the promised endtime and the power of that age. Outside the synoptic tradition, the New Testament sees Satan and his unclean spirits as decisively and finally defeated in the Easter event (e.g., Col. 2.15).

Ezekiel, the Book of.

Author. The book of Ezekiel tells relatively little that is explicit concerning the figure for whom it is named, and apart from brief references in Sirach (49.8–9) and 4 Maccabees (18.17) he is not mentioned by name elsewhere in the Bible. Ezekiel, whose name means "God strengthens," was of priestly lineage, son of Buzi (1.3). Along with other Judeans, he suffered deportation to *Babylon following the surrender of Jehoiachin in 598/597 BCE (1.1; cf. 2 Kings 24.12–16). Ezekiel received his prophetic calling in Babylon in 593 (1.1); his age at the time is not recorded. It is disputed whether some or even all of Ezekiel's ministry actually took place in *Jerusalem rather than in Babylonia, as various of his words could suggest. According to the book's dates, he continued to receive divine communications until at least 571 (29.17). Nothing is mentioned in the Bible concerning the circumstances of his death; much later tradition states that he was murdered by one of the leaders of the exiles whose idolatry he had denounced, and that he was buried near Babylon.

Unlike his near contemporary *Jeremiah, Ezekiel appears as an outwardly stoical, highly self-controlled and somewhat passive personality, who, for example, follows without demur Yahweh's directive not to mourn the death of his beloved wife (24.15–18). On occasion, however, he does venture a protest or appeal in the face of what is communicated to him (4.14; 9.8; 11.13). It is likewise clear that Ezekiel's call to herald Judah's doom caused him profound distress (3.14–15). The response to Ezekiel's message seems to have been much less overtly hostile than was true in the case of Jeremiah. In fact, there are several references to his being respectfully consulted by the leaders of the exiles (8.1; 14.1; 20.1). Finally, the content of Ezekiel's book reveals him as a man of wide learning.

Arrangement/Divisions. The individual units of Ezekiel's material have been arranged in their present sequence on the basis of considerations of chronology and content. First of all, more so than with any other prophetic book, there seems to have been a concern with giving the dated texts of Ezekiel—there are some fifteen of these—in their correct chronological order; only twice does a deviation occur (29.1; 29.17). The materials, however, are grouped by content into three large-scale segments. Words of doom against Judah/Jerusalem are concentrated at the beginning of the book (chaps. 1–24); oracles against various foreign nations follow (chaps. 25–32); and texts concerning the eventual restoration of Yahweh's people predominate in the concluding segment (chaps. 33–48). The intention behind this sequencing (which can be seen also in the book of *Zephaniah, Isaiah 1–35, and the *Septuagint text of Jeremiah) is for the book to culminate on an upbeat note. This principle of arrangement, however, is not followed with complete consistency; chaps. 1–24 contain promises of salvation (e.g., 17.22–24), while an oracle against *Edom (chap. 35) stands with the concluding segment (chaps. 33–48).

Within each of these three major divisions, one may readily identify various distinct blocks of material. Within chaps. 1–24, the vision sequences of 1.1–3.27 and 8.11–11.25 stand out. In chaps. 25–32, brief oracles against Judah's near neighbors (chap. 25) are followed by extensive discourses of doom concerning Tyre (chaps. 26–28) and *Egypt (chaps. 29–32). The final segment, chaps. 33–48, comprises a series of generalized promises of Jewish revival (chaps. 34–37) and a detailed blueprint for the reconstruction of the cult (chaps. 40–48), with chap. 33 serving as transition from what precedes and the *Gog oracles (chaps. 38–39) as a kind of interlude.

Literary Features. As a piece of writing, the book of Ezekiel presents a variety of noteworthy peculiarities, four of which are singled out here. First, certain fixed expressions, which are either unique to Ezekiel or especially favored by him in the Bible as a whole, recur repeatedly, thereby unifying the book terminologically. Examples include "*son of man" (NRSV: "mortal") as a title/address for the prophet (roughly one hundred occurrences: 2.1; etc.); "rebellious house" (twelve times: 2.5; etc.); "to execute judgments on" (nine times: 5.10; etc.); "set your face toward/against" (nine times: 6.2; etc.); "and they/you shall know that I am the Lord" (about fifty times: 6.7; etc.); "to bear disgrace" (eleven times: 16.52; etc.). Second, in articulating its message, the book makes use of a rich variety of literary forms: vision accounts (e.g., 37.1–14), sign narratives (e.g., 12.1–11), allegories (e.g., 17.1–24), laments (e.g., 27.1–36), judgment speeches (e.g., 13.1–23), salvation oracles (e.g., 36.37–38), disputations (e.g., 33.10–20), legal prescriptions (e.g., 44.15–31). Frequently, too, Ezekiel's literary forms are complex entities, incorporating into themselves a number of subgenres; see, for example, chap. 17, an allegory that contains both a judgment speech (17.15–21) and a salvation oracle (17.22–24). Third, Ezekiel's style evidences a consistent tendency toward prolixity and a graphic excess in the handling of traditional imagery; see, for example, his treatment of the conjugal metaphor for Israel's relation to Yahweh in chaps. 16, 20, and 23. Last, in its heavy use of metaphorical language and avoidance of proper names for contemporary figures (curiously, "Ezekiel" occurs only twice: 1.1; 24.24), the book makes a somewhat disembodied impression. Accordingly, it is not surprising that both the locality of the prophet's ministry and the date of the book's composition—it has been dated variously from the age of Manasseh in the mid-seventh century BCE to the Hellenistic period—have long been controverted.

Theology. Ezekiel's God is above all a "holy" being (36.23), that is, one who utterly transcends human comprehension, manipulation, and calculation. This quality of Yahweh finds manifold expression throughout the book. Ezekiel refrains from any direct claims to have seen the deity (see 1.26–28; cf. Isa. 6.1). Yahweh remains free to rebuff human inquiries (14.3; 20.3); he can void the schemes of practitioners of magic (13.20–23). The movements and fates of the great world powers, such as Babylon (29.20) and Gog (38.2–3), are just as much under his control as is the destiny of Israel itself. Yahweh has the capacity to manifest himself outside the land of Israel (1.1); he is able to withdraw his presence from the *Temple (11.23), and later to return there as he wills (43.1–4). He acts, unconstrained by any human claim, for his own purposes (36.22).

At the same time, however, the holy Yahweh is also a God who has freely but passionately and irrevocably committed himself to the people of Israel. Like *Hosea and Jeremiah, Ezekiel develops this dimension of Yahweh's being and activity by using conjugal imagery (chaps. 16; 20; 23). Yahweh carefully and tenderly nourished the cast-off child Israel as his future bride (16.3–14). At present, he is punishing her for her persistent infidelities, but ultimately he will not abandon his spouse to her misery and sinfulness. Rather, he will restore her prosperity and give her the inner capacity to live in faithfulness to him (see, e.g., 36.26–30). In all of this, the transcendent God is intimately and continuously involved in human history, to the end that, finally, both Israel and the nations will know him as the sole, truly efficacious deity (39.22–23, 28).

Anthropology. Ezekiel's anthropology is characterized by an underlying unresolved tension. On the one hand, he is the Hebrew Bible's great advocate of individual responsibility (18.1–32). Ezekiel is likewise commissioned precisely in order to summon his hearers to conscious decision about their behavior options (3.16–21; 33.7–16). On the other hand, however, Ezekiel's words disclose an overwhelming pessimism concerning the people's capacity ever to choose rightly. For him, unlike Hosea (3.15) and Jeremiah (2.2–3), there never was a honeymoon period in Israel's relation to Yahweh. Already during her time in Egypt (16.26; 20.8), as well as ever since, Israel has consistently chosen other gods in preference to Yahweh. Judah learned nothing from Yahweh's punishment of the northern kingdom, only redoubling her own *idolatry in the face of that experience (23.11). Although Ezekiel's hearers may not actively persecute him, neither do they give much attention to his warnings (12.26; 20.49; 33.20–33). Such circumstances suggest that the exhortations Ezekiel is sent to deliver are futile (2.7); what is needed, rather, is a direct intervention by Yahweh that will produce a transformed, obedient heart in his people (11.18–19; 36.26–27). Ultimately, like so many theologians after him, Ezekiel is left affirming both realities, human freedom and divine *grace, without being fully able to account for their interplay.

Biblical Affinities. The book of Ezekiel manifests significant links with a wide range of other biblical traditions. Ezekiel is familiar with the *creation myths incorporated into the primeval history of *Genesis (29.16; 31.8–9; 36.35). From the historical traditions of Israel, he cites the figures of *Abraham (33.24), *Jacob (37.25), and *David (34.23; 37.24). In common with Deuteronomic tradition, he emphasizes the centrality of the *Law, its observance, and especially its nonobservance, in the unfolding of the Yahweh-Israel relationship. His affinities with the Priestly (*P) material of the *Pentateuch, above all the "Holiness Code" (Lev. 17–26), both in content and phraseology, are especially marked; compare, for example, Ezekiel 44.22 with Leviticus 21.7, 13–15, and Ezekiel 44.25–27 with Leviticus 21.1–3. Similarly, Ezekiel displays many similarities with the teachings of the contemporary prophetic figures Jeremiah and Second *Isaiah, including marital imagery, hopes for an inner transformation of the people, renewal of their *covenant with Yahweh, and recognition by the nations of Yahweh's sole deity (see Monotheism). The elaborateness of the accounts of his vision and the cosmic terms in which he describes God's interventions against the enemies of his people (32.7–8; 38.19–22) anticipate later *apocalyptic writing.

The book of Ezekiel is cited directly in the New Testament only rarely; see, for example, 2 Corinthians 6.16 = Ezekiel 37.27. On the other hand, its imagery often provides a point of departure for presentations of various New Testament authors, such as the allusions to Ezekiel 34 in Jesus' contrasting of himself as good shepherd with the Jewish leadership (John 10), and the use in Revelation 22.1–2 of Ezekiel 47.1–12, which describes elements of the vision of water from the temple. Thus, the book of Ezekiel, which itself brings together so many earlier streams of tradition, came to serve as a source of still more comprehensive literary and theological developments in early Christian writing.

Ezra, The Book of. At an early stage, the books of Ezra and *Nehemiah were regarded as a unity. From the time of Origen (third century CE), they were divided as we have them today.

Historical Background. Ezra 1–6 describes the return of the Jews to *Jerusalem under Sheshbazzar (539 BCE) and the initial attempts to rebuild the *Temple; their efforts, however, were frustrated by their enemies. Later, *Zerubbabel, influenced by the prophets *Haggai and *Zechariah, resumed the building of the Temple with the permission of the Persian king, *Darius. The Temple was completed in 515 BCE.

Ezra 7–10 describes a much later situation, and tells of the return of Ezra and a certain group of Jews to Judah in the time of the Persian king Artaxerxes (presumably Artaxerxes I, 465–424 BCE). According to Ezra 7.7, this happened in the seventh year of Artaxerxes (458 BCE). However, in view of disturbed conditions early in his reign, scholars have found this reference to royal permission for the return exceedingly difficult to accept. Another problem arises with the memoir of Nehemiah, in which Ezra and his important religious activities are totally ignored. It is certainly difficult to explain why Ezra and Nehemiah, if they were contemporaries, would avoid mention of each other almost completely in their memoirs (see Nehemiah, The Book of). Scholars have proposed various solutions to this problem. Some have pointed out that with only a slight emendation in Ezra 7.7, where "thirty" may have fallen out as a result of haplography, one can read the "thirty-seventh" year of Artaxerxes I. Thus, Ezra would have accompanied Nehemiah on his second visit to Jerusalem about 428 BCE; this solves some of the problems created by the traditional date of 458 BCE. Other scholars, assuming that the activities of Ezra and Nehemiah must be totally separated, have held that "in the seventh year of Artaxerxes" refers to Artaxerxes II (404–359/358 BCE), which brings us to 398 BCE. However, the traditional view, that Ezra arrived in 458 BCE, is still held by a number of modern scholars. In such a case, it is likely that Ezra's initial visit to Jerusalem was only a few months long. It is possible that he later returned to Jerusalem, but particulars about this are vague. Thus, it appears that the book of Ezra describes the history of certain Jews from 539 to 516 BCE and for a short period in 458 BCE.

This description, however, presents several problems: either the author assumed too much knowledge of certain events on the part of readers, or he himself was uncertain how events developed. One problem involves the role played by Sheshbazzar during the initial return, and his relationship to Zerubbabel. At a certain stage, Sheshbazzar completely vanishes from the sources; what happened to him? No satisfactory reply can be given, and some scholars identify him with Zerubbabel. But the root of this problem lies in the nature of the author's concerns. He is interested not in giving a full account of the life and acts of individuals but in the role that God played in Jewish history, namely, in allowing the people to return to Judah where they rebuilt the Temple. Another problem involves Zerubbabel: like Sheshbazzar, he simply vanishes from the sources. Yet, that he and the high priest Jeshua were active in the second attempt to rebuild the Temple is testified also by the books of Haggai and Zechariah (in both of which Jeshua is called Joshua); Zerubbabel was instrumental in obtaining permission from Darius to continue building, but in the description of the inauguration of the Temple, no mention is made of Zerubbabel. Since the sources imply that at a certain stage Zerubbabel may have been tempted to regard himself as a messiah-king, some assume that he was forcefully removed by the Persians. Yet another problem involves the return of the exiles. Did a large number return with Sheshbazzar, or did various groups return on different occasions? Is the list in Ezra 2 (cf. Neh. 7) representative of one such group of those returning, or is it a list of several groups over a long period? Although there are indications that the list is made up from several groups, one cannot be certain.

It is clear from chaps. 7–10 that Ezra was dispatched by the Persian king Artaxerxes to Jerusalem to establish the Israelite law (*Torah) among the Jews. A number of exiles returned with Ezra, a kind of ideal group consisting of, among others, *priests and *Levites. To his dismay, Ezra discovered that there had been intermarriage with the neighboring nations, and he ordered all foreign wives to be repudiated, so as to keep the religion of Jews pure of contamination by the worship of different gods.

From a historical perspective, the book of Ezra starts with the hegemony of a new imperial force in the ancient Near East, namely the domination of the *Persians under *Cyrus. The Persians' tolerance in religious matters is well known. The book of Ezra begins with Cyrus's decree allowing the Jews to restore their sanctuary in order to serve their God according to their prescribed laws. After Cyrus, there is a lapse of time until the description of the chaotic circumstances that took place just before *Darius I assumed full control. It was at this stage that Zerubbabel and his compatriots started in earnest to rebuild the Temple. When Darius had gained firm control in 520–519 BCE, he granted the Jews the right, according to Cyrus's decree, to continue their building activities. This culminates in the dedication of the Temple in 515 BCE.

In 458 BCE, Artaxerxes I gave permission to Ezra and certain Jews to return to Judah; this was not without political motives, for in 460 BCE a revolt had broken out in Egypt under Inarus against the Persians. Pericles, the Athenian leader who had first decided to attack Cyprus, changed his plans and assisted the Egyptians against the Persians. In 460 and 459 BCE the rebels, with the aid of the Athenians, succeeded against the Persians. The latter kept only a small strip of land under their control, but they bribed the Spartans to start a war against the Athenians. In 458, the Persian general and satrap, Megabyzus, was fighting a successful war against the Egyptians, who were subdued in 456 BCE. It was thus expedient for Artaxerxes to send Ezra out in all goodwill to the Jews so that Judah, so close to the border of Egypt, could be pacified.

Author, Composition, and Sources. The authorship of the book is difficult to determine. No doubt various persons worked on it during its long history of transmission before it reached its present form. Most scholars accept that the Chronicler (see Chronicles, The Books of) is responsible for the final form of the book of Ezra, for the history of Israel is not concluded at the end of 2 Chronicles (36.22–23), but continues into Ezra 1. The Chronicler is thus, from this viewpoint, responsible for editing Ezra and the commentary on the sources that he incorporated into the book.

Other scholars have held that Ezra was written and edited by an author quite different from the Chronicler, one who held a different ideology. It is true that the book of Ezra expresses some religious ideas not shared by the Chronicler. One's assessment, however, depends on how thoroughly the Chronicler edited his materials. It is probable that he did not radically change the view represented in his sources, and that this explains the differences. Although we cannot be certain, it seems likely that in the fourth century BCE the book of Ezra was edited by a later Chronicler.

In any case, it is obvious that the author of the book of Ezra used various sources and put them in chronological order. In Ezra 1–6, various documents are quoted or summarized in the final author's own words. Some of these documents are of Persian origin. Until recently, most scholars rejected the authenticity of these Persian documents, because, it was thought, no Persian king would be interested in finer details of the Jews' religious activities. However, extrabiblical texts have been discovered that show the special interest of Persian authorities in their subjects' religious activities; the edict of Cambyses on the sanctuary of Neith in Egypt and the Passover papyrus from Elephantine in Egypt are two examples. Like the Elephantine papyri, some of the official documents in Ezra are written in Imperial *Aramaic with a number of Persian loanwords. Imperial Aramaic was at that stage the chancellery language of the Persian empire. The greatest majority of Persian loanwords occur in these documents and must be regarded as a further proof of the documents' authenticity. The use of Aramaic in Ezra is not restricted to these documents, however; Ezra 4.8–6.18 and 7.12–26 are in Aramaic, providing further evidence of the book's complicated literary history.

An important source in Ezra 7–10 is the Ezra memoir, written in the first person with some parts in the third person. It is probable that we have here an actual memoir used by the Chronicler. In the sections using the first person, the Chronicler has quoted from the memoir, and in those parts using the third person he has rendered it in his own words. Scholars have pointed out that the language and style of the first-person and third-person sections are similar, and that both are in the common language of the postexilic period.

We may conclude that the book of Ezra was compiled in its present form by the later Chronicler in the fourth century BCE. All indications are that the sources used for this compilation were carefully selected and edited.

Theology. In the book of Ezra, typical religious conceptions of the postexilic period predominate. The Chronicler has not changed conceptions of Ezra to agree with his own, and this is why certain differences between the conceptions of the Chronicler and Ezra can be discerned. In the first place, the role of Yahweh as the God of history is emphasized. This is a common characteristic of Jewish thought in postexilic times. Yahweh is God not only of the Jews, but also of the whole world. He can move the heart of a mighty Persian king in favor of his own people (Ezra 9.8–9). Also, the book of Ezra clearly displays a sense of guilt for sins committed in the past by Israel. In Ezra 9.6, the Israelites' sins and guilt are represented as mounting higher than their heads and even as reaching up to heaven. This view is not present in the work of the Chronicler, but it is discernible in the work of the *Deuteronomic school. Finally, heavy emphasis is laid on the observance of the law of God. The recording of legal stipulations started before the *exile, but it was a continuous process that lasted into the time of Ezra and even later. The law was used by Ezra as a new platform to discipline the Jewish people and give them something tangible to cling to in times of distress.

Faith. In the Hebrew Bible, forms of the noun 'ĕmûnâ or the verb 'mn are usually translated as "faith" or "having faith/believing." Such faith can be expressed toward God (Jon. 3.5), toward a human being (Exod. 4.1–9), or toward both: "So the people feared the Lord and believed in the Lord and in his servant Moses" (Exod. 14.31). The terms are also used to express adherence to an idea or a set of principles, "I believe in your commandments" (Ps. 119.66).

There are other ways of expressing this kind of regard for or confidence in someone or something. In fact, forms of the verb bth are much more frequent in the Hebrew Bible but are usually translated "to trust" rather than "to have faith/believe." This difference can be explained on the basis of semantic development, but there are some instances where the meanings are very close. "He [Hezekiah] trusted in the Lord, the God of Israel" (2 Kings 18.5).

One of the best-known instances of faith in the Bible concerns Abram (*Abraham), who asks how God would make of him a great nation when he was old and his wife was sterile. The Lord asserts that Abraham will indeed have offspring that will be as numerous as the stars in the sky. In response to this promise and against all tangible evidence, Abram has faith in God and is considered to be a righteous person (Gen. 15.6; NJV: "he put his trust in the Lord").

Abram's willingness to trust God in this and other situations makes him a primary example of the biblical concept of faith. His willingness to believe and to obey God is the fulfillment of the *covenant that God had made with him. Throughout the Hebrew Bible, Abraham's descendants struggle with the issue of how to continue as a faithful people. The Psalms rejoice in the faithfulness of God (Pss. 31.5; 111.7) but lament the lack of faith shown by the people (Ps. 78.8). Isaiah warns the people, "If you do not stand firm in faith you shall not stand at all" (Isa. 7.8), and Habakkuk states that "the righteous live by their faith" (2.4).

The Greek translation of the Hebrew Bible, the *Septuagint, usually translates the 'mn family of words with a form of the Greek word pisteuein, "to trust" or "to believe/have faith." This same family of words is used frequently in the New Testament. The author of the letter to the *Hebrews defines faith as "the assurance of things hoped for, the conviction of things not seen" (11.1) and then goes on to list the great deeds that the people of Israel had accomplished "by faith" (11.4–40).

*Paul also makes use of images of faith from the Bible, especially the faith of Abraham. In the process of justifying the mission to the *gentiles, Paul argues that Abraham was said to be righteous by having faith in God before he was *circumcised and therefore is the father of the gentiles who believe, as well as of the Jews (Rom. 4; Gal. 3).

The actual content of faith—what is believed—is described in different ways in Paul's letters. In *Romans, *righteousness will be credited to those who have faith in God who raised Jesus (Rom. 4.24) and those who believe in their hearts that God raised Jesus from the dead will be saved (Rom. 10.9). Elsewhere Paul refers to believing "in Christ Jesus" (Gal. 2.16), but it can be argued that this is an abbreviation for "faith in God who raised Jesus."

Several times Paul refers to faith with a grammatical construction that can be interpreted either as "faith in Christ" or "faith of Christ" (Gal. 2.16, 20; 3.22; Rom. 3.22, 26; Phil. 3.9). Scholarly debate centers on whether Jesus is referred to in the first sense as the object of faith or in the second as an example of faith. The NRSV translation includes footnotes that offer the latter reading as an alternative. It has also been suggested that Paul is being intentionally ambiguous with the construction, leaving both possibilities open. In this case it is interesting to note that later documents tend to specify "faith in Christ," eliminating the possibility for ambiguity (e.g., 1 Tim. 3.13; Acts 20.21).

In the *synoptic Gospels faith is the operative factor in many of Jesus' *miracles. Jesus is impressed by the faith of the centurion and so heals his son (Matt. 8.5–13 par.). Jesus marvels at the faith of those who brought the paralytic man (Matt. 9.1–8 par.) and tells the woman with a hemorrhage that her faith has made her well (Matt. 9.20–22 par.). When Jesus tells the father of a demon-possessed boy that "all things are possible to the one who believes/has faith," the man responds "I believe; help my unbelief" (Mark 9.23–24).

John's gospel emphasizes having faith (always in the verbal form) throughout and states its purpose as leading people to believe that Jesus is the *Messiah, the *Son of God (John 20.31).

"The faith" as a descriptive term for Christianity is found most clearly in *Acts and the Deutero-Pauline material (e.g., Acts 6.7; 1 Tim. 4.1).

Fall, The. The Fall refers to the disobedience and the expulsion of *Adam and *Eve from the garden of *Eden. According to the *J account of *creation (Gen. 2–3), humanity—represented by Adam and Eve—initially enjoyed a life of ease and intimacy with God, but their desire to become "like gods" (Gen 3.5) led them to disobey God's prohibition against eating from the tree of knowledge. They were punished with expulsion from *paradise and condemned to a life of *suffering that was passed on to their descendants.

The biblical myth of the Fall is similar to other legends that contrast humanity's present state of suffering with an earlier time of perfection, a lost paradise or golden age. The biblical narrative is unique, however, in implying that humanity's degradation was indirectly caused by its own free choice.

The fall of divine beings played a central role in the writings of the *gnostics (second and third centuries CE), many of whom believed that creation and even human existence were caused by a precosmic error. According to the gnostics, the physical cosmos was a concrete nightmare from which the divine sparks of humanity sought to escape.

In the New Testament Paul explained that Adam, the man of flesh, brought sin and death to the world while Christ, the second Adam and the man of spirit, brought life (1 Cor., 15.21–22). Paul's view that Adam's fall introduced sin and death (Rom. 5.12) led Augustine (fifth century CE) to develop the doctrine of original sin: that Adam's fall perverted all humanity and that its effects were passed by hereditary transmission from generation to generation. The belief that Adam, as a corporate personality, was responsible for the sins of humanity was never adopted by Judaism and was resisted by Christian thinkers such as Pelagius and Julian of Eclanum (fifth century CE), but Augustine's interpretation of the Fall became the accepted doctrine of Catholic Christianity. Like all myths of a lost paradise or golden age, the story of the Fall, whether of gods or humans, is an index of humanity's yearning for a better world and an attempt to account for the problems of *evil and human suffering.

Family. The family in ancient Israel was a fluid and open community. The most common Hebrew terms (mišpāḥâ and bêt, "house") can designate the single household unit, the wider circle of consanguinity (Gen. 24.38), the clan, the tribe, and the nation (Amos 3.1–2). This concentric usage suggests the role of the basic family in shaping the larger community. Significantly, the *Passover, Israel's foundational ritual, was essentially a family celebration (Exod. 12.3–4, 26–27).

The basis of the family is *marriage, understood as a *covenant between the husband and wife (Prov. 2.17; Mal. 2.14). Although some texts imply a monogamous relationship (Gen. 2.18, 22–24), at least in earlier periods polygamy was an accepted practice (Deut. 21.15; 1 Sam. 1.2; 1 Kings 11.1–6), enlarging the scope of the family. And in a broader sense, the extended family included other relatives (grandparents, grandchildren, siblings) as well as slaves, servants, and resident foreigners (Gen 17.23; 46.5–7, 26–27; Exod. 20.10; Judg. 9.1).

In the extended family (the "house of the father," Hebr. bêt 'āb), the authority of the father was the strongest cohesive force. He arranged marriages for his children, generally within the clan (Gen 24.1–9; Deut. 7.3; Neh. 13.23–25). His patriarchal power might require drastic action against worshipers of other gods (Deut. 13.6–11). Nevertheless, the fifth commandment demanded "honor" for mother as well as father (Exod. 20.12)—perhaps very pertinent in a family that included adult offspring—and the book of Proverbs teaches the respect due equally to each parent (1.8; 6.20; 10.1; 15.20).

The family provided one of the most commonly used analogies for the relationship between Israel and God, as father (Exod. 4.22; Ps. 103.13; Prov. 3.12; Jer. 31.9; Hos. 11.1–4), and also as mother (Isa. 66.3) (see Metaphors).

In the New Testament, oikia ("house, household") is the ordinary word for family, although patria (from patēr, "father") is also used. Disobedience to parents is a sin (Rom. 1.30; 2 Tim. 3.2; see Ethical Lists), and caring for one's family is strongly inculcated (1 Tim. 3.4–5; 2 Tim. 1.5). Yet in the teaching of *Jesus, his followers must give no more than second place to even the closest family ties (Matt. 19.29; Luke 14.26); the true family of Jesus are those who do his father's will (Matt. 12.46–50 par.; cf. Luke 2.48–49).

The primary use of the word oikia is in reference to the *church. The solidarity of the family as the building block of the spiritual family of God is evident in "household" conversions and baptisms (John 4.53; Acts 11.14; 16.15, 31–34). Not only is the whole church the household of God (Eph. 2.19; 1 Tim. 3.15; 1 Pet. 4.17), but also most early Christian congregations were family or house churches, meeting in domestic buildings and led by the householders, including women and husband-and-wife joint leaders (Acts 2.46; Rom. 16.3–5; 1 Cor. 16.15, 19; Philem. 1–2). This helps explain the prominence given in the New Testament to appropriate relations between individuals in the family, including masters and slaves (Eph. 5.21–6.9; Col. 3.18–4.1; 1 Tim. 5.4, 8, 9–16; Philem. 15–16; 1 Pet. 2.18–3.7). The letters in particular are full of metaphors drawn from family life, such as childhood, adoption, sonship, and inheritance (Eph. 3.15; 1 Tim.5.1–2; Philem. 10).

Family Bible. A product of early modern Europe still in use today, a family Bible is any edition of the Bible that includes manuscript records of genealogical and other personal information specific to the owners of the book over several generations. It also symbolically associates the scriptures with the ideal of the Christian family, an association that began in the Reformation, was perfected by seventeenth-century English Puritans and German Pietists, and was furthered by eighteenth-century Anglo-American evangelicals.

Through the medieval period the costly process of copying manuscripts restricted private ownership of the Bible to only the most wealthy families. Between 1450 and 1600, however, the invention of *printing and the Reformation's vernacular *translations made it possible for many families to acquire and to read the Bible. Both Protestant and Catholic reforming theologies, moreover, emphasized biblical *authority and required a greatly increased knowledge of the Bible by the laity. So the newly available vernacular Bibles soon became objects of special veneration in which facts of family history might appropriately be inscribed.

In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, Puritan, Pietist, and evangelical Protestants prescribed ambitious programs of doctrinal catechesis and devotional prayer for family members. The family was viewed as a spiritual commonwealth in which parents were covenantally obligated to transmit the faith to their children. Popular devotional manuals like Philip Doddridge's On the Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul (1745) recommended family prayer and parental exposition of the scriptures every morning and evening. This new physical presence and spiritual authority of the scriptures in daily household rituals encouraged pious families to record the events of their lives—births, baptisms, conversions, confirmations, marriages, deaths—on the pages of their Bibles.

In the nineteenth century the enormous success of the evangelical movement, especially in Victorian Anglo-America, fashioned the Bible into a cultural icon of spiritual identity, biological continuity, and family prosperity. Since 1800 virtually every English translation of the Bible has been published in a special family edition, with commemorative pages dedicated to genealogy, marriages, births, and family history, and with ornamental bindings designed for prominent display in the home. The custom of keeping a family Bible continues to be observed, especially among evangelical Protestants in the United States.

Family Bibles serve scholars as unique sources for social and religious history, but their spiritual and emotional significance was well captured by an anonymous American evangelical poet, whose popular hymn, "The Family Bible," first appeared in The Young Christian's Companion (1826):

How painfully pleasing the fond recollection
Of youthful connection and innocent joy, While blessed with parental advice and affection,

Surrounded with mercy and peace from on high.
I still view the chairs of my father and mother,
The seats of their offspring, as ranged on each hand,
And the richest of books, which excels ev'ry other,
The family bible that stood on the stand.

Fasting. Fasting in connection with prayer, penitence, and preparation for new ventures has been practiced from early times in many cultures and religions. The Bible recognizes it as regular in *mourning for the dead (1 Sam. 31.13), expressions of penitence (Neh. 9.1), intercession (2 Sam. 12.16), and *prayer for God's aid (Judg. 20.26). Fasting was undertaken for personal reasons (Ps. 25.13), as a national act in the face of calamity (Joel 2.15), or as a periodic liturgical observance (Zech. 8.19); normally it involved abstinence from all food to show dependence on God and submission to his will. The great national and liturgical fast was that of the *Day of Atonement (Lev. 16.29–34), but fasting was generally recognized, especially after the *exile, as a meritorious pious practice and as a potent aid to prayer (Tob. 12.8; Luke 2.37). Later, the author of Isaiah 58 claimed that if fasting was to be of value, it must be accompanied by compassion and a concern for social justice.

Jesus accepted fasting as a natural discipline, and he is described (Matt. 4.2) as deliberately fasting before his *temptation and the start of his ministry, similar to the action of Moses (Exod. 24.28). Jesus' disciples, in contrast to the disciples of *John the Baptist and those of the *Pharisees, appear not to have fasted (Mark 2.18–19): they were in the presence of "the bridegroom," a parabolic reference to the *Messiah, so that fasting was inappropriate. But v. 20 envisages a time of fasting "when the bridegroom is taken away from them"; this verse was probably a creation of the evangelist to justify the church's custom of fasting on Good Friday. Certainly, fasting was regularly observed in early Christianity, and Mark 9.29 (NRSV margin) shows how copyists reflected the commonly held view of the connection between fasting and prayer.

In Acts 9.9, Paul is described as fasting before his baptism, and this became the usual practice from very early times (Didache 7.4; Justin Apol. 1.61; Tertullian Bapt. 20), both for the candidates for baptism and for other members of the church. As *baptism was normally celebrated at *Easter, this prebaptismal fast was probably the origin of the Lenten fast, which lasted forty days in the time of Cyril of Jerusalem (late fourth century CE), corresponding to the length of Jesus' fast at the start of his ministry.

Fear. Throughout the Bible, references to fear occur in nonreligious as well as in religious contexts, with two distinct areas of meaning. The first involves emotional distress and alarm with intense concern for impending danger or evil. Thus, the Gibeonites excused themselves before Joshua saying, "We were in great fear for our lives" (Josh. 9.24). In Genesis 9.2, animals are said to be afraid of people. The signs accompanying the coming of the *Son of Man are said in Luke 21.26 to cause people to faint with fear.

The other area of meaning relates to allegiance to and regard for deity. Among the many expressions in the Bible for worshiping God are some metaphors pertaining to fear. These focus upon *worship as an event of profound respect with the implication of awe. In Job 15.4, Eliphaz reprimands Job saying, "But you are doing away with the fear of God." The fear of God involves worshiping the Lord with deep respect and devotion. It is a religious expression and as such implies obedience, love, and trust; see, for example, Deuteronomy 10.12–13. "People who feared God" became an expression for the truly religious (Mal. 3.16; Luke 18.2; Acts 10.22). Closely related is the expression "the Fear of Isaac" (Gen 31.42), an epithet for God, meaning "the one whom Isaac worships" (see Names of God in the Hebrew Bible).

The phrase "fear and trembling" expresses the same two areas of meaning denoted by fear. In Psalm 55.5 and Mark 5.33, the phrase expresses great emotional distress, while in Psalm 2.11 and Philippians 2.12 the phrase signifies religious devotion.

Feasts and Festivals. Sacred feasts and festivals punctuated the calendar of ancient Israel. New moons were a function of a lunar system in which the month functioned as the basic unit for measuring *time. The Pesaḥ festival (*Passover) in the spring, on which unleavened bread was eaten, was historical in character, a commemoration of the *Exodus from Egypt. By contrast, the spring and autumn harvest festivals were seasonal celebrations linked to the agricultural economy of ancient Israel. All three annual festivals were occasions for pilgrimage (Hebr. ḥag).

How feasts and new moons were celebrated depended in great measure on where *sacrifices could be offered. Israelites seeking to celebrate these occasions fully were required to do so at a proper cult site, in other words, to undertake a pilgrimage to an altar (bāmâ) or temple. The Bible records a protracted movement toward cult centralization and the elimination of all local and regional cult sites. The doctrine that all sacrifice should be restricted to a central temple was to have serious practical implications for the scheduling of pilgrimage festivals and all occasions when sacrifices were offered.

In 622 BCE King *Josiah of Judah issued a series of edicts, recorded in 2 Kings 22–23, forbidding all sacrificial worship outside the Temple of Jerusalem. Deuteronomy 12 restricts the offering of sacrifice to a single cult place (māqôm) to be selected by the God of Israel. It has recently been argued that the policy of cult centralization originated in the northern Israelite kingdom of the mid- to late-eighth century BCE before its fall to the Assyrians in 722 BCE. The Judean king *Hezekiah had attempted to implement this policy (2 Kings 18.3–4,22), but since he was succeeded by *Manasseh, the heterodox king who ruled throughout most of the seventh century BCE, no progress was made in eliminating the bāmôt before the time of Josiah. A young king who had returned to the Lord sincerely (2 Kings 23.25), Josiah acted effectively to eliminate places of worship throughout the land.

It is logical, therefore, to conclude that most of the significant changes in the celebration of Israelite festivals went into effect only after Josiah's edicts were promulgated and that most of them were heralded in Deuteronomy. Some scholars dispute this reconstruction, however, and date the priestly codes (*P), which reflect basic changes in worship, to an earlier period.

The New Moon. The new moon (1 Sam. 20.5, 18; 2 Kings 4.23; Isa. 1.13; Hos. 2.11) is sometimes referred to as "the head of the month" (Num. 28.11; etc.). By all indications, the celebration of the new moon was an important occasion in biblical times. This importance may have diminished in time, since the growing importance of the *Sabbath eventually reduced reliance on the lunar calendar, introducing the week as a unit of time.

The account in 1 Samuel 20, set in the early monarchy, suggests that the new moon was the occasion of a sacred feast (zebaḥ) celebrated by the family. Fixing the precise time of the moon's "birth" was necessary for scheduling the festivals, whose dates are formulated as numbered days of the month. According to priestly law (Num. 28.11–15), the new moon was to be celebrated in the public cult by a triad of sacrifices—the burnt offering, the grain offering, and the libation, preceded by the purificatory sin offering. The new moon of the seventh month, in the early autumn (Tishrei), enjoyed special status because it heralded the autumn ingathering festival, the main pilgrimage festival of the year (Lev. 23.23–25; Num. 29.1–16; Ps. 81.3). On that new moon, the ram's horn was sounded to announce the autumn pilgrimage. In later Judaism, the new moon of the seventh month became Ro'sh ha-Shanah, the Jewish New Year.

The Festival of Unleavened Bread and the Passover. The first pilgrimage festival in the spring commemorated the Exodus from Egypt. In the Book of the Covenant, the earliest of the law codes in the Torah, this festival is called "the pilgrimage festival of unleavened bread" (ḥag hammaṣṣôt; Exod. 23.15). It is preceded on the eve of the festival by the "paschal sacrifice" ([zebaḥ] pesaḥ; Exod. 12.21–13.10).

This festival began on the new moon of the month of ripening grain ears (ʾābîb) and lasted seven days, during which only unleavened bread was to be eaten (see Leaven). The pilgrimage occurred on the seventh day. On the eve of the first day the paschal sacrifice, consisting of a lamb, was offered by the family near its home. According to Exodus 12.8–9, it was roasted whole over an open fire, a practice still followed by the *Samaritans. Blood from the sacrifice was poured on the threshold and then spattered on the lintel and doorposts with a twig of hyssop. The application of the blood expressed the theme of protection. The sense of the Hebrew verb pāsaḥ, from which Pesaḥ derives, has been misunderstood to mean "skip, pass over" (whence the name "Passover"), whereas it more properly means "to straddle, stand over," hence "protect" (Isa. 31.5). The God of Israel was pictured as standing over the homes of the Israelites in Egypt to protect them from the plague of the firstborn.

Egyptian bondage was symbolized by the bitter herbs, eaten together with the unleavened bread and the paschal sacrifice. This festival is a môʿēd, "appointed time," a term that indicates its observance on the same date annually (Exod. 13.10; 23.15), and the same is true of the other annual festivals.

In Deuteronomy 16.3 a rationale is given for the unleavened bread. It symbolized affliction, and its preparation was reminiscent of the hasty departure of the fleeing Israelites. Most significant in the provisions of Deuteronomy 16.1–8 is the requirement that the paschal sacrifice be offered at the single cult place selected by God and that it be prepared in the usual manner by boiling major portions of the meat in pots (1 Sam. 2.11–17), with the rest of the victim burned on the altar.

The shift of venue from the home to the central sanctuary parallels the provisions of Josiah's edict (2 Kings 23.21–23) proclaiming the celebration of the paschal sacrifice in the Temple of Jerusalem, something that, we are told, had never occurred before (but see 2 Chron. 30). The paschal sacrifice now did double duty as the festival offering of the first day. This is indicated by the composite term, "the sacred feast of the pilgrimage festival of the Pesaḥ" (Exod. 34.25).

According to Deuteronomy 16, the pilgrimage began with the paschal sacrifice. Israelites would rise the next morning and return home, continuing to eat unleavened bread for the remaining six days of the festival, and observing the seventh day in their settlements as a solemn assembly, on which labor was prohibited. The result of the Deuteronomic legislation was a brief pilgrimage that allowed farmers to return home at the busiest time of the year.

The priestly prescriptions for this festival reveal even further changes in its celebration. The date is the fifteenth of the first month (Nisan), preceded by the paschal sacrifice on the fourteenth, in the late afternoon (Exod. 12.18; Lev. 23.5–6; Num. 28.16–17). From the formulation of these priestly laws it is clear that the paschal sacrifice, like those offered on each of the seven days of the festival, occurred in the Temple. On both the first and the seventh days there is to be a "sacred assembly," on which labor is forbidden. Numbers 28.19–24 specifies the offerings of the public cult. The difficulty implicit in ordaining a seven-day pilgrimage to a central sanctuary would be dealt with, as we will see, by deferring the second pilgrimage. Proclaiming both the first and the seventh days as sacred assemblies satisfied the earlier pilgrimage of the Book of the Covenant as well as the Deuteronomic pilgrimage of the first night.

The Spring Harvest Festival of the First Grain Yield. In the Book of the Covenant (Exod. 23.16) this festival is named "the pilgrimage festival of reaping" (ḥag haqqāṣîr), that is, of the first yield of the barley crop. No specific date is provided in Exodus, but we may assume that it would occur quite soon after the Pesaḥ early in Iyyar.

In Deuteronomy 16.9–12 we observe the dramatic effects of the Deuteronomic requirement of celebration at a central sanctuary: the spring festival of reaping is deferred seven weeks; thus, the festival is named "the pilgrimage festival of weeks" (ḥag šābūʿōt). The Israelites were to count off a period of seven weeks and then present an offering of first fruits, now consisting of wheat, not barley (Exod. 34.26; Deut. 26.1–11; Lev. 2.14–16).

The most logical reason for the deferral was the anticipated difficulty of undertaking two extended pilgrimages to a central temple at the busiest season of the agricultural year. Priestly law, represented by Leviticus 23.9–22, retains the deferral instituted by Deuteronomy. An earlier desacralization of the new barley crop is, however, ordained for the day of the original festival of reaping, soon after the Pesaḥ festival. In Leviticus 23 the spring festival of reaping is not designated a pilgrimage at all; the first fruits were merely to be delivered to the central temple from the Israelite settlements (v. 17). This celebration, on the fiftieth day of the period of counting, was rendered more elaborate by including the "sacred gifts of greeting" (šĕlāmîm [v. 19; NRSV: "sacrifice of well-being"]), along with loaves made of semolina wheat. The counting of seven weeks was to commence on a Sunday and end on a Sunday, seven weeks later, so that seven actual sabbatical weeks would have passed, not merely forty-nine days. The fiftieth day is designated "a sacred assembly," on which labor is prohibited. Numbers 28.26–31 prescribes a complete regimen of sacrifices to be offered in the Temple and it curiously no longer includes the "sacred gifts of greeting."

In summary, we observe major changes in the celebration, scheduling, and essential meaning of the spring festival.

The Autumn Pilgrimage Festival of Ingathering. In the Book of the Covenant (Exod. 23.16) the autumn festival is called "the pilgrimage festival of ingathering" (ḥag hāʾāsîp), namely, "when you gather in your products from the field." It was to occur "at the outset of the year," more precisely, soon after the start of the two-month period of ingathering, corresponding to Tishri-Marheshvan (September–October). Psalm 81.3 indicates that this festival began on the full moon, at the middle of the month, rather than on the new moon. The pilgrimage lasted one day.

Once again, Deuteronomy (16.13–15) introduces a dramatic change. There this festival is named "the pilgrimage festival of booths" (ḥag hassukkôt) and is scheduled to last seven days. It was to occur somewhat later than the ingathering, at the time when the produce of the fields, vineyards, and groves was processed, in the vat and on the threshing floor.

This autumn pilgrimage was the major event of the year, bringing large numbers of Israelites to the Temple. For this reason it was an appropriate time for the dedication of Solomon's Temple (1 Kings 8.2).

Leviticus 23, in two successive statements (vv. 33–36; 39–42), elaborates on the festival of booths, which was a particularly joyous occasion. A rationale is provided for living in booths, namely, the conditions characteristic of the *wilderness experience. Greenery was utilized to symbolize the fertility of the land, and an eighth day with a solemn assembly was added. Like Leviticus, Numbers 29.12–38 specifies sacrifices for all eight days, with the first and eighth days designated as days of rest.

A more realistic approach would seem to suggest that the theme of "booths" was introduced in Deuteronomy as a consequence of the restriction of pilgrimage to one central temple, which also accounts for the extension of the festival to last longer than initially intended. Dwelling in temporary booths became necessary for the numerous pilgrims arriving in the capital from all over the land and, in later times, from the Diaspora as well (Neh. 8.13–18; Zech. 14.16).

The Day of Atonement. The first reference to the *Day of Atonement (yôm hakkippūrîm) is found in Leviticus 16, which sets forth the rites of expiation and purification to be performed by the high *priest in the sanctuary. The principal function of this day was the purification of the sanctuary and priesthood, in advance of the autumn pilgrimage festival.

The rites of expiation were quite elaborate, and they included the dispatch of the scapegoat (see Azazel) into the wilderness, bearing the sins of the people. On this day, the high priest entered the Holy of Holies (see Temple) to seek expiation for sins. In Zechariah 7.5 this day is referred to as "the fast-day of the seventh month," and its importance seems to have increased during the exilic and postexilic periods, in the wake of the national disaster of 587/586 BCE. The postexilic prophet whose words are preserved in Isaiah 58 emphasizes that the God of Israel wants more than cultic purification and sets down ethical, human goals whose pursuit alone may render the atonement process acceptable to God.

Purim. The book of *Esther relates the saga of deliverance that accounts for the annual Purim feast on the fourteenth day of Adar (and, in some areas, on the fifteenth day as well). Set in the reign of Ahasuerus (possibly Artaxerxes I), the Persian ruler of the fifth century BCE, the story emphasizes divine providence over Israel, in which Esther, the queen, and Mordecai, the court counselor, foil the conspiracy of Haman, the wicked enemy of the Jewish people residing in the far-flung provinces of the Achaemenid empire. Jewish custom is to read the Esther Scroll on this occasion and to exchange gifts in celebration of deliverance.

Hanukkah. There is an additional festival, unmentioned in the Hebrew Bible, which became part of later Judaism. The generic word ḥănukkâ, "dedication," occurs in such passages as Numbers 7.10–11; Psalm 30 (title); and Nehemiah 12.27; but the festival of that name is first mentioned in 1 Maccabees 4.59 in its complete form as "the Dedication of the Altar" and referred to simply as "the Dedication" in John 10.22. Hanukkah is an eight-day festival whose celebration begins on the twenty-fifth day of Chislev and which was patterned after the Tabernacles festival of the harvest season, as is indicated by statements in 2 Maccabees 1.9, 18; 2.1; 10.6–8.

Hanukkah celebrates the rededication of the Second Temple of Jerusalem in 164 BCE by the victorious *Maccabees, members of the priestly Hasmoneans of Modein, after its defilement by the Seleucid ruler Antiochus IV Epiphanes, acting with the collaboration of hellenizing Jews. It is the practice to kindle lights on Hanukkah, adding one light each day throughout the eight days of the festival, and to recite psalms of praise, the Hallel (Pss. 113–118).

Conclusion. After the Roman destruction of Jerusalem and of the Second Temple in 70 CE, when all sacrificial rites became inoperative, major changes in observance affect virtually all biblical feasts. Yet all biblical feasts continue to be celebrated to this day, both in Israel and wherever Jewish communities exist.

Feminism and the Bible.

History. As early as 1837, the American abolitionist lecturer Sarah Grimke suggested that biblical interpretation was deliberately biased against women in order to keep them in subjection. She urged women to become trained as scholars and to investigate the sacred text for themselves. By the end of the nineteenth century, a few women had indeed become trained as biblical scholars, but they were not generally using their expertise for the purpose of challenging scriptural arguments for traditional views of women. The foremost nineteenth-century example of such a challenge, The Woman's Bible (1895–1898), was largely the work of nonspecialists, twenty woman suffragists under the leadership of Elizabeth Cady Stanton. Already in this work and in the responses to it, hints of the shape of the twentieth-century discussion can be seen. Some contributors emphasized the heroic character of little-known women in the Bible. Others concentrated on historical development and change as a rationale for rejecting direct application of biblical cultural norms to their own setting. Some women biblical scholars declined to become involved in an unpopular project, while some feminists urged that the whole project was unnecessary because the Bible itself was an irrelevant relic of the past.

For about seventy years after publication of The Woman's Bible the question of feminist biblical interpretation received little attention. Renewed interest in women's rights in the 1960s led to renewed attention to the influence of the Bible on the status and role of women in Jewish and Christian traditions. Feminists quickly recognized the need to reassess not only the Bible but also the centuries of biblical interpretation undertaken mostly by male scholars. Published literature on the topic increased exponentially, and by the 1980s the annual output of books and articles was twentyfold the total publication list of the first half of the century.

Areas of Inquiry. Recent feminist study has contributed to biblical scholarship in at least five major areas.

1. It has emphasized more systematic historical inquiry into the status and role of women in biblical cultures (e.g., Bernadette Brooten, Women Leaders in the Ancient Synagogue; Phyllis Bird, "The Place of Women in the Israelite Cultus," in Ancient Israelite Religion: Essays in Honor of Frank Moore Cross, edited by P. D. Miller et al.). Such investigations attempt to take into account not only the paucity of biblical materials pertinent to the inquiry but also the androcentrism (whether unconscious or deliberate) of the biblical writers. They recognize that the Bible gives only occasional and indirect evidence about the everyday life of the common people, and especially about the life of women. The inquiries make use of extrabiblical writings, while recognizing that the same limitations apply to many of these texts as well. *Archaeology and sociological studies of preindustrial societies provide additional evidence and controls for such investigations (see Social Sciences and the Bible). The variety of linguistic and other specializations required for this effort demands teamwork among scholars and the gradual building of a body of data over a period of many years.

2. A more complete and balanced picture of the actual content of the Bible has been encouraged by highlighting texts pertaining to women that were not well known even among people familiar with the Bible. Among the many examples are the inheritance and marriage of the daughters of Zelophehad (Num. 27; 36), the rape of the Levite's concubine (Judg. 19), and the frequent inclusion of women in *Luke's gospel.

3. Alternative interpretations of familiar biblical texts have been introduced to show that the texts themselves do not necessarily present a negative view of women, but that biases against women have been attributed to these texts by a long succession of androcentric interpreters. Prominent examples of such studies are those arguing that male and female are created equally in the image of God and that *Adam is equally responsible with his wife *Eve for their disobedience in the garden (Gen. 1–3; e.g., Phyllis Trible, God and the Rhetoric of Sexuality), and those arguing that *Paul's insistence on women's silence in church refers to a specific local problem and would not have been generalized, even by Paul, to all women in all churches (1 Cor. 14.34; e.g., Elizabeth Schüssler Fiorenza, In Memory of Her).

4. A more complete and balanced picture of the God portrayed in the Bible has been encouraged by emphasizing texts in which the deity is compared to a woman (e.g., a midwife [Ps. 22.9], or a woman crying out during childbirth [Isa. 42.14], or one who sweeps her home to search for a lost coin [Luke 15.3–10]). Such texts, supplemented by texts using the imagery of inanimate objects for the deity (e.g., God as rock or shield), are used to undergird and reinforce the classic teaching that God is not biologically male, but is indeed beyond male and female. The small number of texts comparing God to a woman, together with the fact that these are generally comparisons (not direct appellations), results in disagreement about the significance of these resources, particularly whether they provide a warrant for referring to the biblical deity as "mother" in contemporary theology and prayer. (See Metaphors.)

5. Fresh translations of all or parts of the Bible seek to reduce the amount of gender-exclusive language in the text. Some of these versions have made such changes only where scholars considered them warranted by the original Hebrew and Greek texts (e.g., the New Revised Standard Version), while others have eliminated many more masculine references in the text (e.g., The Inclusive Language Lectionary). Debate about the relative merits of the two approaches focuses on the question of how an ancient text can and should be heard in a contemporary setting: should its androcentric character be left plainly visible so that it remains true to its own time and culture, or should the androcentrism be softened so that the presumed universal message can be heard more clearly?

Options in Feminist Hermeneutics. As in the time of Stanton and The Women's Bible, some feminists still conclude that the Bible's androcentrism is so deep-seated that the book can no longer be regarded as authoritative for their lives. These persons tend generally to break away openly from their tradition and to give attention to the Bible only as a document having a negative influence on western culture.

Many feminists, however, do continue to regard the Bible as authoritative and remain active in church or synagogue. The goal of these feminists is to describe how this biblical authority persists despite the unacceptable patriarchal context and androcentric bias they recognize in scripture. While there are many differences in detail and nuance among the approaches to the problem, these approaches may be broadly categorized into three types.

1. Close study of texts pertaining to women, with emphasis on showing that these texts do not support the patriarchal structures and assumptions of contemporary society. This approach incorporates both the highlighting of texts previously ignored and the reinterpretation of texts traditionally used to support patriarchal structures in society. The difficulties encountered in the approach are twofold. First, there is no unanimity among scholars as to the correct interpretation of many of the debated texts. Even the criteria by which correctness might be ascertained cannot be agreed upon, since some scholars would admit various interpretations that are plausible as literary readings of a text, while others would insist that the interpretation be evaluated in terms of the probable intent of the original author addressing the ancient cultural context. Second, there are some texts that present a patriarchal view of women for which no positive reinterpretation seems possible. Thus, the question of criteria for choosing some texts as more important than others inevitably arises. Although the problem of selectivity is as old as theology based on the Bible, the difficulty of establishing criteria or the desire to avoid such selection leads some feminists to frustration with this approach.

2. Appeal to the Bible generally (not specifically to texts about women) for a critique of patriarchy. This approach is often closely associated with the concerns of liberation theology in its search to show that the Bible challenges any viewpoint or action that demeans, limits, or controls others because of their race, class, or—in this case—gender. The prophets' criticism of economic exploitation, for example, or Jesus' criticism of ethnic narrowness, is extended by analogy to authorize criticism of the oppression of women (e.g., Rosemary Ruether, Sexism and God-Talk). While this approach has many adherents, others criticize what they regard as a lack of clear criteria for such extension by analogy.

3. Study of texts about women with special attention to the ways in which their patriarchal setting or androcentric worldview continues to be reflected in contemporary culture (e.g., Trible, Texts of Terror). In this approach, the texts function rather like a mirror, enabling modern readers to see their own situations more accurately by focusing on similarities between attitudes toward and treatment of women in biblical times and in the twentieth century. Of course, it is precisely such similarity that leads some feminists to reject the Bible as oppressive and useless as a basis for advocating change. But for those who do not reject the Bible, the mirror is expected to lead to a value judgment, the recognition that such patriarchy is wrong. The basis for this value judgment generally lies in the resources of either the first or the second approaches above.

Feminists who continue to work with the Bible as more than a historical document generally agree that the theological problem of *authority is central to their *hermeneutic task (Letty Russell, ed., Feminist Interpretation of the Bible). The chief poles around which the debate is structured remain those familiar to Christian theology generally: scripture versus tradition, "canon within the canon," and letter versus spirit. A review of the areas of inquiry and hermeneutic options outlined above provides illustration of each of these themes. The scripture-versus-tradition debate, for example, takes shape in the consideration of whose interpretations of the Adam and Eve story should hold sway, whether recent feminist ones or those familiar from the New Testament and church fathers. "Canon within the canon" identifies the dilemma of those who recognize discordant perspectives on women present in scripture. The debate over Bible translation is part of the larger issue of text versus spirit. Many more illustrations could be cited. They highlight the reality that the questions posed by feminism are not peripheral, but rather are central to the understanding of the Bible by communities of faith in every generation.

Festivals. See Feasts and Festivals.

Flesh and Spirit. The word "flesh" literally means soft tissue, as distinguished from skin and bones (e.g., Job 19.20); by extension it can mean the human race (Isa. 40.5; Joel 2.28) and even all animal life (Gen. 6.19). "Spirit" translates words that in both Hebrew and Greek mean "wind" (Gen. 8.1; cf. 1.1) or "breath" (Gen. 6.17; Ezek. 37.5), as well as vital essence. Biblical writers do not normally combine the two terms to designate the totality of human nature. The body/soul dichotomy that so fascinated Greek philosophy is not generally presupposed, even when the two terms occur in close proximity; thus, Matthew 26.41 is not a real exception to this rule. (See Human Person.)

In the New Testament, particularly in the letters of Paul, "flesh" and "spirit" often appear as contrasting rather than complementary terms, representing the natural and divine spheres respectively; this usage also occurs earlier (see Isa. 31.3). Thus, for Paul "flesh" often has a negative connotation, meaning the sphere of human rebellion against God (Rom. 8.3–13; Gal. 5.16–25), as contrasted with the "spirit," which is sometimes identified as the "spirit of God" (e.g., Rom. 8.9; see Holy Spirit).

Flood, The. Today, as in the past, catastrophic floods are experienced universally, and stories are told about them. The stories share many features: land submerged, multitudes drowned, survivors in a boat. People living in basically similar ways in separate places will react similarly; hence, common features in flood stories are predictable and are not proof that all such ancient stories refer to one great flood.

On the other hand, the *Babylonian and Hebrew stories share so much that a connection between them can hardly be denied. Surviving copies of the Babylonian story come from the seventeenth and seventh centuries BCE (the Epic of Atrahasis and the Epic of *Gilgamesh, respectively); the age of the account in Genesis 6–9 in its present form is debated. Both narratives have a pious hero warned by his god to build a great ship (see Ark) and to load it with his family and selected animals in order to escape the coming deluge. Once all others have perished, the ship grounds on a mountain in Armenia (see Ararat), a sacrifice pleases the god, and a divine oath follows never to send another flood. The later Babylonian version describes the hero releasing birds to seek vegetation, but the clay tablets on which the earlier text is recorded have been damaged where that episode might have occurred.

Both the older Babylonian account (Atrahasis) and the Hebrew account belong to larger compositions passing from the creation of human beings to later history, the flood, and its aftermath. Other Babylonian records show a wider tradition preserving names of kings from the beginning of the human race onward, interrupted by the flood. Genesis 5 and 11 present comparable lists in a comparable context. All these similarities indicate a close connection. Scholars often claim that the Hebrew flood story depends on the Babylonian, with modifications in the interest of Israel's monotheistic faith. Consideration of certain differences, however, makes it more likely that both depend upon a common original.

Whether such a flood occurred, or not, is impossible to prove. Archaeologists finding layers of silt in three Babylonian cities associated them with the flood, but each was confined to one place and they were not contemporary. What physical traces such a flood would leave is debatable; though Genesis may imply a global flood, it need not, for the Hebrew word translated as "earth" (6.17; etc.) also means "land, country" (e.g., 10.10), so the narrative could report a deluge limited to the writer's known world.

According to Genesis 9.8–10, God promised never again to send "a flood to destroy the earth." The *covenant with *Noah (9.12–17) sets human society on a basis of individual responsibility, and Genesis goes on to trace this concept in the special revelation that God gave to the line he chose. Forgiveness. The several Hebrew and Greek words translated "forgive" fall into two general and overlapping meanings. The first refers to financial matters and involves the annulment of the obligation to repay what is owed, as in Matthew 18.32 (see Loans and Interest). The other meaning is much more frequent and concerns the reestablishment of an interpersonal relationship that has been disrupted through some misdeed. Thus, in Genesis 50.17, *Joseph is implored by his brothers to forgive the evil that they did to him.

Both meanings are applied to God's gracious pardoning of people's transgressions; note how in the two versions of the *Lord's Prayer, in Matthew's version (6.12) God is asked to forgive debts, in Luke's (11.4) it is sins. Various *metaphors are used to express forgiveness of sins, such as those clustered in Psalm 51: blotting out, washing, purging, hiding the face. Even more vivid language can be used, as in Isaiah 38.17, Jeremiah 31.34, and Micah 7.19: "he will tread our iniquities under foot . . . cast all our sins into the depths of the sea." Such expressive phrasing highlights the completeness of God's forgiveness, which is to serve as a model for human conduct (Luke 6.36).

Fornication. Like the Greek word porneia that it often translates, "fornication" means extramarital or illicit sexual intercourse; it can also mean "sexual immorality" in a broader sense (see, e.g., 1 Cor. 5.1; 6.9).

Warnings against sexual immorality occur repeatedly in the New Testament, especially in Paul and in the book of Revelation; it was apparently an issue especially for gentile Christians (see Acts 15.20; Rev. 2.14, 20–21; 17.2; see Ethical Lists).

In Matthew 5.32 and 19.9 porneia (NRSV: "unchastity") is a justification for *divorce, but its meaning is not clear. Is it *adultery, or some premarital conduct discovered only after *marriage (cf. Deut. 24.1)? Whether committed before or after marriage, it might denote any of the offenses condemned in Leviticus 18. It is unlikely to be merely marriage within the forbidden degrees.

Frankincense. Frankincense is an aromatic gum-resin that emits a strong, pleasant odor when burned. It is extracted from trees of genus Boswellia native to southern *Arabia and northern Somalia. In ancient Israel, frankincense was compounded with other aromatics to make *incense (Exod. 30.34–38), used as an element in offerings to Yahweh (Lev. 2.1–2, 14–16), and displayed with the bread of the Presence (Lev. 24.7). In the New Testament, frankincense is one of the symbolic gifts of the *Magi to the infant Jesus (Matt. 2.11). Throughout antiquity frankincense was the object of a lucrative long-distance trade between southern Arabia and the Levant (Isa. 60.6; Jer. 6.20; Pliny, Natural History 12.30–32).

Freud and the Bible. The views of Sigmund Freud (1856–1939) on religion are well known. He proclaimed to his friend Oscar Pfister, a Lutheran pastor, that he was a "godless Jew" and that only such a one would have discovered the secrets of psychoanalysis. He prided himself on being an intrepid man of science, a conquistador of the mind, who cherished his Enlightenment attitude toward religion and clung to his avowed agnosticism until the end of his life. He admired Baruch Spinoza, the seventeenth-century thinker, who in the spirit of the philosophes proclaimed that one had to read the Bible just as critically as any other book. For all that, Freud's attitudes toward religion were not so simple—the superficial view does not take into account his own ambivalent conflicts about religion and the degree of his own obsessional superstition and even credulity. His view of the Bible reflects this ambiguity and ambivalence. We can discuss the problem in terms of Freud's early exposure to the Bible, his ambivalence toward it, his use of the Bible, and finally the special problem of his treatment of Moses.

Early Familiarity with the Bible. Freud's frequent denials of any meaningful religious training were long accepted as authentic testimony and consistent with his staunch atheism and agnosticism. But recently material has come to light that casts this supposition in doubt, suggesting that Freud's exposure to traditional Judaism may have been more extensive than he implied. In fact, Freud's early religious formation was considerable. His parents both came from traditional Orthodox families and remained Orthodox believers, but they did not follow all the prescribed practices. According to Ernest Jones (1957), they tended to be freethinking, but only after their move from Freiberg in Moravia to Vienna did they dispense with dietary observances and rituals of their Hasidic life-style—presumably in the service of accommodation. The Seder on the eve of *Passover continued to be observed, along with Christmas and Easter.

Freud's father Jacob was a devoted student of the *Torah and was well versed in Jewish lore and tradition, and he had attained a position of considerable respect for his scholarly knowledge of scripture. His familiarity and mastery of biblical texts in the original Hebrew was exceptional. The picture of the family religious atmosphere remains unclear, with conflicting accounts from involved observers—the divergences probably relating to what phase of the family experience was being described. There seems little doubt, in the light of recent research, that little Sigmund had considerable exposure to religious practices and traditions and particularly that he was exposed to extensive and intensive study of the Bible. He was a pupil of Samuel Hammerschlag, a Hebrew scholar of moderate Reform views, and studied the Hebrew language and the Bible from age seven through thirteen. Study of Hebrew was featured in every class, and special emphasis was given to the Torah. Freud was not only Hammerschlag's prize pupil during those years, but he also enjoyed a close and affectionate relationship with his old mentor. Freud's later denials of any knowledge of Hebrew might have been due to a lapse of memory or even a retrospective distortion.

One of the prize possessions of the Freud family was the remarkable edition of the Bible by Ludwig Philippson—the biblical texts were accompanied by numerous discussions of biblical history and comparative religion. Freud would have been quite familiar with this work. He commented in his Autobiographical Study (1925) that he had been deeply engrossed in the Bible from as soon as he was able to read and that this experience had had a lasting effect on him.

But Freud took pains to minimize his early religious background and may thereby have promoted a shibboleth that has persisted through the subsequent years of Freud scholarship. Peter Gay, for example, in A Godless Jew (1987) dismisses the years of study with Hammerschlag as merely reinforcing the religious indifference of Freud's home—"Hammerschlag was far more interested in ethics than in theology, let alone the Hebrew language." This would support Freud's repeated claim that he knew no Hebrew and that his religious upbringing was negligible. He wrote in 1930, "My father spoke the sacred language as well as German or better. He let me grow up in complete ignorance of everything that concerned Judaism." It seems that this declaration cannot be taken at face value and must be reassessed in the light of new evidence to the contrary.

Attitude toward the Bible. Freud's attitude toward the Bible was mixed, reflecting his underlying ambivalence toward his father. When Freud turned thirty-five, his father sent him the family Bible with the following inscription:

> My dear Son,
>
> It was in the seventh year of your age that the spirit of God began to move you to learning. I would say that the spirit of God speaks to you: "Read in My book; there will be opened to you sources of knowledge and of the intellect." It is the Book of Books; it is the well that wise men have dug and from which lawgivers have drawn the waters of their knowledge.
>
> You have seen in this Book the vision of the Almighty, you have heard willingly, you have done and have tried to fly high upon the wings of the Holy Spirit. Since then I have preserved the same Bible. Now, on your thirty-fifth birthday, I have brought it out from its retirement and I send it to you as a token of love from your old father.

Curiously, this inscription, so redolent with biblical allusions, was written in Hebrew. The puzzle remains why Jacob would have addressed such a poignant sentiment to his son who professed to have no knowledge of the language. Certainly one supposition is that Jacob would have known that his son could well understand his inscription. Study of Jacob's language has concluded that he was neither a devout nor nationalistic Jew, but one of the Haskalah who envisioned Judaism as the epitome of Enlightenment rationalism—a characteristic view of Freud himself. Moreover, among the books discovered in Freud's library after his death was just such a Bible in Hebrew and German, with copious marginal notes in Freud's hand. Clearly Freud was more of a student of the Bible than he admitted.

Freud could not reconcile his staunch scientific outlook with any credibility of the Bible. He wrote in a letter in 1939, "The way you are able to reconcile esteem for scientific research with belief in the reliability of the biblical report calls forth my fullest admiration. I could not manage the feat. . . . But whence do you take the right to monopolize the truth for the Bible? I suppose it simply means: I believe because I believe." Whether he was at ease with his disbelief is open to question. If he could bring no belief to the biblical texts, they continued to exercise a fascination over and attraction for him.

Use of the Bible. Freud tended to regard the Bible as a great book of the Western literary tradition, but he did not credit it with any validity or inspiration beyond that. The Bible took its place in his mind along with other great literary works of Western culture, and his use of it was much like his references to other literary sources. His knowledge of European literature in general, both ancient and modern, was extensive—he must have been a voracious reader throughout his life. But in this regard the Bible held no special place. He even quipped at one point that the writings of Karl *Marx seemed to have replaced the Bible and the Qur'ān as sources of revelation, even though they were no more free of contradictions than the sacred books.

Consequently, although scriptural references are scattered through Freud's writings, they are used in the same vein as his references to other literary sources—as allusions or images utilized to make a point, draw a comparison, or illustrate a conclusion. The references span both Testaments, suggesting that Freud had a ready familiarity with the biblical material. References to the *Pentateuch predominate, but occasional allusions to the historical books or the Psalms are also found. Use of other books of the Hebrew Bible, such as the Song of Solomon, is incidental. The New Testament seems to have taken a back seat. The outstanding exception to this pattern is in Freud's treatment of the Moses theme.

Freud and Moses. Freud's first mention of *Moses was in a letter to Carl *Jung in 1908 in which he refers to Jung as *Joshua, who would lead the chosen people into the Promised Land, while Freud, like Moses, would only be able to view it from a distance. The metaphor of the *Promised Land was one of Freud's favorites and was a frequent reference in his letters to Wilhelm Fliess, his longtime friend and correspondent. The meaning shifts in various contexts—at one point it is Rome, the center of Christianity; at another it becomes the meaning of dreams; and toward the end of his life it was the riddle of Moses and the birth of *monotheism.

Freud's closest engagement with the biblical texts came at the end of his life in his attempt to rewrite the Moses legend in Moses and Monotheism (1939). It is flawed by faulty data selection and lacks appropriate methodology and verification; its conceptual structure is built on the sand of unverifiable hypotheses. It was in fact a kind of family romance, which Freud dubbed his "historical novel." Freud had been fascinated with the figure of Moses and probably strongly identified with the great prophet who led his people into the Promised Land—a metaphor for Freud himself, who led the way into the undiscovered continent of the unconscious. In 1901, he saw Michelangelo's powerful statue of Moses and became absorbed in it; he would spend weeks studying, sketching, and analyzing the statue and finally write his essay that transformed the traditional view of Moses into Freud's own vision of restrained power—a concrete expression of Freud's own ideal of the intellectual restraint of passion. He wrote of it: "Michelangelo has placed a different Moses on the tomb of the Pope, one superior to the historical or traditional Moses. He had modified the theme of the broken tablets; he does not let Moses break them in his wrath, but makes him be influenced by the danger that they will be broken and makes him calm that wrath, or at any rate prevent it from becoming an act. In this way he has added something new and more than human to the figure of Moses; so that the giant frame with its tremendous physical power becomes only a concrete expression of the highest mental achievement that is possible in man, that of struggling successfully against an inward passion for the sake of a cause to which he has devoted himself."

Clearly his identification with the figure of Moses was a powerful theme in Freud's thinking about himself and his religious views. The writing of Moses and Monotheism became a final effort to resolve his ambivalent identification with the figure of Moses and through him of his deep-seated conflict and ambivalence regarding his father. It became an act of rebellion, rising up against the religion of his father and toppling its hero. He wrote, "A hero is a man who stands up manfully against his father and in the end victoriously overcomes him." Moses was the leader of his people, the prophet who brought a new revelation and founded a new religion. The image of the prophet who was without honor in his own country, yet would finally prevail and be universally accepted, was part of Freud's vision.

Freud's writing of the Moses book reflected his deep study of the Pentateuch and the critical scholarship of his day. He was strongly influenced by the higher biblical criticism of his day—Julius Wellhausen was an important influence, along with William Robertson Smith, whom Freud quotes often. In Freud's rendering, Moses became an Egyptian and the chosen people were thus deprived of one of their great cultural heroes. Freud reviewed the story of Amenhotep IV (Ahknaton), who rebelled against the gods of his father and established the monotheistic cult of Aten. Moses would have brought the monotheistic cult with him as a new revelation to the chosen people. This rendering of the origins of monotheism has been countered by subsequent biblical research.

Moreover, following the rather flimsy thesis of Ernst Sellin, who claimed to have discovered evidence of the murder of Moses, Freud advanced the hypothesis that Moses was prevented from entering the Promised Land because the Jews had rebelled against his imposition of the worship of the Egyptian god Aten and killed the prophet. Freud's Moses does not reach the Promised Land because he was murdered by his sons—the idea recapitulates Freud's fantasy of the murder of the father of the primal horde as the origin of religion in Totem and Taboo (1912–1913). Only later, in the reunification at Kadesh, under the leadership of a second Moses, did they take up a new religion based on the worship of the volcano god Yahweh. The result was the preservation of elements of Egyptian monotheism in the worship of Yahweh, including the practice of *circumcision.

Psychoanalysts have speculated that, in addition to his identification with Moses, this argument reflects Freud's underlying guilt for his own hostile wishes against his father. Freud would have been struggling to overcome his guilt and ambivalence by his wish to become another messiah, another Moses, who would lead his people out of psychological bondage by the new revelation of psychoanalysis. But this required the destruction of the religion of the fathers. He wrote: "There was no place in the framework of the religion of Moses for a direct expression of the murderous hatred of the father. All that could come to light was a mighty reaction against it—a sense of guilt on account of that hostility, a bad conscience for having sinned against God and for not ceasing to sin. This sense of guilt . . . had yet another superficial motivation, which nearly disguised its true origin. Things were going badly for the people; the hopes resting on the favour of God failed in fulfillment; it was not easy to maintain an illusion . . . of being God's Chosen People. If they wished to avoid renouncing the happiness, a sense of guilt on account of their own sinfulness offered a welcome means of exculpating God: . . . they deserved no better than to be punished by him since they had not obeyed his commandments."

Acceptance of Sellin's fabricated account suggests a strong need to believe on Freud's part, deriving from his identification of Moses with his father and his own unconscious hostility. The murder of Moses thus expresses a fitting punishment for Freud's own parricidal wishes. The identification with the slain Moses-father would have been intensified by Freud's advanced age and the progressive deterioration caused by his painful cancer.

Conclusion. Freud could never resolve his ambivalence toward things religious; his attitudes toward the Bible bear eloquent testimony to this conflict. He refused to acknowledge holy writ as bearing any significance beyond its status as an ancient and traditional literary masterpiece. Yet despite his skeptical and agnostic stance, he could not leave the Bible alone. He returned at the end of his life to immerse himself in the figure of Moses and the mystery of the religion he brought to God's chosen people. He created a psychoanalytic myth of the origins of monotheistic belief in the primal murder of the father in the person of Moses. If this imaginative fiction cannot bear the weight of critical appraisal as a contribution to biblical studies, the question still remains whether Freud was touching on something more profound and meaningful about the human religious condition. Certainly, the Freudian encounter with scripture carries its own lesson—that the reading and interpretation of the biblical texts may not be divorced from the motives, sometimes hidden, of the reader.

Fringes (Hebr. ṣîṣīt, pl. ṣîṣīyyôt; RSV "tassel"). Fringes were frequently worn in the ancient Near East, although this custom's origins and purpose, which was probably protective, are obscure. Numbers 15.38–41 (and, more tersely, Deut. 22.12) ordains that Israelite males are to wear fringes including a blue cord on the four corners of their outside garments as a perpetual reminder to fulfill divine commandments rather than one's own desires. Fringes may also have indicated covenantal affiliation, serving both to differentiate male from female and to distinguish between Israelite and gentile. For later Jewish tradition, wearing ritually correct fringes daily became an important signifier of male religious obligation, equivalent to affixing a mezuzah to the doorpost (Deut. 6.9; 11.20) and placing *phylacteries on the head and arm during prayer (Exod. 13.9, 16; Deut. 6.8; 11.18).

Fundamentalism. A twentieth-century theological movement among conservative Protestants, largely in North America. Despite its broad, amorphous, and decentralized character, fundamentalism has the following features:

1. A strong emphasis on the *inspiration and *authority of the Bible, which is to be understood "literally" and which is held to be "inerrant"—totally free from any error whatsoever, whether historical, theological, or scientific. It is not surprising that fundamentalists strongly repudiate the conclusions of modern biblical criticism, seeing them as implicitly, if not explicitly, undermining the beliefs of traditional Christianity (see Interpretation, History of, article on Modern Biblical Criticism).

2. A marked, at times militant, impulse toward separatism from the other branches of Christianity. Inasmuch as the large mainline Protestant denominations were perceived in the early twentieth century to be drifting toward "modernism" or "liberalism," fundamentalists often withdrew fellowship from them, eventually creating rival Bible colleges, seminaries, publishing houses, and even entire denominations. In 1941, for example, they founded the American Council of Christian Churches, explicitly separate from its mainline counterpart, the Federal (later National) Council of Churches of Christ.

3. With a few exceptions, mostly among some Calvinist churches, fundamentalists tend to embrace the dispensationalist school of biblical interpretation, especially as popularized by the *Scofield Reference Bible. Again understanding the Bible "literally," particularly the many prophecies concerning the land of Israel as yet seemingly unfulfilled, fundamentalists tend to be premillennialists, looking forward to a literal thousand-year future reign of the *Messiah (the *second coming of Christ) over a restored Jewish nation (see Rev. 20.4). Thus, a strong emphasis on future fulfillment of biblical prophecy usually characterizes fundamentalists. A perhaps inevitable corollary to this type of premillennialism is a strong sense of pessimism concerning contemporary human history, which is expected only to degenerate further and further until Christ's return.

4. In accord with this last point, fundamentalists tend to emphasize personal piety and holiness over against the social concerns of the mainline churches. Typically, fundamentalists promote evangelistic revivals and missionary activity, both foreign and domestic, while they heavily inveigh against smoking, drinking (see Wine), the theater, card playing, and the like. Somewhat paradoxical, however, is their strong sense of patriotism, often identifying American values and traditions closely with Christianity. Ever since the 1960s, for example, fundamentalists have bitterly denounced the United States Supreme Court ban on prayer in the public schools as "un-American" as well as "anti-Christian."

The term "fundamentalist" first appeared in the early 1920s to describe those who subscribed to the "fundamentals" of Christian faith, especially the tenets promulgated in a twelve-volume work, entitled The Fundamentals, which had been printed and mailed to thousands of ministers and laypersons during the years 1910–15 by two California oil millionaires, Lyman and Milton Stewart. These booklets took issue with a wide list of enemies of Christianity—Romanism, socialism, atheism, Mormonism, and most of all naturalism, which was held to be the basis of contemporary theological liberalism. The volumes also reaffirmed what were deemed to be "fundamental" truths of traditional Christianity, especially the inspiration and authority of scripture. Historians of fundamentalism commonly link the publishing of these volumes to the "five fundamentals" that had been previously adopted by the General Assembly of the (northern) Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. in 1910 (later reaffirmed in 1916 and 1923), namely, the inerrancy of scripture, the deity of Jesus Christ and his *virgin birth, Christ's substitutionary atonement, his physical (bodily) *resurrection, and the historicity of his *miracles. But, as Ernest R. Sandeen has pointed out, any such listing of the "five points" of fundamentalism, and still less the twelve volumes of The Fundamentals, never typified the leadership of this era. Nonetheless, by the early 1920s, various lists of "the fundamentals" had indeed been drawn up, and they were meant to represent the essential, and hence nonnegotiable, doctrines of Christianity.

Throughout the 1920s, fundamentalists exerted a surprisingly powerful force on American religion and politics, especially in several of the larger Protestant denominations such as the northern Presbyterians and northern Baptists. As Sandeen notes, the origins of fundamentalism were largely to be found in the northeastern region of North America in metropolitan areas, not, as commonly argued, in agrarian or southern locales. Nonetheless, the real strength of fundamentalistic religion eventually did manifest itself among the Southern Baptists and the countless independent Bible churches that began to spring up throughout North America during this time, especially in the southern and midwestern regions of the United States. Politically the fundamentalists flexed their muscles as well, strongly opposing, for example, the teaching in public schools of Darwinian evolution (see Science and the Bible). This opposition led eventually to the notorious "Scopes Monkey Trial" of 1925, in which William Jennings Bryan, a Presbyterian layperson and three-time Democratic party presidential candidate, argued unsuccessfully against the teaching of evolution in the public schools of Tennessee. Other famous fundamentalists of the era included the colorful and popular evangelist Billy Sunday and Princeton seminary professor John Gresham Machen, who personally resisted being called a fundamentalist, saying that it sounded like a new religion.

By the 1940s, less militant fundamentalists were also chafing under the term, regarding it as connoting anti-intellectualism, combativeness, extremism, and paranoia. Calling themselves "evangelicals," they banded together in 1942 to found the National Association of Evangelicals as a more moderate counterpart to the fundamentalist American Council of Christian Churches founded the previous year. Evangelicals still reckoned themselves as the heirs of true, historic Christianity, but they were more willing to work within and among the mainline denominations. The well-known contemporary evangelist Billy Graham, a moderate fundamentalist, has been repeatedly and bitterly denounced by his more conservative counterparts for such compromise.

Fundamentalism is still a force within modern North American Protestant Christianity. In 1976, Jimmy Carter, a self-styled "born again" evangelical Christian, was elected president of the United States, and Ronald Reagan's 1980 and 1984 presidential victories were due in part to the votes of evangelicals and fundamentalists. Jerry Falwell, a prominent Virginia preacher and founder of the so-called Moral Majority (recently disbanded), and Pat Robertson, an influential television evangelist and 1988 Republican party presidential candidate, are two contemporary North American fundamentalists of some renown.

Gabriel. Gabriel is one of the most prominent *angels in postexilic Jewish literature and in Christian texts, especially extracanonical literature. He is portrayed as one of the seven *archangels in 1 Enoch 20.7; elsewhere he is one of the four angels close to God's throne (1 Enoch 10.9; 40.3, 9; cf. Luke 1.19). This proximity to God results in his distinctive functions. Gabriel intercedes with God for those oppressed by evil (1 Enoch 9.1–11), he brings *Enoch into God's very presence (2 Enoch 21.3–6), he explains mysteries about future political events (Dan. 8.16–26; 9.20–27), and he delivers special revelations from God to individuals (Luke 1.8–20, 26–38). Jewish and Christian interpreters have sometimes concluded that biblical texts with unnamed divine messengers (e.g., Gen. 19.1) refer to the archangels Gabriel and Michael. In general, *Michael is described as a warrior, while Gabriel more often functions as an intermediary or an interpreter of *dreams. STEVEN FRIESEN

Gad. Son of Zilpah, *Leah's maid, and *Jacob (Gen. 30.10–11), and one of the twelve *tribes of Israel. The name Gad is associated with the Hebrew word for fortune. In early Israel Gad is both populous (Gen. 46.16; Num. 26.15–18) and adept in battle (Gen. 49.19; Deut. 33.20–21; 1 Chron. 5.18; 12.8–14). The Gadites, together with *Reuben and half of *Manasseh, settle in the Transjordan, an area suited for their abundant cattle (Num. 32.26; Map 1:Y4). The Gadites support *Saul and his family (1 Sam. 31.11–13; 2 Sam. 2.8–9), aid *David (1 Chron. 12.8–14), and participate in his administration (2 Sam. 23.36).

Gad fares poorly during the divided monarchy. King Mesha of Moab (ca. 835 BCE) claims that he dealt harshly with the Gadites of Ataroth (see Moabite Stone). Hazael of Damascus (Syria) devastates Gad (2 Kings 10.32–33). Subsequently, *Tiglath-pileser III of Assyria exiles the Transjordanian tribes (2 Kings 15.29).

Gad can also refer to a foreign deity (Isa. 65.11), a seer during the time of David (1 Sam. 22.5; 2 Sam. 24.11–14), or an organizer of levitical service and chronicler of David's life (1 Chron. 29.29). GARY N. KNOPPERS

Galatians, The Letter of Paul to the. A letter addressed by *Paul to "the churches of Galatia" is fourth in the usual arrangement of the Pauline letters in the New Testament. It is a sustained and passionate expostulation with a group of churches that Paul had planted, whose members were in danger of abandoning the gospel that they had received from him. They were inclined to pay heed to certain teachers who urged them to add to their faith in Christ some distinctive features of Judaism, particularly *circumcision. These teachers also endeavored to diminish Paul's authority by insisting that he was indebted to the Jerusalem church leaders for his apostolic commission and had no right to deviate from Jerusalem practice.

Contents. The opening salutation (1.1–5) is followed immediately by an expression of indignant astonishment that the readers are so quickly departing from the gospel that brought them salvation (1.6–10).

An autobiographical account follows. Paul received his gospel not from others but when God revealed his Son to him. Before that, he had become an expert in the study and practice of Judaism; he showed his zeal by persecuting the followers of Jesus. But when he received his revelation, together with the commission to preach Christ among the *gentiles, he began to fulfill his commission at once without consulting the Christian leaders in Jerusalem. Not until three years later did he go to Jerusalem for a fifteen-day visit to Cephas (*Simon Peter), during which he also met *James, the Lord's brother. After that visit he went to Syria and Cilicia, and continued preaching the gospel there (1.11–24).

Several years later he visited Jerusalem with

*Barnabas and had a conference with the three pillars of the mother church, James, Peter, and *John. They recognized that Paul and Barnabas had been specially called to evangelize gentiles, whereas their own responsibility was rather to evangelize their fellow Jews; they agreed to an appropriate demarcation of the two spheres of missionary activity. But they conferred no authority on Paul: he was in no way commissioned by them (2.1–10).

Indeed, his independence from them was shown during a visit paid by Peter to *Antioch, when Peter withdrew from sharing meals with gentile Christians because of representations made to him by messengers from James in Jerusalem. As Paul saw it, Peter's action compromised the gospel by implying that there was some difference in principle between Jewish and gentile believers. In fact, Paul maintained, there was none; both had been accepted by God through faith in Christ, not through the Jewish law (2.11–21).

Paul wonders whether the Galatians have been hypnotized: how otherwise could they imagine that the saving work was to be completed by their own endeavors when it had begun with their reception of the spirit of God through faith (3.1–5).

Abraham in his day received the promise that through him and his offspring all the gentiles would be blessed. Since it was on account of his faith that Abraham received this promise, it is on the basis of *faith that the gentiles are to experience its fulfillment. The *Law brings no blessing; instead, it brings a *curse on those who fail to keep it, but from that curse Christ has redeemed those who have faith (3.6–14). When the promise to Abraham speaks of his offspring, Christ is meant. The promise is like a deed of covenant, whose terms cannot subsequently be modified by codicil (3.15–18). The Law was given in order to bring the latent sinful propensity of humanity into the open in the form of specific transgressions, during the interval before the coming of the expected offspring. The Law was like a guardian, keeping children under restraint until their coming of age. With the coming of Christ and the exercise of faith in him, the people of God attained their maturity and enjoy their liberty as his fully grown sons and daughters (3.19–4.7).

But the Galatian Christians are turning their backs on their liberty and placing themselves in bondage to legal ordinances. Paul appeals to them to remember the affection they showed for him when he first visited them: he is not jealous because they are listening to other teachers but concerned because those teachers are robbing them of their liberty. They are trying to make them accept circumcision, but Paul warns them that, if they submit to this demand, they must keep the whole Jewish law. Those who have seduced them into this false course will have much to answer for (4.8–5.12).

Christian liberty means liberty to live according to the spirit of Christ, to fulfill the comprehensive commandment to love one another. The way of the spirit is the way of life; the "works of the flesh" lead to destruction (5.13–26). Mutual helpfulness is the hallmark of men and women of faith. Those who do good to others reap the harvest of eternal life (6.1–10).

Let others boast of their achievements; Paul will boast of nothing but the cross of Christ. The scars he has received in his apostolic service mark him as Christ's property (6.11–17). With this he takes his leave of them (6.18).

Authorship. None of the letters bearing Paul's name is so indubitably his as Galatians. Galatians is, indeed, the criterion by which the authenticity of other letters ascribed to him is gauged.

Recipients. The "churches of Galatia" addressed in this letter were situated in the Roman province of Galatia (Map 11:F3), but which part of the province is a matter of dispute. Until 25 BCE the area had been the kingdom of Galatia. The original Galatians were Celts from central Europe who invaded Asia Minor and established themselves there in the third century BCE. But the rulers of Galatia extended their authority over neighboring territories populated by other ethnic groups; these groups were included in the province of Galatia and were Galatians in the political but not in the ethnic sense. To some of these groups belonged the cities of Pisidian Antioch, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe, which were evangelized by Paul and Barnabas around 47 CE (Acts 13.14–14.23). One view is that the churches of those cities were recipients of the letter. Another view is that the recipients were churches established later in the northern part of the Roman province, among the ethnic Galatians. It is true that *Acts makes no mention of Paul's visiting north Galatia, but Acts does not give a complete account of his missionary activity. The precise identity of the recipients does not greatly affect the argument of the letter.

Date. The date of the letter has been fixed at various points between 48 and 55 CE. If it was sent to the churches of Pisidian Antioch, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe, a date around 48 CE is possible, even probable; if it was sent to churches in ethnic Galatia, its date would be later. The affinity between Galatians and *Romans has been thought to point to a date not long before the writing of Romans (early in 57 CE). The affinity should not be exaggerated, however; Paul's assessment of the Law, for example, was considerably modified between Galatians and Romans. Again, wherever Galatians may be dated within the limits mentioned, one's appreciation of its argument is affected only slightly.

Opponents. The traditional view, accepted here, is that those against whom Paul polemicizes in Galatians were judaizing intruders, eager to make the churches in Galatia, which were mainly gentile in composition, conform to the Jewish way of life and probably also to bring them under the control of the church of Jerusalem.

Other features, however, have been discerned in the situation implied in the letter. If Paul warns his readers not to pervert their liberty into license (Gal. 5.13–21), it might indicate that a campaign on two fronts has been simplified by one line of interpretation, according to which the one target of Paul's attack is a form of christianized Jewish *gnosticism. If it is objected that Paul gives no clear hint of this in the letter, the answer is that he did not fully understand the nature of the teaching being urged on his converts. But this is not plausible. Our sole source of knowledge about the opponents and their propaganda is found in Paul's argument; if these references cannot be trusted, there is no other source of information.

The letter can be read against the background of revived militant nationalism in Judea in the years after 44 CE. These militants (who came to be called *Zealots) treated Jews who fraternized with gentiles as traitors. Jerusalem Christians were sensitive to the charge that some of their leaders, if not they themselves, practiced such fraternization. Hence, perhaps, the representations to Peter at Antioch, which made him break off his table fellowship with gentile Christians in that city (Gal. 2.11–14); hence too, perhaps, the judaizing mission to Galatia. For if gentile converts could be persuaded to accept circumcision and conform to Jewish customs in other ways, for example, by observing the sacred calendar (Gal. 4.10), the militants (it was hoped) would be pacified.

Immediate Sequel. What effect the letter had in the churches to which it was sent we do not know. Paul's insistence on gentile believers' equal status with Jewish believers, his refusal of any procedure that compromised his converts' liberty, isolated him in large measure from his peers in the Christian movement as a whole. He was disillusioned when "even Barnabas," hitherto his closest colleague, joined those who found it expedient to stay aloof from association with gentile Christians at Antioch (Gal. 2.13). He continued to feel affection and respect for Barnabas, but confidence was no longer possible. He made no further use of the church of Antioch as a base for his missionary work, and he and the leaders of the Jerusalem church never again felt totally at ease with each other.

As for the churches of Galatia, their response to the letter is unrecorded. Certainly, circumcision soon ceased to be an issue throughout the gentile mission field. This could have been due in part to Paul's argument, but it may have been due even more to a ruling by the church of Jerusalem that circumcision was not to be required from gentile converts (Acts 15.23–29; see Apostolic Council). When Paul began to organize a relief fund for the church of Jerusalem, toward the end of his Aegean mission, he sent instructions to the churches of Galatia about their participation in this effort (1 Cor. 16.1), but it is not clear whether they made a contribution. Perhaps some of them did: one of Paul's companions on the journey to Jerusalem to hand over the contributions was Gaius, a man from Derbe (Acts 20.4).

Galilee (Map 5:X2–3). The name for the northern region of Palestine, meaning literally either the circle or the district. According to Joshua 19, this area was allotted to the tribes of Naphtali, Zebulun, and Dan, although the accounts of the tribal settlements suggest that the older population continued in the more prosperous regions such as the valley and the coast (Judg. 1.30, 33). Archaeological data, especially from surveys, add evidence of many new settlements throughout the region in the early Iron Age, as further south in the central hill country (see Conquest of Canaan). Galilee, together with some of its major cities, especially *Hazor, is only sporadically mentioned in biblical and nonbiblical sources in the first half of the first millennium BCE. After the fall of the northern kingdom in 722 BCE Galilee was included in the Assyrian province of Samaria, but it is unlikely that the whole Israelite population was ever completely uprooted in this largely rural area. While drawing a distinction between Upper and Lower Galilee, later writers, such as *Josephus and Pliny, extol the fertility and the variety of its agricultural produce.

The region receives more attention beginning in the Hellenistic period, when Simon, one of the Maccabean brothers, went there to rescue some fellow Jews during the persecution that followed Antiochus IV's Hellenistic reform in the mid-second century BCE (1 Macc. 5.14–23). This episode has suggested to many scholars that Galilee was then a thoroughly gentile region, but this may not be an accurate assessment. Scattered references from the Persian period (Tob. 1.10; Judith 4.6–10) indicate a continued Jewish presence there in Persian times. Archaeological surveys suggest that the region was not densely populated in the early Hellenistic period, and the episode involving Simon seems to have been confined to the region of Ptolemais. Josephus informs us that the Hasmonean Aristobulus I forcibly circumcised the Iturean people as part of the campaign to reestablish control of the old Israelite territory (Ant. 13.12.318–19.). This episode may have involved some of those dwelling in Upper Galilee but can scarcely be considered to have involved all Galilean Jews of the first century BCE.

The population of Galilee seems to have increased under the Hasmoneans by a process of "internal colonization," giving rise to a densely populated province by the first century CE (Josephus War 3.3.41–44). This "Jewish Galilee" emerged as a separate administrative unity when Pompey, the Roman general, carved up the Hasmonean kingdom, and its identity was further enhanced by the setting up of an administrative council for the region at Sepphoris by his successor Gavinius in 57 BCE. This center, and its rival Tiberias, founded by Herod Antipas in 19 CE, continued to dominate the whole of Lower Galilee administratively, whereas Upper Galilee retained a largely village culture into late Roman and Byzantine times.

Galilee's separate identity also emerged when the Romans once again intervened to carve up *Herod the Great's kingdom on his death in 4 BCE. The region, together with Perea, was entrusted to his son Herod Antipas, whose long reign (4 BCE to 39 CE) covered the career of Jesus of Nazareth. By contrast with Judea in the south, which came under direct Roman rule in 6 CE, with the consequent deterioration of social relations there, Antipas's reign appears to have brought stability to Jewish Galilee. Galilee also came under direct Roman rule, probably on the death of Herod Agrippa in 44 CE, although part of the region—Tiberias and Tarichaeae and their territories—had been given by Nero to Agrippa's son, Agrippa II, whose territory had previously been confined to Trachonitis in Transjordan.

In the First Jewish Revolt (66–70 CE), the Jewish revolutionary council appointed *Josephus as governor of Galilee at the outbreak of hostilities with Rome, but apart from a few centers such as Giscala, Gamala (situated in the Golan, although closely associated with Galilee), and Tiberias, the campaign was quickly brought to an end by the advancing Roman legions, and Josephus was captured after his last stand at the fortress of Jotapata, an account of which is highly embellished to extol his own military prowess (War 3.4.59–3.7.306). Galilee does not seem to have been involved in the Second Jewish Revolt (132–35 CE), and as part of the Roman settlement Jews from the south were forced northward. Thus, from the second century CE on, Galilee became a home of Jewish learning and piety in the land of Israel. It was there that the great scribal schools flourished at Usha, Sepphoris, and Tiberias, producing the *Mishnah and later the Palestinian *Talmud (Yerushalmi). Jews from all over the Mediterranean world were buried at Beth Shearim in Galilee. The excavated remains of the *synagogue there suggest a thriving local community with an independent religious life down to the Arab conquests of the seventh century CE, despite the increased Christian presence after Constantine's conversion.

This sketch of Galilean political and religious history should help to correct some false impressions of Galilee and Galileans that are often found in accounts of the career of *Jesus of Nazareth. Galilean life was relatively stable politically, especially in contrast to Judea, and so it is incorrect to see Galilee as the home of the *Zealots or as a hotbed of revolutionaries, at once more radical and more charismatic in the expressions of their Jewish religious loyalties. Nor were Galileans generally socially deprived or marginalized. The natural fertility of the region, its strategic location on the caravan routes to the East, as well as its role as a hinterland for the Phoenician trading centers, meant that its inhabitants were in a position to enjoy at least some of the benefits that the Hellenistic age brought to the East.

Galilee and Galileans are associated particularly with Jesus of Nazareth and his movement. While each of the four Gospels treats the region differently within the overall purposes of its narrative and does not give us the kind of detailed information about the region that one can glean from Josephus's Life, for example, many of their underlying social and religious assumptions are realistic on the basis of what can be reconstructed historically from other sources. For the evangelists also Galilee is thoroughly Jewish in its religious affiliation. Tensions between the religious claims on the region from Jerusalem and the distinctive regional ethos are recognized (Mark 3.22; 7.1). The rural setting predominates, and the lake region with its busy commercial life is highlighted. This picture, highly selective in its coloring, corresponds remarkably well with a more detailed profile that can be established with the aid of other sources. Galilee did indeed function as a symbol of the newness of Jesus' vision in contrast to the more established circles of Jewish belief for the early Christians, but all the indications are that the symbolic reference was grounded in an actual ministry that was conducted in the real Galilee of the first century CE. Galilee, Sea of (Map 12:Y2–3). A large, heart-shaped expanse of water, 20 km (12.5 mi) long by 11 km (7 mi) wide at its maximum points. It forms a deep basin surrounded by mountains on both sides and a narrow, shoreline plain where several important cities and towns are located. This pattern is broken only at the northwestern corner, where this strip opens out into the plain of Gennesar, the fertility of which was extolled by Josephus (War 3.516–21). The lake surface itself is ca. 210 m (700 ft) below sea level, thus forming a large basin for the waters of the *Jordan River. According to Josephus and Pliny its original name was the Lake of Gennesaret, although both authors are aware that it was also called the Lake of Tiberias (Josephus) or the Lake of Tarichaeae (Pliny), after two of the more important settlements on its shores in Roman times.

The gospels of Matthew (eleven times) and Mark (seven times) call it the Sea of Galilee, a designation also found in John 6 and 21. This may reflect the Hebrew (yam), which can mean either a freshwater lake or the sea properly understood. It has been suggested, however, that Mark's usage (followed by Matthew) has a more symbolic significance in terms of Jesus' control of the forces of evil that are associated with the deep (Job 38.8–11; Ps. 107.23–25, 28–29). Luke reserves the word "sea" for the Mediterranean and always speaks of the "lake of Gennesaret" (5.1, 2) or "the lake" (8.22–23, 33) when referring to the Sea of Galilee. The significance of this usage is that it suggests that Luke, although presumably not a native of Palestine, was able to project himself into that context and accurately reflect local usage in differentiating between sea and lake.

The lake provided a natural boundary between Jewish Galilee and the largely gentile territories of Gaulanitis and the *Decapolis directly across. Despite differences of religious affiliation among the population on either side of the lake, archaeological evidence suggests a real continuity in terms of life-styles, trading, and other relations. The Gospels also testify to this frequent movement, even when it is not always possible to detect accurately the points of embarkation and arrival (see Mark 6.45, 63; 8.10; John 6.22–24). Josephus too mentions fleets of boats on the lake, thus suggesting a busy and thriving subregion within Galilee and linking it with the larger region.

In addition, the lake was a natural resource for Galilee because of the fish industry. Strabo, Josephus, and Pliny, as well as the Gospels, all mention the plentiful supply of fish in the lake. Both Bethsaida and Tarichaeae are generally believed to have derived their names from the fish industry; the latter is most probably the Greek name for Magdala and is derived from the Greek term for preservation. Salting of fish, which made their export possible on a much wider scale, was, we know, a technical skill that was developed during the Hellenistic age. It is likely, therefore, that there was a genuine expansion of this industry in Palestine also. Josephus mentions (War 3.8.520) one type of fish, the coracin belonging to the eel family, which was also found in the Nile, suggesting perhaps that the early Ptolemaic rulers had expanded the fish industry to Galilee as a commercial enterprise. In this regard it is worth noting that James and John, the sons of Zebedee, would appear to have abandoned a thriving business, when they left their father and his hired servants to follow the call of Jesus (Mark 1.16–20). Gamaliel. Gamaliel the Elder was a first-century CE teacher. Although he is not often quoted in the *Mishnah, it is said that "when he died the glory of the Torah ended" (m. Soṭa 9.15).

Gamaliel is best known outside the Mishnah for his brief speech in Acts 5.35–39. Identified as a *Pharisee respected by the people, Gamaliel counsels the *Sanhedrin to leave the early Christian leaders alone: "If this plan or this undertaking is of human origin, it will fail; but if it is of God, you will not be able to overthrow them." He is also identified as *Paul's teacher in Acts 22.3. J. ANDREW OVERMAN

Garden of Eden. See Eden, Garden of.

Gehenna. The place where, according to Jesus in the synoptic Gospels, sinners are punished after death. A few times Hades (see *Hell) is also treated as such a place of punishment (Matt. 11.23; Luke 10.14; 16.23), but it is cited more often as the realm of death in general. (The NRSV translates Grk. geenna as "hell.")

Gehenna was originally the Hebrew name of a valley just south of *Jerusalem's southwestern hill (Josh. 15.8) called "the valley of Hinnom" (gê' hinnōm) or "the valley of Hinnom's son(s)" (gê' ben(ê) hinnōm); Map 9. Under the influence of the Aramaic form gēhinnā(m), the Greek transliteration of the word became geenna. "Hinnom" may be understood as the representative of a *Jebusite group that once dominated the place in question, but the Bible mentions only the valley. In boundary lists it forms the border between Judah and Benjamin south of the Jebusite city (Josh. 15.8; 18.16), implying that Jerusalem belonged to Benjamin.

The later view of Gehenna as a place of punishment, especially by fire, is anticipated in an Isaianic reference to a large *topheth, or burning place, near Jerusalem, said to be lit by the Lord to punish the *Assyrians and their king (Isa. 30.33). A further stage in the development of the relevant concepts is reached in the report concerning King *Josiah's cultic reform of 622 BCE, which implied a desecration of similar topheths in Judah, especially one found in the valley of Hinnom and dedicated to Molech for children (2 Kings 23.10; cf. 2 Chron. 28.3; 33.6). The elimination ordered by Josiah was not entirely successful, for somewhat later Jeremiah made repeated attacks on the topheth and said the valley of Hinnom would become a general burial place (Jer. 7.31; 19.11; 32.35).

On the basis of such passages and influenced by parallelism with Persian ideas of a judgment in fire, Jewish *apocalypticism made the valley of Hinnom a place of punishment within an eschatological milieu. In a vision ascribed to *Enoch a cavity was depicted, into which the faithful Jews, gathered on the holy mountain, would look down to see the righteous judgment and eternal punishment of all godless and cursed people (1 Enoch 26.4; 27.2–3). No name appears here, but since the details of the picture indicate the topography of Jerusalem, the cavity in question must have been meant as the valley of Hinnom. The joining of the eschatological perspective to Jerusalem then led to an explicit use of the name Gehenna for that place of punishment, a usage that emerges in texts of the first century CE in the New Testament (e.g., Matt. 5.22; 10.28; 23.15, 33; James 3.6) and in Jewish apocalypse (e.g., 2 Esdras 7.36, in the Latin translation "Gehenna"). In the *Mishnah and later rabbinic texts, the name Gehenna (gê' hinnōm) has superseded the older term for the underworld (Sheol). Gehenna is also the ordinary term in the *Qur'ān for the place of ultimate punishment.

Genealogies. This entry consists of two articles, the first on genealogies in the Hebrew Bible, especially in the book of Genesis, and the second on genealogies in the New Testament.

Hebrew Bible

A genealogy is a catalogue of the most important information about the successive members of a family's lineage, including their birth, marriage, offspring, age achieved, and death (with many variations). This listing of biographical facts serves to preserve the continuity of a family in its progression through time. Genesis 11.10–11 (*P) is an example of a simple genealogy: "These are the descendants of Shem. When Shem was one hundred years old, he became the father of Arpachshad two years after the flood; and Shem lived after the birth of Arpachshad five hundred years, and had other sons and daughters." Originally, genealogies simply preserved a family's generational succession; later they also came to express kinship and social, political, and religious relationships, as well as connections within larger communities.

Genealogies are an independent genre whose origins go back to nomadic tribes; evidence is found mainly among Arab nomads and African tribes, in some cases to this day. They represent the history of a "prehistoric" period and lose their function after the creation of a state, to be replaced by historical facts.

There are two main types of genealogy. In the linear form, family heads are given in a straight progression from the founder of the clan down to the last or currently living representative; this serves simply to establish the lineage of the latest descendant. The other form follows the diverging branches of a family and exhibits the divisions among the communities descended from the sons of a single ancestor (e.g., Noah in Gen. 10). Genealogies, which were transmitted orally, are intrinsically mutable; changes in the relationships of groups within a larger community are expressed as changes in their genealogies. This capacity for change explains the contradictions between some genealogies: they reflect actual developments in the history of such groups.

Genealogies are an important component of the Bible and of Genesis in particular, establishing the continuity of events through the succession of generations. The original locus of genealogy is the history of the *ancestors in Genesis 12–50, where generational succession provides the framework for the narrative; subsequently, genealogies were used in accounts of primeval history as well. In religious-historical terms, this corresponds to the depiction of cosmogony as theogony; in some religions, as in those of *Egypt and *Mesopotamia, the origin of the world and its elements is attributed to a succession of divine births. An echo of this can still be found in the Hebrew designation of creation as tôlēdôt ("generations" in the literal sense) of heaven and earth (Gen. 1.1). Genealogies, however, occur in the Bible only after the creation of humankind; primeval events have been shifted from divine to human history. The genealogies in Genesis depict all of humanity as the effect of the creator's blessing, from *Adam to *Noah (chap. 5: linear genealogy) and then branching out from Noah's sons to cover the entire known world (chap. 10: branching genealogy). These genealogies knit the individual accounts of primeval events in Genesis 1–11 into a coherent narrative.

Genealogies enclose the history of the ancestors as a whole, as well as framing each of the smaller sections (chaps. 12–25 and 25–36); they thus serve as formal elements in the composition of narrative units. Narratives sometimes begin and/or end with genealogies (e.g., Gen. 34; Ruth 1.2; 4.18–22). Genealogical information delineates the lives of *Abraham and his sons. A genealogy marks the transition from primeval times to the history of the ancestors (Shem to Terah in Gen. 11.10–26 and Terah's sons in 11.27–32). Difficulties concerning the genealogies within the ancestral history arise primarily because they reflect two stages: first, the development of a small kinship group (as in Gen. 25.19–20), and second, the formation of the *tribes (e.g., the twelve sons of Jacob as the fathers of the later twelve tribes of Israel).

In earlier stages of the development of the genre, genealogy and narrative are more tightly integrated. Genealogical information anchors the narrative in a continuous temporal progression. One can merge into the other; a narrative frequently grows out of an item in a genealogy. The proximity of genealogy to narrative is demonstrated in the short elaborations within genealogies, including references to an occupation, as in Genesis 4.2 and 10.9; mention of a contemporaneous event, as in 10.25; or a remark concerning childlessness, as in 11.30. Thus, in the early stages, genealogies contained quite a few narrative elements. In subsequent traditions (P in particular), they follow a fixed format of identical or near-identical sentences, as in Genesis 5.6–8: "When Seth had lived one hundred five years, he became the father of Enoch. Seth lived after the birth of Enoch eight hundred seven years, and had other sons and daughters. Thus all the days of Seth were nine hundred twelve years; and he died." Though limited to a few facts, this form still preserves the life histories of those making up the chain of generations. In a final, later stage, all that remains is a list of names—no longer genealogy in the true sense of the word. A variant development is illustrated by the story of *Joseph, in which genealogy has so completely merged with the narrative as to lose its independent existence.

The developmental phases of the genre of genealogy can be observed in the line of *Esau's descendants (Gen. 36), where a kinship phase (his sons) is followed by one of tribes (the chiefs) and then by one of kings; the format changes accordingly.

After the formation of a state, genealogies, having been reduced to mere lists, tend to lose their importance. In a monarchy, they serve a political function in securing the succession to the throne; for a priesthood they have religious significance in securing succession to sacred office. In these contexts, genealogies still play a role in the life of the community; the lists of names in 1 Chronicles 1–9, however, are a purely literary device.

New Testament

The New Testament contains two genealogies of *Jesus: one in Matthew 1.1–16, which traces his descent from *Abraham, and one in Luke 3.23–38, which reverses the order. While Matthew's genealogy is limited to the Abrahamic line, Luke's goes back to *Adam. Perhaps as a mnemonic device, Matthew or his source divided the generations from Abraham to Jesus into three groups of fourteen (1.17): fourteen generations from Abraham to *David, fourteen from David to the Babylonian *exile, and fourteen from the Babylonian exile to Jesus. In order to maintain the symmetry, the names of the kings Ahaziah, Joash, and Amaziah were dropped from the second list of fourteen between Joram (Jehoram) and Uzziah. Other omissions may have occurred in Matthew's third list of fourteen, because Luke, who presents a different lineage between *Zerubbabel and *Joseph, records nineteen names for the same period.

Matthew's genealogy seems to be intentionally formed around a predetermined number. Most likely he meant to show that Jesus is a royal descendant of Abraham and David, in fact a new David: the sum of the numerical value of the Hebrew consonants in the name "David" ($d + w + d = 4 + 6 + 4$) is fourteen, and Jesus is frequently called "son of David" throughout the gospel of Matthew.

Four women appear in Matthew's list, though they are not found in Luke's. This is notable because in biblical times lineage was traced through males. Even more surprising is that three of these women were non-Israelites: *Rahab the Canaanite, *Ruth the Moabite, and (presumably) *Bathsheba, the wife of Uriah the Hittite. Their mention anticipates the inclusion of *gentiles among Jesus' disciples (Matt. 28.19).

The genealogy in Luke 3.23–38 has variations in different textual traditions. According to most Greek manuscripts (followed by the United Bible Societies' Greek New Testament), there are 11×7 generations from Adam to Jesus (that is, from Adam to Abraham, 3×7 generations; from Isaac to David, 2×7 generations; from Nathan to Salathiel (preexilic), 3×7 generations; from Zerubbabel (postexilic) to Jesus, 3×7 generations). Other Greek manuscripts, the Latin *Vulgate, and the Syriac Peshitta record 76 generations, and some Latin manuscripts list 72 generations. Most likely Luke traces Jesus' genealogy back through Abraham to Adam to show that Jesus is not only the fulfillment of the history of Israel, but also that he is the savior of the world.

Many attempts have been made to reconcile the two genealogies, which after David agree in only two names (Shealtiel [Salathiel] and *Zerubbabel). Because none of these attempts have been generally accepted, it is likely that these inconsistent genealogies serve separate literary functions and are not to be interpreted like modern registers of pedigree. Matthew's genealogy is meant to show Jesus' Davidic, royal descent, and Luke's to underscore the universal role of Jesus as *Son of God.

The word genealogy occurs twice in a disparaging sense: in 1 Timothy 1.4 ("endless genealogies that promote speculations"), and in Titus 3.9 ("avoid . . . genealogies . . . for they are unprofitable"). Because the larger contexts refer to *myths, the allusions may be to the various emanations ("aeons") between God and humankind in *gnostic belief. Or, since Titus 1.14 relates to Jewish myths and 1 Timothy 1.7 calls into question the claims of those who desire to be teachers of the *Law, the genealogies referred to may be based on biblical sources but elaborated in the same way as the Book of Jubilees and more generally aggadah.

BRUCE M. METZGER

Genesis, The Book of. Genesis is the book of beginnings. Its account of primeval history (chaps. 1–11) extends from the creation of the world and humankind (chaps. 1–2) through its near destruction and preservation in the Flood (chaps. 6–9) to the spread of humankind over the earth (chaps. 10–11). The subsequent history of the *ancestors extends from *Abraham to the sons of *Jacob.

Chapters 1–11: Primeval History. Chapters 1–11 of Genesis form an internally coherent unity. The *creation (chaps. 1–2) and *Flood (chaps. 6–9) belong together; the crime against a brother (chap. 4) belongs within the story of rebellion against God (chap. 3; see Fall, The).

The building blocks of chapters 1–11 are narratives (chaps. 1; 2–3; 4; 6–9) and *genealogies (chaps. 5; 10). The narratives recount the beginnings of the world and its people; they cover the creation of the earth and of human beings (chaps. 1–2), wrongdoing and punishment (chaps. 3; 4; 6–9; 11), the first signs of cultural development, and the scattering of tribes and tongues. It is through the genealogies that the events in Genesis 1–11 become a coherent story. The creator's blessing causes the expansion of humankind through the course of time (chap. 5: genealogy from *Adam to Abraham) and the reach of space (chap. 10: the table of nations). Between the two genealogies stands the catastrophe of the Flood (chaps. 6–9), which is caused by the corruption of humankind and threatens to destroy its existence. The accounts of wrongdoing and punishment demonstrate the many possibilities for transgression; both the individual (chaps. 3; 4; 9) and the group (6.1–4, 5–9; 11) can overstep the boundaries set for human beings.

The narratives of creation. The creation of the world and the creation of humankind are independent traditions, each found in early religions throughout the world; the creation of humankind is the earlier of the two. Creation stories did not arise out of a curiosity about origins but from a sense of the menace to human existence in an endangered world. The older narrative (chaps. 2–3) emphasizes the creation of the human race, intertwined with the story of its failure; the limits of sin and death are an integral part of human existence. Human beings themselves, formed from earthly elements, become living beings by receiving the breath of God. They are creatures in all aspects of their existence; these include territory (the garden), food (the fruit of the garden), labor (the tilling and keeping of garden), community (the creation of woman), language (the call and naming), and their relationship to God.

The later narrative (1.1–2.4) emphasizes the creation of the world. In early religions, creation occurs through action, through generation and birth, and through combat. In Genesis 1, everything that exists or becomes has its origins in God's commanding word. The distribution of creation over seven days forms a temporal unity that recalls the week and its culmination in the *Sabbath, and it suggests that the history of creation and humanity also has an aim. The creation of plants and animals according to species show that a created order can include evolution rather than excluding it. The creation of the human "in God's image" means "corresponding to God," that is, as a creature to whom God can speak and who can respond to God. Human dignity is based on this likeness to God. Human rule over the rest of creation is understood in terms of the rule of a king who is responsible for the well-being of his subjects. The growth of humankind involves human effort and the advancement of culture. The refrain, "And God saw that it was good," signifies that creation was good in God's eyes, that it was in accord with God's purpose.

The narratives of wrongdoing and punishment: human limitations. The present human condition is explained as having emerged from the basic and polarized experiences of being at once secure in God and alienated from God. Created by God, the human creature can turn against God and thus incur guilt. This is recounted in the expulsion from the garden (chap. 3). The serpent, the source of temptation, is a creature of God; there is no explanation for the provenance of evil. But God seeks out even the guilty ("Where are you?" [3.9]), and they are able to defend themselves. The punishment is expulsion from the garden, from God's presence and from access to the tree of life (although mortality is already part of the human condition [3.19]). In chap. 4, crime against a brother augments the disobedience to God's command ("Where is your brother Abel?"). Separated from God, human beings become capable of murder and, in 9.20–28, of dishonoring their parents. To this is added the overstepping of boundaries by human communities, as in 6.1–4 (the sons of God), chaps. 6–9 (the destruction of humanity), and 11.1–9 (the *tower of Babel).

Development of the text. The development of the book of Genesis was a long process extending over centuries. The first book of Moses, or Genesis, as we know it, is only the final stage of this process. Oral tradition—narratives, genealogies, itineraries—played a large part in the evolution of this book; it was a long way to the present unity that combines all of primeval and ancestral history. The question of the identity of the author (in the modern sense) of Genesis is irrelevant. It was not writers or poets who desired and first formulated these accounts; their origins lie in the human communities to whose life they belonged. Thus they express an understanding of God, of the world, and of humanity, which did not yet make distinctions between knowledge and belief, between science, philosophy, history, and religion. This explains in part the parallels to the themes of the creation story in many other cultures. These parallels were not necessarily due to literary derivation; rather, questions about origins were asked everywhere in early human history. Therefore, primeval events cannot be understood or described as the beginning of history; it is misguided to inquire about their "historicity." The appropriate question to ask of this material is not, "Did it really happen that way?" but, "Is it our world that is being portrayed? Is this description of human beings accurate?" The essential fact is that, in describing creation, people for the first time grasped the world, and humanity, as a whole.

Chapters 12–50: History of the Ancestors. The narratives of the ancestors extend from Abraham and Sarah to the sojourn of Jacob's family in Egypt. For the most part, they are family stories, dealing with the basic relationships within a familial community: the relationship of parents and children (chaps. 12–25: *Abraham, *Sarah, and *Hagar; *Ishmael and *Isaac), of siblings (chaps. 25–36: *Jacob and *Esau), and of both (chaps. 37–50: *Joseph, his father, and brothers). In these stories the family is the paradigm of community from which all others arise. Human existence is experienced through the succession of generations. One's own identity is preserved in the tales of the ancestors, and only by telling those tales is a link with them established.

Three epochs are reflected in the three generations of Genesis. The first (chaps. 12–25) is dominated chiefly by primal events; life and death are repeatedly at stake. In the second (chaps. 26–36), institutions such as property rights, judicial practice, and sacred rites in sacred locations begin to play a role. The third (chaps. 37–50) reflects the confrontation of kin and kingship in Joseph's rule over his brothers.

The ancestral narratives grew out of oral traditions. They consist of various types of stories, genealogies, itineraries, and divine oracles. In the oral stage of transmission, these elements simply occurred in various versions and underwent many changes in the course of their existence. This is also true of the divine oracles, which trace their origins back to the ancestral period but owe their further development to a later time. Our concept of history cannot be applied to these narratives; they are not historical writing. Rather, they grew out of an interest in telling of one's own ancestors in order to preserve their memory, and this only made sense if the accounts did include true reports of actual persons: in a preliterary age, past events are narrated in order to allow their hearers to share in them.

In its written form, the text in chaps. 12–36 developed from the union of two independent texts, *J ("Yahwist," the earlier of the two) and *P ("Priestly," the more recent). The older text in chaps. 12–25 and 25–36 knits together stories and accounts from the era of the ancestors into a coherent history; the author functioned simultaneously as transmitter, poet, and theologian. This work subsequently underwent a series of expansions. The more recent work grew out of a priestly theology. In addition to its narratives, this text is dominated by genealogies and itineraries that describe the course of Abraham's life (Isaac's is only alluded to) and that of Jacob and Esau. Divine promises and calls occupy a central position in both sections (chaps. 17 and 35), and the concept of *covenant is of prime significance. Characteristic of P are the etiologies of precultic rites, such as *circumcision (chap. 17), kin *marriage (chaps. 27–28), and burial on one's own land (chap. 23), which establish the family as the basic cell of the nation. This more recent text has radically altered the history from a theological point of view. A redactor (R) created a coherent presentation of ancestral history out of these two texts. (See *Pentateuch for more detail.)

The time of the ancestors cannot be determined with certainty (attempts to fix its beginnings have ranged from 2200 to 1200 BCE). At any rate, it is the era before the *Exodus and the settlement of the tribes in Canaan. The individuals and the societal structures belong to the prepolitical life-style of pastoral *nomads before they become settled, lacking economic or political safeguards, and passing by walled cities at a distance. They live with elemental threats to their survival: hunger and thirst, natural catastrophes, danger from those in power. For them, temporal continuity exists only in the succession of generations; the future is embodied in their offspring.

Chapters 12–25: the Abraham cycle. These chapters contain a variety of tales about Abraham, framed by genealogies (11.27–32; 25.1–18) and connected by itineraries. The narratives follow two trajectories: one begins with Sarah's sterility (11.30) and leads to the birth of Isaac (21.1–7) through 12.10–20; 15.2–4, 16, 21; and 17.15–17; in addition there are the later accounts in chaps. 22; 23; and 24. This trajectory concerns the continuation of a family's life from one generation to another among threats and tensions. The Abraham-Lot narratives (chaps. 13; 18; and 19) form a second trajectory, which deals with a family's territory. At the center are the destruction of *Sodom and the rescue of *Lot.

Beside the narratives, an independent line of tradition is found in the divine pronouncements. Their point of departure and core is the prophecy foretelling a son (15.2–3; 16.11; 18.10–14; 17.15–21), one of the earliest Abraham stories. The prophecies of blessing, multiplying, and landowning belong to a later tradition. At the center (chaps. 15–17), prophecies accumulate and form their own narratives.

Between the first ending (chap. 21) and the final one (chap. 25), three detailed stories belonging to a late phase of the Abraham tradition have been inserted (chaps. 22; 23; and 24). Abraham's questioning of God concerning the destruction of Sodom (chap. 18.16–33) also belongs to this late phase. The account of Abraham and the kings (chap. 14) is a very late addition.

Chapters 26–36: the Jacob-Esau cycle. The heart of chaps. 26–36 is the conflict between the brothers Jacob and Esau; at its center is Jacob's indenture to Laban (chaps. 29–31) and the birth of Jacob's sons (chaps. 29.31–30.24: the quarrel between *Leah and *Rachel). These too are tales of conflict. Genealogies form the introduction and conclusion, and the theme of flight and return (chaps. 29–33) provides a larger narrative framework. The conflicts concern territory, food supply, and social standing. Accounts of holy places and encounters with God have been inserted in this context (chaps. 28, 32, and 35). Chap. 26, a remnant of the oral tradition, and chap. 34, an episode from the time of the Judges, do not belong in this context. The conflicts in the Jacob-Esau cycle take place in a familial setting and must be resolved there, since they all endanger the survival of the group; consequently, the narratives tend toward a peaceful resolution of conflict, as in the reconciliation of Jacob and Esau (chap. 33).

The religion of the ancestors. The religion of the ancestral period differs from that of Israel in later times (see Israel, Religion of). It is entirely determined by a personal relationship to God, which corresponds to the life-style of the ancestors. They are dependent on God's blessing; he bestows fertility on humans and their livestock, grants success in enterprise, and lets flocks increase and children mature. God is with them on their path; he helps them to find watering places, directs their journeys, and guides their departures and settlings. They are as dependent on God's promises as on his guidance, for they have no other safeguards for the future. While in chaps. 12–25 God's promises carry a vital significance for the whole, in chaps. 26–36 it is his blessing that occupies this position; God's blessing is the outcome even of the brothers' quarrel as well as of several other episodes.

God not only blesses, he is also the one who saves. He answers the lament of the childless with the promise of a child (17.15–19), which constitutes deliverance. God hears the cry of a thirsty child and leads the mother to a spring (21.15–19). In this relationship with God there is no need for laws. The *curse does not yet stand beside the *blessing, and the covenant is not yet paired with the threat of judgment. This is a prepolitical form of religion; the God of the ancestors has nothing to do with waging war.

In all these narratives, the ancestors are dealing with only one God. There is no sense of polytheistic influence from the surrounding culture. It is the single God on whom they call and in whom they trust, although one cannot describe the religion of the ancestors as a studied *monotheism. They do not yet have an institutional cult; they have no temple, no priesthood, and no cultic laws. Whatever passes between God and human beings happens directly. Only expansions such as 18.16–38 contain intellectual reflections. It is only in such later passages, and not in the ancestral period, that theological concepts, such as *faith, *righteousness, trial, and *covenant, receive significance. The later text of P begins to use language of a theological cast; and only in the later layers of tradition does one find the idealization of the ancestors and the accentuation of their merits.

Chapters 37–50: the Joseph story. The narrative begins with a quarrel between *Joseph and his brothers (chap. 37) and ends with their reconciliation and reunion (chaps. 45–46). In chaps. 46–50 as in 37, the Joseph story is connected with that of Jacob. These connections at the beginning and the end show that the Joseph narrative is meant to continue the ancestral history. The Joseph story in the narrow sense (chaps. 37–45 [except 38] along with sections of chaps. 46–50) is a unified work, complete in itself, from the hand of an unknown writer who was also a theologian. It is an extensive family history, which proceeds from an imminent rift in the family of Jacob to the healing of that rift. The story is structured around two settings: the house of Jacob and Pharaoh's court. It starts with the quarrel of Joseph and his brothers (chap. 37). Chaps. 37–41 tell of Joseph's rise in *Egypt; chaps. 42–45 take up the journeys of Joseph's brothers to Egypt and end with their reconciliation. The kingdom is incorporated into the narrative by setting parts of the story at Pharaoh's court; the restoration of peace in Jacob's family becomes possible through Joseph's high position at the Egyptian court, and at the same time, famine is averted from the Egyptian people. Thus, the Joseph story corresponds to two periods in the history of the people of Israel, that of the kings and that of the ancestors, and creates a connection between them. The end of the story concerns Jacob's testament and death, and finally the death of Joseph. Chaps. 38 (Judah and Tamar) and 49 (sayings of the tribes) are not part of the Jacob story but were inserted later.

The Joseph story is a unified literary narrative, the work of one author in the early monarchic period. The author is not the same as that of the older J tradition (chaps. 12–36); the technique and style are different, for the Joseph story is not compiled from separate narratives and contains no genealogies or itineraries. This story is meant to be heard, not read; thus, the shape of the narrative is clearly defined, both as a whole and in the individual sections. Narrative techniques include key words (three pairs of dreams, Joseph's coat, famine) and doublets (two settings, two journeys, pairs of dreams). The lively description of people and interpersonal relations is characteristic, as in Joseph's rise and fall at court and the danger of abusing power.

The Joseph story is not a didactic wisdom narrative. Only chaps. 39–41 have a connection to *wisdom literature, conditioned by their subject: the wisdom of a statesman at the royal court. Pharaoh describes Joseph as a wise statesman, but his is no artificially learned, scholastic wisdom, but instead a wisdom bestowed by God and matured by hard experience.

God is with Joseph in the low and high points of his life. The effect of his blessing is directed at an individual, but it also gains a universal scope when he averts famine from Egypt. He is the God of peace who heals the rift in the family of Jacob. The God who blesses is also the God who saves. He seeks after the guilty and makes possible forgiveness and reconciliation. The interpretation in 45.5–8 and 50.19–21 summarizes the action of God in this story: God has incorporated the evil doings of the brothers into his working of good. It is God's action that fashions the sequence of events into a whole; at the same time, the whole sequence of events is encompassed within it.

Gentile. From the Latin gens (literally, "nation"; Hebr. gôy; Grk. ethnos), "gentile" refers to a non-Jew or, more broadly, anyone outside the covenant community of Israel. Postexilic times witness references to individual gentiles as opposed to nations; concurrently, the possibility of *conversion to Judaism appears. Gentiles depicted in the Bible are as diverse as are Jews: From *Rahab to *Ruth, Haman to Holofernes, they come from various locations and play various roles—helpers, oppressors, witnesses, tempters.

Joshua 24.11 mentions the seven nations from whom the covenant community is to maintain separation (see Exod. 23.23–33; Deut. 7; Josh. 23). Yet a "mixed multitude" accompanies the community escaping Egypt (Exod. 12.38), and rules for the resident *alien permit the circumcised sojourner to participate in Israel's religious life (Exod. 12.48–49). The so-called promise motif (Gen. 12.3; see Ps. 72.17; Jer. 4.2) insists that by *Abraham "all the families of the earth will bless themselves/be blessed"; Isaiah 42.6 (see 60.3) calls Israel "a light to the nations"; and *Jonah is commissioned to preach to Nineveh. Yet Ezra (9–10) and Nehemiah (10.30; 13.23–30) require *divorce of gentile wives (see also Exod. 34.15–16), and the condemnation of gentile nations is a common prophetic motif. The Hebrew book of *Esther does not decry intermarriage, and the book of Ruth celebrates the union of a Judean man to a *Moabite woman, but the Greek additions to Esther and the book of *Tobit value endogamy (see Marriage).

Connections between Jewish and gentile communities existed in politics, trade, and even religious practices. Some gentiles became *proselytes (Jth. 14.10; Acts 6.5); others were attracted to Jewish practices and *synagogues (the "God-fearers"). The pseudepigraphical book of Joseph and Asenath presents the Egyptian priest's daughter whom Joseph marries as the archetypal proselyte. Gentiles also participated in worship in the Herodian *Temple (Josephus, War 2.17.412–16; 4.4.275; 5.13.563).

Jewish reactions to gentiles are also diverse. Most Jewish groups in the Hellenistic and early Roman periods believed that the righteous among the gentiles would achieve salvation, but they would do so as gentiles and by divine decree at the end of time. Such dual soteriology may also underlie Romans 9–11. Genesis Rabbah 34.8 lists the Noachide commandments incumbent on gentiles. Tosepta Sanhedrin 13.2 mentions gentiles who receive a place in the word to come (but see 1QM; 4 Ezra 3.32–36; ʿAbod. Zar. 24a). Jews were to deal honestly with gentiles (ʿAbod. Zar. 26a) and relieve their poor (Giṭ. 61a) even as they were warned against associating with idolaters. Neither scriptural warrant nor unambiguous historical evidence exists for an organized Jewish program to convert gentiles. Distinctions were to be kept between Jew and gentile, but the manner in which separation was maintained varied economically, socially, geographically, ritually, and philosophically.

Early Christian views of gentiles are generally positive; this is not surprising, given that the church found gentile territory fertile soil for its messages and that most of its canonical documents are addressed to gentile or partially gentile communities. Matthew's *genealogy includes gentiles, and the gospel concludes with the command to make disciples of all the nations (or gentiles, panta ta ethnē; 28.19); Luke has *Simeon predict that Jesus will be "a light for revelation to the Gentiles" (2.32). *Paul is the apostle to the gentiles both in Acts and in his own letters. How Jesus himself regarded gentiles is not clear. In Matthew 10.5b–6; 15.24, he forbids his disciples to engage in a gentile mission (see also Rom. 15.8), but Luke 4 depicts his early willingness to extend the good news to non-Jews. And both comments may be redactional inserts.

Anticipated by the conversion of Cornelius in Acts 10, behavior incumbent on gentile Christians is confirmed by the *Apostolic Council in Jerusalem (Acts 15): gentiles were to follow what was likely a combination of Noachide commandments and the laws incumbent on the resident alien (see also Gal. 2). Scholars debate whether Paul himself insisted that all ritual law was abrogated in light of the Christ event, or whether ethic Jews could retain ritual practices. Within a century, this debate ended: Christianity became predominantly gentile, and Jewish practices were labeled heresies. Today, especially in the United States, "gentile" is often viewed as synonymous with "Christian." This is not, however, the case among members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (Mormons), who refer to those outside their community (including Jews) as "gentiles." AMY-JILL LEVINE Geography of Palestine. (For this article map references are not given; Map 1 and the index to the maps should be consulted.) From the time of the Greek historian Herodotus (fifth century BCE), the term "Palestine" (derived from the word for *Philistine) designated the western tip of the Fertile Crescent, namely, the area on both sides of the *Jordan River, limited on the north by the Litani River and Mount *Hermon, on the east by the Syrian desert, on the south by the *Negeb desert, and on the west by the Mediterranean Sea. It falls into six broad geographical regions: the coastal plain, the Shephelah, the central mountain range, the Judean desert, the Jordan Valley, and the Transjordanian plateau. These can be visualized as north-south strips set side by side.

The Coastal Plain. This strip is divided into three unequal portions by the Ladder of Tyre (Rosh ha-Niqra/Ras en-Naqura) and Mount Carmel. Above Rosh ha-Niqra, the plain widens to the north reaching its greatest width at the *Phoenician city of Tyre, which in biblical times was an island. Between Rosh ha-Niqra and Mount Carmel, the plain averages 8 km (5 mi) in width. In addition to an annual rainfall of 600 mm (24 in), it is thoroughly watered, particularly south of Ptolemais (Akko), where the alluvium deposited by the Naaman and Kishon rivers has pushed the coastline forward into the Bay of Haifa. The two tips of the bay form natural harbors at Akko and Tell Abu Hawam.

South of Mount Carmel, the smooth coastline is devoid of natural harbors, but in antiquity there were lighterage stations at Dor, Strato's Tower, and Jaffa. In this area, the plain is much broader and runs all the way to Gaza. It is characterized by three parallel kurkar ridges, the remnants of prehistoric coastlines. The sand outside the first ridge gave way to swamps within, caused by the failure of rivers and *wadis to drain completely. In biblical times, the third ridge was covered with oak, and the rich soil of the land reaching to the foothills was ideal for *agriculture. The plain is divided in two by the Yarkon River, which begins at Aphek (Rosh haʿAyin). The plain of Sharon north of the Yarkon receives almost twice as much rain (300 mm [12 in]) as the plain of Philistia to the south. The great commercial highway, the Way of the Sea, had to pass through the 3 km (2 mi) gap between Aphek and the hills. This became a major crossroads when *Herod the Great built the first artificial harbor at Strato's Tower and named it Caesarea Maritima.

The Shephelah. As the biblical name ("lowlands") indicates, this is an area of low, rolling hills roughly 45 km (28 mi) long and 15 km (9 mi) broad, lying south of the Aijalon valley. The soft chalk and limestone hills are cut by wide valleys running both north-south and east-west. Even the driest part in the south receives about 250 mm (10 in) of rain, and in the biblical period it was intensely cultivated. Olives, sycamore figs, and vineyards are mentioned explicitly in the Bible. The key cities were *Gezer in the north, which dominated both the plain and the easiest access to the mountains, and *Lachish in the south, which controlled the main route through the center to Beth-shemesh and also the lateral route to *Hebron.

The Central Mountain Range. This region is by far the biggest, and can be divided into three areas, *Galilee, Carmel and *Samaria, and Judea.

Galilee. This mountainous area is bordered on the north by the Litani River and on the south by the Jezreel Valley, which runs along the north side of the Carmel range and broadens out into the great plain of Esdraelon (365 km^2 [140 mi^2]) before sloping gently to join the Jordan Valley at Beth-shean. Because ancient settlements appear only on the edges, it must have been subject to flooding in biblical times. It was, nonetheless, a very important east-west route.

The classical division into Upper and Lower Galilee is based on the simple fact that the three highest peaks of the former are all over 1000 m (3300 ft), whereas the two highest of the latter barely attain 600 m (2000 ft). Even though both benefit by an average rainfall of 800–500 mm (30–20 in), the terrain is generally unsuited to agriculture, and in the biblical period was covered by oak forests. The isolation of the perfectly rounded Mount Tabor (588 m [1929 ft]) gave it a numinous quality. Beside it ran the Way of the Sea, angling out from Hazor to the coast through the Carmel range.

Carmel and Samaria. Running southeast from the coast, the Carmel range is cut by two strategic passes, the Nahal Yoqneam and the Nahal ʿIron, the latter with *Megiddo at its northern end. South of the Dothan Valley, the ridge coalesces with the mountains of Gilboa to create a much wider range with no Shephelah on the west and a steep drop into the Jordan Valley on the east. The central core of the area is constituted by Mount Gerizim (881 m [2889 ft]) and Mount Ebal (941 m [3083 ft]). The pass between them, controlled by *Shechem (Nablus), carried the major east-west route coming from the Jordan via the verdant Wadi el-Farʿah, in which Tirzah, (Tell el-Farʿah) is located, and out to the coast just south of Samaria. This was the heartland of the northern kingdom of Israel, and the contrast between the closed site of Tirzah and the wide prospect to the west from Samaria is symbolic of the shift in policy that took place under Omri in the ninth century BCE (1 Kings 16.23–24; see Israel, History of). In this period, the hills were heavily wooded, but the valleys, which are wider in the north, produced grain, olives, and grapes. North-south travel was difficult, except on the crest running south from Shechem. The first 20 km (12 mi) of the route lay in the fertile Michmethath Valley, but after the ascent of Lubban the road wound in narrow wadis past the sanctuaries of Shiloh and Bethel.

Judea. Geographically, the Jerusalem hills are a saddle between Ramallah and *Bethlehem, which is some 200 m (650 ft) lower than the highest points of Samaria to the north and Hebron to the south. This facilitated east-west travel, and there have always been relatively easy routes to the coastal plain and the Jordan Valley. The forests that covered the hills when the Israelites first occupied the area gradually disappeared. The demands of a growing city were intensified by the insatiable appetite for firewood of a sacrificial cult that endured almost a thousand years. After the hills had been denuded, terraces began to be built on the slopes. The small fields thus developed supported mainly olive trees, but some grain crops as well. The average rainfall is 560 mm (22 in). Enveloped by higher hills with a poor water supply and a location off the natural routes, *Jerusalem would have been doomed to insignificance had *David not given it political weight by making it a religious center.

South of Bethlehem, the hills rise toward Hebron (1000 m [3300 ft]) and then descend to the great plain around Beer-sheba. The tree cover in the biblical period was oak with patches of pine, but Genesis 49.11 attests the intense cultivation of the *vine in the valleys and on terraces. The only significant route ran north-south with only one good branch route to the coastal plain. The geographic homogeneity of the Hebron hills helps to explain why it was always the territory of a single tribe, *Judah.

The Judean Desert. This region borders the Hebron hills on the east. The rainfall decreases sharply some 5 km (3 mi) east of the watershed, and in 20 km (12 mi) the land drops 1200 m (4000 ft) to the Dead Sea. The vegetation is sufficient to support only sheep and goats. In biblical times, this was the grazing land of the settlements on the eastern edge of the hill country (see 1 Sam. 25.2). There are few springs, but runoff can be collected in cisterns to water the flocks. The character of the terrain makes travel difficult. It descends to the east in a series of steps, the most important of which is the Valley of Achor at the northern end. These are cut by the deep gorges of the Wadi Murabba'ât and Wadi Ghiar, which drain into the Dead Sea; both had extensive prehistoric occupation. In the biblical period, the only significant route was that from Tekoa to En-gedi.

The Jordan Valley. From its principal source at Banyas (303 m [995 ft]) in the foothills of Mount *Hermon, the *Jordan River runs south in a great crack in the earth's surface where two tectonic plates meet. It continues down the Gulf of Aqaba/Eilat to become the Rift Valley in Africa. In biblical times, the area south of *Dan was an impassable swamp with Lake Huleh at its center. The Sea of *Galilee (21 by 12 km [13 by 7½ mi] at its longest and widest) is a freshwater lake 210 m (700 ft) below sea-level. It contains twenty-two species of fish, and fishing has always been essential to the local economy.

Shortly after the Jordan leaves the lake it is supplemented by the waters of the Yarmuk. In the 105 km (65 mi) to the Dead Sea the valley drops 194 m (540 ft) but the river meanders through 322 km (200 mi). The river bed with its tropical undergrowth that sheltered large wild *animals is some 7 m (23 ft) below the valley, which widens to 23 km (14 mi) near *Jericho, where the rainfall averages only 150 mm (6 in).

The Jordan ends in the Dead Sea (404 m [1285 ft] below sea level), which has no outlet. Water is lost only through evaporation (in the 40°C [105°F] heat of summer about 24 mm (1 in) each day), producing a high concentration of all the chlorides (26 percent as opposed to the 3.5 percent salinity of the oceans); in Hebrew it is called the "Sea of Salt" (Gen. 14.3; etc; NRSV: "Dead Sea"). It averages 16 km (10 mi) wide, and its length was reduced to 50 km (30 mi) in 1976 when the area south of the Lynch Straits dried out. This may have been the size of the sea in the historical period, but some fifty thousand years ago the water level was 225 m (731 ft) higher, and the valley as far as Galilee was a long inlet of the Red Sea. The gradually rising continuation of the valley to the Gulf of Aqaba/Eilat is now called the Arabah, though in the Bible that term generally means other parts of the Rift Valley.

The Transjordanian Plateau. This region is a strip roughly 40 km (25 mi) wide starting at Mount Hermon and limited on the west by the escarpment of the Jordan Valley. On the east it gradually shades into the Syrian desert. The Golan, lying north of the Yarmuk river, was biblical Bashan and is a basalt plateau characterized by the small cones of extinct volcanoes. The fertile volcanic soil of the southern part gives way to wild pastureland in the north. The center of biblical Gilead is located between the rivers Yarmuk and Jabbok (Nahr ez-Zerqa), but the term is also employed to designate the area as far south as the Arnon River (Seil el-Mojib), which is also called *Ammon. The terrain and vegetation cover is very similar to that of the hill country of Samaria. At an average of 1000 m (3300 ft) above sea level, the plateau of *Moab lying between the Arnon and the Brook Zered (Wadi el-Hesa) is higher than the land to the north. In biblical times, it was proverbial for its fertility, and 2 Kings 3.4 highlights the productivity of its sheep farming. *Edom extends south of Moab as far as the Gulf of Aqaba/Eilat. Its average height parallels that of Moab, but the central peaks rise to 1700 m (5600 ft). Winters are very cold and the snows can last until March. Due to the altitude, the tree cover of this area extends much further south than the corresponding forests west of the Jordan. The great commercial route, the King's Highway, ran the length of the plateau linking *Damascus with the ports of Elath and Ezion-geber on the Gulf of Aqaba.

Gestures. The use of gestures by human beings to denote various feelings or attitudes is a universal phenomenon. Specific gestures may vary from culture to culture; therefore gestures used by the biblical peoples must be understood in their own context. Some of these can be illustrated, however, by examining various tomb paintings, reliefs, and sculptures from the ancient Near East and the biblical texts themselves.

The most frequently mentioned gesture in the biblical writings is that of bowing the head or body, kneeling, or prostrating oneself on the ground. This gesture indicates reverence or subservience to the person or being toward whom the gesture is made. Usually this mode of action is reserved for God or a king or anyone in a position of authority. Most frequently this gesture was assumed in prayer addressed to the deity (1 Kings 8.54; Dan. 6.10; Luke 22.41). While in this position the hands were often held open and upward. This latter gesture was described as "stretching out the hands" (Isa. 1.15), obviously holding out the hands to receive what was requested.

Many other gestures are mentioned in the Bible. One was expected to rise when someone of greater age or importance entered the room (Lev. 19.32; Job 29.8). Out of respect for the scriptures it seems to have been the custom to stand while reading and perhaps hearing the holy words (Neh. 8–9; Luke 4.16–20). When teaching, however, the usual posture was sitting (Matt. 5.1; 23.2; 26.55). To express contempt for another person, one would spit in the other's face (Deut. 26.9; Matt. 26.67). *Mourning was accompanied by such gestures as tearing the garments (Josh. 7.6; Job 1.20) and at times sprinkling dust on the head (Job 2.12–13) or cutting the hair (Ezek. 27.30–31). Striking the thigh seems to have denoted grief or shame (Jer. 31.19; Ezek. 21.17).

Most gestures are accompanied by oral exclamations in the biblical texts so that the meaning of the gesture is usually quite obvious.

Gethsemane (Map 9). The name of the place in *Jerusalem where, according to Matthew 26.36 and Mark 14.32, Jesus was arrested. John does not name it but calls it a garden (18.1). This fits the name's meaning, "oil-press," as does its location on the lower slopes of the Mount of *Olives, in the general vicinity of the several churches there today. MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Gezer. A major city in antiquity and the object of important archaeological excavations in this century, Gezer lies on the border between the Judean foothills and the Shephelah, in the tribal territory of Ephraim (Map 1:W5). Mentioned in inscriptions of Pharaohs Tuthmose III (first half of fifteenth century BCE) and Merneptah (end of thirteenth century), as well as in the *Amarna letters (mid-fourteenth century), Gezer came under Israelite control at a relatively late date. Although the Israelites had failed to conquer the Canaanite city (Josh. 16.10; Judg. 1.29), it passed to their control when it was ceded to *Solomon by Egypt, ostensibly as a dowry for his wife, the pharaoh's daughter (1 Kings 9.16). The siege of Gezer by the *Assyrians (734–732 BCE) is depicted on a relief from the palace of *Tiglath-pileser III in Nimrud (ancient Calah). During the Maccabean period Gezer (called Gazara) was an important Seleucid stronghold until its capture by Simon in 143 BCE (1 Macc. 13.43–48).

Gideon. Also called "Jerubbaal" (Judg. 6.32; 9.1; 1 Sam. 12.11), Gideon is a judge-deliverer from *Manasseh who leads the central highland tribes to victory over *Midianite raiders (Judg. 6.1–8.21). His story illustrates the theme of total dependence on God: at divine command, he reduced his army from thirty-two thousand to three hundred before attacking the enemy (Judg. 7.1–8). Gideon's story also reveals tensions in premonarchic Israel. Intertribal rivalry is evident, as the tribe of *Ephraim shows its jealousy toward Gideon's tribe of Manasseh as a result of Gideon's success (Judg. 7.24–8.3). Also, there is tension over Israel's form of government. After his victory, the people move to make Gideon king; but he refuses, saying they should look on God as their king (Judg. 8.22–23). By contrast, when Gideon's son Abimelech tries to adopt *kingship for himself (after his father's death), he is rejected by the people and killed (Judg. 9).

Gideons, The. The Gideons are an organization of laypeople dedicated to Christian evangelism through the distribution of scripture. They got their start through a chance encounter between two traveling salesmen at the Central Hotel in Boscobel, Wisconsin, in 1898. John H. Nicholson and Samuel Hill, who had stumbled into a raucous convention of lumberjacks, discovered that they shared a common love of the scriptures. The next year, along with W. J. Knights, they founded the Christian Commercial Travelers Association of America. Later the organization was named after *Gideon who (according to Judg. 7) led Israel, armed only with torches and pitchers, to victory over the *Midianites. The Gideons began distributing Bibles in 1908, with their first order for twenty-five copies assigned to the Superior Hotel in Iron Mountain, Montana. Since then, they have put the Bible into hotels and motels in 140 countries. They have also distributed millions of New Testaments to school children and to men and women entering the military. Their Bibles have gone to prisons, inner-city rescue missions, hospitals (in large print), and airplanes, ships, and trains. The ubiquitous presence of the Gideon Bible in hotel rooms has been the occasion of much humor, some of it risqué, but also of reassurance to countless travelers. The organization is active in at least seventy-five countries. In 1990, the Gideons presented their 500 millionth Bible to President George Bush. MARK A. NOLL

Gilgamesh Epic. The Gilgamesh Epic is the greatest masterpiece of literature prior to the Bible and Homer. Episodes of Gilgamesh such as the *flood (from which Genesis 6–8 is in part derived) have survived in older *Sumerian tablets, but the epic as a whole was the later creation of the Semitic *Babylonians and *Assyrians. It circulated widely in the ancient Near East, and was translated into other languages, including *Hittite and Hurrian. As the foremost classic of Mesopotamian civilization, it penetrated Palestine prior to the Israelite *conquest, and Anatolia, where it was available to the Ionian Greeks of Asia Minor.

The twelve tablets of the Gilgamesh Epic form a unified composition dealing with the serious problems of life and death as experienced by the hero Gilgamesh. The milieu of the epic is urban: Gilgamesh is the king of Uruk (biblical Erech), described as a well-planned walled city of superb construction.

The Gilgamesh Epic deals with heroic values. Gilgamesh gives up selfish tyranny for the noble but dangerous aim of eliminating evil from the face of the earth. Because he needs a friend to help him in this awesome mission, a worthy companion, named Enkidu, is created for him out of clay. Together they triumph over the forces of evil in the forms of monsters and dragons.

For offending the goddess Ishtar, Enkidu dies, which reminds Gilgamesh that he too is mortal and will someday perish. For, like *Adam, Gilgamesh has gained knowledge but not immortality. Frightened by the prospect of death, Gilgamesh undertakes a perilous journey to the hero Utnapishtim, who survived the *flood and had immortality conferred on him by the assembled gods. On the way, Gilgamesh stops at the tavern run by the goddess Siduri, who tells him to make the most of life: to eat, drink, be merry; to wed and sire children whose little hands he could hold. Such are the joys within the grasp of mortals; but the gods had reserved immortality for themselves. Nevertheless, Gilgamesh persists in traversing land and sea until he finds old Utnapishtim, who explains that the gods had made him immortal because of a unique event, the flood, which would never be repeated. The gods could not be reconvened merely to immortalize Gilgamesh. So Gilgamesh returns to Uruk, whose magnificence he admires. If we mortals cannot have heaven, we can at least enjoy the comforts of our native city.

The final tablet tells how Gilgamesh interviews the dead Enkidu and learns that the underworld is dreary at best, but utterly wretched for those who die without progeny to offer them food and drink. One's state there is alleviated by leaving children on earth—and the more, the better.

The message is clear: Make the most of the life that is given to us. Ecclesiastes (3.22; 5.17–19; 8.15) makes the same point.

CYRUS H. GORDON

Glory of God. While *holiness expresses God's transcendence, his glory concerns rather his immanence to the world. One text can be seen to combine both concepts: "Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of hosts; the whole earth is full of his glory" (Isa. 6.3). God is invisible, but his glory (Hebr. kābôd) manifests itself in *theophanies, usually associated with storms, fire, and earthquake (see Hab. 3.1–19; Ps. 18.7–15). Such resplendent events both reveal God's presence and reflect his transcendence, concealing him as it were. In the Yahwist (*J) tradition, God shows himself present in a pillar of cloud or of fire (Exod. 13.21), while for the Priestly (*P) tradition "the glory of the Lord" settled on Mount *Sinai and appeared to the Israelites below "like a devouring fire" (Exod. 24.17). Also according to this tradition, the radiant glory of the Lord so transfigured *Moses' face that he had to wear a veil to conceal it (Exod. 34.23–35; cf. Matt. 17.2; 2 Cor. 3.7–18). It was this same manifestation of the divine presence which filled the *Temple when it was dedicated (1 Kings 8.11); Ezekiel described it as leaving the Temple (Ezek. 10.14), going into *exile with Israel, an exile from which it would return (Ezek. 43.2–5).

Though the universal character of the divine glory is often referred to (e.g., Pss. 97.6; 145.10–13; Hab. 2.14), in later biblical traditions this universality is particularly stressed (Isa. 35.2; 40.5; 60.1–3; 66.18–19; see also Luke 2.30–32).

When Paul speaks of "an eternal weight of glory" (2 Cor. 4.17), he is recalling the etymology of the Hebrew word (which is derived from the root kbd, whose primary meaning is "to be heavy"). For Paul, the "glory of Christ" (2 Cor. 4.4), particularly the risen Christ, is a manifestation of the glory of the Father (Rom. 6.4; cf. Mark 8.38 par.). In the gospel of John, on the other hand, the glory of God, possessed by Christ in his preexistence (John 17.5), now dwells in him on earth. The prologue to this Gospel continues the statement that the "Word became flesh and pitched his tent among us" with another regarding seeing the glory of the Son (1.14), and the rest of the Gospel describes particular manifestations of that glory (2.11; 13.31). Similarly, for the author of the letter to the *Hebrews, the Son "is the reflection of God's glory and the exact imprint of God's very being" (1.3), somewhat like personified *Wisdom, "a pure emanation of the glory of the Almighty" (Wisd. of Sol. 7.25).

LEOPOLD SABOURIN

Glossolalia. Glossolalia (from Grk. glōssai, "tongues, languages," and lalein, "to speak") is a phenomenon of intense religious experience expressing itself in ecstatic speech. It is found in several religions, and in Christianity is understood to be a manifestation of the *Holy Spirit.

Explicit New Testament references to speaking in tongues are confined to 1 Corinthians 12–14 and three passages in Acts (2.1–13; 10.46; 19.6). While Paul and the author of Acts both affirm that tongues are a gift of the Spirit, their portrayals of the experience are very different. Paul, who himself had shared the experience (1 Cor. 14.18), describes speaking in tongues as unintelligible to others unless a further gift of interpretation enables it to be more than private devotion, and he contrasts tongues and prophecy (1 Cor. 12.30; 14.5). Luke's description of *Pentecost understands these "other tongues" (Acts 2.4) as intelligible proclamation, and he links tongues and prophecy (Acts 2.16–18; 19.6).

Paul replies to questions and assertions put to him by the Corinthian church. As with other matters in Corinth, Paul is disturbed by the self-centeredness of those who prize and parade their piety while neglecting the love that builds up the community. Accordingly, his chapter on *love as the more excellent way (1 Cor. 13) is at the heart of his discussion, and in the list of gifts of the Spirit he places tongues and the interpretation of tongues last. He suggests that undue preoccupation with tongues represents immaturity (1 Cor. 13.11; 14.20) rather than maturity, and he limits the use of tongues in the church's assembly (1 Cor. 14.27–28).

Luke's account of Pentecost may include residual traces of the unintelligible speech that Paul describes, for he reports that some had charged those who had received the Spirit with drunkenness (Acts 2.13). But Luke interprets the tongues as known languages, and Pentecost as the reversal of *Babel (Gen. 11.1–9), where a confusion of languages had divided the human community. Each of the three passages of Acts in which explicit mention is made of tongues represents a breakthrough in the church's mission. At Pentecost, the first three thousand were baptized (Acts 2.41). The second mention (Acts 10.46) represents the beginning of the gentile mission. The third (Acts 19.6) occurs when the Christian mission is clearly differentiated from that of the followers of *John the Baptist.

JOHN FREDERICK JANSEN

Gnosticism. A modern designation for a religious movement of the early centuries CE, though only some of the groups involved actually called themselves "gnostics" (from Greek gnōsis, "knowledge"). Initially it was regarded as a heresy within early Christianity, opposed by Irenaeus, Hippolytus, and others, the "falsely called knowledge" of 1 Timothy 6.20. A false knowledge, however, implies the existence of a true knowledge, and Clement of Alexandria in fact uses the term "gnostic" for a Christian who has penetrated more deeply than the ordinary believer into the knowledge of the truth (Stromata 7.1–2). Further complications have arisen with increasing knowledge of the religious life of the ancient world, comparative study of ancient religions, and the attempt to account for the origins of gnosticism. One common error of method has been to identify terms or concepts as "gnostic" because of their appearance in developed gnostic systems, and then to trace them back through Greek philosophy or the religions of *Egypt, *Persia, or *Babylonia. This is to ignore the fact that the gnostics adapted and transformed motifs that they borrowed; some such terms and concepts are "gnostic" only in a gnostic context. More recently, increased attention has been paid to possible Jewish origins; but while there is no doubt of the importance of the Jewish contribution, for example in gnostic use and reinterpretation of the Hebrew Bible, it is by no means certain that the movement originated within Judaism or was initiated by Jews. The *Septuagint was the Bible also of early gentile Christians.

What is now clear is that the movement did not suddenly emerge in the second century CE, when it was opposed by early church fathers. There are affinities in the writings of *Philo of Alexandria, and there is evidence that there was a good deal of "gnosticizing" thought even in the first century CE. A question still in debate is the extent of "gnostic" influence on the New Testament, since the evidence has to be found in the New Testament itself, and there is always a danger of interpreting it in light of later systems, which may be to impose on it the ideas of a later period. There is still no gnostic document that in its present form can be dated prior to the New Testament.

The chief characteristics common to all the developed systems are: (1) a radical cosmic dualism that rejects this world and all that belongs to it: the body is a prison from which the soul longs to escape; (2) a distinction between the unknown transcendent true God and the creator or Demiurge, commonly identified with the God of the Hebrew Bible; (3) the belief that the human race is essentially akin to the divine, being a spark of heavenly light imprisoned in a material body; (4) a myth, often narrating a premundane *fall, to account for the present human predicament; and (5) the saving knowledge by which deliverance is effected and the gnostic awakened to recognition of his or her true nature and heavenly origin. At one time it was thought, as the church fathers sometimes allege, that the gnostic was "saved by nature," and that morality was therefore of no importance; indeed, since ethics is largely a matter of obedience to the law of the creator, who seeks to hold the human race in slavery, it could be seen as a positive duty for the gnostic to disobey all such commands. The evidence of the *Nag Hammadi documents, however, suggests that while some gnostics may have shown libertine tendencies, the main direction of the movement was toward asceticism. Some of the characteristics listed can be identified in other systems of thought, but that does not make these gnostic; it is the combination of those ideas into a new synthesis that is gnosticism.

The classic period of gnosticism is the second century CE, with such figures as Basilides and Valentinus, and the latter's disciples Ptolemy and Heracleon, but this was the culmination of a long development. The later books of the New Testament (e.g., the Pastorals, Jude, 1 John) show signs of resistance to an incipient gnosticism, but it is a mistake to think of clear distinctions between orthodoxy and heresy at such an early stage; differing points of view may well coexist for a period, interacting with one another, before it finally becomes clear that they are incompatible. The gospel of *John makes frequent use of the verb "to know," but never employs the noun gnōsis, which may perhaps be significant; *Paul uses the noun quite often, but we need to ask whether he is speaking of a specifically gnostic knowledge. Most religions do profess to convey some kind of knowledge! While there may be doubts about gnostic influence in the New Testament, there can be no question of the significance of New Testament influence on gnosticism; this is shown by numerous allusions and direct quotations in the sources, to which the Nag Hammadi library has added greatly.

Gnosticism has often been regarded as bizarre and outlandish, and certainly it is not easily understood until it is examined in its contemporary setting. It was, however, no mere playing with words and ideas, but a serious attempt to resolve real problems: the nature and destiny of the human race, the problem of *evil, the human predicament. To a gnostic it brought a release and joy and hope, as if awakening from a nightmare. One later offshoot, Manicheism, became for a time a world religion, reaching as far as China, and there are at least elements of gnosticism in such medieval movements as those of the Bogomiles and the Cathari. Gnostic influence has been seen in various works of modern literature, such as those of William Blake and W. B. Yeats, and is also to be found in the Theosophy of Madame Blavatsky and the Anthroposophy of Rudolph Steiner. Gnosticism was of lifelong interest to the psychologist C. G. *Jung, and one of the Nag Hammadi codices (the Jung Codex) was for a time in the Jung Institute in Zurich.

Gog. Described in Ezekiel 38–39 as ruler of the land of Magog, Gog is also "chief prince" of the lands of two tribes in Asia Minor, Meshech (Map 6:F3) and Tubal (Map 6:G3; the specific location of Magog is unknown). Gog, leading a coalition of nations from virtually all points of the compass (Ezek. 38.5–6), is summoned by Yahweh, the God of Israel, to attack Israel itself. Yahweh nonetheless promises to intervene on Israel's behalf, destroying the enemy coalition by means of stupendous natural disasters (Ezek. 38.19–23). The book of Revelation refers to a Satanic invasion of "Gog and Magog" (20.7–10), curiously placing it after the promised millennium (the thousand-year period of the reign of the *Messiah). WILLIAM H. BARNES

Golden Calf. Three "golden calves" appear in the Bible. The first is fashioned by *Aaron at *Sinai to replace *Moses and Yahweh (Exod. 32; Deut. 9.8–21; Ps. 106.19–20; Neh. 9.18; Acts 7.39–41), and the second and third are a pair commissioned by Jeroboam, leader of the northern secession, to replace the *ark; they were worshiped respectively at *Dan and Bethel (1 Kings 12.26–33).

Hebrew ʿēgel is generally rendered "calf," but a more mature beast may be intended. On the one hand, an ʿēgel can be a prancing (Ps. 29.6), untrained (Jer. 31.18) one-year-old (Lev. 9.3; Mic. 6.6). On the other hand, the feminine ʿeglâ can denote a three-year-old heifer (Gen. 15.9), trained (Hos. 10.11) for plowing (Judg. 14.18) or threshing (Jer. 50.11 [translation uncertain]). Hosea 10.5 calls Jeroboam's images "heifers," although the reading is uncertain; elsewhere, Hosea describes the animals as male (8.5–6; 13.2). Most likely, the golden "calves" are young bulls, as the *Septuagint renders in 1 Kings 12.

It is uncertain from 1 Kings 12.28 whether Jeroboam's images are solid gold or gold-plated wood; 2 Kings 17.16 calls them "molten." Aaron's image is "molten" (Exod. 32.4, 8; Deut. 9.16; Ps. 106.19; Neh. 9.18), yet it is destroyed by grinding and burning (Exod. 32.20), as if partly wooden. Hosea 13.2 refers to molten image(s), idols, and calves (it is unclear whether these are the same), and speaks of silver, not gold, while Hosea 8.4 mentions both silver and gold, probably the constituents of the calf in 8.5. Judges 17–18 describes a molten silver image worshiped in Dan, conceivably a forerunner of Jeroboam's calf. In 1990 a silver-coated molten bronze bull 10 cm (4 in) high dated to ca. 1550 BCE was discovered at Ashkelon.

Aaron's and Jeroboam's calves are symbols of Yahweh; Aaron declares a "festival to Yahweh" (Exod. 32.5) and, throughout its history, the northern kingdom of Israel worshiped Yahweh, even while venerating the calves (2 Kings 3:3, 10.29; etc.). But it is unclear whether the calves represent Yahweh himself or a supernatural bovine on which he stands; Jeroboam's calves may even constitute the armrests of God's throne. All three interpretations have parallels in ancient Near Eastern art and literature, and perhaps more than one was current in Israel. The nonbiblical name ʿEgel-yo appears in the *Samaria ostraca (eighth century BCE) and could mean either "calf of Yahweh" or "Yahweh is a calf."

The calf stories in Exodus 32 and 1 Kings 12 are closely related. Both extol "your gods, O Israel, who brought you up out of the land of Egypt," and both culminate in priestly ordination. The simplest explanation is that Exodus 32 is a polemic against Jeroboam's movement; this would explain the plural "your gods" in Exodus 32.4 (contrast the singluar in Neh. 9.18). Alternatively, Exodus 32 might be a polemic against an older cult revived by Jeroboam—conceivably that of Judges 17–18.

WILLIAM H. PROPP

Golden Rule. Since the eighteenth century CE the familiar saying "Do unto others as you would have them do unto you" has been known as the "Golden Rule." Often cited as the sum of Jesus' ethics, the saying also occurs in ancient Greek, Roman, and Jewish writings. For example, Rabbi Hillel (first century BCE) answered a question about the Law's central teaching with the statement: "What is hateful to you, do not do to your fellow creature. That is the whole Law; the rest is commentary" (b. Sabb. 31a).

Some seek to distinguish between the more common negative form just cited and the positive form found in Jesus' teaching by attributing the former to common sense based on self-interest and the latter to Jesus' higher ethical concerns. This distinction, however, fails to hold because the positive form also occurs in extrabiblical writings (Letter of Aristeas 207; T. Naph. 1; and 2 Enoch 61.1) and the negative form appears in Christian literature, such as a variant reading in Acts 15.20, 29; and Didache 1.1.

By itself the rule could indeed reflect a commonsense principle of conduct based on self-interest rather than conduct based on concern for others. But a closer look at New Testament usage reveals that the Golden Rule occurs in contexts calling for *love for others. Matthew and Luke have the saying as part of Jesus' teaching in the *Sermon on the Mount. In Luke 6.31 it is integral to Jesus' teaching about love for one's enemies (6.27–35). In Matthew 7.12 it comes at the conclusion of a series of demands pertaining to one's relation with others (5.21–48) and with God (6.1–7.11). Probably, therefore, Matthew took the saying from its traditional context of love for one's enemies (5.44–47) and used it as a summary of the preceding list of Jesus' demands. By adding the phrase, "for this is the law and the prophets," Matthew places the rule in the broader context of the Sermon on the Mount as well as of his entire gospel. In 5.17 he introduces the series of Jesus' demands (5.21–7.12) by noting that Jesus had come to "fulfill the law and the prophets"; a "greater righteousness" (5.20) is now demanded in one's relationship with others (5.21–48) and with God (6.1–7.11). In 22.40 Matthew directly relates the rule to the love commandment by having Jesus declare that the "law and the prophets" depend on the love commandment.

In the context of Jesus' teaching, therefore, the Golden Rule, rather than being merely a commonsense, ethical rule of thumb, is a practical expression of the love commandment growing out of love for God and one's neighbor. The same connection between the Golden Rule and the love commandment is found in Didache 1.2, as well as in the variant reading in Acts 15.20, 29. ROBERT A. GUELICH

Golgotha. The site of the *crucifixion of Jesus in *Jerusalem; the tomb in which Jesus was buried was apparently nearby (see John 19.41). The name is *Aramaic, and means "the skull," a translation given after the Aramaic in Matthew 27.33, Mark 15.22, and John 19.17. Luke 23.33 gives only the Greek translation. In the *Vulgate a Latin word for "skull," calvaria, is used; this is the source of the English word "Calvary," used in the KJV of Luke 23.33. The origin of the name Golgotha is obscure; suggestions include its location in a cemetery and its being a site for executions. The great biblical scholar Origen (third century CE) thought it was the burial place of *Adam; following this view, artists have frequently placed a skull at the base of the cross in representations of the crucifixion.

The precise location of Golgotha and of the tomb of Jesus are not certain, but the most likely candidate is the present site of the Church of the Holy Sepulcher (Map 9), though traditions identifying it as the place of Jesus' death and burial are apparently no earlier than the fourth century CE. MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Goliath. The heavily armed *Philistine warrior from Gath who, according to 1 Samuel 17, was slain by *David while the latter was still a young shepherd who was armed only with a slingstone and faith in Yahweh. Goliath's height is given in the MT of 1 Samuel 17.4 as six cubits and a span (ca. 3 m [9 ft 9 in]), although textual traditions represented in the *Dead Sea Scrolls and the *Septuagint give four cubits and a span (ca. 2 m [6 ft 9 in]). 1 Samuel 21.8–10 implies, perhaps ironically, that David returned to Gath with Goliath's sword.

In 2 Samuel 21.19 a warrior named Elhanan killed Goliath, a descendant of the giants of Gath, in a battle at Gob. The AV attempts to harmonize the discrepancy by reading: "Elhanan . . . slew the brother of Goliath," following an ancient tendency already found in 1 Chronicles 20.5. However, these discrepancies suggest that the attribution of Goliath's slaying to David may not be original. HECTOR IGNACIO AVALOS

Gospel, Genre of. The term "gospel" (Grk. euaggelion) is used in Christian tradition to designate the canonical Gospels, *Matthew, *Mark, *Luke, and *John, presumably written between 65 and 100 CE. Some source-critical theories suggest the existence of a precanonical gospel, that is, a hypothetical primitive gospel or protogospel underlying one or more of the four canonical Gospels. Other gospels were produced in the second century (and perhaps the first), but they are not recognized as canonical. (See also Apocrypha, article on Christian Apocrypha; Canon, article on New Testament.)

The four Gospels are grouped together in the New Testament canon, apart from the letters and *Revelation and also distinct from the other narrative book, *Acts of Apostles. The Gospels include stories about *Jesus, sayings of Jesus, and a passion narrative; they describe the career of Jesus in a connected narrative from the preaching of *John the Baptist to Jesus' death and *resurrection. This is commonly accepted as the characteristic gospel form. Justin Martyr, about 150 CE, refers to the "gospels" (the first attestation of the term in the plural) as "the memoirs of the apostles," and this historical or biographical definition remained popular through the centuries: the gospel is the story of Jesus, the account of the life and teaching of Jesus Christ.

According to the modern critical consensus, the Gospels constitute their own literary genre: they are sui generis, sharing a distinctive form and content. Three factors seem to have been of influence. First, the study of the literary relationship among the *synoptic Gospels has led to the widely accepted view that both Matthew and Luke depend on Mark, and thus the problem of the gospel genre has become to a large extent a problem of the origin of Mark. Second, form critics emphasize, on the one hand, the role of the kerygma (preaching) in the early church, and on the other, the oral origin and the unliterary character of the pre-Markan gospel material (short anecdotes, small units, and probably a primitive passion narrative). The author of Mark, by combining this traditional material into a framework, created the gospel genre. Third, the Christian gospel form is apparently not influenced by the genres of the Hellenistic literature. The kerygmatic hypothesis has taken two opposing forms. The majority opinion ascribes the gospel framework to Markan redaction. For C. H. Dodd, on the other hand, Mark serves as a commentary on the kerygma. The basic outline of the gospel corresponds to the historical section in the traditional kerygmatic scheme of the sermons in Acts. The story of the passion is prefaced in Mark 1–8, as it is in Acts 10, by an account of the ministry of Jesus in Galilee. The debate is not closed, but Lucan redaction in Acts 10.36–43 can hardly be denied.

There is, however, a growing dissatisfaction with this form-critical approach. The definition of the gospel of Mark as a passion narrative with an extended introduction is no longer acceptable. There is a renewed interest in the search for parallels to Mark's genre, especially for possible associations with Hellenistic biographical literature, in its variegated forms, including the popular biography; a biography subtype written to dispel a false image of the teacher and to provide a true model to follow; an encomium biography; and the epideictic type of biography. For other scholars, connections with Hellenistic biography remain unproved. Yet it can be recognized that the Gospels are biographical in a broader sense. Some analogies can be found in the biblical tradition: the life of Moses, or the biography of the suffering righteous one. Biography in its various types, however, is only one of the models suggested for the gospel. The *apocalyptic genre, the *Passover haggadah, the calendrical cycles, and, in Greco-Roman literature, the Socratic dialogues, the Greek tragedy, the tragicomedy, and rhetorical conventions are other suggestions. The aretalogy deserves special consideration. Mark and John are supposed to have corrected the divine-man christology of their sources, the pre-Markan collection of miracles and the pre-Johannine signs-source. The gospel thus becomes an antiaretalogy, an adaptation of the existing aretalogical genre. On the other hand, however, the source-critical and other presuppositions of these Markan and Johannine trajectories are far from certain. John's dependence on the Synoptics, at least with regard to the gospel form, is a more likely hypothesis.

The gospel of Mark is used in Matthew and Luke in combination with a second source, the hypothetical *Q document. The narrative framework, typical of the gospel form, is lacking in this sayings collection, and designations such as "wisdom gospel" or "aphoristic gospel" are inappropriate. The Q material is blocked together with special material in three interpolations in Luke and mainly in five (or six) discourses in Matthew. The Markan gospel's general outline is preserved in both, with an expansion of the biographical element in the birth stories and the genealogies at the beginning and the appearances of the risen Lord at the end. Luke and Acts explicitly form a two-volume work by one author, and some influence of the literary conventions of Greek historiography is undeniable.

Each of the four Gospels has its own individuality. Redaction criticism and narrative analysis uncover differences of language, style, and composition, differing theological concepts, and differing authorial intentions. Their anonymity is a common characteristic. The present superscriptions (Gospel according to Matthew, etc.) were affixed at an early stage of the tradition, probably under the influence of Mark 1.1, extending the use of the term gospel proclamation to the literary form of the gospel book.

The gospel genre implies a similarity of form and content. For some of the so-called noncanonical gospels—namely for those that embody stories without kerygmatic outlook or those that present sayings and dialogues without a narrative—the term gospel is used improperly.

Grace. In the Bible, the term grace combines ideas in tension that point to profound mystery. Grace names the undeserved gift that creates relationships and the sustaining, responding, forebearing attitude-plus-action that nurtures relationships. Grace concerns the interaction between gracious person and graced recipient, involving the wills of both. The motives of the grace giver; the acceptance, rejection, or forgetfulness of the recipient; the forbearance of the giver; the entire dynamic of forgiveness; the life-renewing impact of the gift—all these are at issue. All pertain whether the gracious one is divine or human. English translations interchange "grace," "favor," "mercy," "compassion," "kindness," and "love" in probing the theme.

There is a slight distinction among the Hebrew and Greek words translated "grace, graciousness, show grace," but more significant is the large degree of overlap in meaning. The Hebrew roots ḥnn ("favor, grace"), ḥsd ("loyalty, steadfast love"), rḥm ("compassion, mercy"), rṣh ("pleasure in, favor toward"), and 'hb ("love") point to the grace theme, as do Greek charis ("grace"), eleos ("mercy"), oiktirmos ("pity, mercy"), and eudokia ("pleasure in"). Close in meaning are Hebrew 'mn ("steadiness, trustworthiness"), ḥml and ḥws ("to pity, to spare").

Much of the Bible portrays grace rather than naming it. In Hosea 11.1–9, the metaphor of parenting dominates, involving compassion and anger, disappointment and chagrin, intervention and forbearance. In Matthew and Mark, Jesus' *parables and person display grace; charis is not used, and eleos appears very rarely. The prophets seldom use grace vocabulary, wrestling instead in beautiful word pictures with the past, present, and future tension between divine wrath and divine yearning love, as well as with the tension in human relationships between care and violation of neighbors. When they do employ grace vocabulary, they sometimes, as Hosea does with ḥesed, select a word for special probing of graced relationships.

It is often said that the ḥnn group pertains to the gifted initiation of relationship, while the maintenance of relationship is named by ḥesed. Note the *Septuagint translations: charis for ḥen, eleos for ḥesed. In lament and thanksgiving *psalms, however, frequently the poet implores divine grace/mercy with an imperative of ḥnn paralleling other imperatives, showing that God's gracing sustains and refurbishes the existing relationship. God is asked to turn back to the one who has lost favor (Pss. 25.16; 86.16; 119.32; cf. 67.2); to hear/answer appeals based on prior experience of God's favor (Pss. 27.7; 30.11); to heal, redeem, blot out transgressions in the one graced. Whether the worshiper is contrite about transgression or bewildered by the undeserved absence of God, continuance of a prior relationship is sought.

In virtually all instances, one who does/gives/shows grace has a superior capacity to act, while the one imploring is in need. Hence the frequent idiom of a needy one "finding favor/grace in the eyes of" someone. A gracious one reaches out to the *poor, the needy, the oppressed, the forsaken—a movement intrinsic to God and to righteous humans.

To understand grace best one can begin with human or divine instances. Proverbs 22.9 and 19.7 display human action: a gracing (NRSV: "generous") person is blessed for sharing bread with the poor; a person gracious (NRSV: "kind") to the poor lends to the Lord and will be appropriately recompensed. But grace does not act to deserve reward; grace is intrinsic to the righteous (Ps. 37.21, 26). One senses God's graciousness by observing the best of human action, but divine and human paradigms of grace inform one another: human grace imitates and depicts God's grace; God's grace calls forth human imitation.

Yet there are heightened dimensions to God's grace. One indication is the intensity of appeal to God's grace and favor in psalms and liturgical compositions. Another is the number of proper names compounded of grace vocabulary and a divine name, such as Hananiah (Ananias), Hananel, and Hanniel, and the short forms Hanan, Hanun, Hanani, and Hannah; a dozen names contain the element rḥm, "compassion."

Three liturgical passages are especially expressive. Exodus 33.19, "I will be gracious to whom I will be gracious, will show mercy on whom I will show mercy," combines affirmation of God's freedom with the promise that grace and *mercy are intrinsic to God. Exodus 34.6–7, using a rich range of grace language in a divine self-affirmation, is recalled in Psalms 86.15; 103.8; 111.4; 145.8; Nehemiah 9.17; Joel 2.13; Jonah 4.2; the affirmation is echoed in part in several other passages and questioned in Psalm 77.7–9. Numbers 6.24–26, the Aaronic blessing, emphasizes the continuance of God's grace and the expected consequence: šālôm (NRSV: "peace").

Grace and mercy in the New Testament, as well as the combination "grace and truth" in the prologue to John (1.14–17), are deeply influenced by Hebrew usage. The noun charis in Luke 1.30; 2.40; 2.52; and 4.22, together with verb forms in 7.21, 42, and many Lucan uses of the term in Acts, reflect the semantic range of the Hebrew Bible. A special emphasis appears in Paul's and Peter's speeches in Acts 13.43 and 15.11 and in nearby narratives about the apostles

(14.3, 26; 15.40; 18.27; 20.24, 32). Here grace as emanating from God, with a commending and sanctifying impact on those who have received it, accords with Paul's use of charis in Romans (fourteen times), 1 and 2 Corinthians, Galatians, and Philippians, developed in Deutero-Pauline Ephesians and Colossians. Paul's polemical emphasis is on the free gift of God's grace, a means of salvation that ought not be resisted, which impels its recipient to new, spontaneous righteousness. Thus grace is both the gift of Jesus Christ and the gift(s) of consequent righteous living in vocation. Paul's aim is to recapture the primacy of God's yearning search for humankind and the bestowal of power to become disciples. Grace, charis, bestows gifts, charismata. Paul has moved God's initiative of relationship to such prominence that "seeking God's favor" or "imploring God's mercy" fades. But Paul will go on wrestling with human response, the use made of God's gift, and the expectation of consequential, thankful living.

The tensions in the dynamic of grace characterize much of the theological wrestling of synagogue and church across the centuries. Grace can be deemed all-sufficient ("grace alone"), but repentance, merit, and reward play their part in its dynamic. Grace can seem to be irresistible in its attractiveness and yet be resisted mightily. Humans who accept God's grace can do dastardly things in God's name. God can be perceived to have run out of favor and patience, and yet new mercy appears. The freedom of God and the perplexity of human behavior have meant that both biblical authors and theologians fail finally to penetrate the depth of mystery in grace.

Graven Image. Hebrew pesel is variously translated as "graven image," "idol," or "statue." Three-dimensional sacred images of metal, stone, wood, or clay were ubiquitously venerated in antiquity.

The Bible misrepresents *idolatry by ascribing to worshipers the naive belief that the image is the deity. Egyptians, Canaanites, and Mesopotamians believed a god's spirit inhabited a statue after consecration, causing it to move, speak, or sweat. While the statue was the god in many respects, the god was not limited to its image. The idol's purpose was to allow the mortal a vision of the divine and to help god and worshiper focus their attention on each other. A few idols had moving parts—such as a movable jaw or dribbling breast—enabling priests to generate "miraculous" divine responses.

Since almost all ancient gods, including Yahweh (Gen. 1.26–27; 5.1; Ezek. 1.26–27), resembled humans, most idols were anthropomorphic. Some, however, portrayed animals, and Egyptian divine images often combined human and animal aspects. While humanoid idols depicted the god him- or herself, the wholly or partly animal representations metaphorically expressed aspects of its nature: a lion for ferocity, a frog for fecundity, a ram for virility, a hawk for mobility, and so forth.

The Bible forbids idolatry to Israelites (Exod. 20.4–5, 23; 34.17; Deut. 4.15–18; 5.8; 27.15). In Roman times, this proscription prevented compliance with the state cult of worshiping the emperor's statue (Rev. 13.14–15; 14.9, 11; 15.2; 16.2; 19.20; 20.4; cf. Dan. 3). Although archaeologists have uncovered virtually no representations of male gods from Israelite times, female figurines, probably representing goddesses, are common. Some equate these statuettes with biblical *Asherah or *teraphim.

Prayers might be spoken before the idol or food set before it, later to be removed for consumption by priests and/or worshipers. Among Jews and Christians of the Roman period, such food was strictly forbidden (Acts 15.29; 21.25; 1 Cor. 8; 10.18, 28; Rev. 2.14, 20).

The avoidance of divine images is called aniconism. While there is no inevitable link between *monotheism and aniconism, it cannot be coincidence that the first monotheist, Pharaoh Akhnaton (1363–1347 BCE), abolished idolatry. Apparently both he and the biblical authors believed figurative representations limited the divine to a particular conception and place or encouraged identification of the one true God with other nonexistent deities. But while Akhnaton's god, the sun, was visible to all in the sky, Yahweh was hidden in his fiery cloud (Exod. 24.17; Deut. 4.15).

Although there were few if any images of Yahweh, Israelite shrines featured statues, carvings, and embroidery depicting celestial beasts associated with Yahweh: *cherubim (winged sphinxes) (Exod. 25.18–22; 26.1, 31; 36.8, 35; 37.7–9; Num. 7.89; 1 Kings 6.23–35; 7.29, 36; 8.6–7; Ezek. 41.18, 20, 25; 1 Chron. 28.18; 2 Chron. 3.7–14; 5.7–8), bull calves (Exod. 32; 1 Kings 7.29; 12.28–30; see Golden Calf), and perhaps *seraphim (winged snakes) (2 Kings 18.4). The Bible preserves vestiges of a debate over their significance: Are the cherubim God's throne or canopy? Are the calves pedestals or depictions of God? Is Nehushtan (2 Kings 18.4) a seraph sheltering Yahweh (Isa. 6) or a venomous serpent (Num. 21.4–9; cf. Isa. 14.29; 30.6)?

Jewish ritual *art, like Muslim art, has generally avoided human images, but the third-century CE *synagogue of Dura Europos features realistic illustrations of Bible scenes. Periodically, Christians have banned holy statues and pictures (iconoclasm), but they are still venerated in Roman Catholicism and Eastern Orthodoxy.

Greek. This language belongs to the western branch of the Indo-European language group, along with the Germanic, Italic, and Celtic families. It evolved into a relatively distinct and unified language ca. 2000 BCE, when Indo-European speakers mixed with earlier inhabitants in the Aegean area, especially on the Greek mainland. Extensive contact with Minoan culture ca. 1650–1450 BCE led to the development of the Mycenaean dialect recorded in the prealphabetic Linear B syllabary. With the collapse of Mycenaean civilization ca. 1250–1200 BCE, the Mycenaean dialect was largely replaced by Doric dialects, except in the interior mountainous region of the Peloponnese and in Cyprus, to which it spread. From the Doric dialects gradually developed Northwest Greek, comprising the dialects of Phocian, Locrian, and Elean, and the West Greek dialects, or Doric proper, including Laconian, Heraclean, Argolic, Corinthian, Megarian, Rhodian, Coan, Theran, Cretan, and other lesser dialects of the west, such as Syracusan and Corcyran. In the east, a dialect akin to Mycenaean, which had already reflected innovations characteristic of the east Greek dialects of classical times, evolved in the Cycladic area into historical Ionic, from which Attic later developed; and in Thessaly another dialect, which was the origin of Aeolic, spread by migrations to Boeotia and Lesbos, where it underwent further modifications through convergence with Ionic.

Only a few dialects were used in literature, and then generally in a somewhat artificial form not corresponding exactly to the spoken language. Further, these literary dialects were associated with certain classes of literature and were so used, regardless of the author's native dialect.

First and foremost among these was the Homeric dialect (well developed before 700 BCE), an amalgam of Ionic and Aeolic, a development of centuries of epic and bardic tradition based on a substratum of Mycenaean. The language of Hesiod (seventh century BCE) is substantially that of Homeric epic but with some Aeolic forms and peculiarities found in Doric and Boeotian. The epic dialect is also used, with some modifications, by elegiac and iambic poets, and to some extent it influenced all of Greek poetry.

The melic poets Alcaeus and Sappho wrote in the Lesbian dialect, with some traces of epic forms. Their language too was imitated by later writers, including Theocritus.

The language of the choral lyric is an artificial composite of Doric characteristics with the elimination of local features and some admixture of Lesbian and epic forms. It was used by the Boeotian Pindar and the Ionians Simonides and Bacchylides as well. The first prose writers were the Ionic philosophers of the sixth century BCE, and in the fifth century the historian Herodotus and Hippocrates of Cos, a Dorian, wrote in Ionic. With the political hegemony and intellectual supremacy of *Athens, the Attic dialect became the language of drama, and by the end of the fifth century it was also used in prose, but earlier prose writers such as the historian Thucydides, the tragedians Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides, and the comedian Aristophanes avoided Attic peculiarities. Among the other great Attic prose writers were the orators Lysias, Isocrates, Aeschines, and Demosthenes, the philosopher Plato, and the historian Xenophon.

Some few other dialects were cultivated in local literature, but the majority of dialects are known only from inscriptions and play no role in literature.

From the welter of classical dialects emerged the Koine. Also called Hellenistic Greek, koinē, "the common (dialect)," designates the prevalent form of the Greek language from the time of *Alexander the Great (late fourth century BCE) to the Byzantine period (sixth-seventh century CE). The Koine emerged largely through a process of leveling and assimilation. Based primarily upon the Attic dialect, the Koine also incorporated elements from other dialects, including Ionic, Doric, and Boeotian. Features peculiar to a single dialect tended to be lost in the formation of a universal Greek vernacular, while those shared by several important dialects left their mark on it. It was spread by the Macedonian conquests over a vast area and became the vehicle of communication for diplomacy and commerce. With the adoption of Hellenic culture it became established in the leading centers of Greek civilization. Its widespread use, especially by nonnative Greek speakers, led to extensive modifications in the living language, which is best preserved in more than fifty thousand papyri, ostraca, and inscriptions from the fourth century BCE to the eighth century CE.

This largely homogenous dialect continued to develop as a living language, but a literary form of the Koine was created in imitation of classical Attic idiom. Among the leading Koine authors using this elevated language were the historians Polybius, Diodorus Siculus, *Josephus, and Arrian, the biographer Plutarch, the rhetorician Dionysus of Halicarnassus, the geographer Strabo, the philosophers Philodemus, *Philo, and Epictetus, and the Sophists Lucian, Philostratus, and Philostratus the Younger. The Atticistic movement, an artificial revival of the classical language, flourished especially in the second century CE as a reaction to the natural developments and innovations of the spoken language that impinged increasingly upon even the literary form of the Koine.

Much more akin to the living Koine is biblical Greek. Hardly a unity in itself, the language of the various Greek translations of the Hebrew scriptures (see Septuagint), the writings of the New Testament, and the Jewish and Christian *apocrypha and *pseudepigrapha does not constitute a special Jewish dialect of the Koine, much less a language outside the mainstream of the development of Greek. But like the papyri, ostraca, and inscriptions from Egypt subject to extensive bilingual interference from Egyptian (Coptic), biblical Greek in varying degrees preserves a Semitic tone and flavor, adopts Semitic modes of speech, and reflects Semitic interference in grammar. It diverges from the rest of the Koine most noticeably in vocabulary, as it coins new words to express specifically biblical concepts or uses older terms with new Jewish or Christian meanings.

The Koine is the direct ancestor of medieval and Modern Greek, except for the Tsaconian dialect descended from classical Laconian. Although the Modern Greek vernacular language (dimotiki) contains very many Latin and especially Turkish loanwords and is itself split into numerous dialects, it represents the latest phase in the development of the Greek language over an unbroken period of some four thousand years. Alongside the Modern Greek vernacular, there is an archaizing form of the language called the katharevousa, which long served as the standard learned and literary language but no longer enjoys its former official status.

FRANCIS T. GIGNAC

Gutenberg, Johannes Gensfleisch zum (ca. 1396–ca. 1468). German printer and inventor of movable type. Gutenberg was born in Mainz and trained as a goldsmith. Around 1430 he moved to Strassburg, where, along with three others, he began to experiment with printing. By the time he returned to Mainz in about 1449 he apparently had movable metal type formed in separate letters, and had invented a typecasting machine along with an oil-based ink printer. In Mainz he became partners with Johannes Fust, a banker, so that he could have funding for a large Latin Bible in two-column format, with each page containing 42 lines. The types he prepared comprised not only the 24 capital and 24 lowercase letters of the Latin alphabet, but 290 different characters (47 capitals and 243 lowercase letters). Gutenberg cast such a great number of types because he wanted to reproduce as accurately as possible the detail of letters in sumptuous medieval manuscripts—and, if he could, to surpass their beauty through his new art. According to most critics, Gutenberg's Bible is better proportioned and harmonized than any of the manuscripts, including those transcribed with the greatest care. Because he printed with an exceptional deep black ink, the Bibles retain their fresh lustre to this day. After first trying to print the headings and initial letters of chapters in red, he hired artisans to illuminate these unadorned spaces in red and blue by hand.

Generally bound in two massive folio volumes, the Gutenberg Bible comprises 1,282 double-columned pages. The pages measure 39.4 × 28.3 cm (15½ × 11⅛ in). It is believed that approximately 150 copies were printed on paper and about 35 on *parchment (vellum). To print each copy, 340 sheets of four pages each were required. Since one calfskin provided only two good sheets of this size, almost 6,000 calves were needed to supply enough vellum for the 35 parchment copies of this Bible. Printing of the Bible began in approximately 1452, but financing problems, as well as the use of Gutenberg's six presses for the production of school grammars, calendars, letters of indulgence, and other small print jobs, postponed the completion of the printing of the Bible until late 1455 or early 1456. Only twelve parchment and thirty-six paper copies of the original Gutenberg Bible are known to exist worldwide; four of the parchment copies are complete, as are seventeen of the paper copies.

Habakkuk, The Book of. The book of Habakkuk is an integrated whole with the following outline:

1.1	Superscription
1.2–4	The prophet's initial complaint
1.5–11	God's answer to the prophet
1.12–17	The prophet's second complaint
2.1–4	God's answer
2.5–20	A series of "woe" oracles
3.1–16	A theophanic hymn, set within a biographical framework
3.17–19	The prophet's final song of faith

The central theme of the book has to do with God's purpose. It was composed between 609–598 BCE, when the *Babylonian armies under *Nebuchadrezzar marched into and captured the Palestinian landbridge. Habakkuk resides in the southern Israelite kingdom of *Judah, and unlike the prophets who preceded him, Habakkuk addresses his words not to his compatriots but to God. His principal question is: When will God fulfill his purpose and bring in his reign of justice, righteousness, and peace on the earth? When is the *kingdom of God going to come?

In the first oracle (1.2–4), Habakkuk raises his initial lament. He sees in Judean society around him nothing but violence and evil—the oppression of the weak, endless strife and litigations, moral wrongs of every kind. And despite Habakkuk's continual pleading with God to end the wrong, God seems to ignore him and to leave the righteous helpless to correct it.

But then God does answer his prophet (1.5–11). He tells Habakkuk that he is rousing the Babylonians to march through the Fertile Crescent and to subdue Judah, as punishment for her sin. The nation that has rejected God's order and rule will find itself subjected to the order and rule of Babylonia and her gods.

In the third section (1.12–17), the prophet acknowledges the justice of God's punishment of Judah. And because God's judgment is always finally an act on the way to salvation, Habakkuk knows that Judah will not die. But his problem remains, because the Babylonians, in their cruel conquests, are even more unrighteous than Judah has been. When will God bring that unrighteousness to an end?

To seek an answer, Habakkuk stations himself on his watchtower (2.1), a symbol of his complete openness to God. And God answers him, assuring him that the "vision"—that is, God's righteous rule, God's kingdom—will come, in faithfulness to the divine promise. Indeed, the fulfillment of God's purpose hastens to its goal. It may seem delayed to human beings, but it will surely come, in God's appointed time. In the meantime, the righteous are to live in faithfulness to God, trusting his promise, obeying his commands, and acting in a manner commensurate with the coming kingdom. Only those who live such trusting and obedient lives will have fullness of life. Those who rely on themselves and their own prowess, who are proud and self-sufficient, and who have no regard for the ways and will of God, will not prosper but will sow the seeds of their own destruction.

The "woe" oracles that follow in 2.5–20 illustrate the message of 2.4. V. 5 is corrupt, but probably should be read, "Moreover, wealth is treacherous; a mighty man is proud, and he does not abide"—a reference to the Babylonians. In the following verses, the prophet then shows the inevitable downfall of all who are unfaithful—of proud tyrants who oppress their captives, of corrupt and self-glorifying governments and military powers, and of idolaters.

The hymn of 3.3–15, with its introduction, confirms the message of 2.2–3. The prophet is granted a vision of God's final, future judgment of all, and of the establishment of God's rule over all the earth. The Lord is portrayed as a mighty warrior, marching up from the southern desert, to conquer all his foes and to give salvation to all who trust him. The portrayal presents the most extensive *theophany (description of the divine appearance) to be found in the Hebrew Bible and depicts the overwhelming glory and might of God, before whose presence and promise of judgment Habakkuk both trembles and is reassured. Some scholars hold that this hymn is an earlier, perhaps much earlier, liturgical composition, incorporated into the book in the postexilic period; if so, it has been skillfully integrated into its present context.

From such a vision of God's future triumph, Habakkuk has found his certainty. He therefore sings the magnificent song of faith (3.17–19) with which the book closes. The prophet's external circumstances have not changed. Violence and injustice still mar his community, strife still abounds, nations still rage and devour the weak, and the proud still strut through the earth. But Habakkuk has been given to see the final outcome of human history. God is at work, behind all events, fulfilling his purpose. His kingdom will come, in its appointed time, when every enemy will be vanquished, and God's order of righteousness and good will be established over all the earth. The prophet, and all the faithful like him, can therefore rejoice and exult.

Nothing more is known about the prophet, though he figures as a minor character in *Bel and the Dragon 33–39. Paul quotes the book (2.4) in both Romans (1.17) and Galatians (3.11), in his discussions of *justification by faith. Hebrews 10.37–38 identifies the coming "vision" of Habakkuk 2.2–3 with Christ, and uses it to strengthen a persecuted church. And believers throughout the years have affirmed the truth of Habakkuk's central thought: No matter what the circumstances, abundant and joyful life can be had from faithfulness to God.

Hades. See Hell.

Hagar. An Egyptian servant of Sarah, featured in the Genesis narratives about *Sarah and *Abraham. According to custom, Sarah, who was sterile, presented Hagar to Abraham so that Hagar might conceive and provide Abraham with an heir.

Two Hagar stories appear in the Bible. The first (Gen. 16.1–16) describes the expulsion of the pregnant Hagar from Sarah's household, her conversation in the wilderness with a messenger of God who urges her to return to the household, and the subsequent birth of her son *Ishmael. In the second Hagar story (Gen. 21.8–21), set more than fourteen years later, when Sarah herself had at last borne a son (*Isaac) and was celebrating the day of his being weaned, Hagar and Ishmael are cast out from Sarah's household into the wilderness. A divine messenger rescues them when their water supply runs out, and he proclaims that Ishmael will become a great nation.

The literary and chronological relationship of these two narratives is problematic, but certain themes common to both can be recognized. One is that Sarah is the dominant figure in the household with respect to management of domestic affairs, including determining the fate of household staff. In both narratives, Sarah makes a decision about Hagar's fate and Abraham acquiesces. Another theme is the tension between the main wife and a concubine or servant wife with respect to inheritance. Parallels with Babylonian laws suggest that Isaac, though born later, could still be considered firstborn. Sarah's desire to exclude Ishmael from any inheritance at all is partly to satisfy the narrative of Genesis 17, in which Sarah will be the mother of the covenantal heir; it may also reflect the difficult personal relations that arise when one son receives all.

A fourth theme involves the way in which disadvantaged individuals are portrayed as surviving and being blessed with the promise of great prominence. A final theme concerns the special role of Ishmael in biblical history. The Hagar stories establish the close relationship of the Ishmaelites ("the descendants of Hagar," according to Bar. 3:23) to the Israelites, relegating them to a separate territory but recognizing that God has protected and sustained their eponymous ancestor, the son of Hagar and Abraham. Finally, the narratives, while making Hagar a heroic figure, are also sensitive to her vulnerability as a woman, a foreigner, and a servant.

Paul interprets the Hagar stories with a tendentious allegory in Galatians 4:21–31.

CAROL L. MEYERS

Haggai, The Book of. The book tells us that Haggai prophesied in the second year of *Darius the Persian (i.e., 520 BCE), his recorded ministry spanning a period of only three months, from the sixth to the ninth month of that year. The promises of *Ezekiel and Second *Isaiah, which must have spurred on many of the returning exiles, seemed not to have been fulfilled. A series of brief oracles in chap. 1 reveal the hardship of the situation of the pioneers, who were struggling to rebuild Judah after the Babylonian *exile. They had known repeated droughts and failed harvests, with consequent famine, poverty, and inflation.

Haggai challenged the community about their priorities. He replies to their protests that they are too poor to rebuild the *Temple (1.2) by saying that it is because they have not rebuilt it that they are so poor (1.4–6, 9–11). He thus draws on the old *covenant traditions that had threatened the people, if they broke the Law, with drought, pestilence, famine, and the frustration of all their activity (Deut. 28.15–24). Similarly, the *Zion tradition had linked God's presence in his Temple at Jerusalem with peace and prosperity for the land and community (e.g., Pss. 29; 72; cf. 2 Sam. 23.1–7). He therefore calls on them to rebuild the Temple (1.8).

A short narrative section (1.12–15) tells how the whole community under the leadership of *Zerubbabel, the governor, and Joshua, the high priest (the Jeshua of Ezra and Nehemiah), was energized by Haggai's preaching to begin work, encouraged by a further assurance of Yahweh's presence by the prophet (1.13).

Evidently some grew discouraged in the work; they were not helped by the cynicism of those who had seen the grandeur of Solomon's Temple (2.3). The following verses show Haggai again encouraging them, not only by assuring them of Yahweh's presence in the task (2.4) but also with the promise that this Temple, once completed, would be the scene of Yahweh's reign as universal king (2.6–9). Earlier prophetic promises are taken up again, together with themes from the *psalms that celebrate Yahweh's rule as king (the so-called enthronement psalms). So God appears, as on Mount *Sinai (Exod. 19.16–18), accompanied by earthquake and cosmic upheavals (cf. Isa. 24.18–20; Jer. 10.10; Ps. 97.1–5); the nations come in pilgrimage to Zion (cf. Isa. 2.2–4 = Mic. 4.1–4), bringing tribute to God as king (cf. Isa. 60.6). God will fill the Temple with his "*glory" as he dwells there again (cf. Ezek. 43.1–5). That is why the new Temple will excel even the first and that is why it is worth building.

The oracle based on a priestly directive in 2.10–14 (cf. Zech. 7.1–3) shows that the postexilic prophets were seen as serving in a sanctuary setting and yet also were deeply concerned with ethical and moral purity.

In 2.15–19 the prophet describes the marked contrast in fortunes that he believed would be experienced after the Temple was rebuilt. The promises of 2.6–9 are renewed in 2.20–22, while 2.23 shows that Haggai saw Zerubbabel as continuing the line of the preexilic Davidic dynasty, which, it was believed, God had promised would last forever (2 Sam. 7.16). The picture of the Davidic king as God's "signet ring" echoes what was said of Jehoiachin earlier (Jer. 22.24). Haggai thus seems to have centered some kind of messianic hope on Zerubbabel.

We know nothing about Haggai himself. The book shows that he was seen as a prophet who assured the immediate postexilic community that earlier prophecies would be fulfilled and the hopes of the Zion/David theology of preexilic Jerusalem would be renewed. The Temple was completed in 515 BCE (Ezra 6.15), but we learn no more about or from Haggai after his three months of preaching spanning the dates given in the book (Ezra 5.1–2 adds nothing new). The addition of a gloss in 2.5 alluding to the presence of God in terms of the pillar of fire and cloud that accompanied the Israelites at the time of the *Exodus (e.g., Exod. 13.21), and the description of the response of Haggai's hearers in terms reminiscent of that of the Exodus community to *Moses (1.12–14; cf. Exod. 35.29; 36.2), suggests that his oracles were handed down among those who saw the return from exile as a second Exodus (as Second Isaiah had done) and Haggai as having exercised the ministry of a second Moses.

Hallelujah (Hebr. halĕlû yāh). The older English translation "Praise ye the Lord" makes it clear that the verb is in the plural; the command to praise is addressed to the members of the worshiping community. The ending "jah" (also written "yah") is a shortened form of Yahweh (see Names of God in the Hebrew Bible; Tetragrammaton).

In the Hebrew Bible, the word occurs only in the Psalter, restricted to several groups of *Psalms (104–106; 111–113; 115–117; and 146–150). It may stand at the beginning of a psalm, as in 111–112; or at the end, as in 104, 105, 115–117; or in both positions, as in 106, 113, 135, and 146–150. In Psalm 104, it concludes the praise of God in nature, and in 105–106, of the God of Israel. Psalms 146–150 are joyful, for use in public worship. It may be that these psalms were once an independent collection. The word also occurs in the Apocrypha (Tob. 13.17; 3 Macc. 7.13).

Like other Hebrew liturgical terms (e.g., *amen), "Hallelujah" is used in the New Testament; in Revelation 19.1–8 it introduces several hymns of praise for God. Rabbinic writings use "Hallel" alone as the title for a song of praise. Christian liturgical usage employs the form "Alleluia," following the Greek and Latin transliterations of the Hebrew original.

Ham/Canaan, Cursing of. According to Genesis 9.20–27, Ham saw his father *Noah lying drunk and naked in his tent, and Noah later cursed Ham's son *Canaan, pronouncing him a slave to his brothers. Ham's precise offense has been interpreted as castration, sexual assault, and incest. But the simplest explanation seems best: in failing to cover his naked father, Ham was disrespectful. Still, it is not Ham but his son Canaan whom Noah cursed, almost certainly because the story served to legitimate Israel's *conquest of Canaan and the destruction of its inhabitants.

This passage has more recently been used to support another kind of racism. Because some of Ham's descendants, notably *Cush, are black (see Gen. 10.6–14), the "curse on Ham" has been interpreted as black (Negroid) skin color and features in order to legitimate slavery and oppression of people of African origin. This interpretation occurs first in the *Talmud and has persisted in certain circles. It is also reflected in the postbiblical Christian tradition of three *Magi, one of whom is black, in parallel to Noah's three sons. Yet it was neither Ham nor Cush who was cursed, but Canaan, the "brother" of Cush and the "son" of Ham.

Hammurabi. See Hammurapi.

Hammurapi (also spelled Hammurabi, a less correct form). Sixth in a dynasty that settled in *Babylon about 1894 BCE and continued until 1595 BCE, Hammurapi ruled ca. 1792–1750 BCE. His ancestors were seminomads from the Syrian steppe who poured into Babylonia from about 2000 BCE onward and overwhelmed the local rulers. The Babylonians knew the tribes as *Amorites or "westerners" and gave that name also to Hammurapi's line (often called the First Dynasty of Babylon). Hammurapi's father, Sinmuballit, had begun to strengthen the city's position within a network of shifting alliances, dominated by Larsa in the south. Hammurapi continued this policy, gaining control of towns farther down the *Euphrates early in his reign. For many years he held this position, raising his kingdom's prosperity by improving irrigation systems and building temples and fortifications. In his thirtieth year he took an opportunity to use his strength and his shrewd alliances to overthrow the dominant king, Rim-Sin of Larsa, thereby obtaining the rule of all southern Babylonia. To the north were other rival states, Eshnunna and *Assyria. They fell to Hammurapi two years later; then, in his thirty-third year, *Mari on the mid Euphrates became his last major conquest. Hammurapi was now master of Mesopotamia. He enjoyed his success for a few years, but at his death the conquered states reasserted themselves, and his son, Samsu-iluna, held only the region of Babylon. In the past, Hammurapi has been identified with Amraphel, king of Shinar (Gen. 14), but current knowledge does not support this.

Babylonians remembered Hammurapi for more than a thousand years. He was first to raise Babylon to great power and so to exalt her god Marduk (biblical Merodach). He was also famous as a lawgiver. Babylonian kings customarily issued a list of new or revised laws when they came to the throne, and Hammurapi did so as well. During his long reign, local governors referred awkward problems to him, and so a considerable body of royal decisions accumulated. Toward the end of his reign, Hammurapi promulgated his famous laws. They were written on clay tablets and engraved on stone stelae, one of which survives almost complete. There is no evidence that Hammurapi's laws ever came into force, perhaps because Samsu-iluna issued his own edict soon afterward. Nevertheless, scribes continued to copy them until at least the sixth century BCE.

Hammurapi's laws are a series of regulations for various circumstances, not a comprehensive code. They are set out in casuistic form, "If a man does . . . , then . . . ," with penalties graded according to the social status of the injured party. While there is a strong emphasis on property rights, the king's claim to decree justice "in order to do away with wicked and perverse men, so that the strong might not oppress the weak," and "to give justice to the orphan and widow," is evident in laws providing for members of society who lost the protection of father or husband.

Comparing Hammurapi's laws with biblical laws shows striking similarities and strong contrasts. Kidnaping, for example, carried the death penalty, and a man who wounded another in a fight had to carry the cost of his care (Hammurapi nos. 14, 206; Exod. 21.16, 18, 19). There are cases of the law of talion, "If a man has put out another man's eye, they shall put out his eye" (nos. 196, 197, 200; see Exod. 21.24). Since in many respects Israelite society was like Hammurapi's a millennium earlier, similarities are not surprising. There are also distinctions. Babylonian law can prescribe physical penalties including execution in a variety of cases involving property (e.g., forms of theft), whereas biblical laws reserve such punishment for offenses against the person, and then with careful restrictions (Exod. 22.2–3; Deut. 25.1–3), placing a special value on human life. Hammurapi did not pretend to give a complete code of laws, so there are no general apodictic commands like "You shall not kill." Although the sun god Shamash was the source of justice, Hammurapi gave no cultic rules like those in the Mosaic code. (See also Law, article on Israelite Law.)

Within Babylonian culture, Hammurapi's laws remain the most extensive surviving statement of the principles for a just and orderly society, and of the king's role in it as shepherd of his people. ALAN MILLARD Hands, Laying on of. See Laying on of Hands.

Hardening of Heart. Hebrew expresses moral and intellectual obtuseness by calling the heart "hard" (or "strong," "firm," "fat," or "bold"). "Hardness of heart" primarily connotes inflexibility of purpose or perception, often but not necessarily leading to *sin. There is no nuance of cruelty, however, as might be inferred from English "hard-hearted." Such obtuseness hinders, for example, *Jesus' disciples from understanding his *miracles (Mark 6.52; 8.17). The rejection of the Christian movement by Jews (Matt. 13.14–15; Mark 3.5; John 12.40; Acts 7.51; 19.9; 28.25–27; Rom. 11.7, 25; 2 Cor. 3.14) and gentiles (Eph. 4.18) is also blamed upon their "hardness" and "stubbornness," as is subsequent dissension within the church (Rom. 2.5; Heb. 3.8, 15; 4.7).

A heart can be made hard by God (Deut. 2.30; Josh. 11.20; Isa. 63.17) or by sinners themselves (Deut. 15.7; Ps. 95.8; 2 Chron. 36.13). In general, the Bible attributes misconduct both to human initiative (2 Kings 17.14; 9.14; 11.8; 13.10; 15.6; 16.12; 18.12; etc.) and to divine intervention (1 Sam. 2.25; 1 Kings 12.15; 18.37; 22.20–23; Isa. 6.9–10; 29.10; 63.17; Ps. 105.25; 2 Chron. 25.16). Psalm 81.12 describes God abandoning the sinful to their stubbornness. Thus, sometimes the Pharaoh of the *Exodus hardens his own heart (Exod. 8.15, 3; 9.34; 1 Sam. 6.6), sometimes it is hardened for him by Yahweh (4.21; 7.3; 9.12; 10.1, 20, 27; 11.10; 14.4, 8, 17), and sometimes it simply "becomes hard" (7.13, 14, 22; 8.15; 9.7, 35). God's intervention and Pharaoh's native stubbornness together lead the king to his doom.

In Isaiah 6.9–10, Isaiah is told that the purpose of his prophecy is to make the Israelites obtuse, lest they evade their deserved punishment. Jesus cites this verse as the reason he speaks not clearly but only in *parables (Matt. 13.10–17). In other words, God has decided that some will be impervious to his message and fated for perdition.

This may seem unfair, and the book of *Jonah in fact dramatizes the converse theory: while the prophet would deny sinners the opportunity to repent, God insists that they be given a chance. Similarly, Ezekiel (3.16–21; 18; 33.1–20) maintains that Yahweh desires each sinner's *repentance; to bring this about is the prophet's job. This more benevolent picture of God contributed in the Persian period and later to the evolution of the image of *Satan, who largely relieved Yahweh of his role of tempter. But the notion of the divine origin of human sin and obtuseness survives in the New Testament. Paul addresses the question of fairness in Romans 9 but reaches no clear conclusion, merely affirming God's absolute power and inscrutable justice: "Who indeed are you, a human being to argue with God?" (Rom. 9.20); compare the divine response to Job from the whirlwind (Job 38–41): "Where were you when I laid the foundations of the earth?" (38.4). WILLIAM H. PROPP

Hazor (Map 1:Y2). Located north of the Sea of *Galilee, Hazor was occupied from the early third millennium to the second century BCE. The city's 12-hectare (30-acre) acropolis and 70-hectare (175-acre) "Lower City," which was enclosed by earthen ramparts, gained international prominence during the second millennium. Texts mention Hazor as an enemy of Middle Kingdom *Egypt (Execration Texts), a destination for tin shipments from the east (*Mari archives), and a military objective of New Kingdom Pharaohs (Dynasties XVIII–XIX). Destruction of those levels dating from the Late Bronze Age (1550–1200), with their successive Canaanite temples, may relate to Israelite *conquest traditions (Josh. 11.1–15; 12.19). Hazor's Iron Age acropolis continued as headquarters for Canaanite alliances (Judg. 4–5) until *Solomon (1 Kings 9.15) and *Ahab made it a garrison city. Despite damage by the Arameans in the ninth century and an earthquake in the eighth, Hazor prospered under Jeroboam II before the *Assyrians razed it in 732 BCE (2 Kings 15.29), leaving destruction debris one meter thick. Heaven. It is important to note that in the Hebrew Bible the word (šāmayim) is plural; English translations sometimes use "heaven," sometimes "the heavens." In Genesis 1.6–8, the creation of the firmament (NRSV: "dome") is described, "and God called the firmament Heaven [NRSV: Sky]." This was regarded as an overarching vault resting on pillars at the end of the earth. Above it was the celestial ocean, and above this the dwelling of God (cf. Ps. 14.2). In the firmament were openings or "windows" through which the upper waters came down in the form of rain (Gen. 7.11). At times, the term "the heavens" refers to the expanse in which the birds fly (Gen. 1.20), at times to the starry heavens, and at other times still to the highest heaven above the firmament. The context decides which meaning is appropriate.

The starry heavens are regarded as a witness to God's being and creative power; continually they "are telling the glory of God" (Ps. 19.1). These heavens remind humans of their littleness and the wonder of God's concern for them (Ps. 8.3–4). Humans' ignorance of "the ordinances of the heavens" (Job 38.33) helps to fill them with awe.

In the course of the biblical period, more transcendent ideas of God developed, and Jeremiah declares, "Do not I fill heaven and earth? says the Lord" (23.24). But even when the concept of God's omnipresence was expressed, other expressions were retained. According to 1 Kings 8.27, *Solomon recognizes that heaven and the highest heaven cannot contain God; but later in the same prayer he repeatedly asks, "Hear in heaven your dwelling place" (8.30, etc.). Isaiah 65.17 speaks of "new heavens and a new earth"; this hope for a new, or renewed, *creation had important developments in later *apocalyptic.

With respect to heaven as the final abode of God's people, this is hardly to be found in the Hebrew Bible, where for the most part the fate of everyone, good or bad, was the shadowy realm of Sheol (see Hell). After the *exile, however, Persian and Greek ideas stimulated Jewish thinking in new directions, and this is seen in some of the apocalypses of the period. Bitter persecution also produced the conviction that God would not leave without some vindication those who had died for their faith. The doctrine of resurrection was at first associated with the hope of life on a renewed earth (see Afterlife and Immortality).

By the Roman period, a blessed future holds a sure place in Jewish thinking, particularly among the *Pharisees; the *Sadducees retained the conception of a universal Sheol. In the New Testament generally, the servants of God are encouraged to look forward to a blissful eternity with God (see Luke 20.38), but the word "heaven" is used sparingly in this connection (e.g., Mark 10.21; Matt 5.12), other terms such as "eternal life," "glory," "my Father's house," being preferred. Hebrews 11.16 speaks of those who "desire a better country, that is, a heavenly one." Paul is more concerned with the company than the place and speaks of the future life as being "with Christ" (Phil. 1.23) and as seeing "face to face" (1 Cor. 13.12).

The term "heaven" still occurs in the New Testament in the sense of "sky" (e.g., Mark 13.25; Luke 13.19 [NRSV: "air"]). In the letter to the *Hebrews, mention is made of the heavens of the present creation that are destined to perish (Heb. 1.10–11), the heavens through which Jesus passed (4.14; 7.26), and the realm beyond, where he sits at the right hand of God "in heaven" (8.1). The last of these resembles in some ways the Platonic heaven of ultimate realities, of which earthly things are copies (cf. 9.23–24 and 8.5).

The word "heaven" does not necessarily refer to a literal place, for already the Christian sits with Christ in the heavenly places (Eph. 2.6). Jesus, who has "all authority in heaven and on earth" (Matt. 28.18), shares the omnipresence of the Father; he "ascended far above all the heavens, so that he might fill all things" (Eph. 4.10).

There is more about heaven in the book of *Revelation than in any other book of the Bible, and vivid pictures are given of the throne of God and the *Lamb, with living creatures and elders, angelic hosts and multitudes of the redeemed, drawn from every nation, bringing homage and praise. Popular conceptions of heaven have been derived largely from the imagery of this book.

Two other matters need mention. Some of the noncanonical writings give detailed descriptions of multiple heavens, up to seven or more. But Paul was not necessarily thinking of these when he wrote of his mystical transport into the third heaven (2 Cor. 12.2); an alternate explanation is that the expression indicates a high degree of spiritual exaltation. Second, Jewish tradition came to have such reverence for the *name of God that "heaven" and other substitutes were used; thus, for example, the prodigal son says, "I have sinned against heaven and before you" (Luke 15.18, 21); and Matthew generally uses "kingdom of heaven" and only four times "*kingdom of God."

Hebrew. The Hebrew language is written from right to left in an alphabet of twenty-two letters. They all originally denoted only consonants, but w, y, and h have also been used to represent certain long vowels at the end of words (w = "u"; y = "i"; h = "a," "o," and "e"; w and y were later used for "o" and "e," respectively) since at least the tenth century BCE and w and y within words since the ninth. In texts from *Qumran and in later writings, letters are used more extensively to represent vowels. The full system of representing vowels by adding points to the consonants developed much later, between the fifth and the tenth centuries CE. The present system of vocalization thus reproduces the pronunciation current about a thousand years after the end of the biblical period, though it is doubtless based on earlier traditions of reading the Bible.

Among the differences between Hebrew (along with other Semitic languages) and English are the presence in the former of the guttural consonants ʿayin and ḥēt (the latter is like "ch" in Scottish "loch"); the emphatic consonants ṭēt, and ṣādeh and qōp (kinds of "t" and "s" that do not occur in English, and a kind of "k" that is not distinguished in English from any other kind of "k"); the sibilant śîn (probably the same as a consonant in Modern South Arabian dialects) alongside sāmek (s) and šîn (š); the presence of two grammatical genders, masculine and feminine; the use of the dual form for certain nouns that go in pairs (e.g., eyes, ears, and feet); the fact that many words are derived from roots of three consonants; and a verbal system in which the use of certain vowels and consonants denotes differences in meaning (e.g., kātab "he wrote"; niktab "it was written"; hiktîb "he caused to write"), and in which there are two forms, the so-called perfect and imperfect, which were used in later times to denote the past and the future, but were employed in earlier times in ways that are still debated.

Within the Northwest Semitic group of languages, Hebrew belongs to the *Canaanite family, which includes *Phoenician, *Moabite, and *Ammonite (some would add *Ugaritic). The other major Northwest Semitic language family is *Aramaic. The word "Hebrew" (ʿibrît) is not used of the language until the Hellenistic period, but we read of "the language of Canaan" in Isaiah 19.18; and in 2 Kings 18.26, 28 (= Isa. 36.11, 13; 2 Chron. 32.18) and Nehemiah 13.24 Jerusalemites speak yĕhûdît, that is, "Judean" (later "Jewish"). Certainly, the similarity between Biblical Hebrew and Phoenician and some Canaanite words that appear in the *Amarna letters from the fourteenth century BCE shows that the Israelites' language did not differ much, if at all, from that of the Canaanites. Some have inferred from the common characteristics of Hebrew and Canaanite, and from the words "A wandering Aramean was my father" (Deut. 26.5) that the ancestors of the Israelites spoke Aramaic and that they adopted from the Canaanites the language later known as Hebrew. It is doubtful, however, whether Deuteronomy 26.5 is intended to convey information about linguistic history, and the affinities of Hebrew with what was spoken by the Canaanites may be explained on the hypothesis that the Israelites and their ancestors already spoke a language closely related to that of the Canaanites.

While the Bible is the principal source for Classical Hebrew, the same language is used in inscriptions. Among the best known are the *Gezer Calendar (tenth century BCE), a list of months defined by the characteristic agricultural work performed in them—this text may not have been written by an Israelite; the Kuntillet ʿAjrud and Khirbet el-Qom inscriptions (late ninth or early eighth century BCE), which mention Yahweh and his *Asherah; the *Samaria ostraca (eighth century BCE) recording payments of wine, oil, and so on; the Siloam Tunnel inscription (late eighth century BCE), found in the tunnel built by *Hezekiah under the city of David to bring water from the spring of Gihon to the Pool of Siloam; the *Lachish ostraca (early sixth century BCE) with military messages before the Babylonian invasion; and the Arad ostraca (same period) recording the provisions supplied to soldiers. The *Moabite Stone (ca. 830 BCE), in which King Mesha of Moab boasts of his victories over the Israelites, is in a language almost identical with Biblical Hebrew.

There were differences of dialect among the Israelites. Judges 11.5–6 reports that the Ephraimite fugitives were unable to say "*shibboleth" but said "sibboleth" and so betrayed their origin to their Gileadite enemies. The Hebrew Bible was transmitted by people in Judah, but traces of another—presumably northern—dialect have been preserved in the Bible. The Song of Deborah (Judg. 5), which appears to be of northern origin, uses the masculine plural ending -în in v. 10, and the relative particle šă- in v. 7, where the dialect of Judah would have used -îm and ʾăšer, respectively. There were other differences between southern and northern Hebrew, as in the second-person feminine singular pronoun and pronominal suffix. A northern story such as 2 Kings 4 (in which the northern prophet *Elisha appears) has thus retained something of its northern dialect. Further, northern inscriptions show dialectal differences. For example, the Biblical Hebrew word for house is bayit, but northern inscriptions have bt, which probably reflects a pronunciation bēt, and "year" is št in contrast to the southern šnh. The book of *Hosea contains many linguistic and textual difficulties, and some of them can probably be explained as resulting from the prophet's northern dialect.

Hebrew changed with the passing of time. The language of the books of Chronicles, for example, is different from that of Kings. Aramaic became the dominant language in the Syro-Palestinian region and it influenced Hebrew and eventually displaced it in some areas. Nehemiah 13.24 complains that some children of mixed marriages could no longer speak the language of Judah but spoke "the language of Ashdod." It is possible that this refers not to a survival of the Philistine language (though that cannot be excluded) but to Aramaic. The language of *Ecclesiastes differs markedly from that of preexilic texts, and the linguistic peculiarities of the *Song of Solomon are often attributed to a late date. Some people, however, could still write in the earlier style, as may be seen in the wisdom of Jesus ben Sira, written around 180 BCE (see *Sirach), and in the sectarian writing from *Qumran. Yet such essays in composition in Classical Hebrew were attempts at archaizing. The prologue to the Greek translation of Sirach also contains the earliest use of the term Hebrew for the language of ancient Israel; see also 4 Maccabees 12.7.

Rabbinical writings of the first few centuries CE use a form of Hebrew that is usually known as Mishnaic Hebrew (from the collection of legal tractates known as the *Mishnah, of ca. 200 CE). It was once widely believed that this language was never used by the common people but was a scholarly language created under the influence of Aramaic. Now it is generally recognized that the rabbis did not concoct a scholarly language but used a form of Hebrew that developed in the last few centuries BCE. This conclusion arises from a study of the nature of the language and from references in rabbinic texts to its use by ordinary people, and this vernacular use doubtless lies behind its presence in the Copper Scroll from Qumran and in some letters from the Second Jewish Revolt (132–35 CE). Although Hebrew was used in Judah in the first century CE as a vernacular, Aramaic and *Greek were also spoken, and there is evidence that Aramaic was dominant in *Galilee in the north. *Jesus came from Galilee, and normally he probably spoke Aramaic. Indeed, some of his words quoted in the Gospels are Aramaic, though some (such as "*abba" and "ephphatha") can be explained as either Hebrew or Aramaic. It is not unlikely that he also spoke Hebrew, especially when visiting Judea.

Several verses in the New Testament appear at first sight to refer to the Hebrew language, and the Greek word translated as "Hebrew" (hebraisti) does indeed refer to that language in Revelation 9.11; 10.16. But it is also used of the Aramaic words Gabbatha and *Golgotha in John 19.13, 17, and it probably denotes a Semitic (as distinct from Greek) language spoken by Jews, including both Hebrew and Aramaic, rather than referring to Hebrew in distinction from Aramaic. Similarly, the Aramaic expression Akeldema is said in Acts 1.19 to be "in their language," that is, the language of the people of Jerusalem.

Some time after the Second Jewish Revolt, Hebrew died out as a vernacular in Palestine, probably in the late second or the third century CE. It continued, however, to be used by Jews as a religious, scholarly, and literary language, and was also spoken in certain circumstances. It was revived as a vernacular only in the later nineteenth century CE, and it is now the living language of the state of Israel.

Hebrews. A name applied occasionally to the early Israelites, primarily to distinguish them from other cultures and peoples of the ancient Near East. An ethnic term, it antedated the common sociopolitical names *Israel or *Judah in the monarchic period, as well as the more ethnoreligious appellative *Jew in later times. The word Hebrews, used thirty-three times in the Hebrew Bible, appears in only four texts (Jer. 34.9 [twice], 14; and Jon. 1.9) describing the period after the time of the Davidic kingdom. Contemporary sources outside the Hebrew Bible refer to the people not as Hebrews but as Israel.

The derivation of the word Hebrew (Hebr. ʿibrî) is uncertain. It may be related to the verb ʿābar, "to cross over or beyond." Thus, the Hebrews would be understood as "those who crossed over" or "the ones from beyond," meaning probably from the other side of the *Euphrates River (Josh. 24.3) or perhaps the *Jordan River (Gen. 50.10). Along this line, the *Septuagint translates "Abram the Hebrew" in Genesis 14.13 as "Abram, the one who crossed over."

A second possible etymology is based on the *genealogies (Gen. 10.21, 24–25; 11.14–17; 1 Chron. 1.18–19, 25; Luke 3.35) that identify Eber, the grandson of Shem, as one of the ancestors of *Abraham and all his descendants, thus the "Eberites." No such explicit tie, however, is made in the Bible, and this connection would suggest that other peoples who are thought to derive from Abraham, including *Edomites, *Moabites, and Arabic tribes, should also be called Hebrews. The connections with Eber on the one hand and the motif of "crossing over" on the other, as well as a third possibility mentioned below, remain suggestive but inconclusive.

Virtually every reference to the Hebrews in the Hebrew Bible occurs in a context in which the purpose is to differentiate these people from those of neighboring countries, usually the Egyptians and the Philistines. *Joseph, stemming from "the land of the Hebrews" (Gen. 40.15), is identified by this name (Gen. 39.14, 17; 41.12) in the story recounting his rise to prominence under the Pharaoh. A later Egyptian ruler charges the Hebrew midwives to kill all sons born to the Hebrews, but they refuse to do so, reporting deceitfully to the Pharaoh that "the Hebrew women are not like the Egyptian women; for they are vigorous and give birth before the midwife comes to them" (Exod. 1.19). Moses is recognized by the Pharaoh's daughter as a Hebrew child, and she calls for a Hebrew woman to nurse him (Exod. 2.6–7). Subsequently, Moses defends a Hebrew, "one of his people," from a beating at the hands of an Egyptian and then flees the land when he learns that other Hebrews have heard of it (Exod. 2.11–14). In confronting the Pharaoh to demand release of his people, Moses makes reference to "the Lord, the God of the Hebrews" (Exod. 3.18; 5.3; 7.16; 9.1). At all these points, the ethnic name serves to distinguish this people from the Egyptians, who are shown as using this designation as well. Genesis 43.32 reports that the Egyptians even considered it an "abomination" to eat with Hebrews, a custom for which there is no record in Egyptian sources.

In their dealings with the *Philistines, the people are also often called Hebrews, especially by the Philistines themselves. At times it seems to be used as a term of contempt, parallel to the tradition in Genesis 43.32. In 1 Samuel 4.6, 9, the Philistines speak derisively of their opponents in battle and urge each other to fight courageously "in order not to become slaves to the Hebrews as they have been to you." In a later episode the Philistines, considering the Hebrews to be unworthy fighters who cower in caves (1 Sam. 14.11), are easily routed by the bravery of Jonathan and his armor bearer. This story also raises the question of whether the Hebrews and the Israelites are identical groups. When Saul issues the battle cry "Let the Hebrews hear," the text states that "all Israel heard" (1 Sam. 13.3–4)—which may not be the same as saying that all the Hebrews responded. It is in fact later reported that a number of Hebrews had previously attached themselves to the Philistines, and that after Jonathan's rout they disaffected and joined the Israelites (1 Sam. 14.21). This text may retain an ancient distinction that in later periods no longer applied: Hebrews as a larger socioeconomic group extending beyond Israel, and Israelites as the particular ones who banded together in the Canaanite highlands to form a new nation. In that case, the Philistines may have simply considered the Israelites to be part of the larger class of Hebrews whom they were attempting to control, for example by restricting their access to metal-working (1 Sam.

13.19). A similar confusion occurs in 1 Samuel 29.3 when the Philistines prohibit *David, who has been living with them, from joining them in battle against the Israelites—not because he is an Israelite but because he is considered a Hebrew.

There are only two other similar references to Hebrews in the Hebrew Bible. In Genesis 14.13, a context in which numerous peoples are mentioned, "Abram [Abraham] the Hebrew" appears parallel to "Mamre the Amorite." In a much later period, the prophet *Jonah, when pressed by sailors of the boat on which he sought escape, calls himself a Hebrew and a believer in the Lord who created the sea and land (Jon. 1.9).

The ethnic and sociopolitical origin of the Hebrews remains a contested point. In many respects the 'apiru (or Ḫabiru; in Sumerian SA.GAZ) seem to be a close counterpart, and it is often suggested that the word Hebrew is derived from 'apiru (rather than from Eber or from the verb "to cross over," as indicated above). The 'apiru were a diverse group of people with an inferior social status, living mostly on the fringes of settled civilizations from Mesopotamia to Egypt, and there is evidence of them in numerous sources throughout the second millennium BCE. They frequently were hired as mercenaries or sold themselves into servitude in order to survive. The *Amarna letters (fourteenth century BCE) place them in the area of Syria-Palestine and describe them as basically outlaws and raiders, but such antagonism with resident populations may not have been common.

While there is no basis for equating the Hebrews with the 'apiru, the proto-Israelites were probably a conglomeration of various Semitic groups, of which the 'apiru was certainly one. Another was the shasu, pastoral nomads and plunderers also known to have been dwelling in Syria-Palestine as well as elsewhere in the region. The tradition of a "mixed multitude" (Exod. 12.38 [NRSV: "mixed crowd"]) or "rabble" (Num. 11.4) led by Moses through the wilderness is consistent with this picture of the early Israelites as an amalgamation of diverse peoples. Calling them "Hebrews" is an early means of distinguishing this new entity from other existing ethnic groups.

Hebrews are mentioned in one other notable context in the Hebrew Bible. Two laws dealing with *slavery distinguish those who are Hebrews from others who are not (compare Lev. 25.39–55). Exodus 21.2–11 provides for the release of every male Hebrew slave after a seven-year period of service unless he should choose to remain for life with his master. Special rights are also reserved for a daughter who has to be sold into slavery. Deuteronomy 15.12–18 extends the law of manumission to include both male and female Hebrew slaves, stipulating that they are to be given ample provisions for starting their new life of freedom. Immediately before the fall of Jerusalem in 587/586 BCE, according to Jeremiah 34.8–22, King Zedekiah proclaimed the release of all male and female Hebrew (here also called Judean) slaves, but after this was accomplished the Israelite masters took them back, eliciting from Jeremiah an ominous pronouncement of doom. It may be that these Hebrew slaves, especially in the earlier laws, are reminiscent of the often-enslaved 'apiru, but the Bible perceives them as compatriot Israelites deserving of treatment better than that normally afforded foreigners.

The name Hebrew, used rarely in the Hebrew Bible, thus occurs primarily to distinguish Israelites ethnically from non-Israelites. At times it is applied by foreigners (mainly Egyptians and Philistines); in other instances, by the Hebrews themselves when addressing foreigners. Except for the slave laws, Israelites normally identify themselves to each other—and often to others as well—as the people of Israel and Judah. Similar usage continues in later literature (e.g., Jth. 10.12; 12.11; 2 Macc. 15.37).

In the New Testament, the term designates Jews, hence Jewish Christians who maintained their ties with the Jewish heritage and the Aramaic or Hebrew language. Acts 6.1 contrasts them with Hellenists, perhaps Jewish Christians who accommodated more to the Hellenistic culture by speaking Greek and following certain Greek customs. Paul, born in Tarsus, proudly identifies himself as "a Hebrew born of Hebrews" (Phil. 3.5; also 2 Cor. 11.22; and Acts 22.2–3).

In modern usage, the term Hebrew is generally applied only to the language (see Hebrew) of ancient and modern Israel and of Jewish scriptures and tradition. DOUGLAS A. KNIGHT

Hebrews, The Letter to the.

Theme and Content. The theme of the letter to the Hebrews is the supremacy of Christ. The letter opens with the assertion that God, who spoke through the *prophets in varied ways, has in this last age spoken his final word in the person of his Son. This immediately introduces an emphasis that remains prominent throughout, namely, the uniqueness and perfection of the Son in comparison with the multiplicity and imperfection of all others. The contrast is between the many and the One, between expectation and fulfillment, between shadow and reality. Thus, the many *priests of the old order, themselves sinful and temporary, are superseded by the single person of Christ, who is without sin and whose priesthood is forever; and their innumerable *sacrifices, endlessly repeated because they were unable to achieve the redemption they portended, are replaced by Christ's one perfect sacrifice of himself, which is ever-more effective for purging sins.

It is apparent from the content of the letter that there was need to insist on the supremacy of Christ by demonstrating his superiority to *angels (1.4–2.18) and to *Moses (3.1–4.13), as well as to *Aaron (4.14–10.18), the first of the high priests of the old order. At the same time, this involved instruction regarding the superiority of the new *covenant, of which Christ is the mediator, to the old covenant under which the Mosaic system operated (8.1–9.10).

Apparently, those to whom this letter was addressed were being tempted not only to assign to angels, or to some angelic being, a position above that of Christ, but also to revert to the structure of the Mosaic dispensation with its regulations and sacrifices. The readers are solemnly warned, accordingly, of the great peril of losing hold of salvation in Christ (2.1–4), of imitating the unbelieving Israelites in the wilderness (3.6b–4.2), of spiritual stagnation and apostasy (5.11–6.8), of despising the gospel (10.26–31), and of copying *Esau, who bartered his birthright to satisfy the whim of a moment (12.15–17).

Recipients and Date. The content of the letter suggests that those to whom it was addressed were Jewish Christians, that is, Jews who had recognized Jesus as the *Messiah. This accords with the traditional designation of the letter, present in the earliest manuscripts as "to the Hebrews."

The date of the letter may confidently be placed before the destruction of *Jerusalem and its *Temple, because of the many indications that the Levitical priesthood was still performing its sacerdotal duties. Furthermore, it is impossible to believe that, had the Temple already been destroyed and its sacrifices ended, no mention of so significant a development would have been made by the author. The occurrence would have been interpreted as confirming his contention that with the coming of Christ the old order had given way to the new. The letter may therefore be dated some time, perhaps a few years, perhaps a few months (depending on how one may discern or interpret other possible indications in the text), prior to 70 CE.

Author. The identity of the author of Hebrews is not known. Allusions in Clement of Rome's letter to the Corinthians attest to the authoritative status of Hebrews before the end of the first century. Presumably Clement knew who the author was. Later on, however, questions regarding the authorship of the letter contributed to the general neglect it suffered in western or Latin Christianity. Jerome's acceptance of the work as coming from the pen of *Paul, and in particular the title "The Epistle of Paul to the Hebrews" in the *Vulgate, was mainly responsible for the belief, unquestioned for more than a thousand years, in its Pauline authorship. But there are adequate reasons for rejecting Paul as its author. First, the writer's style is different from Paul's; second, the issue seems to be settled by his assertion that he (together, apparently, with his readers) received the gospel from those who heard the Lord (2.3).

Of many conjectures that have been offered, there are but two that merit serious consideration. The author was clearly a person in a position of leadership in the apostolic church, intellectually distinguished, theologically mature, and with a profound knowledge of the Bible; two candidates mentioned in the New Testament who meet these criteria are *Barnabas and *Apollos, both of whom were Jewish Christians. Barnabas, who is called an *apostle (Acts 14.14), was an active missionary and an early supporter and companion of Paul. He also was a member of the priestly tribe of *Levi (Acts 4.36), a consideration of interest in view of the considerable length devoted to the priesthood in the letter. That there was a traditional association of Barnabas's name with the letter to the Hebrews is evident from a reference in Tertullian, writing early in the third century (De pudicitia 20).

Apollos, the other strong candidate, was a native of Alexandria and is described as "an eloquent man, well-versed in the scriptures" and a powerful exponent of the gospel (Acts 18.24–28). The Alexandrian connection has impressed those who maintain that the terminology and even the thought of Hebrews are influenced by the culture of the Alexandrian schools, and especially by the philosophical concepts of *Philo. Martin Luther was the first to propose the name of Apollos, without any attempt at substantiation or, for that matter, any thought of philosophical influence from Alexandria or elsewhere (in a 1537 sermon on 1 Cor. 3.4–6, and again in a 1545 comment on Gen. 45.20). But in the absence of any work written by Barnabas or Apollos and of any other first-century evidence, identifying either as the author of the letter is only conjecture.

Destination. The location of the recipients of Hebrews is also unknown. A note stating that the letter was written from Rome or from Italy is found in some manuscripts from the fifth century on, but it is obviously a late gloss based on 13.24, a passage that can be read as stating that the letter was sent not from but to Italy. A Roman destination has been much favored in modern times. But the salutation does not necessarily indicate Italy as either the place of origin or the destination of the epistle, and many scholars now think that its recipients were situated on the eastern shores of the Mediterranean, probably in Palestine or Syria.

Occasion. Like all the letters of the New Testament, Hebrews addressed a specific situation. The discovery of the *Dead Sea Scrolls at Qumran has considerably increased our knowledge of *Judaism in the first century CE. The Qumran sect had withdrawn to the desert, isolating themselves from the Temple worship of Jerusalem, and had established a community governed by the regulations of the Mosaic dispensation, pending the arrival of the eschatological kingdom when the authentic Zadokite or Aaronic high priesthood would be restored in the city of David. The kingdom to be set up would have two messianic personages, the one priestly (Aaronic) who would be superior to the other royal (Davidic), but both would be subordinate to the archangel *Michael as the supreme head. The Qumran literature gives indications of the identification of Michael and *Melchizedek. Yigael Yadin argued that the letter to the Hebrews was intended to counteract the teachings of Qumran; but the Qumran teachings may be taken as representative of *Essenism, whose adherents were to be found throughout Palestine, and there is no need to suppose that the recipients of the letter were converts from the Qumran community. They could have been ex-Essenes or simply Jewish Christians who, attracted by Essene glamorization of a past age, were tempted to compromise the perfection of their salvation in Christ.

At least we now have a clue as to why the writer of Hebrews felt compelled to demonstrate the superiority of Christ to angels, insisting that "God did not subject the coming world . . . to angels" (2.5), and to warn that to return to the Mosaic system with its priesthood would be to lose the gospel. We can also appreciate the need for instruction regarding the true significance of Melchizedek, who as king of Salem and priest of the Most High God portended the union of eternal kingship and eternal priesthood in the single person of Christ. The postulation of two messiahs reflected the inability of combining in one person a priest of the line of Levi with a king of the line of *David. Christ, however, was both the son of David and also a priest forever after the order not of Aaron but of Melchizedek (chap. 7; Ps. 110.4).

The Old and the New. A major purpose of the letter to the Hebrews was to explain the contrast between the old sanctuary and the new and the absolute superiority of the new order over the old. Particularly prominent is the *typology of the *Day of Atonement, which was when annual atonement would be made for the sins of the people (see Lev. 16). Since the high priest too was a sinner, he first offered up a sacrifice for his own sins. Then he killed a goat as a sin offering for the people, and while the people waited outside he disappeared from their view as he went through to the innermost sanctuary of the *tabernacle (the holy of holies), and there sprinkled the animal's blood on the mercy seat. But according to the author of the letter, the old system was unable to achieve the reality that it foreshadowed (10.1–4). The earthly sanctuary also was but "a sketch and shadow of the heavenly one" (8.5). Consequently, the same sacrifices had to be offered over and over again, and the way into the innermost chamber of God's presence was barred to the people. All this served to arouse the longing expectation of the coming of the perfect high priest who would offer up the perfect sacrifice once and for all.

This expectation was made a reality by the coming of Christ, the uniquely great high priest (4.14; 7.4), who, being entirely holy and free from sin (4.15; 7.26), had no need, like the Levitical priests, to offer any sacrifice first for his own sins (7.27), and who offered up not an animal but himself, making atonement for sin by his own blood. His sacrifice avails once for all and need never be repeated (10.10–14). This means, further, that the people, not just the Israelites but now the whole of humankind, are no longer excluded from access to God's presence. This was dramatically indicated by the rending of the curtain that blocked the way into the holy of holies at the moment of Christ's death (10.20; Mark 15.37–38). But it is not a mere earthly sanctuary that has been opened to all, but the true heavenly sanctuary of God's presence (8.2), access to which has been made possible by the triumphant *ascension of the risen Lord into heaven itself (4.14; 9.24), whence his waiting people eagerly look for his glorious reappearance (9.28).

The recipients of the letter are reminded that it is by faith that they must live and die, and that hardship and affliction should never cause them to throw away their confidence and give up the struggle (10.32–39). Chap. 11 is an encomium of faith that sets before them the saints of old, both men and women. But above all they are to set their eyes on Jesus, the pioneer and perfecter of faith, whose humiliation has become glory (12.1–3). And so they are urged to stand firm under persecution, to strive after holiness, and to associate themselves with Jesus and his cross, remembering always that their true homeland is not here but hereafter (12; 13.12–14; cf. 11.10, 13–16). PHILIP EDGCUMBE HUGHES

Hebron (Map 1:X5). A major city of Judah, located ca. 31 km (19 mi) south of Jerusalem. In biblical traditions it is especially associated with the *ancestors of Israel. *Abraham is said to have built an altar there (Gen. 13.18), and Abraham and *Sarah, *Isaac and *Rebekah, and *Jacob and *Leah were buried there in the cave of Machpelah (see Gen. 49.29–32). An enclosure wall built by *Herod the Great surrounds the traditional burial site, now incorporated into a mosque that was originally a church. Hebron's modern Arabic name reflects this association; it is called Ḫalil, for Abraham, the "friend" of God.

Also associated with Caleb and *Samson, Hebron served as *David's first capital (2 Sam. 2.1–5.5) and continued to have symbolic importance in the early monarchy (see 2 Sam. 15.7–10). But once *Jerusalem became established as the capital of the kingdom, Hebron's importance diminished. MICHAEL D. COOGAN Hell. Hell (from a Germanic root meaning "to cover") is the traditional English translation of the Hebrew word Sheol, found sixty-five times in the Hebrew Bible, and of the Greek word Hades, used twenty-six times in the *Apocrypha and ten times in the New Testament. In the NRSV these words are simply transliterated into English, and the translation "hell" is reserved for *Gehenna.

Both Sheol and Hades refer to a general dwelling place of souls after *death (Gen. 37.35; Acts 2.27). Since this sphere was mainly supposed to be found in the underworld (Num. 16.30; Matt. 11.23), it was also called "the pit" (Isa. 38.18), "the bottomless place" (Luke 8.31; Rom. 10.7; see Abyss), or "the lower parts" (of the world; Ps. 63.10; Eph 4.9 [Latin inferiores partes, cf. "inferno"]).

Postexilic Judaism reserved a particular section of hell for the punishment of sinners (emphasized in 1 Enoch 22.10–11). In the New Testament, the *synoptic Gospels and *James in twelve cases name this place of pain Gehenna (Matt. 5.22; James 3.6). Among the New Testament examples of Hades, there are three in which punishment is the point, so that Hades corresponds to Gehenna (Matt. 11.23; Luke 10.15; 16.23). In the other passages where Hades occurs, however, it is used in the neutral sense of a space where all dead are kept (Matt. 16.18; Acts 2.27, 31; Rev. 1.18, 6.8; 20.13, 14; also the variant reading in 1 Cor. 15.55 [cf. Hos. 13.14]).

Concerning the location of hell, the biblical references are colored by the usual cosmology of antiquity, which divided the universe into *heaven, earth, and underworld. The concept of hell, however, did not depend on cosmology, but rather on concern for the destiny of the dead. There was a general conviction that existence continued in some way after its separation from earthly life, an event that implied separation from God, the source of all life. The connection of God with heaven and the *burial of the dead in the ground gave reason generally to localize the realm of death in the underworld, and eventually to let the souls of the wicked dwell in a deeper section than those of the righteous. Such spatial aspects of hell were meant to give the distance of the deceased from God or their nearness to God concrete expression.

In the course of time several different perspectives on hell emerge in the Bible. From a neutral viewpoint, Sheol was regarded in Israel as the dwelling place of all the dead, independent of their character. *Jacob is reported to have said when he believed his son *Joseph dead: "I shall go down to Sheol to my son, mourning" (Gen. 37.35). A similar pessimism is found in various types of literature (e.g., 2 Sam. 12.23; Isa. 14.9–11; Pss. 6.5; 88.5; 115.17; Job 7.9–10). The probable etymology of the word (from the verb šā'al, "to ask") reflects this universalism: the underworld is never sated, but keeps asking for more (see Prov. 27.20; 30.16). Postexilic Judaism and the New Testament also presupposed this general place of the dead, but made it provisional because of the belief in a coming resurrection (Dan. 12.2; Acts 2.27; Rom. 10.7; Rev. 20.13).

When ethical viewpoints are involved, however, Sheol is said to be a place of punishment. Korah and his companions were swallowed up by "the earth" (a term that can also mean "the underworld"), while their supporters were burned in fire (Num. 16.31–35). Psalmists and prophets threatened the godless with destruction in hell (Ps. 9.17; 31.17; 55.15; Isa. 5.14; 28.15, 18; 66.24), and wisdom teachers warned the youth to avoid hell (Prov. 7.27; 15.24); originally, this probably meant that untimely death was the deserved fate of the wicked, but many of these texts could also be interpreted to mean punishment after death. As indicated above, Judaism also developed the idea of different sections for righteous and sinful people in hell (1 Enoch 22.1–14), and especially ascribed the punishment of blasphemers to a cursed and flaming gorge (27.1–4), later called Gehenna. In the New Testament, the story of Lazarus illustrates the different places reserved for the righteous and sinners in the realm of death (Luke 16.26; see also Abraham's Bosom). Parenetic concerns of Jesus and his followers dominate other passages in which hell (called Hades, the abyss, Gehenna, and, in 2 Peter also tartaros) is represented as an instrument of divine punishment (Matt. 5.22, 29; 11.23 par.; 18.9 par.; Luke 8.31; Heb. 10.27; 2 Pet. 2.4; Jude 6; Rev. 9.1–2, 11; 17.8; 20.3). Matthew was especially concerned with this negative aspect of hell, but neither *John in his Gospel nor *Paul in his letters developed it.

Hell was even seen as a power that endeavors to attack life on earth. This found expression in psalms dealing with *salvation from mortal danger; for example: "The cords of Sheol entangled me" (2 Sam. 22.6 = Ps. 18.5), or "The pangs of Sheol laid hold on me" (Ps. 116.3). In postexilic Judaism, the topic was further developed by the community of *Qumran, which also let the "gates" of hell represent the aggressiveness of the underworld (1QH 3.16–19). According to Matthew 16.18, these gates of hell will not be able to subdue the church. It is Gehenna that inspires false teachers (Matt. 23.15) and inflames evil tongues (James 3.6), and powers of destruction ascend from hell to rage on earth (Rev. 9.3, 11; 11.7).

Ultimately, however, God is the one who controls hell. His own fire is able to destroy it (Deut. 32.22), and hell is never hidden from his eyes (Ps. 139.8; Job 11.8; 26.6). The almighty God of Israel is often praised for his ability to rescue a pious soul from death and hell (e.g., Ps. 16.10; 54.14).

Gradually, the conviction of God's omnipotence led to a belief in the resurrection of the dead. These expectations were prepared for by prophetic sayings like the following: God "will swallow up death" (Isa. 25.7; cf. 1 Cor. 15.54); "Your dead will live, their corpses shall rise" (26.19); "He [the Servant] shall prolong his days" (53.10); "I will open your graves" (Ezek. 37.12). Influenced to some extent by Persian religion, Judaism then developed various doctrines of a resurrection and judgment implying that hell will deliver the righteous and rearrest the sinful, for example: "Many . . . shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt" (Dan. 12.2); "the king of the universe will raise us up . . . because we have died for his laws" (2 Macc. 7.9); the souls will be kept in hell "until the great judgment" (1 Enoch 22.4).

In the New Testament, a new perspective is opened by the witness of the apostles that God had raised his Christ from death, confirmed by the information that some women had found the tomb empty (Matt. 28.6 par.) and that several disciples had "seen" the risen Lord (1 Cor. 15.3–8). These experiences were understood to indicate that hell and death had already been defeated by the lord of life, as Peter was reported to have proclaimed at *Pentecost (Acts 2.24, 27, 31). Some of the righteous were also reported to have risen together with him (Matt. 28.52). The provisional and the definitive victory of Christ over death and related powers was a central point for Paul (Rom. 6.9; 8.38–39; 1 Cor. 15.4), and he exclaimed with great joy: "O death, where is your victory?" (1 Cor. 15.55 [see Hos. 13.14]). Although he avoided expressions for hell, Paul certainly reserved some place for the dead until their resurrection, describing this as a peaceful sleep (1 Thess. 4.13) or a punishment in fire (1 Cor. 3.5). Christ's final victory over hell is described in more detail by the prophet John (e.g., Rev. 1.18; 9.1; 20.1). Although the destructive powers of hell increase their attacks on humankind before the approaching end (9.2–11; 13.1–8; 20.7–9), the final conflict will lead to the complete disappearance of death and hell (20.14).

Hermeneutics. Hermeneutics may be defined as the theory of interpretation. More precisely, biblical hermeneutics inquires into the conditions under which the interpretation of biblical texts may be judged possible, faithful, accurate, responsible, or productive in relation to some specified goal. Whereas exegesis involves the actual process of interpretation, biblical hermeneutics moves beyond interpretation. It entails a study of method, inviting reflection on the nature, methods, and goals of biblical interpretation. It also draws on general hermeneutic theory, that is, on traditions of scholarship—within philosophy, the social sciences, theories of literature, and semiotics—that shed light on questions about meaning and understanding. The subject embodies a proper concern to understand the biblical writings not only as particular historical documents of the past but also as texts that address the present with a living and transforming voice. This has often been described as the task of "application," though some prefer to speak of "recontextualization." Finally, theological questions about the status and nature of the Bible also shape hermeneutics. Whether or in what sense the Bible is seen as the authoritative word of God shapes the ways in which issues are explored. (See Authority of the Bible.)

Up to the end of the eighteenth century, three sets of issues assumed particular importance in the history of biblical hermeneutics. First, the Hebrew Bible could be seen either as part of the Christian scriptures or as Jewish scripture only. For Jesus and the earliest Christian communities, the Hebrew Bible was their only scripture, providing among other things the frame of reference within which the gospel was to be understood (1 Cor. 15.3, 4; cf. Luke 24.27). These Christians saw it as applying to their situation (1 Cor. 10.11) and interpreted it in the light of the ministry of Jesus Christ (Acts 8.32–35). In the second century CE, Marcion challenged the status of the Old Testament as part of Christian scripture. But Irenaeus and other church fathers reaffirmed the unity of the two testaments as the message of the one God, who had revealed himself preeminently in Christ (see Interpretation, History of, article on Early Christian Interpretation).

The second issue concerns allegorical interpretation. Allegory presents a meaning other (Grk. allos) than that which might be immediately apparent in the text. For example, John Bunyan's The Pilgrim's Progress, which portrays a spiritual journey through language, at first sight seems to describe physical travel from place to place. In such cases, allegorical interpretation constitutes the appropriate hermeneutic method. But this method was also used extensively in the ancient and medieval world as a device with which to seek out other meanings from biblical and classical texts. It was used in classical Greece to draw "higher" meanings from Homer's narratives about petty squabbles among the Greek deities. The Alexandrian church fathers, especially Clement and Origen, were among those who inherited and used this interpretative device. Clement of Rome allegorized the scarlet thread in Rahab's window (Josh. 2.18) into a symbol of the blood of Christ (1 Clement 12.7). More subtly, many narrative *parables were interpreted as if they had been spoken as allegories in which each element of narrative description carried some independent or self-contained spiritual meaning. The Antiochene fathers, and subsequently also Luther, used the method, though more cautiously. Calvin dismissed the approach on the ground that it allows the interpreter to shape scripture in accordance with human judgments. In this respect allegory is less constrained than *typology: whereas allegory rests on parallels between ideas, typology depends on correspondences or parallels between events.

A third persistent issue in hermeneutics concerns the role of interpretative tradition. Does the way in which the Bible is read and understood depend decisively on the tradition of expectations and assumptions in which the interpreter stands? On one side, the church fathers insisted, against the *gnostics, that the Bible can be understood rightly only when it is seen as the scriptures of the catholic or universal church. On the other side, the reformers, while respecting early tradition, insisted that the Bible could stand on its own feet (see Interpretation, History of, article on Christian Interpretation from the Middle Ages to the Reformation). Its message was not to be equated with how it might already be understood within some given ecclesiastical tradition. In the modern era, it is widely recognized that interpreters must take seriously both the right of the text to speak from within its own historical particularity and the role of traditions in shaping the horizons of interpreters and their questions.

In the modern era, several movements have profoundly influenced biblical hermeneutics. Following the rise of Romanticism in the eighteenth century, Friedrich Schleiermacher and Wilhelm Dilthey argued that to understand a text we must seek out the circumstances or creative vision that caused the author to produce it. This involves sympathetic imagination, or the capacity to place oneself in the author's shoes. The Romantic theorists rightly saw that in the process of interpretation there is a progressive interaction between understanding elements of a written text and provisionally grasping the sense of the whole. In biblical study this means interaction between an analytical study of words or phrases and an attempt to grasp the message of a book or an author as a whole.

In the mid-twentieth century, a number of writers explored existentialist models of hermeneutics. Most notably, Rudolf Bultmann insisted that a narrative or descriptive mode of writing in the Bible can mislead us into failing to notice where such material serves primarily not to describe but to evoke some practical response from the reader. Thus "myth" (a descriptive or narrative mode) needs to be "demythologized," in other words, interpreted as preaching or kerygma. The strength of this approach is that it takes seriously the practical function of the Bible for its writers and earliest audiences. Its weaknesses are that it makes claims about the definition and use of "myth" that are open to question, and that it underplays the importance of historical report and factual truth claims in the New Testament.

Bultmann's pupil, Ernst Fuchs, together with Gerhard Ebeling, pioneered a movement that came to be known in the 1960s as the "new hermeneutic." It had close affinities with the philosophical hermeneutics of the later Martin Heidegger and Hans-Georg Gadamer. They argued that language does not merely communicate ideas; it creates a "world." Biblical language draws the interpreter into a world within which a new reality comes to life. This creative experience is described as a "language-event."

From the late 1960s to the late 1980s, various other hermeneutic models were explored. Liberation theology has taken up the sociocritical models of the social sciences by raising questions about the use of texts for the social control of communities. Paul Ricoeur and others have seen the earliest origins of a "hermeneutic of suspicion" in *Marx, Nietzsche, and *Freud. On the other hand, Ricoeur and, from a different angle, liberation theologians also seek to bring the situation of the present to bear on the text in order to produce positive meaning. Thus, feminist hermeneutics expresses suspicion of masculine interest and have attempted to derive feminist significance from new readings (see Feminism and the Bible). One critical question for such movements is whether the desire for change represents any less an "interest" than does desire to perpetuate the status quo.

Reader-response criticism in literary studies represents another model in process of exploration. The capacity of biblical texts to shape, revise, or confirm readers' expectations is seen as one further aspect of hermeneutic inquiry. Each of the models explored in the modern era underlines, in different ways, the many levels at which understanding, transformation, and action may take place in the encounter between the reader and the text.

Hermon, Mount (Map 1:Y1). The mountain that formed Israel's northern boundary (Deut. 4.48; Josh. 12.1). With an elevation of over 2,800 m (9,200 ft), it dominates the landscape of northern *Galilee and is snow-covered virtually yearround. In antiquity it was apparently the home of lions and leopards (Song of Sol. 4.8). Its name means "set apart" (see Ban) and indicates its sacred character, suitable for a peak from whose base flow the sources of the *Jordan River. Hermon was associated with the Canaanite god *Baal (Judg. 3.3; 1 Chron. 5.23); just below it there is a later shrine to the Greek deity Pan (modern Banias), identified with Caesarea Philippi (Mark 8.27–33 par.). Some have proposed Mount Hermon as the setting for the transfiguration of Jesus (Mark 9.2–8 par.), although Tabor is the traditional location. MICHAEL D. COOGAN Herodian Dynasty. Several members of the family of Herod governed Jewish Palestine during the period of Roman domination.

Sources. The primary source for the Herods is *Josephus; for the later Herods, especially Herod Antipas, Agrippa I, and Agrippa II, the New Testament makes a small contribution to our knowledge. Josephus's two main works, The Jewish War and The Jewish Antiquities, overlap in their coverage of the Herods. Regarding Antipater and Herod the Great, Josephus depended primarily on Nicolaus of Damascus, who was Herod's court historiographer. For the period from Herod's death (4 BCE) to the First Jewish Revolt (66–70 CE), Josephus relied for the most part on oral tradition and hence has far fewer historical particulars. There has been debate about Josephus's historical credibility, but most would grant him to be reliable, taking note, however, of his biases. Archaeological discoveries in *Jerusalem, at *Qumran, and elsewhere have supported many details of his works.

Origin of the Herodian Dynasty. After the Maccabean Revolt (167–164 BCE), in 142 BCE the Jews became politically independent under the rule of the Hasmonean family. It was the Hasmonean Alexander Janneus (103–76 BCE) who appointed the Herodian Antipater, Herod the Great's grandfather, as governor of Idumea. After Alexander's death in the struggle for power among his family members, Hyrcanus II, his eldest son, after ruling only three months as king and high priest, was forced out by his younger brother, Aristobulus II (67 BCE). In 63 BCE Antipater II, son of Antipater and father of Herod the Great, was instrumental in having Hyrcanus II reinstated and in deposing his younger brother. With Rome's intervention in Palestine (63 BCE), both brothers appealed for Roman support, and Pompey sided with Hyrcanus II, reinstating him as high priest. Later Julius Caesar, who had defeated Pompey (48 BCE), reconfirmed Hyrcanus II as high priest and granted Antipater II Roman citizenship with tax exemption, making him procurator of Judea. Antipater II appointed his sons Phasael as governor of *Jerusalem and Herod as governor of *Galilee (47 BCE).

Herod the Great (47–4 BCE). Governor of Galilee (47–37 BCE). Although Herod was only twenty-five years old when he became governor of Galilee, he displayed efficient leadership. After the murder of Caesar in 44 BCE, Cassius, the Roman leader of Syria, appointed him as governor of Coele-Syria. After Antony defeated Cassius (42 BCE), he appointed both Herod and Phasael as *tetrarchs of Judea.

In 40 BCE troubles arose for the two new tetrarchs. When the Parthians arrived in Syria, they joined with Antigonus (the son of Hyrcanus II's deposed brother Aristobulus II) to depose Hyrcanus II. The Parthians besieged Jerusalem and sued for peace. Herod was suspicious of the offer, but Hyrcanus II and Phasael went to meet the Parthian king, who put them in chains. On hearing of this treachery, Herod, his family, and his troops moved to Masada and then to Petra. Antigonus mutilated his uncle Hyrcanus II's ears to prevent his being reinstated as high priest and sent him to Parthia. Phasael died of either poisoning or suicide.

Herod departed for Rome, where Antony, Octavius, and the senate declared him king of Judea. On returning to Palestine, Herod was able to regain Galilee and eventually to lay siege to Jerusalem in the spring of 37 BCE. Meanwhile, before the fall of Jerusalem he married Mariamne, niece of Antigonus, to whom he had been betrothed for five years. He did this not only to spite Antigonus but also to strengthen his claim to the throne, since she was a Hasmonean. In the summer of 37, Herod defeated Antigonus and became de facto the king of the Jews.

King of the Jews (37–4 BCE). Herod's reign can be divided into three periods: consolidation (37–25 BCE), prosperity (25–14 BCE), and domestic troubles (14–4 BCE).

To consolidate his rule, Herod had to contend with four adversaries: the Pharisees, the aristocracy, the Hasmonean family, and Cleopatra of Egypt. The *Pharisees, who disliked Herod because he was an Idumean, a half-Jew, and a friend of the Romans, had great influence over the majority of the people. Herod punished both the Pharisees and their followers who opposed him and rewarded those who were loyal to him. The Sadducean aristocracy, most of whom were members of the *Sanhedrin, were pro-Antigonus. Herod executed forty-five of them and confiscated their property in order to pay the demands that Antony placed on him. The Hasmonean family was upset because Herod had replaced the mutilated high priest Hyrcanus II with Ananel of the Aaronic line. Herod's mother-in-law Alexandra successfully connived to have Ananel replaced with her seventeen-year old son Aristobulus (late 36 or early 35 BCE). Later Herod managed to have him drowned "accidentally," and soon after he put Alexandra in chains. His last adversary was Cleopatra, who wanted to eliminate Herod and Malchus of Arabia and confiscate their lands. When civil war broke out between Octavius and Antony (32 BCE), Herod was prevented from helping Antony because Cleopatra wanted Herod to make war against Malchus, hoping to weaken both and acquire their territories.

After the defeat of Antony at the battle of Actium (31 BCE) Herod proceeded to cultivate Octavius's friendship. Convinced of his loyalty, Octavius returned Jericho to him and also gave him Gadara, Hippos, *Samaria, Gaza, Anthedon, Joppa, and Strato's Tower (later Caesarea).

The last years of consolidation saw much tension in Herod's domestic affairs. Owing to a bizarre series of events, Herod executed his wife Mariamne (29 BCE), his mother-in-law Alexandra (28 BCE) after she attempted to overthrow him, and his brother-in-law Costobarus (25 BCE). Hence, all male relatives of Hyrcanus II were now removed, leaving no rival for Herod's throne.

The period from 25 to 14 BCE was marked largely by success, although there were still occasions of stress. Herod constructed theaters, amphitheaters, and hippodromes and introduced quinquennial games in honor of Caesar, thus violating Jewish law. On the site of Strato's Tower a large urban port was built and named Caesarea. In 24 BCE he built a royal palace in Jerusalem. His crowning achievement in construction was his plan to rebuild the Jewish *Temple; work on this began ca. 20 BCE and was completed in 63 CE. Herod's territory was also greatly expanded in this period with the addition of Trachonitis, Batanea, Auranitis, the area between Trachonitis and Galilee containing Ulatha and Paneas, the area north and northeast of the *Sea of Galilee, and Perea (Map 12:Y5). To gain the good will of the people, in 20 BCE he lowered taxes by a third and in 14 BCE by a fourth.

As Herod grew older a considerable amount of intrigue engulfed his life, much of which arose from his ten wives, each of whom wanted her son(s) to become his successor. This is evident in his changing his will six times. His first wife was Doris, by whom he had Antipater; he repudiated them when he married his second wife, Mariamne (37 BCE), by whom he had five children, of whom only Alexander and Aristobulus were notable. In 24/23 BCE he married his third wife, Mariamne II, by whom he had Herod (Philip). His fourth wife was a *Samaritan, Malthace (23/22 BCE), by whom he had Archelaus and Antipas. In 22 he took as his fifth wife Cleopatra of Jerusalem, who became the mother of Philip the tetrarch. Of the other five wives, none were significant and the names of only three are known.

The main rivalry was between Mariamne's two sons Alexander and Aristobulus and Doris's son Antipater. In 22 BCE Herod made his first will naming Alexander and Aristobulus as his successors. Because of the alleged plots of these two sons, Herod made a second will in 13 BCE, naming Antipater as sole heir. Later there was reconciliation between Herod and Alexander and Aristobulus, and in 12 BCE he made out his third will naming Antipater as the first successor and next after him Alexander and Aristobulus. Because Alexander and Aristobulus became hostile in their attitude toward Herod, he finally ordered them to be executed by strangulation in 7 BCE. Immediately after their execution Herod drew up his fourth will, naming Antipater as sole heir, and, in the event of his death, Herod (Philip) as his successor. With the discovery of Antipater's plan to kill Herod, he was tried and imprisoned. A fifth will was made in which Herod passed over the next two oldest sons, Archelaus and Philip, because Antipater had influenced him against them, and he selected Antipas as sole heir. Five days before Herod's death, he executed Antipater and made his sixth will, in which he designated Archelaus as king, his brother Antipas as tetrarch of Galilee and Perea, and their half-brother Philip as tetrarch of Gaulanitis, Trachonitis, Batanea, and Paneas. It is during this last period of Herod's life, complicated by illness and plots to obtain his throne, that the narrative of the *Magi is set (Matt. 2.1–16).

In conclusion, although Herod was a successful king who was highly regarded by the Romans, his personal life was plagued by domestic troubles. After the death of Herod the Great in the spring of 4 BCE, Antipas and Archelaus contested his last two wills before the emperor in Rome. Antipas favored the fifth will because in it he was sole heir; Archelaus, of course, preferred the sixth. After some delay the emperor made Archelaus ruler over Idumea, Judea, and Samaria with the title of ethnarch, promising that he could become king if he showed good leadership. He appointed Antipas tetrarch over Galilee and Perea and Philip tetrarch over Gaulanitis, Auranitis, Trachonitis, Batanea, Paneas, and Iturea.

Archelaus (4 BCE–6 CE). Archelaus, the son of Herod and Malthace, was made ethnarch over Idumea, Judea, and Samaria in 4 BCE. Before he left for Rome to contest his father's will he was given control of the realm and proceeded to kill about three thousand people; after this there was a prolonged revolt at the feast of Pentecost. On his return he treated both Jews and Samaritans with brutality and tyranny; this is the background of Matthew 2.20–23. Archelaus continued the building policy of his father, but his rule became intolerable. Finally, in 6 CE, the emperor deposed him and exiled him to Gaul. His domain became an imperial province governed by prefects appointed by the emperor.

Antipas (4 BCE–39 CE). Antipas, the son of Herod and Malthace and a full brother of Archelaus, was appointed tetrarch over Galilee and Perea in 4 BCE. After Archelaus had been deposed, Antipas was given the dynastic title Herod, which had great political significance at home and in Rome. He rebuilt what had been destroyed in the widespread revolt after his father's death, including the largest city, Sepphoris, and moved his capital to a new city, Tiberias (named in honor of the emperor Tiberius).

Herod Antipas's greatest notoriety is the imprisonment and beheading of *John the Baptist (Matt. 14.1–12 par.). This incident occurred after he had married Herodias, who was his niece and the wife of his brother Herod (Philip). John the Baptist boldly criticized the marriage, for according to the Mosaic law it was unlawful to marry a brother's wife (Lev. 18.16; 20.21), except for *levirate marriage (Deut. 25.5). As a result, John was imprisoned, and eventually, at the instigation of Herodias with *Salome's help, Herod beheaded John at Machaerus in 31 or 32 CE.

According to the Gospels, Antipas thought that Jesus was John the Baptist resurrected (Matt. 14.1–2; Mark 6.14–16; Luke 9.7–9) and desired to see him, but Jesus withdrew from his territories. Later, during Jesus' final journey to Jerusalem, the Pharisees warned him to leave Galilee because Herod wanted to kill him (Luke 13.31). According to Luke, during Jesus' trial *Pilate sent Jesus to Herod when he heard that Jesus was from Galilee (Luke 23:6–12).

In 36 CE the *Nabatean king Aretas IV defeated Antipas in retaliation for Antipas's deserting his daughter to marry Herodias. Although Antipas had hoped to get help from Rome, it was not forthcoming because of the change of emperors. On his accession, Caligula (37 CE) gave his friend Agrippa I, brother of Herodias as well as nephew of Antipas, the territories of Philip the tetrarch, who had died in 34 CE, and granted Lysanius the coveted title of king. His sister Herodias became intensely jealous and urged her husband to seek the title of king for his long, faithful service. When Antipas and Herodias went to Rome in 39 CE to request the title, Agrippa brought charges against Antipas, and consequently Caligula banished him to Gaul. Agrippa I obtained his territories.

Philip the Tetrarch (4 BCE–34 CE). Philip was the son of Herod the Great and Cleopatra of Jerusalem. In the settlement of Herod's will, he was appointed tetrarch over northern Transjordan, including Gaulinitis, Auranitis, Trachonitis, Bananea, Paneas, and Iturea (Map 13:Y2–3). He rebuilt two cities: Paneas, which he renamed Caesarea Philippi, the site of Peter's confession of Christ (Matt. 16.16), and Bethsaida, where Jesus healed a blind man (Mark 8.22–26). Philip married Herodias's daughter Salome, but they had no offspring. When he died in 34 CE, Tiberias annexed his territories to Syria and, when Caligula became emperor (37 CE), they were given to Agrippa I, Herodias's brother.

Agrippa I (37–44 CE). Agrippa I, the son of Aristobulus (son of Herod the Great and Mariamne) and Bernice (daughter of Herod's sister, Salome, and Costobarus) and the brother of Herodias, was born in 10 BCE. He lived extravagantly and with creditors pursuing him. Sometime ca. 27–30 CE Antipas provided him with a home and a position as inspector of markets in Antipas's new capital, Tiberias. Not long afterward he went to Rome and befriended Gaius Caligula. Owing to an unwise remark favoring Caligula as emperor, Tiberius put him in prison, where he remained until Tiberius's death six months later. In 37 CE when Caligula became emperor, he released Agrippa I and gave him a gold chain equal in weight to his prison chain. He also gave him the territories of Philip the tetrarch and of Lysanius, with the coveted title king. On Caligula's death in 41 CE, Claudius confirmed the rule of Agrippa I and added Judea and Samaria to his kingdom.

Of all the Herods, Agrippa I was the most liked by the Jews and, according to Acts 2, was a persecutor of early Christians. In 44 CE he died suddenly in Caesarea (Acts 12.22–23; Josephus Ant. 19.8.343–52). Because Agrippa's son was only seventeen years old, his territories were reduced to a Roman province. His daughter Drusilla eventually married the Roman procurator Felix (Acts 24.24).

Agrippa II (50–100 CE). Agrippa II, son of Agrippa I and Cypros, daughter of Phasael (Herod the Great's nephew), was born in 27 CE. Because of his young age he was not allowed to rule immediately, but in 50 CE Claudius appointed him king of Chalcis. In 53 Claudius gave him Abilene, Trachonitis, and Arca in exchange for Chalcis. Shortly after the accession of Nero in 54 CE, he acquired the Galilean cities of Tiberias and Tarichea, with their surrounding areas, and the Perean cities of Julias (or Betharamphtha) and Abila, with their surrounding land.

The private life of Agrippa II was not exemplary, for he had an incestuous relationship with his sister Bernice. In his public life he was in charge of the vestments of the high priest and could appoint him. The Romans would seek his counsel on religious issues, and this may be why Festus asked him to hear Paul at Caesarea (Acts 25.13–26.32).

Agrippa II failed to quell the Jewish revolt against Rome in 66 CE and sided with the Romans throughout the war of 66–70. He died childless ca. 100 CE; with his death, the Herodian dynasty ended.

Conclusion. Herodian rule brought stability to the region. With its domination of the eastern parts of the Mediterranean Sea, it was important for Rome to have a peaceful Palestine, because it acted as a buffer state between Rome and the Parthians and was crucial for the trade routes north and south of Palestine. To be a ruler of the Jews was difficult primarily because of their religion. Although the Herods were enamored of Hellenism and adopted some of its elements, they were aware of Jewish religious sensitivities. After the deposition of Archelaus, direct Roman rule of Judea by prefects like Pilate brought instability, much of it due to lack of understanding of Judaism.

Although each of the Herods (except possibly Archelaus) contributed to this stability, it was the pioneering rule of Herod the Great that laid its foundation. As a vassal king, he made it possible for Judea to be somewhat independent. Rome allowed this because he brought stability to the area and because he had proved his loyalty to Rome both militarily and financially.

Hezekiah ("Yah[weh] strengthens"). King of Judah ("the finest": 2 Kings 18.5) 715–698 (or 727–686) BCE. Like his later successor *Josiah, while young he worked closely with the priesthood (2 Chron. 29.2–4) and sought unification with the northern kingdom of Israel (left kingless), inviting the northern tribes to an ecumenical *Passover (2 Chron. 30.1, perhaps a midrashic embroidering of his reforms summarized in 2 Kings 18.4). At first he paid tribute to *Assyria, remaining submissive until 705; but apparently as part of his revolt (2 Kings 18.7; 20.12) he set about fortifying *Jerusalem (2 Chron. 32.5). The year of *Sennacherib's punitive invasion (see Lachish), Hezekiah's fourteenth year in 2 Kings 18.14, was 701, whence the beginning of his reign in 715, a date incompatible with 2 Kings 18.10, in which his sixth year was that of the fall of Samaria in 722 (whence the inauguration date of 727). Assyria's general (Isa. 36.4) appealed to Jerusalem's populace in their own language over the king's head; but trouble in the army (perhaps a plague: see 2 Kings 19.35) forced Sennacherib's sudden withdrawal. A second Assyrian campaign has been proposed on the basis of 2 Kings 18.17–19.36 (duplicating 18.13–16), to collect the immense sum Sennacherib claimed from Judah (2 Kings 18.14); but *Isaiah may have induced Hezekiah just to send off the money and end his years in peace (2 Kings 20.19).

High Place (Hebr. bāmâ). A hill or elevated platform used for sacrifice; a local place of worship; or, in pejorative usage, any sanctuary other than the *Temple in *Jerusalem. The term seems originally to have referred to a natural height where sacrifices were offered. The site was often a hill outside an adjacent city. It was necessary, for example, to "go up" to reach the high place that lay outside *Samuel's hometown (1 Sam. 9.12–14, 19) and to "come down" to return to the city (1 Sam. 9.25). References to the building (1 Kings 11.7; Jer. 19.5) and destruction (2 Kings 23.8; Ezek. 6.3) of high places show that artificially raised platforms were also used. Thus, it is not surprising to find mention of high places within cities (1 Kings 13.32; 2 Kings 17.29) or even in ravines and valleys (Ezek. 6.3).

The form and structure of the high place have been illustrated archaeologically by the discovery at several sites of large, raised platforms of various sizes, often accessed by steps. Some of these are from the pre-Israelite period, including an Early Bronze Age example from *Megiddo (mid-third millennium BCE) and Middle Bronze Age examples from *Gezer and Nahariyeh, near Haifa. Other excavated high places date to the Israelite period, including examples at *Dan, *Hazor, *Megiddo, Arad (Map 1:X6), and Malha, southeast of Jerusalem.

The editors of the *Deuteronomic history (Deuteronomy—2 Kings) regarded the high places as illicit. This negative judgment stemmed from the association of high places with proscribed cultic activities and the worship of foreign gods (1 Kings 11.7) and from the Deuteronomic belief that Jerusalem was the only legitimate place of sacrifice to Yahweh. According to Deuteronomy 12.1–14, Moses instructed the people that, after they had entered the *Promised Land, they must destroy all the places where the local gods were worshiped. Instead of rebuilding these places for the worship of Yahweh, they were to seek the single place that Yahweh would choose and bring their sacrifices there. The subsequent story shows that this chosen place was Jerusalem, as *Solomon asserts in his speech in dedication of the Temple (1 Kings 8.15–53). From this point of view, sacrifice at high places was acceptable in pre-Temple times. Thus Samuel is not condemned by the Deuteronomic editors for his association with a high place (1 Sam. 9.12–25), and even Solomon is excused for his sacrifices at the Gibeonite high place (1 Kings 3.3–4). After the Temple is built, however, sacrifice at local places of worship is no longer condoned. The law of the central sanctuary, in fact, becomes the chief criterion by which subsequent kings of Judah are evaluated by the Deuteronomic editors. All of the kings of Judah before *Hezekiah are said to have permitted high places to remain in use, so that Rehoboam and his successors are condemned for tolerating shrines "on every high hill and under every green tree" (1 Kings 14.23; cf. Deut. 12.2). The northern rulers are censured for the same crime, which is a part of the final condemnation of the northern kingdom in 2 Kings 17.9–10. Hezekiah and *Josiah are said to have introduced reforms in Judah that included, among other things, the removal of the high places (2 Kings 18.4; 23.8, 13, 15, 19).

P. KYLE MCCARTER, JR.

Hittites. Among the people Israel found in *Canaan were the "sons of Heth," members of a Canaanite family (Gen. 10.15). *Esau had married two of their women (Gen. 26.34), and later Ezekiel decried Israel's religious faithlessness by calling her a descendant from a Canaanite and a Hittite (Ezek. 16.3). Ephron the Hittite sold his field and cave near *Hebron to *Abraham (Gen. 23). The names given for these Hittites are all Semitic, and it is likely that all were members of a local Canaanite tribe.

The Hittites of Anatolia (modern Turkey) were another people, forgotten until excavations at Boghazköy were begun in 1906. This was the site of their capital, Hattusha, containing a palace and temples. Clay tablets inscribed with Babylonian cuneiform *writing preserve their language, the oldest recorded member of the Indo-European family. Inscriptions show that the Hittites set up their kingdom about 1750 BCE, and that from about 1380 to 1200 BCE they rivaled the Egyptians and the Babylonians in international affairs. Their armies marched into Syria, where they faced Egyptian forces. After decades of war, the battle of Qadesh (ca. 1259 BCE) led to a treaty that established a line across northern Lebanon, the frontier between their zones of influence. This line provided the limit for Israel's territory (Josh. 1.4; 2 Sam. 24.6 [emended]).

Hittite archives include many rituals for temple services with precise instructions for kings and priests, displaying concern for ritual *purity and complexity of detail similar to the ritual laws of the *Pentateuch. Treaties made by Hittite kings with vassal kings present a formula also found in biblical *covenants, especially those made before the monarchy. Beside records in cuneiform, Hittite scribes used their own hieroglyphic script for royal monuments and perhaps on wooden tablets that have perished.

After the Hittite empire had collapsed under attacks from migrant tribes (possibly including *Philistines among the Sea Peoples), several princes held on to certain cities and created local kingdoms (e.g., Carchemish, Hamath), identified today by carved monuments with Hittite hieroglyphic inscriptions. These "neo-Hittite" states were finally overwhelmed by *Assyria in the ninth and eighth centuries BCE. Before that time they supplied wives for *Solomon (1 Kings 11.1), perhaps soldiers for *David (Uriah the Hittite, 2 Sam. 11; see Bathsheba), and presented a threat to Israel's Aramean enemies (2 Kings 7.6).

ALAN MILLARD

Holiness. When the *seraphim before God's throne cry "Holy, holy, holy" (Isa. 6.3; cf. Rev. 4.8), they are engaging in an ascriptive tautology. God is holy and by that fact defines holiness. "Hallowed be thy name" is a prayer that the intrinsic holiness of God be established and recognized within creation, that is, that God's kingdom come and God's will be done (Matt. 6.9–10 par.; see Lord's Prayer).

In The Idea of the Holy, Rudolph Otto argues that the experience of the holy is irreducible to other categories. What he calls "the numinous" is a mysterium tremendum et fascinans, an awe-inspiring phenomenon that both repels and attracts. The voice from the burning bush tells *Moses to take off his shoes, for he is standing on holy ground, and Moses hides his face (Exod. 3.5–6; cf. Josh. 5.15). In the Bible, the elementary religious experience takes on a personal and ethical tone. The "wholly other," the incomparable "Holy One" (Isa. 40.25), is also the transcendent creator (Ps. 95.6). God's holy name is vindicated by his acts in history (Ps. 98.1; Ezek. 36.22–27; John 12.28; Rev. 15.3–4). If God inspires fear, it is on account of his power and *purity; if God attracts, it is by his creating love and redeeming *grace. More precisely, God's power shows itself as love for the creature; God's purity shows itself as grace to transform the sinner. In his vision of "the King," Isaiah finds his lips touched with a burning coal and his guilt is taken away (Isa. 6.5–7). The prophet is then set in God's service.

God's active claim upon a creature consecrates it. That is preeminently true of God's elect people. Yahweh is, especially in the book of Isaiah, "the Holy One of Israel." He is "God and no mortal, the Holy One in [their] midst" (Hos. 11.9). Out of love, he has chosen this people for his own (Deut. 7.6–8). Belonging to the God who dwells among them, they are a holy nation (Exod. 19.5–6; Deut. 26.19; 28.9; Jer. 2.3). The divine gift brings an obligation: "You shall be holy for I am holy" (Lev. 11.44; 19.2; 20.7, 26).

According to the New Testament, Jesus is "the Holy One of God" (John 6.69; cf. Mark 1.24 par.; Luke 1.35; Acts 3.14), and through him God's favor has been extended to believing *gentiles (1 Pet. 2.9; cf. Rom. 15.16). The church's vocation is to holiness (Eph. 1.3–4; 5.25–27; 1 Thess. 3.13). This again entails a way of life that distinguishes its members from the world (2 Cor. 6.16–7.1; 1 Thess. 4.3–7).

The way of holiness follows God by imitation (Eph. 4.24) and even participation (Heb. 12.10). Believers are "called [to be] saints" (Rom. 1.7; 1 Cor. 1.2; Col. 3.12). Having been sanctified in *baptism (1 Cor. 6.11), Christians are to yield themselves to the righteousness of God for their sanctification to continue (Rom. 6.19–22). Their sanctification is the work within them of the Holy Spirit who has been given to them (Rom. 5.5; 1 Thess. 4.8). The promise is that of being made "partakers of the divine nature" (2 Pet. 1.3–11).

From the Exodus on, the *ark of the covenant was a sign—and a dangerous one (1 Sam. 6.19; 2 Sam. 6.6–10)—of Yahweh's presence with Israel. In the Jerusalem Temple, it belonged in the "holy of holies" (1 Kings 8.6). Divinely significant objects, places, times, and people were "holy," and the adjective became practically formulaic in the priestly documents of the postexilic period: God's holy house or Temple stood on God's holy mountain; it was served by a holy priesthood, and the feasts were holy days. A matching ethic was a prophetic concern (e.g., Mal. 3.4–5). In the New Testament, cultic terminology is turned toward conduct: "Present your bodies as a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable to God" (Rom. 12.1; cf. 1 Cor. 6.19–20; Eph. 2.21–22). Holocaust. The English word holocaust is derived from Latin holocaustum and Greek holocaustos/holokautos (holos, "whole," and kaustos/kautos, "burnt"). Forms of the latter appear more than two hundred times in the *Septuagint, generally to translate Hebrew ʿōlâ (literally, that which goes up), the burnt offering, one of the most common, multipurpose, and ancient forms of Israelite *sacrifice (Lev. 1; Num. 15; etc.). The slaughtered sacrificial *animals, birds, or unblemished male quadrupeds such as sheep, goats, or cattle were wholly burned on the *altar, with the exception of the skin, which was given to the *priest who performed the ritual (Lev. 7.8). The holocaust offering is mentioned three times in the New Testament (Mark 12.33; Heb. 10.6, 8). Although the sacrificial system ceased with the destruction of the *Temple in 70 CE, rabbinic literature includes traditions about and discussions of the burnt offering, the earliest of which is in the *Mishnah, especially tractates Zebaḥim and Tamid.

The meaning of "holocaust" has evolved from complete burnt consumption in sacrifice to include complete or massive destruction, especially of people. It was used in this context in the aftermaths of World War I and II. Since the 1950s, "The Holocaust" has come to refer to the Nazi murder of European Jewry (1941–45). By extension, "holocaust" is sometimes used to designate massive atrocities against or destruction of large numbers of people. The biblical religious-sacrificial origins and connotations of the term are troubling to some who prefer the word used most often in modern Hebrew to refer to the Nazi murder of European Jewry, Sho'ah, whose biblical meanings include devastation, desolation, and ruin. BARBARA GELLER NATHANSON

Holy Spirit. There is no distinct term for spirit in the languages of the Bible; the concept was expressed by a metaphorical use of words that mean, literally, wind and breath (Hebr. rûaḥ; Grk. pneuma); the English word "spirit" is simply an Anglicized form of the Latin word for breath (spiritus). Wind is an invisible, unpredictable, uncontrollable force, which bears down on everything in its path; and people found early that they are exposed to influences that affect them like the wind. Breath is a miniature wind, and from this the metaphorical use of the term acquired a more precise and positive direction, for breath is essential to life (Gen. 6.17).

The Spirit of God in the Hebrew Bible. The action of the spirit is seen in a broad range of experiences, some of which seem less than "spiritual" as we now understand the word. Thus the source of (physical) strength that enabled Samson to kill a lion is ascribed to the spirit of God (Judg. 14.6). And there are several places where it is not clear whether rûaḥ bears the literal sense of wind or the metaphorical sense of spirit (e.g., Gen. 1.2 [cf. 8.1]; Ezek. 1.12). The action of spirit is more often seen in inner experiences, but some of these too are ambiguous (e.g., the evil spirit from the Lord that seized Saul, 1 Sam. 16.14; the lying spirit that the Lord put in the mouth of certain prophets, 1 Kings 22.22). Among the most distinctive experiences ascribed to the action of the spirit are the raptures that drove people to ecstatic speech and behavior (e.g., Saul after his anointing, 1 Sam. 10.6–11; the seventy elders, Num. 11.25); this was the original meaning of "prophecy."

None of the *prophets of Israel before the exile ascribe their vocation to the action of the spirit or, indeed, have much to say about the spirit at all. Some references of a critical or ironical nature seem to indicate that these prophets wished to dissociate their prophetic calling from the ecstatic raptures that earlier went under the name (Hos. 9.7; Mic. 2.11; cf. 1 Sam. 9.9). It is only in the later prophets that the spirit comes into prominence, notably in *Ezekiel. Ezekiel mostly used the term rûaḥ without the qualification "of God," and in many cases the literal and metaphorical senses of the term are hard to disentangle. A high point in the prophecy of Ezekiel is his vision of the valley of dry bones, over which he was commanded to invoke the life-giving breath, or wind, or spirit of God (Ezek. 37.1–14; the three words all render rûaḥ). The hope so dramatically envisaged here becomes a major theme in the latest phase of biblical prophecy. Recognizing that the renewal of God's people could come only from God, the prophets came to look for a general outpouring of his spirit (Isa. 32.15). In no case is the fulfillment of this hope ascribed to the mediation of an expected messianic king; but in the portrayal of this figure in the prophecy of *Isaiah, he is to be the permanent bearer of the spirit (Isa. 11.2; 61.1)—perhaps in contrast to the charismatic leaders of Israel, such as Saul, from whom the spirit departed. The distinctive mark of the messianic era will be the bestowal of God's spirit on all, high and low, old and young, male and female (Joel 2.28).

The designation "holy spirit" occurs only in Psalm 51.11 and Isaiah 63.10–11.

The Holy Spirit in the New Testament. The New Testament announces the fulfillment of the eschatological hope of the spirit proclaimed by the prophets. Two elements are emphasized: the coming of the one who is the permanent bearer of the spirit and the outpouring of the spirit on "all flesh"; and both are linked.

*Jesus is identified as the promised one on whom the Spirit will remain (John 1.33). This identification took place at his *baptism by the visible descent of the Holy Spirit on him in the form of a dove. The story need not imply that the association of the Spirit with Jesus began at his baptism and that he was at that moment adopted as *Son of God; John especially saw in the baptism of Jesus the epiphany of the preexisting Son (John 1.29–34), the one in whom the prophetic hope was fulfilled. According to Luke (4.16–21), Jesus explicitly claimed this identity in his sermon at Nazareth; and it is indicated in the nativity stories, where the emphasis is on the conception by the Holy Spirit rather than on the virginity of Mary (Matt. 1.18; Luke 1.35; see Virgin Birth). Further references to the Holy Spirit are not frequent in the Gospels, but they occur at significant points, especially in *Luke (4.1, 14, 16–21; 11.20 [cf. Matt. 12.28]; 12.10). It is preeminently in the presence and operation of the Holy Spirit in him that Jesus is authenticated (Matt. 12.28; cf. 1 John 5.6–12); and thus to refuse the testimony of the Spirit is a sin that is infinitely graver than the sin of refusing the testimony of Jesus to himself (Matt. 12.31; John 5.31–36). The life of Jesus is presented as wholly directed by the Holy Spirit (John 3.34), and this note recurs in the apostolic preaching in *Acts (e.g., 10.38).

Jesus is not only the permanent bearer of the Holy Spirit; he is also the one who will dispense the gift of the Holy Spirit to others. But this action of Jesus (which is expressed in the future tense in the first three Gospels) does not coincide with his manifestation as the bearer of the Spirit; it is projected into a future beyond the earthly mission of Jesus. There is a stated interval between the epiphany of Jesus and the general distribution of the Holy Spirit. Luke concludes his account of the ministry of Jesus with his command to the disciples to wait for the promise of the Father (Luke 22.49), and in the sequel he measures the period of waiting as fifty days after Easter (Acts 2.1). John expressed the same point in a different way, even though he records the promise made at the baptism of Jesus in the present tense (John 1.33), and he disagrees with the Lucan chronology in placing the gift of the Spirit to the disciples on the evening of Easter (John 20.22); early in his gospel John states that the gift of the Spirit could not be bestowed before Jesus was "glorified," that is, before he had completed his mission (John 7.39), and later, in one of the Paraclete sayings (see below), he stressed that the departure of Jesus must take place first, no matter how that grieves the disciples (John 16.7).

The five sayings about the Paraclete, perhaps a separate collection before their inclusion in the gospel according to John (14.15–17; 14.25–26; 15.26; 16.4–11; 16.12–15), contain the only formal teaching about the Holy Spirit in the New Testament. The term "Paraclete" (NRSV: "Advocate") belongs to the language of the law courts, and means a defending counsel, or attorney, as opposed to the accuser, who is called diabolos ("devil," Rev. 12.10; see Satan). Paraclete is applied directly to Jesus himself in 1 John 2.1, and, indirectly, in John 14.16, where the word "another" implies a similarity between the Paraclete and Jesus himself; the Paraclete will be to the disciples what Jesus himself has been, and the coming of the Paraclete will be equivalent to a coming of Jesus himself (John 14.18, unless this is an allusion to the return of Jesus to the disciples after the Resurrection). But there are important differences, in addition to the sequential relation. The similarities and the differences may be listed summarily: the teaching of the Paraclete will be centered on Jesus and his teaching (John 14.26; 15.26; 16.14); the Paraclete will extend the range of Jesus' teaching to the world (John 16.8); the Paraclete will advance the disciples' understanding of "the truth," which is identical with Jesus (John 16.13; cf. 14.6); the presence of the Paraclete with the disciples will be permanent, in contrast to that of Jesus, which had to be withdrawn (John 14.16; 16.7); the presence of the Paraclete will be invisible and inward (John 14.17).

The relation between Christ and the Holy Spirit is also close in *Paul. The mission of Christ and the mission of the Holy Spirit are virtually indistinguishable; the presence of the Holy Spirit is equivalent to the presence of Christ. The Christ who is designated Son of God in power according to the Holy Spirit (Rom. 1.4) is no longer to be known according to the flesh (2 Cor. 5.16).

The distinction between Christ and the Holy Spirit, where it appears in Paul, is nowhere expressed in terms of a sequence but rather as one between two sides or aspects of the same act of God; the mission of Christ presents its objective, or exterior, aspect, the mission of the Spirit its subjective, or interior, aspect (1 Cor. 2; Gal. 4.4–6). Paul's main concern is with the reality of Christ for faith; for the reality of Christ is accessible only to faith, and it is made accessible through the Holy Spirit (Rom. 8.1–15). Thus to be "in Christ" (Rom. 8.1) is the same as to be "in the Spirit" (Rom. 8.9).

The notion of the "seven gifts" of the Holy Spirit, which was developed in Christian liturgical tradition, is based on Isaiah 11.2 (where the *Septuagint and the *Vulgate add "piety" after "knowledge"), but this number does not cover the endowments granted to different members of the church for the good of the whole; lists of these gifts, called "charismata," are found at various places in the New Testament (e.g., Rom. 12.6–8; 1 Cor. 12). Holy War. See War.

Homosexuality. Leviticus 20.13 prohibits sexual relations between men, defines them as an "abomination," and places them under the death penalty (see also Lev. 18.22). Ethical considerations such as consent, coercion, or the power imbalance inherent in adult-child relations are not legally relevant in these passages (nor in the surrounding levitical laws on adultery, incest, and bestiality). Thus, regardless of the sexual relationship of the participants (a man and his consenting male partner, an adult male whom he had raped, or a child victim), all are equally culpable, since all are equally defiled (see Philo, De spec. leg. 3.7.37–42).

Like Leviticus, *Paul does not employ the ethical categories of consent or age for distinguishing between sanctioned and condemned sexual relations. His letters contain linguistic and conceptual parallels to the levitical laws about same-sex sexual relations. Thus, 1 Corinthians 6.9–10 states that "the ones who lie with men" (NRSV: "sodomites"; cf. Lev. 20.13) will not "inherit the kingdom of God" (see also the Deutero-Pauline 1 Tim. 1.10; and see Ethical Lists). Paul describes male-male sexual relations as "impurity" and asserts that such men "deserve to die" (Rom. 1.24–32). Paul extends the prohibition to include sexual relations between women (Rom. 1.26) as do other postbiblical Jewish writings. Like other writers in the Roman world such as *Philo, Ptolemy, and Martial, Paul sees same-sex sexual relations as transgressions of hierarchical gender boundaries. For example, "unnatural" (Rom. 1.26) most likely refers to the women's attempt to transcend the passive, subordinate role accorded to them by nature. Similarly, the men have relinquished the superordinate, active role (see 1 Cor. 11.13) and have descended to the level of women.

Some postbiblical Jewish and early Christian writers specifically define the sin of *Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen. 18–19.28; cf. Judg. 19) as same-sex relations rather than as rape or inhospitality; see, for example, Jude 7 and Philo, De Abrahamo 26.134–36 (cf. 2 Pet. 2.6; Testament of Naphtali 3.4–5; 4.1).

Biblical prohibitions of same-sex love directly influenced later Roman law and, indeed, Western legal statutes until the present (e.g., sodomy statutes in U.S. criminal law).

Hope. An attitude toward the future, an assurance that God's promises will be kept, a confidence that what is bad will pass and that what is good will be preserved. Hope is a theme in many places in the Bible, even when specific words for hope are not used.

In the Hebrew Bible, a number of words are translated into English as hope. As in English, hope can be a verb or a noun—the act of hoping, the thing hoped for or the person or thing in whom one hopes. There is no single root word that carries the major responsibility for conveying this concept. Each word provides a slightly different nuance to the process of hoping, though we may not be able to identify each subtle distinction. The related words qāwâ (verb) and tiqwâ (noun) may be connected with meanings like "twist," "cord," or "rope," possibly referring to the tension of a time of hoping or the rope to which one clings when in need of hope. The root of the words yāḥal (verb) and tôḥelet (noun) may mean simply "to wait," being neutral about what will happen at the end of the waiting. Similarly, the verb śābar means "to watch," "wait," "expect" (e.g., Ps. 104.27); it becomes hope when one waits with a positive expectation about what will come.

Two words sometimes translated as hope show the relational quality of hope. The verb ḥāsâ can mean "to flee for protection," "to take refuge," "to put trust." The word bāṭaḥ is usually translated as "trust," but it can be understood as "hope," as the *Septuagint often does.

In the New Testament, the noun elpis and the verb elpizein are virtually the only words translated as hope. They are used widely in the epistles, rarely in the Gospels, and not at all in the book of Revelation. This shows clearly that hope may be expressed by a text (such as in the words of Jesus or in Revelation) even when the specific word for hope is not present.

Hope has both an objective and subjective aspect. There are promises from God to which one clings as one faces the unknown and often forbidding future. But as suggested by a word like bāṭaḥ, hope is also an inner sense of confidence in God, a serenity despite terrible present circumstances. Whatever strengthens *faith will also increase hope. Experiences that bring on a crisis of faith, like the *exile or persecution of the early Christians, will also make hope more difficult.

God's promises form the basis for the content of biblical hope. From the objective side, hope is dependent on the confidence that God will provide: (1) The necessities of life—food, *water, land. Without food and water, there is no hope even for life. Land plays an important part in biblical hope—it is promised, given, removed, and promised again (see Promised Land). (2) Protection from danger—both as a community called by God and as individuals. God sends leaders—judges, kings—to protect the nation. When the nation falls, God promises a new and better king from the line of *David, one who will outdo his illustrious ancestor (messianic promises in Isaiah, Jeremiah, Micah, and elsewhere). God will also protect individuals from all that can hurt them (Pss. 4.8; 27.1, 5). (3)

Justice—the good will be rewarded and the wicked will be restrained and punished. (4) Community—the assurance that God will never abandon the people he has chosen, and that they will live in peace and love with other human beings.

Generally speaking, there is in the Bible a growing pessimism that God's promises will be kept within historical time; this is most clearly seen in *apocalyptic writings. Confidence in God remains and hope as relationship survives, but language that had been used to articulate hope for this world is now projected into a world beyond human experience: the land becomes a heavenly home, food and water become heavenly food and the water of life; the *Messiah becomes a divine being; heaven and *hell are the final solution to the problem of justice; communities broken by death and tragedy and sin can be restored in heaven. In spite of the failures and disillusionments of this life, however, there is still hope. God will win the heavenly battle. There will be a resurrection, life after death, and a new age where God reigns.

Horeb. The alternate name of the mountain of revelation more frequently referred to as *Sinai. The name is derived from a root meaning to be dry, an appropriate characterization of the Sinai desert. The designation "Horeb" is characteristic of the Elohist (*E) tradition in the *Pentateuch (e.g., Exod. 3.1; 33.6) and of the book of Deuteronomy (e.g., 1.6; 5.2) and the *Deuteronomic history (1 Kings 8.9; 19.8). The identity of Sinai and Horeb is recognized in Sirach 48.7, suggesting that an attempt to locate two different peaks is misguided.

Hosanna. A transliteration of the Hebrew hôšiaʿ nāʾ, which is an imperative meaning "Save!" It occurs in the Gospels in the narrative of Jesus' entry into Jerusalem (Matt. 21.9; Mark 11.9–10; John 12.13), in a quotation of Psalm 118.25–25 (which in the Masoretic text has the variant form hôšīʿâ nāʾ), one of the psalms recited in the *Passover ritual. In its Greek form, it became a part of the Christian liturgy at an early period (Didache 10.6), and it continues to be used in the Sanctus and Benedictus of the Roman and other rites.

MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Hosea, The Book of. Hosea is the second of the eighth-century BCE prophets whose messages became a separate book (see also Amos, The Book of).

The first three chapters tell the story of the prophet and his family. Hosea was instructed by God to marry a woman who is described as adulterous, either because she was already immoral or in anticipation of her unfaithfulness. The three children carry the same stigma (1.2; 2.4), and they are given bizarre names to symbolize their degraded status (chap. 1).

The similarity between Hosea's experience with his wife and Yahweh's experience with Israel is worked out in the book in all its dimensions—heartbreak, enraged rejection, efforts at reconciliation. All these are interwoven in an allegory in chap. 2. The stories are really the same, because the sin of Gomer against Hosea is identical with Israel's sin against Yahweh: unfaithfulness to the covenanted relationship by resorting to the cult of *Baal, the god of the Canaanites (2.8, 13). This rival religion provided sexual activity as part of its ritual (4.10–19), at once literal and spiritual adultery.

In spite of the hopeless situation, which called for the most drastic discipline and even for the death penalty for both the mother (2.3) and the children (2.12b; 9.12–16), the Lord was quite unwilling to give up the *covenant relationship (11.8). Strenuous efforts were made to renew the marriage, to begin all over again (2.14–23).

The story and the allegory are fairly clear in chaps. 1–3, where Hosea's concerns are uppermost. The rest of the book (chaps. 4–14) deals with Yahweh and Israel. It contains prophetic discourses composed in the language of cult poetry. This language is dense, compact, often opaque. Most translations are clearer than the original due to a considerable amount of guesswork and interpretation. This is unavoidable, because the text of Hosea is notoriously difficult, perhaps the most obscure and problematic in the entire Bible. Its difficulties have been attributed to the peculiar dialect of the northern kingdom, but this has never been demonstrated. Again, the text, because of its great age, is suspected of having suffered much damage in transmission, and numerous attempts have been made to repair these supposed corruptions by textual emendations. Doubtless the surviving text is blemished from such causes, but it is more likely that most of our perplexity arises from our failure to understand the author's use of intricate poetic patterns and sophisticated rhetorical devices.

Even when the words are familiar and the grammar seems to be correct, the discussion is often oblique and enigmatic. There are references to a priest (4.4), a prophet (4.5), a mother (4.5), a king (7.3). Priests are implicated in a murder (6.9) and in other crimes (4.1–2). But no one is named, and none of the events referred to in the book can be connected with historical facts known from other sources.

None of the oracles is dated, so we cannot attach them to the political developments of the period. The military activity described briefly in 5.8–12 has been identified as one of the *Assyrian invasions, but it could be one of the many wars between the two kingdoms of Israel and Judah.

The clue provided by the title (1.1) is curiously lopsided. The four kings of Judah cover most of the eighth century BCE, but only one king of Israel is named. The prophecy predicts judgment on Bethel and *Samaria with death or exile for the king (10.7), but it does not show any awareness of the fulfillment of these threats, notably in the fall of Samaria in 722 BCE. Many of the criticisms of the religious life of Israel could have been made at most times in its history; but the deterioration of the situation fits well with the third quarter of the eighth century, when the northern kingdom went into a rapid decline after the death of Jeroboam II (745 BCE), whom Hosea evidently regarded as the last real king of the north. The discourses reflect the chaos and lawlessness that marked the last two decades of the Samarian regime, the anarchy that set in after the death of Jeroboam II in which many of his successors lost their lives through assassination or revolution.

The international scene is dominated by *Assyria and *Egypt, who are frequently mentioned together throughout the book. Many of the references to these countries reveal diplomatic moves by both Israel and Judah to seek security ("healing," 5.13) through alliance with the great powers (7.11; 8.9). All too often, the little countries in the buffer zone between the two imperial nations tried to play one off against the other, with even more disastrous results. Such moves were roundly condemned by the prophets as apostasy from Yahweh, their true and only Lord. Their new protectors became their captors (9.3).

The northern kingdom is consistently called *Ephraim, new terminology not found in Amos a generation earlier. It probably represents the contraction of the territory ruled from Samaria to a region corresponding to the traditional homeland of that tribe, due to loss of the eastern and northern provinces to the Assyrians and through civil war.

Hosea's messages mostly attack the northern kingdom (1.4), but Judah is frequently mentioned side by side with Ephraim and similarly condemned, especially in the all-important chaps. 4–8. Some scholars wish to delete the references to Judah as secondary additions, but such a revision would seriously injure the fabric of the whole book. The references to *Jacob in the latter part of the book secure a complementary historical perspective that shows a concern for all Israel as the covenant people. It reaches deeply into the past, and Judah could hardly be excluded from Jacob's descendants. The reference to *David in 3.5 likewise recalls the original unity of the people, and looks forward to its future restoration.

The prophecy anticipates wholesale destruction of the state and the deportation of the population. Assyria will be the prime agent of this development. Conquest by Assyria is identified as punishment by God.

Beyond that the prophet anticipates a return from exile (11.11) and reconstitution of the old regime (3.5). With the benefit of hindsight, we connect such statements with the later history of the people, the dispersal first of Israel, then of Judah, and the revival of national life after the *exile. And because the promises of a return seem to fit these later developments, some scholars suspect them of being added after the fact. Unless we recover a manuscript of Hosea of preexilic date, we shall never be able to settle such a point with certainty. But the forecasts are general, even vague, and do not betray actual knowledge of what would eventually take place. It cannot even be shown that the book has been edited with a Judean perspective of later times. It betrays no awareness of the differing fate of Judah or of the later importance of *Babylon. It does not feature *Jerusalem, let alone the *Zion mystique that begins to emerge already in Hosea's younger contemporaries, *Micah and *Isaiah.

Hosea's vision of the future sometimes breaks out into an almost *apocalyptic scenario, with echoes of the serenity and bliss of the original *paradise (2.16–23; 14.4–8). Some scholars believe that such ideas did not develop in Israel until after the exile, but they are deeply woven into the fabric of the book, and any attempt to remove them would spoil the total structure.

Hosea is a book of conflicting passions. Extremes of rage alternate with the most moving expressions of tenderness and compassion. Its themes are the goodness and the severity of God. In passages of unexceeded savagery, Yahweh describes his execution and mutilation of his sinful partner (5.14; 6.5; 9.15; 13.7–8). In other places, the unquenchable affection of God for his people is expressed as grief over their loss, and as the yearning of a father for a beloved child (11.1), or of a husband for an estranged wife (chap. 3). The prophecy reveals the heart of God torn by powerful emotions: justice demands retribution; but *grace cries out for forgiveness. How can both of these divine impulses be satisfied?

Hosea presents a radical solution to this problem. We do not know the outcome of his private tragedy and his heroic measures to recover his wife. He buys Gomer back (3.2), but we are not told how she responded. In God's parallel dealings with Israel, the book everywhere threatens and announces death as the inevitable punishment for sin (2.3, 12; 4.5, 9; 5.12; 7.2; 8.10; 9.9; 10.10; 11.6; 13.7–8, 16). But that will not be the end; once God's anger has been vented, the way of return is open. They may repent (14.1–2); then there will be healing and renewed love (14.4–8). Nothing less than resurrection from the dead can achieve this, and this is what is promised (13.14).

The story and the prophecy operate on several different levels at once, and it is impossible to separate the strands. The oracles have multiple meanings, personal and individual, national and historical. The figures of estrangement/reconciliation, sickness/recovery, death/resurrection are both literal and symbolic, realistic and fantastic. Beginning with one man's private tragedy and agony, the presentation expands to an analysis of Israel's past history and future destiny, reaching from the *ancestors (chap. 12) to the eschaton (2.21–23). As one whose love was nurtured by the love of God, and whose experience then threw more light of understanding back into the love of God, Hosea reveals the Lord as both stern and sensitive, just and compassionate. He desires kindness (Hebr. ḥesed) rather than sacrifice (6.6), because kindness is an attribute in God even deeper than his justice.

FRANCIS I. ANDERSEN

Hospitality. One of the most highly praised virtues in antiquity. In nomadic societies, hospitality was an unwritten law, and the stranger was regarded as divinely protected. This is true also of the Hebrew Bible. *Abraham, a nomad, is the prime example of someone who is blessed by extending hospitality to strangers (Gen. 18.1–8). The Law requires that because the Israelites had been strangers in Egypt, they should show hospitality to strangers (Exod. 23.9; Lev. 19.33–34), who are similarly under God's protection (Deut. 10.17–19) (see Alien). Many other people appear as examples of hospitality, including *Lot (Gen. 19.1–18), Laban (Gen. 29.13), *Rahab (Josh. 2), and the Shunammite woman (2 Kings 4.8–11). Travelers could expect hospitality as a matter of course (1 Sam. 25.8), but they could also be abused (Judg. 19–20). It is therefore not surprising that people on occasion are rebuked for not being hospitable, such as Jethro's daughters (Exod. 2.20), the men of Succoth and Penuel (Judg. 8.4–9), and the men of *Sodom (Gen. 19; cf. Wisd. 19.13–14). Jael's execution of Sisera while he was her guest is noteworthy, for her abuse of hospitality is praised (Judg. 4.17–21; 5.24–27). Nevertheless, hospitality is so highly regarded that in Isaiah 58.7 it is preferred to fasting, and Job commends himself for it (31.31–32; but see 22.7).

Hospitality was equally important among the Greeks and Romans. It was viewed as a sign of a philanthropic nature (Acts 28.2) and was given religious sanction. Zeus was the "friend of strangers" and protected them (Homer, Odyssey 14.283–284; cf. 2 Macc. 6.2). Hospitality was required of all people; only a fool would neglect strangers. By the first century CE, travel was relatively easy and safe, and an extensive system of inns and hostels met the needs of travelers (Luke 2.7; 10.34). Because the services they provided often were minimal and their clientele of a low class, discriminating travelers availed themselves of the hospitality of friends and associates whenever possible. Private hospitality thus continued to be important, especially among simple folk.

The New Testament accords extraordinary importance to hospitality. The Gospels frequently portray *Jesus as enjoying the hospitality of private homes, which provide the setting for much of his teaching (Mark 1.29–34; Luke 7.36–50). Hospitality, furthermore, was part of Jesus' teaching: he used it to illustrate his teaching on human mercy (Luke 10.29–37), God's invitation to accept the gospel (Luke 14.15–25), God's joy over the repentance of a sinner (Luke 15.22–24), humility (John 13.1–11), one's duty to do good without expecting repayment (Luke 14.12–14), and the eschatological gathering of the nations (Luke 13.22–30). As Jesus expected hospitality for himself, he did as well for his followers who preached the gospel. This appears especially in the mission discourses, which reflect the early church's mission practice. People who received Jesus' disciples received Jesus who had sent them (Matt. 10.40–42; 25.31–46), and their offering or withholding of hospitality signified their acceptance or rejection of the gospel (Matt. 10.9–16).

Hospitality continued to be important among early Christians, who traveled as much as other people in the society. Aquila and Prisca, for example, can be placed in Pontus, Rome, *Corinth (Acts 18.1–2), *Ephesus (Acts 18.24–26; 1 Cor. 16.19), and again in Rome (Rom. 16.3). That hospitality appears frequently in exhortations to the moral life shows that it was a matter of constant concern. Hospitality was regarded as an expression of Christian love (Rom. 13.9–13), a gift of God (1 Pet. 4.8–10), a virtue exemplified by ancient worthies (Heb. 13.1–2), and a practical means by which to share in the preaching of the gospel (3 John 5–8). Traveling Christians are not presented in the New Testament as staying in inns: rather, they are described as depending on the private hospitality of the faithful (Acts 21.4–8, 15–16; Philem. 22). Hospitality was extended to defray expenses for further travel (Rom. 15.23–24; 1 Cor. 16.6–7, 11; Titus 3.13–14). Such openness led to abuses such as guests staying too long, but a matter of greater concern was the fear that by receiving someone who propounded error a host would be supporting it (2 John 9–11). One way to guard against this was to write letters of recommendation on behalf of travelers (Acts 18.27; Rom. 16.1–2; 2 Cor. 3.1), a custom widely followed by non-Christians.

Hospitality was practiced in a special way by making available one's home for the meetings of the church. Homes were frequently the settings in which the gospel was first preached (Acts 18.1–6), and for generations they remained the place where Christians met for worship. Such house churches are frequently mentioned in the New Testament (Rom. 16.3–5; 1 Cor. 16.19; Col. 4.15; Philem. 2). Aquila and Prisca, for example, were hosts to evangelists and to the church in three of the cities where they lived. Problems often attended such house churches: religious services quite easily became disorderly (1 Cor. 14), social distinctions between members, rather than being disregarded, could be accentuated (1 Cor. 11.17–32), or a domineering host could usurp power to exclude some persons from the assembly meeting in that house (3 John 9–10). As whole households were converted, so entire households also could be led astray (2 Tim. 3.6; Tit. 1.11). And, despite hospitality's personal and social benefits, it could become a burden to be extended only grudgingly (1 Pet. 4.9). Nevertheless, toward the end of the first century, a Roman Christian still celebrated the hospitality, faith, and piety by which Abraham, Lot, and Rahab were saved (1 Clement 10.7; 11.1; 12.1). Houses, Furniture, Utensils.

Houses. The first houses of the biblical period were the tents of the *ancestors. *Nomads in the Middle East still camp where there is a source of *water, shelter from the wind (and, if possible, from the sun), and pasture for their animals. From very early times, however, villages and walled *cities also existed. Such towns were usually 2.5 hectares (6 acres) or less in size, and the houses were small. The development of cisterns and water systems made it possible to locate villages and towns away from springs and streams.

Tents were made of woven goat hair rugs that shrink and become completely waterproof when wet, and were and still are constructed with an inner dividing curtain that provides privacy. Long ropes held the sides of the tent out and up, providing ventilation and further space (see Isa. 54.2).

Permanent homes can be divided into two general classifications, single-room houses and multiple-room houses. Single-room homes were often built in two sections, a raised terrace for the family and a lower area for its animals. The raised terrace was the living area where food was stored, cooked, and eaten, and the members of the family slept and lived. Such a house is presupposed in Matthew 5.14, where a single lamp shines on all in the house. Under the same roof, but below the raised living space, was an area for the shelter of the family's animals at night (see 1 Sam. 28.24; Luke 13.15). Mangers were dug out of the floor of the raised terrace or constructed of stone or clay and placed on the lower level. Each morning, the house animals would be taken out to the courtyard and the house cleaned. These simple houses could have a guest room on the roof or adjoining the house on the same level. This is the sense of the Greek word kataluma in Luke 22.11 par.; if the word has the same meaning in Luke 2.7, the setting Luke gives for the birth of *Jesus is a private one-room home with mangers in the floor: Joseph and Mary are in the family room because the guest room is full.

The second category, with many varieties, is that of rooms around a central courtyard. This courtyard may be open to the sky, or partially covered, or completely roofed, and was the setting for many activities, including cooking, *crafts, and often business. The house may have one or two floors, but rarely more. The wealthier have higher homes, and they are thus able to look down on the rooftops and courtyards of their neighbors (see 2 Sam. 11.2). Wealthy homes may also have a second courtyard, with surrounding rooms, behind the first, for the family.

Palaces are essentially variations of the second type. Those of *Herod the Great at *Jericho, Masada, and elsewhere exhibit a grand style seldom matched in ancient Palestine, with their reflecting pools, gardens, Roman baths, air conditioning, decorative stone and plaster work, swimming pools, and exquisite mosaic flooring.

The simplest homes were constructed of sun-dried mud bricks with a waterproofing plaster; walls built of such material could easily have been dug through by thieves (see Matt. 6.19–20). Undressed field stones, cut stone, and fired brick were used in wealthier homes. The very wealthy might panel special rooms with wood (see 2 Sam. 7.2), but wood was too scarce a commodity to be used extensively in home building.

The floors were generally of packed earth, with a waterproof lime plaster often added to seal out moisture. Flagstones were occasionally used, and mosaic pavings were introduced in the Hellenistic period.

The most common roof was constructed of thick poles laid flat across the walls about 1 m (3 ft) apart, supported by columns or vertical poles if needed. Thin branches spanned the beams. These in turn were covered with coarsely woven mats and packed clay. After every rain or snow the resulting flat roof was rolled with a stone roller to prevent leaking. Grass would spring up on the roofs, but it was short-lived, as the poets noted (Ps. 129.6–7; Isa. 37.27). Crops were dried and stored on the roof (see Josh. 2.6); guests could be entertained there; and in the summer, the roof became an auxiliary sleeping area. Ceramic tile and stone-slab roofs are found beginning in the Roman period; in the story of the paralytic (Mark 2.1–12 par.), Mark has the bearers dig through the roof, which would suggest clay, while Luke (5.19) uses a word (Grk. kramos) that could mean either tile or clay.

Windows on the first floor were small and high for security reasons. This made the house dark, and could require the use of lamps even in daytime (see Luke 15.8). Window spaces were closed in with lattices so that one could look out but not in; window glass was unknown during the biblical periods. Shutters or heavy drapes were used to close the windows. Second-floor windows were considerably larger.

Metaphorically, the phrase "the house of" meant primarily a person's extended family, not the home.

Furniture. Though furniture was fairly sparse, some items were common. The room built for Elisha was furnished with a bed, a table, a chair, and a lamp (2 Kings 4.10).

For sleeping, a mat or mattress on the floor was most common. Often a raised ledge was built into the floor at one end or around the walls, on which cushions and mattresses were placed for sitting in daytime and sleeping at night. Movable beds were relatively rare. Amos condemns the wealthy who reclined on beds of ivory (Amos 6.4); the prophet asserts that only pieces of this expensive wooden furniture with ivory inlays will survive (3.12). The reference to a bed in Mark 4.21 and Luke 8.16 may reflect the Hellenistic setting of those writers; noteworthy is Matthew 5.16, where the bed is not mentioned.

Chairs were also rare; the bed could also function as a couch. Kings, of course, had thrones, and "Moses' seat" (Matt. 23.2) may have been a special place of honor in the *synagogue.

By the first century CE, the triclinium of Greco-Roman culture was in use in Palestine. This was a U-shaped wide couch with a table at its center. Diners ate reclining on their left sides. Such a dining room is probably the background of Luke 7.35–51 and of the Last Supper (see John 13.23–25).

Closets could be built into the walls to save wood, or constructed as separate pieces of furniture. Chests for storage of clothes and bedding are also attested.

Utensils. The basic utensil of the home was the clay pot or vessel, used for food, light, and cosmetics.

After the food was brought from the fields, it had to be dried and stored for the year. The three age-old enemies of food preservation—moisture, rodents, and insects—were overcome by the use of large earthenware vessels, up to 1 m (3 ft) across and 1.5 m (5 ft) high. These were used for storage of dried grains and fruits, as well as for water, *wine, and oil. Wine, and sometimes water, could also be stored in animal skins.

The staple food was *bread, whose preparation required a (stone) grinder and an oven. The flat grinding stone (the saddle quern) in time was replaced by two circular stones placed one on top of another. Ovens were round and open at the top. Flat, pancakelike loaves were baked stuck to the inside of the conical-shaped oven walls. The wealthier would have had brass or copper pots. Each family would also have had a large stone mortar for crushing meat, green wheat, salt, and other foodstuffs. Pieces of bread also served as the basic eating utensils, which could be dipped into a common dish; without it a *meal could not be served (see Luke 11.5–6).

During the biblical periods, light was produced by burning olive oil in small clay lamps; the wealthy could afford lamps of bronze. Small pitchers for refilling the lamps were part of the lighting equipment. A bowl with water in it could be placed under the lamp as a protection from a falling burning wick except on the *Sabbath (M. Šabb. 3.6). Lamp stands could be niches in walls or freestanding (see also Menorah).

Among the variety of cosmetic aids in use were thin alabaster or glass vials for perfume, palettes for eye-makeup and the like, and small, shaped stones for smoothing callouses.

Human Person. The idea of the human person, so important in modern times thanks especially to the study of psychology, was not a focus of ancient Israelite thought. Because of the corporate identity of the people of Israel, the individual person did not receive much attention in the literature of Israel. However, as Israel moved into a later period, and particularly after its encounter with Hellenism, the nature of the individual and his or her fate became much more prominent both in Second Temple Judaism and early Christianity.

The Hebrew word for the human being is nepeš, which among its wide range of meanings connotes both flesh and soul as inseparable components of a person. A nepeš, or person, is first of all a living being, animated by breath. The life of a person is seen as residing in the *blood as well as in the breath (Deut. 12.23, 24); therefore, it is unlawful to shed or to eat blood. Thus, an essential component of the person is the flesh (Hebr. bāśār), which is separate from God and carries a connotation of weakness. All animals are composed of flesh, and the human animal is no different in this regard.

However, a person is also composed of "soul," so that less concrete attributes also belong to the person. Appetites such as hunger and thirst, emotions like desire, loathing, sorrow, joy, and love, and thought or mental activity all belong to the nepeš. This is how the human differs from animals, who are only flesh; the human, who has been animated by the breath of God (Gen. 2.7), shares in the attributes of God.

At death, the person's flesh dies, and the soul dwells in Sheol, a shadowy place for the dead (see Afterlife and Immortality; Hell). There is no notion in what may be called orthodox Israelite religion of a separate existence for the soul after death. Death is accepted as a natural part of the life cycle, but it is not welcomed, for the person who dies loses his or her being. In a prayer of thanksgiving, the psalmist says to the Lord, "What profit is there in my death, if I go down to the Pit? Will the dust praise you? Will it tell of your faithfulness?" (Ps. 30.9). Death is thus perceived to be the end of all sentient life. In later times, a doctrine of the resurrection of the dead developed, so that the best hope of the person after death lay in resurrection, when the soul and body would be reunited and live again (Dan. 12.2).

With the introduction of Hellenism into the ancient Near East, Israelite thought began to espouse the notion of a separation of soul and body. In Greek thought, body (sōma) is separate from soul (psychē), and the soul contains the true essence of a person. At death, the soul flees the prison of the body to seek a higher life, so that death is truly the liberation of the soul. As Jewish thought began to be influenced by Greek, these concepts emerge in its literature. *Philo, an Alexandrian Jewish philosopher of the first century CE, assumes throughout his works a complete separation of soul and body, with flesh the chief cause of ignorance and soul the vehicle for a higher life. *Josephus, the first-century CE Jewish historian, states that the *Pharisees believe that souls have the power to survive death (Ant. 18.1.14), and that the *Essenes believe that the soul is immortal (Ant. 18.1.18). It is probable, however, that the immortality both of these groups anticipate includes a bodily resurrection.

In the New Testament, the still prominent idea of bodily resurrection (see especially the resurrection narratives in the Gospels and also 1 Cor. 15) implies that the soul and body are inseparable, but the notion of a human being composed of a separate soul and body slowly gains ascendancy. There are several Greek words used to explain different aspects of the human person. The Greek word sarx, the equivalent of Hebrew bāśār, denotes the flesh of both animals and humans. It often appears with the word "blood," as in "flesh and blood," to signify the physical being of the human (as opposed to a supernatural being such as an *angel, which is not composed of flesh and blood). As early as Paul, the word "flesh" begins to receive negative connotations, as the vehicle for *sin in the human being (Rom. 7.5).

The body (Grk. sōma) is the physical being of the person animated by the soul. As such, it is both physical and spiritual, and sometimes is used as the equivalent of nepeš. Paul uses the term sōma in his metaphor of the church as the body of Christ, animated by Christ's spirit (1 Cor. 12.13).

The word psychē, or soul, occurs over a hundred times in the New Testament, illustrating its importance in early Christian thought. The soul is the seat and center of the inner life of the human, and the location of the feelings and emotions, especially love (1 Thess. 2.8). The soul is that part of the human person that survives after the death of the body, and receives the rewards and punishments of the afterlife (cf. Luke 16.19–31). Thus the soul is the vehicle of *salvation. It cannot be injured by human instrumentality, but God can hand it over for destruction. Therefore the soul is the most important possession a person has (Mark 8.36–37). Thus the New Testament has moved beyond the Hebrew Bible concept of an inseparable nepeš, to the idea of a separate soul and body. The soul survives after death, but may be reunited with the body in a physical resurrection (John 11.25).

The last word associated with the makeup of the human being in the New Testament is pneuma, or spirit. The spirit is the breath, that which gives life to the body; in fact, it is often used with "flesh" or "body" to denote the whole person (1 Cor. 5.3–5). The spirit is the seat of insight, often giving persons glimpses of things not visible to the naked eye (e.g., John 13.21). The spirit is also the location of feeling (particularly of love and grief) and will, so that at times the spirit and the flesh are in conflict: "the spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak" (Matt. 26.41). The usage of the word "spirit" often overlaps with that of "soul," and the two together divide the inner life between them. However, the use of the term "spirit" in connection with Jesus emphasizes the most important aspect of "spirit": it is the divine attribute of the human being. God, who is spiritual, breathed his own spirit into the human at creation, and now the human spirit and the divine spirit are related. Often, it is the spirit of God that animates the life of the Christian, as at *Pentecost (Acts 2.2–4). And it is the *Holy Spirit which calls to the human spirit: "it is that very Spirit bearing witness with our spirit that we are children of God" (Rom. 8.16). Thus, early Christian writers pictured the human person as composed of flesh, soul, and spirit, with the flesh, as the vehicle of sin, as something to be tamed, and the soul and spirit, as the vehicles for salvation and participation in the divine, as those parts of the human to be emphasized and nurtured.

Hyssop. A wild shrub, generally identified as Origanum syriacum (rather than the European hyssop), belonging to the mint family and still used medicinally and as an herb in the Near East. It is an insignificant plant, contrasted with the cedar in 1 Kings 4.33. Hyssop stalks were used for sprinkling blood and water in purificatory and apotropaic rituals (Exod. 12.22; Lev. 14.4–6, 49–52; Num. 19.18; Ps. 51.7; Heb. 9.19). Its mention in John 19.29 is puzzling, since the plant on which Jesus is offered wine at the *crucifixion is called a reed in Mark 15.36 par., and hyssop would not have been entirely suitable; John's use of the hyssop may therefore be symbolic.

Idols, Idolatry. An idol is a figure or image worshiped as the representation of a deity. Idols normally take the form of figures in the round or in relief. Strictly prohibited in the Bible, idolatry was widely practiced in the religions of the ancient Near East. Because of their popular appeal, idols became the frequent object of attack in biblical literature.

More than ten different Hebrew words in the Bible designate various types of idols. Some are distinguished according to the method of their construction: "carved image" of stone, clay, wood, or metal; "cast idol" of metal; "pillar," usually an unhewn stone set erect. Other terms have a more general meaning of "shape, form," and thus "representation." The few with a distinctly pejorative sense are not technical names but terms conveying contempt for idolatry: "abominations," "dung-pellets," or "worthless things."

In the religions of ancient Israel's neighbors, idolatry constituted a primary component of public and private piety, and archaeological excavations throughout the region have recovered examples from earliest times onward. These range from crude to elaborate artistic productions of figures in human or animal form, or a mixture of both. Unworked pieces, such as a meteorite rock or a simple wood pillar, could also serve as idols. *Egyptian idols, normally kept in temples, were cultically awakened at daybreak, nourished through sacrifices, dressed and adorned with jewels, and carried about on festive occasions. In *Babylonia, idols could also serve as oracles and were placed at the entrances of homes to guard against witches and evil spirits. The *Canaanites, as did others, formed some of their idols with explicit sexual features, consistent with their fertility cult's concern to ensure the fruitfulness of the land and the womb.

It is not always easy to determine how idols were interpreted in the various religions. In an Egyptian text known as "The Theology of Memphis," the high god Ptah is said to have created not only all other gods but also the idols in which they were to live. This notion—that the idols are not themselves the gods but rather represent them or house them—was probably present in many religions, though such a distinction may not have been made by all believers, as the various cultic practices of caring for the idols seem to suggest. Several later Greek and Roman thinkers wrote polemically to the effect that weak and ignorant people need idols to help them imagine their gods, maintain faith in them, and have the magical means for securing blessing and avoiding disaster.

Strict prohibition of idolatry is one of the most distinctive features of Israelite religion: Yahweh, the God of Israel, could not be represented in physical form and would not tolerate the idols of any other gods. This aniconic principle is articulated in the *Ten Commandments: "You shall not make for yourself an idol, or any likeness of anything. . .; you shall not bow down to them or serve them" (Exod. 20.4–5 [RSV]; see also 20.23–25 and Deut. 4.15–18, 23, 28). Historically, it is uncertain when and why this prohibition first arose. Probably it is early and is directly connected to the demand for exclusive worship of Yahweh alone. Monolatry, while implicitly recognizing the existence of other gods, did not allow for worshiping them (Exod. 20.3; 22.20), and this perhaps led to banning idolatry altogether in the official cult of Israel.

Nonetheless, there are records of the presence of idols throughout Israel's history. *Rachel's cunning theft of her father's household gods (Gen. 31.19) is perhaps less an instance of idolatry than of the usurping of the father's traditional cultic and legal powers in the family. The *golden calves erected first by *Aaron in the wilderness (Exod. 32.1–6) and later by Jeroboam I at *Dan and Bethel (1 Kings 12.28–29) were, on the other hand, regarded as flagrant violations, at least in some Judean circles. Idolatry occurred also in later periods of the monarchy (e.g., the *Asherah mentioned in 1 Kings 16.33; 2 Kings 21.3) and became the object of reforms by King *Hezekiah (2 Kings 18.4) and King *Josiah (2 Kings 23.4–15). With the impending fall of Jerusalem, Ezekiel reported that the people again reverted to idols in hope of escaping destruction (7.20; 8.10). In biting sarcasm, both Jeremiah (10.3–5) and Second Isaiah (40.18–20; 41.7; 44.9–20; 46.1–2, 5–7; cf. Ps. 115.4–8; 135.15–18) exposed the futility of worshiping the products of human hands.

The line between idol representations and permissible cultic objects may at points seem unclear; the *ark, with its gold *cherubim, was not considered an idol but a manifestation of God's presence (see Exod. 25.17–22; Num. 10.33–36; 1 Sam. 4–6; 2 Sam. 6.6–7); similarly ambiguous were the *teraphim (compare Judg. 17–18 with Zech. 10.2); the *ephod (compare Exod. 28 with Judg. 8.24–27), the Nehushtan or bronze serpent (compare Num. 21.8–9 with 2 Kings 18.4), and the oxen supporting the molten sea in Solomon's *Temple (1 Kings 7.25). The criterion for illicit use of such cultic objects apparently lay in whether they were worshiped directly as manipulable substitutes for Yahweh. Theologically, aniconism became a means for insisting that Yahweh cannot—by virtue of the chasm between creator and creation—be rendered adequately in any physical form. The nature of Israel's God must be reflected not in an image but in all aspects of the people's socioeconomic, political, legal, and domestic life. The prohibition of idolatry was thus coupled with commands for alternate types of religious and moral behavior.

The New Testament polemic against idolatry was primarily related to the opposition to Greco-Roman gods (Acts 7.43; 15.20; 17.29; Rom. 1.23). The "desolating sacrilege" in Mark 13.14 may be an allusion to the Roman emperor cult. Paul discussed at some length the problem of whether Christians should eat meat sacrificed to idols (1 Cor. 8; 10.14–22; cf. Rev. 2.14, 20), and he concluded that, while such food was untainted because the idols represented nonexistent gods, Christians should be cautious not to let this practice undermine weaker believers. Figuratively, idolatry designated a shifting of reverence to worldly things, including covetousness (Col. 3.5; Eph. 5.5) and gluttony (Phil. 3.19).

The prohibition against representation of divine or human beings has been observed in *synagogue ornamentation in most periods, and is strictly complied with in Islamic religious architecture as well. In Christianity, strict observance of the prohibition has surfaced in such movements as iconoclasm and Puritanism, and there are significant differences in practice between Roman Catholic and Orthodox churches, on the one hand, and some Protestant churches, on the other.

Illustrated Bibles. The subject of illustrations to the Bible includes not only two-dimensional designs, such as paintings, drawings, engravings, photographs, stained-glass windows, and mosaics, but three-dimensional works as well, such as statues and bas-reliefs. Raphael's madonnas, Michelangelo's Moses, the windows of Chartres Cathedral, the ceiling mosaics of the Santa Sophia in Istanbul, and Ghiberti's great doors to the Baptistry in Florence are all, in a sense, Bible illustrations. Annotations to the Bible are also illustrations of it, and originally this was perhaps the primary meaning of "Bible illustrations." In at least one of these senses, there have been "illustrations" of the Bible since it was written and canonized. Not only were there biblical commentaries from the earliest times, but the interpretation of the commandment against *graven images (Exod. 20.4) as a total prohibition of visual representation of sacred (or perhaps any other) scenes was not uniform even in Jewish tradition—note, for example, the cycle of paintings of scenes from the Hebrew Bible on the walls of the Dura-Europos *synagogue, destroyed by the Persians in 256 CE.

The earliest Christian visual representations of the Bible were apparently emblematic, with *Jesus depicted as "the fish" (the Greek word for fish, ichthus, was understood as an acronym for "Jesus Christ, God's Son, savior"), and up to the fifth century the *crucifixion was always shown symbolically rather than literally. The first narrative cycle of biblical illustrations is the mosaics in Santa Maria Maggiore in Rome, 432–440 CE, and narrative art is much more common in the West than in the eastern churches. Often postbiblical traditions are also represented; for example, *Job is depicted as a bishop and as the patron saint of music.

We are concerned in this article with illustrations in Bibles, largely a Christian phenomenon. The earliest such illustrations now known, from about 400 CE, are for separate sections of the Bible, particularly the *Pentateuch, the Gospels, and the book of *Revelation. Complete illustrated Bibles first appear in the Carolingian period in the eighth century.

The visual matter in such illuminated manuscript Bibles generally consists of three kinds of work: illuminated initial letters, particularly the first word of a book, often merely formal but sometimes representing more or less relevant scenes, such as Paul preaching; decorated borders, with flowers or scrolls or beasts, usually not closely related to their texts; and miniature pictures representing a scene in the text. The illuminated Romanesque Bibles were often very fine, but in them the illustrations were generally less important than the decorations. The illuminated initials in Bibles of the seventh and eighth centuries indicate the dominance of the text over the designs. Among the best-known early illustrated Bibles are the seventh-century Lindisfarne Gospels in the British Museum and the eighth-century Book of Kells in Trinity College, Dublin.

In some cases, the illustrations were not only derived from the text but were more extensive and perhaps even more important than it. The Bible Moralisée, made for Louis IX about 1240, had some five thousand illustrations, now scattered among the Bodleian Library, the British Museum, and the Bibliothèque Nationale. Indeed, the Biblia pauperum, the Bible for the illiterate poor, consisted chiefly of illustrations. The Biblia pauperum was a textbook of Christian *typology, often showing two Old Testament exempla or types (such as Moses in the wilderness) flanking their New Testament echo or antitype (such as Christ in the wilderness), accompanied by appropriate quotations and an explanatory verse in Latin. These were particularly popular in Germany in the thirteenth century. Later, books printed from engraved blocks of wood (not from movable type) with biblical illustrations were also popular in Germany, though they are comparatively rare in Italy and Spain. These block books were enormously influential in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries; their images were copied in sculpture (e.g., misericords), tapestry, stained glass, and paintings. They became the visual lingua franca of the medieval church.

The first printed Bible, that by *Gutenberg in the mid-fifteenth century, had no printed illustrations, but in some copies manuscript borders and initials were added to make the work as beautiful as the manuscript Bibles that it was imitating. There were woodcuts in a German Bible of 1478–79, and later illustrators included Hans Holbein in a Bible of 1522–23 and Hans Burgkmair in a Bible of 1523. Since then, many great artists have made at least some biblical illustrations; among the best known are those by Raphael and Gustave Doré, and, in the modern period, Georges Rouault and Marc Chagall.

In England, Winchester was the most important center for early book illustration and its artisans produced innovative and very fine work particularly about 1000, remarkable especially for depictions of the *Ascension and the creator. The Bible itself was central for Protestant reformers, and Luther's translation of the Bible was one of the most popular books ever published. Further, Luther actively encouraged illustration of the Bible, so long as the text was followed meticulously. But biblical illustration was slow to develop in England, partly because the country was aesthetically backward and partly because the English Puritans were strongly iconoclastic, deploring all visual representations of holy subjects. It was not until the Restoration of Charles II in 1660 that significant illustrated Bibles were printed in England.

The first great illustrated Bible of the Restoration is the two-volume folio of The Holy Bible printed at Cambridge by Field with a hundred marvelous double-page plates by Jan Visscher; a splendid copy bound by 1673 in velvet with watered silk endpages is in the Norwich Cathedral Library. As in most fine book illustration in England before 1750, the artists and even the engravers were from the Continent, chiefly from Holland and France. An equally ambitious folio edition of The Holy Bible was published at Oxford by John Baskett in 1716–17 with sixty-seven plates mostly designed by Louis Cheron and engraved by Michael Van der Gucht and Claude Du Bosc, as well as engraved initial letters. This was issued on two sizes of page and with two suites of designs, and the magnificent copy in the Bodleian is printed on vellum, lined in red throughout, and bound in velvet with the arms of the university in silver plaques on the covers.

Before 1750, however, the illustrations in most English Bibles came from separately published suites of designs engraved by John Sturt (1716) and James Cole (1724) and added to plain texts of the Bible by the bookseller or the purchaser. One reason for this may have been that copyright of the King James translation of the Bible belonged to the crown and was assigned only to the university presses at Oxford and Cambridge and to the royal printer in London. As John Reeves, "One of the Patentees" (see Printing and Publishing, article on Royal Printers' Patent), explained in his great, nonillustrated Holy Bible of 1802, "These privileged persons have confined themselves to reprinting the bare text, in which they have an exclusive right; forbearing to publish it with notes, which, it is deemed, may be done by any of the King's subjects as well as themselves." Toward the middle of the eighteenth century, enterprising publishers began publishing the King James translation with notes and with illustrations, and, to distinguish their productions from those protected by the crown's perpetual copyright, called them The Family Bible or even The Royal Universal Family Bible (1780–82). Other ways of evading the copyright were to publish a History of the Holy Bible, or a paraphrase, or an abridgement. Frequently, perhaps normally, these works were published in inexpensive parts, often sixpence each, in folio, with extensive illustrations, sometimes a hundred and more engravings. There were scores of these bulky publications during the eighteenth century; among the most impressive editions were those printed in Birmingham by John Baskerville (1769–72), with engravings by James Fittler (London, 1795), and with plates after Richard Corbould and Charles R. Ryley (London, 1795). But the most ambitious illustrated Bible ever published in Britain was that undertaken by Thomas Macklin and published in parts from 1791 to 1800 with seventy huge and splendid plates designed by the greatest English artists, such as Benjamin West and Sir Joshua Reynolds, and engraved by the best of the English engravers. Macklin's influence on English artists and publishers was great. For instance, in the first twenty-one years of Royal Academy exhibitions (1769–89), there had been an average of six or seven biblical illustrations per year, but in the eleven years from Macklin's announcement of his great undertaking in 1789 until its completion in 1800 seventeen biblical subjects were exhibited per year. In addition Macklin held his own exhibition of the biblical pictures he had commissioned. There were later popular Bible illustrators in England, most notably perhaps John Martin, but no illustrated edition of the Bible in England has surpassed that of Thomas Macklin.

Immanuel (Emmanuel). Israelite *prophets could give *names to individuals in accord with a specific message that they were trying to communicate (e.g., Jer. 20.3–6). In the same way that *Hosea named his three children to correspond with his message (Hos. 1.2–2.1), so *Isaiah noted, "I and the children whom Yahweh has given me are for signs" (Isa. 8.18): Shear-jashub, meaning "a remnant will return" (Isa. 7.3; 10.21, 22); Maher-shalal-hash-baz, meaning "swift is the booty, speedy is the prey" (Isa. 8.1, 3); and Immanuel, meaning "God is with us" (Isa. 7.14; 8.8, 10).

The time between the birth and the maturation of Immanuel is the specific focus of Isaiah's prophecy. Isaiah claims that before the boy reaches a certain age, Judah's enemies in *Damascus and *Samaria will be driven back by *Assyria (Isa. 7.14–17; cf. 8.1–4). Assyrian sources affirm that in 732 BCE the two kings (cf. Isa. 7.1) reigning in those cities were killed and their kingdoms subdued by Assyria.

This larger context makes it probable that Immanuel was a son of Isaiah. However, because Isaiah laconically says that Immanuel will be born to "the young woman" (Isa. 7.14), some suggest that the mother is someone other than Isaiah's wife, whom he refers to elsewhere as "the prophetess" (Isa. 8.3). Some propose that the mother is a queen (a wife of King Ahaz, to whom Isaiah is speaking), an unidentified bystander to whom Isaiah points, or a cult figure. The traditional Christian interpretation that "the young woman" is an intentional reference to *Mary, the mother of *Jesus (see Virgin Birth), does not do justice to the immediate prophecy, which required fulfillment in the eighth century BCE.

The gospel of *Matthew (1.23) applies Isaiah 7.14 to Jesus in the same way that Matthew applies other events that had already happened in Israel's history to Jesus' life (cf. Matt. 2.15, 18; 4.15–16; 10.35–36; 12.40; 13.35; 15.8–9; see Quotations of the Old Testament in the New Testament). Because Immanuel is one of the few names for which Matthew supplied a translation ("God with us"), it is clear that Matthew wished to stress that in the miraculous birth of Jesus there was a dimension of Isaiah's words appropriate only to Jesus. The echo of the name Immanuel in Jesus' last words in the gospel, "I am with you" (Matt. 28.20; cf. 18.20) is a literary recapitulation of the promise of the birth.

Incarnation. Literally meaning "enfleshment," incarnation is the entry of divinity into human form and life. In some religions this is thought of as something that happens repeatedly, but in the New Testament, incarnation is a once-and-for-all occurrence in *Jesus Christ.

The earliest Christian terms for interpreting Jesus had been drawn from the eschatological hope for a future transformation of existence. In the gospel of *John this hope became secondary, and incarnation—the bringing together of the human and divine in a specific person, Jesus—became the central way of interpreting the divine presence in him.

The effort to express the full presence of God in Jesus led to the conclusion that this specific mode of presence had existed with God prior to the life of Jesus; this preexistent figure had been God's agent in creating the world (John 1.1–3). The existence of Christ before the creation is already present in Paul's writings as they are commonly interpreted (see especially 1 Cor. 8.6; Phil. 2.6; Col. 1.16 [possibly post-Pauline]) and in the non-Pauline Hebrews 1.1–3. Some question the presence of a clear belief in the preexistence of Christ before the relatively late gospel of John. According to this view, the belief developed gradually among Christians from Jewish *wisdom theology, which was first applied to the full preexistence of Christ in John. But *wisdom and word (see Logos) were spoken of in Jewish and early Christian circles as personified entities, and most scholars hold that this imagery had already provided a way of thinking about a preexistent Christ.

Incarnation is meaningful when the distance between the divine and the human is strongly held. This dualism of *flesh and spirit and its overcoming in the incarnation opened the way for the development of later incarnational theology, which held that the goal of the incarnation was the transformation of the human into a nature compatible with the divine.

The Johannine theology of incarnation served as a focal point in the thought of the early church. It became a unifying center for the development of the doctrine of the full divinity and full humanity of Christ and the doctrine of the *Trinity.

The theology of incarnation has been actively debated in modern times. Some regard incarnation as an ancient mythological form of thought; others see in the incarnation a clue to the universal entering of God into human life; still others see the particularity of the incarnation in Jesus Christ as the distinctive core of Christianity. WILLIAM A. BEARDSLEE

Incense. Incense is formed from the resin and gums of certain trees that, when burned, give off a fragrant odor. Incense was widely used in the ancient Near East both domestically, as a perfume, and in religious rites, as a *sacrifice or as a means of driving away *demons.

The use of incense in Israelite worship parallels its widespread use in Canaanite ritual. The prophets' denunciation of it (e.g., Jer. 6.20) relates to their denunciation of sacrifices offered by unethical persons, or because incense was being burned before *idols. The reference in Ezekiel 16.18 to "my [i.e., God's] incense" shows that the offering, which should have been made to God, was being blasphemously misused.

In the Hebrew Bible we find three main uses of incense. First, it supplemented the grain offering, for which pure *frankincense was prescribed (Lev. 2.1). Doubtless, some form of incense was used with animal sacrifices to counteract the stench of burning flesh. Second, its use in censers was part of Egyptian ritual, and was included in Israelite worship probably from an early period. Finally, as part of the sacrificial system, incense was burned on the golden altar within the sanctuary; it was burned regularly twice a day (Exod. 30.1–10). This offering was restricted to the priests who officiated according to a roster (1 Chron. 24.1–19; Luke 1.8–9). On the *Day of Atonement the high priest entered the holy of holies with a censer (Lev. 16.12–13) to cover the mercy seat with a cloud of smoke, lest he be exposed to the presence of God and die.

In the New Testament there are few references to the use of incense. Most concern Israelite practices, though Revelation 5.8 and 8.3–4, describing the worship of heaven, may reflect early Christian ritual. After the destruction of the *Temple and the cessation of the sacrificial system, however, incense is unlikely to have been used by Jews or Christians; its use in other religions, and especially in the imperial cult, would have made it suspect. There are no references to Christian use of incense in the first four centuries CE.

Its use in worship from the fifth century onward probably derived from its ordinary use to show respect for eminent persons, who were sometimes preceded by servants with censers. It is therefore significant that it has been used especially in the Eucharist to cense the ministers, the people, the gospel book, the altar, and the eucharistic elements, all of which are regarded as representations of Christ himself to whom honor is due. This conception was perhaps helped by the understanding of incense as symbolizing the prayers of God's people (Ps. 141.2; Rev. 5.8).

Inheritance. In its secular sense, inheritance is the transmission of property on the owner's death to those entitled to receive it. In Israel this was the right of those related by blood (Num. 27.8–11; 1 Kings 21.3), generally the sons, among whom the firstborn received a double portion (Deut 21.17). The Hebrew word for inheritance, naḥălâ, can also mean possession or portion. There are, however, few legal provisions concerning inheritance in the Hebrew Bible, and its meaning there is primarily theological.

Thus, the land of *Canaan is frequently mentioned as the territory that God gives to Israel (Deut 4.21; 19.14). God had promised it to the *ancestors, first to *Abra(ha)m (Gen. 12.7), then to each succeeding patriarch and to *Moses (Exod. 6.8). It was divided up among the tribes, so that each received its own inheritance (Josh 14.1). The nation too is often described as the Lord's inheritance and therefore holy (Exod 19.5–6; Deut. 7.6). Only if the people maintain their *holiness by keeping God's commandments can they keep possession of the land (Jer. 7.5–7). Thus, the inheritance of the land is a sign of God's faithfulness in fulfilling his promises and a reminder of Israel's duties toward him as the true owner of the land (see Lev. 25.23).

After the *exile various developments occur in the concept of inheritance. With the dispersion of many of the nation from the land of Israel, possession of the *Promised Land increasingly becomes a future hope (Sir. 36.16). With the full development of *monotheism, the inheritance that God gives to Israel includes all peoples and countries (Ps. 111.6). He is the portion of the individual believer as representative of the righteous *remnant that can trust only in God (Pss. 16.5–6; 142.5). In the book of *Wisdom and other writings, the inheritance of the righteous is eternal life (Wisd. of Sol. 5.5).

Various aspects of these ideas are resumed in the New Testament. The promise of inheritance to Abraham is fulfilled in Christ, so that he is the promised inheritance (Gal. 3.14). Similarly, in the parable of the evil tenants (Matt. 21.33–41 par.), Christ is the son to whom inheritance rightly belongs, and after his death it passes to his followers (see also Heb. 9.15–17; Acts 20.32).

For Paul, Christians are the real descendants of Abraham, because they share in the inheritance with Christ, to whom the promise to Abraham properly refers (Gal. 3.29). This means that the inheritance now belongs not just to Abraham's physical descendants but also to faithful non-Israelites, the gentiles (Eph. 3.6).

Finally, the concept of inheritance is eschatological. Although a present reality (1 Pet 3.7), it is more commonly viewed as something Christians will receive only in the heavenly realm beyond this world (1 Pet. 1.4). Thus, it is defined as "eternal life" or "the kingdom," which are to be possessed when the *Son of Man returns at the end of time (Matt 19.29; 25.34). Similarly, the letter to the Hebrews reinterprets the promise to Abraham to refer not to Canaan but to the heavenly city (Heb. 11.8–10). *Hope is the link between present and future (Titus 3.7), as is the sealing by the Holy Spirit that guarantees to Christians their promised inheritance until they can finally possess it (Eph. 1.13–14).

Inspiration and Inerrancy. With regard to the Bible, inspiration denotes the doctrine that the human authors and editors of canonical scripture were led or influenced by the Deity, with the result that their writings may be designated in some sense the *word of God. The theological corollary of inspiration, inerrancy, indicates that these writings have been thereby supernaturally protected from error, thus implying that scripture is entirely trustworthy and uniquely authoritative for a given community of faith. The categories of inspiration and inerrancy derive from traditional Christian theology, although analogous conclusions concerning their scriptures would be held by most Orthodox and Conservative Jews.

By far the most comprehensive of the two terms is inspiration, which is derived from a Latin word meaning "to breathe into or upon." More focused than general usage, in which a literary or artistic work or the like is said to be inspired if it is intellectually, emotionally, or volitionally moving, the theological term designates what for the community of faith would have been an objective reality: the sacred scriptures are nothing less than authentic communication from the Deity, or, as the First Vatican Council (1868–70) simply expressed it, "they have God as their author." In Christian theology, with its traditional trinitarian understanding of the one God as three persons (Father, Son, and Holy Spirit), it is usually the third person of the *Trinity who is specified as having inspired the scriptures.

The theological category of inerrancy is of less venerable vintage; the term does not appear either in Latin or in English before the nineteenth century, and modern Protestant *fundamentalists often employ it in a separative and polemical way. Inerrancy denotes the quality of errorlessness (hence, truthfulness) in all the scripture affirms. Related theological concepts such as *authority and infallibility also seek to define the utter dependability of the Bible as uniquely the word of God. Many contemporary theologians avoid the term inerrancy on the grounds that, on the one hand, too much is claimed by it (a focus on the total exclusion of mistakes rather than on the complete absence of deception, as the early church fathers emphasized), and, on the other hand, too little (typically, only the now nonexistent autographs, or original manuscripts, are deemed inerrant; all admit that the later copies contain errors).

Nonetheless, even if the term inerrant itself is of recent and controversial pedigree, the underlying concept of the complete truthfulness and dependability of all that scripture affirms has long been a part of both Jewish and Christian tradition. (Traditional Muslims would enthusiastically categorize the *Qur'ān with the same terms.) Those books that the rabbis categorized as "defiling the hands," and hence sacred scripture, were highly revered by the late first century CE, as *Josephus indicates: "We have given practical proof of our reverence for our own scriptures. For, although such long ages have now passed, no one has ventured either to add, or to remove, or to alter a syllable; and it is an instinct with every Jew, from the day of his birth, to regard them as the decrees of God, to abide by them, and, if need be, cheerfully to die for them" (Ag. Ap. 1.42).

The Jewish scriptures were of course sacred for Jesus and his followers, and gospel traditions present him as regarding them as humanly inalterable (Matt. 5.18) and inviolate (John 10.35). For Jesus and the New Testament writers the sacred books were "the scriptures" par excellence, and in the words of these scriptures the Holy Spirit of God spoke through human agency (Acts 4.25; cf. 1.16). Typically, words from the mouth of Yahweh found in the Hebrew Bible are labeled "scripture" in the New Testament (e.g., Rom. 9.17; Gal. 3.8), and even quotations not originally from the mouth of God are sometimes designated as such (Rom. 15.9–12; Heb. 1.5–13). Indeed, the Hebrew Bible as a whole is twice designated the "oracles of God" (Rom. 3.2; Heb 5.12), and in the classic New Testament text concerning God's inspiration of the Hebrew scriptures, 2 Timothy 3.14–17, Paul is pictured exhorting Timothy, his Jewish convert, to remember the "sacred writings" he has known since childhood, for "all scripture" (evidently a reference to all, or nearly all, of the books now included in the Hebrew *canon) is "inspired by God" (Grk. theopneustos, probably meaning "breathed out by God") and therefore "useful for both doctrinal instruction and ethical guidance." Similarly, the divine origin of the scripture is clearly emphasized in 2 Peter 1.21.

To be sure, the human origins of the scriptures were not altogether ignored. The personalities of the prophets Jeremiah and Ezekiel vividly shine through much of the literature attributed to them, and few readers of any age would confuse the writings of one with those of the other, even though they were contemporaries and often spoke about the same topics. The same could be said for the eighth-century BCE Judahite prophets Micah and Isaiah. Considerably later, probably in the early first century BCE, the writer of 2 Maccabees provided a memorable description of the human cost of authorship (2.24–32), including "sweat and loss of sleep," and he concluded his book as follows: "If it is well told and to the point, that is what I myself desired; if it is poorly done and mediocre, that was the best I could do. For just as it is harmful to drink wine alone, or, again, to drink water alone, while wine mixed with water is sweet and delicious and enhances one's enjoyment, so also the style of the story delights the ears of those who read the work" (15.38–39). As for the New Testament, a roundabout and not altogether complimentary attestation of the scriptural status of Paul's letters may be found in 2 Peter 3.15–16. Likewise Luke's own efforts at research are recalled in his preface to his gospel (Luke 1.1–4; cf. Acts 1.1–2). Indeed, apostolic authorship, whether actual or pseudonymous, of the New Testament writings served as a major criterion for later acceptance into the canon. Nevertheless, the relationship between the divine and human "authors" of scripture has never been easily delineated.

The subordination of the human author to the divine is clearly assumed in the New Testament (Acts 4.25; 2 Pet. 1.21). Not surprisingly, later Christian theological speculation attempted to refine the nature of this subordination, and the early church fathers utilized images for the human author such as the mouth, finger, lyre, minister, or deacon of God. Rabbinic Judaism also recognized the heavenly origin of scripture, especially the *Torah. In a discussion of interpretations of the harsh denunciation of the "high-handed" sinner of Numbers 15.30–31, the Babylonian Talmud observes: "This refers to him who maintains that the Torah is not from Heaven. And even if he asserts that the whole Torah is from Heaven, excepting a particular verse, which [he maintains] was not uttered by God but by Moses himself, he is included in 'because he has despised the word of the Lord' " (b. Sanh. 99a).

Already in the first century CE, the Hellenistic Jewish philosopher *Philo of Alexandria proposed what may be termed the "mantic theory" of the inspiration of the scriptures, in which the human author becomes possessed by God and loses consciousness of self, surrendering to the divine spirit and its communicatory powers. The second-century Christian apologist Athenagoras also subscribed to such a theory, as did the Montanists, most notably Tertullian (d. ca. 225). But this was a minority position, with both Hippolytus (ca. 170–236) and Origen (ca. 185–254) denying that the biblical writers lost their free will under the force of divine pressure. In the Middle Ages emphasis was usually given only to the divine origin of the Bible, with little interest given to its human writers, although Henry of Ghent (d. 1293) did assert that the human authors were true, if secondary, authors of the books of scripture, not merely organs or channels for the divine message.

But it was not until the Renaissance and Reformation that serious speculation as to the nature of biblical inspiration took place. One of the principal theories popular then was what may be termed the dictation theory, in which God communicated to the human writer the very words of scripture, the human contribution merely being the exact and conscious reception of the divine message. Other views included those of Sixtus of Siena (1520–69) that hypothetically a book of scripture could have been composed by purely human means, with the later approval of the church attesting to its inspiration; and Jacques Bonfrère (1573–1642), who suggested that some parts of the Bible were written only under the negative assistance of the Holy Spirit, which kept the writers from error but otherwise exerted no influence on them. The christological emphasis of Martin Luther (1483–1546) should probably be mentioned at this point; he adopted what may be termed an incarnational view of biblical inspiration, with the divinity and power of God embedded in scripture in the same way as it was in Christ's body. Luther's scorn for the letter of *James, which in his opinion did not preach Christ sufficiently, is well known: he termed it a "right strawy epistle." John Calvin (1509–64) returned to an emphasis on the divine origin of scripture, but he also stressed the concept of accommodation, God adapting the divine message to human capacity through words that accommodated their limited understanding. Post-Reformation Protestant theologians, however, tended to return to the scholasticism of the Middle Ages, describing the inspiration of the Bible as "verbal" (the very words are those chosen by God) and "plenary" (every word, even every letter of scripture is inspired). This view is akin to that of contemporary Protestant fundamentalists.

As a result of the Enlightenment, theologians have focused on issues of biblical authority; for example, whether the Bible, the product of ancient cultures, has any claim on modern humanity. Supernatural revelation was often denied in whole or in part, with such views gaining further support from the rise of modern biblical criticism in the nineteenth century (see Interpretation, History of, article on Modern Biblical Criticism). To be sure, there were exceptions such as millenarians and pietists, but for most the overarching question became and still remains whether and to what degree the Bible is inspired by God, not by what manner such inspiration took place. Today all but the most extreme Jewish and Christian fundamentalists recognize the complicated and heterogeneous origins of the Bible and that it contains statements that in any other literary work would be considered erroneous. Modern biblical criticism has immeasurably enriched our understanding of biblical backgrounds, customs, and mores, but it has inevitably raised other issues. Most modern believers acknowledge that in the end the issue of biblical inspiration is ultimately a mystery—truly a matter of faith.

Jewish Interpretation

The Earliest Commentaries. Although the process of interpretation may be traced within scripture itself (in the reinterpretation of earlier laws and oracles, and in the reuse of earlier narratives), for practical purposes the earliest phase of commentary on the Hebrew Bible extended from ca. 250 BCE to ca. 500 CE. Commentary was the primary medium of Jewish religious discourse in this period, and ideas, both new and old, were presented in the form of comments on the Bible. The commentaries were of several types.

The "rewritten Bible" texts. Into this category fall works such as Jubilees (see below), the Liber antiquitatum biblicarum, the Genesis Apocryphon, and the biblical sections of *Josephus's Antiquities of the Jews. These offer an interpretative retelling of the Bible in the interpreter's own words, and they mirror the basic form of the original. The paradigm of this type of commentary is already found within scripture, notably in the books of *Chronicles, which rework the history of the books of *Samuel and *Kings. Certain sections of the *apocalyptic writings (e.g., 1 Enoch 6–11 = Gen. 6–9) should also, perhaps, be included here, as well as the Temple Scroll from *Qumran, which codifies Temple law.

The Qumran pesharim. These are in true commentary form, in that they quote the original in full and attach to it comments introduced by such formulae as "the interpretation of the matter is" (Hebr. pēšer haddābār). The interpretation is mantological: interpreters see in the text of scripture cryptic allusions to events in their own time, and they decode it in the way they would decode a dream. The interpretation itself is presented in oracular style.

The commentaries of Philo. The commentaries on the Pentateuch by the Alexandrian Jewish scholar *Philo (ca. 15 BCE–50 CE) are, like the pesharim, in true commentary form, and consist of biblical lemma plus comment. They are philosophical in content and attempt, by extensive use of allegory, to read middle Platonism into the Bible. Unlike the rewritten Bible texts or the pesharim, Philonic commentary is argumentative (i.e., it presents its exegetical reasoning, not just its conclusions), and it offers multiple interpretations of the same verse.

The Targums. These Bible translations (which are sometimes very paraphrastic) were used to render the Hebrew lections simultaneously into *Aramaic in the *synagogue. Like the rewritten Bible texts, they mirror the form of the original, but in terms of content they are close to the midrashim (see below), and clearly emanate from a rabbinic milieu. (See Translations, article on Targums.)

The midrashim. These works, products of the rabbinic schools of Palestine in the Tannaitic (ca. 70–200 CE) and Amoraic periods (ca. 200–500 CE), constitute by far the largest corpus of early Jewish biblical commentary. In form they are true commentaries, proceeding by way of lemma plus comment. They are intensely argumentative, at pains to make clear their exegetical reasoning, and quote divergent, and often contradictory, opinions of various scholars. They contain both 'aggādâ (narrative/homiletic material) and hālākâ (legal material). Important texts belonging to this category are the Mekhilta of Rabbi Ishmael (on Exodus), Sifra (on Leviticus), Sifre (on Numbers and Deuteronomy), Genesis Rabba, and Pesiqta de Rab Kahana (on the readings for the festivals and special Sabbaths).

Classical Hermeneutics. Care must be taken in analyzing the hermeneutics of such a complex phenomenon as early Jewish biblical interpretation. Much of the theory, and indeed the practice, is not explicit, and this opens the door to guesswork and subjectivity. It is also important to distinguish between descriptions of the phenomenon from outside and from inside the tradition, since descriptions stemming from these two standpoints will not always coincide. In external description, one need not accept at face value any explicit hermeneutic statements the commentators happen to make, for what they say they are doing and what they actually do are not necessarily the same. In many cases it is clear, from an external standpoint, that the commentators are reading ideas into scripture: they are engaged in eisegesis rather than exegesis. The Jewish tradition of Bible interpretation oscillates between two contrary tendencies—one centrifugal, the other centripetal. In the centrifugal tendency, the tradition moves further and further from the text of scripture, and its links with scripture become increasingly tenuous. In the centripetal tendency, the centrifugal forces are checked and an attempt is made to reintegrate the tradition with scripture. The book of Jubilees is an early example of a centripetal text: it attempts to fuse with the biblical narrative extrabiblical traditions (e.g., legends about Noah) that had grown up in the preceding one hundred or more years, and so to halt the fragmentation of the tradition. In a similar manner, the rabbinic midrashim of the third century CE and later attempt to reintegrate *Mishnah with scripture (note especially Sifra). So, too, in the Middle Ages the Zohar checked the centrifugal movement of qabbalistic literature by reading qabbalistic ideas into scripture. From an external standpoint, eisegesis is a central feature of the tradition. From within the tradition, however, eisegesis is always presented as exegesis: in order to validate the tradition it is necessary to create the illusion that the tradition is already present in scripture, and has been discovered there through meditation.

A fruitful way to analyze early Jewish biblical hermeneutics is to use rabbinic midrash as a yardstick. Rabbinic midrash serves this purpose well because it is massively documented, its underlying worldview is accessible through the living tradition of the synagogue, and, of all the traditions, it is the most explicit as to its hermeneutical theory and practice.

Midrash can be seen as a game like chess, played to strict but complex rules: it has a field of play (the chessboard); aims and objectives (checkmating the king); forces to be deployed and strategies followed to achieve the aims and objectives (the chess pieces, their moves and set patterns of play).

Two axioms define the midrashic field of play. The first is that midrash is an activity performed on the Bible, which is regarded as a fixed, canonical text. For the rabbis, *prophecy has ceased and the *canon of scripture is closed. God no longer speaks directly to humankind; his will can be discovered only through the interpretation of scripture. The *scribe replaces the prophet as the central authority in Judaism. This is the simple, traditional view of the matter. In reality, however, the situation is rather more complicated. To solve the problem of authority and to preempt readings of scripture with which they could not agree, the rabbis were forced to elevate their interpretations to the same status as scripture itself: their interpretations became Oral Torah, and were traced back in principle to *Moses. In effect, the scholar too was inspired, though care was taken to distinguish his inspiration from that of the prophet. (See, however, b. B. Bat. 12a: "Since the destruction of the Temple, prophecy has been taken from the prophets and given to the sages"!) Moreover, in actual fact the rabbis did not confine midrash to scripture. There is an element in midrashic practice that simply represents the standard hermeneutics of the Greco-Roman world, and parallels to it can easily be found in Alexandrian Greek scholarship. To a certain extent, the rabbis would have interpreted any text in the way they interpret scripture. In fact, in the Gemara they apply midrashic methods to the exegesis of the Mishnah.

The second axiom is that scripture is divine speech: it has its origin in the mind of God. The human element in scripture is minimal. The prophet was invaded by a divine power—the "holy spirit" or "spirit of prophecy"—that neutralized human imperfections. "Moses fulfilled the function of a scribe receiving dictation, and he wrote the whole Torah, its histories, its narratives, and its commandments, and that is why he is called a 'copyist' [Deut. 33.21]" (Maimonides, Commentary on Mishnah Sanhedrin, Ḥeleq; cf. b. B. Bat. 15a).

From this axiom a number of inferences were deemed to flow:

1. Scripture is inerrant: it can contain no errors of fact. Errors can be only apparent, not real.

2. Scripture is coherent: each part agrees with all the other parts. Scripture forms a harmonious, interlocking text. Contradictions can be only apparent, not real.

3. Scripture is unalterable. At one level, this means that it is inviolable: it forms a closed text, which should not be changed or rewritten in any way. Interpretation must be clearly distinguished from the actual text of scripture, not integrated with it. Elaborate techniques, culminating in the full-blown *Masorah of the early Middle Ages, were devised to ensure the exact transmission of the received text of the *Torah. At another level, the unalterability of scripture means that it remains eternally relevant: since it originated in the mind of God it can never become obsolescent or be superseded. The rabbis did not admit a doctrine of abrogation. The contrast with Islam is instructive. Abrogation in Islam originally referred to the abrogation of both Judaism and Christianity by the superior revelation brought by Muhammad, the "seal" of the prophets. But it was also used by Islamic lawyers as a way of reconciling conflicts within the *Qurʾān and hadith: early laws are sometimes said to have been abrogated by laws promulgated later by the prophet. The rabbis could have used such a strategy to resolve the contradictions within scripture, but they never did. Perhaps they shied away from implying that God contradicted himself.

4. Scripture is "all music and no noise." Every minute detail is significant—even whether a word is spelled fully or defectively. Mountains of religious law can be deduced even from the "crowns" added to the letters as decorative embellishment. The language of scripture does not contain any redundancy. Repetitions are regularly nuanced to give a slightly different sense.

5. Scripture is polyvalent: it does not have one, fixed, original meaning but, rather, can mean many things at once. Even when two contradictory conclusions are drawn from it, both can be seen as "words of the living God." Although interpreters have great freedom before the text, they are not totally free: they cannot simply deduce what they like from scripture. There is a tendency to stress the primacy of the literal meaning: "no verse can ever lose its plain sense (pĕšaṭ)" (b. Šabb. 63a; Sanh. 34a). With few exceptions, the cantillation and vocalization of the biblical text reflect pĕšaṭ. Latent meanings must be congruent with the pĕšaṭ. The influential dictum that "Torah speaks according to human language" (b. Ber. 31b) implies that Torah communicates like ordinary speech, and should be interpreted like ordinary speech. Halaka (religious law) also exercised a restraining hand on midrash: it was forbidden to disclose aspects of Torah that did not accord with halaka. But the ultimate restraint was the power of tradition. Correct interpretation could be given only by the *rabbis—by scholars who had studied in the right schools, and who were recipients of a tradition going back through the ages to Moses himself.

The aims of the "game" of midrash can, from an internal standpoint, be defined as drawing out the meaning of scripture and applying it to the heart and life of the Jew. This involves resolving the obscurities and contradictions of scripture, displaying its coherence, and bringing it to bear on everyday life. From an external standpoint, the aims can be seen largely in terms of validating tradition from scripture, of finding ways of attaching contemporary custom and belief to the sacred text.

The moves in the "game" of midrash are in part laid down in "rulebooks." From an early date, the rabbis drew up lists of hermeneutical norms (middôt) by which the Torah is to be interpreted. Three of these lists were particularly influential—The Seven Middot of Hillel (t. Sanh. 7.11; ʾAbot R. Nat. A 37; Sipra, Introduction); the Thirteen Middot of Rabbi Ishmael (Sipra, Introduction; Mek. R. Shimʿon ben Yoḥai to Exod. 21.1); and the Thirty-Two Middot of Rabbi Eliezer ben Yose ha-Gelili (Mishnat R. Eliezer I-II; Midr. ha-Gadol Gen., Introduction). The introduction to Eliezer's list categorically states that its norms are to be employed in the exegesis of aggada (i.e., nonlegal texts in the Torah). The lists of Hillel and Ishmael, by contrast, have always been regarded as applying to the exegesis of halaka (i.e., legal texts), though not exclusively. This distinction should not be pressed too far, for some of Eliezer's norms are employed in the interpretation of halaka. There is, however, a discernible reluctance to use some of the more fanciful aggadic techniques, such as gĕmaṭriâ (computation of the numerical values of words or phrases) and nôṭārîqôn (treating biblical words as acronyms) in legal argument. Wherever possible the simple sense (pĕšaṭ) of a law prevailed.

The dates of these lists are very uncertain, for their attributions cannot be taken at face value. The Seven Middot of Hillel—almost certainly the earliest of the three lists—illustrates the nature of the rabbinic exegetical norms:

1. Qal wāḥōmer, inference from a less important case [qal] to a more important one [ḥōmer]: For example, if the perpetual offering, neglect of which is not punished by cutting off, overrides the *Sabbath, then the *Passover offering, neglect of which is punished by cutting off, will also override the Sabbath (b. Pes. 66a).

2. Gĕzērâ šāwâ, inference based on the presence in two different laws of a common term: For example, the expression "in its appointed time" is used in connection with both the Passover (Num. 9.2) and the perpetual offering (Num. 28.2). Since the expression "in its appointed time" used of the perpetual offering involves overriding the Sabbath, so the same term when used of Passover must equally involve overriding the Sabbath (b. Pesaḥ. 66a).

3. Binyan ʾāb mikkātûb ʾeḥād ûbinyan ʾāb miššĕnê

kĕtûbîm, construction of a category (literally, a "father") on the basis of one text, and construction of a category on the basis of two texts: For example, if a master intentionally knocks out a slave's tooth (Exod. 21.27), or blinds him in one eye (Exod. 21.26), the slave goes free in compensation. "Tooth" and "eye" are cited by scripture merely as examples. Their common features are that they are chief organs, they are visible, and loss of them would constitute a permanent defect. Therefore, if a master injures the slave in any of his principal organs, which are visible and loss of which would cause a permanent defect, the slave is entitled to go free (Mek. R. Ishmael, Nez. 9).

4. Kĕlāl ûpĕrāṭ, when a general term (kĕlāl) is followed by a specific term (pĕrāṭ), the general includes only what is contained in the specific: For example, in Leviticus 1.2, "When any of you bring an offering of beasts to the Lord, even of the herd and of the flock. . . ," "beasts" (the kĕlāl) on its own could include "wild beasts," but the addition of "herd" and "flock" (the pĕrāṭ) limits sacrifice to domestic animals (b. Zebaḥ. 34a).

5. Pĕrāṭ ûkĕlāl, when a specific term is followed by a general term, the general adds to the specific, and everything contained in the general term is included: For example, Exodus 22.10 (Hebr. 22.9), "If a man deliver to his neighbor an ass, or an ox, or a sheep (the pĕrāṭ), or any beast (the kĕlāl) . . ." The bailee is liable for any animal falling within the general category of "beast," not just for the specific animals mentioned (Mek. R. Ishmael, Nez. 16).

6. Kayôṣē' bô bĕmāqôm 'aḥēr, the same interpretation applies in another place: For example, consecration of the firstborn to God (Deut. 15.19) does not make them God's, since they already belong to him (Exod. 13.2). Rather, this act was instituted so that one can receive a reward for obeying a divine commandment. The same interpretation applies to kindling the fire on the altar (Lev. 6.5). This act cannot do anything for God, since "Lebanon would not provide fuel enough, nor are its animals enough for a burnt offering" to God (Isa. 40.16). Rather, it gives a person the opportunity to receive a reward for fulfilling a commandment (Mek. R. Ishmael, Pisḥa 16).

7. Dābār hallāmēd mē'inyānô, the meaning of a statement may be determined from its context: For example, "You shall not steal" in Exodus 20.15 must denote a capital offense, since the two preceding offenses in the same verse (murder and adultery) are capital offenses. It denotes, therefore, theft of persons (kidnapping). In Leviticus 19.11, however, "You shall not steal" must refer to theft of property, since the context there is concerned with property (b. Sanh. 86a).

As a description of the exegetical techniques employed in midrash, these lists of middôt have drawbacks: they are by no means exhaustive, and they do not include norms such as heqqēš (analogy) and sĕmûkîm (inference based on juxtaposition of verses). Sherira Gaon (tenth–eleventh centuries CE), in his famous Epistle, gives a list of exegetical norms (designated 'iqqārîn rather than middôt), many of which are not found in any of our three lists. Even if all the norms articulated in rabbinic literature were gathered together, they would not necessarily give a total account of the methods of the daršānîm. The rabbinic norms are prescriptive as well as descriptive: they are as much concerned with what should happen in midrash as with what actually does happen. Some of them are largely academic, since examples in actual midrashic texts can be found only with difficulty. Modern analysis has detected exegetical processes at work in midrash that are nowhere formally acknowledged in rabbinic hermeneutical theory. The lists of norms are useful, but they should be supplemented by direct analysis of the midrashic texts themselves. Studying the rulebooks is no substitute for watching the game actually played.

Broadly speaking, rabbinic hermeneutics appear to hold good for the early nonrabbinic Bible commentaries as well. Many of the exegetical techniques of midrash certainly seem to apply. These are so numerous and so varied that it would be surprising if the methods of the nonrabbinic exegetes could not be paralleled from somewhere in rabbinic midrash. At two points, however, differences of emphasis may be detected. The polyvalent character of scripture is stressed less in the nonrabbinic texts: they tend to offer a unitary reading of scripture. Philo comes closest to the rabbinic position by giving a variety of interpretations of a single verse. Second, in some cases the nonrabbinic commentaries appear less committed than the rabbis to the principle of the unalterability of scripture. The way in which Jubilees and the Temple Scroll rewrite the Bible in classical Hebrew would probably have been frowned upon by the rabbis. This practice raises the suspicion that a new Torah, designed to supersede the old, is being promulgated. In general, however, the aim appears not to have been to supersede the canonical text, but rather to add to it. Jubilees claims to be of divine origin—a second Torah that supplements the first (Jubilees 6.2). The book known as 2 *Esdras also implies that it is a secret book of Moses, worthy of canonical status (14.5–6). These assertions differ perhaps in degree, but hardly in kind, from the rabbis' claim that their traditions are oral Torah, or from Pesher Habakkuk's and Philo's statements that their comments on scripture are inspired (1QpHab 2.8–10; Philo, On the Cherubim 27).

Medieval Developments. The aims and basic methods of rabbinic biblical interpretation as defined in the Talmudic period persisted in Judaism down to modern times. The continuity of the tradition is seen in Rashi (1045–1105), the most influential of all the medieval Jewish commentators. Living in a rather hostile Christian environment in northern France at the time of the First Crusade, Rashi had little incentive to innovate. Although he has his own approach that tends to stress the plain sense (pĕšaṭ) of scripture, and to introduce only "sober" dĕraš, the general intention of his work is to digest and conserve the tradition. The first really radical break with tradition comes with Baruch Spinoza (1632–1677), who, notably in his Tractatus Theologico-Politicus, adumbrates a critical, historical approach to the Bible.

Despite the broad continuity down to the time of Spinoza, significant developments occurred in a number of areas.

Philology. Karaism, founded at Baghdad ca. 765 by Anan ben David, who rejected rabbinic tradition and turned back afresh to scripture, stimulated an interest among Rabbanite scholars in philology. Especially in Spain, Jewish philologians, such as Jonah ibn Janāh (first half of eleventh century), began to clarify the grammar of classical Hebrew by using contemporary Arabic linguistic theory; for example, they established once and for all the triliteral nature of the Hebrew verb. The new philology was championed by the Spanish scholar Abraham ibn Ezra (1089–1164). In the Introduction to his Commentary on the Pentateuch, he outlines five ways to approach the Bible—the Geonic, the Karaite, the Christian, the midrashic, and the philological—and makes clear his preference for the philological: "The fifth way is the one upon which I will base my commentary. Before God, whom alone I fear, it is in my view the right way. I will defer to no one when it comes to interpreting the Torah, but, to my utmost ability, will seek out the grammar of every word and then do my best to explain it." However, the most influential of the grammatical commentators was the French scholar David Kimḥi (ca. 1160–1235). His lucid grammatical analyses, much consulted by Christian scholars at the time of the Renaissance and Reformation, have sometimes a curiously modern ring; note, for example, his comments at Genesis 10.9 on the use of the word "God" to express the superlative in classical Hebrew.

Philosophy. Philosophical interpretation of scripture, which had remained largely dormant in mainstream Judaism since Philo, reemerged powerfully in the Middle Ages. Here, too, Karaism provided the initial stimulus. Through the influence of Saadiah Gaon (882–942), the great opponent of Karaism, the leading ideas of Arabic scholastic theology (Qalām) were made acceptable to rabbinic thought. Philosophical interpretation involved reading the Bible allegorically from a certain philosophical standpoint; thus, Maimonides interprets Ezekiel's vision of the chariot (Ezek. 1) as an allegorical account of his own Neoplatonic form of Aristotelianism (Guide of the Perplexed 3.1–7). The preexisting philosophical system, whatever it was, functioned as a hermeneutic key to unlock scripture.

Mysticism. The rise of the mystical system of qabbalistic literature also powerfully affected biblical interpretation. The Zohar, the most influential mystical commentary, was compiled by Moses de Leon in Spain at the end of the thirteenth century. In formal terms, mystical commentary is similar to philosophical commentary: a preexistent system of ideas is used as a hermeneutic key to determine the sense of scripture, and elements of that system (e.g., the qabbalistic doctrine of the Sefirot: see Zohar 2. 42b–43a) are read into scripture using allegorical methods.

Hermeneutic theory in the Middle Ages was much concerned with identifying the various types of approach to scripture. The most famous classification, known by the mnemonic "PaRDeS," probably goes back to Moses de Leon: Pĕšăṭ = literal interpretation; Remez = allegorical interpretation; Dĕraš = homiletic interpretation; Sôd = mystical interpretation. The Spanish scholar Bahya ben Asher (late thirteenth century) produced a slightly different fourfold classification: literal interpretation (pĕšaṭ); homiletic (midrāš); rational, i.e., philosophical (sekel); and mystical (called "the way of the Lord" = Qabbalah).

In general, the various approaches to scripture were seen not as exclusive or contradictory but as complementary; the polyvalency of scripture continued to be stressed. There was a tendency, however, to rank them in hierarchical order, depending on the interpreter's standpoint. Even Maimonides, who cautioned against trying to separate the "kernel" from the "husk" in scripture (Commentary on Mishnah Sanhedrin, Ḥeleq), acknowledged that there was an "apparent" and a "latent" sense in scripture (Guide of the Perplexed, Introduction). The Zohar (3.152a) uses the analogy of the human body to illustrate the relationship between the various levels of meaning in scripture. Foolish people look only at the tales of the Torah which are its outer garments; those who are wiser look at the commandments, which are the body of the Torah (cf. the description of the commandments as gûfê tôrâ [literally,"bodies of the Torah"] in m. Ḥag. 1.8). But the true sages look only at the inner mystical sense of the Torah, the soul of the Torah. And lest it should be supposed that the meaning of divine speech could ever be exhausted, the Zohar concludes: "and in the world to come they [the mystics] are destined to look at the soul of the soul of the Torah." PHILIP S. ALEXANDER

Early Christian Interpretation

The Bible of the earliest Christians was identical with the Hebrew scriptures of the Jewish communities. When Jesus and the writers of the apostolic period speak of "scripture(s)," they mean the *canon of Torah, Prophets, and Writings that Jews regarded as divinely inspired, that is, written under the immediate dictate or influence of God. *Inspiration was also claimed for the Greek translation of the "Seventy" (*Septuagint [LXX]), which was endorsed by Alexandrian Jewish authorities. In Christian eyes, the legend of the Septuagint's miraculous origin, first told in the Letter of Aristeas (late second century BCE), then elaborated by *Philo, and further embellished by Christian authors such as Justin Martyr, Irenaeus of Lyons, Tertullian, and Augustine, even rendered the Septuagint superior to the Hebrew original.

Jewish interpretation of the Hellenistic and Roman periods took three forms. Midrashic exegesis as practiced by the rabbis searched the holy text for clues to authoritative rules for living (hălākâ) or to a broadly edifying meaning in the present (ʾaggādâ), guided by tradition. The hermeneutical center was *Torah, the Law of God. Second, Jewish scholars in the Greek-speaking diaspora, exemplified by Philo, tried to harmonize the texts with the truths of Platonic or *Stoic natural philosophy and ethics. Finally, the *Essene sectarians at *Qumran, relying on the authority of their "Teacher of Righteousness," read the biblical texts as divine oracles predicting their own end-time existence in the post-Maccabean period; here, the hermeneutical center was moving away from Torah to the prophetic literature. (See also article on Jewish Interpretation above.)

Traces of all three forms can be found in the earliest Christian literature. The *synoptic Gospels portray *Jesus as a rabbinical teacher who routinely answered questions about the *Law (Mark 10.1–12, 17–31; 12.13–34; Luke 12.13–15; etc.). *Paul used both halakhic and aggadic modes in interpreting biblical texts (e.g., Rom. 10.6–8; 2 Cor. 13.1; Gal. 3.15–18), even the seven rules attributed to Rabbi Hillel (Rom. 4.1–12; 5.15–17; 13.8–10; etc.). The letter to the *Hebrews, in its vision of the Temple cult as a shadow of the heavenly reality, seems to fuse the eschatology of an earlier generation with a Platonic worldview akin to Philo (cf. Heb. 8.5; 9.23–28). Most important, the central Christian affirmation of Jesus of Nazareth as being the promised *Messiah and the hermeneutics of promise and fulfillment share the tendency to shift the hermeneutical center from the Law to the Prophets. The *prophets, including *Moses, *David, and other prophetic voices in the scriptures, predicted what was to happen "in these last days" (Heb. 1.2) and thus opened up the *apocalyptic meaning of the present in the context of the overarching plan of God, for example, "Today this scripture has been fulfilled in your hearing" (Luke 4.21; cf. Isa. 61.1). The proof from prophecy very quickly became a major tool of Christian missionaries. It appealed to Jewish hearers loyal to their divine scriptures as well as to non-Jews impressed by the antiquity of such writings. Although Christians might have discarded the Jewish scriptures and started with the experience of new revelation in the person of Jesus, they retained them as a valuable tool for Christian apologetics, which, understood as divine oracles, not only appealed to potential converts but also gave Christians themselves the interpretive categories for understanding the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus the Christ (1 Cor. 15.1–3; Luke 24.25–27; Acts 2.22–36); see Quotations of the Old Testament in the New Testament.

It was Paul who spelled out most powerfully the theological basis of this unified vision of God's purpose in history and the meaning of Christian practices such as *baptism and the common *meal. The old *covenant of the Law had been crowned by the revelation of the new covenant predicted by the prophets (Rom. 10.4; 1 Cor. 11.25; 2 Cor. 3.6; cf. Jer. 31.1). But this fulfillment for Paul was not only linked to the story of Jesus and the Christian present; it also included the *second coming (1 Thess. 4–5). Beyond a limited store of messianic passages that had governed the formation of the earliest Christian traditions about Jesus, Paul identified further predictions and anticipations of the new era in the scriptures. He also suggested the procedures for their apocalyptic interpretation through which later generations would continue to understand biblical passages as applicable to their own situation.

Explaining the experience of Israel as a warning to Christians of his own generation, Paul used the language of "type" or "typical" (1 Cor. 10.6, 11 [NRSV: "example"]), equating it with the "spiritual" understanding of those who have the Holy Spirit (Rom. 8.9, 23; 1 Cor. 2.13–15; 7.40). This kind of *typology, which was not without Jewish antecedents, gained an immense popularity in second-century Christian interpretation. The Greek term "antitype" for Christian baptism as the counterpart of *Noah's rescue already appears in 1 Peter 3.21 (NRSV: "prefigured"). The apostolic fathers, especially the letter of Barnabas (6.11; 7.3, 7, 10, 11; etc.), show the rapid development of the concept. 1 Clement 25 even calls on an image of classical mythology, the phoenix, as a type of Christ's *resurrection. In the middle of the second century CE, the writings of Justin Martyr reveal the wide scope of possible types: Justin not only defended the traditional Christian use of messianic passages such as Genesis 49.10–12; Isaiah 7.14; 9.6; 11.1–3; 53; Psalms 2.7; 110.4 (Apology 32–38); he also found "types," for example, of the cross, in almost every piece of wood mentioned in the Jewish scriptures (Dialogue with Trypho the Jew 86). The Easter Homily by Melito of Sardis (late second century CE) demonstrates the same wealth of imagination when the author reads the *Exodus traditions as types of Christ's death and resurrection. It is likely that second-century Christians had testimonia, collections that grouped together for convenience messianic predictions or other texts yielding "types." Cyprian's treatise Ad Quirinum provides an example; its second part contains a list of "stone" testimonies from the Jewish scriptures that are interpreted as types of Christ (cf. 1 Cor. 10.4), as well as a collection of passages that mention mountain, *lamb, or bridegroom. Typological traditions also inform the earliest representations of Christian *art, especially the funerary paintings and monuments of the catacombs. The pictures frequently can be interpreted as types of salvation using biblical figures such as Noah in the ark, *Daniel between the lions, *Susanna rescued from the elders, *Jonah saved from the fish, or New Testament stories such as the raising of Lazarus and healing *miracles as pointers to the Christian hope beyond the grave.

Paul also introduced the term "allegory" into the vocabulary of Christian exegesis. Galatians 4.21–26 refers to the story of *Sarah and *Hagar (Gen. 16) with the claim that it has to be understood "allegorically" as speaking of two covenants. The interpretation of an authoritative text as having a deeper meaning (hyponoia) than what its words seem to suggest was an old practice among Greeks in the appropriation of Homer and the early poets. The Homeric Allegories of Pseudo-Heraclitus were probably written by a contemporary of Paul. Allegory as a writer's device, an "extended metaphor" in Quintilian's definition (Instit. Rhetor. 9.2.46), appeared with such stories as "Heracles at the crossroads" by Prodikos the Sophist (fourth century BCE). The allegorical interpretation of Homer was the hallmark of Stoic scholarship and later dominated Jewish and Christian interpretation at Alexandria. Philo's main interpretation of the Torah was entitled "Allegories of the Law"; like other allegorizers, Philo found the key to deeper meanings in etymological phenomena, numbers, and unusual terms.

Paul's use of the technical term allēgoroumena in Galatians 4.24 does not clearly distinguish allegory from typology. Sarah and Hagar function here as types the same way as the *wilderness generation in 1 Corinthians 10. Hellenistic allegorization, however, was deliberately employed by other Christian writers. The author of *Hebrews interprets the key texts about the role of the high priest as speaking of Jesus Christ (Heb. 5–7). The letter of Barnabas declares the entire cultic law of Judaism superseded and moralizes all its precepts. It seems that *gnostic teachers developed the apologetic potential of allegory to the fullest extent. Christian gnosis such as that represented by Clement of Alexandria in the early third century freely used the term allēgoria for exegetical endeavors that included extensive reinterpretation of biblical texts as teaching general and timeless truths.

Origen of Alexandria (ca. 185–254), the most prolific exegete of the early church, gave Christian allegory its theoretical foundation. In Book 4 of his treatise On First Principles, he claimed total inspiration by divine providence not only for the canonical scriptures themselves but even for their textual transmission with all its variants and scribal errors. Passages that present "stumbling blocks" in content and wording alert the reader that a spiritual, not a literal meaning must be sought in the holy texts. An "inspired" text requires "spiritual" interpretation that leads the soul upward (Grk. anagōgē) from the realm of the flesh to that of the Spirit. Origen assumed that much of the biblical revelation concerned the fate of souls, their fallen condition, and their redemption. Thus, in his commentaries on the Jewish scriptures, he allegorized the story of Israel as speaking of the journey of the soul, which, leaving the sensual world of "Egypt," seeks the *Promised Land of blessedness. The teachings of Jesus and the apostles had the same goal: they pointed, directly or allegorically, to the *hope by which Christians live.

The wide use of allegory among gnostics, however, raised early doubts about the procedure. Marcion of Pontus, who founded a successful counterchurch in the middle of the second century CE, rejected the Jewish scriptures as the revelation of an "alien" God and based his thought on a revised Paul and a purged gospel of *Luke. Such interpretation by textual revision was not uncommon; Tatian the Syrian applied it in his Diatessaron, an attempt to merge the four separate gospel accounts into one. To curb gnostic "misuses" of the Bible, church writers appealed to three authorities for its proper understanding: an approved canon of the "Old" Testament together with a "New" that assembled writings believed to be of apostolic origin; the "Rule of Faith," a creedal summary of accepted teachings; and the episcopal office, which was expected to decide among competing claims to authoritative exegesis. "Apostolicity" was invoked by Irenaeus and Tertullian as a central criterion against Marcion's reduced canon, a docetic Christology, or gnostic cosmological speculations. Both accused their opponents of arbitrary interpretation and displayed their strong disapproval of unchecked gnostic allegory.

They also shared a concern to apply the apostolic norm to the expansion of the Christian canon through apocrypha. Such writings were not only part of the growing gnostic literature but were also produced and read by catholic Christians. Apocryphal gospels filled in the blanks about Jesus' family and childhood, the forty days after his resurrection, and his journey into hell and heaven (see Descent into Hell). Apocryphal acts interpreted the witness of the apostles as supporting ascetic ideals, especially virginity; in this way they perpetuated the strong accent on moral exhortation that was at the heart of the biblical interpretation of the apostolic fathers (1 and 2 Clement; Didache; Ignatius; Barnabas; Shepherd of Hermas). The earliest canon list of New Testament books, the Canon Muratori (ca. 200 CE), already rejects a large number of apocrypha, but despite constant attempts at curbing the genre, apocryphal books such as the Protevangelium of James, the Acts of Pilate, the Gospel of Bartholomew, and the Apocalypses of Peter and Paul influenced biblical interpretation for centuries to come. (See also Apocrypha, article on Christian Apocrypha.)

During the first two centuries, Christian biblical interpretation was guided by practical concerns: the needs of missionary preaching, the instruction of new converts, apologetics directed at non-Christians, and polemics against "heretical" teachings. In the third and fourth centuries it came to be dominated by a conflict of "schools" analogous to the rivalry of philosophical schools in the Hellenistic world. The conflict clarified some basic options in expounding canonical scriptures in a Christian framework. An ancient but unreliable tradition claimed that Alexandria had a Christian catechetical school with a succession of famous teachers, beginning with Pantaenus in the late second century, Clement of Alexandria, and Origen. Reports by Gregory the Wonderworker, Pamphilus of Caesarea, and Eusebius suggest that Origen taught a curriculum of higher Christian studies that included classical disciplines such as grammar, Greek literature, and philosophy as a basis and the study of biblical texts as the crown. *Textual criticism was as much part of this endeavor as literary analysis and spiritual interpretation. Through Jewish converts, Origen was also aware of the exegetical traditions of rabbinic Judaism and was able to draw on them.

The Alexandrian school of the fourth century carried on the interpretive methods of Origen, including the use of allegory. Major theologians, such as Athanasius, Eusebius, Apollinaris, the Cappadocian fathers, and Cyril of Alexandria, wrote interpretations of biblical books for a broad educated public in the spirit of Origen's anagogical dynamics: scripture instructs the spiritual quest of the soul for an ascent to God who, through Christ the eternal *Logos, has revealed this "way" in the holy writings. Gregory of Nyssa's Life of Moses presents a reading of the Exodus story in two parts, first recounting the details in their historical sequence and then opening up their spiritual meaning as a description of the soul's journey to God in its various stages. Didymus the Blind (d. 398 CE) expounded numerous books of the Bible in a similar way. Alexandrian hermeneutics shows a keen interest in philological detail. The precise wording of a biblical passage as well as its stylistic peculiarities was of utmost importance because the inspired words themselves contained the key to their divinely intended meaning. For these scholars, allegorization was a science, not an arbitrary flight of fancy.

This understanding of Christian allegory became the polemical target of Alexandria's rival, the school of Antioch, in the fourth century. *Antioch, important for earliest Christian history (Acts 11.26), could boast of a long tradition of Hellenistic scholarship. The emphasis seems to have been on the rhetorical arts; Aristotelian and Jewish influences were important. We hear of Christian teachers in Antioch from the late third century onward: Malchion; Lucian, whose recension of the Greek Bible acquired something of a normative status; Dorotheus; Eustathius, and especially Diodore of Tarsus (d. ca. 390 CE), whose ascetic community became the seedbed of the distinctive Antiochian tradition of biblical exegesis. Diodore taught a generation of great scholars, among them Theodore of Mopsuestia, John Chrysostom, and Theodoret of Cyrrhus.

Through the association of Antiochian teachers with the names of heretics such as Arius and Nestorius, many of the works of the school have perished. From the remnants we can infer a sober appreciation of the Bible as a valuable historical document in addition to its spiritual meaning. The Antiochian exegetes took note of the times and circumstances of a particular biblical book. Diodore, for example, tried to rearrange the biblical *Psalms according to their true historical sequence, which he gleaned from internal and external clues, especially the titles. Theodore considered only four Psalms as messianic (Pss. 2; 8; 45; 110) and understood the *Song of Solomon as a love poem composed by *Solomon for the Queen of *Sheba. This did not exclude a divinely intended accommodation of the texts to later times or the need to search for a spiritual sense, which the Antiochians called theōria. But their respect for the historical setting nourished a deep-seated distrust of Alexandrian allegorism. Diodore wrote a (lost) treatise "On the Difference Between Theōria and Allēgoria," and Theodore deplored the dissolution of historical reality at the hand of Alexandrian exegetes, especially in the Genesis account of *creation and *fall, on which he thought the entire Christian message of sin, salvation, and human responsibility depended.

While suspicion of Antiochian theologians remained high during the christological struggles of the fifth and sixth centuries, their moral and ascetic fervor continued to be influential, thanks to the universal reception of the work of John Chrysostom. Chrysostom's sermons on biblical books were avidly copied and were known in the West through Latin translations, the earliest of which probably go back to his lifetime. The school itself found refuge first at Ephraem's school in Edessa, where it was represented by Syrian teachers such as Ibas and Narsai the Great, and later even farther East at Nisibis between the Euphrates and Tigris, where eminent scholars such as Babi the Great and Isho'dad of Merv upheld the great tradition through the end of the patristic period.

The Western church did not participate directly in the war of the schools. Some of its great theologians, such as Ambrose of Milan, Hilary of Poitiers, and Jerome, studied under, or drew on, scholars of both traditions for their moral and spiritual interpretations but did not take sides: Greek learning in any form was still greatly admired. Cassiodorus's list of hermeneutical textbooks for the use of students in the early sixth century includes "Alexandrian" works such as Hilary's Treatise of Mysteries and Eucherius of Lyon's Varieties of Spiritual Understanding, as well as "Antiochian" handbooks such as those of Hadrian and Junilius Africanus. There can be no question, however, that the influence of Origen and his program of spiritual exegesis was central in giving direction to Western biblical interpretation. Translations by Jerome's erstwhile friend Rufinus toned down offensive features of Origen's On First Principles and several of his commentaries, and the contacts with Alexandrian exegetes were never interrupted.

The indigenous Latin tradition, especially in North Africa, reflected an emphasis on catechetical instruction and apologetics, as the writings of Tertullian demonstrate. A rich store of typological exegesis, inherited from the church of the second century, seems to have served these interests; Cyprian's biblicism drew its substance from it. Western exegesis also remained more traditional in its apocalyptic tendencies. While the expectation of an imminent end met with heavy criticism in the East after the Montanist crisis of the late second century, and the book of *Revelation was still of doubtful canonicity to Eusebius at the beginning of the fourth century because of its chiliasm, apocalyptic expectations and millennial themes remained popular in the West. At the time when Greek was still the language of the Christian community in Rome, Hippolytus (early third century) wrote on the prophet Daniel and on the *Antichrist against an upsurge of apocalyptic fervor in response to the persecutions. The first Latin exegesis of the book of Revelation was written in the early fourth century by Victorinus of Pettau in Dalmatia; it is known to us through Jerome's revision, stripped of its pronounced chiliasm.

The late fourth century saw the emergence of an independent mind among Latin exegetes in Tyconius the Donatist. His Book of Rules did not follow Origen's allegorical principles but gathered clues from a rational analysis of biblical language to separate fulfilled messianic prophecies from the divinely intended message of the texts for the church of his day. Tyconius was guided by a vision of history that included the beginnings, the story of Israel, Christ, and the church in one great redemptive movement, understood in terms of the final victory of good over evil. The fragments of his commentary on the book of Revelation show that, while he interpreted its apocalyptic prophecy as applicable to any age, he retained a sophisticated imminent expectation of the eschatological exodus of the true church (the Donatist) from the false.

Another feature of the Western development was a rise of interest in the Pauline letters at a time when such interest was relatively low in the East. We know of five major efforts between 365 and 410 in the West at interpreting the letter to the *Romans: those of Marius Victorinus, the so-called Ambrosiaster, the Budapest Anonymous, Pelagius, and Augustine, who wrote only two fragments on Romans, but the importance of Paul for the formation of his mature theology is amply documented. By his own admission, Augustine was indebted to Tyconius in formulating his exegetical principles. He also shared the Alexandrian emphasis on the spiritual sense, even though he tended to replace the terminology of allegorization with that of "figuration." According to Augustine, scripture speaks not only of promise and fulfillment in the person of Jesus but contains literally or figuratively the answer to all basic questions of humanity. In God's providence, it is given as a means to incite believers to the double love of God and neighbor, which is the goal of the soul's journey. Its human language with all its ambiguities requires careful work by the interpreter. Augustine's plea for competence in biblical languages and the liberal arts, especially rhetoric and logic, became the charter of early medieval monastic education in the West. His exegetical writings, circulating in numerous manuscripts, constituted one of the main patristic authorities for exegetes down to the Reformation. They stressed the priority of the spiritual goal of reading scripture without discouraging the investigation of the plain sense of its words. The medieval theory of a fourfold sense—literal, allegorical, tropological (moral), and anagogical—did not originate with Augustine, however. The first writer to mention it was John Cassian in the fifth century (Conferences 14.8), who used the four biblical meanings of *Jerusalem as an illustration: the actual city, the church, the human soul, and the heavenly city, our final home.

The literary forms of biblical interpretation during the early centuries show a bewildering variety. At first, biblical interpretation was a function of the missionary proclamation by *apostles and *evangelists, the instruction of converts by teachers and *elders, and the itinerant ministry of *prophets. The expansion of Christianity beyond its original Jewish context brought with it the need for apologetics and polemics and moved scriptural interpretation quite naturally into the writing of the more literate members of the church, who could serve as advocates and apologists for the movement. The basic task of interpreting scripture within the Christian congregations, however, was not so much a matter of a developing Christian literature but of the living voice of *bishop, elder, and teacher. The exegetical writings of Hippolytus consist of homiletical reflections on biblical texts, often fragmentary and incomplete, as they would relate to the life of his church members. They were not biblical commentaries. On the contrary, the bishop denounced the genre of "commentary" as an invention of the pagan schools and a heretical practice.

Literary attempts at a coherent interpretation of entire canonical books in a Christian vein were first made by Christian gnostics who took the case for their esoteric theological systems to a literate non-Christian audience through detailed analysis of authoritative texts, among which the Bible held a special place. Even the gnostic interpretation of the Fourth Gospel by the Valentinian Heracleon (end of second century), the first such piece of which we have textual evidence, was, however, far more an apologetic treatise than an exegetical commentary. Commentaries in the strict sense were the product of the Hellenistic school tradition, as Hippolytus suggested. Christian biblical commentaries were the fruit of such traditions on Christian soil, as in Alexandria and Antioch. It seems that Origen created the genre, following classical precedent and employing the three standard forms of scholia, homilies, and tomoi, that is, philological explanations of an entire biblical book at a time. Wherever some form of Christian education took shape in Christian "schools," monastic communities, at the residence of bishops, or in learned circles of ascetic women, biblical interpretation as a scholarly enterprise was a highly valued activity.

The fourth and fifth centuries became the golden age of commentary writing. Jerome deliberately conveyed the impression that even earlier Christians had already produced a respectable body of "commentaries" on the scriptures. Ostensibly building on this treasure, but especially on Origen and the admired exegetes of the Eastern schools, he nourished the dream of creating a Latin Christian literature equal to that of the Romans, based on the Bible and its eternal truths but matching Virgil, Cicero, and Horace in style and form. He gave this endeavor a solid foundation by providing a new Latin translation of major parts of the Bible in his *Vulgate and adapted the forms of classical textual scholarship in his own exegetical work, drawing up tools for the study of biblical chronology, prosopography, geography, and languages, as well as commentaries, in which he made use of his vast learning.

As Jerome himself had feared, his ambitious project fell victim to the new pluralism of a barbarian age that superseded the cultural unity of the crumbling Empire. In Christianity, the syntheses of the following centuries tended to look to the past for their canons of biblical exegesis before they encouraged new attempts at taking up the task. In the East, compilations of the exegetical heritage began to appear in the sixth century with Procopius of Gaza. To this literature of "chains" (catenae), the gathering of patristic interpretations by biblical book and chapter, we owe the preservation of precious fragments of lost commentaries. Even the outstanding theological writers of the Byzantine age rarely wrote fresh commentaries themselves. Similarly, the West experienced a decline in commentary writing after Jerome. The shining exceptions were Cassiodorus and Pope Gregory I in the sixth century. It was the educational zeal of the great monasteries in the British Isles and of the Carolingian rulers on the Continent in the eighth and ninth centuries that created the conditions for a new flowering of serious exegetical work. Christian Interpretation from the Middle Ages to the Reformation

During the period from 600 to 1600 CE, the interpretation of the Bible reflected the broader institutional developments and intellectual concerns of western Christianity. During the earliest part of that period, students of the scriptures relied almost exclusively on the guidance of patristic authority. As a distinctive medieval civilization developed, commentators found positions in schools and universities, where they geared their work to the educational and theological needs of their world. Toward the end of the period, biblical interpretation reflected the fresh influences of critical reason and the spiritual demands that emerged during the epoch of the Protestant and Catholic Reformations. Throughout the whole period, the scriptures helped to shape western culture in all its dimensions. Little wonder, then, that commentators continuously sought to adjust their understanding of the Bible and to expound it in the light of the most advanced information available to them.

The most advanced information available during the early Middle Ages came from the church fathers. Only rarely did Christian commentators of the late first millennium BCE understand more than a smattering of Greek or Hebrew, and even less frequently did they possess the intellectual self-confidence to develop fresh interpretations. The Venerable Bede (672–735) knew some Greek, which he employed in his exposition of Acts, and Remigius of Auxerre (d. 908) seems to have compared the Latin Psalter with the Hebrew text. John Scotus Erigena (d. 877) stood alone, however, as a commentator possessing both language skills and a powerful critical faculty. He consulted the writings of the Greek fathers and based his own commentary on John's gospel on the Greek text, and furthermore he displayed a willingness to correct Latin exegesis on the basis of Greek sources. Most other early medieval commentators, however, worked in an extremely conservative vein. Even the best known of them—Alcuin (d. 804), Claude of Turin (d. 827), and Rabanus Maurus (d. 856)—did little more than reproduce the views of the Latin fathers, particularly those of Jerome and Augustine. Most commentators of the period recognized the literal sense as the foundation of scriptural exegesis, but all of them considered a literal exposition fully compatible with one or more modes of moral, allegorical, or mystical interpretation. Indeed, given the general absence of linguistic skills and philological concern, expositors had little alternative but to develop the various spiritual senses of scripture, which they did with considerable zeal.

The establishment of monastic and cathedral schools encouraged several new developments in biblical interpretation. In the first place, they created a demand for textbooks. Masters in the schools recognized the need for standardized interpretations that could serve as a common foundation for all students. The result was the compilation of the Glossa ordinaria, which presented a brief exposition of the entire Bible. The chief figure in the preparation of this work was Anselm of Laon (d. 1117), master in the cathedral school at Laon, though several other twelfth-century theologians and commentators also contributed to the effort. The Glossa drew extracts from patristic and early medieval expositions, so that it possessed no claim to originality. It exercised an enormous influence, however, since it served for half a millennium as the basic text for students embarked on their introduction to the Bible.

More important, the medieval schools fostered an intellectual and theological creativity that deeply influenced biblical interpretation. Expertise in grammar, logic, and dialectic imparted to the masters a new self-confidence in their intellectual abilities, and equipped them with the tools to fashion a new kind of exegesis. Twelfth-century commentators progressively abandoned the patristic style of running exposition in favor of explanations that concentrated on well-defined theological issues. Exegetes such as Gilbert de la Porrée (d. 1154) and Robert of Melun (d. 1167) organized their commentaries around quaestiones—doctrinal issues requiring explanation on the basis of reason and grounded in some source of authority—so that exposition served the interests of theological accuracy. The culmination of this practice came in the Sentences of Peter Lombard (d. 1160), who organized biblical and patristic doctrine into a veritable compendium of Christian theology.

The most impressive school of interpreters of this sort was that centered in the Abbey of St. Victor in Paris. Hugh of St. Victor (d. 1141), founder of the school, called for systematic, scholarly study of the scriptures. He placed equal weight on literal and spiritual exposition: the exegete must carefully employ all the relevant arts and sciences in establishing the literal sense of the text; whenever appropriate, however, its moral or theological significance should also be developed. Hugh's successors did not take so balanced an approach as their master: Richard of St. Victor (d. 1173) devoted himself to allegorical and mystical exegesis, while Andrew of St. Victor (d. 1175) insisted on a scientifically accurate exposition of the literal and historical sense of the scriptures. In preparing himself for his work, Andrew consulted Jewish scholars and steeped himself in Hebrew, thus setting an example followed by numerous Christian exegetes through the following two centuries.

Whatever their attitude toward spiritual exegesis, expositors in the schools generally geared their work toward theological and doctrinal issues. As a result, biblical interpretation became an increasingly specialized activity. Expositors developed impressive skills in language and reasoning, which they then applied in scriptural analysis. In doing so, they emphasized the significance of the scriptures for the correct understanding of Christian doctrine—rather than seeking, for example, to develop materials for homiletic or teaching purposes—so that exegesis increasingly assumed the status of a subdiscipline of theology.

The establishment of universities in the thirteenth century strongly encouraged the further development of a professional, scientific variety of biblical interpretation. Some commentators, such as Stephen Langton (1155–1228) and Hugh of St. Cher (1200–1263), continued to expound allegorical and spiritual senses of scripture. Generally speaking, however, the universities' heavy emphasis on theology encouraged interpreters to concentrate on the literal sense and to focus their commentaries on important doctrinal issues. The introduction of Aristotelian thought and subsequent development of scholastic theology worked toward the same end. Thus, Albertus Magnus (1193–1280) and Thomas Aquinas (1225–1274) brought Aristotelian science and analysis to bear on the scriptures; both produced literal expositions that plumbed the scriptures in search of support for scholastic explanations of Christian doctrine and mysteries.

The culmination of this variety of exegesis came in the work of Nicholas of Lyra (1270–1349), best known for his monumental Postilla litteralis, which provided an exhaustive literal exposition of the entire Bible. Lyra by no means abandoned spiritual exposition: he set great store by accurate exegesis of the spiritual senses of scripture, and as a supplement to his Postilla litteralis he even prepared a work that briefly outlined the moral and allegorical significance of the entire Bible. Like Albertus and Aquinas, however, Lyra concentrated on literal exposition, and he took pains whenever possible to show that the scriptures supported the scholastic understanding of theology. Yet Lyra also considerably advanced comprehension of the Hebrew Bible in particular because of his solid command of Hebrew. Lyra also closely studied rabbinic commentaries, particularly those of Rashi (1030–1105), one of the greatest of the medieval Jewish exegetes (see article on Jewish Interpretation, above). His language skills enabled him to provide both proper translations and accurate explanations of numerous biblical passages. Similar clarification of the New Testament did not become available until the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, when Renaissance humanists brought their newly acquired knowledge of Greek to bear on the Christian scriptures.

During the later Middle Ages, theologians such as Roger Bacon (1220–1292) and Pierre d'Ailly (1350–1421) called for increased emphasis on Hebrew and Greek as a propaedeutic for biblical interpretation. Regular instruction in biblical languages did not, however, become widely available until the sixteenth century, and by then new cultural forces ensured that scholastic theology would no longer dominate exegesis. Pico della Mirandola (1463–1494) and Johann Reuchlin (1455–1522) became enchanted not only with Hebrew, but also with qabbalistic ideas, which they sought to introduce into Christian exegesis. Meanwhile, expertise in Greek enabled the Renaissance humanists to make important contributions to the understanding of the New Testament. Lorenzo Valla (1407–1457) and especially Erasmus of Rotterdam (1466–1536) inaugurated the modern tradition of New Testament interpretation: they rejected the guidance of scholastic theology, studied the Greek text of the New Testament, and offered expositions that depended on a combination of linguistic, philological, and historical considerations. Both placed high value on the derivation of moral and theological doctrine from the scriptures. Like most of their humanist colleagues, though, they also denied the usefulness of elaborate allegorical or spiritual exegesis, insisting instead on the primacy of literal and historical expositions. Their work made possible a vastly improved understanding of the New Testament. On the basis of their knowledge of Greek and their well-developed critical faculties, they corrected the texts of the Greek and Latin New Testament, offered new Latin translations superior to those of the *Vulgate, and clarified numerous points of history and doctrine in their exegesis of the New Testament.

The Reformation movements of the sixteenth century had deep implications for biblical interpretation, as theologians of all persuasions sought scriptural support for their religious views. To some extent, both Protestant and Catholic reformers continued to work in the tradition of Erasmus and other Renaissance scholars who had brought linguistic skills and philological analysis to bear on the scriptures. Both John Calvin (1509–1564) and Cardinal Cajetan (1468–1534), for example, produced extensive commentaries based on the study of scriptural texts in their original languages and informed by all the advances the humanists had registered in the explanation of the Bible.

Inevitably, however, sixteenth-century commentaries generally betrayed the theological, controversial, or confessional intentions of their authors. Rebels against the authority of the Roman Catholic church, including John Wycliffe (1330–1384) and John Hus (1370–1415) among many others, had traditionally appealed to scripture in justifying their defiance of the pope and the institutional church. Martin Luther (1483–1546) recognized the Bible as the ultimate authority in matters of Christian doctrine, and his expositions—especially of the *Psalms and Pauline letters—helped him to develop his understanding of *faith and *grace. All the major Protestant theologians—Ulrich Zwingli (1484–1531), Martin Bucer (1491–1551), Philip Melanchthon (1497–1560), Heinrich Bullinger (1503–1575), and especially John Calvin—followed Luther's example. Protestants generally rejected the practice of developing elaborate allegorical explanations of the scriptures, but they eagerly scrutinized both the Hebrew Bible and the New Testament in search of authoritative support for Protestant doctrine. Their lectures, sermons, and commentaries on the Bible helped all the founders of Protestant Christianity to develop and solidify their theological views.

Roman Catholic theologians, of course, did not view scriptural authority as a substitute for papal primacy, but during the sixteenth century they too turned their attention to the Bible with special urgency. Jacques Lefèvre d'Étaples (1455–1536), Gasparo Contarini (1483–1542) and Juan de Valdés (1500–1541) all produced commentaries or exegetical works of a highly spiritual character. All three responded especially warmly to the Pauline letters and sought to encourage spiritual reform within the Roman church, while incidentally rendering the scriptures an instrument of Catholic as well as Protestant controversial literature. Cardinals Reginald Pole (1500–1558) and Girolamo Seripando (1492–1563) strongly encouraged delegates at the Council of Trent (1545–1564) to reform the education of clergy: a curriculum based on humanist study of the Bible rather than scholastic theology, they argued, would lead to general reform and eventually to the religious reunion of Christianity. Meanwhile, Cardinal Cajetan (1468–1534) undertook a more direct challenge to Protestant Christianity. In long commentaries on the Gospels and Pauline letters, Cajetan depended upon the methods of humanist scholarship to argue that the New Testament proved the truth of Roman Catholic doctrine and confuted the Protestant alternative.

By the late sixteenth century, then, biblical exegesis clearly reflected the theological division of western Christianity. Although it certainly became the focal point of unpleasant disputes, the Bible also retained its status as the prime source of Christian doctrine and moral teaching. Indeed, the disputes themselves testify to the point that, just as throughout the previous thousand years, the Bible still stood at the center of Christian culture. JERRY H. BENTLEY

Modern Biblical Criticism

Biblical criticism is a very general term, and not easy to define; it covers a wide range of scholarly activities. Its ultimate basis lies in the linguistic and literary character of the Bible. Scripture, though understood to be the word of God, is in human language (*Hebrew, *Aramaic, and *Greek) and in the literary, rhetorical, and poetic patterns of human expression, which can and must be interpreted by human understanding. God speaks through scripture, but its meanings function within the structures of ordinary human language. Criticism depends on a grasp of style, of the relation of part to whole, of expression to genre; it takes the biblical diction very seriously and moves from the detail of language to the larger overarching themes. Approached in this way, the Bible is sometimes found to have meanings other than those that traditional or superficial interpretations have suggested. Criticism is thus "critical," not in the sense that it "criticizes" the Bible (it often reveres it as the basic and holy text), but in the sense that it assumes freedom to derive from the Bible, seen in itself, meanings other than those that traditional religion has seen in it. Biblical criticism thus uncovers new questions about the Bible, even as it offers fresh answers in place of old solutions.

Criticism and Conflict. Biblical criticism need not conflict with long-accepted understandings, but it may do so. This will mean that some traditional interpretations have been ill-grounded in scripture and that some new interpretation should be suggested if justice is to be done to the facts of scripture. Criticism has thus often disturbed existing religion; yet it is also intrinsic to the religious belief in biblical *authority. Far from being a nontheological activity, it is essential to proper theological evaluation. We momentarily suspend the existing theological conviction to see whether it stands the test of questioning against the biblical material itself.

Not surprisingly, therefore, religious conflict has been a great stimulus to critical questioning. Two groups share the same scripture but have widely differing religious convictions. Each may then appeal to the scripture and argue that it cannot mean what others have taken it to mean. According to Matthew 23.23, Jesus himself says that the "weightier matters of the law" are neglected if one concentrates on the implementation of details—an appeal to the general tenor of the text against its detailed literality. As against the Christian understanding of Isaiah 7.14 as a prediction of Christ's *virgin birth, the Jew Trypho (second century CE) insisted that the Hebrew word means simply "young woman," that no virgin birth is involved, and that the reference is to the natural birth of *Hezekiah (see Immanuel).

The religious conflicts that most stimulated the rise of biblical criticism were, however, the Catholic-Protestant conflict within Christianity and, later, the disputes among the many different directions within Protestantism, for these particularly emphasized the unique role of scripture and the implications of reading it for and from itself.

Obstacles to Criticism. The main factors with which criticism has had to contend have included the following:

General ideas or principles concerning the Bible, such as the conviction that, being the word of God, it must necessarily be perfect and thus inerrant in all its parts (see Inspiration and Inerrancy). As against these theoretical convictions, criticism works with the factual realities of the Bible.

Harmonizations that universalize ideas and meanings throughout the Bible, obscuring differences between one part and another. Criticism notices these differences, such as that between documents affirming a virgin birth (Matthew, less clearly Luke) and others that appear not to do so (Mark, Paul, John).

Midrash and allegorical interpretations that decontextualize the words of scripture, ascribing to them senses that may be found elsewhere but do not fit this context. Criticism takes the actual context to be decisive.

Failure to perceive the literary form of the texts, and, in particular, failure to give weight to the silences of scripture, the absences of elements that are commonly read in; for example, the absence from the Hebrew Bible of *Adam's disobedience as an explanation for *evil, the absence of any birth narrative in Mark, the absence from other Gospels of the clause "except for unchastity" (Matt. 19.9; cf. 5.32; see Divorce).

Anachronistic reading into the text of meanings, ideas, and situations of a later age; for example, to understand *bishop in the New Testament as if this were identical with medieval episcopacy, or "scripture" in 2 Timothy 3.16 as if it meant exactly the same set of books that are canonical in modern Protestantism (see Canon). Criticism insists on starting with the words in the meanings that they had in biblical times.

Rationalistic apologetic arguments supposed to overcome discrepancies; for example, the idea that, since the ejection of merchants from the temple by Jesus is placed early in the ministry by John, late by the other Gospels, the event happened several times. Criticism, on the other hand, suggests that the differential placing of the story was for reasons of theological meaning within the narrative.

Authorship. Classical biblical criticism has been much interested in matters of authorship. The *Pentateuch was not written by *Moses himself; the book of *Isaiah contains materials from a time long after that prophet lived; the Gospels were not necessarily written by the disciples whose names they bear. This realization at once changes our picture of the sort of book the Bible is: it is not a once-and-for-all, divinely dictated report but a product of tradition developed over some time within communities of faith. Relations between documents like the *synoptic Gospels are literary relations, involving revision, change of emphasis, selection, and theological difference. The feature of pseudepigraphy must be recognized as a fact: that is, that books may be written in the name of, and attributed to, some great person of the past who presides over that genre. Thus, almost all Israelite *law, of whatever time, was attached to the name of Moses, as were *wisdom writings to that of *Solomon; some letters written in the name of *Paul or *Peter may have been written by followers, perhaps using some material from the apostle himself, rather than by him directly.

Style has been an important criterion from the beginning. Already in the ancient church it was obvious that 2 *Peter was not in a style that Peter used, that the letter to the *Hebrews differed in style from Paul, and that the book of *Revelation differed vastly in style from the gospel and letters of *John; and this observation was already used in early arguments about the canonicity of such books. These ancient observations formed a basis for similar discussions later, especially in Renaissance and Reformation (see article on Christian Interpretation from the Middle Ages to the Reformation, above), when the appreciation of ancient styles had been greatly quickened.

Sources. That books had been formed by the combination of earlier sources was an obvious corollary of these ideas. *Chronicles used Samuel-Kings, revising sometimes slightly, sometimes drastically, and adding material of its own. Mark is most commonly believed to have been used and rewritten by Matthew and Luke. And the sources used could be works that had long disappeared. The books of Kings mention other historical sources known to them. Material common to Matthew and Luke, but absent from Mark, could go back to a source now lost. Within the Pentateuch the different strata, marked by very different language, style, and ideas, could be explained if different sources from different times had been gradually combined. The detection of different sources within a book may thus explain discrepancies and divergent theological viewpoints. Source criticism of this kind is a highly characteristic form of classical biblical criticism. It, along with questions of authorship and date, is sometimes called "higher criticism," in contrast to "lower criticism," the study of text and textual variations (see Textual Criticism), but these terms are now old-fashioned. Indeed, from about the 1930s on, source criticism itself became somewhat old-fashioned and less work was done on it; uncertainties in its conclusions were noted, and rivals to the widely accepted views came to be more commonly supported. Nevertheless, source-critical results continue to be used as a normal framework of discussion by the great majority of scholars, and the broad outlines of source identification in the key areas—the Pentateuch, Isaiah, and the synoptic Gospels—are very generally accepted; such alternatives as there are are equally critical, but in a different way.

Cosmology and Miracle. The rise of biblical criticism ran parallel with changing ideas about the world we live in. New scientific knowledge made it seem impossible that the world could have originated as recently as the date (5000–3600 BCE) implied by the Bible's own *chronology, and the vast majority accepted this: the world was not exactly as Genesis had made it seem (see Science and the Bible). Similarly, it was debated just how exactly factual biblical depictions of miraculous events were. Critics noted the literary aspect: scripture is quite uneven in the degree to which it brings in miracle stories, and it may describe the same event in ways that are more sheerly miraculous or less so. This suggests that the element of miracle is again in part a matter of style. Biblical criticism is not in principle skeptical about *miracles; but it takes it as clear that not all miracle stories are to be taken literally just because they are in the Bible. On the whole, critical scholarship leaves the question aside; for, in its developed form, it concentrates mainly on the meaning or function that the miracle story had within the work of the writer. For this purpose, it finds it unnecessary either to defend or to deny the reality of miracles; the exegetical process works in the same way in either case.

History has often been looked on as the essential component in biblical criticism, though we have maintained that its foundations rest more in language and in literary form. The literary perceptions thus stimulated often could not produce solutions without a historical account of what had taken place. Thus, in the method of Julius Wellhausen (1844–1918), Pentateuchal sources identified through linguistic and literary criteria were matched with the evidence of different stages in the development of religious institutions in Israel, producing a likely sequence and dating. Dating sources and setting them within the framework of known world history thus provides a strong frame of reference for biblical study and a way in which evidence can be marshaled and ordered for discussion and theological evaluation. In particular, the knowledge, even if only approximate, of what lay before and after makes it possible to understand the presuppositions of biblical writers and the situation for which they wrote.

The centrality of this frame, and the importance of the perspective it afforded, has often caused the entire operation of biblical criticism to be understood as "historical criticism." But this exaggerates the degree to which the ideals of historical research dominate biblical study. Historical investigation is only one of the aspects of traditional criticism. Much critical work is basically the exegesis of biblical books; for this, complete historical precision is often impossible, and in any case is not attained, often hardly attempted. More important is a rough and general historical location; the gross distortion of total anachronism is to be avoided. Words must be understood to mean what they meant in the language of the texts, and that means in the time of the texts; texts should be seen against the situation in life for which they were written. In fact, biblical scholars, even when they insist on a historical approach, are often not very historical; they tend to let theological predilection overcome historical realism, and their motivation is commonly the religious scholar's devotion to texts rather than pure historical rigor. It was from traditional theology that there came the emphasis on what had "really happened" in biblical times, on the persons of authority who were behind the writings, on history as the milieu of God's activity. Conversely, the historical perspective on the Bible which biblical criticism has brought about is important primarily as a major fact within theology itself, rather than as a purely historical achievement.

The Canon. One important historical aspect is the perception of the *canon of scripture: the canon came about historically and can be understood historically. The pioneering studies of Johann S. Semler (1725–91) in this area were a vital step in the development of modern biblical studies. The boundaries of scripture are not something eternally and unchangeably established by God; what scripture included at one time and place was not entirely identical with what it included at another; the study of scripture and the study of church history are not separable. That the origins of the canon can be investigated as a human undertaking is correlative with a similar study of the books themselves. The canon can still be understood as God-given, just as the contents of scripture are God-given; but not purely and supernaturally so—rather, only indirectly and through the mediation of human intentions and meanings. Biblical critics have not rejected the canon; on the whole they have continued to uphold it, maintaining that the religious content of the Bible (i.e., the canonical books) is, broadly speaking, vastly superior in quality to that of any other set of written texts.

Theological Differentiation. Central to biblical criticism, and even more important than its historical orientation, is its use of the perception that theological views and emphases differ between one part of scripture and another. The Bible is not a monochrome and unvarying photograph of the being and will of God; it is more like a choir, each member of which has a different part to sing. Thus, in spite of much common subject matter, the *P stratum of the Pentateuch has a theology quite different from that of *Deuteronomy, and Matthew presents quite a different picture of *Jesus from that of Luke. This in itself is no novel or revolutionary insight; but, rather than being content merely to admire the complementary character of the theologies of the books, biblical criticism uses it as a valuable index for the identification of strata and their relative dating, situations, and problems. Equally, it strives to perceive, understand, and evaluate these different theologies as crucial stages in the understanding of scripture as a whole, seen in a dimension of depth.

Theological Roots of Biblical Criticism. Though biblical criticism may appear as something new, in fact it has deep theological roots. The interest in personal authorship went back to early times and was part of the argument over canonicity. Style was also known as a criterion from early times; later, on the basis of style, John Calvin doubted that Peter had written 2 Peter, just as, on grounds of content, he thought that Psalms 74 and 79 came from the Maccabean period (a view later regarded as drastically critical). The emphasis on history and actual events was also part of general Christian tradition: Christianity, people thought, was a peculiarly historical religion, and the importance of the actual words and deeds of Jesus was overwhelmingly accepted and stressed. If biblical criticism noticed and used the theological differences within the Bible, this was an extension from the practice of all theologies; for all, even when accepting the total canon of scripture, had picked out portions as more essential and dominant, while treating others as derivative or of secondary importance. As for the canon, the first obvious fact was that theological tradition had not agreed about it; there had been variations in canons throughout the early centuries, and again as between Roman Catholic and Orthodox on one side, and Protestant on the other. This fact was accentuated when Martin Luther, impressed by theological differentiation, effectively demoted from the New Testament canon *James, Hebrews (not by Paul), and Revelation on the ground of their inadequate understanding of the essential principle of *justification. Difference in emphasis between Old Testament and New Testament was also traditional and universal in Christianity.

The impetus toward biblical criticism given by the Reformation was substantial. Stressing scripture alone—as against mediation through church tradition—meant that everything seemed to depend on scripture. The grammar and wording of the original were reemphasized and a learned ministry capable of handling these words was demanded. The Reformation rejected allegorical methods that had covered over cracks in the surface of scripture, and in the Hebrew Bible it mediated influences from medieval Jewish exegesis (seen, e.g., in the KJV), which in this respect also favored literal understanding (see article in this entry on Jewish Interpretation, above). It asserted the freedom of the interpreter to take a stand on the biblical words as against traditional and authoritative interpretations. But, despite the reformers' insistence on biblical authority, they failed to produce doctrinal agreement; on the contrary, they created a wide variety of conflicting doctrinal positions, all claiming a basis in infallible scripture. The wide variation of ideas and hypotheses within later biblical criticism is a reflection of the same situation.

Rise and Reception of Criticism. The ancient and early modern anticipations of critical views are not in themselves very important. It could be obvious enough that the statement that "at that time the Canaanites were in the land" (Gen. 12.6) was not written by Moses but was a later note; so argued Abraham ibn Ezra (1089–1164), an opinion on which Baruch Spinoza (1632–1677) later built much more. Such observations were often only minor annotations and do not amount to a critical vision of any scale. More important was the growth of the general atmosphere of thought in which it seemed permissible and even normal to argue on the basis of the language and literary form of scripture, with freedom to offer the interpretations that emerged from them. This tradition may go back to Erasmus (1466–1536), and is well represented by Hugo Grotius (1583–1645), who belonged to the Arminian current in the Dutch church. In France, Richard Simon (1638–1712) argued that uncertainties about scripture undermined the Protestant reliance upon it, while freedom in biblical study produced no clash with Catholic dogma; alongside this, his argument against Moses' authorship of the entire Pentateuch is a minor point. Jean Astruc (1684–1766) pioneered the systematic source analysis of the Pentateuch, the different documents being isolated but understood to have been combined by Moses himself.

An especially active locus of new ideas about scripture was England in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. In conflicts over church polity, civil government, and religious freedom there were manifold viewpoints, all of which sought legitimation from scripture, and the ensuing controversies evoked an efflorescence of new ideas and arguments. Thomas Hobbes (1588–1679) is a distinguished representative. For him there is no doubting the authority of the Bible as the law of God; but equally, in the matter of authorship and date, it is simply obvious that the only light we have must come from the books themselves, and from this it is manifest that the books of Moses were written after his time, and similarly with other books. Other important exegetical ideas come from John Locke (1632–1704), who noted, among other things, how Jesus kept secret his messianic status until late in his career (see Messianic Secret); Sir Isaac Newton (1642–1727), who worked on biblical chronology and also thought that the idea of the *Trinity could be disproved from the New Testament; and many others.

In Germany, these ideas were followed up in the later eighteenth century by university professors, who applied them in a much more systematic way. A typical genre was the "introduction," which would cover in turn each book of Old Testament or New Testament and discuss methodically all matters of authorship, source analysis, and dates on the basis of language and content; a pioneer of such work was by Johann Gottfried Eichhorn (published 1780–1783). Central names in Old Testament scholarship are Wilhelm Martin Leberecht de Wette (1780–1849), noted for his work on the key book of Deuteronomy, and Julius Wellhausen, whose solution (the "P" document is the latest of the Pentateuchal sources) remains the point of reference for all discussion of the subject. In New Testament studies, a central figure was Ferdinand Christian Baur (1792–1860), who saw a conflict between Pauline and Petrine traditions as decisive for early Christianity. Of the "quest for the historical Jesus," it is hard to know whether it counts as biblical criticism or as speculative theology; the claim of Johannes Weiss (1863–1914) that Jesus' mission was dominated by eschatological expectation is a more clearly critical standpoint.

The return of this developed biblical criticism to the English-speaking world was not without conflict. W. Robertson Smith was removed from his professorship in Scotland in 1881, and Charles A. Briggs from his clerical functions in the United States in 1893. But soon after these events, critical approaches had clearly won the day in these same churches. In Oxford from 1883 the cautious and erudite scholarship of Samuel Rolles Driver commended the critical reading of the Old Testament, and Lux mundi (1889) aligned the Catholic tradition of Anglicanism with the same. By the early twentieth century, critical perspectives, though not always easily accepted, were overwhelmingly dominant in academic study and serious publishing throughout the western non–Roman Catholic world.

Although biblical criticism made a deep difference to the handling of the Bible, this did not have the feared serious effects on doctrine. This was partly because many traditional doctrines were not nearly as solely dependent on the Bible as had been supposed. Shifts in the mode of understanding the Bible left it possible for these same doctrines to be still maintained. Indeed, biblical criticism fitted in well with certain important doctrinal emphases: in Lutheranism with justification by faith, in Anglicanism with the centrality of *incarnation, in Calvinism with the appreciation of Israel and the Old Testament. Moreover, though much biblical criticism grew up in association with latitudinarian views, with deism, and later with liberal theology, the achievements of criticism showed themselves to be separable from these origins and to be fully maintainable by those who repudiated them. Thus "dialectical" or "neo-orthodox" theology, bitterly hostile to "liberal" theology, accepted the legitimacy of critical procedures and, though itself often cool toward biblical scholarship, on the whole created an atmosphere in which it could flourish very freely.

In the Roman Catholic world, Richard Simon's argument that critical freedom favored the Catholic position was little accepted by his superiors, and critical work was muted until the rise of Catholic modernism, especially in France in the late nineteenth century with Alfred F. Loisy (1857–1940). The modernist movement was formally condemned by Pius X in 1907, and the dogmatic necessity of traditional authorships and dates was reasserted. But since the encyclical Divino afflante spiritu (1943) and especially since the Second Vatican Council, the critical freedom of the Catholic exegete has been acknowledged, and today Catholic and Protestant biblical scholarship form one total constituency (see also Pontifical Biblical Commission).

Jewish academic scholarship has often differed from the solutions favored in Christian work; examples include opposition to Pentateuchal source criticism from Moses Hirsch Segal (1876–1968) and Umberto Cassuto (1883–1951), and different reconstruction of Israelite religious history from Yehezkel Kaufmann (1889–1963). Non-Jewish scholarship was often felt to be too much influenced by Christian theological traditions. But the alternative positions advanced by Jewish scholars are in their own way just as critical, and offer no support to a consistent anticritical mode of study.

Biblical Theology. Biblical criticism has often been understood primarily as an analytical discipline, but equally it is linked with the discipline of *biblical theology, which is the synthetic side of the same movement. Biblical theology seeks to see the common elements that run through the texts, whether through a historical or developmental scheme or through the perception of an inner structure. No serious biblical theology has arisen except in conjunction with the critical approach. Biblical theology, like criticism, is an exploratory approach; the true inner theology of the Bible is not already known, but must be discovered. For opponents of critical study, the theology of scripture is already known, fixed in older creeds and traditions. Though twentieth-century biblical theology felt itself to be in contrast with biblical criticism, they are in fact two sides of the same coin.

Religious Environment. All the above may count as a depiction of "classical" biblical criticism; there remain some more recent developments to be mentioned. The older critics worked largely from the Bible itself; later, increasing knowledge from Mesopotamia and Syria, from Hellenistic *mystery religions, from *gnosticism was added. Clearly, there is some overlap in religious ideas and institutions, in legends, myths, and poetic forms. The "history of religions" school explored this area; a central name is that of Hermann Gunkel (1862–1932).

Form Criticism, influential from the 1920s on, is interested in the smaller literary units that have a function in their "situation in life," through which one penetrates to the underlying purpose. Thus, a gospel story might be of a form fitted for controversy with Jews, a psalm might be of a form belonging to an enthronement ceremony. Important form critics are Gunkel for the Hebrew Bible, and Rudolf Bultmann (1884–1976) for the New Testament. For the New Testament, form criticism often seemed to be skeptical in character, suggesting that stories were generated for these purposes rather than actually spoken by Jesus; in the Hebrew Bible its effects were more conservative, suggesting ways in which poems might have functioned in ancient cult and liturgy.

Tradition Criticism concentrates on the way in which traditions have altered and grown, the places to which they are attached, and the social and cultic relations within which they have been meaningful. It is less interested in documentary hypotheses, more in oral stages of tradition, and it illuminates the deep underlying forces that have molded the Bible into its present form. It has been particularly exemplified in Scandinavian scholarship.

Redaction Criticism is interested in the work of the final editors, who molded the earlier sources into the text that we now have. The method depends on some view of the sources used by the redactor, but the interest falls less on these sources in themselves and more on the way in which they have been adapted into the final text. The object is therefore the shape and structure of the book as we now have it; yet the perception of this depends on a perspective in time, going back to an earlier stage or earlier revisional activity.

Modern Literary Readings. Although the literary character of biblical criticism has been emphasized here, from about 1960 on it has been increasingly felt that it is out of step with modern trends in the appreciation of literature. Literary critics from outside the technical biblical sphere—for example, Frank Kermode, Robert Alter, and Northrop Frye—have made powerful contributions and some biblical scholars are following similar lines. Most of this literary movement is interested in the final, the present, stage of the text, not in historical reconstruction; nor does it share the theological interests characteristic of most biblical criticism. The stress is on the styles, the patterns, the narrative techniques. The text, some think, does not "refer" to anything external to itself, but operates within "the world of the text" (see also Literature, The Bible as). Some of this overlaps with ideas coming from *structuralism, a movement centered in France. Structuralism is interested in the code, the set of structures, that are used in all social and literary complexes, as they are in language itself. It stresses the synchronic, the structures visible within one text at one time, rather than its development over a span of time, though it can also be extended to deal with historical change. These types of reading, in general, differ widely from traditional biblical criticism and especially from its historical interests; on the other hand, their reluctance to say anything informative about the world "outside the text" leaves it doubtful how they can fit with the older theological needs served by biblical criticism.

Canonical Criticism. This approach, advocated principally by Brevard S. Childs, insists on the *canon of scripture as the essential key to interpretation. Canonicity is interested in the final text, not in earlier stages that have led up to it. The canon of books, which brings them all together as holy scripture of the community, means that taken together they provide a "construal" of all their contents. Traditional biblical criticism is legitimate, providing, as it does, the starting points from which Childs reasons toward the canonical sense; but its perspective and direction are basically erroneous. Common areas with redaction criticism and with modern literary readings and structuralism seem obvious; but Childs is anxious to disclaim support from these quarters, for canonical criticism is not at all literary in character, and its validation comes entirely from the theological status of scripture. Though it appears to seek a connection with much earlier exegesis, canonical criticism is a clearly modern phenomenon, working entirely from the tradition of biblical criticism even when it seeks to depart from it.

Conclusion. Biblical criticism has proved to be a dynamic field of study. New approaches and perspectives continue to appear. Areas undergoing fresh examination include the nature of Hebrew poetic form (stimulated by our knowledge of *Ugaritic poetry; see also Poetry, Biblical Hebrew); the character of Judaism at the time when Christianity originated; the character of scripture as story rather than as history. Results believed to have been established will be reconsidered. Yet some of the main positions achieved have remained as essential reference points for the discussion, and no alternatives have been proposed that have gained anything like the same degree of assent. Still more important, the general intellectual atmosphere of criticism, with its base in language and literary form, its reference grid in history, and its lifeblood in freedom to follow what the text actually says, has established itself as without serious challenge. Serious work on scripture can be done only in continuity with the tradition of biblical criticism.

Irony and Humor. Irony is a mode of expression in which what is said is the opposite of what is meant; consequently, ironic statements cannot be understood without rejecting their apparent sense. Humor starts with the perception of irony or of some other inconsistency strong enough to provoke confusion or tension. Sudden release from such tension often results in a smile or in laughter; the inner feeling is of sympathetic joy or of playfulness. Things that are thus perceived and the reactions to that perception are called comical.

There are many examples of irony and humor in the Bible. Genesis 17–18 tells of *Abraham and *Sarah's laughter when they think they have a joke on God. In 1 Samuel 17 it is ironic that the young shepherd boy *David is victorious over the giant *Goliath, and in 2 Samuel 12 the prophet *Nathan ironically makes King David pass sentence on himself. The *Psalms describe God as a laughing god who finds sinners ridiculous in their pride and self-deceptions (2.4; 37.13; cf. 59.9; Prov. 1.26). The *prophets used sarcasm and satire rather than humor in the positive sense. They ridiculed the belief in *idols (Isa. 44; cf. Hos. 13.2) and drew up a ridiculously exact list of the *jewelry of luxurious women (Isa. 3.18–23). Generalizations and exaggerations are also characteristic of prophetic discourse.

The book of *Proverbs provides examples of humor and irony that are different from the biting sarcasm of the prophets and the amusing storytelling of the narrator. The sign of true wisdom is obedience to God's law; the sinner is therefore ridiculous. A lazy man wants to sleep in the morning (Prov. 6.9–10) and does not have the energy to lift his hand to his mouth when he is eating (19.24). The slothful person lying in bed is like a door on its hinges, turning back and forth (26.14). A rich fool thinks he can buy wisdom with money (17.16). *Women are generally respectfully described, unless they are brawling (21.9), contentious (27.15), or immoral (11.22).

In the *synoptic Gospels, similes, *parables, and terms used by *Jesus are often akin to similar expressions in rabbinic literature. The rabbis used humor and irony in their discussion about even the most serious matters. Since Jesus was (called) a *rabbi, it is not surprising that he uses irony and humor as well. In his sayings he describes comical people (Luke 11.5–8; 18.1–8; Matt 5.25; 25.1–12), comical ideas (Matt. 5.36; 7.6, 9–10, 16), and comical events (Matt. 5.15; 7.3–5; Luke 14.7–14). These humorous texts point toward the earliest strata of Christian tradition and probably originated from Jesus himself.

In the gospel of *John everything happens simultaneously within two frames of reference. One is mystical, sublime, heavenly: there Jesus is the eternal, divine *Logos. The other is the earthly, the temporal, that of the "flesh" (John 1.14). The incarnate Jesus and the eternal Christ are the same person, and his message is interpreted in terms that have a double meaning. This results in a certain kind of irony, and the human intellect asks questions that show its lack of understanding and insight (John 2.20; 3.4; 4.11, 15, 33; 6.15, 26, 34; 7.35; 12.16, 28–30; 13.4–11, 28–29; 16.17–18). Here two tunes are interwoven into one musical composition. Those who are attentive only to the sublime tune will hardly find humor in the narrative, but readers conscious of the earthly tune will perhaps think of the *incarnation of Logos as a metamorphosis in the Greek sense, and then the way is open to the understanding of what has been called "divine irony." Among such ironical examples are the declarations of Jewish and Roman authorities (John 11.49–53; 18.5) and Jesus' feigned ignorance (Luke 24.19).

The book of *Acts is a kind of story in which the humor often consists in amusing situations. There is something comical about *Peter's return to the congregation (12.1–19), missionaries as gods (14.1–18), and Demetrius's wonderful speech in Ephesus (19.23–41).

*Paul had rabbinical training and uses ironical questions about theological matters (Rom. 3.29; 6.1, 15; 7.7, 13). He describes himself as a fool for Christ's sake (1 Cor. 4.9–10), and even speaks of God as foolish and weak (1 Cor. 1.18–31). The letter to *Philemon is a masterpiece of sympathetic irony and gentle humor.

JAKOB JÓNSSON

Isaac. Son of *Abraham and father of *Esau and *Jacob. The principal stories about Isaac are found in Genesis 21–28. Isaac is a more shadowy figure than the other patriarchs, and little if anything can be said of him as a historical figure. He is said to have been born when his parents were both advanced in years as a fulfillment of God's promise to Abraham to grant him posterity against all human expectation (see Rom. 4.16–22). In Genesis 22 God himself seems to challenge his own promise by demanding that Isaac be offered as a human sacrifice, but rewards Abraham's unquestioning obedience by providing a ram as a substitute at the last possible moment. This story (the *Aqedah) has been important in Judaism as a reminder of the precariousness of Israel's election and yet the sure promises of God, as well as in Christianity as a "type" of the sacrifice of Christ.

Of Isaac's maturity we learn little. Genesis 24 tells how he acquired a wife (*Rebekah), but the principal characters in this tale are Isaac's servant and Rebekah's family. In Genesis 26 Isaac and Rebekah are involved in an incident with "Abimelech king of the Philistines" (an anachronistic reference), who takes Rebekah into his harem—essentially the same incident twice reported of Abraham and *Sarah (Gen. 12 and 20). Isaac next appears as an old man, deceived by Jacob into giving him the blessing of the firstborn that should by right have been Esau's (Gen. 27). The stories about Isaac locate him at Beer-sheba in the far south of Judah (Gen. 26.23–33) and associate him with the worship of the God El-roi (Gen. 22.14; 24.62), while Jacob later swears by "the Fear of his father Isaac" (Gen. 31.53), perhaps an old divine name (see Names of God in the Hebrew Bible).

JOHN BARTON

Isaiah, The Book of. Isaiah is the first of the Major Prophets in both Jewish and Christian tradition. The book consists of sixty-six chapters that can be divided into five sections of roughly the same length (1–12; 13–27; 28–39; 40–55; 56–66). All except one begin with an attack on arrogance and an appeal for justice and culminate in a hymn or prophecy of salvation, and all except one are addressed to the people of Jerusalem. The one exception is chapters 40–55, which begins "Comfort, O comfort my people," and is addressed to an exiled community in Babylon during the sixth century BCE. The book is held together by common themes and phrases (e.g., "the Holy One of Israel," Jerusalem/Zion, justice and righteousness), by quotations from, or allusions to, earlier passages in later ones (e.g., 1.6 in 53.5; 6.1–13 in 40.1–8; 6.1 in 52.13 and 57.15; 11.6–9 in 65.25), and by other kinds of continuity, such as the life and times of the prophet (1.1; 6–9; 14.28; 20; 36–39; 40.1–8) and the downfall of Babylon (13–14; 46–47).

Contents. Chaps. 1–12 consist of prolonged and bitter attacks on the arrogance and hypocrisy of Jerusalem's leaders ("rulers of Sodom," 1.10; cf. Ezek. 16.49), interspersed with prophecies of a better age to come when swords will be beaten into plowshares (2.4; cf. Mic. 4.3) and "the wolf shall live with the lamb" (11.6). As the title suggests (1.1; 2.1), the prophet's visions place special emphasis on the role of *Jerusalem and a royal savior from the line of *David (9.2–7; 11.1–9). In such a context, it was inevitable that 7.14 would be interpreted as referring to the birth of either a royal savior, *Hezekiah, or a future *messiah.

These chapters also contain a memorable account, like those of other prophets (1 Kings 22.19–23; Jer. 23.18), of Isaiah's glimpse into the heavenly court where he was confronted by the awesome *holiness of God and commissioned to convey God's judgment to his unhearing and unseeing people (chap. 6). This judgment theme continues into the narrative of his confrontation with King Ahaz during the Syro-Ephraimite crisis (chaps. 7–8; cf. 2 Kings 16). Like other eighth-century prophets, Isaiah prophesies that the *Assyrians are the real danger and that they will sweep like a mighty river over the northern kingdoms and into Judah (8.5–8). He calls for faith (7.9; cf. 30.15) and sees beyond present gloom and anguish to future victory (9.1–5). Assyria is a tool in God's hand (10.5–7). Both the terror of a confrontation between human power and God's power, and the hope of the eventual victory of God's people, are expressed in the richly emotive term *Immanuel, "God is with us" (7.14; 8.8; 8.10). The section ends with a short hymn of thanksgiving (chap. 12).

Chaps. 13–27 further proclaim God's sovereignty over history. Isaiah's oracles concerning the nations (cf. Jer. 46–51; Ezek. 24–32; Amos 1–2) begin with *Babylon (13–14) and end with the entire earth (24–27). In addition to the customary taunts and mock laments (e.g., "How you are fallen from heaven, O Day Star, son of Dawn!" 14.12; cf. Amos 5.1–2), this series contains some unusual material: expressions of sympathy for the survivors of *Moab (16.3–5), an unexpected blessing for *Egypt and Assyria (19.24–5), and another glimpse into the trauma of a prophet's visionary experience (21.1–10).

The oracle concerning Tyre (chap. 23), an international seaport in contact with every part of the world (see Phoenicia), leads logically into the last part of this section in which the subject is the entire earth (24–27). These four chapters are often known as the "Isaiah apocalypse": although they do not have the literary characteristics of the book of Revelation and other true apocalypses, they do contain *apocalyptic language and imagery. The whole earth is depicted as desolate, twisted, despoiled, and polluted; sun and moon are eclipsed (24.23); and the passage pictures an eschatological banquet (25.6), the resurrection of the dead (26.19; cf. 25.8), and God's ultimate victory over the host of heaven (24.21), *Leviathan, the "fleeing . . . twisting serpent," and the "dragon that is in the sea" (27.1). The passage belongs firmly to Isaianic tradition, however, as is indicated by such recurring motifs as the city (26.1; cf. 1.21–26), the mountain of the Lord (25.6; cf. 2.2; 11.9), and the vineyard (27.2; cf. 5.1–7).

In chaps. 28–39, the prophet first directs the full force of his rhetoric against Israel and Judah again (28–31), just as *Amos does after his oracles concerning the foreign nations (Amos 2.4–16). The whole preceding section (13–27) functions merely as a foil for this final condemnation of his own people. He takes up where he left off in 1–12: "Ah, the proud garland of the drunkards of Ephraim" (28.1; cf. 5.11–12). "The mighty flood" of an Assyrian invasion reappears from chap. 8, and the call for faith and courage in a city under siege is repeated (30.15; cf. 7.4, 9). This time the crisis is that of 701 BCE, when *Sennacherib invaded Judah and Hezekiah was tempted to join forces with Egypt (31.1–3). Chaps. 36–37 tell the story of a miraculous victory over the Assyrians in that year, highlighting Isaiah's role. There were two other crises in the same year, Hezekiah's illness, when the prophet performs a solar miracle reminiscent of Joshua's at Gibeon (chap. 38; cf. Josh. 10.12, 14), and the visit of Babylonian ambassadors to Jerusalem, during which he foretells the Babylonian *exile (chap. 39). Like chap. 39, the central chapters of this section, especially 34 and 35, point forward to the next section.

Chaps. 40–55 are often known as the "Babylonian chapters." They constitute the most distinctive and homogeneous part of the book, both stylistically and theologically, and are for that reason commonly referred to as "Second Isaiah" or "Deutero-Isaiah." Repetition is frequent (e.g., 40.1; 51.9; 52.1). The exiled community in Babylon is described and addressed collectively as "Zion" (feminine singular; e.g., 40.9; 51.17; 52.1–2) and "my servant" (e.g., 41.8; 44.1). The rise of Cyrus, king of the *Medes and *Persians, is described (45.1–3), as are the fall of Babylon (chap. 47) and the return of the exiles to Jerusalem in a new *Exodus (48.20–21; 51.9–11; 52.11–12). The sheer scale of God's power in history and in creation is another recurring theme in these chapters (e.g., 40.12–20; 42.5–9; 45.9–13), as are explicit *monotheism (e.g., 45.5, 6, 14, 21, 22), the ridicule of *idolatry (e.g., 40.18–20; 44.9–20; 46.1–2), and feminine images for God (42.14; 46.3; 49.15; 66.9). Finally, the concept of healing and victory through the vicarious suffering of "the servant of the Lord" (52.13–53.12) marks out this section as unique in biblical prophecy.

The final section of the book (chaps. 56–66) is mainly concerned with the return of the exiles to Jerusalem and the building of a new society there. "Justice" and "righteousness" are again key motifs here as they were at the beginning (56.1; 59; 61.8; cf. 1.17). Foreigners and *eunuchs will be admitted into the *Temple (56.1). The poor and the oppressed will be set free (58.6–7; 61.1–2), and Temple *sacrifice is finally rejected in favor of humility and *repentance (66.1). The feminine imagery, introduced in chaps. 40–55, is further elaborated (62.1–5; 66.7–14). God is addressed as father (63.16; 64.8), and a striking variation on the God-as-warrior theme is the famous "grapes of wrath" passage (63.1–6) in which he is portrayed as a somewhat reluctant victor, limping home from war, blood-stained and stooping (v. 1; NRSV: "marching"). The last verse of the book, one of the few biblical texts on which a doctrine of hellfire can be based (66.24), is so gruesome that in Jewish custom the preceding verses about "the new heavens and the new earth" are repeated after it, to end the reading on a more hopeful and at the same time more characteristically Isaianic note.

Author. All that is known of Isaiah son of Amoz, the prophet to whom the book is attributed, is found in the book itself. He is not referred to elsewhere in the Bible apart from parallel passages in Kings and Chronicles (2 Kings 19–20; 2 Chron. 29–32). The book contains a few biographical details, which present the picture of a prophet in the traditional pattern: a glimpse into the heavenly court (chap. 6); the giving of symbolic names to his children (7.3; 8.1–4; cf. Hos. 2.1–9); dramatic appearances at the courts of kings (chaps. 7; 37–39; cf. 2 Sam. 12.1–15; 1 Kings 21.17–29; Jer. 22); prophesying through symbolic actions (20; cf. 1 Kings 22.11–12; Jer. 19; Ezek 12.1–7); the performing of miracles (38.7–8; cf. 1 Kings 18.20–46; 2 Kings 4.32–37); and the condemnation of injustice and oppression (1–5; cf. 2 Sam. 12.1–6; 1 Kings 21; Amos 5). According to an extrabiblical legend, he was martyred ("sawn in two"; cf. Heb. 11.37) in the reign of *Manasseh.

The title informs us that he lived during the reigns of four kings of Judah (Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah), that is to say, during the second half of the eighth century BCE. This was a period during which Judah's fortunes changed from affluence under Uzziah (see 2 Chron. 26) to defeat and humiliation at the hands of the Assyrians in 701 BCE (2 Kings 18). Many passages clearly reflect those traumatic years—the approaching Assyrian army (5.26–30; 10.28–32), the devastation of the land of Judah (1.7–8), the folly of Judah's leaders (chaps. 30–31)—and were probably composed at that time. Perhaps the hopes accompanying the coronation of Hezekiah in 715 BCE are expressed in the dynastic hymn 9.1–7.

A few sections of narrative, however, clearly reflect later ideas and attitudes. The story of Jerusalem's miraculous deliverance from the Assyrian army under Sennacherib in 701 (chaps. 36–37), for example, though based on the fact that Jerusalem was not destroyed on that occasion, probably owes much to an upsurge of national confidence during the reign of Josiah (626–609) when the Assyrian empire collapsed. The annals of Sennacherib, and 2 Kings 18.14–16 (omitted from the Isaianic version), suggest that the reality was very different.

Some passages, mainly in chaps. 40–66, contain no references at all to the Assyrians, but frequently allude to events and conditions in the Babylonian period (605–538 BCE): Jerusalem and the Temple in ruins (44.28; 49.17); Babylonian idols (46.1–2); a Jewish colony at Syene (Elephantine) in Egypt (49.12); *Cyrus (45.1). The bulk of the book was thus probably composed more than a century after the lifetime of Isaiah. The popular division into three sections, First Isaiah (chaps. 1–39) dated to the eighth century BCE, Second (Deutero-) Isaiah (chaps. 40–55) to the sixth, and Third Isaiah (chaps. 56–66) to the fifth, is a crude oversimplification. The literary and theological unity of the whole book is unmistakable; and some parts of First Isaiah, notably the two Babylonian chapters (13–14) and the Isaiah apocalypse (24–27), manifestly belong to the sixth century or later. Chaps. 24–27 should probably be dated to the fourth century BCE, contemporary with *Joel. Each passage must be handled on its own, though both as a product of its age and in the context of the Isaianic corpus as a whole.

Key Concepts. Some development is evident from the earliest chapters to the latest. Different images and illustrations are used in different parts of the book, reflecting changes in historical context. But there are enough common themes running throughout the book for us to be able to discuss Isaianic tradition as a rich and distinctive entity within *biblical theology. Concepts such as *holiness, justice, *righteousness, *salvation, *faith, and *peace are brilliantly related to the two fundamental Isaianic themes, the idea of God as "the Holy One of Israel" and the centrality of the city of Jerusalem, which are epitomized in some of the most familiar biblical images and visions. Holiness, perhaps the most distinctive of these concepts, is expressed not only in the recurring epithet "Holy One of Israel" but also in the prophet's vision of God "in the year that King Uzziah died" (6.1–3). Holiness refers first to the transcendent majesty of the king of the universe, creator of all things (6.3; 40.12–23) and Lord of history (10.5–7; 45.1–7). But in Isaiah it has an ethical dimension too: the Holy One condemns moral uncleanness (6.5–7) and the holy city will be characterized by justice and peace (11.6–9; 56.1–8). Ritual *purity and cultic practices are not enough in themselves; indeed, they are savagely condemned if they take the place of social justice (1.11–17; 58) or humility (66.1–4). The Temple plays only a minor role in the visions of a new Jerusalem (1.21–26; 2.2–4; 4.2–6; 26.1–6; 49.16–21; 65.17–25), and in those passages where it is mentioned, the emphasis is on opening its doors to foreigners (56.3–8) and to the nations of the world (2.2–4; 66.18–21).

Many of the most elaborate visions of a new age focus on an individual savior figure, champion of justice and righteousness. In some he is explicitly identified as a king from the royal lineage of David (9.2–7; 11.1–5), and this is no doubt implied in others (32.1–2; 42.1–4; cf. 55.3). In the context of the Babylonian exile, *Cyrus is hailed as the Lord's anointed (45.1–7; cf. 41.2–3), and in one passage the savior figure is represented as a prophet, anointed to "bring good news to the oppressed" (61.1–4; cf. Luke 4.18–19). This prophetic model seems to underlie two others, in which he is described as "the servant of the Lord" (49.1–6; 50.4–9), though in both these cases the story of the "servant" may be understood to refer to the experience of Israel rather than any individual (cf. 49.3).

Finally, there is the celebrated "suffering servant" passage, which seems to tell the story of an individual who heals and redeems by vicarious suffering (52.13–53.12). At one time considered the last of four autonomous "servant songs" (42.1–4; 49.1–6; 50.4–9; 52.13–53.12), it is rather to be understood as an independent hymn of thanksgiving expressing the people's confidence in the power of God to intervene on their behalf, to heal their wounds, and to forgive their sins. There is no answer to the question of who the servant is or how he achieves this. The emphasis, here as elsewhere in the Isaianic tradition (1.21–26; 9.2–7; 35; 41.14–16; 49.14–26; 52.1–2), is on a transformation from humiliation to exaltation, defeat to victory. If it reflects the release of Jehoiachin from prison in Babylon in 660 BCE (2 Kings 25.27–30; Jer. 52.31–34), or the unexpected military successes of Cyrus that eventually led to the fall of Babylon in 538 BCE; it also draws on traditional religious ideas, such as the scapegoat ritual on the Day of Atonement (53.4, 6, 12; cf. Lev. 16.20–22; see Azazel) and the figure of *Moses, the "servant of the Lord" (Deut. 34.5; Josh. 1.1, 2, 13; etc.), who offered to die for his people (53.7–9, 12; cf. Exod. 32.32). The *Exodus and *wilderness motifs are prominent throughout these chapters (e.g., 43.15–21; 48.20–21; 51.9–11; 52.11–12; 55.12–13).

Influence. The book of Isaiah has played a central role in Christian liturgy and theology. It is sometimes called the "Fifth Gospel" because, in the words of Jerome, Isaiah recounts the life of the *Messiah in such a way as to make one think he is "telling the story of what has already happened rather than what is still to come." Isaiah is more often quoted in the New Testament than is any other book of the Hebrew Bible apart from Psalms, and has provided the church with much of its most familiar language and imagery, including the ox and the ass (1.3), the Sanctus (6.3), the Immanuel prophecy (7.14), the key of David (22.22), the suffering Messiah (53), the winepress (63.3), and the New Jerusalem (65.18). The popularity of the Jesse tree motif (11.1) in Christian art, and of Handel's Messiah (largely based on excerpts from chaps. 7; 9; 34; 40; 52; 53; 60) have further extended the influence of Isaiah on western culture. Since the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965), which quotes 2.4 and 32.17 in an important statement on peace and social justice (Gaudium et spes, para. 70), Isaiah has provided liberation theologians and feminists with many of their key scriptural texts.

Isaiah is prominent in synagogue *lectionaries, and has made a profound and distinctive impression on Jewish literary and religious tradition, in particular its Zion-centered visions of justice and peace (e.g., 2.2–4; 11.6–9).

JOHN F. A. SAWYER

Ishmael. Son of *Abraham and *Hagar. A generally positive attitude toward Ishmael and thus toward his descendants is found in the Genesis traditions. He is the recipient of a special divine blessing (Gen 17.20) and is present at the burial of Abraham (25.9). Like Jacob, Ishmael is the father of twelve sons, the ancestors of twelve tribes (Gen 25.16). Another indication of the generally favorable view of this patriarch is the fact that several other later Israelites have the same name. There are, however, hints of ethnic tension in the narratives as well. Like *Cain, Ishmael is depicted as an outcast and prone to violence (Gen. 16.12), and as a wanderer (note the opening words of Melville's Moby-Dick). The Ishmaelites are elsewhere described as leading a typically *nomadic life (Gen. 37.25; Ps. 83.6; 1 Chron. 27.30). The story of Ishmael and Hagar's separation from Abraham's household contains the kind of scurrilous sexual innuendo found elsewhere in *J's etiological narratives concerning Israel's neighbors.

In Muslim tradition, the *Arabs trace their ancestry back to Abraham through Ishmael. Because Ishmael was circumcised (Gen. 17.25), so are most Muslims. And, analogous to Paul's reversal of the figures of *Isaac and Ishmael (Gal. 4.24–26), Muslim tradition makes Ishmael rather than Isaac the son Abraham was commanded to sacrifice (see Aqedah).

MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Israel. The name Israel ("he contended with God") is conferred on *Jacob by a divine messenger after their struggle at the Wadi Jabbok (Gen. 32.28; 35.10; Hos. 12.3). The twelve sons of Jacob and their tribal descendants are therefore called "the sons of Israel" (the Israelites; see Tribes of Israel). The earliest nonbiblical reference to Israel occurs on the inscription of Merneptah, king of Egypt (ca. 1200 BCE).

Israel remains the normal designation for the entire nation until the division of the kingdom in 924 BCE (1 Kings 12.1–20). Biblical authors term the ten northern tribes (i.e., the northern kingdom) Israel and the two southern tribes (i.e., the southern kingdom) Judah. Hence, after the northern kingdom falls (722 BCE) and only Judah remains, its residents are called Judahites or Judeans. (See Israel, History of; Judah, The Kingdom of.)

In the postexilic period the residents of Judah or Yehud are regularly called *Jews, but Israel is also used. In postexilic writings (e.g., Chronicles) the term Israel can therefore denote Jacob, the united kingdom, the northern kingdom, Judah, or simply the descendants of Israel. In some cases, the meaning of Israel is, however, deliberately more restrictive (e.g., the returning exiles in Ezra 2.2, 70).

In rabbinic literature Israel refers to the Jewish people, and the land of Israel describes the country of the Israelite people. In the New Testament Israel can refer to the Jewish people (2 Cor. 3.12; Rom. 11.26) or to the church (Gal. 6.16).

GARY N. KNOPPERS

Israel, History of.

The Biblical Story of Israel. Genesis 32.28 reports God's words to Jacob: "You shall no longer be called Jacob, but Israel, for you have striven with God and with humans, and have prevailed." As the biblical narrative continues, one reads that *Jacob/Israel immigrated with his family to *Egypt where, during a long sojourn, his twelve sons fathered twelve *tribes. Eventually, these twelve "Israelite" tribes were led out of Egypt by *Moses, wandered for forty years in the *wilderness, and finally reached the plains of *Moab east of the *Jordan River. At that point in the biblical narrative, *Joshua succeeded Moses and led the tribes across the Jordan into *Canaan, where they took possession of the land and divided it among themselves. The book of *Judges finds the tribes settled in Canaan following Joshua's death, without stable leadership and often oppressed by surrounding peoples. "In those days there was no king in Israel; all the people did what was right in their own eyes" (Judg. 17.6).

In the time of the prophet *Samuel, when the *Philistines were oppressing Israel, the people cried out to Samuel to give them a king. Against his better judgment, Samuel accommodated their desire by anointing *Saul to be the first king of Israel. Thus Saul, followed by *David and then *Solomon, ruled over a kingdom that consisted primarily of the twelve Israelite tribes with their respective territories. When Solomon died, this Israelite monarchy split into two rival kingdoms—a northern kingdom, composed of ten tribes, which kept the name Israel, and a southern kingdom, composed of the two remaining tribes, *Judah and *Benjamin, which took the name Judah. These two kingdoms existed side-by-side for two centuries, sometimes at war with each other, sometimes at peace, until the northern kingdom was conquered by *Assyria and its territory annexed by that great empire (722 BCE). Judah also fell under Assyrian domination, but it maintained its political identity for almost a century and a half, until it fell to the *Babylonians (587/586 BCE).

Hopes of national recovery remained alive during the long years of Assyrian and Babylonian domination, however, and continued in the Jewish community (the remnant of the kingdom of Judah) that struggled for survival under *Persian rule. These hopes are expressed in the prophetical books of the Hebrew Bible. Moreover, the hope was not just for recovery of Judah but for a united Israel as it had existed in the "golden age" of David and Solomon.

Thus, the biblical writers use the name Israel in different ways. It can refer to the patriarch Jacob (Gen. 35.21–22; 43.6–11); to the twelve tribes (constantly referred to as "the children of Israel" in the books Exodus through Judges); to the early united monarchy ruled over by Saul, David, and Solomon (1 Sam. 13.1; 14.47–48; 2 Sam. 8.15; 1 Kings 4.1; etc.); to the northern kingdom after the split of the united monarchy (1 Kings 14.19; 15.25; 2 Kings 17.21–23); or to the restored nation hoped for in the future (Amos 9.13–15; Zeph. 3.14–20).

Historical Uncertainties and Extrabiblical Sources. The biblical story of Israel, when examined in detail, presents numerous internal inconsistencies—for example, the several enumerations of the Israelite tribes do not always identify the same twelve (compare Gen. 49; Num. 1.20–43; 26.5–50; Deut. 33), nor do they take into account other important tribal groups such as the Calebites and Kenizzites. Moreover, the story presupposes concepts that were generally accepted in ancient times but not today, such as the idea that each of the world's nations descended from a single individual (see Gen. 10).

An Egyptian inscription from the reign of Pharaoh Merneptah (ca. 1200 BCE) provides the earliest known nonbiblical reference to Israel, and the only such reference earlier than the ninth century BCE. The Merneptah inscription is a royal monumental text inscribed on a stele discovered at the site of ancient Thebes. Unfortunately, we learn no more from it regarding Israel than that a people known by that name was on the scene in Palestine by the end of the thirteenth century. Later texts from the ninth century are also royal inscriptions, one commissioned by King Mesha of Moab (see 2 Kings 3 and *Moabite Stone), and several others from the reign of an Assyrian king, Shalmaneser III (858–824 BCE). Israel and Judah were separate kingdoms by the ninth century, and it is Israel that figures in these texts. Mesha reports that King Omri of Israel had "humbled" Moab and claims recovery of Moabite independence among the accomplishments of his own reign. Shalmaneser reports a series of military campaigns into Syria-Palestine and mentions in that context two Israelite kings, *Ahab and *Jehu. Occasional references to Israelite and Judean kings appear in later Assyrian and Babylonian documents, usually in the context of military campaign reports. These references in extrabiblical documents are especially useful for establishing a chronological framework for the Israelite and Judean kings and for correlating biblical history with international affairs.

*Archaeological excavations at Palestinian sites provide information about the material culture of biblical times and also allow for some correlations. For example, the time of the "judges" in Israel would seem to correspond roughly to the opening centuries of the Iron Age (ca. 1200–1000 BCE), which was a period of transition and change in Palestine. Many of the old cities that had flourished during the Bronze Age, especially in the lowlands, were destroyed. Most of them were rebuilt but on a much smaller scale. At the same time, there was a marked increase in the number of small village settlements in areas such as the central hill country, which seem to have been only sparsely populated during the Bronze Age. Note that most of the stories of the book of Judges have their setting among the villages in the north-central (Ephraimite) hill country. (See Conquest of Canaan.)

The writer of 2 Kings 9.10–14 credits Solomon with building (or fortifying) several cities including *Hazor, *Megiddo, and *Gezer. Excavations at all three of these places have unearthed remains of buildings and fortifications that date from approximately 1000 BCE; their relatively impressive scale is suggestive of royal architecture, and for this reason archaeologists generally associate them with Solomon. A somewhat more impressive royal building program from approximately the ninth century seems to be indicated by the ruins at Hazor, Megiddo, and *Samaria. This second building program generally is associated with the Omride rulers of Israel, particularly Omri and Ahab. Remains from later phases of the cities and villages of Israel and Judah show a marked decline in material wealth, many of them ending finally with destruction in approximately the seventh and early sixth centuries BCE. No doubt these later phases correspond to the years of foreign domination by the Syrians, Assyrians, and *Babylonians.

Contemporary Views Regarding the History of Israel. Given the uncertainties that arise from the biblical story, the paucity of references to Israel or Israelites in extrabiblical documents, and the very generalized nature of evidence from artifacts, it is not surprising that present-day scholars hold widely divergent views concerning Israel's history. At one extreme are those who hold that the biblical story is an essentially accurate portrayal of Israel's past; at the other are those who see the Bible as a virtually useless source for historical information and regard it as futile even to speculate on the details of Israelite history. Most biblical scholars and ancient historians hold a moderate position between these two extremes. There seems to be a growing consensus, for example, on the following points.

Nothing can be said with certainty about the origin of the various tribes and clans that composed early Israel and Judah. For the most part, these tribal groupings probably emerged gradually from the diffuse population of Late Bronze and early Iron Age Palestine rather than having entered the land from elsewhere. The name Israel probably referred in premonarchic times primarily to the tribe of *Ephraim, settled in the north-central hill country, but would have been understood to include certain surrounding tribes (such as Benjamin, *Manasseh, and Gilead) that Ephraim dominated. This Ephraim/Israel tribal group would have been the Israel to which the Merneptah inscription refers; most of the stories in the book of Judges have to do with this tribal group; and it was the core of Saul's kingdom, which he appropriately called Israel.

One should not think of Saul's Israel as a highly organized kingdom with precisely defined boundaries. Moreover, loyalty to him probably varied from region to region, with Saul's strongest base of support being the Ephraim-Benjamin-Gilead-Manasseh zone. There is nothing to suggest that the Galilean tribes were part of his kingdom. His campaign against the *Amalekites (1 Sam. 15) implies thoroughfare through Judahite territory. Saul also received some Judean support in his attempts to arrest David (1 Sam. 23.12–13; 26.1–5). This, however, does not necessarily mean that he exercised any sort of permanent control over Judah. In Judah, as in other peripheral areas, Saul's authority probably lasted only as long as he was present with his troops or the local people needed his protection against some other threat.

The battle of Gilboa, in which Saul and Jonathan were killed, left the kingdom on the verge of collapse (1 Sam. 31.1–7). A surviving son (Ishbaal [Ishbosheth]) claimed the throne but transferred his residency to Mahanaim in Transjordan and soon was assassinated (2 Sam 2.8–10; 4.1–3). Thereupon the elders of Israel went to David, who in the meantime had established a kingdom in the south-central "Judean" hill country, and recognized him as their ruler also (2 Sam. 2.1–4; 5.1–3). Later David would make *Jerusalem his capital and expand his realm to include much of Palestine (2 Sam. 5.6–10; 8).

Thus, the Davidic-Solomonic monarchy was not exactly continuous with Saul's Israel. Moreover, the Israelites appear to have maintained their separate identity under David and Solomon—for example, there was some rivalry between the Israelites and the Judahites (2 Sam. 19.41–43), as well as ongoing opposition to Davidic rule. The Israelites played a central role in both *Absalom's and Sheba's rebellions against David (2 Sam. 15–20); Solomon subjected them to forced labor in connection with his royal building projects (1 Kings 11.28); and when Solomon died they rebelled again, this time successfully (1 Kings 12.1–20). Thus was established the northern Israelite kingdom, which the biblical writers depict as a rebel and apostate state, but which the rebels themselves no doubt regarded as a restoration of pre-Davidic Israel. At the core of the rebel (or restored) kingdom was the old Ephraim/Israel tribal area, but it included additional territories (e.g., Jezreel and *Galilee) and cities (e.g., *Shechem) that had been annexed by David. The small tribal area of Benjamin became a disputed frontier between the rival kingdoms of Israel and Judah.

The northern kingdom of Israel lasted approximately two centuries (ca. 924–722 BCE), which may be divided into four phases.

Unstable beginnings (ca. 924–885). Separation left both Israel and Judah weak, while mutual warfare drained their strength even further. Moreover, Israel suffered dynastic instability that resulted finally in civil war. (See especially 1 Kings 15.25–16.22.)

The Omride dynasty (ca. 885–843). Omri, who emerged victorious from the civil war, founded a dynasty that continued through four kings. Under Omri and his son *Ahab, Israel enjoyed a period of international prestige and internal prosperity that may have surpassed that of Solomon's day. Israel clearly overshadowed and probably dominated Judah during this period. Omri built a new capital for the kingdom, which he named *Samaria. The Omride period was remembered, however, as a time of economic and social injustice, and of conflict between Baalism and Yahwism. *Elijah and *Jezebel were colorful characters of the Omride era. (See especially 1 Kings 15.21–2 Kings 10.27.)

The Jehu dynasty (ca. 843–745). Simultaneous and related palace coups brought a new ruler to the thrones of both Israel and Judah in approximately 843 BCE. *Jehu, who seized power in Israel under the banner of Yahwism, founded a dynasty that lasted approximately a century. *Damascus, however, was already on the rise when Jehu seized the throne, and it totally dominated Israel during the reigns of Jehu and his son, Jehoahaz. Damascus, faced with problems from the direction of Assyria, eventually lost its hold on Israel, and Israel in turn enjoyed a brief period of recovery and prosperity. The moment of prosperity is to be associated especially with the reign of Jeroboam II. The *Elisha stories reflect the difficult times experienced by the people of Israel during the early years of the Jehu dynasty, the years of Syrian domination. The book of Amos reflects the situation during the later years, when Israel is enjoying a recovery of prosperity, and implies that the problems of economic and social injustice remained. Zechariah, son of Jeroboam II, was assassinated soon after coming to the throne in approximately 745 BCE, and *Tiglath-pileser III ascended the Assyrian throne the following year. Israel's end was near. (See especially 2 Kings 9–10; 12.17–13.25; 14.23–29; 15.8–12.)

Assyrian conquest and annexation (745–722). Already during the Omride era, Assyrian kings had threatened the little kingdoms of Syria-Palestine in general and Israel in particular. Now Assyria turned its attention to the west and, under *Tiglath-pileser III (744–727), secured a firm grip on the whole region. Israel, which offered some resistance at first in coordination with Damascus, was reduced to vassal status and Hoshea confirmed as king. After Tiglath-pileser's death, however, Hoshea attempted to throw off the Assyrian yoke. This was a disastrous move: Assyria conquered Samaria, annexed the kingdom's territory, exiled thousands of its leading citizens, and replaced them with foreigners from other conquered lands. (See especially 2 Kings 15.13–31; 17.)

The remnants of the kingdom of Israel usually are referred to in later literature as *Samaritans, after the name of the kingdom's chief city founded by Omri (e.g., Luke 9.52; 10.29–41; John 4.1–42). A small group of Samaritans still survives in the vicinity of Nablus.

Israel, Religion of.

Ancient Israel and Its Ancient Near Eastern Setting. Scholarship on ancient Israelite religion seems to swing back and forth, as if attached to a great pendulum, between those who advocate the uniqueness of the biblical revelation (the "biblical theology" approach) and those who assert that ancient Israelite religion is cut from the same cloth as other ancient Near Eastern religions (the "history of religions" approach). Much of the swing toward the latter was occasioned by archaeological discoveries that correlate the Bible and its ancient Near Eastern setting.

Most scholars of ancient Israelite religion argue that we should no longer refer to the Bible and the ancient Near East, as if the former were not a part of the latter. By affirming Israel's cultural and material solidarity with its neighbors, scholars have underscored that the study of ancient Israelite religion must be anchored in its historical ancient Near Eastern moorings. This need not prevent us from affirming that ancient Israel developed uniquely; by definition, all societies form cultural configurations that are distinct. The belief system that emerged from ancient Israel, especially in its conception of the divine, was indeed radical in its context.

The Formative Period. Scholars have been able to document the Canaanite heritage of ancient Israelite religion. Ancestral religion, for example, with its worship of El (as exemplified by titles found in Genesis such as El Shadday, El Elyon, El Bethel, and El, the God of Israel), is directly related to the Canaanite deity El described in the *Ugaritic texts.

Yet scholars have found it more difficult to describe the underlying reasons that led Israel to come up with a configuration of beliefs, such as *monotheism and the absence of divine sex and death, that was radical in its West Semitic Canaanite context. A closely related debate is the date assigned to the formative period for these beliefs. Scholars such as Julius Wellhausen reconstructed an evolutionary process whereby a gradual progression from polytheism and then henotheism eventually led to the "ethical monotheism" of the prophets of the eighth century BCE and later. Others, such as W. F. Albright and Yehezkel Kaufmann, argued for an early crystallization of revolutionary beliefs such as monotheism during the time of *Moses. Such debates have continued and always involve various theories on the settlement of Palestine and the archaeological evidence for the transition from the Late Bronze to the Iron Age (see Conquest of Canaan).

Nature and Scope. Past treatments of ancient Israelite religion were excessively narrow, treating only the "orthodox" religion described by the majority of biblical texts. While the biblical Yahwism that eventually emerged as normative takes center stage for most people, today emphasis is also placed on religious conceptions that were very much a part of ancient Israelite society yet were eventually seen as nonnormative (e.g., Asherah, cults of the dead; see below). In other words, scholars now argue that Israelite religion must be studied from its earliest times to its latest. One should not opt for late Israelite religion (e.g., Deuteronomic or prophetic) while ignoring early forms, even if it seems that the religion of the early period cannot be easily divorced from Canaanite religion.

Sources. The Hebrew Bible is the most important document for studying ancient Israelite religion, yet it has its limitations. It must be understood as collections selected and edited according to certain criteria (e.g., Judean ideology, Deuteronomic theology). Yet this is hardly different from most other ancient Near Eastern texts or even modern literature in which writers selectively edit their material.

Current scholarship runs the full spectrum from pessimism to optimism about our ability to uncover early Israelite religion. Some scholars emphasize that the majority of texts stem from later times and are more or less useless for reconstructing the earlier stages. Others, such as Albright, Frank Moore Cross, David Noel Freedman, and Johannes C. de Moor, argue that some texts, primarily poetic ones, do contain material from the earliest periods of ancient Israel's existence. All scholars face an array of questions when working with material that has an overlay of late editing. To what degree can we unearth the earlier stages of the religion? Can we uncover nonorthodox viewpoints? Does later editing, even later reworking of material, obscure every trace of early beliefs or practices that might have been more at home in the family worship than in the cult which became normative?

*Archaeology provides windows into the diversity of ancient Israelite religion. It uncovers physical remains of temples and various cult paraphernalia regardless of whether such sanctuaries and cultic objects were considered legitimate or apostate. Household shrines, foundations deposits, funeral offerings, and *burials provide new dates on which to reconstruct practices characteristic of family worship and thus outside the scope of most biblical writers. Inscriptional evidence gives us empirical data (such as theophoric elements in personal names) free from the heavy editing of most literary works. But archaeology also has its limitations, such as a simple lack of evidence. At times the extant material remains can be just as restrictive as the biblical texts. The interpretation of the evidence is also subjective and sometimes even dogmatic. But archaeology's biggest shortcoming for reconstructing religion is that it is hard-pressed to comment on underlying causes and ideologies such as monotheism.

It has been widely assumed that a great deal can be learned about a religion by looking at theophoric elements (divine names or titles) in personal *names, for the ancients often gave their children names reflecting the deity or dei-ties whom they worshiped. Yet because of social convention, personal names do not necessarily provide full and accurate evidence of explicit religious devotion. Even polytheists such as *Ahab, *Jezebel, and Athaliah could give their children Yahwistic names. One should ask to what degree this might have been a widespread practice among polytheists who for some reason (e.g., political motivation, fear of repression) adopted the name of the national deity yet in practice worshiped other deities. The absence of naming after goddesses, especially that of *Asherah, has been considered significant. Yet at ancient Ugarit there was a vibrant cult dedicated to Asherah but only one attestation of her name as the theophoric element in a personal name.

Key Concepts. Monotheism. The Israelite deity goes by the names of El/Elohim (a common Semitic noun for "god") and Yahweh. There is universal agreement that Yahweh is derived from the verb "to be," but scholars differ over whether the verb underlying the name is noncausative (see Exod. 3.14) or causative, "the one who causes to come into being," that is, a reference to the deity's role as creator; the latter seems preferable. (See also Names of God in the Hebrew Bible.) Scholars emphasizing the Canaanite heritage also draw parallels between Israelite El/Elohim and Yahweh and the Amorite/Canaanite deities El and *Baal. A correlative issue is the relation of the names Elohim and Yahweh and their connection to the "god of the fathers" of Israelite ancestral tradition. Some, such as Cross, see in Yahweh an original epithet of the ancestral deity El ("El, who causes the heavenly hosts to come into being"). Others, such as de Moor, have argued for Yahweh-El as a south Canaanite form of the gods of the fathers.

Tracing the development of monotheism in ancient Israel is a complex endeavor with little consensus among scholars. One can easily find an advocate for placing the origin of monotheism in every age from the ancestral down to the exilic. Often one's views of monotheism are tied to equally difficult issues, such as the historicity of the *ancestors, the person of Moses, the makeup of the tribal league, kinship relations, the settlement of the land of Israel, and the social function of the *prophets.

In the early period there are clear indications of henotheism or monolatry, the worship of a single deity though recognizing the existence of others. Ancestral religion with its focus on the worship of El seems to point to a monolatrous El cult. Other texts emphasize the presence of other deities. In Psalm 29 we read of the beckoning of the gods to praise Yahweh, and Psalm 82 represents Yahweh judging the gods (cf. Gen 1.26; 6.2; Exod. 12.12; 15.11; Deut. 32.8–9; Josh 24.15; see also Sons of God).

Recently scholars have emphasized the role of the monarchy in the development of nationalistic exclusivity and corresponding monolatrous tendencies. Baruch Halpern sees in *Josiah's reform a "self-conscious monotheism" (see Kingship and Monarchy). Further examples of explicit monotheism can be found in relatively late texts. Thus, Jeremiah no longer describes other deities as options but rather as "cracked cisterns that can hold no water" (Jer. 2.13). Explicit monotheism finds its most articulate voice in Second Isaiah: "I am Yahweh, and there is no other; besides me there is no god" (Isa. 45.5).

The goddess Asherah. The goddess *Asherah has always been known in the Bible through curious references to some type of cult object usually translated as "asherah pole." Some scholars see hints of her in Genesis 49.25 and Amos 8.14, but these verses are textually very difficult. The absence of any destruction of the prophets of Asherah in the *Elijah narrative is intriguing. Similarly, *Jehu destroys the Baal from Israel, yet no mention is made of Asherah (2 Kings 10.18–28; cf. 13.6).

Recently, the goddess and her possible roles have been studied intensively, owing to the discovery of enigmatic inscriptions referring to "Yahweh and his/its(?) Asherah/asherah" at Kuntillet Ajrud and Khirbet el-Qom. As a result some scholars have concluded that Asherah was worshiped in ancient Israel as the consort of Yahweh. But others have argued for an understanding of the word "asherah" as a symbol within the cult of Yahweh rather than a reference to the goddess herself.

Asherah/asherah was certainly present in monarchic Israel. But ancient Israelite society was more pluralistic than we usually assume. There were probably numerous differing viewpoints, many at odds with each other, and they most likely differed from city to city. The asherah symbol in its origin is not easily divorced from the goddess Asherah. Different groups may had differing degrees of toleration when someone mentioned "Yahweh and his asherah." Some may have believed Yahweh to be the national deity, yet had no problem in worshiping local Asherah deities, especially in cults dealing with fertility and agriculture. Other circles freely appropriated mythic imagery apart from mythic content, and thus for them the symbol was a legitimate part of Yahwistic religion. For yet others, such as certain prophetic groups and the Deuteronomist, who argued for exclusive worship of Yahweh, any hint of the goddess deserved condemnation.

The break with ancient Near Eastern myth. Some scholars of Israelite religion, such as Yehezkel Kaufmann and Michael Fishbane, have been struck by the Bible's break with ancient Near Eastern mythical consciousness. This new paradigm was characterized by a "creator-creature distinction" in which an autonomous God is portrayed a distinct from the created world. In addition, sex and death are conspicuously absent when the biblical god is depicted, in contrast to the prevalence of these motifs in other ancient Near Eastern literatures. Admitting henotheism in the early period, one must still recognize that the deity of the Hebrew Bible is not part of a pantheon and is not described as having any sexual relations with any consort, nor does he impregnate animals as does Baal in one of the Ugaritic texts. He is not a "dying and rising god" like Canaanite Baal or Egyptian Osiris. The biblical deity does not imbibe, unlike Canaanite El, described in another text as a pathetic drunkard. In short, the divine is portrayed more transcendently; God is not dependent on any outside power. (See also Myth.)

The development of this new paradigm was part of a process whereby Israelite religion emerged from its Canaanite context and changed from polytheism to monolatry and eventually to monotheism. From all indications this differentiation appeared quite early, although this is not to say that mythic imagery, especially with regard to fertility and *death, does not permeate the Bible, as Marvin Pope has shown.

The aniconic tradition. The novelty of the absence of divine iconography in Israelite religion was not lost even on the ancients. The Roman historian Tacitus thought it bizarre that the Jews would prohibit portrayal of the divine. Modern scholars have a better footing to debate the question thanks to archaeological evidence. In addition to the biblical description of Yahweh invisibly enthroned on the *cherubim (Exod. 25.22; Ps. 80.1), scholars have also looked to data such as an incense stand from Taanach as a depiction of an unseen deity. The most relevant archaeological material is the plethora of bronze and terra cotta figurines depicting Canaanite deities. In light of these, it is remarkable how few material remains exist that document the physical portrayal of Yahweh.

The scholarly debate over the origin of the aniconic tradition goes hand in hand with the debate over the origin of monotheism. Tryvge N. D. Mettinger has noted that the theology associated with the *ark of the covenant was centered on an aniconic deity. Yet he argues that the polemic against images did not reach its full force until the prophet Hosea. Ronald S. Hendel has underscored the role of divine iconography in legitimating royalty throughout the ancient Near East, and thus he traces the origin of the aniconic tradition in Israel back to the bias against kingship.

God versus the dragon and the sea. Some of the clearest examples of mythic imagery in the Bible are the descriptions of God battling a personified sea as well as a dragonlike creature called *Leviathan and *Rahab. Cross has stressed that God's battle with Leviathan, Sea, and Death (see Isa. 25.8) are alloforms of one basic cosmogonic myth in which the Divine Warrior is victorious over the forces of *chaos, found for example in Mesopotamian (Marduk vs. Tiamat) and Canaanite (Baal and Anat vs. Sea, Lotan, and Mot) mythologies. In Psalm 74.13–14 God crushes the heads of Leviathan, a close parallel to the seven-headed dragon creature of the same name known from Ugaritic. Chaos imagery is applied to historical forces (often Egypt), which Yahweh defeats in like manner (Isa. 30.7; Ezek. 29.3–5; 32.2–8; Exod. 15), and is often projected into future eschatological battles. Isaiah 27.1 describes such a battle in which Yahweh will destroy the twisting serpent Leviathan with his mighty sword. The longevity of the theme can be seen in the account in Revelation 12–13 of the defeat of the seven-headed dragon and the seven-headed beast.

The cult and abode of the dead. The biblical idioms for death, "being gathered to one's kin" and "sleeping with one's fathers," underscore the clan solidarity within ancient Israel. Nevertheless, the Yahwism that emerged as normative condemned the worship of the deceased and any form of necromancy (Lev. 19.26–32; 20.6, 27; Deut. 14.1; 18.10–11; 26.14). On the other hand, the Hebrew Bible also gives witness to the practice of certain death rituals. Note especially 1 Samuel 28, where *Saul has a necromancer conjure the dead *Samuel from the grave; the

Deuteronomic historian used this well-known tale to underscore the demise of Saul, yet he left the efficacy of the practice intact. (See also Witch.)

Various Hebrew terms are used, often in parallelism, to describe the abode of the dead, including Sheol, Death, and two words meaning "the Pit." Both Sheol and Death are also used for the personified chthonic power behind death (cf. the Ugaritic god Mot, whose name means "Death"). As a location, Sheol is described as the lowest place imaginable (Deut. 32.22; Isa. 7.11), often in contrast with the highest heavens (Amos 9.2; Ps. 139.8; Job 11.8). Sheol is frequently associated with water images (Jon. 2.3–6), often echoing the stories of divine combat. The gates of the underworld frequently mentioned in Egyptian and Mesopotamian accounts are also found in the Bible (Isa. 38.10; Ps. 9.13; 107.18; Job 38.17; cf. Wisd. of Sol. 16.13; Matt. 16.18). Thus Sheol is a place of imprisonment from which one cannot escape (Job 7.9). The personification of Sheol and Death can be seen in descriptions of their insatiable appetites (Isa. 5.14; Hab. 2.5; Prov. 27.20; 30.15b–16), remarkably reminiscent of the Canaanite deity Mot's voracious appetite. Conclusion. Many scholars have looked to the premonarchic league period to find the origins of ancient Israel's unique configuration, and have produced an array of hypotheses dependent on their views of the conquest/settlement of ancient Israel. Recently archaeologists have reemphasized the indigenous nature of early Israel; yet outside influences certainly played a substantial role. Thus, many look for the key to unlock Israel's radical configuration in the early league (Cross), Mosaic (Freedman), or even pre-Mosaic (de Moor) periods. It will remain difficult, however, to illuminate the social and political background of this period given the paucity of textual and material evidence and the fact that the texts we do have may not constitute plausible historical witnesses.

Ancient Israelite religion encompasses the full spectrum of religious belief and practice, and in addition to the cross-references given above, the reader should look to specialized entries such as the following for a more complete picture: Altars; Apocalyptic Literature; Astarte; Circumcision; Covenant; Creation; Demons; Dreams; Ephod; Eschatology; Feasts and Festival; Graven Image; Heaven; Hell; High Place; Idols, Idolatry; Kingship and Monarchy; Magic and Divination; Mourning; Nephilim; Passover; Prayer(s); Priests and High Priest; Prophets; Queen of Heaven; Rephaim; Righteousness; Sabbath; Sacrifice; Satan; Seraph, Seraphim; Sin; Tammuz; Temple; Teraphim; Theophany; Tribes of Israel; Urim and Thummim; Women, article on Women in the Ancient Near East and Israel.

Issachar. A son of *Leah and *Jacob and one of the twelve *tribes of Israel. The name combines Hebrew words for "man" and "wages"; hence Leah's exclamation "God has given me my hire" (Gen. 30.18). The territory allotted to Issachar (Josh. 17.10; 19.17–23) lies in the plain of Jezreel (Map 3:X3). References to Issachar suggest close associations between it and *Zebulun (Gen. 49.13–14; Deut. 33.18). Issachar, the probable home of *Deborah, played an essential role in her campaign against Sisera (Judg. 5.15). The territory of Issachar was conquered by the *Assyrians in 732 BCE. GARY N. KNOPPERS

Italics. Aldus Manutius (1450–1515), the famous Venetian printer, startled literate Europe in 1501 by publishing the writings of Virgil in a new font of type, characterized by sloping letters somewhat resembling handwriting. That new font of type was called italic, after the ancient name of Italy. As time went on it was discovered that the new typeface was not as easy to read as roman type; hence italic is not used today for the major text of a document but is reserved for specialized uses, such as the titles of books and magazines, foreign words and phrases, scientific names of genera and species, the names of plaintiff and defendant in legal citations, and, most commonly, to point out words that demand special emphasis. None of these uses, however, accounts for the presence of italics in the text of Bibles.

Sebastian Münster (1489–1552), who devoted his lifetime to the study of Hebrew and who produced over forty books, issued the first edition of the Hebrew Bible with a fresh Latin translation. For this Latin version, Münster conceived of the novel idea of printing words not present in the original Hebrew but necessary for idiomatic Latin in small roman type so as to distinguish them from the body of the text. This idea was followed, with modifications, by Calvin's cousin Olivétan in his French Bible of 1535, by Miles Coverdale in the "Great Bible" of 1539, and in the Geneva Bible of 1557–1560, the most popular Bible of the sixteenth century, which introduced the innovation of using italic type for words supplied to complete the sense that had no equivalent in the original.

The Bishops' Bible of 1568 and the original King James Version of 1611 both resumed the use of roman type for words supplied by the revisers. But in 1612, an edition of the King James Version was printed using a small clear roman type, and italics were used for the additions. This practice became standard in subsequent editions and revisions into the twentieth century. The Revised Standard Version (1946; 1952) completely abandoned the practice of using italics for words added by translators to complete or clarify the meaning, the committee regarding such words as an essential part of the translation. Almost all other English translations of the Bible made in the twentieth century have likewise dropped this use of italics as basically misleading, since the ordinary use of italics is to show special emphasis.

J

J. The abbreviation for the Yahwist "source" in the *Pentateuch, derived from the German spelling (Jahwe) of the divine name Yahweh (see Names of God). Beginning in the eighteenth century, scholars noticed that two different names were used for the deity in the book of *Genesis, and using this as a criterion, identified separate sources or traditions or documents. As this analysis matured, the J tradition was traced in the rest of the Pentateuch (and by some in the books of Joshua and Judges and beyond), and was dated to the ninth (or perhaps the tenth) century BCE, though presumably using earlier sources. It is thought to have originated in *Jerusalem. Its characteristics include the frequent use of anthropomorphism in depictions of Yahweh (e.g., Gen. 2.7, 8, 21; 3.8, 21; 7.17b; 8.21); the theme of divine promise of land, descendants, and blessing and its fulfillment; and a focus in the ancestral narratives in Genesis on the territory later controlled by Judah. Subsequent scholars postulated the existence of multiple editions and revisions of J. More recently, several scholars have questioned much of the above analysis, particularly J's date, which has been set by some after the *exile. MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Jacob. Son of *Isaac and *Rebekah and younger brother of *Esau. The Bible presents Jacob in a double light. On the one hand, he is the revered ancestor of the people of Israel, and indeed the name "*Israel" is said to have been given him by God after he had wrestled with God himself at Penuel (Gen. 32.28; but see also Gen. 35.10); on the other, he is a trickster, who deceives his brother into parting with his birthright (Gen. 25.29–34) and his father into giving him the blessing of the firstborn that should have belonged to Esau (Gen. 27). Hosea 12.2–6 and Isaiah 43.27 may well indicate that Jacob's acts were later regarded as sinful, although the accounts in Genesis seem to record them without censure. Jacob is presented as a pastoralist, whereas Esau is a hunter (Gen. 25.27), and the stories about them may reflect rivalries between these two groups in later times, as with the story of *Cain and *Abel (Gen. 4.1–16); equally, they are contrasted as the ancestors respectively of Israelites and *Edomites (Gen. 32.3).

Jacob, like his father Isaac, seeks a wife in Mesopotamia (Gen. 28.1–5). On the way Jacob encamps at Bethel and there in a dream sees divine messengers ascending and descending on a staircase between earth and heaven (see Angels) and erects a pillar to commemorate the incident—perhaps a story to explain why Israelites worshiped at what had been a Canaanite sanctuary. Jacob the trickster is himself tricked by his uncle Laban into working fourteen years to obtain the wife he desires, *Rachel; Jacob contracts to work for seven years but at the end of that time is given *Leah, her elder sister, instead (Gen. 29.15–30). Jacob has his revenge on Laban by swindling him out of large flocks and herds (Gen. 30.25–31.21) and flees from Laban's house to return to the land of *Canaan but is finally reconciled with his uncle (Gen. 31.36–54). After the mysterious incident at Penuel there follows a reconciliation also with Esau (Gen. 33.1–16).

The remaining stories of Jacob focus on the deeds of his children, the ancestors of the twelve *tribes of Israel. Jacob appears as an old man in the story of *Joseph (Gen. 37; 39–50), where the theme of trickery recurs in the deceit by which he is robbed of his favorite son by Joseph's jealous brothers (Gen. 42.36). Eventually Jacob goes down to Egypt with his sons and dies there (Gen. 49.33), but his embalmed body (Gen. 50.2–3) is taken for burial to the land of Canaan by Joseph and his brothers (Gen 50.7–13). The blessing of Jacob (Gen. 49.2–27) is widely held to contain some of the oldest poetry in the Bible. JOHN BARTON

Jambres. See Jannes and Jambres.

James. Four persons in the New Testament have the name "James" (Greek Iakōbos), which is one of two Greek forms of the Hebrew name Jacob (the other being the simple transliteration Iakōb). Since *Jacob was a revered ancestor of Israel, James was a common name among Jews in the Roman period.

James, Son of Zebedee, was a Galilean fisherman in the area of *Capernaum on the Sea of *Galilee, a partner (along with his brother *John) of *Simon Peter (Luke 5.10). He was working in the family business headed by his father when called by Jesus to be his disciple (Mark 1.19–20). James and John along with Peter formed the inner core of three among the *twelve apostles; they witnessed the raising of Jairus's daughter, were present at the transfiguration, and observed (and partially slept through) Jesus' agony in *Gethsemane.

Apparently James and John either expressed themselves explosively or expected God to bring sudden judgment on the enemies of Jesus, for they were nicknamed "Boanerges" ("sons of thunder," Mark 3.17; cf. Luke 9.51–56). Their request to sit at Jesus' right and left hand in his kingdom earned them the anger of the other apostles and a mild rebuke from Jesus (Mark 10.35–45; Matt. 20.20–28; Luke 22.24–27).

Outside the synoptic Gospels James, son of Zebedee, appears only in Acts. He was present in the upper room with the group waiting for *Pentecost (Acts 1.13). The only other reference to him in the New Testament is the cryptic note that Herod (Agrippa I) had him killed (Acts 12.2). He was thus the second recorded martyr of the church (after *Stephen) and the first of the apostolic band to die (except for *Judas Iscariot, who had been replaced as an apostle).

James, Son of Alphaeus, was a Galilean Jew and one of the *twelve (Matt. 10.3; Mark 3.18; Luke 6.15; Acts 1.13); many believe he is the same person as James the younger (Mark 15.40). The Greek term translated "the younger" can also be translated "the little," which probably gives the correct meaning (i.e., he was shorter than James, son of Zebedee). If this identification is correct, this otherwise unknown apostle had a mother named Mary who was present at the crucifixion and was a witness of the resurrection and a brother Joseph (or Joses) who was probably a well-known early Christian (Matt. 27.56; Mark 16.1; Luke 24.10).

James, Father (KJV "brother") of the Apostle Judas (not Iscariot), is mentioned only by Luke (Luke 6.16; Acts 1.13). Nothing further is known about him.

James, Brother of Jesus, is named in Matthew 13.55 and Mark 6.3 along with three other brothers of Jesus (see Brothers and Sisters of Jesus). The Gospels indicate that neither James nor his brothers were followers of Jesus before the *crucifixion (Mark 3.21, 1–35; Luke 8.19–20; Matt. 12–46–50; John 7.1–9). After the *Resurrection, however, these same brothers are mentioned among the group of believers at prayer before *Pentecost (Acts 1.14). *Paul explains the reason for this change of heart (at least in James) in the statement that the risen Jesus had appeared personally to James (1 Cor. 15.7). James apparently rose quickly in the ranks of the church. In Acts 15.13 it is James, not Peter, who is named as the preeminent leader who summed up the deliberations of the council at Jerusalem (49 or 50 CE; see Apostolic Council). Thus, he is viewed as the person who presided over the compromise that allowed Jewish and gentile Christians to remain unified without either forcing *gentiles to become Jews or violating Jewish cultural sensibilities (see also Acts 21.18–26).

In his letter to the *Galatians (2.9), Paul mentions James along with Peter and John, son of Zebedee, as "acknowledged pillars" of the church at Jerusalem. James's authority appears clearly in Galatians 2.12, for emissaries from Jerusalem are said to come "from James" and apparently therefore had authority as his official representatives. Scholars are divided over whether the effort of the emissaries to split Jewish from gentile congregations was James's position (in which case Paul and Acts give differing pictures of James) or whether he had sent them for some other purpose.

James's leadership was well enough known so that the letter of James (see next entry) is attributed to him with a simple "James, a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ" (James 1.1), and the author of the letter of *Jude identifies himself as "Jude, a servant of Jesus Christ and brother of James" (Jude 1). While the attribution of both these letters is debated, there is reason to believe that at least the material in the letter of James, if not the writing itself, stems from the brother of Jesus, and this material reveals an authoritative leader in a Palestinian context.

In 61 CE James suffered martyrdom at the instigation of the high priest Ananus after the sudden death in office of the procurator Festus (Josephus, Ant. 20.9.200). In the following centuries legends about James developed. For example, Hegesippus reports that James was known as "James the Just" because of his exemplary piety (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 2.23), and Jerome connects him with the lost apocryphal Gospel according to the Hebrews (De viris illustribus 2). But other than the fact of his martyrdom and its approximate date, there is little evidence that any of these legends are accurate, and most are certainly apocryphal. PETER H. DAVIDS

James, The Letter of

Outline. The letter of James is a literary composition (i.e., a letter designed to be published rather than dispatched like a true letter) and follows the conventions of the literary letter in its structure:

I. Greeting (1.1)
II. Opening statement (1.2–27)
  A. Testing, wisdom, and wealth (1.2–11)
    1. Testing and faith (1.2–4)
    2. Wisdom and faith (1.5–8)
    3. Wealth and faith (1.9–11)
  B. Testing, speech, and action (1.12–27)
    1. Testing and sin (1.12–15)
    2. God's gift and sinful speech (1.16–21)
    3. Action and sin (1.22–27)
    (1.26–27 are transition verses)
III. Wealth and faith (2.1–26)
  A. Wealth and prejudice (2.1–13)
    1. Thesis (2.1)
    2. Illustration of the problem (2.2–4)
    3. Theological argument (2.5–7)
    4. Biblical passage 1 (2.8–9)
    5. Biblical passage 2 (2.10–11)
    6. Summary (2.12–13)
  B. Giving and faith (2.14–26)
    1. Thesis (2.14)
    2. Illustration of the problem (2.15–17)
    3. Theological argument (2.18–19)
    4. Biblical passage 1 (2.20–24)
    5. Biblical passage 2 (2.25)
    6. Summary (2.26)
IV. Wisdom and speech (3.1–4.12)
  A. Danger of sinful speech (3.1–12)
  B. God's gift of wisdom (3.13–18)
  C. Repentance from sinful speech and action (4.1–10)
  D. Example of sinful speech (4.11–12)
V. Testing and wealth (4.13–5.6)
  A. Testing through wealth (4.13–17)
  B. Testing by the wealthy (5.1–6)
VI. Closing: Patience and prayer (5.7–20)
  A. Conclusion: patience (5.7–11)
  B. Oaths (5.12)
  C. Prayer and health (5.13–18)
  D. Purpose of the letter (5.19–20)

Authorship and Date. The letter claims in 1.1 to come from *James, the brother of Jesus, but this claim has been disputed frequently because of the theology of the letter (not that of an observant Jew) and the excellent quality of the Greek. Thus, the suggestion is frequently made that it is a pseudonymous letter from the late first century CE attributed to James because he had been a great leader of the church.

While this position is widely held, it is not the only possible one. First, the theology of the letter is not as difficult as it appears, especially if one accepts the portrait of James given in *Acts over that of later legends. These legends portray James as being observant of the *Law of Moses, but they contain so many improbable details that they cannot be trusted. On the other hand, Acts portrays him as a Jewish leader who was also a diplomat, concerned that both Jew and *gentile live together in the church. There is no evidence that his teaching in Jerusalem (where the observance of the law was not an issue) had a particularly legalistic tone.

Second, while the Greek is good, among the best in the New Testament, it does from time to time employ obvious Semitisms. Furthermore, while there is a unity to the letter, the vocabulary is inconsistent (e.g., 1.12–15 and 4.1–10 use different words for the same concept). The best explanation of these data is that the letter is a collection of sermons and sayings from James (and possibly from Jesus as well, from whom 5.12 unquestionably comes) edited into letter form. This view also explains the simple attribution (as opposed to more flowery titles used for James by the end of the first century) and the fact that the letter was first circulated in the eastern church and so is missing in some of the early *canon lists in North Africa and the West (although it was known in Rome by the end of the first century, being used by the author of the Shepherd of Hermas). Finally, it accounts for the absence in the letter of a knowledge of Paul's writings on the one hand and the presence of depictions of Palestinian culture on the other.

If the material comes from James and reflects his setting, then the most likely place of editing is Jerusalem or at least Judea. Some of the material probably dates from before *Paul's activity became well known in Jerusalem (49 CE or earlier), for it shows no awareness of Pauline formulations or at best knows only distorted oral reports of his teaching. But the final editing was probably triggered by the martyrdom of James and the desire to preserve and spread his teaching, that is, after 61 CE but probably before the fall of *Jerusalem in 70 CE.

Unity. The letter of James has often been regarded as a collection of miscellaneous sayings without any internal unity other than an interest in some recurring themes. To a degree this is true, for the letter does contain sayings (1.26–27; 2.13; 3.18) and homilies (2.1–12; 2.14–26) that were originally not unified. But the discovery of the literary letter form with the doubled opening (i.e., A B C, A′ B′ C′) and the realization that the three main sections of the letter take up in reverse the topics mentioned in the opening (C B A) together show that these homilies and sayings have been edited into a unified whole. Even the ending fits this form. Thus, while the editor has been conservative and preserved the integrity of the various units (and even some Semitic expressions like "doers of the word" [1.23]), James is unlike *Proverbs or similar *wisdom literature, a mere collection of sayings; it has a unified structure.

Theology. James is writing in the context of a church under pressure, not facing impending martyrdom but discrimination and economic persecution. He is concerned about two tendencies, adopting the mores of the oppressors (e.g., valuing money over community) and attacking other members of the community (e.g., gossip, criticism). Thus his chief concern is the unity of the community and turning the community back from practices that threaten to disrupt it (5.19–20). Within this overriding concern there are several major themes.

The first is testing. Only true commitment to God will resist the overtures of the devil (4.7) made through the impulses of internal cravings. But it is this patient endurance, even when *suffering, that God will reward when he comes to judge the world (5.7–8, 10). In this context James introduces the "double-minded" person (1.8; 4.8) and doubter. This is not the person who trusts in God but still struggles with doubt; it is the person who does the correct religious acts (because God might answer prayer) yet whose real trust (as seen in daily actions) is in human solutions. God does not tolerate such dual trust, for it is spiritual adultery (4.4).

The second major theme is wisdom. God offers people the gift of wisdom to help them stand firm in the test. One mark of this wisdom is the gentle attitude that it produces in speech and action (3.13–18). Conversely, conflict in the community is a mark of the love of the world rather than of God.

The third theme is wealth. In the culture in which James lives, the wealthy are by and large the oppressors of the Christians, many of whom are poor. Christians, however, must not accept the world's values or view their material poverty with concern; if they are truly committed to God, they will show it in generous charity (2.14–26) and in seeking God's will in all their business plans (4.13–17).

Throughout the letter are found the themes of prayer and maintaining the proper perspective. When one is experiencing deprivation, it is easy to focus on the suffering, but James calls for joy (1.2) because the Christian has gained the perspective of God and realizes that the suffering is temporary, the return of Christ as judge imminent, and the rewards of God eternal. With this perspective the Christian should pray in confidence. This prayer is the key to endurance (chap. 1), to the supply of real needs (chap. 4), and to physical and spiritual healing (chap. 5). When he speaks of healing (5.14–18), James assumes this to be the normal practice of the church; unlike Paul (1 Cor. 12.9, 30), he does not look to the gifted healer for help, but to the *elders.

James and Paul. Because of the famous section in 2.14–26, James has often been seen as opposing Paul's stress on *justification by faith without the deeds of the Law. This appears true until one realizes that James uses his critical terms in ways that differ from Paul; in fact, James is using terminology in its older, original sense. Works for Paul are works of the Law, that is, ritual acts such as *circumcision; works for James are deeds of charity such as, according to Jewish tradition, those that Abraham performed. Faith for Paul is a commitment to God, which produces good works; for James faith (i.e., in 2.14–26, for he uses the term in two or three different ways elsewhere in the letter) is mere intellectual belief (2.19), lacking commitment. Finally, "justified" for Paul means the pronouncing of a sinner righteous; "justified" for James means the declaration that a person did in fact act justly. Paul, of course, would have agreed with James that "faith" that does not produce appropriate deeds is a false faith (see Gal. 5.6, 16–21).

Given such differences in usage of common terminology, how are these two authors related? Two possibilities may be mentioned: either James is reacting to a misunderstood and badly distorted Paulinism, perhaps not even knowing who had originated it; or James is speaking to the fault of making intellectual religious commitments without the corresponding amendment of life. In neither case is James opposing Paul; he is simply arguing in his own context what Paul taught in his. PETER H. DAVIDS

Jannes and Jambres (the latter sometimes Mamre). They are mentioned in late antique Jewish, Christian, and Greco-Roman (Pliny, Apuleius, Numenius) sources as Egyptian magicians; the earliest citation is the first-century BCE "Damascus Document" of the *Dead Sea Scrolls. They are identified in Jewish midrash and the New Testament (2 Tim. 3.8) as among Pharaoh's unnamed wise men (Exod. 7.11–13) who duplicated *Moses' and *Aaron's miracles. In both traditions, they symbolize false prophecy and heretical obstruction; several Jewish sources describe them as *Balaam's sons (Targum Jonathan to Num. 22.22; Yalquṭ Exod. 168, 176). The sixth-century CE Christian work "Decree of Gelasius" mentions an apocryphal book, now lost, about their exploits and ultimate conversion.

Jashar, The Book of. One of a number of ancient collections referred to in the Bible that have not survived. To the Book of Jashar (KJV "Jasher"; literally, "the Upright") are attributed the poetic fragment in Joshua 10.12–13 and the lament of *David over *Saul and Jonathan in 2 Samuel 1.18–27 and perhaps also *Solomon's prayer in 1 Kings 8.12–13 (according to the *Septuagint of v. 53 as emended by many scholars). A similar anthology was "the Book of the Wars of Yahweh," cited in Numbers 21.14. The books of *Kings and *Chronicles mention such sources as "the book of the acts of Solomon" (1 Kings 11.41), "the book of the acts of the days [NRSV: annals] of the kings of Israel" (1 Kings 14.19; etc.), "the book of the acts of the days of the kings of Judah" (1 Kings 14.29; etc.), and the written words of various prophets (1 Chron. 29.29; 2 Chron 9.29); and the titles to many of the *Psalms apparently also refer to various collections of hymns. MICHAEL D. COOGAN

Jebusites. The Jebusites were one of several groups of people living on the land that Israel eventually conquered. According to Genesis 10.15–16 and 1 Chronicles 1.14, the Jebusites were related to the *Canaanites. But these passages may indicate a geopolitical relationship rather than an ethnic one; since the Jebusites shared the same territory as the Canaanites, they were perceived to be from the same stock, though they probably were not. In fact, the biblical writers normally distinguish the Jebusites from the Canaanites and from other peoples as well (Exod. 33.2; 34.11; Num. 13.29; Deut. 20.17; Josh. 11.3; 12.8; Judg. 3.5).

*Jerusalem is sometimes identified as Jebus (Judg. 19.10; 1 Chron. 11.4). From this one might infer that Jebus was the pre-Israelite name of the city. The name Jerusalem, however, predates the Israelite *conquest by several centuries, and the city was not appropriated by Israel until the tenth century BCE. Therefore it seems best to take Jebus as an alternate Israelite designation for Jerusalem. The people, then, were not called Jebusites because they lived in Jebus; rather, the city of Jerusalem was sometimes called Jebus because the Jebusites controlled it.

Although there is a brief account of a victory over Jerusalem in the early tribal league period (Judg. 1.8), the Israelites did not take possession of the city at that time, for it is later mentioned as still being a foreign city of the Jebusites (Judg. 19.10–13). *David captured Jerusalem from them and made it his capital (2 Sam. 5.6–10; 1 Chron. 11.4–9). Apparently he did not kill or drive out all the local inhabitants, because subsequently, when he needed land on which to build an altar, he purchased it from Araunah the Jebusite (2 Sam. 24.18–24; 1 Chron. 21.18–27 has the name Ornan for Araunah). *Solomon built the *Temple on that plot of ground (1 Chron. 22.1); he also enslaved the remainder of the Jebusites, and other non-Israelites (1 Kings 9.20–21). Ultimately, they must have assimilated into Israel; Zechariah 9.7 likens them to a Judean clan.

Some have seen Jebusite origins for the changes in Israel's political structure and religious ideology that occurred with the establishment of *kingship, but there is little evidence to support such a hypothesis. WILLIAM B. NELSON, JR.

Jehoshaphat. The fourth king of *Judah (ca. 874–850 BCE). His reign is given only brief attention in Kings (1 Kings 22.41–50; cf. 1 Kings 22), but he is one of the Chronicler's favorite monarchs (2 Chron. 17–20). Jehoshaphat reverses the policy of his predecessors by entering into military, maritime, and marital alliances with kings of Israel. Jehoshaphat's achievements as a reformer are accentuated in Chronicles. He reorganizes the judiciary, sending ministers, *Levites, and *priests to the towns of Judah "to teach the law of the Lord" (2 Chron. 17.7–9), appoints judges for the towns of Judah, and establishes a court in Jerusalem (2 Chron. 19.5–11). Jehoshaphat also reorganizes the army and fortifies cities within his domain (2 Chron. 17.2, 13–19).

The reference to the "valley of Jehoshaphat" in Joel 3.2, 12 plays on Jehoshaphat's name ("the Lord has judged"). It is unclear whether Joel is designating geography (e.g., the Wadi Kidron) or dramatizing a future judgment.

Jehovah. An artificially constructed name for Israel's God first attested in sixteenth-century CE Christian texts. The new construction was the result of changing attitudes toward the use of God's name. The Hebrew name "Yahweh" was not normally pronounced after about the third century BCE out of respect for its holiness. In its place, readers of the Hebrew used 'ădōnāy, "Lord." When vowels were added to the consonantal text of the Hebrew Bible (ca. 1000 CE), the consonants of Yahweh were preserved but the vowels of 'ădōnāy were used as a reminder to readers. Renaissance Christian tradition erroneously combined the consonants of Yahweh and the vowels of 'ădōnāy to produce "Jehovah," which is used occasionally in the King James Version and regularly in some revisions of it. More recent English translations tend to use "LORD" rather than "Jehovah."

Jehu. The son of Nimshi, Jehu was king of Israel ca. 843–816 BCE. 2 Kings 9–10 describes how, under prophetic mandate, Jehu led a bloody military revolt to seize the throne of Israel. He killed the kings of both Israel (Jehoram) and Judah (Ahaziah), had *Jezebel executed, annihilated the dynasty of Omri, and obliterated the worship of *Baal in Israel. Yahweh rewarded Jehu's faithfulness by allowing his dynasty to last five generations.

However historical its base, the account in 2 Kings 9–10 is strongly influenced by the ideology of the *Deuteronomic historian. Quite a different perspective on Jehu's revolt is found in Hosea 1.4–5, where the house of Jehu is threatened with punishment for the bloodshed of Jezreel.

The annals of the Assyrian king Shalmaneser III mention and his "Black Obelisk" depicts a "Ia-ú-a/Ia-a-ú son of Omri" paying tribute to him. This individual is probably Jehu, though his predecessor Jehoram has also been proposed; in any case, it is the only contemporary picture we have of a king of Israel.

Jeremiah, The Book of

The Background. The editorial introduction to the book of Jeremiah, 1.1–3, informs us that the book contains "the words of Jeremiah," that is, what Jeremiah said and did—the Hebrew term translated "words" can cover both—from the beginning of his prophetic ministry in the thirteenth year of the reign of *Josiah, 627 BCE, until the fall of *Jerusalem to the *Babylonians in 587/586 BCE. This is not strictly an accurate account of the contents of the present book since chaps. 40–44 describe the activity of the prophet both in Judah and in Egypt after the fall of Jerusalem. Nevertheless the last forty years of the independent Judean state are the stage on which Jeremiah played out his major prophetic role. Since the book is full of historical references to events in this period, it is important for our understanding of the book to sketch briefly the political factors that shaped these years. They witnessed the gradual break up of the once all-powerful *Assyrian empire and the resurgence within Judah of a religious nationalism that culminated in the reformation under King Josiah in 621 BCE (2 Kings 22–23). Although this religious nationalism must have received a jolt with the death of Josiah at the battle of *Megiddo in 609 BCE, it still had a trump card: Jerusalem, the city of God, with its *Temple where God dwelt, guaranteeing by his presence that this city could never be conquered or destroyed (see Pss. 46 and 48). Such self-confident religious nationalism clashed with the new imperial power of the day, the Neo-Babylonian empire. Under a succession of monarchs, Judah tried to play anti-Babylonian power politics with other small states, aided and abetted by Egypt, in an unsuccessful attempt to postpone the inevitable. In 597 BCE Jerusalem surrendered to the Babylonians, and the cream of Judean society went into exile. The last king of Judah, *Zedekiah, came to the throne as a Babylonian nominee. But the anti-Babylonian lobby in Jerusalem prevailed until, ten years later in 587/586 BCE, the city was captured and destroyed. The curtain had fallen for the last time on the independent kingdom of *Judah. The book of Jeremiah depicts a man who consistently protested against political and religious policies that sealed the fate of his country, a prophet who in the eyes of the establishment of his day was both traitor and heretic. If the fall of Jerusalem had not vindicated his stance, we might now have been reading not the book of Jeremiah but the book of Hananiah (see chap. 28) or of some of the other prophets with whom Jeremiah clashed.

The Problem of the Book. But what do we mean by the book of Jeremiah? The prophets from Amos onward are sometimes called "the writing prophets" because in the Bible we find books to which their names are attached. If this conveys the impression that in such prophetic books we are dealing with a series of books each written by one person, then this is highly misleading, nowhere more so than in the case of the book of Jeremiah. In it we find duplicate accounts of the same events: twice we hear of Jeremiah's sermon in the Temple, once in chap. 7, once in chap. 26; and there are two versions of Jeremiah's arrest, imprisonment, and secret interview with King Zedekiah (37.11–21; 38.1–13). The same or very similar passages will appear in different contexts in the book: thus 6.13–15 reappears in 8.10b–12, and 23.19–20 in 30.23–24. A passage in 49.19–20, which occurs in the context of judgment against *Edom, is repeated with minor variations in the context of judgment against Babylon in 50.44–46. Moreover, there is material within the book that is closely paralleled in other prophetic books; chap. 48 dealing with *Moab has many similarities with Isaiah 15–16, while the section on Edom in 49.7–22 reads like a series of variations on *Obadiah. At times we come across blocks of material dealing with a common theme or linked together by catchwords or phrases. Thus 3.1–4.4 deals with the infidelity and adultery of God's people; 21.1–23.6 gives us the prophet's verdict on various kings of Judah; 23.9–40 is headed "concerning the prophets"; 30, 31, and 33 (the "book of consolation") gather together words of hope for the future, and inserted in their midst (in chap. 32) is an incident from the life of Jeremiah that illustrates this theme. Within this book of consolation, brief independent sections are placed together and introduced by the same phrase. Thus three passages, each introduced by "The days are surely coming," are placed together in 31.27–40. The largest clearly defined collection of material in the book is chaps. 46–51, which contains "oracles against the nations." Such blocks of material, however, only serve to underline the general lack of order that runs through the book as a whole. There is no clear chronological ordering of material; chap. 21, for example, deals with events during the final siege of Jerusalem, chap. 26 with an event that happened more than twenty years earlier. The book keeps jumping about disconcertingly from topic to topic and seems to be needlessly repetitive. At times we are reading poetry, at other times prose. The book makes more sense as a collection or collections of varied material rather than as a work with a coherent theme or plot or any systematic historical framework.

There is a good reason for this. The preexilic prophets are not primarily writers but preachers, messengers of God who transmit their message by word of mouth. The message often takes the form of a brief poetic oracle that begins "Thus says the Lord" and often ends in the book of Jeremiah with another phrase that the NRSV renders "says the Lord," 2.1–3 being an excellent example; see also 2.5–8; 4.27–28; 5.14–15; 6.6–9, 9–12. The present book of Jeremiah contains collections of many such prophetic sayings, almost certainly preserved originally in oral form, supplemented by the addition of biographical and other editorial material. Behind it lies, as we shall see, a long and complex history of transmission, the details of which remain obscure.

The Text. We have spoken so far of the book of Jeremiah, but what book do we mean? The book of Jeremiah has come down to us in two forms, represented by the standard Hebrew *Masoretic text (MT) and the Greek text (*Septuagint [LXX]), and these two text forms differ significantly from each other. The LXX is approximately one-eighth shorter, lacking, it has been calculated, some 2,700 words of the MT. Furthermore, some of the material is differently placed in the two text forms. The "oracles against the nations" come in the MT at chaps. 46–51; in the LXX they are placed immediately after the words "everything written in this book" in 25.13a, and the individual oracles occur in a different order. Some further light on the problem of the two texts has been shed by the *Dead Sea Scrolls. Among fragments of the book of Jeremiah from Caves Two and Four, there are some that support the MT where it differs from the LXX. From Cave Four, however, has come a Hebrew text that follows the LXX textual tradition against the MT in Jeremiah 10 in omitting vv. 6–8 and 10. Thus in Palestine prior to the common era there is evidence for the existence of two Hebrew textual traditions of the book of Jeremiah, a longer one corresponding to what became the standard Hebrew text and a shorter one corresponding to the Greek text. Which one takes us nearer to the earliest form of the text of the book is a matter of scholarly debate. On the whole, the balance of opinion favors the shorter LXX with the MT being regarded as a secondary, expanded text. It contains, for example, many descriptive titles of God not found in the LXX, and while "the prophet" appears as a designation of Jeremiah only four times in the LXX, it occurs twenty-six times in the MT. This is not, however, to say that in every case the shorter text is the superior text or that it represents the "original text" of Jeremiah, whatever that may mean. Each case must be treated on its merits. Since English Bibles follow the standard Hebrew text we shall continue to refer to the contents of the book as in this tradition.

Content and Sources. It is generally agreed that the material in the book of Jeremiah falls into three categories, each stemming from different sources or circles.

Poetic material, to be found in the main interspersed with prose passages in chaps. 1–25. These poetic sections consist largely of oracles in which the prophet functions as God's messenger, speaking in the name of God. They cover a variety of themes, including the nation's infidelity to the Lord and the call to repentance (3.1–5; 4.13–18; 6.15–17), with attacks on the religious and political establishment of the day (2.8–9; 6.13–15; 22.13–19). These poetic passages are on the whole undated and are given no clearly defined context, but it is widely held that in such passages we are in touch with the teaching of the prophet Jeremiah, and that much of the material in chaps. 1–25 represents the earliest stage of the book of Jeremiah. Such passages may well have been part of the scroll that King Jehoiakim, according to chap. 36, insolently consigned to the flames in the winter of 604 BCE, whereupon Jeremiah redictated the scroll to the scribe *Baruch and for good measure added similar words. Certainly there is little in such poetic oracles that could not have come from the early years of the prophet's ministry between the time of his call (627 BCE according to 1.2) and 604 BCE.

In addition to these oracles in which the prophet speaks the word of God to his people, there are other poetic passages in 1–25 that are in the form of intensely personal poems that have been called Jeremiah's confessions or his spiritual diary (see 11.18–12.6; 15.10–21; 17.5–10, 14–18; 18.18–23; 20.7–18). Here we listen not to the word of God on the lips of the prophet but to a man baring his own soul and exposing some of the tensions involved in being a prophet. These passages are without parallel in prophetic literature. Attempts have been made to read them as cultic poems, modeled on the *psalms of lament, that have no real roots in the life of Jeremiah. There seems, however, little reason to doubt that they reflect Jeremiah's experience. As such they are of the highest significance and interest. They show us that behind the apparently untroubled certainty of "Thus says the Lord" there may lie a host of unresolved questions and deep inner turmoil. This is a very human prophet committed to a vocation that tears him apart, agonizing over the apparent failure of his ministry, on the verge of giving up, consumed by a savage bitterness against those who opposed or ignored what he had to say, accusing God of betraying him.

There are two other blocks of material in the book outside chaps. 1–25 that similarly contain poetic prophetic oracles, often interspersed with and expanded by prose sections.

a) Chaps. 30, 31 and 33, the so-called book of consolation, consisting of oracles whose basic theme is that of hope beyond national disaster. This material is probably of very varied origin. The influence of an earlier prophet, Hosea, is very marked in some sections (e.g., 31.1–6), while the language and thought of other passages have close links with a later prophet, the author of Isaiah 40–55 (e.g., 31.10–14). That some of the material in this section goes back to Jeremiah, however, we need not doubt.

b) Chaps. 46–51, the oracles against the nations. The tradition of oracles against other nations, particularly those that threaten the existence of Israel, is one that can be traced back to Amos 1.3–2.3. Such oracles occur also in other prophetic books: Isaiah 13–23, Ezekiel 25–32, Nahum, and Obadiah. Inasmuch as Jeremiah was called, according to 1.5, to be "a prophet to the nations," it is hardly surprising that a substantial collection of such oracles appears in the book. Such oracles affirm that the God of Israel is lord over all nations and pronounce judgment on them not only for their treatment of Israel, but for the arrogant self-confidence that assumes that might is right and for actions that sacrifice justice and human rights to imperial ambitions. It is evident from the different setting in which these oracles are placed in the Hebrew and Greek texts, and the different ordering of the oracles within this material, that they once circulated as an independent collection. How much of it can be traced back to Jeremiah himself is a highly contentious issue.

Biographical narratives that claim to recount key incidents in the life of the prophet. There are two notable features of these narratives. First, there are more such narratives in the book of Jeremiah than in any other prophetic book, and thus, if authentic, they provide us with more information about Jeremiah than is available for any other prophet. Such narratives are to be found in chaps. 26–29, 32, 34–44. Second, these narratives are usually provided with precise dating, the earliest dated to 609 BCE (26:1). If therefore we assume, following 1.2, that Jeremiah's prophetic ministry began in 627 BCE, we have no such narrative for almost the first twenty years of his ministry. This, allied to the lack of any clear evidence in the book for Jeremiah's attitude to the key religious event of this period, the reformation under King Josiah in 621 BCE, has led a variety of scholars to believe that his ministry did not begin until 612 BCE or 609 BCE, with 627 BCE being the possible date of his birth. This is not, however, a necessary inference. The biographical narratives are often linked with the scribe Baruch, who appears in Jeremiah's company in chaps. 32, 36, 43, and 45. We could argue from the lack of biographical material prior to 609 BCE that Baruch first came into contact with Jeremiah in 609; perhaps he was drawn to Jeremiah as the result of the Temple sermon that chap. 26 dates to that year. We have spoken of biographical narratives, but we must not assume from this that it is possible to write a satisfactory biography of Jeremiah, even from 609 BCE onward. The narratives do not appear in chronological sequence, nor do they do any more than highlight what are taken to be certain key incidents that reveal the prophet often locked in conflict with the religious and political establishment of the day. It is no more possible to write a satisfactory biography of Jeremiah on the basis of these narratives than it is to write a life of Jesus on the basis of the gospel narratives. If we push this analogy further we would have to say that it is the events leading up to and surrounding the destruction of Jerusalem in 587 BCE that occupy in the book of Jeremiah the central place that the passion narratives occupy in the Gospels. It is perhaps not surprising that the book of Jeremiah ends in chap. 52 with an account of the fall of Jerusalem, derived in the main from 2 Kings 24–25.

Prose passages occur throughout the book, sometimes in the form of sermons or speeches attributed to Jeremiah, which are usually called Deuteronomic (or Deuteronomistic), since they reflect the style, language, and thought of the book of *Deuteronomy and the Deuteronomic editors who shaped the history of Israel that we find in the books of Judges to 2 Kings. Typical examples of this material are the Temple sermon in chap. 7 and the covenant passage in 11.1–17. It is these Deuteronomic passages that have provoked the greatest controversy in the study of the book of Jeremiah. Some would trace them to Jeremiah himself; others argue that they reflect the characteristic rhetorical prose style of Jeremiah's day and present a tradition of Jeremiah's teaching as handed down in circles familiar with this style and sympathetic to the theology of the book of Deuteronomy. A variation of this view is to regard such passages as conventional scribal compositions and attribute them to Baruch. All such views trace the material in its present form back to the time of Jeremiah. Others, however, believe that such passages are later, either emanating from Deuteronomic preachers during the period of the *exile in Babylon in the sixth century BCE or reflecting theological issues of a still later date during the Persian period. It is doubtful whether in their present form such passages can be attributed to Jeremiah, but it is unduly skeptical to deny that they may well have their roots in a tradition that builds on what Jeremiah said and did. Nor should we think that we necessarily solve problems by speaking about the Deuteronomists. They are at best shadowy figures. We do not know with certainty either who they were or when they functioned.

How or when such varied material came together to form the book of Jeremiah, either in its shorter or its longer form, we do not know, but it must have taken many decades, or even centuries, after Jeremiah's life. The very nature of the book—its varied components, the clear evidence of editing within it, the amalgamation of different traditions—raises the question as to what extent the book provides us with reliable historical data concerning the life, words, and deeds of the prophet. Some deny that the book provides us with any access to the historical Jeremiah. Behind the editing, however, and in and through the varied material, there does seem to emerge a prophetic figure of striking individuality, God's spokesman to Judah at a major crisis point in the life of the nation, and it is hard to see why such a figure should be nothing other than the invention of later ages.

Key Religious Issues. In addition to much that the book of Jeremiah shares with other prophetic books, there are two issues to which specific attention may be briefly drawn. First is the problem of *prophecy. The book speaks not only of one prophet, Jeremiah, but of many prophets. Chap. 28 describes the clash between Jeremiah and the prophet Hananiah, a representative of the Jerusalem religious establishment. Both preface their words by "Thus says the Lord," both use the same prophetic techniques to communicate the message, both are no doubt equally sincere, and both speak a diametrically opposite message. Hananiah declares that the Lord will protect his people and break the power of Babylon, and there was much in Israel's past faith to support his view (e.g., Isa. 31.1–5; Ps. 48); Jeremiah insists that such a message of peace, that all is well with the people basking in God's favor, must be false (6.13–15). But how would anyone witnessing such a clash know who had the true prophetic word? The tests for identifying false prophecy in Deuteronomy 13.1–5 and 18.16–20 would have been little help. In Jeremiah 23.9–40 it is claimed that prophets who proclaim a word that presents no challenge to the conscience of the nation stand in no relationship to God and have no access to his word. They do no more than spout lies they themselves have invented. But how could Jeremiah know this? Did he never wonder whether he himself was mistaken when he heard the confident "Thus says the Lord" of such prophets? This may be the implication of 20.7. The book of Jeremiah highlights the difficulties that people in Judah faced in deciding what was the authentic word of God for them in their day. They had to take choices and live with the consequences.

The second issue is the message of hope. Throughout the book of Jeremiah we find oracles of judgment that insist that Jerusalem must be destroyed, its fate sealed not by the Babylonians but by God. But there are also words of hope, not hope that sidesteps disaster, but hope of a new future beyond disaster. Many of the pictures of hope beyond the richly deserved judgment are modest and homely: people returning to the towns they were once forced to leave, the renewal of life in the countryside, the resumed worship of God in Jerusalem (31.23–25; 33.10–13). But there is another strand. Again and again the prophet draws attention to the stubborn evil heart or will that grips the people (e.g., 3.17). It means that the call to repent falls on deaf ears; it turns the most serious attempt to reform the nation's life into a dead letter. If things are ever to be lastingly different, it can only come through a new initiative of God that will transform human nature. This is the theme of the new covenant passage in 31.31–34, a vision that, drawing on Israel's relationship with God in the past symbolized by the *covenant at Mount *Sinai, sees a new relationship in the future, based as was the past on God's *grace, but a relationship in which the people will be able to give the obedience for which God looks. Thus the book of Jeremiah, which draws richly on Israel's past religious traditions, reaches out to the future. In terms of the new covenant theme, the New Testament claims that that future became the present in Jesus (1 Cor. 11.25; Heb. 8.6–13). ROBERT DAVIDSON

Jeremiah, The Letter of. One of the *Apocrypha. According to Jeremiah 29, Jeremiah wrote from Jerusalem a letter addressed to the Judeans who had been carried off to *exile in *Babylon in the first deportation in 597 BCE. In that letter Jeremiah gives the people instruction as to their conduct in Babylon and warns them against false prophets in their midst. It was no doubt this passage that inspired an unknown author, living probably rather late in the Hellenistic age, to write a similar letter in the prophet's name, to be delivered, supposedly, to those condemned to exile either in 597 BCE or the final disaster of 587/586 BCE before they departed from Jerusalem. The purpose of the letter is to warn the deportees against the temptation that would confront them in Babylon to worship other gods. The danger of apostasy was, of course, also acute in the Hellenistic period, when, presumably, the letter was actually written.

The manner in which the theme is treated was very likely suggested by Jeremiah 10.1–16, and particularly by v. 11, the only verse in Jeremiah written in *Aramaic, which says, "The gods who did not make heaven and earth shall perish from the earth and from under the heavens." The author may have been further inspired by Isaiah 44.9–20. Throughout the whole book runs the motto, first stated in v. 16 and repeated eight times with variations, "It is evident that they are not gods; so do not fear them" (cf. vv. 23, 29, 40, 44, 52, 56, 65, 69). The repetition of the refrain serves to divide the book into ten irregular parts, in each of which the writer calls attention to one or more features of the statues of deities that make worshiping them seem ludicrous.

The "letter" thus does not have a developing thesis but is simply a series of somewhat repetitious tirades directed against Babylonian religion. The modern reader may find it tiresome, but to Hellenistic Jews, it was no doubt an effective and exhilarating bit of satire, adding a touch of humor to the more serious underlying argument, and it would probably have been equally effective with potential converts to Judaism.

The book is known only in Greek and in versions based on it (Latin, Syriac, Arabic), but it is the general scholarly opinion that the original language was Hebrew (or, less probably, Aramaic). This view is based largely on the presence of apparent mistranslations of Hebrew words, the most notable of which is in v. 72, where the Greek word for "marble" seems to represent a Semitic word that could in theory be translated either "marble" or "linen" (see text note in NRSV). The translation "marble" is, however, incongruous in context.

The only clue as to the date of the book is found in v. 3, which refers to a period of seven generations that was to follow the beginning of the Babylonian exile (587/586 BCE). Understanding a generation to be about forty years, this would bring one to approximately 300 BCE, which may be taken as the earliest date possible. Some important commentators accept this as the actual date of the book; others prefer the early second century BCE, when the appeal of Hellenism for Jews was most intense, as evidenced by the events accompanying the Maccabean revolt (1 Macc. 1.11–15).

In the Latin *Vulgate and some versions dependent on it, the letter is printed as chap. 6 of *Baruch rather than as a separate book, which it unquestionably is. It is considered deuterocanonical by Roman Catholics and by some Orthodox churches. ROBERT C. DENTAN

Jericho. Jericho, whose name probably means "Moon (City)" (Hebr. yārēaḥ), is located 12 km (8 mi) north of the Dead Sea at the foot of the western escarpment of the *Jordan valley (Map 1:x5). At 258 m (840 ft) below sea level it is the lowest city on earth. Today a thriving market town, its ten-thousand-year history has been documented principally by the excavations of Kathleen Kenyon at Tell es-Sultan.

Mesolithic hunters were attracted to the area in the ninth millennium BCE by the abundant perennial spring of Ein es-Sultan. By about 8000 BCE a permanent settlement of some two thousand people had been established just beside it. Its irrigation system and the large tower and defense wall imply a social organization that justifies Jericho's title as the oldest city in the world. Sometime around 6800 BCE the original settlers were displaced by another Neolithic people, whose most distinctive cultural achievement was a series of skulls with individualized features restored in plaster. This group, however, had not yet discovered pottery, which first appeared around 4500 BCE when another group took possession of the site. The site was then occupied more or less continuously until the middle of the Late Bronze Age, when the city was devastated. This destruction is too early to be attributed to *Joshua (Josh. 6; see Conquest of Canaan), but in harmony with his words (Josh. 6.26) the site was abandoned until the seventh century BCE, a date that is too late to coincide with the reoccupation mentioned in 1 Kings 16.34 as having occurred in the ninth century BCE. The Iron Age city visited by *Elijah and *Elisha (2 Kings 2) was known as the city of palm trees (Deut. 34.3).

After the Babylonian exile Tell es-Sultan was abandoned, but there must have been a settlement elsewhere in the oasis (cf. Ezra 2.34), because in the late sixth century BCE Jericho was a Persian administrative center, a role it retained in later periods (Josephus, War 1.8.170). In the Hellenistic period the area was considered a private royal domain, and this inhibited any real urbanization; its fortifications guarded the eastern frontier (1 Macc. 9.50; Strabo, Geog. 16.2.40).

The Hasmoneans extended the cultivated area by building an aqueduct from Ein Qilt. The agricultural wealth of the enlarged oasis is extolled by Josephus (War 4.8.459–475) and Strabo (Geog. 16.2.41). The delightful winter climate inspired Alexander Janneus to build a palace on the north bank of the Wadi Qilt. *Herod the Great had Aristobulus III, his last serious rival for the crown of Judea, drowned in its great swimming pool in 35 BCE (Josephus, Ant. 15.3.55). During the years 34–30 BCE, when he was forced to rent the plantations from Cleopatra to whom they had been given by Mark Antony (War 1.18.361), Herod built a winter residence south of the Wadi Qilt. Once Octavian (Augustus) had transferred Jericho to Herod's control in 30 BCE, the latter remodeled the Hasmonean palace, constructed the theater-hippodrome complex at Tell es-Samrat, and later erected more buildings on both sides of the Wadi Qilt (War 1.21.407). The vast quantities of water required by the palace were supplied by three new aqueducts, two on the south wall of the Wadi Qilt and the third coming from Ein Duk at Naaran. Security was guaranteed by Kypros, a fortress on a cliff to the west.

Herod lived in the palace during his last terrible illness, but the medicinal springs of Callirhoe on the east side of the Dead Sea gave him no relief, and he died in Jericho shortly before Passover in 4 BCE (War 1.33.656–673). Josephus's reports that the palace was burnt by Simeon (War 2.4.57) and rebuilt by Archelaus (Ant. 17.13.340) have not been confirmed by recent excavations.

After the dismissal of Archelaus in 6 CE, a garrison occupied Kypros (War 2.18.484). Burials in the cliffs north of the palace continued to 68 CE. Wealthy families from Jerusalem presumably returned each winter to their villas, some of whose foundations have been traced in the plantations south of the palace. This provides the background for the preaching of *John the Baptist in this area, for the plantation slaves who were the only permanent population are unlikely to have been his primary audience. The presence of Jesus in Jericho (Mark 10.46 par.; Luke 19.1) is explained by the fact that, to avoid passing through *Samaritan territory, Galilean pilgrims to Jerusalem followed a route down the Jordan valley to Jericho.

History

Name and Description. The earliest attestation of Jerusalem's name is in the Egyptian Execration Texts of the nineteenth and eighteenth centuries BCE in a form that must be a transcription of the Semitic Urusalim, which appears in the *Amarna letters of the fourteenth century BCE. It is a combination of two elements meaning "the foundation of [the god] Shalem." The second element, rendered Salem, is used alone in Genesis 14.18 and Psalm 76.2. The pronunciation of the Hebrew name is reflected in the Greek Ierousalem, which predominates in the *Septuagint. In 1 *Esdras, *Tobit, and 1–4 *Maccabees, however, the Septuagint has the strongly Hellenized Hierosolyma. Both forms appear in the New Testament.

The biblical city spreads across two hills (average altitude 750 m [2500 ft]) in the central mountain range. It is limited on the west and south by the Hinnom valley, and on the east by the Kidron valley, which separates it from the *Mount of Olives. Josephus alone records that the central valley was called the Tyropoeon ("Cheesemakers"). The western hill is slightly higher than the eastern hill, and both slope to the south. There are two springs, Gihon ("gusher"; see Gen 2.13) and Ein Rogel ("the fuller's spring"), in the Kidron valley. The climate is temperate, and all the rain (annual average 560 mm [22 in]) falls during the four-month winter (December to March). It occasionally snows.

Before the Exile. The original city was on the southern extension of the eastern hill known as Ophel, excavated principally by Kathleen Kenyon and Yigal Shiloh. Scattered pottery attests occupation from the third millennium BCE and the site was defended by a heavy wall from about 1800 BCE. Houses built on artificial terraces climbed the slope to the acropolis. After the Israelite *conquest the territory of Jerusalem was absorbed by the tribe of *Benjamin, but the city of the *Jebusites, with its mixed population of *Amorites and *Hittites (Ezek. 16.3), was left alone. It thus served *David's need for a capital independent of the twelve tribes. He took it ca. 1000 BCE (2 Sam. 5.6–10) and made it an effective center by bringing into it the *ark of the covenant, to which all the tribes gave allegiance. In order to house the ark appropriately David bought a threshing floor to the north of the City of David from one Araunah (2 Sam. 24.18–25), which is both a title ("lord") in Hittite and a personal name in *Ugaritic. Here *Solomon built the First *Temple ca. 960 BCE, which he linked to the city by a palace (1 Kings 6—7), effectively doubling the size of the original Jebusite city. The Jebusite water-shaft was retained for use in military emergencies, but Solomon dug a tunnel from Gihon along the edge of the hill. Sluice gates at intervals facilitated irrigation of the King's Garden in the Kidron valley. The population of Davidic and Solomonic Jerusalem was a few thousand at most.

The excavations of Nahman Avigad in the Jewish Quarter have unearthed evidence, notably a massive wall 7 m (23 ft) wide, that the city had expanded to cover the western hill in the late eighth century BCE. When *Sennacherib menaced Jerusalem, King *Hezekiah built the wall (Isa. 22.10) to protect refugees from the northern kingdom of Israel, who had settled outside the crowded city. He thus created two new quarters, the mišneh ("second"; 2 Kings 22.14) on the western hill, and the maktēš ("mortar"; Zeph. 1.11) in the Tyropoeon valley. The City of David was given a new wall just inside the Jebusite wall that had served for a thousand years. In order to guarantee the water supply, Hezekiah dug a 533 m (1750 ft) tunnel from Gihon through the Ophel ridge to the pool of Siloam in the Tyropoeon valley (2 Chron. 32). An inscription found inside the exit details the construction technique. A new wall was built to protect the vulnerable north side of the city in the seventh century BCE. Both it and houses in the City of David bear traces of the savage attack that brought Jerusalem under *Babylonian control in 587/586 BCE.

After the Exile. The Israelites who returned from the *exile in 538 BCE rebuilt the Temple under the direction of *Zerubbabel (Ezra 5—6), but were authorized to reconstruct the walls only when the *Persians appointed the first Jewish governor, *Nehemiah, about 445 BCE. A complete description of these walls is given in Nehemiah 3, but the passage abounds in textual problems, and it has proved impossible to translate the data into a precise line on the ground. The complete absence of Hellenistic remains on the western hill, however, indicates that they encompassed an area barely equal to that of the city of David and Solomon.

Jerusalem suffered three sieges in the wars between the Ptolemies of Egypt and the Seleucids of Syria (201, 199, and 198 BCE). Sirach 50.1–4 praises the high priest Simon (220–195 BCE) for his rebuilding program, but the differences between the Hebrew and Greek versions create a certain obscurity as to what he actually achieved. After Jerusalem passed into the hands of the Seleucids in 198 BCE, the Hellenizing faction among the Jews built a gymnasium in the city (1 Macc. 1.14). In 167 BCE Antiochus IV Epiphanes forbade all Jewish religious practices. In order to forestall any resistance he threw down the walls of Jerusalem, and built a great fortress, the Akra, to hold a Syrian garrison (1 Macc. 1.29–35). Nine different sites have been proposed for the Akra, but it seems likely that it was south of the Temple. It is not to be confused with the Baris sited northwest of the Temple.

The refortification of the city was begun by Jonathan Maccabeus (1 Macc. 10.10–11) and completed by his brother Simon (1 Macc. 13.10), i.e., between 160 and 134 BCE. *Josephus's description of this line (War 5.4.142–45), which he calls the First Wall, has been given precision by excavations. It ran due west from the Temple along the southern edge of a tributary of the Tyropoeon valley, followed the rim of the Hinnom valley, and mounted the eastern edge of the Ophel ridge to join the Temple. Descriptions of the Hasmonean city appear in the Letter of Aristeas (83–106) and in Josephus (Ant. 12–14), but both must be used with great caution. The date of the information in the former is uncertain, and the latter is at times guilty of anachronism.

The Herodian City. The Romans, who asserted their authority over Palestine in 63 BCE, appointed *Herod the Great king of Judea in 40 BCE. A three-year campaign to establish his sovereignty culminated with the capture of Jerusalem in the summer of 37 BCE. The fact that he had to break two walls in order to reach the Lower City (Ant. 14.16.476–77) suggests that what Josephus calls the Second Wall (War 5.146), which ran from the Gennath Gate in the First Wall to the northwest corner of the Temple, was already in existence at this time. No certain elements of this wall have been discovered, but the section running north from the First Wall cannot be farther west than the present Suq Khan ez-Zeit. Excavations beneath the Holy Sepulcher and in the Muristan reveal that this area was not within the city of the late first century BCE or early first century CE. There is unambiguous evidence that it was an abandoned quarry. A Jewish catacomb was cut in the west wall. The six kokhim graves still visible in the Holy Sepulcher are typical of the first centuries BCE and CE. A projecting corner in the south wall, which sloped to the southeast, was called *Golgotha ("[the place of] the skull"). The relationship of these two elements corresponds perfectly with the description of Jesus' crucifixion and burial in John 19.17–42.

While he presumably repaired, and in some cases certainly strengthened, the walls of the city, Herod did not alter the lines he had inherited. The prime contemporary written source for data on the area they enclosed is Josephus's Jewish War. The principal passages are 5.4.136–83 and 6.4.220–442, but other topographical references are scattered throughout the work. He consistently refers to the western hill as the Upper City, and alludes to the old City of David on Ophel as the Lower City. Cemeteries bordered the city on the north and east; the tombs of the families of Herod the Great (War 5.108) and of the high priest *Caiaphas have been located west of the city.

Herod's Buildings. Herod's first concern was for his own security. On the site of the Hasmonean Baris at the northwest corner of the Temple he built the Antonia fortress (War 5.5.238–45). Since it was named for Mark Antony, it must have been completed prior to the latter's defeat in 31 BCE. Paul was imprisoned there (Acts 21.27–22.30). The Roman garrison based there after 6 CE may have influenced the growth of the healing shrine outside the walls to the east, which figures in John 5.1–9. For the entertainment of his supporters Herod built a theater and an amphitheater (Ant. 15.8.268). The latter has not been located, but the former was in a little valley south of the Hinnom. The hippodrome (War 2.3.44) must have been in the Kidron valley. The quadrennial contests for which these were built gave great offense to pious Jews. In order to further elevate his splendid palace (War 5.4.161–82), excavations show that Herod erected a podium at the highest point of the Upper City. It was protected by three great towers, Hippicus, Mariamne, and Phasaelis. The latter surpassed the Pharos of Alexandria, one of the seven wonders of the ancient world. Its great base (today part of the Citadel) is the only element of the palace to have survived.

After the Romans assumed direct control of Palestine in 6 CE, Herod's palace became the residence of the procurators when they came to Jerusalem (War 2.14.301–308); Philo calls it "the house of the procurators" (Leg. ad Gaium 306). It is here then that we must locate the praetorium in which Pontius *Pilate judged Jesus (John 18.28). This is confirmed by the geographic term used in John 19.13, because Gabbatha ("high point") can only apply to this part of the Herodian city. At this stage the descendants of Herod used the Hasmonean palace on the western edge of the Tyropoeon valley (Ant. 20.8.189–90; cf. Luke 23.7–12).

Starting in 20 BCE it took Herod nine and a half years to complete rebuilding the *Temple on a much grander scale than its predecessor on the same site (War 5.5.184–247; Ant. 15.11.380–425). Nothing remains except the huge retaining walls supporting the platform, the western side of which became a site for Jewish prayer (the "Wailing Wall") after the destruction of the Temple. Such building activity inspired others, and the quality of life of the wealthy in first century CE Jerusalem is nowhere more evident than in the magnificent mansions excavated in the Jewish Quarter.

The sources make no mention of any concern on the part of Herod for the water supply of the city, but Josephus's mention of the Serpent's Pool (War 5.3.108; today Birkat es-Sultan), which served a large catchment area west of the city, probably implies the existence of the serpentine 67 km (42 mi) low-level aqueduct that brought water from Arrub via Solomon's Pools to the Temple. Herod certainly constructed the great reservoir, Birkat Israel, against the north wall of the Temple, and it is likely that he refurbished the Pool of Siloam (John 9.7). Other known reservoirs are Struthion (War 5.11.467), adjacent to the Antonia, and Amygdalon (War 5.11.468), just north of the palace; the latter was fed by aqueducts from Mamilla and from the north. When the water stored in house cisterns is added, it has been calculated that the population ceiling must have been about seventy thousand.

After Herod the Great. Pilate is credited with having constructed a new aqueduct soon after 26 CE (War 2.9.175), but it cannot be identified with the 15 km (9 mi) high-level aqueduct from Bir el-Daraj that supplied the Upper City, and which inscriptions date to 195 CE. The prosperity of Jerusalem increased the demand on space, and the climate of peace meant that there was no risk in building outside the Second Wall. Herod Agrippa I (41–44 CE) tried to wall in this New City or suburb of Bezetha, but the attempt was blocked by the Emperor Claudius (Ant. 19.7.326–327). This wall, completed by the rebels during the First Revolt (66–70 CE), is the famous Third Wall of Josephus (War 5.4.147–55), which has given rise to intense debate, because the data given by Josephus are both vague and incoherent. Only two elements have been identified archaeologically, the north gate beneath the present Damascus Gate, and the east gate, which is the Ecce Homo arch near the Antonia. When eighteen thousand men were made redundant on the completion of work on the Temple in 62–64 CE, Herod Agrippa II employed them to pave the city with white stone (Ant. 20.9.219–22).

The Roman siege began at Passover 70 CE, while internecine warfare raged in the city. All Jerusalem was in the hand of the legions by late August. By order of Titus it was levelled to the ground, the only exceptions being the great towers, Phasaelis, Hippicus, and Mariamne, which were left as a memorial to Jerusalem's former strength and glory (War 7.1.1–2).

Symbolism

Although the sixteenth century was a period of great scientific advances among European mapmakers, one of the best known maps of that period is more imaginative than accurate: a woodcut in the form of a cloverleaf, with Jerusalem depicted as the center of the world from which emanate the continents of Europe, Asia, and Africa. The idea of the centrality of Jerusalem has been a mainstay in Christianity, in various ways, since its inception. It has also been integral to Judaism since the time of King *David in the tenth century BCE and, together with the sacred cities of Mecca and Medina, to Islam since its beginnings in the seventh century CE. In the modern era of nation-states, Jerusalem is both the capital of Israel and, for Palestinians, the capital of the state of Palestine. Thus, Jerusalem has long been a focus of powerful and intertwined passions of religion and politics. Although its name probably originally meant "foundation of [the god] Shalem," it has often been interpreted to mean "city of peace" (Hebr. ʿîr šālōm). But peace has remained an elusive goal for most of Jerusalem's entire history.

In his meditation on this most holy and painful city (Jerusalem: City of Mirrors, [Boston, 1989]), the "capital of memory," the Israeli writer Amos Elon observed that it is as if the very name Jerusalem (Hebr. yĕrûšālaim) is a reflection of the city's contradictory, even dualistic nature (aim is the Hebrew suffix indicating a dual or pair), manifesting itself even in its location on the boundary between Israel's cultivated grasslands and arid desert regions. There has always been a tension between the present and the future, the earthly and the heavenly, the real and the ideal Jerusalem, a city of diverse peoples struggling to accomplish their daily activities and the city of religious visionaries.

The name Jerusalem occurs 660 times in the Hebrew Bible; *Zion, often used as synonymous with Jerusalem, especially in biblical poetry, occurs another 154 times. The former appears most frequently in the historical narratives of 2 Samuel, Kings, Chronicles, Ezra and Nehemiah, and in the prophetic books of Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Zechariah. Except for Salem in Genesis 14.18, it is absent from the *Pentateuch, achieving importance in ancient Israel's self-understanding only after David brought the *ark of the covenant, symbol of God's presence, to the newly conquered city. The ark would find its permanent home in the Jerusalem *Temple, the house of God, completed by David's son *Solomon, and strategically situated very near to the house of God's loyal servant, the king. The belief in the inviolability of Jerusalem, the chosen dwelling place of God, was challenged by such prophets as Micah and Jeremiah, who warned that the city would be destroyed as a result of its transgressions (Mic. 3.12, quoted in Jer. 26.18). But after the *Babylonian destruction of Jerusalem and its Temple in 587/586 BCE, the exilic prophets envisioned a new Jerusalem, which was simultaneously a rebuilding and restoration of the old and also an idealized city, both grander and more enduring than its predecessor, offering its inhabitants a relationship with God and concomitant peace and prosperity. For Jeremiah, the rebuilt Jerusalem was well grounded in the old, even in its physical contours (30.18; 31.38–40). Ezekiel, who understood Jerusalem as "in the center of the nations, with countries all around her" (5.5), celebrates a new city and a new Temple, areas of radiating holiness, fruitfulness, and well-being (chaps. 40–48), where God's *glory will again reside: "And the name of the city from that time on shall be, The Lord is There" (48.35). Second Isaiah is consoling in its assertion that Jerusalem "has served her term, that her penalty is paid" (Isa. 40.2). The gates of the new city will always be open (60.11), and the Lord will be its everlasting light (60.19–20). "No more shall there be in it an infant that lives but a few days, or an old person who does not live out a lifetime" (65.20).

The hopes and expectations of the exilic prophets were realized in part with the rebuilding of the city and Temple during the latter half of the sixth century BCE, the first generation of Persian rule. Both, however, would be destroyed by the Roman army in 70 CE. The Temple was never rebuilt. In the generation before its destruction, the Alexandrian Jewish philosopher and statesman *Philo wrote that the Jews "hold the Holy City where stands the sacred Temple of the most high God to be their mother city" (Flaccum 46). The destruction of the Temple and "mother city" was both a great blow and a great challenge to Jews, inside and outside of Israel. Some Jewish *apocalyptic texts from this period envisioned that at the end time, the heavenly Jerusalem, fashioned by God, would descend to earth; others envisioned a heavenly Jerusalem that awaited the righteous above. In either case, the renewal of Jerusalem was integral to the vision of the end time, a role already suggested in the eschatological visions of the exilic and postexilic prophets.

The formative texts of rabbinic Judaism, which date from roughly the third to the seventh centuries CE, share with the earlier apocalyptic texts both the centrality of the renewal of Jerusalem in the messianic age, and a lack of uniformity in the description of that future, ideal city; in some texts, an earthly Jerusalem, and in others a heavenly city; in some an earthly city that ascends to heaven, and in others a heavenly city that descends to earth. What is striking, however, are the linkages and interdependencies between the earthly and the heavenly Jerusalem. In the anti-Roman messianic Palestinian Jewish revolt of Bar Kochba (132–135 CE), the rebels struck coins with the image of the Temple facade and the inscription "of the freedom of Jerusalem," indicating their hopes for the rebuilding of Jerusalem and its Temple. Similarly, the Jewish rebels of the First Revolt (66–70 CE), with their constellation of religious, nationalist, and messianic apocalyptic motivations, issued coins with the inscription, "Jerusalem the holy" (see Money). As noted above, however, the consequence of the first revolt was not the reinvigoration of Jerusalem, but rather its destruction.

Early rabbinic literature did not focus only on the Jerusalem of the messianic age. The *Mishnah, *Talmuds, and midrashic collections celebrated the memory of the historic Jerusalem as well. Some texts describe Jerusalem as the center or "navel" of the world; others depict in glowing language the grandeur and uniqueness of the city. Jerusalem's uniqueness was reflected also in the halakhic requirements associated with the city, most of which were not practiced, given the destruction of the Temple and city, and the banning of Jews from Jerusalem by the Roman emperor Hadrian, in the aftermath of the war of Bar Kochba.

As if in response to the words of the psalmist of a long-gone era, "If I forget you, O Jerusalem, let my right hand wither" (Ps. 137.5), the memory of Jerusalem and its Temple and the hope for their restoration were reflected in evolving Jewish liturgy, to be evoked on occasions of joy and mourning and perhaps, most importantly, to be recited as part of the Grace after Meals and the daily Amidah prayer, which together with the *Shema, constitute, in a sense, the foundation of Jewish liturgy. The ninth of the month of Av developed as a day of fasting and mourning for the destruction of the First and Second Temples, becoming associated also with other calamitous events in Jewish history (see, e.g., m. Taʿan. 4.6).

It is not clear to what degree and for how long Hadrian's decree banning Jews from Jerusalem was enforced. Jews were permitted to reside in Jerusalem, however, during its many centuries of Muslim rule, beginning with its conquest by Caliph Umar in 638, interrupted only by the brief and, in many ways, violent rule of the twelfth-century Crusader Kingdom of Jerusalem. During the years of Ottoman rule (1517–1917), notwithstanding the rebuilding of Jerusalem's walls (1537–1541) by Suleiman I, Jerusalem remained a small and impoverished city. Only in the mid-to-late nineteenth century did the Jews, Latin Christians, Armenian Christians, and Muslims leave their traditional quarters in the walled city to establish new ongoing neighborhoods, the Jews settling generally to the west of the Old City.

The expansion of Jerusalem outside of the walled city developed at roughly the same time as European Zionism. Many factors contributed to the evolution of the latter, including the anti-Jewish policies of the Russian czarist governments, the overall political, social, and economic conditions of Eastern European Jewry, the evolution of anti-Semitic movements and agitation in Western Europe, and the presence and vitality of other European nationalist movements. Notwithstanding the generally nontraditional religious orientation of most of the early Zionist leaders, one cannot underestimate the significance for them of Jewish historical connections with the land of Israel and the city of Jerusalem, suggested even in the term "Zionism." Nonetheless, many of the early Zionist leaders expressed a kind of ambivalence about Jerusalem, reacting seemingly both to the physical squalor of the city and, from their perspectives, to Jerusalem's tired and outdated Jewish religious practices and passions. The ultra-Orthodox Jewish communities of Jerusalem were a counterpoint to the Zionists' visions of a transformed Jewish society. As late as 1947, the Zionist leadership was willing to accept the United Nations resolution to partition Palestine into a Jewish state and an Arab state, and to make Jerusalem a separate political entity under international administration. Following the war of 1948 and the bloody battle for Jerusalem, however, neither the internationalization of Jerusalem nor the Arab state in Palestine was established. Instead, the land fell under Israeli or Jordanian rule with western Jerusalem under Israeli control and eastern Jerusalem, including the Old City and its holy places, under Jordanian control. Jerusalem was declared the official capital of Israel in December 1949. As a result of the 1967 Six Day War, Israel began to govern formerly Jordanian-held East Jerusalem, which was later officially annexed and incorporated by the Israeli government into the state of Israel. Within the Old City stood the Western or Wailing Wall, a retaining wall from the Second Temple as renovated by *Herod in the first century BCE. It continues to function as a complex religious-national symbol, a focus of prayer, and an object of pilgrimage for Jews inside and outside of Israel. Today, even most of the significant number of Israeli Jews who support territorial compromise with the Palestinians in exchange for peace, including the establishment of a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza, are reluctant to give up any portion of Jerusalem, or to see the city come under international rule or be divided again. Analogously, the significant number of Palestinians who also support a "two state solution" insist that eastern Jerusalem serve as the capital of Palestine. Thus the "city of peace" remains a stumbling block in Arab-Israeli and Palestinian-Israeli negotiations.

Although the Christian population of Jerusalem, two to three percent of the total, has been in decline for the last fifty years, the number of Christian visitors and pilgrims to Jerusalem remains very large. The roots of this fascination with Jerusalem date both to the origins of Christianity as a first-century Palestinian Jewish apocalyptic movement and to the depictions of the ministry, death, and resurrection of Jesus in the four New Testament Gospels. The Gospels mention Jerusalem sixty-seven times. Matthew refers to it as the "holy city" (4.5; 27.53). Although the texts vary, each of the Gospels depicts Jesus as moving seemingly inevitably to Jerusalem, the site of the pivotal events of the life of Jesus and of Christianity's self-understanding, that is Jesus' death and resurrection; and, for first-century Palestinian Jewry, their national and religious center.

As was the case with other kinds of Judaism of this period, early Christianity knew of both an earthly and a heavenly Jerusalem (e.g., Gal. 4.25–26; Heb. 12.22–24). The book of *Revelation, drawing heavily on Ezekiel's vision of the new Jerusalem and very reminiscent of contemporary Jewish apocalyptic texts, describes "the holy city, the new Jerusalem, coming down out of heaven from God" (21.2). Unlike Ezekiel's city, however, this Jerusalem has no Temple, "for its temple is the Lord God the Almighty and the Lamb (21.22)." As Robert Wilken has noted, speculation concerning God's future kingdom on earth with Jerusalem as its center dominated Christian eschatology of the first and second centuries, as, for example, in the writings of Justin Martyr and Irenaeus. Later church fathers, however, such as Origen, who spent more than twenty years in third-century Caesarea, disputed the teachings of Justin Martyr and Irenaeus, as well as Jewish beliefs in the future restoration of some kind of Jerusalem on earth, and spoke only of the heavenly Jerusalem, which remained above and entirely separate from the earthly city.

The fourth century was a period of tremendous change for Christianity. It entered the century as the religion of a persecuted minority, and exited as the official state religion of the Roman empire. Emperor Constantine made Christianity a legal religion in 313, and became its patron and protector. Palestine and in particular Jerusalem became a Christian showplace of sorts. From the time of Constantine, massive church building projects were undertaken to create a visible and glorious manifestation of the legitimacy and permanence of Christian rule—an outward sign of the truth and victory of Christianity. Money poured in from both the government and private persons, bringing with it increased material prosperity and cosmopolitanism for all of fourth- and fifth-century Palestine. Hadrian's Jerusalem, Roman Aelia Capitolina, named after the emperor and the gods of the Capitoline in Rome, would be transformed into a Christian Jerusalem. Constantine himself sponsored the building of three major Palestinian churches, all connected with the life of Jesus, and two of which were in Jerusalem:

the Church of the Holy Sepulcher; a church on the Mount of *Olives; and the Church of the Nativity in nearby *Bethlehem. Already, in the writings of Eusebius, the early fourth-century Caesarean church historian, one can see intimations of the Palestinian church's understanding of itself as guardian of a very earthly Christian Palestine with its center at Jerusalem—a land in which Christians lived and visited, and in which one could see and touch the very places in which the saving events of biblical history had taken place.

Christian pilgrimage to Palestine and especially Jerusalem became widespread in the fourth century. Early pilgrims included Helena, the mother of Constantine. Fourth-century Christian pilgrims, as part of their quest for perfection, would undertake the dangers of travel to Palestine to visit the holy places, and therein both confirm and strengthen their faith. As pilgrimage flourished, some church leaders questioned its value, drawing attention to the contrast between "Jerusalem the Holy" and the city that awaited the pilgrim. For example, Gregory of Nyssa in his "Letter on Pilgrimage" pointed to the "shameful practices" of the people of Jerusalem as evidence that God's grace was no more abundant in Jerusalem than elsewhere.

Echoes of early Christian speculations on the role and nature of Jerusalem in the end time, as well as an interest in the earthly city itself, can be found both in the constellation of factors that shaped the Crusades of medieval Europe, and in the voyages of Columbus who, influenced by late fifteenth-century apocalyptic thought, sought to acquire the gold to finance the final crusade, which would capture Jerusalem and place it again in Christian hands—all part of God's plan for the end time.

Columbus failed in his plans, but Christian interest in and pilgrimage to Jerusalem has endured. For many pilgrims, the Church of the Holy Sepulcher, consecrated in 335, was the highlight of their trip. Today it remains the major Christian holy place in Jerusalem, although most of what can be seen dates from the period of the Crusades, the Church having been destroyed and rebuilt several times since the time of Constantine. Several Christian denominations have rights to various sections of the Church. In their stories of conflict and cooperation, they are illustrative of the diversity within Christianity and the long, complex, and vital history of the Christian community in Jerusalem.

Although an overview of the symbolism and significance of Jerusalem for Islam is beyond the scope of this article, one must note both the importance of Jerusalem for Islam, and the importance of the city's Muslim communities since their inception in the seventh century CE for the history of Jerusalem, in Arabic "al-Quds," "the Holy." Today, Jerusalem's major Muslim holy place, the magnificent Dome of the Rock, a rotunda on an octagonal base, built by the Umayyad Caliph Abd al-Malik and completed in 691/692, dominates the Haram al-Sharif, or Noble Sanctuary, also the site of the Temple Mount of the Jews. The Dome, reminiscent on a grander scale of the nearby Church of the Holy Sepulcher, was constructed in the architectural style of the Byzantine martyrium to serve as a shrine for the holy rock beneath it—a rock which by the time of the Muslim conquest of Jerusalem in 638 was already associated with the Temple and with *Abraham, the common traditional ancestor of Judaism, Christianity, and Islam. The Dome affirmed the triumph of Islam in the midst of the Christian showplace, Jerusalem, "The Holy City," and in a place, atop the Temple Mount, which the Byzantine Christians had kept in ruins to concretize Christian beliefs that the destruction of the Jerusalem Temple was both a fulfillment of prophecy and a proof of the victory and truth claims of the "New Israel."

The sanctity for Islam of the Rock, the Haram, and Jerusalem, in general, was strengthened by the identification by early Muslim authorities of Jerusalem as the destiny of the Prophet Muhammad's night journey (Sūrah 17:1), and the Rock as the place from which he ascended to heaven (Sūrah 53:4–10). As in Judaism and Christianity, Jerusalem assumed an important role in Muslim beliefs concerning the end time and the *day of judgment. So too, Muslim sources reflect the tensions between the holy city, setting of the last judgment, and Jerusalem in its daily activities. Thus Muqaddasi, a tenth-century geographer and historian, and a native of Jerusalem, would celebrate Jerusalem as "the most illustrious of cities" where the advantages of the present and the next world meet, and also describe the city as a place oppressive to the poor, lacking in learned men, "a golden basin filled with scorpions."

Jerusalem is today a city of approximately one-half million people, a city which both celebrates and is haunted by its history, a city in which the tensions between the ideal and the real Jerusalem are lived and witnessed daily, and in which the rages and passions of religion and politics bring to mind the words of the psalmist, "Pray for the peace of Jerusalem" (Ps. 122.6). BARBARA GELLER NATHANSON

Life and Teaching. Introduction: critical method. By accepting the modern critical method of studying the New Testament, we need not attempt to write a life of Jesus in the modern sense of a psychological study. We can hope only to reconstruct the barest outline of his career and to give some account of his message and teaching.

We shall assume that *Mark is the earliest of the four *Gospels and that, apart from the passion narrative (14.1–16.8), the individual units of material are arranged in an order determined more by subject matter than by historical or chronological concerns. Moreover, these units of material (stories about Jesus, pronouncement stories, *miracle stories, *parables, and aphorisms) were adapted to the needs of the post-Easter community and circulated in oral tradition for some forty years before Mark was written down. The authors of the two later *synoptic Gospels, *Matthew, and *Luke, used Mark as their primary source, plus a common source consisting mostly of sayings, unknown to Mark. This source is hypothetical and only recoverable by reconstructing the non-Marcan material common to Matthew and Luke. It is generally known as *Q, from the German word Quelle, "source." In addition, Matthew and Luke have their own special traditions. Like Mark, the three sources—Q, Special Matthew, and Special Luke—contain material previously passed on orally for some fifty years. The evangelists, in their use of sources and oral traditions, shaped them according to their theological interests; this editorial work is known as redaction. Thus, the synoptic Gospels contain material that developed in three stages: authentic words and memories of Jesus himself (stage I), materials shaped and transmitted in oral tradition (stage II), and the evangelists' redaction (stage III). The gospel of *John, however, is very different. It contains some stage I and stage II materials independent of the synoptics that can be used sometimes to confirm or supplement the synoptic evidence in reconstructing the career and teaching of Jesus. But the Fourth Gospel contains much more material belonging to stage III. In reconstructing our account of Jesus, we shall attempt to recover stage I materials from all four Gospels. We shall be assisted by certain tests of authenticity. We may be reasonably certain that materials go back to stage I if they meet some or all of the following criteria: (1) have multiple attestation (i.e., are attested in more than one source or in more than one type of material); (2) are distinctive to Jesus (i.e., they are without parallel in Judaism or in the post-Easter community; this test should be used with caution and generally applied to confirm rather than exclude; principle of dissimilarity); (3) cohere with other accepted Jesus traditions (test of coherence); and/or (4) exhibit indications of originating in *Aramaic (in the case of sayings), since this was Jesus' normal language (though he probably knew some *Greek), or in a Palestinian milieu or social setting.

The birth and upbringing of Jesus. The birth stories in Matthew and Luke are relatively late, and belong to stages II and III. But they contain certain items that go back to earlier tradition. Some of these are clearly theological: Davidic descent, conception through the *Holy Spirit while his mother remained a virgin, homage at birth. Factual data in these common items include: the date of Jesus' birth in the last years of the reign of *Herod the Great (died 4 BCE); the names of Jesus' parents, *Mary and *Joseph; the fact that the child was conceived between betrothal and wedding; the birth at *Bethlehem (though this may be a theological assertion, associated with the Davidic descent). In any case, Jesus was brought up in *Nazareth. His father is said in Matthew 13.55 to have been a carpenter, and Jesus is said to have been one himself in Mark 6.3. Since sons habitually followed their father's trade, this is not improbable. Presumably, Jesus received the education of the devout poor in Israel, with thorough instruction in the Hebrew scriptures.

The beginning of Jesus' public ministry: his message. Jesus' public career began when he left home for the *Jordan River to be baptized by *John the Baptist. Jesus looked back to the Baptist as the source of his mission and authority (Mark 11.27–33). For a time, he appears to have conducted a ministry of baptizing parallel to that of the Baptist (see John 3.22; 4.1), presumably continuing the Baptist's message by demanding repentance from Israel in view of the impending advent of God's *kingdom. After the Baptist's arrest (Mark 1.14), Jesus embarked upon a new kind of ministry. The message of the kingdom acquired a new urgency, perhaps as a result of the *temptation (Mark 1.12–13), which included a vision of God's victory over *Satan (Luke 10.18).

Abandoning the practice of *baptism, Jesus went to the *synagogues for a time and then spoke in the open air, reaching out to the people instead of waiting for them to come to him; but still like the Baptist, he continued preaching the coming kingdom. Jesus never defined what he meant by the kingdom, but it means God's coming in saving power and strength, defeating the powers of evil and inaugurating salvation for Israel. It is basically future ("your kingdom come" in the *Lord's Prayer) but also presently operative in Jesus' words and works (Matt. 12.28 || Luke 11.20 Q). In the *parables of the kingdom, Jesus seeks to engage his hearers, persuading them to see the present operation of the kingdom in his own words and works, and to secure from them the response of faith and confidence in its future consummation—parables of the sower, the seed growing secretly, the mustard seed (Mark 4.3–32); also the leaven (Matt. 13.33 || Luke 13.20–21 Q).

An inescapable conclusion is that Jesus was influenced by the prophecies of *Isaiah 40–66, where the coming of the reign of God is a central theme (Isa. 52.7). Indeed, much of Jesus' teaching is shot through with allusions to Isaiah 40–66. Jesus is represented as quoting Isaiah 61.1–2 and 58.6 in the inaugural sermon in the synagogue at Nazareth (Luke 4.18–19), but the content of the sermon was probably shaped in stage II or III. There are, however, clear echoes of these passages in the Beatitudes (Matt. 5.3–6 || Luke 6.20–23 Q) and in the answer to John (Matt. 11.5–6 || Luke 7.22–23). Jesus thus appeared first and foremost as eschatological prophet, one who announced the definitive coming of God's kingly rule, the salvation of the end time.

Jesus' teaching: ethics. Jesus was also recognized as a *rabbi and teacher. Like the rabbis, he taught in synagogues, collected a band of disciples, and discussed *Torah with them as well as with inquirers and critics. The forms of his teachings were similar to those employed by Pharisaic teachers: parables and aphorisms, that is, sayings, often of a wisdom type, enunciating general truths about human life and manners (e.g., the teaching on anxiety in Matt. 6.25–34). Like the *Pharisees, Jesus took the authority of the Hebrew Bible for granted. It enunciates the demands of God: prohibition of *divorce (Mark 10.6–8; Matt 5.32; Luke 16.18); the second tablet of the *Ten Commandments (Mark 10.19); the *Shema and the summary of the law (Mark 12.29–31).

Yet there are differences between Jesus' teaching and those of the Pharisees. He emphasizes more strongly than they that God demands not just outward conformity to the *law but the whole person, and not just love of *neighbor but love of enemy (see the antitheses of the *Sermon on the Mount, Matt. 5.21–48). The rich young man must not only keep the commandments but sell all he has and follow Jesus (Mark 10.21).

For Jesus, God's demand is summed up in the double commandment of *love. This raises the question of the relationship between Jesus' preaching of the kingdom and his enunciation of God's demand, between his prophetic preaching and his wisdom teaching. Jesus never relates the two; in fact, he relates his wisdom teaching to *creation rather than to the coming of God's kingly rule. Thus, the command to love one's enemy is based on the fact that God causes the rain to fall and the sun to shine upon the just and the unjust alike (Matt. 5.45; cf. Luke 6.35). Similarly, the absolute prohibition of divorce shows that the reversion to the situation at creation is now possible because of the shift in the ages: the age of *Moses is coming to an end, and God's kingly rule is coming. Therefore, Jesus' prophetic preaching presupposes his wisdom teaching. The coming of that rule makes possible the realization of God's original intent in creation. The same unspoken presupposition operates in the double commandment of love: only the coming of God's kingly rule makes it possible for people to love God in radical obedience and to love one's neighbor, including one's enemy. For God's coming in his kingly rule is an act of mercy and forgiveness (an important aspect of Jesus' message; see, e.g., Mark 2.5; Luke 7.47; Matt. 18.23–35; also Jesus' preaching of repentance is connected with his offer of forgiveness: Mark 1.15; 6.12; Matt. 11.20); and forgiveness as a human response to God's forgiveness is the supreme expression of love. Jesus' prophetic message is the indicative and his enunciation of the will of God is the imperative that the indicative implies.

Jesus' teaching about God. Jesus brought no new teaching about God. God is the creator, though this is understood in an immediate way. God did not merely create the world in the beginning, rather, it comes from him as his creation in every moment (Matt. 6.26, 30, 32, and the fourth petition of the Lord's Prayer). For Jesus, God is also the God who acts in history, the climax of which is the coming of the kingdom (see e.g., Matt. 13.16–17 || Luke 10.23–24 Q, and the tradition behind Matt. 23.34–35 || Luke 11.49–50). Also, Jesus frequently adduced biblical characters whose situation in their day was analogous to the situation of his contemporaries in the face of the coming kingdom (e.g., Lot and his wife, the Queen of *Sheba, Jonah).

Although the address of God as Father is not unknown in the Hebrew Bible and Judaism, and even the familiar *abba is not completely without precedent, that usage was characteristic of Jesus. He did not enunciate the fatherhood of God as an abstract doctrine or a general truth but himself experienced God as his own Father (i.e., in his call to his unique mission mediated through his baptism and temptations), and he offered to those who responded to his prophetic message a similar experience and the privilege of addressing God as abba (note the opening address of the Lord's Prayer in its original Lucan form, Luke 11.2).

Jesus' conduct. Jesus appeared as a charismatic healer as well as a preacher and teacher. This was a further implementation of the prophetic mission set forth in Isaiah 35 and 61 (Matt. 11.5–6 || Luke 7.22–23). Jesus performed *exorcisms, which he claimed were the action in him of the Spirit (Matthew) or finger (Luke) of God. To deny this spirit at work in his exorcisms was blasphemy, a sin for which there would be no forgiveness (Mark 3.29). Thus, both healings and exorcisms are related to his message. The actual miracle stories may not be direct reports, but they reflect a general memory that Jesus did do such things. More problematic are the so-called nature miracles. There are three raising stories—Jairus's daughter (Mark 5.21–24, 35–43), the widow's son at Nain (Luke 7.11–17), and Lazarus (John 11.1–44)—but all these belong to stage II. The answer to John (Matt. 11.5–6 || Luke 7.22–23), however, may enable us to take back the fact of resuscitations to stage I, in which case the three stories of the raising may rest upon a general memory that Jesus did perform such deeds. Another special instance of a nature miracle is the feeding of the multitude. This miracle has multiple attestation (Mark 6.30–44, Mark 8.1–10, and John 6.1–15 represent three independent traditions). The shaping of the stories originated early in stage II, where they were modeled partly on the eucharistic tradition and partly on the *Elisha story (2 Kings 4.42–44, whence the miraculous multiplication of the loaves derives). But such a meal itself may well be historical: Jesus met with his followers in a remote place and ate with them. This meal may have been one of a series of events constituting a crisis at the climax of the Galilean ministry (see below).

Jesus also celebrated *meals with the outcast, and for this too there is multiple attestation. In the parables of the lost (Luke 15), Jesus interprets this action as a celebration in advance of the joy of the great banquet of the kingdom of God.

Like John the Baptist, Jesus addressed his message of repentance in view of the coming kingdom to Israel as a whole. But he called some to follow him, accompany him, and share in the work of proclaiming the message. From these he selected *twelve to symbolize the restoration of Israel (Mark 3.14; 6.7; Matt. 19.28; cf. Luke 22.28–30). It would seem that much of Jesus' radical demand was intended for these followers, who constituted a band of wandering charismatic preachers and therefore had to dispense, as he did, with the normal securities of human life (Mark 6.8–9), including family ties (see Mark 3.34–35; 8.34–37; 10.28–30).

The central crisis. It is clear that at one point Jesus broke off his Galilean ministry and transferred his activities to *Jerusalem. There are indications of a series of events starting with the feeding of the multitude (Mark 6.30–52; 8.1–9.13; John 6.1–71), followed by a withdrawal from the crowds, a crossing of the lake, and a period of solitary communication with his disciples (represented by the confession of Peter and the Transfiguration), after which Jesus set out for Jerusalem. We may suppose that during this period of solitude Jesus resolved that it was now God's plan for him to go to Jerusalem and carry his message to Israel at the very center of its life. Two circumstances may have contributed to this decision. First, Jesus' ministry evoked a dangerous messianic enthusiasm among the crowds (John 6.15, clarifying Mark 6.45). Second, the execution of John the Baptist (Mark 6.14–29; cf. 9.13) made Jesus fear that Herod Antipas might arrest him before he could challenge the authorities in Jerusalem (Luke 13.31–34).

The chronology of the Galilean ministry. Since Mark mentions only one *Passover during Jesus' public career, it is often supposed that his entire ministry lasted but a few months, less than one year. True, John mentions two Passovers before the final one (2.13; 6.4), but these references belong to stage III. There are, however, indications of two springs during the Galilean ministry.

In Mark 2.23, Jesus' disciples plucked ears of grain, while in the first feeding the crowds sit on the "green grass" (6.39). If we can trust these items and if they do not refer to the same spring, it would permit us to conclude that the Galilean ministry lasted over a year, for the grainfields episode requires that Jesus should have had time to collect a band of followers, and the feeding presumes a longer ministry. According to Luke 3.1, the Baptist's ministry began in the fifteenth year of Tiberius's reign (27 CE). Jesus' baptism could have occurred in that year, his Judean ministry would have covered the intervening period, and the Galilean ministry would have begun in late 27 or early 28 and ended after the spring of 29. But this is highly speculative. (See also Chronology, article on Early Christian Chronology.)

The journey to Jerusalem. John's gospel has obscured the decisiveness of Jesus' final journey to Jerusalem by bringing him to the holy city on two earlier occasions (John 2.12; 5.1), but these episodes probably belonged to the final Jerusalem period. John may be right, though, in making the Jerusalem ministry last for several months rather than for a single week, as it does in Mark. Indeed, Luke offers some support for a longer Jerusalem ministry (Luke 13.34). This would mean that the journey would have occurred some months earlier than the final Passover, perhaps bringing Jesus to Jerusalem in time for the feast of tabernacles (John 7.2). This would be in the fall of 29 CE.

The purpose of the trip is stated in Mark's three passion predictions (8.31; 9.31; 10.33–34). It is generally agreed that these predictions in their present form are prophecies after the event and therefore reflect a knowledge of the passion story (stage II). But they may well contain an authentic nucleus (stage I), such as "the Son of man will be delivered into the hands of men" (Mark 9.31), where we have an Aramaic play on words (Son of man/ men). Jesus hardly went up to Jerusalem in order to die; that, it has been suggested, would be tantamount to suicide. But he may well have realized that death would be the inevitable outcome of his mission.

The ministry in Jerusalem. Jesus continued to preach and teach in Jerusalem as he had done in Galilee. He also engaged in conflicts with his adversaries. These conflicts, Mark indicates, were of a different kind from the earlier ones in Galilee. Jesus is now a marked man and his enemies engage him on specific issues, seeking to entrap him into self-incrimination. John likewise presents Jesus as engaged in theological conflict with the religious authorities in Jerusalem.

Jesus' challenge reached its climax in his entry to Jerusalem and the "cleansing" of the Temple (so the Synoptics; John shifts the "cleansing" for theological reasons to the beginning of the ministry). It is not at all clear what the precise issues were that led the *Sanhedrin to plot Jesus' execution (for the plot see Mark 14.1–2; 10–11; John 11.45–54). The Synoptics attribute the plot against Jesus to the Sanhedrin's reaction to the cleansing of the Temple (Mark 11.18 par.), while John, less convincingly, attributes it to the raising of Lazarus. Yet John's report of the Sanhedrin meeting (John 11.47–53) seems to be based on reliable tradition: the Sanhedrin decided to get rid of Jesus out of fear that any disturbance of the peace would lead to Roman intervention and destroy the delicate balance between Jewish and Roman power.

On the eve of Passover (following the more plausible chronology of John), Jesus celebrated a farewell meal with his disciples. In the course of it, he interpreted his impending death as the climax of his life of self-giving service (Luke 22.24–27; cf. John 13.1–11; Mark 10.42–45a may originally have belonged to this context). The exact words Jesus spoke over the bread and cup are impossible to recover, since the various accounts of the institution (1 Cor. 11.23–25; Mark 14.22–24 ‖ Matt. 26.26–28; Luke 22.19–20) have been colored by liturgical developments in the post-Easter community (see Lord's Supper). But they all agree that Jesus associated the bread with his body (i.e., his person) and the wine with his blood (i.e., the giving of his life in death) and with the inauguration of a (new) *covenant. He also assured his disciples that beyond his death lay the coming of the kingdom of God (Mark 14.25; Luke 22.15–18).

After the supper, Jesus and the disciples went out to the garden of *Gethsemane (Mark 14.32; John 18.1) where he was arrested by Temple police, and also, if John 18.3 is correct, by Roman soldiers. This would indicate that the priestly party and the Roman prefect *Pilate were in close collusion over the matter. A preliminary investigation was held before the Jewish authorities (Mark 14.53–64; see also John 18.12–14, 19–24, which may be more accurate). This was not a formal trial, but more like a grand jury proceeding. By this investigation they established to their satisfaction that there was sufficient ground to warrant an accusation of high treason before Pilate's court (Mark 15.1–15). There Jesus was condemned to death as a messianic pretender. He was then taken out to *Golgotha and crucified with two criminals who were guilty of sedition (Mark 15.20b-32; John 19.16b–19). Jesus died later that same day and was buried, according to the gospel tradition, by sympathizers (Mark 15.42–47 par.; John 19.38–42). This marks the end of his earthly career.

Jesus' self-understanding. While Jesus' career evoked messianic hopes among his followers and fears among his enemies, stage I material shows him reluctant to assert any overt messianic claim. The self-designation he uses is *son of man. This is so widely attested in the gospel tradition and occurs (with one or two negligible exceptions) only on the lips of Jesus himself, that it satisfies the major tests of authenticity. It occurs in all primary strata of the gospel tradition (Mark, Q, Special Matthew, Special Luke, and the pre-Gospel tradition in John). It is not attested as a messianic title in earlier Judaism and occurs only once outside the gospels (apart from citations of Psalm 8.5–7), in Acts 7.56. So there should be no reasonable doubt that it was a characteristic self-designation of the historical Jesus. It is not a title but means "human one," and it is best understood as a self-effacing self-reference. It is used in contexts where Jesus spoke of his mission, fate, and final vindication.

Jesus certainly thought of himself as a prophet (Mark 6.4; Luke 13.33), but there was a final quality about his message and work that entitles us to conclude that he thought of himself as God's final, definitive emissary to Israel. He was more interested in what God was doing through him than in what he was in himself. He did not obtrude his own ego, yet his own ego was included as part of his message: "Whoever welcomes you welcomes me, and whoever welcomes me welcomes the one who sent me" (Matt. 10.40 || Luke 10.16 Q); "Follow me" (Mark 1.17; etc.); "Those who are ashamed of me . . ." (Mark 8.38); "Blessed is anyone who takes no offense at me (Matt. 11.6 || Luke 7.23 Q); "If it is by the Spirit [Luke: "finger"] of God that I cast out demons . . ." (Matt. 12.28 || Luke 11.20 Q). Jesus dared to speak and act for God. This is clear in the antitheses of the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5.21–48: "It was said to those of ancient times . . . but I say to you"), in his pronouncement of the forgiveness of sins (which only God could do, Mark 2.5–12; Luke 7.36–50), his acceptance of the outcast and healing of *lepers who were shunned under the law. Coupled with such features is the tremendous authority with which Jesus spoke and acted, an authority for which he offers no credentials save that it is intimately bound up with the authority of the Baptist (Mark 11.27–33) and rests upon God's final vindication (Mark 8.38 and Luke 12.8 Q). Jesus does not claim overtly to be *Son of God in any unique sense. Passages in which he appears to do so belong to stage II or III of the tradition. But he does call God "abba" in an unusual way, which points to God's call to which he has responded in full obedience, and therefore we may speak of his unique sense of sonship. But we must bear in mind that in this Palestinian milieu sonship denoted not a metaphysical quality but rather a historical call and obedience. Jesus did challenge his disciples to say who they thought he was, which elicited from Peter the response that he was the Christ or *Messiah (Mark 8.27–30; cf. John 6.66–69). According to Mark, he neither accepted nor rejected Peter's assertion. What did Peter mean, and in what sense did Jesus take it? It is commonly thought that it was meant in a political-nationalist sense and that Jesus rejected this. It seems more likely, however, that Peter meant it in the sense of the anointed prophet of Isaiah 61.1. Such a response to Jesus would have been wholly appropriate as far as it went. What Peter and the other disciples did not realize, of course, was that this mission extended beyond the terms of Isaiah 61 and that it also involved rejection, suffering, and death. It is possible, though much disputed, that Jesus modeled this further insight upon the figure of the suffering servant in Isaiah 53. We could be sure of this if Mark 10.45b belongs to stage I.

A very early tradition (Rom. 1.3) asserted that the earthly Jesus was of a family descended from the royal line of David. We cannot be sure that this played any role in his self-understanding. For the post-Easter community this title was important as qualifying him for the messianic role he assumed after his exaltation.

The use of "*Rabbi" and "my Lord" in addressing Jesus during his earthly ministry did not denote majesty: these were titles of respect accorded a charismatic person. However, as the conviction grew among his followers that he was the final emissary of God, these terms would acquire a heightened meaning.

In sum, we find in the Synoptics only limited evidence for an explicit Christology in Jesus' self-understanding, and such evidence as there is is critically suspect. He was more concerned with what God was doing in him than who he was, especially in any metaphysical sense. But what God was doing through him in his earthly ministry provided the raw materials for the christological evaluation of Jesus after the Easter event.

Person and Work. Introduction: critical presuppositions. In reconstructing the New Testament interpretation of the person (Christology) and work (soteriology) of Jesus, we are concerned with the Christian community's response to the Christ event in its totality. This event embraces both his earthly career, culminating in his *crucifixion, and also the Easter event, that is, the community's subsequent experiences, the empty tomb, and the appearances, together with their ongoing sense of his presence and the hope of his coming again.

The earliest Christian writings we have are those letters of *Paul that are beyond question authentic, namely, 1 *Thessalonians, *Galatians, 1 and 2 *Corinthians, *Romans, *Philemon, and *Philippians. These letters contain formulae that give us evidence of the theology of the pre-Pauline communities (e.g., 1 Thess. 1.9–10; 1 Cor. 15.3–5; Rom. 1.3–4; 3.25–26; 4.25; 10.9). Some of these formulae go back to the earliest Palestinian community, others to the Hellenistic communities (Greek-speaking communities before Paul). In addition, we have the kerygmatic speeches, proclamations of the Christ event, in *Acts; though composed by the author of Luke-Acts, they probably enshrine samples of early Christian preaching (e.g., Acts 2.22–24, 32–33, 36; 3.13–15, 21). Putting the evidence afforded by these materials together, we can form a general idea of the Christologies and soteriologies of the early communities. The letters of Paul provide ample evidence for the apostle's understanding of these matters. We have no other writings that can be said with any certainty to derive from the apostolic age, but there are a number of New Testament writings that, though ascribed to apostolic authors, were probably written in the subapostolic age (i.e., the period from ca. 70 to 110 CE). This would include the "deutero-Pauline" letters, that is, those letters which though ascribed to Paul were with varying degrees of probability written by later writers. Their purpose was to perpetuate Paul's teaching after his death. They consist of 2 *Thessalonians, *Colossians, *Ephesians, and the *Pastorals (1 and 2 Timothy and Titus). Other writings for this period are *Hebrews, together with the *catholic letters (James, 1 and 2 Peter, 1, 2, and 3 John, Jude, Revelation), and stage III of the four Gospels.

The person of Christ. The Easter event established in the first disciples the conviction that, despite Jesus' crucifixion, God had vindicated him and his message. The Christ event was indeed God's saving act. The earliest Christians expressed this conviction by ascribing to Jesus titles of majesty, such as *Messiah (Grk. christos, Eng. "Christ," which was originally a title and is not a proper name), Lord (kyrios), and *Son of God. Some of the early christological patterns suggest that Jesus was "appointed" Christ, Lord, or Son of God (Acts 2.36; Rom. 1.4; Phil. 2.9–11) at his exaltation. These patterns are often called "adoptionist," but this is misleading. The meaning is not that Jesus became something he was not before, for example, a divine person; rather, he was appointed to a new office and function, that of being the one in whom God would finally judge and save the world (Acts 3.21; 1 Thess. 1.10), and through whom he was already offering salvation after Easter in the church's proclamation (Acts 2.38). Moreover, this type of Christology does not mean that the earthly life of Jesus had no christological or salvific significance. It was not nonmessianic, for God was present and acting in the earthly Jesus (Acts 2.22). But its messianic significance was initially expressed by a different set of terms, such as the end-time prophet promised in Deuteronomy 18.15 (Acts 3.22–23; 7.37). It is notable that the emphasis of these Christologies is on the end of Jesus' career; in short, they are paschal Christologies.

Over time, the titles that were first applied to the post-Easter phase of Jesus' saving activity were pushed back into his earthly life. This was notably the case with the title *Son of God. As the story of Jesus' baptism developed in stage II, this title was featured in a heavenly voice ("You are my Son," Mark 1.11), perhaps replacing an earlier use of "servant" in this context. Later in the birth stories, the title Son of God is pushed back to the moment of Jesus' conception or birth (Luke 1.35; cf. Matt. 2.15). This does not mean that some sort of metaphysical divinity is being ascribed to Jesus. In a Jewish context, it meant that like the kings of Israel Jesus was chosen for a unique role in history. Jesus' conception through the Holy Spirit is not meant to imply any metaphysical quality; it means, rather, that Jesus was a historical person elected from the womb for his unique role through the direct intervention of God (cf. Isa. 49.5; Jer 1.4). (See Virgin Birth.)

A similar type of Christology is expressed in the so-called sending formulae. These follow a regular pattern: a verb of sending with God as the subject and the son as the object, followed by a purpose clause stating the saving intention behind the sending. The earliest occurrence of such a formula is: "God sent his Son . . . to redeem those . . ." (Gal. 4.4–5). From such formulae it will be clear that the title "son" denotes a historical person with a saving mission. Notice that, unlike the paschal type, this type of Christology focuses upon the beginning rather than the end of Jesus' career.

In Hellenistic Christianity, a new pattern began to develop in which Christ existed in heaven before his birth. Here is a Christology of preexistence and *incarnation. It is generally agreed that this pattern developed from the identification of Jesus with the *wisdom of God. In Judaism, especially in the Greek-speaking world, the notion of the wisdom of God had undergone a remarkable development. Originally it had been no more than the personification of a divine attribute (see, e.g., Prov. 8.22–31), like God's righteousness or salvation (Isa. 51.6; Ps. 85.10–11). In the later *wisdom literature, however, and in the writings of *Philo, the concept of the wisdom or Word (*logos) of God developed in the direction of hypostatization—it became the distinct personal entity within the being of God, something like a person in the sense in which that term was later used in the Christian dogma of the *Trinity (see, e.g., Wisd. of Sol. 18.14–15). Wisdom or "Word" was that aspect of the being of God which was God turned toward the world in creative, revelatory, and saving activity (see, e.g., Wisd. of Sol. 7.22–27).

The ground for this identification of Jesus with the hypostatized wisdom of God was the fact that Jesus himself had appeared as a sage or wise man and had used the speech forms of wisdom literature (see above). He thus came to be regarded not merely as a spokesperson of wisdom but as wisdom's final envoy who acted as the mouthpiece of wisdom (cf. Matt. 11.28–30 with Sir. 24.19 and 51.23–26). From there, it was but a short step to identify him in person with wisdom itself. This happened first in certain christological hymns (Phil. 2.6–11; 1 Cor. 8.6; Col. 1.15–18a; Heb. 1.3–4; John 1.1–18). In these hymns, the same grammatical subject, usually the relative pronoun "who," governs all the verbs that speak of wisdom's activity before the incarnation, of the activity of the incarnate one in history, and of the exalted one after Easter. Thus, we now have a three-step Christology: (1) wisdom's activity in creation, revelation, providence, and salvation history before Christ; (2) the career of the historical Jesus; (3) the exalted life of Jesus after Easter. Like the sending formulae, this Christology focuses upon the origin rather than the fate of Jesus.

Outside the Fourth Gospel and the Letters of *John, this preexistence-incarnation Christology is for the most part confined to hymns. It does not widely affect the christological thinking of Paul, the deutero-Pauline writings, or Hebrews outside the hymns. There are, however, a few exceptional passages where we do see the influence of this type of Christology. When Paul says that the rock that followed the Israelites in the *wilderness was Christ (1 Cor. 10.4), this implies the identification of Christ with a preexistent wisdom who was active in Israel's salvation history, especially in the *exodus. Again, when Paul says that God sent his Son in the "likeness of sinful flesh" (Rom. 8.3), the sending formula has apparently been widened to include the idea not just of historical sending but of preexistence and incarnation.

Hebrews also shows the influence of this incarnation Christology when the author applies Ps. 8.5–7 to Jesus' career in 2.6–9, and goes on to say "since, therefore, the children share flesh and blood, he himself [Christ] likewise shared the same things" (Heb. 2.14). There are signs in Hebrews that the three-step Christology is beginning to be integrated into the author's thinking.

It is in the gospel of John, however, that the preexistence-incarnation Christology was fully integrated into the thought of the evangelist. True, the Fourth Gospel does contain earlier materials reflecting the more primitive sending formula (e.g., John 12.44, a pre-Johannine saying with synoptic parallels). There are also passages in John where, like Matthew 11.28–30, Jesus is presented as the spokesperson of wisdom (e.g., John 6.35, 37). This may also have been the original sense of the great "I am" sayings, including John 8.58, which originally was intended not to be a personal utterance of Jesus but of God's wisdom speaking through Jesus. Other parts of the evangelist's stage III materials, however, present Christ as one who was personally preexistent. He came down from heaven (3.31). God sent him into the world (3.17).

He came into the world (3.19). At the Last Supper, Jesus prays that he may resume the glory that he had before the world was made (John 17.5; cf. 13.3). Thus, in the later phases of stage III, John moves beyond the idea of Christ as wisdom's spokesperson to the idea that he is the personal incarnation of the eternal wisdom of God. This doubtless affected the understanding of the earlier sending formulae and the sayings in which Jesus is the spokesperson of wisdom. He is now perceived to be the incarnation of wisdom in person. But never does John call Jesus the wisdom of God; rather, the titles that describe him as such are "son" and, in the prologue, Word (Grk. logos). The consequence is that the title Son of God, or son, which had earlier been used functionally to denote historic mission, now acquired a metaphysical sense. We may now properly speak of the divinity, or better, the deity, of Christ. In three instances the Johannine writings actually call Jesus "God" (John 1.18; 20.28; 1 John 5.20). Other instances of this in the New Testament are doubtful on textual or interpretative grounds (Rom. 9.5; Tit. 2.13). When we call Jesus God, it must be carefully nuanced: Jesus is not all that God is. He is the incarnation of that aspect of the divine being which is God going forth from himself in creative, revelatory, and saving activity. In terms of later dogma, he is the incarnation of the Second, not of the First, person of the Trinity.

We may ask what motives propelled Christian writers to such a high Christology within such a relatively short period. The God whose presence had been discerned in the Christ event was the same God they had known all along, the God who created the world, the God who was known in general human experience, and, above all, the God who was known in Israel's salvation history. The Christ event was an experience of recognition. Also *creation and *salvation were closely related. Salvation was not salvation out of the world but salvation of the world.

The work of Christ. By the work of Christ is meant the saving significance of the Christ event (soteriology). The earliest Christian preaching as recorded in Acts (chaps. 2; 3; 10) does not highlight the death of Christ, but speaks of the Christ event in its totality as God's act of salvation. These speeches do feature the death of Christ, but always in the so-called contrast scheme: the death of Christ was Israel's rejection of God's offer, and the *Resurrection was God's act of vindicating his offer (Acts 2.23–24; 3.13–15; 10.39–40). Mark's passion predictions, which in their present form belong to stage II, have the same contrast scheme. Yet these passages also state that Israel's rejection of the Messiah was in accordance with God's purpose (Acts 2.23 and the "must" of the passion predictions). It was also explicitly predicted in scripture (Acts 3.18). Thus, the way was prepared for conceiving the death of Christ not only as Israel's active refusal but also as God's act of salvation.

It was the celebration of the *Lord's Supper which appears to have provided the context for reflection on the saving significance of Christ's death. The earliest traditions that do so consist of liturgical materials. First, we have the expansion of the cup word in the Supper tradition itself (Mark 14.24; cf. Mark 10.45b). Here we get for the first time the so-called hyper-formula, which asserts that the death of Christ was for (Grk. hyper) us. Next, the hyper-formula appears in creedal or catechetical traditions (1 Cor. 15.4).

Over the course of time, more precise imagery was introduced to interpret the meaning of Christ's death. One pre-Pauline hymn compares the death of Christ and its effects with the ritual of the *Day of Atonement. We are "justified . . . through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, whom God put forward as a sacrifice of atonement by his blood. . . . He did this to show his righteousness, because in his divine forbearance he had passed over sins previously committed" (Rom. 3.24–25). "Justify" is a metaphor from the law courts referring to the judge's pronouncement of the verdict "not guilty." This is another way of saying that Christ's death conveyed the forgiveness of sins, an idea that occurs later in the hymn when it speaks of God's "passing over sins." Christ's death is then described as an act of "*redemption" (Grk. apolytrōsis). Although this word is often thought to derive from the manumission of slaves, it has a more likely background in salvation history. God redeemed Israel by bringing it out of the land of Egypt and by restoring it after the exile, and Israel continued to hope for redemption at the end. The Song of Zechariah announces the fulfillment of this hope (Luke 1.68). Redemption thus came to denote deliverance from all the ills of history in the messianic age.

Next we have the word translated "sacrifice of atonement" (Grk. hilastērion). Its precise meaning is disputed. Some translate it "propitiation," which suggests appeasing or placating an angry deity—a notion hardly compatible with biblical thought and rarely occurring in that sense in the Hebrew Bible. It requires God as its object, whereas in this hymn God is the subject: "whom God put forward." Luther translated it as "mercy seat," an item of the *Temple furniture which was sprinkled with blood on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16.14–16). But applied to Jesus the metaphor would be confused: Jesus did not cleanse himself through his own blood as the priest did with the mercy seat on the Day of Atonement. Accordingly, the rendering "expiation" is the most probable. In Israelite sacrifices, especially those of the Day of Atonement, sins were expiated, that is, they were covered over or cleansed and thus removed (Lev. 4.1–6.7; 6.24–7.1). This seems to give the best meaning in Romans 3.24–25. There is, however, an element of truth in the idea of propitiation, for it calls attention to the fact that sin is not only a defilement but a breach of the human relationship with God. As a result of Christ's saving work, this broken relationship has been restored. The last soteriological term in this hymn is the word "blood." This comes from the cup word in the supper tradition and denotes not a substance but the death of Christ as a sacrificial and saving event. Another early formula is found in Romans 4.25: Christ "was handed over to death for our trespasses and was raised for our justification."

Paul took over these earlier traditions about the saving work of Christ and developed them significantly in two directions. He speaks both of the work of Christ in itself (the objective side) and of the work of Christ in believers (the subjective side). Here we will be concerned with the former, the objective side.

The central term in Paul's soteriology is *justification. Together with its cognates, including "*righteousness" as applied to God, it occurs some forty-eight times in the undisputed letters. It is the major focus of Paul's arguments in Galatians 3–4 and in Romans 3.21–5.11. It is almost synonymous with reconciliation (Rom. 5.11). This gives it a more personal twist, for reconciliation is a metaphor derived not from the law court but from relationships between persons and between social groups. Thus, justification comes to mean not merely to pronounce not guilty but also to bring into a right relationship with God. Paul tries to explain how this happened. On the cross Christ took upon himself the curse of the *Law (Gal. 3.10–14) and endured its consequences. God made his son to be "sin" for us (2 Cor. 5.21). Christ put himself in the place of sinners, and as the sinless one he exhausted God's wrath against sin, thus making it possible for humanity to enter into a right relationship with God. The metaphor reconciliation also gives a social and cosmic dimension to justification (2 Cor. 5.19). These dimensions received further emphasis in the deutero-Pauline letters (Col. 1.20–22; Eph. 2.16).

Paul occasionally speaks of Christ's death as a *sacrifice but only in traditional formulae (in addition to Rom. 3.25–26, see 1 Cor. 5.8). He once uses the term "blood" as shorthand for Christ's death as a saving event, in the phrase "justified by his blood" (Rom. 5.9). Otherwise, in the genuine Pauline letters "blood" occurs only in connection with the Lord's Supper.

Christ's death is also regarded by Paul as a victory over the powers of *evil, another item that comes from earlier tradition (Phil. 2.10). In speaking about victory, however, Paul is careful to emphasize that the powers, though decisively defeated, await final subjugation at the end (1 Cor 15.25–27). The apostle includes among the powers of evil not only cosmic forces but existential realities like law, *sin, and *death. This victory-soteriology becomes more important in the deutero-Pauline letters (Col. 2.15; Eph. 1.21), which abandon Paul's reservation about its present incompleteness. All that remains is for everything to be united (NRSV: "gathered up") in Christ at the end (Eph. 1.10).

In itself, the term "*salvation," with its cognates "save" and "savior," is a rather colorless word in the Pauline writings. As with the other words we have studied, its background is found in the Hebrew Bible, where it is applied to the Exodus and to the restoration from exile (Exod. 15.2; Isa. 43.11; 52.10). Like similar words, it also became part of Israel's hope for the end. Paul uses this word group in an all-embracing way. Believers have been saved, though only in hope (Rom. 8.24–25); they are being saved (1 Cor. 1.18); and they will be saved at the end (Rom. 5.10). Once again, the deutero-Pauline letters abandon this reserve and insist that believers have already been saved (Eph. 2.5,8).

The only New Testament work to develop the doctrine of Christ's saving work is the letter to the *Hebrews. This letter makes an elaborate comparison between the levitical high *priests and their sacrifices, on the one hand, and Christ and his sacrifice, on the other. The author took up certain items from earlier Christian tradition. One was the comparison of Good Friday with the Day of Atonement, which we have already seen in Romans 3.24–25 (note the expression "sacrifice of atonement," Heb. 2.17). Another was the supper tradition with its language about blood and covenant (Heb. 8.6–13). Yet a third theme, that of Christ as high priest after the order of *Melchizedek, was suggested by Psalm 110, which led the author on to verse 4 (Heb. 5.6; etc.).

In developing his argument, the author of Hebrews had first to prove that Jesus was qualified to be a high priest despite his lack of levitical descent (Heb. 5.1–10). Then, in the central part of his work (7.1–10.18), he compares Jesus and his sacrifice point by point with the levitical high priests and their sacrifices, demonstrating at every point the superiority of Jesus and his self-offering. As the comparison with the Day of Atonement shows, Christ's sacrifice is not confined to his death but includes also his *ascension into heaven. For the action of the priest in taking the blood of the victim into the Holy of Holies was an essential part of the ritual, in which the slaying of the victim was only a preliminary. Thus, Christ's sacrifice was completed only when he entered into the presence of God and sat down at his right hand (Heb. 10.12). Henceforth, Christ lives to make intercession for us (Heb. 7.25).

How does the author of Hebrews understand Christ's sacrifice to be effective in taking away sin? He follows the biblical belief that *sin is a ritual defilement that can be cleansed only with the blood of a victim (Heb. 9.22). Yet he points beyond a merely cultic interpretation of this imagery when he observes that Christ's death was the offering of a perfect obedience of his human will (Heb. 10.5–10). On the strength of his perfect obedience, believers too can draw near to God's presence and offer the sacrifice of praise that leads to the obedience of a holy life (Heb. 10.19–25; 13.15).

The author of 1 *Peter takes over the earlier tradition that compared Christ's sacrifice to that of the Passover lamb (1 Pet. 1.19). In a remarkable hymnlike passage (1 Pet. 2.21–25), the author describes Christ's passion in terms of the suffering servant of Isaiah 53. Christ's sufferings are to serve as the example for Christian slaves to follow (v. 21). This treatment of the death of Christ as an example is characteristic of the moralism of the subapostolic age.

We turn now to the treatment of the death of Christ in stage III of the four Gospels. Each evangelist presents the death of Christ from his own perspective. For Mark, the death of Jesus was the occasion for the unveiling of the *messianic secret. Only at the crucifixion could he be publicly acknowledged as the Son of God (Mark 15.39). Mark was probably countering the view that overemphasized the miracles as revelations of Christ's deity. The miracles are important to Mark but only as prefigurations of the supreme act of salvation on the cross.

For Matthew, the cross was Israel's rejection of the Messiah. Because of it, God's judgment came upon the nation at the fall of Jerusalem in 70 CE (Matt. 27.25). A new nation, the Christian church, would arise in Israel's place (Matt. 21.43). Meanwhile, Matthew emphasizes the saving significance of the cross by adding to the cup word at the supper the phrase "for the forgiveness of sins" (Matt. 26.28).

For Luke, the death of Jesus at Jerusalem and his consequent assumption into heaven (Luke 9.51) constituted a major turning point in salvation history, inaugurating the new period of the church and its universal mission. This period would be covered by the book of Acts. Luke is wrestling with the problem created by the delay in Christ's *second coming. The time of the church will be marked by persecution and martyrdom, and Christ's passion is presented as an example for Christian martyrs to follow, such as Stephen in Acts 6–7.

John seems to shift his interest away from the cross to the revelation that Jesus brings in his earthly life (John 1.18). The death of Jesus seems to be no more than the occasion when he returned to the Father from whom he came (John 13.3; 16.5). But this is to underestimate the importance of Christ's death in the Fourth Gospel. The words and works of Christ are all overshadowed by the hour of the passion (John 2.4, etc.). The signs or miracles point to what Christ would finally accomplish on the cross. It is there that he brings in the new order symbolized by the changing of the water into wine (2.1–11). It is there that he makes his flesh available for the life of the world (6.51–58), that he cures the blindness of human life (9.1–41), and that he confers eternal life (11.1–44). It is also in the cross that all the claims made in the great "I am" sayings are substantiated. It is because of the cross that he is the true bread that comes down from heaven (6.33), that he is the light of the world (8.12), the door of the sheep (10.7), the good shepherd (10.14), the resurrection and the life (11.25), the way, the truth, and the life (14.6), and the true vine (15.1). Moreover, it is through the cross that the Spirit-Paraclete is released which leads the Johannine community into all truth (7.39). Thus it was the death of Christ and his glorification that made it possible for the Fourth Gospel to ascribe the "I am" sayings to Jesus.

Despite the apparent preoccupation of the author of *Revelation with the events leading up to the end and with the new heaven and the new earth that lie beyond, the cross for him plays a crucial role in salvation history. The central christological image in Revelation is the *Lamb that was slain. In the cross, the Lamb has conquered and taken his seat beside the Father on the throne of heaven (3.21). Because of that victory, the Lamb alone is qualified to open the scroll and its seven seals (5.5). In other words, his victorious death determines the future course of history. It becomes clear that the cross is the central and controlling event of the whole book. Meanwhile, Christ has "ransomed" believers "from every tribe and language and people and nation, and . . . made them to be a kingdom and priests serving our God" (Rev. 5.9–10).

Jew. The English word "Jew" is derived from Hebrew yĕhûdî (fem. yĕhûdît, "Judith"; see Gen. 26.34; also the book of Judith), meaning "Judean," by way of Greek ioudaios and Latin judaeus. The term is first used for citizens of the southern kingdom of *Judah in 2 Kings 16.6; previously, male inhabitants of the kingdom, or of the tribe of Judah from which the kingdom took its name, were referred to as 'îš yĕhûdâ, literally "man [men] of Judah" (e.g., 1 Sam. 11.8). As a consequence of the *exile of many members of the upper classes of Judah by the Babylonians in 597 and 587/586 BCE, many Jews were forcibly settled in Mesopotamia (2 Kings 24–25; Jer. 52). Others, including the prophet Jeremiah, fled to Egypt (Jer. 43). This was the beginning of the Jewish *dispersion, or Diaspora, across the globe, which continues to this day. After the exile the term Jew came to be used for all descended from or identified with this ethnic or religious group, whatever their race or nationality. Thus, in Esther 2.5, Mordecai is identified both as a Jew and as a member of the tribe of *Benjamin. The term "Jew" thus began to parallel the much more ancient designation "Israelite."

The Jews who returned from exile after 538 BCE (Ezra 2; Neh. 7.6–73) settled in the Persian province of Yehud, which eventually became the Roman province of Judea and preserved its name until it was suppressed by the Romans in reaction to Jewish revolts of 66–73 and 132–135 CE.

In the New Testament "Jew" can designate both Jesus (Mark 15.2) and many of his followers (Acts 21.39), as well as some of his adversaries (1 Thess. 2.14–16). However, the rivalry between Christianity and Judaism, coupled with the often uncomplimentary portrait of Jews in the New Testament and the similarity in sound to the name of Judas, often made the word Jew pejorative in the Christian world (see Anti-Semitism).

The question of how to define a Jew, put more simply as "who is a Jew," has engendered much discussion through the ages. Are the Jews to be understood as a social, religious, national, or ethnic community? Basically, the answer of the Jewish tradition, the halakhah, has been that one born of a Jewish mother or one converted to Judaism is a Jew. But this definition has been challenged in recent years. The murder of many of Jewish descent who, however, were not halakhically Jewish during the *Halocaust has raised questions regarding inclusion and exclusion in the Jewish community. The high court of Israel, in the Brother Daniel Rufeisen case, has ruled that an apostate from Judaism cannot apply for automatic citizenship as a Jew under the Law of Return. And in recent years the American Jewish Reform movement has attempted to redefine the term "Jew" to include, in addition to converts, anyone of Jewish descent, whether that descent be matrilineal (the halakhic position) or patrilineal (excluded by halakhah), who practices Judaism and identifies himself or herself as a Jew. A strict definition is therefore impossible to reach.

CARL S. EHRLICH

Jewelry. References to jewelry in biblical literature suggest that it served most of the functions in ancient Palestine that it has served throughout human cultural development worldwide. The aesthetic appeal of different materials, colors, and shapes with which both men and women could adorn themselves was a primary concern. In addition, jewelry was a repository of wealth or form of currency, an insignia of rank or special favor, and, perhaps most important, a focus of religious or magical sentiments.

Biblical words or phrases for various items of jewelry are often enigmatic because the terms are used infrequently and the contexts provide little information about their referents. Only by a careful appraisal of textual, archaeological, and iconographic evidence from a local Palestinian and cross-cultural perspective can the meaning and significance of a term be elucidated. Among items of jewelry clearly denoted in biblical texts are the following: anklet (Isa. 3.18); armlet (Num. 31.50; 2 Sam. 1.10; Isa. 3.20); bracelet (Gen. 24.22, 30, 47; Num. 31.50); crescent pendant (Judg. 8.21, 26; Isa. 3.10); earring (Gen. 35.4; Exod. 32.2–3; 35.22; Judg. 8.24–26; Job 42.11; Hos. 2.15); frontlet (Exod. 13.16; Deut. 6.8; 11.18); necklace (Gen. 41.42; Ezek. 16.11; Dan. 5.29); nose ring (Gen. 24.22, 30, 47; Isa. 3.21; Ezek. 16.12); ring, including signet (Gen. 28.18, 25; 41.42; Exod. 28.11, 21, 36; 35.22; 39.6, 14, 30; Num. 31.50; 1 Kings 21.8; Esther 3.10, 13; 8.2, 8, 10; Job 38.14; Isa. 3.21; Jer. 22.24; Hos. 2.15; Luke 15.22; James 2.2); pendant (Judg. 8.26; Isa. 3.19).

A number of terms are variously interpreted. The "amulets" of Isaiah 3.20 (NRSV) may be snake pendants; the word translated "headbands" in Isaiah 3.18 may mean "little suns," that is, star disc pendants (see below); and the "perfume boxes" of Isaiah 3.20 are literally "soul houses," possibly tubular containers of texts, related to the inscribed frontlet worn above the eyes and to *phylacteries (Matt. 23.5).

The star disc pendant illustrates how archaeological evidence (artifactual, iconographic, and textual) can help elucidate terms for jewelry. Numerous examples of four-rayed, six-rayed, and eight-rayed varieties of this pendant have been recovered from Late Bronze Palestinian and other Near Eastern excavations, and Assyrian kings of later Iron Age dates are depicted on reliefs wearing multistringed necklaces of such pendants. Contemporaneous textual evidence (in particular, a detailed fifteenth century BCE inventory of jewelry presented to the goddess Ningal at Qatna in Syria) identifies these pendants as "suns" in Akkadian, the four- or six-rayed variety representing the sun god (Utu/Shamash/Shapash) and the eight-rayed variety representing a female deity with an astral aspect (Inanna/Ishtar/Ningal/Astarte). Similarly, other terms of biblical jewelry can be related to specific pendant types with magical and religious significance; thus, the crescent or horns pendant is probably to be identified with a moon or war god (Yerah/Baal/Resheph in West Semitic societies). Many other pendant types from Late Bronze and Iron Age Palestinian excavations represent Egyptian hieroglyphs and deities (Bes, Horus, Ptah-Sokar, etc.), fauna (fly, frog, lion, ram, bull, cat, etc.), flora (lotus, mandrake, rosette flower, etc.), and various human and geometric forms. Some of the same motifs occur on signet rings, scarabs, and seals. Although not all are explicitly mentioned in biblical texts, the symbolic associations of the jewelry motifs imply that the ancient inhabitants of Palestine, even during the periods of the United and Divided Monarchies, wore jewelry that had amuletic and/or polytheistic significance.

The inherent contradiction of such jewelry to normative Yahwism is reflected in diatribes against the haughty "daughters of Zion" in Isaiah 3.18–23 and Ezekiel 16.15–17; in Jacob's burial of earrings and foreign gods under a tree at *Shechem (Gen. 35.4), and in Judges 8.21–27, which describes an *ephod, made by *Gideon from the rings, crescents, and other pendants of the *Midianite kings, that became a "snare." Properly employed, however, jewelry could be an item of beauty, value, and status, as exemplified by the nose and finger rings of Rebekah (Gen. 24.22, 30, 47), the signet ring and necklace of Joseph (Gen. 41.42), the armlets and crown of Saul (2 Sam. 1.10), and the signet ring presented to Mordecai by Ahasuerus (Esther 8.2, 8, 10). These items were of gold and/or semiprecious stones, which were highly valued in antiquity. Jewelry was thus an ideal symbol of Israel's relationship to Yahweh, whether as bridal or queenly apparel (Ezek. 16.10–13; Song of Sol. 1.10–11) or the high priest's breastpiece (Exod. 28.17–20; 39.10–13).

Archaeological evidence from Palestine attests to the usage and value of jewelry in a variety of contexts. Anklets, bracelets, earrings, necklaces, frontlets, and rings have been found on the wrists and ankles and near the foreheads, ears, and necks of burials. Special types often occur together on the same individual, which suggests an elevated social status. The occurrence of similar jewelry types in domestic contexts is probably due to accidental loss or to the intentional deposition of the jewelry as hoards, the latter being concentrated in larger buildings. Deposits of jewelry under floors and walls of cultic structures are also common; the jewelry might have adorned a cult statue or represented votive or foundation offerings or taxes. While gold and other precious metals (silver and electrum) are not as prevalent as suggested by some biblical texts (e.g., 2 Chron. 3.3–10), they are well represented in the archaeological record, along with copper/bronze, silicate materials (glass, faience, and frit), bone, shell, and common and semiprecious stones (principally quartz varieties, such as carnelian, agate, and amethyst). Except for precious metals, most of the materials were locally available, and workshops existed throughout the country for fabricating jewelry. PATRICK E. MCGOVERN

Jezebel. Princess of Tyre who married *Ahab, king of Israel (mid ninth century BCE). Jezebel was the daughter of Ethbaal, king of Tyre ("Sidonians" in 1 Kings 16.31 is a biblical term for *Phoenicians in general); according to genealogies given in *Josephus and other classical sources, this would make her the great-aunt of Dido, the founder of Carthage. Jezebel was an ardent worshiper of *Baal and *Asherah who supported their worship from the throne in Israel (1 Kings 16.31–33; 18.4, 19; 19.1–2); her name is best understood as meaning "Where is the Prince?", the cry of Baal's divine and human subjects when he is in the underworld. Jezebel exercised royal prerogatives to acquire Naboth's vineyard for her husband (1 Kings 21) by plotting to have Naboth executed. This incident prompted *Elijah to predict that dogs would eat Jezebel's corpse in Jezreel (1 Kings 21.23; see 2 Kings 9.30–37). *Jehu, the commander of King Joram's army in Israel, was anointed king in Ramoth-gilead in order to destroy Ahab's house because of what Jezebel had done to the prophets and the faithful of Yahweh (2 Kings 9.1–10). When Jehu met King Joram, son of Ahab and Jezebel, to kill him, he remarked that there could be no peace in Israel while the "whoredoms [= apostasy] and sorceries" of Jezebel continued. After killing Joram of Israel and King Ahaziah of Judah (Ahab and Jezebel's grandson), he went to Jezreel to kill Jezebel. Adorned like a queen, she appeared to him in a window, regally defiant in the face of his violence. She was thrown out of the window by her own attendants, who sided with Jehu, and was trampled to death.

Jezebel's sons and daughter also ruled. Ahaziah was king of Israel for two years after Ahab died and Joram succeeded him (1 Kings 22.51–53; 2 Kings 1.17–18; 3.1–3; 10.12–14). Jezebel and Ahab's daughter Athaliah married Jehoram of Judah, and was the mother of Ahaziah, king of Judah (2 Kings 8.25–27). When her son was killed by Jehu (9.14–28), Athaliah set out to kill all his heirs, and she herself ruled for six years (11.1–20).

Jezebel later becomes an insulting epithet for a woman, and is used in Revelation 2.20 of a prophet in Thyatira of whose teaching and practice the author disapproves.

Job, the Book of. The book of Job is the most consistently theological work in the Hebrew Bible, being nothing but an extended discussion of one theological issue, the question of suffering. Its chief literary feature is that it does not expound or defend a dogma from one point of view, but portrays a debate in which conflicting points of view are put forward, none of them being unambiguously presented as preferable. This makes it perhaps the most intellectually demanding book of the Hebrew Bible, requiring of its readers a mental flexibility and even a willingness, in the end, to be left with no unequivocal message.

It is not only a work of intellectual vigor, though; it is also a literary masterpiece that belongs with the classics of world literature, with the Iliad, the Divine Comedy, and Paradise Lost. In design it has both the form of an unsophisticated prose narrative, which nonetheless contains intriguing surprises, and that of a series of subtle speeches in poetry of great delicacy and power. The interplay between prose and poetry, between naïveté and rhetorical finesse, mirrors the interplay among the six participants in the book: Job, the four friends, God—and the narrator.

Structure. The book can be most easily analyzed as narrative framework surrounding poetic core:

1.1–2.13	Framework	prose: narrative
3.1–42.6	Core	poetry: argument
42.7–17	Framework	prose: narrative

Another way of reading the shape of the book follows the indications given by the book itself about the speakers. The whole book may be seen as speech, the narrator speaking in prologue and epilogue, and the characters in the dialogue—the three cycles of conversation between Job and the first three friends, the speeches of Elihu the interloper, and the exchanges between God and Job:

Narrator

This analysis shows, first, that the narrator's words enclose those of all the characters, which has the effect of predisposing the reader to understand how all the speakers in the dialogue are to be understood, and at the end leaving the narrator's perspective uppermost in the reader's mind. Second, it is Job who for the most part initiates conversation; he speaks, and the friends reply to him. But when Yahweh speaks, it is he and not Job who takes the initiative; though Job has summoned Yahweh to speak, Yahweh's speeches are less a reply than a new approach. Third, all the speaking moves toward silence; Job, who has done most of the talking, in the end lays his hand on his mouth (40.4–5); the friends run out of words and do not even finish the third cycle of speeches. Does the book perhaps imply that the real resolution to the problem of suffering comes not at all through talking but only when Yahweh too stops speaking and actually restores Job's fortunes (42.10)?

Argument. Although it is generally agreed that the chief issue of the book is the problem of *suffering, we need to be clear on just what that problem is.

Sometimes it is thought that the question is why is there suffering, what is its origins and cause, or why has this suffering happened to a specific person? To these serious questions the book of Job gives no satisfactory answer. It does indeed say that suffering is sometimes punishment for sins, sometimes a warning against committing sin in the future, and sometimes, as in Job's case, for no earthly reason at all, but for some inscrutable divine reason. In the end, though, readers cannot learn from the book any one clear view about what the reason for any particular suffering, or for human suffering in general, may be.

A second problem about suffering is whether there is such a thing as innocent suffering. Against cut-and-dried theologies of retribution, the book of Job, without of course denying the possibility that sometimes suffering is richly deserved by the sufferer, denies that such is always the case. Job is an innocent sufferer, whose innocence is not only asserted by himself (6.30; 9.15) but is attested to by the narrator (1.1) and above all by God (1.8; 2.3; 42.7–8).

There is a third, and more important, problem about suffering that the book does address, however indirectly. It is more existential: In what way am I supposed to suffer, or what am I to do when I am suffering? Two different but complementary answers are given. First, in the opening two chapters, Job's reaction to the disasters that come upon him is a calm acceptance of the will of God; he can bless God not only for what he has given but also for what he has taken away (1.21; 2.10). The patient Job is thus a model for sufferers. But second, Job does not remain in that attitude of acceptance. Once we move into his poetic speeches, from chap. 3 onward, we encounter a mind in turmoil, a sense of bitterness and anger, of isolation from God and even persecution by God. Job makes no attempt to suppress his hostility toward God for what has happened to him; he insists that he will "speak in the anguish of [his] spirit" and "complain in the bitterness of [his] soul" (7.11). What makes this protesting Job a model for other sufferers is that he directs himself constantly toward God, whom he regards as responsible, both immediately and ultimately, for his suffering. It is only (we may suppose) because Job insists on response from God that God enters into dialogue with Job. Even though Job's intellectual questions about the injustice of his suffering are never adequately answered, he himself is in the end satisfied, as a sufferer, by his encounter with God.

Origins. The composition of the book of Job can be dated to some point between the seventh and the second centuries BCE, but hardly more precisely than that. Quite probably there was a much older tale of an innocent sufferer, and the general theme is found also in *Jeremiah and in the poems of the Suffering Servant of the Lord in Second *Isaiah, both of these prophetic texts stemming from the sixth century. Perhaps the inexplicable suffering of Job was intended to symbolize the suffering of the Jews in Babylonian *exile in that century.

The earliest reference to Job outside the book is found in Ezekiel 14.14, 20, where Job is mentioned along with *Noah and Danel (probably not Daniel; see Daniel, The Book of) as an ancient hero. But this sixth-century reference may well be not to the book of Job but to the more ancient folktale, so no inference about the date of the book can be drawn.

There can be little doubt that the author of the book was an Israelite. Job's homeland is depicted as north *Arabia or possibly *Edom, and in most of the book Job himself does not know God by the Israelite name Yahweh (see Names of God in the Hebrew Bible). Nor does the book refer to any of the distinctive historical traditions of ancient Israel. But these facts only mean that the author has succeeded well in disguising his own age and background in his creation of the character of his hero, who is intended to have universal significance.

In the history of scholarship on the book, several critical questions have commonly attracted attention. One is whether the prose framework of the book (the prologue and epilogue) once existed as an independent story before the poem (3.1–42.6) was composed. The tendency now is to assume that although there was a prose story of Job older than the present book, the prologue and epilogue that we have now were written for their place in the book, since the prose framework by itself does not tell a completely coherent story. The other major question is whether the present allocation of speeches in the third cycle (chaps. 21–31) is the one intended by the author—for it seems strange that there is no third speech of Zophar, that the third speech of Bildad is so short that Job is credited with three speeches in a row, and that some of what Job says seems more suitable in the mouth of one of the friends. Most scholars therefore suspect that there has been some error in the manuscripts of Job, and that, for example, 26.5–14 was originally part of Bildad's speech and 27.13–28.28 was originally Zophar's third speech. A third question often raised is whether the speeches of the fourth friend Elihu (chaps. 32–37) were originally part of the book, since Elihu (unlike the other friends) is not referred to in either the prologue or the epilogue. But it is not possible to settle this question, and in any case these speeches need to be treated as a significant part of the present book whether or not they were contained in the original book.

Job among the *Wisdom Literature. The book of *Proverbs affirms that wisdom—which means the knowledge of how to live rightly—leads to life, while folly leads to death (e.g., Prov 1.32; 3.1–2, 13–18; 8.36). Everywhere the principle of retribution is asserted or taken for granted: that righteousness is rewarded and sin is punished (e.g., Prov. 11.5–6). And the world of humans is divided into two groups: the blessed righteous, or wise, and the unhappy wicked, or foolish.

*Ecclesiastes, while not disparaging the quest for wisdom, asks, What happens to one's wisdom at death? Since death cancels out all values, not excepting wisdom, life cannot be meaningful if it is made to consist of gaining something that will inevitably be lost.

As for Job, from the viewpoint of the book of Proverbs, he is an impossibility. If he is truly righteous, he finds life, and wealth, and health. If he is in pain, he is one of the wicked and the foolish. In the end, of course, the book of Job does not completely undermine the principle of retribution, for Job ends up pious and prosperous; but once the principle is successfully challenged, as it is in the book of Job, even in a single case, its moral force is desperately weakened. For once the case of Job becomes known, if a person who has a reputation for right living is found to be suffering (the fate Proverbs predicts for wrongdoers), no one can point a finger of criticism; the book of Job has established that the proper criterion for determining whether people are pious or not is the moral quality of their life and not the accidental circumstances of their material existence. Joel, The Book of. In both the Hebrew and the Greek canons of the Bible, the book of Joel appears in proximity to that of the eighth-century BCE prophet *Amos, a circumstance that is easily explained by the close correspondence between Joel 3.16–18 and Amos 1.2; 9.13. There can hardly be any doubt that this correspondence is the result of the dependence of the text of Joel on that of Amos; from internal evidence it seems clear that the book of Joel is the work of a late postexilic prophet who was indebted for his images and metaphors to the much older prophetic traditions to which he laid claim and in which he presumed to participate.

The Author and His Times. We know nothing about the person of Joel (whose name means "Yahweh is God") other than that he is identified as the son of an equally unknown Pethuel. All the knowledge that we can derive about him and his times comes from the examination of his prophecy. He is, on the one hand, much concerned with the proprieties of the Temple worship (1.9, 13–14; 2.14–16; etc.), a trait that connects him very closely with the anonymous prophet *Malachi, who was possibly one of the very last to appear in the Judahite prophetic tradition. This trait, however, was by no means characteristic of preexilic prophecy of either Israel or Judah. Joel presupposes, therefore, the existence of a Temple—presumably the Second Temple of *Zerubbabel, which came to be in the aftermath of the initial return from exile following the liberating decree of *Cyrus the Persian after his defeat of the Babylonian empire in 539 BCE (Ezra 1.1–4). Furthermore, contrary to the picture drawn in the preexilic *Deuteronomic history of Israel and Judah, so much concerned with kings and politics, and even contrary to that of the Chronicler's depiction of the period of Ezra and Nehemiah (ca. 458–443 BCE), when Judah and Jerusalem, still under the domination of the Persian empire, were regaining a relative political autonomy with a secular (although concomitantly religious) leadership of native governors (like Nehemiah), Joel's text seems to presuppose a polity not unlike that presupposed by *Sirach (Sir. 50.1–24) or the book of *Judith, where it is taken for granted that the political leadership of the Jews has, by default, devolved upon the high priesthood. Since there is no hint of a disruption in Joel of this peaceful coexistence between religion and alien domination, we are probably not far off the mark when we assign this work to the latter stage of the Persian period of Palestine, which was disrupted only by the conquests of *Alexander the Great beginning in 333 BCE. These considerations would date Joel about 400 BCE.

Outline. The book of Joel consists of two sharply distinguished parts. There is, first of all, the graphic and highly descriptive depiction of a locust plague and a drought (the Hebrew vocabulary for "locusts" is virtually exhausted in 1.4) that descends on Judah and Jerusalem, demanding of everyone, class by class, profession by profession, repentance and prayer as the price of the Lord's continual toleration of a recalcitrant people (1.2–2.27). In the second part (2.28–3.21 [3.1–4.21 in the Hebrew Bible]), the *Day of the Lord is announced in *apocalyptic language. There is a series of salvation prophecies: Judah and Jerusalem will be restored, Israel will triumph over her enemies, and the gentiles will be requited for their misdeeds.

Interpretation. Is Joel a prophet of judgment (against Israel) or of salvation (of Israel in the face of its gentile enemies)? It is really difficult to say. Was the locust plague of the first verses an attempt to describe a real happening, as in Amos 7.1–3, or is it merely a literary device borrowed from the text of a prophetic predecessor? Is this plague a cloak for physical invasion of Israel or simply a symbol of national disintegration? Is the lifting of the plague potential or real? How much and to what extent is the repeated "Day of the Lord" intended to apply to Israel's future destiny and its relation to the gentile world? And by no means let us forget the outpouring of the spirit foretold by this prophet (2.28–32a) and the fulfillment that was discerned by New Testament writers seeking religious continuity (Acts 2.16–19). Whether Joel is to be considered a "cult" or "nationalist" prophet, a prophet of "judgment" or of "salvation," are questions that truly indicate that we have not yet fully comprehended the phenomenon of Israelite prophecy.

BRUCE VAWTER, C.M.

John the Baptist. If John was born of priestly parentage (Luke 1.5), he must have abandoned the priesthood and taken up an ascetic mode of life in the Judean *wilderness, where he subsisted on locusts and wild honey (Mark 1.6). Those who came out to him encountered a man dressed in camel-hair homespun with a leather belt around his waist, the explicit garb of a prophet (2 Kings 1.8; Zech. 13.4). With prophetic zeal he preached a new message and offered a new rite. The message was that lineal descent from *Abraham would not guarantee salvation. Abraham's merits would not suffice, but only an act of repentance that included the renunciation of all presumptions based on election or ethnicity (Matt. 3.9). The God that had called Israel out of Egypt and led it across the *Jordan River was now creating a new people by passing them through the waters of *baptism in that same river. The twelve stones that had been set up to mark Israel's crossing of the parted Jordan (Josh. 4) would themselves be raised up into twelve new tribes if the people of Israel would not repent. John was not founding a new religion but attacking the use of all religiousness as a defense against the demand of God for authenticity and justice.

This message of radical repentance was enacted in a rite of immersion in which the sin of presumption and the whole of one's old life were washed away. Those who rose out of the waters were as newborn infants (John 3.3–8), or as those who had passed from death to life, having been buried and raised from the dead (Rom. 6.1–11). These later Christian interpretations seem to have carried forward at least Jesus' own understanding of what John was about, for he spoke of his own baptism not as an event in the past but as a metaphor for his own approaching death (Mark 10.38–39; Luke 12.50).

John himself may have shared the idea, common in that period, that the last judgment would be enacted by a river of fire through which everyone would have to walk. In anticipation of that imminent judgment, John was inviting one and all to submit to God's judgment now, and by undergoing baptism to cleanse themselves of sin now, in advance of that terrible day. Those who had surrendered themselves to this washing would be preserved through the coming tribulation. They would be wheat gathered into God's granary, while the rest would be chaff burned in unquenchable fire (Matt. 3.12 par.).

John's message fell on Israel like fire on stubble. The Gospels report that "all" went out to hear him (Mark 1.5; Matt. 3.5; Mark 11.32 par.; Luke 7.29; Acts 13.24), and *Josephus comments that he was highly regarded by the whole Jewish people (Ant. 18.5.116–119). The crowds that attended him included tax collectors and prostitutes (Matt. 21.32; Luke 3.12; 7.29). This simple act of immersion, unlike circumcision, made salvation accessible even to women. It was John, not Jesus, who opened a way to God for those who before had felt themselves excluded. And by his dress and diet, even by the metaphors he chose (a tree cutter, a thresher), John identified himself, and the one whom he awaited, with the lowly.

Judaism had never encountered anything quite like this, yet virtually everything recorded of John had parallels in *Isaiah. These parallels include the following: an eschatological outpouring of the Holy Spirit (Isa. 32.15; Mark 1.8 par.) associated with the wilderness (Isa. 35.1–10; 40.3; 41.18–19; 43.19–20; Mark 1.3, 8, 10 par.); a spirit-endowed one to come who will act as judge (Isa. 11.2–5; 42.1–4; 61.1; Mark 1.7–8 par.); Israelites as children of Abraham (Isa. 29.22; 41.8; 51.2; 63.16; Matt. 3.9 par.); unfaithful Israel portrayed as a brood of vipers (Isa. 59.5; 1.4; Matt. 3.7 par.) or as trees that God will hew down with an axe (Isa. 6.13; 10.15–19, 33–34; 14.8; Matt. 3.10 par.); wind/breath/spirit (Hebr. rûaḥ), and fire compared to a river in which one is immersed (Isa. 30.27–28, 33; 43.2; Matt. 3.12 par.); Israel as the threshed and winnowed one (Isa. 21.10; Matt. 3.12 par.); Israel washed clean (Isa. 1.16; 4.4; 52.11; Mark 1.4 par.); and works of righteousness mandated subsequent to washing (Isa. 1.16–17; Matt. 3.8 par.; Luke 3.10–14).

Despite such extensive parallels, John burst on the scene as a virtual mutant, for his rite of baptism, though outwardly similar to Temple lustrations, was wholly without precedent in its meaning. Nowhere in any Jewish source is rebirth made a metaphor for redemption. One is born a Jew. Proselytes might be "reborn" as Jews, but proselyte baptism was not practiced in the first century CE, applied only to non-Jews, lacked an eschatological setting, and did not require running water. John's rite was so unique that he was named by it ("the Baptizer"), and Jesus clearly regards it as given to John by revelation from God (Mark 11.27–33). It circumvented the Temple and its rites; perhaps John's rejection of the priesthood is related to widespread revulsion against the corruption of the Temple and its priesthood in the first century CE.

John's presence in the wilderness has suggested to some that he might have at one time belonged to the community at *Qumran, possibly even being raised by them as an orphan (Luke 1.80; his parents were elderly at his birth [Luke 1.7]). Both John and the settlers at Qumran glowed with eschatological fervor, expecting an imminent judgment and preparing for it in the wilderness. Both called on all Israel to repent, denying that mere Jewishness could save. Both used washings, broke with the Temple cultus, taught prayer and fasting, and focused on Isaiah as their guide to the future. But these qualities seem to have been shared by other sectarians who had located in the wilderness. The Jerusalem *Talmud indicates that twenty-four such distinct sects had come into existence by 70 CE (Sanh. 29c). And much of what John and Qumran held in common derives from Isaiah.

In key respects, moreover, John was quite different from the community at Qumran. They wore white linen; he dressed like the poor, in homespun. His disciples did not settle a community but wandered about with him. John required no three-year period of probation but accepted whoever came, and they returned home rather than remaining with him in the wilderness. He was prophetic, public, missionary, inclusive; Qumran was exclusive, secretive, and withdrawn. His opening of salvation to prostitutes, tax collectors, and sinners must have scandalized that sacerdotal sect. Qumran's ethic applied only to its own community; John's was addressed to the entire nation, even the king (Mark 6.18). He called not for the communal sharing of goods but for sharing with the wretched who had nothing (Luke 3.11). Instead of demanding that his hearers abandon lives of moral ambiguity and move to the desert, John offered an ideal attainable in society by people unable to abandon everything (Luke 3.12–14). John's baptism, unlike Qumran's washings, was not daily, but once for all, and was not intended to achieve levitical purity, but to secure the forgiveness of sins in anticipation of the coming day of wrath. Even their common use of Isaiah 40.3 was different. Qumran interpreted it to mean that the preparation for the Lord's way was to be done in the wilderness by moving there and studying scripture. John seems to have understood the wilderness only as the place where the voice cries out. And Qumran expected a prophet, a messiah of Aaron, and a messiah of Israel; John expected only a coming judge different from all three.

The evangelists each employ the traditions about John in the service of the proclamation of Jesus. Each handles him differently, but all see him as the one who stands at the beginning of the gospel story, demanding of the hearer a beginner's mind and the jettisoning of all previous securities, so that a new word can be heard.

WALTER WINK

John, The Gospel According to.

Structure and Content. The story of *Jesus in John's gospel is presented as a drama, consisting of a prologue, two main acts, and an epilogue. By considering the gospel in this light, its distinctive character may be understood and its teaching illuminated.

The prologue (chap. 1 as a whole) introduces the main theological themes developed in the body of the gospel, such as "life," "light," and "glory." It also includes the leading characters who are to be involved in the main action. *John the Baptist is there, and so are the disciples who will form the nucleus of the early Christian community: *Andrew and *Peter, *Philip and Nathanael. But the stage is dominated by the central character of Jesus himself, whose identity begins already to be disclosed, for in this single chapter he is described as *Word, Son, Christ (*Messiah), *Son of God, King of Israel, and *Son of man. The climax of the prologue is reached in 1.51 ("you will see heaven opened, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man"). Jesus, as the incarnate and exalted Son of man and Son of God, joins earth and heaven decisively together and makes it possible, even in this world, for every believer to share the life of eternity.

Act I (chaps. 2–12) describes the revelation of the Word of God to the world. For those with eyes to see, Jesus during his ministry reveals through his words and actions the glory of God the Father. To demonstrate this truth, John makes his own selection from the miracles, or "signs," that Jesus performed and narrates six of them dramatically. To these six signs are attached explanatory discourses, all of which deal with the leading theme of "life" through Christ, and several memorable "I am" sayings, which act as a text for each sermon. These may be set out as shown in the table on the next page.

Act 2 of John's drama (chaps. 13–20) deals with the glorification of God's Word for the world. At its heart is the story of the passion and resurrection of Jesus, prepared for by the farewell address to the disciples (John 14–17), a discourse that deals with the life of the believer.

The drama ends with an epilogue, chap. 21, which may have been written later but is now firmly related to the body of the gospel. This final section narrates the seventh sign, the catch of 153 fish, and the recalling of Peter. Together these incidents point to the unlimited scope of the Christian good news, an idea retained throughout John's gospel, and provide an agenda for the church of the future. The mission of the disciples to the world can now begin on the basis of the revelation and glorification of the messianic Word of God.

Throughout his dramatic portrayal of the ministry, death, and exaltation of Jesus, John is anxious that readers should "see" the identity of the central character as Christ and Son of God (20.29–31) and "hear" his words. Verbs of seeing and hearing are important in John and are close in meaning to the activity of believing. As in a courtroom, witnesses are called throughout the drama to bear testimony to the life-giving Christ; and the sources of this evidence are divine (the Father, 5.37; the Spirit, 15.26; the scriptures, 5.39) as well as human (John the Baptist, 1.29–36; the Samaritan woman, 4.29, 39–42; the blind man, 9.35–38; Martha, 11.27; and, supremely, Thomas, 20.28).

John thus moves beyond the witness of the other gospel writers in exploring the nature of Jesus in relation to God and humanity, and the grounds for Christian belief and for the spiritual life that is its consequence. Jesus, in John's portrait, is both one with the Father (10.30) and one with his church on earth (16.28).

Origin. Since roughly the middle of the twentieth century support has been growing for the view that the basic tradition underlying John's gospel may be historically more reliable than previously acknowledged. After the rise of biblical criticism in the middle of the nineteenth century, scholarly opinion tended to regard this gospel as a theological rewriting of the others. The author knew Mark, Matthew, and Luke, it was thought, but went his own way when he wished to interpret their meaning. But that conclusion and the assumption that John knew and used the other Gospels in their finished form have now been seriously questioned. It is now thought possible that John drew more or less independently on common Christian sources about the life and teaching of Jesus.

This view may be supported in three ways. First, a straight literary comparison among the four Gospels reveals that, when material in John also appears in the other Gospels (such as the feeding of the five thousand [John 6; Mark 6 par.] and the anointing at Bethany [John 12; Mark 14 par.]), John preserves interesting points of circumstantial detail that appear to be historical rather than theological. Second, the evidence from the *Dead Sea Scrolls has shown that before the common era a literary setting existed in which Jewish and Greek religious ideas were combined in a manner that was once thought to be unique to John and of a late, second century CE, date. The scrolls now make it clear that John may well have derived from *Qumran itself his language of "truth," "knowledge," "wisdom," and "faith," as well as his theological conviction that life is a struggle between truth and perversity, the sons of light and the sons of darkness, good and evil, in which God will ultimately prevail. Third, archaeological discoveries in and around Jerusalem have indicated that, when John uses place-names hitherto unknown (such as Bethesda [John 5.2] and Gabbatha [19.13]), he was not being inventive but referring to sites now identifiable. In this case the stories associated with such sites need not be theological creations either and may well rest on an underlying historical tradition.

Composition. We have already noted that John's gospel is a literary unit, which may be analyzed in terms of its dramatic structure. But, despite the unity of the gospel as we now have it, there are some features that suggest it was composed in edited stages.

For example, there are differences of style and language in various parts of the gospel, especially chaps. 1 and 21. Second, some of the discourses contain material that seems to be largely repeated (as in 6.35–50 and 50–58; chaps. 14 and 16). Third, there are notorious breaks in sequence at a number of points in the gospel. Thus the first two signs performed by Jesus are numbered "first" and "second" (2.11; 4.54), yet in 2.23 we hear of other signs that he did, and the sequence is thus unaccountably interrupted. The geographical locations, also, do not appear to be consistently exact. So in 3.22 we read that Jesus went into Judea, whereas according to 2.23 he was already there; and in 6.1 it is implied that Jesus is in Galilee, although at the end of chap. 5 he is in Jerusalem. Similarly, there is a clear break between the setting of chaps. 20 (Jerusalem) and 21 (Galilee/Tiberias). Furthermore, the continuation of the farewell discourse in John 15–16 (17) is awkward after the command of Jesus at 14.31 ("Rise, let us be on our way").

It is possible to account for some but not all of these variations, repetitions, and breaks in continuity; the problem is thus to explain their presence in what now appears to be a carefully constructed literary whole. Some scholars have suggested that there is no problem, inasmuch as the author himself chose to write in this way. Others believe that displacements in John's material have occurred at the manuscript stage, for example, that chaps. 5 and 6 became reversed, resulting in the odd geographical sequence in John 4–7.

None of the proposed restorations, however, takes the problem seriously or resolves it adequately. A third (and more plausible) explanation suggests that behind the composition of the gospel lie a number of different sources, recording the signs, the teaching, and the passion of Jesus, that have been combined and edited at various stages in the writing of this document, until its final publication as a unified work. What follows is a suggested description of those stages.

First, John the apostle, who was traditionally identified as the "beloved disciple," transmitted orally to his followers an account of the deeds (especially the miracles, or "signs") and sayings of Jesus and of his death and resurrection. As we have already seen, these reminiscences preserved historical information about the ministry of Jesus in both Judea and Galilee.

Second, the beloved disciple and his circle of followers moved to *Ephesus (a city associated, by strong tradition, with John), where the nucleus of the Johannine church was established. While there, John's disciples committed to writing the traditions preserved in their community for the purposes of worship and instruction. In this first draft of the final gospel what may now be recognized as distinctively Johannine thought emerged, as the ideas handed on by the apostle were dramatically treated and theologically developed by the fourth evangelist and his colleagues.

Third, after the death of John his church at Ephesus published a final edited version of the gospel. This included a summary introduction (1.1–18), based on a community hymn and now tied securely to the remainder of the chapter, some editing of the discourses, possibly the addition of the prayer of consecration in chap. 17, and an epilogue (chap. 21). The whole gospel thus assembled then carried an authenticating postscript (21.24–25).

If some such process were involved in the making of John's gospel, it explains many of the features in its composition already discussed. Thus, it accounts for the likelihood that more than one author was responsible for the writing of the gospel, at more than one stage; and also for the fact that at first the Fourth Gospel was not ascribed to John the son of Zebedee. If the witness of the beloved disciple lies behind this gospel (as the text suggests; see 19.35; 21.24) but others from his community actually wrote it, the work may be regarded as apostolic in character, even though it did not in the end come (as some would argue) from the hand of John the apostle himself.

Date. We have seen that there is good reason to regard the sources that were used in the final composition of John's gospel as early and historically reliable. But even if the Johannine tradition may be dated to the early first century CE, this still leaves open the question of the date of the gospel's publication in its final form.

An upper limit may set at 150 CE or a little earlier. Two manuscripts, written on papyrus and discovered in Egypt, are relevant to dating the gospel. One, known as the Rylands Papyrus, contains a few verses of John 18 and may be dated to 135–150 CE. A second papyrus (Egerton 2) includes part of an unknown gospel that probably used John as well as Mark, Matthew, and Luke; this manuscript dates from ca. 150 CE. The existence of these witnesses suggests that John's gospel must have been written at the very latest by the beginning of the second century CE, and probably earlier.

There are no other conclusive external grounds for an earlier date and no firm evidence that any writers before ca. 150 CE knew the gospel. We must therefore look to the contents of the gospel itself to see whether they can help us—although, here again, it is difficult to establish definite conclusions.

One important clue is provided by the reference in 9.22 and 16.2 (cf. 12.42) to the possibility of Jews who confessed Christ being "put out of the synagogue." This may be an allusion to the Test Benediction that was introduced by Rabbi Gamaliel II (ca. 85–90 CE) as a means of excluding Nazarenes and other "heretics" from Jewish worship. If so, a date in this period (ca. 85 CE) may be assigned to the gospel. Such a date is also suggested by the fact that John's theology presumably took some time to develop. It is deeper and more sophisticated than that of the other evangelists, whose texts probably emerged earlier than 85 CE.

Purpose. Various motives have been suggested for the composition of John's gospel. For example, it has been argued that John's intention was to supplement or interpret the other gospels, to restate the Christian good news in Greek terms, to issue a polemical attack on the sect of John the Baptist, to adjust the sacramental teaching prevalent in the early church, to correct understanding about the return of Jesus, and to counter gnostically inclined theology.

John himself gives us (20.30–31) a reason for writing his gospel. He wants his readers to see and to hear who Jesus is: that he is the Christ and the Son of God. But this does not give us a complete picture. Who were these readers? It is unlikely that they were Jews, since by 85 CE the mission to Israel was over. It is possible that John was addressing Jewish Christians in the *Dispersion, torn between loyalty to Judaism and their new-found faith in Jesus and increasingly pressurized by the recently introduced Test Benediction (see above). This would account for the stress in this gospel on the fulfillment of Judaism. But, once again, such an interpretation of John does not take full account of his message about Jesus; nor does it relate the Fourth Gospel directly to a living church situation, in line with current thinking about John.

Let us suppose that John was addressing the needs of his own community and see whether this will provide a reason for the dramatically shaped version of the Jesus story that he preserves in his gospel. It could be that this community of Christians, gathered initially around the beloved disciple, included believers from different backgrounds, both Jewish and gentile. Some held a balanced view of Jesus: that he was both one with God and fully human. But some from a Jewish background, who still felt a loyalty to their heritage, regarded Jesus as human rather than divine. This would have been all the more likely if, after 70 CE, they were under pressure from their compatriots in the Dispersion and were tempted to return to Judaism by denying the messiahship of Jesus, as "the Jews" do throughout this gospel. On the other hand, those in the circle from a Greek background, including possibly some Hellenistic Jewish Christians, could have thought of Jesus as divine rather than human. This would be understandable if the "divine man" tradition of their original religious environment exercised influence on the Johannine church.

These two groups, it may be presumed, had begun to perceive the real identity of Jesus, but neither had seen that his nature, both human and divine, made it possible for him to be the savior of the world. Friction may have resulted; in this case John's emphasis on mutual love (15.12) and unity within the church (17.11, 21–23) would have been entirely in place.

We can find this story anticipated in the book of *Revelation and concluded in the *Johannine letters. Evidently the appeal of the fourth evangelist did little to ease the tensions that had beset his community. But his balanced estimate of the person of Jesus was exactly suited to the needs of his own adherents, and it has provided Christians ever since with important guidelines for assessing and maintaining a crucial part of their faith.

Teaching. John's theology is a theology of life. He bears testimony not only to Jesus, but also to the possibility of life through him (1.4). The repeated symbol of light makes the same point. The life that he mediates to every believer, on the basis of his revelation to the world and his glorification for the world, is the divine life that ultimately belongs to the Father himself (5.26).

Moreover, John's gospel speaks of life through Jesus in all its fullness. The seven signs make clear that Jesus is concerned about the physical dimension of human existence as well as its spiritual possibilities. And since the Word became flesh (1.14), as the signs again illustrate, all matter (not only water, bread, and wine) can point to and convey the abundant life of the life-giver (10.10). Such is John's particular "sacramentalism."

This eternal life is available to the faithful now. John's theology of salvation includes a future tense; so, for example, Jesus promises his disciples that he will eventually "come again" for them (14.3). But his emphasis is on the blessings of eternity that can be shared by the Christian in the present, when the judgment as well as the life of God are disclosed (3.16–18).

This understanding of salvation is determined by John's concept of sin. For writers of the other Gospels sin is essentially personal and communal wrongdoing: it is disobedience to God's law. Its consequence, as throughout the Hebrew Bible, is a breakdown of the *covenant between creator and creature. Such a covenant relationship can be restored only by the sacrifice on the cross, echoed in the subsequent self-offering of obedience in the lives of the disciples (Mark 10.45; Matthew 7.21; Luke 9.23).

For the fourth evangelist sin is not, as in the other Gospels and in Paul, primarily ethical. It stems from a cosmic state of alienation from God, from a spiritual blindness, or darkness, or deadness (John 3.19; 12.35). This situation can be remedied only by restored sight (9.39) and a conscious return to the light through identification with, and incorporation into, the life of the Son who unites the dimensions of heaven and earth (12.46; 15.4). So in John's gospel the passion and crucifixion of Jesus are not seen as a sacrificial explanation for the forgiveness of sin but as glorification: the exultant transformation scene in a spiritual drama of revelation. In Johannine terminology, references to Jesus as the "*Lamb of God" (1.29, 36; see Rev. 13.8) are correspondingly cosmic in character. In John's view, the cross is a timeless manifestation, mediated through a historical event: "I, when I am lifted up from the earth, will draw all people to myself" (John 12.32).

Those who are thus "drawn" to the glorified Christ are indwelt by the Spirit–Paraclete (14.16–17) and receive new life from the vine; and this not only sustains believers individually but also unites them with every other "branch" in the Christian community (15.1–5). At this point, ethical sinfulness can be eradicated by effecting the "new commandment" of love (13.34–35). The time of eternal life in Christ has yet to come; but through him, and decisively, it has arrived already. STEPHEN S. SMALLEY

John, The Letters of.

Situation. The three letters in the New Testament that bear the name of John form a composite unit. Although each possesses individual features, all have common characteristics of style, language, and thought and appear to belong to the same situation.

1 John, in contrast to 2 and 3 John, does not at first look like a personal letter. But it was evidently addressed to a particular church situation, in which problems of belief and behavior were being encountered. Indeed, a crisis had arisen, precipitated by some members of the Johannine circle who were spreading false teaching and encouraging secession from the community. As a result, dissident groups had already been established (1 John 2.19). In the face of division, John (as we may for convenience call the writer[s] of these three epistles) composed a "letter" that was designed to correct the inadequate and erroneous views of his readers and to recall them to the fundamental elements in the apostolic gospel.

The nature of the false teaching propounded by John's opponents is indicated in various places in 1 John. The heterodox members of the church claimed to have a special relationship with God (1.6; 2.4) and to be without sin (1.8, 10). They did not believe that Jesus was the Christ or *Son of God (2.22; 5.1, 5), and denied his being *incarnate (4.2–3; 5.6; 2 John 7). The emphasis in 1 John on right behavior (renouncing sin, rejecting worldliness, and being obedient, especially to the love command) suggests that the opponents were leading others astray regarding ethical as well as theological issues.

If we try to relate these ideas to known systems of opinion in the first century CE, a number of possibilities present themselves. The most widely accepted view is that John was confronted by some early form of *gnostic thinking. Such an outlook stemmed from a sharp, characteristically Greek, division between the spiritual, regarded as good, and the material, deemed to be evil. In such a system no place for a real incarnation of the Son of God could be found; the consequence was docetism, a system that acknowledged Jesus as Son of God but claimed that this was merely a seeming or phantom advent. Views of this nature were entertained in the first century CE by Cerinthus, and in the second century by those whom Ignatius of Antioch attacked, and by Basilides.

An alternative approach is to identify John's opponents, as in the Fourth Gospel, with Jewish denials that Jesus was Messiah and Son of God. Thus, the false teachers countered by the writer claimed to know the Father but denied the Christhood of Jesus (2.4, 22–23). Those who object to this interpretation do so on the grounds that non-Christian Jews cannot have belonged to John's church (2.19) or have claimed to be guided by the Spirit (3.24; 4.1) and to be sinless (1.8, 10). But there is no problem involved if the Jewish opposition came from Jewish Christians. If so, we may combine these two solutions and say that some of John's opponents were Jewish and some were Hellenistic. In that case the situation addressed in 1 John closely approximates that in John's gospel.

Central to the theology of the fourth evangelist is his balanced understanding of the person of Christ: that he is both one with humankind and one with God (see John 16.28). Some Johannine Christians had remained orthodox in their belief. But others, from a Jewish background, needed to be reminded of the divinity of Christ; while a third group, of *gentile origin, required assurance about his real humanity.

If this is an accurate description of the volatile setting out of which John's gospel came, it will throw light on the situation behind 1 John and account for the nature of the false teaching that this writer was trying to resist. For by the time that the Johannine letters were written (say, ten years after the gospel [see below]), friction between the two heterodox groups had developed, and a polarization had begun to emerge. Those with a low view of Jesus had moved further toward a Jewish position and denied that Jesus was the Christ (2.22). Those who espoused a high Christology had become more clearly gnostic and docetic by inclination and refused to acknowledge that the Christ was Jesus (4.2). On both sides, problems of behavior accompanied those of doctrine (2.7–8, the Law is wrongly regarded as indispensable; 3.10–11, right conduct is falsely deemed unimportant). As a result, secession from the community began to take place (2.18–19).

So the writer of 1 John recalls his followers to the fundamental truths of the Christian faith. Often appealing to the teaching of John's gospel, elements of which may have been distorted by his opponents in support of their theological position, he summarizes the claims of the heterodox, provides a balanced theology of Christ's person (divine, [2.13–14], and human, [3.16]), and refutes ethical error, not least by stressing the command to love (3.11; see John 13.34).

The plea for love and unity, however, evident in both the Fourth Gospel and 1 John, seems not to have been widely heeded. The divisions in the community, already apparent when 1 John was written, deepened; and from 2 John we learn that "many deceivers" had gone back into the world (v. 7). Perhaps these were predominantly docetic in outlook (see 2 John 9), although, again, there is nothing in the Johannine letters to suggest that docetism is the only tendency in view.

By the time 3 John appeared, the unity of the Johannine circle seems to have been threatened from an organizational, as well as doctrinal, point of view. Diotrephes was "putting himself first" and excluding orthodox members from the church (3 John 9–10), and the writer's concern that the influence of such leaders should not increase suggests that he feared the final dissolution of the Johannine community. What actually happened we can only guess. Some of the group presumably went further into gnosticism; the Jewish secessionists may have returned to Judaism, while the orthodox adherents no doubt became absorbed into the life of the great church. At that time John's gospel, with the discussion of its doctrine provided by 1 John (supplemented by 2 and 3 John), came into its own, and the teaching of John's circle was finally secured for the cause of orthodoxy.

Character. 2 and 3 John are the shortest letters in the New Testament. They each consist of one chapter only, are roughly equal in length, and correspond to the conventionally brief length of a private letter that, at the time, would have been written on a single papyrus sheet about 20 by 25 cm (8 by 10 in) in size. Both are personal missives, written by one who describes himself as the *elder. But 2 John (addressed to a community) conforms closely to the pattern of other New Testament letters; whereas 3 John (addressed to Gaius, an individual) reflects a secular form of first-century *letter writing. Moreover, 2 John is closer than 3 John to 1 John in subject matter and style. None of these variations, however, compels us to infer that 2 and 3 John are ultimately unrelated (there are evident points of contact between them) or that 2 John was written as a first draft of 1 John. The history of the Johannine community sketched above may be traced entirely naturally from the Gospel to the letters in their present sequence, despite some attempts to assign to them a different order of composition.

The literary character of 1 John, on the other hand, is more difficult to determine. It is not epistolary in character, as are 2 and 3 John; and its style is general, even if personal. Possibly it is best described as a paper or brochure. It was written in light of John's gospel, as a comment on the fourth evangelist's teaching, for purposes of teaching and debate within a troubled and slowly disintegrating community.

Structure. The ways of analyzing the structure of 1 John are numerous. One possibility is to subdivide the two main sections of the letter, which carry exhortations to live in the light as children of God, into four subsections, which set out the basic conditions for truly Christian living. These are stated in the first half of the letter and repeated in cyclical fashion (with one expansion, exemplifying the demand for obedience in terms of the command to love) during the second half. Together with 2 and 3 John this is their outline:

1 JOHN

I. Preface (1.1–4): The word of life
II. Live in the light (1.5–2.29):
  A. God is light (1.5–7)
  B. First condition for living in the light: renounce sin (1.8–2.2)
  C. Second condition: be obedient (2.3–11)
  D. Third condition: reject worldliness (2.12–17)
  E. Fourth condition: keep the faith (2.18–29)
III. Live as children of God (3.1–5.13):
  A. God is Father (3.1–3)
  B. First condition for living as God's children: renounce sin (3.4–9)
  C. Second condition: be obedient (3.10–24)
  D. Third condition: reject worldliness (4.1–6)
  E. Fourth condition: be loving (4.7–5.4)
  F. Fifth condition: keep the faith (5.5–13)
IV. Conclusion (5.14–21): Christian confidence

3 JOHN

A plea for help.

Composition of 1 John. The difficulties involved in determining the literary character of 1 John and analyzing the structure of its material have resulted in a number of attempts to explain the present form of the letter. Two main proposals have been put forward by scholars.

According to one view, the original order has been rearranged. There is, however, no evidence for such transposition, which in the end introduces further dislocations in the text. According to others, various sources have been used and edited; theories under this heading vary considerably. Rudolf Bultmann, for example, has argued that two different styles of writing can be identified in 1 John and that one belongs to a source that may also be detected behind John's gospel while the other derives from the author himself. Wolfgang Nauck, who is critical of Bultmann's position, has proposed that 1 John stems from an earlier composition by the writer, which in due course he rewrote as a baptismal homily. But attempts of this kind to separate an underlying tradition from its edition are unsupported by firm evidence.

It is clear, therefore, that the history of this document cannot easily be explained in terms of rearrangement or written sources. The alternative view, that 1 John is a literary unity, is just as plausible; this suggestion is strongly supported by the theological coherence and balance of the letter and by its coherent structure (see above).

Authorship. The identity of the author of the Johannine letters is a matter of considerable debate and raises the issue of the relationship between these documents and both the gospel and Revelation of John. The following scheme, which attempts to take account of all the relevant data, is only one solution to the problem.

The inspiration behind the tradition and distinctive theology of the Fourth Gospel came from John the apostle, the beloved disciple, himself. In 70 CE he wrote *Revelation in order to encourage the members of his community to remain steadfast in the faith. Some of his followers later undertook the final publication of the gospel. A leading Johannine Christian (who may possibly have been involved in the composition of John's gospel) in due course wrote 1 John. An elder, close to the author of 1 John (or possibly the same person), was then responsible for 2 and 3 John.

All the Johannine documents in the New Testament are associated in some way, even if at times the links between them seem tenuous. That association is probably best accounted for by tracing their origin to a specific community, gathered in some way around John the apostle. Whatever answers are given to the question of authorship, therefore, the origin of the letters (as of the other parts of the Johannine literature) can well be assigned ultimately to an authoritative, apostolic tradition.

Date and Place of Origin. There are conflicting opinions among scholars about when and where the Johannine letters appeared. Assuming that 1, 2, and 3 John followed the gospel of John, the letters of John may be dated to the last decade of the first century CE. This allows time for a sharpening of the heterodox opinions within John's circle and for the first moves on the part of the secessionists.

Although some scholars have suggested Syria as the place of publication, the view that 1, 2, and 3 John were addressed to Johannine communities in Asia Minor, with their center in *Ephesus, is more probable. This is the traditional setting for the birth of John's gospel; it could easily have produced the controversy with Judaism and Hellenism that may be detected in both the Johannine gospel and the letters; and its religious syncretism would readily have nurtured the tendencies in the situation behind the letters.

Postscript. The Johannine letters are often described as catholic documents. This does not mean that they were written for all in the early church but that they delivered to all believers in John's community a timeless message about the nature of Jesus in relation to God and humanity, about the importance of right behavior as well as right belief, and about the need for unity, however flexible, among all the churches. The tensions in John's community were probably not resolved by the appeal for love and unity built into his letters; but the truths that they preserve have proved indispensable for the life of the universal church ever since.

STEPHEN S. SMALLEY

Jonah, The Book of. The antihero of the book of Jonah is mentioned in 2 Kings 14.25 as a prophet of salvation during the expansionistic era of Jeroboam II. The choice of this prophet as the target of didactic satire is doubly appropriate, first because he proclaimed nationalistic oracles in behalf of Israel and second because his name means "dove [of faithfulness or truthfulness]." The author wrote a short parable characterized by fantastic events to poke fun indirectly at a little man whose inner thoughts remain virtually hidden. Although certain similarities exist between this story and the prophetic legends of *Elijah and *Elisha, a greater kinship is with 1 Kings 13. Neither Jonah nor this unnamed man of God is intended for emulation; hence the term "legend" is not entirely appropriate.

The book of Jonah resembles later *midrash, for it interprets biblical texts explicitly (Exod. 34.6) and implicitly (Num. 23.19; Ezek. 18.23). In each instance the issue is the nature of Jonah's God: Is divine *mercy a more powerful attribute than justice? Can the deity actually repent? Does God's preference to grant life rather than death extend beyond Israel's borders?

Jonah's resistance to the divine call exceeds the usual reluctance, exemplified by *Moses, *Amos, and *Jeremiah. Jonah actually flees from God, and after the deity has shown him the futility of his ways, he carries out the task with a vengeance. Then he resents the sparing of repentant Ninevites and argues that justice ought to prevail, although he has experienced undeserved compassion. This picture of Israelite prophecy is not flattering, for Jonah is unrepentant to the end. Furthermore, his manipulation of the facts in answering the sailors renders the prophet suspect and extols their superior ethics. When he does resort to prayer, Jonah exalts the ego and uses the occasion to accuse God. He is also spiteful, hoping that the sailors' repentance will be short-lived, and he eagerly awaits the destruction of *Nineveh.

When was this unflattering depiction of prophecy written? Like many biblical books, this one yields few clues about its time of origin. The supposed Aramaisms may reflect a northern or Phoenician linguistic influence, so they do not necessarily indicate a postexilic date for the book. The expression "king of Nineveh" is no different from king of Samaria (1 Kings 21.1; 2 Kings 1.3); the same usage occurs in Neo-Assyrian inscriptions. Moreover, the use of the past tense with references to Nineveh is not without stylistic precedent in Hebrew narrative (Gen. 29.17; Exod. 9.11; Num. 14.24). The literary relationship between the book of Jonah and other texts (Exod. 14; 32; Deut. 21; 1 Kings 19; Jer. 26 and 36; Ps. 139) does little to clarify the date of the book. Even the apparent citation of Joel cannot be proved, for both references may derive from a common source.

Another approach to dating the book is by searching for its probable setting. The negative attitude toward prophecy resembles Zechariah 13.1–6, but that text cannot be dated with any certainty. Furthermore, unflattering views of prophecy may have existed at various times and places. The antiparticularism is often thought to be a response to the narrow policy of *Ezra and *Nehemiah. Thus, *Ruth and Jonah function to combat the view that would exclude foreigners from divine solicitude. Others suggest that the primary purpose of the book is to encourage repentance on Israel's part, and that was an important aspect of the message proclaimed by *Jeremiah and *Ezekiel. The search for an appropriate social and religious context for the book implies that its essential message is clear; this, however, does not seem to be the case. The favorable depiction of foreigners at Jonah's expense is striking, but is this openness to non-Israelites the central theme of the book?

The strange behavior on Jonah's part is given a rationale from sacred tradition. Jonah quotes (4.2) Exodus 34.6, the cultic confession that the Lord is both compassionate and just, as the reason for his flight from the divine presence. This conscious reflection on the nature of God offers a decisive clue to the purpose of the book. The conflict between Jonah and God concerns theodicy. Is it fair for the wicked inhabitants of Nineveh to escape the deity's wrath by repenting of their sins? Linguistic features link Nineveh and the cities *Sodom and Gomorrah, a comparison in which the Israelites could concur because of the suffering inflicted on them by Assyrian hordes. Nevertheless, the object lesson involving a fast-growing plant that perished just as quickly offers a justification for God's repentance. The closing question addressed to the sulking prophet throws into relief divine compassion for all creatures in Nineveh.

The author may have had more than one purpose. The great prophets had predicted the destruction of foreign nations, but these oracles had failed to come true. Were the prophets false? No, this book suggests, for the Assyrians gained time by repenting. Again, from the perspective of several prophets, Israelites were entirely unrepentant. How could the nation escape God's wrath? By turning from their evil ways and evoking the Lord's pity. Is it too late for that? No, for God is so eager to save them that repentance even by the wicked Ninevites would result in forgiveness. Although the portrait of Israelite prophecy is troubling, the radical self-criticism goes a long way toward redeeming the profession.

Several literary features of the book have captured the imagination of modern critics. These include the repetition by God and the polytheistic sailors of key words such as "get up," "go," and "cry out/proclaim"; the presence of vivid terms like "throw," "go down," and "evil" (the last even in self-description by the people of Nineveh); and varied names for the deity, which do not appear to be used capriciously. Moreover, the book has numerous allusions to earlier biblical expressions, particularly in the psalm (chap. 2) that Jonah utters from the belly of the fish. Perhaps the grotesque and fantastic achieve their pinnacle in the attribution of thoughts to the endangered ship (1.4). The weighty message does not exclude humor: on hearing Jonah's facile confession that deliverance belongs to the Lord, the fish throws up. This entire psalm is a devastating mockery of Israelite piety as it is exemplified by the dubious prophet whose sole concern was his reputation for accuracy of prediction or a restriction of divine compassion to Israel.

Jordan River (Map 1:Y2–5). The major river in ancient Palestine, linking the two major inland lakes of Kinneret (the Sea of *Galilee) and the Dead Sea (also known as the Salt Sea). The principal source of the Jordan is the precipitation on Mount *Hermon and the three springs near Tel Dan, Banias, and Hasbaya. In antiquity some of the headwaters of the Jordan River flowed through the Huleh Valley, a lake until modern times, which is some 300 m (985 ft) higher than the Sea of Galilee; this rapid drop in elevation, which continues farther south, probably explains the river's name (from Hebr. yārad, "to go down"). These sources combine near the northern edge of the Huleh Valley, and from that point the river is called the Jordan.

The river flows out of Kinneret at its southern tip, possibly an artificial outflow; 10 km (6 mi) south the Jordan is joined by its main tributary, the Yarmuk. Another tributary from the east is the Jabbok, in the Wadi Zarqa, 56 km (35 mi) farther south. The Jordan valley receives virtually no direct rainfall south of the Yarmuk. The total annual flow of the river into the Dead Sea, another 194 m (600 ft) lower than the Sea of Galilee, is 1.2 billion m^3 (3 billion gal) of water. Despite this volume, the Jordan River has rarely served as a source of irrigation. The river bluffs of the flood plain of the Rift Valley (Arabic Ghor), which line both sides of the Jordan, are 500–1,000 m (1,500–3,000 ft) wide and constantly crumbling and rise at least 20–50 m (60–150 ft) above the river bottom. These factors constitute a serious impediment to irrigation, since the technology of pumping is fairly recent. The flood plain (Arabic Zor) is called "pride of the Jordan" (NRSV: "thicket"; Jer. 12.5; 49.19; 50.44; Zech. 11.3).

Because of the intense heat of the Rift Valley and the availability of moisture from the Jordan along its river banks, much of the vegetation there has the characteristic of a tropical jungle, which is typical of regions as far south as the Sudan. One plant that grows freely there is the papyrus. In addition there is much tamarisk and spina Christi on the river banks. In antiquity it was a haven for many wild *animals, including lions. The river is fairly narrow and easy to cross, though the current is often swift.

Much of the importance of the Jordan River in the Bible derives from the fact that it assumes so central a place in the geographical nomenclature. It forms a natural boundary, so that *Moab is "beyond the Jordan" and hence the Israelites must cross the Jordan in order to enter the *Promised Land (Josh. 3). Although Israel often controlled territory east of the Jordan, the Jordan forms a natural eastern border, and Ezekiel's idealized nation is entirely to its west (see Ezek. 47.18). Jesus is reported to be baptized at "Bethany across the Jordan" (John 1.28). It is thus both as a primary water source, especially in the northern Ghor, and as a central feature of the Palestinian landscape that the Jordan River derives its importance. ERIC M. MEYERS

Joseph (Husband of Mary). According to the opening chapters of the gospels of *Matthew and *Luke, *Mary, the mother of *Jesus, was engaged before his birth to Joseph, son of Jacob (Matt. 1.16) or of Heli (Luke 3.23). Matthew's infancy story is written largely from Joseph's point of view, even narrating his receiving messages from *angels in his *dreams. These dreams portray his struggle to determine how to deal justly with his fiancée's unexpected pregnancy (Matt. 1.18–25) and how to respond to threats against the infant Jesus (2.13–23).

Matthew and Luke agree in their *genealogies of Jesus that Joseph was a descendent of King *David (Matt. 1.1–16; Luke 3.23–38). These genealogies imply that Joseph was in some way Jesus' father (see Virgin Birth). Joseph is gone from the scene when the Gospels describe Jesus' adult life, though he was apparently remembered by those around Jesus as his father (Luke 4.22; John 1.45; 6.42) and as a carpenter (Matt. 13:55). The gospel of Mark makes no mention of Jesus' father, and calls him instead "Mary's son" (Mark 6.3). The second-century CE infancy gospel Protevangelium of James provides additional information of a legendary character. Later Christian tradition comes to view Joseph as an elderly widower, so that the "*brothers and sisters of Jesus" in such passages as Mark 6.3 could be understood as Joseph's children from a previous marriage, not his children with Mary; later, he came to be seen as a saintly ascetic with no interest in sex, and Jesus' siblings as "cousins."

PHILIP SELLEW

Joseph (Son of Jacob). Joseph, whose name means "May God give increase," was the son of *Jacob and *Rachel (Gen. 30.22–24), and the eponymous ancestor of the house of Joseph, one of the twelve *tribes of Israel. *Genesis 37–50 portrays Joseph as a patriarch through whom the promises to *Abraham, *Isaac, and Jacob are transmitted to later Israel. The God of the ancestors is not, however, called the God of Joseph, and Joseph the patriarch is seldom mentioned in the Bible outside Genesis.

The Joseph story begins in Genesis 37.1, "Jacob settled in the land where his father had lived as an alien, the land of Canaan," and comes to its preliminary end in 47.27, where the opening formula is transformed, "Thus Israel settled in the land of Egypt, in the region of Goshen." Its unity comes not from a single theme, but from sophisticated art, narrating the interaction of the human characters; God's direct action is hardly mentioned.

The story begins with the young, self-centered Joseph announcing to his father and brothers his double *dreams of their obeisance to him. The doubling of his dreams here and later (41.1–8) proves their divine origin. Joseph later goes out to visit his brothers who are caring for their father's flock, apparently a rare event since he does not even know where they are camped (37.12–17). As he comes upon his brothers, they decide to kill him, but at the intercession of Reuben and Judah, he is spared; he ultimately falls into the hands of traders who sell him to the Egyptian Potiphar, captain of the guard. His brothers, however, tell Jacob that his son is dead, and offer as evidence his blood-stained garment, a preferential gift from his father (37.3, traditionally, although probably erroneously, translated as "a coat of many colors"). As if to indicate the passing of time and to build suspense about Joseph's fate, chap. 38 tells the story of Judah, the ancestor of the southern kingdom, a counterbalance to Joseph, the ancestor of the northern kingdom. Chap. 39 opens with Joseph as overseer of Potiphar's house. Even in prison, to which he is unjustly condemned, God protects him. His ability to interpret dreams brings him to Pharaoh's notice (40.1–41.14). He interprets Pharaoh's dream correctly as seven years of plenty and seven years of famine, and he is put in charge of preparing for the seven years of famine (chap. 41). That famine causes Jacob to send all his sons but *Benjamin (the other son of his beloved Rachel) to Egypt to buy grain. In the first visit of his brothers (chap. 42), Joseph tests them by treating them roughly, holding Simeon as hostage, putting their money back in their grain sacks, and demanding that they return with Benjamin on their next visit. Joseph, the cool courtier, wants to learn his brothers' attitude toward him, his full brother Benjamin, and their father. The second visit of the now uneasy brothers is even more eventful (chaps. 43–45): Joseph surprises them by seating them at a banquet according to the order of their birth, Benjamin is arrested on a ruse, and, finally, Judah as spokesman for the group expresses the pain the family disunity has caused (44.18–44). Joseph, by now emotionally drawn into the family's crisis, reveals himself to his brothers, acknowledging that God, despite the selfish behavior of the family members, "sent me before you to preserve life" (45.5). The last chapters narrate Jacob's blessing of his grandsons *Ephraim and *Manasseh (chap. 48), his testament (chap. 49), his death, and Joseph's final days (chap. 50).

At one level, chaps. 37–50 explain how the sons of Jacob got to Egypt through the agency of Joseph. On a deeper level, the chapters tell movingly how God kept a disintegrating family united by the repentance and restraint of its members. The lesson is an important one for Israel because its unity is often threatened by the claims of one tribe against another.

The tribe of Joseph is divided into the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh (Gen. 48; Num. 26.28–37; Josh. 14.4). "House of Joseph" may designate the northern kingdom as distinguished from the southern kingdom of Judah (2 Sam. 19.20; Ps. 78.67–68), or it may designate all Israel (Pss. 77.15; 80.1–2).

In the New Testament, Hebrews 11.22 lists Joseph as a hero of faith; Stephen in his speech summarizes his career in Acts 7.13–17. Some have seen in Mark's episode of the youth who left his cloak behind (Mark 14.51–52) an echo of Genesis 39.11–12. Among noteworthy modern retellings of the Joseph story is Thomas Mann's Joseph and His Brothers.

RICHARD J. CLIFFORD

Joseph of Arimathea. Unanticipated, Joseph enters all four passion narratives to request Jesus' body from Pilate to entomb it. Mark 15.43–46 depicts a respected council member awaiting the reign of God. His Joseph buys a linen cloth, removes the body from the cross, wraps and buries it, and rolls the stone against the tomb. Possibly a disciple, he adheres to commandments concerning burial (Deut. 21.23; Tob. 1.17–18; B. Qam. 81a; Ketub. 17a; but see Num. 19.11 on restrictions involving corpse uncleanness). Matthew's "rich disciple" displays higher righteousness by placing Jesus' body in his own new tomb (27.57–60). Luke's "good and righteous" Joseph (23.50–53) explicitly dissents from the council's action against Jesus, and John's Joseph, paired with the Pharisee Nicodemus, hides his discipleship for fear of the Jews (19.38–42). Apocryphal writings variously present Joseph as caring for *Mary after the Ascension, as the patron of Glastonbury, England, and as involved in the Grail saga.

AMY-JILL LEVINE

Josephus, Flavius. Our knowledge of the life of Josephus stems directly from his own writings, four of which have survived. These works form the most important sources of contemporary information about Jewish religious life, history, and culture during the last two pre-Christian and first post-Christian centuries.

The life of Josephus (37–ca. 100 CE) divides itself into two parts: his dramatic and controversial years in Judea and his residence in Rome as a client of the Flavian emperors. He was born in Jerusalem as Yosef ben Mattityahu. While still a teenager he spent some time in the wilderness as a member of the *Essenes, whose austere life and devotion to scripture Josephus found romantic. Later he classified himself as a member of the *Pharisees. When the great revolt against Rome began in 66 CE, Josephus was appointed as general to take charge of the defense of *Galilee in the northern part of the country. His preparations, however, were nullified when Vespasian overran the Jewish forces. This rout resulted, according to Josephus, from the martial superiority of the Roman army and the tactical skill of their commander. On the other hand, the detractors of Josephus asserted that the Roman victory derived from treachery by Josephus himself, and this suspicion of Josephus's patriotism would haunt him the remainder of his public life. Josephus and some of his companions escaped the besieged town of Jotapata and formed a suicide pact in order to escape capture by the Romans. Somehow Josephus managed to become the sole survivor of this scheme and then promptly surrendered himself to the Romans. He managed to win the attention of Vespasian by forecasting that the Roman commander would become emperor, and when this prediction proved true, Josephus became a permanent fixture in the entourage first of Vespasian and then of Titus. He played a prominent role in the eventual subjugation of Judea.

Josephus spent the remainder of his life residing in Rome as a pensioner of the imperial family. He devoted himself to writing, producing his works under the name of Flavius Josephus. His first surviving work is The Jewish War, a seven-book account of the great rebellion in which he played so prominent a part. Josephus exhibits his skill as a historian by beginning his account two-and-a-half centuries before the actual revolt in order to portray the historical background of the unrest in Judea. His account of the war itself veers in two directions: he manages to defend and magnify the deeds of the Roman generals while simultaneously depicting the courage and heroism of the Jewish defenders of *Jerusalem.

Josephus found in Roman society a considerable interest in Jewish history and in Judaism, and to satisfy this curiosity he wrote The Jewish Antiquities. This work lacks the skillful writing and dramatic excitement of the War but makes up for this lack in sheer comprehensiveness. The first ten of its twenty books are an expanded and embellished paraphrase of the historical writings of the Hebrew Bible. Josephus supplements the biblical narrative with Jewish lore known as haggadah as well as with selections from Greek and other sources relevant to the biblical story. In the second half of the Antiquities Josephus devotes a great deal of space to the rise and reign of *Herod the Great. This section is largely dependent on the histories of Nicolaus of Damascus, a secretary to Herod.

The most charming work of Josephus is a two-book tractate in which he defends the Jewish people and religion against their ancient detractors. Something akin to *anti-Semitism had reared its head in antiquity, and Josephus records some of these ancient slanders in this work, entitled Against Apion. Apion was a popular publicist whose writings featured a number of these calumnies, and the essay of Josephus was intended to be a reply.

Finally, Josephus composed an autobiography originally appended to the Antiquities, which now circulates independently under the title of Life. Much of what is contained in the Life was previously reported in the War. Yet there is some additional material here as well, such as Josephus's version of his dispute with Justus of Tiberias, a rival historian.

The writings of Josephus played an important role in the culture of the Radical Reformation. If Puritan arrivals to New England possessed a book in addition to their Bibles, it was usually Josephus.

Joshua, The Book of. Deriving its title from the name of its protagonist, Joshua is the sixth book of the Bible. It is a narrative that reports how Joshua, following the death of *Moses (Deut. 34), led the people of Israel in occupying the *Promised Land, apportioned it to the twelve *tribes, and led them in the renewal of their *covenant with Yahweh.

Structure and Literary Characteristics. The contents of the book may be outlined as follows:

I. Stories of Israel's occupation of the land (chaps. 1–12)
   A. Prologue, with an account of Yahweh's designation of Joshua as Moses' successor (chap. 1)
   B. The spies in Jericho (chap. 2)
   C. The crossing of the Jordan and the camp at Gilgal (chaps. 3–5)
   D. The fall of Jericho (chap. 6)
   E. Achan's sin and the conquest of Ai (7.1–8.29)
   F. A covenant on Mount Ebal (8.30–35)
   G. Treaty with the Gibeonites (chap. 9)
   H. Conflict with Amorite kings and the southern campaign (chap. 10)
   I. The northern campaign (11.1–15)
   J. Summary of the occupation (11.16–12.24)

II. Account of the division of the land (chaps. 13–21)
   A. Prologue, with an account of the unconquered lands and summary of trans-Jordanian territory (chap. 13)
   B. Allotments of Judah, Ephraim, and (Western) Manasseh (chaps. 14–17)
   C. Allotments of Benjamin, Simeon, Zebulun, Issachar, Asher, Naphtali, and Dan (chaps. 18–19)
   D. Cities of refuge and Levitical cities (chaps. 20–21)

III. Concluding events (chaps. 22–24)
  A. Dismissal of Transjordanian tribes (chap. 22)
  B. Joshua's last words (chap. 23)
  C. The covenant at Shechem (24.1–28)
  D. The graves of Joshua, Joseph, and Eleazar (24.29–33)

Although the book of Joshua is a narrative work, it does not have a carefully developed plot like the books of Ruth, Jonah, and Esther. As the outline indicates, the book is a composition made up of a great many individual and diverse elements. In terms both of contents and genre, each of the three parts of the book consists of quite different types of traditions. Most elements of the first part (Josh. 1–12) are stories of the events in the occupation of the land. With few exceptions, the elements of the second part (Josh. 13–21) are geographical descriptions or lists. Speeches and reports of ceremonies predominate in the final section (Josh. 22–24).

There is, however, narrative movement, if not an explicit and developed plot. At the beginning, the people stand on the edge of the land, poised to take it, and in the end they are in the land, making a covenant with their God. How they got there, and the details of their settlement are the questions answered by the book. What unifies the work is the movement of the people of Israel toward a particular goal, their settlement of the land. Although on close examination one finds that this goal was not fully reached, it is nevertheless the major theme of the narrative. The book is also unified in the particular leader whose name symbolizes the era. Joshua was not only the person who led Israel in the realization of the promise of the land but also the last leader considered fully acceptable to Yahweh.

History of Composition. Consideration of the literary history of the book of Joshua must begin with an examination of its relationship to its context. The fundamental question is whether the book of Joshua should be seen more as a part of what precedes or what follows. Answers to this question have in large measure shaped interpretations of the book's literary history.

On the one hand, the book of Joshua continues the story begun in Genesis and brings to full circle the traditions of the *Pentateuch, recording the fulfillment of the promises to the ancestors reported in Genesis 12–50. Thus, in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, the source-critical analysis of the Pentateuch was extended into the book of Joshua, and scholars found there the same sources (*J, *E, *D, and *P) recognized in the earlier books. Later form-critical and traditio-historical study by Gerhard von Rad argued that Israel's most ancient story included the events now reported in Genesis through Joshua, that is, the Hexateuch. Whether or not there was an ancient little historical credo, as von Rad argued, certainly in a great many places Israel's past was summarized in terms of a series of saving events, including the promise to the ancestors, the Egyptian sojourn and *Exodus, the wandering in the *wilderness, and the settlement of the land. In that circle, the subject matter contained in the book of Joshua would have been the concluding part.

In terms of the organization of the *canon, however, there is a distinct break between the first five books (the Torah or Pentateuch) and the section that begins with Joshua (the Former Prophets in Jewish tradition). That organization is doubtless the last stage in a long history of development, and stems in large measure from the legal contents of the Torah and its association with the authority of Moses.

On the other hand, certainly in its present literary formulation, the book of Joshua is part of the history that begins with Deuteronomy. Whether there are traces of the other Pentateuchal documents or not, its clearest literary affinities are with the book of Deuteronomy. It was Martin Noth who recognized that the book of Joshua is the second major section of a *Deuteronomic history, the account of Israel's past that includes the books of Deuteronomy through 2 Kings as they are organized in the Hebrew canon, that is, without the book of Ruth.

The diverse evidence points to the following conclusions. At an early stage in their oral transmission, Israel's traditions about the occupation of the land would have been the concluding element in the story that began with the promise of the land to the ancestors. At the latest stage, when the Hebrew books were being recognized as canonical, the book of Joshua was part of the second group of scriptures, the Prophets. But at the dominant level of their literary formulation, Joshua belongs with the Deuteronomic historical work that begins with the book of Deuteronomy.

There is abundant evidence in the book of Joshua for the Deuteronomic historians' editorial hand. These scribes—for there must have been more than one—did not create the story but rather drew upon older written and oral materials, organized and interpreted them, and at various points tied the story together with their editorial additions. These latter, recognizable by their similarities to the style and theology of the book of Deuteronomy, tend to occur at key transitions in the history, as well as to consist of speeches by the main characters in the story. Joshua 1 and 23 are such editorial contributions.

The final edition of the history must have been written not long after the last events it reports, in an anecdote concerning King Jehoiachin in Babylon. Thus it dates from ca. 560 BCE, during the Babylonian captivity, and could have been written in either Babylon or Judah. It is highly likely that there were earlier editions of the history. Evidence for two stages is seen in the two conclusions to the book of Joshua (chaps. 23 and 24), both of which bear the clear imprint of the style and theology of Deuteronomy.

In general, the final Deuteronomic editor(s) were at once historians and theologians. In a time of national disaster it was important to preserve the story of the people, especially since the institutions that transmitted the national memory were in disarray. As theologians, they interpreted their present—the Babylonian *exile—as the results of a sinful past. Because of Israel's unfaithfulness to the covenant with Yahweh, the prophetic announcements of judgment had now come to pass.

Older Traditions. When the Deuteronomic editors began to compose the book of Joshua they had at their disposal a great many oral and written materials, some doubtless quite ancient, and some already organized into collections. Most of the individual traditions in chaps. 1–12 are etiological tales, at least in their structure and intention, that is, they tend to conclude with explanations of an existing place, practice, or name in terms of some event during the time of Joshua. Thus, twelve stones at Gilgal are to be explained to future generations as those taken from the Jordan during the crossing (4.19–24), and the name Gilgal is said to come from the first *circumcision in the Promised Land (5.2–9; cf. also 6.22–25; 7.24–26).

Most of the individual stories in Joshua 1–12 relate to events in a single region, that of the tribe of Benjamin and the area near Gilgal (see Map 3:5X), an old sanctuary. What at first glance is an account of the conquest of the entire land turns out to concern the occupation of a small region. The exceptions are the reports of a southern campaign (10.28–43) and a northern one (11.1–23). It seems very likely, then, that the traditions of the tribe of Benjamin and of the sanctuary at Gilgal formed an old collection that became the core of other stories.

Most of the lists that form the basis for the account of the division of the land in chaps. 13–21 existed before the final edition of the book. These include a list of towns and a boundary list. The town lists (15.20–62; 18.21–28) present the names of cities belonging to various tribes. Although twelve groups are given, they do not correspond to the twelve tribes; rather, they list only cities in the southern part of the country. Thus, the town lists probably give the administrative districts of Judah during the monarchy, either from the time of *Josiah (639–609 BCE) or earlier. The boundary lists (15.1–19; 17; 18.11–20; 19.10–16) trace out the frontiers between the tribes as on a *map. Although the actual tribal holdings might have changed frequently, it appears that the boundary lists give a premonarchic version of the land claimed by each tribe. This list is the basis for most contemporary maps of the tribal boundaries in the time of the judges.

Chaps. 13–21 also contain lists of the *cities of refuge and of the Levitical cities (chap. 21) and some individual stories of specific groups such as the Calebites. Some of these, which appear also in Judges 1, concern territories not captured under Joshua; they probably reflect quite ancient tradition. In the final section of the book, chap. 24 calls for special comment. Although the account of the covenant at *Shechem has been edited by the Deuteronomic historians, it probably rests upon early Israelite practice, as does the related passage in 8:30–35.

The History of the Settlement. As a source for the history of ancient Israel, the book of Joshua is useful but limited. In particular, as evidence for the period it reports, there are several reasons why its account cannot be read uncritically. First, while the Deuteronomic editorial framework gives the impression of an invasion of all of Canaan by all of Israel under the leadership of Joshua, a careful reading of the individual sections reveals a different picture. All of the stories account for only part of the land, mainly in the central hill country, and there is even a summary of unconquered territory (13.1–6). Second, the historian of this period needs to take into account a great many other passages that deal directly or indirectly with the period and its events, especially Judges 1. Others are Genesis 34, which appears to concern the settlement of the tribes of *Levi and *Simeon in the area of Shechem, and Numbers 13–14, which seems to assume the conquest of the southern plateau by the tribe of *Judah. Third, the historian needs to take note of whatever external evidence can be brought to bear, including the results of *archaeological research. There is, for example, evidence of the destruction of several Palestinian cities ca. 1200 BCE, and the appearance of a new and materially inferior culture at about that time, but the details of Israel's emergence in her homeland remain uncertain. One of the most useful historical sources in the book is the list of tribal boundaries, reflecting the situation in the period of the judges.

One general point is quite clear. It is far more accurate, both theologically and historically, to speak of what happened in the era of Joshua as the settlement rather than the conquest of the land. Theologically, virtually all levels of the tradition insist that Israel received the land as a gift from Yahweh, in fulfillment of the promise to the ancestors. The battles were understood as episodes in a holy *war in which the conflict was won by Israel's God. Historically, Israel's movement into Canaan was not a sudden series of military campaigns but a gradual settlement over a long period of time, probably more than a century. Certainly, this settlement would have seen military conflict with the native population, but more often by individual tribes than by the entire people of Israel. (See also Conquest of Canaan.)

Theological Themes. The dominant theological perspective of the book of Joshua is that of its final editors, who wrote during the Babylonian exile to interpret that disaster for those who had experienced it. These thinkers viewed the history of Israel as a series of eras, each characterized by particular leaders. Moses was, of course, the leader without peer, the only one with whom Yahweh spoke face to face (Deut. 34.10; etc.). The period of Joshua was the last era of harmony, when an obedient people experienced the fulfillment of the promise of the land. In various ways, the life of Joshua is shown to parallel that of Moses; as Moses led the people through the sea, Joshua led them across the *Jordan River, and both men led the people in the establishment and renewal of the covenant with their God. The next era, that of the Judges, was a time of testing, and the monarchy—with the primary exception of the reigns of *David and Josiah—was a history of apostasy leading up to the exile.

In this scheme, the book of Joshua stresses the importance of the land as a divine gift, addressed finally to a people that has lost that inheritance. Thus, the lists of cities and tribal holdings in chaps. 13–21 are at least as significant as the stories of battles won in chaps. 1–12. The land belongs, ultimately, to the Lord, and the people hold it in trust as an inheritance. One message of the book is that the proper social structure for maintaining that trust is that of the family and the tribe. Land, therefore, is not a commodity to be traded.

Both directly and indirectly, the book addresses the problem of syncretism. To what extent can the people of Israel adopt the religious and cultural patterns of the Canaanites? The Deuteronomic tradition argued vigorously that any compromise with foreign religions and cultures was a betrayal of the covenant and would lead ultimately to ruin. By commanding the total destruction of the native population, the writers express the dogma of a radical means to avoid the problem. This dogma had its roots in the ancient holy war tradition, in which all captives and all booty were subjected to the *ban. But the writers of the book of Joshua knew that the native population had by no means been exterminated; for the most part, they continued to live alongside the Israelites. Thus, the book of Judges reports that the Canaanites and their religious practices were left in order to test the faith of Israel (Judg. 3.1, 4).

Another theme that runs through the book is the relationship between obedience and *blessing. Although Israel receives the land as an unmerited gift, in fulfillment of the promise to the ancestors, she will remain in the land and enjoy its fruits so long as the people are faithful to the covenant. The meaning of faithfulness is expressed in the law (even understood as the "book of the law," 1.8) and the covenant stipulations (8.30–35; 21.13–20; 23.6–13; 24.14–28). Above all, this relationship between obedience and blessing is a corporate rather than an individualistic one. As the story of Achan indicates (chap. 7), the people as a whole may suffer for the sins of some of its members. GENE M. TUCKER

Josiah. King of *Judah (640–609 BCE). His reign is described in 2 Kings 22.1–23.30 (=2 Chron. 34–35; see also Jer. 3.6; 22.11–16). He became king at the age of eight after the assassination of his father, Amon (2 Kings 21.24), and is hailed as the most faithful of Judah's kings (2 Kings 22.2; 23.25).

Because of the decline of the *Assyrian empire, Josiah was able to promote the interests of Judah during his reign. He is praised by the biblical writers primarily for his religious reform, in which he sought to eliminate all non-Yahwistic practices and sanctuaries in Judah. Although the reform may have begun several years earlier (see 2 Chron. 34.3–7), its major impetus was the discovery of "the book of the law" (thought to be the law code of *Deuteronomy) in 621 (2 Kings 22.8–10). Some scholars also believe that an early edition of the books of Joshua–Kings (the *Deuteronomic history) was compiled in conjunction with this reform to reinforce Josiah's measures (see 1 Kings 13.2).

In 609, Pharaoh Neco of Egypt marched through Judah on his way to Carchemish to fight alongside the *Assyrians against *Babylon. Josiah intercepted the Egyptians at *Megiddo, where he was killed. His religious reform was abandoned after his death.

Judah, The Kingdom of.

The Tribe of Judah. The tribe of Judah, which occupied the hill country between the vicinity of *Jerusalem and *Hebron (Map 3:x5), plays a minor role in the biblical narratives that pertain to premonarchic times. In the book of *Judges, for example, there are only occasional mentions of Judah, and this tribe seems to have been very much on the fringe of Saul's kingdom. Judah comes into prominence, however, with David's rise to power, *David himself being a Judean from the village of *Bethlehem. Before conquering Jerusalem and transferring his residency there, David ruled over a kingdom centered at Hebron and consisting primarily of the tribe of Judah. Later, the tribal territory of Judah was to be the core of the southern kingdom, which remained loyal to the Davidic dynasty following *Solomon's death.

Thus the name "Judah," like the name "Israel," is used in different ways in the Bible. It can refer to the eponymous ancestor of the tribe of Judah (Gen. 29.35; 35.23; 37.26), to the tribe itself (Num. 2.3; 7.12; 10.14; Josh. 18.5; 19.1; Judg. 1.4), and to the kingdom of Judah, which covered more extensive territory and included peoples of other tribal origins (1 Kings 14.21, 29; 15.1, 7; Isa. 1.1; Jer. 1.2). These distinctions are not always clear in the biblical story. For example, the tribal boundaries and cities recorded for the tribe of Judah in the book of *Joshua actually represent the ideal territorial extent of the kingdom of Judah. Likewise, the biblical *genealogies tend to subsume under Judah various other southern tribal groups, such as the Calebites, which became constituents of the kingdom of Judah (see Tribes of Israel).

David's Judean Kingdom. David gained popularity as a *Philistine fighter under *Saul's command. Later he broke with *Saul and led a rebel army that operated along the frontier of Judean territory. First we hear of David and his men camped at Adullam (1 Sam. 22.1–4). When Saul learned of their presence there, David and his followers moved to the barren slopes of the hill country southeast of Hebron (1 Sam. 23–26). Apparently, they received little support from the local population in either area; on the contrary, the villagers reported their whereabouts to Saul on more than one occasion.

Eventually, David found it necessary to move to Philistine territory, where he placed himself and his army under the command of Achish, the Philistine King of Gath (1 Sam. 27). Thus it happened that David was allied with the Philistines when they defeated Saul's army at the battle of Gilboa, the battle at which Saul and Jonathan lost their lives (1 Sam. 28–31). Saul's Israelite kingdom was left on the verge of collapse and without leadership. The crown fell to Ishbaal (Ishbosheth) who, realizing that the whole central hill country was now vulnerable to Philistine encroachment, moved his residency (and accordingly the administrative center of the kingdom) to Mahanaim east of the Jordan (2 Sam. 2.8–11). Thereupon David, presumably with Philistine approval, occupied the city of Hebron and its surrounding villages (2 Sam. 2.1–3). His kingship over the region was formalized when "the people of Judah came [to Hebron] and there they anointed David king over the house of Judah" (2 Sam. 2.4).

Thus, for the next seven years, according to 2 Samuel 5.4–5 and 1 Kings 2.11, David ruled over a kingdom centered in the hill country south of Jerusalem, composed largely of the tribe of Judah, with Hebron as its capital. David's realm of influence expanded rapidly during these years of rule from Hebron, so that by the time he conquered Jerusalem and moved his residency there (2 Sam. 5.6–10), the tribe of Judah was only one constituent part of the kingdom. This was to remain true throughout the reign of *Solomon. Among other constituent elements of the Davidic-Solomonic kingdom, for example, were the Israelites.

The Post-Solomonic Kingdom of Judah. Following Solomon's death, the Israelites rebelled and established an independent kingdom of "Israel" (1 Kings 12.1–17). No doubt, many of them understood this as a restoration of the old Saulide kingdom. The people of Jerusalem and of the southern hill country, however, remained loyal to the Davidic dynasty, specifically to Solomon's son, Rehoboam, who was next in line for the throne. While Rehoboam continued to rule from Jerusalem, his realm of authority consisted essentially of the area that David had ruled from Hebron, that is, the old tribal territory of Judah and immediately adjacent regions—the southern hill country, the "wilderness" region between the hill country and the Dead Sea, some of the *Negeb, and some of the Shephelah (see Map 5:w–x5–6). Not surprisingly, this post-Solomonic kingdom came to be called Judah, even though its territory and population extended well beyond those of the tribe of Judah.

This post-Solomonic kingdom of Judah remained in existence for almost three and a half centuries, from Solomon's death in approximately 925 BCE to the destruction of Jerusalem in 587/586 BCE. During the first two hundred years of this period, the kingdoms of Israel and Judah existed side by side, sometimes at peace, sometimes at war; and for much of this time, during the Omride period for example, Judah was overshadowed by, and possibly subject to, Israel.

The article in this volume on "Israel, History of" summarizes key political developments during the two centuries that the two kingdoms existed alongside each other. The following summary covers some of the same material, but focuses on Judah and extends to the destruction of Jerusalem in 587/586.

Unstable beginnings (ca. 924–855). Rehoboam was left with a small and weak kingdom. Hostilities with Israel, whose frontier was only about 17 km (10 mi) from Jerusalem, would have drained his resources even more. As if that were not enough, the Egyptian pharaoh Shishak raided Palestine during the fifth year of Rehoboam's reign. Rather than challenge Shishak, Rehoboam paid a heavy ransom from the Temple treasury (1 Kings 14.25–28).

Apparently, Shishak's raid was a temporary episode with no lasting effect. The hostilities with Israel continued for four decades, however, through the reign of Rehoboam's grandson, Asa (ca. 905–874). 1 Kings 15.16–24 reports that Asa negotiated an agreement with Ben-hadad, the Aramean king of *Damascus, which called for an Aramean attack on Israel's northern border. With Israel's king (Baasha, ca. 902–886) thus distracted, Asa secured his own northern frontier with fortifications at Mizpah and Geba (1 Kings 15.16–22).

In the shadow of the Omrides (ca. 885–843). Under the Omride rulers during the second quarter of the ninth century, Israel emerged as a powerful kingdom. *Jehoshaphat of Judah (ca. 874–850) was roughly contemporary with the two most outstanding of the Omride kings, Omri and *Ahab; and the biblical records suggest that he was an unwavering supporter of their military undertakings; probably he had little choice. Moreover, the two royal families were joined by the marriage of Jehoshaphat's son Jehoram (ruled ca. 850–843) to Omri's daughter (or granddaughter; compare 2 Kings 8.18 with 8.26). When the Omride dynasty fell, therefore, in approximately 843 BCE, there were significant political repercussions in Judah as well.

The circumstances are described in horrible detail in 2 Kings 8.28–10.27. On an occasion when Israel's troops were defending northern Transjordan against Aramean encroachment, *Jehu, commander of the troops, assassinated the king of Israel (also named Jehoram, a son of Ahab), seized the government, and massacred the whole Omride family. Ahaziah, who by that time had succeeded Jehoram son of Jehoshaphat to the throne in Judah, also was assassinated, while visiting his Omride relatives in Israel.

A century of instability and decline (ca. 843–745). Jehu's coup initiated a period of hard times in both Israel and Judah (2 Kings 10.32–33; 12.17–18; 13.3). In fact, all of Syria-Palestine seems to have been dominated for the next four decades by the Aramean kings of Damascus. Judah was troubled as well with dynastic instability. After Ahaziah, who had been assassinated in connection with the Omride massacre, the next three Judean rulers (Athaliah, Joash, and Amaziah) were each executed or assassinated.

Athaliah, the Omride *queen mother, seized the throne for herself at Ahaziah's death and ordered the execution of all others in Judah who could possibly have any claim to it. Her own downfall and execution, after seven years of rule, resulted from a palace coup orchestrated by a priest named Jehoiada (2 Kings 11). Joash, whom Jehoiada placed on the throne in her stead, was a seven-year-old child, supposedly a son of Ahaziah who had escaped the bloodletting at the time of his father's death. Not surprisingly, Joash was much influenced during the early years of his reign (ca. 837–?) by Jehoiada and the Jerusalem priests. Later, however, as Joash reached adulthood and especially after Jehoiada died, he began to exert more independence over the priests. Eventually he too was assassinated, apparently by persons in the royal court (2 Kings 12.1–16, 19–21).

By the time that Amaziah, the son of Joash, ascended the throne (sometime near the end of the ninth century BCE), the Aramean domination of Syria-Palestine had begun to relax. Once again, conflict erupted between Israel and Judah, with Israel overwhelmingly victorious. Not only was Amaziah unable to defend his frontier against Jehoahaz of Israel, but Jehoahaz captured Jerusalem, destroyed a large section of the city wall, and took royal Judean hostages to *Samaria (2 Kings. 14.8–14). Soon thereafter, Amaziah was assassinated by his own countrymen, and Judah probably remained essentially a vassal to Israel through the reigns of Uzziah and Jotham.

Dates for the Judean kings of this period are impossible to establish with any degree of precision. Uzziah and Jotham would have lived during the latter part of the eighth and first part of the seventh centuries BCE respectively (2 Kings 15.1–7, 32–38). The prophets *Amos and *Hosea also belong to this period, as does the early career of *Isaiah.

Assyrian domination (ca. 745–627). Judah, along with all the other little city-states and kingdoms of Syria-Palestine, succumbed to Assyrian domination during the latter half of the eighth century BCE. Unlike Israel, however, whose national existence came to an end at that time and whose territory was annexed by the *Assyrian empire, Judah survived for another quarter of a century after the Assyrian empire itself collapsed. This does not mean, however, that Judah continued to enjoy any significant degree of independence. On the contrary, *Tiglath-pileser's Palestinian campaigns in 734–732 left Judah a subject nation, and this situation remained essentially unchanged until the fall of Jerusalem in 587/586. When *Hezekiah and certain other allied kings dared to challenge Assyrian domination during the reign of *Sennacherib (705–681), the attempt failed miserably, and numerous Judean cities and villages were destroyed. Jerusalem itself narrowly escaped destruction, which was regarded as a miracle (2 Kings 18.9–19.37). The prophets Isaiah and *Micah were active during these years of Assyrian domination.

Egyptian domination (627–605). Although the specific circumstances are not well known, it seems that the Assyrians and Egyptians established an alliance during the latter years of the Assyrian empire. As the Assyrians began to relax their grip on Syria-Palestine, the Egyptians tightened theirs. Specifically, Judah seems to have been subject to Egypt from approximately the end of the reign of Ashurbanipal (668–627 BCE) until the battle of Carchemish in 605. This was the political context of *Josiah's cultic reform, his execution by Pharaoh Neco, and *Jeremiah's early career (2 Kings 22.1–23.30; Jer. 2.18–19).

Babylonian domination and the end of the kingdom of Judah (605–587/586). The *Babylonians, by defeating the Assyrians and their Egyptian allies at the battle of Carchemish in 605 BCE, became masters of Syria-Palestine as well as of Mesopotamia. Unfortunately, the Judeans persisted in challenging the new master, which resulted in the end of their kingdom. Jehoiakim (605–598) died while Jerusalem was under Babylonian siege. Jehoiakim's son Jehoichin was on the throne when the city fell in 597 and was exiled to Babylon with many other prominent Judeans (2 Kings 24.1–17). The Babylonians placed *Zedekiah on the throne; when he too proved disloyal, they conquered Jerusalem again, sacked the city, sent many more Judeans into exile, and placed one Gedaliah in charge of the region (2 Kings 24.18–25.26).

The exact status of Gedaliah, who resided at Mizpah, is unclear—whether he was regarded as a vassal king or as a military governor over annexed territory. Apparently he was not, however, of the Davidic family; soon he was assassinated by a nationalistic group who presumably wished to restore the Davidic line. Very little is known about the situation in Palestine in the aftermath of Gedaliah's assassination, but certainly by this time Judah had ceased to exist as a kingdom.

The Hasmonean Kingdom of Judah. Mention should be made finally of the revolt of the *Maccabees against the Seleucid rulers during the second century BCE. Not only was the revolt successful in throwing off the Seleucid yoke, but it resulted in a Judean kingdom with Jerusalem as its capital, lasting for a century—from the Maccabean recovery of Jerusalem in 164 BCE to Pompey's eastern campaigns in 64–63 BCE. Ruled by the Hasmonean dynasty, the family of Judas Judaisms of the First Century CE. The title of this article indicates a change in scholarly consensus from earlier in this century. Why Judaisms and not Judaism? It has become clear that in the first century CE Judaism was not monolithic but highly variegated throughout the Greco-Roman world, and diverse and complex even within the borders of Roman Palestine. No longer valid is George Foot Moore's characterization of "normative Judaism," by which he meant that Pharisaic-Rabbinic Judaism was the dominant and legitimate expression, against which all other Judaisms were judged to be aberrations or variants. Instead, the picture that has emerged is of multiple Judaisms, distinct Jewish religious systems, yet with connecting threads, indicators that they share a common legacy. Another characterization to be rejected is "late Judaism." This turn of the century terminology was used to brand Judaism in the Greco-Roman period as a legalistic degeneration of earlier prophetic religion, moving toward the end of Judaism with its lack of acceptance of Jesus as the *Messiah. Scholars today recognize that the Judaisms of the first century are early and not late, that they are much more at the beginning than at the end. Yet another contrast that has been laid aside is that of Palestinian versus Hellenistic Judaism; this is an artificial opposition which reduces an enormously complex picture into a simplistic one. Hellenization and its attendant issues were not confined to the Diaspora (see Dispersion). Still, while the overlap between the Judaisms inside and outside of Palestine is significant, one should not deny the distinctive features of Diaspora Judaism, many of which were an outgrowth of two issues: the great distance between the Jerusalem *Temple and most Diaspora Jews, and the fact that Diaspora Judaism was a minority religion in a heavily hellenized and polytheistic setting. In short, it is difficult to compose a coherent picture of the Judaisms of this time because of the very diversity, complexity, and dynamic character which lead us to speak of Judaisms rather than Judaism, and also because of the nature of the sources.

Sources. The primary literary sources for the Judaisms of the first century provide only a limited picture. Those preserved are those which were important to the victors of history. From the Jewish perspective this is rabbinic literature (which dates from the third century CE on, though it may preserve earlier traditions), the foundational literature of what is known as Orthodox Judaism. It gradually came to regard itself as the heir to Pharisaic Judaism, and therefore either ignored or was hostile to other varieties of Judaism in the first century. From a Christian perspective, there is mid-first to second century evidence in the New Testament and other early Christian writings. These view first century Judaisms through the lenses of various Christian communities struggling to establish identities independent of the Judaism out of which they are emerging or with which they are competing, often polemically. Additional sources include two first-century Jewish figures, the historian Flavius *Josephus and the philosopher *Philo of Alexandria, the *Dead Sea Scrolls, the Jewish literature written between the Bible and the *Mishnah and preserved in the *apocrypha and in the *pseudepigrapha, and archeological and inscriptional evidence. Each source has its own problems of interpretation, and there are major gaps, such as data concerning *women. Nevertheless, there is a wealth and variety of sources for the Judaisms of the first century which reflect diverse socioeconomic perspectives. Ironically, it is the very diversity of these perspectives which often limits historical reconstructions, because of their disagreements with one another and the gaping holes that they leave in their wake.

Pharisees. Of the named Judaisms of the first century, the best known are the *Pharisees, attested in Josephus, the New Testament, and rabbinic literature. The evidence reveals nothing of the internal organization of this group—their criteria for membership, leadership structure, or educational system. Only two known individuals claim that they were themselves Pharisees: Josephus and *Paul. There are reasons to question Josephus's claim that at the age of nineteen he became a Pharisee, and certainly many of his writings do not seem to be those of a Pharisee or someone who is more than neutral toward the Pharisees. Still, his later writings show a change of attitude and could support a later Pharisaic affiliation. Paul wrote from the perspective of one who had left Pharisaic Judaism. Josephus's and Paul's claims to be Pharisees open up the possibility that Pharisaic Judaism was found not only in Roman Palestine, but in the Diaspora, possibly as a way of responding to the wider world of Greco-Roman culture with a consciously Jewish way of life.

Josephus mentions the Pharisees fewer than twenty times, and the portrait that emerges is of a relatively small group (six thousand at the time of Herod the Great, Ant. 17.2.42) that for most of the first century played a minor role in Jewish society. They are portrayed as one of three philosophical schools of thought, alongside the Sadducees and Essenes, but seem to have been primarily a political interest group. Lacking their own political power, the Pharisees sought influence with the ruling class to achieve their goals for Jewish society, attempts that succeeded especially during the latter part of Hasmonean rule, and at other times up through the beginning of the revolt against Rome in 66 CE. Josephus' selective description of Pharisaic beliefs—they believe in fate, free will, and God, that the soul is imperishable and that the souls of the wicked will be punished—reflects the interests of his Greco-Roman audience. A hint of the Pharisees' overall goals is that they had a reputation for interpreting traditional laws not recorded in the books of Moses; unfortunately Josephus does not elaborate.

Other clues concerning the Pharisees' goals for a renewed Judaism and their own internal rules come from the Gospels and rabbinic Judaism. The depiction of the Pharisees in the Gospels as the opponents of *Jesus focuses the contention between Jesus and the Pharisees around issues of *fasting and *tithing, *purity, and *Sabbath observance, issues that overlap with the agenda of early rabbinic law. Further, the early rabbinic evidence for the Pharisees presents them as applying their own tradition of priestly piety to everyday life and business. According to Anthony Saldarini, "the Pharisees drew on an old tradition of using priestly laws concerning purity, food, and marriage in order to separate, protect, and identify Judaism" ("Pharisees," Anchor Bible Dictionary). Without denying that the *rabbis are the ideological descendants of the Pharisees, the precise relationship between the Pharisees and the early rabbis who came after them is problematic, and there are considerable differences between the rabbis and the Pharisees. Apparently Pharisaic Judaism's rise to prominence is gradual, beginning after the war with Rome.

Sadducees. Evidence for the *Sadducees is more meager and much more difficult to interpret than that for the Pharisees. None of the sources (Josephus, the New Testament, rabbinic literature) were written from a Sadducean point of view; the Sadducees rarely appear alone in them; and they are generally hostile in their treatment of the Sadducees. The sources agree, however, that the Sadducees were a recognized and well-established group of first-century Jews. Josephus further notes that while they had limited influence, they were respected within Jewish society. Their origins and history are obscure, though we hear of them as a political party during the Hasmonean rule of John Hyrcanus (134–104 BCE) and continue to hear of them throughout the first century CE until sometime after the war with Rome. Josephus portrays the Sadducees as drawn from the ruling class and therefore not popular with the masses. Several sources suggest some sort of connection between the Sadducees and the priestly establishment, and Acts 5 associates them with the high *priest and makes them the dominant group on the *Sanhedrin (though Acts 23 envisions the Sanhedrin as more evenly divided). Caution is needed here: the Sadducees cannot be equated with the priesthood and the ruling class. Not all Sadducees were priests and at best only a very small number of the ruling class were Sadducees. In rabbinic literature the Sadducees are identified with the even less well known Boethusians. It is unclear whether these were two distinct groups or whether the rabbis have conflated two sets of opponents. The little we can glean of Sadducean beliefs comports well with the conservative nature of a group drawn from the ruling class and with some connection to the priesthood: they rejected resurrection, the *afterlife and judgment—a position connecting them with older Israelite religion and pitting them against newer beliefs. Josephus portrays them as denying fate and the traditions of the Pharisees and accepting no observance "apart from the laws." This hardly makes them scriptural literalists, and most likely they had their own traditions of interpretation opposed to those of the Pharisees. Certainly early rabbinic sources claim that the Sadducees differ from the Pharisees concerning ritual purity and Sabbath observance. Other beliefs concerning rituals such as those related to the Temple and the Sadducean/Boethusian method of reckoning Pentecost coincide with priestly practices.

Essenes. Largely due to the discovery of the *Dead Sea Scrolls at *Qumran, the best known group from ancient sources is the *Essenes. The identification of the Qumran community with Essenes is not found in the Scrolls; rather, the impressive agreement of the evidence in the scrolls with that of the other key sources for Essenes (the Roman geographer Pliny the Elder, Philo, and Josephus) makes highly probable the identification of the Qumran community as Essenes. Still, discrepancies remain and the portrait that emerges is far from complete. Both Philo and Josephus number the Essenes at more than four thousand and say that the Essene communities were found throughout Palestine. Pliny locates a major settlement of the Essenes on the northwest corner of the Dead Sea, between Jericho and En-gedi, which all but names the site at Qumran. That site could accommodate about two hundred members at any one time; the majority of Essenes must have lived elsewhere. Both the Scrolls and Josephus seem to provide for two orders of Essenes: celibate men and those who married and had families. It is presumed that Qumran was a celibate community of Essenes and may have served as a center for Essenes from other locations—though the evidence does not rule out other interpretations. The history of the group is only imprecisely known. The Essenes may have originated in the early second century BCE. Even though the Qumran site was destroyed in the war against Rome, because the majority of Essenes lived at other settlements it is not impossible that the group persisted after 70 CE, though evidence to support their survival is hard to find.

Both the Qumran community and the other Essene groups were tightly organized. Those living outside of Qumran offered hospitality to other members, and in general the Essenes studiously avoided contact with outsiders. The penalties were severe for those who violated the rules and purity regulations of the community and for those who denigrated the community in any way. The Essenes were hierarchically organized according to seniority, standing within the community, and "perfection of spirit," with priests at the top. Admission to the group entailed a graduated process over two to three years, which was carefully regulated; there was also provision for expulsion. Full membership involved some form of communal property (even though there appears to have been some private ownership allowed), as well as communal meals and communal funds. The Essenes rigorously kept the *Sabbath. The evidence concerning the attitude of the Essenes toward animal *sacrifice and Temple worship is confusing. Possible interpretations include: there were times in the history of the group when they sent offerings to the Temple and times when they did not; or, the Qumran community dissented from the official Temple ritual, whereas the other Essene communities did not. Among their beliefs were theological determinism, present participation in "eternal life" as well as one which extended beyond the grave, and the notion of a final and universal conflagration.

Other Groups. Philo mentions the Therapeutae, a celibate community of men and women living outside of Alexandria. Their piety and communal practices resemble those of celibate Essenes, with whom there may be some connection. The evidence for *scribes in the first century CE is at best sparse and confusing, and the portrait that emerges from the various sources is incoherent. Despite the presentation of the scribes in the New Testament, scribes do not seem to have formed an organization with its own membership. Rather, scribalism was a profession and a class of literate individuals who functioned as personal secretaries and public officials at all levels of Jewish society. Scribes who worked with the ruling class would most likely have been learned in all aspects of Judaism.

There are also first century Jewish groups whose activity seems to have been primarily political during the time leading up to and throughout the First Jewish Revolt. Josephus wrote of the *Zealots mainly as a group in Jerusalem from 68–70 CE, who spent most of their energy struggling with other Jewish revolutionary groups until Jerusalem was surrounded, when they united against the Romans and mostly died fighting. Josephus also mentions the Fourth Philosophy, a group similar to the Pharisees except for their belief that only God should be acknowledged as king and ruler. The Fourth Philosophy spawned the Sicarii, who specialized in assassinating Jews who collaborated with the Romans. They may have been motivated in part by eschatological and messianic expectations.

Just as there was no "normative Judaism" in the first century CE, so too the borders of first century Judaism were not impermeable. Several groups attest to the porous nature of first century Jewish identity. Most clearly on the "outside" from all but their own perspective are the *Samaritans, yet there are many reasons to view them as among the Judaisms of the age. The Samaritans believed themselves to be the authentic representatives of Mosaic religion. They are characterized by the building of their temple on Mount Gerizim and worship there rather than in Jerusalem, and by limiting themselves to their own version of the Pentateuch, which emphasizes the divine sanctity of Gerizim as the center for Israel's cultic life. Ranging from "inside" to "just outside" from a first century perspective, and yet clearly on the outside from twentieth century Jewish and Christian perspectives are Jewish Christians, a label that encompasses a complex situation and a great variety. Examples include a number of named Jewish Christian groups mentioned in early patristic sources who share their adherence to Jewish beliefs and practices alongside their messianic understanding of Jesus and often a virulent anti-Pauline strain; the community underlying the gospel of *Matthew, who seem to have understood themselves as recently and bitterly separated from the local *synagogue because of their messianic beliefs, despite the fact that they were better at practicing their Judaism; the gospel of *John may be appealing to Jews who have a secret and incipient belief in Jesus (represented by Nicodemus, the parents of the man born blind, and *Joseph of Arimathea), urging them to grow in their understanding and not to be afraid of expulsion from the synagogue or of leaving their Jewish roots behind.

The above Judaisms present only a partial picture of the diversity of the first century. Josephus and Philo are examples of individuals who do not give us a clear sense of what, if any, Jewish group they might represent (despite Josephus's claim to have been a Pharisee from the age of nineteen). Most of the first-century Jewish writings preserved in the apocrypha and pseudepigrapha are not linked to the above-named groups, yet they add significantly to the diversity and complexity of the picture. The several apocalypses and the apocalyptic features of other writings add another substantial dimension. There seem to have been a number of small groups that placed an emphasis on *baptism, whether for ritual purification, initiation, or both. We have only glimpses of other features of the Judaisms of the first century: possible Jewish-*Gnostic tendencies, peasant social banditry groups, popular messianic movements, prophetic movements and groups which formed around a wide range of charismatic leaders.

Common Elements. What do these diverse Judaisms share? In part it is what Lester Grabbe has termed "personal Jewish identity": belief in one God; the concept of being part of the chosen people—Israel; the rejection of images in worship; the centrality of *Torah; and the practice of *circumcision. But even these characteristics are complex. Torah is a good example. The third part of Jewish *canon (the Writings) was not yet closed; in general, different Jews had different ideas about what to include, which text or translation to read, which parts of the Torah, Prophets, and Writings were more authoritative, and how they should be interpreted. Also connecting the various first century Judaisms was the Jerusalem *Temple. The Temple was central both within Roman Palestine and in the Diaspora, despite the obvious problem of distance. In Jewish writings the Temple varies from concrete reality to metaphor to idealization. Long after its destruction, the Mishnah discusses the Temple as if it were still standing. Even those who were critical of current Temple practices, such as the Qumran community, did not contemplate permanently abandoning it. There are exceptions, like the Samaritans, who rejected the Jerusalem Temple, or the community of Leontopolis in Egypt, who built another. Yet even for such dissidents, temple cult in some form was central.

Judas Iscariot. Judas Iscariot is mentioned only in the Gospels and Acts. The name Iscariot probably means "man from Kerioth" (a village in southern Judea) because "from" is used with the name in John (12.4; etc.) and because similar names occur in *Josephus.

Only in John is Judas called Simon's son (6.71; 13.2, 26), and Simon is also Iscariot (6.71; 13.26). So was the name Iscariot given to Judas or to his father or to both? Only John says that Judas was "a thief" and "kept the common purse" (12.6; 13.29). Unlike the *synoptic Gospels, John does not mention the kiss to indicate the one whom the authorities sought.

Judas was remembered for his betrayal of Jesus, an incident on which the sources agree (Mark 3.19 par.; 14.10–11, 43–45 par.; Matt. 26.25; John 6.71; 12.4; Acts 1.16). The motives for Judas's behavior cannot be precisely determined. Mark and Luke report that Jewish authorities promised Judas money for his action, but Matthew says that they paid him thirty pieces of silver immediately, a particular derived from the Hebrew Bible (Matt. 26.14–16; 27.3–10; Zech. 11.12–13; Jer. 18.2–3; 32.6–15). Judas repented, returned the money, and hanged himself. The authorities used the money to buy the "Field of Blood," but Acts 1.18–19 reports that Judas himself bought the field with his blood money and that he died as the result of a fall when "all his bowels gushed out." According to Acts 1.16, 20, his end was predicted in Psalms 69.25 and 109.8.

According to John 13.18, Jesus chose Judas deliberately so that the scripture (Ps. 41.9) might be fulfilled by his betrayal. John agrees with the Synoptics that at the Last Supper Jesus predicted his betrayal by Judas; but John, unlike the Synoptics, does not leave the identity of the traitor in doubt (13.26), since "the devil had already put it into the heart of Judas . . . to betray him" (13.2, 27). Luke also attributes Judas's action to Satan's influence (Luke 22.3).

Accounts of Judas are varied, inconsistent, and influenced by theological opinions of the writers, the belief in the fulfillment of scripture, and the idea that God brings death to ungodly persons (2 Macc. 9.5–12). It is therefore difficult to assess the historicity of Judas and his action. Why, for example, does Mark not mention the name of Judas in the story of the traitor (14.17–21)? Yet all sources list him among Jesus' disciples and know him as Jesus' betrayer. Perhaps as tradition grew the name of Judas became more infamous and the details of his demise more appalling.

Jude, The Letter of. The letter of Jude was written to an unknown church or group of churches to combat the danger posed by certain charismatic teachers who were preaching and practicing moral libertinism. The author seeks to expose these teachers as ungodly people whose condemnation has been prophesied, and he urges his readers to maintain the apostolic gospel by living according to its moral demands.

Despite its brevity, the letter is rich in content, owing to its masterly composition and its economy of expression, which at times achieves an almost poetic effect. An analysis of the structure of the letter is essential to an adequate understanding of it:

I. Address and greeting (vv. 1–2)
II. Occasion and theme of the letter (vv. 3–4)
  A. Appeal to contend for the faith (v. 3)
  B. Background to the appeal: the false teachers (v. 4)
III. Body of the Letter (vv. 5–23)
  B¹. Background to the appeal: a commentary on four prophecies of the doom of the ungodly (vv. 5–19)
    1. Three biblical types (vv. 5–10)
    2. Three more biblical types (vv. 11–13)
    3. The prophecy of Enoch (vv. 14–16)
    4. The prophecy of the apostles (vv. 17–18)
  A¹. Appeal to Contend for the Faith (vv. 20–23)
    1. Exhortations (vv. 20–21)
    2. Advice on dealing with offenders (vv. 22–23)
IV. Concluding doxology (vv. 24–25)

It should be noted that the initial statement of the letter's theme (vv. 3–4) contains two parts that correspond, in reverse order, to the two parts of the body of the letter. The main purpose of the letter is the appeal "to contend for the faith," announced in v. 3 and spelled out in vv. 20–23. But v. 4 explains that this appeal is necessary because the readers are in danger of being misled by false teachers. The claim in v. 4 that these teachers are people whose ungodly behavior has already been condemned by God is then substantiated by the exegetical section (vv. 5–19), which argues that these are the people to whom the scriptural types and prophecies of judgment refer. This section establishes the danger in which the readers are placed by the influence of the false teachers and so performs an essential role as background to the appeal; it is not the main object of the letter, whose climax is reached only in the exhortations of vv. 20–23. Thus, the negative polemic against the false teachers is subordinate to the positive teaching of vv. 20–23. The letter concludes with a doxology (vv. 24–25), in effect a confident prayer that God will preserve the readers and achieve his purpose for them.

The form of the exegetical section (vv. 5–19) requires further explanation. It is not mere undisciplined denunciation, but carefully composed commentary that argues for the statement made in v. 4 that the condemnation of the false teachers has long been prophesied. Both the assumption that scripture is prophetic and the exegetical methods used to apply it to the present resemble the type of commentary (pēšer) found in the *Dead Sea Scrolls.

Jude cites four main "texts" (vv. 5–7, 11, 14–15, 17–18) and comments on each (vv. 8–10, 12–13, 16, 19). The first two are summary references to biblical figures who are types of the ungodly of the last days. The third is a prophecy quoted from the book of *Enoch (1.9), and the fourth gives a prediction of the apostles. The commentaries contain further allusions to scripture, the most prominent being the reference to an apocryphal account of the burial of Moses in v. 9. In each case, however, the transition from text to commentary is clearly marked by the word "these," indicating that the author's opponents are the people to whom the prooftext refers, and by change in tense to the present, indicating that the type or prophecy is now being fulfilled. Another feature of the exegetical method is the use of catchwords to link prooftexts with commentary and with each other; an example is "slander" in vv. 8, 9, 10.

Jude evidently had great respect for the book of *Enoch, quoted in vv. 14–15 and echoed elsewhere (see vv. 6, 12–13). V. 9 refers to an apocryphal text no longer extant, perhaps the lost ending of the Testament of Moses. The use of such literature may locate the letter in a Palestinian Jewish context, in which these works were highly valued. Other indications that point in the direction of Palestinian Jewish Christianity as the milieu in which Jude wrote are his exegetical methods, his dependence on the Hebrew text of the Bible rather than its Greek translation (the *Septuagint), his emphasis on the importance of ethical obligation rather than doctrinal orthodoxy, and his *apocalyptic outlook, which expects the *parousia in the near future. Some scholars therefore regard Jude as a relatively early work that affords a rare glimpse of early Jewish Christianity. But many other scholars date Jude relatively late (up to ca. 120 CE) and consider it an example of the post-Pauline development of early Christianity represented by such works as the *Pastoral letters and *Luke-*Acts. In favor of this latter view, two major claims are made—that Jude's view of "the faith" (vv. 3, 20) identifies Christianity with a fixed orthodoxy, and that v. 17 looks back to the age of the apostles as past—but both claims can be contested.

Two further issues related to the disagreement about the date and character of Jude are the identity of the opponents and the identity of the author. The false teachers whom Jude denounces have often been identified as *gnostics, but there are no clear traces of gnostic teaching in what Jude says about them. What is clear is that the opponents were antinomians who understood the grace of God (v. 4) as a deliverance from moral constraints. They were evidently itinerant teachers (v. 4a) and were accepted at the churches' fellowship *meals (v. 12a), where they laid claim to charismatic inspiration. They evidently regarded themselves and their followers as the truly spiritual people, distinguished from more conventional Christians by their Spirit-inspired freedom from all external authority (see v. 19). This kind of charismatic antinomianism may represent a distortion of Paul's teaching on freedom from the *Law; it would have been possible at any time in the New Testament period.

Most scholars are agreed that the Jude (a shortened form of Judas, the author's actual name, which few English translations use because of the association with *Judas Iscariot) to whom this letter is attributed is Judas the brother of Jesus (Mark 6.3). This identification is strongly implied by the phrase "brother of James" (v. 1), which distinguishes this Judas from others of the same name by mentioning his relation to *James the brother of the Lord (see Brothers and Sisters of Jesus). A majority of modern scholars think the letter is pseudepigraphical, written by a later Christian who attributed his work to Jesus' brother, but a strong case for authenticity is made by others, who point to the features already mentioned that may place the letter in the context of Palestinian Jewish Christianity.

RICHARD J. BAUCKHAM

Judges, The Book of. The book of Judges follows *Joshua and purports to cover the history of Israel from the time of the settlement until just before the establishment of the monarchy. The book's chronology is a problem since the sum of the periods mentioned in it comes to about four hundred years. The *Exodus is usually dated to the thirteenth century BCE and the anointing of *Saul to the middle of the eleventh century; consequently, the era of the judges as calculated by the book is far too long. The book presents the subjects of its narratives as referring to all Israel when originally these figures were associated with particular *tribes. It is not possible to relate the stories of these savior-judges to each other chronologically. The book of Judges is a collection of stories about ancient tribal heroes; the chronological sequence of these stories is certainly artificial, and the fact that the total number of heroes is twelve also suggests editorial design.

The book begins with an introduction (1.1–36) that serves to connect it with the book of Joshua. This introduction, in contrast with the account in Joshua, portrays the settlement as only partially successful and still somewhat incomplete (see Conquest of Canaan). A short discourse that follows (2.1–5) explains Israel's failure to complete the settlement successfully as the result of its disobedience. The purpose of this first introduction is to contrast the period of the judges with that of Joshua. Under Joshua's strong and effective leadership, the tribes enjoyed unity and success. No leader comparable to Joshua took his place, with the result that the unity of the tribes was broken: apostasy soon followed, then military defeat. Israel was faithful to Yahweh during Joshua's lifetime; after his death it fell away. Because Israel turned to other gods, it placed itself in mortal danger. The stories of the judges show how a number of tribal heroes were able to ward off this danger—but only for a time.

A second introduction (2.6–3.6) presents the period of the judges as one during which Israel was guilty of a series of apostasies. Each apostasy was followed by divine punishment, a prayer for help, the rise of a "judge" who saved Israel from destruction, and a period of peace when Israel was ruled by its savior-judge. This pattern is not reflected in all the narratives themselves; rather, it represents the Deuteronomic interpretation of this period in Israel's life (see Deuteronomic History).

The stories about the judges themselves begin in 3.7 and conclude with 16.31. The portrait of Othniel (3.7–11) is rather ill-defined, though it follows the Deuteronomic pattern: Israel sinned by worshiping the gods of Canaan; God gave Israel into the hands of its enemies for a time; the people repented and God raised up a warrior to deliver them; then Israel had rest for forty years. The story about Ehud (3.12–30) is a coarse Benjaminite saga about one of that tribe's ancient heroes who outwitted and then killed Eglon, king of *Moab. There is no narrative connected with Shamgar but only the statement that he "delivered Israel" (3.31).

The story of the prophet *Deborah and the commander Barak is told in both prose (4.1–23) and poetry (5.1–31). The poem of chap. 5 is known as the Song of Deborah and is the most authentic literary source from the period of the judges, probably composed a short time after the victory it celebrates. The story of Deborah and Barak exposes the conflicts that took place when the Israelite tribes that originally settled in the largely unoccupied highlands attempted to make their way into the more fertile and therefore more populated valleys. The tribal forces led by Deborah and Barak defeated a Canaanite army and secured the Esdraelon Valley for Israel. Archaeology has shown that Taanach was violently destroyed about 1125 BCE, when *Megiddo was occupied (see 5.19).

The story of *Gideon (6.1–8.35), also known as Jerubbaal, describes the fear with which Israelite farmers lived. There was the constant danger of having their harvest stolen by raiders. Gideon defeated the *Midianites, whose raids threatened the Israelite population in central Canaan, but he refused the offer of *kingship that the grateful tribes made. Gideon's son Abimelech, however, was quite different; he became king of *Shechem. Abimelech was not really a judge but served as commander of the tribal militia. His story (9.1–57) describes the folly of the monarchy. When the people of Shechem withdrew their support from him, Abimelech did not hesitate to turn his army against them. The remains of ancient Shechem (Tell Balatah) give evidence of a violent destruction in the twelfth century BCE. Abimelech's story was recounted by those who considered the monarchy an infringement upon the rights of Yahweh.

Following Abimelech's story, there is a short note about Tola and Jair (10.1–4). They are credited with no military exploits. The lack of any information about their activities stands in marked contrast with the stories about the exploits of the savior-judges. The two mentioned here, along with three others cited in 12.8–15, had some type of judicial and administrative authority during the period before the monarchy and therefore were known as judges; because details of their activity are so scant, they are sometimes called "minor judges." Later their title was given to military heroes whose exploits are recounted in the major portion of the book; these are the "major judges."

The story of Jephthah (10.6–12.7) shows that social class posed no barriers to exercising leadership within the Israelite community at this period; Jephthah was a son of a prostitute. He led a mercenary army in the north and was called by the elders of Gilead to deal with the Ammonites. Jephthah is remembered for the sacrifice of his daughter to fulfill a vow (11.34–40) and for his use of the password shibboleth during a civil war with the tribe of Ephraim (12.1–6).

Before the stories about Samson begin, there is another note about three judges who engaged in no military exploits but who, like Tola and Jair, were famous tribal leaders: Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon (12.8–15).

*Samson hardly fits the figure of a judge. His stories (13.1–16.31) do not describe leadership he provided for the Israelite tribes against their enemies; rather, they recount a series of personal battles he fought with the *Philistines. None of Samson's adventures have anything to do with the fate of Israel as a whole; he led no organized military campaigns. Samson is a tragic figure who was consumed in a Pyrrhic victory over his enemies. He is included among the judges because his final victory over the Philistines was remembered as a reaffirmation of God's presence with Israel.

The stories about the savior-judges portray them as heroes who led single tribes or groups of tribes in military campaigns in order to liberate Israel from periodic oppression by its enemies. Their rule was temporary. They led certain tribes in a specific military campaign and then, after the military threat was removed, they returned home. None of the judges succeeded in gaining the allegiance of all the tribes. They held power briefly and the area under their effective control was limited. In the present framework, however, these stories receive greater significance. They are not simply tribal sagas about famous heroes of the past; they have become testimonies to the power of Yahweh, who frees Israel when it repents and calls out for deliverance.

The predominant motif in these stories is Yahweh's deliverance of Israel through the judges. The judges are charismatic leaders upon whom has come the "spirit of Yahweh" (6.34; 11.29; 14.6,19; 15.14). This spirit enables them to accomplish what is apparently beyond their natural abilities. In Gideon's story, this receives special emphasis through the narrative about his call (6.11–23).

The remainder of the book of Judges (chaps.

17–21) is taken up with stories that illustrate the self-destructive forces at work within the Israelite tribes. These stories along with the introductions in 1.1–3.6 provide the work's basic theme. The introductory material raises the issue of strife among the tribes; the concluding chapters illustrate the extent to which this lack of unity threatened the very existence of the people of Israel.

Chaps. 17 and 18 deal with a certain Micah who set up his own shrine and introduced a *Levite from *Bethlehem to serve as his priest. This Levite was, in turn, recruited by the migrating Danites to serve as their priest. The tribe of *Dan is depicted in a very unfavorable light. The Danites lack the courage to remain in their original place of settlement; they steal Micah's *ephod, kidnap his priest, and massacre the peaceful village of Laish. The book ends with an internecine war between the tribes that almost succeeded in destroying the tribe of *Benjamin (chaps. 19–21). The purpose of these last few chapters is to portray the period just before the emergence of the monarchy as a time of chaos. The book ends with this characterization of the era: "In those days there was no king in Israel; all the people did what was right in their own eyes" (21.25). The picture of Israel in chaps. 17–21 makes the establishment of the monarchy inevitable if Israel was to survive.

Originally, stories about the most famous of tribal heroes circulated independently of one another. At some point during the period of the monarchy they were assembled in order to underscore the power and willingness of God to save Israel from those who would destroy it. This collection of stories did not involve extensive editing, which may explain some of the repetitions and apparent contradictions in the text. Under the influence of the book of *Deuteronomy, the stories about the judges were incorporated in a much larger work that traced the story of Israel in the land from the entrance under Joshua to the exile under the *Babylonians. The comprehensive purpose of this *Deuteronomic history was to convince the people of Judah that their *exile from the land was not due to some failure on God's part but, rather, that it was their own doing. Israel's peace in the land promised and given by God was constantly threatened by its disobedience and infidelity. The political and economic roots of Israel's problems with its neighbors were ignored in favor of a religious interpretation. Foreign invasions were divine punishment for Israel's infidelities with Canaanite gods. When Israel repented of its failure, foreign domination came to an end through the agency of a judge on whom had fallen the spirit of Yahweh.

For the Deuteronomists, the period of the judges was marked by apostasy after apostasy, which caused Israel to be given into the hands of oppressors. Though God saved Israel through the judges when the people cried for deliverance, Israel always repeated its infidelities. One result of this tendency to apostasy was God's determination not to drive out the nations, in order to test Israel's fidelity and to help instruct the people regarding the bitter consequences brought on by infidelity.

The book of Judges cannot be used to reconstruct the history of Canaan in the twelfth and eleventh centuries BCE except in the broadest possible terms. It describes this period as one of anarchy when the Israelites were competing with other peoples for the rich but limited resources of *Canaan. It portrays the era of the judges as a time when Israel was in the process of achieving a sense of national unity and of laying its own claim to the land of Canaan. Both the book of Judges and archaeology have shown this time to be one of political, social, and economic disorder. The Deuteronomic history continues in the books of *Samuel to show how Israel survived this difficult time.

Sometimes the perspective of the book of Judges is considered to be cyclical. The book does describe a cycle of apostasy, oppression, repentance, and deliverance followed by new apostasy, but this cycle is not endless: the anarchy of the era of the judges leads to the establishment of the monarchy. In addition, the text seems to be posing the question: How long can this cycle of apostasy, repentance, and deliverance go on? The conclusion of the Deuteronomic history states that there is a limit to the infidelities that Yahweh will countenance from Israel before expelling it from the land that had been promised and given to it.

Judgment. See Day of Judgment.

Judith, The Book of. Named after its heroine, the book of Judith is regarded by Jews and Protestants as apocryphal and by Roman Catholics and some Orthodox churches as deuterocanonical (see Apocrypha, article on Jewish Apocrypha). Judith is a beautiful and wealthy widow who, in defense of God and country, first captivates and then decapitates Holofernes, the Assyrian general besieging her hometown, Bethulia of Samaria. Often characterized as a type of novel, the book is best understood as a folktale about a pious widow who, strengthened by her faith in the God of Israel, courageously (and literally) took matters into her own hands and so saved Israel and Jerusalem.

The story is well-told, especially chaps. 10–13, which are a masterpiece of irony. The character and personality of the principal antagonists, as well as those of minor figures such as King *Nebuchadrezzar (called Nebuchadnezzar in the book), the Jewish elder Uzziah of Bethulia, and the Ammonite convert Achior, are all vividly drawn and take on a life of their own. Their speeches, conversations, and prayers, as well as the story's plot, clearly and effectively express the storyteller's theology and ethics. Nonetheless, the book fairly bristles with problems, as the struggles over its canonicity so clearly attest. While western church fathers routinely accepted the book as canonical, eastern fathers quite often did not.

Although the book purports to be a historical account, it abounds in serious errors concerning both history and geography, the most egregious being in 1.1, where Nebuchadnezzar (605–562 BCE) is described as king of the Assyrians with his capital at Nineveh! Moreover, in 1.13–16 he kills the great Median king Arphaxad (who is otherwise unknown to scholars) and destroys Ecbatana, the great city Arphaxad had founded (1.2–4), although in point of fact Ecbatana was founded by Deioces and was conquered by *Cyrus the Great in 554 BCE.

In chap. 2, geographical errors replace historical ones: Holofernes's army traveled from Nineveh to Northern Cilicia, some 800 km (500 mi), in three days (2.21), then fought its way through Put and Lud (2.23)—which are usually identified by scholars as being in Africa and Asia Minor, respectively—only to cross the Euphrates and proceed west through Mesopotamia (2.24) and arrive in Cilicia (2.25)! Paradoxically, the brief survey of Israel's history from the days of the ancestors into the early postexilic period by the Ammonite Achior (chap. 5), is a reasonably accurate account. So too, Holofernes's itinerary through Palestine (chaps. 2–3) seems to be more or less geographically correct. Yet, despite a wealth of geographical and topographical clues throughout the story, the location of Bethulia, the principal scene of the action, is totally unknown to scholars.

The moral and ethical views of the storyteller have frequently been censured, especially the treatment and obvious approval of the character and conduct of the heroine who, at least in her dealings with Holofernes, showed herself to be a shameless flatterer (11.7–8), a bold-faced liar (11.12–14, 18–19), and a ruthless assassin (13.7–8) who seemingly follows two highly popular but debatable axioms: "all's fair in love and war" and "the end justifies the means."

Yet both before and after her murderous (and salvific) act, Judith is regarded by her people as a saint, that is, one who is totally devoted to the Lord: diligent both in prayer (9.1–14) and in fasting (8.4–6), observant of the dietary laws (10.5; 12.2), honoring her husband's memory by remaining forever celibate after his death (16.22) and honored by all (8.8, 28–31; 16.21), and fearing the Lord (cf. 16.16). In the eyes of the storyteller, at least, Judith was the saint who murdered for her people and her God; she is the ideal Jewish woman, as her name, which is simply the feminine form of the word for "Jewish," suggests.

No other biblical book, in either its parts or its totality, is as quintessentially ironic as Judith. Given the sexist and patriarchal character of the day, its central theme is most ironic: "The Lord Almighty has foiled them by the hand of a woman" (16.5); this echoes, probably deliberately, the story of Jael (Judg. 4.17–22; 5.24–27). The storyteller probably intended even the opening verse (1.1) to be understood as ironic, and certainly all the major scenes and characters are.

A beautiful, desirable, but childless widow, Judith lived a celibate life after her husband's death; yet she gave political and spiritual rebirth to her people. Very feminine in appearance, she herself murdered the general, praying even as she decapitated him (13.7–8)! Neither King Nebuchadnezzar, lord of the whole world (2.5), nor Holofernes, the master of the west (2.21–3.9), could master Bethulia. The Ammonite Achior, a seasoned warrior who early in the story displayed more faith in Israel's God (5.20–21) than did Uzziah, the chief elder of Bethulia (7.29–31), fainted on seeing the head that Judith had cut off with her own two hands (14.6). The Assyrian patrol that captured Judith and her maid were so captivated by their captive that they escorted her into the well-protected tent of her intended victim (10.11–16).

The scenes featuring conversations between Holofernes and Achior (5.5–6.9) and between Holofernes and Judith (11.5–12.4, 14–19) abound in punctual ironies (i.e., irony at more or less isolated points) and, when taken together, are what literary critics call "episodic irony." These episodes result in a thematic irony in the book as a whole: Achior spoke the complete truth to Holofernes but was not believed, while Judith dissimulated, equivocated, and lied—and was totally believed! Holofernes had intended to have his way with Judith, but as Judith's song so eloquently expresses it, the exact opposite happened: "Her sandal ravished his eyes; her beauty captivated his mind; and the sword severed his neck" (16.9). Not surprisingly, this dramatic climax is a favorite theme of Renaissance artists.

The opinion sometimes expressed that the book is unbalanced, that chaps. 1–3 or even 1–7 are slow-moving and irrelevant to the main story in 8–16, and that this imbalance probably results from the union of two originally separate stories—that of a Mesopotamian king's war in the east and west [chaps. 1–3] and the tale of Judith—is unjustified. A careful analysis shows that the book is a unity, with chaps. 1–7, in a variety of ways and on a number of levels, serving as an effective and indispensable foil for chaps. 8–16. Moreover, each half of the book has a threefold chiastic structure and a distinctive thematic repetition, namely, fear or its denial in chaps. 1–7, and beauty and its effects in 8–16, with Judith's triumph over Holofernes (10.11–13.10a) being the story's climax in both form and content. Moreover, in chaps. 1–7 masculine, brute force wins many a battle; but in chaps. 8–16 Judith's feminine beauty and wiles, undergirded by her faith in God, wins the war. (None of this is to deny that Judith's song [16.1–17] may be, as several scholars have suggested, an older synagogal psalm adopted and adapted by the storyteller.)

As for the book's religious ideas, neither God's titles nor attributes are in any way noteworthy. His *covenant with Israel is interpreted largely in Deuteronomic terms (5.17–18, 20–21; 8.20; 11.10), with emphasis on the importance of *Jerusalem (4.2), its *Temple (4.2–3), and ritual (4.14–15; 8.5–6; 9.1; 11.13). The efficacy of *prayer, *fasting, and wearing sackcloth (4.10–15; 8.5–6; 9.1) is unquestioned, as is the importance of the dietary laws (10.5, 11–15; 12.2–4, 19). With the exception of *almsgiving and the baptizing of gentile converts (cf. 14.10), virtually all the traditional practices of Maccabean Pharisaism are mentioned. Clearly, the storyteller believed that courage and cleverness, Pharisaic piety and patriotism, undergirded by strong faith in the Lord, would be of benefit to Jews of any time or place.

Whatever the original language of the Judith story, the basis of the Greek version, as its many Hebraisms attest, was *Hebrew. In view of this fact, as well as the storyteller's Pharisaic theology and greater knowledge of Palestinian geography, one may infer that the author was a Palestinian *Pharisee.

As for the book's date of composition, though the story has a postexilic setting and a significant number of Persian nouns and personal names, it also has unmistakable Hellenistic features (cf. "garlands" in 3.7; reclining while eating in 12.15; "wearing garlands" in 15.13), as well as distinctively Maccabean/Hasmonean elements, notably the worshiping of a king as god (3.8), the sweeping political and military powers of the high priest (4.6–7), and the supremacy of the Jerusalem *Sanhedrin (4.6, 8; 11.14).

Other elements in the story are reminiscent of the general circumstances, terminology, spirit, and tradition of the days of Judas Maccabeus (167–161 BCE), especially of the defeat of Nicanor, the general under the infamous Antiochus Epiphanes (175–163 BCE), as narrated in 1 Maccabees 7.43–50. All this, plus the fact that the book has none of the anti-Sadducean spirit so characteristic of Pharisees in the days of Alexander Jannaeus (104–78 BCE), suggests that the book was composed in the days of John Hyrcanus I (135–105 BCE).

The *Septuagint version of the book, which appears to be a very literal translation of Hebrew syntax and idiom, nevertheless has a rich and varied Greek vocabulary. The translation was made no later than the first century CE, for Clement of Rome (ca. 96 CE) alludes to Judith (1 Clem. 55.45).

Unfortunately, the ancient versions are of little help in establishing either the Septuagint text of Judith or its Semitic basis. The Old Latin, Syriac, Coptic, and Ethiopic versions are all based upon the Septuagint, but no critical or scientific edition exists for any of them. Jerome's *Vulgate (ca.

405 CE) is a paraphrase of the then-current Aramaic text, which may be based upon the Greek rather than the Hebrew. Like Judith who stood alone to do the job, so also must the Septuagint of the book of Judith. CAREY A. MOORE

Jung and the Bible. There would be little challenge to the proposition that Carl Jung (1875–1961) paid more attention to the Bible than any other psychoanalytic thinker or that his views of the Bible provoked more commentary from his followers and other religious scholars than those of any comparable figure. All of Jung's discussions of biblical texts bear the unique mark of his psychological views and his theories of symbolic meaning. As is so often the case, Jung's immersion in the Bible reflects aspects of his personality and life experience.

Early Development. Jung's familiarity with the Bible came at an early age. He was born in Keswill on Lake Constance in Switzerland in 1875. His father was a minister and pastor of the Lutheran church there, but within six months moved to Laufen, where Jung spent his early years. Of this early experience, Jung wrote, "In my mother's family there were six parsons, and on my father's side not only was my father a parson but two of my uncles also. Thus I heard many religious conversations, theological discussions, and sermons."

Jung's relationship with his pastor father was not the happiest. The pastor was a pious and conservative man of God, but for all his religiosity he was unable to help his son with the childhood terrors and emotional turmoil, the severe nightmares and choking fits, that made life in the parsonage all but unbearable. Theological issues became a sticking point between them. Jung's curiosity and inquisitive mind led him to question his father's traditional beliefs, to which the older Jung would reply that one should not bother about thinking in religious matters, but should devote oneself to believing. Jung's early religious doubts seem to have centered around his conflicts toward his father and his deep-seated ambivalence, both toward his father and his father's religious views. For the son the religion of the father was a doctrine about God and had little to do with the living experience of God. In Jung's view, his father "had taken the Bible's commandments as his guide; he believed in God as the Bible prescribed and as his forefathers had taught him" but without any sense of "the immediate living God who stands, omnipotent and free above His Bible and His Church, who calls upon man to partake of His freedom." Much of Jung's later writing about religion reflects his underlying ambivalence toward his father and his constant effort to contest approaches to religion and the Bible that resulted in no more than stale doctrines and scientific facts and did not foster the life of the spirit and the enrichment of psychic life to which Jung devoted his life.

If Jung's religiously conservative father became the object of Jung's ambivalent conflicts, his mother played an important if opposite role. Her religious views were less rigid and little concerned with conventional piety. She introduced her son to works from other religious traditions and gave him a copy of Goethe's Faust when he was a university student. She also seems to have encouraged Jung's interest in spiritualism and parapsychological phenomena.

Jung's Approach. One cannot help but be impressed by the extent to which Jung was steeped in biblical lore. In none of his writings is he ever very far from the discussion of biblical themes or from the use of scriptural references to make his point. In the preface of Answer to Job, he stated, "I do not write as a biblical scholar (which I am not), but as a layman and physician who has been privileged to see deeply into the psychic life of many people." He was not interested in the usual questions of biblical research—the meaning, origins, cultural background, and history behind biblical texts. He sought to find that meaning of the texts that would speak to modern men and women in their present historical and cultural experience. He was less concerned with the origins of the texts than with their effects on the lives of contemporary readers.

His familiarity with the Bible is impressive. References can be found from all but thirteen of the sixty-six books in the Hebrew Bible and New Testament. The gospel of John was his favorite—he cited it more than 120 times. He was well acquainted with the *Apocrypha and *Pseudepigrapha, quoting from the books of *Enoch, 2 *Esdras, *Tobit, and the *Wisdom of Solomon. He also made references to the New Testament apocryphal writings, quoting from the Gospel of the Egyptians, the book of the Apostle Bartholomew, the Gospel of Peter, the Acts of Peter, the Acts of John, the Gospel of Philip, and the Acts of Thomas. References to biblical figures and biblical phrases flowed easily from his pen. Further testimony to the significance of holy writ in Jung's life are the inscriptions on the family tomb in Küsnacht. The first reads Vocatus atque non vocatus Deus aderit ("Summoned or not, God will be here")—the same words were inscribed on Jung's bookplate and over the entrance to his home. The second is Primus homo terrenus de terra; secundus homo coelestis de coelo ("The first man was earthly, from the earth; the second man was heavenly, from heaven"; 1 Cor. 15.47). In explaining the first inscription over his doorway, he said, "I have put the inscription there to remind my patients and myself: timor dei initium sapientiae ['the fear of God is the beginning of wisdom']. Here another not less important road begins, not the approach to Christianity, but to God himself and this seems to be the ultimate question."

Certainly Jung's use of the Bible was idiosyncratic. For him it was a primary source of material that could be translated into terms of his psychological system—with particular emphasis on the symbolic dimension of scriptural references and events that he was able to connect with aspects of his own views about the role of myths and symbols in human psychic functioning and their connection with the collective unconscious and archetypal symbols. Myths were not mere words or stories but living truths and psychic realities that exercise their power on the human soul by their use of symbolic language. Symbols thus served as the vehicles of psychic transformation that extended beyond the communication of meaning to the level of psychic integration and spiritual revitalization.

His effort was consistently directed to viewing scripture in such a way as to make it relevant to psychic concerns. He argued that the religious propositions in the Bible had their origin in the human psyche and that their meaning was in some sense determined by psychic roots, whether conscious or unconscious. They are in effect psychic facts and relevant to psychic truths that are concerned with the illumination of the soul. Their aim and purpose are not to provide information but to bring about psychic change. Jung endorsed the view that "all scripture is inspired by God and useful for teaching, for reproof, for correction, and for training in righteousness, so that everyone who belongs to God may be proficient, equipped for every good work" (2 Tim. 3.16). Insofar as religious statements are "psychic confessions" deriving from the unconscious, they are like dreams that enter consciousness to inspire new insight and illumination. Thus, the *prophets spoke of being seized by the *word or *spirit of God. The psyche becomes the place where the divine and human interact—transcendence is replaced by immanence. The scripture becomes the vehicle and means of God's presence and action in the soul. Behind and in the words there is the Word.

Christ as Archetype of the Self. A good example of this usage is Jung's development of Christ as the symbol for the integrated self. The Self in Jung's psychology represents the unity and wholeness of the personality, embracing all psychic phenomena. It stands for the goal of integration of the total personality and individuality. This archetypal image is expressed in mandalas and in the heroes of myth and legend but above all in the image of Christ who "exemplifies the archetype of the Self." As he comments in Answer to Job, "Christ would never have made the impression he did on his followers if he had not expressed something that was alive and at work in their unconscious. Christianity itself would never have spread through the pagan world with such astonishing rapidity had its ideas not found an analogous psychic readiness to receive them."

He makes use of the Johannine theme of Christ as the way, the truth, and the light. Christ thus comes to symbolize the way of love (John 13.35), service (Mark 10.43), the life of the Spirit (Gal. 5.19–22), salvation, and reconciliation. Christ thus becomes the archetype of the Self—the Christ-event not only speaks to the soul but acts within it to awaken, revive, cleanse, and save. In psychological terms, the Christ-event means that to become true Selves we must acquire a broader consciousness that connects the sense of identity and wholeness with love of the neighbor. Love is the mark of the Christian. Jung observes: "The men of that age were ripe for identification with the word made flesh, for the founding of a community united by an idea, in the name of which they could love one another and call each other brothers. The old idea of . . . a mediator in whose name new ways of love would be opened, became a fact, and with that human society took and immense stride forward."

In this fashion Jung strove to bring the scripture closer to vital interests and make it a force for psychic enrichment and integration—far different from his father's stale reverence for the words of scripture rather than the relation of the Bible to real life and the God of life. As he put it, "The Bible is not the words of God, but the Word of God." As the archetype of the Self, Christ becomes a real event in the life of the soul. Christ acts in the soul to draw out real effects and changes. The Christ symbol brings with it a power through *grace to become what one could not become on one's own.

Answer to Job. Despite his frequent allusions to scripture, the Answer, written in 1952, was his only work based exclusively on a scriptural text. It was meant to be his interpretation of the Old Testament God-image of Judaism and its transformation into the Christian God. His portrayal of God in this work was controversial and provocative, challenging the traditional Christian view of God by its theory of the "dark side" of God. Jung's God, from one perspective, is like a reflection of *gnostic dualism, ruling the world by the forces of good, embodied in the figure of Christ, and evil, embodied in the figure of *Satan. The dualism of good and evil is integrated in the unified image of God.

From another point of view, he saw God and the *Trinity in terms of a symbolic dynamic pertaining to the individual soul and the whole of Judeo-Christian culture. In the first stage God is Yahweh of the Old Testament; in the second stage the image of the Son and behind him the loving Father dominates the New Testament and its historical developments; and finally, with the doctrine of the Holy Spirit we enter the post–New Testament era of Christian history and development. We can hear the echoes of Joachim di Fiore and his preaching of the final and consummate age of the Holy Spirit that stirred millennial visions in the twelfth century. In Jung's eyes the trinitarian doctrine was rooted in archetypal symbols that characterize the collective unconscious of humanity. Despite his disclaimer that he was only addressing the image of God as a psychological construct and not as a reality outside the mind, Jung's treatment of the subject often seems to forget or ignore his own qualifications.

To recapitulate the story of Answer to Job: the adversary of God, Satan, casts doubt on the faithfulness of God's mortal servant *Job. Jung puzzles as to why Yahweh accepts the testimony of the father of lies and seems not to know Job's true character. Why should God believe Satan rather than his own omniscience? In any event, God turns Job over to the torments of the devil in order to win the wager with Satan. All Job's possessions and even his children are destroyed before his face, yet he still cries out in his grief, "The Lord gave and the Lord has taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord" (Job 1.21). Satan ups the ante, and Job is subjected to further torments and afflictions. In his misery Job turns to his friends for solace, but they are helpless to explain his poor fortune, appealing to conventional wisdom which proves inadequate.

Yahweh answers Job's appeals for mercy not by rejecting the deceptions of Satan but by majestic declarations of his omnipotence (Job 38–40). But, asks Jung, what of the missing omniscience? The compensatory outpouring of rich gifts, the thousands of head of cattle, camels, oxen, and so on, even the blessings of new sons and daughters, hardly measure up to the loss of the others whom Job had loved and cherished. This God, says Jung, has no feeling, so lost in his own omnipotence is he.

The drama progresses as the figure of Sophia, a feminine figure representing *Wisdom as found in the *wisdom literature, enters. If Yahweh had consulted her rather than Satan, he would have known Job's faithfulness. Her task is to help undo the damage caused by God's omnipotence. Under her influence, Yahweh wishes to become human in order to make recompense for the torments he inflicted on Job, to restore the moral balance, and particularly to avoid the consequence of becoming a discredited and disregarded god. Most of all, he wishes to save himself from his own terrible and heartless indifference to human fate and sufferings. He can become human only through the help of Sophia, the prototype of *Mary. Sophia helps him see that his first creation went awry because of the devices of Satan in the guise of the serpent. To avoid the taint of Satan's influence, God would have to be born of a *virgin by an immaculate conception.

Answer to Job was essentially Jung's culminating effort to join his conflictual struggle with God and at another remove his father. His view of God was transmuted into a cultural crisis of modernity. He commented: "Later generations could afford to ignore the dark side of the Apocalypse, because the specifically Christian achievement was something that was not to be frivolously endangered. But for modern man the case is quite otherwise. We have experienced things so unheard of and so staggering that the question of whether such things are in any way reconcilable with the idea of a good God has become burningly topical."

Thus, Jung argues, the insistence on the concept of God as all good has lost its meaning for contemporary men and women and has led to the abandonment of God. The result is a mechanistic view of the universe, a decline of spiritual values, and a sense of the meaninglessness of human existence. The presence of *evil in the world creates a crisis for Christian consciousness: If God is omnipotent and all good, why does evil exist? Jung's answer is that God is not all good, but that he encompasses both good and evil. We can see the reflection of Jung's father's face in the face of the God he portrays in the Answer. It is a face compounded of good and evil that presents itself as a mystery and an enigma, just as his own father's difficult character had been for Jung as a child.

Conclusion. The Bible was for Jung not just another book to be read critically and skeptically, as *Freud might have done. It was a book of faith, of hope, of inspiration, in which Jung found the words and images that carried him along his fevered search for meaning, psychological truth, and wholeness in his own and in his contemporaries' psychic lives. His concerns were far removed from the more scientific objectives of biblical hermeneutics and exegesis. He sought what was for him a psychological cause, a lifelong crusade, to translate the God of his father into a living God of Jung's own making. The success of his effort and the validity of his accomplishment remain enigmatic.

Junia. The only woman called an *apostle (Rom. 16.7) in the New Testament. *Paul's relative or compatriot, Junia had been in prison, perhaps for the gospel. Her name suggests that she may have been a freedwoman or a descendant of a slave freed by a member of the Junian clan. As an apostle, Junia must have claimed to have seen the risen Jesus and have engaged in missionary work (cf. 1 Cor. 9.1).

Although previous scholars intrepreted the name Junia as masculine, church fathers, including Origen, John Chrysostom, and Jerome, identified her as a woman. Further, while the hypothetical male name Junias is unattested in ancient inscriptions, the female Latin name Junia occurs over 250 times in Greek and Latin inscriptions found in Rome alone. Therefore scholars today generally interpret the name as feminine.

Justice. See Righteousness.

Justification. The concept of justification is based on that of *righteousness; in fact, both can translate the same Greek word (dikaiosunē). As applied to human beings, this connotes the status of being in the right when tested or judged by God. That condition lies at the heart of the covenantal relationship between Yahweh and his people, Israel. For the maintenance of *covenant relations, righteousness on Israel's part is also required, with the prospect of attaining approval from God both in this life and, in later literature, at the final judgment.

*Paul opposed this construction for two reasons. The claim that those who keep God's law will be set right with God and given approved status before God is considered by Paul to be a vain hope, inasmuch as this class of "righteous" persons has no qualified member, for "all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God" (Rom. 3.23). There is no prospect of being set right with God as long as a person stays with nomistic religion (Gal. 5.3). Instead, the outlook on such a basis is one of universal condemnation for both Jews and gentiles, since all have become sinners (Rom. 2.17–3.20; Gal. 3.21–22). All stand under divine judgment (Rom. 1.18; 3.9,19), and must remain so unless God takes action on their behalf.

The second reason why Paul opposed nomistic religion is that he believed a new era had dawned with the coming of the *Messiah. What Judaism anticipated as God's gracious intervention at the endtime, Paul now declares as a present reality for all who are of faith (Rom. 5.1), in the sure confidence that at the future tribunal the past verdict of acceptance and amnesty will be confirmed (Gal. 5.5; Phil. 1.11; 3.9). In this way the tension of the Christian life ("already justified . . . not yet finally 'saved' ") is maintained as a part of Paul's proclamation.

Justification has been defined as "the gracious action of God accepting persons as righteous in consequence of faith resting upon His redemptive activity in Christ" (Vincent Taylor). This definition needs strengthening by a recognition that Paul constantly lays a basis for what he believed about God's "redemptive activity" in Christ's obedience (Rom. 5.9) or righteousness (Rom. 5.18). Consequently, more should be said in any summary statement about Paul's insistence on "imputation" as providing a rationale for the divine enterprise in canceling human guilt and providing acceptance in his holy presence. Romans 3.21–26 and 2 Corinthians 5.18–21 stand out as central to Paul's teaching. Also, Paul's thought is as much conditioned by promises of rectification of personal relationships as
